2. Egelhoff v. Egelhoff, No. 99-1529. The case presented the question whether ERISA preempts a state law that purports to revoke the designation of beneficiary made pursuant to the terms of an ERISA plan. David Egelhoff designated petitioner Donna Rae Egelhoff, his wife at the time, as beneficiary under ERISA life insurance and pension plans. David and Donna Rae subsequently divorced. Donna Rae remained the beneficiary of record under both plans, however, and after David's death in 1994 she received the life insurance proceeds. Respondents, who are David's children from another marriage and other statutory heirs, filed an action seeking to recover the life insurance proceeds and pension benefits, relying on a State of Washington statute that revokes upon divorce a provision made in favor of the former spouse during marriage "that relates to the payment or transfer at death of the decedent's interest in a nonprobate asset." The Washington Supreme Court agreed with respondents' position, rejecting petitioner's claim that ERISA preempted the state statute. As amicus curiae supporting petitioner, we argued that because the Washington statute regulates the designation of beneficiaries and payment of benefits, it "relate[s] to any employee benefit plan" and thus ERISA expressly preempts the state law, see 29 U.S.C. 1144(a). The Washington statute squarely conflicts with several substantive provisions of ERISA and thus, we maintained, is also preempted under ordinary conflict preemption principles.

The Supreme Court reversed and remanded the judgment of the Washington Supreme Court in an opinion by Justice Thomas, agreeing with our arguments. Because a state law relates to an ERISA plan, and is therefore preempted, "if it has a connection with or reference to such a plan," the Court noted that "to determine whether a state law has the forbidden connection, we look both to the objectives of the ERISA statute as a guide to the scope of the state law that Congress understood would survive, as well as to the nature of the effect of the state law on ERISA plans" (internal quotation marks omitted). Applying that framework, the Court concluded that the Washington statute has an "impermissible connection with ERISA plans" because it "binds ERISA plan administrators to a particular choice of rules for determining beneficiary status," thus requiring administrators to "pay benefits to the beneficiaries chosen by state law, rather than to those identified in the plan documents" and thereby "implicat[ing] an area of core ERISA concern." Specifically, the Court noted, the statute "runs counter to ERISA's commands that a plan shall 'specify the basis on which payments are made to and from the plan,' § 1102(b)(4), and that the fiduciary shall administer the plan 'in accordance with the documents and instruments governing the plan,' § 1104(a)(1)(D), making payments to a 'beneficiary' who is 'designated by a participant, or by the terms of [the] plan.' § 1002(8)." Furthermore, the Court held that "[t]he Washington statute also has a prohibited connection with ERISA plans because it interferes with nationally uniform plan administration," which is impossible "if plans are subject to different obligations in different States."

Finally, the Court rejected respondent's arguments that ordinary ERISA preemption analysis should not apply because the Washington statute allows employer opt-out, because it involves both family law and probate law, traditional areas of state regulation, or because a finding of preemption here would require a finding of preemption of the various state statutes that disinherit murdering heirs.

Justice Scalia concurred, joined by Justice Ginsburg. In a one-paragraph opinion, he noted the continued uncertainty of the meaning of the "relate to" provision, and stated that ERISA can take on "a plausible and precise content, only by interpreting the 'relate to' clause as a reference to our ordinary pre-emption jurisprudence."

Justice Breyer dissented, joined by Justice Stevens. He concluded that the statute was not preempted by ERISA and argued that "[t]here is no direct conflict or contradiction between the Washington statute and the terms of the plan documents here at issue." Rather, he expressed the view that the Washington statute merely served a gap-filling role, by providing what would happen when a beneficiary designation is invalid. "To refer to state property law to fill in that blank," he concluded, "cannot possibly create any direct conflict with the plan documents." Nor did he agree with the Court's conclusion that the Washington statute "interfere[d] with nationally uniform plan administration" by requiring administrators to "familiarize themselves with state statutes." Any burden, he concluded, was minimal, consisting of nothing more than a "one-time requirement that would fall primarily upon the few who draft model ERISA documents, not upon the many who administer them. So meager a burden cannot justify pre-empting a state law that enjoys a presumption against pre-emption."

B. Grants of Certiorari

On March 26, the Court granted petitions for a writ of certiorari in the following cases:

1. EEOC v. Waffle House, No. 99-1823. The case presents the question whether an employee's agreement to arbitrate employment-related disputes with an employer bars the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), as plaintiff in an enforcement action against the employer, from obtaining victim-specific remedies for discrimination against the employee, such as backpay, reinstatement, and damages. Based on a claim filed with it, the EEOC brought this action in district court alleging that respondent had engaged in unlawful employment practices on the basis of disability. Respondent moved to compel arbitration or to dismiss the action under the Federal Arbitration Act, 9 U.S.C. 1 et seq., on the ground that the claimant had agreed to arbitrate employment-related disputes. The district court denied the motion, finding that claimant and respondent had not entered into an agreement to arbitrate. The court of appeals affirmed the district court's refusal to compel arbitration, concluding (contrary to the view of the district court) that claimant and respondent had agreed to arbitration, but that that agreement did not prevent the EEOC from bringing this public enforcement action. The court also held, however, that, although the EEOC could obtain general injunctive relief, the agreement between claimant and respondent did preclude the EEOC from obtaining other, victim-specific forms of relief, such as backpay, reinstatement, and compensatory and punitive damages. We contend that the appeals court's decision conflicts with the purposes and practices of the dual system of private and public enforcement established by the 1972 amendments to Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, codified at 42 U.S.C. 2000e-5(f)(1) (providing the EEOC with independent authority to bring suit in court). We urged the Court to grant certiorari because the decision in this case, and a similar one from the Second Circuit, conflict with a decision of the Sixth Circuit holding that an indistinguishable arbitration agreement has no effect on the ability of the EEOC to obtain all of the forms of relief authorized by Congress, including the precise forms of victim-specific relief barred by the Fourth Circuit.

2. Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Mineta, No. 00-730. The case presents the questions (1) whether the court of appeals misapplied the strict scrutiny standard in determining if Congress had a compelling interest to enact legislation designed to remedy the effects of racial discrimination, and (2) whether the United States Department of Transportation's (DOT) current Disadvantaged Business Enterprise (DBE) program is narrowly tailored to serve the compelling governmental interest of remedying the effects of racial discrimination that impede the ability of socially and economically disadvantaged individuals to participate in opportunities created by government contracting.

We contended that further review of the issues raised by petitioner is not, at this time, warranted, because the court of appeals in this case correctly and carefully applied the test of strict scrutiny to evaluate the constitutionality of the DOT's DBE program, and its decision does not conflict with any decision of this Court or any other court of appeals. We noted that this case focused primarily on a specific aspect of the DOT's small business program -- the use of Subcontractor Compensation Clauses -- that had been discontinued before the court of appeals issued its decision, and petitioner sought only prospective relief. Consequently, we argued, the case has become somewhat divorced from the concrete context of an actual application that traditionally assists this Court in deciding cases. Moreover, we noted, other federal courts are now reviewing the current DOT DBE program, and those cases will permit a number of circuits to address the constitutionality of the program in a context with a more meaningful forward-looking effect, and consequently provide this Court with the opportunity to conduct further review as appropriate.

3. McCarver v. North Carolina, No. 00-8727. The case presents the question whether the execution of a mentally retarded person violates the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. We have not participated in this case, and we are determining whether participation is warranted.

D. Invitations

On March 26, the Supreme Court invited the Solicitor General to file briefs expressing the views of the United States on the petitions for certiorari in the following cases:

1. Rush Prudential HMO, Inc. v. Moran, No. 00-1021. Section 4-10 of the Illinois Health Maintenance Organization Act provides that, if a patient's primary care physician deems a proposed procedure desired by the patient to be medically necessary, but the HMO disagrees and denies coverage for the procedure, the patient may have the HMO's decision reviewed by an outside physician, and the HMO must abide by the reviewing physician's determination. The case presents the question whether Section 4-10 is preempted by ERISA. The Court previously called for the views of the United States in Montemayor v. Corporate Health Insurance, Inc., No. 00-0665, which raises virtually the same issue.

2. Edelman v. Lynchburg College. The case presents the questions (1) whether 29 C.F.R. 1601.12(b), which provides that a Title VII "charge may be amended to cure technical defects or omissions, including the failure to verify the charge," is invalid; and (2) if so, whether equitable tolling is appropriate with regard to a charging party who relied on that regulation.

II. Supreme Court Arguments

During the week of March 26, we are presenting oral arguments in the following cases:

1. United Dominion Industries v. United States, No. 00-157. The case involves the tax treatment of "product liability losses," which a corporation may carry back a maximum of ten years from the loss year and use as a deduction in the carryback year. 26 U.S.C. 172(b). Such losses occur when a taxpayer has a net operating loss for the year and the net operating loss is attributable in whole or in part to deductions for product liability expenses. The question presented is whether the availability of the "product liability loss" carryover for affiliated entities that file a consolidated return is to be determined by aggregating the income and expenses of the consolidated entities or, instead, separately calculating the income and expense of each entity. We argue that the court of appeals correctly applied Treasury Regulations in ruling that the proper method is to determine "product liability loss" separately for each entity and, therefore, that the product liability expenses of an entity with positive income may not be included in the "product liability loss" carryback for the consolidated group. Under the governing Treasury regulations, the product liability expenses of each affiliate must be netted against the income of that affiliate in determining the "separate taxable income" of that affiliate. When, as in this case, an affiliate has positive taxable income, then all of the product liability expenses have been used to reduce taxable income and there is no unconsumed product liability expenses to carryback on the consolidated return. The text and history of Section 172 make clear that the "taxpayer" to whom the "product liability loss" provisions apply is the corporation that has itself incurred product liability expenses and is unable fully to utilize them because of an insufficient amount of income. We argue that Congress did not intend to provide any additional tax benefit to a profitable corporation that used all of its product liability expenses as deductions against current income. Allowing the consolidated return to carryback "product liability losses" for profitable affiliates that already used the product liability expenses to reduce total income amounts to a double deduction and encourages significant tax avoidance abuses, in contravention of Congress's express intent that consolidated returns not be employed as an artifice for tax avoidance.

2. Atkinson Trading Co. v. Shirley, No. 00-454. As amicus curiae, we address the question whether the Navajo Nation may impose a hotel occupancy tax on non-Indian overnight guests at the Trading Post operated by petitioner on lands petitioner owns in fee, when the Trading Post is subject to federal regulations under the Indian Trader statutes, petitioner's land is wholly surrounded by Indian lands on the Navajo Reservation, and petitioner and its guests receive necessary government services from the Navajo Nation. The Court's decisions in Montana v. United States, 450 U.S. 544, 565-566 (1981), and Strate v. A-1 Contractors, 520 U.S. 438, 446 (1997), hold that a Tribe may tax or regulate the activities of nonmembers on nonmember fee land within a reservation if the nonmembers enter "consensual relationships with the tribe or its members," or if their conduct "threatens or has some direct effect on the political integrity, the economic security, or the health or welfare of the tribe." We contend that petitioner has, for Montana purposes, entered into a "consensual relationship" with the Navajo Nation by conducting a substantial business within the boundaries of the Tribe's Reservation, under regulations issued by the Secretary of the Interior that afford the Tribe the opportunity to play a substantial role in regulating that business. By applying for and accepting a federal Indian Trader's license under those regulations, petitioner has accepted privileges of trade to which the Tribe may attach a tax. That conclusion supports the tax here, even though the Navajo tax is formally assessed against petitioner's customers, rather than against petitioner itself. We also contend that the Tribe's occupancy tax is valid under Montana's second test because petitioner's business is subject to comprehensive federal regulations, enforceable by the Tribe, that reflect a conclusion by the Secretary of the Interior that petitioner's operations do have a direct effect on the Tribe and its members.

3. United States v. Oakland Cannabis Buyers' Cooperative, No. 00-151. The case presents the question whether medical necessity is a legally cognizable defense to a charge of distributing drugs in violation of the Controlled Substances Act (CSA). We argue that the Ninth Circuit's decision recognizing a medical necessity defense cannot be squared with the CSA, which makes it illegal to "manufacture, distribute, or dispense, or possess with intent to manufacture distribute, or dispense," any controlled substance, "except as authorized" under the Act. 21 U.S.C. 841(a)(1).

We contend that the text, structure and purpose of the CSA establish a judgment by Congress that

Syllabus

NOTE: Where it is feasible, a syllabus (headnote) will be released, as is being done in connection with this case, at the time the opinion is issued. The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Timber & Lumber Co., 200 U. S. 321, 337.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Syllabus

TEXAS v. COBB

CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS OF TEXAS

No. 99–1702. Argued January 16, 2001– Decided April 2, 2001

While under arrest for an unrelated offense, respondent confessed to a home burglary, but denied knowledge of a woman and child's disappearance from the home. He was indicted for the burglary, and counsel was appointed to represent him. He later confessed to his father that he had killed the woman and child, and his father then contacted the police. While in custody, respondent waived his rights under Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U. S. 436, and confessed to the murders. He was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death. On appeal to the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, he argued, inter alia, that his confession should have been suppressed because it was obtained in violation of his Sixth Amendment right to counsel, which he claimed attached when counsel was appointed in the burglary case. The court reversed and remanded, holding that once the right to counsel attaches to the offense charged, it also attaches to any other offense that is very closely related factually to the offense charged.

Held: Because the Sixth Amendment right to counsel is "offense specific," it does not necessarily extend to offenses that are "factually related" to those that have actually been charged. Pp. 4–11.

(a) In McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U. S. 171, 176, this Court held that a defendant's statements regarding offenses for which he has not been charged are admissible notwithstanding the attachment of his Sixth Amendment right to counsel on other charged offenses. Although some lower courts have read into McNeil's offense-specific definition an exception for crimes that are "factually related" to a charged offense, and have interpreted Brewer v. Williams, 430 U. S. 387, and Maine v. Moulton, 474 U. S. 159, to support this view, this Court declines to do so. Brewer did not address the question at issue here. And to the extent Moulton spoke to the matter at all, it expressly referred to the offense-specific nature of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. In predicting that the offense-specific rule will prove disastrous to suspects' constitutional rights and will permit the police almost total license to conduct unwanted and uncounseled interrogations, respondent fails to appreciate two critical considerations. First, there can be no doubt that a suspect must be apprised of his rights against compulsory self-incrimination and to consult with an attorney before authorities may conduct custodial interrogation. See Miranda, supra, at 479. Here, police scrupulously followed Miranda's dictates when questioning respondent. Second, the Constitution does not negate society's interest in the police's ability to talk to witnesses and suspects, even those who have been charged with other offenses. See McNeil, supra, at 181. Pp. 4–9.

REV_00261012

Syllabus

(b) Although the Sixth Amendment right to counsel clearly attaches only to charged offenses, this Court has recognized in other contexts that the definition of an "offense" is not necessarily limited to the four corners of a charging document. The test to determine whether there are two different offenses or only one is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not. Blockburger v. United States, 284 U. S. 299, 304. The Blockburger test has been applied to delineate the scope of the Fifth Amendment's Double Jeopardy Clause, which prevents multiple or successive prosecutions for the "same offense." See, e.g., Brown v. Ohio, 432 U. S. 161, 164–166. There is no constitutional difference between "offense" in the double jeopardy and right-to-counsel contexts. Accordingly, when the Sixth Amendment right to counsel attaches, it encompasses offenses that, even if not formally charged, would be considered the same offense under the Blockburger test. Pp. 9–11.

(c) At the time respondent confessed to the murders, he had been indicted for burglary but had not been charged in the murders. As defined by Texas law, these crimes are not the same offense under Blockburger. Thus, the Sixth Amendment right to counsel did not bar police from interrogating respondent regarding the murders, and his confession was therefore admissible. P. 11.

___ S. W. 3d ___, reversed.

REHNQUIST, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which O'CONNOR, SCALIA, KENNEDY, and THOMAS, JJ., joined. KENNEDY, J., filed a concurring opinion, in which SCALIA and THOMAS, JJ., joined. BREYER, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which STEVENS, SOUTER, and GINSBURG, JJ., joined.

REV_00261013

NOTICE: This opinion is subject to formal revision before publication in the preliminary print of the United States Reports. Readers are requested to notify the Reporter of Decisions, Supreme Court of the United States, Washington, D. C. 20543, of any typographical or other formal errors, in order that corrections may be made before the preliminary print goes to press.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 99–1702

TEXAS, PETITIONER v. RAYMOND LEVI COBB

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS OF TEXAS

[April 2, 2001]

CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals held that a criminal defendant's Sixth Amendment right to counsel attaches not only to the offense with which he is charged, but to other offenses "closely related factually" to the charged offense. We hold that our decision in McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U. S. 171 (1991), meant what it said, and that the Sixth Amendment right is "offense specific."

In December 1993, Lindsey Owings reported to the Walker County, Texas, Sheriff's Office that the home he shared with his wife, Margaret, and their 16-month-old daughter, Kori Rae, had been burglarized. He also informed police that his wife and daughter were missing. Respondent Raymond Levi Cobb lived across the street from the Owings. Acting on an anonymous tip that respondent was involved in the burglary, Walker County investigators questioned him about the events. He denied involvement. In July 1994, while under arrest for an unrelated offense, respondent was again questioned about the incident. Respondent then gave a written statement confessing to the burglary, but he denied knowledge relating to the disappearances. Respondent was subsenized in other contexts that the definition of an "offense" is not necessarily limited to the four corners of a charging instrument. In Blockburger v. United States, 284 U. S. 299 (1932), we explained that "where the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not." Id., at 304. We have since applied the Blockburger test to delineate the scope of the Fifth Amendment's Double Jeopardy Clause, which prevents multiple or successive prosecutions for the "same offence." See, e.g., Brown v. Ohio, 432 U. S. 161, 164–166 (1977). We see no constitutional difference between the meaning of the term "offense" in the contexts of double jeopardy and of the right to counsel. Accordingly, we hold that when the Sixth Amendment right to counsel attaches, it does encompass offenses that, even if not formally charged, would be considered the same offense under the Blockburger test.[3]

REV_00261014

While simultaneously conceding that its own test "lacks the precision for which police officers may hope," post, at 10, the dissent suggests that adopting Blockburger's definition of "offense" will prove difficult to administer. But it is the dissent's vague iterations of the "'closely related to'" or "'inextricably intertwined with'" test, post, at 10, that would defy simple application. The dissent seems to presuppose that officers will possess complete knowledge of the circumstances surrounding an incident, such that the officers will be able to tailor their investigation to avoid addressing factually related offenses. Such an

---

[3] In this sense, we could just as easily describe the Sixth Amendment as "prosecution specific," insofar as it prevents discussion of charged offenses as well as offenses that, under Blockburger, could not be the subject of a later prosecution. And, indeed, the text of the Sixth Amendment confines its scope to "all criminal prosecutions." assumption, however, ignores the reality that police often are not yet aware of the exact sequence and scope of events they are investigating– indeed, that is why police must investigate in the first place. Deterred by the possibility of violating the Sixth Amendment, police likely would refrain from questioning certain defendants altogether.

REV_00261023

It remains only to apply these principles to the facts at hand. At the time he confessed to Odessa police, respondent had been indicted for burglary of the Owings residence, but he had not been charged in the murders of Margaret and Kori Rae. As defined by Texas law, burglary and capital murder are not the same offense under Blockburger. Compare Texas Penal Code Ann. §30.02(a) (1994) (requiring entry into or continued concealment in a habitation or building) with §19.03(a)(7)(A) (requiring murder of more than one person during a single criminal transaction). Accordingly, the Sixth Amendment right to counsel did not bar police from interrogating respondent regarding the murders, and respondent's confession was therefore admissible.

The judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas is reversed.

It is so ordered.

REV_00261024

quently indicted for the burglary, and Hal Ridley was appointed in August 1994 to represent respondent on that charge.

Shortly after Ridley's appointment, investigators asked and received his permission to question respondent about the disappearances. Respondent continued to deny involvement. Investigators repeated this process in September 1995, again with Ridley's permission and again with the same result.

In November 1995, respondent, free on bond in the burglary case, was living with his father in Odessa, Texas. At that time, respondent's father contacted the Walker County Sheriff's Office to report that respondent had confessed to him that he killed Margaret Owings in the course of the burglary. Walker County investigators directed respondent's father to the Odessa police station, where he gave a statement. Odessa police then faxed the statement to Walker County, where investigators secured a warrant for respondent's arrest and faxed it back to Odessa. Shortly thereafter, Odessa police took respondent into custody and administered warnings pursuant to Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U. S. 436 (1966). Respondent waived these rights.

After a short time, respondent confessed to murdering both Margaret and Kori Rae. Respondent explained that when Margaret confronted him as he was attempting to remove the Owings' stereo, he stabbed her in the stomach with a knife he was carrying. Respondent told police that he dragged her body to a wooded area a few hundred yards from the house. Respondent then stated:

> "I went back to her house and I saw the baby laying on its bed. I took the baby out there and it was sleeping the whole time. I laid the baby down on the ground four or five feet away from its mother. I went back to my house and got a flat edge shovel. That's all

REV_00261015

> I could find. Then I went back over to where they were and I started digging a hole between them. After I got the hole dug, the baby was awake. It started going toward its mom and it fell in the hole. I put the lady in the hole and I covered them up. I remember stabbing a different knife I had in the ground where they were. I was crying right then." App. to Pet. for Cert. A–9 to A–10.

Respondent later led police to the location where he had buried the victims' bodies.

Respondent was convicted of capital murder for murdering more than one person in the course of a single criminal transaction. See Texas Penal Code Ann. §19.03(a)(7)(A) (1994). He was sentenced to death. On appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas, respondent argued, inter alia, that his confession should have been suppressed because it was obtained in violation of his Sixth Amendment right to counsel. Relying on Michigan v. Jackson, 475 U. S. 625 (1986), respondent contended that his right to counsel had attached when Ridley was appointed in the burglary case and that Odessa police were therefore required to secure Ridley's permission before proceeding with the interrogation.

The Court of Criminal Appeals reversed respondent's conviction by a divided vote and remanded for a new trial. The court held that "once the right to counsel attaches to the offense charged, it also attaches to any other offense that is very closely related factually to the offense charged." ___ S. W. 3d ___ 2000 WL 275644, *3 (2000) (citations omitted). Finding the capital murder charge to be "factually interwoven with the burglary," the court concluded that respondent's Sixth Amendment right to counsel had attached on the capital murder charge even though respondent had not yet been charged with that offense. Id., at *4. The court further found that respondent had asserted that right by accepting Ridley's appointment in the burglary case. See ibid. Accordingly, it deemed the confession inadmissible and found that its introduction had not been harmless error. See id., at *4–*5. Three justices dissented, finding Michigan v. Jackson to be distinguishable and concluding that respondent had made a valid unilateral waiver of his right to counsel before confessing. See 2000 WL, at *5–*13 (opinion of McCormick, P. J.).

REV_00261016

The State sought review in this Court, and we granted certiorari to consider first whether the Sixth Amendment right to counsel extends to crimes that are "factually related" to those that have actually been charged, and second whether respondent made a valid unilateral waiver of that right in this case. 530 U. S. 1296 (2000). Because we answer the first question in the negative, we do not reach the second.

The Sixth Amendment provides that "[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence." In McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U. S. 171 (1991), we explained when this right arises:

> "The Sixth Amendment right [to counsel] . . . is offense specific. It cannot be invoked once for all future prosecutions, for it does not attach until a prosecution is commenced, that is, at or after the initiation of adversary judicial criminal proceedings– whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment." Id., at 175 (citations and internal quotation marks omitted).

Accordingly, we held that a defendant's statements regarding offenses for which he had not been charged were admissible notwithstanding the attachment of his Sixth Amendment right to counsel on other charged offenses. See id., at 176.

REV_00261017

Some state courts and Federal Courts of Appeals, however, have read into McNeil's offense-specific definition an exception for crimes that are "factually related" to a charged offense.[1] Several of these courts have interpreted Brewer v. Williams, 430 U. S. 387 (1977), and Maine v. Moulton, 474 U. S. 159 (1985)– both of which were decided well before McNeil– to support this view, which respondent now invites us to approve. We decline to do so.

In Brewer, a suspect in the abduction and murder of a 10-year-old girl had fled from the scene of the crime in Des Moines, Iowa, some 160 miles east to Davenport, Iowa, where he surrendered to police. An arrest warrant was issued in Des Moines on a charge of abduction, and the suspect was arraigned on that warrant before a Davenport judge. Des Moines police traveled to Davenport, took the man into custody, and began the drive back to Des Moines. Along the way, one of the officers persuaded the suspect to lead police to the victim's body. The suspect ultimately was convicted of the girl's murder. This Court upheld the federal habeas court's conclusion that police had violated the suspect's Sixth Amendment right to counsel. We held that the officer's comments to the suspect constituted interrogation and that the suspect had not validly waived his right to counsel by responding to the officer. See 430 U. S., at 405–406.

Respondent suggests that Brewer implicitly held that the right to counsel attached to the factually related murder when the suspect was arraigned on the abduction

---

[1] See, e.g., United States v. Covarrubias, 179 F. 3d 1219, 1223–1224 (CA9 1999); United States v. Melgar, 139 F. 3d 1005, 1013 (CA4 1998); United States v. Doherty, 126 F. 3d 769, 776 (CA6 1997); United States v. Arnold, 106 F. 3d 37, 41 (CA3 1997); United States v. Williams, 993 F. 2d 451, 457 (CA5 1993); Commonwealth v. Rainwater, 425 Mass. 540, 556, 681 N. E. 2d 1218, 1229 (1997); In re Pack, 616 A. 2d 1006, 1010–1011 (Pa. Super. 1992).

REV_00261018

charge. See Brief for Respondent 4. The Court's opinion, however, simply did not address the significance of the fact that the suspect had been arraigned only on the abduction charge, nor did the parties in any way argue this question. Constitutional rights are not defined by inferences from opinions which did not address the question at issue. Cf. Hagans v. Lavine, 415 U. S. 528, 535, n. 5 (1974) ("[W]hen questions of jurisdiction have been passed on in prior decisions sub silentio, this Court has never considered itself bound when a subsequent case finally brings the jurisdictional issue before us").

Moulton is similarly unhelpful to respondent. That case involved two individuals indicted for a series of thefts, one of whom had secretly agreed to cooperate with the police investigation of his codefendant, Moulton. At the suggestion of police, the informant recorded several telephone calls and one face-to-face conversation he had with Moulton during which the two discussed their criminal exploits and possible alibis. In the course of those conversations, Moulton made various incriminating statements regarding both the thefts for which he had been charged and additional crimes. In a superseding indictment, Moulton was charged with the original crimes as well as burglary, arson, and three additional thefts. At trial, the State introduced portions of the recorded face-to-face conversation, and Moulton ultimately was convicted of three of the originally charged thefts plus one count of burglary. Moulton appealed his convictions to the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, arguing that introduction of the recorded conversation violated his Sixth Amendment right to counsel. That court agreed, holding:

> "Those statements may be admissible in the investigation or prosecution of charges for which, at the time the recordings were made, adversary proceedings had not yet commenced. But as to the charges for which > Moulton's right to counsel had already attached, his incriminating statements should have been ruled inadmissible at trial, given the circumstances in which they were acquired.'" 474 U. S., at 168 (quoting State v. Moulton, 481 A. 2d 155, 161 (1984)).

REV_00261019

We affirmed.

Respondent contends that, in affirming reversal of both the theft and burglary charges, the Moulton Court must have concluded that Moulton's Sixth Amendment right to counsel attached to the burglary charge. See Brief for Respondent 13–14; see also Brief for the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers et al. as Amici Curiae 22–23. But the Moulton Court did not address the question now before us, and to the extent Moulton spoke to the matter at all, it expressly referred to the offense-specific nature of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel:

> "The police have an interest in the thorough investigation of crimes for which formal charges have already been filed. They also have an interest in investigating new or additional crimes. Investigations of either type of crime may require surveillance of individuals already under indictment. Moreover, law enforcement officials investigating an individual suspected of committing one crime and formally charged with having committed another crime obviously seek to discover evidence useful at trial of either crime. In seeking evidence pertaining to pending charges, however, the Government's investigative powers are limited by the Sixth Amendment rights of the accused. . . . On the other hand, to exclude evidence pertaining to charges as to which the Sixth Amendment right to counsel had not attached at the time the evidence was obtained, simply because other charges were pending at that time, would unnecessarily frustrate the public's interest in the investigation of criminal activi> ties." 474 U. S., at 179–180 (emphasis added; footnote omitted).

REV_00261020

See also id., at 168 ("[T]he purpose of their meeting was to discuss the pending charges"); id., at 177 ("[T]he police knew . . . that Moulton and [the informant] were meeting for the express purpose of discussing the pending charges . . ." (emphasis added)). Thus, respondent's reliance on Moulton is misplaced and, in light of the language employed there and subsequently in McNeil, puzzling.

Respondent predicts that the offense-specific rule will prove "disastrous" to suspects' constitutional rights and will "permit law enforcement officers almost complete and total license to conduct unwanted and uncounseled interrogations." Brief for Respondent 8–9. Besides offering no evidence that such a parade of horribles has occurred in those jurisdictions that have not enlarged upon McNeil, he fails to appreciate the significance of two critical considerations. First, there can be no doubt that a suspect must be apprised of his rights against compulsory self-incrimination and to consult with an attorney before authorities may conduct custodial interrogation. See Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U. S., at 479; Dickerson v. United States, 530 U. S. 428, 435 (2000) (quoting Miranda). In the present case, police scrupulously followed Miranda's dictates when questioning respondent.[2] Second, it is critical to recognize that the Constitution does not negate society's interest in the ability of police to talk to witnesses and suspects, even those who have been charged with other offenses.

---

[2] Curiously, while predicting disastrous consequences for the core values underlying the Sixth Amendment, see post, at 3–7 (opinion of BREYER, J.), the dissenters give short shrift to the Fifth Amendment's role (as expressed in Miranda and Dickerson) in protecting a defendant's right to consult with counsel before talking to police. Even though the Sixth Amendment right to counsel has not attached to uncharged offenses, defendants retain the ability under Miranda to refuse any police questioning, and, indeed, charged defendants presumably have met with counsel and have had the opportunity to discuss whether it is advisable to invoke those Fifth Amendment rights.

REV_00261021

> "Since the ready ability to obtain uncoerced confessions is not an evil but an unmitigated good, society would be the loser. Admissions of guilt resulting from valid Miranda waivers are more than merely 'desirable'; they are essential to society's compelling interest in finding, convicting, and punishing those who violate the law.'" McNeil, 501 U. S., at 181 (quoting Moran v. Burbine, 475 U. S. 412, 426 (1986)).

See also Moulton, supra, at 180 ("[T]o exclude evidence pertaining to charges as to which the Sixth Amendment right to counsel had not attached at the time the evidence was obtained, simply because other charges were pending at the time, would unnecessarily frustrate the public's interest in the investigation of criminal activities").

Although it is clear that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel attaches only to charged offenses, we have recog-

---

Thus, in all but the rarest of cases, the Court's decision today will have no impact whatsoever upon a defendant's ability to protect his Sixth Amendment right.

It is also worth noting that, contrary to the dissent's suggestion, see post, at 1–2, 3, there is no "background principle" of our Sixth Amendment jurisprudence establishing that there may be no contact between a defendant and police without counsel present. The dissent would expand the Sixth Amendment right to the assistance of counsel in a criminal prosecution into a rule which " 'exists to prevent lawyers from taking advantage of uncounseled laypersons and to preserve the integrity of the lawyer-client relationship.'" Post, at 5 (quoting ABA Ann. Model Rule of Profesional Conduct 4.2 (4th ed. 1999)). Every profession is competent to define the standards of conduct for its members, but such standards are obviously not controlling in interpretation of constitutional provisions. The Sixth Amendment right to counsel is personal to the defendant and specific to the offense.

REV_00261022

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 99–1702

TEXAS, PETITIONER v. RAYMOND LEVI COBB

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS OF TEXAS

[April 2, 2001]

JUSTICE KENNEDY, with whom JUSTICE SCALIA and JUSTICE THOMAS join, concurring.

The Court's opinion is altogether sufficient to explain why the decision of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals should be reversed for failure to recognize the offense-specific nature of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. It seems advisable, however, to observe that the Court has reached its conclusion without the necessity to reaffirm or give approval to the decision in Michigan v. Jackson, 475 U. S. 625 (1986). This course is wise, in my view, for the underlying theory of Jackson seems questionable.

As the facts of the instant case well illustrate, it is difficult to understand the utility of a Sixth Amendment rule that operates to invalidate a confession given by the free choice of suspects who have received proper advice of their Miranda rights but waived them nonetheless. The Miranda rule, and the related preventative rule of Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U. S. 477 (1981), serve to protect a suspect's voluntary choice not to speak outside his lawyer's presence. The parallel rule announced in Jackson, however, supersedes the suspect's voluntary choice to speak with investigators. After Jackson had been decided, the Court made the following observation with respect to Edwards:

> 'Preserving the integrity of an accused's choice to communicate with police only through counsel is the > essence of Edwards and its progeny– not barring an accused from making an initial election as to whether he will face the State's officers during questioning with the aid of counsel, or go it alone. If an accused knowingly and intelligently' pursues the latter course, we see no reason why the uncounseled statements he then makes must be excluded at his trial." Patterson v. Illinois, 487 U. S. 285, 291 (1988).

REV_00261025

There is little justification for not applying the same course of reasoning with equal force to the court-made preventative rule announced in Jackson; for Jackson, after all, was a wholesale importation of the Edwards rule into the Sixth Amendment.

In the instant case, Cobb at no time indicated to law enforcement authorities that he elected to remain silent about the double murder. By all indications, he made the voluntary choice to give his own account. Indeed, even now Cobb does not assert that he had no wish to speak at the time he confessed. While the Edwards rule operates to preserve the free choice of a suspect to remain silent, if Jackson were to apply it would override that choice.

There is further reason to doubt the wisdom of the Jackson holding. Neither Miranda nor Edwards enforces the Fifth Amendment right unless the suspect makes a clear and unambiguous assertion of the right to the presence of counsel during custodial interrogation. Davis v. United States, 512 U. S. 452, 459 (1994). Where a required Miranda warning has been given, a suspect's later confession, made outside counsel's presence, is suppressed to protect the Fifth Amendment right of silence only if a reasonable officer should have been certain that the suspect expressed the unequivocal election of the right.

The Sixth Amendment right to counsel attaches quite without reference to the suspect's choice to speak with investigators after a Miranda warning. It is the commencement of a formal prosecution, indicated by the initiation of adversary judicial proceedings, that marks the beginning of the Sixth Amendment right. See ante, at 4 (quoting McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U. S. 171, 175 (1991)). These events may be quite independent of the suspect's election to remain silent, the interest which the Edwards rule serves to protect with respect to Miranda and the Fifth Amendment, and it thus makes little sense for a protective rule to attach absent such an election by the suspect. We ought to question the wisdom of a judge-made preventative rule to protect a suspect's desire not to speak when it cannot be shown that he had that intent.

REV_00261026

Even if Jackson is to remain good law, its protections should apply only where a suspect has made a clear and unambiguous assertion of the right not to speak outside the presence of counsel, the same clear election required under Edwards. Cobb made no such assertion here, yet JUSTICE BREYER's dissent rests upon the assumption that the Jackson rule should operate to exclude the confession no matter. There would be little justification for this extension of a rule that, even in a more limited application, rests on a doubtful rationale.

JUSTICE BREYER defends Jackson by arguing that, once a suspect has accepted counsel at the commencement of adversarial proceedings, he should not be forced to confront the police during interrogation without the assistance of counsel. See post, at 3–5 (dissenting opinion). But the acceptance of counsel at an arraignment or similar proceeding only begs the question: acceptance of counsel for what? It is quite unremarkable that a suspect might want the assistance of an expert in the law to guide him through hearings and trial, and the attendant complex legal matters that might arise, but nonetheless might choose to give on his own a forthright account of the events that occurred. A court-made rule that prevents a suspect from even making this choice serves little purpose, especially given the regime of Miranda and Edwards.

REV_00261027

With these further remarks, I join in full the opinion of the Court.

REV_00261028

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 99–1702

TEXAS, PETITIONER v. RAYMOND LEVI COBB

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS OF TEXAS

[April 2, 2001]

JUSTICE BREYER, with whom JUSTICE STEVENS, JUSTICE SOUTER, and JUSTICE GINSBURG join, dissenting.

This case focuses upon the meaning of a single word, "offense," when it arises in the context of the Sixth Amendment. Several basic background principles define that context.

First, the Sixth Amendment right to counsel plays a central role in ensuring the fairness of criminal proceedings in our system of justice. See Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U. S. 335, 344 (1963); Powell v. Alabama, 287 U. S. 45, 57 (1932).

Second, the right attaches when adversary proceedings, triggered by the government's formal accusation of a crime, begin. See Brewer v. Williams, 430 U. S. 387, 401 (1977); Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U. S. 682, 689 (1972); Massiah v. United States, 377 U. S. 201, 206 (1964).

Third, once this right attaches, law enforcement officials are required, in most circumstances, to deal with the defendant through counsel rather than directly, even if the defendant has waived his Fifth Amendment rights. See Michigan v. Jackson, 475 U. S. 625, 633, 636 (1986) (waiver of right to presence of counsel is assumed invalid unless accused initiates communication); Maine v. Moulton, 474 U. S. 159, 176 (1985) (Sixth Amendment gives defendant right "to rely on counsel as a 'medium' between him and the State"). Cf. ABA Model Rule of Professional Conduct jeopardy law, but police officers in the field, to navigate Blockburger when they question suspects. Cf. New York v. Belton, 453 U. S. 454, 458 (1981) (noting importance of clear rules to guide police behavior). Some will apply the test successfully; some will not. Legal challenges are inevitable. The result, I believe, will resemble not so much the Sargasso Sea as the criminal law equivalent of Milton's "Serbonian Bog . . . Where Armies whole have sunk."

REV_00261029

There is, of course, an alternative. We can, and should, define "offense" in terms of the conduct that constitutes the crime that the offender committed on a particular occasion, including criminal acts that are "closely related to" or "inextricably intertwined with" the particular crime set forth in the charging instrument. This alternative is not perfect. The language used lacks the precision for which police officers may hope; and it requires lower courts to specify its meaning further as they apply it in individual cases. Yet virtually every lower court in the United States to consider the issue has defined "offense" in the Sixth Amendment context to encompass such closely related acts. See ante, at 5, n. 1 (majority opinion) (citing cases from the Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Ninth Circuits as well as state courts in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania); Taylor v. State, 726 So. 2d 841, 845 (Fla. Ct. App. 1999); People v. Clankie, 124 Ill. 2d 456, 462–466, 530 N. E. 2d 448, 451–453 (1988); State v. Tucker, 137 N. J. 259, 277–278, 645 A. 2d 111, 120–121 (1994), cert. denied, 513 U. S. 1090 (1995). These courts have found offenses "closely related" where they involved the same victim, set of acts, evidence, or motivation. See, e.g., Taylor v. State, supra, at 845 (stolen property charges and burglary); State v. Tucker, supra, at 278, 645 A. 2d, at 121 (burglary, robbery, and murder of home's occupant); In re Pack, 420 Pa. Super. 347, 355–356, 616 A. 2d 1006, 1010 (1992) (burglary, receiving stolen property, and theft charges), appeal denied, 535 Pa. 669, 634 A. 2d 1117 (1993). They have found offenses unrelated where time, location, or factual circumstances significantly separated the one from the other. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Rainwater, 425 Mass. 540, 547–549, and n. 7, 681 N. E. 2d 1218, 1224, and n. 7 (1997) (vehicle theft charge and earlier vehicle thefts in same area), cert. denied, 522 U. S. 1095 (1998); Whittlesey v. State, 340 Md. 30, 56–57, 665 A. 2d 223, 236 (1995) (murder and making false statements charges), cert. denied, 516 U. S. 1148 (1996); People v. Dotson, 214 Ill. App. 3d 637, 646, 574 N. E. 2d 143, 149 (murder and weapons charges), appeal denied, 141 Ill. 2d 549, 580 N. E. 2d 123 (1991).

REV_00261038

One cannot say in favor of this commonly followed approach that it is perfectly clear– only that, because it comports with common sense, it is far easier to apply than that of the majority. One might add that, unlike the majority's test, it is consistent with this Court's assumptions in previous cases. See Maine v. Moulton, 474 U. S., at 162, 167, 180 (affirming reversal of both burglary and theft convictions); Brewer v. Williams, 430 U. S., at 389, 390, 393, 406 (affirming grant of habeas which vacated murder conviction). And, most importantly, the "closely related" test furthers, rather than undermines, the Sixth Amendment's "right to counsel," a right so necessary to the realization in practice of that most "noble ideal," a fair trial. Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U. S., at 344.

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, following this commonly accepted approach, found that the charged burglary and the uncharged murders were "closely related." All occurred during a short period of time on the same day in the same basic location. The victims of the murders were also victims of the burglary. Cobb committed one of the murders in furtherance of the robbery, the other to cover up the crimes. The police, when questioning Cobb, knew that he already had a lawyer representing him on the burglary charges and had demonstrated their belief that this lawyer also represented Cobb in respect to the murders by asking his permission to question Cobb about the murders on previous occasions. The relatedness of the crimes is well illustrated by the impossibility of questioning Cobb about the murders without eliciting admissions about the burglary. See, e.g., Tr. 157 (Feb. 19, 1997) (testimony by police officer who obtained murder confession) ("Basically what he told us is he had gone over to the house to burglarize it and nobody was home"); 22 Record, State's Exh. 20 (typed statement by Cobb) (admitting that he committed the murders after entering the house and stealing stereo parts). Nor, in my view, did Cobb waive his right to counsel. See supra, at 4–5. These considerations are sufficient. The police officers ought to have spoken to Cobb's counsel before questioning Cobb. I would affirm the decision of the Texas court.

REV_00261039

Consequently, I dissent.

REV_00261040

4.2 (2001) (lawyer is generally prohibited from communicating with a person known to be represented by counsel "about the subject of the representation" without counsel's "consent"); Green, A Prosecutor's Communications with Defendants: What Are the Limits?, 24 Crim. L. Bull. 283, 284, and n. 5 (1988) (version of Model Rule 4.2 or its predecessor has been adopted by all 50 States).

Fourth, the particular aspect of the right here at issue– the rule that the police ordinarily must communicate with the defendant through counsel– has important limits. In particular, recognizing the need for law enforcement officials to investigate "new or additional crimes" not the subject of current proceedings, Maine v. Moulton, supra, at 179, this Court has made clear that the right to counsel does not attach to any and every crime that an accused may commit or have committed, see McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U. S. 171, 175–176 (1991). The right "cannot be invoked once for all future prosecutions," and it does not forbid "interrogation unrelated to the charge." Id., at 175, 178. In a word, as this Court previously noted, the right is "offense specific." Id., at 175.

This case focuses upon the last-mentioned principle, in particular upon the meaning of the words "offense specific." These words appear in this Court's Sixth Amendment case law, not in the Sixth Amendment's text. See U. S. Const., Amdt. 6 (guaranteeing right to counsel "[i]n all criminal prosecutions"). The definition of these words is not self-evident. Sometimes the term "offense" may refer to words that are written in a criminal statute; sometimes it may refer generally to a course of conduct in the world, aspects of which constitute the elements of one or more crimes; and sometimes it may refer, narrowly and technically, just to the conceptually severable aspects of the latter. This case requires us to determine whether an "offense"– for Sixth Amendment purposes– includes factually related aspects of a single course of conduct other than those few acts that make up the essential elements of the crime charged.

REV_00261030

We should answer this question in light of the Sixth Amendment's basic objectives as set forth in this Court's case law. At the very least, we should answer it in a way that does not undermine those objectives. But the Court today decides that "offense" means the crime set forth within "the four corners of a charging instrument," along with other crimes that "would be considered the same offense" under the test established by Blockburger v. United States, 284 U. S. 299 (1932). Ante, at 9. In my view, this unnecessarily technical definition undermines Sixth Amendment protections while doing nothing to further effective law enforcement.

For one thing, the majority's rule, while leaving the Fifth Amendment's protections in place, threatens to diminish severely the additional protection that, under this Court's rulings, the Sixth Amendment provides when it grants the right to counsel to defendants who have been charged with a crime and insists that law enforcement officers thereafter communicate with them through that counsel. See, e.g., Michigan v. Jackson, supra, at 632 (Sixth Amendment prevents police from questioning represented defendant through informants even when Fifth Amendment would not); Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U. S. 291, 300, n. 4 (1980) (Fifth Amendment right, unlike Sixth, applies only in custodial interrogation).

JUSTICE KENNEDY, JUSTICE SCALIA, and JUSTICE THOMAS, if not the majority, apparently believe these protections constitutionally unimportant, for, in their view, "the underlying theory of Jackson seems questionable." Ante, at 1 (KENNEDY, J., concurring). Both the majority and concurring opinions suggest that a suspect's ability to invoke his Fifth Amendment right and "refuse any police questioning" offers that suspect adequate constitutional protection. Ante, at 8, n. 2 (majority opinion); see also ante, at 2–3 (KENNEDY, J., concurring). But that is not so.

REV_00261031

Jackson focuses upon a suspect– perhaps a frightened or uneducated suspect– who, hesitant to rely upon his own unaided judgment in his dealings with the police, has invoked his constitutional right to legal assistance in such matters. See Michigan v. Jackson, 475 U. S., at 634, n. 7 ("The simple fact that [a] defendant has requested an attorney indicates that he does not believe that he is sufficiently capable of dealing with his adversaries singlehandedly") (quoting People v. Bladel, 421 Mich. 39, 63–64, 365 N. W. 2d 56, 67 (1984)). Jackson says that, once such a request has been made, the police may not simply throw that suspect– who does not trust his own unaided judgment– back upon his own devices by requiring him to rely for protection upon that same unaided judgment that he previously rejected as inadequate. In a word, the police may not force a suspect who has asked for legal counsel to make a critical legal choice without the legal assistance that he has requested and that the Constitution guarantees. See McNeil v. Wisconsin, supra, at 177 ("The purpose of the Sixth Amendment counsel guarantee . . . is to protec[t] the unaided layman at critical confrontations' with his expert adversary") (quoting United States v. Gouveia, 467 U. S. 180, 189 (1984)). The Constitution does not take away with one hand what it gives with the other. See Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U. S., at 344 (Sixth Amendment means that a person charged with a crime need not "face his accusers without a lawyer to assist him"); Michigan v. Jackson, supra, at 633, 635 (presuming "that the defendant requests the lawyer's services at every critical stage of the prosecution" even if the defendant fails to invoke his Fifth Amendment rights at the time of interrogation); cf. Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U. S. 477, 484–485 (1981) (when accused has expressed desire to deal with police through counsel, police may not reinitiate interrogation until counsel has been made available); ABA Ann. Model Rule of Professional Conduct 4.2, p. 398, comment. (4th ed. 1999) ("Rule 4.2 . . . exists to prevent lawyers from taking advantage of uncounseled laypersons and to preserve the integrity of the lawyer-client relationship").

REV_00261032

For these reasons, the Sixth Amendment right at issue is independent of the Fifth Amendment's protections; and the importance of this Sixth Amendment right has been repeatedly recognized in our cases. See, e.g., Michigan v. Jackson, supra, at 636 ("We conclude that the assertion [of the right to counsel] is no less significant, and the need for additional safeguards no less clear, when the request for counsel is made at an arraignment and when the basis for the claim is the Sixth Amendment").

JUSTICE KENNEDY primarily relies upon Patterson v. Illinois, 487 U. S. 285 (1988), in support of his conclusion that Jackson is not good law. He quotes Patterson's statement that the Constitution does " 'not ba[r] an accused from making an initial election as to whether' " to speak with the police without counsel's assistance. Ante, at 1–2 (quoting Patterson v. Illinois, supra, at 291).

This statement, however, cannot justify the overruling of Jackson. That is because, in Patterson itself, this Court noted, "as a matter of some significance," that, at the time he was interrogated, the defendant had neither retained nor accepted the appointment of counsel. 487 U. S., at 290, n. 3. We characterized our holding in Jackson as having depended upon "the fact that the accused ha[d] asked for the 'help of a lawyer' in dealing with the police," 487 U. S., at 291 (quoting Michigan v. Jackson, supra, at 631), and explained that, "[o]nce an accused has a lawyer, a distinct set of constitutional safeguards aimed at preserving the sanctity of the attorney-client relationship takes effect," 487 U. S., at 290, n. 3 (citing Maine v. Moulton, 474 U. S., at 176).

JUSTICE KENNEDY also criticizes Jackson on the ground that it prevents a suspect "from . . . making th[e] choice" to "give . . . a forthright account of the events that occurred." Ante, at 3. But that is not so. A suspect may initiate communication with the police, thereby avoiding the risk that the police induced him to make, unaided, the kind of critical legal decision best made with the help of counsel, whom he has requested.

REV_00261033

Unlike JUSTICE KENNEDY, the majority does not call Jackson itself into question. But the majority would undermine that case by significantly diminishing the Sixth Amendment protections that the case provides. That is because criminal codes are lengthy and highly detailed, often proliferating "overlapping and related statutory offenses" to the point where prosecutors can easily "spin out a startlingly numerous series of offenses from a single . . . criminal transaction." Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U. S. 436, 445, n. 10 (1970). Thus, an armed robber who reaches across a store counter, grabs the cashier, and demands "your money or your life," may through that single instance of conduct have committed several "offenses," in the majority's sense of the term, including armed robbery, assault, battery, trespass, use of a firearm to commit a felony, and perhaps possession of a firearm by a felon, as well. A person who is using and selling drugs on a single occasion might be guilty of possessing various drugs, conspiring to sell drugs, being under the influence of illegal drugs, possessing drug paraphernalia, possessing a gun in relation to the drug sale, and, depending upon circumstances, violating various gun laws as well. A protester blocking an entrance to a federal building might also be trespassing, failing to disperse, unlawfully assembling, and obstructing Government administration all at one and the same time.

The majority's rule permits law enforcement officials to question those charged with a crime without first approaching counsel, through the simple device of asking questions about any other related crime not actually charged in the indictment. Thus, the police could ask the individual charged with robbery about, say, the assault of the cashier not yet charged, or about any other uncharged offense (unless under Blockburger's definition it counts as the "same crime"), all without notifying counsel. Indeed, the majority's rule would permit law enforcement officials to question anyone charged with any crime in any one of the examples just given about his or her conduct on the single relevant occasion without notifying counsel unless the prosecutor has charged every possible crime arising out of that same brief course of conduct. What Sixth Amendment sense– what common sense– does such a rule make? What is left of the "communicate through counsel" rule? The majority's approach is inconsistent with any common understanding of the scope of counsel's representation. It will undermine the lawyer's role as "'medium'" between the defendant and the government. Maine v. Moulton, supra, at 176. And it will, on a random basis, remove a significant portion of the protection that this Court has found inherent in the Sixth Amendment.

REV_00261034

In fact, under the rule today announced by the majority, two of the seminal cases in our Sixth Amendment jurisprudence would have come out differently. In Maine v. Moulton, which the majority points out "expressly referred to the offense-specific nature of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel," ante, at 7, we treated burglary and theft as the same offense for Sixth Amendment purposes. Despite the opinion's clear statement that "[i]ncriminating statements pertaining to other crimes, as to which the Sixth Amendment right has not yet attached, are, of course, admissible at a trial of those offenses," 474 U. S., at 180, n. 16, the Court affirmed the lower court's reversal of both burglary and theft charges even though, at the time that the incriminating statements at issue were made, Moulton had been charged only with theft by receiving, id., at 162, 167, 180.

REV_00261035

Under the majority's rule, in contrast, because theft by receiving and burglary each required proof of a fact that the other did not, only Moulton's theft convictions should have been overturned. Compare Me. Rev. Stat. Ann., Tit. 17–A, §359 (1981) (theft) (requiring knowing receipt, retention, or disposal of stolen property with the intent to deprive the owner thereof), with §401 (burglary) (requiring entry of a structure without permission and with the intent to commit a crime).

In Brewer v. Williams, the effect of the majority's rule would have been even more dramatic. Because first-degree murder and child abduction each required proof of a fact not required by the other, and because at the time of the impermissible interrogation Williams had been charged only with abduction of a child, Williams' murder conviction should have remained undisturbed. See 430 U. S., at 390, 393–395, 406. Compare Iowa Code §690.2 (1950 and Supp. 1978) (first-degree murder) (requiring a killing) with Iowa Code §706.2 (1950) (repealed 1978) (child-stealing) (requiring proof that a child under 16 was taken with the intent to conceal the child from his or her parent or guardian). This is not to suggest that this Court has previously addressed and decided the question presented by this case. Rather, it is to point out that the Court's conception of the Sixth Amendment right at the time that Moulton and Brewer were decided naturally presumed that it extended to factually related but uncharged offenses.

At the same time, the majority's rule threatens the legal clarity necessary for effective law enforcement. That is because the majority, aware that the word "offense" ought to encompass something beyond "the four corners of the charging instrument," imports into Sixth Amendment law the definition of "offense" set forth in Blockburger v. United States, 284 U. S. 299 (1932), a case interpreting the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment, which Clause uses the word "offence" but otherwise has no relevance here. Whatever Fifth Amendment virtues Blockburger may have, to import it into this Sixth Amendment context will work havoc.

REV_00261036

In theory, the test says that two offenses are the "same offense" unless each requires proof of a fact that the other does not. See ante, at 9 (majority opinion). That means that most of the different crimes mentioned above are not the "same offense." Under many States' laws, for example, the statute defining assault and the statute defining robbery each requires proof of a fact that the other does not. Compare, e.g., Cal. Penal Code Ann. §211 (West 1999) (robbery) (requiring taking of personal property of another) with §240 (assault) (requiring attempt to commit violent injury). Hence the extension of the definition of "offense" that is accomplished by the use of the Blockburger test does nothing to address the substantial concerns about the circumvention of the Sixth Amendment right that are raised by the majority's rule.

But, more to the point, the simple-sounding Blockburger test has proved extraordinarily difficult to administer in practice. Judges, lawyers, and law professors often disagree about how to apply it. See, e.g., United States v. Woodward, 469 U. S. 105, 108 (1985) (per curiam) (holding that lower court misapplied Blockburger test). Compare United States v. Dixon, 509 U. S. 688, 697–700 (1993) (opinion of SCALIA, J.) (applying Blockburger and concluding that contempt is same offense as underlying substantive crime); with 509 U. S., at 716–720 (REHNQUIST, C. J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (applying Blockburger and deciding that the two are separate offenses). The test has emerged as a tool in an area of our jurisprudence that THE CHIEF JUSTICE has described as "a veritable Sargasso Sea which could not fail to challenge the most intrepid judicial navigator." Albernaz v. United States, 450 U. S. 333, 343 (1981). Yet the Court now asks, not the lawyers and judges who ordinarily work with double

REV_00261037

U.S. Department of Justice

Office of the Solicitor General

The Solicitor General

Washington, D.C. 20530

March 19, 2001

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

From: RDC for Barbara D. Underwood
Acting Solicitor General

Subject: Weekly Report

I. Supreme Court Arguments

During the week of March 19, we are presenting oral arguments in the following cases:

1. Kansas v. Colorado, No. 105 (original), a case brought by the State of Kansas to enforce its rights under the Arkansas River Compact. In an earlier decision, the Supreme Court accepted the Special Master's recommendation that Colorado be held liable for violations of the Compact resulting from post-Compact well pumping in Colorado. After further proceedings, the Master issued a Report recommending that Kansas be awarded money damages for losses that occurred as a result of the violations, including aggregate losses to past and future Kansas water users, and that prejudgement interest be awarded on damages from 1969 to the present. Both Kansas and Colorado filed exceptions to the recommended remedy. We contend that the exceptions of Kansas and Colorado should be overruled because the recommended remedy falls within the Court's broad discretion to fashion a fair and equitable remedy for Colorado's violations of the Compact.

2. C&L Enterprises, Inc. v. Citizen Potawatomi Nation, No. 00-292, which presents the question whether and under what circumstances an Indian Tribe's agreement to arbitrate disputes arising out of a standard form contract entered into with a private party, and to have judgment entered upon the final arbitration award "in any court having jurisdiction thereof," constitutes a valid waiver of the Tribe's sovereign immunity from suit in state court. Substantial interests of the United States are involved in the case because of its special relationship with Indian Tribes, the interest in sound application of principles of foreign sovereign immunity upon which petitioner relies, and the need to ensure that arbitration agreements entered into by the federal government are not erroneously construed as waivers of sovereign immunity.

As amicus curiae, we argue that an arbitration clause in a standard form contract does not constitute an express and unequivocal consent to suit in state court, at least where the agreement is ambiguous regarding whether an enforcement action can be brought in tribal courts.

3. Saucier v. Katz, No. 99-1977. The case presents two questions: (1) whether, in a case alleging the use of constitutionally excessive force, the test for qualified immunity and the reasonableness test under the Fourth Amendment are identical, such that a finding of unreasonable force under the Fourth Amendment necessarily precludes qualified immunity; and (2) whether the court of appeals erred in concluding that petitioner's use of force to detain respondent, which consisted of carrying respondent from the crowd to a waiting van and pushing him inside without injuring him, so clearly exceeded the amount of force permitted by the Fourth Amendment as to warrant denial of qualified immunity. With respect to the first issue, we contend that the Fourth Amendment reasonableness test and the qualified immunity test are distinct. We contend that "objective reasonableness" is the standard for the Fourth Amendment merits inquiry, whereas the qualified immunity determination asks whether the officer's conduct was so obviously constitutionally excessive that no reasonable officer could have concluded otherwise. We note that because the merits inquiry is usually treated as a question of fact for the jury, equating it with the qualified immunity determination would effectively require the question of qualified immunity to be resolved at trial. This result undermines a critical function of qualified immunity—providing immunity from suit, not just from liability. With respect to the second issue, we argue that the minimal use of force that occurred here was not so clearly unlawful that no reasonable officer could have thought it to be lawful at the time.

4. Timothy Booth v. C.O. Churner, et al., No. 99-1964. The question presented is whether a prison inmate suing prison officials for money damages is required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995 to exhaust prison administrative remedies that address the problem identified by the inmate, but that do not permit the recovery of money damages. The Court's decision in this case will affect the United States' interest in defending litigation against the Bureau of Prisons and in ensuring the efficacy of the Bureau's administrative remedy program. In McCarthy v. Madigan, 503 U.S. 140, 150 (1992), the Court construed a federal provision requiring inmates to exhaust such "plain, speedy, and effective remedies as are available" to excuse exhaustion when an inmate seeks only money damages and the prison's grievance procedure does not offer such relief. Congress subsequently eliminated the qualifying terms "plain, speedy, and effective," eliminated the requirement that administrative remedies must meet certain minimum acceptable standards of fairness and effectiveness, and eliminated a court's discretion to excuse the plaintiff's failure to exhaust when exhaustion would not be appropriate or in the interests of justice. We argue as amicus curiae that these changes reflect a judgment that inmates should exhaust all available remedies without regard to whether the administrative process provides for the recovery of the particular type of relief the inmate seeks.

5. The Wharf (Holdings) Limited v. United International Holdings, Inc., No. 00-347. The case presents two questions: (1) whether an action under Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, 15 U.S.C. 78j(b), and Securities and Exchange Commission Rule 10b-5, 17 C.F.R. 240.10b-5, may be based on misrepresentations about a person's intention to sell securities; and (2) whether an action under Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5 may be based on misrepresentations made in connection with an oral contract to purchase or sell a security. With respect to the first question, we contend as amicus curiae that an action under Section 10(b) may be based on misrepresentations about a person's intention to sell securities because Section 10(b) covers "any manipulative or deceptive device or contrivance" and prohibits "all fraudulent schemes in connection with the purchase or sale of securities." Thus, the language of Section 10(b) does not limit the subject matter of the misrepresentation that may form the basis for liability. And misrepresentation of one's intention to perform a promise is a well recognized form of fraud. We argue that a misrepresentation of one's intention to sell a security is made "in connection with the purchase or sale of any security" because an option on a security is itself a security under the Act and a contract to purchase or sell a security is a purchase or sale of a security under the Act. We contend that restricting claims to misrepresentation about value would undermine the Act's purpose of ensuring honest securities markets and promoting full disclosure.

We contend that the second question is not properly before the Court because respondents' theory of liability and the court of appeals decision are premised on the completed sale of a security—the purchase of an option, which is itself a security under the Act. If the Court does address the question, we argue that Section 10(b) applies to an oral contract to sell a security because nothing in the Act suggests that contracts for the sale of securities must be in writing and oral contracts to sell securities are generally enforceable under the laws of all 50 States.

6. Nevada v. Hicks, No. 99-1994, in which a divided Ninth Circuit panel held that the Fallon Tribal Court had jurisdiction over civil rights and tort claims filed by a member of the Fallon Paiute-Shoshone Tribe against Nevada wildlife officials arising from the seizure of big-horn sheep's head trophies on allotted land within the Tribe's Reservation. The case presents two questions: (1) whether a tribal court may exercise adjudicatory jurisdiction over a suit brought by a tribal member against state officials in their personal capacities, where the suit arises out of the state officials' conduct on trust lands within the Tribe's reservation in the execution of a search warrant authorized by a tribal court; and (2) whether, when state officials sued in their personal capacities in tribal court invoke an immunity defense arising under federal law, the state officials must litigate the defense in tribal court before proceeding to federal court.

We argue as amicus curiae that the tribal court does have jurisdiction over the claims against petitioners, because the Court has recognized that "tribes retain considerable control"—both regulatory and adjudicatory—"over non-member conduct on tribal land" within a reservation, as well as authority over the conduct of nonmembers elsewhere within a reservation where that conduct involves "consensual relationships with the tribe or its members" or affects "the political integrity, the economic security, or the health or welfare of the tribe." We contend that here, that test is met. Petitioners entered into a consensual relationship with the Tribe because, in order to execute the warrants, they were required to, and did, obtain authorization from the tribal court. Furthermore, a Tribe's political integrity and welfare are threatened when state officials, invoking the Tribe's own authority, are alleged to have violated the rights of its members on its reservation.

We further argue that the tribal court should be afforded the initial opportunity to consider petitioners' federal defenses of qualified and official immunity. As the Court has recognized, exhaustion of tribal court procedures promotes tribal self-government, enables the tribal court to consider the limitations on its own authority, and avoids simultaneous litigation in federal court.

Finally, although the tribal court has jurisdiction over the claims against petitioners, they, like defendants in state court, should have an opportunity to obtain a federal forum for the adjudication of claims arising under federal law. Under 28 U.S.C. 1441, a state court defendant has a right to remove federal claims (and pendent state claims) to federal court. Here, a comparable result may be obtained by a federal court injunction against tribal court adjudication of the federal claims.

II. Supreme Court Filing

A. Brief on the Merits

1. Idaho v. United States, No. 00-189. The case presents the question whether the United States holds title, in trust for the Coeur d'Alene Tribe, to lands underlying portions of Coeur d'Alene Lake and the St. Joe River that are within the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation. The State of Idaho concedes that the 1873 Executive Order establishing the Coeur D'Alene Indian Reservation included submerged lands in the Reservation, so under United States v. Alaska, 521 U.S. 1 (1997), the only remaining question is whether, at the time of Idaho's admission to the Union, Congress clearly manifested its intent to defeat Idaho's title to these submerged lands. We contend that Congress did intend to withhold from Idaho title to the submerged lands because Congress intended to retain ownership of the entire Reservation that was set aside in the Executive action and was aware at the time of Idaho's statehood that the Reservation contained submerged lands. Also indicating that Congress intended to retain ownership of the submerged lands for the Tribe is the fact that retention of the submerged land was necessary to enable Congress to achieve its purposes in setting aside the Reservation: enabling tribal members to continue their fishing and other uses of the lake and associated rivers and preserving Congress's ability to bargain in good faith with the Tribe concerning possible cession of a portion of its Reservation. We also argue that Congress's requirement at the time that territories seeking statehood include in their proposed state constitutions a clause disclaiming state title to all land owned or held by Indian tribes further indicates that Congress intended to retain lands for the Tribe in Idaho.

Sylvia C. James v. USA

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 1822/1740
9630

Box 56
Folder 6

REV_00261045

THE WHITE HOUSE
CORRESPONDENCE TRACKING WORKSHEET

DATE RECEIVED: 7/12/01

NAME OF CORRESPONDENT: Sylvia C. James

SUBJECT: James v. USA, POTUS, etc.

ROUTE TO: OFFICE/AGENCY	(STAFF NAME)	ACTION CODE	ACTION DATE M/D/YR	DISPOSITION TYPE RESP	DISPOSITION C D	DISPOSITION COMPLETED M/D/YR
	CUGONZ	A	7/12/01		C
	Brett	A

ACTION COMMENTS:

COMMENTS: file in general litigation files. → Brett

Brett Kavanaugh
6-7984

ADDITIONAL CORRESPONDENTS: MEDIA:

rec'd 7/10 Counsel's Office

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE MIDDLE DISTRICT OF NORTH CAROLINA

Sylvia C. James	]	1: 01CV487
Plaintiff	]
Vs.	]	Affidavit
United States Government and	]
President George Bush and	]	Exhibit E to Amendment
Attorney General John Ashcroft
Defendants

Plaintiff, being first duly sworn according to law, says:

Listed below is the additional relief sought in this complaint.

The way our capitalistic society is set up today where people have the right to make as much money as possible off another person amounts to slavery and that violates the Thirteenth Amendment. Thus, this must be changed.

We Black Americans need help. The American Government should pay Black America reparations for what we have had to endure. The American Government needs to compensate Black America for playing God over us for all of these centuries. The American Government needs to compensate Black America for teaching and forcing Blacks to work towards getting their rewards after death, rather than allowing us the necessities of life while we are living. The American Government needs to compensate Black America for denying us the necessities of life for all these centuries and forcing us to go hungry, live in indecent housing unfit for humans or animals, denying us health care, etc. The American Government needs to compensate Black America for singling us out as the Canaanites in the Bible for discriminatory inhumane treatment. The American Government must compensate Black America for giving Black America over to a depraved mind.

Black Americans should be given reparations but in part that must be given by making the necessities of life free to all.

I want my reward while I am living and can make use of it. The American Government has wronged me by enslaving and mistreating me and forcing me to act out the role of Jesus Christ while playing God over me and attempting to force me to work towards getting my reward after death. The American Government owes me big time. I hate the idea of a God, and I have been wronged by having the Government force the idea of a God and a higher power on me. I deserve 50 million dollars.

In the past, no value has been put on a person's right to have a good sex life. No value has been given to a person's right to enjoy consensual sex. Consensual sex has only been seen as immoral and wrong. Well, in order to teach the world that consensual sex is important and is something to be valued, I'm going to put a monetary value on it. I also deserve the 50 million dollars for being raped at the age of 18. In addition to deserving the money because I was raped, I deserve the money because consensual sex was not available to me at the time. I deserve the money because consensual sex was not available to me when I was a child growing up. I also deserve the money because consensual sex is not truly available to me now as an adult. For example, in North Carolina, there are several laws on the books against not only children, but against adults having consensual sex. The court does not need to hold a hearing to determine if I was raped because the court should know I was raped. That was the only sex available. Consensual sex was not available, and as I've just pointed out, it is not truly available now.

I am holding the Roman Catholic Church and the church in general as responsible for my being raped. In addition, I am holding all the governments who act out the role of God responsible. Since they are all working together, I see them as being responsible. I am also holding the state of North Carolina responsible. Although I deserve 50 million dollars, I am interested in the world sharing. I don't want all of that money. I just want what is reasonable in a sharing society. Also, I mainly want a change in our society. I am mainly interested in having all the governments change their laws whether they actually pay me or not. The one thing that separates me from most other rape victims is that I did not victimize myself by supporting the church and religion which supports rape.

In addition to paying reparations to Blacks, the American Government should make things right for all peoples who have been wronged. It is not only Black America, but also the poor, who are mostly required to act out the role of Jesus Christ.

REV_00261048

It is in the interests of America to provide for everyone, not just for some. Deserving White Americans and people from other races must be paid reparations. Timothy McVeigh should be paid reparations. No one should be forgotten or considered unimportant. Everyone must be treated on an equal basis.

The whole world should share the world's wealth, and everyone throughout the world should have the right to the necessities of life.

The land and the resources of the earth should not be something that individual people own. These should be something that all people on earth make use of while they are alive. Today, people believe that because they pay for a house, they own it. They believe that because that is what is said. But that is not true. The minute they fail to pay taxes on their homes and land, the Government takes their home and land. Buying a home and having decent housing is a source of stress for the masses, no matter what people pay for their homes and no matter if they are buying or renting. People are under constant stress to make more and more money to pay for the necessities of life. People are under constant stress to cheat other people and make a profit on them. We need to eliminate that stress. We need a change. All people should have access to free housing and free utilities. However, unlike what I now have, people should not just have access to free housing, which is substandard. It should be decent housing. In order for all people to have true access to equal treatment, the necessities of life should be free to all people. It is not equal treatment if the poor do not have access to the same luxuries that the rich have. Such luxuries are a necessity in today's world.

Everyone should have the right to the necessities of life; the proper food, clothing, health protection including good health care, decent housing free from such things as rats and roaches, a telephone, a cellular phone, electricity, heat, air conditioning, water, indoor bathrooms, refrigerator, stove for cooking, microwave, washer and dryer, bed and other furniture, radio, television, cable TV, VCR, CD player, computer, computer printer, child care, maid/cleaning service, convenient transportation including a car of their own, spending money, the right and money to do fun things for entertainment such as go to the movies, clubs, go dancing, golfing, bowling, skating, go to the state fair, go to amusement parks, travel and go on vacation, the right to a good sex life, the right to a good education including sex education, the right to have children or not, the right to abortion and other contraception, the right to feel safe, loved, important and special and the right to happiness, etc. We should have certain established human rights, which we are guaranteed.

Even though we need convenient public transportation, I find that there are times when I absolutely need a car, and I can't get around it. Thus, people need a car.

Also, people should have the right to have pets. A pet has to eat and a pet has other needs including health care needs. So included in our necessities of life should be costs for taking good care of pets such as dogs and cats. Many people think of pets such as dogs and cats as a part of the family. I do. People have spent centuries domesticating dogs and cats as part of the family, and it is not right to refuse to feed them when we can. When I see people refusing to feed animals such as lost and stray cats and dogs just for the hell of it, I see that as similar to refusing to feed people who are in need. That is wrong. Animals in general deserve rights also. Some people might say that if we include owning a pet as a necessity of life, then some people might get a dog or a cat to get extra money. But why should we care why they do it as long as long as they take good and humane care of the animal?

We need to legalize sex outside marriage. Adultery should not be a crime. People can choose to live with whomever they wish. Also, people can choose to have sex with only one person or with no one if that is their choice. But people can not own another person. Slavery is against the law. The institution of marriage violates the Thirteenth Amendment. Thus, we should get rid of the institution of marriage. People should not be led to believe that through marriage, they have the right to own another person. Also, since there is no God, all marriages are based on a lie anyway. In addition, it is impossible for two people to become one person. That is crazy. Thus, all current marriages should be declared null and void, and no more marriages should be allowed in the future. It should not be legal to take advantage of another person just because they give their consent. In addition, I find that much of the unhappiness in the world today is caused because people believe that they are supposed to find that one person who was meant for them, and thus they run into so much difficulty and heartache trying to find that one faithful person for them and trying to force that person to be faithful to them, when that is not natural.

Nudity should be legalized.

Children should be given rights including sexual rights just as adults.

We should get rid of holidays, which are dedicated to religion, war and superstition. I want the State and Federal Government to stop celebrating holidays such as Easter, Memorial Day, Veterans' Day, Thanksgiving and Christmas, etc., which are dedicated to religion, war and superstition. Government employees should be given other days off. Also the workweek should be shortened to give men and women more time to spend with their families and children and so that people can have more leisure time. If we are going to make family life top priority in this nation, we are going to have to make a serious cut in the workweek. I am not advocating shutting our businesses down. People need to share the work. We need to hire more people to do one job so that people don't have to work such long hours and so that a person can have more leisure time off and more personal time off. Eight hours a day for 5 days a week is too long. But the guards in the jail work from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m. and the next shift come in and work from 6 p.m. to 6 a.m. Guards can work like this for six days a week. Also, others such as bus drivers and nurses work extremely long hours. That is insane. That means they are slaves to the state or the city or to their jobs, and they can not possibly have a decent personal life.

In addition, we should not create meaningless, busy work just to keep people working and to give people something to do. The world has been built up. We can now afford to share the wealth. We can now afford to enjoy ourselves and have fun. We can afford to have some serious time off for leisure and for other person things. We do not have to keep enslaving ourselves with work.

Our criminal justice system should be humane and geared towards rehabilitation, not punishment and revenge. A person should not loose their rights just because they are charged with a crime or convicted of a crime. A person should not lose their citizenship just because they are suspected of a crime or convicted of a crime. Criminals and suspects should not be handcuffed. Police should not carry weapons. Guns and nuclear weapons must be removed from our society.

REV_00261051

The world should be seen as one society. It is so obvious that the different leaders of the different governments around the world act together as one. The different people in the different nations around the world should also have the opportunity to work together as one world. Our blockades must be removed from around the world, and we need to withdraw our armed forces from around the world. We don't want to keep alienating people and treating them wrong. We don't need a military, and we should not have one. War is murder and war is wrong.

Our obligations on earth are to the living, not to the dead. Our system should be changed to where we are worth more alive than we are dead. The dead should be disposed of, not preserved. We need to convert the ancient shrines, temples, mosques, tombs, churches, etc into market places, shops, shopping malls, shopping centers, banks, housing areas for the living, restaurants, libraries, massage parlors and/or other areas that can be truly used by the living. In America, many of our churches are down town and converting them into something that are useful such as shops, etc. would be perfect. Also, in America, many of our churches are located in rural areas, where converting churches to shops, banks, libraries, etc. would be quite helpful to the community. We need to start cremating all the dead. We should stop pretending that the dead are just resting and that they have any needs or power and that they are able to do anything further after their deaths.

A President should be chosen based on merit.

A President should have the right to make decisions as the need arises. No one can predict what they are going to do beforehand. Thus, I am asking for relief based on what I now see that we need.

This the 8 th day of June, 2001

Sylvia C James

Sylvia C. James, Plaintiff, Affiant

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 8th day of June, 2001

Notary Public Victoria B Butts
My commission expires: Aug. 6, 2002

REV_00261052

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE BY MAIL

Sylvia C. James	]	1: 01CV487
Plaintiff	]
Vs.	]
United States Government and	]
President George Bush and	]
Attorney General John Ashcroft
Defendants

The undersigned hereby certifies that on June 8, 2001 she served a copy of the attached Exhibit E to Amendment by placing said copy in a postpaid envelope addressed to the persons hereinafter named at the addresses stated below, which is the last known addresses, and by depositing said envelopes and contents in the United States Mail at Chapel Hill, North Carolina.

Addressees:

President George Bush
1600 Pennsylvania Ave NW
Washington DC 20500

John Ashcroft
Attorney General of the United States
U.S. Department of Justice, Room 5111
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W.
Washington, DC 20530

Benjamin H. White, Jr. &
John W. Stone, Jr.
Office of United States Attorney 101 South Edgeworth St.
Greensboro, NC 27401

Timothy McVeigh
USP Terre Haute Highway 63 South
Terre Haute, Indiana 47808

Sylvia C James

Sylvia C. James, Plaintiff

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Terrorism Insurance [Folder 1]

OA/NARA#: 1825/1743
9633

Box 56
Folder 6

REV_00261054

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Terrorism Insurance [Folder 2]

OA/NARA#: 1825/1743
9633

Box 56
Folder 7

REV_00261055

Suzanne.scruggs@ost.dot.gov @ inet
Linda.figura@do.treas.gov @ inet anna.hart@do.treas.gov @ inet bvosburgh@doc.gov @ inet kreaves@doc.gov @ inet
Michael J. Conway/WHO/EOP@EOP
Susan B. Ralston/WHO/EOP@EOP
Alice H. Williams/CEA/EOP@EOP
Douglas J. Holtz-Eakin/CEA/EOP@EOP
Karen E. Keller/OMB/EOP@EOP
Karen E. Keller/OMB/EOP@EOP
Lois E. Altoft/OMB/EOP@EOP
Leslie A. Mooney/OPD/EOP@EOP
Carlos E. Bonilla/OPD/EOP@EOP barbara.lucas@ost.dot.gov @ inet

REPORTS OF INSURERS' CLAIMS ESTIMATES (from BBC news 9/14)

Swiss Re	$1B
Munich Re	$900M
AIG	$500M
Zurich Financial	$400M
Axa	$300M-$400M
Scor	$150M-$200M
Chubb	$100M-$200M
CGNU	$51M
Berkshire Hathaway	3-5% of total loss
Lloyd's	"Substantial"

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Terrorism Insurance [Folder 3]

OA/NARA#: 1825/1743
9633

Box 56
Foldor 8

REV_00261058

Source: News & Business > News > News Group File, Most Recent Two Years
Terms: "punitive damages" and sarbanes and dodd and date(bef 12-2001) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

Congressional Press Releases November 1, 2001, Thursday

Copyright 2001 eMediaMillWorks, Inc.
(f/k/a Federal Document Clearing House, Inc.)
Congressional Press Releases

November 1, 2001, Thursday

SECTION: PRESS RELEASE

LENGTH: 800 words

HEADLINE: SENATE BANKING COMMITTEE LEADERS REACH AGREEMENT WITH ADMINISTRATION ON TERRORISM RISK INSURANCE LEGISLATION

BYLINE: PAUL S. SARBANES, SENATOR, SENATE

BODY:
:Thursday, November 1, 2001

SENATE BANKING COMMITTEE LEADERS REACH AGREEMENT WITH ADMINISTRATION ON TERRORISM RISK INSURANCE LEGISLATION

Senators Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md), Phil Gramm (R-Tex), Chris Dodd (D-Conn), and Mike Enzi (R-Wyo) have reached agreement with the Administration on legislation to ensure the continued availability and affordability of terrorism risk insurance. The title of the legislation is the "Terrorism Risk Insurance Act of 2001."

"I am very pleased to announce this timely agreement," Senator Sarbanes said. "It represents a temporary, targeted, focused plan to allay uncertainties about the continuing availability of insurance at affordable prices. As we approach the end of the calendar year, when many policies are due to expire, it offers a responsible framework for proceeding with economic activities which are essential to the viability of our economy but which otherwise might not be possible." Senator Gramm commented, "I am pleased that of the various proposals that have been discussed, we have agreement on the one plan that provides no money to the insurance industry. Under our plan, we enter into a partnership with the industry to share the risk against insurance attacks, but all of the funds in the program would go directly to assist Americans who might become victims of terrorism. With this program, business in America can go on, without interruption from the terrorist threats."

"This measure - in short - can help seal cracks in our economic foundation that might occur in the event of future terrorist attacks," said Senator Dodd. "It acts as a 'homeland security' defense for our economy, and is definitely one 'policy' our nation should be willing to underwrite. I commend the Administration, Chairman Sarbanes, and Senators Gramm and Enzi for their leadership, and for everyone recognizing that this isn't about a single interest, but about our national interest."

"This bill represents a consensus between four members of the Senate Banking Committee with much different backgrounds and constituencies - This is not a compromise," said Sen. Enzi. "This legislation gives protection to taxpayers by forcing industry to be accountable for the first payments of any insurance claims and the bill also provides the proper federal backstop to protect small businesses and our economy as a whole."

The Act is a direct response to the events of September 11th, which have raised urgent questions about the future availability and affordability of insurance for losses resulting from terrorist attacks. In the absence of such insurance, lenders could be reluctant to finance real estate purchases, construction, or business investments in plant and equipment. With the expiration of many existing insurance policies looming on January 1, 2002, significant economic disruption could occur at that time.

The Terrorism Risk Insurance Act of 2001 establishes the Terrorism Insured Loss Shared Compensation program within the Department of the Treasury. Under this program, the Federal government would share the risk of future terrorist attacks with the insurance industry for two years. The Secretary of the Treasury would have the authority to extend the program for one additional year. In order to participate in the program, an insurance company must offer terrorism coverage in all of its property/casualty policies.

State regulation of insurance companies would continue uninterrupted, except that the definition of a "terrorist act" would be established by the legislation. States would be required to allow rate changes to take effect immediately during the first year of the program.

Any claims for property damage, personal injury or death arising from a terrorist act that occurs while the program is in effect would be consolidated in a single Federal district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation, and punitive damages would not be available.

In each of the first year two years of the program, Federal cost- sharing would become available after total losses exceed $10 billion, and the Federal government would assume responsibility for 90% of losses between $10 billion and $100 billion. If losses exceed $100 billion, Congress would determine the appropriate mechanism for ensuring payment. If the program is extended for a third year, Federal cost-sharing would become available after total losses exceed $20 billion, with the Federal government again assuming 90% of the responsibility for losses up to $100 billion. The program would cover only those property/casualty losses arising from act of terrorism, with the Treasury Secretary, in concurrence with the Secretary of State and the Attorney General, certifying whether an event is a terrorist act.

LOAD-DATE: November 5, 2001

Source: News & Business > News > News Group File, Most Recent Two Years ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" and sarbanes and dodd and date(bef 12-2001) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 1, 2002 - 4:21 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

McConnell

On page 29, strike line 1 and all that follows through page 30, line 17, and insert the following:

SEC. 10. PROCEDURES FOR CIVIL ACTIONS.

(a) FEDERAL CAUSE OF ACTION.--

(1) IN GENERAL.--There shall exist a Federal cause of action for claims arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism, which shall be the exclusive cause of action and remedy for such claims, except as provided in subsection (f).

(2) PREEMPTION OF STATE ACTIONS.--All State causes of action of any kind for claims arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism that are otherwise available under State law, are hereby preempted, except as provided in subsection (f).

(b) GOVERNING LAW.--The substantive law for decision in an action described in subsection (a)(1) shall be derived from the law, including applicable choice of law principles, of the State in which the act of terrorism giving rise to the action occurred, except to the extent that--

(1) the law, including choice of law principles, of another State is determined to be applicable to the action by the district court hearing the action; or

(2) otherwise applicable State law (including that determined under paragraph (1), is inconsistent with or otherwise preempted by Federal law.

(c) FEDERAL JURISDICTION.--

(1) IN GENERAL.--Notwithstanding any other provision of law, not later than 90 days after the date of the occurrence of an act of terrorism, the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall assign a single Federal district court to conduct pretrial and trial proceedings in all pending and future civil actions for claims arising out of or resulting from that act of terrorism.

(2) SELECTION CRITERIA.--The Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall select and assign the district court under paragraph (1) based on the convenience of the parties and the just and efficient conduct of the proceedings.

(3) JURISDICTION.--The district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction over all actions under paragraph (1). For purposes of personal jurisdiction, the district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall be deemed to sit in all judicial districts in the United States.

(4) TRANSFER OF CASES FILED IN OTHER FEDERAL COURTS.--Any civil action for claims arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism that is filed in a Federal district court other than the Federal district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation under paragraph (1) shall be transferred to the Federal district court so assigned.

(5) REMOVAL OF CASES FILED IN STATE COURTS.--Any civil action for claims arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism that is filed in a State court shall be removable to the Federal district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation under paragraph (1).

(d) APPROVAL OF SETTLEMENTS.--Any settlement between the parties of a civil action described in this section for claims arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism shall be subject to prior approval by the Secretary after consultation by the Secretary with the Attorney General.

REV_00261123

(e) LIMITATION ON DAMAGES.--

(1) IN GENERAL.--Punitive or exemplary damages shall not be available for any losses in any action described in subsection (a)(1), including any settlement described in subsection (d), except where--

(A) punitive or exemplary damages are permitted by applicable State law; and

(B) the harm to the plaintiff was caused by a criminal act or course of conduct for which the defendant was convicted under Federal or State criminal law, including a conviction based on a guilty pea or plea of nolo contendere.

(2) PROTECTION OF TAXPAYER FUNDS.--Any amounts awarded in, or granted in settlement of, an action described in subsection (a)(1) that are attributable to punitive or exemplary damages allowable under paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not count as insured losses for purposes of this Act.

(f) CLAIMS AGAINST TERRORISTS.--Nothing in this section shall in any way be construed to limit the ability of any plaintiff to seek any form of recovery from any person, government, or other entity that was a participant in, or aider and abettor of, any act of terrorism.

[Page: S5483] GPO's PDF

(g) EFFECTIVE PERIOD.--This section shall apply only to actions described in subsection (a)(1) arising out of or resulting from acts of terrorism that occur during the effective period of the Program, including any applicable extension period.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, this amendment replaces the liability section of the underlying bill with the liability section proposed in the compromise bill sponsored by Senator Gramm and myself.

The compromise has three principal elements. First, consolidation of all claims in a single Federal district court; second, approval of settlements by the Secretary of the Treasury; third, a ban on punitive damages, unless the defendant has been convicted of a criminal offense that is related to the plaintiff's injury.

The first two provisions should not spark any controversy. The proponents of the underlying bill themselves have agreed to Federal jurisdiction over these claims, and the approval of settlements by the Secretary of the Treasury simply protects the taxpayer dollars that will be exposed to potentially enormous lawsuits under this program. And since the underlying bill now--unlike an earlier version--prudently bans punitive damages against the Federal Treasury, this approval process ensures that a party does not attempt to casually circumvent that ban through a settlement.

So, again, this is a debate about whether we should expose American victims of terrorism to punitive damages--damages that heap additional punishment on American victims, even after the plaintiff has been fully compensated for his or her injuries.

REV_00261124

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Terrorism Insurance [Folder 3]:
Bills and Other Statutes [EMPTY]

OA/NARA#: 1825/1743
9633

Box 56
Folder 9

REV_00261137

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Terrorism Insurance [Folder 3]: Blocked Assets

OA/NARA#: 1825/1743
9633

Box 56
Folder 10

REV_00261138

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Terrorism Insurance [Folder 3]: Message

OA/NARA#: 1825/1743
9633

Box 56
Folder 11

REV_00261139

Kevin Warsh
10/17/2002 09:59:16 AM

Record Type: Record

To: Scott McClellan/WHO/EOP@EOP, Claire E. Buchan/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc: See the distribution list at the bottom of this message Subject: Final Draft of President's Statement -- Terrorism Insurance

Attached is final draft, subject to go-ahead from Leg Affairs later today.

Final draft statement Oct 17 2002.c

THE WHITE HOUSE

Office of the Press Secretary

For Immediate Release
October 17, 2002

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

The Congress today took an important step toward putting America's hard hats back on the job. The agreement reached by House and Senate conferees on terrorism insurance will help create new jobs for America's workers and billions in new investment.

I am pleased that the agreement provides a Federal backstop for costs associated with acts of terrorism, ensures meaningful industry participation in any losses resulting from terrorist acts, fully consolidates lawsuits in a single Federal court, and provides fair and certain resolution of claims. Although we significantly improved legal procedures to prevent abusive lawsuits against victims of terrorism, I am disappointed that we could not get agreement on even stronger measures to protect our economy. I urge the House and Senate to act quickly to get this bill to my desk.

Message Copied To:

Karl C. Rove/WHO/EOP@EOP
Daniel J. Bartlett/WHO/EOP@EOP
Stuart W. Bowen/WHO/EOP@EOP
Keith Hennessey/OPD/EOP@EOP
Brett M. Kavanaugh/WHO/EOP@EOP
Kristen Silverberg/WHO/EOP@EOP
Matthew Kirk/WHO/EOP@EOP
Brian C. Conklin/WHO/EOP@EOP
Kirk Blalock/WHO/EOP@EOP

October 17, 2002

To Members of the House Republican Leadership:

On behalf of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the world's largest business federation representing more than three million businesses and organizations of every size, sector and region, I write to urge you to support the proposed terrorism insurance compromise negotiated today and to explain why we strongly support the liability provisions of the proposed terrorism insurance compromise.

It is vital that the Congress pass this legislation before adjourning for the year. The economy has lost more than $15 billion and 300,000 jobs in the construction industry alone as a result of a lack of terrorism insurance coverage. We expect this legislation to provide a much needed boost to the economy, providing jobs to hundreds of thousands of workers across the country.

Although the U.S. Chamber would have preferred more extensive litigation management provisions, providing a federal cause of action and consolidation of claims has significant benefits:

- First, without this legislation, and the federal cause of action that it provides, businesses would have absolutely NO protection from predatory lawsuits that result from any future terrorist incident – they would still face forum shopping and multiple claims in state courts; courts known for rendering outrageous awards.
- Second, having these trials in federal court will provide consistent rulings, fair procedures for both plaintiffs and defendants, and provide for the use of relevant state laws that ban or otherwise limit the availability of punitive damages;
- Third, this legislation will prevent a "rush to the court-house," which would otherwise give early lawsuit filers an advantage over later claimants; and
- Fourth, the proposal represents an improvement over the Senate bill, which did not contain consolidation for trial purposes. This provision will significantly reduce administrative and legal costs, reduce redundant, repetitive and costly discovery, and will enable both plaintiffs and defendants to deal with only one trial, rather than multiple trials with potentially inconsistent outcomes.

Of course, we would have preferred to improve the legal system even more, particularly with respect to punitive damages. However, these improvements are substantial, which will add some needed momentum to the economy and is far preferable to no improvements. Ultimately we believe that this bill will improve the legal rights of both plaintiffs and defendants and, importantly will help American workers and the economy.

Considering the negative impacts on the economy that doing nothing will entail, moving a bill that backstops reinsurers and provides for exclusive federal court jurisdiction and consolidation is preferable to a continued stalemate. In short, it is the U.S. Chamber's view that this proposed solution is preferable to no action and that it should be enacted into law.

Sincerely,

R. Bruce Josten

cc: Chairman James Sensenbrenner
Chairman Michael Oxley

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Terrorism Insurance [Folder 3]: Proposals and Messages

OA/NARA#: 1825/1743
9633

Box 57
Folder 1

REV_00261145

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Terrorism Insurance [Folder 3]: State Statutes on Punitive Damages

OA/NARA#: 1825/1743
9633

Box 57
Folder 2

REV_00261152

be bifurcated. Initially, juries will be instructed to determine liability and the amount of compensatory damages, if any; also, the jury is to return a special verdict on the question whether a punitive damages award is warranted. If the jury answers yes to the punitive damages question, the trial will be resumed for the presentation of evidence and instructions relevant to the amount appropriate to award as punitive damages. After postverdict trial court review and subsequent appellate review, the amount of the final punitive damages judgment will be paid into the trial court. The trial court will then order payment of litigation expenses, including the plaintiff's attorney's fees, and instruct the clerk to divide the remainder equally between the plaintiff and the State General Fund. The provision for payment to the State General Fund is applicable to all judgments not yet satisfied, and therefore would apply to the judgment in Gore's case.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

For the reasons stated, I dissent from this Court's disturbance of the judgment the Alabama Supreme Court has made. [851]

APPENDIX TO OPINION OF GINSBURG, J.

STATE LEGISLATIVE ACTIVITY REGARDING PUNITIVE DAMAGES

State legislatures have in the hopper or have enacted a variety of measures to curtail awards of punitive damages. At least one state legislature has prohibited punitive damages altogether, unless explicitly provided by statute. See N. H. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 507:16 (1994). We set out in this appendix some of the several controls enacted or under consideration in the States. The measures surveyed are: (1) caps on awards; (2) provisions for payment of sums to state agencies rather than to plaintiffs; and (3) mandatory bifurcated trials with separate proceedings for punitive damages determinations.

[*615] I. CAPS ON PUNITIVE DAMAGES AWARDS

* Colorado -- Colo. Rev. Stat. §§ 13-21-102(1)(a) and (3) (1987) (as a main rule, caps punitive damages at amount of actual damages).

* Connecticut -- Conn. Gen. Stat. § 52-240b (1995) (caps punitive damages at twice compensatory damages in products liability cases).

* Delaware -- H. R. 237, 138th Gen. Ass. (introduced May 17, 1995) (would cap punitive damages at greater of three times compensatory damages, or $ 250,000).

* Florida -- Fla. Stat. §§ 768.73(1)(a) and (b) (Supp. 1992) (in general, caps punitive damages at three times compensatory damages).

* Georgia -- Ga. Code Ann. § 51-12-5.1 (Supp. 1995) (caps punitive damages at $ 250,000 in some tort actions; prohibits multiple awards stemming from the same predicate conduct in products liability actions).

* Illinois -- H. 20, 89th Gen. Ass. 1995-1996 Reg. Sess. (enacted Mar. 9, 1995) (caps punitive damages at three times economic damages).

* Indiana -- H. 1741, 109th Reg. Sess. (enacted Apr. 26, 1995) (caps punitive damages at greater of three times compensatory damages, or $ 50,000).

* Kansas -- Kan. Stat. Ann. §§ 60-3701(e) and (f) (1994) (in general, caps punitive damages at lesser of defendant's annual gross income, or $ 5 million).

REV_00261154

* Maryland -- S. 187, 1995 Leg. Sess. (introduced Jan. 27, 1995) (in general, would cap punitive damages at four times compensatory damages).

* Minnesota -- S. 489, 79th Leg. Sess., 1995 Reg. Sess. (introduced Feb. 16, 1995) (would require reasonable relationship between compensatory and punitive damages).

* Nevada -- Nev. Rev. Stat. § 42.005(1) (1993) (caps punitive damages at three times compensatory damages if compensatory damages equal $ 100,000 or more, and at $ 300,000 if the compensatory damages are less than $ 100,000).

[*616] * New Jersey -- S. 1496, 206th Leg., 2d Ann. Sess. (1995) (caps punitive damages at greater of five times compensatory damages, or $ 350,000, in certain tort cases).

* North Dakota -- N. D. Cent. Code § 32-03.2-11(4) (Supp. 1995) (caps punitive damages [1619] at greater of two times compensatory damages, or $ 250,000).

* Oklahoma -- Okla Stat., Tit. 23, §§ 9.1(B)-(D) (Supp. 1996) (caps punitive [852] damages at greater of $ 100,000, or actual damages, if jury finds defendant guilty of reckless disregard; and at greatest of $ 500,000, twice actual damages, or the benefit accruing to defendant from the injury-causing conduct, if jury finds that defendant has acted intentionally and maliciously).

* Texas -- S. 25, 74th Reg. Sess. (enacted Apr. 20, 1995) (caps punitive damages at twice economic damages, plus up to $ 750,000 additional noneconomic damages).

* Virginia -- Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-38.1 (1992) (caps punitive damages at $ 350,000).

II. ALLOCATION OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES TO STATE AGENCIES

* Arizona -- H. R. 2279, 42d Leg., 1st Reg. Sess. (introduced Jan. 12, 1995) (would allocate punitive damages to a victims' assistance fund, in specified circumstances).

* Florida -- Fla. Stat. §§ 768.73(2)(a)-(b) (Supp. 1992) (allocates 35% of punitive damages to General Revenue Fund or Public Medical Assistance Trust Fund); see Gordon v. State, 585 So. 2d 1033, 1035-1038 (Fla. App. 1991), aff'd, 608 So. 2d 800 (Fla. 1992) (upholding provision against due process challenge).

* Georgia -- Ga. Code Ann. § 51-12-5.1(e)(2) (Supp. 1995) (allocates 75% of punitive damages, less a proportionate part of litigation costs, including counsel fees, to state treasury); see Mack Trucks, Inc. v. Conkle, 263 Ga. 539, 540-543, 436 S.E.2d 635, 637-639 (Ga. 1993) (upholding provision against constitutional challenge).

[*617] * Illinois -- Ill. Comp. Stat., ch. 735, § 5/2-1207 (1994) (permits court to apportion punitive damages among plaintiff, plaintiff's attorney, and Illinois Department of Rehabilitation Services).

* Indiana -- H. 1741, 109th Reg. Sess. (enacted Apr. 26, 1995) (subject to statutory exceptions, allocates 75% of punitive damages to a compensation fund for violent crime victims).

* Iowa -- Iowa Code § 668A.1(2)(b) (1987) (in described circumstances, allocates 75% of punitive damages, after payment of costs and counsel fees, to a civil reparations trust fund); see Shepherd Components, Inc. v. Brice Petrides-Donohue & Assoc., Inc., 473 N.W.2d 612, 619 (Iowa 1991) (upholding provision against constitutional challenge).

* Kansas -- Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-3402(e) (1994) (allocates 50% of punitive damages in medical malpractice cases to state treasury).

REV_00261155

* Missouri -- Mo. Rev. Stat. § 537.675 (1994) (allocates 50% of punitive damages, after payment of expenses and counsel fees, to Tort Victims' Compensation Fund).

* Montana -- H. 71, 54th Leg. Sess. (introduced Jan. 2, 1995) (would allocate 48% of punitive damages to state university system and 12% to school for the deaf and blind).

* New Jersey -- S. 291, 206th Leg., 1994-1995 1st Reg. Sess. (introduced Jan. 18, 1994); A. 148, 206th Leg., 1994-1995 1st Reg. Sess. (introduced Jan. 11, 1994) (would allocate 75% of punitive damages to New Jersey Health Care Trust Fund).

* New Mexico -- H. 1017, 42d Leg., 1st Sess. (introduced Feb. 16, 1995) (would allocate punitive damages to Low-Income Attorney Services Fund).

* Oregon -- S. 482, 68th Leg. Ass. (enacted July 19, 1995) (amending [853] Ore. Rev. Stat. §§ 18.540 and 30.925, and repealing Ore. Rev. Stat. § 41.315) (allocates 60% of punitive damages to Criminal Injuries Compensation Account).

[*618] * Utah -- Utah Code Ann. § 78-18-1(3) (1992) (allocates 50% of punitive damages in excess of $ 20,000 to state treasury).

III. MANDATORY BIFURCATION OF LIABILITY AND PUNITIVE DAMAGES DETERMINATIONS

* California -- Cal. Civ. Code Ann. § 3295(d) (West Supp. 1995) (requires bifurcation, on application of defendant, of liability and damages phases of trials in which punitive damages are requested).

* Delaware -- H. R. 237, 138th Gen. Ass. (introduced May 17, 1995) (would require, at [1620] request of any party, a separate proceeding for determination of punitive damages).

* Georgia -- Ga. Code Ann. § 51-12-5.1(d) (Supp. 1995) (in all cases in which punitive damages are claimed, liability for punitive damages is tried first, then amount of punitive damages).

* Illinois -- H. 20, 89th Gen. Ass., 1995-1996 Reg. Sess. (enacted Mar. 9, 1995) (mandates, upon defendant's request, separate proceeding for determination of punitive damages).

* Kansas -- Kan. Stat. Ann. §§ 60-3701(a) and (b) (1994) (trier of fact determines defendant's liability for punitive damages, then court determines amount of such damages).

* Missouri -- Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 510.263(1) and (3) (1994) (mandates bifurcated proceedings, on request of any party, for jury to determine first whether defendant is liable for punitive damages, then amount of punitive damages).

* Montana -- Mont. Code Ann. § 27-1-221(7) (1995) (upon finding defendant liable for punitive damages, jury determines the amount in separate proceeding).

* Nevada -- Nev. Rev. Stat. § 42.005(3) (1993) (if jury determines that punitive damages will be awarded, jury then determines amount in separate proceeding).

* New Jersey -- N. J. Stat. Ann. §§ 2A:58C-5(b) and (d) (West 1987) (mandates separate proceedings for determination of compensatory and punitive damages).

[*619] * North Dakota -- N. D. Cent. Code § 32-03.2-11(2) (Supp. 1995) (upon request of either party, trier of fact determines whether compensatory damages will be awarded before determining punitive damages liability and amount).

REV_00261156

* Oklahoma -- Okla. Stat., Tit. 23, §§ 9.1(B)-(D) (Supp. 1995-1996) (requires separate jury proceedings for punitive damages); S. 443, 45th Leg., 1st Reg. Sess. (introduced Jan. 31, 1995) (would require courts to strike requests for punitive damages before trial, unless plaintiff presents prima facie evidence at least 30 days before trial to sustain such damages; provide for bifurcated jury trial on request of defendant; and permit punitive damages only if compensatory damages are awarded).

* Virginia -- H. 1070, 1994-1995 [854] Reg. Sess. (introduced Jan. 25, 1994) (would require separate proceedings in which court determines that punitive damages are appropriate and trier of fact determines amount of punitive damages).

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 517 us 564
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, October 12, 2002 - 2:03 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

****
 TX REPORT ***
****

TRANSMISSION OK

TX/RX NO	0620
CONNECTION TEL	92281475
CONNECTION ID	VICE PRESIDENT'S
ST. TIME	10/16 18:39
USAGE T	03'26
PGS. SENT	15
RESULT	OK

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

OFFICE OF THE COUNSEL TO THE PRESIDENT

Facsimile
Cover Sheet

Phone: (202) 456-7900
Fax: (202) 456-1647

Date: _____
Time: _____

To: MATT KIRK

Fax: 228-1425

From: _____

Number of Pages: ____

Message:

_____

_____

_____

_____

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Terrorism Insurance Backup File [1]

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 2180/2091
9800

Box 57
Folder 3

REV_00261173

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF

(202) 456-6798 – Phone
(202) 456-1907 - Fax

TO: Brett

FAX NUMBER: 62-1647

PHONE NUMBER:

FROM:

TOTAL NUMBER OF PAGES:

Message:

Confidentiality Notice: This document in transmission contains information to the sender which is confidential and may be legally privileged. The information is intended for the individual or entity named above. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, duplication, or taking of any action in reliance on the contents of this telecopied information is strictly prohibited. If you received this telecopy in error, please immediately notify us by telephone to arrange the return of the original to us.

1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, DC 20500

Emily Willeford
10/09/2001 07:52:30 AM

Record Type: Record

To: Carol J. Thompson/WHO/EOP@EOP, Elizabeth N. Camp/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:
Subject: final terrorism insurance memo

FYI for the 11 am meeting.
---------- Forwarded by Emily Willeford/OPD/EOP on 10/09/2001 07:51 AM ----------

D. Marcus Sumerlin 10/08/2001 04:02:59

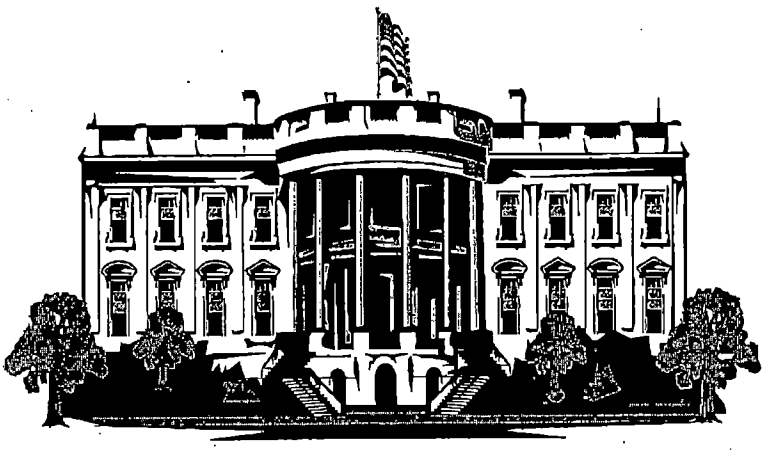
Record Type: Record

To: See the distribution list at the bottom of this message

cc: Emily Willeford/OPD/EOP@EOP, Eric H. Otto/OPD/EOP@EOP, Gary R. Edson/NSC/EOP@EOP
Subject: final terrorism insurance memo

Please find attached a final version of the terrorism insurance memo for your principal.

Thanks,



Marc

deputies insurance memo 10-08-01.d

Message Sent To:

Peter.Fisher@do.treas.gov @ inet
K. Philippa Malmgren/OPD/EOP@EOP
Augustine T. Smythe/OMB/EOP@EOP kathleen.cooper@esa.doc.gov @ inet michael.jackson@ost.dot.gov @ inet kirk.vantine@ost.dot.gov @ inet
Charles D. McGrath Jr/OVP/EOP@EOP
Brett M. Kavanaugh/WHO/EOP@EOP
Randall S. Kroszner/CEA/EOP@EOP
Jeffrey R. Brown/CEA/EOP@EOP
Kristen Silverberg/WHO/EOP@EOP
Sheila.Bair@do.treas.gov @ inet brown@nber.org @ inet
John A. Cloud/NSC/EOP@EOP
Michael J. Conway/WHO/EOP@EOP
Karen E. Keller/OMB/EOP@EOP
Amy C. Smith/OMB/EOP@EOP

FAX COVER SHEET

EMILY WILLEFORD
NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL
THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON, DC 20502
PHONE: 202/456-5804 FAX: 202/456-0127

DATE: OCTOBER 10, 2001 NUMBER OF PAGES (INCL. COVER): 6 TO: BRETT KAVANAUGH

FAX: 61647

COMMENTS: FROM MARC SUMERLIN. THANK YOU.

The document accompanying this Facsimile Transmission Sheet is intended only for the use of the individual or entity to which it is addressed. This message contains information which may be privileged, confidential or exempt from disclosure under applicable law. If the reader of this message is not the intended recipient, or the employee or agent responsible for delivering the message to the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, dissemination, copying or distribution, or taking any action in reliance on the contents of this communication is strictly prohibited. If you have received this communication in error, please notify us immediately at the number above.

UNIFORM PRODUCT CODING MATRIX (DRAFTED 10/5/01)

Line of Business	Filing Code	Line of Insurance	Description	NAIC Annual Statement Line
Property			Coverage protecting the insured against loss or damage to real or personal property from a variety of perils, including—but not limited to—fire, lightening, business interruption, loss of rents, glass breakage, tornado, windstorm, hail, water damage, explosion, riot, civil commotion, rain, or damage from aircraft or vehicles.
	1.010	Commercial	Property insurance coverage sold to commercial ventures.	01—02.1
	1.020	Personal	Property insurance coverage sold for personal, family or household purposes.	01—02.1
Crop			Coverage protecting the insured against loss or damage to crops from a variety of perils, including but not limited to fire, lightening, loss of revenue, tornado, windstorm, hail, flood, rain, or damage by insects.
	2.010	Crop-Hail	All other crop or hail insurance products.	02.1
	2.020	Federally Reinsured	Crop insurance coverage that is either wholly or in part reinsured by the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation (FCIC) under the Standard Reinsurance Agreement (SRA). This includes the following products: Multiple Peril Crop Insurance (MPCI); Catastrophic Insurance, Crop Revenue Coverage (CRC); Income Protection and Revenue Assurance.	02.2
Flood			Coverage protecting the insured against loss or damage to real or personal property from flood. (Note: If coverage for flood is offered as an additional peril on a property insurance policy, file it under the applicable property insurance filing code.)
	2.310	Commercial	Separate flood insurance policy sold to commercial ventures.	02.3
	2.320	Personal	Separate flood insurance policy sold for personal, family or household purposes.	02.3
Farmowners			A package policy for farming and ranching risks, similar to a homeowners policy, that has been developed for farms and ranches and includes both property and liability coverage for personal and business losses. Coverage includes farm dwellings and their contents, barns, stables, other farm structures and farm inland marine, such as mobile equipment and livestock.
	3.010	Commercial	Farmowners insurance sold to commercial ventures.	03
	3.020	Personal	Farmowners insurance sold for personal, family or household purposes.	03
Homeowners			A package policy combining real and personal property coverage with personal liability coverage. Coverage applicable to the dwelling, appurtenant structures, unscheduled personal property and additional living expense are typical. Includes mobile homes at a fixed location.
	4.010	Owner Occupied	Homeowners insurance sold to owners occupying the described property.	04
	4.020	Tenants	Homeowners insurance sold to tenants occupying the described property.	04
	4.030	Condos	Homeowners insurance sold to condominium owners occupying the described property.	04

REV_00261182

Line of Business	Filing Code	Line of Insurance	Description	NAIC Annual Statement Line
		Umbrella and Excess (Personal)	Non-business liability protection for individuals above a specific amount set forth in a basic policy issued by the primary insurer; or a self-insurer for losses over a stated amount; or an insured or self-insurer for known or unknown gaps in basic coverages or self-insured retentions.
	17.221		Claims Made	17
	17.222		Occurrence	17
		Other	Other Liability not specifically described above.
	17.231		Claims Made	17
	17.232		Occurrence	17
		Product Liability	Coverage for losses or injuries caused by defect or malfunction of the product.
	18.010		Claims Made	18
	18.020		Occurrence	18
Auto Liability			Coverage that protects the insured against financial loss because of legal liability for motor vehicle related injuries, or damage to the property of others caused by accidents arising out of ownership, maintenance or use of a motor vehicle (including recreational vehicles).
		Auto No-fault (Personal Injury Protection—PIP)	PIP that provides for the use of an automobile no-fault benefits in states that have enacted mandatory or optional no-fault automobile insurance coverages. PIP usually includes benefits for medical expenses, loss of work income, essential services, accidental death and funeral expenses.
	19.011	Private Passenger		19.1
	19.012	Commercial		19.3
		Other Auto Liability	Auto liability coverage, other than personal injury protection, for all motor vehicles.
	19.021	Private Passenger		19.2
	19.022	Commercial		19.4
Auto Physical Damage			Motor vehicle coverage (including collision, vandalism, fire and theft) that insures on a first party basis against material damage to the insured's vehicle.
	21.110	Private Passenger	Auto physical damage coverage for motor vehicles that are used in connection with personal, family or household purposes.	21.1
	21.220	Commercial	Auto physical damage coverage for motor vehicles that are used in connection with a business, commercial establishments, or activities carried on for gain or profit.	21.2
Aircraft	22		Coverage for aircraft (hull) and their contents; aircraft owners' and aircraft manufacturers liability to passengers, airports and other third parties.	22
Fidelity	23		A bond covering an employer's loss resulting from an employee's dishonest act (e.g., loss of cash, securities, valuables, etc.)	23

REV_00261191

Line of Business	Filing Code	Line of Insurance	Description	NAIC Annual Statement Line
Surety	24		A three-party agreement where the insurer agrees to pay a second party (the obligee) or make complete an obligation in response to the default, acts, or omissions of a third party (the principal or obligor).	24
Burglary and Theft			Coverage for property taken or destroyed by break-in and entering the insured's premises; burglary or theft; forgery or counterfeiting; fraud; and off-premises exposure. Includes Fidelity and Surety coverage written as part of a Crime and Fidelity program.
	26.010	Commercial	Burglary and theft coverage for commercial enterprises.	26
	26.020	Personal	Burglary and theft coverage for personal or household risks.	26
Boiler and Machinery	27		Coverage for the failure of boilers, machinery and other electrical equipment. Benefits include (i) property of the insured, which has been directly damaged by the accident; (ii) costs of temporary repairs and expediting expenses; and (iii) liability for damage to the property of others. Coverage also includes inspection of the equipment.	27
Credit			Coverage purchased by manufacturers, merchants, educational institutions, or other providers of goods and services extending credit, for indemnification of losses or damages resulting from the nonpayment of debts owed to them for goods or services provided in the normal course of their business.
	28.010	Credit Personal Property	Insurance covering a creditor's security interest in such property when written in connection with a credit transaction that: (1). Covers perils to the goods purchased through a credit transaction or used as collateral for a credit transaction and that concerns a creditor's interest in the purchased goods or pledged collateral either in whole or in part; or (2). Covers perils to goods purchased in connection with an open-end credit transaction as specified in the NAIC Model Act on Credit Personal Property. NOTE: Credit life accident and health insurance products and credit unemployment insurance should be reported under this code.	28
	28.020	Single Interest	Credit personal property insurance covering only the seller's or creditor's interest in the goods purchased through the credit transaction or pledged as collateral in the credit transaction.	28
Other Lines of Business	33		Coverages not described under previous Lines of Insurance.	33
Title	34		Coverage that guarantees the validity of a title to real and personal property. Buyers of real and personal property and mortgage lenders rely upon the coverage to protect them against losses from undiscovered defects in existence when the policy is issued.	None
Interline Filings	35		A filing consisting of one or more forms, classification or territories that applies to more than one line of business (e.g., cancellation provisions; declarations page).	None

REV_00261192

Line of Business	Filing Code	Line of Insurance	Description	NAIC Annual Statement Line
	4.040	Mobile Homes	Homeowners insurance sold to owners occupying the described mobile home.	04
	4.050	Other	All other Homeowners insurance products.	04
Commercial Multiple Peril			The non-liability portion of a multiple peril policy for a commercial enterprise. The policy packages two or more insurance coverages protecting an enterprise from various property and liability risk exposures. Frequently includes fire, allied lines, various other coverages (e.g., difference in conditions) and liability coverage. Such coverages would be included in other annual statement lines, if written individually. Include under this line of business multi-peril policies (other than farmowners, homeowners and automobile policies) that include coverage for liability other than auto.
		Commercial Package Policy	The CPP provides a broad package of property and liability coverages for commercial ventures other than those provided insurance through a businessowners policy. (The older special multi peril programs (SMP) also use this code.)
	5.110		Non-Liability Portion	05.1
	5.120		Liability Portion	05.2
	5.210	Builders' Risk Policies	Typically written on a reporting or completed value form, this coverage insures against loss to buildings in the course of construction. The coverage also includes machinery and equipment used in the course of construction and to materials incidental to construction.	05.1
		Businessowners	The non-liability portion of a businessowners policy (BOP). The BOP provides a broad package of property and liability coverages for small and medium sized apartment buildings, offices, and retail stores.
	5.310		Non-Liability Portion	05.1
	5.320		Liability Portion	05.2
	5.410	Manufacturers Output Policies	Provides broad form all risks coverage of personal property of an insured manufacturer that is located away from the premises of the manufacturer at the time of a claim.	05.1
		Other Package Policies	All other Commercial Multiple peril insurance products.
	5.510		Non-Liability Portion	05.1
	5.520		Liability Portion	05.2
Mortgage Guaranty			Insurance that indemnifies a lender for loss upon foreclosure if a borrower fails to meet required mortgage payments.
	6.010	MG-Fixed Rate Mortgages	The type of loan in which the interest rate will not change for the entire term of the loan.	06
	6.020	MG-Trust/Pools	Insure pools of loans secured by instruments constituting a first lien on real estate and evidenced by pass-through certificates or other instruments.	06
	6.030	MG-Variable Mortgages	The type of loan in which the interest rate may vary or float periodically throughout the term of the loan based on an interest rate index.	06

REV_00261183

Line of Business	Filing Code	Line of Insurance	Description	NAIC Annual Statement Line
Ocean Marine	8		Coverage for ocean and inland water transportation exposures; goods or cargoes; ships or hulls; earnings; and liability.	08
Inland Marine			Coverage for property that may be in transit, held by a bailee, at a fixed location, or movable goods that are often at different locations (e.g., off-road constructions equipment), or scheduled property (e.g., Homeowners Personal Property Floater) including items such as live animals, property with antique or collector's value, etc. These lines also include instrumentalities of transportation and communication, such as bridges, tunnels, piers, wharves, docks, pipelines, power and phone lines, and radio and television towers.	09
	9.010	Animal Mortality	Coverage that provides a death benefit to the owner of a policy in the event of the death of the insured livestock.	09
	9.020	Difference in Conditions (DIC)	DIC is a special form of open-peril coverage written in conjunction with basic fire coverage and designed to provide protection against losses not reimbursed under the standard fire forms.	09
	9.030	EDP Policies	Coverage to protect against losses arising out of damage to or destruction of electronic data processing equipment and its software.	09
	9.040	Pet Insurance Plans	Veterinary care plan insurance policy providing care for a pet animal (e.g., dog or cat) of the insured owner in the event of its illness or accident.	09
	9.050	Other Commercial Inland Marine	All other inland marine coverage that is sold to commercial ventures.	09
	9.060	Other Personal Inland Marine	All other inland marine coverage that is sold for personal, family or household purposes.	09
Financial Guaranty	10		A surety bond, insurance policy, or an indemnity contract (when issued by an insurer), or similar guaranty types under which loss is payable upon proof of occurrence of financial loss to an insured claimant, obligee or indemnitee as a result of failure to perform a financial obligation.	10
Medical Malpractice			Insurance coverage protecting a licensed health care provider or health care facility against legal liability resulting from the death or injury of any person due to the insured's misconduct, negligence, or incompetence, in rendering or failure to render professional services.
		Acupuncture	Medical malpractice for acupuncture procedures.
	11.110		Claims Made	11
	11.120		Occurrence	11
		Ambulance Services	Medical malpractice for a ambulance service.
	11.210		Claims Made	11
	11.220		Occurrence	11

REV_00261184

Line of Business	Filing Code	Line of Insurance	Description	NAIC Annual Statement Line
		Chiropractic	Medical malpractice for a chiropractor.
	11.310		Claims Made	11
	11.320		Occurrence	11
		Community Health Centers	Medical malpractice for a community health center.
	11.410		Claims Made	11
	11.420		Occurrence	11
		Dental Hygienists	Medical malpractice for a dental hygienist.
	11.510		Claims Made	11
	11.520		Occurrence	11
		Dentists – General Practice	Medical malpractice for a general practice dentist.
	11.610		Claims Made	11
	11.620		Occurrence	11
		Dentists – Oral Surgeons	Medical malpractice for a oral surgeon dentist.
	11.710		Claims Made	11
	11.720		Occurrence	11
		Home Care Service Agencies	Medical malpractice for a home care service agency.
	11.810		Claims Made	11
	11.820		Occurrence	11
		Hospitals	Medical malpractice for a hospital.
	11.910		Claims Made	11
	11.920		Occurrence	11
		Licensed Practical Nurses	Medical malpractice for a licensed practical nurse.
	11.101		Claims Made	11
	11.102		Occurrence	11
		Nurse Anesthetists	Medical malpractice for a nurse anesthetist.
	11.111		Claims Made	11
	11.112		Occurrence	11
		Nurse Midwife	Medical malpractice for a nurse midwife.
	11.121		Claims Made	11
	11.122		Occurrence	11
		Nurse Practitioners	Medical malpractice for a nurse practitioner.
	11.131		Claims Made	11
	11.132		Occurrence	11
		Nursing Homes	Medical malpractice for a nursing home.
	11.141		Claims Made	11
	11.142		Occurrence	11

REV_00261185

Line of Business	Filing Code	Line of Insurance	Description	NAIC Annual Statement Line
		Occupational Therapy	Medical malpractice for a occupational therapist.
	11.151		Claims Made	11
	11.152		Occurrence	11
		Ophthalmic Dispensing	Medical malpractice for ophthalmic dispensing.
	11.161		Claims Made	11
	11.162		Occurrence	11
		Optometry	Medical malpractice for an optometrist.
	11.171		Claims Made	11
	11.172		Occurrence	11
		Osteopathy	Medical malpractice for a osteopathic physician.
	11.181		Claims Made	11
	11.182		Occurrence	11
		Pharmacy	Medical malpractice for a pharmacist.
	11.191		Claims Made	11
	11.192		Occurrence	11
		Physical Therapy	Medical malpractice for a physical therapist.
	11.201		Claims Made	11
	11.202		Occurrence	11
		Physicians & Surgeons	Medical malpractice for a physician or surgeon.
	11.211		Claims Made	11
	11.212		Occurrence	11
		Physicians Assistants	Medical malpractice for a physicians assistant.
	11.221		Claims Made	11
	11.222		Occurrence	11
		Podiatry	Medical Malpractice for a podiatrist.
	11.231		Claims Made	11
	11.231		Occurrence	11
		Private Duty Nurses	Medical malpractice for a private duty nurse.
	11.241		Claims Made	11
	11.242		Occurrence	11
		Psychology	Medical malpractice for a psychologist.
	11.251		Claims Made	11
	11.252		Occurrence	11
		Registered Nurses	Medical malpractice for a registered nurse.
	11.261		Claims Made	11
	11.262		Occurrence	11

REV_00261186

Line of Business	Filing Code	Line of Insurance	Description	NAIC Annual Statement Line
		Speech Pathology	Medical malpractice for a speech pathologist.
	11.271		Claims Made	11
	11.272		Occurrence	11
		Other	Medical malpractice not specifically described above.
	11.281		Claims Made	11
	11.282		Occurrence	11
Earthquake			Property coverage for losses resulting from a sudden trembling or shaking of the earth, including that caused by volcanic eruption.
	12.010	Commercial	Earthquake property coverage for commercial ventures.	12
	12.020	Personal	Earthquake property coverage for personal, family or household purposes.	12
Workers' Compensation			Insurance that covers an employer's liability for injuries, disability or death to persons in their employment, without regard to fault, as prescribed by state or federal workers' compensation laws and other statutes. Includes employer's liability coverage.
	16.010	Alternative Workers' compensation	Other than standard workers' compensation coverage, employer's liability and excess workers' compensation(e.g., large deductible, managed care).	16
	16.020	Employers Liability	Employers liability coverage for the legal liability of employers arising out of injuries to employees. This code should be used when coverage is issued as an endorsement, or as part of a statutory workers' compensation policy. When coverage is issued as a stand-alone policy, or as an endorsement a package policy, the appropriate "Other Liability" code should be used (i.e., 17.101 or 17.102).	16
	16.030	Excess Workers' Compensation	Either specific and/or aggregate excess workers' compensation insurance written above an attachment point or self-insured retention.	33
	16.040	Standard Workers' Compensation	Insurance that covers an employer's liability for injuries, disability or death to persons in their employment, without regard to fault, as prescribed by state or federal workers' compensation laws and includes within the basic policy employer's liability coverage.	16
Other Liability			Coverage protecting the insured against legal liability resulting from negligence, carelessness, or a failure to act resulting in property damage or personal injury to others.
		Commercial General Liability	Flexible & broad commercial liability coverage with two major sub-lines: premises/operations sub-line and products/completed operations sub-line.
	17.011		Claims Made	17
	17.012		Occurrence	17

REV_00261187

Line of Business	Filing Code	Line of Insurance	Description	NAIC Annual Statement Line
		Completed Operations	Policies provided to contractors covering liability to persons who have incurred bodily injury or property damage from defective work or operations completed or abandoned by or for the insured, away from the insured's premises.
	17.021		Claims Made	17
	17.022		Occurrence	17
		Comprehensive Personal Liability	Comprehensive liability coverage for exposures arising out of the residence premises and activities of individuals and family members. (Non-business liability exposure protection for individuals.)
	17.031		Claims Made	17
	17.032		Occurrence	17
		Contractual Liability	Liability coverage of an insured who has assumed the legal liability of another party by written or oral contract.
	17.041		Claims Made	17
	17.042		Occurrence	17
		Day Care Centers	Liability coverage for day care centers.
	17.051		Claims Made	17
	17.052		Occurrence	17
		Directors & Officers Liability	Liability coverage protecting directors or officers of a corporation from liability arising out of the performance of their professional duties on behalf of the corporation.
	17.061		Claims Made	17
	17.062		Occurrence	17
		Elevators and Escalators Liability	Liability coverage for bodily injury or property damage arising from the use of elevators or escalators operated, maintained or controlled by the insured.
	17.071		Claims Made	17
	17.072		Occurrence	17
		Employment Practices Liability	Liability protection for an employer providing personal injury coverage arising out of employment-related practices, personnel policies, acts, or omissions. Examples of claims such policies respond to are refusal to employ, termination, coercion, demotion, evaluation, reassignment, discipline, defamation, harassment, humiliation, and discrimination.
	17.081		Claims Made	17
	17.082		Occurrence	17

REV_00261188

Line of Business	Filing Code	Line of Insurance	Description	NAIC Annual Statement Line
		Employee Benefit Liability	Liability protection for an employer for claims arising from provisions in an employee benefit insurance plan provided for the economic and social welfare of employees. Examples of items covered are pension plans, group life insurance, group health insurance, group disability income insurance, and accidental death and dismemberment.
	17.091		Claims Made	17
	17.092		Occurrence	17
		Employers Liability	Employers liability coverage for the legal liability of employers arising out of injuries to employees. This code should be used when coverage is issued as a stand-alone policy, or as an endorsement to a package policy. When this coverage is issued as an endorsement to a statutory workers' compensation policy, the appropriate "Workers' Compensation" code should be used (i.e., Code 16.020).
	17.101		Claims Made	17
	17.102		Occurrence	17
		Environmental Pollution Liability	Liability coverage of an insured to persons who have incurred bodily injury or property damage from acids, fumes, smoke, toxic chemicals, waste materials or other pollutants.
	17.121		Claims Made	17
	17.122		Occurrence	17
		Fire Legal Liability	Coverage for property loss liability as the result of separate negligent acts and/or omissions of the insured that allows a spreading fire to cause bodily injury or property damage of others. An example is a tenant who, while occupying another party's property, through negligence causes fire damage to the property.
	17.131		Claims Made	17
	17.132		Occurrence	17
		Kidnap & Ransom Liability	Liability coverage up to specific limits for payments demanded by kidnappers for the release of an insured held against his or her will.
	17.141		Claims Made	17
	17.142		Occurrence	17
		Liquor Liability	Coverage for the liability of an entity involved in the retail or wholesale sales of alcoholic beverages, or the serving of alcoholic beverages, to persons who have incurred bodily injury or property damage arising from an intoxicated person.
	17.151		Claims Made	17
	17.152		Occurrence	17

REV_00261189

Line of Business	Filing Code	Line of Insurance	Description	NAIC Annual Statement Line
		Municipal Liability	Liability coverage for the acts of a municipality.
	17.161		Claims Made	17
	17.162		Occurrence	17
		Nuclear Energy Liability	Coverage for bodily injury and property damage liability resulting from the nuclear energy material (whether or not radioactive) on the insured business's premises or in transit.
	17.171		Claims Made	17
	17.172		Occurrence	17
		Personal Injury Liability	Coverage for the liability of an insured for injury to persons, other than bodily injury. Examples include discrimination, falsely arrest, illegal detainment, libel, malicious prosecution, slander, suffering mental anguish, and violation of privacy rights.
	17.181		Claims Made	17
	17.182		Occurrence	17
		Premises and Operations (OL&T and M&C)	Policies covering the liability of an insured to persons who have incurred bodily injury or property damage on an insured's premises during normal operations or routine maintenance, or from an insured's business operations either on or off of the insured's premises.
	17.191		Claims Made	17
	17.192		Occurrence	17
		Professional Errors and Omissions Liability	Coverage available to pay for liability arising out of the performance of professional or business related duties, with coverage being tailored to the needs of the specific profession. Examples include abstracters, accountants, insurance adjusters, architects, engineers, insurance agents and brokers, lawyers, real estate agents, stockbrokers.
	17.201		Claims Made	17
	17.202		Occurrence	17
		Umbrella and Excess (Commercial)	Coverage for the liability of a commercial venture above a specific amount set forth in a basic policy issued by the primary insurer; or a self-insurer for losses over a stated amount; or an insured or self-insurer for known or unknown gaps in basic coverages or self-insured retentions. Note: Does not include excess workers' compensation insurance.
	17.211		Claims Made	17
	17.212		Occurrence	17

REV_00261190

YAHOO! NEWS Home - Yahoo! - My Yahoo! - News Alerts - Help AP Associa Press

A Sneak Peek at the Season's Best Books

Click here to visit www.getsmart.com

Home | Top Stories | Business | Tech | Politics | World | Local | Entertainment | Sports | Science | Health

Top Stories Headlines

Monday October 15 4:14 PM ET

Bush. Admin. Presents Insurance Plan

By MARCY GORDON, AP Business Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Bush administration offered up a plan Monday to help insurance companies withstand a future terrorism shock while keeping the government out of the insurance business.

The proposal would split between the government and the insurance industry the costs property claims from future terror attacks. Taxpayers would pick up 80 percent of the first $20 billion in costs next year and insurers the rest. The government's share of costs would decrease gradually through 2004 and end after that, senior administration officials told reporters, speaking on condition of anonymity.

U.S. insurance companies that write policies protecting property could face payments of $30 billion to $50 billion for the Sept. 11 attacks in New York and northern Virginia, the biggest insured loss ever. Major reinsurance companies, which assume part of the risk covered by insurance firms, have said they won't renew terrorism coverage after Dec. 31, when many contracts expire and must be renewed.

The administration's plan is being presented as an alternative to legislation drafted by lawmakers and supported by the insurance industry, which would create a government-backed insurance industry pool to cover future terrorism losses. The industry-supported measure is modeled after a government-guaranteed insurance pool, funded by the industry, established in Britain in response to attacks by the Irish Republican Army. If insurance losses were to exceed the amount in the pool, the government would cover the difference.

That proposal is too complex and would put the government in the position of directly regulating the insurance industry and possibly rates charged for coverage, administration officials said. American insurance companies are regulated by the states in which they do business, without federal intervention.

Gretchen Schaefer, a spokeswoman for the American Insurance Association, said the trade group is eager to see details of the White House proposal and would not comment on it beforehand.

Rep. Michael Oxley, R-Ohio, chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, likewise had no immediate comment, his spokeswoman, Peggy Peterson, said.

REV_00261193

A spokesman for Sen. Paul Sarbanes, D-Md., head of the Senate Banking Committee, didn't immediately return a telephone call seeking comment.

The administration plan would put a $100 billion cap on the Treasury's liability for terror claims. If losses were higher, the Treasury secretary would ask Congress for guidance.

Under the White House proposal, the insurance industry's maximum costs would be $12 billion next year, $23 billion in 2003 and $36 billion in 2004.

Also:

-Next year, the government would pay 90 percent of claims exceeding $20 billion.

-In 2003, taxpayers would pick up all the first $10 billion in costs. An amount over $10 billion but equal to or less than $20 billion would be split evenly between the government and the industry. The government would pay 90 percent of costs over $20 billion.

-In 2004, the industry would cover all the first $20 billion. An amount over $20 billion but equal to or less than $40 billion would be evenly split, while the government would pay 90 percent of costs exceeding $40 billion.

-

On the Net: American Insurance Association: http://www.aiadc.org

Treasury Department: http://www.ustreas.gov

Email this story - (View most popular) | Formatted version

Earlier Stories

Bush Admin. Readying Insurance Plan (October 13)

Search Advanced

Search: Stories Photos Full Coverage

Home | Top Stories | Business | Tech | Politics | World | Local | Entertainment | Sports | Science | Health

---

Questions or Comments

Copyright © 2001 The Associated Press. All rights reserved.

The information contained in the AP News report may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed without the prior written authority of The Associated Press.

REV_00261194

U.S. CHAMBER INSTITUTE FOR LEGAL REFORM
1615 H STREET, NW
WASHINGTON, DC 20062
VOICE: (202) 463-5724
FAX: (202) 463-5302

FACSIMILE TRANSMISSION COVER LETTER

To:	Brett Cavanaugh	From:	Matt Webb
Fax:	(202) 456-1647	Pages:	5 (including cover)
Phone:		Date:	October 10, 2001
Re:	Article & Editorial on Sep. 11th Litigation	CC:

☐ Urgent X For Review ☐ Please Comment ☐ Please Reply ☐ Please Recycle

● Comments:

Brett –

Attached please find a copy of an article that ran in today's NY Times discussing the split in ATLA over whether to sue or not about the September 11th attacks as well as an editorial from today's Wall Street Journal on the same subject.

THE INFORMATION IN THIS FACSIMILE IS INTENDED ONLY FOR THE USE OF THE INDIVIDUAL TO WHOM IT IS ADDRESSED AND MAY CONTAIN INFORMATION THAT IS PRIVILEGED AND CONFIDENTIAL. IF THE READER OF THIS MESSAGE IS NOT THE INTENDED RECIPIENT, YOU ARE HEREBY NOTIFIED THAT ANY DISSEMINATION, DISTRIBUTION OR COPYING OF THIS COMMUNICATION IS STRICTLY PROHIBITED. IF YOU HAVE RECEIVED THIS FACSIMILE IN ERROR, PLEASE NOTIFY THE ABOVE REFERENCED SENDER IMMEDIATELY AT (202) 463-5724.

DRAFT – OCTOBER 9, 2001

107TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

H.R. _____

To ensure swift and fair compensation for the victims of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, to ensure that the terrorists and other culpable parties will be held legally liable for their actions, to prevent further economic harm to innocent bystanders to these events, and for other purposes.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

A BILL

To ensure swift and fair compensation for the victims of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, to ensure that the terrorists and other culpable parties will be held legally liable for their actions, to prevent further economic harm to innocent bystanders to these events, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE

(a) SHORT TITLE. – This Act may be cited as the "September 11, 2001 Victim Compensation Act".

(b) REFERENCE. – Whenever in this Act, reference is made to a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section of the Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act (P.L. 107-42).

contingency fees in connection with the assertion of a claim under this section that exceed:

(1) the amount of costs and reasonable expert witness fees incurred in prosecuting the claim; and

(2) a reasonable attorney fee.

In this subsection, a reasonable attorney fee shall be a fee based on the actual time spent and the reasonable expenses of an attorney incurred in providing legal services in connection with the prosecution of a claim under this section."

SECTION 10. SMALL BUSINESS RELIEF

(a) IN GENERAL. – There is hereby authorized to be appropriated $500,000,000 to the Small Business Administration to establish a September 11th Small Business Relief Fund. The purpose of the fund is to provide direct relief to small businesses, as defined in 15 U.S.C. § 632(a)(1), that have been directly affected by the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001.

(b) Within 30 days of the date when this Act shall take effect, the Administrator shall publish eligibility guidelines consistent with this Act and the procedures under which the relief fund shall be administered. In establishing eligibility requirements and administrative procedures, the Administrator shall give priority to businesses located in close proximity of the site of the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001.

(c) The Administrator shall begin accepting applications for the relief fund immediately upon publication of the eligibility guidelines and administrative procedures. /Not later than 21 days after the date on which an application is filed, the Administrator shall complete a review, make a determination and provide written notice to the applicant with respect to the application Such a determination shall be final and not subject to judicial review.

REV_00261205

SECTION 11. FEDERAL CAUSE OF ACTION FOR DAMAGES RELATED TO FURTHER ACTS OF TERRORISM.

(a) DEFINITIONS. -- In this section, the following definitions apply:

(1) ACT OF TERRORISM. – The term "act of terrorism" means activity that –

(A) involves a violent act or an act dangerous to human life that is in violation of the criminal laws of the United States or of any state, or that would be a criminal violation if committed within the jurisdiction of the United States or of any State; and

(B) appears to be intended –

(i) to intimidate or coerce a civilian population;

(ii) to influence the policy of a government by intimidation or coercion; or

(iii) to affect the conduct of a government by assassination or kidnapping.

(2) COLLATERAL SOURCE. – The term "collateral source" means all collateral sources, including life insurance, pension funds, death benefit programs, and payments by Federal, State, or local governments related to acts of terrorism.

REV_00261206

(3) ECONOMIC LOSS. – The term "economic loss" means any pecuniary loss resulting from harm (including the loss of earnings or other benefits related to employment, medical expense loss, replacement services loss, loss due to death, burial costs, and loss of business or employment opportunities) to the extent recovery for such loss is allowed under applicable state law.

(4) NONECONOMIC LOSS. – The term "noneconomic loss" means losses for physical and emotional pain, suffering, inconvenience, physical impairment, mental anguish, disfigurement, loss of enjoyment of life, loss of society and companionship, loss of consortium (other than loss of domestic service), hedonic damages, injury to reputation, and all other nonpecuniary losses of any kind or nature.

(5) PROPERTY DAMAGE. – The term "property damage" means physical injury to or destruction of tangible or intangible property, or loss of tangible or intangible property that has not been physically injured or destroyed but has been evacuated, withdrawn from use or rendered inaccessible as a direct result of an act of terrorism.

(b) EXCLUSIVE FEDERAL CAUSE OF ACTION FOR DAMAGES. – There shall exist a Federal cause of action for damages arising out of, resulting from or related to any act of terrorism occurring on or after September 12, 2001. Notwithstanding section 40120(c) of title 49, United States Code, this cause of action shall be the exclusive remedy for damages arising out of, resulting from or relating to acts of terrorism occurring on or after September 12, 2001.

REV_00261207

(c) COGNIZABLE CLAIMS. – This cause of action shall be limited to –

(1) claims for breach of contract;

(2) claims for negligence or gross negligence to the extent that such claims seek relief for physical injury or death;

(3) claims for negligence or gross negligence to the extent that such claims seek relief for property damage; and

(4) claims for fraud to the extent that such claims are based on allegations of intentional affirmative misrepresentations.

(d) JURISDICTION. – The United States district courts shall have exclusive and original jurisdiction over all actions brought for any claim (including any claim for loss of property, personal injury, or death) arising out of, resulting from or relating to an act of terrorism committed on or after November 12, 2001. The judicial panel on multidistrict litigation, established by section 1407 of title 28, United States Code, shall transfer all claims arising out of, resulting from or relating to a particular act of terrorism to a single district court for both pretrial purposes and trial.

(e) SUBSTANTIVE LAW. – The substantive law for decision in any such suit shall be as follows:

(1) For a breach of contract claim or a fraud claim, the substantive law for decision shall be derived in accordance with the choice of law principles of the State of the district court designated by the multidistrict litigation panel pursuant to subsection (d).

REV_00261208

(2) For a negligence or gross negligence claim, the substantive law for decision shall be derived exclusively from the law of negligence of the State in which the act of terrorism occurred, unless such law is inconsistent with or preempted by Federal law.

(f) REMEDIES. –

(1) The remedies for breach of contract claims or fraud claims shall be governed by applicable state law.

(2) The remedies for negligence claims or gross negligence claims shall be as follows:

(A) Any individual or entity asserting negligence or gross negligence claims for physical injury or death shall be entitled to seek only economic and noneconomic losses.

(B) The liability of each defendant for economic losses resulting from gross negligence shall be joint and several among defendants.

(C) The liability of each defendant for economic losses resulting from negligence or intentional fraud shall be several only and shall not be joint. Each defendant shall be liable only for the amount of economic losses allocated to the defendant in direct proportion to the percentage of responsibility of the defendant for the harm to the claimant.

(D) The liability of each defendant for noneconomic losses resulting from negligence claims or gross negligence claims shall be several only and shall not be joint. Each defendant shall be liable only for the amount of noneconomic losses allocated to the defendant in direct proportion to the percentage of responsibility of the defendant for the harm to the claimant.

(E) Any individual or entity asserting negligence or gross negligence claims for property damage shall be entitled to seek only the replacement cost of such property.

(F) The liability of each defendant for property damage losses shall be several only and shall not be joint. Each defendant shall be liable only for the amount of property damage losses allocated to the defendant in direct proportion to the percentage of responsibility of the defendant for the harm to the claimant.

(G) Neither punitive damages nor any other form of relief not specified in this subsection shall be recoverable under this cause of action.

(H) Any judgment awarded to an individual or entity under this subsection shall not include interest prior to judgment.

(I) Any judgment awarded to an individual or entity under this subsection shall be reduced by the amount of collateral source compensation the individual or entity has received or is entitled to receive as a result of an act of terrorism.

(g) REASONABLE ATTORNEY FEES. – In no event shall any attorney charge, demand, receive or collect contingency fees in connection with the assertion of a claim under this section that exceed:

(1) the amount of costs and reasonable expert witness fees incurred in prosecuting the claim; and

(2) a reasonable attorney fee.

In this subsection, a reasonable attorney fee shall be a fee based on the actual time spent and the reasonable expenses of an attorney incurred in providing legal services in connection with the prosecution of a claim under this section.

(h) LIMITATIONS PERIOD. – A negligence claim or a gross negligence claim under this section must be commenced within one year. This period shall be computed from the date of discovery of the injury by the plaintiff or from the date when through the exercise of reasonable diligence such injury should have been discovered by the plaintiff, whichever is earlier, if the physical injury or property damage was caused by latent effects of exposure to any substance or combination of substances, in any form, upon or within the body or upon or within the property.

(i) EXCLUSION FOR RECOVERY AGAINST TERRORISTS. – Nothing in this section shall in any way limit the ability of any individual or entity to seek any form of recovery from any person, entity or government alleged to be a knowing participant in any act of terrorism, or to limit the liability of such a person.

SECTION 12. EFFECTIVE DATE.

This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act, and shall apply to any claim (or cause of action) resulting from or relating to the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 or any act of terrorism occurring on or after September 12, 2001.

Tuesday, October 09, 2001 (5:00 pm)

REV_00261212

SECTION 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

(a) FINDINGS. – The Congress finds as follows:

(1) In the wake of the tragic terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, we as a Nation must give the highest priority to providing full, fair and swift compensation to those individuals, family members, and businesses most seriously harmed.

(2) Virtually every individual and business in the country suffered as a result of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 – many citizens were put out of work, countless businesses were closed or otherwise disrupted, and the lives of all Americans were disrupted in countless ways.

(3) At a time when national unity should be our paramount concern, it is important to minimize court battles amongst our citizens related to the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, and to minimize the damage that these attacks have wrought on our nation's economy.

(4) Although numerous programs are being implemented by the Federal Emergency Management Administration, the Small Business Administration and various state and local agencies to assist small businesses that were affected by the terrorist attacks, Congress recognizes that additional help is necessary for those small businesses that were directly and most severely affected by the terrorist attacks and their aftermath.

REV_00261197

(b) PURPOSES – The purposes of this Act are:

(1) To ensure swift, full and fair compensation for those who suffered personal injury, death, or property damage as a result of the terrorist attacks.

(2) To ensure that our civil justice system does not punish Americans for the evil acts of terrorists or further their goal of crippling the U.S. economy.

(3) To assist all victims of the terrorist attacks in their efforts to seek recovery from anyone who knowingly participated in a conspiracy to perpetrate the attacks.

(4) To assist small businesses that were most directly and severely affected by the terrorist attacks.

SECTION 3. REGISTRATION AND RECORDATION OF AIRCRAFT

Section 201 is amended by inserting the following at the end:

"(f) LIMITATION ON LIABILITY. – Section 44112(b) of such title is amended by inserting at the beginning "Notwithstanding any federal or state statute, regulation, or judicial interpretation to the contrary,".

SECTION 4. DEFINITIONS

Section 402 is amended –

(a) By redesignating subsection (8) as subsection (9); and

(b) By inserting after subsection (7) the following:

"(8) PROPERTY DAMAGE. – The term "property damage" means physical injury to or destruction of tangible or intangible property, or loss of tangible or intangible property that has not been physically injured or destroyed but has been evacuated, withdrawn from use or rendered inaccessible as a direct result of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001.

SECTION 5. PURPOSE

Section 403 is amended by inserting the following after "2001":

"and to provide for a fair, orderly and expeditious process for the resolution of all claims arising out of those crashes".

SECTION 6. LIMITATION ON CIVIL ACTION

Section 405(c)(3)(B)(i) is amended by striking "Federal or State".

SECTION 7. FEDERAL CAUSE OF ACTION FOR DAMAGES

(a) Section 408 is amended –

(1) by striking "(a) IN GENERAL. –".

(2) by redesignating the heading of subsection (b) as "SEC. 409. – FEDERAL CAUSE OF ACTION FOR DAMAGES".

(3) by striking subsection (c).

(4) by redesignating paragraphs (1) and (2) as subsections (a) and (c) respectively, and by striking paragraph (3).

(5) by amending the redesignated subsection (a) by inserting "resulting from or relating to" directly after "arising out of" in each place it appears.

(6) by inserting the following after the redesignated subsection (a):

"(b) COGNIZABLE CLAIMS. – This cause of action shall be limited to –

(1) claims for breach of contract;

(2) claims for negligence or gross negligence to the extent that such claims seek relief for physical injury or death;

(3) claims for negligence or gross negligence to the extent that such claims seek relief for property damage; and

(4) claims for fraud to the extent that such claims are based on allegations of intentional affirmative misrepresentations.".

(7) by amending the redesignated subsection (c) to read as follows:

"(c) SUBSTANTIVE LAW. – The substantive law for decision in any such suit shall be as follows:

(1) For a breach of contract claim or a fraud claim, the substantive law for decision shall be derived in accordance with the choice of law principles of the State of New York.

(2) For a negligence or gross negligence claim, the substantive law for decision shall be derived exclusively from the law of negligence of the State in which the crash occurred, unless such law is inconsistent with or preempted by Federal law.".

(8) by inserting after the redesignated subsection (c) the following:

"(d) REMEDIES. –

(1) The remedies for breach of contract claims or fraud claims shall be governed by applicable state law.

(2) The remedies for negligence claims or gross negligence claims shall be as follows:

(A) Any individual or entity asserting negligence or gross negligence claims for physical injury or death shall be entitled to seek only economic and noneconomic losses (as defined in Section 402).

(B) The liability of each defendant for economic losses resulting from gross negligence shall be joint and several among the defendants responsible for such gross negligence.

(C) The liability of each defendant for economic losses resulting from negligence or intentional fraud shall be several only and shall not be joint. Each defendant shall be liable only for the amount of economic losses allocated to the defendant in direct proportion to the percentage of responsibility of the defendant for the harm to the claimant.

(D) The liability of each defendant for noneconomic losses resulting from negligence claims or gross negligence claims shall be several only and shall not be joint. Each defendant shall be liable only for the amount of noneconomic losses allocated to the defendant in direct proportion to the percentage of responsibility of the defendant for the harm to the claimant.

(E) Any individual or entity asserting negligence or gross negligence claims for property damage (as defined in Section 402) shall be entitled to seek only the replacement cost of such property.

(F) The liability of each defendant for property damage losses shall be several only and shall not be joint. Each defendant shall be liable only for the amount of property damage losses allocated to the defendant in direct proportion to the percentage of responsibility of the defendant for the harm to the claimant.

(G) Neither punitive damages nor any other form of relief not specified in this subsection shall be recoverable under this cause of action.

(H) Any judgment awarded to an individual or entity under this subsection shall not include interest prior to judgment.

(I) Any judgment awarded to an individual or entity under this subsection shall be reduced by the amount of collateral source compensation the individual or entity has received or is entitled to receive as a result of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001.

"(e) REPORT TO CONGRESS. – Within eighteen months after the enactment of the "September 11, 2001 Victim Compensation Act," the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York shall provide Congress with a report describing the number and nature of the claims brought under this section and the aggregate amount of compensation being sought by all claimants. On the basis of that report, Congress shall promptly take whatever action is determined to be necessary (including approval of appropriate compensation plans and appropriation of funds) to ensure that individuals and entities receive full compensation for legitimate claims and to ensure that the liability regarding such claims is not borne primarily by persons not involved in the perpetration of terrorist attacks. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated sufficient funds for the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York to create this report.

"(f) LIMITATIONS PERIOD. – A negligence claim or a gross negligence claim under this section must be commenced within one year. This period shall be computed from the date of discovery of the injury by the plaintiff or from the date when through the exercise of reasonable diligence such injury should have been discovered by the plaintiff, whichever is earlier, if the physical injury or property damage was caused by latent effects of exposure to any substance or combination of substances, in any form, upon or within the body or upon or within the property.

"(g) EXCLUSION FOR RECOVERY AGAINST TERRORISTS. – Nothing in this section shall in any way limit the ability of any individual or entity to seek any form of recovery from any person, entity or government alleged to be a knowing participant in any conspiracy to hijack any aircraft or commit any terrorist act, or to limit the liability of such a person".

(b) Section 409 is amended by redesignating the section as Section 410.

SECTION 8. JURISDICTION

The Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act (P.L. 107-42) is amended by inserting the following new Section after Section 410:

"SEC. 411. ORIGINAL AND EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION FOR ALL CIVIL ACTIONS.

"The United States District Court for the Southern District of New York shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction over all actions brought for any claim (including any claim for loss of property, personal injury, or death) arising out of, resulting from or relating to the terrorist-related aircraft crashes of September 11, 2001. For purposes of personal jurisdiction, the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York shall be deemed to sit in all judicial districts in the United States."

SECTION 9. REASONABLE ATTORNEY'S FEES

The Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act (P.L. 107-42) is amended by inserting the following new Section after Section 411:

"SEC. 412. REASONABLE ATTORNEY'S FEES.

(a) REASONABLE ATTORNEY FEES. – In no event shall any attorney charge, demand, receive or collect

U.S. CHAMBER INSTITUTE FOR LEGAL REFORM
1615 H STREET, NW
WASHINGTON, DC 20062
VOICE: (202) 463-5724
FAX: (202) 463-5302

FACSIMILE TRANSMISSION COVER LETTER

To:	Brett Cavanaugh	From:	Jim Wootton
Fax:	(202) 456-1647	Pages:	14 (including cover)
Phone:		Date:	October 4, 2001
Re:	Airline Liability Bill Expansion	CC:

☐ Urgent X For Review ☐ Please Comment ☐ Please Reply ☐ Please Recycle

- Comments:

Brett –

Attached is a draft copy of the revised airline liability bill that would provide additional liability protections to the other elements of the business community. We have also attached a summary of the draft. This is very much a work in progress and the coalition we have put together has not signed-off on this yet (we are meeting tomorrow afternoon). Just wanted you to see the direction in which we are heading.

THE INFORMATION IN THIS FACSIMILE IS INTENDED ONLY FOR THE USE OF THE INDIVIDUAL TO WHOM IT IS ADDRESSED AND MAY CONTAIN INFORMATION THAT IS PRIVILEGED AND CONFIDENTIAL. IF THE READER OF THIS MESSAGE IS NOT THE INTENDED RECIPIENT, YOU ARE HEREBY NOTIFIED THAT ANY DISSEMINATION, DISTRIBUTION OR COPYING OF THIS COMMUNICATION IS STRICTLY PROHIBITED. IF YOU HAVE RECEIVED THIS FACSIMILE IN ERROR, PLEASE NOTIFY THE ABOVE REFERENCED SENDER IMMEDIATELY AT (202) 463-5724.

DRAFT 10/4/2001

107TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

H.R. _____

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

A BILL

To ensure swift and fair compensation for the victims of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, to hold the terrorists legally liable for their actions, to prevent further economic harm to innocent bystanders to these events, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE

(a) SHORT TITLE. – This Act may be cited as the "September 11, 2001 Victim Compensation Act".

(b) REFERENCE. – Whenever in this Act, reference is made to a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section of the Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act (P.L. 107-42).

SECTION 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

(a) FINDINGS. – The Congress finds as follows:

(1) In the wake of the tragic terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, we as a Nation must give the highest priority to providing full, fair and swift compensation to those individuals, family members, and businesses who were most seriously harmed.

(2) Virtually every individual and business in the country suffered as a result of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 – many citizens were put out of work, countless businesses were closed or otherwise disrupted, and the lives of all Americans were disrupted in countless ways.

(3) At a time when national unity should be our paramount concern, it is important to minimize court battles amongst our citizens related to the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, and to minimize the damage that these attacks have wrought on our nation's economy.

(4) Although numerous programs are being implemented by the Federal Emergency Management Administration, the Small Business Administration and various state and local agencies to assist small businesses that were affected by the terrorist attacks, Congress recognizes that additional help is necessary for those small businesses that were directly and most severely affected by the terrorist attacks and their aftermath.

(b) PURPOSES – The purposes of this Act are:

(1) To ensure swift, full and fair compensation for those who suffered personal injury, death, or property damage as a result of the terrorist attacks.

(2) To ensure that our civil justice system does not punish Americans for the evil acts of terrorists or further their goal of crippling the U.S. economy.

(3) To assist all victims of the terrorist attacks in their efforts to seek recovery from anyone who knowingly participated in a conspiracy to perpetrate the attacks.

(4) To preserve the ability of all insured individuals and entities to recover under their insurance policies for business interruption and other damages they may have sustained as a result of the attacks.

(5) To assist small businesses that were most directly and severely affected by the terrorist attacks.

SECTION 3. REGISTRATION AND RECORDATION OF AIRCRAFT

Section 201 is amended by inserting the following at the end:

"(f) LIMITATION ON LIABILITY. – Section 44112(b) of such title is amended by inserting at the beginning "Notwithstanding any federal or state statute, regulation, or judicial interpretation to the contrary,".

SECTION 4. DEFINITIONS

Section 402 is amended –

(a) By redesignating subsection (8) as subsection (9); and

(b) By inserting after subsection (7) the following:

"(8) PROPERTY DAMAGE. – The term "property damage" means physical injury to or destruction of tangible or intangible property, or loss of tangible or intangible property that has not been physically injured or destroyed but has been evacuated, withdrawn from use or rendered inaccessible as a direct result of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001".

REV_00261216

SECTION 5. PURPOSE

Section 403 is amended by inserting the following after "2001":

"and to provide for a fair, orderly and expeditious process for the resolution of all claims arising out of those crashes".

SECTION 6. LIMITATION ON CIVIL ACTION

Section 405(c)(3)(B)(i) is amended by striking "Federal or State".

SECTION 7. FEDERAL CAUSE OF ACTION FOR DAMAGES

(a) Section 408 is amended –

(1) by striking "(a)" and "IN GENERAL".

(2) by redesignating the heading of subsection (b) as "Sec. 409. – FEDERAL CAUSE OF ACTION FOR DAMAGES".

(3) by redesignating paragraphs (1), (2) and (3) as subsections (a), (b) and (c) respectively.

(4) by redesignating subsection (c) as subsection "(b)".

(b) The new Section 409 is amended –

(1) by striking subsection (2) and inserting the following:

"(2) SUBSTANTIVE LAW. – The substantive law for decision in any such suit shall be as follows:

(A) For a breach of contract claim, the substantive law for decision shall be derived in accordance with the choice of law principles of the State of New York.

(B) For a negligence claim, the substantive law for decision shall be derived exclusively from the law of negligence of the State in which the crash occurred, unless such law is inconsistent with or preempted by Federal law"; and

(2) by striking subsection (3) and redesignating subsection (2) as subsection (3);

(3) by inserting after subsection (1) the following:

"(2) COGNIZABLE CLAIMS. – This cause of action shall be limited to –

(A) claims for breach of contract;

(B) claims for negligence alleging physical injury or death; and

(C) claims for negligence alleging property damage.

(4) by inserting after subsection (3) the following:

"(4) REMEDIES. –

(A) The remedies for breach of contract claims shall be governed by applicable state law.

(B) The remedies for negligence claims shall be as follows:

(i) Any individual or entity asserting negligence claims for physical injury or death shall be entitled to seek only economic and noneconomic losses (as defined in Section 402).

(ii) The liability of each defendant for economic losses shall be joint and several among defendants.

(iii) The liability of each defendant for noneconomic losses shall be several only and shall not be joint. Each defendant shall be liable only for the amount of noneconomic losses allocated to the defendant in direct proportion to the percentage of responsibility of the defendant for the harm to the claimant.

(iv) Any individual or entity asserting negligence claims for property damage (as defined in Section 402) shall be entitled to seek only the replacement cost of such property.

(v) The liability of each defendant for property damage losses shall be several only and shall not be joint. Each defendant shall be liable only for the amount of property damage losses allocated to the defendant in direct proportion to the percentage of responsibility of the defendant for the harm to the claimant.

(vi) Neither punitive damages nor any other form of relief not specified in this subsection shall be recoverable under this cause of action.

(vii) Any judgment awarded to an individual or entity under this subsection shall not include interest prior to judgment.

(viii) Any judgment awarded to an individual or entity under this subsection shall be reduced by the amount of collateral source compensation the individual or entity has received or is entitled to receive as a result of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001.

(5) REASONABLE ATTORNEYS' FEES. – In no event shall any attorney charge, demand, receive or collect contingency fees in connection with the assertion of a claim under this section that exceed:

(A) the amount of costs and reasonable expert witness fees incurred in prosecuting the claim; and

(B) a reasonable attorney's fee.

In this subsection, a reasonable attorney's fee shall be a fee based on the actual time spent and the reasonable expenses of an attorney incurred in providing legal services in connection with the prosecution of a claim under this section.

(6) REPORT TO CONGRESS. – Within eighteen months after the enactment of the "September 11, 2001 Victim Compensation Act," the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York shall provide Congress with a report describing the number and nature of the claims brought under this section and the aggregate amount of compensation being sought by all claimants. On the basis of that report, Congress shall promptly take whatever action is determined to be necessary (including approval of appropriate compensation plans and appropriation of funds) to ensure that individuals and entities receive full compensation for legitimate claims and to ensure that the liability regarding such claims is not borne primarily by persons not involved in the perpetration of terrorist attacks.

(7) LIMITATIONS PERIOD. – No claim for negligence may be filed under this section after the date that is one year after the date of enactment of the "September 11, 2001 Victim Compensation Act".

(5) by striking subsection (b) and inserting the following:

"(b) EXCLUSION FOR RECOVERY AGAINST TERRORISTS. – Nothing in this section shall in any way limit the ability of any individual or entity to seek any form of recovery from any person alleged to be a knowing participant in any conspiracy to hijack any aircraft or commit any terrorist act, or to limit the liability of such a person".

(c) Section 409 is amended by redesignating it as Section 410.

SECTION 8. JURISDICTION

(a) Title IV is amended by inserting the following at the end of Section 410:

"Sec. 411. ORIGINAL AND EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION FOR ALL CIVIL ACTIONS.

The United States District Court for the Southern District of New York shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction over all actions brought for any claim (including any claim for loss of property, personal injury, or death) resulting from or relating to the terrorist-related aircraft crashes of September 11, 2001. For purposes of personal jurisdiction, the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York shall be deemed to sit in all judicial districts in the United States".

SECTION 9. SMALL BUSINESS RELIEF

(a) IN GENERAL. – There is hereby authorized to be appropriated $500,000,000 to the Small Business Administration to establish a September 11th Small Business Relief Fund. The purpose of the fund is to provide direct relief to small businesses, as defined in 15 U.S.C. § 632(a)(1), that have been directly affected by the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001.

(1) Within 30 days of the date when this Act shall take effect, the Administrator shall publish eligibility guidelines consistent with this Act and the procedures under which the relief fund shall be administered.

(2) In establishing eligibility requirements and administrative procedures, the Administrator shall give priority to businesses located in close proximity of the site of the terrorist attacks which occurred on September 11, 2001.

(3) The Administrator shall begin accepting applications for the relief fund immediately upon publication of the eligibility guidelines and administrative procedures.

(4) Not later than 21 days after the date on which an application is filed, the Administrator shall complete a review, make a determination and provide written notice to the applicant with respect to the application Such a determination shall be final and not subject to judicial review.

SECTION 10. EFFECTIVE DATE.

(a) EFFECTIVE DATE. – This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act, and shall apply to any claim (or cause of action) resulting from or relating to the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001.

Thursday, October 04, 2001 (5:45 pm)

REV_00261222

Summary Of "September 11, 2001 Victim Compensation Act"

The recently enacted Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act (the "ATSSSA") was a first step toward addressing the economic ramifications of the September 11 tragedy, focusing primarily on the airline industry. The proposed September 11, 2001 Victim Compensation Act (the "Victim Compensation Act") would complete that effort by amending the ATSSSA to add provisions that would ensure swift and fair compensation for the victims of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 and prevent further economic injury to innocent bystanders to those events.

I. Principal Provisions

The ATSSSA established a federally funded September 11th Victim Compensation Fund (the "Victim Fund") from which persons physically injured or killed in the events in New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia (or their representatives) may obtain compensation. Persons who seek compensation from the Victim Fund waive their right to pursue claims through litigation. However, persons eligible to make claims to the Victim Fund are free to pursue their claims through traditional litigation. Further, any person who sustained personal or economic injuries resulting from the September 11th events (i.e., claims not presently compensable by the Victim Fund) also is free to litigate.

The proposed Victim Compensation Act would set ground rules for the tidal wave of litigation that is now likely to ensue. Thousands of injured parties should be expected to sue hundreds of non-terrorist defendants (e.g., airlines, aircraft manufacturers, aircraft component manufacturers, airport authorities, security companies, building owners, building managers, architects, building contractors, building components manufacturers and suppliers, employers). The guiding principles of the Act are (a) to ensure an orderly, equitable process for providing swift compensation for persons who present legitimate claims and (b) to protect innocent bystanders from being further victimized by the specter of misguided or excessive claims.

The bill would not restrict or otherwise affect the type and scope of claims that may be asserted against the September 11 terrorists or any person or entity that aided or abetted their activity. However, the bill would:

- Confirm the intent of the ATSSSA that all court claims arising out of the events of September 11 must be filed in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York.

- Confirm that the sole cause of action by which a person may seek compensation from non-terrorists for injuries/damages sustained in the September 11 attacks is the new federal cause of action established by the ATSSSA.

- Establish that under the new federal cause of action for asserting claims against non-terrorists, a claimant may sue for breach of contract (with the substantive law derived from the jurisdiction designated by the choice of law principles normally applied by the New York court) or for negligence (applying the same elements and other governing substantive law as a negligence claim under the law of the jurisdiction where the relevant aircrash occurred (either New York, Pennsylvania, or Virginia)). (Thus, other causes of action (e.g., fraud-based claims) would not be available.)

- Establish that this new federal cause of action will be available only to persons who allegedly have sustained personal injury (including death) or property damage. (Thus, for example, the cause of action would not be available to persons who arguably have claims only for lost profits (without any property damage) or emotional distress (unaccompanied by physical injury).)

- Establish that as to remedies from non-terrorists, persons who assert personal injury/death claims may obtain through litigation the same remedies as are available from the ATSSSA-created Victim Fund. As to such claims, the liability of each defendant for economic losses would be joint and several, but as to noneconomic losses, each defendant shall be liable only in direct proportion to its responsibility for the alleged harm. Persons who assert property damage claims may recover the replacement cost of such loss. As to such claims, the liability of each defendant shall also be proportional.

- Preclude the award of any punitive damages against non-terrorists.

- Limit any attorney contingency fees to lodestar fees, costs, reasonable expert witness fees, and reasonable expenses.

- Require that all negligence claims against non-terrorists be filed within one year; breach of contract claims would be governed by normal rules.

- Require that within 18 months, the court handling the claims shall report to Congress on the number and nature of the claims and the total amount of the claims asserted to that point.

- Declare that upon receiving the court's report regarding the claims filed, Congress "will take whatever action is determined to be necessary (including approval of appropriate compensation plans and appropriation of funds) to ensure that individuals and entities receive full compensation for legitimate claims and to ensure that the liability regarding such claims is not borne primarily by persons not involved in the perpetration of terrorist attacks."

- Provide a $500 million appropriation to the Small Business Administration to establish a September 11th Small Business Relief Fund to provide immediate relief to small businesses that have been directly affected by the terrorist attacks.

II. Rationale

The core dual rationale for the legislation is (a) to ensure that parties injured by the events of September 11 may obtain swift and fair compensation and (b) also to ensure that such compensation burdens are not visited primarily on parties that played no role in the primary causative act – the terrorists' hijacking and crashing of four commercial aircraft. The bill achieves those fundamental purposes in several ways:

REV_00261224

- First, the bill will establish a process by which litigation claims will be filed and by which the court will report to Congress the nature and aggregate amount of such claims. In the bill, Congress will commit to take the necessary steps (including appropriations) to ensure that legitimate claims will be reasonably compensated without placing that burden on persons and entities not involved in the terrorist activity that was the primary cause of the injurious events on September 11. Hopefully, any necessary federal appropriations can be financed from assets seized essentially as war reparations from the terrorists and any governments or other entities that in any way aided and abetted their heinous acts.

- Second, every American family and business was affected by the September 11th attacks – Americans nationwide were glued to their television sets, mourning for the victims and worrying about the safety of their families. People stayed home, many businesses closed, and numerous trips and conventions were cancelled. If each and every individual or business affected in any way by the terrorist attacks were allowed to bring a lawsuit to seek recovery for economic losses related to the attacks with no cap on total liability, it would delay justice for those who were most injured – and it could devastate the American economy. For that reason, the bill would focus the litigation process on the claims that are most deserving of compensation – claims for personal injury and property damage. Further, the bill would prohibit the award of punitive damages based on the view that the judicial system should not punish Americans for the acts of terrorists and thereby help the terrorists achieve their evil ends by wreaking further havoc on the U.S. economy.

- Third, the bill would simplify the litigation process by establishing two causes of actions – a breach of contract action (tracking traditional state law principles) and a negligence action (derived wholly from state negligence law of the three jurisdictions where the primary injuries occurred). The bill requires that all tort claims be filed within one year, so that the court will be able to determine rapidly the full array of defendants and tort claims that must be resolved and proceed to do so as quickly as possible. Since the Victims Fund will be open to receiving claims for two years, claimants who become disenchanted with the litigation process will still have an opportunity to seek recovery through the Victims Fund. (Breach of contract claims will be governed by normal limitations rules, since many of those claims will be insurance coverage matters that may not ripen within a shorter period.)

- Fourth, in enacting the ATSSSA, Congress intended that the Victim Fund would be the primary source of payments for personal injury and wrongful death claims. However, it is now apparent that because of the absence of any restraints on the litigation process, the incentives will push most eligible claimants toward filing litigation and away from the Victim Fund. The bill would impose some restrictions on the litigation process, a step that would make the Victim Fund more attractive.

REV_00261225

- Fifth, the bill would not affect the prosecution of any claims against the terrorists or their co-conspirators. Further, the bill would not in any way affect the ability of persons with insurance coverage – such as business interruption coverage – to file claims with their insurance carriers and to bring litigation related to those coverage claims.

- Sixth, the bill would provide $500 million in direct and expedited relief to small businesses that have been directly and severely affected by the terrorist attacks. This provision will help to mitigate the business losses of persons whose claims for purely economic losses may be limited by the bill.

10/4/01 at 5:45 pm

REV_00261226

ACT OF TERRORISM - For purposes of this Act, an "act of terrorism" means any act, certified by the Secretary of the Treasury in his sole discretion after consultation with the Secretary of State [the Secretary of Defense} and the Attorney General, as a violent act or act dangerous to human life, property or infrastructure, within the United States, that appears to be intended to intimidate or coerce the civilian population of the United States and to influence the policy or affect the conduct of the United States government by intimidation or coercion. The Secretary shall not certify any act as an act of terrorism if it is committed in the course of a war declared by the Congress of the United States. Any certification determination by the Secretary shall be final.

anguish, and loss of enjoyment of life; economic losses include medical expenses lost earnings, and other out-of-pocket expenses.

We also recommend the following policies, but believe they will be difficult to pass:

- For any civil action from a terrorist event against anyone other than the perpetrators, aiders, non-economic damages would be limited to $500,000 and available only to plaintiffs who suffered physical injury.
- For any civil action from a terrorist event against anyone other than the perpetrators, aiders, defendants would be liable only for acts of gross negligence.

Private Sector Reinsurance of Terrorism

Private insurers would be free to form reinsurance pools to diversify their risk. The federal government could also provide tax-exempt status to the assets of any new terrorism reinsurance pool. We believe that private pools could be formed under state laws, obviating the need for a federal charter.

REV_00261228

LIABILITY - 5 PRINCIPLES

(1) certification as terrorist incident by Secretary of Treasury

(2) federal cause of action - so preempt state suits

(3) consolidation of cases in single federal court - selected by Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation

(4) high standard for liability - gross negligence

(5) limitations on damages
→ punitives - NONE
→ non-economic - limits

REV_00261229

Price-Anderson Act

(42 U.S.C. 2014)

Purpose -- To encourage the development of the nuclear industry and to ensure prompt and equitable compensation in the event of a nuclear incident.

Coverage -- For licensed nuclear power plants indemnified by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC), the Act provides for three tiers of protection against third party "public liability arising from a nuclear incident" (covering "any legal liability" with certain exceptions):

(1) Private insurance: Each reactor must purchase the maximum private insurance commercially available (currently $200 million).
(2) Retrospective pooling: If damage from an incident exceeds $200 million, each of the 110 reactors is assessed a pro-rata share of the excess up to $83.9 million, capped at $10 million per year per reactor ($83.9x 110= $9.23 billion pool+ $200 million= $9.43 billion coverage cap to the industry). The NRC may in specified circumstances, on a case-by-case basis, postpone all or part of the annual deferred premium. NRC also may provide reinsurance or guarantee payment of deferred premiums if there is a shortfall. In that event, NRC must advance necessary funds based on a Congressional appropriation or (to the extent approved in appropriation Acts) by issuing obligations to the Treasury.
(3) Government commitment: If damage exceeds $9.43 billion, the Act contains a moral commitment from Congress to provide full and prompt compensation to the public, based on a plan the President submits.

[For contractors and suppliers indemnified by the Department of Energy, the Act provides full indemnification up to $9.43 billion without private insurance. In effect, the government self-insures against nuclear incidents from contractual activities conducted on its behalf.]

Basis of Liability -- Liability is based on state tort laws of the jurisdiction where the incident occurs. Since many states provide strict liability for ultrahazardous activities, it's possible that liability for a nuclear incident could be established without fault. For "extraordinary nuclear occurrences," the Act requires waiver of certain defenses so that claimants need not prove fault and defendants may not claim charitable or sovereign immunity. In limited situations, the Act supercedes state law with uniform rules such as a limitation on awarding punitive damages or the time in which claims may be brought.

Consolidated Jurisdiction -- Claims are consolidated in a single U.S. District Court where the incident occurs. This channels liability through one court to one source of funds, so there is no need to sue all potential defendants or allocate liability among multiple defendants.

International Coverage -- Damages for injuries suffered in other countries from incidents in the U.S. may be sought in U.S. courts under the Act. The Act cannot control liability exposure in other countries.

Sunset -- The Act sunsets provisions permitting coverage for potential licensees and new contracts. Congress renewed and amended the 1957 Act in 1966, 1969, 1975, and 1988.

FAIR Plans --Fair Access to Insurance Requirements
(12 U.S.C. 1749bbb)

Purpose -- To create statewide plans to make essential property insurance more readily available in urban areas following the 1968 riots by providing Federal reinsurance for property losses arising from "riots or civil disorders." The statutory authority terminated in 1985, but 29 states still run FAIR programs.

Role of FEMA -- The FEMA Director, in consultation with a public-private Advisory Board, establishes and carries out the FAIR program, the Federal reinsurance program (including a "National Insurance Development Fund"), and a Federal crime insurance program, described below. FEMA reports to Congress at least annually on its operations under the Act.

Reinsurance -- FEMA is authorized to offer reinsurance from the National Insurance Development Fund to each insurer or pool for property losses arising from "riots or civil disorders." Reinsurance is offered only on "standard lines" of property insurance, as defined.

Premiums -- Insurers pay FEMA reinsurance premiums, determined by FEMA in consultation with the Advisory Board, for deposit into the Fund. FEMA thereafter may adjust premiums after consulting with the Advisory Board and the NAIC. The Fund can borrow from the Treasury to meet its needs.

Reimbursement for Losses -- The Act requires states to pass legislation stating that they will reimburse FEMA for any reinsured losses up to 5% of the aggregate property insurance premiums earned in that state during the previous year, to the extent the losses exceed the amount FEMA received in reinsurance premiums.

Federal Crime Insurance -- FEMA is required to critically review the market availability in each state of burglary and robbery insurance at affordable rates. If there is a critical unavailability, FEMA must make it available at affordable rates through the facilities of the Federal government after consulting with state insurance authorities in estimating what rates are affordable.

Participation in State FAIR Plans -- Participation in a state FAIR plan is required for an insurer to qualify for Federal reinsurance. (Most states also require property insurers to join the FAIR program before getting a certificate of authority to do business.) Each insurer wishing to participate in a FAIR program must cooperate with the appropriate state insurance authority in establishing and carrying out the FAIR plan. Plans are approved and administered by state insurance authorities. Plans must be run in a way that makes essential property insurance more readily available in urban areas. Plans must include various requirements regarding property inspection, reporting of reasons for declining coverage or requiring changes in the property, etc. A potential insured can request coverage under the program after being denied coverage otherwise.

Pool Re (Pool Reinsurance Co. Ltd.)

Purpose -- To create an independent, mutual reinsurance company backed by the government that provides reinsurance to member companies for property loss and business interruption due to fire and explosion from "acts of terrorism" (primarily car bombs) that the insurance and reinsurance markets would not otherwise insure. Since its inception in 1993, Pool Re has covered three major losses for a total of 600 million pounds.

Participants -- Member companies are insurers (and Lloyd's syndicates) authorized to underwrite property insurance and business interruption for risks located in England, Wales and Scotland. Currently there are about 200 members, including all of the largest insurers in the U.K. commercial insurance market.

Reinsurance Coverage -- Members are required to offer reinsurance to first line insurers in excess of the retention, which is 100,000 pounds per "head of cover" per incident or 2.5 million pounds per policy per cover per incident. "Heads of cover" include: (1) buildings and completed structures, (2) other property (including contents, engineering contractors and computers), (3) business interruption, and (4) book debts (unclear how many heads of cover there actually are). Insureds have the option of buying protection beyond the 100,000 pounds of coverage, in which case the insurer cedes the additional premium to Pool Re, which assumes the risk.

Government (Retrocession) Liability -- Under the retrocession agreement, the government becomes liable to make payments to Pool Re when Pool Re's financial resources, including a [500 million] pound loan facility, have been exhausted. Members may reinsure only with Pool Re, which agrees to reinsure each member in excess of its retention. The Reinsurance (Acts of Terrorism) Act of 1993 enabled the Secretary for Trade and Industry to enter into the retrocession agreement with Pool Re subject to the consent of the Treasury. Pool Re's only retrocessionaire is the government.

Premiums -- Pool Re is funded through "market" rate premiums set by the government in exchange for the government underwriting excess exposure to the fund. Companies pay rates depending on the locations of risks in different geographic zones -- currently 150 pounds per million pounds of coverage in metropolitan areas, and 30 pounds per million of coverage in rural areas. The retrocession agreement provides that when Pool Re's funds reach one billion pounds, a retrocession premium becomes payable to the government. If Pool Re incurs an underwriting loss (an underwriting year is closed after three years), each member must pay an additional premium equivalent to 10% of the underwriting loss subject to a maximum of 10% of the premium income it paid to Pool Re for the underwriting year in question. If Pool Re makes an underwriting profit, each member is entitled to a 10% return premium.

Certification -- According to the retrocession agreement, the Secretary of State is required to provide a certificate to the effect that an "act of terrorism" has occurred for which indemnity is claimed under a reinsurance agreement.

Dispute resolution -- The agreements provide a dispute resolution procedure in addition to the usual arbitration clause.

FAIR Plans --Fair Access to Insurance Requirements
(12 U.S.C. 1749bbb)

Purpose -- To create statewide plans to make essential property insurance more readily available in urban areas following the 1968 riots by providing Federal reinsurance for property losses arising from "riots or civil disorders." The statutory authority terminated in 1985, but 29 states still run FAIR programs.

Role of FEMA -- The FEMA Director, in consultation with a public-private Advisory Board, establishes and carries out the FAIR program, the Federal reinsurance program (including a "National Insurance Development Fund"), and a Federal crime insurance program, described below. FEMA reports to Congress at least annually on its operations under the Act.

Reinsurance -- FEMA is authorized to offer reinsurance from the National Insurance Development Fund to each insurer or pool for property losses arising from "riots or civil disorders." Reinsurance is offered only on "standard lines" of property insurance, as defined.

Premiums -- Insurers pay FEMA reinsurance premiums, determined by FEMA in consultation with the Advisory Board, for deposit into the Fund. FEMA thereafter may adjust premiums after consulting with the Advisory Board and the NAIC. The Fund can borrow from the Treasury to meet its needs.

Reimbursement for Losses -- The Act requires states to pass legislation stating that they will reimburse FEMA for any reinsured losses up to 5% of the aggregate property insurance premiums earned in that state during the previous year, to the extent the losses exceed the amount FEMA received in reinsurance premiums.

Federal Crime Insurance -- FEMA is required to critically review the market availability in each state of burglary and robbery insurance at affordable rates. If there is a critical unavailability, FEMA must make it available at affordable rates through the facilities of the Federal government after consulting with state insurance authorities in estimating what rates are affordable.

Participation in State FAIR Plans -- Participation in a state FAIR plan is required for an insurer to qualify for Federal reinsurance. (Most states also require property insurers to join the FAIR program before getting a certificate of authority to do business.) Each insurer wishing to participate in a FAIR program must cooperate with the appropriate state insurance authority in establishing and carrying out the FAIR plan. Plans are approved and administered by state insurance authorities. Plans must be run in a way that makes essential property insurance more readily available in urban areas. Plans must include various requirements regarding property inspection, reporting of reasons for declining coverage or requiring changes in the property, etc. A potential insured can request coverage under the program after being denied coverage otherwise.

War Damage Corporation Act
56 Stat. 174 (1942)

Purpose -- To establish WDC as a subsidiary of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (RFC) to provide property owners in the U.S. with reasonable insurance protection against loss or damage from enemy attack or U.S. military resistance during WWII, since basic fire and extended coverages contained a war risk exclusion.

History -- WDC was established in 1941 as the War Insurance Corporation and renamed the WDC in 1942. It is a subsidiary of the RFC, which was established by Congress in 1940 to aid in the national defense program. The WDC program grew from the War Risk Insurance Act of 1914 (38 Stat. 711), which provided insurance for maritime vessels and was amended in 1917 in response to WWI. WDC's charter and all policies expired in 1947. WDC's assets were liquidated by 1949, and in 1957 its stock was transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury for cancellation after all suits against the WDC had been settled.

Coverage -- The Act directs the RFC to empower the WDC to use its funds to provide, through insurance, reinsurance or otherwise, reasonable protection against loss or damage to real or personal property resulting from enemy attack or U.S. military resistance, with such exceptions as WDC, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, may deem advisable.

RFC Funding -- The Act directs the RFC, upon the request of the Secretary of Commerce and with the President's approval, to provide funds to WDC and issue obligations sufficient to carry out the Act's purposes. The aggregate amount of funds supplied by the RTC may not exceed $1 billion.

Premiums -- WDC protection would be made available upon the payment of such premium and subject to such terms and conditions as WDC may establish with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce.

Establishment of Rates -- In view of the national interest involved, the Act required WDC to establish from time to time uniform rates for each type of property for which protection was made available. To establish a basis for such uniform rates, the Act required WDC to estimate the average risk of loss on all property of such type in the U.S.

Limitation of Protection -- Protection was available only in the U.S., its territories and possessions, and other places determined by the President to be under U.S. dominion and control, and not to property on which the Maritime Commission was authorized to provide marine war-risk insurance. WDC, with approval of the Secretary of Commerce, could suspend or restrict protection in areas in consideration of loss of control by the U.S.

Losses Sustained between Dec. 7, 1941 and the Start-Up Date -- WDC was authorized to provide compensation without requiring an insurance contract or payment of premium, adjusting the loss as if a policy were in effect.

Compensating Victims of Terrorism: The Current Framework in the United States

SUMMARY

I. INTRODUCTION 383
II. DEFINING THE "VICTIM OF TERRORISM" 384
III. STATUTORY REMEDIES 385
A. Statutory Aims 385
B. The Hostage Relief Act of 1980 387
C. The President's Commission on Hostage Compensation and the War Claims Act of 1948 389
D. The Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act 391
IV. LEGAL ACTIONS IN U.S. COURTS 393
A. Suits by U.S. Citizens—The Iranian Hostage Suits 393
B. Suits by Aliens 396
V. PRIVATE COMPENSATORY METHODS 399
VI. CONCLUSION 401

I. INTRODUCTION

> The political and psychological potential of hostage-taking as a symbolic act of power is of the greatest magnitude. No social organization sharing in the power structure of any society is immune. The fear inspired by the possible use of hostages by very small groups to exert pressure on very large groups within the existing power structure is potentially one of the most disruptive forces in technologically advanced societies.[1]

As this passage suggests, the effects of terrorism are devastating, not only to those individuals involved in a particular terrorist incident, but to society in general. Fortunately, many nations have made progress toward dealing with terrorism's societal effects.[2] However, many individuals directly affected by terrorists—those suffering the most immediate harm—have largely been ignored in the United States and elsewhere:

> A number of other countries have had diplomats kidnapped and held hostage but inquiries by our embassies abroad revealed that none of them has any regular legislative or administrative program

1. R. CRELINSTEN & D. SZABO, HOSTAGE-TAKING ix (1979).
2. See, e.g., LEGISLATIVE RESPONSES TO TERRORISM (Y. Alexander & A. Nanes eds. 1986).

REV_00261241

and is a result of the individual's relationship with the [U.S.] Government."[63] A family member is any dependent of a captive or any other individual who is a member of the captive's family or household.[64]

The Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act is thus "permanent" in that it is not restricted to victims of any particular terrorist incident. It is limited only by the requirements that the victim be associated with the U.S. government and that the compensable incident have occurred after January 21, 1981,[65] the date of the release of the Iranian hostages.[66] The Iranian hostages are included in the Act, and specifically provided a payment of $50 per day of captivity.[67]

The nonmonetary benefits of the Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act are similar to those of the Hostage Relief Act. For example, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish interest-bearing savings funds to which captives' pay and allowances may be allotted.[68] Captives and family members are entitled to payment of medical and health care expenses arising from the terrorist incident to the extent such expenses are not covered by insurance or a government program.[69] The Act provides for the extension of portions of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act to captives,[70] thereby staying legal actions against them during the period of their captivity. Captives, their spouses, and their children are also entitled to educational benefits for a period not to exceed forty-five months.[71]

Notwithstanding these similarities, the Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act differs sharply from the Hostage Relief Act because it provides that monetary benefits be paid directly to captives or their family members. Iranian hostages receive a payment of $50 per day of captivity.[72] Other individuals taken captive after November 4, 1979, the date of the taking of the Iranian hostages,[73] will receive a payment of "not less than one-half of the amount of the worldwide average per diem rate under section 5702 of this title which was in effect for each day that individual was so held."[74] The Act further provides that compensation be paid in case of disability or death pursuant to regulations prescribed by the President.[75]

---

63. Id.
64. Id.
65. Id. § 803, (100 Stat.) 882.
66. See supra notes 24-28 and accompanying text.
67. Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act § 802, (100 Stat.) 879.
68. Id. § 803, (100 Stat.) 879-80.
69. Id. § 803, (100 Stat.) 880.
70. Id. § 803, (100 Stat.) 881.
71. Id. § 803, (100 Stat.) 881-82.
72. See supra note 67 and accompanying text.
73. See supra notes 22-23 and accompanying text.
74. Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act § 803, (100 Stat.) 880-81. Indirect victims receive no monetary award for any mental anguish they may have suffered. See id.
75. Id. § 803, (100 Stat.) 882-83.

REV_00261250

p with the [U.S.] Govern-a captive or any other indi-or household.[64]

is thus "permanent" in that rorist incident. It is limited ciated with the U.S. govern-occurred after January 21, ostages.[66] The Iranian hosovided a payment of $50 per errorism Compensation Act or example, the Secretary of t-bearing savings funds to ted.[68] Captives and family health care expenses arising penses are not covered by rovides for the extension of Act to captives,[70] thereby iod of their captivity. Capntitled to educational bene-71 s of Terrorism Compensa-Act because it provides that their family members. Ira-captivity.[72] Other individ-date of the taking of the ot less than one-half of the under section 5702 of this al was so held."[74] The Act ase of disability or death nt.[75]

Stat.) 879.

Stat.) 880-81. Indirect victims have suffered. See id.

Another significant difference between the Hostage Relief Act and the Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act is that the latter provides benefits for members of the military taken captive in a terrorist incident,[76] while the former makes no mention of them. Members of the military receive nonmonetary benefits similar to those described above. They will have their pay and allowances deposited in an interest-bearing savings fund,[77] will receive payment of medical expenses arising from the terrorist incident,[78] and will receive educational assistance.[79] Medical and educational benefits are also provided for the dependents of such captives.[80] Probably the most important benefit provided to military personnel is a monetary payment similar to that designated for other U.S. government employees.[81] Members of the military are also entitled to disability and death compensation as determined by the President.[82]

The Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act is obviously a major step in the direction of compensating victims of terrorism. It provides a permanent source of benefits, both monetary and nonmonetary, which can be immediately implemented in response to a terrorist incident. Victims will no longer have to endure a long uncompensated period, awaiting special legislation. This Act does not, however, compensate all victims or fully compensate those it does cover. Victims may thus be forced to turn to a more traditional source of obtaining compensation for injuries—the courts.

IV. LEGAL ACTIONS IN U.S. COURTS

While many victims have brought lawsuits seeking recovery for injuries sustained in terrorist incidents, these actions have for the most part been unsuccessful. The two cases described below, probably the most important in this area, illustrate the typical problems that terrorist victims will continue to face in such suits.

A. Suits by U.S. Citizens—The Iranian Hostage Suits

Perhaps the most prolific source of hostage compensation litigation has been the Iranian hostage incident.[83] The seminal case stemming from that incident is Persinger v. Islamic Republic of Iran.[84] The decision in that case

76. Id. § 806, (100 Stat.) 884-89.
77. Id. § 806, (100 Stat.) 884.
78. Id. § 806, (100 Stat.) 886-87.
79. Id. § 806, (100 Stat.) 887-88.
80. See supra notes 78-79 and accompanying text.
81. Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act § 806, (100 Stat.) 884-85. See supra note 74 and accompanying text.
82. Id. § 806, (100 Stat.) 885-86.
83. See supra notes 22-30 and accompanying text.
84. Persinger v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 729 F.2d 835 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 105 S. Ct. 247 (1984).

REV_00261251

was extremely important because it ultimately disposed of several other similar suits.[85]

Persinger involved an action for damages brought by a former Iranian hostage, U.S. Marine Sergeant Gregory Allen Persinger, and his parents, against the Islamic Republic of Iran for injuries inflicted during the seizure and detention of the American hostages at the United States Embassy in Tehran.[86] The district court dismissed the action, holding that the Executive Order implementing the Algiers Agreement[87] validly extinguished the plaintiffs' claims, first because the President has the power to " 'dispose of private claims against foreign states to resolve, or avoid, international crises,' "[88] and "in the alternative, because even in the absence of a valid executive order, Iran would be immune under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act [FSIA] from suit for tortious acts in the United States Embassy in Tehran."[89]

On appeal, the District of Columbia Circuit Court initially affirmed the district court's first basis, holding the Executive Order enforceable.[90] The United States, which had intervened as a party defendant, petitioned the circuit court for a rehearing, which was granted.[91] The court's first decision was then vacated, and a second opinion issued in which the court upheld the district court's dismissal on the alternative basis—that Iran remained immune under the FSIA.[92]

The effect of the second opinion was to make any consideration of the issue of the Executive Order's validity improper,[93] since the FSIA provides that, unless an express exception exists, "a foreign state shall be immune from the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States."[94] The only FSIA exception considered possibly applicable to Iran by the court states that immunity shall not apply in cases where damages are sought from a foreign state "for personal injury or death, or damage to or loss of property, occurring in the United States and caused by the tortious act or omission of that foreign state or any official or employee of that foreign state while acting within the scope of his office or employment."[95]

---

85. Persinger, 729 F.2d at 838 n.3.
86. See supra notes 22-30 and accompanying text.
87. See supra note 28 and accompanying text.
88. Persinger, 729 F.2d at 837, citing Persinger v. Islamic Republic of Iran, No. 81-00230, slip op. at 2 (D.D.C. Aug. 21, 1981). Cf. Dames & Moore v. Regan, 453 U.S. 654 (1981) (upholding an executive order issued as part of the effort to implement the Algiers Agreement).
89. Persinger, 729 F.2d at 837-38.
90. Persinger v. Islamic Republic of Iran, No. 81-2003 (D.C. Cir. Oct. 8, 1982), vacated, 729 F.2d at 835.
91. Persinger, 729 F.2d at 837.
92. Id.
93. Id. at 838.
94. 28 U.S.C. § 1604 (1982).
95. 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(5) (1982) (emphasis added).

REV_00261252

posed of several other simiht by a former Iranian hosersinger, and his parents, inflicted during the seizure United States Embassy in a, holding that the Execu-37 validly extinguished the the power to " 'dispose of or avoid, international cri-ie absence of a valid execu-eign Sovereign Immunities Jnited States Embassy in court initially affirmed the Order enforceable.[90] The defendant, petitioned the

The court's first decision which the court upheld the asis—that Iran remained any consideration of the since the FSIA provides gn state shall be immune States."[94] The only FSIA by the court states that are sought from a foreign or loss of property, occur-is act or omission of that oreign state while acting

Republic of Iran, No. 81-00230, . Regan, 453 U.S. 654 (1981)
rt to implement the Algiers

.C. Cir. Oct. 8, 1982), vacated,

In determining whether this exception applied to Iran, the court examined the issue of "whether Congress, in enacting the FSIA, intended to exercise its jurisdiction to give [United States] courts . . . competence to hear suits against foreign states for torts committed on United States embassy premises abroad."[96] The court concluded, on the basis of the statutory language, the legislative history, and "the consequences of adopting a contrary position,"[97] that the exception did not apply.[98]

The claims brought by Sergeant Persinger's parents specifically sought damages for mental and emotional distress suffered within the United States as a result of a family member's detention.[99] The Persingers argued that the FSIA exception, which had not applied to their son's claim, did apply to their's, and they were therefore not prevented from bringing suit against Iran.[100] The circuit court held, however, that the FSIA exception requires not only the injury, but also the tort causing it to have occurred in the United States.[101] The court pointed out the inconsistency of holding otherwise:

> It would be anomalous to say that Congress intended to deny a remedy to [Sergeant Persinger]—a hostage imprisoned for more than a year—and yet also intended to expose Iran to suit by his parents for their emotional distress. Indeed, [the Persingers'] argument would have the result that had one hostage died in Tehran and another been released and died in the United States, both deaths being due to injuries inflicted while they were held hostage, the district court would have jurisdiction over the second suit but not over the first. Such results would deprive the statute of any policy coherence.[102]

The court concluded that it was prohibited by the FSIA from taking jurisdiction over any of the Persingers' claims against Iran.[103]

---

96. Persinger, 729 F.2d at 839.

97. Such a position was described as:

> [t]he "functional equivalent" of making U.S. embassies part of the U.S. territory "for jurisdictional purposes." Such a result could, for example, cause the French government to be subject to suit in the United States if a French government vehicle were involved in an automobile accident on the U.S. embassy grounds in West Germany. Furthermore, foreign states "might hesitate in providing services to U.S. embassies or consulates were they to be subject to suit in U.S. courts for negligent acts or omissions on those premises." In addition, since some foreign states base their sovereign immunity decisions on reciprocity, or parity of reasoning, it is possible that a decision to exercise jurisdiction in this case would subject the United States to suits abroad for torts committed on the premises of embassies located here.

Id. at 841 (citations omitted).

98. Id. at 839.

99. Id. at 842.

100. Id.

101. Id.

102. Id. at 842-43.

103. Id.

REV_00261253

10/18/2001 10:46 FAX 3954769 TECH SERVICES 015

Persinger thus rang the death knell for the Iranian hostage suits.[104] Furthermore, due to the circuit court's broad interpretation of the protection afforded by the FSIA, Persinger places a virtually insurmountable barrier before any future terrorist victim's suit involving state-sponsored terrorism abroad.

B. Suits by Aliens

United States citizens have not been the only terrorist victims seeking compensation through the U.S. courts. The case of Tel-Oren v. Libyan Arab Republic involved a lawsuit brought by alien victims of terrorism against alien terrorists in a United States federal court.[105] The terrorist incident forming the basis of the suit occurred on March 11, 1978, when thirteen members of the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) landed by boat in Israel.[106] The terrorists set out for the main highway between Haifa and Tel Aviv, where they seized two civilian buses, a taxi, and a car. The passengers were taken hostage with the result that twenty-two adults and twelve children were killed and seventy-three adults and fourteen children were seriously wounded. Most of the victims were Israeli citizens; a few were American or Dutch citizens.

The alien victims brought suit against the terrorists in a United States district court, asserting jurisdiction under several statutes,[107] most notably the Alien Tort Statute.[108] In a terse per curiam decision, the court of appeals affirmed the lower court's dismissal of the action.[109] Each of the circuit judges did, however, file a lengthy concurrence, fully explaining his own reasoning behind the dismissal, and these three concurrences are where the importance of the case lies. On wholly separate and distinct grounds, each judge found that an alien plaintiff could not bring a lawsuit against an alien terrorist in a United States federal court.

---

104. See supra note 85; see also McKeel v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 722 F.2d 582 (9th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 105 S. Ct. 243 (1984) (also holding FSIA precludes jurisdiction in an Iranian hostage suit).

105. Tel-Oren v. Libyan Arab Republic, 726 F.2d 774 (D.C. Cir. 1984), aff'g, 517 F. Supp. 542 (D.D.C. 1981), cert. denied, 470 U.S. 1003 (1985).

106. The facts are taken from Judge Edwards' opinion in Tel-Oren. Tel-Oren, 726 F.2d at 776.

107. Both the alien and the U.S. citizen plaintiffs claimed federal question jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331 (1982), diversity jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1332 (1982), and jurisdiction under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1330, 1602-1611 (1982). Tel-Oren, 726 F.2d at 775. The district court rejected plaintiffs' arguments for jurisdiction under the diversity statute and the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, and those arguments were abandoned by the plaintiffs on appeal. Tel-Oren, 726 F.2d at 799 n.3. The circuit court declined, with very little discussion, to extend jurisdiction to the U.S. citizen plaintiffs under 28 U.S.C. § 1331, the Alien Tort Statute being inapplicable to them. See Tel-Oren, 725 F.2d at 779 n.4, 800.

108. 28 U.S.C. § 1350 (1982).

109. Tel-Oren, 726 F.2d at 775.

10/18/2001 THU 09:41 [TX/RX NO 5211]

REV_00261254

anian hostage suits.[104] Furrpretation of the protection ally insurmountable barrier ıg state-sponsored terrorism ly terrorist victims seeking of Tel-Oren v. Libyan Arab victims of terrorism against t.[105] The terrorist incident ch 11, 1978, when thirteen ation (PLO) landed by boat highway between Haifa and taxi, and a car. The passenenty-two adults and twelve ınd fourteen children were Israeli citizens; a few were errorists in a United States al statutes,[107] most notably iam decision, the court of the action.[109] Each of the ırrence, fully explaining his ree concurrences are where arate and distinct grounds, t bring a lawsuit against an lic of Iran, 722 F.2d 582 (9th Cir.

SIA precludes jurisdiction in an

.C. Cir. 1984), aff'g, 517 F. Supp.

Tel-Oren. Tel-Oren, 726 F.2d at ned federal question jurisdiction r 28 U.S.C. § 1332 (1982), and

, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1330, 1602-1611 ejected plaintiffs' arguments for reign Immunities Act, and those -Oren, 726 F.2d at 799 n.3. The l jurisdiction to the U.S. citizen ıg inapplicable to them. See Tel-

In the first concurrence, Judge Edwards initially found that the Alien Tort Statute granted the plaintiffs in Tel-Oren a right to sue under two possible theories. Under one theory, he claimed that an expansive view of the Alien Tort Statute could be taken, following the reasoning of the Second Circuit in the case of Filartiga v. Pena-Irala.[110] In that case, the Second Circuit held that torture by a state official violated the "law of nations" as described in the Alien Tort Statute,[111] and the plaintiffs were thus entitled to bring suit in a U.S. federal district court.[112]

Judge Edwards' second jurisdictional theory was derived from Adra v. Clift,[113] in which the court based Alien Tort Statute jurisdiction on first, a violation of a municipal tort law, and second, a law of nations violation. Judge Edwards noted that while the plaintiff's action in Adra was "grounded directly on a domestic tort"—the unlawful taking of a minor child from a parent—it implicated a law of nations violation, the falsifying of a passport.[114] The Adra court's jurisdiction to decide the domestic tort issue would thus allow it to also decide the law of nations issue.[115]

Judge Edwards was, however, unable to find Alien Tort Statute jurisdiction under either theory on the Tel-Oren facts. He noted a major distinction between Tel-Oren and Filartiga in that, while the Filartiga defendant "acted under color of state law," the Tel-Oren plaintiffs did "not allege facts to show that official or state-initiated torture [was] implicated . . . ."[116] Judge Edwards was also unable to find that an act of terrorism constituted a law of nations violation as required by the Alien Tort Statute.

> While [the United States] unequivocally condemns all terrorist attacks, that sentiment is not universal. Indeed, the nations of the world are so divisively split on the legitimacy of such aggression as to make it impossible to pinpoint an area of harmony or consensus. . . . [T]errorism has evoked strident reactions and sparked strong alliances among numerous states. Given this division, I do 110. Filartiga v. Pena-Irala, 630 F.2d 876 (2d Cir. 1980). In Filartiga, the Second Circuit found an alien defendant liable to alien plaintiffs for causing the death of a seventeen-year-old who was one plaintiff's son and the other's brother. The victim had been tortured to death by the defendant, Pena-Irala, who was at that time Inspector General of Police in Asuncion, Paraguay. The Filartigas' claimed that the death was in retaliation for Dr. Filartiga's political activities and beliefs. Id. at 878-80.

111. Id. at 884.

112. Id. at 887-88.

113. 195 F. Supp. 857, 862-65 (D. Md. 1961). In Adra, an alien plaintiff sued his former alien wife and her American husband, contending that he was legally entitled to custody of his daughter by the wife, that the daughter was being wrongfully withheld from him, and that the defendants had concealed the child's name and nationality by falsifying her passport, a violation of the law of nations. Id. at 860-62.

114. Tel-Oren, 726 F.2d at 786.

115. Id. at 786-87.

116. Id. at 791. "Nor do I think they could," Judge Edwards stated, "so long as the PLO is not a recognized member of the community of nations." Id.

REV_00261255

> not believe that under current law terrorist attacks amount to law of nations violations.[117]

Judge Edwards thus concluded that, while the Alien Tort Statute served as a basis of jurisdiction for the alien plaintiffs, the fact that they received their injuries from private citizens acting as terrorists prevented them from bringing suit.

Judge Bork, on the other hand, found that the Alien Tort Statute itself prevented a federal court from having jurisdiction in Tel-Oren. He first held that the case should be dismissed on act of state and political question grounds,[118] since adjudication "would present grave separation of powers problems" in United States foreign policy matters.[119] He also pointed out the difficulty of the required "analysis of international legal principles," such as the status of terrorism, "that are anything but clearly defined and that are the subject of controversy touching 'sharply on national nerves.' "[120]

The major thrust of Judge Bork's opinion, however, is that the Alien Tort Statute does not itself provide alien plaintiffs with a right to bring suit in a federal district court. He analogized the statute to the federal question jurisdiction statute,[121] stating that "[n]either of those statutes either expressly or impliedly grants a cause of action. Both statutes merely define a class of cases federal courts can hear; they do not themselves even by implication authorize individuals to bring such cases."[122] Judge Bork thus reasoned that the right to bring suit must arise from the law of nations in order for jurisdiction to be extended under the Alien Tort Statute.[123] He found that neither the United States treaties which the Tel-Oren plaintiffs cited,[124] nor "international human rights law" provided the requisite right of action.[125]

Judge Robb disposed of the case by holding it nonjusticiable under the political question doctrine.[126] As with Judge Bork, one of Judge Robb's major concerns was maintaining the separation of governmental powers in United States foreign policy matters:

> Cases which would demand close scrutiny of terrorist acts are far beyond [the] limited exceptions to the traditional judicial reticence displayed in the face of foreign affairs cases. That traditional deference to the other branches has stemmed, in large part, from a fear of undue interference in the affairs of state, not only of this nation but of all nations.[127]

---

117. Id. at 795.
118. Id. at 801.
119. Id. at 805.
120. Id. (citing Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 428 (1964)).
121. 28 U.S.C. § 1331 (1982).
122. Tel-Oren, 726 F.2d at 811.
123. Id. at 816.
124. Id. at 808-10.
125. Id. at 816-19.
126. Id. at 823.
127. Id. at 825.

REV_00261256

Judge Robb also hesitated to extend United States federal jurisdiction in an area with almost limitless potential plaintiffs:

> The victims of international violence perpetrated by terrorists are spread across the globe. It is not implausible that every alleged victim of violence of the counterrevolutionaries in such places as Nicaragua and Afghanistan could argue just as compellingly as the plaintiffs here do, that they are entitled to their day in the courts of the United States.[128]

Like Judges Edwards and Bork, Judge Robb therefore also came to the conclusion that because jurisdiction did not exist, dismissal was proper.[129]

The significance of Tel-Oren is that it severely limits the possibility that an alien plaintiff will be able to seek compensation from any terrorist defendant in a United States federal court. The desirability of such a limitation and possible further ramifications of Tel-Oren for U.S. terrorist victims[130] are issues that will continue to invite close scrutiny.[131]

V. PRIVATE COMPENSATORY METHODS

The oldest[132] and most sophisticated form of terrorist victim compensation now available is private insurance. Kidnap, ransom and extortion (K/R&E) insurance is currently offered by seven insurance companies, although only three—American International Group, Lloyd's of London, and Chubb & Son—dominate the field.[133] It is estimated that more than half of the Fortune 500 companies maintain some form of K/R&E insurance.[134] Companies with such insurance usually keep that fact:

> cloaked in secrecy. One reason might be that insurers and corporate executives rarely discuss the topic in public or even behind closed doors. Companies fear that if they reveal that their executives . . . are covered by K/R&E, the publicity will only bring

128. Id. at 826.

129. Id. at 827.

130. Such victims would be those U.S. citizens victimized by "private" terrorists or involved in terrorist incidents within the United States since Persinger precludes actions against state-sponsored terrorists inflicting injuries abroad. See supra notes 96-103 and accompanying text.

131. For a critical discussion of Tel-Oren and its theoretical implications, see Koh, Civil Remedies for Uncivil Wrongs: Combatting Terrorism Through Transnational Public Law Litigation, 22 TEX. INT'L L.J. 211 (1987).

132. This compensation system dates back to the Middle Ages:

> Although Lloyd's [of London] in the 1930s was the first insurer to offer kidnap insurance in modern times, the concept is almost 500 years old. With the advent of shipping in the 1200s, pirates and other enemies not only seized ships' cargoes but also the wealthy traders who were sometimes aboard. At first, cargoes were insured. Then, in 1500, the Guidon de la Mer, a French marine code, first provided for kidnap insurance. . . . In 1681, Louis XIV of France provided for the insurance when he included the provision in his Ordonnance de la Marine.

Schussel, supra note 13, at 5-6.

133. Id. at 4-5.

134. Id. at 5.

REV_00261257

> trouble. Indeed, most policies require that the coverage be kept confidential or the policies become void. Therefore, only a few key people in a corporation may know of the coverage, and many who are covered never hear about it.[135]

A company may typically maintain ransom coverage from $1 million to more than $20 million, paying premiums ranging from $1,000 to more than $100,000.[136] The coverage in K/R&E policies can be quite comprehensive. For example, a policy obtained through American International Group may include the following:

> (1) Payment of ransom for kidnapping or alleged kidnapping;
>
> (2) payment of ransom on a threat to kill or bodily injure an insured;
>
> (3) protection against loss by reason of destruction, disappearance, or wrongful appropriation of ransom monies while being delivered;
>
> (4) payment of expenses incurred for negotiators and consultants, reward, interest costs of a loan, legal fees, damages, and salaries;
>
> (5) payment of loss of earnings resulting from an interruption of business caused by a kidnapping or extortion incident;
>
> (6) payment of an accidental death and dismemberment benefit if an insured sustains bodily injury during a kidnap; and
>
> (7) payment of a wrongful detention benefit, reimbursing the insured for salary losses and other costs resulting from involuntary confinement by a host government or other organization.[137]

K/R&E policies should become increasingly popular because, "[w]ith improved protection afforded to government interests, terrorist activities directed at business concerns are likely to increase."[138] Policies covering family members, rather than employees, should also become more common as terrorists begin to target family members of corporate employees.[139] This may occur because "[f]amilies may not be as well protected as corporate staff and [terrorist] kidnappers may perceive them as more willing to pay a ransom quickly than a corporation."[140] Currently, such insurance is only available at a price prohibitive to most individuals. As terrorism incidents continue to increase, however, K/R&E insurance may prove to be a more attractive, if not the only, method available for private U.S. citizens to obtain terrorist victim compensation.

---

135. Id.

136. Id.

137. AIG Special Services Division, The Policy, in SPECIAL RISK INSURANCE (copy on file with Texas International Law Journal).

138. AIG Special Services Division, Corporate Kidnapping, in SPECIAL RISK INSURANCE (copy on file with Texas International Law Journal).

139. AIG Special Services Division, Individual/Family Kidnapping, in SPECIAL RISK INSURANCE (copy on file with Texas International Law Journal).

140. Id.

REV_00261258

JOURNAL [Vol. 22:383

the coverage be kept erefore, only a few key verage, and many who overage from $1 million to

; from $1,000 to more than an be quite comprehensive.
n International Group may lleged kidnapping;

l or bodily injure an uction, disappearance, while being delivered;

ators and consultants,
lamages, and salaries;
om an interruption of n incident;
nemberment benefit if idnap; and lefit, reimbursing the lting from involuntary organization.[137]

popular because, "[w]ith terests, terrorist activities ase."[138] Policies covering lso become more common porate employees.[139] This protected as corporate staff more willing to pay a ran-ich insurance is only avail-
. As terrorism incidents
e may prove to be a more vate U.S. citizens to obtain

L RISK INSURANCE (copy on file

g, in SPECIAL RISK INSURANCE

Kidnapping, in SPECIAL RISK nal).

VI. CONCLUSION

While victims of terrorism often went uncompensated in the past, various schemes have developed within the United States to remedy this situation. Statutes like the Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act guarantee that some future victims will be compensated for their injuries. Private insurance, when available, performs the same function for those not covered by such statutes.

However, not all terrorist victims come within the purview of these schemes. Methods available to individuals not provided for by statute or covered by insurance have proven largely unsuccessful. Decisions like Persinger and Tel-Oren have made recovery through the U.S. court system highly unlikely for these individuals. It is inevitable, therefore, that there will be individuals, including U.S. citizens, who will be victimized by terrorism and forced to suffer injury without remedy.

Ultimately, the issue of terrorist victim compensation has the potential to extend even beyond those involved in a specific terrorist incident. The words of one scholar best sum up the final ends of terrorist victimization:

> Those not involved in an incident either directly or by virtue of knowing someone who is involved may still feel touched by a particular incident. The psychology of terror and the fear of indiscriminate or random violence are key factors here. . . . Whether people actually avoid visiting Israel, walking in certain areas of Belfast, accepting certain diplomatic missions or business posts, or speaking out publicly on various issues out of fear of being targeted by terrorists is not easily measured or verified. However, it is a fact that most ordinary citizens will accept severe curtailment of civil liberties in the name of security. This is the ironic lesson that has been repeatedly demonstrated in country after country faced with serious terrorist campaigns. This fact alone is sufficient evidence that the general public is victimized in some way by terrorist acts.[141]

*Kimberly A. Trotter

141. R. CRELINSTEN & D. SZABO, supra note 1, at 130.

* J.D. Candidate 1987, University of Texas.

REV_00261259

10/18/2001 10:43 FAX 3954769 TECH SERVICES 003

> for the payment of compensation in such cases. All followed the practice of continuing salary payments, as does the United States, and a few granted cash bonuses for family expenses or extra leave on an ad hoc basis.[3]

This shortcoming has been recognized in recent years and subsequent analysis has resulted in the formulation of several responses from nations affected by terrorist acts. The purpose of this Note is to provide a guide to the various methods available in the United States to gain compensation for terrorist victims.[4] Section II examines the problem of defining who is a victim of terrorism. Section III discusses relevant statutory remedies. In Section IV, the use of legal actions in U.S. courts as a method for obtaining compensation receives attention. Section V focuses on private compensatory methods.

II. DEFINING THE "VICTIM OF TERRORISM"

The threshold question to be answered when considering terrorist victim compensation is who is a victim of terrorism; that is, who is to be compensated. Obviously, any hostages held in a terrorist incident are direct victims[5] of terrorism,[6] but some persons beyond the hostages themselves may also be victims.

For example, family members of hostages may suffer compensable injuries[7] during a terrorist incident:

> Family, friends, and close associates of direct victims may undergo even greater stress during or after an incident than the direct

---

3. PRESIDENT'S COMMISSION ON HOSTAGE COMPENSATION, THE FINAL REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE PRESIDENT'S COMMISSION ON HOSTAGE COMPENSATION, at 29 (Sept. 21, 1981) [hereinafter COMMISSION REPORT]. Private U.S. citizens are not entitled to statutory terrorist victim compensation. See infra notes 31-35 and 63-66 and accompanying text.

4. This Note is limited to a discussion of compensatory methods applicable to victims receiving personal injuries due to a terrorist incident; i.e., former hostages and their families. A discussion of compensation for "economic" injuries, i.e., property damage, is beyond the scope of this Note.

5. The direct-indirect label is used to distinguish victims who are actively involved in a terrorist incident, i.e., hostages, from those who are incidentally affected by the incident, i.e., hostage families. A different, but useful, model of hostage victim labeling is provided in R. CRELINSTEN & D. SZABO, supra note 1, at 3-6, where hostages are labeled "passive" or "secondary" victims, and those who are expected to fulfill the terrorist's demands are labeled "active" or "primary" victims.

6. Terrorism has been described as "the threat and use of psychological and physical force—including intimidation, coercion, repression, and, ultimately, destruction of human lives and property—for the purpose of attaining real or imaginary ideological and political goals." LEGISLATIVE RESPONSES TO TERRORISM, supra note 2, at v. Another description characterizes terrorism as "a fear-provoking tactic involving the callous use of innocent people to achieve political or personal ends." R. CRELINSTEN & D. SZABO, supra note 1, at ix.

7. See infra note 37 and accompanying text.

10/18/2001 THU 09:41 [TX/RX NO 5211]

REV_00261242

victim himself, by virtue of the fact that the latter's coping mechanisms have been fully activated to deal with the situation, whereas the former feels totally helpless and useless.[8]

Diego C. Asencio, former United States Ambassador to Brazil and a former terrorist hostage,[9] has stated that: "the [hostage] knows what condition he is in, how he is feeling, what to expect, but the family is in a state of uncertainty. . . . I am convinced that in some cases members of the family suffer more even than the victim."[10]

Providing benefits to a hostage's family members may also be of immense psychological benefit to the hostage himself. As Representative Daniel A. Mica has noted:

> We have learned from the hostage experience in Iran that, in a long-term hostage situation, a major concern of a captive is for the welfare of his or her family. We have not fully provided for security of our personnel until we have enacted legislation which provides safeguards against the mental as well as physical strain which sometimes comes with serving our country overseas.[11]

The decision of who is a compensable victim of terrorism thus reaches beyond just providing for those involved in a particular hostage incident. Different compensatory methods will have their own peculiar and competing goals to satisfy, in addition to monetary compensation. Ultimately, the definition of "terrorist victim" will reflect the compensatory method selected.

III. STATUTORY REMEDIES

A. Statutory Aims

United States statutes regarding compensation for victims of terrorism allow benefits only to U.S. government employees who have been involved in a hostage incident and their families.[12] This restriction has come about for two reasons. First, many terrorist incidents have involved U.S. government

8. R. CRELINSTEN & D. SZABO, supra note 1, at 130.

9. Ambassador Asencio was held hostage in Bogota, Colombia for 61 days. Asencio, The Psychological Impact of Communication on the Hostage and Family: A Hostage Experience in Colombia, in PROCEEDINGS OF THE 10TH ANNUAL SYMPOSIUM ON THE ROLE OF BEHAVIORAL SCIENCE IN PHYSICAL SECURITY—"OUTTHINKING THE TERRORIST: AN INTERNATIONAL CHALLENGE" 1 (1985) reprinted in H.R. 1956 and H.R. 2019, Benefits to Federal Employees Who are Victims of Terrorism: Joint Hearings Before the Subcomm. on Civil Service and the Subcomm. on Compensation and Employee Benefits of the House Comm. on Post Office and Civil Service and the Subcomm. on International Operations of the House Comm. on Foreign Affairs, 99th Cong., 1st Sess. 139, 140 (1985) [hereinafter Joint Hearings].

10. Joint Hearings, supra note 9, at 72-73 (testimony of Diego C. Asencio, former United States Ambassador to Brazil).

11. Joint Hearings, supra note 9, at 18 (statement of Rep. Daniel A. Mica).

12. See infra notes 33-35, 62-64 and accompanying text. The Internal Revenue Code provides for the exclusion from gross income of:

> [a]mounts received by an individual as disability income attributable to injuries incurred as a direct result of a violent attack which the Secretary of State determines to be a terrorist attack and which occurred while such individual was an employee of employees rather than private citizens.[13] Government employees stationed abroad are often both the easiest prey and the greatest prize for terrorists wishing to strike out at the United States.[14] In describing his own hostage experience, Ambassador Asencio stated, "the gentlemen who held me were not angry at me personally but, in fact, were interested only in my value as a symbol, as a representative of the President of the United States, of the people of the United States. . . ."[15]

REV_00261243

The second reason for limiting compensation to government employees is the view that such compensation fulfills a duty owed by the United States to its employees. The President's Commission on Hostage Compensation,[16] for example, recommended "that the Government view its obligation toward the [Iranian] hostages as those of an employer and assume the costs of restoring the hostages to health, provide disability compensation if their health cannot be restored, provide compensation for material losses and safeguard their employment rights and career prospects."[17] The Hostage Relief Act of 1980[18] established "the principle that the government as a reasonable and compassionate employer had a responsibility to . . . hostages to provide . . . some material relief to partially offset the duress suffered by them and their families."[19] Apparently, the question of the existence of a similar duty to private citizens victimized abroad because they are Americans has yet to be decided.[20] the United States engaged in the performance of his official duties outside the United States.

---

I.R.C. § 104 (a)(5) (1982).

13. See Appendix D, COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 88-99 (setting out dates, locations, and descriptions of 50 terrorist incidents involving U.S. officials from 1968 to 1980). United States Representative Patricia Schroeder has related the story of a State Department employee who stated that "[g]overnment employees overseas, regardless of agency and whether they work in Africa, the Middle East, South America, or Paris, are terrorism targets purely because they are Government employees. Carrying a diplomatic or official passport can be an automatic death warrant." Joint Hearings, supra note 9, at 1 (statement of Rep. Patricia Schroeder). But see Schussel, Kidnap & Ransom Insurance: The Industry's Red Hot, Hush Hush Topic, 37 CONTACT No. 3 at 3, 4 (1985) ("[I]n 1984, incidents against American businesses overseas for the first time exceeded those against the U.S. government.") (CONTACT is a publication of the American International family of insurance companies and agencies) (copy on file with Texas International Law Journal).

14. Joint Hearings, supra note 9, at 91 (testimony of Vice President L. Bruce Laingen, National Defense University). Mr. Laingen was held hostage in Tehran, Iran for 444 days. Appendix C, COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 85.

15. See Joint Hearings, supra note 9, at 71.

16. See infra note 38 and accompanying text.

17. COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 31.

18. See infra note 21.

19. Joint Hearings, supra note 9, at 43 (statement of Norman Painter, President, Local 1812, American Federation of Government Employees).

20. Id. at 67 (statement of Rep. Patricia Schroeder).

REV_00261244

ment employees stationed eatest prize for terrorists escribing his own hostage lemen who held me were sted only in my value as a United States, of the peo-government employees is ed by the United States to stage Compensation,[16] for lew its obligation toward and assume the costs of ity compensation if their r material losses and safes."[17] The Hostage Relief )vernment as a reasonable o . . . hostages to provide ess suffered by them and existence of a similar duty are Americans has yet to l duties outside the United

3, at 88-99 (setting out dates,
.S. officials from 1968 to 1980).
he story of a State Department as, regardless of agency and
, or Paris, are terrorism targets plomatic or official passport can at 1 (statement of Rep. Patricia
The Industry's Red Hot, Hush
4, incidents against American U.S. government.") (CONTACT rance companies and agencies)

e President L. Bruce Laingen, in Tehran, Iran for 444 days.

rman Painter, President, Local

B. The Hostage Relief Act of 1980

The Hostage Relief Act of 1980[21] was the first statute expressly drafted to compensate victims of a particular act of terrorism. The Act was passed in response to the Iranian hostage incident[22] in which seventy-two persons were seized or forced into protective refuge in Tehran, Iran.[23] All but one of these persons was a U.S. government employee or a person working under contract to the U.S. government, and fifty-two of these were held in captivity for 444 days.

On January 19, 1981, the United States and Iran entered into the Declaration of the Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria (Algiers Agreement),[24] a treaty providing for, among other things, the release of the American hostages.[25] President Jimmy Carter issued Executive Order 12,283 on the same day in fulfillment of the United States' commitment under the Agreement.[26] That Order directed the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the regulations necessary to enforce the provisions of the Agreement, and directed that he notify all appropriate courts of his action.[27] The hostages were released on January 20, 1981. President Ronald Reagan implemented the Algiers Agreement by Executive Order on February 24, 1981.[28] Among the provisions of the Agreement, it was agreed that no hostage would bring suit against Iran for damages incurred during the hostage incident.[29] The penalty for instituting such a suit was a fine of $50,000 and a ten-year prison term.[30]

21. Hostage Relief Act of 1980 §§ 101-301, 5 U.S.C. § 5561 (1982).

22. H.R. REP. NO. 1349, 96th Cong., 2d Sess. 1, reprinted in 1980 U.S. CODE CONG. & AD. NEWS 4178.

23. The facts are taken from COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 3-10.

24. Declaration of the Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria, Jan. 19, 1981, United States-Iran, 20 I.L.M. 224 (1981) [hereinafter Algiers Agreement].

25. Id. at 225.

26. Exec. Order No. 12,283, 3 C.F.R. 114-15 (1982), reprinted in 50 U.S.C. § 1701 notes at 261-62 (Supp. 1987).

27. Id.

28. Exec. Order No. 12,294, 3 C.F.R. 139-40 (1982), reprinted in 50 U.S.C. § 1701 notes at 263-64 (Supp. 1987).

29. Algiers Agreement, supra note 24, at 227; see also 31 C.F.R. § 535.216(a) (1986), prohibiting:

> [p]ersons subject to the jurisdiction of the United States . . . from prosecuting in any court within the United States or elsewhere, whether or not litigation was commenced before or after January 19, 1981, any claim against the Government of Iran arising out of events occurring before January 19, 1981 relating to: (1) The seizure of the hostages on November 4, 1979; (2) The subsequent detention of such hostages; (3) Injury to United States property or property of United States nationals within the United States Embassy compound in Tehran after November 3, 1979; or (4) Injury to United States nationals or their property as a result of popular movements in the course of the Islamic Revolution in Iran which were not an act of the Government of Iran.

30. 31 C.F.R. § 535.701 (1986).

REV_00261245

In an attempt to compensate the Iranian hostages by some alternative means, Congress enacted the Hostage Relief Act of 1980.[31] The Act designates compensable victims of terrorism as "American hostages" and "family members."[32] An American hostage is defined as any individual who, while in the civil service or the military or while a citizen or resident alien of the United States rendering personal service to the United States abroad, is placed in "captive status" during the applicable hostage period.[33] Captive status means a missing status due to "hostile action abroad . . . which is directed against the United States during the hostage period . . . ."[34] A family member is defined as any dependent of an American hostage and any member of the hostage's family or household.[35]

The Hostage Relief Act is important not only because of its particular purpose, but also because it expressly recognizes that a hostage's family members are compensable victims. The benefits provided by the Act were specifically tailored to meet the differing needs of hostages and their families. Thus, the Act provided several very specific and goal-oriented benefits that were formerly unavailable. Among these were:

> [1] Creation of an interest-bearing salary savings fund, including retroactive interest on salary held prior to establishment of the fund.
>
> [2] Reimbursement of medical expenses of the hostages and members of their families which are attributable to the hostage experience. . . .
>
> [3] Extension of the Soldiers and Sailors Relief Act to hostages, thereby permitting courts to defer legal actions against hostages and their families when the enforced absence is prejudicial to their defense.
>
> [4] Exemption from gross income of compensation paid while in hostage status.
>
> [5] Exclusion from income tax when an employee dies as a result of hostile action.
>
> [6] Deferred assessment of taxes and penalties and refund of any tax collected before enactment.
>
> [7] Authorization for spouse to file joint [income tax] return.

---

31. Hostage Relief Act of 1980, §§ 101-301, 5 U.S.C. § 5561 (1982).

32. Id. § 101, 5 U.S.C. § 5561 (1982).

33. Id. § 101(1), 5 U.S.C. § 5561 (1982). Congress chose not to compensate the one Iranian hostage who was a private U.S. citizen. See id. § 101, 5 U.S.C. § 5561 (1982). "Congress has made a clear distinction between the private American hostage and public official hostages in the Hostage Relief Act of 1980 by providing only . . . tax relief benefits . . . to the private citizen while making the government employees eligible for the other benefits . . . ." COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 32. See also supra notes 16-20 and accompanying text.

34. Hostage Relief Act of 1980 § 101(4)(A), 5 U.S.C. § 5561 (1982).

35. Id. § 101(3), 5 U.S.C. § 5561 (1982).

REV_00261246

[8] Reimbursement of educational expenses (post-secondary) of hostage families . . . and retraining of hostages.[36]

While the Act was of enormous benefit to the victims of the Iranian hostage incident, it lacked any means of compensating the hostages or their families for all of their damages; no compensatory monetary award existed for the pain, suffering, and mental anguish of the victims and their families.[37] Furthermore, since the Act was enacted expressly to compensate the American hostages in Iran, it was an ad hoc response. No permanent legislation existed for the benefit of subsequent terrorist victims. The issues of hostage compensation and U.S. policy towards terrorist victims thus became the topic of study for the President's Commission on Hostage Compensation.

C. The President's Commission on Hostage Compensation and the War Claims Act of 1948

The President's Commission on Hostage Compensation was formed by President Jimmy Carter on January 19, 1981,[38] for the purpose of "making recommendations to the President as to whether the United States should provide financial compensation to the United States nationals held hostage in Iran . . . ."[39] In its study, the Commission considered the events surrounding the Iranian hostage incident, the existing statutory remedies and benefits available to the hostages, and the obligation of the United States government to provide compensation to the hostages.[40] Ultimately, the 36. Appendix G, COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 120. See generally Hostage Relief Act of 1980 §§ 101-301, 5 U.S.C. § 5561 (1982) (statutorily providing these benefits).

37. American tort law generally recognizes three basic kinds of compensable losses suffered by victims in personal injury actions. D. DOBBS, HANDBOOK ON THE LAW OF REMEDIES: DAMAGES-EQUITY-RESTITUTION § 8.1, at 540 (1973). First, there are losses relating to lost wages and lost earning capacity. A tort victim is normally entitled to recover for his lost wages and for "any loss of working capacity resulting from his injury, whether the loss in capacity actually reduces his earnings or not." Id. Second, there are expenses incurred due to the injury, usually medical expenses. "The value of any services rendered as the result of an injury is the usual measure of recovery for this particular element of damage. . . . [R]ecovery is not limited to expenses of treatment. Any reasonable expense, adequately proved to be the result of the injury, is an item of damage." Id. at 543. Finally, victims receive "intangible" injuries, often described as pain, suffering, and mental anguish. Id. at 544. Courts will typically allow "fair" or "reasonable" compensatory damages for such injuries. Id. at 545.

Indirect victims, such as family members, may also suffer from intangible injuries. Recovery of damages for "mental distress" may be allowed where "it would appear that there was a very high degree of probability that the mental disturbance would follow, and that the defendant [the terrorist, for example] proceeded in conscious and deliberate disregard of it, so that the defendant's conduct would properly be called wilful, wanton or reckless." PROSSER AND KEETON ON THE LAW OF TORTS § 12 (W. Page Keeton 5th ed. 1984).

38. Exec. Order No. 12,285, 3 C.F.R. 117-18 (1982).

39. COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 1.

40. See generally COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, for a detailed discussion of each of these topics.

REV_00261247

Commission concluded that paying "compensation in the tort sense was not appropriate."[41] The Commission specifically recommended "that the United States Government make no payment to the Iranian hostages or their family members of any compensation intended to be the equivalent to compensatory damages for injuries incurred as the result of the unlawful detention of the hostages by the Iranian Government."[42] Instead, "[t]he Commission considered various bases under which direct financial benefits for the hostages might be warranted and concluded that monetary benefits, modeled after [the War Claims Act of 1948,[43] a] statute providing similar payments to American prisoners of war and wartime civilian internees on account of their detention, would be appropriate."[44]

The War Claims Act allows for the compensation of prisoners of war,[45] civilian U.S. citizen internees captured by hostile forces,[46] and certain employees of contractors working abroad for the United States.[47] Benefits received under the Act are payable only to designated beneficiaries, usually the captive himself or his immediate family members.[48]

Using the War Claims Act as a precedent, the Commission recommended that legislation be adopted providing for payment to the hostages equivalent to $12.50 per day[49] for each day of captivity.[50] While the Commission acknowledged that distinctions existed between prisoners of war and civilian 41. Letter from James S. Dwight, Jr., Chairman, President's Commission on Hostage Compensation, to President Ronald Reagan (Sept. 21, 1981), reprinted in COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at i.

42. COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 35-36.

43. War Claims Act of 1948, 50 U.S.C. App. §§ 2001-2017 (1982).

44. COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 20. The War Claims Act may have been chosen as the Commission's model for hostage compensation because of the then recent release of Vietnam POWs who had received awards under this statute. Joint Hearings, supra note 9, at 49 (statement of Walter F. Weiss, Congressional Liaison, American Foreign Service Association).

45. War Claims Act of 1948, 50 U.S.C. App. § 2005 (1982).

46. Id. § 2004.

47. Id. § 2003. Compensable employees are described in 42 U.S.C. § 1701(a) which provides compensation for injury proximately resulting from a war-risk hazard.

48. War Claims Act of 1948, 50 U.S.C. App. §§ 2004(d), 2005(c) (1982). Benefits due to U.S. contractor employees are payable to the employee or his dependents. Id. § 2003(a) (referring to 42 U.S.C. § 1701(b)).

49. The selection of this specific amount sparked some controversy:

> The Commission noted that the daily detention benefit payable to persons eligible under the War Claims Act was last adjusted upward in 1970 and now stands at $5.00 per day for prisoners of war. The Commission felt it proper to recommend that the President suggest to the Congress a further upward adjustment in this figure [for the hostages] to $12.50 per day to take into account the impact of inflation since 1970.

COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 22. This figure was subsequently referred to as "ridiculous"; Letter from Brice M. Clagett to Rep. Patricia Schroeder (June 12, 1985), reprinted in Joint Hearings, supra note 9, at 38; "condescending"; id. at 73 (statement of Diego C. Asencio); and an "insult"; id. at 80 (statement of Thomas D. Boyatt, former United States Ambassador to Brazil).

50. Joint Hearings, supra note 9, at 33.

REV_00261248

isation in the tort sense was not ally recommended "that the to the Iranian hostages or their nded to be the equivalent to l as the result of the unlawful overnment."[42] Instead, "[t]he which direct financial benefits ıcluded that monetary benefits,
,[43] a] statute providing similar l wartime civilian internees on riate."[44]

ensation of prisoners of war,[45] hostile forces,[46] and certain the United States.[47] Benefits esignated beneficiaries, usually nembers.[48]

he Commission recommended ıent to the hostages equivalent ity.[50] While the Commission n prisoners of war and civilian

President's Commission on Hostage l, 1981), reprinted in COMMISSION

01-2017 (1982).
he War Claims Act may have been ion because of the then recent release statute. Joint Hearings, supra note 9, Liaison, American Foreign Service

5 (1982).

ibed in 42 U.S.C. § 1701(a) which rom a war-risk hazard.
4(d), 2005(c) (1982). Benefits due to e or his dependents. Id. § 2003(a) ne controversy:

ıefit payable to persons eligible n 1970 and now stands at $5.00 proper to recommend that the djustment in this figure [for the impact of inflation since 1970.
e was subsequently referred to as atricia Schroeder (June 12, 1985), ıding"; id. at 73 (statement of Diego ıas D. Boyatt, former United States

internees held during war on the one hand, and the hostages on the other,[51] the Commission also felt "that the holding of hostages by international terrorists and the well-documented tendency of some nations to disregard international standards for the treatment of prisoners of war and internees have brought the two situations much closer together."[52]

It is significant that the Commission chose the War Claims Act as its model, since this Act, like the Hostage Relief Act of 1980, expressly allows for the compensation of a hostage's family.[53] Unlike the Hostage Relief Act, however, the War Claims Act does not provide specific nonmonetary benefits, such as payment of medical expenses, to either a hostage or his family. Benefits are provided as a lump sum monetary award,[54] and in the event of the hostage's death, the designated family members are entitled to the lump sum which the hostage himself would have received.[55]

Ultimately, the Commission's recommendations, including the $12.50 per day payment to the Iranian hostages, were never implemented.[56] Sensing the inequity in such a result,[57] members of Congress subsequently introduced several bills that provided some form of compensation to the Iranian hostages as well as a permanent compensation system for future terrorist victims.[58]

D. The Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act

The most recent legislative attempt at compensating victims of terrorism is the Omnibus Security and Antiterrorism Act of 1986.[59] The pertinent portion of that statute is Title VIII, the Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act,[60] which provides benefits for "captives" and their "family members."[61] A captive is defined as an individual held involuntarily while such individual is in the civil service, or a U.S. citizen, national, or a resident alien rendering service to the United States.[62] "Captive status" is defined as "a missing status which, as determined by the President, arises because of a hostile action

51. Id. at 20.
52. Id. at 21.
53. See supra notes 32-35 and accompanying text.
54. War Claims Act of 1948, 50 U.S.C. App. §§ 2003(a), 2004(c), 2005(b) (1982).
55. Id. §§ 2003(a), 2004(d), 2005(b).
56. H.R. REP. No. 201, 99th Cong., 1st Sess., pt. 1, at 6 (1985) [hereinafter HOUSE REPORT]; see also Joint Hearings, supra note 9, at 19 (statement of Ronald I. Spiers, Under Secretary of State for Management); id. at 41 (statement of Walter F. Weiss, Congressional Liaison, American Foreign Service Association).
57. See HOUSE REPORT, supra note 56, at 25.
58. E.g., H.R. 1956, 99th Cong., 1st Sess. (1985); H.R. 2019, 99th Cong., 1st Sess. (1985); H.R. 2851, 99th Cong., 1st Sess. (1985).
59. Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Antiterrorism Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-399, 1986 U.S. CODE CONG. & AD. NEWS (100 Stat.) 853 (Supp. No. 8).
60. Id. § 801, (100 Stat.) 879 [hereinafter Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act].
61. Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act § 803, (100 Stat.) 879.
62. Id.

REV_00261249

Can Tort Law Be Ethical?

A proposal to curb ill-gotten gains.

BY MICHAEL HOROWITZ

SOMEONE STICKS A LOADED GUN to your head and asks for your wallet. Do you resist if you know the bullets are cheap and likely (but not certain) to be duds?

Today, mass tort litigation creates similar bet-your-life scenarios for increasing numbers of industries. Federal circuit court judge Richard Posner has noted that when a jury can "hold the fate of an industry in the palm of its hand . . . and hurl [it] into bankruptcy . . . the industry is likely to settle—whether or not it really is liable." Law increasingly counts for little in mass tort cases; fixing the size of payoffs to make the cases go away has become its primary function.

Think otherwise? Then imagine yourself general counsel of McDonald's, faced with a nationwide class action brought on behalf of millions of Happy Meal customers who claim that their diabetes, obesity, and heart attacks were caused by your products, and with a companion series of suits brought by government agencies that paid for their medical care.

Your first reaction would be fury and incredulity. You know—or think you do—that french fries aren't cigarettes. You know that McDonald's tried and failed to sell low-fat hamburgers, that it gainfully employs vast numbers of young people, that millions of customers enjoy its products every day. That's when reality intrudes.

The first dose would come when you noted that the damages claimed in the combined suits vastly exceed the entire net worth of McDonald's—that it will be out of business if the cases are tried and lost. You then realize that the company's files almost certainly contain memos discussing the health effects of your products. You also note that the public is less aware of the risks of eating Big Macs than of smoking Camels, that you've done little to advise your customers of those risks, that many of those patrons are young and unschooled, that you've made it hard for them to know the fat and calorie content of what you sell, that armies of expert witnesses and government officials are prepared to second-guess your menu and recipe decisions and to allege that "junk foods" are killing America. Your government relations vice president then describes the price the company will pay for waging sustained public war on political officials eager for massive lawsuit windfalls they can spend without having to pass tax increases. Your media people also warn that document leaks and angry politicians orchestrated by media-savvy lawyers can metastasize the company's happy face image into a skull and crossbones faster than you can say asbestos or Bill Gates.

Finally, you note that 8 or 9 state supreme courts—or has it now become 19 or 20?—are, like the Florida Supreme Court, dominated by tort lawyers implacably eager to redistribute your assets without regard to fault. And, if that isn't enough, the value of the company's stock has dropped precipitously since the lawsuits were filed. As a prudent lawyer and company officer, you'll soon come to understand what you need to do.

First, make sure all your competitors—Popeyes and Taco Bell, as well as Wendy's and Burger King—are also named in the suit. Then, after learning from your marketing people that the bottom won't drop out of sales as long as you (and your competitors) don't add more than 30 cents to the price of Big Macs, conduct a kabuki ritual of discovery proceedings whose singular objective is a settlement that will increase burger prices by no more than a quarter (with comparable increases for chicken wings and burritos).

Settling will be easy, for all you'll need to do is pay a nickel a burger for the next 25 years to the 300 or so lawyers who brought and control the cases. To be sure, this tort tax on your products will hurt business, and you'll be squeezed some by the nutrition education programs and modest salt and calorie reductions you'll be required to implement as part of the settlement. But offering a nickel rather than a penny a burger for legal fees (and offering government health care programs more lucrative settlements than individual plaintiffs) will do wonders in getting a settlement you can live with. Among other things, it will convert the lawyers who sued you into self-interested guarantors of the health of the fast food industry; and it will immediately return your stock price to where it was when the cases were brought.

Michael Horowitz is a senior fellow at the Hudson Institute and director of its Project for Civil Justice Reform.

REV_00261263

The settlement will of course add eight or ten new tort lawyer billionaires to the Forbes 400 and will give the tort bar more disposable income to "invest" in the political process than all parties now spend in all U.S. elections in any given year. But that will be the next industry's worry, not yours.

The above scenario is, precisely, the story of the great asbestos and tobacco lawsuits of the 1990s. It explains why, in order to save itself, Dow threw its Dow Corning division to the wolves in the junk science breast-implant cases. As former Washington Post business editor David Ignatius has written, it will one day be the story of an oil industry that sits with global warming risk memos in its files if droughts or floods depreciate property values in different regions of the country. And consider this recent Department of Agriculture report: Carbonated soda provides more sugar in a typical 2-year-old's diet than cookies, candies, and ice cream combined, while more than half of 8-year-olds drink a can of soda per day and a third of all teenage boys drink at least three cans per day. Do you think for a second that creative tort lawyers won't try to link this "soda addiction" to any number of present and future health and social ills? Are you ready, Coke? Will you be ready when the tort bar dominates 30 state supreme courts? Cheer up, for you'll be able to get out of it all without too much damage if you pay the tort lawyers a penny a can for 25 years or so. On second thought, maybe you'll need a penny and a half to make them go away.

Under every canon of legal ethics, these blackmail scenarios should be proscribed. The central premise of legal ethics—that lawyers are fiduciaries restricted to reasonable and risk-based fees—is shattered when, as in the tobacco cases, lawyers are scheduled to receive $200,000 per hour fees for late-filed, copycat cases. Fee ethics mandates are said to be particularly critical in contingency fee cases where, as courts and scholars have noted, $100-million cases seldom require ten times as much risk and effort as $10-million cases. In fact, the relationship of case size to attorney risk is reversed in mass tort cases, where survival threats to defendants make $245-billion cases more than a thousand times harder, to win than "mere" $245-million cases.

The central premise of legal ethics is shattered when lawyers receive $200,000 per hour fees for late-filed, copycat cases.

President Bush proposed during the campaign to apply to lawyers in mass tort cases the Internal Revenue Code provisions that govern fiduciary breaches of duty by pension fund trustees, foundation executives, and employees of 501(c)(3) non-profits. Under this so-called Jim and Tammy Faye Bakker provision of the 1996 Taxpayer Bill of Rights, overreaching fiduciaries have the "choice" of refunding their excess payments or paying a federal tax of $2 for every dollar they keep. Under the president's proposed reform, attorneys in successful mass tort cases would be handsomely but not obscenely compensated. Based on a developed body of law governing the compensation of lawyers in shareholder suits, mass tort fees would be based on high hourly "lodestar" fees multiplied by a factor as high as six to cover the risks the lawyers assumed when they brought their cases.

REV_00261264

Acting as if President Bush's reform proposal never had been made, a group of tobacco attorneys recently sold a 12-year strip of about $1 billion in future fees for $308.1 million in immediate cash—thereby transferring the risk of non-payment of their fees to banks and investors. That cash-out was reported to be the first step in a planned two-year securitization of all future fees from the tobacco lawsuits, estimated to provide a payout of no less than $3 billion and as much as $10 billion.

Perhaps the lawyers and their bankers believed that the Bush proposal was not meant to be applicable to the tobacco settlement fees, and early comments from unnamed Bush spokesmen may have given them grounds to believe that this was so. If so, the lawyers and their bankers are in for a rude surprise. Page 80 of the president's budget contains this terse and, to taxpayers, cheering sentence: "The budget also assumes additional public health resources for the States from the President's proposal to extend fiduciary responsibilities to the representatives of States in tobacco lawsuits."

The Bush budget thus ensures that members of Maryland's congressional delegation will soon be asked to decide whether sick Maryland smokers (and the government agencies that pay for their care) or tobacco attorney Peter Angelos will receive the overwhelming bulk of the $1.1 billion fee now sought by Angelos. They will do so knowing that Angelos's services were rendered under a statute which, in the words of the state senate president, Mike Miller, "changed centuries of precedent to ensure a win." They will do so with the country's leading ethics scholars arguing that almost all of the money must go to Maryland rather than Angelos if codes of ethics are to have any meaning at all. Ted Kennedy, meanwhile, will get to vote on whether the bulk of the $775 million awarded to the Massachusetts tobacco lawyers should go to them or that state's health authorities. This comes in the face of sworn testimony by tort lawyers from other states that the Massachusetts attorneys added little or nothing to the settlement received by Massachusetts. Other members of Congress will have similar opportunities to decide whether fiduciary standards that still allow tobacco lawyers to be paid as much as $3,000 per hour are too ungenerous to those lawyers.

The Bush proposal will chill the plans of the tobacco lawyers to take a $3-$10 billion payoff and run. It sets up what will be a defining national debate on the role and rule of lawyers. Finally, it offers the tort bar the lesson that many Americans are now also learning: Don't underestimate George W. Bush. ◆

REV_00261265

CONSOLIDATION

LANGUAGE

(a) SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION. Notwithstanding any other law, within 90 days of an act of terrorism as defined in section 803, the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall assign a single federal district court to conduct pre-trial and trial proceedings in all pending and future civil actions for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from a single act of terrorism as defined in section 803, and shall transfer all such pending civil actions to that district court. The Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall select and assign the district court based on the convenience of the parties and the just and efficient conduct of the proceedings. The district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction over all such actions. For purposes of personal jurisdiction, the district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall be deemed to sit in all judicial districts in the United States.

[Subsections (b) and (c) would ensure transfer of cases filed in other courts.]

PURPOSE

- A single federal court and a uniform standard of liability are necessary to ensure that the legal system is not overwhelmed by multiple cases in multiple courts in multiple states -- with similar claims in multiple forums decided under widely varying standards for liability, causation, defenses, and damages.

- Consolidation of cases in a single court is a common procedure in mass tort cases and was a central feature of the legislation recently enacted by Congress for the tort cases arising out of the September 11 attacks.

ANALOGUE IN AIR TRANSPORTATION ACT

- Section 408(b) of the Air Transportation Act consolidates all cases arising out of the September 11 attacks in a single federal court.

PUNITIVE DAMAGES

LANGUAGE

(e) PUNITIVE DAMAGES. Punitive damages, exemplary damages, and other damages not intended to compensate the plaintiff for actual losses shall not be available in any civil action subject to this title.

PURPOSE

- In mass tort cases, only a limited pool of resources will be available to plaintiffs who prove liability (whether because of bankruptcy or settlement).

- Because of the limited pool of resources, it would be grossly inequitable and unfair to allow one plaintiff or class of plaintiffs to receive an excessive award -- including a punitive component entirely unrelated to the plaintiff's injuries -- that could greatly limit or outright preclude recovery by other plaintiffs.

- Even for defendants who face no possibility of bankruptcy, the possibility of massive punitive or non-economic damages creates pressure to settle even unmeritorious cases and economic instability for potential defendants in terrorism cases.

- A business defendant who engages in the kind of wrongdoing that otherwise would trigger punitive damages will face a variety of federal and state criminal and administrative investigations and sanctions.

ANALOGUE IN AIR TRANSPORTATION ACT

- Section 405(b)(5) of the Air Transportation Act precludes recovery of punitive damages in the victims' claims process, and Section 408(a) limits any recovery against air carriers to the limits of their liability policies, which essentially precludes punitive damages against air carriers.

OFFSET

LANGUAGE

(f) OFFSET. In determining the amount of any money damages available under this title, the court shall offset any compensation or benefits received or entitled to be received by the plaintiff or plaintiffs from any collateral source, including the United States or any federal agency thereof, in response to or as a result of the act of terrorism

PURPOSE

- This procedure, which Congress adopted for the victims claims process applicable to individual cases arising out of the September 11 terrorist attacks, will ensure that plaintiffs are compensated for their losses, yet also prevent double recovery by plaintiffs. It thus will help preserve the limited pool of defendant resources available for successful plaintiffs without penalizing injured victims.

- The procedure is consistent with the principle that first-party private insurance and, where necessary, standard government benefits have been (and should be) the primary means for promptly and appropriately compensating the parties injured in a terrorism attack. Through these resources, injured parties will receive appropriate care and compensation without resort to an inefficient judicial process that would trigger widespread bankruptcies.

- Even in ordinary tort cases, many states offset past and prospective insurance benefits paid or payable to the plaintiff against the plaintiff's recovery.

ANALOGUE IN AIR TRANSPORTATION ACT

- Section 405(b)(6) of the Air Transportation Act requires that recovery by a claimant in the victims' claims process be reduced by the amount of collateral source compensation the plaintiff has received or is entitled to receive.

NON-ECONOMIC DAMAGES

LANGUAGE

(g) NON-ECONOMIC DAMAGES. Each defendant shall be liable only for the amount of non-economic damages allocated to the defendant in direct proportion to the percentage of responsibility of the defendant for the harm to the claimant. No plaintiff may recover non-economic damages unless the plaintiff suffered physical harm.

PURPOSE

- The proposed language is more modest than many proposals: It would not eliminate non-economic damages, nor would it impose proportional fault for economic damages. In addition, this proposal for proportional liability for non-economic damages is less restrictive than state law provisions that may apply to many cases litigated under the cause of action recently established by Congress for the September 11 events.

- Without this provision, a court could hold any defendant "jointly and severally" liable for the full amount of the plaintiff's non-economic damages, even for those damages unrelated to the defendant's actions or attributable to the terrorists.

- Some studies suggest that non-economic damages can comprise 40-50% of damages in certain classes of tort cases. If any defendant, even the marginally involved, could be made to pay the full extent of non-economic damages in a mass terrorism incident, these damages could easily threaten to bankrupt hundreds of legitimate businesses.

- Limitations on joint and several liability are commonplace. At least thirty-seven states have enacted some form of proportional liability. Indeed, seventeen states have adopted proportional liability even for economic damages. Another eight states have adopted proportional liability for economic and non-economic damages for any marginally-involved defendant (e.g., one found to be less than 50% at fault).

ANALOGUE IN AIR TRANSPORTATION ACT

- Section 408(a) of the Air Transportation Act limits recovery against air carriers to the limits of their liability policies, which is an effective cap on non-economic damages against air carriers, and applies state law limits on joint and several liability, which in many cases will be more restrictive than this proposal.

SUBSTANTIVE STANDARD FOR LIABILITY

LANGUAGE

(h) SUBSTANTIVE LAW. The standard of care for the federal cause of action . . . shall be gross negligence. Unless otherwise specified in this title, the district court shall derive other substantive principles of liability for the federal cause of action from the principles of the common law.

PURPOSE

- The gross negligence standard is a middle-ground standard between simple negligence and intentional wrongdoing and is particularly appropriate in tort cases where, by definition, the injury has been caused by the criminal acts of an intervening third party, not by legitimate bystander property and business owners.

- A simple negligence standard would generate undue pressure towards a massive settlement and/or bankruptcy, yet legitimate businesses should not be forced to bankruptcy as a result of damage and injuries caused by terrorists, at least absent serious wrongdoing on the part of these legitimate businesses.

- On a forward-looking basis, a simple negligence standard for terrorism cases would inevitably discourage normal economic activity, particularly in locales that are susceptible to terrorist attacks. For similar reasons, the law of torts traditionally has established that criminal acts by an intervening agent are often so unlikely in any particular instance or specific location that the burden of taking continual precautions against them almost always exceeds the apparent risk.

ANALOGUE IN AIR TRANSPORTATION ACT

- Section 408(b) of the Air Transportation Act provides that the substantive standard for liability is to be derived from the law of the State where the incident occurred. That procedure could be unwieldy and unfair in a mass terrorism incident that occurs in multiple states.

Cox 40

Measure HR 3210
Amendment No. 1b

F:\M7\COX\COX.090

Agreed To?	C. YES ✓	No	Wdn
Voice Vte	Yeas 26	Nays 21

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. COX

TO THE AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. OXLEY

Page 28 of the amendment, line 1, after "claimed by" insert "or against".

November 7, 2001
F:\V7\110701\110701.047

LaFalce 74

Measure HR 3210

Amendment No. 1a

H.L.C.

F:\M7\LAFALC\LAFALC.074
[strike tort reforms]

Agreed To?	YES	No ✓	Wdm
Voice Vte	Yeas 24	Nays 32

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. LAFALCE

TO THE AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. OXLEY

Strike line 18 on page 26 of the amendment and all that follows through line 10 on page 29 (and conform the table of contents accordingly).

F:\M7\BENTSE\BENTSE.019 BENTSEN 19

Measure H.R. 3210

Amendment No. 1e

Agreed To?	YES ✓	No	Wdm
Voice Vte ✓	Yeas	Nays

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BENTSEN

TO THE AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. OXLEY

Page 28 of the amendment, after line 23, insert the following:

Nothing in this subsection may be construed to limit an action by an injured party for damages other than a claim for commercial property and casualty insurance resulting from an act of terrorism causing a triggering determination.

U.S. CHAMBER INSTITUTE FOR LEGAL REFORM
1615 H STREET, N.W.
WASHINGTON D.C. 20062-2000
FAX: 202-463-5302

FACSIMILE TRANSMITTAL SHEET

TO: Brett Cavanaugh	FROM: Aileen F. Maguire
COMPANY:	DATE: 9/24/2001
FAX NUMBER: 202-456-6279	TOTAL NO. OF PAGES INCLUDING COVER:
PHONE NUMBER:	SENDER'S REFERENCE NUMBER:
RE:	YOUR REFERENCE NUMBER:

☐ URGENT ☐ FOR REVIEW ☐ PLEASE COMMENT ☐ PLEASE REPLY ☐ PLEASE RECYCLE

NOTES/COMMENTS:

Please review attached draft letter.

DRAFT

September 24, 2001

The Honorable Mitchell E. Daniels, Jr.
Director
Office of Management and Budget 725 17th Street, NW
Washington DC 20503

Dear Mitch:

As you can see from the attached letter the U.S. Chamber of Commerce supported the passage of the Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act last Friday. Unfortunately, however, we have concerns that the legislation is too limited in its protections against this tragedy becoming a litigation bonanza for the plaintiffs' trial bar, thus drawing resources from victims and businesses. We hope the White House will join the business community in supporting a broadening of its provisions in the weeks ahead.

Of more immediate concern, however, is the scope of Section 408, entitled "Limitation on Air Carrier Liability," in dealing with litigation arising out of the events of September 11, 2001. Specifically, it is our understanding that Section 408(b) entitled "Federal Cause of Action" applies to all litigation and not just litigation against air carriers, notwithstanding the general title of Section 408. We are concerned that some are interpreting Section408(b) as not applying to businesses such as the manufacturer of the aircraft involved, the lessors of the aircraft, anyone with interests in the area of the crashes, and the insurers of any of these parties.

Mitch, as this is a matter of extreme importance to the business community -- on which the recovery of our economy largely depends -- I would appreciate your sending me a clarification of this matter as soon as possible.

Sincerely,

Attachment

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
OF THE
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

R. BRUCE JOSTEN
EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT
GOVERNMENT AFFAIRS

1615 H STREET, N.W.
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20062-2000
202/463-5310

September 21, 2001

To Members of the U.S.House of Representatives:

I am writing on behalf of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the world's larget business federation, representing more than three million businesses and organizations of every size, sector, and region, to commend you for your prompt efforts to assist the airline industry as well as the victims of the tragic events of September 11, 2001. The continued viability of the airline industry is critical to the American public, economy and national defense. Unfortunately, I must also voice serious concerns about the liability provisions of the Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act of 2001.

Specifically, we are concerned that the bill will have dramatic and negative unintended consequences on the entire business community, possibly spawning litigation against many other parties including the manufacturer of the aircraft involved, suppliers of components for the aircrafts, the lessors of the aircraft, anyone with interests in the area of the crashes, and the insurers of any of these parties. While we share the goal of assisting the airline industry during this time of crisis, the liability provisions of the legislation are incomplete and may create a flood of litigation arising out of the horrible events of last week, delaying compensation to deserving parties.

Accordingly, we strongly urge you to carefully consider the liability limitation provisions of the legislation and make clear that they apply to all affected parties and not just those related to the airline industry. If, however, you are unable to make these changes at this time, we strongly urge you to commit to readdressing the liability aspects within the next few weeks.

Sincerely,

R. Bruce Josten

R. Bruce Josten

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
OF THE
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

R. BRUCE JOSTEN
EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT
GOVERNMENT AFFAIRS

1615 H STREET, N.W.
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20062-2000
202/463-5310

September 21, 2001

To Members of the U.S. Senate:

I am writing on behalf of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the world's larget business federation, representing more than three million businesses and organizations of every size, sector, and region, to commend you for your prompt efforts to assist the airline industry as well as the victims of the tragic events of September 11, 2001. The continued viability of the airline industry is critical to the American public, economy and national defense. Unfortunately, I must also voice serious concerns about the liability provisions of the Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act of 2001.

Specifically, we are concerned that the bill will have dramatic and negative unintended consequences on the entire business community, possibly spawning litigation against many other parties including the manufacturer of the aircraft involved, suppliers of components for the aircrafts, the lessors of the aircraft, anyone with interests in the area of the crashes, and the insurers of any of these parties. While we share the goal of assisting the airline industry during this time of crisis, the liability provisions of the legislation are incomplete and may create a flood of litigation arising out of the horrible events of last week, delaying compensation to deserving parties.

Accordingly, we strongly urge you to carefully consider the liability limitation provisions of the legislation and make clear that they apply to all affected parties and not just those related to the airline industry. If, however, you are unable to make these changes at this time, we strongly urge you to commit to readdressing the liability aspects within the next few weeks.

Sincerely,

R. Bruce Josten

Source: All Sources > Federal Legal - U.S. > USCS - United States Code Service; Code, Const, Rules, Conventions & Public Laws
Terms: airline stabilization and liability and date(aft 9-15-2001) (Edit Search)

*107 P.L. 42, ; 115 Stat. 230;
2001 Enacted H.R. 2926; 107 Enacted H.R. 2926

UNITED STATES PUBLIC LAWS
107th Congress -- 1st Session
(c) 2001, LEXIS-NEXIS, A DIVISION OF REED ELSEVIER INC. AND REED ELSEVIER PROPERTIES INC.

PUBLIC LAW 107-42 [H.R. 2926]
SEPT. 22, 2001

107 P.L. 42; 115 Stat. 230; 2001 Enacted H.R. 2926; 107 Enacted H.R. 2926

RELATED NEWS SEARCH: ◆ 107 P.L. 42
BILL TRACKING REPORT: ◆ 107 Bill Tracking H.R. 2926
FULL TEXT VERSION(S) OF BILL: ◆ 107 H.R. 2926

An Act

To preserve the continued viability of the United States air transportation system.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled ,

[*1] SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act".

TITLE I--AIRLINE STABILIZATION

[*101] SEC. 101.--AVIATION DISASTER RELIEF.

(a) In General.--Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the President shall take the following actions to compensate air carriers for losses incurred by the air carriers as a result of the terrorist attacks on the United States that occurred on September 11, 2001:

(1) Subject to such terms and conditions as the President deems necessary, issue Federal credit instruments to air carriers that do not, in the aggregate, exceed $ 10,000,000,000 and provide the subsidy amounts necessary for such instruments in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Credit Reform Act of 1990 (2 U.S.C. 661 et seq.).

(2) Compensate air carriers in an aggregate amount equal to $ 5,000,000,000 for--

(A) direct losses incurred beginning on September 11, 2001, by air carriers as a result of any Federal ground stop order issued by the Secretary of Transportation or any subsequent order which continues or renews such a stoppage; and

(B) the incremental losses incurred beginning September 11, 2001, and ending December 31, 2001, by air carriers as a direct result of such attacks.

(b) Emergency Designation.--Congress designates the amount of new budget authority and outlays in all fiscal years resulting from this title as an emergency requirement pursuant to section 252(e) of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 (2 U.S.C.

REV_00261298

losses; and

(ii) the amount of compensation to which the claimant is entitled based on the harm to the claimant, the facts of the claim, and the individual circumstances of the claimant.

(2) Negligence.-- With respect to a claimant, the Special Master shall not consider negligence or any other theory of liability.

(3) Determination.-- Not later than 120 days after that date on which a claim is filed under subsection (a), the Special Master shall complete a review, make a determination, and provide written notice to the claimant, with respect to the matters that were the subject of the claim under review. Such a determination shall be final and not subject to judicial review.

(4) Rights of claimant.-- A claimant in a review under paragraph (1) shall have--

(A) the right to be represented by an attorney;

(B) the right to present evidence, including the presentation of witnesses and documents; and

(C) any other due process rights determined appropriate by the Special Master.

(5) No punitive damages.-- The Special Master may not include amounts for punitive damages in any compensation paid under a claim under this title.

(6) Collateral compensation.-- The Special Master shall reduce the amount of compensation determined under paragraph (1)(B)(ii) by the amount of the collateral source compensation the claimant has received or is entitled to receive as a result of the terrorist-related aircraft crashes of September 11, 2001.

(c) Eligibility.--

(1) In general.-- A claimant shall be determined to be an eligible individual for purposes of this subsection if the Special Master determines that such claimant--

(A) is an individual described in paragraph (2); and

(B) meets the requirements of paragraph (3).

(2) Individuals.-- A claimant is an individual described in this paragraph if the claimant is--

(A) an individual who--

(i) was present at the World Trade Center, (New York, New York), the Pentagon (Arlington, Virginia), or the site of the aircraft crash at Shanksville, Pennsylvania at the time, or in the immediate aftermath, of the terrorist-related aircraft crashes of September 11, 2001; and

(ii) suffered physical harm or death as a result of such an air crash;

(B) an individual who was a member of the flight crew or a passenger on American Airlines flight 11 or 77 or United Airlines flight 93 or 175, except that an individual identified by the Attorney General to have been a participant or conspirator in the terrorist-related aircraft crashes of September 11, 2001, or a representative of such individual shall not be eligible to receive compensation under this title; or

(C) in the case of a decedent who is an individual described in subparagraph (A) or (B), the personal representative of the decedent who files a claim on behalf of the decedent.

(3) Requirements.----

(A) Single claim.--Not more than one claim may be submitted under this title by an individual or on behalf of a deceased individual.

(B) Limitation on civil action.--

(i) In general.--Upon the submission of a claim under this title, the claimant waives the right to file a civil action (or to be a party to an action) in any Federal or State court for damages sustained as a result of the terrorist-related aircraft crashes of September 11, 2001. The preceding sentence does not apply to a civil action to recover collateral source obligations.

(ii) Pending actions.--In the case of an individual who is a party to a civil action described in clause (i), such individual may not submit a claim under this title unless such individual withdraws from such action by the date that is 90 days after the date on which regulations are promulgated under section 407.

[*406] SEC. 406. PAYMENTS TO ELIGIBLE INDIVIDUALS.

(a) In General.--Not later than 20 days after the date on which a determination is made by the Special Master regarding the amount of compensation due a claimant under this title, the Special Master shall authorize payment to such claimant of the amount determined with respect to the claimant.

(b) Payment Authority.--This title constitutes budget authority in advance of appropriations Acts and represents the obligation of the Federal Government to provide for the payment of amounts for compensation under this title.

(c) Additional Funding.--

(1) In general.-- The Attorney General is authorized to accept such amounts as may be contributed by individuals, business concerns, or other entities to carry out this title, under such terms and conditions as the Attorney General may impose.

(2) Use of separate account.-- In making payments under this section, amounts contained in any account containing funds provided under paragraph (1) shall be used prior to using appropriated amounts.

[*407] SEC. 407. REGULATIONS.

Not later than 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Attorney General, in consultation with the Special Master, shall promulgate regulations to carry out this title, including regulations with respect to--

(1) forms to be used in submitting claims under this title;

(2) the information to be included in such forms;

(3) procedures for hearing and the presentation of evidence;

(4) procedures to assist an individual in filing and pursuing claims under this title; and

REV_00261308

(5) other matters determined appropriate by the Attorney General.

[*408] SEC. 408. LIMITATION ON AIR CARRIER LIABILITY.

(a) In General.--Notwithstanding any other provision of law, liability for all claims, whether for compensatory or punitive damages, arising from the terrorist-related aircraft crashes of September 11, 2001, against any air carrier shall not be in an amount greater than the limits of the liability coverage maintained by the air carrier.

(b) Federal Cause of Action.--

(1) Availability of action.-- There shall exist a Federal cause of action for damages arising out of the hijacking and subsequent crashes of American Airlines flights 11 and 77, and United Airlines flights 93 and 175, on September 11, 2001. Notwithstanding section 40120(c) of title 49, United States Code, this cause of action shall be the exclusive remedy for damages arising out of the hijacking and subsequent crashes of such flights.

(2) Substantive law.-- The substantive law for decision in any such suit shall be derived from the law, including choice of law principles, of the State in which the crash occurred unless such law is inconsistent with or preempted by Federal law.

(3) Jurisdiction.-- The United States District Court for the Southern District of New York shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction over all actions brought for any claim (including any claim for loss of property, personal injury, or death) resulting from or relating to the terrorist-related aircraft crashes of September 11, 2001.

(c) Exclusion.--Nothing in this section shall in any way limit any liability of any person who is a knowing participant in any conspiracy to hijack any aircraft or commit any terrorist act.

[*409] SEC. 409. RIGHT OF SUBROGATION.

The United States shall have the right of subrogation with respect to any claim paid by the United States under this title.

TITLE V--AIR TRANSPORTATION SAFETY

[*501] SEC. 501.--INCREASED AIR TRANSPORTATION SAFETY.

Congress affirms the President's decision to spend $ 3,000,000,000 on airline safety and security in conjunction with this Act in order to restore public confidence in the airline industry.

[*502] SEC. 502. CONGRESSIONAL COMMITMENT.

Congress is committed to act expeditiously, in consultation with the Secretary of Transportation, to strengthen airport security and take further measures to enhance the security of air travel.

TITLE VI--SEPARABILITY

[*601] SEC. 601.--SEPARABILITY.

If any provision of this Act (including any amendment made by this Act) or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of this Act (including any amendment made by this Act) and the application thereof to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

REV_00261309

Speaker of the House of Representatives.
Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

Source: All Sources > Federal Legal - U.S. > USCS - United States Code Service; Code, Const, Rules, Conventions & Public Laws
Terms: airline stabilization and liability and date(aft 9-15-2001) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, September 26, 2001 - 11:19 AM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

901(e)). Such amount shall be available only to the extent that a request, that includes designation of such amount as an emergency requirement as defined in such Act, is transmitted by the President to Congress.

[*102] SEC. 102. AIR TRANSPORTATION STABILIZATION BOARD.

(a) Definitions.--In this section, the following definitions apply:

(1) Board.-- The term "Board" means the Air Transportation Stabilization Board established under subsection (b).

(2) Financial obligation.-- The term "financial obligation" means any note, bond, debenture, or other debt obligation issued by an obligor in connection with financing under this section and section 101(a)(1).

(3) Lender.-- The term "lender" means any non-Federal qualified institutional buyer (as defined by section 230.144A(a) of title 17, Code of Federal Regulations (or any successor regulation) known as Rule 144A(a) of the Securities and Exchange Commission and issued under the Security Act of 1933, including--

(A) a qualified retirement plan (as defined in section 4974(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (26 U.S.C. 4974(c)) that is a qualified institutional buyer; and

(B) a governmental plan (as defined in section 414(d) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (26 U.S.C. 414(d)) that is a qualified institutional buyer.

(4) Obligor.-- The term "obligor" means a party primarily liable for payment of the principal of or interest on a Federal credit instrument, which party may be a corporation, partnership, joint venture, trust, or governmental entity, agency, or instrumentality.

(b) Air Transportation Stabilization Board.--

(1) Establishment.-- There is established a board (to be known as the "Air Transportation Stabilization Board") to review and decide on applications for Federal credit instruments under section 101(a)(1).

(2) Composition.-- The Board shall consist of--

(A) the Secretary of Transportation or the designee of the Secretary;

(B) the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, or the designee of the Chairman, who shall be the Chair of the Board;

(C) the Secretary of the Treasury or the designee of the Secretary; and

(D) the Comptroller General of the United States, or the designee of the Comptroller General, as a nonvoting member of the Board.

(c) Federal Credit Instruments.--

(1) In general.-- The Board may enter into agreements with 1 or more obligors to issue Federal credit instruments under section 101(a)(1) if the Board determines, in its discretion, that--

(A) the obligor is an air carrier for which credit is not reasonably available at the time of the transaction;

(B) the intended obligation by the obligor is prudently incurred; and

(C) such agreement is a necessary part of maintaining a safe, efficient, and viable commercial aviation system in the United States.

(2) Terms and limitations.----

(A) Forms; terms and conditions.--A Federal credit instrument shall be issued under section 101(a)(1) in such form and on such terms and conditions and contain such covenants, representatives, warranties, and requirements (including requirements for audits) as the Board determines appropriate.

(B) Procedures.--Not later than 14 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall issue regulations setting forth procedures for application and minimum requirements, which may be supplemented by the Board in its discretion, for the issuance of Federal credit instruments under section 101(a)(1).

(d) Financial Protection of Government.--

(1) In general.-- To the extent feasible and practicable, the Board shall ensure that the Government is compensated for the risk assumed in making guarantees under this title.

(2) Government participation in gains.-- To the extent to which any participating corporation accepts financial assistance, in the form of accepting the proceeds of any loans guaranteed by the Government under this title, the Board is authorized to enter into contracts under which the Government, contingent on the financial success of the participating corporation, would participate in the gains of the participating corporation or its security holders through the use of such instruments as warrants, stock options, common or preferred stock, or other appropriate equity instruments.

(3) Deposit in treasury.-- All amounts collected by the Secretary of the Treasury under this subsection shall be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

[*103] SEC. 103. SPECIAL RULES FOR COMPENSATION.

(a) Documentation.--Subject to subsection (b), the amount of compensation payable to an air carrier under section 101(a)(2) may not exceed the amount of losses described in section 101(a)(2) that the air carrier demonstrates to the satisfaction of the President, using sworn financial statements or other appropriate data, that the air carrier incurred. The Secretary of Transportation and the Comptroller General of the United States may audit such statements and may request any information that the Secretary and the Comptroller General deems necessary to conduct such audit.

(b) Maximum Amount of Compensation Payable Per Air Carrier.--The maximum total amount of compensation payable to an air carrier under section 101(a)(2) may not exceed the lesser of--

(1) the amount of such air carrier's direct and incremental losses described in section 101 (a)(2); or

(2) in the case of--

(A) flights involving passenger-only or combined passenger and cargo transportation, the product of--

(i) $ 4,500,000,000; and

(ii) the ratio of--

(I) the available seat miles of the air carrier for the month of August 2001 as reported to the Secretary; to

(II) the total available seat miles of all such air carriers for such month as reported to the Secretary; and

(B) flights involving cargo-only transportation, the product of--

(i) $ 500,000,000; and

(ii) the ratio of--

(I) the revenue ton miles or other auditable measure of the air carrier for cargo for the latest quarter for which data is available as reported to the Secretary; to

(II) the total revenue ton miles or other auditable measure of all such air carriers for cargo for such quarter as reported to the Secretary.

(c) Payments.--The President may provide compensation to air carriers under section 101(a)(2) in 1 or more payments up to the amount authorized by this title.

[*104] SEC. 104. LIMITATION ON CERTAIN EMPLOYEE COMPENSATION.

(a) In General.--The President may only issue a Federal credit instrument under section 101(a)(1) to an air carrier after the air carrier enters into a legally binding agreement with the President that, during the 2-year period beginning September 11, 2001, and ending September 11, 2003, no officer or employee of the air carrier whose total compensation exceeded $ 300,000 in calendar year 2000 (other than an employee whose compensation is determined through an existing collective bargaining agreement entered into prior to September 11, 2001)--

(1) will receive from the air carrier total compensation which exceeds, during any 12 consecutive months of such 2-year period, the total compensation received by the officer or employee from the air carrier in calendar year 2000; and

(2) will receive from the air carrier severance pay or other benefits upon termination of employment with the air carrier which exceeds twice the maximum total compensation received by the officer or employee from the air carrier in calendar year 2000.

(b) Total Compensation Defined.--In this section, the term "total compensation" includes salary, bonuses, awards of stock, and other financial benefits provided by an air carrier to an officer or employee of the air carrier.

[*105] SEC. 105. CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN AIR SERVICE.

(a) Action of Secretary.--The Secretary of Transportation should take appropriate action to ensure that all communities that had scheduled air service before September 11, 2001, continue to receive adequate air transportation service and that essential air service to small communities continues without interruption.

(b) Essential Air Service.--There is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary to carry out the essential air service program under subchapter II of chapter 417 of title 49, United States Code, $ 120,000,000 for fiscal year 2002.

REV_00261301

(c) Secretarial Oversight.--

(1) In general.-- Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary is authorized to require an air carrier receiving direct financial assistance under this Act to maintain scheduled air service to any point served by that carrier before September 11, 2001.

(2) Agreements.-- In applying paragraph (1), the Secretary may require air carriers receiving direct financial assistance under this Act to enter into agreements which will ensure, to the maximum extent practicable, that all communities that had scheduled air service before September 11, 2001, continue to receive adequate air transportation service.

[*106] SEC. 106. REPORTS.

(a) Report.--Not later than February 1, 2001, the President shall transmit to the Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure, the Committee on Appropriations, and the Committee on the Budget of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, the Committee on Appropriations, and the Committee on the Budget of the Senate a report on the financial status of the air carrier industry and the amounts of assistance provided under this title to each air carrier.

(b) Update.--Not later than the last day of the 7-month period following the date of enactment of this Act, the President shall update and transmit the report to the Committees.

[*107] SEC. 107. DEFINITIONS.

In this title, the following definitions apply:

(1) Air carrier.-- The term "air carrier" has the meaning such term has under section 40102 of title 49, United States Code.

(2) Federal credit instrument.-- The term "Federal credit instrument" means any guarantee or other pledge by the Board issued under section 101(a)(1) to pledge the full faith and credit of the United States to pay all or part of any of the principal of and interest on a loan or other debt obligation issued by an obligor and funded by a lender.

(3) Incremental loss.-- The term "incremental loss" does not include any loss that the President determines would have been incurred if the terrorist attacks on the United States that occurred on September 11, 2001, had not occurred.

TITLE II--AVIATION INSURANCE

[*201] SEC. 201.--DOMESTIC INSURANCE AND REIMBURSEMENT OF INSURANCE COSTS.

(a) In General.--Section 44302 of title 49, United States Code, is amended--

(1) in subsection (a)(1)--

(A) by striking "subsection (b)" and inserting "subsection (c)"; and

(B) by striking "foreign-flag aircraft--" and all that follows through the period at the end of subparagraph (B) and inserting "foreign-flag aircraft.";

(2) by redesignating subsections (b), (c), and (d) as subsections (c), (d), and (e), respectively;

(3) by inserting after subsection (a) the following:

"(b) Reimbursement of Insurance Cost Increases.--

"(1) In general.-- The Secretary may reimburse an air carrier for the increase in the cost of insurance, with respect to a premium for coverage ending before October 1, 2002, against loss or damage arising out of any risk from the operation of an American aircraft over the insurance premium that was in effect for a comparable operation during the period beginning September 4, 2001, and ending September 10, 2001, as the Secretary may determine. Such reimbursement is subject to subsections (a)(2), (c), and (d) of this section and to section 44303.

"(2) Payment from revolving fund.-- A reimbursement under this subsection shall be paid from the revolving fund established by section 44307.

"(3) Further conditions.-- The Secretary may impose such further conditions on insurance for which the increase in premium is subject to reimbursement under this subsection as the Secretary may deem appropriate in the interest of air commerce.

"(4) Termination of authority.-- The authority to reimburse air carriers under this subsection shall expire 180 days after the date of enactment of this paragraph.";

(4) in subsection (c) (as so redesignated)--

(A) in the first sentence by inserting ", or reimburse an air carrier under subsection (b) of this section," before "only with the approval"; and

(B) in the second sentence--

(i) by inserting "or the reimbursement" before "only after deciding"; and

(ii) by inserting "in the interest of air commerce or national security or" before "to carry out the foreign policy"; and

(5) in subsection (d) (as so redesignated) by inserting "or reimbursing an air carrier" before "under this chapter".

(b) Coverage.--

(1) In general.-- Section 44303 of such title is amended--

(A) in the matter preceding paragraph (1) by inserting ", or reimburse insurance costs, as" after "insurance and reinsurance"; and

(B) in paragraph (1) by inserting "in the interest of air commerce or national security or" before "to carry out the foreign policy".

(2) Discretion of the secretary.-- For acts of terrorism committed on or to an air carrier during the 180-day period following the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Transportation may certify that the air carrier was a victim of an act of terrorism and in the Secretary's judgment, based on the Secretary's analysis and conclusions regarding the facts and circumstances of each case, shall not be responsible for losses suffered by third parties (as referred to in section 205.5(b)(1) of title 14, Code of Federal Regulations) that exceed $ 100,000,000, in the aggregate, for all claims by such parties arising out of such act. If the Secretary so certifies, the air carrier shall not be liable for an amount that exceeds $ 100,000,000, in the aggregate, for all claims by such parties arising out of such act, and the Government shall be responsible for any liability above such amount. No punitive damages may be awarded against an air carrier (or the Government taking responsibility for an air carrier under this paragraph) under a cause of action arising out of such act.

REV_00261303

(c) Reinsurance.--Section 44304 of such title is amended--

(1) by striking "(a) General Authority.--"; and

(2) by striking subsection (b).

(d) Premiums.--Section 44306 of such title is amended--

(1) by redesignating subsections (b) and (c) as subsections (c) and (d), respectively; and

(2) by inserting after subsection (a) the following:

"(b) Allowances in Setting Premium Rates for Reinsurance.--In setting premium rates for reinsurance, the Secretary may make allowances to the insurance carrier for expenses incurred in providing services and facilities that the Secretary considers good business practices, except for payments by the air carrier for the stimulation or solicitation of insurance business.".

(e) Conforming Amendment.--Section 44305(b) of such title is amended by striking "44302 (b)" and inserting "44302(c)".

[*202] SEC. 202. EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS TO VENDORS, AGENTS, AND SUBCONTRACTORS OF AIR CARRIERS.

Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, the Secretary may extend any provision of chapter 443 of title 49, United States Code, as amended by this title, and the provisions of this title, to vendors, agents, and subcontractors of air carriers. For the 180-day period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary may extend or amend any such provisions so as to ensure that the entities referred to in the preceding sentence are not responsible in cases of acts of terrorism for losses suffered by third parties that exceed the amount of such entities' liability coverage, as determined by the Secretary.

TITLE III--TAX PROVISIONS

[*301] SEC. 301.--EXTENSION OF DUE DATE FOR EXCISE TAX DEPOSITS; TREATMENT OF LOSS COMPENSATION.

(a) Extension of Due Date for Excise Tax Deposits.--

(1) In general.-- In the case of an eligible air carrier, any airline-related deposit required under section 6302 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to be made after September 10, 2001, and before November 15, 2001, shall be treated for purposes of such Code as timely made if such deposit is made on or before November 15, 2001. If the Secretary of the Treasury so prescribes, the preceding sentence shall be applied by substituting for "November 15, 2001" each place it appears--

(A) "January 15, 2002"; or

(B) such earlier date after November 15, 2001, as such Secretary may prescribe.

(2) Eligible air carrier.-- For purposes of this subsection, the term "eligible air carrier" means any domestic corporation engaged in the trade or business of transporting (for hire) persons by air if such transportation is available to the general public.

(3) Airline-related deposit.-- For purposes of this subsection, the term "airline-related deposit" means any deposit of--

REV_00261304

(A) taxes imposed by subchapter C of chapter 33 of such Code (relating to transportation by air); and

(B) taxes imposed by chapters 21, 22, and 24 with respect to employees engaged in a trade or business referred to in paragraph (2).

(b) Treatment of Loss Compensation.--Nothing in any provision of law shall be construed to exclude from gross income under the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 any compensation received under section 101(a)(2) of this Act.

TITLE IV--VICTIM COMPENSATION

[*401] SEC. 401.--SHORT TITLE.

This title may be cited as the "September 11th Victim Compensation Fund of 2001".

[*402] SEC. 402. DEFINITIONS.

In this title, the following definitions apply:

(1) Air carrier.-- The term "air carrier" means a citizen of the United States undertaking by any means, directly or indirectly, to provide air transportation and includes employees and agents of such citizen.

(2) Air transportation.-- The term "air transportation" means foreign air transportation, interstate air transportation, or the transportation of mail by aircraft.

(3) Claimant.-- The term "claimant" means an individual filing a claim for compensation under section 405(a)(1).

(4) Collateral source.-- The term "collateral source" means all collateral sources, including life insurance, pension funds, death benefit programs, and payments by Federal, State, or local governments related to the terrorist-related aircraft crashes of September 11, 2001.

(5) Economic loss.-- The term "economic loss" means any pecuniary loss resulting from harm (including the loss of earnings or other benefits related to employment, medical expense loss, replacement services loss, loss due to death, burial costs, and loss of business or employment opportunities) to the extent recovery for such loss is allowed under applicable State law.

(6) Eligible individual.-- The term "eligible individual" means an individual determined to be eligible for compensation under section 405(c).

(7) Noneconomic losses.-- The term "noneconomic losses" means losses for physical and emotional pain, suffering, inconvenience, physical impairment, mental anguish, disfigurement, loss of enjoyment of life, loss of society and companionship, loss of consortium (other than loss of domestic service), hedonic damages, injury to reputation, and all other nonpecuniary losses of any kind or nature.

(8) Special master.-- The term "Special Master" means the Special Master appointed under section 404(a).

[*403] SEC. 403. PURPOSE.

It is the purpose of this title to provide compensation to any individual (or relatives of a deceased individual) who was physically injured or killed as a result of the terrorist-related aircraft crashes of September 11, 2001.

REV_00261305

[*404] SEC. 404. ADMINISTRATION.

(a) In General.--The Attorney General, acting through a Special Master appointed by the Attorney General, shall--

(1) administer the compensation program established under this title;

(2) promulgate all procedural and substantive rules for the administration of this title; and

(3) employ and supervise hearing officers and other administrative personnel to perform the duties of the Special Master under this title.

(b) Authorization of Appropriations.--There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to pay the administrative and support costs for the Special Master in carrying out this title.

[*405] SEC. 405. DETERMINATION OF ELIGIBILITY FOR COMPENSATION.

(a) Filing of Claim.--

(1) In general.-- A claimant may file a claim for compensation under this title with the Special Master. The claim shall be on the form developed under paragraph (2) and shall state the factual basis for eligibility for compensation and the amount of compensation sought.

(2) Claim form.----

(A) In general.--The Special Master shall develop a claim form that claimants shall use when submitting claims under paragraph (1). The Special Master shall ensure that such form can be filed electronically, if determined to be practicable.

(B) Contents.--The form developed under subparagraph (A) shall request--

(i) information from the claimant concerning the physical harm that the claimant suffered, or in the case of a claim filed on behalf of a decedent information confirming the decedent's death, as a result of the terrorist-related aircraft crashes of September 11, 2001;

(ii) information from the claimant concerning any possible economic and noneconomic losses that the claimant suffered as a result of such crashes; and

(iii) information regarding collateral sources of compensation the claimant has received or is entitled to receive as a result of such crashes.

(3) Limitation.-- No claim may be filed under paragraph (1) after the date that is 2 years after the date on which regulations are promulgated under section 407.

(b) Review and Determination.--

(1) Review.-- The Special Master shall review a claim submitted under subsection (a) and determine--

(A) whether the claimant is an eligible individual under subsection (c);

(B) with respect to a claimant determined to be an eligible individual--

(i) the extent of the harm to the claimant, including any economic and noneconomic

Council of Economic Advisers
November 15, 2001

Macroeconomic Consequences of Interrupting Terrorist Risk Insurance

- The absence of insurance coverage for terrorism risks will likely reduce the willingness of lenders to provide financing for existing commercial structures.
    - The result will look like a "credit crunch."
    - The credit crunch of 1990-1991 – in which the aggregate value of existing structures fell by about $320 billion – provides one guide to the likely effect.
    - To be conservative, assume that one-half (or five percent) of the decline in value was due to the credit crunch.
    - A comparable reduction today would be roughly $200 billion in the value of corporate real estate, occurring shortly after the January 1, 2002 expiration of existing contracts.
- The lack of availability of terrorist risk insurance would also likely deter construction of new projects.
    - Again, using 1990-1991 as a guide, we estimate that the level of construction in non-residential structures would decline roughly $10 billion (at annual rates) over the four quarters of 2002.
- The impact triggers an overall reduction in 2002 GDP of 0.3 percentage point.
    - The reduced growth rate of GDP is equal to 0.8 percentage point in the first quarter of 2002, 0.7 percentage point in the second quarter of 2002, and diminishing thereafter.
        - The source of the decline is that the decline in asset values reduces the consumption purchases of the household sector.
        - In addition, lower valuations reduce the incentive to invest in new structures. This effect reinforces the liquidity effects noted above. The net effect is a reduced path for investment in non-residential structures.

Example of a $50 Billion Terrorist Event

A $50 billion event would be similar in scale to the World Trade Center attacks, which are estimated to have caused losses to commercial property and casualty insurers in the neighborhood of $40 billion. To walk through how this proposal would handle such an event, this document analyzes the outcomes through the three ranges of the program: The first $10 billion industry retention, the $10-25 billion policyholder surcharge, and the $25-50 billion government/industry cost sharing.

Assumptions: This analysis assumes that the event affects the 25 largest gross primary insurers (the World Trade Center attack affected 24 primary insurers). The American Insurance Association data that was available for strictly commercial lines only gives per-company information for net written premiums. Using this data does not indicate a preference for using net versus gross premiums.

$10 Billion Industry Retention: The first $10 billion will be borne by industry. The affected insurers (the 25 largest) have net commercial premiums of $79.2 billion. Thus, if the per-company cap of 6% is reached for all companies, the affected companies will pay, in total, $4.75 billion. This leaves $5.25 billion to be advanced by Treasury. To recapture the $5.25 billion from the industry as a whole, which has $134.3 billion in premiums, would require companies to pay an amount roughly equal to 4% of their annual premiums (3.91%). The Treasury, which would have the authority on how to structure these payments, could require each firm to pay 1% per year over 4 years.

$10-25 Billion Policyholder Surcharge: The next $15 billion will be advanced by the government and then recouped by a surcharge on all policyholders. Treasury has discretion over form, size, and timing of the surcharge. To recoup $15 billion in 1 year, the Treasury would have to levy an 11.2% surcharge. The Treasury could choose to stretch the collection process over 10 years, leaving an annual surcharge of 1.12%. It should be noted that this actually overstates the amount of surcharge needed, as over time, the amount of premiums written can be expected to grow.

$25-50 Billion Government/Industry Cost Sharing: Of the remaining $25 billion, ninety percent ($22.5 billion) will come directly from the government. The remaining ten percent ($2.5 billion) could be paid by three possible sources: policyholders, industry as a whole, or the affected companies. This considers all three options:

Policyholders: Treasury would advance the $2.5 billion to the affected companies and recoup it through an added surcharge on all policyholders. To recoup this over one year an additional surcharge of 1.8% would be required. Conforming with the previous assumption, Treasury could charge .18% per year over ten years. This would bring the total surcharge to 1.3% per year over three years. Note, this is an overestimate due to expected growth in premiums.

Industry as a whole: Treasury would advance the $2.5 billion to the affected companies and recoup it through an added assessment on all insurance companies. A 1.8% assessment would be needed to recoup the $2.5 billion over 1 year. Spreading this out over 4 years would result in a .45% additional assessment. This would bring the total assessment for the entire event for all companies to 1.45% per year over 4 years.

Affected Companies: The affected companies would be obliged to pay the $2.5 billion industry share of losses in proportion to each company's share of the insured losses.

Pass HR 3210
Keep the Wheels of American Commerce Turning

Don't let terrorists hobble the U.S. economy. We need legislation to create a federal backstop for terrorism insurance immediately.

Airports Council International – North America Alliance of American Insurers Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers
American Association of Airport Executives American Bankers Association
American Bankers Insurance Association American Council for Capital Formation American Council of Independent Laboratories American Insurance Association
American Iron & Steel Institute
American Resort Development Association
American Road & Transportation Builders Association American Nursery & Landscape Association
American Society of Association Executives American Tort Reform Association American Trucking Associations
America's Community Bankers
APICS, the Educational Society for Resource Management Associated Builders and Contractors
Associated General Contractors of America Association of American Railroads Association of Financial Guaranty Insurors Building Owners and Managers Association
The Business Roundtable Club Managers Association of America
Commercial Mortgage Securities Association Community Associations Institute
Consumer Bankers Association
Consumer Mortgage Coalition
Council of Growing Companies Council of Insurance Agents and Brokers
Edison Electric Institute
Electronic Financial Services Association Electronic Retailing Association
Electronic Representatives Association International Financial Services Roundtable Greater Washington Society of Association Executives Hotel Association of New York City, Inc.
Illinois State Chamber of Commerce Independent Insurance Agents of America Institute of Real Estate Management International Association of Amusement Parks and Attractions International Council of Shopping Centers International Dairy Foods Association International Franchise Association Interstate Natural Gas Association of America Manufactured Housing Institute
Mortgage Bankers Association of America Motion Picture Association of America National Apartment Association
National Association of Chain Drug Stores
National Association of Home Builders National Association of Independent Insurers National Association of Industrial & Office Properties
National Association of Manufacturers
National Association of Mutual Insurance Companies National Association of Professional Insurance Agents National Association of Real Estate Investment Trusts
National Association of Realtors National Council of Chain Restaurants
National Court Reporters Association
National Food Processors Association
National Lumber and Building Materials Dealers Association National Marine Manufacturers Association
National Multi Housing Council
National Petrochemical & Refiners Association
National Retail Federation
National Tank Truck Carriers, Inc.
The New England Council
Nuclear Energy Institute
Outdoor Power Equipment Aftermarket Association Printing Industries Association of America, Inc.
Portland Cement Association
Real Estate Board of New York
The Real Estate Roundtable
Reinsurance Association of America
Reserve Officers Association
Society of American Florists
Truck Renting and Leasing Association
United States Chamber of Commerce
United States Telecom Association
Yellow Pages Publishers Association

WSJ
10/10/01

REVIEW & OUTLOOK

War Profiteers

Things must be getting back to normal: There's litigation in the air. Yesterday the Supreme Court denied an appeal from Microsoft, which means that the case will continue to work its way through the lower courts. At the same time, the High Court shut down an effort to reverse a state ban on cities suing gun manufacturers over crime costs. Meanwhile, the trial lawyers are crossing their hearts and hoping everyone believes they have no intention of litigating liability for the World Trade Center attack.

The day after the worst atrocity on American home soil, trial lawyers association president Leo V. Boyle posted a letter on the group's Web site titled "A National Tragedy." For "the first time in our history," Mr. Boyle announced, "the Association of Trial Lawyers of America, in this time of national crisis, urges a moratorium on civil lawsuits that might arise out of these awful events."

Oh, bravo. Now, we don't question their horror at the attack. But if our tort warriors really wanted to demonstrate solidarity with the nation—and especially with those families whose loved ones were buried in the rubble of lower Manhattan—a pledge to accept a reform limiting outrageous fees would be more persuasive than a moratorium with no real meaning. Especially when they can count on friends in Congress to protect their core interests. Does anyone believe that Tom Daschle and Richard Gephardt didn't know exactly what they were doing when they made sure that the airline bailout bill that ended up going before both their Houses wasn't the one that would have limited attorneys fees?

The lost passage we refer to appears in the version of the bill introduced by Rep. Don Young (R., Ark.). It reads as follows: "ATTORNEY FEES.—Reasonable attorneys fees for work performed in any action commenced pursuant in this section shall be subject to the discretion of the court, but in no event shall any attorney charge, demand, receive, or collect for services rendered, fees in excess of 25% of the damages ordered by the court to be paid pursuant to this section." Contingency fees, of course, normally scale up from 33%.

With airlines desperate for cash and warning of imminent bankruptcies, it wasn't likely in any event that the bill was going to get held up over lawyers fees. Now any future claimants have two choices: Either sue in federal court in New York, or submit a claim to a federal compensation fund to be administered by a special master appointed by the Attorney General—and give up the right to sue.

The devil . . . er, the plaintiffs bar . . . is in the details.

ATLA says it is encouraging people to take the administrative route and has set up a program to provide pro bono representation for those in need. But because no one knows what the criteria or award levels will be, victims and their families not in immediate need of money will likely hang back until they see what's what—one reason a moratorium has little significance now. After all, claimants have two years to file. And whatever pious advisories ATLA might send its members, they're still free to do what comes naturally.

This is all the more reason to try to rescue some good from the wreckage by applying a reform endorsed by George W. Bush in the campaign: Redefine the fee relationship between a tort lawyer and his client as a fiduciary one. A version of this principle already operates in so-called securities cases. Here, lawyers fees are determined by the lodestar method: They submit bills detailing the hours they worked, which a court then multiplies by a reasonable rate that factors in a measure of the risk involved. Not only would such a reform ensure that money from this tragedy go to widows and orphans rather than their attorneys; it would set a badly needed example for all future mass tort claims. Courts are still dealing with cases from the 1993 World Trade Center bombing.

Tort lawyers, of course, shrink from the sunshine of hourly rates. They'd be loath to abandon the percentage-of-the-take arrangement, which can translate into hourly rates of tens of thousands of dollars. It strikes us that behind ATLA's counsels of restraint lurks an understanding that theirs is not the kind of business that would show very well in the public spotlight of this particular crisis.

All the more reason to address the issue head-on, with clarifying legislation if necessary and administratively where possible. We would think, for example, that a ruling on reasonable fees would be one of the first issues a special master for the September 11 attacks would address, especially for a largely administrative process where no one has to prove causation. And if the master does limit fees on the administrative side, it becomes even more important to have them limited on the courtroom option, so that attorneys advising their clients which road to take do so without a strong personal incentive to sue.

ATLA's pronouncements of self-restraint notwithstanding, the fact that their Congressional partners deep-sixed any limitations on legal fees in the airline bailout bill tells us that some folks want this door kept ajar. If only on the principle of helping those who have a hard time helping themselves, we'd sure like to know if we could count on ATLA's support for some supplemental legislation making it harder for the lawyers to stick their hands into the pockets of the victims.

PROJECT FOR INTERNATIONAL RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Michael J. Horowitz
Director

MEMO

December 3, 2001

TO: INTERESTED PARTIES
RE: Tort Reform and the Insurance/Terrorism Bill
FROM: Michael Horowitz MH

Having neither seen the House bill nor learned of its House floor timetable, I discovered that the House was actually voting on the bill while discussing its need for a lodestar/multiplier provision with a key House staffer, Jeff Emerson.

Had I known of the legislative timetable I would have been in touch with many of you both earlier and on a more urgent basis. More importantly, had I looked at a copy of the House bill itself, I would have been able to suggest a much easier legislative fix than the lengthy and somewhat complicated one I've previously circulated to most of you.

The legislative fix that I hope can ultimately be made would substitute the following language for the "reasonable fees . . . not in excess of 20 percent" cap of Section 15(a)(7) of the House bill:

> "reasonable fees ... payable on a lodestar multiplier basis as awarded in shareholder cases."

That's it -- all that needs to be done to create a precedent of extraordinary value, and to block tort lawyers from receiving unethical fees likely to aggregate to billions of dollars in the terrorism cases covered by the House bill.

1015 18th Street, N.W., Suite 300, Washington, DC 20036
202-223-9200 Fax: 202-223-8537

Had lodestar/multiplier language been put before the Financial Services Committee or House on a timely basis, I believe that it rather than a 20% cap reform would have been adopted. But this is water under the bridge, and I'm writing to discuss what can be still done to achieve this critical outcome.

Step One: Because the tort provisions in the substitute bill passed by the House (HR 3210) differ from the bill approved by the Committee, for which a report was issued (HR3357), there is real uncertainty regarding the "reasonable fee" language of Section 15(a)(7) of the bill. Therefor, perhaps Mr. Oxley can make a brief floor statement strongly emphasizing that the courts are expected to carefully review the reasonableness of legal fees resulting from cases covered by the bill. In such a statement, he could make clear that lodestar/multiplier formulas are, at the least, highly appropriate approaches that the courts can take to ensuring that such fees are, as the House bill explicitly requires, reasonable. Even more promising would be the issuance of a new Committee report explicitly defining lodestar/multiplier fees as the means of complying with the bill's reasonable fee language. This prospect arises from the fact, noted above, that a Committee report was issued on HR 3210, even though the House voted for the language contained in a substitute bill, HR 3357.

Step Two: I've learned that that Senator John McCain will become deeply involved with the bill. Insofar as its tort reform provisions are concerned, this is likely to be good news. I have previously discussed the need for lodestar/multiplier fees in mass tort cases with Senator McCain, and found him an enthusiastic supporter of the reform. McCain's key staffer Jeanne Bumpus is likely to be solid and knowledgeable on the issue, as are key staffers to Senators Lott, Gramm and McConnell. As indicated in the earlier memo I sent to most of you, I strongly believe that removing the House bill's ban on punitive damages – the provision which has thus far drawn most of the fire from the tort bar and Democrats – would be a cheap price to pay for a lodestar/multiplier provision and precedent. I hope to press this point with Senators and Senate staff interested in the bill's tort reform provisions. A key question is whether the Administration agrees with this strategy and is prepared to press it.

Step three: Whatever happens in the Senate bill, achieve the step two outcome in conference.

I'm sending this memo to tort reform advocates, to key House and Senate staffers, and to Administration members involved with the bill. I hope that it sparks action to enact a provision that will truly protect terrorism victims from unethical, overreaching fees – one that will also establish a precedent whose strategic importance to the American legal, business and political systems is in my judgement impossible to overstate.

Responding to the Events of September 11 : A Picture of What Congress Has Already Done and Suggestions for What Should Still Be Done

I. Congress's Immediate Response: Compensating Victims and Keeping the Civil Aviation System Up and Running.

In the days following the September 11 terrorist attacks, two concerns immediately surfaced. First, how could Congress help ensure that the victims of these terrorist attacks received compensation for their injuries? Second, in light the huge financial losses suffered by airlines during the temporary shutdown after September 11, and the potentially unlimited liability facing the two airlines that were the subjects of the terrorist attacks, what could Congress do to ensure that America's airlines remained up and running?

A. The Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act

Congress swiftly responded to these two questions by enacting the Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act of 2001. In that act, Congress outlined the two mechanisms that would be available to victims of the air tragedies for compensation, and provided a liability backstop so that the airlines could obtain insurance and keep running.

1. Compensating Victims of the September 11 Attacks

Congress created a system in which the victims of the September 11 tragedies could elect to pursue compensation through one of two options, the Victim Compensation Fund or litigation. These two options are mutually exclusive — a claimant may pursue either one of these two remedies, but not both.

A. The Victim Compensation Fund

The Victim Compensation Fund was created to compensate individuals injured by the events of September 11. This federally-funded program provides a mechanism through which victims of the terrorist attacks can be compensated without the time and expense of litigation. Eligible individuals may file a claim with the Special Master, who will review the claim and make a determination as to the amount that the claimant will be awarded. No punitive damages may be awarded in the Victim Compensation Fund. In addition, any award to a claimant will be reduced by the amount of any collateral compensation received by the claimant. Many issues about the Fund, including which payments will be deemed to be "collateral" are to be determined by the Attorney General and the Special Master.

B. Litigation

The Air Transportation Safety and Stabilization Act created a federal cause of action for individuals who opt to sue, and provided that all claims resulting from or relating to the terrorist attacks would be brought in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York.

The Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act also limited the liability of air carriers in litigation arising out of September 11 to amount of liability insurance of the air carrier.

The language of the act is not entirely clear regarding what happens once the air carriers, and other defendants covered by the amendments to this legislation, reach the limits of their coverage. One possibility is that plaintiffs will be faced with the prospect of a judgement against defendants from whom they cannot collect. In the face of such a possibility some potential plaintiffs might elect not to sue and would choose to seek compensation in the Victim Compensation Fund. Once the group of potential defendants have reached the limits of their coverage, the federal government may be pressured to assume at least partial responsibility for any judgment above the limits of the air carrier's liability insurance.

2. Terrorist Events involving Air Carriers within the Six Months of September, 2001

The Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act also provided that if any acts of terrorism occurred "on or to" an air carrier within 180 days of September 22, 2001, the Secretary may certify that that air carrier was a victim of terrorism. Upon such a certification, the air carrier would not be liable for losses suffered by third parties that exceed $100 million in the aggregate, and the government would be liable for any liability above $100 million. In addition, no punitive damages may be awarded against an air carrier for claims arising under this section.

B. Increasing Aviation Security

On November 19, 2001, Congress passed the Aviation and Transportation Security Act. While most of the sections of this bill pertain to aviation security, the bill also clarified several provision of the Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act by:

- making clear that electing to submit a claim to the Special Master does not limit a plaintiff's right to pursue a lawsuit against any person who is a knowing participant in a plan to commit a terrorist act,

REV_00261357

- extending the liability limits afforded to air carriers to also cover aircraft manufacturers, airport sponsors, or a persons with a property interest in the World Trade Center on September 11, 2001,

- clarifying that the liability limitation does not extend to air transportation security businesses unless the air transportation security business is an airline or airport sponsor; and

- limiting the total liability of the City of New York to $350,000,000.

In sum, after the two bills were passed, Congress had set in place mechanisms for dealing with the events of September 11, and had limited the liability of airlines should there be any additional terrorist attacks in the months after September 11. Neither of these bills, however, addressed the potential liability that could result from a potential terrorist attack more than six months in the future.

II. Why a Reinsurance Bill is Necessary

The Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act was intended, in its own words "to preserve the continued viability of the air transportation system." In other words, Congress limited the liability of the airlines for the events resulting from September 11, so that the airlines could continue to operate, and established a mechanism so that the victims of the September 11 tragedies could be compensated. Since the September 11 attacks, many insurers and reinsurers are taking a careful look at what type of insurance they can provide to their clients in light of the new risk of terrorist attacks. While the insurance industry has expressed a strong commitment to honor the obligations that resulted from the September 11 attacks, when it comes to contracting for insurance for the future, some reinsurers have expressed that they are seeking to limit or exclude coverage for terrorist attacks. A principal reason for the insurers' decision is that normal insurer methods of assessing risk, actuarial determination, do not work with respect to acts of terrorism. Unlike hurricanes, fires, or illness, there is no past database that might be used to make even reasonable speculative determinations about future risks of terrorist acts.

III. Why It Makes Sense to Include Civil Justice Reforms in the Terrorism Risk Protection Act

Trial lawyers have employed several traditional tactics in attempting to make sure that civil justice reforms are not included in the Terrorism Risk Protection Act. Misinformation abounds regarding what the civil justice provisions in H.R. 3210 do, and why these provisions should be included in the final legislation. For example, during consideration of this issue in the House of Representatives, Minority Whip Bonoir incorrectly stated in a memo that the civil justice provisions would shield a baggage screener who intentionally participated in a terrorist plot from liability. Mr. Bonoir's statement is a prime example of the confusion and misinformation surrounding these civil justice provisions This paper will clear up this and other misconceptions and explain why these provisions should be included in the bill.

REV_00261358

A. Answering The Passover Question: Why Is This Bill Unlike All Others?

On the last night of Passover, the youngest child in a family is asked to explain "why is this night different from all others?" Similarly, opponents of civil justice reforms have publicly questioned why this bill should be different from other "tort reform" measures. In other words, why should Senators and Representatives who have opposed civil justice reforms in the past support reforms in this bill? This is why:

1. These Provisions Will Protect Unlimited Expenditure of Federal Government Funds

Under H.R. 3210, when an act of terrorism occurs, the terrorist act may be a "triggering event," setting into motion the system of government assistance to the insurance industry, and partial industry repayment of that federal assistance. Essentially, the system is set up so that the government will provide assistance to commercial insurers in proportion to their losses, above a certain level. This means that the amount of money the federal government pays out under this bill is directly related to amount of losses that an insurer pays out, including losses related to litigation and settlement of claims. Therefore, the civil justice reform provisions in the bill are not directed solely at traditional tort law defendants; taxpayers will ultimately pay a substantial portion of the liability costs that may arise under this act. The civil justice reform provisions of the bill do ensure that each person is adequately compensated, but may also place rational limits on the expenditure of federal tax dollars. Even more stringent limits have been placed on government liability in the past.

For example, before 1946, individuals could not bring lawsuits against the federal government because of the doctrine of sovereign immunity. In 1946, Congress passed the Federal Tort Claim Act ("FTCA"), which partially repealed the doctrine of sovereign immunity and authorized tort lawsuits against the United States under certain circumstances. When Congress enacted the FTCA, however, it put the following procedural safeguards in place so that the government would not be subject to unlimited liability:

- No suit may be brought until the claim has been submitted to the appropriate federal agency and that agency denies the claim or fails to act within six months.[1]
- No jury trials are permitted- all claims must be tried to a judge.[2]
- No punitive damages are allowed.[3]
- No strict liability is permitted.
- The government is not liable, even if negligent, if its acts could be deemed "a discretionary function," in essence, a bad policy judgment.

While the FTCA has been amended since 1945, there has been no serious attempt to modify or repeal its liability limits. It has served both tort victims and the government well. The procedural safeguards of the FTCA reflect the well-reasoned view of Congress that when federal

1 28 U.S.C. § 2675.
2 28 U.S.C. § 2402.
3 28 U.S.C. § 2674.

REV_00261359

dollars are at stake, individuals should be compensated for their injuries, but should not receive any "windfalls" in their damage awards.

2. In Cases Arising Under This Bill, The Lawsuits Would Result From the Acts of Terrorists — Not Actions of the Defendants

First, tort law exists, at least in part, to compensate injured individuals when someone else's wrongful act is responsible for their injuries. Second, tort law is also supposed to deter wrongful conduct and encourage socially responsible behavior by holding individuals responsible for the injuries that they have caused.

In the litigation that would be covered by the reinsurance bill, the second of these two rationales is substantially reduced. Punitive damages would be available in an action against a terrorist or anyone who aided him. The terrorists would be the only defendants who acted with conscious disregard for human life. Non-terrorists defendants may have been careless or negligent, but their behavior pales when compared with the culpability of the actual party who caused the harm — the terrorist. Because the deterrence rationale for tort law is substantially reduced, Congress should focus on the remaining goal of tort law: What is the best way in which to assure that future victims of terrorist attacks are compensated?

B. The Civil Justice Reform Provisions of H.R. 3210

H.R. 3210 contains four civil justice reform provisions. In the event of a future terrorist attack, these four provision would enable victims of the attack to be fairly compensated for the injuries that they have suffered. Inclusion of these provisions in the final legislation would help ensure that taxpayer dollars are not wasted on litigation costs or "windfall" recoveries to a small group of plaintiffs, but are used to compensate injured individuals.

1. All cases are brought in the same federal court

This section simply states that all claims arising out of a terrorist event would be brought in the same federal court. This section is similar to the Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act, which provides that all claim arising out of the September 11 attacks will be brought in the federal court for the Southern District of New York. In addition, this procedure is common in mass tort cases, where claims are often consolidated in the same court in order to take advantage of the judicial economy that flows from having one judge, who is very familiar with the case, decide all of the relevant legal issues.

2. No punitive damages are permitted

H.R. 3210 would not allow punitive damages in litigation arising out of a terrorist attack, except in claims against anyone who intentionally participates in a terrorist plot or participates in a conspiracy to commit such an act. Defendants who did not knowingly participate in the terrorist act (such as the owner of a building or property that was the target of an act of terrorism) could not be held liable for punitive damages. Their conduct, which may be negligent or careless, does not and should not create a basis for the punishment. Punishment should be restricted to the terrorists and those who assist them.

REV_00261360

Punitive damages, as their name suggests, exist to punish defendants. The theory behind punitive damages is that in some instances, if a defendant engages in highly morally objectionable conduct, the civil justice system should impose additional damages against the defendant to punish the conduct in question and deter similar conduct in the future. Punitive damages awards do not compensate victims for injuries that they have suffered. Injured parties are compensated with two types of compensatory damages: economic (i.e. awards for lost wages or bills) and non-economic (i.e. awards for pain and suffering). Because punitive damages do not compensate the victims, they are considered a "windfall recovery."

The prohibition on punitive damages is appropriate here because federal funds will be used, at least in part, to pay the judgments and settlements under this bill. There is strong precedent for prohibiting punitive damages where federal funds are involved. A prohibition on punitive damages already exists with respect to claims against the federal government under the Federal Tort Claims Act. In addition, the Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act does not allow punitive damages to be awarded to claimants in the Victim Compensation Fund. Congress has therefore already expressed its judgment that federal dollars should not be used to award punitive damages. Including a similar provision in the reinsurance bill is a continuation of this sound Congressional public policy.

Finally, from an insurance perspective, allowing punitive damages for claims involving future acts of terrorism creates a situation where there is a risk without any reward. It is highly unlikely that punitive damages would be awarded against a negligent or careless defendant for the terrorist acts of another party. Nevertheless, even a remote possibility of such an award creates a situation in which there no way for an insurer to measure the risk. Insurers cannot possibly know when or where terrorists will strike again or the extent and breadth of that risk. Consequently, there is no way for an insurer to calculate the cost of insuring against such a punitive damages award. Therefore, allowing punitive damages would create a situation in which there is an uninsurable risk with no corresponding reward. The "reward" is nonexistent because it is unlikely that a plaintiff will ever benefit from the possibility of punitive damages.

3. Joint liability is abolished for noneconomic damages

Joint liability refers to the rule that when two or more defendants substantially contribute to an injury, each defendant can be held liable for the full amount of the judgment, regardless of the degree to which the jury finds the defendant to have been at fault. The principle underlying joint liability is that each defendant's wrongful conduct is substantial enough to pay for the plaintiff's injury, so the plaintiff should be fully compensated and should not suffer if one defendant is absent from the jurisdiction or bankrupt.

H.R. 3210 modifies the traditional joint liability rule by providing defendants will not be jointly liable for noneconomic damages (i.e. pain and suffering). According to H.R. 3210, each defendant may be jointly liable for economic damages (what the person actually lost — wages, health cares costs, etc.) if the relevant state law allows,[4] but each defendants would only be liable for non-economic damages in proportion to its responsibility for the harm to the plaintiff.

REV_00261361

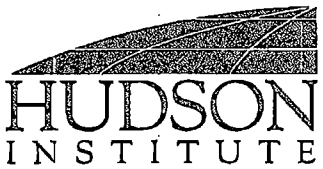
It is sensible to include this provision in a reinsurance bill because the events that would be covered by the reinsurance bill are completely different in kind from the typical tort on which this rule is based. In a typical tort case, there is an assumption that each defendant's wrongful acts have substantially contributed to the plaintiff's injury. In cases of terrorism, however, the potential defendants (such as owners of buildings or businesses that are attacked) have absolutely nothing to do with the individuals or groups creating the harm (i.e. terrorists). In plain English, these defendants should not be held liable for the pain and suffering caused by terrorists. Because federal dollars are at stake, it is also reasonable to include this reform so that the federal government is not held liable for the pain and suffering caused by terrorists.

4. Collateral Sources Are Considered

The collateral source rule means that, in general, a judgment against a defendant is not reduced if the plaintiff receives money from sources other than (collateral to) the defendant. For example, if a defendant negligently injures a plaintiff and the plaintiff has to go to the hospital for assistance, the plaintiff can sue the defendant for the hospital bill, even if the plaintiff's insurance has reimbursed him or her for the bill. The principle rationale for this rule is that a defendant who has acted wrongfully should not benefit from the plaintiff's foresight in purchasing insurance.



H.R. 3210 modifies this rule, providing that an award to a plaintiff in litigation after a terrorist event shall be reduced by the amount that the plaintiff has received from a collateral source. A similar rule applies to the Victim Compensation Fund, where awards by the Special Master are reduced by amounts that individuals have received from collateral sources.

Including the collateral source rule reform in this legislation is sound for the very same reasons that it was logical to include this in the Victim Compensation Act. As explained above, the plaintiffs in litigation arising under this bill will receive federal dollars. Federal funds are not unlimited, and decisions must be made regarding how to allocate resources between plaintiffs. This provision would ensure that funds are used to compensate injured persons who have not yet been compensated, rather than providing "additional" recovery to those who have already been compensated.

72081

[4] Because the statute does not address economic damages, the substantive law of the state where the accident occurred would determine economic damages. The traditional joint liability rule remains in effect in thirteen states. Twelve states have abolished the joint liability. In the remaining twenty-five states, a modified joint liability rule exists. There are several ways in which the states have modified the traditional joint liability rule. For example, in California joint liability has been abolished for noneconomic damages. In other states, joint liability is abolished for defendants whose fault does not meet a certain level. For example, in New Jersey, joint liability is abolished for defendants who are less than 60% at fault.

REV_00261362

PROJECT FOR INTERNATIONAL RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Michael J. Horowitz
Director

FAX TO: Wayne Abernathy, Hunter Bates, Jeanne Bumpus, Ben Cohen, Cesar Conda, David Crane, Terry Haines, David Keating, Charles Kolb, Jay Lefkowitz, John Schmitz, Jim Wootton

FROM: Michael Horowitz MH

Crunch time is here; I'm aware that the insurance industry wants nothing to stand in the way of an insurance bill. I know that, in concert with the tort bar, the industry has generated the powerful impression that there will be no bill if attorney fee caps are attached to it.

I believe that the above view is both right and wrong, and is in all events short-sighted, for the following reasons:

- The anti-fee cap alarms are in fact valid, even as the attorneys fee provision that needs to be added to the bill is not a fee cap. The needed reform is an uncapped fee formula similar to the one routinely used in many contingency fee cases where there is no lack of lawyers willing to bring tough cases on behalf of poor and vulnerable clients. All who oppose the House bill's 20% cap are right to do so; as the tobacco cases have shown, multi-billion dollar, $100,000+ per hour fees are literally routine in mass tort cases even with contingency fee percentages far lower than 20%. In sum: the issue at play has nothing to do with fee caps, but with whether hourly times multiplier fee formulas or percentile fee formulas are the fairest means of attracting able plaintiffs' lawyers while also honoring fiduciary principles and protecting terrorism victims.

- In this regard, it is significant that the Federal courts have construed the "reasonable fee" term in Federal statutes to mean hourly fees times multiplier and not percentile fees – precisely the reform needed for the insurance bill. (For example, the courts have so construed the "reasonable fee" provision of the Civil Rights laws.) As noted above and elsewhere, there is no paucity of attorneys ready, willing, and able to handle complex and high-risk cases against powerful and fully-financed defendants even though paid on an hourly times multiplier rather than percentile basis.

1015 18th Street, N.W., Suite 300, Washington, DC 20036
202-223-9200 Fax: 202-223-8537

- All other tort reform provisions in the insurance act will have no meaningful effect; they barely provide fig leave cover to any claim that the insurance bill has "tort reform" provisions in it. This is particularly true of the punitive damages provision – on which many Republicans and conservatives have mistakenly focused, with shrewd don't-throw-me-in-the-briar-patch support from a sophisticated tort bar. The willingness of the tort bar to accept a McCain bill with a punitive damage provision in it results from the fact few expect many serious punitive damage claims in terrorism cases.

I again urge long-term – indeed, even short-term – strategic thinking before ceding the opportunity to fight for a fee formula that will significantly increase the recoveries of terrorism victims. Such an effort will require its adversaries to show what they will not be able to do: that hourly times multiplier contingency fee formulas will not produce a full supply of willing and able lawyers to litigate terrorism cases. It will compel them to defend fees like those that have been paid in the tobacco cases – in many instances $100,000+ per hour payments that have gone to lawyers in limited-risk copycat cases.

It should also be noted that a meaningful fee formula provision in the insurance bill will also create a powerful precedent in support of the President's mass tort case fee reform initiative. That initiative addresses the present likelihood that 30-50 tort lawyer billionaires (and many more centi-millionaires) will be created in the next 5-10 years as a result of unreasonable fee grabs from vulnerable clients in mass tort cases.

It is hard to seriously contend that clients whose lawyers are paid with hourly times multiplier fee formulas are underrepresented; application of such a formula to lawyers in cases where taxpayers will be paying 80¢ on every dollar of payout is thus both a critical and minimal step. In such a situation, the Federal government has both the right and responsibility to ensure that terrorism victims, and not their lawyers, receive the bulk of federally subsidized payments.

HUDSON INSTITUTE

PROJECT FOR INTERNATIONAL RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

TO: Wayne Abernathy, Hunter Bates, Jeanne Bumpus, Ben Cohen, Cesar Conda, David Crane, Peter Davidson, Viet Dinh, Terry Haines, Brett Kavanaugh, Charles Kolb, Jay Lefkowitz, Steve Moore, John Schmitz

Michael J. Horowitz
Director

I don't know what's now happening with negotiations re the terrorism insurance bill, but am writing to urge a strategic approach to the matter.

Doing so, in my opinion, leads to two outcomes:

- the take-current-rights-from-victims provisions in the House bill, very much including the punitive damage provision, are ankle-biter items that will have limited impact on terrorism cases and no serious precedential value in future tort reform battles; and, most of all

- the 20% fee cap of the House bill will be of no more effect in curbing windfall, multi-billion $100,000+ per hour fees than such a provision would have had in the tobacco cases. In the tragic event of a terrorist catastrophe, payouts are likely to be in the high billions and, as such, a 20% cap will still put billions of taxpayer dollars in lawyers' rather than victims' pockets.

I reiterate my hope that the Administration and Congressional leadership will move towards the President's mass tort fee reform – one that rejects fee caps and calls for an uncapped, judicially administered fee formula based on hourly fees times risk multipliers.

In my opinion, such a reform is worth more, by orders of magnitude, than the tort reform provisions in the House bill – even as it will be far easier to defend. It's hard to imagine how opponents will justify killing an insurance bill based on the claim that lawyers won't be available to represent terrorism victims because "mere" fees of $2000-$3000 per hour will be all they can hope for. That's my idea of a tort reform debate – one that finally puts conservatives on the side of consumers and exposes the unethical overage of today's mass tort case fees.

Carpe diem; I'm at your pleasure.

Michael Horowitz

1015 18th Street, N.W., Suite 300, Washington, DC 20036
202-223-9200 Fax: 202-223-8537

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "war risk exclusion" and insurance and law /10 economics (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*47 Case W. Res. 155, **

Copyright (c) 1996 Case Western Reserve Law Review.
Case Western Reserve University

Fall, 1996

47 Case W. Res. 155

LENGTH: 29530 words

NOTE: Landowner Liability For Terrorist Acts *

* Awarded the Sindell Brothers Award for outstanding tort law scholarship presented each year to a Case Western Reserve University Law School student. In addition, awarded the first annual Case Western Reserve Law Review Outstanding Student Note Award, as selected by the editors and faculty advisor.

Melinda L. Reynolds

SUMMARY:
... The specter of terrorism within the United States has become frighteningly real. ... For "new" causes of action, like landowner liability for terrorism, courts may be especially tempted to use policy considerations to define foreseeability. ... Especially when viewed in the context of commercial leaseholds, current formulations of landlord liability will not provide the most efficient methods of victim compensation or increased prevention when the crime in question is terrorism. ... The question of whether mere warnings about the risk of crime (or terrorism) on the premises could ever be sufficient to avoid liability has not been addressed by litigation. ... Some of the implications of this doctrine are raised in Samson v. Saginaw Professional Building, Inc., where the Michigan Supreme Court upheld a finding of liability against a landlord for a criminal act committed by a patient of a tenant mental health clinic against an employee of another tenant. ... Our goals as a society are crime/terrorism prevention and victim compensation, but landlord liability seems equitable only as a prevention technique, not as a compensation mechanism. ...

TEXT:
[*155] [*156]

Introduction

The specter of terrorism within the United States has become frighteningly real. The World Trade Center and Oklahoma City bombings have effectively erased the traditional American paradigm of terrorism as a foreign problem. These two incidents alone caused staggering national losses. The World Trade Center bombing in February of 1993 killed six people and injured more than a thousand others, created a crater 150-200 feet deep, and damaged the massive complex five levels down and two levels up from the explosion. [1] Economically, total damage was estimated at over $ 510 million, [2] with claims in civil lawsuits filed totaling over $ 1.9 billion. [3] And while the World Trade Center bombing was repeatedly called "the single most destructive act of terrorism ever committed . . . in the United States," [4] a preliminary estimate from the [*157] Oklahoma City bombing put damage at over $ 652 million. [5] against terrorism. However, it is not clear that tort remedies provide a cost-effective incentive to do so. Finally, imposing liability on landlords may have extensive undesirable consequences, as landlords may not respond as desired. Examining these issues will support the hypothesis of the previous section: landowner liability by itself is not the most appropriate legal response to domestic terrorism.

A. Defining Terrorism

In terms of framing appropriate legal responses, a threshold issue for legislatures and courts will be who gets to decide when an act constitutes terrorism. [134] Certainly, in order to determine whether landlord liability can be an effective preventive measure, the behavior to be prevented must be defined. For purposes of this Note, the term terrorism has generically been used to refer to bombings--the type of act most likely to impact landowners. [135] It [*181] seems, however, that no "one definition of terrorism has gained universal acceptance," even the United Nations is unable to agree on a definition. [136] Whatever its definition, Americans have traditionally considered terrorism to be a matter for international law. Americans think that if terrorism occurs in the United States, it must have "come in" across borders. [137] Clearly though, as shown by the Oklahoma City bombing, terrorist acts may be entirely domestic. Further, the face of terrorism has changed over the past two decades. Skyjackings and spectacular raids like the one at the Munich Olympics have been replaced [138] by car bombs. [139] Based on this analysis, the definition of terrorism will no doubt change as both politics and technology change. One constant is that terrorists have very different motivations from ordinary criminals; a terrorist [*182] act is neither profit-motivated nor a random assault, it is usually part of a larger plan, [140] and is usually calculated for media effect. If landlord liability for criminal acts is applied to terrorism, we are effectively saying that these types of definitional differences do not matter, although they must affect the kinds of preventive measures that are effective. [141]

B. Preventing Terrorism

Just as in the context of criminal acts, making landlords liable for terrorist acts really means that we want landlords to assist in prevention or protection. [142] While in the criminal context structural changes by landlords (e.g., alarms and lighting) are of prime importance, most experts agree that structural changes by themselves will not thwart a terrorist attack. As Richard Moore, an associate director with FEMA, explained, "You can make a building less susceptible to severe damage, but it's got to be done in concert with other things--security for instance . . . ." [143] Experts agree that the most effective counterterrorist measure is intelligence, especially infiltration of terrorist organizations. [144] There are therefore three principal ways to prevent terrorist acts: structural changes to buildings, private security changes, and government actions. To determine whether landlords should be held liable, the effectiveness of the first two must be evaluated. Based on the following analysis, the argument for resting the primary burden of prevention with governments rather than private landowners is even stronger here than in the context of regular crime.

Attempting to prevent terrorism assumes that terrorist groups act rationally; that is, they attempt to minimize costs and achieve their own ideas of successful outcomes. Indeed, there is evidence that terrorist groups respond to measures that raise the risks of a particular type of attack. [145] In this regard, while creating an absolutely damage-proof building is both architecturally impossible and prohibitively expensive, there are a number of ways to make build- [*183] ings more resistant to "human evil." [146] Various structural modifications include imposing setbacks, [147] preventing flying glass, [148] and infrastructure supports. [149] Structural changes are not cheap, however, and in fact may increase dangers for other perils (e.g., fire). [150] Changes of a preventive rather than protective nature, like restricting access and using camera surveillance are more practical. [151]

For what has been called "the most terrible weapon in a terrorist's arsenal" [152] --the car bomb--adequate preventive measures may not exist. Robert Kupperman, a terrorism expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, noted that car bombs are a "throw away" weapon requiring little planning or support and fewer participants than the more traditional terrorist acts. [153] A munitions expert who formerly worked with the CIA noted that very few places in the United States are protected from car bomb attacks. "People in the intelligence community have been warning for years that this kind of thing could come to the United States . . . . And in the United States, we have bigger cars than they do in Europe." [154] Indeed, it seems the simplest of terrorist [*184] plots and weapons can foil the most sophisticated security. Security at the Olympic games in Atlanta involved more than 30,000 police and security experts, more than 2,000 explosives experts, 40 bombsniffing dogs, 1,000 video cameras, 200,000 I.D. badges, 100 computerized command centers, and microchips that stored digital images of the bearer's palmprint; all at a cost of over $ 117 million. [155] The security teams in Atlanta had practiced against a release of nerve gas, a massive bomb attack inside the games, and a plane hijacking, but were unable to protect visitors from a crude pipe-bomb left unattended in a bag. [156]

REV_00261377

A further problem with preventive measures is that they serve to merely relocate criminal behavior. For example, while fortification of diplomatic facilities has resulted in a decrease of known terrorist missions aimed at them, incidences of assassinations and hostage-takings outside protected facilities against civilians has increased. [157] This substitution phenomenon suggests that all landowners would have to continually refine structural and procedural security to thwart terrorists ready to relocate or develop new tactics in order for preventive measures to be effective. This highlights the need for more retaliatory or interventionist measures by government.

Experts believe that the preferred way to prevent terrorism is to "identify and break up terrorist cells, possibly expel or prevent the entry of individual terrorists and thwart their plans." [158] The FBI, which has the primary responsibility for counterterrorism measures in the United States, [159] perceives that counterterrorism is still a "growing field" and has transferred a number of agents from counterintelligence to that area. [160] One question raised after the Oklahoma City bombing was whether any free society could ever prevent terrorist acts. [161] As Fred Moore of FEMA noted, "I don't [*185] think any government, even the most authoritarian, has found a way to eliminate terrorism." [162] Indeed, even though the Oklahoma City tragedy appears wholly domestic, it seems likely that many acts of terrorism within the United States will be perpetrated by those who come from outside the country or flee the country afterwards. Without a unified international effort, or at least consensus on means of deterrence and agreement to accept the costs that a global antiterrorism strategy would entail, efforts by agencies of any one nation seem destined to be reactive. [163] These comments suggest that at the least a national policy, rather than the state-bystate approach inherent in landlord tort liability, is warranted.

Many of the same concerns about the effectiveness of private citizens as compared to government in preventing regular crime apply in the terrorism context. The differences noted above--that structural changes are even less effective but more costly, and that there is a greater necessity for national if not international government intervention--reinforce the conclusion that landlord liability as a method of increasing terrorism prevention should be restricted.

C. Warnings

In addition to intervention, the term "prevention" as used here is assumed to include protection, or measures designed to lessen the damage caused by terrorist attacks. One way of protecting tenants and invitees is to require landlords to warn them about terrorist threats received. The question of whether mere warnings about the risk of crime (or terrorism) on the premises could ever be sufficient to avoid liability has not been addressed by litigation. Theoretically at least, warnings themselves could be an adequate security measure in response to lower levels of foreseeable terrorism. However, if warnings would be sufficient, there may still be a question about whether it would be equitable or efficient to require landlords to issue them. Disclosure of terrorist threats is not an easy issue as there are several competing concerns in a determination of when to notify tenants or customers. Disclosure could theoretically reduce lawsuits if the threat is carried out, but could hurt business if it is not. Disclosure can encourage public dialogue that can help law enforcement--or encourage copycats. For example, after the World Trade Center bombing there were seventy bomb threats a day in New York City. [164] The classic "boy who cries wolf" syndrome creates a risk that real threats will be ignored. [165] [*186] Finally, however, there are advantages to public notification in that citizens can help with prevention. For example, British officials in particular were dependent upon citizens to help spot IRA bombs. [166]

REV_00261378

If a landlord guesses incorrectly and does not issue a warning, certainly issues of notice and reasonable response are implicated. [167] For example, over Easter weekend in 1995, Disneyland received a threat that a chemical attack would take place. [168] Disneyland officials decided not to warn visitors, but did summon health officials and a chemical warfare team before the FBI determined it was a hoax. [169] If something had gone wrong that weekend, Disneyland would have been faced with the prospect of defending its decision not to warn customers in front of an unsympathetic jury. The best solution to this problem may be to statutorily establish that landowners have a duty to inform the appropriate government authority if they are aware of any risks. The authority can then make a determination about any necessary warnings. In that way private landowners have a clear role in prevention, while determinations about public policy are left to the experts.

D. Issues from the World Trade Center Bombing Litigation

The civil litigation following the World Trade Center bombing provides examples of some of the more detailed legal issues likely to arise when landlord liability is applied to acts of terrorism. An examination of some of these concerns (namely, insurance, mass tort, and evidentiary issues) reinforce the conclusion that this type of litigation, which requires massive amounts of resources to pursue, will not likely provide an efficient legal response to domestic terrorism.

1. Insurance

Since the targets of terrorist attacks are likely to be commercial leaseholds, and since commercial leaseholds generally carry insurance, litigation following a terrorist act will likely consist of a [*187] battle between insurance companies. Insurers of tenants will attempt to subrogate claims that they have been forced to pay, probably by alleging that either the policyholder or someone else (i.e., the landlord) was negligent. [170] For example, in the World Trade Center litigation, one insurance company, Phoenix Assurance, is seeking to recoup a $ 5-10 million payout on a property and business interruption policy for Teleport Communications Group, Inc., a World Trade Center tenant. A lawyer for Phoenix Assurance notes, "Insurance companies have an obligation to policyholders and shareholders to minimize their losses." [171] In fact, insurance companies with significant claims are well represented among the remaining plaintiffs in the World Trade Center litigation. [172] Of course, having insurance companies involved as final litigants first requires that they have decided to honor policyholders' claims. [173]

When claims are significant, [174] insurers may try to avoid them under any number of exceptions to coverage. For example, insurers might try to argue that a terrorist bombing is not a covered "occurrence" because it was technically not an accident but a deliberate act. Theoretically, this type of maneuvering should not be successful, "as the use of the term 'accident' was not intended to deprive policyholders of coverage for deliberate acts of violence against them by unknown third parties." [175] A more likely tactic when damages from a terrorist attack are at issue may be for insurers to claim refuge under a "war risk exclusion." The war risk exclusion generally bars coverage for damages resulting from "war, invasion, civil war, revolution, insurrection or warlike operations, whether there be a declaration of war or not." [176] In practice, this exclusion has generally been limited to actions taken by hostile [*188] government entities or attempts to overthrow government entities. [177] For example, at least one insurance company has tried, albeit without success, to argue that the war risk exclusion should preclude coverage for damages resulting from a hijacking. [178] Further, should insurance companies attempt to assert an exclusion, they generally have the burden of proof to show why coverage should not apply. [179] Specifically with regard to the World Trade Center, shortly after the bombing, two of the biggest carriers in the property and business-disruption fields took different positions on whether the war risk exclusion would apply in that instance. [180] In many European countries, insurance policies now include specific terrorism exclusions, however, the World Trade Center's policies did not. [181]

REV_00261379

Given that insurance companies for tenants injured by a terrorist act will most likely have to honor claims for property loss, business interruption, and general liability, [182] it is likely that they will attempt to subrogate claims via litigation. As insurance companies undoubtedly have the resources to be powerful plaintiffs, commercial landlords whose properties have been the site of terrorist attacks will likely be harder pressed to defend themselves against allegations of negligence than their residential counterparts whose tenants' losses may often be uninsured.

2. Mass Torts

Due to the nature of the terrorist attacks contemplated, a great number of plaintiffs will be involved in subsequent litigation against landlords for a given incident. In the wake of the World [*189] Trade Center bombing, an eight-firm steering committee was appointed to direct the litigation of the 170 civil actions filed. [183] For purposes of judicial economy (if not ecology), [184] it makes sense to litigate all the World Trade Center claims simultaneously. It is also important to ask, however, whether there will be any undesirable side-effects to doing so.

For example, in more typical class action cases, [185] concerns arise as to whether the focus will shift from client to lawyer, from damages to attorney's fees, and from litigation to settlement. Apart from saving costs, which primarily benefit the defendant, it is probably to the plaintiffs' advantage to have the cases consolidated, since their claims will tend to reinforce each other. [186] Apparently, in this case the Port Authority thought that the cost of litigating all the claims separately would far outweigh any such intangible benefit gained by the plaintiffs. As long as these types of concerns of both defendants and plaintiffs can be managed efficiently, which remains to be seen in the World Trade Center litigation, perhaps the fact that terrorist acts will create mass tort litigation is not a significant problem, at least as to its effect on the substantive law. [*190]

3. Evidentiary Issues

In attempting to hold landlords liable for terrorist acts, some interesting evidentiary issues may develop. For example, in the wake of the bombing, the World Trade Center has undertaken significant additional structural modifications and security procedures. [187] It does not appear to have been addressed yet, but one question may be whether the plaintiffs can introduce evidence of these subsequent remedial measures to attempt to prove that the Port Authority either knew that existing security was inadequate or that alternate cost-effective safety measures were available. The New York equivalent of Federal Rule of Evidence 407, which excludes "evidence of the subsequent remedial measures . . . offered to prove negligence or culpable conduct" [188] would be at issue. As the Federal rule itself notes, however, it "does not require the exclusion of evidence of subsequent measures when offered for another purpose, such as proving ownership, control, or feasibility of precautionary measures, if controverted, or impeachment." [189] Thus, plaintiffs' attorneys will likely find a way to get evidence of the modifications admitted.

Another evidentiary issue that will undoubtedly arise in terrorism cases against landlords, and indeed has arisen in the World Trade Center litigation, involves whether discovery of previously conducted security studies should be allowed. Plaintiffs in the World Trade Center bombing case requested that the Port Authority turn over some sixty-two documents that relate to security audits of the complex conducted in the mid-1980s. [190] The Port Authority has resisted production of the materials on grounds that the documents "are subject to the public interest privilege and/or that they contain information which is neither material nor necessary in the prosecution of the action." [191] Discovery of the security reports is [*191] a key issue for the plaintiffs since they allegedly contain comments like "the vulnerability of the World Trade Center to the terrorist is substantial . . . . It is an extremely inviting target," and that the parking garage "presents an enormous opportunity at present for a terrorist to park an explosive filled vehicle that could affect vulnerable areas." [192] The same reports also allegedly contain specific recommendations to tighten security, including closer monitoring of the garage, and banning all public parking. The lawsuit filed by Phoenix Assurance alleges that "as far as we can tell, [the reports were] almost entirely ignored." [193] In attempting to establish that the Port Authority was negligent in failing to protect tenants from the bombing, the plaintiffs are attempting to show that the Port Authority was aware of security problems and did not respond reasonably to them. Plaintiffs' attorneys are therefore also undertaking discovery by seeking testimony of consultants and Port Authority employees who might have been aware of the risk. [194]

As noted above, the plaintiffs claimed that the documents should be produced since they are relevant to Port Authority's recklessness (or knowledge) and foreseeability. [195] In response, the [*192] Port Authority argued that since the explosion occurred on a sublevel, any information about a safety system, device, or practice occurring at or above the concourse level is irrelevant. [196] The judge dismissed the Port Authority's argument, holding that "the mere fact that the explosion occurred in a level beneath the concourse does not necessarily render irrelevant the documents . . . relating to the concourse or floors above the concourse." [197] Further, he noted that "the PA may assert as a defense that, while numerous recommendations were made, it was unable to take all of the recommended steps because of, inter alia, cost and that therefore it had to prioritize the implementation of them." [198] The judge warned that by asserting such a defense--that it acted reasonably and with due care in following the reports and implementing recommendations found therein--the Port Authority could then be compelled to produce the documents. [199]

While the public interest privilege may be specific to a quasigovernmental agency like the Port Authority, many of the relevance and policy issues noted could easily arise in a completely private setting. For example, though not raised by the Port Authority, other relevancy arguments could include whether the type of harm is not specifically addressed by the security report, the security report is out-of-date, or even that the contents of the report would likely cause the jury to be prejudiced against the defendant. Finally, defendants are likely to make the policy argument that the admissibility of security reports may actually constitute a disincentive to conduct them in the first place. Therefore, evidentiary issues specific to terrorism will require significant resources and add another layer of complexity to an already complex area of litigation.

E. The Effects of Finding Landlords Liable

All of the problems endemic to terrorism discussed above suggest that imposing liability on landowners is not an efficient mechanism for increased prevention. Further, imposing liability on landowners may have some unintended, potentially negative effects because landowners may not respond as desired. Such unintended consequences may be divided into five categories: (1) landowners [*193] may not respond to liability with increased security; (2) landowners may even treat liability as a disincentive to engage in further security measures; (3) landowners may use liability as justification for impinging on tenants' rights; (4) landowners may shift resources to other investments (unintended macroeconomic consequences); and (5) landowners may attempt to shift the risk of liability to other parties.

1. Liability as Incentive

REV_00261381

In determining whether landowner liability will result in increased protection against terrorist attacks, beyond the analysis of which preventive measures may be effective against terrorism, [200] an examination of whether landowner liability has resulted in increased security measures against regular criminal acts may be helpful. Commentators have argued both for and against liability under tort law as an effective deterrent (or incentive). For example, one author argues that finding landlords liable for protecting tenants and invitees has induced landlords to make "considerable efforts" to render their buildings negligence-proof, if not crimeproof, by hiring extra lobby personnel and security guards, and improving lighting. [201] Further, apparently due to liability exposure, almost every major fast food company has recently hired a security director and over the past ten years these companies' security budgets have approximately doubled. [202]

The same author notes that tort law as a deterrent is only moderately successful, and questions whether deterrence benefits outweigh the costs imposed. [203] For example, it is unclear whether imposing liability on landlords actually prevents crime overall or merely serves to relocate it. [204] Many commentators also point out the social costs, including potential violations of tenants' rights, and increased chances for corruption, discriminatory enforcement, and vigilantism, which could result from the deputization of the citizenry and the fact that law enforcement essentially becomes private. [205] For example, from 1969 to 1990 the value of private [*194] security industries rose from $ 2.5 million to $ 18 billion annually and the number of employees increased from fewer than 300,000 to nearly two million. [206] Currently private security personnel outnumber police by more than two to one, but are largely unregistered and usually not as well trained. [207]

Despite these concerns, and while it seems unfair to find that a person is entitled to more protection from a landowner than from police, business and industry do have the financial and technical resources available for aiding the prevention of crime [208] (or terrorism). It therefore seems reasonable to conclude that while imposing liability on landlords does provide a moderate incentive to increase crime prevention, such incentive must be evaluated on a cost-benefit basis. For terrorism, this analysis suggests that the preventive measures that landlords can take by applying private resources seem to be less cost-effective than the measures that government can take by applying public resources.

2. Liability as Disincentive

The propensity for liability to act as a disincentive is perhaps most apparent under the voluntary assumption of duty theory of liability. [209] In the commercial context, this type of liability would likely be triggered frequently since a large percentage of commercial landowners provide some level of security. For example, assume that there are two landlords who both can foresee that at some point there will probably be a terrorist act upon one of their tenants (e.g., each leases to an abortion clinic). One landlord chooses to ignore various threats, while one hires a security guard in response. When tenants or their invitees ultimately suffer injuries, under the voluntary assumption of duty theory, the landlord who hired the security guard is more likely to be found to have a duty and will probably face a jury to defend the reasonableness of his conduct. [210] Under this analysis, it is hard to see why any landlord would initially take what is undoubtedly the safer course, [*195] since he would be, at best, in the same position as his counterpart who did nothing--facing a potentially hostile jury to defend his conduct. On the other hand, if the landlord does not provide security, he still has not eliminated risk. Without empirical data, it is difficult to gauge disincentive effects. However, it seems reasonable to conclude that if not a disincentive, the incentive effects of tort liability in this context are often muted.

3. Effects of Landlord Liability on Tenants' Rights

As one commentator has noted, it is perhaps "axiomatic" that "as a landlord's duty to protect . . . tenants increases, so too the landlord's right to screen, control and evict tenants increases." [211] Some of the implications of this doctrine are raised in Samson v. Saginaw Professional Building, Inc., [212] where the Michigan Supreme Court upheld a finding of liability against a landlord for a criminal act committed by a patient of a tenant mental health clinic against an employee of another tenant. While the court did not specify how landlords should deal with such high risk tenants, [213] the court did seem to imply that a landlord has some responsibility to assess the risks caused by tenants. [214] This prompted one commentator to caution, "There is a difference, however, between requiring a landlord to act once a dangerous condition becomes apparent, and encouraging him to discriminate against certain tenants based on their prior records, their occupations, or the types of invitees they may be expected to attract. Samson appears to do the latter." [215] In another instance, a court upheld a landlord's right to refuse the tenancy of an ex-convict, noting that "in choosing his tenants, a landlord has a legitimate interest in protecting his property, and an interest in protecting the health, safety, and welfare of his other tenants. He may consider any criteria, but especially criteria relevant to these ends." [216]

REV_00261382

Encouraging this type of behavior among landlords, especially in the application of liability to terrorism, would seem to invite discrimination against unpopular organizations. Indeed, this controversy recently arose in New York, where a judge ruled that a landlord could break an abortion clinic's lease "if his purpose is to [*196] protect other tenants against security risks arising from the clinic's presence in his . . . building." [217] The landlord based the eviction on the clinic's failure to follow his regulations, which were designed to prevent the clinic from performing abortions. The judge found the landlord's regulations to be reasonable, holding that "a landlord must exercise reasonable care to protect its tenants against any foreseeable dangers." [218] The judge's ruling, which never mentions the word abortion, cites seventeen incidents that were "directly related" to the abortion clinic, including gunshots, assaults on employees, rocks thrown at clinic windows, smashed cars, a false bomb scare, a tenant's doors glued shut, and the anonymous posting of a threatening note that read in part "you risk injury or death if you are caught near these premises." [219] The ruling allowed the landlord to start eviction proceedings against the clinic, even though it had eight years left on its lease and was not in default of rent. [220]

Negative reaction against the decision was swift and raised many of the civil rights concerns that result from imposing a duty to protect on landlords in this context. For example, Rep. Charles Schumer (D-Brooklyn) noted: "It's an open invitation to the extremist fringe in the pro-life movement to harass and intimidate landlords until they evict clinics." [221] Priscilla Smith, attorney for Center for Reproductive Law & Policy, stressed that "saying the clinic created an unsafe environment is the same as saying that, 'We can't have Jewish people in our neighborhood because we can't have people coming here and burning crosses.' It's an easy way of trying to hide your discriminatory actions." [222] And Donna Lieberman, attorney with the New York Civil Liberties Union noted: [*197]

> The court has approved a landlord's effort to evict a tenant because the landlord failed to secure the safety of the building for the tenant, which is a basic landlord obligation. . . . There was never any showing that the performance of abortions presented any danger to the security of the building. [223]

Finally, stressing contractual rather than public policy considerations, David Rosenberg, a Manhattan lawyer, noted:

> I would hope that commercial tenants' groups would rally behind this tenant. If it stands up, then a lease has almost no meaning for a tenant. . . . It's a contract. The tenant hasn't violated it. And the tenant has a right to expect to continue to operate according to the original contract. [224]

4. Macroeconomic Consequences--Risk Shifting

Besides inviting tenants' rights violations, imposing a duty to provide security on landlords may prove to be economically inequitable to some controversial tenants. Theoretically, landlords leasing to more expensive stores can pass on the added cost of security to customers, but businesses catering to a lower-income clientele may not necessarily be able to do so without losing customers who are more sensitive to prices than security. [225] This could ultimately cause smaller or marginally profitable landlords, especially with high-risk or controversial tenants, to leave the commercial real estate market for more lucrative investments. [226]

Short of leaving the market, some landlords may respond to liability for criminal/terrorist acts on their premises by simply refusing to provide security and disclaiming all responsibility for security--perhaps by informing prospective tenants that security is their own responsibility. This does not, however, eliminate the risk of liability if crime/terrorism, is found to be foreseeable; a more prudent alternative available to landowners would be to attempt to modify tort liability by shifting risk back to tenants. [227] Including [*198] exculpatory clauses in leases is one method of allocating risk in a contractual arrangement. While few courts have specifically addressed the use of exculpatory clauses respecting criminal acts, [228] in general, a commercial tenant may agree to exonerate a landlord from liability for future acts of negligence, for both property damage and personal injury. [229] Exculpatory clauses in residential leases have often been found to be against public policy, and therefore invalid, although, their use in the commercial context has not been as restricted. [230] There are some limitations on the use of exculpatory clauses in commercial leases. Five states [231] impose statutory restrictions (e.g., New York law invalidates any agreement that exempts a lessor from liability for personal injury or property damage resulting from the lessor's negligence in operation or maintenance of the property). Additionally, there appears to be a consensus that exculpatory clauses cannot insulate landlords from intentional, wanton, or willful behavior. [232] Some courts have found that exculpatory clauses only protect landlords from passive negligence, not active negligence. [233] A few courts have held that an exculpatory clause cannot release a landlord who has violated a statutory provision. [234] Further, an exculpatory clause is usually binding only on parties to the lease. Third-parties like the tenants' employees or invitees are not precluded from bringing suit against the landlord in this instance, although the existence of these types of provisions may provide for the landlord's later indemnity claim against the tenant. [235] Finally, a court may always choose to invalidate an exculpatory clause as unconscionable if there is evidence of grossly unequal bargaining power. [236] In summary, exculpatory [*199] clauses in commercial leases have generally been held enforceable in enough cases to warrant landlords' use of them if confronted with liability for terrorist acts. In this regard, exculpatory clauses will likely provide a more efficient mechanism of allocating risks than the use of negligence standards, at least as to damage suffered by tenants.

5. Intended Effects

In the midst of this analysis of the negative effects, the potential for positive, intended effects should not be forgotten. If one of society's primary concerns is to ensure that victims are compensated fully, society may consider certain market or macroeconomic effects to be secondary. In other words, the weight given to the value of private victim compensation may be so high that market inefficiencies are minor in comparison. If so, the cost of terrorist prevention may often be "cheapest" to the landowner. [237] As with victim compensation, perhaps the danger is so grave that society considers the prevention of terrorism by all reasonable methods, not just strictly cost-effective ones, desirable. Further, there is evidently some relationship between opportunity and certain types of crimes, as well as the magnitude of harm and security measures, so that often the landlord is not entirely blameless. [238] Finally, the "political" benefit of imposing liability may be that pressure for legislative reform is eventually brought to bear by more influential landlords disgusted or threatened by current litigation practices. [239] [*200]

REV_00261384

F. Summary

Landlord liability for criminal acts has not resulted in clear guidelines about when duty will be imposed or what security responses will be considered sufficient. These problems, which mitigate attempts at increased prevention and protection, would only be exacerbated by the application of this doctrine to acts of domestic terrorism. Our goals as a society are crime/terrorism prevention and victim compensation, but landlord liability seems equitable only as a prevention technique, not as a compensation mechanism. Expansive theories of liability, which have as their primary goals giving compensation to victims, while certainly desirable, are best run by the government with funds raised from society as a whole. Any rules placing burdens on landowners should therefore have prevention, rather than compensation, as their primary goal. This conclusion suggests that narrower theories of liability, designed only to induce landowners to take cost-effective measures to prevent terrorism, [240] should be implemented.

Theoretically, cost-effective levels of protection could be derived empirically--for example, some types of structural changes must be more effective than others in certain settings. Under the current state of the law, however, an efficient standard is not likely to emerge. [241] In fashioning a legal response to terrorism, perhaps other systems that have been forced to address the problem more extensively will provide direction toward a comprehensive solution.

III. Alternative Legal Responses to Domestic Terrorism

The primary conclusion offered by this Note is that using current legal theories of landlord liability for criminal acts as a method of recovery by victims of domestic terrorism is not the best legal response, given goals of increased prevention and victim compensation. Courts deciding this issue will likely be confronted by societal pressures both to expand and contract the scope of landowners' duties. [242] Their decisions may be affected by the availability of other alternatives able to adequately address concerns about victim compensation and prevention. The alternatives presented here are only intended to be a basis for consideration and not definitive proposals. Discussion is limited to how these types of representative alternatives can, either [*201] separately or in combination, achieve the goals and address the problems presented.

A. Comprehensive Federal Legislation

Even though victim compensation seems to be a task best handled by government entities rather than private individuals, in this context current legislation would not appear to adequately redress the injuries of non-government affiliated victims of terrorist acts. [243] Therefore, perhaps the most equitable and efficient solution to the victim compensation issue is to amend current legislation to provide for a comprehensive platform of victim compensation for acts of domestic terrorism. Further, the use of legislation to establish minimum levels of reasonable care has apparently proven to be effective in the residential context. [244] Federal legislation specifying minimal structural and procedural antiterrorism measures for commercial buildings over certain sizes could be implemented, much as in the residential context, as the basis for public sanctions or as a guideline in the application of tort liability. [245] A statutory violation would arguably be conclusive of liability--replacing foreseeability--resulting in greater predictability and lowered use of judicial resources. [246] Alternatively, federal legislation could provide direct compensation to landowners. For example, landowners in Northern Ireland are compensated directly by the British government for losses from terrorist attacks. Police certification that the injury was related to a terrorist attack is required for reimbursement, but no premiums are paid. Funding comes from tax revenues throughout Great Britain. [247] Claims in Northern Ireland are relatively small when compared with the two incidents referred to throughout this Note. [248] Further, under this system there does not appear to be any incentive for landowners to take preventive measures. For these reasons (potential size of losses and lack of incentives), the Northern Ireland legislative response does not seem appropriate for adoption in the United States. [*202]

REV_00261385

B. Government Assisted Insurance

It is pragmatic to assume that if domestic terrorism continues, United States insurance companies will follow the lead of their European counterparts and begin to write terrorism exclusions into commercial property policies. When continental and British insurers took this course in 1993, fears of an economic crisis prompted the British government to promise that it would ensure that coverage for terrorist acts would be available to landowners in Great Britain. [249] The British government essentially agreed to become the "reinsurer of last resort" for losses caused by terrorist acts. [250] To do so it formed "Pool Re," a mutual reinsurance company, to provide the coverage excluded by private insurers. [251] The British system provides five layers of terrorism coverage to a landowner, with the government having final responsibility if all layers are exhausted. [252] Premiums charged for the additional Pool Re coverage are determined based on a number of different factors, some of which are apparently particular to the "terrorism insurance" market. [253] Another part of the premium structure is that an "IRA levy" is attached by the British government to all household and vehicle policies written, to shift the cost of insurance from London to other parts of the country. [254] While it does spread risks, there are problems with the British reinsurance scheme. There seems to be no incentive for insureds to take preventative measures. Certainly, premium reductions are common in other contexts, and as was [*203] discussed earlier, there are measures landlords can take to mitigate the effects of, if not prevent, terrorism. [255]

In a somewhat similar vein, the Overseas Private Investment Corporation ("OPIC") was formed by the United States government at least partly to "underwrite political risk insurance in friendly, less developed countries." [256] If political risk was defined to include terrorism, the principles of OPIC could theoretically be applied in developing a model for government provided domestic terrorism insurance, whereby the United States government could act as either a direct or indirect insurer for terrorism risks. The lessons learned from the shortcomings of the British system, like ensuring that premiums reflect preventive measures and using levies to spread the cost of premiums throughout the country, could be integrated. When insurance is used in this manner, economic efficiency is aided because insurance companies, in setting premiums reflective of precautions taken, will help minimize the cost of accident prevention. Landlords will have a clearer standard to follow; mitigating tendencies to either overprotect or do nothing. In this manner, the costs of victim compensation can be at least partially borne by the party best able to spread the risk--the government--in an economically efficient manner that also provides incentives for landlords to take measures to help prevent, or lessen the effect of, terrorist attacks.

C. Contract Theories

Once society is assured that victims of domestic terrorism will be fully compensated, via comprehensive legislation and government assisted insurance as suggested above, there are strong philosophical arguments for letting the market function via contract liability alone. [257] Market or contract based theories partially depend on the premise that it is the government's, and not the private sector's, duty to protect citizens. Further, even if there is a private sector duty, it is not fair to single out landlords. [258] Some [*204] theories provide that whatever security measures are necessary will be implemented by landowners on their own because customers will demand them. "By letting the market police itself . . . the more efficient level

REV_00261386

When considered with other recent terrorist attacks and threatened attacks, [6] these incidents suggest that domestic terrorism is an emerging national problem. Americans must therefore develop innovative solutions to address the issues of prevention and victim compensation.

Initial responses to domestic terrorism have resulted in what some have called the "hardening" of America. [7] Government responses to domestic terrorism have included both modifications to existing agencies' priorities as well as legislation providing for limited victim compensation and expanded law enforcement powers. [8] This Note considers the American common law response to [*158] domestic terrorism--landowner liability for terrorist acts--as typified by the civil litigation following in the wake of the World Trade Center bombing.

After the World Trade Center bombing over 174 suits were filed against the Port Authority, the owner of the World Trade Center complex. [9] The suits involve "a relatively murky area of the law," [10] namely a landowner's responsibility to protect tenants or invitees against criminal acts of third parties. In brief, the courts face the issue of whether the Port Authority, as landowner, was negligent in either its assessment of the foreseeability of the harm of a terrorist attack or the adequacy of the security measures it took in response to that assessment.

An examination of this particular legal response to domestic terrorist acts is critically important for several reasons. First, beyond the economic effects that can be imagined at the individual party level, the placement of liability could also have significant macroeconomic results. [11] Further, imposing civil liability on land- [*159] lords may have extensive implications for individual rights to privacy, as well as availability of fairly-valued rental space for more controversial tenants. [12] These issues must be measured against the harsh inequity that could result if civil suits are not allowed, as some innocent victims will invariably not be made whole by insurance or victim-compensation-type statutes. [13] Finally, no precedent appears to squarely address civil recoveries for acts of domestic terrorism as described here; [14] hence plaintiffs' reliance on the general body of law dealing with landlord liability for criminal acts of third parties. The question at hand then is whether this body of law is the best way to achieve equitable victim compensation and increased antiterrorism protection. [15]

In the wake of terrorist attacks in the United States, injured parties inadequately compensated by insurance or statutory assistance programs are likely to turn to civil lawsuits against landowners for relief. These suits will involve claims under the general rubric of "landlord liability for criminal acts of third parties." If based on current doctrines, claims involving terrorist acts will only exacerbate problems of unpredictability, inequity, and inefficiency endemic to claims presently involving more typical criminal acts. A nationwide legal response consisting of federal legislation, government-assisted insurance, and judicial decisions restricting recovery to more narrowly drawn theories of liability is necessary to provide more equitable and efficient answers to concerns about both victim compensation and prevention.

Part I of this Note presents potential legal responses available to victims of domestic terrorism by reviewing victim-compensationtype statutes that might apply and by examining how potential civil claims could be brought using landowner liability for criminal acts of third parties. [16] The examination of contemporary landowner [*160] liability will focus on problems arising from the use of foreseeability as a legal element, since this appears to be a primary cause of the current unpredictability in the law. The implications of applying existing liability theories in the environment of commercial leaseholds are also examined in detail since they will have particular importance in the context of terrorism. Part II examines how issues particularly related to terrorism will affect the application of existing doctrines, with the conclusion that the exclusive use of these types of claims is not the most appropriate legal means to achieve society's goals. Part III presents alternative legal responses that may provide more comprehensive victim compensation as well as the predictable legal outcomes which will cause landowners to take cost-effective preventive measures.

REV_00261369

of protection will emerge as business owners seek to attract customers by using the most cost effective measures." [259]

Advantages to traditional contract liability include the ability to potentially cure a dangerous situation before a terrorist act occurs via traditional contract remedies like rent abatement, repair and offset, rescission, or even termination of the lease if contracted security measures are not provided. [260] In the commercial context, the uses of exculpatory clauses and indemnification provisions result in a more efficient allocation of risks than the legal rules now in effect, at least when tenants are the victims. [261] They result in greater precision in the negotiated solution, as each party's responsibilities are defined, and the bearer of the risk is clearly identified. This in turn allows procurement of appropriate insurance, as well as preventive security measures by the party bearing the risk (avoiding overlap of duties). [262] Provisions regarding risks related to terrorist acts and the provision of security against them should therefore be explicitly provided for in every commercial tenant's lease and pursuing a contract remedy should always be considered an appropriate legal response where applicable.

D. Tort Reform

When contract claims are not available, and if recommendations regarding victim compensation are not implemented, the problems with the negligence theories of landlord liability for criminal acts can be lessened so that they can be considered appropriate legal responses in that limited context. In those instances, since victim compensation is not assured, equity demands that landlord liability not be rejected. To mitigate the primary problems involved in the negligence formulations discussed above, foreseeability should be treated as a question of law and reserved for the court. The courts [*205] should then promulgate clear standards of liability and appropriate responsive security measures with an eye toward uniformity among jurisdictions. And finally, the courts should be responsive to concerns about landlords as social insurers, landlords operating in the commercial context, and the limited ability of landlords to prevent terrorism, by restricting the definition of duty.

Conclusion

In the wake of the World Trade Center and Oklahoma City bombings, America is learning how to deal with domestic terrorism by "hardening" our buildings and stepping-up security. We have not yet, however, developed methods for providing equitable and efficient legal remedies for victims of domestic terrorism. Since statutory victim compensation provisions in place will likely not provide full relief, victims are apt to pursue civil litigation against the one party likely to have sufficient, available assets--the landowner. Victims will likely proceed, and in fact have proceeded in the World Trade Center bombing case, under the theory that landlords have a duty to protect tenants from criminal acts of third parties. However, the body of law in this area is unsettled. Landowners are generally unable to predict liability or develop appropriate responses once liability is imposed. Liability varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction and indeed even from court to court. Many of the problems with landlord liability in this area have resulted from courts' treatment of the concept of foreseeability as establishing duty. In applying this theory of liability to terrorist acts, the issue of foreseeability is stretched to its outer limit; all of its shortcomings are accentuated. Further, courts will be asked to develop standards for terrorism liability in an environment of conflicting pressures; to both restrict duty, in the face of growing concern that landlords should not be social insurers, and to expand duty, in the face of the increasing visibility of terrorist acts.

While it is not clear how courts will define liability in view of these pressures, it seems certain that imposing tort liability on landlords for terrorist acts is not the most appropriate legal response. Victim compensation is best handled by the ultimate riskspreader, the government. To the extent society's concerns involve victim compensation and risk spreading, comprehensive federal legislation and government assisted insurance should be the primary remedies. To the extent society's concerns involve prevention, or antiterrorist measures, perhaps government is again the most efficient actor. Still, landlords can often effectively contribute through structural and procedural changes in security designed to aid both in the prevention and mitigation of damage. Sufficient incentives for this role can likely be achieved by making premiums under a [*206] government assisted insurance program contingent on attaining certain specifically defined safety levels, establishing statutory minimums for security measures based on building types, and allowing the market to function via contractual risk shifting provisions, such as exculpatory clauses. Limited tort liability (i.e., with clear, uniform standards of duty and sufficient responses) should only be used as a safety net when necessary to prevent inequity. How our society responds to domestic terrorism will necessarily be indicative of our opinions about the current state of the American legal system. To achieve society's goals of both victim compensation and prevention, we must forge equitable yet efficient legal responses from the stockpile of alternatives at our disposal.

REV_00261387

FOOTNOTES:

n1 See Jeffrey S. Green & Ira Tripathi, Coping with Chaos: The World Trade Center Bombing and Recovery Effort, 27 Urb. Law. 41, 41 (1995).

n2 See Daniel Wise, Lawyers Pack World Trade Center Hearing, N.Y. L.J., May 9, 1994, at 1 (insurance industry estimate).

n3 See Mitchell Pacelle, Onslaught of Civil Suits Begins in World Trade Center Bombing, Wall St. J., June 28, 1994, at B1, B10.

n4 Ralph Blumenthal, Prosecutors Describe "Horror" as Trial in Towers Blast Opens, N.Y. Times, Oct. 5, 1993, at B1.

n5 See Paul English, Preliminary Estimate Puts Bomb Losses at $ 652 Million: Uncovered Costs To Stagger State Budget Resources, The Daily Oklahoman, May 19, 1995, at 1. Oklahoma Governor Frank Keating noted that the loss amount "not only makes it the most catastrophic dollar loss in American history for a terrorist act, but in Oklahoma it's without doubt the greatest loss to the public and private sectors ever." Id.

n6 Including, for example, the Centennial Park bombing at the Olympics in Atlanta, the Amtrak derailment in Arizona, Unabomber bombings and threats, and abortion clinic attacks. "Scarcely a week goes by without at least one terrorist related incident making the headlines." Ileana M. Porras, On Terrorism: Reflections on Violence and the Outlaw, 1994 Utah L. Rev. 119, 119. The director of the CIA recently told Congress that he expects an increase in domestic terrorism over the next decade. See Sunday Today (NBC television broadcast, Jan. 7, 1996).

n7 See, e.g., Tom Masland et al., Fighting Back; Life in the Bull's-Eye, Newsweek, May 1, 1995, at 56. For example, security measures at the World Trade Center in the aftermath of the bombing reflect both structural and procedural changes, including wrapping columns with steel, painting windows with shatter-resistant coating, installing a hydraulic crash barrier, using an online photo ID system, restricting access to the towers, hiring of hundreds of new security guards, moving outside parking away from the building, see id., and restricting parking in the underground garage where the bomb was detonated. See Richard Lacayo, How Safe is Safe? Americans Must Decide How Much Freedom They Are Willing to Trade for More Security, Time, May 1, 1995, at 68, 71. After the Oklahoma City bombing, changes were implemented at Federal buildings around the country. All in all, officials put more than 8,000 federal buildings on "second-level alert"--requiring all employees and visitors to identify themselves "until further notice." Masland et al., supra, at 56. And although he had opposed the action for some time, President Clinton agreed to a ban of vehicular traffic in front of the White House. See Kathy Lewis & G. Robert Hillman, White House Barriers Erected: Clinton Cites Terrorist Fears, The Record (Northern N.J.), May 21, 1995, at A1. In arguing for the measure, Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin said that "the bombings of the federal building in Oklahoma City and the World Trade Center in New York are reminders of a growing terrorist threat." Id. at A3.

REV_00261388

n8 For example, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), which is best known for its response to disasters like floods or earthquakes, has also begun to focus on the problem of "technological events" like major acts of terrorism. See Scott S. Greenberger, FEMA Focuses on Prevention, Telegram & Gazette (Worcester, Mass.), May 2, 1995, at A1, A2. After the World Trade Center bombing, FEMA came up with recommendations to make structures safer, proposing designs for stronger windows and doors. See id. at A3. In responding to the Oklahoma City bombing, in a more traditional role, FEMA is expected to offset about $ 33 million of the loss, as well as provide for rebuilding-loan programs. See English, supra note 5, at 1.

The Emergency Supplemental Appropriations for Additional Disaster Assistance, for Anti-Terrorism Initiatives, for Assistance in the Recovery from the Tragedy that Occurred at Oklahoma City, and Rescission Act, 1995, as its name implies, appropriates some $ 66 million for the demolition and rebuilding of the Federal building and authorizes an appropriation of Community Development Block Grant funds of approximately $ 39 million to be used "to assist property and victims damaged and economic revitalization" in a specified area around the bombing site. Pub. L. No. 104-19, section 2007(c), 109 Stat. 194, 252-53 (1995) [hereinafter Emergency Anti-Terrorism Act]. More controversial anti-terrorism provisions of this Act include establishing a $ 34 million "Counterterrorism Fund" for the Department of Justice, and appropriating $ 77 million for a "Domestic Counterterrorism Center" for the FBI. See section 2007(c), 109 Stat. at 249-50.

The Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, signed by President Clinton in April of this year, authorizes $ 1 billion in law enforcement spending over four years, provides for the designation of terrorist groups, bans fund raising in the U.S. for designated terrorist groups, streamlines deportation procedures for terrorists, requires plastic explosives to contain chemical markers, and strengthens penalties for many acts of terrorism. Pub. L. No. 104-132, section 301-823, 110 Stat. 1214, 1247-317 (1996) [hereinafter Antiterrorism Act of 1996]; see also infra note 17.

Recent events including the Centennial Park bombing at the Atlanta Olympics have triggered another round of proposals for increased antiterrorism spending. See Top Priority in Terrorism Fight, The Post And Courier (Charleston, S.C.), Aug. 1, 1996, at 12 (discussing a bill sponsored by Senator Judd Gregg which would add another $ 78.7 million to the Antiterrorism Act of 1996).

n9 Some of these suits have either been settled or dismissed, but of the original suits, 126 involved personal injuries (containing a total of 294 individual claims), 17 involved property damage (containing a total of 159 claims, most of them for cars in the parking garage), and 31 involved business interruption (containing 194 claims filed by companies with offices in the World Trade Center or their insurers). See Wise, supra note 2, at 5.

n10 See Pacelle, supra note 3, at B1.

n11 For example, after the World Trade Center explosion some investors expressed concerns about the Port Authority's ability to pay off some of its $ 4.1 billion in public improvement bonds. See Jon Nordheimer, Crisis at the Twin Towers: The Port Authority; Complex Insurance Issues in Aftermath of Explosion, N.Y. Times, Mar. 2, 1993, at B5; see also infra notes 225-36 and accompanying text (discussing macroeconomic effects of imposing liability on landowners or tenants and the effect of exculpatory clauses).

n12 See infra notes 217-24 and accompanying text.

REV_00261389

n13 See infra notes 17-23 and accompanying text.

n14 The term "terrorism" is generally used here to refer to bombing-type acts since they will most often have the greatest effect on landowners. See infra notes 134-41 and accompanying text (discussing in more detail the definition of terrorism).

n15 Throughout this Note, societal goals of increased victim compensation and antiterrorism are presumed. This presumption is based on an economic theory of torts which holds that liability is imposed on defendants in order to (1) compensate those who are harmed and (2) provide incentives for tortfeasors to limit risk-producing behavior to efficient levels (in this case theoretically complete deterrence). See Uri Kaufman, When Crime Pays: Business Landlords' Duty to Protect Customers From Criminal Acts Committed on the Premises, 31 S. Tex. L. Rev. 89, 103 (1990).

n16 The topic of landowner liability for criminal acts of third parties has been commented on extensively. See, e.g., William H. Hardie, Jr., Foreseeability: A Murky Crystal Ball for Predicting Liability, 23 Cumb. L. Rev. 349, 364 n.61 (1992) (listing no less than fifteen law review pieces discussing landlord liability for criminal acts of third parties); Kaufman, supra note 15, at 92 n.13 (discussing representative pieces advocating extreme proposals). Therefore, it is not within the scope of this Note to fully address it, rather the discussions presented here focus on landowner liability for terrorist acts.

n17 See Emergency Anti-Terrorism Act, supra note 8, at 253 (making other appropriations to various governmental agencies for rebuilding). In view of the magnitude of the claims noted earlier, this is not likely to provide sufficient compensation. Additional assistance should also be available to some government employees. See infra note 20 and accompanying text (citing the Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act, Pub. L. No. 99399, section 801, 100 Stat. 879 (1986)). Also, the Antiterrorism Act of 1996 specifically provides for mandatory victim restitution as well as additional compensation for victims of terrorism via The Victims of Crime Act of 1984. See Antiterrorism Act of 1996, supra note 8, at 1227-41 (mandatory victim restitution), 1243-47 (assistance to victims of terrorism). However, obtaining restitution from terrorists will probably not provide adequate compensation in the majority of cases. See infra notes 25-26 and accompanying text (noting that terrorists will often have insufficient or hard-to-reach assets). Further, while the Antiterrorism Act of 1996 specifically authorizes Federal funding of state crime victim compensation programs which provide assistance to victims of terrorism, these types of programs provide very limited compensation (for example, limited medical expenses and lost wages). See infra note 23 and accompanying text.

n18 Michael Ratner & Beth Stephens, Tyrants, Terrorists and Torturers Brought to Justice; U.S. Courts Provide Compensation for Victims, N.Y. L.J., May 15, 1995, at S5 (quoting the Torture Victim Protection Act (TVPA), Pub. L. No. 102-256, 106 Stat. 73 (1992)).

n19 The Warsaw Convention generally allows damages up to $ 75,000 against international airlines for accidental injuries. See Deborah Squiers, Court Dismisses Damages Suit in Airport Death, N.Y. L.J., Apr. 2, 1990, at 1.

n20 See Kimberly A. Trotter, Compensating Victims of Terrorism: The Current Framework in the United States, 22 Tex. Int'l L.J. 383, 392 (1987).

n21 See id. at 393.

n22 Id. at 401. Of course, this statement assumes that victims are unable to satisfy losses completely via insurance recoveries.

n23 While it may be possible for victims to obtain partial recovery under more traditional state-sponsored crime victim compensation funds, if available, these generally provide a significantly lower recovery than a civil suit, so there is still an incentive to sue. See Rex A. Sharp, Paying for the Crimes of Others? Landowner Liability for Crimes on the Premises, 29 S. Tex. L. Rev. 11, 16 n.11 (1987).

n24 If the victim is an invitee of a commercial tenant, it might be possible for the victim to include the commercial tenant as a responsible party, since if the lessee has exclusive control and possession it may be considered to have the same protective duties as a landlord. See, e.g., Daniels v. Shell Oil Co., 485 S.W.2d 948, 951 (Tex. Civ. App. 1972). For purposes of this Note, references to landlords or landowners are presumed to include tenants where tenants retain exclusive control and possession of the leased premises. Further, employees of tenants or landlords may likely be precluded from bringing suit against one or the other since their injuries may be exclusively addressed by workers' compensation. See, e.g., Daniel Wise, Law Firms Based in World Trade Center Regroup: Lawyers See Potential for Dozens of Liability Claims, N.Y. L.J., Mar. 2 1993, at 1 (noting that Port Authority employees are precluded from recovery outside of worker's compensation in the World Trade Center bombing); see also infra note 127 (discussing invitees and employees of tenants). Recently, victims (including the owner of the World Trade Center) have also attempted to hold chemical manufacturers responsible--alleging that they could have made the ammonium nitrate, an ingredient in the bombs used in Oklahoma City and at the World Trade Center, less explosive. See Hassan Fattah, Federal Court Dismisses Case Against ICC, Chemical Week, July 17, 1996, at 12.

n25 See Alexander Stille, The PLO: A Suit Provides an Inside Look, 10 Nat'l L.J. 1 (1987). The 1985 murder of Leon Klinghoffer (an elderly man in a wheelchair who was ostensibly singled out because of his Jewish name and United States passport by Palestinians who hijacked the cruise ship, Achille Lauro) came to symbolize terrorism in the late 1980's much as the World Trade Center, Oklahoma City, and Centennial Park bombings do in the mid-1990's. Recently, the PLO has tentatively agreed to underwrite a peace institute in order to settle the lawsuit. If the agreement is finalized, the Klinghoffers will drop all legal claims against the PLO. See Beth J. Harpaz, Klinghoffers, PLO Plan Peace Institute In Terror Victim's Memory, AP, Jan. 18, 1996, available in LEXIS, Nexis Library, AP File.

n26 For example, what is certain to be the first of many lawsuits involving the Centennial Park bombing was filed less than a week after the explosion. The suit, filed by a woman injured in the blast, asks for $ 500,000 in damages and alleges that security guards did not evacuate people quickly enough. See FBI Continues Investigation of Olympic Blast (CNN news broadcast, Aug. 3, 1996).

n27 See Sharp, supra note 23, at 54-55. Further, the landlord could be held liable via vicarious liability. See id. at 55; see also Sharp v. W.H. Moore, Inc., 796 P.2d 506 (Idaho 1990) (noting that security service's liability could be imputed to landlord as a result of agency relationship).

n28 And, where applicable, the landowner's insurer.

n29 See B.A. Glesner, Landlords as Cops: Tort, Nuisance & Forfeiture Standards Imposing Liability on Landlords for Crime on the Premises, 42 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 679, 790 (1992).

n30 See id. at 688. "Courts within a single jurisdiction may differ as to the appropriate basis for liability; even appellate courts have misinterpreted or ignored their own state supreme court's analysis of the issue." Id. at 688. One South Carolina District Court has noted, "the wide range of approaches taken by courts in other jurisdictions establishes only that support can be found for practically any position." Id. (quoting Cooke v. Allstate Management Corp., 741 F. Supp. 1205, 1209 n.1 (D.S.C. 1990)).

n31 See Robert S. Schoshinski, American Law of Landlord and Tenant section 4.14 (1980).

REV_00261391

n32 While some have held that landlord tort liability has therefore undergone a "drastic metamorphosis," see Glesner, supra note 29, at 684, or "revolution," others claim that this aspect of landlord-tenant law merely reflects an "integration . . . into the mainstream of contract and tort law." Charles J. Goetz, Wherefore the Landlord-Tenant Law "Revolution?"--Some Comments, 69 Cornell L. Rev. 592, 602 (1984). Under the latter theory, these other branches of law began incorporating "such notions as optimal risk-bearing, transaction costs, and externalities" that put pressure on "antiquated landlord-tenant doctrines." Id. at 599-600. This theory seems more plausible in that the landlord's duty to protect tenants originated in the residential context, arguably in response to the changed relationship (now considered contractual) of modern landlord and tenant. See, e.g., Javins v. First Nat'l Realty Corp., 428 F.2d 1071, 1075 (D.C. Cir. 1970) ("In our judgment the trend toward treating leases as contracts is wise and well-considered. . . . Leases of urban dwelling unites should be interpreted and construed like any other contract."). Given that this area of the law is responsive to changes in contract and tort doctrines, any reform in those areas will in turn influence the courts' adoption of landlord liability for acts of terrorism.

n33 439 F.2d 477 (D.C. Cir. 1970).

n34 See Miriam J. Haines, Landlords or Tenants: Who Bears the Costs of Crime? 2 Cardozo L. Rev. 299, 317-18 (1981).

n35 See Joan L. Neisser, The Tenant as Consumer: Applying Strict Liability Principles to Landlords, 64 St. John's L. Rev. 527, 532 (1990).

n36 Kline, 439 F.2d at 481.

n37 For example, the court's first basis for liability, maintaining common areas in a reasonably safe condition, perhaps reflects an economic efficiency argument; namely, since the landlord has exclusive control, it is cost-effective for him, rather than tenants, to take preventive action. Tenants' responses would necessarily be duplicative or involve collective action with high transaction costs; tenants lack security expertise, and the landlord is in the best position to ensure against risk via insurance. See Peter S. Selvin, Landlord Tort Liability for Criminal Attacks on Tenants: Developments Since Kline, 9 Real Est. L.J. 311, 315 (1981). On the other hand, in recognizing that there are limits to liability, or that the landlord is not an "insurer," the court may be acknowledging that public policy or fairness dictates that a landlord should not be liable when he is not at fault. See Sharp, supra note 23, at 16.

n38 See Schoshinski, supra note 31, section 4.15, at 219.

n39 In this regard, Kline may be limited to its facts, in that the tenant specifically advised the landlord about other prior criminal acts on the premises, see Kline, 439 F.2d at 479 n.3, and the landlord had actually decreased security measures since the inception of the tenant's lease. See Schoshinski, supra note 31, section 4.15, at 218-19.

n40 See supra note 30 and accompanying text.

n41 See infra notes 115-27 and accompanying text.

n42 Haines, supra note 34, at 343 n.144. See also Marvin F. Milich, Protecting Commercial Landlords From Liability for Criminal Acts of Third Parties, 15 Real Est. L.J. 236, 241 (1987) (citing cases involving commercial landlords where theories of recovery paralleled those in cases involving residential landlords). Further, it is generally acknowledged that residential landlord/tenant law was the "impetus for the modern trend imposing a duty upon commercial landowners." Donna Lee Welch, Case Comment: Ann M. v. Pacific Plaza Shopping Center: The California Supreme Court Retreats from its "Totality of the Circumstances" Approach to Premises Liability, 28 Ga. L. Rev. 1053, 1064 n.64 (1994).

REV_00261392

n43 With this said, the first theory listed above, strict liability, sparingly adopted in residential suits, does not seem to have ever been successfully applied in the commercial context. See, e.g., Sharp, supra note 23, at 73-76 (citing Davis v. Allied Supermarkets, Inc., 547 P.2d 963, 965 (Okla. 1976), which held that in spite of the risk spreading policy behind strict liability, "it does not seem that shifting the financial loss caused by crime from one innocent victim to another innocent victim is proper"); Jeffrey Fowler, Rowe v. State Bank of Lombard: The Key to Unlocking a Landlord's Duty to Provide Security, 23 J. Marshall L. Rev. 131 (1989) (discussing Rowe v. Lombard State Bank, 531 N.E.2d 1358 (Ill. 1988) which rejected strict liability but held the commercial landlord liable on other grounds). Further, even those who would argue for increased application of strict liability for landlords in the residential setting seem to agree that its application to the commercial setting is not appropriate. See Frank F. Gibson & Elliot Klayman, Landlord Liability: A New Dimension, 25 Am. Bus. L.J. 1, 27-28 (1987) (holding that the policy considerations favoring strict liability in the defective products context apply in the residential but not commercial leasehold context). Therefore, this theory is not discussed here.

n44 See Kline, 439 F.2d at 481.

n45 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 690.

n46 See id. at 691.

n47 See id. at 690.

n48 Kline, 439 F.2d at 484.

n49 See Bob Gibbins & Yii-Chwen (Francis) Pan, Landlords and Third-Party Criminal Conduct, Trial, Mar. 1986, at 48. Many courts that have adopted this rule cite the Restatement of Torts in support, which states that:

one who undertakes, gratuitously or for consideration, to render services to another which he should recognize as necessary for the protection of the other's person or things, is subject to liability to the other for physical harm resulting from his failure to exercise reasonable care to perform his undertaking, if (a) his failure to exercise such care increases the risk of such harm, or (b) the harm is suffered because of the other's reliance upon the undertaking.

Restatement (Second) of Torts section 323 (1977). This is effectively an exception to the "no duty to rescue" rule, which holds that "the fact that the actor realizes or should realize that action on his part is necessary for another's aid or protection does not of itself impose upon him a duty to take such action." section 314.

n50 See John M. Adler, Relying Upon the Reasonableness of Strangers: Some Observations About the Current State of Common Law Affirmative Duties to Aid or Protect Others, 1991 Wis. L. Rev. 867, 884.

n51 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 696. A landlord's failure to provide adequate security could also result in a breach of contract claim. See id. at 698 n.88.

n52 See David C. Markatos, Property Law: The Growing Accountability of Landlords for Third-Party Criminal Attacks, 1991 Ann. Surv. Am. L. 501, 508. Cases brought under this theory are often fact-intensive and result in unpredictable jurisprudence. See id.

n53 See id. at 510.

REV_00261393

n54 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 696. See also Jardel Co., Inc. v. Hughes, 523 A.2d 518 (Del. 1987) (finding that since mall owner had voluntarily undertaken to provide a security program, sufficiency of that program constituted jury question).

n55 In the residential context, a "handful" of courts have held that the implied warranty of habitability should include a duty to provide security. See Markatos, supra note 52, at 521-22. In the commercial context, a duty to provide security "would have to be confined as an independent material provision of the lease." Haines, supra note 34, at 326 n.91. While some commentators have argued for the extension of residential habitability warranties to certain commercial settings, see Robert A. Levinson & Michael N. Silver, Do Commercial Property Tenants Possess Warranties of Habitability? 14 Real Est. L.J. 59 (1985), in practice such application has been restricted. When used in the commercial context, this theory has generally involved conditions existing at the inception of the lease. See Gibbons & Pan, supra note 49, at 48.

n56 See Sharp, supra note 23, at 30. This claim may also give rise to a tort claim of misrepresentation or fraud. See e.g., O'Hara v. Western Seven Trees Corp. Intercoast Management, 142 Cal. Rptr. 487, 491 (Cal. Ct. App. 1977) (holding that cause of action exists if tenant justifiably relies on landlord's misrepresentations concerning safety). But see Cooke v. Allstate Management Corp., 741 F. Supp. 1205, 1216 (D.S.C. 1990) (stating that landlord's opinion that apartment was "safe" was inadequate to support claim for misrepresentation).

n57 Pacelle, supra note 3, at B10.

n58 See id.; see also infra notes 190-99 and accompanying text (discussing the issue of whether discovery of previous security studies should be allowed).

n59 See Pacelle, supra note 3, at B10; Douglas Feiden, D. Witter Fights WTC Lease, Says It Was Duped by PA, Daily News (New York), July 25, 1996, at 36. Some have suggested that Dean Witter's suit is largely motivated by business reasons rather than security concerns. While the firm locked in to a long-term lease at $ 35 per square foot, rents in the building have generally decreased to the point that some tenants now pay less than $ 25 per square foot. See id.

n60 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 698 n.88. Further, when contract claims are brought, they often appear as alternatives to claims based on tort theories and are therefore cursorily pleaded and prone to dismissal by courts. See Markatos, supra note 52, at 516.

n61 See Markatos, supra note 52, at 516.

n62 See Richmond Medical Supply Co. v. Clifton, 369 S.E.2d 407 (Va. 1988).

n63 See Markatos, supra note 52, at 516.

n64 See infra notes 228-36 and accompanying text.

n65 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 688.

n66 See W. Page Keeton et al., Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts section 30, at 164-65 (5th ed. 1984).

n67 With this said, the last basis for negligence claims, statutory violations, appears primarily in the residential context. Statutory requirements for the provision of different security measures do appear to be a growing trend, however, and may be applied with more frequency in the commercial context in the future. A landlord's compliance with statutory requirements usually does not protect him from liability, however, since they generally represent only minimum measures. See Glesner, supra note 29, at 702. For these reasons, and since no statutes currently address required antiterrorism measures, this basis for liability is not addressed extensively here, although it is suggested infra at notes 24446 and accompanying text.

REV_00261394

n68 Of these questions, the issue of when an act is foreseeable (thereby establishing duty) is the most troublesome and is discussed in detail in the text. The issue of proximate cause, or more specifically, determining when a criminal act intervenes between the negligence of the landlord and injury to the tenant, is also dependent on foreseeability since if the defendant should have foreseen the criminal's actions, such actions will not be considered superseding causes. See Restatement (Second) Torts sections 448-49 (1977). Technically, the plaintiff must also prove the threshold issue that the landlord's act or omission was the legal cause of his injury as well. However, courts have apparently not discussed this concept in detail. One author contends that while it is not clear that the causal link between provisions of security and likelihood of crime is legally sufficient, "situational crime prevention" studies do find that there is some relationship between opportunity and crime. Madeline Johnson, Landlord's Responsibility for Crime: Determining Legal Causation, 17 Real Est. L.J. 234, 241 (1989). Similar arguments may arise with regard to the relationship between "opportunity" and the incidence of terrorism, although terrorists' motivations differ from those of "ordinary" criminals. See infra notes 140, 145 and accompanying text.

While it has apparently not been a recurring issue in the regular crime cases, if landlords are held liable for the effects of terrorist acts, they may attempt to argue that the behavior of controversial tenants (e.g., performing abortions) itself constitutes a superseding cause that precludes their being held liable. See infra notes 211-24 (discussing the effects of landlord liability on controversial tenants).

The reasonableness of a landlord's response also involves issues of foreseeability since landlords effectively need to predict what types of security will prove adequate to prevent attempted crimes. However, courts have not been consistent in finding what measures constitute adequate security. They have addressed the sufficiency of any number of security measures, from security guards to alarms to lighting, in different ways. See Jardel Co. v. Hughes, 523 A.2d 518, 525 (Del. 1987) (holding that whether one security guard on premises for each nightly shift was sufficient was question for jury); Peacock's, Inc. v. Shreveport Alarm Co., 510 So. 2d 387, 400 (La. Ct. App. 1987) (finding landlord partially liable for negligently allowing access to alarm controls); Shepard v. Drucker & Falk, 306 S.E.2d 199, 202 (N.C. Ct. App. 1983) (allowing landlord to present testimony comparing lighting at apartment complex with other complexes, since it was proper attempt to show whether reasonable care had been exercised). But see Carrigan v. New World Enterprises, Ltd., 446 N.E.2d 265, 270 (Ill. App. Ct. 1983) (holding landlord's breach of contractual obligation to maintain burglar alarm was not sufficient to trigger liability for tenant's rape). In one case, the court denied recovery where "the plaintiff failed to adduce testimony from a qualified expert in the field of building security thereby leaving the jury" to speculate regarding the deficiencies in security, if any, at the time of the incident. Iannelli v. Powers, 498 N.Y.S.2d 377, 382 (N.Y. App. Div. 1986). Certainly, questions of when more sophisticated antiterrorism security measures are reasonable will be even more difficult for courts to handle. For example, when are crash barriers and photo I.D. access reasonable? This issue seems destined to foster a battle of experts at trial. See supra note 7 and accompanying text; infra notes 142-63.

n69 See, e.g., Glesner, supra note 29, at 707.

n70 See id. at 704.

n71 224 N.W.2d 843 (Mich. 1975).

REV_00261395

n72 Id. at 849 (citation omitted).

n73 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 703. Unlike under the special relationship formulation, there is no presumption that landlord's have a duty to protect tenants. Id.

n74 531 N.E.2d 1358 (Ill. 1988).

n75 Id. at 1367-68. Some commentators have noted that this dual role of foreseeability is problematic. While foreseeability is usually understood to define and limit the scope of a pre-existing duty, it is not generally used to "justify the imposition of duty." Haines, supra note 34, at 339; see also Sharp, supra note 23, at 21.

n76 Kline v. 1500 Massachusetts Avenue Apartment Corp., 439 F.2d 477, 480 n.3, 483 (D.C. Cir 1970).

n77 Samson v. Saginaw Professional Building, Inc., 224 N.W.2d 843, 851 (Mich. 1975).

n78 See Old v. Lefmark Management Co., 1995 WL 500619, at *2 (Tex. Ct. App. Aug. 24, 1995). The letter also requested that "if the results of this survey indicate additional security is needed for the common areas, please take the appropriate action necessary to protect our employees and customers." Id. The actual notice standard is also apparently reflected in Rowe, where plaintiffs had to prove that the landlord actually knew that unauthorized possession of master keys would lead to illegal entry. See 531 N.E.2d at 1367-68, n79 See Fowler, supra note 43, at 145. In some cases, it is clear that courts have also used the defendants' security precautions as evidence of their "constructive notice" of risks. See Hardie, supra note 16, at 400.

n80 See infra notes 190-99 and accompanying text (discussing the existence of a security report warning of susceptibility to terrorist attacks).

n81 See Fowler, supra note 43, at 145.

n82 See Welch, supra note 42, at 1060.

n83 See id.

n84 See Markatos, supra note 52, at 513 (quoting the court in Isaacs v. Huntington Memorial Hosp., 695 P.2d 653 (Cal. 1985) (criticized by Ann. M. v. Pacific Plaza Shopping Center, 863 P.2d 207 (Cal. 1993))). This prompted one Florida court in rejecting this definition to declare that it would not "sacrifice the first victim's right to safety upon the altar of foreseeability by slavishly adhering to the . . . notion that at least one criminal assault must have occurred on the premises before the landlord can be held liable." Paterson v. Deeb, 472 So. 2d 1210, 1219 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1985) (rejecting the prior similar incidents rule).

n85 See Markatos, supra note 52, at 513. In jurisdictions following this rule, there is a general sense that in order to qualify as "prior similar incidents," crimes must be on the premises, be sufficient in number and recent enough to put the landlord on notice, and be sufficiently similar in nature to the incident in question. See Glesner, supra note 29, at 706.

n86 695 P.2d 653 (Cal. 1985). See Welch, supra note 42, at 1061.

n87 863 P.2d 207 (Cal. 1993).

n88 See id. The court went on to note, however, that the foreseeability of the harm should still be balanced against the burden of the duty imposed--reserving the questions of whether

REV_00261396

I. Analysis of Potential Claims

A. Victim Compensation for Terrorist Attacks in the United States--Statutory Claims

While there are some statutory provisions addressing victim compensation for acts of terrorism, they have traditionally been inadequate for a number of reasons. For example, the only appropriation aimed at providing direct assistance to victims of the Oklahoma City bombing seems to be the $ 39 million Community Development Block Grant. [17] Other statutory provisions, which theoretically apply to victims of terrorism or other international incidents, apply only in narrow sets of circumstances. For example, the Torture Victim Protection Act provides that a "private cause of action in federal court against individuals who commit such abuses while acting under 'actual or apparent authority, or color of law, of [*161] any foreign nation,'" may be brought by or on behalf of a United States citizen who was a victim of torture or summary execution. [18] The Warsaw Convention [19] addresses incidents on international airlines, and the Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act provides relief only to victims associated with the United States government. [20] Moreover, even those victims who do fall under one of these "patchwork" statutory provisions are generally not fully compensated. [21] Thus, "it is inevitable . . . that there will be individuals, including United States citizens, who will be victimized by terrorism and forced to suffer injury without remedy." [22] If statutory recoveries are insufficient, victims are likely to turn to the courts, bringing civil suits against one of the parties involved to obtain compensation for their injuries. [23]

B. Civil Litigation--Background

In the types of terrorist acts contemplated here, parties that could be potentially held responsible by victims include the terrorist organization, security firms, and landowners. [24] Bringing suit [*162] against the responsible terrorist organization itself is not unheard of. For example, the son and daughter of Leon Klinghoffer sued the Palestinian Liberation Organization ("PLO") after their father was murdered during the Achille Lauro incident. [25] However, as in ordinary criminal cases, plaintiffs are not likely to target those parties where recovery is difficult due to insufficient or hard-toreach assets. Security firms or landlords would seem to provide an easier recovery. Indeed, if it can be proved that a security firm was negligent in its provision of services, it should be susceptible to liability itself. [26] However, a landlord would likely not escape liability even in that case, because if a landlord has an affirmative duty to protect the plaintiff, then the landlord remains liable for negligence in selecting, directing, or supervising the security agency. [27] The likely target for injured plaintiffs will be the solvent party with the most broadly defined responsibility for protection--the landowner. [28]

C. Landowner Liability for Criminal Acts of Third Parties

This landowner-as-target hypothesis is borne out by the many suits filed as a result of criminal acts of third parties. A victim of a terrorist (or criminal) act could file a complaint against an allegedly negligent landlord for failing to secure the premises under a number of different theories, with differing likelihoods of success. While landlords now have some duty to protect their tenants from third-party crime in practically every jurisdiction, [29] the extent of [*163] such duty varies greatly depending upon the jurisdiction, and sometimes even the court. [30]

1. Background

For a full understanding of the problems involved in predicting the success of these claims, some background is necessary. The unsettled state of the law in this area is due to several factors. Traditionally, landlords did not have any special duty regarding the security of their tenants, a corollary of the rule that private parties generally have no duty to rescue others. [31] Only within the last twenty-five years have landlords been held liable to their tenants for a commercial leasehold that is "inherently dangerous" or in the immediate proximity to a substantially similar business that has experienced prior crimes could trigger a duty without itself being the site of any prior similar incidents. See id. at 215-16; Welch, supra note 42, at 1065-66.

n89 As one commentator noted, "The Ann M. Court reasoned that landowners would unjustly become the insurers of public safety if plaintiffs could prove the degree of foreseeability required to impose liability without offering evidence of prior similar crimes." Mark Bianchi, Tort-Law--Revisiting Isaacs: A Commercial Landowner's Duty to Protect Against Criminal Acts of Third Parties--Ann M. v. Pacific Plaza Shopping Center, 28 Suffolk U. L. Rev. 306, 311 (1994). "The court decided to revisit Issacs in light of the increase in violent crime and pressure from the court of appeals." Id. at 311 n.29 (citations omitted).

n90 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 679-82 (noting a correlation between increasing crime rates and landlord liability in general); Milich, supra note 42, at 236 (noting that "not to be overlooked as influencing modern-day judges is the rising crime rate."); Welch, supra note 42, at 1057 (noting that "crime problems of epidemic proportions caused courts to recognize . . . exceptions to their judicially created no-duty rules.").

n91 See infra Part III discussing alternatives.

n92 See Markatos, supra note 52, at 514. Obviously, prior similar crimes on the premises remain highly probative under this theory, which effectively holds only that an absence of prior similar crimes does not foreclose liability. See, e.g., Whittaker v. Saraceno, 635 N.E.2d 1185, 1188 (Mass. 1994) ("The previous occurrence of similar criminal acts on or near a defendant's premises is a circumstance to consider, but the foreseeability question is not conclusively answered in favor of a defendant landlord if there has been no prior similar criminal act.").

n93 See, e.g., Kaufman, supra note 15, at 97 ("To date, only California has adhered to this rule in the business-invitee context.").

n94 See Markatos, supra note 52, at 514.

n95 See Green Cos. v. DiVencenzo, 432 So. 2d 86 (Fla Dist. Ct. App. 1983).

n96 Daniel P. Kennedy, Inadequate Security and Premises Liability, Trial, June, 1991, at 56.

n97 If a landlord is aware of such reports, at some level of specificity to her premises she may be considered to have notice under even the most restrictive definition of foreseeability. See supra notes 76-81 and accompanying text (discussing the role of notice in varying definitions of foreseeability).

n98 See Kaufman, supra note 15, at 97.

n99 See id. at 98.

n100 See Sharp, supra note 23, at 32-34.

n101 See infra notes 164-69 and accompanying text (discussing the use of warnings against terrorist attacks).

n102 See infra notes 211-24 and accompanying text (discussing the negative implications to these types of tenants of imposing this duty on landlords).

n103 Hardie, supra note 16, at 367.

REV_00261397

n104 In fact, foreseeability has been held to just be a tool of the courts; changing as needed to mask public policy decisions about how broad a landowner's duty should be. See Hardie, supra note 16, at 393; Welch, supra note 42, at 1057 n.25.

n105 For example, one commentator feels that:

Courts are uncomfortable with jury determinations of foreseeability as an element of duty in causes of action that have not yet matured and that have not yet been established as common theories with which the court is familiar. Until this maturation occurs, courts simply will continue to decide cases on the basis of policy considerations.

Hardie, supra note 16, at 392. Of course, this does not bode well for the development of a clear definition of foreseeability in landowner liability for acts of terrorism.

n106 See Johnson, supra note 68, at 247. This is basically a permutation of the famous "Hand formula." See United States v. Carroll Towing Co., 159 F.2d 169 (2d Cir. 1947). One commentator has noted, however, that in an evaluation of this "formula" for criminal acts, the third factor, probability, has been underplayed since it is the most difficult to evaluate. See Johnson, supra note 68, at 248. Johnson further notes that empirical studies suggest a causal link between physical conditions controlled by the landlord and crime, but that there is no way to determine the exact probability of a given crime given a certain condition. See id.; supra note 68.

n107 Further, in evaluating available alternatives, the landowner is generally found culpable if a reasonable person would have chosen an option that would have avoided the injury. See Johnson, supra note 68, at 248. However, reasonable landlords have much less information about what measures will prevent the commission of terrorism than they do about regular crime.

n108 See Hardie, supra note 16, at 390.

n109 See Kaufman, supra note 15, at 100.

n110 As one commentator has noted:

Courts and commentators have long recognized that any case which goes to a jury under general instructions on the foreseeability of a heinous crime almost invariably results in a verdict for the plaintiff. With hindsight, juries inevitably find that more security should have been employed since the security provided was in fact inadequate. It is precisely for this reason that most cases surviving a motion for summary judgment result in large settlements for the plaintiffs.

Id.

n111 In other words, spend more on protection than the theoretically efficient legal standard would require in order to take into account the court's "margin of error" in determining fault. See Kaufman, supra note 15, at 105.

REV_00261398

n112 See id.

n113 See Sharp, supra note 23, at 19.

n114 There is no reason for plaintiffs not to forego suit because their legal fees are a percentage of recovery; there is little incentive for defendants to proceed to trial because they do have real legal costs and the probability of success and range of potential verdicts will be hard to quantify. See Hardie, supra note 16, at 405. This arguably puts defendants in the position of settling on amounts in excess of optimum.

n115 See supra note 42.

n116 See Royal Neckwear Co. v. Century City, Inc., 252 Cal. Rptr. 810 (Cal. Ct. App. 1988) (holding that a commercial landlord does not owe a duty to safeguard tenant's property from foreseeable criminal activity by third parties); Craig v. AAR Realty, 576 A.2d 688 (Del. Super. Ct. 1989) (denying liability of owner of large mall who did not retain control); Czech v. Aspen Indus. Ctr., 368 A.2d 938 (N.J. Super. 1976) (rejecting liability for landlord, the court distinguished commercial from residential tenancies in terms of fairness and public interest); Exxon v. Tidwell, 867 S.W.2d 19, 21 (Tex. 1993) (stating that the general rule in a commercial setting "is that a landlord is not liable to a lessee for injuries caused by an unsafe condition, which can include the unreasonable risk of harm from criminal intrusions, unless the landlord was aware of the latent dangerous condition at the time the premises were let."); Glesner, supra note 29, at 684 n.16 (noting that "many courts apply a lower standard of security for commercial buildings").

n117 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 684 n.16.

n118 See, e.g., Gibson & Klayman, supra note 43, at 27-28 (noting that "in most instances [commercial tenants] bargaining power is comparable--or perhaps superior--to that of the landlord. They can protect themselves by demanding express warranties that improve safety").

n119 See Selvin, supra note 37, at 328 n.61 (quoting Dietz v. Miles Holding Corp., 277 A.2d 108, 110 n.2 (D.C. App. 1971) which stated that "the residential housing market offers markedly less alternatives to tenants than does the commercial office building market").

n120 See id. at 323. For example, most commercial buildings by definition must be open to the public during the business day. In one case involving a government building, the court held that it was that nature of a such a building that it "remain accessible and open to the steady flow of dissimilar citizens" and that this was a reality that the court should realize in imposing liability. Id. at 327 (quoting Turner v. United States, 473 F. Supp. 317 (D.D.C. 1979)).

n121 See id. at 325.

n122 An apartment building, for example, is fairly self-contained. A commercial premises, like the World Trade Center, can extend over a city block (parking garages, walkways, plazas, etc.). Theoretically, the landlord's protective liability should diminish as does his control--varying with proximity, although it is not clear where it should end. See Selvin, supra note 37, at 330; Sharp, supra note 23, at 14 n.3.

n123 See Selvin, supra note 37, at 328.

n124 See id. at 324.

n125 See Gibson & Klayman, supra note 43, at 27. This consideration may not translate well to the terrorism context because of the often sophisticated and extensive security and structural measures required. For example, in the World Trade Center case, Dean Witter, certainly a sophisticated tenant, claims to have relied on the Port Authority's representations. See supra notes 57-59 and accompanying text.

n126 This rationale does not necessarily imply the same result if only one tenant occupies the leasehold, since then the tenant would be best able to provide protection. See Comment, Torts--Landlord-Tenant Relations--Landlord has Duty to Take Reasonable Precautions to Protect his Tenants Against Criminal Acts of Third Parties--Kline v. 1500 Massachusetts Ave. Apartment Corp., 45 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 943, 951 n.53 (1970) [hereinafter Landlord-Tenant Relations].

n127 A final difference between commercial and residential tenancies is that a business expects customers and has employees. It has been assumed here that invitees, employees of tenants, and tenants are treated in the same manner (i.e., entitled to the same protection). Indeed this seems to be the case in most jurisdictions. See Doyle v. Exxon, 592 F.2d 44 (2d Cir. 1979) (finding duty to protect employee of tenant); Ann M. v. Pacific Plaza Shopping Ctr., 863 P.2d 207, 212-13 (Cal. 1993) (stating that because the commercial tenant generally is not a natural person and because it acts through its employees, "it cannot be seriously asserted that a tort duty that a landlord owes to protect the personal safety of its tenants should not extend to its tenant's employees"); Haines, supra note 34, Landlord-Tenant Relations, supra note 126, at 950; Selvin, supra note 37, at 325. But see Cornpropst v. Sloan, 528 S.W.2d 188 (Tenn. 1975) (denying plaintiff-shopper's complaint stressing both the absence of landlord-tenant relationship and that the case involved commercial vs. residential property).

Under this assumption, standards of liability would theoretically not be affected by the difference. A complete discussion of this issue is beyond the scope of this Note, therefore it is assumed for present purposes that invitees and employees of tenants are treated in the same manner as tenants wherever possible. However, employees of tenants will often be precluded from filing suit due to worker's compensation statutes. See supra note 24.

n128 See supra note 30 and accompanying text.

n129 While this is the case with many types of claims, it is particularly disturbing in the context of terrorism where preventive measures seem most effective when conducted based on a consistent national, if not international, scale. See infra notes 158-63 and accompanying text.

n130 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 761; supra notes 111-12.

n131 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 773.

n132 See id. at 707; supra note 113 and accompanying text.

n133 One additional issue beyond the scope of this paper is the treatment of government entities in their roles as landlords. As evidenced by the Oklahoma City bombing, government buildings may often be the target of terrorist attacks. While there may be certain filing or notification requirements specific to government landlords, it appears that there are tenable arguments that there should be no difference between suing government and private landlords, since the former are acting in a proprietary capacity. See Wise, supra note 24, at 1. See generally, Attorney General's Advocacy Institute, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Federal Tort Claims Act Litigation Seminar (1990); Irvin M. Gottlieb & Paul H. Gantt, Uncle Sam as a Landlord under the Federal Tort Claims Act (1967).

n134 For example, in other areas of the law, the success of a claim often depends, at least in part, on who gets to define it; that is, whether an act results in the violation of a federal statute (as defined in federal court) or in a breach of contract (as defined in state court).

REV_00261400

n135 Cases brought as a result of terrorist bombings on airlines, such as the Pan Am incident over Lockerbie, involve very different legal theories than those at issue here since the standard for liability is outlined statutorily under the Warsaw Convention. See, e.g., In re Air Disaster at Lockerbie Scotland on December 21, 1988, 37 F.3d 804 (2d Cir. 1994). Other United States cases have involved acts that could be defined as terrorism, but do not raise the same issues as the types of acts involving domestic landowners as contemplated here. See Tel-Oren v. Libyan Arab Republic, 726 F.2d 774 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (relatives of Israelis killed in a PLO attack brought suit under the Alien Tort Claims Act); New Market Investment Corp. v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 774 F. Supp. 909 (E.D. Pa. 1991) (Chilean grapes laced with cyanide seized at customs). More random acts of retribution not involving political overtones (e.g., acts committed by disgruntled employees and sociopathic individuals) are also not addressed here. See, e.g., Douglas Waller & Tom Morganthau, Caught by Surprise, Newsweek, Mar. 8, 1993 at 28 (quoting Jerry Bremer, the State Department's top counterterrorism official in the 1980s who commented after the World Trade Center bombing, "We shouldn't automatically assume this is the beginning of a new world war. . . . It's entirely plausible that this is some disgruntled employee who's been fired."); cf. Vrndavan v. Malcolm, No. 64839, 1994 WL 86225 (Ohio Ct. App. March 17, 1994) (involving a lone gunman entering Cleveland public library at noon and randomly shooting three people). Finally, a number of domestic cases use the term "terrorism" or "terroristic" but really involve more ordinary, random criminal activity, such as "terroristic threatening," which is a misdemeanor in some states. See, e.g., Parker v. Norris, 859 F. Supp. 1203 (E.D. Ark. 1994).

n136 Porras, supra note 6, at 125. See also Captain Bruce T. Smith, Assertion of Adjudicatory Jurisdiction by United States Courts Over International Terrorism Cases, Army Law., Oct. 1991, at 15 (noting that each state has advanced a different definition of the term; in effect, "one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter"). The term terrorism has therefore been held to be "Humpty Dumpty," or anything we want it to be. See Porras, supra note 6, at 124; see also, R. Thackrah, Terrorism: A Definitional Problem, in Contemporary Research on Terrorism 24 (Paul Wilkenson & Alasdair M. Stewart eds., 1987). A federal statute currently defines terrorism as "premeditated, politically motivated violence perpetrated against noncombatant targets by subnational groups or clandestine agents," usually intended to influence an audience. 22 U.S.C. section 2656f(d)(2) (1994) (prescribing annual country reports on terrorism by the Secretary of State). The United States Department of Defense calls it "the unlawful use or threatened use of force or violence against individuals or property, with the intention of coercing or intimidating governments or societies, often for political or ideological purposes." Smith, supra, at 15.

n137 See Porras, supra note 6, at 144.

n138 See Waller & Morganthau, supra note 135, at 28 (contending that the reason for the change are intelligence agencies' increased abilities to monitor terrorist activities).

n139 See infra notes 152-54 and accompanying text.

n140 See Ayaz R. Shaikh, A Theoretic Approach to Transnational Terrorism, 80 Geo. L.J. 2133, 2174 n.15 (1992).

n141 And further, they should affect who we want to have define (courts vs. legislatures) the behavior that constitutes terrorism. A case-by-case development of a definition in the courts would seem destined to perpetuate the unpredictability and inequity currently associated with foreseeability.

n142 See supra note 15 and accompanying text.

n143 Greenberger, supra note 8, at A1.

REV_00261401

n144 "If you want to counter terrorism, 80 percent is a matter of getting good intelligence. . . . You can fiddle around with the other 20 percent all you want, but in terms of prevention, intelligence is the key." Masland et al., supra note 7, at 56-57 (quoting L. Paul Bremer, who headed President Reagan's counterterrorism office).

n145 See Shaikh, supra note 140, at 2134.

n146 Mark A. Hofmann, Perils an Impossible Task, Bus. Ins., June 12, 1995, at 3.

n147 "The critical thing is to keep the weapons as far from the building as possible, by imposing some setbacks." Id. (quoting Eve Hinman, security analyst with Failure Analysis Associates). Examples of setbacks include pop-up bollards, such as pipes filled with concrete that can be recessed to street level and raised when needed to restrict vehicular traffic. See id.

n148 "In a bomb attack, generally speaking, the primary sources of both property damage and bodily injury is flying glass." Id. (quoting Ron Massa, president of Loron Corp., a high-tech security consultant, who also noted that a 1993 Irish Republican Army bombing in London showered the surrounding area with 700 tons of shattered glass). After the Oklahoma City bombing, more than 400 buildings in the area had glass broken and about 75% of the people injured were hurt by flying glass. See Hofmann, supra note 146, 148, at 3; see also Leslie Scism & Joe Davidson, Insurance Losses in Oklahoma Bombing Seen Topping Several Hundred Million, Wall St. J. May 4, 1995, at A4. Preventive measures include installing laminated glass, like that used in cars. Hofmann, supra note 146, at 3.

n149 Bombs, for example, produce enormous vertical thrust capable of "peeling roofs right off like a sardine can," requiring that they essentially be tied down. Hofmann, supra note 146, at 3. As opposed to retro-fitting buildings for restricting access, structural hardening is much more difficult, is costly, and is of questionable effectiveness. The Oklahoma City bombing made us all familiar with the structural concerns present in trying to protect against a bomb blast. See id.

n150 See id. For example, security bars on windows can hamper a tenant's escape from a burning building.

n151 "I think the answer has to be in the prevention area as opposed to protection." Id. (quoting Fred Deacon, highly respected risk engineering manager for Kemper Insurance).

n152 Christopher Dickey, Car Bombs: A Potent Weapon of Fear, Newsweek, Mar. 8, 1993, at 29.

n153 See Waller & Morganthau, supra note 135, at 28.

n154 Dickey, supra note 152, at 29; see also Sunday Today, (NBC television broadcast, Jan. 7, 1996) (interviewing Brian Jenkins, a terrorism expert who noted a trend discernible in the 1990's toward the increasing incidence of large-scale indiscriminate violence exemplified by car bombs).

n155 See James Adams & Maurice Chittenden, 18-Minute Countdown To Carnage, Sunday Times (London), July 28, 1996, section 1, at 2.

n156 See id.

n157 Shaikh, supra note 140, at 2141-42. In 1990, for example, "hard" targets (military, government, and diplomatic) accounted for 25% of attacks, businesses and other targets accounted for 75%. See id. at 2142 n.42 (citing United States Department of State, Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1990 37 (1991).

REV_00261402

n158 Howard M. Shapiro, The FBI in the 21st Century, Address at the Cornell Law School (Oct. 18, 1994), in 28 Cornell Int'l. L.J. 219, 223 (1995); see also James Q. Wilson, The Case for Greater Vigilance, Time, May 1, 1995, at 73 ("Terrorist groups . . . are best attacked by infiltration. This means either planting an undercover agent in their midst or recruiting one of their members as an informant. This is the job of the FBI.").

n159 See Shapiro, supra note 158, at 223.

n160 See id.

n161 See Wilson, supra note 158, at 73.

n162 Greenberger, supra note 8, at A1.

n163 See, e.g., Shaikh, supra note 140, at 2134.

n164 See James Rainey, Threats of Terrorism: When to Tell the Public, L.A. Times, July 4, 1995, at 1, available in 1995 WL 2062176.

n165 See id.

n166 See id.

n167 See supra notes 76-81 and accompanying text. For example, while the United States Department of Transportation is now required to assess the safety of foreign airports and issue warnings when they do not meet safety standards, airlines themselves decide what, if anything, to tell passengers about known threats. Many airline officials feel compelled to disclose threats because of litigation following the Pan Am Lockerbie incident, where juries awarded almost $ 40 million to plaintiffs for Pan Am's failure to take proper precautions. A terrorist bomb downed Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland in 1988. Travelers on the flight were not informed that terrorists had threatened several flights, like Flight 103, that had originated in Frankfurt, Germany.

n168 See Rainey, supra note 164, at 1.

n169 See id.

n170 See Pacelle, supra note 3, at B1. One New York insurance lawyer notes that "insurance companies do not pay any large losses without a fight. I call it insurance nullification by litigation." Id.

n171 Id. (quoting Phoenix Assurance lawyer Blair Fensterstock).

n172 See, e.g., Wise, supra note 2, at 1 (noting that one firm represents 20 insurance companies seeking to recover over $ 75 million in claims).

n173 For damage attributable to a terrorist attack, any number of policies might apply. Direct physical damage to insured property as a result of fire, smoke, or vibrations is generally covered by a property policy. Indirect losses resulting from a tenant's loss of use of their property may be covered by either a property or business interruption policy. General liability policies should cover tenants for damages they may incur because of damage to a third party (e.g., if a customer's business is interrupted because of the terrorist act). See Rhonda D. Orin, Insurance May Provide Glimmer of Light for Darkened World Trade Center Businesses, N.Y. L.J., Mar. 10, 1993, at 1.

REV_00261403

n174 Using the World Trade Center bombing as an example, indirect losses alone can often be significant. New York City officials have estimated that companies and government agencies could lose $ 692 million if the World Trade Center was closed for a week. See id.

n175 Id. at 7.

n176 Id. at 6.

n177 See id.

n178 See Orin, supra note 173, at 1. The court, in Pan American World Airways v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 505 F.2d 989 (2d Cir. 1974), relied on the fact that Pan Am was covered by an "all risk" policy, where all risks not excluded are automatically included.

n179 See Orin, supra note 173, at 1 (citing Emons Indus. Inc. v. Liberty Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 545 F. Supp. 185, 189 (S.D.N.Y. 1982) ("New York law places the burden of proof upon the insurance company to show any exclusions.")).

n180 Hartford said that there should be no problem with coverage because under its policies the exclusion only applies if war has been declared. Aetna argued that it was too soon to say how the exclusion would be applied. See Wise, supra note 24, at 1. The spokesperson for Hartford said that standard clauses (in this case coverage exclusions for damage attributable to "insurrection and acts of war") are recommended to the industry by the Insurance Services Office, a trade organization, and that each company has its own interpretation of such language. Id.

n181 See William B. Bice, Comment, British Government Reinsurance and Acts of Terrorism: The Problems of Pool Re, 15 U. Pa. J. Int'l. Bus. L. 441, 448 n.39 (1994) (stating that the World Trade Center provides an ideal example of a no-exclusion policy). Should incidences of domestic terrorism continue, it may not be long until domestic insurers covering U.S. commercial risks attempt to use terrorism exclusions as well.

n182 See supra note 173 and accompanying text.

n183 See Today's News Update, N.Y. L.J., Aug. 2, 1994, at 1. The World Trade Center cases were consolidated on June 4, 1994 upon a motion of the Port Authority which argued that (1) the claims all involved Port Authority's liability; (2) the salient facts involved (place, date, time) were the same in every case; (3) the fact that there were some issues of law and fact that were not common should not defeat the motion to consolidate since there was at least one important issue of law/substantial fact in common; and (4) consolidation would avoid unnecessary duplication of trials, save unnecessary costs and expense, and prevent injustice resulting from divergent decisions based on the same facts. See Green & Tripathi, supra note 1, at 48-49.

n184 As Justice Sklar noted in the course of the first conference of the World Trade Center litigation, "We have to have coordination to avoid wasting your time and my time, . . . failure to organize . . . would be anti-ecological. . . ." Wise, supra note 2, at 1.

n185 Courts have avoided the use of class actions for "mass accidents," perhaps largely because of differences between plaintiffs' injuries or damages. See Jenkins v. Raymark Indus., Inc., 782 F.2d 468, 473 (5th Cir. 1986) (allowing certification of a class action for asbestos claims).

n186 In the World Trade Center litigation, of the roughly 114 lawyers representing the 661 claimants, only four objected to the creation of the committee, and they will manage their cases separately. See Today's News Update, supra note 183, at 1. The lawyer leading the committee, Blair Fensterstock, represents Phoenix Assurance Co., one of the insurance companies attempting to subrogate claims related to the blast. See Wise, supra note 2, at 1, 5; see also supra note 9 (discussing the types of claims filed). In making recommendations for the committee, Fensterstock acknowledged that it is not always easy to please the variety of plaintiffs. For example, some lawyers with personal injury claims are concerned that their clients' interests might get lost if the committee is dominated by lawyers representing commercial clients. See Wise, supra note 2, at 5.

REV_00261404

n187 See supra note 7.

n188 Fed. R. Evid. 407. New York state courts do not follow the Federal Rules of Evidence, but they do follow a common law rule which holds that evidence of subsequent remedial measures is not admissible at trial to prove the negligence or culpable conduct of a defendant. See Particia A. Brass, Federal Rule of Evidence 407: Should It Apply to Products Liability, 11 Touro L. Rev. 253, 280 (1994).

n189 Fed. R. Evid. 407.

n190 See Matter of World Trade Center Bombing Cases, N.Y. L.J., Apr. 14, 1995, at 26.

n191 Id. "The public interest privilege applies to 'confidential communications between public officers, and to public officers, in the performance of their duties, where the public interest requires that such confidential communications or their sources should not be divulged.'" Id. (quoting Cirale v. 80 Pine St. Corp., 316 N.E.2d 301, 303 (N.Y. 1974)). While perhaps limited to quasi-governmental agencies like the Port Authority, many of the policy arguments presented by the public interest privilege issue are likely to be raised in admissibility questions generally. For example, in arguing against discovery of the documents on this basis, the Port Authority emphasized that in preparing the reports, employees consulted with the "FBI, CIA, the National Security Agency, the Department of Defense, Scotland Yard, and intelligence and counterintelligence agencies of Israel, France, Switzerland, and Italy," and claimed that revealing the contents of the report would discourage such cooperation in the future. Matter of World Trade Center Bombing Cases, supra note 190, at 26. Further, the Port Authority argued that the documents should not be revealed because they contained information which could adversely affect security if used by a "person intending to engage in activity injurious to persons and property at the World Trade Center. . . ." Id. Finally, the Port Authority argued that the plaintiffs would not be foreclosed from establishing that their injuries resulted from Port Authority's lack of due care since they could go to other sources (e.g., expert testimony) to establish negligence. See id. at 27.

The plaintiffs responded that the public interest privilege should be construed narrowly because: (1) the public interest privilege would not apply to a private landlord in this instance, a fortiori it should not be applied here; and (2) the Port Authority failed to show how revealing the security reports would inhibit communication. See id. at 26. They also alleged that the public interest would be better served if the documents were disclosed because the revelation of the Port Authority's vulnerabilities would force it to take remedial measures, and that even if privilege applies, all of the Port Authority's concerns could be met via use of a confidentiality order. See id. at 26-27.

The judge ordered an in camera review of the documentation in order to determine whether it should be privileged. See Matter of World Trade Center Bombing Cases, supra note 190, at 27. He is expected to decide which security reports the plaintiffs may receive in September, 1996. See Feiden, supra note 59, at 36.

n192 Pacelle, supra note 3, at B10.

n193 Id.

n194 See Wise, supra note 2, at 5. This may raise an interesting agency question: when could a landlord be considered to have constructive knowledge of the risks? However, this question is beyond the scope of this Note. In this case, since the reports were apparently prepared for the Port Authority's executive director, it seems clear that the Port Authority would be considered to have constructive knowledge.

REV_00261405

n195 See Matter of the World Trade Center Cases, supra note 190, at 26. Also, as discussed above, Dean Witter alleges that the Port Authority misrepresented security in lease negotiations, so that evidence of the Port Authority's knowledge is necessary in proving its claims of fraud. See id.

n196 See id. at 27.

n197 Id.

n198 Id. The judge cited Nallan v. Helmsley-Spear, Inc., 407 N.E.2d 451, 458 n.8 (N.Y. 1980), for the proposition that the jury may take into account the cost of the safety measures in determining the reasonableness of the safety measures. See id.

n199 See id.

n200 See supra notes 142-63 and accompanying text.

n201 See Gary T. Schwartz, Reality in the Economic Analysis of Tort Law: Does Tort Law Really Deter?, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 377, 416 (1994).

n202 See id.

n203 See id. at 444.

n204 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 773.

n205 See id.; see also Kaufman, supra note 15, at 109 n.24 ("The police function is highly specialized, involving skills and training which the government alone can provide. There is no room for the private devices of frontier days."); infra notes 211-224 and accompanying text (discussing potential violations of tenants' rights that could result). But see Fred C. Zacharias, The Politics of Torts, 95 Yale L.J. 698, 709 n.70 (1986) (arguing that "there is little danger that imposing liability will cause [security officers] to become vigilantes or 'officious intermeddlers' into private affairs").

n206 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 785.

n207 See id. In the context of terrorism, private security firms have initiated specialization in "crises response" services to respond to "acts of violence . . . directed at a company, governmental agency or individuals. . . ." Wackenhut Corporation Crisis Response Services Brochure (on file with author).

n208 See Kaufman, supra note 15, at 112 n.106 (quoting President's Commission on Law Enforcement, Report: The Challenge of Crime in A Free Society 35, 289 (1967)); Zacharias, supra note 205, at 709 ("The government's general responsibility for law enforcement does not eliminate the business's separate duty to supplement public compensation and public protection.").

n209 See supra notes 49-54 and accompanying text.

n210 This passage is based loosely on the "two restaurants" example in Adler, supra note 50, at 884.

REV_00261406

criminal acts of third parties. [32] Another cause of the unsettled nature of this doctrine may be some of the competing policy considerations evident throughout its uneven evolution, appearing first in the seminal case, Kline v. 1500 Massachusetts Avenue Apartment Corp. [33]

The Kline court imposed a duty on residential landlords to take reasonable steps to protect tenants from foreseeable criminal acts. This case is generally said to mark the initial departure from the traditional view that landlords had no duty to protect tenants. The court achieved this by extending the traditional landlord duty to maintain common areas in a reasonably safe condition beyond prevention from physical defects to protection from criminal acts. [34] This was done by: (1) applying the warranty of habitability [*164] to defects in security, and (2) by recognizing a special relationship between landlord and tenant; [35] both of which are critical theories of recovery in many jurisdictions today. While Kline provided an important remedy to victims of crime, it was also the harbinger of some of the uncertainty that continues to mark this area of the law. In defining the standard of landlord liability, for example, the Kline court equivocally remarked that the "landlord is no insurer of his tenants' safety, but he certainly is no bystander." [36] This rather tentative assertion apparently reflects the tension the court recognized in trying to fashion an efficient yet equitable result. [37] Further, Kline gives little guidance about what security measures are required of landlords once duty is established. [38] Subsequent cases have read Kline both narrowly and broadly; depending on jurisdiction and setting. [39] Answers to the two questions raised in Kline, namely the appropriate standard for establishing duty given efficiency and equity concerns, and the definition of appropriate responses to any duty imposed, will no doubt continue to occupy courts when the crime in question is terrorism.

2. Current Theories of Recovery

Depending on the jurisdiction and court, [40] any number of theories of landowner liability may be available for victims of terrorism. Current theories may be aggregated into five principal groups: (1) strict liability; (2) duty to maintain safe common areas; (3) voluntary assumption of duty to protect; (4) contract; and (5) negligence. An examination of the differing theories available is important in order to determine which of them will prove most [*165] successful for victims of terrorism. Outcomes for victims of more typical crimes vary primarily because their theories of liability use different definitions of foreseeability and require different landlord behavior. Further, different theories emphasize certain underlying policy concerns, which could have implications for how complaints alleging landlord liability for terrorist acts will be received by courts. Finally, although landlord liability for criminal acts first arose in a residential context, this Note focuses on commercial landlord liability since terrorist acts are most likely to involve that type of leasehold. While the appropriateness of the application is examined at the conclusion of this section, [41] commentators feel that most jurisdictions have generally "made no explicit distinction between commercial and residential landlords" in holding landlords liable for the criminal acts of third parties. [42] Therefore, this discussion initially assumes a commercial setting. [43]

a. Safe Common Areas

The duty to maintain common areas in a safe condition is perhaps the most traditional of all the theories of recovery. As the court in Kline noted, this duty applies the same rationale as the longstanding duty of landlords to protect tenants from unsafe physical defects. [44] To sustain this claim, a tenant must show both that [*166] the landlord had control of the area and knowledge of the defective condition, and that the defects foreseeably enhanced the risk of criminal activity. [45] Accessibility defects (e.g. defective locks) seem to trigger liability most often under this theory. [46] Perhaps because of its traditional nature, this approach has gained wide acceptance, even in jurisdictions reluctant to recognize landlord liability. [47] This theory of liability may have important ramifications for holding landlords liable for acts of terrorism due to its focus on the landlord's exclusive control of common areas. For example, in Kline, the court noted that the landlord is in an even better position than the police to take preventive measures. "Municipal police cannot patrol the entryways and the hallways, the n211 Glesner, supra note 29, at 762.

REV_00261371

n212 224 N.W.2d 843 (Mich. 1975); see also supra notes 70-72 and accompanying text (discussing the "special relationship" theory of liability).

n213 See Haines, supra note 34, at 344 (noting that "the majority opinion gives little guidance on this problem").

n214 See Samson, 224 N.W.2d at 849 (stating that "if the risk of death or serious bodily injury to a number of persons, the law requires that some care be exercised even though the probability is slight that the incident will occur").

n215 Haines, supra note 34, at 345.

n216 Collins v. AAA Homebuilders, 333 S.E.2d 792, 793 (W. Va. 1985).

n217 N.Y. Judge's Decision Turns Tenants Into Victims, Newsday, Nov. 1, 1995, at A28. (citing Long Island Gynecological Services, P.C. v. 1103 Stewart Ave. Associates Ltd. Partnership, No. 4890-95, 1995 WL 686571 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. Oct. 16, 1995), rev'd, 638 N.Y.S.2d 959 (N.Y. App. Div. 1996)). The Appellate Division has now enjoined the landlord from evicting the clinic pending the outcome of the appeal to the Court of Appeals. See Today's News Update, N.Y. L.J., Dec. 15, 1995, at 115.

n218 John T. McQuiston, Justice in Nassau Says Landlord May Evict Abortion Clinic, N.Y. Times, Oct. 31, 1995, at B1, B4. The landlord first told the clinic in January that they could no longer perform abortions, but then, after consulting with his attorney, revised the regulations to prohibit "tenants from 'engaging in any activity which, in and of itself, jeopardizes the safety or property of other tenants.'" Id.

n219 McQuiston, supra note 218, at B1; see also Peterson, Abortion Clinic Can Get Boot, Sez Judge, Daily News, Oct. 31, 1995, at 21 (noting that protesters also often aggressively confronted patients and staff, and sometimes other tenants of the building by mistake); New York: Judge Allows Abortion Clinic Eviction, in Abortion Report, Oct. 31, 1995, at 1 [hereinafter Abortion Report].

n220 See Peterson, supra note 219, at 21.

n221 Id.

n222 Abortion Report, supra note 219, at 1.

n223 McQuiston, supra note 218, at B1, B4.

n224 Id.

n225 See Sharp, supra note 23, at 51 (arguing that in the private context the "free market is better at allocating security resources").

n226 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 773; Haines, supra note 34, at 351 (both discussing this principle as applied to criminal acts). Also, short of leaving the real estate market, many landlords are likely to "overprotect" since it is difficult to set clear guidelines for liability given current negligence standards. This is an inefficient use of resources as the amount spent on protection (and passed on to consumers) will not reduce enough accidents to justify its costs. See supra notes 111-12 and accompanying text.

n227 Of course, landlords who have attempted to delegate security duties to an outside firm are attempting to shift risk as well, but will likely be less successful. See supra notes 26-n228 See Haines, supra note 34, at 346.

REV_00261407

27 and accompanying text.

n229 See William K. Jones, Private Revision of Public Standards: Exculpatory Agreements in Leases, 63 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 717, 727-28 (1988).

n230 "Courts have distinguished between residential and commercial leases, ruling that exculpatory clauses in most residential leases will be voided as against public policy." Daniel G. Hise, Landlord and Tenant--Exculpatory Clause in Lease Void as Against Public Policy--Cappaert v. Junker, 413 So. 2d 378 (Miss. 1982), 3 Miss. C. L. Rev. 253, 258 (1983). But see College Mobile Home Park and Sales, Inc. v. Hoffman, 241 N.W.2d 174, 177 (Wis. 1976) (arguing that the categorical distinction between residential and commercial leases is "artificial and arbitrary" in this context).

n231 See Jones, supra 229, at 729 (discussing statutes in New York, Illinois, Massachusetts, Maryland, and Georgia).

n232 See Jones, supra note 229, at 730.

n233 See, e.g., Vermes v. American Dist. Telegraph Co., 251 N.W.2d 101 (Minn. 1977) (holding that failure to advise tenant of qualities of jewelry store that might be undesirable was "active" negligence that could not be relieved by broad exculpatory clause in lease).

n234 See Hise, supra note 230, at 256; Jones, supra note 229, at 728-32.

n235 See Jones, supra note 229, at 731.

n236 See id.; see also Haines, supra note 34, at 347-48 n.159; Hise, supra note 230, at 258.

n237 For example, the following analysis as to criminal acts was presented in Craig v. A.A.R. Realty Corp., 576 A.2d 688 (Del. Super. Ct. 1989):

Of all the involved parties, the cost of crime reduction is cheapest to the landowner. For the criminal, imposing civil liability on him in addition to existing criminal sanctions does not deter him from committing the crime. Imposing duty on the patron, so that he must protect and compensate himself, may result in crime reduction, but only at the expensive cost of the patron staying home. . . . While the patron holds just one expensive [to society] option, staying home, the landowner holds many options . . . [such as] installation of better lighting, fences, or guard service. . . .

Id. at 693. Concerning terrorism, the issuance of warnings may be an example of where costs are clearly lowest to the landowner.

n238 See Johnson, supra note 68, at 250. And in some cases, of course, it may be clear that the landlord acted irresponsibly. For example, it may be possible to set the negligence standard high enough (e.g., actual notice for duty) that a true fault-based liability standard is approximated.

n239 Under a "political effects model," a new rule imposes liability on a well-represented group, which is expected to activate legislative attention to the problem, so that in the long run, the legislature will provide a solution and make the determination of who should bear accident costs and how. See Zacharias, supra note 205, at 725. While Zacharias argues that his model would work in the context of landlord liability for criminal acts, he might reject the imposition of liability on landlords for acts of terrorism for the same reasons he rejects liability for hijacking airlines. See id. at 750.

n240 See generally Kaufman, supra note 15, at 103-08.

n241 "To effectively guide primary behavior . . . legal rules must inform people of liabilities that will be imposed for particular behavior. To do that they must be clear, they must refer to verifiable facts and they must not call for unachievable behavior." Adler, supra note 50, at 920.

n242 See supra notes 89-91 and accompanying text.

n243 See supra notes 17-23 and accompanying text.

n244 See supra note 67 and accompanying text.

n245 See, e.g., Haines, supra note 34, at 353-54 (arguing that courts may not provide the most appropriate forum for determining the type of protection to which tenants should be legally entitled, and that legislatures should act to place duty on landlords to use reasonable care, which should be specifically defined at a minimum level).

n246 And providing a consistent national benchmark for establishing duty.

n247 See Bice, supra note 181, at 463-64.

n248 All losses in Northern Ireland between 1968 and 1993 totaled Sterling695 million. See id. at 464.

n249 See id. at 447-48 (listing potential economic consequences of the lack of coverage for terrorism losses including: widespread business bankruptcies; bank lending bases secured by property becoming suspect; property developers becoming unable to secure financing; and pension funds becoming unable to rely on income from property investments). The British government was also pressured to step in by the Association of British Insurers, who argued that "terrorism is a political problem and that the government should therefore bear the losses." Id. at 448 n.36.

n250 Reinsurance is "the insurance by an insurer of the liability of another insurer arising under contracts of insurance which the latter has entered into"--practically meaning that "reinsurers insure direct insurers for a pre-determined part of their liability." Id. at 442-43.

n251 See id. at 441.

n252 The layers are (1) a primary layer of regular property coverage with a policyholder's direct insurer; (2) if that is exhausted, an additional layer of up to Sterling100,000, also with direct insurers; (3) and (4) two layers provided directly through Pool Re, if premiums paid to Pool Re are exhausted (third), member insurers in the pool contribute an additional 10% (fourth); and (5) if all these are exhausted, the British government is ultimately is liable for all excess losses. See generally Bice, supra note 181, at 449-54. Pool Re has approximately 115 insurance companies and 120 Lloyd's syndicates as members who "cede" premiums to the pool to reinsure risks of terrorism. See id. at 450.

n253 For example, "target risk" is determined by rate setting personnel based on whether and to what extent a particular property is at risk of terrorist attack. See id. at 452.

n254 See id.

REV_00261409

n255 See id. at 459, 461-62.

n256 Id. at 466. In general, OPIC offers programs to insure United States investments in developing countries against currency inconvertibility and expropriation, as well as political violence. Most forms of long-term investment (equity, debt, loan guarantees, and leases) may be insured.

n257 The choice between tort and contract law is perhaps philosophical. A contract view would suggest that tort law should act only when there is no possibility to contract (and even then the outcome should mirror what the parties would have done), while a tort view would suggest that tort law should control when society has decided that it (and not the parties themselves) should set the applicable standards. See Thomas C. Galligan Jr., Contortions Along the Boundary Between Contracts and Torts, 69 Tul. L. Rev. 457, 46162 (1994). Whatever the philosophical view, the landlord-tenant relationship is predicated, before all else, on a contract.

n258 "The fact that government and law enforcement authorities cannot prevent criminal attacks does not justify transferring such responsibility to business proprietors." Kaufman, supra note 15, at 109 n.90 (quoting Fager, Liability of Business Proprietors for Criminal Acts of Third Persons, 29 Fed'n Ins. Couns. Q. 29, 33 (1978)); see also Sharp, supra note 23, at 17.

n259 Kaufman, supra note 15, at 110.

n260 See Haines, supra note 34, at 323; see also supra note 63 and accompanying text.

n261 Exculpatory clauses will generally not preclude suits in tort by plaintiffs who are not parties to the lease. See supra note 235 and accompanying text. If actions for victims of domestic terrorism were restricted to those based on contract, the victim compensation legislation suggested here would be expected to provide exclusive recovery for those victims precluded from tort suits.

n262 See Jones, supra note 229, at 733.

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "war risk exclusion" and insurance and law /10 economics (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Monday, October 15, 2001 - 9:12 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

garages and the basements of private multiple unit . . . dwellings. They are neither equipped, manned, nor empowered to do so." [48] This type of emphasis on control and efficiency provides a powerful argument for using this theory to require landlords to provide at least minimal structural security measures against terrorist acts.

b. Voluntary Assumption of Duty

Another traditional theory of landlord liability involves a landowner's voluntarily assumed duty to provide security. Under this theory, if a landowner voluntarily assumes the performance of duties for security, he should be required to perform those duties carefully. [49] Even courts that have limited a landowner's duty to protect a tenant from the criminal acts of others absent any affirmative conduct on the part of the landowner would likely find a duty if the landlord provided some type of security in what proved to be a negligent manner. [50] In practice, these claims can arise as a [*167] result of the landlord's express or implied promise to provide security, including representations in lease terms, oral statements, and advertisements. [51] Many decisions based on this theory use an implicit balancing test to determine liability, considering the degree of reliance assumed by the injured tenant as well as the potential burden to the landlord. [52] Courts using this balancing test may have particular difficulty in applying it to terrorism since both the degree of reliance by the tenant and burden to the landowner in preventing the crime are generally very high. Some commentators note that because this theory provides no positive incentive to provide security it results in landlords being less inclined to offer increased security protection. [53] Choosing to provide no security is theoretically risky for landlords, however, because the definition of what constitutes a voluntary provision of security differs by jurisdiction. [54] What constitutes a provision (or further, a negligent provision) of antiterrorism security is likely to be even less clear than in the context of more traditional criminal acts, so that predicting liability will continue to be at least as difficult.

c. Contract

Claims brought under contract theories may rely on either express or implied warranties [55] to provide security. A recovery theory based on express warranties would suggest that a landlord has a duty to provide the type and amount of security advertised. [56] The World Trade Center litigation provides an example of [*168] how liability based on express contract provisions could be triggered in the context of terrorism. One large tenant, Dean Witter, claims that it raised concerns about safety when it negotiated its lease in 1984 and 1985, but that it was assured in writing that security provisions at the World Trade Center surpassed "'all other comparable building complexes within the city' and that the parking garage was secure." [57] Dean Witter claims that it never would have leased the space, for about one billion dollars over twenty years, if it knew that the Port Authority already had knowledge that the parking garage was vulnerable to terrorist attack. [58] Dean Witter is asking to rescind its lease and demanding more than $ 220 million in property and punitive damages. [59]

Contract claims are usually thought to be brought less frequently than tort claims, since damages for the former are generally very limited--compensating the injured party for property damage, but not providing for pain and suffering or punitive damages. [60] Since contract claims are very fact-specific, they tend not to be as susceptible to arguments based on broader notions of social policy as some of the other theories presented here. [61] This will likely be a disadvantage for tenant-victims of terrorism urging courts to extend liability beyond the "four corners" of the lease. Further, of course, the injured party must have a legally cognizable basis for recovery under the contract as a party in privity, or perhaps as a third-party beneficiary.

However, there are often clear advantages to contract claims for plaintiffs. In one case where the court held that a landlord did not have a duty to protect a tenant from the criminal act of a third party, a recovery based on an express contract provision for the value of property stolen was not precluded. [62] By imposing a contractual obligation to furnish security measures, courts may provide [*169] tenants with some means of correcting dangerous security problems before a tragedy occurs. [63] This aspect of contract claims may also have particular application for the prevention of terrorism to ensure that landowners provide bargained-for structural and procedural safeguards. Finally, especially in the commercial context, a landlord's liability may be modified by contractual provisions, such as exculpatory clauses, which generally result in a more efficient allocation of risk between the two parties. [64]

d. Negligence

The clear majority of claims in this area are based on negligence theories. [65] In order to sustain a negligence claim, a plaintiff must show that the defendant's behavior created an unreasonable risk of harm by departing from a reasonable standard of care, and that such behavior was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's damages. [66] A review of the various negligence formulations courts use provides ample support for the contention that the law regarding landlord liability for the criminal acts of third parties is unsettled. In general, a landlord's duty to provide security in this context may be based on a special relationship, special circumstances, or statutory requirements. [67] Recurring questions raised by this type of liability that have particular applications to terrorism include: when a criminal act should be deemed to be foreseeable; when a third party's criminal act should be considered a superseding cause; and when a landlord's response should be deemed reasonable. [68] Failure [*170] to adequately resolve these questions suggests that under the current state of the law, landlords are largely unable to accurately predict either liability or the appropriate level of responsive security precautions. [69] These problems will only be exacerbated when negligence claims, based on landlords' failure to protect tenants from terrorism, are allowed.

i. Negligence Formulations

Courts first developed the negligence formulation that landlords had a duty to protect tenants from criminal acts of third parties based on their special relationship because of the changing circumstances of the modern residential tenant. The underlying basis for this per se duty seems to be the landlord's superior position to perceive and prevent risks of criminal conduct. [70] For ex- [*171] ample, in Samson v. Saginaw Professional Building, Inc., [71] the Michigan Supreme Court, in adopting the special relationship theory in a commercial context, held that "the existence of this relationship between the defendant landlord and its tenants and invitees placed a duty upon the landlord to protect them from unreasonable risk of physical harm." [72] Conversely, under the special circumstances formulation of negligence, foreseeability of a criminal attack serves to establish both duty and proximate cause. [73] For example, in Rowe v. State Bank of Lombard, [74] the court, allowing a claim for the tenant's employees in spite of a finding that the landlord-tenant relationship was not a special relationship, held that "when knowledge of foreseeable harm is combined with the landlord's sole ability to guard against it, without undue burden, the landlord has the duty." [75]

ii. Foreseeability--Definitions

The definition of foreseeability is often the determining factor in negligence claims, with more expansive definitions more likely to result in findings of duty. Three more major and two more minor definitions of foreseeability are commonly used. The most restrictive view of foreseeability requires that the landowner actually had notice of the risks involved. Foreseeability is generally proven under this definition by representations made by tenants or others, either notifying the landlord of past crimes as in Kline, [76] or that attacks are possible or likely as in Samson. [77] In a recent case, to prove that the defendant landlord had knowledge of existing risks, the plaintiff introduced evidence in the form of a letter from a commercial tenant advising the landlord of crimes on the premises and requesting that a security review be performed. [78] [*172] This type of subjective condition has significant drawbacks in that it may discourage landlords from looking for unsafe conditions and from being amenable to tenants' reports of unsafe conditions. [79] Such a foreseeability rule for terrorism would generally result in landowners avoiding liability for these reasons, although perhaps not in the World Trade Center case. [80] Most jurisdictions imposing a duty based on foreseeability now use some type of "knew or should have known" standard instead. [81]

REV_00261373

The prior similar incidents rule is a less restrictive, middleground definition which requires that a plaintiff produce evidence of prior similar criminal acts on the landowner's premises to establish foreseeability. [82] While widely used, especially in commercial settings, [83] the prior similar incidents rule also has several drawbacks. First, the landowner is effectively allowed one free assault before he can be held to have a duty. [84] Second, some commentators and courts have stated that the prior similar incidents rule leads to "arbitrary results and distinctions" since it is often unclear how close in time, near in location, or analogous in conduct the prior incidents must be. [85] If this standard were adopted in landowner liability for acts of terrorism cases, issues about where to draw the line for terrorist incidents (e.g., between a prior explosion and a bomb threat) would undoubtedly be at the forefront.

In perhaps the most famous denouncement of the prior similar incidents rule, the California Supreme Court, in 1985, abandoned it in Isaacs v. Huntington Memorial Hospital, [86] adopting instead the [*173] totality of the circumstances definition discussed below. However, in 1993, the California Supreme Court essentially re-adopted the prior similar incidents rule in Ann M. v. Pacific Plaza Shopping Center, [87] holding that a landowner is rarely, if ever, liable to a plaintiff absent evidence of prior similar crimes on the premises. [88] The return to the use of the prior similar incidents rule in California perhaps signals that the view of the landlord as "social insurer" has fallen out of favor. [89] If so, the curtailment of pro-victim approaches may have implications for how the application of landowner liability to acts of terrorism will be received by courts. In contrast, the rising rate of violent crime has often been held to be the primary influence in expanding the duty to protect. [90] Thus, it seems likely that judges will also feel pressure to interpret standards expansively in response to the increasing visibility of terrorism. How courts respond to these conflicting demands for either more restrictive or expansive liability in addressing landlord liability for acts of terrorism may depend on the alternatives to this type of liability presented. [91]

The totality of the circumstances approach mentioned above represents the high water mark of pro-victim landowner liability theories, requiring that courts analyze foreseeability in light of all the facts and on a case-by-case basis. [92] While some jurisdictions [*174] have applied it less frequently to commercial leaseholds, [93] the totality of the circumstances definition has been called the "touchstone" of foreseeability. [94] Factors that come in under the totality of the circumstances rule range from evidence of neighborhood crime (e.g., a computer printout of police records of reported crimes in the area), [95] to environmental criminology studies (including "physical structure of the building, lighting, traffic patterns, and social and ecological circumstances linked to the potential for a criminal event"). [96] By analogy, if studies about how terrorists choose targets are generally available, they could provide a basis for recovery under this formulation. [97] The extent of a landowner's role in determining foreseeability is unclear under this definition.

Two more minor definitions of foreseeability that have appeared occasionally in various jurisdictions are the "first line of defense" and "tempting target" theories. Under the former, even if foreseeability is rather low (e.g., no prior incidents), when a landlord's nonfeasance amounts to what would generally be considered gross negligence (e.g., no door locks), courts will usually find a duty. [98] While only a few courts have adopted the "tempting target" theory, a number of have acknowledged it as a factor in the determination on some other basis. [99] This theory proposes that some leaseholds are by their nature particularly attractive for crime: bars, concert halls, and casinos. [100] Both of these theories may have implications for the application of the landowner liability to terrorism in that the duty to simply warn of a terrorist threat would seem to be a good candidate for the "first line of defense rule," [101] and leaseholds with controversial clients (e.g., abortion clinics) might be seen as "tempting targets" for terrorists. [102] [*175]

iii. Foreseeability--Problems

Whatever its definition, determining foreseeability will likely be critical in predicting landowner liability in cases involving terrorist acts. When foreseeability is used both to establish duty and causation, it becomes a "murky crystal ball." [103] If foreseeability is used as a method of establishing liability in claims involving terrorism, courts must find a way to cure the problems of inefficiency and inequity it now generates. One such problem is that foreseeability is susceptible to judges' and juries' subjective beliefs. In the tort context, it seems that foreseeability should be related to fault. When applied to criminal acts, however, its boundaries often seem defined by courts' concerns about public policy. [104] For "new" causes of action, like landowner liability for terrorism, courts may be especially tempted to use policy considerations to define foreseeability. [105]

Similarly, judges and juries tend to focus on the severity of resulting harm when determining, with the benefit of hindsight, whether a criminal act was foreseeable. For example, a landowner's duty may be framed as to avoid creating unreasonable risks for his tenants. In assessing "reasonableness," the landowner should consider the severity of the harm, alternatives available to him, and the probability of harm. [106] While the severity of harm from terrorist acts is admittedly great, probability is very low for most leaseholds. Further, while the cost of safer alternatives may be generally low for ordinary criminal acts (e.g., safer locks, more lighting), the costs of preventing terrorism are generally significant. [107] This analysis would therefore suggest that fact finders [*176] must be especially reminded of the latter two components of the foreseeability/duty decision when determining liability for terrorist acts, since they will generally serve to temper the role that the severity of the harm should play.

Another of the problems with foreseeability in this context is whether it should be a question for the judge or jury. Because foreseeability is used in different ways by many courts, it is not clear whether courts have uniformly decided who should resolve the foreseeability issue. [108] What is clear is that if the question does go to the jury, the landlord will likely be the loser. Jury verdicts are likely to turn not so much on facts but on the jury's sense of right and wrong. [109] This puts landlords at an unfair disadvantage, creates confusion about what is required of them, and pressures them to settle. [110] Problems with juries deciding foreseeability will be greater in terrorism cases, as compared to ordinary criminal cases, since methods of determining foreseeability, as well as what constitutes a reasonable security response, are more likely to be beyond the common knowledge of the average juror.

Given this status quo, the chances for developing a clear definition of foreseeability for use in cases involving landowner liability for acts of terrorism are slim. When standards are unclear, some commentators believe that landlords will "overprotect." [111] The resulting "uncertainty zone" is wasteful to society because the amount spent on protection (and passed on to consumers) will not reduce enough violent acts to justify its costs, resulting in an inefficient use of resources. [112] Further, cases where summary judgment would have been proper instead go to the jury to determine foreseeability; resulting in judicial inefficiency. [113] Finally, a vague [*177] standard of duty works to the immediate economic disadvantage of the defendant, or landlord. [114] Therefore, should the negligence concept of landowner liability be applied to acts of terrorism, courts or legislatures must develop a more definitive standard of duty in order to ensure that these inefficiencies and inequities are not perpetuated.

3. Implications of a Commercial Setting

While the vast majority of the early cases imposing landlord liability for criminal acts involved residential buildings, acts of terrorism will probably target commercial leaseholds. Even though many commentators think that most jurisdictions have not distinguished between the two settings, [115] not all commentators or courts are of that opinion and many believe the application of the law should not be the same. [116] An analysis of the desirability of symmetry between the rules for residential and commercial leaseholds is important since any valid differences should affect the standards of duty adopted for terrorism.

REV_00261375

First, since landlord liability for security was developed largely in response to courts' objectives of improving the quality of affordable housing, [117] the initial purpose behind the imposition of liability is different. Second, commercial tenants are generally in a much better bargaining position than residential tenants; they are more likely to be able to negotiate for the levels of security protection they feel are adequate. [118] This seems due to the fact that commercial tenants generally possess more resources and the fact that [*178] the commercial market generally offers more alternatives than the residential market. [119] Third, a landlord's physical control over the premises in the commercial setting is much lower. [120] The need for public access, as well as a larger area to be protected, normally means that commercial buildings require more extensive security. [121] A further control-type distinction is the definition of the premises boundary line. For example, when are parking lots or the street in front of a leasehold within the area that a landlord should protect? [122] Fourth, security in a commercial setting generally has a different purpose than in a residential one. Banks and stores do not hire guards for the primary purpose of protecting customers; they are there to protect assets. [123] An important economic distinction between the two settings is that most commercial tenants carry insurance and can theoretically pass on the costs of their own security measures through increased prices. [124] Finally, commercial tenants are often in a better position than the landlord to assess the safety of the premises; defects in security may remain undiscovered by a landlord unaware of a commercial tenant's particular safety needs. Commercial tenants are more likely to make a thorough inspection of the premises to determine if it is suitable for its purposes, relying less on the representations of the landlord. [125] These considerations suggest that the duty to provide security in a commercial context should be lower than in a residential one. [126] [*179] While this analysis does not necessarily demonstrate that there should be no landlord liability if applied to acts of terrorism, it does suggest that standards of duty should not be as strict as those used in the residential context. [127]

D. Summary

The many different theories of recovery, formulations of negligence, and definitions of foreseeability available to plaintiffs make it difficult for landlords to both assess their liability for protecting tenants and develop an appropriate response to that liability. Since successful theories of recovery vary by jurisdiction and even by court, [128] if landlord liability for criminal acts were applied to acts of terrorism, outcomes for victims would differ based on the location of the terrorist's target. [129] This confusion has led some commentators to note that regardless of Kline's admonition that they are not insurers, landlords must in fact overprotect. [130] This overprotection results in economic inefficiency and may prompt some landlords to seek other investment opportunities altogether. [131] Furthermore, the number of different theories available and reluctance of courts to specifically define foreseeability decreases the chances of judicially resolving a case at an early stage. [132] While current [*180] victim compensation statutes appear inadequate, the alternative of landlord liability for criminal acts is subject to these significant drawbacks. Especially when viewed in the context of commercial leaseholds, current formulations of landlord liability will not provide the most efficient methods of victim compensation or increased prevention when the crime in question is terrorism.

II. Landowner Liability When the Crime is Terrorism

Holding landlords liable for acts of terrorism raises issues beyond those involved in landlord liability for more mundane criminal acts. Topics more specific to terrorism that may affect the determination of whether landlord liability is an appropriate legal response can be divided into six categories: (1) defining terrorism; (2) preventing terrorism; (3) warnings; (4) insurance; (5) mass torts; and (6) evidentiary issues. [133] Further, by imposing liability on landlords, society is really asking that they assume responsibility for preventing or protecting

REV_00261376

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: ((insurance) /20 war or terrorism) and risk and property and life and (exclusion /20 (war or terrorism)) and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*47 Case W. Res. 155, **

Copyright (c) 1996 Case Western Reserve Law Review.
Case Western Reserve University

Fall, 1996

47 Case W. Res. 155

LENGTH: 29530 words

NOTE: Landowner Liability For Terrorist Acts *

* Awarded the Sindell Brothers Award for outstanding tort law scholarship presented each year to a Case Western Reserve University Law School student. In addition, awarded the first annual Case Western Reserve Law Review Outstanding Student Note Award, as selected by the editors and faculty advisor.

Melinda L. Reynolds

SUMMARY:
... The specter of terrorism within the United States has become frighteningly real. ... For "new" causes of action, like landowner liability for terrorism, courts may be especially tempted to use policy considerations to define foreseeability. ... Especially when viewed in the context of commercial leaseholds, current formulations of landlord liability will not provide the most efficient methods of victim compensation or increased prevention when the crime in question is terrorism. ... The question of whether mere warnings about the risk of crime (or terrorism) on the premises could ever be sufficient to avoid liability has not been addressed by litigation. ... Some of the implications of this doctrine are raised in Samson v. Saginaw Professional Building, Inc., where the Michigan Supreme Court upheld a finding of liability against a landlord for a criminal act committed by a patient of a tenant mental health clinic against an employee of another tenant. ... Our goals as a society are crime/terrorism prevention and victim compensation, but landlord liability seems equitable only as a prevention technique, not as a compensation mechanism. ...

TEXT:
[*155] [*156]

Introduction

The specter of terrorism within the United States has become frighteningly real. The World Trade Center and Oklahoma City bombings have effectively erased the traditional American paradigm of terrorism as a foreign problem. These two incidents alone caused staggering national losses. The World Trade Center bombing in February of 1993 killed six people and injured more than a thousand others, created a crater 150-200 feet deep, and damaged the massive complex five levels down and two levels up from the explosion. [1] Economically, total damage was estimated at over $ 510 million, [2] with claims in civil lawsuits filed totaling over $ 1.9 billion. [3] And while the World Trade Center bombing was repeatedly called "the single most destructive act of terrorism ever committed . . . in the United States," [4] a preliminary landlords, society is really asking that they assume responsibility for preventing or protecting against terrorism. However, it is not clear that tort remedies provide a cost-effective incentive to do so. Finally, imposing liability on landlords may have extensive undesirable consequences, as landlords may not respond as desired. Examining these issues will support the hypothesis of the previous section: landowner liability by itself is not the most appropriate legal response to domestic terrorism.

REV_00261411

A. Defining Terrorism

In terms of framing appropriate legal responses, a threshold issue for legislatures and courts will be who gets to decide when an act constitutes terrorism. [134] Certainly, in order to determine whether landlord liability can be an effective preventive measure, the behavior to be prevented must be defined. For purposes of this Note, the term terrorism has generically been used to refer to bombings--the type of act most likely to impact landowners. [135] It [*181] seems, however, that no "one definition of terrorism has gained universal acceptance," even the United Nations is unable to agree on a definition. [136] Whatever its definition, Americans have traditionally considered terrorism to be a matter for international law. Americans think that if terrorism occurs in the United States, it must have "come in" across borders. [137] Clearly though, as shown by the Oklahoma City bombing, terrorist acts may be entirely domestic. Further, the face of terrorism has changed over the past two decades. Skyjackings and spectacular raids like the one at the Munich Olympics have been replaced [138] by car bombs. [139] Based on this analysis, the definition of terrorism will no doubt change as both politics and technology change. One constant is that terrorists have very different motivations from ordinary criminals; a terrorist [*182] act is neither profit-motivated nor a random assault, it is usually part of a larger plan, [140] and is usually calculated for media effect. If landlord liability for criminal acts is applied to terrorism, we are effectively saying that these types of definitional differences do not matter, although they must affect the kinds of preventive measures that are effective. [141]

B. Preventing Terrorism

Just as in the context of criminal acts, making landlords liable for terrorist acts really means that we want landlords to assist in prevention or protection. [142] While in the criminal context structural changes by landlords (e.g., alarms and lighting) are of prime importance, most experts agree that structural changes by themselves will not thwart a terrorist attack. As Richard Moore, an associate director with FEMA, explained, "You can make a building less susceptible to severe damage, but it's got to be done in concert with other things--security for instance . . . ." [143] Experts agree that the most effective counterterrorist measure is intelligence, especially infiltration of terrorist organizations. [144] There are therefore three principal ways to prevent terrorist acts: structural changes to buildings, private security changes, and government actions. To determine whether landlords should be held liable, the effectiveness of the first two must be evaluated. Based on the following analysis, the argument for resting the primary burden of prevention with governments rather than private landowners is even stronger here than in the context of regular crime.

Attempting to prevent terrorism assumes that terrorist groups act rationally; that is, they attempt to minimize costs and achieve their own ideas of successful outcomes. Indeed, there is evidence that terrorist groups respond to measures that raise the risks of a particular type of attack. [145] In this regard, while creating an absolutely damage-proof building is both architecturally impossible and prohibitively expensive, there are a number of ways to make build- [*183] ings more resistant to "human evil." [146] Various structural modifications include imposing setbacks, [147] preventing flying glass, [148] and infrastructure supports. [149] Structural changes are not cheap, however, and in fact may increase dangers for other perils (e.g., fire). [150] Changes of a preventive rather than protective nature, like restricting access and using camera surveillance are more practical. [151]

For what has been called "the most terrible weapon in a terrorist's arsenal" [152] --the car bomb--adequate preventive measures may not exist. Robert Kupperman, a terrorism expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, noted that car bombs are a "throw away" weapon requiring little planning or support and fewer participants than the more traditional terrorist acts. [153] A munitions expert who formerly worked with the CIA noted that very few places in the United States are protected from car bomb attacks. "People in the intelligence community have been warning for years that this kind of thing could come to the United States . . . . And in the United States, we have bigger cars than they do in Europe." [154] Indeed, it seems the simplest of terrorist [*184] plots and weapons can foil the most sophisticated security. Security at the Olympic games in Atlanta involved more than 30,000 police and security experts, more than 2,000 explosives experts, 40 bombsniffing dogs, 1,000 video cameras, 200,000 I.D. badges, 100 computerized command centers, and microchips that stored digital images of the bearer's palmprint; all at a cost of over $ 117 million. [155] The security teams in Atlanta had practiced against a release of nerve gas, a massive bomb attack inside the games, and a plane hijacking, but were unable to protect visitors from a crude pipe-bomb left unattended in a bag. [156]

REV_00261420

A further problem with preventive measures is that they serve to merely relocate criminal behavior. For example, while fortification of diplomatic facilities has resulted in a decrease of known terrorist missions aimed at them, incidences of assassinations and hostage-takings outside protected facilities against civilians has increased. [157] This substitution phenomenon suggests that all landowners would have to continually refine structural and procedural security to thwart terrorists ready to relocate or develop new tactics in order for preventive measures to be effective. This highlights the need for more retaliatory or interventionist measures by government.

Experts believe that the preferred way to prevent terrorism is to "identify and break up terrorist cells, possibly expel or prevent the entry of individual terrorists and thwart their plans." [158] The FBI, which has the primary responsibility for counterterrorism measures in the United States, [159] perceives that counterterrorism is still a "growing field" and has transferred a number of agents from counterintelligence to that area. [160] One question raised after the Oklahoma City bombing was whether any free society could ever prevent terrorist acts. [161] As Fred Moore of FEMA noted, "I don't [*185] think any government, even the most authoritarian, has found a way to eliminate terrorism." [162] Indeed, even though the Oklahoma City tragedy appears wholly domestic, it seems likely that many acts of terrorism within the United States will be perpetrated by those who come from outside the country or flee the country afterwards. Without a unified international effort, or at least consensus on means of deterrence and agreement to accept the costs that a global antiterrorism strategy would entail, efforts by agencies of any one nation seem destined to be reactive. [163] These comments suggest that at the least a national policy, rather than the state-bystate approach inherent in landlord tort liability, is warranted.

Many of the same concerns about the effectiveness of private citizens as compared to government in preventing regular crime apply in the terrorism context. The differences noted above--that structural changes are even less effective but more costly, and that there is a greater necessity for national if not international government intervention--reinforce the conclusion that landlord liability as a method of increasing terrorism prevention should be restricted.

C. Warnings

In addition to intervention, the term "prevention" as used here is assumed to include protection, or measures designed to lessen the damage caused by terrorist attacks. One way of protecting tenants and invitees is to require landlords to warn them about terrorist threats received. The question of whether mere warnings about the risk of crime (or terrorism) on the premises could ever be sufficient to avoid liability has not been addressed by litigation. Theoretically at least, warnings themselves could be an adequate security measure in response to lower levels of foreseeable terrorism. However, if warnings would be sufficient, there may still be a question about whether it would be equitable or efficient to require landlords to issue them. Disclosure of terrorist threats is not an easy issue as there are several competing concerns in a determination of when to notify tenants or customers. Disclosure could theoretically reduce lawsuits if the threat is carried out, but could hurt business if it is not. Disclosure can encourage public dialogue that can help law enforcement--or encourage copycats. For example, after the World Trade Center bombing there were seventy bomb threats a day in New York City. [164] The classic "boy who cries wolf" syndrome creates a risk that real threats will be ignored. [165] [*186] Finally, however, there are advantages to public notification in that citizens can help with prevention. For example, British officials in particular were dependent upon citizens to help spot IRA bombs. [166]

REV_00261421

If a landlord guesses incorrectly and does not issue a warning, certainly issues of notice and reasonable response are implicated. [167] For example, over Easter weekend in 1995, Disneyland received a threat that a chemical attack would take place. [168] Disneyland officials decided not to warn visitors, but did summon health officials and a chemical warfare team before the FBI determined it was a hoax. [169] If something had gone wrong that weekend, Disneyland would have been faced with the prospect of defending its decision not to warn customers in front of an unsympathetic jury. The best solution to this problem may be to statutorily establish that landowners have a duty to inform the appropriate government authority if they are aware of any risks. The authority can then make a determination about any necessary warnings. In that way private landowners have a clear role in prevention, while determinations about public policy are left to the experts.

D. Issues from the World Trade Center Bombing Litigation

The civil litigation following the World Trade Center bombing provides examples of some of the more detailed legal issues likely to arise when landlord liability is applied to acts of terrorism. An examination of some of these concerns (namely, insurance, mass tort, and evidentiary issues) reinforce the conclusion that this type of litigation, which requires massive amounts of resources to pursue, will not likely provide an efficient legal response to domestic terrorism.

1. Insurance

Since the targets of terrorist attacks are likely to be commercial leaseholds, and since commercial leaseholds generally carry insurance, litigation following a terrorist act will likely consist of a [*187] battle between insurance companies. Insurers of tenants will attempt to subrogate claims that they have been forced to pay, probably by alleging that either the policyholder or someone else (i.e., the landlord) was negligent. [170] For example, in the World Trade Center litigation, one insurance company, Phoenix Assurance, is seeking to recoup a $ 5-10 million payout on a property and business interruption policy for Teleport Communications Group, Inc., a World Trade Center tenant. A lawyer for Phoenix Assurance notes, "Insurance companies have an obligation to policyholders and shareholders to minimize their losses." [171] In fact, insurance companies with significant claims are well represented among the remaining plaintiffs in the World Trade Center litigation. [172] Of course, having insurance companies involved as final litigants first requires that they have decided to honor policyholders' claims. [173]

When claims are significant, [174] insurers may try to avoid them under any number of exceptions to coverage. For example, insurers might try to argue that a terrorist bombing is not a covered "occurrence" because it was technically not an accident but a deliberate act. Theoretically, this type of maneuvering should not be successful, "as the use of the term 'accident' was not intended to deprive policyholders of coverage for deliberate acts of violence against them by unknown third parties." [175] A more likely tactic when damages from a terrorist attack are at issue may be for insurers to claim refuge under a "war risk exclusion." The war risk exclusion generally bars coverage for damages resulting from "war, invasion, civil war, revolution, insurrection or warlike operations, whether there be a declaration of war or not." [176] In practice, this exclusion has generally been limited to actions taken by hostile [*188] government entities or attempts to overthrow government entities. [177] For example, at least one insurance company has tried, albeit without success, to argue that the war risk exclusion should preclude coverage for damages resulting from a hijacking. [178] Further, should insurance companies attempt to assert an exclusion, they generally have the burden of proof to show why coverage should not apply. [179] Specifically with regard to the World Trade Center, shortly after the bombing, two of the biggest carriers in the property and business-disruption fields took different positions on whether the war risk exclusion would apply in that instance. [180] In many European countries, insurance policies now include specific terrorism exclusions, however, the World Trade Center's policies did not. [181]

.../retrieve?_m=9b0f1406ad6350db190c177e2936d1c8&docnum=1&_fmtstr=FULL&_startdo 10/2/2001

Given that insurance companies for tenants injured by a terrorist act will most likely have to honor claims for property loss, business interruption, and general liability, [182] it is likely that they will attempt to subrogate claims via litigation. As insurance companies undoubtedly have the resources to be powerful plaintiffs, commercial landlords whose properties have been the site of terrorist attacks will likely be harder pressed to defend themselves against allegations of negligence than their residential counterparts whose tenants' losses may often be uninsured.

2. Mass Torts

Due to the nature of the terrorist attacks contemplated, a great number of plaintiffs will be involved in subsequent litigation against landlords for a given incident. In the wake of the World [*189] Trade Center bombing, an eight-firm steering committee was appointed to direct the litigation of the 170 civil actions filed. [183] For purposes of judicial economy (if not ecology), [184] it makes sense to litigate all the World Trade Center claims simultaneously. It is also important to ask, however, whether there will be any undesirable side-effects to doing so.

For example, in more typical class action cases, [185] concerns arise as to whether the focus will shift from client to lawyer, from damages to attorney's fees, and from litigation to settlement. Apart from saving costs, which primarily benefit the defendant, it is probably to the plaintiffs' advantage to have the cases consolidated, since their claims will tend to reinforce each other. [186] Apparently, in this case the Port Authority thought that the cost of litigating all the claims separately would far outweigh any such intangible benefit gained by the plaintiffs. As long as these types of concerns of both defendants and plaintiffs can be managed efficiently, which remains to be seen in the World Trade Center litigation, perhaps the fact that terrorist acts will create mass tort litigation is not a significant problem, at least as to its effect on the substantive law. [*190]

3. Evidentiary Issues

In attempting to hold landlords liable for terrorist acts, some interesting evidentiary issues may develop. For example, in the wake of the bombing, the World Trade Center has undertaken significant additional structural modifications and security procedures. [187] It does not appear to have been addressed yet, but one question may be whether the plaintiffs can introduce evidence of these subsequent remedial measures to attempt to prove that the Port Authority either knew that existing security was inadequate or that alternate cost-effective safety measures were available. The New York equivalent of Federal Rule of Evidence 407, which excludes "evidence of the subsequent remedial measures . . . offered to prove negligence or culpable conduct" [188] would be at issue. As the Federal rule itself notes, however, it "does not require the exclusion of evidence of subsequent measures when offered for another purpose, such as proving ownership, control, or feasibility of precautionary measures, if controverted, or impeachment." [189] Thus, plaintiffs' attorneys will likely find a way to get evidence of the modifications admitted.

REV_00261423

Another evidentiary issue that will undoubtedly arise in terrorism cases against landlords, and indeed has arisen in the World Trade Center litigation, involves whether discovery of previously conducted security studies should be allowed. Plaintiffs in the World Trade Center bombing case requested that the Port Authority turn over some sixty-two documents that relate to security audits of the complex conducted in the mid-1980s. [190] The Port Authority has resisted production of the materials on grounds that the documents "are subject to the public interest privilege and/or that they contain information which is neither material nor necessary in the prosecution of the action." [191] Discovery of the security reports is [*191] a key issue for the plaintiffs since they allegedly contain comments like "the vulnerability of the World Trade Center to the terrorist is substantial . . . . It is an extremely inviting target," and that the parking garage "presents an enormous opportunity at present for a terrorist to park an explosive filled vehicle that could affect vulnerable areas." [192] The same reports also allegedly contain specific recommendations to tighten security, including closer monitoring of the garage, and banning all public parking. The lawsuit filed by Phoenix Assurance alleges that "as far as we can tell, [the reports were] almost entirely ignored." [193] In attempting to establish that the Port Authority was negligent in failing to protect tenants from the bombing, the plaintiffs are attempting to show that the Port Authority was aware of security problems and did not respond reasonably to them. Plaintiffs' attorneys are therefore also undertaking discovery by seeking testimony of consultants and Port Authority employees who might have been aware of the risk. [194]

As noted above, the plaintiffs claimed that the documents should be produced since they are relevant to Port Authority's recklessness (or knowledge) and foreseeability. [195] In response, the [*192] Port Authority argued that since the explosion occurred on a sublevel, any information about a safety system, device, or practice occurring at or above the concourse level is irrelevant. [196] The judge dismissed the Port Authority's argument, holding that "the mere fact that the explosion occurred in a level beneath the concourse does not necessarily render irrelevant the documents . . . relating to the concourse or floors above the concourse." [197] Further, he noted that "the PA may assert as a defense that, while numerous recommendations were made, it was unable to take all of the recommended steps because of, inter alia, cost and that therefore it had to prioritize the implementation of them." [198] The judge warned that by asserting such a defense--that it acted reasonably and with due care in following the reports and implementing recommendations found therein--the Port Authority could then be compelled to produce the documents. [199]

While the public interest privilege may be specific to a quasigovernmental agency like the Port Authority, many of the relevance and policy issues noted could easily arise in a completely private setting. For example, though not raised by the Port Authority, other relevancy arguments could include whether the type of harm is not specifically addressed by the security report, the security report is out-of-date, or even that the contents of the report would likely cause the jury to be prejudiced against the defendant. Finally, defendants are likely to make the policy argument that the admissibility of security reports may actually constitute a disincentive to conduct them in the first place. Therefore, evidentiary issues specific to terrorism will require significant resources and add another layer of complexity to an already complex area of litigation.

E. The Effects of Finding Landlords Liable

All of the problems endemic to terrorism discussed above suggest that imposing liability on landowners is not an efficient mechanism for increased prevention. Further, imposing liability on landowners may have some unintended, potentially negative effects because landowners may not respond as desired. Such unintended consequences may be divided into five categories: (1) landowners [*193] may not respond to liability with increased security; (2) landowners may even treat liability as a disincentive to engage in further security measures; (3) landowners may use liability as justification for impinging on tenants' rights; (4) landowners may shift resources to other investments (unintended macroeconomic consequences); and (5) landowners may attempt to shift the risk of liability to other parties.

REV_00261424

1. Liability as Incentive

In determining whether landowner liability will result in increased protection against terrorist attacks, beyond the analysis of which preventive measures may be effective against terrorism, [200] an examination of whether landowner liability has resulted in increased security measures against regular criminal acts may be helpful. Commentators have argued both for and against liability under tort law as an effective deterrent (or incentive). For example, one author argues that finding landlords liable for protecting tenants and invitees has induced landlords to make "considerable efforts" to render their buildings negligence-proof, if not crimeproof, by hiring extra lobby personnel and security guards, and improving lighting. [201] Further, apparently due to liability exposure, almost every major fast food company has recently hired a security director and over the past ten years these companies' security budgets have approximately doubled. [202]

The same author notes that tort law as a deterrent is only moderately successful, and questions whether deterrence benefits outweigh the costs imposed. [203] For example, it is unclear whether imposing liability on landlords actually prevents crime overall or merely serves to relocate it. [204] Many commentators also point out the social costs, including potential violations of tenants' rights, and increased chances for corruption, discriminatory enforcement, and vigilantism, which could result from the deputization of the citizenry and the fact that law enforcement essentially becomes private. [205] For example, from 1969 to 1990 the value of private [*194] security industries rose from $ 2.5 million to $ 18 billion annually and the number of employees increased from fewer than 300,000 to nearly two million. [206] Currently private security personnel outnumber police by more than two to one, but are largely unregistered and usually not as well trained. [207]

Despite these concerns, and while it seems unfair to find that a person is entitled to more protection from a landowner than from police, business and industry do have the financial and technical resources available for aiding the prevention of crime [208] (or terrorism). It therefore seems reasonable to conclude that while imposing liability on landlords does provide a moderate incentive to increase crime prevention, such incentive must be evaluated on a cost-benefit basis. For terrorism, this analysis suggests that the preventive measures that landlords can take by applying private resources seem to be less cost-effective than the measures that government can take by applying public resources.

2. Liability as Disincentive

The propensity for liability to act as a disincentive is perhaps most apparent under the voluntary assumption of duty theory of liability. [209] In the commercial context, this type of liability would likely be triggered frequently since a large percentage of commercial landowners provide some level of security. For example, assume that there are two landlords who both can foresee that at some point there will probably be a terrorist act upon one of their tenants (e.g., each leases to an abortion clinic). One landlord chooses to ignore various threats, while one hires a security guard in response. When tenants or their invitees ultimately suffer injuries, under the voluntary assumption of duty theory, the landlord who hired the security guard is more likely to be found to have a duty and will probably face a jury to defend the reasonableness of his conduct. [210] Under this analysis, it is hard to see why any landlord would initially take what is undoubtedly the safer course, [*195] since he would be, at best, in the same position as his counterpart who did nothing--facing a potentially hostile jury to defend his conduct. On the other hand, if the landlord does not provide security, he still has not eliminated risk. Without empirical data, it is difficult to gauge disincentive effects. However, it seems reasonable to conclude that if not a disincentive, the incentive effects of tort liability in this context are often muted.

3. Effects of Landlord Liability on Tenants' Rights

As one commentator has noted, it is perhaps "axiomatic" that "as a landlord's duty to protect . . . tenants increases, so too the landlord's right to screen, control and evict tenants increases." [211] Some of the implications of this doctrine are raised in Samson v. Saginaw Professional Building, Inc., [212] where the Michigan Supreme Court upheld a finding of liability against a landlord for a criminal act committed by a patient of a tenant mental health clinic against an employee of another tenant. While the court did not specify how landlords should deal with such high risk tenants, [213] the court did seem to imply that a landlord has some responsibility to assess the risks caused by tenants. [214] This prompted one commentator to caution, "There is a difference, however, between requiring a landlord to act once a dangerous condition becomes apparent, and encouraging him to discriminate against certain tenants based on their prior records, their occupations, or the types of invitees they may be expected to attract. Samson appears to do the latter." [215] In another instance, a court upheld a landlord's right to refuse the tenancy of an ex-convict, noting that "in choosing his tenants, a landlord has a legitimate interest in protecting his property, and an interest in protecting the health, safety, and welfare of his other tenants. He may consider any criteria, but especially criteria relevant to these ends." [216]

REV_00261425

Encouraging this type of behavior among landlords, especially in the application of liability to terrorism, would seem to invite discrimination against unpopular organizations. Indeed, this controversy recently arose in New York, where a judge ruled that a landlord could break an abortion clinic's lease "if his purpose is to [*196] protect other tenants against security risks arising from the clinic's presence in his . . . building." [217] The landlord based the eviction on the clinic's failure to follow his regulations, which were designed to prevent the clinic from performing abortions. The judge found the landlord's regulations to be reasonable, holding that "a landlord must exercise reasonable care to protect its tenants against any foreseeable dangers." [218] The judge's ruling, which never mentions the word abortion, cites seventeen incidents that were "directly related" to the abortion clinic, including gunshots, assaults on employees, rocks thrown at clinic windows, smashed cars, a false bomb scare, a tenant's doors glued shut, and the anonymous posting of a threatening note that read in part "you risk injury or death if you are caught near these premises." [219] The ruling allowed the landlord to start eviction proceedings against the clinic, even though it had eight years left on its lease and was not in default of rent. [220]

Negative reaction against the decision was swift and raised many of the civil rights concerns that result from imposing a duty to protect on landlords in this context. For example, Rep. Charles Schumer (D-Brooklyn) noted: "It's an open invitation to the extremist fringe in the pro-life movement to harass and intimidate landlords until they evict clinics." [221] Priscilla Smith, attorney for Center for Reproductive Law & Policy, stressed that "saying the clinic created an unsafe environment is the same as saying that, 'We can't have Jewish people in our neighborhood because we can't have people coming here and burning crosses.' It's an easy way of trying to hide your discriminatory actions." [222] And Donna Lieberman, attorney with the New York Civil Liberties Union noted: [*197]

The court has approved a landlord's effort to evict a tenant because the landlord failed to secure the safety of the building for the tenant, which is a basic landlord obligation. . . . There was never any showing that the performance of abortions presented any danger to the security of the building. [223]

Finally, stressing contractual rather than public policy considerations, David Rosenberg, a Manhattan lawyer, noted:

I would hope that commercial tenants' groups would rally behind this tenant. If it stands up, then a lease has almost no meaning for a tenant. . . . It's a contract. The tenant hasn't violated it. And the tenant has a right to expect to continue to operate according to the original contract. [224]

4. Macroeconomic Consequences--Risk Shifting

Besides inviting tenants' rights violations, imposing a duty to provide security on landlords may prove to be economically inequitable to some controversial tenants. Theoretically, landlords leasing to more expensive stores can pass on the added cost of security to customers, but businesses catering to a lower-income clientele may not necessarily be able to do so without losing customers who are more sensitive to prices than security. [225] This could ultimately cause smaller or marginally profitable landlords, especially with high-risk or controversial tenants, to leave the commercial real estate market for more lucrative investments. [226]

Short of leaving the market, some landlords may respond to liability for criminal/terrorist acts on their premises by simply refusing to provide security and disclaiming all responsibility for security--perhaps by informing prospective tenants that security is their own responsibility. This does not, however, eliminate the risk of liability if crime/terrorism, is found to be foreseeable; a more prudent alternative available to landowners would be to attempt to modify tort liability by shifting risk back to tenants. [227] Including [*198] exculpatory clauses in leases is one method of allocating risk in a contractual arrangement. While few courts have specifically addressed the use of exculpatory clauses respecting criminal acts, [228] in general, a commercial tenant may agree to exonerate a landlord from liability for future acts of negligence, for both property damage and personal injury. [229] Exculpatory clauses in residential leases have often been found to be against public policy, and therefore invalid, although, their use in the commercial context has not been as restricted. [230] There are some limitations on the use of exculpatory clauses in commercial leases. Five states [231] impose statutory restrictions (e.g., New York law invalidates any agreement that exempts a lessor from liability for personal injury or property damage resulting from the lessor's negligence in operation or maintenance of the property). Additionally, there appears to be a consensus that exculpatory clauses cannot insulate landlords from intentional, wanton, or willful behavior. [232] Some courts have found that exculpatory clauses only protect landlords from passive negligence, not active negligence. [233] A few courts have held that an exculpatory clause cannot release a landlord who has violated a statutory provision. [234] Further, an exculpatory clause is usually binding only on parties to the lease. Third-parties like the tenants' employees or invitees are not precluded from bringing suit against the landlord in this instance, although the existence of these types of provisions may provide for the landlord's later indemnity claim against the tenant. [235] Finally, a court may always choose to invalidate an exculpatory clause as unconscionable if there is evidence of grossly unequal bargaining power. [236] In summary, exculpatory [*199] clauses in commercial leases have generally been held enforceable in enough cases to warrant landlords' use of them if confronted with liability for terrorist acts. In this regard, exculpatory clauses will likely provide a more efficient mechanism of allocating risks than the use of negligence standards, at least as to damage suffered by tenants.

5. Intended Effects

In the midst of this analysis of the negative effects, the potential for positive, intended effects should not be forgotten. If one of society's primary concerns is to ensure that victims are compensated fully, society may consider certain market or macroeconomic effects to be secondary. In other words, the weight given to the value of private victim compensation may be so high that market inefficiencies are minor in comparison. If so, the cost of terrorist prevention may often be "cheapest" to the landowner. [237] As with victim compensation, perhaps the danger is so grave that society considers the prevention of terrorism by all reasonable methods, not just strictly cost-effective ones, desirable. Further, there is evidently some relationship between opportunity and certain types of crimes, as well as the magnitude of harm and security measures, so that often the landlord is not entirely blameless. [238] Finally, the "political" benefit of imposing liability may be that pressure for legislative reform is eventually brought to bear by more influential landlords disgusted or threatened by current litigation practices. [239] [*200]

F. Summary

Landlord liability for criminal acts has not resulted in clear guidelines about when duty will be imposed or what security responses will be considered sufficient. These problems, which mitigate attempts at increased prevention and protection, would only be exacerbated by the application of this doctrine to acts of domestic terrorism. Our goals as a society are crime/terrorism prevention and victim compensation, but landlord liability seems equitable only as a prevention technique, not as a compensation mechanism. Expansive theories of liability, which have as their primary goals giving compensation to victims, while certainly desirable, are best run by the government with funds raised from society as a whole. Any rules placing burdens on landowners should therefore have prevention, rather than compensation, as their primary goal. This conclusion suggests that narrower theories of liability, designed only to induce landowners to take cost-effective measures to prevent terrorism, [240] should be implemented.

Theoretically, cost-effective levels of protection could be derived empirically--for example, some types of structural changes must be more effective than others in certain settings. Under the current state of the law, however, an efficient standard is not likely to emerge. [241] In fashioning a legal response to terrorism, perhaps other systems that have been forced to address the problem more extensively will provide direction toward a comprehensive solution.

III. Alternative Legal Responses to Domestic Terrorism

The primary conclusion offered by this Note is that using current legal theories of landlord liability for criminal acts as a method of recovery by victims of domestic terrorism is not the best legal response, given goals of increased prevention and victim compensation. Courts deciding this issue will likely be confronted by societal pressures both to expand and contract the scope of landowners' duties. [242] Their decisions may be affected by the availability of other alternatives able to adequately address concerns about victim compensation and prevention. The alternatives presented here are only intended to be a basis for consideration and not definitive proposals. Discussion is limited to how these types of representative alternatives can, either [*201] separately or in combination, achieve the goals and address the problems presented.

A. Comprehensive Federal Legislation

Even though victim compensation seems to be a task best handled by government entities rather than private individuals, in this context current legislation would not appear to adequately redress the injuries of non-government affiliated victims of terrorist acts. [243] Therefore, perhaps the most equitable and efficient solution to the victim compensation issue is to amend current legislation to provide for a comprehensive platform of victim compensation for acts of domestic terrorism. Further, the use of legislation to establish minimum levels of reasonable care has apparently proven to be effective in the residential context. [244] Federal legislation specifying minimal structural and procedural antiterrorism measures for commercial buildings over certain sizes could be implemented, much as in the residential context, as the basis for public sanctions or as a guideline in the application of tort liability. [245] A statutory violation would arguably be conclusive of liability--replacing foreseeability--resulting in greater predictability and lowered use of judicial resources. [246] Alternatively, federal legislation could provide direct compensation to landowners. For example, landowners in Northern Ireland are compensated directly by the British government for losses from terrorist attacks. Police certification that the injury was related to a terrorist attack is required for reimbursement, but no premiums are paid. Funding comes from tax revenues throughout Great Britain. [247] Claims in Northern Ireland are relatively small when compared with the two incidents referred to throughout this Note. [248] Further, under this system there does not appear to be any incentive for landowners to take preventive measures. For these reasons (potential size of losses and lack of incentives), the Northern Ireland legislative response does not seem appropriate for adoption in the United States. [*202]

REV_00261428

B. Government Assisted Insurance

It is pragmatic to assume that if domestic terrorism continues, United States insurance companies will follow the lead of their European counterparts and begin to write terrorism exclusions into commercial property policies. When continental and British insurers took this course in 1993, fears of an economic crisis prompted the British government to promise that it would ensure that coverage for terrorist acts would be available to landowners in Great Britain. [249] The British government essentially agreed to become the "reinsurer of last resort" for losses caused by terrorist acts. [250] To do so it formed "Pool Re," a mutual reinsurance company, to provide the coverage excluded by private insurers. [251] The British system provides five layers of terrorism coverage to a landowner, with the government having final responsibility if all layers are exhausted. [252] Premiums charged for the additional Pool Re coverage are determined based on a number of different factors, some of which are apparently particular to the "terrorism insurance" market. [253] Another part of the premium structure is that an "IRA levy" is attached by the British government to all household and vehicle policies written, to shift the cost of insurance from London to other parts of the country. [254] While it does spread risks, there are problems with the British reinsurance scheme. There seems to be no incentive for insureds to take preventative measures. Certainly, premium reductions are common in other contexts, and as was [*203] discussed earlier, there are measures landlords can take to mitigate the effects of, if not prevent, terrorism. [255]

In a somewhat similar vein, the Overseas Private Investment Corporation ("OPIC") was formed by the United States government at least partly to "underwrite political risk insurance in friendly, less developed countries." [256] If political risk was defined to include terrorism, the principles of OPIC could theoretically be applied in developing a model for government provided domestic terrorism insurance, whereby the United States government could act as either a direct or indirect insurer for terrorism risks. The lessons learned from the shortcomings of the British system, like ensuring that premiums reflect preventive measures and using levies to spread the cost of premiums throughout the country, could be integrated. When insurance is used in this manner, economic efficiency is aided because insurance companies, in setting premiums reflective of precautions taken, will help minimize the cost of accident prevention. Landlords will have a clearer standard to follow; mitigating tendencies to either overprotect or do nothing. In this manner, the costs of victim compensation can be at least partially borne by the party best able to spread the risk--the government--in an economically efficient manner that also provides incentives for landlords to take measures to help prevent, or lessen the effect of, terrorist attacks.

C. Contract Theories

Once society is assured that victims of domestic terrorism will be fully compensated, via comprehensive legislation and government assisted insurance as suggested above, there are strong philosophical arguments for letting the market function via contract liability alone. [257] Market or contract based theories partially depend on the premise that it is the government's, and not the private sector's, duty to protect citizens. Further, even if there is a private sector duty, it is not fair to single out landlords. [258] Some [*204] theories provide that whatever security measures are necessary will be implemented by landowners on their own because estimate from the [*157] Oklahoma City bombing put damage at over $ 652 million. [5] When considered with other recent terrorist attacks and threatened attacks, [6] these incidents suggest that domestic terrorism is an emerging national problem. Americans must therefore develop innovative solutions to address the issues of prevention and victim compensation.

REV_00261429

Initial responses to domestic terrorism have resulted in what some have called the "hardening" of America. [7] Government responses to domestic terrorism have included both modifications to existing agencies' priorities as well as legislation providing for limited victim compensation and expanded law enforcement powers. [8] This Note considers the American common law response to [*158] domestic terrorism--landowner liability for terrorist acts--as typified by the civil litigation following in the wake of the World Trade Center bombing.

After the World Trade Center bombing over 174 suits were filed against the Port Authority, the owner of the World Trade Center complex. [9] The suits involve "a relatively murky area of the law," [10] namely a landowner's responsibility to protect tenants or invitees against criminal acts of third parties. In brief, the courts face the issue of whether the Port Authority, as landowner, was negligent in either its assessment of the foreseeability of the harm of a terrorist attack or the adequacy of the security measures it took in response to that assessment.

An examination of this particular legal response to domestic terrorist acts is critically important for several reasons. First, beyond the economic effects that can be imagined at the individual party level, the placement of liability could also have significant macroeconomic results. [11] Further, imposing civil liability on land- [*159] lords may have extensive implications for individual rights to privacy, as well as availability of fairly-valued rental space for more controversial tenants. [12] These issues must be measured against the harsh inequity that could result if civil suits are not allowed, as some innocent victims will invariably not be made whole by insurance or victim-compensation-type statutes. [13] Finally, no precedent appears to squarely address civil recoveries for acts of domestic terrorism as described here; [14] hence plaintiffs' reliance on the general body of law dealing with landlord liability for criminal acts of third parties. The question at hand then is whether this body of law is the best way to achieve equitable victim compensation and increased antiterrorism protection. [15]

In the wake of terrorist attacks in the United States, injured parties inadequately compensated by insurance or statutory assistance programs are likely to turn to civil lawsuits against landowners for relief. These suits will involve claims under the general rubric of "landlord liability for criminal acts of third parties." If based on current doctrines, claims involving terrorist acts will only exacerbate problems of unpredictability, inequity, and inefficiency endemic to claims presently involving more typical criminal acts. A nationwide legal response consisting of federal legislation, government-assisted insurance, and judicial decisions restricting recovery to more narrowly drawn theories of liability is necessary to provide more equitable and efficient answers to concerns about both victim compensation and prevention.

Part I of this Note presents potential legal responses available to victims of domestic terrorism by reviewing victim-compensationtype statutes that might apply and by examining how potential civil claims could be brought using landowner liability for criminal acts of third parties. [16] The examination of contemporary landowner [*160] liability will focus on problems arising from the use of foreseeability as a legal element, since this appears to be a primary cause of the current unpredictability in the law. The implications of applying existing liability theories in the environment of commercial leaseholds are also examined in detail since they will have particular importance in the context of terrorism. Part II examines how issues particularly related to terrorism will affect the application of existing doctrines, with the conclusion that the exclusive use of these types of claims is not the most appropriate legal means to achieve society's goals. Part III presents alternative legal responses that may provide more comprehensive victim compensation as well as the predictable legal outcomes which will cause landowners to take cost-effective preventive measures.

REV_00261412

customers will demand them. "By letting the market police itself . . . the more efficient level of protection will emerge as business owners seek to attract customers by using the most cost effective measures." [259]

Advantages to traditional contract liability include the ability to potentially cure a dangerous situation before a terrorist act occurs via traditional contract remedies like rent abatement, repair and offset, rescission, or even termination of the lease if contracted security measures are not provided. [260] In the commercial context, the uses of exculpatory clauses and indemnification provisions result in a more efficient allocation of risks than the legal rules now in effect, at least when tenants are the victims. [261] They result in greater precision in the negotiated solution, as each party's responsibilities are defined, and the bearer of the risk is clearly identified. This in turn allows procurement of appropriate insurance, as well as preventive security measures by the party bearing the risk (avoiding overlap of duties). [262] Provisions regarding risks related to terrorist acts and the provision of security against them should therefore be explicitly provided for in every commercial tenant's lease and pursuing a contract remedy should always be considered an appropriate legal response where applicable.

D. Tort Reform

When contract claims are not available, and if recommendations regarding victim compensation are not implemented, the problems with the negligence theories of landlord liability for criminal acts can be lessened so that they can be considered appropriate legal responses in that limited context. In those instances, since victim compensation is not assured, equity demands that landlord liability not be rejected. To mitigate the primary problems involved in the negligence formulations discussed above, foreseeability should be treated as a question of law and reserved for the court. The courts [*205] should then promulgate clear standards of liability and appropriate responsive security measures with an eye toward uniformity among jurisdictions. And finally, the courts should be responsive to concerns about landlords as social insurers, landlords operating in the commercial context, and the limited ability of landlords to prevent terrorism, by restricting the definition of duty.

Conclusion

In the wake of the World Trade Center and Oklahoma City bombings, America is learning how to deal with domestic terrorism by "hardening" our buildings and stepping-up security. We have not yet, however, developed methods for providing equitable and efficient legal remedies for victims of domestic terrorism. Since statutory victim compensation provisions in place will likely not provide full relief, victims are apt to pursue civil litigation against the one party likely to have sufficient, available assets--the landowner. Victims will likely proceed, and in fact have proceeded in the World Trade Center bombing case, under the theory that landlords have a duty to protect tenants from criminal acts of third parties. However, the body of law in this area is unsettled. Landowners are generally unable to predict liability or develop appropriate responses once liability is imposed. Liability varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction and indeed even from court to court. Many of the problems with landlord liability in this area have resulted from courts' treatment of the concept of foreseeability as establishing duty. In applying this theory of liability to terrorist acts, the issue of foreseeability is stretched to its outer limit; all of its shortcomings are accentuated. Further, courts will be asked to develop standards for terrorism liability in an environment of conflicting pressures; to both restrict duty, in the face of growing concern that landlords should not be social insurers, and to expand duty, in the face of the increasing visibility of terrorist acts.

While it is not clear how courts will define liability in view of these pressures, it seems certain that imposing tort liability on landlords for terrorist acts is not the most appropriate legal response. Victim compensation is best handled by the ultimate riskspreader, the government. To the extent society's concerns involve victim compensation and risk spreading, comprehensive federal legislation and government assisted insurance should be the primary remedies. To the extent society's concerns involve prevention, or antiterrorist measures, perhaps government is again the most efficient actor. Still, landlords can often effectively contribute through structural and procedural changes in security designed to aid both in the prevention and mitigation of damage. Sufficient incentives for this role can likely be achieved by making premiums under a [*206] government assisted insurance program contingent on attaining certain specifically defined safety levels, establishing statutory minimums for security measures based on building types, and allowing the market to function via contractual risk shifting provisions, such as exculpatory clauses. Limited tort liability (i.e., with clear, uniform standards of duty and sufficient responses) should only be used as a safety net when necessary to prevent inequity. How our society responds to domestic terrorism will necessarily be indicative of our opinions about the current state of the American legal system. To achieve society's goals of both victim compensation and prevention, we must forge equitable yet efficient legal responses from the stockpile of alternatives at our disposal.

REV_00261430

FOOTNOTES:

n1 See Jeffrey S. Green & Ira Tripathi, Coping with Chaos: The World Trade Center Bombing and Recovery Effort, 27 Urb. Law. 41, 41 (1995).

n2 See Daniel Wise, Lawyers Pack World Trade Center Hearing, N.Y. L.J., May 9, 1994, at 1 (insurance industry estimate).

n3 See Mitchell Pacelle, Onslaught of Civil Suits Begins in World Trade Center Bombing, Wall St. J., June 28, 1994, at B1, B10.

n4 Ralph Blumenthal, Prosecutors Describe "Horror" as Trial in Towers Blast Opens, N.Y. Times, Oct. 5, 1993, at B1.

n5 See Paul English, Preliminary Estimate Puts Bomb Losses at $ 652 Million: Uncovered Costs To Stagger State Budget Resources, The Daily Oklahoman, May 19, 1995, at 1. Oklahoma Governor Frank Keating noted that the loss amount "not only makes it the most catastrophic dollar loss in American history for a terrorist act, but in Oklahoma it's without doubt the greatest loss to the public and private sectors ever." Id.

n6 Including, for example, the Centennial Park bombing at the Olympics in Atlanta, the Amtrak derailment in Arizona, Unabomber bombings and threats, and abortion clinic attacks. "Scarcely a week goes by without at least one terrorist related incident making the headlines." Ileana M. Porras, On Terrorism: Reflections on Violence and the Outlaw, 1994 Utah L. Rev. 119, 119. The director of the CIA recently told Congress that he expects an increase in domestic terrorism over the next decade. See Sunday Today (NBC television broadcast, Jan. 7, 1996).

n7 See, e.g., Tom Masland et al., Fighting Back; Life in the Bull's-Eye, Newsweek, May 1, 1995, at 56. For example, security measures at the World Trade Center in the aftermath of the bombing reflect both structural and procedural changes, including wrapping columns with steel, painting windows with shatter-resistant coating, installing a hydraulic crash barrier, using an online photo ID system, restricting access to the towers, hiring of hundreds of new security guards, moving outside parking away from the building, see id., and restricting parking in the underground garage where the bomb was detonated. See Richard Lacayo, How Safe is Safe? Americans Must Decide How Much Freedom They Are Willing to Trade for More Security, Time, May 1, 1995, at 68, 71. After the Oklahoma City bombing, changes were implemented at Federal buildings around the country. All in all, officials put more than 8,000 federal buildings on "second-level alert"--requiring all employees and visitors to identify themselves "until further notice." Masland et al., supra, at 56. And although he had opposed the action for some time, President Clinton agreed to a ban of vehicular traffic in front of the White House. See Kathy Lewis & G. Robert Hillman, White House Barriers Erected: Clinton

REV_00261431

Cites Terrorist Fears, The Record (Northern N.J.), May 21, 1995, at A1. In arguing for the measure, Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin said that "the bombings of the federal building in Oklahoma City and the World Trade Center in New York are reminders of a growing terrorist threat." Id. at A3.

n8 For example, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), which is best known for its response to disasters like floods or earthquakes, has also begun to focus on the problem of "technological events" like major acts of terrorism. See Scott S. Greenberger, FEMA Focuses on Prevention, Telegram & Gazette (Worcester, Mass.), May 2, 1995, at A1, A2. After the World Trade Center bombing, FEMA came up with recommendations to make structures safer, proposing designs for stronger windows and doors. See id. at A3. In responding to the Oklahoma City bombing, in a more traditional role, FEMA is expected to offset about $ 33 million of the loss, as well as provide for rebuilding-loan programs. See English, supra note 5, at 1.

The Emergency Supplemental Appropriations for Additional Disaster Assistance, for Anti-Terrorism Initiatives, for Assistance in the Recovery from the Tragedy that Occurred at Oklahoma City, and Rescission Act, 1995, as its name implies, appropriates some $ 66 million for the demolition and rebuilding of the Federal building and authorizes an appropriation of Community Development Block Grant funds of approximately $ 39 million to be used "to assist property and victims damaged and economic revitalization" in a specified area around the bombing site. Pub. L. No. 104-19, section 2007(c), 109 Stat. 194, 252-53 (1995) [hereinafter Emergency Anti-Terrorism Act]. More controversial anti-terrorism provisions of this Act include establishing a $ 34 million "Counterterrorism Fund" for the Department of Justice, and appropriating $ 77 million for a "Domestic Counterterrorism Center" for the FBI. See section 2007(c), 109 Stat. at 249-50.

The Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, signed by President Clinton in April of this year, authorizes $ 1 billion in law enforcement spending over four years, provides for the designation of terrorist groups, bans fund raising in the U.S. for designated terrorist groups, streamlines deportation procedures for terrorists, requires plastic explosives to contain chemical markers, and strengthens penalties for many acts of terrorism. Pub. L. No. 104-132, section 301-823, 110 Stat. 1214, 1247-317 (1996) [hereinafter Antiterrorism Act of 1996]; see also infra note 17.

Recent events including the Centennial Park bombing at the Atlanta Olympics have triggered another round of proposals for increased antiterrorism spending. See Top Priority in Terrorism Fight, The Post And Courier (Charleston, S.C.), Aug. 1, 1996, at 12 (discussing a bill sponsored by Senator Judd Gregg which would add another $ 78.7 million to the Antiterrorism Act of 1996).

n9 Some of these suits have either been settled or dismissed, but of the original suits, 126 involved personal injuries (containing a total of 294 individual claims), 17 involved property damage (containing a total of 159 claims, most of them for cars in the parking garage), and 31 involved business interruption (containing 194 claims filed by companies with offices in the World Trade Center or their insurers). See Wise, supra note 2, at 5.

n10 See Pacelle, supra note 3, at B1.

n11 For example, after the World Trade Center explosion some investors expressed concerns about the Port Authority's ability to pay off some of its $ 4.1 billion in public improvement bonds. See Jon Nordheimer, Crisis at the Twin Towers: The Port Authority; Complex Insurance Issues in Aftermath of Explosion, N.Y. Times, Mar. 2, 1993, at B5; see also infra notes 225-36 and accompanying text (discussing macroeconomic effects of imposing liability on landowners or tenants and the effect of exculpatory clauses).

n12 See infra notes 217-24 and accompanying text.

REV_00261432

n13 See infra notes 17-23 and accompanying text.

n14 The term "terrorism" is generally used here to refer to bombing-type acts since they will most often have the greatest effect on landowners. See infra notes 134-41 and accompanying text (discussing in more detail the definition of terrorism).

n15 Throughout this Note, societal goals of increased victim compensation and antiterrorism are presumed. This presumption is based on an economic theory of torts which holds that liability is imposed on defendants in order to (1) compensate those who are harmed and (2) provide incentives for tortfeasors to limit risk-producing behavior to efficient levels (in this case theoretically complete deterrence). See Uri Kaufman, When Crime Pays: Business Landlords' Duty to Protect Customers From Criminal Acts Committed on the Premises, 31 S. Tex. L. Rev. 89, 103 (1990).

n16 The topic of landowner liability for criminal acts of third parties has been commented on extensively. See, e.g., William H. Hardie, Jr., Foreseeability: A Murky Crystal Ball for Predicting Liability, 23 Cumb. L. Rev. 349, 364 n.61 (1992) (listing no less than fifteen law review pieces discussing landlord liability for criminal acts of third parties); Kaufman, supra note 15, at 92 n.13 (discussing representative pieces advocating extreme proposals). Therefore, it is not within the scope of this Note to fully address it, rather the discussions presented here focus on landowner liability for terrorist acts.

n17 See Emergency Anti-Terrorism Act, supra note 8, at 253 (making other appropriations to various governmental agencies for rebuilding). In view of the magnitude of the claims noted earlier, this is not likely to provide sufficient compensation. Additional assistance should also be available to some government employees. See infra note 20 and accompanying text (citing the Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act, Pub. L. No. 99399, section 801, 100 Stat. 879 (1986)). Also, the Antiterrorism Act of 1996 specifically provides for mandatory victim restitution as well as additional compensation for victims of terrorism via The Victims of Crime Act of 1984. See Antiterrorism Act of 1996, supra note 8, at 1227-41 (mandatory victim restitution), 1243-47 (assistance to victims of terrorism). However, obtaining restitution from terrorists will probably not provide adequate compensation in the majority of cases. See infra notes 25-26 and accompanying text (noting that terrorists will often have insufficient or hard-to-reach assets). Further, while the Antiterrorism Act of 1996 specifically authorizes Federal funding of state crime victim compensation programs which provide assistance to victims of terrorism, these types of programs provide very limited compensation (for example, limited medical expenses and lost wages). See infra note 23 and accompanying text.

n18 Michael Ratner & Beth Stephens, Tyrants, Terrorists and Torturers Brought to Justice; U.S. Courts Provide Compensation for Victims, N.Y. L.J., May 15, 1995, at S5 (quoting the Torture Victim Protection Act (TVPA), Pub. L. No. 102-256, 106 Stat. 73 (1992)).

n19 The Warsaw Convention generally allows damages up to $ 75,000 against international airlines for accidental injuries. See Deborah Squiers, Court Dismisses Damages Suit in Airport Death, N.Y. L.J., Apr. 2, 1990, at 1.

n20 See Kimberly A. Trotter, Compensating Victims of Terrorism: The Current Framework in the United States, 22 Tex. Int'l L.J. 383, 392 (1987).

n21 See id. at 393.

n22 Id. at 401. Of course, this statement assumes that victims are unable to satisfy losses completely via insurance recoveries.

n23 While it may be possible for victims to obtain partial recovery under more traditional state-sponsored crime victim compensation funds, if available, these generally provide a significantly lower recovery than a civil suit, so there is still an incentive to sue. See Rex A. Sharp, Paying for the Crimes of Others? Landowner Liability for Crimes on the Premises, 29 S. Tex. L. Rev. 11, 16 n.11 (1987).

n24 If the victim is an invitee of a commercial tenant, it might be possible for the victim to include the commercial tenant as a responsible party, since if the lessee has exclusive control and possession it may be considered to have the same protective duties as a landlord. See, e.g., Daniels v. Shell Oil Co., 485 S.W.2d 948, 951 (Tex. Civ. App. 1972). For purposes of this Note, references to landlords or landowners are presumed to include tenants where tenants retain exclusive control and possession of the leased premises. Further, employees of tenants or landlords may likely be precluded from bringing suit against one or the other since their injuries may be exclusively addressed by workers' compensation. See, e.g., Daniel Wise, Law Firms Based in World Trade Center Regroup: Lawyers See Potential for Dozens of Liability Claims, N.Y. L.J., Mar. 2 1993, at 1 (noting that Port Authority employees are precluded from recovery outside of worker's compensation in the World Trade Center bombing); see also infra note 127 (discussing invitees and employees of tenants). Recently, victims (including the owner of the World Trade Center) have also attempted to hold chemical manufacturers responsible--alleging that they could have made the ammonium nitrate, an ingredient in the bombs used in Oklahoma City and at the World Trade Center, less explosive. See Hassan Fattah, Federal Court Dismisses Case Against ICC, Chemical Week, July 17, 1996, at 12.

n25 See Alexander Stille, The PLO: A Suit Provides an Inside Look, 10 Nat'l L.J. 1 (1987). The 1985 murder of Leon Klinghoffer (an elderly man in a wheelchair who was ostensibly singled out because of his Jewish name and United States passport by Palestinians who hijacked the cruise ship, Achille Lauro) came to symbolize terrorism in the late 1980's much as the World Trade Center, Oklahoma City, and Centennial Park bombings do in the mid-1990's. Recently, the PLO has tentatively agreed to underwrite a peace institute in order to settle the lawsuit. If the agreement is finalized, the Klinghoffers will drop all legal claims against the PLO. See Beth J. Harpaz, Klinghoffers, PLO Plan Peace Institute In Terror Victim's Memory, AP, Jan. 18, 1996, available in LEXIS, Nexis Library, AP File.

n26 For example, what is certain to be the first of many lawsuits involving the Centennial Park bombing was filed less than a week after the explosion. The suit, filed by a woman injured in the blast, asks for $ 500,000 in damages and alleges that security guards did not evacuate people quickly enough. See FBI Continues Investigation of Olympic Blast (CNN news broadcast, Aug. 3, 1996).

n27 See Sharp, supra note 23, at 54-55. Further, the landlord could be held liable via vicarious liability. See id. at 55; see also Sharp v. W.H. Moore, Inc., 796 P.2d 506 (Idaho 1990) (noting that security service's liability could be imputed to landlord as a result of agency relationship).

n28 And, where applicable, the landowner's insurer.

n29 See B.A. Glesner, Landlords as Cops: Tort, Nuisance & Forfeiture Standards Imposing Liability on Landlords for Crime on the Premises, 42 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 679, 790 (1992).

n30 See id. at 688. "Courts within a single jurisdiction may differ as to the appropriate basis for liability; even appellate courts have misinterpreted or ignored their own state supreme court's analysis of the issue." Id. at 688. One South Carolina District Court has noted, "the wide range of approaches taken by courts in other jurisdictions establishes only that support can be found for practically any position." Id. (quoting Cooke v. Allstate Management Corp., 741 F. Supp. 1205, 1209 n.1 (D.S.C. 1990)).

n31 See Robert S. Schoshinski, American Law of Landlord and Tenant section 4.14 (1980).

REV_00261434

n32 While some have held that landlord tort liability has therefore undergone a "drastic metamorphosis," see Glesner, supra note 29, at 684, or "revolution," others claim that this aspect of landlord-tenant law merely reflects an "integration . . . into the mainstream of contract and tort law." Charles J. Goetz, Wherefore the Landlord-Tenant Law "Revolution?"--Some Comments, 69 Cornell L. Rev. 592, 602 (1984). Under the latter theory, these other branches of law began incorporating "such notions as optimal risk-bearing, transaction costs, and externalities" that put pressure on "antiquated landlord-tenant doctrines." Id. at 599-600. This theory seems more plausible in that the landlord's duty to protect tenants originated in the residential context, arguably in response to the changed relationship (now considered contractual) of modern landlord and tenant. See, e.g., Javins v. First Nat'l Realty Corp., 428 F.2d 1071, 1075 (D.C. Cir. 1970) ("In our judgment the trend toward treating leases as contracts is wise and well-considered. . . . Leases of urban dwelling unites should be interpreted and construed like any other contract."). Given that this area of the law is responsive to changes in contract and tort doctrines, any reform in those areas will in turn influence the courts' adoption of landlord liability for acts of terrorism.

n33 439 F.2d 477 (D.C. Cir. 1970).

n34 See Miriam J. Haines, Landlords or Tenants: Who Bears the Costs of Crime? 2 Cardozo L. Rev. 299, 317-18 (1981).

n35 See Joan L. Neisser, The Tenant as Consumer: Applying Strict Liability Principles to Landlords, 64 St. John's L. Rev. 527, 532 (1990).

n36 Kline, 439 F.2d at 481.

n37 For example, the court's first basis for liability, maintaining common areas in a reasonably safe condition, perhaps reflects an economic efficiency argument; namely, since the landlord has exclusive control, it is cost-effective for him, rather than tenants, to take preventive action. Tenants' responses would necessarily be duplicative or involve collective action with high transaction costs; tenants lack security expertise, and the landlord is in the best position to ensure against risk via insurance. See Peter S. Selvin, Landlord Tort Liability for Criminal Attacks on Tenants: Developments Since Kline, 9 Real Est. L.J. 311, 315 (1981). On the other hand, in recognizing that there are limits to liability, or that the landlord is not an "insurer," the court may be acknowledging that public policy or fairness dictates that a landlord should not be liable when he is not at fault. See Sharp, supra note 23, at 16.

n38 See Schoshinski, supra note 31, section 4.15, at 219.

n39 In this regard, Kline may be limited to its facts, in that the tenant specifically advised the landlord about other prior criminal acts on the premises, see Kline, 439 F.2d at 479 n.3, and the landlord had actually decreased security measures since the inception of the tenant's lease. See Schoshinski, supra note 31, section 4.15, at 218-19.

n40 See supra note 30 and accompanying text.

n41 See infra notes 115-27 and accompanying text.

n42 Haines, supra note 34, at 343 n.144. See also Marvin F. Milich, Protecting Commercial Landlords From Liability for Criminal Acts of Third Parties, 15 Real Est. L.J. 236, 241 (1987) (citing cases involving commercial landlords where theories of recovery paralleled those in cases involving residential landlords). Further, it is generally acknowledged that residential landlord/tenant law was the "impetus for the modern trend imposing a duty upon commercial landowners." Donna Lee Welch, Case Comment: Ann M. v. Pacific Plaza Shopping Center: The California Supreme Court Retreats from its "Totality of the Circumstances" Approach to Premises Liability, 28 Ga. L. Rev. 1053, 1064 n.64 (1994).

REV_00261435

n43 With this said, the first theory listed above, strict liability, sparingly adopted in residential suits, does not seem to have ever been successfully applied in the commercial context. See, e.g., Sharp, supra note 23, at 73-76 (citing Davis v. Allied Supermarkets, Inc., 547 P.2d 963, 965 (Okla. 1976), which held that in spite of the risk spreading policy behind strict liability, "it does not seem that shifting the financial loss caused by crime from one innocent victim to another innocent victim is proper"); Jeffrey Fowler, Rowe v. State Bank of Lombard: The Key to Unlocking a Landlord's Duty to Provide Security, 23 J. Marshall L. Rev. 131 (1989) (discussing Rowe v. Lombard State Bank, 531 N.E.2d 1358 (Ill. 1988) which rejected strict liability but held the commercial landlord liable on other grounds). Further, even those who would argue for increased application of strict liability for landlords in the residential setting seem to agree that its application to the commercial setting is not appropriate. See Frank F. Gibson & Elliot Klayman, Landlord Liability: A New Dimension, 25 Am. Bus. L.J. 1, 27-28 (1987) (holding that the policy considerations favoring strict liability in the defective products context apply in the residential but not commercial leasehold context). Therefore, this theory is not discussed here.

n44 See Kline, 439 F.2d at 481.

n45 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 690.

n46 See id. at 691.

n47 See id. at 690.

n48 Kline, 439 F.2d at 484.

n49 See Bob Gibbins & Yii-Chwen (Francis) Pan, Landlords and Third-Party Criminal Conduct, Trial, Mar. 1986, at 48. Many courts that have adopted this rule cite the Restatement of Torts in support, which states that:

one who undertakes, gratuitously or for consideration, to render services to another which he should recognize as necessary for the protection of the other's person or things, is subject to liability to the other for physical harm resulting from his failure to exercise reasonable care to perform his undertaking, if (a) his failure to exercise such care increases the risk of such harm, or (b) the harm is suffered because of the other's reliance upon the undertaking.

Restatement (Second) of Torts section 323 (1977). This is effectively an exception to the "no duty to rescue" rule, which holds that "the fact that the actor realizes or should realize that action on his part is necessary for another's aid or protection does not of itself impose upon him a duty to take such action." section 314.

n50 See John M. Adler, Relying Upon the Reasonableness of Strangers: Some Observations About the Current State of Common Law Affirmative Duties to Aid or Protect Others, 1991 Wis. L. Rev. 867, 884.

n51 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 696. A landlord's failure to provide adequate security could also result in a breach of contract claim. See id. at 698 n.88.

n52 See David C. Markatos, Property Law: The Growing Accountability of Landlords for Third-Party Criminal Attacks, 1991 Ann. Surv. Am. L. 501, 508. Cases brought under this theory are often fact-intensive and result in unpredictable jurisprudence. See id.

REV_00261436

n53 See id. at 510.

n54 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 696. See also Jardel Co., Inc. v. Hughes, 523 A.2d 518 (Del. 1987) (finding that since mall owner had voluntarily undertaken to provide a security program, sufficiency of that program constituted jury question).

n55 In the residential context, a "handful" of courts have held that the implied warranty of habitability should include a duty to provide security. See Markatos, supra note 52, at 521-22. In the commercial context, a duty to provide security "would have to be confined as an independent material provision of the lease." Haines, supra note 34, at 326 n.91. While some commentators have argued for the extension of residential habitability warranties to certain commercial settings, see Robert A. Levinson & Michael N. Silver, Do Commercial Property Tenants Possess Warranties of Habitability? 14 Real Est. L.J. 59 (1985), in practice such application has been restricted. When used in the commercial context, this theory has generally involved conditions existing at the inception of the lease. See Gibbons & Pan, supra note 49, at 48.

n56 See Sharp, supra note 23, at 30. This claim may also give rise to a tort claim of misrepresentation or fraud. See e.g., O'Hara v. Western Seven Trees Corp. Intercoast Management, 142 Cal. Rptr. 487, 491 (Cal. Ct. App. 1977) (holding that cause of action exists if tenant justifiably relies on landlord's misrepresentations concerning safety). But see Cooke v. Allstate Management Corp., 741 F. Supp. 1205, 1216 (D.S.C. 1990) (stating that landlord's opinion that apartment was "safe" was inadequate to support claim for misrepresentation).

n57 Pacelle, supra note 3, at B10.

n58 See id.; see also infra notes 190-99 and accompanying text (discussing the issue of whether discovery of previous security studies should be allowed).

n59 See Pacelle, supra note 3, at B10; Douglas Feiden, D. Witter Fights WTC Lease, Says It Was Duped by PA, Daily News (New York), July 25, 1996, at 36. Some have suggested that Dean Witter's suit is largely motivated by business reasons rather than security concerns. While the firm locked in to a long-term lease at $ 35 per square foot, rents in the building have generally decreased to the point that some tenants now pay less than $ 25 per square foot. See id.

n60 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 698 n.88. Further, when contract claims are brought, they often appear as alternatives to claims based on tort theories and are therefore cursorily pleaded and prone to dismissal by courts. See Markatos, supra note 52, at 516.

n61 See Markatos, supra note 52, at 516.

n62 See Richmond Medical Supply Co. v. Clifton, 369 S.E.2d 407 (Va. 1988).

n63 See Markatos, supra note 52, at 516.

n64 See infra notes 228-36 and accompanying text.

n65 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 688.

n66 See W. Page Keeton et al., Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts section 30, at 164-65 (5th ed. 1984).

n67 With this said, the last basis for negligence claims, statutory violations, appears primarily in the residential context. Statutory requirements for the provision of different security measures do appear to be a growing trend, however, and may be applied with more frequency in the commercial context in the future. A landlord's compliance with statutory requirements usually does not protect him from liability, however, since they generally represent only minimum measures. See Glesner, supra note 29, at 702. For these reasons, and since no statutes currently address required antiterrorism measures, this basis for liability is not addressed extensively here, although it is suggested infra at notes 24446 and accompanying text.

REV_00261437

n68 Of these questions, the issue of when an act is foreseeable (thereby establishing duty) is the most troublesome and is discussed in detail in the text. The issue of proximate cause, or more specifically, determining when a criminal act intervenes between the negligence of the landlord and injury to the tenant, is also dependent on foreseeability since if the defendant should have foreseen the criminal's actions, such actions will not be considered superseding causes. See Restatement (Second) Torts sections 448-49 (1977). Technically, the plaintiff must also prove the threshold issue that the landlord's act or omission was the legal cause of his injury as well. However, courts have apparently not discussed this concept in detail. One author contends that while it is not clear that the causal link between provisions of security and likelihood of crime is legally sufficient, "situational crime prevention" studies do find that there is some relationship between opportunity and crime. Madeline Johnson, Landlord's Responsibility for Crime: Determining Legal Causation, 17 Real Est. L.J. 234, 241 (1989). Similar arguments may arise with regard to the relationship between "opportunity" and the incidence of terrorism, although terrorists' motivations differ from those of "ordinary" criminals. See infra notes 140, 145 and accompanying text.

While it has apparently not been a recurring issue in the regular crime cases, if landlords are held liable for the effects of terrorist acts, they may attempt to argue that the behavior of controversial tenants (e.g., performing abortions) itself constitutes a superseding cause that precludes their being held liable. See infra notes 211-24 (discussing the effects of landlord liability on controversial tenants).

The reasonableness of a landlord's response also involves issues of foreseeability since landlords effectively need to predict what types of security will prove adequate to prevent attempted crimes. However, courts have not been consistent in finding what measures constitute adequate security. They have addressed the sufficiency of any number of security measures, from security guards to alarms to lighting, in different ways. See Jardel Co. v. Hughes, 523 A.2d 518, 525 (Del. 1987) (holding that whether one security guard on premises for each nightly shift was sufficient was question for jury); Peacock's, Inc. v. Shreveport Alarm Co., 510 So. 2d 387, 400 (La. Ct. App. 1987) (finding landlord partially liable for negligently allowing access to alarm controls); Shepard v. Drucker & Falk, 306 S.E.2d 199, 202 (N.C. Ct. App. 1983) (allowing landlord to present testimony comparing lighting at apartment complex with other complexes, since it was proper attempt to show whether reasonable care had been exercised). But see Carrigan v. New World Enterprises, Ltd., 446 N.E.2d 265, 270 (Ill. App. Ct. 1983) (holding landlord's breach of contractual obligation to maintain burglar alarm was not sufficient to trigger liability for tenant's rape). In one case, the court denied recovery where "the plaintiff failed to adduce testimony from a qualified expert in the field of building security thereby leaving the jury" to speculate regarding the deficiencies in security, if any, at the time of the incident. Iannelli v. Powers, 498 N.Y.S.2d 377, 382 (N.Y. App. Div. 1986). Certainly, questions of when more sophisticated antiterrorism security measures are reasonable will be even more difficult for courts to handle. For example, when are crash barriers and photo I.D. access reasonable? This issue seems destined to foster a battle of experts at trial. See supra note 7 and accompanying text; infra notes 142-63.

n69 See, e.g., Glesner, supra note 29, at 707.

n70 See id. at 704.

n71 224 N.W.2d 843 (Mich. 1975).

REV_00261438

n72 Id. at 849 (citation omitted).

n73 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 703. Unlike under the special relationship formulation, there is no presumption that landlord's have a duty to protect tenants. Id.

n74 531 N.E.2d 1358 (Ill. 1988).

n75 Id. at 1367-68. Some commentators have noted that this dual role of foreseeability is problematic. While foreseeability is usually understood to define and limit the scope of a pre-existing duty, it is not generally used to "justify the imposition of duty." Haines, supra note 34, at 339; see also Sharp, supra note 23, at 21.

n76 Kline v. 1500 Massachusetts Avenue Apartment Corp., 439 F.2d 477, 480 n.3, 483 (D.C. Cir 1970).

n77 Samson v. Saginaw Professional Building, Inc., 224 N.W.2d 843, 851 (Mich. 1975).

n78 See Old v. Lefmark Management Co., 1995 WL 500619, at *2 (Tex. Ct. App. Aug. 24, 1995). The letter also requested that "if the results of this survey indicate additional security is needed for the common areas, please take the appropriate action necessary to protect our employees and customers." Id. The actual notice standard is also apparently reflected in Rowe, where plaintiffs had to prove that the landlord actually knew that unauthorized possession of master keys would lead to illegal entry. See 531 N.E.2d at 1367-68, n79 See Fowler, supra note 43, at 145. In some cases, it is clear that courts have also used the defendants' security precautions as evidence of their "constructive notice" of risks. See Hardie, supra note 16, at 400.

n80 See infra notes 190-99 and accompanying text (discussing the existence of a security report warning of susceptibility to terrorist attacks).

n81 See Fowler, supra note 43, at 145.

n82 See Welch, supra note 42, at 1060.

n83 See id.

n84 See Markatos, supra note 52, at 513 (quoting the court in Isaacs v. Huntington Memorial Hosp., 695 P.2d 653 (Cal. 1985) (criticized by Ann. M. v. Pacific Plaza Shopping Center, 863 P.2d 207 (Cal. 1993))). This prompted one Florida court in rejecting this definition to declare that it would not "sacrifice the first victim's right to safety upon the altar of foreseeability by slavishly adhering to the . . . notion that at least one criminal assault must have occurred on the premises before the landlord can be held liable." Paterson v. Deeb, 472 So. 2d 1210, 1219 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1985) (rejecting the prior similar incidents rule).

n85 See Markatos, supra note 52, at 513. In jurisdictions following this rule, there is a general sense that in order to qualify as "prior similar incidents," crimes must be on the premises, be sufficient in number and recent enough to put the landlord on notice, and be sufficiently similar in nature to the incident in question. See Glesner, supra note 29, at 706.

n86 695 P.2d 653 (Cal. 1985). See Welch, supra note 42, at 1061.

n87 863 P.2d 207 (Cal. 1993).

n88 See id. The court went on to note, however, that the foreseeability of the harm should

REV_00261439

I. Analysis of Potential Claims

A. Victim Compensation for Terrorist Attacks in the United States--Statutory Claims

While there are some statutory provisions addressing victim compensation for acts of terrorism, they have traditionally been inadequate for a number of reasons. For example, the only appropriation aimed at providing direct assistance to victims of the Oklahoma City bombing seems to be the $ 39 million Community Development Block Grant. [17] Other statutory provisions, which theoretically apply to victims of terrorism or other international incidents, apply only in narrow sets of circumstances. For example, the Torture Victim Protection Act provides that a "private cause of action in federal court against individuals who commit such abuses while acting under 'actual or apparent authority, or color of law, of [*161] any foreign nation,'" may be brought by or on behalf of a United States citizen who was a victim of torture or summary execution. [18] The Warsaw Convention [19] addresses incidents on international airlines, and the Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act provides relief only to victims associated with the United States government. [20] Moreover, even those victims who do fall under one of these "patchwork" statutory provisions are generally not fully compensated. [21] Thus, "it is inevitable . . . that there will be individuals, including United States citizens, who will be victimized by terrorism and forced to suffer injury without remedy." [22] If statutory recoveries are insufficient, victims are likely to turn to the courts, bringing civil suits against one of the parties involved to obtain compensation for their injuries. [23]

B. Civil Litigation--Background

In the types of terrorist acts contemplated here, parties that could be potentially held responsible by victims include the terrorist organization, security firms, and landowners. [24] Bringing suit [*162] against the responsible terrorist organization itself is not unheard of. For example, the son and daughter of Leon Klinghoffer sued the Palestinian Liberation Organization ("PLO") after their father was murdered during the Achille Lauro incident. [25] However, as in ordinary criminal cases, plaintiffs are not likely to target those parties where recovery is difficult due to insufficient or hard-toreach assets. Security firms or landlords would seem to provide an easier recovery. Indeed, if it can be proved that a security firm was negligent in its provision of services, it should be susceptible to liability itself. [26] However, a landlord would likely not escape liability even in that case, because if a landlord has an affirmative duty to protect the plaintiff, then the landlord remains liable for negligence in selecting, directing, or supervising the security agency. [27] The likely target for injured plaintiffs will be the solvent party with the most broadly defined responsibility for protection--the landowner. [28]

C. Landowner Liability for Criminal Acts of Third Parties

This landowner-as-target hypothesis is borne out by the many suits filed as a result of criminal acts of third parties. A victim of a terrorist (or criminal) act could file a complaint against an allegedly negligent landlord for failing to secure the premises under a number of different theories, with differing likelihoods of success. While landlords now have some duty to protect their tenants from third-party crime in practically every jurisdiction, [29] the extent of [*163] such duty varies greatly depending upon the jurisdiction, and sometimes even the court. [30]

1. Background

For a full understanding of the problems involved in predicting the success of these claims, some background is necessary. The unsettled state of the law in this area is due to several factors. Traditionally, landlords did not have any special duty regarding the security of their tenants, a corollary of the rule that private parties generally have no duty to rescue others. [31] still be balanced against the burden of the duty imposed--reserving the questions of whether a commercial leasehold that is "inherently dangerous" or in the immediate proximity to a substantially similar business that has experienced prior crimes could trigger a duty without itself being the site of any prior similar incidents. See id. at 215-16; Welch, supra note 42, at 1065-66.

n89 As one commentator noted, "The Ann M. Court reasoned that landowners would unjustly become the insurers of public safety if plaintiffs could prove the degree of foreseeability required to impose liability without offering evidence of prior similar crimes." Mark Bianchi, Tort-Law--Revisiting Isaacs: A Commercial Landowner's Duty to Protect Against Criminal Acts of Third Parties--Ann M. v. Pacific Plaza Shopping Center, 28 Suffolk U. L. Rev. 306, 311 (1994). "The court decided to revisit Issacs in light of the increase in violent crime and pressure from the court of appeals." Id. at 311 n.29 (citations omitted).

n90 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 679-82 (noting a correlation between increasing crime rates and landlord liability in general); Milich, supra note 42, at 236 (noting that "not to be overlooked as influencing modern-day judges is the rising crime rate."); Welch, supra note 42, at 1057 (noting that "crime problems of epidemic proportions caused courts to recognize . . . exceptions to their judicially created no-duty rules.").

n91 See infra Part III discussing alternatives.

n92 See Markatos, supra note 52, at 514. Obviously, prior similar crimes on the premises remain highly probative under this theory, which effectively holds only that an absence of prior similar crimes does not foreclose liability. See, e.g., Whittaker v. Saraceno, 635 N.E.2d 1185, 1188 (Mass. 1994) ("The previous occurrence of similar criminal acts on or near a defendant's premises is a circumstance to consider, but the foreseeability question is not conclusively answered in favor of a defendant landlord if there has been no prior similar criminal act.").

n93 See, e.g., Kaufman, supra note 15, at 97 ("To date, only California has adhered to this rule in the business-invitee context.").

n94 See Markatos, supra note 52, at 514.

n95 See Green Cos. v. DiVencenzo, 432 So. 2d 86 (Fla Dist. Ct. App. 1983).

n96 Daniel P. Kennedy, Inadequate Security and Premises Liability, Trial, June, 1991, at 56.

n97 If a landlord is aware of such reports, at some level of specificity to her premises she may be considered to have notice under even the most restrictive definition of foreseeability. See supra notes 76-81 and accompanying text (discussing the role of notice in varying definitions of foreseeability).

n98 See Kaufman, supra note 15, at 97.

n99 See id. at 98.

n100 See Sharp, supra note 23, at 32-34.

n101 See infra notes 164-69 and accompanying text (discussing the use of warnings against terrorist attacks).

n102 See infra notes 211-24 and accompanying text (discussing the negative implications to these types of tenants of imposing this duty on landlords).

REV_00261440

n103 Hardie, supra note 16, at 367.

n104 In fact, foreseeability has been held to just be a tool of the courts; changing as needed to mask public policy decisions about how broad a landowner's duty should be. See Hardie, supra note 16, at 393; Welch, supra note 42, at 1057 n.25.

n105 For example, one commentator feels that:

Courts are uncomfortable with jury determinations of foreseeability as an element of duty in causes of action that have not yet matured and that have not yet been established as common theories with which the court is familiar. Until this maturation occurs, courts simply will continue to decide cases on the basis of policy considerations.

Hardie, supra note 16, at 392. Of course, this does not bode well for the development of a clear definition of foreseeability in landowner liability for acts of terrorism.

n106 See Johnson, supra note 68, at 247. This is basically a permutation of the famous "Hand formula." See United States v. Carroll Towing Co., 159 F.2d 169 (2d Cir. 1947). One commentator has noted, however, that in an evaluation of this "formula" for criminal acts, the third factor, probability, has been underplayed since it is the most difficult to evaluate. See Johnson, supra note 68, at 248. Johnson further notes that empirical studies suggest a causal link between physical conditions controlled by the landlord and crime, but that there is no way to determine the exact probability of a given crime given a certain condition. See id.; supra note 68.

n107 Further, in evaluating available alternatives, the landowner is generally found culpable if a reasonable person would have chosen an option that would have avoided the injury. See Johnson, supra note 68, at 248. However, reasonable landlords have much less information about what measures will prevent the commission of terrorism than they do about regular crime.

n108 See Hardie, supra note 16, at 390.

n109 See Kaufman, supra note 15, at 100.

n110 As one commentator has noted:

Courts and commentators have long recognized that any case which goes to a jury under general instructions on the foreseeability of a heinous crime almost invariably results in a verdict for the plaintiff. With hindsight, juries inevitably find that more security should have been employed since the security provided was in fact inadequate. It is precisely for this reason that most cases surviving a motion for summary judgment result in large settlements for the plaintiffs.

Id.

n111 In other words, spend more on protection than the theoretically efficient legal standard would require in order to take into account the court's "margin of error" in determining fault. See Kaufman, supra note 15, at 105.

REV_00261441

n112 See id.

n113 See Sharp, supra note 23, at 19.

n114 There is no reason for plaintiffs not to forego suit because their legal fees are a percentage of recovery; there is little incentive for defendants to proceed to trial because they do have real legal costs and the probability of success and range of potential verdicts will be hard to quantify. See Hardie, supra note 16, at 405. This arguably puts defendants in the position of settling on amounts in excess of optimum.

n115 See supra note 42.

n116 See Royal Neckwear Co. v. Century City, Inc., 252 Cal. Rptr. 810 (Cal. Ct. App. 1988) (holding that a commercial landlord does not owe a duty to safeguard tenant's property from foreseeable criminal activity by third parties); Craig v. AAR Realty, 576 A.2d 688 (Del. Super. Ct. 1989) (denying liability of owner of large mall who did not retain control); Czech v. Aspen Indus. Ctr., 368 A.2d 938 (N.J. Super. 1976) (rejecting liability for landlord, the court distinguished commercial from residential tenancies in terms of fairness and public interest); Exxon v. Tidwell, 867 S.W.2d 19, 21 (Tex. 1993) (stating that the general rule in a commercial setting "is that a landlord is not liable to a lessee for injuries caused by an unsafe condition, which can include the unreasonable risk of harm from criminal intrusions, unless the landlord was aware of the latent dangerous condition at the time the premises were let."); Glesner, supra note 29, at 684 n.16 (noting that "many courts apply a lower standard of security for commercial buildings").

n117 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 684 n.16.

n118 See, e.g., Gibson & Klayman, supra note 43, at 27-28 (noting that "in most instances [commercial tenants] bargaining power is comparable--or perhaps superior--to that of the landlord. They can protect themselves by demanding express warranties that improve safety").

n119 See Selvin, supra note 37, at 328 n.61 (quoting Dietz v. Miles Holding Corp., 277 A.2d 108, 110 n.2 (D.C. App. 1971) which stated that "the residential housing market offers markedly less alternatives to tenants than does the commercial office building market").

n120 See id. at 323. For example, most commercial buildings by definition must be open to the public during the business day. In one case involving a government building, the court held that it was that nature of a such a building that it "remain accessible and open to the steady flow of dissimilar citizens" and that this was a reality that the court should realize in imposing liability. Id. at 327 (quoting Turner v. United States, 473 F. Supp. 317 (D.D.C. 1979)).

n121 See id. at 325.

n122 An apartment building, for example, is fairly self-contained. A commercial premises, like the World Trade Center, can extend over a city block (parking garages, walkways, plazas, etc.). Theoretically, the landlord's protective liability should diminish as does his control--varying with proximity, although it is not clear where it should end. See Selvin, supra note 37, at 330; Sharp, supra note 23, at 14 n.3.

n123 See Selvin, supra note 37, at 328.

n124 See id. at 324.

n125 See Gibson & Klayman, supra note 43, at 27. This consideration may not translate well to the terrorism context because of the often sophisticated and extensive security and structural measures required. For example, in the World Trade Center case, Dean Witter, certainly a sophisticated tenant, claims to have relied on the Port Authority's representations. See supra notes 57-59 and accompanying text.

REV_00261442

n126 This rationale does not necessarily imply the same result if only one tenant occupies the leasehold, since then the tenant would be best able to provide protection. See Comment, Torts--Landlord-Tenant Relations--Landlord has Duty to Take Reasonable Precautions to Protect his Tenants Against Criminal Acts of Third Parties--Kline v. 1500 Massachusetts Ave. Apartment Corp., 45 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 943, 951 n.53 (1970) [hereinafter Landlord-Tenant Relations].

n127 A final difference between commercial and residential tenancies is that a business expects customers and has employees. It has been assumed here that invitees, employees of tenants, and tenants are treated in the same manner (i.e., entitled to the same protection). Indeed this seems to be the case in most jurisdictions. See Doyle v. Exxon, 592 F.2d 44 (2d Cir. 1979) (finding duty to protect employee of tenant); Ann M. v. Pacific Plaza Shopping Ctr., 863 P.2d 207, 212-13 (Cal. 1993) (stating that because the commercial tenant generally is not a natural person and because it acts through its employees, "it cannot be seriously asserted that a tort duty that a landlord owes to protect the personal safety of its tenants should not extend to its tenant's employees"); Haines, supra note 34, Landlord-Tenant Relations, supra note 126, at 950; Selvin, supra note 37, at 325. But see Cornpropst v. Sloan, 528 S.W.2d 188 (Tenn. 1975) (denying plaintiff-shopper's complaint stressing both the absence of landlord-tenant relationship and that the case involved commercial vs. residential property).

Under this assumption, standards of liability would theoretically not be affected by the difference. A complete discussion of this issue is beyond the scope of this Note, therefore it is assumed for present purposes that invitees and employees of tenants are treated in the same manner as tenants wherever possible. However, employees of tenants will often be precluded from filing suit due to worker's compensation statutes. See supra note 24.

n128 See supra note 30 and accompanying text.

n129 While this is the case with many types of claims, it is particularly disturbing in the context of terrorism where preventive measures seem most effective when conducted based on a consistent national, if not international, scale. See infra notes 158-63 and accompanying text.

n130 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 761; supra notes 111-12.

n131 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 773.

n132 See id. at 707; supra note 113 and accompanying text.

n133 One additional issue beyond the scope of this paper is the treatment of government entities in their roles as landlords. As evidenced by the Oklahoma City bombing, government buildings may often be the target of terrorist attacks. While there may be certain filing or notification requirements specific to government landlords, it appears that there are tenable arguments that there should be no difference between suing government and private landlords, since the former are acting in a proprietary capacity. See Wise, supra note 24, at 1. See generally, Attorney General's Advocacy Institute, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Federal Tort Claims Act Litigation Seminar (1990); Irvin M. Gottlieb & Paul H. Gantt, Uncle Sam as a Landlord under the Federal Tort Claims Act (1967).

n134 For example, in other areas of the law, the success of a claim often depends, at least in part, on who gets to define it; that is, whether an act results in the violation of a federal statute (as defined in federal court) or in a breach of contract (as defined in state court).

REV_00261443

n135 Cases brought as a result of terrorist bombings on airlines, such as the Pan Am incident over Lockerbie, involve very different legal theories than those at issue here since the standard for liability is outlined statutorily under the Warsaw Convention. See, e.g., In re Air Disaster at Lockerbie Scotland on December 21, 1988, 37 F.3d 804 (2d Cir. 1994). Other United States cases have involved acts that could be defined as terrorism, but do not raise the same issues as the types of acts involving domestic landowners as contemplated here. See Tel-Oren v. Libyan Arab Republic, 726 F.2d 774 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (relatives of Israelis killed in a PLO attack brought suit under the Alien Tort Claims Act); New Market Investment Corp. v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 774 F. Supp. 909 (E.D. Pa. 1991) (Chilean grapes laced with cyanide seized at customs). More random acts of retribution not involving political overtones (e.g., acts committed by disgruntled employees and sociopathic individuals) are also not addressed here. See, e.g., Douglas Waller & Tom Morganthau, Caught by Surprise, Newsweek, Mar. 8, 1993 at 28 (quoting Jerry Bremer, the State Department's top counterterrorism official in the 1980s who commented after the World Trade Center bombing, "We shouldn't automatically assume this is the beginning of a new world war. . . . It's entirely plausible that this is some disgruntled employee who's been fired."); cf. Vrndavan v. Malcolm, No. 64839, 1994 WL 86225 (Ohio Ct. App. March 17, 1994) (involving a lone gunman entering Cleveland public library at noon and randomly shooting three people). Finally, a number of domestic cases use the term "terrorism" or "terroristic" but really involve more ordinary, random criminal activity, such as "terroristic threatening," which is a misdemeanor in some states. See, e.g., Parker v. Norris, 859 F. Supp. 1203 (E.D. Ark. 1994).

n136 Porras, supra note 6, at 125. See also Captain Bruce T. Smith, Assertion of Adjudicatory Jurisdiction by United States Courts Over International Terrorism Cases, Army Law., Oct. 1991, at 15 (noting that each state has advanced a different definition of the term; in effect, "one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter"). The term terrorism has therefore been held to be "Humpty Dumpty," or anything we want it to be. See Porras, supra note 6, at 124; see also, R. Thackrah, Terrorism: A Definitional Problem, in Contemporary Research on Terrorism 24 (Paul Wilkenson & Alasdair M. Stewart eds., 1987). A federal statute currently defines terrorism as "premeditated, politically motivated violence perpetrated against noncombatant targets by subnational groups or clandestine agents," usually intended to influence an audience. 22 U.S.C. section 2656f(d)(2) (1994) (prescribing annual country reports on terrorism by the Secretary of State). The United States Department of Defense calls it "the unlawful use or threatened use of force or violence against individuals or property, with the intention of coercing or intimidating governments or societies, often for political or ideological purposes." Smith, supra, at 15.

n137 See Porras, supra note 6, at 144.

n138 See Waller & Morganthau, supra note 135, at 28 (contending that the reason for the change are intelligence agencies' increased abilities to monitor terrorist activities).

n139 See infra notes 152-54 and accompanying text.

n140 See Ayaz R. Shaikh, A Theoretic Approach to Transnational Terrorism, 80 Geo. L.J. 2133, 2174 n.15 (1992).

n141 And further, they should affect who we want to have define (courts vs. legislatures) the behavior that constitutes terrorism. A case-by-case development of a definition in the courts would seem destined to perpetuate the unpredictability and inequity currently associated with foreseeability.

n142 See supra note 15 and accompanying text.

REV_00261444

n143 Greenberger, supra note 8, at A1.

n144 "If you want to counter terrorism, 80 percent is a matter of getting good intelligence. . . . You can fiddle around with the other 20 percent all you want, but in terms of prevention, intelligence is the key." Masland et al., supra note 7, at 56-57 (quoting L. Paul Bremer, who headed President Reagan's counterterrorism office).

n145 See Shaikh, supra note 140, at 2134.

n146 Mark A. Hofmann, Perils an Impossible Task, Bus. Ins., June 12, 1995, at 3.

n147 "The critical thing is to keep the weapons as far from the building as possible, by imposing some setbacks." Id. (quoting Eve Hinman, security analyst with Failure Analysis Associates). Examples of setbacks include pop-up bollards, such as pipes filled with concrete that can be recessed to street level and raised when needed to restrict vehicular traffic. See id.

n148 "In a bomb attack, generally speaking, the primary sources of both property damage and bodily injury is flying glass." Id. (quoting Ron Massa, president of Loron Corp., a high-tech security consultant, who also noted that a 1993 Irish Republican Army bombing in London showered the surrounding area with 700 tons of shattered glass). After the Oklahoma City bombing, more than 400 buildings in the area had glass broken and about 75% of the people injured were hurt by flying glass. See Hofmann, supra note 146, 148, at 3; see also Leslie Scism & Joe Davidson, Insurance Losses in Oklahoma Bombing Seen Topping Several Hundred Million, Wall St. J. May 4, 1995, at A4. Preventive measures include installing laminated glass, like that used in cars. Hofmann, supra note 146, at 3.

n149 Bombs, for example, produce enormous vertical thrust capable of "peeling roofs right off like a sardine can," requiring that they essentially be tied down. Hofmann, supra note 146, at 3. As opposed to retro-fitting buildings for restricting access, structural hardening is much more difficult, is costly, and is of questionable effectiveness. The Oklahoma City bombing made us all familiar with the structural concerns present in trying to protect against a bomb blast. See id.

n150 See id. For example, security bars on windows can hamper a tenant's escape from a burning building.

n151 "I think the answer has to be in the prevention area as opposed to protection." Id. (quoting Fred Deacon, highly respected risk engineering manager for Kemper Insurance).

n152 Christopher Dickey, Car Bombs: A Potent Weapon of Fear, Newsweek, Mar. 8, 1993, at 29.

n153 See Waller & Morganthau, supra note 135, at 28.

n154 Dickey, supra note 152, at 29; see also Sunday Today, (NBC television broadcast, Jan. 7, 1996) (interviewing Brian Jenkins, a terrorism expert who noted a trend discernible in the 1990's toward the increasing incidence of large-scale indiscriminate violence exemplified by car bombs).

n155 See James Adams & Maurice Chittenden, 18-Minute Countdown To Carnage, Sunday Times (London), July 28, 1996, section 1, at 2.

n156 See id.

n157 Shaikh, supra note 140, at 2141-42. In 1990, for example, "hard" targets (military, government, and diplomatic) accounted for 25% of attacks, businesses and other targets accounted for 75%. See id. at 2142 n.42 (citing United States Department of State, Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1990 37 (1991).

REV_00261445

n158 Howard M. Shapiro, The FBI in the 21st Century, Address at the Cornell Law School (Oct. 18, 1994), in 28 Cornell Int'l. L.J. 219, 223 (1995); see also James Q. Wilson, The Case for Greater Vigilance, Time, May 1, 1995, at 73 ("Terrorist groups . . . are best attacked by infiltration. This means either planting an undercover agent in their midst or recruiting one of their members as an informant. This is the job of the FBI.").

n159 See Shapiro, supra note 158, at 223.

n160 See id.

n161 See Wilson, supra note 158, at 73.

n162 Greenberger, supra note 8, at A1.

n163 See, e.g., Shaikh, supra note 140, at 2134.

n164 See James Rainey, Threats of Terrorism: When to Tell the Public, L.A. Times, July 4, 1995, at 1, available in 1995 WL 2062176.

n165 See id.

n166 See id.

n167 See supra notes 76-81 and accompanying text. For example, while the United States Department of Transportation is now required to assess the safety of foreign airports and issue warnings when they do not meet safety standards, airlines themselves decide what, if anything, to tell passengers about known threats. Many airline officials feel compelled to disclose threats because of litigation following the Pan Am Lockerbie incident, where juries awarded almost $ 40 million to plaintiffs for Pan Am's failure to take proper precautions. A terrorist bomb downed Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland in 1988. Travelers on the flight were not informed that terrorists had threatened several flights, like Flight 103, that had originated in Frankfurt, Germany.

n168 See Rainey, supra note 164, at 1.

n169 See id.

n170 See Pacelle, supra note 3, at B1. One New York insurance lawyer notes that "insurance companies do not pay any large losses without a fight. I call it insurance nullification by litigation." Id.

n171 Id. (quoting Phoenix Assurance lawyer Blair Fensterstock).

n172 See, e.g., Wise, supra note 2, at 1 (noting that one firm represents 20 insurance companies seeking to recover over $ 75 million in claims).

n173 For damage attributable to a terrorist attack, any number of policies might apply. Direct physical damage to insured property as a result of fire, smoke, or vibrations is generally covered by a property policy. Indirect losses resulting from a tenant's loss of use of their property may be covered by either a property or business interruption policy. General liability policies should cover tenants for damages they may incur because of damage to a third party (e.g., if a customer's business is interrupted because of the terrorist act). See Rhonda D. Orin, Insurance May Provide Glimmer of Light for Darkened World Trade Center Businesses, N.Y. L.J., Mar. 10, 1993, at 1.

REV_00261446

n174 Using the World Trade Center bombing as an example, indirect losses alone can often be significant. New York City officials have estimated that companies and government agencies could lose $ 692 million if the World Trade Center was closed for a week. See id.

n175 Id. at 7.

n176 Id. at 6.

n177 See id.

n178 See Orin, supra note 173, at 1. The court, in Pan American World Airways v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 505 F.2d 989 (2d Cir. 1974), relied on the fact that Pan Am was covered by an "all risk" policy, where all risks not excluded are automatically included.

n179 See Orin, supra note 173, at 1 (citing Emons Indus. Inc. v. Liberty Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 545 F. Supp. 185, 189 (S.D.N.Y. 1982) ("New York law places the burden of proof upon the insurance company to show any exclusions.")).

n180 Hartford said that there should be no problem with coverage because under its policies the exclusion only applies if war has been declared. Aetna argued that it was too soon to say how the exclusion would be applied. See Wise, supra note 24, at 1. The spokesperson for Hartford said that standard clauses (in this case coverage exclusions for damage attributable to "insurrection and acts of war") are recommended to the industry by the Insurance Services Office, a trade organization, and that each company has its own interpretation of such language. Id.

n181 See William B. Bice, Comment, British Government Reinsurance and Acts of Terrorism: The Problems of Pool Re, 15 U. Pa. J. Int'l. Bus. L. 441, 448 n.39 (1994) (stating that the World Trade Center provides an ideal example of a no-exclusion policy). Should incidences of domestic terrorism continue, it may not be long until domestic insurers covering U.S. commercial risks attempt to use terrorism exclusions as well.

n182 See supra note 173 and accompanying text.

n183 See Today's News Update, N.Y. L.J., Aug. 2, 1994, at 1. The World Trade Center cases were consolidated on June 4, 1994 upon a motion of the Port Authority which argued that (1) the claims all involved Port Authority's liability; (2) the salient facts involved (place, date, time) were the same in every case; (3) the fact that there were some issues of law and fact that were not common should not defeat the motion to consolidate since there was at least one important issue of law/substantial fact in common; and (4) consolidation would avoid unnecessary duplication of trials, save unnecessary costs and expense, and prevent injustice resulting from divergent decisions based on the same facts. See Green & Tripathi, supra note 1, at 48-49.

n184 As Justice Sklar noted in the course of the first conference of the World Trade Center litigation, "We have to have coordination to avoid wasting your time and my time, . . . failure to organize . . . would be anti-ecological. . . ." Wise, supra note 2, at 1.

n185 Courts have avoided the use of class actions for "mass accidents," perhaps largely because of differences between plaintiffs' injuries or damages. See Jenkins v. Raymark Indus., Inc., 782 F.2d 468, 473 (5th Cir. 1986) (allowing certification of a class action for asbestos claims).

n186 In the World Trade Center litigation, of the roughly 114 lawyers representing the 661 claimants, only four objected to the creation of the committee, and they will manage their cases separately. See Today's News Update, supra note 183, at 1. The lawyer leading the committee, Blair Fensterstock, represents Phoenix Assurance Co., one of the insurance companies attempting to subrogate claims related to the blast. See Wise, supra note 2, at 1, 5; see also supra note 9 (discussing the types of claims filed). In making recommendations for the committee, Fensterstock acknowledged that it is not always easy to please the variety of plaintiffs. For example, some lawyers with personal injury claims are concerned that their clients' interests might get lost if the committee is dominated by lawyers representing commercial clients. See Wise, supra note 2, at 5.

n187 See supra note 7.

n188 Fed. R. Evid. 407. New York state courts do not follow the Federal Rules of Evidence, but they do follow a common law rule which holds that evidence of subsequent remedial measures is not admissible at trial to prove the negligence or culpable conduct of a defendant. See Particia A. Brass, Federal Rule of Evidence 407: Should It Apply to Products Liability, 11 Touro L. Rev. 253, 280 (1994).

n189 Fed. R. Evid. 407.

n190 See Matter of World Trade Center Bombing Cases, N.Y. L.J., Apr. 14, 1995, at 26.

n191 Id. "The public interest privilege applies to 'confidential communications between public officers, and to public officers, in the performance of their duties, where the public interest requires that such confidential communications or their sources should not be divulged.'" Id. (quoting Cirale v. 80 Pine St. Corp., 316 N.E.2d 301, 303 (N.Y. 1974)). While perhaps limited to quasi-governmental agencies like the Port Authority, many of the policy arguments presented by the public interest privilege issue are likely to be raised in admissibility questions generally. For example, in arguing against discovery of the documents on this basis, the Port Authority emphasized that in preparing the reports, employees consulted with the "FBI, CIA, the National Security Agency, the Department of Defense, Scotland Yard, and intelligence and counterintelligence agencies of Israel, France, Switzerland, and Italy," and claimed that revealing the contents of the report would discourage such cooperation in the future. Matter of World Trade Center Bombing Cases, supra note 190, at 26. Further, the Port Authority argued that the documents should not be revealed because they contained information which could adversely affect security if used by a "person intending to engage in activity injurious to persons and property at the World Trade Center. . . ." Id. Finally, the Port Authority argued that the plaintiffs would not be foreclosed from establishing that their injuries resulted from Port Authority's lack of due care since they could go to other sources (e.g., expert testimony) to establish negligence. See id. at 27.

The plaintiffs responded that the public interest privilege should be construed narrowly because: (1) the public interest privilege would not apply to a private landlord in this instance, a fortiori it should not be applied here; and (2) the Port Authority failed to show how revealing the security reports would inhibit communication. See id. at 26. They also alleged that the public interest would be better served if the documents were disclosed because the revelation of the Port Authority's vulnerabilities would force it to take remedial measures, and that even if privilege applies, all of the Port Authority's concerns could be met via use of a confidentiality order. See id. at 26-27.

The judge ordered an in camera review of the documentation in order to determine whether it should be privileged. See Matter of World Trade Center Bombing Cases, supra note 190, at 27. He is expected to decide which security reports the plaintiffs may receive in September, 1996. See Feiden, supra note 59, at 36.

n192 Pacelle, supra note 3, at B10.

n193 Id.

REV_00261448

n194 See Wise, supra note 2, at 5. This may raise an interesting agency question: when could a landlord be considered to have constructive knowledge of the risks? However, this question is beyond the scope of this Note. In this case, since the reports were apparently prepared for the Port Authority's executive director, it seems clear that the Port Authority would be considered to have constructive knowledge.

n195 See Matter of the World Trade Center Cases, supra note 190, at 26. Also, as discussed above, Dean Witter alleges that the Port Authority misrepresented security in lease negotiations, so that evidence of the Port Authority's knowledge is necessary in proving its claims of fraud. See id.

n196 See id. at 27.

n197 Id.

n198 Id. The judge cited Nallan v. Helmsley-Spear, Inc., 407 N.E.2d 451, 458 n.8 (N.Y. 1980), for the proposition that the jury may take into account the cost of the safety measures in determining the reasonableness of the safety measures. See id.

n199 See id.

n200 See supra notes 142-63 and accompanying text.

n201 See Gary T. Schwartz, Reality in the Economic Analysis of Tort Law: Does Tort Law Really Deter?, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 377, 416 (1994).

n202 See id.

n203 See id. at 444.

n204 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 773.

n205 See id.; see also Kaufman, supra note 15, at 109 n.24 ("The police function is highly specialized, involving skills and training which the government alone can provide. There is no room for the private devices of frontier days."); infra notes 211-224 and accompanying text (discussing potential violations of tenants' rights that could result). But see Fred C. Zacharias, The Politics of Torts, 95 Yale L.J. 698, 709 n.70 (1986) (arguing that "there is little danger that imposing liability will cause [security officers] to become vigilantes or 'officious intermeddlers' into private affairs").

n206 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 785.

n207 See id. In the context of terrorism, private security firms have initiated specialization in "crises response" services to respond to "acts of violence . . . directed at a company, governmental agency or individuals. . . ." Wackenhut Corporation Crisis Response Services Brochure (on file with author).

n208 See Kaufman, supra note 15, at 112 n.106 (quoting President's Commission on Law Enforcement, Report: The Challenge of Crime in A Free Society 35, 289 (1967)); Zacharias, supra note 205, at 709 ("The government's general responsibility for law enforcement does not eliminate the business's separate duty to supplement public compensation and public protection.").

n209 See supra notes 49-54 and accompanying text.

n210 This passage is based loosely on the "two restaurants" example in Adler, supra note

REV_00261449

Only within the last twenty-five years have landlords been held liable to their tenants for criminal acts of third parties. [32] Another cause of the unsettled nature of this doctrine may be some of the competing policy considerations evident throughout its uneven evolution, appearing first in the seminal case, Kline v. 1500 Massachusetts Avenue Apartment Corp. [33]

The Kline court imposed a duty on residential landlords to take reasonable steps to protect tenants from foreseeable criminal acts. This case is generally said to mark the initial departure from the traditional view that landlords had no duty to protect tenants. The court achieved this by extending the traditional landlord duty to maintain common areas in a reasonably safe condition beyond prevention from physical defects to protection from criminal acts. [34] This was done by: (1) applying the warranty of habitability [*164] to defects in security, and (2) by recognizing a special relationship between landlord and tenant; [35] both of which are critical theories of recovery in many jurisdictions today. While Kline provided an important remedy to victims of crime, it was also the harbinger of some of the uncertainty that continues to mark this area of the law. In defining the standard of landlord liability, for example, the Kline court equivocally remarked that the "landlord is no insurer of his tenants' safety, but he certainly is no bystander." [36] This rather tentative assertion apparently reflects the tension the court recognized in trying to fashion an efficient yet equitable result. [37] Further, Kline gives little guidance about what security measures are required of landlords once duty is established. [38] Subsequent cases have read Kline both narrowly and broadly; depending on jurisdiction and setting. [39] Answers to the two questions raised in Kline, namely the appropriate standard for establishing duty given efficiency and equity concerns, and the definition of appropriate responses to any duty imposed, will no doubt continue to occupy courts when the crime in question is terrorism.

2. Current Theories of Recovery

Depending on the jurisdiction and court, [40] any number of theories of landowner liability may be available for victims of terrorism. Current theories may be aggregated into five principal groups: (1) strict liability; (2) duty to maintain safe common areas; (3) voluntary assumption of duty to protect; (4) contract; and (5) negligence. An examination of the differing theories available is important in order to determine which of them will prove most [*165] successful for victims of terrorism. Outcomes for victims of more typical crimes vary primarily because their theories of liability use different definitions of foreseeability and require different landlord behavior. Further, different theories emphasize certain underlying policy concerns, which could have implications for how complaints alleging landlord liability for terrorist acts will be received by courts. Finally, although landlord liability for criminal acts first arose in a residential context, this Note focuses on commercial landlord liability since terrorist acts are most likely to involve that type of leasehold. While the appropriateness of the application is examined at the conclusion of this section, [41] commentators feel that most jurisdictions have generally "made no explicit distinction between commercial and residential landlords" in holding landlords liable for the criminal acts of third parties. [42] Therefore, this discussion initially assumes a commercial setting. [43]

a. Safe Common Areas

The duty to maintain common areas in a safe condition is perhaps the most traditional of all the theories of recovery. As the court in Kline noted, this duty applies the same rationale as the longstanding duty of landlords to protect tenants from unsafe physical defects. [44] To sustain this claim, a tenant must show both that [*166] the landlord had control of the area and knowledge of the defective condition, and that the defects foreseeably enhanced the risk of criminal activity. [45] Accessibility defects (e.g. defective locks) seem to trigger liability most often under this theory. [46] Perhaps because of its traditional nature, this approach has gained wide acceptance, even in jurisdictions reluctant to recognize landlord liability. [47] This theory of liability may have important ramifications for holding landlords liable for acts of terrorism due to its focus on the landlord's exclusive control of common areas. For example, in Kline, the court noted that the landlord is in an even better position than the police to take

REV_00261414

50, at 884.

n211 Glesner, supra note 29, at 762.

n212 224 N.W.2d 843 (Mich. 1975); see also supra notes 70-72 and accompanying text (discussing the "special relationship" theory of liability).

n213 See Haines, supra note 34, at 344 (noting that "the majority opinion gives little guidance on this problem").

n214 See Samson, 224 N.W.2d at 849 (stating that "if the risk of death or serious bodily injury to a number of persons, the law requires that some care be exercised even though the probability is slight that the incident will occur").

n215 Haines, supra note 34, at 345.

n216 Collins v. AAA Homebuilders, 333 S.E.2d 792, 793 (W. Va. 1985).

n217 N.Y. Judge's Decision Turns Tenants Into Victims, Newsday, Nov. 1, 1995, at A28. (citing Long Island Gynecological Services, P.C. v. 1103 Stewart Ave. Associates Ltd. Partnership, No. 4890-95, 1995 WL 686571 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. Oct. 16, 1995), rev'd, 638 N.Y.S.2d 959 (N.Y. App. Div. 1996)). The Appellate Division has now enjoined the landlord from evicting the clinic pending the outcome of the appeal to the Court of Appeals. See Today's News Update, N.Y. L.J., Dec. 15, 1995, at 115.

n218 John T. McQuiston, Justice in Nassau Says Landlord May Evict Abortion Clinic, N.Y. Times, Oct. 31, 1995, at B1, B4. The landlord first told the clinic in January that they could no longer perform abortions, but then, after consulting with his attorney, revised the regulations to prohibit "tenants from 'engaging in any activity which, in and of itself, jeopardizes the safety or property of other tenants.'" Id.

n219 McQuiston, supra note 218, at B1; see also Peterson, Abortion Clinic Can Get Boot, Sez Judge, Daily News, Oct. 31, 1995, at 21 (noting that protesters also often aggressively confronted patients and staff, and sometimes other tenants of the building by mistake); New York: Judge Allows Abortion Clinic Eviction, in Abortion Report, Oct. 31, 1995, at 1 [hereinafter Abortion Report].

n220 See Peterson, supra note 219, at 21.

n221 Id.

n222 Abortion Report, supra note 219, at 1.

n223 McQuiston, supra note 218, at B1, B4.

n224 Id.

n225 See Sharp, supra note 23, at 51 (arguing that in the private context the "free market is better at allocating security resources").

n226 See Glesner, supra note 29, at 773; Haines, supra note 34, at 351 (both discussing this principle as applied to criminal acts). Also, short of leaving the real estate market, many landlords are likely to "overprotect" since it is difficult to set clear guidelines for liability given current negligence standards. This is an inefficient use of resources as the amount spent on protection (and passed on to consumers) will not reduce enough accidents to justify its costs. See supra notes 111-12 and accompanying text.

n227 Of course, landlords who have attempted to delegate security duties to an outside firm are attempting to shift risk as well, but will likely be less successful. See supra notes 26-27 and accompanying text.

n228 See Haines, supra note 34, at 346.

n229 See William K. Jones, Private Revision of Public Standards: Exculpatory Agreements in Leases, 63 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 717, 727-28 (1988).

n230 "Courts have distinguished between residential and commercial leases, ruling that exculpatory clauses in most residential leases will be voided as against public policy." Daniel G. Hise, Landlord and Tenant--Exculpatory Clause in Lease Void as Against Public Policy--Cappaert v. Junker, 413 So. 2d 378 (Miss. 1982), 3 Miss. C. L. Rev. 253, 258 (1983). But see College Mobile Home Park and Sales, Inc. v. Hoffman, 241 N.W.2d 174, 177 (Wis. 1976) (arguing that the categorical distinction between residential and commercial leases is "artificial and arbitrary" in this context).

n231 See Jones, supra 229, at 729 (discussing statutes in New York, Illinois, Massachusetts, Maryland, and Georgia).

n232 See Jones, supra note 229, at 730.

n233 See, e.g., Vermes v. American Dist. Telegraph Co., 251 N.W.2d 101 (Minn. 1977) (holding that failure to advise tenant of qualities of jewelry store that might be undesirable was "active" negligence that could not be relieved by broad exculpatory clause in lease).

n234 See Hise, supra note 230, at 256; Jones, supra note 229, at 728-32.

n235 See Jones, supra note 229, at 731.

n236 See id.; see also Haines, supra note 34, at 347-48 n.159; Hise, supra note 230, at 258.

n237 For example, the following analysis as to criminal acts was presented in Craig v. A.A.R. Realty Corp., 576 A.2d 688 (Del. Super. Ct. 1989):

Of all the involved parties, the cost of crime reduction is cheapest to the landowner. For the criminal, imposing civil liability on him in addition to existing criminal sanctions does not deter him from committing the crime. Imposing duty on the patron, so that he must protect and compensate himself, may result in crime reduction, but only at the expensive cost of the patron staying home. . . . While the patron holds just one expensive [to society] option, staying home, the landowner holds many options . . . [such as] installation of better lighting, fences, or guard service. . . .

Id. at 693. Concerning terrorism, the issuance of warnings may be an example of where costs are clearly lowest to the landowner.

n238 See Johnson, supra note 68, at 250. And in some cases, of course, it may be clear that the landlord acted irresponsibly. For example, it may be possible to set the negligence standard high enough (e.g., actual notice for duty) that a true fault-based liability standard is approximated.

n239 Under a "political effects model," a new rule imposes liability on a well-represented group, which is expected to activate legislative attention to the problem, so that in the long run, the legislature will provide a solution and make the determination of who should bear accident costs and how. See Zacharias, supra note 205, at 725. While Zacharias argues that his model would work in the context of landlord liability for criminal acts, he might reject the imposition of liability on landlords for acts of terrorism for the same reasons he rejects liability for hijacking airlines. See id. at 750.

n240 See generally Kaufman, supra note 15, at 103-08.

n241 "To effectively guide primary behavior . . . legal rules must inform people of liabilities that will be imposed for particular behavior. To do that they must be clear, they must refer to verifiable facts and they must not call for unachievable behavior." Adler, supra note 50, at 920.

n242 See supra notes 89-91 and accompanying text.

n243 See supra notes 17-23 and accompanying text.

n244 See supra note 67 and accompanying text.

n245 See, e.g., Haines, supra note 34, at 353-54 (arguing that courts may not provide the most appropriate forum for determining the type of protection to which tenants should be legally entitled, and that legislatures should act to place duty on landlords to use reasonable care, which should be specifically defined at a minimum level).

n246 And providing a consistent national benchmark for establishing duty.

n247 See Bice, supra note 181, at 463-64.

n248 All losses in Northern Ireland between 1968 and 1993 totaled Sterling695 million. See id. at 464.

n249 See id. at 447-48 (listing potential economic consequences of the lack of coverage for terrorism losses including: widespread business bankruptcies; bank lending bases secured by property becoming suspect; property developers becoming unable to secure financing; and pension funds becoming unable to rely on income from property investments). The British government was also pressured to step in by the Association of British Insurers, who argued that "terrorism is a political problem and that the government should therefore bear the losses." Id. at 448 n.36.

n250 Reinsurance is "the insurance by an insurer of the liability of another insurer arising under contracts of insurance which the latter has entered into"--practically meaning that "reinsurers insure direct insurers for a pre-determined part of their liability." Id. at 442-43.

n251 See id. at 441.

n252 The layers are (1) a primary layer of regular property coverage with a policyholder's direct insurer; (2) if that is exhausted, an additional layer of up to Sterling100,000, also with direct insurers; (3) and (4) two layers provided directly through Pool Re, if premiums paid to Pool Re are exhausted (third), member insurers in the pool contribute an additional 10% (fourth); and (5) if all these are exhausted, the British government is ultimately is liable for all excess losses. See generally Bice, supra note 181, at 449-54. Pool Re has approximately 115 insurance companies and 120 Lloyd's syndicates as members who "cede" premiums to the pool to reinsure risks of terrorism. See id. at 450.

n253 For example, "target risk" is determined by rate setting personnel based on whether and to what extent a particular property is at risk of terrorist attack. See id. at 452.

REV_00261452

n254 See id.

n255 See id. at 459, 461-62.

n256 Id. at 466. In general, OPIC offers programs to insure United States investments in developing countries against currency inconvertibility and expropriation, as well as political violence. Most forms of long-term investment (equity, debt, loan guarantees, and leases) may be insured.

n257 The choice between tort and contract law is perhaps philosophical. A contract view would suggest that tort law should act only when there is no possibility to contract (and even then the outcome should mirror what the parties would have done), while a tort view would suggest that tort law should control when society has decided that it (and not the parties themselves) should set the applicable standards. See Thomas C. Galligan Jr., Contortions Along the Boundary Between Contracts and Torts, 69 Tul. L. Rev. 457, 46162 (1994). Whatever the philosophical view, the landlord-tenant relationship is predicated, before all else, on a contract.

n258 "The fact that government and law enforcement authorities cannot prevent criminal attacks does not justify transferring such responsibility to business proprietors." Kaufman, supra note 15, at 109 n.90 (quoting Fager, Liability of Business Proprietors for Criminal Acts of Third Persons, 29 Fed'n Ins. Couns. Q. 29, 33 (1978)); see also Sharp, supra note 23, at 17.

n259 Kaufman, supra note 15, at 110.

n260 See Haines, supra note 34, at 323; see also supra note 63 and accompanying text.

n261 Exculpatory clauses will generally not preclude suits in tort by plaintiffs who are not parties to the lease. See supra note 235 and accompanying text. If actions for victims of domestic terrorism were restricted to those based on contract, the victim compensation legislation suggested here would be expected to provide exclusive recovery for those victims precluded from tort suits.

n262 See Jones, supra note 229, at 733.

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: ((insurance) /20 war or terrorism) and risk and property and life and (exclusion /20 (war or terrorism)) and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 2, 2001 - 9:58 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

preventive measures. "Municipal police cannot patrol the entryways and the hallways, the garages and the basements of private multiple unit . . . dwellings. They are neither equipped, manned, nor empowered to do so." [48] This type of emphasis on control and efficiency provides a powerful argument for using this theory to require landlords to provide at least minimal structural security measures against terrorist acts.

b. Voluntary Assumption of Duty

Another traditional theory of landlord liability involves a landowner's voluntarily assumed duty to provide security. Under this theory, if a landowner voluntarily assumes the performance of duties for security, he should be required to perform those duties carefully. [49] Even courts that have limited a landowner's duty to protect a tenant from the criminal acts of others absent any affirmative conduct on the part of the landowner would likely find a duty if the landlord provided some type of security in what proved to be a negligent manner. [50] In practice, these claims can arise as a [*167] result of the landlord's express or implied promise to provide security, including representations in lease terms, oral statements, and advertisements. [51] Many decisions based on this theory use an implicit balancing test to determine liability, considering the degree of reliance assumed by the injured tenant as well as the potential burden to the landlord. [52] Courts using this balancing test may have particular difficulty in applying it to terrorism since both the degree of reliance by the tenant and burden to the landowner in preventing the crime are generally very high. Some commentators note that because this theory provides no positive incentive to provide security it results in landlords being less inclined to offer increased security protection. [53] Choosing to provide no security is theoretically risky for landlords, however, because the definition of what constitutes a voluntary provision of security differs by jurisdiction. [54] What constitutes a provision (or further, a negligent provision) of antiterrorism security is likely to be even less clear than in the context of more traditional criminal acts, so that predicting liability will continue to be at least as difficult.

c. Contract

Claims brought under contract theories may rely on either express or implied warranties [55] to provide security. A recovery theory based on express warranties would suggest that a landlord has a duty to provide the type and amount of security advertised. [56] The World Trade Center litigation provides an example of [*168] how liability based on express contract provisions could be triggered in the context of terrorism. One large tenant, Dean Witter, claims that it raised concerns about safety when it negotiated its lease in 1984 and 1985, but that it was assured in writing that security provisions at the World Trade Center surpassed "'all other comparable building complexes within the city' and that the parking garage was secure." [57] Dean Witter claims that it never would have leased the space, for about one billion dollars over twenty years, if it knew that the Port Authority already had knowledge that the parking garage was vulnerable to terrorist attack. [58] Dean Witter is asking to rescind its lease and demanding more than $ 220 million in property and punitive damages. [59]

Contract claims are usually thought to be brought less frequently than tort claims, since damages for the former are generally very limited--compensating the injured party for property damage, but not providing for pain and suffering or punitive damages. [60] Since contract claims are very fact-specific, they tend not to be as susceptible to arguments based on broader notions of social policy as some of the other theories presented here. [61] This will likely be a disadvantage for tenant-victims of terrorism urging courts to extend liability beyond the "four corners" of the lease. Further, of course, the injured party must have a legally cognizable basis for recovery under the contract as a party in privity, or perhaps as a third-party beneficiary.

However, there are often clear advantages to contract claims for plaintiffs. In one case where the court held that a landlord did not have a duty to protect a tenant from the criminal act of a third party, a recovery based on an express contract provision for the value of property stolen was not precluded. [62] By imposing a contractual obligation to furnish security measures, courts may provide [*169] tenants with some means of correcting dangerous security problems before a tragedy occurs. [63] This aspect of contract claims may also have particular application for the prevention of terrorism to ensure that landowners provide bargained-for structural and procedural safeguards. Finally, especially in the commercial context, a landlord's liability may be modified by contractual provisions, such as exculpatory clauses, which generally result in a more efficient allocation of risk between the two parties. [64]

REV_00261415

d. Negligence

The clear majority of claims in this area are based on negligence theories. [65] In order to sustain a negligence claim, a plaintiff must show that the defendant's behavior created an unreasonable risk of harm by departing from a reasonable standard of care, and that such behavior was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's damages. [66] A review of the various negligence formulations courts use provides ample support for the contention that the law regarding landlord liability for the criminal acts of third parties is unsettled. In general, a landlord's duty to provide security in this context may be based on a special relationship, special circumstances, or statutory requirements. [67] Recurring questions raised by this type of liability that have particular applications to terrorism include: when a criminal act should be deemed to be foreseeable; when a third party's criminal act should be considered a superseding cause; and when a landlord's response should be deemed reasonable. [68] Failure [*170] to adequately resolve these questions suggests that under the current state of the law, landlords are largely unable to accurately predict either liability or the appropriate level of responsive security precautions. [69] These problems will only be exacerbated when negligence claims, based on landlords' failure to protect tenants from terrorism, are allowed.

i. Negligence Formulations

Courts first developed the negligence formulation that landlords had a duty to protect tenants from criminal acts of third parties based on their special relationship because of the changing circumstances of the modern residential tenant. The underlying basis for this per se duty seems to be the landlord's superior position to perceive and prevent risks of criminal conduct. [70] For ex- [*171] ample, in Samson v. Saginaw Professional Building, Inc., [71] the Michigan Supreme Court, in adopting the special relationship theory in a commercial context, held that "the existence of this relationship between the defendant landlord and its tenants and invitees placed a duty upon the landlord to protect them from unreasonable risk of physical harm." [72] Conversely, under the special circumstances formulation of negligence, foreseeability of a criminal attack serves to establish both duty and proximate cause. [73] For example, in Rowe v. State Bank of Lombard, [74] the court, allowing a claim for the tenant's employees in spite of a finding that the landlord-tenant relationship was not a special relationship, held that "when knowledge of foreseeable harm is combined with the landlord's sole ability to guard against it, without undue burden, the landlord has the duty." [75]

ii. Foreseeability--Definitions

The definition of foreseeability is often the determining factor in negligence claims, with more expansive definitions more likely to result in findings of duty. Three more major and two more minor definitions of foreseeability are commonly used. The most restrictive view of foreseeability requires that the landowner actually had notice of the risks involved. Foreseeability is generally proven under this definition by representations made by tenants or others, either notifying the landlord of past crimes as in Kline, [76] or that attacks are possible or likely as in Samson. [77] In a recent case, to prove that the defendant landlord had knowledge of existing risks, the plaintiff introduced evidence in the form of a letter from a commercial tenant advising the landlord of crimes on the premises and requesting that a security review be performed. [78] [*172] This type of subjective condition has significant drawbacks in that it may discourage landlords from looking for unsafe conditions and from being amenable to tenants' reports of unsafe conditions. [79] Such a foreseeability rule for terrorism would generally result in landowners avoiding liability for these reasons, although perhaps not in the World Trade Center case. [80] Most jurisdictions imposing a duty based on foreseeability now use some type of "knew or should have known" standard instead. [81]

REV_00261416

The prior similar incidents rule is a less restrictive, middleground definition which requires that a plaintiff produce evidence of prior similar criminal acts on the landowner's premises to establish foreseeability. [82] While widely used, especially in commercial settings, [83] the prior similar incidents rule also has several drawbacks. First, the landowner is effectively allowed one free assault before he can be held to have a duty. [84] Second, some commentators and courts have stated that the prior similar incidents rule leads to "arbitrary results and distinctions" since it is often unclear how close in time, near in location, or analogous in conduct the prior incidents must be. [85] If this standard were adopted in landowner liability for acts of terrorism cases, issues about where to draw the line for terrorist incidents (e.g., between a prior explosion and a bomb threat) would undoubtedly be at the forefront.

In perhaps the most famous denouncement of the prior similar incidents rule, the California Supreme Court, in 1985, abandoned it in Isaacs v. Huntington Memorial Hospital, [86] adopting instead the [*173] totality of the circumstances definition discussed below. However, in 1993, the California Supreme Court essentially re-adopted the prior similar incidents rule in Ann M. v. Pacific Plaza Shopping Center, [87] holding that a landowner is rarely, if ever, liable to a plaintiff absent evidence of prior similar crimes on the premises. [88] The return to the use of the prior similar incidents rule in California perhaps signals that the view of the landlord as "social insurer" has fallen out of favor. [89] If so, the curtailment of pro-victim approaches may have implications for how the application of landowner liability to acts of terrorism will be received by courts. In contrast, the rising rate of violent crime has often been held to be the primary influence in expanding the duty to protect. [90] Thus, it seems likely that judges will also feel pressure to interpret standards expansively in response to the increasing visibility of terrorism. How courts respond to these conflicting demands for either more restrictive or expansive liability in addressing landlord liability for acts of terrorism may depend on the alternatives to this type of liability presented. [91]

The totality of the circumstances approach mentioned above represents the high water mark of pro-victim landowner liability theories, requiring that courts analyze foreseeability in light of all the facts and on a case-by-case basis. [92] While some jurisdictions [*174] have applied it less frequently to commercial leaseholds, [93] the totality of the circumstances definition has been called the "touchstone" of foreseeability. [94] Factors that come in under the totality of the circumstances rule range from evidence of neighborhood crime (e.g., a computer printout of police records of reported crimes in the area), [95] to environmental criminology studies (including "physical structure of the building, lighting, traffic patterns, and social and ecological circumstances linked to the potential for a criminal event"). [96] By analogy, if studies about how terrorists choose targets are generally available, they could provide a basis for recovery under this formulation. [97] The extent of a landowner's role in determining foreseeability is unclear under this definition.

Two more minor definitions of foreseeability that have appeared occasionally in various jurisdictions are the "first line of defense" and "tempting target" theories. Under the former, even if foreseeability is rather low (e.g., no prior incidents), when a landlord's nonfeasance amounts to what would generally be considered gross negligence (e.g., no door locks), courts will usually find a duty. [98] While only a few courts have adopted the "tempting target" theory, a number of have acknowledged it as a factor in the determination on some other basis. [99] This theory proposes that some leaseholds are by their nature particularly attractive for crime: bars, concert halls, and casinos. [100] Both of these theories may have implications for the application of the landowner liability to terrorism in that the duty to simply warn of a terrorist threat would seem to be a good candidate for the "first line of defense rule," [101] and leaseholds with controversial clients (e.g., abortion clinics) might be seen as "tempting targets" for terrorists. [102] [*175]

iii. Foreseeability--Problems

Whatever its definition, determining foreseeability will likely be critical in predicting landowner liability in cases involving terrorist acts. When foreseeability is used both to establish duty and causation, it becomes a "murky crystal ball." [103] If foreseeability is used as a method of establishing liability in claims involving terrorism, courts must find a way to cure the problems of inefficiency and inequity it now generates. One such problem is that foreseeability is susceptible to judges' and juries' subjective beliefs. In the tort context, it seems that foreseeability should be related to fault. When applied to criminal acts, however, its boundaries often seem defined by courts' concerns about public policy. [104] For "new" causes of action, like landowner liability for terrorism, courts may be especially tempted to use policy considerations to define foreseeability. [105]

Similarly, judges and juries tend to focus on the severity of resulting harm when determining, with the benefit of hindsight, whether a criminal act was foreseeable. For example, a landowner's duty may be framed as to avoid creating unreasonable risks for his tenants. In assessing "reasonableness," the landowner should consider the severity of the harm, alternatives available to him, and the probability of harm. [106] While the severity of harm from terrorist acts is admittedly great, probability is very low for most leaseholds. Further, while the cost of safer alternatives may be generally low for ordinary criminal acts (e.g., safer locks, more lighting), the costs of preventing terrorism are generally significant. [107] This analysis would therefore suggest that fact finders [*176] must be especially reminded of the latter two components of the foreseeability/duty decision when determining liability for terrorist acts, since they will generally serve to temper the role that the severity of the harm should play.

Another of the problems with foreseeability in this context is whether it should be a question for the judge or jury. Because foreseeability is used in different ways by many courts, it is not clear whether courts have uniformly decided who should resolve the foreseeability issue. [108] What is clear is that if the question does go to the jury, the landlord will likely be the loser. Jury verdicts are likely to turn not so much on facts but on the jury's sense of right and wrong. [109] This puts landlords at an unfair disadvantage, creates confusion about what is required of them, and pressures them to settle. [110] Problems with juries deciding foreseeability will be greater in terrorism cases, as compared to ordinary criminal cases, since methods of determining foreseeability, as well as what constitutes a reasonable security response, are more likely to be beyond the common knowledge of the average juror.

Given this status quo, the chances for developing a clear definition of foreseeability for use in cases involving landowner liability for acts of terrorism are slim. When standards are unclear, some commentators believe that landlords will "overprotect." [111] The resulting "uncertainty zone" is wasteful to society because the amount spent on protection (and passed on to consumers) will not reduce enough violent acts to justify its costs, resulting in an inefficient use of resources. [112] Further, cases where summary judgment would have been proper instead go to the jury to determine foreseeability; resulting in judicial inefficiency. [113] Finally, a vague [*177] standard of duty works to the immediate economic disadvantage of the defendant, or landlord. [114] Therefore, should the negligence concept of landowner liability be applied to acts of terrorism, courts or legislatures must develop a more definitive standard of duty in order to ensure that these inefficiencies and inequities are not perpetuated.

3. Implications of a Commercial Setting

While the vast majority of the early cases imposing landlord liability for criminal acts involved residential buildings, acts of terrorism will probably target commercial leaseholds. Even though many commentators think that most jurisdictions have not distinguished between the two settings, [115] not all commentators or courts are of that opinion and many believe the application of the law should not be the same. [116] An analysis of the desirability of symmetry between the rules for residential and commercial leaseholds is important since any valid differences should affect the standards of duty adopted for terrorism.

REV_00261418

First, since landlord liability for security was developed largely in response to courts' objectives of improving the quality of affordable housing, [117] the initial purpose behind the imposition of liability is different. Second, commercial tenants are generally in a much better bargaining position than residential tenants; they are more likely to be able to negotiate for the levels of security protection they feel are adequate. [118] This seems due to the fact that commercial tenants generally possess more resources and the fact that [*178] the commercial market generally offers more alternatives than the residential market. [119] Third, a landlord's physical control over the premises in the commercial setting is much lower. [120] The need for public access, as well as a larger area to be protected, normally means that commercial buildings require more extensive security. [121] A further control-type distinction is the definition of the premises boundary line. For example, when are parking lots or the street in front of a leasehold within the area that a landlord should protect? [122] Fourth, security in a commercial setting generally has a different purpose than in a residential one. Banks and stores do not hire guards for the primary purpose of protecting customers; they are there to protect assets. [123] An important economic distinction between the two settings is that most commercial tenants carry insurance and can theoretically pass on the costs of their own security measures through increased prices. [124] Finally, commercial tenants are often in a better position than the landlord to assess the safety of the premises; defects in security may remain undiscovered by a landlord unaware of a commercial tenant's particular safety needs. Commercial tenants are more likely to make a thorough inspection of the premises to determine if it is suitable for its purposes, relying less on the representations of the landlord. [125] These considerations suggest that the duty to provide security in a commercial context should be lower than in a residential one. [126] [*179] While this analysis does not necessarily demonstrate that there should be no landlord liability if applied to acts of terrorism, it does suggest that standards of duty should not be as strict as those used in the residential context. [127]

D. Summary

The many different theories of recovery, formulations of negligence, and definitions of foreseeability available to plaintiffs make it difficult for landlords to both assess their liability for protecting tenants and develop an appropriate response to that liability. Since successful theories of recovery vary by jurisdiction and even by court, [128] if landlord liability for criminal acts were applied to acts of terrorism, outcomes for victims would differ based on the location of the terrorist's target. [129] This confusion has led some commentators to note that regardless of Kline's admonition that they are not insurers, landlords must in fact overprotect. [130] This overprotection results in economic inefficiency and may prompt some landlords to seek other investment opportunities altogether. [131] Furthermore, the number of different theories available and reluctance of courts to specifically define foreseeability decreases the chances of judicially resolving a case at an early stage. [132] While current [*180] victim compensation statutes appear inadequate, the alternative of landlord liability for criminal acts is subject to these significant drawbacks. Especially when viewed in the context of commercial leaseholds, current formulations of landlord liability will not provide the most efficient methods of victim compensation or increased prevention when the crime in question is terrorism.

II. Landowner Liability When the Crime is Terrorism

Holding landlords liable for acts of terrorism raises issues beyond those involved in landlord liability for more mundane criminal acts. Topics more specific to terrorism that may affect the determination of whether landlord liability is an appropriate legal response can be divided into six categories: (1) defining terrorism; (2) preventing terrorism; (3) warnings; (4) insurance; (5) mass torts; and (6) evidentiary issues. [133] Further, by imposing liability on

REV_00261419

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: ((insurance) /20 war or terrorism) and risk and property and life and (exclusion /20 (war or terrorism)) and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*15 Dick. J. Int'l L. 405, **

Copyright (c) 1997 Dickinson School of Law, Carlisle, PA
Dickinson Journal of International Law

Winter, 1997

15 Dick. J. Int'l L. 405

LENGTH: 21802 words

COMMENT: Keeping the Peace - British, Israeli, and Japanese Legislative Responses to Terrorism

Matthew H. James

SUMMARY:
... Even though terrorism is more commonplace in some regions than in others, all societies have become wary of its devastating impact. ... However, a particular definition will not shape a nation's terrorism counteraction policy as effectively as will its attitude toward terrorist violence. ... A nation will need to identify the factors that serve as catalysts for terrorist violence before it will be able to draft an effective terrorism counteraction policy. Although democratic states are frequently targeted for terrorist violence, the inherent strengths of such political systems make them insusceptible to many forms of terrorism. ... The Inspector General is further authorized to close any facility that serves a terrorist organization or its members. ... The Penal Law can also be applied to offenses committed in the course of a terrorist attack. ... The most striking Israeli legislation is that concerning assistance to victims of terrorism. ... Like Northern Ireland, Israel will not be able to enact legislation that will quell the enmity that has been the driving force behind terrorist violence in Israel. ... Advances in policy management, target security, and tactical responses have also curtailed the threat of terrorist activity. ...

TEXT:
[*405]

I. Introduction

In recent decades, the global community has been confronted with the phenomenon of terror as a means of protest. Even though terrorism is more commonplace in some regions than in others, all societies have become wary of its devastating impact. The threat posed by insurgents who seek to radically alter a nations' cultural, social, and political precepts has proven to be unpredictable, but efficient policy management can effectively safeguard potential targets and strengthen vulnerable weaknesses.

The United Kingdom, Israel, and Japan have each developed terrorism counteraction policies based upon legislation that specifically targets insurgent operations. While it is important that these initiatives be liberally construed in order to efficiently police terrorist behavior, it is equally important that these laws be narrowly tailored so as to protect individual liberties. Should these measures invade the sanctity of individual autonomy, terrorists will be better

REV_00261454

Palestinian groups, though a major threat, have recently been overshadowed by the emergence of militant Jewish fundamentalists who also seek to destroy the peace process. The assassination of Yitzak Rabin by a radical Jewish student has forced Israel to re-evaluate its policies on Jewish extremist groups. [153] However, even before Rabin's assassination, the extremist groups Kach [154] and Kahane Chai [155] were declared to be terrorist organizations after voicing support for a Kach affiliate who attacked an Islamic [*433] mosque. [156] Jewish extremists have proved to be a danger to a peaceful coexistence with Palestinians and have now been brought to the forefront of Israeli attention with Yitzak Rabin's assassination. [157]

B. Antiterrorist Legislation in Israel

The Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance, [158] which is only applicable to internationally-recognized Israeli borders, Jerusalem, [159] and the Golan Heights, [160] was the first antiterrorist legislation to be enacted by the state of Israel. [161] The Ordinance has no effect in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. [162] It does not define terrorism; rather, it describes a "terrorist organisation" as: "a body of persons resorting in its activities to acts of violence calculated to cause death or injury to a person or to threats of such acts of violence." [163] Supporting a terrorist organization is punishable by a maximum of three years imprisonment and a fine of one- [*434] thousand pounds, [164] membership in a terrorist organization is an offense warranting a maximum prison sentence of five years, [165] and activity in a terrorist organization is subjected to a maximum term of twenty years imprisonment. [166]

The Ordinance requires that the government post notice in the Official Gazette stating that a particular group has been designated a terrorist organization. [167] If no such notice has been posted, the government must prove that one or more of a group's members is responsible for acts or threats of violence on behalf of or by order of the organization, or that one or more of a group's members claimed responsibility for acts or threats of violence on behalf of or by order of the organization. [168] An organization's property may also be confiscated by order of a district court in response to a request by the Inspector General. [169] The Inspector General is [*435] further authorized to close any facility that serves a terrorist organization or its members. [170]

The Penal Law [171] can also be applied to offenses committed in the course of a terrorist attack. Because offenses against the person, such as causing death or endangering life and health, are not excused if the offense is committed in connection with a political or religious motive, the Penal Law is equally applicable to terrorist activity. [172] Capital punishment may not be requested for regular offenses, but military courts are given the option of imposing the death penalty. [173] There are also special provisions in the Penal Law addressing unlawful associations and assemblies that supplement the Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance. [174] Certain provisions also provide for extraterritorial jurisdiction over [*436] offenses against humanity, [175] offenses against the state, [176] and offenses causing injury to nationals or residents of Israel. [177]

Upon conquering the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in 1967, the Commander of the Israeli Defense Forces issued the Proclamation on Law and Administration, [178] which declared that the British Mandate Defence (Emergency) Regulations, 1945, [179] which had been maintained by previous occupiers, would remain in force. The Defence (Emergency) Regulations list various terrorist offenses that fall under the title of Unlawful Associations and warrant a fine and imprisonment of one to ten years. [180] Unlike the domestic laws of Israel, the Defence (Emergency) Regulations grant the military far-reaching powers, such as administrative [*437] detention, travel restrictions, expulsions, and the demolition of a residence known to belong to a terrorist. [181]

In addition to these principal laws, Israel has also enacted specific laws to aid in the state's plan of terrorism counteraction. The Explosives Law [182] forbids the manufacture, trade, and transport of explosives without a permit granted by an authorized government Minister. [183] The Extradition Law [184] provides for the extradition of an individual from Israel to another state except in cases where the substantive offense is political in character [185] or if the offender is an Israeli citizen. [186] Under the Law of Return [187] an immigrant may be denied a visa if the Minister of the Interior determines that the individual has engaged in an activity directed against the Jewish people, may endanger public health, public safety, or state security, [188] or has a criminal past and is [*438] likely to endanger public welfare. [189] Furthermore, deportation is only permissible with regard to an individual who is in Israel without a permit of residence. [190]

REV_00261463

The most striking Israeli legislation is that concerning assistance to victims of terrorism. Pensions will be granted to citizens who are injured by acts of terrorism within the state and abroad, [191] as is true of visa and permit holders who are injured by acts of terrorism within the state and areas controlled by the Israeli Defense Forces. [192] Israel will also provide victims of terrorism with funeral expenses, [193] medical expenses, [194] and subsidies for vocational education, health insurance, and guaranteed loans. [195]

C. Observations

Israel's experience with terrorism bears resemblance to that of the United Kingdom in that it has grown from centuries of religious and cultural turmoil. The Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement is a significant step toward ending disputes over geographic boundaries that have been the subject of numerous terrorist attacks, but the social strife inherent in the region will continue to plague any peace accord. Those who do press for further compromise will be not only challenged by radical terrorist organizations, but will also face resistance from militant civilians and communities that are ingrained with a hatred that will not diminish in their lifetimes. The Netanyahu administration is now facing these obstacles. Like Northern Ireland, Israel will not be able to enact legislation that will quell the enmity that has been the driving force behind [*439] terrorist violence in Israel. Unless Israelis and Palestinians can control their mutual animosity, current peace efforts will be in vain and terrorism will continue to afflict the region. The next century will be instrumental in healing ancient wounds that have compelled the terrorist violence of past decades.

V. Japan

Japan's antiterrorist policies have their foundation in statutory laws that date back to the late nineteenth century. However, it was sizable Communist-inspired demonstrations, many of which culminated in riotous disorders in the early 1950s, that brought the issue of terrorism before the legislature. [196] Unlike the United Kingdom and Israel, Japan has not experienced terrorism on an extensive scale. For this reason, Japan has adopted a practice of enacting antiterrorism legislation ex post facto. However, recent developments may compel Japan to enact initiatives that uniformly address the problem of terrorism.

A. Insurgent Organizations in Japan

The Japanese Red Army (JRA) [197] is comprised of a small number of former student activists who now operate in conjunction with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) in Lebanon's Bekaa Valley. [198] The group is believed to have [*440] between twenty and thirty hard-core members encamped in Lebanon and a financial support base of 100-150 in Japan. [199] Financial assistance is mainly provided by the PFLP, other Palestinian terrorist groups, and Libya. [200] The most infamous of the JRA's activities was the 1972 attack of Lod Airport in Israel, [201] and the takeover of the American embassy in Kuala Lumpur. [202] The group's activity subsided in 1977, but its members re-emerged in 1986 in connection with other Asian terrorist organizations. [203] However, group fragmentation, apathy, and police arrests have severely limited the organization's activities.

The Chukaku-Ha, [204] comprised of approximately 3500 members, a political party, and a covert action wing (the Kansai Revolutionary Army), [205] is the largest and most powerful of [*441] several ultra-leftist factions. [206] Funds derived from membership dues, sale of the Zenshin newspaper, and fundraising campaigns are channelled to support 200 core members who have no other source of income. [207] The Chukaku-Ha's attacks, usually conducted with crude rockets, incendiary devices, and flamethrowers, [208] are targeted at property damage rather than human casualties. [209]

REV_00261464

Within the past year, the Aum Shinrikyo (Cult of the Supreme Truth) has been designated as a "violence-prone organization." [210] The cult, comprised of 10,000 members in Japan [211] is most notorious for its gas attacks on the Tokyo subway system. [212] The cult has also been held responsible for other crimes, including murder, kidnappings, illegal weapons manufacture, torture, and child abuse. [213] The cult's guru, Asahara Shokou, along with 100 members, have since been arrested. [214] [*442]

B. Antiterrorism Legislation

The basic foundation for terrorism counteraction in Japan can be found within the Criminal Code of 1907. [215] Under the Code, crimes such as insurrection, homicide, assault, kidnapping, destruction of property, and rioting [216] can be prosecuted as acts of terrorism. [217] Furthermore, the Code's extraterritorial jurisdiction provisions, which were revised in 1987, [218] can also be used to bring acts of terrorism committed abroad within the jurisdiction of Japanese courts. [219] Although the Code is applicable to the basic common crimes inherent in terrorism, Japan has found it necessary to enact additional legislation to enhance its terrorism counteraction policy. [*443]

Following World War II, Japan enacted the Subversive Activities Prevention Law of 1952 [220] to control the activities of the Japanese Communist Party. [221] Even though suppression of the Communist Party was this law's original purpose, it can be utilized to suppress any terrorist organization. [222] Common crimes [223] normally addressed under the Criminal Code will be prosecuted under the Subversive Activities Prevention Law if committed with an objective of "the promotion or support of or opposition to any political doctrines or policy." [224] Additionally, the Subversive Activities Prevention Law will also be applied to treasonable offenses which the Criminal Code designates as subversive activities per se. [225] However, to be prosecuted under the Subversive Activities Prevention Law, a defendant must be affiliated with a subversive organization; otherwise he or she will face normal criminal proceedings under the Criminal Code. [226]

An organization's members who are convicted under the provisions of the Subversive Activities Prevention Law are subject to a maximum of seven years imprisonment or penal servitude. [227] The organization itself can be completely dissolved or be restricted [*444] from engaging in specific activities for a specified length of time. [228] The Public Security Investigation Agency may designate an organization as a danger and appropriate for surveillance and investigation, and may also request that the Public Security Commission dissolve the organization entirely. [229]

The Subversive Activities Prevention Law has not been without controversy. Arguments have been made, albeit unsuccessfully, that it infringes upon the constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech, [230] and critics have warned against possible infringement of the right to freedom of religion. [231] Demonstrators arrested during disturbances in the 1960s and 1970s were commonly tried under the riot provisions of the Criminal Code instead of the Subversive Activities Prevention Law. [232] The language of the Subversive Activities Prevention Law limits its application to situations in which there is a danger that the group will continue to repeat subversive activity in the future, and even then it will be applied "only within the minimum extent necessary to assure the [*445] public safety." [233] To many critics, it appears that the Subversive Activities Prevention Law has been largely ineffective. [234]

REV_00261465

Japan has further attempted to curtail the activities of subversive organizations, mainly the Japanese Mafia, through the enactment of the Law Preventing Illegal Activities by Members of Underground Organizations. [235] A group usually will be designated an underworld organization if its members have extensive criminal records. [236] This being the case, they will be banned from engaging in a number of specified activities. [237]

In the absence of an extradition treaty with a nation, [238] foreign terrorists can be extradited under the Law for the Extradition of Fugitive Criminals, [239] except in cases of a political nature. [240] In this respect, an immigrant who is determined by the Minister of Justice to be a danger to the public peace or national interest can be deported under the Immigration Control and Refugee Recognition Law. [241]

Japan has also countered the threat of terrorism by passing laws that restrict the use of explosives and nuclear materials. The [*446] Explosives Decree of 1884 [242] was revised in 1918 to supplement the Criminal Code with heavier penalties. [243] However, milder penalties have been instituted for the manufacture, sale, and import of explosives without permission under the Law Concerning the Control of Explosives and Similar Substances. [244] Japan enacted additional legislation to control explosives in 1972 with the Law for Punishment for the Use of Glass-Bottle Grenades [245] which makes the use, possession, or manufacture of gasoline bombs a criminal offense. [246] In 1988, Japan amended the Law for Control of Nuclear Source Material, Nuclear Fuel Material and Reactors [247] to ratify the Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material. [248]

Most recently, Japan passed the Law Concerning the Prevention of Bodily Harm Caused by Sarin Gas [249] in response to a [*447] number of terrorist attacks undertaken by Aum Shinrikyo. [250] The use of Sarin or other lethal chemicals warrants a maximum penalty of penal servitude for life [251] while production or possession carries a sentence of penal servitude of up to seven years. [252]

Furthermore, Japan has been active in subscribing to the resolutions of various international conventions. In recognition of the 1970 Convention for Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft [253] and the 1971 Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against Safety of Civil Aviation, [254] Japan enacted the Law Concerning Punishment for Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft and Similar Crimes [255] and the Law Concerning Punishment of Activities Endangering Aircraft. [256] Japan also has ratified the 1973 Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons, Including Diplomatic Agents [257] and the 1979 International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages [258] by enacting the Law Concerning Punishment for Hostage-Taking. [259]

C. Observations

As can be seen, Japan has enacted legislation to address specific terrorist threats rather than a uniform act to counter terrorism. Japan's current experiences with terrorist organizations [*448] can be addressed by either the Subversive Activities Prevention Law or the Criminal Code for prosecution. However, it appears that Japan will continue to enact specific legislation that directly addresses immediate threats, will subscribe to international conventions, and will rely upon the Criminal Code for enforcement of its antiterrorist policies. As long as such practices are effective in combatting future threats of terrorism, it would be unnecessary for Japan to expand in new directions.

VI. Conclusion

The antiterrorism legislation of the United Kingdom, Israel, and Japan has been seasoned by regional phenomena. In this respect, it is easy to dismiss each law as distinctively influenced.

REV_00261466

However, terrorist violence is an adhesive that will continue to bond each nation's current initiatives. The United Kingdom and Israel hold in common a territorial struggle seared by centuries of religious and cultural turmoil. Japan, though not troubled by the same degree of religious strife, has been the target of violent leftist political campaigns which have conceived a legislative response of similar effect. Each nation has criminalized the implements of terrorism through uniform and specific legislation. Furthermore, each nation has enacted legislation which prohibits the existence of the principle organizations responsible for terrorism. The efforts of all three nations are unique in framework, but analogous in essence.

The United Kingdom's quandary may only be resolved with independence for Northern Ireland. However, this is an unlikely option. Furthermore, independence will not ameliorate the religious schism in the population; the struggle will continue regardless of sovereignty. Negotiations between the British government and the IRA may curb the violence from a political perspective, but it will do little to improve relations between Catholics and Protestants. Therefore, the United Kingdom will have to look to the law to control further violence. However, legislation cannot extinguish the prejudices that continue to fuel the violence to which Northern Ireland has become accustomed. It is not only the terrorists who are instilled with animosity, but the population itself. Therefore, the PTA and the EPA will do little to solve the dilemma and continue to be criticized as meager means to an unattainable end. [*449]

The situation in Israel is comparable to that of the United Kingdom, but current political themes appear to be somewhat effective in pacifying the region's violent tendencies. What has now surfaced is a wave of violence aimed at corrupting the process of compromise. Like Northern Ireland, legislation will not be able to eradicate the abhorrence that is uniformly embraced by the opposing cultures occupying the region. As the Israeli military begins to withdraw from the Occupied Territories, the Gaza Strip and the West Bank will hopefully be able to relax the emergency measures that have been necessary to this day. However, the Jewish population that remains will still be militant, as will the Palestinians who both passively and actively support the Islamic campaign of terrorism. The Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance and the Defence (Emergency) Provisions mirror the British initiatives in form and substance. Although these laws have accomplished their basic purposes, it is naive to consider them solutions to the problem of terrorism. Each nation will continue to develop policies to supplement the tattered legislation that has valiantly attempted to prevent violent protest.

Unlike Northern Ireland and Israel, Japan enjoys an existence devoid of the everyday apprehension of impending violence. In this respect, it has been possible for Japan to rely upon its uniform Criminal Code to address terrorist infractions. The Subversive Activities Prevention Law has not been utilized to the same degree as the Criminal Code, and it is unlikely it will do so in the future. Japanese Leftist groups may very well pass from existence now that Communism's influence is dissipating from the global panorama. Furthermore, the Japanese Red Army has been effectively excluded from the country and is beginning to deteriorate as a major terrorist threat. Japan has been successful in controlling its national security with initiatives that criminalize behavior that sporadically erupts into violence. It is unlikely that Japan will ever have to undergo the legislative transformations attributable to Israel and the United Kingdom.

Terrorism will undoubtedly vex the international community as it progresses into the next century; however, the legislative initiatives of nations like the United Kingdom, Israel, and Japan have significantly contributed to a global condemnation of terrorism. Advances in policy management, target security, and tactical responses have also curtailed the threat of terrorist activity. A firm antiterrorist policy is in the best interest of most every [*450] nation, but its measures should create an environment hostile to terrorist behavior, not a system that hinders the daily operations of the general public. A nation's citizens should realize the extent of contemporary society's vulnerability and be willing to make concessions to successfully implement terrorism counteraction policies. However, incessant paranoia and initiatives that reach far beyond the relative threats posed by contemporary terrorists will only work against the status quo. If the global community does not observe this balance, society will be altered, and the terrorist will have triumphed.

REV_00261467

FOOTNOTES:

n1. Sean Anderson & Stephen Sloan, Historical Dictionary of Terrorism 1 (1995).

n2. U.S. government agencies employ their own definitions that essentially encompass the basic principles inherent in the American perspective on terrorism:

The unlawful use or threatened use of force or violence by a revolutionary organization against individuals or property with the intention of coercing or intimidating governments or societies, often for political or ideological purposes. (U.S. Department of Defense).

The unlawful use of force or violence against persons or property to intimidate or coerce a government, the civilian population, or any segment thereof, in furtherance of political or social objectives. (U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation).

Premeditated, politically motivated violence perpetrated against noncombatant targets by subnational groups or clandestine agents. (U.S. Department of State).

Violent criminal conduct apparently intended: (a) to intimidate or coerce a civilian population; (b) to influence the conduct of a government by intimidation or coercion; or (c) to affect the conduct of a government by assassination or kidnapping. (U.S. Department of Justice).

Louis Rene Beres, Note, The Meaning of Terrorism - Jurisprudential and Definitional Clarifications, 28 Vand. J. Transnat'l. 239, 240 (1995).

n3. Terrorism is defined as "the use of violence for political ends and includes any use of violence for the purpose of putting the public or any section of the public in fear." Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, 20(1) (Eng.).

n4. Such definitions are still rather simplistic when compared to those of scholars who seek definitions that encompass all the potential facets of the insurgent mentality. For example:

Terrorism is an anxiety-inspiring method of repeated violent action, employed by (semi-) clandestine individuals, group or state actors, for idiosyncratic, criminal or political reasons, whereby - in contrast to assassination - the direct targets of violence are not the main targets. The immediate human victims of violence are generally chosen randomly (targets of opportunity) or selectively (representative or symbolic targets) from a target population, and serve as message generators. Threat- and violence-based communication processes between terrorist (organisation), (imperiled) victims, and main targets are used to manipulate the main target (audience(s)), turning it into a target of terror, a target of demands, or a target of attention, depending on whether intimidation, coercion, or propaganda is primarily sought.

Alex P. Schmid, The Response Problem as a Definition Problem, in Western Responses to Terrorism 7, 8 (Alex P. Schmid & Ronald D. Crelinsten eds., 1993).

REV_00261468

n5. See Ramsey Kleff, Terrorism: The Trinity Perspective, in Terrorism & Political Violence: Limits and Possibilities of Legal Control 13, 13 (Henry H. Han ed., 1993).

n6. Benjamin Netanyahu, Defining Terrorism, in Terrorism: How the West Can Win 7, 8 (Benjamin Netanyahu ed., 1986).

n7. See Benzion Netanyahu, Terrorists and Freedom Fighters, in Terrorism: How the West Can Win 25, 27 (Benjamin Netanyahu ed., 1986).

n8. Id.

n9. See Netanyahu, supra note 6, at 9.

n10. See id.

n11. National Advisory Committee on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals, Report of the Task Force on Disorders and Terrorism 3 (1976), cited in Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 3.

n12. See Lawrence Freedman et. al., Terrorism and International Order 57 (1986).

n13. Id.

n14. See John M. Collins, Definitional Aspects, in Political Terrorism and Energy 1, 11-12 (Yonah Alexander & Charles K. Ebinger eds., 1982).

n15. Karl A. Seger, The Anti-Terrorism Handbook 4 (1990).

n16. Id. Such an example can be seen with the Japanese Red Army, a small Marxist organization that is now primarily supported and trained in the Middle East by the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine. See U.S. Dep't of State, Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1994 45 (1995) (hereinafter Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1994).

n17. Seger, supra note 15, at 5. It is often difficult to determine when certain activities of a state actually support a terrorist organization. See David E. Long, The Anatomy of Terrorism 107 (1990). Sometimes a state will provide financial support for a political party reputed to have its own terrorist factions. Id. An example would be Saudi Arabia's support for the PLO through the Al-Fatah which, although linked with terrorism, is the political wing of the PLO. Id. An inimical example would be Libya's support of the PLO through splinter groups that are exclusively committed to terrorist violence. Id.

n18. Seger, supra note 15, at 5. State supported training for terrorist groups does not always involve military-style camps or drills. Such training can often be technical in nature, such as surveillance, counterfeiting, forgery, communications, and recruitment techniques. See Long, supra note 17, at 108.

n19. A striking example of state-directed terrorism occurred in 1984, when Iran developed a special forces unit comprised of 2500 men, each willing to undertake suicide missions in order to spread Islamic fundamentalism throughout the Middle East and North Africa. Seger, supra note 15, at 5-6. According to former U.S. Secretary of State George P. Shultz, Syria, Libya, and North Korea have also been responsible for state-directed terrorism. See John B. Wolf, Antiterrorist Initiatives 24 (1989).

n20. It would be more expedient for a state to support, rather than directly operate a terrorist cell, in order to maintain a questionable distance from the terrorist act itself. See Long, supra note 17, at 106.

REV_00261469

n21. L. Paul Bremer III, The West's Counter-Terrorist Strategy, in Western Responses to Terrorism 255, 257 (Alex P. Schmid & Ronald D. Crelinsten eds., 1993).

n22. The late 1980s provide significant evidence that supports this assertion: the U.S. air strike on Libya in 1986 reduced the frequency of Libyan involvement in terrorist activities from 19 acts in 1986 to six in 1988; European Community-imposed sanctions against Syria led to the 1987 expulsion of Abu Nidal; the European Community simultaneously recalled its foreign ministers from Tehran and suspended all official high level exchanges with Iran after Ayatollah Khomeini's call for the execution of Salman Rushdie. See id. at 258.

n23. The Western European community has established the TREVI Group (Terrorism, Radicalism, Extremism, and Political Violence) which is comprised of each state's Ministers of Justice and Interior to regularly produce an agreed upon assessment of terrorist threats facing European Community nations by exchanging information on the movement and operating methods of particular groups. Id. at 260. Similarly, the International Police Organization (INTERPOL) now alerts member states of FBI arrest warrants for certain terrorists. Id.

n24. This practice needs to be adopted by the government as a whole and by individual entities in their respective capacities (military installations, defense contractors, municipal facilities, law enforcement, and the private sector). Seger, supra note 15, at 35. Examples can be seen in the universal screening of airline passengers with metal detectors, increased security at diplomatic facilities, "watch lists" of terrorists for border police, and covert tactical operations. Bremer, supra note 21, at 261.

n25. G. Davidson-Smith, Counterterrorism Contingency Planning and Incident Management, in Democratic Responses to International Terrorism 123, 125 (David A. Charters ed., 1991).

n26. Alex P. Schmid, Terrorism and Democracy, in Western Responses to Terrorism 14, 17 (Alex P. Schmid & Ronald D. Crelinstein, eds., 1993). These factors will not reduce terrorism if they fail to work properly. Id. Terrorist violence incensed in Northern Ireland and in Sri Lanka when free elections were stifled through the gerrymandering of election districts. Id. Unrestrained police brutality has also provided for a recourse to violence as exemplified by an unpunished police killing of a West Berlin demonstrator which gave rise to the German June 2nd movement of 1967. Id. Another contributing element occurs when the media cannot vent the grievances of the public, such as in the Basque country under the Franco Regime in Spain. Id.

n27. Id. at 18-19.

n28. Schmid, supra note 26, at 18-19.

n29. Id. at 15.

n30. Robert H. Kupperman & Darrell M. Trent, Terrorism: Threat, Reality, Response 13 (1979).

n31. Ninety-five percent of terrorist violence involves bombings, assassinations, armed assaults, kidnappings, hijackings, and hostage-taking, half of which are directed against American, French, Israeli, British, and Turkish targets. See Jeffrey Ian Ross, The Nature of Contemporary International Terrorism, in Democratic Responses to International Terrorism 17, 31-32 (David A. Charters ed., 1991).

n32. Seger, supra note 15, at 15. While a terrorist bombing that killed the governor of Idaho in 1905 took days to reach the world audience, a 1986 hijacking of a Karachi airliner was broadcast live on the morning news. Id.

REV_00261470

n33. Leonard Weinberg & William Eubank, Political Terrorism and Political Development, in Terrorism and Political Violence: Limits and Possibilities of Legal Control 29-30 (Henry H. Han ed., 1993).

n34. See Collins, supra note 14, at 12.

n35. See generally Clive Walker, The Prevention of Terrorism in British Law 267-72, (2d ed. 1992).

n36. In 1985, the press paid up to $ 12,500 for interviews with the Amal Militia during its hijacking of TWA 847. See James Adams, The Financing of Terror (1986), reprinted in Seger, supra note 15, at 15.

n37. See Schmid, supra note 26, at 18.

n38. See Seger, supra note 15, at 16.

n39. Modern transportation systems enabled members of the United Freedom Front to live in Ohio and travel to New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, and Massachusetts to rob banks, collect intelligence, and bomb targets. Id. These terrorists would leave on Monday morning and return undetected by Friday. Id. Members of the Brotherhood of Silence used vans and motor homes as safe houses and would travel U.S. interstate highways until a deadly confrontation with the authorities revealed a mobile arsenal of weapons, scanners, and tactical equipment. Id.

n40. In 1987 alone, the Dutch borders were crossed by 30,000 trains, 229,000 aircraft, and 232,000 ships. Volkskrant, July 12, 1988, at 1, cited in Schmid, supra note 26, at 14. Custom points were crossed by 114,000,000 people and almost 4000 weapons were confiscated. Id.

n41. Id. at 31.

n42. Id.

n43. Id.

n44. Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 16.

n45. Bard E. O'Neill cites to the following seven basic types of strategic ideologies that have been adopted by terrorist groups over the century: 1) Anarchists are the most dangerous because they believe that all institutionalized political systems are illegitimate and should be eliminated; 2) Egalitarians seek to radically transform the social structure through a redistribution of equality and often advocate authoritarian and elitist regimes; 3) Traditionalists want to restore past systems and conventions based on ancestral heritage and religion; 4) Pluralists want to establish a system in which values of individual freedom, liberty, and participation will be emphasized, however there are few examples of such groups; 5) Secessionists renounce the nation state to which they are subjects and want to separate and establish an independent state; 6) Reformists aim to obtain more political, social and economic benefits for the people whom they claim to represent, but do not want to reject the current political system; and finally, 7) Preservationists seek to maintain the status quo by engaging in violence against non-ruling minorities. See Bard E. O'Neill, The Strategic Context of Insurgent Terrorism, in Terrorism and Political Violence: Limits and Possibilities of Legal Control 77-79 (Henry H. Han ed., 1993).

n46. See Weinberg & Eubank, supra note 33, at 30.

n47. Richard Schultz, Conceptualizing Political Terrorism: A Typology, in International

REV_00261471

Terrorism: Current Research and Directions 9-15 (Alan D. Buckley & Daniel D. Olson eds., 1980) noted in Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 5. "Revolutionary Terrorism [is defined as] ... the threat and/or development of extranormal forms of political violence, in varying degrees, with the object of successfully effecting a complete revolutionary change (i.e., a change of fundamental political-social processes) within the political system." Id.

n48. Id. "Sub-Revolutionary Terrorism [is defined as] ... the threat and/or employment of extranormal forms of political violence, in varying degrees, with the objective of effecting various changes in the particular political system .... The goal is to bring about certain changes in the body politic, not to abolish it in favor of a complete system change." Id.

n49. Id. "Establishment Terrorism [is defined as] ... the threat and/or employment of extranormal forms of political violence in varying degrees, by an established political system, against both external and internal opposition. Id. Specifically such means may be employed by an established political system against other nation-states and groups external to the particular political system, as well as internally to repress various forms of domestic opposition/unrest and/or to move the populace to comply with programs/goals of the state." Schultz, supra note 47, at 5.

n50. See generally Grant Wardlaw, The Democratic Framework, in The Deadly Sin of Terrorism 5-11 (David A. Charters ed., 1994).

n51. The underlying conflict that plagues Northern Ireland can be traced back as early as the 1600s. See John E. Finn, Constitutions in Crisis 47 (1991). Protestant British and Scottish colonists forcibly settled Ulster Plantation amidst Catholic uprisings. Id. The conflict later solidified when King William's Protestant army defeated King James' Catholic army in 1689. Id. In the ensuing centuries, severe prejudices developed between the Catholic and Protestant populations, the former demanding the establishment of an independent Irish state, the latter remaining loyal to the crown. Id. The demands for some form of national political independence were satisfied by the foundation of the Irish Free State in 1922. Id. However, this settlement left Northern Ireland, as formed under the Government of Ireland Act of 1920, subservient to the British and in the control of the Loyalist Protestant majority. Id.

n52. David Bonner, The United Kingdom's Response to Terrorism, in Western Responses to Terrorism 174 (Alex P. Schmid & Ronald D. Chelinsten eds., 1993). The 1960s gave rise to a civil rights movement calling for reforms that would allow the Catholic minority to participate equally in the political and economic life of the province. See Brian J. Dorrian, Note, Meeting "Clear and Present Dangers?" British Legal Responses to Violent Irish Nationalism 50 U. Toronto Fac. L. Rev. 161, 163 (1993). The 1963 election of a moderate leader, Terrence O'Neill, significantly contributed to the progress of the civil rights movement and raised Catholic expectations, but also alienated the loyalist population. Id. The escalating violence culminated when the mainly Protestant police force opened fire on Catholic rioters in 1969. Id. Two nights of violent rioting ensued, and the British Army was subsequently summoned. Id.

n53. Great Britain has witnessed the hijacking and destruction of its aircraft abroad, the kidnapping and killing of its nationals abroad, as well as bombings, assassinations and attempted assassinations within its borders by foreign insurgents. Id. at 173. Terrorist incidents have surfaced in connection with the political affairs of India, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Libya, and Syria. Id. The British Isles have also seen domestic violence perpetrated by Welsh and Scottish nationalists, neo-Fascists, radical animal rights activists, and Anarchists such as the Angry Brigade. Id.

n54. Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 148.

n55. Id. Due to this resurgence of violence, both the United Kingdom and Ireland officially able to assert the myth that they are liberators of the oppressed and not violent insurrectionists.

This Comment will discuss different aspects of contemporary society which function as catalysts for terrorist violence and survey British, Japanese, and Israeli legislative initiatives that attempt to control the activities of terrorist organizations that actively operate in each nation. Part II will focus upon intrinsic obstacles, such as definitional inconsistencies, threat assessment, and contributing factors that effective policy management must surmount. Parts III, IV, and V will survey British, Israeli, and Japanese legislative countermeasures, respectively, and briefly profile terrorist cells operating within each nation. Part VI will compare each nation's initiatives and comment upon the future of terrorism in light of the [*406] current state of British, Israeli, and Japanese antiterrorism legislation.

II. Framework for Legislative Control

Before undertaking a study of a particular nation's antiterrorism legislation, one should be familiar with several elements that will have a universal impact upon the effectiveness of such measures. This section will focus upon general areas that are significant to any study of terrorism.

It should be recognized that a comprehensive definition of the term "terrorism" is very elusive. Instead of searching for a catch-all explanation of the phenomenon, it would be more practical for a nation to identify terrorism's root causes in order to ascertain a faction's infrastructure, support bases, and potential targets before formulating the proper means for response. In this regard, emphasis should be directed toward distinguishing the contemporary components of society that create an environment conducive to terrorism.

A. Definitional Obstacles

Establishing a proper and comprehensive definition of terrorism is a complicated task that still induces extensive debate. The cliche "one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter" illustrates how easily the definition can be obscured. [1] In western society, the term elicits graphic and horrid images of criminal violence and brutality. However, organizations or nations that actively sponsor or directly engage in terrorism perceive violence as the most effective means of bringing about the particular transformations they seek. A complete definition of the term must take these two opposing viewpoints into account. In this respect, defining "terrorism" has proven to be troublesome.

Nations such as Japan and Israel have not adopted an explicit statutory definition of "terrorism," but others, such as the United [*407] States [2] and the United Kingdom, [3] have developed such language. [4] However, a particular definition will not shape a nation's terrorism counteraction policy as effectively as will its attitude toward terrorist violence. The antiterrorism measures of the United [*408] Kingdom, Japan, and Israel have been formed by both global trends and regional factors unique to their individual histories. When developing future policies, it is not any one particular definition that will guide these states, but a general attitude shaped by what each state has learned from experience.

For purposes of this Comment, a strict analysis of the definition of "terrorism" is unnecessary. The term, however, does have important implications that should be noted. For example, the aforementioned freedom fighter cliche is very misleading. Terrorists prefer to classify themselves as freedom fighters or guerrillas struggling for national liberation, social justice, or other ideals. [5] In reality, a terrorist often directs violence at persons who have no connection with his or her alleged grievances. [6] People are often targeted indiscriminately for proscribed the IRA. Id.

REV_00261455

n56. Id.

n57. Id.

n58. See Bonner, supra note 52, at 175.

n59. PIRA is the main Irish nationalist paramilitary and terrorist organization seeking to reunite the six counties of Northern Ireland with the rest of Ireland in order to form an "Irish Socialist Republic." Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 292. This objective is sought primarily through revolutionary armed struggle rather than through political or diplomatic means. Id. PIRA has resorted to terrorism aimed at inflicting maximum casualties and has targeted civilians as well as military personnel. Id.

n60. See id. PIRA has also used its political wing - the Provisional Sinn Fein headed by Gerry Adams - to accomplish such goals. Bonner, supra note 52, at 175. PIRA had as many as 1000 hard-core members in the 1970s, but internal disputes have since cut this figure to between 200 and 500 members. Id. Even though membership appears to be small, PIRA is able to draw upon much support through sympathy and intimidation. Id.

n61. Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 294. From 1969 to 1982, members of PIRA have been convicted of 2269 murders, 7521 bombings resulting in 608 deaths, and at least 1000 "kneecappings" (summary executions and threats against family members). Id. PIRA is compartmentalized into Active Service Units whose members only know each other and the person issuing orders from above so as to minimize damages should a member be caught. Department of Defense, Terrorist Group Profiles 56-59 (1988) (hereinafter Terrorist Group Profiles). The Active Service Units are subordinate to localized Brigades which are ultimately responsible to the PIRA operational authority, the Northern Command. Id. PIRA attacks have occurred outside of Northern Ireland, the most notorious being the Brighton Bombing of 1984 which was designed to kill Margaret Thatcher. Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 295. PIRA operations have also been reported in western European nations such as West Germany and the Netherlands. Id. at 294.

n62. Id. at 293-94.

n63. Terrorist Group Profiles, supra note 61, at 57.

n64. Bonner, supra note 52, at 175.

n65. Terrorist Group Profiles, supra note 61, at 57. Libyan weapons were intercepted off the coasts of Ireland in 1973 and France in 1987. Id. Libya has also been reported to have given PIRA between one and two million British pounds. Id.

n66. Id. at 50.

n67. Id.

n68. Id.

n69. Terrorist Group Profiles, supra note 61, at 51-52.

n70. Id.

n71. Id. at 51.

n72. Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 147.

n73. Bonner, supra note 52, at 177.

n74. Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 357.

n75. Id. The UDA's legal status is due in large part to the fact that British security forces depend upon it for auxiliary support. Id.

n76. Id.

n77. Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 359. The UVF ceased to exist officially in 1922 when most of its members joined the newly created Royal Ulster Constabulary. Id. However, the group reinstated itself in both 1966 and 1973 and declared war on all IRA members. Id.

n78. Id.

n79. Bonner, supra note 52, at 177.

n80. Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 359.

n81. Id. In one of its more notorious attacks, the UFF shot and wounded current Sinn Fein President Gerry Adams as he was driving through Belfast. Id.

n82. Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 (Eng.).

n83. See Walker, supra note 35, at 31. The Birmingham bombings of November 21, 1974, in which twenty-one people were killed and 184 injured, are often thought to have prompted the passage of the PTA. Id. However, both the Provisional and Official IRA had engaged in over 150 attacks in the two years preceding the PTA's creation. Id. Although the PTA has been deemed "panic legislation," it was modeled after the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1973, the Prevention of Violence (Temporary Provisions) Act 1939, and the Immigration Act of 1971. Id. at 31-32. Nevertheless, the PTA is criticized because of the design defects that stem from its rapid passage.

n84. Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996 (Eng.).

n85. An official review of the 1991 revision of the legislation recommended that a new statute be enacted with a number of changes. See generally J.J. Rowe, Review of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1991, Q.C., Cm.2706 (Feb 1995) (the Rowe Report) as cited in Kersi B. Shroff, The United Kingdom, in Terrorism: Foreign/International Legal Responses in Selected Foreign Countries 122 (Report for Congress, 1995) (analyzes the 1991 form of the EPA, but remains consistent with the 1996 revision).

n86. Walker, supra note 35, at 41.

n87. See Bruce W. Warner, Great Britain and the Response to International Terrorism, in The Deadly Sin of Terrorism 20 (David A. Charters ed., 1994).

n88. Shroff, supra note 85, at 124. Schedule 1, Part I, of the EPA lists substantive offenses such as murder, manslaughter, rioting, kidnapping, false imprisonment, conspiracy to murder, causing explosions, escaping from lawful custody, theft, robbery, burglary, intimidation, throwing a petrol bomb, criminal damage to property, possession of illegal firearms, aircraft hijacking, taking of hostages, financial assistance to terrorism, and breach of exclusion orders. Id.

n89. Id. at 124. Murder, manslaughter, theft, and intimidation can be certified out whereas rioting, causing grievous bodily harm by explosions and escaping from lawful custody cannot.

REV_00261474

See also Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, Sch. 1, Pt. I: Substantive Offenses (Eng.).

n90. Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, 4-8, Sched. 2, (Eng.).

n91. Id. An order lasts for three years but can be revoked by the Secretary of State before the period expires. Id. at Sched. 2(1) and (2). A British citizen cannot be excluded from the entire United Kingdom. Id. at 7(4). A British citizen also cannot be excluded from Great Britain if he or she has been a resident of Great Britain throughout the last three years and is currently excluded from Northern Ireland. Id. at 5(4)(a) and (b). Likewise, a British citizen cannot be excluded from Northern Ireland if he or she has been a resident of Northern Ireland throughout the last three years and is currently excluded from Great Britain. Id. at 6(4)(a) and (b). Exclusion orders are used when there is sufficient information that indicates that an individual is involved with terrorism but where that individual cannot be prosecuted because of a lack of admissible evidence. See Rowe, supra note 85, at 6. Sixty-five people have been excluded from the entire United Kingdom, 410 from Great Britain, and seven from Northern Ireland. See C.A. Gearty & J.A. Kimbell, Terrorism and the Rule of Law 34 (1995) as cited in Shroff, supra note 85, at 129.

n92. See Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, Sched. 2. Organizations proscribed by the EPA are the Irish Republican Army, Red Hand Commandos, Cumann na mBan, Fianna Na mBan, Saor Eire, Ulster Freedom Fighters, Ulster Volunteer Force, Irish National Liberation Army, Irish People's Liberation Organization, and the Ulster Defence Force. Id. at 30(3). The Secretary of State may add or remove organizations from this list. Id. at 30(4). When an organization is listed, it becomes illegal for any person to: a) belong to the organization; b) solicit support for the organization; c) solicit membership or carry out orders of the organization; d) address any meeting of three or more persons knowing that the meeting is to: i) support a proscribed organization; ii) further the activities of a proscribed organization; or iii) be addressed by a member of a proscribed organization. Id. at 30(1)(a)-(d). It is also illegal to publicly wear any item of dress or display any article that arouses reasonable apprehension that he or she is a member or supporter of a proscribed organization (Id. at 31(a) and (b)) or to publicly conceal one's identity with a mask or a hood. Id. at 35. Furthermore, it is an offense to possess any article that could reasonably be assumed to be connected with the commission, preparation, or instigation of an act of terrorism connected with the affairs of Northern Ireland. Id. at 32(1).

n93. See Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, Sched. 1 (Eng.). The PTA has only proscribed the Irish Republican Army (no specification is made between the Provisional IRA and the Official IRA) and the Irish National Liberation Army. See id. The language of PTA 2, relating to membership, support, and meetings of proscribed organizations, and PTA 3, relating to the display of public support, mirrors the language of EPA 30 and 32. However, no provisions of the PTA address the wearing of masks or hoods to conceal one's identity.

n94. See generally Walker, supra note 35, at 267-78.

n95. Shroff, supra note 85, at 132.

n96. Id. at 127; see also Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, Part V: Regulation of the Provision of Private Security Services (37-44) (Eng.).

n97. Shroff, supra note 85, at 127. The EPA requires a certification process for private security services through which certificates must be renewed every 12 months (see Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, 39(3) (Eng.)) and a certificate holder must notify the Secretary of State of a change of employees within 14 days of the change. See id. at 40. The Secretary of State may refuse to issue a certificate or revoke an existing certificate if he has reason to believe that a proscribed organization would benefit from the certificate or if the applicant or certificate holder has persistently failed to comply with the requirements of Part V (Regulation of the Provision of Private Security Forces). See id. at 39(1) and (5).

n98. Shroff, supra note 85, at 127; see also Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, 38(2), (Eng.).

n99. Shroff, supra note 85, at 123. For example, both the police and armed forces may: 1) enter and search buildings, other than a dwelling house and seize any munitions or radio transmitters and receivers found therein; 2) stop and search persons in public places and seize any munitions or radio transmitters and receivers; 3) enter a non-dwelling building to search for and seize explosives; 4) stop and search persons in public places and seize explosives; 5) enter any premises to search for detained persons; 6) stop and question a person anywhere to ascertain identity, movements or knowledge of terrorist incidents; and, 7) enter any premises in the course of operations for preservation of peace or maintenance of order. Id.; see also Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, 17-24 (Eng.).

n100. See Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, 19 (Eng.) (Powers of arrest and seizure by members of Her Majesty's forces).

n101. Shroff, supra note 85, at 130. A person is guilty of an offense if he or she: a) discloses to another person information that is likely to prejudice an investigation; b) falsifies, conceals, destroys or otherwise disposes of, or causes or permits the falsification, concealment, destruction or disposal of, material which is or is likely to be relevant to an investigation. Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, 17(2) (Eng.). An exception is made for disclosures by a legal adviser to a client or representative of a client or to any person in contemplation of or in connection with legal proceedings. Id. at 2C.

n102. Shroff, supra note 85, at 130. Such a person may be detained for up to 48 hours, which may be extended for an additional five days with the permission of the Secretary of State. See Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) 1989, 14(4) and (5) (Eng.); see also R. v. Officer in Charge of Police Office, Castlereagh, ex parte Lynch, [1980] N.I. 126, 131, as cited in Shroff, supra note 85, at 130.

n103. Shroff, supra note 85, at 130. Immigration and customs officials may arrest a person without reasonable suspicion and subsequently detain him or her for up to 12 hours, which may be extended to 48 hours if there is reasonable suspicion. Id. Detention may also be extended for an additional five days with the permission of the Secretary of State. Id.; see Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, 16 and Sched. 5, 1(b) and (c) (Eng.).

n104. Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996 12(2)(b) (Eng.). After 1981, a number of trials were based on evidence obtained from accomplices turned informers under the promise of immunity ("Supergrasses"). See S.H. Bailey, et al, Civil Liberties 263 (1991) as cited in Shroff, supra note 85, at 126. Such trials were abandoned in 1986 when it was noted that judges were not sufficiently discriminating in the use of uncorroborated evidence. Id.

n105. Shroff, supra note 85, at 124. The latter proceeding requires the consent of both the court and the defendant. Id. Because defendants would often withhold their consent by refusing to recognize the court, a provision was enacted whereby the court is obliged to proceed, if it is not unjust to do so, without the defendant's consent if the prosecution wishes to conduct a preliminary inquiry for a scheduled offense. Id.; see also Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, 2 (Eng.).

n106. See Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, 3(2) (Eng.). Magistrates are no longer used for bail hearings in terrorist cases because it was the practice of the defendant's supporters to mob the courtroom and create a threatening atmosphere and subsequently intimidate the court. See Rowe, supra note 85, at 12.

REV_00261476

n107. See Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, 5 (Eng.).

n108. See id. at 11; Shroff, supra note 85, at 124. Critics of this system argue that a judge will become biased against defendants after continually reviewing cruel and horrifying evidence. See Gearty & Kimbell, supra note 91, at 51. Statistics since 1980 show acquittal rates ranging from 29% to 50%. Id. However, the latest review of this provision found that intimidation still poses a threat to jury trials and that the current system should not yet be abandoned. See Rowe, supra note 85, at 15.

n109. Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, 11(5) and (6) (Eng.).

n110. See generally Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, 9-13 (Eng.). These provisions are not applicable to acts committed outside the United Kingdom unless the omission of such acts would constitute a triable offense in the United Kingdom. Id. at 9(4).

n111. Shroff, supra note 85, at 130.

n112. See generally Criminal Justice Act, 1993, 51 (Eng.), as cited in Shroff, supra note 85, at 130.

n113. Shroff, supra note 85, at 127. If a conviction is obtained for intimidation, financial assistance for terrorism, or assisting another to retain the proceeds of terrorist-related activities, the court may also issue a confiscation order. Id. at 128. The court is allowed to assume that any property transferred to the defendant in the six years prior to the proceedings was the result of terrorist-related activities. Id.

n114. Id. at 131. Such offenses "include murder, manslaughter, kidnapping, abduction, causing explosions with intent to endanger life or property, and possessing firearms with an intent to injure." Id.

n115. Aviation Security Act, 1982 (Eng.); Aviation and Maritime Security Act, 1990 (Eng.), as cited in Shroff, supra note 85, at 131.

n116. Taking of Hostages Act, 1982, 4 (Eng.) as cited in Shroff, supra note 85, at 131. Also, the Internationally Protected Persons Act of 1978 grants extraterritorial jurisdiction over offenses committed against diplomats and government officials. Id.

n117. This conflict is grounded in the Biblical histories of Canaan (now Israel) and the Hebrew exodus from Egypt in the thirteenth century B.C. See Federal Research Division, Library of Congress, Israel: A Country Study 6, 17 (Helen Chapin Metz ed., 1990) (hereinafter Israel: A Country Study). The Palestinians (the Biblical Philistines) began their military push into Canaan around 1050 B.C., but were repelled by an increasingly powerful Israelite army commanded by King David. Id. However, in the sixth century B.C., the Babylonians conquered Jerusalem, thereupon scattering the Hebrew people into exile. Id. The Persian defeat of Babylonia in the mid-sixth century B.C. enabled the Jews to return to Israel, but the Roman Empire, upon conquering the Persians enveloped Israel in 332 B.C. Id. The Arab-Muslim conquest of 638 A.D. ended the rule of the Roman Empire, and the region, now Palestine, was subjected to Arab rule until Western Europe launched the Crusades of 1100 A.D. Id. The Arabs again took control of Jerusalem in 1291 A.D. Id. In 1516, the region was incorporated into the Ottoman Empire which remained in power until World War I. Id.

n118. See Israel: A Country Study, supra note 117, at 17-38.

n119. See id. at 38-44. The founding of the World Zionist movement took place in the late nineteenth century and contributed to increased Jewish immigration to Palestine. Id.

REV_00261477

Following the Holocaust of World War II, the movement for a sovereign Jewish state was met with violent opposition from Arab nationalists. Id.

n120. See Bernard Reich, Historical Dictionary of Israel lv-lvi (1992).

n121. See id. at lvi.

n122. Israel captured from Egypt both the Sinai Peninsula and the Gaza Strip in the summer of 1956, but eventually withdrew when United Nations peacekeepers were deployed to the Suez Canal region. See id. at lvii.

n123. Upon Egyptian President Nasser's call for the removal of United Nations forces, Israel launched a preemptive strike which subsequently drew Jordan, Syria, Iraq, and other Arab nations into the war. See id. at lvii-lviii. Israel's ultimate victory resulted in its occupation of the Sinai Peninsula, the Gaza Strip, the West Bank, East Jerusalem, and the Golan Heights. Id.

n124. Between February 1969 and August 1970, Egypt launched attacks against Israeli forces at the Suez Canal, but agreed to accept a U.N. Security Council Resolution devised by U.S. Secretary of State William Rogers after the Soviet Union began supporting Israel. See Israel: A Country Study, supra note 117, at 62-63.

n125. In what came to be known as the "Yom Kippur War," Syria and Egypt launched a surprise attack against Israel at its northern and southern borders. See id. at 64. Israel was eventually able to drive the invading armies back into their respective countries. See id. at 65. Israel entered into Syria and Egypt and threatened to overtake Damascus and the Egyptian Army, thus provoking Soviet intervention which prompted a cease fire negotiated by the United States. See id. at 66.

n126. Israel launched a major military action against the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) which was encamped in Lebanon in order to secure Israel's northern border and destroy the PLO infrastructure. Reich, supra note 120, at lx. Although the border was secured and the PLO withdrew from Lebanon, Israeli troops stationed in Lebanon were targeted for violent terrorist operations. Id.

n127. See Noemi Gal-Or, Countering Terrorism in Israel, in The Deadly Sin of Terrorism 139 (David A. Charters ed., 1994) citing Gabriel Ben-Dor, The Strategy of Terrorism in the Arab-Israeli Conflict: The Case of Palestinian Guerrillas, in Terrorism, Surprise and Control 139 (Yair Evron ed., 1979).

n128. Id.

n129. This Charter was adopted by the Palestine National Council of the PLO, on July 17, 1968. See The Arab-Israel Conflict and its Resolution: Selected Documents 136 (R. Lapidoth & M. Hirsch eds., 1992).

n130. Id. at 137, art. 9.

n131. See Agreement on the Gaza Strip and Jericho Area, Cairo, May 4, 1994, arts. VIII and XVIII (Government of Israel, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Jerusalem).

n132. Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 109.

n133. In addition to numerous attacks on civilian targets, different factions of Al-Fatah, such as Black September, Force-17, and the Hawari Group, were responsible for the assault on Israeli athletes at the Munich Olympics, the assassination of Jordan's Prime Minister, and the takeover and sabotage of several embassies. Terrorist Group Profiles, supra note 61, at 12-13; Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 113.

REV_00261478

n134. Terrorist Group Profiles, supra note 61, at 12-13.

n135. Id.

n136. Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 113.

n137. Id.

n138. U.S. Dep't of State, Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1995 61 (1996) (hereinafter Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1995). After splitting from the PLO, the PSF not only attacked Israeli and Arab targets, but PLO targets as well.

n139. Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 289. The PSF numbers around 300 members and, in addition to several notorious attacks in the 1970s and the kidnapping of U.S. Army Colonel Ernest Morgan, it has claimed unconfirmed responsibility for other attacks. Id.

n140. An early break-away group from the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, the DFLP has been involved only in border raids since 1988, but was responsible for the Ma'alot schoolhouse massacre in 1974, in which 27 children were killed and 134 people were wounded. Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1994, supra note 16, at 37-38.

n141. See Kenneth Katzman, Terrorism: Middle Eastern Groups and State Sponsors 15 (CRS Report for Congress, 1995). The DFLP split into two factions in 1991. Id. The Hawatmeh faction opposes the Declaration of Principles signed between the PLO and Israel in 1993 while the other faction is loyal to Arafat. Id. The Hawatmeh faction, which has since suspended its membership in the PLO, is now affiliated with ten other peace-rejectionist groups based in Damascus. Id.

n142. The PFLP was formed after the 1967 war and received its notoriety through several ruthless hijackings and killings in the 1970s. Terrorist Group Profiles, supra note 61, at 25-26. The PFLP was responsible for the bombings of several civilian airliners and buses, was the force behind the Japanese Red Arm's attack on Lod Airport, and has undertaken rocket, grenade, and knife attacks against Israeli civilians. Id.

n143. The PFLP-GC split from the PFLP to pursue the development of a conventional military, as can be seen in numerous attacks utilizing hang-gliders, hot air balloons, assault rifles, and anti-tank and anti-aircraft rockets. The PFLP-GC successfully engineered the release of 1150 Palestinian prisoners in exchange for three Israeli soldiers. See id. at 26-27; Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1995, supra note 138, at 60-61. The PFLP-GC's violent opposition to the PLO led to a further split which established the foundation of the Palestine Liberation Front (PLF). Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1995, supra note 138, at 58-59. The PLF further split into pro-Libyan, pro-Syrian, and pro-PLO factions. Id. The pro-PLO faction led by Abu Abbas is responsible for the attack on the cruise ship Achille Lauro. Id. An arrest warrant for Abu Abbas is still outstanding in Italy. Id.

n144. The 15 May Organization, was formed in 1979 and has never been affiliated with the PLO. Terrorist Group Profiles, supra note 16, at 8-9. It disbanded in 1984 after several bombings of U.S. and Israeli targets. Id.

n145. See Katzman, supra note 141, at 14-15.

n146. Lebanese Shiite clerics who subscribe to the Islamic revolutionary ideology of Ayatollah Khomeini founded the Hizballah after the Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1982. Id. at 4-5. The organization's original goal was to form an Islamic republic in Lebanon, but it has since concentrated its efforts on disrupting the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. Id. The

REV_00261479

Hizballah is also trying to integrate into the Lebanese political system and now holds eight of 128 seats in the national assembly. Id.

n147. Reports have indicated that Iranian diplomats posted in Lebanon, Syria, and Sudan provide the Hizballah with logistical support. Iran is also reported to finance the organization with $ 60 to $ 100 million per year. Id.

n148. The Hizballah has conducted several notorious anti-Western attacks, such as bombings of the U.S. Marine Barracks, the U.S. Embassy, and the U.S. Embassy annex in Beirut. Katzman, supra note 141, at 4-5. It is also responsible for the hijacking of a TWA airliner, two Israeli-targeted bombings in Buenos Aires, and the detention of Western hostages in Lebanon. Id.

n149. HAMAS, which grew out of a Palestinian uprising in 1987, generally opposes the peace process, but does appear to be willing to participate in the newly formed Palestinian Authority which has resulted from the peace agreement. Id. at 6. The organization has a military wing, known as the Izz ad-Din al Qassam Brigades, but also engages in peaceful political activity, provides social services, supports charities, and finances education to needy Palestinians. Id.

n150. See Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1994, supra note 16, at 41. The number of hardcore members is unknown, but HAMAS has tens of thousands of sympathizers who lend both political and financial support. Id.

n151. Id.

n152. See id. at 53-54. In addition to bus attacks and cross-border raids against Israeli targets in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, the PIJ has threatened to attack U.S. interests in both Jordan and Egypt due to its strong support of Israel. Id.

n153. Although Jewish extremists have used terrorism against Palestinian civilians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, the Israeli government has not been swift in responding to the problem. See P. Marcus, The Treatment of Terrorists in the Israeli Occupied Territories 3(2) Amer. U. J. Int'l. & Pol'y. 457 (1988) as cited in Ruth Levush, Israel, in Terrorism: Foreign/International Legal Responses in Selected Foreign Countries 69, 70 (Report for Congress, 1995).

n154. This organization was founded by Rabbi Meir Kahane who was assassinated in the United States in 1990. Katzman, supra note 141, at 11. Kahane was responsible for the creation of the Jewish Defense League in 1968, which operated in the United States, primarily for the protection of Orthodox Jews in New York City neighborhoods. See Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 169-71. The Kach Party is an ultranationalist group favoring expulsion of the Arabs from both Israel and the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Id.

n155. Founded by Meir Kahane's son, Binyamin, this group split from the Kach party following Meir Kahane's assassination. See Katzman, supra note 141, at 11.

n156. See Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1995, supra note 138, at 51. A Kach affiliate killed 40 people and wounded 150 people worshipping at a mosque in Hebron on February 25, 1994. Katzman, supra note 141, at 11. These groups have also claimed responsibility for several shootings in the West Bank and Hebron. Id. Israel banned both groups on March 13, 1994 in an effort to stem the furor caused by the Hebron massacre. Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 172.

n157. Jewish terrorist groups were not considered to be a threat to the Israeli Defense Forces as of 1988. Israel: A Country Study, supra note 117, at 279-80. The Gush Emunim Underground launched several terrorist operations against Arab targets in the early 1980s.

REV_00261480

Id. Other smaller groups were responsible for less notorious attacks. Id.

n158. 1 L.S.I. 76, (1948). This Ordinance only applies during a state of emergency as declared by 9 of the Law and Administration Ordinance, 1948, 1 L.S.I. 7, (1948).

n159. See Law and Administration Ordinance (Amendment No. 11) Law, 1967, 21 L.S.I. 75, (1966-67); and Municipal Ordinance (Amendment No. 6) Law, 1967, 21 L.S.I. 75-76, (1967), as cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 72.

n160. See Golan Heights Law, 1981, 36 L.S.I 7, (1981-82), as cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 72.

n161. The Ordinance was enacted after the assassination of United Nations mediator Count Folke Bernadotte. Noemi Gal-Or, Countering Terrorism in Israel, in The Deadly Sin of Terrorism 137, 149 (David A. Charters ed., 1994). Although its intention was to eradicate domestic Jewish terrorism, the Ordinance also applies to foreign terrorism. Id.

n162. Levush, supra note 153, at 72. These territories were never officially annexed by Israel and military regulations apply to all people living within their jurisdictions; however, for common offenses, Jordanian law applies to the West Bank, Egyptian law applies to the Gaza Strip, and Israeli law applies to all of Israel. Id.

n163. Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance, 1948, 1 L.S.I. 76, (1948), 1.

n164. Id. at 4. A person who supports a terrorist organization: a) publishes, in writing or orally, words of praise, sympathy or encouragement for acts of violence calculated to cause death or injury to a person or for threats of such acts of violence; or b) calls for aid or support for acts of violence calculated to cause death or injury or threat of such; c) possesses propaganda materials; d) gives money or money's worth for the benefit of a terrorist organisation; e) puts a place at the disposal of a terrorist organisation as a place of action, meeting, propaganda, or storage; or f) puts an article at the disposal of a terrorist organisation. Id. Israel passed the Prevention of Terrorism (Amendment) Law, 1980, 34 L.S.I. 211, (1980), which adds: g) identifies with or supports a terrorist organization in a public place.

n165. Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance, 1948, 1 L.S.I. 76, (1948), 1. ""Member of a terrorist organisation' means a person belonging to it and includes a person participating in its activities, publishing propaganda in favour of a terrorist organisation or its activities or aims, or collecting moneys or articles for the benefit of a terrorist organisation or its activities." Id.

n166. Id. at 2. This offense includes:

performing a function in the management or instruction of a terrorist organisation or participating in the deliberations or the framing of the decisions of a terrorist organisation or acting as a member of a tribunal of a terrorist organisation or delivering a propaganda speech at a public meeting or over the wireless on behalf of a terrorist organisation.

Id.

n167. Id. at 8. In any legal proceeding, such notice serves as proof that the posted body of persons is a terrorist organisation unless the contrary is proven. Id. Furthermore, a final judgment which determines that a body of persons is a terrorist organization can be used as prima facie evidence that the group is a terrorist organization in any other legal proceeding. Id. at 11(a).

REV_00261481

n168. See Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance, 1948, 1 L.S.I. 76, (1948), 7; see also Levush, supra note 153, at 75.

n169. See Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance, 1948, 1 L.S.I. 76, (1948), 5; see also Levush, supra note 153, at 74.

n170. Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance, 1948, 1 L.S.I. 76, (1948), 6(a). A property owner affected by such an action may appeal to a district court within fifteen days of receiving knowledge of the shut down. Id. at 6(b).

n171. Laws of the State of Israel, Special Volume, 5737-1977, as cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 72.

n172. Id.

n173. The death penalty has only been implemented in the Adolf Eichmann war crimes case. Levush, supra note 153, at 73.

n174. Penal Law, 5737-1977, art. 2, reprinted in Levush, supra note 153, at 73, states:

(1) any body of persons, incorporated or unincorporated, which by its constitution or propaganda or otherwise advocates, incites or encourages any of the following unlawful acts:

(a) the subversion of the political order of Israel by revolution or sabotage;

(b) the overthrow by force or violence of the lawful government of Israel or of any other state, or of organized government;

(c) the destruction or injury of property of the State or of property used in commerce within the State or with other countries.

Id.

n175. Penal Law, 5737-1977, 4, as cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 76-77.

n176. Penal Law, 5737-1977, 5(a), reprinted in Levush, supra note 153, at 77, states:

The courts in Israel are competent to try under Israeli law a person who committed abroad an act which would have been an offense had it been committed in Israel and which injured or was intended to injure the State of Israel, its security, property or economy or its transport or communication links with other countries.

Id.

n177. Penal Law, 5737-1977, 7(a), reprinted in Levush, supra note 153, at 77, states:

REV_00261482

the mere fact that they are vulnerable and innocent. [7] Genuine freedom fighters generally do not deliberately attack children, a person passing by in the street, or people who merely have an ethnic or religious connection to a geographic area. [8] True terrorists often target people who are not the cause of the oppression that a freedom fighter would struggle against and thus break down the boundaries of acceptable conflict and draw in a civilian population that is then victimized at random. [9] Terrorists are also not guerrillas. Guerrillas are irregular soldiers who wage war on far superior military forces, not unarmed, unsuspecting, and defenseless civilians. [10]

Therefore, classifying terrorists as freedom fighters or guerrillas is a misconception that attempts to refute terrorism's implicit barbarity and legitimize outlandish criminal behavior. This manipulation is made possible by broad application of the term "terrorism." It does not merely apply to radical insurgent organizations that indiscriminately use violence as an ideological arm; instead it applies to any individual, group, or nation that utilizes [*409] physical force as a medium to invoke or obstruct political and social transformations. With such an extensive base, it is understandable that terrorism has yet to be defined with boilerplate language. Although a concise or an entirely accurate statement may prove elusive, terrorism, when broken down to a simple principle, is basically "the threat of violence and the use of fear to coerce, persuade, and gain public attention." [11]

B. Identifying the Threat

Geo-political controversies and ideological disagreements often serve as catalysts for terrorism. Violence directed against democratic states frequently results from political and social objectives that are so hopelessly extreme that the normal channels of democracy would not be likely to afford the radical results sought. [12] In non-democratic states, terrorists act out of desperation due to a lack of suitable means to obtain their desired objectives. [13] Regardless of their theater of operation, terrorist groups are either reactionaries who wish to restore former conventions or revolutionaries who wish to replace existing structures. [14]

It is rare for independent terrorist cells to have significant external contacts for support or an infrastructure that will ensure their longevity. [15] Such organizations are often limited in their capabilities, but may be able to contact other organizations that can provide them with necessary aid. [16] Organizations that receive support from sovereign nations can better maintain the group's existence through access to training, weapons, safe harbor, and [*410] logistical and administrative support. [17] Such support provides them with opportunities to travel internationally, obtain sophisticated weapons and explosives, and coordinate their objectives with other terrorist groups. [18]

Other nations may go so far as to directly organize, supply, and control terrorist cells for the purpose of creating a militant wing of a particular autocratic regime. [19] These organizations do not face difficulties with regard to sustenance, leadership, and support; however, state-directed organizations are rare due to the risk of international condemnation. [20] Although any insurgent group, whether independent or state-operated, can be unpredictably dangerous, overlooking an organization's support base could limit effective evaluation of its potential capabilities.

The goal of a terrorism counteraction policy is to make the political, economic, and psychological climate in which terrorists operate increasingly hostile in order to reduce terrorism to a point where it cannot divert a nation from its stated policies. [21] To achieve this end, an effective policy should focus upon a rule of law that delegitimizes terrorist activity. Further, it must make the practice of supporting terrorism unacceptable internationally in [*411] order to stifle financial and military assistance to insurgent groups. [22] Due to each culture's unique ethnocentric differences, these efforts should focus upon vigorous international cooperation and negotiation. [23] However, rigorous legal standards do not guarantee compliance, so a nation must also employ localized measures by continually re-evaluating threats to potential target sites, and then work to improve their protection. [24]

REV_00261456

The courts in Israel shall be competent to try under Israeli Law a person who committed abroad an act which would have been an offense had it been committed in Israel and which injured or was intended to injure the life, person, health, freedom or property of an Israeli national or resident of Israel.

Id.

n178. M. Shamgar, Military Government in the Territories Administered by Israel 1967-1980, The Legal Aspects 450 (1982), as cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 75, states:

The law in existence in the Region on June 7, 1967, shall remain in force, insofar as it does not in any way conflict with the provisions of this Proclamation or any Proclamation or Order which may be issued by me, and subject to modifications resulting from the establishment of government by the Israel Defense Forces in the Region.

Id.

n179. Government of Palestine, The Defence (Emergency) Regulations, 1945, as amended until Mar. 2, 1947, as cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 75.

n180. See British Mandate Defence (Emergency) Regulations, 1945, arts. 84 and 85. With regard to unlawful associations, memberships, management, holding office, and working for the association is prohibited; in addition, to affording a meeting place, fundraising, and publishing or distributing materials is impermissible. Levush, supra note 153, at 76.

n181. R. Shehadeh, Occupier's Law, Israel and the West Bank 184 (1985) as cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 76.

n182. Explosives Law, 1953, 8 L.S.I. 57, (1953-54) as cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 77.

n183. Levush, supra note 153, at 78. Israel does not have any specific regulations regarding nuclear materials even though it is speculated that it will have nuclear capabilities in the near future. Id.

n184. Extradition Law, 1954, 8 L.S.I. 144 (1953-54), reprinted in Levush, supra note 153, at 78. Section 2 states that an individual may be extradited if:

(1) An agreement providing for reciprocity as to the extradition of offenders exists between Israel and the state requesting his extradition ...

(2) he is accused or has been convicted in the requesting state of an offense of a non-political character and which, had it been committed in Israel, would be one of the offenses set out in the Schedule to this Law.

REV_00261483

Id.

n185. An example can be found in Nakash v. State of Israel, 40(4) P.D. 78, in which the appellant argued that his murder of an Arab night club owner in France was of a political character since it was in response to the French authorities' failure to adequately protect Jews from attacks organized by Arab organizations. Levush, supra note 153, at 78. The court authorized the extradition because the substance of the offense was not political in nature and held that the subjective motives of the appellant were irrelevant. Id.

n186. 8 Dinim (Laws) 4733 (1991-), cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 78. A citizen will be extradited if he or she committed the offense before acquiring Israeli citizenship. Id.

n187. Law of Return, 1950, 4 L.S.I 114, (1950), reprinted in Fundamental Laws of the State of Israel 156 (Joseph Badi ed., 1961).

n188. Id.

n189. Law of Return (Amendment), 1954, 8 L.S.I. 144, (1954), reprinted in Fundamental Laws of the State of Israel 332 (Joseph Badi ed., 1961).

n190. Entry into Israel Law, 1952, as amended, 6 L.S.I. 161 (1951-52), cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 79. An individual will not be deported if they are an Israeli national or if they are in possession of an immigrant visa granted under the Law of Return, 5710-1950. Id.

n191. See Victims of Hostile Action (Pensions) Law, 1970, 24 L.S.I. 131 (1969-70), cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 79.

n192. See Pensions for Victims of Hostile Actions (Definition of Area Held by the Israel Defense Forces), 1971, 31 Dinim 20409 (1993-), cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 79.

n193. See Victims of Hostile Action (Burial Expenses) Regulations, 1978, 31 Dinim 20385 (1993-), cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 79.

n194. See Victims of Hostile Action (Burial Expenses) Regulations, 1978, 31 Dinim 20395 (1993-), cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 79.

n195. See Victims of Hostile Action (Burial Expenses) Regulations, 1978, 31 Dinim 20399 (1993-), cited in Levush, supra note 153, at 79.

n196. Sung Yoon Cho, Japan, in Terrorism: Foreign/International Legal Responses in Selected Foreign Countries 89, 97 (Report for Congress, 1995).

n197. The JRA wishes to incite a world-wide Marxist-Leninist revolution by uniting leftist Japanese forces to eliminate imperialism and establish a "People's Republic" in Japan. Terrorist Group Profiles, supra note 61, at 118.

n198. See Terrorism and Democracy 170-85 (Peter Janke ed. 1992). The origins of the JRA are found in the Sekigun-Ha, a militant student group organized in 1969, which disbanded when the police detected plans to overtake the official residence of the Prime Minister. Id. at 172. Fifty-four members were arrested, and the remaining members, in search of international support, hijacked JAL flight Yodo-Go on March 31, 1970, and forced it to fly to North Korea. Id. at 175. However, the North Korean government restricted the group from conducting any activities and forced the hijackers to remain in North Korea until the late 1980s. Id. at 176. Soon after the hijacking, the Japanese police arrested 200 people in efforts to suppress the remainder of the group, but when Fusako Shigenobu was released from prison, she left Japan with a small number of followers. Id. They traveled to Lebanon were they reorganized as the Arab Red Army in order to gain strength as a faction of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, but soon changed their name to the Japanese Red Army. Id.

REV_00261484

n199. Terrorist Group Profiles, supra note 61, at 118.

n200. Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1994, supra note 16, at 44.

n201. See Terrorism & Democracy, supra note 198, at 176-77. Three members, while still under the name of the Arab Red Army, attacked passengers with machine guns and grenades on May 30, 1972. Id. at 176. Twenty-four people were killed, many of whom were on a religious pilgrimage from Puerto Rico, and two of the terrorists committed suicide in the process. Id. at 177. The third member, Kozo Okamoto, was arrested and sentenced to life imprisonment, but was released along with 1150 Palestinian guerrillas in exchange for three Israeli soldiers held by the PFLP in 1985. Id. The purpose of this attack, though believed to have been to prove the JRA's loyalty to the PFLP, is still unknown. Id. at 176. See William A. Farrell, Blood and Rage: the Story of the Japanese Red Army 138-44 (1990) for a detailed account of the Lod Airport Massacre.

n202. Terrorist Group Profiles, supra note 61, at 119. In August of 1975, ten members took over the U.S. Consulate in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, and took 52 people hostage. Id. The terrorists demanded that seven JRA members be set free from Japanese prisons and transported to the Middle East. Id. Although Japan intended to release all seven JRA members, only five expressed willingness and were transported to Tripoli, Libya, via Kuala Lumpur. Id. The Japanese government later released nine imprisoned terrorists and paid six million dollars in exchange for 159 people taken hostage when the JRA hijacked a Japan Airlines plane in Bombay and forced it to land in Dhaka, Bangladesh in 1977. Id. Upon the release and payment, the hijackers were flown to Algeria. Id.

n203. See Terrorism & Democracy, supra note 198, at 182-83. Evidence revealed that JRA members were believed to be behind the formation and subsequent activities of the Anti-Imperialist International Brigade and the Anti-war Democratic Front. Id.

n204. Also known as the Middle Core or Nucleus Faction, this organization wants to terminate the current constitutional democracy in Japan, the monarchy, and United States-Japanese relations. Terrorist Group Profiles, supra note 61, at 115.

n205. Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1995, supra note 138, at 44.

n206. Anderson & Sloan, supra note 1, at 66-67. It is the largest and most militant of 23 factions that make up the Japanese New Left movement. Id. The group also rejects the "Japanese corporate state" as evidenced by "frequent attacks on the construction of the New Tokyo International Airport and against the subway and railroad mass-transit systems." Id.

n207. Terrorist Group Profiles, supra note 61, at 116.

n208. Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1994, supra note 16, at 37.

n209. See Terrorist Group Profiles, supra note 61, at 117. The group has been linked to the beating death of a railway trade union official in September of 1986, but other attacks have not produced human casualties. Id. For example, truck-mounted flamethrowers have been used to burn buildings, bombs have destroyed homes of executives and have been used to delay construction of the expanding Narita airport, and rocket-bombs and projectiles have been fired at targets such as the Imperial Palace and airports. Id.

n210. Cho, supra note 196, at 98.

REV_00261485

n211. Master of Terror, Asiaweek, Dec. 22, 1995 / Dec. 29, 1995, at 43; available in LEXIS, NEWS Library, ASIAWK File. In addition to its Japanese contingent, the cult also claims to have 100,000 member overseas, primarily in Moscow, but also in New York, Bonn, and Colombo. Id.

n212. See Steven R. Bowman, Chemical Agent Attacks in Japan, CRS Report for Congress May 4, 1995. In June of 1994, seven people were killed by a release of Sarin Gas in the cult's home town of Matsumoto. Id. On March 5, 1995, nineteen passengers on the Yokohama subway were hospitalized for eye and respiratory pain from unidentified fumes. Id. The most lethal attack came on March 20, 1995, when Sarin leaked from packages placed aboard five cars in Tokyo's subway system which killed 12 people and injured more than 5000. Id. One month later, April 19, 1995, 400 people were hospitalized following a "copy-cat" attack with tear gas. Id.

n213. Master of Terror, supra note 211, at 43.

n214. Id. Shokou's trial began in early May and could continue for another five years. Trial of the Century, Asiaweek, May 10, 1996, at 7; available in LEXIS, NEWS Library, ASIAWK File. In addition to the Japanese trial, a Russian court has ordered the cult to pay $ 4 million to families of cult members. Justice for All, Asiaweek, April 28, 1995; available in LEXIS, NEWS Library, ASIAWK File. This money is to be used to build a rehabilitation center for brainwashed cult members. Id.

n215. Law No. 45 of 1907, amended by Law No. 31 of 1991, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 89.

n216. Id. at 90. Generally, a person is guilty of rioting under the Code if he assembles in a crowd for the purpose of using violence or intimidation (art. 106); however, rioting will be prosecuted as a terrorist offense if two or more people assemble for purposes of jointly causing injury to life, limb, or property (art. 208-2). Id. at 92. These assembly provisions also have been supplemented by the Law Concerning Punishment of Violent Acts, Law No. 60 of 1926, amended by Law No. 31 of 1991, arts. 5-7., which enhance the Code provisions to aggravated offenses which carry a maximum punishment of ten years of penal servitude. Id.

n217. See Cho, supra note 196, at 90. Additionally, attempts and conspiracies to commit such crimes also fall under the Code's terrorism provisions. Id.

n218. Under revised art. 4-2, if a crime observed by an international convention corresponds to a provision of the Criminal Code, Japan is obligated to punish anyone who commits the crime outside of the country. See K. Itoh, The 1987 Penal Code and Other Special Criminal Amendments Law: A Response to the Two UN Conventions Against International Terrorism 32 Jap. Ann. Int'l. 18 (1989), cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 95.

n219. Cho, supra note 196, at 94. Art. 1, 2, grants jurisdiction over anyone who "commits a crime on board a Japanese vessel or a Japanese aircraft outside Japan." Id. Art. 2 grants jurisdiction over anyone who commits a designated crime (insurrection, counterfeiting, and forgery of public documents) that threatens Japan. Id. Art. 3 grants jurisdiction over any Japanese national who commits a designated major crime (murder, bodily injury, kidnapping, and arson) outside of the country. Id. Finally, Art. 4 grants jurisdiction over any Japanese public official who is guilty of official corruption or drafting false official documents outside of Japan. Id.

n220. Law No. 240 of 1952, amended by Law No. 89 of 1993, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 89.

n221. See John M. Maki, Japan's Subversive Activities Prevention Law, VI W. Pol. Q. 489-92 (1953).

REV_00261486

n222. Subversive Activities Prevention Law, Law No. 240 of 1952, amended by Law No. 89 of 1993, art. 1, reprinted in Cho, supra note 196, at 91, states that the law's purpose is:

To contribute to the preservation of public safety by establishing regulatory procedures for taking action against organizations which have carried out terroristic activities as organizational activities and supplementing the Criminal Code with additional penalties.

Id.

n223. Such crimes are riot, arson, the setting off and use of explosives, endangering the passage of or wrecking public conveyances, murder, robbery, interference in the exercise of duties and coercion of public officials. Maki, supra note 221, at 493.

n224. Id., citing art. 4, 1, P B.

n225. Cho, supra note 196, at 91. Subversive activities per se are crimes related to insurrection and treason, such as inducement of foreign aggression, and providing assistance to enemies. Maki, supra note 22, at 492-93.

n226. Cho, supra note 196, at 91.

n227. Subversive Activities Prevention Law, Law No. 240 of 1952, amended by Law No. 89 of 1993, art.38, P 1, construed in Cho, supra note 196, at 91.

n228. Subversive Activities Prevention Law, Law No. 240 of 1952, amended by Law No. 89 of 1993, arts. 5-7, construed in Cho, supra note 196, at 92.

n229. Cho, supra note 196, at 97. Sixteen groups have been targeted for surveillance and investigation under the Subversive Activities Prevention Law, but none have been dissolved. Id.

n230. Cho, supra note 196, at 93. In four separate cases, members of the Communist Party were indicted on charges of printing and distributing Communist literature in violation of art. 38, P 2, but challenged the Law's constitutionality as in violation of Article 21 of the Japanese Constitution. Id. Although the defendants were ultimately acquitted on other grounds, the constitutionality of the Act was upheld by the lower courts, three of which were affirmed by the Japanese Supreme Court. Id., citing the Gifu Case, 396 Hanrei Jiho 19 (1959)(affirmed by the Supreme Court, Dec. 21, 1964); Tsu and Kyoto Cases, 496 Hanrei Jiho 69 (1967) (affirmed by Supreme Court, July 20, 1967, and Sept. 22, 1967, respectively); and the Kushiro Case, 74 Hanrei Jiho 21 (1956)(affirmed by the Sapporo High Court, Mar. 30, 1956).

n231. Cho, supra note 196, at 98. The Aum Shinrikyo, which has been designated as a violence-prone organization, has been subjected to the Subversive Activities Prevention Law. Id. Critics have asserted that putting a religious organization under surveillance could be a violation of the Japanese Constitution's guarantee of freedom of religion. Id.

n232. Id. at 97. However, eight members of an ultra-nationalistic organization were indicted on charges of preparation of homicide and incitement to riot in violation of Articles 39 and 40 of the Subversive Activities Prevention Law. See 603 Hanrei Jiho 94 (1970), cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 93-94.

n233. Subversive Activities Prevention Law, Law No. 240 of 1952, amended by Law No. 89 of 1993, art. 2, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 91.

REV_00261487

n234. Cho, supra note 196, at 97.

n235. Law No. 77 of 1991, amended by Law No. 89 of 1993, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 93.

n236. Cho, supra note 196, at 93.

n237. The ban covers activities ranging from terroristic threats to extorting protection money. Id. at 93. Engaging in a banned activity can result in one year's imprisonment and a fine of up to one million yen. Id.

n238. An example is the extradition treaty between Japan and the United States that entered into force on May 26, 1980. Treaty on Extradition, May 26, 1980, U.S.-Japan, 31 UST 892, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 96.

n239. Law No. 68 of 1953, amended by Law No. 89 of 1993, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 96.

n240. Id. An example is a case in which a Chinese national hijacked a Chinese aircraft flying from Bejing to New York and forced it to land at Fukuoka Airport in Japan on December 16, 1989. Y. Kiyoshi, Political Offenses and Hijacking with the Japanese Law for the Extradition of Fugitives from Justice, 34 Jap. Ann. Int'l L. 69 (1991), construed in Cho, supra note 196, at 96. The terrorist claimed he was fleeing from arrest due to his involvement in the Tianamen Square demonstration, but it was revealed in court that he had actually been arrested for embezzlement. Id. Because this was not a political offense, the terrorist was extradited to China on April 24, 1990. Id.

n241. Cabinet Order No. 319 of 1951, amended by Law No. 94 of 1991, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 97.

n242. Decree of the Dajokan, Law No. 3 of 1884, amended by Law No. 34 of 1918, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 89.

n243. The amended Decree provided for the death penalty, penal servitude, or seven years to life incarceration. Id.

n244. Violations could result in a sentence of penal servitude not exceeding three years and fines not exceeding one million yen Law No. 290 of 1950, amended by Law No. 89 of 1993, art. 58, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 92.

n245. Law No. 17 of 1974, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 92. Anyone who endangers another's life or property through the use of a gasoline bomb is subject to a sentence of up to seven years of penal servitude whereas anyone charged with the possession or manufacture of a gasoline bomb can be fined up to 100,000 yen or sentenced to up to three years of penal servitude. Id.

n246. Cho, supra note 196, at 89. This legislation was passed in response to the "Molotov cocktail struggle" in which mass protests and demonstrations were inspired by left-wing student organizations and radical elements from various labor unions. Id.

n247. Law No. 166 of 1957, amended by Law No. 89 of 1993, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 95-96. This revision incorporated new articles to make it an offense for any person to handle specified nuclear material without authority, to cause death, injury, or damage to property with a fission chain reaction or by diffusing radiation. Cho, supra note 196, at 96. Anyone guilty of such an offense or even attempting such an offense can be sentenced to penal servitude of up to ten years. Id. Any person who threatens to harm life, limb, or destroy property with nuclear material, or who demands that others not perform their duties or refrain from exercising their rights by threatening to steal nuclear material is subject to a minimum of three years penal servitude. Id.

REV_00261488

n248. See International Terrorism: A Compilation of Major Laws, Treaties, Agreements, and Executive Documents 510 Comm. Print 1991, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 95.

n249. Cho, supra note 196, at 93. The Law Concerning the Prevention of Bodily Harm Caused by Sarin Gas was enacted on April 19, 1995. Id.

n250. Id. at 94. Police raids of the cult's facilities have revealed large quantities of chemicals necessary for the production of Sarin gas as well as gun parts and machinery. Id.

n251. The Law Concerning Prevention of Bodily Harm Caused by Sarin Gas, Art. 5, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 93.

n252. The Law Concerning the Prevention of Bodily Harm Caused by Sarin Gas, Art. 3, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 93.

n253. Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft, 1970, U.S.-Japan, 22 UST 1641, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 95.

n254. Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against Safety of Civil Aviation, 24 UST 567, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 95.

n255. Law No. 68 of 1970, amended by Law No. 48 of 1978, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 90.

n256. Law No. 87 of 1984, amended by Law No. 82 of 1977, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 90.

n257. Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons, Including Diplomatic Agents, 28 UST 1975, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 95.

n258. International Terrorism: A Compilation of Major Laws, Treaties, Agreements, and Executive Documents, supra note 248, at 510.

n259. Law No. 48 of 1978, amended by Law No. 52 of 1987, cited in Cho, supra note 196, at 90.

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: ((insurance) /20 war or terrorism) and risk and property and life and (exclusion /20 (war or terrorism)) and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 2, 2001 - 10:02 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

Specific assessments should indicate the potential sources of attack, motivation, and form of aggression expected. [25] Furthermore, tactical teams are needed to contain and diffuse hostile situations. Such preventive and reactive measures will supplement the legal initiatives that a state will employ to effectuate its goals for countering terrorism.

Without effective implementation, legislative mandates will only serve as bare and empty attempts at containment. However, overzealous enforcement may create an oppressive atmosphere, intrude upon individual liberties, and generate public resentment. It may then be easier for terrorists to gain sympathy from segments of a population that are similarly constrained by anti-terrorist initiatives. This is not to assert, however, that a nation should not [*412] vehemently denounce terrorism and utilize its best combative resources. But policy-makers must acknowledge that terrorists often resort to violence because they feel constrained by the status quo; further suppression could make violent insurrection more attractive.

C. Contributing Factors

A nation will need to identify the factors that serve as catalysts for terrorist violence before it will be able to draft an effective terrorism counteraction policy. Although democratic states are frequently targeted for terrorist violence, the inherent strengths of such political systems make them insusceptible to many forms of terrorism. The ability to remove leaders through free elections, to protest freely through the media, and to resolve disputes in impartial courts reduces the necessity for violent social protest. [26]

However, there are also many intrinsic weaknesses in democratic states that foster the conditions for insurgencies. The democratic right to freedom of association provides terrorists with more latitude than that allowed by authoritarian states. [27] Inadequately protected targets, such as mass transit systems, are abundant and readily accessible, and the legal system can be inhibited by witness intimidation and the requirement of strict proof for conviction. [28]

The dilemma which democratic states face is that the only way to address such contributing factors is to curtail the freedoms inherent in their very existence. [29]

Terrorists seek to turn a nation's power and strength against itself by exploiting the weaknesses and vulnerabilities of its [*413] infrastructure; [30] but an attack will need publicity before it can trigger political or social transformations in the targeted culture. In this respect, targets are chosen for symbolic purposes and attacks are deliberately threatening and violent. [31] With the capabilities of the modern media, the old Chinese proverb "kill one and frighten ten thousand" could now read "kill one and frighten ten million." [32] The commercialization of violence has provoked increasingly spectacular operations in order to avoid monotony. [33] In order to transmit a more staggering psychological message, symbolism has taken precedence over substance with regard to target selection. [34] Nations such as the United Kingdom have realized the influential role of the media and have slowly enacted censorship laws to control the messages being broadcast. [35] Without such restrictions, the media can unwittingly contribute to the success of an operation. [36]

Another catalyst for terrorist violence is an intensified freedom of movement that has developed on an enormous scale. [37] Access to mass transportation allows international terrorist organizations to strike at targets anywhere in the world by planting bombs and fleeing the area before detonation. [38] Modern superhighways and easy access to air travel have enabled domestic terrorists to [*414] effectuate their plans with less chance of detection. [39] The volume of tourism and international migration in Western Europe is so enormous that keeping cross-border traffic under surveillance is beyond systematic control. [40] Restricting the ability to move freely throughout certain nations will generate disdain among many critics, but may be an unfortunate necessity for certain terrorism counteraction initiatives.

REV_00261457

The differences between Western and non-Western perspectives on collective responsibility have also had a significant impact on terrorist violence. Western societies usually emphasize individual accountability and responsibility, while non-Western societies tend to hold all members of a social, ethnic, or religious group collectively responsible for assigned guilt. [41] As a result, non-Western insurgents will often target an entire group or culture. [42] Western insurgents, however, will target particular individuals, such as businessmen and politicians, more often than random passers-by. [43]

The contemporary international community has also been influenced by a century of political, social, and religious movements that each espouse distinct ideologies and seek different transmutations. Due to the great diversity of terrorist groups, a regular scheme of comparative analysis must take into account distinct political beliefs, unique organizational features, motivations, and tactics of a group. [44] A terrorist's ideology and ultimate goal have significant relationships to his or her strategies and operations. [45] [*415] Fundamentalist religions often perceive terrorist violence as a divine duty which ultimately relieves insurgents of the moral, political, and practical constraints that normally condemn indiscriminate and massive violence. [46] One terrorist may seek to completely obliterate a nation's government [47] whereas another may want only to change a particular practice rather than abolish an entire system. [48] Furthermore, a governing body itself may engage in terrorism in order to deter and weaken opposition. [49] As can be seen, the subjective factors that contribute to the identity of a terrorist cell vary greatly. [*416]

It should be realized that there is no concrete remedy that will entirely eradicate terrorism. The preceding discussion regarding contributing factors is a general survey of major contemporary trends, not a standard that will envelop each root cause. However, if these factors go unrestrained, they will serve as a conduit for terrorist violence. Policy-makers must recognize the aforementioned factors in order to avoid overrating or underrating the threat of terrorism. There is a danger that a nation will unknowingly effectuate the fundamental goals of a terrorist movement by devising unnecessary initiatives that counter misperceived threats, and thereby alter the status quo. [50]

III. United Kingdom

Antiterrorism legislation in the United Kingdom has been greatly, if not entirely, influenced by the ongoing controversy in Northern Ireland between the Catholic and Protestant populations. [51] The ramifications of the political violence inherent in the struggle are staggering: among a population of 1.5 million, 3000 people have been killed since 1969. [52] In addition, although this [*417] Comment focuses mainly upon Irish-based terrorism in the United Kingdom, the United Kingdom has experienced domestic terrorism from other sources and has also been repeatedly victimized by foreign insurgents. [53] However, it is violent Irish nationalism that has had the most severe impact upon British antiterrorist legislation.

A. Insurgent Organizations

The Irish Republican Army (IRA) was established in the mid-19th century, but did not become so titled until the Dublin Easter Rebellion of 1916. [54] The IRA was disbanded upon the creation of the Irish Free State in 1922, but again became active in 1939 when it undertook a bombing campaign in London, Manchester, Glasgow, and Birmingham. [55]

In 1969, internal disagreements over the group's Marxist ideology caused a split in the IRA. [56] One faction became the Official Irish Republican Army which renounced armed struggle in 1972, and eventually became the Worker's Party. [57] Although the Official Irish Republican Army has ceased using force and has developed a non-sectarian political approach to assert its views, it remains a proscribed organization in the United Kingdom. [58]

REV_00261458

The other faction formed the Provisional Irish Republican Army (PIRA) [59] in order to pursue the objectives of unifying [*418] Ireland under a socialist government and undermining British support for keeping Northern Ireland in the United Kingdom through military operations. [60] PIRA's terrorist campaign consists of bombings, assassinations, kidnappings, extortion, and robberies targeted against the British Army, Ulster security forces, prison and judicial officials, and Loyalist party members. [61] The objectives of PIRA's campaign are to raise to unacceptable levels the economic and political costs to Britain of maintaining troops in Northern Ireland, to provoke British and Northern Irish military and police forces to violate the human and civil rights of PIRA suspects or ordinary Catholics in the hope that such abuses will outrage Britain's domestic civil libertarians and excite international condemnation, and to forcibly mobilize Northern Irish Catholics into the struggle. [62] Financing has been generated through not only robberies of banks, post offices, and corporate payrolls, [63] but also through extortion, profits from small businesses, and defrauding the government. [64] Additionally, PIRA has been able to draw support from Irish Americans and Libya in the form of arms and money. [65] [*419]

A smaller Marxist group, the Irish National Liberation Army (INLA), was formed by dissidents of the Official IRA in 1975 and is considered to be the military arm of the Irish Republican Socialist Party, even though the party denies such a connection. [66] Feuding between the INLA and both wings of the IRA led to the murders of many members, including the group's founder, Seamus Costello. [67] In addition, subsequent internal fighting and arrests triggered by informants have severely weakened the group. [68] INLA attacks began in 1975 with shootings and bombings of British soldiers, Northern Ireland's security forces, Ulster government officials, and members of the Loyalist Party. [69] However, INLA received the most attention with the assassination of the British Conservative Party spokesman in 1979. [70] The group does not have international financial support and relies mainly on robberies of banks, trains, and payrolls for funding. [71] However, INLA has made contacts with the West German Revolutionary Cells and French Direct Action Leftist groups. [72]

Although terrorism within the United Kingdom is traditionally presumed to be executed only by Irish Catholics, Protestant cells have also been instrumental in shaping legislative responses. Loyalist terrorism has been limited to small groups that condemn links with the Irish Republic and resist political change. [73]

The Ulster Defense Association (UDA) was formed in 1971 for the ostensible purpose of protecting Protestant neighborhoods from IRA attacks, but it is suspected of supporting smaller death squad units that assume names separate from the UDA. [74] The UDA receives effective state support from the Ulster Defense Regiment, which is an official security organization dominated by sectarian Protestant militiamen, and which continues to hold legal existence in Northern Ireland. [75] [*420]

The Ulster Volunteer Force (UVF) is a proscribed group that was briefly political in the 1970s, but is mainly known for bombings, robberies, and murdering members of the Catholic community. [76] It was formed from the unification of all Ulster Protestant militias in 1913 in order to oppose the grant of an autonomous government to Ireland in which Protestants would have formed a minority. [77] This group also had effective state support from the Ulster Defense Regiment. [78]

The Ulster Freedom Fighters (UFF), which is basically a "counter terror" body that resists Catholic aggression and seeks to deteriorate the connection with the British government in order to establish an independent Northern Ireland. [79] The UFF splintered from the Ulster Defense Association and was proscribed in 1973, but continued to carry out numerous assassinations and bombings. [80] Although its targets have been IRA supporters and sympathizers, it has also carried out random attacks on prominent Catholics regardless of political affiliation in order to terrorize the Roman Catholic Community. [81]

REV_00261459

B. Antiterrorism Legislation

The Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act [82] (PTA) is the current product of the British legislative response to terrorism. A barrage of violent Irish nationalism between 1972 and 1974 led to the somewhat hasty enactment of this initiative. [83] The [*421] PTA has been renewed and amended since its enactment in 1974 with the most recent alteration taking effect in 1989. Emergency legislation specific to Northern Ireland has also been enacted with the passage of The Northern Ireland Emergency Provision Act [84] (EPA). The most current revision was completed on June 17, 1996, and went into effect on August 25, 1996. [85] Critics point out that these two initiatives overlap both each other [86] and the common law. [87] Notwithstanding such criticism, both Acts remain at the forefront of British legislative responses to both domestic and international terrorism.

The EPA focuses on a system of scheduled offenses considered to be commonly committed in pursuit of terrorist activities and as such are given special treatment as to the mode of commitment, trial, and sentencing. [88] Some of these offenses can be certified out of EPA treatment and addressed in the normal manner if the Attorney General agrees that the commission of a particular offense has no connection with the purposes of the EPA. [89] Under the PTA, if a person is connected with the commission of a terrorist activity, the Secretary of State is granted the power to issue exclusion orders against him or her. [90] Such orders can [*422] exclude a person from entering either Great Britain, Northern Ireland, or the entire United Kingdom. [91]

The EPA proscribes ten paramilitary organizations [92] and the PTA proscribes two organizations. [93] In this respect, the media has been prohibited from broadcasting words spoken by representatives of proscribed organizations, or any statements supporting pro- [*423] scribed organizations. [94] However, the British government has appeased the media by ensuring the availability of official sources of information. [95]

The EPA also subjects private security services in Northern Ireland to intense scrutiny in order to prevent terrorist infiltration of such enterprises in order to extort funds from the public. [96] A constable is authorized to enter any premises where a business involving the provision of security services is operated and inspect employment records. [97] Any person who knowingly or recklessly furnishes false or misleading information during the certification process commits an offense. [98]

The EPA grants the police and armed forces broad powers of search, arrest, and detention which can be exercised without a warrant or reasonable suspicion. [99] Although the EPA gives similar authority to both constables and the army, any member of the armed forces on duty may detain suspected offenders for a maximum of only four hours. [100] The PTA also grants broad [*424] investigatory powers to the British police over the commission, preparation, instigation, or financing of terrorism. [101] For example, if a constable has reasonable suspicion that a person is simply connected with terrorist activity, the constable may arrest him or her without a warrant even though the person is not suspected of committing a specific crime. [102] Additionally, the PTA allows immigration and customs officials to examine and search persons and articles to determine if they are connected to terrorist activity. [103] Although the authorities are granted sweeping powers of arrest and detention under the EPA, evidence of admissions and confessions will not be admitted into court if there is unchallenged evidence of torture, inhumane treatment, violence, or threats of violence used to coerce a suspect into making a statement. [104]

The EPA establishes two forms of committal proceedings in Northern Ireland: a preliminary investigation in which the testimony of prosecution witnesses is obtained by the court under oath, and a preliminary inquiry in which written depositions are consi- [*425] dered by the court. [105] A person accused of a scheduled offense may only be granted bail by a judge of the High Court or the Court of Appeal, [106] but a magistrate may remand such an offender into custody for a maximum of 28 days. [107] Scheduled offenses are tried before a judge sitting without a jury to prevent the intimidation of witnesses and jurors. [108] However, the judge must give reasons for a conviction and a defendant is given a right of appeal on any ground without the leave of court or a certificate from the trial court judge. [109]

REV_00261460

The PTA also criminalizes financial assistance to acts of terrorism or proscribed organizations. [110] The PTA absolves bankers and financial advisors from breaching any rules of confidence in order to encourage voluntary disclosure of any information based upon suspicion of funds being used to finance activities connected with terrorism. [111] In this respect, it is an offense to fail to disclose knowledge or suspicion of financial assistance of terrorism gained within the course of business [*426] dealings. [112] Furthermore, the EPA has provisions that allow for the confiscation of proceeds of terrorist activities. [113]

Although the PTA does not apply to offenses committed outside of the United Kingdom, section 4 of the Suppression of Terrorism Act of 1978 grants jurisdiction over offenses committed in countries that are members of the European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism. [114] Jurisdiction is also granted over activities related to aviation and maritime security [115] and the taking of hostages. [116]

C. Observations

The United Kingdom has uniformly addressed terrorism under initiatives designed to control the domestic struggle in Northern Ireland. The PTA may have been frantically enacted under the duress of a seemingly uncontrollable IRA bombing campaign of the early 1970s, but it has also been molded into a powerful declaration of the United Kingdom's antiterrorist policy. Similar to the EPA, the PTA is a temporary measure that may one day be repealed entirely. As the United Kingdom attempts to mend its domestic troubles in the future, it will become necessary for the British Government to determine when to retire its temporary antiterrorism legislation altogether. But in the wake of developments of the past century, total abandonment of the Acts could prove unwise and a permanent legislative policy may better serve the interests of the United Kingdom. [*427]

The United Kingdom faces a unique problem in that it must cope with terrorism in essentially two environments. Great Britain has suffered through significant insurgencies, especially those which gave rise to the PTA, but on a scale quite different from that of Northern Ireland. With regard to Northern Ireland, the scars left by centuries of religious discrimination will not be healed by a withdrawal of the British military. There are no legislative initiatives that will be able to reverse the extreme bitterness and hatred between Catholics and Protestants. Furthermore, the presence of heavily armed British soldiers in Northern Ireland over the past two decades has not contributed to the development of a society in which political and social grievances are to be remedied through non-violent processes. The EPA constitutes perhaps the most efficient policy of countering violence that one can expect to be implemented in such an environment. But as its title states, the EPA is an emergency provision and not permanent. One hopes that the emergencies that have necessitated the implementation of the EPA will not only subside in the coming century, but serve as examples of what the people of Northern Ireland must work to avoid in the future.

IV. Israel

Similar to the United Kingdom, Israel's antiterrorism legislation has been shaped by internal threats resulting from centuries of conflict between Jews and Palestinians. [117] The fall of the Ottoman Empire on the eve of World War I gave rise to zealous [*428] Palestinian and Zionist independence movements, [118] both of which were further fueled by the rule of the British Mandate. [119] Israel officially came into being on May 14, 1948, and was immediately declared war upon by the Arab League. [120] An armistice was agreed upon the following year, [121] but major wars again erupted in 1956-57, [122] 1967, [123] 1969-70, [124] 1973, [125] and 1982.

REV_00261461

[126] These intense conflicts led to the Israeli antiterrorism measures in place today.

Palestinian terrorists generally seek to eradicate Israeli society as a whole rather than merely a single political entity or elite. [127] In this respect, Arab states are able to work against Israel, without [*429] being in a state of war, by supporting the activities of radical groups. [128] The recent peace movement has not been received with far-reaching support, especially from radical factions of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) and organizations like Hamas and the Islamic Jihad. Nor has the Israeli government's cooperation with the Palestinians been widely supported by Israeli militants, as demonstrated by the assassination of Yitzak Rabin by a radical Jewish student. Achieving a lasting peace in this region will be a painstakingly long process that undoubtedly will be challenged by both Israeli and Palestinian terrorists.

A. Insurgent Organizations

Until 1993, the PLO operated under the Palestine National Charter [129] which explicitly states that the only way to liberate Palestine is through armed struggle. [130] The PLO, however, has since agreed to assume responsibility for public order and security in Gaza and Jericho, and to work toward preventing acts of terrorism, crime, and other hostilities. [131] This change in policy was made possible by the September 13, 1993, Peace Accord between the PLO and Israel, which "allowed mutual recognition and the eventual creation of an autonomous Palestinian government under PLO auspices within the West Bank and Gaza Strip." [132]

Prior to this peace agreement, groups affiliated with the PLO pursued policies of terrorism designed to eradicate the Jewish State. The Al-Fatah, [133] formed by Palestinian exiles in Kuwait in 1957, mounted border raids into Israel in 1965 and became the military [*430] arm of the PLO under the direction of Yassir Arafat in the late 1960s. [134] The Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1982, and an air raid on the PLO's Tunisian headquarters in 1985, forced the Al-Fatah to relocate in several Mid-East countries. [135] Al-Fatah received some diplomatic leverage when, in 1988, Arafat reiterated the group's renunciation of terrorism and acknowledged Israel's right to exist before the United Nations. [136] But this international goodwill was damaged when Al-Fatah openly sided with Iraq during the Gulf War. [137]

Internal divisions over the Palestinian-Israeli peace agreements still plague the Popular Struggle Front (PSF), [138] which rejoined the PLO in 1991 after suspending its membership in 1974. [139] The Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (DFLP), [140] which has always advocated the position that the formation of a Palestinian state does not require the destruction of Israel, had been coping with internal struggles and break-away factions prior to the Peace Accord. [141] The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), [142] whose inflexible Marxist ideology generated [*431] several internal disputes which led to the formation of other terrorist organizations, such as the PFLP-General Command (PFLP-GC) [143] and the Arab Organization of 15 May, [144] has suspended its participation in the PLO to continue a campaign of violence. [145]

A number of organizations not affiliated with the PLO continue to support the violent eradication of Israel. The Hizballah, [146] which is primarily directed from Iran, [147] seeks to rid the Lebanese region of all non-Islamic influences through a vigorous campaign of terrorism. [148] HAMAS, [149] a loosely-structured orga- [*432] nization that works primarily through mosques to recruit members, raise money, organize activities, and distribute propaganda, has become Al-Fatah's rival since its formation in 1987. [150] Militant factions of Hamas, whose strength is focused in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, have conducted many attacks against Israel civilian and military targets, suspected Palestinian collaborators, and Al-Fatah rivals. [151] The Palestinian Islamic Jihad (PIJ) is actually a cohesive group of several factions which advocate the creation of an Islamic state and the destruction of Israel through holy war. [152] Because the PLO has not been able to successfully control these fundamentalist groups, Israel will be forced to stay alert to continued violence.

REV_00261462

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: ((insurance) /20 war or terrorism) and risk and property and life and (exclusion /20 (war or terrorism)) and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*12 DePaul Bus. L.J. 351, **

Copyright (c) 1999 DePaul University
DePaul Business Law Journal

Fall, 1999 / Spring, 2000

12 DePaul Bus. L.J. 351

LENGTH: 10842 words

ARTICLE: The Role of Insurance in the Battle against Terrorism

Gene Rappe*

* Gene Rappe has worked in the insurance industry for twelve years in a variety of marketing, underwriting, and claims assignments. His opinions are personal and do not reflect the opinion of the insurance industry in general.

SUMMARY:
... Several reasons make this statement relevant: The industry possesses no police power to counter terrorism; it makes no claims of general expertise in the field of study; [1] and it seldom discusses a terrorist event until after the fact. ... [18] They next apply this information to the language of a given insurance policy. ... An insurance policy is considered a policy of adhesion; [26] thus, the insurer decides the terms and the conditions of the policy without input from the potential policy buyer. ... Case law has warned carriers that if courts consider a term in an insurance policy to be ambiguous, the courts will look to the ordinary usage of the term [42] and even consult a dictionary to determine the word's meaning. ... Other products on the insurance market exist to handle the breakdown of electronic equipment, [91] but without such coverage, the business owner would face considerable uninsured losses. ...

TEXT:
[*353]

I. Introduction

Few businesses or arms of government would consider the insurance industry as an important component in the fight against terrorism. Several reasons make this statement relevant: The industry possesses no police power to counter terrorism; it makes no claims of general expertise in the field of study; [1] and it seldom discusses a terrorist event until after the fact. [2] Yet despite the industry's apparent lack of presence in the general discussion of the subject, one should not dismiss the insurance industry as irrelevant. In fact, the insurance industry has much to offer in the battle against terrorism.

The industry [3] employs many experts in the fields of risk control, disaster preparedness, and claims payment. Within the framework of this expertise, industry risk control representatives are able to recommend ways to "harden a business." Disaster preparedness experts, employed by carriers, plan to direct company resources to deal with mass disaster. [4] Claims representatives, after a loss, measure damage and make payments to insureds in accordance

REV_00261490

Further suppose the terrorist attacks a water supply and an employee at a business location drinks water while at work and dies. This certainly suggests that the water in the building's pipes is contaminated and, by extension, the building is now contaminated. The industry does not normally contemplate damaged water as the trigger. Typically, it implies coverage in the event that water causes the damage, however, the term remains undefined. Ambiguities under insurance policies are resolved in favor of the insured as previously discussed.

Though few chemical weapons attacks have occurred in the United States, government officials routinely state it is not a question of if, but rather of when. [80] John Deutsch, a former Director of Central Intelligence, points to a disturbing new terrorist trend spreading across the globe. He believes that more and more terrorists are using powerful explosives to attack mass-civilian targets. [81]

c. Nuclear Weapons

Next, we turn to those weapons constructed with radioactive elements. [82] Typically, we think of nuclear and thermonuclear [*374] weapons; however, non-fissile, "dirty" radioactive weapons also exist. Non-fissile weapons do not achieve nuclear reaction; they explode as conventional bombs. Because they are built with a component of radioactive isotopes, these elements spread out to poison the land and people with whom they come in contact.

Fissile nuclear weapons deliver five primary damage effects upon detonation: blast, heat, electromagnetic pulse, and direct and residual radiation. [83] With the exception of the last three items, nuclear weapons are similar to conventional bombs although their explosive force is enormously more powerful. [84]

Were blasts and heat the only sources of damage from a fissile weapon, it is likely that a policy would similarly respond to such events as it would to any other bomb blast claim (notwithstanding the potential war exclusion being raised). However, such super weapons yield a deadly flux of radioactive particles and electromagnetic pulse ("EMP") in addition to their more conventional effects. [85]

EMP arises when charged particles at the point of detonation move away from ground zero at the speed of light in the form of electromagnetic waves, not unlike the motion of radio waves. [86] These particles travel along wires, pipes, and conduits. [87] They travel through the air to find antennas. [88] They are attracted to any conductor. [89] From the conductor, the particles jump to attached electronic equipment and destroy it. [90] Even if a building escapes the tremendous blast and thermal radiation, it may sustain damage to its wiring and electronic components from the effects of EMP. [*375]

The business owner would find that the typical property policy contains the aforementioned electronic exclusion. Other products on the insurance market exist to handle the breakdown of electronic equipment, [91] but without such coverage, the business owner would face considerable uninsured losses.

Fissile weapons create two types of radiation. [92] The first form of radiation is immediate radiation in the form of deadly gamma and x-rays. [93] These exist for relatively short periods of time, but are particularly harmful to people within the lethal zone. [94] The lethal zone is where the radioactive dose delivered exceeds 1,000 REMS (radiation effects in man). [95] The zone is not uniform in size and is contingent upon the weapon's yield, height of burst and duration of fireball, to name a few factors. [96] Again, we would expect life insurance, benefits, worker's compensation policies, and health policies to respond to such injuries.

Residual radiation comprises the second form of radiation. [97] This is known as fallout. [98] When a nuclear fireball touches the ground, it throws radioactive particles into the air. [99] These particles descend and contaminate the land or property. [100] Some have short lives while particles of other isotopes linger. [101] [*376] This effect encounters a potential exclusion under property policies' nuclear exclusion, as previously discussed.

REV_00261499

Recall that the ISO exclusion states that the policy will not pay for nuclear radiation or radioactive contamination, however caused. It does not, however, take away the coverage for ensuing fire. Some carriers issue proprietary coverage forms that might include a small sub-limit for radiation coverage; [102] however, this coverage is extremely limited in scope. [103] In most instances, a business would not likely find many policies that contain this type of coverage and would therefore face uninsured losses.

As the business owner can readily see, insurance plays an important role in one's planning in the fight against terrorism. While policies of insurance do not cover every possible loss scenario, the insurance industry provides a potential source of assistance in advance of any attack and after an attack, thereby helping a business return to its normal operations following a terrorist attack.

D. Are Insurers ready for the task?

Even as one contemplates the assistance that insurers can provide policy holders, one must question whether or not insurers should cover these types of losses in full, or if they should be circumscribed in some form. Domestic carriers do not have experience in dealing with multiple terrorist attacks and the subsequent damages created. If damages become exceedingly great, with attacks occurring more regularly, carriers might restrict coverage, such was the case in the United Kingdom. [104] Such a response, by [*377] American insurers, would be anti-consumer, on the one hand, but self-protective on the other. For even as carriers review damages, caused by terrorists, and claims are adjusted and paid, a carrier's expected claims losses continue.

Currently, policies of insurance cover damages resulting from terrorism (notwithstanding the aforementioned exclusions). However, because the incidence is currently low, carriers do not specifically factor terrorism rating charges into either the group I or group II property insurance premiums. [105] Similarly, life insurance companies, who use mortality tables to assist with their actuarial rating, do not contemplate the sudden death of several hundred policyholders at one moment. [106] Current coverage could change if terrorists were to create vast destruction in this country. One reason that carriers exclude damages for war is because carriers cannot actuarially rate for such massive calamity. War, by its very nature, is not predictable, and its damages are not truly insurable. Terrorists are capable of creating warlike damages given the right type of weapons and opportunity.

While it is difficult to say with certainty how hypothetical terrorist attacks might affect a carrier's bottom line, or even its financial solvency, we can state that such attacks will detrimentally affect profitability. Carriers must remain profitable in order to address the needs of all policyholders throughout a given year. Therefore, carriers need to examine whether or not it is appropriate to exclude any damages arising out of terrorist's actions, to limit payment to prescribed sub-limits, or else to determine a way [*378] to rate for the potential loss and to build this into pricing mechanisms. In the meantime, carriers will continue to address loss on a case-by-case basis.

IV. Insurer Vulnerabilities

Insurers deal with catastrophic loss every year. Tornadoes, hurricanes, earthquake, and large fires generate tremendous losses that concern carriers. [107] One can read most any insurance company's Third Quarter Financial Report to find a paragraph about the impact of catastrophic losses on a company's bottom line. [108] In fact, insurance companies buy insurance on their own books of business (called reinsurance), in part, to offset the financial consequences of large losses. [109]

REV_00261500

Carriers are vulnerable to losses caused by terrorists in two areas: (1) direct losses to their own facilities as a result of the effects of a weapon; and (2) significant damage losses sustained by policy holders as a result of powerful weapons of mass destruction. n110As to the former issue, a carrier might even be the target of a terrorist. Large insurance companies, as they are in the financial services sector of the economy, represet potentially appealing targets due to their prominence, relative ease of access, large numbers of people on site, the financial disruption such an attack would create to a large area, and finally for the press such an attack would be certain to generate.

Insurers take preventive measures against business disruption arising from a terrorist attack. As examples of such measures, insurers constantly back up their records and store the dup [*379] licate data off site. [111] Most major insurance companies limit access to their property through the use of guarded security checkpoints located at their entryways. For example, one can find this feature in the lobbies of SAFECO Insurance Company located in Seattle, Washington and St. Paul Insurance Company in St. Paul, Minnesota. One may also observe that additional security measures include the use of identification badges issued to employees and guests as well as the requirement for visitors to sign a log-in book. Furthermore, insurance companies purchase reinsurance on their books of business in order to protect against extraordinary and unforeseen losses, and to stabilize their business in the face of wide swings in profit and loss margins inherent in the insurance business. [112] Nevertheless, tremendous chaos would ensue in the aftermath of an attack against the corporate facilities of an insurance company.

V. Conclusion

Carriers have much to offer policyholders in the way of possible loss preventive services. Carriers excel at mitigating loss severity and frequency before it happens, whether or not the damages arise out of natural or man-made catastrophe. After a loss, carriers assist businesses to reestablish commerce through quick evaluation and payment of claims per the terms of their policies. At issue for business owners are considerations that surround their own business exposures as they relate to insurance policy coverage and exclusions. Many losses will be covered under current property policies. Businesses may find themselves uninsured or underinsured when faced with pollution claims, electronic damage claims, radiological claims, or war claims.

Carriers also have much at stake. Domestic insurers have never faced massive recurring losses attributable to terrorist activity. Profitability may suffer and degraded service to other policyholders might arise as a result of terrorist actions. Carriers need [*380] to contemplate whether or not they wish to continue to insure these types of catastrophic damages or whether they should limit coverage through sub-limits or higher deductibles.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 One possible exception to this statement is the specialized kidnap and ransom coverage provided by some insurers.

n2 An electronic database search yielded 15 articles in periodicals, published between 1985 and 2000, that for the most part, dealt with insurance and terrorism in the United Kingdom. Search of Infotrack Library (Dec. 5, 1999) (using the search words "insurance and terrorism").

n3 For the purposes of this article, industry includes insurance carriers and insurance agencies.

n4 1 James J. Markham, Insurance Institute of America, Property Loss Adjusting 91 (1st ed. 1990) [hereinafter 1 Markham].

n5 Id. at 172-175 (defining the scope of an adjuster's duties following a loss assignment).

REV_00261501

n6 1 Markham, supra note 4, at 51 (describing exclusions generally and listing war as an uninsurable peril).

n7 Loss control is referred to as risk control.

n8 Sam Howe Verhovek, Uncertainty Pains Oklahoma City, N.Y. Times, July 2, 1995, at 18 (noting that "six other structures collapsed and more than 300 were damaged").

n9 U.S. State Department, Travel Warnings & Consular Information Sheets, (visited Mar. 29, 2000) <http://travel.state.gov/travelwarnings.html>.

n10 The 1993 World Trade Center bombing in New York and the 1995 Oklahoma City attack.

n11 2 James J. Markham, Insurance Institute of America, Property Loss Adjusting 198-200 (1st ed. 1990).

n12 Samuel L. Glasstone et al., The Effects of Nuclear Weapons 158-160 (3rd ed. 1977) (comparing the effects of the nuclear blasts in Hiroshima and Nagasaki on buildings constructed from various materials).

n13 1 Markham, supra note 4, at 220.

n14 1 Markham, supra note 4, at 176.

n15 This is common industry practice.

n16 1 Markham, supra note 4, at 220 (discussing this process in the context of the duties of the adjuster).

n17 Id. at 218-223 (providing an "Overview of the Adjustment Process").

n18 Id. at 222.

n19 Id. at 91 (introducing the process for determining the amount of recovery).

n20 1 Markham, supra note 4, at 49 (providing guidance on understanding the nature of reading the exceptions to the definition of peril and the exceptions to exclusions).

n21 The reader should be aware that while this article puts forth a good faith effort to address insurance policy coverage issues, it is not the intention of the author to pre-adjust a business' loss nor is it the author's desire to cover every conceivable loss scenario.

n22 Other insurance products provide coverage for liability, work place injury, long term disability, health benefits, etc. These are not property policies.

n23 Likewise, life and health policies, benefits policies, and other policies that pay for the injuries or deaths people sustain as a result of covered loss, contain similar, but not identical coverage.

n24 Many Insurance companies subscribe to the Insurance Services Office (ISO). ISO, a New York based operation, publishes common insurance policy language, promulgates loss costs that carriers use to help determine their rates, establishes rules for classifying business operations, and provides other generic insurance services to the insurance industry. For further information about the ISO, see Welcome to Insurance Services Office, Inc. (visited Mar. 3, 2000) <http://www.iso.com>.

REV_00261502

n25 For example, compare Chubb, St. Paul, ISO, SAFECO, and Reliance property extensions. Each contains similar yet distinct coverage provisions (to review and compare policies, obtain them from a broker, carrier or insurance commissioner).

n26 Eric A. Wiening et al., Insurance Contract Analysis 377 (1st ed. 1992) (stating that "insurance policies are contracts of adhesion").

n27 Donald L. Hirsch et al., Casualty Claim Practice 145 (5th ed. 1992) (providing an example of how courts handle this unequal bargaining position when interpreting an ambiguity in the contract).

n28 See Hirsch et al., supra note 27, at 145 (insurance consumers generally cannot bargain for a policy's construction because it is non-negotiable).

n29 1 Markham, supra note 4, at 49 (explaining the role of definitions).

n30 Id. at 47-48 (discussing "all-risks" coverage).

n31 Causes of Loss Special Form CP1030, Insurance Services Office 1 (June 1995) (on file with author).

n32 Id.

n33 1 Markham, supra note 4, at 48-49 (discussing "all-risks" policies and the corresponding burden of proof placed on the insurer).

n34 Id.

n35 Pan Am. World Airways, Inc. v. Aetna Cas. and Sur. Co., 505 F.2d 989, 999. (2d Cir. 1974).

n36 Pan Am. World Airways, Inc. v. Aetna Cas. and Sur. Co., 505 F.2d 989, 999. (2d Cir. 1974).

n37 Sherwin-Williams Co. v. Insurance Co. of the State of Pennsylvania, 863 F. Supp. 542, 546, aff'd 105 F.3d 258 (N.D. Ohio 1994).

n38 Causes of Loss Special Form CP1030, Insurance Services Office 2-4 (June 1995) (on file with author).

n39 See Causes of Loss Special Form CP1030, supra note 38, at 2.

n40 Id. at 3.

n41 Building and Personal Property Coverage Form CP0010, Insurance Services Office 10 (June 1995) (on file with author).

n42 Joseph v. Utah Home Fire Ins. Co., 835 P.2d 885, 887 (Or. 1992).

n43 Smith v. State Farm Ins., 927 P.2d 111, 114 (Or. App. 1996).

n44 Building and Personal Property Coverage Form CP0010, Insurance Services Office 10 (June 1995) (on file with author).

n45 Causes of Loss Special Form CP1030, Insurance Services Office 7 (June 1995) (on file with author).

n46 Causes of Loss Special Form CP1030, Insurance Services Office 1 (June 1995) (on file with author).

n47 See Glasstone et al., supra note 12, at 1-2 (covering additional effects of nuclear weapons in the damages discussion).

n48 Causes of Loss Special Form CP1030, Insurance Services Office 2 (June 1995) (on file with author).

n49 Pan Am. World Airways, Inc. v. Aetna Cas. and Sur. Co., 505 F.2d 989, 999 (2d Cir. 1974).

n50 See 18 U.S.C. § 2332b(g)(5) (Supp. II 1996).

n51 Hague Convention IV, Oct. 18, 1907, Ch. 1, art. 1.

n52 Id.

n53 Evan Luard, International Recognition of Civil Wars 20-21 (1972) (discussing the disparity in foreign policies adopted by countries in the past, and eliciting past attempts to make international agreements concerning the action of third party countries in civil conflicts).

n54 See Luard, supra note 53, at 170-171.

n55 In Younis Brothers and Co. v. CIGNA Worldwide Ins. Co., the insured owned businesses in Liberia that were damaged by fire and looting, but CIGNA's policy excluded war and the courts upheld that coverage for losses caused by civil war, rebellion, and insurrection were excluded. 91 F.3d 13, 14 (1996) (holding Liberia was in a state of insurrection at the time of the loss). Insurrection is a political movement designed to overthrow a duly constituted government. Id.

n56 An example of such linkage is the airstrikes against Libya in 1986. The reprisal arose in response to Libyan sponsorship of a bombing of a German discotheque, frequented by United States military personnel. Mary Williams Walsh, Germany Finally to Try '86 Disco Bombing Case; Terrorism: Officials Say They At Last Have Answers For The Deadly Blast That Led The U.S. To Attack Libya, L.A. Times, Nov. 18, 1997, at A1.

n57 Pan Am. World Airways, Inc. v. Aetna Cas. and Sur. Co., 505 F.2d 989, 999 (1974).

n58 Id.

n59 1 Markham, supra note 4, at 174-175.

n60 Of Normalcy and Amour Propre, The Economist, Mar. 6, 1993, at 25 (referring to the "best guess of the city comptroller . . .").

n61 See Verhovek, supra note 8, at 18.

n62 Id.

n63 Insurance Information Institute Fact Book 1997, 72 (1996) [hereinafter III Fact Book 1997].

n64 Anthony Spaeth, Engineer of Doom; Cult Leader Shoko Asahara didn't just forecast armageddon, he planned it, Time, June 12, 1995, at 57.

REV_00261504

n65 Some life insurance policies contain a double indemnity clause for murder. Richard Morais, Double indemnity, Forbes, Nov. 18, 1985, at 280.

n66 III Fact Book 1997, supra note 63, at 83.

n67 However, this is not to say that U.S. insurers have not raised the War Exclusion in other parts of the World. See Pan Am. World Airways, Inc. v. Aetna Cas. and Sur. Co., 505 F.2d 989 (1974).

n68 See Spaeth, supra note 64, at 57 (stating that the Aumshin Rikyo cult had the capability to manufacture between 60kg to 80kg per month).

n69 James A. F. Compton, Military Chemical and Biological Agents 4-5 (1987) (discussing their primary purpose in military operations as "to kill, incapacitate, or seriously injure personnel . . .").

n70 Id. at 135 (introducing the operation of nerve agents).

n71 Id. at 6 (introducing the operation of blister agents).

n72 Id. at 87.

n73 See Compton, supra note 69 at 7, 87, 137, 360-404.

n74 Building and Personal Property Coverage Form CP0010, Insurance Services Office 10 (June 1995) (on file with author).

n75 AIG, for example, writes a site specific pollution policy.

n76 St. Paul Companies Premier Property Protection Form F0150, or its 42700 Property Form, for example, offers a $ 25,000 sublimit.

n77 Underwriters may attach total pollution exclusions.

n78 See AIG, supra note 75.

n79 See supra notes 38-40 and accompanying text.

n80 See The White House, Office of the Press Secretary, Remarks by the President To the Opening Session of the 53rd United Nations General Assembly (release date Sept. 21, 1998) (visited Mar. 15, 2000) <http://www.pub.whitehouse.gov/uri-res/I2R?urn:pdi:///oma.eop.gov.us/1998/9/22.2.text.1> (discussing the use of weapons of mass destruction as a violation of Article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights).

n81 John Deutsch, Terrorism, Think Again, Foreign Policy, #108, Fall 1997, at 11.

n82 In recent years, the press has reported uncertainty over the security of the former Soviet Union's stock pile of processed fissile material. See, Pat Towell, Russian Nuclear Material Vulnerable to Theft, Study Says, Cong. Wkly., Feb. 5, 2000, at 265. Such stories leave readers with the worried impression that rogue elements might obtain these elements in sufficient quantities to fabricate a radiological weapon.

n83 See Glasstone et al., supra note 12, at 1 (introducing the characteristics of nuclear explosions).

n84 Id.

REV_00261505

n85 Id. at 1-2, 632 (providing a formal definition of an EMP).

n86 Id. at 514-517 (describing the "origin and nature of the EMP").

n87 See Glasstone et al., supra note 12, at 520.

n88 Id. at 516.

n89 Id. at 515-520.

n90 Id. at 516.

n91 A business owner should contact their insurance agent to discuss the availability of boiler and machinery or breakdown coverage. Some breakdown coverage comes with computer policies.

n92 See Glasstone et al., supra note 12, at 1-2.

n93 Id. at 568-575 (describing the biological effects of nuclear injuries).

n94 Id. at 580-81 (providing a chart that summarizes clinical effects of acute ionizing radiation doses).

n95 Id. at 576 (defining the method of deriving the "biological dose," or RBE dose, which is stated in terms of REM (roentgen equivalent (in man)).

n96 See Glasstone et al., supra note 12, at 580-586.

n97 Id. at 1-2.

n98 Id. at 633 (defining fallout).

n99 Id.

n100 See Glasstone et al., supra note 12, at 633.

n101 Id. at 600 (linking the length of time an isotope will linger to that element's biological half-life).

n102 St. Paul Companies Premier Property Protection Form F0150, at 9 (Jan. 1998) (on file with author).

n103 Id. The additional coverage benefit applies to radioactive contamination that arises out of material at a covered location, radioactive material used in operations, but it must not arise out of a nuclear reactor or out of nuclear fuel.

n104 In the United Kingdom, insurers and government established Pool Reinsurance Co. Ltd. in 1993 due to IRA attacks. Insurers pay the first 100,000 Pounds Sterling before the government steps in to act as the insurer of last resort. Carolyn Aldred, UK Terrorism Market Softens, Bus. Ins., Dec. 15, 1997, at 19.

n105 Typical factors include fire, wind, vandalism, and other forces of nature and man. Terrorism is neither a group I or group II peril. This is common industry practice (opinion of the author based on experience).

n106 Life insurance mortality tables provide life expectancy data for people. Such tables are actuarially generated based upon mortality data of given age groups. The data is based upon natural occurring death rates. This is common industry practice (opinion of the author based on experience).

n107 .III Fact Book 1997, supra note 63, at 80-83.

n108 By way of example, three large insurance companies' Third Quarter results:

Chubb Group, 1999 Third Quarter Financial Statement, at 1 (1999); SAFECO Corporation, 1999 Third Quarter Financial Statement, at 2 (1999); Traveler's Group 1999 Third Quarter Financial Statement, at 1 (1999).

n109 This is common industry practice (opinion of the author based on experience).

n110 See supra notes 59-62 and accompanying text.

n111 .This is common industry practice (opinion of the author based on experience).

n112 Insurance Information Institute Fact Book 2000, 18 (1999).

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: ((insurance) /20 war or terrorism) and risk and property and life and (exclusion /20 (war or terrorism)) and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 2, 2001 - 10:00 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

with the terms of insurance contracts. [5] Rapid payment of claims enables victims of catastrophic damage to return to business after a loss has occurred.

While insurers have much to offer their policyholders, a question arises as to whether a carrier should cover certain losses in the first place. Modern day weapons of mass destruction are [*354] sufficiently powerful to create damages so destructive that such damages might be analogous to destruction caused by war. Most policies exclude damages arising out of war because of the inability to underwrite for such an exposure. [6] Furthermore, insurers can sustain physical damage to their own facilities and to the assets upon which they rely for capital to pay claims.

The industry has much to offer its policyholders in the battle against terrorism. However, potential industry vulnerabilities to damages created by a terrorist act, in conjunction with the normal, ongoing, expected losses a carrier anticipates paying every year, might cause an insurer to reconsider if it should pay for terrorist-caused damages. On the other hand, deciding to restrict or limit payments to policyholders suffering from destruction brought on by a terrorist act is, at the very least, an anti-consumer position for a carrier to take.

This article attempts to examine the role of insurance in the context of potential damages, brought upon by acts of terrorism, to business. It further illustrates current insurance industry response to terrorist threats before and after such an event occurs.

II. Business Vulnerabilities to Terrorist Attack

The owner of a business should consider its vulnerabilities to a terrorist's attack in planning for contingencies arising out of interruption to their operations. Such consideration revolves around business operations that can be modified, as well as aspects and practices of the business that are not so easy to change. Industry loss control [7] employees can work with business owners to better facilitate a return to business operations following a terrorist's attack.

Naturally, some businesses are more likely to be targets of terrorists than others. For instance, large multinational corporations may have greater exposure to this threat than a corner drug store because of their reputation, product manufactured, or their relationship to a powerful nation. However, smaller businesses [*355] may suffer significant damage due to their close proximity to a large corporate facility. Indeed, in Oklahoma City, structures nearby the Murrah Federal Building sustained damage. [8] Similarly, in the recent attacks against United States' embassies in East Africa, nearby structures also sustained damage.

The Department of State routinely issues terrorist threat warnings, indicating the possibility of attack against U.S. citizens or corporations overseas. [9] Whether large or small, domestic or abroad, businesses may be able to employ the talents of insurance industry risk control experts to help with contingency planning in reducing their exposures to a terrorist's actions.

As a matter of practical consideration, business owners already contemplate scenarios giving rise to the loss of their operations. Fire, earthquake, severe wind, and theft, to name but a few, are perils businesses face every day. These prevalent dangers serve as the fundamental reasons businesses purchase insurance policies in the first place because it is far more likely that a business will suffer damage at the hands of nature or through the carelessness of man than they will at the hands of a terrorist, given that only two catastrophic terrorist actions have taken place in the United States in the past decade. [10] This is not to suggest that a business should summarily dismiss the threat of terrorism.

III. The Insurance Industry's Response

A. Risk Control, Contingency Planning and Disaster Preparedness

REV_00261491

Risk control employees routinely work with business owners to plan means by which they can recover after sustaining [*356] a loss, regardless of whether the loss is generated by the forces of nature or by the hand of man. Both causes of loss can be catastrophic in nature and the damage may be partial or complete. The reader should understand that risk control employees probably cannot answer a question of how to defend against nuclear attack, but they can respond to questions regarding the best means to protect against high winds, or to control fire spread. While risk control employees may not be experts in the field of terrorism, they are experts in the control of loss.

One mission of a risk control department is to provide advice on the best means by which an insured can mitigate damage before it happens. Many suggestions may be practices already in existence, while other ideas may never have been considered, but are quite simple to implement. In planning and preparing against harm caused by acts of terrorism, a business's overall goal should be to implement mechanisms that harden their operations against any possible damages caused by such acts.

Relevant risk control activities business persons must consider include: continuation of production; storage; electronic file backup; redundant production; property; suppliers; vehicles; and security of premises. These risk control alternatives allow businesses to employ industry practices in order to reduce the consequences of catastrophe well in advance of any possible loss.

1. Continuation of Production

A business owner, prior to sustaining a loss, should negotiate a mutual arrangement with an industry competitor that allows each to continue their individual business product's production at the other's location in the event of damage to their own facilities. Such arrangements might agree to additional shifts to continue production, as well as charge an extra amount of profit for the arrangement. Insurance extra expense coverage helps to defray this cost after a covered loss is sustained. [11] [*357]

2. Storage

Another means of insuring against loss caused by terrorist activity is for businesses to disperse their storage so that no single calamity destroys a significant portion of their stock.

3. Electronic file backup

Businesses should make copies of the electronic records generated and store them off site. Performance of this task should occur at least daily. Such practice will ensure that important documents are not destroyed in the event of a terrorist event. In general, it is sound business practice to back up records upon which a business relies for its own financial interests. Furthermore, in the event of loss, backup records will serve as important documentation to support claims made under the insurance policy.

4. Redundant Production

Larger companies may be able to shift production from one site to another, thereby ensuring continuation of operations. Businesses with redundant production capability in a facility distant from the location sustaining damage will have their operations less interrupted and may resume normal business practice with greater ease than businesses that do not benefit from the ability to shift production.

5. Property

The structural integrity of the business's building should be considered from the standpoint of the survivability of the premises (i.e. how quickly it can recover after damage) as well as the survivability of the people who work within its four walls. Just as fire doors, sprinklers, firewalls and separations help to [*358] stop the spread of fire, concrete reinforced buildings withstand blast, even nuclear blast, better than wooden buildings. [12]

6. Suppliers

Businesses should attempt to conduct business deals with suppliers that will not similarly suffer damage from the same terrorist attack, should such an attack occur. It stands to reason that distant suppliers are not as susceptible to the damage created in the attack affecting the business entity at hand. In addition, the existence of several interchangeable suppliers, if possible, will ease the maintenance of confidentiality.

7. Vehicles

Businesses should disperse large auto fleets, if possible, to avoid simultaneous destruction.

8. Security of premises

Businesses should consider extra security measures such as fences, cameras, and lights as a means of further securing the premises of their operations. Such practice encourages potential attackers to find easier alternative targets to strike.

B. Rapid claims settlement and the return to business operations after a terrorist attack

Once a terrorist attack occurs, the industry's primary response is to assess damages and to indemnify its policy holders, per the terms of an insurance policy, as applied to the fact situation of the loss. [13] Carriers dispatch their claims representatives to [*359] assess damage. [14] And companies will adjust capital reserves to enable a carrier to meet its financial obligations to its policyholders. [15]

Concurrent with assessing damages, insurance companies review the policies covering the damage to determine the extent of insurance coverage. [16] Carriers examine the factual situation surrounding the loss. [17] They determine the cause of the loss and nature of the damages. [18] They next apply this information to the language of a given insurance policy. [19] A business owner must understand that a carrier refers to the language in the policy when an insurer examines losses to decide whether they will ultimately pay a claim in full, limit payment, or deny payment.

The provisions of the policy consist of various clauses, but two important policy provisions are the insuring agreement and the exclusions. These provisions are important to the policyholder because they determine what types of events are covered, the nature of the property that is covered, and, by way of exclusion, what sort of property or perils are excluded.

If the facts of the loss and extent of damages constitute a peril insured under the policy and no exclusions exist to eliminate coverage, the claim is paid. [20] If no covered peril exists or an exclusion operates to preclude insurance coverage, or in some instances, sub-limit coverage to a certain dollar amount, the carrier may deny payment of the claim or pay the sub-limit for the loss. In either instance, a business may find itself facing uninsured losses. [*360]

Therefore, with respect to the general discussion of terrorism and insurance, a business owner must understand the exposure he or she faces, the nature of the potential for coverage available to the business under the insuring provisions, and the potential for exclusions to eliminate or limit insurance coverage. Understanding this, the business owner can identify gaps in insurance coverage and take action to redress given risk transfer deficiencies.

C. Insurance Policies

REV_00261493

1. Property Policies

Many types of insurance policies exist that potentially cover the damages and losses caused by the destructive acts of terrorists. [21] For the purpose of this article, the insurance policy focus will be limited to property and inland marine policies that indemnify a business' property losses and income stream. However, the businesses insured must also give serious consideration to health, life, and worker's compensation policies because weapons, after all, kill and injure people in addition to their ability to destroy property.

Property policies consist of the following general categories: commercial property policies that cover building, contents, and loss of income; inland marine policies that essentially cover moveable property owned by a business; and automobile policies that cover the physical damage of automobiles owned by a business. [22]

In general, one can say that the commercial property policies of various insurance companies are similar, but not [*361] identical. [23] Commercial property policies outline what is covered and state a limit of coverage. They contain provisions that tell what an insured must do in the event of loss, describe how losses are adjusted and what form of cooperation is expected of an insured, and contain insuring provisions and exclusions.

Certain carriers publish their own proprietary language policies, while other carriers adopt more common insurance policy language generated by the Insurance Services Office Incorporated ("ISO"). [24] Even carriers that adopt ISO language policies might make certain proprietary changes to policy language or provide various property coverage enhancements in order to differentiate themselves from their competitors. [25]

The point is that one must understand the coverage they have purchased for their business not only in the context of terrorist inflicted damages, but for all types of potential losses.

An insurance policy is considered a policy of adhesion; [26] thus, the insurer decides the terms and the conditions of the policy without input from the potential policy buyer. [27] Like any [*362] contract, the customer can accept the policy as offered or reject it. Because of this concept, it is a well-founded principle in the insurance industry that any policy ambiguity favors the insured. [28] Thus, the policy contains many definitions of terms in order to provide clarity and to avoid ambiguity. [29]

i. All Risk Policies

The insurance industry offers broadly worded property policies. These policies are called "all risk" policies because they cover a vast number of perils subject to various exclusions. [30] For example, consider an ISO language policy. The insuring agreement states, in its "Causes of Loss-Special Form," that "when special is shown in the declarations, covered causes of loss means risks of direct physical loss unless the loss is (1) excluded in section B, exclusions; or (2) limited in section C, limitations...." [31] Under the broad language of "all risk" policies, an insured will assert that a covered loss was sustained. [32] Case law generally holds that insurance carriers have the burden of proof to demonstrate the operation of an exclusion. [33] If the carrier cannot prove such an existence, the carrier must pay the claim. [34] Pan American World Airways, Inc. v. Aetna Casualty and Surety Co. illustrates this view and in addition provides further examples specific to the discussion of insurance and terrorism. [35]
[*363]

While this proposition appears to be the prevailing view, the Northern District Court in Ohio took a counter viewpoint in Sherwin-Williams Co. v. Insurance Co. of the State of Pennsylvania, holding that losses are covered under an "all risk" policy unless the insurer specifically asserted that an exclusion applied. [36] The court further postulated that the burden of proof shifted to the insured to prove that the loss was covered. [37]

REV_00261494

For a business that is contemplating insurance coverage for terrorist-inflicted damage, these are significantly important factors. While it may initially appear that terrorist-caused destruction is covered under a policy, several exclusions may, in fact, serve to limit or eliminate coverage.

ii. Four General Exclusions Under Property Insurance Policies

Although the facts surrounding the terrorist induced loss may vary, it is in the business owner's best interest to fully contemplate four general exclusions that are frequently considered by an insurer. These exclusions include: electrical damage, pollution, nuclear, and war. [38] Because of the nature of the weapon system employed, the effects of the weapon, or the political status of the group employing the weapon that causes the damage, an insurer may raise one or more of these exclusions as policy defenses. As discussed previously, under a broadly phrased property policy, a carrier must generally prove the operation of one of these exclusions if they deny a claim.

a. Electrical Damage Exclusion

The electrical damage exclusion states, in pertinent part, that the insurer "will not pay for loss or damage caused by or re [*364] sulting from...artificially generated electric current, including electric arcing, that disturbs electrical devices, appliances or wires." [39] This exclusion could arise in the aftermath of the detonation of a nuclear bomb.

b. Pollution Exclusion

The pollution exclusion states, in pertinent part, that the insurer "will not pay for loss or damage caused by or resulting from...discharge, seepage, migration, release or escape of 'pollutants' unless the discharge, dispersal, seepage, migration, release or escape is itself caused by any of the 'specified causes of loss.' But if loss or damage by the 'specified causes of loss' results, we will pay for the resulting damage caused...." [40]

The terms "pollutants" and "specified causes of loss" are terms that are commonly defined in the insured's policy. [41] As discussed, carriers define such terms in order to avoid future ambiguity and prospective litigation. Case law has warned carriers that if courts consider a term in an insurance policy to be ambiguous, the courts will look to the ordinary usage of the term [42] and even consult a dictionary to determine the word's meaning. [43] Thus, a biological toxin or some form of nerve agent or other chemical weapon would indeed meet the definition of "pollutant." [44]

However, a closer examination of the term, "specified causes of loss," is warranted for the review of an ISO "all risk" policy. Specified causes of loss means, in pertinent part, "fire...explosion...riot or civil commotion, vandalism...or water [*365] damage." [45] Thus, it would appear that the exclusion is not absolute, for if one of the specified causes of loss were to give rise to the damage, coverage could be available up to the limit or sublimit of insurance issued under the policy.

c. Nuclear Exclusion

The nuclear exclusion states, in pertinent part, that the insurer "will not pay for loss or damage caused directly or indirectly by...nuclear radiation, or radioactive contamination, however caused. But if loss by fire results, we will pay for that resulting loss or damage." [46] This exclusion is applicable in the event a terrorist employs a radiological weapon of any variety. Notice, however, that while fire related losses are covered, nuclear weapons yield other damaging effects besides those of blast and heat. [47]

d. War Exclusion

REV_00261495

The war exclusion states, in pertinent part, that the insurer "will not pay for loss or damage caused directly or indirectly by...(1) war, including undeclared or civil war; (2) warlike action by a military force, including action in hindering or defending against an actual or expected attack, by any government, sovereign or other authority using military personnel or other agents; or (3) insurrection, rebellion, revolution, usurped power, or action taken by governmental authority in hindering or defending against any of these." [48] [*366]

Complex issues arise out of this exclusion. For instance, one might analogize to the old cliche that one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter, implying the notion that a terrorist may perhaps be a soldier.

While an insurance carrier may attempt to raise this exclusion under certain terrorism scenarios, on the whole, it would be difficult for a carrier to prove that a terrorist's actions fall under the ambit of the war exclusion. [49] To simply state that a terrorist is a soldier and that the war exclusion applies would not likely be provable by an insurer because the United States defines a terrorist as a criminal, not as a soldier. [50]

Questions remain as to what constitutes a war, a warlike force or what signifies a military force. Legal scholars and academics continuously debate these complicated issues. International conventions, specifically the Hague Convention of 1907 and the Geneva Conventions of 1949, provide further clarification on such issues, classifying who is a combatant, a belligerent, and a guerilla fighter.

To fall under the protective provisions of the Hague Convention, a soldier must act in a prescribed manner. [51] A responsible person must command him, carry arms openly, wear distinctive insignia, and operate lawfully in accordance with the laws and customs of war. [52] Terrorists typically fall short of acting in accordance with some or all of the provisions.

International customs and conventions govern forms of belligerency, though there may not actually be a universal international agreement of these customs. [53] International law suggests that a sovereign may recognize rebellions or insurrections within [*367] a country, but that certain conditions must prevail before a group might be recognized as a belligerency. Three general conditions typically are cited: (1) belligerents must occupy and administer a substantial part of territory; (2) they must adhere to the rules of war; and (3) they must be responsive to identifiable authority. [54] Thus, the reader can infer that a belligerent need not be a sovereign nation and that it is not enough to merely claim that a terrorist's actions constitute insurrection or revolution. These are conditions of a legal state that imply some form of sovereignty. [55] The actions of a few individuals rarely meet these high standards.

On the other hand, it may be possible to link the actions of terrorists to that of a sovereign authority. Evidence of such linkage could come in the form of a claim made by a foreign power or by a statement made by the United States government either in words or in deed. [56] However, once the exclusion is proved to be in operation, it precludes all coverage under any policy with such a clause.

In Pan American v. Aetna, the insurance company unsuccessfully argued that the terrorists acted under orders from a political movement or government in the Middle East when they hi-jacked a plane and subsequently destroyed it after forcing the [*368] pilot to land in Egypt. [57] The court held that the terrorist organization was not a government nor were its members acting as belligerents when they destroyed the jet. [58]

2. Assessment of Coverage

Carriers examine damages when investigating a claim. Following a terrorist attack, the carrier determines the cause and origin of such damages. Such an investigation normally reveals the evidence of any issues that might form the basis for raising an exclusion. [59] Examples would include the nature of the weapon employed, and its effects rendered in conjunction with any residues left are all to be taken into consideration in assessing damages.

REV_00261496

i. Types of Damages

a. Property Damage

In comparison to the cost of Mother Nature's calamities, a terrorist's destructive act could ultimately surpass any loss costs paid out for a storm or flood. Consider the cost of the World Trade Center after the blast of 1993, in which estimates of damage approached the one-half billion dollars. [60] Similarly, the 1995 bombing of the Murrah Federal Building, in Oklahoma City, collapsed six other structures and damaged approximately 300 others to some degree. [61] While estimates of those damages vary considerably, one estimate of damage placed costs was approximately six hundred and fifty two million dollars. [62] [*369]

In these events, the damages included structural damage to buildings. Given the insuring agreement previously reviewed and contemplating the policy exclusions, it would seem that a property policy would respond to this type of damage. In these damage scenarios, the proof of a covered peril takes shape in the form of structural damage to a building and loss of its contents. An insurer would not likely prove the operation of an exclusion, with the possible exception of the war exclusion under some scenarios.

b. Death and Human Injuries

Consider the human damage that attacks generate. In Oklahoma City, 168 people were killed from one terrorist event and from one relatively small bomb. [63] And twelve people died and nearly 5,500 sustained injury when a Japanese terrorist group attacked the Tokyo subway system with sarin nerve gas in 1995. [64] These instances generate not only property losses but costs of worker's compensation, disability, health and hospital, and the costs paid for life insurance claims, to name but a few. Imagine the severity of the loss if the Tokyo subway attack resulted in the death of 5,500 people, rather than their actual injury; had the terrorists acted more proficiently, the results would have rendered greater tragedy and costs than actually ensued.

Consider a similar, but hypothetical, attack against a city in the United States. If 5,500 people died in the downtown core of a United States city, as a result of some weapon of mass destruction, life insurance costs alone could run staggeringly high. Even if one makes the conservative assumption that the average life insurance policy of a worker has a value of not more than $ 100,000 per person, the life insurance loss would amount to $ 550,000,000. Some policies have murder clauses that pay in ex [*370] cess of the policy's face value. [65] Also, employees may have additional layers of life insurance through work.

While the life insurance losses from a non-explosive event have been discussed, yet to be considered is the aspect of human injuries and the damage created by possible blast and fire to structures. If the hypothetical case is expanded to include such damages, perhaps to the extent of the damages incurred at the World Trade Center or the Murrah building, the damages measure up to those caused by major natural catastrophes. Consider the following insured losses for some major catastrophic events: 1995 Hurricane Opal $ 2,100,000,000; 1992 Hurricane Andrew $ 15,500,000,000; 1989 Hurricane Hugo $ 4,200,000,000; 1989 Loma Prieta Quake $ 960,000,000. [66]

i) Types of Weapons Employed

a. Traditional Weapons

The type of weapon employed by a terrorist is relevant in order to determine whether an exclusion might operate to limit or eliminate coverage. Historical events demonstrate that terrorists most frequently employ a conventional bomb. The terrorist attacks at the World Trade Center in Oklahoma City and the attacks against the U.S. military installations and embassies overseas most recently evidence the conventional bomb preference. The bombs employed were typically small because they were carried in standard vehicles. In many well-known terrorism events, the terrorists have driven adjacent to or inside of the intended target and exploded their weapons. Damages caused by this type of weapon are likely not excluded and insurers have yet to raise the war exclusion in the United States. [67] This may change if terrorists [*371] step up their operations in this country and if, in so doing, a link to a foreign sovereign is established.

REV_00261497

b. Chemical and Biological Weapons

Terrorists evidently have access to chemical or biological weapons. The sarin nerve agent attack, in Tokyo, appears to be an isolated case, but a frightening case nevertheless because it demonstrates that "ordinary" people, without the backing of industry or government, can manufacture a deadly nerve agent. [68]

Chemical weapons primarily kill and injure people, although some can also persist for some duration as a liquid form to contaminate property. [69] A variety of chemical weapons exist. Nerve agents attack the body's nervous system. [70] Blister agents attack exposed skin and can damage unprotected respiratory systems. [71] Blood agents inhibit the supply of red blood cells moving oxygen in the body. [72] Agents have many names, such as phosgene, mustard gas, sarin, lewisite, soman, VX, and GB. [73] Biological agents, such as anthrax, West Nile encephalitis, and plague also infect people and might constitute "pollutants" under a property policy of insurance, especially if such germs entered the building's water supply. [74]

It is less likely that a life insurance policy will contain a pollution exclusion because many personal life insurance policies contain very few exclusions. While some older policies may contain a war exclusion and a suicide exclusion, this author has [*372] never encountered a pollution exclusion in a life insurance policy. The salient feature the business owner must recognize is that from an insurance standpoint, an attack employing these weapons would result in some form of pollution as defined in most property policies.

Were a business contaminated by such a chemical, notwithstanding any structural damage, it is likely that no employee would return to work until a competent authority certified decontamination of the premises. Thus, the business owner should immediately recognize the first existence of a potential gap in coverage due to the presence of the pollution exclusion. Some insurance products on the market exist to overcome some aspects of the exclusion. [75]

Pollution coverage is a sophisticated specialty area of property insurance. Few companies' policies read identically. Some carriers provide a sub-limit of $ 25,000 for property damage arising out of pollution, [76] while others completely exclude any pollution claims. [77] Still other policies, called site specific insurance policies, provide large limits and broad coverage to clean up contaminated property. [78] However, some of the general exclusions (such as war and nuclear exclusions) are found even in the broadest site-specific policies. Thus, even the most sophisticated pollution policies contain exclusions.

Recall that the particular ISO pollution exclusion policy provides limited coverage under a "specified causes of loss" provision. Such limited coverage includes "fire...explosion...riot or civil commotion, vandalism...or water damage."

[79] Should a terrorist release a chemical weapon through an explosive delivery system, an argument might be made that the trigger for coverage is met (fire or explosion). Likewise, if the terrorist employs nothing more than a vial of anthrax at an in [*373] sured's premises, it is possible that an argument for coverage can be made under an act of vandalism concept.

REV_00261498

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: ((insurance) /20 war or terrorism) and risk and property and life and (exclusion /20 (war or terrorism)) and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

3 U Chi L Sch Roundtable 1

Copyright (c) 1996 University of Chicago
The University of Chicago Law School Roundtable

1996

3 U Chi L Sch Roundtable 1

LENGTH: 20823 words

ARTICLE: Coalitions and Quakes: Disaster Relief and its Prevention

Saul Levmore *

* Saul Levmore is the Brokaw Professor of Corporate Law and the Albert Clart Tate, Jr. Professor at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is grateful to Barry Adler, Duane Benton, Michael Krauss, Robert Rasmussen, Glen Robinson, George Rutherglen, and Peter Swire and to participants at workshops at the University of Michigan, Cornell, and George Mason Law Schools for comments on an earlier version of this project.

SUMMARY:
... Earthquakes and other calamities often generate substantial government- sponsored relief, but because disasters are not always followed by significant taxpayer-financed assistance there is the obvious question of when to expect post-disaster relief. ... If, in order to create or excite a formidable interest group, it is "advanta- geous" for a victim to be one of many ravaged by a given disaster, it is neverthe- less likely that the group of losers can grow too large. ... In contrast, when post- disaster relief is expected (because of sympathy and interest group pressures), "unrelated" interest groups will not oppose dramatically efficient precautions because of the expected savings in post-disaster relief. ... Yet in terms of positive political theory alone, pre-disaster relief, in the form of subsidized insurance, would seem more likely than an equivalent amount (in expected value terms) of post-disaster relief, if only because virtually all members of the interest group would benefit from and, therefore, support the pre-disaster alternative. ... When no relief scheme is in place, every disaster affords an opportunity for an interest group to take advantage of acute sympathy for victims in order to obtain post-disaster relief. ... Similarly, the federal government could, if it wished, find a political and legal means of requiring property owners (in specified regions) to carry earthquake insurance even without the provision of federally-sponsored pre-disaster or post-disaster relief. ...

TEXT:

I. Introduction

Earthquakes and other calamities often generate substantial government- sponsored relief, but because disasters are not always followed by significant taxpayer-financed assistance there is the obvious question of when to expect post-disaster relief. In turn, some understanding of the availability of public subsidies has implications for the structuring of democracies experience hurricanes--but not hurricanes that leave millions without shelter for more than a month. Much as democracies avoid major famines, it should also be the case that floods and earthquakes of comparable magnitude do far more damage in nondemocratic environments. Again, the mechanism that makes this plausible is that where responsive governments are concerned there will often be relief in the event of a major disaster and, in turn, the prospect of this relief sets in motion interests that favor disaster-mitigating investments. There is also the less interesting notion that democratic governments simply intercede more readily once a major disaster is underway.

REV_00261508

The picture thus far is one of partial internalization. Some combination of public and interest-group pressure can be counted on to force occasional post- disaster relief. In the case of certain enormous disasters this relief can be counted on, but in other cases it is expected with some probability between zero and one. And even if these predictions are imperfect, and the source or nature of the public pressure not perfectly specified or well understood, the chance of relief makes at least some pre-disaster investments worthwhile. Citizens or politicians or even selfish interest groups are not so hobbled by collective action problems that they would miss the opportunity to make some of these efficient, pre- disaster investments, but it is unlikely that all desirable precautions are under- taken. This is especially the case because some disasters rarely rise to the level required for "forced" relief arising out of media coverage, sympathy, and the like. Thus, few fires or crimes rise to the level necessary to extract a decent chance of relief even though the government is very much in control of most of the relevant prevention efforts.

To the extent that there is this connection between expected relief payments (arising out of some unspecified mix of sympathy, political coalitions, and the like) and efficient, pre-disaster precautions, the process described here can also provide the underpinning for a normative theory of disaster relief. The implica- tion is that one might favor relief--with some allowances made for moral hazard problems--in order to bring about efficient disaster-mitigating investments. For example, if taxpayer-financed relief appeared inevitable after many violent crimes we might imagine a very different set of interests in favor of gun control, drug decriminalization, prison construction, and school funding. [35] But in the absence of post-disaster relief, we should not expect otherwise unconcerned interest groups to support efficient, pre-disaster precautions.

III. Insurance and relief

A. Insurance and the Likelihood of Relief

If a citizen can be sure of obtaining relief in the event of a given kind of disaster, and if this relief is at the expense of other taxpayers, then quite plainly there will be no need to purchase insurance to cover the potential loss. If, as is almost always the case, relief is less than certain and less than fully compensato- ry, then the citizen faces something of a tradeoff. It is quite likely that the presence of insurance will reduce the likelihood or level of relief, if only because there will be less sympathy from other voters. It is also likely that relief will be available only for uninsured losses. [36] If relief is indeed a function of interest group power and general sympathy, then there may be optimal levels of insur- ance and interest group politics to purchase [37] so that after a disaster there will be some certain amount of insurance coverage and then some probability of relief to cover uninsured losses. But the point here is that there is at least some tradeoff between insurance and "free" relief. In a manner of shorthand, we can imagine situations (or ranges) where individuals will prefer the (increased) potential for post-disaster relief over the purchase of insurance in advance of any disaster. [38] This is hardly a novel suggestion.

The strategic problem implicit in the tradeoff just described is complicated by the fact that insurance will generally cover both individual and widespread losses, while government-sponsored relief will virtually never be available for disasters striking just one, or even several individuals. [39] Conceptually, one might purchase insurance that provided coverage only in the event that the disaster that caused the insured's loss did not do widespread damage, but, practically speak- ing, the existence of such an insurance policy would destroy political sympathy for the victim.

REV_00261517

I am suggesting, then, that since relief is more likely where there is no insurance, and because relief is uncertain in general and unlikely for disasters that strike narrowly, individuals face a difficult problem when they decide how much insurance to buy and how much to invest in interest group formation. There is obviously a technical solution to this wealth maximization problem, although it will differ across individuals according to their perceptions of collective action problems and their attitudes toward risk. Moreover, the "solu- tion" that will occur to individuals seems unfortunate. As already suggested, individuals might purchase less insurance the more they expect widespread losses and then relief. No special moral hazard or other social inefficiency is generated by the purchase of additional insurance for individualized losses alone, but the reality is that the very sale of such policies will reduce the likelihood of relief. I have been unable to find an insurance policy that provides for coverage in the event of flood, fire, or earthquake damage, but then, for example, only half as much coverage in the event that the locality is identified as a recipient of federal disaster relief or in the event that more than one thousand properties are damaged. If coverage cannot be bifurcated in this manner (between widespread and narrow disasters), individuals will buy less insurance the more they expect losses to be relieved. This reduction seems inefficient.

From the perspective of taxpayers at large this tendency seems especially unfortunate (but not particularly inefficient) because the less insurance pur- chased, the more likely the groundswell of sympathy for the victims of disasters. This claim may be most persuasive when put in unscientific terms: television broadcasts of uninsured property owners pointing to their horrible losses will most likely move public opinion in favor of government-financed (as well as private-charitable) relief. A related point is that audiences and voters project from their own circumstances. Most citizens do not have earthquake insurance but do have fire insurance and can therefore more readily favor relief after earthquakes than after fires. [40] In any event, for the present it is sufficient to see that individuals will underinsure because of the potential for relief of uninsured losses.

One obvious solution to this problem is to attempt to develop an expectation that relief will never be available for insurable risks. If individuals do not expect relief for uninsured losses because these losses could have been insured, then there will be no inclination to underinsure in the expectation of relief. Coalitions may or may not succeed in gaining relief after disasters caused by terrorism or war, for example, but inasmuch as insurance is not generally available for losses arising out of these events [41] there is no problem of encouraging "underinsur- ance." Private relief, normally funneled through charitable organizations, might be available for insurable but uninsured losses (and it would be difficult to ban such relief) but direct, publicly-funded relief might be reserved for uninsurable losses. The problem with this "solution" is that it is almost surely politically unacceptable or unworkable. There is no enforceable means of precommitment, no apparent inclination to limit relief to uninsurable losses, and many situations in which some victims of a disaster will be of sufficiently modest means that the decision to do without insurance will seem understandable rather than exces- sively risky or socially exploitative. A more normative project might make the argument that relief ought to be denied where losses would have been insurable, but I take the apparent social taste for relief efforts as given. My positive aim in this Section has been to explain when we might expect post-disaster relief; my normative aim is limited to suggestions that are within the realm of the political- ly acceptable. There is an argument to be made against (and in favor of) virtually all relief, for example, but that is simply not the point of the present project.

B. Promising Relief for Insured Losses

A more modest resolution to the problem caused by the tradeoff between insurance and relief is for the government to attempt to promise, if only through precedent, that when relief is provided it will cover losses whether or not they are insured, even if some insured victims gain recovery exceeding their losses. One reason for this promise is to encourage potential victims to buy the amount of insurance they want without any perceived need to decrease their coverage because of the probability of relief. If a business or residential property owner knows that relief, should it be forthcoming, will be for fifty percent or some other fraction of losses--be they insured or uninsured--then that potential victim will purchase an amount of coverage that comes close to what he or she would purchase in a world in which there were no chance of relief. It is likely that the insured will purchase slightly less insurance in a world where relief is possible, if only because the prospect of relief removes some risk of loss. But if relief is given only for uninsured losses, then it must surely be the case that the prospect of relief will cause substantially less insurance to be purchased. [42] In short, one rea- son to promise relief (even) for insured losses is to lessen the bias toward underinsurance that is introduced by prospective post-disaster relief.

REV_00261518

The prospect of relief in addition to insurance does raise some moral hazard problems. If insurance added to relief holds out the prospect of recoveries exceeding the value (or even the replacement value) of what has been lost, insureds might do such things as bringing their valuables to flood and fire rather than taking them away to higher or safer ground. But because relief is never certain (and insurance comes with deductibles) [43] it is unlikely that insureds will behave in this manner. And as a cautionary measure it is also possible to legislate penalties for such fraudulent behavior. Finally, relief might be limited to cover losses to real property and crops, for example, in order to limit the opportunity for socially destructive but privately profitable behavior, which seems like more of a threat where personal property is concerned.

The most interesting effect of this promise, that if relief is forthcoming it will go to insured and uninsured losses alike, is that as more insurance is purchased, relief itself becomes less likely. [44] As discussed earlier, relief is more likely where there are sympathetic victims and political clout, and the first of these conditions is weakened when there are fewer victims who can claim to have been devastated by the disaster in question. Thus, an airplane crash never seems to elicit relief for the families of those who perish. The suggestion is that an important obstacle to relief is the fact that many of those who die will have substantial life insurance and, in any event, tort recoveries are likely. If television crews had trouble finding flood and earthquake victims who have lost virtually all their worldly goods, or did not find such victims representative, then relief would be much less likely after these disasters as well. Again, even if a potential victim were aware of this connection between insurance and relief, he or she would also realize that the individual decision to purchase insurance has virtually no effect on the probability of relief. However, when many individuals purchase insurance because of the promise that relief will not be limited to uninsured losses, it is almost inevitable that less relief will in fact be forthcoming. Although I empha- size the positive effect on the amount of insurance that will be purchased, a reasonable normative conclusion is that since much relief is administratively costly and regressive in distributional terms, the likely decrease in relief is probably a good thing in and of itself.

This relationship between insurance and relief may also form part of the explanation for the lack of generous relief following the deaths of members of the armed forces on active duty. When armed forces are involved in a conflict and suffer casualties, there is normally no special post-disaster relief, even though many families lose important sources of support. One obvious explanation goes to the coalition part of the theory; the victims are not from a convenient geo- graphical area and do not have an easy means of organization. Moreover, veterans groups might be expected to focus more on relief for survivors with disabilities or even on education benefits. In short, the families of those who die in the service of their country are in a sense one degree more removed from political organization than surviving veterans, and this difference may explain the absence of special relief. A second explanation suggests that the absence of this form of post-disaster relief stems from the existence of a death benefit that is specified in advance. There would surely be more public sympathy for surviving families if there were no provision of a death benefit. This is especially so because individual combatants and their families are unlikely to be able to insure against the relevant losses because life insurance policies generally exclude losses from actual or imminent wars. [45] Yet the advance specification of a death benefit is a contributing but not sufficient explanation on its own because organized veterans groups often succeed in gaining post-war increases in various benefits even though lesser benefits were specified in advance. [46]

In any event, although I am suggesting that a kind of collateral source rule for relief might be a good thing, I have not suggested a means for making credible the promise of such a rule. But I suspect that if politicians simply an- nounced that relief would not be denied for insured losses, and then followed through on the first occasion when relief was otherwise legislated, a precedent would be set that would itself be politically difficult to break.

C. Uninsured Losses and Implicit Collusion

A logical implication of the argument about encouraging expectations regarding collateral benefits is that, as a budgetary matter, it may even be worthwhile for the government to subsidize the purchase of certain kinds of insurance in order to reduce the pressure for post-disaster relief. [47] In turn, representatives of citizens who expect relief in the future might sensibly oppose the promise of relief even for insured losses. After all, if this promise is likely to induce the purchase of insurance, and, the more insurance purchased, the less likely post-disaster relief, then it will be in the interests of a group of potential victims to discourage its members from purchasing insurance. In other words, it may not be rational for any given individual to vary the amount of insurance purchased because of the effect on the likelihood of relief, [48] but it will be sensi- ble for representatives of these individuals to encourage underinsurance in order to increase the amount of post-disaster relief. An interest group could do this either by helping to develop the precedent that relief is available only for uninsured losses or by discouraging attempts to legislate mandatory insurance. Potential victims may well prefer government-subsidized insurance (which can be worth more than the increased likelihood of relief), a topic to which I turn to shortly, but my point here is simply that unsubsidized insurance may be some- thing that these interest groups (or their agents) would wisely discourage.

Of course, it is unlikely that we will find much evidence of potential relief recipients or their representatives [49] behaving in the manner just described. Explicit expressions of interest in less relief (or promise of relief) rather than more would be sufficiently striking as to draw attention to the strategic behavior that underlies it. And, in turn, evidence of conscious manipulation of public sympathy would reduce the likelihood of relief. But there may be more subtle ways of maximizing relief in the manner suggested. Consider, for example, the fact that mortgagees in Southern California normally require borrowers to carry fire and other insurance on homes and other properties, but they apparently do not require earthquake insurance. [50] It is possible that these creditors recognize that if there is any substantial earthquake damage, then there will be fairly widespread damage and that relief will be forthcoming. This signal from lenders may itself be sufficient to encourage individuals to buy less earthquake insurance (and in the aggregate to make relief more likely), so that lenders may serve as subtle intermediaries.

It may also be no coincidence that California has historically been a state where it is difficult or expensive for lenders to enjoy deficiency judgments against defaulting mortgagors; [51] property owners are in fact "insured" in the sense that devastating earthquakes will either stimulate relief efforts or will be borne largely by lenders. In a regime where lenders do not look beyond the security offered by the property for the satisfaction of their loans, the insurance that is required by lenders is likely to be the only insurance that homeowners will find worthwhile to purchase. [52] In any event, it is not impossible that sophisticated lenders under- stand that to require earthquake insurance would be to reduce the likelihood of relief. And inasmuch as this relief is likely to generate economic activity it may even be in the lenders' narrow interest to prefer relief over insurance. [53] Alterna- tively, a competitive equilibrium among banks may be sustained where earth- quake insurance is not required (and there is some substantial probability of relief). [54]

REV_00261520

A less subtle example of implicit collusion against insurance in order to maximize expected relief is offered by the experience following the National Flood Insurance Act of 1968. [55] Under the Act, the federal government subsi- dizes flood insurance (marketed by private firms) but only for properties located in a community that has qualified by enacting land-use and control measures aimed at reducing the flood hazard related to new construction. [56] But because only one-third of flood-prone communities had joined the program by 1973, there is reason to think that communities declined to enter the program because they feared that there would be less disaster relief in the event of flooding. [57] Al- though the Act sought to increase the purchase of insurance by promising that post-disaster relief would be unavailable to residents of qualified communities who failed to acquire flood insurance, it has been difficult to make this promise entirely credible. [58]

Finally, there is the possibility of a more extreme solution, if it can be called that, to the problem of strategic underinsurance: insurance could be mandated. All property owners, or all owners in specified regions, might be required to carry a given level of earthquake or flood or other insurance. [59] One problem with this approach is that many property owners sincerely prefer not to pay for this insurance. And the political problem is now familiar; mandatory insurance will be opposed if only because it makes disaster relief less likely. Moreover, it may be difficult to follow through and to deny relief to those who did not abide by the earlier mandates. Nevertheless, the evolution toward mandatory insurance for automobile owners [60] and in the area of health care suggests that this option should not be ignored. My intuition is that the first step toward such change should be a federal commitment to consider (but not to guarantee) relief only where a state government asks the federal government to match funds that the state has already agreed to provide. A state-federal partnership in post-disaster relief would serve to encourage efficient pre-disaster precautions (because the states would now internalize projected losses to a degree) and pre-disaster mandates. [61]

IV. Pre-Disaster Relief

A. Insurance and Relief Revisited

I have suggested that if individuals expected relief efforts (in the event that they are forthcoming) to cover insured as well as uninsured losses, then more insurance would be purchased and, in turn, less relief would materialize. Relief requires some combination of public sympathy and political power (with little of the latter needed where, for example, in the case of serious starvation the disaster is truly devastating), and the former is less likely the more insurance coverage there is in place. The same sort of thinking would appear to provide an easy answer to the question of why interest groups do not regularly obtain subsidized pre-disaster insurance rather than post-disaster relief. Yet in terms of positive political theory alone, pre-disaster relief, in the form of subsidized insurance, would seem more likely than an equivalent amount (in expected value terms) of post-disaster relief, if only because virtually all members of the interest group would benefit from and, therefore, support the pre-disaster alternative. [62] A United States Senator from California would probably do well to secure post- earthquake relief for the thousands of Californians who suffered earthquake- related losses, but there is some chance that other in-state interests will be indifferent to such relief. In contrast, it is almost impossible to imagine a world in which the Senator would not be encouraged to gain pre-earthquake insurance subsidies directly benefitting hundreds of thousands of constituents. The problem with this preference, of course, is that there will not be much public sympathy before an earthquake strikes. Californians may prefer pre-disaster to post-disaster relief, and their political agents may be inclined to work harder in order to get credit for such programs, but it seems likely that something more is needed in order to overcome the general pre-disaster reaction that this is but another interest group seeking a piece of the pie.

REV_00261521

On the other hand, if it is true that taxpayers in general might be better off not limiting post-disaster relief to uninsured losses, then it may also be the case that taxpayers are better off providing pre-disaster relief. Even if we hold the level of expected expenditure constant, it is possible that subsidizing insurance creates less of a distortion than the potential for relief of uninsured losses alone. The possibility of gaining relief for uninsured losses can be expected to discour- age the purchase of insurance, while a subsidy for insurance will presumably encourage the purchase of insurance. It is possible, or even likely, that the first distortion is greater than the latter. It is even possible that the two offset one an- other. The subsidy encourages insurance, but potential victims may (correctly) still expect some relief even though there was a pre-disaster subsidy for insurance and, therefore, may decrease their insurance purchases to the extent that they expect more relief for uninsured losses.

A second reason for preferring to give pre-disaster insurance subsidies rather than occasional post-disaster relief relaxes the assumption that the cost of the two programs will be the same. Taxpayers or their representatives may perceive both that sympathy for victims is great once a disaster occurs and that there is less sympathy if pre-disaster insurance had been available at a subsidized level but had not been purchased. In short, it may be economical to give in advance. Moreover, for reasons discussed earlier, recipients and their representatives may prefer less aid to more because the subsidy is directed to more recipients. Those who would have purchased insurance even if unsubsidized will almost surely prefer the subsidy; and even a majority of those who would not have purchased insurance may prefer a certain subsidy (should they choose to take it) over an uncertain payout, even if the latter has a somewhat higher expected value.

There is a kind of voting paradox in this preceding argument, and I am suggesting that this kind of intransitivity may explain a good deal of the legisla- tion we find. Given the "requirements" of sympathy and political influence, we often expect post-disaster relief and not pre-disaster subsidies because sympathy is absent before disaster strikes. But once we can expect some post-disaster relief, both potential victims and other taxpayers may prefer some package of pre- disaster subsidies over post-disaster relief even though a proposal for a pre- disaster subsidy would have lost to the possibility that nothing at all be done.

There is a third, related, and very practical reason to think that pre-disaster relief will sometimes prevail. It combines the redistributional characteristics of the preceding argument (regarding the preference, however intransitive, for insurance subsidy over post-disaster relief) with a return to the question of disaster mitigation and the encouragement of the optimal amount of insurance. When relief takes the form of subsidies for insurance it is fairly simple to reduce the overall loss from future disasters by conditioning relief on preventive steps. Thus, the subsidized insurance may be conditioned on certain building require- ments or flood-control plans and so forth. Again, it is useful to see that potential victims may join other taxpayers in preferring this approach over post-disaster relief. Some recipients will be planning to take these preventive steps in any event, and others will simply prefer the subsidy-in-hand (however conditioned) over the greater prospect of uncertain disaster relief. In any event, it is more difficult to condition post-disaster relief on preventive steps. As discussed previously, a promise that relief, if given at all, will only be given to those who had met certain building requirements or other disaster-mitigating conditions may not be credible. And the payment of relief only for reconstruction that meets certain requirements will normally affect only a small number of property owners likely to be affected by the next disaster. To be sure, the government could simply legislate, or virtually force the state government to enact and enforce, the behavior in question. But in practice this will be difficult to do unless attached to a carrot.

In short, I am suggesting that on both efficiency and public choice grounds the emergence of pre-disaster subsidies is not surprising. At the same time, I am not quite claiming that this form of relief dominates other outcomes. There is the potential for a kind of intransitivity, with pre-disaster relief appearing superior to post-disaster relief which seems preferable (occasionally) to no relief which, in turn, seems to defeat pre-disaster relief. [63] One possibility is that we should expect instability as a kind of constant dissatisfaction with the status quo that generates change. [64] Alternatively, for reasons discussed presently, it is possible that the pre-disaster subsidy outcome is most likely to emerge as the stable equilibrium. [65] The case for instability is in part based on the fact that relief is difficult to predict because sympathy depends on media coverage and because political influence requires an interest group to form a successful coalition. But part of the case for instability also rests on the intransitivity sketched above; there may be constant movement from no relief to occasional (and increasing) post-disaster assistance, to pre-disaster insurance subsidies, and then, because of the absence of relief in the pre-disaster period, to no relief again.

The alternative argument, that the pre-disaster subsidy regime will prevail, is essentially one of endowment effects. When no relief scheme is in place, every disaster affords an opportunity for an interest group to take advantage of acute sympathy for victims in order to obtain post-disaster relief. The "no relief norm" in this way will constantly be challenged by occasions for relief. Somewhat similarly, post-disaster relief will always raise fears of moral hazard and of future relief expectations such that the presence of post-disaster relief may generate the movement to pre-disaster subsidies for many of the reasons discussed earlier. But it may be more difficult to move away from pre-disaster relief (to no relief) because the benefits of this change would be spread widely and thinly, while the costs will be concentrated in one narrower interest group. It is perhaps con- ventional wisdom to think that it is difficult to remove a program that benefits a well organized group, but this wisdom often seems correct.

Finally, pre-disaster subsidized insurance may reduce the chance of post- disaster relief, but it surely does not eliminate that possibility. Predicting the durability of a pre-disaster relief scheme is thus especially difficult because potential disaster victims and other taxpayers may not share expectations as to the likelihood of post-disaster relief in a regime with pre-disaster subsidies. I am satisfied to leave open the question of whether and when to expect not cycling but stability in the form of pre-disaster relief.

B. National Health Insurance

The contemporary debate about national health insurance has some relation to the political and economic phenomena discussed thus far. The prospect of an insurance scheme causes various interest groups to scramble into coalitions be- cause most schemes necessarily involve some cross-subsidies and, therefore, some winners and losers. If universal coverage is to emerge, then the political game is all the more intense because an implicit or explicit tax is necessary in order to finance health care for those who have not purchased it in the past and are unable to afford it (or corresponding taxes) in the future.

There are, of course, obvious differences between this interest group struggle and that associated with earthquakes, floods, and other discrete disasters. Even though discrete disasters generate victims who are plainly identifiable and easily organized (because of their geographic proximity), the pre-disaster high risk group is also identifiable and may be even easier to organize. As such, the major evolutionary advantage of post-disaster relief, it will be recalled, is not organiza- tional ability but rather the likelihood of sympathy from other taxpayers. In contrast, the subset of citizens in need of extensive health care is more difficult to organize. Some of these subsets may be especially successful in attracting charitable support, and a few may even be able to overcome problems of political organization, but by and large post-disaster relief is unlikely. [66] In the case of a particular disease, for example, afflicted citizens are usually dispersed and unlikely to be well-organized. And in the pre-disaster phase, the subset of citizens at high risk for the given disease is not nearly as identifiable as that for earthquakes and similar natural disasters.

This difference in dispersion and identifiability means that post-disaster relief for particular health problems is often unlikely, but it does not say much about the likelihood of any pre-disaster program. I use the term program rather than relief because a national health insurance scheme that covers treatment for an illness need not subsidize one group at the expense of another in ex ante terms. The move toward government-sponsored, rather than private, insurance may be fueled by problems of mobility rather than affordability. [67]

REV_00261523

The comparison is more interesting when we force the affordability issue by thinking of the problem of uninsured patients who cannot afford critical care. One way to think about the apparent move toward national health insurance is to see that we have a post-disaster relief scheme currently in effect in the form of public and private subsidies to maintain emergency rooms and other hospital facilities used rather intensively by uninsured patients. [68] This form of disaster relief seems akin to what we would expect in the event of famine; it is difficult to imagine an affluent democracy (or perhaps any society) denying emergency medical care, [69] so that public sympathy generates relief even for a group with little political power. Given the reality of this post-disaster relief scheme, [70] taxpayers may sensibly prefer pre-disaster relief in the form of subsidized insurance over the post-disaster relief currently taking place in emergency rooms. The analogy is to the disaster mitigation features of subsidized flood (and perhaps earthquake) insurance. Just as taxpayers and potential victims may both benefit by a move from post-disaster to pre-disaster relief when the latter is in the form of subsidized insurance contingent on disaster-mitigating steps (such as flood planning and conformity to building codes), so too everyone may benefit if subsidized heath insurance leads to preventive rather than emergency care. The move can be beneficial in both financial and mortality terms. Put somewhat differently, there is also the possibility of evolution toward catastrophic health insurance (or health care), but the expenditures necessary to support more routine (but emergency room) care bring about the possibility of pre-"disaster" relief for all health problems. But either kind of national health insurance (uni- versal or catastrophic) is an example of pre-disaster relief succeeding post- disaster relief so long as substantial redistribution is involved.

I do not think a strongly normative position on this matter is warranted. It is remotely possible, for example, that subsidized health insurance will have a significant impact on work effort; better health care, like better food and lodging, is, after all, one of the things many citizens work hard to enjoy. In this, as in many other questions of public versus private provision, experimentation or experience may be necessary in order to understand better the interaction between economies of scale, incentives to work, moral hazards, well functioning markets, and other concerns. My point is simply that once we recognize the substantial post-disaster relief schemes that have arisen as part of the present system, it is no surprise to see a movement toward the alternative of pre-disaster relief. Once again, even if a majority of taxpayers, their representatives, or policy experts prefer no relief, or at least less relief, over pre-disaster relief (and that is not likely to be the case in health care), there is likely to be evolution from post- disaster to pre-disaster relief.

V. Conclusion

All disasters are not alike, and a theory of disaster relief must suffer immedi- ately from the problem of defining disaster. But I have tried to paint over such problems with a broad brush in order to make some progress on the question of when to expect relief and in order to generalize about alternatives to post- disaster relief. As it turns out, it is difficult to predict the scope of post-disaster relief because so much depends on the level of what I have called "sympathy" for victims. We can predict that relief is more likely after an earthquake than after a crime wave, but I do not claim to be able to predict which earthquakes (or hurricanes or explosions, for that matter) will generate the greatest relief efforts. To take but one problematic variable, if one disaster strikes soon after another it is possible that taxpayers will tire of financing relief efforts, but it is also possible that victims of the second disaster will benefit from the precedent regarding relief created in the aftermath of the first. [71]

I have suggested that there is often a kind of intransitivity among the (rough) policy options of post-disaster relief, no relief, and pre-disaster relief. I have also argued that in some situations cycling may not occur, because the order of consideration, as it were, can be expected over time to favor the pre-disaster relief outcome. [72] It is also possible that this dynamic operates outside of the context involving government-sponsored relief. Thus, one plausible description of the history of retirement plans is that in the beginning employers paid their workers in cash, with no fringe benefits, because employees could then make suitable individual savings (and other allocational) decisions. Over time there were retirements or deaths or disabilities that evoked sufficient sympathy as to cause employers or fellow workers to raise funds for the departing worker or for that worker's stricken family. The regime was then one of "no relief" with occasional "post-disaster relief." It is also easy to see how precedents might have been created so that the number of sympathy cases grew. In turn, these cases might have generated moral hazard fears, although they are not quite that, about the propensity to save and, more generally, pressure on the one side to make relief more certain and on the other side to defuse the case for relief by encour- aging pre-disaster planning. Retirement and other insurance plans may in this way have emerged through employer-organized "subsidies," or forced savings programs in place of wages. These programs seem like natural developments; post-disaster relief leads to pre-disaster plans. Moreover, the pre-disaster pro- grams need to be subsidized, mandated, or somehow encouraged (compared to private savings and consumption) or too many employees will allow disaster to strike if only to elicit post-disaster relief. To be sure, the tax system has come to play a role in this scheme, but tax laws might just as well have encouraged private savings through direct incentives. In any event, tax law may be the cart rather than the horse in this story.

REV_00261524

In the case of this particular example, if we were to start all over again, a substantial case might be made against employer-organized retirement systems on grounds of free choice (and utility), mobility, and horizontal equity. With perfect foresight about the development of employer-sponsored plans, a substantial number of those who favored "no relief" might have preferred a different kind of pre-disaster planning or might have worked harder to forestall tax and other preferences for relief of any kind in order to encourage private ordering. But in the real workplace, the movement from no relief to post-disaster relief and then to pre-disaster relief seems almost inevitable. In turn, the expense of pre-disaster programs has encouraged the growth of part-time employment, not to mention contractions and self-employment, such that a subset of the work-force has been relegated to no relief. The kind of intransitivity explored in this Article is thus not limited to public programs.

Returning to the emergence of pre-disaster subsidies more generally, it is, of course, possible that I have overstated the positive case for pre-disaster programs. The future may bring about the gradual reduction and even withdrawal of flood insurance, subsidized health insurance, and even retirement plans. I have fol- lowed conventional wisdom in assuming that interest groups (and employees with endowment effects) will be good at protecting benefits they enjoy, [73] but in reality even the most cherished entitlements can disappear. Budget crises may cause gradual reductions in the level of the subsidy for flood insurance, for example, while the continued presence of a flood insurance program may suppress sympathy for post-disaster relief. More interesting, the threat of many uninsured victims (asking for post-disaster relief the next time around) and the problem of adverse selection may encourage not only the reduction of subsidies, but also the passage of accompanying legislation mandating the purchase of private insurance or requiring disaster-mitigating expenses. Similarly, the federal government could, if it wished, find a political and legal means of requiring property owners (in specified regions) to carry earthquake insurance even without the provision of federally-sponsored pre-disaster or post-disaster relief. More generally, there may be evolution toward insurance but not necessarily toward subsidized insurance. [74] The government could also find ways to require various disaster-mitigating expenditures with sticks rather than carrots. I suspect that these developments will be more likely if state-sponsored relief is a precondi- tion for federally-sponsored relief. [75]

Unsubsidized, mandated health insurance is perhaps the best current example of such a possibility. The potential for such unfunded mandates or regulations aimed at disaster mitigation makes plain both the deep and complicated involve- ment of government in private lives and the difficulty of attaching ideological labels to many policy proposals. If post-disaster relief is often a precursor to pre- disaster relief, and sometimes even a precursor to subsequent unfunded man- dates, then citizens and their representatives can be forgiven if they have mixed feelings about proposals for relief or for disaster-mitigation programs in the first place.

REV_00261525

FOOTNOTES:

n1 It is arguable, however, that federal relief simply follows property damage rather than death or injury, although this distinction might itself have an obvious interest group explanation. The Los Angeles Rodney King Riots, for example, generated much less relief than the Northridge Earthquake soon thereafter, but the latter did twenty times more in the way of property damage. See Shante Morgan, Two Years Later, L.A. Riot Scars Run Deep, San Diego Union-Trib A3 (Apr 29, 1994) (victims of riots causing thousands of injuries, 55 deaths, and $ 1 billion in damage to buildings feel "ignored" in comparison to earthquake victims, although at least $ 0.6 billion in aid followed the riots). The Northridge earthquake caused between $ 20 and $ 30 billion of damage and was followed by more than $ 7 billion in relief. Michael Miller, Fire, Quake, Mud, Floods, Riots Dim California Dream, Reuters (Feb 9, 1994), available in LEXIS, News Library, Reuna File ($ 20 billion estimate); Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act of 1994, Debate on HR 3759 on the House Floor, 103d Cong, 2d Sess, 140 Cong Rec H211-04 (1994) (statement of Rep. Lucille Roybal-Allard) (range of damage estimates); Emergency Supple- mental Appropriations Act of 1994, Pub L No 103-211, 108 Stat 3-14 (1994) (general allocation of $ 4.7 billion along with allocations to Small Business Administration ("SBA"), Departments of Education, Transportation, and Housing and Urban Development, the Veterans Health Administration, and President's Discretionary Fund (to be divided between earthquake and Midwest flood relief) totalling about $ 7.2 billion).

Any comparison between the gradual losses from problems such as urban decay with those from unique events such as earthquakes or riots leads to the familiar point that discrete events focus attention. A child in need of a liver transplant may attract more attention and monetary contributions than a nation of children in need of funding for prenatal care or kidney dialysis. See Guido Calabresi and Philip Bobbitt, Tragic Choices: The Conflicts Society Confronts in the Allocation of Tragically Scarce Resources 134-37 (Norton, 1978). More generally, my focus in this paper is on discrete losses that the state has not precommitted to compensate.

n2 By incidence I refer not to the identity of the ultimate beneficiaries of relief, but rather to the occasions on which substantial relief is forthcoming.

n3 It would be interesting to compare this to relief patterns in parliamentary systems with only at-large representation. I am unable to offer reliable, comparative data in part because most democracies have at least some geographic representation. But it is interesting that after the recent floods in Western European countries, with parliamentary democracies and strong political parties, there was no disaster relief for farmers and other (geographi- cally concentrated) interests. In contrast, in Japan, where geographical representation is thought to be important, the government gave $ 25,000 to every family that lost its home and $ 50,000 to each family that lost its head of household in an earthquake and tidal wave that caused massive destruction on the island of Okushiri. World News Tonight with Peter Jennings, ABC News (July 15, 1993) available in LEXIS, News Library, Script File. It is noteworthy that there are countries with geographic representation, such as New Zea- land and Britain, that have experimented with universal earthquake insurance and with war damage insurance. See G. Granville Slack, The War Damage Acts and the War Risks Insurance Act, 1939, Part II (Commodity Insurance Scheme) 11 (Butterworth, 2d ed 1944) (The British Act provided compensation for war-damaged property with 50% of the funds coming from a new tax on land owners and the other 50% coming out of general funds.). Note, however, that the United States had a similar act during World War II. Mark S. Rhodes, relief efforts. Inasmuch as these efforts sometimes take the form of pre-disaster subsidies, this Article aims to illuminate the choice between pre- and post-disaster relief.

REV_00261526

The positive question of when relief is likely to be government subsidized refers implicitly to the American experience in which earthquakes, floods, and severe droughts trigger sympathy and government-funded relief more often than do crime waves, inner city decay, rural deterioration, and some diseases. It should be apparent that this comparison is difficult to prove because so much depends on the definitions and measures of relief that are used. For example, if all farm programs are seen as addressing the phenomenon of rural depopulation, all expenditures on urban-based crime, drug prevention, and education are linked to concerns about inner cities, and all funding of scientific research is interpreted as aimed at improving mortality statistics, then the amount spent on relief following droughts and earthquakes will seem trivial. Even so, the question of why relief follows some natural disasters rather than others remains, but the larger question of political priorities can be substantial- ly avoided. In this Article, I will assume that expenditures relating to crops, crimes, and science can be taken to reflect narrower interests than those noted above and that, in any event, there is something interesting about the fact that public expenditures are part of the reaction to some discrete losses but not others. It is surely the case that large, direct expenditures by the federal government are more likely following an earthquake than after an urban crime wave. [1]

Section II explores the characteristics of disasters that beget relief. Among other things, I suggest ways in which the prospect of disaster relief might generate desirable incentives for investments aimed at minimizing disaster- related losses in the first place. Section III turns to the conventional wisdom that people might decline to take preventive steps, including the purchase of insurance, because they expect relief in the event of disaster. I suggest that all parties might be better off if the government could credibly promise that in the event of relief insured losses would be compensated along with uninsured ones. Section IV considers the choice between post-disaster relief and pre-disaster subsidized insurance. I argue that there may be a kind of intransitivity among various policy options but that pre-disaster relief may be the alternative most likely to emerge. I conclude with an illustration involving health care politics and financing, for a move in the direction of national health insurance can be understood in terms of the choice among the options of no relief, post-disaster assistance, and pre-disaster subsidies. Among other things, the discussion suggests that pre-disaster subsidies (such as subsidized flood insurance) may be more beneficial than generally recognized and that it might be sensible to provide federal relief only where there are matching state-provided funds.

II. Explaining Post-Disaster Relief

A. The Positive Political Theory of Disaster Relief

An obvious but important explanation of the incidence [2] of post-disaster relief is that discrete natural disasters tend to affect limited geographic areas and often, therefore, relatively well organized interest groups. An earthquake in Los Angeles affects people who are already well organized by virtue of the structure of our political system. [3] If earthquake victims gain more federal aid in absolute or relative terms than do a similar number of citizens suffering from a given disease, then we might attribute that difference to the geographic concentration of earthquake victims who, through their representatives or electoral votes, can gain a greater share of the national pie. We expect such interest groups to be excellent at avoiding burdens and to be fairly successful at obtaining benefits. [4] This is especially true when the interest group is concentrated in several congres- sional districts or states, or is essentially coterminous with one state, because there is already in place a means of overcoming collective action problems and gaining political advantage over dispersed and disorganized fellow citizens. In contrast, those who suffer from a disease (or those who hope for government funds to support research about a disease) need to overcome collective action problems in organizing their claims. [5] Falling in between these extremes are disasters that n4 See Saul Levmore, The Case for Retroactive Taxation, 22 J Legal Stud 265, 279 n 27, 285 (1993) (a kind of endowment effect may make organized interests especially determined to protect what they already enjoy). Success may also be tied to the chance that the jurisdiction affected by the disaster is considered pivotal in an upcoming political election. See, for example, Melissa Healy, Cheney Defends Plan to Rebuild Base Hit By Storm; Recovery: Defense Secretary Admits Proposal is Based on More than Military Needs. But He Rails Against Charges That Move is Motivated by Politics, LA Times A15 (Sept 3, 1992) (linking decision by President George Bush to rebuild Homestead Air Force Base after Hurricane Andrew to forthcoming presidential election).

REV_00261509

Couch on Insurance 2d section 42:474 at 562 (Law Co-op, 2d ed 1982).

n5 A major problem is the ability to suppress free riding in order to extract "taxes" or other seed capital from potential beneficiaries. Rent seeking by an interest group may be profitable but "investors" need a means of pooling their investments.

n6 It is tempting to suggest that modest success will also come to interest groups organized around issues of great absolute value to individual members. Thus, an increase in social security benefits may affect a group that is just as numerous as a group that would benefit from a plan to compensate victims of crime, but added social security benefits seem more likely to emerge from the political process than does compensation to crime victims. The latter group may be perfectly identifiable (as it will be, for example, if the proposal is to compensate victims of crimes committed in the past year) but most of its members will have relatively little to gain.

But one problem with this comparison, or suggestion, is that there are striking examples of nonrecurring interests with a great deal to gain but with little history of success. Consider, for example, the relatively low benefits paid to families of members of the military killed in active service. These extremely sympathetic victims are not associated with a moral hazard problem, suffer losses that are not easily insurable through private channels, and might work for fairly large ex post relief packages--but they are geographi- cally dispersed and otherwise unmotivated to organize.

There are, of course, examples of relief even where the victims are dispersed or appear unsympathetic. For example, governments may pay for emergency room care even when victims are at fault and (ostensibly) politically powerless. The discussion in the text claims only that among the factors explaining the incidence of relief, geographical and other organizational advantages are noteworthy.

n7 However, at least with respect to local capital markets, one way of rationalizing post-disaster relief is with the idea that these markets may be too inflexible to finance a rapid recovery.

n8 There is, of course, no recent experience with post-invasion relief claims. While the bombing of Pearl Harbor did produce some civilian casualties and business losses, virtually all those losses were traced to anti-aircraft activity, rather than direct enemy strikes. Walter Lord, Day of Infamy 158, 220 (Holt, 1957). It is unclear whether this fact makes relief more or less likely. In any event, inasmuch as post-disaster relief blossomed only in the last 25 years, see note 13, the Pearl Harbor experience is probably uninformative.

n9 See Rhodes, Couch on Insurance 2d section 1:61 at 159-60 (cited in note 3) (containing a standard form homeowners policy that excludes war damage from coverage). At least in the case of life insurance, however, insurance companies only use the exclusion in times of war or impending war, and then only for particular high-risk insureds (such as males of draft age). Janice E. Greider, et al, Law and the Life Insurance Contract 227 (Irwin, 5th ed 1984); Kenneth Black, Jr. and Harold D. Skipper, Jr., Life Insurance 138 (Prentice- Hall, 11th ed 1987).

REV_00261527

n10 There is also a connection between repetition and moral hazard and between repetition and the ability of citizens to expect that relief will be forthcoming. These matters are explored below.

n11 These benefits are occasionally added to "expected" benefits in the midst of an economic downturn (or election season). Note that previously promised unemployment benefits contain an element of pre-disaster relief because there are obvious cross-subsidies among insured workers.

n12 The bailout of Chrysler is a particularly interesting exception because the govern- ment received stock options which later proved quite profitable. Warren Brown, Chrysler's Driving Wheel Bids Farewell; Iacocca's and Automaker's Resurgence Were Intertwined, Wash Post H1 (Dec 27, 1992) (government earned $ 350 million from warrants and stock options issued in exchange for $ 1.2 billion in loan guarantees). In contrast, businesses in Los Angeles that received post-earthquake relief were not asked to promise to make pay- ments in the event that they thrived after rebuilding. Of course, to the extent that even the most powerful interest groups must join coalitions and therefore must face constraints, it is difficult to predict when interest groups will do better holding out for larger "subsi- dies" rather than benefits that are offset by extractions in the event of success. Universities might choose to lobby for scholarships rather than subsidized loan programs of somewhat smaller net benefit, but when we see loans (or Chrysler stock options) it is not always the case that the interest group has proved to be weaker than others.

n13 More generally, relief may beget relief in the sense that expectations about relief have something to do with past experience. The Alaska earthquake of 1964 is often given as the watershed event, after which major disasters often generated government-sponsored relief. Douglas C. Dacy and Howard Kunreuther, The Economics of Natural Disasters: Implications for Federal Policy 53-54 (Free Press, 1969) (The Alaska earthquake of 1964 produced the first U.S. legislation specifically aimed at a single disaster, despite the fact that Alaska's property damage was only average when compared to prior disasters.). See also Howard Kunreuther, Recovery from Natural Disasters: Insurance or Federal Aid? 9 (Am Enterprise Inst, 1973).

On the other hand, most examples of identification could also be explained on geographic grounds. For instance, South Dakota may benefit from drought relief because enough citizens from other states fear droughts themselves, but it is also possible that South Dakota--with its disproportionate power in the Senate--is simply good at getting relief. Political power may explain the fact that even small problems can receive attention and relief from federal agencies. See, for example, South Dakota Landslide Victims Need Assistance Now, 104 Cong Rec S9113-01 (July 15, 1994) (statement of Senator Larry Pressler urging relief in addition to the SBA loans already approved for home and business owners in the small town of Lead, South Dakota, where a slow-moving landslide caused damage).

n14 To the extent that these rules are state-initiated there is the puzzle as to why relief comes from the federal government. In the case of floodplains, it seems sensible that control and prevention are somewhat in the hands of the United States Army Corps of Engineers because relief is expected from the federal fisc. Oliver A. Houck, Rising Water: The National Flood Insurance Program and Louisiana, 60 Tulane L Rev 61, 66-71 (1985).

n15 Id at 71.

n16 The argument is a familiar one in the debate over the proper treatment of losses in an income tax system. See Mark Campisano and Roberta Romano, Recouping Losses: The Case for Full Loss Offsets, 76 Nw U L Rev 709 (1981) (arguing for symmetrical treatment of losses and profits in order to encourage efficient, if risky, investments). The problem is complicated by the fact that it is difficult to keep an even playing field among start-up companies, enterprises with past losses, and conglomerated firms.

REV_00261528

Note also that the casualty loss deduction in 26 USC section165(c)(3) (1988) of the tax code gives relief even for personal assets lost in a disaster. Louis Kaplow, The Income Tax as Insurance: The Casualty Loss and Medical Expense Deductions and the Exclusion of Medical Insurance Premiums, 79 Cal L Rev 1485, 1489-93 (1991) (casualty loss deduction covers assets used for the owner's consumption, such as a yacht destroyed by a storm).

n17 This is because the percentage of property losses covered by federal aid was in the range of the marginal tax rates on ordinary income and capital gains.

n18 In referring to "full internalization" below, I will assume that the government will actually pay only a fraction of losses in order to control moral hazards. In contrast, partial internalization will refer to the idea that the government pays still less, or gives relief less often, if only because there is insufficient sympathy or political support for "full" relief.

n19 An optimistic theorist might insist that war casualties are sufficiently in the public eye as to obviate the need for further political internalization. This is related to the well known claim that democracies do not engage in warfare with other democracies. Of course, this optimistic view suggests that there would not be relief in the event that a hostile military force inflicted losses, because such an event would be very much in the public eye.

Put differently, it is possible to categorize potential losses, or "disasters," as of the kind that the state can be expected to prevent in an efficient manner or of the kind regarding which the state could use some budgetary encouragement to prevent efficiently. The state might be expected to plan efficiently for the national defense, so that little would be gained by having it compensate those citizens who suffer losses from war- fare--poorly or well conducted.

n20 The argument can not be that relief is always provided in order to encourage ef- ficient prevention, because it is obvious that some crimes, fires, storms, and other "disasters" do not generate government-sponsored relief. If, instead, the idea is that benevolence (or political forces) encourages relief whenever it is plausible that government- sponsored mitigation steps would have efficiently minimized or prevented the disaster at issue, then the question is why these same forces do not simply encourage efficient preventive steps, without the intermediation of relief. Where private parties are concerned, it is easy to see both why the threat of damages might encourage efficient precaution- taking and why it might be easier to use losses as the triggering device instead of suits for unreasonable risk creation. But where public servants are concerned, the threat of payments for (disaster-related) losses will not necessarily encourage precautions because the losses are not paid by these agents themselves. At the very least, we will need a compli- cated theory to explain how disaster relief might best encourage efficient precautions.

n21 One possibility is that the federal government seeks credit for relief. Another is that it wishes to regulate, perhaps in order to attract rent seeking behavior, and plans to justify regulation as a means of lowering the costs of relief. An interesting possibility is that the federal government will or should condition relief on the provision of matching funds from state governments. This state-provided post-disaster relief must be drawn from a broad tax base or an affected group will simply agree to pay the state in order to re- ceive federal funds.

n22 See generally Houck, 60 Tulane L Rev 61 (cited in note 14).

n23 On the possible collective action problem among these interests, see note 30 and accompanying text.

n24 See, for example, notes 47 and 58 which discuss the inability of the government to follow through on its earlier threats that relief would be denied to those who did not participate in crop insurance or flood insurance programs.

REV_00261529

n25 Amartya Sen, The Economics of Life and Death, Sci Am 40 (May 1993); and Amartya Sen, Freedom and Needs, New Republic 31 (Jan 10 & 17, 1994).

n26 Sen, Sci Am at 43 (cited in note 25) ("If leaders must seek reelection and the press is free to report starvation and to criticize policies, then the rulers have an incentive to take preemptive action."); see also Sen, New Republic at 33-34 (cited in note 25).

n27 See Sen, Sci Am at 43-44 (cited in note 25) (noting that China continued the questionable agricultural policies of the "Great Leap Forward" despite the onset of a three-year famine that killed between 23 and 30 million people). See also Amartya Sen, Inequality Reexamined 77-78 (Harvard, 1992) (noting Emperor Haile Selassie's refusal to undertake famine relief measures in Ethiopia in 1973 because "wealth has to be gained through hard work" and because "those who don't work starve"). The implicit argument is that only a ruler who is not democratically accountable could survive while abiding by such a principle.

n28 One version of the argument is that citizens will respond to large-scale suffering of fellow citizens. Another version, which helps limit the argument to famines and to a small number of other disasters, is that such sympathy arises primarily where the disaster is perceived as having been avoidable by sensible government projects.

n29 Note that I do not argue that potential victims force the government to prevent famine. There are simply too many examples of repeat losers (even in democracies) to believe that otherwise disadvantaged regions or ethnic groups suddenly develop political power when famine is concerned. I therefore prefer the more indirect mechanism described in the text; powerful interest groups recognize that a major disaster will elicit sympathy and expenditures in favor of the disadvantaged.

n30 The collective action problem among interest groups may seem like an analytically serious problem of the theory suggested in the text. But we are generally ignorant of why and when collective action problems are overcome. Thus, when a tax measure includes generous depreciation deductions we are inclined to point to "business interests," even though these interests include a wide variety of trade associations and other entities which might suffer from their own collective action problems.

One partial solution to the collective action problem would involve some linkage. Mayors of large cities might be more inclined to support flood management programs if any surplus in the flood insurance program was promised to urban programs. But the question of linkage and direct competition among interest groups is beyond the scope of this Article.

There is also a related question of why charitable organizations succeed in organiz- ing around certain causes. There is both a collective action mystery and a disaster-related puzzle. Charities operate along with governments in some areas (for example, blood donations and museums) but not others (for example, crime control). I leave these questions for another effort.

n31 It is also possible that different interest groups will form or gain power in democracies and non-democracies.

n32 Sen favors not food distribution but rather wealth redistribution or employment programs which provide victims with purchasing power. Sen, Sci Am at 43 (cited in note 25). I have already noted that some (perhaps second-best) methods of avoiding serious famines may be relatively attractive to interest groups that can resolve any collective action problem among interest groups and concerned citizens. See note 30 and accompanying text.

n33 Although the collective action problem among interest groups is now more serious.

REV_00261530

n34 Sen, Sci Am at 41-43 (cited in note 25).

n35 I do not mean to take a position on the optimal size of these programs, but there is surely something to be said from the perspective of positive political theory for internal- izing a larger fraction of the real social costs of crime and other problems. The (positive and normative) case for compensating crime victims is sufficiently intricate as to require separate development.

For the present, it should be sufficient to note that even if the moral hazard problems associated with such a relief effort could be overcome, victims of crime would still be difficult to organize into an effective coalition because actual victims face serious collective action problems of their own, and potential victims are both unidentifiable and dispersed. Moreover, serious political opposition would be likely.

n36 Under the Federal Emergency Management Act ("FEMA"), all recipients must repay any government assistance that is duplicated by insurance proceeds. 44 CFR section 205.39 (f) (2) (1994). Similarly, the SBA will not provide relief for losses that are covered by insurance. 13 CFR section 123.3 (b)(3) (1995). In addition, victims are not eligible for relief when they "assumed the risk," which includes situations where insurance was initially pur- chased but not maintained. 13 CFR section 123.3 (b)(4) (1995).

n37 The implication is that there is often a need to spend in order to gain interest group power.

n38 Kunreuther, Recovery From Natural Disasters at 30-32 (cited in note 13), illustrates how an individual may be better off declining to purchase insurance, taking out a large mortgage (because later relief may be tied to outstanding loans), and later enjoying an SBA loan and forgiveness grant along with a casualty loss tax deduction. Unfortunately, Kunreuther does not make the individual's ex ante estimate of the likelihood of relief in the event of a disaster explicit. Similarly, Kunreuther notes that SBA loans may make small losers whole, whereas flood insurance would have come with a deductible, but again there is no discount taken for the fact that, in the event of flooding, insurance payments are virtually certain while disaster relief is not. The implicit claim is that since many individuals do not purchase flood insurance even when the government subsidizes 90% of its cost, individuals must regard the disaster relief as quite likely. Id at 23.

n39 This suggests an interesting analogy, or contrast, between takings law and disaster relief. Insurance aside, one who suffers alone from a natural disaster is unlucky (because there is no prospect of relief if lightning hits one or two properties) while one who suffers alone as the result of a government program may be able to obtain just compensation as a result of having been "singled out." See Saul Levmore, Takings, Torts, and Special Inter- ests, 77 Va L Rev 1333 (1991). Insurance complicates this comparison. Relief is less likely to be forthcoming for insured losses, but insurance may often be unavailable for losses threatened by government actions. Indeed, takings law has been described as a substitute for (unavailable and difficult to provide) private insurance. Lawrence Blume and Daniel L. Rubinfeld, Compensation for Takings: An Economic Analysis, 72 Cal L Rev 569, 571 (1984). Risk averse individuals or property owners can buy insurance to cover most disas- ters, and can expect relief because of takings law in the event of individualized losses from government actions, but must hope to be on the winning side of interest group battles when it comes to losses suffered by many citizens because of government actions.

n40 This intuition is difficult to prove to the skeptical. We do not have the luxury of a controlled experiment in which a serious hurricane or earthquake strikes a region with a great deal of private insurance and then strikes another with little insurance. On the other hand, the fact that we do not experience post-disaster relief after airplane and railroad crashes (even where there is no tort recovery) and after fires suggests that relief may be associated with uninsured victims. The contrary impression would be that even where most victims are insured, the media can always stimulate sympathy and relief by locating and broadcasting information about uninsured victims.

REV_00261531

n41 Regarding the war exclusion, see text accompanying note 9. The inclusion of terrorism in a special federal program designed to encourage insurers to undertake normally uninsurable risks indicates that the private insurance market has not generally provided "terrorism insurance." Rhodes, Couch on Insurance 2d section 80:4 at 626 (cited in note 3); Providence Washington Ins. Co. v Lynn, 492 F2d 979, 984 n 3 (1st Cir 1974) (noting that the federal reinsurance program designed to provide coverage for "riot and civil disorder" also covers terrorism).

The usual noninsurability of war (and terrorism) losses is itself interesting. The obvious explanation is that insurers fear that with such coverage the solvency of the insurance system might be in question. I do not find this explanation compelling if only because insurance could be written with some aggregate loss ceiling. Put differently, insur- ers could respond to the correlation among insureds' losses by reinsuring in the in- ternational market or offering only partial coverage.

n42 We might imagine a regime in which relief is promised only to those who have insurance, but this sort of regime is likely to cause the purchase of too much insurance. Moreover, for reasons mentioned earlier, it would be politically unacceptable to keep this promise.

n43 A 10% deductible is common with respect to earthquake insurance. Earthquakes and Earthquake Insurance, Hearing Before the Subcommittee on Policy Research and Insurance of the House Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, 101st Cong, 2d Sess 54 (1990) (statement of John Drennan, Allstate Insurance Co.).

The details of these policies provide that losses are covered only if they exceed 10% of the property's insured value and that only 90% of losses above that ceiling are reimbursed. These "copayments" can be understood as a mechanism for avoiding claims for cracks and other damage that may not have been caused by the earthquake. In the case of flood insurance, the moral hazard problem is more obvious.

n44 It is, of course, possible either that the existence of pre-disaster insurance does not affect the likelihood of post-disaster relief or that a pre-disaster program signals the government's involvement in a problem and actually increases the likelihood of post- disaster relief. The (opposite) intuition, as reflected in the text, is shared by Professors Macey and Miller who, in the context of bank failures, suggest that deposit insurance might be understood as signalling to bank regulators that the insurance amount reflects the limit of the government's exposure in the event of failure. Jonathan R. Macey and Geoffrey P. Miller, Deposit Insurance, the Implicit Regulatory Contract, and the Mismatch in the Term Structure of Banks' Assets and Liabilities, 12 Yale J Reg 1, 23-24 (1995).

n45 Greider, et al, Law and the Life Insurance Contract at 227 (cited in note 9); Black and Skipper, Life Insurance at 138 (cited in note 9).

n46 Note also that the advance specification factor is a familiar one. An employer, such as a private school or charity, will sometimes raise funds in order to present a retiring or disabled employee with a substantial gift. But such gifts are much less likely in the pres- ence of employer-supported retirement programs or disability insurance.

n47 The Federal Crop Insurance Program subsidizes direct crop insurance for farmers by paying 30% of each producer's premiums up to a maximum 65% of each producer's adjusted yield. Matthew Bender, Agricultural Law section 120.A02, reprinted in Commission for the Improvement of the Federal Crop Insurance Program, Recommendations and Findings to Improve the Federal Crop Insurance Program 159-60 (GPO, 1989). Although the goal of the program was to replace disaster relief, the relatively low participation rate (approxi- mately 25%) has resulted in continued ex post relief. Federal Crop Insurance Commission Act of 1988, 134 Cong Rec H8228, H8230 (Sept 26, 1988) (statement of Rep. Ed Jones) ("producer participation in the program [has not been] sufficient to forestall the political pressures that always come to bear when natural disasters strike a wide path, especially in an election year.").

REV_00261532

n48 Individuals may rationally underinsure because they know that there is a chance of relief for uninsured losses. But we should not expect individuals to further underinsure in order to increase the chance of relief, because any one person will have an insignificant effect on the overall amount of uninsured losses or on the probability that public sympathy will develop for devastated individuals.

n49 I ignore the possibility that their representatives might selfishly wish to maximize relief efforts in order to get credit for the program.

n50 Based on 1990 Congressional testimony, State Farm records indicated that only 28% of Californians with homeowners insurance also had earthquake insurance. Earth- quakes and Earthquake Insurance, 101st Cong 2d Sess at 60 (cited in note 43) (statement of Frank Nutter, The Earthquake Project, Alliance of American Insurers). On a more limited scale, an insurance company with 37,000 homeowner's policies in the Bay Area es- timated that only 30% of its policyholders had earthquake insurance. Id at 52 (statement of Peter Lefkin, Fireman's Fund Insurance Co.).

The Flood Disaster Protection Act of 1973, Pub L No 90-448, 82 Stat 476 (1973), codified as amended at 42 USCA sections 4001 et seq (1994), makes flood insurance a requirement on new mortgages for property in identified flood areas. A similar requirement has been recommended for earthquakes. See Howard Kunreuther, et al, Disaster Insurance Protection: Public Policy Lessons 253 (Wiley & Sons, 1978).

n51 John Mixon and Ira B. Shepard, Antideficiency Relief for Foreclosed Homeowners: ULSIA Section 511(b), 27 Wake Forest L Rev 455, 476 (1992) (noting that California homeowners are protected from deficiency judgments more than homeowners who lived in the oil-states were during the 1980's recession). California's anti-deficiency statutes, which were enacted in the 1930's, limit the mortgagee's right to seek a deficiency judgment and even eliminate that right in certain circumstances, such as a mortgage that is foreclosed through a private sale. David A. Leipziger, Deficiency Judgments in California: The Supreme Court Tries Again, 22 UCLA L Rev 753, 753 n 1 (1975); see generally the "anti-deficiency statutes" contained in the Cal Civ Proc Code sections 580a, 580b, 580d, 726 (West 1993).

n52 They may also insure home contents, but again there is quite a moral hazard associated with relief for such personal property. A less likely, but provocative, example of this implicit collusion may be the exclusion in most insurance policies for losses re- sulting from acts of war. The expectation may be that insurance will reduce the likelihood of charitable or governmental relief.

n53 There will also be fewer borrowers if insurance is required because insurance raises the cost of homebuying and so forth.

n54 Note that an insurance policy that covered earthquake-related losses in the event that fewer than 500 houses were damaged (or less subtly, in the event that no govern- ment-sponsored relief arrived) would dramatically reduce the likelihood of sympathy and relief.

n55 Pub L No 90-448, 82 Stat 476 (1968), codified as amended at 42 USCA sections 4001 et seq (1994).

n56 Id at section 4011(b) (flood insurance program should encourage participation by private insurers); id at section 4022 (no new flood insurance provided unless adequate land use and control measures are adopted).

REV_00261533

n57 Kunreuther, Recovery from Natural Disasters at 25 (cited in note 13).

There is also evidence that even when communities qualified, most residents did not purchase flood insurance. Kunreuther, Disaster Insurance Protection at 6 (cited in note 50). In 1973, Congress attempted to overcome this problem by denying federal financial assistance for the construction or acquisition of buildings to communities and individuals that did not join the National Flood Insurance Program or purchase flood insurance after enrollment in the program. Id at 6-7.

n58 See for example, Kunreuther, Recovery from Natural Disasters at 24-25 (cited in note 13) (disaster aid provided after Tropical Storm Doria flooded homes of New Jersey residents who were eligible for flood insurance, even though the 1968 Act provided that such individuals were ineligible).

n59 If there is a competitive market in the provision of the insurance, price controls are unnecessary. In the case of health insurance, proposals for mandates are usually accompanied by regulation or price control plans because such competition is not universally expected.

n60 The automobile insurance example reflects an implication of the present Article, that victims who are unlikely to attract sympathy and post-disaster relief might choose pre-disaster precautions.

n61 See text accompanying note 21.

n62 In cases where pre-disaster subsidies exceed the expected value of the post-disaster relief that would have been available in the absence of a pre-disaster program, it is no mystery why interest groups might prefer pre- rather than post-disaster programs. But it does not appear to be the case that pre-disaster programs are more generous than their post-disaster "substitutes." The move to pre-disaster relief is thus not simply one of "entitlement creep."

n63 By "defeat" I mean prevails over in the political process.

n64 For a similar kind of cycling, see Saul Levmore, Parliamentary Law, Majority Decisionmaking, and the Voting Paradox, 75 Va L Rev 971 (1989).

n65 The cycling need not be the same for every disaster and relief program. But in the case of earthquakes and floods, for instance, it is easy to imagine that post-disaster relief defeats no relief (when sizable losses generate sympathy), that pre-disaster subsidized insurance defeats post-disaster relief, and then that no relief defeats pre-disaster subsidies. It is also possible that a proposal for pre-disaster unsubsidized mandates defeats pre- disaster subsidies--but that these are sometimes hard to live up to so that post-disaster relief again defeats no relief.

n66 To the extent that post-disaster relief is likely, there may be groups that would prefer for national health insurance proposals to fail. Insurance will extract premiums from these high risk groups while post-disaster relief would have provided relief at lower cost.

n67 The mobility problem is that workers who develop health problems will be un- wanted in new insurance pools. The most obvious solution to this problem is to break the link between the workplace and the insurance pool, but the evolution of tax laws and insurance schemes makes this difficult to do without a move toward a national or regional health system.

REV_00261534

n68 It has been estimated that the total annual cost of health care provided to uninsured Americans is $ 9.7 billion. Note, Eliminating Patient Dumping: A Proposal for Model Legislation, 28 Valp U L Rev 291, 292 (1993). As anecdotal evidence, it is often stated that much of this cost can be attributed to the failure of uninsured persons to seek medical care until they are in need of emergency care. Health Care Reform: Pizza Hut, McDonald's, and the Fast-Food Industry, 140 Cong Rec H6333-02, H6335 (July 27, 1994) (statement by Rep. Rosa Delauro).

n69 More accurately, voters will care for those with whom they empathize.

n70 I include the moral, political, and practical impossibility of moving to a no-relief scheme.

n71 When the Pacific Northwest floods of 1964 struck just eight months after the Alas- ka earthquake of 1964, a congressman from the Pacific Northwest cited the Alaska relief as precedent. Dacy and Kunreuther, The Economics of Natural Disasters at 54-55 (cited in note 13). Oregon Congressman Al Ullman stated that "we seek no preferential treatment, only assistance parallel to . . . the Alaska earthquake." Id at 54-55. The Pacific Northwest Disaster Relief Act of 1965, Pub L No 89-41, 79 Stat 131 (1965), provided Alaska with 30-year loans and $ 70 million for highway reconstruction. Dacy and Kunreuther, The Economics of Natural Disasters at 55 (cited in note 13). By contrast, neither the subsequent Upper Mississippi floods nor the extraordinarily destructive tornados that hit the Midwest on Palm Sunday, 1965 produced special legislation. Id.

n72 By order of consideration I refer to the familiar idea that where there is cycling and a voting paradox, the order of consideration will determine the outcome that is approved by majority (or other) vote. The same may be true here if voters are disinclined to return to a scheme that was once found deficient.

n73 See text accompanying note 4.

n74 Thus, there may be evolutionary advantages to workers' compensation systems and other no-fault systems over more ex post tort law even when such insurance schemes do not incorporate substantial redistributive components. But inasmuch as my sense is that most pre-disaster schemes do involve subsidies or other means of redistribution, I empha- size the option of pre-disaster relief and simply leave open the possibility of subsequent movement toward unsubsidized mandates.

n75 See text accompanying notes 21 and 61.

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: ((insurance) /20 war or terrorism) and risk and property and life and (exclusion /20 (war or terrorism)) and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 2, 2001 - 10:00 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00261535

strike a group that is previously organized but not geographical- ly--and therefore politically--advantaged. For example, Black Lung Disease was largely coincidental with membership in a single union (and also with residence in a small number of states), and Agent Orange posed a political task for previously organized veterans. We might surmise that previously organized victims are, at the very least, poised to act when disaster strikes and, in most cases, able to generate relief for the very reasons that they were able to organize in the first place. [6] Recurring disasters, such as crop failures or floods, might motivate groups to organize in preparation for future calamities.

On the other hand, nonrepetition can be an advantage in securing relief because unique disasters are less threatening to taxpayers. Compare, for example, the victims of a mad gunslinger who opens fire in a restaurant with those who suffer at the hands of an invading army which does damage before being subdued. These groups are similar in terms of geographic representation, likely exposure to media coverage, ongoing organization, and moral hazard concerns (none), and we might imagine them to be of identical size. And in neither case is there likely to be a failure of the capital markets such that victims would have difficulty borrowing funds in order to rebuild profitable businesses. [7] But I think it fair to say that relief is most unlikely in the gunslinger situation and yet possible in the "invasion" setting. [8] While the gunslinger's victims could have purchased private insurance more easily than the invasion's victims, I suspect that the important difference between the two settings is that relief seems more likely for unique disasters. In other words, it is difficult to rationalize compensa- tion for the victims of one murderer because we are unlikely to offer relief to all victims of murderers. Hence, even though victims of an invasion are hardly well organized, the uniqueness of the event makes relief plausible. However, we should recognize that "uniqueness" may simply camouflage the importance of insurability. It may be that victims of murder fail to gain relief because they could have insured, and that the invasion victims might get relief not because their problem is unique but rather because acts of war are generally excluded from insurance coverages. [9] If pieces of a meteor landed and did similar damage, my intuition is that there would be no relief unless the losses fell deeply and widely on a well organized interest group. If so, insurability and organization do all the predictive work, and uniqueness is superfluous. [10]

If, in order to create or excite a formidable interest group, it is "advanta- geous" for a victim to be one of many ravaged by a given disaster, it is neverthe- less likely that the group of losers can grow too large. For example, victims of crime may in reality simply be too numerous to subsidize. If the cost of relief is very great, even the most dispersed and passive majority will notice the grave threat to tax rates or other government programs; and if the cost is constrained by limiting each victim's relief, then the net potential recovery per victim may be sufficiently small that victims will not find it worthwhile to organize at all.

There are, of course, counterexamples where very large--but not well organized--subsets of the population extract reimbursement for discrete losses. Supplemental unemployment benefits may be one such example. [11] But relief for discrete losses suffered by a large unorganized subset of the population generally comes not in the form of taxpayer-sponsored relief, but instead in the form of (apparent) burden-shifting to another disfavored or unorganized group. Rules barring foreclosures and requirements that workplaces or buildings accommodate disabled persons illustrate this idea.

A related phenomenon concerns the structure of relief. When an interest group is successful in obtaining post-disaster relief, it is most unlikely to reim- burse the fisc in a future time period. Thus, if farmers in the Mississippi Valley gain aid after serious flooding, we do not expect that region to be required to pay higher taxes than the rest of the country in a year in which weather condi- tions and harvests are especially favorable. The very characteristics of interest group politics that are associated with the existence of post-disaster relief also support the interest group's ability to ward off special assessments or other "extra" burdens. There are important historical exceptions to this observation, including a windfall profits tax on domestically produced oil and higher taxes on businesses enjoying supernormal profits during war, but these are relatively unusual political developments and are facilitated by the presence of wars, embargoes, and other salient events that focus political attention on large numbers of voters rather than on organized interests. [12]

Although geographic concentration seems to spawn relief, other variables must also play a role. West Virginia and California, for example, have suffered disasters that are fairly state-specific, but they are not equally successful in extracting federal funds. It may be useful to learn about the political experience and connections of those who represent these interests, but it is likely that there are other factors that explain the relative successes of various disaster victims. I turn first to considerations that do not have much to do with positive political theory and then in Section II-C to the possibility that the expectation of relief payments stimulates prudent disaster-mitigating investments earlier in time.

B. Other Considerations

1. Identification.

It is easy to imagine that voters are more likely to come to the assistance of fellow citizens when they can identify with these beneficiaries. A related possibili- ty is that relief may be conceived of as part of a mutual insurance arrangement. For instance, farmers in South Dakota may be among the first to favor relief for drought-stricken farmers elsewhere--both because they identify with those in need and because they hope that other voters will follow the precedent of relief when a drought hits South Dakota. [13] However, this is not an especially useful explanation for post-earthquake relief because voters know that earthquakes are far more likely in some locations than in others. Yet it is also possible that relief follows empathy which, in turn, may be linked to personal familiarity. Influential citizens or politicians (and their aides) may identify more with (or simply know many more of) the residents of Southern California than those of West Virginia.

2. Moral hazard.

The prospect of public assistance generally raises the fear of moral hazard. The most familiar example is that flood relief or subsidized flood insurance may encourage inefficient building on flood plains. It is difficult to assess the relative magnitudes of moral hazards, but it seems plausible that the moral hazard accompanying drought relief is less serious than that associated with such familiar relief as unemployment benefits. It is even more difficult to evaluate the moral hazard problem associated with earthquake relief--both because subsidies can be made to be conditional on disaster-mitigating steps [14] and because there is not much post-earthquake individual behavior at stake (although the prospect of relief may well lead to greater development in areas with substantial earth- quake risk). In the case of flood insurance, subsidies are often contingent on a community or an individual insured adopting steps likely to mitigate damage, so that there may actually be less loss than there would have been in the absence of the insurance program in the first place. [15] Moreover, post-disaster relief may re- duce losses if relief funds can only be used to redevelop in accordance with disaster-mitigating regulations. Conditional relief can, at least in theory, reverse the obvious moral hazard accompanying the prospect of subsidizing victims. In any event, as a positive matter the moral hazard problem does not seem well correlated with the absence of disaster relief. Losses from war and unpreventable diseases do not, for example, normally trigger relief efforts, while post-flood relief, which is fairly common, may create a serious moral hazard problem.

3. Government as partner.

It may be tempting to think of some post-disaster relief as reflecting an implicit private-public partnership. We tax Californians when they prosper and therefore, the argument proceeds, we ought to subsidize them when they suffer from an earthquake. There is a ring of fairness to this explanation, but also a fairly intuitive efficiency claim about the neutral treatment of risky invest- ments. [16] The suggestion is that the correct amount of investment and risk-taking will be encouraged in a system where the government, if it shares in gains, also shares in losses. In the case of post-disaster relief it is even possible, as a positive matter, to point optimistically to the nature and magnitude of relief. The relief following recent California earthquakes, for example, could be described as mirroring the tax rates imposed (in the absence of disaster) by the federal government on profitable enterprises or perhaps on appreciated residences. [17]

REV_00261511

But this optimistic, partnership-like view of relief is probably misguided. If the economic activity found in Southern California were instead in another location, far from a fault line, the federal government would still tax away a large share of the profit earned in these activities and would then not need to pay for disaster-related losses. The analysis is thus closely related to the moral hazard discussion in the preceding section because relief expenditures might be seen as efficient and fair only when the profits themselves (taxed away in good times) were somehow linked to the risk of earthquake or drought or other relief- prone disaster. Put differently, most of the activity that takes place in Southern California and that is taxed by the federal government could also occur (and be taxed) in other locations, so that post-earthquake relief is not necessary to encourage the activity. And as a matter of fairness alone it is difficult to see why taxpayers should pay Californians for the losses that they suffer when, or to the extent that, these activities take place in California because people enjoy living there rather than somewhere else. On the other hand, to the extent that more profitable farmland is likely to be in flood-prone areas, the partnership view is positively and normatively attractive with regard to flood relief, as well as many other kinds of disaster relief.

C. Democracy and Disaster

1. Internalization.

The most optimistic explanation for post-disaster relief is that governments agree to provide relief when, or even because, the prospect of such future expenditures creates desirable incentives for preventive measures. If taxpayers and their representatives know that they will pay for a substantial fraction of losses caused by floods, then there is an incentive to invest in such things as levees and floodplain management in order to economize on disaster relief. But, if the government paid the entire cost of relief and rehabilitation, there might be too substantial a moral hazard problem. A government that was forced to share in relief, however, might leave potential victims with suitable incentives even while encouraging itself to take the most efficient preventive measures. [18]

There are some enticing examples of this internalization idea. The rising popularity of national health insurance can, for example, be described as sensible because the government funds, and therefore controls, the direction of medical research and disease prevention efforts. This theory suggests, perhaps correctly, that relief would be provided in the event of a military invasion. It fails, howev- er, to predict the (rather universal) low level of relief for those who perish in the service of their country. [19]

But this straightforward internalization suggestion is far too optimistic. There is, first, a missing link in the argument. If the government is motivated by either public opinion or other means always to provide disaster relief, then why is it not simply and more directly motivated by the same forces to invest regularly in efficient mitigation? [20] Moreover, there does not appear to be much of a connec- tion between disasters that beget relief and disasters that could be efficiently minimized by the government. Post-disaster relief appears to be more likely following earthquakes and hurricanes than in the aftermath of major fires, but government-initiated prevention would seem to be at least as effective for fires. Similarly, there is rarely post-disaster relief for crime victims, although a govern- ment that compensated all victims of crime or, perhaps to avoid moral hazard problems, all victims of serious violent crime, would surely take the cost of crime much more seriously. Finally, the optimistic internalization argument, or the little that is left of it, is weakened by the fact that when the federal government provides relief, it is often the state and local governments that are better situated to effect preventive measures. [21]

REV_00261512

In short, if the internalization argument suggested here were completely successful there would be no puzzle as to when government-sponsored relief was forthcoming because the claim would be that we would find relief whenever ef- ficient mitigation was in the same government's hands. Citizens would always demand relief as a precommitment to efficient precautions. In reality, however, relief is much more occasional. Moreover, the internalization idea lacks connec- tive fiber between payments and prevention. The prospect of paying losses in tort or contract may well motivate private parties to take efficient precautions, but it is hard to see how the prospect of disaster relief encourages legislators or bureaucrats to invest in precautions. If legislators or other government officials are simply inclined to do that which is socially desirable, disaster relief is a superfluous intermediating incentive. And if instead these agents need encourage- ment, it is hard to see how the prospect of disaster relief forces their hands with respect to pre-disaster precaution-taking.

2. Partial internalization.

I have imagined a (counterfactual) world in which disaster relief is promised in order to encourage the promisor or its agents to make efficient investments in disaster-mitigation, and I have suggested that ours is not such a world, if only because disaster relief is in fact not always forthcoming. It is possible, however, that some subset of efficient precautions is encouraged by the promise or history of disaster relief. In particular, if disaster relief follows public "sympathy" or interest group pressure of some kind, or even if relief is largely unpredictable, the government might wisely take cost effective precautions to reduce the subsequent costs of relief. The unpredictable quality of this impetus for relief might well generate too few precautions, but at least the precautions that are taken will be efficient. My suggestion is that whatever the explanation of the availability of disaster relief, the prospect of such relief will generate some efficient government- sponsored precautions.

If, for example, the government knew that it would be forced to compensate all losses from all hurricanes, then it might invest in every efficient precaution in order to reduce these expenditures. I have, of course, not yet specified the mechanism that would encourage such efficient investments--and indeed I have expressed some skepticism regarding the likelihood that "the government" has any incentive at all to do the sensible thing. But in order to consider the problem one layer at a time, assume for the present that the government is perfectly responsive to financial incentives, so that the prospect of spending now in order to save later is attractive. Under such an assumption it is again obvious that full internalization--reduced only to control moral hazard problems--will lead to efficient precaution-taking.

Now what if there is "partial internalization," so that the government is expected not to compensate a large fraction of all hurricane-related losses, for instance, but rather half (or some other fraction) of all losses caused by one out of two hurricanes? The government might perceive that political coalitions and media coverage are such that relief will not always be required, but it will know that there is some positive probability that it will be forced to provide post- disaster relief. This expectation should encourage the government to take some steps to reduce losses. If, for example, a better bridge can be constructed at a cost of one hundred million dollars, and this hurricane-resistant bridge provides an expected benefit in present value terms of five hundred million dollars, then the government is encouraged to invest in this precaution because it expects to pay about one-quarter of all hurricane-related losses, and the return to this investment is more than four hundred percent. In contrast, we might wish the government to build a given storm sewer system or stockpile relief supplies at a cost of $ 0.9 billion with an expected social benefit in present value terms of $ 1 billion, but a government that was perfectly responsive to financial incentives, that expected to pay only a fraction (such as 25 percent, or anything less than 90 percent) of losses, and that was otherwise unresponsive to voters and social costs would not invest in these precautions. The point is that partial internalization might lead to some efficient precautions, even if it is unlikely to encourage investment in all efficient, available precautionary projects. With this point in mind we can turn to the causal connection between expected relief expenditures and the incentive to invest in pre-disaster precautions.

REV_00261513

3. Feedback loops.

a) Taking "sympathy" as given. It is possible that elected leaders or other public servants act in the best interests of their constituents and seek out effi- cient, disaster-mitigating steps suitable for government intervention. This optimis- tic view of disaster mitigation has very little to say about disaster relief. There is no social benefit from full or partial internalization, for the government is by hypothesis already eager to undertake efficient precautions. The occasional availability of post-disaster relief might simply be explained with a combination of most of the variables discussed in Sections II-A and B--but with no role for internalization.

I prefer to make something of the connection between post-disaster relief and a variety of pre-disaster programs. For example, there is little doubt that experi- ence with flood relief has generated both subsidized flood insurance programs and attempts to regulate the quantity and quality of development on flood plains. [22] It seems likely that other pre-disaster programs have arisen not (or not only) out of direct attempts by the government to solve collective action prob- lems or to provide public goods in an efficient manner, but rather as a reaction to, and in anticipation of, expected post-disaster relief costs.

One simple suggestion is that the political disposition toward occasional post-disaster relief (based on geography, "sympathy," and so forth) causes a variety of interest groups to respond with pre-disaster programs. [23] Some of these pre-disaster steps will be efficient precautionary investments and others may simply be redistributive or simply inefficient schemes designed to benefit some groups while attracting support (or minimizing strong opposition) because of their ability to reduce the likelihood, and therefore the expense, of post- disaster relief. Put differently, even if we are unable to develop a perfect positive theory of when to expect post-disaster relief, the prospect of some positive probability of paying out such relief generates pre-disaster effects. We might imagine that citizens or their public-regarding agents will take these pre-disaster steps if they anticipate paying out more post-disaster relief to their fellow citizens. Alternatively, and perhaps more strangely, we might imagine various selfish interest groups as supporting--or at least as not opposing--pre-disaster investments or regulations simply to avoid post-disaster relief efforts that will draw on the fisc and reduce the chance that programs favored by these interest groups can be funded. The most likely story is that important players in the political process oppose (even many of the most efficient) pre-disaster precau- tions when the likelihood of post-disaster relief is low, but favor (and certainly do not block) exceptionally efficient precautions when the probability of more expensive post-disaster relief is high.

I do not mean to ignore either the collective action problem that might exist among interest groups or the possibility that self-serving interest groups will propose inefficient spending programs in the name of disaster mitigation. Turning first to the problem of self-serving interest groups, it is noteworthy that a purely public-regarding citizen, politician, or group could encourage many efficient precautions not with pre-disaster subsidies--which are normally the easiest means of enriching the very interest groups that might lead the charge for such pre-disaster "mitigation"--but rather with unfunded mandates. The federal government could require private insurance, local building codes, zoning strate- gies, and other steps that might efficiently reduce the need for post-disaster relief at no obvious expense to the federal fisc. One problem with this strategy (on the part of concerned interest groups) is that it is difficult to displace the expectation of post-disaster sympathy. An unsubtle government will simply require these precautions or will announce that future relief is conditional on these pre-disaster precautions. Yet when disaster strikes, the political propulsion toward relief may not be inhibited by the fact that many victims did not abide by earlier warn- ings. [24]

REV_00261514

b) Famines and feedback mechanisms. Famines present a useful illustration of the feedback loop between post-disaster relief and pre-disaster precautions. Famines also present a striking example of the mechanism I have in mind because we tend to think of famines as completely avoidable, although in some sense starvation and malnutrition can be avoided at a cost in much the way all hurricane and crime losses might be prevented at a cost. Finally, famines offer an opportunity to think about the collective action problem among interest groups because some methods of relief or prevention generate obvious benefits to discrete groups.

Amartya Sen has explored the remarkable ability of democracies--or more precisely, nations with elected leaders and free presses--to avoid major fam- ines. [25] We might simply assume that this remarkable connection is robust; even poor democracies stave off famines while more affluent countries, that have neither a lively press to report on problems and incompetence, nor rulers who suffer in the event of disaster, endure famines. But what is the mechanism that averts this particular disaster? Sen implies that because elected leaders know that they will not survive an avoidable famine of great magnitude, they support investments in networks of roads, public employment programs, or other disaster-mitigating steps in order to prevent famines in the first place. [26] Put more cynically, elected leaders appear to survive easily in the face of some malnutrition and disease, but if these problems grow to some level of salience, then the media attention that follows makes it impossible for these leaders to survive in office.

There is room to quibble with this straightforward feedback mechanism because elected leaders might be able to blame those who preceded them by one or two terms for the failure to invest in infrastructure and the like. Indeed, Sen may really mean that once a famine strikes, a politically responsible government will be forced to take steps to avert a catastrophic event. If food shortages appear, a responsible government might be forced to redistribute wealth, release reserve stocks, engage in public works programs to redistribute wealth, and take other steps that lead the press and the electorate to marvel at their leaders in crisis rather than depose them at the next election. Sen's evidence may be consistent with this depiction of crisis and elected leadership because it suggests a connection between democracy and the absence of major famines. A cynic might even say that in democracies there will be more frequent crises because constituent groups perceive that the prospect of a major disaster will arouse the attention of otherwise unresponsive governments. In any event, the critical suggestion is that crises stimulate effective responses. Bits of Sen's work can be understood as favoring this alternative account of democracy and disaster, [27] but to a degree it is an unflattering picture (even) of democracy, for it suggests that democratic governments may preside over numerous small-scale tragedies that are in the aggregate no less horrible than the occasional large-scale disasters they avoid.

An ancillary view of the democracy-famine connection returns us to the internalization theme. While electoral feedback forces relief in the event of a famine, [28] it is the prospect of such costly relief that causes politicians to make more efficient pre-disaster investments in order to prevent famine in the first place. And if politicians are not inclined to make these investments because, as suggested earlier, current investments may only affect the likelihood of disaster long after they need to run for reelection, a variety of interest groups may nev- ertheless push politicians to make these investments because the potential economic burden of famine relief threatens competing programs that these other groups desire. [29] Perhaps the most likely story is that some citizens and politi- cians will propose sensible precautions and organized groups will not oppose these plans because the long-term investments are solid even from the perspective of the interest groups that do not immediately gain from precautionary steps. When post-disaster relief is not expected, interest groups will oppose even efficient precautions because the costs associated with these precautions are borne by taxpayers (including the members of these potent interest groups) although most of the benefits accrue to disaster victims. In contrast, when post- disaster relief is expected (because of sympathy and interest group pressures), "unrelated" interest groups will not oppose dramatically efficient precautions because of the expected savings in post-disaster relief.

REV_00261515

Moreover, any collective action problem among citizens and these unrelated interest groups might be overcome by the work of "related" interest groups, such as those interested in road building or grain storage contracts, that stand to gain directly from famine avoidance investments. [30] Indeed, the dynamics among interest groups might explain the precise means by which democracies avoid serious famines; cash grants may lose out to roadbuilding, stockpiling, and in- kind distributions because the latter methods may more powerfully motivate interest groups to form coalitions with other groups which seek only to encour- age efficient investments that will create a bigger pie later on.

This internalization argument implicates democracy to the extent that informed voters will want their leaders to ease the suffering of fellow citi- zens--and that occasions will arise on which these voters will be painfully in- formed. [31] A democratic government can therefore be expected both to respond to and to mitigate such a disaster. In turn, some citizens or their agents or their selfish interest groups might wish for their government to invest in advance in order to avert famines if only because prevention is cheaper than the cure. Plainly, this indirect feedback story assumes that it is in fact generally less expensive to avoid famines in the first place than to provide aid once they occur.

In the case of famine, it is noteworthy that the prospect of relief probably creates little moral hazard because even if individuals knew that famine relief would be forthcoming, they would still hardly want to be among those who suffer before their fellow citizens apply sympathetic pressure or before their leaders step in to avert a major famine. One may quarrel with the proper method of intervention, [32] but it is difficult to be opposed to all disaster relief in the case of a large-scale famine.

c) Democracy and disaster mitigation. I am not suggesting that all disasters ought to generate relief. There are, for example, more serious moral hazard problems associated with relief following floods, hurricanes, and earthquakes. In advanced economies, most potential victims will be at little risk of serious personal injury where these natural disasters are concerned, and the prospect of relief for property losses may lead to greater losses than would be borne in the absence of expected relief. My point instead is that in all these cases relief may be "forced" on the government by a sympathetic citizenry, and the prospect of these relief expenses may stimulate disaster-mitigating steps--with no serious opposition because of the efficiency of these steps. In short, prevention may be undertaken if it is cheaper than a cure and, at least in theory, those who favor pre-disaster precautions will take the moral hazard problem into account when comparing the cost of prevention and cure. If the prospect of relief generates losses, interest groups may either favor disaster-mitigating investments that combat the moral hazard, perhaps by conditioning investments on certain behavior, or they will simply oppose the investments, knowing that they will do more harm than good. [33] Again, the critical triggering device (and one that separates responsive from nonresponsive governments) is that it is understood that in the event of a major disaster there is a positive chance that the govern- ment will be forced to provide relief. We might understand the correlation between democracy and the absence of famine as following from the notion that since a serious famine is expected to lead to relief with a probability of one, democracies always invest in preventing such famines because the prevention, or at least intervention once a famine begins and before it becomes severe, is much cheaper than the cure. In the case of other disasters, including less serious fam- ines, relief is less certain, perhaps because much depends on where the disaster strikes or how media coverage proceeds, so prevention is found less worthwhile.

More generally, once we recognize the implications of Sen's categorization of "serious famines," [34] the basic connection between democracy and disaster- avoidance can probably be made for most disasters. Much as democracies do experience some starvation and malnutrition, but not famines that claim the lives of twenty million citizens, so too

REV_00261516

****
 TX REPORT ***
****

TRANSMISSION OK

TX/RX NO	3388
CONNECTION TEL	92252338
CONNECTION ID
ST. TIME	10/30 13:52
USAGE T	00'39
PGS. SENT	2
RESULT	OK

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

OFFICE OF THE COUNSEL TO THE PRESIDENT

FACSIMILE COVER SHEET

Date: _____ Time: _____

To: Paul Taylor

Fax: 225-2338

From: Brett Kavanaugh

Phone: (202) 456-7900 Fax: (202) 456-1647

Number of Pages (including cover sheet): 2

Message:

Paul: We thought this would accomplish the goals (as well as an offset) in a short packad. We should talk re

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

OFFICE OF THE COUNSEL TO THE PRESIDENT

FACSIMILE COVER SHEET

Date: _____ Time: _____

To: Paul Taylor

Fax: 225-2338

From: Brett Kavanaugh

Phone: (202) 456-7900 Fax: (202) 456-1647

Number of Pages (including cover sheet): 2

Message:

Paul: We thought this would accomplish the goals (as well as an offset) in a short package. We should talk re attorneys fees. Brett

Confidentiality Notice

The document accompanying this telecopy transmission contain confidential information belonging to the sender which is legally privileged. The information is intended only for the use of the individual or entity named above. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, or distribution or the taking of any action in reliance on the contents of this telecopied information is strictly prohibited. If you have received this telecopy in error, please immediately notify us by telephone to arrange for return of the original documents to us.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1. Short Title

Section 1 designates the short title of the Act as the "World Trade Center Liability Parity Act."

Section 2. Purpose

Section 2 sets forth the purpose of the Act. The purpose is to promote and encourage building on the site of the World Trade Center as a physical symbol of America's resolve to overcome terrorism by providing parity of treatment between air carriers protected under the recently adopted Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act (the "Air Transportation Act") and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey ("Port Authority") and other persons with property interests in the World Trade Center.

Section 101. Definitions

Section 101 defines "property owner" as the Port Authority and any other person with a property interest in the World Trade Center, whether that interest is fee simple, leasehold, or easement, either direct or indirect. The definition includes the 99-year lessees to the buildings known as World Trade Center Buildings 1, 2, 4, 5 and 7.

Section 102. Limit of Property Owners Liability

Section 102 amends Section 408(a) of the Air Transportation Act to provide that the liability of any property owner, as defined in the Act, with respect to all claims for liability of any sort, whether for compensatory or punitive damages, for contribution or indemnity, or for any other liability, arising from the terrorist-related aircraft crashes of September 11, 2001, shall be limited to the limits of liability insurance coverage available to such property owner. This provision places the property owners on equal footing with the air carriers, whose maximum claim liability was limited to the limits of their liability insurance by Section 408(a) of the recently adopted Air Transportation Act.

Section 103. Right of Subrogation

Section 103 qualifies the right of subrogation provided to the United States in Section 409 of the Air Transportation Act by providing that such right shall not exist against any air carrier or property owner.

U.S. CHAMBER INSTITUTE FOR LEGAL REFORM
1615 H STREET, NW
WASHINGTON, DC 20062
VOICE: (202) 463-5724
FAX: (202) 463-5302

FACSIMILE TRANSMISSION COVER LETTER

To:	Brett Cavanaugh	From:	Matt Webb
Fax:	(202) 456-1647	Pages:	22 (including cover)
Phone:		Date:	October 15, 2001
Re:	Airline Liability Bill Expansion	CC:

☐ Urgent X For Review ☐ Please Comment ☐ Please Reply ☐ Please Recycle

● Comments:

Brett –

Attached is a revised draft of the airline liability bill expansion and summary. Any comments you may have would be greatly appreciated.

THE INFORMATION IN THIS FACSIMILE IS INTENDED ONLY FOR THE USE OF THE INDIVIDUAL TO WHOM IT IS ADDRESSED AND MAY CONTAIN INFORMATION THAT IS PRIVILEGED AND CONFIDENTIAL. IF THE READER OF THIS MESSAGE IS NOT THE INTENDED RECIPIENT, YOU ARE HEREBY NOTIFIED THAT ANY DISSEMINATION, DISTRIBUTION OR COPYING OF THIS COMMUNICATION IS STRICTLY PROHIBITED. IF YOU HAVE RECEIVED THIS FACSIMILE IN ERROR, PLEASE NOTIFY THE ABOVE REFERENCED SENDER IMMEDIATELY AT (202) 463-5724.

Summary of "Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act"

In the recently enacted Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act (the "ATSSSA"), Congress addressed victim compensation and the economic ramifications of the September 11 tragedy, focusing primarily on the airline industry. The proposed Victims Of Terrorism Compensation Act (the "Victims Compensation Act") builds on those efforts by (1) establishing guidelines for litigation that results from any future terrorist acts in order to ensure swift and fair compensation to the victims of such attacks, while minimizing economic injury to innocent bystanders and (2) amending the ATSSSA to apply these guidelines to the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001.

I. Principal Provisions

A. Title I – Civil Litigation Mechanism Addressing Future Acts of Terrorism.

Title I of the Victims Compensation Act establishes a federal cause of action for victims of terrorist attacks that occur after September 11, 2001 and provides the ground rules for pursuing litigation related to such acts. The guiding principles of this Title are (a) to ensure an orderly, equitable process for providing swift compensation for persons who present legitimate claims, and (b) to protect innocent bystanders from being further victimized by the specter of misguided or excessive claims.

The bill would not restrict or otherwise affect the type and scope of claims that may be asserted against knowing participants in any act of terrorism. However, with regard to claims related to a terrorist attack that are asserted against other individuals or entities, the bill would:

- Establish an exclusive, simplified federal cause of action that allows terrorism victims to bring claims sounding in breach of contract, intentional fraud, or negligence. (Other causes of action (e.g., negligent misrepresentation or non-disclosure) would not be available.)

- Instruct the Judicial Panel for Multidistrict Litigation to transfer all claims related to a particular terrorist attack to a single district court for pretrial purposes and any ensuing trial.

- Provide that the substantive law governing breach of contract or fraud claims would be derived from that of the State whose law would apply under the choice-of-law principles of the State of the district court to which the claims are transferred.

- Provide that the substantive law governing negligence claims would be derived from the law of the State in which the act of terrorism occurred, except to the extent that such law is inconsistent with – or preempted by – federal law.

- Allow negligence claims to be brought only by individuals or entities that have suffered personal injury or property damage. Thus, for example, the cause of action would not be available to persons who arguably have claims only for lost profits (without any property damage) or emotional distress (unaccompanied by physical injury).

- Specify the remedies available under the new federal cause of action. Persons who assert negligence claims will be able to recover economic and noneconomic losses. The liability of each defendant for economic losses would be joint and several, but as to noneconomic losses, each defendant shall be liable only in direct proportion to its responsibility for the alleged harm. Persons who assert property damage claims may recover the replacement cost of such losses. As to such claims, the liability of each defendant shall also be proportional. Awards will not be subject to pre-judgment interest, and awards will be reduced by the amount of any collateral source compensation that the claimant has received.

- Preclude the award of any punitive damages against non-terrorists.

- Limit contingent attorney fees to lodestar-based fees, costs, reasonable expert witness fees, and reasonable expenses.

- Require that all negligence claims against non-terrorists be filed within one year of injury, except for claims arising from latent injuries arising out of substance exposures, which must be filed within one year of discovery or one year after such injuries should have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence. Breach of contract and fraud claims would be governed by normal rules.

B. Title II – Amendments to the Air Transportation Safety And System Stabilization Act to Provide A Civil Litigation Mechanism Addressing The Events Of September 11th

Title II of the Victims Compensation Act supplements the ATSSSA by applying many of the provisions in Title I to lawsuits that are brought for injuries suffered in the September 11th terrorist attacks.

The ATSSSA established a federally funded September 11th Victim Compensation Fund (the "Victim Fund") from which persons physically injured and the representatives of those killed in the events in New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia may obtain compensation. Persons who seek compensation from the Victim Fund waive their right to pursue claims through litigation. However, persons eligible to make claims to the Victim Fund who decide not to file a claim with the Victim Fund are free to pursue their claims through traditional litigation. Further, any person who sustained property or economic injuries resulting from the September 11th events also is free to litigate. As a result, it is expected that thousands of injured parties will sue hundreds of non-terrorist defendants (e.g., airlines, aircraft manufacturers, aircraft component manufacturers, airport authorities, security companies, building owners, building managers, architects, building contractors, building components manufacturers and suppliers, employers).

REV_00261544

The proposed Victim Compensation Act would set similar ground rules for this likely tidal wave of litigation to those established in Title I for future acts of terrorism. As with Title I, the bill would not restrict or otherwise affect the type and scope of claims that may be asserted against the September 11 terrorists or any person or entity that aided or abetted their activity. However, the bill would:

- Confirm the intent of the ATSSSA that all court claims arising out of the events of September 11 must be filed in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York.

- Confirm that the sole cause of action by which a person may seek compensation from non-terrorists for injuries/damages sustained in the September 11 attacks is the new federal cause of action established by the ATSSSA.

- Establish that under the new federal cause of action for asserting claims against non-terrorists, a claimant may sue for breach of contract or for intentional fraud (with the substantive law for such contract or fraud claims derived from the jurisdiction designated by the choice of law principles normally applied by the New York court) or for negligence (applying the same substantive law of the jurisdiction where the relevant aircrash occurred (either New York, Pennsylvania, or Virginia).

- Establish (as in Title I) that negligence claims under this new federal cause of action will be available only for personal injury, death, or property damage, and that such claims must be brought within one year (or, with regard to latent injuries resulting from substance exposures, within one year from the date of discovery or the date when such injuries should have been reasonably discovered).

- Establish the same remedies set forth in Title I for negligence and property damage claims (including the ban on punitive damages against non-terrorists and the reduction for collateral source compensation). Persons who assert property damage claims may recover the replacement cost of such losses. The joint and several liability provisions included in Title I would apply under Title II to lawsuits resulting from the September 11th terrorist attacks as well.

- Limit contingent attorney fees to lodestar-based fees, costs, reasonable expert witness fees, and reasonable expenses.

- Require that within 18 months, the court handling the claims shall report to Congress on the number and nature of the claims and the total amount of the claims asserted to that point. (The bill contains funding for the court's preparation of the report.)

- Declare that upon receiving the court's report regarding the claims filed, Congress "will take whatever action is determined to be necessary (including approval of appropriate compensation plans and appropriation of funds) to ensure that individuals and entities receive full compensation for legitimate claims and to ensure that the liability regarding such claims is not borne primarily by persons not involved in the perpetration of terrorist attacks."

REV_00261545

II. Rationale

The core dual rationale for the legislation is (a) to ensure that parties injured by terrorist attacks (including the events of September 11) may obtain swift and fair compensation and (b) also to ensure that such compensation burdens are not visited primarily on parties that have played no role in the primary causative acts in such terrorist attacks. The bill achieves those fundamental purposes in several ways:

- First, the bill would streamline the litigation process for victims of future terrorist attacks (and victims of the September 11th attack) by establishing a limited number of theories for recovery – a breach of contract claim (tracking traditional state law principles), a fraud claim (limited to actions based on intentional affirmative misrepresentations) and a negligence claim (derived wholly from state negligence law of the jurisdictions where the primary injuries occur). The bill requires that all tort claims (except for claims for certain latent injuries) be filed within one year from discovery, so that the court will be able to determine rapidly the full array of defendants and tort claims that must be resolved and proceed to do so as quickly as possible. (Breach of contract and fraud claims will be governed by normal limitations rules, since many of those claims will be insurance coverage matters that may not ripen within a shorter period.)

- Second, the bill would not affect the prosecution of any claims against the terrorists or their co-conspirators. Further, the bill would not in any way affect the ability of persons with insurance coverage – such as business interruption coverage – to file claims with their insurance carriers and to bring litigation related to those coverage claims.

- Third, every American family and business was affected by the September 11th attacks – Americans nationwide were glued to their television sets, mourning for the victims and worrying about the safety of their families. People stayed home, many businesses closed, and numerous trips and conventions were cancelled. The same outpouring of emotion is likely to occur in the event of future terrorist attacks against our nation as well. As a result, the bill would focus the litigation process on the claims that are most deserving of compensation – claims for personal injury and property damage. Further, the bill would prohibit the award of punitive damages based on the view that the judicial system should not punish Americans for the acts of terrorists and thereby help the terrorists achieve their evil ends by wreaking further havoc on the U.S. economy.

- Fourth, with regard to the September 11th attacks, the bill will establish a process by which litigation claims will be filed and by which the court will report to Congress the nature and aggregate amount of such claims. In the bill, Congress would commit to take the necessary steps to ensure that legitimate claims will be reasonably compensated without placing that burden on persons not involved in the terrorist activity that was the primary cause of the September 11 events. Hopefully, any necessary federal appropriations can be financed from assets seized essentially as war reparations from the terrorists and any governments or other entities that in any way aided and abetted their heinous acts.

REV_00261546

- Fifth, in enacting the ATSSSA, Congress intended that the Victim Fund would be the primary source of payments for personal injury and wrongful death claims. However, it is now becoming clear that because of the absence of reasonable restraints on the litigation process, the incentives will push most eligible claimants toward filing litigation and away from the Victim Fund. The bill would impose some reasonable restrictions on the litigation process, a step that would make the Victim Fund more attractive.

Monday, October 15, 2001 (5:45 pm)

REV_00261547

• Rove, Sumerlin, Silverberg, Fisher, Bair, Matt Kirk, Conklin, Krozner, Kavanaugh Westine, Mehlman

FYI / Kirk

156

VIA FACSIMILE

April 15, 2002

The Honorable Tom Daschle
Senate Majority Leader
5221 Capitol Building
Washington, DC 20510

The Honorable Dennis Hastert
Speaker of the House of Representatives
H232 Capitol Building
Washington, DC 20515

The Honorable Trent Lott Senate Republican Leader
S-230 Capitol Building
Washington, DC 20510

The Honorable Richard Gephardt House Democrat Leader
H-204 Capitol Building
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Congressional Leaders:

As a result of the events of September 11th, the nation's property and casualty insurance companies have or will pay out losses that will exceed $35 billion dollars. Since the first of January, many insurance companies, self-insurers and states have been faced with a situation where they are unable to spread the risk that they insure because of the unavailability of reinsurance protection. In the event of another major attack, some companies or perhaps a segment of the industry would face insolvency. While most states have approved a limited exclusion for terrorism with a $25 million deductible, exclusions for workers' compensation coverage are not permitted by statute in any state. The present situation poses a grave risk to the solvency of the insurance industry, state insurance facilities, economic development initiatives, and the ability of our states to recover from impacts of the September 11th attacks.

In the months after the attack on our nation, legislation passed in the House and was introduced in the Senate to create a backstop for the insurance industry so they could continue to provide protection to their customers. The Administration has also supported this concept. Currently, there is broad bi-partisan agreement for providing an insurance backstop. Governors believe this is an important goal that should not be inhibited by other issues.

Since late December, the lack of a financial backstop has started to ripple through the economy and will continue to do so. This will further impact the ability of the economy to recover from the current recession.

As Governors, we are facing many critical issues resulting from the September 11th crisis. The emerging problem in insurance coverage only serves to exacerbate our recovery efforts. In view of this, we, the undersigned Governors, respectfully urge the Congress to quickly complete its work on the terrorism reinsurance legislation in order to return stability to U.S. insurance markets.

Sincerely,

Sincerely,

Governor Jim Hodges
South Carolina

Governor John G. Rowland
Connecticut

Governor Mike Johanns
Nebraska

Governor Angus S. King Jr.
Maine

Governor Paul E. Patton Kentucky

Governor Mike Huckabee
Arkansas

Governor Judy Martz
Montana

Governor Jim Geringer
Wyoming

Governor Don Siegelman
Alabama

Governor George H. Ryan Illinois

Governor Bob Holden
Missouri

Governor Bill Owens
Colorado

Governor Mark R. Warner
Virginia

Governor Scott McCallum
Wisconsin

Governor Jeb Bush
Florida

Governor Jane Swift Massachusetts

Governor Frank O'Bannon
Indiana

Governor Bob Taft
Ohio

ROBERT C. BYRD, WEST VIRGINIA, CHAIRMAN

DANIEL K. INOUYE, HAWAII
ERNEST F. HOLLINGS, SOUTH CAROLINA
PATRICK J. LEAHY, VERMONT
TOM HARKIN, IOWA
BARBARA A. MIKULSKI, MARYLAND
HARRY REID, NEVADA
HERB KOHL, WISCONSIN
PATTY MURRAY, WASHINGTON
BYRON L. DORGAN, NORTH DAKOTA
DIANNE FEINSTEIN, CALIFORNIA
RICHARD J. DURBIN, ILLINOIS
TIM JOHNSON, SOUTH DAKOTA
MARY L. LANDRIEU, LOUISIANA
JACK REED, RHODE ISLAND

TED STEVENS, ALASKA
THAD COCHRAN, MISSISSIPPI
ARLEN SPECTER, PENNSYLVANIA
PETE V. DOMENICI, NEW MEXICO
CHRISTOPHER S. BOND, MISSOURI
MITCH MCCONNELL, KENTUCKY
CONRAD BURNS, MONTANA
RICHARD C. SHELBY, ALABAMA
JUDD GREGG, NEW HAMPSHIRE
ROBERT F. BENNETT, UTAH
BEN NIGHTHORSE CAMPBELL, COLORADO
LARRY CRAIG, IDAHO
KAY BAILEY HUTCHISON, TEXAS
MIKE DEWINE, OHIO

TERRENCE E. SAUVAIN, STAFF DIRECTOR
STEVEN J. CORTESE, MINORITY STAFF DIRECTOR

United States Senate

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS
WASHINGTON, DC 20510–6025

March 4, 2002

The Honorable Tom Ridge
Assistant to the President for Homeland Security
Executive Office of the President
The White House
Washington, DC 20502

Dear Governor Ridge:

In Securing the Homeland Strengthening the Nation, President Bush concludes that, "the threat of terrorism is an inescapable reality of life in the 21st Century. It is a permanent condition to which America and the entire world must adjust." We share the view that it is essential that Federal, state, and local governments must have a significant and sustained commitment to defend our homeland.

The Senate Appropriations Committee will be holding a series of hearings to examine closely the Federal response here at home to the events of September 11, 2001. The President's Budget for Fiscal Year 2003 includes requests for homeland defense funding in dozens of departments and agencies. In the Executive Order establishing the Office of Homeland Security, President Bush gives you the responsibility to certify that the funding levels contained in the Budget transmitted to the Congress are necessary and appropriate for the homeland security-related activities of the Executive Branch.

Therefore, you are the single Executive Branch official with the responsibility to integrate the many complex functions of the various Federal agencies in the formulation and execution of homeland defense programs. Your views and insights on the policies necessary to meet these objectives are critical to the Committee and the nation. As Chairman and Ranking Member of the Committee, we request that you testify before the Committee on April 9th, April 10th, or April 11th, 2002. The subcommittees of this Committee will address the detailed funding requests for the individual agencies and departments.

Thank you for your attention to this matter. We look forward to your early and positive response.

Sincerely yours,

Ted Stevens
Ranking Member

Robert C. Byrd
Chairman

RCB/TS:cek

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

June 16, 1992

Dear Mr. Chairman:

I am writing in response to your letter of June 11 to the President regarding your June 23 scheduled hearing. In that letter, you invited the Administration to send appropriate Administration officials to testify. We would propose to send Mr. Robert Mueller, Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division, Department of Justice, and Mr. Laurence Urgenson, Acting Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division, Department of Justice. In addition, I would note that the Administration has previously testified in great detail regarding pre-Desert Storm Iraq policy, the administration of the relevant programs and related investigations. I attach a copy of this testimony and ask that it be made available to all Committee Members before the hearing.

Your letter also requested the appearance of Mr. Nicholas Rostow, Special Assistant to the President and Senior Director for Legal Affairs, National Security Council; and Mr. C. Boyden Gray, Counsel to the President. As I advised the Chairman of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs in response to a similar request, it is the longstanding practice of the Executive Branch to decline requests for testimony by members of the President's personal staff. For that reason, I must decline your request for personal testimony by Messrs. Gray and Rostow. In light of the unusual circumstances presented here, however, the Administration is prepared to work with you to develop an alternative, mutually acceptable mechanism for making available to Members of the Committee the White House officials whose testimony you have sought.

Finally, attached to your letter was a request for documents from the Department of Agriculture, the State Department, the Department of Justice, the White House, the Department of the Treasury/U.S. Customs Service, and the Department of Commerce. In order to expedite a response to that request, we have forwarded it to the listed Departments outside the White House, and have directed them to respond directly to the Committee. In light of the large number of documents requested, it is unlikely that they or the White House will be able to meet the June 18 response date, but we have requested that they respond as quickly as possible.

REV_00261552

Sincerely,

Nicholas E Calio

Nicholas E. Calio
Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs

Chairman Jack Brooks
Committee on the Judiciary
House of Representatives
2138 Rayburn House Office Building
Washington, D.C. 20515-6218

cc: The Honorable Hamilton Fish, Jr.

attachments

REV_00261553

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT
OFFICE OF HOMELAND SECURITY
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20502

March 4, 2002

MEMORANDUM TO JUDGE ALBERTO GONZALES
TIM FLANIGAN

CC: ADM. STEVE ABBOT, MARK HOLMAN, DAVID ADDINGTON, BRETT KAVANAUGH

FROM: EDWARD McNALLY

SUBJECT: SENATE REQUEST FOR GOV. RIDGE'S TESTIMONY

Attached for your information and review is a copy of today's letter to Governor Ridge from Senators Robert Byrd and Ted Stevens of the Senate Appropriations Committee concerning the forthcoming "series of hearings" to "examine closely the Federal response here at home" to the events of September 11th. The letter states:

> "As Chairman and Ranking Member of the Committee, we request that you testify before the Committee on April 9th, April 10th, or April 11th, 2002."

Last week I provided you with copies of the 1999 memorandum by the Attorney General which concluded, among other issues, that the Counsel to the President, e.g., was immune from a subpoena to testify. By way of additional background, also attached here are copies of a set of June 1992 letters from Nick Calio and Boyden Gray concerning requests for testimony by Nick Rostow (who then held John Bellinger's position) and Boyden Gray (the Administration declined), and also regarding former presidential Chief of Staff Howard Baker. Also included is a memorandum prepared by OLC in 1994 concerning "Congressional Requests for Testimony of White House Officials", which provides a detailed history of how various administrations have addressed these issues during the past 50 years. I am available to discuss these matters at any time that is convenient to you.

ROBERT C. BYRD, WEST VIRGINIA, CHAIRMAN

DANIEL K. INOUYE, HAWAII
ERNEST F. HOLLINGS, SOUTH CAROLINA
PATRICK J. LEAHY, VERMONT
TOM HARKIN, IOWA
BARBARA A. MIKULSKI, MARYLAND
HARRY REID, NEVADA
HERB KOHL, WISCONSIN
PATTY MURRAY, WASHINGTON
BYRON L. DORGAN, NORTH DAKOTA
DIANNE FEINSTEIN, CALIFORNIA
RICHARD J. DURBIN, ILLINOIS
TIM JOHNSON, SOUTH DAKOTA
MARY L. LANDRIEU, LOUISIANA
JACK REED, RHODE ISLAND

TED STEVENS, ALASKA
THAD COCHRAN, MISSISSIPPI
ARLEN SPECTER, PENNSYLVANIA
PETE V. DOMENICI, NEW MEXICO
CHRISTOPHER S. BOND, MISSOURI
MITCH MCCONNELL, KENTUCKY
CONRAD BURNS, MONTANA
RICHARD C. SHELBY, ALABAMA
JUDD GREGG, NEW HAMPSHIRE
ROBERT F. BENNETT, UTAH
BEN NIGHTHORSE CAMPBELL, COLORADO
LARRY CRAIG, IDAHO
KAY BAILEY HUTCHISON, TEXAS
MIKE DEWINE, OHIO

TERRENCE E. SAUVAIN, STAFF DIRECTOR
STEVEN J. CORTESE, MINORITY STAFF DIRECTOR

United States Senate

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS
WASHINGTON, DC 20510-6025

March 4, 2002

The Honorable Tom Ridge
Assistant to the President for Homeland Security
Executive Office of the President
The White House
Washington, DC 20502

Dear Governor Ridge:

In Securing the Homeland Strengthening the Nation, President Bush concludes that, "the threat of terrorism is an inescapable reality of life in the 21st Century. It is a permanent condition to which America and the entire world must adjust." We share the view that it is essential that Federal, state, and local governments must have a significant and sustained commitment to defend our homeland.

The Senate Appropriations Committee will be holding a series of hearings to examine closely the Federal response here at home to the events of September 11, 2001. The President's Budget for Fiscal Year 2003 includes requests for homeland defense funding in dozens of departments and agencies. In the Executive Order establishing the Office of Homeland Security, President Bush gives you the responsibility to certify that the funding levels contained in the Budget transmitted to the Congress are necessary and appropriate for the homeland security-related activities of the Executive Branch.

Therefore, you are the single Executive Branch official with the responsibility to integrate the many complex functions of the various Federal agencies in the formulation and execution of homeland defense programs. Your views and insights on the policies necessary to meet these objectives are critical to the Committee and the nation. As Chairman and Ranking Member of the Committee, we request that you testify before the Committee on April 9th, April 10th, or April 11th, 2002. The subcommittees of this Committee will address the detailed funding requests for the individual agencies and departments.

Thank you for your attention to this matter. We look forward to your early and positive response.

Sincerely yours,

Ted Stevens
Ranking Member

Robert C. Byrd
Chairman

RCB/TS:cek

REV_00261555

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

June 16, 1992

Dear Mr. Chairman:

I am writing in response to your letter of June 11 to the President regarding your June 23 scheduled hearing. In that letter, you invited the Administration to send appropriate Administration officials to testify. We would propose to send Mr. Robert Mueller, Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division, Department of Justice, and Mr. Laurence Urgenson, Acting Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division, Department of Justice. In addition, I would note that the Administration has previously testified in great detail regarding pre-Desert Storm Iraq policy, the administration of the relevant programs and related investigations. I attach a copy of this testimony and ask that it be made available to all Committee Members before the hearing.

Your letter also requested the appearance of Mr. Nicholas Rostow, Special Assistant to the President and Senior Director for Legal Affairs, National Security Council; and Mr. C. Boyden Gray, Counsel to the President. As I advised the Chairman of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs in response to a similar request, it is the longstanding practice of the Executive Branch to decline requests for testimony by members of the President's personal staff. For that reason, I must decline your request for personal testimony by Messrs. Gray and Rostow. In light of the unusual circumstances presented here, however, the Administration is prepared to work with you to develop an alternative, mutually acceptable mechanism for making available to Members of the Committee the White House officials whose testimony you have sought.

Finally, attached to your letter was a request for documents from the Department of Agriculture, the State Department, the Department of Justice, the White House, the Department of the Treasury/U.S. Customs Service, and the Department of Commerce. In order to expedite a response to that request, we have forwarded it to the listed Departments outside the White House, and have directed them to respond directly to the Committee. In light of the large number of documents requested, it is unlikely that they or the White House will be able to meet the June 18 response date, but we have requested that they respond as quickly as possible.

REV_00261556

Sincerely,

Nicholas E Calio

Nicholas E. Calio
Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs

Chairman Jack Brooks
Committee on the Judiciary
House of Representatives
2138 Rayburn House Office Building
Washington, D.C. 20515-6218

cc: The Honorable Hamilton Fish, Jr.

attachments

REV_00261557

ANDREWS & KURTH
MAYOR, DAY, CALDWELL & KEETON
L.L.P.
ATTORNEYS

AUSTIN DALLAS
LONDON
LOS ANGELES
NEW YORK
THE WOODLANDS
WASHINGTON, D.C.

600 TRAVIS, SUITE 4200
HOUSTON, TEXAS 77002

TELEPHONE: 713.220.4200
FACSIMILE: 713.220.4285

FAX COVER SHEET

TO: Brett Kavanaugh COMPANY:

FROM: Terri Lacy EMPLOYEE NO.: 1175

DATE: December 21, 2001

FAX NO. : 202.456.5104 MATTER NO.: NO. OF PAGES (INCLUDING COVER SHEET) 3

CONFIRMATION NO.:

MESSAGE

To whom at the Post do we send this?

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTE

The information contained in this facsimile message is legally privileged and confidential information intended only for the use of the individual or entity named above. If the reader of this message is not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any dissemination, distribution or copy of this fax is strictly prohibited. If you have received this fax in error, please immediately notify us by telephone and return the original message to us at the address above via the United States Postal Service. Thank you.

Should you have any problems receiving this fax, please call (713) 220.4546.

ANDREWS & KURTH
MAYOR, DAY, CALDWELL & KEETON
L.L.P.
ATTORNEYS
600 TRAVIS, SUITE 4200
HOUSTON, TEXAS 77002

AUSTIN
DALLAS
LONDON
LOS ANGELES
NEW YORK
THE WOODLANDS
WASHINGTON, D.C.

TELEPHONE: 713.220.4200
FACSIMILE: 713.220.4285

TERRI LACY
DIRECT: 713.220.4482
email: terrilacy@akllp.com

December 21, 2001

The Washington Post Company
Washington, D.C.

Dear Sirs:

As President Bush's personal attorney, I write in response to Stephen Hensen's December 16 article regarding President Bush's Texas gubernatorial papers. Mr. Hensen alleges that Governor Bush's Administration somehow acted inappropriately by providing his official gubernatorial records to the George H.W. Bush Presidential Library at Texas A&M, rather than to the Texas State Library and Archives. Mr. Hensen's allegations are erroneous and misstate Texas law.

Contrary to Mr. Hensen's suggestions, Section 441.201 of the Texas Government Code expressly provides that "in consultation with the [Texas State Library and Archives] commission, a governor may designate an institution of higher education or alternate archival institution in the state, in lieu of the Texas State Library and Archives, as the repository for the records of the executive office of the governor created or received during that governor's term of office." Consistent with this law, in December 2000 then Governor Bush and the State Library and Archives Commission signed a Designation Agreement naming the George Bush Presidential Library and Museum in College Station, Texas, as the repository for the executive office records of Governor Bush's Administration. The records were then shipped to the Library with the knowledge of the Library's Director, David Alsobrook (a fact that belies Mr. Hensen's claim that Presidential Library officials were "surprised" at receiving the records).

Since that time, representatives for the State Library and Archives Commission, the federal National Archives and Records Administration, the Office of the Governor of the State of Texas and President Bush's personal representatives have worked diligently to finalize a memorandum of understanding concerning the processing of the papers. The parties plan to sign an interim memorandum that will govern the papers until the Texas Attorney General issues an opinion addressing certain issues that remain unresolved. After the issuance of that opinion, the parties will sign a final memorandum of understanding. In the meantime, however, requests from the public are being processed as expeditiously as possible consistent with the fact that it takes a substantial amount of time to properly catalogue this quantity of records.

HOU:727590.1

All of the parties in this process want the papers to be as accessible to the public as possible, and everyone has worked together in a spirit of cooperation to attain that goal.

Very truly yours,

Terri Lacy

Terri Lacy

1175:bt

JOHN A. MINTZ
ATTORNEY AT LAW
VIRGINIA AND WASHINGTON, D. C.
P.O. BOX 362 OAKTON, VA 22124
703-620-2537 FAX 703-620-0454

FACSIMILE TRANSMITTAL SHEET

TO: Brett Kavanaugh, Esq.	FROM: John A. Mintz
COMPANY: Associate Counsel to the President	DATE: 22 APRIL 2003
FAX NUMBER: 202-456-6279	TOTAL NO. OF PAGES INCLUDING COVER: ONE
PHONE NUMBER: 202-456-7984	SENDER'S REFERENCE NUMBER: 7014-21-22
RE: AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSN. v NARA	YOUR REFERENCE NUMBER:

Brett, thanks for your call today advising of the proposed revised language in a statement that DOJ proposes to file today in captioned suit. We have reviewed the revised language you provided and I am authorized to advise you that my client will offer no objection to the proposed filing or to the statement, as revised.

John A. Mintz

Brett

James M. Wootton
President

August 19, 2002

Dr. Glenn Hubbard
Chairman
Council of Economic Advisors
Eisenhower Executive Office Building 17th and Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20502

Dear Dr. Hubbard:

Thank you for taking the time to meet with Robert Hahn, John Schmitz and me to discuss tort reform and federalism. As you know, we very much look forward to working with you to promote both of these ideas within this Administration. We know that these issues are of great importance to President Bush who, as a former Governor and a business leader, has a unique perspective and understanding of the importance of a limited federal government that protects our liberty through the effective exercise of its Constitutionally enumerated powers

As President Bush underscored during his campaign, our civil justice system faces extraordinary problems that directly impact the national economy and our liberty. The dramatic increase in the number of lawsuits and the magnitude of jury awards have resulted in more than just direct losses to national business for liability payouts. Indeed, the current tort system imposes additional costs on the society as a whole by increasing the prices of consumer goods, discouraging technological innovation, and decreasing the supply of reasonably priced insurance. Early work by Peter Huber estimated that the economic impact of tort liability on American individuals, government organizations, and businesses is at least $80 billion a year. (Liability: The Legal Revolution and its Consequences 11-14, (1990)). More recent work by the Council of Economic Advisors (CEA) estimates direct costs of nearly $180 billion, or 1.8% of the gross domestic product (Who Pays for Tort Liability Claims? An Economic Analysis of the U.S. Tort Liability System, Council of Economic Advisors, April 2002, citing Tillinghast-Towers Perrin, U.S. Tort Costs: 2000, Trends and Findings on the Costs of the U.S. Tort System). The CEA white paper also notes that only an estimated 20% of those costs go to claimants for economic damages.

Because of the close relationship between national prosperity and a unified national marketplace our federalist system from the beginning contained the constitutional tenant that regulation of interstate commerce (as opposed to the regulation of schools or other areas that are local in nature) comes within the special authority and competence of the national government. Notably, recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions, ph (202) 463-5724 fax (202) 463-5302 jwootton@uschamber.com 1615 H Street, NW Washington, DC 20062-2000 including United States v. Lopez (514 U.S. 549 (1995)) and United States v. Morrison (529 U.S. 598 (2000)), have signaled that the Court is prepared to enforce this "enumerated powers" approach to the Constitution and its distinction between national and state authority. Thus, the President can and should be encouraged to take thoughtful and appropriate steps to address the abuses of our civil justice system whenever those abuses burden the free flow of the goods and services in interstate commerce.

In light of these developments, Governors John Engler (Michigan) and Frank Keating (Oklahoma) convened a Federalism Symposium in Washington, D.C. on June 6, 2001, to provide a forum to discuss how to advance simultaneously the federalism agenda of the governors, the original understanding and theoretical underpinnings of federalism, and the needs of the business community. Sponsored by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce Institute for Legal Reform, the Federalism Symposium was attended by leaders in the business community, senior state officials, Bush Administration and congressional representatives, scholars, and others.

The Symposium confirmed the broad recognition by federalism experts, such as Ted Olson and Robert Bork, that Federalist principles do not require the federal government to defer to state law standards of liability that burden interstate commerce or conflict with or impede federal laws, regulation, and policies in areas where the federal government acts pursuant to an enumerated power. They and other federalism scholars identified below conclude that the Commerce Clause authorizes the federal government to remove such impediments to interstate commerce, in part by enacting preemptive statutes and regulations concerning product safety and labeling. Far from violating core tenets of federalism, federal tort reform measures that preempt the current miscellany of ill-considered, inefficient, and oftentimes judicially-imposed state policies in these areas are consistent with the proper, constitutionally-delegated role of the federal government in our system of divided power.

The attached articles and copy of the Spring 2002 Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy (in which the Symposium papers were published) provide a more comprehensive discussion. They are summarized below:

- Brief of Ted Olson (now Solicitor General of the United States) to the Supreme Court on behalf of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in Geier v. Amer. Honda Motor Corp. - Olson discusses how "[R]ecent developments and trends in state tort law reveal an enhanced need for vigorous enforcement of implied preemption principles and related constitutional mandates in order to shield our national economy from the increasing burdens placed upon it by unconstrained, arbitrary, inconsistent, and excessive tort verdicts and ever-expanding liability rules."

- Robert H. Bork and Daniel E. Troy, Locating the Boundaries: The Scope of Congress's Power to Regulate Commerce, 25 HARV. J. L. & PUB. POL'Y 849 (2002) – Bork and Commerce Clause's role to prevent efforts at state level

- Troy examine why the Commerce Clause, from an originalist perspective, permits the federal government to establish uniform safety and labeling standards and empowers the federal government to remove impediments to interstate commerce and maintain a vibrant national economy.

- Michael W. McConnell, Book Review, Federalism: Evaluating the Founders' Design, U. CHI. L. REV. 1483 (1987) –McConnell's analysis finds tort reform a suitable subject for federal action because a national forum prevents a narrow "faction" within the population – such as a judge or jury confronted with an unsympathetic, out-of-state corporate defendant – from effectively crafting policies that will affect the entire nation.

- C. Boyden Gray (former Counsel to President Bush), Regulation and Federalism, YALE J. REG. (1983) - Gray argues because many federal programs are "frequently inconsistent with local needs and preferences, administered by bureaucrats who are unaccountable to local citizens, and riddled with inefficiencies," federal involvement should be confined only to four areas, including products liability standards where "the combined effect of disparate state regulatory standards may intolerably burden interstate commerce."

- John Eastman, Re-entering the Arena: Restoring a Judicial Role for Enforcing Limits on Federal Mandates, 25 HARV. J. L. & PUB. POL'Y 931 (2002) – Eastman uses the Unfunded Mandates Reform Act (UMRA) as the basis for making two broader recommendations for incorporating constitutional considerations into Congressional deliberations. First, he proposes that Congress should consider the financial cut-offs established by UMRA as guidelines for determining limits on federal authority. Second, Eastman argues that the long-dormant non-delegation doctrine, which (in theory) prohibits the assignment of unbridled lawmaking powers to executive agencies, can also be used as a way of preventing costly federal regulations.

These analyses, along with the related Supreme Court jurisprudence, clearly support the principle that certain actions by the federal government to limit state tort liability for goods and services produced and sold in the national market do not violate the principles of federalism on which our nation was founded. On the contrary, such federal action is an essential part of the foundation of federalist theory.

We hope you find these pieces to be useful in your analysis and discussions with President Bush. If you would like to discuss any of these issues further, or have questions or comments, please do not hesitate to contact me, John or Bob.

Sincerely,

James M. Wootton
President

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Page

STATEMENT OF THE INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES 1

I. STATUTORY AND REGULATORY BACKGROUND 2

A. THE FEDERAL FOOD, DRUG, AND COSMETIC ACT 2

FDA Approval of Drug Product Labeling Changes 5

B. THE FOOD AND DRUG ADMINISTRATION MODERNIZATION ACT 7

C. CALIFORNIA PROPOSITION 65 7

II. STATEMENT OF THE FACTS 9

A. Dowhal's State Court Action 9

B. The Superior Court's Decision 11

C. FDA's Disposition Of Dowhal's Citizen Petition 12

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT 13

ARGUMENT 15

I. THE FDCA PREEMPTS THE ENFORCEMENT OF PROPOSITION 65 AS A STATE LAW BECAUSE IT WOULD CONFLICT WITH THE REQUIREMENTS OF FEDERAL LAW AND POSE AN OBSTACLE TO ACCOMPLISHING THE OBJECTIVES OF THIS FEDERAL STATUTE 15

A. Application Of Proposition 65 To Require Defendants To Use Dowhal's Proposed Warnings Would Make It Impossible For Them To Comply With Both Federal and State Law 16

REV_00261575

FDA Approval of Drug Product Labeling Changes

Once FDA has approved an NDA, an applicant generally may not deviate from FDA-approved product labeling without submitting an NDA supplement that provides a full explanation of the basis for the change.[14] FDA permits two kinds of labeling supplements: (1) "pre-approval supplements," which require FDA approval before a change occurs; and (2) "changes being effected supplements," which may be implemented before FDA approval.[15] In either case, an applicant must provide supporting information for the proposed change, or alert FDA to the existence of such information elsewhere. The supporting evidence may take several forms, including company-conducted or independent studies, published reports, and compilations of adverse events. FDA evaluates the scientific evidence pertaining to the proposed change. It then determines whether the proposed labeling change is appropriate based on such factors as the frequency of the risk of a side-effect/bad outcome, the severity of the potential risks, and the potential benefits and risks associated with the proposed warning.

Unless the proposed changes are minor, an applicant typically submits labeling changes in a pre-approval supplement. Where an applicant uses a "changes being effected" supplement, its evidentiary obligations are not reduced. Thus, although use of a "changes being effected" supplement permits a manufacturer to make labeling changes upon filing its supplement, the regulation still requires the manufacturer to "give a full explanation of the basis for the change."[16] Therefore, although an applicant may implement a labeling change immediately, it must still give

---

[14]21 CFR 314.70.

[15]21 CFR 314.70(b),(c).

[16]21 CFR 314.70(c).

REV_00261584

FDA a full explanation of the basis for the change that it has made. The more significant the proposed labeling change, the greater the explanation required. Accordingly, a drug manufacturer must have the same sound basis in scientific evidence for making a labeling change under this provision as it needs to obtain agency approval of a labeling change using the normal pre-approval supplement process.

If the agency disagrees with the changes made based on its evaluation of the evidence supporting the change, FDA notifies the company that the change is not approved. Should the company market the product using that unapproved labeling, it would violate the FDCA's prohibitions against marketing an unapproved new drug and against marketing a misbranded drug.[17]

Thus, in actual practice, only minor product labeling changes, like an editorial change, deletion of an ingredient affecting only the color of a drug product, or changes in the container or closure system for the drug product are generally made without FDA's prior approval. Furthermore, given the expense associated with any labeling change, manufacturers are reluctant to proceed under the provision allowing them to make a labeling change before getting FDA approval because it carries a risk that FDA will ultimately deny approval and thereby require another labeling change.

---

[17]21 U.S.C. §§ 352, 355(a).

REV_00261585

B. THE FOOD AND DRUG ADMINISTRATION MODERNIZATION ACT

In 1997, Congress amended the FDCA by enacting the Food and Drug Administration Modernization Act ("the Modernization Act").[18] These amendments to the FDCA added an express preemption provision for over-the-counter drug labeling. That provision expressly preempts any state requirement for over-the-counter drugs that is "different from, in addition to, or otherwise not identical with" an FDA requirement.[19] This section also includes an exception from federal preemption for state laws adopted by public initiative or referendum enacted before September 1, 1997.[20]

C. CALIFORNIA PROPOSITION 65

In 1986, California adopted the Safe Drinking Water and Toxic Enforcement Act, also known as Proposition 65.[21] Under Proposition 65, in the course of doing business, persons must provide a clear and reasonable warning before exposing any individual to a chemical known to the state to cause cancer or reproductive toxicity.[22] Such a warning must clearly communicate that the chemical is known to the state to cause cancer, birth defects, or other reproductive harm.[23] The regulations promulgated under Proposition 65 also provide "safe harbor" warning messages that are deemed to satisfy the requirement for a clear and reasonable warning. With [18]Pub. L. No. 105-115, 111 Stat. 2296 (1997).

---

[19]21 U.S.C. § 379r(a).

[20]21 U.S.C. § 379r(d)(2).

[21]California Health and Safety Code § 25249.5, et seq.

[22]California Health and Safety Code § 25249.6.

[23]22 California Code of Regulations § 12601(a).

REV_00261586

respect to the nicotine therapy replacement products at issue here, that "safe harbor" warning consists of the following language: "Warning: This product contains a chemical known to the State of California to cause birth defects or other reproductive harm."[24] Proposition 65 also includes a statutory federal preemption exemption, which excludes from coverage exposures to chemicals for which federal law governs the warnings in a manner that preempts state authority.[25]

Proposition 65 requires the Governor to publish a list of those chemicals known to cause cancer or reproductive harm. The Governor must cause that list to be revised at least annually to reflect additional knowledge.[26] Inclusion of a chemical on such a list is required where the chemical is known to the state to cause cancer or reproductive harm: (1) based upon the opinion of the state's qualified experts relying on scientifically valid testing, (2) based upon a determination by a body deemed to be authoritative by the state's qualified experts and the state's lead agency, or (3) based upon a requirement imposed by a state or federal agency that formally mandates that the chemical be labeled or identified as causing cancer or reproductive harm.[27]

As a general matter, California has deferred to FDA's expertise concerning regulation of drug products by adopting FDA regulations for purposes of California law.[28] More important, California has designated FDA as one of four authoritative bodies empowered to designate

---

[24]22 California Code of Regulations § 12601(b)(4)(B).

[25]California Health and Safety Code § 25249.10(a).

[26]California Health & Safety Code § 25249.8.

[27]Id. California's regulation also addresses the requirements for a cognizable identification by an authoritative body of a chemical as causing reproductive toxicity. The pertinent regulation also provides for notice and public comment before a chemical may be added to the list of potentially hazardous chemicals.

[28]California Health and Safety Code § 110111.

REV_00261587

chemicals as reproductive toxins under Proposition 65.[29] Moreover, when it listed nicotine as a reproductive toxin under Proposition 65 on April 1, 1990, California relied upon FDA's action requiring a reproductive health warning to be included in the warning labeling for the prescription form of nicotine replacement therapy products as the sole basis for that listing.[30] Thus, California made no independent assessment of the potential reproductive toxicity of the nicotine contained in these products. Nor did it rely on a determination by any other entity deemed an authoritative body under the state's regulations.

II. STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

A. Dowhal's State Court Action

In 1998, Dowhal asked the California Attorney General to initiate an enforcement action against SmithKline Beecham and other drug manufacturers that marketed nicotine replacement therapy products in California on the ground that the warnings in their product labeling did not meet the requirements of Proposition 65. In pertinent part, FDA's approved warning for Defendants' products advised users as follows:

> If pregnant or breast-feeding, ask a health professional before use. Nicotine can increase your baby's heart rate. First try to stop smoking without the [name of product].

Exh. 1 to Joint Request For Judicial Notice at 5. Beginning in 1996 and continuing through 2001, in response to specific inquiries, FDA repeatedly advised Defendants that they might be [29]California Health & Safety Code § 25249.8; 22 California Code of Regulations § 12306(b), (k), (l)(4). The other entities designated as authoritative bodies are the International Agency for Research on Cancer, the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, and the United States Environmental Protection Agency.

---

[30]See J.A. 1562.

REV_00261588

liable for selling misbranded articles if they deviated from the FDA-approved warning labeling for these nicotine replacement therapy products. See Respondents Brief at 10-14, 18-20. Furthermore, FDA gave that advice on several occasions in response to a Defendant's inquiry concerning possible use of warnings that were proposed as compliant with Proposition 65. J.A. 1499-1501, 1504-06, 1514-17, 1520-21, 1568-69, 1571, 1632-36, 2401.

In a May 6, 1998 letter to FDA, the California Attorney General questioned whether Defendants' FDA-approved product labeling satisfied the requirements of Proposition 65. In its written response, FDA advised the California Attorney General that Defendants' warning labeling clearly and accurately identified the reproductive risks associated with their nicotine replacement therapy products and therefore met the FDCA's labeling requirements. FDA also opined that Defendants' warning labeling appeared to satisfy the California Attorney General's standards with respect to Proposition 65 because the warnings were "clear and reasonable." J.A. 1558-1561. After receiving FDA's letter, the Attorney General did not initiate an enforcement action.

On August 23, 1999, Dowhal filed this action in the Superior Court of the State of California, San Francisco County. He alleged that Defendants had committed past violations as well as ongoing violations of Proposition 65 by knowingly and intentionally causing women to be exposed to nicotine through the use of their products without providing the warnings that Proposition 65 required. In addition to civil penalties and restitution, Dowhal sought to enjoin Defendants to include with their products particular warnings that significantly differed from the warnings required by FDA. Plaintiff sought an injunction requiring Defendants to use the "safe harbor" warning set forth at page 8 supra in their labeling or, alternatively, to require them to include either the following warning or a comparable one:

REV_00261589

> If pregnant or breast-feeding, ask a health professional before use. Nicotine, whether from smoking or medication, can harm your baby. First try to stop smoking without the patch.

Exh. 1 to Jt. Request For Judicial Notice at 5 (emphasis added). Defendants opposed that request because federal law controlled the contents of these warnings and preempted any state law requirements mandating inconsistent labeling that would render the products misbranded under the FDCA.

B. The Superior Court's Decision

Ruling on cross-motions for summary judgment in a March 12, 2001 order, the Superior Court concluded that Defendants were entitled to summary judgment because federal law preempted application of Proposition 65 with respect to the warnings that they used in their product labeling. J.A. 2429-2432. Applying the doctrine of conflict preemption, the trial court held that the product warnings that FDA had approved for Defendants' use in marketing their products preempted the alternative warning requirements that Dowhal asserted were mandated by Proposition 65. The Superior Court reasoned that the applicability of conflict preemption was unaffected by the express statutory preemption clause and its exception in the Modernization Act. It then concluded that conflict preemption applied because Defendants could not comply with both FDA's warnings and the warnings Dowhal claimed were mandated by Proposition 65. Furthermore, the court found conflict preemption applicable because Dowhal's proposed warnings would frustrate the federal purpose of ensuring that warnings accurately reflect the known health risks associated with drug products.

REV_00261590

C. FDA's Disposition Of Dowhal's Citizen Petition

On August 2, 2000, one year after he filed his complaint, Dowhal filed a citizen petition with FDA asking the agency to change the warnings required in the labeling of nicotine replacement therapy products. Again, Dowhal asked FDA to require Defendants and any other manufacturers of a similar product to include a warning like the "harm your baby" warning set forth at page 11 supra.

On August 17, 2001, FDA responded to Dowhal's petition. Based on its review of the relevant information, including the information furnished by Dowhal in support of his citizen petition, FDA declined to adopt the warnings he proposed. Exh. 1 to Jt. Request for Judicial Notice. Instead, FDA asked each sponsor of a nicotine replacement therapy product to submit to the agency a labeling supplement with a new pregnancy warning containing the following wording:

> If you are pregnant or breast-feeding, only use this medicine on the advice of your health care provider. Smoking can seriously harm your child. Try to stop smoking without using any nicotine replacement medicine. This medicine is believed to be safer than smoking. However, the risks to your child from this medicine are not fully known.

This warning reflected language deemed appropriate by FDA given current knowledge about the use of nicotine replacement therapy products during pregnancy. It reflected a proper balance concerning the need to warn about the harms associated with continued smoking during pregnancy, the benefits of total nicotine abstinence, the need to provide information about the known risks of nicotine replacement therapy products, and the need to provide information about the relative risks of these products in comparison to the risks of smoking. In adopting this warning, FDA also determined that the Dowhal's proposed warning lacked sufficient support in scientific evidence.

REV_00261591

As the FDA ultimately determined in addressing Dowhal's citizen petition, neither the "safe harbor" warning nor Dowhal's proposed "harm your baby" warning provided appropriate information concerning the nature of the risk posed by nicotine in the products. The absence of such information creates a danger that consumers may be misled about the risks associated with the products, which may result in consumer decisions concerning product use based upon an inaccurate array of information. The presentation of incomplete and misleading information in such warning labeling renders a product misbranded under the FDCA.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

Defendants' use of the pregnancy warning that Dowhal advocated for these products would cause them to violate the FDCA's prohibition on selling misbranded drug products. Therefore, under the doctrine of conflict preemption, Proposition 65 could not be applied to Defendants' warning labels if it required Defendants to use Dowhal's proposed warning labeling. Conflict preemption would also apply because state law would pose an obstacle to the accomplishment of the full purposes and objectives of a federal statute, the FDCA.

1. In rejecting Dowhal's proposed warning in the context of addressing his citizen petition on August 17, 2001, FDA determined that Proposition 65 would conflict with the FDCA if it required use of Dowhal's proposed warning labeling. Thereafter, any state requirement mandating use of labeling that differed significantly from the FDA-approved labeling would be preempted. Moreover, where a federal agency has implemented a statute that it is charged with administering, its action may also be applied to conduct that occurred before the agency announced that decision. Therefore, FDA's construction of the FDCA's misbranding prohibition with respect to Dowhal's proposed warning labeling applies equally to Defendants' antecedent conduct.

REV_00261592

Moreover, just as the doctrine of primary jurisdiction allows a trial court to rely upon an agency explanation issued after the filing of a lawsuit, this Court now may properly rely on FDA's application of the FDCA's misbranding provision in the agency's August 17, 2001 determination in order to affirm the Superior Court's grant of summary judgment for Defendants. Furthermore, FDA's determination concerning appropriate warning labeling reflects the agency's application of its unrivaled expertise to the relevant data. Because Congress has entrusted FDA to make any necessary judgments concerning what labeling provides the warnings necessary to avoid misbranding a product, a state court should defer to FDA's assessment and apply it in a way that assures the proper functioning of a comprehensive federal regulatory plan.

Conflict preemption also applies here because requiring Defendants to use Dowhal's proposed warning labeling to meet their duties under Proposition 65 would pose an obstacle to the accomplishment of the full purposes and objectives of Congress. State law must be applied here in a way that preserves the latitude necessary for the federal regulatory scheme to operate as Congress intended. FDA repeatedly cautioned the Defendants against changing their warning labeling unless they had an adequate factual basis to do so. Tellingly, Defendants had no new facts to present to FDA to support different warning labeling. Under these circumstances, applying Proposition 65 to require Defendants to use Dowhal's proposed warning labeling would thwart attainment of the goals Congress sought to achieve under the FDCA.

REV_00261593

1. FDA's Action On Dowhal's Citizen Petition Showed That The FDCA Preempted Compelled Use Of Dowhal's Proposed Warning Labeling Under Proposition 65 17

2. The Preemptive Effect Of FDA's Disposition Of The Citizen Petition Also Governs The Application Of Proposition 65 To Defendants' Conduct Before The FDA Issued Its Determination 19

B. Application Of Proposition 65 To Require Dowhal's Proposed Warnings Would Frustrate Attaining The Objectives Of A Federal Statute 23

II. THE MODERNIZATION ACT DOES NOT AFFECT THE APPLICATION OF CONFLICT PREEMPTION HERE 27

CONCLUSION 32

CERTIFICATE OF COMPLIANCE WITH CALIFORNIA RULE OF COURT 14(c)1

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

REV_00261576

2. Plaintiff erroneously contends that the Modernization Act exempts Proposition 65 from displacement under conflict preemption principles. The Superior Court correctly held that the Modernization Act affects only express preemption, not conflict preemption.

ARGUMENT

I. THE FDCA PREEMPTS THE ENFORCEMENT OF PROPOSITION 65 AS A STATE LAW BECAUSE IT WOULD CONFLICT WITH THE REQUIREMENTS OF FEDERAL LAW AND POSE AN OBSTACLE TO ACCOMPLISHING THE OBJECTIVES OF THIS FEDERAL STATUTE.

To assure adherence to the Supremacy Clause of the United States Constitution, federal law preempts enforcement of state law in certain circumstances.[31] Thus, federal law preempts state law where Congress has expressed a clear intent that a federal statute have that effect. Even absent explicit preemption language in a statute, federal law preempts state law where Congress has clearly intended to legislate comprehensively and thereby precluded the states from supplementing federal law. Finally, federal law preempts state law where compliance with both federal and state law is impossible or where state law poses an obstacle to accomplishing the full purposes and objectives of Congress as expressed in a statute.[32]

By enacting the FDCA, Congress established a comprehensive scheme of drug regulation. That regulatory plan promotes the important interest of protecting consumers from unsafe drugs. To advance that interest, the FDCA operates to ensure that drugs on the market are safe and effective. Thus, the FDCA prohibits the sale of misbranded drugs,[33] which it identifies as drugs

---

[31]U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[32]United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. 89, 109 (2000); Geier v. American Honda Motor Co., 529 U.S. 861, 873 (2000); Capital Cities Cable, Inc. v. Crisp, 467 U.S. 691, 698-99 (1984).

[33]See 21 U.S.C. § 331(b).

REV_00261594

that lack adequate warnings.[34] Given the comprehensive nature of drug regulation under this federal law, any state regulation must be compatible with the regulatory plan established under the FDCA.

Here, conflict preemption applies because requiring Defendants to use Dowhal's proposed warning labeling to meet their duties under Proposition 65 would conflict with federal law and pose an obstacle to accomplishing Congress's full purposes and objectives.[35]

A. Application Of Proposition 65 To Require Defendants To Use Dowhal's Proposed Warnings Would Make It Impossible For Them To Comply With Both Federal and State Law.

In support of the agency's role in assuring that misbranded drugs are not sold, Congress gave FDA authority to regulate the labeling of drug products. FDA's authority includes the power to require appropriate warnings on over-the-counter drugs and prohibit the sale of misbranded drug products.[36] Under the Act, an over-the-counter drug is deemed misbranded when "[i]ts labeling is false or misleading in any particular" or "[u]nless its labeling bears . . . such adequate warnings against use . . . where its use may be dangerous to health . . . in such [34]See 21 U.S.C. § 352(a) ("A drug or device shall be deemed to be misbranded if its labeling is false or misleading in any particular.") See also 21 U.S.C. § 352(f) (a drug or device shall be deemed to be misbranded "unless its labeling bears (1) adequate directions for use; and (2) such adequate warnings against use in those pathological conditions. . . where its use may be dangerous to health . . . in such manner and form, as are necessary for the protection of users").

---

[35]English v. General Electric Co., 496 U.S. 72, 78-79 (1990). See also Geier v. American Honda Motor Co., 529 U.S. at 873; Laurence H. Tribe, American Constitutional Law, § 6-25 at 481 n. 14 (2d ed. 1988) (conflict preemption applies even "where Congress did not necessarily intend preemption . . . [if] the particular state law conflicts directly with federal law or stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment of federal objectives.").

[36]21 U.S.C. § 352(a), (f); 21 C.F.R. Part 201, Subpart C.

REV_00261595

manner and form as are necessary for the protection of users."[37] To constitute an adequate warning, a warning must in FDA's view be clear and truthful in all respects, not be misleading in any particular respect, and accurately communicate both the benefit-to-risk ratio and the proper use of the product in terms likely to be read and understood by the ordinary person.[38]

1. FDA's Action On Dowhal's Citizen Petition Showed That The FDCA Preempted Compelled Use Of Dowhal's Proposed Warning Labeling Under Proposition 65.

Under the FDCA, manufacturers of drug products may not make changes to product labeling previously approved by FDA unless those changes are accurate and not misleading. Therefore, to the extent that state law would require a manufacturer to use product labeling that misbrands a drug product, the FDCA preempts state law under the doctrine of conflict preemption.

It cannot be reasonably disputed here that the FDCA's requirements with respect to drug marketing preempt any inconsistent requirements imposed by Proposition 65. Thus, the critical question is whether the FDCA's prohibition against the sale of misbranded drugs conflicted with the warning labeling that Dowhal claimed was required by that state law.

In determining whether Dowhal's proposed warning labeling was prohibited under the FDCA, the analysis must start from the proposition that an agency's reasonable judgment with [37]21 U.S.C. §§ 352(a), 352(f).

---

[38]See 21 C.F.R. § 330.10(a)(4)(iii), (v). See also 21 U.S.C. § 355(d), which conditions FDA's approval of a new drug application upon the presentation of adequate tests to show the safety of the drug under the conditions prescribed, recommended, or suggested in the proposed labeling and upon the agency's finding that the labeling for the drug is not "false or misleading in any particular."

REV_00261596

respect to the meaning of its own statute is entitled to judicial deference.[39] Therefore, any reasonable agency determination as to what constitutes misbranding under the FDCA will ordinarily be controlling.

Here, FDA ultimately rejected Dowhal's proposed warning labeling as inconsistent with the FDCA's prohibition against misbranding. In its August 17, 2001 letter, FDA addressed Dowhal's citizen petition requesting the agency to require under the FDCA the same warning that he claimed Proposition 65 required. Exh. 1 to Jt. Request for Judicial Notice. In that letter, FDA also established a new pregnancy warning for nicotine replacement therapy products. That warning differed materially from the warning Dowhal sought. In formulating the new labeling requirement, FDA sought to fashion a warning that clearly and reasonably communicated all the known risks associated with these products as well as the relative reproductive risks associated with smoking in comparison to total abstinence from nicotine in any form. Exh. 1 to Jt. Request for Judicial Notice at 6-8.

Tellingly, FDA considered and rejected Dowhal's proposed Proposition 65-compliant warning labeling. Given the rejection of Dowhal's proposed warning labeling by FDA, the federal agency with expertise and paramount responsibility in the area of drug regulation, the agency's determination that use of such warning labeling would make Defendants' products misbranded carries controlling weight in a state court action brought by the very party that asked FDA to act on the matter. As the agency's August 17, 2001 determination made clear, use of Dowhal's proposed warning labeling would render the Defendants' products misbranded because that warning overstated the known risks of product use by equating the hazards posed by small amounts of nicotine delivered by means other than through inhaled smoke with the risks of smoking,[40] Exh. 1 to Joint Request For Judicial Notice at 6-8. Accordingly, if Proposition 65 required Defendants to use Dowhal's warning labeling, that state law would conflict with the FDCA and would yield to federal law under the doctrine of conflict preemption.

---

[39]Chevron U.S.A. Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 842-45 (1984).

REV_00261597

2. The Preemptive Effect Of FDA's Disposition Of The Citizen Petition Also Governs The Application Of Proposition 65 To Defendants' Conduct Before FDA Issued Its Determination.

FDA's August 17, 2001 construction of the FDCA's misbranding prohibition with respect to Dowhal's proposed warning labeling also applies to the Defendants' conduct before that date. Where an agency has construed a statute that it is charged with administering, the agency's construction may also be applied to conduct that occurred before the agency announced that construction.[41] In Smiley v. Citibank (South Dakota), N.A., which also involved a federal statute that preempted state law, the Supreme Court held that a regulation setting forth the Comptroller of the Currency's construction of the National Bank Act was entitled to deference. More important, the Court explained that the Comptroller's construction merited deference even though that construction would apply to conduct that predated the issuance of the regulation containing the agency's construction. The Court concluded that applying the new statutory construction to [40]Cigarettes must carry one of four Surgeon General warnings. 15 U.S.C. § 1333(a)(1). One of the permissible warnings states: "Smoking By Pregnant Women May Result in Fetal Injury, Premature Birth, and Low Birth Weight." That warning, which closely resembles the warning Dowhal sought, does not differentiate the known harmful effects associated with cigarette smoking from the potential risks of nicotine replacement products. Those risks are not yet scientifically substantiated.

---

[41]Smiley v. Citibank (South Dakota), N.A., 517 U.S. 735, 744 n. 3 (1996).

REV_00261598

conduct completed before the regulation's issuance did not pose a risk of giving the regulation invalid retroactive effect. At least where an agency's construction filled a gap where there had been no contrary agency guidance, "it would be absurd to ignore the agency's current authoritative pronouncement of what the statute means."[42]

The same rule should govern here. Before FDA's disposition of Dowhal's citizen petition, the agency had not issued definitive advice concerning whether use of Dowhal's proposed warning labeling would render Defendants' products misbranded under the FDCA. Given FDA's August 17, 2001 determination, the agency's rejection of Dowhal's proposed warning labeling constitutes the agency's authoritative assessment of the relevant evidence. It also represents this federal agency's authoritative interpretation and application of the FDCA with respect to that warning labeling. In accordance with the Supreme Court's admonition in Smiley that it would be absurd to disregard an agency's current authoritative application of its governing statute in these circumstances, this Court should apply FDA's construction of the FDCA's requirements to the Defendants' adherence to the FDA-approved product labeling before August 17, 2001.

Although FDA may not have issued a formal directive until it acted on Dowhal's citizen petition, the agency's action on the petition did not reflect a new position by FDA concerning the application of the FDCA to Dowhal's proposed warning labeling. In fact, FDA repeatedly advised Defendants that such a warning could misbrand their products. Thus, the agency's formal determination confirmed the statute's applicability to Dowhal's proposed warning labeling based on the agency's review of all the relevant data. The determination showed the conflict between the FDCA's misbranding prohibition and any state law that required use of Dowhal's

---

[42] 517 U.S. at 744 n. 3.

REV_00261599

proposed warning labeling. Where such a conflict exists between federal and state law, federal law preempts state law even with respect to transactions that have already been completed before the agency's determination confirming the conflict.[43]

Moreover, judicial application of FDA's August 17, 2001 statutory construction to the Defendants' conduct before that date closely parallels the doctrine of primary jurisdiction. Where the issues presented fall within an agency's specialized expertise and involve "technical and intricate questions of fact and policy that Congress assigned to a specific agency," the doctrine of primary jurisdiction permits a trial court to consider an agency explanation provided after the commencement of a lawsuit.[44]

FDA has now determined in a final agency action that use of Dowhal's proposed warning labeling would render these products misbranded. For the same reason that a trial court should rely upon an agency explanation issued after the filing of a lawsuit under the doctrine of primary jurisdiction, "it would be absurd to ignore the agency's current authoritative pronouncement of what the statute means" to resolve a question concerning whether use of Dowhal's proposed warnings would make Defendants' products misbranded under the FDCA.[45] Therefore, this Court may affirm the Superior Court's grant of summary judgment for Defendants based upon FDA's action on Dowhal's citizen petition.

---

[43]See Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 U.S. 470 (1996). Given the pendency of Dowhal's citizen petition before FDA and the fact his petition presented the same questions his lawsuit raised, the Superior Court could have stayed the action pending FDA's disposition of the citizen petition either at the request of a party or sua sponte.

[44]See Wise v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 77 Cal. App. 4th 287, 295-96 (1999); Farmers Insurance Exchange v. Superior Court, 2 Cal. 4th 377, 380 (1992).

[45]Smiley v. Citibank (South Dakota, N.A.), 517 U.S. at 744 n. 3.

REV_00261600

FDA's August 17, 2001 determination also merits deference from a state court with respect to conduct that preceded the determination for another reason. That determination reflects a regulatory decision based upon this federal agency's application of a statute it is charged with administering. The determination necessarily involves applying the agency's expertise to the data relevant to deciding what warning label is appropriate for these products. In Chicago and North Western Transportation Company v. Kalo Brick and Tile Company,[46] the Supreme Court concluded that the ICC's judgment was entitled to deference in a state court because Congress had entrusted the agency with responsibility for making such judgments. The Court explained that, because "the judgment as to what constitutes reasonableness belongs exclusively to the Commission," it would frustrate Congressional intent as expressed in a federal statute "to permit the State of Iowa to use the threat of damages to require a carrier to do exactly what the Commission is empowered to excuse."[47] Here, where Congress has entrusted FDA to make any necessary judgments concerning what labeling provides the warnings necessary to keep a product from being misbranded, a state court must also defer to FDA's assessment.

Furthermore, especially where a party may challenge a federal agency's determination in federal court under the Administrative Procedure Act after exhausting available administrative remedies, that party may not bypass that judicial remedy by challenging the agency's determination indirectly by bringing an action under state law.[48] Tellingly, where judicial review

---

[46]450 U.S. 311, 325-26 (1981).

[47]450 U.S. at 325-26. See also Deford v. Soo Line Railroad Co., 867 F.2d 1080, 1089 (8th Cir. 1989).

[48]See 5 U.S.C. § 701 et seq.

REV_00261601

is available under the federal system, review under state law is unavailable even where the agency did not make its determination until after the initiation of the state court action.[49]

To be sure, where the evidence bearing upon what warning labeling is appropriate has changed significantly over time, that change may affect whether FDA's determination concerning appropriate labeling may be fairly applied to prior conduct. Thus, if the FDA here had relied heavily on new facts to conclude that Dowhal's proposed warning labeling would render these products misbranded, it might bear on the acceptability of the labeling before those facts came to the agency's attention. Here, however, there is no suggestion that any significant evidentiary change occurred from the time Dowhal filed this suit until the agency's disposition of his citizen petition. Therefore, there can be no suggestion that Dowhal's proposed warning was at some earlier time compliant with the FDCA.

B. Application Of Proposition 65 To Require Dowhal's Proposed Warnings Would Frustrate Attaining The FDCA's Objectives.

The discussion above also shows that conflict preemption applies here because requiring Defendants to use Dowhal's proposed warning labeling to meet their duties under Proposition 65 would pose an obstacle to accomplishing Congress's full purposes and objectives.[50] As previously noted, by enacting the FDCA, Congress established a comprehensive regulatory plan

---

[49]Chicago and Northwestern Transportation Co. v. Kalo Brick & Tile Co., 450 U.S. at 326.

[50]English v. General Electric Co., 496 U.S. at 78-79. See also Geier v. American Honda Motor Co., 529 U.S. at 873; Laurence H. Tribe, American Constitutional Law, § 6-25 at 481 n. 14 (2d ed. 1988).

REV_00261602

designed to ensure the safety and effectiveness of drugs. Congress gave FDA plenary authority to regulate the labeling of drug products.[51]

State law must be applied in a way that preserves the latitude necessary for the federal regulatory scheme to operate as Congress intended.[52] As we have previously discussed, a drug manufacturer's use of the "changes being effected" supplement is generally limited to circumstances involving noncontroversial labeling changes. Although use of a "changes being effected" supplement permits a manufacturer to make labeling changes as soon as it files its supplement, the regulation requires the manufacturer to provide FDA with a satisfactory evidentiary basis for the change, especially with respect to any significant labeling change like the one Dowhal advocated. FDA's regulation does not allow a drug manufacturer to file such a submission without an adequate factual foundation. Moreover, standing alone, the fact that state law requires use of a particular warning cannot not constitute the necessary factual predicate.

Furthermore, FDA responded to specific inquiries from Defendants during the 1997-2001 period by advising them that they might be liable for selling misbranded drug products if they deviated from the FDA-approved warning labeling for these nicotine replacement therapy products. See Respondents Brief at 10-14, 18-20. Moreover, FDA gave that advice on several occasions in response to a Defendant's inquiry concerning possible use of warnings that were proposed as compliant with Proposition 65. J.A. 1499-1501, 1504-06, 1514-17, 1520-21,

---

[51] 21 U.S.C. § 352(a), (f); 21 CFR Part 201, Subpart C.

[52] Buckman Co. v. Plaintiffs' Legal Committee, 531 U.S. 341, 347-48 (2001).

REV_00261603

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases:

AT&T Co. v. Central Office Telephone, Inc., 524 U.S. 214 (1998) 29

Buckman Company v. Plaintiffs' Legal Committee, 531 U.S. 341 (2001) 24, 28, 29

Capital Cities Cable, Inc. v. Crisp, 467 U.S. 691 (1984) 15

Chevron U.S.A. Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837 (1984) 18

Chicago and North Western Transportation Company v. Kalo Brick and Tile Company, 450 U.S. 311 (1981) 22, 23

Deford v. Soo Line Railroad Co., 867 F.2d 1080 (8th Cir. 1989) 22

English v. General Electric Co., 496 U.S. 72 (1990) 16, 23

Farmers Insurance Exchange v. Superior Court, 2 Cal. 4th 377 (1992) 21

Freightliner Corporation v. Myrick, 514 U.S. 280 (1995) 29

Geier v. American Honda Motor Co., 529 U.S. 861 (2000) 15, 16, 23, 27, 28

Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 U.S. 470 (1996) 21

Morales v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 504 U.S. 374 (1992) 29

Smiley v. Citibank (South Dakota), N.A., 517 U.S. 735 (1996) 19, 20, 21

United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. 89 (2000) 15, 29

Wise v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 77 Cal. App. 4th 287 (1999) 21

Constitution:

United States Constitution, art. VI, cl. 2 15

Statutes:

5 U.S.C. § 701 et seq 23, 30

15 U.S.C. § 1333(a)(1) 19

REV_00261577

1568-69, 1571, 1632-36, 2401. Depriving Defendants of their ability to heed this advice without the risk of sustaining liability under a complementary state law system would plainly frustrate the objectives Congress sought to advance under the FDCA.[53]

In light of the nature of their particular products, these Defendants had another valid reason for hesitancy in adopting Plaintiff's proposed warnings based on their concern over liability for misbranding. With many drug products, strengthening the warnings on product labeling may carry only a moderate risk of causing confusion among consumers about whether to use a product. Here, nicotine, the ingredient in Defendants' products that made them subject to Proposition 65, is also present in cigarettes. Consumers use Defendants' products solely to assist their efforts to discontinue the use of cigarettes and thereby avoid further exposure to the serious health hazards posed by inhaled tobacco smoke.

Strengthening the warnings about the consumption of nicotine in these nicotine replacement therapy products carries an obvious risk of discouraging consumers from using the products. Such a warning would increase the risk that consumers would continue to be exposed to the much greater health risks of inhaled tobacco smoke. Given the possibility of causing such harmful consumer confusion, Defendants had good reason to avoid labeling changes that might render their products misbranded.

---

[53]Based on the particular wording of the agency's communications to certain Defendants, FDA may have in some instances preempted application of Proposition 65 at least as to Proposition 65-compliant warnings that FDA considered and rejected for purposes of compliance with the FDCA. But because preemption applies to all the Defendants in this suit for their actions during entire time period at issue for the reasons set forth elsewhere in this brief, this Court need not consider the applicability of preemption based on FDA's specific communications to particular Defendants.

REV_00261604

The California Attorney General nevertheless asserts (Br. 33-35) that FDA's treatment of warning labeling requirements for Habitrol, another nicotine replacement therapy product marketed by a company that is not a party in this case, Novartis Consumer Health, Inc., shows that Defendants' use of Dowhal's proposed warning labeling would not cause them to misbrand their products. The Attorney General chiefly relies upon the fact that, when FDA approved the warning labeling for Habitrol in 1999, that warning labeling included the "harm your baby" warning Dowhal advocates under Proposition 65.

To begin with, this argument ignores the fact that, for FDA's regulatory purposes, every new drug is unique even if its formulation includes ingredients similar to or even identical to another drug product. FDA must evaluate each application based upon the submissions made by the applicant and all other relevant evidence that is available to the agency when it reviews the application. Thus, each NDA approval is manufacturer-specific. Accordingly, it does not necessarily follow that, because FDA has approved a label for one product, its approval for that product represents de facto approval for the identical warning for all similar products.

Furthermore, soon after FDA issued the approval for Habitrol, the agency determined that the scientific evidence regarding the potential harms from the use of the product did not, in fact, support the use of that warning. FDA's determination rendered this product misbranded. But in the exercise of its administrative discretion, FDA withheld pursuit of an enforcement action for misbranding against Habitrol's sponsor while the agency determined what language an appropriate warning should contain. Tellingly, after the agency addressed Dowhal's citizen petition, FDA instructed Habitrol's sponsor to submit an NDA Supplement containing the same labeling that the agency had approved in its August 17, 2001 determination. In so doing, FDA brought these products under a uniform labeling regime, but not a regime requiring the use of the "harm your baby" warning.

REV_00261605

In any event, as our argument above shows, state law here conflicts with the FDCA to the extent that Proposition 65 requires Defendants to use Dowhal's proposed warning labeling. Therefore, this Court need not decide whether Proposition 65 may require a drug manufacturer to make a significant change in warning labeling where that manufacturer lacks adequate evidence to justify a labeling change under the federal regulatory plan created by the FDCA. Likewise, the Court also need not decide whether California law may require a drug manufacturer to make a significant change in warning labeling where FDA has explicitly cautioned the manufacturer against making an unwarranted change in warning labeling.

II. THE MODERNIZATION ACT DOES NOT AFFECT THE APPLICATION OF CONFLICT PREEMPTION HERE.

Dowhal contends (Br. at 21-29) that the Modernization Act exempts Proposition 65 from displacement under conflict preemption principles. But the Superior Court correctly held that the Modernization Act affects only express preemption, not conflict preemption.

The Modernization Act added to the FDCA an express preemption provision for over-the-counter drug labeling. That provision expressly preempts any state requirement regarding over-the-counter drugs that is "different from, in addition to, or otherwise not identical with" an FDA requirement.[54] That provision, however, also includes an exception from such federal [54] 21 U.S.C. § 379r(a).

REV_00261606

preemption for state laws adopted by public initiative or referendum enacted prior to September 1, 1997, a classification that includes Proposition 65.[55]

A statutory provision that excludes a state law from the ordinary impact of express preemption does not affect conflict preemption. In Geier v. American Honda Company, the Supreme Court held that, even where Congress uses a savings clause to exempt a particular state law from the impact of express preemption, conflict preemption still applies where a conflict exists between state law and federal law that frustrates attaining a federal objective or makes it impossible for persons to comply with the both federal and state law.[56] In Geier, the Court cautioned against giving broad effect to such savings clauses where doing so would upset the careful regulatory scheme established by federal law. In reaching that result, the Court emphasized that "[c]onflict preemption turns on the identification of actual conflict, and not on an express statement of preemptive intent."[57]

Similarly, in Buckman Company v. Plaintiffs' Legal Committee,[58] which also involved the FDCA, the Court held that conflict preemption applied notwithstanding an express preemption provision that also contained a savings clause. There, plaintiffs asserted that another express preemption provision in the FDCA did not preempt their state law claims alleging fraud on the agency.[59] Reaffirming its analysis in Geier, the Court observed that "[n]either an express

---

[55]21 U.S.C. § 379r(d)(2).

[56]529 U.S. 861, 870.

[57]529 U.S. at 884.

[58]531 U.S. 341 (2001).

[59]See 21 U.S.C. § 360k(a), in the Medical Device Amendments, Pub. L. No. 94-295, 90 Stat. 539 (1976).

REV_00261607

preemption provision nor a savings clause bars the ordinary working of conflict preemption principles."[60]

Furthermore, the particular language of the Modernization Act's exemption from express preemption confirms that the exemption does not affect conflict preemption. Section 21 U.S.C. § 379r(d)(2) exempts Proposition 65 from express preemption by virtue of its language that "this section shall not apply to a state requirement." (emphasis added) "This section" refers to the statutory provision entitled National Uniformity for Non Prescription Drugs, which sets forth the federal preemption provision.[61] Where Congress uses the "this section" formulation in a savings clause, it intends to limit the application of that savings clause to one particular express preemption provision.[62] Therefore, Congress plainly intended the exception it crafted for Proposition 65 to apply only with respect to the accompanying express federal preemption, not to conflict preemption.

The California Attorney General also contends (Amicus Br. at 33-35) that the Modernization Act eliminated FDA's authority to prohibit Defendants from using Dowhal's proposed warning. Here, he suggests that any refusal by FDA to permit Defendants to use that [60]531 U.S. at 352. The express preemption language and savings clause in 21 U.S.C. § 360k for medical devices, is similar to the Modernization Act's express preemption provision and its savings clause, which Dowhal relies on here. See also Freightliner Corporation v. Myrick, 514 U.S. 280 (1995) (implied preemption may apply despite presence of express preemption clause).

---

[61]See 21 U.S.C. § 379r(a).

[62]United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. 89, 106 (2000); Morales v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 504 U.S. 374, 385 (1992); AT&T Co. v. Central Office Telephone, Inc., 524 U.S. 214, 227-28 (1998).

REV_00261608

Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act ("FDCA"):

21 U.S.C. § 301 et seq 1
21 U.S.C. § 321(d) 1

21 U.S.C. § 331(a) 2
21 U.S.C. § 331(b) 2, 15
21 U.S.C. § 331(k) 2

21 U.S.C. § 352 6
21 U.S.C. § 352(a) 1, 2, 5, 16, 17, 24
21 U.S.C. § 352(c) 5
21 U.S.C. § 352(f) 1, 2, 16, 17, 24, 27, 28

21 U.S.C. § 355(a) 6
21 U.S.C. § 355(b)(1)(A) 3
21 U.S.C. § 355(b)(1)(F) 4

21 U.S.C. § 355(d) 3, 17
21 U.S.C. § 355(d)(5) 3

21 U.S.C. § 355(e) 3
21 U.S.C. § 355(j) 3

21 U.S.C. § 360k 29
21 U.S.C. § 360k(a) 28

21 U.S.C. §§ 371-377 1

21 U.S.C. § 379r(a) 7, 27, 29
21 U.S.C. § 379r(d)(2) 7, 27, 28

21 U.S.C. § 393 1

Medical Device Amendments, Pub. L. No. 94-295, 90 Stat. 539 (1976) 28

Pub. L. No. 105-115, 111 Stat. 2296 (1997) 7

California Health and Safety Code § 110111 8

California Health and Safety Code § 25249.5, et seq 7
California Health and Safety Code § 25249.6 7
California Health and Safety Code § 25249.8 ..... 8, 9
California Health and Safety Code § 25249.10(a) 8

REV_00261578

Regulations:

21 C.F.R. § 5.10 1

21 C.F.R. Part 201, Subpart C 1, 2, 16, 23
21 C.F.R. § 201.63(a) 2
21 C.F.R. § 201.66(c)(5)(iii)(iv)(ix) 2

21 C.F.R. § 314.70 ..... 5, 6
21 C.F.R. § 314.70(b) 5
21 C.F.R. § 314.70(b)(3) 5

21 C.F.R. § 314.70(c) 5, 6
21 C.F.R. § 314.70(c)(2)(i) 6

21 C.F.R. § 330.10(a)(4)(iii),(v) 17

22 California Code of Regulations § 12306(b) 9
22 California Code of Regulations § 12306(k) 9
22 California Code of Regulations § 12306(l)(4) 9

22 California Code of Regulations § 12601(a) 7
22 California Code of Regulations § 12601(b)(4)(B) 8

Miscellaneous:

Laurence H. Tribe, American Constitutional Law, § 6-25 at 481 (2d ed. 1988) 16, 23

REV_00261579

STATEMENT OF THE INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

Plaintiff-Appellant Paul Dowhal challenges the Superior Court's holding that federal law preempted a state labeling requirement for over-the-counter nicotine replacement therapy products marketed by Defendants-Respondents SmithKline Beecham, et al. The United States has a substantial interest in this Court's resolution of that issue. On the merits of the issue, the United States appears as an amicus curiae in support of Defendants because it concurs that federal law preempted a labeling requirement that Plaintiff sought to apply to Defendants under state law.

The Food and Drug Administration ("FDA"), a component of the Department of Health and Human Services, is responsible for regulating drugs. These drugs include over-the-counter drug products, as defined by the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act ("FDCA" "the Act").[1] The FDCA's comprehensive scheme of drug regulation ensures that drugs are safe and effective for their intended uses. The Act specifically authorizes FDA to regulate the labeling of drug products, including appropriate warnings on over-the-counter drugs.[2] An over-the-counter drug is deemed misbranded under the FDCA when "[i]ts labeling is false or misleading in any particular." It is also misbranded "[u]nless its labeling bears . . . such adequate warnings against

---

[1] 21 U.S.C. § 301 et seq. The FDCA vests regulatory and enforcement authority in the Secretary of Health and Human Services. See, e.g., 21 U.S.C. §§ 371-377; § 321(d). The Secretary has delegated his authority to the Commissioner of the FDA. 21 CFR 5.10. See also 21 U.S.C. § 393 (duties and powers of the FDA).

[2] 21 U.S.C. § 352(a), (f); 21 CFR Part 201, Subpart C.

REV_00261580

use . . . where its use may be dangerous to health . . . in such manner and form as are necessary for the protection of users."[3]

In granting summary judgment for Defendants, the trial court accepted their argument that compliance with the warning that Dowhal claimed was necessary to satisfy California law would require them to violate their product labeling duties under the FDCA. Therefore, the court determined that the FDCA preempted any California law requirement that imposed different obligations with respect to product labeling on these nicotine replacement therapy products. This Court's disposition of Dowhal's challenge to that ruling implicates FDA's interest in drug regulation.

1. STATUTORY AND REGULATORY BACKGROUND

A. THE FEDERAL FOOD, DRUG, AND COSMETIC ACT

The FDCA prohibits the misbranding of drugs in interstate commerce and empowers FDA to regulate the labeling of drug products, including the warnings on over-the-counter drugs.[4] Under the statute, an over-the-counter drug is misbranded where its labeling is false or misleading in any particular or if its labeling does not contain adequate warnings against any use dangerous to health.[5] FDA's regulations establish specific requirements for over-the-counter drug product labeling. These requirements are designed to mandate warnings that reflect the known risks based on reliable scientific evidence.[6]

---

[3]21 U.S.C. §§ 352(a), 352(f).

[4]21 U.S.C. §§ 331(a), (b), (k), 352(a), (f); 21 CFR Part 201, Subpart C.

[5]21 U.S.C. §§ 352(a), 352(f).

[6]See 21 CFR 201.63(a), 201.66(c)(5)(iii)(iv)(ix).

REV_00261581

After reviewing new drug applications ("NDAs") submitted to the agency by the individual manufacturers, FDA approved Defendants' nicotine replacement therapy products. [7] In submitting an NDA for a specific drug product for an intended use, an applicant must provide "full reports of investigations which have been made to show whether or not such drug is safe for use and whether such drug is effective for use."[8] An applicant must also include "adequate tests by all methods reasonably applicable to show whether or not such drug is safe for use under the conditions prescribed, recommended, or suggested in the proposed labeling."[9] In addition, applicants must furnish "substantial evidence that the drug will have the effect it purports or is represented to have under the conditions of use prescribed, recommended, or suggested in the proposed labeling."[10] "Substantial evidence" must consist of adequate and well-controlled investigations, including clinical investigations by suitably qualified experts that provide a reasonable basis for concluding that the drug will have the effect it purports or is represented to have under the conditions of use prescribed, recommended, or suggested in its labeling.[11]

Because an evaluation of a drug product's effectiveness in conjunction with FDA review of an NDA is inextricably intertwined with the proposed labeling for the product, an applicant must submit proposed labeling along with the NDA.[12] In evaluating an NDA, FDA reviews all

---

[7]FDA has approved other over-the-counter nicotine replacement therapy products marketed under Abbreviated New Drug Applications. 21 U.S.C. § 355(j).

[8]21 U.S.C. § 355(b)(1)(A).

[9]21 U.S.C. § 355(d).

[10]21 U.S.C. § 355(d)(5).

[11]21 U.S.C. § 355(e).

[12]21 U.S.C. § 355(b)(1)(F).

REV_00261582

the information submitted along with it to determine whether there is substantial evidence that the product will be effective and whether the benefits associated with the product outweigh any associated risks. Where the agency concludes both that the product will be effective and safe, FDA then determines how the relevant product information should be presented to the doctor. With respect to over-the-counter drugs, FDA determines how the information should be presented to the consumer in the product labeling.

Drug product labeling reflects not only the evidence submitted by the applicant in support of the NDA but also FDA's review of other relevant information. Such information may include studies completed during the drug development process, information about the chemical entity and how it acts in the body, information concerning the safety of similar drugs, and information concerning whether the drug is known to interact with any other substances. This information may also be included in the required labeling if it provides facts that a physician should know before prescribing the drug to a patient or information that a consumer should know before taking a drug.

What constitutes appropriate labeling for a drug product is not always obvious. Therefore, drug sponsors often have a dialogue with FDA about what should appear on a particular drug label. But when FDA ultimately approves an NDA, it also approves the final version of the product label. Because FDA cannot approve product labeling that would render a product misbranded, any product labeling must provide adequate directions for use and not be false or misleading.[13]

---

[13]21 U.S.C. § 352(a), (c), (f).

REV_00261583

FRAMEWORK FOR A COMPENSATION PROGRAM FOR PRESCRIPTION DRUG INJURIES

Trial lawyers and other advocates of the current tort liability system for prescription drug injuries claim that the threat of potentially massive liability gives manufacturers an essential incentive to optimize their product quality and risk-management practices while simultaneously compensating individuals who have suffered injuries as a result of inadequacies in those practices. The purported incentive provided by the tort system, however, directly conflicts with the risk management analysis undertaken by FDA in its approval of new drugs and in its postmarket surveillance of drugs already in the marketplace. FDA's decision to approve a new drug represents the agency's determination that, based on current scientific knowledge, the benefits of the new drug product to the public health outweigh its risks. The approval decision is made with full knowledge of the fact that all drugs pose some risk to some portion of the patient population, and that further study and experience will, over time, provide additional information about risks both known and unknown at the time the drug is approved.

In reality, however, every new piece of safety information provided to the public by FDA and drug manufacturers after a new drug is approved and in use provides opportunistic trial lawyers with a marketing opportunity for a new class action. The costs of defending those state law tort suits -- and the ad hoc decisions of non-expert judges and inexperienced juries in those actions -- often create incentives that are inconsistent with the FDA's expert determination regarding the benefit to public health of individual drugs and the Agency's programs for overseeing and managing the unavoidable risks of prescription drugs. For example, State law verdicts (or the threat of such verdicts) in "failure to warn" tort suits create overwhelming incentives for manufacturers to expand and, consequently, complicate their prescription drug labeling, which directly conflicts with recent FDA efforts to streamline and simplify such labeling, which the agency has undertaken after extensive study of the problem of information overload on drug labels. In short, the current tort system constitutes a shadow regulatory regime that frustrates, conflicts with, and ultimately threatens to undermine the comprehensive regulatory system crafted by the FDA in the exercise of its unique expertise in regulating pharmaceuticals for the protection of public health.

Despite these conflicts, Federal regulators and courts have been reluctant to preempt State law tort claims – no doubt out of concern that preemption would deprive injured persons of compensation for drug-related injuries. In similar situations, however, Congress has responded by displacing tort liability and providing an alternative compensation regime. For example, when lawsuits threatened the supply and availability of childhood vaccines, Congress passed the National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act of 1986, which eliminated counterproductive litigation while providing an administrative system for compensating those injured by the inherent and inevitable risks of vaccines.

Similarly, sound public policy now demands the elimination of the tort system's ongoing interference with the FDA's management of new drug approval and adverse event surveillance programs designed to protect the public health. At the same time, FDA, Congress, industry and the public must ensure that those who are injured by prescription drugs are fairly compensated. In addition to frustrating FDA's public health objectives as noted above, the current tort system is unacceptably slow, expensive, and inefficient, with an enormous amount of compensation dollars diverted to lawyers, experts and other administrative costs. Even worse, a number of factors, including public perceptions of "big business" generally and the pharmaceutical industry specifically, the complexity of the legal and factual issues involved, and the varying leverage wielded by trial lawyers based upon the "inventory" of claimants they have been able to amass, frequently make the results of drug tort litigation fundamentally unfair to defendants and plaintiffs alike. These cases have become a crapshoot for plaintiffs, whose outcome depends not so much on the merits of the parties' respective claims as on substantively irrelevant factors, such as where suit was brought and who represents the plaintiffs. Thus, a new system is needed to spread the risk of pharmaceutical-related injuries among all those benefiting from prescription drugs and to provide swift, predictable, reasonable and fair compensation with maximum efficiency. To protect the public health for all Americans and to assure fair and efficient resolution of claims for drug-related injuries, we must find a better way.

REV_00261609

Overview of Program

A tort replacement initiative in the prescription drug field would, like the Vaccine Act, substitute a "no-fault" reimbursement program covering certain injuries caused by prescription drugs for the existing tort/product liability system. Once in effect, the program would apply prospectively to future claims for prescription-related injury, regardless of when the drug was first prescribed or the injuries first began to develop.. Such a program would effectively eliminate the specter of "bet the company" mass tort litigation in which, despite the best efforts of scientists and regulators, an approved drug product is determined to have previously unknown or unpredictable adverse consequences when administered to the population at large. Coverage could be provided through a trust fund for those who could demonstrate the requisite injury caused by an FDA-approved prescription drug, provided that the drug was taken pursuant to and consistent with a prescription issued to the claimant by a qualified (or purportedly qualified) physician.

The program would allow claimants to recover economic damages (lost earnings and medical care expenses) from the fund consistent with established guidelines, place caps on the recovery of damages for death and non-economic damages, prohibit recovery of punitive and exemplary damages, and permit the recovery of only reasonable attorneys fees and costs. The program would be secondarily liable, and would not pay for items or services covered by collateral sources, such as federal and state benefit plans and private insurance. Moreover, the program could be designed to allow it to seek contribution from responsible third parties (e.g., a physician/administrator who commits malpractice). Compensation awards would be paid from a trust fund that could be financed with a small levy on all prescription drugs covered by the program.

As noted above, FDA approval of a prescription drug as safe and effective represents the Agency's determination that the benefits of the drug product to patient populations outweigh the attendant risks. Some risks, however, remain in the use of all prescription drugs. Some of these risks, ranging from the minor side effects of many prescription drugs to the frequently significant impact of chemotherapy drugs on patients who might die absent treatment, are necessarily attendant upon use of the drug product. They are disclosed in labeling when their incidence has been demonstrated to be sufficiently connected to administration of the drug that FDA deems their disclosure appropriate to protecting the public health. The tort system theoretically bars recovery for those effects as a risk assumed by the patient (although in specific cases, plaintiffs have prevailed). The program, similarly, would not provide recovery for such effects.

REV_00261610

Other prescription drug injuries, whether labeled or not, are so far removed from the benefits of the product that an individual drug user could not reasonably expect such an injury attendant to the benefit of the product. The best example is the severe adverse reaction that may occur in a small number of users of a drug who cannot be identified. The program would be designed to allow recovery for such injuries, even where the existing tort system might not.

Framework of Program

1. Prescription Drugs to Be Covered: Coverage would extend to all prescription drugs approved by FDA and issued through an authorized prescription written in the United States and trust territories or for Armed Forces members serving abroad and their dependents. The limitation to United States drugs is justified by importation and reimportation limitations placed on prescription drugs by the Prescription Drug Marketing Act and FDA's recent concerns regarding the scope of the personal use exemption to the importation and reimportation limitations.

2. Uses to Be Covered: Coverage would extend to all uses of an eligible prescription drug. Thus, the program would include both off-label use and allegations of erroneous prescribing or dosage.

(a) Attempting to exclude off-label uses would render the program ineffective for a large number of claims that currently clog the tort system.

(b) In addition, FDA's current labeling regulations require specific warnings related to common off-label uses where there is lack of substantial evidence of effectiveness of the use and association of the use with clinically significant risk or hazard.

(c) Regarding medication errors, the Fund would be authorized to pursue contribution claims from physicians or prescribers to the extent the Fund pays benefits for doctor or prescriber error.

3. Claimant Eligibility: The claim may be denied upon demonstration of use without a prescription issued to the claimant, use by the patient inconsistent with label or physician instructions and warnings, and/or misrepresentation by the patient to the prescriber concerning the existence of conditions material to determining whether the drug is contraindicated.

(a) As part of the petition process, the Claimant would bear the initial burden of providing the prescription and averring as to proper use and lack of material misrepresentation.

(b) The initial burden on the petitioner could also be satisfied by requiring a standardized affidavit from the prescribing physician as to existence and necessity of prescription and appropriate instruction of and disclosure to the patient.

REV_00261611

(c) The Fund could challenge the claim based on medical records and other evidence, but would bear the burden of persuasion.

4. Parties to be Covered: The Program would cover manufacturers, health care providers, and pharmacists, with the Fund able to pursue contribution claims against providers and pharmacists for prescribing errors. Such broad coverage would prevent diversion of disproportionate tort burdens to health care providers and pharmacists.

5. Injuries to be Covered: The program would include, subject to determination of causation as noted below, all injuries except those within the known risks identified on the labeling at the time the prescription was issued that are so likely to manifest themselves as part of the benefits of the product that their occurrence should reasonably be expected.

(a) To control administrative costs and prevent the system from being overloaded by trivial or frivolous claims, consideration could be given to establishing an injury threshold for compensable claims under the system. Injuries falling below the seriousness threshold would not be compensated.

(b) As noted below, specific determination of those injuries (and their magnitude) that are sufficiently known and likely to occur could be tied to FDA's determinations of risk as reflected in its labeling decisions. Caps on damages for wrongful death or pain and suffering, similar to the $250,000 cap for each contained in the Vaccine Act, would be included.

(c) Over time, experience with the administration of the system may provide a basis for establishing schedules setting compensation amounts for certain injuries. Such schedules could apply presumptively, with claimants free to offer evidence demonstrating that the scheduled compensation would be insufficient and inappropriate under the circumstances and that, subject to applicable caps, a higher compensation amount should be awarded.

(d) Claims alleging fear of future injury based on exposure (i.e., medical monitoring claims) would not be covered unless FDA determines medical monitoring is warranted based upon experience with a particular drug

(e) Punitive damages would be unavailable under the system.

(f) Under the broad preemption of pharmaceutical-related claims associated with the system, there would be no provision for residual common law or statutory claims for medical monitoring, punitive damages, or liability in excess of awarded amounts.

6. Determination of Causation: Over time, FDA would make drug-by-drug determinations of the types and magnitude of injuries that would be entitled to the rebuttable presumption of causation. These determinations would be made as part of FDA's labeling or approval decisions, and would be reviewed periodically based on adverse event reports, additional information requested or received from the manufacturer or other sources, and experience to date of petition determinations.

(a) All other injuries would be subject to proof of causality by preponderance of evidence.

REV_00261612

(b) FDA's labeling requirements, both proposed and current, require that labeling categorize adverse reactions by frequency (most frequent, less frequent, and rare) and severity. These determinations could provide the basis for distinguishing between known adverse reactions whose occurrence and magnitude can reasonably be expected from use of the product (those that are most frequent or least severe and should therefore be excluded from coverage) and the known but unpredictable severe adverse reaction.

(c) As the entity ultimately responsible for the risk-benefit determination that permits marketing of a pharmaceutical product, FDA is in the best position to ultimately decide which risks inherent in the product are part of the trade-off for the product's benefits, and which are so out of proportion to the benefits that a claimant should be compensated.

7. Administration of Program: Under enabling legislation, the Secretary of Health and Human Services would promulgate regulations establishing a system for the efficient and expeditious determination of petitions, which might include, at the Secretary's discretion, contracting with outside parties experienced in the adjustment of medical claims to make an initial determination of eligibility and amount of award, subject to de novo review by a Special Master and APA review by a district court, thus combining private sector, administrative and judicial resources.

8. Funding of Program: Funding would be based on a tax on wholesale sales of each prescription drug.

(a) Adjustments should be considered as cost information is developed or to address other inequities (e.g., adjustments to impose equal tax burdens on manufacturers of "brand name" and "generic" products that present identical risk factors).

(b) Implementing legislation should provide for consideration of the feasibility of the use of risk rating after a set period of years.

REV_00261613

Source: Legal > States Legal - U.S. > Florida > Statutes & Legislative Materials > FL - LexisNexis Florida Annotated Statutes - Book Browse ⓘ
TOC: Florida Statutes > /. . . / > PART II DAMAGES > 768.72 Pleading in civil actions; claim for punitive damages.
Terms: "punitive damages" /15 assess or award or recover
Section: Fla. Stat. § 768.72

Fla. Stat. § 768.72

LexisNexis (TM) Florida Annotated Statutes

 THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH THE 2002 LEGISLATIVE SESSION ***
 September 2002 Annotation Service ***

TITLE XLV TORTS
CHAPTER 768 NEGLIGENCE
PART II DAMAGES

♦ GO TO CODE ARCHIVE DIRECTORY FOR THIS JURISDICTION

Fla. Stat. § 768.72 (2002)

768.72 Pleading in civil actions; claim for punitive damages.

(1) In any civil action, no claim for punitive damages shall be permitted unless there is a reasonable showing by evidence in the record or proffered by the claimant which would provide a reasonable basis for recovery of such damages. The claimant may move to amend her or his complaint to assert a claim for punitive damages as allowed by the rules of civil procedure. The rules of civil procedure shall be liberally construed so as to allow the claimant discovery of evidence which appears reasonably calculated to lead to admissible evidence on the issue of punitive damages. No discovery of financial worth shall proceed until after the pleading concerning punitive damages is permitted.

(2) A defendant may be held liable for punitive damages only if the trier of fact, based on clear and convincing evidence, finds that the defendant was personally guilty of intentional misconduct or gross negligence. As used in this section, the term:

(a) "Intentional misconduct" means that the defendant had actual knowledge of the wrongfulness of the conduct and the high probability that injury or damage to the claimant would result and, despite that knowledge, intentionally pursued that course of conduct, resulting in injury or damage.

(b) "Gross negligence" means that the defendant's conduct was so reckless or wanting in care that it constituted a conscious disregard or indifference to the life, safety, or rights of persons exposed to such conduct.

(3) In the case of an employer, principal, corporation, or other legal entity, punitive damages may be imposed for the conduct of an employee or agent only if the conduct of the employee or agent meets the criteria specified in subsection (2) and:

(a) The employer, principal, corporation, or other legal entity actively and knowingly participated in such conduct;

(b) The officers, directors, or managers of the employer, principal, corporation, or other legal entity knowingly condoned, ratified, or consented to such conduct; or

REV_00261614

(c) The employer, principal, corporation, or other legal entity engaged in conduct that constituted gross negligence and that contributed to the loss, damages, or injury suffered by the claimant.

(4) The provisions of this section shall be applied to all causes of action arising after the effective date of this act.

HISTORY: s. 51, ch. 86-160; s. 1172, ch. 97-102; s. 22, ch. 99-225.

LexisNexis (TM) Notes:
CASE NOTES
TREATISES AND ANALYTICAL MATERIALS LAW REVIEWS

CASE NOTES
Admiralty Law : Personal Injuries : Maritime Tort Law
Antitrust & Trade Law : Consumer Protection
Business & Corporate Entities : Corporations : Shareholders & Other Constituents : Actions Against Corporations Civil Procedure : Pleading & Practice : Pleadings : Heightened Pleading Requirements
Civil Procedure : Pleading & Practice : Pleadings : Amended Pleadings Civil Procedure : Disclosure & Discovery
Civil Procedure : Discovery Methods : Interrogatories Civil Procedure : Appeals : Appellate Jurisdiction
Civil Procedure : Appeals : Appellate Jurisdiction : State Court Review
Civil Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability
Constitutional Law : Civil Rights Enforcement : Civil Rights Act of 1871
Torts : Damages : Damages Generally
Torts : Damages : Punitive Damages
Torts : Procedure : Discovery
Torts : Procedure : Preemption

Admiralty Law : Personal Injuries : Maritime Tort Law

1. In a maritime claim brought by an employee, the trial court erred when it denied the employer's motion to strike a demand for punitive damages because the employee failed comply with state law procedure set forth in Fla. Stat. ch. 768.72, which required a proffer of record evidence to support a punitive damages claim; as the requirement in ch. 768.72 of showing a reasonable basis for punitive damages did not contradict substantive maritime law and because the standards for whether punitive damages were recoverable remained the same, the statute did not impose additional obligations on the employee who filed in a state court. Norwegian Cruise Lines v. Zareno, 712 So. 2d 791, 1998 Fla. App. LEXIS 7520 (June 24, 1998).

Antitrust & Trade Law : Consumer Protection

REV_00261615

Source: Legal > Legislation & Politics > State Codes, Constitutions, Court Rules & ALS, All ⓘ
TOC: Official Code of Georgia Annotated > /. . . / > ARTICLE 1. GENERAL PROVISIONS > § 51-12-5.1. Punitive damages
Terms: "punitive damages" /15 ("conscious" or intentional) (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

O.C.G.A. § 51-12-5.1

OFFICIAL CODE OF GEORGIA ANNOTATED
Copyright © 2002 by The State of Georgia
All rights reserved.

* THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH THE 2002 REGULAR LEGISLATIVE SESSION *

TITLE 51. TORTS
CHAPTER 12. DAMAGES
ARTICLE 1. GENERAL PROVISIONS

♦ GO TO CODE ARCHIVE DIRECTORY FOR THIS JURISDICTION

O.C.G.A. § 51-12-5.1 (2002)

§ 51-12-5.1. Punitive damages

(a) As used in this Code section, the term "punitive damages" is synonymous with the terms "vindictive damages," "exemplary damages," and other descriptions of additional damages awarded because of aggravating circumstances in order to penalize, punish, or deter a defendant.

(b) Punitive damages may be awarded only in such tort actions in which it is proven by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant's actions showed willful misconduct, malice, fraud, wantonness, oppression, or that entire want of care which would raise the presumption of conscious indifference to consequences.

(c) Punitive damages shall be awarded not as compensation to a plaintiff but solely to punish, penalize, or deter a defendant.

(d) (1) An award of punitive damages must be specifically prayed for in a complaint. In any case in which punitive damages are claimed, the trier of fact shall first resolve from the evidence produced at trial whether an award of punitive damages shall be made. This finding shall be made specially through an appropriate form of verdict, along with the other required findings.

(2) If it is found that punitive damages are to be awarded, the trial shall immediately be recommenced in order to receive such evidence as is relevant to a decision regarding what amount of damages will be sufficient to deter, penalize, or punish the defendant in light of the circumstances of the case. It shall then be the duty of the trier of fact to set the amount to be awarded according to subsection (e), (f), or (g) of this Code section, as applicable.

(e) (1) In a tort case in which the cause of action arises from product liability, there shall be no limitation regarding the amount which may be awarded as punitive damages. Only one award of punitive damages may be recovered in a court in this state from a defendant for any act or omission if the cause of action arises from product liability, regardless of the number of causes of action which may arise from such act or omission.

(2) Seventy-five percent of any amounts awarded under this subsection as punitive damages, less a proportionate part of the costs of litigation, including reasonable attorney's fees, all as determined by the trial judge, shall be paid into the treasury of the state through the Office of Treasury and Fiscal Services. Upon issuance of judgment in such a case, the state shall have all rights due a judgment creditor until such judgment is satisfied and shall stand on equal footing with the plaintiff of the original case in securing a recovery after payment to the plaintiff of damages awarded other than as punitive damages. A judgment debtor may remit the state's proportional share of punitive damages to the clerk of the court in which the judgment was rendered. It shall be the duty of the clerk to pay over such amounts to the Office of Treasury and Fiscal Services within 60 days of receipt from the judgment debtor. This paragraph shall not be construed as making the state a party at interest and the sole right of the state is to the proceeds as provided in this paragraph.

(f) In a tort case in which the cause of action does not arise from product liability, if it is found that the defendant acted, or failed to act, with the specific intent to cause harm, or that the defendant acted or failed to act while under the influence of alcohol, drugs other than lawfully prescribed drugs administered in accordance with prescription, or any intentionally consumed glue, aerosol, or other toxic vapor to that degree that his or her judgment is substantially impaired, there shall be no limitation regarding the amount which may be awarded as punitive damages against an active tort-feasor but such damages shall not be the liability of any defendant other than an active tort-feasor.

(g) For any tort action not provided for by subsection (e) or (f) of this Code section in which the trier of fact has determined that punitive damages are to be awarded, the amount which may be awarded in the case shall be limited to a maximum of $250,000.00.

(h) This Code section shall apply only to causes of action arising on or after April 14, 1997.

HISTORY: Code 1981, § 51-12-5.1, enacted by Ga. L. 1987, p. 915, § 5; Ga. L. 1993, p. 1402, § 18; Ga. L. 1997, p. 837, § 1.

NOTES:
CODE COMMISSION NOTES. --Pursuant to Code Section 28-9-5, in 1997, in subection (f) "tort-feasor" was substituted for "tortfeasor" in two places and "judgment" was substituted for "judgement" near the middle and "April 14, 1997" was substituted for "the effective date of this subsection" at the end of subsection (h).

LAW REVIEWS. --For article, "Products Liability Law in Georgia Including Recent Developments," see 43 Mercer L. Rev. 27 (1991). For article, "The Case for Allowing Punitive Damages in Georgia Wrongful Death Actions: The Need to Remove an Unjust Anomaly in Georgia Law," see 45 Mercer L. Rev. 1 (1993). For article commenting on the 1997 amendment of this section, see 14 Georgia St. U. L. Rev. 63 (1997). For annual survey article on tort law, see 50 Mercer L. Rev. 335 (1998). For annual survey article discussing tort law, see 51 Mercer L. Rev. 461 (1999). For article, "Insurance," see 53 Mercer L. Rev. 281 (2001).

For note, "Mack Trucks, Inc. v. Conkle: The Georgia Supreme Court Tells the Legislature to Keep On Truckin' When Appropriating Punitive Damage Awards to the State Treasury," see 45 Mercer L. Rev. 1439 (1994).

For comment, "Are Excessive Punitive Damages Unconstitutional in Georgia?: This Question and More in Colonial Pipeline Co. v. Brown," see 6 Ga. St. U.L. Rev. 85 (1989). For comment, "Statutory Punitive Damage Caps and the Profit Motive: An Economic Perspective," see 40 Emory L.J. 303 (1991).

JUDICIAL DECISIONS

REV_00261617

Source: Legal > States Legal - U.S. > Idaho > Statutes & Legislative Materials > ID - Idaho Code Annotated ⓘ
TOC: Idaho Code Annotated > / . . . / > CHAPTER 16. [PERIODIC PAYMENT OF JUDGMENTS -- LIMITATION ON CERTAIN TORT DAMAGES AND LIABILITIES] > § 6-1604. Limitation on punitive damages
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 award or assess or recover (Edit Search)

↶Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

Idaho Code § 6-1604

Idaho Code
Copyright 1948-2002 by Matthew Bender & Company, Inc. one of the LEXIS Publishing companies.
All rights reserved.

 STATUTES CURRENT THRU THE 2002 CUMULATIVE SUPPLEMENT ***
 (2ND REGULAR SESSION OF THE 56TH LEGISLATURE) ***
 ANNOTATIONS CURRENT THROUGH MARCH 19, 2002 ***

CODE OF CIVIL PROCEDURE
TITLE 6. ACTIONS IN PARTICULAR CASES
CHAPTER 16. [PERIODIC PAYMENT OF JUDGMENTS -- LIMITATION ON CERTAIN TORT DAMAGES AND LIABILITIES]

◆ GO TO CODE ARCHIVE DIRECTORY FOR THIS JURISDICTION

Idaho Code § 6-1604 (2002)

§ 6-1604. Limitation on punitive damages

(1) In any action seeking recovery of punitive damages, the claimant must prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, oppressive, fraudulent, wanton, malicious or outrageous conduct by the party against whom the claim for punitive damages is asserted.

(2) In all civil actions in which punitive damages are permitted, no claim for damages shall be filed containing a prayer for relief seeking punitive damages. However, a party may, pursuant to a pretrial motion and after hearing before the court, amend the pleadings to include a prayer for relief seeking punitive damages. The court shall allow the motion to amend the pleadings if the moving party establishes at such hearing a reasonable likelihood of proving facts at trial sufficient to support an award of punitive damages. A prayer for relief added pursuant to this section shall not be barred by lapse of time under any applicable limitation on the time in which an action may be brought or claim asserted, if the time prescribed or limited had not expired when the original pleading was filed.

(3) The limitations on noneconomic damages contained in this act are not applicable to punitive damages.

(4) Nothing in this section is intended to change the rules of evidence or standards of proof used by a trier of fact in finding punitive damages.

HISTORY: I.C., § 6-1604, as added by 1987, ch. 278, § 1, p. 571.

NOTES:
COMPILER'S NOTES. The words "this act" refer to S.L. 1987, ch. 278, which is compiled as §§ 5-335, 5-336, 6-801 -- 6-804, 6-807, 6-1601 -- 6-1605, 12-123, 12-301 -- 12-303, 28-22-

REV_00261618

104, 41-336A, 41-1329, 41-1329A, 41-1815, 41-2401, and 72-311.

Section 18 of S.L. 1987, ch. 278 read: "The provisions of this act shall take effect on July 1, 1987, provided however, that Section [Sections] 1 through 11 shall apply only to causes of action which accrue on and after July 1, 1987. Provided further, that Section 6-1603, Idaho Code, as enacted herein, is hereby repealed and does sunset for causes of action which accrue after June 30, 1992."

CITED IN: Doe v. Cutter Biological, 844 F. Supp. 602 (D. Idaho 1994); Mac Tools, Inc. v. Griffin, 126 Idaho 193, 879 P.2d 1126 (1994); Vaught v. Dairyland Ins. Co., 131 Idaho 357, 956 P.2d 674 (1998); McGilvray v. Farmers New World Life Ins. Co., -- Idaho --, 28 P.3d 380 (2001); King v. Lang, -- Idaho --, 42 P.3d 698 (2002).

ANALYSIS
Basis for Award.
Burden of Proof.
Determining Amount of Damages.
Discretion of Court.
Failure to Strike Improper Claim.
Federal Diversity Cases.
Hearing.
No Malice Found.

BASIS FOR AWARD.

Punitive damages are reserved for the most unusual and compelling circumstances; the reason for the disfavor with regard to awarding punitive damages is the emphasis on punishment and deterrence rather than compensation of plaintiff, which is the normal role for a civil action. O'Neil v. Vasseur, 118 Idaho 257, 796 P.2d 134 (Ct. App. 1990).

As a matter of law, the failure to disclose a subsequently discovered fact, absent a duty to do so, is not such conduct that would support an award of punitive damages under this section. Duffin v. Idaho Crop Imp. Ass'n, 126 Idaho 1002, 895 P.2d 1195 (1995).

Nominal damages to a landowner who was prevented from accessing his property by an easement across a neighbor's property, where the neighbor erected a locked gate across the easement road, supported a punitive damages award because overwhelming evidence showed that the neighbor was aware of the easement. Harwood v. Talbert, -- Idaho --, 39 P.3d 612 (2001).

BURDEN OF PROOF.

The district judge did not abuse his discretion by denying plaintiff's claim for punitive damages where defendant failed to establish a reasonable likelihood he could prove by a preponderance of the evidence that plaintiff acted oppressively, fraudulently, wantonly, maliciously or outrageously. Weaver v. Stafford, 134 Idaho 691, 8 P.3d 1234 (2000).

DETERMINING AMOUNT OF DAMAGES.

Calculating 5% of insurance company's annual profit in arriving at an amount of punitive damages was a reasonable method of determining an appropriate amount for deterrent purposes where facts established deceptive marketing practices and bad faith denial of benefits practices by insurance company which were likely to continue if not deterred. Walston v. Monumental Life Ins. Co., 129 Idaho 211, 923 P.2d 456 (1996).

DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where the district court acted consistent with legal standards applicable to punitive damages and reached its decision by an exercise of reason, the court did not abuse its discretion in determining not to allow the jury to consider the plaintiff's claim for punitive damages. Polk v. Robert D. Larrabee Family Home Ctr., 135 Idaho 303, 17 P.3d 247 (2000).

FAILURE TO STRIKE IMPROPER CLAIM.

REV_00261619

Source: Legal > States Legal - U.S. > Illinois > Statutes & Legislative Materials > IL - Illinois Compiled Statutes Annotated ⓘ
TOC: Illinois Compiled Statutes Annotated > /. . . / > PART 11. TRIAL > § 735 ILCS 5/2-1115.05. Limitations on recovery of punitive damages in cases other than healing art or legal malpractice cases
Terms: "punitive damages" and wanton or willful or disregard or indifference (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

735 ILCS 5/2-1115.05

ILLINOIS COMPILED STATUTES ANNOTATED
Copyright © 2002 by Matthew Bender & Company, Inc.
a member of the LexisNexis Group.
All rights reserved.

 THIS SECTION IS CURRENT THROUGH PUBLIC ACT 92-617, 7/8/2002 ***
 ANNOTATIONS CURRENT THROUGH MARCH 25, 2002 ***

CHAPTER 735. CIVIL PROCEDURE
CODE OF CIVIL PROCEDURE
ARTICLE II. CIVIL PRACTICE
PART 11. TRIAL

◆ GO TO CODE ARCHIVE DIRECTORY FOR THIS JURISDICTION

735 ILCS 5/2-1115.05 (2002)

§ 735 ILCS 5/2-1115.05. Limitations on recovery of punitive damages in cases other than healing art or legal malpractice cases

Sec. 2-1115.05. Limitations on recovery of punitive damages in cases other than healing art or legal malpractice cases. (a) In all cases on account of bodily injury, or physical damage to property based on negligence, or product liability based on any theory or doctrine, other than those cases described in Section 2-1115 [735 ILCS 5/2-1115], punitive damages may be awarded only if actual damages are awarded. The amount of punitive damages that may be awarded for a claim in any civil action subject to this Section shall not exceed 3 times the amount awarded to the claimant for the economic damages on which such claim is based.

(b) To recover punitive damages in cases described in subsection (a), a plaintiff must show by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant's conduct was with evil motive or with a reckless and outrageous indifference to a highly unreasonable risk of harm and with a conscious indifference to the rights and safety of others. "Clear and convincing evidence" means that measure or degree of proof that will produce in the mind of the trier of fact a high degree of certainty as to the truth of the allegations sought to be established. This evidence requires a greater degree of persuasion than is necessary to meet the preponderance of the evidence standard.

(c) In any action including a claim for punitive damages, a defendant may request that the issues relating to punitive damages be tried separately from the other issues in the action. If such a request is made, the trier of fact shall first hear evidence relevant to, and render a verdict upon, the defendant's liability for compensatory damages and the amount thereof. If the trier of fact makes an award of actual damages, the same trier of fact shall immediately hear any additional evidence relevant to, and render a verdict upon, the defendant's liability for punitive damages and the amount thereof. If no award of actual damages is made, the claim for punitive damages shall be dismissed. If the defendant requests a separate proceeding concerning liability for punitive damages pursuant to this Section, and the proceeding is held, evidence relevant only to the claim of punitive damages shall be inadmissible in any proceeding to determine whether compensatory damages are to be awarded.

(d) The limitations of subsection (a) shall not apply in a case in which a plaintiff seeks damages against an individual on account of death, bodily injury, or physical damage to property based on any theory or doctrine due to an incident or occurrence for which the individual has been charged and convicted of a criminal act for which a period of incarceration is or may be a part of the sentence.

(e) Nothing in this Section shall be construed to create a right to recover punitive damages.

(f) This amendatory Act of 1995 applies to causes of action accruing on or after its effective date.

HISTORY:
Source: P.A. 89-7, § 15.

NOTES:
NOTE.
P.A. 89-7, which enacted this section, was declared unconstitutional in Best v. Taylor Mach. Works, 179 Ill. 2d 367, 228 Ill. Dec. 636, 689 N.E.2d 1057 (1997).

EFFECTIVE DATE.
Section 995 of P.A. 89-7 made this section effective upon becoming law. The Act was approved March 9, 1995 and applicable to causes of action as specified in each Section or part of the Act.

LEGAL PERIODICALS
For note, "Illinois' Landmark Tort Reform: The Sponsor's Policy Explanation," 27 Loy. U. Chi. L.J. 805 (1996).
For comment, "The 1995 Illinois Civil Justice Reform Act: Has the Baby Been Thrown Out with the Bath Water?," 20 S. Ill. U.L.J. 117 (1996).
For article, "Illinois Tort Reform: The Judge's Perspective," see 84 Ill. B.J. 124 (1996).
For article, "Punitive Damages: The U.S. Supreme Court's Meandering Path," see 83 Ill. B.J. 576 (1995).

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00261621

Minnesota Statutes 2002, Table of Chapters

Table of contents for Chapter 549

549.20 Punitive damages.

Subdivision 1. Standard. (a) Punitive damages shall be allowed in civil actions only upon clear and convincing evidence that the acts of the defendant show deliberate disregard for the rights or safety of others.

(b) A defendant has acted with deliberate disregard for the rights or safety of others if the defendant has knowledge of facts or intentionally disregards facts that create a high probability of injury to the rights or safety of others and:

(1) deliberately proceeds to act in conscious or intentional disregard of the high degree of probability of injury to the rights or safety of others; or

(2) deliberately proceeds to act with indifference to the high probability of injury to the rights or safety of others.

Subd. 2. Master and principal. Punitive damages can properly be awarded against a master or principal because of an act done by an agent only if:

(a) the principal authorized the doing and the manner of the act, or

(b) the agent was unfit and the principal deliberately disregarded a high probability that the agent was unfit, or

(c) the agent was employed in a managerial capacity with authority to establish policy and make planning level decisions for the principal and was acting in the scope of that employment, or

(d) the principal or a managerial agent of the principal, described in clause (c), ratified or approved the act while knowing of its character and probable consequences.

Subd. 3. Factors. Any award of punitive damages shall be measured by those factors which justly bear upon the purpose of punitive damages, including the seriousness of hazard to the public arising from the defendant's misconduct, the profitability of the misconduct to the defendant, the duration of the misconduct and any concealment of it, the degree of the defendant's awareness of the hazard and of its excessiveness, the attitude and conduct of the defendant upon discovery of the misconduct, the number and level of employees involved in causing or concealing the misconduct, the financial condition of the defendant, and the total effect of other punishment likely to be imposed upon the defendant as a result of the misconduct, including compensatory and punitive damage awards to the plaintiff and other similarly situated persons, and the severity of any criminal penalty to which the defendant may be subject.

REV_00261622

Subd. 4. Separate proceeding. In a civil action in which punitive damages are sought, the trier of fact shall, if requested by any of the parties, first determine whether compensatory damages are to be awarded. Evidence of the financial condition of the defendant and other evidence relevant only to punitive damages is not admissible in that proceeding. After a determination has been made, the trier of fact shall, in a separate proceeding, determine whether and in what amount punitive damages will be awarded.

Subd. 5. Judicial review. The court shall specifically review the punitive damages award in light of the factors set forth in subdivision 3 and shall make specific findings with respect to them. The appellate court, if any, also shall review the award in light of the factors set forth in that subdivision. Nothing in this section may be construed to restrict either court's authority to limit punitive damages.

HIST: 1978 c 738 s 4; 1986 c 444; 1990 c 555 s 15-18

Copyright 2002 by the Office of Revisor of Statutes, State of Minnesota.

REV_00261623

Source: Legal > Legislation & Politics > State Codes, Constitutions, Court Rules & ALS, All ⓘ
TOC: Mississippi Code of 1972 Annotated > /. . . / > CHAPTER 1. PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE PROVISIONS COMMON TO COURTS > § 11-1-65. Punitive damages
Terms: "punitive damages" /15 ("conscious" or intentional) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

Miss. Code Ann. § 11-1-65

MISSISSIPPI CODE of 1972 ANNOTATED
Copyright © 1972-2002 by THE STATE OF MISSISSIPPI
All rights reserved.

 CURRENT THROUGH THE 2002 REGULAR AND FIRST EXTRAORDINARY SESSION ***
 STATE COURT ANNOTATIONS CURRENT THROUGH APRIL 30, 2002 ***
 FEDERAL COURT ANNOTATIONS CURRENT THROUGH MARCH 10, 2002 ***

TITLE 11. CIVIL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE
CHAPTER 1. PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE PROVISIONS COMMON TO COURTS

♦ GO TO CODE ARCHIVE DIRECTORY FOR THIS JURISDICTION

Miss. Code Ann. § 11-1-65 (2001)

§ 11-1-65. Punitive damages

(1) In any action in which punitive damages are sought:

(a) Punitive damages may not be awarded if the claimant does not prove by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant against whom punitive damages are sought acted with actual malice, gross negligence which evidences a willful, wanton or reckless disregard for the safety of others, or committed actual fraud.

(b) In any action in which the claimant seeks an award of punitive damages, the trier of fact shall first determine whether compensatory damages are to be awarded and in what amount, before addressing any issues related to punitive damages.

(c) If, but only if, an award of compensatory damages has been made against a party, the court shall promptly commence an evidentiary hearing before the same trier of fact to determine whether punitive damages may be considered.

(d) The court shall determine whether the issue of punitive damages may be submitted to the trier of fact; and, if so, the trier of fact shall determine whether to award punitive damages and in what amount.

(e) In all cases involving an award of punitive damages, the fact finder, in determining the amount of punitive damages, shall consider, to the extent relevant, the following: the defendant's financial condition and net worth; the nature and reprehensibility of the defendant's wrongdoing, for example, the impact of the defendant's conduct on the plaintiff, or the relationship of the defendant to the plaintiff; the defendant's awareness of the amount of harm being caused and the defendant's motivation in causing such harm; the duration of the defendant's misconduct and whether the defendant attempted to conceal such misconduct; and any other circumstances shown by the evidence that bear on determining a proper amount of punitive damages. The trier of fact shall be instructed that the primary purpose of punitive damages is to punish the wrongdoer and deter similar misconduct in the future by the defendant and others while the purpose of compensatory damages is to make the plaintiff whole.

REV_00261624

(f) (i) Before entering judgment for an award of punitive damages the trial court shall ascertain that the award is reasonable in its amount and rationally related to the purpose to punish what occurred giving rise to the award and to deter its repetition by the defendant and others.

(ii) In determining whether the award is excessive, the court shall take into consideration the following factors:

1. Whether there is a reasonable relationship between the punitive damage award and the harm likely to result from the defendant's conduct as well as the harm that actually occurred;

2. The degree of reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct, the duration of that conduct, the defendant's awareness, any concealment, and the existence and frequency of similar past conduct;

3. The financial condition and net worth of the defendant; and

4. In mitigation, the imposition of criminal sanctions on the defendant for its conduct and the existence of other civil awards against the defendant for the same conduct.

(g) The seller of a product other than the manufacturer shall not be liable for punitive damages unless the seller exercised substantial control over that aspect of the design, testing, manufacture, packaging or labeling of the product that caused the harm for which recovery of damages is sought; the seller altered or modified the product, and the alteration or modification was a substantial factor in causing the harm for which recovery of damages is sought; the seller had actual knowledge of the defective condition of the product at the time he supplied same; or the seller made an express factual representation about the aspect of the product which caused the harm for which recovery of damages is sought.

(2) The provisions of Section 11-1-65 shall not apply to:

(a) Contracts;

(b) Libel and slander; or

(c) Causes of action for persons and property arising out of asbestos.

HISTORY: SOURCES: Laws, 1993, ch. 302, § 2, eff from and after July 1, 1993.

NOTES:
EDITOR'S NOTE. --Laws, 1993, ch. 302, § 5, effective July 1, 1993, provides as follows:
"SECTION 5. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after July 1, 1993. Procedural provisions of this act including subsections (1)(a), (b), (c) and (d) of Section 2 [§ 11-1-65] shall apply to all pending actions in which judgment has not been entered on the effective date of the act and all actions filed on or after the effective date of the act. All other provisions shall apply to all actions filed on or after July 1, 1994."

CROSS REFERENCES. --Provisions of this section as effecting exception to what otherwise might constitute consequential damages, see § 75-2-715.

JUDICIAL DECISIONS

REV_00261625

Source: Legal > Legislation & Politics > State Codes, Constitutions, Court Rules & ALS, All ⓘ
TOC: Montana Code Annotated > /. . . / > PART 2 DAMAGES > 27-1-221 Punitive damages -- liability -- proof -- award.
Terms: "punitive damages" /15 ("conscious" or intentional) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

Mont. Code Anno., § 27-1-221

MONTANA CODE ANNOTATED

 THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH THE 2001 LEGISLATION ***

TITLE 27 CIVIL LIABILITY, REMEDIES, AND LIMITATIONS CHAPTER 1 AVAILABILITY OF REMEDIES -- LIABILITY PART 2 DAMAGES

◆ GO TO CODE ARCHIVE DIRECTORY FOR THIS JURISDICTION

Mont. Code Anno., § 27-1-221 (2001)

27-1-221 Punitive damages -- liability -- proof -- award.

(1) Subject to the provisions of 27-1-220 and this section, reasonable punitive damages may be awarded when the defendant has been found guilty of actual fraud or actual malice.

(2) A defendant is guilty of actual malice if the defendant has knowledge of facts or intentionally disregards facts that create a high probability of injury to the plaintiff and:

(a) deliberately proceeds to act in conscious or intentional disregard of the high probability of injury to the plaintiff; or

(b) deliberately proceeds to act with indifference to the high probability of injury to the plaintiff.

(3) A defendant is guilty of actual fraud if the defendant:

(a) makes a representation with knowledge of its falsity; or

(b) conceals a material fact with the purpose of depriving the plaintiff of property or legal rights or otherwise causing injury.

(4) Actual fraud exists only when the plaintiff has a right to rely upon the representation of the defendant and suffers injury as a result of that reliance. The contract definitions of fraud expressed in Title 28, chapter 2, do not apply to proof of actual fraud under this section.

(5) All elements of the claim for punitive damages must be proved by clear and convincing evidence. Clear and convincing evidence means evidence in which there is no serious or substantial doubt about the correctness of the conclusions drawn from the evidence. It is more than a preponderance of evidence but less than beyond a reasonable doubt.

(6) Liability for punitive damages must be determined by the trier of fact, whether judge or jury. An award of punitive damages must be unanimous as to liability and amount.

(7) (a) Evidence regarding a defendant's financial affairs, financial condition, and net worth is not admissible in a trial to determine whether a defendant is liable for punitive damages. When the jury returns a verdict finding a defendant liable for punitive damages, the amount of punitive damages must then be determined by the jury in an immediate, separate proceeding and be submitted to the judge for review as provided in subsection (7)(c). In the separate proceeding to determine the amount of punitive damages to be awarded, the defendant's financial affairs, financial condition, and net worth must be considered.

REV_00261626

(b) When an award of punitive damages is made by the judge, the judge shall clearly state the reasons for making the award in findings of fact and conclusions of law, demonstrating consideration of each of the following matters:

(i) the nature and reprehensibility of the defendant's wrongdoing;

(ii) the extent of the defendant's wrongdoing;

(iii) the intent of the defendant in committing the wrong;

(iv) the profitability of the defendant's wrongdoing, if applicable;

(v) the amount of actual damages awarded by the jury;

(vi) the defendant's net worth;

(vii) previous awards of punitive or exemplary damages against the defendant based upon the same wrongful act;

(viii) potential or prior criminal sanctions against the defendant based upon the same wrongful act; and

(ix) any other circumstances that may operate to increase or reduce, without wholly defeating, punitive damages.

(c) The judge shall review a jury award of punitive damages, giving consideration to each of the matters listed in subsection (7)(b). If after review the judge determines that the jury award of punitive damages should be increased or decreased, the judge may do so. The judge shall clearly state the reasons for increasing, decreasing, or not increasing or decreasing the punitive damages award of the jury in findings of fact and conclusions of law, demonstrating consideration of each of the factors listed in subsection (7)(b).

(8) This section is not intended to alter the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure governing discovery of a defendant's financial affairs, financial condition, and net worth.

HISTORY:

En. Sec. 4290, Civ. C. 1895; re-en. Sec. 6047, Rev. C. 1907; re-en. Sec. 8666, R.C.M. 1921; Cal. Civ. C. Sec. 3294; Field. Civ. C. Sec. 1839; re-en. Sec. 8666, R.C.M. 1935; R.C.M. 1947, 17-208; amd. Sec. 2, Ch. 507, L. 1985; amd. Sec. 2, Ch. 627, L. 1987; amd. Sec. 33, Ch. 16, L. 1991; amd. Sec. 1, Ch. 328, L. 1997.

NOTES:

Part Cross-References

Periodic payment of certain future damages, Title 25, ch. 9, part 4.

REV_00261627

Source: Legal > Legislation & Politics > State Codes, Constitutions, Court Rules & ALS, All ⓘ
TOC: Nevada Revised Statutes Annotated > /. . . / > CHAPTER 42. DAMAGES > § 42.005. Exemplary and punitive damages: In general; limitations on amount of award; determination in subsequent proceeding
Terms: "punitive damages" /15 ("conscious" or intentional) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

NRS § 42.005

NEVADA REVISED STATUTES ANNOTATED
Copyright © 1986-2002 by Matthew Bender & Company, Inc.
a member of the LexisNexis Group.
All rights reserved.

 THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH ALL 2002 LEGISLATION ***
 ANNOTATIONS CURRENT THROUGH CASES PUBLISHED JUNE 4, 2002 ***

TITLE 3. REMEDIES; SPECIAL ACTIONS AND PROCEEDINGS
CHAPTER 42. DAMAGES

◆ GO TO CODE ARCHIVE DIRECTORY FOR THIS JURISDICTION

NRS § 42.005 (2002)

§ 42.005. Exemplary and punitive damages: In general; limitations on amount of award; determination in subsequent proceeding

1. Except as otherwise provided in NRS 42.007, in an action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, where it is proven by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud or malice, express or implied, the plaintiff, in addition to the compensatory damages, may recover damages for the sake of example and by way of punishing the defendant. Except as otherwise provided in this section or by specific statute, an award of exemplary or punitive damages made pursuant to this section may not exceed:

(a) Three times the amount of compensatory damages awarded to the plaintiff if the amount of compensatory damages is $ 100,000 or more; or

(b) Three hundred thousand dollars if the amount of compensatory damages awarded to the plaintiff is less than $ 100,000.

2. The limitations on the amount of an award of exemplary or punitive damages prescribed in subsection 1 do not apply to an action brought against:

(a) A manufacturer, distributor or seller of a defective product;

(b) An insurer who acts in bad faith regarding its obligations to provide insurance coverage;

(c) A person for violating a state or federal law prohibiting discriminatory housing practices, if the law provides for a remedy of exemplary or punitive damages in excess of the limitations prescribed in subsection 1;

(d) A person for damages or an injury caused by the emission, disposal or spilling of a toxic, radioactive or hazardous material or waste; or

REV_00261628

(e) A person for defamation.

3. If punitive damages are claimed pursuant to this section, the trier of fact shall make a finding of whether such damages will be assessed. If such damages are to be assessed, a subsequent proceeding must be conducted before the same trier of fact to determine the amount of such damages to be assessed. The trier of fact shall make a finding of the amount to be assessed according to the provisions of this section. The findings required by this section, if made by a jury, must be made by special verdict along with any other required findings. The jury must not be instructed, or otherwise advised, of the limitations on the amount of an award of punitive damages prescribed in subsection 1.

4. Evidence of the financial condition of the defendant is not admissible for the purpose of determining the amount of punitive damages to be assessed until the commencement of the subsequent proceeding to determine the amount of exemplary or punitive damages to be assessed.

5. For the purposes of an action brought against an insurer who acts in bad faith regarding its obligations to provide insurance coverage, the definitions set forth in NRS 42.001 are not applicable and the corresponding provisions of the common law apply.

HISTORY: 1989, ch. 218, § 2, p. 486; 1995, ch. 691, § 5, p. 2669.

CASE NOTES

EDITOR'S NOTE. --The cases below were decided under NRS 42.010 prior to its 1989 amendment and the enactment of this section by Acts 1989, ch. 218.
I. In General.
II. Punitive Damage Award Proper.
III. Punitive Damage Award Improper.

I. IN GENERAL.

PURPOSE OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES. --The concept of punitive damages rests upon a presumed public policy, to punish a wrongdoer for his act and to deter others from acting in similar fashion. Nevada Cement Co. v. Lemler, 89 Nev. 447, 514 P.2d 1180 (1973); Ace Truck & Equip. Rentals, Inc. v. Kahn, 103 Nev. 503, 746 P.2d 132 (1987).

Punitive damages are designed not to reward the victim but to punish the wrongdoer and deter fraudulent, malicious or oppressive conduct. Turnbow v. State, Dep't of Human Resources, 109 Nev. 493, 853 P.2d 97 (1993).

COMPENSATORY DAMAGES. --The Nevada Supreme Court indicates that the terms "bodily injury" only encompass compensatory damages, not punitive damages, for indemnification purposes. Lombardi v. Maryland Cas. Co., 894 F. Supp. 369 (D. Nev. 1995).

WHETHER THE RECORD CONTAINS SUFFICIENT EVIDENCE TO JUSTIFY AN AWARD OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES IS A QUESTION OF LAW, and for the court to decide. Austin v. C & L Trucking, Inc., 610 F. Supp. 465 (D. Nev. 1985).

BUT WHERE THE NECESSARY FACTUAL BASIS FOR PUNITIVE DAMAGES EXISTS, the amount of the award rests with the sound discretion of the jury. Austin v. C & L Trucking, Inc., 610 F. Supp. 465 (D. Nev. 1985).

ALLOWANCE OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES IS DISCRETIONARY. --A plaintiff is never entitled to punitive damages as a matter of right; their allowance or denial rests entirely in the

REV_00261629

Source: Legal > Legislation & Politics > State Codes, Constitutions, Court Rules & ALS, All ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /15 ("conscious" or intentional) (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

N.C. Gen. Stat. § 1D-15

GENERAL STATUTES OF NORTH CAROLINA
Copyright © 2002 by Matthew Bender & Company, Inc.
a member of the LexisNexis Group.
All rights reserved.

 STATUTES CURRENT THROUGH THE 2001 REGULAR SESSION ***
 ANNOTATIONS CURRENT THROUGH MARCH 7, 2002 ***

CHAPTER 1D. PUNITIVE DAMAGES

◆ GO TO CODE ARCHIVE DIRECTORY FOR THIS JURISDICTION

N.C. Gen. Stat. § 1D-15 (2002)

§ 1D-15. Standards for recovery of punitive damages

(a) Punitive damages may be awarded only if the claimant proves that the defendant is liable for compensatory damages and that one of the following aggravating factors was present and was related to the injury for which compensatory damages were awarded:

(1) Fraud.

(2) Malice.

(3) Willful or wanton conduct.

(b) The claimant must prove the existence of an aggravating factor by clear and convincing evidence.

(c) Punitive damages shall not be awarded against a person solely on the basis of vicarious liability for the acts or omissions of another. Punitive damages may be awarded against a person only if that person participated in the conduct constituting the aggravating factor giving rise to the punitive damages, or if, in the case of a corporation, the officers, directors, or managers of the corporation participated in or condoned the conduct constituting the aggravating factor giving rise to punitive damages.

(d) Punitive damages shall not be awarded against a person solely for breach of contract.

HISTORY: 1995, c. 514, s. 1.

NOTES:
LEGAL PERIODICALS. --For article, "North Carolina's New Punitive Damages Statute: Who's Being Punished, Anyway?," see 74 N.C.L. Rev. 2174 (1996).
For article, "Judicial Boilerplate Language as Torts Decisional Litany: Four Problem Areas in North Carolina," see 18 Campbell L. Rev. 359 (1996).

CASE NOTES

Source: Legal > Legislation & Politics > State Codes, Constitutions, Court Rules & ALS, All
TOC: Page's Ohio Revised Code Annotated > /. . . / > [TRIAL BY JURY] > § 2315.21 Recovery of punitive or exemplary damages in tort actions.
Terms: "punitive damages" /15 ("conscious" or intentional) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

ORC Ann. 2315.21

PAGE'S OHIO REVISED CODE ANNOTATED
Copyright (c) 2002 Anderson Publishing Company

 THIS DOCUMENT REFLECTS CHANGES RECEIVED THROUGH MARCH 18, 2002 ***

TITLE XXIII [23] COURTS -- COMMON PLEAS CHAPTER 2315: TRIAL PROCEDURE
[TRIAL BY JURY]

◆ GO TO CODE ARCHIVE DIRECTORY FOR THIS JURISDICTION

ORC Ann. 2315.21 (Anderson 2002)

STATUS: CONSULT SLIP LAWS CITED BELOW FOR RECENT CHANGES TO THIS DOCUMENT
◆ LEXSEE 2001 Ohio HB 412 -- See sections 1, 2 and 4.

§ 2315.21 Recovery of punitive or exemplary damages in tort actions.

(A) As used in this section:

(1) "Tort action" means a civil action for damages for injury [n1] person or property. "Tort action" includes a product liability claim for damages for injury or loss to person or property that is subject to sections 2307.71 to 2307.80 of the Revised Code, but does not include a civil action for damages for a breach of contract or another agreement between persons.

(2) "Trier of fact" means the jury or, in a nonjury action, the court.

(B) Subject to division (D) of this section, punitive or exemplary damages are not recoverable from a defendant in question in a tort action unless both of the following apply:

(1) The actions or omissions of that defendant demonstrate malice, aggravated or egregious fraud, oppression, or insult, or that defendant as principal or master authorized, participated in, or ratified actions or omissions of an agent or servant that so demonstrate;

(2) The plaintiff in question has adduced proof of actual damages that resulted from actions or omissions as described in division (B)(1) of this section.

(C)(1) In a tort action, the trier of fact shall determine the liability of any defendant for punitive or exemplary damages and the amount of those damages.

(2) In a tort action, the burden of proof shall be upon a plaintiff in question, by clear and convincing evidence, to establish that the plaintiff is entitled to recover punitive or exemplary damages.

(D) This section does not apply to tort actions against the state in the court of claims or to the extent that another section of the Revised Code expressly provides any of the following:

(1) Punitive or exemplary damages are recoverable from a defendant in question in a tort action on a basis other than that the actions or omissions of that defendant demonstrate malice, aggravated or egregious fraud, oppression, or insult, or on a basis other than that the defendant in question as principal or master authorized, participated in, or ratified actions or omissions of an agent or servant that so demonstrate;

(2) Punitive or exemplary damages are recoverable from a defendant in question in a tort action irrespective of whether the plaintiff in question has adduced proof of actual damages;

(3) The burden of proof upon a plaintiff in question to recover punitive or exemplary damages from a defendant in question in a tort action is one other than clear and convincing evidence;

(4) Punitive or exemplary damages are not recoverable from a defendant in question in a tort action.

HISTORY:

: 142 v H 1 (Eff 1-5-88); 146 v H 350 (Eff 1-27-97); 149 v S 108, § 2.01. Eff 7-6-2001.

Not analogous to former RC § 2315.21 (GC § 11421-1a; 120 v 707; Bureau of Code Revision, 10-1-53), repealed 133 v H 1201, § 1, eff 7-1-71.

NOTES:

n1* In division (A)(1), the HB 1 (142 v --) enactment reads "or loss to . . . " The law now reads as a result of the amendment in SB 108 (149 v --).

The provisions of § 3(A)(8) of SB 108 (149 v --) read as follows:

(8) Section 2315.21 of the Revised Code is revived, supersedes the version of the same section that is repealed by Section 2.02 of this act, and includes amendments to respond to division (C)(2) of section 2315.21 of the Revised Code having been held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Ohio in Zoppo v. Homestead Ins. Co.

(1994), 71 Ohio St.3d 552.

CROSS-REFERENCES TO RELATED SECTIONS Civil liability for-- Performing or attempting partial birth procedure, RC § 2307.53.
Terminating or attempting termination of pregnancy after viability, RC § 2307.52.
Civil recovery for criminal act, RC § 2307.60.
Court of common pleas; jurisdiction to award punitive or exemplary damages, RC § 2305.01.
Damages--
Cable television owner or operator, RC § 2307.62.
Disparagement of perishable agricultural or aquacultural food product, RC § 2307.81.
Nursing home resident grievance, RC § 3721.17.
Right of publicity in individual's persona, RC § 2741.07.
When jury shall determine amount of punitive or exemplary damages, RC § 2315.18.

REV_00261632

Source: Legal > Legislation & Politics > State Codes, Constitutions, Court Rules & ALS, All ⓘ
TOC: Oregon Revised Statutes Annotated > /. . . / > DAMAGES > 18.537. Standards for award of punitive damages; required review of award by court; additional reduction of award for remedial measures.
Terms: "punitive damages" /15 ("conscious" or intentional) (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

ORS § 18.537

OREGON REVISED STATUTES

 THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH THE 2001 REGULAR SESSION OF THE 71ST LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY ***

TITLE 2. PROCEDURE IN CIVIL PROCEEDINGS
CHAPTER 18. JUDGMENTS; COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE; DAMAGES; GARNISHMENT DAMAGES

◆ GO TO CODE ARCHIVE DIRECTORY FOR THIS JURISDICTION

ORS § 18.537 (2001)

18.537. Standards for award of punitive damages; required review of award by court; additional reduction of award for remedial measures.

(1) Punitive damages are not recoverable in a civil action unless it is proven by clear and convincing evidence that the party against whom punitive damages are sought has acted with malice or has shown a reckless and outrageous indifference to a highly unreasonable risk of harm and has acted with a conscious indifference to the health, safety and welfare of others.

(2) If an award of punitive damages is made by a jury, the court shall review the award to determine whether the award is within the range of damages that a rational juror would be entitled to award based on the record as a whole, viewing the statutory and common-law factors that allow an award of punitive damages for the specific type of claim at issue in the proceeding.

(3) In addition to any reduction that may be made under subsection (2) of this section, upon the motion of a defendant the court may reduce the amount of any judgment requiring the payment of punitive damages entered against the defendant if the defendant establishes that the defendant has taken remedial measures that are reasonable under the circumstances to prevent reoccurrence of the conduct that gave rise to the claim for punitive damages. In reducing awards of punitive damages under the provisions of this subsection, the court shall consider the amount of any previous judgment for punitive damages entered against the same defendant for the same conduct giving rise to a claim for punitive damages.

HISTORY: 1995 c.688 § 2

CURRENT ANNOTATIONS

NOTES OF DECISIONS

Whether punitive damages are within range awardable by rational juror is not determined by fixed ratio between compensatory damages amount and punitive damages amount.

REV_00261633

Source: Legal > Legislation & Politics > State Codes, Constitutions, Court Rules & ALS, All ⓘ
TOC: Pennsylvania Statutes > /. . . / > CHAPTER 5. MEDICAL PROFESSIONAL LIABILITY > § 1303.505. Punitive damages
Terms: "punitive damages" /15 ("conscious" or intentional) (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

40 P.S. § 1303.505

PENNSYLVANIA STATUTES, ANNOTATED BY LEXISNEXIS(TM)

* THIS SECTION IS CURRENT THROUGH ACT 55 OF THE 2002 LEGISLATIVE SESSION *
 SEPTEMBER 2002 ANNOTATION SERVICE ***

PENNSYLVANIA STATUTES
TITLE 40. INSURANCE
CHAPTER 5C. MEDICAL CARE AVAILABILITY AND REDUCTION OF ERROR (MCARE) ACT
CHAPTER 5. MEDICAL PROFESSIONAL LIABILITY

✦ GO TO CODE ARCHIVE DIRECTORY FOR THIS JURISDICTION

40 P.S. § 1303.505 (2002)

§ 1303.505. Punitive damages

(a) AWARD.--PUNITIVE DAMAGES MAY BE AWARDED FOR CONDUCT THAT IS THE RESULT OF THE HEALTH CARE PROVIDER'S WILLFUL OR WANTON CONDUCT OR RECKLESS INDIFFERENCE TO THE RIGHTS OF OTHERS. IN ASSESSING PUNITIVE DAMAGES, THE TRIER OF FACT CAN PROPERLY CONSIDER THE CHARACTER OF THE HEALTH CARE PROVIDER'S ACT, THE NATURE AND EXTENT OF THE HARM TO THE PATIENT THAT THE HEALTH CARE PROVIDER CAUSED OR INTENDED TO CAUSE AND THE WEALTH OF THE HEALTH CARE PROVIDER.

(b) GROSS NEGLIGENCE.--A SHOWING OF GROSS NEGLIGENCE IS INSUFFICIENT TO SUPPORT AN AWARD OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

(c) VICARIOUS LIABILITY.--PUNITIVE DAMAGES SHALL NOT BE AWARDED AGAINST A HEALTH CARE PROVIDER WHO IS ONLY VICARIOUSLY LIABLE FOR THE ACTIONS OF ITS AGENT THAT CAUSED THE INJURY UNLESS IT CAN BE SHOWN BY A PREPONDERANCE OF THE EVIDENCE THAT THE PARTY KNEW OF AND ALLOWED THE CONDUCT BY ITS AGENT THAT RESULTED IN THE AWARD OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

(d) TOTAL AMOUNT OF DAMAGES.--EXCEPT IN CASES ALLEGING INTENTIONAL MISCONDUCT, PUNITIVE DAMAGES AGAINST AN INDIVIDUAL PHYSICIAN SHALL NOT EXCEED 200% OF THE COMPENSATORY DAMAGES AWARDED. PUNITIVE DAMAGES, WHEN AWARDED, SHALL NOT BE LESS THAN $ 100,000 UNLESS A LOWER VERDICT AMOUNT IS RETURNED BY THE TRIER OF FACT.

(e) ALLOCATION.--UPON THE ENTRY OF A VERDICT INCLUDING AN AWARD OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES, THE PUNITIVE DAMAGES PORTION OF THE AWARD SHALL BE ALLOCATED AS FOLLOWS:

(1) 75% shall be paid to the prevailing party; and

REV_00261634

(2) 25% shall be paid to the Medical Care Availability and Reduction of Error Fund.

Source: Legal > Legislation & Politics > State Codes, Constitutions, Court Rules & ALS, All ⓘ
TOC: Pennsylvania Statutes > /. . . / > CHAPTER 5. MEDICAL PROFESSIONAL LIABILITY > § 1303.505. Punitive damages
Terms: "punitive damages" /15 ("conscious" or intentional) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, October 11, 2002 - 12:33 AM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

Source: Legal > Legislation & Politics > State Codes, Constitutions, Court Rules & ALS, All ⓘ
TOC: South Dakota Codified Laws - South Dakota > /. . . / > CHAPTER 21-3. DAMAGES FOR TORTS > § 21-3-2. Punitive damages in discretion of jury
Terms: "punitive damages" /15 ("conscious" or intentional) (Edit Search)

↶Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

S.D. Codified Laws § 21-3-2

SOUTH DAKOTA CODIFIED LAWS
Copyright © 1968-2002 by The State of South Dakota
All rights reserved.

 STATUTES CURRENT THROUGH 2003 ADVANCE CODE SERVICE PAMPHLET NUMBER 1. ***
 ANNOTATIONS CURRENT THROUGH 2002 SD 62 ***

TITLE 21. JUDICIAL REMEDIES
CHAPTER 21-3. DAMAGES FOR TORTS

◆ GO TO CODE ARCHIVE DIRECTORY FOR THIS JURISDICTION

S.D. Codified Laws § 21-3-2 (2002)

§ 21-3-2. Punitive damages in discretion of jury

In any action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed, or in any case of wrongful injury to animals, being subjects of property, committed intentionally or by willful and wanton misconduct, in disregard of humanity, the jury, in addition to the actual damage, may give damages for the sake of example, and by way of punishing the defendant.

HISTORY: Source: CivC 1877, §§ 1946, 1974; CL 1887, §§ 4580, 4607; RCivC 1903, §§ 2292, 2319; RC 1919, §§ 1965, 1991; SDC 1939 & Supp 1960, § 37.1902.
See Cal Civ Code, § 3294.

NOTES:
CROSS-REFERENCES.
Interference with lawful hunting or fishing, punitive damages authorized, § 41-1-10.
Minors, restriction on liability for punitive damages, § 26-1-4.
Persons of unsound mind, restriction on liability for punitive damages, § 20-11A-5.

ABUSE OF PROCESS.
Creditor who knowingly levied against exempt property of judgment debtor could be held liable for punitive damages resulting from conversion as well as interest; fact that damages were awarded by court on directed verdict rather than by jury was inconsequential and court could properly include a fixed amount as interest where length of time was certain. Roberts v. Shaffer (1916) 36 SD 551, 156 NW 67.
Surety on attachment bond is not liable in damages for wrongful attachment except upon showing that attachment was malicious and without probable cause. Slaughter v. Nolan (1918) 41 SD 134, 169 NW 232.
Upon showing of malice attending wrongful attachment, plaintiff may recover in separate action for damages in addition to action on attachment bond. Kirby v. First Nat. Bank of

REV_00261636

Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-52

CODE OF VIRGINIA
Copyright (c) 2002 by Matthew Bender & Company, Inc.
a member of the LexisNexis Group.
All rights reserved.

 THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH ALL 2002 LEGISLATION ***
 ANNOTATIONS CURRENT THROUGH JULY 19, 2002 ***

TITLE 8.01. CIVIL REMEDIES AND PROCEDURE
CHAPTER 3. ACTIONS
ARTICLE 5. DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT

✦ GO TO CODE ARCHIVE DIRECTORY FOR THIS JURISDICTION

Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-52 (2002)

§ 8.01-52. Amount of damages

The jury or the court, as the case may be, in any such action under § 8.01-50 may award such damages as to it may seem fair and just. The verdict or judgment of the court trying the case without a jury shall include, but may not be limited to, damages for the following:

1. Sorrow, mental anguish, and solace which may include society, companionship, comfort, guidance, kindly offices and advice of the decedent;

2. Compensation for reasonably expected loss of (i) income of the decedent and (ii) services, protection, care and assistance provided by the decedent;

3. Expenses for the care, treatment and hospitalization of the decedent incident.to the injury resulting in death;

4. Reasonable funeral expenses; and

5. Punitive damages may be recovered for willful or wanton conduct, or such recklessness as evinces a conscious disregard for the safety of others.

Damages recoverable under 3, 4 and 5 above shall be specifically stated by the jury or the court, as the case may be. Damages recoverable under 3 and 4 above shall be apportioned among the creditors who rendered such services, as their respective interests may appear. Competent expert testimony shall be admissible in proving damages recoverable under 2 above.

The court shall apportion the costs of the action as it shall deem proper.

HISTORY: Code 1950, § 8-636.1; 1974, c. 444; 1977, cc. 460, 617; 1982, c. 441.

Source: Legal > States Legal - U.S. > Wisconsin > Statutes & Legislative Materials > WI - Wisconsin Statutes ⓘ
TOC: Wisconsin Statutes > /. . . / > CHAPTER 895. MISCELLANEOUS GENERAL PROVISIONS
> 895.85. Punitive damages.
Terms: "punitive damages" (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

Wis. Stat. § 895.85

WISCONSIN STATUTES

 THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THRU THE 2000-2001 LEGISLATION ***

PROVISIONS COMMON TO ACTIONS AND PROCEEDINGS IN ALL COURTS
CHAPTER 895. MISCELLANEOUS GENERAL PROVISIONS

✦ GO TO THE CODE ARCHIVE DIRECTORY FOR THIS JURISDICTION

Wis. Stat. § 895.85 (2001)

895.85. Punitive damages.

(1) DEFINITIONS. In this section:

(a) "Defendant" means the party against whom punitive damages are sought.

(b) "Double damages" means those court awards made under a statute providing for twice, 2 times or double the amount of damages suffered by the injured party.

(c) "Plaintiff" means the party seeking to recover punitive damages.

(d) "Treble damages" means those court awards made under a statute providing for 3 times or treble the amount of damages suffered by the injured party.

(2) SCOPE. This section does not apply to awards of double damages or treble damages, or to the award of exemplary damages under ss. 46.90 (6) (c), 51.30 (9), 51.61 (7), 103.96 (2), 134.93 (5), 146.84 (1) (b) and (bm), 153.85, 252.14 (4), 252.15 (8) (a), 610.70 (7) (b), 943.245 (2) and (3) and 943.51 (2) and (3)

(3) STANDARD OF CONDUCT. The plaintiff may receive punitive damages if evidence is submitted showing that the defendant acted maliciously toward the plaintiff or in an intentional disregard of the rights of the plaintiff.

(4) PROCEDURE. If the plaintiff establishes a prima facie case for the allowance of punitive damages:

(a) The plaintiff may introduce evidence of the wealth of a defendant; and

(b) The judge shall submit to the jury a special verdict as to punitive damages or, if the case is tried to the court, the judge shall issue a special verdict as to punitive damages.

(5) APPLICATION OF JOINT AND SEVERAL LIABILITY. The rule of joint and several liability does not apply to punitive damages.

HISTORY: History: 1995 a. 17; 1997 a. 71; 1999 a. 79.

REV_00261638

CASE NOTES:

NOTE: The first 3 cases noted below were decided prior to the adoption of s. 895.85.

Punitive damages may be awarded in products liability cases. Judicial controls over punitive damage awards are established. Wangen v. Ford Motor Co. 97 Wis. 2d 260, 294 N.W.2d 437 (1980).

Guidelines for submission of punitive damages issues to the jury in a products liability case are discussed. Walter v. Cessna Aircraft Co. 121 Wis. 2d 221, 358 N.W.2d 816 (Ct. App. 1984).

Regardless of the classification of the underlying cause of action, punitive damages are recoverable if the defendants conduct was "outrageous." Insurance coverage for punitive damages is not contrary to public policy. Brown v. Maxey, 124 Wis. 2d 426, 369 N.W.2d 677 (1985).

In awarding punitive damages, the factors to be considered are: 1) the grievousness of the wrongdoers acts; 2) the degree of malicious intent; 3) the potential damage that might have been caused by the acts; and 4) the defendants ability to pay. An award is excessive if it inflicts a punishment or burden that is disproportionate to the wrongdoing. That a judge provided a means for the defendant to avoid paying the punitive damages awarded did not render the award invalid. Gianoli v. Pfleiderer, 209 Wis. 2d 509, 563 N.W.2d 562 (Ct. App. 1997).

Nominal damages may support a punitive damage award in an action for intentional trespass. A grossly excessive punishment violates due process. Whether punitive damages violate due process depends on: 1) the reprehensibility of the conduct; 2) the disparity between the harm suffered and the punitive damages awarded; and 3) the difference between the award and other civil or criminal penalties authorized or imposed. Jacque v. Steenberg Homes, 209 Wis. 2d 605, 563 N.W.2d 154 (1997).

A circuit court entering default judgment on a punitive damages claim must make inquiry beyond the complaint to determine the merits of the claim and the amount to be awarded. Apex Electronics Corp. v. Gee, 217 Wis. 2d 378, 571 N.W.2d 23 (1998).

The Future of Punitive Damages. SPECIAL ISSUE: 1998 WLR No. 1.

The availability of punitive damages depends on the character of the particular conduct committed rather than on the theory of liability propounded by the plaintiff. The recovery of punitive damages requires that something must be shown over and above the mere breach of duty for which compensatory damages can be given. Unified Catholic Schools of Beaver Dam Education Association v. Universal Card Services Corp. 34 F. Supp. 2d 714, (1999).

Source: Legal > States Legal - U.S. > Wisconsin > Statutes & Legislative Materials > WI - Wisconsin Statutes ⓘ
TOC: Wisconsin Statutes > /. . . / > CHAPTER 895. MISCELLANEOUS GENERAL PROVISIONS > 895.85. Punitive damages.
Terms: "punitive damages" (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, October 11, 2002 - 3:05 AM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

REV_00261639

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

HR 1 LIABILITY LIMITS

`SEC. 2363. DEFINITIONS.

`For purposes of this subpart:

`(1) ECONOMIC LOSS- The term `economic loss' means any pecuniary loss resulting from harm (including the loss of earnings or other benefits related to employment, medical expense loss, replacement services loss, loss due to death, burial costs, and loss of business or employment opportunities) to the extent recovery for such loss is allowed under applicable State law.

`(2) HARM- The term `harm' includes physical, nonphysical, economic, and noneconomic losses.

`(3) NONECONOMIC LOSS- The term `noneconomic loss' means loss for physical or emotional pain, suffering, inconvenience, physical impairment, mental anguish, disfigurement, loss of enjoyment of life, loss of society or companionship, loss of consortium (other than loss of domestic service), hedonic damages, injury to reputation, or any other nonpecuniary loss of any kind or nature.

`(4) SCHOOL- The term `school' means a public or private kindergarten, a public or private elementary school or secondary school, or a home school.

`(5) STATE- The term `State' means each of the several States of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the United States Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, any other territory or possession of the United States, or any political subdivision of any such State, territory, or possession.

`(6) TEACHER- The term `teacher' means--

`(A) a teacher, instructor, principal, or administrator;

`(B) another educational professional who works in a school;

`(C) a professional or nonprofessional employee who--

`(i) works in a school; and

`(ii)(I) in the employee's job, maintains discipline or ensures safety; or `(II) in an emergency, is called on to maintain discipline or ensure safety; or `(D) an individual member of a school board (as distinct from the board).

`SEC. 2364. APPLICABILITY.

`This subpart shall only apply to States that receive funds under this Act, and shall apply to such a State as a condition of receiving such funds.

`SEC. 2365. PREEMPTION AND ELECTION OF STATE NONAPPLICABILITY.

`(a) PREEMPTION- This subpart preempts the laws of any State to the extent that such laws are inconsistent with this subpart, except that this subpart shall not preempt any State law that provides additional protection from liability relating to teachers.

`(b) ELECTION OF STATE REGARDING NONAPPLICABILITY- This subpart shall not apply to any civil action in a State court against a teacher with respect to claims arising within that State if such State enacts a statute in accordance with State requirements for enacting legislation--

`(1) citing the authority of this subsection;

`(2) declaring the election of such State that this subpart shall not apply, as of a date certain, to such civil action in the State; and

`(3) containing no other provisions.

`SEC. 2366. LIMITATION ON LIABILITY FOR TEACHERS.

`(a) LIABILITY PROTECTION FOR TEACHERS- Except as provided in subsection (b), no teacher in a school shall be liable for harm caused by an act or omission of the teacher on behalf of the school if--

`(1) the teacher was acting within the scope of the teacher's employment or responsibilities to a school or governmental entity;

`(2) the actions of the teacher were carried out in conformity with Federal, State, and local laws (including rules and regulations) in furtherance of efforts to control, discipline, expel, or suspend a student or maintain order or control in the classroom or school;

`(3) if appropriate or required, the teacher was properly licensed, certified, or authorized by the appropriate authorities for the activities or practice involved in the State in which the harm occurred, where the activities were or practice was undertaken within the scope of the teacher's responsibilities;

`(4) the harm was not caused by willful or criminal misconduct, gross negligence, reckless misconduct, or a conscious, flagrant indifference to the rights or safety of the individual harmed by the teacher; and

`(5) the harm was not caused by the teacher operating a motor vehicle, vessel, aircraft, or other vehicle for which the State requires the operator or the owner of the vehicle, craft, or vessel to--

`(A) possess an operator's license; or

`(B) maintain insurance.

`(b) EXCEPTIONS TO TEACHER LIABILITY PROTECTION- If the laws of a State limit teacher liability subject to one or more of the following conditions, such conditions shall not be construed as inconsistent with this section:

`(1) A State law that requires a school or governmental entity to adhere to risk management procedures, including mandatory training of teachers.

`(2) A State law that makes the school or governmental entity liable for the acts or omissions of its teachers to the same extent as an employer is liable for the acts or omissions of its employees.

ate law that makes a limitation of liability inapplicable if the civil action was brought by an officer of a State or local government pursuant to State or local law.

`(c) LIMITATION ON PUNITIVE DAMAGES BASED ON THE ACTIONS OF TEACHERS-

`(1) GENERAL RULE- Punitive damages may not be awarded against a teacher in an action brought for harm based on the act or omission of a teacher acting within the scope of the teacher's employment or responsibilities to a school or governmental entity unless the claimant establishes by clear and convincing evidence that the harm was proximately caused by an act or omission of such teacher that constitutes willful or criminal misconduct, or a conscious, flagrant indifference to the rights or safety of the individual harmed.

`(2) CONSTRUCTION- Paragraph (1) does not create a cause of action for punitive damages and does not preempt or supersede any Federal or State law to the extent that such law would further limit the award of punitive damages.

`(d) EXCEPTIONS TO LIMITATIONS ON LIABILITY-

`(1) IN GENERAL- The limitations on the liability of a teacher under this subpart shall not apply to any misconduct that--

`(A) constitutes a crime of violence (as that term is defined in section 16 of title 18, United States Code) or act of international terrorism (as that term is defined in section 2331 of title 18, United States Code) for which the defendant has been convicted in any court;

`(B) involves a sexual offense, as defined by applicable State law, for which the defendant has been convicted in any court;

`(C) involves misconduct for which the defendant has been found to have violated a Federal or State civil rights law; or

`(D) where the defendant was under the influence (as determined pursuant to applicable State law) of intoxicating alcohol or any drug at the time of the misconduct.

`(2) HIRING- The limitations on the liability of a teacher under this subpart shall not apply to misconduct during background investigations, or during other actions, involved in the hiring of a teacher.

`(e) RULES OF CONSTRUCTION-

`(1) CONCERNING RESPONSIBILITY OF TEACHERS TO SCHOOLS AND GOVERNMENTAL ENTITIES- Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect any civil action brought by any school or any governmental entity against any teacher of such school.

`(2) CONCERNING CORPORAL PUNISHMENT- Nothing in this subpart shall be construed to affect any State or local law (including a rule or regulation) or policy pertaining to the use of corporal punishment.

`SEC. 2367. ALLOCATION OF RESPONSIBILITY FOR NONECONOMIC LOSS.

`(a) GENERAL RULE- In any civil action against a teacher, based on an act or omission of a teacher acting within the scope of the teacher's employment or responsibilities to a school or governmental entity, the liability of the teacher for noneconomic loss shall be determined in accordance with subsection (b).

`(b) AMOUNT OF LIABILITY-

`(1) IN GENERAL-

`(A) LIABILITY- Each defendant who is a teacher shall be liable only for the amount of noneconomic loss allocated to that defendant in direct proportion to the percentage of responsibility of that defendant (determined in accordance with paragraph (2)) for the harm to the claimant with respect to which that defendant is liable.

`(B) SEPARATE JUDGMENT- The court shall render a separate judgment against each defendant in an amount determined pursuant to subparagraph (A).

`(2) PERCENTAGE OF RESPONSIBILITY- For purposes of determining the amount of noneconomic loss allocated to a defendant who is a teacher under this section, the trier of fact shall determine the percentage of responsibility of each person responsible for the claimant's harm, whether or not such person is a party to the action.

`(c) RULE OF CONSTRUCTION- Nothing in this section shall be construed to preempt or supersede any Federal or State law that further limits the application of joint liability in a civil action described in subsection (a), beyond the limitations established in this section.

`SEC. 2368. EFFECTIVE DATE.

`(a) IN GENERAL- This subpart shall take effect 90 days after the date of enactment of the No Child Left Behind Act of 2001.

`(b) APPLICATION- This subpart applies to any claim for harm caused by an act or omission of a teacher if that claim is filed on or after the effective date of the No Child Left Behind Act of 2001 without regard to whether the harm that is the subject of the claim or the conduct that caused the harm occurred before such effective date.

February 25, 2002

State Punitive Damages Provisions

- Twenty-nine states and the District of Columbia have no limits on punitive damage awards (except by constitutional standards):

  AZ, AR, CA, DE, DC, HI, ID, IL, IA, KY, ME, MD, MN, MS, MO, MT, NM, NY, OH, OR, PA, RI, SC, SD, TN, UT, VT, WV, WI and WY.

- Six states have abolished punitive damages completely:

  LA, MA, MI, NE, NH and WA.

- Fifteen states have limited punitive damage awards:

  AL: In nonphysical injury cases against large businesses, punitive damages are limited to the greater of three times compensatory damages or $500,000; in nonphysical injury cases against small businesses with a net worth of less than $2 million, limited to $50,000 or 10% of net worth up to $200,000; in personal injury cases, limited to the greater of three times compensatory damages or $1.5 million. Limits to be adjusted Jan. 1, 2003, and at three year intervals thereafter in accordance with the Consumer Price Index.

  AK: Punitive damages are limited to the greater of three times compensatory damages or $500,000. In cases involving actual malice, punitive damages are limited to the greater of four times compensatory damages or four times aggregate amount of financial gain that the defendant received as a result of its conduct or $7 million.

  CO: Punitive damages may not exceed compensatory damages.

  CT: Punitive damages in product liability actions are limited to two times compensatory damages.

  FL: Punitive damages are limited to the greater of three times compensatory damages or $500,000; if the trier of fact finds the defendant's conduct was "motivated solely by unreasonable financial gain" punitive damages may be awarded up to the greater of four times compensatory damages or $2 million; no cap applies if the defendant had a "specific intent to harm the claimant." Punitive damages may not be awarded more than once for a single act or course of conduct unless the court finds by clear and convincing evidence that the prior award was insufficient to punish the defendant.

  GA: Punitive damages are limited to $250,000 unless the plaintiff demonstrated that the defendant acted with a specific intent to harm.

IN: Punitive damages are limited to the greater of three times compensatory damages or $50,000.

KS: Punitive damages are limited to the lesser of $5 million or the defendant's annual gross income. If the court finds that the profitability of the conduct exceeds the amount of the general limitation, the court may award an amount equal to 1½ times the amount of the profit which the defendant gained or is expected to gain as a result of the conduct.

NV: Punitive damages are limited to three times compensatory damages if the amount of compensatory damages is $100,000 or more; and $300,000 if the amount of compensatory damages is less than $100,000. Limits do not apply to an insurer who acts in bad faith regarding its obligations to provide insurance coverage or in product liability actions.

NJ: Punitive damages are limited to greater of five times compensatory damages or $350,000.

NC: Punitive damages are limited to the greater of three times compensatory damages or $250,000.

ND: Punitive damages are limited to the greater of two times compensatory damages or $250,000.

OK: Punitive damages may not exceed the greater of $100,000 or compensatory damages. Where the jury finds by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant acted with malice or an insurer intentionally acted in bad faith, punitive damages may not exceed the greater of $500,000 or two times compensatory damages or the amount of the increased financial gain to the defendant.

TX: Punitive damages limited to the greater of two times economic damages plus amount equal to non-economic damages up to $750,000, or $200,000.

VA: Punitive damages may not exceed $350,000.

REV_00261660

January 25, 2002

State Joint and Several Liability Provisions

- Fourteen states and the District of Columbia allow unlimited joint and several liability:

  AL, AR, DE, DC, HI, IL, ME, MD, NC, PA, RI, SC, VT and VA.

- Eleven states have abolished joint and several liability completely:

  AK, AZ, CO, IN, KS, KY, LA, ND, OR, TN and WY.

- Twenty-five states have limited joint and several liability:

  CA: Joint liability has been abolished for noneconomic damages only.

  CT: Defendants are generally only liable in proportion to their share of responsibility. If a defendant is insolvent or its share is otherwise uncollectible, the remaining defendants may be required to pay that defendant's share of the damages according to their percentages of negligence.

  FL: If plaintiff is at fault, joint liability is abolished for: (a) any defendant found 10% or less at fault; (b) economic damages in excess of $200,000 for any defendant found to be more than 10% but less than 25% at fault; (c) economic damages in excess of $500,000 for any defendant found at least 25% but no more than 50% at fault; (d) economic damages in excess of $1 million for any defendant found more than 50% at fault. If plaintiff is not at fault, joint liability abolished for: (a) any defendant found to be less than 10% at fault; (b) economic damages for any defendant found at least 10% but less than 25% at fault; (c) economic damages in excess of $500,000 for any defendant found at least 25% but not more than 50% at fault; (d) economic damages in excess of $1 million for any defendant found at least 25% but not more than 50% at fault; and (e) economic damages in excess of $2 million for any defendant found more than 50% at fault. Joint liability does not apply to any defendant who is found to be less at fault than the plaintiff.

  GA: Joint liability applies, but can be disregarded in certain cases where the plaintiff is partially at fault.

  ID: Joint liability has been abolished, except in cases arising out of a violation of any state or federal law or regulation related to hazardous or toxic waste or substances or solid waste disposal sites, or any cause of action arising from the manufacture of any medical devices or pharmaceutical products.

  IA: Joint liability has been abolished for non-economic damages. Joint liability has been abolished for economic damages for defendants less than 50% at fault.

MA: Each defendant is liable to the extent of that defendant's proportionate share of the entire common liability, without regard to his relative degree of fault. Thus, in a two-defendant case, a defendant found 1% negligent can be compelled to pay 50% of the judgment.

MI: Joint liability has been abolished, except in medical malpractice cases or criminal conduct involving gross negligence or the use of drugs or alcohol.

MN: A defendant whose fault is 15% or less is only liable up to four times that defendant's percentage of fault.

MS: Joint liability has been abolished to the extent needed for the plaintiff to recover 50% of damages.

MO: If the plaintiff was at fault, joint liability is limited to two times the defendant's percentage of fault.

MT: Joint liability has been abolished except for defendants found to be more than 50% at fault, except that joint liability shall apply in actions arising from an act or omission that violates a state environmental law relating to hazardous or deleterious substances.

NE: Joint liability has been abolished for non-economic damages.

NV: Joint liability has been abolished for defendants less at fault than the plaintiff, except in products liability actions, strict liability actions, or actions involving the emission, disposal or spillage of a toxic or hazardous substance.

NH: Joint liability has been abolished for defendants less than 50% at fault.

NJ: Joint liability has been abolished for defendants less than 60% at fault.

NM: Joint liability has been abolished, except in strict liability cases, cases involving vicarious liability, or "situations not covered by any of the foregoing and having a sound basis in public policy."

NY: Joint liability has been abolished for non-economic damages for defendants less than 50% at fault, except when the defendant is found liable for: (1) use, operation, or ownership of a motor vehicle; (2) having acted with reckless disregard for the safety of others; (3) certain provisions of labor law; (4) unlawfully releasing hazardous substances; and (5) product liability actions where the manufacturer of the product is not a party to the action, jurisdiction over the manufacturer could not be obtained, and liability would have been imposed on the manufacturer through strict liability.

REV_00261662

OH: Joint liability has been abolished for non-economic damages, but only if the plaintiff was contributorily negligent or impliedly assumed the risk that caused the harm.

OK: Joint liability is abolished if the plaintiff was at fault.

SD: Joint liability is limited to two times the percentage of fault of any defendant found to be less than 50% at fault.

TX: Joint liability has been abolished except for defendants found to be more than 50% at fault. In cases involving toxic torts, a defendant is jointly liable if that defendant's fault is 15% or greater.

WA: Joint liability has been abolished if the plaintiff is found to be at fault.

WV: In medical malpractice actions, joint liability has been abolished for defendants found to be less than 25% at fault.

WI: Joint liability has been abolished for defendants found to be less than 51% at fault.

REV_00261663

U.S. Department of Justice

Office of Legislative Affairs

Office of the Assistant Attorney General Washington, D.C. 20530

March 8, 2000

Honorable Henry J. Hyde
Chairman
Committee on the Judiciary
U.S. House of Representatives
Washington, D.C. 20515

Dear Mr. Chairman:

This letter presents the views of the Administration, updating the preliminary views of the Department of Justice presented to you on October 26, 1999, regarding H. R. 1283, the "Fairness in Asbestos Compensation Act of 1999." H.R. 1283 has changed considerably since our last letter, which raised a number of issues and questions that we have spent the last several months analyzing. In recent weeks, we have received several amendments, including the latest amendment, in the nature of a substitute, on March 3.[1] We understand that the Committee has spent substantial time crafting the legislation, and we have met with your staff and others working on behalf of the proposed legislation. As we have informed your staff, we remain interested in continuing our dialogue about these very important and difficult issues.

Like the Committee, the Department of Justice wants to see asbestos claims processed fairly, efficiently, and quickly. We share the same concerns and sympathies for the victims of asbestos exposure. As the Committee knows, the diseases that result from exposure to asbestos can cause great suffering, and often lead to quick and painful deaths. Like the Committee, we have considered at great length the question of how to ensure prompt and appropriate compensation for individuals harmed by exposure to asbestos. The question for both the Department and the Committee, we believe, is whether the proposed solution improves upon the status quo by ensuring faster and more equitable compensation to asbestos victims. We could not support any proposal that fails to improve the present system or hinders the progress made in compensating asbestos victims.

We oppose H.R. 1283 for a number of reasons, including:

---

[1] While the latest amendment has not yet been introduced, we understand that the Committee intends to make it a substitute for the currently pending bill. Therefore, in this letter, "H.R. 1283" refers to this amendment, entitled "Asbestos Compensation Act of 2000."

REV_00261665

seek further review through an appeal to the Court of Federal Claims, and ultimately to a U.S. Court of Appeals. Section 106.

Third, for a claimant determined to be medically eligible, if the claimant decided to use the administrative system, he/she would have to name all defendants and submit a verified, particularized statement providing, with respect to each defendant, the basis for the allegation. The amount of time permitted for such a filing is not yet determined. Section 103(a)(2). Fourth, upon finding that the claimant's statement met the requirements of the bill, the Administrator would have to provide notice to each named defendant. The Administrator is not given a deadline for doing so. Section 103(a)(3).

Fifth, each named defendant in turn would have the right to assert third party claims, and likely would be entitled to discovery for the purpose of obtaining information necessary to identify all such additional defendants. This discovery, to be determined by an Administrative Law Judge, would not be subject to statutory or regulatory deadlines and could itself take months, particularly given the history of disputes regarding the allocation of responsibility among asbestos defendants. Section 103(a)(4).

As we read H.R. 1283, it is only after these five events occur that the claimant would be entitled to receive a good faith settlement offer from the named defendants. It is entirely likely that a claimant under the new administrative system would face a substantial wait before receiving even an initial settlement offer, let alone full compensation. That is not a material improvement over the current system. Indeed, for many claimants, the wait to work their way through the system would follow the wait for the system to be erected, resulting in years of delay in compensation to the sick.

Moreover, even if a claimant is able to resolve his or her claim, H.R. 1283 would create the likelihood of bitter litigation over one of the most contentious issues in asbestos suits: apportionment of liability among the defendant companies. In many cases, it is this dispute which occupies the most time and resources. Rather than attempt to reduce this litigation, the legislation would insert the U.S. government further into the maelstrom, by obliging the Trustee to litigate against defendants in an effort to recover the funds awarded to the claimant. Section 104. The Trustee would be prohibited from even acknowledging in court the fact or the amount of the settlement for which it is seeking reimbursement. Section 209. Meanwhile, the defendants would remain as capable and likely as they are today to attempt to elude paying their appropriate share of liability. Given the litigation history over apportionment of liability, we believe years of litigation would be likely, involving the U.S. government in matters that previously have remained a private dispute, and - to the extent the defendants were successful individually in defeating U.S. attempts to recover the full settlement amount - leaving the taxpayer to pay the difference and reducing the funds available to victims in future settlements.

Finally, one aspect of H.R. 1283 raises constitutional concerns. H.R. 1283's provision for the appointment of the OAC's Medical Director by the Administrator of the OAC, Section 101(c), appears to run afoul of the Appointments Clause. The Director is an inferior officer whose appointment must be vested "in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments." Because the Attorney General may remove the Administrator of the OAC for cause (see Section 101(a)), we do not believe the Administrator to be the head of a department for purposes of the Appointments Clause.[7]

REV_00261674

To be clear, the concerns we express about H.R. 1283 do not stem from a "can't-do" attitude, or from any objection that the Department of Justice, as opposed to another federal agency, is tasked with developing this proposed administrative process. If this bill were enacted, the Department of Justice would embrace this challenge with dedication to our statutory responsibilities and to the need to speed compensation to deserving claimants. Our concerns arise, regrettably, from our experience with similar administrative systems and our decades-long experience with asbestos litigation.

* * * *

As we noted at the outset, we remain interested in a dialogue with the Committee on how to improve the present state of asbestos compensation, which is far from perfect. However, to the extent that any legislation would improve the process, one might do better by building upon developments in the current system than by erecting new structures of the type proposed by H.R. 1283. As we have informed your staff, we remain willing to work with the Committee on this issue and to evaluate any other proposal for improving the present state of asbestos compensation.

Thank you once again for this opportunity to present our views. The Office of Management and Budget has advised us that from the standpoint of the Administration, there is no objection to submission of this letter. Please do not hesitate to call upon us if we may be of further assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert Raben
Assistant Attorney General

cc: Honorable John Conyers, Jr.
Ranking Minority Member

---

[7] In addition to this concern, and the constitutional concern we raised in our letter of October 26, 1999, H.R. 1283 contains no congressional findings regarding the problems caused by the current approach to asbestos litigation, including its impact on victims, on the judicial system, and, most importantly, on interstate commerce. This may make it less likely that H.R. 1283 would withstand constitutional challenge under the Commerce Clause.

11

Back to Civil Justice Home Page

Back to Asbestos Legislation Page

Back to Congress Watch Home Page

REV_00261675

- The process of compensating asbestos victims has improved since the 1980s, when the last comprehensive study on asbestos litigation was completed. While the current system is not ideal, we believe a new administrative process would undermine progress that has been made.
- H.R. 1283 would deprive asbestos victims of fair compensation, including victims who are demonstrably sick as a result of exposure to asbestos;
- H.R. 1283 would transfer costs now borne by defendant companies - who have been found legally responsible for the harm caused - to asbestos victims and the taxpayers; and
- H.R. 1283 would delay and worsen, rather than accelerate and improve, compensation to the sick.

I. The Asbestos Litigation and Compensation Process Has Improved

Like the Committee, we have been concerned by reports that the asbestos litigation and compensation process is an "elephantine" morass in need of reform.[2] In evaluating the state of asbestos litigation, the Supreme Court relied on a study using data from the mid-1980s. For the past several months, we have attempted to analyze the situation in asbestos litigation today. To some extent, our efforts have been hampered by the paucity of data and the absence of any more recent comprehensive study of asbestos caseloads, settlements and the like. Nevertheless, we are persuaded that the process for compensating victims of asbestos exposure has improved since the mid-1980s.

First, in recent years the parties to the asbestos controversy have settled hundreds of thousands of claims, a marked improvement over the more adversarial culture that permeated much of asbestos litigation at the time of the last major study. Working together, the plaintiff and defense bars have created a number of these private settlement mechanisms and national settlement programs, all of which have hastened the payment of claims to sick individuals, reduced the burden on the courts, and brought greater financial certainty to a number of defendants. For example, as the Committee was informed in its July 1999 hearing, Owens Corning alone has settled over 200,000 claims through the National Settlement Program it initiated in 1998. Another example is the Louisiana settlement agreement entered into by plaintiffs and defendants in 1998, which is creating numerous additional settlements.

Second, as to the claims that do remain on the court dockets, the courts have made considerable progress in managing these caseloads. In particular, state and federal courts around the country have instituted several case management controls that harness the volume of asbestos claims and permit the claims of the sickest victims to be expedited. These tools include multi-district consolidation in the Federal courts, the consolidation of similar claims for discovery and

---

[2] See Ortiz v. Fibreboard, 119 S. Ct. 2295, 2302 (1999).

REV_00261666

trial, and procedures for those with less serious diseases to file claims in court without actively prosecuting them (i.e., pleural registries). This latter technique has resulted in a de facto stay for many claims of the less impaired. Thus, in courts utilizing pleural registries, even though the cases of the less impaired constitute a large part of the pending case backlog, they consume comparatively few judicial resources. In addition, several states have created distinct causes of action for different asbestos-related injuries, eliminating the incentive for victims to rush to court at the first physical sign of injury and permitting those who initially recover small amounts for minimal injury to return to court if their condition subsequently deteriorates.

Third, asbestos has become a "mature" tort, with many of the basic liability questions resolved. Over the past decade, the litigants have clarified some of the medical issues, made progress on product identification, causation, and apportionment of liability issues, and the defendant companies have resolved a number of disputes with their insurers. This has resulted in fewer disputes, less discovery, less repetition in depositions and trials, and, as a consequence, a higher percentage of available dollars going to the victims.

This is not to say, however, that the present state of asbestos litigation is ideal. There are still a large number of cases pending in the courts, and not every court system has instituted the case management and prioritization techniques used successfully by other courts. As a consequence, some cases migrate to forums that are historically more favorable to plaintiffs, resulting in inconsistent verdicts and settlements, and some deserving victims are still compensated too slowly.

For the Administration, a key question is whether the imperfections in the current system justify the substitution of untested administrative procedures and standards for the traditional court system. Given our concerns that the system would not work as hoped and would benefit culpable defendants at the expense of the victims and taxpayers, we think the case for this untested system has not been made.

II. H.R. 1283 Would Exclude Many Asbestos Victims From Fair Compensation

H.R. 1283 would create medical criteria according to which asbestos victims would be determined to be medically eligible or ineligible for compensation. At the outset, we note that legislating medical criteria to limit recipients of asbestos-related compensation sets standards that overstate the precision of existing diagnostic testing; and it precludes the incorporation of advances in medical knowledge by prescribing standards that may soon be outdated. Further, the proposed legislation does not foster fairness for people with diseases resulting from asbestos exposure.

First, the medical criteria in H.R. 1283 would result in sick people being denied compensation for their injuries. Even if we were to accept the proponents' avowed purpose of eliminating the claims of the non-sick while preserving the claims of the sick, the medical criteria in H.R. 1283 would not accomplish that goal. Experts from the Department of Health and Human Services, as well as many in the medical community, have indicated that the proposed medical criteria are too restrictive and would result in the denial of compensation to many injured and impaired patients.

REV_00261667

For example, the proposed medical criteria for asbestosis would require a claimant with evidence of obstructive disease on lung function testing to demonstrate high levels of fibrosis on chest x-rays as well. Yet, as our colleagues at HHS have informed us, asbestos exposure may cause a mixed obstructive and restrictive pattern and, in some instances, cause predominantly obstructive disease. In addition, the use of objective norms to measure the lung function of every claimant treats all claimants as if their normal lung function is identical. This, of course, is not the case. Some patients may have pre-exposure lung functions well above average and may lose more than 20% of their lung capacity, yet fail to meet the lung function criteria in the proposed bill. H.R. 1283 would deny compensation to these people who have been demonstrably impaired by their exposure to asbestos. Further, patients with asbestosis may have shortness of breath with exertion and functional impairment demonstrated by reduced arterial oxygenation during exercise, yet not meet the lung function criteria in the bill. In addition, H.R. 1283 understates the degree of injury experienced by individuals with pleural disease who fail to meet the lung function criteria, and does not adequately provide screening for these individuals. As a result of the proposed medical criteria, we are informed that physically impaired asbestos victims would be denied compensation.

Second, the medical criteria of H.R. 1283 would eliminate many existing causes of action and injuries compensable under current state law. In many jurisdictions, for example, plaintiffs are entitled to sue and recover for scarring of the lungs or for an increased risk of lung cancer as a result of exposure to asbestos, regardless of impairment. Under H.R. 1283, those claims would no longer be recognized, prohibiting claimants exposed to asbestos from obtaining compensation. At best, the claimants alleging such injuries could recover reimbursement of medical monitoring costs, as compared to the significant compensation they might receive today. Section 306(a). In a system in which those who are not yet physically impaired are denied the right to bring a claim, it is unlikely that the plaintiffs' bar, which currently finances and facilitates much of the medical monitoring of the less seriously impaired, would have the necessary financial incentive to pursue claims for medical monitoring. As a result, many victims who today receive the peace of mind and prompt medical attention that results from medical monitoring - at little or no cost to the victims - would be denied that benefit.

Third, H.R. 1283 would make it effectively impossible for many victims of asbestos exposure, who also were smokers, to recover compensation from asbestos defendants for the damage done to them by asbestos. H.R. 1283 would prohibit presumptive eligibility for lung cancer victims, where the claimant has a "substantial history of smoking" and does not have a qualifying non-malignant condition. Section 304(b). As many experts have stated, the interaction of smoking and asbestos exposure is synergistic, and smokers exposed to asbestos are at an exponentially greater risk of developing lung cancer than smokers without asbestos exposure. Among those heavily exposed, for example, 80% of all lung cancers would have been eliminated in the absence of asbestos exposure, even had smoking habits not been changed.[3] Thus, contrary to the implication of H.R. 1283, many lung cancers involving both a substantial history of smoking and significant asbestos exposure would not have occurred but for the asbestos exposure. As for the requirement that lung cancer be accompanied by a qualifying non-malignant condition, HHS advises us that many studies have clearly shown that asbestos is a carcinogen and causes cancer independent of causing non-malignant disease, again contrary to the implication of H.R. 1283. In short, H.R. 1283 would prevent many victims of lung cancer from recovering compensation for a primary cause of their cancer - asbestos exposure.

REV_00261668

Fourth, H.R. 1283 would prohibit courts from awarding punitive damages to victims. Section 202. Under H.R. 1283, punitive damages would be available only in administrative adjudications, thus diluting any right to opt out to a traditional court and eliminating the already-rare phenomenon of court-imposed punitive damages. Yet, even in the administrative context, where any possible concerns over jury-applied punitive damages would be eliminated, the legislation would make punitive damages available only where a "conscious, flagrant indifference" to a claimant was "the proximate cause" of the injury. And even if the claimant could satisfy this standard, he or she would be severely limited as to the amount of punitive damages available for past bad acts by culpable companies. Section 208(d). As we have stated with regard to other tort reform legislation, punitive damages serve an important deterrent function.

III. H.R. 1283 Would Impose Unwarranted Costs on Asbestos Victims and Taxpayers

In addition to our concerns with the medical criteria and the exclusion of asbestos victims, we have a number of concerns with the economic impact of the legislation. Specifically, we believe that H.R. 1283 would provide unwarranted benefits to asbestos companies to the detriment of victims of asbestos and the taxpayers.

First, to the extent that it is unable to recover from defendants the recommended aggregate settlement that it has already paid to claimants, the Asbestos Compensation Fund - the entity charged with paying claimants - would be required to reduce future recommended aggregate settlements, taking into account the outstanding deficit. Section 402(a)(4). This provision, in effect, creates an incentive for defendants to avoid paying the government in a timely manner, if at all, on the assumption that a deficient Fund reduces settlement values and therefore defendants' ultimate expense. Ultimately, this would lead to lower settlement values for deserving victims.

Second, although the stated intention of the program is for defendants ultimately to cover all expenses, under H.R. 1283, the Federal Treasury could advance the Office of Asbestos [3] See, e.g., A. Ritzen and L. Rosenstock, The Misuse of Epidemiology and Apportionment in Compensation for Occupational Disease, New Solutions, Winter 1993, at 29-36. R. Saracci, Interaction and Synergism, 12 American Journal of Epidemiology 465-466 (1980).

---

REV_00261669

Compensation (the "OAC") up to $100 million in start-up funds. Section 403(a). Past programs in which the Federal government has advanced funds have been largely unsuccessful in trying to recover from responsible parties. In programs such as the Black Lung Benefits Act and the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act (the CERCLA Superfund), the government spent considerable resources to seek reimbursement from responsible parties, and yet in many instances failed, leaving the taxpayers to subsidize the programs, or reducing future settlements to cover the shortfall. Similarly, we are concerned that the defendant companies may not pay for all of the costs associated with the administration of the OAC.

Third, to the extent that less seriously injured claimants seek medical monitoring expenses, it is likely that the U.S. government would be left holding the bill. Unlike other parts of the legislation, no mechanism is even proposed for the defendants to fund medical monitoring. By contrast, the bill contemplates yearly non-administrative appropriations by the U.S. of up to $150 million, which would not be reimbursable. Section 403. It appears that payment for medical monitoring would be drawn from these appropriations.[4] In the coming years, therefore, the government could be required to pay billions of dollars for injuries caused by the asbestos companies. We see no justification for the taxpayers to assume such a liability from the defendant companies, particularly in light of the fact that courts consistently have found the asbestos companies legally responsible for asbestos-related harm.

As we understand it, one of the justifications offered for this taxpayer subsidy is that the United States should share in paying for the asbestos problem. This argument does not fully account for the substantial sums that the United States already has spent as a result of the asbestos problem. Over the past thirty years, the government has paid billions of dollars in health, medical, research, and abatement costs to address the problems created by the marketing and sale of asbestos products. Similarly, in the coming years U.S. taxpayers can expect to pay additional billions in such costs, without the additional financial burden placed on them by this legislation. To the extent the Committee believes the government should pay even more because the United States shares culpability with the asbestos companies for the sale and distribution of asbestos products, we believe that premise is misguided. Virtually every court has rejected the assertion that the United States is culpable for the harms inflicted by asbestos. Significantly, these rulings were based not on immunity doctrines but on factual findings that the liability of asbestos defendants should not be placed upon the United States. As one court concluded, the effort by the asbestos companies to transfer culpability to the government is a "grossly misplaced" attempt to "impose the woes of asbestos compensation upon the customer [the United States] whom they actively pursued."[5] Another court, after conducting a six-week trial on the [4] An earlier draft of the bill specified appropriations of $200 million annually for certain medical monitoring reimbursements. That provision has been excised from the current draft with no new provision to provide such funding.

---

[5] Glover v. Johns Manville, 525 F. Supp. 984, 986 (E.D. Va. 1979), aff'd in part, vacated in part and remanded, 662 F.2d 225 (4th Cir. 1981).

REV_00261670

issue, rejected the assertion that "the Government sacrificed the health of shipyard workers to the war effort." Instead, the court concluded, based on the facts, that "the Government took reasonable health and safety measures regarding asbestos use in the shipyard environment . . . ."[6]

Taken together, these various provisions, along with the elimination of many claims through the imposition of H.R. 1283's medical criteria, result in a massive transfer of funds – billions of dollars – to the defendant companies, financed by asbestos victims and taxpayers. We see no justification for such a significant subsidy, particularly given the fact that so many courts and juries have found asbestos companies liable to the people who have been exposed to their products.

We understand that some have asserted that cost-shifting is required to ensure the continued viability of defendant companies so that they will continue to have the capacity to compensate sick victims in the future. We agree that preserving the assets of companies in order to compensate sick victims is vital. However, proponents of H.R. 1283 have not demonstrated that the financial health of asbestos defendants, taken as a whole, is so dire as to require a large subsidy of the sort envisioned by H.R. 1283. The Treasury Department has examined publicly available information regarding a number of asbestos defendants. While the industry has seen bankruptcies in the past two decades, public filings (10K and 10Q reports) by many major industry participants do not indicate financial distress; to the contrary, their statements often inform shareholders and others that asbestos-related liabilities will not have a material impact upon the present or future financial performance of the companies. In fact, over the past decade, many of these companies successfully have recovered, or made agreements to recover, billions of dollars in insurance coverage. We do not doubt that some companies may be in distress due to asbestos-related liabilities, but we have not seen the kind of compelling financial data, on an industry-wide basis, to justify shifting the economic responsibility of these injuries from the culpable corporate defendants and their shareholders to the victims and the taxpayers. In addition, the Treasury Department informs us that some companies that have chosen to work cooperatively with plaintiffs to resolve their asbestos-related liabilities could be placed at a competitive disadvantage by H.R. 1283. Public policy should not seek to reward defendants that have chosen not to settle at the expense of those firms that have acknowledged their responsibility.

IV. H.R. 1283's Administrative System Would Delay Compensation to the Sick, Not Make It Better or Faster

While one of the stated goals of H.R. 1283 is to speed compensation to deserving claimants, our analysis of the proposal indicates the opposite. In our view, H.R. 1283 would

---

[6] Johns Manville v. United States, 13 Cl. Ct. 72, 133 (1987), vacated on jurisdictional grounds, 855 F.2d 1571 (Fed. Cir. 1988); see also GAF v. United States, 19 Cl. Ct. 490, 499 (1990) (rejecting GAF's assertion that "the Government knowingly exposed its employees to asbestos hazards"), aff'd, 932 F.2d 947 (Fed. Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 1071 (1992).

REV_00261671

delay compensation to sick victims of asbestos exposure.

A. Start-up Delays

The creation of an administrative structure to handle a large number of claims inherently requires a multitude of steps and decisions before that structure can begin to process the claims of the sick. Of necessity, these steps and decisions delay the processing of claims for those cases that are already pending. Based on our experience administering several compensation programs, we are convinced such delay would result were H.R. 1283 to be adopted.

First, we believe it would take a considerable amount of time to establish and effectively operate the proposed Office of Asbestos Compensation ("OAC"), which would serve both administrative and adjudicatory functions. As we read H.R. 1283, the OAC likely would need to hire and/or contract with hundreds, and perhaps over a thousand employees – including lawyers, physicians, claims reviewers, and administrative personnel – before it could adequately handle the large number of cases that would confront the OAC initially.

In this regard, a comparison to the National Vaccine Injury Compensation Program, established more than a decade ago, is instructive. That program processes cases that, while often medically complex, are nevertheless more streamlined than the average asbestos case in that vaccine cases do not require resolution of difficult and fact-intensive issues such as allocation, apportionment, or the exercise of subrogation rights against the industry. Yet, the vaccine program utilizes approximately 100 staffers in various agencies to handle the approximately 700 cases currently pending before it, and has resolved approximately 5,000 cases in its entire eleven-year history. We are concerned that, given similar staff-to-claim needs and even assuming some economies of scale accompanying the larger volume of asbestos cases, the OAC may need to hire a very large number of people to process the tens of thousands of claims that would be filed upon the commencement of OAC operations.

Second, in addition to hiring and training all of these people, the OAC, no matter how well-intentioned and diligent in purpose, would face further delays in opening due to the complex and controversial rules that would have to be promulgated before any claim could be processed. For example, as we read H.R. 1283, before processing a claim, the OAC must develop, based on difficult-to-obtain historical data, a "compensation grid" on which offers to the asbestos claimants would be based. Section 103(b)(2). The legislation appears to recognize the difficulty of this exercise by providing the OAC with subpoena power to collect information about prior settlements. Section 107(c). It is almost certain that litigants would challenge the process of developing this grid. This is precisely what occurred in the vaccine program, which has developed and modified its own compensation grid. Litigation and disputes over the development of the compensation grid would further delay compensation to the sick.

Third, the processing of asbestos claims would be further delayed by satellite litigation on at least two significant issues. First, even once developed, the "compensation grid" would lead to more litigation when affected parties were not satisfied by the outcome. Second, the medical criteria, and the controversy surrounding them, would lead to new litigation and multiple appeals. For example, the parties to the asbestos claims process almost certainly would litigate and appeal multiple questions involving claimants with asbestos-related lung cancer and a history of smoking. The uncertainty resulting from this litigation over new questions - which the parties, not the OAC, would initiate - would further delay compensation to asbestos victims facing progressive asbestos-related illness.

REV_00261672

This delay in establishing the OAC is crucial because during this interim, start-up period, most of the pending asbestos claims would almost certainly grind to a halt. Although the bill allows for current claimants to continue with their case in court if trial commences within six months of the bill's enactment (Section 501(b)), only a marginal percentage of asbestos cases currently make it to trial, let alone within six months. Similarly, although the bill permits claimants to demand "right to sue" letters from the OAC if they do not receive an initial decision on medical eligibility quickly, that right is limited to those rare claimants with "a scheduled trial date within one year" after enactment. Section 501(c). In any event, even if a few claimants could return to court before the OAC was operational, the prospective change in the law that the bill represents (and, in particular, the development of the compensation grid) almost certainly would alter the defendants' litigating positions and create incentives to defer litigating and settling the pending cases until the OAC process sorted itself out. Therefore, for the years that it would take for the OAC to become operational, while many victims' disease would progress, their claims would not.

Again, a comparison to the vaccine program is illuminating. Although the National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act was passed by Congress in 1986, the vaccine program did not issue its first award for several years. In the interim, during the years it took to establish the vaccine office, most cases were stayed by the courts and little settlement progress was made. Once the vaccine claims resolution process commenced, it took twice as long to resolve claims as was predicted at the time the legislation was drafted (two years instead of one). Indeed, with the backlog created by the initial filing of approximately 4,300 cases by 1990, the vast majority of vaccine cases were not resolved in even two years. Thus, our experience indicates that, with the erection of any new administrative structure, pending cases tend to be delayed far longer than anticipated, no matter how well intentioned or diligent the staff. The result is delayed justice for deserving victims.

B. Delays in the Claims Resolution Process

Once the OAC was finally up and running, the proposed claims resolution process would not, in our view, materially improve upon the traditional court system. H.R. 1283's claims processing procedures would require a number of steps for each individual. First, as we understand the bill, a claimant would have to submit a detailed, complete medical file before a claim was considered filed. Section 102(b). Our experience with asbestos litigation indicates that it would often take months to complete such a file. Second, once the claim was successfully filed, the claimant would be required to wait up to thirty days for the Medical Director to make an initial decision regarding eligibility. If initially denied, the claimant would then be obligated to petition for review by a panel of two qualified physicians or an exceptional medical claims panel. Section 102(c). If the denial were affirmed by the review panel, the claimant would then

REV_00261673

U.S. SENATE Established 1947
Republican Policy Committee

April 29, 2003

Background Paper

The Need for Class Action Reform

Class action lawsuits allow plaintiffs whose injuries might not be worth enough to justify bringing individual suits to combine their damages into one lawsuit against a common defendant. Class action lawsuits can facilitate the fair and efficient resolution of legitimate claims of numerous parties. For those reasons, federal and state courts' rules of civil procedure enable litigants to proceed on a class basis in appropriate cases.

In recent years, however, a relatively small number of class action plaintiffs' attorneys have abused the class action procedures. The effects have been dramatic: a distortion of our federalist system by the actions of a few rogue state courts; excessive compensation of attorneys at the expense of injured plaintiffs; unprecedented costs to the national economy; and an overall decline in public respect for our nation's judicial system.

Congress has been attempting to reform the class action rules for several years despite strong resistance from trial lawyers. On April 11, the Senate Judiciary Committee reported the Class Action Fairness Act (S. 274) after a favorable, bipartisan vote. The RPC will release a Legislative Notice when S. 274 is to be debated on the floor. Until then, this background paper examines why class action reform is necessary.

The Role of Federal Courts in Multi-State Class Actions

The U.S. Constitution provides for federal jurisdiction over all lawsuits between citizens of different states, i.e., those cases where the parties are of "diverse" citizenship.[1] The first Congresses enacted legislation narrowly construing "diversity jurisdiction" – long before the class action procedure had been contemplated.[2] Today, the most obviously "national" types of litigation – multi-million-dollar class action cases involving national companies engaging in interstate commerce with citizens of many states – are often stuck in state court. This is so because Congress has narrowly construed constitutional diversity to require all plaintiffs to be diverse from all defendants: "complete diversity." Consequently, national class actions with plaintiffs from all 50 states and defendants from multiple states are rarely eligible for federal court. The result is that a few state courts are deciding cases with great national significance and effectively regulating national industries and professions beyond their state borders.

[1] U.S. Constitution, art. II, sec. 2, cl. 1.

[2] See Strawbridge v. Curtis, 7 U.S. (3 Cranch) 267 (1806) (explaining that the requirement of "complete diversity" was a creation of Congress, not of the Constitution).

REV_00261678

Much has been written accusing these state courts of incompetence, anti-business biases, and outright corruption. The Constitution provides for federal jurisdiction over cases between citizens of different states precisely so that parties never have to deal with questions of local bias. As Chief Justice Marshall once observed, "[H]owever true the fact may be, that the tribunals of the states will administer justice as impartially as those of the nation, to parties of every description, it is not less true that the Constitution itself either entertains apprehensions on this subject, or views with such indulgence the possible fears and apprehensions of suitors, that it has established national tribunals for the decision of controversies between aliens and a citizen, or between citizens of different states."[3] The Senate need not pass judgment on the quality of state court judges – most of whom are undoubtedly of high integrity and competence – to recognize that parties to litigation should have a right to the protection of the constitutional safeguard, and that nationwide class actions should not be barred from the federal courts.

The Growing Abuse of Coercive Interstate Class Actions

A literal class action industry devoted to finding opportunities to extract financial payments from American business has developed in the past few decades. This class action industry is dominated by a focused group of class action plaintiffs' attorneys who "shop" throughout the nation for the friendliest courts to hear possible cases. As a result, businesses operating in the United States are increasingly at risk of being hauled into select state court jurisdictions where judges are quick to certify a class and where juries are wont to render extravagant awards.[4] Moreover, because each state is sovereign, the same defendant often faces copycat cases in different states, which frequently result in inconsistent judgments.

Forum-shopping has enabled clever attorneys to file in state court many lawsuits that implicate citizens of many states and interstate commerce – precisely the kinds of lawsuits best suited to the federal courts. However, due to the antiquated requirement of "complete diversity" in citizenship among plaintiffs and defendants, these attorneys have been able to craft their pleadings to evade federal court jurisdiction. For example, in Madison County, Illinois – one of the most notorious of the plaintiff-friendly class action jurisdictions in the nation[5] – a South Carolina law firm filed a purported class action on behalf of three named plaintiffs, none of whom lived in Madison County, against 31 defendants throughout the United States, none of whom were located in Madison County.[6] Instead, they base jurisdiction on the mere allegation that some as-yet-unknown class members live in Madison County.

The effect of encouraging such forum-shopping has been dramatic. One study estimates that "[v]irtually every sector of the United States economy is on trial in Madison County, Palm

---

[3] Bank of the United States v. Deveaux, 9 U.S. (5 Cranch) 61, 87 (1809).

[4] Under the current legal system, "national class actions can be filed just about anywhere and are disproportionately brought in a handful of state courts whose judges get elected with lawyers' money." "Making Justice Work," editorial, Washington Post 25 Nov. 2002, at A-14.

[5] See, e.g., John H. Beisner and Jessica Davidson Miller, "Class Action Magnet Courts: The Allure Intensifies," Class Action Litigation Report, Vol. 4, No. 2 (BNA 2003).

[6] Beisner and Miller, "Class Action Magnet Courts: The Allure Intensifies," at 62.

REV_00261679

Beach County [Florida], and Jefferson County [Texas] – long distance carriers, gasoline purchasers, insurance companies, computer manufacturers and pharmaceutical developers."[7]

Current Class Action Abuses Continue to Harm Plaintiffs

Injured plaintiffs can also suffer due to insufficient judicial oversight of lawsuits that have come to be dominated by class action attorneys. The costs of litigation and the windfall profits to attorneys have produced a legal system that returns less than 50 cents on the dollar to people it is designed to help, and only 22 cents to compensate for actual economic loss.[8]

As a by-product of attorney-dominated class action litigation, many class action settlements consist of disproportionate payments of attorneys fees to plaintiffs' attorneys and nothing of real value to the injured plaintiffs. Indeed, in some settlements, the plaintiffs receive no cash whatsoever, while the attorneys purporting to represent them receive millions of dollars. For example, in a case against Blockbuster, Inc., customers who alleged they were charged excessive late fees for video rentals were to receive $1 coupons while their attorneys received over $9 million.[9] In an Illinois case about cellular phone charges, settling class members received coupons to buy future products (but not to pay current bills), while their attorneys received more that $1 million in fees.[10] In a similar "coupon" case settlement in California, class members received a $13 rebate towards the purchase of new computer monitors, while their attorneys received $6 million.[11] Given the unlikelihood that many class members will ever be able to convert these "coupons" into much of value, these settlements have the effect of granting the attorneys the vast majority of the economic value of the settlements.

Injured parties also suffer when they receive complicated settlement notices that do not adequately explain their right to challenge the settlement or to enjoy the full benefits of the settlement. Even more troubling, some have accused defendants of conspiring with plaintiffs' attorneys to produce confusing notices in order to ensure that the actual economic value of the settlement to the class members is lower than reported to the court.[12] Relatedly, some settlements have been crafted to provide very large payments to the "named" plaintiff – the original plaintiff who brought the suit prior to class certification – in order to persuade that plaintiff to agree to a settlement that will give fellow class members far less compensation (if any). Additional judicial scrutiny is necessary to ensure that the class members – those who allegedly have been injured, as opposed to their attorneys – understand their rights.

---

[7] John H. Beisner and Jessica Davidson Miller, "They're Making a Federal Case Out of It," Civil Justice Report, No. 3 (Center for Legal Policy at the Manhattan Institute 2001), at 27.

[8] Tillinghast-Towers Perrin, U.S. Court Costs: 2002 Update, Trends and Findings on the Costs of the U.S. Tort System, at 1, available at http://www.tillinghast.com/tillinghast/publications/reports/2002_Tort_Costs_Update/Tort_Costs_2002_Update_rev.pdf. Tillinghast is an international actuarial and management consulting company that has been examining the U.S. legal system's costs in published studies since 1985.

[9] "Blockbuster customers to be reimbursed for late fees," Associated Press, 11 Jan. 2002, discussing Scott v. Blockbuster, Inc., No. D162-535 (Jefferson County, Texas, 2001).

[10] Michelle Singletary, "This 'Settlement' Doesn't Ring True," Washington Post 5 Sept. 1999, at H-01.

[11] Michelle Singletary, "'Coupon Settlements' Fall Short," Washington Post 12 Sept. 1999, at H-01.

[12] Genine C. Swanzey, Using Class Actions to Litigate Mass Torts: Is There Justice for the Individual?, 11 Georgetown Journal of Legal Ethics 421, 428 (1998); Arthur Bryant, "Class Actions for Settlement Only: An Invitation to Collusion," Legal Times 17 June 1996, at 19.

REV_00261680

The Costs of Runaway Litigation to the National Economy

Over the past decade, class action lawsuits have grown by over 1,000-percent.[13] This growth in class action litigation contributes to the increasing burdens that civil lawsuits place on the American economy.[14] While some of that increase in class actions may be due to legitimate increases in injuries to innocent plaintiffs, it is also due to a myriad of lawsuits filed with the intent of forcing early settlements. Plaintiffs' attorneys have manipulated the class action legal procedures in certain states to force early settlements on even the most frivolous of claims, especially if a pliant judge can be persuaded at an early stage to certify the case as a class action. Because class actions aggregate many potential claims into one lawsuit, and because many unfair, or even unconstitutional, certification rulings cannot be appealed until after an expensive trial on the merits, defendants often face the risk of a single judgment in the tens of millions or even billions of dollars.

The risk of a single, bankrupting award often forces defendants to settle the case with sizable payments even when the defendant has meritorious defenses. As one federal court explained, "The risk of facing an all-or-nothing verdict presents too high a risk, even when the probability of an adverse judgment is low. These settlements have been referred to as judicial blackmail."[15] Thus, defendants facing non-meritorious class action lawsuits must decide whether to assume even a slight risk of an unfavorable jury award that could bankrupt the company. This "judicial blackmail" imposes increased costs on the economy, causing higher prices and lower wages (along with the enrichment of those attorneys who brought the weak claims in the first place).

Noting this drag on the American economy and the difficulty that insurers have in accounting for litigation risk, the chairman of Lloyd's of London recently remarked, "In such an environment, what hope is there to keep the spirit of risk-taking alive, to fuel the appetite for innovation and creation? Would those who trekked their way across the dusty plains, or built up vast commercial empires, or realised the dream of putting man on the Moon – would they have achieved any of this if they had to face the threat of being sued?"[16] When litigation costs become too unpredictable, the effect will be to dissuade investment, discourage entrepreneurship, increase the costs of risk planning, and threaten the core economic activities that have long characterized American capitalism.

---

[13] Class Action Watch, Vol I, No. 2 (Spring 1999), available at http://www.fed-soc.org/Publications/classactionwatch/classaction1-2.pdf (finding increase of 1,315 percent over previous decade); Tillinghast-Towers Perrin at 1.

[14] In 2001, total damages, litigation expenses, and court-related costs amounted to $205 billion. Tillinghast-Towers Perrin at 3.

[15] Castano v. American Tobacco Co., 84 F.3d 734, 746 (5th Cir. 1996); see also Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay, 437 U.S. 463, 476 (1978) ("Certification of a large class may so increase the defendant's potential damages liability and litigation costs that he may find it economically prudent to settle and to abandon a meritorious defense"); In the Matter of Rhone-Poulenc Rorer, Inc., 51 F.3d 1293 (7th Cir. 1995) (noting the "intense pressure to settle" rather than "roll[ing] the[] dice" by taking the case to a jury).

[16] Lord Levene (Chairman, Lloyd's of London), Speech to Union League of Chicago, 8 April 2003, at 12-13, available at http://www.lloyds.com/index.asp?ItemId=4776.

REV_00261681

S.274's Reforms Will Address These Problems

As will be discussed more fully in the forthcoming Legislative Notice, S.274 remedies the problems discussed in this background paper. First, it expands federal jurisdiction over class actions by eliminating the need for "complete diversity." The effect of this change will be to drive those cases that are multi-state, or national, in scope to federal court, while keeping state courts involved in adjudicating matters that primarily involve the forum state. This expanded federal jurisdiction will also eliminate the allure of forum shopping for the most favorable forum because defendants will be able to avail themselves of unbiased federal courts in high-dollar, multi-state cases.

The bill also has several consumer-protection provisions. It requires that notices be clear and not bogged-down with "legalese" so that plaintiffs can better understand their rights. It also requires that state attorneys general, or other relevant state officials, be notified of pending class action settlements so that these elected officials can protect their citizens. The bill also requires federal judges to scrutinize non-cash settlements to ensure that plaintiffs are treated fairly when their lawyers get cash settlements but they get coupons. And, it requires that the Judicial Conference study ways to ensure that lawyers are not getting unfair, outrageous fees at the expense of consumers.

Conclusion

Class actions are an important part of our litigation system that, when used properly, should produce a net savings to the litigation system and just recoveries to injured parties. But without reform, the class action process will remain a system ripe for exploitation, and the harm to the fundamental fairness of the civil justice system will continue to grow.

REV_00261682

REV_00261683

Tort Reform [Folder 2] [2]

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 2172/2083
9702

Box 58
Folder 12

LOCAL RULES OF PRACTICE OF THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA

Effective February 1, 1997

Including Amendments Received Through October 1, 2000

Research Note

Use WESTLAW ® to find cases citing or applying specific rules. WESTLAW may also be used to search for specific terms in court rules or to update court rules. See the VA-RULES and VA-ORDERS Scope Screens for detailed descriptive information and search tips.

Amendments to these rules are published, as received, in the South Eastern Reporter 2d advance sheets.

Table of Rules

LOCAL RULES

Rule
1. Scope of Rules.
(A) Application.
(B) Statutory Rules.
(C) Effective Date of Amendments.
3. Area and Divisions.
(A) Area.
(B) Divisions.
(C) Division in Which Suits to Be Instituted.
4. Service and Return of Summons—Abatement.
(A) Service and Abatement.
(B) Withholding Service.
(C) Civil Cover Sheet.
7. Motions—Continuances—Court Orders.
(A) Grounds and Relief to Be Stated.
(B) Address and Telephone Number of Attorney and Pro Se Litigants.
(C) Use of Forms.
(D) Return Date.
(E) Briefs Required.
(F) Continuances.
(G) Filing of Pleadings.
(H) Extensions.
(I) Determination of Motions Without Oral Hearing.
(J) Motions Against Pro Se Parties.
(K) Court Orders—Objections Noted.
7.1 Financial Disclosure.
(A) Required Disclosure.
(B) Time for Filing.
(C) Statement Delivered to Judge.
Financial Interest Disclosure Statement.
16. Pretrial Conference.
Rule
(A) Applicability of Rule 16.
(B) Initial Pretrial Conference and Order and Scheduling Order.
26. Discovery and Expert Disclosure.
(A) Inapplicability of Certain Discovery Requirements.
(B) Requirement of a Writing.
(C) Objections to Discovery Process.
(D) Expert Disclosures.
30. Depositions—Expenses—Summaries—Reviewing Depositions.
(A) Discovery.
(B) Recording and Transcribing Transcript of Discovery Deposition.
(C) Attorneys' Fees.
(D) Security for Travel Expense.
(E) Travel Expense.
(F) Reviewing Depositions.
(G) Summaries of Depositions.
(H) Reasonable Notice.
(I) Limits on Depositions.
33. Interrogatories.
37. Motions to Compel and Sanctions.
(A) Motions to Compel.
(B) Briefing of Discovery Motions.
(C) Compliance With Discovery Orders.
(D) Failure to Comply With Order.
(E) Consultation Among Counsel.
(F) Extensions.
(G) Unnecessary Discovery Motions or Objections.
(H) Sanctions.
(I) Filing of Discovery and Responses.
38. Demand for Jury Trial.
45. Subpoenas.

REV_00261685

NORFOLK LAW LIBRARY Fax:7576224406 Jul 11 '01 15:58 P.11/19

cause shown, subpoenas compelling attendance at a deposition shall be served not later than eleven (11) days before the date of the deposition. No subpoena for the taking of depositions shall be issued by the Clerk unless there be exhibited to the Clerk a copy of the notice to take deposition together with a statement of the date and manner of service and of the names of the persons served, certified by the person who made service.

(G) Civil Actions—Place of Taking Deposition. Except with respect to a witness in a foreign country (See 28 U.S.C. § 1783), the Clerk shall, upon request, issue a subpoena for taking a deposition requiring the appearance of any party or witness at any place within the district or 100 miles from the place where that person resides, is employed, or transacts business in person, or is served, or at such other convenient place as is fixed by an order of court.

(H) Subpoenas in Blank. Whenever there is a question as to whether or not a subpoena in blank should be issued by the Clerk, the applicant shall be referred to a judge of this Court for a final determination. Before issuing a subpoena in blank, the Clerk shall determine the actual pendency of the action and the date and time set for hearing or trial. Except for good cause shown, a blank subpoena returnable in one division will not be issued out of another division. Blank subpoenas shall recite the title and number of the case and shall be completed in every detail except for the name and address of the witness. Returns of service shall be made promptly and filed with the Clerk. Service of subpoenas in blank shall be subject to the requirements of these Rules.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 47. JURORS

(A) Jury Lists.

(1) The entire list of names drawn to serve a division of the Court for a particular period and for a particular action or case, together with the questionnaires prepared by the jurors, may be disclosed to counsel for the parties, or to any party acting pro se, unless the Court directs otherwise. However, no juror shall be approached, either directly or through any member of his or her immediate family, in an effort to secure information concerning such juror.

(2) When the jurors report for duty at a session of Court, the Clerk shall, upon request, make available to counsel for the parties, or to any party acting pro se, a list of such jurors.

(B) Peremptory Challenges. In civil actions where there are several plaintiffs and/or several defendants, and in a criminal case where there is more than one defendant, the Court may allow each or both sides more than the usual number of peremptory challenges permitted by law upon motion made at least twenty-one (21) days before the date set for commencement of trial. Untimely motions will not be entertained.

[Effective February 1, 1997; amended effective September 1, 2000.]

RULE 48. NUMBER OF JURORS—CIVIL ACTIONS

Unless otherwise provided by law, the jury in any civil action shall consist of at least six (6), but no more than twelve (12), persons.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 51. PROPOSED JURY INSTRUCTIONS AND VOIR DIRE

Except as provided otherwise in a pretrial or scheduling order, in all cases tried to a jury, whether civil or criminal, the parties shall submit proposed instructions and voir dire questions to the Court in duplicate, with a copy to opposing counsel, at least five (5) business days before the scheduled trial date. Each instruction shall be set forth on a separate page and shall be numbered and identified appropriately by the party submitting it and the original shall bear at its foot a citation of the authority in support of the instruction. Instructions shall be filed as a group together with a cover sheet in pleading form and a certificate of service.

Instructions filed with the Court must be proffered to the Court during the instruction conference and ruled upon by the Judge in order to become a part of the official record for appeal.

[Effective February 1, 1997; amended effective September 1, 2000.]

RULE 54. COSTS—NOTICE OF APPEAL—JURY COSTS

(A) Payment in Advance. All fees and costs due the Clerk shall be paid in advance except as otherwise provided by law.

(B) Stipulation for Costs for Certain Admiralty and Maritime Claims. No stipulation for costs for complaints, petitions, counterclaims, and cross-claims, and the filing of an answer, appearance or claim shall be required, unless specifically ordered by the Court, except where now or hereafter required by statute, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or the Supplementary Rules for Certain Admiralty and Maritime Claims heretofore or hereafter adopted by Congress or through the Rule Making process.

(C) Bond Premiums. If costs are awarded by the Court, the reasonable premiums or expense paid on any bond or other security given by the prevailing party shall be taxed as part of the costs.

REV_00261694

(D) Taxable Costs And Procedure For Taxing Costs.

(1) Bill of Costs. The party entitled to costs shall file a bill of costs as provided in 28 U.S.C. § 1920 and § 1924 within eleven (11) days, unless such time is extended by order.

Such bill of costs shall distinctly set forth each item thereof so that the nature of the charge can be readily understood. An itemization and documentation for requested costs in all categories shall be attached to the cost bill. Costs will be disallowed if proper documentation is not provided.

(2) Objection to the Bill of Costs. A party from whom costs are sought may serve an opposition to the bill of costs within eleven (11) days after service of the bill of costs. The opposition shall identify each item objected to, and the grounds for the objection. Within five (5) days thereafter, the prevailing party may serve responses to the objections.

If no objections are filed, the Clerk shall promptly proceed to tax the costs and shall allow such items specified in the bill of costs as are properly chargeable as costs. The Clerk shall give notice of such action to the parties or their counsel. The Court shall promptly review the action of the Clerk upon timely motion under Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(d). In the absence of a timely motion the action of the Clerk is final.

If objections are filed and the Clerk shall be unable to determine all or some of the properly chargeable costs, the application for such costs shall be referred to the judge who presided over the trial or, at the discretion of that judge, to a United States Magistrate Judge for report and recommendation under 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(B).

(E) Excessive and Unnecessary Costs. Any party applying for costs which are not recoverable or which are excessive shall be subject to sanction under Fed. R. Civ. P. 11.

(F) Notice of Appeal, Fees.

(1) Where there are multiple parties seeking to appeal jointly (e.g., where cases are consolidated or tried together or decided by a single judgment or order) and a joint notice of appeal is filed, the Clerk shall collect only one fee and only one cost bond if required. Where separate notices of appeal are filed, the Clerk shall collect separate fees and require separate bonds.

(2) Separate notices of appeal, separate fees, and separate bonds are required of a party who exercises a right of appeal under Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(3), within fourteen (14) days of the date on which the first notice of appeal was filed.

(G) Jury Costs. Whenever any civil action scheduled for jury trial is settled, or otherwise disposed of in advance of the actual trial, then, except for good cause shown, juror costs, including service fees, mileage and per diem, shall be assessed equally against the parties and their counsel or otherwise assessed as directed by the Court, unless the Clerk is notified at least one full business day prior to the day on which the action is scheduled for trial in time to advise the jurors that it will not be necessary for them to attend.

Likewise, when any civil action, proceeding as a jury trial, is settled at trial in advance of the verdict, then, except for good cause shown, all jury costs, service fees, mileage and per diem shall be assessed equally against the parties and their counsel, or otherwise assessed as directed by the Court.

[Effective February 1, 1997; amended effective September 1, 2000.]

RULE 56. SUMMARY JUDGMENT

(A) Summary Judgment—Time of Filing. No motion for summary judgment will be considered unless it is filed and set for hearing or submitted on briefs, within a reasonable time before the date of trial, thus permitting a reasonable time for the Court to hear arguments and consider the merits after completion of the briefing schedule specified in Rule 7(E)(1).

(B) Summary Judgment—Listing of Undisputed Facts. Each brief in support of a motion for summary judgment shall include a specifically captioned section listing all material facts as to which the moving party contends there is no genuine issue and citing the parts of the record relied on to support the listed facts as alleged to be undisputed. A brief in response to such a motion shall include a specifically captioned section listing all material facts as to which it is contended that there exists a genuine issue necessary to be litigated and citing the parts of the record relied on to support the facts alleged to be in dispute. In determining a motion for summary judgment, the Court may assume that facts identified by the moving party in its listing of material facts are admitted, unless such a fact is controverted in the statement of genuine issues filed in opposition to the motion.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 62. APPEAL BOND—EXEMPTION FROM

(A) Exemption. The Commonwealth of Virginia, or any political subdivision or any office or agent thereof, shall not be required, unless otherwise ordered by the Court, to post a supersedeas bond or other undertaking which includes security for the payment of costs on appeal.

(B) Alternate to Supersedeas Bond. In lieu of any supersedeas bond, the parties may stipulate with respect to any agreement or undertaking. In lieu of any cost bond, the parties may stipulate with respect to any agreement or undertaking conditioned that the monies and properties of the Court are fully protected or prepaid. The prevailing party in the district Court should seriously consider this subdivision as, in the event of a reversal, the premium of any bond will be taxed as a part of the costs. All such stipulations must be approved by the Court and filed in the record.

REV_00261695

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 65. SURETIES—SECURITY—BONDSMAN

(A) Security. In both civil actions and criminal cases, except as otherwise provided by law or by agreement of the parties, every bond, undertaking or stipulation must be secured by (1) the deposit of cash or negotiable government bonds, undertaking or stipulation; (2) the undertaking or guaranty of a corporate surety doing business in Virginia and holding a certificate of authority from the Secretary of the Treasury; or (3) the undertaking or guaranty of sufficient solvent sureties, residents of Virginia, who own real or personal property within the State of Virginia worth double the amount of the bond, undertaking or stipulation over all debts and liabilities, and over all obligations assumed on other bonds, undertakings or stipulations, and exclusive of all legal exemptions. A husband and wife may act as surety on a bond, but they shall be considered as only one surety. If a bond, undertaking or stipulation is executed by individual sureties, each surety shall execute an affidavit of justification, giving the full name, occupation, residence and business address, showing that he or she is qualified as an individual surety under the provisions of this Rule. Provided that, in criminal cases, this Rule shall not in any way modify, alter or change any of the provisions of the Bail Reform Act or any successor statute.

(B) Prohibited Sureties. Members of the bar, administrative officers or employees of this Court, the United States Marshal, his deputies or assistants, shall not act as a surety in any civil action, criminal case or other proceeding pending in this Court. A member of the bar may execute a bond as attorney-in-fact upon presenting a properly executed power of attorney.

(C) Powers of Clerk. To approve security, the Clerk or Deputy Clerk is authorized to approve all recognizances, stipulations, bonds, guaranties, or undertakings, in the penal sum prescribed by statute or order of the Court, whether the security be property or personal or corporate surety. If the bond is offered by a professional bondsman or a person qualifying under (A)(3) above, approval of the Court, Magistrate Judge or Bankruptcy Judge shall be obtained for penal sums in excess of $25,000.00.

(D) Professional Bondsman. Any person desiring to become surety for compensation (professional bondsman) on any bond required to be given in any matter before the Court or any of its Magistrate Judges or Bankruptcy Judges, or in any other matter under the jurisdiction of this Court, shall, before attempting to act, obtain approval of the Court. Application for such approval shall be by petition, duly sworn to, setting forth:

(1) That the applicant is of good moral character, is a citizen of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and residing within the boundaries of the Eastern District of Virginia.

(2) His or her full name, business and home address, marital status, and the nature of any business conducted by such person.

(3) Whether he or she is licensed in Virginia and/or any of the cities or counties of Virginia to act as a professional bondsman and, if so, where and whether such person has qualified in any of the Courts of Virginia to so act.

(4) Statement (signed by the owners) of assets (including both real estate and personal estate) and liabilities, and as to real estate, its description, location, how titled and any encumbrances thereon. If a partnership is involved, a statement of the assets of both the partnership and the individual parties must be included, signed by owners of the assets. Assets owned by third parties or jointly with parties who are not partners will not be considered.

(5) A list of any and all bonds on which such person is the surety, the nature of the bond and where lodged.

(6) That such person will quarter-annually file with the Court a list of all bonds upon which he or she is surety, whether any bonds are in default, whether any action on such bond has been instituted, and whether there are any unpaid judgments against such person.

(7) A certificate from a Court of record, or the Chief of Police of the home city or town, or of two other responsible citizens, that such person is of good moral character.

(8) A list of any and all criminal convictions, except traffic violations, and whether there are any pending indictments or warrants against such person.

(9) If the information provided under paragraph (4) above reveals a total net worth of at least $200,000.00, and the applicant is otherwise satisfactory, an order may be entered permitting the applicant to act until further order of the Court. Should at any time the total net worth stated in paragraph (4) fall below $200,000.00 as shown on any quarterly report, or the applicant have more bonds outstanding than can be adequately covered, in the Court's opinion, by the net worth shown, or the applicant fail to file on time any quarterly report, or if for any reason the Court should deem the security offered by the applicant to be inadequate or outstanding bonds not adequately secured, the Court may terminate the right of the applicant to act as surety on any bond, without notice.

REV_00261696

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 67. DEPOSITS INTO COURT

Deposit Into Court Procedure. Upon entry of an order in any action involving the payment into Court of a sum of money to be deposited to the credit of the Court for the benefit of any party, the party for whose benefit the sum is to be deposited shall tender to the Court a sketch for an order identifying the desired depository (which must have sufficient collateral in the Federal Reserve Bank in Richmond as required by 31 C.F.R. § 202 [Circular 176]), the specific investment instrument with the rate of interest expected to be earned thereon, and the proposed disposition of the interest proceeds. The order should specify if the Clerk is directed to place the funds into an interest bearing account for the benefit of the party later determined by the Court to be entitled to the fund and interest earned thereon will be provided to the person receiving the funds. If the order does not specify that the funds are to be placed in an interest bearing account for the benefit of the person later determined by the Court to be entitled to the funds, the funds will be deposited into the Court's United States Treasury account, and no interest will accrue to any party's benefit. Interest earned thereon will accrue to the United States. The sketch shall be endorsed by the guardian ad litem of any party under a legal disability. Upon entry of such sketch, or any modification thereof, the party shall cause the same to be served on the Clerk in a manner similar to that required by Fed.R.Civ.P.67. The order shall also provide that the Clerk's registry assessment fee, as prescribed by the Judicial Conference of the United States and published in the Federal Register, be paid to the Clerk from the interest earned on the investment. At the time any request for disbursement of deposited funds is made, the party requesting disbursement shall provide the Clerk in writing the social security or tax identification number of any person to whom any payment is to be made.

[Effective February 1, 1997; amended effective September 1, 2000.]

RULE 71A. LAND CONDEMNATION ACTIONS

The guidelines for filing, docketing, recording and reporting land condemnation proceedings approved by the Judicial Conference of the United States at its March 6–7, 1975 Session are approved for use in this jurisdiction and are hereby adopted. The Clerk is directed to implement these guidelines and is authorized, where the United States files separate condemnation actions and a single declaration of taking relating to those separate actions, to establish a Master file in which the declaration of taking may be filed. The filing of the declaration of taking therein shall constitute a filing of the same in each of the actions to which it relates.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 72. UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE JUDGES—DUTIES

Magistrate judges of this District serve as judicial officers of the Court and are authorized and specially designated to perform all duties authorized or allowed to be performed by United States magistrate judges by the United States Code and any rule governing proceedings in this Court.

Duties and cases may be assigned or referred to a Magistrate Judge by an Order entered in the action or on the instructions of a District Judge.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 79. EXHIBITS AND DEPOSITIONS

(A) Trial Exhibits. In all civil actions, unless otherwise ordered by the Court, the party intending to offer exhibits at trial shall place them in a binder, properly tabbed, numbered and indexed, and the original and one copy shall be delivered to the Clerk, with copies in the same form to the opposing party, one (1) business day before the trial.

(B) Custody and Disposition of Models and Exhibits.

(1) Custody. After being marked for identification, exhibits offered or admitted in evidence in any action tried in this Court shall be placed in the custody of the Clerk, unless otherwise ordered by the Court. All other exhibits, models, and material not offered and admitted in evidence shall be retained in custody of the attorney or party producing same at trial, unless otherwise directed by the Court.

(2) Removal. Whenever any models, diagrams, exhibits, depositions, transcripts, briefs, tables, charts, paper writings, articles or other items or material or things have been placed in the custody of the Clerk for introduction into evidence or otherwise, and same are not admitted or marked for identification, or otherwise used, they shall be removed by the party who delivered or filed or lodged them with the Clerk immediately following the conclusion of the trial or other disposition of the action, unless otherwise directed by the Court. If such items are not withdrawn within ten days after the right to withdraw them exists, the Clerk may forward them to counsel or the party entitled to them, or destroy or make other disposition of them as the Clerk may deem appropriate.

(C) Disposition of Exhibits, Depositions, in Civil Cases. All exhibits, models, diagrams, depositions, transcripts, briefs, tables, charts, paper writings, articles or other items or material or things, introduced, tendered, lodged or marked in the trial of a civil action or lodged, filed or delivered to the Clerk in anticipation of their introduction into evidence or for use at trial, shall be withdrawn by the parties to the litigation or their counsel upon the expiration of thirty (30) days after the judgment has become final and the time for appeal or application for a rehearing or further hearing shall have passed. If such items, material or things are not so removed within the time aforesaid, the Clerk may forward them to counsel or the party entitled thereto, or shall destroy or make such other disposition or use of them as the Clerk may deem appropriate. The Court may at any time direct or order one or more counsel to be the custodian of the exhibits and depositions rather than the Clerk.

REV_00261697

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 80. OFFICIAL COURT REPORTERS TRANSCRIPTS—HEARING ON TRANSCRIPTS—RECORD ON APPEAL

(A) Preparation of Transcript. Where a Court reporter, under contract or officially employed, is called upon to prepare a transcript, or any portion thereof, in a civil or criminal case in which a party is acting pro se, or in a criminal case in which the defendant is entitled to counsel under the Criminal Justice Act, the Court reporter may, at his or her election, file said transcript or portion thereof with the Clerk of the United States District Court (or if the transcript or portion thereof is ordered by the Court of Appeals, it may be filed with the Clerk of the United States Court of Appeals), and the Clerk shall acknowledge receipt of said transcript and forward same to the pro se party or, if represented by counsel pursuant to appointment under the Criminal Justice Act, to the attorney representing said defendant.

(B) Court Reporter Management Plan. In accordance with the provisions of 28 U.S.C. § 753 and the requirements of a resolution adopted by the Judicial Conference of the United States at its session in March 1982, all district Courts have been required to file a Court Reporter Management Plan which is available for inspection and copying in the Office of the Clerk. This plan calls for the supervision, duties and assignments of Court reporters, including the work hours, fees for transcripts, etc. The transcript rates charged by reporters are governed by rates recommended by the Judicial Conference of the United States if adopted by this Court. The schedule of maximum fees which may be charged is posted in the Clerk's Office.

(C) Release of Transcript. The Clerk shall not release any transcript for copying or reproducing without an order of the Court, but counsel, interested parties, or the news media may examine any transcript on file.

(D) Obligation to Pay Court Reporter. The obligation to pay the reporter for any and all transcripts shall be the joint and several personal obligation of the attorney, and the party for whose benefit the transcript was obtained, when the order is placed, to the extent so ordered. Any charges for a transcript shall be payable upon the completion of the transcript or any segment thereof, when a proper bill for same has been submitted by the reporter. If proper charges for transcripts are not paid within a reasonable time after submission, the reporter may refer the matter to a judge for such action as may be deemed appropriate.

(E) Record on Appeal. Unless otherwise directed by the Court, the record on appeal in civil and criminal cases shall not include the examination of the jury on voir dire, counsel's opening statements, arguments of counsel (including arguments of counsel on motions) and the Court's charge to the jury unless there were exceptions to the charge.

Unless the parties file a written stipulation with the Clerk within twenty days after notice of appeal is filed designating the papers which shall constitute the record on appeal the Clerk shall certify and forward to the Court of Appeals all of the original pleadings and orders in the file jacket dealing with the action or proceeding in which the appeal is taken, unless otherwise instructed by the Court of Appeals.

(F) Daily or Expedited Copy. All requests for daily or expedited transcripts must be made in writing to the Court Reporter, if known, and, if not, to the Clerk, with copies to opposing counsel, not later than five (5) business days before the hearing or trial to be transcribed.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 83.1 ATTORNEYS AND PRO SE PARTIES

(A) Eligibility. Any person who is a member of the bar in good standing in the Supreme Court of Virginia is eligible to practice before this Court upon admission.

(B) Initial Appearance. Any person who meets the requirements of the foregoing paragraph and who maintains a law office outside of Virginia shall set forth his or her Virginia State Bar I.D. Number on any initial pleading filed by such person.

(C) Procedure for Admission. Every person desiring admission to practice in this Court shall file with the Clerk written application therefor accompanied by an endorsement by two qualified members of the bar of this Court stating that the applicant is of good moral character and professional reputation. The form for such application may be obtained from the Clerk's Office of the Court. As a part of the application, the applicant shall certify that applicant has within ninety days prior to the submission of the application read or reread (a) The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, (b) The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, (c) The Local Rules of the Court, and (d) The Federal Rules of Evidence. The applicant shall thereafter be presented by a qualified practitioner of the Court who shall in open Court by oral motion, and upon giving assurance to the Court that he has examined the credentials of the applicant and is satisfied the applicant possesses the necessary qualifications, move for his admission to practice.

REV_00261698

The applicant shall in open Court take the oath required for admission, subscribe the roll of the Court, and pay to the Clerk the required fee. For such payment, he shall be issued a certificate of qualification by the Clerk. For good cause shown, the Court may waive payment of the fee.

(D) Foreign Attorneys.

(1) Upon written motion by a member of this Court, a practitioner from another state or the District of Columbia may appear and conduct specific cases pro hac vice before this Count including oral arguments of motions and trial, provided that:

(a) The rules of the federal courts of the district in which he or she maintains an office extend a similar privilege to members of the bar of this Court; and

(b) That such practitioners from another state or the District of Columbia shall be accompanied by a member of the bar of this Court in all appearances before this Court.

For purposes of this rule, a member of the bar of this Court shall be a person admitted to practice under subparagraph (C), Local Rule 83.1.

(2) All practitioners admitted before this Court for the purpose of participating in a particular proceeding (pro hac vice) shall be subject to the Local Rules of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia including, but not limited to, Appendix B of the Federal Rules of Disciplinary Enforcement. Applicants for pro hac vice admission shall complete a written application certifying that they have read the Local Rules of the Court and shall pay the required fee to the Clerk, provided that practitioners employed full-time by the United States of America may request exemption from the payment of such fee and the Clerk may grant such exemption. If the Court finds the application otherwise appropriate, upon payment of the required fee or upon the granting of an exemption by the Clerk to full-time employees of the United States of America, the Court may order the pro hac vice admission of the applicant. Revenues from pro hac vice admission fees shall be deposited in the District's non-appropriated funds account and disbursed on order of the Chief Judge of the District for such improvements to the Court's Administration of Justice as the Chief Judge finds appropriate.

(3) Except where a party conducts his or her own case, no pleading or notice required to be signed by counsel shall be filed unless signed by counsel who shall have been admitted to practice in this Court under subparagraphs (A), (B) and (C) of this Rule, with the office address where notice can be served upon said attorney, and who shall have such authority that the Court can deal with the attorney alone in all matters connected with the case. Such appearance shall not be withdrawn without leave of the Court. Service of notice or other proceedings on such an attorney shall be equivalent to service on the parties for whom the attorney appeared.

(E) Western District of Virginia. Any attorney admitted to practice in the Western District of Virginia shall be permitted to practice in the Courts of the Eastern District of Virginia upon the filing of a certificate from the Clerk of the Western District of Virginia showing that such attorney has been duly admitted to practice in that district.

(F) Attorneys Filing Pleadings. Any counsel presenting papers, suits or pleadings for filing, or making an appearance, must be members of the bar of this Court, or must have counsel who are members of the bar of this Court to join in the pleading by endorsement. Any counsel who joins in a pleading, motion, or other paper filed with the Court will be held accountable for the case by the Court. At least one person admitted to practice under subsection (C) of this Rule must personally be present at all hearings, pretrials, and trials. This obligation may not be avoided or delegated without leave of Court.

(G) Withdrawal of Appearance. No attorney who has entered an appearance in any civil or criminal action shall withdraw such appearance, or have it stricken from the record, except on order of the Court and after reasonable notice to the party on whose behalf said attorney has appeared.

(H) Practicing Before Admission or While Disbarred or Suspended. Any person who, before admission to the bar of this Court or during any disbarment or suspension, exercises any of the privileges of a member of the bar of this Court, or who pretends to be entitled so to do, shall be guilty of contempt of Court and subject to appropriate punishment therefor.

(I) Professional Ethics. With the exception of Virginia Rule of Professional Conduct 3.6 (the subject of which is covered by Local Criminal Rule 57), the ethical standards relating to the practice of law in this Court shall be the Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, as published in the version effective January 1, 2000.

(J) Courtroom Decorum. Counsel shall at all times conduct and demean themselves with dignity and propriety. When addressing the Court, counsel shall rise unless excused therefrom by the Court. All statements and communications to the Court shall be clearly and audibly made from a standing position at the counsel table or, if the Court is equipped with an attorney's lectern, from a standing position behind the lectern, facing the Court or the witness. Counsel shall not approach the bench unless requested to do so by the Court or unless permission is granted upon the request of counsel.

REV_00261699

Examination of witnesses shall be conducted by counsel standing behind the lectern or, if none, behind the counsel table. Counsel shall not approach the witness except for the purpose of presenting, inquiring about, or examining the witness with respect to an exhibit, unless otherwise permitted by the Court. Only one attorney for each party may participate in the examination or cross examination of a witness.

(K) Third-Year Law Student. An eligible law student qualifying pursuant to Paragraph II of the Plan for Third-Year Practice filed in each division of this Court is herewith given leave to participate in any civil or criminal case pursuant to said plan and as said plan may, from time to time, be amended. The Plan for Third-Year Practice is Appendix A to these Rules.

(L) Federal Rules of Disciplinary Enforcement. All counsel admitted to practice before this Court or admitted for the purpose of a particular proceeding (pro hac vice) shall be admitted subject to the rules, conditions and provisions set forth in full as Appendix B to these Rules.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA

APPLICATION TO QUALIFY AS A FOREIGN ATTORNEY UNDER LOCAL RULE 83.1(D)

In Case Number _____, Case Name_____

To: The Honorable Judges of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia

PERSONAL STATEMENT

FULL NAME (no initials, please)_____

Bar Identification Number _____ State _____

Firm Name _____

Firm Phone #_____ Direct Dial #_____
FAX #_____

E-Mail Address _____

Office Mailing Address _____

Name(s) of federal court(s) in which I have been admitted

I certify that the rules of the federal court(s) in which I have been admitted and have my office extend a similar pro hac vice admission privilege to members of the bar of the Eastern District of Virginia.

I have not been reprimanded in any court nor has there been any action in any court pertaining to my conduct or fitness as a member of the bar.

I hereby certify that within ninety (90) days prior to the submission of this application I have read (a) The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, (b) The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, (c) The Local Rules of this Court and (d) The Federal Rules of Evidence.

I am ___ am not ___ a full-time employee of the United States of America, and if so, request exemption from the admission fee.

_____
(Applicant's Signature)

I, the undersigned, do certify that I am a member of the bar of this Court, not related to the applicant; that I know the applicant personally, that the said applicant possesses all of the qualifications required for admission to the bar of this Court; that I have examined the applicant's personal statement. I affirm that his/her personal and professional character and standing are good, and petition the court to admit the applicant pro hac vice.

_____ Date_____
(Signature)

_____
(Typed or Printed Name)

Court Use Only:

Clerk's $25.00 Fee Paid_____ or Exemption Granted_____

The motion for admission is GRANTED _____ or DENIED_____

(Judge's Signature) _____

Date_____

(Rev. 8/31/00)

[Effective February 1, 1997; amended effective September 1, 2000.]

RULE 83.2 SALES AND DISTRIBUTION OF PROCEEDS OF SALES

(A) General. All sales shall be made by the United States Marshal, or an authorized Deputy United States Marshal in the name of the Marshal, and the provisions of Local Admiralty Rule (e)(15) subparagraphs (b); (c); (d) and (e) shall apply except as may be modified in this Rule.

(B) Confirmation by Court. All sales shall be subject to confirmation by the Court. The Marshal shall file with the Clerk on the day of sale a report thereof. An interested person may object to the sale by filing written objections with the Clerk within two (2) Court days following the sale in conformity with Local Admiralty Rule (e)(15)(c). If no objections are filed, the sale shall stand confirmed unless the Court orders otherwise within said time. If objections are filed within the said two days, the Clerk shall forthwith submit the report and objections to the Court for prompt disposition.

REV_00261700

(C) Marshal's Discretion in Certain Instances. The Marshal may decline to knock down a vessel or other property to the highest bidder when the highest bid, in his or her opinion, is grossly inadequate.

(D) Deposit of Sale Proceeds. The proceeds of all sales by the Marshal shall be forthwith paid into the registry of the Court to be disposed of according to law.

(E) Distributions. All distributions of the proceeds of any sale shall be by order of Court.

(F) Certain Maritime Liens. Maritime liens filed before sale, including liens filed by leave of Court at anytime prior to sale, shall be paid first. Maritime liens filed after sale shall be paid last. Liens in each of the foregoing two classes shall preserve their respective rank as among themselves, except in the case of maritime liens of the first class, the order of priority between such liens shall be that those which have accrued within one year prior to the filing of the complaint shall be paid first, and claims which have accrued theretofore shall be paid in the inverse order of the years in which they accrued.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 83.3 PHOTOGRAPHING, BROADCASTING AND TELEVISING IN COURTROOM AND ENVIRONS

(A) General. The taking of photographs and operation of tape recorders in the Courtroom or its environs, and radio or television broadcasting from the Courtroom or its environs during the progress of or in connection with judicial proceedings, including proceedings before a United States Magistrate Judge or Bankruptcy Judge, whether or not Court is actually in session, is prohibited. A judge may, however, permit (1) the use of electronic or photographic means for the presentation of evidence or the perpetuation of a record; and (2) the broadcasting, televising, recording, or photographing of investitive, ceremonial, or naturalization proceedings. Environs, as used in this Rule, shall include any floor on which any Courtroom or hearing room is located, including all hallways, stairways, windows, and elevators immediately adjacent to any such floor.

(B) Exception. With permission of the party or parties to be photographed, pictures may be taken by any permanent occupant of any office within the environs aforesaid when the Court is not in session.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 83.4 HABEAS CORPUS AND PROCEEDINGS IN FORMA PAUPERIS

(A) Standard Forms. All pro se petitions for writs of habeas corpus must be filed on a set of standardized forms to be supplied, upon request, by the Clerk without cost to the petitioner. Counsel filing a petition for writ of habeas corpus need not use a standardized form, but any petition shall contain essentially the same information as set forth on said form.

(B) Filing of Cases by Prisoners In Forma Pauperis. If a party desires to file a proceeding in forma pauperis under 28 U.S.C. § 1915(a), and if the party desiring to file such proceeding is then confined to a state or federal penal institution, the party shall, within thirty (30) days of the receipt of any order, accomplish one of the following:

(1) Remit the required filing fee to the Clerk of this Court, or

(2) Request an extension of time within which to pay the required fee and thereafter pay same, or

(3) Cause to be filed a statement of the prison account of the party showing (a) the amount on deposit in the prison account at the period beginning six months immediately preceding the submission of the complaint or petition herein, and (b) the deposits to that prison account within the six-month period, including the source of said funds so deposited in said account and the reasons for any withdrawal therefrom, and

(C) Effect of Permitting Partial Payment; Reconsideration of Status. Permission to proceed in forma pauperis by making a partial payment shall not be construed as authorizing the order of successive later payments after the order has been entered authorizing the party to proceed in forma pauperis. Whenever it appears that there may have been a change in the party's financial condition, the Court may reconsider whether the party may continue to proceed in forma pauperis.

(D) Site of Evidentiary Hearings—Prisoner Cases. In its discretion, the Court may conduct evidentiary hearings in prisoner cases at any penal institution in Virginia.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 83.5 COMMUNICATION WITH JURORS

No attorney or party litigant shall personally, or through any investigator or any other person acting for the attorney or party litigant, interview, examine or question any juror or alternate juror with respect to the verdict or deliberations of the jury in any action, civil or criminal, except on leave of court granted upon good cause shown and upon such conditions as the court shall fix.

REV_00261701

NORFOLK LAW LIBRARY Fax:7576224406 Jul 11 '01 16:06 P.19/19

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 83.6 SETTLEMENT AND ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION

(A) The Court encourages the parties to meet and consult with each other to achieve settlement. Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 651, 652, and 653, as amended by the Alternative Dispute Resolution Act of 1998, the use of mediation as an alternative dispute resolution process in all civil actions, including adversary proceedings in bankruptcy, is authorized. Before the initial pretrial conference or in the scheduling order, litigants in all civil cases shall be advised of the availability of mediation and may request it. The continued utilization of settlement conferences as a form of mediation is also authorized.

(B) The parties by consent may select and compensate any mutually acceptable non-judicial mediator or neutral. No mediator or neutral may be compensated by contingent fee. After mediation ends, the parties and the mediator or neutral shall file under seal a report stating (1) the name and address of the mediator or neutral; (2) his or her compensation and who paid it; and (3) the result of the mediation.

(C) All Active United States District Judges, Senior United States District Judges, United States Magistrate Judges and United States Bankruptcy Judges are authorized (a) to act as mediators or neutrals; and (b) to appoint as mediators or neutrals any appropriately trained non-judicial person, in which event the appointing Order shall establish the compensation to be paid for the services of such non-judicial person and shall schedule a time for completion of mediation. Any participant or potential participant in ADR who is able to establish an inability to pay a pro rata share of the neutral's proposed compensation, may petition this court for the appointment of a judicial neutral.

(D) The appointment of a mediator or neutral shall not operate to postpone or stay the scheduling of any case or controversy nor shall such appointment be grounds for the continuance of a previously scheduled trial date or the extension of any deadlines previously scheduled by the Court.

(E) The substance of communication in the mediation process shall not be disclosed to any person other than participants in the mediation process; provided, however, that nothing herein shall modify the application of Federal Rule of Evidence 408 nor shall use in the mediation process of an otherwise admissible document, object or statement preclude its use at trial.

(F) The Chief Judge of the District shall appoint an ADR Administrator for the District. Duties of the Administrator shall include the following: implementing, administering, overseeing and evaluating the Court's ADR programs; providing rules for the qualification of mediators and neutrals; and consulting with the Chief Judge of the District, members of the bar, and the United States Attorney relative to exempting specific cases or categories of cases from ADR.

(G) Disqualification of Neutrals. Neutrals shall be disqualified from participation in any case in which the individual, his or her law firm, group, or organization may be personally affected by the outcome of the mediation or their impartiality may be called into question. Accordingly, the provisions of 28 U.S.C. § 455 apply to neutrals by application of this Local Rule. Neutrals shall also refrain from activity that may call into question their impartiality, for example, acceptance of gifts or favors of any kind from a party.

[Effective September 1, 2000.]

LOCAL CRIMINAL RULES

LOCAL CRIMINAL RULE 6. GRAND JURY

(A) Charge to Grand Jury. When a new grand jury is first convened, the Court shall deliver its charge but, if recessed and later reconvened, the Court shall not be required again to charge the grand jury, but may do so if deemed appropriate.

(B) Unless otherwise ordered by the Court, grand jurors selected for service shall be convened at the following locations:

(1) At Alexandria—on the first Tuesday in each month except July.

(2) At Norfolk—on the second Monday in each month.

(3) At Richmond—on the third Monday in each month except August.

(4) At Newport News—as ordered.

Whenever a Monday falls upon a legal holiday, the grand jury may be directed to convene on the next succeeding business day which is not a legal holiday, without the necessity of an order of Court. Grand jurors for each respective division of the Court shall be selected in accordance with the Jury Selection Act and the district plan implementing same.

[Effective February 1, 1997; amended effective September 1, 2000.]

LOCAL CRIMINAL RULE 12. CRIMINAL CASES—MOTIONS

(A) General. Within eleven (11) days from the date of arraignment, or such other time as may be

REV_00261702

Rule
(A) Issuance of Subpoenas.
(B) Return Date of Subpoenas.
(C) Proof of Service of Subpoenas.
(D) Subpoenas to Officials.
(E) Timely Service of Subpoenas for Trial or Hearings.
(F) Deposition Subpoenas.
(G) Civil Actions—Place of Taking Deposition.
(H) Subpoenas in Blank.
47. Jurors.
(A) Jury Lists.
(B) Peremptory Challenges.
48. Number of Jurors—Civil Actions.
51. Proposed Jury Instructions and Voir Dire.
54. Costs—Notice of Appeal—Jury Costs.
(A) Payment in Advance.
(B) Stipulation for Costs for Certain Admiralty and Maritime Claims.
(C) Bond Premiums.
(D) Taxable Costs And Procedure For Taxing Costs.
(E) Excessive and Unnecessary Costs.
(F) Notice of Appeal, Fees.
(G) Jury Costs.
56. Summary Judgment.
(A) Summary Judgment—Time of Filing.
(B) Summary Judgment—Listing of Undisputed Facts.
62. Appeal Bond—Exemption From.
(A) Exemption.
(B) Alternate to Supersedeas Bond.
65. Sureties—Security—Bondsman.
(A) Security.
(B) Prohibited Sureties.
(C) Powers of Clerk.
(D) Professional Bondsman.
67. Deposits Into Court.
Deposit Into Court Procedure.
71a. Land Condemnation Actions.
72. United States Magistrate Judges—Duties.
79. Exhibits and Depositions.
(A) Trial Exhibits.
(B) Custody and Disposition of Models and Exhibits.
(C) Disposition of Exhibits, Depositions, in Civil Cases.
80. Official Court Reporters Transcripts—Hearing on Transcripts—Record on Appeal.
(A) Preparation of Transcript.
(B) Court Reporter Management Plan.
(C) Release of Transcript.
(D) Obligation to Pay Court Reporter.
(E) Record on Appeal.
(F) Daily or Expedited Copy.
83.1 Attorneys and Pro Se Parties.
(A) Eligibility.
(B) Initial Appearance.
(C) Procedure for Admission.
(D) Foreign Attorneys.
(E) Western District of Virginia.
(F) Attorneys Filing Pleadings.
(G) Withdrawal of Appearance.
(H) Practicing Before Admission or While Disbarred or Suspended.
(I) Professional Ethics.
(J) Courtroom Decorum.
(K) Third-Year Law Student.
(L) Federal Rules of Disciplinary Enforcement.
Application to Qualify as a Foreign Attorney Under Local Rule 83.1(D).
83.2 Sales and Distribution of Proceeds of Sales.
Rule
(A) General.
(B) Confirmation by Court.
(C) Marshal's Discretion in Certain Instances.
(D) Deposit of Sale Proceeds.
(E) Distributions.
(F) Certain Maritime Liens.
83.3 Photographing, Broadcasting and Televising in Courtroom and Environs.
(A) General.
(B) Exception.
83.4 Habeas Corpus and Proceedings in Forma Pauperis.
(A) Standard Forms.
(B) Filing of Cases by Prisoners In Forma Pauperis.
(C) Effect of Permitting Partial Payment; Reconsideration of Status.
(D) Site of Evidentiary Hearings—Prisoner Cases.
83.5 Communication With Jurors.
83.6 Settlement and Alternative Dispute Resolution.

LOCAL CRIMINAL RULES

6. Grand Jury.
(A) Charge to Grand Jury.
(B) [Untitled].
12. Criminal Cases—Motions.
(A) General.
(B) Style of Motions.
24. Trial Jurors.
30. Instructions.
55. Disposition of Exhibits in Criminal Cases.
57. Free Press—Fair Trial Directives.
(A) Potential or Imminent Criminal Litigation.
(B) Grand Jury Proceedings.
(C) Pending Criminal Proceedings—Specific Topics.
(D) Pending Criminal Proceedings—General.
(E) Provisos.
(F) Court Personnel.
(G) Motions.
(H) Open Court.
58. Collateral Payments.

LOCAL ADMIRALTY RULES

(a). Authority and Scope.
LAR (a)(1) Authority.
LAR (a)(2) Scope.
LAR (a)(3) Citation.
LAR (a)(4) Officers of Court.
(b). Maritime Attachment and Garnishment.
LAR (b)(1) "Not Found Within the District" Defined.
LAR (b)(2) Affidavit That Defendant is Not Found Within the District.
LAR (b)(3) Ownership of Property.
LAR (b)(4) Use of State Procedures.
(c). Actions in Rem: special Provisions.
LAR (c)(1) Undertaking in Lieu of Arrest.
LAR (c)(2) Intangible Property.
LAR (c)(3) Publication of Notice of Action and Arrest.
LAR (c)(4) Default in Action In Rem.
LAR (c)(5) Entry of Default and Default Judgment.
(d). Possessory, Petitory and Partition Actions.
(e). Actions in Rem and Quasi in Rem: General Provisions.
LAR (e)(1) Itemized Demand for Judgment.
LAR (e)(2) Salvage Actions Complaints.
LAR (e)(3) Verification of Pleadings.
LAR (e)(4) Review by Judicial Officer.
LAR (e)(5) [Untitled].

REV_00261686

Rule
LAR (e)(6) Marshal's Forms.
LAR (e)(7) Property in Possession of United States Officer.
LAR (e)(8) Security for Costs.
LAR (e)(9) Increased Security for Costs.
LAR (e)(10) Marshal's Fees and Expenses.
LAR (e)(11) Appraisal.
LAR (e)(12) Adversary Hearing.
LAR (e)(13) Intervenors' Claims.
LAR (e)(14) Custody of Property.
LAR (e)(15) Sale of Property.
(f). Limitation of Liability.
LAR (f)(1) Security for Costs.
LAR (f)(2) Order of Proof at Trial.
LAR (f)(3) Compliance With Supplemental Rule F(4).

APPENDICES

App.
A. Plan for Third Year Practice Rule.
B. Federal Rules of Disciplinary Enforcement.

LOCAL RULES

RULE 1. SCOPE OF RULES

(A) Application. These rules, made pursuant to the authority granted by Fed.R.Civ.P. 83 and Fed. R.Crim.P. 57 for the United States District Courts, as prescribed by the Supreme Court of the United States, so far as not inconsistent therewith, shall apply in all civil actions, criminal cases, and other proceedings in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia.

(B) Statutory Rules. 1 U.S.C. §§ 1–5, inclusive, shall, as far as applicable, govern the construction of these rules.

(C) Effective Date of Amendments. Amendments to these Local Rules shall take effect on the date of entry of the order authorizing the amendments and shall govern all proceedings thereafter commenced and, insofar as just and practicable, all then pending proceedings.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 3. AREA AND DIVISIONS

(A) Area. The Eastern District of Virginia consists of the counties, cities and towns specified in 28 U.S.C. § 127, and the places for holding Court within the district are prescribed as Alexandria, Newport News, Norfolk and Richmond.

(B) Divisions. This district shall be divided into four divisions to be designated as the Alexandria, Newport News, Norfolk and Richmond Divisions; the place for holding Court for each of said divisions shall be the city whose name the division bears, and the territory comprising, and embraced in, each of the said divisions shall be as follows:

(1) The Alexandria Division shall consist of the City of Alexandria and the Counties of Loudoun, Fairfax, Fauquier, Arlington, Prince William, and Stafford and any other city or town geographically within the exterior boundaries of said counties.

(2) The Newport News Division shall consist of the Cities of Newport News, Hampton and Williamsburg, and the Counties of York, James City, Gloucester, Mathews, and any other city or town geographically within the exterior boundaries of said counties.

(3) The Norfolk Division shall consist of the Cities of Norfolk, Portsmouth, Suffolk, Franklin, Virginia Beach, Chesapeake, and Cape Charles, and the Counties of Accomack, Northampton, Isle of Wight, Southampton, and any other city or town geographically within the exterior boundaries of said counties.

(4) The Richmond Division shall consist of the Cities of Richmond, Petersburg, Hopewell, Colonial Heights and Fredericksburg, and the Counties of Amelia, Brunswick, Caroline, Charles City, Chesterfield, Dinwiddie, Essex, Goochland, Greensville, Hanover, Henrico, King and Queen, King George, King William, Lancaster, Lunenburg, Mecklenburg, Middlesex, New Kent, Northumberland, Nottoway, Powhatan, Prince Edward, Prince George, Richmond, Spotsylvania, Surry, Sussex, Westmoreland, and any other city or town geographically within the exterior boundaries of said counties.

(5) All of the waters, and the lands under such waters, adjacent and opposite to any city, county or town shall be a part of the division of which said city, county or town is a part, and wherever there are any waters between any city, county or town which are in different divisions, then such waters and land under them shall be considered to be in both divisions.

(6) In the event of any annexation or merger of any cities and/or counties the land lying within the merged or annexed area shall be deemed within the exterior boundaries of the original city or county to the same intent and purpose as if the annexation or merger had not occurred, unless otherwise modified by local rule.

(C) Division in Which Suits to Be Instituted. Civil actions for which venue is proper in this district shall be brought in the proper division, as well. The venue rules stated in 28 U.S.C. § 1391 et seq. also shall apply to determine the proper division in which an action shall be filed. For the purpose of determining the proper division in which to lay venue, the venue rules stated in 28 U.S.C. § 1391 et seq. shall be construed as if the terms "judicial district" and "district" were replaced with the term "division." However, the Clerk's office in any division shall accept for filing new complaints which, venue excepted, are in proper form. Such complaints shall be filed on the day submitted, stamped as having been "filed," deemed "filed" for all purposes, and forwarded to the division where venue lies for further proceedings.

REV_00261687

NORFOLK LAW LIBRARY Fax:7576224406 Jul 11 '01 15:53 P.05/19

[Effective February 1, 1997; amended effective September 1, 2000.]

RULE 4. SERVICE AND RETURN OF SUMMONS—ABATEMENT

(A) Service and Abatement. If service of a summons and complaint is sought other than under Fed. R.Civ.P. 4(d) but is not effected, the Marshal or other person responsible for effecting service shall return the summons and complaint to the Clerk with an endorsement thereon stating the reasons for failure to effect service.

All waivers of service obtained under Fed.R.Civ.P. 4(d) shall be filed within five (5) days after they are returned to plaintiff. Unless, within one hundred and twenty (120) days after the complaint is filed, a defendant has been served or has appeared or has waived service, the Clerk shall abate the action and dismiss it without prejudice as to such defendant(s) after having given, but received no response to, the notice required by Fed.R.Civ.P. 4(m).

Where the United States, its officers, corporations or agencies are served by mail pursuant to Fed. R.Civ.P. 4(i)(1)(A), service shall be effective on the date of the postmark or on the date received if there is no postmark or it is illegible. The United States Attorney shall file a certificate reporting the postmark and receipt dates.

(B) Withholding Service. Requests by a party to withhold the service of a summons and complaint, or a third-party summons and complaint upon parties as to whom waiver of service provisions are inapplicable shall not be granted by the Clerk without leave of Court first obtained; provided, however, that a party may request the Clerk to withhold the issuance and service of an in rem process upon advising the Clerk that the property subject to arrest or attachment is not within the jurisdiction or that arrangements have been made for the acceptance of service.

(C) Civil Cover Sheet. The Clerk shall require a complete and executed AO Form JS 44(a), Civil Cover Sheet, to accompany each civil action filed except as to actions filed by prisoners and other litigants proceeding pro se.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 7. MOTIONS—CONTINUANCES—COURT ORDERS

(A) Grounds and Relief to Be Stated. All motions shall state with particularity the grounds therefor and shall set forth the relief or order sought.

(B) Address and Telephone Number of Attorney And Pro Se Litigants. All pleadings and motions shall include the attorney's office address and telephone number. All pleadings filed by non-prisoner litigants proceeding pro se shall contain an address where notice can be served on such person and a telephone number where such person can be reached or a message left. All pleadings filed by prisoners proceeding pro se shall contain an address where notice can be served on such person.

(C) Use of Forms. Motions and interrogatories on printed forms, multigraphed, mimeographed, or in any manner reproduced by machine process, other than a typewriter, computer or word processor, shall not be permitted unless the attorney filing same has deleted all extraneous matter and certifies that he or she has carefully reviewed the remaining portions and in good faith believes that the contents are pertinent to the case.

(D) Return Date. Except as otherwise provided by an order of the Court or by these Rules, all motions shall be made returnable to the time obtained from and scheduled by the Court for a hearing thereon. The moving party shall be responsible to set the motion for hearing or to arrange with opposing counsel for submission of the motion without oral argument. Unless otherwise ordered, a motion shall be deemed withdrawn if the movant does not set it for hearing (or arrange to submit it without a hearing) within thirty (30) days after the date on which the motion is filed. The non-moving party also may arrange for a hearing. Before endeavoring to secure an appointment for a hearing on any motion, it shall be incumbent upon the counsel desiring such hearing to meet and confer in person or by telephone with his or her opposing counsel in a good-faith effort to narrow the area of disagreement. In the absence of any agreement, such conference shall be held in the office of the attorney nearest the Court in the division in which the action is pending. In any division which has a regularly scheduled motions day, the motion should be noticed for the first permissible motions day.

(E) Briefs Required:

(1) All motions, unless otherwise directed by the Court and except as noted hereinbelow in subsection 7(E)(2), shall be accompanied by a written brief setting forth a concise statement of the facts and supporting reasons, along with a citation of the authorities upon which the movant relies. Unless otherwise directed by the Court, the opposing party shall file a responsive brief and such supporting documents as are appropriate, within eleven (11) days after service and the moving party may file a rebuttal brief within three (3) days after the service of the opposing party's reply brief. No further briefs or written communications may be filed without first obtaining leave of Court.

REV_00261688

(2) Briefs need not accompany motions: (a) for a more definite statement; (b) for an extension of time to respond to pleadings, unless the time has already expired; and (c) for a default judgment.

(3) Except for good cause shown in advance of filing, opening and responsive briefs, exclusive of affidavits and supporting documentation, shall not exceed thirty (30) 8½ inch × 11 inch pages double-spaced using 10 pitch typeface and rebuttal briefs shall not exceed twenty (20) such pages.

(F) Continuances. Motions for continuances of a trial or hearing date shall not be granted by the mere agreement of counsel. Any such motion will be considered by the Court only in the presence of all counsel, and no continuance will be granted other than for good cause and upon such terms as the Court may impose.

(G) Filing of Pleadings. After the filing of the complaint, all pleadings, motions, briefs and filings of any kind must be timely filed with the Clerk's office of the division in which the case is pending.

(H) Extensions. Any requests for an extension of time relating to motions must be in writing and, in general, will be looked upon with disfavor.

(I) Determination of Motions Without Oral Hearing. In accordance with Fed. R. Civ. P. 78, the Court may rule upon motions without an oral hearing.

(J) Motions Against Pro Se Parties. It shall be the obligation of counsel for any party who files any dispositive or partially dispositive motion addressed to a party who is appearing in the action without counsel, to attach to, or include at the foot of, the motion, a warning consistent with the requirements of Roseboro v. Garrison, 528 F.2d 309 (4th Cir. 1975). The warning shall state that:

(1) The pro se party is entitled to file a response opposing the motion and that any such response must be filed within twenty (20) days of the date on which the dispositive or partially dispositive motion is filed; and

(2) The Court could dismiss the action on the basis of the moving party's papers if the pro se party does not file a response; and

(3) The pro se party must identify all facts stated by the moving party with which the pro se party disagrees and must set forth the pro se party's version of the facts by offering affidavits (written statements signed before a notary public and under oath) or by filing sworn statements (bearing a certificate that it is signed under penalty of perjury); and

(4) The pro se is also entitled to file a legal brief in opposition to the one filed by the moving party.

(K) Court Orders—Objections Noted. Whenever counsel shall endorse an order and note with such endorsement any objection to the order, unless the grounds of such objection have been previously stated in the record, or unless the grounds are set forth in writing at the time and as a part of the endorsement, or a request made to the Court for a hearing, it will be assumed the objection is without effect and waived.

[Effective February 1, 1997; amended effective September 1, 2000.]

RULE 7.1 FINANCIAL DISCLOSURE

(A) Required Disclosure. A nongovernmental corporation, partnership, trust, other similar entity that is a party to, or that appears in, an action or proceeding in this Court shall:

(1) file two copies of a statement that

a. identifies all its parent entities (corporate or otherwise), and also identifies any publicly held entity (corporate or otherwise) that owns 10% or more of its stock; or

b. states that there is nothing to report under Rule 7.1(A)(1)(a); and

(2) file a supplemental statement containing such additional information as may be from time to time required by the Judicial Conference of the United States or this Court.

(B) Time for Filing. A statement or form required by Rule 7.1(A) shall be filed within fourteen (14) days of the party's first appearance, pleading, petition, motion, response, or other request addressed to the Court, except that the statement or form required by Rule 7.1(A) shall be filed simultaneously with any request for emergency relief such as a motion for temporary restraining order. A supplemental statement or form shall be filed promptly upon any change in the circumstances that Rule 7.1(A) requires the party to identify.

(C) Statement Delivered to Judge. The Clerk shall deliver a copy of the Rule 7.1(A) disclosure to each judge acting in the action or proceeding.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA

_____

vs. Civil/Criminal Action No._____

_____

REV_00261689

FINANCIAL INTEREST DISCLOSURE STATEMENT

Pursuant to Local Rule 7.1 of the Eastern District of Virginia and to enable Judges and Magistrate Judges to evaluate possible disqualification or recusal, the undersigned counsel for _____ in the above captioned action, certifies that the following are parents, trusts, subsidiaries and/or affiliates of said party that have issued shares or debt securities to the public or own more than ten percent of the stock of the following:

_____

_____

Or

Pursuant to Local Rule 7.1 of the Eastern District of Virginia and to enable Judges and Magistrate Judges to evaluate possible disqualifications or recusal, the undersigned counsel for _____ in the above captioned action, certifies that there are no parents, trusts, subsidiaries and/or affiliates of said party that have issued shares or debt securities to the public.

Date

Signature of Attorney or Litigant Counsel for_____

Note: Under L.R. 7.1(A)(1), this form is to be filed in duplicate with the Clerk of Court.

Rev. 8/31/00

[Effective September 1, 2000.]

RULE 16. PRETRIAL CONFERENCE

(A) Applicability of Rule 16. Proceedings upon a defendant's default and matters involving habeas corpus petitions, other pro se prisoner petitions, bankruptcy proceedings, condemnation cases, motions to vacate, reduce or modify sentences, probation violations, forfeitures, and reviews from administrative agencies, are not subject to the provisions of this rule, but the judge to whom any such case is assigned may, in his or her discretion, follow the procedure outlined herein in whole or in part in any case. (See, Fed. R.Civ.P. 16(b)).

(B) Initial Pretrial Conference and Order and Scheduling Order. In all other civil actions, as promptly as possible after a complaint or notice of removal has been filed, the Court shall schedule an initial pretrial conference to be conducted in accordance with Fed.R.Civ.P. 16(b), and in addition thereto, or in lieu thereof, not later than ninety (90) days from first appearance or one hundred and twenty (120) days after service of the complaint, the Court shall enter an order fixing the cut-off dates for the respective parties to complete the processes of discovery, the date for a final pretrial conference and, whenever practicable, the trial date, and providing for any other administrative or management matters permitted by Fed.R.Civ.P. 16 or by law generally.

The parties and their counsel are bound by the dates specified in any such orders and no extensions or continuances thereof shall be granted in the absence of a showing of good cause. Mere failure on the part of counsel to proceed promptly with the normal processes of discovery shall not constitute good cause for an extension or continuance.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 26. DISCOVERY AND EXPERT DISCLOSURE

(A) Inapplicability of Certain Discovery Requirements.

(1) The provisions of Fed.R.Civ.P. 30(a)(2)(C) (oral depositions); Fed.R.Civ.P. 31(a)(2)(C) (depositions by written questions); Fed.R.Civ.P. 33(a) (written interrogatories); Fed.R.Civ.P. 34(b) requests for production and entry); and Fed.R.Civ.P. 36(a) (requests for admission) that a party may not serve such discovery before the time specified in Fed.R.Civ.P. 26(d) will not apply in this District.

(2) The provisions of Fed.R.Civ.P. 26(a)(1) (that a party shall provide certain initial disclosure without awaiting a discovery request); Fed.R.Civ.P. 26(d) (that a party may not seek discovery from any source before the parties have met and conferred as required by Fed.R.Civ.P. 26(f)); Fed.R.Civ.P. 26(f) (that the parties meet and plan for discovery prior to a scheduling conference); Fed.R.Civ.P. 30(a)(2)(A) (that a party must obtain leave of Court to take more than ten depositions); Fed.R.Civ.P. 32(a)(3) (that a deposition taken without leave of Court pursuant to a notice under Fed.R.Civ.P. Rule 30(a)(2)(C) shall not be used against a party who demonstrates that, when served with the notice, it was unable through the exercise of diligence to obtain counsel to represent it at the taking of the deposition); and Fed.R.Civ.P. 33(a) (that limits the number of written interrogatories to 25 in number including all discrete subparts), will not apply in this District.

(3) A deposition taken without leave of Court pursuant to a notice under Fed.R.Civ.P. 30(a)(1) before the time required by Fed.R.Civ.P. 12 for filing an answer or responsive pleading shall not be used against a party who demonstrates that, when served with the notice, it was unable through the exercise of diligence to obtain counsel to represent it at the taking of the deposition.

(B) Requirement of a Writing. All objections to interrogatories, depositions, requests, or applications under Fed.R.Civ.P. 26 through 37, as well as all motions and replies thereto concerning discovery matters, shall be in writing. If time does not permit the filing of a written motion, the Court may, in its discretion, waive this requirement.

(C) Objections to Discovery Process. Unless otherwise ordered by the Court, an objection to any interrogatory, request, or application under Fed. R.Civ.P. 26 through 37, shall be served within fifteen (15) days after the service of the interrogatories, request, or application, except that a defendant may serve any such objection within thirty (30) days after service of the summons and complaint upon that defendant and, within forty-five (45) days after service of the summons and complaint, shall serve responses to interrogatories, requests or applications that are served with the complaint and as to which no objection is made. The Court may allow a shorter or longer time. Any such objection shall be specifically stated. Any such objection shall not extend the time within which the objecting party must otherwise answer or respond to any discovery matter to which no specific objection has been made.

REV_00261690

(D) Expert Disclosures.

(1) Agreement Upon Disclosure. Counsel are encouraged to agree upon the sequence and timing of the expert disclosures required by Fed.R.Civ.P. 26(a)(2). All such agreements must be in the form of a consent order entered by the Court.

(2) Timing of Mandatory Disclosure. Absent such a consent order or unless ordered otherwise, the disclosures required by Fed.R.Civ.P. 26(a)(2) shall be made first by the plaintiff not later than sixty (60) days before the earlier of the date set for completion of discovery or for the final pretrial conference, if any; then by the defendant thirty (30) days thereafter. Plaintiff shall disclose fifteen (15) days thereafter any evidence that is solely contradictory or rebuttal evidence to the defendant's disclosure.

(3) Completion of Disclosure. Whether accomplished by agreement pursuant to subsection 26(D)(1) or pursuant to the schedule set by subsection 26(D)(2), all parties shall complete all forms of expert disclosure and discovery not later than thirty (30) days after the date upon which plaintiff is, or would be, required by subsection 26(B)(2) to disclose contradictory or rebuttal evidence.

(4) General Provisions. For purposes of this rule, counter-claim plaintiffs, cross-claimants and third-party plaintiffs shall be plaintiffs as to all elements of the counter-claim, cross-claim or third-party claim. Answers to interrogatories directed at clarification of the written reports of expert witnesses disclosed pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 26(a)(2) shall be due fifteen (15) days after service.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 30. DEPOSITIONS—EXPENSES—SUMMARIES—REVIEWING DEPOSITIONS

(A) Discovery. Any party, or representative (officer, director or managing agent), of a party, filing a civil action in the proper division of this Court, must ordinarily be required, upon request, to submit to a deposition at a place designated within the division. Exceptions to this general rule may be made on order of the Court when the party, or representative of a party, is of such age or physical condition, or special circumstances exist, as may reasonably interfere with the orderly taking of a deposition at a place within the division. A defendant, who becomes a counterclaimant, cross-claimant or third-party plaintiff, shall be considered as having filed an action in this court for the purpose of this Rule. This subsection shall not apply to an involuntary plaintiff nor an interpleader plaintiff.

(B) Recording and Transcribing Transcript of Discovery Deposition. The expense of recording a deposition shall be paid by the party seeking to take same. The expense of transcribing the deposition shall be paid by any party ordering the preparation of the original. Any other party desiring a copy of said deposition shall pay for same at the copy rate. Parties may, by agreement, equally share the costs of attendance and transcribing, including such copies as desired.

(C) Attorneys' Fees. Unless the services of associate counsel are retained, in lieu of travel expense, it is not the policy of the Court to make an allowance of counsel fees in attending any deposition, except to the extent provided by statute, and otherwise in this Rule, but the Court reserves the right to make a reasonable allowance where the circumstances of the case may justify same.

(D) Security for Travel Expense. Any party desiring to take the deposition of a witness (not a party or representative of a party) for discovery or use at trial, or a party or representative of a party as ordered by the Court under (A), beyond a division of the Court in which the action is pending, shall, if such testimony cannot be readily procured in another manner, prepay or secure the reasonable cost of travel of not more than one opposing counsel to the place of taking the deposition and return therefrom, but in no event shall the reasonable costs of travel exceed an amount which would reasonably be required to be paid to associate counsel in the area in which the deposition is being taken unless insufficient time is allowed in giving the notice to take depositions.

(E) Travel Expense. The "costs of travel" as provided in this Rule shall consist of the reasonable costs of travel by air or other public transportation, or an allowance for travel by private automobile at the prevailing rate per mile as may be provided for federal government employees on official business, whichever means of transportation is reasonably selected and used, including the cost of transportation from the office or residence to the terminal of the public transportation and from the destination terminal to the place of the taking of the deposition, and reasonable overnight accommodations, if deemed reasonably necessary, and return. The Court may, in its discretion, make a reasonable allowance for food.

REV_00261691

The "cost of travel," as herein defined, shall apply to any witness (not a party or the representative of a party) required to attend the taking of a deposition. As to any witness attending a trial or hearing in a civil action, pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 45(b)(2), the expense of such "cost of travel" shall be taxed as costs if said witness testifies or if it is reasonably necessary for the witness to appear, but said "costs of travel" shall be limited to what would have been expended if said witness resided at one hundred (100) miles from the place of the trial or hearing, together with such reasonable allowance, if required for the purpose of the witness testifying, for overnight accommodations and food. If the witness resided within one hundred (100) miles of the place of trial or hearing, the "cost of travel" shall be limited to the mileage and attendance fees as provided by law.

(F) Reviewing Depositions. Whenever depositions are expected to be presented in evidence, counsel shall, before the final pretrial conference or, if same are not then available, before the day of trial, review such depositions and (1) extract therefrom a short statement of the qualifications of any expert witness to read to the jury, (2) eliminate unnecessary and/or irrelevant matters, and (3) eliminate all objections and statements of counsel to avoid reading same to a jury. In the event counsel are unable to agree on what shall be eliminated, they shall submit to the Court for a ruling thereon before the date of trial. Failure to do so will constitute a waiver of objections.

(G) Summaries of Depositions. In all nonjury cases, counsel shall attach to any deposition a summary of the examination of the testimony of each witness, thereby pointing out the salient points to be noted by the Court.

(H) Reasonable Notice. As a general rule, eleven (11) days in advance of the contemplated taking of a deposition shall constitute reasonable notice of the taking of a deposition in the continental United States, but this will vary according to the complexity of the contemplated testimony and the urgency of taking the deposition of a party or witness at a particular time and place.

(I) Limits on Depositions. Unless otherwise permitted by the Court for good cause shown, such permission being granted only upon written motion to the Court pursuant to Local Rule 7, no party shall take more than five (5) depositions of non-party, non-expert witnesses, including depositions to be used at trial pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 32(a)(3), whether upon oral examination pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 30, or upon written questions pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 31. Any party may be deposed. This limit may not be waived by agreement of counsel.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 33. INTERROGATORIES

Unless otherwise permitted by the Court for good cause shown, such permission being granted only upon written motion to the Court pursuant to Local Rule 7, no party shall serve upon any other party, at any one time or cumulatively, more than thirty (30) written interrogatories, including all parts and sub-parts. This limit may not be waived by agreement of counsel.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 37. MOTIONS TO COMPEL AND SANCTIONS

(A) Motions to Compel. After a discovery request is objected to, or not complied with, within time, and if not otherwise resolved, it is the responsibility of the party initiating discovery to place the matter before the Court by a proper motion pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 37, to compel an answer, production, designation or inspection. Such motion must be accompanied by a brief as required by Local Rule 37(B).

(B) Briefing of Discovery Motions. Unless otherwise ordered, the scheduling and page limitation provisions of Local Rule 7(E) shall apply to all discovery motions; provided that the Court may elect to decide discovery motions without briefing.

(C) Compliance With Discovery Orders. After the Court has ruled on a discovery motion, any answer, production, designation, inspection, or examination required by the Court shall be completed within eleven (11) days after the entry of the order on the motion, unless otherwise ordered by the Court.

(D) Failure to Comply With Order. A party objecting to the failure of another party to comply with an order on a discovery motion shall be responsible for bringing the non-compliance before the Court by a proper motion for supplementary relief pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 37.

(E) Consultation Among Counsel. Counsel shall confer to decrease, in every way possible the filing of unnecessary discovery motions. No motion concerning discovery matters may be filed until counsel shall have conferred in person or by telephone to explore with opposing counsel the possibility of resolving the discovery matters in controversy. The Court will not consider any motion concerning discovery matters unless the motion is accompanied by a statement of counsel that a good faith effort has been made between counsel to resolve the discovery matters at issue.

(F) Extensions. Depending upon the facts of the particular case, the Court in its discretion may, upon appropriate written motion by a party, allow an extension of time in excess of the time provided by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, these Rules, or previous Court order, within which to respond to or complete discovery or to reply to discovery motions.

REV_00261692

Any agreement between counsel relating to any extension of time is of no force or effect; only the Court, after appropriate motion directed thereto, may grant leave for any extension of time. Unless otherwise specifically provided, such extension will be upon the specific condition that, regardless of what may be divulged by such discovery, it will not in any manner alter the schedule of dates and procedure previously adopted by the Court in the particular case.

(G) Unnecessary Discovery Motions or Objections. The presentation to the Court of unnecessary discovery motions, and the presentation to another party or non-party of unnecessary discovery requests of any kind, as well as any unwarranted opposition to proper discovery proceedings, will subject such party to appropriate remedies and sanctions, including the imposition of costs and counsel fees.

(H) Sanctions. Should any party or attorney fail to comply with any of the provisions of this Local Rule 37, or otherwise fail or refuse to meet and confer in good faith in an effort to narrow the areas of disagreement concerning discovery, sanctions provided by Fed.R.Civ.P. 37, may be imposed.

(I) Filing of Discovery and Responses. Except for a party proceeding pro se unless otherwise permitted by the Court on its own initiative or for good cause shown by motion under Fed.R.Civ.P. 5(d), discovery materials, depositions upon oral examination and upon written questions, interrogatories, requests for documents, requests for admission, notices for depositions and production, requests for disclosure of expert information, expert information, disclosures, and answers and responses or objections to such discovery requests shall not be filed with the pleadings or papers in any case. Where specific discovery material may appropriately support or oppose a motion, the specific discovery material in question shall be appended as an exhibit to the motion, or in response thereto, without having been previously filed. Discovery material otherwise permitted to be used at trial may be properly so used, if otherwise admissible, without having been previously filed except by parties proceeding pro se.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 38. DEMAND FOR JURY TRIAL

Any demand for jury in a civil action must be in writing and filed strictly in accordance with Fed. R.Civ.P. 38. Removal actions shall be governed by Fed.R.Civ.P. 81(C). In the event another party is added, the additional party may demand trial by jury at any time within twenty (20) days after such party is served with process or summons.

[Effective February 1, 1997.]

RULE 45. SUBPOENAS

(A) Issuance of Subpoenas. Attorneys of record in an action, or associates in firms of record, as officers of the Court, shall issue all subpoenas in the action as authorized by Fed.R.Civ.P. 45(a)(3).

Parties appearing pro se may apply for subpoenas in their own behalf. All such requests by such party must be accompanied by a memorandum setting forth the names and addresses of witnesses or the documents requested and why and for what purpose or purposes. All such requests by pro se parties shall be referred to a Judge or Magistrate Judge of this Court who shall first determine whether the requested subpoena shall issue; provided, however, that such determination shall not preclude any witness or person summoned or other interested party from later contesting the subpoena.

(B) Return Date of Subpoenas. All subpoenas shall be made returnable to the place, date and time of trial or hearing, unless otherwise ordered by the Court.

(C) Proof of Service of Subpoenas. In civil actions, the party issuing a subpoena for a trial, a hearing or contempt proceedings, or when it is otherwise necessary to file proof of service, shall file proof of service in the form required by Fed.R.Civ.P. 45(b)(3). Any such proof of service shall be filed promptly and, in any event, within the time during which the person served must respond to the subpoena. Lawyers and parties proceeding pro se shall file with the proof of service in civil actions, or before a witness is required to testify in criminal cases, a certificate that all required witness fees and expenses were served with the subpoena requiring the attendance of the witness.

(D) Subpoenas to Officials. Without first obtaining permission of the Court, no subpoena shall issue for the attendance at any hearing, trial or deposition of (1) the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or Attorney General of any State; (2) a Judge of any Court; (3) the President or Vice–President of the United States; (4) any member of the President's Cabinet; (5) any Ambassador or Consul; or (6) any military officer holding the rank of Admiral or General.

(E) Timely Service of Subpoenas for Trial or Hearings. Except as otherwise ordered by the Court for good cause shown, subpoenas for attendance of witnesses at hearings or trials in civil actions shall be served not later than fourteen (14) days before the date of the hearing or trial.

(F) Deposition Subpoenas. Proof of service of a notice to take depositions as provided in Fed.R.Civ.P. 30(b) and 31(b) constitutes sufficient authorization for the issuance of a subpoena by the Clerk for the district in which the deposition is to be taken for the attendance of persons named or described therein. Except as otherwise ordered by the Court for good

REV_00261693

Diana L. Schacht
07/10/2001 06:51:10 PM

Record Type: Record

To: Jay P. Lefkowitz/OMB/EOP@EOP, Courtney S. Elwood/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc: Kristen Silverberg/WHO/EOP@EOP
Subject: tort reform

would you please look over this memo and give me your comments? I need to deliver it to Josh later tonight, or early tomorrow at the latest. Thanks for your help and your contributions. This will not be the last opportunity to put things on the list, but if you have anything else you wish to add now, that would be great.

tort reform proposals.doc

C produced the ded a way out of the 1 his lawyer and the suit. Nevertheless, dant's lawyer under easonable inference iat of a purpose to en to the exception easonable inference trinsic evidence.
ruling on the excep-appears appropriate ception by a single ence may be used.
the degree to which privileged material.
stion which if yield-
e extrinsic evidence sh with the requisite where illegal purpose etween attorney and tion, the interest in
) of the preliminary low the communica-
1, a line of examina-mative results would ght require that the r to his allegation of
:h one might infer a advocated earlier in to apply. Although he exception focuses ttacking privilege on rule is that the overions of privilege lies burden is eased con-ve the effect of shift-iming that the future

two-step procedure,
t step, to determine
eged communication.
ep reached, it would ght to return to the e crime or tort excep-nents that define and

1 1 (1943); McCormick

UNREASON IN THE LAW OF DAMAGES: THE COLLATERAL SOURCE RULE

John Doe, permanently injured through the negligence of Richard Roe, recovers a judgment against the tortfeasor. Damages awarded to Doe conform to the factfinder's estimate of his medical and hospital expenses, of a monetary translation of his pain and suffering, and of his loss of earnings prior to judgment and as projected into the future. In mitigation of damages the defendant offers evidence that Doe's losses were in fact reduced by proceeds from Roe's liability insurance and from the plaintiff's own hospitalization and accident insurance, by a brother's gift of medical care, by continued salary payments and pension benefits, by tax advantages accruing from the substitution of tax-free funds for his taxable salary, and by savings resulting from Doe's reduced living costs during his hospitalization and from the absence of normal business-related expenses. In the majority of American jurisdictions, only the evidence of payment by the defendant's insurer would be admitted in mitigation of damages — the rest being excluded as deriving from "collateral sources," sources unrelated to the defendant. In spite of the primarily compensatory theory behind tort damages,[1] Doe is thus placed in a better monetary position than he was in before the accident.

This so-called collateral source rule provides, in effect, that in an action for compensatory damages the defendant will not be permitted to establish that the plaintiff did not actually sustain the amount of injury alleged, if diminution resulted from the conduct of a third person.[2] Although the rule itself has been in use since 1854 [3] and the term "collateral source" in currency since 1871,[4] application in varied situations amidst a congeries of exceptions continues to spawn litigation. The many cases applying or declining to apply the rule have, however, only rarely provided a vehicle for its judicial rationalization or for an exposition of its underlying policies.[5]

The question of mitigation for benefits from a collateral source reflects a potential conflict between guiding objectives of tort law. The first is to compensate the injured party, to make him whole; the second and more dubious one is to burden the tortfeasor with the loss.[6] If the loss is reduced by the tortfeasor himself, damages can be mitigated without conflicting with either goal.[7] When a third party compensates

[1] Restatement, Torts § 901, comment a (1939); id. § 903.
[2] Id. § 920, comment e; McCormick, Damages § 90 (1935).
[3] See The Propeller Monticello v. Mollison, 58 U.S. (17 How.) 152 (1854); Maxwell, The Collateral Source Rule in the American Law of Damages, 46 Minn. L. Rev. 669 (1962).
[4] Harding v. Town of Townshend, 43 Vt. 536, 538 (1871); see Averbach, The Collateral Source Rule, 21 Ohio St. L.J. 231, 233 (1960).
[5] "[I]n this field logic is conspicuous by its absence." Browning v. War Office, [1963] 1 Q.B. 750, 762 (C.A. 1962) (dissenting opinion of Donovan, L.J.).
[6] The purpose being either deterrence or punishment, or both. See Restatement, Torts § 901 (1939).
[7] When one branch of the government is the tortfeasor and another branch pays for the loss, problems of identity arise. In United States v. Harue Hayashi, 282

REV_00261706

B. Legal Compensation Does Not Fully Compensate

Refusal to mitigate has often been rationalized on the ground that "legal 'compensation' for personal injuries does not actually compensate." [73] Proponents of this argument have in mind the difficulty of translating pain and suffering into monetary terms, the inconvenience of litigation, and the inroads into damage awards of legal fees and unanticipated inflation.[74] Although each of these fears is real, the argument is less than persuasive.

There is, first, the latitude permitted juries to fix damages for pain and suffering; it cannot be doubted that juries frequently use this rubric to provide for inconvenience, legal fees, and inflation — in addition to generous provision for pain and suffering. A second objection to the argument is that the amount and availability of collateral benefits received in any case are fortuitous and bear no relation to the extent a purely compensatory damage award falls short of making the plaintiff whole. Where the plaintiff has no insurance, participates in no wage-continuation plan, is not recipient of a donor's largess, and realizes no resultant savings, about the only benefit which refusal to mitigate adds to his damages is tax savings; a well-situated plaintiff, on the other hand, may be "compensated" several times over as the result of a no-mitigation rule. If the inadequacies of a compensatory ceiling on damages present a genuinely important problem, more reliable solutions than the collateral source rule seem called for. Awarding attorneys' fees to the successful party is one example of a remedy more accurately attuned to the evil sought to be cured.[75]

C. The Plaintiff Paid for the Benefit

Where the plaintiff has paid a consideration for the benefit received, either in premiums on an insurance policy or by surrender of accumulated sick leave in return for continued salary payments, judicial refusal to mitigate has been nearly inexorable. The force of this argument is such that even in Britain evidence of accident insurance proceeds continues to be excluded.[76] Careful analysis of the argument does, however, somewhat diminish its persuasiveness.

Consistent with the consideration theory, a court might exclude evidence of life insurance proceeds on the ground that the wrong merely accelerated payment, but nevertheless admit evidence of accident insurance proceeds. The suggested distinction turns on an inquiry which has not been made by the courts: why does one purchase accident insurance? If the insured is speculating on the possibility of double recovery in the event of an accident attributable to the wrong of another, exclusion of the evidence may be warranted; mitigation would give [73] Hudson v. Lazarus, 217 F.2d 344, 346 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 350 U.S. 856 (1954).

[74] See McWeeney v. New York, N.H. & H.R.R., 282 F.2d 34 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 870 (1960); 2 HARPER & JAMES, TORTS § 25.22 (1956).

[75] See McWeeney v. New York, N.H. & H.R.R., supra note 74, at 43 (Lumbard, C.J., dissenting).

[76] Bradburn v. Great W. Ry., L.R. 10 Ex. 1 (1874), distinguished Browning v. War Office, [1963] 1 Q.B. 750, 759 (C.A. 1962). Donovan, L.J., dissented in Browning on the ground that the pension and insurance situations were indistinguishable. Id. at 761.

him less than he bargained for — although an enlightened jurisdiction might regard such a bargain as contrary to public policy. But it seems more likely that the insured is purchasing security — prompt and sure payments without the necessity of litigation and without regard to the liability and financial resources of prospective defendants.[77] The motives behind purchase of hospitalization insurance seem susceptible to similar characterization. If this view is correct, there exists no compelling reason why the insured should get more than he bargained for.

Similar motive analysis, albeit complicated by the involvement of employers and unions, might require mitigation for benefits from salary continuation plans, and exclusion of evidence of pension benefits, the latter being closer to life insurance proceeds.[78] However, a different sort of analysis, one based on the incongruity of ascertaining "loss of earnings" without regard to the actual continuation of earnings, suggests that pension benefits too ought to be admitted for mitigation purposes. Just as some jurisdictions permit mitigation for continued salary payments,[79] receipt of pension benefits — which are merely deferred compensation — ought to diminish the amount of earnings loss. But this earnings analysis would not permit mitigation where payments diminish the employee's accumulated sick leave, particularly if the accumulated time could be translated into cash at termination of employment.[80]

The most serious deficiency of the consideration argument, however, is its circularity. Insurance and employment benefit arrangements are contractual; the price to the beneficiary depends on the scope of benefits agreed upon. Should the insurer or employer acquire rights of reimbursement or subrogation, the cost of the arrangement to the beneficiary would go down. The legal result cannot properly be predicated on the consideration paid; rather, it must be the other way around.

D. The Plaintiff Was the Intended Donee

Even in Alabama, the American jurisdiction least receptive to the collateral source rule, gifts to the plaintiff are not usable for mitigation purposes.[81] Among the few exceptions to this rule are the Restatement of Torts position that gratuitous services by a public charity are admissible,[82] and occasional holdings that the value of services rendered gratuitously by a doctor may not be recovered by the plaintiff.[83] The argument is that the donor intended to confer a benefit, not on the tortfeasor, but on the plaintiff, and that mitigation would shift the benefit.

Concern for the donor's intent raises the obvious question of how that intent is to be determined. While the nurse-wife in Daniels v. Celeste [84] rather clearly did not intend to benefit the tortfeasor who injured her [77] See Note, 63 HARV. L. REV. 330, 332 (1949).

[78] But see Browning v. War Office, [1963] 1 Q.B. 750, 762 (C.A. 1962) (dissenting opinion of Donovan, L.J.); Payne v. Railway Executive, [1952] 1 K.B. 26 (C.A. 1951).

[79] See pp. 743–44, supra.

[80] See Rigney v. Cincinnati St. Ry., 99 Ohio App. 105, 131 N.E.2d 413 (1954).

[81] Bachelder v. Morgan, 179 Ala. 339, 60 So. 815 (1912), criticized in Note, 14 ALA. L. REV. 148, 159 (1961).

[82] § 924, comment f (1939).

[83] E.g., Coyne v. Campbell, 11 N.Y.2d 372, 183 N.E.2d 891, 230 N.Y.S.2d 1 (1962).

[84] 303 Mass. 148, 21 N.E.2d 1 (1939).

REV_00261716

husband, there is no reason to believe that charitable institutions or "Good Samaritans" harbor intentions hostile to the tortfeasor. Similarly, the intent of employers making gifts to injured employees may well be to tide them over the prejudgment period rather than to add to the eventual damage award. Besides, the reluctance of our jurisprudence to shift losses to defendants might outweigh the desirability of honoring the donor's intent, particularly if the nature of that intent is open to question and conflicts with the compensatory ideal. Finally, to permit mitigation does not deprive the plaintiff of all benefit, since he did have the services when he needed them and without cost. Awarding him the monetary value of the services in a judgment probably rendered several years later seems an unanticipated windfall.

E. Benefits May Be Hard To Compute

In McWeeney v. New York, N.H. & H.R.R.[85] Judge Friendly, recognizing the conflict between computing loss of earnings on a pretax basis and the desired compensatory ideal, nevertheless refused to permit mitigation in the amount of the plaintiff's tax savings. His primary reason was the difficulty of computing the tax which would have been payable on future earnings, especially since the task would be for the jury. The judge noted that whereas computation of damages involved only the ascertaining of normal earning power, postaccident earning power, life expectancy, and the present value of the sum so arrived at, intrusion of tax considerations would necessitate more difficult determinations. Among these are variations in gross income, an estimate of the exemptions and deductions likely to be available, and a prediction as to changes in tax rates.

Proof of some of these matters would obviously complicate the trial process, as might determination of the value of gratuitously rendered services and more remote resultant savings. But the trial judge, aided by counsel, might himself make all but the most speculative tax adjustments to the pretax earnings figure returned by the jury.[86] And even a rough estimate of the operative tax rate would bring the damage award closer to a compensatory level than is the result under the collateral source rule.[87]

F. Legislative Intent May Preclude Mitigation

Whatever the logical difficulties of denying mitigation for collateral benefits in a system of damages which is primarily compensatory, Congress and the state legislatures may make a considered decision that particular benefits are to be additional to an injured party's other remedies. Where such a legislative intent is ascertainable, mitigation is of course improper. Since 1939 the Internal Revenue Code may have reflected such a policy choice, damages recoverable for loss of earnings being expressly excluded from gross income.[88] Similarly, section 5 of the [85] 282 F.2d 34 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 870 (1960).

[86] This system is used in England, where there are no juries in accident cases. MAYNE & MCGREGOR, DAMAGES 262–64 (12th ed. 1961).

[87] British Transp. Comm'n v. Gourley, [1956] A.C. 185, 197, 204, 210 (1955).

[88] Int. Rev. Code of 1939, ch. 1, § 22(b)(5), 53 Stat. 10. Despite suggestions that the tax treatment of lost earnings was rooted in emotional factors, see

FELA,[89] which enumerates certain items which an employer can set off in an employee's suit under the act, might be read to reflect a congressional decision that no additional collateral benefits can be set off. Judicial practice, however, has been to determine whether a particular benefit falls within section 5; if not, the "collateral source rule" is invoked and mitigation denied — without discussion of the policy considerations behind this particular application of the rule.[90] A contrary legislative intent may, of course, be manifested. Australia's Social Services Consolidation Act, for example, prohibits payment of invalid pensions to a person possessing an enforceable claim against another.[91]

III. Conclusion

None of the arguments here canvassed justifies refusal to mitigate as a general proposition. There are, at any rate, sufficient doubts regarding the defendant's "deserving" to pay more than the amount needed to make the plaintiff whole, the suitability of the no-mitigation rule as a remedy for the putative inadequacies of legal compensation, the bona fides of the argument that the plaintiff has bargained for a recovery exceeding compensation, the nature and significance of the donor's intent, the difficulties inherent in computing a compensatory award, and the character of legislative purpose, to make automatic incantation of the "collateral source rule" the most dubious of practices. The nub of the problem seems to be the very existence of this particular legal formula. Invocation of the "rule" has too often been a substitute for analysis of the merits of the parties' claims. If the task of reasoning through to an answer appropriate to the kind of benefit involved is believed too difficult, a general rule confining damages to a compensatory level seems infinitely preferable to its opposite. The British courts, more tightly bound to precedent than are our own, have moved a long way toward this position. Surely American jurisdictions should now cease to compensate plaintiffs for earnings never lost and expenses never in fact incurred; it will then be appropriate to work out rules regarding more speculative "benefits" like tax and resultant savings and those — such as insurance — more remotely connected to the amount of damages caused by the defendant's conduct. Should such changes require revision of the venerable rules regarding subrogation and reimbursement, so much the better for the state of our law.

Harnett, Torts and Taxes, 27 N.Y.U.L. Rev. 614, 626 (1952), the exclusion from gross income was continued in 1954.

[89] 35 Stat. 66 (1908), 45 U.S.C. § 55 (1952).

[90] See, e.g., New York, N.H. & H.R.R. v. Leary, 204 F.2d 461, 468 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 346 U.S. 856 (1953).

[91] Social Services Consolidation Act, 1947–50, § 25(1)(d) (Austl.); Fleming, Torts 211 (2d ed. 1961).

REV_00261718

the injured party, complications arise. Achievement of both goals is not impaired where the third party acquires either a right to reimbursement from the proceeds of the injured party's suit against the tortfeasor, or his own subrogated cause of action directly against the wrongdoer. Thus is the problem of the third party resolved contractually under most property and fire insurance agreements,[8] and statutorily under most workmen's compensation acts.[9] In other situations, however, the third party has no recognized right to either reimbursement or subrogation; here the potential conflict between tort objectives might have been resolved by extending the availability of reimbursement and subrogation, or dealt with by permitting the defendant to benefit from diminution of the plaintiff's actual loss. Instead, the orthodox solution has been invocation of the collateral source rule, permitting the plaintiff to exceed compensatory limits in the interest of insuring an impact upon the defendant.[10] This Note will survey the situations in which the orthodox solution has been applied and the exceptions with which it has been encumbered, and examine critically the justifications advanced for refusal to mitigate in particular circumstances.

I. The State of the Law

A. Insurance

Except in Alabama, which does not recognize a collateral source rule,[11] American courts do not permit defendants to reduce damages by introducing evidence that plaintiffs have received proceeds from life, accident, or hospitalization insurance.[12] It was with respect to insurance that the British courts first excluded evidence of collateral benefits,[13] a position seemingly surviving the current British trend toward a compensatory ceiling on damages.[14] In neither country, however, does the rule apply to property or fire insurance proceeds; whether or not the contract expressly so provides, the insurer is subrogated to the insured's rights against the tortfeasor and the tortfeasor may prove the existence of a subrogee in mitigation of damages.[15] Contrary language in a few cases[16] seems explicable on the ground that the court tacitly assumed

F.2d 599 (9th Cir. 1960), the court reconciled apparently contradictory cases, explaining that the Government is a single entity for purposes of mitigation if the payments are from general tax monies appropriated for a specific purpose, such as the support of a Veteran's Administration hospital, but separate entities if the payments are made from special funded sources such as the Old Age and Survivor's Trust Fund.

[8] Vance, Insurance 786–90 (3d ed. 1951).

[9] Id. at 798; 46 Colum. L. Rev. 669, 673 n.20 (1946).

[10] See Note, 14 Ala. L. Rev. 148, 159–60 (1961); Note, 63 Harv. L. Rev. 330, 331 (1949).

[11] Jones v. Keith, 223 Ala. 36, 134 So. 630 (1931); see Note, 14 Ala. L. Rev. 148, 155–57 (1961).

[12] E.g., Roth v. Chatlos, 97 Conn. 282, 116 Atl. 332 (1922) (accident insurance); Conley v. Foster, 335 S.W.2d 904 (Ky. Ct. App. 1960) (hospitalization insurance); Gaydos v. Domabyl, 301 Pa. 523, 152 Atl. 549 (1930) (life insurance).

[13] Bradburn v. Great W. Ry., L.R. 10 Ex. 1 (1874).

[14] See British Transp. Comm'n v. Gourley, [1956] A.C. 185; Browning v. War Office, [1963] 1 Q.B. 750 (C.A. 1962), p. 745 infra.

[15] Vance, Insurance 786–88 (3d ed. 1951).

[16] Allen v. Zickos, 37 Ala. App. 361, 68 So. 2d 841 (1953) (property); Morton v. Washington Light & Water Co., 169 N.C. 468, 86 S.E. 294 (1915) (fire).

REV_00261707

that the insurer would have a right of reimbursement out of the proceeds of the judgment.[17]

This distinction between accident and property insurance rests on technical grounds rooted in ancient rules of subrogation. Subrogation theory requires that both the insurer's and the tortfeasor's obligations to the insured be the same. Where there has been property damage, both tortfeasor and insurer have a duty to compensate the insured for actual damages; subrogation is therefore permitted. Accident insurance contracts, on the other hand, require the insurer to pay scheduled benefits rather than the damages which might be imposed on the tortfeasor.[18] This distinction perhaps merits preservation on the ground that the obligations of insurer and tortfeasor are more likely to coincide in property damage cases, thereby minimizing the incidence of multiple litigation. But wherever insurance equals or exceeds loss, a single suit by the insurer is sufficient; and where it fails to cover loss, reimbursement from the proceeds of the insured's suit will usually obviate the need for another trial. The cases, however, do not distinguish hospitalization insurance — which is likely to approximate the actual cost of medical services — from life or accident insurance,[19] nor do they inquire into the degree of correspondence between insurance proceeds and actual loss. Although subrogation is said to be based on general principles of equity,[20] courts do not imply rights to subrogation or reimbursement in accident or hospitalization insurance. Whether these rights may be expressly provided for by contract in the accident or hospitalization insurance context has not been determined, the industry practice being to the contrary.[21] Absent provision for subrogation or reimbursement, all but the Alabama courts have chosen to permit plaintiffs to add damage awards for gross loss to their insurance proceeds.

B. Employment and Welfare Benefits

When the plaintiff during the period of his disability receives salary or other payments from his employer, or benefits from pension or statutory welfare plans, a more complicated pattern is presented. Despite the incongruity of permitting plaintiffs to recover for loss of earnings when earnings have not in fact been interrupted, the majority of American jurisdictions exclude evidence of continued compensation, at least for the purpose of diminishing the amount of damages.[22] But here there is no solid front. Three jurisdictions, for example, draw a distinction between salary payments and gifts, admitting evidence of the former in mitigation of damages. Alabama permits the intention of the employer to control.[23] Proof that no services were performed during [17] See Note, 14 ALA. L. REV. 148, 155 (1961).

[18] 46 COLUM. L. REV. 669, 672 n.16 (1946).
[19] Compare Conley v. Foster, 335 S.W.2d 904 (Ky. Ct. App. 1960), with Roth v. Chatlos, 97 Conn. 282, 116 Atl. 332 (1922).
[20] VANCE, INSURANCE 787 (3d ed. 1951).
[21] Compare Michigan Hosp. Serv. v. Sharpe, 339 Mich. 357, 63 N.W.2d 638 (1954), with Michigan Medical Serv. v. Sharpe, 339 Mich 574, 64 N.W.2d. 713 (1954). Subrogation was allowed in the latter on the ground that the contract there involved did contain an express subrogation clause.
[22] E.g., Campbell v. Sutliff, 193 Wis. 370, 214 N.W. 374 (1927).
[23] Compare Whiddon v. Malone, 220 Ala. 220, 124 So. 516 (1929), with Bachelder v. Morgan, 179 Ala. 339, 60 So. 815 (1912).

REV_00261708

the period covered by the payments is sufficient to exclude evidence of receipt in Missouri and in Pennsylvania,[24] although one Pennsylvania case suggests that payments equal to salary are admissible even though not required by contract and though no services were performed.[25] The courts of New York and Ohio [26] draw a different distinction, admitting evidence of continued salary payments unless made from accumulated sick leave. The argument seems to be that where sick leave is diminished, payments do not represent a net benefit to the plaintiff. This is especially clear if, as in an Ohio case,[27] the plaintiff could have collected salary for accumulated sick leave at the termination of his employment. British courts generally allow defendants to reduce damages by the amount of salary payments,[28] although where a plaintiff affirmed his moral obligation to repay his employer, he was permitted to recover "lost earnings" from the defendant, the court's decree directing him to repay his employer.[29] Those jurisdictions which permit continued salary payments to be set off against loss of earnings do not, however, allow the employer to enforce the successful plaintiff's moral obligation to reimburse,[30] nor do they give the employer a cause of action against the tortfeasor.[31] Contrary holdings seem to rest on the assumed existence of special relationships, such as that between shipowner and seaman.[32]

In most jurisdictions, evidence of pension and welfare fund payments received as a result of the plaintiff's injury are similarly inadmissible for mitigation purposes.[33] Almost all workmen's compensation statutes, however, provide that the insurer or employer is subrogated to the injured employee's claim against the tortfeasor.[34] Where they do not, a common law right of subrogation is denied and evidence of receipt of statutory compensation is excluded.[35] New York and Pennsylvania, which allow mitigation in the event of continued salary payments,[36] exclude evidence of statutory disability benefits.[37] With regard to pen-

[24] See Moon v. St. Louis Transit Co., 247 Mo. 227, 152 S.W. 303 (1912); Quigley v. Pennsylvania R.R., 210 Pa. 162, 59 Atl. 958 (1904).

[25] Pensak v. Peerless Oil Co., 311 Pa. 207, 166 Atl. 792 (1933).

[26] See De Paulis v. United States, 193 F. Supp. 7 (E.D.N.Y. 1961); Drinkwater v. Dinsmore, 80 N.Y. 390 (1880); D'Amico v. Resnick, 197 N.Y.S.2d 826 (Sup. Ct. 1960); Rigney v. Cincinnati St. R.R., 99 Ohio App. 105, 131 N.E.2d 413 (1954); Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. Ry. v. Fagin, 3 Ohio N.P. (n.s.) 30 (Super. Ct. 1905), aff'd mem., 74 Ohio St. 491, 78 N.E. 1135 (1906).

[27] Rigney v. Cincinnati St. R.R., supra note 26.

[28] See Receiver for the Metropolitan Police Dist. v. Croyden Corp., [1957] 2 Q.B. 154 (C.A. 1956); Payne v. Railway Executive, [1952] 1 K.B. 26 (C.A. 1951).

[29] Dennis v. London Transp. Bd., [1948] 1 All E.R. 779 (K.B.).

[30] Cf. Alabama Power Co. v. Edwards, 219 Ala. 162, 121 So. 543 (1929).

[31] Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 153 F.2d 958 (9th Cir. 1946), aff'd, 332 U.S. 301 (1947). Contra, Philadelphia v. Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co., 337 Pa. 1, 10 A.2d 434 (1940) (dictum).

[32] E.g., Jones v. Waterman S.S. Corp., 155 F.2d 992 (3d Cir. 1946).

[33] E.g., Ring v. Minneapolis St. Ry., 176 Minn. 377, 223 N.W. 619 (1929) (pensions); Mobley v. Garcia, 54 N.M. 175, 217 P.2d 256 (1950) (relief payments).

[34] See note 9 supra.

[35] Crab Orchard Improvement Co. v. Chesapeake & O. Ry., 115 F.2d 277 (4th Cir. 1940) (W. Va. law), cert. denied, 312 U.S. 702 (1941); Overland Constr. Co. v. Sydnor, 70 F.2d 338 (6th Cir. 1934) (Ohio law); see Truscon Steel Co. v. Trumbull Cliffs Furnace Co., 120 Ohio St. 394, 166 N.E. 368 (1929).

[36] See notes 24 & 26 supra.

[37] Seidel v. Maynard, 279 App. Div. 706, 108 N.Y.S.2d 450 (1951) (per curiam); Philadelphia v. Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co., 337 Pa. 1, 10 A.2d 434 (1940) (dictum).

REV_00261709

sions Britain followed the American rule until 1963, when the Court of Appeal in Browning v. War Office allowed mitigation.[38] Distinguishing the insurance cases on the ground that the insured had paid a consideration, the court reasoned that damages were intended to be no more than compensatory and that plaintiffs ought not to receive windfalls. In response to the postwar institution of a comprehensive welfare scheme, Parliament enacted a rather arbitrary solution to the problem posed by receipt of benefits from a collateral source: one half of the statutory benefits received and likely to be received during the five years following injury are to be used to mitigate the tortfeasor's liability.[39]

Refusal to mitigate for employment and welfare benefits creates evidentiary problems, since receipt of such payments may be relevant to disputed issues other than the amount of damages. Although evidence inadmissible for one purpose may nevertheless be perfectly admissible for another,[40] the trial judge may exclude competent evidence whose probative value is "substantially outweighed by the risk that its admission will . . . create substantial danger of undue prejudice or of confusing the issues or of misleading the jury . . . ."[41] In Tipton v. Socony Mobil Oil Co.,[42] decided this Term by the Supreme Court, a Jones Act defendant introduced evidence that the plaintiff had accepted benefits under another compensation act, by its terms inapplicable to crew members,[43] in order to prove that the plaintiff was not a seaman within the jurisdictional requirements of the Jones Act.[44] The jury, never cautioned by the trial judge with respect to the limited use it might make of the evidence, found the plaintiff not a seaman within the Jones Act, obviating the necessity of reaching the question of damages. The Court vacated the judgment, apparently on the ground that the evidence lacked sufficient probative value as to the plaintiff's status to overcome its prejudicial effect. In Eichel v. New York Cent. R.R.,[45] also decided this Term, the defendant in a Federal Employers' Liability Act suit sought to introduce evidence that the plaintiff was receiving substantial disability benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act,[46] the defendant's purpose being to impeach the plaintiff's testimony regarding permanency of his injuries and his motives for not returning to work. Since the amount of the collateral benefit was crucially relevant here, [38] [1963] 1 Q.B. 750 (C.A. 1962). Donovan, L.J., dissenting, found no logical distinction between pensions and insurance payments. Id. at 761.

[39] National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, 9 & 10 Geo. 6, c. 62; National Insurance Act, 1946, 9 & 10 Geo. 6, c. 67; Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act, 1948, 11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 41; see Friedmann, Social Insurance and the Principles of Tort Liability, 63 HARV. L. REV. 241 (1949); Note, 63 HARV. L. REV. 330, 333 (1949). On the theory that the plaintiff has incurred no expense, the value of drugs and medical services obtained under welfare legislation may not be recovered by the plaintiff. FLEMING, TORTS 210 (2d ed. 1961).

[40] 1 WIGMORE, EVIDENCE § 215 (3d ed. 1940).

[41] UNIFORM RULE OF EVIDENCE 45 (1953).

[42] 375 U.S. 34 (1963) (per curiam).

[43] Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, 44 Stat. 1424 (1927), as amended, 33 U.S.C. §§ 901–50 (1958), as applied in the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, 67 Stat. 463 (1953), 43 U.S.C. § 1333(c)(1) (1958).

[44] 38 Stat. 1185 (1915), as amended, 46 U.S.C. § 688 (1958).

[45] 84 Sup. Ct. 316, reversing per curiam 319 F.2d 12 (2d Cir. 1963) (Friendly, J.).

[46] 49 Stat. 967 (1935), as amended, 45 U.S.C. § 228 (Supp. IV, 1963).

REV_00261710

Eichel more directly than Tipton posed the threat of prejudicing the damage award. The Court affirmed exclusion by the trial judge on the ground that "the likelihood of misuse by the jury clearly outweighs the value . . . . Insofar as the evidence bears on the issue of malingering, there will generally be other evidence having more probative value and involving less likelihood of prejudice . . . ." [47] The Court noted the undesirability of making receipt of federal statutory benefits evidence of malingering, the susceptibility of evidence of collateral benefits to misuse by juries, and its potentially prejudicial impact. While it remains to be seen whether the Supreme Court will continue this Term's venture into reviewing evidentiary rulings by trial judges,[48] Tipton and Eichel may prove useful in reminding the lower judiciary of the need to articulate their view of the probative value of admitted evidence of collateral benefits and to instruct juries carefully in the uses to which such evidence may properly be put.

C. Gratuitous Services

Three recurrent situations raise the question whether the plaintiff ought to recover damages for expenses never in fact incurred, a kind of benefit different from payments of insurance but like that of continued salary. The first involves gratuitously rendered hospital and medical expenses. Here the Restatement of Torts suggests that mitigation be permitted where the services are rendered by a public charity.[49] Neither the Restatement nor the few cases [50] which have followed it have offered any rationale for this particular exception to the no-mitigation rule; nor is it apparent why a plaintiff should be able to recover the value of services rendered gratuitously by a doctor or by a private hospital, but not those obtained from a public charity. Most courts have simply declined the Restatement's lead, preferring instead rigid application of the collateral source exclusionary rule.[51]

In the second typical situation the plaintiff seeks recovery of the value of services rendered gratuitously by an association of which he is a member. In Coyne v. Campbell [52] the New York Court of Appeals recently ruled in favor of the defendant, likening gratuitous medical services to employment benefits rather than to insurance proceeds, a distinction already embedded in the state's law of damages.[53] Disregarding the plaintiff's duty to repay the association in kind should occasion arise, the court found controlling the absence of consideration moving from the plaintiff. In a recent Wisconsin case, however, a precedent similar to Coyne was distinguished and a contrary result reached where [47] 84 Sup. Ct. at 317.

[48] See Id. at 318 (Harlan, J., dissenting). A question now hangs over New York, N.H. & H.R.R. v. Leary, 204 F.2d 461 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 346 U.S. 856 (1953), where evidence that the plaintiff would receive a Railroad Retirement Act pension at age 65 was admitted as relevant to his request that earnings loss be computed on the basis of service until age 70.

[49] § 924, comment f (1939).

[50] E.g., Di Leo v. Dolinsky, 129 Conn. 203, 27 A.2d 126 (1942).

[51] E.g., Hudson v. Lazarus, 217 F.2d 344 (D.C. Cir.), cert denied, 350 U.S. 856 (1954).

[52] 11 N.Y.2d 372, 183 N.E.2d 891, 230 N.Y.S.2d 1 (1962).

[53] Compare Healy v. Rennert, 9 N.Y.2d 202, 173 N.E.2d 777, 213 N.Y.S.2d 44 (1961), with Drinkwater v. Dinsmore, 80 N.Y. 390 (1880).

the plaintiff sought to collect accident insurance after receiving free hospitalization, the court relying on the fact that the plaintiff had paid a consideration for the accident insurance.[54]

The third kind of situation concerns recovery for the value of services gratuitously rendered by the plaintiff's wife or someone similarly situated. The general rule seems to be that mitigation is denied, permitting the plaintiff to recover for expenses not in fact incurred.[55] But in Daniels v. Celeste, where the ministering wife was a registered nurse and may have had to give up her employment to serve her husband, the Massachusetts court ruled against the plaintiff, reasoning that he had not "paid" for the services — and could not, since he could not legally contract with his own wife.[56] To the extent that the husband and wife are regarded as a single economic unit, the court's conclusion that the plaintiff had incurred no "loss" is difficult to understand and its decision absurdly legalistic. The gratuitous provision of services by the plaintiff's wife at the expense of her job seems, after all, clearly an a fortiori case for recovery, since it is the one case in which the plaintiff — his family group, at any rate — does in fact sustain an economic loss.

D. Tax Advantages

Section 104(a)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 excludes from gross income "the amount of any damages received (whether by suit or by agreement) on account of personal injuries or sickness." A plaintiff who recovers for loss of earnings on a pretax basis is therefore placed in a better financial position than if he had earned the same amount of money. Nevertheless, most courts compute loss of earnings without regard to the tax savings, relying on the collateral source rule,[57] the conjectural nature of tax estimates,[58] the inability of juries to make the required computations and the complications which would otherwise be introduced into trials,[59] and the congressional intent to give injured parties a tax benefit.[60] In 1956 the House of Lords overruled contrary precedent and held that damages for lost earnings must be computed on a posttax basis.[61] The courts of Connecticut and Oklahoma [62] have subsequently adopted this position.

---

[54] Kopp v. Home Mut. Ins. Co., 6 Wis. 2d 53, 94 N.W.2d 224 (1959), distinguishing Nelson v. Pauli, 176 Wis. 1, 186 N.W. 217 (1922) (by implication).

[55] E.g., Houston & T.C.R.R. v. Gerald, 60 Tex. Civ. App. 151, 128 S.W. 166 (1910).

[56] 303 Mass. 148, 21 N.E.2d 1 (1939).

[57] Mitchell v. Emblade, 80 Ariz. 398, 298 P.2d 1034 (1956); Hall v. Chicago & N.W. Ry., 5 Ill. 2d 135, 125 N.E.2d 77 (1955).

[58] Stokes v. United States, 144 F.2d 82 (2d Cir. 1944).

[59] McWeeney v. New York, N.H. & H.R.R., 282 F.2d 34 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 870 (1960); Highshew v. Kushto, 235 Ind. 505, 134 N.E.2d 555 (1956).

[60] Hall v. Chicago & N.W. Ry., 5 Ill. 2d 135, 125 N.E.2d 77 (1955); 69 HARV. L. REV. 1495, 1496 (1956).

[61] British Transp. Comm'n v. Gourley, [1956] A.C. 185 (1955), overruling Billingham v. Hughes, [1949] 1 K.B. 643 (C.A.). See MAYNE & MCGREGOR, DAMAGES 251–64 (12th ed. 1961). It has been suggested that a better solution, one which would deprive the defendant of a windfall, would be to tax the award. FLEMING, TORTS 209 (2d ed. 1961).

[62] Floyd v. Fruit Indus., Inc., 144 Conn. 659, 136 A.2d 918 (1957); O'Connor v. United States, 269 F.2d 578 (2d Cir. 1959) (limited to Oklahoma law in McWeeney v. New York, N.H. & H.R.R., 282 F.2d 34 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 870 (1960)).

REV_00261712

E. Resultant Savings

Like tax savings, the expenses from which the plaintiff is relieved by virtue of his injury may be analogized to benefits received from a collateral source. In either case, to ignore the item when computing damages is to award the plaintiff a windfall. Whether or not a saving is taken into account seems to turn on its degree of remoteness and speculativeness, although the results exhibit little in the way of logical consistency. In one rather bizarre case, the defendant was not permitted to diminish the award for pain and suffering by the fact that the miscarriage which resulted from the injury he inflicted would spare the plaintiff the pain and suffering of childbirth.[63] Consistent with the general British tendency to confine damages to a compensatory level, the Court of Appeal allowed a setoff for board saved while the plaintiff recuperated in a nursing home, using the nursing home's allocation of food costs.[64] Furthermore, had he introduced evidence of the home's allocation of room costs, the defendant would have obtained a deduction for that, too. The court rejected figures based on the cost of room and board which the plaintiff would have incurred had she not been injured, apparently on the ground that since she was now getting less valuable accommodations, she was entitled to additional cash. A contrary choice would result in a shrinking of the plaintiff's position.

II. The Rationales Examined

That there is no single collateral source rule ought to have emerged from the foregoing survey of situations in which the measure of damages might be mitigated to the extent of collateral benefits. Accordingly, the policy considerations usually advanced to justify particular refusals to mitigate cannot be assayed in a vacuum, but must be examined in light of the situation with respect to which they are invoked. Nor should one be surprised if analysis suggests that mitigation be permitted in one case and not in another.

A. The Defendant Deserves To Pay

Perhaps the most pervasive rationale offered to justify exclusion of evidence of collateral benefits is the putative desirability of making the defendant pay the undiscounted amount of damages he has caused.[65] As one court has put it, "If there must be a windfall certainly it is more just that the injured person shall profit therefrom, rather than the wrongdoer shall be relieved of his full responsibility for his wrongdoing." [66] But this emphasis upon the burdens which the defendant ought to bear, rather than upon the sum necessary to make the plaintiff whole, is pregnant with difficulties.

One court has observed the fallacy behind the assumption that "there is some norm of damages which a defendant who has acted without [63] Morris v. St. Paul City Ry., 105 Minn. 276, 117 N.W. 500 (1908).

[64] Shearman v. Folland, [1950] 2 K.B. 43 (C.A.).
[65] E.g., Roth v. Chatlos, 97 Conn. 282, 116 Atl. 332 (1922).
[66] Grayson v. Williams, 256 F.2d 61, 65 (10th Cir. 1958).

reasonable care ought to pay for his careless act . . . ." [67] No such norm is available. Even the most flagrant wrongdoer ordinarily is not liable for damages unless harm in fact results from his conduct; and when harm does occur, his liability depends, not on the degree of fault, but on the extent of injury, the physical idiosyncracies and earning capacity of the injured person, and on the latter's own degree of culpability. Furthermore, there is no indication that refusals to mitigate have been sensitive to varying degrees of moral fault; the intentional wrongdoer, the merely negligent tortfeasor, and he who is subject to absolute liability are treated in the same fashion. Punitive damages are a more appropriate device for dealing with the intentional tortfeasor, since they do not depend on fortuitous circumstances. Besides, the ultimate burden of the damage award is frequently borne, not by the alleged wrongdoer, but by liability insurers and the premium-paying public, the uninsured defendant being the least likely to be able to satisfy a large judgment.[68] Not only is the relationship between fault and the amount of damages too attenuated to be useful,[69] but attempts to hold the defendant responsible for the "harm" he has caused beg the question. The very issue in controversy is what constitutes the "harm" to be compensated; does it include salary not in fact discontinued and medical expenses never actually incurred, or is it exclusive of insurance proceeds or expenses from which the injury relieves the victim?

Doubts also beset the assumption that windfalls, if indeed there are any, ought to go to the plaintiff rather than to the wrongdoer. Perhaps this is morally correct, but the rough moral judgment of the community may well be otherwise. Judicial fears that juries will inexorably use evidence of collateral benefits admitted for other purposes to diminish defendant's liability [70] at least suggest that the average man finds the plaintiff a more unconscionable beneficiary of windfalls than the defendant. Furthermore, the remedies of subrogation and reimbursement offer alternatives to allocating windfalls to the defendant. Workmen's compensation statutes already provide for such a result, and one court has suggested that an employer should have a right to intervene in his employee's suit and assert a claim for benefits paid.[71] But where the potential subrogee is a loss-spreading fund or is otherwise well able to bear the loss, subrogation shifts the loss to an individual less able to bear it or to another loss-spreader, thus adding the cost of the shift to the total economic loss to be borne by the public.[72] There is much to be said, therefore, for permitting the defendant to take advantage of collateral benefits, he being — after an unsuccessful lawsuit — most in need of them.

---

[67] Browning v. War Office, [1963] 1 Q.B. 750, 765 (C.A. 1962) (opinion of Diplock, L.J.).

[68] 2 HARPER & JAMES, TORTS § 25.22, at 1346 & n.11 (1956). The treatise here incorporates James, Social Insurance and Tort Liability: The Problem of Alternative Remedies, 27 N.Y.U.L. REV. 537 (1952).

[69] Id. § 25.22. See generally EHRENZWEIG, NEGLIGENCE WITHOUT FAULT (1951).

[70] See pp. 745–46 supra.

[71] Philadelphia v. Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co., 337 Pa. 1, 10 A.2d 434 (1940) (dictum).

[72] 2 HARPER & JAMES, TORTS § 25.23 (1956).

REV_00261714

Source: All Sources > News > News Group File, All
Terms: peter w/3 huber and subrogation and insurance (Edit Search)

1987 Legal Times, March 9, 1987

Copyright 1987 American Lawyer Newspapers Group Inc.
Legal Times

March 9, 1987

SECTION: PERSPECTIVE; Views From Legal Times' Board Of Contributors; Pg. 9

LENGTH: 5141 words

HEADLINE: Will New Vaccine Statute Give Shot in Arm to Tort Reform?

BYLINE: BY PETER HUBER; Peter Huber is a lawyer and consultant in Washington, D.C., who is the author of a major report for the Department of Justice assessing the effects of the AT&T divestiture. He has written extensively on insurance and tort-related issues

BODY:
Something in the nature of "tort reform" slipped through the last Congress, attracting surprisingly little notice. The new legislation will provide at least the usual level of entertainment for the legal community. But the real story if longer and more interesting and features fewer lawyers.

The journey starts in the English countryside in 1798. Over the next two centuries, it makes stops in a variety of unexpected places, including a convention of legionnaires in Philadelphia, a squalid village in Bangladesh, and the Sampan community that floats on the hepatitis-infected waters of Hong Kong harbor. It concludes today in the Polk Street bars and bathhouses of San Francisco. Along the way, the U.S. liability courts get involved, so much so that Congress passes a law to try and keep them from putting an end to the saga. But I'm getting ahead of myself.

Vaccines have contributed more to public health in this country and around the world than any other medical product, device, or procedure. Until Salk and Sabin developed their vaccines in the late 1940s and 1950s, polio was still every parent's terror in this country. Cases of paralytic polio in the United States dropped from 57,000 in 1952 to four in 1984. The incidence of measles dropped from 900,000 reported cases and 2,000 deaths in 1941, to 1,500 reported cases and two deaths in 1983. Other vaccines against mumps, rubella, whooping cough, and countless other infectious diseases have been to spectacularly successful that many in this country haven't even the vaguest idea what the diseases look like.

The Revolution Continues

Nor is the revolution by any means over. Genetic engineering now provides the tools for synthesizing new vaccines against meningitis, chicken pox, and perhaps even AIDS. The recently developed Hepatitis B vaccine may prove to be the first confirmed anti-cancer prophylactic. Studies of communities that suffer from a high incidence of hepatitis have demonstrated quite a strong link with liver cancer.

All vaccines, however, are also somwhat risky. A recent report by the American Medical Association provides these sample statistics: one in 312,500 doses of whooping cough vaccine causes brain damage; one in 1 million doses of measles vaccine causes brain damage; one in 3.2 million doses of polio vaccine causes paralysis, mostly to unvaccinated adults coming in contact with vaccinated children.

REV_00261721

There is much debate about whether safer vaccines are currently feasible. The Food and Drug Administration, all pharmaceuetical companies, and the vast majority of pediatricians insist that they are moving toward better products as fast as they can, but that those currently in use represent the best possible compromises between effective protection, safe design, and proper (though not excessive) warning of the residual hazards. Not all lawyers agree.

Which brings us to our liability system. Professor Edmund Kitch of the University of Virginia Law School has recounted the story in more detail elsewhere. n1 Anyone who maintains that the "liability crisis" is a mirage, a conspiracy of the insurance companies, or merely a sober judicial response to irresponsible business practices and dangerous technologies has to work a bit harder explaining this one away.

n1 Kitch, The Vaccine Dilemma, Issues in Sci. & Tech., Winter 1986, at 108.

The first -- and certainly the happiest -- judicial chapter in the vaccination story was written at the turn of the century, when public programs requiring universal vaccination against smallpox came into legal prominence. The risk of contracting smallpox from the vaccine itself -- was worrisome.

More than a few opponents saw vaccination as an incomprehensible, high-tech experiment, forced on a helpless public by untrustworthy scientific experts and overbearing public officials, and they attacked it as an unconstitutional infringement on individual liberty. The Supreme Court, to which this argument was addressed, was unconvinced: "[Medical experts] generally have considered the risk of such an injury [from improper vaccination] too small to be seriously weighed against the benefits." n2 The program was upheld.

n2 Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11, 17-18 (1905).

The legal climate changed. Early signs of liability problems arose in the 1960s, n3 by the 1970s produced the major developments. The 1974 decision of Reyes v. Wyeth Labs n4 was probably the first big break in contemporary vaccine litigation. Plaintiffs won a series of subsequent cases including, in several instances, large awards of punitive damages.

n3 See, e.g., Parke, Davis & Co. v. Stromsodt, 411 F.2d 1390 98th Cir. 1969) (award of $ 500,000); Tinnerholm v. Parke, Davis & Co., 411 F.2d 48 (2d Cir. 1969) ($ 651,758); Sterling Drug Inc. v. Yarrow, 408 F.2d 978 (8th Cir. 1969) ($ 180,000).

n4 498 F.2d 1264 (5th Cir. 1974).

A few later cases reinforced the idea that vaccine manufacturers were absolutely liable for all side effects of their products, or should pay because the FDA-approved warnings were not as draconian as a jury later judged they should have been, or should be punished for preferring FDA-approved variants of a vaccine over alternatives preferred in other countries.

A handful of courts imposed liability even though the overwhelming weight of the scientific evidence indicated that the injury in question was not caused by the vaccine. Several of the suits won by plaintiffs almost certainly involved injuries not actually caused by the vaccine.

We need not retry these cases here. For valid reasons or otherwise, pharmaceutical companies and their insurers soon became firmly convinced that the liability system was both hostile and unpredictable. And although the trend solidified only in the 1980s, the more prescient companies recognized it a decade earlier.

Swine Flu Epidemic

This led to the first congressional attention to the vaccine liability problem. In January 1976, swine flu virus was identified as the source of an infection that caused numerous illnesses and one death at Fort Dix, N.J. There was also some fear at the time (later proved unfounded) that the epidemic of Legionnaires' disease had been caused by swine flu.

REV_00261722

After meeting with physicians and public health experts, President Ford requested funds for an emergency mass-vaccination program, and Congress appropriated the money within three weeks. The vaccine, like those directed at other kinds of flu, was relatively easy to manufacture, and the pharmaceutical industry was initially prepared to go along. But with the Reyes decision still freshly in mind, the insurance companies were not.

From the Senate floor, Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) denounced the insurance companies' "cupidity" and "lack of social obligation to the needs of the American people."

Despite the fact that several decades of experience have been gained in the administration of several hundred million influenza immunization doses, with very few lawsuits resulting from these programs, the insurance industry is apparently unwilling to participate, despite the extensive field trials of these new vaccines which show that they are safer than those employed in the past. . . . [E]ven more disturbing is the suggestion that other federally funded immunization programs are now threatened with lack of insurance coverage. . . . The position taken by the insurance industry in this country with respect to these immunization programs is incomprehensible to me. . . . One would have hoped that in our free enterprise system, the insurance industry might have been able to find some reasonable basis to undertake insurance coverage of so important a program, and at a reasonable price based upon actuarial experience.

When the hand-wringing was over, Congress passed the National Swine Flu Immunization Program. It provided for an action against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act as the exclusive remedy for personal injury from the vaccine. Pharmaceutical companies furnished the vaccine at cost.

And as it so often does, "cupidity" turned out to be annoyingly rational. A risk warning set out in the federal statute had been provided with every dose of the vaccine, even though at the time no one knew what, if any, side effects would ultimately materialize after the vaccine had been scratched into 45 million arms. And although Kennedy was confident the vaccine had no side effects, the side effects materialized nonetheless.

The vaccine, it turned out, caused or promoted Guillain-Barre syndrome, a rare but disabling impairment of the central nervous system. Thousands of claims were subsequently filed, totaling more than $ 3 billion. Many were litigated. Two of the resulting decisions were, as Kitch accurately describes them, "remarkably hostile" to the manufacturers and the federal government insurer. The government eventually stipulated to liability for the syndrome whenever it was clear that the impairment began within 10 weeks of vaccination. It paid out nearly $ 80 million on 700 claims.

Tiny Risks Loom Large

Public attitudes during this period grew increasingly sour. The very success of vaccination programs has sharpened the focus on the tiny residual risks created by the vaccines themselves; small risks loom much larger when big risks have been eradicated. After one major vaccine scare in Britain, thousands of parents declined to have their children immunized against whooping cough. In the United States, the Dissatisfied Parents Together (whose acronym, DPT, mimics that of one of the major three-in-one childhood vaccines) published an angry book, repeatedly denounced the industry's failure to come up with safer products, and applauded the stricter liability rules and punitive damages that had been assessed against various vaccine manufacturers.

One of the national television networks aired a documentary that pilloried the manufacturers of the pertussis, or whooping cough, vaccine: The manufacturers, the story implied, had all but concealed the product's risks, obdurately refused to develop a safer substitute, and ignored experiments with a better product in use in Japan. By all more sober accounts from epidemiologists and physicians, this was all quite untrue. But the shift in public attitudes was inevitable nonetheless.

One must note, at the same time, that by the measures usually relied on by the tort system's defenders, there is nothing in all this to worry about. Swine flu liability costs were shouldered by the federal government; they cost the pharmaceutical companies nothing at all. With other vaccines, manufacturers have won most of the litigated cases, and have paid little in settlements in the past decade. The liability system is just applying some gentle pressure for the development of safer products. And, of course, compensating a few grievously injured victims who are greatly in need.

Then there is the real world. Neither pharmaceutical companies nor their insurers make money by basking in the glow of past successes. Insurers do not translate past loss records into current premiums; they set current premiums in anticipation of future losses. And the liability future in the vaccine business has unquestionably become very cloudy.

Insurers, as the swine flu debacle abundantly demonstrated, don't like these products. An increasing number of vaccine manufacturers don't either. In the past 20 years, the number of U.S. vaccine manufacturers has shrunk by more than half. We now depend on sole suppliers for vaccines against polio, rubella, measles, mumps, and rabies. In 1976, we clearly had no willing manufacturers of the swine flu vaccine at all. At one point in 1984 it appeared we might lose all sources of pertussis vaccine. Those companies that have stayed in the business have directed an ever-increasing fraction of their resources to insuring and defending against the liability problems. The price of all vaccines has risen accordingly -- by several thousand percent in some cases.

The fact is that vaccines are expensive to develop and manufacture, and profit margins historically have been quite low. And the last decade, we all know full well what it could be in the next. Once you get your vaccine on the market, the contemporary tort system has the power to blow away not only the product, which typically represents years of up-front research and dvelopment, but also (if you're unlucky enough) your entire company. Take a new vaccine, scratch it into 20 million arms, and only then discover that your chief pharmacologist used to work for A. H. Robins, and you are unquestionably in bad trouble. Why take the risk?

An Important Model

Last year Congress finally confronted the problem, if only halfheartedly, in the National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act. On Nov. 14, 1986, the President, in much the same spirit, signed a package bill that included that act. The act sets up an alternative compensation system for vaccine injuries. Although not the legislation I would have written, the act clearly represents about as much tort reform as Congress can currently stomach. As such, it is a very important model.

If the new program works reasonably well, it may be copied in other initiatives covering drugs and medical devices, other consumer products, and other types of services. If the program fails miserably, as it well may, it seems unlikely that we will see significant federal reforms in other areas of product liability law for quite some time. For better or worse, then, this act is now the model for product liability reform at the federal level.

Just what does it do? If tomorrow your two-year-old daughter is given a dose of pertussis vaccine made by Connaught Laboratories and suffers a seizure and brain damage within a day or two, she'll have a claim. In the first round she must sue Dr. Otis Bowen, secretary of Health and Human Services, in federal district court. She may not sue Connaught. She may not sue in state court. yet the new act says nothing about your daughter's pediatrician. More on that interesting omission later.

REV_00261724

In this first round, the federal court must appoint a special master to hear the claim. The master determines whether your daughter's seizure was caused by Connaught's vacine. If he concludes it was, the master makes no additional inquiry about Connaught's negligence or fault; he simply decides on a dollar award. The act sets out criteria for that award. It generally allows for out-of-pocket and other economic losses. It places a $ 250,000 cap on pain and suffering and bars any punitive damages.

Starting All Over

The master's findings then go to the district judge. The judge, roughly speaking, can do the whole thing over again, though subject to the same limits and guidelines on causation and damages. All of this first round is to be completed within one year after your daughter files her claim.

Then comes Round 2 -- if you want it. If you don't like the district court's judgment, you simply reject it. Then, and only then, you are free to file an action against Connaught in state court under state law. But subject, now, to some additional rules and requirements prescribed by this new act.

Any state trial must be held in three separate phases; one for liability, one for compensatory damages, and one for punitive damages. In the state trial, Connaught may not be held liable for "unavoidable side effects."

Literally applied -- which it won't be -- that clause would mean that Connaught will hardly ever be liable at all, because most vaccine injuries today almost certainly are unavoidable, given the present state of the technology. (I doubt the limit will be seriously enforced: It is altogether too easy to invoke different procedures and products used in other countries to buttress a claim that no given injury was truly "unavoidable.") In the state trial, Connaught may not be held liable for inadequate warning on its vaccine, if the warning complied fully with FDA requirements. (Here again, however, the act contains an exception to its safe-harbor provision that might well eviscerate it.) And in the state trial, your daughter may not argue that Connaught failed to give direct warnings to her or to you, rather than to her pediatrician. Finally, you can't get punitive damages from Connaught in the state trial if Connaught did everything it was supposed to do under FDA rules, absent fraud or intentional misconduct.

How well will the whole scheme work? No one really has the faintest idea. But it's easy enough to sketch out two possible scenarios that cover the outer limits of what may materialize.

Optismistic View

The optimistic scenario first. No more than a couple of hundred claims are filed a year. Two-thirds are dismissed on their face as making claims for injuries not caused by the vaccine. The other one-third or so are scientifically meritorious, or at least credible. Reasonably generous awards are made reasonably quickly, in the first-round proceeding. A good number of claimants accept the awards and go home. The first round, in short, becomes everything that our tort system today is not: fast, fair, efficient, predictable, reasonable, and most important of all, widely perceived to be all of the above.

Those few who insist on going on to the second round, for whatever reason, soon wish they hadn't. The Connaughts of this world, and their insurance companies, take a hard line in every second-round proceeding. The word goes out: No settlements at this stage -- the settlement process comes during Round 1 of the act, or before, and thereafter there is no second chance. In Round 2, the Connaughts will litigate every issue, without exception, to the hilt. Every adverse judgment will be appealed to the end. Within a few years the plaintiffs bar gets the message, and comes to accept the first-round process as the central compensation mechanism.

REV_00261725

If the insurance industry is really going to make this thing work, it is also going to have to close off the backdoor claims. Keep in mind that you and your daughter can still sue your pediatrician, or health maintenance organization, or the lab technician, or the syringe manufacturer, or the company that made the refrigerator in which the vaccine was stored, or the Ayatollah Khomeini, and no doubt will sue them all under the venerable shotgun method for choosing defendants in liability suits. So the word is going to have to go out here too that there is one pot and one procedure that will work easily, and other attempts to get at the insurance pool through defendants other than Dr. Bowen, will be fought tooth and nail.

Finally, in my optimistic scenario, the system begins to settle down and run smoothly. The act is recognized in most circles to be reasonably efficient and fair. It is expanded to include more vaccines than are currently covered. Similar systems are eventually established for other drugs and medical devices, and for other products further afield. We all live happily ever after.

The second scenario is the one that came close to sinking this legislation when it came up for the President's signature. Claims alleging vaccine injuries mushroom, from a hundred or so per year into the thousands. Essentially every child who gets a chill or a fever within a short time of being vaccinated, and who subsequently has serious health problems of one sort of another, files a claim. The first-round compensation system is administered clumsily and too generously. Costs mount rapidly. Before long, Bowen, the fund he administers, and the vaccine industry as a whole have become the funders of a broad-ranging new welfare programfor sick young children.

At the same time, the few children with possibly legitimate claims of vaccine-induced injury disdain the awards made in the first-round proceedings. THey rush off to state courts just as soon as they can. The state courts continue on their current path toward infinitely plastic liability rules, undisciplined tests of causation, and infrequent but randomly munificent awards.

Vaccine manufacturers and their insurers begin to settle second-round lawsuits. The word now goes out that the first round is a slush fund for almost anyone and the second round a still-active crap shoot for those with colorable claims. The act, in the style of a Hollywood production, comes to be known as Black Lung II -- a Woody Allen farce at which we laugh to conceal the horrified realization that life is dangerously uncontrollable.

Everyone who has criticized the tort system, as I frequently have, must hope that we will find a way to develop the first scenario and avoid the second. What will that take? Possibly more than anyone can provide. The main imponderable in all vaccine cases is causation. No one really knows for sure just what side effects most childhood vaccines cause.

The best evidence is epidemiological. This kind of evidence was available, for example, to link the swine flu vaccine to Guillain-Barre syndrome. The federal government paid out nearly $ 80 million to 700 claimants. Perhaps half of the cases compensated would have arisen anyway, even without the vaccine. This, indeed, is the central problem in all vaccine cases: correlation without causal connection.

Some vaccine risks are quire simple. Nearly all of the handful of polio cases that now occur annually in the United States are probably caused by the polio vaccine rather than a wild virus. But the causal links in many other cases are much more uncertain, and false positives are difficult to avoid. Millions of children are vaccinated every year. Millions of children also get sick. There is an inevitable and quite large chronological overlap between the two events.

A British epidemiological study, for example, arrived at numbers suggesting that pertussis vaccination may cause 30 cases to 40 cases of brain damage in this country every year. The mechanism, however, is not understood, and there are of course far more children who suffer brain damage from other causes. If we are the least bit loose about causation in such cases, the compensation scheme will be an unrelieved disaster.

Congress at least anticipated the potential problems. The act includes a "vaccine injury table;; that defines compensable conditions in terms of the interval between vaccination and onset of the condition. The table is derived from one prepared by the AMA. If a person experiences a condition X with severity Y within Z days of vaccination, he will be entitled to compensation. The injury table lists the vaccines, and a certain class of injuries, and a time limit -- 24 hours, or three days, or a week -- during which the first symptoms of the disease must materialize.

But there are many words in the statute, and this guarantees much slack. It is difficult, moreover, to predict how honestly and carefully sympathetic pediatricians (whose own exposure to liability probably increases whenever the fund does not pay) are going to handle this issue. Awards will often depend critically on just when symptoms first appear. There may be a very strong temptation for anyone who is feeling generous to fudge just a little bit in drawing up the records on the timing issue. Once again, if this happens in any significant degree, the program will be a disaster.

Saving on Attorney Fees

All the while, a compensation system like this one can afford to be more generous than the tort system. Indeed, it should be able to afford to be almost twice as generous, because the world should be able to save about that much on the lawyers that will not be needed. Nevertheless, the quid pro quo for accepting a complete, no-fault compensation system that moves quite quickly and smoothly must be that the new system operates more rationally, systematically, and predictably than tort law. I would suggest a rule of thumb. Fifty percent of false positives in the first round of this sytem will be tolerable. Anything much higher will not.

The Department of Health and Human Services can, of course, take some steps that may help keep things in order. It needs a short list of highly credible experts in the field, open-minded but also hard-nosed. It needs to work out a uniform, written set of guidelines on how the special masters should gather their evidence in a standardized, unemotional, and largely written format. And it should commit at the outset to generous, quick settlement of any case that fits the written criteria, while also committing to no settlement at all for those falling outside. The clearer the signals sent out at the beginning, the better the chance that the system will work.

The whole refractory problem of false positives and excess claims on the fund brings us, finally, to the most important issue. Dr. Bowen, who is privileged to be the named defendant in all first-round actions, is not personally wealthy. No one quite knows yet how he is to pay for all these suits against him. The House version of the act imposed a tax on childhood vaccines, at prescribed levels, to raise about $ 40 million a year. But that tax was not part of the Senate bill, and is not yet law.

The act as passed also contains a clause suspending its operation whenever it is too short of cash, so as of today there is in fact no program at all. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that claims will run at about two to three times the revenues that would be generated by the taxes proposed in the House, especially in the first few years. If these estimates are on target, the program will be legally obliged to shut down even before it starts up.

If Congress does not fund the program soon, an interesting if politically unlikely possibility is worth considering. The act provides for subrogation: If Brown pays off your daughter, he then gets her original claim against Connaught, if she had one. This subrogation clause means that the whole engine could be put in motion without any further action by Congress. If they ever feel so inclined, vaccine manufacturers and their insurers could get some money -- say, $ 30 million -- into the fund immediately. Lawyers on all sides would shuffle some paper and chant appropriate words about advance payment on contigent liabilities, and in short order, the system would be solvent.

This would permit the interested parties to test out the program without putting any tax on the federal books and would also permit them to abandon it if things quickly got out of hand. The world of Washington probably has too much inertia for anything like this ever to be tried. But if Congress (or the President) balks at appropriating the money, a backdoor, quasi-voluntary approach might be worth considering.

However, the program is ultimately funded, there is a unique and perhaps essential opportunity here to demonstrate that a fairer, more orderly and ultimately more generous approach than the current tort system is possible. We surely need one. Vaccines are by no means the only problem area.

Take a look at contraceptives. The Lippes Loop ad Cooper Seven intrauterine devices have gone the same way as the Dalkon Shield, even though for a good number of women the first two IUDs are probably safer options than anything else. There was recently a very big award against the manufacturer of the leading spermicide, which is used in conjunction with all the barrier methods of contraception. The pill has been the target of numerous lawsuits over the years. Overall, the range of choice is narrowing, the prices are going up, and contraceptive manufacturers are digging in and hunkering down.

The ultimate losers, as always, will be the consumers -- the women who rely on these drugs and devices to exercise what has recently become their constitutionally protected right to control their own procreative cycle.

The story repeats itself in other areas too. If you know someone who has morning sickness, tell her to see her lawyer. Bendectin, the only real drug for treating the condition, has been knocked off the market by a flood of entirely baseless litigation. Major manufacturers of anesthesiology equipment have been under intense pressure from the tort system, although one should note that surgery without anesthesia has its disadvantages too.

A good number of medical specialists, especially obstetricians and neurosurgeons, have begun to practice expensive and sometimes dangerous defensive medicine; some have abandoned their specialties entirely. The tort system as it now operates is a slow and demoralizing crap shoot for the injured plaintiff and the often puzzled defendant alike.

We are not, however, about to turn back the clock and resurrect the old pro-defendant tort rules that dominated the landscape 30 years ago. Accepting this political reality, we have no choice but to move forward to some different compensation system. Once again, this act -- if it ever gets funded -- will be one of the first real attempts in the area of medical products and devices. Like it or not, it's going to be the test case.

And amid all the breast-beating and pontificating by members of our learned profession, avidly representing themselves and sometimes their clients too, we should perhaps keep in mind a quite different scene: A woman is lying on a bed. Her body is covered with the most horrible sores imaginable. The scene is hardly new -- probably a billion people on the planet alive today have seen it in the flesh, as did countless others from every generation before ours. And yet no one reading this article will ever see the scene again. The woman is dying of a disease called smallpox.

REV_00261728

In 1798, Edward Jenner discovered that he could immunize people against this dreaded disease by infecting them with another much less serious virus, cowpox. In the 1960s, the World Health Organization (WHO) launched its final assault on smallpox. As it happens, my father worked on that project, and my personal obsession with vaccines may be rooted in the inordinate pride I have in his own modest involvement in that campaign. On Dec. 9, 1979, 181 years after Jenner's discovery, the WHO was able to declare that the last cases of smallpox in Bangladesh had been isolated and eliminated.

Smallpox has been eradicated from the face of this planet. There is no animal reservoir for the virus, so it will never return. This is a victory that can be repeated. Scientists have the tools. The question really is whether lawyers will let them develop and use them.

GRAPHIC: Picture, no caption

Source: All Sources > News > News Group File, All
Terms: peter w/3 huber and subrogation and insurance (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, July 3, 2001 - 6:38 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

10 of 18 DOCUMENTS

Copyright (c) 1992 Ohio State Law Journal
Ohio State Law Journal

Spring, 1992

53 Ohio St. L.J. 587

LENGTH: 13226 words

NOTE: The Constitutionality of Offsetting Collateral Benefits Under Ohio Revised Code Section 2317.45.

Julie A. Schafer

SUMMARY:
... Beginning in the early 1980s a number of state legislatures, having perceived a "crisis" in the insurance industry, enacted statutes that limited the amount of damages a plaintiff could recover in a tort action. ... Although an insurance crisis certainly was a motivating force, at least in Ohio there was a concern over the plaintiffs who, under the collateral source rule, were receiving a double recovery. ... The fact that the source of the collateral benefit in this case was workers' compensation buttressed the court's statement that "[p]ayments made under Ohio Workers' Compensation Program are not, and were never meant to be complete compensation for an injured employee. ... Attention must also be paid to the trend in most states toward limiting tort liability, either through damage caps or through abrogation of the collateral source rule. ... The most compelling argument made by the common pleas court in Cook is that workers' compensation did not adequately compensate the victim for his injury. ... The prevalence of statutes limiting liability in all types of tort actions indicates that the abrogation of the collateral source rule will continue. ... If the goal of tort law is primarily to compensate the injured victim, then the elimination of the collateral source rule may serve this purpose more effectively than damage caps. ...

TEXT:

[*587] I. INTRODUCTION

Beginning in the early 1980s a number of state legislatures, having perceived a "crisis" in the insurance industry, enacted statutes that limited the amount of damages a plaintiff could recover in a tort action. n1 These statutes took a number of forms, including caps on noneconomic damages, the elimination of joint and several liability, and the elimination of the collateral source rule. n2

The primary focus of this Note is upon the theories that underlie the abrogation of the collateral source rule. This analysis will center upon a critique of Ohio's statutory elimination of the collateral source rule, as well as the various legislative modifications of the collateral source rule undertaken in other states.

Part II discusses the general theories behind liability caps. Part III analyzes the history of the collateral source rule, and Part IV examines the statutory elimination of the collateral source rule in Ohio and the accompanying case law. Part V suggests some improvements to the current Ohio statute.

II. PURPOSE OF LIABILITY CAPS

Much of the motivating force behind the enactment of liability caps came from a dramatic increase in medical malpractice litigation across several states. n3 Studies in these states concluded that because of the high dollar recoveries by plaintiffs in medical malpractice actions, insurance coverage was growing prohibitively expensive for a large portion of the population. n4 Consequently, [*588] state legislatures enacted laws to limit plaintiffs' recovery of damages, particularly punitive damages. Ohio is among those states. n5

(A) State the total amount of compensatory damages, past and future, to the Plaintiffs.

STATE YOUR ANSWERS IN FIGURES IN INK $ 400,000.00

(B) What portion of your answer to Interrogatory (A) is past damages, if any, to the Plaintiffs?

STATE YOUR ANSWERS IN FIGURES IN INK $ 34,000.00

(C) What portion of your answer to Interrogatory (A) is future damages, if any, to the Plaintiffs?

STATE YOUR ANSWERS IN FIGURES IN INK $ 366,000.00

IF YOU FIND THAT THERE ARE FUTURE DAMAGES, MOVE TO INTERROGATORY (D). IF YOU FIND THAT THERE ARE NO [*609] FUTURE DAMAGES, DO NOT ANSWER THE REMAINING QUESTIONS

(D) What are the portions of the future damages shown in your answer to Interrogatory (C) that fall into the following:

(1) Future economic loss $ 366,000.00

(2) Future noneconomic loss

THE TOTAL OF THESE TWO AMOUNTS MUST EQUAL YOUR ANSWER TO INTERROGATORY (C)

(E) What are the portions, if any, of future economic loss shown in your answer to Interrogatory (D)(1), if any, that fall into the following:

(1) Wages, salaries or other lost compensation (earning capacity) (fringe benefits) $ 300,000.00

(2) (Expenditures) (expenses) (costs) for medical care or treatment, rehabilitation services, or other care, treatment, services, products, or accommodations $ 66,000.00

(3) Any other (expenditures) (expenses) (costs) brought on by injury to person

THE TOTAL OF FUTURE ECONOMIC LOSS MUST EQUAL YOUR ANSWER TO INTERROGATORY (D)(1). n103

As the jury verdict form shows under (E)(1), the amount of wages, salaries, or other lost compensation totaled $ 300,000, and the costs for medical care or treatment totaled $ 66,000. The workers' compensation benefits in this case compensated the victim for precisely the type of harm that the jury deemed should be compensated. Therefore, the common pleas court's comments concerning inadequate compensation of an injured party who receives workers' compensation are inapplicable to the present case. n104

V. CONCLUSION

The prevalence of statutes limiting liability in all types of tort actions indicates that the abrogation of the collateral source rule will continue. At least ten states have modified the collateral source rule either for medical malpractice actions or for personal injury actions. n105 Despite the argument that these statutes deprive a plaintiff of a full recovery while granting the defendant a windfall, these statutes allow a jury to determine the total compensation to which the plaintiff is entitled. The plaintiff then receives this amount -- although he may not receive the entire amount from the defendant -- and he may receive [*610] the amount over a period of years, but the plaintiff does receive the amount his injury is deemed to be worth. Damage caps, on the other hand, limit compensation to the statutory amount, regardless of the "true" value of the injury. If the goal of tort law is primarily to compensate the injured victim, then the elimination of the collateral source rule may serve this purpose more effectively than damage caps.

Ohio's latest modification of the collateral source rule, when considered with its provisions for medical malpractice actions and actions against political subdivisions, essentially abolishes the collateral source rule. Section 2317.45 is quite thorough in defining what types of benefits qualify as offsetting collateral benefits. The statute is much less clear concerning the procedures to enforce and review the disclosures made by the plaintiff. Section 2317.45, unlike some other statutes, defines the time period in which collateral benefits must be disclosed. Given the long time span covered by the statute, defendants need an opportunity to verify the accuracy of the collateral benefits, and to obtain review during the five-year period following the entry of judgment.

The injustice of offsetting workers' compensation benefits, thereby creating a windfall for a defendant, could be remedied by explicitly excluding workers' compensation benefits from the provisions of the statute, or by providing a statutory right of subrogation for workers' compensation benefits.

The Ohio legislature may wish to avoid the problem of attorneys' fees by amending the statute to include terms similar to Alaska's statute, n106 requiring the court to award costs and attorneys' fees before evidence of collateral benefits may be introduced. This would eliminate one of the strong incentives parties may have to continue litigating.

Until the Ohio Supreme Court decides the constitutionality of section 2317.45, the statute likely will be challenged throughout the state. Given the earlier decisions by the supreme court, which permit the offsetting of collateral benefits in medical malpractice actions, it seems unlikely that the court would not permit offsetting of collateral benefits in other actions. The supreme court may be concerned that an injured plaintiff in a workers' compensation case could be denied a pain and suffering recovery. Rather than strike the entire statute, the court could require that, in order for the statute to apply, the jury's verdict must be divided into separate damage amounts. In that way, it would be clear whether the plaintiff was receiving a double recovery.

As a whole, section 2317.45 is a reasonable statute. Those who oppose the statute argue that the insurance crisis is a result not entirely of large verdicts, but of attorneys and insurance companies. n107 Even if this is true, this does not justify overturning section 2317.45. Instead, other statutes should be passed to deal with all of the forces that push insurance rates unreasonably high. The [*611] workers' compensation bureau and other administrative agencies that also battle rising costs can remedy the perceived unfairness of section 2317.45 by providing for subrogation rights. By doing so, these agencies would fall outside of the statute. Rather than overrule one important attempt to contain rising insurance costs, the courts and the legislature should resolve some of the finer details of section 2317.45, and concentrate upon containing costs in other areas.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 See Ruth Gastel, The Civil Justice System, INSURANCE INFORMATION INSTITUTE (Feb. 1991); Linda J. Gobis, Note, Lambert V. Wrensch: Another Step Toward Abrogation of the Collateral Source Rule in Wisconsin, 1988 WIS. L. REV. 857 (1988); Amanda E. Haiduc, Note, The Tale of Three Damage Caps: Too Much Too Little and Finally Just Right, 40 CASE W. RES. L. REV. 825 (1990); L. Timothy Perrin, Comment, The Collateral Source Rule in Texas: Its Impending Demise and a Proposed Modification, 18 TEX. TECH L. REV. 961 (1987); see generally Ralph D. Gaines Jr. & William K. Hancock, Tort Reform in Alabama: A Proponent's Perspective, 18 CUMB. L. REV. 649 (1988); Perry Pazer & Tim Hogan, The New Collateral Source Rule: Is It Constitutional?, 18 TRIAL L. Q. 9 (1987).

n2 See sources cited supra note 1.

n3 Haiduc, supra note 1, at 825. See generally Ruth Gastel, Medical Malpractice, INSURANCE INFORMATION INSTITUTE (Feb. 1991).

n4 See Haiduc, supra note 1, at 825; Gastel, supra note 3.

n5 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2307.43 (Baldwin 1990). In August, 1991, the Ohio Supreme Court held that section 2307.43 was unconstitutional. Morris v. Savoy, 576 N.E.2d 765 (Ohio 1991).

n6 Nancy L. Manzer, Note, 1986 Tort Reform Legislation: A Systematic Evaluation of Caps on Damages and Limitations on Joint and Several Liability, 73 CORNELL L. REV. 628, 628 (1988). Some writers blame attorneys for the rising costs of insurance. See Dennis McLellan, Surfeit of Civil Suits is a Crime, Advocate of Tort Reform Says, L.A. TIMES, Aug. 15, 1990, at E1 (Orange County ed.). In this article, McLellan discusses a recent book by Robert V. Wills, entitled "Why Lawyers are Killing America." Id. Wills blames the rise in litigation for the spiraling costs of liability insurance. Id. Another author writes that "[t]he courts, insurance carriers and defense lawyers are the three main culprits in rising insurance defense costs," which translates into higher overall insurance rates. Defense Lawyer Fingers Culprits in Cost Spiral, THE NATIONAL UNDERWRITER COMPANY PROPERTY & CASUALTY/EMPLOYEE BENEFITS Edition 26

(Nov. 19, 1990).

n7 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § § 2305.27, 2743.02, 2317.45 (Baldwin 1990).

n8 STANTON DARLING, OHIO CIVIL JUSTICE REFORM ACT (1987). The Sixth Circuit agreed that the state legislature intended to prevent double recoveries with section 2317.45.

The purpose of the Ohio law . . . seems to be to prevent injured plaintiffs from receiving a windfall due to their injury. The statute requires that damage awards be adjusted for collateral benefits received as a result of . . . the injury so that a plaintiff will receive, in total, only the amount that a jury has determined to be adequate compensation for the particular injury.

Baker v. Goldblatt, No. 91-3508, 1992 WL 12679, at *5 (6th Cir. Jan. 30, 1992).

n9 DARLING, supra note 8, at 3.

n10 Id.

n11 Perrin, supra note 1, at 961.

n12 Id. at 966.

n13 Id. at 983.

n14 Joseph F. Cunningham, Collateral Source: Double Judgment or Double Trouble, 9 DISTRICT LAW 34, 35 (1985).

n15 Gobis, supra note 1, at 860-61.

n16 263 N.E.2d 235 (Ohio 1970).

n17 Id. at 239.

n18 Id.

n19 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45 (Baldwin 1990).

n20 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45(B)(1). The relevant sections of the statute are reproduced below:

(A)(1) As used in this section:

(a) "Collateral benefits" means benefits that a plaintiff has received, or may be entitled to receive within the next sixty months after the entry of judgment, as a result of an injury, death, or loss to person or property that is a subject of a tort action, from any of the following:

(i) The government of the United States, or any state or any political subdivision of any state, under a program that provides medical, hospital, sickness, dental, or other health benefits, including, but not limited to, social security, medicare, or medicaid;

(ii) A federal, state, or political subdivision of a state disability income or workers' compensation program, or a wage continuation program of an employer;

(iii) A medical, hospital, sickness, dental, or other health insurance program;

(iv) An accident insurance program that provides medical, hospital, sickness, dental, or other health benefits;

(v) A contract or agreement under which medical, hospital, sickness, dental, or other health services are provided or under which the cost of those services are paid for or reimbursed.

(b) "Rights of recoupment" means rights or [sic] recoupment through subrogation, trust agreement, contract, lien, operation of law, or otherwise.

(c) "Tort action" means a civil action for damages for injury, death, or loss to person or property. "Tort action" includes a product liability claim that is subject to sections 2307.71 to 2307.80 of the Revised Code, but does not include a civil action for damages for a breach of contract or another agreement between persons.

(d) "Trier of fact" means the jury or, in a nonjury action, the court.

(2) As used in this division and divisions (B)(2)(a) and (c)(i) of this section, "plaintiff" includes, in a wrongful death action, the decedent and all beneficiaries of the action.

(B)(1) Except as provided in division (C) of this section, if a plaintiff in a tort action is entitled to an award of compensatory damages, that plaintiff shall disclose to the court after such entitlement is determined all relevant collateral benefits, all rights of recoupment relative to the disclosed collateral benefits, and the costs, premiums, or charges for any of the disclosed collateral benefits paid or contributed within the three-year period immediately preceding the accrual of the cause of action, by the plaintiff, any member of his immediate family, or the employer of the plaintiff or any member of his immediate family or, in a wrongful death action, the decedent, any beneficiary of the action, the employer of the decedent or any beneficiary of the action, any member of the immediate family of the decedent or any such beneficiary, or the employer of any member of the immediate family of the decedent or any such beneficiary.

n21 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45(B)(2). The full text of this subsection reads as follows:

(B)(2) Upon the disclosure required by division (B)(1) of this section, the court shall do all of the following:

(a) Determine whether both of the following are satisfied in relation to any of the disclosed collateral benefits:

(i) The plaintiff has received the disclosed collateral benefit or is reasonably certain to receive it within the next sixty months after the entry of judgment;

(ii) There are no rights of recoupment respecting the disclosed collateral benefit.

n22 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45(B)(2)(b). The full text of this subsection reads as follows:

(b) As to any disclosed collateral benefits in relation to which both requirements of division (B)(2)(a) of this section are satisfied, determine the total of the costs, premiums, or charges for such benefits paid or contributed within the three-year period immediately preceding the accrual of the cause of action, by the plaintiff, any member of his immediate family, or the employer of the plaintiff or any member of his immediate family or, in a wrongful death action, the decedent, any beneficiary of the action, the employer of the decedent or any beneficiary of the action, any member of the immediate family of the decedent or any such beneficiary, or the employer of any member of the immediate family of the decedent or any such beneficiary[.]

Two federal courts recently interpreted this subsection. In Deaton v. Dreis and Krump Manufacturing Co., 134 F.R.D. 219 (N.D. Ohio 1991), the district court held that in determining the amount of workers' compensation premiums paid by the employer that will be added back to the jury award, the employer's contribution is not limited to the amount paid on behalf of the particular employee. Id. at 225. That is, although the employer had paid only $ 5.27 in workers' compensation premiums for the plaintiff-employee, the court added back to the plaintiff's award the total amount of workers' compensation benefits the employer paid during the three years prior to the plaintiff's injury. Id. In this case, the employee had received $ 11,618.64 in workers' compensation, and the employer had paid $ 15,624 in premiums. Id. at 225. Therefore, the court concluded that the plaintiff's workers' compensation "which the statute requires be deducted from the verdict, is entirely offset by his employer's contribution." Id.

The Sixth Circuit disagreed with this interpretation in Baker v. Goldblatt, No. 91-3508, 1992 WL 12679 (6th Cir. Jan. 30, 1992). According to the court, "collateral benefits received by a plaintiff should be adjusted only by that portion of en employer's workers' compensation premiums directly related to the employment fo the particular plaintiff." Id. at *4.

n23 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45(B)(2)(c). The full text of this subsection reads as follows:

(c) Prior to entering judgment for the plaintiff, do both of the following:

(i) Subtract from the compensatory damages that the plaintiff otherwise would be awarded the amount of any disclosed collateral benefits in relation to which both requirements of division (B)(2)(a) of this section are satisfied;

(ii) Subject to the limitation specified in this division, add to the balance derived under division (B)(2)(c)(i) of this section the total of any costs, premiums, and charges described in division (B)(2)(b) of this section. The amount of those costs, premiums, and charges that is added to that balance shall not exceed any amount subtracted pursuant to division (B)(2)(c)(i) of this section from the compensatory damages that the plaintiff otherwise would be awarded.

An example of how this would operate is as follows: Suppose that the jury renders a verdict for the plaintiff for compensatory damages in the amount of $ 10,000.00. Based upon evidence presented by the defendant, the judge determines that the plaintiff is entitled to collateral benefits from her insurance company of $ 6,000.00. The judge then subtracts the $ 6,000.00 of collateral benefits from the jury award for compensatory damages, which leaves the plaintiff with a $ 4,000.00 recovery. However, because the plaintiff paid $ 1,000.00 in premiums for the insurance coverage she received, the court adds this $ 1,000.00 to the $ 4,000.00 recovery. The result is that the plaintiff is entitled to receive $ 5,000.00 from the defendant.

n24 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45(B)(3). The full text of this subsection reads as follows:

(3) Except as provided in division (B)(1) of this section, in another section of the Revised Code, or in the Rules of Evidence, evidence of collateral benefits is not admissible in a tort action and shall not be submitted to or considered by the trier of fact in determining whether to award compensatory damages to a plaintiff in a tort action or in determining the amount of any such damages.

n25 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45(B)(1), (B)(2). Ohio's statute is unique with respect to the duration of its disclosure requirements. See, e.g., CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 52-225a (West 1990) (providing that benefits up to the date of judgment may be deducted). See also MICH. COMP. LAWS ANN. § 600.6303 (West 1990) (Court must first determine that there is a previously existing contractual or statutory obligation on the part of the collateral source to pay the benefits before they may be deducted).

n26 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45(B)(2)(a)(i).

n27 22 AM. JUR. 2D Damages § 23 (1988). Black's Law Dictionary defines compensatory damages as "such as will compensate the injured party for the injury sustained, and nothing more; such as will simply make good or replace the loss caused by the wrong or injury." BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY 390 (6th ed. 1990). Dan Dobbs writes that "[t]he damages award is substitutionary relief, that is, it gives the plaintiff money mainly by way of compensation, to make up for some loss that was not, originally, a money loss, but one that ordinarily may be measured in money." DAN DOBBS, REMEDIES 135 (1973).

n28 In Ohio, workers' compensation legislation became effective in 1913. See OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § § 4123.01-4123.99 (Baldwin 1990). The Ohio Constitution mandates the establishment of workers' compensation by employers. OHIO CONST. art. II, § 35. There is no right of subrogation included in the workers' compensation statutes, which means that an employee who receives workers' compensation benefits will fall within the scope of § 2317.45.

n29 81 AM. JUR. 2D Workmen's Compensation § § 1-3 (1976).

n30 Id. at § 2.

n31 Ohio Manufacturers' Association, THE FACTS ABOUT WHY OHIO NEEDS TOTAL REFORM FOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION 7 (Fall/1985 Reform Proposal).

Workers' Compensation rests upon the economic principle that those persons who enjoy the product of a business -- whether it be in the form of goods or services -- should ultimately bear the cost of the injuries or deaths that are incident to the manufacture, preparation and distribution of the product. . . . If the cost is a predictable incident of the operation, sound business judgment demands that it be included as an element of the price.

WEX S. MALONE, ET. AL., CASES AND MATERIALS ON WORKERS' COMPENSATION AND EMPLOYMENT RIGHTS 39 (1980).

n32 See OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § § 2317.45(B)(1), (B)(2)(c)(i).

n33 ALASKA STAT. § 09.17.070 (1990).

n34 See supra note 31.

n35 Perrin, supra note 1, at 991. Subrogation is "the substitution of one person in the place of another with reference to a lawful claim or right. . . . It is the machinery by which the equities of one man are worked out through the legal rights of another." 73 AM. JUR. 2D § 1 (1974). Conceptually, subrogation resembles other equitable doctrines which are designed to prevent unjust enrichment. "[Subrogation] is not an absolute right, but one which depends on the equities and attending facts and circumstances of each case." Id. at § 11. The factors to consider when determining whether a right of subrogation exists include: the secondary liability of the person claiming subrogation rights, or "the necessity of acting to protect his own interests, or . . . an agreement that he is to have security." Id.

n36 Morris v. Savoy, 576 N.E.2d 765 (Ohio 1991).

n37 Id. at 772.

n38 Id.

n39 Id. at 773.

n40 Cook v. Wineberry Deli, Inc., No. 14841, 1991 WL 131485 (Ohio Ct. App., Summit Cty. July 17, 1991).

n41 Id. at *1.

n42 Id.

n43 Cook v. Wineberry Deli, Inc., No. CV88 08 2737, 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *5. (Summit Cty. Oct. 8, 1990). Although the analysis of section 2317.45 is quite extensive, it is important to note that the judge adopted plaintiffs' brief, and incorporated it, verbatim, as the opinion of the court.

n44 Id. at *6. Although the research in the plaintiff's brief cites research to the contrary, there is an abundance of literature which cites a litigation explosion as a primary cause of rising insurance rates. See sources cited supra note 1.

n45 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *6.

n46 Id.

n47 Id. at *6-7.

n48 Id. at *8-9. What is noticeably absent from the court's opinion is a discussion of the legislature's response to the insurance crisis in Ohio. Also absent from the court's analysis was a discussion of the widespread trends in other states which limited recoveries in tort actions. See supra notes 1-6.

n49 Cook v. Wineberry Deli, Inc., 1991 WL 131485, at *4 (Ohio Ct. App Summit Cty. July 17, 1991).

n50 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *11. See OHIO CONST. art. I, § 5.

n51 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *11.

n52 Id. at *13.

n53 Id. at *13-14. Although this analogy has some merit, arguably the true effect of the statute is to achieve an equitable apportionment of damages; this is the crucial difference between remittitur and section 2317.45. Remittitur occurs "[i]f money damages awarded by a jury are grossly excessive as a matter of law, [whereupon] the judge may order the plaintiff to remit a portion of the award." BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY 1295 (6th ed. 1990). In contrast, the judge's deduction of collateral benefits under section 2317.45 is not based upon the assumption that the jury's award was excessive. Instead, the deduction is based upon the realization that the plaintiff's recovery was excessive. Under section 2317.45, the injured party still receives the compensation awarded by the jury. If remittitur were applied, the total recovery to which the injured party is deemed entitled would be reduced.

n54 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *15.

n55 Id.

n56 Id. at *16.

n57 Id. at *16-17. This particular comment suggests that because the benefits are deducted from what a defendant otherwise would pay, justice was not achieved. Such a position ignores one of the primary goals of tort law: to compensate the injured party. This argument perhaps would be more persuasive in the criminal context where there are multiple purposes to be served by the judicial system. See generally SANFORD H. KADISH & STEPHEN J. SCHULHOFER, CRIMINAL LAW AND ITS PROCESSES (1989).

n58 Cook v. Wineberry Deli, Inc., No. 14841, 1991 WL 131485, *5 (Ohio Ct. App. Summit Cty. July 17, 1991).

n59 OHIO CONST. art. 1, § 16.

n60 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *20.

n61 1991 WL 131485 at *5-6.

n62 Cook v. Wineberry Deli, Inc., No. CV88 08 2737, 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *24 (Summit Cty. Oct. 8, 1990).

n63 The statute violated due process under both the Ohio Constitution and the United States Constitution. U.S. CONST. amend. XIV., OHIO CONST. art. I, § 16.

n64 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *33.

n65 Id.

n66 Id. at *34-35.

n67 Cook v. Wineberry Deli, Inc., No. 14841, 1991 WL 131485 at *7 (Ohio Ct. App. Summit Cty. July 17, 1991).

n68 Id.

n69 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *42-43.

n70 Id. at *43. According to the court, "heightened rational basis" could be applied to the statute if an "important" rather than a "fundamental" right is infringed. Id. at *46-47.

n71 Morris v. Savoy, 576 N.E.2d 765 (Ohio 1991).

n72 Id. at 772.

n73 Id.

n74 Jeffers v. Phillips Ready Mix, No. 90 CA 0057, 1991 Ohio App. LEXIS 50 (Greene Cty. Jan 8, 1991). The court makes no reference to the Cook decision. It appears that the constitutionality of section 2317.45 was not challenged.

n75 Id. at *1.

n76 Id.

n77 Id.

n78 Id. These collateral benefits were from workers' compensation. Id. This case is similar to Cook in that the plaintiffs received workers' compensation even though the employer had no responsibility for plaintiffs' injuries, yet the plaintiffs also received jury awards from defendants.

n79 Id. at *3.

n80 Id. at *4-5. Essentially, plaintiff is arguing that workers' compensation did not compensate him for this future pain and suffering, and therefore that this amount should not be deducted. See supra notes 28-32 and accompanying text.

n81 1991 Ohio App. LEXIS 50, at *6. This argument actually presents the opposite of what is discussed earlier. See supra notes 25-26 and accompanying text. That is, it seemed that one of the problems with section 2317.45 is that the defendant would have to rely upon the plaintiff's disclosure of collateral benefits. In this case, however, the plaintiff did not inform the jury of all his medical expenses, and the defendant had evidence of benefits which exceed these disclosed expenses. In other words, the plaintiff has to be careful to inform the jury of all expenses, because he will be held accountable for all of the benefits, even if the jury was underinformed.

n82 1991 Ohio App. LEXIS 50, at *4.

n83 Id.

n84 Id. at *5. By holding this way, the court does overlook one of the purposes of section 2317.45: to prevent a double recovery.

n85 Id. at *6. Although the court does not explicitly say so, it appears that plaintiffs' argument in Cook that section 2317.45 deprived them of a jury trial had little merit in this court. See supra notes 50-58 and accompanying text.

n86 Sorrell v. Thevenir, slip op., No. 89 CL 121 (Ohio Ct. C.P. Gallia County Jan. 14, 1991).

n87 See Defendant's Notice of Appeal in the appendix to Defendant-Appellant's Brief at i, Sorrell (No. 91-CA04).

n88 Sorrell, slip. op. No. 89 CL 121, at 9.

n89 Id. at 5-12.

n90 Id. at 1.

n91 Id. at 2.

n92 Defendant-Appellant's Brief at 1-2, Sorrell (No. 91-CA-4).

n93 Id. at 2.

n94 See Defendant-Appellant's Brief, Sorrell (No. 91-CA04); Plaintiffs-Appellees Brief, Sorrell (No. 91-CA-4). See also supra notes 40-70 and accompanying text.

n95 See supra notes 8-9 and accompanying text. See generally PETER W. HUBER, LIABILITY (1988). Huber writes eloquently of the insurance crisis that spread across the United States over the past two decades.

n96 See supra note 8 and accompanying text.

n97 Id.

n98 See supra notes 96-97 and accompanying text.

n99 See ALASKA STAT. § § 09.17.070 (1989), 09.55.548 (Supp. 1986); ARIZ. REV. STAT. ANN. § 12-565 (1989); CAL. CIV. CODE § 333.1 (West 1990); CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 52-225a (West 1990); FLA. STAT. ANN. § 768.76 (West 1990); IND. CODE ANN. § 34-4-36-2 (West 1990); MICH. COMP. LAWS ANN. § 600.6303 (West 1990); MINN. STAT. § 548.36 (1990); OR. REV. STAT. § 18.580 (1989); UTAH CODE ANN. § 78-14-4.5 (1990).

n100 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2744.05 (Baldwin 1990).

n101 Menefee v. Queen City Metro, 550 N.E.2d 181 (Ohio 1990).

n102 See id.

n103 Cook v. Wineberry Deli, Inc., No. CV88 08 2737, 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *55-56 (Summit Cty. Oct. 8, 1990).

n104 See supra notes 55-56 and accompanying text. The court in Jeffers alluded to the potential unfairness of deducting benefits that had not already compensated the injured party. See supra note 84 and accompanying text.

n105 See supra note 99 and accompanying text.

n106 See supra note 33 and accompanying text.

n107 See supra notes 46-48 and accompanying text.

While much of the emphasis in tort reform was upon controlling the rising cost of medical insurance, in large part due to high malpractice verdicts, there also was a concern about rising insurance rates in other highly litigious areas. One commentator suggested that in addition to rising insurance costs, state legislatures increasingly believed that the judicial system was not working efficiently and therefore that some sort of statutory damage limitation was necessary. "Although the 'insurance crisis' was the most widely publicized factor that led states to adopt tort reform measures, the state legislatures also were responding to scholarship indicating that the tort system failed to achieve its compensatory objectives and therefore should be substantially modified or even eliminated." n6

This perceived crisis in insurance led many states, including Ohio, to abolish the collateral source rule altogether. Ohio enacted statutes to eliminate the collateral source rule first for medical malpractice claims and for claims regarding political subdivision immunity, and then for general negligence claims. n7 Although an insurance crisis certainly was a motivating force, at least in Ohio there was a concern over the plaintiffs who, under the collateral source rule, were receiving a double recovery. n8 According to the author of Ohio's [*589] most recent statute abolishing the collateral source rule, the primary purpose of the statute is to prevent an injured party from receiving a double recovery. n9 The author noted previous legislative attempts to reduce awards by collateral benefits, including Ohio Revised Code section 2305.27, which applies to medical malpractice actions. n10

III. HISTORY OF THE COLLATERAL SOURCE RULE

Before addressing the specifics of the statutory modifications of the collateral source rule, it first seems appropriate to consider the rule's long history. The rule has both an evidentiary and a damage component. As one commentator explains, "[a]s a rule of evidence, it precludes introduction into evidence of any benefits the plaintiff obtained from sources collateral to the defendant. As a rule of damages, it forces the defendant to pay for the entire loss he caused despite independent recoveries by the plaintiff for the same loss." n11

One popular justification for the collateral source rule is that the defendant should not benefit from his wrongful conduct. n12 Other justifications are that "the plaintiff should retain any benefit he obtained on his own or which was intended for him alone, and . . . the defendant should not benefit from plaintiff's receipt of compensation from sources independent of the defendant." n13

Another commentator stated that "[i]t is considered better that an injured party receive double recovery than that a wrongdoer be relieved of liability for damages, especially since one purpose of accessing [sic] damages is to deter negligent conduct and encourage due care in the future." n14 However, another writer recognized that:

The collateral source rule has evolved from opposing principles of tort law. First, the rule conflicts with the compensatory function of tort law. Full compensation is provided when the plaintiff is restored to the position he or she occupied before the tort occurred. If a plaintiff receives compensation from a third party not connected to the defendant, receipt of these benefits should in theory be used to reduce the tortfeasor's total damages. However, the collateral source rule requires the tortfeasor to pay the judgment even though the plaintiff has already been partly or completely compensated for the injuries suffered. [*590] Thus, double recovery is possible and the plaintiff can be put in a better position than before the tort occurred. The collateral source rule also conflicts with the damage mitigation principle . . . because receipt of benefits from a collateral source does not act to mitigate damages. n15

The leading Ohio case on the collateral source rule is Pryor v. Webber. n16 In Pryor the plaintiff brought a negligence action and argued that evidence of diminished wages paid by her employer should not have been admitted. The Ohio Supreme Court agreed. In construing the collateral source rule, the court held that "the receipt of collateral benefits is deemed irrelevant and immaterial on the issue of damages." n17 Because the court held that the benefits were irrelevant, the jury should not hear evidence concerning plaintiff's receipt of employer benefits, nor should the court deduct the benefits.

The court stated that "[t]he entire theory of the collateral source rule is to keep the jury from learning anything about the collateral income so that it will not influence the decision of the jury." n18 The jury may decide in a plaintiff's favor regardless of whether the evidence of collateral benefits is introduced; however, the jury could deduct from its award an amount equal to, or greater than, the admitted benefits. Such an outcome could not be controlled or predicted by the trial judge.

IV. ABROGATION OF THE COLLATERAL SOURCE RULE

The Ohio legislature eliminated the collateral source rule by enacting Ohio Revised Code section 2317.45 (also referred to as H.B. 1), effective in 1988. n19 The scope of the statute is extremely broad. The statute provides:

[I]f a plaintiff in a tort action is entitled to an award of compensatory damages, that plaintiff shall disclose to the court after such entitlement is determined all collateral benefits, all rights of recoupment relative to the disclosed collateral benefits, and the costs, premiums, or charges for any of the disclosed collateral benefits paid or contributed within the three-year period immediately preceding the accrual of the cause of action. n20

[*591] Once disclosure is made by the plaintiff, the court must determine whether "[t]he plaintiff has received the disclosed collateral benefit or is reasonably certain to receive it within the next sixty months after the entry of judgment" and that "[t]here are no rights of recoupment respecting the disclosed collateral [*592] benefit." n21 Following this determination, the court must calculate the costs of premiums paid for the collateral benefit. n22 Then, the court must, "prior to entering judgment for the plaintiff . . . subtract from the compensatory damages that the plaintiff otherwise would be awarded the amount of any disclosed collateral benefits . . . [and] add to the balance derived . . . the total of any costs, premiums, and charges." n23

[*593] According to the statute, the court makes all determinations concerning the offset of the collateral benefits, and "evidence of collateral benefits is not admissible in a tort action and shall not be submitted to or considered by the trier of fact in determining whether to award compensatory damages to a plaintiff . . . or in determining the amount of any such damages." n24

A. Analysis

Certainly one of the most problematic aspects of Ohio's collateral benefits statute is the time frame during which benefits must be disclosed. The plaintiff [*594] is required to disclose all collateral benefits which meet the definitions in subsection (A)(1) and which were received three years prior to the accrual of the cause of action or which may be received up to five years following judgment. n25 According to subsection (B)(1), the plaintiff would wait until he or she is awarded damages before informing the court of any collateral benefits. If this is the case, not only will it be difficult for a plaintiff to collect and report all the benefits received, but it will be equally, if not more difficult, for the defendant to determine the accuracy and completeness of the plaintiff's disclosures. For example, if the judgment is entered three years after the cause of action accrued, the plaintiff must account for payments made up to six years earlier. In addition, the plaintiff must predict five years into the future what benefits will be received, and the defendant must rely upon this prediction. The statute does not provide for any special policing mechanism. If the plaintiff is "reasonably certain" to receive a benefit within five years, the court will consider it. n26 Although it is conceivable that the plaintiff will receive unanticipated benefits, the statute does not provide for a re-evaluation or opportunity for another hearing during the five-year period.

Another potential problem area concerns the meaning of "compensatory" damages as used in the statute. In general, compensatory damages are defined as:

[D]amages in satisfaction of, or in recompense for, loss or injury sustained. They compensate a plaintiff for actual injury or loss resulting, for instance, from bodily injury or property damage. The term covers all loss recoverable as a matter of right and includes all damages (beyond nominal damages) other than punitive or exemplary damages. n27

The meaning of compensatory damages in the context of section 2317.45 becomes important when considering an offset of workers' compensation [*595] benefits. n28 Workers' compensation is awarded upon a scale based upon the type of injury sustained, and its purpose is to prevent the hardship to an employee of proving employer negligence. n29 Workers' compensation essentially operates so that "a right to compensation is given for all injuries incident to the employment . . . the amount of which is limited and determined in accordance with a definite schedule." n30

There are many theories underlying workers' compensation. According to the Ohio Manufacturers'

Association:

The fundamental principle of the [Workers' Compensation Act] was the establishment of a balance between the interests of labor in receiving fair compensation for injured members of the work force, and the interests of industry in being able to anticipate the costs of compensation as a portion of its overall cost of doing business. Concessions were made on both sides in the attempt to balance these interests. Injured workers gave up the right to sue their employers by agreeing that their sole remedy would be compensation through a newly created state insurance fund. In return, employers agreed to prompt payment of compensation regardless of fault. n31

The issue with respect to workers' compensation and the operation of section 2317.45 is the following: Suppose that a plaintiff has received workers' compensation benefits, and receives a special jury verdict that includes damages for emotional pain and suffering. Theoretically, it is unclear whether the workers' compensation benefits should be deducted from the plaintiff's [*596] recovery, since workers' compensation benefits are not intended to compensate the plaintiff for emotional pain and suffering.

Thus, in the case of the plaintiff/employee who receives a large jury award for emotional pain and suffering, there is a strong argument that this plaintiff was never compensated by workers' compensation, and that, therefore, there should be no offset, particularly when the purported interest in enacting the statute was to prevent a double recovery. If a plaintiff was never compensated for pain and suffering, then there hardly could be a double recovery.

Although this is a theoretically sound argument, the legislature explicitly refers to the term "compensatory" throughout the text of section 2317.45. n32 If the legislature's ultimate goal was to limit judgment amounts as much as possible, then compensatory damages clearly would include traditional compensatory damages. Most likely the legislature's concern was upon limiting the final dollar amount of a plaintiff's recovery, as is the case with damage caps, rather than upon a direct correlation between the type of collateral benefit received and the particular type of damages awarded.

Yet another problematic area involves the awarding of attorneys' fees. In the typical case the jury most likely will render a verdict far enough in excess of the collateral benefits received that the attorney will be able to recover a fee from the excess. However, it is possible to imagine a situation in which, for example, over the course of several years the plaintiff has received, and spent, $ 20,000 in collateral benefits. After years of litigation, the plaintiff finally receives a jury verdict in an amount that is $ 20,000 or less. Because the collateral benefits are deducted before the defendant pays the judgment, there is no money available for the attorney. This poses several interesting issues.

First, this could deter a plaintiff's attorney from handling a case he otherwise might have because of a fear that no money will remain to pay his fee. Second, rather than discourage costly litigation, the statute encourages it. When faced with little or no recovery, both the plaintiff and the plaintiff's attorney have increased incentive to fight over the deduction of benefits. Third, an offset of nearly all of the judgment would result in an extremely dissatisfied plaintiff. An individual who was injured two or three years earlier, and who received benefits during those years, may have received only $ 200 or $ 300 per week, which probably was spent as it was received. After going through the time and expense of a trial, and after being awarded damages, the plaintiff still receives nothing. Such a result could encourage both the plaintiff and the plaintiff's attorney to settle for an amount below which the plaintiff may otherwise be willing to settle.

Alaska has solved the dilemma of recovering attorneys' fees by providing in its collateral benefits statute:

[*597] [A]fter the fact finder has rendered an award to a claimant, and after the court has awarded costs and attorneys fees, a defendant may introduce evidence of amounts received or to be received by the claimant as compensation for the same injury from collateral sources that do not have a right of subrogation by law or contract. n33

There remains the troubling issue that was the root of the collateral source rule: Should the defendant benefit from his wrong? When the collateral benefits consist of workers' compensation benefits, it appears even more unjust that the defendant should escape financial responsibility for his wrong while the state workers' compensation bureau does not.

On the other hand, if the view of the Ohio Manufacturers' Association is accepted, then workers' compensation should absorb a loss which is an "incident" of employment. n34 While it seems unfair for the plaintiff to receive a double recovery, it also may seem unfair for workers' compensation to pay the defendant's bill. Perhaps the appropriate response to this issue would be to expand those programs that have subrogation rights. n35 Then, the defendant would be required to pay the amount of the judgment, the plaintiff would not receive a double recovery, and workers' compensation funds would be replaced. Rather than repeal the statute or declare it unconstitutional because of this discrepancy, those institutions that regularly pay such types of benefits could adopt subrogation rights.

B. Ohio Case Law

Relatively little litigation has arisen concerning the application and constitutionality of section 2317.45. The Ohio Supreme Court has not directly addressed the statute; however, given the split of opinion that is developing in the lower courts, it is likely that the supreme court will need to resolve the constitutionality of section 2317.45.

[*598] 1. Morris v. Savoy

In August, 1991, the Ohio Supreme Court held that the Ohio statute that placed a cap upon medical malpractice recoveries was unconstitutional. n36 Interestingly, however, the court held that section 2305.27, which abrogated the collateral source rule for medical malpractice claims, was constitutional. The court made a number of statements regarding the ability of the state legislature to modify the collateral source rule that indicate that, should the constitutionality of section 2317.45 be challenged, the court would hold it constitutional.

According to the court, the legislature's intent in enacting section 2305.27 was to prevent particular kinds of double recoveries, "specifically those which would duplicate recovery from funds that are directly, or indirectly, supported by the general public or the business community, e.g., public welfare or workers' compensation. . . ." n37

The court distinguished the unconstitutional damages cap from section 2305.27: "Such a setoff may inure to the benefit of the tortfeasor, but it does not do so to the detriment of the victim as does the damage cap of R.C. 2307.43. . . ." n38 The court also permitted a setoff of plaintiff's future workers' compensation payments "to the extent they can be determined with a reasonable degree of certainty." n39

2. Cook v. Wineberry Deli

In July 1991, the Court of Appeals for Summit County reversed a common pleas court decision holding section 2317.45 unconstitutional. n40 Because this case provides the most comprehensive analysis of section 2317.45 to date, the arguments provided by the lower court, and rejected by the court of appeals, will be discussed in detail. The arguments addressed in these two decisions comprise the major arguments in opposition to the constitutionality of section 2317.45.

After bringing a personal injury and loss of consortium action against defendant Wineberry Deli, the plaintiffs, Timothy and Karen Cook, received a jury award of $ 400,000 in compensatory damages. n41 Defendant moved to apply section 2317.45 to the $ 33,646.97 of workers' compensation benefits [*599] plaintiff received. n42 The common pleas court denied this motion and held that section 2317.45 unconstitutionally deprived plaintiffs of "their right to a jury trial, their right to an open court and a remedy, their right to due process, and their right to equal protection under the law." n43

Before analyzing the constitutional issues posed by the collateral benefits statute, the common pleas court reviewed some of the legislative history presented by plaintiffs. The court noted that the Ohio Alliance for Civil Justice "supported [the statute], originally citing a 'litigation explosion' as the root cause of unaffordable or unavailable liability insurance. It was also claimed that high jury awards caused liability insurance premiums to rise, making it impossible for business to operate with a safety net of insurance, consequently having a detrimental effect on investment and production." n44 The court also noted that the Ohio Alliance for Civil Justice received its support primarily from business and insurance companies. n45

One group opposing the passage of section 2317.45 was the Ohio Public Interest Campaign. The group argued that "the insurance industry had contrived the insurance crisis solely for the purpose of promoting and protecting 'organized price gouging' by underwriters." n46

Relying upon several studies, the common pleas court discussed evidence that [I]nsurance industry profits had actually increased by 505% since 1985. Furthermore, the insurance industry enjoyed net gains of approximately 75 billion dollars between 1976 and 1985. A National Association of Attorneys General Report states that since 1975 the property/casualty stock index has risen more than 500%. This rise was five times the increase in the Dow Jones Industrial Average. n47

The court concluded that:

[T]he purpose of [the statute] was not to end the insurance crisis that was contrived by businesses and insurance companies. . . . [The statute] did not seek fairness for all; it favored businesses and insurance companies. . . . [It] [*600] was enacted as neither a means of ensuring the availability of insurance coverage, as set out in the bill's preamble, nor as a measure of fairness to all Ohio citizens, as stated by its backers. Rather, it was enacted in response to an 'insurance crisis' contrived by the insurance industry to promote and protect price gouging by underwriters, a basis having no relationship to its stated purpose. n48

The court of appeals did not address this lengthy legislative history. Instead the court noted:

[I]n enacting R.C. 2317.45, the Ohio Legislature was responding to what it perceived as a crisis in the insurance industry due to rising costs and premiums. To relieve this crisis, the legislature determined that the common law collateral source rule should be partly abrogated, thus relieving the insurance industry -- and, ultimately, the public -- of the burden of paying compensation in excess of that required to make injured parties whole. n49

a. Right to a Jury Trial

According to the common pleas court, section 2317.45 violates article 1, section 5 of the Ohio Constitution because it "plainly violates a negligently injured person's right to have all the facts in her or his case determined by a jury." n50 The court based its conclusion upon its perception that "the General Assembly has empowered the judiciary to 'materially change' and limit the right to have a jury determine the amount of any damages to be awarded in tort cases." n51

The common pleas court advanced two additional reasons that section 2317.45 violated the right to a jury trial. First, the court stated that "[t]he effect of the statute is closely akin to that of an automatic remittitur, a court determined reduction of the damages awarded by a jury because the court considers them excessive, even though they are not the result of passion or prejudice." n52 The court then noted that "[r]emittitur is looked on with disfavor [*601] in the Ohio courts, and historically, it may be done only with the consent of the plaintiff." n53

Second, the court disregarded the argument advanced by the defendant that the statute is designed to "prevent[] a double recovery by the plaintiff." n54 The court regarded this argument as "fallacious" and stated that it "presumes that the collateral benefit has completely compensated the tort victim." n55 The fact that the source of the collateral benefit in this case was workers' compensation buttressed the court's statement that "[p]ayments made under Ohio Workers' Compensation Program are not, and were never meant to be complete compensation for an injured employee. Consequently, it is wholly inappropriate to subtract Workers' Compensation benefits from [plaintiffs'] compensatory award." n56

The lower court also stated that even if it were to accept defendant's argument that plaintiffs would be receiving a double recovery, "[t]he wrong done to plaintiff by the defendant is not diminished in any way by the plaintiff's receipt of collateral benefits." n57 The plaintiff was held to be the party most entitled to benefit from the defendant's wrong.

The court of appeals rejected the lower court's reasoning. According to the court:

R.C. 2317.45 specifically preserves the inadmissibility of evidence of collateral benefits at trial, and therefore does not in any way invade the province of the jury in its determination of the central issues of liability and the damages suffered by the plaintiff. The true significance of R.C. 2317.45 does not come into operation until after trial and after the jury's verdict. Cook's argument [*602] ignores the obvious -- that the issue of collateral benefits was never before the jury under the collateral source rule, and this situation is not altered under R.C. 2317.45. Therefore, R.C. 2317.45 neither removes nor adds to any issues before the jury, nor does it alter the trial proceedings in any manner. n58

b. Open Courts and Right to a Remedy

The common pleas court held that section 2317.45 violated Ohio Constitution article I, section 16, which provides that "all courts shall be open, and every person, for an injury done to him in his lands, goods, person or reputation, shall have remedy by due course of law." n59 The court reasoned that the plaintiff is denied a remedy when the jury renders a verdict for compensatory damages and the judge then deducts from that verdict. The court stated:

The parties are being told by the legislature that, regardless of what the finder of fact has determined, the defendant will not be held responsible for the full extent of plaintiff's resulting injuries. . . . The statute] strips a jury verdict of its purpose and significance. It is rendered a sterile, meaningless gesture and a mockery of what is supposed to be a meaningful remedy. n60

The court of appeals strongly disagreed with this argument. The court of appeals stated:

[I]n Cook's view, a meaningful remedy can be had only by holding the negligent tortfeasor responsible to the full extent of injuries suffered, regardless of the extent to which the plaintiff may already have been made whole through other sources of compensation. . . . By enacting R.C. 2317.45, the legislature has now shifted the emphasis in tort actions away from punishing the merely negligent tortfeasor, and toward ensuring that the plaintiff is fully compensated and made whole, regardless of the sources of compensation. Such a decision was properly within the province of the legislature to make. n61

c. Due Process

Because the right to a jury trial and to a remedy are considered fundamental, the common pleas court held that the state must demonstrate that [*603] the statute furthered a "compelling" state interest in order to comply with the requirement of due process of law. n62

The lower court found a number of flaws in the statute, each of which it held violated due process. n63 One problem which the court found particularly troublesome was the possibility of a "double deduction." n64 That is, even though the jury will not be informed of a plaintiff's receipt of collateral benefits, "there is no procedural safeguard for plaintiffs to prevent the jury from discounting the verdict to reflect their own sensibilities regarding collateral benefits and 'double recoveries.'" n65

The common pleas court was troubled by the fact that the defendant, and the defendant's insurance company would "reap the benefits of plaintiff's Workers' Compensation benefits. . . . Consequently, the injured party is saddled with the additional burden of supporting the liability insurance industry, rather than that burden properly being upon the defendant." n66

The court of appeals dispensed with this line of argument rather quickly. Treating both the due process and equal protection claims together, the court of appeals applied rational basis review because section 2317.45 "neither implicates any fundamental or substantive rights, nor creates any suspect classifications. . . ." n67 With respect to Cook's contention that the insurance crisis was a "hoax," the court of appeals responded by stating that the

[A]rguments, both pro and con, were thoroughly presented to and considered by the legislature when it deliberated the enactment of R.C. 2317.45. Even a cursory review of these arguments makes it clear that, at the very least, there were legitimate, debatable questions of whether an insurance crisis existed, and whether the remedy undertaken by the legislature was appropriate. n68

d. Equal Protection

Relying upon article I, section 2 of the Ohio Constitution and the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, the common pleas court held that section 2317.45 violates equal protection because "it treats tort victims who are injured at work or who are entitled to certain government [*604] benefits differently from tort victims who receive benefits from a private insurer, therefore, requiring different treatment of those within the classification." n69 The court also regarded the classification as unconstitutional because it separates victims of medical malpractice from the victims of other forms of negligence. Therefore, the court applied strict scrutiny. n70

Although the court of appeals rejected the lower court's equal protection argument, the court of appeals did not provide any substantive analysis to guide future cases. In this respect the recent Ohio Supreme Court decision in Morris v. Savoy n71 may be helpful. In Morris the supreme court considered, and rejected, the argument that the collateral benefits statute for medical malpractice claims violated equal protection. n72 According to the supreme court, "a line is drawn -- the statute covers only a 'medical claim' -- but does not make any internal distinctions among class members. All plaintiffs in medical malpractice must confront the same setoff of benefits from collateral sources." n73 The same is true for section 2317.45 -- all plaintiffs face the same setoff.

3. Jeffers v. Phillips Ready Mix

In January, 1991, the Ohio Court of Appeals for the Second District upheld section 2317.45, and applied the statute in order to deduct workers' compensation benefits from plaintiff-appellant's jury award. n74 In this case, plaintiff-appellant Jeffers (hereinafter referred to as plaintiff) sued the defendant, a third party, for injuries plaintiff suffered while working for Sowder Concrete Corporation. n75 Both the plaintiff and the defendant were found negligent. n76 The jury awarded the plaintiff $ 39,500 in damages, and then reduced this amount by 40% due to plaintiff's negligence. n77 The net amount of damages totaled $ 23,700. However, the plaintiff also received collateral benefits totaling $ 22,403.14. n78 The plaintiff appealed the trial court's deduction of these benefits from the $ 23,700 jury award.

[*605] The plaintiff made three arguments relevant to this Note. First, the plaintiff argued that "the collateral benefits should be subtracted from the damages assessed by the jury before factoring in [plaintiff's] comparative negligence." n79 Second, the plaintiff argued that because the jury awarded $ 14,000 for future pain and suffering although he would not have future medical expenses, this amount should not be offset. n80 Third, the plaintiff argued that the jury received evidence of $ 10,292.36 in medical bills as proof of the plaintiff's injury, but that the judge deducted $ 22,403.14 of collateral benefits. n81

The court systematically and straightforwardly overruled each of the plaintiff's objections to the operation of section 2317.45. The court held that collateral benefits are to be deducted from the jury award, reduced by the plaintiff's negligence. n82 The court reasoned that "[t]he answer is found in R.C. 2317.45 (B)(2)(c)(i), the operative portion of which reads . . . 'compensatory damages that the plaintiff otherwise would be awarded.'" n83 The plaintiff, but for the collateral benefits, would receive $ 23,700. Therefore, that is the amount from which the benefits should be deducted.

The court also rejected the plaintiff's future pain and suffering argument. The court did not consider whether in fact the plaintiff would receive a double recovery. Instead, the court held that "[t]he way the statute is written, compensatory damages includes all damages except punitive damages. While future pain and suffering is not something for which collateral benefits are received, it is not the province of the court to revise plain legislative enactments." n84

The court also held that the post-verdict proceeding to determine collateral benefits controls the amount that should be offset. According to the court, "it does not matter whether the jury was aware of the medical expenses in order [*606] for them to be deductible. . . . [T]he collateral benefits adjustment is a post verdict adjustment. It is a proceeding wherein additional evidence can be taken, but wherein a jury is not involved." n85

4. Sorrell v. Thevenir

In January 1991, the Ohio Court of Common Please for Gallia County held that section 2317.45 was unconstitutional. n86 The case currently is on appeal before the Ohio Court of Appeals for the Fourth District. n87 The lower court, concluded that "it is absurd to finance the tortious conduct of the defendant by appropriations from the Workers' Compensation system. Plaintiff's employer did not cause her injury but yet it is his premium that may be increased because of defendant's conduct." n88 The lower court held that section 2317.45 was unconstitutional because it violates the right to a jury trial, the right to a remedy found in the Ohio Constitution, and the right to due process under the Fourteenth Amendment and under the Ohio Constitution. n89

The facts of Sorrell illustrate the hardship that section 2317.45 can cause; whether that hardship justifies a finding of unconstitutionality is another issue entirely. In Sorrell, the plaintiff, a convenience store employee, successfully sued a customer who allegedly injured her during one of his frequent visits to the store. n90 The jury awarded the plaintiff $ 10,128.26 in damages, $ 5,128.26 allocated to lost wages and medical benefits, and $ 5,000 for pain and suffering. n91 The plaintiff had received $ 10,906.96 of workers' compensation benefits, and an additional $ 3,428.26 paid by the workers' compensation fund to the plaintiff's doctor. n92 The defendant argued that this amount should be offset from the jury award, thereby leaving the plaintiff with no recovery from the defendant. n93

[*607] On appeal, both the plaintiff and the defendant essentially put forth the arguments presented in the Cook case. n94 Hopefully, the court of appeals will reverse the lower court's decision in Sorrell just as the court of appeals did in Cook.

C. Analysis

The court of common pleas in Cook identified a number of inconsistencies in the collateral benefits statute; none of these inconsistencies alone, however, justified holding section 2317.45 unconstitutional. By stretching each inconsistency to its extreme, the lower court found no reasonable basis for the statute. The court of appeals properly reversed the lower court's decision. Hopefully, courts in other districts will follow the lead established in Cook.

The court of appeals decision in Cook was correct for a number of reasons. First, although there may be some evidence that the insurance industry concocted an insurance crisis in order to push H.B. 1 through the Ohio legislature, there is an abundance of evidence that such a crisis did indeed exist. n95 In addition, there is strong evidence that a primary purpose of the statute is to prevent the plaintiff from receiving a double recovery. n96 This interest is independent of the insurance issue, and may instead suggest that the legislature is more concerned about other aspects of tort liability. According to one commentator,

Tort scholars suggest that three of the tort system's primary objectives are promoting justice, deterring potentially injurious activities, and compensating accident victims. Although the justice and deterrence objectives often require the same outcomes, the compensation objective may require an outcome inconsistent with the other two goals. This potential inconsistency, coupled with the tort system's poor design for adequately compensating victims, suggests that compensation is at most a subsidiary goal of tort law, and perhaps is merely a means of fulfilling the justice and deterrence objectives. n97

Consequently, even though some evidence may arguably suggest that the insurance situation in Ohio was not of crisis proportions, other legitimate reasons remain for eliminating the collateral source rule. n98

[*608] Attention must also be paid to the trend in most states toward limiting tort liability, either through damage caps or through abrogation of the collateral source rule. This reform is not limited to the medical malpractice area. By 1990, as many as ten states had altered the traditional collateral source rule. n99

Neither court in Cook mentioned another Ohio statute that provides for the offsetting of collateral benefits against a political subdivision. This statute, Ohio Revised Code section 2744.05, provides that "[i]f a claimant receives or is entitled to receive benefits for injuries or loss allegedly incurred from a policy or policies of insurance or any other source, the benefits shall be disclosed to the court, and the amount of the benefits shall be deducted from any award against a political subdivision recovered by that claimant." n100

The Ohio Supreme Court has held that this statute is constitutional. n101 The court rejected an equal protection challenge, and applied rational basis review. n102 Given that the two other Ohio statutes that provide for a deduction of collateral benefits have survived equal protection scrutiny, it is likely that the third statute will be upheld as well.

The most compelling argument made by the common pleas court in Cook is that workers' compensation did not adequately compensate the victim for his injury. This argument parallels the earlier discussion concerning whether workers' compensation benefits could legitimately be deducted from an award for emotional pain and suffering. Although this argument may be persuasive in the appropriate case, the jury verdict in Cook illustrates that this is not a concern here. The jury verdict form is reproduced below:

Senate version of teacher liability protection

TITLE XI – TEACHER PROTECTION
As reported in S1

SEC. 1101. TEACHER PROTECTION.

The Act (20 U.S.C. 6301 et seq.) is amended by adding at the end the following:

TITLE X – TEACHER PROTECTION

SEC. 10001. SHORT TITLE.

This title may be cited as the 'Paul D. Coverdell Teacher Protection Act of 2001'.

SEC. 10002. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS. – Congress makes the following findings:

(1) The ability of teachers, principals and other school professionals to teach, inspire and shape the intellect of our Nation's elementary and secondary school students is deterred and hindered by frivolous lawsuits and litigation.

(2) Each year more and more teachers, principals and other school professionals face lawsuits for actions undertaken as part of their duties to provide millions of school children quality educational opportunities.

(3) Too many teachers, principals and other school professionals face increasingly severe and random acts of violence in the classroom and in schools.

(4) Providing teachers, principals and other school professionals a safe and secure environment is an important part of the effort to improve and expand educational opportunities, which are critical for the continued economic development of the United States.

(5) Frivolous lawsuits against teachers maintaining order in the classroom impose significant financial burdens on local educational agencies, and deprive the agencies of funds that would best be used for educating students.

(6) Clarifying and limiting the liability of teachers, principals and other school professionals who undertake reasonable actions to maintain order, discipline and an appropriate educational environment is an appropriate subject of Federal legislation because –

(A) the scope of the problems created by the legitimate fears of teachers, principals and other school professionals about frivolous, arbitrary or capricious lawsuits against teachers is of national importance; and

(B) millions of children and their families across the Nation depend on teachers, principals and other school professionals for the intellectual development of children.

(b) PURPOSE. – The purpose of this title is to provide teachers, principals and other school professionals the tools they need to undertake reasonable actions to maintain order, discipline, and an appropriate educational environment.

SEC. 10003. PREEMPTION AND ELECTION OF STATE NONAPPLICABILITY.

(a) PREEMPTION. – This title preempts the laws of any State to the extent that such laws are inconsistent with this title, except that this title shall not preempt any State law that provides additional protection from liability relating to teachers.

(b) ELECTION OF STATE REGARDING NONAPPLICABILITY. – This title shall not apply to any civil action in a State court against a teacher with respect to claims arising within that State if such State enacts a statute in accordance with State requirements for enacting legislation –

(1) citing the authority of this subsection;

(2) declaring the election of such State that this title shall not apply, as of a date certain, to such civil action in the State; and

(3) containing no other provisions.

SEC. 10004. LIMITATION ON LIABILITY FOR TEACHERS.

(a) LIABILITY PROTECTION FOR TEACHERS. – Except as provided in subsections (b) and (c), no teacher in a school shall be liable for harm caused by an act or omission of the teacher on behalf of the school if –

(1) the teacher was acting within the scope of the teacher's employment or responsibilities related to providing educational services;

(2) the actions of the teacher were carried out in conformity with local, State, and Federal laws, rules and regulations in furtherance of efforts to control, discipline, expel, or suspend a student or maintain order or control in the classroom or school;

(3) if appropriate or required, the teacher was properly licensed, certified, or authorized by the appropriate authorities for the activities or practice in the State in which the harm occurred, where the activities were or practice was undertaken within the scope of the teacher's responsibilities;

(4) the harm was not caused by willful or criminal misconduct, gross negligence, reckless misconduct, or a conscious, flagrant indifference to the rights or safety of the individual harmed by the teacher; and

(5) the harm was not caused by the teacher operating a motor vehicle, vessel, aircraft, or other vehicle for which the State requires the operator or the owner of the vehicle, craft, or vessel to –

(A) possess an operator's license; or

(B) maintain insurance.

(b) CONCERNING RESPONSIBILITY OF TEACHERS TO SCHOOLS AND GOVERNMENTAL ENTITIES. – Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect any civil action brought by any school or any governmental entity against any teacher of such school.

(c) EXCEPTIONS TO TEACHER LIABILITY PROTECTION. – If the laws of a State limit teacher liability subject to one or more of the following conditions, such conditions shall not be construed as inconsistent with this section:

(1) A State law that requires a school or governmental entity to adhere to risk management procedures, including mandatory training of teachers.

(2) A State law that makes the school or governmental entity liable for the acts or omissions of its teachers to the same extent as an employer is liable for the acts or omissions of its employees.

(3) A State law that makes a limitation of liability inapplicable if the civil action was brought by an officer of a State or local government pursuant to State or local law.

(d) LIMITATION ON PUNITIVE DAMAGES BASED ON THE ACTIONS OF TEACHERS. –

(1) GENERAL RULE. – Punitive damages may not be awarded against a teacher in an action brought for harm based on the action or omission of a teacher acting within the scope of the teacher's responsibilities to a school or governmental entity unless the claimant establishes by clear and convincing evidence that the harm was proximately caused by an action or omission of such teacher which constitutes willful or criminal misconduct, or a conscious, flagrant indifference to the rights or safety of the individual harmed.

(2) CONSTRUCTION. – Paragraph (1) does not create a cause of action for punitive damages and does not preempt or supersede any Federal or State law to the extent that such law would further limit the award of punitive damages.

(e) EXCEPTIONS TO LIMITATIONS ON LIABILITY. –

(1) IN GENERAL. – The limitations on the liability of a teacher under this title shall not apply to any misconduct that –

(A) constitutes a crime of violence (as that term is defined in section 16 of title 18, United States Code) or act of international terrorism (as that term is defined in section 2331 of title 18, United States Code) for which the defendant has been convicted in any court;

(B) involves a sexual offense, as defined by applicable State law, for which the defendant has been convicted in any court;

(C) involves misconduct for which the defendant has been found to have violated a Federal or State civil rights law; or

(D) where the defendant was under the influence (as determined pursuant to applicable State law) of intoxicating alcohol or any drug at the time of the misconduct.

(2) HIRING. – The limitations on the liability of a teacher under this title shall not apply to misconduct during background investigations, or during other actions, involved in the hiring of a teacher.

SEC. 10005. LIABILITY FOR NONECONOMIC LOSS.

(a) GENERAL RULE. – In any civil action against a teacher, based on an action or omission of a teacher acting within the scope of the teacher's responsibilities to a school or governmental entity, the liability of the teacher for noneconomic loss shall be determined in accordance with subsection (b).

(b) AMOUNT OF LIABILITY. –

(1) IN GENERAL. – Each defendant who is a teacher, shall be liable only for the amount of noneconomic loss allocated to that defendant in direct proportion to the percentage of responsibility of that defendant (determined in accordance with paragraph (2)) for the harm to the claimant with respect to which that defendant is liable. The court shall render a separate judgment against each defendant in an amount determined pursuant to the preceding sentence.

(2) PERCENTAGE OF RESPONSIBILITY. – For purposes of determining the amount of noneconomic loss allocated to a defendant who is a teacher under this section, the trier of fact shall determine the percentage of responsibility of each person responsible for the claimant's harm, whether or not such person is a party to the action.

(c) RULE OF CONSTRUCTION. – Nothing in this section shall be construed to preempt or supersede any Federal or State law that further limits the application of joint liability in a civil action described in subsection (a), beyond the limitations established in this section.

SEC. 10006. DEFINITIONS.

For purposes of this title:

(1) ECONOMIC LOSS. – The term 'economic loss' means any pecuniary loss resulting from harm (including the loss of earnings or other benefits related to employment, medical expense loss, replacement services loss, loss due to death, burial costs, and loss of business or employment opportunities) to the extent recovery for such loss is allowed under applicable State law.

(2) HARM. – The term 'harm' includes physical, nonphysical, economic, and noneconomic losses.

(3) NONECONOMIC LOSSES. – The term 'noneconomic losses' means losses for physical and emotional pain, suffering, inconvenience, physical impairment, mental anguish, disfigurement, loss of enjoyment of life, loss of society and companionship, loss of consortium (other than loss of domestic service), hedonic damages, injury to reputation and all other nonpecuniary losses of any kind or nature.

(4) SCHOOL. – The term 'school' means a public or private kindergarten, a public or private elementary school or secondary school (as defined in section 14101, or a home school.

(5) STATE. – The term 'State' means each of the several States of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the United States Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, any other territory or possession of the United States, or any political subdivision of any such State, territory, or possession.

(6) TEACHER. – The term 'teacher' means a teacher, instructor, principal, administrator, other educational professional that works in a school, or an individual member of a school board (as distinct from the board itself).

SEC. 10007. EFFECTIVE DATE.

(a) IN GENERAL. – This title shall take effect 90 days after the date of the enactment of the Paul D. Coverdell Teacher Protection Act of 2001.

(b) APPLICATION. – This title applies to any claim for harm caused by an act or omission of a teacher if that claim is filed on or after the effective date of the Paul D. Coverdell Teacher Protection Act of 2001, without regard to whether the harm that is the subject of the claim or the conduct that caused the harm occurred before such effective date.

House version of teacher liability protection

PART D – TEACHER LIABILITY PROTECTION
As reported in HR1

SEC. 2301. SHORT TITLE.

This part may be cited as the 'Paul Coverdell Teacher Liability Protection Act of 2001'.

SEC. 2302. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS – Congress makes the following findings:

(1) The ability of teachers, principals and other school professionals to teach, inspire and shape the intellect of our Nation's elementary and secondary school students is deterred and hindered by frivolous lawsuits and litigation.

(2) Each year more and more teachers, principals and other school professionals face lawsuits for actions undertaken as part of their duties to provide millions of school children quality educational opportunities.

(3) Too many teachers, principals and other school professionals face increasingly severe and random acts of violence in the classroom and in schools.

(4) Providing teachers, principals and other school professionals a safe and secure environment is an important part of the effort to improve and expand educational opportunities.

(5) Clarifying and limiting the liability of teachers, principals and other school professionals who undertake reasonable actions to maintain order, discipline and an appropriate educational environment is an appropriate subject of Federal legislation because –

(A) the scope of the problems created by the legitimate fears of teachers, principals and other school professionals about frivolous, arbitrary or capricious lawsuits against teachers is of national importance; and

(B) millions of children and their families across the Nation depend on teachers, principals and other school professionals for the intellectual development of children.

(b) PURPOSE – The purpose of this part is to provide teachers, principals and other school professionals the tools they need to undertake reasonable actions to maintain order, discipline and an appropriate educational environment.

SEC. 2303. PREEMPTION AND ELECTION OF STATE NONAPPLICABILITY.

(a) PREEMPTION – This part preempts the laws of any State to the extent that such laws are inconsistent with this part, except that this part shall not preempt any State law that provides additional protection from liability relating to teachers.

(b) ELECTION OF STATE REGARDING NONAPPLICABILITY – This part shall not apply to any civil action in a State court against a teacher with respect to claims arising within that State if such State enacts a statute in accordance with State requirements for enacting legislation –

(1) citing the authority of this subsection;

(2) declaring the election of such State that this part shall not apply, as of a date certain, to such civil action in the State; and

(3) containing no other provisions.

SEC. 2304. LIMITATION ON LIABILITY FOR TEACHERS.

(a) LIABILITY PROTECTION FOR TEACHERS – Except as provided in subsections (b) and (c), no teacher in a school shall be liable for harm caused by an act or omission of the teacher on behalf of the school if –

(1) the teacher was acting within the scope of the teacher's employment or responsibilities related to providing educational services;

(2) the actions of the teacher were carried out in conformity with local, State, and Federal laws, rules and regulations in furtherance of efforts to control, discipline, expel, or suspend a student or maintain order or control in the classroom or school;

(3) if appropriate or required, the teacher was properly licensed, certified, or authorized by the appropriate authorities for the activities or practice in the State in which the harm occurred, where the activities were or practice was undertaken within the scope of the teacher's responsibilities;

(4) the harm was not caused by willful or criminal misconduct, gross negligence, reckless misconduct, or a conscious, flagrant indi the rights or safety of the individual harmed by the teacher; and

(5) the harm was not caused by the teacher operating a motor vehicle, vessel, aircraft, or other vehicle for which the State requires the operator or the owner of the vehicle, craft, or vessel to –

(A) possess an operator's license; or

(B) maintain insurance.

(b) CONCERNING RESPONSIBILITY OF TEACHERS TO SCHOOLS AND GOVERNMENTAL ENTITIES – Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect any civil action brought by any school or any governmental entity against any teacher of such school.

(c) EXCEPTIONS TO TEACHER LIABILITY PROTECTION – If the laws of a State limit teacher liability subject to one or more of the following conditions, such conditions shall not be construed as inconsistent with this section:

(1) A State law that requires a school or governmental entity to adhere to risk management procedures, including mandatory training of teachers.

(2) A State law that makes the school or governmental entity liable for the acts or omissions of its teachers to the same extent as an employer is liable for the acts or omissions of its employees.

(3) A State law that makes a limitation of liability inapplicable if the civil action was brought by an officer of a State or local government pursuant to State or local law.

(d) LIMITATION ON PUNITIVE DAMAGES BASED ON THE ACTIONS OF TEACHERS –

(1) GENERAL RULE – Punitive damages may not be awarded against a teacher in an action brought for harm based on the action of a teacher acting within the scope of the teacher's responsibilities to a school or governmental entity unless the claimant establishes by clear and convincing evidence that the harm was proximately caused by an action of such teacher which constitutes willful or criminal misconduct, or a conscious, flagrant indifference to the rights or safety of the individual harmed.

(2) CONSTRUCTION – Paragraph (1) does not create a cause of action for punitive damages and does not preempt or supersede any Federal or State law to the extent that such law would further limit the award of punitive damages.

(e) EXCEPTIONS TO LIMITATIONS ON LIABILITY –

(1) IN GENERAL – The limitations on the liability of a teacher under this part shall not apply to any misconduct that –

(A) constitutes a crime of violence (as that term is defined in section 16 of title 18, United States Code) or act of international terrorism (as that term is defined in section 2331 of title 18, United States Code) for which the defendant has been convicted in any court;

(B) involves a sexual offense, as defined by applicable State law, for which the defendant has been convicted in any court;

(C) involves misconduct for which the defendant has been found to have violated a Federal or State civil rights law; or

(D) where the defendant was under the influence (as determined pursuant to applicable State law) of intoxicating alcohol or any drug at the time of the misconduct.

(2) RULE OF CONSTRUCTION – Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to affect subsection (a)(3) or (d).

SEC. 2305. LIABILITY FOR NONECONOMIC LOSS.

(a) GENERAL RULE – In any civil action against a teacher, based on an action of a teacher acting within the scope of the teacher's responsibilities to a school or governmental entity, the liability of the teacher for noneconomic loss shall be determined in accordance with subsection (b).

(b) AMOUNT OF LIABILITY –

(1) IN GENERAL – Each defendant who is a teacher, shall be liable only for the amount of noneconomic loss allocated to that defendant in direct proportion to the percentage of responsibility of that defendant (determined in accordance with paragraph (2)) for the harm to the claimant with respect to which that defendant is liable. The court shall render a separate judgment against each defendant in an amount determined pursuant to the preceding sentence.

(2) PERCENTAGE OF RESPONSIBILITY – For purposes of determining the amount of noneconomic loss allocated to a defendant who is a teacher under this section, the trier of fact shall determine the percentage of responsibility of that defendant for the claimant's harm.

SEC. 2306. RULE OF CONSTRUCTION.

Nothing in this part shall be construed to affect any State or local law (including a rule or regulation) or policy pertaining to the use of corporal punishment.

SEC. 2307. DEFINITIONS.

For purposes of this part:

(1) ECONOMIC LOSS – The term 'economic loss' means any pecuniary loss resulting from harm (including the loss of earnings or other benefits related to employment, medical expense loss, replacement services loss, loss due to death, burial costs, and loss of business or employment opportunities) to the extent recovery for such loss is allowed under applicable State law.

(2) HARM – The term 'harm' includes physical, nonphysical, economic, and noneconomic losses.

(3) NONECONOMIC LOSSES – The term 'noneconomic losses' means losses for physical and emotional pain, suffering, inconvenience, physical impairment, mental anguish, disfigurement, loss of enjoyment of life, loss of society and companionship, loss of consortium (other than loss of domestic service), hedonic damages, injury to reputation and all other nonpecuniary losses of any kind or nature.

(4) SCHOOL – The term 'school' means a public or private kindergarten, a public or private elementary school or secondary school (as defined in section 14101, or a home school.

(5) STATE – The term 'State' means each of the several States of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the United States Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, any other territory or possession of the United States, or any political subdivision of any such State, territory, or possession.

(6) TEACHER – The term 'teacher' means a teacher, instructor, principal, administrator, or other educational professional that works in a school, a local school board and any member of such board, and a local educational agency and any employee of such agency.

SEC. 2308. APPLICABILITY.

This part applies to any claim for harm caused by an act or omission of a teacher if that claim is filed on or after the effective date of the No Child Left Behind Act of 2001 without regard to whether the harm that is the subject of the claim or the conduct that caused the harm occurred before such effective date.

REV_00261758

Tort Reform [Folder 2] [3]

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 2172/2083
9702

Box 58
Folder 13

12 of 142 DOCUMENTS

Copyright (c) 1997 Trustees of Boston University Boston University Journal of Science and Technology Law

4 B.U. J. SCI. & TECH. L. 9

LENGTH: 24245 words

NOTE: The National Vaccine Injury Compensation Program: Can It Still Protect an Essential Technology? *

* (c) 1998 by the Trustees of Boston University. Cite to this Note as 4 B.U. J. SCI. & TECH. L. 9 (1998). Pin cite using the appropriate paragraph number. For example, cite the first paragraph of this Note as 4 B.U. J. SCI. & TECH. L. 9 para. 1 (1998).

Jaclyn Shoshana Levine *

* B.A., 1994, Michigan State University; J.D., 1998, Boston University School of Law.

TEXT:

I. INTRODUCTION

1. Occupying a firm place in the scientific and technologic realm cannot, and does not, insulate vaccines from the law. With powerful social and scientific forces vehemently advocating n1 and forcefully opposing n2 vaccines, the law, not surprisingly, plays an active role in vaccine development n3 and use. n4 Manufacturer liability for vaccine injuries arguably illustrates the most visible and contentious relationship between the law and vaccines.

2. Starting in the 1970s, and peaking in the 1980s with a national insurance crisis n5 as a significant part of the background, some vaccine manufacturers were forced to pay large awards or settlements to vaccine-injury victims and their families. n6 Consequently, vaccine manufacturers seriously threatened to cease producing vaccines, using the important role vaccines play in American public health as political leverage. n7 What makes this law-science standoff particularly interesting is that rather than forcing vaccine technology to bend to the law's demands, as has historically been the case for other inherently dangerous medical products, n8 Congress decided to reshape the law. n9

3. Congress enacted the 1986 National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act ("Vaccine Act") n10 to solve this vaccine crisis. The Vaccine Act outlined a comprehensive national initiative to coordinate and encourage vaccine use. n11 Congress included the National Vaccine Injury Compensation Program ("VICP" or "Compensation Program") within the larger piece of legislation to address specifically vaccine manufacturer liability. n12 The legislation mandated that victims first seek a remedy in a federally administered no-fault process before pursuing a civil court remedy against manufacturers. n13

4. This legislative solution to the vaccine crisis and its legal roots was both reasonable and revolutionary. Congress acted reasonably by making public health a priority. n14 By passing the Vaccine Act the national legislature acknowledged that legal change was not an alternative, it was an imperative. Congress created a legal revolution by not only conceiving and implementing a creative no-fault solution to the liability crisis, but by explicitly basing it on the aspirational Restatement n15 (Second) of Torts ("Second Restatement"). n16

5. The Compensation Program portion of the Vaccine Act was controversial when Congress adopted it. n17 Nevertheless, even the VICP's original detractors would have to admit that it has met its central goal n18 of preserving the American vaccine market without bankrupting the federal government. n19 The Compensation Program's success is evident in the contemporary vaccine market; although only a small number of manufacturers produce vaccines, vaccines are still available and widely used today. n20 tax on all vaccines, n121 may put the program in jeopardy.

55. Until this recent change, every dose of vaccine that is produced in this country and appears on the Vaccine Injury Table was subject to a risk-based excise tax. n122 The amount of tax on every dose of vaccine a manufacturer produced was determined by using actuarial principles assessing the risk the vaccine posed for injury. The graduated tax scale made the VICP act like an experience rated insurance program: the more dangerous the vaccine, the higher the tax. Of course, manufacturers had the opportunity to pass on the cost of the tax to bulk buyers, such as state governments, hospitals and clinics. Nevertheless, manufacturers initially paid the tax, and the proceeds were put into the Vaccine Trust Fund, where they accumulated to pay for the VICP's administration and awards. n123

56. To understand how the risk-based tax worked, consider the DPT n124 vaccine "cocktail," which protects against three diseases: diphtheria, pertussis ("whooping cough"), and tetanus. This single vaccine generates almost 75% of all of the injuries that the VICP covers, and primarily from only the pertussis component. n125 A vaccine that only protects against diphtheria and tetanus had an $ 0.06 excise tax per dose because those components are relatively safe. n126 Yet when the more dangerous pertussis bacteria was added to the vaccine, the excise tax jumped to $ 4.46 to pay for the injuries it would cause and to signify that the pertussis component of the vaccine is much more risky. n127

57. Other vaccines listed on the Vaccine Injury Table demonstrated this same pattern, with higher taxes identifying vaccines that pose higher risks. Under this insurance-like philosophy, the next highest vaccine tax was for oral ("live") polio vaccines. n128 This relatively high tax on the oral polio vaccine existed because its injuries create the second largest group of claims in the VICP. n129

58. Congress originally appropriated money to pay for injuries that occurred before the Compensation Program started in 1988. n130 By doing this, the initial vaccine tax levels were lower, paying only for prospective injuries. n131 Today, the VICP is financially independent of Congressional appropriations because the risk-based vaccine tax took into account the dangerousness of a vaccine, and accordingly determined a tax rate. n132

59. The Vaccine Trust Fund has a unique problem -- it has more money than it currently needs. n133 The VICP web site reports that the increasing combination of vaccines makes differentiating risk difficult for specific vaccines, accounting for the misfit between the tax revenue and Compensation Program costs. n134 Yet that does not fully explain why there is a misfit between the tax and program costs. The VICP works under a presumption that the individual risks of a vaccine can be measured, predicted, and incorporated into a tax formula in order to gather adequate financial reserves to pay compensation. Accurate scientific proof of the individual injuries each protective agent in a vaccine causes is crucial to the way the excise tax incorporates risk. When vaccines combine different protective agents in the same medium, the tax formula simply adds their individually established risk-based taxes.

60. The assumptions, that the tax will adequately estimate the risk of injury and accurately finance the Trust Fund by aggregating the individual vaccine risks, become less realistic as scientists begin to make more vaccines with higher numbers of components. This cumulative tax approach ignores the positive, negative, or unknown synergy of protecting against multiple diseases with one vaccine. n135 Consequently, new combinations of protective agents in a single medium makes it difficult to quantify how many people will eventually draw on the Trust Fund. This uncertainty is incompatible with the way the excise tax operates. n136 Without publicly examining the issue further, the Compensation Program administrators argue that the vaccine tax must eliminate the element of risk to eliminate the funding uncertainty.

61. The attack on the risk-based tax assumes that the risk component, and not the cumulative method of calculating, causes the over-funding problem. Under the current flat-tax system, which became effective last year, the tax will be a flat $ 0.75 per component of a vaccine but will continue to aggregate based on the number of components. n137 A trivalent vaccine, whether it protects against diphtheria, pertussis, and tetanus, or measles, mumps, and rubella, would have a $ 2.25 tax -- three times the $ 0.75 tax. Even if risk was what rendered the vaccine tax inaccurate, it does not eliminate the possibility that combining protective agents while only using simple addition to calculate the tax also constitutes part of the problem.

62. Without an explanation of why the winning $ 0.75 proposal is more accurate at determining injuries, and therefore Compensation Program costs, than the alternate proposal of a $ 0.84 tax, it is difficult to say how this will be any improvement over the current system. This really only proves that the previous risk model, which is up to ten years old for some of the vaccines, is not in touch with current vaccine injuries; this change to a flat tax does not prove that risk is an unmanageable or undesirable part of the tax.

63. Nor does the mere change to a flat tax necessarily solve the over funding situation. The flat tax forecloses serious considerations of alternative explanations of why the VICP revenue and participation are mismatched. Rather than simply jumping to a "solution" for over funding, Congress should consider other reasons why there might be over funding, and if that reason indicates an inherent and worsening flaw in the Compensation Program's overall design. If Congress understands why the VICP has more money than it needs, it can make a better decision about the VICP's future format and what funding philosophy is best suited to maintaining the VICP's self-sufficiency. n138

64. The problem with adjusting the vaccine tax to eliminate the Trust Fund surplus with a flat tax of $ 0.75 per vaccine dose n139 produced is that the flat tax is a one-time solution. Lowering the Trust Fund reserves without identifying why it is over funded does not solve the underlying problem. Moreover, by lowering the Trust Fund reserves the Compensation Program no longer has the option of handling an unexpected vaccine crisis. n140 Without any financial flexibility, Congress would end up inefficiently duplicating a process it already has available to meet the "predictable unpredictability" of disease epidemics. n141

65. If VICP participation increases for any reason, a flat tax may quickly end the Compensation Program. A flat tax does not consider risk at all. By ignoring the relationship between the dangerousness of a vaccine and petitions filed in the Federal Claims Court, Congress makes the VICP vulnerable to one bad batch of vaccine bankrupting the entire no-fault program. Section 9510(d)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code, which governs the Vaccine Trust Fund, limits the liability of the federal government to the amount in the Trust Fund. n142 As an independent program, the federal government provides no backup funding after claims exhaust the Trust Fund.

66. If this flat tax coincides with the Third Restatement, the combination might incidentally eliminate a secondary warning system about vaccine dangerousness. n143 In reality, few vaccine users probably know about the risk-based vaccine tax, or that a higher tax implies a higher level of danger. Insurance, free programs, and lack of understanding and concern insulate many consumers from this sort of economic warning. However, cost conscious health care professionals who must purchase vaccines may be extremely sensitive to this type of information. To those intermediaries accustomed to seeing a risk-based tax incorporated into a vaccine's price, a flat tax might falsely indicate that a particular vaccine has become safer, or that all vaccines are equally safe. The Third Restatement requires that the learned intermediary play a larger role in weeding out inappropriate vaccination candidates, yet a flat tax may remove an important and easily understood vaccine warning.

E. Complementary Initiatives -- Internal and External Challenges

67. Other initiatives related to vaccines may interact with the Third Restatement or offset its effects on the vaccine market. Although universal health care is an unpopular subject, adopting more comprehensive health care coverage would significantly lessen the amounts awarded under the VICP. n144 As section 300aa-15(g) says, the VICP will not provide compensation for any item or service which could be paid for "under any State compensation program, under an insurance policy, or under any Federal or State health benefits program . . . or an entity which provides health services on a prepaid basis." n145 If Congress or state legislatures are inclined to subsidize health care costs, childhood vaccines will almost certainly be included. Not only are vaccines relatively low cost, n146 their opponents are less credible. n147

68. In addition, the new national vaccination tracking system may help epidemiologists refine risk assessments by making it easier to determine actual injuries and the rate of lawsuits those injuries spawn. n148 As a result of more descriptive and accurate data, Congress may be in a better position to assess other aspects of the VICP, such as the link between the Trust Fund surplus and the risk-based tax.

69. Alternatively, the vaccine reporting system can track more than mere adverse events. Already, some states or counties have achieved appreciable results by using a tracking system to send reminders to parents to make sure their children receive a full vaccination schedule. n149 However, these local tracking systems are imperfect. Moving from an area, even within the same state, puts individuals outside of the reach of the reminder program. A national system can increase the likelihood that all children will receive their vaccinations. Of course, more vaccinations will result in a higher number of actual injuries, necessitating VICP coverage and making it especially important for Congress to ensure that the VICP is ready to handle the claims.

F. Assessment of Challenges and Recommendation

70. Congress has legitimate reasons to investigate the VICP. Following further study of these issues, Congress should adopt a clear plan of action to ensure the VICP's future, vaccine availability and safety, and manufacturer accountability based on what W. Kip Viscusi calls a strategy of principled products liability reform. n150 This plan of action can range from full preemption of non-VICP remedies to a simple amendment of the Vaccine Act's language. It might also include a new financing mechanism for the Trust Fund. Nevertheless, the changes must be purposeful, with "efficient incentives for controlling risks and efficient levels of insurance for the injured." n151

III. CONGRESS SHOULD MAKE SPECIFIC CHANEGS TO THE COMPENSATION PROGRAM BY AMENDING THE VACCINE ACT

71. Whatever changes take place in the Compensation Program, whether or not tied to the Third Restatement, must take into consideration the VICP's initial concerns for moderation. This concern for balance must translate into both form and function, providing a simple process accessible to the widest variety of petitioners with varying degrees of resources, while fostering the underlying philosophy that encourages safety and compensation.

A. Full Preemption of State Law

72. A new era for the VICP should start with less confusion than when the program began. One of the largest sources of confusion relates to whether the Compensation Program preempts state law. To resolve this problem, Congress should amend § 300aa-21 of the National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act to eliminate the petitioner's right to elect to reject the VICP award. Allowing the coexistence of federal and state regulation is fundamentally inconsistent in an area, such as vaccine liability, where Congress intends to use a heavy hand in shaping the complex legal balance between society, manufacturers and consumers. By eliminating the election option and fully preempting state law Congress will not only avoid confusion, it will have the control over vaccine liability necessary to institute more comprehensive reforms.

73. Full preemption of state law will also allow Congress to acknowledge the Third Restatement without fully adopting its standards. Whether or not supporting preemption in the abstract, the Third Restatement already anticipates increasing federal preemption of state law for medical product-related liability. In comment b to section 6, the Reporters state clearly that in the case of federal preemption, the Third Restatement's standards for liability cannot apply. n152 Though clearly federal supremacy would achieve this result without acknowledgment from the Reporters, the Third Restatement's discussion of preemption attempts to advertise it as a viable option.

74. Though not the best option, if Congress felt compelled to leave a state remedy in place, it should consider only allowing civil suits for defective manufacturing cases. Injuries from an imperfectly manufactured vaccine have received the most consistent legal treatment in this century. Allowing fault-based (negligence) lawsuits for defective manufacturing would minimize interjurisdictional inconsistencies for manufacturers in comparison to the inevitably varying standards for defective design and improper warning cases. Still, full preemption would provide the most organizational and procedural benefits, completely streamlining compensation for vaccine injuries.

75. If the Third Restatement makes state law less sympathetic to injured users, forcing more and more petitioners to elect to receive a VICP award, eliminating the state remedy would free the creative legal energy dealing with product liability complications to deal with the pressures on a larger VICP. Instead of marshaling political support for separate controls on state liability for manufacturers, Congress could work on substantive changes in the no-fault portion of the program.

B. Raise VICP Compensation Levels

76. Manufacturers of all products would like to see an end to liability, however, this sort of protection comes at consumers' expense. Consequently, a program that works to share equitably the costs and risks of injury must consider the consumer perspective. Though arguably fair now, the Compensation Program should increase its award levels. Of course, award levels should not exceed the actual money the program takes in through the vaccine tax. Running a deficit would jeopardize the VICP's independence and threaten Congress' current favor. Rather than retaining the financial surplus, the VICP could use the excess funds constructively. n153

77. One option is for the Compensation Program to increase awards. The first award increase should go to petitioners who allege a vaccine-related death. This initial increase has nothing to do with the permanence of losing a family member, because there is no valid way to measure and compare that grief with the pain families feel from living with a permanently injured child. The rationale behind this increase is equity; the Compensation Program already allows a variable award for injuries not resulting in death. These injury awards can increase or decrease on a case-by-case basis to justly compensate an individual and pay for comprehensive care. In contrast, the death award in the VICP has not changed in the past ten years. Instead of a flat $ 250,000 award, the VICP could allow a petitioner's estate to seek additional compensation for costs related to the vaccine injury and illness that led up to death, as well as the costs for preparing the petition to the VICP. Alternatively, Congress could simply raise the lump sum award.

78. Dedicating the surplus bounty toward expanding the VICP's administrative capacity or leaving it for a "rainy day" would be a more conservative approach. This could translate into a focus on quickly adjudicating the remaining backlogged cases by hiring an additional Special Master or sponsoring a study to assess the Compensation Program's current processes. Re-investing the surplus in the VICP will help meet unpredicted needs by making the no-fault program more resilient, which will become increasingly important in light of the upcoming changes to the VICP's financing mechanism. Arguably, the no-fault process can be considered as part of compensation under the VICP because it provides value to petitioners as an alternative to the awkward and slow moving civil courts. So, though petitioners would not necessarily receive higher awards from the Compensation Program under this more conservative approach, the process for awarding compensation would be strengthened and raised to a higher level.

79. Congress will have a separate concern for injury compensation if it fully preempts the election option for petitioners. The national legislature must ensure that petitioners will receive adequate compensation under whatever changes are implemented. One of the incentives for granting adequate compensation under the current system is the election option. Special Masters and others involved in the Compensation Program understand that a primary concern is to keep petitioners from ultimately going to the civil courts, which is why VICP awards must be competitive with state and federal court awards. Without an election option, the Compensation Program administrators have no competition from outside sources, and therefore they might let compensation levels drop. "They ought to be grateful for what they get" attitudes that can accompany entitlement programs such as the VICP might combine with the diminished incentive to make generous payments, all to consumers' detriment.

80. Determining how the legislation itself could mandate an increase in compensation to living petitioners is difficult because their awards are variable and independently determined. One option would be to add a flat monetary bonus to every successful petition in addition to the costs and future needs already incorporated in the award. Without knowing the exact scope of the current surplus, it is unlikely that the Compensation Program would be able to sustain this sort of award without a purposeful increase in the funding. Regardless, raising compensation levels deserves further consideration.

C. Flat Tax and Risk-Based Rebate

81. Compensation Program administrators cite difficulty in estimating the future risk of vaccines as one reason why a flat tax is preferable to the current risk-based tax. Given the potential for new vaccines and new vaccine combinations without well-defined risks, there are strong reasons to support a flat tax. However, the risk-based tax has worked well for the VICP. To lessen the problem of accurately determining and generating Compensation Program financing based on projected data without eliminating risk, Congress could impose a flat tax on every dose of vaccine produced and couple it with a risk-based rebate. By incorporating risk into the rebate, the VICP can use retrospective "hard" data based on actual injuries attributable to specific manufacturers. n154 By imposing a risk criteria at the end of petition adjudication, rather than at the time of the initial excise tax levy, Congress can maintain the VICP's sensitivity to real vaccine safety issues while still improving Compensation Program administration.

82. The combination flat tax and risk-based rebate would help Congress maintain and even increase an incentive for manufacturers to improve vaccine safety. If, as proposed, Congress eliminates the post-election civil action option for VICP petitioners, the threat of product liability will no longer naturally urge this scientific and technological innovation. n155 Competition will not naturally provide the impetus for vaccine improvements as it encourages improvements in other products. With the tax-rebate combination, Congress can encourage manufacturers to lower wholesale vaccine costs and actually contribute a greater amount of money to the Compensation Program without shifting cost to buyers. Furthermore, unlike a flat tax acting alone, a flat tax combined with a risk-based rebate will still provide an indirect warning about a vaccine's safety.

83. With a flat tax/risk-based rebate program, Congress would tax manufacturers based on every dose of vaccine they produce. Regardless of the type of vaccine produced, manufacturers would pay the same flat fee. If a pharmaceutical company produces one million diphtheria vaccine doses, two million chicken pox vaccine doses, and three million polio vaccine doses, it would pay a tax equal to six million times a set fee (probably less than $ 0.80). n156 The money paid in taxes would be deposited into the Vaccine Trust Fund, and used primarily for paying VICP administration costs and no-fault awards to injured consumers.

84. After the VICP compensates injured consumers, a manufacturer would receive a percentage of the tax it paid in the form of a rebate. Since the flat tax will be actuarially set above the minimum revenue needed to run the program, part of the surplus funding would be returned to manufacturers based on how much the VICP paid to petitioners for injuries from that particular manufacturer's vaccine. The money remaining in the Trust fund after the VICP pays the rebates would be used to expand the VICP's coverage.

85. The Advisory Committee that oversees the VICP should commission an actuarial study of what the optimal flat tax would be if the goal was to create a sufficient surplus to expand Compensation Program coverage without a waiting period, and what sort of formula the Compensation Program should use to establish the rebate. Establishing a flat tax is relatively easy. The Advisory Committee can pick the target revenue goal and project the number of doses that will be manufactured in a given year. Though actual numbers of injuries and doses of vaccines produced may vary in one year, they should be close to the projections, which can be based on historical data and routine public health estimation of need. n157

86. Congress and the National Vaccine Advisory Committee can use this flat tax to keep the vaccine market stable. With a risk-based tax, such as the one that the Compensation Program previously used, manufacturers have less of an incentive to produce riskier vaccines, such as the pertussis vaccine, because they pay higher taxes. By relating the actual amount paid in taxes only to the number of doses a manufacturer produces, pharmaceutical companies would contribute to the Vaccine Trust Fund in proportion to the magnitude of their individual business, whether they produce one type of vaccine or many types of vaccines. This may help reverse the vaccine industry's monopolistic trend by eliminating any positive or negative incentives for producing one or more vaccines. With a flat tax all manufacturers, not just the richest ones, will be able to afford to pay the tax and still make a profit.

87. The tax revenue surplus in excess of the Compensation Program costs would then be available for rebates. The Advisory Committee can establish a merit-based system for the rebate. With a merit-based system, the Advisory Committee does not have to treat manufacturers equally, even when they produce a vaccine for the same disease. This means that if one form of the polio vaccine is safer than another, the manufacturer with the safest vaccine will get the most money back, if the Advisory Committee equates merit with safety. Under a safety formula, the maximum rebate will go to the manufacturers of vaccines with the fewest injuries, and the lowest rebate to manufacturers of vaccines with the most injuries. Merit might also be related to other factors, such as lower wholesale prices or profit-making, which might make vaccines more affordable to the poor. The Advisory Committee might consider money invested in vaccine safety research and development as meritorious. Alternatively, the rebate can reward a manufacturer who responds to a crisis with a full refund of the tax. Because the VICP currently has a surplus, this formula can be tested with actual, rather than projected, data.

88. By making the rebate optional the risk element would encourage manufacturers to improve vaccine safety without further penalizing them, as liability would, when improvement is impossible. The rebate could spawn more than just research and development on vaccines to lower injuries and increase rebate amounts. Manufacturers might subsidize public screenings to better identify who should not take a vaccine. Manufacturers could produce multi-language translations of warnings for non-English vaccine users, reducing some of the burden for producing warnings that the CDC currently shoulders. Manufacturers might pay for state-based continuing medical education to update learned intermediaries on vaccine risks and benefits.

D. Expand the Vaccine Injury Table and the Aids to Interpretation

89. One of the benefits of the original VICP legislation is that it allows notice-and-comment rulemaking by the Secretary of Health and Human Services to amend the Vaccine Injury Table as well as the Aids to Interpretation. This allows both to reflect accurately scientific knowledge about injuries and present-day vaccine recommendations for children (and some adults) without an additional act of Congress. If the Third Restatement does influence the adjudication of vaccine injury disputes in the civil courts, as measured by increasing number of petitioners accepting VICP awards because state remedies are unlikely, then consider the Third Restatement's effect on claims for vaccines and injuries that the VICP excludes. Individuals injured by a VICP-excluded vaccine, or consumers whose type of injury are not covered by Compensation Program, may literally lack a forum to adjudicate their claims and award compensation in meritorious cases.

90. Vaccines that prevent non-childhood diseases may be used less frequently than the vaccines historically included in the VICP, but they are no less beneficial to society. The Secretary of Health and Human Services should use the VICP's notice-and-comment rulemaking authority to expand the Vaccine Injury Table and the Aids to Interpretation to include these other vaccines, and fully describe the symptoms that demonstrate a causal connection between the vaccine and an injury. With the tax and Trust Fund already in place, and with a current surplus, the Secretary has very few structural barriers to expanding the program. This is not to suggest that the Secretary is immune to political considerations, but with manufacturers placated by preemption of state remedies for childhood vaccines, their Congressional supporters should be amenable to a similar liability scheme for other vaccines.

91. Expanding the Compensation Program will also reduce legal confusion about which forums are appropriate for which injuries. What happens when an injured petitioner to the VICP received two or more vaccines at the same time, one covered and one excluded by the VICP? VICP case law suggests that an arbiter in the Compensation Program does not have to force an injured petitioner to decide which vaccine caused the injury when the symptoms they exhibit are related to more than one Compensation Program covered vaccine. n158 However, separating symptoms on the Vaccine Injury Table and the Aids to Interpretation from similar symptoms for excluded vaccines may be impossible. A single, unified vaccine injury forum would greatly reduce the potential for confusion, as well as create a cadre of very experienced adjudicators.

E. Add Consumer Protection Language

92. In addition to expanding the Vaccine Injury Table and the Aids to Interpretation to create a wider, more encompassing Compensation Program, Congress should update and create additional legislative history through hearings, the Congressional Record, public debate, and a purposes clause at the beginning of the Vaccine Act. Hopefully, this legislative history will reflect a sincere desire to benefit injured consumers as an important part of encouraging vaccine use. Currently, the Secretary has a mandate from the Compensation Program to seek out and encourage safer vaccines. n159 This is not equivalent to saying that an explicit purpose behind the Vaccine Act is to provide consumers legal protection from vaccine injuries.

93. Though sometimes superficial, especially in the face of contrary provisions explicitly benefiting manufacturers, consumer protection language has a strong role to play in vaccine injury compensation. An explicit intent to protect consumers helps the Federal Claims Court and Special Masters who administer the no-fault process, as well as the federal courts involved in the appeals process, to construe the statute effectively and accurately. n160 In turn, this consumer protection language helps these judicial actors enforce a balance between social, manufacturing, and consumer interests. Moreover, obvious Congressional intent sends a message to everyone involved in the manufacturing process that individuals should not be forced to bear the entire risk when manufacturers and the rest of society literally benefit at their expense.

F. Warn all Relevant Parties

94. Congress should amend the Vaccine Act to require manufacturers to provide warnings to both consumers and to health care providers. n161 There is no legitimate reason to minimize a manufacturer's duty to warn of a vaccine's inherent dangers if there will be no liability for such a failure to warn. The Third Restatement is only awkward and inefficient at requiring the warning go to the person most likely to put the information to good use. In reality, there are many times when a consumer and learned intermediary need to work together to form an opinion as to whether taking a vaccine is a good idea. This cooperation is impossible without the correct warnings. Despite other concerns, safety must be a central interest for Congress.

95. Contrary to the inevitable argument that these multiple warnings will require too much time and money from manufacturers, this is the smallest contribution that the manufacturers can make to vaccine safety in return for a ban on individual defective warning liability. Legislators should look to the successful experiment with warnings and oral contraceptives as a vision of the multilevel warnings that should accompany vaccines. Pharmaceutical manufacturers currently include written warnings with all oral contraceptive packages without diminishing the information that goes to health care professionals. n162 There is no reason to assume that manufacturers could not do the same for vaccines.

96. To accomplish the most widespread and effective warnings, Congress would only have to mandate direct consumer warnings. Regardless of a legal mandate, manufacturers would already be inclined to warn health care professionals about the risks and benefits of a vaccine as part of their marketing strategies. Furthermore, because the Third Restatement and the VICP do not eliminate malpractice liability for health care providers, those duty-bound learned intermediaries would likely seek out this information without prompting. In contrast, consumers are in an untenable position. Not only are consumers required by law to take vaccines, but they lack the political power to force manufacturers to deal with them directly and often do not have enough knowledge to question independently the risks and benefits of a vaccine.

97. These consumers with the least access to information are literally the most at risk from vaccines. Therefore, it is important for this legislative amendment to require that manufacturers design warnings to educate the intended audience reasonably and effectively. This means that a manufacturer would not satisfy its duty to warn by providing a learned intermediary with a simplified, non-technical warning. Nor would a manufacturer satisfy its duty to warn a consumer with a complex and virtually "plain-language-free" warning designed for scientists.

98. If there is no liability for failing to warn, Congress needs to consider how it will enforce this warning provision. Regulatory oversight might be insufficient by itself, therefore, Congress may want to consider adjusting the VICP petition process to aid enforcement. Congress could require a petitioner to submit information related to the vaccine warning associated with his or her claim. This would help the Department of Health and Human Services gather data on the manufacturers, and if necessary, commence internal administrative proceedings to investigate and penalize a manufacturer for noncompliance.

99. If, at the end of an investigatory process addressing a manufacturer's noncompliance, an administrative law judge held that a manufacturer failed to provide reasonable and adequate warnings, a number of relevant penalties would be available. First, such a penalty could suspend a manufacturer's right to receive a tax rebate. The penalty could be an additional fine, or require the manufacturer to submit to more frequent and stricter scrutiny of the warnings by the FDA. In outrageous cases of fraud and abuse, the manufacturer's vaccine could be excluded entirely from the VICP, reimposing civil liability under the standards currently specified in the VICP legislation allowing punitive damages. The reporting measures in conjunction with these possible licensing and administrative penalties against a manufacturer should ensure compliance with comprehensive warning legislation in the absence of civil liability.

IV. CONCLUSION

100. Richard Neely colorfully suggested that "only people who believe in Tinker Bell [can] have any firm expectation that Congress will do anything" to improve product liability. n163 As for Senate Bill 2760, one of the VICP's precursor bills, he found it "complicated but largely useless" as well as full of "weasel language." n164 Judge Neely also predicted that the House would eventually "gut" the clear and convincing standard to be applied to jury decisions in design cases -- a standard he grudgingly valued. n165

101. Surprise Judge Neely, fairies are real! Not only did Congress manage to retain the clear and convincing standard, n166 they also managed to implement a workable program that alleviated the vaccine market stress. This demonstrates that, despite criticism and doubt, Congress is capable of identifying significant problems and implementing effective change. Moreover, Congress is an appropriate agent for change for the national vaccine market because it is swifter and more unifying than individual state legislatures or judicial districts. Consequently, as problems arise inside and outside of the VICP, Congress should not be afraid to seriously contemplate these challenges and to search out new solutions. Whether Congress decides to implement one or none of the changes this Note proposes, it must maintain its primary concern for public health and a balanced vaccine liability scheme.

102. Appendix A: Comparing Vaccine Liability in Civil Courts

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL]

103. Appendix B: Process for Creating the Flat Tax and Risk-based Rebate Using Hypothetical Data

Step 1: Estimate program costs.

Determine the total number of dollars necessary to run an expanded VICP with a 20% surplus for one year.

<$ 40,000,000 in program expenses, $ 10,000,000 surplus>

Step 2: How many doses of vaccine will the VICP have to cover during the program year?

Use epidemiological and industry data to predict the number of doses of vaccines manufacturers will produce that year.

<200,000,000 doses of four different vaccines produced by two different manufacturers>

Step 3: Determine the flat tax.

Divide the total from Step 1 by the number of doses of vaccine in Step 2 to determine a flat tax.

<$ 50,000,000/200,000,000 doses = $ 0.25 tax per dose of vaccine>

To determine how much each manufacturer will pay in total taxes multiply the tax by the number of doses of vaccine they make.

<($ 0.25)(50,000,000 doses)(2 vaccines) = $ 25,000,000 tax to the Trust Fund>

Step 4: What is the maximum amount of money the VICP could return to manufacturers in the form of a rebate?

This sum can be calculated two ways. First, the Advisory Committee could decide on additional program objectives it would pay for out of the surplus, establishing a single amount. Though individual rebate amounts would vary, total manufacturer rebates could not exceed the remaining surplus. Using a rebate formula, illustrated infra, manufacturers would actually have their rebates scaled to a $ 5,000,000 surplus.

<NVAC wants to use $ 5,000,000 for other program goals>

<$ 5,000,000 in vaccine tax could be returned as a rebate>
<after calculating the rebate based on total surplus the rebate is adjusted proportionally so that they do not exceed $ 5,000,000>

Or, the surplus can remain an aggregate $ 10,00,000 and could be distributed using a rebate formula that will leave a surplus, as illustrated infra.

Step 5: What factors should determine the amount of a manufacturer's rebate?

In this instance Advisory Committee chooses two merit-related factors to determine the amount of rebate each manufacturer receives:

a) the number of injuries the VICP must pay per 1,000,000 doses of vaccine that specific manufacturer produces, and

b) the amount of profit the manufacturer makes on those 1,000,000 doses of vaccine.

The fewer the injuries and the lower the profit, the larger the rebate a manufacturer receives. In addition, the Advisory Committee can choose a constant, or a guaranteed rebate. Therefore if the rebate formula returns a negative figure the manufacturer receives only the predetermined rebate amount, and does not owe the VICP any money.

Step 6: What specific elements should an algebraic formula contain to reflect the preferred distribution of rebates to manufacturers?

In Step 5 the Advisory Committee decided on the philosophical components of a formula, however, the formula must incorporate additional elements to make sure the rebates do not exceed the surplus, and that the formula takes into consideration the risk of each vaccine. Together these relevant elements are:

. the number of doses of vaccine a manufacturer produces
. the amount of profit the manufacturer makes on those vaccine doses
. the number of injuries that vaccine causes
. the tax a manufacturer pays on one vaccine
. the total number of vaccines a manufacturer produces
. the number of manufacturers making vaccines covered by the VICP
. VICP surplus
. the guaranteed 1% rebate amount
. the total number of rebates the VICP will have to pay
. the total number of injuries the VICP pays for the vaccines taxed in that year

Step 7: What does a rebate formula look like?

Rebate for one vaccine = [[S - (G)(V)]/V - [E + .01(P)]] + G

S= surplus = total tax revenue - program costs
G = guaranteed return of 1% of the tax
V = # of vaccines involved, the same vaccine produced by different manufacturers count as separate vaccines, not the # of doses
E = VICP expenses for injuries from that vaccine = VICP costs divided by the total number of injuries, and then multiplied by the number of injuries for that single vaccine
P = manufacturer profit on a vaccine in dollars

Rebate for a manufacturer = [SIGMA]rebates for each vaccine produced

Step 8: What would rebates using this formula look like?

The following table pulls together the hypothetical data described in this problem and shows four possible rebates.

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL]

Manufacturer 1 rebate: $ 3,450,566

Manufacturer 2 rebate: $ 1,850,283

Total rebates to manufacturers: $ 5,300,849

Surplus left for the Advisory Committee to use in the VICP: $ 4,699,151

FOOTNOTES:

n1 An extensive list of organizations that support vaccine research, development, and use, ranging from the American Academy of Family Physicians to the National Institutes of Health. See Vaccine Page Organizations-General (visited June 1, 1998) <http://www.vaccines.com/organizations.htm>.

n2 See Informed Parents Vaccination Home Page (visited Feb. 28, 1998) <http://www.unc.edu/aphillip/www/vaccine/informed.htm> ("Why are a growing number of parents and health care professionals around the world questioning vaccination? The controversy stems from the thousands of deaths and permanent disabilities attributed to vaccination annually, as well as the many published medical studies, government statistics, congressional testimonies, and other credible sources that directly contradict commonly held assumptions about vaccine safety and effectiveness. Take no one else's word for it: Make your own informed vaccination decisions!"); see also Welcome to the Concerned Parents for Vaccine Safety Home Page (visited Feb. 27, 1998) <http://home.sprynet.com:80/sprynet/Gyrene/Home.htm> (a multi-level web site with downloadable documents and links to other philosophically-aligned sources of information).

n3 The Food and Drug Agency ("FDA"), the National Institutes of Health ("NIH"), and Centers for Disease Control and Prevention ("CDC") have the primary legal mandates to further and approve vaccine development and use. See Food Drug & Cosmetic Act, 21 U.S.C. § 355 (1994) (requiring FDA to grant approval before a drug can enter interstate commerce); see also Children's Vaccine Initiative, 42 U.S.C. § 283d (1994) (mandate to National Institute of Allergies and Infectious Diseases and National Institute of Child Health and Human Development to develop childhood vaccines to be used in United States and abroad).

n4 Vaccine cases have provided the context for some of the Supreme Court's most serious examinations of due process and compelled technology use. See Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11, 24-27, 38-39 (1905) (landmark case upholding constitutionality of compulsory vaccination laws); see also United States v. Anderson, 328 U.S. 699, 700 (1946) (involving criminal prosecution of U.S. military inductee for refusing vaccination).

n5 In the years prior to congressional reform of vaccine manufacturer tort liability, insurance premiums rose steeply, and benefits, including maximum policy payouts to manufacturers, declined rapidly. See Mitchell F. Dolin, Excess Defense Coverage and Long-Tail Liabilities, 32 TORT & INS. L.J. 875, 875, 883-87, 891-98 (1997) (discussing the role of third party insurance in defending product liability suits and the 1984-85 liability crisis, including the stop gap measure of overlapping multiple policies). See generally Kyle D. Logue, Toward a Tax-Based Explanation of the Liability Insurance Crisis, 82 VA. L. REV. 895 (1996) (describing the 1980s liability crisis and arguing that it was related to the tax reform efforts occurring at the same time).

n6 See Morris v. Parke, Davis & Co., 573 F. Supp. 1324, 1325 (C.D. Cal. 1983) (permitting plaintiff to pursue punitive damages under a market share theory, established in Sindell v. Abbott Laboratories, 607 P.2d 924 (Cal. 1980), from DPT manufacturers if plaintiff could prove they had conscious disregard for safety).

n7 Some manufacturers, such as Connaught and Wyeth, actually ceased making the DPT vaccine. See 131 Cong. Rec. S3843-04 (daily ed. Apr. 2, 1985) (statement of Sen. Hawkins). After the Compensation Program, which absolved manufacturers of liability, was implemented, some manufacturers resumed production. Cf. NATIONAL VACCINE ADVISORY COMMITTEE, NATIONAL VACCINE PROGRAM, ADULT IMMUNIZATION, Appendix VII (1994) [hereinafter ADULT IMMUNIZATION] (listing Wyeth and Connaught as producing DPT vaccine).

n8 For instance, although breast implants are often used safely in post-radical mastectomy reconstructive surgery, and the data showing their dangerousness are equivocal at best, recent litigation against the

6. 1998 marks the tenth anniversary of the Compensation Program's implementation. Given the Compensation Program's basic success, this anniversary presents a natural time for reflection. Rather than allowing this examination to be self-congratulatory, this Note argues that Congress should vigorously scrutinize the VICP and the scientific and legal contexts in which it exists. Congress should first identify potential challenges to the efficient process the VICP uses and the vaccine market equilibrium it encourages. After considering the likelihood and strength of these challenges, Congress should contemplate making appropriate changes in the Vaccine Act to maintain vaccine availability, market equilibrium, and encourage increasing vaccine safety.

7. This Note has three main sections. Part II identifies factors that could challenge the VICP's operations and stabilizing effects on the vaccine market. Though identifying a number of potential external threats, this portion of the Note focuses particularly on the American Law Institute's ("ALI") newly authored n21 Restatement (Third) of Torts ("Third Restatement"). n22 Part II also looks at the recent simplification of the VICP's funding tax and other internal changes to the Compensation Program. If Congress actively reexamines the Compensation Program and determines that good cause exists to make changes, Part III suggests a course of action to minimize the negative effects of the threats and challenges discussed in Part II. This proposal centers around fully preempting all remedies for vaccine injuries outside the VICP, funding the VICP with a flat tax, and motivating manufacturer concern for safety with a risk-based rebate. Part IV concludes the Note.

II. CONGRESS SHOULD CRITICALLY REEXAMINE THE VICP

8. Before the 1986 National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, vaccine-injured individuals could seek compensation from vaccine manufacturers in state courts. Under diversity jurisdiction, federal courts provided an alternative forum, yet the tort claims of defective vaccine manufacturing, defective vaccine design, or inadequate warnings were the same in both court systems. n23

9. After Congress passed the Vaccine Act, vaccine-injured individuals retained an election to sue manufacturers in these courts, n24 but only after going through a no-fault process. In this no-fault process, the petitioners sued the Compensation Program, with the Secretary of Health and Human Services, instead of the manufacturer, as the respondent. n25 Congress designed the no-fault Compensation Program to be more than a mere preliminary step to suing manufacturers directly. By creating a petitioner-friendly process with liberal compensation guidelines, Congress hoped to make the VICP so attractive that vaccine-injured individuals would not exercise their election option at all.

10. The sections of the Vaccine Act that created the Compensation Program spells out comprehensively the no-fault process. n26 The statute describes how a person petitions the Federal Claims Court for compensation, n27 serves notice on the Secretary of Health and Human Services, n28 and establishes the existence of a qualifying injury. n29 The legislation carves out special rules of discovery, and excludes the possibility of using the no-fault process findings in the civil courts. n30 The Vaccine Act also clearly defines the role of the Special Masters who hear claims and make final decisions, n31 including the preponderance standards of proof and scientific presumptions that operate to make it easy for a petitioner to succeed. n32 The legislation lists the multiple categories of compensation a Special Master can award, ranging from past and future medical care to special housing and educational costs. n33 The Vaccine Act establishes how a Special Master makes a final recommendation to the Claims Court, n34 and how a petitioner can appeal that decision to the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit. n35 The Vaccine Act also determines the exact process for a petitioner to reject a Claims Court judgment and seek redress in the civil court system. n36

11. During its first years, the Compensation Program encountered difficulty in implementing efficiently the Vaccine Act's legislative scheme, despite the clear process created by Congress. In 1991 Wendy Mariner, a professor of Health Law at the Boston University School of Public Health, evaluated for the Administrative Conference of the United States the Compensation Program's first working year. n37 In that report she suggested that the Compensation Program was capable of working through its early problems hearing claims and would settle into a regular working pattern if it did not run out of funding. n38 The three most important questions today are: Has the Compensation Program worked out its old problems? Has it met its objectives of reducing manufacturer liability and providing easy compensation to victims? Are new threats emerging to challenge the Compensation Program in the future?

manufacturer has severely affected the silicon breast implant market. See MARCIA ANGELL, SCIENCE ON TRIAL 19, 21-23, 111-32 (1996).

n9 Neither technological determinism, which posits that science and technology are independent forces that the law cannot drive, nor technological neutrality, which credits human choice for scientific and technological advances, adequately explain Congress' choice to reshape the law to benefit vaccine technology. Only the theory of technological realism, which asserts that law and science have a dynamic relationship, each one shaping the direction of the other, explains this incident. See PRISCILLA M. REGAN, LEGISLATING PRIVACY: TECHNOLOGY, SOCIAL VALUES, AND PUBLIC POLICY 10-15 (1995).

n10 42 U.S.C. § § 300aa-1 to -34 (1994).

n11 See id. § 300aa-2(a)(1)-(9) (describing the role the Director of the National Vaccine Program has in research, development, testing, licensing, production, procurement, distribution, use, evaluation, coordination, and funding of vaccines).

n12 See id. § § 300aa-10 to -34.

n13 See id. § 300aa-11.

n14 Representative Madigan introduced the first draft of the Vaccine Act on March 27, 1985. See 131 Cong. Rec. H1587 (daily ed. Mar. 27, 1985) (Statement of Rep. Madigan). Though later modified to create a no-fault program, Representative Madigan's proposed legislation clearly voiced the House's first priority as preserving vaccines as a part of the American public health system. See id. ("This legislation is based on three major principles: First, the childhood immunization program in this country is one of our most important health efforts; second, the future availability of some vaccines is in severe jeopardy; and third, those children injured by vaccines deserve fast and equitable compensation.").

n15 Promulgated by the American Law Institute ("ALI"), a Restatement furthers the ALI's purpose "to promote the clarification and simplification of the law and its better adaptation to social needs" by expressing the majority view of the law, and in some cases acting correctively by proposing what the law should be. American Law Institute Bylaws, § 1.01 (eff. May 17, 1994) (visited May 5, 1997) <http://www.ali.org/ali/bylaws2.htm> [hereinafter ALI Bylaws]. A Restatement is not law unless a legislature takes the unusual step of incorporating it into legislation, or a court takes notice of its standards and applies them.

n16 See generally RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS (1963-64 Main Vol. & Supp.) [hereinafter SECOND RESTATEMENT].

n17 Representatives Dannmeyer, Fields, Nielson, and Schaefer jointly filed a dissenting view to H.R. 5546, The National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act. See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act of 1986, H.R. REP. NO. 99-908, at 78, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 6344, 6382-3. Although agreeing that federal action was necessary, they objected to the financing mechanism, an excise tax, and believed that the bill "further erodes the concept of compensating victims of negligent acts, and provides authority for the establishment of several unnecessary and dulicative [sic] advisory councils and commissions." Id. at 6382. Of course, these House members also supported their own bill, H.R. 1780, which would have used liability capitation, damages not to exceed $ 1,000,000, and paid awards out of private insurance. Id. at 6382-83; see also WENDY K. MARINER, ADMINISTRATIVE CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES, INNOVATION AND CHALLENGE: THE FIRST YEAR OF THE NATIONAL VACCINE INJURY COMPENSATION PROGRAM 6-8 (1991) [hereinafter FIRST YEAR] (describing the opposition of the Department of Justice to a new entitlement, and the opposition of the Department of Health and Human Services to "nearly automatic compensation" focusing on injuries when the agency was attempting to fulfill a concurrent mandate to promote vaccination (citation omitted)).

n18 See 131 Cong. Rec. S3843-04 (daily ed. Apr. 2, 1985) (statement of Sen. Hawkins) ("It is obvious that a legislative solution is needed to stabilize the supply of childhood vaccines and restore public confidence in the childhood immunization program."); see also Amendola v. Secretary Dep't Health & Human Servs., 23 Cl. Ct. 621, 626 (1991) (discussing the policy goals of the Vaccine Act); Stotts v. Secretary Dep't Health & Human Servs., 23 Cl. Ct. 352, 358 (1991) (stating that compensating vaccine injury victims was also a central goal of the VICP).

n19 See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act of 1986, H.R. REP. NO. 99-908, at 78 (1986), reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 6344, 6382 (dissenting Representatives' views suggesting that the Compensation Program would put the federal government at risk financially).

n20 See ADULT IMMUNIZATION, supranote 7, at Appendix VII (listing all currently produced vaccines and their manufacturers).

n21 See Heavy Substantive Agenda for ALI's 1997 Annual Meeting in Washington, D.C. (visited May 5, 1997) <http://www.ali.org/ali/annupdate.htm>.

n22 RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TORTS: PRODUCTS LIABILITY § 6(a) (Proposed Final Draft 1997) [hereinafter THIRD RESTATEMENT].

n23 See generally Wendy K. Mariner, Compensation Program for Vaccine Related Injury Abroad: A Comparative Analysis, 31 ST. LOUIS U. L.J. 599 (1987) (describing the history of American settlement of vaccine injury disputes and comparing it to international approaches).

n24 National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-21(a) (1994).

n25 See id. § 300aa-12(b) (parties involved in petitions).

n26 See id. § § 300aa-1 to -34; see also FIRST YEAR, supra note 17, at 11-20 (describing and evaluating the Compensation Program's implementation).

n27 See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-11 (1994) (describing form, content, and limitation of petitions).

n28 See id. § 300aa-11(a)(1) (notice).

n29 See id. § 300aa-11(c) (evidence of injury in petition).

n30 See id. § 300aa-12(d)(3)(B) ("There may be no discovery in a proceeding on a petition other than the discovery required by the special master."); § 300aa-12(d)(4)(A) (no information required by a Special Master may be disclosed without the express written permission of submitting party).

n31 See id. § 300aa-12(d) (duties of Special Masters).

n32 See id. § 300aa-13(b) (matters to be considered).

n33 See id. § 300aa-15 (long list of factors to be considered for determining compensation).

n34 See id. § 300aa-12(e)(3) (Special Master's decision is final unless petitioner files an objecting motion).

n35 See id. § 300aa-12(f) (appeals).

n36 See id. § 300aa-21(a) (elections); see also § 300aa-22 (standards to be applied in a mandatory three-phase civil action after a petitioner elects to reject the Compensation Program award or judgment of no award).

n37 See FIRST YEAR, supra note 17; see also Administrative Conference Act of 1964, 5 U.S.C. § § 591-96 (1994) (establishing the Administrative Conference as an independent federal agency dedicated to evaluating how other federal agencies carry out their duties).

n38 See FIRST YEAR, supra note 17, at 3, 66-69.

n39 See Vaccine Trust Fund, I.R.C. § 9510 (1994).

n40 See National Vaccine Injury Compensation Program, Summary of Current Issues, Report to the National Institutes of Health Pertussis Conference August, 1996 (visited June 11, 1997) <http://www.hrsa.dhhs.gov:80/bhpr/vicp/sumcur.htm#3> [hereinafter Current VICP Issues].

n41 See generally H.R. CONF. REP. 105-405 (1997) (Senate and House recommendations for 1998 fiscal year disbursements from the Vaccine Trust Fund to pay for Department of Justice and Federal Claims Court expenses related to the VICP); see also H.R. CONF. REP. 105-390 (1997) (Senate and House recommendations for 1998 fiscal year disbursements from the Vaccine Trust Fund to pay for Department of Health and Human Services expenses related to the VICP).

n42 See National Vaccine Injury Compensation Program, Monthly Statistics Report Through April 30, 1997 (visited June 11, 1997) <http://www.hrsa.dhhs.gov/bhpr/vicp/sumcur.htm> [hereinafter VICP Statistics].

n43 See National Vaccine Injury Compensation Program, Background Information on VICP, (visited June 11, 1997) <http://www.hrsa.dhhs.gov/bhpr/vicp/abdvic.htm> [hereinafter VICP Background].

n44 See ADULT IMMUNIZATION, supra note 7, at Appendix VII.

n45 See, e.g., Lyme Disease Vaccine Proven To Work in Clinical Trial, HEALTH LETTER CDC (Sept. 29, 1997), available in 1997 WL 7716620 (describing that a recent study concluded that a new lyme disease vaccine by Connaught is effective in preventing a disease that afflicts more than 16,000 American children and adults each year).

n46 One of the least understood aspects of product liability law is the role of perception in shaping legal change. A study of the trends in product liability law suits occurring in the federal courts during the same time frame as the vaccine liability "crisis" (1973 - 1986) indicates that vaccine manufacturers were not necessarily under extraordinary attack. TERENCE DUNGWORTH, PRODUCT LIABILITY AND THE BUSINESS SECTOR iii-v (1988). In fact, pharmaceutical manufacturers represented only 2.2% of all federal product liability defendants, and more than 60% of those cases related to the Dalkon Shield intrauterine device produced by A.H. Robins and the anti-nausea drug Bendectin produced by Merrill Dow -- not vaccines or their manufacturers. See id. 19, 39-43, 51.

Despite suffering from selection bias (the study did not include data on lawsuits in state courts) and confounding (asbestos litigation was unusually high in this time period, minimizing the real magnitude of health and pharmaceutical product cases) the study illustrates two important points. First, even if vaccines are particularly vulnerable to liability, the liability may be justified, not signaling a crisis. Second, Congress cannot project when public and industry perception will combine with real legal and scientific developments to signal a new "crisis" requiring attention and action. This Note argues that one rational response to uncertainty is to examine the issues that could combine with perception to create a new sense of crisis.

n47 For author's comparison of liability for vaccine injuries under different standards, see Appendix A.

n48 Product liability law, the broader body of law from which vaccine liability draws its own standards, has liberalized from its original fiercely pro-manufacturer stance. See, e.g., MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co., 111 N.E. 1050, 1053 (N.Y. 1916) (eliminated privity of contract requirement in tort, paving the way for remote purchasers to sue manufacturers directly, in this case an auto manufacturer); Escola v. Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 150 P.2d 436, 438-40 (Cal. 1944) (allowing bystander to receive damages for injuries from an exploding bottle).

As plaintiffs became more successful in product liability lawsuits, the ALI's Second Restatement codified many of the standards related to the three basic causes of action: defective manufacturing, defective design, and inadequate warnings or instructions. See SECOND RESTATEMENT, supra note 16, § 402A cmts. f, i, k (comments on "Special Liability of Seller of Product for Physical Harm to User or Consumer"). In grappling with unavoidably unsafe, or inherently dangerous products, such as medical technologies, the Second Restatement delicately tries to balance the interests of industry, society, and consumers by adopting what is generally called a "consumer expectation test" under a negligence standard. See id.

n49 The legislative history suggests that lawmakers at the time recognized that a series of events, and not single happenings, were combining to create the crisis. For what appears to be a particularly anxious statement, see 132 Cong. Rec. E2755-02 (Aug. 6, 1986) (statement of Rep. Fred J. Eckert). ("The lawsuits are mounting. Huge settlements are leading insurance companies to review their liability policies. Premiums are increasing. Coverage is being reduced. Policies are being canceled altogether. Some vaccine manufacturers have already ceased producing their products because they concluded the liability risk is too great.").

n50 Less than two months after the proposed final draft of the Third Restatement was adopted by the ALI membership, it was submitted to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Alabama as legal authority. See Citing Third Restatement, Union Carbide Also Wants Judgment in MDL, 5MEALEY'S LITIG. REP.:

BREAST IMPLANTS 15 (July 24, 1997) (reporting progress of a pending case, In re Silicone Gel Breast Implant Products Liability Litigation, MDL 926, CV-92-P-10000-S (N.D. Ala. filed Apr. 1, 1994)).

n51 Professors Henderson and Twerski, the Reporters for the Third Restatement, characterized their job as restating existing law. See James A. Henderson, Jr. & Aaron D. Twerski, Arriving at Reasonable Alternative Design: The Reporters' Travelogue, 30 U. MICH. J.L. REFORM 563, 564, 585 (1997). They acknowledge, however, that the Third Restatement sometimes takes principles from mere legal dicta to the creation of more modern standards, such as the highly controversial defective design standard. See id. at 563. Based on their articulated philosophy that the time has come for a new Restatement, these not-so-clearly existing standards must be intended to influence the law toward what are really new standards described in the Third Restatement.

n52 See supra note 50 and accompanying text.

n53 Judge Guido Calabresi and Jeffrey O. Cooper recount an anecdote about Judge Cardozo who, while sitting on the New York Court of Appeals, attended an ALI meeting to discuss the Restatement (First) of Torts. Guido Calabresi & Jeffrey O. Cooper, New Directions in Tort Law, 30 VAL. U. L. REV. 859, 866-67 (1996). Judge Cardozo, reportedly considering Palsgraf v. Long Island R.R., 162 N.E. 99 (N.Y. 1928) at the time, helped persuade the ALI membership that negligence should be relational, that is, directed toward the plaintiff, to be actionable. See id. After the ALI meeting, Judge Cardozo returned to work and convinced a majority of the New York Court of Appeals that they should reverse the lower court's decision for the plaintiff in Palsgraf because the Restatement would resolve the problem that way. See id.

n54 Though the Reporters of the Third Restatement may characterize their roles as passive, the same is not necessarily true for the ALI. See ALI Bylaws, supra note 15, at § 1.01 ("The Institute's purposes are as stated in its Certificate of Incorporation: The particular business and objects of the society are educational, and are to promote the clarification and simplification of the law and its better adaptation to social needs, . . . and to encourage and carry on scholarly and scientific legal work.") (emphasis added).

n55 See American Law Institute, Products Liability Restatement Gets Final Approval from Membership (visited Mar. 26, 1998) <http://www.ali.org/ali/AMDRAFTS.HTM>.

n56 See RICHARD A. EPSTEIN, CASES AND MATERIALS ON TORTS 759 (6th ed. 1995).

n57 See Terry Carter, Subtle Tort Reform New Restatement Injects Fault Issue in Design Defect Cases, 83 A.B.A. J. 18 (Aug. 1997).

n58 For example, James A. Henderson, Jr., who went from being a professor at the Boston University School of Law and a consultant to a manufacturer association, the National Product Liability Council, to a Reporter for the Third Restatement, testified before Congress in 1982 to support a national product liability standard limiting liability for manufacturers. See To Regulate Interstate Commerce by Providing For a Uniform Product Liability Law, and For Other Purposes, Hearings on S. 2631 Before the Subcomm. for Consumers of the Comm. on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, 97th Cong. 20 (Mar. 9, 1982). Tort reform also finds support from individuals at the state level. See generally RICHARD NEELY, THE PRODUCT LIABILITY MESS: HOW BUSINESS CAN BE RESCUED FROM THE POLITICS OF STATE COURTS (1988) (state judge and politician supporting federal judicial activism to reform tort-based civil actions).

n59 The Third Restatement, even in its tentative drafts, served as the focus of numerous law review articles. See, e.g., Jeffrey D. Winchester, Note, Section 8(C) of the Proposed Restatement (Third) of Torts: Is it Really What the Doctor Ordered?, 82 CORNELL L. REV. 644, 664-688 (1997) (discussing defective design standards in the Third Restatement's second tentative draft).

n60 See H.R. REP. NO. 99-908, at 26 (1986), reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 6344, 6367 ("Given the existence of the compensation system in this bill, the Committee strongly believes that Comment k [to section 402A of the Second Restatement] is appropriate and necessary as the policy for civil actions seeking damages in tort.").

n61 In the years following the Vaccine Act, courts interpreted congressional intent to allow the coexistence of federal and state remedies for vaccine injuries. See, e.g., Mazur v. Merck & Co., Inc., 742 F.Supp. 239, 246-8 (E.D. Pa. 1990). In fact, Congress mandated that states maintain a remedy for vaccine injuries. See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-22(e) (1994) ("No State may establish or enforce a law which prohibits an individual from bringing a civil action against a vaccine manufacturer for damages for a vaccine-related injury or death if such civil action is not barred by this part.").

n62 See H.R. REP. NO. 99-908, at 25-26, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 6344, 6366-67.

n63 "Post-election" refers to lawsuits permitted after a Court of Federal Claims judgment. See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-21 (1994).

n64 See Henderson & Twerski, supra note 51, at 564 ("Some contend that we have been political brokers. We are told, often by the same critics, that we have been ideologically rigid. It is hard to see how we could be both savvy political brokers and rigid ideologues. We plead not guilty on both counts of the indictment. We have heard from a multitude of voices. Arguments have been presented with both passion and intellectual rigor.").

n65 See Angela C. Rushton, Note, Design Defects Under the Restatement (Third) of Torts: A Reassessment of Strict Liability and the Goals of a Functional Approach, 45 EMORY L.J. 389, 400-8 (1996).

n66 See THIRD RESTATEMENT, supra note 22, § 2 (strict liability still applies to defectively manufactured products and simple negligence for design and warning cases) n67 See id. § 6 and comments.

n68 See SECOND RESTATEMENT, supra note 16, § 402A cmt. k.

n69 See THIRD RESTATEMENT, supra note 22, § 6.

n70 See id.

n71 See id. § 6(b).

n72 See id. § 2(a).

n73 See MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co., 111 N.E. 1050, 1053 (1916).

n74 See Products Liability Restatement Gets Final Approval from Membership, supra note 56.

n75 See THIRD RESTATEMENT, supra note 22, § 6 cmt. a.

n76 Compare SECOND RESTATEMENT, supra note 16, § 402A cmt. c (a consumer has the right to expect reasonably safe goods and is "entitled to the maximum of protection . . . [from] those who market the products") with THIRD RESTATEMENT, supra note 22, § § 6(c)-(d) and comments (lacking explicit consumer protection language).

n77 THIRD RESTATEMENT, supra note 22, § 6(c) (emphasis added).

n78 Id. § 6(c) cmt. f (emphasis added).

n79 See Mazur v. Merck & Co., Inc., 964 F.2d 1348, 1357-8 (3d Cir. 1992) (applying the Second Restatement's learned intermediary rule, and concluding that neither nurses nor pharmacists are learned intermediaries under the Pennsylvania construction of the doctrine).

n80 The classic Second Restatement learned intermediary standard allows a manufacturer to provide warnings and instructions to health care professionals instead of consumers when that health care professional has an evaluative role. See SECOND RESTATEMENT, supra note 16, § 402A cmt. k. This doctrine is based on the unique capabilities health care professionals have in assessing risks and benefits of medical interventions. The Second Restatement's expectation is that these learned intermediaries will pass the manufacturer's warnings and instructions to consumers in a form most likely to facilitate informed consent.

n81 The new standard demands that a better/safer vaccine design be available at the time the vaccine in question was administered. See Carter, supra note 58, at 18. This prohibits evidence of the development of a safer vaccine design between the time of administration/injury and the law suit to suggest that the original design was negligent, especially when the newer design was produced by a competitor. See id. ("As a practical matter, admits Habush, plaintiffs lawyers regularly offer reasonable alternative designs in making their cases. 'But this means it's no longer a strategic decision. . . . Now it's a threshold barrier to getting to a jury.'") (quoting Richard Habush, adviser to the Reporters for the Third Restatement, and a critic of the alternative design requirement).

n82 See THIRD RESTATEMENT, supra note 22, § 6 cmt. f.

n83 See id. § 6 cmt. b and corresponding Reporter's Note.

n84 See id.

n85 See id.; see also id. § 4(b) (rules governing compliance with regulations).

n86 See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-22(b)(2)(1994) ("For purposes of [civil vaccine warning liability], a vaccine shall be presumed to be accompanied by proper directions and warning if the vaccine manufacturer shows that it complied in all material respects with all requirements under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act."). One issue that this Note does not attempt to solve is how Congress can substantively improve the way regulations ensure that manufacturers design safe vaccines and effective warnings to limit the number of injuries and deaths from inherent dangers. This should be a large concern for Congress if federal and state regulations become the benchmark for reasonableness in the absence of negligence-based civil liability, which currently provides an external motivation to make vaccines safe and warnings effective. See Mazur v. Merck & Co., Inc., 742 F.Supp. 239, 247 (E.D. Pa. 1990) (federal regulation and tort law serve different purposes). There is no objective evidence that these regulations actually demonstrate how reasonable designs and warnings should look.

n87 See THIRD RESTATEMENT, supra note 22, § 6(d).

n88 See id. § 6 cmt. d.

n89 See Richard C. Ausness, Product Category Liability: A Critical Analysis, 24 N. KY. L. REV. 423, 432-35 (1997) (general discussion of the risk utility test and its applications).

n90 See THIRD RESTATEMENT, supra note 22, § 6(d)(1).

n91 Id. § 6(d)(2).

n92 See SECOND RESTATEMENT, supra note 16, § 402A cmt. k.

n93 The VICP does say that manufacturers will not be excused from directly warning consumers if, when proved by clear and convincing evidence, they abused the lenient standard by willfully hiding risks or failing to use due care when proved by clear and convincing evidence. See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-22(b)(2)(A)-(B) (1994).

n94 See THIRD RESTATEMENT, supra note 22, § 6 cmt. e ("When the content of the warnings is mandated or approved by a governmental agency regulation and a court finds that compliance with such regulation federally preempts tort liability, then no liability under this Section can attach.").

n95 See id.

n96 See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § § 300aa-(11), 14(a) (1994) (presumption of causation to vaccines in program, allowing non-Table childhood vaccine injuries to go through VICP, but not suggesting that all vaccines are childhood vaccines).

n97 See Carter v. Secretary Dep't Health & Human Servs., 21 Cl. Ct. 651, 653-55 (1990) (affirming Special Master's decision that petitioner failed to establish that her non-Table injury, juvenile rheumatoid arthritis, was caused by the covered rubella vaccine).

n98 More specific results are discussed in section II(E), infra.

n99 See H.R. REP. NO. 99-908, at 5 (1986), reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 6344, 6346 (priority 4).

n100 See 131 Cong. Rec. S3843-04 (daily ed. Apr. 2, 1985) (statement of Senator Hawkins).

n101 See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-21 (1994) (election option).

n102 See VICP Background, supra note 43.

n103 The enabling legislation's title (the National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act) indicates that the Compensation Program was designed to cover vaccines routinely recommended for children. However, this limitation does not exclude adults who take these same vaccines. See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-11 (1994). Indeed, there are no age requirements for recovering under the VICP. See id; Schafer v. American Cyanamid Co., 20 F.3d 1, 5-7 (1st Cir. 1994) (finding that when both parents contracted polio from daughter who had been vaccinated and developed disease, other's acceptance of VICP award did not bar father and daughter from suing under Massachusetts law applied in federal court under diversity jurisdiction).

n104 See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42. U.S.C. § 300aa-11(b)(1)(B) (limiting pre-1988 injuries to a maximum of 3500 petitions); see also Charette v. Secretary of Dep't of Health and Human Servs., 33 Fed. Cl. 488, 491-93 (1995) (affirming Special Master's decision to dismiss claim by wife of man killed by anaphylactic reaction to typhoid vaccine, which is not included in VICP).

n105 "Routinely administered" is a term of art within the VICP. The Congressional mandate to the Secretary of Health and Human Services is to expand the VICP to cover more vaccines when the CDC determines that they should be "routinely administered" to children. See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-14(e)(1)-(2) (1994) ("When . . . the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention recommends a vaccine to the Secretary for routine administration to children, the Secretary shall, within the 2 years of such recommendation, amend the Vaccine Injury Table" to include the vaccine in the Compensation Program) (emphasis added). See generally EMERGING VIRUSES (Stephen S. Morse, ed. 1993) (essays discussing the ecological and historical patterns of disease emergence, recession, and reemergence, including the potential for upcoming disease epidemics of new and old diseases).

n106 See discussion supra note 103.

n107 Despite the fact that the VICP now covers the hepatitis B vaccine, many contemporary adults were never vaccinated against the disease because the vaccine only became available in the late 1970s. Consequently, adults recently vaccinated against hepatitis B are taking a "childhood" vaccine. See W. Charles Cockburn, Disease Control and Prevention in the 20th Century: The Role of Immunization, in PROCEEDINGS OF THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON THE ROLE OF THE INDIVIDUAL AND THE COMMUNITY IN THE RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, AND USE OF BIOLOGICALS, at 6 (Mar. 2-5, 1976); see also National Vaccine Injury Compensation Program, Vaccine Injury Table (eff. Mar. 24, 1997) (visited June 11, 1997) http://www.hrsa.dhhs.gov/bhpr/vicp/table.htm> (listing the Hepatitis B vaccine) [hereinafter New Vaccine Injury Table].

n108 See The Whooping Cough Afflicts Teens, Adults: Preliminary Data Suggest Pertussis Often Causes Coughs in Grown-Ups, WALL ST. J., Oct. 2, 1997.

n109 See AIDSW KLY. PLUS (Sept. 29, 1997), available in 1997 WL 11007305 (reporting positive findings from tests of the HPG-30 AIDS vaccine); Brigid Schulte, Terrifying Risk in AIDS Fight: Volunteers Would Risk Lives to Find Vaccine Against Deadly Disease, SEATTLE TIMES, Sept. 27, 1997, at A2 (announcing 50 AIDS activists' offer to receive an attenuated AIDS virus to further the pace of vaccine research and clinical trials).

n110 See VICP Statistics, supra note 42.

n111 See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-1 to -34 (1994).

n112 The Surgeon General does not have a direct role in the VICP, however, that position has a number of similarities to the roles that key actors in the VICP play. Each individual creates policy, takes on particular causes by drawing public attention to problems, marshals resources committed to change, and sets scientific standards.

n113 See Sabin Russell, Not Afraid To Speak Her Mind, S.F. CHRON., Nov. 9, 1997, at 3Z3 (interview with Dr. Elders in which she expressed that being an activist, even if doing so is controversial, is a part of being a central public health figure).

n114 See Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11, 26 (1905) (stating that a mandatory vaccination statute was constitutional despite the liberty interest implicated).

n115 See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-14(c).

n116 O'Connell v. Shalala, 79 F.3d 170, 179 (1st Cir. 1996) ("The petitioners' interpretation means that every alteration to the text of a proposed rule -- even a minor technical or grammatical alteration -- would have to be rerouted through the [Advisory Committee], subject to a fresh notice-and-comment period. This extra step would be necessary even when the Secretary changes a proposed regulation in accordance with the [Advisory Committee's] announced wishes or to correct a syntactical bevue [sic]. Such a construction would create a nearly endless circle and attenuate the rulemaking process without achieving any corresponding benefit. Because it is difficult to believe that the Congress intended to prolong the revisory process by directing the Secretary to engage in a mindless minuet, the prospect of wasted motion cuts against the petitioners' interpretation.").

n117 See 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-14(c).

n118 Hepatitis B, conjugated and unconjugated Hib, and Varicella (chicken pox) have been added to the list of the vaccines the VICP covers. See New Vaccine Injury Table, supra note 107. The original Vaccine Injury Table focused on encephalopathy and seizure disorders, and now the VICP covers a wider range of defined injuries such as chronic arthritis, brachial neuritis, and thrombocytopenic purpura. See id. at (6)-(11).

n119 See New Vaccine Injury Table, supra note 107 (accompanying scientific exposition).

n120 See I.R.C. § 9510(c) (1994).

n121 See Pub. L. No. 105-34 § 904, 111 Stat. 788, 873-74 (1997) (codified at I.R.C. § 4131(b)).

n122 See Excise Tax Financing of Federal Trust Funds, available in 1993 WL 739690 (C.R.S.) (January 5, 1993) [hereinafter Federal Trust Funds] (explaining federal trust funds).

n123 See I.R.C. § 9510 (1994). After the change to a flat tax, the taxes are still placed into the Vaccine Trust Fund. See id.

n124 This is also called the DTP vaccine.

n125 See VICP Statistics, supra note 43.

n126 See I.R.C. § 4131(b) (1994) (amended by Pub. L. 105-34 § 904, 111 Stat. 788, 873-74 (1997)).

n127 See id.

n128 See id.

n129 See VICP Statistics, supra note 43.

n130 See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-15j (1994).

n131 See Federal Trust Funds, supra note 122, at *11.

n132 See id.

n133 See Current VICP Issues, supra note 41.

n134 See id.

n135 This simple tax mechanism does not even come close to confronting the issues of separating risk when multiple vaccines are administered at the same time, or whether administering multiple vaccinations is ethical if scientists cannot estimate their combined risks.

n136 See Current VICP Issues, supra note 41.

n137 The compromise also rejected the Senate's proposal of limiting the flat tax to a two-year experiment with an evaluation of its permanent feasibility based on a study by the Secretary of the Treasury. See I.R.C. § 4131(b)(2) (Supp. 1997).

n138 There are numerous reasons why the Trust Fund might be overfunded. At the most simple level, the risk-based vaccine tax might be miscalculated, thereby "misdiagnosing" the need for compensation. Private insurance might be paying for injuries in lieu of public monies from the Trust Fund, which only pays for unreimbursable costs. Still, successful vaccination campaigns in socioeconomically disadvantaged areas rely heavily on mass clinics where there may be inadequate screening for risk factors, and when injuries do occur, few attorneys are willing to take injury cases to the Compensation Program on a contingency fee basis. Each one of these explanations merits a different remedy, from changing the tax formula, to amending the Vaccine Act to cover different types of costs, to providing free legal assistance. Overfunding alone does not clearly suggest that the problem is related to a risk component in the tax.

n139 See Current VICP Issues, supra note 41 (flat tax level initially proposed in President Clinton's 1995 budget).

n140 See generally ARTHUR M. SILVERSTEIN, PURE POLITICS AND IMPURE SCIENCE (1981) (discussing the unexpected emergence of the "swine flu" in 1976, and the emergency legislative action Congress enacted to make the appropriate vaccine available).

n141 The recent tension between the United States and Iraq involved using anthrax as a biological weapon. See Fouad Ajami, Saddam and a Sack of Sugar, U.S. NEWS & WORLD REP., Dec. 1, 1997, at 46. Anthrax is a vaccine preventable disease, and the Michigan Biologic Products Institute ("MBPI") is the sole American anthrax vaccine producer. See ADULT IMMUNIZATION, supra note 7, at Appendix VII. Currently, Department of Defense contracts account for $ 20 million in annual sales by the MBPI, with virtually no private use (or liability) of the vaccine. See Former Workers Question State Assessment of MBPI Value, MICH. INFO. & RES. SERV., July 17, 1997, at 1-2. If the military and CDC decide that it is wise to vaccinate a wider number of Americans against anthrax, the State of Michigan would, understandably, be wary of liability. To allay Michigan's liability fears, and ensure that the vaccine would be available, the anthrax vaccine could be included in the VICP. Yet without a surplus, the Trust Fund might not be able to pay all of its meritorious claims for injuries from other vaccines in addition to anthrax injuries because the anthrax vaccine has never been taxed, nor is it included in any financial planning for the VICP.

A much more likely emergency scenario for a vaccine would revolve around a vaccine for the H5N1 "Hong Kong" or "Avian" influenza. See Brian Palmer, A Bird-to-Human Flu, U.S. NEWS & WORLD REP., Jan. 12, 1998, at 30;. Although influenza is normally treated as a routine illness, even in benign years it kills up to 20,000 Americans. See Laura Tangley, Detecting Secrets of a Potential Killer: Scientists Home In on Why Bird Flu May Spawn the Next Deadly Pandemic, U.S. NEWS & WORLD REP., Jan. 26, 1998, at 60. The possibility that this new flu strain may be as devastating as the 1918 worldwide Spanish influenza pandemic, which killed more than 20 million people, is particularly frightening for public health planners and virologists who see an inherent problem in finding a H5N1 vaccine culture medium. See id. at 61. Given the recent failure of several lots of Parke-Davis' Fluogen vaccine for a less virulent strain of influenza, the pressure is mounting on manufacturers to provide a safe and effective vaccine for this new killer disease. See Flu Shot Advisory (visited Oct. 5, 1997) <http://www.alaw.org/pr.121896.html> (warning about the Parke-Davis recall). Immunity from tort liability through the VICP would help encourage manufacturer efforts to address the potential epidemic, but it would also expose the VICP to a significant financial drain if even a small percentage of injuries result.

n142 See I.R.C. § 9510(d)(1) (1994).

n143 The primary warning about which courts are concerned comes directly from vaccine manufacturers in written disclosures of costs and benefits of specific vaccines. See, e.g., Reyes v. Wyeth Laboratories, 498 F.2d 1264, 1293 (5th Cir. 1974) (case brought for injuries infant sustained from Sabin oral polio vaccine, negligent warning claimed because only nurse saw vaccine package insert listing the vaccine's risks).

n144 See Hill v. American Cyanamid Co., No. 03 A01-9108-CV-267, 1992 WL 9466 at * 2 (Tenn. Ct. App. Jan. 24, 1992) (holding that state Medicaid reimbursement of illness costs were not unreimbursable expenses under the VICP and that a special master's finding of insufficient jurisdictional amount should be considered a final judgment, allowing the pursuit of state remedy).

n145 National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-15(g) (1994).

n146 See VaCCINe: The Virginia Computerized Children's Immunization Network (visited Oct. 5, 1997) <http://vmednet.gen.va.us/clinical/vaccine.html>.

n147 Opponents to mainstream medicine, whether they resist mandatory vaccination or fluoridation of community water sources, tend to be labeled as illegitimate and unreliable. See Exner v. American Medical Association, 529 P.2d 863, 866-7 (Wash. Ct. App. 1974) (affirming dismissal of water fluoridation opponent's defamation lawsuit claiming that American Medical Association had personally attacked him in an article attempting to portray the activists in his cause as "charlatans" or "quacks"); Yiamouyiannis v. Consumers Union, Inc., 619 F.2d 932, 942 (2d Cir. 1980) (affirming dismissal of water fluoridation opponent's defamation lawsuit).

n148 See VACCINE ADVERSE EVENT REPORTING SYSTEM (VAERS) (visited Oct. 5, 1997) <http://www.fda.gov/cber/vaerstxt.html#info>; see also SUSAN S. ELLENBERG & ROBERT T. CHEN, THE COMPLICATED TASK OF MONITORING VACCINE SAFETY, PUB. HEALTH REP. 10, 11 (Jan. 11, 1997) ("Vaccines, like all other pharmaceutical products, are not entirely risk-free; while most known side effects are minor and self-limited, some vaccines have been associated with very rare but serious adverse effects. Because such rare effects are often not evident until vaccines come into widespread use, the Federal government maintains ongoing surveillance programs to monitor vaccine safety. The interpretation of data from such programs is complex and is associated with substantial uncertainty. A continual effort to monitor these data effectively and to develop more precise ways of assessing risks of vaccines is necessary to ensure public confidence in immunization programs.").

n149 See Jon S. Abramson, et al., Development of a Vaccine Tracking System to Improve the Rate of Age-Appropriate Primary Immunization in Children of Lower Socioeconomic Status, 126 J. PEDIATRICS 583, 585-86 (1995) (study conducted in Forsyth County, North Carolina, determined that tracking children from birth, combined with discussion of the importance of vaccination, telephone and mail reminders, resulted in a statistically significant increase in age-appropriate vaccination); Raja Mishra, Immunization Score Rises, DET. FREE PRESS, July 24, 1997, at B1 (state health officials attribute a new Michigan immunization database with partial credit for the 15% improvement in state immunization rates).

n150 See W. KIP VISCUSI, REFORMING PRODUCTS LIABILITY 209-215 (1991).

n151 Id. at 211 (using the word "insurance" broadly, meaning compensation for injuries as well as a level of confidence for individuals' future if they are injured).

n152 See THIRD RESTATEMENT, supra note 22, § 6 cmt. b.

n153 See Current VICP Issues, supra note 41.

n154 For author's example of how to plan for a flat tax and risk-based rebate see Appendix C, infra.

n155 See Margaret I. Lyle, Note, Mass Tort Claims and the Corporate Tortfeasor: Bankruptcy Reorganization and Legislative Compensation Versus the Common-Law Tort System, 61 TEX. L. REV. 1297, 1352-55 (1983) (discussing how government assumption of compensation costs in overwhelming liability cases defeats market incentives for safety).

n156 The first proposal for a flat tax to reduce the Trust Fund Surplus was suggested at $ 0.51 per dose. See Current VICP Issues, supra note 41. The current flat tax rate is $ 0.75. See I.R.C. § 4131(b) (Supp. 1997).

n157 In implementing the flat tax Congress could include an incentive for manufacturers to lower vaccine costs by tying the tax to the wholesale per-dose cost of the vaccine. Typically, lowering price might raise concerns about lowering vaccine safety, however, the risk-based rebate described in the next section could overcome those concerns. The strongest argument against tying external factors to the tax is that doing so alters the flat nature of the tax even if the variables are unrelated to the risk of injury.

n158 See DiLeo v. Secretary Dep't Health & Human Servs., 23 Cl. Ct. 796, 799-800 (1991).

n159 See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-27 (1994).

n160 See Rodriguez v. Secretary Dep't Health & Human Servs., 34 Fed. Cl. 57, 60 (1995) (affirming Special Master's decision to dismiss claim against VICP, and pointedly attacking petitioner's failure to cite supportive legislative history); see also Staples v. Secretary Dep't Health & Human Servs., 30 Fed. Cl. 348, 356-59 (1994) (affirming decision to dismiss VICP claim based on construction of legislative history as evidence of Congress' intent to exclude claims for vaccine preventable diseases contracted from community exposure).

12. The weight of the evidence suggests that the Compensation Program has settled into an effective routine and is meeting Congress' policy goals; no single issue or factor appears ready to destroy the VICP at this time. The Vaccine Trust Fund, n39 which pays for compensation to victims in the VICP, is running a surplus. n40 Both the Senate and the House recommended 1998 funding for the administrative aspects of the VICP at or above previous levels. n41 Finally, after nine years, the VICP has adjudicated the majority of its backlogged cases. n42 Only a relatively small number of petitioners to the Compensation Program elect to preserve their rights to civil remedies by rejecting VICP awards, and not all of them choose to seek redress in other courts. n43 Manufacturers continue to produce vaccines. n44 Vaccine research is continuing to progress, providing new hope for eliminating diseases. n45 Despite the good news that no one issue or event is imminently poised to ruin the VICP, Congress should remain vigilant, looking for problems before they occur. The VICP's current conditions demonstrate that it is functioning to meet the needs of 1986 America. These factors neither indicate how well the VICP is handling today's vaccine issues, nor if the Compensation Program is capable of addressing upcoming vaccine problems.

13. A cautious Congress must acknowledge that the world is changing. What works to maintain a vaccine liability equilibrium, satisfying consumers, victims, manufacturers, and public health officials now may not work in the future. Congress should not wait for a dramatic event, such as a sudden decrease in manufacturer concern for vaccine safety or improvement, to signal that it is time to reconsider the VICP. If Congress does wait for another disaster it will be ignoring one of the most important lessons of the last vaccine liability crisis: there may not be one single event to indicate that Congress needs to take action. n46 In general, the law that applies to vaccine injuries n47 tends to evolve slowly. n48 Therefore, Congress should be sensitive to the fact that though the Vaccine Act helped redirect the natural evolution of the vaccine-law interaction, it did not halt the evolution.

14. Key to this analytical viewpoint is understanding that one challenge to the compensation program or the vaccine market alone may not necessarily make any difference. However, when changes occur in rapid succession, or concurrently, they may have unintended effects. For example, if manufacturers only experienced liability in some high profile vaccine injury cases or lacked liability insurance in the 1970s and 1980s, vaccine prices may have gone up, but the problems would not have appeared as severe. By contrast, when manufacturers were losing cases and they could not buy sufficient liability insurance, that was perceived as significantly harmful. n49 This Note identifies separate, rising vaccine liability issues, and projects how they could combine to create a problematic legal and economic atmosphere. By recognizing flaws inherent in the Compensation Program, ("internal challenges"), as well as outside forces that may affect it ("external challenges"), Congress can make any necessary changes smoothly and gradually. The following sections identify five internal and external challenges to the VICP.

A. The Highly Conservative Third Restatement -- External Challenge

1. The Third Restatement will be influential

15. Congress should recognize that the Third Restatement of Torts is a highly influential scholarly work. n50 Moreover, the Third Restatement proposes to use its influence to further fundamentally different and radically conservative standards for product liability. n51 These standards may conflict with the purposes underlying the Compensation Program, thereby causing problems in the way it works.

16. When academic writing proposes new paths for the law, policy makers, judges, and practitioners may not take notice. However, this new Restatement stands to be more than academic, it is likely to affect state and federal law. n52 Although the Restatement cannot change law without judicial or legislative adoption, the ALI's membership is comprised of the same people active in legal reform who will make persuasive arguments for implementing the Third Restatement's standards in legislatures and courts. n53 While a transition from thoughts to application may not be the purpose of other writings that explore legal theory, it is consistent with the ALI's goal to affect the law. n54 Therefore, the heated debate in Washington, D.C. at the ALI's annual meeting in May, 1997 can be seen as a preview of the debate and legislative action to come. n55

17. Considering that the Second Restatement's position on product liability dominated American legal thought for over thirty years, the Third Restatement can rely on precedent to suggest that eventually it too will n161 See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-22(c) (1994) (absolving manufacturers of liability for failing to warn consumers directly).

n162 See SECOND RESTATEMENT, supra note 16, § 6 cmt. e.

n163 See NEELY, supra note 59, at 80.

n164 See id. at 161.

n165 See id.

n166 See National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, § 300aa-22(b)(2)(B) (1994).

be widely applied. n56 Although change will likely take time, n57 there is no reason to believe that because the Third Restatement is also non-binding it will be any less acceptable to the institutions that create and administer the law than was the Second Restatement.

18. Furthermore, the national tort reform movement, which typically argues for more manufacturer protection and greater restraint on individual freedom to sue for injuries, has widespread advocates. n58 The new Restatement will almost certainly be used in future public debate as "evidence" of what is right or proper about liability, due to its highly visibility since its tentative drafts. n59

19. The ALI's vote last spring to adopt the Third Restatement should also attract Congress' attention because the Second Restatement was the explicit foundation for the Compensation Program. n60 Congress may take the Third Restatement as a sign that relying on the Second Restatement's philosophies is no longer advisable. Further, because Congress chose not to fully preempt state remedies, n61 Congress implicitly relied on the Second Restatement to shape the majority of the remedies available outside the Compensation Program. n62 If the law currently applied to post-election n63 vaccine cases in the state and federal courts no longer provides a realistic opportunity for adequate remedies for vaccine injuries based on the Third Restatement's standards, Congress may pay close attention.

2. What the Third Restatement Changes

20. One of the most contentious issues the ALI membership debated last spring centered around the decision to change the liability standards for medical products such as vaccines. n64 The disproportionately lengthy discussion about medical products and prescription drugs indicates just how strikingly different the Third Restatement is from the Second Restatement and majority law. In general, the Third Restatement makes it more difficult for a court that follows its position to impose liability on a vaccine manufacturer because the text moves toward a higher threshold for liability. n65 To make this turn toward the conservative, the Third Restatement uses two drafting devices.

21. First, the Third Restatement creates a dual liability standard by creating one standard for general product liability and another for medical products and prescription drugs. General liability, described in section 2, retains the more consumer-sympathetic standards the Second Restatement proposed. n66 In comparison, section 6, which narrowly applies to medical devices and prescription drugs such as vaccines, acknowledges the inherent social utility in medical products and adopts a manufacturer-sympathetic approach. n67 This special medical product standard makes it difficult for a plaintiff to recover against a manufacturer under most circumstances. In contrast, the Second Restatement treated legal liability for all types of products as a single issue. The Second Restatement only proposed different standards of liability if products posed different levels of dangerousness. n68 By isolating medical device and prescription drug liability, the Third Restatement minimizes opposition to higher liability thresholds. Consumer protection advocates focusing on automobile safety, for example, have no reason to object to the Third Restatement because car buyers retain a higher level of protection against manufacturer negligence.

22. The second drafting device the Reporters of the Third Restatement use to make the Third Restatement more conservative is the conservative language of the text itself. Though still arranging liability around the three basic causes of action, the Reporters use extensive comments, illustrations, and rationales to clarify the Third Restatement's intended impact. n69 The substance of this approach is outlined immediately below.

a. Defective manufacture of vaccines -- strict liability

23. The general rule for liability remains that "[a] manufacturer of a prescription drug or medical device who sells or otherwise distributes a defective drug or medical device is subject to liability for harm to persons caused by the defect." n70 A product is not considered defective unless "at the time of sale or other distribution" it "contains a manufacturing defect as defined in section 2(a)" of the general product liability standards. n71 That broader portion of the Third Restatement states that a product "contains a defect when [it] departs from its intended design even though all possible care was exercised in the preparation and marketing of the product." n72 Other than updating the language of this section to apply specifically to medical products, this strict liability standard remains consistent with Judge Cardozo's opinion in the benchmark product liability case MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co. n73

b. Defective design -- no liability unless absolutely no benefit

24. Defective design was the most contentious standard in the Third Restatement debated by the ALI membership. n74 Unlike the liability standard for defective vaccine production, in which the Third Restatement retains the traditional approach, n75 the Third Restatement reverses the liberal pro-consumer approach in defective design actions. Contrary to the Second Restatement, the Third Restatement does not find relevant the reasonable consumer's expectation of a design's safety. n76 Plaintiffs can no longer allege that a manufacturer was negligent if it failed to consider consumer toleration or preferences for risks when it designed a vaccine.

25. Instead of looking at reasonable consumer views, the Third Restatement standard asks whether a learned intermediary, having weighed the foreseeable risks of a vaccine against its therapeutic benefits, would have found it so dangerous that she or he would not have prescribed it for "any class of patients." n77 Comment f frames the issue by saying that a vaccine design is unreasonable only when objectively viewed, reasonable providers, possessing the knowledge that a reasonable drug manufacturer had or should have had about the risks and benefits attendant to the use of the drug or medical device, would [not] prescribe it for any class of patients. Given this very demanding objective standard, liability is likely to be imposed only under unusual circumstances. The court has the responsibility to determine when the plaintiff has met the burden of production for this demanding standard. n78

26. Although the plaintiff-victims and defendant-manufacturers will present expert testimony supporting their positions at trial, the Third Restatement lowers the threshold for reasonableness to the extent that a jury only has a minimal fact finding role and the testifying experts possess significant power to determine a case's outcome. Rather than requiring an affirmative decision that a vaccine design was or was not reasonable, the Third Restatement limits the jury's decision to believing or not believing in the existence of a class of users for whom the vaccine may be useful.

27. Note that the standard never specifically asks whether the testifying learned intermediary would find the vaccine design reasonable. The Third Restatement asks a learned intermediary, who is most likely a doctor, n79 to determine whether the vaccine has any use at all. Nor does the standard ask a learned intermediary to decide whether the manufacturer should suggest the vaccine is safe to use for people with the plaintiff's health background, even if that was implied or stated on the vaccine's label. The Third Restatement elevates the role of learned intermediaries beyond acting as conduits for warnings to the point where they are also vaccine design judges. n80 This, perhaps, forms a new learned intermediary standard. By pre-selecting physicians as the preferred scientific experts on vaccines, though virologists, biochemists, or other health professionals may have equally good or superior insight into the vaccine design and injury at issue, the Third Restatement expands the importance of health care providers.

28. By pinning liability to a health care provider's perspective, the Third Restatement ensures that lawsuits minimize outsider comparisons of the industry n81 and eliminates the plaintiff's viewpoint from affecting the proceedings. The Third Restatement reinforces this new learned intermediary standard by requiring a plaintiff to establish that a reasonable alternative design was possible and available when the vaccine was designed. n82 Potentially, the Third Restatement allows manufacturers that are the sole producers of a specific type of a vaccine to control their liability risks by exploring one vaccine design during development, thus effectively eliminating defective design as a cause of action.

29. This Third Restatement standard also highlights a growing deference to the regulatory systems that approve vaccine designs. n83 In a sophisticated argument, the Reporters suggest that if an appropriate government agency has already approved a vaccine design, courts should strongly consider not imposing what amounts to their additional, but unstated, regulation. n84 The Third Restatement weights its arguments in favor of the manufacturer and against judicial regulation of vaccine design by making it extremely difficult for a plaintiff to prevail in this type of suit. n85 Although taking the idea to an extreme, the Third Restatement parallels the VICP's rebuttable presumption that vaccine designs complying with federal regulatory requirements are per se reasonable and not negligent. n86

c. Defective warning -- new learned intermediary standard

30. The Third Restatement attempts to balance a lenient attitude toward manufacturer design choices by mandating warnings. n87 Hopefully, given the right information, a consumer can decide not to take the vaccine if his or her health background suggests that doing so is dangerous. n88 On a larger scale, the theory behind warnings attempts to reduce the exposed group for whom a vaccine poses little benefit, but significant risks. n89

31. The Third Restatement states that a manufacturer will be held liable for injuries when the warning of foreseeable risks are not supplied to the "prescribing and other health care providers who are in a position to reduce the risks of harm in accordance with the instructions or warnings." n90 And if the manufacturer does not warn "the patient when [it] knows or has reason to know that health care providers will not be in a position to reduce the risks of harm in accordance with the instructions or warnings" the manufacturer can also be held liable for injuries. n91

32. This requirement that manufacturers be excused from liability if they adequately warn learned intermediaries in an evaluative role is not innovative in itself. The Second Restatement proposed a similar standard, n92 and the VICP went one step further by eliminating manufacturer responsibility for direct consumer warnings. n93 The Third Restatement does, however, suggest a more substantive standard for negligence when plaintiffs question warning and instruction adequacy. Although the Third Restatement does not go so far as to suggest a standardized warning for vaccines, it does explicitly state that, when a warning meets regulatory standards, courts should heavily consider that as adequate and reasonable. n94 Much in the same way that the new defective design standards hold reasonable consumer expectations of safety irrelevant, the Third Restatement suggests that courts not be overly concerned with the actual impact of a warning. n95

33. On one level this standard proposes an efficient system, allowing manufacturers to avoid liability based on a particular plaintiff-consumer's ability to comprehend a warning. Nevertheless, this new standard provides no clue as to when a court may legitimately examine the substance of a warning or instruction. Although the Third Restatement uses government regulation as a benchmark for adequacy, it does not suggest the level of accuracy or effectiveness a regulatory standard must demand in order to afford a complying warning or instructing a safe harbor from liability. Nor does the Third Restatement demand that these government regulations be concerned with consumer safety. The Reporters and the ALI membership could have kept the courts out of the business of regulating the substance of warnings by allowing compliance to absolve liability, but still require that the regulations demand reasonable warnings.

34. This failure to require reasonably effective warnings is disturbing when combined with the defective design standard. Under the Third Restatement, manufacturers have much more freedom to make vaccine designs suitable for only the smallest group of consumers without fear of liability. Nevertheless, when any medical product is useful for only a particular class of consumers it may be exceedingly dangerous for everyone else. The key to reducing injuries from the medical product, whether it is a prosthetic device or a vaccine, is to identify accurately those who should and should not use it. Warnings are one of the most powerful screening mechanisms that manufacturers possess to minimize injuries. An effective warning can also reduce defective design liability by screening out inappropriate users. The potentially dangerous attribute of the Third Restatement is that it relies so heavily, and perhaps naively, on executive agencies to protect consumers.

35. If the complex regulations mandating warnings already in force were so effective, and judicial oversight so unnecessary, there would be no vaccine injuries -- and yet vaccine injuries persist. By removing substantive judicial examination of warnings without a corresponding increase in concern by another legal entity, the Third Restatement does not adequately seek to protect consumers.

3. The Third Restatement's impact

36. As the Third Restatement's influence grows it will signal a significant shift in the American legal attitude toward injury recovery. The Reporters appear to hope the Third Restatement will do more than correct any overly liberal legal sympathy toward consumer-plaintiffs with a manufacturer-sympathetic legal system. The Reporters create the impression that they want the legal system to reject almost any vaccine injury complaint that does not allege defective manufacturing, fraud, or abuse.

37. The counter argument that these effects, should they materialize, are insignificant because the Compensation Program exists to take care of consumers, is inapposite. The Compensation Program does not cover every vaccine on the market. n96 Nor does the Compensation Program cover every potential vaccine-related injury or aggravation. n97 The potential result of the Third Restatement's growing influence is a group of consumer-plaintiffs who neither receive adequate compensation in the VICP n98 nor have recourse in the state and federal courts.

38. As for the vaccine market, vaccine prices may fall and availability rise because of the diminished risk of liability. This result is consistent with the Compensation Program's economic goals. n99 Those goals, however, also looked to build public confidence in vaccination. n100 But with few quality controls built into the Third Restatement's manufacturer liability standards, it is difficult to imagine the legal devices available to encourage safety in a Third Restatement world. One interpretation of this economic effect is to suggest that though vaccine prices will fall, so will vaccine quality. This compromised quality may then affect the general consumer, and not just especially sensitive consumers whose injuries are unpredictable. When liability's deterrent effect slackens, manufacturers will no longer have the motivation to conduct further research and development to improve vaccine safety.

39. The Third Restatement and the VICP have a direct philosophical conflict. Congress designed the Compensation Program to be open ended, with an election for petitioners to seek redress directly from manufacturers in the state and federal civil courts. n101 Although the Third Restatement does not explicitly preclude this election option, it does so implicitly by establishing standards under which even a severely injured plaintiff is unlikely to succeed.

40. If Congress agrees with the Third Restatement's conservative effect on state and federal law, the national legislature has two choices for action. Congress can naively ignore the conflict, allowing a de facto end to the election option within the Compensation Program. Alternatively, Congress can institutionalize this change to the VICP by amending the Vaccine Act to exclude the election option.

41. Regardless of the choice it makes between these two options, Congress ultimately will be held accountable for the legal environment for vaccine injuries because it has already taken an active role in shaping vaccine liability. Congress, therefore, should act carefully in the way it supports or distances itself from the Third Restatement because it may unintentionally affect public perception of the Compensation Program and national vaccine initiatives.

42. The Compensation Program constitutes only one part of a larger Vaccine Act plan for widespread vaccination and disease prevention in the United States. Although Congress has the constitutional authority to pass legislation promoting and requiring vaccination to protect society's health, it still has an obligation to make sure that the pro-vaccination system it puts into place protects the rights of individuals. Congress strengthens the social legitimacy of its other vaccine programs by being able to show that it has created an efficient, just, and comprehensive system of injury compensation. In contrast, Congress undercuts its argument that its motivation is to protect the public from deadly diseases if its motivation appears to focus solely on protecting manufacturer liability interests. If Congress actively or passively allows the manufacturer-focused Third Restatement to affect negatively the way vaccine-injured individuals receive compensation, then it risks undermining public confidence in the Vaccine Act programs. To avoid this negative Third Restatement consequence, Congress will have to balance carefully the business, social, and individual interests in one of the most significant and cost effective health technologies of this century.

43. This philosophical conflict centering around the election option can substantially affect the Compensation Program by increasing the number of awards paid out of the Vaccine Trust Fund. VICP petitioners will elect to receive a Trust Fund award more frequently due to the low probability of winning a civil court judgment against a manufacturer under the Third Restatement's defective design and warning standards. Although Compensation Program statistics suggest that only an extremely small minority of petitioners elect to go to other courts to seek more favorable awards after a VICP judgment, n102 the election option was designed to be an important safety valve. Rather than requiring Compensation Program petitioners to accept lower award levels if the Trust Fund financing becomes insufficient to meet an increasing volume of meritorious claims, Congress created the election provision to force manufacturers back into paying compensation for the injuries they cause. Congress should not sacrifice this important balance between the need to guard business with protecting the consumer's right to be fairly compensated for injuries without explicit deliberation.

B. Emerging Diseases and New Vaccines -- External Challenges

44. When Congress created the VICP, it decided to cover a specific class of vaccines, those routinely given to children. n103 Several factors might have motivated this decision, including the political consideration that focusing on the needs of children is sometimes less controversial than concentrating on adult needs. The provisions of the VICP, however, suggest that the legislature intended the "childhood vaccine" limitation to constrain the volume of injuries going through the no-fault program to avoid overwhelming its administrative and financial capacity. n104 Yet what Congress once considered a constraint on the types of vaccines covered by the Compensation Program may become less meaningful as new vaccines are routinely administered to children for emerging or previously unpreventable diseases. n105

45. The problem does not end with the numbers of children vaccinated for emerging or previously untreatable diseases. The Compensation Program also compensates adults who are injured by vaccines routinely given to children. n106 This might be called a catch-up syndrome. Because these vaccines were not available when contemporary adults were children, the initial group of new vaccine recipients are larger than would normally be expected. n107 Therefore, the group of injured consumers may be larger than the Compensation Program can handle. In 1986 there was a certain logic to assuming children would make up the bulk of VICP petitioners; it was reasonable for Congress to assume that most adults are immune to "childhood" diseases because they were either vaccinated or had naturally developed an immunity from exposure to the wild virus. Nevertheless, new data indicates that some vaccines, including the most dangerous pertussis vaccine, do not provide lifelong immunity. n108 Re-vaccination against these diseases, whether in childhood or adulthood, multiplies the potential number of vaccine injuries the VICP will have to handle.

46. Furthermore, the line between adult and childhood vaccines is blurring. Vaccines for diseases such as hepatitis B are now routinely given to both adults and children. There are other diseases and vaccines which are not currently under Compensation Program, but are prime candidates for being included in the future because of their potential for helping children and adults. With vaccines, such as the HPG-30 AIDS vaccine, in the clinical trial phase of development and pushing science further, newer and riskier vaccines are not remote possibilities, they are close to being reality. n109 The risks these vaccines pose become more socially palatable when the diseases they prevent are deadly and the associated costs of caring for injuries and disability are higher. Many public health advocates would love to insulate all Americans against diseases such as AIDS with a vaccine, even if it did pose risks. To prevent these diseases and others from developing later, the most logical course of action is to vaccinate people when they are very young. Yet a vaccine's routine administration to children is almost an automatic qualifying factor for VICP coverage.

47. The net result of advancing technology confronting and successfully preventing new diseases is a larger group of vaccine-injured consumers. The social benefit of the vaccines may very well justify these injuries. However, social utility presents one of the best arguments for Congress ensuring that the VICP is financially and administratively capable of providing compensation to petitioners. Still, the VICP is not well prepared to handle a sudden or large influx of petitions. Although the Federal Claims Court, assisted by the Special Masters, has adjudicated more than 75% of the initial backlog of pre-1988 cases, n110 it has taken almost ten years to do so. A time lag due to an overload of cases may have been justified at the beginning of the Compensation Program because Congress was trying to draw cases specifically out of the civil courts and into the no-fault program. However, adjudication delays today would not serve any noble or useful purpose -- they would only highlight administrative weakness.

C. Key Actors and Vaccine Table Amendments -- Internal Challenge

48. Congress delegated authority to a number of different people and parties when it created the VICP, including the Secretary of Health and Human Services ("Secretary"), the Advisory Committee on Childhood Vaccines ("Advisory Committee"), the CDC, and the Compensation Program Director. n111 Over the past ten years these actors have carried out their work and made conservative changes in the VICP's coverage and operations in a generally quiet, unreported manner. The political process, pressures of public accountability, and the developing sciences of virology and immunology tend to limit these actors' choices when it comes to changing what vaccines the VICP covers, and how the Compensation Program operates. The relative lack of controversy and public attention have allowed the VICP to work during the past ten years without any significant legislative or judicial challenges to its original form and functions. However, this quiet environment is not guaranteed, and could quickly change based on leadership or activism by one of the key players in the Compensation Program.

49. Each of these different people and parties charged with administering the VICP have the potential to make rapid or radical changes in it. As they confront more controversial and pressing issues, these key players may seize an opportunity to take action. The recent volatile break between the former Surgeon General Joycelyn Elders n112 and the Clinton administration is one example of how a single public health official can bring controversy to a highly respected position or program. n113 Granted, vaccines are not as taboo as the sexuality issues that Dr. Elders boldly confronted, but as long as vaccines predictably injure and kill children they remain controversial. The fact that many people have no realistic opportunity to give or withhold consent to vaccination because it is mandated by law underscores the volatile individual liberty issues that always percolate under the surface of public acceptance of vaccination. n114 The balance the uncontroversial VICP strikes between the individual and social concerns about vaccination helps to further public health efforts to control or eliminate diseases by quieting public objections to vaccination. Congress should consider how the roles of these key individuals may affect the future of the Compensation Program.

50. Take, for instance, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, who acts as a powerful gatekeeper for the Compensation Program. When Congress created the VICP it contemplated the development of beneficial new vaccines. Knowing that making injury compensation available reassures the public, manufacturers and the insurance industry, Congress added 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-14(c), empowering the Secretary to amend the Vaccine Injury Table and Aids to Interpretation through notice and comment rulemaking. n115 The Secretary holds a significant amount of discretion in making these amendments when the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention recommend that a new vaccine be administered routinely to children. The First Circuit decision in O'Connell v. Shalala affirmed this rulemaking authority by clarifying that the power to amend the Vaccine Injury Table is extremely broad, and even includes a power to remove vaccines from the program. n116 Although the Secretary must respond to a CDC recommendation of including a new vaccine on the Injury Table, the Secretary need not wait for a recommendation. Instead, the Secretary has the authority to act on independent initiative or even public petition. n117

51. With less than three years left in Secretary Shalala's tenure as the head of Health and Human Services, she may have more latitude to make significant changes that draw more public attention. For example, the Secretary might use the VICP to encourage manufacturers to develop and distribute riskier vaccines by placing them on the Injury Table before they are widely accepted. This would give manufacturers more liability protection and would be consistent with Secretary Shalala's personal trend of Vaccine Injury Table n118 and Aids to Interpretation amendments. n119

52. If there is a valid generalization from Secretary Shalala's actions, it is that people in key VICP roles will attempt to make the VICP more widely applicable. In doing so, the Secretary and other key Compensation Program players risk drawing negative scrutiny. This is not to suggest that they refrain from making necessary changes in the VICP simply to avoid controversy. Rather, the Secretary should take into consideration these opposing viewpoints and attempt to address them rationally to preserve the VICP's important work.

53. Congress should not take action to limit VICP key players' activism. That would hinder public health efforts and be nearly impossible to enforce. However, Congress should be aware that Americans have not reached a consensus on vaccine safety, the zone of protection manufacturers deserve, or the appropriate role the VICP should take in balancing future injury issues. If these key actors in the VICP do speak out more frequently and loudly than they have in the past by amending the Vaccine Injury Table, Congress should pay close attention. Whatever action Congress takes to silence or amplify these key players' arguments could affect the vaccine availability-liability balance, the growing effectiveness of public vaccination programs the Vaccine Act encourages, or the VICP's public acceptance and participation levels.

D. Flat Tax -- Internal and External Challenge

54. Congress was sensitive to the problems that expansion could pose to the VICP, whether that expansion comes from a greater number of petitioners accepting Trust Fund awards or larger numbers of vaccines and injuries being covered. As a result, the VICP legislation actually ties vaccine and injury inclusion in the VICP to adequate reserves in the Trust Fund. n120 However, a change in VICP funding, a $ 0.75 flat

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews and ALR
Terms: "national childhood vaccine injury act" (Edit Search)

*44 Am. U.L. Rev. 1853, **

Copyright (c) 1995 The American University Law Review
The American University

Summer, 1995

44 Am. U.L. Rev. 1853

LENGTH: 30958 words

STRIKING A BALANCE BETWEEN PRODUCT AVAILABILITY AND PRODUCT SAFETY: LESSONS FROM THE VACCINE ACT

Daniel A. Cantor

SUMMARY:
... With such a record of success, it is perhaps surprising to discover that American vaccine policy remains in a state of flux. ... The Vaccine Act also adopts the learned intermediary doctrine, allowing manufacturers to fulfill their duty to warn by transmitting information to the treating physician rather than to the vaccinee directly. Finally, the Vaccine Act creates a presumption that manufacturer warnings that comply with the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) standards are adequate, thereby preventing state courts from performing an independent assessment of these warnings' sufficiency. ... First coined in 1967, the learned intermediary doctrine holds that, in the case of prescription pharmaceuticals, manufacturers satisfy their duty to warn by providing an adequate warning to the treating physician. ... In deciding that the learned intermediary doctrine does not apply in the mass vaccine context, the court in Davis drew an analogy to the situation where a manufacturer directly supplies a consumer with an over-the-counter nonprescription drug. ... Given that the manufacturer's duty to warn extends only to the physician, and the physician's informed consent duty is governed by the community practice standard, the vaccinee may receive neither a direct warning nor a physician performed risk assessment. ... At the same time, however, the FDA does not currently permit the sale of the non-cellular DTP vaccine. ...

TEXT:
[*1853] [*1854]

Introduction

During the twentieth century, America has developed a childhood immunization program that many praise as the most spectacular public health success in history. [1] Over a period of fifty years, the United States has dramatically reduced the annual occurrence of polio, whooping cough, and measles. [2] Diseases that once threatened to end prematurely the life of every American infant are now prevented with a routine series of early childhood vaccinations. [3]

With such a record of success, it is perhaps surprising to discover that American vaccine policy remains in a state of flux. At the heart of the controversy lies a legal debate that extends beyond the [*1855] relatively narrow field of childhood immunization. This debate focuses on the recurring product liability dilemma of how to properly establish a balance between product safety and product availability. Due to the social costs at stake, the debate intermediary doctrine assumed would take place.

IV. The Relationship Between Federal and State Law

The Federal Government, through Congress and through the FDA, has played a key role in the development of American vaccine policy. [158] In designing the Vaccine Act, Congress had the opportunity to assert complete federal control over vaccine regulation by explicitly preempting state tort actions. [159] Congress, however, left petitioners with the option of pursuing civil tort actions, [160] although it created a presumption that manufacturers in compliance with FDA standards satisfy their warning duties [161] and prohibited direct warning actions. [162]

The congressional decision not to completely preempt state common law raises important questions about the proper relationship between federal regulatory and state common law regimes. On the one hand, given the Federal Government's predominate role in [*1877] twentieth century vaccine regulation, one can argue that the Vaccine Act should have explicitly declared vaccine regulation to be an exclusively federal matter. [163] On the other hand, one can also argue that the Federal Government has exercised too much influence by passing the Vaccine Act. According to this view, the Vaccine Act's creation of a presumption that warnings are adequate if they comply with FDA standards paralyzes States' common law ability to function as a vehicle for protecting its citizens from the dangers of inadequate warnings. [164] This section examines the inherent tension between federal regulation and state common law as these systems apply to the regulation of vaccine warnings.

A. The Preemption Doctrine

Article VI of the U.S. Constitution, in announcing the supremacy of federal law, provides the basis for the preemption doctrine. [165] Federal courts have recognized two types of preemption: statutory and regulatory. [166] Although stemming from different sources of federal law, both types [167] preempt state statutes, regulations, and common law. [168]

The U.S. Supreme Court has held that express language indicating a federal intent to preempt state law is a sufficient but not necessary condition for a finding of federal preemption. [169] Preemption may [*1878] also occur where federal intent to maintain exclusive control is implicit in the "structure and purpose" of the federal law. [170] The test for implied preemption is whether the federal law in question is so comprehensive as to occupy the entire field. [171]

Additionally, courts must find preemption where a conflict exists between state and federal laws. [172] Conflict preemption has three distinct subcategories: [173] first, when compliance with both federal and state law is impossible; [174] second, when state law interferes with the objectives of federal law; [175] and third, when state law obstructs the methods used to achieve federal objectives. [176]

In understanding preemption analysis, one must consider the limits to the preemption doctrine. The mere possibility of conflict between state and federal law does not lead to preemption. [177] Rather, the conflict must "necessarily exist." [178] Additionally, the concept of federalism carries with it a presumption against preemption. [179] Fearful of interfering with States rights, courts are very reluctant to preempt state law in areas of traditional state regulation. [180] Issues concerning health and safety are primary examples of traditional areas of state regulation. [181] [*1879]

B. FDA Regulation of the Vaccine Industry

REV_00261798

Arguments favoring federal preemption of state tort law remedies for vaccine injuries focus on the comprehensive nature of the FDA's regulation of the vaccine industry. [182] In order to assess such arguments, this Comment initially reviews the history and present state of the FDA's role in federal vaccine policy. [183]

The Federal Government's involvement with vaccine regulation began with the passage of the Virus, Serum, Toxin Act of 1902. [184] Under this federal legislation, the Public Health Service, and later the Department of Treasury, regulated the vaccine industry. [185] Although the names of the various administrative branches have changed over time, [186] the Federal Government has remained active in vaccine regulation throughout the twentieth century. [187] Presently, the FDA's Center for Drug and Biologics bears primary responsibility for vaccine regulation. [188]

Pursuant to the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938, [189] the FDA is the primary regulator of vaccines. [190] The FDA meets its obligations in a two-fold manner. The FDA promotes public health by approving the use of new and safe treatments. [191] The FDA also protects public health by removing unsafe and ineffective drugs from the market. [192] As the federal guardian of vaccine safety, the FDA [*1880] has issued comprehensive regulations for the design and manufacture of vaccines. [193]

The FDA's regulation of vaccines begins prior to the manufacturing stage. [194] Initially, a potential manufacturer must apply to the FDA for a license to manufacture the vaccine. [195] FDA regulations require manufacturers to submit a sample lot of the vaccine and summaries of tests run on the lot. [196] These regulations take into account not only the vaccine itself, but also employee qualifications and responsibilities, [197] as well as the condition of the manufacturer's work area. [198]

The FDA has promulgated additional, specific rules for the production of the pertussis component of the DTP vaccine. [199] Manufacturers must test every lot of the pertussis component for potency [200] and toxicity. [201] A written release from the FDA serves as final approval of the DTP lot. [202]

In addition to regulating design and manufacture, the FDA carefully evaluates the labelling of vaccines. [203] The FDA requires that labels include the makeup of the vaccine, the administration schedule, and the indications and contraindications for usage. [204] Of particular importance to the preemption discussion is the fact that the FDA must approve all language contained in a vaccine label. [205] Once certain language is approved, manufacturers may not change label language without first filing a supplemental new drug application with the FDA. [206] Manufacturers who alter warning language [*1881] without FDA approval face criminal prosecution. [207]

The FDA, in deciding whether to approve or reject certain warning language, promotes a policy of uniform labelling and warnings. [208] While manufacturers must provide adequate warnings, manufacturers cannot insulate themselves from liability by issuing overly broad warnings. All information contained in vaccine labels and warnings must have clinical relevance. [209] The FDA only permits warnings about known hazards, not theoretical possibilities. [210]

C. Preemption Case Law

1. The courts' rejection of preemption claims brought by vaccine manufacturers

In the vaccine context, courts generally have not found an intent by Congress, or any agency, to preempt a State's failure to warn cause of action. [211] The Fourth Circuit's decision in Abbot v. American Cyanamid Co. [212] provides a well-organized discussion of the issues involved in the warning preemption debate. The plaintiff, after receiving a DTP vaccination manufactured by American Cyanamid, suffered severe neurologic injuries. [213] Raising a motion for summary judgment, the manufacturer argued that the plaintiff's failure to warn and design defect theories were preempted. [214] American Cyanamid offered what the Fourth Circuit described as a "broad" and a "narrow" preemption argument.

REV_00261799

American Cyanamid's "broad" argument, essentially an occupation of field claim, insisted that the comprehensive nature of federal [*1882] vaccine regulation left no room for state regulation. [215] American Cyanamid cited the detailed labelling requirements imposed by FDA regulations as evidence that the FDA intended to regulate exclusively all aspects of vaccine labelling. [216] American Cyanamid argued that because the federal requirements regulated virtually every detail of the label, there should be no room for state action. [217]

The Fourth Circuit, however, refused to find preemption based upon occupation of field, stating that the comprehensiveness of federal regulations does not result in a per se finding of preemption. [218] The court began with the premise that issues addressed by congressional legislation are matters of national concern. [219] Every issue addressed by Congress, however, does not preclude concurrent state law. [220] Instead, proponents of federal preemption must overcome several adverse presumptions. [221] First, health and safety matters are traditionally areas of state concern and are not easily found to be preempted. [222] Second, given that agencies promulgate [*1883] very detailed regulations, [223] regulations lacking a clear intent to preempt presumptively do not occupy the field. [224]

American Cyanamid's "narrow" preemption argument took the form of a conflict of policy objectives, claiming that state tort law interfered with the intended effects of the federal vaccine policy. [225] According to the Fourth Circuit, the federal objective of FDA regulations was to promote vaccine safety. [226] The defendant argued that, in addition to safety, federal vaccine policy is committed to protecting the availability and use of the vaccines. [227] The imposition of excessive state tort law liability, the defendant argued, frustrates these policy objectives by driving manufacturers from the market. [228] In considering American Cyanamid's motion for summary judgment based on a policy objectives conflict, the court framed the issue as "whether the federal interest requires that federal regulations be viewed as having struck the balance between safety and quantity or whether the regulations merely establish minimum safety standards and allow state regulation to establish the balance." [229]

In an attempt to discern the nature of the federal policy that American Cyanamid claimed was harmed by state regulations, the Fourth Circuit turned to the Vaccine Act. [230] As a preliminary matter, the court rejected the defendant's argument that because the Vaccine Act does not expressly address preemption it is neutral on the matter. [231] Rather, the court turned to the Vaccine Act's legislative history [232] and found two assumptions weighing against a finding of [*1884] preemption. [233] First, the Vaccine Act recognizes that prior federal vaccine legislation, specifically the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act [234] and the Public Health Service Act, [235] does not preempt state tort actions. [236] Second, the Vaccine Act expressly states that state tort actions remain available to aggrieved parties. [237] Finding that the Vaccine Act did not evince a federal intent to strike an immutable balance between vaccine safety and availability, the court refused to adopt the opposite policy determination. [238]

2. Preemption and the physical conflict dilemma

In Hurley v. Lederle Laboratories, [239] (Hurley II) the Fifth Circuit, like the Fourth Circuit in Abbot, did not find that FDA regulations completely preempted state warning claims. [240] The Fifth Circuit did, however, recognize that specific FDA regulations may result in a [*1885] limited preemption of state tort law when a manufacturer cannot satisfy a federal regulation without violating state law and vice versa. [241] This reasoning represented a compromise between two competing concerns. On the one hand, courts would place manufacturers in an inescapable bind by finding the FDA-approved warning insufficient. In order to meet a state-warning standard, the manufacturer would have to violate federal law. [242] On the other hand, the court in Hurley II found limits to the value of FDA-approved warnings. Given that the FDA only evaluates warnings based on the information submitted by manufacturers, the FDA's role in the warning evaluation process is somewhat "passive." [243] In approving designs, the FDA only considers the sufficiency of the proposed designs and does not consider alternative designs or regulation schemes. [244] The warnings approved by the FDA, therefore, may not represent the safest potential warnings, for the FDA may not have considered the full universe of relevant information. [*1886]

REV_00261800

D. The Vaccine Act's Presumption of Warning Adequacy as an Attempt to Resolve the Physical Conflict Dilemma

The Vaccine Act's presumption of adequate warning when manufacturers comply with FDA standards may represent an attempt to balance the Fifth Circuit's conflicting views toward physical conflict preemption in Hurley II. [245] In the interest of insulating manufacturers from having to choose between federal criminal liability or state tort liability, the Vaccine Act begins with the assumption that the FDA-approved warning is adequate. [246] The Vaccine Act, however, takes into account the passive nature of the FDA's warning-evaluation process and compensates for this deficiency by allowing plaintiffs to rebut the presumption [247] with a showing that the manufacturer "engaged in fraud or intentional withholding of information." [248] If the manufacturer has not provided the FDA with all relevant information for examining the manufacturer's proposed warning, the Act does not insulate the manufacturer against state inadequate warning claims. [249]

V. Vaccine Act and Restatement 402A Comment k

Section 300aa-22(b)(1) of the Vaccine Act adopts Restatement (Second) of Torts section 402A comment k. Comment k represents an [*1887] important exception to the strict liability doctrine. [250] This exception recognizes that there exists a certain class of products that is incapable of being made safer, [251] but nonetheless provides great value to society. [252] Acknowledging the utilitarian interest in the availability of such "unavoidably unsafe" products, comment k directs that, so long as the "unavoidably unsafe" product is properly prepared and marketed, strict liability will not apply. [253] Because proper manufacturing and proper warnings are prerequisites to immunity, comment k only provides manufacturers with protection from liability premised on strict liability design defect claims. [254]

A. The Vaccine Act's Blanket Application of Comment k to All Vaccines Covered by the Act

The Vaccine Act's legislative history clarifies Congress' intention to apply comment k immunity to all vaccines covered by the Act. [255] In deciding to apply comment k to vaccines, Congress expressed fear that sympathetic juries would ignore the social utility of vaccines and routinely rule for innocent victims and against "equally "innocent'" manufacturers. [256] Congress, seeking to ensure the continued compensation of victims while removing economic disincentives for manufacturers, applied comment k to all vaccines covered by the Act and created a no-fault compensation system for injured parties [*1888] deprived of strict liability causes of action. [257]

The Vaccine Act's blanket adoption of comment k represents one of three possible ways of approaching "unavoidably unsafe" products. [258] As an alternative to insulating all vaccines from strict design defect liability, Congress could have eliminated comment k and subjected all designs to strict design defect liability. [259] Additionally, as a middle ground between blanket insulation and no insulation, Congress could have adopted a threshold test to determine whether a given vaccine warrants special protection. [260] This approach was developed by the California Court of Appeals in Kearl v. Lederle Laboratories. [261] The court in Kearl did not contest the basic concept of exceptional social utility underlying comment k. [262] Instead, the California Court of Appeals expressed concern with the manner of the comment's application. [263] Characterizing the judiciary's application of comment k as "routine" and

REV_00261801

"mechanical," [264] the court in Kearl held that before a jury hears the issue of design defect liability, a judge must make a threshold determination of whether to grant a defendant comment k immunity. [265] In making this decision, the judge should consider:

(1) whether, when distributed, the product was intended to confer an exceptionally important benefit that made its availability highly desirable; (2) whether the then-existing risk posed by the product both was "substantial" and "unavoidable"; and (3) whether the interest in availability (again measured as of the time of distribution) outweighs the interest in promoting enhanced accountability through strict liability design defect review. [266]

A third approach to the "unavoidably unsafe" product issue is to subject all products to strict design defect liability. [267] [*1889]

B. A Criticism of the Vaccine Act's Blanket Application of Comment k

Given the multitude of divergent judicial interpretations of comment k, Congress had no paradigmatic example to follow when drafting the Vaccine Act. [268] Textual and structural arguments exist both supporting and rebutting a blanket application of comment k to all vaccines. A close reading of the text of comment k and analysis of the comment's underlying policy, however, indicates that the concept of "unavoidably unsafe" products, defined by the Restatement as incapable of being made safe for their intended and ordinary use, [269] cannot support a blanket approach. [270]

1. Textual challenge

A literal reading of the text of comment k suggests that the "unavoidably unsafe" standard requires some sort of discerning test. [271] The comment begins with the words, "There are some products ...." [272] The American Law Institute's use of "some" indicates that not all products in a class automatically merit immunity from strict liability design defect claims. [273]

The comment continues, "In the present state of human knowledge, these products are quite incapable of being made safe for their intended and ordinary use." [274] Measuring from the time of distribution, a plain-language interpretation of these two clauses suggests that only a product that is not subject to improvement using [*1890] currently held scientific knowledge warrants comment k immunity. [275]

In order for the Vaccine Act to comport with the language of comment k, Congress would have to perform either a risk-utility analysis before promulgating section 22(b) or allow the judiciary to perform a risk-utility analysis at trial. [276] Given that Congress rejected the latter approach, [277] we must presume that Congress applied a risk-utility analysis to the vaccines covered by the Act. The language of comment k, however, raises questions as to whether the whole-cell DTP vaccine warrants classification as an "unavoidably unsafe" product. [278]

In order to reach the conclusion that the whole-cell DTP vaccine is not an "unavoidably unsafe" product, it is first necessary to provide some history concerning vaccine designs. The DTP vaccine currently licensed by the FDA consists of three parts - diphtheria toxoids, tetanus toxoids, and the whole cell pertussis component. [279] Adverse reactions to the DTP vaccine have been linked to the pertussis portion of the vaccine. [280] While the immunizing factors in the diphtheria and tetanus portion of the vaccine can be identified and purified, the offending elements of the pertussis portion cannot be removed. [281]

REV_00261802

Many experts in the medical community, concerned with the reactivity of the pertussis portion of the DTP vaccine, have advocated [*1891] the development of an alternative vaccine. [282] Currently, two alternatives to the whole-cell pertussis portion exist: acellular and non-cellular vaccines. [283] Although not currently manufactured, a non-cellular vaccine was discovered in the 1950s. [284] Testing of the non-cellular vaccine has revealed a product with adequate immunnogenicity but lower reactivity than its whole cell pertussis counterpart. [285]

In 1961, Eli Lilly & Company applied for a patent for a non-cellular pertussis vaccine named Tri-Solgen. [286] Upon FDA approval, Tri-Solgen dominated the market until the mid-1960s. [287] Of special importance to the comment k issue is an internal clinical evaluation run by Lederle Laboratories and Eli Lilly in 1967. [288] The test compared the relative reactivity of Lederle's Tri-Immunol vaccine, a whole-cell DTP vaccine, against Lilly's Tri-Solgen non-cellular vaccine. [289] The results of a test on 335 infants showed that the whole-cell vaccine had a much higher reactivity rate than did the non-cellular vaccine. [290] Although Lederle had first-hand evidence demonstrating the lower reactivity rate of the non-cellular pertussis vaccine, it continued to market the whole-cell version. [291]

In 1975, Lilly stopped producing Tri-Solgen. [292] Wyeth Laboratories secured an option to the rights for the manufacturing technology of Tri-Solgen. Wyeth could not, however, purchase Lilly's license, because FDA regulations require manufacturers of identical vaccines to acquire separate licenses. [293] During the late-1970s, Wyeth devel [*1892] oped its own non-cellular vaccine. [294] The FDA, however, refused to license Wyeth's product, citing both a lack of evidence showing that the non-cellular vaccine was superior to the whole-cell version and concerns about possible toxicity. [295] Since Lilly's withdrawal from the DTP market, only the whole-cell DTP vaccine has been available in the United States. [296]

Application of the language of comment k to the above-mentioned DTP history reveals that DTP may not qualify as an "unavoidably unsafe" product. [297] The scientific history suggests that manufacturers have possessed the knowledge and the production capabilities to produce a safer version of the DTP vaccine. [298] At the same time, however, the FDA does not currently permit the sale of the non-cellular DTP vaccine. [299] This analysis demonstrates that a textual interpretation of comment k does not, standing alone, resolve the safety versus availability dilemma in the context of design defect liability. Rather, one must examine the policy considerations underlying the strict liability doctrine and the exception to these considerations contained in comment k.

2. Policy challenge

Although the Vaccine Act's adoption of a blanket approach to comment k partially conflicts with a textual interpretation of the comment, Congress' decision nonetheless finds support in the case law of many jurisdictions. [300] Decisions announcing a blanket [*1893] approach recognize the analytical dilemmas created by rejecting a balancing test. [301] For example, in Brown v. Superior Court, [302] the Supreme Court of California stated:

It seems unjust to grant the same protection from liability to those who gave us thalidomide as to the producers of penicillin. If some method could be devised to confine the benefit of the comment k negligence standard to those drugs that have proved useful to mankind while denying the privilege to those that are clearly harmful, it would deserve serious consideration. [303]

These courts nonetheless elevate the consumer interest in the availability of drugs over the safety interest of holding manufacturers strictly liable for their products. [304]

REV_00261803

The Vaccine Act's blanket application of comment k is premised on concerns that strict product liability causes of action destabilized the vaccine market. [305] A 1986 Report, written by the House Committee on Energy and Commerce, illustrates congressional concern with the future of the country's universal immunization policy. [306] In explaining the need for legislation in this area, the House Report begins with a compelling assessment of the successes of American vaccine policy:

Vaccination of children against deadly, disabling, but preventable infectious diseases has been one of the most spectacularly effective public health initiatives this country has ever undertaken. Use of vaccines has prevented thousands of children's deaths each year and has substantially reduced the effects resulting from disease. Billions of medical and health-related dollars have been saved by immunizations. [307] [*1894]

The Report then discusses the small number of vaccinees who suffer permanent and sometimes deadly vaccine-related injuries. [308] The Report goes on to document the recent withdrawal of manufacturers from the vaccine market and the concomitant increase in vaccine prices. [309] After considering the benefits of universal vaccination and the recent instability of the market, the Committee on Energy and Commerce concluded that Congress must ensure the continued availability of children's vaccines. [310]

The legislative history demonstrates the utilitarian, policy-based reasoning underlying the Vaccine Act's adoption of comment k. This reasoning closely parallels the California Supreme Court's product-availability-over-product-safety approach in Brown v. Superior Court. The court in Brown candidly admitted that it was rejecting the increased safety benefits promoted by strict design defect liability in order to promote the rapid availability of highly beneficial drugs. [311] In reaching its decision to grant all prescription drugs comment k immunity, the California Supreme Court cited three policy considerations. First, society has a greater interest in the immediate availability of beneficial drugs than in the increased safety of these drugs. [312] Second, manufacturers, unsure of the future status of their products under a risk-benefit comment k analysis, will be deterred from developing new drugs. [313] Third, manufacturers carrying greater product liability insurance to cover design defect liability will raise the [*1895] price of vaccines and make vaccines unavailable to the average consumer. [314]

As was the case with the textual interpretation of comment k, the court in Brown relied on policy considerations that do not justify the Vaccine Act's application of blanket immunity for all vaccines. [315] Brown recognizes that there are certain socially valuable drugs that cannot be improved using current scientific knowledge. [316] Given the health benefits rendered by such drugs, Brown reads comment k as justifying the immediate marketing of the drugs, regardless of the fact that future scientific advances may allow safety improvements. [317] The court believed that the public could be harmed if manufacturers delayed distributing prescription drugs, whose safety could not be improved under current scientific knowledge, in order to avoid design defect liability. [318] As the previous discussion of the history of DTP testing indicates, however, manufacturers may currently possess the knowledge to produce a safer vaccine. [319] That knowledge may presently allow manufacturers to make safety alterations without significantly inhibiting the distribution of their product. [320]

Furthermore, both Brown and the Vaccine Act accept the ill-conceived policy notion that strict design defect liability deters investment in research and development. [321] Holding vaccine manufacturers strictly liable for design defects promotes, rather than deters, research and development. [322] Under a risk-utility approach to comment k, manufacturers who do not act on current scientific knowledge to produce safer vaccines would be held strictly liable for design defects. [323] Given that manufacturers are held to the knowl [*1896] edge of experts in their fields, [324] most manufacturers will invest considerable time and resources into research and development in order to avoid design defect liability. [325]

Rather than promoting research and development, the Vaccine Act's blanket application of comment k removes incentives for vaccine manufacturers to improve their products. [326] By insulating vaccine manufacturers from strict design defect liability, the Vaccine Act implicitly announces that the Federal Government is satisfied with the current state of vaccine safety, and that the Government will not use the tort system to encourage manufacturers to improve their vaccines. [327]

VI. Recommendations

A. Direct Warnings

Evaluating the Vaccine Act's treatment of consumer warnings is a difficult task. On the one hand, the legislation banning direct failure to warn liability removes an important vehicle for promoting an informed patient population. [328] On the other hand, by requiring health care providers to distribute standard warnings written by the Secretary, the Act attempts to achieve, by way of regulation, the same result that Davis v. Wyeth [329] and its progeny achieved through the civil tort system. [330]

While this Comment applauds the design of the Vaccine Act's informational and recording requirements, it also recognizes that state law direct warning causes of action and federal reporting require [*1897] ments are not mutually exclusive. [331] If the ultimate goal of a universal vaccination policy is safety, federal legislation could maintain both a state common law-based direct duty to warn as well as federal reporting regulations. The combination of a state duty to warn and federal reporting requirements would combat lax community practices and the excessively pro-vaccine environment in two distinct ways. The federal regulations would compensate for inconsistent community practices by requiring physicians to distribute standardized vaccine information and to report contraindications. [332] At the same time, a common law direct warning rule would diminish the current universal vaccination policy's weakening of physician warnings by ensuring that individual vaccinees possess adequate information both to make an informed decision prior to vaccination and to protect against adverse reactions subsequent to vaccination. [333]

The Vaccine Act, however, clearly acknowledges its compromising purpose. [334] The Act seeks both to reduce manufacturer liability and to create a more pro-plaintiff compensation system. [335] Given its goal of insulating manufacturers from excessive liability, the Vaccine Act skillfully removes direct failure to warn liability while continuing to encourage an informed patient base through its vaccine information and reporting requirements. [336] [*1898]

B. Relationship Between Federal and State Law

Prior to the passage of the Vaccine Act, manufacturers were often caught between inconsistent state and federal warning standards. [337] Given that manufacturers may not alter the content of their warnings without FDA approval, [338] compliance with state law warning standards sometimes required manufacturers to violate federal law or regulations. Conversely, compliance with federal regulatory warning standards often exposed manufacturers to liability under state law. [339]

The Vaccine Act responded to this dilemma by creating a presumption that warnings complying with FDA standards are adequate. [340] This Comment credits the Vaccine Act for taking an affirmative step toward resolving the vaccine warning dilemma. The Vaccine Act's presumption initially tips the scales towards manufacturers while also giving plaintiffs a vehicle for overcoming the presumption. The Act, however, has imprudently moved from one extreme to the other. The legislation removes too much of the impetus for manufacturers to act on their actual or constructive knowledge concerning the adequacy of warnings. The presumption of warning adequacy allows manufacturers to disregard knowledge of actual deficiencies in their warnings so long as the warning complies with FDA standards. [341]

REV_00261805

In lieu of the Vaccine Act's presumption of adequate warnings, this Comment proposes the following framework. If under state law a judge or jury finds that a manufacturer knew or should have known of an inadequacy in warning, [342] the court should determine whether [*1899] the manufacturer petitioned the FDA for a change in the warning language in order to resolve the inadequacy. [343] Manufacturers who fail to act on their knowledge or constructive knowledge of an inadequate warning should be held liable. [344] If the manufacturer has petitioned the FDA for a change in warning language and the FDA had rejected the petition, however, the manufacturer should not be found liable. [345]

This proposed framework seeks to force manufacturers to exercise all safety options within their capacity. The law should not allow manufacturers who do not address known or knowable warning inadequacies to seek shelter under a deferential presumption. FDA standards are designed to ensure safety, not to insulate manufacturers from confronting difficult safety issues. If Congress amends the Vaccine Act to reflect this framework, the deterrence function of warning liability would remain intact. At the same time, the amendment would recognize that deterrence has limits, and that state deterrence theories should not force manufacturers to choose between violating federal or state law.

C. Comment k

Congress' decision to grant blanket comment k immunity to all vaccines covered by the Vaccine Act conflicts with both the text and policy of comment k. [346] The fact that vaccines as a class have effectively reduced the risk of many formerly deadly diseases does not warrant a per se application of comment k immunity to all vac [*1900] cines. [347] According to the language of comment k, a vaccine only merits special protection when the danger posed by the vaccine is unavoidable and when the utility of the vaccine outweighs the risks. [348] As previously discussed, the Vaccine Act's blanket application of comment k is most suspect with regard to the DPT vaccine because numerous studies have indicated that manufacturers are currently capable of producing a safer vaccine. [349] This Comment does not question the utility of the DTP vaccine; it questions the wisdom of permanently justifying the dangers of the whole-cell DTP vaccine by applying to the vaccine the label "unavoidably unsafe." As discussed earlier, evidence exists indicating that DTP manufacturers may currently possess the ability to produce a safer vaccine. [350] At the present time, however, the FDA only permits the sale of the whole-cell vaccine. [351] The question must therefore be asked, what degree of design defect liability will best promote manufacturer investment of time and resources into the development of a new DTP vaccine that reduces adverse reactions?

This Comment recommends that Congress repeal the Vaccine Act's blanket application of comment k immunity. In place of a blanket application approach, Congress should adopt the three-part balancing test developed by the California Court of Appeals in Kearl. [352] The Kearl test provides a dual advantage. The three-part threshold test avoids the establishment of a federally endorsed status quo in which vaccine research and development has reached an acceptable endpoint. Under Kearl, manufacturers will recognize the possibility that the FDA will approve an alternative DTP vaccine. [353] In order to avoid potential design defect liability, manufacturers will invest in [*1901] research efforts to improve the whole-cell DTP vaccine and will petition the FDA for approval of their new designs. [354]

The Kearl test, while promoting manufacturer investment in improved safety, also accommodates the underlying theme of Brown v. Superior Court, namely that some drugs possess exceptional social utility and therefore warrant more lenient liability standards. [355]

REV_00261806

Two of the three-prongs of the Kearl test consider society's immediate need for beneficial drugs. The first prong considers the nature of the benefits of the drug in question, and the third prong considers the public's interest in the drug's availability. [356] The Kearl test, therefore, effectively provides DTP manufacturers with temporary immunity from strict design defect liability [357] while continuing to encourage manufacturers to search for a safer product.

This lack of permanent protection from strict design defect liability led the Supreme Court of California to overrule Kearl in Brown:

[Under the Kearl test, a] manufacturer's incentive to develop what it might consider a superior product would be diminished if it might be held strictly liable for harmful side effects because a trial court could decide, perhaps many years later, that in fact another product which was available on the market would have accomplished the same result. [358]

The impact of the court's criticism is not applicable because the FDA only allows manufacturers to market the whole-cell DTP vaccine. The possibility that the FDA may approve a new DTP vaccine will encourage, rather than discourage, individual manufacturers to improve their own products. [359] The court in Brown envisioned manufacturers halting all research efforts for fear that their future product would one day be found to be defective in design. [360] The codification of the Kearl test would not lead to this result. Under Kearl, the complacent DTP manufacturer, who continues to market an unsafe vaccine, will face liability for a defect in design. [361] [*1902]

No given formula for balancing society's need for vaccine availability with society's need for vaccine safety will satisfy all the parties involved. At present, the Kearl threshold test offers a viable compromise that both respects the social utility of the DTP vaccine and encourages the development of an even safer product. For these reasons, Congress should repeal the blanket application of comment k to all vaccines and instead codify the Kearl three-prong test.

Conclusion

The National Childhood Vaccine Injury Compensation Act of 1986 represents a much needed legislative response to the civil tort system's inability to achieve a proper balance between vaccine safety and vaccine availability. To a large degree, the Vaccine Act achieves its goals. Plaintiffs may seek compensation in a no-fault compensation system, and manufacturers are relieved of the burden and expense of defending vaccine injury law suits. The Vaccine Act's modification of state common law for plaintiffs who reject judgment under the statutory no-fault compensation program, however, places too much emphasis on vaccine availability and not enough emphasis on vaccine safety. In order to strike a more equitable balance, this Comment recommends that Congress take the following steps: (1) require manufacturers with knowledge of warning inadequacies to petition the FDA for a warning alteration before giving manufacturers the benefit of the presumption that warnings in compliance with FDA standards are adequate; and (2) adopt the three-factor Kearl test for determining "unavoidably unsafe" product status. Both recommendations respect the social utility of vaccines and will therefore promote a workable balancing of safety and availability interests.

If the majority of vaccine injury plaintiffs continue to accept judgment under the statutory no-fault compensation program, these changes will not have a large scale impact on vaccine injury litigation. As Congress begins to consider legislation in other areas of product liability law, however, it should take note of the shortcomings of the Vaccine Act's alteration of state tort law. Congress should also ensure that future statutory modifications of the civil tort over this issue is particularly intense in the context of children's vaccines. On the one hand, vaccine manufacturers insist that increased regulation and liability will make vaccine producers uninsurable and stymie research and development. [4] Given the indisputable social utility of children's vaccines, this argument carries significant merit. On the other hand, plaintiffs' coalitions and certain scientists insist that vaccine manufacturers currently market unsafe vaccines to American children. [5] As evidence, these groups cite the recurring incidence of brain damage and even death in young vaccine recipients. [6]

REV_00261807

Recent legislative and executive proposals have once again brought the vaccine debate to the political forefront. In 1993, the Clinton administration introduced and successfully passed a bill providing free vaccines to eligible children. [7] Commenting on the legislation, President Clinton stated, "Our nation is the only industrialized nation in the world that does not guarantee childhood vaccination for all children. It ought to be like clean water and clean air. It ought to be part of the fabric of our life." [8]

Shortly after passing this initiative, Republican candidates for the House of Representatives published the "Contract with America." [9] Item nine of the Contract advocates the curtailment of state strict liability laws and the passage of uniform federal product liability legislation. [10] [*1856]

Although neither of these proposals directly affects vaccine-related injury litigation, both demonstrate the continuing difficulties our nation faces in its attempt to establish a workable balance between product availability and product safety. In the interest of increasing dialogue on this crucial issue, this Comment reexamines a recent legislative attempt to reform vaccine product liability litigation, the National Childhood Injury Compensation Act of 1986 (Vaccine Act). [11] This important legislation removed the common law element of negligence from vaccine product liability litigation by creating a no-fault compensation program funded by an excise tax on vaccines. [12] The Vaccine Act requires plaintiffs to file a claim against the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services (the Secretary) rather than against the vaccine manufacturer. [13] A valid claim includes an affidavit and documentation proving that the injuries received were caused by a vaccine. [14] If the petitioner is dissatisfied with the result of the no-fault litigation, she may reject the judgment and pursue a civil tort action against the vaccine manufacturer. [15]

Although the Vaccine Act permits vaccine-injury victims to sue manufacturers under state product liability laws, Congress limits the legal theories available to those who forego the Vaccine Act's compensation system. [16] The Vaccine Act affords protection consistent with Restatement (Second) of Torts section 402A comment k [17] (comment k) to vaccines covered by the Act, thereby shielding manufacturers from strict design defect liability. [18] The Vaccine Act also adopts the learned intermediary doctrine, allowing manufacturers [*1857] to fulfill their duty to warn by transmitting information to the treating physician rather than to the vaccinee directly. [19] Finally, the Vaccine Act creates a presumption that manufacturer warnings that comply with the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) standards are adequate, thereby preventing state courts from performing an independent assessment of these warnings' sufficiency. [20]

The Vaccine Act is important legislation because it represents an effort by both vaccine consumers and vaccine manufacturers to strike a middle ground between the seemingly incongruous goals of vaccine safety and vaccine availability. Instead of focusing on the statutory no-fault compensation program of the Vaccine Act, this Comment examines the role that the civil tort system plays in balancing product safety and product availability. As a device for framing this often amorphous topic, this Comment reviews and comments on the Vaccine Act's three fundamental alterations to state tort law for those plaintiffs, who, after rejecting the results of the statutory no-fault compensation program, proceed with a civil law suit against a vaccine manufacturer. Admittedly, the Vaccine Act's alterations of state tort law will not have a large impact on vaccine litigation because most vaccine injury claims are resolved within the statutory framework. The hope is, however, that an examination of the system establish a workable balance between product availability and product safety.

REV_00261790

FOOTNOTES:

n1. See H.R. Rep. No. 908, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. 4 (1986) [hereinafter 1986 House Report] (stating that childhood vaccination has saved thousands of lives and billions of health care dollars), reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 6344, 6345.

n2. Randall B. Keiser, Deja Vu All Over Again? The National Childhood Vaccine Injury Compensation Act of 1986, 47 Food Drug Cosm. L.J. 25, 25 (1982) (citing reduction of American polio incidence from 57,000 cases in 1952 to 4 in 1984, whooping cough incidence from 265,000 cases in 1934 to 2000 in 1982, and measles incidence from 2250 deaths in 1941 to 2 deaths in 1983).

n3. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 4, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6345 (stating that vaccines have prevented thousands of deaths every year).

n4. National Childhood Vaccine-Injury Compensation Act of 1985: Hearing on S. 827 Before the Senate Comm. on Labor and Human Resources, 99th Cong., 1st Sess. 240 (1985) (statement of Robert Johnson, President, Lederle Lab.) (stating that number of carriers willing to insure Lederle in 1985 dropped from 26 to 8).

n5. See id. at 42 (statement of Jeffrey H. Schwartz, President, Dissatisfied Parents Together) (announcing Dissatisfied Parents Together's goal of enacting more stringent testing procedures for children's vaccines).

n6. See Vaccine Injury Compensation: Hearings on H.R. 5810 Before the Subcomm. on Health and the Environment of the House Comm. on Energy and Commerce, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 73 (1984) [hereinafter 1984 Vaccine Hearing] (statement of Dr. Edward Brandt, Jr., Assistant Secretary of Health) (explaining that risk of permanent neurologic damage from DTP vaccine is one in 310,000).

n7. See 42 U.S.C. 1396s(a)(1)(A) (Supp. V 1993) (providing vaccinations at no charge for statutorily eligible children).

n8. Paul Richter, Child Vaccination Program Is Pushed Health, L.A. Times, Feb. 13, 1993, at A1 (internal quotation marks omitted).

n9. See Tony Mauro, Contract with America: The Common Sense Legal Reform Act, USA Today, Nov. 17, 1994, at A10 (stating that more than 300 Republican congressional candidates signed Contract with America on September 27, 1994).

n10. See The Republican "Contract with America,' Phila. Inquirer, Dec. 18, 1994, at C8.

n11. See 42 U.S.C. 300aa-1 to -34 (1988 & Supp. V 1993).

n12. Id. 300aa-15(i)(2) (1988) (providing for payments for vaccine-related injury or death through Vaccine Injury Compensation Trust Fund); see also 26 U.S.C. 9510(a) (1988 & Supp. V 1993) (mandating that revenues from taxes on vaccines provide monies for fund).

n13. 42 U.S.C. 300aa-12(b)(1) (1988 & Supp. V 1993).

n14. Id. 300aa-11(c).

n15. Id. 300aa-21(a)(1)-(2) (1988) (requiring that petitioner must file with Court of Federal Claims decision whether to accept compensation or pursue civil action within 90 days of court's final judgment). The Court of Federal Claims has jurisdiction over claims concerning compensation under the Vaccine Act. Id. 300aa-12(a) (Supp. V 1993).

REV_00261808

n16. See infra notes 51-57 and accompanying text (discussing limitations.on causes of action available under Vaccine Act).

n17. See Restatement (Second) of Torts 402A cmt. k (1965) (explaining that manufacturers of items that are unavoidably unsafe, such as prescription drugs, shall not be held strictly liable for injuries relating to their product, as long as product is manufactured properly and contains adequate warnings). The justification for the absence of strict liability lies in the fact that while these products can never become totally safe, they constitute a desirable and helpful product, furthering the health and well-being of society. Id.

n18. 42 U.S.C. 300aa-22(b)(1) (1988) (stating that manufacturer of vaccine shall not be liable for any vaccine-related injury or death caused by unavoidable side effects so long as manufacturer properly prepared and labeled vaccine with proper warnings).

n19. Id. 300aa-22(c) (providing that no manufacturer shall be liable in civil actions for failing to directly warn injured recipient).

n20. Id. 300aa-22(b)(2). But see id. 300aa-23(d)(2) (allowing plaintiff to rebut presumption by showing that manufacturer engaged in fraud or failed to exercise due care).

n21. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 7, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6348 (stating that concerns of vaccine market instability led to creation of Vaccine Act); Subcomm. on Health and the Environment of the House Comm. on Energy and Commerce, 99th Cong., 2d Sess., Childhood Immunizations 72 (Comm. Print 1986) [hereinafter Childhood Immunizations] (stating that manufacturers began fleeing from vaccine market in 1966).

n22. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 7, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6348 (discussing dissatisfaction with current compensation system); 1984 Vaccine Hearing, supra note 6, at 111 (statement of Donna Gray, Dissatisfied Parents Together) (asking Congress for compensation program).

n23. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 7, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6348.

n24. See Childhood Immunizations, supra note 21, at 86 (presenting results of vaccine manufacturer survey).

n25. See Childhood Immunizations, supra note 21, at 68.

n26. Childhood Immunizations, supra note 21, at 68.

n27. See Childhood Immunizations, supra note 21, at 67.

n28. See 1984 Vaccine Hearing, supra note 6, at 266 (statement of Dr. James Mason, Director, Center for Disease Control) (explaining that Connaught's inability to obtain insurance was reason for its withdrawal from market).

n29. See Childhood Immunizations, supra note 21, at 70-71.

n30. See Childhood Immunizations, supra note 21, at 71 (reporting that as of 1986, Center for Disease Control had four-month stockpile of oral polio vaccine and was attempting to establish 10-week stockpile of DTP vaccine).

n31. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 4, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6345 (stating that price of vaccines has increased greatly due in part to increased litigation surrounding vaccine-related injuries or deaths).

REV_00261809

n32. Childhood Immunizations, supra note 21, at 63.

n33. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 7, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6348 (discussing fear that withdrawal of one vaccine manufacturer could trigger outbreak of preventable disease).

n34. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 6, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6347 (noting that very few individuals injured by vaccines ever receive compensation, and stating that "but for the relatively few who are injured by vaccine - through no fault of their own - the opportunities for redress and restitution are limited, time consuming, expensive, and often unanswered").

n35. See, e.g., Brooks v. Medtronic, Inc., 750 F.2d 1227, 1230-31 (4th Cir. 1984) (finding comment k applicable to drugs and medical devices); Brown v. Superior Court, 751 P.2d 470, 477 (Cal. 1988) (holding that comment k applies to all prescription drugs); Johnson v. American Cyanamid Co., 718 P.2d 1318, 1323 (Kan. 1986) (holding that sabin polio vaccine is unavoidably unsafe as matter of law).

n36. See Peggy J. Naile, Tort Liability for DTP Vaccine Injury and the Preemption Doctrine, 22 Ind. L. Rev. 655, 682 (1989) (stating that state-mandated vaccination removes choice element); Fay F. Spence, Alternatives to Manufacturers Liability for Injuries Caused By the Sabin-Type Oral Polio Vaccines, 28 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 711, 734 (1986) (arguing that inadequate warning cannot constitute proximate cause of vaccine injury).

n37. See Spence, supra note 36, at 732 (arguing that mandatory vaccination makes adequacy of warning irrelevant).

n38. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 6, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6347 (stating that lawsuits can take years to complete); Childhood Immunizations, supra note 21, at 87 (reporting results of manufacturer survey showing that of 299 claims filed between 1980 and 1985, 72% were still pending in 1985).

n39. See 42 U.S.C. 300aa-13(a)(1)(A)-(B) (1988) (directing that petitioner shall receive compensation if petitioner proves causation and Secretary of Health and Human Services fails to prove that unrelated factors caused injury); see also 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 3, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6344 (referring to Vaccine Act as "no-fault" compensation system).

n40. See 42 U.S.C. 300aa-11(a)(2)(A) (1988 & Supp. V 1993) (explaining that petitioners may not bring civil action in state or federal court if seeking more than $ 1000 in damages unless petitioner has filed petition pursuant to Vaccine Act).

n41. See id. 300aa-21(a)(1)-(2) (1988) (stating that following entry of judgment, petitioner shall file election within 90 days either accepting or rejecting judgment).

n42. Ct. Cl. R. App. J., Rule 7 ("There shall be no discovery as a matter of right. The informal and cooperative exchange of information is the ordinary and preferred practice.").

n43. 42 U.S.C. 300aa-12(b)(1) (1988 & Supp. V 1993).

n44. See id. 300aa-12(d)(3)(A) (Supp. V 1993) (instructing special master to issue decision as to whether petitioner is entitled to compensation).

n45. See id. 300aa-12(d)(2)(A)-(E) (recommending that Court of Federal Claims provide for less rigid rules). The Vaccine Act specifically directs the Court of Federal Claims to promulgate rules that "provide for a less-adversarial, expeditious, and informal proceeding for the resolution of petitions." Id. 300aa-12(d)(2)(A).

REV_00261810

n46. See id. 300aa-14 (1988 & Supp. V 1993) (providing table of presumed causation for DTP, polio, and MMR vaccines).

n47. Id. 300aa-13(a)(1)(A) (1988).

n48. Id. 300aa-11(c)(1)(C)(ii)(I).

n49. Id. 300aa-13(a)(1)(A); see McClendon v. Secretary of Dep't of Health & Human Servs., 23 Cl. Ct. 191, 195-96 (1991) (holding that burden of proof required is preponderance of evidence rather than scientific certainty).

n50. See 42 U.S.C. 300aa-13(a)(1)(B). The Code states that illnesses or injuries not previously known to have a relation to the vaccine that are nonetheless proven to arise out of the administration of the vaccine do not fall into the category of "factors unrelated to the administration of the vaccine." Id. 300aa-13(a)(2)(A)-(B).

n51. See id. 300aa-21(a)(1)-(2).

n52. See id. 300aa-22(b)-(c) (granting comment k immunity to all vaccines, creating presumption of adequacy in all warnings that comply with FDA standards, and banning liability for direct failure to warn).

n53. See id. 300aa-22(b)(1).

n54. See id. 300aa-22(b)(2) (declaring that compliance with requirement of Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, 21 U.S.C. 301-392 (1988 & Supp. V 1993), and Public Health Service Act, 42 U.S.C. 262 (1988), creates presumption of adequate warning).

n55. See id. 300aa-22(b)(2)(A), -23(d)(2)(A)-(C).

n56. See id. 300aa-22(c).

n57. See id. 300aa-22(e).

n58. See id. 300aa-25 to -28 (1988 & Supp. V 1993) (requiring physicians to record information related to administration of vaccine; requiring Secretary to write vaccine information materials for distribution by physicians; and requiring manufacturers to keep detailed records of manufacturing process).

n59. See id. 300aa-25(b)(1)(A)-(C) (1988).

n60. Id.

n61. See id. 300aa-26(a) (1988 & Supp. V 1993) (giving Secretary one year from promulgation of Act to develop and distribute materials).

n62. Id. 300aa-26(c) (Supp. V 1993).

N63. See id. 300aa-26(d) (1988 & Supp. V 1993).

n64. See id. 300aa-28(a)(1)-(4) (1988).

n65. Id. 300aa-28(a)(1).

n66. See id. 300aa-28(a)(2) (requiring report of any suspicious test results that might indicate potential safety hazard).

REV_00261811

n67. See id. 300aa-28(b)(1)-(2) (stating that manufacturer would be subject to civil penalty of $ 100,000, criminal fine of $ 50,000, or one year imprisonment).

n68. See supra note 56 and accompanying text (stating that vaccine manufacturer shall not be liable for claims arising solely out of manufacturer's lack of direct warning to injured vaccine recipient).

n69. Givens v. Lederle, 556 F.2d 1341, 1345 (5th Cir. 1977). The court in Givens held that the learned intermediary doctrine did not apply when a private physician administered a vaccine in a private setting because the setting resembled a clinic situation similar to that in Reyes. See also Reyes v. Wyeth Lab., 498 F.2d 1264, 1277 (5th Cir.) (following "mass vaccine" clinic exception to learned intermediary doctrine enunciated in Davis), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1096 (1974); Davis v. Wyeth Lab., 399 F.2d 121, 131 (9th Cir. 1968) (holding that manufacturer must provide direct warning where vaccine is administered at mass clinic). But see Walker v. Merck & Co., 648 F. Supp. 931, 934 (M.D. Ga. 1986), aff'd, 831 F.2d 1069 (11th Cir. 1987) (limiting Fifth and Ninth Circuits' mass vaccine exceptions to polio cases); Johnson v. American Cyanamid Co., 718 P.2d 1318, 1324 (Kan. 1986) (applying learned intermediary doctrine solely because physician administered vaccine). Some commentators have argued that, given the courts' narrow reading of Davis and its progeny, the Vaccine Act's elimination of direct warning duty does not significantly alter products liability landscape. See Okianer C. Dark, Is the National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act of 1986 the Solution for the DTP Controversy?, 19 U. Tol. L. Rev. 799, 857 (1988) (arguing that plaintiffs may still have cause of action against manufacturer through such claims as negligent preparation, improper design, or failure to warn physician under strict liability standard).

n70. See Susan A. Casey, Laying an Old Doctrine to Rest: Challenging the Wisdom of the Learned Intermediary Doctrine, 19 Wm. Mitchell L. Rev. 931, 957 (1993) (asserting that learned intermediary doctrine overestimates physicians' willingness to serve as conduit between manufacturers and patients); Alan R. Styles, Prescription Drugs and the Duty to Warn: An Argument for Patient Package Inserts, 39 Clev. St. L. Rev. 111, 123 (1991) (arguing that under learned intermediary doctrine, doctors are not always willing to perform individualized risk assessments).

n71. See infra notes 152-57 and accompanying text (arguing that informational and reporting requirements both permit vaccinee to actively participate in risk-benefit analysis and reduce physician discretion in decision to utilize vaccine).

n72. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 7, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6345 (stating that concerns propelling legislation are inadequacy of civil tort system as compensation mechanism and instability of vaccine market).

n73. See infra notes 334-35 and accompanying text (asserting that Act seeks to insulate manufacturer from liability as well as establish pro-plaintiff compensation system).

n74. See infra notes 331-32 and accompanying text (proposing combining federal reporting regulations with state common law-based direct warning rule).

n75. See Dark, supra note 69, at 848-49 (stating that Vaccine Act removes mass vaccine exception to learned intermediary doctrine); Theodore H. Davis & Catherine B. Bowman, No-Fault Compensation for Unavoidable Injuries: Evaluating the National Childhood Vaccine Injury Compensation Program, 16 U. Dayton L. Rev. 277, 304 (1991) (arguing that Act abrogates direct warning causes of action previously permitted under Davis and its progeny); Mary Beth Neraas, The National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act of 1986: A Solution to the Vaccine Liability Crisis?, 63 Wash. L. Rev. 149, 158 (1988) (stating that Act removes manufacturers' duty to warn ultimate users directly).

n76. See Sterling Drug v. Cornish, 370 F.2d 82, 85 (8th Cir. 1966) (labelling consumer's doctor as "learned intermediary" between manufacturer and consumer).

n77. See Reyes v. Wyeth Lab., 498 F.2d 1264, 1276 (5th Cir.) (stating that manufacturers of prescription drugs must only warn prescribing physicians), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1096 (1974); Davis v. Wyeth Lab., 399 F.2d 121, 129 (9th Cir. 1968) (describing customary rule that manufacturer has duty only to warn physician prescribing drug); Dunkin v. Syntex Lab., 443 F. Supp. 121, 123 (W.D. Tenn. 1977) (stating that Tennessee law only requires prescription drug manufacturer to warn prescribing physician adequately); Buckner v. Allergan Pharmaceuticals, 400 So. 2d 820, 822 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1981) (holding that manufacturer's duty to warn of drug's potential dangers is fulfilled by adequate warning to prescribing doctor); Seley v. G.D. Searle & Co., 423 N.E.2d 831, 839 (Ohio 1981) (arguing that position of physician as learned intermediary removes manufacturers' duty to warn ultimate consumers of prescription drugs directly).

n78. See Restatement (Second) of Torts, supra note 17, 388 (requiring manufacturers of potentially dangerous products to warn foreseeable ultimate users).

n79. See Spence, supra note 36, at 728 (identifying manufacturers' difficulty in providing direct warnings to users and insufficient patient knowledge as policy considerations supporting learned intermediary doctrine). Circuit Judge Wisdom, in Reyes v. Wyeth Laboratories, provided a persuasive justification for the learned intermediary doctrine:

Prescription drugs are likely to be complex medicines, esoteric in formula and varied in effect. As a medical expert, the prescribing physician can take into account the propensities of the drug, as well as the susceptibilities of his patient. His is the task of weighing the benefits of any medication against its potential dangers. The choice he makes is an informed one, an individualized medical judgment bottomed on a knowledge of both patient and palliative. Pharmaceutical companies then, who must warn ultimate purchasers of dangers inherent in patent drugs sold over the counter, in selling prescription drugs are required to warn only the prescribing physician, who acts as a "learned intermediary" between the manufacturer and consumer.

Reyes, 498 F.2d at 1276.

n80. See Reyes, 498 F.2d at 1276.

n81. Id.; see also Barbara Pope Flannagan, Products Liability: The Continued Viability of the Learned Intermediary Rule as it Applies to Product Warnings for Prescription Drugs, 20 U. Rich. L. Rev. 405, 413 (1986) (arguing that physician is only individual possessing knowledge of both patient and drug).

n82. Reyes, 489 F.2d at 1276; see Flannagan, supra note 81, at 413 ("The physician's knowledge of the patient and the drug are taken into account when the physician makes a medical judgment as to the appropriate course of treatment for a particular patient.").

n83. See Davis v. Wyeth Lab., 399 F.2d 121, 129 (9th Cir. 1968) (arguing that due to medical nature of warning, it is difficult to adequately warn lay consumer); Flannagan, supra note 81, at 413 (arguing that direct manufacturer warnings might mislead patient).

n84. See Dunkin v. Syntex Lab., 443 F. Supp. 121, 123 (W.D. Tenn. 1977) (stating that direct manufacturer warning may interfere with doctor-patient relationship); McKee v. American Home Prods. Corp., 782 P.2d 1045, 1055 (Wash. 1989) (en banc) (arguing that package inserts may confuse and frighten patients); Casey, supra note 70, at 948 (arguing that patient may fear discussing package insert with physician and decide to avoid medical treatment); Walter J. Curran, Package Inserts for Patients: Informed Consent in the 1980s, 305 New Eng. J. Med. 1564, 1566 (1981) (suggesting that package inserts may lead patients to question physician's prescription and reject therapy altogether).

REV_00261813

n85. Flannagan, supra note 81, at 413 (discussing practical difficulties of direct warnings).

n86. Flannagan, supra note 81, at 413 (suggesting that physician can both answer patient questions and gauge whether patients fully understand nature of treatment).

n87. Casey, supra note 70, at 948 (stating that direct contact between manufacturer and patient is rare); Spence, supra note 36, at 728 (citing fact that patients receive prescription drugs through physician as reason for learned intermediary doctrine).

n88. Casey, supra note 70, at 948.

n89. See Seley v. G.D. Searle & Co., 423 N.E.2d 831, 840 (Ohio 1981) ("The patient is expected to place primary reliance upon the physician's judgment, and to follow his advice and instructions as to use of the drug.").

n90. See Casey, supra note 70, at 939-45 (citing mass vaccines, oral contraceptives, and intrauterine devices as products to which learned intermediary doctrine does not apply) (citing Davis v. Wyeth Lab., 399 F.2d 121, 131 (9th Cir. 1968) (holding that manufacturer must provide direct warning in mass immunization clinic context); Odgers v. Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp., 609 F. Supp. 867, 878 (E.D. Mich. 1985) (requiring oral contraceptive manufacturers to give user direct warning)).

n91. 399 F.2d 121, 131 (9th Cir. 1968).

n92. See Davis, 399 F.2d at 124.

n93. See id. at 122.

n94. See id. at 125 (stating that warnings to medical society were in package insert provided in every bottle of 100 doses).

n95. See id.

n96. See id. at 130 (stating that directly warning physician is only effective means by which warning would benefit patient).

n97. Id.

n98. Id.

n99. Id. at 131; see also Reyes v. Wyeth Lab., 498 F.2d 1264, 1277 (5th Cir.) (referring to "assembly line" nature of mass immunization clinics), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1096 (1974).

n100. Davis, 399 F.2d at 131. Building on the Ninth Circuit's rationale, the Fifth Circuit later expanded the mass vaccine clinic exception to the learned intermediary doctrine. See Givens v. Lederle, 556 F.2d 1341, 1345 (5th Cir. 1977). Whereas the court in Davis imposed a structural distinction between mass clinics and private physicians, the Fifth Circuit in Givens evaluated the nature of the private-physician scenario and determined that the dispensation of vaccinations in the private physician scenario is more analogous to a visit to a mass clinic than a visit to a private physician's office, despite the presence of a physician. Id. (finding that administration of vaccine, although supervised by physician, resembled county health clinic setting).

n101. Davis, 399 F.2d at 131.

n102. Id.

n103. Id.

n104. Id.

n105. Id.

n106. Id.

n107. See Childhood Immunizations, supra note 21, at 60 (stating that 50% of vaccines are administered through public sector programs); see also Reyes v. Wyeth Lab., 498 F.2d 1264, 1277 (5th Cir.) (discussing public health professor's testimony that majority of sabin polio vaccines are administered in mass vaccination clinics), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1096 (1974).

n108. See supra notes 91-106 (discussing mass vaccine clinic exception to learned intermediary doctrine).

n109. Reyes, 498 F.2d at 1276 (validating learned intermediary doctrine on basis that physician can perform informed risk assessment by applying knowledge of both drug and patient's medical history).

n110. Casey, supra note 70, at 957 (questioning willingness and ability of physicians to serve as learned intermediaries); Styles, supra note 70, at 123 (arguing that physicians are not always willing to inform patients of prescription drug's risks).

n111. Styles, supra note 70, at 128-29 (stating that customary practice standard for informed consent requires physicians to warn patients only when medical community deems disclosure necessary); Gerald F. Tietz, Informed Consent in the Prescription Drug Context: The Special Case, 61 Wash. L. Rev. 367, 368 (1986) (arguing that informed consent doctrine does not adequately protect patients who receive prescription drugs).

n112. See Canterbury v. Spence, 464 F.2d 772, 780 (D.C. Cir.) (stating basic premise that "every human being of adult years has a right to determine what shall be done with his own body"), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1064 (1972); Marjorie Maguire Shultz, From Informed Consent to Patient Choice: A New Protected Interest, 95 Yale L.J. 219, 226-27 (1985) (arguing that doctor's responsibility for patient's well-being requires doctor to provide patient with sufficient information to allow patient to make intelligent, informed decision); Styles, supra note 70, at 113 (stating that informed consent doctrine obligates doctors to warn of proposed therapy's risks).

n113. See, e.g., Watkins v. United States, 482 F. Supp. 1006, 1013 (M.D. Tenn. 1980) (holding that physician was not required to warn patient of dermatological drug's side effects when giving such warnings was not common practice of medical community); Finley v. United States, 314 F. Supp. 905, 915 (N.D. Ohio 1970) (finding physician was not negligent because of lack of expert opinion that warning should have been given); Styles, supra note 70, at 128-29 (explaining that customary practice standard is determined by customs of medical profession itself, and is therefore not absolute); Tietz, supra note 111, at 309 (stating that medical customary practice standard is based on medical community customs rather than patients' expectations).

Some jurisdictions, recognizing that the customary practice standard is determined by physicians, have developed a more patient-oriented measure of informed consent. See

REV_00261815

Canterbury, 464 F.2d at 784 (defining scope of duty to warn as "when a reasonable person, in what the physician knows or should know to be the patient's position, would be likely to attach significance to the risk or cluster of risks in deciding whether or not to forego the proposed therapy"). But see Styles, supra note 70, at 129 (stating that although Canterbury standard still governs in many jurisdictions, courts have not applied patient-oriented reasonableness test to prescription pharmaceutical cases).

n114. Watkins, 482 F. Supp. at 1013 (requiring informed consent only where such consent is standard practice in medical community); Finley, 314 F. Supp. at 915 (citing lack of evidence of community warning practice as reason for dismissal of failure to warn claim).

n115. See Styles, supra note 70, at 128-29 (explaining that physician's duty to warn only goes so far as local medical community deems appropriate). For an argument suggesting a stricter informed consent standard, see Canterbury, 464 F.2d at 274 (arguing that informed consent requires standard governing physicians rather than standard governed by physicians).

n116. Styles, supra note 70, at 130; see also Casey, supra note 70, at 948 (observing that patient may become intimidated by potential consequences or confused by medical terminology and consequently reject treatment).

n117. 819 F.2d 349 (2d Cir. 1987).

n118. See Plummer v. Lederle Lab., 819 F.2d 349, 352 (2d Cir. 1987).

n119. See id. (relating warning estimating one in six million chance of contracting contact polio).

n120. Id.

n121. See Casey, supra note 70, at 957 (arguing that physicians are not prepared to serve as learned intermediaries); Tietz, supra note 111, at 367 (arguing that doctors do not inform patients of important information about risks of serious side effects of prescription drug use) (citing J. Katz, The Silent World of Doctor and Patient 83 (1984)).

n122. See Casey, supra note 70, at 957-58 (arguing that medical community's ability and willingness to act as learned intermediary is overstated and that measuring scope of duty to warn by standard of practice of community affords, at best, only limited knowledge of risks associated with treatment).

n123. Id.

n124. See H.R. Rep. No. 1063, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 2 (1984) (urging creation of permanent system to deliver comprehensive immunization services), reprinted in 1984 U.S.C.C.A.N. 4804, 4805.

n125. See Childhood Immunizations, supra note 21, at 103.

n126. See James M. Burke, DTP Controversy: An Assessment of the Liabilities of Manufacturers and Administering Physicians Under Several Legal Theories, 17 Seton Hall L. Rev. 541, 591-92 (1987) (advocating that manufacturers respond to doctors' lack of objectivity with "Dear Doctor" letters, pamphlets, and other advertisements); Casey, supra note 70, at 957-58 (arguing that initially adequate warnings may become insufficient when physician makes per se determination of drug's value). Graham v. Wyeth Lab., 666 F. Supp. 1483, 1487 (D. Kan. 1987), provides an illustration of the overpromotion phenomena. The plaintiff parents were provided with information prepared by the Missouri Department of Health describing the risks of the whole-cell vaccine, prior to their child receiving the DTP vaccination. Upon being asked questions about the side effects of the vaccine, however, a nurse responded that the warnings were "just statistics" and that the adverse reactions "didn't really happen." Id. The plaintiff infant daughter sustained severe and irreversible brain damage. Id. at 1485.

REV_00261816

n127. See Burke, supra note 126, at 591-92 (stating that pro-vaccine environment creates false perception of utility of vaccines); Casey, supra note 70, at 957-58 (arguing that overpromotion leads to manufacturers' disregard for warnings).

n128. See, e.g., Salmon v. Parke, Davis & Co., 520 F.2d 1359, 1362 (4th Cir. 1975) (holding that manufacturer who knowingly ignores that warning is being disregarded may be liable for failure to warn); Incollingo v. Ewing, 282 A.2d 206, 222 (Pa. 1971) (holding that manufacturer with knowledge that learned intermediaries are ignoring otherwise valid warnings may be liable for failure to warn); Burke, supra note 126, at 592 (arguing that manufacturers ignoring environment in which their products are distributed may be liable for failure to warn under learned intermediary doctrine).

n129. 282 A.2d 206 (Pa. 1971).

n130. Incollingo v. Ewing, 282 A.2d 206, 222 (Pa. 1971).

n131. See id.

n132. See id.

n133. Id.

n134. See id.; Burke, supra note 126, at 592 (arguing that charging manufacturers with knowledge of environment will help restore objectivity of physician warnings).

n135. See Burke, supra note 126, at 592 (asserting that manufacturers have duty to "neutralize the effect of overpromotion" by using any available means, including advertisements, pamphlets, and even "Dear Doctor" letters).

n136. See 42 U.S.C. 300aa-22(a)-(c) (1988) (discussing standards of responsibility with regard to warnings).

n137. See Casey, supra note 70, at 958 (arguing that patients are not as susceptible to overpromotion as physicians are because manufacturers of prescription drugs do not generally market to patients).

n138. Burke, supra note 126, at 592.

n139. 42 U.S.C. 300aa-22(b)(2).

n140. See Incollingo v. Ewing, 282 A.2d 206, 222 (Pa. 1971) (holding drug manufacturer responsible for restricting drug use to "proper situations" where manufacturer knew or should have known of widespread misuse). The adequacy presumption created by the Vaccine Act is not easily rebutted. In order to rebut the presumption, plaintiffs must show that the manufacturer participated in a fraudulent, intentional, or wrongful withholding of information from the Secretary, or prove by clear and convincing evidence that the manufacturer did not exercise due care. Id.

n141. See Spence, supra note 36, at 732 (discussing argument that state vaccination laws, which require vaccinations prior to matriculation, remove choice element and therefore prevent vaccine from being proximate cause of vaccinee's injury).

REV_00261817

alterations to the civil tort system, codified by Congress in the Vaccine Act, will provide guidance for future legislative reforms in the area of product liability.

Part I explores the vaccine crisis that inspired Congress to reform vaccine litigation. Part II describes the Vaccine Act. Part III considers the Vaccine Act's adoption of the learned intermediary doctrine. Part IV analyzes the Vaccine Act's presumption that warnings complying with FDA standards are adequate and confronts the larger question of the proper relationship between federal regulations and state common law. Part V discusses the Vaccine Act's blanket application of comment k to all vaccines.

Following the evaluation of Congress' alteration of state tort law, Part VI offers a series of conclusions and recommendations for future legislative action. First, the Vaccine Act's elimination of a plaintiff's cause of action under a failure-to-warn tort theory represents a prudent compromise between the dual interests of reducing manufacturer liability and maintaining vaccine safety. Second, the presumption of warning adequacy in the Vaccine Act allows manufacturers to [*1858] disregard knowledge of vaccine inadequacies so long as the vaccine warning complies with FDA standards. To remedy this deficiency, Congress should require manufacturers with knowledge of warning deficiencies to seek FDA permission to modify their warnings even though existing warnings meet FDA standards. Third, Congress' blanket application of comment k immunity to all vaccines ignores research indicating that manufacturers may currently possess the scientific knowledge to produce safer, alternative vaccines. Congress therefore should amend the Vaccine Act by incorporating a risk-benefit analysis prior to awarding "unavoidably unsafe" status to a vaccine.

I. The Vaccine Crisis

In response to fears that the civil tort system had destabilized the vaccine market, Congress reexamined vaccine liability issues in the early 1980s. [21] In addition to concerns about the availability of vaccines, Congress received pressure from pro-plaintiff groups complaining about the civil tort system's inequities. [22] These dual concerns led Congress to the conclusion that American vaccine policy was in a state of crisis and required a systemic overhaul. [23]

A. Instability of the Vaccine Market

Several related incidents brought to light the instability of the American vaccine market. Fearful that the $ 3.5 billion in damages sought by vaccine injury victims between 1980 and 1984 presaged major financial exposure, [24] six manufacturers ceased production of vaccines. [25] Whereas at one time eight private pharmaceutical companies produced the diphtheria-tetanus-pertussis (DTP) vaccine, only two, Lederle and Connaught, continued to manufacture the DTP vaccine in 1986. [26] Similarly, by 1986, Lederle and Connaught were [*1859] the only manufacturers of polio vaccines. [27] The majority of vaccine manufacturers left the market citing the unavailability of product liability insurance. [28]

The decrease in the number of vaccine manufacturers resulted in a concomitant decline in the national vaccine stockpile. [29] In 1986, the vaccine stockpile had fallen below the Center for Disease Control's recommended six-month reserve supply. [30] Those manufacturers remaining in the vaccine market greatly increased their prices. [31] For example, a dose of the measles, mumps, and rubella (MMR) vaccine increased in cost from $ 2.71 in 1980 to $ 8.47 in 1986. [32] Congress therefore feared an actual vaccine shortage and the possible reemergence of formerly contained deadly diseases. [33]

B. The Inability of the Civil Tort System to Provide Adequate Compensation for Vaccine-Related Injuries

REV_00261791

n142. See Spence, supra note 36, at 732-34.

n143. Spence, supra note 36, at 732-34.

n144. See Casey, supra note 70, at 959 (explaining that patient plays important role in monitoring signs and symptoms of adverse reactions after use of drug); Tietz, supra note 111, at 389 (arguing that patient plays important role in monitoring adverse reactions to prescription drugs).

n145. Tietz, supra note 111, at 389.

n146. See Tietz, supra note 111, at 389 (asserting that prescription drug therapy requires continuous monitoring depending on patient's awareness of side effects and their symptoms in order to avoid time lag between ingestion of drug and side effect); see also Casey, supra note 70, at 359 (suggesting that doctor's role in detecting signs of adverse reactions ceases once patient leaves doctor's office).

n147. See Tietz, supra note 111, at 389 (highlighting patient awareness of potential side effects as crucial in order for drug therapy monitoring process to be effective, thereby requiring patient to be "coparticipant" in process).

n148. See Tietz, supra note 111, at 389 (noting that patient compliance with prescription drug therapy improves when patient is informed directly, rather than if physician treats patient as inactive participant).

n149. See 42 U.S.C. 300aa-26(a)-(d) (1988 & Supp. V 1993).

n150. Id. 300aa-26(c)(1)-(4).

n151. See id. 300aa-26(d)(2) (1988) (requiring physician to provide vaccine information material prior to administration of vaccine).

n152. See id. 300aa-26(a) (1988 & Supp. V 1993) (mandating dissemination of vaccine information by health care providers to legal representatives or vaccinees). The very nature of the information that the Secretary must include in the vaccine information - benefits, risks, and compensation for injuries - offers the vaccinee the opportunity to consider for herself the benefits and risks of vaccination.

n153. See supra note 84 and accompanying text.

n154. See Styles, supra note 70, at 128-29 (discussing customary practice standard of informed consent). Under the community practice standard, a physician, as a learned intermediary, is only required to communicate to the patient information that is deemed necessary by the medical community. Id. The Vaccine Act replaces the judgment of the medical community with the judgment of the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS). Id.; see also 42 U.S.C. 300aa-26(a) (1988) (requiring HHS Secretary to develop vaccine information). The Act, however, may still rely on physician discretion to the extent that it requires doctors to supplement the vaccine information with oral explanations in "appropriate cases" without specifying who is to make this determination. Id. 300aa-26(d) (Supp. V 1993). Given the Act's silence as to the meaning of "appropriate cases," id., physicians providing supplementary vaccine information may still be governed by the community practice standard. This result is no different than if Congress had required manufacturers to provide direct warnings to physicians. In both cases, the vaccinee has a finite amount of written information upon which the physician may or may not add his or her medical knowledge. This scenario is at least an improvement over a learned intermediary doctrine without a regulatory imposition of patient warnings.

REV_00261818

n155. See 42 U.S.C. 300aa-25(b)(1)(A)-(C) (1988) (detailing recording requirements for health care providers and manufacturers). The recording mandate requires that health care providers and manufacturers report to the Secretary the following information:

(A) the occurrence of any event set forth in the Vaccine Injury Table, including the events set forth in section 300-14(b) of this title which occur within 7 days of the administration of any vaccines set forth in the Table or within such longer period as is specified in the table or section, (B) the occurrence of any contraindicating reaction to a vaccine which is specified in the manufacturer's package insert, and (C) such other matters as the Secretary may by regulation require.

Id.

n156. Compare id. (setting out reporting requirements for health care providers and manufacturers) with Incollingo v. Ewing, 282 A.2d 206, 222 (Pa. 1971) (charging manufacturer with knowledge of environment in which drugs are distributed). The Vaccine Act approaches the problem of environmental overpromotion in a different manner than the court in Incollingo, which suggested that manufacturers be required to evaluate the state of mind of physicians receiving their warnings. Incollingo, 282 A.2d at 222. The Vaccine Act requires physicians to report directly certain contraindicating events. 42 U.S.C. 300aa-25(b)(1)(A)-(C).

n157. 42 U.S.C. 300aa-25(b)(1)(A)-(B).

n158. See, e.g., Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, 21 U.S.C. 351-392 (1988 & Supp. V 1993) (setting forth various policies regarding, inter alia, representation, revocation, certification, and required recording and reporting of information concerning various drugs); Public Health Service Act, 42 U.S.C. 241-289 (1988) (enumerating general powers and duties of Public Health Service, and establishing and specifying role and function of various medical institutions, services, and systems); Jennie Clarke, Federal Preemption: A Vaccine Manufacturer's Defense, 56 UMKC L. Rev. 515, 525-28 (1988) (documenting growth of federal involvement in vaccine regulation throughout 20th century).

n159. See Jones v. Rath Packing Co., 430 U.S. 519, 525 (1977) (holding that Congress may preempt state law by explicitly announcing its intention in language of statute); Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 230 (1947) (concluding that scheme of federal regulation may be so highly pervasive as to allow reasonable inference that Congress intended to leave no room for States to supplement it).

n160. 42 U.S.C. 300aa-22(e) (1988).

n161. Id. 300aa-22(b)(2).

n162. Id. 300aa-22(c).

n163. Cf. Naile, supra note 36, at 689 (noting that all aspects of vaccine design, manufacturing, and labelling are overseen by FDA).

n164. See Richard C. Ausness, Federal Preemption of State Product Liability Doctrines, 44 S.C. L. Rev. 187, 276-77 (1993) (arguing that FDA only responds to warnings submitted by manufacturers and therefore may not be approving safest possible warnings).

n165. See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2 ("This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof ... shall be the supreme Law of the Land."); see also Ausness, supra note 164, at 191 (stating that Supremacy Clause is basis for preemption doctrine); Naile, supra note 36, at 683 (stating that Supremacy Clause gives Congress power to override state law).

REV_00261819

n166. See Clarke, supra note 158, at 539; Benjamin W. Heineman, Jr. & Carter G. Phillips, Federal Preemption: A Comment on Regulatory Preemption After Hillsborough County, 18 Urb. 589, 591 n.10 (1986).

n167. See Ausness, supra note 164, at 191.

n168. See Ausness, supra note 164, at 191 (explaining that state common law, as well as state legislation, is preempted by federal law); Clarke, supra note 158, at 531 (stating that both statutory and regulatory preemption override laws promulgated by state legislatures and state courts); see also Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. de la Cuesta, 458 U.S. 141, 153 (stating that "federal regulations have no less preemptive effect than federal statutes"); Clarke, supra note 158, at 530 (noting that courts have used same principles in finding both statutory and regulatory preemption).

n169. See, e.g., Jones v. Rath Packing Co., 430 U.S. 519, 525 (1977) (stating that preemption "is compelled whether Congress' command is explicitly stated in the statute's language or implicitly contained in its structure and purpose"); City of Burbank v. Lockheed Air Terminal Inc., 411 U.S. 624, 633 (1973) (holding that federal law may expressly or impliedly preempt state law); Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 230 (1947) (holding that federal law may preempt state law either explicitly or implicitly).

n170. Jones, 430 U.S. at 525.

n171. See Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. State Energy Resources Conservation & Dev. Comm'n, 461 U.S. 190, 203-04 (1983) (holding that dominant nature of federal interest will create presumption that state enforcement of law on same subject is prohibited); Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 458 U.S. at 153 (finding implied preemption where federal regulation is so pervasive that it gives rise to inference that Congress completely occupied field).

n172. See Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 458 U.S. at 153 (holding that conflict results in nullification of state law to extent of conflict with federal law).

n173. See Ausness, supra note 164, at 196-97.

n174. See Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 458 U.S. at 153; Florida Lime & Avocado Growers v. Paul, 373 U.S. 132, 142-43 (1963).

n175. See Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 458 U.S. at 153; Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 67 (1941).

n176. See Barbara L. Atwell, Products Liability and Preemption: A Judicial Framework, 39 Buff. L. Rev. 181, 186 (1991); see also International Paper Co. v. Ouellette, 479 U.S. 481, 494 (1987) (finding that dumping claims under state law interfered with federal method of compliance with Clean Water Act).

n177. See Goldstein v. California, 412 U.S. 546, 554 (1973) (explaining importance of distinguishing between "possible" and "necessary" conflicts); Atwell, supra note 176, at 186 (arguing that actual conflict must exist to trigger conflict preemption doctrine).

n178. Goldstein, 412 U.S. at 555 (1973) (holding that only necessary conflict warrants overriding state law).

REV_00261820

n179. See Jones v. Rath Packing Co., 430 U.S. 519, 525 (1977) (""We start with the assumption that the historic police powers of the States were not to be superseded by the Federal Act unless that was the clear and manifest purpose of Congress'" (quoting Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 230 (1947))).

n180. Id. (citing need to achieve balance between federal and state rights); see also United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 349 (1971) (stating that absent clear intent from Congress, Court will be reluctant to impose balance between federal and state rights).

n181. Atwell, supra note 176, at 188; see also Hillsborough County v. Automated Medical Lab., 471 U.S. 707, 716 (1985) (explaining presumption of peaceful coexistence between state and federal health and safety regulations).

n182. See, e.g., Hurley v. Lederle Lab., 651 F. Supp. 993, 999 (E.D. Tex. 1986) (stating that comprehensiveness of federal regulation demonstrates implied congressional intent to preempt state tort law), rev'd on other grounds, 863 F.2d 1173 (5th Cir. 1988); Naile, supra note 36, at 689 (arguing that comprehensiveness of federal regulations leaves no room for state tort law).

n183. For a comprehensive overview of FDA vaccine regulation, see Clarke, supra note 158, at 525-29.

n184. Pub. L. No. 57-274, 32 Stat. 728 (1902) (codified at 42 U.S.C. 141-143 (1988)); see Clarke, supra note 158, at 525 (describing allocation of regulatory responses during 20th century).

n185. Clarke, supra note 158, at 525 (noting that Congress passed 1902 Act following deaths of 12 children resulting from tetanus contamination from diphtheria and tetanus vaccine).

n186. See Clarke, supra note 158, at 525. In 1944, Congress passed the Public Health Service Act (PHSA). Pub. L. No. 78-410, 58 Stat. 682, 702 (1994) (codified at 42 U.S.C. 262 (1988)). The PHSA incorporated the Virus, Serum, Toxin Act and transferred regulatory responsibilities to the Federal Security Agency. Clarke, supra note 158, at 525. The Division of Biologics Standards (DBS), a subsidiary of the National Institutes of Health, assumed regulatory authority in 1955. Id. In 1972, DBS evolved into the FDA's Bureau of Biologics. Id. at 525-26.

n187. See supra notes 163-81 and accompanying text (discussing Federal Government's role in 20th century vaccine regulation).

n188. Clarke, supra note 158, at 526 (explaining that FDA's Office of Biologics Research and Review and the Bureau of Drugs together form the Center for Drugs and Biologics).

n189. 21 U.S.C. 301-392 (1988 & Supp. V 1993).

n190. 21 U.S.C. 371 (1988) (granting Secretary regulatory power).

n191. 50 Fed. Reg. 7452 (1985) (explaining FDA's attempt to rewrite revision in order to expedite approval process for beneficial drugs).

n192. Id. (describing protective role played by FDA).

n193. Clarke, supra note 158, at 527.

n194. See 21 C.F.R. 601.1 (1994) (requiring both establishment and product license).

REV_00261821

n195. Id.

n196. See id. 601.2 (requiring manufacturer to submit "data derived from nonclinical laboratory and clinical studies which demonstrate that the manufactured product meets prescribed standards of safety, purity, and potency").

n197. See id. 211.25 (requiring that all persons involved in manufacturing process have education, training, and experience necessary to carry out assignment).

n198. See id. 600.10 (allowing only designated individuals into vaccine-processing area).

n199. See id. 620.1 to .6 (providing requirements for propagation of bacteria, bacterial content, detoxification, potency tests, toxicity tests, dosage, and labelling).

n200. See id. 620.4 (prescribing laboratory test using mice as samples); see also Taber's Cyclopedic Medical Dictionary 1359 (16th ed. 1985) (defining potency as "strength of medicine").

n201. See 21 C.F.R. 620.5 (requiring toxicity test using mice as samples); see also Taber's Cyclopedic Medical Dictionary, supra note 200, at 1883 (defining toxicity as "the extent, quality, or degree of being poisonous").

n202. 21 C.F.R. 610.2 (stating that "a manufacturer shall not distribute a lot of a product until the lot is released by the Director").

n203. See, e.g., id. 610.60 to .65 (describing labelling requirements for DTP vaccine).

n204. Id.

n205. Id. 601.12.

n206. Id.; Clarke, supra note 158, at 529.

n207. Clarke, supra note 158, at 529; see also 21 C.F.R. 601.5(b)(3) (stating that FDA will revoke manufacturer's license and hold agency hearing for noncompliance if manufacturer fails to report labelling changes).

n208. See 50 Fed. Reg. 51,402 (1985) (naming uniformity as goal of regulation).

n209. 44 Fed. Reg. 37,442 (1979) (limiting relevant pharmacological information to that which is of significant, normal, and practical clinical applicability).

n210. 21 C.F.R. 201.56(c) (requiring that manufacturers base warnings on "data derived from human experience" and not on claims where there is inadequate evidence). The regulations further mandate that conclusions based on animal data shall be identified as such. Id.

n211. See Hurley v. Lederle Lab., 863 F.2d 1173, 1176 (5th Cir. 1988) (collecting federal and state decisions rejecting preemption claims); Knudsen v. United States, 691 F. Supp. 1346 (M.D. Fla. 1987); Foyle v. Lederle Lab., 674 F. Supp. 530 (E.D.N.C. 1987); Martinkovic v. Wyeth Lab., 669 F. Supp. 212 (N.D. Ill. 1987); Morris v. Parke, Davis & Co., 667 F. Supp. 1332 (C.D. Cal. 1987); MacGillivray v. Lederle Lab., 667 F. Supp. 743 (D.N.M. 1987); Graham v. Wyeth Lab., 666 F. Supp. 1483 (D. Kan. 1987), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 981 (1990); Wack v. Lederle Lab., 666 F. Supp. 123 (N.D. Ohio 1987); Patten v. Lederle Lab., 655 F. Supp. 745 (D. Utah 1987).

n212. 844 F.2d 1108 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 908 (1988).

REV_00261822

n213. See Abbot v. American Cyanamid Co., 844 F.2d 1108, 1110 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 908 (1988).

n214. See id.

n215. See id. at 1111-12.

n216. See id. at 1112; see also supra notes 203-07 and accompanying text (discussing labelling requirements).

n217. Abbot, 844 F.2d at 1112.

n218. Id. (citing Hillsborough County v. Automated Medical Lab., 471 U.S. 707, 719 (1985)) (stating that although all matters addressed by Congress are of national concern, not all matters of national concern warrant preemption). But see Naile, supra note 36, at 690. Naile argues that DTP regulations are distinguishable from the blood regulations in Hillsborough County. Id. First, the local interest in blood collection, the subject addressed by the court in Hillsborough County, is stronger than the local interest in vaccine regulation. Id. Second, the local regulations did not require the collectors to violate federal regulations, while state tort law may require vaccine manufacturers to violate FDA regulations. Id. Third, the FDA blood collection regulations expressly state their intent of nonexclusivity, while FDA vaccine regulations do not make a similar admission of nonexclusivity. Id.

Each of Naile's three arguments distinguishing Hillsborough County from the vaccine preemption debate misses a crucial point. By arguing that blood collection is a stronger local interest than vaccine regulation, Naile ignores the utilitarian benefits of infectious disease control. Local governments, acting in the best interest of their constituents, have a strong interest in establishing strong preventive vaccination programs. Concerning the argument that state tort verdicts might compel violation of federal vaccine regulations, Naile ignores the fact that the possibility of conflict is not a sufficient ground for preemption. See Goldstein v. California, 412 U.S. 546, 554-55 (1973) (distinguishing between possibility of conflict and inevitability of conflict). Finally, the lack of an affirmative statement of nonexclusivity in FDA vaccine regulations does not distinguish Hillsborough County. "When preemption by regulation is considered, courts are reluctant to find preemption by federal regulations when the agency does not make very clear an intent of preemption since agencies normally address problems in a detailed manner." Abbot, 844 F.2d at 1112.

n219. Abbot, 844 F.2d at 1112.

n220. Id. (noting that mere existence of federal legislation does not preempt all related state law).

n221. Id. The Court noted that preemption is difficult to find when: (1) Congress did not expressly manifest its intention to preempt, id. (citing Maryland v. Louisiana, 451 U.S. 725, 726 (1981)); (2) the preemption argument is based on the comprehensiveness of federal regulations, id. (citing Hillsborough County, 471 U.S. at 717); or (3) no federal remedy exists, id. (citing Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 464 U.S. 238, 251 (1984)).

n222. Id.; Hillsborough County, 471 U.S. at 715.

n223. See Abbot, 844 F.2d at 1113 (citing Hillsborough County, 471 U.S. at 718).

n224. See id. at 1112 (noting that courts are more reluctant to infer preemption from comprehensiveness of regulations than from comprehensiveness of statutes).

n225. See id. at 1113.

REV_00261823

n226. See id. (stating overall goal of legislation is safety of drugs and biological products).

n227. See id.; see also Naile, supra note 36, at 527 (listing objectives of federal vaccine regulation as safety and efficiency).

n228. See Abbot, 844 F.2d at 1113.

n229. Id.; see also Hillsborough County, 471 U.S. at 721 (holding that federal objective of blood collection regulations was to establish minimum standards, not to strike balance of safety and quality). For other cases viewing federal regulations as minimum standards, see Brochu v. Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp., 642 F.2d 652, 658 (1st Cir. 1981); Salmon v. Parke, Davis & Co., 520 F.2d 1359, 1363 (4th Cir. 1975); Griffin v. United States, 500 F.2d 1059, 1060-67 (3d Cir. 1974); MacGillivray v. Lederle Lab., 667 F. Supp. 743, 746 (D.N.M. 1987); Toner v. Lederle Lab., 732 P.2d 297, 311 n.12 (Idaho 1987), cert. denied, 485 U.S. 942 (1988); Wooderson v. Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp., 681 P.2d 1038, 1055 (Kan.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 965 (1984); Feldman v. Lederle Lab., 479 A.2d 374, 390 (N.J. 1984).

n230. See Abbot, 844 F.2d at 1113-14 (viewing Vaccine Act as most recent statutory expression of federal vaccine policy).

n231. Id. at 1113.

n232. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 6, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6345 (stating that prior to passage of Vaccine Act, civil tort system was sole compensation mechanism).

n233. Abbot, 844 F.2d at 1113.

n234. 21 U.S.C. 301-393 (1988 & Supp. V 1993).

n235. 42 U.S.C. 200 to 300aaa-13 (1988 & Supp. V 1993).

n236. Abbot, 844 F.2d at 1113. While the court did not cite the specific language of the Vaccine Act, it noted that the purpose of the two earlier acts was to promote "the safety of dues and biologic products." Id. Moreover, the court noted that the Vaccine Act is "replete" with the assumption that "state tort and contract actions are available without preemption by earlier federal legislation." Id.

n237. 42 U.S.C. 300aa-22(a) (1988) (stating that except as otherwise provided, state law applies to vaccine injury civil actions); Abbot, 844 F.2d at 1113.

n238. Abbot, 844 F.2d at 1114. In Hurley v. Lederle Lab., the Fifth Circuit delivered an even stronger admonishment against the federal judiciary determining the objectives of federal vaccine policy. Hurley v. Lederle Lab., 863 F.2d 1173, 1177 (5th Cir. 1988) (Hurley II), rev'g 651 F. Supp. 993 (E.D. Tex. 1986) (Hurley I). The court in Hurley II acknowledged the theoretical possibility of removing state tort liability in order to further the policy objective of increasing vaccine supplies. Id. The court then proceeded to demonstrate that the wisdom of such a policy decision is uncertain. First, preempting state tort law might promote consumer insecurity concerning the quality of vaccines. Id. Second, the price increases caused by state tort damages may be passed on to the Federal Government, thereby eliminating the very need to preempt state tort law. Id. Given the potentially adverse consequences that would arise from a finding that state tort law conflicted with the objectives of federal vaccine policy, the Fifth Circuit found that there was no sufficient evidence on which to declare state tort law preempted. Id.

Interestingly, the Fifth Circuit's decision in Hurley II reversed a decision by the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Texas finding preemption based on, inter alia, an objectives conflict. Hurley v. Lederle Lab., 651 F. Supp. 993 (E.D. Tex. 1986) (Hurley I), rev'd, 863 F.2d 1173 (5th Cir. 1988) (Hurley II). In Hurley I, the district court found that allowing individual States to dictate warnings standards would irreparably harm the federal policy of warning uniformity. Id. at 1005-06.

REV_00261824

With the Vaccine Act as a guide, the Fifth Circuit in Hurley II established a better and more consistent decision than the district court in Hurley I. The Vaccine Act's legislative history alleviates the need for courts to choose between indeterminative policy considerations. If Congress did not believe that state law warning actions damaged the Act's policy favoring uniformity, courts no longer have a need to find an objectives conflict.

n239. Hurley II, 863 F.2d at 1173.

n240. See id. (recognizing that in limited instances state law may conflict with federal law or regulations but finding that manufacturer's arguments so broadly phrased as to preempt all state product liability law for vaccine). The court noted that there should be a reluctance to find that "federal law implicitly preempts state law." Id.

n241. See id. at 1179 (finding that specific FDA approval of manufacturer warning preempts state inadequate warning claim, assuming FDA has all relevant information to make approval decision).

n242. Id. For arguments that physical conflicts, where the manufacturer cannot concurrently satisfy both federal and state law, place vaccine manufacturers in an unfair position, see Hurley I, 651 F. Supp. at 1000 (arguing that Texas common law determination of inadequate warnings can create physical conflict with FDA standards). See also Clarke, supra note 158, at 536-37 (asserting that state court juries often impose warning duties inconsistent with federal regulations); Naile, supra note 36, at 689 (arguing that state tort liability punishes manufacturer for not violating federal law).

Broader policy arguments against allowing state courts to find failure to warn liability are often raised in conjunction with the foregoing physical conflict arguments. Many argue that the FDA is in a better position to establish and judge warning standards than are state judges and juries. See, e.g., Pennington P. Landon, Federal Preemption and the Drug Industry: Can Courts Co-Regulate?, 43 Food Drug Cosm. L.J. 85, 116-17 (1988); Alan Schwartz, Proposals for Products Liability Reform: A Theoretical Synthesis, 97 Yale L.J. 353, 389 (1988). FDA officials have superior resources and superior technical expertise with which to make complicated safety policy decisions. Ausness, supra note 164, at 276. To allow state judges and juries to second-guess FDA standards defeats the safety enforcement structure that Congress established through its creation of the FDA. See Naile, supra note 36, at 694 (arguing that jury evaluation of FDA standards frustrates congressional intent in delegating exclusive authority to FDA to approve and license vaccines).

n243. See Hurley II, 863 F.2d at 1179 (noting that FDA only considers vaccine designs "if and when" manufacturers come forward with proposal).

n244. See id. (concluding that absence of FDA-approved alternatives to whole-cell vaccine does not indicate FDA disapproval of any such alternatives). There are other reasons for allowing state law to coexist with FDA regulations. Over the past decade, the FDA was forced to limit its budget and cut back on its staff. See Ausness, supra note 164, at 276 (stating that FDA has cut staff by 2000 since 1980 (citing Bruce A. Silverglade, Preemption - The Consumer Viewpoint, 45 Food Drug Cosm. L.J. 143, 144 (1990))). With reduced financial and staff capacities, the FDA has a diminished ability to independently assess vaccine warnings. See id.; see also Jones ex rel. Jones v. Lederle Lab., 695 F. Supp. 700, 711 (E.D.N.Y. 1988) (finding that limited FDA resources would restrict agency's ability to perform independently).

n245. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 6, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6345 (outlining inadequacy of civil tort system as compensation mechanism and instability of vaccine market as reasons propelling vaccine legislation).

n246. 42 U.S.C. 300aa-22(b)(2) (1988). The presumption reflects a legislative discomfort with the litany of cases viewing FDA regulations as floors rather than ceilings. For cases finding that FDA regulations are minimum standards, see supra note 229.

n247. 42 U.S.C. 300aa-22(b)(2), -23(d)(2) (1988 & Supp. V 1993). Pursuant to 300aa-22 (b)(2)(A) and -23(d)(2), a plaintiff may vitiate the presumption by showing that the manufacturer engaged in fraud or intentional and wrongful withholding of information from the Secretary of Health either before or after approval of the vaccine, or other criminal or illegal activity relating to the safety and effectiveness of vaccines. Id. 300aa-23(d)(2)(A). Alternatively, the plaintiff may show by "clear and convincing evidence that the manufacturer failed to exercise due care notwithstanding its compliance with ... [the] Act." Id. 300aa-22(b) (2)(B).

This congressional approach closely parallels the Fifth Circuit's analysis in Hurley II. According to the Fifth Circuit, a finding of physical conflict is warranted where state law imposes standards violative of federal law and where the manufacturer has provided the FDA with all the information necessary to evaluate the proposed warning. Hurley v. Lederle Lab., 863 F.2d 1173, 1179 (5th Cir. 1988) (citing KVUE, Inc. v. Austin Broadcasting Corp., 709 F.2d 922, 931-32 (5th Cir. 1983)). The Fifth Circuit therefore held that the only question presentable to the jury was whether Lederle provided the FDA with all available information. Id. at 1179-80. In effect, the Vaccine Act arrives at the same result by allowing rebuttal of the warning presumption only if the manufacturer withheld material information.

n248. 42 U.S.C. 300aa-22(b)(2)(A), -23(d)(2)(A)-(C) (1988).

n249. Id. 300aa-23(d)(2)(B); see also supra note 246 (discussing ways plaintiff may overcome presumption that manufacturer warnings in compliance with FDA standards are adequate).

n250. See Dark, supra note 69, at 820-21 (explaining that where product is unavoidably unsafe, strict liability does not apply if product contains proper warning); Tim Moore, Comment K Immunity to Strict Liability: Should All Prescription Drugs Be Protected?, 26 Hous. L. Rev. 707, 708 (1989) (arguing that unavoidably unsafe products, properly manufactured and containing proper warnings, are not subject to strict liability).

n251. See Restatement (Second) of Torts, supra note 17, 402A cmt. k ("There are some products which, in the present state of human knowledge, are quite incapable of being made safe for their intended and ordinary use.").

n252. See Restatement (Second) of Torts, supra note 17, 402A cmt. k (calling marketing and use of unavoidably unsafe products such as Pasteur vaccine "fully justified, notwithstanding the high degree of risk which they involve").

n253. Restatement (Second) of Torts, supra note 17, 402A cmt. k.

n254. See, e.g., Brochu v. Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp., 642 F.2d 652, 657 (1st Cir. 1981) (reading comment k to hold that absence of appropriate warning constitutes unreasonable danger, thus allowing strict liability claim); Kearl v. Lederle Lab., 218 Cal. Rptr. 453, 465 (Ct. App. 1987) (holding that comment k immunity concerns only design defects); Toner v. Lederle Lab., 732 P.2d 297, 305 (Idaho 1987) (holding that express language of comment k only immunizes manufacturers from strict liability for design defects and not for manufacturing or warning defects); Feldman v. Lederle Lab., 479 A.2d 374, 383 (N.J. 1984) (holding that comment k immunity does not insulate manufacturer from strict liability for failure to warn).

REV_00261826

n255. 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 26, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6367 ("The committee has set forth comment k in this bill because it intends that the principle in comment k regarding "unavoidably unsafe products'... apply to the vaccines covered in the bill ....").

n256. 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 26, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6367 (discussing need to create alternative that compensates victim while not unduly penalizing manufacturer).

n257. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 26, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6367 (allowing victim to seek relief even where vaccine is as safe as possible).

n258. See Brown v. Superior Court, 751 P.2d 470, 477 (Cal. 1988) (explaining that courts could apply strict liability doctrine to all products, apply comment k to all products, or apply threshold test to determine when comment k protection should apply).

n259. See id.

n260. See id.

n261. 218 Cal. Rptr. 453, 463-64 (Ct. App. 1985) (holding that judge must engage in three-prong test to decide whether to apply comment k).

n262. Kearl v. Lederle Lab., 218 Cal. Rptr. 453, 463 (Ct. App. 1985).

n263. Id. ("The statement that drugs are unavoidably [dangerous], and therefore within the protection of comment k, has become almost tautological." (quoting Comment, Can a Prescription Drug Be Defectively Designed? - Brochu v. Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp., 31 DePaul L. Rev. 247, 254 (1981))).

n264. Id.

n265. See id. at 463-64.

n266. Id. at 464.

n267. See Brown v. Superior Court, 751 P.2d 470, 477 (Cal. 1988).

n268. See Davis & Bowman, supra note 75, at 289 (explaining that different jurisdictions have employed divergent interpretations of comment k); Moore, supra note 250, at 724-25 (citing four separate approaches to comment k treatment). Compare Toner v. Lederle Lab., 732 P.2d 297, 308 (Idaho 1987) (holding that comment k immunity does not apply to all prescription drugs), cert. denied, 485 U.S. 942 (1988) with Brown, 751 P.2d at 482 n.11 (finding that immunity from strict design defect liability applies to all prescription drugs) and Grundberg v. UpJohn Co., 813 P.2d 89, 90 (Utah 1991) (holding that all drugs approved by FDA are "unavoidably unsafe" as matter of law).

n269. Restatement (Second) of Torts, supra note 17, 402A cmt. k.

n270. See Toner, 732 P.2d at 308 ("It is equally obvious that not all drugs are so perfectly designed that they cannot be made more pure or more safe, or that there are not safer, suitable alternatives."). An interesting counterargument, however, is that any improvement of a drug changes its chemical nature, thus creating an entirely new drug. According to this argument, the act of improving old drugs results in the creation of a new drug. Because the end result of improvement is a new drug, a manufacturer, by definition, cannot produce a

REV_00261827

In addition to concerns regarding the effects of liability on the vaccine market, Congress also voiced doubts about the sufficiency of the civil tort system as a compensation mechanism. [34] Certain components of state tort law present substantial barriers to compensation for victims of vaccine-related injuries. For example, many courts have bestowed "unavoidably unsafe" status upon vaccines, thereby foreclosing strict liability design defect claims. [35] Furthermore, the fact that vaccination is often made compulsory by law, makes it [*1860] extremely difficult, if not impossible, to prove proximate cause. [36] Specifically, manufacturers argue that better warnings about a vaccine's potential dangers would not persuade potential plaintiffs to forego receiving a vaccine because all children must receive vaccinations before beginning school and all children must attend school. [37] Vaccine-injury litigation is also extremely lengthy. Given the fact-intensive discovery needed to establish manufacturer liability, a victim of a vaccine-related injury must often wait years from the date of injury to receive compensation. [38]

II. The Vaccine Act

The Vaccine Act created a no-fault compensation system for victims of certain vaccine-related injuries. [39] For injuries occurring after passage of the Act, all petitioners alleging injury are required to participate in the Act's adjudication process. [40] If petitioners are not satisfied with the outcome of the statutory no-fault adjudication process, they may pursue traditional tort actions. [41]

The Vaccine Act restructures many aspects of civil torts litigation. [42] The Secretary, rather than the vaccine manufacturer, serves as the defendant. [43] The Office of Special Masters of the United States Court of Federal Claims acts as the trier of law and fact. [44] Rules of [*1861] procedure under the Vaccine Act are less formal than traditional rules. [45]

Petitioners in the no-fault compensation system may prove entitlement to compensation in two different ways. The Vaccine Act contains a Vaccine Injury Table listing certain injuries, symptoms of such injuries, and time limits for the onset of such injuries. [46] A petitioner able to demonstrate both that she suffered an injury listed in the vaccine table and that the first manifestation of the injury occurred within the time limit prescribed by the table creates a presumption of causation. [47] A petitioner who is unable to prove the existence of a table injury is still entitled to compensation if she can prove causation-in-fact. [48] Petitioners may satisfy the burden of proof by demonstrating causation-in-fact by a preponderance of the evidence. [49] Once a petitioner has established either a table injury or causation-in-fact by a preponderance of the evidence, the burden shifts to the respondent to prove that a factor unrelated to the administration of the vaccine caused the injury. [50]

As previously noted, after adjudication of their claims under the Vaccine Act's no-fault compensation system, petitioners may elect to reject the finding of the special master or judge and proceed to file a tort action in state or federal court. [51] The Vaccine Act does, however, place certain limitations on such civil causes of action. [52] The Act states that vaccine manufacturers are not liable for unavoidable side effects caused by vaccines that are properly prepared and accompanied by adequate warnings. [53] The Act also directs that manufacturer compliance with FDA warning standards creates a [*1862] presumption of adequate warnings. [54] Petitioners may rebut this presumption by demonstrating with clear and convincing evidence that the manufacturer did not exercise due care or that the manufacturer engaged in fraud or intentional withholding of information. [55] Additionally, the Act prohibits claims based on the direct failure to warn, when failure to provide a direct warning constitutes the sole claim. [56] Finally, although the Vaccine Act places limitations on certain tort claims, it expressly prohibits States from banning civil actions not proscribed by the Act itself. [57]

The Vaccine Act also creates certain information distribution and recording requirements for health care providers and vaccine manufacturers. [58] Pursuant to the Act, health care providers must report to the Secretary all injuries that are listed in the Vaccine Injury Table safer version of the same drug. See Brown, 751 P.2d at 478 (rejecting argument that improving drug's design will create new drug that cannot be considered definitionally as improved design of old drug).

REV_00261792

n271. See Toner, 732 P.2d at 308 (arguing that comment contemplates risk-benefit analysis); Moore, supra note 250, at 722 (stating that language of comment k does not indicate any intent to provide blanket protection to all drugs).

n272. Restatement (Second) of Torts, supra note 17, 402A cmt. k.

n273. Restatement (Second) of Torts, supra note 17, 402A cmt. k.

n274. Restatement (Second) of Torts, supra note 17, 402A cmt. k.

n275. See Toner, 732 P.2d at 306 (stating that "unavoidable risk" requires no feasible alternative design that, at time of product's production, accomplishes same purpose with less risk). On the other hand, textual arguments certainly exist supporting Congress' blanket application of comment k immunity to all vaccines covered by the Vaccine Act. Comment k cites the Pasteur vaccine as an "outstanding example" of an "unavoidably unsafe" product. Id. Louis Pasteur, a 19th century French chemist, developed a rabies vaccine and made substantial contributions to the field of immunology. Taber's Cyclopedic Medical Dictionary, supra note 200, at 1239. Additionally, comment k speaks of "many ... vaccines" worthy of comment k treatment. Restatement (Second) of Torts, supra note 17, 402A cmt. k.

n276. The language of comment k would permit Congress to provide blanket comment k immunity, if, prior to promulgating the Vaccine Act, Congress performed an "alternative design" analysis for all of the vaccines covered. It is textually unacceptable, however, for Congress to legislate blanket immunity from strict liability under the guise of applying comment k. If Congress decides to insulate manufacturers from strict design defect liability, Congress should announce that it is abandoning comment k and is creating a new standard.

n277. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 26, reprinted in 1986 U.S.S.C.A.N. at 6367 (explaining that comment k applies to all vaccines covered by Act).

n278. See infra notes 282-99 and accompanying text (stating that existence of equally effective, safer version of DTP supports view that whole-cell DTP is not "unavoidably unsafe").

n279. Naile, supra note 36, at 661.

n280. Naile, supra note 36, at 662.

n281. Naile, supra note 36, at 662; Toner v. Lederle Lab., 732 P.2d 297, 300 (Idaho 1987) (stating that complex nature of pertussis-causing organism is so complex that toxin cannot be deactivated) (citing Ezagui v. Dow Chem. Corp., 598 F.2d 727, 731 (2d Cir. 1979)), cert. denied, 485 U.S. 942 (1988).

n282. See Burke, supra note 126, at 547.

n283. Naile, supra note 36, at 668-69 (discussing acellular vaccine, used for mass immunization in Japan since 1991, and non-cellular vaccines as alternatives to whole-cell vaccine).

n284. Toner, 732 P.2d at 300 (noting that clinical testing of non-cellular vaccine occurred in early 1950s); Burke, supra note 126, at 568-70 (stating that Eli-Lilly developed non-cellular DTP vaccine in 1950s).

REV_00261828

n285. Burke, supra note 126, at 569-70; see Taber's Cyclopedic Medical Dictionary, supra note 200, at 896 (defining immunogenicity as "the capacity to stimulate the formation of antibodies").

n286. Burke, supra note 126, at 569.

n287. See Burke, supra note 126, at 569 (citing public relations campaign documenting Tri-Solgen's reduced reactivity rate as reason for non-cellular vaccine's success).

n288. See Burke, supra note 126, at 569 (discussing internal clinical evaluation comparing reaction rates between Tri-Solgen and whole-cell vaccine). The interoffice memo, released in 1985 by an organization named Dissatisfied Parents Together, was produced in response to a discovery request during DTP litigation. Id. at 569 n.163.

n289. Burke, supra note 126, at 569 (stating that Lederle initiated test to evaluate the purported success of Lilly's vaccine).

n290. Burke, supra note 126, at 259; see also Toner v. Lederle Lab., 732 P.2d 297, 300 (Idaho 1987), cert. denied, 485 U.S. 942 (1988).

n291. Burke, supra note 126, at 569.

n292. See Toner, 732 P.2d at 300; Burke, supra note 126, at 570.

n293. See Naile, supra note 36, at 668 (explaining that Wyeth could not meet FDA facility-licensing requirements).

n294. Naile, supra note 36, at 668.

n295. Naile, supra note 36, at 668.

n296. Burke, supra note 126, at 570.

n297. See Burke, supra note 126, at 575 (explaining that strongest argument against awarding whole-cell vaccine "unavoidably unsafe" product status is existence of equally effective and less dangerous alternative product); see also Toner, 732 P.2d at 306 (stating that existence of alternative design, posing less risk, would undermine purpose of comment k and would not receive immunity from liability). In Toner, the Idaho Supreme Court, in response to questions certified by the Ninth Circuit, did not find it necessary to determine whether the whole-cell DTP vaccine is an unavoidably unsafe product because the question as to the effects of comment k on strict liability was discussed simply to help answer the certified question of comment k's application to negligence claims. Id. at 303-04. Nevertheless, the Idaho Supreme Court did offer some hints as to what its answers would be. The court in Toner said that "not all drugs are so perfectly designed that they cannot be made more pure or more safe, or that there are not safer, suitable alternatives." Id. at 308. Given the conceptual framework offered by the court, the ability of DTP manufacturers to produce a non-cellular vaccine could preclude granting the whole-cell vaccine comment k status.

n298. See supra notes 282-95 and accompanying text (discussing manufacturer knowledge of potentially safer, alternative DTP vaccine).

n299. See Naile, supra note 36, at 668 (stating that FDA refused to license Wyeth Laboratories to produce Tri-Solgen or its own non-cellular vaccine).

n300. See Chambers v. G.D. Searle & Co., 441 F. Supp. 377, 380-81 (D. Md. 1975) (stating that comment k applies to all prescription drugs); Brown v. Superior Court, 751 P.2d 470,

REV_00261829

477 (Cal. 1988) (holding that comment k applied to all prescription drugs); Johnson v. American Cyanamid Co., 718 P.2d 1318, 1323 (Kan. 1986) (holding that sabin polio vaccine is unavoidably unsafe as matter of law).

n301. See, e.g., Brown, 751 P.2d at 479 (admitting that blanket approach may reduce potential for development of safer drugs); Terrie Bialostok Brodie, Brown v. Superior Court: Drug Manufacturers Get Immunized from Strict Liability for Design Defects, 19 Golden Gate U. L. Rev. 435, 441-42 (1989) (discussing Brown court's statement that Restatement lacks clarity as to proper application of comment k).

n302. 751 P.2d 470 (Cal. 1988).

n303. Brown, 751 P.2d at 481.

n304. See, e.g., id. at 479 (stating that both because drugs are very beneficial to society, and because holding drug manufacturers to strict liability standard may reduce drug availability, public policy favors negligence standard for drug manufacturers); Burke, supra note 126, at 559 (stating that application of negligence standard, rather than strict liability, for drugs is based on belief that product availability of certain drugs is more important than manufacturer accountability for drug defects).

n305. See supra note 1 and accompanying text.

n306. 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 1-7, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6344-48 (stating purpose and need of new systems for compensating individuals who have been injured by vaccines routinely administered to children).

n307. 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 4, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6345.

n308. 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 4, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6347 ("While most of the Nation's children enjoy great benefit from immunization programs, a small but significant number have been gravely injured.").

n309. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 4, 6-7, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6345, 6347-48 (describing how increased number of lawsuits against vaccine manufacturers and decreased availability of affordable product liability insurance has resulted in higher vaccine prices and manufacturer's withdrawal from vaccine market).

n310. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 7, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6348 ("Thus, the withdrawal of even a single vaccine manufacturer would represent the very real possibility of vaccine shortages, and, in turn, increasing numbers of unimmunized children, and, perhaps, a resurgence of preventable diseases.").

n311. Brown v. Superior Court, 751 P.2d 470, 479 (Cal. 1988) ("Public policy favors the development and marketing of beneficial new drugs, even though some risks, perhaps serious ones, might accompany their introduction, because drugs can save lives and reduce pain and suffering.").

n312. Id.

n313. Id. According to this argument, the looming prospect of large damage awards will deter manufacturers from investing in socially valuable research and development. See Moore, supra note 250, at 718-19 (stating that manufacturers considering developing new drugs will be deterred because there is no assurance that state court will find drug "unavoidably unsafe" under risk-benefit analysis).

n314. See Brown, 751 P.2d at 479 (arguing that insurance will increase price and lower availability of pharmaceuticals).

REV_00261830

n315. See Brodie, supra note 301, at 454-55 (arguing that Brown court's belief is without merit because design defect liability neither deters research and development nor destabilizes vaccine market); Moore, supra note 250, at 732 (arguing that design defect liability actually encourages research and development).

n316. See Brown, 751 P.2d at 479 (stating that it is not beneficial to withhold some drugs until scientific knowledge advances enough to determine all of drug's effects).

n317. See id. (stating that interest in availability of socially useful drugs outweighs benefit of postponing distribution until new scientific knowledge evolves).

n318. Id.

n319. See supra notes 286-92 and accompanying text (discussing Lederle and Eli Lilly tests of Tri-Immunol and Tri-Solgen in 1960s).

n320. See Moore, supra note 250, at 732-33 (arguing that design defect liability encourages research, but does not inhibit product availability).

n321. See Brown, 751 P.2d at 479; 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 7, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6348 (suggesting that Vaccine Act will lead to more stable vaccine market because manufacturers will have better understanding of potential exposure to litigation).

n322. See Moore, supra note 250, at 732 (stating that design defect liability "fuels" research).

n323. See, e.g., Brochu v. Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp., 642 F.2d 652, 655 (1st Cir. 1981) (holding that existence of equally effective but safer version of product warranted finding of design defect); Toner v. Lederle Lab., 732 P.2d 297, 306 (Idaho 1987) (holding that drug must be as safe as possible in order to trigger comment k immunity), cert. denied, 485 U.S. 942 (1988).

n324. See John P. Reilly, The Erosion of Comment K, 14 U. Dayton L. Rev. 255, 260 (1989).

n325. See Moore, supra note 250, at 732.

n326. See Finn v. G.D. Searle & Co., 677 P.2d 1147, 1165 (Cal. 1984) (Bird, C.J., dissenting) (arguing that design defect liability encourages manufacturers to correct safety flaws); Christopher J. Albee & Dawn Kilgallen, Comment, Providing Blanket Comment K Immunity to All FDA Approved Ethical Drugs: The Defect in Grundberg v. Upjohn Co., 7 St. John's J. Legal Comment. 475, 493-94 (1991) (arguing that blanket application benefits manufacturers at expense of public safety).

n327. Comment k speaks of justified marketing. Blanket application of comment k to all vaccines implies that Congress considers the interest in vaccine availability strong enough to deflate safety concerns. But see 42 U.S.C. 300aa-27(a)-(b) (1988 & Supp. V 1993) (stating that Secretary of Health and Human Services shall promote development of safer vaccines and create task force).

n328. See Styles, supra note 70, at 113 (stating that adequate patient information satisfies informed consent doctrine).

n329. 399 F.2d 121 (9th Cir. 1968).

REV_00261831

n330. See supra notes 91-109 and accompanying text (discussing holding in Davis).

n331. See Cipollone v. Liggett Group, 112 S. Ct. 2608, 2628-29 (1992) (Blackmun, J., dissenting) (arguing that FDA regulations and state tort law can operate concurrently); Ausness, supra note 164, at 278 (arguing that federal regulation and state law can concurrently promote drug safety).

n332. See 42 U.S.C. 300aa-25(b)(1)(A)-(C) (1988) (setting forth vaccine reporting procedures for health care providers and vaccine manufacturers). The regulations can reduce the lack of physician-patient communication that results from the customary practice standard of informed consent. Furthermore, by providing physicians with several scenarios in which they must report to the Secretary, the regulations require doctors to consider seriously the risks of vaccination.

n333. See Incollingo v. Ewing, 282 A.2d 206, 222 (Pa. 1971) (arguing that manufacturer could be negligent for medical community's disregard of warnings). By charging manufacturers with knowledge of the medical community's ability to comprehend and implement manufacturer warnings, state tort law, in addition to federal regulations, ensures that physicians will become aware of the risks of vaccination. See Burke, supra note 126, at 592 (endorsing state law requirement that manufacturers use "Dear Doctor" letters and other advertising methods to present objective view of product and combat pro-vaccine environment).

n334. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 7, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6348 (stating that rationales behind Vaccine Act were dissatisfaction with civil tort system as compensation mechanism and instability of vaccine market).

n335. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 7, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6348.

n336. See 1986 House Report, supra note 1, at 29-30, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6370-71.

n337. See Naile, supra note 36, at 695 (stating that manufacturers cannot meet state common law standards until FDA authorizes change in warning or design).

n338. See supra notes 203-10 and accompanying text (discussing role of FDA in approval of warning labels).

n339. See Naile, supra note 36 and accompanying text.

n340. 42 U.S.C. 300aa-22(b)(2) (1988).

n341. FDA labelling requirements for vaccine potency illustrate the potential dangers of presuming the adequacy of a warning when it meets FDA standards. See 21 C.F.R. 620.6(d) (1994) (requiring that labels on DTP bottles state that vaccine has potency of 12 mouse protective units per dose); Burke, supra note 126, at 577-78 (stating that not all bottles contain 12 mouse protective units per dose as suggested on FDA mandated labels). But see 21 C.F.R. 620.4(g) (stating that despite label information, FDA will approve vaccine lot containing between 8 and 36 mouse protective units per dose). A "lot" is "that quantity of uniform material identified by the manufacturer as having been thoroughly mixed in a single vessel." Id. 600.3(y).

The FDA informs manufacturers of the actual mouse protection unit level upon approval of the vaccine. See Burke, supra note 126, at 577. If compliance with FDA warning standards is presumptively adequate, the Vaccine Act allows manufacturers to knowingly run the risk of a child receiving a triple dose of the vaccine. Id. at 578.

REV_00261832

n342. The proposal imputes to manufacturers the same standard applied in other warning cases. See W. Page Keeton et al., Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts 99, at 697 (5th ed. 1984 & Supp. 1988) (explaining that standard used in warning cases is that manufacturer must know or have reason to know of danger of product for liability to attach); Naile, supra note 36, at 679 (same).

n343. Manufacturers are not completely prohibited from changing warnings after initial FDA approval. See Clarke, supra note 158, at 529 (stating that FDA allows manufacturers to propose new language by filing supplemental new drug application).

n344. This Comment's endorsement of holding manufacturers liable, when they do not petition the FDA when they have knowledge of warning inadequacy, is premised on the theory that tort law encourages product safety. See Ausness, supra note 164, at 277.

This theory does not raise the problem, addressed in Hurley v. Lederle Lab., of placing manufacturers in an inescapable bind between federal and state mandates. Hurley v. Lederle Lab., 651 F. Supp. 993, 999 (E.D. Tex. 1986), rev'd, 863 F.2d 1173 (5th Cir. 1988). Manufacturers may attempt to meet state common law requirements through the FDA mechanism of new supplemental applications.

n345. Once the FDA has rejected a manufacturer's request to improve a warning, the physical conflict preemption dilemma, where the manufacturer cannot concurrently satisfy both federal and state laws, arises. See supra notes 239-49 and accompanying text. At this point, the function of tort law as a safety promoter ceases, and there is little reason to hold manufacturers to a standard not attainable without violating federal law.

n346. See supra notes 255-67 and accompanying text (discussing Congress' decision to apply blanket comment k immunity to vaccines covered by Vaccine Act).

n347. See George H. King, Note, A Prescription for Applying Strict Liability: Not All Drugs Deserve Comment K Immunization, 21 Ariz. St. L.J. 809, 824-25 (1989) (arguing that only unavoidably unsafe drugs providing exceptional benefits warrant comment k protection).

n348. Restatement (Second) of Torts, supra note 17, 402A cmt. k.

n349. See supra notes 285-99 and accompanying text.

n350. See supra notes 286-96 and accompanying text.

n351. See Burke, supra note 126, at 570 (stating that since production of Tri-Solgen stopped in 1970s, only whole-cell DTP vaccines have been available).

n352. Kearl v. Lederle Lab., 218 Cal. Rptr. 453, 463-64 (Ct. App. 1985) (rejecting blanket approach to application of comment k immunity). Kearl establishes a three-part test for determining whether a product is "unavoidably dangerous." The Kearl test requires determining: (1) whether the product was intended to confer a high benefit; (2) whether the then-existing risk of the product was "substantial" and "unavoidable"; and (3) whether the interest in availability at the time of distribution outweighs the interest in enhanced accountability. Id. at 464.

n353. See King, supra note 347, at 826 (stating that upon discovery of existence of safer drug, manufacturers would discontinue marketing less safe drug); Moore, supra note 250, at 732 (suggesting that imposition of strict design defect liability will encourage research and development).

n354. See Moore, supra note 250, at 732 (arguing that threat of financial liability will promote increased safety efforts by manufacturers).

REV_00261833

n355. See Kearl, 218 Cal. Rptr. at 464 (incorporating weighing benefits of drug and public's interest in availability of drug into threshold test).

n356. Id.

n357. See Moore, supra note 250, at 729 (stating that beneficial drugs will continue to receive comment k protection under Kearl-like balancing test). Because the FDA currently approves only the whole-cell DTP vaccine, the DTP vaccine will qualify for "unavoidably unsafe" status.

n358. Brown v. Superior Court, 751 P.2d 470, 482 (Cal. 1988).

n359. See supra note 315 (discussing argument that strict design defect liability promotes manufacturer investment in research and development).

n360. See Brown, 751 P.2d at 482.

n361. See Kearl, 218 Cal. Rptr. at 464 (instructing that trial judge, when considering unavoidability of danger in product, should take into account "availability ... of any alternative product that would have as effectively accomplished the full intended purpose of the subject product"). Kearl announces to manufacturers that it is in their best interest to develop the equally effective alternative product rather than be presented with evidence that they are marketing an inferior and dangerous product. Id.

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews and ALR
Terms: "national childhood vaccine injury act" (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, July 4, 2001 - 2:27 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

and occur within seven days of vaccine administration. [59] Health care providers must also inform the Secretary of all incidents of contraindicating reactions listed in the manufacturer's vaccine package insert. [60]

The Vaccine Act also instructs the Secretary to develop and distribute vaccine information materials to health care providers. [61] The vaccine information materials must include explanations of: (1) the vaccine's benefits; (2) the vaccine's risks; (3) the existence of the National Vaccine Injury Compensation Program; and (4) other relevant information. [62] The Act then requires all health care providers administering vaccines to distribute the information to the legal representative of a child receiving the vaccine. [63]

Manufacturers must keep detailed records of their manufacturing process. [64] The Vaccine Act mandates recording the "manufacturing, process, testing, repooling, and reworking of each batch, lot, or other quantity of such vaccine including any significant problems encoun [*1863] tered in the production, testing, or handling of such batch, lot, or other quantity." [65] Upon discovery of a potential safety hazard involving a vaccine, a manufacturer must report the findings to the Secretary within twenty-four hours. [66] The Vaccine Act imposes both civil and criminal penalties on manufacturers for destroying, altering, falsifying, or concealing required records. [67]

III. Vaccine Act's Ban on Direct Failure to Warn Claims

As discussed in the preceding section, the Vaccine Act prohibits claims against manufacturers for failing to provide an adequate warning to the ultimate recipient of the vaccine. [68] This legislative decision directly conflicts with judicial decisions that required direct warnings at mass vaccine clinics where the vaccine is not administered by a private physician. [69] Thus, the legislation raises questions as to whether the Vaccine Act has sacrificed too many patient safety mechanisms. [70] After reviewing the learned intermediary doctrine and its exceptions, and the Vaccine Act's informational and reporting requirements, this Comment concludes that the Vaccine Act's informational and reporting requirements partially compensate for [*1864] many of the advantages lost by barring direct warning claims, namely informed consent and patient safety. [71] Given that Congress passed the Vaccine Act in response to concerns about vaccine availability and safety, [72] the decision to abolish direct warnings was a prudent compromise. [73] As the term "compromise" suggests, however, the Vaccine Act is not the ultimate protector of vaccinee safety, and future amendments should respond to this problem. [74]

A. The Learned Intermediary Doctrine

The Act's rejection of manufacturer liability for failure to provide a direct warning to the ultimate consumer amounts to a statutory adoption of the "learned intermediary doctrine." [75] First coined in 1967, [76] the learned intermediary doctrine holds that, in the case of prescription pharmaceuticals, manufacturers satisfy their duty to warn by providing an adequate warning to the treating physician. [77] The learned intermediary doctrine, therefore, serves as an important [*1865] exception to the common law rule that manufacturers must adequately warn the ultimate recipients of their products. [78]

Several policy considerations justify Congress' decision to insulate vaccine manufacturers from direct failure-to-warn liability. [79] First, the prescribing physician is in the best position to make an informed decision about the relative benefits and risks of using the drug. [80] The physician possesses knowledge of both the drug in question and the patient's medical history. [81] The physician can, taking into account the specific nature of the patient's medical history, perform an individualized balancing of the vaccine's benefits and the dangers of its use. [82]

Second, patients are not likely to possess the medical knowledge necessary to understand manufacturers' warnings. [83] Consumers with inadequate medical knowledge may ignore or misinterpret important warnings. [84] Third, direct warnings to consumers often take the form

REV_00261793

[*1866] of package inserts, [85] which unlike a doctor who is available for follow-up questions, cannot respond to all of the concerns and questions of individual consumers. [86] Fourth, prescription drug manufacturers do not always have adequate access to their ultimate consumers. [87] Because the prescription drug is not always distributed in its original packaging, the manufacturer may have difficulty relaying the warning to the ultimate consumer. [88] Finally, the learned intermediary doctrine accepts as reality that patients normally rely on their physicians to make medical decisions in the patient's best interest. [89]

B. Exceptions to the Learned Intermediary Doctrine

The learned intermediary doctrine is not without exceptions. [90] Two years after a court first coined the term "learned intermediary," the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit announced the doctrine's first exception in Davis v. Wyeth Laboratories. [91] In Davis, the plaintiff received a sabin oral polio vaccine at a mass immunization clinic sponsored by Idaho public health officials and a local medical society. [92] Within thirty days of vaccination, the plaintiff developed paralysis from the waist down. [93] Although the manufacturer provided warnings to the medical society, [94] the purchaser of the vaccines, the plaintiff did not receive a warning. [95]

When considering the scope of the duty to warn, the court in Davis began with the proposition that the learned intermediary doctrine [*1867] ordinarily governs failure to warn cases involving prescription drugs. [96] Because the decision to vaccinate is a medical determination, the manufacturer best meets its duty to warn by providing the prescribing physician with adequate information. [97] After discussing the theoretical underpinnings of the learned intermediary doctrine, however, the court in Davis distinguished vaccines dispensed by a private physician from vaccines dispensed at mass clinics. When a private physician is involved, the individualized balancing of benefits and dangers envisioned by the authors of the learned intermediary doctrine may be expected. [98] Unlike private physicians, mass immunization clinics lack a one-on-one doctor-patient relationship, and therefore, an individualized balancing of the benefits and risks of vaccination is less likely. [99] The court in Davis reasoned that the prescriptive nature of the sabin drug is a result of the vaccine's administrative nature rather than some immutable characteristic of the drug itself: "Here, however, although the drug was denominated a prescription drug, it was not dispensed as such. It was dispensed to all comers at mass clinics without an individualized balancing by a physician of the risks involved." [100]

In deciding that the learned intermediary doctrine does not apply in the mass vaccine context, the court in Davis drew an analogy to the situation where a manufacturer directly supplies a consumer with an over-the-counter nonprescription drug. [101] In such a case, the manufacturer cannot impose its own endorsement of the drug's worth on the consumer. [102] Rather, the manufacturer must provide the consumer with the necessary information to weigh the benefits and risks of the drug. [103] Moreover, when a manufacturer sells a drug to an intermediate purchaser, the manufacturer must protect the ultimate consumer's autonomy by either providing a warning to the [*1868] ultimate consumer or by contractually obligating the intermediate purchaser to provide such a warning. [104] Wyeth Laboratories, having taken an active role in establishing the mass immunization clinic, knew that the medical society was not providing warnings to the vaccinees. [105] The court therefore concluded that Wyeth had not met its duty to warn the plaintiff of the risks of the sabin vaccine. [106]

The decision in Davis highlights one potential danger of congressional adoption of the learned intermediary doctrine under the Vaccine Act. A large percentage of American children receive polio and DTP vaccines in mass immunization clinics. [107] When vaccines are dispensed at a mass immunization clinic, the vaccinee is not likely to receive the benefit of a physician's individualized risk assessment, [108] and therefore, the rationale of the learned intermediary doctrine weakens. [109] The Vaccine Act, consequently, may prevent these children and their legal representatives from properly balancing the benefits and risks of vaccination.

C. Problems with Physicians Serving as Learned Intermediaries

Mass vaccination exceptions aside, the learned intermediary doctrine poses other dangers for vaccinees in the private physician context. By not requiring direct warnings to vaccinees, the learned intermediary doctrine implicitly assumes that private physicians will undertake an individualized balancing of benefits and risks before administering the vaccine. [110] The present state of the law concerning informed consent for prescription drugs, however, does not require full disclosure by the physician. [111] As a result, physicians [*1869] may not involve vaccinees in the decisionmaking process.

1. Customary practice standard of informed consent

The informed consent doctrine imposes minimum warning duties on physicians. [112] In the case of prescription drugs, courts have generally held physicians to a "customary practice standard." [113] Under the customary practice standard, a physician is under a duty to warn only if the medical community determines that disclosure is mandated. [114] The customary practice standard does not provide an absolute warning requirement because the medical community itself governs the scope of the duty to warn. [115]

As one scholar has commented, physicians are often unwilling to warn patients of the inherent risks of prescription drug use because the physicians fear that too much informed consent may frighten the patient and cause the patient to reject treatment. [116] Plummer v. Lederle Laboratories [117] provides a good example of this phenomenon. The plaintiff, Harry Plummer, contracted polio shortly after his grand [*1870] daughter was injected with the sabin vaccine. [118] Lederle Laboratories provided the administering physician with a warning detailing the danger of individuals contracting polio upon contact with the vaccinee. [119] In a pre-trial deposition, Dr. Cohen, the administering physician, made the following comments concerning his perceived duty, as a learned intermediary, to warn the vaccinee:

My feeling ... was that there is an extremely minute percentage of people who will have the complications from the drug. I felt that, again, because I had never experienced [other practicing physicians] giving these warnings, it ... wasn't necessary for me to do it; and ... I felt ... that giving the warning ... could scare off parents from bringing children in for future vaccinations, which to me were much more important than the warning itself for the few number of people who are going to contract disease .... [120]

Plummer demonstrates how the learned intermediary doctrine may result in physicians deciding not to perform an individualized balancing of the benefits and risks of vaccination. [121] Given that the manufacturer's duty to warn extends only to the physician, and the physician's informed consent duty is governed by the community practice standard, the vaccinee may receive neither a direct warning nor a physician performed risk assessment.

2. The weakening of the learned intermediary doctrine in an environment that supports universal vaccination

The dangers precipitated by the combined effect of the learned intermediary doctrine and the community practice standard are heightened in the vaccine context. [122] The current politico-medical environment in the United States is exceedingly pro-vaccine. [123] For example, the U.S. Government strongly endorses universal childhood immunization, [124] and all fifty States mandate vaccination prior to [*1871] entry into the public school system. [125]

Such extensive federal and state support for universal vaccination may have an overpersuasive effect on physicians. Physicians, responding to government propaganda and manufacturer advertising, may become irreversibly persuaded by the value of vaccination and abandon patient-by-patient risk assessments. [126] When such overpromotion occurs, the value of manufacturer warnings to physicians becomes diluted. [127]

3. The responsibility of the manufacturer who has knowledge that its warning is not being followed

The foregoing discussion demonstrates how the pro-vaccine environment, in combination with the customary practice standard of informed consent, diminishes physicians' abilities to function as learned intermediaries. Prior to the passage of the Vaccine Act, state common law provided a mechanism for combatting a physician's inability or unwillingness to fully appreciate manufacturer warnings. [128] In Incollingo v. Ewing, [129] the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania addressed a manufacturer's failure to alter its warning in the face of evidence that the drug was being used indiscriminately. [130] The plaintiffs submitted evidence that the drug, Chloromycetin, should only be used in treating serious illnesses. [131] As the plaintiffs [*1872] brought to light, however, physicians were prescribing the drug to treat non-serious illnesses. [132] In reviewing the trial court's judgment for the plaintiff, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania affirmed a jury instruction that the manufacturer's knowledge of, and subsequent inattention to, the fact that the drug was being used indiscriminately could result in a finding of negligence: "When a required warning is retained unchanged in the face of being widely disregarded, and the supplier knows or has reason to know of such wide disregard, a jury may be permitted to find the warning insufficient." [133]

Incollingo attaches liability to a manufacturer that possesses either actual or constructive knowledge that its warning is being ignored. [134] Applying the Incollingo rationale to the vaccine context, a trier of fact might find that the manufacturer failed to take adequate steps to remedy the fact that the pro-vaccine national environment has lessened physicians' ability to serve as effective learned intermediaries. [135]

Unfortunately, Congress did not include in the Vaccine Act a tort mechanism for overcoming physicians inability to serve as learned intermediaries. [136] Congress could have achieved this end in one of two ways. It could have required physicians to warn vaccinees directly [137] or, more in keeping with the learned intermediary doctrine, Congress could have required manufacturers to neutralize the pro-vaccine environment by mandating the use of "Dear Doctor" letters, which provide additional warnings to physicians, and other forms of advertising likely to reach the medical profession. [138] Rather than requiring manufacturers to recognize environmental barriers to physician warnings, the Vaccine Act creates a presumption that warnings that comply with federal regulatory standards are adequate. [139] This presumption will likely negate the environmental [*1873] awareness charged to manufacturers by cases such as Incollingo, [140] and as a result, vaccinees may once again suffer from a lack of individualized balancing by a learned intermediary.

D. Importance of Informed Consent After Immunization

Although the duty to warn is an important component of ensuring product safety, one scholar has argued that the necessity of informed consent is nullified by the fact that all fifty States mandate vaccination prior to entry into the public school system. [141] According to this argument, Congress' endorsement of the learned intermediary doctrine will not effect the results of individualized balancing because the States have already concluded that the benefits of universal vaccination outweigh the risks. [142] As a result, in theory, Congress' decision to adopt the learned intermediary doctrine simply amounts to the discharging of useless individual risk assessments. [143]

This argument fails to recognize that informed consent plays a role in post-vaccination decisionmaking, as well as in the initial decision whether or not to vaccinate. [144] Although doctors perform a valuable role in communicating complex medical information to patients, the patient nonetheless benefits from a direct warning. After a patient receives a vaccination, a period of time exists, which is sometimes quite large, in which adverse reactions are likely to occur. [145] An informed patient is better able to recognize the signs of an adverse reaction before the reaction becomes debilitating. [146] Because the vaccinee does not reside with the physician, the [*1874] physician's knowledge of the adverse reaction does little good in the post-vaccine scenario unless the physician has communicated the warning to the vaccinee. [147] In the interest of minimizing adverse reactions, a direct-warning rule better ensures that the patient is able to evaluate signs and symptoms than does the learned intermediary doctrine as applied under the community practice standard. [148] Even though patients may not legally reject vaccination, the absence of either a direct warning or a thorough balancing by a learned intermediary still puts the vaccinee's health at risk.

REV_00261796

E. Vaccine Act's Informational and Recording Requirements

As the preceding discussion indicates, the Vaccine Act's preemption of direct failure to warn claims may actually increase the net number of vaccinees who do not receive sufficient warnings. The question thus arises whether the recording and informational requirements imposed by the Vaccine Act adequately compensate for the safety features sacrificed by eliminating direct failure to warn causes of action.

1. Vaccine informational materials

Concerning direct warnings for vaccinees, the Act requires that the Secretary furnish health care providers with vaccine information. [149] This information must discuss the benefits of the vaccine, the potential risks of the vaccine, the existence of the National Vaccine Injury Compensation Program, and other relevant information. [150] Health care providers are then required to distribute the information to the legal representative of the vaccinees. [151]

The vaccine information required by the Vaccine Act has a number of advantages. It allows the vaccinee or the vaccinee's legal representative to take an active role in the decision whether to vaccinate. [152] [*1875] As discussed earlier, one of the policy considerations underlying the learned intermediary doctrine is that vaccinees often do not have the requisite medical knowledge to understand direct warnings. [153] Now, however, the vaccine information creates a framework for performing a risk-benefit analysis and thus permits the vaccinee to participate in the ultimate decision. In addition, by requiring physicians to provide vaccinees with written information, the Vaccine Act serves, in part, to objectify the pro-vaccine environment. The written information removes some of the discretion formerly allocated to the physician under the customary practice standard of informed consent. [154]

2. Health care provider recording requirements

In addition to the Vaccine Act's mandate that physicians provide vaccinees with reliable information, the Act requires that physicians engage in certain recording practices with respect to the administration of vaccinations. [155] By requiring physicians to report certain recognizable events following vaccination, the Vaccine Act serves to combat the lack of individualized balancing by physicians that has occurred as a result of the excessively pro-vaccine environment. [156] [*1876] Pursuant to the recording requirements, even if a physician should forego an initial risk-benefit analysis, she is required to report adverse reactions and contraindications. [157]

The reporting scheme may play a significant role in reducing DTP-related adverse reactions. Because the DTP vaccine is given in three installments, the reporting requirements may encourage physicians to either eliminate or delay the second and third doses when a potential problem manifests itself. The health care provider recording mandates, therefore, may help reestablish the individualized physician balancing that the authors of the learned

REV_00261797

Peter Huber < PRA 6
05/11/2001 09:45:21 AM

Record Type: Record

To: Courtney S. Elwood/WHO/EOP

cc:
Subject: RE: Tort Reform

Hi Courtney, Good to hear from you, and I hope all is well with you in the seat of power.

George Priest at Yale is worth hearing from, and he knows everyone else, I'd definitely start with him. All the rest of the names that follow are simply dredged out of deep memory banks, and I'm sure George can give you a much better list.

Richard Epstein at Chicago is brilliant on this, as on everything, but the trouble with Richard is that he talks infinitely fast, and also forever, which can be frustrating for practical people who are trying to get things done. Lester Brickman (Cardozo? Somewhere in New York, anyway) is another academic who has had some quite creative ideas over the years, but he's another somewhat strange duck, like the rest of us in the tort movement I suppose. Mike McConnell used to be involved too, but I gather you want to make him a judge, so it may be too late to get him to say anything useful. David Bernstein is at George Mason - I coedited a book with him some years ago (Phantom Risk) and he has continued to write about rules of evidence, he's a nice guy, but rather a plodder, and by no means entertaining in front of an audience, but he too might have additional contacts.

As for me, though perfectly willing and pleased to come in and chat, I'm really not in the thick of this debate at all any more. My most recent involvement has been with junk science and rules of evidence - and even that stuff is now very dated, I just haven't kept pace with more recent developments.

I'll leave you with one annoyingly small thought that I've been floating for almost a decade, though with very limited success. Big tort reform, embodied in a "tort bill" seems almost impossible - the politics always shake out against you. So I've long believed that the real reforms would come interstitially, through small clauses inserted into dozens of other laws - clauses limiting liability in specific situations, facilitating recoupment and subrogation to eviscerate the scandal of double dipping (victims being paid twice, through first-party insurance, often federal insurance, and then again through third-party liability insurance by way of the tort system), etc. The objective should be to add a tort limiting clause to every Peace Corps bill, student aid bill, crime bill, etc. Ending with dozens and dozens of little picket fences of outright immunity, or limited liability, or limits on punitives, or tougher standards of scientific evidence. Thankless work, with little visible glory, but build enough of these and something good will happen over time.

Good luck
Peter

-----Original Message-----
From: Courtney_S._Elwood@who.eop.gov [mailto:Courtney_S._Elwood@who.eop.gov] Sent: Friday, May 11, 2001 8:20 AM
To: phuber@khhte.com
Cc: mwilliams@khhte.com
Subject: Tort Reform

[Marilyn, If I've sent this to the wrong e-mail address for Peter, could you forward it to him? Thanks, and I hope all is well with you.]

Peter --

I hope all is well with you. These days, I am sure that you are fully occupied with the energy issues that are consuming our Nation. I can tell you that your recent editorial in the WSJ on nuclear power was well received here at the White House, and I was peppered with questions about you and your political philosophy. Keep up the good work.

I am writing today about a different issue -- tort reform. I know that many years ago you gave tort reform a great deal of thought and wrote some interesting things. As always, you were well ahead of your time. Are you still interested in, and thinking about, the subject? And, more important, do you have any ideas for ways to reform the civil justice system that you'd be in a position to share with a group here at the White House that has been tasked with addressing the issue? We are planning to invite six to ten people in (two or three at a time) to talk to the group and to present concrete proposals for reform. Whether or not you are interested, perhaps you could share with me who you think are the best thinkers these days on the subject.

-- Courtney

July 3, 2001

TO: Viet Dinh

FROM: David Karp

SUBJECT: Rulemaking Process for Federal Rules of Procedure and Evidence

This responds to your request for a description of the rulemaking process for federal rules of procedure and evidence. The statutes governing the process appear in chapter 131 of the Judicial Code (title 28), 28 U.S.C. §§ 2071-77. The main features of the system are as follows:

The Supreme Court has the power to prescribe "general rules of practice and procedure and rules of evidence" for cases in the federal district courts and courts of appeals. 28 U.S.C. 2072.[1] As provided in 28 U.S.C. 2073, the Supreme Court is advised and assisted in the rulemaking process by the Judicial Conference and its committees. The Judicial Conference is chaired by the Chief Justice and includes the chief court of appeals judges and selected district judges from each circuit (28 U.S.C. 331). The Chief Justice appoints the members of the Judicial Conference's committees.

Several committees of the Judicial Conference exist specifically for the purpose of developing and considering changes to the federal rules of procedure and evidence. These include an Advisory Committee on Civil Rules, which is generally responsible for proposed changes in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, an Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules, which is generally responsible for proposed changes in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, an Advisory Committee on Evidence, which is generally responsible for proposed changes in the Federal Rules of Evidence, and an Advisory Committee on Appellate Rules, which is generally responsible for proposed changes in the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure.[2] Above the advisory committees, there is a Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure. These various committees include a majority membership of judges, but also include members who are practitioners or academics. As discussed below, the Department is represented on these committees.

---

[1] The process described in this memorandum relates to the generally applicable federal rules, such as the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the Federal Rules of Evidence, and the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure. The individual federal courts also have authority to issue their own local rules as provided in 28 U.S.C. 2071, 2077.

[2] Thus, changes in Fed. R. Civ. P. 11 (relating to sanctions for litigation abuse) or Fed. R. Civ. P. 26 et seq. (relating to discovery) would be within the jurisdiction of the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules. Changes in Fed. R. Evid. 702 (relating to expert witnesses, including standards for scientific testimony) would be within the jurisdiction of the Advisory Committee on Evidence.

Under the normal operation of the process, changes in the federal rules are considered in the first instance by the appropriate advisory committee. With the approval of the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure, an advisory committee will publish a proposed rules change for public comment. In addition to regularly receiving written comments concerning proposed rules changes, the advisory committees sometimes hold hearings, if members of the public wish to be heard directly.

Following the receipt of public comment, an advisory committee may forward a proposed rules change to the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure. If the Standing Committee approves the change, it forwards the proposal to the Judicial Conference. If the Judicial Conference agrees, it forwards the proposal to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court then decides whether to promulgate the change. Rules changes issued by the Supreme Court must be submitted to Congress for a review period of at least seven months, and must be submitted for such review no later than May 1 of the year in which they are to take effect, as provided in 28 U.S.C. 2074. Rules promulgated by the Court go into effect following the conclusion of the Congressional review period, unless Congress disapproves or modifies them by the enactment of legislation. As a practical matter, adoption of a rules change through the rulemaking process – from initial consideration by an advisory committee through the Congressional review period and effectiveness – typically takes about three years.

The Department has representation on the various advisory committees and the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference. Traditionally, the Department is represented on the Standing Committee by the Deputy Attorney General (or designee); on the Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules and on the Advisory Committee on Evidence by the Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division (or designee – currently Roger Pauley); on the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules by the Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Division (or designee); and on the Advisory Committee on Appellate Rules by the Solicitor General (or designee).

While OLP has not directly represented the Department on these committees, it has until recently chaired a civil rules working group – including members from the Associate Attorney General's office, the Civil Division, the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys, Environment, Tax, Antitrust, and Civil Rights – that helped to formulate the Department's positions on changes in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. OLP has also been involved in the Department's work on changes in other rules, and originated a number of proposed rules changes which were eventually adopted through the rulemaking process or legislation – e.g., Fed. R. Crim. P. 32(c)(3)(E) (victims' right of allocution in sentencing); Fed. R. Evid. 413-15 (relating to similar crimes evidence in sex offense cases); Fed. R. Evid. 404(a)(1) (in part) (allowing negative character evidence concerning defendant where defendant attacks victim's character).

The Supreme Court's authority to issue rules of procedure and evidence, and the related advisory apparatus through the Judicial Conference and its committees, involve the exercise of delegated legislative power. Constitutionally, Congress has the ultimate authority over the rules of procedure and evidence in the federal courts. Congress may disapprove or modify rules proposed or adopted by the Supreme Court, and may affirmatively adopt rules of procedure and evidence. For example, the Federal Rules of Evidence as a whole were initially enacted by Congress through legislation in 1975, after Congress held up and substantially modified the Rules of Evidence as the Supreme Court had proposed them a few years earlier. Examples of individual rules that were enacted through legislation, rather than the rulemaking process, include Fed. R. Evid. 412 (rape victim shield rule) and Fed. R. Evid. 413-15 (relating to similar crimes evidence in sex offense cases).

7 U.S. 267, *; 1806 U.S. LEXIS 331, **;
2 L. Ed. 435; 3 Cranch 267

LEXSEE 7 U.S. 267

STRAWBRIDGE ET AL. v. CURTISS ET AL.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

7 U.S. 267; 1806 U.S. LEXIS 331; 2 L. Ed. 435; 3 Cranch 267

FEBRUARY, 1806 TERM

PRIOR HISTORY:
[1]

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the circuit court, for the district of Massachusetts, which dismissed the complainants' bill in chancery, for want of jurisdiction.

Some of the complainants were alleged to be citizens of the state of Massachusetts. The defendants were also stated to be citizens of the same state, excepting Curtiess, who was averred to be a citizen of the state of Vermont, and upon whom the subpaena was served in that state.

LEXIS HEADNOTES - Classified to U.S. Digest Lawyers' Edition:
If there be two or more joint plaintiffs, and two or more joint defendants, each of the plaintiffs must be capable of suing each of the defendants, in the courts of the United States, in order to support the jurisdiction.

SYLLABUS:

REPORTER'S NOTES

If there be two or more joint plaintiffs, and two or more joint defendants, each of the plaintiffs must be capable of suing each of the defendants, in the courts of the United States, in order to support the jurisdiction.

COUNSEL:

The question of jurisdiction was submitted to the court without argument by P. B. Key, for the appellants, and Harper, for the appellees.

On a subsequent day,

OPINIONBY:
MARSHALL

OPINION:

[*267] MARSHALL, Ch. J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court has considered this case, and is of opinion that the jurisdiction cannot be supported.

The words of the act of congress are, "where an alien is a party; or the suit is between a citizen of a state where the suit is brought, and a citizen [2] of another state."

The court understands these expressions to mean that each distinct interest should be represented by persons, all of whom are entitled to sue, or may be sued, in the federal courts. That is, that where the interest is joint, each of the persons concerned in that interest must be competent to sue, or liable to be sued, in those courts.

But the court does not mean to give an opinion in the case where several parties represent several distinct interests, [*268] and some of those parties are, and others are not, competent to sue, or liable to be sued, in the courts of the United States.

Decree affirmed.

REV_00261840

Courtney

REV_00261842

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

[Tort Reform Articles] [1]

OA/NARA#: 1646/1514
9597

Box 58
Folder 14

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "mass torts" and consolidation and uniform and judge and court and date(aft 1997) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*1998 Det. C.L. Rev. 7, **

Copyright (c) 1998 Detroit College of Law at Michigan State University Law Review
Detroit College of Law at Michigan State University Law Review

Spring, 1998

1998 Det. C.L. Rev. 7

LENGTH: 32005 words

ARTICLE: AFTER AMCHEM AND AHEARN: THE RISE OF BANKRUPTCY OVER THE CLASS ACTION OPTION FOR RESOLVING MASS TORTS ON A NATIONWIDE BASIS, AND THE FALL OF FINALITY?

Greg M. Zipes *

* B.A., Stanford University; J.D., University of California, Los Angeles. The author practices commercial and bankruptcy law for Curtis, Mallet-Prevost, Colt & Mosle in New York City. I thank my colleagues at Curtis for their support, my wife Leila Rachlin for her encouragement and suggestions, and Mary Santillon and Sheila Doherty for their assistance in creating the final product. I also thank the members and staff of the Review and especially Kristen Sorrell for her help.

SUMMARY:
... Congress has offered few concrete solutions, and judges and attorneys have responded out of perceived necessity by devising a variety of methods for resolving mass torts, including the increasingly creative use of class actions and bankruptcy options. ... This section describes events leading up to Amchem and Ahearn, and concludes that the Supreme Court has, at least temporarily, reined in liberal readings of the requirements for class action certification to justify its use in mass tort litigation. ... Not surprisingly, parties tend to litigate mass tort cases with devices within the adversary system that are themselves less traditional and which provide some ability to deal with large groups of similarly situated parties: the class action, with a judicious use of case consolidation techniques, and the bankruptcy system. ... In sustaining the circuit court's decision in Amchem (and at the same time remanding Ahearn), the Supreme Court dealt a serious blow to the use of class actions in the mass tort context. ... A. Bankruptcy's Underpinnings of Collectivization of Claims and Debtor Rehabilitation: A Natural Advantage in Resolving Mass Tort Issues ... Far from assuming that each creditor will direct its own action against the debtor, bankruptcy assumes that the average creditor will not get involved at all. ... A different outcome in Amchem might have led to finality for companies with mass tort problems: future claimants would have been bound by the settlement. ...

TEXT:
[*8]

Introduction

Mass torts, such as those arising from asbestos or silicon implants, present the legal system with caldrons of sticky, bubbly and ill-smelling troubles. While different types of mass torts future claimants would want back-end opt out rights to keep pace with changing science and medicine, not to mention the possibility that the settlement might prove insufficient to pay their claim.

REV_00261843

The circuit court concluded that a settlement with only one broadly defined class was a recipe for abuse: competent, diligent, and loyal representation of the entire class would not result when defendants had the opportunity to essentially select one or several plaintiffs' lawyers to represent the class. [93] Defendants' ability to select plaintiffs' lawyers in this manner might set up a "reverse auction" so worrisome to some commentators, in which defendants seek to identify the plaintiffs' lawyer who will submit the lowest plausible settlement offer on behalf of the plaintiff class in exchange for the promise of a hefty fee. [94] In other words, the defendants would have the opportunity to select those attorneys who will sue them. The court concluded that incentives involved may overwhelm the judgment of otherwise highly ethical lawyers. [95]

The Ahearn circuit court took a different approach with conflicts of interests, largely dismissing the concerns of the Amchem court. [96] The court, in a lengthy analysis, addressed, and rejected, the argument that the class counsel had impermissible conflicts due to concurrent representation of both present asbestos claimants and the class of future claimants, and concerns about purported conflicts within the future class. [97] Its approach was freewheeling: a class might consist of widely disparate groups, united only in their overall desire to see a case settle. However, this was not the important part of the analysis. The court placed a much greater emphasis on the process employed by the attorneys, asking if there was vigorous negotiation which would allay concerns over possible collusion. [98] The circuit court ultimately held that there was. [99] [*30]

In the absence of the Amchem Supreme Court decision, this second approach might have gained wide acceptance. It was a logical extension to prior mass tort cases, which were increasingly certifying classes that permitted attorneys to represent ever larger numbers of disparate members. The Ahearn court opened the door to a further loosening of the standards with respect to representation, as a more traditional conflict review was replaced by an analysis of whether vigorous and arms length negotiations took place between attorneys as aided by an activist judge and various experts. [100] More generally, its approach challenged the traditional assumption of the adversary system about the rights of parties to represent themselves or at least, in the class action, to be represented by similarly situated parties. It is evident as well that the Amchem circuit court was unwilling to view mass tort litigation as requiring a radical change from accepted adversary principles of individual autonomy and a generally passive, neutral judge. The Ahearn court, in contrast, proved more willing to accept the role of a court as a guardian and advocate in the process.

2. The Problem of Commonality and Typicality

The Ahearn and Amchem circuit courts also took a different approach to commonality and typicality. Many times, a class action involves determinations of when defendants or plaintiffs gained knowledge of the problem, what information defendants withheld from the public, and what they represented in product instructions. Also, punitive damage standards vary in the fifty jurisdictions, ranging from gross negligence to various levels of willfulness and wantonness. These questions are not entirely common to everyone in the class, but at the same time also may not be a sufficient reason to disassemble a class.

Typicality is a related problem. The argument can be made that no plaintiff could be typical of the numerous types of people who might have claims in a mass tort context. With settlement class actions especially, [101] the [*31] question arises as a mirror image to the adequacy of representation debate: whether "typicality" or "commonality" can be found by simply stating that all members in the class are united if they have an interest in working together to obtain the best possible result.

With the Amchem circuit court case, the court answered the question in the negative, finding the foregoing questions precluded a finding of commonality and typicality. There were simply too many disparate questions undermining class cohesion in that case. [102]

The Ahearn court disagreed with the Amchem analysis. The Ahearn court was satisfied with the settlement provision reached by the parties, which provided that if a shortfall occurred in any year, payments during that year were prioritized so that the sickest claimants were paid first.

This is in stark contrast to the Amchem case where the settlement attempted to award damages to class members based on the severity of their injuries alone . . . . We would likely agree with the [Amchem Court] that a class action requesting individual damages for members of a global class of asbestos claimants would not satisfy the typicality requirements due to the huge number of individuals and their varying medical expenses, smoking histories, and family situations. In Ahearn, only commonly held questions regarding insurance coverage for the class' injuries and establishment of an equitable distribution process to insure that all class members receive compensation were decided. As a result, this settlement is unaffected by the typicality and commonality problems cited in [the Amchem Court decision]. [103]

The Ahearn approach in particular drew criticism in the academic literature. Parties, and particularly defendants, could take advantage. Rather than resist class action certification, defendants might change their tactics and begin to seek provisional certification because they discovered this technique could assure low cost settlements as they found plaintiffs' attorneys willing to accept lower settlements in exchange for generous fees. [104] Once again, the Ahearn court's response to such assertions was that vigorous negotiation and review by the court could cure these concerns. The Ahearn court's approach [*32] made the court, which went so far as to meet the parties late at night, [105] a prime player in negotiations, and its review of the process in reaching the settlement, presumably under Rule 23(e), in effect cured any shortcoming in satisfying the other elements of certification.

3. The Problem of Judiciability of Future Claims in the Class Action and the Use of Settlement Class Actions

A further issue with class actions is how to bind future claimants, or parties who are not even certain whether they are, or will be, claimants, and whether Article III limits the people who can be in a class. [106] With long latency periods, the point at which a "future claims" class action is certified and the settlement approved may be decades before a class member discovers that he or she is ill. The question becomes how to represent this person. Judicial responses have varied, revealing uncertainty about the propriety of certifying future members in class actions. [107]

Notwithstanding the injunction against the inclusion of future claimants in the notes to Federal Rule 23, future claimants in fact were certified early in the rule's history. [108] One commentator has suggested that standing of future claimants should be limited to those circumstances in which (1) class members are likely to be aware of their injuries at the time of certification (such as in the defective heart valve or breast implant cases) and (2) the class representatives include present and future claimants so that at least some class members are in a position to monitor the adequacy of their attorneys' representation. [109] Another approach is to permit an opt-out of future claimants [*33] to avoid due process issues. [110] That having been noted, both the Ahearn and Amchem circuit courts seemed to permit certification of future claimants in class actions. [111] It is interesting, however, that the courts have acted in the absence of a strict statutory mandate, and this reflects a recognition that courts believe they have no other choice than to certify future claimants, shunting aside Article III judiciability issues because of the perceived absence of alternatives in the mass tort context. As described below, the Supreme Court in Amchem did not decide the appropriateness of future claimants in a class, and so the issue is not decided.

REV_00261853

Along the same lines, settlement class actions became accepted practice before the Ahearn decision. These class actions are pre-negotiated, and generally the parties have no intention of litigating. [112] The Amchem circuit court found grave difficulties with settlement class actions, arguing that an absence of a vigorous clash of adversaries raised significant questions. [113] Once again, the Fifth Circuit found the problem of a lack of an adversarial [*34] posture between the parties could be resolved through vigorous good faith negotiations. [114]

G. The Amchem Supreme Court Case

In 1997, a divided Supreme Court rendered its eagerly anticipated decision in Amchem Products, Inc. v. Windsor. [115] In sustaining the circuit court's decision in Amchem (and at the same time remanding Ahearn), the Supreme Court dealt a serious blow to the use of class actions in the mass tort context. The Supreme Court focused on certification issues, agreeing with the circuit court that "class certification issues are dispositive." [116] The Supreme Court therefore found it unnecessary to address any Article III issues. [117]

The Court made clear that all the elements of Rule 23(a) and (b) must be considered in a settlement class action; they cannot be lumped together in some kind of "gestalt" settlement. [118] Subdivisions (a) and (b) focus court attention on whether a proposed class has sufficient unity so that absent members can fairly be bound by decisions of class representatives. That dominant concern persists when a settlement class action is proposed by parties with no intention to litigate. The Court agreed with the Amchem circuit court's assessment that it is not sufficient to rely on the class members' claimed shared interest in the fairness of settlement or desire to be quickly compensated. The class action court must therefore dig deeper and find other bases to meet all the requirements of Rule 23(a), examining each element carefully. [119]

In spite of its more general language regarding class action certification, the Supreme Court in the end only examined the adequacy requirement of 23(a)(4) and the predominance requirements of 23(b)(3). For example, with respect to the adequacy of representation, the Court again agreed with the Third Circuit, holding that the "sprawling class" prevented adequate representation. [120] There were simply too many issues, such as time of exposure, length of exposure, and disparate state law, to permit representation by one set of attorneys. The Supreme Court agreed with the assessment of the case by the Third Circuit that "each plaintiff [in an action involving claims [*35] for personal injury and death] has a significant interest in individually controlling the prosecution of [his case]; each has a substantial stake in making individual decisions on whether and when to settle." [121]

While the Court did not approve this particular settlement class action, the Court did not preclude its use in other instances. Indeed, in the case of a proposed settlement, a district court need not inquire whether the case, if tried, would present intractable management problems . . . for the proposal is that there be no trial. But other specifications of the rule-those designed to protect absentees by blocking unwarranted or overbroad class definitions-demand undiluted, even heightened, attention in the settlement context. Such attention is of vital importance, for a court asked to certify a settlement class will lack the opportunity, present when a case is litigated, to adjust the class, informed by the proceedings as they unfold. [122]

The Court criticized overly aggressive court involvement in the process, finding that if a nebulous general fairness inquiry under Rule 23(e) controlled certification, eclipsing Rule 23 (a) and (b), and permitting class designation despite the impossibility of litigation, both class counsel and court would be disarmed. [123] It indicated that the amount of each claim might make a difference, as Rule 23 is designed for parties with claims too small to litigate individually. It found that the Court of Appeals in fact did not ignore the terms of the settlement; instead, that court "homed in on settlement terms in explaining why it found the absentees' interests inadequately represented." [124] The Third Circuit's close inspection of the settlement in that regard, the Court concluded, was altogether proper. [125]

Although not directly addressed by the Court, lurking uncomfortably in the background are the ethical issues with respect to the attorneys' representation of such a large class with all of the potential intra-class conflicts. By focusing on Federal Rule 23(a)(4) and addressing the difficulties faced by the representatives of the class, the Court was able to indirectly express its disapproval of the attorneys' actions. [*36]

Without reaching Article III or constitutional issues, the Court implied that the form of notice to the settlement class presented a due process concern, stating that "we recognize the gravity of the question whether class action notice sufficient under the Constitution and Rule 23 could ever be given to legions so unselfconscious and amorphous." [126] Parties seeking to settle nationwide class actions must consider that the Supreme Court has not decided this and other constitutional issues in the mass tort context.

The dissent in the Amchem case made many of the points of the Ahearn circuit court. It noted, for example, that the size of the settlement was indeed important and relevant, as asbestos lawsuits have taken up more than six percent of the federal docket in one recent year, thereby acknowledging that the problem might be addressed in the form of a mass settlement. [127] It was more sanguine than the majority view about the procedure employed by the district court in settling the case, stating that as long as the lower court considered the benefits and draw backs of settlement, the settlement agreement can satisfy the various elements of a class action even, apparently, in the absence of vigorous adversarial relationships. [128]

H. Unanswered Questions after Amchem and Ahearn

Potentially, Amchem will have a sweeping effect on class actions. However, its scope is ultimately unclear as long as Ahearn remains pending before the Supreme Court, now for the second time in two years. For now, the Supreme Court appears to have crossed three low barriers with respect to the use of class actions, notwithstanding its failure to approve the settlement in the Amchem case. First, it acknowledged that class actions have a role in resolving mass torts, rejecting claims that Rule 23 does not provide a specific statutory basis. [129] Second, it indicated its willingness to accept settlement class actions under certain conditions, which, however, it did not explain in very much detail. [130] Third, it appears to now accept the inclusion of future claimants in class actions, again under certain hazy circumstances, rejecting claims of a lack of standing. [131] [*37]

Further, although the Supreme Court remanded the Amchem case on the grounds that the members of the class faced impermissible conflicts, at the same time it stated that the proposed class was more "sprawling" than in any other cases. [132] Accordingly, an argument can be made that the case can be limited to its rather extraordinary facts.

However, such a position is problematic, because the Supreme Court also vacated the Ahearn decision, without any explanation except a reference to its Amchem decision. [133] The Supreme Court may have intended to seek a reexamination of all various statements made by the Ahearn court regarding adequacy of counsel, commonality, typicality, and the use of a limited fund class action in lieu of bankruptcy. Taken together, Amchem and Ahearn focus on the class action's tension in resolving mass torts, caught between the adversary system's ideal of individual rights and a world in which individual rights might have to give way to group solutions.

REV_00261855

Amchem highlights the perils of a Court which seeks to inject itself into the process, active in negotiations and review of the parties' actions. Amchem also makes clear that such a court should not substitute its own assessment of the fairness of the settlement for the dictates of Rule 23, which sets forth the requirements of a class action. More generally, Amchem discourages court activism, placing less importance on the Court's role in resolving class actions. It further seems to reaffirm the primacy of individual rights in class actions, signaling that the perceived mass tort crisis does not require an extraordinary departure from the principle of court passivity and neutrality.

Finally, Amchem creates significant problems for a company that wishes to resolve all its mass tort burdens with one fell swoop. The company most likely will not be able to settle with one set of attorneys. Instead, it will need to make sure that all the various subgroups, including present and future claimants and claimants from states with differing treatment of torts, are adequately represented by separate counsel. As it may be impossible to adequately represent future claimants, the settlement will have to provide for an opt-out, [134] creating further uncertainty for companies wishing to use the class action to quantify their damages. The foregoing text must be qualified: [*38] the Supreme Court simply stated in Amchem what it would not permit, and not what it would definitely permit.

As it turns out, the Supreme Court has an opportunity to address some of these questions in more detail. Earlier this year, the Fifth Circuit reconsidered its affirmation of the Ahearn case in response to the remand by the Supreme Court. It in turn summarily reaffirmed its prior decision in a five-paragraph decision finding that "we can find nothing in the Amchem opinion that changes our prior decision." [135] The Supreme Court has accepted certiorari, but as of the date of this article's publication has not decided the case.

The Fifth Circuit's rejoinder presents the Supreme Court with the opportunity to clarify certain issues left unresolved with Amchem. Most immediately, it will decide whether the Fifth Circuit is correct in its assessment that "there are two controlling differences between this case and Amchem. First, this class action proceeded under Rule 23(b)(1), Amchem was a Rule 23(b)(3) case. Second, there was no allocation or difference in award, according to nature or severity of injury, as there was in Amchem." [136]

It is by no means certain that the Supreme Court will get past certification issues. The Fifth Circuit, for example, did not articulate an analysis of Rule 23(a)(4) in light of Amchem, which may be a significant, or perhaps the only, reason why the Supreme Court accepted certiorari.

However, if the Supreme Court agrees with the Fifth Circuit on certification issues, it will presumably turn to constitutional issues. The Supreme Court at a minimum will have to answer the following questions to ensure confidence in the use of Federal Rule 23 in resolving the use of class actions:

1. Does a settlement of a nationwide class action violate a plaintiff's due process right to trial? The nationwide settlement might be seen as an attempt to improperly impact upon substantive tort law in all fifty states, with its cap on punitive damages and restricted right to trial.

2. Does the settlement create judiciability problems for a court? The Court may address the propriety of a lawsuit in which the parties clearly lacked the intention to litigate and the defendants chose their adversaries, with whom they came to agreement.

3. Does the settlement violate the due process rights of plaintiffs who do not know they were exposed to asbestos? The Court may decide the validity of the Fifth Circuit's conclusion that this case is no different [*39] from other class action cases in which courts decide the rights of unknown parties. [137]

REV_00261856

If the Supreme Court does not answer these questions in the Ahearn decision, litigants seeking to use the class action to achieve a national settlement will always face nagging constitutional issues that might be appealed.

I. Multi-District Litigation: A Note on the Effect of Amchem and Other Recent Supreme Court Precedent

In the mass tort context, class actions often go hand in hand with the consolidation of cases by the MDL Panel. Established in reaction to a spate of filings by the United States claiming that electrical equipment manufacturers violated anti-trust laws, [138] the MDL Panel has authority to consolidate all civil actions pending in federal district courts in to a single district. The cases must involve common questions of fact and transfer must serve interests of judicial economy, fairness, and the convenience of the parties and witnesses. [139]

The statute is intended to govern pretrial procedure only. It is distinct from class actions in that it is designed to consolidate already pending cases, and only for the pretrial process. However, the influence of the statute is much broader because a vast majority of the consolidated pretrial proceedings never return to district court for trial. [140] Instead, transferee courts often use mechanisms like settlement and dismissal to dispose of the "substantive part" of the case in the mass tort context. [141] Consolidation makes settlement easier, [*40] because mass tort defendants can readily quantify the costs and benefits of settling with all potential adversaries at the same time. They might gladly exchange upfront costs of settling in order to eliminate the uncertainty of ongoing piecemeal litigation. Indeed, prior to Amchem, it was an open secret that a multidistrict transfer for pretrial proceedings almost invariably resulted in settlement of the transferred claims, without the need for trial. [142] This observation ties into the earlier point that few, if any, mass tort cases ever make it to trial.

Further, district courts to which a case had been transferred under the MDL have routinely taken the next step and assigned the cases to themselves for trial, notwithstanding the MDL's plain reference as a pre-trial device. The reason is also seemingly very logical: after using one judge to supervise the massive discovery proceedings, it makes little sense to remand each case back to separate district court judges with little or no familiarity with the complex issues at hand for the purposes of conducting a trial. Rather, it makes perfect sense to keep the cases with the judge who supervised discovery. [143] Amchem and the more recent case of Lexecon v. Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Learch [144] must negatively impact upon the use of MDL, further complicating the use of class actions in resolving mass tort issues. If it is true that a particular referral has with it an implicit goal of promoting settlement, then it should not be used in conjunction with class actions. Amchem makes this point about the limitations of the MDL indirectly, with its language that parties in cases subject to an MDL referral must be prepared to litigate. Lexecon, although a non-mass tort case, is much more explicit with this point and therefore relevant to the MDL mass tort discussion. [145]

In Lexecon, the issue was whether a district court to which a case had been transferred under the MDL for pretrial proceedings can also assign itself [*41] the case for trial. [146] In that case, Lexecon brought a diversity action in an Illinois district court against two law firms for various torts, including defamation, in connection with Lincoln Savings Bank litigation. [147] The defendant law firms requested that the case be transferred to the Arizona district court handling the Lincoln Savings Bank litigation. [148] The MDL Panel granted the motion and ordered the transfer. [149] Later, the Lincoln Savings Bank litigation settled, except for the Lexecon defamation claim. The Arizona court denied Lexecon's motion to request the MDL Panel to transfer back to the Illinois court and assigned the case to itself for trial, stating that the self-transfer was an efficient way of proceeding. [150] Trial on the action resulted in a judgment for the law firms and Lexecon appealed. [151]

After the Circuit Court affirmed, the Supreme Court reversed in a unanimous decision. [152] The Supreme Court stated that the MDL statute and legislative history are clear: cases must be remanded after the discovery stage is complete. [153] "Milberg may or may not be correct that permitting transferee courts to make self-assignments would be more desirable than preserving a plaintiff's choice of venue (to the degree that Section 1407(a) does so), but the proper venue for resolving that issue remains the floor of Congress." [154]

The Lexecon case removes any doubt that it is the Supreme Court's intent to snuff out liberal readings of statutes to address mass tort issues. Indeed, the Lexecon case represents a shift by at least part of the Court: the dissenters in Amchem, who were willing to accept an efficiency argument even in the face of an arguably clear note to Rule 23, switched their point of view and now require a more literal reading of statutes. Interestingly, Justice Breyer, who dissented in Amchem, cited Amchem with approval for this proposition. [155] Parties cannot take liberties with interpretations of statutes for the sake of efficiency, but what are they supposed to do? Perhaps the bankruptcy option will become more attractive to mass tort defendants. [*42]

II. The Bankruptcy System and Its Use in Resolving Mass Torts

The bankruptcy system has been described as follows: "It is the twofold purpose of the Bankruptcy Code to convert the estate of the bankrupt into cash and distribute it among creditors and then to give the bankrupt a fresh start . . . ." [156]

Speed and finality are important in the bankruptcy process. [157] Mass torts present the bankruptcy system with tricky questions and a dilemma: how in the world can bankruptcy courts quickly and fairly resolve the claims of mass tort victims, when their injuries may not even manifest themselves for years? Although the bankruptcy system has some decent answers to this question, bankruptcy statutes at the same time are vague in critical respects. What follows is an examination of bankruptcy's natural advantages over class actions in resolving mass tort claims especially in light of Amchem, followed by a cautionary tale of how, nevertheless, bankruptcy is not at all perfect as a method for their resolution. [*43]

A. Bankruptcy's Underpinnings of Collectivization of Claims and Debtor Rehabilitation: A Natural Advantage in Resolving Mass Tort Issues

The first goal of the bankruptcy system is to efficiently collect the assets of the debtor and distribute these assets to creditors according to a priority scheme under the Bankruptcy Code. [158] After much patchwork evolution, the system has developed a collectivist approach [159] and creditors who would normally be acting separately in prosecuting their cases and collecting on judgments (and, indirectly, fighting each other for scarce resources) are thrown together to pursue assets of the debtor. Similarly situated creditors share on a pro rata basis. [160] In fact, the bankruptcy system goes so far as to retroactively promote equality among similarly situated creditors, [161] providing for the "avoidance" and "recovery" by the bankruptcy estate of certain transfers made before the bankruptcy filing which favor some unsecured creditors over others. [162] As such, bankruptcy is immediately different from the greater adversary system, with its primary focus on group, rather than individual, rights. It further differs from the adversary system because it changes the incentives for a creditor who would otherwise vigorously pursue [*44] its case and seek to recover debtor assets: Because all creditors in the same class must share equally regardless of who uncovers the funds, individual creditors have less of an incentive to take the lead in an investigation of the debtor. While the bankruptcy system has safeguards to ensure that the debtor's affairs are fully investigated and that individual creditors are protected, [163] the overall outcome is that individual rights are far less important in bankruptcy than in the greater adversary system. Far from assuming that each creditor will direct its own action against the debtor, bankruptcy assumes that the average creditor will not get involved at all.

Creditors tolerate a group approach presumably because they have concluded that it is the best way to realize some return in a bad situation. For example, accounts receivable might be uncollectible if a particular creditor acts quickly in enforcing judgment and thereby closes down the business of the debtor. Bankruptcy, with its mechanisms in place for collecting such accounts receivable and providing for an orderly payment of debts from debtor assets, is more logical. [164]

REV_00261858

Bankruptcy thereby deals with commonality and typicality issues differently from Article III courts acting under Rule 23's dictates. As the bankruptcy system seeks to provide similarly situated creditors with equal treatment, in theory at least the Bankruptcy Code assigns no distinction between future and present injuries of the same kind. It lumps this group into the same general category, as a pre-petition, unsecured debt. The paradigmatic example is of present and future judgment creditors of the debtor: an unsecured creditor who has already obtained a judgment is treated the same, under the Bankruptcy Code, as a creditor who has not yet obtained a judgment.

In exchange for submitting to bankruptcy, the debtor hopes to obtain a discharge of debts. [165] For a Chapter 7 debtor, discharge means that creditors are forever barred from collecting pre-petition debts. [166] For a reorganizing [*45] debtor filing under Chapter 11, the fresh start means that creditors cannot seek repayment of their debts as long as the debtor makes its payments pursuant to a confirmed plan. [167] The concept of discharge is a long established one [168] and is derived from the desire to restore to the debtor some measure of confidence in its capacity to control its future.

The law favors the granting of a discharge to an honest debtor and does not second guess a discharge if later the debtor's financial affairs are rectified, and the debtor is in a position to repay its debts. Reopening a bankruptcy case would explicitly threaten the Code's goal of debtor rehabilitation. [169] The debtor, then, has strong arguments that a confirmed plan should not be modified. Plans may be modified to take into account changes in a company's circumstances, or misjudgments by the courts, but the standard for modification is extremely hard to meet. [170] The modification of a debtor's Chapter 11 plan also affects creditors and thus threatens the Code's goal of fairness among creditors. Pre-petition secured creditors, trade creditors, and shareholders may justifiably oppose a modification of a plan in many cases because of the financial uncertainty that modification may bring to the debtor, which lessens their own chances for repayment under the plan.

In theory, the principles of speed and finality combine to provide a solution to the riddle of mass torts. Once a plan is proposed and approved, creditors are hard-pressed to complain that the settlement should be revisited should it become apparent that the debtor company in fact has assets to satisfy more of its pre-petition debts. Further, there is no ability of a creditor to "opt-out" of a plan. Such a result would violate the principle of a fresh start. Bankruptcy as a structural matter imposes mass tort solutions as a result of its efforts to rehabilitate the debtor. In sum, individuals have far less control of [*46] their destinies in bankruptcy, with its emphasis on group solutions. The fight still taking place in the case of class actions of group rights versus individual autonomy has been decisively won in the bankruptcy realm in favor of group rights.

B. The Expansive Definition of a Claim: Bankruptcy's Ability to Quantify Contingent Liabilities

Since finality is important, Congress elected to give an expansive definition to the word "claim." [171] The more expansive the definition, the more debts that can get discharged after treatment under a plan and the more complete the debtor's rehabilitation.

Under the Bankruptcy Code, the court is capable of estimating and reducing almost any claim to a dollar amount, no matter how speculative or tied to injunctive relief. [172] Likewise, a court may estimate an injury that might ordinarily be subject to a remedy of specific performance. [173] [*47]

REV_00261859

Likewise, a pre-petition cause of action is a pre-petition claim, regardless of whether it sounds in tort, breach of warranty, or contract. [174] Even with unliquidated, contingent, unmatured, and/or disputed obligations, courts have readily reduced the claim to a dollar and concluded that the obligation is classified as a pre-petition claim. [175] An obligation based on a guarantee on which there has been no pre-petition default, an obligation to pay taxes that the Internal Revenue Service has not yet assessed, and future obligations to pay on a settlement agreement are all claims that have been held to be pre-petition claims without much dissent. At the other end of the spectrum are cases in which a party has not yet even encountered a debtor's product, but still wishes to file a claim in bankruptcy. Courts may find that a party's claim is too speculative to be acknowledged as a claim in bankruptcy. [176]

The Bankruptcy Code does not identify a method or procedure to be used by a bankruptcy court to estimate contingent or unliquidated claims. [177] Bankruptcy courts have improvised, guided only by the requirement that substantive state law govern the ultimate value of the claim. [178]

Accordingly, bankruptcy appears, at first glance, to solve the "sprawling class" problem identified in Amchem very neatly: put simply, sprawling creditor classes are permitted in bankruptcy as long as the claimants are similarly situated. Further, as bankruptcy is not an Article III forum, it need [*48] not get involved with tricky issues of judiciability of a future claim. Instead, in a robotic manner to speed the debtor to a discharge, bankruptcy courts can and do reduce claims. A coherent federal statutory process is in place for disposing of all claims, past, present and future, whether contingent or not, and that process is the bankruptcy process. [179]

C. Bankruptcy and Its Ability to Modify State Law Under Certain Conditions

As set forth above, the Amchem Court had great difficulty with the use of class actions in resolving mass tort issues because of a lack of authority under Rule 23 to alter state law personal injury or punitive damage provisions. Bankruptcy does not suffer in the same way, as it may utilize several provisions to paper over troubling state law. First, a nationwide consolidation of personal injury cases is specifically sanctioned under the Bankruptcy Code. [180] Accordingly, a district court's reluctance to consolidate personal injury actions from different states in a single class is simply not an issue in the bankruptcy context. [*49]

Second, the Bankruptcy Code provides a neat statutory method for dealing with potentially deal breaking claimants, permitting the cramdown of a plan upon a class that might have greater rights under state law. [181] The cramdown provides specific authority to ignore the state court rights certain creditors as long as certain conditions are met. In return, the Bankruptcy Code provides at least theoretical procedural protection to those parties who are facing a cramdown. These parties are entitled to vote and intervene prior to the vote. In contrast, class actions do not provide specific authority for overriding a particular constituency's state law rights.

Third, the Bankruptcy Code explicitly subordinates punitive damages, thereby overruling substantive state law. [182] Bankruptcy can avoid the manifold issues arising from parties from different states claiming a right to punitive damages when there is a limited pool of assets. In contrast, courts attempting to settle class actions must struggle with a lack of statutory authority for overriding state law. Accordingly, although members of a class in bankruptcy must be "substantially similar," [183] the problem of a dissenting class can be solved with a cramdown or subordination.

Bankruptcy, therefore, provides a statutory solution which class actions cannot. The Dalkan Shield district court was reversed because the circuit court could find no basis for the district court's position in subordinating punitive damages. [184] If the case had been in bankruptcy, it is very possible, with the cramdown and subordination provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, that the outcome could have been statutorily defended. With the Amchem

REV_00261860

Supreme Court decision, the Dalkan Shield circuit court has been vindicated as it is clear that a general fairness argument should not be made to justify certification of a class in the Rule 23 context, and it appears that bankruptcy provides the only remedy, at the moment, if punitive damages are to be subordinated. [*50]

D. Bankruptcy's Paradox: The Debtor Need Not Be Insolvent to Gain the Finality of a Discharge

Companies which are not insolvent may nevertheless take advantage of bankruptcy. When Congress enacted the 1978 Bankruptcy Code, the requirement of insolvency as a pre-condition to filing a petition under any chapter of Title 11 was removed. [185] Solvent debtors can file petitions so long as they are willing to subject their assets to administration under the bankruptcy laws. A debtor's ability to repay debts in whole or in part is not adequate cause for dismissal of a case under the Bankruptcy Code. [186] Until a debtor proposes a plan, it is too speculative to conclude that reorganization is not in the best interests of the debtor and debtor's creditors simply because the debtor is solvent. Further, if a debtor is able to fully recover after confirmation of a plan, perhaps becoming wildly successful, it has no duty to pay pre-petition creditors. Interestingly, the bankruptcy cases that have spawned the most mass tort case law were filed by corporations that arguably are not insolvent. Attorneys saw the use of bankruptcy as an opportunity to resolve specific problems. [187]

In theory, therefore, a debtor corporation could gain its coveted discharge of mass tort liability in bankruptcy, permitting it to finally quantify its losses regardless of its actual insolvency. Bankruptcy, in theory, is a good option for an otherwise healthy company that faces a mass tort problem.

E. Bankruptcy's Ability to Deal with Conflicts of Interest: Avoiding Amchem's Uncomfortable Questions

Courts have barely begun to puzzle through attorney conflict of interest issues for nationwide settlements in the class action context. In distinct contrast, the bankruptcy system has well developed conflict of interest rules, for reasons that have nothing to do with mass torts. Rather, the bankruptcy system is cost conscious in a way that the general adversary system is not. There is also concern about protecting what is left of an often meager estate, [*51] lest over-reaching attorneys or other professionals drain it of wealth which by right should inure to the benefit of unsecured creditors. [188]

As a result of these and other concerns, prior court approval of counsel and other professionals by the debtor in possession of a Chapter 11 case or a trustee in a Chapter 7 case is necessary. Professionals must file an application with the court for an order approving their retention. In this application, the professionals must disclose all potential material conflicts and demonstrate their disinterestedness. [189] Also, as the attorneys must describe the scope of their anticipated services, including some time estimates, the court may later hold them to a more limited fee if the attorneys exceed the scope of their advertised services. Attorney behavior is therefore regulated from the start. Courts have held that they may examine the bankruptcy capabilities of the attorneys seeking retention and deny retention if they believe that the attorneys do not have the qualifications to perform bankruptcy work, regardless of the attorneys' proven abilities in other fields. [190]

Court supervision continues throughout the case because bankruptcy cases necessarily create numerous conflicts of interest. "The difficulty here is that alliances shift in the middle of the case, depending on the issues. Creditors may be allied against the debtor in, say, trying to bring the debtor to heel. But creditors and the debtor may be allied with each other in trying to maximize the return from the estate. As if this weren't complicated enough, the Bankruptcy Code goes even further. That is, at one point the Bankruptcy Code permits one person to occupy a dual role." [191] [*52]

REV_00261861

present different challenges to the legal system, they all share the common denominators of great expense, long delays and a review of innumerable, similar claims. [1] Congress has offered few concrete solutions, and judges and attorneys have responded out of perceived necessity by devising a variety of methods for resolving mass torts, including the increasingly creative use of class actions and bankruptcy options.

In the highly publicized case of Amchem Products, Inc. v. Windsor, [2] the Supreme Court struck down an imaginative use of class actions in the mass tort context, which will no doubt impact on approaches for resolving such [*9] claims. With Amchem, the Supreme Court expressed concern, among other things, about the perceived conflicts of interests in a "sprawling class," [3] and also the general lack of a coherent statutory basis for the use of class actions in resolving mass tort claims. [4] The Supreme Court's solution would be to implement a national legislative system to deal with the asbestos problem, [5] an idea that is not at all original and no more popular or practical now than when it was first proposed. [6] [*10]

Ironically, in the face of a demonstrated lack of resolve by Congress, non-Article III bankruptcy courts may become more prominent in the mass tort arena by default. The bankruptcy system at first glance does seem to be a perfect forum for resolving mass tort issues. The Bankruptcy Code provides a statutory basis for resolving large numbers of claims, thereby addressing a specific concern of the Supreme Court, and contains elaborate safeguards against conflicts of interests. [7] Furthermore, the Bankruptcy Code, through its priority system and by shifting debtor's resources from equity holders to other creditors in a plan of reorganization, appropriately penalizes those who take the risk in investing in a company. [8] In contrast, class actions usually do no such thing: they set aside limited funds for the payment of class action claims, while the company and its shareholders escape potentially unscathed.

However, the bankruptcy solution is itself problematic. First, the bankruptcy system, while facially sufficient for resolving large numbers of claims, in fact never before had to deal with such vexing problems as mass torts. Courts acting under the Bankruptcy Code have been forced to improvise. [9] Courts may take comfort in finding a system in place for [*11] resolving large numbers of claims, reciting Bankruptcy Code provisions like a talisman, but the reality is that bankruptcy courts are no more adept than other forums in resolving mass tort issues. Ironically, the Amchem class action was commenced exactly because of the perceived failure of the bankruptcy process in dealing effectively with mass torts. [10] Therefore, the Amchem case has the ironic effect of strengthening the role of a forum which the parties intended to avoid. Indeed, with Amchem, Article III courts have been sidelined as "inferior" bankruptcy courts are left to resolve cases involving literally billions of dollars and millions of lives. [11]

Part I of this article first describes the class action's role within the adversary system. Its growing use in resolving mass torts in the face of a lack of statutory support points to an equally obvious dearth of alternatives. This section describes events leading up to Amchem and Ahearn, and concludes that the Supreme Court has, at least temporarily, reined in liberal readings of the requirements for class action certification to justify its use in mass tort litigation. More broadly, the Supreme Court has created great doubt about the future of the use of class actions and consolidation techniques often used in conjunction with class actions in resolving mass torts which will, at the very least, make bankruptcy a more attractive option for companies facing liability.

Part II explores the bankruptcy system. For better or worse, it has definitively resolved questions that still plague class actions, with its wholly different approach to mass tort issues. It provides explicit authority for quantifying disputed, contingent or unliquidated claims, permits and legitimizes heavy court involvement in the litigation and settlement process and has flexible, but in the end, strict, conflict of interest statutes. Further, from a structural standpoint, many of the concerns expressed by the Supreme Court in Amchem

In bankruptcy, a debtor in possession must act in the best interest of the estate and its creditors. [192] As courts have noted, this duty sometimes runs against the debtor's desire for self-preservation. Courts are also necessary to monitor attorneys who wish to represent a debtor when the attorneys also represented the debtor prior to the bankruptcy filing date. Courts may also review attorney practices at the time of the fee application to ensure they have remained conflict free. [193]

Court involvement in the bankruptcy process permits a fine tuning of conflict of interest rules in a way not found in the greater adversary system. With court approval, attorneys can get out of a bankruptcy case during a temporary conflict, and then rejoin at some later date when the conflict no longer exists as long as they seek court approval. In contrast, once a conflict exists in the greater adversary system, the conflict is generally permanent. [194] [*53]

These conflict of interest rules provide the bankruptcy system with an obvious advantage over the class action. In a mass tort context, it may very well be necessary to grant flexibility to attorneys representing claimants. The issues of causation and damages are so complex that attorneys acting in good faith cannot always determine when or if they are involved in a conflict of interest. However, Amchem arguably ties attorneys' hands in the class action context. They are never sure if their representation of a large class will subject themselves to attack on appeal. In contrast, bankruptcy permits flexibility. Attorneys may rest easier with the assurance that they have obtained an order approving their retention and fees.

F. Bankruptcy Court Judges: Their Mandate to Intervene at All Stages of the Case Could Assist with Mass Tort Settlements

Bankruptcy courts possess greater power than courts in other forums to control discovery as well as other aspects of the case. They are unabashedly activist and in some cases non-neutral by design and therefore do not suffer the same stigma that activist district court judges do in class action cases. [195] This is a distinct advantage in resolving mass torts, which may require court intervention to review the negotiation process and the fairness of the settlement.

There are several reasons for bankruptcy court activism. First, as set forth above, bankruptcy judges must monitor conflicts of interest. Second, bankruptcy judges are not Article III judges. Bankruptcy judges are immediately distinguishable from other types of judges because of the considerable discretion they exercise in carrying out their duties by virtue of a statutory grant to review retention and fee applications of professionals and settlements reached between parties. [196] Indeed, bankruptcy judges proactively [*54] intervene at all stages of the proceeding in a way that is unheard of in the greater civil adversary system. [197] Bankruptcy court activism arises as a result, in part, of the bankruptcy court's roots as an administrative agency, which imbues the court with a predilection toward regulation of the participants. Prior to 1973, bankruptcy judges, then called referees, were involved in the day-to-day operations of bankruptcy cases. Their duties included, for example, organizing and scheduling meetings of creditors, setting up creditors' committees, appointing trustees, and setting trustees' fees.

The bankruptcy judge's function has been transformed. Since 1978, bankruptcy judges' roles as administrators has been largely removed by Congress. [198] In Congress' view, the lack of separation between administrative and judicial functions eroded public confidence in bankruptcy proceedings. Bankruptcy judges were seen as favoring certain trustees and they were dealing with administrative issues that "real" judges did not. This lack of separation was also a major reason for the establishment of the United States Trustee. [199] Regardless, the court's administrative roots give bankruptcy judges a historical legitimacy to intervene in cases.

REV_00261862

Third, unlike the generalist judges within the adversary system, bankruptcy judges are almost by definition experts in their field. [200] They are [*55] often chosen from the pool of bankruptcy attorneys, and, if not already proficient in the law when appointed, develop an expertise by examining the same types of cases over and over. Moreover, bankruptcy courts in different districts develop their own expertise. Attorneys representing large corporations will sometimes seek to file in the Southern District of New York or Delaware, for example, which have experience with such complex reorganizations.

Control is, to more of a degree than found in district courts, taken out of the hands of the litigants. This is because judges know the overall framework of the Bankruptcy Code and will not automatically accept an attorney's argument, which may be logical on its face, but which does not comport with the overall policy of the Bankruptcy Code. Common-law judges, in contrast, are generalists, seeing relatively few cases dealing with any given subject and having little control over their agendas. [201]

Perhaps as a result of these factors, negotiation and counseling in bankruptcy tend, much more than in general civil litigation, to take place under the supervision of the court. [202] Bankruptcy courts are also courts of equity and therefore have a further basis to intervene in situations as they deem appropriate. [203] In their decisions, courts also often justify their activist and equitable position by reciting the mantra that bankruptcy proceedings must conclude quickly. [204] In fact, bankruptcy courts have, in the name of [*56] promptly administrating the bankruptcy estate, unjustifiably assumed powers-they may only do what the Bankruptcy Code permits them to do. [205]

Once again, bankruptcy clearly provides a judge an activist role in the process. [206] In contrast, the judge presiding over a class action proceeding, as demonstrated by Amchem, does not necessarily have this institutional prerogative.

G. Bankruptcy: The Theory and Reality of Mass Tort Litigation

In theory, bankruptcy solves many of the problems still troubling class actions. It provides authority for resolving "future" claims, attaches importance to group rights, permits and legitimizes heavy court involvement, has strong conflict of interest statutes, and solves commonality problems through the "cramdown" and by other means.

Bankruptcy is, nevertheless, not a perfect forum for resolving mass tort issues. For example, as has been described above, bankruptcy ascribes a broad definition to a "claim." In fact, the circuits are divided and seem to have trouble in deciding when a "claim" arises in a limited number of recurring fact patterns including indemnification obligations, [207] liability under environmental clean-up statutes such as CERCLA, [208] and, not surprisingly, [*57] tort liability for exposure to toxic substances such as asbestos. [209] At one extreme, some courts have held that a claim arises as soon as the debtor engages in the actions that are the basis for the claim and have readily calculated future claims. [210] At the other extreme, courts have held that a claim does not arise until the creditor has a fully accrued cause of action under non-bankruptcy law. [211] The question of judiciability rears its head in bankruptcy in this context.

Further, just because a bankruptcy court decides that it can fix future claims does not mean it is out of trouble-indeed, far from it. Bankruptcy judges who undertake to estimate future claims may badly misjudge the number and types of claims. [212] This creates a definite problem of finality, which is so important to the bankruptcy process.

The Johns-Manville case illustrates the perils of mass tort claims estimation. In part, the problems with Manville's failure to anticipate future claims led to the use of class actions in Amchem and Ahearn. [213] In 1982, [*58] Manville filed a petition for relief under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, as a result of an increasing number of current and expected tort claims against it for exposure to asbestos. As part of its Chapter 11 reorganization plan,

REV_00261863

Manville created the Asbestos Health Trust in 1986 as the sole fund through which present and future victims of asbestos-related diseases could satisfy their claims. [214] The intention was to rehabilitate; quantify the claims, separate them, and permit Manville to continue in business. The trust idea ran afoul of the bankruptcy priority scheme, which returns equity to share holders only when the other creditors have been paid. Nevertheless, it was deemed the only practical solution at the time. Such trusts have since been recognized as valid by Congress. [215] The trust soon ran out of money and the parties puzzled over how to resolve the dilemma.

In a sense, the bankruptcy presumption of plan finality prevailed, as the plan was not modified. However, the solution had the same effect. Judge Weinstein approved a class action settlement that revised rights with regard to the trust created to handle claims against Manville Corporation for personal injury due to exposure to asbestos. [216]

Judge Weinstein justified an increase to the trust assets through his power to "act equitably to protect all those claimants against the trust who were injured by Manville asbestos." [217] This language sounds suspiciously like the general equitable arguments rejected by the Supreme Court in Amchem. Judge Weinstein stated that he could wholly rely upon New York substantive law without looking to stretch the intent of Rule 23 at all, [218] finding that "no statute or decision [of New York law] limits the courts' equity powers to interpret New York substantive trust law. Acting under New York state law, the federal courts must protect the rights of trust beneficiaries." [219] The court thereby found a statutory hook to justify a settlement that allowed for the additional funding. [220] [*59]

Interestingly, the problems that arose in the Manville case regarding a shortfall in the trust as set up under the plan were completely predictable. From the start, the parties readily acknowledged that the trust fund would be insufficient to pay all claimants, but they saw no alternative and so proceeded headlong. [221]

This improvisation can be seen in other mass tort cases as bankruptcy courts grapple with liability issues. In denying a motion for estimation and the debtor's motion for the appointment of a panel of experts to assist in the liquidation of claims, the Dow Corning court exhorted the parties as follows:

The task of achieving a fair distribution of assets in the mass tort setting is onerous and profound. And of course, criticizing flawed approaches to an incredibly difficult problem is easy. The hard part is coming up with a better model . . . the Court has encouraged the parties to think creatively, to search the academic literature for new ideas and to not be afraid to try them. We again encourage the parties to try something new and better. [222]

If bankruptcy attorneys are required to "think creatively" and "search academic literature for new ideas" to resolve their mass tort issues, this appears to preclude bankruptcy as a means for resolving mass torts in light of the Supreme Court's teaching in Amchem that the floor of Congress, and not the courts, should be the place where new methods are proposed. However, such a conclusion would be too sweeping. As argued above, bankruptcy does have established procedures which can be used to resolve mass torts (ability to handle a large number of claims, activist judges, etc.). This dramatic call to action ignores the substantial basis for justifying mass tort solutions in the bankruptcy context.

It is necessary to acknowledge that the specific issue of treatment of future claimants in the mass tort context is largely unresolved in bankruptcy. Bankruptcy courts, so effective at reducing to monetary amounts future claims outside the mass tort context, are still finding ways to apply proven bankruptcy principles in the mass tort context. [223] A bankruptcy debtor is not free from worry just because it has confirmed a plan. Rather, the debtor must [*60] worry that courts may open the case up to reexamination, and determine whether a debtor must contribute even more to a plan as occurred in Manville. Finality, the ultimate goal of any debtor, is very much in doubt when a plan can be changed and bankruptcy's principle of finality is circumvented.

Further, until recently, bankruptcy courts have not had to deal with the vexatious issues of causation and establishment of liability in the mass tort context, as the debtor rarely had a reason to contest liability. How bankruptcy courts resolve this issue is completely unsettled. Bankruptcy courts dealing with the issue admit as much. [224] As has been indicated above, this problem is not unique to bankruptcy, as very few, if any, nationwide class action cases have ever fully litigated liability issues.

Conclusion

A different outcome in Amchem might have led to finality for companies with mass tort problems: future claimants would have been bound by the settlement. [225] In refusing to certify the proposed class, the Supreme Court has created great uncertainty with respect to the use of class actions in resolving mass tort liability on a nationwide scale and, by default, bankruptcy becomes a more attractive alternative. As set forth above, bankruptcy has coherent answers to many of the questions outstanding in the class action context.

However, larger questions may be asked about the use of the bankruptcy solution. Bankruptcy stresses group rights over individual autonomy. If the Supreme Court correctly decided Amchem, with its assumptions that individual interests cannot be subsumed in a class and that courts should not act as protectors for individual claimants absent a specific statutory mandate, then bankruptcy's use can be viewed as problematic. Amchem implicitly reinforces the traditional notions of party control and a passive, neutral judiciary. The Supreme Court found that there is no need to alter these assumptions to address the perceived mass tort crisis.

The bankruptcy process may encourage abuse by parties which see benefits in dealing with large groups instead of individuals or small groups with their own agendas, exactly the concerns expressed by the Supreme Court in rejecting the proposed class in Amchem. Bankruptcy's use of activist, non-Article III judges may lead to forum shopping. Again, parties may see the benefits of bypassing entire groups of people who normally play a role in the [*61] adversarial process, and instead focus on convincing a judge, who by design plays a large role in the bankruptcy process.

These questions are too important to remain unresolved and will be addressed in the future. Until then, attorneys, when asked by a corporate client facing mass tort liability if it can gain finality through the use of the class action device or the bankruptcy process, must now answer in the negative, but with bankruptcy perhaps the better option for an ailing company. Amchem obviously creates great uncertainty in the use of the class action for such a purpose. The bankruptcy process has its own problems, most importantly that it has not proven it is capable of creating closure for a corporation seeking to discharge its present and future mass tort liabilities, notwithstanding its formidable tools for bringing cases to a conclusion quickly and efficiently under less unique circumstances.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 See a full definition of the term "mass tort" infra p. 14-15.

n2 117 S. Ct. 2231 (1997). The case was filed as Carlough v. Amchem Prods., Inc. Later, Robert A. Georgine was substituted as a representative plaintiff for Edward J. Carlough. The district court published several opinions in this case prior to the litigation of the class action certification issues which resulted in the Supreme Court case. See Carlough v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 834 F. Supp. 1437 (E.D. Pa. 1993), Carlough v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 158 F.R.D. 314 (E.D. Pa. 1993), Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246 (E.D. Pa. 1994). Amchem's cousin, Flanagan v. Ahearn, 90 F.3d 963 (5th Cir. 1996), vacated and remanded, 117 S. Ct. 2503 (1997), aff'd sub. nom., In re Asbestos Litig., 134 F.3d 668 (5th Cir. 1998), cert. granted, sub nom., Ortiz v. Fiberboard Corp., 118 S. Ct. 2339 (U.S. June 22, 1998) (No. 97-1704) has its own consequences for class action law. These cases will be discussed in greater detail infra Part I.

n3 See Amchem, 117 S. Ct. at 2250.

n4 See id. at 2249.

n5 See id. at 2252.

n6 The Judicial Conference Ad Hoc Committee on Asbestos Litigation, appointed by Chief Justice Rehnquist in 1990, called for a national solution as early as 1991. See Judicial Conference of the U.S. Ad Hoc Comm. on Asbestos Litig., Report of Ad Hoc Comm. on Asbestos Litig. 19 (1991). The Committee recommended that Congress create "a national system for resolving asbestos claims which at the very least permits consolidating all asbestos claims in a single forum." Id. at 30. As an alternative, the Committee recommended that Congress expressly authorize class actions or collective trials in asbestos cases. See id. at 36. In the absence of such changes, the Committee foresaw that all the defendants' resources for payment of these claims would be exhausted within a few years, leaving many claimants without remedy. In response, Congress took no immediate action whatsoever, and made only minor changes several years later to the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. § 524(g) (1994) (Congress recognized the bankruptcy court's authority to issue "channeling injunctions" in asbestos cases which preclude actions by third parties that would have the effect of circumventing trust distributions).

Along the same lines, on June 20, 1997, tobacco companies, states' attorneys general and public health advocates announced a settlement granting broad liability protection to the tobacco industry in exchange for large payments by the industry over a 25 year period. On September 17, 1997, President Clinton announced that the settlement must be toughened. Soon after, law makers were holding hearings and discussing various changes to the settlement in response to political pressures. In March and April, 1998, the Senate Commerce Committee negotiated and approved a bill substantially tougher on the tobacco companies than the original settlement. On April 8, 1998, RJR Nabisco Holdings Corporation CEO, Steven Goldstone, declared the proposed settlement dead and other tobacco companies followed suit. While it is too early to tell whether Congress will consider legislation anyway, it is likely that there will be no legislation this year. See Wall St. J., Apr. 9, 1998, at A3.

As the asbestos and tobacco examples demonstrate, legislative solutions to such difficult mass injury issues often require long waits and often fail to materialize. This failure by Congress to act in imposing an overall system reflects the "limitations of political decision-making generally, systematic deficiencies, including inadequate resources, poor data bases, sluggish proceedings, hostility to economic analysis, weak leadership, political vulnerability, lack of public support and participation, secrecy, sporadic enforcement, under and overdeterrence, inability to set priorities, lawlessness, and many others." Stacy L. Rahl, Modification of a Chapter 11 Plan in the Mass Tort Context, 92 Colum. L. Rev. 192, 202 n.60 (1992) (quoting Peter H. Schuck, Agent Orange on Trial, 290 (1986)) (the use of an administrative solution may in the end have negligible effects in decreasing the costs to the system and to the parties involved).

n7 The dissent in the ill fated Ahearn case made exactly this point, warning that the certification of the class was improper because it represented a "constructive bankruptcy." The dissent further stated that certification would impermissibly circumvent the "detailed protections of the Bankruptcy Code for the express purpose of imposing the entire cost of the bailout on Fibreboard's most vulnerable creditors, to the betterment of its shareholders." Ahearn, 90 F.3d at 993.

REV_00261866

n8 In commenting on the Amchem decision, Lawrence Tribe, who represented the respondents opposed to the asbestos settlement, stated "what we won't see now is the use of class-action litigation as a sort of cheap substitute for bankruptcy in which companies, in effect, purchase a cap on liability." Christopher Drew, Ruling Could Jeopardize Class-Action Settlements, N.Y. Times, June 27, 1997, at D15.

n9 A prime example of this improvisation can be seen with the Manville bankruptcy case. See infra at Part II.F; see also Frank Macchiarola, The Manville Personal Injury Settlement Trust: Lessons for the Future, 17 Cardozo L. Rev. 583 (1996). Macchiarola was a special master in the Manville case and set forth the convoluted history of the filing, with its manifold appeals, during which time the district court and Second Circuit struggled with the novel issues before them. After it was clear, for example, that the Manville trust as proposed in the confirmed Chapter 11 plan could not adequately fund claims, District Judge Weinstein approved a settlement which modified the parties' rights to the trust fund. Initially, the Second Circuit deemed this modification to be an impermissible modification of the plan which had been previously confirmed because it did not meet the Bankruptcy Code's procedure for modification. Therefore, the Second Circuit reversed and remanded. See id. at 611. However, on a motion for a rehearing, the Second Circuit court stated that "upon reconsideration, we conclude that our factual point [regarding priority of payment in the trust] was somewhat incorrect and that our legal point [that the payment priority was what the parties foresaw when they approved the plan] was entirely incorrect." Id. at 613. See also Steven L. Schultz, In re Joint Eastern and Southern District Asbestos Litigation: Bankrupt and Backlogged-A Proposal for the Use of Federal Common Law in Mass Tort Class Actions, 58 Brook. L. Rev. 553 (1992). Manville, and more generally, the problems the bankruptcy system faces when dealing with mass tort issues, are discussed in more depth, infra Part II.F.

n10 See Thomas A. Smith, A Capital Markets Approach to Mass Tort Bankruptcy, 104 Yale L.J. 367, 369 (1994).

n11 District courts face other diversions unknown to bankruptcy courts. For example, because of quick trial statutes, district courts often must sacrifice litigation of complex civil actions to concentrate on relatively minor criminal actions. At the end of these trials, they are required to impose the mandatory sentence without discretion. See United States Sentencing Commission, Special Report to the Congress: Mandatory Minimum Penalties in the Federal Criminal Justice System 10 (1991) (approximately 100 federal offenses then carried mandatory minimum sentences).

n12 The adversary system in the United States depends upon advocates to gather and present evidence to a generally passive, neutral decision maker. See generally Frankel, Partisan Justice (1984); Stephen Landsman, The Adversary System: A Description and Defense (1984); Ellen E. Sward, Values, Ideology, and the Evolution of the Adversary System, 64 Ind. L.J. 301 (1989); cf. John H. Langbein, The German Advantage in Civil Procedure, 52 U. Chi. L. Rev. 823, 842 (1985) (describing the inquisitorial model found in certain countries which, inter alia, imposes upon the judge the role of actively questioning witnesses).

n13 "It is a principle of general application in Anglo-American jurisprudence that one is not bound by a judgment in personam in a litigation in which he is not designated as a party . . . ." Flanagan v. Ahearn, 90 F.3d 963, 998 (5th Cir. 1996) (quoting Hansbury v. Lee, 311 U.S. 32, 40 (1940)).

n14 See Gideon v. Wainright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963) ("In our adversary system of criminal justice, any person hailed into court . . . cannot be assured a fair trial unless counsel is provided for him. This seems to be an obvious truth.") But cf. In re Groban, 352 U.S. 330 (1957) (Frankfurter, J., concurring) ("The utmost devotion to one's profession and the fullest recognition of the great role of lawyers in the evolution of a free society cannot lead one to erect a constitutional principal that no administrative inquiry can be had in camera unless a lawyer be allowed to attend."); Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 556 (1974) ("The right to counsel depends upon an analysis of the interests of the individual and those of the regime to which he is subject").

n15 See Rogello Lasso, Gladiators Be Gone: The New Disclosure Rules Compel a Reexamination of the Adversary Process, 36 B.C. L. Rev. 479, 510 (1995). As reformers have noted, the two sides in fact often are not equally represented, and reformers have argued that a system requiring blanket mandatory disclosure rule and active judicial intervention during the discovery stage might better protect the party without adequate representation. See id.

n16 See, e.g., Fed. R. Civ. P. 26 advisory committee's note (1937 adoption) ("The more common practice in the United States is to take depositions on notice by the party desiring them, without any order from the court, and this has been followed in these rules".) Id.

n17 See Geoffrey C. Hazard, Ethics in the Practice of Law 120-35 (1978) (the inquisitional model, which places upon judges the potentially conflicting role of factfinder and decisionmaker, which in turn exacerbates biases to prejudice results, doesn't exist in the adversary system); Marshall v. Jerrico, 446 U.S. 238, 242 (1980) (the two sides are responsible for presenting their cases with earnestness and vigor); Mirjan Damaska, Presentation of Evidence and Factfinding Precision, 123 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1083 (1975).

n18 The common law tort is a wrong, independent of contract, that signifies an injury committed to the person or property of another. Further, a tort has been seen as a purely private dispute, subject to redress in a court.

n19 See Jack B. Weinstein & Eileen B. Hershenov, The Effect of Equity on Mass Tort Law 1991, U. Ill. L. Rev. 269, 274 (1991). Mass tort litigation should succeed in:

(1) fairly and expeditiously compensating numerous victims, and (2) deterring wrongful conduct where possible; while (3) preventing overdeterrence in mass torts from shutting down industry or removing needed products from the market, (4) keeping the courts from becoming paralyzed by tens or even hundreds of thousands of repetitive personal injury cases, and (5) reducing transactional costs of compensation.

Id.

n20 See Roger H. Trangsrud, Joinder Alternatives in Mass Tort Litigation, 70 Cornell L. Rev. 779, 780 (1985).

n21 Some would define a mass tort differently. See Richard A. Nagarda, In the Aftermath of the Mass Tort Class Action, 85 Geo. L. J. 295, 296, n.1 (1996) (defining mass torts differently, as different from "mass accidents" which do not involve latent issues, or "toxic torts" which involve latent issues but in a specific geographical area. Mass torts involve latent issues over a wide geographic area).

n22 See In re Northern Dist. of Cal. Dalkon Shield IUD Prod. Liab. Litig., 521 F. Supp. 1188, 1191 (N.D. Cal. 1981) ("Unconscionable possibility that large numbers of plaintiffs who are not first in line at the courthouse door will be deprived" of compensation), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), and cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1171 (1983). Some have argued that the courts have treated mass tort law as a public law problem. See, e.g., Lester Brickman, The Asbestos Litigation Crisis: Is There a Need for an Administrative Alternative?, 13 Cardozo L. Rev. 1819 (1992); Deborah R. Hensler, Fashioning a National Resolution of Asbestos Personal Injury Litigation: A Reply to Professor Brickman, 13 Cardozo L. Rev. 1967 (1992).

REV_00261868

n23 Fed. R. Civ. P. 23. Class actions and consolidation techniques were developed by equity, where courts looked at the issues of fact and fairness in particular situations to fashion remedies. See Weinstein & Hershenov, supra note 19, at 270.

n24 Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a).

n25 See Hannah v. Larche, 363 U.S. 420, 442 (1960) (the differing rules of fair play encompassed by the concept of due process vary according to the specific factual context and differing types of proceedings). See also Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Comm. v. McGrath, 341 U.S. 123, 162-63 (1951) (Douglas, J., concurring opinion). "The very nature of due process negates any concept of inflexible procedures universally applicable to every applicable situation . . . . Due process, unlike some legal rules, is not a technical conception with a fixed content unrelated to time, place and circumstances." Cafeteria & Restaurant Workers Union v. McElroy, 367 U.S. 886, 895 (1961) (quoting Joint Anti-Facist Comm. v. McGrath, 341 U.S. 123, 162-63 (1951) (Justice, J., concurring opinion)). See also Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 339 U.S. 306, 313 (1950).

n26 The Supreme Court has repeatedly emphasized the importance of rigorously and consistently applying each of these prerequisites in order to protect adequately the due process rights of class members not before a court, most recently with the Amchem case.

The safeguards provided by the Rule 23(a) and (b) class-qualifying criteria, we emphasize, are not impractical impediments-checks shorn of utility-in the settlement class context. First, the standards set for the protection of absent class members serve to inhibit appraisals of the chancellor's foot kind-class certifications dependent upon the court's gestalt judgment or overarching impression of the settlement's fairness.

Amchem Prod., Inc. v. Windsor, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 2248 (1997). See also General Tel. Co. v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 156-57 (1982); East Texas Motor Freight Sys., Inc. v. Rodriguez, 431 U.S. 395, 405-06 (1977); Johnson v. Georgia Highway Express, Inc., 417 F.2d 1122, 1124 (5th Cir. 1969).

n27 The numerosity requirement of the class action was designed "to prevent members of a small class from being unnecessarily deprived of their rights without a day in court." 7 Charles Wright & Arthur Miller, Federal Practice & Procedure § 1762, at 593 (1972).

n28 To make sure the important policy goal of individual autonomy is not sacrificed for efficiency, the Reporter for the 1966 amendments cautioned: "The new provision invites a close look at the case before it is accepted as a class action . . . ." Benjamin Kaplan, Continuing Work of the Civil Committee: 1966 Amendments of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (I), 81 Harv. L. Rev. 356, 390 (1967).

n29 The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure contain compulsory joinder provisions which require that, outside the class action context, the court must join all parties necessary for the just adjudication of an action. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 19. The rules also provides for the permissive joinder of parties whose claims arise out of the same transaction or occurrence that forms the subject of the original dispute. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 20.

n30 See, e.g., Phillips v. Joint Legislative Comm., 637 F.2d 1014, 1022 (5th Cir. 1981); Pabon v. McIntosh, 546 F. Supp. 1328 (E.D. Pa. 1982). Other factors are relevant in determining numerosity. See also Doe v. Charleston Area Med. Ctr., Inc., 529 F.2d 638 (4th Cir. 1975) (where relief sought is injunctive and declaratory, even speculative and conclusory representations about the size of the class are sufficient); Arkansas Educ. Ass'n v. Board of Educ., 446 F.2d 763, 765-66 (8th Cir. 1971) (geographical diversion of the class is relevant); Parham v. Southwestern Bell Tel. Co., 433 F.2d 421, 426 (8th Cir. 1970) (deterring massive wrong and fraud on the public is a consideration); Cypress v. Newport News Gen. & Nonsectarian Hosp. Ass'n, 375 F.2d 648, 652-53 (4th Cir. 1967) (small size of potential recovery for individual litigants may be a factor in favor of finding class action certification).

REV_00261869

n31 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a). Commonality is satisfied where a question of law links the individual members. See American Fin. Sys., Inc. v. Harlow, 65 F.R.D. 94, 107 (D. Md. 1974). See also Deboer v. Mellon Mortgage Co., 64 F.3d 1171 (8th Cir. 1995), Forbush v. J.C. Penney Co., 994 F.2d 1101, 1106 (5th Cir. 1993).

n32 Typicality requires a court to focus on and compare the similarity between the named plaintiffs' legal and remedial theories and the legal and remedial theories of those whom they purport to represent to determine whether they are similar. See Jenkins v. Raymark Indus., Inc., 782 F.2d 468, 472 (5th Cir. 1986); Byes v. Telecheck Recovery Serv., 173 F.R.D. 421-24 (E.D. La. 1997). The typicality requirement assures that the representative's interests are so aligned with those of the class that vigorous pursuit of her own interests will necessarily further the interests of the class. See Jordan v. Los Angeles County, 669 F.2d 1311, 1321 (9th Cir. 1982).

n33 Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b). Id.

n34 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(1)(B), (b)(3). Rule 23(b)(2) permits class actions if "final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief" is appropriate with respect to the entire class. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2). The provision is not generally used to obtain monetary relief and therefore is less important in the mass tort class action context.

n35 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(1)(B), (b)(3). Class actions may qualify under several of the categories of Rule 23(b). See In re A.H. Robins Co., 880 F.2d 709, 728 (4th Cir. 1989).

n36 Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(1)(B). This rule may require a preliminary factfinding inquiry concerning the defendant's assets or exposure. See In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield, IUD Prod. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982); In re Agent Orange Prod. Liab. Litig., 100 F.R.D. 718, 725 (E.D.N.Y. 1983), aff'd, 818 F.2d 145 (2d Cir. 1987).

n37 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(1)(B). Rule 23(b)(1) should be chosen over (b)(3) to prevent "inconsistent adjudication or compromise of class interests." Robertson v. National Football Ass'n, 556 F.2d 682, 685 (2d Cir. 1977). But see County of Suffolk v. Long Island Lighting Co., 907 F.2d 1295, 1303 (2d Cir. 1990) (the court exercised its narrow discretionary power in permitting class members to opt out in a (b)(1) action).

n38 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3).

The matters pertinent to the findings include: (A) the interest of members of the class in individually controlling the prosecution or defense of separate actions; (B) the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already commenced by or against members of the class; (C) the desirability or undesirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in the particular forum; (D) the difficulties likely to be encountered in the management of a class action.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3).

n39 See Amchem, 117 S. Ct. at 2247. Rule 23(b)(3) is designed for situations in which "class-action treatment is not as clearly called for" as it is in Rule 23(b)(1) and (b)(2) situations. Rule 23(b)(3) permits certification where class suit "may nevertheless be convenient and desirable." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 Advisory Committee's note. Common questions must "predominate over the questions affecting individual members"; and class resolution must be "superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy." The Advisory Committee sought to cover cases "in which a class action would achieve economies of time, effort, and expense, and promote . . . uniformity of decision as to persons similarly situated, without sacrificing procedural fairness or bringing about other undesirable results." Id.

REV_00261870

n40 See, e.g., Phillips Petroleum v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797, 811 (1985) (due process entitles class members to a right to opt out from the class); Brown v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 982 F.2d 386 (9th Cir. 1993). But see In re Agent Orange Prod. Liab. Litig., 996 F.2d 1425, 1437 (2d Cir. 1993) (right to opt out not required where it would be meaningless to future claimants).

n41 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(2).

n42 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3). The court is required to disseminate "to the members of the class the best notice practicable under the circumstances, including individual notice to all members who can be identified through reasonable effort." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(2).

n43 See In re A.H. Robins Co., 880 F.2d 709, 745 (4th Cir. 1989); John C. Coffee, Jr., The Corruption of the Class Action: The New Technology of Collusion, 80 Cornell L. Rev. 851 (1995).

n44 Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(e).

n45 When considering whether to approve a settlement, the court must determine whether the settlement is fair, reasonable, and adequate. See Girsh v. Jepson, 521 F.2d 153, 156-57 (3d Cir. 1975). "The law favors settlement, particularly in class actions and other complex cases where substantial judicial resources can be conserved by avoiding formal litigation." In re General Motors Pick-Up Truck Fuel Tank Prod. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d 768, 784 (1995). However, the court as guardian of the rights of absent class members is required to "independently and objectively analyze the evidence and circumstances before it in order to determine whether the settlement is in the best interest of those whose claims will be extinguished." Id. at 785. (quoting 2 Newberg & Conte § 11.41 at 11-88 to 11-89). "The settlement must be both substantively reasonable compared to the likely rewards of litigation . . . and the result of good faith, arms length negotiations." Fickinger v. C.I. Planning Corp., 646 F. Supp. 622, 627 (E.D. Pa. 1986) (citations omitted). The decision whether to approve a settlement is for the sound discretion of the trial court, and that determination is reversible only for abuse of discretion. See Bryan v. Pittsburgh Glass Co., 494 F.2d 799, 801 (3d Cir. 1974).

n46 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 advisory committee's note (1966 revision).

A 'mass accident' resulting in injuries to numerous persons is ordinarily not appropriate for a class action because of the likelihood that significant questions, not only of damages but of liability and defenses to liability, would be present, affecting the individuals in different ways. In these circumstances an action conducted nominally as a class action would degenerate in practice into multiple lawsuits separately tried.

Id. (citations omitted) (quotations in original).

n47 The bankruptcy system will be described infra Part II.

n48 The courts cannot ignore Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938) or the Rules Enabling Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2072(b) (1994). See also Fed. R. Civ. P. 82.

n49 Further examples of this reluctance to use class actions to join plaintiffs with disparate claims abound. See In re School Asbestos Litig., 789 F.2d 996, 1007 (3d Cir. 1986) (the Third Circuit stated that "the dictates of state law may not be buried under the vast expanse about the use of class actions simply do not exist in the bankruptcy system. However, for a variety of reasons, the bankruptcy system's requirements of finality and speed are not always well suited for resolving mass tort claims, and bankruptcy courts find themselves having to [*12] guess, often unsuccessfully, at how to structure outcomes that are fair to future claimants and at the same time afford finality to the companies and creditors utilizing the bankruptcy system.

REV_00261871

Part III concludes that, at least for the immediate future, companies facing mass tort liability may prefer bankruptcy to the class action option, but regardless of their choice will have to live with uncertainty as courts continue to grope for appropriate means for balancing concerns between the debtors and various claimants which are fighting for scarce resources.

I. Resolving Mass Torts in the Adversary System: An Uncomfortable Fit

A. The Adversary System: Stressing Individual Autonomy and Judicial Restraint

The adversary system's goals are simple: to uncover the truth of the matter subject to litigation and, where necessary, redress losses. [12] To achieve these goals, the judicial system relies upon two fundamental attributes, and both point to a system geared toward individualized justice. The first is party control. The litigants themselves establish the pace and timing of the litigation, with the expectation that a vigorous interchange between them will lead to the "truth." Indeed, this clash of adversaries as a means of ascertaining the truth is perhaps the most deeply rooted principle in Anglo-American law. Each party is afforded a due process right to "appear and be heard." [13] The constitutional right of trial by jury presupposes party initiative and the underlying principle of individual autonomy with a detailed evaluation of facts of each case. The emphasis of the adversary system is upon resolving [*13] private disputes: policy making is to be left to legislature consistent with the principle of separation of powers.

Likewise, the assumption that lawyers will do the litigating on behalf of the parties, while not explicit, is understood. [14] Attorneys are necessary because the two sides should be equally able to obtain information and present the case to an impartial fact finder. [15]

The Federal Rules provide the basic framework for attorneys during the discovery stage and up through trial. The opposing parties exercise a wide range of choice on whether, where, and when a lawsuit is filed and what resources to devote to the litigation. In general, the parties are left to their own devices for ensuring that the case moves toward trial in that with rare exceptions, no judicial order is required to conduct discovery. [16] Indeed, it has been widely noted that the American common-law system emphasizes party control of litigation rather than judicial prosecution and investigation. In short, an individual is in control of its own destiny.

The second attribute of the adversary system, and the flip side of individual autonomy, is the presence of a neutral decision maker. Although recently not as true, judges have traditionally been seen as passive arbiters of conflicting private interests who rule on questions of law. [17] Neutrality in judges is generally a good thing. For example, parties' knowledge that judges are neutral encourages them to settle without utilizing scarce court resources. [*14] They are aware of the ultimate strengths of their arguments and bargain accordingly, without calculating that they may obtain a special advantage in placing a matter before a court or that the judge will become an advocate for their side.

B. Mass Torts: A Definition and an Explanation of Its Tricky Fit Within the Adversary System

Mass torts do not fit comfortably within the adversary system, and even a coherent definition is elusive. Unlike with common law torts, [18] the number of injured parties is huge. [19] The adversary system seeks to provide individualized justice, but such an approach is not always practical with mass torts when thousands of claims must be dealt with quickly and of a federal class action. The parties' rights under state substantive law must be respected, and if that is not possible in a class action, then that procedure may not be used"). See also In re Tetracycline Cases, 107 F.R.D. 719, 724 (W.D. Mo. 1984) (class certification often denied in mass tort actions); In re RhonePoulenc Rohrer Inc., 51 F.3d 1293 (7th Cir. 1995). But see R. Barclay Surrick, Punitive Damages and Asbestos Litigation in Pennsylvania: Punishment or Annihilation?, 87 Dick. L. Rev. 265, 296 (1983).

REV_00261845

n50 See In re Northern Dist. of Cal. Dalkon Shield IUD Prod. Liab. Litig., 521 F. Supp. 1188 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982).

n51 Dalkon Shield, 521 F. Supp. at 1191.

n52 Id. at 1192.

n53 The bankruptcy system, discussed infra Part II, is a special category within the greater adversary system. Its goals are somewhat different from those goals traditionally associated with the civil adversary system, including, most notably, an explicit goal to rehabilitate the debtor.

n54 See Dalkon Shield, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982). See also Dunn v. Hovic, 1 F.3d 1371, 1387 (3d Cir. 1993) (the court also refused to place a cap on punitive damages in asbestos cases, noting a concern about punitive damages, but stating that it had no right to adopt an activist role to fix perceived problems).

n55 See In re Asbestos Litig., 90 F.3d 963, 993 (1996) (Smith, J., dissenting) (arguing that "this is simply a case of judges-both trial and appellate-trying too hard to solve the vexing problems posed by unending asbestos litigation.") n56 Abram Chayes, The Role of the Judge in Public Law Litigation, 89 Harv. L. Rev. 1281, 1291 (1976). See also Geoffrey B. Hazard, The Effect of the Class Action Device Upon the Substantive Law, 58 F.R.D. 299, 30709 (1973) (describing societal changes which encouraged increased use of class action device).

n57 See Judith Resnick, Aggregation, Settlement and Dismay, 80 Cornell L. Rev. 918, 937 (1995) ("In practice, I believe we are witnessing the alteration of court-based individual adjudication-as it melds with 'alternative dispute resolution'. . . .") (citation omitted) (emphasis in original). See also Marc Galanter & Mia Cahill, "Most Cases Settle": Judicial Promotion and Regulation of Settlements, 46 Stan. L. Rev. 1339, 1388-89 (1994) (stating that overall effects of judicial settlement promotion are unknown).

n58 See Coffee, supra note 43, at 853.

n59 See Coffee, supra note 43, at 858.

n60 See Thomas A. Smith, A Capital Market Approach to Mass Tort Bankruptcy, 104 Yale L.J. 367 (1994) (discussing psychological reasons why present and future claimants do not share similar outlooks).

n61 See Smith, supra note 60, at 367.

n62 See Flanagan v. Ahearn, 90 F.3d 963 (5th Cir. 1996), vacated and remanded, 117 S. Ct. 2503, aff'd sub nom. In re Asbestos Litig., 134 F.3d 668 (5th Cir. 1998).

n63 The MDL Panel, described in greater detail infra I(I), has been hailed as a means for forcing parties to reach settlements. Placing parties together in a case tends to lead to settlements. As set forth below, the Amchem decision may force a reassessment of the efficacy of the MDL Panel in forcing settlements.

n64 See In re Asbestos Prod. Liab. Litig. (No. VI), 771 F. Supp. at 42224.

n65 See id. at 424.

n66 See Amchem, 117 S. Ct. at 2238.

n67 The CCR was a consortium of over 20 former asbestos manufacturers who faced financial ruin from the litigation. See id. at 2338.

n68 See id. at 2239.

n69 See id.

n70 See id.

n71 See id.

n72 See id. at 2240.

n73 This use of comprehensive schedules is similar to other cases. See, e.g., In re Rio Hair Naturalizer Prods. Liab. Litig., 1996 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20440 (E.D. Mich. 1996).

n74 See id. at 2241.

n75 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3).

n76 See Amchem, 117 S. Ct. at 2241.

n77 See id. See also Carlough v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 834 F. Supp. 1437, 1467-68 (E.D. Pa. 1993).

n78 See Amchem, 117 S. Ct. at 2241. See also Carlough v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 158 F.R.D. 314, 336 (E.D. Pa. 1993).

n79 See Amchem, 117 S. Ct. at 2241.

n80 See id. at 2242. See also Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 878 F. Supp. 716, 726-27 (E.D. Pa. 1994).

n81 See Amchem, 117 S.Ct. at 2242. See also Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 83 F.3d 610 (1996).

n82 Ahearn, 90 F.3d at 971.

n83 Id. at 974.

n84 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(1).

n85 See Ahearn, 90 F.3d at 972.

n86 See id. at 973.

REV_00261873

n87 See id.

n88 See id. at 972.

n89 See id. at 968.

n90 See Francis E. McGovern, Resolving Mature Mass Tort Litigation, 69 B.U. L. Rev. 659, 660 (1989) (class actions should not be used until litigation "matures," that is until the case has been tried often enough to eliminate all novel questions of fact and law). This concept has been picked up in subsequent cases. See Castano v. American Tobacco Co., 84 F.3d 734 (5th Cir. 1996) (single mass tort class action creates a danger that a wide ranging and novel issue may be resolved in one case, thereby robbing the courts of the benefits of evolutionary legislation or case law). But see David Rosenberg, Comment, Of End Games and Openings in Mass Tort Cases: Lessons from a Special Master, 69 B.U. L. Rev. 695, 707-11 (1989) (maturity should not be a prerequisite to the use of class action procedures).

n91 See also In re General Motors Corp. Pick-Up Truck Fuel Tank Prod. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d 768, 800-01 (3d Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 116 S. Ct. 88 (1995).

n92 See id. at 799-800.

n93 See id. at 630-31.

n94 There is a kind of accepted folk wisdom: that litigation or the threat of litigation cures improper incentives during settlement negotiations. With litigation as a real option, the defendants are more likely to bargain seriously. See Coffee, Jr., supra note 43 at 853 (1995). As set forth infra n.112, the threat of litigation generally does not exist in the mass tort context.

n95 See Georgine, 83 F.3d at 629. See also Coffee, Jr., supra note 43, at 853.

n96 See Ahearn, 90 F.3d at 975-76, n.8.

n97 See id. at 977.

n98 See id. at 971.

n99 See id. at 980. As to the alleged conflict between future and present members, the court found that the district court did not err in finding that the parties vigorously negotiated under the auspices of a former judge, and that present and future claimants both were united in wanting to avoid the risk of Fibreboard losing the coverage case and also to yield a maximum dollar amount. As to the intraclass conflict, the court found no "substantial" conflict, in that the negotiations were vigorous and there was no good alternative. See id. at 981.

n100 In the Amchem dissent, Judge Breyer applauded this approach, stating that the higher courts should defer more often to the district courts, concluding in the Amchem case that "the District Court's certification decision rests upon more than 300 findings of fact reached after five weeks of comprehensive hearings. . . . That court is far more familiar with the issues and litigants than is the court of appeals or are we . . . ." Amchem, 117 S. Ct. at 2253 (Breyer, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

n101 See John C. Coffee, Jr., Understanding the Plaintiff's Attorney: The Implications of Economic Theory for Private Enforcement of Law Through Class and Derivative Actions, 86 Colum. L. Rev. 669 (1986) (a discussion on a tendency for plaintiff's counsel to sell out the class to ensure a settlement and its fee). See also Jonathan R. Macey & Geoffrey P. Miller, The Plaintiffs' Attorney's Role in Class Action and Derivative Litigation: Economic Analysis and Recommendations for Reform, 58 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1 (1991) (stating that class actions are a boon to defense attorneys because in a settlement class action, plaintiffs' lawyers and defendants typically negotiate a settlement prior to filing the class action).

REV_00261874

n102 See Georgine, 83 F.3d at 634.

n103 Amchem, 90 F.3d at 976 n.8 (citation omitted).

n104 Coffee, Jr., supra note 43, at 853. ("Not only do the plaintiffs' attorneys abandon the right to litigation at the outset which assures defendants that there is little downside risk from the use of this approach, but there is little opportunity for judicial oversight or intervention by other plaintiffs' attorneys.")

n105 See id. at 971.

n106 See Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560-61 (1992). (To obtain Article III jurisdiction "first, the plaintiff must have suffered an 'injury in fact'-an invasion of a legally protected interest which is (a) concrete and particularized; and (b) 'actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical.'") (citations omitted).

n107 See, e.g., Strong v. Arkansas Blue Cross & Blue Shield, Inc., 87 F.R.D. 498, 508 (E.D. Ark. 1980); Hines v. D'Artois, 383 F. Supp. 184, 188 (W.D. La. 1974), rev'd on other grounds, 531 F.2d 726 (5th Cir. 1976). See also Elizabeth R. Kaczynski, The Inclusion of Future Members in Rule 23(b)(2) Class Actions, 85 Colum. L. Rev. 397 (1985).

n108 See Cypress v. Newport News Gen. & Nonsectarian Hosp. Ass'n, 375 F.2d 648 (4th Cir. 1967). Although only two black doctors had actually applied for positions at the Newport News General and Nonsectarian Hospital, the court chose to recognize an additional 16 black physicians who practiced in the area in order to satisfy the numerosity requirement. The court justified its action on the grounds that the additional 16 class members might have found themselves victims of the hospital's allegedly discriminatory employment practices at some time in the future. See Cypress, 375 F.2d at 653 n.9.

n109 See Coffee, supra note 43, at 857.

n110 See id. at 855-56.

n111 See also In re A.H. Robins Co., 880 F.2d 709 (4th Cir. 1989) (affirming approval of class settlement resolving claims of class members with unmanifested symptoms of disease resulting from use of the Dalkon Shield); In re Agent Orange Prod. Liab. Litig., 996 F.2d 1425, 1433-34 (1993) (holding that class action properly included individuals who had been exposed to Agent Orange, but who had not yet manifested injury).

n112 The general lack of litigation in mass tort cases makes it difficult to assess whether the results of settlement class actions are as fair as those going to litigation. Indeed, this author was hard pressed to find any cases involving latent mass tort class actions that have gone through trial and not settled. Recently, this streak of non-litigated cases was broken in a silicon implant case, and its outcome may point even more to the perils of relying on the clash of adversaries in the mass tort context. Prior to litigation, the manufacturers of silicone gel breast implants had insisted that there was no scientific basis for liability. Indeed, the best studies yet conducted on this question, released shortly after a major settlement of a law suit, failed to demonstrate a causal relationship between breast implants and the alleged illnesses. See Marcia Angell, Do Breast Implants Cause Systemic Disease?, 330 New Eng. J. Med. 1748 (1994) (discussing Gabriel et al. study and others). Notwithstanding this lack of evidence, the manufacturers' concern about the outcome of a trial were justified, to a large extent. Without actually arriving at the merits of the law suit which was to be left for a later phase, a Louisiana jury found that the Dow Chemical Company had knowingly deceived women by hiding information about the health risks of silicone used in breast implants notwithstanding the lack of firm evidence of its harm. See Barry Meier, Dow Chemical Deceived Women On Breast Implants, Jury Decides, N.Y. Times, Aug. 19, 1997, at A1. Accordingly, the premise that litigated class actions might insure more rational or fair results than settlement class actions is questionable.

REV_00261875

n113 See Georgine, 83 F.3d at 630. See also In re General Motors PickUp Truck Fuel Tank Prod. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d. 768 (3d Cir. 1995) (rejecting the use of settlement class action when the class would not have been certified for litigation).

n114 See Ahearn, 90 F.3d at 988-89.

n115 117 S. Ct. 2231 (1997).

n116 Amchem, 117 S. Ct. at 2244.

n117 See id.

n118 See id. at 2248.

n119 See id. at 2248-49.

n120 See id. at 2249.

n121 Id. at 2246 (quoting Georgine, 83 F.3d at 633) (alterations in original).

n122 Id. at 2248 (citing Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 (b)(3)(D)). See also Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c), (d).

n123 See Amchem, 117 S. Ct. at 2248.

n124 Id.

n125 See id. The Supreme Court cited Benjamin Kaplan, Continuing Work of the Civil Committee: 1966 Amendments of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (I), 81 Harv. L. Rev. 356, 391 (1967) ("The interest [in individual control] can be high where the stake of each member bulks large and his will and ability to take care of himself are strong; the interest may be no more than theoretic where the individual stake is so small as to make a separate action impracticable." (footnote omitted)).

n126 Id. at 2252.

n127 See Amchem, 117 S. Ct. at 2253-54 (Breyer, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

n128 See id. at 2254.

n129 See discussion supra Part I.G.

n130 See discussion supra Part I.G.

n131 This conclusion may be overstated. The Supreme Court specifically refused to address Article III issues, although it has, in the past, permitted the inclusion of future claimants in class actions. See Amchem, 117 S. Ct. at 2244.

REV_00261876

n132 See id. at 2250.

n133 See Flanagan v. Ahearn, 117 S. Ct. 2503 (1997).

n134 See John C. Coffee, Jr., Class Wars: the Dilemma of Mass Tort Class Activism, 95 Colum. L. Rev. 1343 (1995) (Professor Coffee has suggested that the right to opt-out for the future claimant should occur at the time of the claimant's discovery of his injury, the appointment of representative plaintiff steering committees, and the implementation of an auction procedure for the choice of lead counsel to improve the accountability of the counsel selection process).

n135 Ahearn, 134 F.3d at 669.

n136 Id. at 670.

n137 Id.

n138 For a discussion of the history of the MDL, see Resnick supra note 57, at 927.

n139 See 28 U.S.C. § 1407(a) (1994) ("Civil actions involving one or more common questions of fact . . . may be transferred to any district for coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings.") (the "MDL").

n140 As of the late 1980s, less than one fifth of the cases within the MDL rubric were sent back to the originating court. See Patricia D. Howard, A Guide to Multidistrict Litigation, 124 F.R.D. 479, 480 (1989) (2600 of the 16,700 actions were remanded). See also Resnick, supra note 57, at 927.

n141 Indeed, during the first six years of MDL alone, about a quarter of the MDL litigations certified were mass torts. See Resnick, supra note 57, at 927.

From 1968, when it came into being, until 1975, the MDL panel transferred 168 litigations for consolidated pretrial treatment, including (by our count) 42 mass accident litigations (mostly air crashes) and three products liability cases (Dalkon, Celotex "technifoam" (house insulation) and a design defect/personal injury products liability litigation based on a faulty light plane engine). Thus about a quarter were torts. Of those 46 litigations, two included cases requesting class action certification.

Id. at 929.

n142 The MDL Panel itself has recognized that settlement or consolidation typically follows the transfer for pretrial proceedings under the MDL statute. See Richard A. Chesley & Kathleen Woods Kolodgy, Mass Exposure Torts: an Efficient Solution to a Complex Problem, 54 U. Cin. L. Rev. 467, 536 (1985). See In re Agent Orange Prod. Liab. Litig., 597 F. Supp. 740, 751-54 (E.D.N.Y. 1984), aff'd, 818 F.2d 145 (2d Cir. 1987).

n143 Use of the statute to justify assignment for trial was first recognized in Pfizer, Inc. v. Lord, 447 F.2d 122 (2nd Cir. 1971). Indeed, virtually every court to consider the question held or at least assumed that such authority existed under Section 1404(a) and the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation Rule 14(b) prior to the Lexecon case.

n144 118 S. Ct. 956 (1998).

n145 See Lexecon, 118 S. Ct. at 962-65.

n146 See id. at 959.

n147 See id.

n148 See id.

n149 See id.

n150 See id. at 960.

n151 See id.

n152 See id. at 960, 966.

n153 See id. at 964.

n154 Id.

n155 Other creative methods of resolving mass tort issues which do not have express statutory authority such as sampling, Glen O. Robinson and Kenneth S. Abraham, Collective Justice in Tort Law, 78 Va. L. Rev. 1481 (1992), are subject to attack under the Amchem logic.

n156 Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 353-54 (1985) (value maximization of the estate is "an important goal of the bankruptcy laws."). See also Katchen v. Landy, 382 U.S. 323, 328-29 (1966) ("This Court has long recognized that a chief purpose of the bankruptcy laws is 'to secure a prompt and effectual administration and settlement of the estate of all bankrupts within a limited period . . . .'") (citations omitted); Stellwagen v. Clum, 245 U.S. 605, 617 (1918); Williams v. United States Fidelity & Guar. Co., 236 U.S. 549, 554-59 (1915); Burlingham v. Crouse, 228 U.S. 459, 473 (1913); Wetmore v. Markoe, 196 U.S. 68, 77 (1904); S. Rep. No. 95-989, at 9 (1978) reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 5795 (to encourage debtor "rehabilitation.").

n157 The investigation of the debtor must be done quickly to ensure that the debtor can put the matter behind him and get on with his new life. Just as importantly, creditors benefit from a quick resolution of the bankruptcy case because the debtor's assets have less time to disappear. See California Airmotive Corp. v. Bass, 354 F.2d 453 (9th Cir. 1965). The Bankruptcy Rules themselves mandate that the "rules shall be construed to secure the [expeditious and economical administration of every case under the bankruptcy code and the] just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every [case and] proceeding." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1001. See H. R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 5 (1977). Chapter 11 of the present Bankruptcy Code was part of the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978, Pub. L. 95-598, 92 Stat. 2549. The first major revision of the bankruptcy laws since 1938, the bankruptcy code consolidated three reorganization chapters into a single business reorganization chapter, with the premise that business reorganizations should be quick and more efficient and provide greater protection to the debtor, creditors, and the public. See id.

n158 See 11 U.S.C. §§ 507, 726(a) (1994) (describing priority of distribution).

n159 United States bankruptcy law has its origins in the 1700's, when many of the colonies had their own set of comprehensive laws regulating debtor-creditor relations. This mishmash of rules continued almost uninterrupted for the first 109 years of this country's existence without major federal government intervention, notwithstanding the Bankruptcy Clause in the Constitution which empowers Congress to "establish . . . uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies . . . ." U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 4. For a general discussion of the history of bankruptcy law, see In re Morris, 12 B.R. 321 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1981).

REV_00261878

n160 See In re Saybrook Mfg. Co., 963 F.2d 1490, 1495-96 (11th Cir. 1992) ("Section 507 of the Bankruptcy Code fixes the priority order of claims and expenses against the bankruptcy estate. Creditors within a given class are to be treated equally, and bankruptcy courts may not create their own rules of superpriority within a single class.") (citations omitted); In re Sun Runner Marine, Inc., 945 F.2d 1089, 1094 (9th Cir. 1991) ("To [pay certain pre-petition unsecured claims in full while others remain unpaid] would impermissibly violate the priority scheme of the Bankruptcy Code.") (citation omitted). See also In re FCX, Inc., 60 B.R. 405, 409-11 (Bankr. E.D. N.C. 1986) (court cannot alter distribution priorities absent inequitable conduct by claimant); In re Baldwin-United Corp., 43 B.R. 443, 457 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 1984) ("It is . . . beyond travail that the most significant policy in bankruptcy jurisprudence is equality of treatment of like-situated creditors.").

n161 Even in situations where an unsecured creditor is not going to otherwise receive a distribution in a non-bankruptcy situation because the debtor did not have enough assets, the Bankruptcy Code's priority scheme under 11 U.S.C. § 502 may have the effect of redistributing the debtor's assets so that an unsecured creditor in fact receives a distribution.

n162 See 11 U.S.C. §§ 547-551 (1994). See also In re Freedom Group, Inc., 50 F.3d 408, 410 (7th Cir. 1995).

n163 See Greg M. Zipes, Discovery Abuse in the Civil Adversary System: Looking to Bankruptcy's Regime of Mandatory Disclosure and Third Party Control Over the Discovery Process for Solutions, 27 Cumb. L. Rev. 1107 (1997) (to compensate for potential abuses by the debtor in the face of weekly positioned adversaries, bankruptcy assigns the role of investigation of the debtor's financial affairs to third parties and requires the debtor to fully cooperate in exchange for a discharge).

n164 See Thomas H. Jackson, Bankruptcy, Non-Bankruptcy Entitlements, and the Creditors' Bargain, 91 Yale L.J. 857, 864 (1982) (arguing that if creditors united privately to draft a bankruptcy system, they would agree to implement something similar to the system in place because it (1) eliminates the strategic costs associated with collecting and (2) reduces variances in recoveries).

n165 See 11 U.S.C. § 727 (1994) ("The court shall grant the debtor a discharge . . . .").

n166 For a Chapter 7 debtor, discharge means that any prepetition debts can no longer be collected. 11 U.S.C. §§ 524-525 (1994) describe the effects of discharge, one of the most important being an injunction against collecting debts. See also Thomas H. Jackson, The Fresh-Start Policy in Bankruptcy Law, 98 Harv. L. Rev. 1393, 1406 (1985).

n167 See 11 U.S.C. § 1141 (1994).

n168 The concept stretches back to the English Statute of Anne in 1705. See Charles Jordan Tabb, The History of the Bankruptcy Laws in the United States, 3 Am. Bankr. L.J. 1, 10 (1995). A debtor who fully cooperated in the bankruptcy proceeding was not only granted a discharge, but was also granted a monetary allowance out of the bankruptcy estate. See id. The law at the same time provided for the death penalty for fraudulent bankrupts. See id. Since 1903, the discharge provision has survived many amendments and changes to the Bankruptcy Act and Code. See Teresa A. Sullivan et al., Limiting Access to Bankruptcy Discharge: An Analysis of the Creditors' Data, Wis. L. Rev. 1091 (1983).

n169 See In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 878 F. Supp. 473 (E. & S.D. N.Y. 1995) (court refused to modify a confirmed plan, but sought other ways around the plan's harsh effects on future claimants). A complete discussion of this is contained infra Part II.F.

n170 11 U.S.C. § 1127(b).

REV_00261879

n171 § 101(5) of the Bankruptcy Code (11 U.S.C. § 101(5) (1994)) defines a claim as follows:

(A) right to payment, whether or not such right is reduced to judgment, liquidated, unliquidated, fixed, contingent, matured, unmatured, disputed, undisputed, legal, equitable, secured, or unsecured; or

(B) right to an equitable remedy for breach of performance if such breach gives rise to a right to payment, whether or not such right to an equitable remedy is reduced to judgment, fixed, contingent, matured, unmatured, disputed, undisputed, secured, or unsecured;

11 U.S.C. § 101(5) (1994).

n172 According to the legislative history:

The effect of the definition is a significant departure from previous law . . . . The definition is any right to payment, whether or not reduced to judgment, liquidated, unliquidated, fixed, contingent, matured, unmatured, disputed, undisputed, legal, equitable, secured, or unsecured . . . . By this broadest possible definition, and by the use of the term throughout the title 11, . . . the statute contemplated that all legal obligations of the debtor, no matter how remote or contingent, will be able to be dealt with in the bankruptcy case. It permits the broadest possible relief in the bankruptcy court.

H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 309 (1978), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5963, 6266. See also S. Rep. No. 989 (1978), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 5807-08.

n173 This sledgehammer approach to reducing claims to a monetary amount manifests itself with rejections of leases. § 365(g) of the Bankruptcy Code provides for the quantification of damages for a breach by a debtor of lease terms, notwithstanding that damages with leases often include specific performance in the absence of bankruptcy. See 11 U.S.C. § 365(g) (1994). "The purpose [of having the date of rejection relate back] is to treat rejection claims as pre-petition claims." H.R. 95-595, 95th Cong. 349 (1977). See also NLRB v. Bildisco & Bildisco, 465 U.S. 513, 531; In re Stewart Foods, 64 F.3d 141, 144 (4th Cir. 1995) (citing 11 U.S.C. §§ 365(g)(1), 502(g)) ("The rejection of an executory contract constitutes a breach of the contract, and a party's damages resulting from that rejection are treated as a pre-petition claim and receive the priority provided to general unsecured creditors."); United States v. Dewey Freight Sys., Inc., 31 F.3d 620 (8th Cir. 1994); In re Spectrum Info. Tech., Inc., 190 B.R. 741 (Bankr. E.D. N.Y. 1996); In re West Chestnut Realty of Haverford, Inc., 177 B.R. 501 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1995); In re Hooker Inv., Inc., 145 B.R. 138 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1992); S. Rep. No. 95-989 at 60; 2 Lawrence P. King, Collier on Bankruptcy <para> 101.05 (15th ed. 1993).

n174 See, e.g., Southeastern Sprinkler Co. v. Meyertech Corp., 831 F.2d 410, 417 (3d Cir. 1987); King supra note 169.

n175 From both the language of the statute and the legislative history, it is clear that Congress intended that all of these types of obligations be treated as claims under the Code. See 11 U.S.C. § 101(5) (1994); S. Rep. No. 989, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 21-22 (1978); H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 309 (1977).

n176 See In re Piper Aircraft Corp., 58 F.3d 1573 (11th Cir. 1995) (anticipated damages caused by the debtor's planes falling out of the sky in the future, even when based upon statistical probability, are too speculative to establish a claim).

REV_00261880

n177 Neither § 502(c) of the Bankruptcy Code, the most logical place for such a provision, nor the Bankruptcy Rules sets forth a method.

n178 See Bittner v. Borne Chem. Co., 691 F.2d 134 (3rd Cir. 1982) (court estimating a breach of contract claim must rely upon the appropriate state law of contracts); In re Continental Airlines, Inc., 57 B.R. 842 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 1985) (reviewing the merits of the claim to determine whether the claimant would prevail upon full litigation in the appropriate state forum).

n179 This is an oversimplification. As set forth infra, courts in fact struggle with determining how far into the future they may look to fix contingent claims in the mass tort context.

n180 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(5) (1994) provides:

The district court shall order that personal injury tort and wrongful death claims shall be tried in the district court in which the bankruptcy case is pending, or in the district court in the district in which the claim arose, as determined by the district court in which the bankruptcy case is pending.

28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(5) (1994).

See also In re Dow Corning Corp., 103 F.3d 129 (6th Cir. 1996) (Dow Corning and its shareholders filed a motion to transfer to the Eastern District of Michigan when roughly 1500 non-breast implant personal injury tort claims were pending against them. The circuit court cited 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(5) (1994) in reversing the Eastern District's decision to deny Dow's motion to transfer.) In acknowledging its own difficulties in estimating mass tort issues, the court noted that while one bankruptcy court successfully estimated the speculative damages which arise with mass torts; see A.H. Robbins, 839 F.2d at 198, another failed and its failure was "predictable," see Johns-Manville, 68 B.R. at 618. See also Smith, supra note 60, at 38289; In re A.H. Robins Co., 880 F.2d 694, 699 (4th Cir. 1989) (Court noted that experts' estimates of the recovery value of the Dalkon Shield claims ranged from $ 600 million to $ 7 billion dollars, but nevertheless the court settled upon an exact figure for these claims for the purposes of a plan.) It has also been suggested that parties may estimate claims in the case of a consensual plan of reorganization. See In re Dow Corning, 211 B.R. 545 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 1997). See generally, Jeffrey Davis, Cramming Down Future Claims in Bankruptcy: Fairness, Bankruptcy Policy, Due Process, and the Lessons of the Piper Reorganization, 70 Am. Bankr. L.J. 329, 330 (1996).

n181 In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 14 F.3d 726, 733 (2d Cir. 1993). The Second Circuit rejected the aggressive invocation of Rule 23(b)(1)(B) to accomplish a similar objective, stating "the function of the federal courts is not to conduct trials over whether a statutory scheme should be ignored because a more efficient mechanism can be fashioned by judges." In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 14 F.3d at 733.

n182 Payment of punitive damages is subordinated to payment of other classes of claims in Chapter 7 liquidation proceedings. See 11 U.S.C. § 726(4) (1994). See also In re Keene Corp., 162 B.R. 935, 948 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1994) (discussing possible grounds for subordinating punitive damages claims).

n183 See 11 U.S.C. § 1122(a) (1994).

REV_00261881

efficiently. As individual rights are sometimes impacted, courts must remain active, supervise at all times and be a watch dog for the less powerful groups, which also contravenes the general principles of court passivity and neutrality. Although mass torts share the trait that all of the tort claims arising from the tortfeasor's behavior have at least some common factual basis, [20] in reality, mass torts fall into two categories. The first, and less problematic, is a single catastrophe mass tort, such as a plane crash. These torts are marked by a single identifiable incident or tragedy from which causation of injuries may be easily traced and the injuries are contemporaneous with the incident.

The second and much more problematic type is a latent tort, one in which an injury manifests itself only years, or decades, after exposure to a product. [21] [*15] The question of whether the product was even the cause of the injury is sometimes at issue. Mass torts in this second category are the focus of this article. They generally ensnare companies that would be healthy in the absence of a specific mass tort problem, but after a few individual unfavorable verdicts with punitive damages, would likely not only be unhealthy but bankrupt. As such, a mass tort in this second category does not involve a private dispute as with the garden variety negligence action, but is something more with a public policy component, because large companies or industries face ruin. [22]

Not surprisingly, parties tend to litigate mass tort cases with devices within the adversary system that are themselves less traditional and which provide some ability to deal with large groups of similarly situated parties: the class action, with a judicious use of case consolidation techniques, and the bankruptcy system. However, because class action and bankruptcy law did not contemplate mass torts, their use has been an uneasy fit.

C. The Class Action and Its Role Within the Adversary System

The class action was not designed to address the second type of mass tort described above. Federal Rule 23 sets forth the modern statutory basis for class action law suits. [23] While there are different types of class actions, all require the following:

(1) the class is so numerous that joinder of all members is impractible,

(2) there are questions of law or fact common to the class,

(3) the claims or defenses of the representative parties are typical of the claims or defenses of the class, and

(4) the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class. [24]

[*16]

Class actions represent an explicit exception to the adversary system principle that named parties conduct their own litigation. Rule 23(a)'s requirements of commonality, typicality, and adequacy of representation are considered an adequate substitute for this traditional due process safeguard. [25] Although some of Rule 23's elements require similar analysis (i.e. typicality and commonality), each must be looked at individually by courts in deciding whether to certify a class. [26]

The numerosity requirement is an important limitation on the use of the class action device. [27] Unless the class members are so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable, it is preferable not to adjudicate the members' rights by means of a representative suit as this impacts upon individualized [*17] justice. [28] The inquiry focuses not simply on the number of class members, [29] but on the feasibility of joinder. [30]

Likewise, Rule 23(a)'s requirement of commonality demands that the members of the class share a common grievance. [31] The requirements of typicality and adequacy of representation n184 See discussion supra Part I.

REV_00261846

n185 In re Keniston, 85 B.R. 202, 214 (Bankr. D. N.H. 1988).

n186 See 11 U.S.C. §§ 707, 1307 (1994).

n187 See Kathleen W. Meaney, The Asbestos Bankruptcy: JohnsManville's Petition for Reorganization Under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code-a Good Faith Filing or a Sham?, 19 Suffolk U. L. Rev. 55, 71 (1985).

n188 See Cohen & Thiros, P.C. v. Keen Enter., Inc., 44 B.R. 570, 573 (N.D. Ind. 1984) (fees must be monitored because every penny that goes to an attorney as an administrative fee or commission is a penny less to creditors).

n189 See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014(a). Rule 2014 requires the applicant to satisfy the court of the specific facts showing the necessity for the employment, the name of the person to be employed, the reasons for the selection, the professional services to be rendered, any proposed arrangement for compensation, and, to the best of the applicant's knowledge, all the person's connections with the debtor, creditors, any other party in interest . . . .

Id. See also In re Alexander, 129 B.R. 183, 185 (Bankr. D. Minn. 1991) (purpose of § 327 of the Bankruptcy Code is to ensure that no conflict of interest arises as a result of such employment); In re Abraham, 163 B.R. 772, 780 (Bankr. W.D. Tex.1994).

n190 In re Michigan Interstate Ry. Co., 32 B.R. 325 (Bankr. E.D. Mich.1983) (court denied retention when attorneys were not specialists in bankruptcy law but were nevertheless sought to be retained because of their overall integrity).

n191 John D. Ayer, How to Think About Bankruptcy Ethics, 60 Am. Bankr. L.J. 355, 387 (1986); see also Nancy Rapoport, Turning and Turning in the Widening Gyre: the Problem of Potential Conflicts of Interest in Bankruptcy, 26 Conn. L. Rev. 913, 916 (1994); Hansen, Jones & Leta, P.C. v. Segal, 220 B.R. 434, 459-460 (D. Utah 1998) citing In re Curlew Valley Assoc., 14 B.R. 506, 511 (Bankr. D. Utah 1981) ("Actions that benefit one group may harm others. Secured creditors generally prefer conservative decisions in operating the ongoing business and expeditious prosecution of the bankruptcy case, as their interest lies in realizing collateral as quickly as possible if reorganization is not feasible and in avoiding the loss of value in their collateral and the loss of interest. On the other hand, while enjoying the automatic stay of creditors' claims, equity owners who will be paid last, if at all, may wish to pursue riskier investments and more litigation (which delays the prosecution of the bankruptcy) to increase the amount of their return . . . . In short 'reorganization involves the 'turbulent rivalry of many interests.'").

n192 As stated supra, the debtor in possession must act in the creditors' best interest, which is not always in the debtor's best interest. See 11 U.S.C. § 1107 (1994). An attorney who previously represented the debtor may not be capable of advising the debtor to compromise his own interests for the sake of creditors. Courts may disallow retention to avoid the otherwise inevitable situation where the attorney will be denied fees because he advised the debtor qua debtor instead of the debtor-in-possession, who should be protecting the interests of the creditors. See, e.g., In re Vlachos, 61 B.R. 473, 482 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 1986) (Chapter 7 attorney for the debtor is not entitled to compensation from the estate for services rendered unless he can demonstrate that the services relate to the debtor's administrative responsibilities and the debtor is not capable of payment for services rendered). See John D. Ayer, Through Chapter 11 with Gun or Camera, but Probably Not Both: A Field Guide, 72 Wash. U. L.Q. 883 (1994). See also Nancy B. Rapoport, Seeing the Forest and the Trees: The Proper Role of the Bankruptcy Attorney, 70 Ind. L.J. 783, 807 (1995).

REV_00261882

n193 See Levin & Weintraub v. Rosenberg, 330 F.2d 98 (2d Cir. 1964) (no statute of limitations for a court to review fee arrangements); In re EZ Feed Cube Co., 123 B.R. 69 (Bankr. D. Or. 1991).

n194 See Model Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 1.9 (1994); Model Code of Professional Responsibility, Canon 4 (1980) (a lawyer must not represent a potential client if the representation jeopardizes confidences transmitted by a different client); Model Rule 1.7; Model Code, Canon 5 (a lawyer cannot represent a potential client if the representation would inhibit the lawyer's representation of another client); Model Rule 1.7; Model Code, Canon 5 (a lawyer cannot represent a third party if the lawyer has a personal financial stake in the outcome of the litigation). (For example, courts must take the side of the unrepresented unsecured creditors when considering the fairness of a particular settlement. In re Planned Protective Serv., Inc., 130 B.R. 94 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1991) (court should conduct a full and independent assessment of whether a compromise is fair and equitable and in the best interests of the creditors and the estate.)

n195 See Zipes, supra note 163, at 1150.

n196 Congress' expansion of the role of bankruptcy judge from mostly administrative to judicial in nature caused a Constitutional crisis. In the seminal case of Northern Pipeline Constr. v. Marathon Oil Pipeline Co., 458 U.S. 50, 87 (1982), the debtor wished to litigate a pre-petition state common law claim against a third party creditor in bankruptcy court. The Supreme Court did not permit the action, holding that an Article I bankruptcy judge cannot decide a state law claim that is unrelated to bankruptcy process. The Court went further, finding bankruptcy judges to be an unconstitutional infringement on Article III judges. In response to Marathon, Congress enacted the Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984, 128 U.S.C. § 157 (1994), establishing a core/non-core dichotomy. Bankruptcy judges have jurisdiction in core matters. "To be a core proceeding, an action must have as its foundation the creation, recognition, or adjudication of rights which would not exist independently of a bankruptcy environment." Acolyte Elec. Corp. v. City of New York, 69 B.R. 155, 173 (Bankr. E.D. N.Y. 1986). In noncore matters, the bankruptcy court acts as an adjunct to the district court in a fashion similar to a magistrate. See Taxel v. Electronic Sports Research, (In re Cinemationics, Inc.), 916 F.2d 1444, 1449 (9th Cir. 1990). Accordingly, in spite of Marathon, Congress realized that the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction was necessary to the efficient administration of the bankruptcy estate. Article III courts have apparently agreed, broadly construing bankruptcy court jurisdiction over core matters.

n197 For a more complete description of the role of bankruptcy judges, see Zipes, supra note 163, at 1150.

n198 The 1978 changes were enacted, in part, because of Congress' recognition of the need for a specialized court. First, district courts were overburdened by their case load. Congress recognized that bankruptcy matters would not receive the "expeditious disposition" they require if they were handled by the district courts. H.R. Rep. No. 95-595 (1997). Second, in light of the testimony before the commission concerning district court judges' "lack of interest in bankruptcy matters" Congress feared that bankruptcy cases would be placed at the bottom of court calendars. See also H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 14-15 (1977). (Arguing that bankruptcy judges are more competent than "generalist judges that only occasionally handled bankruptcy cases and would not have a sufficient understanding of the law and factual situations that arise in bankruptcy cases. [A generalist judge] would be unable to make the quick decisions that these cases so often require.").

REV_00261883

n199 See Zipes, supra note 163, at 1159.

n200 Congress found that the bankruptcy area had "become too specialized and required too much expertise to be handled on an ad hoc basis by a generalist court." H.R. Rep. No. 95-595.

n201 This may be less true for district court judges involved in mass tort cases. These judges develop special expertise after seeing the same mass tort issues time and again. This point was made by Justice Breyer in the Amchem dissent, when he stated that the appellate courts should not so easily second-guess the factual findings of the district court judge, who has the benefit of a close examination of the facts relating to the specific case. See Amchem, 117 S. Ct. at 2252 (Breyer, J., dissenting in part).

n202 See United Savings Ass'n of Tex. v. Timbers of Inwood Forest Assoc., Ltd., 808 F.2d 363, 373 (5th Cir. 1987) (en banc), aff'd, 484 U.S. 365 (1988).

Early and ongoing judicial management of . . . cases is essential if the . . . process is to survive and if the goals of reorganizability on the one hand, and creditor protection, on the other, are to be achieved. In almost all cases the key to avoiding excessive administrative costs, which are borne by the unsecured creditors, as well as excessive interest expense, which is borne by all creditors, is early and stringent judicial management of the case.

United Savings Ass'n of Tex., 808 F.2d at 373 (footnotes omitted).

n203 See Cohen & Thiros, P.C. v. Keen Enter., Inc., 44 B.R. 570, 573 (N.D. Ind. 1984).

n204 See In re Croton River Club, Inc., 52 F.3d 41 (2d Cir. 1995) (the Second Circuit gave a bankruptcy court tremendous power to overrule a homeowners' association's decision, usually sacrosanct in New York state, all in the name of speed).

n205 See 11 U.S.C. § 105 (1994). See also United Savings Ass'n of Tex., 484 U.S. at 365; Worthington v. Ahlers, 485 U.S. 197, 206 (1988) (whatever equitable powers remain in bankruptcy courts can only be exercised within the confines of the Bankruptcy Code). However, bankruptcy courts remain courts of equity. They can do what is necessary to forward the bankruptcy system's goals, including to speed the case along. See In re Bonner Mall Partnership, 2 F.3d 899 (9th Cir. 1993).

n206 Hansen, Jones & Leta, P.C. v. Segal, 220 B.R. 434 (D. Utah 1998) (finding that although the debtor has a fiduciary duty to creditors of the estate, debtor's counsel does not).

n207 See Avellino & Bienes v. M. Frenville Co., 74 F.2d 332 (3d Cir. 1984) (state law rather than bankruptcy law is applied to determine when a claim arose). This case has been criticized in other circuits. See, e.g., In re Waterman S.S. Corp., 141 B.R. 552 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1992). Section 502(e)(1)(B) disallows a creditor's claim if the claim is one for reimbursement of or contribution to a claimant that is "liable with the debtor on or has secured the claim of a creditor, to the extent that as of . . . the claim for reimbursement or contribution is contingent as of the time of its allowance or disallowance . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 502(e)(1)(B) (1994). See In re Charter Co., 81 B.R. 644 (M.D. Fla. 1987), aff'd 862 F.2d 1500 (11 Cir. 1989).

n208 Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act (CERCLA), 42 U.S.C. §§ 9601-9675 (1994). See, e.g., CMC Heartland Partners v. Union Pac. R.R., 3 F.3d

REV_00261884

200 (7th Cir. 1993); California Dep't of Health Servs. v. Jensen, 995 F.2d 925 (9th Cir. 1993); In re Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pac. R.R., 974 F.2d 775 (7th Cir. 1992); United States v. LTV Corp., 944 F.2d 997 (2d Cir. 1991); In re Penn Cent. Transp. Co., 944 F.2d 164 (3d Cir. 1991); Lancaster v. Tennessee, 831 F.2d 118 (6th Cir. 1987); Erman v. Lox Equip. Co., 142 B.R. 905 (N.D. Cal. 1992); AM Int'l, Inc. v. Datacard Corp., 146 B.R. 391 (N.D. Ill. 1992); In re National Gypsum Co., 139 B.R. 397 (N.D. Tex. 1992); Sylvester Bros. Dev. Co. v. Burlington N. R.R., 133 B.R. 648 (D. Minn. 1991); United States v. Union Scrap Iron & Metal, 123 B.R. 831 (D. Minn. 1990); Juniper Dev. Group v. Kahn, 73 B.R. 494 (Bankr. D. Mass. 1987).

n209 See Grady v. A.H. Robins Co., 839 F.2d 198, 203 (4th Cir. 1988) (court found injuries claim arose at the time of the use of the product, rather than at the time of the injury which occurred after the bankruptcy filing date); In re Eagle-Picher Indus., Inc., 23 B.R. 203, 256, 262 (S.D. Ohio 1996) (holding that claims can be allowed and somewhat amazingly calculating the expected claims to be filed after the petition date to be $ 2,024,511,000); Schweitzer v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 758 F.2d 936 (3d Cir. 1985); In re UNR Indus., Inc., 725 F.2d 1111 (7th Cir. 1984); Waterman S.S. Corp. v. Aguiar, 141 B.R. 552 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1992), vacated on other grounds, 157 B.R. 220 (S.D. N.Y. 1993); In re JohnsManville Corp., 57 B.R. 680, 686-88 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1986). Examples of other types of cases in which the issue has been discussed include River Place E. Hous. Corp. v. Rosenfeld (In re Rosenfeld), 23 F.3d 833, 838 (4th Cir. 1994) (post-petition assessments for dues to a housing cooperative), Lemelle v. Universal Mfg. Corp., 18 F.3d 1268, 1274-78 (5th Cir. 1994) (product liability action), In re Piper Aircraft Corp., 162 B.R. 619 (Bankr. S.D. Fla.) (product liability action), aff'd sub nom., Epstein v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors of Piper Aircraft Corp., 168 B.R. 434, 43940 (S.D. Fla. 1994), Pettibone Corp. v. Ramirez (In re Pettibone Corp.), 90 B.R. 918, 930-32 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1988) (product liability action), Roach v. Edge (In re Edge), 60 B.R. 690 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 1986) (medical malpractice claim), Riso v. Francis (In re Riso), 58 B.R. 978, 979-80 (Bankr. D. N.H. 1986) (breach of non-compete clause) and In re O'Danny Boy, Inc., 35 B.R. 955, 957-58 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 1983) (damage and waste to leased property).

n210 See Bruce S. Nathan, Protecting Corporate Creditors Under the Bankruptcy Code, Matthew Bender's Business Law Monographs, 48, Apr., 1997; see also supra note 209.

n211 See Nathan supra note 210.

n212 See In re Dow Corning Corp., 211 B.R. 545 (E.D. Mich. 1997).

n213 A further problem with the bankruptcy option is the sheer length of time each case remains in Chapter 11. In the Dow Corning bankruptcy, testimony revealed that mass tort bankruptcy cases involving public companies with assets of greater than $ 100 million in 1980 dollars, filed between October 1, 1979 and December 31, 1997, tend to linger in Chapter 11 bankruptcy for many years before confirmation. UNR Industries, Inc., for example, stayed in bankruptcy for 80 months prior to confirmation. See Does Exclusivity Foster Chaos or Cooperation?, Banker. Ct. Decision Wkly. News & Cmt., June 16, 1998, at A11. Of course, class action cases are no better. The Ahearn settlement is now approaching its sixth year of uncertainty.

n214 See In re Johns-Manville Corp., 68 B.R. at 621.

n215 11 U.S.C. §524(g).

n216 See id. at 575.

n217 Id. at 514.

n218 See In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 982 F.2d at 734.

n219 Id.

n220 See In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 1991 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7527 (E.D.N.Y. & S.D.N.Y. May 16, 1991).

n221 Indeed, although the A.H. Robins trust, which was funded in accordance with the bankruptcy court's estimation of future claims, appears to have sufficient funds to pay all the claims in full, one court has questioned the court's "uncanny prognosticating ability," stating that "the court clearly feared that its estimate would not hit the mark as it felt compelled to take extraordinary measures to control the make-up and activities of the purportedly independent Claimants Trust." In re Dow Corning Corp., 211 B.R. 545, 601 n.60 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 1997).

n222 In re Dow Corning Corp., 211 B.R. at 602-03.

n223 See supra note 210.

n224 See In re Dow Corning, 211 B.R. at 545.

n225 The dissent in Ahearn stated that the case was extraordinarily important, concluding that Fibreboard's litigation strategy was bound to lead other financially threatened companies to utilize it as a road map. See Flanagan v. Ahearn, 90 F.3d at 994 (Smith, J., dissenting).

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "mass torts" and consolidation and uniform and judge and court and date(aft 1997) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 23, 2001 - 8:04 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

focus in significant part on potential conflicts of interest, ensuring that the representative has suffered the same injury as the other class members [32] and also is capable of litigating the claims of others.

Once these prerequisites are met, class action participants must also qualify under one of the subparts of Rule 23(b). [33] For the purposes of class actions in the mass tort context, Rule 23 (b)(1)(B) and (b)(3) are most [*18] important, [34] because they provide the court with some statutory justification for resolving mass tort claims facing an otherwise healthy company. [35] Rule 23(b)(1) permits certification when resolution of individual law suits would "substantially impair" other members' ability to protect their interests. This provision is most commonly used when "limited funds" are at stake or where "the prosecution of separate actions by or against individual members of the class would create a risk of . . . adjudications with respect to individual members of the class which would as a practical matter be dispositive of the interests of the other members not parties to the adjudications . . . ." [36] It is a mandatory class action provision, with no risk that individual members will opt out of the class to pursue litigation to the prejudice of other members. [37] Accordingly, defendant companies seeking to limit their liability prefer lawsuits under this provision.

The Supreme Court has termed Federal Rule 23(b)(3) [38] to be the most "adventuresome" [39] of the class action provisions. Class actions under Rule [*19] 23(b)(3), often referred to as "non-mandatory" or "opt-out" class actions, are maintainable if they meet the requirements of "predominance" and "superiority." [40] Unlike Rule 23(b)(1), Rule 23(b)(3) does not require a request for declaratory or injunctive relief. It requires notice to all class members. [41] The notice must provide an opportunity for a potential class member to opt-out and warn the party that, if it does not request an exclusion, it will be bound by any subsequent judgment. [42] It is the provision which the Supreme Court directly addressed in Amchem.

Rule 23(b)(3) has been increasingly used in the mass tort context. [43] Litigants justify its use exactly because of its opt-out provision, which avoids nasty issues regarding the violation of due process rights of absent members and is arguably fairer to future claimants, who are not necessarily bound. At the same time, the provision creates a great deal of uncertainty for companies wishing to limit their liability by agreeing to settle a class action because of the claimants' right to opt-out and perhaps commence an individual suit. These elements will be discussed in further detail below.

While Rule 23(a) and (b) deal with certification, Rule 23(e) addresses the settlement of class actions. No class action may be "dismissed or compromised without court approval," [44] preceded by notice to class members. This Court blessing of a settlement is not a usual part of the adversary process. First, it impacts upon individualized choice in when and how to settle by inviting court intervention into the process. Second, the Court's independent inquiries, even in the absence of an objection to the proposed settlement by the litigants, represents a break from the court's normally neutral and passive mien with respect to how parties handle their case. However, this provision is useful when large groups of absent class members, with no real ability to protect their rights, are involved in a law suit. [*20] The court becomes their protectors. Although the standard for settlement under Rule 23(e) is vague and appears to give little guidance to the courts of a settlement standard, this is not as big a problem as it appears as courts have developed comprehensive tests to determine an adequacy of settlement. [45]

D. Problems with Class Actions in the Mass Tort Context Prior to the Amchem Supreme Court Decision and the Remand of Ahearn

As set forth above, the prerequisites of the class action are straight forward enough. However, the use of the class action in resolving mass torts is not at all obvious. Most fundamentally, the decidedly narrowing language of the Advisory Committee Note to Rule 23 discourages the use of class actions for resolving mass torts. [46]

REV_00261847

With this language, class actions instantly suffer in a way that bankruptcy [47] does not in that there is no statutory sanction for its use in resolving mass torts. After all, courts are not supposed to ignore substantive law to facilitate class action treatment. [48] Even in the absence of the generally strict constructionalist Supreme Court, it is likely that appellate courts would [*21] have had great problems with the creative approaches of lower courts or academics in applying class actions to mass torts. A pattern of reversing lower courts who take liberties in adapting class actions did in fact occur and found its ultimate manifestation in the Amchem decision. [49] Indeed, the sheer persistence of the courts in using the class actions in the face of this seemingly clear statutory authority points to desperation: the problems posed by mass tort law are not, in those courts' opinions, being addressed through legislative and other means.

Class actions as a way of resolving mass torts saw their first use with the Dalkan Shield litigation. [50] The district court took the large step of certifying a nationwide class on punitive damages issues. It saw a need to stop the injustice "that large numbers of plaintiffs who are not first in line at the courthouse door will be deprived of a practical means of redress," because companies will face financial ruin after verdicts in relatively few cases. [51] The district court also stated that it had the power to "certify a class when such a decision is in the collective best interest of the plaintiffs." [52] These reasons for approving certification, while perhaps logical, had no specific statutory basis. Debtor rehabilitation and equality of distribution of similarly situated creditors are not major goals of the greater adversary system, although they are in the bankruptcy system. [53] The circuit court reversed on the strength of its concern with the Advisory Committee's Note to Rule 23 discouraging the use of class actions for resolving mass torts. [54] [*22]

Nevertheless, the district courts, not the circuit courts, have to deal with the deluge of mass tort cases on a daily level, and some district courts, guided by their belief that something must be done, keep trying to push the boundaries of the use of the class action as did the Dalkon Shield court. [55]

This battle of the courts with respect to whether class actions may be used to resolve mass torts is reflected in scholarly articles as well. Some commentators argue large class actions serve to address the need to "formulate legal ideas in general or universal terms, rather than ad hoc." [56] Likewise, commentators have argued that class actions should be used to create new possibilities for resolving problems in an increasingly complex society. [57]

These commentators believe Rule 23 is a beneficial provision that should be given a broad reading to afford maximum flexibility. They argue that the provision in fact permits experimentation in uncharted territories, notwithstanding the infamous 1966 note, thereby permitting policymaking in mass tort adjudication that stimulates innovation; unbound by bad precedent in one jurisdiction, mass tort judges and lawyers in other jurisdictions may avoid past mistakes and undertake novel approaches to knotty problems. Further, corporations may seek to limit their risks and losses by joining together. [58]

However, other commentators have criticized this free wheeling approach of Rule 23. Regardless of the good policy reasons for using class actions, they return to the fact that there is simply no explicit federal basis for experimentation. One commentator stated that the recent mass tort cases prior to Amchem offered much room for concern regarding their treatment of claimants with different conditions and alteration of otherwise applicable state law, which arguably Rule 23 cannot and should not alter. [59] [*23]

In asbestos cases, for example, many have argued that there is a natural conflict of interest between claimants who already suffer from ailments, and those who have been exposed but are as of yet symptom free. [60] A court must also consider the conflicts within a potential class which includes members living in states that permit immediate substantial recoveries with a broad definition of punitive damages and members from other states. The courts' willingness to create a single class to accommodate these conflicting interests in the recent settlements brought under the Rule 23 rubric, these commentators argued, seems highly questionable. [61]

Two cases stood out as foils in the debate regarding whether class actions are an efficient method for addressing mass torts, the Amchem case as it wound its way up to the Supreme Court, and the Ahearn [62] case, in which the court very self-consciously attempted to distinguish itself from Amchem. In general, the Amchem circuit court adopted the strict view that experimentation in class action settlements cannot be justified under case law precedent; the Ahearn circuit court adopted a more flexible approach. These two cases encapsulate the debate regarding the expanding use of class actions to resolve mass torts and will be the focus of the next section.

E. The Amchem and Ahearn Cases

The Amchem and Ahearn cases share some obvious commonalities. Both cases arose from the asbestos crisis, which threatened the health of affected individuals as well as major companies. Indeed, the fates of perhaps millions of individuals rested on the outcomes of the cases; each asbestos claimant was, or some day may be, adversely affected by past exposure to asbestos products manufactured by one or more of the over 20 companies sued for damages. They were also both "settlement" class actions, commenced by parties which had no intention to litigate, a recent phenomenon and increasingly common in the mass tort context.

The cases also differed in certain respects: (1) Ahearn was a mandatory class action brought under Federal Rule 23(b)(1), while Amchem was an optout class action under Federal Rule 23 (b)(3); and (2) Amchem did not involve a limited fund, while Ahearn did. The Ahearn circuit court found these [*24] differences to be highly significant and assumed its decision would survive regardless of the fate of Amchem. More generally, the Ahearn circuit court decision took a more aggressive approach in expanding class action precedent in adapting it to mass torts; the Amchem circuit court refused to do so. What follows is a brief history of the two cases as they wound their way through the appellate process, followed by a comparison of the circuit courts' treatment of the Rule 23 elements.

1. The Amchem Case: A Factual and Procedural History Leading to the Appeal to the Circuit Court

The Amchem class action settlement was made possible after eight federal judges, experienced in the management of complex asbestos cases, urged the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation [hereinafter MDL Panel] [63] to consolidate in a single district all asbestos complaints pending in federal courts. The MDL accepted their recommendation and transferred all asbestos cases then filed, but not yet on trial in federal courts, to a single district, the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, before a single judge for pretrial proceedings. [64]

The order aggregated pending asbestos cases only. [65] After the consolidation, attorneys for plaintiffs and defendants formed steering committees and began settlement negotiations. [66] Once negotiations seemed likely to produce an agreement purporting to bind potential plaintiffs-those who did not manifest any injury and who were not represented by counsel in an action-CCR [67] agreed to settle, through separate agreements, the claims of plaintiffs who had already filed asbestos-related lawsuits. [68] Indeed, CCR had made clear throughout the settlement negotiations that it would not settle unless it could bind these future claimants, thereby permitting the CCR members to finally quantify their losses and continue free from annoying asbestos claims. [69] [*25]

After settling the various inventory claims, CCR and the plaintiffs' lawyers chosen by the CCR filed, within the space of a single day, a complaint, an answer containing general denials, and a proposed settlement agreement, along with a joint motion for conditional class certification.

REV_00261849

The parties never intended to litigate. [70]

The complaint identified nine lead plaintiffs, designating them and members of their families as representatives of a class comprising all persons who had not filed an asbestos-related lawsuit against a CCR defendant as of the date the class action commenced, but who (1) had been affected by asbestos or products containing asbestos attributable to a CCR defendant, or (2) whose spouse or family member had been so exposed. The complaint delineated no subclasses; all named plaintiffs were designated as representatives of the class as a whole. [71]

The settlement further provided that compensation above the fixed ranges was permitted for "extraordinary" claims, but otherwise placed both numerical caps and dollar limits on such claims. Class members were to receive no compensation for certain kinds of claims, even if otherwise applicable state law recognized such claims. The settlement altered state court rights in other ways, in that it failed to provide for compensation to family members of asbestos-exposed individuals for loss of consortium and for other relief. [72] In short, the stipulation did what Congress has refused to do, creating in effect a non-governmental administrative agency guided by a schedule of payments to compensate class members who met defined asbestos-exposure and medical requirements. [73] The court also altered state tort law by altering punitive damages and the right to trial for what it perceived to be a good cause, pushing boundaries in this way as well.

The settlement permanently bound class members who accepted the settlement, while CCR defendants had the opportunity to withdraw from the settlement after ten years, presumably to protect them against a higher than expected number of opt-outs. [74] On January 29, 1993, as requested by the settling parties, the district court conditionally certified, under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(b)(3), [75] the encompassing opt-out class set forth in the settlement agreement. [76] In preliminary rulings, the court found that it had [*26] subject-matter jurisdiction [77] and approved the settling parties' plan for giving notice to the class. [78] The court-approved notice informed recipients that they could exclude themselves from the class, if they so chose, within a three-month opt-out period. [79]

