15 U.S.C. § 15(a) (1982) (emphasis added). Professor Redden provides an excellent discussion of federal statutes that expressly provide for punitive damages, federal statutes that expressly preclude punitive awards, and federal statutes that are unclear on this issue. See K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 558-93.

n236. Judge Friendly favored the power of judicial reduction of punitive awards when writing the opinion in Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832 (2d Cir. 1967):

There is more to be said for drastic judicial control of the amount of punitive awards so as to keep the prospective total within some manageable bounds. This would require, for example, a reduction of the instant $ 100,000 award to something in the $ 5,000-$ 10,000 range, still leaving defendant exposed to several million dollars of exemplary damages.

Id. at 840.

n237. O.W. HOLMES, THE COMMON LAW 3 (1881). As stated in In re Nothern District of California "Dalcon Shield" IUD Products Liability Litigation, 526 F. Supp. 887, 899 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated on other grounds, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983), the purpose of punitive damages awards is "to sting, not kill, a defendant." But see, Acosta v. Honda Motor Co., 717 F.2d 828, 838 n.15 (3d Cir. 1983) (en banc), in which the court suggested punishment to destruction may constitute acceptable policy, or as the court more succinctly noted, "[n]or is such a result necessarily untenable").

n238. As noted by the court in Town of Jackson v. Shaw, 569 P.2d 1246, 1253 (Wyo. 1977), "The punitive allowance should be in an amount that would promote the public interest without financially annihilating the defendants." See Martin v. Johns-Manville Corp., 469 A.2d 655 (Pa. Super. 1983), which authorized punitive damages from a successor corporation for allegedly defective asbestos products supplied by a predecessor corporation. The punished legal entity neither designed, manufactured, nor sold the alleged defective product causing plaintiff's injury. In Morris v. Parke, Davis & Co., 573 F. Supp. 1324 (D.Cal. 1983), the court carried the punitive damage doctrine to its illogical extreme. The court approved the imposition of punitive damages on a defendant in a case in which strict tort liability was initially predicated on the market share theory because the plaintiffs could not establish that the defendant was the manufacturer or the seller of the injury causing product.

n239. See S. 44, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 12(e), (f)(1) (1984) (suggesting that the amount of punitive damages that a plaintiff can receive should not exceed the amount of compensatory damages awarded, with any remaining punitive damages going to a court-determined "public purpose"). The logic of this suggestion was recognized as early as 1877 by a court that, unfortunately, refused to follows its own instincts. See supra note 186 and accompanying text.

REV_00263608

n240. See supra notes 215-20 and accompanying text.

n241. See Duffy, supra note 9, at 9.

n242. See supra notes 209-13 and accompanying text.

n243. See, e.g., Dempsey v. Auto Owners Ins. Co., 717 F.2d 556, 562 (11th Cir. 1983); White v. Conoco, Inc., 710 F.2d 1442, 1448 (10th Cir. 1983); Moore v. American United Life Ins. Co., 150 Cal. App. 3d 610, , 197 Cal. Rptr. 878, 897 (1984); Riegel v. Aastad, 272 A.2d 715, 717-18 (Del. 1970); Leimgruber v. Claridge Assoc., 73 N.J. 450, 375 A.2d 652, 656 (1977).

n244. Owen, supra note 174, at 57-58; see Warren v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 693 F.2d 1373, 1380 (11th Cir. 1982) (maximum limit is exceeded if award is "neither just nor proper").

n245. As the Fifth Circuit stated about an unrelated abusable relic, legal doctrines that invite appeals and confuse judges, juries, and attorneys ought to be given a "quick and not too decent a burial." United States v. Bailey, 468 F.2d 652, 668-69 (5th Cir. 1972), aff'd en banc, 480 F.2d 518 (5th Cir. 1973).

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 standard and reckless and "substantially certain" (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, October 2, 2002 - 10:34 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

punishment meted out by punitive damages. [53] An exception to this rule, and one that has created much controversy because of the absence of any responsible theoretical foundations coupled with its fundamental inequities, [54] is the award of punitive damages based on vicarious liability. [55]

Courts are less than clear in defining and identifying the entities sought to be deterred by the effects of punitive damages. [56] For example, Iowa, Mississippi, North Carolina, Ohio, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia intend to deter persons other than the defendant from committing acts similar to those that prompted the punitive damage award. [57] Other jurisdictions that have adopted punitive damages observe that it is their policy to deter both the defendant and other potential wrongdoers. [58] Arizona and New Jersey, however, hold that the deterrent effect of punitive damages should be directed only at the particular tortfeasor before the court, [59] while Minnesota is unclear concerning whom it intends to [*1128] deter with punitive damages. [60]

B. Punishment Only

Delaware is the only state that has adopted punishment as the sole purpose for the imposition of punitive damages. [61] The Delaware Supreme Court has stated that it will allow punitive damages only as punishment to the tortfeasor for willfully and wantonly committed wrongful acts. [62] Wisconsin, similarly, recognizes the punishment rationale as a sufficient, if not sole, basis for imposing punitive damages. [63]

C. Deterrence Only

Deterrence represents the singular basis for authorizing punitive damages in Alaska, Georgia, Idaho, Maine, Oregon, Rhode Island, and Utah. [64] Many of these jurisdictions, however, do not specifically hold deterrence as the sole rationale for awarding punitive damages, but merely imply this basis. [65] The Idaho Supreme Court, in discussing the policy of deterrence, observed:

We prefer to accentuate those cases which define the purpose of exemplary damages as a deterrent to the defendant and others from engaging in similar conduct in the future. We concede that any exemplary damages assessed against a defendant will appear to him to be punishment. However, we feel [*1129] that the courts in these civil cases should be motivated primarily by a purpose of deterrence and not by a purpose of punishment. In other words, the assessment of exemplary damages should be prompted by the court's or jury's desire to assure, to the extent possible via the imposition of a monetary penalty, that similar conduct does not occur in the future. Punishment, per se, should be left to the criminal law. [66]

Also, as in those jurisdictions that recognize both punishment and deterrence as the rationales for punitive damages, [67] the jurisdictions that recognize only a deterrence rationale fail to clarify the entities sought to be deterred by the award of punitive damages. [68] This lack of uniformity in policy and application reflects the inherent weakness in a doctrine that, rather than advancing the best interests of society, actually threatens society's economic underpinnings.

Texas recently has announced that either deterrence or punishment, separately and independently, constitute an appropriate rationale for the assessment of punitive damages. [69] Therefore, the plaintiff may elect to seek punitive damages based on only the deterrence rationale, on only the punishment rationale, or both. [70] This judicial aberration reflects not only the lack of legal soundness of the doctrine, but also demonstrates the court's acceptance of the notion that punitive damages can serve as a windfall for plaintiffs.

D. Award of Additional Damages

REV_00263566

Several jurisdictions view punitive damages as mere monetary awards that complement compensatory damages. [71] Punitive damages, [*1130] in these jurisdictions, serve to provide remuneration for intangible injuries such as hurt feelings, loss of companionship, wounded dignity, grief, embarrassment, [72] mental anguish, [73] or litigation expenses. [74] These jurisdictions predicate their philosophy on the outdated theorem that such injuries were not compensable under early common law. [75] Common sense and the current availability of expanded, if not unlimited, compensatory damages in all tort actions expose the fallacy of this rationale. [76]

IV. APPLICATION OF THE PUNITIVE DAMAGE DOCTRINE IN TODAY'S CONTEXT

A. Standards of Conduct That Warrant Punitive Damages

The ratio decidendi that courts employ when imposing punitive damages vary in almost indecipherable, yet extremely important, degress. The disparate innuendos and connotations that accompany the legal bases articulated to support punitive damage liability precipitate subtle shifts in jury interpretations, in understandings of the law, and in burdens of proof. For this reason, the jurisdiction in which a plaintiff institutes suit profoundly affects the outcome of his case. Generally, most jurisdictions focus on the defendant's conduct, rather than the nature or extent of the harm sustained by the plaintiff. [77] This restricted approach lends itself to anything but consistency. Although a broad standard is necessarily imprecise, most commentators acknowledge that the imposition of punitive damages requires more than a mere tortious act -- the defendant's conduct must be aggravated or outrageous, or characterized by some positive element of conscious wrongdoing. [78]

[*1131] 1. Standard of Intentional Conduct

Those jurisdictions and commentators who recognize the validity of the punitive damage doctrine envision recovery when the defendant's actions eithe are or are deemed to be intentional. [79] Most of these courts and commentators adopt this proposition [*1132] without hesitation and endeavor to expand the punitive damage concept to situations that concern more imprecise conduct. [80] It is in this area of marginally intentional conduct that the judicial standards for imposing punitive damages first become muddled and legally irrational. Some states, therefore, have espoused very strong standards of appellate review. In Rhode Island the courts will approve punitive awards only "upon evidence of such willfulness, recklessness or wickedness, on the part of the party at fault, as amounted to criminality." [81] New Jersey, similarly, requires the plaintiff to prove "actual malice, which is nothing more or less than intentional wrongdoing -- an evil-minded act . . . or an act accompanied by a wanton and willful disregard of the rights of another." [82] Other jurisdictions have couched the standard in slightly different, yet equally strong, language. California requires that "the defendant must be guilty of oppression, fraud or malice. . . . He must act with the intention to vex, injure or annoy, or with a conscious disregard of the plaintiff's rights." [83] In Vermont the plaintiff must show "that there was actual malice . . . conduct [*1133] manifesting personal ill will or carried out under circumstances evidencing insult or oppression, or even by conduct showing a reckless or wanton disregard of one's rights." [84] Other states employ weaker characterizations of the intentional conduct standard. New York requires that "the wrong [be] aggravated by evil or a wrongful motive or that there [be] willful and intentional misdoing, or a reckless indifference equivalent thereto." [85] Alabama possesses one [*1134] of the weaker intentional conduct standards in that the courts only require "some circumstances of aggravation, such as willfulness, wantonness, maliciousness, gross negligence or recklessness, oppression, outrageous conduct, indignity and contumely, insult, or fraud or gross fraud." [86]

The standards of intentional conduct sufficient to warrant punitive awards vary in degrees, both from each other and from the reckless and negligent standards that many jurisdictions apply. Significantly, one legal scholar has proposed that courts should limit punitive damages to cases concerning intentional faults. [87] Another well-known scholar, who formerly enthusiastically supported a rather unrestricted approach to punitive damages, [88] after viewing the results of an unfettered application of punitive damages over a mere seven year period, now recognizes the importance of limiting punitive damages to intentional and quasi-intentional situations. [89]

REV_00263567

[*1135] 2. Standard of Reckless Conduct

The broad area of reckless or wanton conduct is an ill-defined, often fluctuating category. The courts ostensibly have articulated a clearly defined and legally meaningful standard to evaluate potential liability for punitive damages. Any analysis of the cases, however, reveals an unintelligible, linguistic exercise in legalese, the significance of which doubtlessly is lost upon many legal scholars and, more importantly, most jurors. Generally, the cases delineate a continuum of antisocial conduct. The upper, aggravated end of this continuum approaches intentional conduct, and therefore, courts are more likely to authorize the imposition of punitive damages for this type of conduct. The lower, more passive end of the continuum consists of conduct that is simply improper or ill-conceived, but is not of such egregious quality that it warrants punitory measures. Between these two extremes is conduct that varies in often imperceptible, but extremely important degrees for the application of the punitive damage concept.

A review of the cases employing "the reckless or wanton" standard discloses a disturbing overlap between this standard and the intentional conduct standard. The distinctions between the two standards often are too imperceptible to allow absolute categorization. Some courts proclaim that the standard for the imposition of punitive damages is "actual malice, which is nothing more or less than intentional wrongdoing -- an evil-minded act" [90] , or "an evil intent deserving of punishment or of something in the nature of special ill will." [91] Some courts repudiate the necessity of demonstrating actual malice in favor or a standard of "legal malice," which [*1136] appears to differ little from intentional conduct. [92] Others refer to "conscious disregard of [the plaintiff's] rights" and award punitive damages when the evidence demonstrates that the defendant acted willfull and maliciously. [93] Other courts denominate reckless or wanton conduct as "gross negligence" which then is defined as an "entire want of care" that raises an inference of "conscious indifference" to the rights of others. [94] Still other jurisdictions judge the defendant's conduct against a standard of reckless or wanton conduct, oppression, fraud, or malice under which the wrongdoer must act with the intent to vex, injure or annoy, [95] or act out of a maliciousness or recklessness that evidences an utter disregard of the consequences. [96] At least one court has judicially formulated a standard of reckless, wanton, or oppressive conduct that requires spite, ill will, or reckless indifference by the defendant. [97] Tennessee has [*1137] attempted to amalgamate all of the various characterizations of the reckless standard into one sentence. Tennessee courts will allow punitive damages in cases involving fraud, malice, gross negligence or oppression, . . .or where a wrongful act is done with a bad motive or so recklessly as to imply a disregard of social obligation, . . . or where there is such willful misconduct or entire want of care as to raise a presumption of conscious indifference to consequences. [98]

The standards for measuring reckless or wanton conduct are confusing and devoid of any effective definition. Scholars universally have acknowledged the absence of any meaningful characterization. [99] Jurors motivated by the noble desire to render a fair verdict simply cannot fathom the intricacies in meaning and subtle connotations that characterize the different standards for measuring [*1138] reckless or wanton conduct. [100] Because of the absence of any understandable standards of measurement and the inevitably inconsistent interpretations by juries, every defendant increasingly is subject to the vagaries of individual jurisdictions and an uninformed jury.

REV_00263568

3. Standard of Negligent Conduct

Most courts refuse to impose punitive damages for "negligent" conduct. [101] Some states purport, however, to recognize a distinction between mere negligence and gross negligence, and they invariably authorize punitive damages only for the latter. [102] At least one court had held that gross negligence, in and of itself, is not sufficient to support an award of punitive damages. [103]

B. The Corporate Defendant and Punitive Damages

The doctrine of vicarious liability provides a further avenue for courts to impose punitive damages on parties other than the actual wrongdoer. [104] A large number of jurisdictions adhere to the respondeat superior rule that an employer is subject to punitive [*1139] damages when an employee, while operating within the scope of his employment, commits tortious acts that further the employer's interests. The imposition of punitive damages vicariously on another is incongruous with the objective of deterrence. Punishing the employer or corporation for the acts of the servant simply metes out punishment based not on opprobrious conduct but on the mere legal relationship between the offending individual and his employer. A number of other jurisdictions, however, adopt the more conservative "complicity rule." [105] The complicity rule limits the imposition of vicarious liability for punitive damages to situations in which a managerial agent of the employer either commits the egregious act, [106] specifically authorizes the act, [107] or ratifies the [*1140] act [108] or when an unfit employee recklessly hired by the employer commits the act. [109] At least under the complicity rule, the employer or corporation has undertaken an affirmative, conscious act in hiring an unfit employee or authorizing the egregious act of the employee.

Courts also impose punitive damages on corporations under the recently formulated concept of strict tort liability. [110] A recent opinion by the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit demonstrates the extent to which courts have expanded the award of punitive damages in strict liability situations. In Saupitty v. Yazoo Manufacturing Co. [111] the court affirmed awards of $ 560,000 in compensatory damages and $ 440,000 in punitive damages when the plaintiff's left hand and arm were injured by a riding lawnmower the defendant had manufactured. The court sanctioned the punitive award even though the plaintiff substantially had altered the product by removing both the belt guard and the brakes of the mower. [112] A vigorous dissent asserted that under applicable strict tort liability doctrine either of these material alterations to the mower should have constituted grounds for a directed verdict for the defendant. [113] The dissent also emphasized that even if the court elected to impose strict liability under such meager evidence, no evidence existed in the record to justify an award of [*1141] punitive damages. [114]

The imposition of punitive damages in the strict liability context also has been assailed on the grounds that punitive damages traditionally are awarded in tort actions in which the compensatory damages are premised on conduct, while compensatory damages in strict tort liability actions are based solely on the condition of the product. [115] Strict tort liability rests entirely on the socioeconomic policy of risk distribution. Following this rationale, the product supplier is essentially blameless. Liability is visited upon the product supplier on the theoretical basis that the supplier is the entity best able to absorb the loss suffered by a product user simply by distributing the added cost to the marketing public and by purchasing additional insurance. Consequently, courts in strict liability cases award compensatory damages because of the condition of the product, not the conduct of the product supplier. Punitive damages in a strict tort liability context, therefore, would seem to be plainly illogical because neither punishment nor deterrence of conduct is at issue. [116]

An equally compelling argument against punitive damages in a strict liability context is that such awards in product liability cases produce economically and socially undesirable results.

REV_00263569

[117] The gravest danger in products liability is that an aggregate of punitive awards can bankrupt or financially cripple a business. [118] One commentator has observed that the recent trend toward more substantial punitive damage verdicts has reached the point at which the [*1142] question must be posed whether the goal of punitive damages is "punishment of the defendant or actually his annihilation." [119] Courts, however, increasingly ignore or only superficially address these arguments in their affirmation of punitive damage awards against manufacturers in a strict tort liability context. [120] The situation in strict tort liability is exacerbated by the fact that liability may be predicated on an alleged defective design or a defective warning on the product. Products are marketed in certain design lines and literally millions of identically designed or marketed products may exist. If punitive damages may be awarded repeatedly for the same design or marketing deficiency, then indeed, the punitive damage doctrine may be utilized to punish a product supplier to the point of economic destruction. [121] Several recent decisions, [*1143] unmindful of the concern for the continued economic viability of product suppliers, have acknowledged that the bankruptcy or other form of annihilation of a product supplier by the repeated imposition of punitive damage awards could be justified and judicially sanctioned. [122]

The Fifth Circuit recently recognized the serious problem of supplier annihilation in Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp. [123] and elected to reject the punitive damages concept in the area of industry-wide asbestos related litigation. The Fifth Circuit recognized that economic loss distribution represented the primary objective of strict tort liability [124] and noted that one court had suggested that "the demise of the manufacturer in such circumstances is not a 'necessarily untenable' result." [125] The Fifth Circuit, however, refused to accept this draconian result and stated that "[a]t the point where awards of punitive damages destroy the viability of the enterprises necessary to accomplish loss distribution, the remedy of punitive damages becomes incompatible with the strict liability cause of action." [126] The court's major rationale was the [*1144] continued financial viability of manufacturers, which would insure compensation for the projected future thousands of asbestosis claimants. The judges expressed a reluctance to provide a windfall to the current plaintiffs at the expense of future claimants who conceivably would be foreclosed from recovering even compensatory damages if repeated punitive awards continue to bankrupt manufacturers. Of course, the court did consider, in rejecting the punitive damages award, that the continued viability of product suppliers is the very essence of society's continued economic existence.

The Fifth Circuit's decision in Jackson is an implicit recognition of a problem that must concern the courts: should the judiciary determine whether businesses which constitute the underpinning of this society's economy continue to exist and remain viable as the producer of products necessary to service society and as the employer of the millions of individuals composing society? The avowed purpose of the punitive damage doctrine never has been and never should be the economic destruction of business entities. If such decisions should be imposed, they should emanate from a duly elected and representative legislative body. The destruction of businesses, the loss of thousands of jobs, the repeated trauma to the American economy, and the significantly increased product costs to consumers should not be the objective of any system. The current antibusiness attitude reflected in the multitude of recent decisions is troubling. Such judicially mandated, economically adverse consequences exceed society's tolerance of judicial activism, and punitive sentences of death for corporations should no longer [*1145] be permitted under the guise of a civil tort compensation system.

C. Other Factors Affecting Punitive Damage Awards

Most jurisdictions adhere to the rule that actual or compensatory damages are a prerequisite to an award of punitive damages. [127] The amount of actual or compensatory damages required are not specifically defined and, generally, nominal actual damages suffice. [128]

Perhaps the two factors that most significantly affect the amount of punitive damages

REV_00263570

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined (i)
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 "insurance coverage" and date(aft 1997) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*113 Harv. L. Rev. 1783, **

Copyright (c) 2000 The Harvard Law Review Association Harvard Law Review

May, 2000

113 Harv. L. Rev. 1783

LENGTH: 14780 words

DEVELOPMENTS IN THE LAW -- THE PATHS OF CIVIL LITIGATION III. Problems and Proposals in Punitive Damages Reform

SUMMARY:
... As the modern lawsuit grows more complex and as large classes of plaintiff-victims bring suits against companies and even industries, the threat of punitive damages looms larger over defendants. ... The idea that an injurer must have notice of its potential liability for a harmful act was the driving motivation behind the important 1996 Supreme Court decision in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, which overturned a punitive award of $ 2 million as violative of the Due Process Clause. ... Finally, some states have attempted to reduce the apparent irrationality of punitive damage awards by bifurcating the litigation pro-cess into a liability stage and a damages stage. ... Thus, not only would courts have to consistently apply a multiplier to cover the current enforcement gap, legislatures would also have to allow plaintiffs acting as private attorneys general to recover for the costs to common property or future generations in order to achieve deterrence based on the full social harm the injurer causes. ... Culpability might remain a factor, however, for punitive damages against defendants - whether individuals or corporations - who were reckless or intended to cause injury. ... Currently, only a slight majority of states allow defendants to insure against the risk of punitive liability. ...

TEXT:
[*1783]

As the modern lawsuit grows more complex and as large classes of plaintiff-victims bring suits against companies and even industries, n1 the threat of punitive damages looms larger over defendants. Of course, punitive damages are not awarded in all cases, n2 and they are increasingly remitted by trial judges. n3 When awarded, however, they can be both spectacular and devastating - attracting popular n4 and academic n5 attention. Recent punitive jury awards include a $ 223.82 million legal malpractice award, n6 a $ 114.5 million products liability award, n7 and at least a dozen more verdicts between $ 20 million and $ 100 million. n8 These examples do not represent the ceiling for awards in unique cases: a California jury awarded a plaintiff almost $ 5 billion in a 1999 products liability case against General Motors, n9 and a Hawaii [*1784] jury awarded a plaintiff more than $ 20 billion. n10 Punitive damages are also unpredictable; juries sometimes award more than a plaintiff claims, and judges today adjust the size of jury verdicts more routinely than in the past. n11

In its current state, the doctrine of punitive damages has a questionable logical basis, is difficult to apply, and is unpredictable. This Part presents the irrational state of the law of punitive damages and suggests a modest program of reform. Section A describes the growing problem with punitive damages awards. Section B analyzes the most recent forays areas; criminal penalties, both monetary and non-monetary, do not increase with the defendant's wealth.

REV_00263610

Although these suggestions promote efficiency and theoretical coherence, enhancing the rationality and symmetry of punitive damages, proposals for reform from outside the deterrence theory school augment their strength. The most obvious first step in promoting predictability and rationality is for judges instead of juries to make the primary determination of punitive awards. n117 One of the foundational inconsistencies of the doctrine of punitive damages is that punitive amounts are determined by juries while the reasons for awards are given by judges - reasons which may not be the real reasons behind the award. n118 In addition, jurors with consistent reasons or equal levels of moral condemnation may not attach consistent valuations to those reasons. n119 A judge-imposed sanction on defendants that a jury has found punitively liable would also bypass the failure of juries to take into account the necessities of corporate risk and decisionmaking. This failure manifests itself in an intuition that corporations should not "treat people like statistics" - and in the psychological bias against [*1803] corporations that has been documented in jury determinations of corporate culpability. n120 Accordingly, juries incentivize defendants toward an inefficient zero level of risk in their activities and products. To enhance the rationality of the judge's award, a panel of experts or even an independent agency might provide useful aid in assessing any cost-benefit analysis conducted ex ante by the defendant. n121 Judicial damages determinations may not represent a radical departure from current practice, as many awards are remitted by the trial judge or on appeal, n122 but would be an important step in shaping a more predictable and therefore a more effective deterrent standard for punitive liability. n123

The extension of this procedural concern is that, if punitive damages are to continue to have a retributive purpose, the procedures for their determination should be similar to those used in the criminal context, perhaps entrusting the decision to seek punitive damages to public prosecutors and turning over all damages to the state. n124 This proposal probably goes too far, n125 but it has two virtues. First, greater [*1804] procedural safeguards for punitive liability, such as a "clear and convincing" standard, n126 would curb some of the criticism that punitive damages allow criminal liability under civil standards. Second, the development of a widespread or even national punitive liability rule (for example, a stringent requirement about intent) to replace the existing system of interrelated and varying standards would alleviate both predictability concerns and the cross-jurisdictional problem. n127 Finally, acknowledging the public role and purpose of punitive damages - through state collection of punitive damages or statutory standards for judges to administer as a matter of law - would give the institution of punitive damages a clearer role in civil litigation. n128

E. Conclusion

In the short run, these changes would probably reduce the overall level of punitive awards. In a sense, this is the answer that the Supreme Court and many commentators have given to the question of how to deal with punitive damages distortions; the Gore standard, for example, created new standards under which to reduce damage awards. Removing considerations of wealth and culpability and placing punitive power in the hands of judges would probably have the effect of at least curbing the highest awards. The effect of these reforms, ideally, would be that defendants would be better able to determine the desired level of safety ex ante, avoiding some of the enforcement problems created by litigation ex post. More abstractly, these changes [*1805] raise the question: Is the legal community willing to sacrifice some tort enforcement for greater punitive damages rationality?

If compensatory damages - which seem easier rationally to predict than punitive damages n129 - can take the place of some of the enforcement lost through punitive damages reform, then a general reduction in the amount of punitive damages awarded is not necessarily a bad idea. Although the idea that punitive damages should fill the enforcement gap is most developed in law and economics scholarship, the rationale exists even in the case law. n130 If the litigation system itself can be structured better to fill the enforcement gap, courts might be open to phasing out large extracompensatory awards. It is worth asking, therefore, whether other techniques of litigation that are part of the new shape of lawsuits could fulfill those deterrent and punitive purposes more effectively than punitive damages.

REV_00263619

Two potential alternatives exist that could close the enforcement gap by encouraging more awards of compensatory damages, providing deterrence without some of the troubling theoretical inconsistencies associated with punitive damages. For example, wider acceptance of a subrogation technique would allow insurers to pay victims directly for their injuries in the proper amount, then sue the defendants for the whole. This technique would place plaintiffs and defendants on a more even playing field by allowing an experienced market player to make one major investment in litigating the claims arising from a given accident. n131 A wider latitude for class action certification might also reduce the number of cases in the courts, the number of uncompensated victims, and the size of the enforcement gap. n132 In particular, institutional class representatives would have the resources to manage both common claims and differences between class members, the time differential between the appearance of various claims, and the substantive demands of mass tort litigation. Subrogation and class actions both reduce the cost per claim of litigating multi-victim accidents and allow more plaintiffs to prosecute their claims, closing the enforcement gap.

A potentially more difficult task is to find a logical and effective way to replace the retributive value of punitive damages. This approach [*1806] assumes that, given full deterrence and compensation for victims, further retribution would still be desirable. This proposition is questionable, n133 but some alternatives to punitive damages may yet exist in this area. For example, regulatory penalties might ultimately replace the law enforcement or deterrent aspects of punitive damages. n134 The same regulatory agencies that make enforcement decisions about safety regulations might also decide whether violations are so severe as to deserve punitive liability in addition to regulatory penalties. n135 Such a suggestion adds an element of expertise to Murphy's suggestion that a state actor have responsibility for requesting punitive liability. n136

With these more systemic long-term possibilities in view, a modest program of incremental change such as that suggested above can reduce the law's reliance on punitive damages to meet the goals of deterrence and punishment. To be most effective, however, legislative bodies in each state must define the purposes of punitive damages and the desired level of deterrence. Perhaps with centralized, national data from an expert agency, states would be able to justify their particular regimes as effective in fulfilling those purposes while minimizing distortive effects. This process of definition and justification would reduce the sometimes irrational nature of punitive damages, the Court's main target in Gore, and would also solidify the theoretical framework for punitive damages. Such a project could be accomplished in time, transforming punitive damages from one of the most vilified elements of the litigation process into a useful and rational adjunct to compensatory damages.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. See supra Part II; supra Part IV.

n2. A detailed empirical survey of punitive damage awards in 45 of the most populous U.S. counties found that punitive damages are awarded in less than 10% of jury trials. See Theodore Eisenberg, John Goerdt, Brian Ostrom, David Rottman & Martin Wells, The Predictability of Punitive Damages, 26 J. Legal Stud. 623, 632-35 (1997). The median punitive award was $ 50,000, but because of high-end awards, the mean punitive award was $ 534,000. See id. at 634 tbl.1.

REV_00263620

n3. See, e.g., Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 22, 1999, at C16. In most cases, remittitur is not a simple reduction of the award (which would substitute the discretion of the court for that of the jury), but rather a grant of a new trial if the plaintiff does not agree to accept a lower award than that determined by the jury. See generally Johansen v. Combustion Eng'g, Inc., 170 F.3d 1320, 1327-29 (11th Cir. 1999) (discussing this aspect of the remittitur process).

n4. A recent high-profile products liability case, for example, was brought against McDonald's by a customer who spilled her McDonald's coffee, burning herself, and received an award of $ 2.9 million. See Liebeck v. McDonald's Restaurants, P.T.S., Inc., No. CV-93-02419, 1995 WL 360309 (D.N.M. Aug. 18, 1994).

n5. See infra pp. 1785-86, 1787-88.

n6. See Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, supra note 3 (discussing Piscitelli v. Friedenberg, No. 707862 (Cal. Super. Ct., San Diego County, Jan. 14, 1998)).

n7. See Margaret Cronin Fisk, 7,600 Volts Equals $ 114M Verdict, Nat'l L.J., Nov. 22, 1999, at A10 (discussing the post-verdict settlement in Aultman v. Duncan Mfg., No. CV-96-077 (Ala. Cir. Ct., Hale County, Oct. 29, 1999) and describing its terms).

n8. See generally Margaret Cronin Fisk, Verdicts: The Big Numbers of 1999, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 28, 1999, at C4; Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, supra note 3.

n9. See GM's Challenge to $ 4.9 Billion Judgment Set for August 26 Hearing in California, Prod. Liab. Daily (BNA) D6 (Aug. 17, 1999), available in Westlaw, BNA-PLD File.

n10. The plaintiff in this case brought suit in Hawaii state court, claiming that the Marcos family of the Philippines imprisoned and tortured him after he discovered a cache of gold hidden by Japan in the Phillippines during World War II. See Roxas v. Marcos, 969 P.2d 1209, 1218-33 (Haw. 1998). The Hawaii Supreme Court reduced the verdict to $ 6 million, finding that the jury award was too speculative. See id. at 1275.

n11. See Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, supra note 3 ("Judges hacked away at large jury awards at an unprecedented pace in 1998.").

n12. Deterrence theory seeks to minimize social harm by deterring harmful conduct to the point at which the expected benefits lost by the prevented conduct equal the expected harm it will cause. See infra p. 1795.

n13. Commentators once criticized punitive damages for failing to fit neatly into the system of compensation represented by tort law or into the retributive purposes of criminal law. For example, the highest court of New Hampshire once called punitive damages "an unsightly and unhealthy excrescence, deforming the symmetry of the body of law." Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. 342, 382 (1872).

n14. See, e.g., W. Kip Viscusi, The Social Costs of Punitive Damages Against Corporations in Environmental and Safety Torts, 87 Geo. L.J. 285, 322-27 (1998).

n15. See, e.g., GM's Challenge to $ 4.9 Billion Judgment Set for August 26 Hearing in California, supra note 9 (quoting the plaintiff's attorney's defense of the $ 4.8 billion punitive award: "How else do you punish a huge corporation with a daily revenue of $ 440 million and cash on hand amounting to more than $ 12 billion?").

n16. Richard W. Murphy, Superbifurcation: Making Room for State Prosecution in the Punitive Damages Process, 76 N.C. L. Rev. 463, 468 (1998).

REV_00263621

n17. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 42 (1991) (O'Connor, J., dissenting). Justice O'Connor added that, in her view, "common-law procedures for awarding punitive damages fall into the latter category." Id.

n18. The word "distortion" is used here to describe any pernicious effects or unnecessary costs that the regime of punitive damages has on the legal system that might disappear if other mechanisms replaced it.

n19. See David G. Owen, A Punitive Damages Overview: Functions, Problems, and Reform, 39 Vill. L. Rev. 363, 378-79 (1994) (arguing that punitive damages may serve as compensation for unrecompensable injuries and litigation costs). But see Allen v. R & H Oil & Gas Co., 63 F.3d 1326, 1332 n.10 (5th Cir. 1995) (noting that few states recognize a compensatory function for punitive damages).

n20. The term "private attorney general" refers to a plaintiff who is given a cause of action by the state not primarily to enable the plaintiff to seek redress for individual injuries, but to facilitate the enforcement of public policy.

n21. See Owen, supra note 19, at 375-77.

n22. See Viscusi, supra note 14, at 322-27.

n23. See, e.g., Thomas Koenig, The Shadow Effect of Punitive Damages on Settlements, 1998 Wis. L. Rev. 169, 173. This perspective causes controversy not only because of its empirical claim, but also because some of its critics perceive it as serving a corporate agenda at the expense of social welfare. See Stephen Daniels & Joanne Martin, Myth and Reality in Punitive Damages, 75 Minn. L. Rev. 1, 9-14 (1990) (describing the politicization of the punitive damages debate). Punitive damages usually apply only to torts that are intentional ("really mean") or grossly negligent ("really stupid"), TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 419 S.E.2d 870, 887 (W. Va. 1992), but some of the largest awards are levied against corporations for accidents that occur in the course of their business. The perceived advantage that corporate defendants enjoy in the justice system justifies this phenomenon to some. Corporate defendants, however, fight punitive damages not only in the courtroom, but also in the pages of academic journals. See, e.g., Elizabeth Amon, Exxon Bankrolls Critics of Punitives, Then It Cites the Research in Appeal of $ 5.3B Valdez Award, Nat'l L.J., May 5, 1999, at A1 (describing Exxon's sponsorship of the research of Professors Sunstein and Viscusi).

n24. See generally, e.g., Bruce Chapman & Michael Trebilcock, Punitive Damages: Divergence in Search of a Rationale, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 741 (1989); Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1 (1982); Thomas C. Galligan, Jr., Augmented Awards: The Efficient Evolution of Punitive Damages, 51 La. L. Rev. 3 (1990); A. Mitchell Polinsky & Steven Shavell, Punitive Damages: An Economic Analysis, 111 Harv. L. Rev. 869 (1998); infra pp. 1795-96.

n25. See, e.g., Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 878-81; Viscusi, supra note 14, at 322-27.

n26. 517 U.S. 559 (1996).

n27. See Murphy, supra note 16, at 537.

n28. See, e.g., Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Punitive Damages, Due Process, and the Jury, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 975, 991-99 (1989).

REV_00263622

n29. Compare Koenig, supra note 23, at 172 (noting that additional settlement pressure may exist when parties negotiate settlements according to their perceptions of the populist views of juries), with A. Mitchell Polinsky, Are Punitive Damages Really Insignificant, Predictable, and Rational? A Comment on Eisenberg et al., 26 J. Legal Stud. 663, 665 (1997) (arguing that settlement amounts mirror trial awards and thus pose no greater threat to defendants).

n30. See Koenig, supra note 23, at 208.

n31. See Eisenberg, Goerdt, Ostrom, Rottman & Wells, supra note 2, at 625.

n32. See David Luban, A Flawed Case Against Punitive Damages, 87 Geo. L.J. 359, 365 (1998).

n33. See Eisenberg, Goerdt, Ostrom, Rottman & Wells, supra note 2, at 651-52.

n34. See Polinsky, supra note 29; see also E. Berton Spence, Punitive Damages in Alabama After BMW v. Gore: Are Outcomes Any More Predictable?, 59 Ala. Law. 314, 314-15 (1998) (finding that punitive damage awards were no more predictable after the redefinition of excessiveness review).

n35. See Cass R. Sunstein, Daniel Kahneman & David Schkade, Assessing Punitive Damages (with Notes on Cognition and Valuation in Law), 107 Yale L.J. 2071 (1998).

n36. Id. at 2074.

n37. See infra pp. 1796-97.

n38. 517 U.S. 559 (1996).

n39. In Browning-Ferris Industries. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257 (1989), the Court held that the Excessive Fines Clause applies only when part of a damages award is to be paid to the state. See id. at 264; see also infra note 74. Pacific Mutual Life Insurance. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1 (1991), applied the Due Process Clause to the excessiveness review of punitive damages, upholding vicarious punitive liability for up to four times the amount of a compensatory award. See id. at 23-24. The due process inquiry depended on states' historical reliance on punitive damages, see id. at 17, and on procedural safeguards used by the state court to ensure the fairness of the award, see id. at 19-20. In TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443 (1993), the Court sustained a punitive award of $ 10 million on compensatory damages of $ 19,000, calling into question the existence of "excessiveness" standards at all. See id. at 446, 466. To add more procedural certainty to the propriety of a given award, the Court also ruled that judicial review must be available for awards of punitive damages. See Honda Motor Corp. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415, 435 (1994).

n40. Gore, 517 U.S. at 564.

n41. See id. at 567.

n42. Id. at 585-86.

n43. See id. at 585.

n44. See id. at 574-75.

n45. See id.

n46. See id. at 582-83.

REV_00263623

n47. 499 U.S. 1 (1991).

n48. 509 U.S. 443 (1993).

n49. The ratio of punitive damages to actual compensatory damages upheld in TXO was higher than 10:1, but the Court held that the relevant ratio in this case was the much lower ratio of punitive damages to potential compensatory damages. See id. at 462. On this basis, the Court noted that a ratio of up to 10:1 would not be presumptively unconstitutional. See id.

n50. See Gore, 517 U.S. at 585-86.

n51. Id. at 606 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

n52. Compare Continental Trend Resources, Inc. v. Oxy USA, Inc., 101 F.3d 634, 643 (10th Cir. 1996) (holding that courts must give plaintiffs the choice between remittitur and a new trial), and Lee v. Edwards, 101 F.3d 805, 813 (2d Cir. 1996) (same), with Johansen v. Combustion Eng'g, Inc., 170 F.3d 1320, 1331-32 (11th Cir. 1999) (holding that courts may simply reduce awards on constitutional grounds without giving plaintiffs a choice).

n53. 97 F.3d 914 (7th Cir. 1996).

n54. See id. at 920. Although he relied on Gore and found that the punitive award of $ 22,500 was consistent with Gore's two "numerical" guideposts (the ratio of punitive damages to compensatory damages and comparable awards for similar conduct), Judge Posner questioned the ratio guidepost, stating that "the smaller the compensatory damages, the higher the ratio of punitive to compensatory damages has to be in order to fulfill the objectives of awarding punitive damages." Id. at 919. Posner's remark echoes the deterrence theorists' concern over the enforcement gap. See infra pp. 1795-96.

n55. 101 F.3d 805 (2d Cir. 1996).

n56. See id. at 813.

n57. 101 F.3d 634 (10th Cir. 1996).

n58. See id. at 641.

n59. See Lee, 101 F.3d at 813.

n60. See Jordan v. Shaw Indus., Inc., 131 F.3d 134, 1997 WL 734029, at *5 (4th Cir. 1997).

n61. BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 583 (1996) (quoting TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 481 (1993) (O'Connor, J., dissenting)).

n62. Parsons v. First Investors Corp., 122 F.3d 525, 530 (8th Cir. 1997).

n63. Riley v. Kurtz, No. 98-1077, 1999 WL 801560, at *8 (6th Cir. 1999).

n64. See Gore, 517 U.S. at 574 ("Elementary notions of fairness enshrined in our constitutional jurisprudence dictate that a person receive fair notice not only of the conduct that will subject him to punishment, but also of the severity of the penalty that a State may impose.").

REV_00263624

n65. Inter Med. Supplies, Ltd. v. EBI Med. Sys., Inc., 181 F.3d 446, 468 (3d Cir. 1999).

n66. See Owen, supra note 19, at 384-85 ("Vague standards ...provide[] ...flexibility to achieve justice on the individual facts.").

n67. Punitive damages are a state law problem insofar as the law of punitive damages is state doctrine. However, to treat the problem on a state-by-state basis ignores some of the most salient justifications for the use of punitive damages, which require national change. See infra p. 1794.

n68. For example, in Wilson v. IBP, Inc., 558 N.W.2d 132, 148 (Iowa 1996), the Iowa Supreme Court combined the various excessiveness factors of Gore, Haslip, and several state cases and balanced them against one another. In the Alabama cases of McKowan v. Bentley, No. 1971357, 1999 WL 667290, at *7 (Ala. Aug. 27, 1999), and Cherokee Electric Cooperative v. Cochran, 706 So. 2d 1188, 1194 (Ala. 1997), the Alabama Supreme Court held that the state practice of awarding punitive damages only in wrongful death actions overcame Gore's requirement that punitive damages must bear a reasonable relationship to compensatory damages "because a state can make homicide expensive." Id. at 1194. In addition, various courts have elided the due process "notice" guideposts of Gore by embracing the notion that extremely reprehensible conduct can diminish the importance of the other two factors. See, e.g., Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp. v. Malone, 972 S.W.2d 35, 52 (Tex. 1998).

n69. See, e.g., Routh Wrecker Serv., Inc. v. Washington, 980 S.W.2d 240, 244 (Ark. 1998) (explaining that the state test of excessiveness, whether the award "shocked the conscience" of the trial court, should be considered prior to the Gore guideposts and applying both the state and federal tests in turn).

n70. For example, the South Carolina Court of Appeals noted that "although punitive damages have received increasing academic criticism in recent years ...the doctrine's viability is unchallenged in South Carolina's jurisprudence." Clark v. Cantrell, 504 S.E.2d 605, 609 & n.2 (S.C. Ct. App. 1998) (citing Owen, supra note 19, and Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24). In a few cases, however, academic discussion has reinforced state decisions. See, e.g., Jones v. Shaffer, 573 So .2d 740, 744 (Miss. 1990) (citing Steven Shavell, Economic Analysis of Accident Law (1987), to justify a compensatory use of punitive damages). The slight notice of academic theories by state courts is surprising in light of Justice Breyer's observation in Gore that a state's reliance on a "constraining "economic' theory" might be a factor favoring deference in federal court excessiveness review. BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 594 (1996) (Breyer, J., concurring).

n71. See, e.g., N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. 507:16 (1986). Other states prohibit punitive damages for certain types of cases. For a complete list of state statutes in effect in 1996 concerning punitive damages, see Gore, 517 U.S. at 614 (Ginsburg, J., dissenting).

n72. See, e.g., Colo. Rev. Stat. 13-21-102 (1997); Conn. Gen. Stat. 52-240b (1997).

n73. See, e.g., Ga. Code Ann. 51-12-5.1 (Supp. 1999); Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3701 (1994). Other states use lower caps in cases in which compensatory awards are low. See, e.g., Nev. Rev. Stat. 42.005 (1999).

n74. See, e.g., Iowa Code 668A.1 (1998); Utah Code Ann. 78-18-1 (1996). Although these laws may implicate the Excessive Fines clause of the Constitution, because they involve payment to the state, several courts have upheld them against such challenges. See, e.g., Fust v. Missouri, 947 S.W.2d 424 (Mo. 1997); see also Sonja Larsen, Annotation, Validity, Construction, and Application of Statutes Requiring that Percentage of Punitive Damages Awards Be Paid Directly to State or Court-Administered Fund, 16 A.L.R.5th 129 (1993).

REV_00263625

n75. People injured in states with punitive damages caps or bans further subsidize these taxpayer redistributions because they suffer from injury at the same rate as people in states that allow punitive damages, see Viscusi, supra note 14, at 288-90, but they cannot recover as much for their injuries.

n76. See, e.g., Cal. Civ. Code 3295 (West 1997); Mo. Rev. Stat. 510.263 (Supp. 1999).

n77. Murphy, supra note 16, at 472.

n78. Bifurcation is also an option in federal trials, though it is not mandatory. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 42(b).

n79. See Koenig, supra note 23, at 208.

n80. This literature is extensive, and the authors document it thoroughly. See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 876 n.12, 877 n.14. Among the major works they cite are Darryl Biggar, A Model of Punitive Damages in Tort, 15 Int'l Rev. L. & Econ. 1 (1995); Robert D. Cooter, Punitive Damages for Deterrence: When and How Much?, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 1143 (1989); and Ellis, supra note 24.

n81. See generally Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24.

n82. See id. at 874-75.

n83. The ideas summarized in this paragraph have been developed over the course of more than a quarter-century of law and economics scholarship. See, e.g., Guido Calabresi, The Costs of Accidents: A Legal and Economic Analysis (1970); William M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, The Economic Structure of Tort Law (1987); Richard A. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law (2d ed. 1972); Shavell, supra note 70; Gary S. Becker, Crime and Punishment: An Economic Approach, 76 J. Pol. Econ. 169 (1968).

n84. See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 874.

n85. See id. at 905-10.

n86. See id. at 874-75.

n87. See id. at 874. To use their simple example, suppose an injurer causes $ 100,000 worth of harm to each of its victims, and the probability of the injurer being caught and held legally responsible is one in four. The total damages should thus be $ 400,000 to each victim who successfully sues: a punitive award of $ 300,000 in addition to the compensatory award of $ 100,000. Such an award will cause the injurer to pay for the total social injury caused, despite the existence of a 75% enforcement gap. See id. at 874-75.

n88. See id. at 905-10.

n89. For example, if a state permits compensation for emotional distress in addition to injuries, this policy represents a judgment that the conduct of the injurer was more reprehensible than conduct for which no such compensation is allowed. It might be argued that culpability should be measured by potential harm, an approach approved by the Supreme Court in TXO. See TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 462 (1993). Polinsky and Shavell reject this argument, contending that a potential defendant will structure his conduct to account for probable compensatory and punitive damages, so the ex post award of only actual damages has no effect on deterrence. See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 914-17.

REV_00263626

n90. If, for example, a doctor leaves a surgical tool inside a patient, compensatory damages will on average be quite high (because most plaintiffs will sue and win), and punitive damages are therefore unnecessary. See Polinsky and Shavell, supra note 24, at 906. The same logic, the authors claim, applies to mass torts such as the Exxon Valdez oil spill. See id. at 903-04.

n91. See id. at 910-14.

n92. Id. at 911.

n93. See id. at 933.

n94. See Viscusi, supra note 14, at 288-90.

n95. Id. at 334.

n96. See generally id. There is a flaw in Viscusi's argument caused by the cross-jurisdictional problem, see supra p. 1794, which limits the effectiveness of state reforms. Because corporations are likely to adjust their level of safety to the national average of liability instead of customizing their products and behavior for each state, there should not be variations in the accident rate between states with varying levels of liability. National corporations can minimize costs by allowing the same number of accidents in each jurisdiction (using an optimal average level of safety) and paying different amounts in different states when held liable for those accidents. See also Luban, supra note 32, at 363-64.

n97. See Viscusi, supra note 14, at 335 (noting the possibility of regulatory enforcement of corporate safety requirements).

n98. Indeed, in their empirical study, Professor Eisenberg and his colleagues found no evidence to suggest that punitive damages are awarded against corporations more frequently than against individuals. See Eisenberg, Goerdt, Ostrom, Rottman & Wells, supra note 2, at 646. They did, however, find that the amount of punitive awards is generally higher against businesses. See id. at 649.

n99. This problem, at least, is a limitation of Polinsky and Shavell's specific formulation of the model. It might be possible to construct a system in which a multiplier not only aggregated unenforced claims, but also forced injurers to internalize the entire cost of accidents; this system would, however, require extraordinary efforts at valuation by legislatures and unprecedented cooperation among judges. Even if such costs could be measured and agreed upon, the necessary systematic recalibration of measurements of individual harm by reference to social harm would be impossible. For a documentation of the practical problems of legislative valuation as a determinant of social harm, see Luban, supra note 32, at 375-77 (citing the Occupational Safety and Health Act, 29 U.S.C. 666(e) (1994), which "treats serial homicide as a misdemeanor," as an example of a law that cannot represent Congress's considered judgment about the value of deterrence).

n100. In addition, this system would create distributional problems. Because early awards are high, there is more incentive for anyone with a colorable claim of injury to sue; in turn, less "enforcement gap" damages are available to each plaintiff. These competing incentives might arrive at some equilibrium, but one in which damages to compensate plaintiffs with lower expected damages would be transferred in the form of punitive damages to those plaintiffs with higher expected damages (and therefore enough incentive to bring suit). Payment of punitive damages into state funds would exacerbate this problem by reducing the plaintiff's claim value, pricing more of the claimants with lower expected damages out of litigation.

REV_00263627

n101. See, e.g., Fisk, supra note 8; Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, supra note 3; Verdicts: The Big Numbers of 1997, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 23, 1998, at C2.

n102. See, e.g., Eisenberg, Goerdt, Ostrom, Rottman & Wells, supra note 2, at 644-46 (finding that the potential for punitive liability affects settlement amounts).

n103. See, e.g., Fisk, supra note 8; Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, supra note 3; Verdicts: The Big Numbers of 1997, supra note 101.

n104. See Eisenberg, Goerdt, Ostrom, Rottman & Wells, supra note 2, at 644-46.

n105. See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 903-04 (discussing the case of the Exxon Valdez).

n106. See Eisenberg, Goerdt, Ostrom, Rottman & Wells, supra note 2, at 644-46.

n107. See, e.g., GM's Challenge to $ 4.9 Billion Judgment Set for August 26 Hearing in California, supra note 9 (products liability).

n108. See, e.g., Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, supra note 3 (legal malpractice).

n109. See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 905-10.

n110. Recklessness in such cases might be defined as the failure to perform any cost-benefit analysis at all or by creating some other standard, see infra note 127.

n111. Punitive awards in cases involving intentional injuries have generally been less controversial than in other cases. This acceptance of punitive damages may result from the fact that intentional torts look the most like "aggravated wrongs" for which the retributive function of punitive damages is most appropriate. See Owen, supra note 19, at 375-77; see also William M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, An Economic Theory of Intentional Torts, 1 Int'l Rev. L. & Econ. 127, 127-39 (1981) (explaining that economic analysis is relevant to deterring the intentional behavior of tortfeasors).

n112. See Robert G. Schloerb, Richard L. Blatt, Robert W. Hammesfahr & Lori S. Nu-gent, Punitive Damages: A Guide to the Insurability of Punitive Damages in the United States and its Territories 39 (1988); Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 931 & n.193.

n113. See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 933 (noting that the fear of a large judgment is a greater deterrent to a risk-averse defendant than a stream of well-calibrated insurance premiums).

n114. This feature of insurance has a distributional benefit as well as a deterrent benefit, as it forces an entire industry that engages in a risky activity to pay for that activity, instead of placing the entire burden on the single defendant who is "struck by lightning" when a jury award is assessed. Furthermore, the distribution might be across an "industry" of risk takers comprising individuals. Shifting the burden of cost-benefit analysis to the insurance industry lessens the critique, see supra p. 1797, that some of those individuals might not be acting rationally at the time of an accident.

n115. See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 910-14.

n116. See id. The idea that wealth need not play a part in punitive damage awards has support in the case law. In Kemezy v. Peters, 79 F.3d 33 (7th Cir. 1996), which was lost in the aftermath of Gore, Judge Posner found that "none of [the purposes served by awarding into the field by the courts, and section C discusses academic reform proposals. Section D argues that deterrence theory n12 can provide a foundation for bringing more rationality and consistency to punitive damages.

REV_00263628

A. The Problem with Punitive Damages

Criticism of punitive damages is widespread, but critics express widely divergent views on precisely what is wrong with them. Once attacked on formal grounds, n13 opponents today criticize them for failing to supplement the other elements of the civil justice system effectively. These opponents believe that punitive damages threaten productive members of society with insolvency simply to satisfy the public's indignation upon seeing the innocent harmed. n14 To advocates, punitive damages are the only way for society to express that indignation in a way that a corporation will understand: n15 by checking the power of corporate America, punitive damages prevent the public from "driving repainted, exploding Ford Pintos while washing down [*1785] unsafe drugs with scalding coffee." n16 Moderates see the virtues of punitive damages but also fear their misapplication. As Justice O'Connor has written: "Punitive damages are a powerful weapon. Imposed wisely and with restraint, they have the potential to advance legitimate state interests. Imposed indiscriminately, however, they have a devastating potential for harm." n17

Many complaints concerning punitive damages share a common theme: because the practical and theoretical boundaries of punitive damages are undefined, especially as established by jury awards, such awards act as distortions n18 on the legal system. These distortions may exist because it is hard to identify a role that punitive damages uniquely play in the justice system. Punitive damages compensate victims for certain losses that standard compensatory awards do not cover; n19 they act as punishment for bad acts, empowering private attorneys general n20 to seek retribution where criminal sanctions prove impracticable; n21 and they supplement the important deterrent functions of both tort and criminal law. This lack of a unique role opens punitive damages to the criticism that another, perhaps existing, feature of the legal system could replace them. Developments in punitive damages in the last several years are attempts to cure some of these distortions.

Some punitive damages reformers believe that the purpose of damages is to induce potential defendants to take a socially optimal level of care, not to deter harmful conduct completely. Traditional tort reformers, therefore, argue that punitive damages, by painting a target on the chests of the companies with the deepest pockets, stifle innovation and harm shareholders. n22 The winners are individual plaintiffs who were "lucky" enough to be injured, the losers are defendants and [*1786] the general public, as defendants pass the cost of punitive liability along to consumers through higher prices for products and services. n23

Law and economics scholars and deterrence theorists espouse a related view: n24 the potential for enormous punitive awards distorts the traditional tort mechanisms of compensation (or insurance) and deterrence by introducing irrelevant factors into calculations of the cost of harmful conduct. Punitive damages make injurers pay for much more than the harm they cause, in effect overdeterring some kinds of conduct and discouraging some socially beneficial activity. n25 In other words, punitive damages make ex ante calculations of potential liability almost impossible.

The notice that is important to deterrence theorists for economic reasons is important to courts for the additional reason that predictability is an important rule of law value - sometimes elevated to the level of a due process requirement. The idea that an injurer must have notice of its potential liability for a harmful act was the driving motivation behind the important 1996 Supreme Court decision in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, n26 which overturned a punitive award of $ 2 million as violative of the Due Process Clause. Punitive damages, however, are sometimes so great that potential defendants cannot anticipate punitive damages] depends critically on proof that the defendant's income or wealth exceeds some specified level.... Rich people are not famous for being indifferent to money." Id. at 35. He therefore held that a plaintiff could not dispute his award of punitive damages simply because the jury failed to consider the defendant's wealth. See id. at 36.

REV_00263611

n117. In some states, this idea is already in practice. For example, in Kansas, the jury as fact-finder decides whether punitive liability is appropriate, and then the judge determines the proper amount of punitive damages. See Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3701 (1994). This suggestion has been made elsewhere. See Paul Mogin, Why Judges, Not Juries, Should Set Punitive Damages, 65 U. Chi. L. Rev. 179, 207-23 (1998).

n118. It is true that this situation exists in many areas of civil litigation, but if punitive damages are to have both deterrent and retributive purposes in addition to compensatory purposes, then an analogy may again be drawn to criminal law, in which a jury determines liability (guilt), but a judge conducts the sentencing. "How great were the plaintiff's injuries?" is a question of fact, and "How must the law incentivize rational behavior on the part of the defendant?" is a question of law - and in the latter area, judges have more expertise than juries.

n119. See Sunstein, Kahneman & Schkade, supra note 35, at 2074. Despite this fact, the authors argue that juries should continue to be used in assessing punitive damages, but they recommend changes that would impose some uniformity on the dollar amount that accompanies a given jury's intended level of punishment. See id. at 2121-24. They also acknowledge, however, that "if optimal deterrence is the purpose of the award of punitive damages, the jury system is an extremely bad institution." Id. at 2111.

n120. See, e.g., Viscusi, supra note 14, at 328-30. Viscusi discusses the hindsight bias that produces a "common assumption" in juries that firms "should have anticipated all possible accidents." Id. at 328. He also notes that juries may overestimate the importance of small probabilities, leading them to penalize corporations when risks, acceptable in the abstract, turn into concrete injuries. See id. at 329.

n121. It has been suggested that entrusting expert administrators to determine damages amounts can best eliminate the valuation and risk biases that jury verdicts reflect, removing judges from the equation entirely and bestowing the benefits of "bureaucratic rationality" on the system. See Sunstein, Kahneman & Schkade, supra note 35, at 2124 ("An administratively operated schedule of fines and penalties seems better than juries at producing deterrence, for such a system would reduce the costs of decision and probably reduce the cost of errors as well.").

n122. See Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, supra note 3.

n123. The bifurcation responses enacted in several states take steps toward this ideal, as the damages portion of a trial is sometimes heard only before a judge, see Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. 52-240b (1997); Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3702(a) (1994), and as these responses often carry other procedural safeguards such as separate discovery, see, e.g., Ala. Code 6-11-20 (1993); Cal. Civ. Code 3294(a) (1997); Mont. Code Ann. 27-1-221(5) (1999). Importantly, the bifurcated trial is a way to remove some forms of jury bias without removing the jury. Some evidence, such as corporate cost-benefit analyses, which would be relevant to a finding of negligence at the liability phase, might be seen as an indication of "heartlessness" at the damages phase and inflate an award. See Developments in the Law - The Civil Jury, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 1408, 1529-30 (1997). Bifurcation thus can be seen as another important procedural safeguard that advances the rationality goal in awarding punitive damages.

n124. See Murphy, supra note 16, at 501-03.

REV_00263629

n125. This scheme poses several problems, including a reduction in a plaintiff's incentive to sue and the placement of decisions that are essentially regulatory in the office of state prosecutors. A different way of placing the punitive function in state hands would be to entrust punitive enforcement to regulatory agencies, see Viscusi, supra note 14, at 317-20, although this too would essentially remove punitive liability from the realm of civil litigation altogether.

Both of these suggestions would encounter opposition not only from the plaintiff's bar, but also from academics who advocate the virtues of the private attorney general system of tort enforcement. These writers prefer the private attorney general "bounty hunter" to either the bureaucrat or the unchecked corporate sector. Luban, supra note 32, at 366. In this view, the increased incentive to sue created by punitive damages is not a distortion caused by punitive damages, but a valuable way of privately financing law enforcement. See id. at 367.

A compromise would be to divert all punitive awards to the state, encouraging private attorneys to seek punitive damages by paying them fees equal to their lost opportunity cost. This compromise would remove the incentive for plaintiffs to sue for the stars in hopes of a giant windfall, but it would also prevent a large, non-criminal enforcement burden from being placed on the shoulders of public prosecutors. Enforcement decisions, furthermore, might be made by neutral state officials, but the further punitive liability investment in a given claim would be made by the private attorneys who already have a substantial investment in the litigation.

n126. Such a standard has support in both statutory and case law. See, e.g., Watkins v. Ford Motor Co., 190 F.3d 1213, 1217 n.2 (11th Cir. 1999) (citing Ga. Code Ann. 15-12-5.1(b) (1999), which requires clear and convincing evidence of the defendant's intent before imposing punitive liability). But see Honda Motor Corp. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415, 433 (1994) (noting that a clear and convincing standard of liability may not be an adequate safeguard against excessive punitive awards).

n127. In a system of punitive damages based solely on deterrence, for example, such a rule might remove punitive liability for a defendant who is able to show that he conducted a cost-benefit analysis ex ante for the product or activity in question. The strictness of the desired rule could be adjusted by changing the assumptions required in performing the analysis.

n128. This public role might extend to coordinating one punitive award for the defendant's conduct across the entire state - or better yet, nation - instead of subjecting the defendant to repeated punitive awards for the same conduct in every state. See Murphy, supra note 16, at 473, 524-27.

n129. See supra pp. 1787-88.

n130. See, e.g., Nutrivida, Inc. v. Inmuno Vital, Inc., 46 F. Supp. 2d 1310, 1316-17 (S.D. Fla. 1998) (using punitive damages to deter conduct that would be undeterred by compensatory damages); cf. Wilson v. IBP, Inc., 558 N.W.2d 132, 145 (Iowa 1996) (using punitive damages to deter potential harm that might otherwise go undeterred); Bowen v. Caldor, Inc., 710 A.2d 267, 285 (Md. 1998) (same).

n131. Cf. David Rosenberg, The Causal Connection in Mass Exposure Cases: A "Public Law" Vision of the Tort System, 97 Harv. L. Rev. 849, 889-92 (1984) (describing the claim investment incentives of plaintiffs' attorneys).

n132. See infra pp. 1809-10.

n133. It is questionable because of the problems inherent in attempting to punish a corporation for its past conduct - how do you teach a corporation "a lesson," especially when its directors or officers may not have been affiliated with the corporation when the injury occurred? In addition, the "retributive" function of punitive damages might not be necessary if there were a reliable way to fill the enforcement gap; the reason "punishment" must be an object of punitive damages may simply be that compensatory damages will inevitably fall short of the total social harm caused by the injury.

REV_00263630

n134. See Viscusi, supra note 14, at 317-20 (describing how government regulation provides incentives for safety).

n135. Independent agencies might use promulgated regulations to adjudicate punitive liability, further enhancing predictability.

n136. See supra p. 1803.

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined (i)
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 "insurance coverage" and date(aft 1997) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Thursday, September 12, 2002 - 1:42 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00263631

them, making it impossible to choose a course of action beforehand.

The power of private attorneys general to impose tort sanctions under a rationale normally protected by state discretion and criminal [*1787] procedural safeguards adds another layer of distortion to both the civil and criminal systems of deterrence and punishment. Punitive damages allow retribution to intrude into the realm of civil litigation, which is troubling because civil standards of proof are lower than criminal standards and the moral culpability of the defendant may be less clear. n27 If it is acknowledged that punitive damages have the purpose of retribution for bad acts, then it is unclear why overzealous and interested "prosecutors" are better suited for such a purpose than criminal prosecutors and the safeguards of the criminal law. n28

Finally, the difficulty of predicting the potential liability for a harmful act pressures defendants to settle cases - especially class actions - in which punitive awards are possible, however unlikely. Some dispute this effect for garden-variety torts, n29 but mass tort cases provide a clear example of the settlement leverage that the threat of a punitive award bestows upon plaintiffs. n30 To some, this pressure for settlement when the plaintiff has very little chance of winning may result in an inflated settlement amount n31 and the appearance of an admission of guilt. To defend the system, plaintiffs' advocates describe a system in which corporations play hardball with plaintiffs who have legitimate claims, wearing them down by threatening to drag out litigation until they settle for a fraction of their claims' worth. n32

The very existence of these problems is in dispute, and the dispute is compounded by the fact that empirical data on punitive damages that can garner the agreement of a wide cross-section of the legal community continues to prove elusive. Professor Eisenberg and his colleagues, for example, argue that not only is there a rational pattern to the award of punitive damages, but that there is also a discernible ratio of punitive to compensatory damages that makes punitive amounts predictable. n33 Professor Polinsky, however, uses this same data to support the proposition that punitive damages are irrational, [*1788] significant, and unpredictable. n34 Another study n35 reveals a distortion arising not from legal standards or processes, but from human psychology. This study concluded that potential jurors "have a great deal of difficulty in mapping such [moral] judgments onto an unbounded scale of dollars. Shared moral judgments but erratic, unpredictable, and arbitrary awards, possibly even meaningless awards, are a potential product of this difficulty." n36 Finally, Professor Viscusi uses data about accidents to argue that punitive damages have no effect on behavior and therefore should be abolished as superfluous. n37 Unfortunately, the empirical uncertainty surrounding punitive damages makes it difficult to support most reform proposals with convincing data.

B. Federal and State Responses to the Punitive Damages Problem

There have been several efforts in recent years to define the legal foundations of punitive damages and to describe ways to apply them intelligently and systematically. However, these responses have not been entirely satisfactory: the Supreme Court offered a possibility for national change that has failed in its implementation, and although states have proposed several interesting solutions, states can only partially alleviate the problem because of their limited jurisdiction.

1. The Supreme Court and BMW v. Gore. - During the 1990s the Supreme Court was quite active in the area of punitive damages, issuing five different rulings, including BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore n38 in 1996. Most of the Court's activity early in the decade concerned how to determine whether a particular punitive award is excessive and therefore in violation of the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment or the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. n39 Although the Supreme Court could not possibly, in a [*1789] handful of cases, bring order and uniformity to the various state law doctrines that allow for punitive damages, the Court did articulate a test that would systematically reduce some of the highest awards. The Court's rulings, however, failed to reform punitive damages law (or to stem the tide of criticism), and the apportionment of punitive damages seems no more evenhanded or principled at the end of the decade than it was at the beginning. The Court's rulings were inadequate in two significant respects: first, they failed to articulate a coherent rationale for punitive damages or describe constitutionally permissible limits on the purpose of punitive liability; and second, their standards for determining "excessiveness" are subject to almost infinite discretion and make the outcome of the individual case no more predictable than it was before.

REV_00263612

The most important theme to emerge from the Court's recent punitive damages cases was that the Due Process Clause limits the size of punitive damages awards. The plaintiff in Gore, Dr. Ira Gore, had bought a BMW that the dealer had represented to him as new; the car had in fact been repainted and was worth $ 4000 less than Gore was led to believe. The jury awarded Gore the $ 4000 in compensatory damages, plus $ 4 million in punitive damages, which Gore had claimed "would provide an appropriate penalty for selling approximately 1000 cars for [$ 4000] more than they were worth." n40 On BMW's post-trial motion, the Alabama Supreme Court remitted the award to $ 2 million. n41

The Supreme Court struck down the award as unconstitutional, declaring it "grossly excessive" and thus a violation of the Due Process Clause. n42 The Court based its decision on rule of law values, noting that any damages would be excessive if the defendant could not have had notice of them at the time of the conduct. n43 In doing so, the Supreme Court established three "guideposts" for determining the excessiveness of punitive awards: the degree of reprehensibility of the conduct, the disparity between the actual or potential compensatory and punitive damages awarded, and the amounts of punitive awards in comparable cases. n44 Writing for the Court, Justice Stevens reasoned that such considerations would further the legitimate goals of punitive damages: adequate notice both protects the defendant from the quasi- [*1790] criminal, retributive aspects of punitive damages and ensures the proper working of the regime's deterrent function. n45 However, the Court declined to suggest a mathematical bright line for constitutionality, relying on the "reprehensibility" guidepost to limit or justify the fruits of the jury's imagination. n46 Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip n47 and TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp. n48 had upheld punitive-compensatory ratios of only 4:1 and 10:1 n49 respectively, and the Court concluded that the 500:1 ratio present in the Gore case did not survive constitutional review. n50

2. The Application of Excessiveness Review in Federal Courts. - Dissenting in Gore, Justice Scalia claimed that the "test" that the Court developed would provide no guidance at all to courts: "These crisscrossing platitudes yield no real answers in no real cases." n51 The development of punitive damages law in the federal courts has confirmed his fears. Eight circuits have applied Gore to determine the excessiveness of punitive awards, with some circuit conflict emerging over procedural aspects of the remittitur process n52 and with mixed results over the substantive meaning of the guideposts.

In most cases, the federal circuit courts' reasoning has some basis in the language of Gore, but their holdings do not necessarily follow from that decision. For example, in Cooper v. Casey, n53 Judge Posner of the Seventh Circuit upheld a 12:1 ratio of punitive damages to compensatory damages (higher than the potential ratio explicitly approved in TXO) because he determined that the moral culpability of the defendant was so high that that particular Gore factor should carry added weight. n54 In several other cases, courts of appeals used factors [*1791] external to the Gore tests to strike down punitive awards that the Supreme Court might have upheld under Gore. In Lee v. Edwards, n55 after finding that the district court's award passed the Gore test, the Second Circuit nonetheless reduced the award on the grounds that the court below had no discretion to allow such a high award. n56 Similarly, the Tenth Circuit in Continental Trend Resources, Inc. v. OXY USA, Inc. n57 found that the Gore guideposts supported a large punitive award, but the court nevertheless refused to uphold an award that it found to be unnecessarily large for purposes of deterrence. n58

REV_00263613

An additional problem is that, because Gore failed to articulate a bright-line rule, courts have used precedent to expand the permissible ratio of punitive to compensatory awards far beyond those sanctioned in Haslip and TXO and even beyond the ratio struck down in Gore. The punitive award in Lee was $ 75,000, which represented a ratio of punitive to compensatory damages of 75,000:1 because the compensatory award was nominal. n59 Relying on this precedent, the Fourth Circuit upheld ratios of up to 488:1, despite the fact that the compensatory damages awarded were actual, not nominal. n60 This decision suggests that, despite the "suspicious judicial eyebrow" that the Supreme Court raised at the 500:1 ratio in Gore, n61 judges continue to use precedent to expand the outer limits of the permissible ratio.

Finally, two circuits seem to have given up trying to apply the Gore guideposts as stated and instead have glossed the Supreme Court's opinion to create a test for unconstitutional excessiveness that is easier to apply (though arguably no more determinative). The Eighth Circuit described Gore as a constitutional test to determine whether an award is so disproportionate to a state's interests in punitive damages as to be in a "zone of arbitrariness." n62 Similarly, the Sixth Circuit interpreted the Gore test as asking whether the disparity between the punitive and compensatory awards "shocks the conscience." n63

These cases suggest that the Gore standards provide little direction for litigants. The result is that meaningful notice of potential liability, [*1792] perhaps the key element in the due process analysis of Gore, n64 is lost among the guideposts. As the Third Circuit stated, "the Supreme Court has instructed as to the analysis but has provided nothing concrete as to the amount" that might be excessive. n65 The larger implication is that the potential for a constitutional limit on punitive awards - which could provide a foundation for reducing the pressures they place on the civil litigation system - has gone unrealized. Although a general limit on punitive damages could reduce settlement pressures, provide greater procedural safeguards for defendants, or approach a goal of optimal deterrence, federal punitive damages law ensures none of these things to litigants; remittitur as a matter of law is not guaranteed. Perhaps these wildly divergent applications of Gore represent a triumph of justice in the individual case. n66 However, this benefit may come at the cost of judges' abusing their discretion in contravention of the rule of law values that the Supreme Court intended that Gore protect.

3. State Responses to Punitive Damages. - Some of the most extensive reforms of punitive damages have occurred in state law, and insofar as punitive damages are a "state law problem," n67 these state responses represent a good start. Many recent state court cases in which the excessiveness of punitive damages has been litigated have combined the Gore standard with existing state law. This approach has led to unrecognizable permutations of Gore in a few cases, n68 but in others, courts merely applied state-law excessiveness review before conducting a Gore analysis. n69 State courts have also occasionally taken [*1793] notice of academic treatments of punitive damages, but these discussions have rarely had a determinative impact on the outcome of cases. n70

In most states, however, the primary locus of punitive damages reform is not the judiciary, but the legislature. State legislatures have attempted a variety of approaches that reduce the size of the permissible punitive award or the plaintiff's incentive to seek it. A few states have severely limited the availability of punitive damages to specific statutory circumstances. n71

Perhaps the most common response among other states is to cap each punitive award at a given dollar amount or at a fixed ratio to the compensatory award. Eleven states have punitive damages caps that range from one to five times the amount of compensatory damages, n72 while others provide for absolute caps, ranging from $ 300,000 to $ 5 million. n73 The effect of such requirements is to lower the incentive for plaintiffs to litigate unmeritorious claims and reduce the burden on state industry that punitive damages represent. Another, more subtle way of altering plaintiffs' incentives and rectifying distributional problems is to require the payment of punitive damages into state funds. Thirteen states now have laws allowing a percentage of many punitive awards to be paid to the state treasury or to a state-administered victims' compensation fund. n74 In doing so, the state essentially [*1794] redistributes punitive damages from the plaintiffs who win the punitive damages lottery to either the state taxpayers as a whole or to those victims who did not have a large enough claim to pay for litigation. n75

REV_00263614

Finally, some states have attempted to reduce the apparent irrationality of punitive damage awards by bifurcating the litigation pro-cess into a liability stage and a damages stage. Usually upon the defendant's request, trials in twelve states n76 must be bifurcated to separate the determination whether punitive liability is appropriate from the consideration of the amount of the award. Because certain evidence concerning the extent of the injury may not be available to sway the jury's sympathies at the initial phase, a plaintiff is less able to "play the jury lottery" n77 and must invest more in litigation costs to seek a large jury verdict. n78

These reforms are a beneficial first step, and the limitation of punitive amounts in particular may help defendants take better account of potential punitive liability in settlements as well as in litigation. n79 However, because defendants are unlikely to customize mass-produced goods to the liability rules of different states, punitive damages are most likely to induce change in potential defendants' national business. This phenomenon may blunt the impact in each state of that state's individual reforms. Because national corporate defendants can cost-effectively make only limited changes in their state-to-state business, the national average level of punitive liability is probably more likely to to influence behavior than the level in any particular state. At least in cases involving national corporations, the defendant will calculate its potential liability across all relevant jurisdictions and will adjust its behavior accordingly. This cross-jurisdictional problem heightens the necessity for definitive national reform of punitive damages. In contrast, the system resulting from state reforms is ad hoc: while it may be an improvement in practice, it is not necessarily more theoretically consistent or even rational. Although the states are currently the most effective reformers of punitive damages doctrine, the concomitant problems of coordination and scope make the absence of a national statement about excessiveness even more conspicuous.

[*1795]

C. Deterrence Theory and the Rational Choice Proposals

Recent academic literature concerning punitive damages falls into two categories: rational choice theory discussions of the punitive damages regime and empirical studies that support or refute various reform efforts. One provocative and ambitious solution to the punitive damages distortion problem comes from the field of law and economics. Professors Polinsky and Shavell build on the twenty-year-old rational choice literature on punitive damages n80 in an attempt to bring order to the field of punitive damages. n81 They define the legitimate objectives of punitive damages and radically change the calculation of punitive damages to match these objectives. Polinsky and Shavell argue that the best justification for punitive damages is to fill the enforcement gap created by the tort system through the use of an award multiplier formula that considers the likelihood that a tortfeasor will escape liability. n82

The foundation for this argument is deterrence theory, one of the pillars of the law and economics movement. The tort system, this argument begins, serves two purposes: to compensate victims for individual harms and to deter injurers from perpetuating social harms. In a perfectly operating system, all victims of harm would receive compensation, thus forcing injurers to internalize the costs of their actions and encouraging them to cease behavior that causes net social harm. By punishing too rarely or in insufficient amounts, damages might fail to deter socially harmful behavior. But if imposed too often or in excessive amounts, damages can overdeter by increasing the cost of net-beneficial behavior. n83 Out of this background, Polinsky and Shavell argue that the true purpose of punitive damages is to fill the enforcement gap - to serve as a proxy for the compensatory damages not awarded to victims because not all tortious acts result in judgments against injurers. n84 Punitive damages should force the full cost of tortious behavior into the injurer's calculus. "Punishment," from this perspective, [*1796] is irrelevant; the goal of "punishment" is merely another way to state the goal of deterrence. n85 Polinsky and Shavell recommend that, when considering awards of punitive damages, judges should derive a multiplier from the chance that the harmful conduct would not have been caught and litigated. n86 Judges should apply this multiplier to compensatory awards to determine the proper level of punitive damages. n87

REV_00263615

Several implications flow from this analysis. First, the authors argue that the reprehensibility of the defendant's action is irrelevant to the determination of the award. n88 Instead, the reprehensibility of the injurer's conduct should be "measured" by the amount the plaintiff is allowed to recover n89 and the likelihood that the injurer will escape liability. n90 The multiplier will deter the conduct that should be deterred regardless of the defendant's moral culpability. Second, the wealth of the defendant should be irrelevant in determining a punitive award. n91 It does not matter whether a corporation is wealthy; if compensatory damages (multiplied to cover the enforcement gap) make one particular harmful activity unprofitable, the corporation will stop the activity. Consideration of wealth is no more than "a tax on corporate size and success." n92 Finally, the scope of state-recognized liability insurance may be expanded to cover punitive liability to lower the costs of paying for accidents. n93

Although acknowledging the importance of Polinsky and Shavell's work, Professor Viscusi offers an alternative solution: to abolish the institution [*1797] of punitive damages altogether. Based on an empirical study, Viscusi claims that states that prohibit punitive damages have no greater rate of certain kinds of toxic chemical accidents and toxic environmental releases than states that permit punitive damages. n94 Viscusi argues that punitive damages impose costs on corporate activities such as research and development; they are "a dangerous lottery for firms engaged in potentially risky lines of corporate activity." n95 These costs, passed on to the public through higher prices, are greater than the corresponding benefit of fewer accidents. n96 Viscusi proposes to eliminate punitive damages altogether and look for other sources of corporate accident deterrence. n97

The virtue of these scholars' work and of deterrence theory in general is to present a comprehensive framework within which to analyze punitive damages. Their theory takes the desperately needed steps of defining the appropriate goals of punitive damages; striking a balance between punishment, deterrence, and compensation; and providing a complete system for producing the desired results. Given that a major critique of jury verdicts is their supposed irrationality, a rational system to determine the proper size of punitive awards is attractive. Yet there are problems with their theory that cause it to fall short as a response to the problem of punitive damages distortions.

It should be noted first that this particular iteration of deterrence theory suffers from many of the same problems that affect law and economics in general. For example, it proceeds on the assumption that all potential injurers will conduct an ex ante cost-benefit analysis each time that they act. Although many of the largest awards are in cases of products liability and mass tort, in which corporations might be expected to conduct such an analysis and to account for the possibility of punitive damages, such rational calculation may not always be realistic for an individual doctor who faces the prospect of punitive malpractice liability. n98 A second problem (shared by other rational [*1798] choice proposals) is the global coordination problem. Although tort law in a perfectly working market might force injurers to internalize the costs of the injuries that they cause, the internalized costs are still only those recognized by the legal system as compensable to someone. n99 Thus, not only would courts have to consistently apply a multiplier to cover the current enforcement gap, legislatures would also have to allow plaintiffs acting as private attorneys general to recover for the costs to common property or future generations in order to achieve deterrence based on the full social harm the injurer causes.

REV_00263616

In addition to these large-scale problems, Polinsky and Shavell's proposal presents several other theoretical difficulties that prevent it from being an optimal solution to the problem of punitive damages distortions. For example, the fewer the number of plaintiffs who sue for damages in a particular case, the more damages each would receive as their share of the overall award. Plaintiffs who sue early, before many suits are brought, are therefore likely to receive higher awards. The success of early plaintiffs will raise the expected award for those potential plaintiffs who have waited to see the outcome of early cases before filing claims, but high early awards will also dry up the pool of damages from which later plaintiffs would draw upon proving their case. Thus, a multiplier calculated early will be systematically too large, and plaintiffs who sue later will either end up with nothing (because compensation for their injuries has already been paid to other plaintiffs in the form of punitive damages) or will force the defendant to pay again (which would be double counting, producing overdeterrence). n100

[*1799] Another problem is the effect of punitive damages on settlements. One reason that many settlements are large, despite a low chance of plaintiff victory, is the possibility that juries might award irrationally large punitive damages. n101 If punitive damages have an effect on settlements, n102 the enforcement gap theory either breaks down or becomes even more complex: settlements compensate for some unknown percentage of the enforcement gap. The multiplier therefore would have to take into account not only prior and prospective judgments against the injurer, but also all settled claims. Otherwise the defendant would face too much liability - paying for its action both in settlements and in court.

Finally, there are problems of implementation. Even assuming that damages could perfectly eliminate the enforcement gap, any such system would demand fantastic feats of prediction and calculation from judges. Determining the multiplier in each particular case would also require much more information than is probably available to assess the size of the enforcement gap and the damages necessary to close it. The empirical data concerning punitive awards and their effect on defendants are not currently sophisticated enough to support the kind of calculations necessary to put a deterrence theory regime into practice. The problems of implementation might therefore dull some of the luster of a theoretically integrated approach to punitive damages. In addition, the practical effect of Polinsky and Shavell's program would probably be greater than they imagine; although the most notorious punitive awards are extremely large, n103 punitive awards are relatively rare and often less than compensatory damages awarded in the same cases. n104 Polinsky and Shavell could achieve their goal of reducing the biggest and most publicized awards, n105 but they would explode the number of cases in which punitive damages were awarded and probably also increase the size of the awards. Perhaps this result would advance the goal of deterrence, but it is almost certainly not what most deterrence theorists envision.

D. Suggestions for Reform of Punitive Damages

Judicial responses to the problems posed by punitive damages are generally incremental but incoherent; in contrast, deterrence theorists' [*1800] responses are theoretically complete but too radical to be practicable. The suggestions that follow are an attempt to synthesize the strengths of the Gore approach and of deterrence theory into a modest proposal for the reform of punitive damages; this proposal reduces the distortions that punitive damages cause by selectively applying them where their value can be best realized. Punitive damages should promote the values of efficiency, predictability, and rationality to support goals of due process, optimal deterrence, and equitable compensation. Also, any program of reform should be adaptable to the existing litigation system to maximize the prospects for lasting, integrated change.

REV_00263617

It is important to keep in mind the practical strength of the Supreme Court's approach: it has potential for national change within the context of the existing punitive damages doctrine. Two premises may therefore prevent us from straying too far into the theoretical realm. First, abandoning the notion that punitive damages must fill the entire enforcement gap in every case yields a much less intrusive change to the current system. Second, acknowledging that punitive damages may have a retributive purpose in addition to their deterrent purpose is more compatible with the established case law and enables us to make more rational arguments about how to fulfill this retributive purpose. These premises imply that, for now, a good first step would be to limit punitive damages to cases in which they currently apply under state law - rather than the current practice of applying them in all cases in which there is an enforcement gap. Deterrence theorists might object that such extractions water down the effectiveness of their proposals, but the alternative that they offer would require too great a paradigm shift.

These limitations suggest an initial distinction between two types of cases that currently result in punitive damages. Punitive damages are awarded most often in cases of intentional tort n106 and most notoriously in cases of products liability n107 and malpractice. n108 However, moral culpability should almost never be taken into account in the award of punitive damages n109 when the tortfeasor is a corporation (or other continuing business entity). Especially in products liability or contract cases in which the corporation may have performed a cost-benefit analysis before acting, a finding of culpability is merely an excuse to overdeter. Forcing a defendant to pay compensation for the harm it causes will fulfill the expectations that the defendant had at the time of the injury; punitive damages will only further deter harm if those [*1801] expectations were unrealistically low. Culpability might remain a factor, however, for punitive damages against defendants - whether individuals or corporations - who were reckless n110 or intended to cause injury. n111 Confining culpability considerations to cases in which there is a clearly culpable target and using deterrence considerations in other cases of corporate action is a rough divide; however, it brings greater consistency by matching the different rationales behind punitive damages to the cases in which those rationales apply.

A second feature of the economic model of punitive damages that the legal system should adopt is the proposition that punitive damages should be insurable. Currently, only a slight majority of states allow defendants to insure against the risk of punitive liability. n112 Allowing insurance coverage of punitive damages greatly increases the predictability of the liability costs of a given product or activity. Restricting insurability discourages risk-averse defendants from engaging in potentially beneficial activities. n113 In addition, insurability allows for greater risk management. Insurers may be in a better position than potential defendants to predict the costs of accidents and to distribute those costs across an entire industry of risk takers. n114

Finally, as Polinsky and Shavell's suggest, the wealth of a defendant should be excluded from the consideration of a punitive award. n115 Wealth considerations may serve an expressive function, sending a message to corporations that their wealth will not shield them from breaking the law. However, a defendant's wealth is irrelevant [*1802] to the deterrence rationale of punitive damages. n116 If an injurer has to pay more for a particular course of action than he profits from it - as he would if the amount required for deterrence is well-calculated - he will discontinue the action regardless of how much money he has in the bank. Similarly, wealth considerations are inconsistent with the retributive goals of the law in other

REV_00263618

8 of 100 DOCUMENTS

Copyright (c) 1992 Maryland Law Review, Inc..
University of Maryland School of Law

Fall, 1992

51 Md. L. Rev. 172

LENGTH: 17570 words

ESSAY: WHAT IS A TORT CLAIM? AN INTERPRETATION OF CONTEMPORARY TORT REFORM

KENNETH S. ABRAHAM *

* Class of 1962 Professor of Law, University of Virginia School of Law. A.B., Indiana University, 1967; J. D., Yale University, 1971. This Essay is a revised version of the Simon E. Sobeloff Lecture, which I delivered at the University of Maryland School of Law on April 4, 1991. I thank Kenneth Kress, Jeffrey O'Connell, Glen Robinson, and William Stuntz for their comments on an earlier draft.

SUMMARY:
... One of the most common questions raised on the first day of torts class is, "What is a tort?" On their first day of law school, students falter until, eventually, it emerges that a tort is a civil wrong not arising out of contract. ... Indeed, the evolving conception of a tort claim reflects the effort to have what some reformers may think is the best of two worlds -- the imposition of liability on particular wrongdoers that is at the core of tort liability, and the standardization of recovery that is at the core of health and disability insurance and other non-tort compensation systems. ... A true system of liability for risk creation would dispense compensation on a much more uniform basis than would traditional tort liability, because it would base awards on potential loss rather than actual loss, and inevitably there would be less individualized damage computation when the plaintiffs had not yet suffered injury. ... Finally, aside from tort law, no compensation system explicitly pays claimants for their pain and suffering, and even those that pay compensation which might be viewed as a surrogate for pain and suffering only pay in limited amounts. ... For many the full trade has not yet been completed, however, and for this reason too I would expect more reform that makes tort liability look increasingly like non-tort law. ...

TEXT:

[*172] INTRODUCTION

One of the most common questions raised on the first day of torts class is, "What is a tort?" On their first day of law school, students falter until, eventually, it emerges that a tort is a civil wrong not arising out of contract. This almost completely circular definition is not enlightening, and that is part of the lesson. Unless you already know what contitutes a civil wrong, the definition is useless. And once you know what constitutes a civil wrong, the definition is unnecessary. In this Essay I shall explore the changing character of the civil wrongs that are governed by "accident law" -- negligence and strict liability for personal injury -- by looking at the implications of recently proposed and enacted tort reforms for our conception of the nature of a tort claim in this field.

In the last ten years, both proposed and actually adopted accident law reforms have proliferated. The scope and magnitude of these reforms are unparalleled in the history of tort law. They have come from the left, the center, and the right; they have involved medical, products, environmental, and other forms of liability; and they run the conceptual gamut from tinkering with tort law doctrine, to imposing liability for creating the circumstances that distinguish one plaintiff from another. In this respect the abolition of the collateral source rule is a move away from rather than toward the traditional conception of a tort claim.

To sum up, the three reforms of damages law that I have canvassed in this Subpart -- statutory caps, scheduling, and reversal of the collateral source rule -- are graphic illustrations of both of the effects of eroding the traditional conception of a tort claim that I have been underscoring. These reforms help to counteract the potentially arbitrary or discriminatory application of tort law to particular claimants, and they import into tort law devices that non-tort systems have used successfully in providing compensation. For example, under the traditional rules governing pain and suffering, [*194] enormous sums may be paid for pain and suffering to a few claimants. At the same time, other individuals' economic losses may go undercompensated. As it becomes recognized that for practical purposes a finite amount of money is available to compensate the victims of accidental illness and injury, this kind of distribution is transformed into a target for reform. Similarly, the collateral source rule permits double compensation for expenses that have been paid by a claimant's own insurance, even while other claimants have not been fully compensated for their medical expenses or lost wages. Both statutory caps on pain and suffering and the abolition of the collateral source rule can be viewed as attempts to reduce this kind of inequity among claimants, by preserving the large but ultimately finite sum that is available to compensate tort claimants for those who are most in need -- victims with uncompensated out-of-pocket losses.

Proposals for scheduling damage awards would move the system toward another form of equity as well. The great strength of the traditional conception of a tort claim is its capacity to take into account the individual circumstances of the plaintiff and the particular chain of events leading to injury. The enormous discretion accorded the jury under this conception, however, also creates the potential that circumstances that ought to be legally irrelevant to the outcome of the claim may be taken into account. As groups, African-Americans and whites, men and women, the wealthy and the poor may fare differently as claimants under the traditional conception. Similarly, individual defendants and corporations, professional and nonprofessional defendants, local defendants and foreign defendants may fare differently. n59

The various forms of damage scheduling that recently have been proposed would tend to mitigate different outcomes because of prejudice or favoritism based on the foregoing factors. Everyone with the same injury would receive an award within a prespecified range. Admittedly, the data from which schedules are constructed might include outcomes based on such prejudice or favoritism. But by averaging or aggregating the outcomes from a representative sample of claims, the effect of these biases would be submerged; all subsequent claimants would receive awards that averaged the positive [*195] and negative differences resulting from the biases. n60 Thus, damage scheduling would attempt to avoid the silent inequities that can be camouflaged by what Holmes called the "featureless generality" of jury verdicts under the traditional conception. n61

In addition to the effect of these reforms in the law of damages on equity among claimants, each reform represents an effort to import into tort law one or more features that are characteristic of non-tort compensation schemes. Three parallels here are striking. First, nearly all non-tort compensation systems employ rules governing coordination of benefits that are designed to avoid duplicate or overlapping coverage. n62 Private insurance policies accomplish coordination through policy provisions; social insurance accomplishes it through statutory directives or regulations. Along the entire range of compensation systems, the only major exception to this practice is the collateral source rule of traditional tort law. Abolition of the rule is therefore a major landmark in the development of tort law. Abolition not only makes tort resemble other systems; in this respect it makes tort law one of them.

Second, damage scheduling of tort awards has counterparts in any number of non-tort compensation systems that use categorical rules of various sorts to ignore idiosyncracies and differences among individuals, in the interest of achieving equity among claimants and increasing administrative efficiency. Examples include the social security "grid" used to classify disabilities for purposes of SSDI; n63 the lump sums that workers' compensation pays for designated permanent disabilities; n64 and the "diagnostic review group" (DRG) limitations on Medicare reimbursements for particular kinds of illnesses and medical procedures that have been spreading through health insurance generally. n65 These devices are coming to be seen as attractive methods of capturing for tort law some of the efficiencies and equities generated by non-tort systems, and they are finding [*196] their way into the tort reform movement in the form of caps on damages and proposals for damage scheduling.

Finally, aside from tort law, no compensation system explicitly pays claimants for their pain and suffering, and even those that pay compensation which might be viewed as a surrogate for pain and suffering only pay in limited amounts. n66 By foregoing such payment, these systems make compensation of out-of-pocket loss a priority, and at the same time avoid the statistical uncertainty that they would face if compensation of a non-objective category of loss were available without limit. Statutory caps on pain and suffering resonate with both these concerns.

C. Class Actions and Bankruptcy

In this Essay, I cannot undertake a thorough review of the developments in class actions and bankruptcy that have occurred during the last decade, nor can I do justice to the many innovative proposals for reform that have emerged during the same period. It is sufficient to note here that many of the important developments in class actions and bankruptcy in recent years have occurred in tort litigation, and that virtually every important actual and proposed change in the way these fields handle tort claims has had or would have the effect of rendering the particular circumstances of each plaintiff's claim less significant than they would have been under the traditional conception. n67

The tort system simply cannot resolve hundreds of thousands of claims through the ordinary process of individual litigation. n68 By their very nature, class actions tend to focus on the general rather than on the particular. For example, determinations regarding negligence (or strict liability) and at least some features of causation often are made generally and become binding on all members of the class. In addition, in a number of mass tort actions, including asbestos [*197] and Dalkon Shield litigation, the courts and such ancillaries as special masters and consultants have constructed schemes that would encourage or require claimants to be categorized and then compensated on the basis of that categorization. n69 In these cases the courts have used their class action and bankruptcy authority to fashion methods of standardizing claims and distributing payment, all under the rubric of imposing "tort liability." n70 Thus, in a very real sense the principal point of filing for Chapter Eleven bankruptcy reorganization in response to mass tort litigation is to trigger judicial authority to treat collectively claimants who otherwise would have the right to more individual treatment. Finally, much of the academic writing about class actions and damages in mass tort cases has been directed at devising satisfactory methods of departing from the traditional conception of a tort claim, through damage scheduling, aggregative valuation, and the like. n71

In short, the function of class actions and bankruptcy reorganization in connection with tort claims is precisely to facilitate the demise of the traditional conception of a tort claim in mass tort actions. In these settings the law has begun to recognize that, for a variety of reasons, the individualization that is at the heart of the traditional conception is an unaffordable luxury. The rules governing the resolution of tort claims through class actions and bankruptcy -- and the innovations that are now being proposed and seriously considered -- make it increasingly feasible to depart from the traditional conception by paying comparatively less attention to the particulars of individual claims than would be paid outside these settings.

D. Waivers and Disclaimers of Tort Liability

The last set of reforms that I shall analyze does not involve change in the rules governing tort liability or damages, but elective [*198] substitution of alternative regimes for those rules. At the beginning of the modern era of tort law, tort liability displaced contract law as the source of liability for personal injury in settings, including the delivery of health care and the sale of products, n72 where injurers and victims could have contracted before injury about their rights and obligations. That displacement did not merely make tort liability the dominant system for redressing wrongful personal injury; because tort law could not be set aside by contract, tort liability became the exclusive source of law governing liability for personal injury. n73 The traditional conception of a tort claim therefore also became the exclusive reference point for adjudicating personal injury claims. Tort liability could not be waived; it could not be disclaimed; and it could not be contracted away.

The citadel that these no-waiver, no-disclaimer, no-contract rules built is now in the early stages of being dismantled. In the fields of automobile liability, medical malpractice, and products liability, limited adoptions of elective no-fault regimes and far-reaching proposals for authorization of liability and compensation contracts are reordering personal injury law. The common characteristic of these measures, and in a sense their most important feature, is the suspension of the traditional conception's monopoly in the field of civil liability. Personal injury law and tort law are no longer synonymous.

These nontraditional measures can be classified most comfortably along two axes. First, they permit displacement of tort law either at the election of one party or upon the agreement of both parties. Thus, an alternative regime may be selected in a number of ways: only by the claimant, n74 only by the injurer, n75 or only upon mutual agreement. n76 Second, the alternative regime may be selected [*199] before a cause of action in tort arises, n77 after a cause of action arises, n78 or at either point. The result is a combination of different possibilities, together with variations within each depending on whether full or only partial displacement of tort law rules governing liability and damages is permitted. n79 For example, the Virginia and Florida birth-injury compensation programs n80 afford obstetricians and hospitals an annual right to opt out of tort liability for birth-related neurological defects, but in exercising this right these health-care providers must opt into a no-fault compensation system financed by flat surcharges against them. On the other hand, the federal child vaccine-injury program n81 is financed by pharmaceutical companies, and affords claimants who are already injured a right to opt into a no-fault compensation scheme that is comparatively less generous than the tort system has been to successful claimants in this field.

There are two main features of this entire cluster of possibilities. The first is that they are just that -- possibilities. The parties' relationship need not be completely constrained by tort law in general or by the traditional conception in particular. By contract or (depending on the variation in question) at the unilateral election of one of the parties, the full individualization required by the traditional conception may be set aside. Second, in virtually all of these reforms and proposals, what tort law is set aside for is a set of rights and liabilities that is far more standardized and far less individualized than tort rights. Typically the claimant under these schemes is assured full compensation for medical expenses, partial compensation for lost wages, and sometimes a lump sum equivalent to pain [*200] and suffering damages that is subject to a specified monetary ceiling. n82 There is no need to prove negligence, and in some instances statutory presumptions of causation eliminate the need to prove that the claimant suffered actual harm at the hands of the party who would be a defendant if he were making a tort claim. n83

The contract alternatives thus sidestep some of the political difficulties entailed in the construction and implementation of mandatory non-tort compensation schemes, and encourage the more or less voluntary adoption of such schemes. For example, where the right to opt out of tort liability is unilateral, the political objections of those who are given that right are likely to fade away, since they can elect to remain in the tort system. To meet the objections of those against whom this right is exercised, some quid pro quo is necessary. This is likely to mean that the compensation scheme that substitutes for tort liability must be comparatively generous, either financially or through liberalization of compensability criteria.

So far the legislatures have chosen to construct these elective systems themselves, leaving one or both of the parties merely to elect or not to elect participation in a legislatively specified alternative to tort law. The next logical step in the development of contract alternatives may well be legislative or even judicial authorization for potential claimants and defendants to construct alternative systems themselves. Potential parties may then opt out of tort liability and into those systems by mutual agreement. But, for two reasons, this next step may be some years away. First, neither legislatures nor courts are likely to be comfortable with full freedom to contract out of tort liability before assessing experience with the more limited regimes that have been adopted. Second, some system must be devised for bringing into the picture the insurers whose interests would be affected by individual choices. For example, when patients or physicians opt out of the tort system, the exposure of both the physician's malpractice liability insurer and the patient's first-party and social insurers may be affected; these impacts need to be considered, and a method of accounting for them through rate changes, rebates, surcharges, and the like must be devised. Otherwise some of the principal beneficiaries and victims of a decision to opt out of tort and into an alternative regime will be left on the sidelines.

[*201] If these problems were solved, it is quite possible that permitting the parties to opt out of tort liability by mutual agreement would generate a whole series of other schemes, custom designed by the parties for particular kinds of transactions or relationships: for lawnmower-related injuries, drug side effects, and the like. Legislatures cannot reasonably be expected to formulate such compensation programs individually, but they can be expected to authorize such contracts in general and establish specific constraints on their terms. n84 Even if the law cannot construct such schemes, it can allow the parties whose interests would be served by doing so to construct them. The right to opt out of tort liability would create the opportunity to do just that. The courts could police these contracts, having received the legislative message that, subject to the legislatively prescribed constraints, waivers and disclaimers of tort liability are presumptively valid rather than presumptively unconscionable. The private sector could then proceed to try to solve the technical obstacles to constructing alternative compensation systems.

III. IMPLICATIONS FOR THE FUTURE

Because I have claimed not merely to be describing what has already become tort law, but also to be using proposals for reform to predict what else will happen to tort law, I want to suggest in this Part why I think that the future will bring more of the same kinds of tort reform that I have been emphasizing. I argued above that contemporary reform has the effect of promoting greater equity among claimants. Of course, what counts as equitable or inequitable depends on what factors are considered legally important or irrelevant. Identical treatment of all claimants or all defendants is not equitable if there are relevant differences among members of these categories. The developments that I have canvassed seem to me likely to influence several forms of inequity that have long been recognized in the tort system, but nonetheless have been tolerated. As these inequities become less tolerable, reforms that respond to them are likely to be regarded with favor.

One inequity involves differences in the quality of the lawyers [*202] representing claimants. Some are adept at proving causation in the face of scientific uncertainty, some are not. Some are capable of winning million-dollar verdicts and some are not. By imposing liability without requiring proof of causation and by standardizing award levels, a number of the reforms would tend to mitigate the effect of such differences. Another form of inequity I mentioned earlier is the possibility of jury prejudice -- racism, sexism, xenophobia, and a variety of other biases. As we become more and more aware of diversity in our population and more sensitive to that diversity, sweeping the possibility of these kinds of jury prejudices under the rug becomes less and less comfortable, and reforms that respond to or tend to neutralize the prejudices by standardizing award levels become more attractive.

A third form of inequity might be called "legal luck." If you are unlucky enough to fall in your bathtub, you receive limited compensation from health and disability insurance, but if you suffer the same injury at the hands of a third party like your doctor or the manufacturer of your car, under the traditional conception the sky is the limit -- you are free to seek the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. Few people ever find that pot of gold, and in certain respects, some recent reforms may simply bring the law on the books into line with the way tort law is actually practiced in most cases through compromise and settlement. But some of the reforms attempt to contain and manage the differences resulting from legal luck by shrinking the differences in compensation available from tort and the other systems, though without eliminating the differences. The result is a tort system that still has deterrence capacity and still awards more in damages than alternative systems, but that generates less difference in compensation levels and therefore makes people less uncomfortable about the effect of legal luck. n85 [*203] Because this and the other two forms of inequity are likely to remain troubling to many observers of the tort system, pressure for continued reform of this sort is likely to continue.

In addition to reducing inequity among claimants, I have argued that the reforms I have canvassed draw heavily on the devices employed by non-tort compensation systems. In my view the explanation is twofold. First, many of the reformers find the non-tort systems appealing, and are willing to settle for half-a-loaf rather than none. n86 They get half a compensation system -- one operated by a court rather than an insurance company or government agency, or one in which tort liability is not abolished but is made optional. There is every reason to expect that this kind of pressure will continue. For example, my colleague Jeffrey O'Connell has created several new forms of elective no-fault in recent years and some are now being adopted. n87 This development is likely to encourage no-fault reformers.

The second reason for the appeal of non-tort systems is that the scope of tort liability has been expanding for at least the last century. Politically, the time for a quid pro quo seems to have come. More and more people have the right to recover in tort. When the scope of tort liability was limited and defenses were many, full individualization and unlimited damages seemed sensible. As liability has expanded and the defenses to it have withered away, for at least some reformers a trade-off was overdue. The features of nontort systems that award lower levels of compensation in return for providing compensation to more victims appear to be an appealing trade for this expansion in the scope of liability. For many the full [*204] trade has not yet been completed, however, and for this reason too I would expect more reform that makes tort liability look increasingly like non-tort law.

It should go without saying that whether all these changes are desirable is a separate matter. One might think that dealing with the risk of jury prejudice by standardizing awards and ignoring diversity is a bad idea. One might favor the development of more non-tort compensation systems, but think that trying to transform tort law into a non-tort system is not sensible. Or one might favor the latter idea, but object to certain of the reforms that are employed to achieve the transformation of tort law. I happen to think, for example, that placing absolute dollar caps on pain and suffering damages burdens precisely the wrong people -- those who have suffered serious injuries early in their lives -- because they are the people who are most likely to receive a large recovery. Scheduling damages for all claimants makes much more sense to me.

But all that is a matter for another day. The first task is to understand the underlying significance and common direction of contemporary tort reform. Having gained a grasp of that significance, we can then undertake the normative task of assessing the wisdom of the reforms. Then at least we would not be debating the simplistic question of whether a particular reform does or should benefit plaintiffs or defendants. We could instead address more complicated and difficult questions involving how to handle diversity, which forms of equity among claimants are preferable, and tort law's proper relationship with the non-tort systems that are its institutional relatives. That is the kind of tort reform debate toward which we ought to be heading.

CONCLUSION

Let me conclude by emphasizing that my analysis has been offered in the spirit of interpretation, and indeed interpretation of an unfinished and evolving text. The multiple authors of the text probably would not recognize it in my interpretation. The whole text of tort reform, however, may not only be greater than the sum of its parts, but different from that sum as well. Whether my own interpretation will turn out to be correct, of course, depends on how the text continues to be written. But whatever the significance and shape of contemporary tort reform movement ultimately turn out to be, the road to that completed text should be very exciting indeed.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. In some respects this de-emphasizing of the particulars of individual claims reflects a focus on distributive instead of corrective justice -- that is, on the overall distribution of goods in society, rather than on the obligations of particular defendants to particular plaintiffs. For discussion of this distinction, see generally Jules L. Coleman, Moral Theories of Torts: Their Scope and Limits (pts. 1 & 2), 1 LAW & PHIL. 371 (1982), 2 LAW & PHIL. 5 (1983). But as I shall try to show in the remainder of this Essay, more is at issue in contemporary tort reform than whether to pursue corrective or distributive justice through the imposition of tort liability.

n2. See infra Subpart I.A.

n3. See infra Subpart I.B.

n4. See infra Subpart I.C.

n5. See, e.g., Vaughan v. Menlove, 3 Bing (N.C.) 468, 132 Eng. Rep. 490 (C.P. 1837); see also 3 FOWLER HARPER ET AL., THE LAW OF TORTS § 16.2, at 389 (2d ed. 1986).

n6. See OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, THE COMMON LAW 98-99 (Mark D. Howe ed., Belknap Press 1963) (1881).

n7. See generally James A. Henderson, Jr., Expanding the Negligence Concept: Retreat from the Rule of Law, 51 IND. L.J. 467 (1976).

n8. Admittedly, in certain other respects even traditional negligence law does not attend to the unique facts of the case at hand. For example, the external standard used to determine whether the defendant was negligent abstracts from the defendant's own circumstances and disabilities in evaluating the quality of his or her conduct. See GUIDO CALABRESI, IDEALS, BELIEFS, ATTITUDES AND THE LAW 24 (1985) (discussing the "reasonable person" standard); David Rosenberg, Damage Scheduling in Mass Exposure Cases, 1 COURTS, HEALTH SCI. & L. 335, 339 (1991) ("[T]here is no mistaking the averaging design of the external, reasonable person standard of the negligence rule.").

n9. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 520 cmt. l (1965).

n10. As delineated in the Second Restatement of Torts, these are:

(a) existence of a high degree of risk of some harm to the person, land or chattels of others;

(b) likelihood that the harm that results from [the activity] will be great;

(c) inability to eliminate the risk by the exercise of reasonable care;

(d) extent to which the activity is not a matter of common usage;

(e) inappropriateness of the activity to the place where it is carried on;

(f) extent to which its value to the community is outweighed by its dangerous attributes.

Id. § 520.

n11. See VICTOR E. SCHWARTZ, COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE § § 1.1, 1.4-1.6 (2d ed. 1986).

n12. See, e.g., Micallef v. Miehle Co., 348 N.E.2d 571, 578 (N.Y. 1976) (overturning the "patent-danger" rule, which barred recovery for injuries resulting from a patent, rather than a latent, danger).

n13. See 4 HARPER et al., supra note 5, § 20.2, at 91.

n14. See, e.g., Guenther v. Armstrong Rubber Co., 406 F.2d 1315, 1318 (3d Cir. 1969) (evidence that defendant manufactured 75% to 80% of tires in stock not sufficient for plaintiff to get to jury); Smith v. Rapid Transit, Inc., 58 N.E.2d 754, 755 (Mass. 1945) (evidence that defendant operated a bus route at approximate time and place of plaintiff's collision with bus not admissible on question of defendant's ownership of particular bus). See generally David Kaye, The Limits of the Preponderance of the Evidence Standard: Justifiably Naked Statistical Evidence and Multiple Causation, 1982 AM. BAR FOUND. RES. J. 487.

n15. See, e.g., Herskovits v. Group Health Coop., 664 P.2d 474, 476-77 (Wash. 1983) (jury permitted to determine whether physician's failure to diagnose illness in timely fashion was proximate cause of death, upon evidence that decedent's chance of survival was reduced from 39% to 25%).

n16. The members of the jury are of course permitted to generalize from their own experience in and understanding of the physical world in order to answer the counterfactual causal inquiry. Indeed, it is hard to imagine how the causal inquiry could be resolved without reference to such experience and understanding, unless it were by reference to statistical generalizations.

n17. On at least some views of the matter it also is not sufficient that the defendant harmed the plaintiff; harm to the plaintiff must also have been foreseeably risked. See Palsgraf v. Long Island R.R., 162 N.E. 99, 99 (N.Y. 1928). In addition, in at least some situations the type of harm risked, and not some other type, must have occurred in order to hold the defendant liable. See Petition of Kinsman, 338 F.2d 708, 726 (2d Cir. 1964) (defendant liable only if injury to plaintiff caused by failure to raise a drawbridge before bridge was struck by drifting vessel was foreseeable).

n18. See, e.g., Steinhauser v. Hertz, 421 F.2d 1169, 1173-74 (2d Cir. 1970) (holding that plaintiff is entitled to recover in full if jury finds that accident was "precipitating factor" causing schizophrenia in child, who previously exhibited latent schizophrenic tendencies).

n19. See SCHWARTZ, supra note 11, § 2.1, at 30-32. The same approach is used in jurisdictions where comparative negligence also applies in strict liability actions. See, e.g., Daly v. General Motors Corp., 575 P.2d 1162, 1168-69 (Cal. 1978) (proportionately reducing plaintiff's recovery where plaintiff failed to use safety belts and door locks, and was driving while intoxicated).

n20. The ideal of corrective justice is often impossible to achieve in a number of respects. For example, the "wrongdoer" may be an individual employee of a legal construct -- a corporation -- but the corporation is likely to be the defendant; the basis for the imposition of liability may not be that the defendant is a "wrongdoer," but that the defendant should be held liable notwithstanding the absence of wrongdoing; and the defendant's insurance company, not the defendant, may provide the funds that "correct" the "wrong."

n21. See generally Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr., Authority in the Dock, 69 B.U. L. REV. 469 (1989).

n22. See generally Kenneth S. Abraham, The Insurance Implications of Alternative Compensation Systems, 25 HOUS. L. REV. 817 (1988) (arguing that the difficulty of defining compensable events in product and process injuries, including environmental exposure injuries, makes expansion of health and disability coverage in private first-party and social insurance policies a more viable alternative than no-fault insurance schemes); James A. Henderson, Jr., The Boundary Problems of Enterprise Liability, 41 MD. L. REV. 659 (1982) (discussing problems in defining compensable events under an enterprise liability system for technologically advanced activities).

n23. For a compendium, synthesis, and analysis of much of this scholarship and law reform, see generally the two-volume AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE REPORTERS' STUDY, ENTERPRISE RESPONSIBILITY FOR PERSONAL INJURY (1991) [hereinafter ENTERPRISE RESPONSIBILITY FOR PERSONAL INJURY]. See also TORT LAW AND THE PUBLIC INTEREST (Peter H. Schuck ed., 1991) (discussing tort reform controversy).

n24. For a catalogue of the reforms that were adopted by statute, see Joseph Sanders & Craig Joyce, "Off to the Races": The 1980s Tort Crisis and the Law Reform Process, 27 HOUS. L. REV. 207, 220-22 (1990).

n25. See, e.g., In re Fibreboard Corp., 893 F.2d 706, 712 (5th Cir. 1990) (overruling district court's "imaginative approach" that had required full trial on liability for 11 class representatives using evidence from 30 illustrative plaintiffs, enabling jury then to determine damages suffered by remaining 2990 class members); Jenkins v. Raymark Indus., 782 F.2d 468, 475 (5th Cir. 1986) (affirming district court's ratification of plaintiff class in mass-tort asbestos action, using bifurcated trials to determine punitive and actual damages separately). See generally PETER H. SCHUCK, AGENT ORANGE ON TRIAL (1986) (examining judicial approaches to Agent Orange litigation and suggesting alternatives); Francis E. McGovern, Resolving Mature Mass Tort Litigation, 69 B.U. L. REV. 659 (1989) (examining judicial approaches to asbestos-related and Dalkon Shield litigation, and suggesting alternatives).

n26. See infra Subpart II.A.

n27. See infra Subpart II.B.

n28. See infra Subpart II.C.

n29. See infra Subpart II.D.

n30. See, e.g., Sterling v. Velsicol Chemical Corp., 647 F. Supp. 303, 321-22 (W.D. Tenn. 1987) (approving "enhanced risk" or "enhanced susceptibility" to disease as compensable injury); Glen O. Robinson, Probabilistic Causation and Compensation for Tortious Risk, 14 J. LEGAL STUD. 779, 783 (1985) (arguing that the basic objectives of tort law are better served if liability is based on risk of injury rather than on actual occurrence of harm).

n31. See, e.g., Rosenberg, supra note 8, at 341-42 (suggesting that firms potentially liable for claims involving toxic exposure set aside a fund, or purchase m commercial insurance to cover such claims); Christopher H. Schroeder, Corrective Justice and Liability for Increasing Risks, 37 UCLA L. REV. 439 (1990) (arguing in favor of increased risk of harm as a compensable event). In a sense, this modified approach departs even more radically from the traditional conception of a tort claim than does the pure approach. Under the pure approach the imposition of liability on the defendant and the receipt of compensation by the plaintiff are simultaneous. There is a direct, face-to-face connection between the plaintiff and the defendant in the course of the claim, and the judgment rendered obligates the defendant to pay the plaintiff. But under the modified approach the defendant does not pay the plaintiff directly; it pays into a fund that later pays the plaintiff.

This separation of the imposition of liability from the payment of compensation may seem to be merely formal. From the plaintiff's standpoint the defendant pays the plaintiff, and the plaintiff cannot recover unless he or she has been harmed by the defendant. On the other hand, from the defendant's standpoint, its liability is not to an individual or even to a group of individuals. Rather, the defendant is liable to a kind of intermediary -- the fund created by its payment of the judgment against it. The identities of the individuals whose harm the defendant's actions have risked are immaterial to the defendant. By the time this risk materializes in harm, the defendant's legal relationship with and obligation to these individuals has terminated. In effect, the defendant has paid a tax calibrated to the riskiness of its activities and that tax has been used to finance a system that will later be used to compensate those who subsequently become victims of these activities.

n32. Diethylstilbestrol (DES) was marketed as a prescription drug for the prevention of miscarriage, and was later alleged to cause cancer in daughters of some women who took DES during pregnancy. See, e.g., Sindell v. Abbott Lab., 607 P.2d 924, 925 (Cal. 1980) (holding defendants liable in proportion to their share of the DES market).

n33. See, e.g., Hardy v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 509 F. Supp. 1353 (E.D. Tex. 1981).

n34. See supra note 14 and accompanying text.

n35. In some jurisdictions a defendant may avoid liability by showing that the plaintiff could not have been exposed to that defendant's product. For example, the defendant may show that during the years in question it made no sales in the state where the plaintiff resided. See, e.g., McCormack v. Abbott Lab., 617 F. Supp. 1521, 1526 (D. Mass. 1985). In other jurisdictions, however, even this showing will not suffice to exonerate the defendant. See, e.g., Hymowitz v. Eli Lilly & Co., 539 N.E.2d 1069, 1074-75 (N.Y. 1989).

n36. See, e.g., Herskovitz v. Group Health Coop., 664 P.2d 474, 479 (Wash. 1983) (measuring damages in a wrongful death case by the percent reduction in chance of survival); David Rosenberg, The Causal Connection in Mass Exposure Cases: A "Public Law" Vision of the Tort System, 97 HARV. L. REV. 849 (1984).

n37. Like market-share liability, this approach is fraught with practical problems, not the least of which is the potential unreliability of the statistical evidence on which it would rely. See Kenneth S. Abraham, Individual Action and Collective Responsibility: The Dilemma of Mass Tort Reform, 73 VA. L. REV. 845, 867 (1987) (noting that "the data necessary to support the probabilistic measures of causation that could serve as surrogates for causal responsibility will rarely be available").

n38. In tort, the dominant compensable event is the occurrence of an injury resulting from the fault of the defendant. By contrast, in workers' compensation and automobile no-fault insurance the event is an injury caused by employment or while driving. In health and disability insurance (private or social), the event is a loss falling into the appropriate category, regardless of fault or cause.

n39. There actually are two problems: (1) it is sometimes difficult to know whether a particular injury was caused by the activity in question (medical care or exposure to a product or environmental hazard, for example); and (2) even assuming that the injury was caused by the activity in question, not all such injuries must be included within the compensation system to assure optimal internalization of the cost of injuries associated with the activity. Examples in this category might include a minor side effect of beneficial medical treatment or an accidental cut caused by a sharp knife. Imposing tort liability for risk creation responds more to the first than to the second problem.

n40. At the very least, tort liability appears to be expanded under this approach. To be entirely consistent, of course, damages should be calculated in proportion to risk regardless of the percentage probability that the defendant's action caused the plaintiff harm. For example, if a defendant is liable for 30% of a claimant's loss when there is a 30% chance that the defendant caused the loss, then the defendant should be held liable for only 70% of the loss when the chance that the defendant caused the loss is 70%. If under a new regime the defendant were held liable only for 70% of the loss in the latter situation, then liability would have been contracted in this respect, because under traditional rules the defendant would pay 100% of the loss in such a situation.

n41. Between 1985 and 1988, 23 jurisdictions placed caps on damage recoveries. See Sanders & Joyce, supra note 24, at 220-22.

n42. See, e.g., STEVEN SHAVELL, ECONOMIC ANALYSIS OF ACCIDENT LAW 228-35 (1987)

(arguing that socially ideal compensation cannot be achieved under a liability system that compensates for nonpecuniary losses); Samuel A. Rea Jr., Non-Pecuniary Loss and Breach of Contract, 11 J. LEGAL STUD. 35 (1982) (exploring "inefficiency" of full compensation for nonpecuniary losses resulting from breach); Alan Schwartz, Proposals for Products Liability Reform: A Theoretical Synthesis, 97 YALE L.J. 353, 362-67, 408-11 (1988) (contending that tort liability should apply only to pecuniary losses while nonpecuniary harm should be covered by a legislatively-mandated system of fines).

n43. See, e.g., Kenneth S. Abraham & Glen O. Robinson, Aggregative Valuation of Mass Tort Claims, LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS., Autumn 1990, at 137. See generally Rosenberg, supra note 8 (proposing damage scheduling through averaging and prioritizing compensation in lieu of individual awards); James F. Blumstein et al., Beyond Tort Reform: Developing Better Tools for Assessing Damages for Personal Injury, 8 YALE J. ON REG. 171 (1991) (proposing development of a reporting system that would have precedential value for future awards); Randall R. Bovbjerg et al., Valuing Life and Limb in Tort: Scheduling "Pain and Suffering," 83 NW. U. L. REV. 908 (1989) (proposing three alternative frameworks to perfect valuation of noneconomic damages under the current system of liability).

n44. Depending on the complexity of the schedule, it might take into account the severity of the injury, its degree of permanence, and the life expectancy of the party injured.

n45. See, e.g., Bovbjerg et al., supra note 43, at 921-22 (tables summarizing a sample of jury awards).

n46. See generally Abraham & Robinson, supra note 43.

n47. Of course, it is possible to imagine damage schedules that create only rebuttable presumptions and therefore permit the claimant to show that, because of the unusual severity of the injury, the upper limit applicable to that kind of injury should be relaxed. See id. at 147-48. Such an approach will tend to have fewer of the effects I point to in the text, but because of the typical operation of even rebuttable presumptions, these effects still are likely to appear to some degree.

n48. See 4 HARPER et al., supra note 5, § 25.22, at 648-51.

n49. See 1 ENTERPRISE RESPONSIBILITY FOR PERSONAL INJURY, supra note 23, at 162-64.

n50. See Kenneth S. Abraham, Medical Malpractice Reform: A Preliminary Analysis, 36 MD. L. REV. 489, 504-06 (1977) (discussing potential modifications of the collateral source rule); Prentiss E. Feagles et al.; Comment, An Analysis of State Legislative Responses to the Medical Malpractice Crisis, 1975 DUKE L. J. 1417, 1447-50 (citing California, Idaho, Iowa, New York, Pennsylvania, and Tennessee statutes).

n51. In total, 25 jurisdictions have now enacted some form of legislation governing the collateral source rule. See Sanders & Joyce, supra note 24, at 220-22 (table listing those states enacting such legislation between 1985 and 1988).

n52. Strictly speaking, in some of these jurisdictions the rule has not been completely abolished because the statutes abolishing the rule apply only to specified sources or exclude specified sources from their application. In addition, decisions in a number of federal cases have ruled the statutes inapplicable to certain federal social insurance programs, on the ground that the abolition would interfere with the federal statutory rights of reimbursement accorded some of these sources of social insurance. See, e.g., Rubin v. Sullivan, 720 F. Supp. 840, 846 (D. Haw. 1989) (disallowing matching funds under Medicaid); Abrams v. Heckler, 582 F. Supp. 1155, 1165 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) (upholding regulation precluding Medicare payments for services covered by auto insurance policies).

n53. For explanations of the reasons for this unsystematic exercise of insurers' rights of subrogation and reimbursement, see 1 ENTERPRISE RESPONSIBILITY FOR PERSONAL INJURY, supra note 23, at 164.

n54. See John G. Fleming, The Collateral Source Rule and Loss Allocation in Tort Law, 54 CAL. L. REV. 1478, 1498-1512 (1966) (outlining several methods by which insurers obtain reimbursement).

n55. Most estimates are that between 30 and 37 million people in the United States (out of a population of 250 million) are uninsured. See, e.g., CONGRESSIONAL RESEARCH SERVICE, HEALTH INSURANCE AND THE UNINSURED: BACKGROUND DATA AND ANALYSIS 93 (1988); M. Eugene Moyer, A Revised Look at the Number of Uninsured Americans, 8 HEALTH AFF. 102 (1989).

n56. Hawaii was the last state to adopt a workers' compensation law, in 1963. See ARTHUR O. LARSON, THE LAW OF WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION § 5.30 (1952 & Supp. 1989).

n57. See Social Security Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1396 (1988).

n58. See HEALTH INSURANCE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA, 1988 UPDATE: SOURCE BOOK OF HEALTH INSURANCE DATA 7 (1988) (table).

n59. For example, one study showed that juries are likely to award substantially more in product liability, malpractice, or work injury cases than in an automobile case involving injury of the same severity. See AUDREY CHIN & MARK A. PETERSON, DEEP POCKETS, EMPTY POCKETS: WHO WINS IN COOK COUNTY JURY TRIALS 52-56 (1985).

n60. See Abraham & Robinson, supra note 43, at 150-51; Rosenberg, supra note 8, at 340-41.

n61. HOLMES, supra note 6, at 89.

n62. See KENNETH S. ABRAHAM, DISTRIBUTING RISK: INSURANCE, LEGAL THEORY, AND PUBLIC POLICY 133-72 (1986) (discussing the purposes and implications of and devices for coordinated coverage).

n63. For discussion of the promulgation of the grid, and the controversy and litigation that followed, see JERRY L. MASHAW, BUREAUCRATIC JUSTICE (1983).

n64. See LARSON, supra note 56, at § 58.00.

n65. See Social Security Amendments of 1983, Pub. L. No. 98-21, 97 Stat. 65 (1984) (codified as amended in scattered sections of 42 U.S.C.). For discussion of these limitations, see J. Timothy Phillips & Don E. Wlneberg, Medicare Prospective Payment: A Quiet Revolution, 87 W. VA. L. REV. 27 (1984).

n66. The lump sum workers' compensation payments for specified permanent disabilities bear a close resemblance to pain and suffering damages, though they are not so denominated. Pain and suffering is also recoverable under automobile uninsured or underinsured motorist insurance, but the right to benefits is contingent on the existence of a valid cause of action in tort against the uninsured or underinsured motorist.

n67. For fairly recent sets of recommendations, see AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE, COMPLEX LITIGATION PROJECT, TENTATIVE DRAFT No. 1 (Apr. 14, 1989) and TENTATIVE DRAFT No. 2 (Apr. 6, 1990); AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION COMMISSION ON MASS TORTS, REVISED FINAL REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS (1989) [hereinafter COMMISSION ON MASS TORTS].

n68. For example, the Agent Orange, Dalkon Shield, and asbestos litigation have involved about 125,000, 210,000, and 340,000 claimants, respectively. See COMMISSION ON MASS TORTS, supra note 67, at 15e.

n69. See Kenneth R. Feinberg, The Dalkon Shield Claimants' Trust Claims Resolution Facility, LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS., Autumn 1990, at 79; McGovern, supra note 25, at 659.

n70. In other cases some trial judges have attempted to employ collective devices for resolving individual issues without great success. See, e.g., In re Fibreboard Corp., 893 F.2d 706, 712 (5th Cir. 1990) (granting mandamus against trial court's plan to determine liability and damages for an entire class of 3000 claimants based on a trial of selected claims representing different asbestos-related disease categories). For in-depth discussion of other innovative efforts that have met with mixed success, see Linda S. Mullinex, Beyond Consolidation: Postaggregative Procedure in Asbestos Mass Tort Litigation, 32 WM. & MARY L. REV. 475 (1991).

n71. Without question, David Rosenberg has been in the forefront of this effort. See, e.g., Rosenberg, supra note 8, at 335.

n72. See, e.g., MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co., 111 N.E. 1050, 1053 (N.Y. 1916) (holding that purchaser of a vehicle may sue manufacturer for negligence, notwithstanding absence of privity of contract between them).

n73. See, e.g., Henningsen v. Bloomfield Motors, Inc., 161 A.2d 69, 97 (N.J. 1960) (holding that risk of harm, to wholesale substitution of no-fault compensation schemes for tort liability. Both academic analysis and partisan debate over the wisdom and practicality of these reforms has been and continues to be intense. In short, tort law is in considerable turmoil and there is no end in sight.

It would be a mistake to try to find a single central message in all of this analysis, debate, and reform, for the subject is not monolithic. Some proposals and analyses have been based on the assertion [*173] of principle, some on pragmatic judgments about the most workable mix of tort law, regulation, and insurance, and some have been transparently self-serving. Nonetheless, it has been common to divide contemporary tort reform into two categories: reforms that would increase the scope of tort liability and reforms that would decrease it. This is obviously a useful classification, for it captures what is important to those who are immediately affected: whether a reform produces more or less liability, more or less compensation. This concern with whether plaintiffs or defendants gain an immediate benefit from a reform, however, obscures something else that is beginning to happen, and that I think will continue to happen in contemporary tort law.

At the core of our traditional conception of a tort claim are two notion: the right to individualized determination of the defendant's liability, and the right to custom-tailored compensation for the actual loss suffered by the claimant. The particular circumstances of the claim play an essential role in such a conception. But the combined effect of a number of the reforms that have surfaced in recent years is the erosion of this conception. In one way or another these measures de-emphasize the particulars of the individual claim.

In eroding the traditional conception, the reforms seem to me to be significant in two related ways. First, they promote a version of equity among claimants that both accords a priority to the compensation of out-of-pocket loss and reduces the risk of disadvantaging members of particular groups. n1 Second, the reforms import into tort law some of the more appealing (though to some people, unappealing) features of non-tort compensation systems -- workers' compensation, auto no-fault, and private and social insurance. Because non-tort compensation systems tend to standardize claims and recoveries at the expense of individualization, it is no surprise that the two effects of recent reform are related. Indeed, the evolving conception of a tort claim reflects the effort to have what some reformers may think is the best of two worlds -- the imposition of liability on particular wrongdoers that is at the core of tort liability, and the [*174] standardization of recovery that is at the core of health and disability insurance and other non-tort compensation systems.

At the outset a word about the character of my inquiry is in order. I do not contend that the authors of contemporary tort reforms have consciously attempted to change our conception of what it means to have a tort claim. On the contrary, most of those involved in tort reform, whether in litigation, in the legislatures, or in the pages of law reviews, are concerned mainly with expanding or contracting liability, not explaining or even understanding the jurisprudential significance of the reforms they propose. And because I want not only to describe the recent past but also to predict the future course and significance of reform, my analysis covers both reforms that already have been enacted and those that are being given serious consideration -- though I do not include proposals for reform that are at this stage mere pie-in-the-sky. For all these reasons, I shall offer what I describe as an interpretation -- a reading of the major features of contemporary tort reform, designed more to uncover their ultimate meaning and significance than to assess their immediate impact.

I. THE TRADITIONAL CONCEPTION

The traditional conception of a tort claim is rooted in the notion that every claim is unique. This conception is reflected both in the rules of law that govern the making of tort claims and in the manner in which they are implemented. There is individualization throughout: in the application of liability standards, n2 in the rules governing causation, n3 and in the assessment of the claimant's damages. n4

A. Liability Standards

From the time of its emergence as the dominant standard of liability for accidental harm, negligence has been defined as the failure to exercise the care that would be reasonable under the circumstances. n5 Although, as Holmes suggested over a century ago, n6 our notions of negligence might well have crystallized into a set of categorical [*175] rules delineating the kinds of behavior that do or do not satisfy the negligence standard, this kind of crystallization never occurred. On the contrary, even the nineteenth century automobile manufacturer could not use disclaimer of implied warranty to relieve it of liability when plaintiff was injured because of manufacturing defect).

n74. This approach is employed by the National Vaccine Act, which provides no-fault compensation to individuals suffering side effects from the administration of child vaccines. See National Vaccine Act, 42 U.S.C. § § 300aa-1 to -34 (1988).

n75. This approach is employed by the Virginia and Florida birth-injury funds. See VA. CODE ANN. § § 38.2-5000 to -5021 (Michie 1990 & Supp. 1991); FLA. STAT. ANN. § § 766.301-.316 (West Supp. 1989).

n76. For proposals in this regard, see 1 ENTERPRISE RESPONSIBILITY FOR PERSONAL INJURY, supra note 23, at 487-536; Jeffrey O'Connell, A "Neo-No-Fault" Contract In Lieu of Tort: Preaccident Guarantees of Postaccident Settlement Offers, 73 CAL. L. REV. 898 (1985).

n77. See, e.g., Richard Epstein, Medical Malpractice, Imperfect Information, and the Contractual Foundation for Medical Services, LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS., Spring 1986, at 201 (discussing contracts for health services, especially in light of the rise of health maintenance organizations (HMOs)); Glen O. Robinson, Rethinking the Allocation of Medical Malpractice Risks between Patients and Providers, LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS., Spring 1986, at 173.

n78. See, e.g., Jeffrey O'Connell, Offers That Can't Be Refused: Foreclosure of Personal Injury Claims By Defendants' Prompt Tender of Claimants' Net Economic Losses, 77 NW. U. L. REV. 589, 601 (1982) (proposing a statute that would give a defendant in a personal injury action the option of foreclosing such claims by offering, within 60 days, to pay the claimant's net economic loss, or "special" damages, in excess of losses covered by the claimant's collateral sources).

n79. For example, complete ex ante waiver of tort liability might be permitted, or such waivers might be permitted only if the potential injurer promised to provide a substitute compensation package, such as no-fault payment of full economic loss resulting from an injury for which there would otherwise be tort liability. See id.; Kenneth S. Abraham, Medical Liability Reform: A Conceptual Framework, 260 JAMA 68, 71-72 (1988).

n80. See supra note 75.

n81. See supra note 74.

n82. See, e.g., VA. CODE ANN. § 38.2-5009 (Michie 1990 & Supp. 1991).

n83. See, e.g., id. § 38.2-5008.

n84. These constraints would have to deal with at least two issues: how to establish the equivalent of "informed consent" or "knowing waiver" by claimants (and those who might become claimants), and the substantive requirements and limits of the approach substituted for tort liability. We have considerable experience with the former. As to the latter, a requirement that the alternative have a monetary value equivalent to the tort right waived, in light of the probability and severity of potential injury and any price differential offered in return for the waiver, might provide a suitable baseline.

n85. In a somewhat similar manner the imposition of liability for creating risk might be interpreted as a method of dealing with "legal luck" from the defendant's rather than the plaintiff's perspective. Under the traditional conception, either there is full liability or there is none. The party who has acted negligently, but has the luck not to have caused injury, escapes entirely, while the defendant who is negligent in the same way, but unlucky enough to have injured someone, may have to shoulder enormous liability for the injuries its actions caused. Morally speaking, the defendant whose risky actions do not cause injury stands in the same position as the defendant whose actions do. See Christopher H. Schroeder, Corrective Justice and Liability for Increasing Risks, 37 UCLA L. REV. 439, 453 (1990). Liability for creating risk would diminish this distinction without a moral difference among defendants. Admittedly, however, two different factors tend to mitigate the effect of these forms of legal luck for defendants: liability insurance and the repeat-player phenomenon. By insuring, the potential defendant can transfer to an insurance pool the risk of having the bad luck of injuring someone; and even the noninsured actor mitigates the effect of such bad legal luck through what amounts to self-insurance if that actor has a sufficiently broad base of claims experience to be a repeat player. The argument for imposing liability for creating risk in order to mitigate the impact of legal luck is therefore much weaker from defendants' than from plaintiffs' perspective.

n86. The logic of this development (if not also the history) proceeds as follows: First, the weaknesses of the traditional conception of tort law are recognized. Next, serious consideration is given to the adoption of non-tort liability and compensation systems that would supplement or displace the traditional conception, but the political and technical obstacles to the construction of such systems are recognized. Attention therefore turns again to reform within the tort system. Tort reforms are then formulated that in one way or another attempt to capture the benefits of the infeasible compensation-system alternatives to tort liability, while avoiding the disadvantages of these alternatives. This progression is not a figment of my interpretive imagination; it is explicit, for example, in the recent study group report on tort reform to the American Law Institute. See 1 ENTERPRISE LIABILITY FOR PERSONAL INJURY, supra note 23, at 6-7.

n87. See, e.g., Jeffrey O'Connell, A Model Bill Allowing Choice Between Auto Insurance Payable With and Without Regard to Fault, 51 OHIO ST. L.J. 947, 947-51 (1990).

per se no-duty rules have slowly eroded in favor of submission of negligence claims to juries for decision. n7 The result is that at least in principle every negligence case is unique, for the law makes no effort to treat it as a member of a general category governed by a legal rule. n8 The only precedent that most negligence cases set (and the major rule that most follow) is that because reasonable people could disagree about whether the behavior involved was negligent, the case should be submitted to the jury.

In the fields of accident law dominated by strict liability rather than negligence the situation is similar. The defectiveness of a particular product's design and the adequacy of the warning it carried may be litigated time and again, even though the same design and warning are involved in each separate case. In environmental liability, the law on the books is that the courts, not juries, are to decide such questions as whether a particular activity is "abnormally dangerous" and therefore warrants the imposition of strict liability for the injury it causes. n9 The test for what constitutes an abnormally dangerous activity, however, requires consideration of six different and largely incommensurable factors. n10 As a consequence, the imposition of this form of strict liability is highly context dependent, and per se rules govern its application to only a few especially dangerous activities such as blasting. In most other situations the [*176] unique circumstances of each case must be considered in determining whether to impose strict liability for the consequences of the activity.

What is true of liability standards themselves is also true of most available defenses. It is now the law in most of the country that the doctrine of comparative negligence does not bar a plaintiff's recovery, but instead reduces the size of that recovery in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to the plaintiff. n11 Whether comparative negligence or contributory negligence is in force, however, each doctrine focuses on the particular character of the plaintiff's conduct under the circumstances of the case. The same is true of certain other defenses to both negligence and strict liability, including product misuse and assumption of risk. n12

B. Causation

The notion that each tort claim is unique also is reflected in the traditional rules governing proof of causation. The plaintiff must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that, but for the defendant's conduct, the plaintiff would not have suffered the loss in question. n13 I admit that this but-for test in a sense divorces the causation issue from the unique facts of the case at hand because the jury must decide what would have happened had the defendant not been negligent (or not engaged in a strict liability activity). Because by hypothesis the defendant was negligent (or engaged in a strict liability activity), this decision requires a counterfactual inquiry involving one important "fact" that differs from the case at hand.

Nonetheless, the focus of the causation inquiry on the unique facts of the individual case does emerge, and nowhere more than in the rules regarding what cannot count as evidence of causation. "Naked" statistical evidence regarding the probability that the defendant's action caused the plaintiff harm is inadmissible, n14 with [*177] only a few exceptions. n15 The result is that the jury is not permitted to base its decision on evidence about causation in other situations. n16 When there simply are no particular facts (or there are insufficient facts) on which to base a causal determination, the plaintiff has failed to make out a prima facie case and the defendant wins automatically.

Moreover, the essence of the traditional causation requirement is that the action of the defendant must have wronged the plaintiff by causing him or her actual physical harm. That is, the defendant's actions must not only risk harm to the plaintiff, but that harm, or a harm very much like it, must actually occur. n17 The idea that tort liability is imposed only when the defendant's actions have caused physical harm to the plaintiff is so obvious that it is almost transparent, but it is a critically important feature of the traditional conception of accident law. Without an actual-harm requirement, the plaintiff is a mere member of the public toward whom the defendant behaved improperly, and the imposition of liability on the defendant -- however measured -- begins to resemble criminal punishment for wrongdoing to the public at large rather than the rectification of a wrong to a particular individual. The actual-harm requirement thus makes the unique causal connection between the defendant's action and plaintiff's harm the focus of inquiry.

C. Damages

Without question, the rules governing recovery of damages in tort cases most clearly reflect the traditional conception of the uniqueness of every tort claim. The successful plaintiff is entitled to [*178] recover individualized and unlimited damages for past and future out-of-pocket expenses such as lost wages and medical costs, and for past and future pain and suffering. Evidence of awards made to others who have suffered similar injuries not only is not binding -- it is not even admissible; the jury does not hear of other awards and cannot consider them in assessing damages. The principle of individualization is so strong, in fact, that a "thin-skull" rule prevails, under which a plaintiff who is especially susceptible to injury may recover in full. n18

Even the major exception to this principle of individualized full recovery confirms it. Under the doctrine of comparative negligence, the negligence of the plaintiff does not bar recovery, but merely reduces the plaintiff's recovery in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to him or her. n19 The baseline against which this reduction occurs, however, is full and individualized recovery; comparative negligence thus maintains tort law's allegiance to this principle of individualized recovery even while creating an exception to it.

In summary, the individualized character of the determinations that make up the traditional conception is evident when the rules governing standards of conduct, causation, and damages described above are considered together. And they have been surprisingly resistant to change. I think that the traditional conception has been so appealing because resolution of personal injury claims in court, before juries, has remained important. Part of this appeal is rooted in the ideal of corrective justice, under which a wrongdoer is required to rectify the harm done to his or her victim.

But in my view more is at stake than this simple, sometimes primitive, and in the modern context, often impossible ideal. n20 Also at stake is the idea that, without the aid of the government and the [*179] whole apparatus of the criminal law, ordinary aggrieved citizens can put authority on trial. That idea has become part of the democratic ideal in this country, and tort law is a major vehicle through which that confrontation occurs, n21 or at least seems to occur. We have been willing to tolerate much that is unattractive and unfair about tort law in order to permit ordinary people to sue large institutions for malpractice, defectively designed products, and hazardous exposure to pollutants. There have always been alternatives, but they lie outside the tort system -- stronger regulation for deterrence, and no-fault systems like workers' and auto compensation schemes. But, for two reasons, until recently there did not seem to be any feasible way to extend the compensation systems beyond employment and auto injuries: it appeared necessary to cut back on tort liability in order to extend these approaches into other fields, and that was politically difficult. Further, because of the difficulty of defining the events that would trigger a right to compensation, there did not seem to be any technically feasible way to construct workable no-fault systems of compensation in other fields. n22

What is now beginning to happen is that tort law is groping toward an arrangement that circumvents these difficulties by maintaining the right to sue in tort, while at the same time importing some of the more attractive features of non-tort compensation systems into tort law. The importing has begun to occur and will continue, I think, both because the alternatives are attractive in their own right, and because they would remedy some of the weaknesses of tort law that we once were willing to tolerate, but which have become increasingly objectionable. Of course it is open to question what the future will bring, for my analysis is almost as much a prediction of what is going to happen as it is a description of what has already happened. But a great deal has already happened, and in any case the role of the legal scholar sometimes is to help us see [*180] where we are going. That is what I will try to do in the following discussion.

II. THE IMPACT OF RECENT DEVELOPMENTS ON THE TRADITIONAL CONCEPTION

The decade of the 1980s was a period of enormous ferment in tort law scholarship and tort law reform. Significant new proposals for reordering tort law emerged, n23 the liability insurance "crisis" of the middle of the decade catalyzed support for some of these proposals, and tort reform statutes of one sort or another were enacted in over forty states. n24 In addition, judicial action in a series of mass tort cases experimented with new approaches on a number of different fronts. n25

Although this scholarship and the legislative and judicial action that it helped to spawn are diverse, on discernible theme is the tendency of many of the reforms to depart from the traditional conception of the uniqueness of every tort claim. Each of a series of reforms would erode (or has begun to erode) this traditional conception, by rendering the particular circumstances of the plaintiff or defendant less significant to the outcome of the claim than they would have been in the past. Interestingly, this common characteristic links together a number of otherwise quite different reforms. Some of these expand the scope of liability, by imposing liability measured by the degree of risk imposed on the plaintiff. n26 Others contract liability, by reversing the traditional "collateral source" [*181] rule or by placing caps on damages recoverable for pain and suffering. n27 Some facilitate the institution of tort claims by breaking down barriers to class actions, n28 while others make it more difficult or impossible to bring tort actions by authorizing waivers or disclaimers of tort liability. n29

A. Liability for the Tortious Creation of Risk

Perhaps the most radical of all the measures that would erode the traditional conception of a tort claim involves liability for the tortious creation of risk. A cluster of recent proposals and judicial decisions has begun a process of eliminating the actual harm requirement of tort law. Each reform makes the unique facts of the plaintiff's claim less important to his or her rights of recovery than they would be traditionally. In each instance, this departure is accomplished by measuring liability according to the degree of risk imposed on the plaintiff rather than by the amount of actual harm the plaintiff suffered.

The extreme form of liability for risk creation is liability imposed even before anyone suffers actual physical harm. A number of commentators and a few cases have advanced this idea. n30 They would compensate those subjected merely to the risk of harm -- for example, because they were exposed to a carcinogenic substance -- and would measure liability by multiplying the probability that the risk will materialize in harm by the expected magnitude of loss should it occur. If a plaintiff had a twenty-five percent chance of contracting cancer because of a tortious exposure to a carcinogen, she would receive twenty-five percent of the value of a claim for actually contracting the disease. A modified approach would measure liability in roughly the same manner, but would create a "fund" into which the defendant's payment would be made. Those who subsequently suffered injury would then be entitled to recover from the fund, based on the probability that their harm was caused by a party contributing to the fund. n31

[*182] A less extreme approach would impose liability for risk only after harm had already been suffered. This approach may be starting to become commonplace. Perhaps the most well-known example is market-share liability, adopted most prominently in a number of DES cases, n32 and sometimes employed in asbestos claims as well. n33 In such cases, each of many companies has marketed a generically identical or nearly identical substance; a large number of individuals are able to prove exposure to the substance and the occurrence of harm resulting from that exposure, but are unable to identify the particular defendant or defendants responsible for his or her exposure. Traditional rules governing proof of causation would leave such a plaintiff without a viable claim, because proof of any individual marketer's responsibility for the plaintiff's exposure would be impossible. Even proof that a particular company had marketed more than fifty percent of the substance in question would not satisfy the burden of proof under the traditional rule that naked statistical evidence is inadmissible. n34

Market-share liability responds to this problem of the indeterminate defendant by permitting the plaintiff to recover from each [*183] marketer of the offending substance in proportion to the market share of that defendant. There need be no showing that the plaintiff was in fact exposed to any individual defendant's product. n35 The theory behind the doctrine rests on the probability that each defendant's product injured someone, and that such injury is highly likely to have occurred in proportion to each defendant's market share. By foregoing the requirement that a plaintiff prove causation in the traditional manner, those deserving of compensation receive it, and potential defendants are threatened with liability in proportion to the degree of harm that their actions caused. In the long run, in theory, each defendant will end up paying the same sum that it would have paid had perfect evidence of causation been available. In order to achieve this result, however, each defendant is held liable in proportion to the risk that its actions created rather than for the actual harm it caused a particular plaintiff.

The practical difficulties of implementing a market-share liability scheme are great, but these difficulties are beside the point. For my purposes here, the important point is that market-share liability marks a distinct departure from the traditional conception of a tort claim. It simply does not matter whether a particular defendant in a market-share case actually injured the plaintiff or not, for a defendant's action and the plaintiff's harm need not match. Any defendant's wrong now consists of having risked harming the plaintiff, rather than of having actually caused the plaintiff harm. Each plaintiff is a surrogate for all the parties whom a defendant actually injured, even though the defendant may not have injured that plaintiff. One traditionally essential set of particulars about the plaintiff's claim has therefore become completely irrelevant.

What market-share liability does in a narrow range of cases, other recent proposals and a few cases would accomplish much more broadly. These measures would extend the theory behind market-share liability to cases in which there is a form of direct evidence of the degree of risk imposed on the plaintiff by the defendant. Where market-share liability uses market share as a proxy for risk, these approaches would use epidemiological or other statistical [*184] measures of the degree of risk imposed on the plaintiff by the defendant. n36 It is important to recognize that these approaches would not merely set aside the traditional prohibition against the use of naked statistical evidence to prove causation. Rather, they would impose liability even when statistical evidence showed that it was less probable than not that the defendant's actions caused the plaintiff's harm. In such cases, the plaintiff would recover only the percentage of his or her losses equal to the percentage probability that the defendant's actions had caused the losses.

Proportional liability for creating risk thus resembles market-share liability in the way it departs from the traditional conception of a tort claim. n37 Because there is no requirement of a match between the defendant's actions and the plaintiff's harm, even a defendant that probably has not harmed the plaintiff may be required under this approach to compensate the plaintiff for a portion of his losses. The basis of the plaintiff's claim has been transformed into a demand for compensation that depends much less than a traditional claim on the particulars of the parties' circumstances.

One point of significance about these different moves toward imposing liability for creating risk is that they are a response to the difficulty of creating non-tort compensation systems in the fields where proving causation is so difficult for plaintiffs. A primary feature of any liability or compensation system is the compensable event, or trigger of the right to compensation. That event may be defined by reference to fault, cause, or loss. n38 The principal technical problem that has prevented the development of no-fault medical, products, and environmental-injury compensation schemes analogous to those governing auto and work-related injuries is the difficulty of constructing a satisfactory set of compensable events. [*185] Because it is considered highly desirable to internalize within the health-care, products, and chemical industries the cost of injuries in each field, cause-based compensation systems are preferred. Otherwise, it would be technically more sensible (though in all probability financially impossible) simply to adopt loss-based systems providing universal health and disability insurance, instead of trying to charge each activity with the cost of providing no-fault compensation for the injuries associated with the activity.

Proposals for imposing tort liability for the creation of risk respond to this problem n39 by circumventing it. When tort liability is imposed for the creation of risk, then many of the knotty problems that would be associated with the definition and proof of a compensable event under a non-tort, no-fault compensation system are avoided. Certainly, it would be equally possible to avoid these technical problems within a no-fault compensation system by paying claimants for exposure to risk rather than for actual harm. Circumventing the problem within the tort system, however, avoids a political obstacle to the construction of such a non-tort system. To set up such a system outside tort law might require abolishing or restricting tort liability. Setting it up within tort law does not abolish or restrict tort liability; n40 on the contrary, it expands the scope of tort liability and thereby avoids both the technical and the political obstacles to the construction of a full-blown compensation scheme.

The result looks something like a compensation system operating in court. A true system of liability for risk creation would dispense compensation on a much more uniform basis than would traditional tort liability, because it would base awards on potential loss rather than actual loss, and inevitably there would be less individualized [*186] damage computation when the plaintiffs had not yet suffered injury. That this all appears a bit jerry-rigged and therefore only vaguely resembles the non-tort compensation systems with which we are familiar may be part of the point: that is sometimes what happens when you take a fish out of water.

B. Damages

If liability for creating risk appears only vaguely to be moving the tort system toward the standardization that is so characteristic of non-tort systems, recent reforms in the law of damages move tort law in that direction with a vengeance. I shall discuss three such reforms here: statutory caps on the sums recoverable as damages, proposals for scheduling damage recoveries, and abolition of the collateral source rule.

1. Caps on Damages for Pain and Suffering. -- Perhaps the most visible reform enacted in the wake of the liability insurance crisis of the mid-1980s was the statutory cap on pain and suffering damages. n41 Typically set at a figure of $ 250,000 or higher, these caps are designed at least in part to preclude the occasional enormous judgment resulting from a "runaway" jury. Statutory caps also respond in a crude way to the argument that because it would make little economic sense for potential victims to insure themselves against pain and suffering, tort law should not impose liability for this form of loss.

There are plausible (though in my view unconvincing) arguments for completely abolishing the right to recover pain and suffering damages. n42 Yet, if the right of some victims to recover in full for their pain and suffering is abolished, then the principle that underlies retention of the right of full recovery of such damages by other victims demands explanation. It might be argued, for example, that statutory caps simply recognize that it would be unreasonable for a jury to assess the present value of any individual's pain and suffering [*187] at a level in excess of the cap in question, because no amount of pain and suffering could rationally be valued in excess of the cap. On this view, a cap assures that what is already irrelevant is not given weight nonetheless. But given the fact that juries commonly awarded sums in excess of what later became the statutory cap in particular jurisdictions, this argument is weak. An occasional jury might be regarded as utterly irrational; but common awards above a specified level suggest (even if they do not prove) that it is not irrational so to assess the value of certain kinds of pain and suffering. The operative principle behind caps is more likely to be that, although some claimants incur pain and suffering that could legitimately support awards in excess of the cap, some such excess awards are the result of inaccurate or punitive assessments. In order to avoid the latter, the caps are formulated to preclude the former as well.

Another plausible but ultimately unconvincing explanation for caps is that the real function of pain and suffering damages is to provide the claimant with a method of financing activities that become more desirable to him or her as a result of his injury -- the projected cost of which normally is not recoverable as an out-of-pocket loss. The permanently injured athlete may wish to purchase a wide-screen television and season tickets to the local team's games, for example. Because it would be very rare that the present value of such expenses would exceed the statutory cap, the cap serves to prevent overcompensation for this category of expense. The weakness of this explanation, however, is that there is no necessary connection between the degree of a claimant's pain and suffering and the magnitude of the expense the claimant is likely to incur in order to engage i substitute activities. In addition, this theory cannot begin to explain awards made for lost enjoyment of life's activities to comatose claimants or others who could not possibly use their awards to finance the purchase of substitute enjoyments.

Whatever the motive for the enactment of statutory caps on pain and suffering damages, and regardless of whether there is a coherent principle underlying them, the effect of the caps is clear. Statutory caps compromise the traditional principle of full compensation for both economic and noneconomic loss suffered by a successful tort claimant. A cap renders irrelevant to the plaintiff's claim any pain and suffering that would be assessed a value in excess of the cap. The unique circumstances of those seriously injured victims whose pain and suffering would fall into this category therefore are ignored. In jurisdictions that have enacted caps, for all intents [*188] and purposes a tort claim is no longer an action for full recovery of damages suffered by very seriously injured or exceptionally sensitive claimants. These claimants, not tortfeasors, bear the risk that they will suffer unusually severe pain and suffering.

2. Damage Scheduling. -- A number of proposals for limiting the individualization of damage awards in other ways have recently emerged. n43 These proposals would subject awards for pain and suffering to "schedules" defining the lower and upper limits of awardable damages for particular kinds or categories of loss. The most straightforward of these proposals would categorize typical injuries according to their severity, n44 and would prescribe the range of awardable pain and suffering damages for each category. The amount awardable for a temporary minor injury such as an improperly set fracture would be lower than that awardable for a permanent major injury such as blindness or the loss of a limb. n45 A broader version of this approach would apply it not only to awards for pain and suffering, but to damages for economic loss as well. The plaintiff simply would receive a lump sum chosen from within a pre-specified range applicable to the category in which his or her injury fit.

Glen Robinson and I recently have proposed an analogous but more far-reaching scheme for "aggregative valuation" of claims in mass tort actions. n46 Under our proposal, the early claimants would try or settle their claims pursuant to traditional rules governing recoverable damages. These results would then be aggregated and used as the basis for constructing damage "profiles" for each category of loss. Later claimants' recoveries would be subject to the upper and lower limits specified in the profiles. Because these profiles would be constructed from data regarding actual awards and settlements [*189] in the same action, they necessarily would take into account the discounting of these awards and settlements by juries or the parties themselves because of such nondamage-related issues as negligence and causation. Unlike more conventional damage scheduling, our approach therefore would take into account not only the severity of injury suffered, but also the strength or weakness of other elements of the claim.

There is one sense in which the effect of all damage scheduling could resemble the effect of statutory caps. If the highest category on the schedule had an upper limit, then the most severely injured or especially sensitive claimants would bear the same risk of suffering above-ceiling losses as they would when a statutory cap was in force. The highest category in a damage schedule need not have a closed end, however, although many of the proposals for scheduling seem to assume a closed end. In any event, the interesting features of damage scheduling lie in their effect throughout the schedule, not merely at the high end.

First, scheduling renders irrelevant the special severity of the losses suffered by claimants falling into any of the schedule's categories. The claimant with an extraordinarily painful broken arm finds himself undercompensated for his pain and suffering if under traditional rules he would have recovered more than the schedule allows him. n47 Indeed, if the schedule applies to both pain and suffering and economic loss, some claimants could find that they are not even fully compensated for their medical expenses and lost wages, because their losses in these categories alone exceed the upper limit allowed for a broken arm. Second, unlike the statutory cap, damage scheduling inserts a floor under which awards for a particular category of injury may not fall. Not only is the special severity of an injury or the claimant's special sensitivity irrelevant; the unusual mildness of the injury or the claimant's insensitivity to the injury also does not count. The claimants who heal far more quickly than the average person or who work in spite of their pain can pocket their awards with impunity, though presumably the awards made to such claimants will be at the low end of the scale.

In short, damage scheduling standardizes awards by treating [*190] claims that otherwise would not be alike as though they were alike. The claims that would be outliers in any given category are brought back within a normal distribution of awards. Like the outlier claims that are subject to caps, some of these would have been the result of jury error, but some simply would have warranted special treatment under the traditional conception of a tort claim. Plaintiffs whose claims might lie outside the high end of any particular schedule bear the risk that they will be less than "fully" compensated because their special characteristics are not taken into account. In contrast, defendants bear the risk that outliers on the low side will be more than "fully" compensated for the same reason. In both instances, however, the unique circumstances in which the plaintiff finds himself or herself -- circumstances that play such a central role in the assessment of damages under the traditional conception of a tort claim -- are of only limited significance in fixing the amount of the award the plaintiff receives.

3. Collateral Sources. -- The traditional "collateral source rule" governs the tort law treatment of collateral sources of compensation for the plaintiff's losses, such as health or disability insurance. The rule provides that evidence of past or probable future payment of such benefits to the plaintiff is inadmissible in the trial of a tort action. n48 The result of this rule of evidence is of course also substantive: the plaintiff is entitled to recover in full from the defendant for losses that already have been or will in the future be paid by collateral sources such as first-party or social insurance.

The standard critique of the rule has been that it is inappropriate to impose liability on a defendant for sums that the plaintiff has not in fact lost, because she is insured. The standard responses have been that these losses are a real social cost even if the plaintiff has not lost them, and that optimal deterrence therefore requires that the defendant be threatened with liability for all the costs of its activities; that the plaintiff should not be denied the benefit of his or her foresight in purchasing insurance; that because plaintiffs often do not receive compensation for some losses, duplicate recovery for other losses helps to make them whole; and that in any event double compensation of the plaintiff can be avoided by permitting the plaintiff's insurer to contract for a right of reimbursement for its payments out of any subsequent tort recovery that the plaintiff secures. n49 For years the traditional rule held out against its critics, [*191] but then it began to crumble. In the 1970s several jurisdictions abolished it by statute in medical malpractice cases; n50 in the 1980s a larger number abolished it (again by statute) in all tort claims. n51 In these jurisdictions, past and prospective insurance benefits paid or payable to the plaintiff are offset against the plaintiff's recovery. n52

The recent reversals of the collateral source rule present a more complicated picture than either statutory caps or damage scheduling. These reversals might be interpreted to have trained more rather than less attention on the particular circumstances of the plaintiff in a tort claim. In my view, however, these changes represent a move in the opposite direction. For the most part, recent modifications of the collateral source rule run with rather than against the grain of the other changes I have been canvassing.

The opposite argument, that reversal of the traditional rule represents a move toward rather than away from individualization, is as follows. The collateral source rule ignores differences among plaintiffs, because in computing the plaintiff's losses it precludes consideration of any collateral compensation received by the plaintiff for those losses. By requiring that such collateral payments to the plaintiff be taken into account in computing damage awards, statutory reversals of the rule (according to this view) increase the focus of the tort action on the plaintiff's particular circumstances -- in this instance, the plaintiff's access to insurance against some of the very losses that he or she has sued to recover.

For two reasons, however, I think that this interpretation does not fit the facts as well as a very different interpretation. First, the notion that the collateral source rule ignores the plaintiff's access to [*192] collateral sources is overly simple. In fact, the rule is responsive to these sources even as it prohibits reference to them at trial. Health and disability insurers usually provide in their policies that they shall be subrogated to the rights of their insureds against third parties who have caused these insureds to suffer losses covered by the policy. Statutes creating social insurance often do the same. In each instance, insurers' rights of subrogation may be exercised directly against these third parties -- such as tortfeasors -- or the subrogation rights may be translated into the right to be reimbursed for the amount of these insurance benefits out of any tort recovery secured by the policyholder. In practice, these rights of subrogation and reimbursement are not exercised systematically, but they are exercised. n53

Consequently, the assertion that the collateral source rule ignores the differential availability of insurance benefits to plaintiffs is far from accurate. The rule actually attends to these differences by permitting the creation of a fund out of which insurers can be reimbursed for the benefits they have paid. n54 In the absence of the rule, private and social insurers' rights of subrogation and reimbursement are far less meaningful. Requiring that a plaintiff's past and future access to insurance benefits be ignored in court was traditional tort law's method of distinguishing those who did and did not have such benefits. Abolishing the rule means the opposite: a plaintiff's status as an insurance beneficiary is no longer protected, and those who do and do not have insurance receive the same net compensation.

The second reason I interpret recent abolitions of the collateral source rule to be departures from the traditional conception is a bit more subjective. The collateral source rule has a moralistic quality about it, in that it seeks to assure that those who have been provident enough to purchase insurance are not denied the benefit of that providence. Yet, although the citizens of this country are far from being fully insured against the economic consequences of illness and injury, first-party and social insurance are no longer the uncommon or nonexistent phenomena they were at the time the rule came into existence and received this kind of moralistic support. [*193] For example, most Americans have health insurance, n55 virtually all the employed have workers' compensation covering them against wage losses resulting from work-related accidents or disease; n56 Social Security Disability Insurance (SSDI) provides nearly the entire working population with subsistence-level insurance against wage loss resulting from permanent disability; n57 and a much smaller but still significant percentage of the working population is covered against wage loss by private disability insurance. n58

The statutory abolitions of the collateral source rule that have been adopted in many states are at least partly a reflection of this growth in the forms and scope of loss insurance coverage protecting the American public. These statutes recognize that loss insurance is so widespread that it is the rare plaintiff whose losses are not covered in some respect by one or more sources of private or social insurance. Admittedly, abolition of the collateral source rule places the precise character of the plaintiff's collateral sources of coverage at issue in each individual tort claim; but from a broader perspective, such abolition emphasizes what most tort claimants have in common -- collateral sources of insurance coverage -- rather than isolating the particular

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 73 Va. L. Rev. 845

*73 Va. L. Rev. 845, **

Copyright © 1987 Virginia Law Review Association.

Virginia Law Review

AUGUST, 1987

73 Va. L. Rev. 845

LENGTH: 31081 words

ARTICLE: INDIVIDUAL ACTION AND COLLECTIVE RESPONSIBILITY: THE DILEMMA OF MASS TORT REFORM.

Kenneth S. Abraham *

* Professor of Law, University of Virginia School of Law. Research for this article was supported by a University of Virginia School of Law SOHIO Research Fellowship. I wish to thank participants in workshops at the University of Virginia and Duke Law Schools for their comments on an earlier draft.

SUMMARY:
... DURING the past two decades we have witnessed a series of large-scale accidents almost unprecedented in their frequency and scope: the collapse of the Buffalo Creek dam; the MGM-Grand Hotel fire; the fall of the skywalk at the Hyatt Hotel in Kansas City; the asbestos "crisis"; thousands of tort claims for injuries allegedly caused by such drugs as Bendectin and DES; suits by servicemen and their families for damages resulting from diseases allegedly caused by exposure to Agent Orange in Vietnam; and other disasters so noteworthy that the names of the places they occurred have come to signify the events themselves -- Love Canal, Three Mile Island, Bhopal. ... A last reason for the limited success of the class action device is that, given the present state of some substantive rules of liability, class action treatment actually would be inappropriate in a number of mass tort cases. ... On this view, the additional cost of litigating many mass tort claims individually constitutes the premium that the legal system is willing to pay to diversify the risk of error in its use of collective responsibility rules of substantive liability. ... Therefore, upon return to a system of individual responsibility in tort, the expansion of first-party coverage that would be necessary to assure compensation for out-of-pocket losses to those who would previously have been entitled to tort recoveries would include the following: 1) higher benefits for those with limited medical or hospitalization insurance; 2) medical and hospitalization insurance for the fifteen to twenty percent of the population that is currently uninsured; 3) insurance against wage losses resulting from non-work-related injury or disease not covered (or not fully covered) by social security or existing private disability insurance; and 4) insurance against work-related wage loss substantially exceeding the workers' compensation ceiling. ...

TEXT:
[*845] DURING the past two decades we have witnessed a series of large-scale accidents almost unprecedented in their frequency and scope: the collapse of the Buffalo Creek dam; [1]

defendants are unable to meet their burden, they are held jointly and severally liable. Moreover, even if defendants are able to apportion damages the shift has collectivizing effects, because most of the cost of apportioning has been spread among defendants instead of shouldered by the plaintiff. [48]

[*863] Debate about whether the incentive effects created by joint and several liability rules are superior to approaches that decline to impose such forms of collective responsibility is unresolved. [49] Arguably, the more collective responsibility a given rule entails -- on its face or because of the collectivizing effects of liability insurance -- the less optimal is its effect on the safety incentives of those to whom it applies. Free-riding will confound these incentives, because the cost of failing to optimize safety will be collectively, rather than individually, imposed. Because most enterprises subject to joint and several liability will not receive sufficient benefit to warrant optimal investment, they will underinvest in safety if others can capture some of that benefit. [50]

To the extent that these collective responsibility rules have incentive effects that are, in fact, suboptimal, they must seek a separate, noneconomic justification. In my view, this justification must derive (when it can be given at all) from the sense in which the defendants actually have or have not acted in a collective fashion. Yet something like actual collective activity by potential defendants can be discovered more easily in some cases than in others. The problem is illustrated by the following examples.

Example One. Separate enterprises polluting a drinking water supply act independently, but are aware that the others are acting in a manner that may make subsequent tracing of individual responsibility for diseases caused by drinking the polluted water difficult. [51]

[*864] In this example the predictable effect of the actions of independent enterprises is their combination into a single, indistinguishable, injury-causing force. Here the notion that each independent act is a cause of the subsequent force is plausible, as is the associated notion that those responsible have acted collectively. [52] Consciously parallel actions that have predictably joint effects very closely resemble actions taken in concert.

When there is no such subsequent combination of independent but consciously parallel actions, however, the imposition of collective responsibility requires other support. Sometimes justifications are available. For instance, collective action may precede the creation of an injury-creating force. The evidence of collusion among asbestos manufacturers to suppress information about its dangers may support the imposition of collective responsibility in actions against them, [53] and decisions made by trade associations about product design or marketing that eventuate in injuries may support the imposition of collective responsibility on association members. [54]

The situations in which even these attenuated notions of collective action can be invoked, however, are limited. Moreover, the question whether a finding of collective causal responsibility is appropriate in such cases can be reached only when the connection between the forces set in motion by the defendants and the plaintiffs' disease or injuries is provable. Often plaintiffs can prove this connection by preestablished relationships, as in cases of signature disease, by epidemiological studies conducted specifically for the litigation at hand, [55] or by clinical judgments made by qualified experts. In such cases, what harmed the plaintiff may be clear, even [*865] if who caused the harm, either factually or legally, may not be clear. Substance causation is proved, but source causation is at issue.

More problematic are cases involving nonsignature diseases in which substance causation is also at issue. Lung cancer, leukemia, and birth defects have a variety of causes, some better understood than others. The parties potentially responsible for such harms, assuming that they can be identified, often have not acted collectively, even in an attenuated sense. Yet each has caused some harm to potential, indeterminate plaintiffs. As Professor Glen Robinson has argued, the logic of market share liability suggests that these potentially responsible parties could be held liable based on a formula reflecting the probability that each party harmed a particular plaintiff. [56] Logical though this approach might be, it is unfortunately very impractical, because nothing even remotely as precise a proxy for the probability of responsibility as market share is available in most nonsignature disease cases. [57] Science has progressed to the point where it can identify some substances and exposures that seem to increase the probability of certain diseases, but only infrequently can these probabilities be quantified with any precision. [58]

REV_00263662

The argument for imposing collective responsibility in nonsignature disease cases, therefore, is not strong. The next examples generate a rationale supporting this approach, not to recommend it, but to demonstrate how far the law would have to extend beyond its current limits to impose collective responsibility in nonsignature disease cases.

Example Two. The probability of contracting a particular disease is substantially increased by exposure to any of several substances. Exposure to more than one of these substances arithmetically increases the probability of contracting the disease.

[*866] Here a number of obstacles to the imposition of collective responsibility on those responsible for exposure can be identified. First, the plaintiff must prove his exposure to each substance, because otherwise potentially responsible sources with no connection to the plaintiff's harm could be held liable. Second, unless the plaintiff is exposed to all or most of the substances that increase the probability of contracting the disease, the plaintiff will rarely be able to prove that exposure to these substances more probably than not accounts for the disease. Third, even if the plaintiff's burden of proof were relaxed and the award of probabilistically measured compensation were allowed, the need for more precise quantification of probabilities than is normally possible would foreclose any such award. Only if the plaintiff can overcome these very substantial obstacles can the court then face directly the question whether the sources are collectively responsible.

But on what basis can it be concluded that the sources are collectively responsible? If each source knew both that the exposures for which it is responsible increase the risk of harm to those exposed and that scientific uncertainty renders linking causal responsibility to any particular exposure impossible, then the sources stand in a similar relation to the harm as the defendants in Example One. The relation is not exactly the same, however, because in Example One each party contributed to some actual harm -- the pollution. Example One thus involves the problem of apportionment, while Example Two poses the problem of causation vel non. In Example Two each exposure merely increased the risk that the plaintiff would contract the disease in question, and increased it no more than if the plaintiff had been exposed only to that substance. There is neither actual collective action nor proven causal responsibility on each party's part in Example Two. In the end, therefore, the imposition of collective responsibility for nonsignature disease in cases of arithmetically increased risk must find justification, if at all, not on its own terms, but as a surrogate for individual responsibility.

Example Three. The facts are the same as Example Two, but the sources' contribution to the risk of contracting the disease is exponential, because exposure to the different substances in combination has a synergistic effect.

Under these circumstances the defendants' action is more collective, at least in the sense that the combination of their individual [*867] actions is more than the sum of its parts. To the extent that each knows of the potential effect of its actions and acts anyway, something resembling consciously parallel action has occurred. Whether this will warrant imposing collective responsibility, however, depends on the kind of synergy involved. In the simplest and most extreme case, exposure to one or even all but one of the substances involves no danger, because no risk exists in the absence of all the actions. If the sources have knowledge of this effect, then their actions can be called collective in a meaningful sense -- they exhibit a mutual, conscious disregard of consequence.

REV_00263663

In other cases, however, each substance alone is also capable of causing some harm. In such cases it is unclear whether each substance contributed to the harm. The sources responsible for each substance may have acted in a consciously parallel fashion, but these actions may not have had a combined effect. Whether the additional, exponentially increased risk produced by the combination of the substances is more probably than not responsible for the plaintiff's harm depends on the risk posed by each substance and the strength of their synergy. When the synergy is more probably than not responsible for the disease, then the sources not only have acted collectively; proof of their collective effect should satisfy conventional doctrines governing proof of causation. When this synergy is less probably than not the cause of the plaintiff's disease, however, the case looks more like Example Two and poses the same difficulties as that example. [59]

In sum, the justification for imposing collective responsibility in a large variety of nonsignature disease cases is not easy to find. Often no collective action of even the attenuated sort that might warrant a finding of collective responsibility in other mass tort situations can be identified; the use of collective responsibility as a surrogate for individual responsibility does not necessarily have the incentive effects that might otherwise justify its imposition; and in any case, the data necessary to support the probabilistic measures of causation that could serve as surrogates for causal responsibility will rarely be available. The entire effort usually requires [*868] more than the legal or scientific state of the art is capable of providing.

D. The Risk of Insolvency

An entirely different impetus toward collective responsibility is evident in the search for a solvent defendant. The risk that the defendant is insolvent -- typically borne by the plaintiff in an accident case -- has occasionally prompted courts even in conventional tort cases to spread joint and several liability beyond its traditional bounds, and to extend liability to certain defendants in situations that would not otherwise permit a finding of proximate cause. [60] For the most part, however, liability rules are formulated without regard for the potential insolvency of the defendant.

The rise of mass tort litigation suggests three reasons for taking this risk into consideration in formulating liability rules. [61] The first is the potential misdistribution of assets between tort claimants, other creditors, and owners of an enterprise threatened with insolvency because of its responsibility for a mass accident. [62] The longer the period between the actions that produce mass injuries and the final resolution of all claims that result, the greater the opportunity for the commercial creditors and owners of the responsible [*869] enterprise to divert their assets and thereby to preclude tort claimants from recovering their losses. Without liability rules that prevent this kind of diversion, the enterprise has an incentive to engage in excessively risky activity.

The second reason for taking the potential insolvency of defendants into account in formulating liability rules is a corollary of the first. Under traditional rules governing the allocation of the risk of insolvency, early tort claimants obtain compensation for their losses until the defendant's assets are depleted; consequently, later claimants may find that the defendant has become insolvent by the time their claims mature. An adjustment of rights among tort claimants would be required to prevent this inequity.

Finally, a defendant threatened with insolvency over a long period will almost inevitably operate less efficiently than it would if the threat were removed. Its access to capital markets will be hindered, worthwhile mergers may be blocked, and other features of its operation may be impeded. Earlier resolution of claims than is permitted under traditional rules of tort liability could reduce or eliminate these inefficiencies by removing the sword of Damocles hanging over the defendant's neck. [63]

REV_00263664

Any liability rule that attempts to adjust for the potential misdistributions, inequities, and inefficiencies produced by the risk of insolvency will inevitably have more features of collective responsibility than the traditional rule it replaces. For example, under current rules, victims whose claims are resolved late in the distribution of all the claims against a defendant bear the greatest risk that the defendant's insolvency will foreclose their recoveries. The Manville Corporation cited this potential inequity as a justification for its proposed reorganization under Chapter Eleven of the bankruptcy law. [64] Manville's reorganization proposals contemplated shifting some of this risk of insolvency to current claimants by limiting the damages they could recover for asbestos-related injury to their out-of-pocket losses. Thus more assets would be available for later claimants. [65] Professor Mark Roe has also proposed shifting [*870] the risk of insolvency forward in time by affording all claimants compensation analogous to an annuity whose value would vary with the future earnings of the defendant and with the frequency and severity of the claims made against it. [66]

In each of these and similar proposals, the shareholders, current commercial creditors, current tort claimants, and future tort claimants of a defendant collectively bear the risk of the defendant's insolvency. In different proposals this risk is allocated to the parties in different ways, but in each the risk of insolvency is lifted, to a great extent, from the shoulders of future tort claimants. The advantage of these collective approaches is not only greater equity among plaintiffs, [67] but greater equity between tort claimants and commercial creditors and greater efficiency in operating the potentially insolvent enterprise under uncertainty about the scope of future tort claims. [68] Such advantages are achieved, however, only at the cost of a radical revision of the traditional rights of shareholders, as well as commercial and tort creditors with claims already in existence.

In short, as the risk of insolvency increases, the traditional rights of shareholders, creditors, and current tort claimants can remain untouched only if the interests of future tort claimants are sacrificed. With liability rules reflecting individual responsibility, that sacrifice occurs, because the passage of time may leave future claimants without a fund from which to claim recovery. With more collective liability rules in place, the sacrifice can be mitigated, but only through a corresponding sacrifice of currently existing rights.

E. Collective Procedures and Equity Among Plaintiffs

The final conflict between individual and collective models of responsibility occurs because of the availability of two very different approaches to mass tort litigation. Individual procedures maximize the litigants' control over their own cases. Allowing independent litigation of a series of claims arising out of the same accident or course of conduct, however, is unnecessarily expensive. More importantly, separate litigation of hundreds or thousands of nearly [*871] identical cases may violate what I shall call the "equity principle" -- the notion that like cases shall be treated alike.

Although the equity principle is a central norm in our system of justice, it has rarely troubled accident law in any special way. Part of the explanation is that its force has been dissipated by the important distinction between questions of law and questions of fact. A question of fact is said to be one "about which reasonable people could disagree." This formulation is a suitable approach to the allocation of decisionmaking authority between judge and jury. Yet its implication is not only that people on the same jury could legitimately disagree about the answer to a question of fact, but also that different juries could legitimately disagree if the question were put to them. This characterization of questions of fact thus suggests that cases involving identical facts, submitted to different juries, can justifiably be decided differently. Yet this notion and the equity principle cannot live easily together, if they can live together at all.

The tension has been reconciled in several ways. The first way is simply to apply the equity principle only to questions of law. This limitation on the reach of the principle might be supported by the argument that because the function of the jury is to determine the facts in a case, no one can know that two cases are alike in relevant respects until two juries have decided them in the same way. If two similar cases are decided differently, then they are only that: similar, but not identical, in the respects considered relevant by the two juries. In such cases the norm underlying the equity principle is not violated.

This reconcilation may seem to work when it is focused on comparisons of jury decisions in seemingly similar but unrelated cases, because its circularity makes it irrefutable in the absence of independent data about the facts of these cases. But of course this kind of reconciliation is nothing but circular. Moreover, in mass tort litigation the cases submitted to juries are more than merely "similar"; often they arise out of the same accident or identical set of facts. No one would say that the facts in two such cases are different precisely and only because two juries decided the cases differently.

A different way to reconcile the tension between the equity principle and the law's treatment of questions of fact is to ascribe the difference in the results of seemingly identical cases not to juries' [*872] answers to empirical questions, but to their answers to mixed questions of law and fact. Two juries may have agreed on the facts "on the ground" but characterized them differently. For example, one jury may have concluded that the defendant was negligent or its product defective, while the other reached the opposite conclusion. This reconciliation, however, is even less satisfactory than the previous one. Why should it be any more acceptable to violate the equity principle because of jury differences about mixed questions of law and fact than about pure questions of fact? Because the equity principle is undoubtedly applicable to pure questions of law, the more a factual question has in common with a question of law, the stronger the argument for deciding it in the same way in cases with common facts.

A third way to reconcile the tension is to ascribe responsibility for differences in the results of like cases to such exogenous variables as the quality of legal representation available to the parties. This is less a reconciliation of the tension than a recognition of it, because almost any variable that accounts for such differences is exogenous when two cases are alike in all relevant respects. In some sense other attempts at reconciliation may be ways of avoiding this recognition that legal outcome is so dependent on input. Although this fact of legal life is commonplace, it is easier to tolerate in dissimilar cases than in those that are very nearly identical. One can never say with certainty about a single, isolated case that a greater investment of resources or some other change in input would have altered its outcome, but once two like cases have produced different outcomes, one cannot avoid the fact that some variable or variables account for the difference. With the rise of mass accidents the problem of assuring equity among plaintiffs has become more severe, because of the greater possibility that many similarly or identically situated plaintiffs will be treated differently under circumstances that preclude rationalization of the different outcomes of their cases.

As a consequence, the advantages of streamlining the procedures used in mass tort litigation have become increasingly evident. Achieving these advantages, however, requires deciding whether to treat plaintiffs individually or to construct procedural devices that will link their fortunes in collective fashion. Three procedural devices which address this choice might play considerable roles in mass accident litigation. Each can be seen as a method of reducing [*873] the costs of administering such litigation as well as promoting equity among plaintiffs. First, the doctrine of collateral estoppel, or issue preclusion, may be used to make decisions in early cases binding in later cases involving the same set of facts. Second, class action suits may be employed so that a single decision on common issues binds all or most plaintiffs whose claims arise out of the same set of facts. Third, under some circumstances the doctrine of stare decisis may be invoked to assure that issues decided as a matter of law in one case are resolved the same way in later cases. Yet because these doctrines strike compromises between individual and collective forms of responsibility, none of the devices as currently formulated reduces the costs of mass tort litigation or responds to the demands of the equity principle as much as might otherwise be expected.

REV_00263666

1. Collateral Estoppel

Collateral estoppel operates to preclude a party from relitigating in one case an issue decided against it (or against those in "privity of interest" with it) in an earlier case. The doctrine had limited application until the decision of the Supreme Court in Parklane Hosiery v. Shore. [69] Before Parklane, the "mutuality" requirement permitted collateral estoppel at the federal level only if the party invoking the doctrine would have been estopped to raise the issue in question again had the earlier decision been decided against him rather than in his favor. [70] The major use of the device was to prevent repeat litigation of the same issue by the same parties. It could be used "defensively" by a defendant who had prevailed on a particular issue or issues in earlier litigation against the same party, and could be used "offensively" by a plaintiff who had prevailed in earlier litigation against the same party and who was litigating a different claim involving an issue already decided between them.

With the demise of the mutuality requirement, collateral estoppel can be used by litigants who were not parties to the earlier litigation deciding the issue in question. For this reason the doctrine [*874] may appear to have considerable potential for use in mass tort litigation. Once an issue is decided in the first case arising out of a mass accident, for example, it might not have to be relitigated in subsequent claims involving the same facts. Equity among plaintiffs and substantial savings in administrative costs would result.

For a variety of reasons, however, this potential is more apparent than real. First, the "defensive" form of the doctrine still is not available against a plaintiff not a party to earlier litigation, because he cannot be deprived through collateral estoppel of the right to an initial trial by jury. A defendant who has already prevailed in earlier litigation against one plaintiff still can be forced by another plaintiff to relitigate identical and previously resolved issues. The defendant may therefore be held liable to one plaintiff even after prevailing against another plaintiff injured in the same accident; earlier plaintiffs may find that although they have failed to recover, subsequent and identically situated plaintiffs have been successful. Under these circumstances equity among plaintiffs is sacrificed to assure each plaintiff the constitutional right to individual responsibility for his own suit.

Parklane's elimination of the mutuality requirement is subject to another exception that also emasculates its value for much mass disaster litigation. The Court held that "offensive" collateral estoppel could be invoked in the federal courts by a litigant not a party to the earlier case only if that litigant could not have joined the earlier case with reasonable ease. [71] In other words, potential litigants are not allowed to stand on the sidelines awaiting the outcome of crucial litigation, planning to use favorable results but to ignore unfavorable rulings in subsequent litigation. This limitation may prevent the Parklane rule from discouraging joinder of claims, but it certainly does not encourage any more joinder than did the previous rule. Depending on what counts as reasonable ease in joining the earlier case, the new collateral estoppel may have no greater collectivizing effect than the previous rule.

The third limitation on the new doctrine is that its availability depends on the earlier litigation being structured in anticipation of the doctrine's later use. Without such structuring, a determination that the issues in a subsequent case were actually decided in an [*875] earlier one may not be possible. Otherwise, the decision in the earlier case may be ambiguous on key issues. For example, in drug or toxics litigation plaintiffs will have been exposed to the hazardous substance at different times and for different lengths of time. Unless the earlier judgment specifies the time or times at which the defendant's conduct began to subject it to liability, that judgment will have no collateral effect in subsequent cases involving plaintiffs exposed at times slightly different from the earlier plaintiff. [72] Yet the plaintiffs in the earlier case normally will have very little incentive to structure a case so that its judgment may subsequently have preclusive effect.

Finally, in mass disaster litigation the choice of the case that is to have preclusive effect on later disputes is crucial. A number of similar cases probably will be proceeding simultaneously; if the resolutions of the issue or issues they share are inconsistent, any designation that one will have preclusive effect in subsequent litigation would ignore the others and would be utterly arbitrary. [73] This kind of arbitrariness can be avoided only by severely limiting the number of cases in which collateral estoppel is available. [74]

REV_00263667

In sum, when collateral estoppel is applicable, it is collective in the extreme, although the collective responsibility it reflects is one-directional. The victory of an early plaintiff relieves subsequent plaintiffs of the responsibility for proving the components of their claims, without placing any additional responsibility on these subsequent plaintiffs. Nonetheless, collectivization in mass tort cases through this doctrine is likely to be unusual. Taken together, the current limitations on the use of collateral estoppel deprive the doctrine of much of its capacity for reducing administrative costs and achieving equity among plaintiffs in mass tort litigation. The plaintiffs' seventh amendment right to trial by jury and concern [*876] for fairness to defendants imbues the doctrine with a heavy -- and probably appropriate -- emphasis on individual responsibility.

2. Class Actions

In contrast to collateral estoppel, which depends on fortuitous structuring of preclusive litigation and the absence of inconsistent verdicts to be effective, class actions might combine claims in a way that avoids both these obstacles. [75] Class actions therefore have considerable potential to promote the equity principle and to reduce administrative costs in mass tort litigation. They might serve the equity principle by deciding common issues in one piece of litigation rather than in a series, and they might reduce the costs of litigation in the same fashion. [76] In short, class actions might be a powerful device for collectivizing responsibility among plaintiffs. [77]

Class actions nevertheless have not realized their full potential for achieving these aims. As long ago as 1966, the Federal Rules Advisory Committee Note to Rule 23, the federal rule of procedure governing class actions, stated that:

A "mass accident" resulting in injuries to numerous persons is ordinarily not appropriate for a class action because of the likelihood that significant questions, not only of damages but of liability and defenses to liability, would be present, affecting the individuals in different ways. In these circumstances an action conducted nominally as a class action would degenerate in practice into multiple lawsuits separately tried. [78]

[*877] Although the Advisory Committee's pessimism was not entirely warranted, it was partly correct. Interpretations of Rule 23 have placed substantial practical obstacles in the paths of plaintiffs wishing to invoke it. Decisions of the Supreme Court require plaintiffs bringing class actions to pay the costs of providing notice to class members. [79] This is a very expensive process in mass tort cases that involve hundreds or thousands of persons whose identities may be unknown. The Court also has held that each of the named plaintiffs in a class action must satisfy diversity of citizenship demands [80] and that all plaintiffs must meet the amount in controversy requirement. [81] Taken together, these requirements undoubtedly foreclose a considerable amount of federal class action litigation in mass tort cases. [82]

Two other considerations have further limited the success of the class action in collectivizing responsibility among plaintiffs. First, as heavily collective as a class action is when it is operative, the federal approach is often optional, allowing plaintiffs to combine their forces and fates if they wish, but usually permitting those who wish to go their own way not to join the class. [83] Collective [*878] responsibility, with both its benefits and burdens, is available through the class action, but individual responsibility is not foreclosed for the plaintiff who wishes it.

The major limitation of this approach is the obvious one. When participation in the class action is not mandatory for members of the class, individuals may opt out to pursue their claims separately. In this manner a class may break apart, causing excess expense and the inequitable resolution of similar cases. In cases where the prospect of liability is so great that for practical purposes the defendant has only a limited fund available to compensate all plaintiffs, class members who do not opt out may find that the fund has been exhausted before the class action is resolved because of the greater time it takes to litigate class actions. [84]

REV_00263668

[*879] A last reason for the limited success of the class action device is that, given the present state of some substantive rules of liability, class action treatment actually would be inappropriate in a number of mass tort cases. For example, different state choice of law rules may render the legal issues applicable to the different claimants variable. Likewise, the factual circumstances under which plaintiffs have been injured or exposed to danger may vary so greatly that individual, rather than common, issues predominate. [85]

Nonetheless, courts could adopt more flexible approaches to class actions than these limitations suggest. [86] The predominance of common over individual issues -- one of the requisites to class action certification -- is a comparative question, but the key is to isolate the sets of issues to be compared. If the individual issues to be compared with common issues are defined as all those that must be decided to resolve the claims of all the victims of the accident in question, common issues may not predominate. In many mass tort cases, however, the court can identify subclasses of claimants who share enough common issues for these to predominate over the individual questions and can certify these subclasses in accordance with Rule 23's dictates. [87] For example, in a mass exposure case where victims have been exposed during different periods, the court could certify subclasses based on periods of exposure, perhaps by keying the subclasses to periods when the defendant's knowledge of the dangers in question increased. Claims regarding standards of care and causation that are chronologically distinct [*880] then could be segregated and considered in groups.

Decisions on these and other flexible methods of certifying class actions in mass tort cases follow no consistent pattern. The courts seem to be "ad-hocing" in ways that defy characterization. [88] In the absence of a strong trend toward the use of class actions in mass tort cases, a third device for streamlining litigation and promoting equity among plaintiffs is worth examining.

3. Stare Decisis

More than a century ago, Holmes predicted the increasing use of stare decisis in accident cases. [89] As prescient as Holmes may have been on other matters, this prediction has not stood the test of time. In traditional accident cases fact situations usually have been considered too varied to fall into the kinds of patterns Holmes envisioned. [90] Modern courts, less burdened with the nineteenth-century distrust of jury discretion, have been comfortable submitting a wide range of questions to juries. Nonetheless, stare decisis is a potentially powerful method of importing collective responsibility into mass disaster litigation. By assuring uniformity in the decision of legal issues, the doctrine can serve the equity principle; by predetermining the answers to some questions and making others predictable, it can help to reduce the cost of resolving legal disputes.

[*881] The capacity of stare decisis to achieve these ends depends on what constitutes a legal, as distinct from a factual, question. Here the problem posed by Holmes comes to the fore. A factual question has traditionally been one on which reasonable people could reasonably disagree. But this formulation does not clarify why a court, trying a series of claims arising out of the same or very similar mass accidents and seeing juries "oscillating to and fro" on the same mixed questions of law and fact, should continue to submit these questions to a series of juries.

REV_00263669

A typical dangerous exposure accident illustrates the dilemma faced by a court confronting the problem of inconsistent jury verdicts in identical cases. Assuming that the court takes seriously the Advisory Committee's dictum that class actions normally are not appropriate in mass accident cases and does not certify such an action, a series of identical or closely similar cases results. If the first case tried to a jury is decided for the defendant, collateral estoppel is not available in the second case, which the jury decides for the plaintiff. These inconsistent verdicts render collateral estoppel on common issues unavailable in any of the remaining cases. The court now has two options open to it. One option is to ignore the equity principle and to entertain, perhaps into the next decade, a series of separate lawsuits, with all their corresponding costs. The other option is for the court to "see the necessity of making up its mind for itself," as Holmes suggested, and to decide as a matter of law the issues that otherwise will have to be litigated repetitively as subsequent cases come to trial.

At first glance the option of finding a course of conduct to be negligent (or not negligent) as a matter of law may seem inappropriate when there are preexisting verdicts that are inconsistent with such a finding. Yet this is inconsistency no different in impact from what occurs whenever a rule of law (as opposed to a finding of fact) is overturned. Although the system might have to tolerate a few inconsistent pre-existing verdicts under this approach, it could avoid many more by assuring equity among plaintiffs in future cases. The approach would treat future plaintiffs collectively, as stare decisis always has, by removing constantly recurring issues from the realm of jury discretion.

The strongest argument against such a move applies generally not only to stare decisis, but also to limitations on the use of collateral estoppel and class actions in mass tort cases. The individual [*882] responsibility norm so evident in the rules governing the application of these three devices is the touchstone of the argument. The stance the law takes in this field is that equity among plaintiffs and economy in litigation are values that hold if other things are equal, but that the interest in individual control of litigation and individualized determination of legal rights may trump those values in virtually all cases.

This conclusion may simply reflect the notion that when individual claimants desire, their rights may properly depend on the effort, resources, and skill they invest in establishing or defending these rights. To force claimants to bear collective responsibility for the outcomes of their claims would transgress this principle. Plaintiffs may join voluntarily and bear collective responsibility under some circumstances, but ordinarily they will not be forced into such a position. Class actions in mass tort cases therefore are normally optional, and stare decisis is rarely used to take mixed questions of law and fact from the jury.

Although this explanation is plausible, it fails to account fully for the law's willingness to employ doctrines that, through the creation of substantive collective responsibility, join together the fates of defendants in these same cases. If control over one's own fate is so highly valued, why is it afforded more easily to plaintiffs than to defendants? This difference in treatment calls for a better explanation.

A second way to account for the curious mixture of individual and collective responsibility in the procedural doctrines governing mass torts is that the law in this field attempts to hedge against its own imperfections. Uncertainty about the accuracy and justifiability of the results produced by substantive collective responsibility doctrines may demand significant limits on the reach of collective responsibility procedures. The hedge is possible because the current formulations of the procedural rules allow outcomes to vary from case to case, even when collective responsibility rules on matters of substance are employed. The possibility of variation is a method of diversifying the risk of legal error by distributing it among a series of individual cases. Thus, the more certainty the system has that the results produced by a substantive collective responsibility rule are justified, the greater should be its willingness to adopt collective procedures. Conversely, the less certain the justification for collective responsibility, the more caution that [*883] must be exercised to limit the collective effects of the procedures used. On this view, the additional cost of litigating many mass tort claims individually constitutes the premium that the legal system is willing to pay to diversify the risk of error in its use of collective responsibility rules of substantive liability.

REV_00263670

In sum, having adopted rules of collective responsibility that allow tort claims that would otherwise fail or could never even be brought, the law has severely limited its own ability to manage this litigation. Paradoxically, mass tort law has adopted procedural rules that fail to solve problems of equity among plaintiffs and multiply the cost of litigation in order to guard against weaknesses in the substantive rules of collective responsibility that bring these two problems into being. This may be the most telling of all the criticisms that can be leveled at the developing substantive rules.

III. CONFRONTING THE DILEMMA

The problems posed by mass tort litigation are diverse, and, apart from the size of the plaintiff class, no single set of characteristics defines the mass tort. Running through each of the principal problems that tend to be raised by mass tort litigation, however, is the tension between the traditional notion of individual responsibility and the expanded notion of collective responsibility. Only by confronting the dilemma created by this tension can the tort system clarify what is at stake in determining the shape of mass tort law.

Several generic responses to the dilemma are possible. One is to hold fast to the traditional notion of individual responsibility, by refusing to establish special tort, insolvency, and procedural rules governing mass torts. Another is to take the path on which the law seems to have embarked, by expanding existing rules as they apply to mass torts and thereby importing notions of collective responsibility into the system. A critical issue posed by the current move toward more collective responsibility, however, is what is gained by doing so.

Certainly the deterrent effects of imposing liability on a collective basis are speculative at best. [91] Perhaps the move can be explained [*884] instead as an effort to retain the sense of popular control over large enterprises and institutions that in other respects are thought to control the populace. Cost internalization may thus have moral, or at least symbolic, as well as economic connotations. Yet as the analysis in Part II suggested, collective responsibility doctrines tend to promote at best a very attenuated form of cost internalization. In almost every case the only obvious gain from moving toward collective responsibility is that the move facilitates the compensation of victims. This is the principal effect of more collective rules governing the standard of liability, proof of causation, and insolvency, and it must also be counted as one of the major aims of the procedural devices that create collective responsibility among plaintiffs.

The costs of extending compensation to victims through rules of collective responsibility in this manner, however, are high. Litigation in cases involving scientific uncertainty, for example, can be complex and lengthy. Insolvency proceedings in which the interests of early and late tort claimants, creditors, and shareholders conflict may require the intricate negotiation and reorganization of rights. In cases where the gains in deterrence and equity are substantial, these costs may be worth paying, but when the magnitude or the very existence of these gains is questionable, [92] as it often is in cases where collective responsibility is invoked, the only remaining gain -- the extension of compensation to victims -- may be obtainable in other settings at a lesser cost.

Two other approaches can make use of nonadjudicatory systems to provide compensation to victims. The first is to create special administrative compensation funds to deal with the damages caused by mass torts. Such an approach would attempt to circumvent many of the problems that arise when collective responsibility is invoked in a system designed for the application of individual responsibility. A second and preferable approach is to return to the traditional system of individual responsibility in tort, but to link that return to tradition with expanded forms of first-party compensation [*885] for accident victims. This approach not only would recognize the problems posed by an increased emphasis on collective the MGM-Grand Hotel fire; [2] the fall of the skywalk at the Hyatt Hotel in Kansas City; [3] the asbestos "crisis"; [4] thousands of tort claims for injuries allegedly caused by such drugs as Bendectin [5] and DES; [6] suits by servicemen and their families for damages resulting from diseases allegedly caused by exposure to Agent Orange in Vietnam; [7] and other disasters so noteworthy that the names of the places they occurred have come to signify the events themselves -- Love Canal, Three Mile Island, Bhopal. Injuries on this scale occurred in the past, although less often and usually with less impact; [8] however, only recently has the legal system become preoccupied [*846] with mass injuries and the problems posed by the litigation they engender.

REV_00263671

Notwithstanding the burgeoning legal literature on the subject, [9] basic issues remain unresolved. Are "mass" torts qualitatively different from "traditional" accidents, or are they only quantitatively different? What are the legal characteristics of mass torts? Are the legal issues posed by mass torts independent of each other or are they connected in a way that clarifies the concept of a mass tort itself? Without answers to these questions, the search for solutions to the perceived problems of mass tort litigation is doomed to be without direction.

I maintain that the "mass tort" is not a single, unitary phenomenon, but a name given to a series of very different kinds of accidents posing a cluster of different legal problems. The only obvious link between all these accidents is the large number of people injured in each. As a consequence, proposals to solve "the" mass tort problem ultimately target only individual features of the cluster of issues that characterize mass tort litigation, and leave the other features untouched. Much of the tort reform legislation enacted state-by-state during the past two years reflects this ad hoc approach. [10]

Despite the disparate nature of the legal problems that characterize mass torts, many of the possible solutions to these problems must wrestle with similar concerns. Each must resolve a dilemma about the nature of legal responsibility that is presently unrecognized and therefore unsettled: the choice between individual and [*847] collective forms of responsibility. Increasingly, traditional conceptions of individual action and individual responsibility are being called into question by conceptions that overlook differences between individual parties and thereby promote more collective forms of responsibility.

In my view, the move toward collective responsibility in tort law is not, on the whole, a sensible development. The move is creating serious problems for the legal system, and it is confounding the nation's liability insurance markets. [11] Of course, the move toward collective responsibility is not characteristic of only mass torts; it is at the core of much tort liability, though usually it is well-hidden in conventional tort law. Yet because mass torts pose the dilemma with special severity, they are an especially suitable vehicle for examining it.

In this Article I shall try to clarify the dilemma and the set of choices it generates for the reform of mass tort law. Part I sets out the features of the responsibility dilemma that characterize the search for solutions to mass tort problems. Part II examines the most salient characteristics of the phenomena that tend to be termed "mass torts." This Part explores the ways in which the responsibility dilemma analyzed in Part I figures in the different problems that trouble mass tort litigation and criticizes several of the developments in this field. Finally, Part III takes up the different non-tort solutions that are available for solving these problems and demonstrates the implications of my analysis for reform of mass tort law.

I. TWO MODELS OF RESPONSIBILITY

Almost all forms of civil liability ultimately are individual. Liability is either imposed on a defendant, who pays the plaintiff to satisfy the judgment, or liability is not imposed and the plaintiff or some collateral source absorbs the loss. Behind this focus on the pocket out of which payment is made, however, lies a world in which different elements of the tort and compensation systems combine to produce more complicated forms of responsibility. Two models of responsibility facilitate an understanding of this less visible [*848] world; they responsibility in tort law, but also would avoid the difficulties encountered in constructing administrative compensation funds. Furthermore, it would acknowledge that the appeal of these alternatives is that they facilitate the compensation of victims. Without an alternative compensation source, the lure of collective responsibility will remain strong, and the effort to retain individual responsibility in tort will be continually undermined.

REV_00263654

A. Administrative Compensation Funds

A system of administrative compensation funds that displace or supplement the tort system is the first possible alternative for dealing with the consequences of mass accidents. Such funds can make increased use of the rules of collective responsibility but can apply them through a method and in a forum constructed specifically for the invocation of collective responsibility. At both the federal and state levels, funds that are in some ways analogous to those proposed for application to mass accidents have been established for limited purposes. The federal "Superfund" for cleaning up hazardous waste storage sites is perhaps the most notable, [93] but others, such as the Black Lung Disease Fund, also are in place, [94] and a number have been proposed. [95] Even so common a program as the workers' compensation system can be considered a distant relative. Unfortunately, the obstacles to the effective implementation of the approach are so serious that it cannot now be considered a feasible way to solve the dilemma posed by large-scale accidents.

On paper the operation of a fund would be appealingly simple. Assessments would be made against enterprises creating the risk of [*886] the kinds of injuries to be compensable by the fund. These assessments would be pooled, and the fund thereby created would finance the payment of compensation. The injuries to be made compensable by the fund would be defined, and a right to recover from the fund in an administrative proceeding -- a right that could be equally or more collective than the tort rights it replaces -- would be created. Among other factors, [96] the measure of compensation would take account of the sums available to the fund.

In theory a fund set up in this way could resolve or circumvent many of the problems that are characteristic of mass tort litigation. Because claims would no longer involve individual defendants with assets at stake, many of the traditional rules and procedures developed by tort law to assure that no liability is imposed without some individual responsibility would be irrelevant. In addition, the new rules of collective responsibility could be applied without the procedural and substantive safeguards of individual rights that now raise the cost of resolving mass accident disputes through fullscale adjudication. [97]

As appealing as this prospect is, however, none of the available methods of structuring funds would solve enough of the problems of principle and practice that funds would pose to make them attractive as a general alternative. Rather, only in the unusual case would the construction of a fund be sensible. To see why this would be so, an examination of the three major issues a fund must confront in striking a balance between individual and collective responsibility is useful. These issues involve: 1) the events to be compensable by a fund; 2) the method of financing the fund; and 3) the measure of compensation awarded to eligible victims.

1. The Compensable Event

The events triggering a claimant's right to receive compensation from a fund might be defined to circumvent many of the problems posed by tort litigation against individual defendants. For example, the compensable event could be defined by reference to a designated outcome (e.g., contracting a particular disease or suffering a particular kind of injury), as well as, perhaps, by reference to [*887] other prerequisites (e.g., exposure to a substance capable of causing the particular disease or injury). A party causally responsible for the claimant's injuries would have neither the incentive nor the opportunity to litigate causation issues, because no enterprise would be held responsible by the fund for any particular injury. Consequently, few of the incentives that increase the cost of conventional mass tort litigation would operate in a proceeding against the fund.

REV_00263672

Moreover, this approach to the definition of the compensable event would almost automatically eliminate the procedural problems that typically afflict mass accident litigation. Nothing would encourage a fund to treat the central factual issues in a series of identical claims as questions of fact that could be decided differently in different instances. Rather, like cases could easily be treated alike by a fund, which would have institutional memory and rules to assure that those injured under circumstances considered identical receive treatment that does not violate the equity principle. The enormous difficulties of using collateral estoppel, class actions, and stare decisis in tort litigation to reduce the costs of resolving claims and to promote equity among plaintiffs could be transcended easily. [98]

Another advantage of this approach to defining the compensable event would be its capacity to avoid some of the problems of proving causation that plague mass tort litigation. No longer would proof of source causation be required, because a fund would eliminate the plaintiff's obligation to identify the particular party or enterprise responsible for his injury. Exposure and substance causation still would require proof, but the former is often not a problem, and the latter could be handled in new ways that would take advantage of the fund's capacities. For example, factual presumptions based on existing scientific data or developed by the fund's scientific staff could aid the claimant's efforts. [99] In cases where the [*888] claimant suffered a signature disease, the claimant might be entitled to recovery unless a special reason to believe the disease had a different cause in his case could be demonstrated.

It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that this technique would solve all the problems of proving causation encountered in conventional mass tort litigation. A large percentage of potential claims -- perhaps even the vast majority -- would involve sufficient causal uncertainty that indulging in presumptions would be factually unwarranted. Certainly this would be true whenever the probability that the claimant's injury or disease was caused by an event covered by the fund was substantially less than fifty percent. Any presumption of causation in such cases would produce more inaccuracy than would the wholesale denial of claims, even if some of these in fact would merit compensation. [100] Eventually the fund might accumulate enough data to support a large body of presumptions, but the length of time necessary to develop such a data base cannot be estimated with certainty. In any case, that data might well demonstrate that most of the diseases resulting from mass torts have other causes, in which case few presumptions would be warranted.

Two possible arrangements could deal with the prospect of uncertain substance causation. The fund could offer compensation only for a set of designated compensable events (those for which factual presumptions of substance and exposure causation are warranted) and leave persons suffering other diseases to their traditional causes of action in tort, to the extent that they could meet their burdens of proof. [101] The defect of this approach is that it might severely limit the jurisdiction of a fund, because the number of situations in which causal presumptions would be factually warranted might be comparatively small.

An alternative arrangement could permit a fund to offer compensation to all those with diseases allegedly caused by events compensable by the fund, but to offer it on an ex post probabilistic basis. No presumptions would be required, although they might be used. Claimants would receive only that percentage of their losses [*889] equal to the probability (as understood at the time of the claim) that the loss was caused by an event compensable by the fund -- that is, by the activities of one or more contributors to the fund. Thus, if the probability that the claimant's disease was caused by a compensable event were thirty percent, then the claimant would receive thirty percent of his compensable losses. To take account of potential changes in scientific knowledge of causation, claimants might be offered the choice between the lump-sum payment of their losses, discounted by causal probability and paid on a present-value basis, and the periodic payment of their losses, making them eligible for increases, but vulnerable to decreases, in the payments based on annually

REV_00263673

recalculated probabilities. [102]

For several reasons, however, the problems of administering this second approach could prove to be enormous. First, sufficiently precise data to warrant estimating causal probabilities might not be available in many of the cases that would otherwise be subject to a fund's jurisdiction. Second, because the compensation paid would be partial, the inclination of decisionmakers to tailor their findings to a claimant's needs might be strong, causing the cost of operating the fund to rise. Finally, a variable periodic payment approach could be vulnerable to continual disputes about award levels, also driving up the costs of a fund's operation. In short, given the current state of scientific knowledge, precise enough definitions of compensable events to warrant the widespread use of funds probably are not feasible.

2. Financing

The method of calculating the assessments that finance the fund would be integral to achieving any incentive effects that the fund could create. The more crudely calculated the assessments, the more collective the system of responsibility that the fund would implement. The problems posed in developing financing for a fund involve the structuring of assessments, the risk of contributor insolvency, and the scope of retroactive liability.

Assessment structure. The fund could be financed in one of two [*890] major ways. It could assess what might be called quantity-based charges against the enterprises responsible for contributing to the fund. These charges would affect production or activity levels but would have little impact on safety levels. For instance, charges against the manufacturers of chemical feedstocks [103] based on volume and toxicity would influence the cost of the feedstocks. This would affect the amount of each that is produced and, in turn, the amounts of hazardous substances produced. However, such quantity-based assessments could have no effect on the level of safety at which the activities using these substances were conducted, because the charges levied would not vary with these levels of safety. [104]

In contrast, quality-based assessments could affect safety levels. Charges against the operators of hazardous waste storage dumps, for example, might distinguish between different methods of containment, the distance of the dump from population centers, and other safety-related factors. Quality-based standards could be supplemented by experience-rating that would vary assessments in accordance with the number of injuries clearly caused by an enterprise's activities. The choice between the two assessment systems would be problematic. Quantity-based assessments usually would be simpler to administer than quality-based standards, even without supplementing the latter with experience-rating, but quantity-based standards probably would have inferior incentive effects, except when safety levels varied only within a narrow range and when the research incentives created by quality-based assessments were weak. [105]

Given current levels of knowledge about causation, however, optimism that a fund's assessment structure could permit fine-tuning of the safety incentives of the enterprises subject to the assessments would be unwarranted. [106] Indeed, in light of the unpredict-ability of many mass accidents, some parties causing them probably would not have been assessed charges at all, because the [*891] administrators of the fund had not anticipated these parties' potential responsibility for future injuries. The less predictable an accident, the more difficult it is to deter with any system of responsibility, whether applied by a fund or by the tort system.

Even in many cases of total unpredictability, however, and certainly in those where some crude charges had been assessed, the safety incentives created by a fund probably would be no more crude and diffused than those produced by the current tort-law mixture of individual and collective responsibility, but they probably would not produce deterrent effects more precise than those generated by tort law either. I reach this conclusion because the administrators of a fund would know and make use of roughly the same information that liability insurers now know about their policyholders. The dilution of incentives resulting from the collective, categorical character of the fund's assessment structure would not necessarily differ from that now produced by the effects of joint and several liability, market share liability, and the other collective causation doctrines that appear to be growing in influence. Therefore, to the extent that the present liability and self-insurance of responsible enterprises has been priced or calculated to account for these collective responsibility doctrines, the shift to funds financed by these enterprises would neither sacrifice the incentive-creating capacity of the mass tort system nor increase it substantially.

REV_00263674

The Risk of Insolvency. Because of the fund's method of financing, it would allocate the risk of insolvency quite differently from conventional tort and bankruptcy law. A fund would remain liable to claimants even after parties that caused their injuries might become insolvent; consequently, the risk of misdistribution of a responsible party's assets among tort claimants would be eliminated. In effect, contributors to the fund would share the risk that one or more of their number might become insolvent after the adoption of the fund.

On the surface this form of risk-sharing would appear to result in more equitable relations among firms who would previously have been codefendants in tort claims brought by the victims now compensated by the fund. Under the developing tort rules governing the apportionment of damages among codefendants, each defendant is held jointly and severally liable for indivisible injuries caused either jointly or cumulatively by the defendants. For example, the coincidence of being a codepositor in a waste disposal site [*892] can produce an obligation not only for one's own actions but for those of codepositors as well, should such codepositors be insolvent at the time of the judgment. [107] The formal risk of such fortuitous liability would be greatly reduced by a fund, which forces all solvent contributors to share the risk of their cocontributors' insolvency.

The scope of the risk-sharing produced by a fund would depend on the nature of the fund's assessments. The longer the latency period between the risk-creating act and the occurrence of a compensable event, the greater difficulty the fund would experience in setting the assessment rates. If in the long run the rates charged a group of enterprises were excessive, the group would bear less of the risk of the insolvency of its members than if the rates charged were too low. Assessments could be deliberately set higher than the predicted exposure requires, as a kind of premium paid by each enterprise for protection against the risk of asset diversion by the shareholders and creditors of other enterprises. If an enterprise became insolvent, a cushion against this risk of insolvency would have accumulated, and assesments might not have to be increased to account for the loss of a contributor. In the absence of insolvencies, any excess could inure to the benefit of contributors through reduced (or less steeply increased) rates.

The consequence of this arrangement is that no single potentially responsible party would be forced to bear the cost of liability caused by multiple insolvent or unavailable responsible parties. However, because individual defendants frequently would be insured against such liability anyway, and because the cases which consist of only one rather than a group of solvent defendants would probably be uncommon, this improvement in equity among defendants often would be more theoretical than real.

A fund's method of financing also might have some impact on the uncertainty costs presently produced by the risk of a responsible enterprise's insolvency. To the extent that a fund could impose retrospective assessments on a contributing enterprise to account for any emerging evidence of the injuries caused by the enterprise's past activities, analogous uncertainty costs would remain under the fund. Although placing limits on retrospective assessment would reduce this uncertainty, the limits would have at least one undesirable [*893] effect. Limiting retrospective assessment would create a moral hazard, because an enterprise enjoying such protection would in effect be provided with unlimited insurance against liability. Other enterprises contributing to the fund would bear collective responsibility for the consequences of this hazard. Because both the emerging rules governing collective causation and the protections against liability provided by bankruptcy law create analogous moral hazards, however, limiting retrospective assessment might not be so objectionable in fact as it seems to be in theory. Nonetheless, if limiting retrospective assessment by a fund were considered unacceptable, then the uncertainty costs produced by unlimited liability would remain even under the fund.

REV_00263675

The Problem of Retroactive Liability. The last critical question bearing on the financing of the fund would be whether those who were exposed, before the establishment of the fund, to a hazardous substance, drug, or other activity subject to the fund's jurisdiction, but who manifested the relevant injury or disease after the establishment, would be entitled to compensation. There are a number of alternatives. First, the parties could be denied compensation from the fund and allowed a traditional tort cause of action. In light of the long-latency period of many of the diseases that would be covered by some sort of administrative fund, however, this approach would preserve for thirty or more years most of the problems the fund had been created to solve.

Second, these long-latency claimants could be allowed to recover from the fund, but their share of compensation could be paid out of general revenues rather than through assessments against contributing enterprises. The feasibility of this approach, of course, might by influenced by the limits of the federal budget.

Third, assessments financing the fund could be set to anticipate not only the claims arising out of future activities of enterprises financing the fund, but also to reflect the past activities of both these firms and other firms no longer in existence. This alternative would achieve the same aims as does the imposition of strict liability in tort for the failure to warn of or remedy unknowable dangers, but here the "retroactive" obligation would be imposed broadly on all fund contributors rather than on particular defendants. [108]

[*894] This last approach also would pose practical problems. Not only would responsible enterprises be relieved of tort liability for their past activities, but their liability insurers also would be relieved of contractual responsibility for defending claims and paying judgments that could no longer be entered against their policyholders. In a sense these insurers would be unjustly enriched unless they were required to contribute to the portion of the fund used to compensate the victims of activities occurring before the establishment of the fund. Yet no fair formula for such a contribution could be fashioned without predicting the exposure these insurers would have faced had the fund not been established, and such a prediction would be quite speculative. Enterprises that had paid large insurance premiums could nonetheless justifiably demand some such contribution from their insurers before they would support the establishment of a fund. [109]

3. The Measure of Compensation

In a very real sense the measure of compensation adopted by a fund would be the key to its feasibility, because the cost of compensating victims through a fund inevitably would be a prime issue in evaluating the proposals for establishing it. [110] The tension between the two models of responsibility is therefore reflected in the issues surrounding the choice of a measure of compensation. The focal point of this tension is the fact that a principle of full compensation, including payment for pain and suffering associated with personal injury, obtains in tort law. A fund almost certainly [*895] would have to deny compensation for such intangible losses, because the limitation of recovery to more objectively provable out-of-pocket losses would be necessary both to avoid disputes not easily resolved without fact-finding proceedings and to limit the total cost of providing compensation. [111]

Although the arguments for awarding pain and suffering damages in tort are plausible, the same arguments are problematic when made in favor of awarding such damages in the administrative context. The cost of litigating many tort claims would be prohibitive in the absence of such awards, because they provide a fund out of which to pay plaintiffs' attorneys without reducing net awards for out-of-pocket losses. But the attorney's role in obtaining compensation from a fund would be much reduced. Additionally, a more subtle tension between the compensatory justification for awarding only out-of-pocket damages when a fund is in place and the deterrence justification for awarding pain and suffering damages in all settings renders the measure of compensation problem more complex. The availability of pain and suffering damages from a fund might complicate (or bankrupt) it to the point of failure; but pain and suffering is a social cost that the contributors to a fund should internalize if a fund purports to be a rough substitute for the tort system.

REV_00263676

Proponents of a fund can provide two responses to such a costinternalization criticism. The first has already been rehearsed: the deterrent effect of collective responsibility for mass torts is so diffuse and ineffective that the shift to a fund would involve little sacrifice in deterrence. A second and quite different response would be to create fund substitutes for the deterrence achieved through the threat of tort liability for pain and suffering or punitive damages. A more logical and controllable alternative to awards for pain and suffering might be to award scheduled death benefits keyed to life expectancy at the age of death and scheduled lumpsum [*896] benefits for other designated disabilities resulting from events compensable by the fund (sterility, blindness, loss of a limb, and so forth). The death benefit probably would cover a large percentage of the events compensable by the fund because, unfortunately, one common event that would be compensable -- cancer -- very frequently causes death within a few years of its detection or is cured.

Another rough substitute for pain and suffering could be fashioned by granting the compensation fund itself a new form of quasi-subrogation action. For example, this cause of action could be allowed against a particular enterprise only under circumstances where an award of punitive damages would have been available had individual tort claims for compensatory damages not been foreclosed by the adoption of the fund. Because the fund would be entitled to bring only one such action, the threat of overdeterrence through multiple awards of punitive damages that now troubles the tort system would be eliminated. [112] The single action for punitive damages would allow the jury to consider the mass character of the injuries caused by the defendant, a process difficult to arrange in a suit by one or a few of the victims of a mass accident. [113] The fact that any award would be paid to the fund and would help to compensate large numbers of victims, rather than be a windfall to a single plaintiff, would also be relevant. All this, however, would be a rather cumbersome and indirect way to retain the deterrent effect of tort liability for pain and suffering damages. [114]

[*897] The last problem a fund must face in setting its measure of compensation also would put two goals in conflict. The problem is whether the fund or the claimant's collateral sources (for example, health or disability insurers) should bear the primary responsibility for the losses compensable by the fund. Channelling primary responsibility through the fund might have the activity and production level effects on parties contributing to the fund discussed previously. [115] In contrast, making a claimant's collateral sources primary and denying these sources any rights of subrogation against the fund would protect the financial integrity of the fund. This approach would reduce the activity and production level effects a fund might otherwise generate, because the premiums that victims would pay for health and disability insurance would hide the full cost of injuries associated with the activities of the contributing parties. Yet the possibility of achieving some of these incentive effects would be the strongest argument for using a fund, rather than private first-party coverage or social insurance alone, to compensate the victims of mass torts. These latter forms of compensation have little potential for influencing the behavior of those potentially responsible for causing mass accidents. From this point of view, therefore, the conflict between the cost-limitation and incentive-creation goals should be resolved in favor of the fund as the primary source and a claimant's collateral insurance as only a secondary source of compensation.

[*898] Setting coverage priorities this way, however, would risk forcing the nation's chemical and pharmaceutical companies to finance an under-the-table system of national health and disability insurance. If the fund's compensation criteria were unduly generous and undiscriminating, much of the cost of medical expenses and lost wages resulting from a variety of causes could be shifted to the enterprises contributing to the fund. Some observers have charged that this has been the experience in the black-lung compensation program, albeit on a smaller scale. [116] To avoid this result, the compensable event and measure of compensation would have to be defined so that only the cost of injuries actually caused by any of the parties contributing to the fund would be paid by the fund. Yet as my discussion of the compensable event indicated, optimism that definitions precise enough to avoid overinclusiveness but broad enough to warrant adoption of a system of funds could, in fact, be fashioned would be unrealistic.

REV_00263677

My reluctant but inevitable conclusion, then, is that a system of administrative compensation funds would not be a satisfactory approach to the mass tort problem. The costs of using funds would probably be too great, the obstacles to their effective operation too numerous, and the dangers they would pose too serious to justify their adoption on any but a very limited and experimental basis. At every turn -- in defining the compensable event, in financing the fund, and in setting the measure of compensation -- the idea of a fund is an attractive but impractical alternative to the collective responsibility that is increasingly evident in tort law.

B. Expanded First-Party Insurance

Almost by a process of elimination, the approach to the compensation of mass tort victims that has the most appeal is a return to a tort system based on a model of individual responsibility, and a reduction of the appeal of more collective concepts of responsibility by expanding existing first-party sources of insurance available to victims. To a large extent this approach would recognize that any deterrence worth achieving through the threat of tort liability [*899] could be achieved by the traditional system of individual responsibility, that the obstacles to the successful operation of administrative compensation funds would be prodigious, and that the compensation afforded by the move toward collective responsibility in tort or administrative systems could be more effectively provided through first-party insurance.

Importantly, this approach would rely on existing forms of insurance; it would not be a special purpose no-fault system and would not require the creation of new forms of coverage available only to the victims of mass torts. This expanded system could be operated either by private entities or by government. In theory either option is feasible, because private insurers now market health and disability insurance, and the federal and state governments now provide health and disability protection through a variety of programs.

Such coverage now parallels the compensation available in tort. For instance, the desire to provide compensation for two major components of out-of-pocket loss -- medical expenses and lost wages -- currently contributes to the lure of collective responsibility in tort law. Even if concern for the intangible losses of survivors resulting from wrongful death is included as a component of loss, each of the components also is currently insured or insurable through first-party medical and hospitalization coverage, workers' compensation, life insurance, and first-party disability insurance. A patchwork array of social insurance also provides coverage that sometimes substitutes for or supplements this private insurance. Thus, over eighty percent of the population is protected by medical or hospitalization insurance of some sort, [117] the average family owns over $ 58,000 worth of life insurance, [118] most of the working population is protected by workers' compensation against wage loss (as well as medical expenses) resulting from work-related injuries, [119] and this same group also is protected through the Social [*900] Security Disability Insurance system (SSDI), up to a minimal ceiling, against wage loss resulting from long-term, total disability. [120] A much smaller percentage of the labor force is protected against wage loss resulting from "non-occupational" injury or disease, especially if the disability in question is partial or short-term. [121]

Therefore, upon return to a system of individual responsibility in tort, the expansion of first-party coverage that would be necessary to assure compensation for out-of-pocket losses to those who would previously have been entitled to tort recoveries would include the following: 1) higher benefits for those with limited medical or hospitalization insurance; 2) medical and hospitalization insurance for the fifteen to twenty percent of the population that is currently uninsured; 3) insurance against wage losses resulting from non-work-related injury or disease not covered (or not fully covered) by social security or existing private disability insurance; and 4) insurance against work-related wage loss substantially exceeding the workers' compensation ceiling.

REV_00263678

The cost of all this additional coverage would be immense -- tens of billions of dollars at the least. Little of this sum would represent "new" costs, however, because the expansion of coverage would protect against losses that currently occur but are borne by the individual victim. Apart from the overhead involved in extending the coverage, and the increase in claims that inevitably results when more losses are insured, the expansion of first-party coverage would merely spread losses rather than create them. Nonetheless, any attempt to institute an expanded system of first-party insurance would face substantial obstacles and hard choices.

For example, the tort system now provides mandatory protection for victims: with a few exceptions, a potential victim cannot opt to waive future tort rights in return for a present benefit. Consequently, to provide victims with the equivalent of what they would lose upon return to an individual responsibility system in tort, an expanded first-party system would have to be mandatory. Yet how this mandate could be effectively enforced is not at all clear. One [*901] approach would be to require employers to administer a mandatory system. Another would be to require proof of required minimum coverages upon renewal of driver's licenses. An individualized enforcement system -- on the model of draft registration -- could be used for remaining individuals. A third approach would be to encourage insurers to offer in one policy a set of coverages satisfying the purchase requirement and to issue a certificate resembling a W-2 form to be filed with tax returns.

While a number of such enforcement devices might be feasible, the difficulties of trying to assure that over two hundred million people have purchased (or had purchased for them) two or three different kinds of insurance should not be underestimated. For this reason, a mandatory system probably would have to consist of governmentally provided social insurance, rather than privately-marketed insurance protection. [122] Under such an approach, the desired benefit levels would simply be provided to eligible victims. Payment could be financed either out of general revenues or through contributions on the model of the social security system. When social insurance is mandatory, however, it tends to provide very limited benefit levels; therefore, the problem of the undercompensated victim probably would not be eliminated by the introduction of increased social insurance.

An expanded system of private first-party insurance, on the other hand, need not be automatically mandatory. Torts (including mass torts) cause only a small portion of the death and disability in this country; [123] to require the purchase of first-party insurance against all death, disability, and health care costs solely to compensate the small portion of these misfortunes that is tortiously caused would be massive overkill. Purchase of first-party coverage might therefore remain entirely voluntary (except for a few existing exceptions such as no-fault automobile insurance), or companies writing medical, hospitalization, or disability coverage might be required to offer customers the option to purchase a package of legislatively prescribed coverage. Because purchasing such coverage [*902] would be optional, it would not have to be limited to subsistence-level benefits.

Reducing the scope of tort liability by deemphasizing collective responsibility, however, probably would not noticeably increase incentives to purchase first-party coverage, even if insurance companies were strongly encouraged to offer it. If this were indeed the case, then the four gaps in first-party health and disability protection available to compensate accident victims identified earlier would remain. Any of these gaps would be significant, but one gap in first-party coverage would be the most prominent -- the absence of widespread, substantial insurance against non-occupationally caused disability. This wage-loss component would thus be the missing link in any effort to use first-party insurance as a substitute for compensation in tort. The nature of the private market in disability insurance is therefore worth examining, because the first-party approach to tort reform must pin its hopes on this market.

REV_00263679

An initial explanation for the sparseness of private disability insurance may be informational. Although at any given age the average adult is as likely to suffer a serious disability as to die, he spends about ten times as much each year for life than for disability insurance. Perhaps the prospect of death appears so much more salient and dreadful than the prospect of disability that the insurance markets have reacted accordingly. In any case, a concerted campaign to educate the population about the comparative probabilities of death and disability might create greater demand for disability insurance.

Two other market failures, however, are much more likely to be at the heart of the problem. [124] The first is the problem of adverse selection. All voluntary insurance is afflicted to some extent by the disproportionate tendency of those who are more likely to suffer losses to apply for coverage. Unless the insurer can screen applicants effectively and reject or risk-classify those with above-average expected losses, its risk-pooling efforts will be undermined, and the price of coverage will rise. Yet because information about the probability of suffering an insured loss is more probably in the insured's exclusive possession in the disability insurance context than in others, disability insurers may find it difficult to risk-classify [*903] with accuracy. In addition, the fact that private disability insurance has never been widespread has prevented the accumulation of data that might render the risk-classification process more accurate. The market's inability to neutralize adverse selection has thus perpetuated itself.

A second and related market failure is the problem of moral hazard: the tendency of an insured party to exercise less care to minimize losses than he would exercise if he were uninsured. With disability insurance, moral hazard is present both ex ante and ex post. The insured individual is more likely to suffer a loss and more likely to stay disabled than the uninsured. Both forms of moral hazard can be mitigated by limiting the amount of coverage sold to a percentage of the insured's pre-disability income (usually a maximum of about sixty percent) and by coordinating with other sources of wage-loss insurance so that overinsurance is not possible. Nonetheless, the prospect of working is sometimes not as attractive as the prospect of leisure with lower income, and economic conditions may reduce the job prospects of even the marginally able or disabled who would prefer to work. For both reasons, the cost of disability insurance is driven up unless the insurer can accurately assess the validity of both initial and continuing claims.

Yet as the controversy surrounding the SSDI program in the early 1980's illustrated, [125] the very concept of disability is more subjective than are most insured events. Therefore, both fraudulent and innocently invalid claims are more difficult to detect, claims expenses are higher than in other lines of insurance, disputes between claimants and insurers are more frequent, and the cost of coverage is higher than it would be in the absence of these consequences of moral hazard. As a result, private disability insurance -- especially when individually purchased -- is a comparatively expensive insurance product, and less is purchased than might otherwise be expected.

The problems of adverse selection and moral hazard, then, probably are largely responsible for the weakness of the private disability insurance market. No magic solutions to these problems exist. Perhaps the best approach would simply leave the market to operate as it always has, permitting it to grow as tort liability ceases its own expansion, as demand for disability insurance slowly increases, [*904] and as the market itself develops new devices for reducing adverse selection and moral hazard. For those who are unsatisfied by such a laissez-faire stance, however, I can offer a few new directions for the search for solutions to both adverse selection and moral hazard in disability insurance.

REV_00263680

The best way to deal with adverse selection, of course, would be to remove the selection decision from the applicant. This could be accomplished either by making individual purchase mandatory [126] or by marketing coverage on a group, rather than an individual, basis. If participation by all group members were automatic, then the adverse selection effect could be largely eliminated. Because about seventy percent of the private disability insurance now sold in this country is group insurance, [127] however, placing greater emphasis on the group approach would not seem to be a promising way to expand the incidence of disability protection. On the other hand, conceivably some effort to encourage the employers who now offer health insurance as a fringe benefit to offer disability insurance along with it -- perhaps through special tax incentives to the employer -- could have the desired effect.

Similarly, possible solutions to the moral hazard problem should recognize the reasons that the problem is so severe in disability insurance. First, the definition of "disability" inevitably makes eligibility decisions more subjective than in other forms of coverage. This problem could be addressed directly, rather than through the indirect methods traditionally employed. For example, policies could be offered in which "disability" is defined exclusively by reference to a series of designated conditions that would count automatically as "disabling." Because the existence of these conditions could be more objectively verified than disability itself, eligibility could be more easily determined and borderline disputes more easily avoided.

Moreover, although some disabilities might not be covered as a result of this approach, the cost of the more limited form of coverage would be correspondingly reduced and demand might increase. The SSDI experience with a version of this approach, while mixed, has met with some success, [128] and some private insurers already [*905] use the method on a nonexclusive, limited basis. Individual insurers, however, probably would have less than optimal incentives to innovate in this way, because other insurers could copy innovations at a relatively low cost compared to those of the innovating company. [129] Either collective or legally mandatory experimentation could therefore be necessary to test the utility of this designated disability approach.

The second reason moral hazard is so severe in disability insurance is that any periodic payment system inevitably creates continuing incentives for the claimant to remain eligible for payment. The monthly payment system generally used by disability insurers is bound to be afflicted in this way. In contrast, the great virtue of the tort system's approach, for all its other disadvantages, is that it avoids ex post moral hazard by paying damages in a lump sum. To capture this virtue, a form of damage scheduling on the model of the lump sum payments made in workers' compensation might help to alleviate some of the moral hazard in disability insurance. By paying lump sums for certain designated disability conditions and at the same time by insuring a lower percentage of lost wages (up to a maximum of forty percent, for example), both the incentive of the insured to remain disabled after payment of the lump sum and the cost of providing continuing coverage when the disability continued could be reduced.

Each of these suggestions tentatively outlines experimental solutions for some of the problems that now limit the scope of the private disability insurance market. The prospect that any of these solutions would immediately increase demand for disability insurance, lower the cost of coverage, or make the market generally more vigorous is unlikely; but just as the tort system is not set in stone, neither is the insurance market. New ways of providing disability insurance that reduce some of the problems the market now faces are long overdue. Similar efforts to fill the other gaps in the first-party market -- especially for the portion of the population without health insurance -- should also be undertaken. Legislative or regulatory encouragement of experimentation may be required to enlist the creative energies of the insurance industry in this endeavor. Although legal intrusion into the market is a serious venture, such a foray is well worth considering, especially if the new [*906] insurance protection would aid in the attempt to rehabilitate tort law.

IV. CONCLUSION

REV_00263681

represent polar examples of phenomena that in practice combine both individual and collective responsibility themes.

Under the model of individual responsibility, injuries have identifiable legal causes, and those responsible for these causes are held liable for their legally defined results. An action (or inaction) produces liability only if, absent that action, injury would not have occurred. It follows that liability can be imposed only for injuries "caused" in this sense. In addition, the model implicitly assumes that those held liable actually bear responsibility by paying damages out of their own pockets. This is a world of people and enterprises with clear identities, of distinct actions that can be ascribed to identifiable parties, of assets that cannot be exhausted by potential or actual liability, and of insurance that can be priced to reflect accurately the probability that the policyholder will suffer a compensable loss. [12]

In contrast, the model of collective responsibility is as yet inchoate and underdeveloped, but has increasing explanatory power. Under this regime, injuries often have multiple legal causes, and parties are held liable not only individually but also as members of a group. As a result they may be held liable for damages that another party would pay under the individual model. In addition, in the world of collective responsibility, a party can externalize the risk or cost of liability by declaring bankruptcy or by purchasing insurance that cannot be priced to reflect with accuracy the probability of loss. In all these ways responsibility for the loss in question is shared collectively.

How and when does one of these two models dominate the other? First, in certain settings one model may be a more accurate description of the non-legal world than the other. If in fact certain kinds of injuries are the product of several parties acting together, then a conception of legal responsibility that reflects this understanding of the world makes sense. Thus, collective responsibility may be the natural outcome of collective action. Second, concern for equity among parties also may affect the dominance of one model over the other. While rules of individual responsibility treat parties to different lawsuits as isolated from one another and from [*849] other legal actions, rules of collective responsibility treat parties as members of groups and naturally provide greater opportunity to consider treating like cases alike. Finally, since the model of individual responsibility often falls short of achieving its aims, a collective model may sometimes more effectively achieve the aims of individual responsibility. Thus collective responsibility may be adopted as a surrogate for individual responsibility.

These considerations make the choice between individual and collective responsibility seem deceptively easy. Making that choice in mass tort litigation is rarely easy, however, because in practice the justifications for choosing one model over the other are mixed. The parties potentially responsible for mass torts often are neither clearly isolated individuals nor consciously collective groups; promoting equity among plaintiffs tends to be appropriate only if other factors are equal, because equity conflicts with the countervailing interest in individual control of litigation; and using collective responsibility as a surrogate for individual responsibility risks the appearance of unfairness, because the imposition of tort liability is likely to have connotations that are publicly interpreted by reference to the norms of individual, rather than collective, responsibility. Mass tort law therefore reflects the tension between the two models, as the next Part reveals.

II. THE LEGAL CHARACTERISTICS OF MASS TORTS

The choice between the models of individual and collective responsibility is most often available in mass tort litigation because the limits of the individual model are most evident in these cases. Yet the accidents that produce the legal problems characterizing mass torts are by no means homogeneous. Apart from the large number of persons injured, the lawsuits that arise out of such diverse occurrences as airplane crashes, exposure to hazardous substances or dangerous drugs, and nuclear accidents do not necessarily have much in common. Some of these "accidents" are sudden events, others occur gradually, and still

REV_00263655

The dilemma of mass tort reform is that the legal system is presented with a choice among unsatisfactory alternatives. On the one hand, the system may muddle along as it has, slowly constructing ever-more collective liability standards and applying them through the most expensive method of claim resolution -- full-scale adjudication. On the other hand, the system can recognize the dangers on its path and return to standards emphasizing individual responsibility. But a return to more traditional rules could limit the availability of compensation to the victims of mass accidents and could forego the attempt to allocate responsibility for much of the damage caused by such accidents.

Until recently, these two alternatives defined the contours of the debate over mass tort reform. But two other alternatives also merit consideration. First, collective responsibility standards could be retained and applied through a mass tort compensation fund or funds. Unfortunately, a fund would have great disadvantages as well as benefits. Given current knowledge, placing effective constraints on a fund's compensation criteria would be difficult; yet, ironically, the same limited knowledge about causation in mass tort litigation is part of what prompts consideration of funds as an alternative to the current system.

A second alternative would return to the traditional tort system but also promote the expansion of first-party insurance to assure adequate compensation of victims. This approach would also pose problems. Mandating the purchase of coverage could prove to be an administrative nightmare; yet making purchase optional might not sufficiently increase the amount of coverage available to potential victims.

Regardless of the alternative or alternatives that are adopted, recognition of the dilemma of mass tort reform should clarify what is at stake in making choices about reform. The principal lesson taught by the dilemma may be that the model of individual responsibility underlying many of the precepts of traditional tort law is losing its influence. What began as a regime of liability for fault, and then developed into a method of affecting behavior by imposing liability without fault, is now evolving toward a system of liability [*907] without either fault or causation. As individual responsibility in the tort system fades away, it is worth wondering whether the remaining advantages of the system could be more effectively preserved by adopting other compensation schemes and simultaneously returning tort law to its earlier state.

The answer depends not only on what has already occurred, but on what the future brings as well. In a sense, therefore, the problem is what to do until the future comes. If the tort system is in the midst of a temporary period of a few decades in which society's technological capacities have outstripped its ability to deal with their consequences, then it will be able to muddle through without radical reform. Perhaps the tort system will have to adopt even more collective responsibility standards and apply them even less efficiently and more expensively than at present. Matters may become worse before they get better, but slowly our knowledge of and capacity to deal with the adverse consequences of powerful technologies will grow, and with that growth the legal system will eventually be able to banish uncertainty and return to the model of individual responsibility it is designed to follow.

On the other hand, the future may not be so benign. We may be at the beginning of a long, unhappy period during which we will be paying for the bargain we have made, and continue to make, in order to reap the benefits of advanced technologies. If this rather Faustian vision is accurate, the paradigmatic problem the legal system will face is the mass tort, and bending the rules of individual responsibility into collective responsibility devices may prove inadequate to the task. The legal problems mass torts pose are proving to be qualitatively different from those of the past, and an effective, long-term solution to those problems simply may not lie in the tort system as we have known it.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 See G. Stern, The Buffalo Creek Disaster (1976).

REV_00263682

n2 See In re MGM Grand Hotel Fire Litig., 570 F. Supp. 913 (D. Nev. 1983).

n3 See In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 988 (1982).

n4 See P. Brodeur, Outrageous Misconduct (1985) (detailing the circumstances surrounding the asbestos cases); Special Project, An Analysis of the Legal, Social, and Political Issues Raised by Asbestos Litigation, 36 Vand. L. Rev. 573 (1983).

n5 See In re Bendectin Prod. Liab. Litig., 749 F.2d 300 (6th Cir. 1984).

n6 See Sindell v. Abbott Laboratories, 26 Cal. 3d 588, 607 P.2d 924, 163 Cal. Rptr. 132 (1980).

n7 See In re Agent Orange Prod. Liab. Litig., 534 F. Supp. 1046 (E.D.N.Y. 1982).

n8 A number of factors probably explain why mass tort claims were not a fixture on the legal scene until recently. The most important is that successful claims for diseases with long-latency periods require the development of considerable medical knowledge about causation -- a development that did not occur until recently. Moreover, the legal system had to create a "discovery" exception to statutes of limitations to permit the instigation of such suits. See, e.g., Scott v. Rinehart & Dennis Co., 116 W. Va. 319, 180 S.E. 276 (1935) (period for bringing claim for silicosis had expired before plaintiff could have known he had contracted the disease).

In contrast, mass tort claims for injuries caused by sudden accidents were sometimes brought in the past. See, e.g., Jacobs v. Ringling Bros.-Barnum & Bailey Combined Shows, Inc., 141 Conn. 86, 103 A.2d 805 (1954) (detailing suit arising out of 1944 circus fire that killed 169 persons). Criminal actions were frequently brought in mass accident cases as well. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Welansky, 316 Mass. 383, 55 N.E.2d 902 (1944) (manslaughter charge arising out of "Cocoanut Grove" fire); People v. Harris, 74 Misc. 353, 134 N.Y.S. 409 (Ct. Gen. Sess. 1911) (manslaughter charge arising out of "Triangle Shirt Waist" fire).

n9 See, e.g., Rethinking Tort and Environmental Liability Laws: Needs and Objectives of the Late 20th Century and Beyond, 24 Hous. L. Rev. 1 (1987); Critical Issues in Tort Reform, 14 J. Legal Stud. 459 (1985); Toxic Waste and Environmental Law, 33 Clev. St. L. Rev. 1 (1984-85); Catastrophic Personal Injuries, 13 J. Legal Stud. 415 (1984); An Analysis of the Legal, Social and Political Issues Posed by Asbestos Litigation, 36 Vand. L. Rev. 573 (1983).

n10 For a catalogue of these reforms, see U.S. Dep't of Justice, Tort Policy Working Group, An Update on the Liability Crisis 65-73 (1987).

n11 See Abraham, Making Sense of the Liability Insurance Crisis, 48 Ohio St. L.J. (forthcoming 1987).

n12 For a discussion of the problems of pricing liability insurance, see K. Abraham, Distributing Risk: Insurance, Legal Theory, and Public Policy 64-100 (1986).

n13 Although the term accident usually connotes a sudden event, I shall use it to refer to sudden, gradual, and serial occurrences that produce mass injuries eventuating in tort claims.

n14 In the Agent Orange litigation, for example, defendants spent $ 100 million to prepare for trial. See P. Schuck, Agent Orange on Trial 5 (1986).

n15 See, e.g., id. at 87-90.

REV_00263683

n16 See Sindell v. Abbott Laboratories, 26 Cal. 3d 588, 612, 607 P.2d 924, 937, 163 Cal. Rptr. 132, 145 (1980).

n17 See In re MGM Grand Hotel Fire Litig., 570 F. Supp. 913, 920-24 (D. Nev. 1983).

n18 Cf. Feinberg, The Toxic Tort Litigation Crisis: Conceptual Problems and Proposed Solutions, 24 Hous. L. Rev. 155, 162 (1987) (the more defendants in a suit, the higher the potential payoff, and the lower the incentives of plaintiffs to settle).

n19 This phenomenon appears to have been the major obstacle to settlement in the MGM Grand Hotel fire litigation. See 570 F. Supp. at 933-36.

n20 For an analysis of the factors that more generally promote settlement and litigation, see Priest & Klein, The Selection of Disputes for Litigation, 13 J. Legal Stud. 1 (1984).

n21 See, e.g., A. Lowenfeld, Aviation Law §§ 7.12-.22 (2d ed. 1981) (discussing the claims arising from two major air disasters).

n22 See N.Y. Times, Mar. 24, 1985, § 4, at 22, col. 1. For an analysis of the variety of factors that may prompt settlement in mass tort cases, see Sand, How Much Is Enough? Observations in Light of the Agent Orange Settlement, 9 Harv. Envtl. L. Rev. 283, 296-306 (1985).

n23 Commentators also suggest that the transaction costs of a tort action increase not merely additively, but exponentially, with increases in the number of parties in the action. See, e.g., P. Schuck, supra note 14, at 7; Epstein, The Legal and Insurance Dynamics of Mass Tort Litigation, 13 J. Legal Stud. 475, 476-77 (1984).

n24 See Black & Lilienfeld, Epidemiologic Proof in Toxic Tort Litigation, 52 Fordham L. Rev. 732 (1984); Dore, A Commentary on the Use of Epidemiological Evidence in Demonstrating Cause-in-Fact, 7 Harv. Envtl. L. Rev. 429, 431-33, 436-37 (1983); Hall & Silbergeld, Reappraising Epidemiology: A Response to Mr. Dore, 7 Harv. Envtl. L. Rev. 441, 441-43 (1983); Hoffman, The Use of Epidemiological Data in the Courts, 120 Am. J. Epidemiology 190 (1984).

n25 For example, the definitive findings on the effects of exposure to asbestos after long-latency periods were first published in Selikoff, Churg, & Hammond, The Occurrence of Asbestosis Among Insulation Workers in the United States, 132 Annals N.Y. Acad. Sci. 139 (1965).

n26 See, e.g., Escola v. Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 24 Cal. 2d 453, 462-63, 150 P.2d 436, 441 (1944) (Traynor, J., concurring).

n27 See Calabresi & Hirschoff, Toward a Test for Strict Liability in Torts, 81 Yale L.J. 1055, 1067-70 (1972); Calabresi & Klevorick, Four Tests for Liability in Torts, 14 J. Legal Stud. 585, 591-92, 611-13 (1985).

n28 See, e.g., Spano v. Perini Corp., 25 N.Y.2d 11, 14-15, 250 N.E.2d 31, 33 (1969). Some courts hold out the possibility of a rare exception. See, e.g., Whitman Hotel Corp. v. Elliot & Watrous Eng'g Co., 137 Conn. 562, 566, 79 A.2d 591, 593 (1951).

n29 See Restatement (Second) of Torts § 402A (1965).

n30 On this view, both negligence and strict liability adopt cost-benefit tests, the former dependent on foresight and the latter on hindsight. See Keeton, Product Liability and the Meaning of Defect, 5 St. Mary's L.J. 30, 37-38 (1973); Wade, On the Effect in Product n31 See, e.g., Dart v. Wiebe Mfg., Inc., 147 Ariz. 242, 709 P.2d 876 (1985); Elmore v. Owens-Illinois, Inc., 673 S.W.2d 434 (Mo. 1984); Beshada v. Johns-Manville Prods. Corp., 90 N.J. 191, 197, 447 A.2d 539, 542 (1982).

REV_00263684

Liability of Knowledge Unavailable Prior to Marketing, 58 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 734, 739, 756-59 (1983).

n32 See Schwartz, Products Liability, Corporate Structure, and Bankruptcy: Toxic Substances and the Remote Risk Relationship, 14 J. Legal Stud. 689, 693-94 (1985).

n33 For a discussion of the other explanations for the movement to strict liability, see Calabresi & Klevorick, supra note 27, at 594-602.

n34 Cf. Cooter, Prices and Sanctions, 84 Colum. L. Rev. 1523, 1540 (1984) (strict liability is superior to negligence when relatively large errors are likely in the identification of the efficient level of care and relatively small errors are likely in the computation of damages or assignment of liability).

n35 See Calabresi & Hirschoff, supra note 27, at 1062-63.

n36 See Shavell, Strict Liability Versus Negligence, 9 J. Legal Stud. 1 (1980).

n37 See, e.g., Helling v. Carey, 83 Wash. 2d 514, 520-21, 519 P.2d 981, 984-85 (1974) (Utter, J., concurring).

n38 Signature diseases include vaginal adenocarcinoma, caused almost exclusively by exposure to the drug DES in utero, and mesothelioma, caused almost exclusively by inhalation of asbestos fibers. See Abraham & Merrill, Scientific Uncertainty in the Courts, Issues in Sci. and Tech., Winter 1986, at 93, 101.

n39 See Rabin, Environmental Liability and the Tort System, 24 Hous. L. Rev. 27, 29 (1987); Rosenberg, The Causal Connection in Mass Exposure Cases: A "Public Law" Vision of the Tort System, 97 Harv. L. Rev. 849, 855-58 (1984) (proposing that burden of proof problems be solved by adopting a system of proportional compensation).

n40 See supra notes 32-36 and accompanying text.

n41 See S. Epstein, The Politics of Cancer 39 (1978); Elliott, Goal Analysis Versus Institutional Analysis of Toxic Compensation Systems, 73 Geo. L.J. 1357, 1362 (1985) (discussing limited information processing capacities of legal doctrines).

n42 See Dore, supra note 24, at 436-37.

n43 See Michie v. Great Lakes Steel Div., 495 F.2d 213 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 997 (1974).

n44 A second explanation for relaxing the traditional burdens of proof is quite different. Because the large number of plaintiffs in mass tort cases can threaten the solvency of any single defendant, all parties -- plaintiffs and defendants -- have an even greater incentive than normal to join all potentially responsible parties. As the search for a deep pocket widens, the connection between the actions of a particular defendant and the plaintiff's losses becomes attenuated. Thus the necessity for a shift in the plaintiff's burden of proof arises so that the purpose of joining the additional defendant with only attenuated causal responsibility is not defeated. In such cases a defendant with limited causal responsibility for the plaintiff's loss may come to bear more than an equitable share of liability for that loss, either because liability is imposed in equal shares or because some defendants are insolvent and others bear their remaining liability.

REV_00263685

n45 In some cases, there are both. For example, considerable evidence indicates that collusion among asbestos manufacturers prevented dissemination of information about its dangers. See P. Brodeur, supra note 4, at 109-31, 178-80.

n46 Thus, the intention is to produce a more accurate assessment of individual responsibility on the part of defendants. Traditional burdens of proof result in inaccurate assessments of responsibility whenever a plaintiff is unable to pinpoint responsibility that in fact should be borne by another party. Shifting the burden of proof to defendants may also result in inaccuracy; but when the over-assessment of responsibility produced by collective rules that shift the burden of proof is smaller than the under-assessment produced by retaining the traditional rules, a shift comes closer to imposing the "correct" amount of liability. Such a shift therefore departs less from the individual responsibility standard than a rule that actually embodies the standard.

n47 See, e.g., Collins v. Eli Lilly Co., 116 Wis. 2d 166, 198-200, 342 N.W.2d 37, 52-53 (1984) (liability in DES case apportioned among defendants on basis of comparative negligence rather than market share), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 826 (1985).

n48 One other effect of collective rules governing proof of causation is worth noting here. The most unpredictable feature of any accident is the amount of damage it produces. Slight differences in physical circumstances, in the susceptibility of those exposed to risk, in the age or earning capacity of victims, or in other factors can result in wide variations in the amount of liability imposed on a responsible party. One accident barely scratches a victim, but an identical one causes mayhem. Large enterprises that suffer frequent claims are somewhat protected from such vicissitudes by the law of large numbers, and those with less frequent claims can buy similar protection through insurance. Collectivizing doctrines governing causation further smooth out this unpredictable variation in the severity of claims, thereby removing the capricious feature of rules having a more individual emphasis.

n49 See, e.g., Landes & Posner, Joint and Multiple Tortfeasors: An Economic Analysis, 9 J. Legal Stud. 517 (1980); Rizzo & Arnold, Causal Apportionment in the Law of Torts: An Economic Theory, 80 Colum. L. Rev. 1399 (1980).

n50 Collective responsibility rules may have suboptimal effects not only on safety levels but on activity or production levels as well. Reducing production levels will reduce market share and therefore the extent of an enterprise's market share liability in most cases. Under at least some versions of this doctrine, however, responsible enterprises continue to bear part of the cost of injuries caused by enterprises not subject to suit because of insolvency or jurisdictional factors. Only by eliminating involvement in an activity altogether will an enterprise be assured of avoiding the free-rider effects of market share or joint and several liability for losses caused by the activity.

n51 See, e.g., Michie v. Great Lakes Steel Div., 495 F.2d 213, 215, 216-18 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 997 (1974).

n52 Moreover, in some of these cases each defendant's action not only increases the difficulty of apportioning individual responsibility; when they combine, these actions may also have synergistic effects that increase the likelihood (sometimes predictably) that the actions of the others will cause harm. For discussion of synergy, see infra note 59 and accompanying text.

n53 See P. Brodeur, supra note 4, at 109-31, 178-80.

n54 See, e.g., Hall v. E. I. Du Pont De Nemours & Co., 345 F. Supp. 353, 371-74 (E.D.N.Y. 1972).

REV_00263686

n55 See, e.g., Sulesky v. United States, 545 F. Supp. 426, 429-30 (S.D. W. Va. 1982) (epidemiological studies of the side effects of swine flu vaccination). Cf. In re Agent Orange Prod. Liab. Litig., 597 F. Supp. 740, 854-56 (E.D.N.Y. 1984) (epidemiological studies of the effects of exposure to Agent Orange).

n56 See Robinson, Multiple Causation in Tort Law: Reflections on the DES Cases, 68 Va. L. Rev. 713, 759-69 (1982).

n57 Cf. Rosenberg, supra note 39, at 881-85 (arguing in favor of proportional compensation).

n58 The limitations of available data also render impractical both Professor Robinson's and Professor Rosenberg's creative proposals for compensation on the basis of risk rather than actual harm. See Robinson, Probabilistic Causation and Compensation for Tortious Risk, 14 J. Legal Stud. 779 (1985); Rosenberg, supra note 39, at 885-87. For an effort by workers exposed to asbestos to recover for their increased risk of contracting cancer, see Devlin v. Federal Shipbldg. & Dry Dock Co., 202 N.J. Super. 556, 495 A.2d 495 (1985).

n59 As complicated as the examples are, they are oversimplified. For instance, potentially relevant factors such as differences in the doses or durations of exposure to each of the substances involved have been deliberately excluded. The inclusion of these matters would make judgments about the nature of each source's responsibility considerably more difficult.

n60 See, e.g., Vesely v. Sager, 5 Cal. 3d 153, 486 P.2d 151, 95 Cal. Rptr. 623 (1971) (liability of vendor of alcoholic beverages to victim of vendor's drunken customer); see also Trenier v. California Inv. and Dev. Corp., 105 Cal. App. 3d 44, 46 n.1, 164 Cal. Rptr. 156, 157 n.1 (1980) (noting that the Vesely doctrine added a solvent defendant -- the bar owner).

Rules governing the liability of a successor corporation for the torts of its predecessor also are developing to meet the risk that a defendant is insolvent. See, e.g., Leannais v. Cincinnati, Inc., 565 F.2d 437, 439-43 (7th Cir. 1977); Ray v. Alad Corp., 19 Cal. 3d 22, 560 P.2d 3, 136 Cal. Rptr. 574 (1977).

n61 The role played by the risk of insolvency in mass tort claims, like the other characteristics of mass torts, is not independent of the others. Rather, the risk of insolvency is partially a product of these characteristics and, in turn, partially a cause of their existence. The impact of the size of mass disasters on the risk of insolvency is obvious: the greater the number of plaintiffs injured and the more the losses suffered, the greater the risk that damages will exceed the defendant's assets. Similarly, the same problem that often leads to difficulties in proving breach of the applicable standard of care -- the passage of time between the actions that ultimately will result in liability and the actual imposition of that liability -- also creates the potential for creditors and owners of an enterprise to drain a defendant's assets and render it insolvent by the time the latency period ends and injuries begin to manifest themselves. At least in some mass tort cases, the threat of multiple awards of punitive damages, a very common characteristic of mass disaster litigation, is the real threat to the solvency of defendants.

n62 See Roe, Bankruptcy and Mass Tort, 84 Colum. L. Rev. 846, 855, 863-64 (1984).

n63 See id. at 856-62.

n64 See In re Johns-Manville Corp., Summary of the Joint Plan of Reorganization 1 (Nov. 21, 1983).

n65 See id. at 7-8. The plan eventually adopted did not embody these proposals. See In re Johns-Manville Corp., Second Amended and Restated Plan of Reorganization, slip op. at 8, 45 n66 See Roe, supra note 62, at 871-74.

REV_00263687

(Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Dec. 18, 1986).

n67 Cf. id. at 855 (suggesting that a first-come, first-served rule might not be inequitable in this context).

n68 See supra note 63 and accompanying text.

n69 439 U.S. 322 (1979).

n70 In some jurisdictions the mutuality requirement had already been abolished in state cases. See, e.g., Bernhard v. Bank of Am. Nat'l Trust & Sav. Ass'n, 19 Cal. 2d 807, 122 P.2d 892 (1942).

n71 439 U.S. at 331.

n72 See, e.g., Hardy v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 681 F.2d 334, 344-45 (5th Cir. 1982).

n73 See Currie, Mutuality of Collateral Estoppel: Limits of the Bernhard Doctrine, 9 Stan. L. Rev. 281, 285-89 (1957).

n74 The doctrine therefore will be of use only when a first plaintiff has prevailed (presumably both at trial and on appeal) and a second then invokes the doctrine and is sustained on appeal before any inconsistent verdicts in other trials are entered. If inconsistent verdicts are entered before the second plaintiff's use of the doctrine is considered on appeal, then the appellate court could not affirm without the arbitrariness just described. Given the time involved in trying a case to a verdict and appealing it, a defendant will easily prevail at trial in at least one case and thereby render the doctrine unavailable in the remainder of the untried cases raising the same issue.

n75 Perhaps the most notable example is the Agent Orange case. See In re Agent Orange Prod. Liab. Litig. (Ryan v. Dow Chem. Co.), 611 F. Supp. 1396 (E.D.N.Y. 1985). For an analysis of the entire case and proposals for reform, see P. Schuck, supra note 14.

n76 Indeed, one can paint a picture of what would happen if the obstacles to the use of collateral estoppel were removed that looks very much like a class action. Other potential plaintiffs would have an incentive to help finance the first plaintiff's claim because they could benefit greatly themselves if the claim succeeded. The major difference between this state of affairs and a class action would be the absence of mutuality -- in subsequent cases the defendant would be precluded from relitigating issues decided against it, but as nonparties to the earlier suit, new plaintiffs would not be precluded by any earlier determinations favorable to the defendant. Class actions avoid much of this potential violation of the equity principle.

n77 Although the use of class actions may thus streamline litigation, they may also make possible some small claims that would not otherwise be lodged if they had to be separately litigated. In this way class actions may actually increase, rather than reduce, overall litigation costs. See Weinstein, Some Reflections on the "Abusiveness" of Class Actions, 58 F.R.D. 299, 300 (1973).

n78 Proposed Amendments to Rules of Civil Procedure for the United States District Courts, 39 F.R.D. 69, 103 (1966).

n79 See Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 417 U.S. 156 (1974).

n80 See 7 C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure: Civil § 1755 (1972 & Supp. 1985).

REV_00263688

n81 See Zahn v. International Paper Co., 414 U.S. 291, 301-02 (1973).

n82 See Mullenix, Class Resolution of the Mass Tort Case: A Proposed Federal Procedure Act, 64 Tex. L. Rev. 1039, 1047-60 (1986) (discussing the imperfect fit between Rule 23 and the problems of mass torts).

n83 Rule 23 provides for several situations in which, once a class action is certified, all members must join the class. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(1). These are obviously the most powerful forms of class action because they assure both the maximum economy and the most fidelity to the equity principle. Two are most important to this analysis. In the first, an action can be certifed if separate actions could result in inconsistent verdicts producing incompatible standards of conduct. Id. 23(b)(1)(A). Although this provision may appear to solve the problem that makes collateral estoppel so rarely available in mass disaster litigation, in fact it is inapplicable to cases that pose only the possibility of inconsistent verdicts in claims for money damages. The provision would apply to mass tort litigation only when the defendant simply could not comply with all potential orders that might be issued if the action were not certified for class treatment. See In re Bendectin Prods. Liab. Litig., 749 F.2d 300, 305 (6th Cir. 1984); McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. United States Dist. Court, 523 F.2d 1083, 1086 (9th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 911 (1976).

The second situation in which an action can be certified as mandatory occurs when separate adjudications by some members of the class would be dispositive, as a practical matter, of the interests of other members of the class. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(1)(B). The most important application of this section to mass torts should come in cases of prospective insolvency of the defendant. See Proposed Amendments to Rules of Civil Procedure for the United States District Courts, supra note 78, at 101. Whenever a limited fund (in comparison to the potential damages that are awardable) is available to compensate class members, their interests would be prejudiced if recoveries by early plaintiffs exhausted the defendant's assets. Certification of a class action in such cases promotes equity among plaintiffs by collectivizing the risk of insolvency on the part of the defendant.

Setting aside the difficulties of determining in advance when this threat is sufficiently real to warrant certification, one notable decision threatens this provision's usefulness. In a case growing out of the collapse of the skywalk in the Kansas City Hyatt Hotel in 1981, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit held that the Federal Anti-Injunction Act is violated by mandatory certification when claims by class members are pending in state court. The court reasoned that certification would constitute an injunction against the prosecution of these claims. See In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175, 1180-81 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 988 (1982). If this decision holds, few mass tort claims will be certifiable as mandatory class actions, because of the likelihood that at least one class member will file an action in state court before the time certification would otherwise be granted by the appropriate federal court.

n84 A second weakness of this form of class action, however, may also be a strength. The touchstones for certification of a class action that are optional for class members are the predominance of common questions of law or fact over individual ones and the superiority of class over separate adjudication of the controversy. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3). These two standards are sufficiently vague that courts presented with requests for certification have considerable discretion in deciding whether to certify. For example, the predominance standard does not indicate whether class action treatment is appropriate in cases where different claimants would be subject to the liability rules of different states because of choice of law rules. See In re Northern Dist. of Cal. Dalkon Shield Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 850-52 (9th Cir. 1982) (reversing certification of class action for punitive damages that involved plaintiffs from 50 states). Nor does the superiority requirement preclude certification on the ground that the cost of individual litigation would be prohibitive.

REV_00263689

When this discretion is combined with that entailed in the courts' authority under Rule 23 to certify actions with respect to particular subclasses and issues, see Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(4), the flexibility of the Rule and the power of the judge presented with a request for certification of optional actions is apparent. See, e.g., Ouellette v. International Paper Co., 86 F.R.D. 476, 480 (D. Vt. 1980); Payton v. Abbott Labs, 83 F.R.D. 382, 387 (D. Mass. 1979), vacated on grounds that a predominance of common issues no longer existed, 100 F.R.D. 336 (D. Mass. 1983). Through these devices the courts can assure that common issues are decided in common, while they resolve separately issues and problems which do not warrant common treatment. Nonetheless, this flexibility and discretion have prompted some courts to take to heart the Advisory Committee's 1966 dictum and to refuse to certify individual issues that might well be better resolved through class treatment, on the ground that common questions did not predominate over individual ones. See, e.g., In re Three Mile Island Litig., 87 F.R.D. 433, 441-42 (M.D. Pa. 1980).

n85 See, e.g., In re Northern Dist. of Cal. Dalkon Shield Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 853-55 (9th Cir. 1982).

n86 For an argument in favor of vastly increased use of class actions in mass exposure cases, see Rosenberg, supra note 39, at 908-16.

n87 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(4).

n88 See, e.g., In re Bendectin Prods. Liab. Litig., 102 F.R.D. 239 (S.D. Ohio) (judge certified class for settlement purposes only), appeal dismissed sub. nom. Schreier v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceutical, Inc., 745 F.2d 58 (6th Cir.) (mem.), mandamus to vacate certification, 749 F.2d 300 (6th Cir. 1984); In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 93 F.R.D. 415, 419 (W.D. Mo.) (judge certified a "non-opt out" class), vacated, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 988 (1982); In re Northern Dist. of Cal. Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 521 F. Supp. 1188, 1192-95 (N.D. Cal.) (judge certified a nationwide class on punitive damages issue and a statewide class for common liability issues), modified, 526 F. Supp. 887 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982); Payton v. Abbott Labs, 83 F.R.D. 382, 387 (D. Mass. 1979) (judge certified class for resolution of particular issues).

n89 "But supposing a state of facts often repeated in practice, is it to be imagined that the court is to go on leaving the standard to the jury forever? Is it not manifest, on the contrary, that if the jury is, on the whole, as fair a tribunal as it is represented to be, the lesson which can be got from that source will be learned? Either the court will find that the fair teaching of experience is that the conduct complained of usually is or is not blameworthy, and therefore, unless explained, is or is not a ground of liability; or it will find the jury oscillating to and fro, and will see the necessity of making up its mind for itself." O. Holmes, The Common Law 98 (1881).

n90 In the few situations that are sufficiently homogeneous to warrant the treatment Holmes recommended -- rear-end collisions, for example -- settlements in the shadow of the legal rule occur so frequently that the cases are litigated only rarely.

n91 For an argument that even the traditional tort law system fails to achieve its deterrence goals, see Sugarman, Doing Away with Tort Law, 73 Calif. L. Rev. 555, 559-91 (1985).

n92 See Institute of Medicine, Vaccine Supply and Innovation 118-19 (1985); Dewes, Economic Incentives for Controlling Industrial Disease: The Asbestos Case, 15 J. Legal Stud. 289 (1986); Kitch, The Vaccine Dilemma, Issues in Sci. & Tech., Winter 1986, at 108; Huber, Safety and the Second Best: The Hazards of Public Risk Management in the Courts, 85 Colum. L. Rev. 277 (1985).

n93 See Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 9601-9657 (1982).

REV_00263690

n94 See Federal Mine Safety and Health Act (as amended by the Black Lung Benefits Reform Act), 30 U.S.C. § 902 (1982).

n95 See, e.g., Superfund Section 301(e) Study Group, Injuries and Damages from Hazardous Wastes -- Analysis and Improvement of Legal Remedies, Senate Comm. on Env't & Pub. Works, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. 193-254 (1982) [hereinafter Study Group Report]; Elliott, supra note 41, at 1359-60; Pierce, Encouraging Safety: The Limits of Tort Law and Government Regulation, 33 Vand. L. Rev. 1281, 1321-22 (1980). For a criticism of the approach, see Rabin, supra note 39, at 45-50.

n96 See infra notes 110-116 and accompanying text.

n97 See Pierce, Institutional Aspects of Tort Reform, 73 Calif. L. Rev. 917, 937-39 (1985).

n98 As I suggested above, fidelity to the equity principle is not always a virtue. A fund would have the capacity to make compensation decisions categorically; but this would be a capacity to be categorically incorrect as well as categorically correct. Instead of hedging in the manner of the current system by limiting the scope of the equity principle, a fund would take a different approach: it would hedge by exercising restraint in designating compensable events and by periodically revising the probability calculations and presumptions on which its measure of compensation would be based.

n99 See Study Group Report, supra note 95, at 213-19.

n100 For a discussion of the accuracy implications of the different rules governing the proof of causation in conventional tort law, see Rosenberg, supra note 39, at 861-77.

n101 This would create a two-tiered system resembling that proposed by the Superfund Study Group. See Study Group Report, supra note 95, at 193-205.

n102 This suggestion is derived from Professor Mark Roe's ingenious proposal for compensating tort claimants in bankruptcy reorganizations based on an analogy to a variable annuity. See Roe, supra note 62, at 871-74.

n103 Chemical feedstocks are basic chemical compounds used to produce more complex, sometimes hazardous substances.

n104 For a more detailed analysis, see K. Abraham, supra note 12, at 53-54.

n105 Such incentives are weakest when the potential dangers are unknown and a research focus therefore is not preordained, when the necessary research requires a high capital investment, and when the industry in question is relatively unconcentrated.

n106 See Sugarman, supra note 91, at 636-41.

n107 See, e.g., United States v. Chem-Dyne Corp., 572 F. Supp. 802 (S.D. Ohio 1983).

n108 While the question has not been completely settled, retroactive assessments of this sort probably are constitutional. See Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., 428 U.S. 1 (1975) (upholding legislation which provided for retroactive benefits to victims of black lung disease).

n109 Conceivably a crude formula based on the amount of unexhausted coverage could be used. Different percentages would have to be set for primary and excess coverage. A more complicated formula, accounting for the difference between occurrence and claims-made policies, might be required as well. For a description of the difference between occurrence others take place serially over periods of time. [13] Some of the injuries result immediately, while others take years before manifestation. Because not all mass [*850] tort litigation exhibits all the same characteristics, no single solution of "the" mass tort problem can be formulated -- a cluster of problems, rather than a single problem, is involved. Nevertheless, several legal problems that often characterize mass tort litigation can be isolated, and the different ways in which the dilemma of responsibility arises in this litigation can be identified.

REV_00263691

This Part examines five separate common characteristics of mass torts: the size of the legal actions resulting from mass accidents; the nature of the standard of care to be applied in evaluating the defendants' conduct; the variety of problems that plaintiffs encounter in attempting to prove causation; the character of liability rules governing the rights of mass tort claimants against insolvent defendants; and the stress placed on procedural devices to promote equity among claimants and to streamline the work of the legal system.

A. Size

The term "mass tort" itself suggests that the size of mass accidents and the number of parties to the legal action or actions subsequently instituted are essential characteristics. But the size of a lawsuit is not only a defining characteristic of a mass tort action; size is also an important influence on its outcome. A tort action with many parties poses problems different in kind from an action arising out of a traditional, "two-party" accident -- problems which affect the behavior of the parties involved in the lawsuit, the likelihood and content of any settlement, and the ultimate choice between the models of responsibility that govern the litigation.

The behavior of the defendants in actions with one or a few plaintiffs and in mass actions with hundreds of plaintiffs is likely to differ significantly. The defendant (or its liability insurer, or both) in a mass action faces the prospect of very high costs. [14] If all the claims rise or fall together, the incentive to leave no stone unturned in defending is very great; the defendant may invest far more than in a traditional case. In contrast, if the defendant faces a series of suits, each arising out of essentially the same set of facts -- hundreds of users of a particular drug claiming damages for [*851] side effects, for example -- then the defendant has a slightly different, but similar, incentive. Here the defendant may invest more than might otherwise be rational to defend early claims in order to to establish a reputation for toughness, or to generate early evidence that it will prevail in later suits. This strategy may deter later suits or increase the defendant's chances of obtaining favorable settlements. Either incentive threatens to increase the complexity, length, and cost of the litigation in question.

The number of defendants in a mass tort action also may influence the defendants' behavior. Although a group of defendants in a single action may be able to reduce their average costs by joint investment in the proof of common issues, their interests often conflict regarding other issues. [15] The most critical conflict concerns each defendant's relative responsibility for the plaintiffs' losses. When substantive liability rules emphasize individual responsibility, each defendant has an incentive to avoid liability entirely by proving other defendants responsible. Collective responsibility rules may render complete escape from liability more difficult, depending on the nature of the rule and of the defendant, but not necessarily impossible. For instance, a defendant in a market share liability case may try to prove that it had no share of the market relevant to the plaintiff's claims. [16] Regardless of the model of responsibility implicated by the substantive rules, the effort to pin responsibility on other defendants therefore may be more complicated in a mass tort action than the straightforward effort to avoid liability in a typical two-party case.

The possibility of cross-claims among defendants for contribution or indemnity not only increases the number of issues that may have to be litigated; it also may make joint cooperation difficult. For example, the litigation concerning the MGM Grand Hotel fire involved and claims-made insurance policies, see K. Abraham, supra note 12, at 49-51. One model that might be used is the "Wellington Accords" on the contribution responsibilities of the companies providing liability insurance for asbestos manufacturers in cases involving multiple coverage. See Wellington, Asbestos: The Private Management of a Public Problem, 33 Clev. St. L. Rev. 375 (1984-85). But the Wellington Accords were voluntary; a mandatory contribution to a fund established for mass tort claims might be impossible.

REV_00263656

n110 For example, the cost of the Superfund Study Group's proposal, using a no-fault system, has been estimated by the American Insurance Association at $ 29 billion per year. See Connolly, Responses to Kenneth R. Feinberg, 24 Hous. L. Rev. 175, 179 (1987).

n111 One sure way to drive up total compensation costs and thereby undermine any administrative system would be to allow victims to recover both from the fund and to bring tort actions. Even if the tort recovery were reduced by the amount of compensation paid by a fund, many of the defects of the current system would be preserved by such an approach. The recommended preservation of tort claims was thus one of the major defects of the Superfund Study Group's recommendations. See Study Group Report, supra note 95, at 255-71. Yet, as a practical matter, this kind of compromise probably would be necessary to secure political support for the creation of a fund.

n112 The threat of multiple awards for a single course of misconduct has long been a problem in theory. See Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832 (2d Cir. 1967); Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 Mich. L. Rev. 1258 (1976). In recent years the problem has become a practical one as well. See Jeffries, A Comment on the Constitutionality of Punitive Damages, 72 Va. L. Rev. 141 (1986); Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, 49 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1 (1982).

n113 Even this approach would not solve all of the problems in awarding punitive damages in mass tort actions. For example, if the mass accident in question caused serial injuries, the fund could not bring a punitive damage action until a considerable portion of those injuries had manifested themselves, yet it would not always be easy for the administrators of the fund to determine when that point had been reached.

n114 Under this approach an award of punitive damages should be sought by the fund whenever there are substantial injuries caused by an identifiable responsible party but a large portion of these injuries have not generated successful claims against the fund. This might occur in a number of situations. Injured persons might not know they are injured, or the fund might be unable to distinguish those entitled to compensation from those not entitled, but nevertheless be able to say how many persons in the aggregate had been injured by the responsible party. The amount of damages awarded should reflect the cost of injuries, including pain and suffering, which otherwise would not be internalized by the responsible party.

Why, then, should the term "punitive" damages be used to describe an award that would be designed so clearly to achieve the ends normally understood to be served by awards of compensatory damages -- the promotion of optimal deterrence? Proponents of a fund would have to make the following argument: traditionally, punitive damages are available in tort when the defendant has acted recklessly or with malicious intent to cause harm. In these cases, the expected cost of the risk taken by the defendant far exceeds the cost of avoiding it; therefore, a defendant faced with the prospect of liability for costs so far in excess of the expected benefits would be reckless (or worse) to risk incurring these costs. A rational defendant would take such a risk only if, in fact, it did not expect to face liability for the full costs of the harms caused by the risk. Therefore, optimal deterrence would be promoted under either the tort system or an administrative fund if the defendant who did not otherwise anticipate bearing full responsibility for compensatory damages would nevertheless be threatened with liability for punitive damages roughly equal to the amount of compensatory damage liability that it would avoid.

REV_00263692

n115 See supra notes 103-106 and accompanying text.

n116 Benefits paid under the Black Lung Program rose from $ 110 million in 1970 to an estimated $ 1.7 billion in 1980. See U.S. Dep't of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, Statistical Abstract of the United States 1984, at 374 (104th ed.). For a description of the program, see Meiser, The Black Lung Benefits Act, 17 Forum 813 (1982).

n117 For example, in 1983 more than 190 million people in the United States had private hospitalization insurance in some form and more than 178 million had insurance against the costs of surgery. See Health Ins. Ass'n of Am., Source Book of 1984-1985 Health Insurance Data 87-88. In 1981 at least 32 million people (some of them included in the figures just cited) had Medicare or Medicaid coverage. See U.S. Dep't of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, supra note 116, at 107. Estimates of those without any health insurance range from 8 to 16 percent of the population. Health Ins. Ass'n of Am., supra, at 9.

n118 See American Council of Life Ins., Life Insurance Fact Book Update 4 (1985).

n119 In 1981, workers' compensation covered 79 million people. See U.S. Dep't of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, supra note 116, at 389.

n120 In 1980, SSDI covered 89.7 million people. See id. at 375.

n121 For example, in 1983 only 24 million people -- slightly more than 20 % of the labor force -- were protected by private, long-term disability insurance, and only about 36 million people were protected by short-term disability insurance. See Health Insurance Ass'n of Am., supra note 117, at 16.

n122 For a recommendation of a combined social/private insurance approach, see Sugarman, supra note 91, at 648-51; see also P. Schuck, supra note 14, at 280 (recommending more first-party insurance in this situation).

n123 For example, in 1984, 93 % of all deaths were from natural causes, whereas 2.4 % were caused by non-motor-vehicle accidents. See American Council of Life Ins., supra note 118, at 43.

n124 See S. Rea, Jr., Disability Insurance and Public Policy (1981).

n125 For a description, see J. Mashaw, Bureaucratic Justice 106-23 (1983).

n126 See supra note 122-23 and accompanying text.

n127 See Health Ins. Ass'n of Am., supra note 117, at 16.

n128 See J. Mashaw, supra note 125, at 109-14.

n129 See K. Abraham, supra note 12, at 78-79.

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 73 Va. L. Rev. 845
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 23, 2001 - 7:46 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

more than one hundred defendants, many with cross-claims against each other. [17] With interests to protect in relation to other defendants, each defendant may wish to appear and examine others in depositions, to propound interrogatories to others, to cross-examine the others' witnesses at trial, and generally to act [*852] independently. The greater the number of defendants in any action, the greater the likelihood of such cross-claims and the greater the cost of the litigation to all parties.

The number of parties involved also affects the plaintiffs' incentives and opportunities. As the number of plaintiffs who are parties to any suit increases, more assets are available to invest in the discovery and proof of common issues. Such cooperation can lower the average cost per party and thereby reduce the pressure on any given plaintiff to settle to protect his investment. With the pressure to settle reduced, the complexity, length, and total cost of the litigation is likely to increase. [18]

The probability that a case will be litigated may be increased not only by the incentives affecting plaintiffs and defendants as a class, but also by the behavior of individual parties. Whenever settlement depends on the cooperation or agreement of certain parties, they may behave strategically by demanding superior treatment as a condition of their agreement. Refusals to settle are not always strategic, however, because a party may occupy a position that legitimately requires special, separate treatment. For instance, to assure that total settlement payments stay within the limits of insurance coverage or other available assets, defendants who are subject to cross-claims by codefendants may need protection against such claims before settling with plaintiffs. Defendants not subject to such cross-claims have no need for this protection. Yet without the cooperation of the latter set of defendants, the former set may be unwilling or unable to settle. [19] In short, the more parties to the litigation, the greater the difficulty of fashioning a settlement to which all essential parties will agree. [20]

Under some circumstances, of course, a combination of incentives in mass tort cases may make settlement more rather than less likely. A defendant facing plaintiffs with pooled resources and more staying power than the typical individual claimant may decide that the necessity of heavy litigation expenditures is not worth [*853] their potential benefit. Major airplane crash litigation apparently follows this pattern, though usually only after substantial investment in the case by both sides. [21] The fear of high litigation costs, in addition to the threat of adverse verdicts, also seems to have motivated the defendants' settlement offers in the Agent Orange and Bendectin litigation. [22] Although the mass character of the litigation in these and similar instances makes settlement more likely, settlement is nevertheless more costly because of the mass character of the cases. Thus, other things being equal, a mass tort claim is likely to be more complex, lengthy, and costly than an equivalent claim involving only two parties. [23]

The complexity and cost of mass injury litigation, however, are only quantitative effects of size; the size of such litigation can render it qualitatively different from ordinary tort cases as well. First, size is part of the reason that the choice between individual and collective models of responsibility can be posed at all. For example, the choice of an appropriate liability standard depends heavily on the incentive effects of the threat that the standard will be applied in the future. The sporadic and isolated imposition of liability in a few unrelated, ordinary accident cases may have little incentive effect on future actors, simply because the cases are sporadic and isolated. Even the threat that a particular standard that has been adopted previously in an ordinary accident case also will be adopted in mass tort cases is far weaker than the message sent when a new standard actually is applied in a mass tort case. A responsibility dilemma therefore is not likely to be acute unless it is posed by the extended set of claims characteristic of mass tort litigation.

Second, only after the scientific community develops at least some knowledge about the causes of injuries at issue in mass tort cases can the legal system even contemplate adopting collective responsibility [*854] rules that displace certain of the problems of tracing individual responsibility. The greater number of injured parties in a mass tort case can be a prerequisite to the development of such knowledge. For example, in some cases the existence of a large number of people with the same disease or injury is necessary to the scientific identification of its cause. [24] The first asbestos worker who contracts lung cancer has a myriad of possible causes to consider, but once many asbestos workers contract the same disease, epidemiologists can begin to make judgments about causation. [25] In contrast, in other instances potential claimants cannot proceed far enough even to have difficulty proving causation, because they cannot identify potentially responsible defendants by analyzing a large number of similar claims.

REV_00263657

In sum, the most salient feature of mass tort litigation is more than a merely definitional property; size also affects the behavior of the litigants, influences their incentives to settle, and helps to create the other legal problems associated with the choice between the individual and collective models of responsibility.

B. The Applicable Standard of Care

The responsibility dilemma characteristic of mass tort litigation emerges again in the choice between fault and non-fault standards of liability. Negligence is generally an individual responsibility standard; strict liability is a feature of regimes weighed more toward collective responsibility. The explanation for this difference involves more than the evident stress on individual fault in negligence law; strict liability sometimes serves as a surrogate that more effectively achieves the aims of negligence law than negligence itself. [26] More importantly, strict liability tends to be imposed at a [*855] higher level of generality than negligence liability. It is applied to categories of activities, with less regard for detailed differences in the behavior of or care taken by individuals or firms comprising these categories. [27] For example, a blaster is strictly liable for injuries caused by that activity, regardless of the time, place, or manner in which the blasting occurs; [28] likewise, the maker of an unreasonably dangerous product is liable for the injuries it causes, despite the amount of care exercised in the product's design and manufacture. [29] Strict liability is imposed because of characteristics that activities share, rather than because of features of behavior that distinguish actors engaging in the same activity.

Despite these collective responsibility implications of strict liability, its use as a standard of care in the typical products liability case is not a major substantive change, because negligence and strict liability ordinarily produce similar outcomes. Although negligence liability requires foreseeability of the risk in question and strict liability does not, usually the risk was foreseeable even if the defendant did not actually foresee it. Others in the industry or the scientific community will have sufficiently recognized the danger to put the defendant on notice of the existence of the risk. In these cases a strict liability standard simply relieves the plaintiff of the burden of proving what probably was the case and probably could be proved. [30]

The collective responsibility implications of strict liability are more prominent, however, in cases where a long-latency period occurs between the exposure to a dangerous substance and the manifestation of a disease caused by the exposure. The longer the latency period after the plaintiff's exposure to the risk created by the defendant, the greater the chance that unforeseen and possibly [*856] unforeseeable risks were recognized only after exposure. The critical issue in such cases is whether the defendant should be held liable for a failure to reduce or to warn of risks that were unknown and unknowable at the time they posed a danger to the plaintiff. The defendant in such a case typically raises a "state of the art" defense based on its inability to discover or understand the danger at the time of the exposure. [31] In effect, the defendant claims that it should not be liable if it were not negligent.

The appeal of this claim to be judged by an individual responsibility standard is strong. On the other hand, requiring a showing of negligence in long-latency cases would place on plaintiffs significant difficulties of proof. Proof of negligence would require a showing that the defendant actually knew of the danger in question -- always a difficult burden to meet -- or that it should have known of the danger. Yet if the defendant, others in the industry, and the scientific community were unaware of the danger, then the plaintiff would be required to prove that the defendant was negligent in conducting insufficient research into the dangers of the product or material in question and that a reasonable level of research would have uncovered the danger. [32]

REV_00263658

Such proof would be enormously complicated, expensive, and difficult. It would involve showing the prospective benefits to the defendant at the time of conducting the research, the prospective costs, and the probability that a reasonable level of research would have uncovered the danger in question. Furthermore, different defendants might have different research obligations, depending on their research capacities and other characteristics. Moreover, all this would have to be proved twenty years or more after the period in question. By imposing strict liability rather than negligence in such cases, the tort system can ignore differences in the prospective benefits and costs to different enterprises of conducting research that would have revealed undiscovered risks; instead, the system holds the industry producing the product or taking the action in question to a collective standard. The drift toward strict [*857] liability in failure to warn cases, therefore, can be explained partially as a reaction to the difficulties of proving negligence in long-latency cases. [33] In these cases strict liability may serve as a surrogate for negligence by overimposing liability (from the standpoint of the negligence standard) less than adherence to a negligence standard would underimpose liability. [34]

A different justification must be provided for imposing strict liability in long-latency cases in which a reasonable level of research would not have uncovered the risk that culminated years later in mass injuries. Here strict liability is not a surrogate for negligence because the cases do not involve negligence. Instead, the justification for imposing strict liability must rest, if it exists at all, on the impact on future actors of the threat of strict liability. This threat may encourage additional research by future actors into the risks posed by their activities [35] or may influence levels of activity and production unaffected by the threat of negligence liability. [36]

Underlying this kind of justification for the imposition of strict liability in conventional cases, however, there has always seemed to be an unstated moral predicate. This predicate is that a standard of care that imposes liability on a defendant and thereby "uses" that defendant to influence future actors is morally acceptable if the defendant could have predicted such a use of strict liability. Thus the moral acceptability of strict liability stems from its predictability. Predictability subjects the actual defendant to all of the incentive effects that the threat of strict liability produces and eliminates the "use" of the defendant only as a means to influence others.

Prediction becomes more difficult, however, as the period between the time an enterprise tries to predict its liability for present actions and the time liability actually is imposed increases. To the extent an enterprise now subject to suit could not have predicted the imposition of strict liability, no incentives were created by that [*858] prospect, and the justification for imposing strict liability can only be its impact on the future actors who can now anticipate strict liability. Under such circumstances the defendant is used only to influence the behavior of others. Thus, strict liability has the greatest potential to use defendants as a means to an end unrelated to their past actions in long-latency cases.

This phenomenon is perhaps the strongest example of the way in which the adoption of strict liability in long-latency cases collectivizes responsibility when injuries are largely unpredictable. In the first decade or two after a strict liability standard is adopted, its imposition holds past actors responsible for the consequences of their own actions, but the exclusive purpose of imposing liability is to influence others. In effect, the law enlists past actors in service of its effort to control future actors -- it holds the former collectively responsible for influencing the behavior of the latter.

REV_00263659

Unfortunately, the most obvious method of avoiding this "retroactive" imposition of obligations -- prospective announcement of a new rule of liability -- would be feasible in this field only in the most attenuated way. Because of the long-latency periods involved, the prospective rule could not have an immediate effect on litigation, but could apply only to those claims resulting from exposures that occur after the time when potential defendants could reasonably have predicted the ultimate imposition of strict liability. If this watershed point were to lie somewhere in the mid-1970's, then a strict liability rule announced prospectively today would not begin to have application until the late-1990's, when injuries from exposures occurring after the watershed would manifest themselves.

This would be an odd-looking rule indeed. More important, it would be a rule that might not achieve its aims. Current actors could not be confident that such a rule would be applied when the first opportunities for application would not occur for ten years or more. Because such a threat lacks credibility, its incentive effects might be weak. Therefore, the need to make the threat to impose strict liability in future cases credible may explain its current imposition in cases involving actions that occurred before the state of the art could anticipate such liability, and from which the typical moral predicate for the imposition of liability is absent.

At this point in the analysis, two ways in which strict liability takes a step toward collective responsibility have emerged. First, strict liability, much more than negligence liability, embodies a [*859] standard of conduct that results in liability for ordinary rather than exceptional activity. A finding of strict liability makes a statement about an activity, not an actor alone, and is therefore a statement about all who are engaged in the activity. It is like a finding that an entire industry is negligent as a matter of law, though without the fault implied by such a finding. [37] Second, in long-latency cases that disallow a state-of-the-art defense, current defendants bear the cost of making a credible threat to impose liability on future defendants, and are held responsible so that the system can control the behavior of others.

These are only small steps toward collective responsibility. To judge an individual defendant by a standard that applies to the actions of a group of actors is not to impose liability on the group; to impose liability on an individual actor primarily to affect the behavior of others imposes a kind of vicarious, rather than overtly collective, responsibility. Nonetheless, the rise of strict liability, especially in long-latency cases, portends more direct forms of collective responsibility, because the imposition of strict liability begins to dissolve the conceptual boundaries between individual actors. If a defendant is held liable because of the nature of the activity in which it and others engage, despite differences in the manner of conducting the activity, the differences between the actors are submerged. If a defendant is held liable for actions which posed unpredictable risks solely in order to influence others' behavior now, an otherwise important difference between them -- their control over different sets of events -- is ignored. These small movements toward collective responsibility grow larger in the new doctrines governing causation.

C. Proof of Causation

It should come as no surprise that proving causation often is especially difficult in mass tort cases. The factors that render causal relations unclear and knowledge about the risk posed by a variety of hazards underdeveloped at the time of trial are likely to be the same ones that hindered the enterprise's ability to make sophisticated risk-safety calculations in the first place. An enterprise that [*860] cannot predict the consequences of its actions with the requisite degree of certainty may not invest in the degree of loss prevention that, with hindsight, would have been optimal. The result may be mass exposure to risk and potentially massive injury.

REV_00263660

To meet traditional burdens of proof in a regime that emphasizes individual responsibility, the plaintiff must show what I shall call substance, source, and exposure causation. That is, he must prove that the substance for which the defendant is responsible can cause his injury or disease, that the defendant and not someone else was the source of the substance, and that he was in fact exposed to the substance in a way that has caused his disease. In many cases proof of some of these elements is simple; in some cases, proof of one automatically proves another. For example, when a particular disease is caused almost exclusively by a particular substance, the occurrence of the disease is the substance's "signature." [38] Proof that the plaintiff has the disease, therefore, is also proof of both exposure and substance causation. In many cases, however, meeting the traditional burden of proof as to each of these elements is no minor accomplishment.

Probably no doctrinal requirement has more troubled the courts in mass injury cases than the traditional rule that the plaintiff bears the burden of proving causation. [39] One reason for the problem is the long-latency period associated with diseases caused by dangerous exposures to certain drugs, toxic chemicals, or hazardous waste. [40] Because the period between the exposure allegedly producing the disease and the manifestation of the disease can be twenty years or more, [41] evidence of any connection between the defendant's actions and the plaintiff's loss may often have disappeared or become unavailable.

[*861] Another reason proving causation is so troubling in mass tort cases is that scientific knowledge often is insufficient to allow a firm conclusion about the cause of the plaintiff's injury. Clinical and epidemiological studies may support the conclusion that exposure to a substance for which the defendant is responsible may have been a cause of the plaintiff's loss; such studies may even provide some guidance as to the probability of this causal connection. Their value is often limited, however, because they will not support the traditionally required inference that the defendant was more probably than not a cause. [42] The difficulties of proof are no less troubling when the question is how much of plaintiff's damages were caused by each defendant, even assuming that together the defendants are responsible for all such damages. [43]

The pressure to relax the traditional burdens of proof regarding causation and apportionment of damages has been strong. Without such relaxation often the plaintiff will fail, notwithstanding the appeal of his claim and the probability that the defendant or defendants have caused injuries to someone, even if not to the plaintiff. [44] The courts have responded to the pressure with a series of doctrinal innovations that adopt a more collective focus than the rules they replace.

The new rules can shift the burdens of proof and adopt a more collective emphasis in several ways. In signature disease cases, market share liability entirely relieves the plaintiff of the burden of proving source causation. That burden is shifted to the defendants, who normally are unable to disprove causation and therefore bear liability collectively, albeit in proportion to their market shares. The defendants in signature disease cases have not necessarily [*862] acted collectively to cause plaintiff's damages, although sometimes the actions of each contributed. [45] Rather, market share liability is an effort to impose collective responsibility in a way that mirrors the amount of each defendant's individual responsibility: it is a surrogate for individual responsibility. [46]

Joint and several liability imposed on independent tortfeasors -- another method of shifting the burden of proof -- has even more collective effects for two reasons. First, the amount of liability imposed bears no necessary relation to the degree of responsibility of any particular defendant for the plaintiff's injury. In certain cases the amount of liability imposed may not even reflect the probability that a particular defendant is responsible at all. [47] Second, because each defendant bears the risk of the others' insolvencies, it may have to pay both its own non-causal share and a portion of the shares of codefendants. Shifting the burden of apportioning damages to a group of defendants, each of whom has caused an undetermined part of a plaintiff's injuries, also is a collective response to the causation problem, because if

REV_00263661

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined (i)
Terms: "punitive damages" and "mass torts" and date(aft 1997) and settlement and terrorism (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*2001 U. Ill. L. Rev. 947, **

Copyright (c) 2001 The University of Illinois University of Illinois Law Review

2001

2001 U. Ill. L. Rev. 947

LENGTH: 13743 words

ARTICLE: COMPENSATION FOR MASS PRIVATE DELICTS: EVOLVING ROLES OF ADMINISTRATIVE, CRIMINAL, AND TORT LAW

Jack B. Weinstein*

* Senior Judge, Eastern District of New York. Thanks are due to Adam Zimmerman, Esq., Gregory S. Chernack, Esq., Edwin J. Wesely, Esq., Professor Norman Abrams, and Professor Victor J. Stone, for their assistance with this paper. Many others with specialized knowledge made helpful comments, some of which are referred to in the footnotes that follow.

SUMMARY:
... This paper begins an exploration of the evolving role of administrative, criminal, and tort law in compensating victims and deterring mass delicts. ... Part IV highlights how increased use of compensation in criminal and administrative law has been accompanied by curbs to limit recovery in the tort system. ... In some ways this development is a return to an earlier time, in the long-ago past of criminal and tort law. ... It provided for an administrative agency (overseen by a special master) to hear claims against the airlines (and possibly others) and provide swift compensation. ... In the past century tort law has expanded its primary role to compensate. ... Also pending were a class action in the Southern District of New York and an action brought by the SEC in the District of Columbia. ... The Trend Against Compensating Victims Through the Tort System ... It allows the federal courts to throttle private state tort law. ... First, the tort system can provide more flexible forms of recovery. ... Even a balanced administrative-criminal-tort system will pose challenges. ... C. The Role of the Tort System ...

In this essay, the Honorable Judge Weinstein explores the "evolving role of administrative, criminal and tort law in compensating victims and deterring mass delicts." This essay, originally delivered as part of the Paul M. Van Arsdell Lecture, at the University of Illinois College of Law, begins by discussing the evolution of these three models in compensating victims of mass torts, and how recent developments have led these three models to overlap. Administrative law is primarily designed to prevent mass torts through regulation. Changes in discovery rules, as well as long-arm statutes, among other factors, have begun to favor "those seeking private remedies in the courts." The evolution of criminal law beyond the protection of the public can be seen through the increased use of fines and forfeitures in criminal proceedings, although this trend has the effect of reducing the amount available to pay victims restitution. In part III, Judge Weinstein provides recent examples of this trend towards overlap in federal district court as well as in administrative law. Parts IV and V suits. [101]

Transaction costs to society and in compensating victims can be very high. It has been estimated that such costs of the tort system in dealing with products liability and environmental claims consume up to two-thirds of the resources that society devotes to resolving such claims; only about one-third of total outlays by the parties and the court system [*971] is paid as compensation to successful plaintiffs. [102] In the DES cases, a defense attorney suggested to me that transaction costs in that litigation consumed almost ninety percent of the total award to victims. This was probably true at the earlier stages of the controversy when many cases were being contested. Now that settlements take place on a privately administered matrix basis with the help of a court appointed special master, the transaction costs are probably no longer excessive.

Despite these costs, on balance, I think the tort model provides a distinctly democratic and effective means for protecting victims and ensuring that their injuries are properly compensated. [103] On the whole, the tort system provides more flexible forms of relief, prevents agency capture, promotes vigilance of both producers and the public, spreads information relevant to the public interest, and displays sensitivity to populations not always served by the general political process.

First, the tort system can provide more flexible forms of recovery. Considerations long associated with equity jurisprudence have motivated many of the procedural and substantive responses of American courts to problems posed by complex multi-party, multi-issue mass tort cases. [104] Many mass tort resolutions have moved away from the traditional courtroom individual remedies, and have instead set up aggregated settlements, compensation-administrative plans, and insurance-type installment payment programs supervised by the courts. [105]

Second, the tort model can reduce tendencies toward "agency capture." [106] While government has a vital role in our society's health, I have an inherent distrust of government as the sole protector of our rights and [*972] safety. [107] Administrative agencies are subject to political pressures not to regulate too stringently; the finances of agencies can be cut if enforcement policies of the executive or legislature change; pressure to appoint administrators favorable to industry sometimes exists; and there is a movement to and from private industry that can create conflicts. [108] In sum, agencies are susceptible to the needs of the industry they are charged with regulating.

Admittedly, the recommendation of the American Law Institute regarding regulatory preclusion of private actions does have a certain charm in its symmetry. As Professor Richard B. Stewart posits, the recommendations do streamline the "two track" system of tort and administrative law (but not the third track of criminal law). [109] Nevertheless, as regulatory failures with a host of products suggest - from Asbestos to tires to the Zeppelin - tort law often provides more reliable, open, and politics-free protection to the public. [110]

[*973] Third, I believe there is a distinct, continuing, and prominent role for private litigation and entrepreneurial private attorneys in this field. [111] Both the criminal and administrative agencies are somewhat less tenacious in pursuing delictors than private civil attorneys induced by their desire to earn fees and of private litigants for personal vindication. [112]

Fourth, private litigation is good at exposing bad acts. As contrasted with the Continental and English civil systems, which place premiums on secrecy and confidentiality, U.S. courts provide for liberal discovery rules, open courtrooms, and presumptions in favor of unsealing documents that may involve the public interest. [113] The U.S. court system is able to make bad acts visible and subject to public discussion in ways that administrative FOIA requests sometimes cannot. [114]

REV_00263704

The tort model also provides sensitivity to populations otherwise under-served by administrative and prosecutorial action. [115] This is true [*974] not only of the large desegregation, prison, discrimination, and disability cases, but also in environmental and consumer regulation. [116]

In sum, these features of the private civil system provide a democratic addition to administrative and criminal forms of compensation. This private counterweight is a critical component of American jurisprudence. At an international conference in Geneva on class actions and other methods of compensating masses of injured people, I was struck by what I took to be an underlying assumption of Europe, South America, and the Far East. They emphasize a "top-down" approach: the government and other agencies provide protection and compensation for those injured without much say by the individual. [117]

In contrast, the U.S. civil system is, I suggest, one of "bottom-up." The individual, through his or her attorney, defends and prosecutes private rights against corporations, the government (subject to the somewhat outdated and unjust governmental immunity defenses), and others. The attitudes of American society obviously affect its view of courts and litigation. From the outset, the colonies and subsequently the postrevolutionary generations showed a sense of private independence and initiative somewhat different from that of the British Empire and other nations. [118] This tradition continues today in the evolution of American law.

[*975]

VI. Opportunities and Difficulties in Integrating the Three Models

As the attack continues on our traditional tort system and as its role is attenuated in remedying large-scale injuries, we should ask: How can we design our hydra-headed system to compensate individuals fairly and efficiently? How can we maintain the tort system's known advantages in compensating for mass disasters while effectively utilizing the criminal and administrative system to ensure that those injured receive adequate compensation at reasonable cost? I believe that an integrated administrative-criminal-tort system offers distinct advantages even though it presents difficulties and risks.

First, I want to discuss how the growing use of the criminal and administrative system to compensate individuals ironically tends to alienate individual victims from the legal process. Second, I will highlight the risks and advantages of a fully integrated system. Finally, I will underscore the valuable role the tort system can continue to play in compensating individuals fairly, reducing transactional inefficiency, and deterring future bad acts.

A. Alienation of Individuals from the Legal Process

Ultimately, the developments I have already described present a serious risk: they will further alienate individual victims from the legal process. As described in the last section, the traditional tort model can be more "democratic" because the individual litigant plays a central role. By contrast, the tendency in administrative and criminal law is to favor the government's position over that of the person injured. [119] As I have noted, there is pressure on the courts to reduce private mass litigation. [120] These tendencies disfavor the tort leg of the compensation stool and threaten our "bottom-up" jurisprudence.

[*976] Individuals are squeezed out of the legal process in other ways as well. Victims now have a right to be heard at sentencing, particularly for purposes of restitution, as well as in some rule-making and other decisions of administrative agencies. [121] Yet those seeking to be protected or compensated are usually only peripheral players in the administrative and criminal law systems. [122] By contrast, in civil litigation, the individual harmed has a right to be heard from the outset and throughout. Even in class and other mass actions, more and more attorneys remain in contact with their clients through group meetings, telephone exchanges, and new mediums like e-mail and the Web. [123] Additionally, those claiming injury have an absolute right to be heard in any fairness hearing held by the court before approval of a class settlement. [124]

REV_00263705

We must also consider the different legal burdens a victim assumes in order to receive compensation. If a victim must rely on the criminal system to receive compensation, the prosecutor must satisfy the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard of guilt and demonstrate that a defendant acted with the requisite mens rea, which usually requires a subjective intent to harm. [125] In comparison, the traditional tort model requires proof of negligence only by a preponderance of the evidence. Under the civil standard, it is more likely that victims will be compensated. The compassion of jurors for persons like themselves who have been injured also places victims at an advantage in civil trials. This may be particularly true of previously unprotected groups. [126]

[*977] The burden in administrative cases varies. Usually a government agency must merely demonstrate something by a preponderance of the evidence; [127] occasionally it must demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence. [128] Hence, the ability to obtain recovery usually - albeit not always - requires no greater burden than in civil cases, and sometimes the practical burden is less than it would be in a civil case. [129] Because of these differences, it is possible that a civil or administrative action can succeed where an earlier criminal case failed. This may be particularly true for minorities. [130]

B. Advantages and Disadvantages of Full Integration

Even a balanced administrative-criminal-tort system will pose challenges. A fully integrated system increases the burden of coordination among parties, stimulates the creation of federal barriers for private litigants, and may induce excessive recoveries. Overall, however, a coordinated tort - administrative - criminal system will reduce the threat of duplicative litigation, give judges a more complete picture of victims' needs, and provide opportunities for more creative remedies.

1. Disadvantages

i. Coordination

A potential difficulty with an integrated system is that any coordination among governmental agencies, prosecutors, private attorneys, and the courts can slow ultimate disposition. Nevertheless, particularly if private attorneys recognize the advantage of cooperation with criminal and administrative agencies in their private suits, they can be expected to try to expedite the matter in order to obtain their fee. [131] Moreover, if a single [*978] broad settlement - such as in a generic drug case - can be reached, the need for multiple actions can be eliminated.

ii. Restrictive Legislation and Federalism

There is the possibility that coordination will encourage those who oppose private recovery to enact legislation requiring permission from the relevant governmental agency before bringing class actions. [132] A threat to our federalism exists if the more potent federal criminal-administrative-civil litigation triumvirate overwhelms the state Erie tort approach. Preemption increases the threat to private civil litigation; but it does not seem a serious impediment to civil actions at the moment. [133]

iii. Excessive (or Inadequate) Recoveries

REV_00263706

The use of criminal law and administrative law as a club to induce excessive (or inadequate) recoveries presents risks of abuse, but these risks can be guarded against. The courts have felt no compunction about reviewing unfair administrative action. Criminal law rights and forfeiture rights have been protected by both Congress and the courts against overreaching. [134]

As a matter of policy the criminal system should not occupy a central role in providing for private compensation. This is true regardless of the mental state required for the particular crime charged. Criminal convictions still carry a great stigma of moral turpitude, even in regulatory offense crimes where mens rea is minimal. [135] The system should not force a defendant into settling unfair civil claims in order to avoid a criminal prosecution.

If we are to provide fair remedies (in and out of the courtroom), Congress and the courts should ensure that criminal and administrative proceedings do not overshadow the tort system. If, however, there is a good independent reason to bring administrative or criminal proceedings, [*979] private compensation through restitution or disgorgement as a collateral matter is appropriate. [136]

2. Advantages

i. Duplicative Litigation

The integrated model offers several advantages. First, if all three prongs can be combined in the same court, the threat of duplicative litigation is minimized. Lawyers and judges who are familiar with the case can work together to bring about a speedy termination of the dispute. The possibility of a global settlement increases.

ii. Equitable Allocation and Restitution

The judge who has all aspects of the case before him or her is able to get a complete picture of the entire group of victims and of the defendant. This permits allocation of the defendant's resources in the most equitable manner. It also minimizes the risk that the defendant will hide his or her assets. The danger that plaintiffs in another civil action will be shortchanged is reduced. [137] By ensuring that the victims are heard in any related proceeding, a judge can guarantee that they are not forgotten or crushed by an overly bureaucratic process.

iii. Flexible Relief

Finally, a more integrated system has advantages in designing the form of relief and how it is allocated. For example, the so-called fluid recovery in a class action or a private action based upon damage, in nuisance cases, to the community generally (rather than to individuals seeking compensation), permits private persons and private attorneys to accomplish some of the things the government should be doing through executive, legislative, administrative, or criminal action. [138] Private actions by individuals or private nongovernmental groups to obtain remedies for the population generally against abuses in prisons, mental institutions, [*980] schools, toxic dumps, or the like are in this category. By combining the skills and resources of government prosecutors, administrators, and the private bar, an integrated model provides new opportunities for community protection. As already noted, to the extent that the administrative and criminal systems eliminate all the benefits of noncompliance with the law, punitive damages in civil suits can be eliminated, leaving the private action to deal only with pure compensation. [139]

C. The Role of the Tort System

The private tort model plays a valuable role in this integrated system. [140] Without an effective procedure for obtaining compensation for large numbers of people injured through the tortuous conduct of malefactors, most of the injured would be uncompensated and the tortfeasor would not pay the full social cost of its activities. Consolidations, advertisements by plaintiffs' counsel, contingency fees, class actions, and the whole panoply of organizational approaches we have developed for private enforcement of private rights are essential in a society as complex as ours. We should not dismantle or substantially reduce the private tort model solely in reliance on the administrative and criminal law models. Cooperation among them to increase transactional efficiency and reduce costs to defendants, plaintiffs and the government should be encouraged.

REV_00263707

An approach to conflicts of laws and jurisdiction that will permit one court to apply one rule of law and one procedural system in conducting one litigation involving one related series of dispute is desirable. [141] It is useful, where the dispute is pending in different federal courts, to have multiple actions consolidated before one judge. Transfers, either pursuant to 1404 of title 28 of the U.S. Code or by the multidistrict panel, or by stays of cases pending in other federal district or state courts should be utilized where appropriate to put all related proceedings - civil, administrative, and criminal - before the same judge. [142]

In the federal system, transfer by the multidistrict panel to one court can be only for pretrial purposes, [143] although that centralization often results in a settlement. A federal civil case can more easily be transferred to the place where the criminal case is pending [144] because venue [*981] rules are stricter for criminal than for civil cases. [145] If the cases are pending in the state and federal systems, or in a number of states, consolidation becomes difficult, although there are limited provisions for stays and for removal of some matters from state to federal court. [146] Statutory authority for more comprehensive consolidation would be useful. [147]

VII. Conclusion

Ours is a mixed economy and legal system, energized by private entrepreneurship, government responsibility, and charitable communal impulse. All elements have their roles. Often these roles overlap. How all of our institutions can work together without impinging on and reducing the effectiveness of each presents intriguing problems for the law and for society.

It is natural for administrative lawyers and criminal prosecutors to resent private attorneys piggy-backing on their work to bring large civil suits with high fees. Yet, as evidenced by examples such as the Rubin case, administrative agencies are sometimes ill-suited to aggressively retrieve money on behalf of private plaintiffs. There are many cases of the government itself contracting out private collection services. Private lawyers can be extremely competent and innovative in pursuing damages.

As Professors Goldberg and Zipinsky write, private litigation protects the "default norm that the civil justice system will provide a remedy for every wrong." [148] Efforts should be made to ensure that the private attorneys, motivated by fees, are available. [149]

Private counsel can assist in gathering facts and in advising and quieting the fears of clients. They have an important role in our judicial system. Our "bottom-up" approach to protection of individuals should not be abandoned or hobbled. Excessive fees can be avoided, but adequate fees that will nurture a strong bar - capable of protecting individual rights generally and their clients' rights particularly - should be maintained in any joint criminal-administrative-private integrated proceeding. [150]

[*982] It would be useful for the government agencies involved - state and federal - together with the private bar to work out policies for cooperation, perhaps through such associations as the American Law Institute or the American Bar Association's Section on Litigation. Appropriate administrative rule making and amendments of sentencing guidelines and the Attorney General's guidelines need consideration. [151]

REV_00263708

The courts must ensure fairness. The threat of administrative or criminal action to force a civil settlement would be particularly dangerous. Nor should a civil settlement allow the "buying-off" of a justifiable criminal or administrative proceeding.

More complex technology, globalization of communication, aggregation of production and distribution entities, and growth and urbanization of populations all conspire to make more effective methods for compensating large numbers of those injured by mass delicts desirable - whether through private suits, criminal prosecutions, administrative actions, mediation and arbitration, or a combination of them. [152]

FOOTNOTES:

n1. Various devices are designed to keep cases out of the courts. An example is the "lemon laws" designed to give purchasers of automobiles and other machinery a right to exchange defective purchases, see, e.g., Sarah Hale, Mechanics Fuming Over Veto, Newsday, Feb. 25, 2000, at A5 (discussing veto of bill to permit return to manufacturers of defective emission-testing equipment similar to automobile lemon law) and of New York's extensive mediation services, see Deborah Hensler, A Research Agenda: What We Need to Know About Court Connected ADR, A.B.A. Disp. Resol. Mag., Fall 1999, at 15; Samuel Estreicher & Kenneth J. Turnbull, Class Actions and Arbitration, 233 N.Y. L.J. 3 (2000); David Gladwell, Modern Litigation Culture, the First Six Months of the Civil Justice Reforms in England and Wales, 19 Civ. Just. Q. 9 (2000); Relevant Civil Procedure Rules Adopted by British Judiciary, April 26, 1999 (Rule 1.4(2) (courts can encourage alternate dispute resolution where appropriate)); Sol Schreiber & Laura Weisenbach, In re Estate of Ferdinand E. Marcos Human Rights Litigation: The Personal Account of the Role of the Special Master, 31 Loy. L. Rev. 475 (1998); Jack B. Weinstein, Some Benefits and Risks of Privatization of Justice Through ADR, 11 Ohio St. J. Disp. Resol. 241 (1996) [hereinafter Weinstein, Benefits & Risks]; Jack B. Weinstein, Preliminary Thoughts on Alternate Dispute Resolution (Apr. 2000) [hereinafter Weinstein, Preliminary Thoughts] (International Law Conference, Nicosia, Cyprus) (unpublished) (on file with the University of Illinois Law Review) and citations therein. Even the university disciplinary system may be used to keep grievances and financial claims out of the courts. See Letter from Professor Norman Abrams, to author (Oct. 9, 2000) (on file with the University of Illinois Law Review). For a chart suggesting the relatively small proportion of possible compensation cases that go through the civil court system to trial, see Jack B. Weinstein, The Restatement of Torts and the Courts, 54 Vand. L. Rev. 1439, 1445 (2001) [hereinafter Weinstein, Restatement].

n2. This development is not new. From the earliest days of the modern derivative suit and class action, a strong relationship between the plaintiffs' bar and the government developed through the receipt from the latter of information about acts of putative defendants that might provide a basis for private mass actions. In the thirties and since, for example, much of the private securities litigation depended upon reports required by the S.E.C. and investigations by it, Congress and the Department of Justice, and prosecutions based on violations of federal and state securities acts. E.g., David Ratner & Thomas Lee Hazen, Securities Regulation 12 (5th ed. 1966).

n3. For my views of Alternate Dispute Resolution, see, e.g., Weinstein, Benefits and Risks, supra note 1; Weinstein, Preliminary Thoughts, supra note 1; see also, e.g., Emmanuel Gaillard, The New ADR Rules of the International Chamber of Commerce, N.Y. L.J., Oct. 10, 2001, at 3 (ICC Court of Arbitration expansion as "the world's pre-eminent arbitration institution"). As applied to employer-employee disputes, ADR may be substantially tilting the law away from protections of workers.

REV_00263709

n4. E.g., F. H. Lawson et al., Amos and Walton's Introduction to French Law 200 (3d ed. 1967)

If criminal proceedings have been initiated, the victim may elect to work out his civil remedies in a separate civil action before the civil courts, or to intervene as civil party in the criminal proceedings. In the former case the civil action must be stayed while the penal action is being prosecuted, with a view to preventing contradictory findings of fact. In the latter case the penal and civil actions are considered simultaneously by the criminal court, which may both punish the wrongdoer in accordance with the criminal law and indemnify the victim in accordance with the civil law. A person who has suffered loss as a result of the criminal act of another has nearly always a civil remedy, because fault is necessarily present. Before intervening in penal proceedings, however, the victim must consider the prospects of success in the penal action, since, if the case is one within the competence of the tribunal de police or the tribunal correctionnel, civil damages will not be awarded unless the penal action succeeds. If it fails, for example because the prosecution has not proved mens rea, civil damages will not be awarded and a fresh civil action would have to follow. It is otherwise in cases coming before the cour d'assises, where, if negligence is proved, civil damages may be awarded in the absence of proof of mens rea.

Id. (footnotes omitted) (emphasis in original). Stanley S. Arkin, Commencement of Criminal Actions - A More Global View, N.Y. L.J., Oct. 12, 2000, at 3 ("In France, any person or legal entity that claims to have been harmed by a violation of law may bring a civil action to obtain damages... . A claimed victim also has the right, pursuant to the Criminal Code, to bring or participate in, a public criminal action."). Some American states permit private persons to start a criminal action. The federal statutes require the prosecution to commence a criminal action.

n5. 18 U.S.C.A. 1961-1968 (West Supp. 2000). The RICO statute creates a private cause of action based on the criminal violation. A civil suit by the government can provide a wide range of remedies including injunction and disgorgement of profits. The stigma of being labeled a "racketeer" should not induce settlement of the civil and criminal actions. E.g., Falise v. Am. Tobacco Co., 94 F. Supp. 2d 316 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); Nat'l Asbestos Workers Med. Fund v. Philip Morris, Inc., 74 F. Supp. 2d 221 (E.D.N.Y. 1999); Nat'l Asbestos Workers Med. Fund v. Philip Morris, Inc., 71 F. Supp. 2d 139 (E.D.N.Y. 1999); Blue Cross & Blue Shield of N.J., Inc. v. Philip Morris, Inc., 113 F. Supp. 2d 345 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); Blue Cross & Blue Shield of N.J., Inc. v. Philip Morris, Inc., 36 F. Supp. 2d 560 (E.D.N.Y. 1999); Simon v. Philip Morris, Inc., 86 F. Supp. 2d 95 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); United States v. Philip Morris, Inc., 116 F. Supp. 2d 131, 155 (D.D.C. 2000) (dismissing some causes of action but retaining RICO-based causes).

n6. E.g., 18 U.S.C. 3063 (1994) (criminal powers of Environmental Protection Agency); 15 U.S.C. 1644 (1994) (consumer credit); 18 U.S.C. 1365 (1994 & Supp. IV 1998) (tampering with consumer products).

REV_00263710

n7. E.g., Child Support Recovery Act of 1992, 18 U.S.C. 228 (1994 & Supp. IV 1998); Catherine Wimberly, Deadbeat Dads, Welfare Moms, and Uncle Sam: How the Child Support Recovery Act Punishes Single Mother Families, 53 Stan. L. Rev. 729 (2000) (describing relation of criminal law and private litigation in enforcing child support orders).

n8. See Norman Abrams, Administrative Process Alternatives to the Criminal Process 3-10 (1979).

n9. See, e.g., Blue Cross & Blue Shield of N.J., Inc. v. Philip Morris, Inc., No. 98 CV 3287 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 4, 2001) (Memorandum and Order).

n10. E.g., 18 U.S.C. 2264 (1994) (domestic violence); id. 2264 (stalking); 18 U.S.C.A. 3555 (West Supp. 2000) (notice to victims).

n11. 18 U.S.C. 3510 (1994 & Supp. IV 1998).

n12. E.g., id. 3556 (order of restitution); id. 3662 (order of restitution); id. 3663a (mandatory restitution to victims of certain crimes); id. 3664 (procedure for issuance and enforcement of order of restitution); 11 U.S.C. 523 (nondischargeability in bankruptcy); 21 U.S.C. 853(q) (Supp. II 1996) (cleanup costs associated with methamphetamine manufacturing); 42 U.S.C. 1316 (1994) (public assistance); 42 U.S.C. 2210 nt (radiation exposure compensation); U.S. Sentencing Guidelines Manual 5E1.1, 8B.1.1. Total restitution ordered in fiscal year 1999 was $ 1,827,516,440. See Memorandum from Sentencing Commission to the author (Oct. 11, 2000) (on file with author). Restitution is payable before a fine. U.S. Sentencing Guidelines Manual 5E1.1(c). If there is no identifiable victim, the court may order "community restitution." Id. 5E1.1(d). It may include services and be payable over time. Id. 5E1.1(e)-(f). The remedy is particularly useful against organizations where incarceration is not possible. See id. 8B1.1; United States v. All Star Indus., 962 F.2d 465 (5th Cir. 1992) (corporation ordered to pay restitution for losses that occurred more than five years before return of indictment). An order of restitution is a lien in favor of the United States on all property and rights to property of the person fined as if it were liability for unpaid taxes. See generally 18 U.S.C.A. 3613(c) (West Supp. 2000). The lien arises on the entry of judgment and continues until satisfied, remitted or set aside, or for twenty years plus the period of incarceration or upon the death of the defendant. See id. 3613(b); see also Office of the Attorney Gen., U.S. Dep't of Justice, Attorney General Guidelines for Victim and Witness Assistance (2000). While the terms are sometimes used in this paper interchangeably, "restitution" is designed to cover the losses of a victim, and goes to the victim, while "disgorgement" is intended to take back gains obtained by the perpetrator in violation of law rather than reimbursing the victim for loss. Forfeitures attendant upon criminal acts such as drug trafficking are partly a matter of disgorgement, but primarily one of the punishments through loss of assets such as vehicles that were used in transportation. See 21 U.S.C. 881 (1994) (for features in drug cases). In a sense, such forfeitures are a form of "restitution" to the public at large for the general ravages of drugs. This complex area is beyond the scope of this paper. For a discussion of the technical procedural problems in providing restitution under the Sentencing Guidelines, see W. Royal Furgeson Jr. et al., The Perplexing Problem with Criminal Monetary Penalties in Federal Courts, 19 Rev. Litig. 167 (2000).

REV_00263711

n13. 15 U.S.C. 78(c) (1994).

n14. 21 U.S.C. 321 (1994 & Supp. IV 1998).

n15. 42 U.S.C.A. 7607 (West Supp. 2000) (administrative provisions and air pollution); Letter from Eric Schaeffer, Director, Office of Regulatory Enforcement of EPA, to author (Oct. 2, 2000) (on file with author). Mr. Schaeffer, illustrating the complexity of administrative restitution and disgorgement policies, wrote:

... .

Brief Overview of EPA's "Restitution-Related" Enforcement Authorities:

Most of the federal environmental laws authorize EPA to initiate a range of enforcement responses to environmental noncompliance. These responses include criminal, civil judicial, and civil administrative actions. In an average year, EPA initiates approximately ten times the number of administrative enforcement actions as it does judicial actions. Criminal or civil judicial actions are typically brought to address intentional egregious, or exceptionally complicated actions, or where significant injunctive relief is needed. With rare exceptions, EPA seeks to recover any economic benefit of noncompliance (EBN) realized as a result of the violations in all enforcement actions.

EPA recoups government costs for hazardous substance clean-ups through administrative or judicial cost recovery actions under its Comprehensive Environmental Response Act (CERCLA or Superfund) and Oil Pollution Act (OPA) authorities. We can also order Potentially Responsible Parties (PRPs) to conduct the required clean-up themselves. CERCLA and the OPA further provide for authorized "Natural Resource Trustees" to conduct natural resource damages (NRD) assessments as a means of evaluating the need for restoring the public's natural resources following releases of hazardous substances into the environment. While EPA is not a Natural Resource Trustee, we coordinate with the Trustees in the context of NRD assessments, investigations, and planning for response actions.

Recovery of Economic Benefit of Noncompliance in EPA Enforcement Actions:

REV_00263712

The recapture of a violator's EBN is the cornerstone of EPA's civil penalty program to deter and address violations of environmental law. It is assumed that most regulated entities will comply with the law when the costs of noncompliance exceed the benefits. Penalties that recoup the EBN realized by the violators serve to "level the playing field" and ensure that no company obtains a competitive edge from its noncompliance.

Many of the environmental statutes administered by EPA explicitly require federal courts, in judicial cases, and the EPA Administrator or her delegatees, in administrative actions, to consider a violator's EBN in imposing civil penalties. Examples include the Clean Water Act (CWA), Safe Drinking Water Act (SDWA), Clean Air Act (CAA) and the [Emergency] Planning and Community Right-to-Know Act (EPCRA). While EBN is not specifically identified as a penalty factor in other statutes, e.g., the Resource Conversation and Recovery Act (RCRA), the Toxic Substances Control Act (TSCA), and the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA), in practice, both federal judges and EPA's Administrative Law Judges (ALJs) routinely consider the EBN to the violator in assessing appropriate penalties. This amount serves as a "floor" to which a "gravity" penalty component reflecting the seriousness and/or willfulness of the violation is added to ensure an adequate deterrent impact.

EPA Penalty Policies and Guidelines:

As discussed above, most of the federal environmental laws provide for a range of possible enforcement responses and provide EPA with the discretion to select the most effective enforcement response for each given instance of noncompliance. EPA issues Enforcement Response Policies (ERPs) to guide decision as to whether to seek penalties in specific cases and, if so, the appropriate forum in which to seek them, i.e., in the U.S. Courts, or before EPA's ALJs. We have also issued many civil penalty policies to ensure that adequate and consistent penalties are calculated for comparable violations. Some of these policies establish general guidelines on how to calculate civil penalties, while others are statute-specific penalty policies for individual media programs. EPA may seek stakeholder input when developing these policies, particularly from our State partners who typically serve as co-regulators under the environmental laws.

EPA ensures that administratively imposed penalties and settlements of civil penalty actions are consistent with our policies. Where compelling equitable circumstances make the application of a particular policy inappropriate or unfair, however, EPA will depart from the policy in an effort to match the penalty to the facts of the case. This approach reflects the status of our penalty policies as non-binding guidance rather than formal rules. For the same describe the effects that increased use of criminal and administrative law in compensating victims of mass delicts, the trend towards limiting recovery in tort law, and the costs and benefits of these developments. He concludes by positing that tort law still plays a vital role in compensating victims of mass delicts. Finally, in part IV, Judge Weinstein suggests that tort law could be better integrated into the three model system, and how such an integrated administrative-criminal-tort system could help reduce duplicative litigation.

REV_00263713

TEXT:
[*948]

I. Introduction

Four main divisions of the law are utilized in compelling compensation from, and in sometimes deterring, those whose delicts cause harm to masses of people: (1) criminal; (2) administrative; (3) civil, particularly tort; and (4) arbitration and mediation. [1] What the roles of these divisions should be; how, if at all, they should be integrated; what are the dangers and advantages of these branches working together and separately; and what are the paths of the future remain somewhat unclear. Already there is substantial evidence of a series of developing related tendencies that may call for greater cooperation among those responsible for each in compensating individuals. I will emphasize mass torts, but much of what I will say applies to individual cases.

This paper begins an exploration of the evolving role of administrative, criminal, and tort law in compensating victims and deterring mass delicts. [2] The fourth leg of arbitration and mediation (or alternate dispute resolution) - where most important disputes are now being decided - is beyond the scope of this article. [3] Part II traces the evolution of the three models and illustrates how their roles in compensating individuals have [*949] begun to overlap. Part III provides examples of these trends in federal district court and administrative law. Part IV highlights how increased use of compensation in criminal and administrative law has been accompanied by curbs to limit recovery in the tort system. Part V describes the costs and benefits of these developments - concluding that tort law still plays a vital role in ensuring a more "democratic" method of compensation. Part VI suggests how tort law can be better integrated into this multi-armed system to ensure more effective remedies for mass delicts.

The overlapping of these enforcement arms raises questions about what their special roles ought to be, individually and cooperatively. We can think of an integrated approach as a "French model" [4] because it mimics some aspects of the continental system by fusing administrative, criminal, and tort proceedings into a single or related actions.

In the criminal law there has been an expansion of, for example, fraud actions, racketeer influenced (RICO) actions, [5] increased environmental and consumer protection prosecutions, [6] and criminal enforcement [*950] of orders requiring support for children [7] - many of which might have been brought as private tort actions. Much of this substantive expansion has taken place at the federal level. It has required increased resources for the federal courts and federal enforcement agencies. Attempts to move cases from the criminal courts to civil courts and administrative agencies have not been particularly successful partly because criminal law expansion and incarceration has been embraced by politics. [8] Some advances in decriminalization by the creation of drug courts have been valuable. In the area of consumer fraud, a shift from criminal to private civil prosecutions has been marked. [9]

The criminal law has, however, begun to focus more closely on the interests of victims. [10] It now provides them with a right to be heard at sentencing. [11] Strong provisions require restitution for monetary losses. [12] reason, the Agency's Consolidated Rules of Practice for administrative actions (40 CFR Part 22; http://www.epa.gov/oalj/crop.pdf) requires EPA's ALJs to "consider" our penalty policies, but they do not bind them. See 40 CFR 22.27(b).

REV_00263696

When EPA identifies cases that are appropriate for civil judicial or criminal enforcement, we refer them to the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) and/or the appropriate United States Attorneys for filing in the U.S. District Courts. In most judicial cases, the DOJ or U.S. Attorneys will typically request the statutory maximum penalty in the complaint, but may consult the applicable EPA penalty policies for guidance in the context of settlement negotiations.

n16. 15 U.S.C. 2053; see also Note on Legislation, CPSC Seeks Introduction of Legislation Calling for Study of Enforcement Changes, 28 Prod. Safety & Liab. Rep. (BNA) 930 (Oct 9, 2000).

n17. 29 U.S.C. 651-678.

n18. 42 U.S.C. 2000e-4.

n19. 49 U.S.C. 102; 49 U.S.C. 30127 (air bags).

n20. See 49 U.S.C. 307 (transfer of ICC jurisdiction to Department of Transportation).

n21. While criminal law actions seem quite distinct from administrative law in this way, the former has many of the characteristics of the latter in its administration. For one thing, the Department of Justice uses internal rule making to control prosecutors and provides some rudimentary guidelines to U.S. Attorneys on restitution. See generally Norman Abrams, Exploring Limits on the Use of Administrative Agencies in the Felony Criminal Process, 33 Isr. L. Rev. 539 (1999).

n22. See Am. Law Inst., 2 Enterprise Responsibility for Personal Injury 83 (1991).

n23. The expansion of the federal criminal law and administrative remedies tends to shift power to Washington, D.C., and away from state regulation of tort law. This development is contrary to the tendency by the conservative members of the Supreme Court to shore up states' rights at the expense of the federal government and its laws through broader interpretations of the Ninth Amendment (rights retained by the people), Tenth Amendment (powers not delegated reserved), and the Eleventh Amendment (no federal judicial power permitting certain suits against the states) as well as limits on Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment (power of Congress to enforce the substantive terms of the Amendment). E.g., United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000) (striking down Violence Against Women Act); Kimel v. Fla. Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62 (2000) (holding that ADEA could not abrogate states' Eleventh Amendment immunity); Alden v. Maine, 527 U.S. 706 (1999) (Congress cannot subject state to suit in state court without its consent); Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898 (1997); Mitchell S. Lustig, Rehnquist Court Redefines the Commerce Clause, N.Y. L.J., Mar. 28, 2000, at 3.

REV_00263714

n24. See United States v. Winkler, 817 F. Supp. 1530, 1537 (D. Kan. 1993) (restitution amount in criminal case set at sum determined in civil suit by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation; the amount of restitution was to be credited to the civil judgment).

n25. The New York Attorney General also frequently handles "cases in which the issues of restitution and disgorgement figure prominently in the relief." His authority to do so in a parens patriae capacity flows from New York's Executive Law:

Whenever any person shall engage in repeated fraudulent or illegal acts or otherwise demonstrate persistent fraud or illegality in the carrying on, conducting or transaction of business, the attorney general may apply in the name of the people of the state of New York, to the supreme court of the state of New York ... for an order enjoining the continuance of such business activity or of any fraudulent or illegal acts, directing restitution and damages and, in an appropriate case, cancelling any certificate filed under and by virtue of the provisions of [Penal Law 440 or General Business Law 130] ... and the court may award the relief applied for or so much thereof as it may deem proper ... ."

N.Y. Exec. Law 63(12) (1993) (emphasis added); Letter from Attorney General of New York, to author (Sept. 12, 2000) (on file with author).

n26. See Edward Brunet, Improving Class Action Efficiency by Expanded Use of Parens Partiae Suit and Intervention, 74 Tul. L. Rev. 1919, 1921 (2000). City Corporation Counsel have brought suits against such industries as the gun and paint (lead) industries. Id.; see also David J. Kaufman, Franchise Scam Halted by Attorney General's Office, N.Y. L.J., Aug. 24, 2000, at 3.

n27. See generally Jack B. Weinstein, Individual Justice in Mass Tort Litigation (1995) [hereinafter Weinstein, Individual Justice]; Jack B. Weinstein, Mass Tort Jurisdiction and Choice of Law in a Multinational World, Communicating by Extraterrestrial Satellites, 37 Willamette L. Rev. 145 (2001) [hereinafter Weinstein, Mass Tort] (examining jurisdiction and conflict of law issues in mass torts); Jack B. Weinstein, Some Reflections on United States Group Actions, 45 Am. J. Comp. L. 833, 834 (1997); Jack B. Weinstein, Compensating Large Numbers of People For Inflicted Harms, 11 Duke J. Comp. & Int'l L. 166 (2001)

REV_00263715

[hereinafter Weinstein, Compensating] (discussing various approaches to compensation); Weinstein, Restatement, supra note 1 (exploring impact of the Restatement in the Courts); see also Howard M. Erickson, Coattail Class Actions: Reflections on Microsoft, Tobacco, and the Mixing of Public and Private Lawyering in Mass Litigation, 34 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 1, 41 (2000) (combining public and private lawyering enhances deterrence).

n28. It has been suggested that the emphasis on aggregate settlements to dispose of these cases - often without individual client input - should be discouraged by ethical rules. See Nancy J. Moore, The Case Against Changing the Aggregate Settlement Rule in Mass Tort Lawsuits, 41 S. Tex. L. Rev. 149, 153-55 (1999). I cannot agree that the ethical dangers (which can be guarded against) outweigh the advantages in providing remedies to those wronged.

n29. See Letter of Administrative Office of United States Courts, to Chief Justice 3-5 (Sept. 27, 2000). In 1980 the proportion of federal civil cases terminated by trial was nine percent, but it had declined to about three percent by 1999; total jury trials decreased by nineteen percent between 1982 and 1999. In 1992 the proportion of criminal cases terminated by trial was twenty-two percent; in 1999 it was eleven percent. Id. Even eleven percent seems high. In my court it is far lower and, of course, this figure does not take into account the large number of cases in which prosecution is declined.

n30. The technique goes back to Civil War fraud prosecutions, recently encouraged by statutory amendment. E.g., Vt. Agency of Natural Res. v. United States ex rel. Stevens, 529 U.S. 765 (2000), rev'g, United States ex rel. Stevens v. Vt. Agency of Natural Res., 162 F.3d 195, 208 (2d Cir. 1998) (Weinstein, J., dissenting); Kurt Eichenwald, Big Hospital Manager to Pay a Fraud Settlement of $ 95 Million, N.Y. Times, Oct 3, 2000, at A21 (practice a subject of widespread criminal and civil investigations of hospital industry; suits were "filed under the federal whistle-blower laws."). The result of this development is related to the privatization issue. Government is increasingly relying on the private sector to carry on its governmental duties. See Daniel Guttman, Public Purpose and Private Service: The Twentieth Century Culture of Contracting Out and the Evolving Law of Diffused Sovereignty, 52 Admin. L. Rev. 859 (2000). The examples range from privately operated schools and prisons to the use of private collection agencies and attorneys to collect loan debts. When I was County Attorney of Nassau County my legal staff did all the legal work of all county departments; now staff has been reduced and many of the more difficult litigations are handled by private litigators for a fee. As in the case of qui tam prosecutions, the line between public-governmental and private activities has been blurred. The government also uses private attorneys to collect debts. On the need for holding fees down in such matters, see Mark A. Behrens & Donald J. Kochan, Let the Sunshine in: The Need for Open Competitive Bidding in Government Retention of Private Legal Services, Prod. Safety & Liab. Rep. (BNA), at 915 (Oct. 2, 2000); cf. In re Auction Houses Antitrust Litigation, 196 F.R.D. 444 (S.D.N.Y. 2000) (auction to obtain less expensive representative of class, considerations pro and con and authorities).

n31. See Brad Seligman, The California Alternative to Class Action: The Unfair Competition Law, Class Action Litig. Rep. 252 (2000); see also Bergeron v. Philip Morris, Inc., 100 F. Supp. 2d 164, 171-72 (E.D.N.Y. 2000) (describing the New York and Massachusetts consumer protection statutes).

REV_00263716

n32. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., The Common Law 39 (Dover Publ'ns 1991) (1881); Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 374 (2d ed. 1936) ("The modern distinction between crime and tort is ... one of those classifications which it is futile to press upon medieval law."). The question of what the basic rationale of the criminal law is may not be free from dispute. E.g., George P. Fletcher, The Fall and Rise of Criminal Theory, 1 Buff. Crim. L. Rev. 275, 287 (1988).

n33. Cf. Per Henrick Lindblom, Individual Litigation and Mass Justice: A Swedish Perspective and Proposal on Group Actions in Civil Procedure, 45 Am. J. Comp. L. 805, 811 (1997) ("general courts have been afforded a restricted role as guarantors of the rights of private citizens"). See generally Papers and Oral Discussion of Conference on Comparative Procedure in Florence, Italy, 1997, in 45 Am. J. Comp. L. (1997) and in Weinstein, Compensating, supra note 27.

n34. See Weinstein, Compensating, supra note 27 (international conference on comparative procedure, summer 2000).

n35. Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act, Pub. L. No. 107-42, 115 Stat. 230 (2001) (updating 49 U.S.C. 40101); see also 147 Cong. Rec. E1764-01 (daily ed. Oct. 2, 2001) (explanation and criticism of the Act by Hon. Henry A. Waxman).

n36. Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act 402(8), 404(a), Pub. L. No. 107-42, 115 Stat. 230, 237 (2001) (definition and duties of special master).

n37. Id. 403(b)(3) (decision within 120 days of filing of claim).

n38. For a preliminary discussion of the Act, which must be modified because of technical problems beyond the scope of this article, see, for example, Norman B. Arnoff & Sue C. Jacobs, Terrorism's Effects and Insurance Coverage, N.Y. L.J., Oct. 9, 2001, at 3 (urging prompt mediation); James D. Tussing & Stewart B. Herman, Government Acts to Bail Out U.S. Airlines, N.Y. L.J., Oct. 4, 2001, at 3; Karen Friefeld, Dilemma for Families: Quick Claims or Court?, Newsday, Oct. 4, 2001, at A30; Lizette Alvarez, An Airline Bailout: Senate Backs $ 15 Billion for Industry and Sets Up Victims' Fund, N.Y. Times, Sept. 22, 2001, at A1; Jim Dwyer & Diana B. Henriques, Money for Families of Attack Victims Could Vary Widely, N.Y. Times, Sept. 20, 2001, at A1; Jenna Greene, Insurance Experts Say Some Disputes Are Likely, Nat'L L.J., Sept. 24, 2001, at A11; Diana B. Henriques & David Barstow, Fund for Victims' Families Already Proves Sore Point, N.Y. Times, Oct. 1, 2001, at A1; Sarah Sparks & Milo Geyelin, Experts Offer Ways to Manage Terror Lawsuits, Wall St. J., Sept. 25, 2001, at A10; Seth Stern, Who Pays the Damages for Sept. 11?, Christian Sci. Monitor, Sept. 27, 2001, at 4; Ruth Bryna Cohen, Most Lawyers Agree with Moratorium on Filing over Terrorism, Legal Intelligencer, at http://www.law.com (last visited Sept. 19, 2001). Coordination of civil cases with criminal prosecutions may involve political consequences. See

REV_00263717

David Johnston & Benjamin Weiser, Ashcroft Is Centralizing Control over the Prosecution and Prevention of Terrorism, N.Y. Times, Oct. 10, 2001, at B9 (shift of control from U.S. Attorney General in Southern District of New York to Washington, D.C.).

n39. See, e.g., Jack B. Weinstein, Individual Justice in Mass Tort Litigation 48-49 (1995) (discussing consolidation of suits arising from World Trade Center disaster of 1993); id. at 123, 308-10 (black lung, atomic energy, and children's vaccines).

n40. Individual and, whenever possible, personal contact with victims is recommended. While the methods for implementing AG Guidelines provisions are relatively straightforward in cases where the number of victims is limited, they can present challenges as the number of victims grows into the hundreds and thousands. In carrying out their obligations under the AG guidelines in cases with large numbers of victims, responsible officials should use the means, given the circumstances, most likely to achieve actual contact with and notice to victims. Dep't of Justice Deputy Att'y Gen's Victim's Rights Working Group, Dep't of Justice, Att'y Gen Guidelines for Victim and Witness Assistance 11 (2000); see also, e.g., United States v. Blake, 89 F. Supp. 2d 328, 347-48 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); Frank Carrington & George Nicholson, The Victims' Movement: An Idea Whose Time Has Come, 11 Pepp. L. Rev. 1 (1984); Christopher R. Goddu, Comment, Victims' "Rights" or a Fair Trial Wronged, 41 Buff. L. Rev. 245 (1993); cf. Scott P. Boylan, Coffee from a Samovar: The Role of the Victim in the Criminal Procedure of Russia and the Proposed Victims Rights Amendment to the United States Constitution, 4 U.C. Davis J. Int'l L. & Policy 103 (1998) (describing Russian system in which victims can actively participate at trial and on appeal).

n41. See 18 U.S.C. 3553(a)(7) (Supp. I 1995) (requiring court to consider "the need to provide restitution to any victims of the offense" in determining sentence); U.S. Sentencing Guidelines Manual 5E1.1 (1998). Producers and sellers of illegal drugs would be subject to civil suits from those they harm under legislation passed by the United States House on October 9, 2000. See N.Y. L.J., Oct. 11, 2000, at 1.

n42. E.g., 18 U.S.C. 982 (1994).

n43. E.g., U.S. Sentencing Guidelines Manual 5 E1.1 (1998); Blake, 89 F. Supp. 2d at 351-52; United States v. Cheung, 952 F. Supp. 148, 150-51 (E.D.N.Y.1997); United States v. Ferranti, 928 F. Supp. 206, 220-23 (E.D.N.Y.1996), aff'd, 135 F.3d 116 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 523 U.S. 1096 (1998).

n44. Cf. Letter from Lawrence E. Maxwell, Inspector in Charge, U.S. Postal Inspection Service, to author (Oct. 16, 2000) (on file with the University of Illinois Law Review):

The Postal Inspection Service enforces approximately 200 federal statutes in protecting the Nation's mail system. Restitution is utilized primarily in mail fraud investigations (18 U.S.C.

REV_00263718

1341), mail theft (18 U.S.C. 1708) and various other crimes in which the Postal Service is victimized financially. These include contract frauds, embezzlements, and fraudulent workmen's compensation claims. The Postal Service also receives criminal fines and civil penalties for violations of a number of statutes.

First and foremost, the Inspection Service, as a law enforcement agency must and does seek to restore property to victims of these crimes, whether they are consumers, businesses, or other government victims. To do otherwise would not only be wrong, but would invite legislative restrictions on enforcement policies. In civil cases, our restitution strategy relies largely on a variety of statutes. For example, under the Program Fraud Civil Remedies Act (PFCRA) we can seek up to twice the amount of the loss plus penalties. In these types of cases, we weigh the seriousness of the act to the respondent's ability to pay. Other factors, i.e., the breadth of the fraud and deterrence value the impositions of penalties have also enter into the calculus. When cases are developed by investigators, the Agency first evaluates the underlying circumstances. Our recommendations are then presented to the Department of Justice (DOJ) who decides if the case will proceed through the judicial system. The Act also allows us to take action even if the agency did not incur a loss, but other conditions of the Act are met.

Under the False Claims Act, a similar process is employed. One major difference, however, is the fact the government can seek treble damages and penalties up to $ 10,000 per occurrence.

With the recent passage of the Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act (CAFRA), certain provisions enhance our ability to recover money and property in the fraud arena. We now have the authority to forfeit the proceeds of mail fraud schemes without employing a money laundering analysis. More importantly, CAFRA also provides a mechanism to restore the property to victims, where heretofore this process was difficult if not impossible in the wide range of cases we investigate.

Although seemingly a logical and practical tool, formulating restitution strategies has not been as easy as we would hope. Some of the problems we encounter include coordination among civil and criminal prosecutors, our own General Counsel's Office, and coordination among other agencies involved in the task force operation. For example, whenever a complex criminal prosecution is in progress, the prosecutor is reluctant to invite a coordinated civil or administrative forfeiture, or some other administrative action without a complete bifurcation. One reason for this is the ever present discovery issues, which remain a concern for most prosecutors of the criminal aspects of the case. This issue is a continuing topic at DOJ Forfeiture Component Meetings as well as LECC conferences. One remedy to alleviate this concern was provided by CAFRA, in that civil judicial forfeiture can be stayed during the pendency of the criminal case.

REV_00263719

Coordinating the civil and criminal prosecutions not only allows the most effective strategical approach by the government, but also presents the most complete picture of the loss and the assets available for distribution to victims. Ultimately, a coordinated strategy provides the best opportunities for victim recoveries, while enabling the court to determine the appropriate penalty for the crime.

The Inspection Service also is awarded criminal fines in some of its cases. Fines are intended not only as a punishment to the offender, but they help offset the investigative costs to the agency. However, the government should not benefit at the expense of victims. Every effort must be made to identify victims and their losses.

I do not believe it is necessary to legislate greater cooperation amongst all interested parties in a case. This cooperation though should be strongly encouraged by the Department of Justice, United States Attorneys, and the courts.

n45. See Abrams, supra note 8, at 4 (emphasis in original):

What has not been generally observed is that the criminal process is a hybrid that in its totality is really an administrative process - that is, a system of governmental activity directly affecting the individual, one component of which happens to use the judiciary as a fact-finder, law-applier and sanction imposer.

Id.

n46. On balance, the huge improvements in auto safety are due to: (1) statutory and detailed administrative regulation, and oversight of manufacturers by the DOT's requirement of accident reporting for recall purposes; (2) public perceptions of the need for safe cars when they buy new vehicles; and (3) new technological improvements. Recoveries in civil suits as a protective deterrent device are probably less effective than any of the first three. See generally Robert L. Rabin, Keynote Paper: Reassessing Regulatory Compliance, 88 Geo. L. J. 2049, 2070 (2000).

REV_00263720

n47. There has been a related expansion of the right to sue through whittling away of standing and other limiting doctrines preventing suits in the public interest that protect in environmental pollution matters. E.g., Ara B. Gershengorn, Private Party Standing to Raise Tenth Amendment Commandeering Challenges, 100 Colum. L. Rev. 1065, 1074-75 (2000); see also United States v. Students Challenging Regulatory Agency Procedures, 412 U.S. 669, 685-90 (1973); Marcia Cole, Campaign 2000 Focus Is "Judicial Activism", Nat'l L.J., Aug. 21, 2000, at A1 (the evolution of the standing doctrine has become "a major barrier against environmental enforcement efforts); Martin A. Schwartz, Federal Rights Without Remedies, N.Y. L.J., Dec. 19, 2000, at 3 (increasing Eleventh Amendment limitations on federal rights of action); but see Friends of Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Envtl. Serv. (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 189 (2000) (reasonable environmental concerns sufficient to establish injury-in-fact); Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83, 109-10 (1998).

n48. E.g., Congress to Expedite Passage of Tread Bill to Enhance NHTSA Power, Consumer Safety, Prod. Safety & Liab. Rep. (BNA), at 859 (Sept. 18, 2000).

n49. See Letter from Stephen G. Burns, Acting Gen. Counsel of Nuclear Regulatory Commission, to author (Sept. 28, 2000):

It is well-known that the civilian uses of radioactive materials, most notably in power plants, do pose the risk of injury to large numbers of people. The risk is quite small, but it is nonetheless not zero... . In the event of a major offsite release of radiation at a nuclear power plant in the United States, all claims of radiological injury from the plant (other than those claims covered by workmen's compensation statutes) would be handled under the Price-Anderson Act, which is found at section 170 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended (Price-Anderson is codified at 42 U.S.C. 2210 and in definitions in 42 U.S.C. 2014). Price-Anderson was ... designed to address several of the features of mass torts, most notably the need to provide full and prompt compensation for widespread exposure to potentially harmful agents, the effects of which may not reveal themselves for many years; difficulties in proving causation; heavy transactional costs; and threats to the financial ability of many companies to respond to traditional damage awards.

Price-Anderson mixes tort and administrative law principles, and although the Act covers only private suits, it could operate alongside the NRC's use of its authority under the Atomic Energy Act to pursue civil or criminal penalties for violations of the Atomic Energy Act or the Agency's regulations. Under the indemnification provisions of Price-Anderson, all liability is channeled to the licensed operator of a power plant, and an operator's liability is in turn limited. Cases are removable to the Federal District Court where the accident took place, but this Court must apply State tort law to the extent that it is consistent with the Act. Justified claims are compensated out of private insurance that the NRC requires each licensee to maintain, and, to the extent that damages exceed such insurance, out of a retrospective premium pool to which every power plant licensee must contribute in the event of an accident at any plant. The Act provides that there would be a waiver of defenses should the NRC determine that there has been an "extraordinary nuclear occurrence", that is, an event causing radiation levels off-site that are "substantial" and that have resulted, or will result, in "substantial" damage to off-site persons or property. The waivers relieve plaintiffs of a requirement to prove fault; they need prove only that the incident caused their injuries. The Act instructs the NRC to make full use of private insurance organizations to coordinate procedures for handling, investigating, and settling claims. Through 1997, there had been 195 claims, and compensation of about 131 million dollars paid. However, that amount included some transaction costs, such as legal expenses. The Act also permits punitive damages in some cases, thus reducing the amounts available to compensate injuries. In cases in which public liability may exceed the limit of liability, courts are authorized to establish priorities among claimants

REV_00263721

... .

The Price-Anderson Act is designed to cope with a mass tort after the fact, but much of the NRC's work is devoted to preventing a mass tort. Under the agency's statutory authorities other than Price-Anderson, the agency employs civil, criminal, and administrative modes, encourages settlement of disputes, and employs forms resembling restitution. For example, seeking to maintain or restore safe conditions, the agency may, on its own, deny license applications, and modify, suspend or revoke licenses already granted, and it may seek, through the Attorney General, injunctive or other equitable relief for violation of regulatory requirements. Aiming to deter unsafe conduct, the agency may on its own impose civil penalties, and may ask the Attorney General to pursue criminal penalties, including imprisonment. In matters that reach litigation before the agency's administrative judges, the agency encourages settlement, and reviews each proposed settlement to determine whether it is in the public interest. An overview of the considerations in making this determination may be found in a recent Commission order, In re Sequoyah Fuels Corporation and General Atomics, 46 NRC 195, CLI-97-13 (1997) (available at 1997 WL 687867 [NRC]).

In pursuit of a safety-conscious work environment, the agency uses something like restitution, though restitution before adjudication. It is the policy of the agency to encourage licensees to maintain or restore the pay and benefits of an employee who alleges retaliation for raising safety issues, pending reconsideration or resolution of the matter. See 61 Fed. Reg. 24339, col. 3 (May 14, 1996)

n50. Oral and written presentations to Conference on Restatement Third, Vanderbilt University Law School (Sept., 2000).

n51. E.g., Stephen B. Burbank & Linda J. Silberman, Civil Procedure Reform in Comparative Context: The United States of America, 45 Am. J. Comp. L. 675 (1997).

REV_00263722

n52. E.g., 28 U.S.C. 1367 (1994) (supplemental jurisdiction); Jack B. Weinstein, After Fifty Years of Federal Rules of Civil Procedure Are the Barriers to Justice Being Raised, 137 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1901, 1914 (1988); Jack B. Weinstein, The Ghost of Process Past: The Fiftieth Anniversary of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Erie, 54 Brook. L. Rev. 1, 24 (1988); Jack B. Weinstein, Procedural Reform as a Surrogate for Substantive Law Revision, 59 Brook. L. Rev. 827, 834 (1993).

For a good short summary of class actions and mass torts, with some quantification, see Deborah R. Hensler, Mass or Class? Form and Function in Mass Tort Litigation (papers to be delivered AALS annual meeting, San Francisco, Cal., Jan. 5, 2001).

n53. Falise v. Am. Tobacco Co., 94 F. Supp. 2d 316 (E.D.N.Y. 2000).

n54. John C. Coffee Jr., Class Wars: The Dilemma of the Mass Tort Class Action, 95 Colum L. Rev. 1343, 1384 (1995); Ralph R. Mabey & Peter A. Zisser, Improving Treatment of Future Claims: The Unfinished Business Left by the Manville Amendments, 69 Am. Bank. L.J. 487, 506 (1995); Nat'l Bankr. Review Comm'n, Treatment of Mass Future Claims in Bankruptcy, Ch. 2, in Bankruptcy; The Next 20 Years (1997).

n55. See Marc Galanter, Why the "Haves" Come Out Ahead: Speculation on the Limits of Legal Change, 9 L. & Soc'y Rev. 95, 114-24 (1974) (documenting how wealthier parties are able to translate their privileges into litigation victories not only with high priced attorney's but also as repeat players in the system). Much of the classic analysis in this article does not apply today to massive actions where both sides are well represented because of the huge fees available.

n56. 928 F. Supp. 206 (E.D.N.Y. 1996).

n57. Hughey v. United States, 495 U.S. 411, 413 (1990); cf. United States v. Soderling, 970 F.2d 529, 533 (9th Cir. 1991) (restitution greater than loss permitted if part of a plea agreement where government agrees to curtail prosecution); United States v. Casamento, 887 F.2d 1141, 1177 (2d Cir. 1989) (restitution in form of drug treatment to those who took drugs as a result of defendant's drug trafficking not permitted).

n58. But see United States v. Brown, 744 F.2d 905 (not the equivalent of a civil judgment so that protections of civil adjudication not required); Bonnie Arnett Von Roeder, The Right to a Jury Trial to Determine Restitution Under the Victim and Witness Protection Act of 1982, 63 Tex. L. Rev. 671 (1984).

n59. United States v. Porter, 41 F.3d 68, 71 (2d Cir. 1994) (sentencing judge, not

REV_00263723

[*951] In the administrative area, we have created powerful agencies such as the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), [13] the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), [14] the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), [15] [*952] the Consumer Safety Products Commission (CPSC), [16] the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA), [17] the Equal Opportunity Employment Commission (EEOC), [18] and the Department of Transportation (DOT). [19] In contrast, the powers of the now-defunct Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) were limited primarily to controlling contractual relationships between shippers and carriers, [20] but included some aspects of safe operation of railroads and trucks. The new agencies utilize orders for recalls of dangerous products, and seek to deter by fines, injunctions, and orders for disgorgement and restitution. [21] Detailed product safety regulations are now a chief method of protecting the public directly by controlling risks. [22]

The protective blanket of administrative agencies currently covers the entire population in its day-to-day activities. These administrative agencies increasingly use disgorgement, mediation, settlement, and other techniques to compel malefactors to provide compensation to individuals who have been harmed. [23] Criminal and civil suits may be used by these agencies in conjunction with the more usual administrative proceedings. [24] [*953] Parens patriae suits by state attorneys general, [25] as in the recent tobacco cases, can be categorized as within this administrative zone. [26] Some are based on tort theory and employ private counsel to conduct litigation.

In the civil area, there has been a vast expansion in the use of remedies to deal with privately induced environmental problems and those caused by pharmaceutical, chemical, and other industries. [27] The class action is the most dramatic of these devices because it permits the aggregation of large numbers of claims that otherwise would not have been prosecuted; most of those who have been injured are not required to take any remedial action on their own behalf. Other less obvious forms serve the same purpose: for example, advertising and contacts with unions have enabled some lawyers to obtain tens of thousands of clients, permitting them to bring consolidated civil actions, or settle without trials on a matrix basis huge numbers of claims in such matters as asbestos, breast implants, and diethylstilbestrol (DES). [28] The individual entrepreneurship of lawyers who have become rich and powerful as a result of these massive litigations has excited the approbation of some and created [*954] antipathy in others. Despite the increased litigation, the number of cases tried before juries has been steadily decreasing in the federal courts. [29]

Even the federal government strongly relies on private attorneys in prosecutions of federal government claims through increased emphasis on "whistle blower" qui tam actions. [30] Such suits can be categorized as private civil litigations although the Attorney General can take charge of them. Another alternative to class actions allows private plaintiffs to rely on an unlawful practice as a basis for injunctive and restitutionary relief even when those bringing suit have not themselves been injured. [31]

The result of these developments is that we now have three separate but overlapping branches of law (four, if we include alternate dispute resolution) attempting to perform similar functions: the compensation of victims and deterrence of future bad acts. In some ways this development is a return to an earlier time, in the long-ago past of criminal and tort law. As Holmes pointed out, early tort law was "directed only to intentional wrongs," and these actions "had a criminal as well as a civil aspect [in that they] had the double object of satisfying the private party for his loss, and the king for the breach of peace." [32]

[*955] The trend to compensate through governmental litigation marks a departure for the U.S. civil system. While primary reliance on the government to compensate victims has been a commonplace feature of the "top-down" justice systems in Europe, South America, and the Far East, [33] the U.S. system has traditionally followed a more "bottom-up" approach. [34] Individuals, through their private attorneys, defend or prosecute to enforce their own rights probation, must supervise restitution terms and enforcement).

REV_00263697

n60. E.g., 18 U.S.C. 3663 (1994 & Supp. IV 1998) (how court determines amount of restitution).

n61. Cf. United States v. Maurer, 266 F.3d 150, 153 (2d Cir. 2000) (restitution did not have to take into account possible set-off available in a civil suit).

n62. 952 F. Supp. 148 (E.D.N.Y. 1997).

n63. 18 U.S.C. 1964(c) (Supp. III 1997).

n64. United States v. Berardini, 112 F.3d 606, 612 (2d Cir. 1997) (payment by defendant into a fund for known, but not located victims proper).

n65. Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(e)(1).

n66. 99 Crim. 84. (E.D.N.Y. 1999).

n67. E.g., 18 U.S.C.A. 3663(a)(1)(B)(i)(II) (West 2000) (court should consider financial needs of defendant in determining amount of restitution).

n68. E.g., Rhonda L. Rundle, SEC Files Securities-Fraud Suits; Executives Also Face Indictments, Wall St. J., Sept. 28, 2000, at B18 (SEC filed "civil lawsuits and other enforcement actions," and "indictments" were also "handed up."). In describing these administrative law cases, I have relied on press reports.

n69. Stephen Labaton, Generic-Drug Maker Agrees to Settlement in Price-Fixing Case, N.Y. Times, July 13, 2000, at A1.

n70. Service Company Must Pay $ 11 Million in ValueJet Crash, N.Y. Times, Aug. 15, 2000, at A12. The $ 2 million in fines was subsequently reduced to $ 1.75 million in a settlement between SabreTech and the FAA. Betsy McKay, SabreTech Sets Accord with FAA on Role in 1996 ValueJet Crash, Wall St. J., May 23, 2001, at B2.

REV_00263724

n71. Service Company Must Pay $ 11 Million in ValueJet Crash, N.Y. Times, Aug. 15, 2000, at A12.

n72. E.g., Peter Aronson, Disability Settlement Sets Record, Nat'l L.J., Aug. 28, 2000, at B1 (American Airlines agrees to pay $ 1.7 million to ninety-nine individuals for violations of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 after suit brought by the Department of Labor); Andy Pasztor, U.S. Regulators Seek to Fine Boeing $ 1.2 Million, Wall St. J., Aug. 3, 2000 (FAA seeking to fine Boeing for lax manufacturing controls); cf. Safety Commission Recalls 91,000 Go-Karts After One Death and Two Injuries, N.Y. Times, Aug. 15, 2000, at A12 (CPSC acted after go-karts had reportedly caused death and injuries by entangling the hair or garments of the rider in exposed rotating parts); see also Letter from Eric Schaeffer, to author, supra note 15.

n73. Fed. Trade Comm'n v. Mylan Labs. Inc., 62 F. Supp. 2d 25, 36 (D.D.C. 1999).

n74. Id. at 37 (citing cases permitting the FTC to pursue monetary relief under 13(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act).

n75. Letter from Robert Pitofsky, Chairman, Federal Trade Comm'n, to author (Aug. 14, 2000).

n76. United States v. Universal Management Servs., Inc., 191 F.3d 750 (6th Cir. 1999) (affirming $ 100 million award FDA obtained through disgorgement by a consent decree), cert. denied, 530 U.S. 1274 (2000); Dierdre Davidson, FDA Now Packs a Heavy Punch, Nat'l L.J., July 17, 2000, at B6. This trend is not to be confused with the Supreme Court's possible cutting back on the finding of private rights of action in a statute. E.g., Alexander v. Sandoval, 121 S. Ct. 1511 (2001) (no private right of action to enforce regulations under Title VI of Civil Rights Act of 1964); Meghrig v. KFC Western, Inc., 516 U.S. 479 (1996). The question in the former line of cases is whether an agency that is statutorily granted the power to institute litigation also has the power to seek restitution; this is a different question from whether individuals are allowed to bring suit even though a statute does not explicitly grant them such power.

n77. Telephone Conversation with Litigation Deputy of FDA (Aug. 28, 2000). There are no guidelines with respect to cooperation of the agency with private attorneys for those claiming injury.

n78. Herzfeld v. United States District Court, 699 F.2d 503, 506 (10th Cir. 1983).

REV_00263725

↑n79. Id.; see also, e.g., Letter from First Senior Deputy Comptroller of the Currency, to author (Sept. 6, 2000):

The OCC is authorized under its primary enforcement statute, 12 U.S.C. 1818, to order a bank, or its officers, directors, or other "institution-affiliated parties," to pay restitution to a party that has suffered a loss as a result of the bank's or the individuals misconduct. While the OCC has issued no specific regulations or guidelines on this subject, both statutory and case law have established legal standards for when the agency may order a bank or an individual to pay restitution.

Under 12 U.S.C. 1818(b), the OCC may issue a cease and desist order to a bank or an individual who violates a law, rule, or regulation; condition imposed in writing or formal written agreement entered into with the agency; or who engages in an unsafe or unsound practice. The OCC's cease and desist power includes the authority to order a respondent to make restitution, provide reimbursement, indemnification, or guarantee against loss, provided that the respondent was either unjustly enriched, or the violation or practice involved a reckless disregard for the law or any applicable regulations or prior agency order. 12 U.S.C. 1818(b)(6)(A).

The case law has further defined when the OCC may order payment of restitution. Specifically, in Rappaport v. U.S. Dep't of the Treasury, 59 F.3d 212 (D.C. Cir. 1995), cert denied, 516 U.S. 1073 (1996), the D.C. Circuit held that the common law definition of "unjust enrichment" applied to the term as it is used in 12 U.S.C. 1818(b)(6)(A). Under the D.C. Circuit's interpretation, unjust enrichment requires a showing that the party against whom restitution is sought has received and retained a benefit that properly belongs to another. Rapport, 59 F.3d at 217. Moreover, the amount of restitution owed is measured by the defendants gain, rather than the plaintiff's loss. Id.

The OCC does not typically consult with the United States Attorney or private attorneys before making a decision to seek restitution. However, where there is a parallel criminal case, we routinely contact the appropriate U.S. Attorney's Office in order to coordinate our actions and ensure they will not in any way interfere with the criminal case.

Eliot Spitzer, the Attorney General of New York has suggested that joint federal-state cooperation can avail government restitutionary relief, even when unavailable under the agencies own statute. In a recent action brought jointly with the FTC against an Internet website publisher charged with fraudulently billing visitors to its sites, the New York Attorney General's participation in the action included a demand for restitution - relief generally unavailable under the FTC's own statute. Letter from the Attorney General of New York, to author (Sept. 12, 2000).

REV_00263726

n80. Cf. Jane Stapelton, Legal Cause: Cause-in-Fact and the Scope of Liability for Consequences, 54 Vand. L. Rev. 941, 956 (2001) (methods "to contain the voraciousness of the negligence principle within tolerable bounds"); John Caher, Court Seen as Slow in Expanding Tort Claims, Criminal Defendants' Rights, N.Y.L.J., July 24, 2001, at 1 (describing trend against private litigants in decisions by the New York Court of Appeals); Theodore Eisenberg & Steward J. Schwab, Double Standard on Appeal: An Empirical Analysis of Employment Discrimination Cases in the U.S. Courts of Appeals (July 16, 2001) (unpublished manuscript, on file with the University of Illinois Law Review) (appellate courts more likely to reverse plaintiff victory than defense verdict in employment discrimination and other civil rights cases).

n81. See generally, II Am. Law Inst., Reporters' Study, Enterprise Liability for Personal Injury, ch. 7, Workers' Compensation and Product Liability 183 (1991). In some states recoveries have not kept pace fully with rising costs of living. In other states it has been possible to circumvent the barrier against directly suing the employer by first suing the manufacturer of a "defective" machine involved in the injury, then having the manufacturer, in turn, sue the employer. E.g., Ibarra v. Equip. Control, 268 A.D.2d 13 (N.Y. App. Div. 2000).

n82. Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969, Pub. L. No. 91-173, 101-426, 83 Stat. 742, 745-98 (codified in scattered sections of 30 U.S.C.) (Black Lung Act); see also Deal Reached on Aid for Uranium Miners, N.Y. Times, Oct. 6, 2000, at A20 (proposals to compensate uranium miners and workers). But see Air Transportation Safety and Systems Stabilization Act, Pub. L. No. 107-42, 115 Stat. 230 (2001).

n83. See Jack B. Weinstein, Individual Justice in Mass Tort Litigation 123-24 (1995); see also Matthew L. Wald, Lawmakers Bar Payments for Workers on Weapons, N.Y. Times, Sept. 27, 2000, at 12 (compensation proposed to those made sick or killed while working on nuclear weapons).

n84. Weinstein, supra note 83, at 123.

n85. E.g., Jack B. Weinstein, Adjudicative Justice in a Diverse Mass Society, 8 J.L. & Pol'y 385 (2000).

n86. See W. Page Keeton et al., Prosser & Keeton on Torts 585-86 (5th ed. 1984) (discussing statutes dealing with auto insurance). See, e.g., John M. Shields, Reviewing the Threshold for "Serious Injury", 224 N.Y. L.J., Aug. 24, 2000, at 1 (referring to serious injury in automobile accident cases). At the federal level, similar legislative efforts are underway, largely - but not completely - stymied to date by the power of rich plaintiffs attorneys' donations to one political party, balancing potential defendants' donations to the other. See generally Bob Van Voris, Clinton's a Surprising Tort Reformer, Nat'l L.J., Aug. 14, 2000, at 1 (listing as limitations on plaintiffs' suits: the General Aviation Revitalization Act of 1994, the Federally Supported Health Centers Assistance Act of 1995, the Small Business Job Protection Act of 1996, the Aviation Disaster Family Assistance Act of 1996, the Bill Emerson Good Samaritan Food Donation Act of 1996, the Coast Guard Authorization Act of 1996, Volunteer Protection Act of 1997, the Amtrak Reform and Accountability Act of 1997, the Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act of 1998, the Biomaterials Access Assurance Act of 1998, and the Year 2000 Information and Readiness Act). Notably, federal legislation attempted to limit federally financed legal aid centers from pursuing class actions - severely restricting the ability of impact litigation in areas of poverty law. The Supreme Court recently held these restrictions unconstitutional. See Legal Services Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533 (2001). For the effect of donating to political parties and candidates to obtain or deny such limiting legislation, see, for example, John M. Broder and Don Van Natta, Jr., Perks for Biggest Donors and Pleas for More Cash, N.Y. Times, July 30, 2000, at 1.

REV_00263727

n87. E.g., Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corporation, 527 U.S. 815 (1999); Amchem Prod., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591 (1997); In re Repetitive Stress Injury Litig., 11 F.3d 368 (2d Cir. 1993).

n88. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(f) and advisory committee notes. For a debate between proponents and opponents of interstate class actions, see Frederick M. Baron, The Truth About 5.353: Unfairness in Class Actions, 69 U.S. L. Wk., Sept. 12, 2000, at 2131. See, e.g., Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995, Pub. L. 104-67, 109 Stat. 737 (codified as amended at 15 U.S.C. 77a); Paul A. Ferrillo, New Tide Rising in Securities Class Action Litigation, 223 N.Y. L.J., Aug. 8, 2000, at 1.

n89. "Once an area of state law has been completely pre-empted, any claim purportedly based on that pre-empted state law is considered, from its inception, a federal claim, and therefore arises under federal law." Caterpillar, Inc. v. Williams, 482 U.S. 386, 393 (1987). This permits removal cases even though a state claim and nondiversity action in a state court might appear to preclude removal. See Lyons v. Phillip Morris, Inc., 225 F.3d 909, 912 (8th Cir. 2000); Anthony E. Szdlowski, Preemption in the Securities Industry: A Diminished Standard?, 74 St. John's L. Rev. 259 (2000); Michael Hoenig, More on Pre-Emption of Air-Bag Restraint Claims, N.Y. L.J., Sept. 11, 2000, at 3.

n90. United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. 89, 94 (2000) (preempting state regulations "governing oil tanker operations and designs"); e.g., Pegram v. Hendrich, 530 U.S. 211 (2000); Geier v. Am. Honda Motor Co., 529 U.S. 1913 (2000); Norfolk S. Ry. Co. v. Shanklin, 529 U.S. 344 (2000); Sakellaridis v. Polar Air Cargo, Inc., 104 F. Supp. 2d 160 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); Burke v. Dow Chem. Co., 797 F. Supp. 1128 (E.D.N.Y. 1992); Leo T. Crowley, ERISA Pre-Emption Returns in Managed Care, 224 N.Y. L.J., Aug. 2, 2000, at 3; Allison M. Zieve, Grier v. Honda: The News Is Not All Bad for Consumers, 28 Product Safety & Liability Rep. (BNA) 622 (2000); see also Buckman Co. v. Plaintiffs' Legal Comm., 531 U.S. 341 (2000) (granting certiorari on whether federal medical devise law bars state tort claims that a company made fraudulent representations to the FDA in seeking clearance for an orthopedic screw system).

REV_00263728

n91. See Sakellaridis, 104 F. Supp. 2d at 162.

n92. Mickey Meece, The Very Model of Conciliation: Companies Adopting Postal Service Grievance Process, N.Y. Times, Sept. 6, 2000, at C1 (documenting thirty percent drop of formal complaints within the postal service with new national mediation program); see also Samuel Estreicher & Kenneth J. Turnbull, New Guidance on Predispute Mandatory Arbitration Agreements, 224 N.Y. L.J, Sept. 13, 2000, at 3; Robert S. Greenberger, As Arbitration Spreads to Consumer Purchasers, a Court Battle Looms, Attorneys Lead a Backlash Against Corporate Practice that Reduces Lawsuits, Wall St. J., Sept. 19, 2000, at A1; Arbitration May Trump Class Actions Under TILA, Electronic Fund Transfer Act, U.S. L. Wk., Sept. 12, 2000, at 1132; Weinstein, Preliminary Thoughts, supra note 1.

n93. E.g., Major League Baseball Players Ass'n v. Garvey, 121 S. Ct. 1724 (2001) (courts not authorized to review labor-arbitration decision on merits despite alleged error); Lawrence W. Newman, Ethics in International Arbitration, 224 N.Y. L.J., July 31, 2000, at 3 (American Attorneys more likely to reveal adverse information); Steven J. Shore & Franklin D. Ormsten, Arbitration Still Has Broad Reach in Securities, 224 N.Y. L.J., Aug 9, 2000, at 3; DOL Seeks to Expand Use of Mediators to Resolve Disputes Under Employment Laws, U.S. L. Wk., Jan. 9, 2001; Weinstein, Preliminary Thoughts, supra note 1. The use of binding arbitration has become increasingly popular - particularly for Internet businesses where the choice of applicable law is uncertain and new technology has made it easier to impose. Elizabeth G. Thornburg, Going Private: Technology, Due Process, and Internet Dispute Resolution, 34 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 151, 179-84 (2000) (describing trends in arbitration as more favorable to businesses who can choose applicable substantive and procedural law and less favorable to consumers).

n94. E.g., Watson v. Texas, No. 00-41269, 2001 WL 883533 (5th Cir. Aug. 7, 2001); United States v. Philip Morris, Inc., 116 F. Supp. 2d 131 (D.D.C. 2000); Pam Belluck, Chicago Gun Suit Fails, but California's Proceeds, N.Y. Times, Sept. 16, 2000, at A9; Richard B. Schmitt, Cities Begin Fact-Finding Phase in Gun Law Suits, Wall St. J., Sept. 25, 2000, at B30.

n95. E.g., Alison Frankel & Paul Breverman, ATLA's War Room, Am. Law., Oct. 2000 (coordinated work of plaintiff trial lawyers).

n96. Henry Weinstein, Attack Waged on Fees Anti-Tobacco Attorney Received, L.A. Times, Mar. 15, 2001, at A1.

n97. E.g., Barry Meier, Lawyer in Holocaust Case Faces Litany of Complaints, N.Y. Times, Sept. 8, 2000. Some of the attorneys in this case have served without fees in a striking example of devotion to the public interest. Id.

REV_00263729

n98. Michael Winesip, The Explorer on Trial, NY Times, Dec. 17, 2000, (Magazine), at 52 (describing the staffing, investigatory, and budget limitations of the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration).

n99. Keith Bradsher, Documents Portray Tire Debacle as a Story of Lost Opportunities, N.Y. Times, Sept. 11, 2000, at A1. The nondisclosure of this information raises serious problems of ethical obligations owed by attorneys to report damages to law enforcement officials. The problem of secret settlements may also provide a reason for concern. Jack B. Weinstein, Secrecy in Civil Trials, 9 Brook. J.L. & Soc. Pol. 53, 58 (2000).

n100. Am. Law Inst., 1 Reporters' Study: Enterprise Responsibility for Personal Injury, The Institutional Framework 398-402 (1991) [hereinafter Enterprise Responsibility].

n101. The study summarized its proposal for preclusion of tort liability for negligence as follows:

First, the risk must have been placed under regulatory control by a specialized administrative agency, a body with statutory authority to monitor and assess risk-creating activities in its area of responsibility, and with a mandate to establish and revise regularly specific regulatory controls on enterprise behavior... .

Second, the enterprise in question must have complied with all relevant regulatory requirements.

Third, the defendant must have publicly disclosed to the relevant regulatory agency any material information in its possession (or of which it has reason to be aware) concerning the risks posed by the defendant's activities and/or the means of controlling them. This requirement would extend to information indicating that agency standards or tests may be inadequate or inappropriate.

Enterprise Responsibility, supra note 100, at 95-97.

n102. Richard B. Stewart, Regulatory Compliance Preclusion of Tort Liability: Limiting the Dual Track System, 88 Geo. L.J. 2167, 2168 (2000) (citing Enterprise Responsibility, supra note 100, at 384).

REV_00263730

n103. Significantly, as civil rights abroad become more effective, American style litigation is expanding abroad. E.g., Suzanne Kepner, Britain's Legal Barriers Start to Fall, Discrimination Lawsuits Are Becoming More Common, N.Y. Times, Oct. 4, 2000, at W1 (proposes that "thanks, in part, to the cultural influence of America" smaller claims have been brought to court).

n104. The procedural techniques to aggregate and manage mass disaster cases, such as broad joinder devices and class actions, are creatures of equity. Promulgation of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in 1938 theoretically merged law and equity in the federal system, which is where most mass tort cases are filed. Jack B. Weinstein & Eileen B. Hershenov, The Effect of Equity on Mass Tort Law, 1991 U. Ill. L. Rev. 269, 279.

n105. In the Dalkon Shield litigation, some 195,000 claims have been filed since A.H. Robins's bankruptcy resulted in a personal injury compensation trust fund that will eventually total some $ 2.5 billion. The court appointed five trustees to carry out functions of the trust. The trustees were responsible for designing and implementing a claims-restitution facility pursuant to guidelines set out in the trust agreement for purposes of resolving personal injury claims. See id. The hundreds of millions in Agent Orange funds were used to aid tens of thousands of veterans and hundreds of thousands of family members in an administrative scheme. See Final Report of the Special Master in Agent Orange Litigation on the Distribution of the Agent Orange Settlement Fund, Sept. 1997, In re "Agent Orange" Product Liability Litigation, MDL No. 381.

n106. See generally Thomas W. Merrill, Capture Theory and the Courts: 1967-1983, 72 Chi.-Kent L. Rev. 1039 (1997) (discussing the development of administrative legal doctrine).

n107. Bob Van Voris, Tire Deaths: Criminal Acts?, Nat'l L.J., Sept. 18, 2000, at A1 (discussing the involvement of the U.S. government in the Bridgestone/Firestone controversy).

n108. Paul Strauss, Handling a Plaintiff's Sexual Harassment Case, 26 Litigation 4, 37 (2000) (discussing limitations of EEOC interviews and investigations); Tom Hamburger, Laurie McGinley & David S. Cloud, Industries That Backed Bush Are Now Seeking Return on Investment, Wall St. J., Mar. 3, 2001, at 1; John Harwood & Kathy Chen, Under President Bush, Regulatory Rollback Has a Major Impact, Wall St. J., Aug. 3, 2001, at 1 (describing "quiet revolution" of regulatory relaxation for banks, hospitals, oil companies, telecommunication giants employers, and corporations); e.g., Tom Brune, Reno: $ 23M Needed in Big Tobacco Suit, Newsday, Oct. 6, 2000, at A16 ("Reno also objected to provisions [of a proposed statute effectively cutting off funds to prosecution of tobacco companies] saying that could "allow politics to interfere with the conduct of litigation.'"); see also Leslie Wayne & Michael Moss, Bailout for Airlines Showed the Weight of a Mighty Lobby, N.Y. Times, Oct. 10, 2001, at A1.

REV_00263731

n109. Richard B. Stewart, Regulatory Compliance Preclusion of Tort Liability: Limiting the Dual-Track System, 88 Geo. L.J. 2167 (2000).

n110. The recent "revelation" that Firestone tires used on heavy Ford sports utility automobiles had dangerous tread separation problems, probably leading to scores of deaths, is instructive. In 1978 there was a recall of almost fifteen million Firestone tires that had passed government tests devised for an earlier technology, but insufficient for new steel belted tires. New regulations were drafted in 1980. But the next administration cancelled procedures to devise any new regulations and the budget of the National Highway Safety Commission was sharply cut to avoid the "high cost of government regulation on the industry." Keith Bradsher, Stricter Rules for Tire Safety Were Scrapped by Reagan, N.Y. Times, Sept. 4, 2000, at A10. Neither Congress nor the executive branch adequately protected the public. See Joan Claybrook, Congress's Part in the Firestone Crises, N.Y. Times, Sept. 4, 2000 at A17. Now the administrative branch may require the recall of many millions of tires at an expense of hundreds of millions of dollars, but after extensive loss of life and injuries resulting from the defects. We can also expect private class action and individual suits for death, injuries and property damage in the tire cases. Although the threat of private suits did not prevent either the 1978 or 2000 recall fiascoes, I am convinced that such suits do discourage carelessness and cover-ups of dangers by industry. Potential civil suits are an important back-up for governmental inadequacy. Keith Bradsher, Documents Portray Tire Debacle as a Story of Lost Opportunities, N.Y. Times, Sept. 11, 2000, at A1, A23 (discussing information sharing between personal injury attorneys regarding the Firestone's situation); see also Howard M. Erichson, Coattail Class Actions: Reflections on Microsoft, "Tobacco' and the Mixing of Public and Private Lawyering in Mass Litigation, 34 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 1, 6 (2000) (describing the relationship between private and public lawyering); Joseph L. Gastwirth, Suggestions for Reconciling the Values of Statistical Science with the Goals and Need of the Legal and Regulatory Processes, Proceedings of the Section on Epidemiology, Am. Stat. Ass'n (1998) (impact of delayed warning on some substances can entail substantial risk to public). In a letter dated March 13, 2001 to the author, Professor Gastwirth concludes that some 100 cases of Reye syndrome may have been averted if the FDA had not delayed warnings of the affect of aspirin on children in 1982.

n111. Jack B. Weinstein, A View from the Judiciary, 13 Cardozo L. Rev. 1957 (1992) (Proceedings of the Administrative Conference of the United States, October 31, 1991 Colloquy: An Administrative Alternative to Tort Litigation to Resolve Asbestos Claims). Neither administrative nor criminal law will stop attorneys who see big bucks in civil litigation. See, e.g., Bob Van Voris & Matt Fleischer, Feeding Frenzy over Firestone, Nat'l L.J., Sept. 11, 2000, at A1 (discussing plaintiff attorney preparation for possible Firestone litigation); Center for Auto Safety, Car Owners Sue Bridgestone, Say Recall Insufficient, 69 U.S. L. Wk. Aug. 29, 2000, at 2123; see also, e.g., Jenna Greene, FTC Affected by Deluge of Mergers, Nat'l L.J., Sept. 18, 2000, at B5 (discussing FTC difficulties at prosecuting violations in areas other than mergers); Gretchen Morgenson, Many Holes Weaken Safety Net for Victims of Failed Brokerages, N.Y. Times, Sept. 25, 2000, at A1; Mathew L. Ward & Keith Bradsher, Safety Agency Wants Increase in Its Authority, N.Y. Times, Sept. 9, 2000, at C1 (discussing the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration's request for more money to investigate safety problems).

n112. The author recently heard a case that provides an intriguing example of the limitations of criminal restitution. In a scheme involving fraudulently rolled back automobile odometers, the government was unable to identify the victims of the fraud. The defendant's activities extended from 1990 until late 1996. By this time, many of the consumers had already resold the cars to second or third generation purchasers without suspecting the fraud. The U.S. Attorney stated in the pre-sentencing report that tracing chains of ownership would be labor-intensive and time-consuming. Moreover, given the number of victims in the case, the difficulty in setting a fair market value for each vehicle at the time of its fraudulent sale, and the difficulty of calculating the value of extra charges (such as the increased finance charges or insurance costs) it is impossible to set an exact restitution amount.

REV_00263732

United States v. Faden, Docket No. 99 CR 275-01 Pre-Sentence Investigation Report, March 31, 1999. A plaintiff's attorney interested in certifying a class has a market incentive to identify these victims for the purposes of compensation.

n113. See Jack B. Weinstein, Secrecy in Civil Trials: Some Tentative Views, 9 J.L. & Pol'y 53, 58 (2000); Jack B. Weinstein & Catherine Wimberly, Secrecy in Law and Science, 23 Cardozo L. Rev. 1 (2001) (forthcoming).

n114. Notably, the 1991 A.L.I. study recommendations would only grant regulatory compliance as a defense to liability if defendants publicly disclosed relevant information concerning the risks posed by their actions:

The defendant must have publicly disclosed to the relevant regulatory agency any material information in its possession (or of which it has reason to be aware) concerning the risks posed by the defendant's activities and/or the means of controlling them. This requirement would extend to information indicating that agency standards or tests may be inadequate or inappropriate.

Stewart, supra note 102, at 2168.

n115. See John Hart Ely, Democracy and Distrust 135-79 (1980); see also United States v. Carolene Prods. Co., 304 U.S. 144, 153 n.4 (1937) ("Prejudice against discrete and insular minorities may be a special condition ... curtail[ing] the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities ... may call for a correspondingly more searching judicial inquiry.").

n116. See Staci Jeanne Krupp, Environmental Hazards: Assessing the Risk to Women, 12 Fordham Envt'l L.J. 111 (2000) (describing how models used by the EPA are based on weight and fat levels of the average male and do not adequately protect the needs of women).

n117. E.g., Arbitration Ass'n, The Claims Resolution Process on Dormant Accounts in Switzerland (1999); Richard Capalli & Caludio Consolo, Class Actions for Continental Europe, against corporations and other malefactors. Providing victims with the power to obtain redress for their own injuries reflects the attitude of American society that such a system is more democratic (more responsive to victims needs) and more efficient (more reliant upon market forces and private initiative to bring about more complete and effective remedies).

REV_00263733

A striking example of this interplay followed the September 11, 2001, attack on the Pentagon and World Trade Center. In view of the resulting thousands of deaths and injuries and the likelihood of tens of thousands of suits in state and federal court with tens of billions of dollars in potential recoveries, Congress enacted the Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act. [35] It provided for an administrative agency (overseen by a special master [36]) to hear claims against the airlines (and possibly others) and provide swift compensation. [37] An attempt was also made to consolidate all private actions in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York with possibly some cooperation between the courts and the Special Master. [38] The concept of the Act appears [*956] to be based partly on a number of current federal administrative agencies. [39]

II. The Evolution of "Compensation"

In times past, with rudiments today, we essentially relied upon self-help to achieve compensation. This lawless procedure, with its inclination to invite new retaliations was slowly supplanted by religious and state regulation. These controls attempted to provide relief and protect the public with a more neutral process.

English and American models relied on growing governmental institutions such as professional police forces, criminal judicial systems, and prisons to punish and rehabilitate. In a recent development, criminal sentencing now emphasizes the rights of victims, [40] restitution, [41] and the seizing of assets through forfeiture, [42] as well as incarceration.

The basic goal of the criminal law is protection of the state and public rather than compensation of individuals. Heavy fines and forfeitures may in fact reduce the assets of defendants that are available to pay victims either through private litigation or restitution. Nevertheless, in criminal proceedings, the current tendency favors compensation through restitution of those injured by a crime. [43] A form of restitution without judicial intervention may take place even in the criminal investigative [*957] stage when the criminal realizes the game is up and pays back the victim "voluntarily." [44]

Administrative agencies serve a function similar to that of criminal law. [45] Regulation through continuous supervision and intervention of the [*958] government to prevent damages to the general population is the focus. The shift to administrative agencies with broad powers over pharmaceuticals, air and water, automobiles, discrimination, safety in the workplace, and consumer products and the like represents a tidal movement designed to protect the entire population. [46] These developments have considerably increased putative plaintiffs' protections. [47]

In addition to compensation of private persons and deterrence - now goals also of civil and criminal litigation - administrative law is designed primarily to prevent future harms to the general population by regulation. For example, it is much more effective in protecting those on the highways to regulate tires, air bags, instability, and the like before accidents occur by requiring safe construction through detailed standards, than by deterring dangerous design through the threat of future damage awards or fines. [48] The work of agencies such as the Nuclear Regulatory Commission is an extreme example of the need to regulate rather than solely to deter. [49]

[*959] In the past century tort law has expanded its primary role to compensate. [50] Beginning with the adoption of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in 1938, the law began to favor strongly those seeking private remedies in the courts. Broad as-of-right discovery,

REV_00263698

6 Temple Int. & Comp. L.J. 217, 218 (1993); Weinstein, Compensating, supra note 27. But see Phillippe A. Grumback, Notorious Swiss Holocaust Denier Imprisoned, Justice, Summer 2000, at 12 (three associations had right to appear in proceedings); Norbert W<um u>kler, United Nations Compensation Commission: A New Contribution to the Process of International Claims Resolution, J. Int'l Econ. L. 249 (1999).

It is interesting to refer to the "clash" between the Americans and Japanese respecting their versions of constitutional democracy, which was "seen" by the Americans who, in effect, wrote the new Japanese constitution. See John W. Dower, Embracing Defeat, Japan in the Wake of World War II 353 (1999).

In mid-February 1946, ... Matsumoto attempted to persuade occupation authorities that fundamental differences between East and West were at issue here. "A juridical system is very much like certain kinds of plants, which transplanted from their native soil, degenerate, or even die," he wrote in a memorandum to [U.S.] GHQ. "Some of [the] roses of the West, when cultivated in Japan, lose their fragrance totally." This East-is-East-and-West-is-West improvisation was less red rose than red herring, for far more was involved here than white men's flora ill suited to Eastern soil, or a simplistic clash between "Western" and "Japanese" cultures. The basic conflict lay between two Western systems of legal thinking. Put over simply, these experts, well grounded in German legislative and administrative law and a German-style "theory of state structure," were largely indifferent to American concerns about popular sovereignty and human rights."

Id.

n118. E.g., Fred Anderson, Crucible of War: The Seven Years' War and the Fate of Empire in British North America, 1754-1766, at 219-22 (2000) ("exasperating," independence of colonial soldiers, "colonial obstinacy," "resistance to imperial authority"; contrasted with attitude of British Commander "that his authority flowed from the royal prerogative and royal commission" with command control over colonial governors, officers, legislatures, and troops); Joyce Appleby, Inheriting the Revolution, The First Generation of Americans 5 (2000) ("Independence made possible the creation of a distinctive American Society that honored individual initiative, institutional restraint and popular public participation."); id. at 7 ("the autonomous individual emerged as an ideal"); id. at 26 ("Thomas Jefferson's presidential election ushered in an era of participatory politics, making way for a distinctive American political culture.") id. at 75 ("The principal citizens of American cities were merchants or lawyers - the former to make the money, the latter to adjudicate the suits that money provoked."); id. at 109 ("lawyers were abundant"); see also Alan Ryan, My Way, N.Y. Rev., Aug. 10, 2000, at 47 (more self-seeking than communitarian efforts by Americans). But cf. Larry McMurty, Inventing the West, N.Y. Rev., Aug. 10, 2000, at 24 ("most of the traditions which we associate with the American West were invented by pulp writers, poster artists, impresarios, and advertising men.").

n119. E.g., In re Rashid, 210 F.3d 201, 208 (3d Cir. 2000) (restitution to fraud victim entered prior to October 1998 amendments to the Bankruptcy Code are dischargeable if payable to private parties, but not if payable to the government).

n120. E.g., Summary of Report of the United States Judicial Conference Committee on

REV_00263734

Federal-State Jurisdiction, March 2000 (recommendation that Congress be urged to provide for state courts as the primary forum for personal injury claims arising from denial of health benefits).

n121. E.g., Administrative Procedure Act (APA), 5 U.S.C. 553(c) (1994) ("After notice required by this section, the agency shall give interested persons an opportunity to participate in the rule making through submission of written data, views, or arguments with or without opportunity for oral presentation.").

n122. According to Michael Solender, General Counsel of the Consumer Product Safety Commission, "the overriding issues in our cases are typically different from private litigation. Our cases focus on the risk to the public and the conduct of the company, not on whether an individual deserves compensation for his or her injury." CPSC Letter to author, 2 (Sept. 6, 2000). CPSC counsel is generally discouraged from coordinating activities with plaintiff's counsel, and "strives to treat all plaintiff and defense lawyers evenhandedly" to avoid an appearance of conflict. Id. The FTC, which unlike the CPSC seeks disgorgement in addition to equitable relief and penalties, generally only seeks this relief "in cases that do not require the application of agency expertise to develop new principles of law." Letter from General Counsel Valentine, to author 3 (Sept. 1, 2000).

n123. See Weinstein, Compensating, supra note 27. The U.S. Attorney General guidelines actually call for similar victim contact in criminal matters. For example, the guidelines state:

[A] toll free telephone number system can be established that not only would permit victims to call in and get recorded information concerning the status of the matter, but would actually call the victims to alert them to a change in status. With individuals' increasing ability to access the Internet, Web sites can be created that contain information concerning the progress of investigations and prosecutions.

U.S. Dep't of Justice Attorney General Guidelines for Victim and Witness Assistance 13, Jan. 13, 2000. I have not spoken with many attorneys who knew of these guidelines or consistently follow them.

n124. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(d).

n125. Once guilt is established beyond a reasonable doubt, sentencing decision on restitution and the like are made by the judge utilizing a preponderance standard.

n126. See Krupp, supra note 116 ("governmental regulation provides women little protection").

REV_00263735

n127. New York state agencies enjoy less oversight than federal agencies. E.g., Steadman v. SEC, 450 U.S. 91, 102 (1981) (holding that under section 7(c) of the Administrative Procedure Act, a sanction may not be imposed or rule or order issued unless the case is proved by a preponderance of the evidence); David Siegal, Only an "Abuse of Discretion" that "Shocks the Conscious" Can Be Used by a Court to Overturn Sanction by an Agency, N.Y. L. Digest, Feb. 2001 (discussing Featherstone v. Franco, 95 N.Y.2d 550 (2000)); Thomas R. Newman & Steven J. Ahmuty Jr., Review of Administrative Penalties, N.Y.L.J., May 2, 2001, at 3 (discussing New York case law).

n128. E.g., Smolen v. Chater, 80 F.3d 1273, 1281 (9th Cir. 1996) (denial of Social Security benefits must be supported by clear and convincing evidence).

n129. See 42 U.S.C. 423(f) (1994); Jack B. Weinstein, Equality and the Law: Social Security Disability Cases in the Federal Courts, 35 Syracuse L. Rev. 897, 902 (1984).

n130. As a result of the different burdens of proof and substantive and mental elements, an acquittal in a criminal case does not have a collateral estoppel effect in a civil one. No situation more vividly illustrates this fact than the O.J. Simpson trials. A refusal of an administrative agency to act will not preclude a civil suit on the initiative of private litigants.

n131. Plaintiff's attorneys have already become adept at using government agency studies published on the Internet to their advantage. See Erichson, supra note 110, at 1; Robert J. Ambrogi, From Tobacco Hazard to Auto Safety, Sites Abound, Nat'l L.J., Mar. 26, 2001, at B9. In qui tam actions, if the Department of Justice does not intervene, private attorneys can themselves run with the ball. Sometimes the urge to obtain fees can appear unseemly. E.g., Van Voris & Fleischer, supra note 111, at 2 (describing several attorneys' efforts to capitalize a Firestone tire recall); Alison Frankel, Tobacco Fees, Am. Law., Sept. 2000, at 98.

n132. Cf. Lindblom, supra note 33; Victor E. Schwartz, Finally, a Chance to Reform Product Liability Law, Wall St. J., Sept. 9, 1992, at A15 (proposing federal product liability law as method to clarify law of punitive damages).

n133. For example, the court of appeals for the First Circuit upheld Massachusetts' restrictions on cigarette advertisements in the state's three largest metropolitan areas after they were attacked on preemption grounds. See Consolidated Cigar Corp. v. Reilly, 218 F.3d 30 (1st Cir. 2000), rev'd sub nom. Lorillard Tobacco Co. v. Reilly, 121 S. Ct. 2404 (2001). See discussion in Blue Cross & Blue Sheild of N.J., Inc. v. Philip Morris, Inc., No. 98 CV 3287 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 4, 2001) (Memorandum and Order).

n134. E.g., United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321 (1998) (holding that Excessive Fines Clause applies to forfeiture).

REV_00263736

n135. While the mens rea problem is not extreme in administrative rulings, in general, it would seem appropriate to approach the roles of the administrative agency in much the same way as the criminal prosecutor - i.e., the administrative agency should not be used primarily to enforce tort liability.

n136. For an interesting example of the interplay between criminal and civil prosecutions, see Douglas Franz et al., The Unraveling of a Conspiracy: Private Files Fuel an Art Auction Inquiry, N.Y. Times, Oct. 8, 2000, at A1.

n137. When the criminal, administrative, and civil actions are brought separately, the opposite risk also exists - the possibility of double recovery by some victims. Consolidation before one judge is the most effective way to avoid this problem. Judges can deal with this potential difficulty on a case by case basis. E.g., SEC v. Palmisano, 135 F.3d 860, 865-66 (2d Cir. 1998); SEC v. First Jersey Sec., Inc., 101 F.3d 1450, 1475 (2d Cir. 1996) (upholding award of disgorgement to agency with set-off amounts paid to private litigants in prior settlement).

n138. An example is the tobacco passive exposure to smoke class action on behalf of flight attendants in Florida. Broin v. Philip Morris Co., 641 So. 2d 888 (Fl. Dist. Ct. App. 1994); Miami Trial Settles, Legal Intelligencer, Feb. 10, 1998, at 4. The result, appropriately I think, was the provision of medical treatment for the flight attendants rather than compensation to the individual members of the class.

n139. See Letter from Eric Schaeffer of the EPA, supra note 15.

n140. I am not here dealing with the substantive matters of what the tort law is or the scope of preemption or the kind of regulatory compliance preclusion that may block private suits. See Robert L. Rabin, Reassessing Regulatory Compliance, 88 Geo. L.J. (2000) (distinguishing related doctrines of regulatory compliance and preemption); Symposium, Regulatory Compliance as a Defense to Product Liability, 88 Geo. L.J. 2049 (2000).

n141. See Weinstein, Mass Tort, supra note 27, at 145.

n142. E.g., Note, Firestone Litigants Ask Multidistrict Panel for Consolidated Pretrial Proceedings, Class Action Litigation Reporter, Sept. 22, 2000, at 3888 (defendants seek consolidation of more suits based on defective tires in one federal district court).

REV_00263737

n143. See 28 U.S.C. 1407(a) (Supp. IV 1998); Lexecon Inc. v. Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach, 523 U.S. 26, 40 (1998).

n144. See 28 U.S.C. 1404.

n145. Compare 28 U.S.C. 1391 (1994) (civil venue provisions), with U.S. Const. amend. VI ("In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall ... [be tried by a] an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed ... .").

n146. See 28 U.S.C. 1441.

n147. Deborah R. Hensler et al., Class Action Dilemmas 28-31 (2000).

n148. John C. Goldberg & Benjamin C. Zipinsky, The Third Restatement and the Place of Duty in Negligence, 54 Vand. L. Rev. (forthcoming 2000).

n149. E.g., Dick Thornburgh, Sue, but Don't Prosecute, N.Y. Times, Sept. 20, 2000, at A27; Carol Vogel & Ralph Blumenthal, Art Auction Houses Agree to Pay $ 512 Million in Price Fixing Cases, N.Y. Times, Sept. 23, 2000, at A1; Carol Vogel & Ralph Blumenthal, Ex-Chief to Pay Bulk of Claims for Sotheby's, N.Y. Times, Sept. 25, 2000, at A1 ($ 156 million and $ 30 million).

n150. E.g., Edward W. Gerecke, Halting Regulation Through Litigation, Nat'l L.J., Oct. 9, 2000, at B11 ("In these gun and tobacco cases, a sometimes frustrated, and oftentimes very willing, governmental entity joins forces with teams of lawyers to pursue the industry. Many of these lawyers have the financial capacity to take on an industry ... .").

n151. E.g., Abrams, supra note 21, at 539, 559-74 (discussing rule making by the Department of Justice and Sentencing Commission). These agencies could provide guidelines for integrating civil and criminal practice in compensation. The Attorney General Guidelines for Victim and Witness Assistance recognizes that "the use of representative victims and victim proxies (such as organizations that represent the interests of the victim class or actual class action representatives)" may be appropriate methods to provide victims with notice and information. Office of the Attorney Gen., U.S. Dep't of Justice, Attorney General Guidelines for Victim and Witness Assistance 2000, at 13 (2000). Given the complexity of the issues that I have outlined above, more guidance will be necessary.

n152. See generally Weinstein, Individual Justice, supra note 27; Weinstein, Mass Tort, supra note 27; Weinstein, Compensating, supra note 27.

REV_00263738

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" and "mass torts" and date(aft 1997) and settlement and terrorism (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Thursday, September 12, 2002 - 2:36 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

flexible pleadings, consolidation of related cases, multidistrict transfers, long-arm statutes, as well as the relaxation of exclusionary evidence rules, tended to favor those plaintiffs seeking help from the courts. [51] Amendments to the Federal Rules as, for example, those widening Rule 23 on class actions, have tended to enhance the power of plaintiffs. [52]

[*960] The bankruptcy laws have also been useful in enhancing civil recoveries. [53] Some experts have suggested expanded bankruptcy as a substitute for class actions. [54] They underestimate, in my opinion, the transactional and other costs of bankruptcy and the difficulties of coordinating the bankruptcy proceedings with related civil cases.

Taking advantage of the open door to the courthouse has been a skilled plaintiffs' bar that has, partly through generous contingency fees and advertising, become powerful and well coordinated. In mass cases, the power of plaintiffs' and defendants' bars and the procedures available to them is now fairly equal. [55]

III. Examples

Having three separate branches of the law simultaneously providing compensation to the same victims for the same delicts creates difficulties. First is the obvious problem of duplicative (or triplicate) litigation. To have the same matter relitigated, often in different courts, wastes resources and sometimes risks conflicting approaches and outcomes. Such repetitive litigation can squander a defendant's resources, preventing victims from receiving as much compensation as they should. Partial fusion of the administrative, criminal, and tort systems offers an opportunity to amalgamate, enabling imposition of criminal and administrative controls and sanctions while compensating individuals for their losses in a coordinated civil proceeding. A few of my cases over the past several years illustrate the opportunities that this development offers, but also exposes some of the problems. The expansion of criminal and administrative actions into areas traditionally reserved for tort law poses problems of integration, communication among parties and institutions, and compensation for the victims.

A. The Docket of a District Court

An illustrative case is United States v. Ferranti. [56] It involved a particularly heinous arson. The defendant had set his store on fire at night. It was located on the ground floor of a three-story building. The upper [*961] floors contained occupied residential apartments. The building was virtually destroyed, leaving the tenants psychologically seared and homeless, with most of their possessions gone. Even worse, a firefighter had been killed in attempting to contain the blaze.

In determining the proper fine and amount of restitution, this case was relatively simple because it involved only a single federal criminal prosecution. The award of restitution was authorized only for the loss caused by the specific conduct constituting the offense, [57] but that loss plus a fine absorbed all of the defendant's assets. Thus, there was no point in victims' bringing any separate civil proceeding. The sentencing took on a quasi-civil aspect because it was used to fulfill some of the goals of the tort system. [58] It was necessary for the court to analyze the assets of the defendant, which were sizeable, and to determine the amount of monetary harm the numerous victims had suffered.

The court ordered restitution of almost $ 1.5 million, allocating it among the tenants, the City of New York, insurance companies and owners of damaged real property. The rest of the defendant's assets were taken in fines. Because the defendant's real property had to be completely liquidated, the court ordered that the defendant provide the U.S. Attorney's Office with full information regarding his property so that it could monitor the sales. The distribution of assets was through the Court Clerk's Office and the Probation Department. [59] Had the assets of the defendant been greater, a civil suit would almost surely have been brought on behalf of some of the injured to recover for their emotional damages and possibly for punitive damages. The restitution statutes do not now cover such losses; [60] a separate civil action to recover such damages is required, unless the defendant voluntarily consents to pay. [61]

REV_00263699

A second litigation, United States v. Cheung, [62] was somewhat more complicated. It consisted of both a criminal prosecution and a parallel federal civil suit. Both proceedings were before me. The case involved a ponzi-type financial fraud that mulcted Chinese immigrants. The defendant was indicted and also sued by a class of the victims pursuant to civil [*962] RICO. [63] I sought to ensure that the victims received maximum recovery while minimizing transaction costs.

Through coordinated efforts of the magistrate judge, the Assistant U.S. Attorney, plaintiffs' counsel in the class action, and the FBI, a disposition was reached in which the defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of the indictment and the civil litigation was settled for $ 200,000, to be divided among the class members and the plaintiffs' attorney. As part of the sentence, the court ordered $ 1.25 million in restitution (essentially all of the defendants remaining assets) that was shared among all the victims. Distribution of the funds involved cooperation of the Probation Department, the U.S. Attorney, and private counsel for the victims. [64] Private counsel received an appropriate fee. He had played a useful role explaining to his clients what was happening. The victims appeared with class counsel before the court at the sentencing to express their rage.

In order to avoid any impropriety in the Cheung case, not only did I avoid participating in plea negotiations, (which the criminal law explicitly precludes), [65] but I declined involvement in the civil case as well. Because the two sets of negotiations were so closely related, I felt that involvement in either would raise the specter of impropriety. This detachment was also important when I conducted fairness hearings.

The third case, United States v. Rubin, [66] a securities fraud matter, raised more difficult problems. The criminal proceeding was the only part of the litigation in my court. Also pending were a class action in the Southern District of New York and an action brought by the SEC in the District of Columbia. In this situation, the three models, which should work together, were relatively uncoordinated except by counsel for the defendant. One of the considerations in the criminal case was to ensure that fines payable to the government would not so strip the defendant of assets as to make it impossible to make whole those defrauded. That was accomplished by setting aside enough restitution money through the criminal case to provide payments in the settled class action.

It was necessary in Rubin to determine what assets the defendant possessed so that victims were not shortchanged. Counsel for the defendant, the plaintiffs in the class action, and the U.S. Attorney prosecuting the criminal action appeared to be cooperating in exploring what could be paid. The SEC seemed quiescent, though it had threatened to seek appointment of a receiver to secure the defendant's assets. The government in the criminal case contended that during the pendency of these three proceedings, the defendant divested himself of most of his assets. Yet, in neither its criminal nor its administrative capacity had the government [*963] sought injunctions or liens to prevent a possible loss of assets that might have been used for disgorgement or restitution in the criminal or SEC actions. By contrast, the plaintiffs' attorneys in the civil action moved promptly to ensure that assets sufficient to settle the civil case were set aside.

The Rubin case is further complicated by the fact that the defendant appears to be suffering from the early stages of Alzheimer's disease. By criminal statute, funds for a defendant's support and treatment and for care of his family must be taken into account, reducing the funds available for a restitution order [67] - factors not ordinarily considered in a civil or administrative proceeding.

REV_00263700

Putative defendants have often avoided criminal prosecutions, or arranged for reduced pleas, by consenting to compensate victims. The hammer over their heads is the threat of a criminal or administrative prosecution. The use of district attorneys as collection agencies for locally favored institutions was at one time pervasive.

B. Administrative Law Examples

The growing emphasis on protection of the safety of the population at large by administrative and criminal agencies has reduced the need for tort law as a deterrent to dangerous conduct. Examples regularly appear in the press showing the shift towards administrative law. [68]

A recent case involved allegedly anticompetitive behavior by Mylan Laboratories, a generic drug manufacturer. Mylan faced an action brought by the FTC as well as several private law suits. An agreement, in which Mylan agreed to pay $ 147 million, has reportedly been reached with the government and most of the private litigants. Much of the money will be used to compensate those who were forced to pay higher drug prices. Some $ 35 million will be used to settle some of the private lawsuits, and $ 12 million will go to the government and private attorneys. [69]

The Mylan result seems to benefit all the parties involved. The defendant has settled virtually all of the litigation against it and paid a substantial penalty for its behavior; the government and private attorneys were able to coordinate their actions, expediting a solution to this case in a single settlement; and, most importantly, restitution will be used to benefit those who were harmed by anticompetitive action.

[*964] In another recent incident - the ValueJet Airlines crash in the Everglades that killed 110 people in 1996 - a federal judge in a criminal case ordered a contractor, SabreTech, to pay $ 2 million in fines and $ 9 million in restitution for illegally causing the transportation of hazardous waste that contributed to the accident. [70] The National Transportation Safety Board (NTSB) split the blame for the crash among SabreTech, ValueJet, and the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) for lax oversight of the fast-growing discount airline. SabreTech's insurers have reportedly paid $ 262 million to settle lawsuits by the families of the victims. Private litigations can go forward (assuming the defendant has any assets). Finally, SabreTech has been charged with murder in state court. [71]

What is particularly interesting about SabreTech's defending in multiple venues is the relationship of the case to punitive damages. To the extent that the criminal and administrative penalties cover the full social costs and punishment for a massive wrong there seems to me to be little justification for adding punitive damages to an individual's compensatory tort judgment.

These cases are illustrative of a growing phenomenon - the seeking of restitution or disgorgement by administrative agencies. [72] For example, in the Mylan case, the district court held that the FTC had disgorgement authority pursuant to section 13(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act. [73] The FTC argued in Mylan - a contention accepted by five courts of appeals and many district courts - that its power to seek injunctive relief includes the power to order disgorgement and restitution. [74] Central to the FTC's argument was that "companies, if advised by counsel that the only remedy [the FTC possesses] is [an order] to cease engaging in illegal conduct, will go ahead with the bad behavior until someone tells them to stop." [75] The court's ruling that the FTC had this power to order disgorgement undoubtedly helped settle the related litigations.

In another case, the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit ruled that the FDA has the authority to seek restitution in connection [*965] with its supervision of pharmaceuticals. [76] This case was relied upon by the FDA in suggesting disgorgement by

REV_00263701

Abbot Laboratory, resulting in a $ 100 million settlement. Pressure was applied jointly by the FDA and the Department of Justice seeking a global settlement without, apparently, cooperating with the private attorneys for the injured. [77]

The SEC itself has the power to administer a restitution fund. [78] This authority stems from its exercise of ancillary jurisdiction. [79]

C. Conclusions

These examples illustrate three important concepts. First, and perhaps most obvious, is the powerful authority criminal prosecutors and [*966] administrative agencies possess. In Ferranti, Cheung, and Rubin, the U.S. Attorney along with the probation department were responsible for recommending large fines and restitution, locating victims, monitoring the liquidation of assets and ensuring that the defendant retained adequate funds to compensate victims. Mylan and SabreTech illustrate how administrative agencies, like the FTC and FDA, are not only assuming larger roles in coordinating litigation, but seeking fines and disgorgement that may cover the full social cost of a massive wrong.

Second, these cases suggest that despite their increased authority, prosecutors and administrative agents are not always well suited to facilitate communication with, and provide effective remedies for, victims. In Cheung, the private plaintiff's lawyer was largely responsible for communicating with the victims, and in Rubin, the combined efforts of the U.S. Attorney's Office and the SEC proved to be less effective than those of private attorneys in protecting the funds necessary to compensate victims. The tort model continued to play an important role in addressing victims needs.

Finally, these examples demonstrate the desirability of guidelines that instruct attorneys and judges on how to coordinate and balance criminal, administrative, and private actions. The Mylan result benefited all the parties involved partly because the government and private attorneys were apparently able to coordinate their actions, expediting a comprehensive remedy in a single settlement. As administrative agencies and prosecutors exercise additional authority to address victims' needs, resolving conflicts of interest and better communication among themselves and with private counsel and the aggrieved will be essential to providing fair and adequate relief.

IV. The Trend Against Compensating Victims Through the Tort System

While criminal and administrative law have moved towards victim compensation as one of their goals (even if it is a secondary one), concurrently there has been a recent marked attempt to limit the power of recovery through the civil system. [80] Congress, state tort reforms, federal court decisions, increased use of alternative dispute resolution, [*967] and parens patriae suits have all tended to limit the traditional effectiveness of the privately driven tort system.

Diverting and limiting private suits to vindicate tort rights is not new. Workers' compensation laws were adopted some one hundred years ago. They have served fairly well to reduce transactional costs while speeding modest recoveries without a required showing of fault. [81] The black lung cases, unlike asbestos, have been removed from the courts and assigned to administrative resolution; [82] the high costs, however, have somewhat soured Congress on this technique of using administrative agencies to compensate. [83] In the matter of children's vaccines, Congress has drawn most claims into the government-administered compensation program, reportedly at low costs of administration. [84]

An obvious example of the trend away from traditional private litigation is the concerted political effort to restrict civil actions in mass cases. [85] Tort reform in the states, sparked primarily by powerful potential defendants, has truncated substantive tort law, established procedural roadblocks, and capped remedies. Extensive limits on personal injury claims in the automobile field have also had some success in taking many relatively minor auto cases out of the courts. [86]

REV_00263702

[*968] The federal courts themselves have attempted, particularly at the appellate level, to limit class and other aggregate actions. [87] Judicial door-closing was recently accelerated slightly when Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure was amended to permit interlocutory appeals from class certification orders, enabling the appellate courts to quash class actions quickly before settlement. [88]

Another federal development that has had some impact in reducing civil litigation alternatives is the preemption doctrine. [89] It allows the federal courts to throttle private state tort law. [90] The Supreme Court has been cautious in utilizing this technique to convert shielding federal statutes into swords striking at state litigation and administrative protections. [91]

Increased reliance by private and public institutions on Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR) techniques has drained a good deal of potential civil litigation out of the courts. [92] The tendency to rely on ADR in [*969] securities disputes, labor matters, and international business disputes has been striking. [93]

Another important example of bypassing traditional private tort law is the recoveries sought by state and federal attorneys general. For example, in tobacco cases, they have acted as parens patriae on behalf of consumers, but using private plaintiffs' attorneys to conduct much of the litigation. [94]

V. Costs and Benefits of Mass Actions

There are advantages and disadvantages to shifting compensation for private wrongs from the private system to the criminal and administrative systems. On the one hand, the tort model may be subject to abuse. Plaintiff attorneys may charge excessive fees, have conflicts with their clients and the public interest, deter technological innovation, and create high transaction costs for victims and society. But, on the other hand, as my own experience has convinced me in cases that I have presided over - such as Agent Orange, DES, asbestos, tobacco, gun, and breast implants - the tort model provides an effective democratic and egalitarian means for protecting victims and ensuring that their injuries are properly compensated. On the whole, the tort system can be more flexible, prevent agency capture, promote procedural and substantive law innovations, and be more sensitive to people's needs than governmental processes. [95]

Private mass actions are subject to abuse. Particularly upsetting to some are the billions of dollars in legal fees in the recent tobacco cases. [96] While private lawyers have the opportunity and obligation to stay in [*970] touch with clients, some have disregarded this role. [97] Personal injury lawyers sometimes also neglect their larger obligation to the public interest in their "vigorous advocacy." As personal injury lawyers shared with each other information about dozens of deaths involving Ford Explorers equipped with Firestone Tires, they reportedly held back much of the information from federal regulators. In this instance, the general lack of confidence in the National Highway Transit Safety Administration may have been reasonable. [98] According to one report on the coordination of lawsuits against auto and tire makers, plaintiffs lawyers feared prompting a federal investigation that could unfairly find Firestone tires free of defects. [99]

Private litigation may also chill scientific innovation and create high transaction costs for victims and society at large. A 1991 ALI study suggested that the tort system, combined with administrative regulation, might over-deter development of technologically complex products such as drugs, vaccines, and aircrafts. [100] The study recommended that industry compliance with federal regulations plus preemption be used as a limited defense to product liability

REV_00263703

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" and date(aft 1997) and koenig and settlement (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*1998 Wis. L. Rev. 101, **

Copyright (c) 1998 Wisconsin Law Review.
University of Wisconsin

1998

1998 Wis. L. Rev. 101

LENGTH: 15562 words

THE INCIDENCE, SCOPE, AND PURPOSE OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES: ARTICLE: RECONSIDERING INSURANCE FOR PUNITIVE DAMAGES

Tom Baker *

* Connecticut Mutual Professor and Director, Insurance Law Center, University of Connecticut School of Law. Copyright, January 1997, Tom Baker. Thank you to Mary Coombs, Clark Freshman and David Luban for comments on an earlier draft.

SUMMARY:
... (3) Contract provisions intended to eliminate coverage for claims that are likely to result in punitive damage awards; and ...

TEXT: [*101]

I. Introduction

Many courts refuse on policy grounds to enforce contracts to provide insurance for punitive damages, to the general applause of academic commentary. [1] According to the conventional wisdom, insurance for punitive damages defeats the purposes of those damages and therefore courts should prohibit that insurance. This Article reexamines the conventional wisdom in light of basic information about the liability insurance market and concludes that there is little evidence of a need for this particular form of judicial regulation.

The next two parts of this Article set the scene for the main discussion in Part IV. Part II reviews the deterrence and retribution objections to insurance for punitive damages. Part III then describes restrictions that insurance companies have placed on the insurance they offer for punitive damages and explains those restrictions as efforts to control moral hazard and adverse selection.

Part IV considers the case for judicial regulation of punitive damages insurance in light of these market restrictions. Part IV argues that the twin problems of moral hazard and adverse selection provide insurance companies with adequate incentive to address the deterrence objection to punitive damages insurance and that the companies' control over underwriting and contracting places them in a better position than courts to address that objection. Therefore, there is no need for courts to act on deterrence grounds to prohibit insurance for punitive damages.

REV_00263740

large punitive damages awards does not exist in any practical sense, because individuals and small businesses rarely purchase insurance with the kinds of limits that would be needed to cover multi-million dollar awards. [58]

Of course, empirical research suggests that the far more common punitive damages award is well under $ 100,000. [59] At least among the business and professional classes in the United States, automobile and general liability insurance coverage at that level is widely purchased. Thus, the available insurance limits would be insufficient to pay punitive damages only in the exceptionally egregious case--when the jury really became angry at the defendant. This suggests that insurance policy limits may function, in a very rough way, to ameliorate some of the prevention and retribution-based concerns about insurance for punitive damages. If the jury really wants to impose a million dollar punishment on an individual or a small business defendant, there is a good chance that award will exceed the available insurance limits.

[*119] In the large commercial insurance market, substantial policy limits are far more common. Indeed, in commercial liability insurance cases in which I have participated, annual limits well into the hundreds of millions of dollars are not unusual. [60] This suggests that, except in the mass tort situation, dollar limits alone do not effectively limit the punitive damages insurance coverage available to corporate America.

Nevertheless, as discussed below, I have a working assumption that punitive damages exclusions are more common in umbrella and excess policies. To the degree this is so, the dollar limits on primary insurance coverage would tend to limit the punitive damages coverage for the large corporate market in much the same way as insurance purchasing patterns limit the punitive damages coverage in the personal and small business markets.

C. Contract Provisions

Although insurance underwriting and dollar limits on insurance policies do restrict insurance for punitive damages in a manner that answers some of the theoretical objections to such insurance, these two aspects of insurance practice are hardly a complete answer to those objections. If there is to be a real answer--and I believe there is, especially for the prevention-based objections--it has to come from the insurance contract.

There are three types of contract provisions that reduce the insurance coverage that would otherwise be provided for punitive damages claims under standard liability insurance policies: intentional harm exclusions, punitive damages exclusions, and claim-specific exclusions. The paragraphs that follow describe each of these.

1. intentional harm exclusions

Standard general liability insurance forms exclude coverage for bodily injury and property damage that is "expected or intended from the standpoint of the insured." [61] The requirement in the standard automobile liability policy that the injury or damage be "caused by accident" serves a similar function. [62] Courts differ on the precise meaning given to these words, but the common idea is the elimination of liability insurance coverage in situations in which the insured knew or [*120] should have known to a very high probability that harm would result. [63] Insurance companies have long included such exclusions in their policies because of concerns about moral hazard, in both the "situational" and "individual" senses of that term. [64]

Insurance for intentional harm raises serious situational moral hazard concerns. [65] As discussed in the context of the prevention objections to insurance for punitive damages, there is good reason to believe that insurance for intentional harm poses a clearer insurance-deterrence tradeoff than insurance for inadvertent harm. Although certainly not all actors can or will act in the manner predicted by the theory of moral hazard, the insurance industry has made a collective decision not to provide insurance for intentional harm, except for certain narrow or specialized forms of coverage. [66] Thus, insurance is actually available for punitive (and, for that matter, compensatory) damages only in cases in which the defendant has not been shown to have intended the harm.

REV_00263749

[*121] Insurance against intentional harm also raises individual moral hazard concerns because such insurance will be disproportionately attractive to those who are not constrained by conventional norms against causing harm. If insurance for intentional harm were available, anyone who was about to cause such harm would be well advised to buy that insurance. Conversely, anyone who was reasonably sure she was not going to cause harm intentionally would be well advised not to buy that insurance. Because we are talking about intentional harm, people can identify in advance (to a significant but not perfect degree) whether they will need the insurance, and they can hide that fact from the insurance company (at least the first time [67]). Thus, insurance for intentional harm also presents an adverse selection problem, [68] with the result that insurance that excluded coverage for intentional harm would tend to drive out from the market insurance that offered such coverage. [69]

As a result of the intentional harm exclusion in liability insurance, tort law in action addresses questions of fault, not only in a tort claim filed by a plaintiff, but also in the presentation of that claim to the defendant's liability insurance company. In the tort claim, the formal fault lines are two: between liability and no liability, and between compensatory and punitive damages. The insurance claim adds a third fault line--between intentional and unintentional harm.

The relationship between the punitive damages fault line and the intentional harm fault line is not straightforward. Not all cases of intentional harm will meet the applicable tort law standard for punitive damages, [70] nor will all punitive damages cases meet the applicable insurance law standard for intentional harm. The question of whether to enforce contracts to provide punitive damages matters only for cases in which the punitive damages standard is met, but the intentional harm standard is not. [71]

[*122]

2. punitive damages exclusions

The most straightforward way to eliminate insurance coverage for punitive damages is to include in the insurance policy a provision explicitly excluding coverage for punitive damages. The fact that punitive damages exclusions typically are not included in primary liability insurance policies represents a considered choice to offer that coverage. Indeed, efforts to include such exclusions in the industry-wide standard form primary policies have been rejected on marketing grounds. [72] This suggests that most insurance companies prefer to sell, and most policyholders prefer to buy, primary liability insurance policies that do not contain a blanket exclusion for punitive damages. This suggests, as well, that intentional harm exclusions are an adequate solution to the moral hazard and adverse selection problems that are posed by insurance for punitive damages.

Nevertheless, it appears that punitive damages exclusions appear more often in umbrella and excess liability insurance policies. [73] If so, this may reflect a judgment that, in an excess policy, a punitive damages exclusion serves as a less expensive proxy for an intentional harm exclusion. A very large punitive damages award is quite likely to reflect the jury's conclusion that the defendant consciously caused serious harm. Nevertheless, an insurance company cannot avoid paying that claim, based on an intentional harm exclusion, without a second trial. [74] Avoiding coverage based on a punitive damages exclusion, in contrast, would require no second trial.

REV_00263750

3. claim-specific exclusions

Liability insurance policies also commonly contain claim-specific exclusions that limit indirectly the insurance that is actually available for punitive damages. Contemporary standard form examples of such exclusions include provisions relating to claims arising out of asbestos, sexual harassment and molestation, assault, and pollution. These are all liability claims that are disproportionately likely to arouse a strong sense of moral indignation on the part of juries and, thus, pose a disproportionate risk of punitive damages.

[*123] Some insurance policies also contain claim-specific exclusions that are specially drafted for the particular insureds to whom they apply. These "manuscript" exclusions are inserted into general liability insurance policies with some regularity once a product becomes the subject of mass tort litigation. Examples include exclusions relating to breast implants, IUDs and toxic shock syndrome. [75]

It seems unlikely that claim-specific exclusions are inserted in liability insurance policies solely because of concerns about punitive damages. But the exclusions do have the effect of reducing insurance companies' punitive damages exposure. More important, however, these exclusions highlight the fact that insurance is an iterative game.

Insurers have strong incentives to eliminate the disproportionately risky from their insurance pools. Thus, having insurance against claims during one policy period is no guarantee that there will be insurance against claims in the future. Indeed, this is becoming even more true as the insurance industry shifts from "occurrence" to "claims made" forms of coverage. [76] Consequently, regardless of the extent of the insurance for punitive damages that initially is offered for sale on the insurance market, the theoretical concern that punitive damages insurance would allow an insured to avoid all the financial consequences of egregious future action is unlikely to be borne out in practice for repeat players such as manufacturers and retailers.

D. Public Policy Based Refusals to Pay

Insurance companies largely have chosen to limit punitive damages coverage indirectly, rather than by explicitly excluding coverage for punitive damages. Notwithstanding the freedom of contract ideology that still animates much of insurance practice, [77] liability insurance companies regularly refuse to pay punitive damages claims on the grounds that public [*124] policy forbids it. [78] Today, about half of the U.S. jurisdictions are receptive to this defense, at least with respect to direct (as opposed to vicarious) punitive damages. [79] The merits of this defense are addressed in Part IV of this Article.

Recalling my earlier claim that insurance companies have concluded "that intentional harm exclusions are an adequate solution to the moral hazard and adverse selection problems that are posed by insurance for punitive damages," [80] the careful reader may ask, "Why, then, do insurance companies regularly refuse to pay punitive damages on grounds of public policy?" After all, if an insurance company wants to pay a punitive damages claim, there is no one with standing to sue who will object: the insured gets the coverage and the victim gets the money.

Three possible explanations have occurred to me. The first follows from the internal division in insurance companies between claims departments and "production" departments (sales and marketing). The absence of an explicit punitive damages exclusion allows the production departments to sell the "broadest coverage available," while the public policy against punitive damages insurance allows the claims department to avoid paying those damages. One reason that claims and production departments are separated bureaucratically in insurance companies is to minimize the ability of producers to pressure those who pay claims and, just as important, to permit the producers to say to their customers that they have no control over whether a claim gets paid, thus helping to preserve the personal relationship between producers and customers. [81]

REV_00263751

The second reason follows from the divided nature of the industry's decision not to include a punitive damages exclusion in the commercial liability insurance policy. [82] Clearly, the dissenting companies did not agree that offering punitive damages coverage was a good idea. The [*125] implied exclusion allows those companies to achieve at least part of their goal of excluding punitive damages while still using the industry standard form. [83]

The third reason is a game theoretic explanation. In the individual instance, it is almost always in the insurance company's interest not to pay a claim, provided it can do so without losing good will. The "public policy" against punitive damages insurance allows the insurance company to refuse to pay that part of the claim without appearing to exercise its discretion in so doing and, therefore, without sacrificing good will. Thus, even though offering the insurance may be in the best interests of the industry as a whole (a fact suggested by the absence of the exclusion in the standard policy), the contrary interests in the individual situations overwhelm that collective interest. This is another instance of the familiar prisoners' dilemma, in which individually rational action leads to a collectively irrational result. [84]

Notwithstanding these explanations, interviews with personal injury lawyers (both plaintiff and defense) suggest that insurance companies in fact do pay punitive damages claims at the settlement stage even in states in which they are not required to do so. [85] Thus, the public policy against insurance for punitive damages does not mean that there is no punitive damages coverage, but rather that in an individual case insurance companies have the power to decide whether to pay or not.

A rational insurance company will make that decision in a manner that takes into account the size of the claim, the likelihood that the customer will be lost, the profitability of the account, and, perhaps most important, the size of the potential judgment it can avoid by paying some punitive damages "tribute" at the settlement stage. [86] In practice, this means that some punitive damages coverage in fact is provided in the settlement stage. [87]

[*126]

E. Summary

When we examine insurance practice, we find that the insurance that is actually available on the insurance market is more restrictive than the unlimited insurance considered in the theoretical discussion. Except for specialized forms of coverage, insurance for intentional harm is not available. The insurance for unintentional harm that is available excludes some claims that pose a disproportionate risk of punitive damages. Moreover, insurance underwriters regularly restrict, or refuse to provide, coverage to insureds who pose a disproportionate risk of punitive damages. All these restrictions follow from insurance companies' efforts to combat moral hazard and adverse selection. [88] We also find that, even in states in which punitive damages are formally uninsurable, insurance companies regularly pay punitive damages claims at the settlement stage. Thus, punitive damages insurance does not pose all the problems suggested in the theoretical discussion, nor is prohibiting such insurance the panacea that a purely theoretical or doctrinal approach might suggest.

Clearly, this description has not demonstrated that "in fact" these market restrictions on insurance for punitive damages prevent that insurance from undercutting the prevention and retribution objectives of those damages. What it has demonstrated, however, is that insurance companies have a strong financial incentive to construct the insurance relationship in a manner that answers the theoretical objections to insurance for punitive damages and that insurance companies underwrite and draft insurance contracts in ways that appear to be consistent with that incentive. The next part of this Article discusses whether, in light of this incentive and those aspects of insurance practice, courts should nevertheless refuse to enforce contracts to provide insurance for punitive damages.

REV_00263752

IV. Reconsidering Insurance for Punitive Damages

The prevention objection to insurance for punitive damages is an instrumental one. It says that insurance for punitive damages should be prohibited because that insurance will reduce the deterrent effect of those damages. Yet, all insurance reduces the financial impact of the insured- against event, a fact that has not prevented widespread acceptance of liability insurance. Thus, the prevention objection to insurance for punitive damages must turn on a significant difference between the effect of that insurance and the effect of insurance for compensatory damages. [*127] There has to be, in other words, some basis for concluding that insurance for punitive damages undercuts tort law's prevention purpose more than insurance for compensatory damages.

Part II argued that this basis can be found by comparing the moral hazard and adverse selection problems posed by the two types of insurance. In theory, insurance for punitive damages poses greater moral hazard and adverse selection problems than insurance for compensatory damages, because defendants who are subjected to punitive damages awards are more likely than other defendants to have known that their conduct violated the applicable legal standard and to have predicted before buying insurance that this would be the case. Given their proven willingness to violate legal standards, we can reasonably conclude that these defendants are less able than other defendants to be governed by the norm prevention aspect of tort law. Thus, punitive damages insurance is objectionable from a prevention standpoint because it reduces the financial incentive of tort damages for those who need that incentive the most.

From a prevention perspective, the policy choice between permitting or prohibiting insurance for punitive damages comes down to a simple question: can insurance companies be counted upon to make adequate efforts to control the moral hazard and adverse selection problems posed by such insurance? As Part III discussed, insurance companies have great financial incentive to control the moral hazard of insurance, not only because of the increased loss that results, but also because of the accompanying problem of adverse selection. As a result, the insurance that is actually available for punitive damages is far more restrictive than what is assumed in the theoretical discussion. Indeed, when we look at insurance practice, we find that the insurance contract already attempts to eliminate insurance for those whom insurance companies have decided most need the financial incentive of damages.

Insurance practice is far more protective of the prevention objectives of tort law than the crude distinction in insurance law between compensatory and punitive damages. Through the use of the intentional harm exclusion, insurance practice regulates the prevention effect, not only of punitive damages, but also of compensatory damages. Given the incentive of insurance companies to control moral hazard and adverse selection, and their ability to do so through the use of underwriting and insurance contract provisions, [89] the best course for judges concerned [*128] about punitive damages, insurance, and the prevention objectives of tort law is to leave well enough alone. [90]

With respect to the retribution objection to punitive damages, insurance practice provides a less definitive response. The intentional harm exclusion addresses part of the retribution objection. Indeed, because the intentional harm exclusion applies to all damages, insurance practice does a more thorough job in this respect than insurance law to further the retributive purposes of tort law. Nevertheless, the goals of insurance companies do not mesh as neatly with the retribution objectives of tort law as they do with the prevention objectives of tort law. Insurance companies seek to control moral hazard and adverse selection because, speaking metaphorically, that puts money in their pockets. Furthering the retribution objectives of the common law is less clearly in their self interest. Indeed, provided that the problems of moral hazard and adverse selection can be addressed, softening the retributive punch of the common law would seem to be good business. Thus, the more importance courts give to notions of retribution in developing their approach to punitive damages, the stronger the objection to insurance for punitive damages.

REV_00263753

Nevertheless, once we acknowledge that the insurance market does not, in most cases, offer coverage for intentional harm, the remaining retribution objections to punitive damages insurance seem, from a practical perspective, minor. While we do not have good data on the frequency of punitive damages claims, there is a growing body of research on punitive damages awards that shows that such awards are rare [91] and that they are often struck down on appeal. [92] If and when the time comes to pay a punitive damages award, the insurance carrier is almost certain to claim that the insured defendant intended the harm and, therefore, that there is no insurance for the claim. Although insurance companies will not (and should not) win all those coverage cases, they will win some, and many more will be settled for a percentage of the amount claimed. The result is that even with insurance for punitive [*129] damages, tort law in action calibrates the "sting" of a judgment according to the culpability of the defendant to a far greater extent than is acknowledged in the typical judicial decision prohibiting insurance for punitive damages. [93] Moreover, as interviews with personal injury lawyers suggest, efforts to improve the calibration of that sting by prohibiting insurance for punitive damages will have less of an effect on tort law in action than a judge or legislator might wish, because some insurance for punitive damages in fact is provided even when such insurance is prohibited. [94]

V. Implications for Tort and Insurance Policy

There are several conclusions that follow from the above discussion. The first is that, from both a prevention and a retribution perspective, it makes little practical difference whether punitive damages are insurable or not. That does not mean, of course, that it might not make a great difference to individual parties in individual cases. But there is little reason to believe that prohibiting the insurance will have much effect on social welfare. Any assertion that permitting the insurance will increase loss by inhibiting the prevention aspect of tort law can easily be answered by reference to the strong incentive for insurance companies to control moral hazard and adverse selection and by the counter assertion that the availability of the insurance will enhance the norm projection aspect of tort law. Similarly, the intentional harm exclusion answers some of the retribution objections to insurance for punitive damages. Moreover, in some cases that do not involve intentional harm, the availability of the insurance will increase the likelihood that plaintiffs will file actions, thereby enhancing tort law's ability to achieve its retributive ends.

The second conclusion follows from the first: if insurance for punitive damages is not of great practical importance to the prevention or retribution purposes of tort law, there must be some other explanation for courts' efforts to prohibit that insurance. One plausible explanation lies in a combination of the legitimation function of courts and the dynamics of the prisoners' dilemma described at the conclusion of Part III (in which the individually rational decision not to pay a particular punitive damages claims overwhelms the collectively rational decision to offer such coverage). The prisoners' dilemma explains why insurance companies would repeatedly ask courts to refuse to enforce their promise, and the legitimation function explains why courts sometimes grant this request. [*130] No judge likes the law to appear a fool, and the "sound bite" on punitive damages insurance can easily make the law appear a fool.

My final conclusion is hardly unique to this paper. Indeed, it is the common theme of much of the current insurance law scholarship: tort law cannot be fully understood without paying close attention to insurance, and insurance law cannot be understood without paying close attention to tort law. [95] The clearest demonstration offered in this paper lies in the centrality of the intentional harm exclusion to the conclusion that insurance for punitive damages does not significantly undercut the prevention and retribution objectives of tort law.

REV_00263754

The intentional harm exclusion exists to enable insurance companies to make money by controlling moral hazard and adverse selection, but it also furthers important prevention and retribution purposes of tort law. As a result, the insurance company that denies a claim because of the intentional harm exclusion furthers the prevention and retribution goals of tort law nearly as much as the plaintiff who asserts the claim in the first place. Thus, the intentional harm battle that dominates much insurance coverage litigation has important consequences beyond the resolution of that litigation. Indeed, no less than the plaintiff who brings the claim, the insurance company that (properly) denies the claim on intentional harm grounds acts on behalf of all victims and potential victims of intentional harm to prevent loss and to achieve retribution.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. See, e.g., W. Page Keeton et al., Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts 2 (5th ed. 1984); Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev 1, 73-76 (1982); Alan I. Widiss, Liability Insurance Coverage for Punitive Damages? Discerning Answers to the Conundrum Created by Disputes Involving Conflicting Public Policies, Pragmatic Considerations and Political Actions, 39 Vill. L. Rev. 455, 462 (1994).

n2. In reaching this conclusion, I do not consider the claim by some courts that insurance for punitive damages should be permitted on the grounds that punitive damages do not serve their intended function. See Lazenby v. Universal Underwriters Ins. Co., 383 S.W.2d 1, 5 (Tenn. 1964). I agree with Dean Ellis that if these courts are right, the better approach is to address punitive damages directly. See Ellis, supra note 1, at 75.

n3. See Joseph E. Stiglitz, Risk, Incentives and Insurance: The Pure Theory of Moral Hazard, 8 Geneva Papers on Risk & Ins. 4, 6 (1983) (AThe more and better insurance that is provided against some contingency, the less incentive individuals have to avoid the insured event, because the less they bear the full consequences of their actions.")

n4. A nice example of the importance of paying attention to this distinction appears in Jon D. Hanson and Kyle D. Logue, The First-Party Insurance Externality: An Economic Justification for Enterprise Liability, 76 Cornell L. Rev. 129 (1990) (criticizing tort theorists for failing to consider the fact that first party insurance for individuals is rarely experience-rated). Two theoretical papers that simultaneously illustrate the importance of paying attention to insurance institutions and the difficulty of doing so within the bounds of economic theory are Seth J. Chandler, The Interaction of the Tort System and Liability Insurance Regulation: Understanding Moral Hazard, 2 Conn. Ins. L. J. 91 (1996) [hereinafter Chandler, Understanding] and Seth J. Chandler, Visualizing Moral Hazard, 1 Conn. Ins. L.J. 97 (1995) [hereinafter Chandler, Visualizing].

n5. See, e.g., Stiglitz, supra note 3. This is not a criticism of economic theory, but rather a call for careful application of that theory in the context of insurance institutions. See Chandler, Visualizing, supra note 4 for a formal demonstration, using computer-assisted mathematical modeling, of the theoretical ability of insurance contract provisions to reduce the insurance-deterrence tradeoff.

n6. See Ellis, supra note 1 (Following the conventions of law and economics scholarship, Ellis uses the term "deterrence," rather than "prevention.") n7. See id. at 10-12. For example, the fact that punitive damages serve to compensate plaintiffs for otherwise non-compensable harm does not tell us which plaintiffs are entitled to those additional damages. We need notions of retribution or deterrence to explain why providing greater than the usual compensatory damages is best in one case and not another. We accept less than complete compensation generally, perhaps because we are uncomfortable with requiring negligent or strictly liable defendants to bear the entire cost of their injury causing activity, or because we want to encourage people to "lump it" to some degree in order to discourage claiming. But, when a defendant behaves in a sufficiently flagrant fashion, we are less uncomfortable with requiring that defendant to bear the full costs (or more) of his or her conduct and we no longer believe that the plaintiff should "lump it." If we explore why our feelings are different for the flagrant defendant, we will see that the reasons track those that will be discussed in the paragraphs on retribution and deterrence below. See infra Parts II.C-D.

REV_00263755

Ellis did not address directly the legitimation purpose of punitive damages: for example, convincing us that tort law is in fact capable of constraining the behavior of powerful economic actors. Nevertheless, his analysis applies to that purpose as well: legitimation may well be the most important purpose of punitive damages, but that purpose cannot tell us when to assess those damages.

n8. See Widiss, supra note 1, at 465-66. The courts of many jurisdictions, including such populous states as California, Florida, Illinois and New York, forbid the insurance of direct punitive damages on public policy grounds. All states permit the insurance of punitive damages that are assessed vicariously. See id.

n9. See, e.g., Robert D. Cooter, Economic Analysis of Punitive Damages, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 79, 96 (1982) (arguing that this criticism should give way because insurance makes both victims and tortfeasors better off); Ellis, supra note 1, at 73-76. While I agree with the conclusion that punitive damages insurance should not be prohibited, I disagree strongly with Cooter's reasoning because it takes an ex post approach to victim welfare that fails to acknowledge victims' autonomy. For a critique of ex post approaches to victim welfare, see Mark Geistfeld, Placing a Price on Pain and Suffering: A Method for Helping Juries Determine Tort Damages for Nonmonetary Injuries, 83 Cal. L. Rev. 773 (1995).

n10. See Marc Galanter & David Luban, Poetic Justice: Punitive Damages and Legal Pluralism, 42 Am. U. L. Rev. 1393, 1429 (1993).

n11. Cf. David G. Owen, A Punitive Damages Overview: Functions, Problems and Reform, 39 Vill. L. Rev. 363, 374 (1994) (referring to the "education" function of punitive damages).

n12. I do not want to suggest, however, that this function cannot be accommodated within the concept of deterrence as it is used in economic analysis. From an economic perspective, Galanter and Luban are simply highlighting the fact that people have preferences for things other than money. Fining Bob for doing X will affect the behavior of Alice, a rational conformist, not simply because she wants to avoid the fine imposed on Bob, but also because she values living her life in a socially acceptable way. In other words, she is deterred from doing X, not only by the probabilistic costs attributable to the risk of being fined, but also because of the value she places on living in a socially responsible manner (and the corollary of that value, the loss to her self-understanding attributable to engaging in stigmatized behavior--a loss that will occur whether or not she is caught).

n13. It is possible that the norm or rule will itself be the result of a cost-benefit analysis. To the extent individuals make a cost-benefit calculation, however, the costs and benefits are assessed, not with reference to the probability of loss that may be imposed on others (Learned Hand's BPL, see United States v. Carroll Towing Co., 159 F.2d 169, 173 (2d Cir.

REV_00263756

1947)), but with reference to what there is to gain or lose by breaching the applicable norm.

n14. See Ellis, supra note 1, at 25-33.

n15. See David G. Owen, Civil Punishment and the Public Good, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 103, 113 (1982) (Aeach of Professor Ellis' categories seems all-inclusive or almost so: none of the categories appear to exclude many, if any, cases.").

n16. See Cooter, supra note 9, at 80-81.

n17. See id. Using the numbers provided in Cooter's exploding pop bottle hypothetical, I was able to calculate a "tipping point" that occurs when the bottler is held liable for thirty percent or less of the costs of exploding pop bottles.

n18. See Michael J. Saks, Do We Really Know Anything About the Behavior of the Tort Litigation System--And Why Not?, 140 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1147 (1992) (an exhaustive review of the empirical literature and findings in the tort field).

n19. See Cooter, supra note 9, at 91. For an analysis that suggests that this difference between negligence and strict liability disappears when insurance companies specify precaution conditions, see Chandler, Understanding, supra note 4, at 138-40.

n20. See Cooter, supra note 9, at 91.

n21. An alternative, and more practically important threshold, is provided by insurance contract provisions that specify the precautions that insureds must take to avoid harm. See generally Chandler, Understanding, supra note 4; Chandler, Visualizing, supra note 4. The intentional harm and accident provisions discussed in Part III of this paper are two examples of such provisions.

n22. See, e.g., Ellen Wertheimer, Punitive Damages and Strict Products Liability: An Essay in Oxymoron, 39 Vill. L. Rev. 505 (1994).

n23. The reluctance of some legal authorities to police domestic violence could well lead one to conclude that the "law in action" does not regard such violence as entirely illegitimate. See Richard J. Gelles & Murray A. Strauss, Intimate Violence 20-25 (1988).

n24. See Morris Dees, Finding the Forum for a Victory, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 11, 1991 at S3 (describing the Southern Law Poverty Center's strategy of bankrupting white supremacists).

n25. See Chandler, Visualizing, supra note 4, at 123 (using computer-assisted modeling to estimate a tipping point that occurs, in the absence of precaution conditions in the insurance contract, at an indemnification level of twenty percent).

n26. See Gary T. Schwartz, Reality in the Economic Analysis of Tort Law: Does Tort Law Really Deter?, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 377 (1994).

n27. See Stiglitz, supra note 3.

n28. See text accompanying notes 42-45 (discussing insurance and retribution).

n29. Indeed, as Kent Syverud has suggested, at times insurance institutions can anticipate legal norms. See Kent D. Syverud, On the Demand for Liability Insurance, 72 Tex. L. Rev. 1629, 1638 n.33 (1994).

n30. Note that this is a probabilistic statement; not an assertion that all those subjected to an award will have this level of intent. Unless we deny that the standard for punitive damages has anything to do with intent (or that fact finders are more often right than wrong), this probabilistic statement will be true regardless of the precise standard for punitive damages. For a listing of various standards employed by courts, see Michael Rustad & Thomas Koenig, The Historical Continuity of Punitive Damages Awards: Reforming the Tort Reformers, 42 Am. U. L. Rev. 1269, 1317 n.240 (1993).

REV_00263757

n31. Cf. Cooter, supra note 9, at 85-86 (suggesting that the imprecision of legal standards explains much of the inadvertent violation of those standards).

n32. See Widiss, supra note 1, at 482.

n33. See, e.g., 2 Stuart M. Speiser et al., The American Law of Torts 8:50 (1985) (describing standards for the imposition of vicarious punitive damages, some of which require a considerably lower level of fault than negligence). Absent vicarious liability for punitive damages, principals would have an incentive not to monitor their agents' behavior so as not to have the knowledge necessary to support a direct punitive damages award.

n34. For an argument that the deterrent purposes of punitive damages is satisfied by compensating only the lawyer (and not the plaintiff), see Note, An Economic Analysis of the Plaintiff's Windfall from Punitive Damage Litigation, 105 Harv. L. Rev. 1900 (1992). This argument ignores the conflicts of interest between plaintiffs and their lawyers that would result from compensating lawyers but not their clients.

n35. See Galanter & Luban, supra note 10, at 1432.

n36. Id. at 1434.

n37. Id. at 1432.

n38. Id. (internal quotations omitted).

n39. See, e.g., Jules L. Coleman, Risks and Wrongs 218-19 (1992). As I will discuss in Part IV, tort law in action recognizes additional gradations in culpability, mainly because of insurance.

n40. See Jean Hampton, Correcting Harms Versus Righting Wrongs: The Goal of Retribution, 39 UCLA L. Rev. 1659, 1663 & 1691 (1992).

n41. See id.

n42. See id. at 1685, 1695.

n43. In the context of groups or subcultures opposed to the prevailing legal regime, the social consequences of a punitive damages award may not be negative.

n44. See Galanter & Luban, supra note 10, at 1440 (AHigh punitive damages awards hit homo economicus where it hurts: an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, and a bottom line for a bottom line. It is poetic justice."); Hampton, supra note 40, at 1688-89.

n45. See Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 174 Cal. Rptr. 348 (Ct. App. 1981) (an appeal case where jury awarded $ 125 million to a boy who was badly burned in an explosion of a Ford Pinto).

n46. I start with the form, not because of a theoretical position that the interpretation of form contracts should start with the form, but rather because insurance practitioners do. See

REV_00263758

The incentives of insurance companies do not mesh as neatly with the retributive objectives of tort law. Accordingly, retribution provides a somewhat stronger case for judicial regulation of punitive damages [*102] insurance (as well as other aspects of liability insurance). Nevertheless, even with punitive damages insurance, tort law in action will calibrate the sting of a tort action according to the culpability of the defendant, and insurance underwriting practices reduce the ability of repeat offenders to use insurance to insulate themselves from the retributive aims of tort law. Moreover, because there is nothing a court can do to stop an insurance company from paying a punitive damages claim, particularly at the settlement stage, there is little reason to believe that judicial regulation of punitive damages insurance will have a significant impact on the retributive function of tort law. Thus, even the retribution-based case for implying a punitive damages exclusion in liability insurance policies is at best a weak one. [2]

Part V addresses the implications of this analysis for tort and insurance policy. As this Article illustrates, a primary function of insurance institutions is constructing insurance relationships that minimize the insurance-deterrence tradeoff predicted by economic theory. [3] Thus, when discussing "insurance" in the context of tort policy, we have to be careful to distinguish between theoretical conceptions of insurance and insurance as it is actually provided through insurance institutions. [4] Similarly, when discussing insurance policy, we cannot forget that insurance institutions play an important role in furthering the objectives of tort policy.

This Article illustrates the point most concretely by using the existence of intentional harm exclusions as the primary basis for the [*103] conclusion that there is little to gain by prohibiting insurance for punitive damages. Because of intentional harm exclusions, the liability insurance that is actually provided through the insurance market poses much less an insurance-deterrence tradeoff than the simple model of insurance that is employed in most economic theory. [5] Furthermore, the significance of these exclusions to that tradeoff means that insurance companies that (properly) deny claims on intentional harm grounds serve important deterrence and retribution functions that further the objectives of tort law.

II. A Theoretical Perspective on Insurance for Punitive Damages

It is well established in the theoretical literature that there are two primary justifications for punitive damages: retribution and prevention. [6] As Ellis has shown, the remaining justifications, such as compensation or legitimation, depend on theories of retribution or prevention to explain why punitive damages should be assessed in one case but not another. [7] It is commonly observed that insurance for punitive damages defeats the purposes of those damages. [8] If we understand retribution to require [*104] the deprivation of something that the offender values, then the tension between punitive damages and insurance is obvious. A money judgment hardly stings the defendant when it is an insurance company that pays. Similarly, if we understand prevention to require imposition of the cost of harm on the offending party, the tension between insurance and punitive damages is equally obvious. The higher, and perhaps prohibitive, price that the offender must pay to purchase insurance in the future pales in comparison to the punitive damages judgment thereby avoided. The standard theoretical analysis criticizes insurance for punitive damages on just these grounds. [9] While I do not entirely dispute this analysis, the theoretical case against enforcing contracts to insure punitive damages is not as strong as commonly understood.

A. Punitive Damages as Prevention

"Prevention" is a term that I have borrowed from Professors Galanter and Luban in place of the more commonly used term "deterrence." [10] By using "prevention," Galanter and Luban intend to capture, not only the idea that punitive damages can prevent loss by subjecting people to severe financial consequences for causing loss, but also the idea that punitive

REV_00263741

Tom Baker, Constructing the Insurance Relationship: Sales Stories, Claims Stories, and Insurance Contract Damages, 72 Tex. L. Rev. 1395, 1409 (1994) [hereinafter Baker, Stories].

n47. This Article will differ from what I understand to be insurance industry custom by including within the category of "general liability insurance" the liability insurance that is sold as part of residential insurance packages, such as homeowners, renters, condominium, and dwelling insurance. I do this because liability insurance in these packages provides the same kind of broad form protection--using much of the same policy language--as the popular Commercial General Liability insurance form.

n48. See, e.g., 1 Susan J. Miller & Philip Lefebvre, Miller's Standard Insurance Policies Annotated 409 (1996). In the noncommercial, individual market, the primary bodily injury and property damage coverage is provided as part of the residential insurance package (i.e., homeowners, renters, condominium or dwelling insurance) and the primary personal injury coverage is provided by an umbrella insurance policy. See, e.g., ISO, HO3 and ISO personal umbrella forms.

n49. Irvin E. Schermer, Automobile Liability Insurance 23.01 (3d ed. 1995).

n50. APrimary" insurance is the first layer of insurance that covers a risk. "Excess" or "umbrella" insurance provides coverage once the primary insurance is exhausted (although in certain circumstances an umbrella policy may be primary). As discussed below, it is my working assumption that punitive damages exclusions are more common in umbrella and excess insurance policies.

n51. But see Widiss, supra note 1, at 475 (collecting cases stating that the insurance policy is ambiguous on this point). The ambiguity doctrine (by which ambiguous policy provisions are interpreted to favor the policyholder) means that it makes no practical difference whether we conclude that the standard form policy unambiguously provides coverage for punitive damages or that the policy is ambiguous on this point. The "as damages" litigation in the environmental context makes clear that courts take a very expansive interpretation of the meaning of the word "damages" in liability insurance policies. See, e.g., AIU Ins. Co. v. Superior Court, 799 P.2d 1253 (1990).

n52. See Tom Baker, On the Genealogy of Moral Hazard, 75 Tex. L. Rev. 237 (1996) [hereinafter Baker, Genealogy].

n53. See id.

n54. Insurance writers sometimes refer to moral hazard as a tendency toward fraud or destruction, but, given that honesty and avoidance of harm are conventional social norms, we can understand a tendency toward fraud or destruction as an example of a lack of attachment to conventional social norms. I use the word "conventional" so as not to suggest that dishonesty, destructiveness, violence and the like are not social norms in certain times and places.

n55. For an extensive study of insurance companies' efforts to manage the incentives created by insurance, see Carol Heimer, Reactive Risk and Rational Action (1985).

n56. See Baker, Genealogy, supra note 52, at 238.

n57. These observations were related in the interviews reported in Tom Baker, Transforming Punishment into Compensation: In the Shadow of Punitive Damages, 1998 Wis. L. Rev. 211 [hereinafter Baker, Transforming]. Given the addictive nature of alcohol, this is hardly surprising, but I would welcome suggestions of ways to test this assertion.

REV_00263759

n58. This "working assumption" is based on interviews with personal injury lawyers. See id. (reporting interviews).

n59. See Stephen Daniels & Joanne Martin, Myth and Reality in Punitive Damages, 75 Minn. L. Rev. 1, 42 (1990).

n60. See, e.g., Armstrong World Indus., Inc. v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 26 Cal. Rptr. 2d 35 (Ct. App. 1995) (the consolidated asbestos insurance coverage cases).

n61. See, e.g., Miller & Lefebvre, supra note 48, at 409.

n62. See Schermer, supra note 49, 23.02.

n63. See Robert H. Jerry, Understanding Insurance Law 861-63 (2d ed. 1996).

n64. See Heimer, supra note 55.

n65. What I refer to as "situational" moral hazard is that aspect of the insurance trade's concept of moral hazard that coincides with the concept as it is used in economic theory: the effect on incentives whenever one person bears the costs of harm caused by another. In such a situation, the person causing the harm has less incentive to avoid that harm than if (all other things being equal) she bore the full costs of that harm herself. See Baker, Genealogy, supra note 52, at 238.

n66. The insurance contract discussion in this paper is limited to automobile liability insurance and to the bodily injury and property damage coverage provided in general liability insurance policies. There are other forms of insurance that provide punitive damages insurance. The most significant of these other forms of insurance, in terms of the numbers of policies in force, is known as "personal injury" coverage. This coverage is commonly included in commercial general liability insurance packages and in umbrella insurance policies sold to individuals.

Personal injury coverage often is provided without an intentional injury exclusion, especially at the primary level. See, e.g., Miller & Lefebvre, supra note 48, at 412. Personal injury coverage is "named-peril" insurance that, as that characterization suggests, provides coverage only against a number of specific kinds of claims (hence the term, named perils). Today, those claims include defamation, wrongful prosecution, and trespass. See Terri D. Keville, Note, Advertising Injury Coverage: An Overview, 65 S. Cal. L. Rev. 919, 928 (1992).

Other forms of insurance that provide some coverage for punitive damages includes directors and officers liability insurance, errors and omissions insurance (for lawyers, accountants, and insurance agents), and reinsurance (insurance for insurance companies). I mention these forms of insurance only to make it clear that I am aware that the analysis in this Article is directed at coverage for bodily injury and property damage and that there may be forms of insurance coverage for which the market does not provide an adequate answer to the theoretical objections to insurance for punitive damages.

n67. For a discussion of the repeat player, see infra text accompanying notes 75-76.

n68. Adverse selection refers to the tendency for insurance to be purchased by people who are disproportionately likely to experience an insured-against event. See Michael Rothschild & Joseph Stiglitz, Equilibrium in Competitive Insurance Markets: An Essay on the Economics of Imperfect Information, 90 Q.J. Econ. 629, 632 (1976).

n69. See id.; George A. Akerlof, The Market for "Lemons": Quality Uncertainty and the

REV_00263760

Market Mechanism, 84 Q.J. Econ. 488, 492-93 (1970).

n70. Of course, there has to be some resulting bodily injury, personal injury, or property damage for there to be insurance coverage. For a listing of verbal formulations used by courts as the punitive damages standard, see Rustad & Koenig, supra note 30, at 1317 n.240.

n71. At least outside of the specialized or narrowly targeted coverage discussed in supra note 66.

n72. See Widiss, supra note 1, at 488.

n73. This working assumption is based on my involvement over the last nine years in large commercial coverage cases.

n74. Avoiding coverage on the basis of an intentional harm exclusion requires a factual finding that the insured committed the relevant act with the requisite intent. Since the standards for punitive damages and the intentional harm exclusion are not the same, there will have to be a second coverage trial.

n75. I am aware of these examples from discussions with lawyers involved in these mass tort cases. We know that these manuscript exclusions exist because insurance coverage for a product that becomes the subject of mass tort claims typically ends shortly after the claims situation becomes acute, even though the manufacturer continues to have general liability insurance.

n76. An occurrence policy is triggered by harm that takes place during the policy period, regardless when the claim is made; a claims made policy is triggered when a claim is made during the policy period, provided that claim arises from harm that took place after the "retroactive date" of the policy. See Sparks v. St. Paul Ins. Co., 495 A.2d 406 (1985). Claims made policies give insurance companies a greater ability to terminate coverage when the number or type or size of claims becomes acute.

n77. See Baker, Stories, supra note 46, at 1408, 1417; cf. Friedrich Kessler, Contracts of Adhesion--Some Thoughts About Freedom of Contract, 43 Colum. L. Rev. 629 (1943).

n78. It takes some familiarity with insurance practice to fully appreciate the irony of insurance companies relying on public policy arguments to avoid paying claims otherwise covered by their insurance policies. The irony comes from the steadfast complaints of insurance interests about judges who "rewrite" insurance policies to provide coverage that the insurance companies did not sell. According to that same logic, a judge who refused to enforce an insurance company's promise to pay a punitive damages claim would be "rewriting" the policy to take away coverage that the policyholder had bought. As my prior writing makes clear, I do not agree that judges who refuse to enforce standard form provisions are requiring insurance companies to provide insurance that they did not sell, nor would I seriously assert that, when a manufacturer purchases a liability policy covering risks in a state whose courts oppose such coverage, the manufacturer is buying punitive damages coverage for those risks. See Baker, Stories, supra note 46.

n79. See Widiss, supra note 1, at 466-68.

n80. Supra Part III.C.2.

n81. See Baker, Stories, supra note 46, at 1416.

n82. See Widiss, supra note 1, at 488.

REV_00263761

n83. One of the most important benefits of using the industry standard form is gaining access to the collective loss experience of all insurance companies that use the form.

n84. See Douglas G. Baird et al., Game Theory and the Law, 48-49, 312-313 (1994) (providing a game theoretic account of the prisoners' dilemma). For a brief history of the dilemma, see Paradoxes of Rationality and Cooperation 3-4 (Richmond Campbell & Lanning Sowden eds., 1985).

n85. See Baker, Transforming, supra note 57 (interviews with personal injury lawyers practicing in Florida, a jurisdiction that will not enforce contracts to insure punitive damages). Note that the moneys paid are not denominated as punitive damages.

n86. See id.

n87. See id.

n88. An additional dynamic, not explored in the text, is the effort to define insurance as a culturally acceptable practice. See Baker, Genealogy, supra note 52.

n89. For examples of other contract provisions used to control moral hazard, see Heimer, supra note 55.

n90. In light of my earlier writing, I should clarify that I am advocating a judicial "hands-off" approach here because insurance companies' incentives and contracting practices are consistent with the objectives of the legal system and because enforcing contracts to provide punitive damages insurance is not inconsistent with insureds' expectations. See Baker, Stories, supra note 46, at 1420-22 (discussing how judges construct the insurance relationship).

n91. See, e.g., Daniels & Martin, supra note 59; Michael Rustad, In Defense of Punitive Damages in Products Liability: Testing Tort Anecdotes with Empirical Data, 78 Iowa L. Rev. 1 (1992); Rustad & Koenig, supra note 30.

n92. See William M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, New Light on Punitive Damages, Regulation, Sept./Oct. 1986, at 33.

n93. See Widiss, supra note 1.

n94. See Baker, Transforming, supra note 57.

n95. See, e.g., Kenneth S. Abraham, Distributing Risk (1986); Chandler, Understanding, supra note 4; Chandler, Visualizing, supra note 4; Syverud, supra note 29.

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined (i)
Terms: "punitive damages" and date(aft 1997) and koenig and settlement (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Thursday, September 12, 2002 - 2:18 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

damages can prevent loss by making a strong statement that certain conduct lies well outside the bounds of the acceptable. [11] I prefer Galanter and Luban's "prevention" because it helps to remind me (and may help remind others) of this norm projection function of punishment, which has not been emphasized in the economic analysis of law. [12] As Galanter and Luban recognize, human behavior [*105] is strongly conformist. In most situations, we decide on the appropriate level of care, not by making an explicit cost-benefit calculation, but rather by observing whether there is a rule or norm that applies to a given situation. [13] If so, we typically orient our behavior to that rule or norm. One way punitive damages awards prevent harm is by reminding people that norms of safety or care exist and stigmatizing flagrant violation of them.

Whether we focus on the financial or norm projection aspects of punitive damages, however, the difficult theoretical question is why we need punitive damages to prevent harm, when compensatory damage awards already project norms and create financial incentives for conforming to those norms. Why, in other words, punish defendants to prevent harm when we already attempt to compensate plaintiffs at the level that is (at least theoretically) appropriate for preventing harm?

Ellis has explained that punitive damages are an efficient complement to compensatory damages in three situations:

(1) When the probability of being held liable for breach of a legal standard is less than the probability of loss resulting from that breach;

(2) When there are important harms that would not be considered in computing a compensatory damage award; and

(3) When the actor derives an illegitimate benefit from the harmful act. [14]

[*106] The first situation results from what I will call the "underenforcement" problem; the second situation results from what I will call the "externalities" problem; and the third situation, from what I will call the "deviance" problem. While these categories may be criticized as overbroad, [15] they provide a helpful framework for discussing whether punitive damages insurance is consistent with the prevention justification for punitive damages.

1. underenforcement and externalities

The underenforcement and externalities problems are alike in that they highlight the failure of the compensatory damages regime to impose the full costs of harm on those who are liable for causing that harm. The underenforcement problem means that some people who should be held responsible for causing harm are not. The externalities problem means that those who are held responsible are not required to compensate all those harmed for all the harm suffered. Both problems threaten the prevention function of the legal regime.

Negligence regimes can in theory withstand substantial uncompensated harm with no loss in their deterrent effect. [16] Nevertheless, there is a tipping point below which it would be rational for the actor to ignore the legal standard. [17] Punitive damages can move that tipping point downward, compensating for underenforcement and undercompensation. We know from empirical research that the U.S. legal system is characterized by massive underenforcement and substantial undercompensation. [18] Were damages limited to compensation, a rational actor who was not constrained by the conscience, stigma, or good will costs that typically accompany the violation of social norms would often be better off ignoring legal standards governing caretaking conduct. Punitive damages assessed when a defendant deliberately ignores a legal standard can discourage actors from deliberately taking advantage of the underenforcement and externalities problems.

REV_00263742

[*107] In theory, strict liability regimes are much more sensitive to underenforcement and undercompensation problems than negligence regimes. [19] Indeed, as Cooter has shown, any reduction in enforcement or compensation will result in reduced care. [20] Although this analysis can be understood as a reason for preferring negligence to strict liability, it also provides a theoretical justification for the use of punitive damages within a strict liability regime. Given that we know that only a fraction of injured individuals makes claims, we can confidently say that all real world strict liability regimes will be characterized by underenforcement. Within a strict liability regime, punitive damages could create the same threshold effect as the negligence standard, [21] thereby increasing the level of safety under strict liability. Thus, rather than being incoherent, [22] the imposition of punitive damages in an appropriate strict liability case may serve a useful prevention function.

2. deviance

The "deviance" problem arises from the actor who is unable or unwilling to act in accordance with the values that are recognized as legitimate by the prevailing legal regime. Ellis uses as his example a man who engages in violence because of the infidelity of his spouse. Compensatory damages are not an adequate deterrent in Ellis's example because the husband derives satisfaction from inflicting injury on the spouse or her sexual partner. Other examples of the deviance problem include violence by members of groups committed to an alternative social order. At least formally, the satisfaction that results from self-help violence is not recognized as legitimate in the U.S. legal regime, [23] and punitive damages are one way to make that point.

[*108] While it seems unlikely that the threat of a punitive damages judgment will do much to prevent such harm, an actual punitive damages judgment may at least partially incapacitate organized groups in conflict with the existing social order. The punitive damages judgments obtained by the Southern Poverty Law Center against the Klu Klux Klan and other white supremacists represent one attempt to use punitive damages for this specific deterrence purpose. [24]

B. Considering Punitive Damages Insurance in Light of the Prevention Justification

Like the uncompensated harm that results from underenforcement and externalities, liability insurance lowers the cost of violating a legal standard. Accordingly, liability insurance is subject to the same tipping point analysis. [25] In theory, the incentive effects of insurance and uncompensated harm are additive. Thus, given the problems of underenforcement and externalities, one might wonder how much deterrence insured damages really provide. [26] For compensatory damages, this insurance-deterrence tradeoff [27] is widely tolerated. Thus, the theoretical possibility of the tradeoff cannot itself be a serious objection to punitive damages. What might be different about punitive damages?

One answer turns on the theoretical purposes of compensatory and punitive damages: both compensatory and punitive damages are intended to prevent harm, but only compensatory damages are intended to provide compensation for victims, and only punitive damages are intended to provide retribution. In light of this distinction, we could say that the insurance-deterrence tradeoff is tolerated for compensatory damages because insurance for compensatory damages enhances tort law's compensation function without undercutting its retribution function. Insurance for punitive damages, on the other hand, appears to undercut tort law's retribution function without providing any necessary benefit in terms of compensation. [28]

[*109] Punitive damages also differ from compensatory damages in a manner more directly related to the prevention rationale. Recall Galanter and Luban's observation that tort damages prevent harm, not only through financial incentives, but also through norm projection. Clearly, insurance reduces the financial incentives created by tort damages; this is so for both compensatory and punitive damages. Insurance does not undercut so fundamentally, however, the norm projection aspect of tort damages. Indeed, insurance may improve the norm projection aspect of tort law: the existence of insurance makes it more likely that damage awards will be paid, thereby increasing the ability of plaintiffs to vindicate their rights through tort law. Moreover, the existence of insurance institutions facilitates the dissemination of the norms created and reflected in tort law. [29]

REV_00263743

Nevertheless, it seems likely that norm projection will have less effect on behavior that meets the standard for punitive damages awards than on behavior that does not meet that standard. Defendants who are liable for punitive damages are more likely to have known that their conduct violated (or was likely to violate) the relevant standard of care than defendants who are not held liable. [30] Those who are willing to violate a legal standard are unlikely to be deterred from violating it again simply by being reminded of the standard. Indeed, given the underenforcement and externalities problems discussed above, a rational actor may be better off ignoring legal standards governing caretaking conduct. Punitive damages can change this conscious cost-benefit calculus only if the actor expects to bear the costs of those damages.

Insurance for compensatory damages does not undercut the prevention rationale of tort damages to the same extent, because those who violate legal standards inadvertently are governed more by tort law's norm projection function than those who violate legal standards deliberately. [31] As this suggests, the lower the level of intent required for punitive damages, the weaker the prevention-based objection to insurance for those damages. Thus, it is not surprising that U.S. courts [*110] universally enforce contracts to provide insurance for vicarious punitive damages. [32] Vicarious punitive damages are assessed against a principal who was merely negligent in the supervision of her agent. [33] For that reason, the insurance-deterrence tradeoff for vicarious punitive damages should be similar to that for compensatory damages. Moreover, insuring vicarious punitive damages enhances the norm projection aspects of tort law by providing an incentive for plaintiffs and their lawyers to bring to public attention flagrant breaches of legal standards. [34]

C. Punitive Damages as Retribution

Using work by the philosopher Jean Hampton, Galanter and Luban have offered a strong retribution-based defense of punitive damages. [35] Following Hampton, they explain that the purpose of retribution is to express "public commitment to the value of persons." [36] A public commitment to the value of persons requires a public response when a person acts deliberately to cause harm (or in a way known to have a very high probability of causing harm), because that person has denied the value of those he has harmed. In effect, his actions say to his victims, "You are worth so much less than I that I can hurt you deliberately.

As Galanter and Luban explain, the retributive purpose of punitive damages "is to reassert the truth about the relative value of wrongdoer and victim by inflicting a publicly visible defeat on the wrongdoer." [37] For this reason, they describe punitive damages awards as a form of "expressive defeat." [38]

Yet, compensatory damage awards also can be understood as a form of expressive defeat. After all, the victim wins the lawsuit and the perpetrator is required to pay the victim for the harm caused. Thus, as [*111] with prevention, one might reasonably ask why we need punitive damages for retribution, when we already compensate in a manner that appears to serve this retributive purpose? The answer must be that the relative value that would be asserted in a legal regime that limited damages to compensation would be false.

REV_00263744

There are (at least) two reasons why the relative values would be false. The first dovetails with Ellis's deterrence justifications for punitive damages. The second follows from the relatively low level of moral culpability that is required for compensatory damages.

First, as the underenforcement and externalities problems reveal, perpetrators as a class wrongfully cause more harm to victims than they are required to pay as compensation. The presence of this substantial uncompensated harm defeats the compensatory damages regime's claim to an efficient result (i.e., one in which the benefits to society of an activity that causes harm exceed its costs). Moreover, as the deviance problem reveals, damages that are based solely on compensation can encourage the use of harm to achieve improper ends. For both these reasons, a legal regime that limited damages to compensation would systematically privilege perpetrators over victims and would encourage perpetrators to treat victims as means to achieve ends that are illegitimate within the logic of the legal regime.

Second, compensatory damage awards do not adequately satisfy the moral requirement that the consequences of action turn on moral culpability. Think of the distinction that young children learn between hurting someone "by accident" and hurting someone "on purpose." The higher level consequence given to children for hurting someone "on purpose" represents an effort to teach them about the value of persons and--this is the crucial point--the role that distinctions made on the basis of the actor's state of mind play in maintaining that value.

For good reasons, compensatory damages are assessed for much harm that is caused "by accident" and are not, as a formal matter, computed on the basis of moral culpability (beyond the requirement that the threshold liability standard is met). [39] Yet, public commitment to the morally appropriate value of persons requires that there be greater consequences for harm that is done "on purpose." I do not mean to suggest that the formulations used with children are adequate to describe the distinctions that tort law does or should make, but the point should be clear. In tort law, compensatory damages are assessed when harm results from an act of relatively low moral culpability. When the perpetrator's [*112] moral culpability significantly exceeds that level, there must be some additional consequence, or else tort law has failed to "right the wrong." [40] Thus, without punitive damages (or some other additional consequence), tort law fails, because the "wrong" is a function, not only of the harm caused, but also of the moral culpability of the person who caused it. [41]

D. Punitive Damages Insurance and Retribution

Punitive damages can be justified on retributive grounds, then, because the relative value of persons asserted by compensatory damages is, in the sense described above, false. It is false because compensatory damages allow perpetrators to cause harm to achieve illegitimate ends. And it is also false because compensatory damages, alone, cannot right the wrong caused by perpetrators whose moral culpability significantly exceeds the compensatory damages threshold.

Does insurance for punitive damages undercut these retributive justifications? The quick answer is "of course." If by retribution we mean hurting the perpetrator, how can money paid by an insurance company "right the wrong"? Although the insurance company may raise rates, refuse to provide coverage, or insert a restrictive exclusion, these are muted punishments, at least as compared to requiring the perpetrator to pay the punitive damages award directly.

Yet, as Hampton notes, retribution is not synonymous with punishment. [42] Wrongs are made right in other ways as well. Public ceremonies, apologies, and financial payments all help to reassert the value of the person wronged relative to the person who committed the wrong. Indeed, whether or not a punitive damages award is insured, that award makes a public statement about the value of the victim that contradicts the private assessment of the perpetrator at the time the wrong was committed. Moreover, insured or not, a punitive damages award represents a consequence for extreme culpable behavior that goes beyond that for less culpable behavior. Although an insured punitive damages award clearly will hurt less than an uninsured one, it nevertheless does hurt: insurance is made more expensive and less available in the future; for commercial entities there is a loss of good will; and for any individuals involved, there are negative social consequences. [43]

REV_00263745

[*113] With that said, one cannot escape the fact that insurance for punitive damages would allow a perpetrator, in return for a fee paid in advance, to escape a significant part of the consequences for extreme, culpable behavior. Thus, even though the punitive damages award may reassert publicly the value of the victim, the fact that the perpetrator would not be the one who pays that award would at least partially defeat the "poetic justice" that Galanter, Luban and Hampton regard as one of the most attractive features of punitive damages. [44] Indeed, in the Grimshaw case described by these scholars, [45] were we to learn that the jury's award was to have been paid, not by Ford, but rather by Aetna, Travelers, or Lloyd's, we might wonder whether a significant part of the jury's message might be lost on Ford (much as Galanter, Luban and Hampton wondered what message Ford received when the judge reduced the jury's punitive damages award by ninety-seven percent).

E. Summary

The analysis thus far can be summed up as follows: the theoretical justifications for punitive damages are to prevent harm and to provide retribution for highly culpable harm. Insurance for punitive damages undercuts the prevention justification when it reduces the financial impact of those damages on defendants (and potential defendants) who are unlikely to respond adequately to the norm projection aspects of tort law. Moreover, insurance for punitive damages undercuts the retribution justification when it allows a perpetrator to escape responsibility for the consequences of egregious action. At the same time, however, by encouraging victims to seek and collect punitive damages, insurance for punitive damages enhances tort law's capacity to project norms and to reassert publicly the value of those injured.

The lower the level of intent required for punitive damages, the weaker the theoretical objections to insurance for those damages. Thus, insurance for vicarious punitive damages does not seriously undercut the prevention justification, because vicarious damages are assessed against defendants who are no less likely to respond adequately to the norm projection aspect of tort law than defendants subjected simply to compensatory damages awards. Similarly, because vicariously liable [*114] defendants are significantly less morally culpable than defendants subjected to direct punitive damages awards, insurance for vicarious punitive damages is less objectionable from a retribution perspective. Indeed, distinguishing between the insurability of direct and vicarious damages should facilitate the calibration of the "sting" of those damages to the culpability of the defendant.

III. Observations on the Insurance for Punitive Damages That Is Actually available on the U.S. Insurance Market

The preceding discussion has addressed the relationship between insurance and punitive damages from a simple (perhaps simplistic) theoretical perspective in which insurance is an all or nothing phenomenon. The insurance for punitive damages that is actually provided through the insurance market is more complex. This part of the Article will describe important aspects of the insurance that is actually available in order to lay the groundwork for considering whether insurance-in-action presents the theoretical problems addressed in the discussion above.

In the insurance field, the starting point for analyzing what insurance is provided in any insurance transaction is the insurance policy form used in that transaction. [46] Typically, that form is a standard form insurance policy drafted by an insurance trade association. Even when an insurance company chooses to use a form other than the industry standard, it would be unusual for that form to differ from the industry standard other than in detail.

REV_00263746

As a result of this standardization, we can learn a great deal about the nature of the insurance that is actually available on the insurance market without undertaking an exhaustive market survey. Indeed, we can go a long way toward understanding what punitive damages insurance is actually available by focusing on the standard form policies used for the two types of liability insurance which comprise the vast bulk of what is sold in the United States: automobile liability insurance and general liability insurance. [47] Whether the policyholder is John Doe, Cafe [*115] Juanita, or Mega Chemical Company, the basic provisions of the applicable automobile and general liability insurance policy forms will be remarkably similar, particularly as regards insurance for punitive damages claims.

The central promise of the standard automobile and general liability insurance policies appears in what is called the "Insuring Agreement" of the policies. In general liability insurance policies, that promise is to pay "those sums the insured becomes legally obligated to pay as damages because of bodily injury, personal injury, or property damage." [48] In automobile liability insurance policies, that promise is to pay "all sums which the insured shall become legally obligated to pay as damages by reason of bodily injury [or property damage] ... sustained by any person, caused by accident." [49]

In both of these insuring agreements, the company promises to pay those sums "the insured shall become legally obligated to pay as damages." The agreements do not distinguish among kinds of damages. Nor are there distinctions among kinds of damages elsewhere in the standard primary automobile and general liability forms used by most U.S. insurance companies. [50] Indeed, there is little dispute that, on their face, most primary general and automobile policies provide coverage for punitive damages. [51]

[*116] Nevertheless, the insurance that is actually available for punitive damages is far from unlimited. Insurance companies limit the coverage provided for punitive damages by using the following four tools:

(1)Underwriting practices intended to avoid providing coverage for some targets of punitive damages claims;

(2) Insurance policies with dollar limits that are less than the amount of a likely punitive damages judgment;

(3) Contract provisions intended to eliminate coverage for claims that are likely to result in punitive damage awards; and

(4) Public policy based refusals to fulfill the promise to pay punitive damages claims.

Of course, these are in addition to the option of including an explicit punitive damages exclusion in the liability insurance policy. The sections that follow describe each of these tools.

A. Underwriting

Insurance underwriting is the process of deciding how much insurance to provide to whom, against what risks, and at what price. At least since the eighteenth century, one aim of underwriters has been to exclude from the insurance pool those members of a given rate class whose loss experience is expected to exceed that of the average for the class or, alternatively, to charge these higher risk individuals a higher premium (which, in effect, is to create a new rate class).

REV_00263747

In identifying which potential insureds to exclude from the insurance pool on this basis, underwriters have been guided by the concept of moral hazard. As I have described in detail elsewhere, the insurance concept of moral hazard is similar to the concept of moral hazard developed by economists. [52] But while economists understand moral hazard to be a property of institutional arrangements for the sharing of risk, insurance underwriters understand moral hazard also to be part of the character of the individuals or entities that participate in insurance arrangements.

In insurance practice, the differing loss experience of insureds within a given rate class is understood to be attributable, in significant part, to [*117] variations in this second, "individual," sense of moral hazard. [53] Although it can be difficult to determine what exactly is meant by an individual's moral hazard, there are least two components that are relevant to punitive damages: (1) the propensity to take care (or not) to avoid harm to the person and possessions of oneself and others, and (2) the degree of attachment to other conventional social norms. [54] Implicit in this understanding of moral hazard is the belief that, all other things being equal, people who are careful and who observe other conventional social norms are less likely to be the subject of punitive damages awards than those who are not careful or do not observe such norms.

As with many other aspects of insurance practice, we can understand insurance underwriting as an attempt to control the incentives created by insurance. [55] Insurance underwriting attempts to control insurance incentives by addressing the moral hazard of insurance applicants. Although I am sometimes skeptical of insurance underwriters' ability to identify and exclude insureds on the basis of moral hazard, [56] whatever success they do enjoy in this regard will decrease the punitive damages exposure of their employers.

In this context, we can understand insurance underwriting as an attempt to exclude from the insurance pool people who are (1) less likely to be guided by the norm projection aspects of tort law; (2) more likely to respond to the incentives created by underenforcement, externalities or insurance; and (3) more likely to cause harm with the culpability deserving of retribution. As this description suggests, efforts by insurance companies to reduce or control the moral hazard of insurance will also tend to ameliorate the retribution and prevention objections to insurance for punitive damages.

One example of the effect that insurance underwriting can have on the actual insurance that is available for punitive damages comes from automobile liability insurance. Perhaps the most common punitive damages automobile accident case is that of the wrongful death caused by a drunk driver. According to plaintiffs' lawyers, it is not unusual for [*118] such drivers to have had a conviction for driving under the influence (DUI). [57] Insurance companies in the standard and preferred risk automobile insurance markets routinely refuse to sell insurance policies to people who have a DUI conviction. Those with a DUI conviction can obtain insurance in the substandard market or, failing that, from the residual automobile insurance pool. The policies sold in these other markets, however, provide low dollar coverage--often as little as $ 25,000 per accident or less--that is well below the expected liability for any serious automobile accident. As a result, punitive damages insurance in fact is not widely available to those drivers believed to be most likely to be the subject of a punitive damages claim.

B. Dollar Limits on Insurance Coverage

As this automobile insurance example illustrates, dollar limits on coverage also serve to limit insurance companies' exposure to punitive damages claims, particularly for large punitive damages claims. Indeed, in the personal and small business markets, insurance against

REV_00263748

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 87 Geo. L.J. 285,AT 294

87 Geo. L.J. 285

Copyright (c) 1998 Georgetown Law Journal
Georgetown Law Journal

November, 1998

87 Geo. L.J. 285

LENGTH: 36435 words

SYMPOSIUM: Punitive Damages: The Social Costs of Punitive Damages Against Corporations in Environmental and Safety Torts

W. KIP VISCUSI *

* John F. Cogan, Jr. Professor of Law and Economics, Harvard Law School. My research was supported by the Harvard University Olin Center for Law, Economics, and Business; the Sheldon Seevak Research Fund; and a grant from the EXXON Corporation.

TEXT:

INTRODUCTION

Perhaps more than any other aspect of the judicial system, punitive damages have come to symbolize the problems of our nation's courts. Punitive damages awards are often substantial -- running into the millions, and in rare cases, the billions of dollars. These awards are also highly variable. Often there is no clear-cut basis to predict the likely size of the punitive damage award, even knowing the compensatory damages amount. The high stakes and high variability of punitive damage awards are of substantial concern to companies, as punitive damages may pose a catastrophic threat of corporate insolvency. Punitive damages' high stakes raise legitimate concerns for legal reformers, in light of the general belief that juries lack sufficiently well-defined guidelines and expertise to set punitive awards reliably.

In her dissenting opinion in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip, Justice O'Connor eloquently summarized the current deficiencies in the Court's handling of punitive damage awards:

> Punitive damages are a powerful weapon. Imposed wisely and with restraint, they have the potential to advance legitimate state interests. Imposed indiscriminately, however, they have a devastating potential for harm. Regrettably, common-law procedures for awarding punitive damages fall into the latter category. States routinely authorize civil juries to impose punitive damages without providing them any meaningful instructions on how to do so. Rarely is a jury told anything more specific than 'do what you think best.' . . .
>
> In my view, such instructions are so fraught with uncertainty that they defy rational implementation. Instead, they encourage inconsistent and unpredictable results by inviting juries to rely on private beliefs and personal predilections. Juries are able to target unpopular defendants, penalize unorthodox or controversial views, and redistribute wealth. Multimillion dollar losses are inflicted on a whim. While I do not question the general legitimacy of punitive damages, I

REV_00263764

States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	44.6	13.9

REDUCTION IN TOTAL RELEASES

	t-statistic, 1988-1992	t-statistic, 1990-1992
States without punitive damages:
Michigan
Nebraska
New Hampshire
Washington
four state totals
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	0.41	1.35 *
States with insurable punitives	0.58	1.87 **
States with uninsurable punitives	1.45 *	0.53
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	1.29	1.29

Note: The t-statistic tests the weighted mean for the four states which do not award punitive damages against the weighted mean for the states in the category described.

 Significant at the 95 percent confidence level.
 Significant at the 99 percent confidence level.

For sources, see Table 6A, infra.

The third panel in Table 2 focuses on the percent reduction in surface water discharges, which are measured in terms of pounds of toxic pollutants released. Statistics appear for two time periods, 1988-1992 and 1990-1992. The percent reductions in the no-punitive-damages states are 66% in 1988-1992. Each of these discharge reduction amounts is significantly below that of the other states, and the magnitude of the discrepancy is substantial. This statistically significant difference between punitive damages states and the no-punitive-damages states is the better performance of no-punitive-damages states with respect to water discharges of toxic chemicals. The comparison of the percent reduction in surface water discharges in the no-punitive-damages states with the various punitive-damages-insurance regimes indicates that the no-punitive-damages states had the highest such reductions. This reduction value is significantly different from that in all three punitive-damages-insurance status regimes. These statistically significant efforts provide no evidence of a deterrent role of punitive damages. To the extent that the superior performance of the no-punitive-damages states is due to other economic factors, the statistical analysis in the Appendix controls for such influences.

The final panel in Table 2 considers the percent reduction in total toxic releases. This category encompasses surface water discharges, underground injection, releases to land, fugitive or nonpoint air emissions, and stack or point air emissions. The no-punitive-damages states are not significantly different from the punitive damages states from 1988-1992 and perform significantly better than the punitive damages states from 1990-1992. The reduction in total chemical releases is significantly lower in the no-punitive-damages states from 1988-1992 as compared to states with uncertain status for punitive damages insurance. The larger chemical reductions in states with uninsurable punitives from 1988-1992 seems to be due to the early years in that time period because there is no statistically significant difference from 1990-1992. The Appendix will analyze other causative factors as well.

REV_00263773

C. ACCIDENTAL FATALITY RATES

Accidental fatality rates per person in different states also should reflect any deterrent effect of punitive damages. If punitive damages lead firms to choose safer risk levels, the accident rates should be higher in the four states that do not permit punitive awards.

The first set of accidental deaths in Table 3 pertains to medical misadventures, which consists of complications and misadventures of surgical and medical care. To the extent that medical malpractice punitive damages awards have a deterrent effect, these rates should be higher in the states that do not have punitive damages. The medical misadventure death rate is 0.89 per 100,000 population in the no-punitive states, which is not significantly different from states that recognize punitive damages. The overall United States death rate average is a bit higher than in the no-punitive damages-states, or 1.00 death per 100,000. These differences are the opposite of what one would expect if punitive damages deterred dangerous behavior. More refined analyses of medical misadventures by insurance status indicates that these rates are higher in states in which punitive damages are insurable and lower in states in which the insurability status of punitive damages is uncertain. As in the case of the toxic release results, some differences such as this will occur on a random basis. What is clear is that there is no consistent pattern of a deterrent effect of punitive damages.

Table 3

Accidental Death Rates in States with and without Punitive Damages

MEDICAL MISADVENTURE DEATHS

	Deaths	Population (1,000s)
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	82	9,537
Nebraska	20	1,639
New Hampshire	14	1,148
Washington	42	5,448
Four state totals	158	17,772
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	2,459	245,117
States with insurable punitives	892	71,043
States with uninsurable punitives	1,367	144,949
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	213	30,273
TOTAL DEATHS
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	2,906	9,538
Nebraska	591	1,639
New Hampshire	288	1,148
Washington	1,722	5,448
Four state totals	5,507	17,773
States with punitive damages:

REV_00263774

Other 46 states and DC	85,931	245,117
States with insurable punitives	29,857	71,043
States with uninsurable punitives	46,813	144,949
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	9,548	30,273

MEDICAL MISADVENTURE DEATHS

	Deaths/Population (100,000s)	t-statistic
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	0.860
Nebraska	1.220
New Hampshire	1.220
Washington	0.771
Four state totals	0.889
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	1.003	0.58
States with insurable punitives	1.256	1.87 **
States with uninsurable punitives	0.943	0.29
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	0.704	2.03 **
TOTAL DEATHS
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	30.468
Nebraska	36.059
New Hampshire	25.087
Washington	31.608
Four state totals	30.985
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	35.057	1.09
States with insurable punitives	42.027	2.85 ***
States with uninsurable punitives	32.296	0.51
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	31.540	0.17

Note: The t-statistic tests the weighted mean death rate for the four states which do not award punitive damages against the weighted mean for the states in the category described.

For sources, see Table 6A. infra.

Table 4

Insurance Performance Differences between States with and without Punitive Damages

TOTAL INSURANCE

	Premiums	Population

REV_00263775

	($ 1,000)	(1,000)
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	$ 9,870,463	9,538
Nebraska	$ 1,738,960	1,639
New Hampshire	$ 1,198,307	1,148
Washington	$ 4,745,126	5,447
Four state totals	$ 17,552,856	17,772
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	$ 245,607,234	245,117
States with insurable punitives	$ 65,288,517	71,043
States with uninsurable punitives	$ 150,312,113	144,949
States with uncertain insurance rul	$ 31,150,917	30.273
MEDICAL MALPRACTICE
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	$ 193,836	9,538
Nebraska	$ 21,783	1,639
New Hampshire	$ 20,696	1,148
Washington	$ 97,863	5,447
Four state totals	$ 334,178	17,772
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	$ 5,637,691	245,117
States with insurable punitives	$ 1,420,860	71,043
States with uninsurable punitives	$ 3,768,674	144,949
States with uncertain insurance rul	$ 575,187	30,273
PRODUCT LIABILITY
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	$ 74,587	9,538
Nebraska	$ 14,351	1,639
New Hampshire	$ 8,336	1,148
Washington	$ 38,312	5,447
Four state totals	$ 135,586	17,772
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	$ 2,024,666	245,117
States with insurable punitives	$ 481,672	71,043
States with uninsurable punitives	$ 1,295,844	144,949
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	$ 255,807	30,273
OTHER LIABILITY
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	$ 760,467	9,538
Nebraska	$ 141,883	1,639
New Hampshire	$ 88,891	1,148
Washington	$ 369,689	5,447
Four state totals	$ 1,360,930	17,772

REV_00263776

States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	$ 20,589,828	245,117
States with insurable punitives	$ 4,759,881	71,043
States with uninsurable punitives	$ 13,335,308	144,949
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	$ 2,603,478	30,273

TOTAL INSURANCE

	Premiums/Population	t-statistic
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	$ 1.035
Nebraska	$ 1,061
New Hampshire	$ 1.044
Washington	$ 871
Four state totals	$ 988
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	$ 1.002	0.18
States with insurable punitives	$ 919	1.02
States with uninsurable punitives	$ 1.037	0.60
States with uncertain insurance rul	$ 1.029	0.44

MEDICAL MALPRACTICE

States without punitive damages:
Michigan	$ 20
Nebraska	$ 13
New Hampshire	$ 18
Washington	$ 18
Four state totals	$ 19
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	$ 23	0.79
States with insurable punitives	$ 20	0.24
States with uninsurable punitives	$ 26	1.08
States with uncertain insurance rul	$ 19	0.11

PRODUCT LIABILITY

States without punitive damages:
Michigan	$ 7.82
Nebraska	$ 8.76
New Hampshire	$ 7.26
Washington	$ 7.03
Four state totals	$ 7.63
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	$ 8.26	0.54
States with insurable punitives	$ 6.78	0.96
States with uninsurable punitives	$ 8.94	1.11
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	$ 8.45	0.76

REV_00263777

OTHER LIABILITY
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	$ 80
Nebraska	$ 87
New Hampshire	$ 77
Washington	$ 68
Four state totals	$ 77
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	$ 84	0.57
States with insurable punitives	$ 67	0.80
States with uninsurable punitives	$ 92	1.24
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	$ 86	0.90

Note: The t-statistic tests the weighted means for the four states which do not award punitive damages against the weighted mean for the states in the category described.

For sources, see Table 6A, infra.

The second measure in the bottom panel of Table 3, which pertains to all causes of accidental death, is the overall death rate. Once again, the rates are somewhat lower in the states without punitive damages, 31.0 versus 35.1. However, this difference is statistically insignificant. The only statistically significant difference in the total accidental death results is the higher rate in states with insurable punitive damages, as compared to the no-punitive damages states. States with punitive damages are not safer.

D. INSURANCE PREMIUM DIFFERENCES

A final set of measures of the risk-averting effects of punitive damages are insurance premium levels. Punitive damages are often uninsurable under standard insurance policies. Moreover, eighteen of the forty-six states that allow punitive damages explicitly prohibit insurance of punitive damages assessed directly against an insured for its own actions. [13] However, if punitive damages deter firms from making risky decisions, the risk levels should decline, lowering the associated premium levels.

To the extent that insurers are willing to provide coverage of punitive damages, states that permit punitive damages would have higher insurance premiums. Overall, there is no net significant relationship borne out in the results below, irrespective of the punitive damages regime or the insurability of punitive damages. Table 4 presents four different insurance premium measures -- total insurance premiums, medical malpractice premiums, product liability premiums, and other liability premiums. To adjust for state size, the third column of statistics puts each of these measures in terms of the premium per 1000 residents in the state. The results are consistent in all four cases. The per capita insurance premium is the same or lower for the average of the four states that do not recognize punitive damages. Moreover, in every instance, there is no statistically significant difference between the four no-punitive-damages states and the rest of the country. These results hold true as well when the comparison is between states with no punitive damages and each of the three insurability regimes.

Using insurance premiums as a proxy for risk levels has the same general implications as do fatality rates: There is no evident effect of punitive awards. This result is notable because it encompasses two somewhat different consequences of accidents. Accidental deaths involve fatalities for which the monetary loss does not fully capture the social welfare costs. In contrast, insurance premiums abstract from all non-monetary effects and address only the financial consequences of risk. The fact that neither measure indicated a decrease in risk resulting from punitive awards suggests that a broad range of risk-related actions are insensitive to the deterrent effect of punitive damages.

REV_00263778

E. WHITHER THE DETERRENT EFFECT?

If punitive damages do in fact provide deterrence through their financial penalties on risky actions, states with punitive damages should exhibit superior performance in some risk dimension. The comprehensive analysis presented here is more extensive than any previous empirical assessment in the literature. It addresses accidental fatalities from various sources, a variety of insurance premium measures, chemical accident data, and toxic chemical discharge statistics. Moreover, it distinguishes states based on the insurance status of punitive damages. States with punitive damages exhibit no safer risk performance than states without punitive damages. The statistically significant differences observed follow no clear pattern and would occur by chance given the large number of statistical tests for differences relative to the four states without punitive damages. It is instructive to review these statistically significant differences, as they have no consistent relation to any particular punitive damages-insurance regime. In Table 1, states with uncertain insurance status had higher, not lower, levels of toxic chemical accidents and toxic chemical accidents involving injury. In Table 2, three of the punitive damages groupings (all such states, states with insurable punitive damages, states with uninsurable punitives, and states with uncertain punitives insurability) performed worse in terms of the percent reduction in surface water discharges. For the reduction in total chemical releases, states without punitives performed better from 1990-1992 and the same from 1988-1992. States with uninsurable punitives performed better from 1988-1992, but not from 1990-1992. States with uninsurable punitives performed worse over the 1990-1992 period, but not significantly so. However, these toxic release results are not corroborated by any of the other three toxic release variables analyzed. The final set of statistically significant differences is shown in Table 3, which indicates higher medical misadventure deaths and total accidental death rates for states with insurable punitives and lower medical misadventure death rates when the insurability of punitive damages is uncertain.

These statistically significant differences display no consistent direction or pattern. The more detailed multivariate analysis in the Appendix largely eliminates these effects. Moreover, the differences all involve refined categorizations of the punitive-damages-insurance regimes. None of the differences pertain to the overall comparison of states without punitive damages and states that recognize punitive damages. As is especially apparent in the insurance results in Table 4, punitive damages do not have a significant deterrent effect. Consequently, moving to a no-punitive-damages liability regime would sacrifice little of the deterrence sought by the tort liability system.

The above results are consistent with the views expressed by punitive damages critics, who observe that random and unpredictable awards will not have a deterrent effect. Further examination below of the circumstances that some scholars have identified as potential areas where punitive damages could serve a productive role will reveal some of the reasons for this lack of efficacy. The set of such circumstances is both narrowly defined and involves judgments that are likely beyond a jury's competence.

II. PRINCIPLES FOR CORPORATE RISK DECISIONS

A. THE NATURE OF RISK TRADEOFFS

A conceptual reference point for assessing the role of punitive damages for corporate, environmental, and safety torts is to begin with the underlying corporate actions themselves. How should corporations conceptualize risky decisions, and what guidelines should govern responsible behavior? What is the institutional context for these acts that gives rise to the environmental and safety damages? What criterion should be applied in assessing the social desirability of corporate acts? In the usual parlance of economics, the initial question is whether there is some kind of market failure whereby private incentives alone would create inadequate incentives for safety. If there is such a failure, one should then ask whether compensatory damages and government regulations suffice, or whether punitive damages are needed to augment these awards to create appropriate incentives for safety. What do we mean by an appropriate level of safety?

REV_00263779

The standard economic theory of punitive damages and incentives casts the analysis within a highly stylized situation of certainty. [14] Does the economic value of the definite harm resulting from an action exceed the benefits? The task then becomes setting a damage amount so that the company recognizes the full costs of its actions and exercises an appropriate degree of care in its activities. These formulations are overly simplistic, however, because they neglect potential risks that affect corporate actions and the linkage of the company's behavior to the societal effects. Particularly with product and environmental risks, the adverse repercussions of corporate actions usually stem not from deliberate corporate acts, but from acts that may generate adverse societal effects with some probability less than one. Indeed, most real catastrophes have very remote possibilities of occurrence. To understand fully what legal sanctions may be appropriate when corporate decisions generate social harms, it is necessary to explicitly account for the tradeoffs inherent in corporate risk decisionmaking.

In situations of risk and uncertainty, the appropriate comparison is between the costs of the safety action and the value of the expected benefits. If the expected benefits to society of greater safety exceed the expected costs to the company, decisions to invest in safety are efficient. Similarly, it is not socially worthwhile to make safety investments when the expected social benefits are exceeded by the costs once all social consequences are fully recognized and valued. One may, nevertheless, wish to compensate those who suffer the damages costs, even if the risk level is efficient, but this is a distributional and fairness issue, and is thus outside the scope of this article.

The test for whether safety incentives are adequate requires that one weight the value of the harms that might occur by the probability that the harms will occur. [15] Comparing the actual loss of the accident event with the costs of safety precautions may create a very misleading assessment of the economic desirability of precautions. Losses must be weighed by their probability of occurrence, which may be quite small. If the probability of the accident is very low, the expected losses (that is, the loss multiplied by its probability) will likewise be reduced and substantial precautions will not be warranted. To the extent that juries operating after the fact focus on the actual loss that has occurred, rather than the expected loss before the risky action, errors in jury behavior will be particularly great when the probabilities involved are small and the stakes involved are high.

Consider the following example. Suppose that there is one chance in a million that there will be a catastrophic loss of $ 3 billion, which is a figure not unlike the total social value of the loss of life in a major plane crash. We will assume this amount represents the full economic value of preventing the crash, not just the earnings loss. The company could eliminate this risk of an accident by an expenditure of $ 10,000. Is it worth it? The expected accident costs without the safety precaution equal the probability of 1/1,000,000 multiplied by the $ 3 billion loss, for a total expected loss of $ 3000. This figure is far below the $ 10,000 amount of additional safety costs. From a benefit-cost standpoint, there is no economic efficiency justification for additional care. However, if juries focus on the value of the loss alone, failing to weight it by the probability, then the comparison after the accident will be between the $ 3 billion loss and the $ 10,000 in safety expenditures. Precautions not only appear warranted, but failing to take precautions now appears to be reckless and irresponsible given the differences in the orders of magnitude involved. The first major prerequisite for thinking sensibly about corporate risk decisions is that the comparison should be between safety costs and expected incremental benefits of these expenditures at the time of the corporate action, not the consequences after the fact when the outcome is known.

REV_00263780

B. TRADEOFFS ARE NECESSARY EVEN WHEN RISKS ARE UNCERTAIN

That the risks are uncertain or may not be precisely known does not displace the need to compare the costs and expected benefits of greater safety. We may know, for example, that smoking cigarettes is risky, but not whether the lifetime mortality risk is 1/6 or 1/3. However, these judgments should be based on the state of the information at the time of the corporate action, not after the fact. Such uncertainty involving the need to make judgments with only incomplete information available are quite common in punitive damages contexts.

Even when the firm has substantial knowledge, it may not know the exact probability of adverse outcomes. In the McDonald's coffee cup case, [16] the company had more information about the risk than in most liability contexts but still was not perfectly knowledgeable. In that case, a woman received a $ 160,000 award for compensatory damages and a $ 2.7 million award for punitive damages after spilling hot coffee on her lap. The punitive damages award was reduced by the court from its initial jury award level to $ 480,000, and ultimately McDonald's settled the case out of court for an undisclosed amount.

How should McDonald's have thought about the temperature selection decision? At least to a certain degree, higher coffee temperatures enhance the flavor and keep the coffee warmer longer, which is a benefit to customers. Increased temperatures, however, may also pose a risk of scalding, particularly in instances in which the consumer is not careful.

McDonald's has two sources of information regarding the risk. [17] First, it controlled the temperature of the coffee and required that it be served at temperatures from 180 to 190 degrees Fahrenheit. Skin burn rates increase exponentially at temperatures above 140 degrees Fahrenheit. If the company had reduced the temperature of the coffee, it could have converted a situation of known risks to one in which there was a certainty of no injury. However, for most commercially viable coffee temperatures, there would be at least some risk of burn injury. The question is how substantial this risk would be.

A key issue is that McDonald's cannot monitor the extent of consumer carelessness. How often will purchasers from their drive-through window put the coffee on their lap or between their knees while driving? Preventing all such injuries from careless use of a hot product sets the risk level too low and is thus inefficient. Given the consumer desirability of hot coffee and McDonald's desire to accommodate consumer preferences, the ideal temperature for coffee should not be so tepid that no burns would result. The fact that coffee is hot is well known and readily motivating once the customer holds the cup. The appropriate approach to the liability issue is to ask whether McDonald's struck an appropriate balance between costs and benefits, recognizing the effects for the entire market and the reasonable judgments McDonald's could make; the liability issue should not focus solely on the situation for the individual plaintiff who was harmed or that individual's possibly idiosyncratic carelessness.

Although McDonald's could not monitor all such behavior, it did have some consumer reports of injuries. Using such information, as well as scientific evidence on temperatures that lead to scalding and burns, one could then pose the coffee safety issue in the following manner: Reducing the temperature of the coffee would decrease the expected number of injuries; one would want to weight the value of these injuries to account for not only the monetary losses but also the value of any health effects to the injured individuals. If, however, the coffee temperature is lowered, the company will presumably lose profits because of decreased coffee sales. There may also be diminished welfare to consumers, including those who still purchase the coffee, because of the more tepid coffee temperature. From an economic efficiency standpoint, McDonald's should lower the temperature of the coffee so long as the reduction in the expected costs to the injured consumers exceeds the expected benefits both to the consumers and the company from hot coffee. Indeed, in a subsequent coffee burn case, Judge Frank Easterbrook posed the tradeoff in exactly this manner. [18]

REV_00263781

The appropriate assessment should consequently be from the standpoint of the entire market, taking into account the preferences of all consumers and the injuries to all consumers. The issue is not what temperature makes sense for consumers who drive with coffee on their lap because McDonald's cannot distinguish its customers based on their level of care. The typical focus of court cases, however, is not on the market choice but on consumers who have experienced isolated injuries which often have a small associated probability of occurrence. Court cases by their very nature focus on individuals, whereas regulation and legislation is better suited to dealing with markets. Preventing such injuries would involve substantial costs across a product line to make the necessary improvements for a mass-marketed product.

Matters become more complex when there is uncertainty regarding the risk probability. Even safety experts may sharply disagree on such probabilities. A dramatic example of uncertainty is with respect to scientific debates over the "doomsday rock." Some astronomers have hypothesized that a large asteroid will someday hit the earth and have catastrophic consequences, a phenomenon that captured the fantasy of Hollywood scriptwriters in 1998. [19] Scientists from Cornell University, who have sought government funding to support a research program for rockets to divert or destroy such asteroids, estimated our risk of death as being as high as 1/6000. [20] An arguably more realistic assessment of the risk from a consensus group of scientists estimates the individual risk of death from the doomsday rock as 1/2,000,000. [21] This broad range of scientific judgment reflects the extent of our ignorance regarding the magnitude of the risk and the presence of substantial uncertainty.

Such divergences of opinion are not restricted to extraterrestrial battles. Similar kinds of uncertainties are present with respect to highly litigated products such as breast implants. The Food and Drug Administration (FDA) banned silicon breast implants from the market, citing the presence of substantial hazards, whereas the American Medical Association continued to issue press releases indicating that the risks appeared to be small. [22] The most recent scientific evidence fails to indicate a significant risk, though risks that do not lead to signature diseases, such as the mesothelioma risk from asbestos, are often difficult to link to product exposures. [23] These uncertainties have not impeded the courts from awarding punitive damages to women with breast implants.

Our inability to pinpoint risk levels was also evident in the case of "low" risks from British beef. Scientists in England faced uncertainties in 1996 about the risks of "mad cow" disease from eating British beef. Estimates of the ultimate fatalities from Creutzfeldt-Jakobs disease range from 5 to 500,000 deaths in Britain. [24] This enormous gap in the estimated level of risk provides little information to make sound judgments about the consequences of beef consumption for the British.

Another extreme example of persistent uncertainty is the catastrophe involving TWA Flight 800. [25] Even after months of investigation, it is not entirely clear whether the cause of the accident was a bomb, a missile, or a mechanical failure. The determination of the cause of the accident has a potentially significant impact on TWA's ultimate liability. Moreover, even if the accident occurred due to some kind of structural failure, unless the cause of that failure can be identified, the appropriate precaution warranted would not be known. The result has been that TWA has adopted a more diffuse set of safety reforms -- increased airline security and efforts to decrease the risk of explosion for fuel tanks.

Information gathered over time can be helpful but not always definitive. Recent problems

REV_00263782

> see a strong need to provide juries with standards to constrain their discretion so that they may exercise their power wisely, not capriciously or maliciously. The Constitution requires as much. [1]

The usual approach to evaluating legal rules such as those pertaining to punitive damages is to assess their performance in well-defined hypothetical scenarios. If there is a problem with how these legal rules might perform in different accident contexts, then the solution is to tinker with the structure of the rule so that it will continue to perform well in situations in which it is effective, while at the same time eliminating the problems that arise in other contexts where it performs less satisfactorily. This kind of thought process provided the impetus for the tort liability reforms enacted in response to the 1984-1986 liability insurance crisis. [2] Yet, even though punitive damages reforms were often at the forefront of liability reforms adopted by various states in the mid to late 1980s, dissatisfaction with courts' assessment of punitive damages continues.

Accordingly, the approach taken in this article is a more fundamental one. Rather than focusing solely on isolated examples of extreme punitive damages excess, I suggest that we reassess whether punitive damages serve any constructive role at all. In doing so, I adopt a methodology that differs from the usual hypothetical case study approach that dominates the law and economics literature. The usual stylized liability problem formulations implicitly assume empirical relationships that may not in fact exist. In particular, they assume that punitive damages serve a valuable deterrent function. Moreover, they assume that juries will apply punitive damages to narrowly defined economics problems, whereas juries in practice may apply punitive damages more broadly. Prior reform efforts have invariably resulted not in subtle tinkering with punitive damages formulas according to economists' prescriptions, but rather in the imposition of some kind of cap or limit on punitive damages. This article goes beyond those reform efforts to ask whether punitive damages should be abolished altogether for corporations in environmental and safety torts.

The methodological approach I use is based not on hypothetical economic problems but rather on a societal benefit-cost approach of the type typically used to assess other social policies, such as government regulations: On balance, do punitive damages generate more benefits to society than costs? Even after a wave of tort liability reform measures, there is still widespread dissatisfaction with the role of punitive damages in our legal system. It is instructive to ask whether these adverse effects are so great that punitive damages do not pass a benefit-cost test. Put somewhat differently, would society's welfare be improved if we eliminated punitive damages as a legal instrument? This article will explore that question in the context of corporate actions affecting risk and environmental safety.

My reform prescription that we abolish punitive damages in this context would seem to contradict the plausibly constructive role that punitive damages may play in selected instances. However, the kind of fine tuning of punitive damages to narrowly defined circumstances that law and economics scholars envision [3] is required to ensure a constructive role for punitive damages does not account for how juries actually behave. Moreover, none of the state reforms of punitive damages have incorporated subtle economic criteria for awarding and setting punitive damages. Rather, they have all focused on very simple approaches, such as damages caps. [4]

The overriding issue that must be addressed before abolishing punitive damages is whether doing so will eliminate a constructive force for the promotion of safety and the protection of the environment. Because no existing study adequately addresses this issue, this article presents the most comprehensive empirical assessment to date of the effects of punitive damages. This task is facilitated by the fact that four states already have liability regimes in which punitive damages are not awarded. Have these states performed worse on any reasonable measure of safety, as one would expect, if punitive damages do in fact have a deterrent effect?

REV_00263765

encountered with automobile airbags indicate that even for some safety-related products with substantial opportunities for gathering safety data, it may take time for knowledge to develop. Automobile companies can learn about the properties of airbags through crash tests as well as through market experience. Because fatalities caused by airbags are a relatively rare event -- with about fifty estimated fatalities to date [26] -- the risk consequences of airbags and the particular risks they pose to children, small adults, and the elderly were not immediately apparent. Moreover, evidence on the benefits of airbags is based on engineering model projections rather than tallies of actual lives saved. Mirroring juries' tendency to focus on the harm caused in the individual case rather than on the defendant-corporation's pre-accident risk-benefit assessment, the public has responded with greater concern for the identified lives lost than the more hypothetical estimated lives saved.

Problems posed by continuing uncertainties plague even the most expert risk assessors. The consequences of mistaken judgments are particularly severe in zero-infinity problems, that is, those situations in which either there is no loss or the loss is catastrophic. A recent financial catastrophe affected the most venerable insurance institution, Lloyd's of London. Lloyd's persistently underestimated the scope of the asbestos litigation, for which it served as a major reinsurer. Lloyd's 1982 worst-case scenario of the total number of asbestos cases that would emerge was 81,000. The company later developed an assesment of the total number of claims, updating its estimate to 180,000 in 1990. [27] These estimates remained considerably below the American Bar Association's estimate of the litigation level, which was 340,000 claims in 1990. [28] The outcome for Lloyd's is that it has thus far survived, but it has had to undergo a major reorganization along with the imposition of substantial losses upon many Lloyd's "names."

The occurrence of substantial losses in this as well as other zero-infinity contexts does not necessarily imply that the decisions themselves were bad. The appropriate reference point for judging these decisions is whether they were sound at the time when they were made, not whether the decisionmaker was unlucky. The high losses that occurred are simply a reflection of the nature of the stakes and the risks involved. In the case of Lloyd's, the possibility of catastrophic losses arose from the positively correlated nature of mass toxic tort lawsuits. Rather than incurring a series of independent and identically distributed risks, it encountered many highly correlated risks that imposed considerable losses once juries found the asbestos firms liable. Corporations likewise engage in high stakes decisions -- whether it be a small risk of environmental disaster or a hazard from a mass marketed consumer product that could injure thousands. The appropriate reference point for judging such risk decisions is whether they were prudent given their expected consequences. A zero risk ideal will not be feasible.

C. RISK BALANCING IN PERSONAL DECISIONS

We cannot blame all hazards on corporate actions and bad decisions. Moreover, corporations are not unique in making tradeoffs involving risk that may not produce perfect safety. Risks are an inescapable part of our daily lives. The sources of risks that increase one's annual death risk by 1 in a 1,000,000 include the following: drinking a half a liter of wine, living two days in New York or Boston (air pollution), traveling ten minutes by bicycle, traveling 150 miles by car, eating forty tablespoons of peanut butter, or eating 100 charcoal broiled steaks. [30] Although we might wish to reduce the risks in our life, few of us would be willing to give up all of our daily activities, many of which generate risks. We make risk tradeoffs every day, and corporations must engage in a similar balancing.

The infeasibility of attaining a zero-risk outcome stems from the fact that the cost of risk reduction increases as the level of the risk declines. [31] Because achieving risk reductions gets increasingly more expensive as we improve our levels of safety, at some point it is desirable to stop our quest for reducing one type of risk and use our resources for greater risk reduction elsewhere. Sources of personal risks include smoking, failure to use seatbelts, lack of exercise, and poor diets. Even the most disciplined safety-minded consumers indulge in some risky activities. Travel is inherently risky, whether by plane or by car. To the extent that we drive smaller, fuel-efficient cars, we incur greater risks. Cars that resembled tanks would be safer, but more expensive and more cumbersome to operate. Our daily lives are not governed by a single-minded commitment to safety but by the need to strike a reasonable balance between safety and other concerns, such as our desire to travel or occasional enjoyment of a decadent dessert. The task of the legal system is to provide incentives for corporations to strike an appropriate balance using appropriate societal values for the benefits of improved safety as our guide.

REV_00263783

D. ECONOMIC RESOURCES ARE LIMITED

Consider what would happen if we did not attempt to strike such a reasonable balance but instead sought to achieve zero risks at any cost. Suppose, for example, that all societal resources were devoted to accident reduction. Even if we spent all our money for this purpose, the United States economy would only have enough resources to spend less than $ 60 million per accidental fatality. [32] These expenditures would leave us nothing to spend on food, cancer prevention, environmental quality, medical care, or many other worthwhile expenditures. There are limits as to how much safety we can efficiently achieve and, accordingly, on the amounts we should spend. In some cases, government regulations have cost more than $ 60 million per fatality. Some, such as the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) formaldehyde standard, cost in the billions. Such expenditure levels on risk prevention are not possible across the board since incurring them would bankrupt the economy.

Notably, even in the areas that have been the targets of major government regulation, we are not risk-free. After more than a quarter of a century of risk and environmental regulation, substantial hazards remain. [33] We are safer than before, in part because of society's greater affluence, but we are not risk-free. On average, we continue to face an annual risk of motor-vehicle accidents of 1/5000, an annual risk of job accidents per worker of just under 1/10,000, an annual risk of death and injury in a home accident of 1/11,000, and an annual risk of an aviation accident of 1/250,000. [34] The continued existence of these risks does not necessarily imply that regulatory agencies have been remiss. Rather, they indicate that zero risk levels are unachievable.

Perhaps the main exception to the infeasibility of the quest for attaining zero risk is the Delaney Clause. [35] Under this clause, the FDA prohibits all food additives that pose any risk of cancer. More specifically, the Delaney Clause states that "no additive shall be deemed to be safe if it is found to induce cancer when ingested by man or animal, or if it is found, after tests which are appropriate for the evaluation of the safety of food additives, to induce cancer in man or animals." [36] Despite this zero-risk ideal for food additives, considerable natural and synthetic sources of cancer risk remain in our diets. Natural carcinogens include chemicals contained in apples, pears, broccoli, basil, alcohol, peanut butter, coffee, lettuce, and a wide variety of other staples of very healthy diets. [37] There are also risks that arise from human action, ranging from pesticide residues to saccharin as an artificial sweetener. Moreover, how much we eat and the character of what we eat, such as the consumption of fatty foods, have profound implications for the riskiness of our diet. Even substantial vigilance and dietary planning will not result in a risk-free diet.

E. ELIMINATING RISK BECOMES INORDINATELY COSTLY

The exorbitant costs of reducing risks to a zero level is reflected in what Justice Breyer refers to as the "90-10 principle." He gives the example of the Superfund program:

> Let me provide some examples. The first comes from a case in my own court, United States v. Ottati & Goss, arising out of a ten-year effort to force cleanup of > a toxic waste dump in southern New Hampshire. The site was mostly cleaned up. All but one of the private parties had settled. The remaining private party litigated the cost of cleaning up the last little bit, a cost of about $ 9.3 million to remove a small amount of highly diluted PCBs and "volatile organic compounds" (benzene and gasoline components) by incinerating the dirt. How much extra safety did this $ 9.3 million buy? The forty-thousand-page record of this ten-year effort indicated (and all the parties seemed to agree) that, without the extra expenditure, the waste dump was clean enough for children playing on the site to eat small amounts of dirt daily for 70 days each year without significant harm. Burning the soil would have made it clean enough for the children to eat small amounts daily for 245 days per year without significant harm. But there were no dirt-eating children playing in the area, for it was a swamp. Nor were dirt-eating children likely to appear there, for future building seemed unlikely. The parties also agreed that at least half of the volatile organic chemicals would likely evaporate by the year 2000. To spend $ 9.3 million to protect non-existent dirt-eating children is what I mean by the problem of "the last 10 percent." [38]

REV_00263784

In practice, the drop-off in the efficacy of hazardous waste cleanup expenditures may be even steeper. Justice Breyer hypothesized that the government spreads 90% of its resources to eliminate the last 10% of the risk. Put somewhat differently, it eliminates 90% of the risk by the most effective 10% of its expenditures. In practice, the initial expenditures are even more effective than Justice Breyer conjectured, as the Superfund program achieves over 99% of its risk reduction with the first 5% of the total cleanup expenditures that it requires for the hazardous waste sites. [39] However, the essential point of Justice Breyer's example is certainly correct. The initial large risk reductions come the cheapest. As we spend more money to reduce risk, it becomes increasingly expensive to achieve risk reductions. Indeed, Breyer's hypothesis that eliminating the last 10% of the risk costs us 90% of our risk reduction dollar is not an unrealistic indicator of the dramatic declines in the efficacy of risk reducing expenditures. Because of this rapid drop-off in the efficiency of risk reduction expenditures, it is imperative to ask how much safety is really desirable. And, whether other uses of the money would produce more safety benefits.

F. RANDOM EVENTS AND IMPERFECT CORPORATE CONTROL LIMIT RISK REDUCTION

Failure to recognize the limits of risk-reducing expenditures often leads to unrealistic goals. When the Occupational Safety and Health Act was passed, legislators predicted dramatic declines in job risks would result from the bill. [40] Similarly, projections of the efficacy of seatbelts in reducing motor vehicle fatalities greatly overstated the extent of the improvement that occurred. [41] The ideal of perfect safety has proven to be an illusory goal.

One source of limits to improving safety is that both people and technology matter. Companies cannot simply select a risk-free technology. Even very safe technologies do not eliminate all sources of risk. Most government regulatory efforts have focused on technological improvements, such as improved guarding on machines and passive restraint systems for cars, rather than making people more safety conscious. Influencing the actions of the individuals who also may contribute to risk is sometimes a concern as well, particularly with respect to hazard warnings. However, it is difficult to eliminate all risky behaviors.

Furthermore, increases in safety technology may make it less imperative for people to take protective action, thus impeding safety improvements. Since seatbelts make cars safer, it becomes less important for drivers to exercise care. [42] In addition, people may overestimate the efficacy of technological improvements to safety and fail to take the appropriate level of care. In my analysis of safety caps, I show that people are often lulled into a false sense of security by treating child safety caps as being risk-free, leaving containers with such caps around the house and exposed to children. [43] The mechanism underlying this effect was the subject of a more thorough exploration with respect to cigarette lighters. There is evidence that parents believe that safety mechanisms for cigarette lighters dramatically improve their safety. This improvement in safety characteristics decreases parents' concerns about the location of the lighter and the exposure of children to cigarette lighters. [44]

REV_00263785

Overall statistics suggest that worker actions may be quite prominent sources of risk. Pilot error is responsible for 75% of all airplane accidents. [45] From 45-88% of workers' compensation claims involve accidents in which worker behavior played a contributory role. [46] A study by OSHA found that the majority of deaths of deep sea divers in the North Sea could be traced to worker behavior rather than inadequacies in technology. [47]

What these results mean for company behavior is that consumers and workers are often major contributors to accidents and that technology changes alone will not eliminate risk. The policy levers that can be most readily manipulated by a corporation are changes in product design, changes in the technology of the workplace, and similar technological improvements. Corporations have much more difficulty altering human behavior. Consumers take actions on a decentralized basis. How they use a product cannot be monitored by a corporation. A company can provide hazard warnings, as McDonald's now writes "HOT! HOT!" across the top of its coffee cups. In the case of very potent risks, there can be requirements of safety training, such as the certified pesticide applicators requirement for using dangerous pesticides and the requirement that a motorvehicle license be obtained before driving a car. However, a corporation cannot deploy safety managers to accompany consumers while they are using products because of the decentralized nature of this activity. Juries may ignore this lack of control as one jury did when it awarded $ 25 million in punitive damages to the heirs of a woman who drove around a lowered railroad-crossing gate and was killed. [48]

Decentralized decisions do not, however, imply no corporate control. Profit centers within organizations provide decentralized incentives. Indeed, if inefficiencies escalated with respect to firm size, the largest firms in the economy would be the least profitable. Large firms, which are the safest in terms of accident records for workers on the job, would face the greatest financial risk. [49]

Worker behavior is an intermediate case. Companies can establish guidelines for worker behavior and also control worker behavior more readily than consumer behavior. However, companies cannot continuously monitor the safety-related behaviors of all workers. Supervisors may be able to observe whether protective equipment is being worn and other visible indicators of safety when production is in a group context. However, the difficulty of eliminating unsafe behaviors is reflected in the continued dominance of worker actions as a contributing cause of job accidents. Just as companies cannot entirely control risk because they cannot entirely control consumers, workers are at risk in part because they do not have complete control over their workers' actions.

Thus, in large corporations, random errors arise both for technological performance and worker behavior. In the case of technologies, firms have organizational control over the choice of technology but not over all aspects of its performance. Equipment runs the risk of failing just as the Challenger space shuttle ran the risk of a booster rocket exploding. Similarly, firms can prescribe behavior for workers, but unless they incur inefficiently high levels of monitoring costs some risk of worker failure remains.

The bureaucratic nature of corporate decisionmaking introduces an aspect of uncertainty into risk decisions. The difficulties in maintaining corporate control, and in recognizing the difference between central decisions by a corporation and decentralized mistaken actions within a corporation, are reflected in the American Law Institute's recommended principles guiding the award of punitive damages: "An enterprise should be liable for punitive damages only when there is clear and convincing evidence of reckless disregard for the safety of others in the decisions made by management officials or other senior personnel." [50]

REV_00263786

As the potential independent causes of an accident proliferate, the culpability for not taking a particular precaution decreases. Companies faced with risk situations in which multiple independent causes combine will have a cloudier notion of the likely consequences of safety improvements than in well-defined risk situations. From the standpoint of corporate decisionmaking, the multiplicity of possible risk sources and the absence of a sound understanding of the risk level tend to mute the perceived efficacy of precautionary actions. Before the accident, the appropriate precaution is less clear-cut than after the fact.

Furthermore, in some cases, substantial uncertainties may remain even after the accident, as in the case of the crash of TWA Flight 800. Whether the extensive security requirements enacted after such accidents produce benefits exceeding the substantial costs and delays imposed on passengers depends in large part on the likelihood of such accidents in the future.

III. PUNITIVE DAMAGES ARE NOT NEEDED FOR DETERRENCE

A. COMPENSATORY DAMAGES ARE GENERALLY ADEQUATE FOR DETERRENCE

The assessment of risk measures in Part I failed to reveal any deterrent effect of punitive damages; as a practical level, punitive awards do not enhance safety. This Part addresses a somewhat different issue: that is, even if punitive damages did enhance deterrence, is there any need for them to supplement the safety incentives provided by compensatory awards?

For a large class of circumstances, compensatory damages alone provide adequate deterrence. Consider a case in which all accident costs are financial or involve monetary equivalents. In the case of nonmonetary losses such as environmental damage, the economic assumption is that from the standpoint of those who are injured, this loss can be translated into a fixed amount of money. In such circumstances, both strict liability and negligence rules create efficient levels of safety. [51] In particular, the financial incentives facing the injurer will be adequate to ensure appropriate levels of deterrence.

From an efficiency standpoint then, there is no rationale for additional sanctions. Penalties that go beyond those needed to create an efficient level of safety will produce safety benefits that are not commensurate with the costs being incurred, and these costs in turn will lead to higher prices and other adverse economic effects. Policies for which the benefits to society are exceeded by the costs are not in our net national interest.

Although punitive damages are not generally warranted, there are some narrowly defined circumstances in which analysts have suggested that they could play a potentially constructive role. The discussion below will outline the circumstances that have been identified in which punitive damages can potentially promote more efficient levels of safety. I will then assess the importance of these circumstances and compare these potential benefits of punitive damages with the adverse effects that punitive damages generate.

Table 5

Theoretical Factors Triggering the Pertinence of Punitive Damages

FACTOR	PROBLEM	SOLUTION
Enforcement Error	Probability that harm will go undetected and/or unpunished.	Multiply compensatory damages by the reciprocal of the enforcement probability.
Gap between Compensatory	Optimal compensation from	Impose a fine, regulatory

REV_00263787

Damages for Adequate Deterrence	insurance standpoint provides inadequate deterrence.	penalty, or use punitive damages as a deterrence penalty.
Malicious Intent	Party causing accident derives enjoyment from inflicting harm that may affect value of loss to victim. Usually not relevant for corporate behavior.	Increase damages to offset such enjoyment.

B. POTENTIAL TRIGGERS OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES [52]

Any efficiency-based rationale for going beyond compensatory damages to assess a punitive award requires that conditions other than those in the standard economic loss model be met. Table 5 summarizes the three situations in which, theoretically, punitive damages may be relevant -- enforcement error, a gap between compensatory damages and the deterrence value, and malicious intent. Satisfying at least one of the criteria is a prerequisite for having apotentially sound basis for awarding punitive damages regarding certain corporate acts or actions which might have had probabilistic elements.

The first of the three hypothesized justifications for punitive damages is an enforcement error. Suppose the compensatory damage amount would have provided optimal deterrence, as with monetary harms. However, if an enforcement error creates the probability that the corporation will not suffer this sanction, then there is a rationale for increasing the damages level if tort liability is the only source of financial incentives for safety. A series of authors have shown that compensatory damages provide appropriate deterrence in a situation of imperfect enforcement after the compensatory amount has been multiplied by the reciprocal of the probability that the sanction will be imposed. [53] This formulation ensures that the expected penalty facing the firm equals the optimal deterrence value, taking into account the probability that it will not be levied.

One should, however, be careful in interpreting this underenforcement rationale since courts do limit the extent of liability to exclude many cases of remote risks for which enforcement is difficult. For example, in tort cases, the circle of harm is limited to those directly affected by the accident. [54] If sanction costs would escalate if all indirect effects were taken into account because the ramifications of any favorable or adverse event throughout the economy are extensive. Moreover, it is not clear that accidents create net indirect losses. Damages paid by companies will also stimulate the economy through a variety of indirect efforts, so for symmetry purposes, it is inappropriate to penalize companies for indirect losses without crediting them for the indirect benefits generated by the damage payment. Similarly, benefit-cost analyses for government regulations do not include indirect effects because other expenditures otherwise would have indirect consequences.

Even if one acknowledges the role of enforcement error in muting the effect of compensatory damages on incentives, this factor may not be particularly pertinent for corporate risk decisions. The usual example of an enforcement error problem is midnight dumping of toxic chemicals. Dumping environmental hazards in this manner is explicitly designed to evade enforcement. If there is some probability the polluter will not be caught, compensatory damages will lead to expected sanctions that are less then what is needed for efficient deterrence. Thus, it would seem that additional sanctions in the form of punitive damages would be required to create appropriate incentives.

REV_00263788

However, the tort liability system is not the only institutional actor. The Resource Conservation and Recovery Act [56] (RCRA) imposes sanctions for reckless disposal of hazardous wastes, such as the midnight dumping example. Thus, in addition to potential compensatory damages, other societal mechanisms exist to promote safety and environmental quality. As will be indicated below in the discussion of the role of regulation more generally, much of the belief in the need for stringent punitive damages stems from a tort-centric perspective that ignores the role of such other societal institutions.

For the most part, corporate actions do not follow the clandestine nature of midnight dumping. McDonald's, for example, could not disavow that it had sold the coffee that spilled on the unfortunate woman's lap. The manufacturers of Ford Pintos and GMC trucks likewise could not escape enforcement because the identities of these vehicles were apparent, and the mass-produced nature of the products led to risks that were well known and highly publicized. Moreover, the fact that there may be underenforcement for some classes of behavior does not imply that this rationale for punitive damages can be used for corporate acts in which there is no significant enforcement error.

Even if there is a situation with enforcement error and no regulatory incentives, it is not clear that juries can make sensible judgments on this issue. The analytic task for jurors is extremely complex. In a court case, there presumably is no enforcement error: the firm has been identified. The jury must consequently make an enforcement error judgment across an entire market or set of activities. This task is nontrivial even if no other courts will award punitive damages. However, if other cases involving the risky behavior also might generate punitive damages, the incentives will be too great if punitive damages are set in each case by a jury which is assuming that no other punitive damages will be awarded. In practice, punitive damages in one jurisdiction often lead to efforts to obtain punitive damages in similar cases, which in turn may lead the defendant to settle such cases out of court even if the case is not litigated. Juries have no reliable basis for anticipating the snowball effect of their punitive damages award on other court awards. Failure to recognize the potential ramifications of a punitive award will lead to excessive deterrence.

A second potential role of punitive damages arises when the appropriate deterrence values of damage and sufficient compensation amounts differ. This situation pertains to the character of the accident rather than the mere size of the loss. In particular, does the accident do more than simply lower welfare by the value of losing a fixed sum of money? Does it, for example also impede our ability to enjoy specific money or consumption activities? This situation may occur for severe health effects such as brain damage, which impedes an accident victim's ability to derive well-being from a court award. Accidents that cause fatalities or severely disabling injuries are also prime examples. In these instances, compensatory damages amounts may not provide adequate deterrence because the value of preventing irreplaceable health losses, such as in the case of death, goes beyond the monetary sums involved.

The implicit deterrence value of life associated with preventing a small risk of death ranges from $ 3-[illegible] million per statistical life, with the midpoint value of $ 5 million. [58] Court awards for compensatory damages after fatalities are typically well below that amount. Compensatory damages are intended to ease the financial burdens of the survivors rather than to reflect the well-being of the deceased or provide efficient deterrence. In contrast, punitive damages can have a deterrence function that goes beyond the compensation function to reflect the harm to society of preventing the risky outcome.

Using punitive damages for deterrence is not ideal, however, as it provides compensation to accident victims or their estates that exceeds the optimal insurance value of their loss. Punitive awards for monetary losses are not in consumers' interest because they will, in effect, pay for the unneeded insurance provided by these damages through higher product prices. [59] People will be forced to pay for a level of tort liability insurance beyond what they would buy on their own in the world of perfect insurance markets.

REV_00263789

Government fines and regulatory penalties are superior mechanisms to punitive damages because they create incentives without overinsurance. As will be documented below, the market sanction is $ 3-7 million for each fatality. When job markets for employment risks or product markets for consumption risks function effectively, they will transmit incentives for safety through higher wages for risky jobs and lower prices for hazardous products. If operative, this economic mechanism will meet the deterrence objective, and the courts can focus on their compensatory role. Even if market incentives fall short, imperfect market incentives when coupled with compensatory damages may generate incentives for safety that may be adequate or possibly even too great. That punitive damages are not in widespread use for wrongful death actions may indicate that neglect of safety is typically not so extreme in most cases that punitive financial penalties are needed.

The third situation in which there may be a trigger for punitive damages is malicious behavior, as in intentional torts. The enjoyment that parties derive from inflicting harm may well be viewed as an unacceptable component of the behavior. As indicated in Table 5, such concerns seem more pertinent to personal actions than corporate ones. A punitive damages amount that is the injurer's enjoyment from causing the accident will establish the additional incentive needed for the appropriate degree of care. [60] Given the scope of actions considered in this article -- corporate environmental and safety torts -- this rationale for punitive damages is impertinent.

If the compensatory damage amount imposed on the company creates appropriate incentives, then there is a role for punitive damages. When this condition is not met, one of the three potential triggers of punitive damages must be present for there to be any role for a punitive award. In environmental and safety torts, however, the malicious intent concern is largely irrelevant, and the principal factors that could trigger punitive damages are enforcement errors. Deterrence for both effects. In most situations of corporate acts, enforcement error is a major component or is beyond a jury's competence. Indeed, such judgments would be quite difficult to make even for sophisticated legal scholars. Compensation for fatal losses that promote deterrence provides overinsurance. Whether punitive damages have a constructive role in such contexts depends in large part on the other societal incentive mechanisms in place. The subsequent discussion explores why, put simply, corporations will not completely ignore safety in the absence of tort liability.

What are the broader implications of this review of the theoretical underpinnings of punitive damages? The theoretical case for punitive damages is restricted to narrowly defined circumstances for which I have illustrated, the rationale for punitive damages is not compelling. This rather sparse theoretical foundation may in fact help explain why in practice punitive damages have proved to be an effective deterrent. Punitive damages can, at best, play a limited role in specific contexts likely to be beyond a jury's expertise, such as making complicated statistical judgments regarding the size of the enforcement error based on a case where the defendant has in fact been identified. Indeed, it is noteworthy that the articles supporting punitive damages do not give any actual case examples where juries have made awards in line with the theoretical ideal but instead focus on hypothetical case studies in which juries or attorneys to have done far more clarity than has yet been evident in our court system. The courts have produced no demonstrable safety benefits.

C. MARKETS PROMOTE SAFETY

How juries make the assessment that the firm has been sufficiently remiss to warrant punitive damages is unclear. Juries may fail not only in their thinking about the expected benefits of safety but also in their analysis of the costs of accidents to the firm. In thinking about the adequacy of general incentives, it should be recognized that the court system is not only the institution that affects corporate behavior. Unfortunately, most of the legal literature suffers from a too narrow perspective in which the courts are the only social institution - rk. The courts are not the only safety incentive mechanism in place. For firms that sell ri roducts the market or hire workers into risky jobs, there may be a market response t ris y activi , such as an unwillingness to fly ValuJet after a crash. Indeed, economist imates the implicit value of life are based on observed wage premiums for risky jobs a igher p es now commanded by safer products in the market. These substantial ket pre ums are in the range of $ 3-$ 7 million per statistical life. [61]

REV_00263790

The source ese val s is analysis of compensating differentials for risk, controlling for various as of the rker's job. It is useful to provide some sense of the nature of these studies, w n turn i icates the prevalence of these market incentives for risk. [62] There have been rous s ies of compensating differentials that workers receive for hazardous jobs in the d Stat as well as in many other countries, such as Australia and Japan. The basic idea se stu s is to analyze statistically the wage premium workers receive for added risk e job. typical worker in the United States faces an annual job-related fatality risk '10,00 [63] In return, the worker receives an average wage premium of $ 500, where amou has been estimated by controlling statistically for other aspects of the worker the job. On average, 10,000 workers would receive a total of $ 5 million (10,000 w times 00 per worker) in return for the one expected statistical death among the us, th ue of a statistical life is $ 5 million.

It is impor to unde and what this number means. It is not the value a person must receive to ifferen ween certain death and life. No amount of money may suffice. Nor is it th a e that would purchase in a life insurance policy. Desired compensation for one's l ill be less. Rather, it simply reflects the risk-money tradeoff from the standpoin p ventic This amount would be pertinent for setting punitive damages from a deterren ndpoi compensatory damages were deducted and the firm otherwise completely ed saf . However, even in this case, such an award would provide overinsura onsu , for example, would not want to purchase products with such a punitive d insu policy ttached to it.

In addition ese mo risk tradeoffs in prices and wages, there are other economic mechanis may safety. Consumers may boycott the product. There also may be stock mar rc ercuss that either embody these reputational effects or reflect additional reassessn inves f the value of the firm in the wake of these accidents. [64]

The courts ast imp ly, recognize other financial consequences that affect corporate incentives degree rehen ibility of the corporation's behavior and the divergence between t rate and the appropriate degree of care are typically among the factors to ideres the setting of punitive damages. However, the assumption that it is only the s that p vide incentives after an accident establishes an unrealistic reference Some rations conceivably may set their safety level at zero. But rampant f saf ncom on, even in situations in which there is no anticipation of liability. T ol nomer hows t at other societal mechanisms foster safety incentives. Governm ulation k syst matic neglect of safety. There will also be market penalties safe pro s, as well as reputational costs.

D. GOVE T REGU N PROVIDES ADDITIONAL INCENTIVES FOR SAFETY

Airplane c s enera ck market losses that average $ 50 million per life lost. [65] Governm nctions mpose costs on firms when there are regulatory violations. To capture a ie ely t ntive structure that should be designed for punitive damages, it is also es t take onsid ation the incentives provided through these other institutio ors. Ot , firms will be penalized multiple times by separate social institutio h of wh ener ting incentives to decrease risk.

Companie entives f fety come from a variety of sources. For marketed products, consumer spond to a eived increase in risk by being willing to pay less for products declared h hazardous, h as the Audi 2000 brakes or alar in apples. Notably, the Ford Pinto wa pped from Fo s product line not long after the Ford Pinto litigation. [66]

REV_00263791

In additio the value of urt awards, companies also suffer stock price diminutions and adverse p icity that m pose costs well beyond the court awards themselves. A detailed study of t effects of to bility publicity on the value of firms indicates that these effects were ofte bstantial, a many cases exceeded the actual awards themselves. [67] Furtherm , stock price cts are suffered not only by corporate officers but also by stockhold not involved i he decision.

In consid the risk-red ion incentives facing companies, it is worth-while to recognize that ther multiple in ional actors that generate such incentives. The market and the courts ar o such soci itutions, but a variety of government regulations are at work as well. Airp e safety is s to Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) rules, air traffic controlle ctions, and nment inspections. Cigarettes bear congressionally mandated warning d are subje ring nt advertising restrictions. They also are the focus of a propose 68.5 billion ative package. In the case of prescription drugs, the FDA not only sets standards f sting the drugs but also, in effect, writes the warning language that acc nies all new scription drugs. [68] For oil tankers in sensitive inland waterways like Princ illiam Sound ulatio n by the state and federal government, actions by the Coast G , performanc escor tugboats, and other actions not under corporate control affect ac nt preventio vell s reaction after a spill has occurred.

The exist e of govern regulations that specify standards of corporate behavior often can serv a refere for fficient corporate actions. [69] The legislative mandates of regulato encies a quite restrictive. Typically, they require that firms provide a greater of safety uld e efficient from an economic standpoint. [70] The cost per statistic saved by t effort is often well beyond $ 5 million. Due to the influence of restricti islative ma s, ag ncies often set these standards based on risk alone, not risk-cos eoffs. As a c que ce, an American Law Institute panel recommended that well-def government lator requirements should afford a regulatory compliance defense st punitive d ges [71]

The cour o not curre e out punitive damages in cases of regulatory compliance. In one par rly egre , a ompany was penalized $ 210 million for a chemical spill that wa in EPA and took no land out of agricultural use. [72]

Althoug Supreme C has n t yet recognized a regulatory compliance defense to punitive ges, it has nize the importance of government regulations and the charact orporate b r. In BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, [73] the Supreme Court o d:

> The is no eviden t BMW acted in bad faith when it sought to establish the ap riate line n presumptively minor damage and damage requiring di re to p . For his purpose, BMW could reasonably rely on state di re statu ida ce. In this regard, it is also significant that there is no ence that ersi ed in a course of conduct after it had been ac d unlawfu on e occasion, let alone repeated occasions. . . . In an al e of a histo on- mpliance with known statutory requirements, there is sis for ass tha more modest sanction would not have been su t to motiva l co pliance with the disclosure requirement imposed by th ama Supr ourt in this case. [74]

This reco ion of th nce of regulatory compliance is in no way inconsistent with the

REV_00263792

Any assessment of the desirability of punitive damages requires a thorough assessment of whether they serve any constructive deterrent function. [5] Part I of this article examines possible measures of the efficacy of punitive damages and fails to find any systemic differences in the safety and environmental performance between states with punitive damages and states without them. Thus, there is no deterrence benefit that justifies the chaos and economic disruption inflicted by punitive damages.

Part II defines the context of the corporate risk decisions that are the subject of this study. How do corporations make risk decisions, and what factors, including legal rules, influence them? Punitive damages can influence these risk decisions by increasing the financial sanctions for adverse outcomes of risky decisions. However, if experience shows that punitive damages awards are unpredictable or unlikely, there will be less deterrence.

Part III reviews the conceptual rationales for punitive damage that have been offered in the law and economics literature. These conceptual rationales all deal with highly specialized circumstances, which often involve refined economic judgments likely to be beyond a jury's competence. Consequently, the absence of a measurable deterrent effect of punitive damages is not surprising. Moreover, market forces and regulatory incentives are more powerful and more appropriate means to provide the necessary deterrence incentives.

The absence of any positive record of accomplishment for punitive damages does not, however, imply that they are benign or inconsequential. Part IV examines some of the concrete economic harms that occur when indiscriminate legal sanctions are levied without a sound economic basis.

If punitive damages are so problematic, why have they resisted meaningful reform? Part V explores these issues, tracing the difficulties to various kinds of incorrect approaches to risk decisions embodied in jury behavior and societal reactions to risk more generally. Part VI concludes the paper with a proposal to eliminate punitive damages for corporate risk and environmental decisions.

I. PUNITIVE DAMAGES HAVE NO SIGNIFICANT DETERRENT EFFECT

The linchpin for any economic argument in support of punitive damages is their role in deterring risky behavior. Section IIIB explores the stated economic bases for punitive damages, all of which hinge on an assumed empirical relationship between punitive damages and corporate risk decisions.

The rationale for such a linkage is straightforward. Punitive damages increase the penalty on the firm after an accident or adverse environmental outcome. When the firm calculates the costs of increased safety against the expected costs associated with adverse risk outcomes, the potential for punitive damages will boost expected costs of risky outcomes, making precautions more attractive.

While this deterrence relationship is not controversial, the linkages in practice may not be so clearly consequential. Suppose that juries award punitive damages and set their amount in a completely random and capricious manner. [6] Under this extreme assumption, there will be no linkage between the expected punitive damages costs and the firm's risk action. [7] Consequently, the existence of a deterrent effect depends on whether punitive damages awards follow the prescriptions touted by legal scholars or the more random patterns asserted by punitive damages critics. Exploring the deterrence linkages will help resolve which of the opposing viewpoints about jury behavior is correct.

If all states had the same punitive damages regimes and if these did not vary over time, it would be impossible to assess their influence. Fortunately, a natural experiment already

REV_00263766

Court's r in the Me ic case. [75] In that case the Court ruled that the preemption provision f medical d es did ot preclude lawsuits against defective products. The product q tion had er bee explicitly reviewed by the FDA, but instead was a variant of a simi rly rketed luct. M eover, the nature of the FDA review process for medical devices i n s rigorou s for pr scription drugs. [76]

The Unite tates Supr Court made clear the narrow limitations that should pertain to a regulato mption efense: "Moreover federal requirements must be 'applicab the devic question, and, according to the regulations, pre-empt state law only if th e 'specific nterpart regulations' or 'specific' to a 'particular device.'" [77] A regulator mplianc se is c rtainly desirable but does not go far enough. Punitive damage even i situations of regulatory noncompliance, as there are regulato s s t n stablish financial incentives for care.

The adva ta of gov ent re lations go beyond simply establishing well-defined standard behavior a safe har ors for corporate action. Regulatory agencies often serve an inform nal role, for res rch and for data gathering. The National Highway Traffic Safety A s information on the number of motor vehicle deaths, assisting ssing r ks. NHTSA, for example, kept a running tally of the number this pa y relat d to gas tank placement. [78] More recently, it has develop ed and lives lost due to air bags. A central data analysis of this t tiv use regulatory agencies may be able to identify trends in compar od may be able to pool information regarding similar products o y ri ore pr sely than would be possible using information available to the com to ities also can serve a coordinating role. One such role is to stand the mea g of har d warning language, as in the case of the FDA warning languag rug m keted by different companies. [79]

There ar tag s regulation as well. The process of formulating regulations can pro e re on lation of competing interests, such as public access to a product ver ncerns with safety. There can also be a debate over the merits c es, ng to bear a specialized expertise of regulatory officials rather t , e less specialized knowledge and may be more prone to percepti .

The char f the st regu ory compliance defense is forward looking. On a retrospe s, l the situation before the accident, the sole emphasis is on compen owe after the accident, companies would be subject both to compen d d d government regulations that would emerge after the acciden rma hat the accident provided. Compliance with these regulati ffici erating behavior for the matters addressed by the regulati ima ective of punitive damages that are levied from a deterre iola f these guidelines would be subject to regulatory penaltie ry i ives for compliance.

E. DYNA TMENT OMOTES SAFETY

Even wi r re ory sanctions, there are often strong incentives for compar bel after a major accident or a catastrophe. A major impetus for incr s th accident itself often conveys substantial information about t risk. the accident has occurred the company will be aware of the nee an atory agencies may also establish new guidelines for risk actions se management process is a dynamic process even without addition es ed by the courts, companies will often have the incentive to alter t e the becomes apparent.

REV_00263793

An impor rning i through actual events. Auto companies can observe the frequen h ruck tanks catch fire upon side impact. Pharmaceutical compani e of a e reactions to drugs that they can use to assess product risks. Si p s can n about risks after major catastrophes, such as a major oil spill c r lisas

The diffe es e cases s in terms of the sample size involved and the relationship of the s c) robu y. For mass marketed automobiles and pharmaceutical products s su a very ge sample size. In contrast, major catastrophes tend to involve r er abili and often are more idiosyncratic events. Learning that the O-rings c thra cold weather can help reduce the risk of catastrophes from an the e, but there have not been enough trials of space shuttle launche le t tify all such possible risks of explosion with precision. Catastr p m informative with respect to the particular risk that caused a single t not ide information to make judgments for all causes that might g da ks in future.

Catastr ot a nated because risks of substantial losses are usually small. The wid i imat hat arise because of the unanticipated character of catastro ed i Challenger disaster experience. Before the Challenger disaster im hat the chance of such a disaster was one flight in 100,00 aster, the agency estimated the risk of such a catastr n seventy-eight. A single adverse event led NASA officials to raise y a factor of 1000.

Part of t o the information conveyed by the event, indicating the limits of w ver, dditional consequence of the catastrophe was to increase the cre A who had higher risk assessments. Even before the Challen NAS gineers [81] had estimated the risk of catastrophe as one flight in y indicated that the risk of a booster failure was one flight in thirty

The Cha oc difficulties of risk assessment within the context of large organiz in the organization have different perspectives on the risk and wei ly. The working engineers placed the greatest weight on the like r rockets, whereas more senior NASA officials placed greater ed record of success that they had experienced to date. [83]

The Cha zes the difficulties involved in situations of uncertainty coupled astrophic events. There may be widely disparate estimates of the risk ates may be particularly great in the case of large organiz av with quite different perspectives. After a catastrophe occurs, the high ss e vindicated, but even if the catastrophe had not occurred it may st t the high risk assessors were correct but there simply had not bec erience the catastrophic event. Another possibility is that the low nd we were simply unlucky. [84]

Part of t se is a change both in regulatory standards and legislative require s t usands of cancers related to asbestos became better known, society f ways. The courts levied damages and firms reorganized under h ghtened its regulations to a cost in excess of $ 100 million per cas s did the EPA. The result was a regulatory response and a wave of ed a period of inadequate regulation. This experience, while extrem events and major accidents generate a substantial amount of infor ccident that will lead to diverse governmental and private respon

REV_00263794

IV. PUNITIVE DAMAGES CAUSE ECONOMIC HARM

A. PUNITIVE DAMAGES DISCOURAGE BENEFIT-COST TRADEOFFS

If punitive damages are simply ineffective and caused no adverse consequences, they should be eliminated. However, their overall performance may be even worse than simply failing to foster cost-effective safety incentives; random and unpredictable punitive damages may in fact cause economic harms.

One example of such an adverse consequence is that punitive damage awards discourage companies from doing the kinds of risk management analyses of benefits and costs that are in society's best interests but may offend jurors' sensitivities. Ideally, tort liability and the other societal institutions promoting safety should encourage companies to strike a reasonable balance between risks and costs. Safety improvements should be pursued only so long as the expected benefits to safety exceed the costs. These benefits are not only financial. Monetary measures of the benefits should also include society's willingness to pay for the health-risk reductions and environmental improvements that will take place because of the increased safety undertaken by the corporation. Thus, the benefit-cost tradeoff simply requires that safety improvements be undertaken so long as they are in society's best interest.

Who should be responsible for making such judgments? Should it be the company, with its extensive knowledge of the characteristics of the product and the market consequences? As Judge Learned Hand observed, companies regularly incorporate such safety concerns in a manner that reflects the pertinent tradeoffs. Firms routinely perform cost-effectiveness analyses of their products. Such studies include recognition of the costs of injury and the costs of precautions. Judge Easterbrook notes that the jury perspective tends to be incomplete because it focuses on the effects on the injured person in court, not on the invisible consumers in society who will be affected by the corporate response to tort liability decisions. The companies are more likely to take the societal perspective on costs and benefits, whereas jurors tend to focus on the case specifics.

Making precise assessments of the costs and benefits of safety actions is often feasible for large corporations. For example, the Ford Motor Company, for example, was able to explicitly calculate the costs and benefits of eliminating a safety hazard for the Ford Pinto. [86] General Motors similarly analyzed the costs and benefits of fuel-fed fires. [87] Making such calculations may offend some jurors, but thinking rigorously about risks and costs is exactly what we would like companies to do so that they can strike a reasonable balance between risks and costs. For example, Ford considered the costs and risk associated with different gas tank locations for the Pinto. Although these estimates have been widely touted by plaintiffs' lawyers as representative calculations undertaken by Ford with respect to the risk of gas tank explosion upon rear impact, a recent assessment suggests that these calculations pertained not to the risk associated with rear impact, but rather with the risk of explosion of the gas tank when struck by a vehicle behind. [88] Moreover, the analytical context appears to have been a proactive attempt to strike a balance, not an effort to escape liability. Regardless of which particular tradeoffs to which the calculations pertain, Ford had extensive quantitative information of the costs of various risks, which it could use to assess the risks and the consequences of alternative design. Simply making such calculations, however, led to substantial jury bias. For example: [89]

The nature of these calculations was as follows. Relocating the gas tank would cost Ford $ 11 per car or truck. Ford produced 12 million cars and light trucks creates a total cost of over $ 137.5 million. Moving the gas tank would prevent 180 burn deaths valued at $ 200,000 each, 180 serious burn injuries valued at $ 67,000 per injury, and 2100 burned vehicles valued at $ 700 per vehicle. Based on Ford's estimates, the value of the risk reduction benefits would be $ 49.6 million -- far less than the $ 137.5 million in costs. A m[illegible] e va[illegible]on of the risk to life and health using a deterrence value of life of $ [illegible] har[illegible]e court awards, leads to assessed safety benefit values of $ 1.4 [illegible] / ar[illegible]f magnitude greater than the costs. [90] Whether Ford's decisio[illegible] as i[illegible] de[illegible]s[illegible]n the potential design benefits from the rear gas tank location, hic[illegible] co[illegible]non [illegible]tchbacks. Only by making such a calculation can we assess w[illegible]b[illegible] c[illegible]any [illegible]e the right tradeoff and, if not, how much it fell short.

REV_00263795

Ford clear[illegible] cal[illegible]ions by undervaluing safety. However, the company should be appl[illegible]ts t[illegible]least grapple systematically with the cost and safety implicat[illegible]acti[illegible]. In[illegible], in the wake of this experience, we now know how Ford erred in [illegible]tl[illegible]afe[illegible]nefits. In other cases, the error might be an overas[illegible]co[illegible]or a[illegible]ure to adequately assess risks. By making these tradeoffs explicit[illegible]or[illegible]n f[illegible]our experiences and make more sensible risk tradeoffs in the fut[illegible]If,[illegible]ve[illegible]our[illegible]eate a chilling atmosphere for analysis in which explicit tradeoff[illegible][illegible]ecc[illegible]of the alleged immorality of considering the inevitable tradeoff[illegible][illegible]s[illegible]s[illegible], then we will suppress the type of systematic thinking about risk tha[illegible][illegible]q[illegible]cou[illegible]nhance our safety much more than clandestine, qualitative decisio[illegible]

In the p[illegible]nwa[illegible]n the Ford Pinto case, there is no evidence that the courts consid[illegible]e[illegible]or[illegible]anctions. It is likely, however, that market incentives for safety [illegible]nsi[illegible]s tank fires and explosions are visible and highly dramatic events [illegible]hc[illegible]e-[illegible]ted" by news organizations. After such accidents, companies will su[illegible]b[illegible]e[illegible]ers[illegible]blicity costs that create powerful incentives to make produc[illegible]court-imposed penalties. Thus, even if Ford erred before the accide[illegible]ul[illegible]ect the market to generate powerful incentives for safety once th[illegible]ub[illegible]ed.

B. PUN[illegible]RO[illegible]E COUNTERPRODUCTIVE SPENDING AND WASTEFUL PRECA[illegible]LE[illegible]TO INCREASED RISK

A possi[illegible]of[illegible]mages might be that additional safety incentives, even if unprec[illegible]in[illegible]o harm and might have some protective benefit. In this view, [illegible]romote safety at any cost without worrying about benefit-cost c[illegible]h an approach is not simply that it offends economists' quest for po[illegible]y test in which benefits exceed the costs, but rather that by imposi[illegible]attempt to promote zero risks, we may actually not be reduci[illegible]ll.

The se[illegible]ve[illegible]s counterproductive. Spending inordinate amounts of money to ach[illegible]risk once risks have reached a reasonably safe level is more than s[illegible]. It diverts these funds from other productive uses. Such other[illegible]safety benefits and favorable health effects so that diverti[illegible]xpenditures involves real health costs.

Judge [illegible]tes Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia has correctly obser[illegible]ersion of resources, there may be the loss of a statistical life every[illegible]vernment spends an inordinate amount on regulatory efforts. He su[illegible]in the vicinity of $ 10 million per statistical life have no net benef[illegible]funds otherwise could have had a greater effect in reducing risk b[illegible]edical care, housing, and other life-extending consumption items.[illegible]al estimates suggest that expenditures around $ 10 million could[illegible]statistical life, my estimates, which use an approach that avoids[illegible]s of disentangling the causality involving income and morta[illegible]ppropriate reference point is $ 50 million. [92] What this estim[illegible]e we spend $ 50 million or more to eliminate an expected death, t is th istical life because we divert resources from other worthwhile morta ducin urpo s.

REV_00263796

The na of this k-risk c t may seem surprising, but its underlying economic principle is cap in the f wi g c ple. Suppose that some risk prevention is no more safety-enhan han dic tc nd filling them back up again. Such efforts do nothing to promo ety, b e be injured in the process. Moreover, if we had devoted the ditch g resc a dard bundle of consumer items, including items such as medic e, som ave been saved. Saving that $ 50 million, instead of spendi on end th omise little or no return, produces greater overall health, becau grea nt results allows us to spend more on the types of goods and servic t will , alth.

C. PU E DAMA S D AGE INNOVATION

Punitiv mages a h gu ssential mechanism for generating a large tort liability award e abs u e damages, the court award will be restricted to the much more t dar o such high awards bolster the incentives for safety or do they h ome a ssions?

Most a ment n have focused on anecdotal evidence. To address this issue more natic re and I [93] developed a large database that included measu f innova n b try for a large sample of firms. These innovations included new p s, new uctions, and other measures that would provide reliable indica f the de the industry was undertaking the kinds of activities that would o the ess that has enhanced our lives and well-being. At low and mode s of awards have the constructive effect that supporters of the liabili em h ed. In particular, modest levels of damages foster innov nd p hat bolster our level of safety. Thus, a modest award level has a ructiv g firms to undertake the kinds of product modifications and new p t intr l reduce our risks.

Once t amage s very high, however, the effect is counterpro-ductive. High dama ls sup n across the board. Firms in effect stop innovating because of the ntial y suffer for new and uncertain product introductions, as oppos hnologies. Once damages become excessively high, either produ lop or firms will withdraw from the market altogether. Such withd as t n the United States private aircraft industry's production of priva es. [9

A mor miner s the effect of punitive damages on vaccines. Vaccines are vital t physi nfortunately, some people suffer side effects from vaccines, which subm urdens on the affected firms. The wave of litigation against vacci uce an 50% reduction in the number of manufacturers of vacci single-product monopolies are the producers of many majo r polio, mumps, measles, rabies, and rubella. In much the same s are now produced only by a single-product supplier, as other ave t. [96] The substantial increase in vaccine prices, far above the o nflat be traced to the rising role of liability costs. [97] In the usual econo ontext means that fewer people will buy the product. The same is true c ines - accines has increased, the rate of immunization in the Unite s ha

These mic te and demonstrable. However, they have largely been ignor discussion has focused on punishment of corporations.
The c on what financial incentive we should provide to corpo to ecognizing that we benefit from corporate activity in many ways at e f lives. Unfortunately, litigation, particularly in the case of sever s t damages, tends to focus on the narrow context of the indivi ce ader effect on corporate incentives and the economy as a whole.

REV_00263797

The h lottery can be influential even when punitive damages are not a damages can have a chilling effect on corporate behav nt case involves the Cabbage Patch doll, which chewed off the ha e company received substantial adverse publicity and the girl's $ 25 million punitive damages award. [99] In another alleg mber at a New York performance of Cats filed a suit askin compensatory damages because one of the cats in the show dance, sat on her lap, and mussed up her hair. [100] Seem nitive damages can have chilling economic effects. Even if there im ve damages in such instances, the unpredictability of juries and t due to past punitive damages awards in other seemingly frivol t of court to avoid the risk of a major financial penal

V. WH

Why d ing sound judgments regarding risk actions and associated punit to e especially great for punitive damages as comp tory damages? Does the risk assessment context create additi o not err more when assessing punitive damages, the large a more pressing concern. However, juries' ability to make actions is likely to be severely limited.

Decisi ainty are notoriously difficult. People often make syste ns because these situations impose much greater dema choices involving certainty. [101] These errors in perce havior of individuals within organizations as well as juries ch of the many errors in perception and decision will b n the character of the risk decision and the infor

A. OU S

An im en probabilities and consequences. The probability is the likeli he consequence represents the magnitude of the loss in an ac y is that people may confuse the two components. [102] High ly affect perceptions of the preventability of the accid ss ex post does not, however, imply that the ex ante occurred was large or that this probability could have gh preventive actions. Thus, the correct test of whet ree of care is whether the cost of the precaution was less t y that would have resulted from the precaution, multi l loss. [103] Making such a judgment requires, however, that j e, before the accident, and make a risk judgment unta has in fact occurred.

B. H

A pit is that they may incorrectly assess the firm's know hindsight they may infer that the company also had fu... ...mp...t care enough about safety to invest in a greater level of pre... ...eve... ...e clairvoyant powers implicit in the common assumption that t... ...icip... ...possible accidents.

REV_00263798

Using ... ...forr... ...s the yardstick for determining how companies should select ... ...a hi... ...el of safety precautions will seem optimal compared to what ... ...sen... ...n the more imperfect information available before the accid... ...ro... ...pproach in the courtroom, consequently, will overstate the m... ...tiv... ...s required to align the incentives of the firm with those neede... ...it ... ...f care. Hindsight bias of juries consequently leads to exces... ...ns... ...es overstate the firm's degree of knowledge prior to the ac...

Ideall... ju... ...ess t... ...oration's decision based on the degree of risk inform... ...'ginc... ...te behavior based on subsequent information rather than ... ...he ... ...he safety action will lead to an overstatement of the beha... ...'. J... ...'er... ...rook notes that juries are more prone to problems of hin... ...'or... ...hic... ...are more likely to focus correctly on the prosp... ...n... ...e Easterbrook observes: "The 'ex post' perspective of litiga... ...c... ...dis...orts judgment." [105]

Puttin... ...ght b... ...inherently difficult for juries. What was the state of inforn... ...f the... ...n, and will the jury use this as the reference point? After the fa... ...s oc... ...he retrospective accident probability will be 1.0. Howe... ...refe... ...int for assessing whether the firm has met its oblig... ...nad... ...rc...iate ex ante risk tradeoff given the available inforr... ...mi... ...ib... set of corporate protective actions. These corpo... ...c... ...s i... technology and operating procedures that could affect...

C. IRR... E... ...T... PROBABILITIES AND PREMIUMS FOR ZERO RISK

Many ... ...fa... ...risk p... ...on stem from the character of the risk. For low proba... ...tl... ...ve b... ...ed to their attention, people usually overestimate the level ... ...6... ...'ide... ...risks tend to be overestimated, while very large risks often ... ...To... ...nt... ...hat accidents and major catastrophes involve small proba... ...p... ...tc... ...verestimate their likelihood once these possibilities are c... ...s'... ...ea... ...when people are completely unaware of the risk, they ... ...h... ...tl... hazard. [107]

The p... ...eq... ...fact for jury assessments of corporate risk actions is that peopl... ...ve... ...fiec... ...having a higher probability of an accident than was the case ... ...con... ...y will attempt to avoid these risks more than they would... ...re p... ...understood. After the fact, the hazards will be ident... ...ri... ...erat... ...ex post basis, there will be a tendency of juries to over-asses... ...c... ...'vi...g small probabilities, reflecting the observed syste... ...r... ...t...e level of the risk. Overcoming this bias may be diffic... ...o...

A corc... ...ov... ...mall probabilities is that people will be willing to pay a prem... ...ert... ...a situation of zero risk. [108] Since people overestimate small... ...d... ...f...m a small probability to zero will have a greater effec... ...iv... ...k r... ...h...n a risk decrease of the same magnitude that did not r... ...'d... ...'co... ...aluation of risk reduction, for example, have indicated that r... ...'s... ...ou...ehold chemical products from 5/10,000 to zero has a mu... ...'c... ...'su...mers than decreasing the risk level from 15/10,000 to 5/1... The ... ...se represents twice the risk decrease associated with zero ri... ... . Whereas economic predictions would indicate that peopl... ... ... ngness to pay for successive reductions in risk, in practi... ... ... ly high value on the last reduction in risk that decre... ... ... l of zero risk leads government officials to declare that our fo... ... rat... ...g, for example, that only a small number of Americans will b... ... od... ...r.

This p... ... bias ... ...nce jury behavior. To the extent that juries also exhibit a cert... ... ...im, ...limination of the risk by a company by more than is warra... ... ... reduction. Similarly, departures from zero risk will be viewe... ... ...n they are. Juries will not appropriately value the comp... ... ...a small, but nevertheless nonzero amount. This latter relati... ... ... risk perceptions in terms of overestimating small proba... ... ...ionship between actual risks and perceived risks so that t... ... ce... ...uction in risk than has actually occurred. [110] Figure 1 illustr... ... tio... ...y risks. People overestimate small risks and under... ... ge... ...ed probability curve is flatter than the actual proba... ... tha... ...e line. Juries consequently underestimate the extent of the ri... ... a c... ...eved and overestimate the importance of further risk reduc... ... ...erestimation of corporate risk-reduction efforts leads to jur... ... ...ts in cases involving risk and uncertainty.

D. IR... ... ... RISKS

The c... ... ...portant role. People tend to overreact to risks assoc... ... ...s that represent increases from accustomed risk levels, risks ... ... ir... ...nd risks associated with highly publicized events. [111] Peopl... ... onf... ...nd outcome amounts, rating the probability as higher if the ... ...

What ... ...l of these elements will be present in many punitive dama... ... ...illnesses. Consider, for example, litigation involving breas... ... ...mplants involve a new technology which presents new risks. ... ...mplants incurred risks that were then outside of their perso... ... ...enerated considerable publicity. Asbestos risks likew... ... ... outside of the control of the exposed individual, and involv... ... ...cognizant of when they incurred the risk because of evolv... ... ...d to overreact to such risks, producing excessive respo... ... se ... ...ssing liability and punitive damages.

E. IR... ... ... TAIN RISKS

A fina... ... ...tially influential is the well-known Ellsberg paradox. [113] Pe... ... ...chance of winning a prize to an equivalent "soft" proba... ... ...counterpart to this effect in the case of losses. Stud... ... ...biguous risks and environmental damage indicate that ... ...cisely understood risks of adverse outcomes are prefe... ... ...es of an adverse environmental outcome even thoug... t ... ...verse outcome is the same in each instance. For exam... e, ...own chance of an adverse consequence of 2/1000 rathe... ... ... is either 1/1000 or 3/1000.

This p... ... ...tend to make companies more cautious in situations of ambi... ... ...ns of known risk. However, if they are unfortunate enou... ... ...e despite their precautions, juries are likely to be particu rgi uri ticularly likely to be excessively demanding in situati ns ir) t that they treat the risks incurred by the company as being re y tain. Thus, we are led to a perhaps paradoxical result.

REV_00263800

Situat n cautionary behavior will be particularly difficult for comp a well-defined risks, should have more lenient liability stand e t people (and thus juries), to overestimate uncertain risks r na ti te defendants particularly harshly in situations of uncer .

Again, ju tha ith respect to this and other errors in jury behavior is that j ot as al risk decisionmakers before the fact, but rather as critics i after the fact. From this external reference point, juror s ments that are rational regarding precautions, but that may b e result may be jury anger with a company's perfor ction.

VI. RE C

A. THE PUN MAGES CEILINGS

Curre s ro 's have been largely preoccupied with the search for an el jes to compensatory damages. Punitive damages have been evel punitive damages reforms that have either estab ct ratios between punitive damages and comp and I have shown that damages caps have been the most ever, punitive damages ceilings and multipliers have a seem re is no apparent basis for setting such quantitative guide cap counterproductive by serving as an anchor, setting a targe [118]

The U ne ndicated that the extent of the punitive damages amou satory damages level, but has resisted strict numc nitive damages award in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v re aware that the punitive damages award in this case i compensatory damages. . . . While the monetary comp be close to the line, the award here did not lack objec Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., the Court upheld an av na the compensatory damages amount:

> this award is 'grossly excessive,' TXO places its > t is over 526 times as large as the actual > er stresses the shocking disparity between the > ory award, that shock dissipates when one > ondents, in terms of reduced or eliminated > ucceeded in its illicit scheme. [120]

In BM , the Court overturned a punitive damages award that was 1 s t nsatory damages amount, but the Court did not overt ne d some numerical guideline for propriety: "As in Hasli bright line marking the limits of a constitutionally accep [121] Rather, the problem was that the award did not reflec ct of BMW or the level of damages needed to provide the a

REV_00263801

The le[illegible] fo[illegible] beyond any punitive damage formulas or caps. All such effort[illegible] [illegible]r' impetus is that punitive damages are out of control and that v[illegible] discipline. Picking a cap of $ 1 million has no more econ[illegible] target number, whether $ 500,000 or $ 5 million.

If a le[illegible] olic [illegible]ns' entally flawed, the solution is to eliminate it rather than to res' [illegible]he [illegible] than set arbitrary ceilings on punitive damages, an appro[illegible] t social costs of punitive damages is to abolish them altoge[illegible] ignificant deterrence and will eliminate all of the puniti[illegible] [illegible]ated the arbitrary cutoffs on punitive awards.

B. A P[illegible] [illegible]'E DAMAGES

Do pu[illegible] ost test? Put somewhat differently, is there any basis whats[illegible] [illegible]c [illegible]e[illegible] efits derived from punitive damages exceed the wide range[illegible] [illegible]ts[illegible] [illegible]n awards? The benefits side of the ledger indicates no signif[illegible] [illegible]a[illegible] tory damages do serve an essential role in a wide varie[illegible] victims and providing incentives for deterrence. Aboli[illegible] t diminish the current role of compensatory damages; such [illegible] s of accident victims and create incentives for deter[illegible]

The m[illegible] e adequacy of compensatory damages for deterrence involv[illegible] nstances. Concerns about punishing malicious behavior are p[illegible] on, and only rarely to corporate risk decisions. Simil[illegible] alient problem for corporate actions, which are typically readi[illegible] arge-scale losses for which punitive damages might be awar[illegible] ate decisions have traditionally played a role in major catas[illegible] tial individual loss, and in these instances the identity of th[illegible] n. Moreover, assessing the enforcement error prob[illegible] al judgments likely beyond any jury's competence.

The f[illegible] amages might be warranted is for outcomes such as fatali[illegible] onetary equivalents are needed to create adequate deter[illegible] es in such instances create inefficiencies. They provide exce[illegible] rding accident victims a damages payment much large[illegible] he victims would voluntarily choose if given the option of pu[illegible] olicy for such losses. Punitive damages are also rarely awar[illegible] as fatalities because corporations seldom completely ignor[illegible] ey may occasionally fall short of an adequate level of safet[illegible] ls, regulatory sanctions, and market-based penalties can b[illegible]).

The c[illegible] l established. Punitive damages are highly uncertain and c[illegible] firms engaged in potentially risky lines of corporate activ[illegible] urage risk-taking, such as the development of new phar[illegible] s of commerce. In the absence of such progress, our stan[illegible] nt adverse effects on our health. Excessive punitive dam[illegible] nd create excessive incentives for safety that may in fact i[illegible]

The v[illegible] he role of punitive damages in the liability system is well estab[illegible] ontinued despite more than a decade of state-level puni[illegible] e reforms invariably constrain the level of punitive dam[illegible] tle guidance to juries about when punitive damages are v[illegible] ised in the law and economics literature. The reason exists. Four states -- Michigan, Nebraska, New Hampshire and Washington -- do not permit punitive damages. [8] Thus, these four states already have in place the liability regime that I recommend. Is there any evidence that these states fare worse with respect to risk than the states that do permit punitive damages?

Punitive damages regimes of course differ in character. Criteria for punitive damages awards may differ in terms of the statutory requirements or nature of the conduct that must be present for punitive awards to be pertinent. [9] There also may be punitive damages caps and limits on insurability. The analysis below assesses the average effect of these punitive damages regimes as compared to the no-punitive-damages states.

The nature of the statistical tests is twofold. First, this part analyzes the average risk levels for states with and without punitive damages. Is there a significant difference in performance that reflects evidence of a deterrent effect of punitive awards? Such patterns may not, however, be fully informative, as the states may differ in other ways, such as income levels and industry mix. The second set of tests provided in the Appendix consists of multivariate regression results that explicitly control for these differences. The implications of these more refined statistical tests mirror the overall mean across state comparisons: there is no evidence of a significant deterrent effect of punitive damages.

A. TOXIC CHEMICAL ACCIDENTS

Accidents involving toxic chemicals are local in character and should be quite responsive to differences in states' financial incentives. Because these accidents are relatively infrequent, Table 1 presents two measures of toxic chemical accidents over the 1988-1992 period. The total number of chemical accidents in the top panel was 34,000 over that period. As indicated in the bottom panel of Table 1, the number of toxic chemical accidents involving injury and death was just over 2000. In each case the accident rate per 100,000 population was lower for the four states without punitive damages than for the rest of the country. The calculations in the table of accident rates per capita account for differences in state size. Other adjustments, such as accident rates based on a measure of industrial activity, also show no effect from punitive damages. There is no statistically significant difference between the states with and without punitive damages in terms of the risk level.

States with punitive damages are not, however, a homogeneous group. An important difference pertains to whether corporations in those states can insure against punitive damages. Some states permit insurance, other states explicitly prohibit insurance, and a third group of states have not resolved whether to allow insurance. If insurance premiums adjust to reflect the higher expected costs when punitive damages are permitted, then any deterrent effect of punitive damages should be similar irrespective of their insurability. One might hypothesize, however, that if there is less than full responsiveness of insurance rates to risk levels, the effect of punitive damages should be greater when insurance is not permitted.

Table 1

Environmental Risk Differences in States with and without Punitive Damages

TOXIC CHEMICAL ACCIDENTS, 1988-1992

	Accidents	Population (1,000s)
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	869	9,418
Nebraska	163	1,604
New Hampshire	112	1,114

REV_00263767

why t... n unable to provide such guidance is that there is simply no w... in which a compelling case for punitive damages exists.
For t... ve damages awards be eliminated for corporate risk and envir...

Woul... with compensatory damages? From a tort-centric persp..., t... principal source of incentives for corporate behavior.
How... or ... uch broader environment than the tort system.
Corp... ... enerate powerful incentives for safety. The workers who a... the job are hired in a market. Similarly, the products the c... who themselves respond to risk levels. Public reactions and t... sult after major corporate transgressions will generate addit... er these financial incentives.

Gover... sti... e a wide variety of regulatory requirements that influe... nmental decisions. These regulations typically impose more ... ger... erson would select to meet an efficient level of safety.
More ... tory penalties even when there is no accident, thus maki... s in a broader range of circumstances. Consequently, corpo... e of government regulations consequently should not be expo... mpany's actions violate a regulation, then we can rely upon ... tory agencies to foster the appropriate safety incen... mages would augment these regulatory sanctions, as woul... ould be powerful incentives for safety, even for regul... sition of punitive damages.

Even ... a case for punitive damages is hard. With some effort, scho... amples of situations meriting punitive awards such as thos... en for narrowly defined hypothetical cases there is no empi... ries can make reliable judgments on the subtle statis... d. Moreover, there is a wealth of empirical evidence docu... ve in judging risky actions -- biases that typically will be pr...

The l... t us to have omniscient juries apply tightly circur... generated by highly specialized economic models. If punit... orm of damages, there is no reason to believe that juries ... in the future than they have after a decade of punitive dama...

Punit... f our judicial system. Legal observers such as Supreme Cour... d the randomness of jury behavior. [122] Punitive dama... ificant deterrent effects, but the unpredictable chance of ca... bstantial harm. If one were to apply the usual tools of polic... vernment expenditure programs and regulations, the requi... Do punitive damages create more good for society than harm... v conceivable test of efficacy. The most sensible legal refor... for corporate safety and environmental tort.

APPE... F DETERRENCE EFFECTS

Table... arious mean-risk measures for states with and without puni... of course, differ in more dimensions than punitive dama... detailed multivariate regression analysis counterparts that ... of punitive damages given a variety of other variables, such ... comparison, the regression table numbering in the

REV_00263803

Appendix follows that in the text. The results mirror those in the simpler means tests, and in some respec are even stronger. Pu itive damages have no significant effect in generating deterrence f any of the safety mea ures considered. Some of the beneficial deterrent effects in the alysis of the means r o doubt is attributable to other economic influences.

Table 1A foc s on the total number of chemical accidents and the total number of such accidents inv ing injury and death. These regressions control explicitly for the size of the population, ti number of manufact ring employees per capita household income, and the Republican pr idential vote. Howeve r, they also include measures of the extent of chemical industry activity, including the numb r of employees in the chemical industry, the oil and gas extraction in stry, and oil refini g. While a variety of these industry mix variables are consequenti s predictors of ch m l accidents, states with no punitive damages do not perform diff tly in any significant manner. The omitted punitive damages variable is for states with r unitive damages per itted. These states consequently serve as the reference point for ass ng the role of punitive damages in all the subsequent regressions. The main question to b ddressed is whether there is evidence of a deterrent effect in any of the three punitive dam s regime states f r which insuring punitive damages is permitted, states where such i rance is not perm tt , and states where the status of such insurance has yet to be resolve

The regressi analysis in Table 1 r toxic chemical accidents will follow the same general pattern as all bsequent analyse will first estimate a single model including the three punitive dam s variables and a scale measure such as population. The equation will then be exp d to include othe ables of potential influence, such as those reflecting industry mix l political factors. T results for toxic chemical accidents in Table 1A do not indicate any ificant influence ny of the three punitive damagesinsurance regimes.

Table 1A

Regression Results for 1988-1 Toxic Chemical Accidents and Toxic Chemical Accidents I lving Injury or

Variable	Toxic Chemical Accidents
Intercept	-239.009	492.084
	(303.400)	(407.554)
Population	1.45 x 10<-4> 	2.91 x 10<-5>
	(0.14 x 10<-4>)	(2.22 x 10<-5>)
State has p itives, but ambiguousl insurable punitives icator	427.263	-30.197
	(359.881)	(180.016)
State has i urable punitives indicator	301.412	42.918
	(313.636)	(152.688)
State has w insurable punitives i icator	-51.666	12.525
	(319.234)	(154.400)
Manufacturi g Employees		0.603 *
		(0.336)
Per Capita ousehold Income		-0.015*
		(0.008)
Republican esidential Vote (19 2		3.856
		(5.533)
Chemical E loyees		-2.083

REV_00263804

(SIC 28)		(2.715)
Oil and Gas Extraction Employees (SIC 13)		2.722 (3.172)
Oil Refining Employees (SIC 291)		157.272  (18.723)
[ILLEGIBLE TEXT]	0.687	0.931
Variable	Toxic Chemical Accidents Involving Injury or Death
Intercept	-16.213 (17.228)	2.268 (23.303)
Population	9.75 x 10<-6>  (0.80 x 10<-6>)	1.86 x 10<-6> (1.27 x 10<-6>)
State has punitives, but ambiguously insurable punitives indicator	14.916 (20.435)	2.892 (10.293)
State has insurable punitives indicator	11.796 (17.809)	2.906 (8.730)
State has uninsurable punitives indicator	5.952 (18.127)	14.836 (8.828)
Manufacturing Employees		0.076  (0.019)
Per Capita Household Income		-0.0003 (0.0005)
Republican Presidential Vote (1992%)		0.312 (0.316)
Chemical Employees (SIC 2)		-0.726  (0.155)
Oil and Gas Extraction Employees (SIC 13)		-1.305  (0.181)
Oil Refining Employees (SIC 291)		12.896  (1.071)
[ILLEGIBLE TEXT]	0.771	0.949

Note: standard errors in parentheses. Employment figures are in thousands.

* Significant at 90% confidence level.

 Significant at 95% confidence level.

 Significant at 99% confidence level.

The toxic release regression results in Table 2A present analyses of the determinants of facilities reporting toxic discharges, forms reporting toxic discharges, forms reporting toxic discharges, reduction in surface water discharges, and reduction in total releases. The other variables include measures from equations as well as toxic facilities per capita. In some ca[illegible]s the explanatory power [illegible]he regressions is very low. Since the object of the estimat[illegible] is t[illegible] test whether punit[illegible] damages matter, not to predict these toxic releases, the abs[illegible]ce of a strong predictive [illegible]ionship for the some of the toxic discharge variables is not a n[illegible]r c[illegible]cern. The toxic re[illegible] regressions also fail to indicate a deterrent role of punitive [illegible]es. For the most pa[illegible]he three punitive damages regimes have no significant effect. T[illegible]e no significant eff[illegible]n Panel A. The only exception in Panels A, B, and C of Table 2[illegible] with respect to th[illegible] percent reduction in surface water discharges there is one [illegible] t effect, which go[illegible] opposite direction needed for a deterrent effect, as it indic[illegible] of a reduction in d[illegible]rges when there are punitives, but they are not insurab[illegible]ever, in the fuller v[illegible]n of the statistical model there is no such influence. Panel C [illegible]Ta[illegible] 2A includes no st[illegible]ally significant insurance variable effects. Overall, the punitiv[illegible]s regime states d[illegible] differ in any significant manner for the Toxic Release Invent[illegible]

REV_00263805

Table 2

Regre[illegible]n [illegible]sults for Toxic R[illegible]e Inventory

Panel [illegible] Reporting Sour[illegible]duction Activities in 1992

Variable	Percent of Facilities Reporting Reduction Activities
Interc[illegible]t	0.364 	0.602 ***
	(0.032)	(0.114)
State [illegible]s punitives, but ambigu[illegible]l[illegible] insurable punitiv[illegible] indic	-0.014	0.025
	(0.040)	(0.038)
State [illegible]urable punitive indica	0.0028	0.047
	(0.0360)	(0.034)
State [illegible]s u[illegible]nsurable punitiv[illegible] indic[illegible]r	0.0021	0.024
	(0.0341)	(0.031)
TRI fa[illegible]lities per 100,000 popula[illegible]n		-0.012 **
		(-0.005)
Manuf[illegible]g employees per 100,0[illegible]ation		1.98e<-5> **
		(0.82e<-5>)
House[illegible]ome per capita		-2.87e<-6>
		(2.08e<-6>)
Republ[illegible]an [illegible]residential Vote (1992		-0.0053 ***
		(0.0018)
[ILLE[illegible]LE TEXT]	0.009	0.314

Variable	Percent of Forms Reporting Reduction Activities
Interc[illegible]	0.278 	0.531 ***
	(0.033)	(0.107)
State [illegible]nitives, but ambigu[illegible]sly [illegible]nsurable punitiv[illegible]s indic[illegible]r	-0.022	-0.027
	(0.041)	(0.036)
State [illegible]insurable punitives	-0.031	-0.024

REV_00263806

indica'	(0.037)	(0.032)
State i insurable punitives	0.005	0.022
indica	(0.035)	(0.029)
TRI fa it es per 100,000		-0.014 ***
popula n		(0.004)
Manufa ing employees per		2.38e<-5> ***
100,0 lation		(0.77e<-5>)
Househ come per capita		-2.74e<-6>
		(1.96e<-6>)
Republ residential Vote		-0.006 ***
(1992		(0.002)
[ILLE XT]	0.042	0.435

Note: s' errors in parentheses. Observations weighted by state population.

For sou e Table 6A, infra.

* Signi 90% confidence level.

 Sig t 95% confidence l el.

 Si at 99% confidence l vel.

Panel ges in Surface W r Discharges Reported in 1992 Toxic Release Invent

Variable		Percent Reduction in Surface Water Discharges from 1988 to 1992
Interc	38.399	-127.897
	(100.480)	(415.575)
State nitives, but	-197.371	-152.063
ambig nsurable punitiv s	(125.638)	(140.004)
indic
State surable punitives	-13.735	44.804
indica	(111.757)	(123.456)
State nsurable punitiv s	-16.762	8.755
indica	(106.050)	(113.921)
TRI fa es per 100,000		-3.138
popula		(16.793)
Manuf employees per		0.014
100,0 ation		(0.030)
Housel ome per capita		0.007
		(0.008)
Republ esidential Vote		-4.291
(1992		(6.637)

REV_00263807

[ILLEG EXT]	0.043	0.014
Variable	Percent Reduction in Surface Water Discharges from 1990 to 1992
Interc	27.540	-84.428
	(87.515)	(350.535)
State l nitives, but ambigu y insurable punitives indica	-204.937 * (109.426)	-145.391 (118.017)
State l surable punitives indica	-12.954 (97.982)	50.666 (104.669)
State l nsurable punitives indicat	-31.050 (92.366)	0.228 (95.976)
TRI facil es per 100,000 populatio		-3.660 (14.156)
Manufactur g employees per 100,000 po lation		0.019 (0.025)
Household ome per capita		0.0057 (0.0064)
Republican esidential Vote (1992%)		-5.718 (5.593)
[ILLEGIBLE EXT]	0.076	0.092

Note: standa errors in parenthes. Observations weighted by state population.

For sources, Table 6A, infra.

* Significant 90% confidence l .

 Significa t 95% confidence l el.

 Significa at 99% confidence l vel.

Table 3A pre ts a series of two s of regressions for which the dependent variables are the per capit tality rates from ical misadventures and all accidents. In each case, the first regress eported includes an intercept and a set of indicator or dummy variables for whether t state permits pu damages and their insurability status. The second set of regressio includes the p ita manufacturing employees to control for industry mix, the per ita household inc to control for wealth effects, and the percent Republican p dential vote in 1 control for political influences. The medical misadventur quation also inclu the number of physicians per capita.

In none of th quations in Table is there evidence that punitive damages reduce risk. The only sta ally significant i is that the total accidental death rate is higher in the states w surable punitiv s, which is the opposite of a deterrence relationship.

Table 4A pr s analogous reg results for the per capita value of different insurance premiums, w... are the counte... the mean estimates in Table 2. As before, the four measures ar... per capita val... insurance premiums, medical malpractice premiums, pr... ct, and other li... miums. The explanatory variables parallel those included in T... 3A. All three o... ive damages variables in Table 4A are statistically significant. T... extent that p... ages have a deterrent role, the risk levels and the premium amo... s should be lo... unitive damages states. The competing effect is that the prosp... of punitive da... boost premium levels for any given level of risk. Howev..., it is ... states with in... itive damages that have higher premium rates but the other two ... nitive damages ... pings.

REV_00263808

Panel C: Cha... es in Total To... ...es Reported in 1992 Toxic Release Inventory

Variable	Percent Reduction in Total Toxic Releases from 1988 to 1992
Intercept	31.207 	6.568
	(8.304)	(31.959)
State has p... tives, but ambiguously ...surable punit... indicator	10.171	5.762
	(10.384)	(10.767)
State ... ...rable punitiv... indicator	-4.109	-2.050
	(9.236)	(9.494)
State has ... ...nsurable punit... indicator	9.449	7.506
	(8.765)	(8.761)
TRI f... liti... per 100,000 popul... n		0.752
		(1.291)
Manuf... ...employees pe... 100,0... ...ion		-0.0025
		(0.0023)
House... ...e per capita		0.0012 ***
		(0.0006)
Republi... ...esidential Vo... (1992		-0.122
		(0.510)
[ILLF... ...E ... T]	0.101	0.167

Variable	Percent Reduction in Total Toxic Releases from 1990 to 1992
Interc...	25.222 	40.997
	(7.035)	(27.138)
State ... ...tives, but ambig... ...ly ...surable punit... indic...	-12.522	-7.808
	(8.797)	(9.143)
State ... ...rable punitiv... indic...	-10.937	-3.028
	(7.831)	(8.062)
State ... ...surable punit... indic...	-1.068	1.843
	(7.425)	(7.439)
TRI fa... ...s per 100,000 popul...		-1.481
		(1.097)

REV_00263809

Manufa · employees per 100,0 · tion		0.0022 (0.0019)
House! · e per capita		2.13e<-4> (4.97e<-4>)
Republ · sidential Vot (1992		-0.764 * (0.433)
[ILLEG · T]	0.097	0.175

Note: s' · rrors in parenth · bservations weighted by state population.

For sou · Table 6A, infra.

* Signi · 0% confidence

 Sig · 05% confidenc

 Sig · 99% confiden · .

For ref · le 5A summa · means and standard deviation of the variables used, and Ta · ides the data · .

Table 3

Regre · lts for Acci · ath Rates Per Capita

	ariable	Medical Misadventures
Interc	0.952 	-0.447
	(0.219)	(0.908)
State · ives, but ambig · urable punit · ator	-0.367	-0.396
	(0.274)	(0.279)
State · rable punitiv · indic	0.352	0.201
	(0.244)	(0.251)
State · urable puni · indic	0.045	-0.048
	(0.231)	(0.234)
Manuf · Employees per 100,0 · ion		2.92 x 10<-5>
		(2.60 x 10<-5>)
House! · per capit ·		-1.34 x 10<-5>
		(1.59 x 10<-5>)
Republ · sidential Vo · (199		0.029 *
		(0.015)
Physi · capita		0.0029 **
		(0.0013)
[ILLE ·]	0.184	0.231
	ariable	All Accidental Deaths
Interc	30.836 	52.919 ***
	(3.335)	(9.607)

REV_00263810

State ...	...tives, but	0.821	-1.595
ambig...	...surable	(4.170)	(3.250)
punit...	...tor
State	...able punitiv...	11.027 	6.185 **
indica...		(3.709)	(2.885)
State	...urable puni...	0.271	-1.228
indica...		(3.520)	(2.666)
Manufa...	...mployees per		-4.79 x 10<-4>
100,0...	...on		(3.04 x 10<-4>)
House...	...per capita		-8.40 x 10<-4> ***
			(1.76 x 10<-4>)
Republ...	...idential Vo...		0.298 *
(1992			(0.149)
Physi...	capita
[ILLE...	...]	0.366	0.645

Note: s... ...rors in paren...

For so... ...ble 6A, infra.

* Signi... ...% confidenc...

 Sig... ...5% confidenc...

 Si... ...99% confide... ...l.

Table ...

Insura... ...um Regres... ...sults

Panel ... ...surance a... ...al Malpractice Insurance Premiums

	Variable	Total Insurance Premiums
Inter...		983.739  345.809
		(81.761) (272.208)
State ...	...tives, but	45.089 1.719
ambig...	...rable	(101.765) (83.369)
punit...	...tor
State	...ble punitiv...	-64.696 -26.772
indic...		(90.825) (75.165)
State	...urable pun...	52.910 2.484
indic...		(86.323) (70.190)
Manuf...	...mployees pe...	-0.011
100,0...	...n	(0.008)
House...	...per capi...	0.012 **
		(0.005)
Republ...	...dential V...	1.408

REV_00263811

(1992			(4.478)
Physic	100,000		1.200 ***
popul			(0.396)
[ILLE	]	0.060	0.429

Variable	Medical Malpractice Premiums
Interc	18.856 	-9.403
	(5.800)	(18.403)
State h ves, but ambigu insurable puniti ctor	0.196	-6.242
	(7.219)	(5.636)
State ble puniti indic	1.033	-2.586
	(6.443)	(5.082)
State ins rable puni indic	6.666	-0.970
	(6.124)	(4.745)
Manufa g Employees p 100,00 lat n		-0.0011 **
		(0.0005)
Househ com per capi		-3.15 x 10<-4>
		(3.23 x 10<-4>)
Republican residential V (1992%)		0.478
		(0.303)
Physicians er 100,000 population		0.149 ***
		(0.027)
[ILLEGIBLE TEXT]	0.024	0.461

Note: standard errors in paren .

* Significant at 90% confiden .

 Significant at 95% confide l.

 Significant at 99% confid el.

Panel B: Product Liability a er Liability Premiums

Variable	Product Liability Premiums
Intercept	7.654 	0.588
	(1.156)	(3.180)
State has punitives, but ously insurable p nitives inc	0.792	2.517 **
	(1.439)	(1.068)
State has insura le puni indicator	-0.871	0.657
	(1.284)	(0.951)
State has uninsu able p indicator	1.284	2.161 **
	(1.221)	(0.880)
Manufacturing Em loyees 100,000 popu lat n		4.93 x 10<-4> ***
		(1.00 x 10<-4>)

REV_00263812

Washington	594	5,147
Four state totals	1,738	17,283
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	32,162	237,727
States with insurable punitives	11,382	68,213
States with uninsurable punitives	15,334	141,930
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	5,558	28,698
TOXIC CHEMICAL ACCIDENTS INVOLVING INJURY OR DEATH, 1988-1992
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	50	9,418
Nebraska	17	1,604
New Hampshire	14	1,114
Washington	42	5,147
Four state totals	123	17,283
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	2,016	237,727
States with insurable punitives	559	68,213
States with uninsurable punitives	1,199	141,930
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	272	28,698

TOXIC CHEMICAL ACCIDENTS, 1988-1992

	Accidents/ Population (100,000s)	t-statistic
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	9.2
Nebraska	10.2
New Hampshire	10.1
Washington	11.5
Four state totals	10.1
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	13.5	0.76
States with insurable punitives	16.7	0.96
States with uninsurable punitives	10.8	0.34
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	19.4	2.26 **
TOXIC CHEMICAL ACCIDENTS INVOLVING INJURY OR DEATH, 1988-1992
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	0.53
Nebraska	1.06
New Hampshire	1.26
Washington	0.82
Four state totals	0.71

REV_00263768

Household Income per cap		1.98 x 10<-4> ***
		(0.58 x 10<-4>)
Republican Presidential Vote (1992...)		-0.105 **
		(0.050)
[ILLEGIBLE TEXT]	0.127	0.558
Variable	Other Liability Premiums
Intercept	76.514 	77.122 *
	(12.519)	(41.161)
State has punitives, bu... ...ously insurable punitives ind...	9.396	14.078
	(15.582)	(13.831)
State has insura... e p... indicator	-9.487	5.526
	(13.907)	(12.315)
State has uninsurable ... s indicator	15.036	17.342
	(13.217)	(11.390)
Manufacturi... Employees 100,000 popu... n		7.43 x 10<-5>
		(129.24 x 10<-5>)
Household I...come per ca		0.0019 **
		(0.0008)
Republican Presi...nti... Vote (1992...)		-1.794 ***
		(0.641)
[ILLEGIBLE TEXT]	0.144	0.380

Note: standar... errors in par... s.

* Significant at 90% confi... l.

 Significant at 95%... vel.

 Signific... at 99%... evel.

Table 5A Su... mary of V... ...ns (Std. Deviations)

Variable		Mean	Std. Dev.
Employees in Manufact... (1,000s)	...tor, 1992	358.078400	383.595900
Employees in the O... Ind... ...SIC 1...	...xtraction ...0s)	5.464706	21.851420
Employ... the O... 291), ... (1,...	Industry (SIC	1.109804	4.374529
Employ... the O... Products Industry ...	Allied ...996 (1,000s)	19.664710	24.921650
Indicator which equ... punitive damages	...tates without	0.078431	0.271524
Indicator which equ... insu... punitiv...	...tates with	0.470588	0.504101
Indica... ...ch ...	...tates with	0.352941	0.482640

REV_00263813

unins ... e puniti ...
Indica ... ich equa ...	tates with	0.117647	0.325396
unce ... insuran ...	...es
Medica ... ractice ...	r capita	21.494960	11.611970
(19 ...
Medica ... dventur ...	er 100,000	1.103261	0.519397
Pop ... , 199 ...
Motor ... e Acci ...	Per 100,000	17.868230	5.744419
Popul ... , 199 ...
Other ... ty Fee ...	capita (1995)	83.748800	35.775910
Per Ca ... mploye ...	ring	0.065000	0.026700
Sec ... 2
Per Ca ... ouseho ...	94	32,440.040000	4,851.375000
Propo ... f TRI ...	porting	0.366000	0.090010
Red ... Activ ...
Propo ... TRI ...	ing Reduction	0.259706	0.069365
Acti ...
Perce ... tic ...	ter	(65.743860)	454.705200
Dis ... from ...
Perce ... tion ...	er	(43.913040)	380.355500
Dis ... from ...
Perce ... ction ...	c Releases	33.526780	25.755110
fro ... to 199 ...
Perce ... tio ...	c Releases	16.880070	17.135410
fro 2
Physi ... ...),(...	on, 1994	219.568600	79.608360
Popula ... 95		5.154,699.060000	5.741,453.000000
Produ ... lity ...	capita	7.800801	2.622146
(19
Ratio ... facil ...	population	0.090300	0.042000
in t ... s
Repub ... te in ...	ntial	37.668630	6.419486
Ele
Total ... a ...	,000	38.127320	8.818885
Pop ...
Total ... e ...	pita (1995)	1,005.691000	199.321900
Toxic ... l Ac ...	j Injury	41.941180	60.336200 or ... 988- ...
Toxic ... l Ac ...	1992	664.705900	908.791800

Table ...

Data ... or ... al ... is

		Source
Total ... d ...	1	NATIONAL SAFETY COUNCIL, ACCIDENT
misad ... dea ...	0	FACTS 26-27 (1997).

REV_00263814

popula
Employ · the · ·	· llied	State and Area Employment, Hours and produc · st · (	· oyees	Earnings, Bureau of Labor Statistics, in th · nd · ·	· ustry	1997 (on-line searchable series
(SIC · · nd e ·	· l	catalog, refini · t · ·	· 996.	http://146.142.4.24/cgi-bin/dsrv?sa).
Emplo · · a ·		U.S. BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, STATISTICAL
during		ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES: 1996,
		at 740 tbl. 1213 (116th ed. 1996).
Manufact · · ·		U.S. BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, STATISTICAL
		ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES: 1996,
		at 740 tbl. 1213 (116th ed. 1996).
Per Capi · Hous · ·	· 1994.	U.S. BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, STATISTICAL
		ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES: 1996,
		at 465 tbl. 716 (116th ed. 1996).
Money In · of · ·	· n	U.S. BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, STATISTICAL income, · · te, ·	· 4	ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES: 1996, dollars: · t ·		at 465 tbl. 716 (116th ed. 1996).
Physicia · · l ·	· n for	U.S. BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, STATISTICAL
1994.		ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES: 1996,
		at 124 tbl. 181 (116th ed. 1996).
Active n · · · ·	·	U.S. BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, STATISTICAL nurses, · · t ·		ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES: 1996,
		at 124 tbl. 181 (116th ed. 1996).
1995 pop · n		U.S. BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, STATISTICAL
		ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES: 1996,
		at 28 tbl. 27 (116th ed. 1996).
Resident · ula · · ·	·	U.S. BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, STATISTICAL
1970-199		ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES: 1996,
		at 28 tbl. 27 (116th ed. 1996).
Republic · e	· tial	U.S. BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, STATISTICAL election		ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES: 1996,
		at 271 tbl. 435 (116th ed. 1996).
Popular v · · · ·	· by	U.S. BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, STATISTICAL political · y, ·	· and	ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES: 1996,
1992.		at 271 tbl. 435 (116th ed. 1996).
Surface w · d · ·	· l	U.S. ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY toxic rel · ·	· 2.	OFFICE OF POLLUTION PREVENTION AND TOXICS, 1992 TOXICS RELEASE INVENTORY
		(TRI) PUBLIC DATA RELEASE 196-204 tbl.
		3-12.A (1994).
Toxic chemi · · ·	· ic	JOEL A. TICKNER & HILLEL GRAY, chemical ac · e	· ry or	ACCIDENTS DO HAPPEN: TOXIC CHEMICAL death for t · · c		ACCIDENT PATTERNS IN THE UNITED STATES

REV_00263815

5 (1994).

Toxic releas[illegible] ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY OFFICE Facilities, [illegible] OF POLLUTION PREVENTION AND TOXICS, facilities a[illegible] ource 1992 TOXICS RELEASE INVENTORY (TRI) reduction ac[illegible] PUBLIC DATA RELEASE 136-37 tbl. 2-13 (1994).

Insurance pre[illegible] INSURANCE INFORMATION INSTITUTE, THE FACT BOOK 1997; PROPERTY/CASUALTY INSURANCE FACTS 34-35 (1996).

GRAPHIC:
FIGURE 1, Rel[illegible]io[illegible] ved and Actual Risk Levels

FOOTNOTES:

n1 Pacific Mu[illegible] L[illegible] 499 U.S. 1, 45-46 (1991) (O'Connor, J., dissenting) (granting juries "u[illegible] less discretion" with regard to punitive damages violates constit[illegible]io[illegible] r the Due Process Clause).

n2 For a deta[illegible]d[illegible] erformance of different aspects of the tort liability system along t[illegible] AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE, ENTERPRISE RESPONSIBILI[illegible] Y: REPORTERS' STUDY (1991) [hereinafter AMERICAN LA[illegible] n3 For a com[illegible]el[illegible] omics perspective, see A. Mitchell Polinsky & Steven Shavell, Punit[illegible] Analysis*, 111 HARV. L. REV. 869 (1998).

n4 For a revi[illegible]c[illegible] reforms, see W. Kip Viscusi & Patricia Born, Medical Malpractice Ins[illegible] bility Reform*, 24 J. LEGAL STUD. 463 (1995). For a general review[illegible] ges, see RICHARD L. BLATT ET AL., PUNITIVE DAMAGES: A [illegible] LAW AND PRACTICE (1991).

n5 Unpredict[illegible] other than simply less deterrence for risk-related decisions. Unp[illegible] incentives for actions that do not reduce risk, leading to inefficient i[illegible] on the character of the penalties firms expect to be imposed.

n6 For a criti[illegible]e[illegible] punitive damages, see George L. Priest, Punitive Damages Refo[illegible] 56 LA. L. REV. 825 (1996).

n7 If the pa[illegible]n[illegible] ot predictable, firms could respond by climinating all sources of ris[illegible] made risk-free, such responses often take the form of withdrawin[illegible] r not putting risky new products on the market.

n8 See BLA[illegible]T[illegible]

n9 See id. at 18[illegible] ket part) (noting that in New Hampshire there are limited statut[illegible] ch punitive damages can be awarded).

n10 863 P.2[illegible] n11 See "C[illegible]r[illegible] reat to State's Businesses, Attorney Claims*, 16 Chem. Reg. illegible.

REV_00263816

n12 See Eric . F ne and the Infliction of Emotional Distress, 30 TORT & INS. L.J. 1[illegible], 1

n13 See BL[illegible]T ET [illegible] 77.

n14 See Robert D. [illegible] nages for Deterrence: When and How Much?, 40 ALA. L. REV. 1143 (1[illegible] y in Cooter's analysis arises with respect to enforcement error, n[illegible] s.

n15 By the same lo[illegible] mages awards, even large ones, will not promote safety, just as period quiring HIV/AIDS was low did not lead to extensive precautions. See Tom[illegible] imism about AIDS is Premature, WALL ST. J., Feb. 4, 1998, at A22.

n16 See Liebeck v. [illegible] nts, P.T.S., Inc., No. CV-93-121419, 1995 WL 360309 (D.N.M. Aug.

n17 For a detailed d[illegible] rmation available to McDonald's, see S. Reed Morgan, McDonald's E TIMES, Sept. 19, 1994, at 26.

n18 See McMahon v. [illegible], No. 97-4131, 1998 WL 351294 (7th Cir. July 2, 1998).

n19 See ARMAGEDD[illegible] ctures 1998); DEEP IMPACT (Paramount Pictures and Dreamworks L.L.C. ar[illegible] ment 1998).

n20 See William J. B Menace to Early Life, Could Still Destroy Earth, N.Y. TIMES, June 18, 1991

n21 See The Threat [illegible] MIST, Sept. 11, 1993, at 13.

n22 For a summary [illegible] en the American Medical Association's Council on Scientific Affairs claim[illegible] convincing evidence that breast implants caused health problems and t[illegible] the Food and Drug Administration, see John Schwartz, FDA and Al[illegible] mplants, WASH. POST, Dec. 1, 1993, at A4.

n23 See MARCIA AN[illegible] TRIAL: THE CLASH OF MEDICAL EVIDENCE AND THE LAW IN THE BRE[illegible] 00-110 (1996).

n24 See Mad Cows a [illegible] NOMIST, Mar. 30, 1996, at 25.

n25 See Robert W. H[illegible] titerrorist Rhetoric*, 19 REGULATION 51, 51-57 (1996); see also Matt[illegible] -11: Rewiring Urged, N.Y. TIMES, Apr. 12, 1998, at S4.

n26 See Car Safety [illegible] e, ECONOMIST, Nov. 30, 1996, at 29.

n27 See Nicholas Si[illegible] uman or Natural Disaster? (1994) (paper presented at the Stanford Univer[illegible] Social Treatment of Catastrophic Risk) (on file with author).

n28 For further disc[illegible] g scientific knowledge regarding asbestos, see W. Kip Viscusi, Alternativ[illegible] nses to Asbestos, J. OF RISK AND UNCERTAINTY 147 (1996) and the r[illegible] therein.

n29 A recent award i[illegible] s case levied a $ 31 million punitive damages penalty on Owens Corn . See Ballard v. Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., No. CL-93-1087-AD (Fl. C) (verdict) (discussed in 25 Prod. Safety & Liab. Rep. (BNA) 103 (Jan. .

REV_00263817

n30 See Richard Wils Daily Risks of Life, TECH. REV., Feb. 1979, at 45.

n31 For an example o al costs of risk reduction, see W. KIP VISCUSI, RISK BY C ICE: RE ND SAFETY IN THE WORKPLACE (1983). Also see the discussion below o 0-10 principle, infra note 38 and accompanying text.

n32 This calculation i in W. KIP VISCUSI, FATAL TRADEOFFS: PUBLIC AND PRIVATE RESPO GK (1992).

n33 In addition to ac low, there are also other hazards such as a risk of homicide, risks of mor from air pollution, risks of skin cancer from ultraviolet ra iation, a ed by an airbag, among many other hazards.

n34 See W. KIP VIS KING THE RISKY DECISION 24 (1992). These data in turn are based on d TIONAL SAFETY COUNCIL, ACCIDENT FACTS (various years).

n35 21 U.S.C. § 34

n36 Id. The statutor additives is identical. See 21 U.S.C. § 379e(b)(5) (B) (1994).

n37 See Bruce N. A ossible Carcinogenic Hazards, 236 SCIENCE 271, 271-80 (19); Lois S Carcinogens: Setting Priorities, 258 SCIENCE 261, 263 (1992).

n38 STEPHEN BREY VICIOUS CIRCLE 11-12 (1993).

n39 See W. Kip Visc milton, Cleaning up Superfund, PUB. INTEREST, Summer 19 6, at 52- rivate parties contribute to these expenditures.

n40 See V CUST, s n41 See Sam Peltzm utomobile Safety Regulation, 83 J. POL. ECON. 677, 679 (197 (arguing t ation has not affected the highway death rate).

n42 See id. This is t moral hazard.

n43 For a summary VISCUSI, supra note 32.

n44 See W. Kip Visc llo, The Effect of Product Safety Regulation on Safety P ions, 1 7, 921 (1994).

n45 See IP VI RODUCTS LIABILITY 8 (1991).

n46 Son of the sul er behavior stems from false reporting of accidents. Over a fiv icago Transit Authority employees accounted for 1200 inju claims. T of injuries suggest possible fraud or misrepres ion, n orkers are riskier. For further discussion, see VISCUSI, note n47 See V CUSI, s '5, .

REV_00263818

n48 See V htman lo. 001, 1997 WL 614962 (Ohio App. Sept. 30, 1997). The trial ju educ v es award to $ 15 million, and an Ohio appellate court affirm he aw n49 This gr her s n r he stronger merit rating of workers' compensation premiums f er ployers in large firms were not responsive to incentives, n ich lc served. See Michael J. Moore & W. Kip Viscusi, Promoting S ty Thi rs nsation, 20 RAND J. OF ECON. 4, 499-515 (1989).

n50 2 AME AN LA TT note 2, at 264 (1991) (discussing the merits and disadvantag co ti n51 See, e. , A. M LI N INTRODUCTION TO LAW AND ECONOMICS (2d ed. 198).

n52 See Pc ra 3, for a more detailed review of these principles.

n53 See Co , st , a references contained therein.

n54 See Ro ns Dr p v. Flint, 275 U.S. 303, 307-08 (1927) (Holmes, J.) (holding tha fo lc on other than person injured merely because injured pers as t ch other person unknown to tortfeasor).

n55 For a n n omic rationales for limiting the scope of liability, see Barl er 54 F.2d 50, 52-54 (1st Cir. 1985).

n56 42 U.S. 8

n57 GM also ad in se nenting its risk analysis. See E.C. Ivey, Value Analysis of A Fuel r ne 29, 1973) (on file with author).

n58 See V , 2, n59 See V S 5.

n60 See Pe D pc s of Punitive Damages. Department of Economics, Massachuset l rking Paper No. 97-17 (Sept. 1997); Peter Diamond, Int t iency Concerns in Punitive Damages for Reckless Disregard of s to a f Economics, Massachusetts Institute of Technology 1997).

n61 For re , s CUSI, supra note 32.

n62 For a v, at 59-73.

n63 See id.

n64 For rev or ock market repercussions of liability suits, see evidence as ec oni Hersch, The Market Response to Product Safety Litig 1. 0 (1990).

n65 See t ntal Death: A Capital Market Approach*, 3 J. RISK & UNCERTA .

REV_00263819

n66 See ... 5, ...-13. More generally, for evidence on the price premium... rk K. Dreyfus & W. Kip Viscusi, Rates of Time Preference... omobile Safety and Fuel Efficiency, 38 J.L. & ECON. 7... ( n67 For a ric... f... t... price effects for product liability events published in the V... e major events associated with the Agent Orange litigation, s... 64, at 213-30. Also see the study of airplane crash st... f... ra note 65.

n68 See... ... and Products Liability: The Role of the Food and Drug Ad... METIC L.J. 233, 236 (1986).

n69 S... 5, ...-28; AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE, supra note 2 n70 For... m... o... s of safety, see VISCUSI, supra note 43 at 118-24.

n71 See... upra note 2, at 110. For a stronger advocacy of a regulato... iability, see W. Kip Viscusi et al., Deterring Inefficie... onomic Rationale for the FDA Regulatory Compli... . 1437 (1994).

n72 S... -CI-00158 (Ky. Cir. Ct. June 24, 1996).

n73 5...

n74 Id...

n75 M... (1996) (finding that the Medical Device Amend... te causes of action).

n76 S... n and Liability for Pharmaceuticals and Medical Device... i... ON (Thomas Lenard & Henry Miller eds.) (forthco...

n77 M...

n78 S... he Ford Pinto Case, 43 RUTGERS L. REV. 1013, 1030 (...

n79 S...

n80 S... e V... w Shuttle Disaster Leads NASA to Consider Options, N.Y... ...24.

n81 S... e D... ER LAUNCH DECISION 274 (1996).

n82 S... e S... s by Air Force Said Risks Were 1 in 35, N.Y. TIMES, ...eb. ... Air Force estimate was prepared by the rain safety ... opl... ty used by NASA. These officials had more experi... ce ...

n83 S... e V...

REV_00263820

n84 A bran[illegible] sian decision theory provides detailed guidelines for incorpora[illegible], e.g., HOWARD RAIFFA, DECISION ANALYSIS: INTRODUCT[illegible] NDER UNCERTAINTY (1968).

n85 S[illegible]e C[illegible] F.2d 210, 215 (7th Cir. 1990) (Easterbrook, J., concur[illegible]ng) ([illegible] "minimize the sum of construction, operation, and inj[illegible]ry co[illegible] n86 For a d[illegible] calculations, see VISCUSI, supra note 45, at 111-13.

n87 See E.C[illegible] Fuel Fed Fire Related Fatalities, GM Memorandum (June 2[illegible], 1[illegible] n88 S[illegible]e V.[illegible]].

n89 S[illegible]e R[illegible] ITE, THE IMPACT OF PUBLICITY ON CORPORATE OFFEN[illegible]RS

n90 These c[illegible] detail in VISCUSI, supra note 45, at 111-13. These calcula[illegible] rnal Ford Company report by E.S. Grush & C.S. Saund[illegible], F[illegible]duced Fires and Fuel Leakages, reprinted in FISSE[illegible] 4.

n91 S[illegible] A, 938 F.2d 1310, 1326 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (Willia[illegible], J.

n92 S[illegible] of Regulatory Costs and Policy Evaluation Criteria, 25 RAN[illegible] J. I use is to explicitly link the implicit value of saving[illegible] sta[illegible] ads to the loss of a statistical life through regulat[illegible] on, see W. Kip Viscusi, Regulating the Regul[illegible] n93 M[illegible] uct Liability, Research and Development, and Innov[illegible] (1993).

n94 [illegible] 5

n95 [illegible] ppears in AMA Board of Trustees, Impact of Produc[illegible] Medical Technology, 137 PROC. House of Deleg[illegible]

n96 [illegible] ury Compensation: Hearing on H.R. 1780, H.R. 4777, [illegible] on Health and the Env't of the House Comm. on Energ[illegible] (1986).

n97 [illegible] te 95, at 7. Further discussion appears in Gina Colata[illegible] ses in Childhood Vaccines, 232 SCIENCE 1339 (1986) n98 [illegible] baum, Rationing Without Justice: Children and the Ameri[illegible] P[illegible]. 1859, 1867-68 (1992).

n99 [illegible] 45-47 (Jan. 17, 1997).

n10[illegible] Character was Much Too Frisky, N.Y. TIMES, Feb.

1, 199 · in hese alleged damages is no longer with the show.

n101 he ems, see W. KIP VISCUSI, RATIONAL RISK POLICY (199

n102 ffi essing the magnitude of punitive damages. See Daniel O d Erratic Awards: The Psychology of Punitive Damag -84 (1998).

n103 he ty formulation, see VISCUSI, supra note 45. This conce; n ormula." A company is liable if the cost of preca bi cident multiplied by the size of the loss. See Unite d 169 (2d Cir. 1947).

n104 RE IE ET AL., A STUDY OF JUROR AND JURY JUDGI N. FFECTS ON LIABILITY JUDGMENTS (1998).

n105 ., 210, 215 (7th Cir. 1990) (Easterbrook, J., concur.

n10 E CEPTABLE RISK (1981).

n107 T DISASTER INSURANCE PROTECTION: PUBLIC POLIC

n10 ac hat are truly zero risk, though some components may h n109 A gation of the Rationality of Consumer Valuations of Mul 465 (1987).

n11 3

n111 sc ena, see FISCHHOFF ET AL., supra note 106; VISCU V. T AL., 4 U.S. DEP'T OF THE INTERIOR, EVALU FINAL ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STATEMENT PROPC 1972).

n112 V NDIVIDUAL DIFFERENCES IN SUBJECTIVE RISK THRE

n11 , and the Savage Axioms, 75 Q.J. ECON. 643 (1961

n11 C ation of Ambiguous Risk Information, 31 THEORY & DEC. scusi & Wesley A. Magat, Bayesian Decisions with Ambig ERTAINTY 371 (1992). The latter language is from E 517 U.S. 559 (1996).

n11 rms, see Alexander Volokh. Punitive Damages and E ues, 213 Reason Foundation Policy Study 20 n.91 (199 damages reforms have been considered by Cong ges reform has been enacted.

n11

States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	0.85	0.74
States with insurable punitives	0.82	0.70
States with uninsurable punitives	0.84	0.60
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	0.95	1.89 **

Note: The t-statistic tests the weighted mean accident rate for the four states which do not award punitive damages against the weighted mean for the states in the category described.

For sources, see Table 6A, infra.

The results in Table 1 do not indicate any incentive role for the insurability status. States with no punitive damages permitted have a toxic chemical accident rate of 10.1 per 100,000 population, which is below the rate of 10.8 for states with uninsurable punitives, where these differences are not statistically significant. States with insurable punitives and uncertain insurance have higher, not lower, risk levels than the states without punitive damages, where these differences are statistically significant for the states with uncertain insurability of punitives. None of the effects in Table 1 indicate a deterrent role of punitive damages in reducing toxic chemical accidents.

B. TOXIC CHEMICAL RELEASE RISKS

A related set of risk measures consists of four environmental outcome measures developed by the United States Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) as part of its Toxic Release Inventory database. These environmental risks are also local in character, so they should be subject to regional differences in financial incentives -- to the extent that punitive damages exert a deterrent effect.

Analyzing the EPA toxic chemical release data is of interest for two reasons. First, the government's statistics on handling toxic chemicals provide an instructive measure of the safety of companies' handling of dangerous chemicals. If punitive damages have a deterrent effect, they should promote safer chemical practices. Second, the Toxic Release Inventory database itself may give rise to litigation, including lawsuits that lead to punitive damages. One prominent such case was a fear-of-cancer case in California, Potter v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. [10] Using data derived from Toxic Release Inventory reports and other government risk management data, plaintiffs who lived near a landfill sued Firestone, which was responsible for some chemicals dumped at that site. [11] The California Supreme Court allowed such claims in a negligence action provided that the plaintiffs met certain conditions, such as proving that the fear flowed from their personal knowledge of the risk. [12] The four measures examined in Table 2 are among the principal indices of toxic releases compiled by the EPA, which monitors manufacturing facilities in the United States that handle substances designated by the EPA as toxic. The EPA requires facilities to file forms that report on activities directed at reducing the amount of toxic releases from a given source.

The first panel of toxic release statistics in Table 2 pertains to the number of facilities that reduced their discharges. The fraction of facilities reducing their discharges is 0.36 in the no-punitive-damages states and 0.36 for the country as a whole. Reported source reductions, as measured by the number of facilities reporting source reductions, do not vary with the presence of punitive damages. The analysis of facilities reporting toxic release reductions indicates no significant differences even when the insurability status of punitive damages is recognized. The proportion of facilities reducing discharges is 0.36 for the no-punitive-damages states and also 0.36 for the states with insurable punitives, the states with n117 dvantages of ceilings and multipliers, see 2 AMERI t 258-59.

REV_00263769

n11 riability in Civil Jury Awards, 21 L. & HUM. BEHA

n11 99 U.S. 1 (1991).

n12 es Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 459-64 (1993).

n121 .S. 559, 585 (1996).

n122 ip, 499 U.S. 1, 45-6 (1991) (O'Connor, J., disse

Servi Citat
V Date/Ti EDT

is | Terms and Conditions vision of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

uninsurable punitives, and the states with uncertain legal status regarding punitive damages. These levels are virtually identical irrespective of the punitive damages regime.

Facilities may, however, have multiple sources of toxic releases, leading to the filing of multiple forms per facility. The second panel in Table 2 presents analogous discharge reduction statistics using the number of forms as the unit of analysis rather than the number of facilities. This measure consequently adjusts for facility-related differences in the scale of potentially polluting activities. The no-punitive-damages states once again do not exhibit a significant difference in source reductions. The fraction of forms reflecting source reductions is 0.27 for the no-punitive-damages states and 0.25 for the entire country. Whereas the no-punitive-damages states had a fraction -- 0.27 -- of forms reporting discharges, each of the three punitive-damages-insurance state groupings had a lower (statistically insignificant) proportion of such reductions. The no-punitive-damages states perform almost identically to the various punitive-damages-insurance regimes with respect to forms reporting reductions in discharges.

Table 2

Reductions in Surface Water Discharges in States with and without Punitive Damages (SWD)

FACILITIES REPORTING REDUCTIONS, IN TOXIC RELEASE INVENTORY (TRI)

	# TRI Facilities	Number of Facilities Reducing Discharges
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	969	337
Nebraska	180	60
New Hampshire	129	51
Washington	332	134
Four state totals	1,610	582
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	21,837	7,864
States with insurable punitives	7,375	2,651
States with uninsurable punitives	12,487	4,507
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	2,104	758

FACILITIES REPORTING REDUCTIONS, IN TOXIC RELEASE INVENTORY (TRI)

	Proportion of Facilities Reducing Discharges	t-statistic
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	0.348
Nebraska	0.333
New Hampshire	0.395
Washington	0.404
Four state totals	0.361

REV_00263770

States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	0.360	0.08
States with insurable punitives	0.359	0.13
States with uninsurable punitives	0.361	0.04
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	0.360	0.08

FORMS REPORTING REDUCTIONS IN DISCHARGES

	# TRI Forms	Number of Forms Reducing Discharges
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	3,747	996
Nebraska	540	134
New Hampshire	362	83
Washington	1,035	319
Four state totals	5,684	1,532
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	74,737	18,897
States with insurable punitives	25,679	6,147
States with uninsurable punitives	40,962	10,754
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	8,458	2,079

FORMS REPORTING REDUCTIONS IN DISCHARGES

	Proportion of Forms Reducing Discharges	t-statistic
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	0.266
Nebraska	0.248
New Hampshire	0.229
Washington	0.308
Four state totals	0.270
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	0.253	0.63
States with insurable punitives	0.239	1.28
States with uninsurable punitives	0.263	0.23
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	0.246	0.91

REDUCTION IN SURFACE WATER DISCHARGES

	Percent reduction in SWD,	Percent reduction in SWD, 1990-

REV_00263771

	1988-1992	1992
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	34.9	8.4
Nebraska	-43.7	9.8
New Hampshire	85.9	70.9
Washington	70.3	68.0
States with punitive damages:
Four state totals	66.0	62.6
Other 46 states and DC	9.5	-45.7
States with insurable punitives	-3.3	-56.6
States with uninsurable punitives	54.6	12.7
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	-159.0	-268.1

REDUCTION IN SURFACE WATER DISCHARGES

	t-statistic, 1988-1992	t-statistic, 1990-1992
States without punitive damages:
Michigan
Nebraska
New Hampshire
Washington
States with punitive damages:
Four state totals
Other 46 states and DC	2.15 	3.12 ***
States with insurable punitives	4.36 	4.61 ***
States with uninsurable punitives	0.54	2.66 ***
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	3.61 	4.62 ***

REDUCTION IN TOTAL RELEASES

	Percent reduction in total releases, 1988-1992	Percent reduction in total releases, 1990-1992
States without punitive damages:
Michigan	26.2	19.0
Nebraska	31.2	25.0
New Hampshire	54.6	29.0
Washington	40.3	36.8
four state totals	32.0	24.4
States with punitive damages:
Other 46 states and DC	35.2	14.0
States with insurable punitives	26.9	8.4
States with uninsurable punitives	40.3	21.5

Source: News & Business > News > News Group File, Most Recent Two Years ⓘ
Terms: loss and "terrorism insurance" and loss and hurricane and billion (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

© ABA, Tort & Insurance Law Journal, 2002

Copyright © 2002 American Bar Association Tort & Insurance Law Journal

Spring, 2002

37 Tort & Ins. L.J. 817

LENGTH: 38748 words

SECTION: ARTICLE.

TITLE: The Insurance Aftermath of September 11: Myriad Claims, Multiple Lines, Arguments Over Occurrence Counting, War Risk Exclusions, the Future of Terrorism Coverage, and New Issues of Government Role

AUTHOR: Jeffrey W. Stempel

Jeffrey W. Stempel is Professor of Law at the William S. Boyd School of Law, University of Nevada Las Vegas. This article's research was aided in part by support from the James E. Rogers Research Fund at UNLV. Thanks to Ann McGinley and other participants at a Boyd School of Law faculty workshop for ideas, comments, and support. Thanks also to Kory Staheli, Jennifer Gross, Matthew Wright, and Tabitha Fiddyment for research assistance and to attorneys Gene Anderson, Jed Bergman, Gary Haugen, Randy Maniloff, and Mary Kay Vyskocil for sharing public materials on these insurance issues and pending disputes.

TEXT:

I. INTRODUCTION

September 11, 2001, is an unforgettable date for many reasons. n1 In addition to its political, social, and historical importance, it may mark a watershed of insurance history as well. n2 The value of the insured losses due to the collapse of the World Trade Center (WTC) towers is estimated to total at least $ 35 billion and perhaps $ 75 billion. n3 In addition, most of the people killed by terrorism were covered by life insurance. Many business operations were affected, invoking possible business interruption coverage. The airplanes that became weapons of destruction carried passengers whose estates are likely to press claims against the airlines operating the flights (United and American), potentially raising issues of liability coverage. n4 n1 This article's focus on insurance issues related to September 11 of necessity dwells on the World Trade Center losses more than those stemming from the attack on the Pentagon or the crash of a fourth hijacked airliner in the Pennsylvania countryside when passengers attempted to retake the plane and prevent its use as a weapon. Although these other two shocking acts of terrorism will give rise to insurance claims of considerable magnitude, they fall far below the scope and severity of the WTC terror attacks in economic and insurance terms. The author will also follow what appears to be an emerging convention of using the term "September 11" as a noun with relatively clear meaning as well as using a number of synonyms for the atrocity (e.g., attack, terrorism, disaster, incident). See James J. Kilpatrick, policyholder with such coverage might have had a supplier or customer in the towers, in which case the coverage is probably triggered. Coverage may not be applicable where a peripheral business was impacted only indirectly without its own physical damage. n34 Contingent BI coverage may also apply to losses brought about by damage to a service provider such as in a case of suspended utility services or may, depending on policy language, apply to suspension of operations required by government action in the wake of the tragedy such as the cordoning off of a restricted area. n35 n33 See Sclafane, supra note 29, at 53, 54.

REV_00263824

n34 See id. at 53 (coverage unlikely); Hsieh, supra note 25, at 21 (coverage likely according to policyholder attorney if policyholder can show property loss to key customer, supplier, distributor, or manufacturer).

n35 See Hsieh, supra note 25, at 21. Corollary to this type of coverage may be the question of whether a business was "forced" to shut down because of government action or merely did so voluntarily for a variety of reasons. See Lenckus, supra note 25, at 1, 62 (coverage for stock exchange company claims of business interruption may hinge on whether shutdown was in fact required by government restrictions on access to lower Manhattan).

In the past, courts have divided on whether there must be a complete stoppage of business or whether a significant and demonstrable showdown might suffice. n36 The most recent Insurance Services Office form for BI coverage provides that a slowdown of the business constitutes a suspension, n37 but much of the potential post-disaster coverage may be written on older forms that may give rise to litigation over this question. In addition, issues may arise over whether companies that lost income due to the tragedy but whose own facilities were not physically harmed will have coverage. Physical damage is a requisite, but courts may differ as to the quantum of physical damage required. The current standard policy contains rather clear language conditioning coverage on a causal relationship to physical damage rather than simply a connection to physical damage.

n36 See Reidy & Carter, supra note 24, at A23. See, e.g., Am. Med. Imaging Corp. v. St. Paul Fire and Marine Ins. Co., 949 F.2d 690 (3d Cir. 1991) (slowdown sufficient). In addition, a business that is not generating any revenue may be unable to obtain coverage. See, e.g., Cont'l Ins. Co. v. DNE Corp., 834 S.W.2d 930, 934 (Tenn. 1992).

n37 See Sclafane, supra note 29, at 54. The treatment of a business slowdown as a "suspension" is not accomplished through a specific definition in the policy but follows from the policy's general treatment of lost income as covered under certain conditions, with coverage reduced or lost when income is at predamage levels. See, e.g., Form CP 00 30 06 95, reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 237-40.

A debate may also arise over whether the business is really stopped or constricted if other production capacity is available. n38 This type of coverage dispute may arise during the processing of September 11 claims due to the large number of affected businesses that have offices at other locations in addition to those directly affected by the collapse of the towers. For example, tenants such as insurance brokers Aon and Marsh & McClennan and the law firms Cleary Gottlieb Steen & Hamilton and Sidley Austin Brown & Wood have other offices, backed-up data, and access to temporary services. All were undoubtedly affected in their business by the tragedy. Whether they were affected enough could become a litigated question if their insurers choose to dispute business interruption claims.

n38 See, e.g., Fold-Pak Corp. v. Liberty Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 784 F. Supp. 49, 54 (N.D.N.Y. 1992) (to collect policy proceeds, business must produce evidence that it was unable to meet customer needs through alternative facilities).

REV_00263833

E. Automobile Insurance

Although overlooked in most of the discussion to date, many automobiles were destroyed or damaged in the September 11 disaster. Owners with comprehensive auto coverage can make valid claims that fall within coverage, although standard personal and business auto policies contain a war risk exclusion. n39 n39 See, e.g., Personal Auto Policy No. PP 00 01 06 98 (ISO 1997), reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 11 (loss excluded if due to "War (declared or undeclared) . . . Civil war . . . Insurrection . . . or Rebellion or revolution); Business Auto Coverage Form No. CA 00 01 07 97, reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 498, 503:

> 1. We will not pay for "loss" caused by or resulting from any of the following. Such "loss" is excluded regardless of any other cause or event that contributes concurrently or in any sequence to the "loss".
> . . .
>
> b. War or Military Action
> (1) War, including undeclared or civil war;
> (2) Warlike action by a military force, including action in hindering or defending against an actual or expected attack, by any government sovereign or other authority using military personnel or other agents; or > (3) Insurrection, rebellion, revolution, usurped power or action taken by governmental authority in hindering or defending against any of these.

F. Liability Insurance

Although most of the insurance focus in the aftermath of the September 11 disaster has been on property and life claims, there are significant liability insurance issues, although some may have been truncated by legislation. The four large planes that were the subject of the coordinated terrorist attack all appear to have been hijacked with relative ease, paving the way for nonfrivolous claims by passengers' estates and ground victims. In what is popularly referred to as the airline bailout act, Congress not only provided direct financial aid to the industry but limited liability to the insurance carried by the airlines. n40 The enactment eliminates many but perhaps not all of a number of interesting tort law and liability coverage issues that would otherwise emerge from September 11.

n40 See Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act, Pub. L. 107-42, 115 Stat. 230, H.R. 2926 (107th Cong., 1st Sess.) (enacted Sept. 22, 2001), §§ 101-107 (provisions for disaster relief for airlines), § 408 (liability of airlines "arising from the terrorist-related aircraft crashes" of September 11 "shall not be in an amount greater than the limits of the liability coverage maintained by the air carrier").

The seemingly obvious theory of tort liability against American and United would posit that the airlines were negligent in their screening (or nonscreening) of passengers and in failing to take reasonable steps to prevent hijacking and use of the planes as weapons. As common carriers, the airlines are strictly liable to passengers, and monetary recovery for injury or death to domestic passengers is not limited by the Warsaw Convention as is the case with international flights. n41 Because all four hijacked planes were on domestic routes, the claims for these hundreds of dead passengers will undoubtedly be significant, although probably not sufficient to imperil the solvency of any insurers if the recovery is limited to claims by the passengers' families.

REV_00263834

n41 See 49 Stat. 3000 et seq., T.S. No. 876 (1934), reprinted following 49 U.S.C. App. § 1502; El Al Israel Airlines, Ltd. v. Tseng, 525 U.S. 155 (1999) (Warsaw Convention bars passenger's claim of psychosomatic injury inflicted by airline search); Zicherman v. Korean Air Lines Co., 516 U.S. 217 (1996) (Convention governs claim in connection with civilian airline flight mistakenly shot down over Soviet skies).

As to claims against the airlines by those injured on the ground, airlines would argue that the claims are farfetched as to foreseeability. Perhaps, but perhaps not. Hijackings, although uncommon in the United States for twenty-five years, have been shown to be a past and continuing menace. n42 A reasonable jury could find that the pre-September 11 status quo of metal detector walk-throughs, perfunctory security screening of employees, permissible carryon bags containing four-inch pen knives, and failure to conduct background checks on passengers was an accident waiting to happen. The suicidal piloting of the craft into buildings caught people by surprise (which explains the lack of passenger resistance until passengers on the fourth flight found out what had happened in the previous three assaults). But a jury could find the risk to nonpassengers from inadequate security to be foreseeable. After all, Tom Clancy foresaw it in a best-seller. n43 Although not in aircraft, suicide bombings by motor vehicle or in person have occurred with some frequency outside the United States, the attack on U.S. Marines in Lebanon in 1983 being perhaps the most prominent to Americans. n44 n42 See, e.g., text and accompanying notes 150-70, infra (hijackings and other terrorist acts continued to occur with some frequency in the world during the 1980s and 1990s, most by militant Islamic groups); Pan Am. World Airways, Inc. v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 505 F.2d 989, 1000 (2d Cir. 1974) (more than 200 hijackings took place between 1960 and 1970, a fact of which insurers and airlines both were constructively aware).

n43 See TOM CLANCY, DEBT OF HONOR (1996) (terrorists hijack airplane and drive it into U.S. Capitol during president's State of the Union message, killing nearly all top national leaders in one fell swoop. See also TOM CLANCY, EXECUTIVE ORDERS (1998) (protagonist Cabinet member becomes president in aftermath of tragedy and must deal with hostile foreign powers and Muslim extremists behind terrorist airplane attack).

n44 See, e.g., Steve Coll, Bomb Kills India's Ex-Premier Gandhi; Campaign Rally Attack Leaves 14 Other Dead in Tamil Nadu, WASH. POST, May 22, 1991, at A1 (suicide bomber pedestrian kills former Indian prime minister); Ron Maitz & Don Melrio, America Under Attack: Security, ATLANTA CONST., Sept. 12, 2001, at 9A (in 1983, suicide bomber drives truck laden with explosives into barracks in Lebanon housing U.S. Marines, killing 241 as they slept; also referring to attack on U.S.S. Cole by suicide motorboat bombing during 2000 and consequent deaths of sailors).

Although hindsight can be said to be twenty-twenty, it is hardly beyond question that airlines could be held liable to persons other than their passengers for lax security leading to the September 11 hijackings and carnage. At a minimum, such claims could survive motions to dismiss or summary judgment motions and require substantial defense under the duty-to-defend policies of commercial airline insurance. The airline protection act makes such claims far less likely by establishing a fund for victims to be administered by a special master with access to the fund requiring a waiver of otherwise available court actions. n45 In light of the limited liability also conferred in the Act, prospective claimants are unlikely to elect to pursue the airlines. In addition, the standard commercial general liability, or CGL, policy contains a war risk exclusion, as do most airline liability policies. n46 But by its terms, the exclusion "applies only to liability assumed under a contract or agreement." n47 n45 See Airline Stabilization Act, supra note 40, §§ 103, 401-409.

REV_00263835

n46 The CGL exclusion states that the policy does not apply to:

> i. War
> "Bodily injury" or "property damage" due to war, whether or not declared, or any act or condition incident to war. War includes civil war, insurrection, rebellion or revolution.

See CGL Policy Form No. CG 00 01 07 98 (ISO 1997), reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 460. Airline liability coverage is usually written on forms other than the standard CGL because the CGL contains an Aircraft Exclusion that would obviously be inconsistent with a commercial airline policyholder. In other regards, however, the language of the typical airline policy and the standard CGL is the same or similar.

n47 Id.

In other words, airline liability insurers bear substantial exposure, but probably not catastrophic exposure, particularly when victims can turn to the government fund rather than attempt to litigate exceptions to the Airline Stabilization Act's ban on punitive damages, limitation on recovery, or the constitutionality of the legislation. n48 Ground victims of September 11 may have perfectly valid negligence claims against the airlines but there may be no insurance to pay the claims if successful, particularly if policies are exhausted by the claims for passenger claimants, and if there is another source of compensation. n49 A combination of economics, public relations, and poor likelihood of legal success may explain why these insurers are unlikely to raise the war exclusion. Notwithstanding the legislative protection, the airlines themselves have seen a substantial drop in passengers and could face bankruptcy or consolidation, making them less attractive litigation targets. n50 n48 The airline passengers and tower occupants arguably acquired causes of action on September 11. To the extent that Congress truncated or eliminated these causes of action eleven days later, the Airline Stabilization Act has the uncomfortable look of a taking of a property right without due process or a civil version of an ex post facto law. To be sure, Congress has in the past acted to limit tort claims and to replace the tort system with an administrative remedial scheme. In these instances, there was known to be a potential batch of claims of varying magnitude and merit. With the Airline Stabilization Act, Congress acted to remove litigation rights that were fully vested for a discreet, identifiable (if large) group. The merits of the claims are arguably strong and nonspeculative, especially for the airline passengers and crew. As to the crew, despite workers' compensation laws, the airlines arguably committed intentional wrongdoing in that they were repeatedly warned by crew members (as was the government) of the inadequate security system governing air travel.

n49 See Airline Stabilization Act, supra note 40, § 405(b)(5) (prohibiting awards of punitive damages in claims against victim compensation fund); American Airlines to claim $ 2.3 billion, BUS. INS., Oct. 29, 2001, at 1 (noting legislation and that American Airlines parent company said that it expected the claims paid by its insurers to total $ 2.3 billion).

n50 See As Big Losses Widen, an Airline Shake-Up Appears Unavoidable, WALL ST. J., Nov. 6, 2001, at A5.

G. Product Liability, Errors and Omissions, or Professional Liability Coverage

Claims could conceivably be made against the professional who designed the airplanes or the buildings in question, although the likelihood of such claims being successful is slight. The theory of such claims would be that the airplane was improperly designed as to security features (e.g., the cockpit door that could be penetrated) or flammability of fuel. The designers and builders of the towers would be accused of failing to design against impact and fire of the type seen on September 11. These sorts of claims appear farfetched because both the airplanes and the towers appear to have been state of the art at the time of their design and manufacture. n51 Most observers describe the towers as having held up for an amazingly long time in view of the tremendous impact and fire that occurred. n52 In addition, the manufacture and construction involved took place years and even decades before the incident, making it likely that statutes of limitation or repose under applicable state law would foreclose such claims. n53 n51 See generally PROSSER & KEETON ON TORTS (describing elements of product liability claims and available defenses).

REV_00263836

n52 Seabrook, supra note 2, at 64. Ironically, Osama bin Laden is reputed to have been videotaped telling associates that he expected only the top portion of the towers to fall. See also Walter Pincus & Karen DeYoung, New bin Laden tape described as incriminating; U.S. officials mull whether and who to release video, LAS VEGAS REV.-J., Dec. 9, 2001, at 3A, col. 5 (tape in U.S. possession but authorities have not determined whether to release contents publically). Bin Laden's opinions and expectations, of course, are probably irrelevant to the legal issues presented save for some marginal impact on the question of whether September 11 qualifies as an excluded war risk.

n53 See, e.g., N.Y.C.P.L.R. § 214(6) (three-year statute of limitations for negligence) (McKinney 2001); N.Y. U.C.C. Law § 2-725 (McKinney 2001) (four-year statute of limitations in connection with warranty claims arising from sale of goods).

H. Directors & Officers Coverage

The typical Directors & Officers, or D & O, policy provides coverage if a director or officer is sued for a wrongful act, usually defined as "any act, error, omission, misstatement, misleading statement, or neglect or breach of duty by the individual insureds solely in their capacities as directors and/or officers of the Company insured." n54 Policy language may vary but the concept is the same: director or officer negligence that causes injury may be covered. Claims of negligence against the airlines and others associated with poor security could include director and officer defendants as well. As with the claims implicating general liability insurance, D & O coverage may be strained but is not likely to be in financial disarray from such claims, provided the relevant policies have aggregate limits, which is highly likely. n55 n54 See, e.g., Directors and Officers Reimbursement Indemnity Policy, reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 579, 581.

n55 Liability insurance written without an aggregate limit would expose the insurer to the possibility that the September 11 losses would be considered more than one "occurrence" under the policy, requiring the insurers to pay considerable amounts. However, the general approach to counting liability insurance occurrences is to focus on the cause of the loss rather than the effects. See STEMPEL, supra note 14, § 2.06[h]. Applied to the September 11 tragedy, this strongly argues for a relatively limited number of occurrences (e.g., each plane hijacked, the impact on each building) rather than a potentially bankrupting determination of thousands of occurrences (e.g., each death or injury).

I. Miscellaneous Types of Coverage

Although not of the magnitude of mainstream property insurance, a market exists for insurance covering planned events such as plays, sports contests, and concerts. In the wake of the September 11 tragedy, major sports leagues suspended operations for approximately a week, a pattern replicated for some entertainment events. These policies are usually triggered, however, only by government-imposed cancellation or physical damage that precludes the event (e.g., a collapsed building, an injured soloist). Because most of the September 11-related cancellations were voluntary, these policies may not be triggered. n56 n56 Susanne Sclafane, Business Interruption Insurers Expect 'Ripple Effect' from Terrorist Attack Claims, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Sept. 24, 2001, at 11 (quoting Ernest & Young senior risk management specialist John Dorf).

REV_00263837

In the main, then, it appears that if the war risk and related exclusions are to have a significant role in post-September 11 coverage battles, their impact will be in the area of property insurance. n57 Property insurance is the likely battleground both for the war risk exclusion and for counting occurrences. Although the insurance industry appears to have the financial strength to withstand the blow of September 11, n58 any additional disasters of such magnitude in the near future could imperil the solvency of the industry. n59 Should these future contingent risks involve terrorism, it is worth examining the efficacy of a war risk exclusion should insurers wish to assert it in the future or reconsider its application to some September 11 claims if their financial future begins to cloud.

n57 See Christopher E. Mandel, Impact of attacks felt across all lines, BUS. INS., Oct. 15, 2001, at 10 (most conservative realistic total loss estimate is $ 41 billion, most in property lines):

> A consensus seems to have emerged about which lines will be hardest hit by this event. Direct property losses will likely be in the range of $ 8 billion to $ 12 billion, including claims for the World Trade Center itself ($ 3.5 billion in real property values alone) and surrounding properties, including an untold number of personal autos. Liability, indirect property or business losses and contingent business interruption losses ($ 4 to $ 7 billion) will add to the total.

Id.

n58 See id. (estimated property and casualty capital worldwide is $ 300 billion, "$ 200 billion of which is on the commercial side," but according to Standard & Poor's, insurance system is at risk if September 11 losses exceed $ 50 billion).

n59 See id. (after September 11, insurance industry cannot "afford a major natural catastrophe of the magnitude of Hurricane Andrew or the 1994 Northridge earthquake, due to the impact on reinsurance treaties now so much at risk").

III. HOW MANY OCCURRENCES?

As noted above, the most newsworthy case to date appears to be the battle between twin towers owner Larry Silverstein and Swiss Re, which wrote property coverage on the towers. n60 Silverstein, who holds a long-term lease on the WTC and suffered not only the destruction of the towers but also physical damage to other WTC property, has stated an intent to rebuild on the site, contending that he is obligated to rebuild under the lease as well as inspired to rebuild as a reaction to the attack. n61 The Swiss Re suit has been described as "a clear effort to put pressure on the alliance [of Silverstein, the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, Silverstein's lenders, and co-investors] and possibly prompt some of the investors or lenders to pressure Mr. Silverstein to walk away from a rebuilding effort."

REV_00263838

n62 Despite the destruction at Ground Zero, Silverstein "has pledged to continue to pay his mortgage and ground rent," n63 although the property will not be a money-maker anytime soon.

n60 See McLeod, supra note 8, at 1; Labaton & Glater, supra note 8, at C2. See also Dave Lenckus, Whether WTC attack is one event or two debated, BUS. INS., Oct. 1, 2001, at 22; Jim Stanton, Insurers make threat to block terror pay-outs, EVENING NEWS--SCOTLAND, Sept. 28, 2001, at B3 (showing cross-Atlantic reach of the story).

n61 See Labaton & Glater, supra note 8, at C1, col. 4, C14, col. 2 (Silverstein "speaks of rebuilding lower Manhattan with almost religious zeal. 'There's no way I could not go forward and build this thing,' he said in an interview on Wednesday [October 31, 2001]. 'What these terrorists have tried to do is destroy the symbol of New York, destroy the symbol of our economic progress, our strength, our way of life, and I can't handle that.'").

n62 See Labaton & Glater, supra note 8, at C14 (attributing this analysis to "experts" and describing Silverstein coalition as "a tenuous alliance, one which is certain to fracture should some members begin to sense that they will not be repaid by Mr. Silverstein or come to believe that he cannot get all the money he claims that his insurers owe him and cannot cap his liability"). Silverstein has retained advocates to lobby Congress for legislation limiting the liability of the WTC to $ 1 billion for claims that may be made by victim families or businesses contending that WTC errors exacerbated the destruction from the terrorist attack, leading to some criticism that Silverstein is trying to have it both ways: limiting his liability but maximizing the liability of his insurer for the property loss. See id. at C1, C14.

n63 See Labaton & Glater, supra note 8, at C14; Alessandra Stanley, Trade Center Leaseholder Pledges to Rebuild, N.Y. TIMES, Oct. 5, 2001, at B2 (Silverstein states that he is "obligated by my lease to pay rent for 99 years, I am obligated to rebuild, and I have the money to rebuild," assuming his claims for insurance coverage are successful); Bloomberg News, Trade Center Operator Seeks $ 7.2 Billion from Insurers, available at http://newsday.com/business/printedition/ny-bzsil092404961oct09.story (visited May 1, 2002).

Thus, the stakes of the Swiss Re/Silverstein dispute are high in and of themselves. The matter is also a potentially high-stakes dispute in that it may set precedent for other claims or future cases involving the determination of the number of occurrences under an insurance policy. However, the public contentions of the parties suggest that the WTC dispute may turn more on particularized policy language or contracting behavior by policyholder and insurer. A final insurance policy for the property was not in place on September 11, making binders and other evidence of insuring intent potentially important to a final adjudication or settlement of the issue. n64 As one account put it, Swiss Re and Silverstein "cite entirely different sets of coverage terms" as controlling the outcome of the dispute. n65

n64 See Labaton & Glater, supra note 8, at C14:

> The policies [or property insurance] were still under negotiation, and the coverage included the disputed terms of the so-called "binders," or promises by insurance carriers to provide coverage. A policy was formally issued by Travelers, a Citigroup subsidiary, on September 14, after a flurry of e-mails and phone calls among the lawyers negotiating the terms of the policy, but other carriers are keeping quiet about whether they will agree to be bound by those terms or by others. Swiss Re executives say that the case turns on a tightly scrawled note on one of the binders that strikes some language and replaces it with the phrase "subject to wording to be agreed." In its complaint, the insurance company asserts that the crashes are a single event under the language in effect on

REV_00263839

September 11.

This type of rolling or late documentation of an insurance agreement is not unusual for such risks. See E.E. Mazier, Swiss Re WTC Lawsuit Analyzed, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Nov. 5, 2001, at 46 (comments of insurance coverage attorneys Vince Vitkowsky and Laurie Kamaiko of New York office of Edwards & Angell, LLP).

n65 See McLeod, supra note 8, at 1:

> Swiss Re says it is bound under a property form that broker Willis Group Ltd., developed and that features a restrictive definition of "occurrence" that precludes the two-event argument.
>
> Silverstein, on the other hand, contends the entire program is governed by a form used by a primary insurer, Travelers Property/Casualty Corp., that does not define occurrence. Under these circumstances, it says, New York law would treat each tower's loss as a separate event.
>
> Muddying the waters further, insurance and legal sources say that other insurers on the program may have used other variations of coverage wordings on their own participations, including different definitions of occurrence.

Although Swiss Re is the lead insurer on the WTC property, the total coverage package involves approximately twenty carriers with varying percentages of the risk. Most significant are Swiss Re (20.9 percent), Lloyd's (19.3 percent), Allianz (15.6 percent), ACE (8.4 percent), Chubb (7.2 percent), Westport (6.7 percent), Travelers (5.9 percent), and Royal (5 percent), with another fourteen insurers comprising the additional 11 percent of the risk. Swiss Re has also contended that Silverstein purchased insufficient insurance on the property. See McLeod, supra note 8, at 1, 27 (describing history of placement negotiations and amounts in question at various times).

To the extent that the WTC coverage dispute is typical, the Swiss Re position appears ill taken. Standard property insurance policies define covered perils but usually do not define what constitutes a "loss" or "occurrence" or the number of occurrences. Liability insurance typically contains language defining an occurrence as "an accident, including continuous or repeated exposure to substantially the same general harmful conditions." n66 This definition, in place largely since 1966 (when the language embellishing "accident" was added), n67 is designed to make clear that a covered occurrence need not be abrupt or confined in scope. At the same time, neither are damages befalling a property or all claims against a policyholder designed to be batched together unless they are sufficiently connected. n68 n66 See CGL Policy Form CG 00 01 07 98 (ISO 1997), reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 468.

n67 See EUGENE R. ANDERSON, JORDAN S. STANZLER & LORELIE S. MASTERS, INSURANCE COVERAGE LITIGATION § 9.02 (2d ed. 2000) for a discussion of the history of changes to the wording of the definition of occurrence in liability policies.

n68 See STEMPEL, supra note 14, § 2.06[h].

The number of occurrences taking place under a policy of insurance is generally determined according to a "cause" test rather than an "effects" test. n69 The focus is on the number of causes of loss rather than on the number of injuries. For example, a policyholder could not seriously suggest that every decedent or injured worker constitutes an "occurrence" under an applicable liability policy or that each damaged component of the towers is an occurrence.

REV_00263840

n69 See id.; ROBERT H. JERRY II, UNDERSTANDING INSURANCE LAW § 65[c] (2d ed. 1996); see also, e.g., Michigan Chem. Corp. v. Am. Home Assur. Co., 728 F.2d 374 (6th Cir. 1984) (applying Michigan law); Appalachian Ins. Co. v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., 676 F.2d 56 (3d Cir. 1982) (applying Massachusetts law); Transp. Ins. Co. v. Lee Way Motor Freight, Inc., 487 F. Supp. 1325, 1330 (N.D. Tex. 1980) (citing cases) (applying Texas law). But see Elston-Richards Storage Co. v. Indem. Ins. Co. of N. Am., 194 F. Supp. 673 (W.D. Mich. 1960), aff'd, 291 F.2d 627 (6th Cir. 1961) (leading case cited for effects test). See also Arthur A. Johnson Corp. v. Indemnity Ins. Co., 164 N.E.2d 704 (N.Y. 1959) (adopting what court said was a hybrid version of cause analysis, focusing more on the event of loss than on negligent act or acts causing the loss). During the intervening forty years, cause analysis in general has focused more on the loss event than on negligence or malfeasance leading to a loss event, making the Johnson case a part of the majority approach.

Nor would policyholders want such a liberal approach to counting occurrences, due to deductibles or self-insured retentions that normally far exceed the loss of any one element of insured property and often exceed the value of individual liability claims. However, policyholders do have an interest in an approach to counting occurrences that is not too restrictive should they be faced with potentially catastrophic losses and limited to a single occurrence of insurance coverage.

Case law on the determination of insurance tends to strike a moderately pro-policyholder balance in close cases. For example, where there are liability claims stemming from a manufacturing problem, a court is likely to find occurrences based on wholesale shipment or episodes of loss created by the product rather than calling the product defect a single occurrence stemming from defective design, a problem at the home plant, or mislabeling. n70 The bulk of case law takes a similar approach regarding not only shipments but also injury from defective products and damage to property. n71 n70 See STEMPEL, supra note 14, § 2.06[h]; JERRY, supra note 69, § 65[c]; see also, e.g., Mich. Chem. Corp., 728 F.2d at 374 (applying Michigan law) (number of occurrences in connection with claims arising out of contaminated/mislabeled livestock feed determined according to number of deadly shipments of material to farmers who later became claimants, resulting in four occurrences rather than one occurrence from the mislabeling problem or hundreds of occurrences due to number of dead cattle); Maurice Pincoffs Co. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 447 F.2d 204 (5th Cir. 1971) (applying Texas law) (similar facts involving contaminated bird seed; court finds eight occurrences based on sales rather than one occurrence from contamination or 100 occurrences due to 100 dead birds).

n71 See, e.g., Dicola v. Am. Steamship Owners Mut. Prot. & Indem. Ass'n (In re Prudential Lines, Inc.), 158 F.3d 65, 77-79 (2d Cir. 1998) (asbestos exposure inflicting bodily harm constitutes multiple occurrences even if root cause of problem is injurious quality of asbestos); H.E. Butt Grocery Co. v. Nat'l Union Fire Ins. Co., 150 F.3d 526, 533 (5th Cir. 1998) (two employee sexual assaults on children are two occurrences, not one occurrence stemming from a single negligent failure to supervise); Stonewall Ins. v. Asbestos Claims Mgmt. Corp., 73 F. 3d 1213 (2d Cir. 1995) (same as Prudential Lines regarding asbestos injury); Babcock & Wilcox Co. v. Arkwright-Boston Mfg. Mut. Ins. Co., 53 F.3d 762, 767-68 (6th Cir. 1995) (asbestos injuries were separate occurrences notwithstanding arguable batching language of policy); Am. Red Cross v. Travelers Indem. Co. of R.I., 816 F. Supp. 755, 761 (D.D.C. 1993) (each distribution of contaminated blood was occurrence); Uniroyal, Inc. v. Home Ins. Co., 707 F. Supp. 1368 (E.D.N.Y. 1988) (each major shipment of Agent Orange during the Vietnam War a separate occurrence); Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 765 A.2d 891 (Conn. 2001) (same approach re asbestos bodily injury);

REV_00263841

Commercial Union v. Porter Hayden Co., 698 A.2d 1167 (Md. 1997); Arthur A. Johnson Corp., 164 N.E.2d at 704. But see Owens-Illinois v. Aetna Cas. Sur. Co., 597 F. Supp. 1515 (D.D.C. 1984) (manufacture and sale of insulation that resulted in insured being named in thousands of asbestos-related lawsuits a single occurrence); Hartford Accident & Indem. Co. v. Wesolowski, 305 N.E.2d 907 (N.Y. 1973) (where automobile's careening sideswipe of one car and head-on crash into another is part of continuous uninterrupted path, incident constitutes one occurrence for insurance purposes). Importantly for purposes of the WTC coverage litigation, Arthur A. Johnson and Wesolowski utilized the same event-causing-injury approach and are fully consistent at law and distinguished by their facts, suggesting that New York law favors the policyholder in this high-profile case.

Where the cause of loss is part of a system or policy, courts have found but one occurrence. n72 These precedents provide some support to the WTC insurers that undoubtedly will argue that the September 11 terrorism emanates from but one al Qaida/bin Laden master plan. Although this appears to be true, the fact remains that the plan had two rather discrete and separate episodes: driving one plane into the North Tower, and driving a completely separate plane, operated by another airline and crew, into the South Tower, both planes commandeered in separate hijackings rather than launched as parts of one fleet.

n72 See, e.g., Appalachian Ins. Co., 676 F.2d at 56 (applying Massachusetts law) (employment discrimination resulting from company policies is one occurrence rather than multiple occurrences based on number of affected employees); Transp. Ins. Co., 487 F. Supp. at 1330 (applying Texas law) (same); Interstate Fire & Cas. Co. v. Archdiocese of Portland, 747 F. Supp. 618 (D. Or. 1990) (negligent supervision of priest who committed child abuse is one occurrence) (note that this case and its progeny are contra to H.E. Butt Grocery Co., 150 F.3d at 526 and its line of cases cited in note 71, supra). Accord Foust v. Ranger Ins. Co., 975 S.W.2d 329 (Tex. App. 1998) (damage to cotton plantings from single herbicide spraying is one occurrence); Phillips v. Ostrer, 481 So. 2d 1241 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1985) (common plan of fraud is one occurrence despite separate overt acts carrying out fraud). In particular, the WTC insurers may invoke the reasoning of Bethany Christian Church v. Preferred Risk Mutual Insurance Co., 942 F. Supp. 330 (S.D. Tex. 1996), which held that embezzlement by a church employee over a period of time was but a single course of conduct and hence a single occurrence under the relevant employee dishonesty policy.

However, the legal rule enunciated in Archdiocese of Portland could have been used to support a finding of multiple occurrences. 747 F. Supp. at 622 ("Application of the cause theory depends upon whether there was one proximate, uninterrupted and continuing cause which resulted in all of the injuries and damage for which the claimant seeks coverage."). By this yardstick, the two separate airline crashes into the North and South Towers, separated by thirty minutes and two different hijackings, would appear to constitute two occurrences by any reasonable definition. The Archdiocese of Portland result can most effectively be explained in that there were multiple instances of abuse but a single child victim. See also Interstate Fire & Cas. Co. v. Archdiocese of Portland, 35 F.3d 1325 (9th Cir. 1993) (reversing trial court and finding that, notwithstanding single child victim and common modus operandi of perpetrator, instances of injury during different policy periods constituted different occurrences).

Courts have found but one occurrence where the damages are linked to an essentially unbroken chain, such as when a car leaves the road and brushes against a row of parked cars. n73 Insurers will undoubtedly invoke these precedents to argue that the WTC losses are the result of a similar sort of careening collision. This argument seems distinctly less persuasive than the "common scheme" argument asserting that the WTC loss resulted from a single terrorist initiative. The fall of the towers may have been a chain reaction, but it was indisputably the product of two separate collisions involving two separate vehicles and is thus rather readily distinguishable from the cases involving careening automobiles or a derailed train of many components. n74

REV_00263842

What Was Sept. 11?, LAS VEGAS REV.-J., Nov. 25, 2001, at 4E, col. 6 (noting that the incident has been described in a variety of ways connoting a terrorist or warlike act, as well as with terms such as tragedy, catastrophe, massacre, and disaster; also suggesting that "September 11" itself has now become a noun known to all).

n2 See William C. Rempel & Richard A. Serrano, America Attacked, L.A. TIMES, Sept. 12, 2001, at A1 (describing attacks and U.S. reaction); David Lieberman, Extreme heat, 'pancaking' doom towers into rubble; 2,000-degree fire wilts steel; cave-in faster with each floor, USA TODAY, Sept. 13, 2001, at 1A, col. 3 (describing attacks and destruction); Vernon Loeb, A Global, Pan-Islamic Network; Terrorism Entrepreneur Unifies Groups Financially, Politically, WASH. POST, Aug. 23, 1998, at A1 (describing bin Laden's background and terrorist network). See also John Seabrook, The Tower Builder: Why did the World Trade Center buildings fall down when they did?, NEW YORKER, Nov. 19, 2001, at 64, 68-71 (describing engineering aspects of disaster with extensive focus on Les Robertson, one of the lead structural engineers involved in the building of the towers); James Glanz, Why World Trade Center Towers Stood, Then Fell, N.Y. TIMES, Nov. 11, 2001, at B1, col. 3. See also James Glanz, Wounded Buildings Offer Survival Lessons, N.Y. TIMES, Dec. 4, 2001, at D1, col. 2 (discussing mechanics of fall of 7 WTC, which was not struck by one of the airplanes, and survival of nearby 90 West Street, which was constructed in 1907 using more concrete, which is more resistant to fire but otherwise heavier and not as strong as steel).

n3 See Susanne Sclafane, $ 75 Billion? The Guessing Continues, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Oct. 1, 2001 at 6 (noting that initial lower estimates of damage in the $ 35-$ 50 billion range were generally being revised upward by insurers); Alan Cowell & Joseph B. Treaster, Insurance losses could hit a staggering $ 72 billion, LAS VEGAS SUN, Sept. 24, 2001, at 4C (leading insurance consulting firm estimates that insured losses stemming from WTC disaster will approximate $ 72 billion). The Insurance Services Office website provides a relatively current tally of claims of which it is aware arising from the tower attacks. See www.iso.com/docs/news.htm.

n4 But the airlines' liability is capped at the amount of their insurance in force. See text and accompanying note 45, infra (discussing airline assistance legislation enacted by Congress in wake of tragedy). See also Michael Freedman, Waiting in the Wings; Plaintiff lawyers have restrained themselves in the wake of the September 11 attacks. That's about to change, FORBES, Oct. 29, 2001, at 62.

Nearly all of these policies, like almost all insurance policies, contain some type of war risk exclusion. As discussed below, these exclusions in brief state that the insurance coverage will not apply to losses caused by acts of war. War rhetoric emerged immediately in the aftermath of the disaster, with President George W. Bush and other leaders describing the terrorism as an act of war against the United States and addressing the problem of terrorism as the next war that America must prosecute and win to ensure the survival of the nation and its free society. News accounts and programming picked up the theme, frequently referring to "America at War" and a "War on Terrorism." n5 Concerns were consequently raised regarding whether the war risk exclusions in applicable policies would bar coverage for the September 11 losses. Many insurers and industry spokes-persons responded to these concerns by stating that the carriers would not invoke the exclusion, an undoubtedly wise public relations move. n6 n5 See, e.g., William C. Rempel & Richard A. Serrano, America Attacked: The Political Response 'Acts Of War' Bush Vows Full Assault, L.A. TIMES, Sept. 13, 2001, at A1; Siobhan Roberts, U.S. Under Attack: Building Twin Towers an Engineering Feat, WASH. POST, Sept. 12, 2001, at A9.

n6 See Theresa Agovino, Life insurers, regulators move to quickly pay claims: War, terrorism exclusions not invoked, LAS VEGAS SUN, Sept. 24, 2001, at 4C. But see Caroline McDonald, n73 See, e.g., St. Paul-Mercury Indem. Co. v. Rutland, 225 F.2d 689 (5th Cir. 1955) (applying Georgia law) (truck hitting train and causing derailment of sixteen cars belonging to fourteen different owners is one occurrence); Olsen v. Moore, 202 N.W.2d 236 (Wis. 1972) (policyholder's car hit two cars in two opposite lanes; one occurrence); Wesolowski, 305 N.E.2d at 907 (careening car that hits two other vehicles in rapid succession creates one insured occurrence). But see State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 26 P.3d 1074 (Alaska 2001) (separately injured victims of automobile's path are each entitled to separate policy limits for occurrence under auto policy).

REV_00263825

n74 But see Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co. v. City of Chicago, 260 F.3d 789 (7th Cir. 2001) (damage caused by 1993 Chicago flood when tunnel wall breached stems from one occurrence).

Thus, a case like American Indemnity Co. v. McQuaig n75 would seem apt precedent. There, the court found that two gunshots by the policyholder that were separated by two minutes were two distinct occurrences. Similarly instructive is Goose Creek Consolidated I.S.D. v. Continental Casualty Co., n76 in which the court found that arson inflicted on two different school buildings constituted two occurrences despite the seeming commonality of the arsonists.

n75 435 So. 2d 414 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1983). But see Koikos v. Travelers Ins. Co., 240 F.3d 1331 (11th Cir. 2001) (trial court finds two shots fired in "nearly concurrent" fashion to be one occurrence; viewing trial court as in tension with McQuaig, appellate court certifies to Florida Supreme Court question of whether instant case involved one or two occurrence under restaurant owner's liability policy). The Florida Supreme Court heard oral argument on Koikos on Nov. 8, 2001. As of this writing, the court has not rendered a decision.

n76 658 So. 2d 338 (Tex. App. 1983). Accord Lexington Ins. Co. v. Travelers Indem. Co., Case No. 00-15407, 2001 U.S. App. LEXIS 20575 (9th Cir. Sept. 11, 2001) (arson fires of four separate courthouses by a single dissatisfied litigant constitute four separate occurrences, notwithstanding the single perpetrator and linkage in motive and methodology); State Farm Lloyds, Inc. v. Scott, 960 S.W.2d 781 (Tex. App. 1997) (two gunshots causing injury are two occurrences under liability insurance policy).

In the case cited to reports, the WTC policyholders' counsel argues that New York has clearly embraced a view favorable to policyholders. n77 In Arthur A. Johnson Corp. v. Indemnity Insurance Co., n78 one wall of a building collapsed due to heavy rainfall. Almost an hour later, another wall collapsed with "no suggestion that the collapse of the first wall caused the failure of the second." n79 The Court of Appeals, New York's highest court, considered the events as two separate occurrences, triggering higher property insurance coverage. n80 New York case law on liability insurance is similar. n81

n77 See Labaton & Glater, supra note 8, at C14:

> Mr. Silverstein's lawyers maintain that New York state law, which governs the case, makes clear that each crash and collapse was a separate insurable event. In 1959, they note, the New York Court of Appeals found that the collapse of two walls in adjoining buildings owned by one person, 50 minutes apart, were distinct events.

Id.

REV_00263843

n78 64 N.E.2d 704 (N.Y. 1959).

n79 Id.

n80 See id. See also Kuhn's of Brownsville v. Bituminous Cas. Co., 270 S.W.2d 358 (Tenn. 1954) (excavation designed to combine buildings but resulting in the collapse of each building two days apart constitutes two occurrences).

The efficient proximate cause approach is applied with particular emphasis on the temporal element in New York. See, e.g., Album Realty Corp. v. Am. Home Assur. Co., 607 N.E.2d 804 (N.Y.1992) (cause of loss is covered break of pipes leading to water damage rather than the freezing that caused pipes to rupture); Bird v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 120 N.E. 86 (N.Y. 1918) (ship damaged by concussion of explosion rather than the fire that led to the explosion); Home Ins. Co. v. Am. Ins. Co., 537 N.Y.S.2d 516 (N.Y. App. Div. 1989) (electric arcing considered cause of loss, leading to coverage even though arcing was product of steam causing electrical equipment to short out). In Bird, Justice Cardozo enunciated the approach to insurance causation that prevails in New York and other states to this day and also enunciated the precursors to the modern "reasonable expectations" approach to insurance coverage.

> General definitions of a proximate cause give little aid. Our guide is the reasonable expectation and purpose of the ordinary business man when making an ordinary business contract. It is his intention, expressed or fairly to be inferred, that counts. There are times when the law permits us to go far back in tracing events to causes. The inquiry for us is how far the parties to this contract intended us to go. The causes within their contemplation are the only causes that concern us. . . . The same cause producing the same effect may be proximate or remote as the contract of the parties seems to place it in light or shadow. That cause is to be held predominant which they would think of as predominant. A common-sense appraisement of everyday forms of speech and modes of thought must tell us when to stop.
>
> . . .
>
> This view of the problems of causation shows how impossible it is to set aside as immaterial the element of proximity in space. The law solves these problems pragmatically. There is no use in arguing that distance ought not to count, if life and experience tell us that it does. The question is not what men ought to think of as a cause. The question is what they do think of as a cause. We must put ourselves in the place of the average owner whose boat or building is damaged by the concussion of a distant explosion, let us say a mile away . . . when the fire is at all times so remote that there is never exposure to its direct perils, and that exposure to its indirect perils comes only through the presence of extraordinary conditions, the release and intervention of tremendous forces of destruction.

Bird, 120 N.E. at 87. See also Robert E. Keeton, Insurance Law Rights at Variance with Policy Provisions, 83 HARV. L. REV. 961 (1970) (Part I) (recognizing and defining reasonable expectations doctrine).

Applied to the deaths and property damage at Ground Zero, the facts of the attack and resulting damage would tend to indicate a reverse-Bird situation. The concussion or impact with the airplane came first and caused significant damage directly flowing from the crash. Greater damage resulted, however, from the resulting fire that became the efficient proximate cause of the demise of the towers.

REV_00263844

n81 See cases cited in note 71, supra.

Swiss Re argues that the WTC property coverage is not undefined or covered by analogy to the standardized definition of occurrence found in liability insurance policies. Rather, Swiss Re argues that the controlling language is that of the "WilProp2000" form used by the broker. The form defines an "occurrence" as "damages that are attributable directly or indirectly to one cause or to one series of similar causes. All such losses will be added together and . . . will be treated as one occurrence irrespective of the period of time or area over which such losses occur." n82 n82 See McLeod, supra note 8, at 27. Although the disputants give different versions of what happened and what constitutes the contract of insurance, at least one observer finds that Swiss Re's claim to incorporating the WilProp2000 form "does not withstand scrutiny." See Mark Geistfeld, Number of Attacks Is Key in Sept. 11 Dispute, N.Y.L.J., Dec. 21, 2001, at 8. Professor Geistfeld reaches this conclusion based on the uncontested statements in the parties' pleadings and concludes as a matter of law that Swiss Re cannot assert that the contract was incomplete until acceptable wording was agreed upon in light of the nondebated facts of the transaction, insurance placement custom, and Swiss Re's failure to insist upon more restrictive language in the binder that it issued. By contrast, Travelers did insist upon using its form, which contains no definition of "occurrence."

Although this language is more restrictive than a complete absence of definition and appears more restrictive than the standard CGL definition of an occurrence as "substantially the same exposure to the same general conditions," the WilProp2000 language does not foreclose a finding of two occurrences in connection with the WTC losses. Even under the language preferred by Swiss Re, the issue is far from clear. In fact, the better argument appears to be that there were two occurrences even if the issue is governed by the form.

Coverage under the WilProp2000 would hinge on whether the collapse of the towers is due to a "series of similar causes." The two aircraft crashes into two separate buildings are clearly not one cause. The two events are similar, but it is far from clear that they are of a series. The modus operandi of the airline hijackings was similar and the two seizures were coordinated. But were they one series? One dictionary defines a "series" as:

> 1 a: a number of things or events of the same class coming one after another in spatial or temporal succession <the hall opened into a [series] of small rooms> b: a set of regularly presented television programs each of which is complete in itself 2: the indicated sum of usu. infinite sequence of numbers 3 a: the coins or currency of a particular country and period b: a group of postage stamps in different denominations 4: a succession of volumes or issues published with related subjects or authors, similar format and price, or continuous numbering . . . 6: a group of chemical compounds related in composition and structure . . . in series: in serial arrangement. n83 n83 See MERRIAM-WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE DICTIONARY 1068 (10th ed. 1996).

"Similar" is defined as

> 1: having characteristics in common: strictly comparable 2: alike in substance or essentials: CORRESPONDING <no two animal habitats are exactly [similar] . . . 3: not differing in shape but only in size or position ([similar] triangles> [similar]

REV_00263845

polygons.

SIMILAR, ANALOGOUS, PARALLEL mean closely resembling each other. Similar implies the possibility of being mistaken for each other <all houses in the development are similar>. n84

n84 Id. at 1093.

"Cause" is defined as "1 a: a reason for an action or condition: motive b: something that brings about an effect or a result . . . an agent that brings something about." n85 The literal definitions of terms in the text of even the more restrictive WilProp2000 definition are not conclusive but suggest that a series of events is something more uniform and tightly bound that the WTC plane crashes of September 11. A series implies replication of the same product in a rather direct and unvarying pattern. For example, when the South Tower collapsed, the falling concrete floors did not comprise 104 separate occurrences. The collapsing floors were of one series as the building pancaked in a domino effect when the steel support gave way and floor upon floor collapsed due to the cascading weight of the concrete. n86

n85 Id. at 1082.

n86 See Seabrook, supra note 2, at 64 (describing WTC construction, design, and engineering, and process by which towers collapsed); James Glanz, Why Trade Center Towers Stood, Then Fell, N.Y. TIMES, Nov. 11, 2001, at B1 (same).

By contrast, the two airplane collisions with the buildings were arguably separate events rather than part of the same sequence. The planes took off separately on separate routes. They were seized by separate teams of terrorists. They were flown in separate patterns toward two separate targets (the North Tower and the South Tower). They created two separate fires and had two separate, although similar, destructive effects on the two different buildings. Under these circumstances, it is not unreasonable to view the collapse of the towers as two separate occurrences even under the WilProp2000 language. They could not be mistaken for one another as might an assembly line of bricks that fall in sequence.

One could argue from the dictionary definitions that there is only one occurrence because the WTC losses were "caused" by Osama bin Laden and al Qaida. But if this reasoning is accepted, then the Pentagon and Pennsylvania plane crashes are also part of this one occurrence. If all events had been insured by Swiss Re, the insurer could then argue that it was subject to only one policy limit, a result that seems absurd. Although suggesting that all havoc wreaked at the WTC had but one cause (bin Laden) has a less obviously absurd ring to it, it is also a farfetched contention. Even a resourceful, ruthless, and empowered terrorist cannot cause damage until he or she produces a damage-causing event. Even if we give one person or organization all "credit" for the plane hijacking scheme (forgetting that it was carried out by nineteen murderers), the losses caused by the scheme stemmed from two separate airplane crashes. If there had been only one plane flown into one tower, there would have been considerably less damage--probably not half as much but nonetheless a distinctly lower order of magnitude of insured loss.

In addition, there are other facts suggesting that it is more appropriate to characterize the demise of the towers as more than a single occurrence. For example, 7 WTC, a forty-seven-story structure in the complex, collapsed late the next day "as a result of a fire that apparently ignited shortly after the towers were hit." n87 The Silverstein group did not hold a lease on 7 WTC. n88 If it had, the policyholder arguably would have suffered physical damage from three separate occurrences, suggesting that the North Tower and South Tower collapses were distinct enough to be separate occurrences even under the WilProp2000 form.

REV_00263846

n87 See Lieberman, supra note 2, at 1A, col. 3 (also noting that One Liberty Plaza, a nearby building, "partially caved in" late in the day of Wednesday, September 12). Although the language of the WilProp2000 form has not been litigated, similarly unifying contract language has been found not to make all asbestos-related injuries one occurrence when they stem from exposure to different sources of asbestos. See, e.g., Babcock & Wilcox Co. v. Arkwright-Boston Mfg. Mut. Ins. Co., 53 F.3d 762, 767-68 (6th Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 1140 (1996). But see Geistfeld, supra note 82 (arguing that if WilProp2000 form controls, damage to towers is one occurrence resulting from series of related terrorist attacks). As reflected in the discussion in this article, I disagree with Professor Geistfeld on this point. The hijacking terrorism directed at the towers was sufficiently separated that it does not constitute the same series of events in the manner of earthquake aftershocks or gusts of the same hurricane.

n88 See Complaint of World Trade Center Properties LLC v. ACE Bermuda Ins. Ltd. & XL Ins. Ltd., No. 01 CV 9731 (Nov. 5, 2001) at PP5-10 (The Silverstein group leased the buildings at 1, 2, 4, and 5 WTC.).

If the WilProp2000 form applies, there is a rub for the policyholder, however. If a court finds both the insurer and policyholder interpretations of this more restrictive language to be reasonable, the hornbook rule of insurance law in New York as elsewhere is that uncertainties are resolved against the drafter, which is usually the insurer or its agents. n89 But if Swiss Re is correct, the Willis form definition of an occurrence may be viewed as language chosen by the policyholder through its agent, the broker, n90 in which case the insurer could find itself in the rare position of being able to utilize the ambiguity principle in its favor.

n89 See STEMPEL, supra note 14, § 4.08.

n90 A broker is usually regarded as the agent of the policyholder for most purposes, although the broker is often considered the insurer's agent for purposes of processing premium payments, notices, or claims. See STEMPEL, supra note 14, § 6.01. Despite the general rule, a broker's status may hinge on the facts of the instant case as to the broker's duties, responsibilities, and source of compensation. Id.

Further complicating things is that New York is what one might call a weak or, at most, moderate, ambiguity state (as opposed to a strong ambiguity state), i.e., one where the court invokes the ambiguity doctrine only as a last resort when other indicia of meaning fail to clarify the construction of the policy. n91 In the WTC dispute, a court may find that negotiation conduct and the context of the risk placement argue more strongly in favor of one side or the other. For example, a court might find that in light of premiums paid relative to similar risks, the parties tacitly intended to treat the $ 3.6 billion figure as the absolute aggregate limit of liability for the risk. Alternatively, there may be no external indicators of the outer limit of coverage or the degree of separation required for separate occurrences.

n91 See STEMPEL, supra note 14, § 4.08[g] (describing nuances of different versions of ambiguity analysis and dividing states into strong, moderate, and weak versions of the ambiguity approach).

Elements of the "drafting history" of the standard occurrence definition found in the CGL policy, however, suggest that the notion of a "series" of "related" events is what insurers sought to embody in the basic standard form, n92 which implies that the WilProp2000 really has no more restrictive definition of the number of occurrences than does the standard CGL. If this is the case, a policyholder could claim two occurrences in the WTC property loss rather than one.

REV_00263847

n92 See ANDERSON, STANZLER & MASTERS, supra note 67, § 9.02[A], at 9-10 (quoting INA executive Lyman J. Baldwin that 1966 definition of occurrence, which used "accident or exposure to conditions" language, was designed to treat as one occurrence a "related series of events" and providing additional drafting history).

Another means for assessing the debate over the more restrictive occurrence definition is to ask whether the two plane crashes wrought distinct damage. n93 It appears that they did, a fact that suggests that there were two occurrences rather than one. Although the September 11 tragedy can be laid at the feet of a particular heinous plot by a seemingly coordinated group of psychotics, the fact remains that the incident would have been far different without the second airplane crash. Insurers can perhaps argue that, as a matter of physics and fact, the collapse of the North Tower (that was a foregone conclusion after the first collision) would have brought down the South Tower. This possible argument seems inconsistent with the facts. Each tower came down independently and at separate times due to separate airplane attacks and separate resulting fires. Although the initial collapse of the South Tower shook the earth, the North Tower remained standing for another half-hour and appeared to collapse because fire weakened the steel support, not because the earlier fall of the South Tower had undermined the integrity of the North Tower (although the earlier collapse hardly helped). Depending on the factual evidence adduced if the coverage dispute is tried, the court may find that the second tower would have survived with comparatively minimal damage if not for the second aircraft strike. If that is the scientific case in fact, this strongly argues for a finding of two occurrences. Conversely, a finding that the fall of the one tower would have surely brought down the second tower even in the absence of a second airplane strike argues for the insurer's position, but that position seems undercut by the observable facts of the disaster.

n93 See Mazier, supra note 64, at 46, 50 (paraphrasing assessment of insurer attorney Laurie Kamaiko that courts could consider whether one airplane could have caused all damage, whether collapse of WTC 7 "hours after the twin towers fell" was distinct occurrence, and relationship between tower collapses and damage to particular adjacent property).

IV. THE HISTORY AND RATIONALE OF THE WAR RISK EXCLUSION AND RELATED EXCLUSIONS

Insurance, of course, is simply a form of risk shifting and risk spreading among people. n94 Modern risk management has evolved from merchants dividing precious goods among horses or ships (so that the entire cargo would not be lost if one went down) to sophisticated interlocking insurance products designed to provide indemnity and often defense if property is lost or the policyholder sued. n95

n94 See STEMPEL, supra note 14, § 1.01.

n95 For a brief but lively review of insurance history, see ANDREW TOBIAS, THE INVISIBLE BANKERS (1982). For more extensive historical background, see ANTHONY BROWN, LLOYD'S OF LONDON (1975). See also STEMPEL, supra note 14, § 1.01 at 1-4; EMERIC FISCHER & PETER NASH SWISHER, PRINCIPLES OF INSURANCE LAW xxxvi (2d ed. 1995); WILLIAM H.A. CARR, PERILS NAMED AND UNNAMED: THE STORY OF THE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NORTH AMERICA (1966) (sketching history and development of insurance industry).

Insurers, of course, make their money by distributing risk. The very reason for having insurance is to spread risk. People or businesses purchase insurance as a way of spreading risk among a wide group of similarly situated policyholders. By doing this, the policyholder agrees to accept a certain loss (the payment of the premium) in return for obtaining protection should it experience a large but unpredictable loss. The nature of insurance realistically requires that the happening of insured events--or at least their severity and time of occurrence--be contingent and comparatively isolated rather than certain or widespread in order to create an environment in which private insurers will want to operate and in which other entities will want to purchase insurance.

REV_00263848

The ability to give up a comparatively small amount of certain loss (the premium) in return for a large amount of protection (the policy limits) should a large loss occur makes insurance an attractive concept. Insurers are able to offer this product by virtue of spreading the risk of the contingent loss (e.g., fire, hurricane, flood) among a large group of policyholders. More important, the group (or risk pool) of policyholders must be sufficiently large and variegated that the pool of policyholders as a whole is not too greatly damaged by any one incident or series of related incidents.

Insurers seek to cover "uncorrelated" risk and to avoid "correlated" risk. For example, providing homeowners' insurance to more than a million policyholders randomly distributed across the continental United States creates a risk pool upon which a property insurer can profitably operate, provided that it charges adequate premiums and otherwise engages in sound underwriting. Because risk distribution and pooling are so central to insurance, the underwriting process seeks to achieve a large but sound and uncorrelated pool of policyholders. Insurance policies are written to provide defenses to coverage and grounds for rescission should the policyholder's conduct tend to undermine maintenance of a sound risk pool.

Property insurance forms commonly exclude war risks n96 or similar dangers. n97 Liability policies typically contain a similar exclusion but may provide that the exclusion "applies only to liability assumed under a contract or agreement." n98 The purpose of these exclusions is to prevent the insurer from becoming responsible for the coverage of a large and correlated risk. For example, if war comes to Elm City, it will bring areawide property damage, thereby destroying the risk spreading and law of averages used by insurers to make money. Even a bad hailstorm or tornado will usually cause only confined or episodic damage. By contrast, a peril such as war tends to bring widespread damage to all policyholders in a region over an extended period of time. Life insurance policies frequently exclude war as a cause of death so that they are not faced with an avalanche of claims should the population be mobilized. Courts have enforced well-drafted war risk exclusions where the insurer has been careful not to mislead the policyholder or were the policyholder is reasonably sophisticated. Because most courts look for the cause nearest the loss to determine if coverage exists, policyholder counsel may be able to turn the confusion of riot-related or perhaps even war-related destruction to their advantage by arguing that the real cause of the loss was fire or simple theft, smoke damage, water damage, etc., that may merely have had its initial roots in the excluded event. n99 n96 See text and accompany notes 19-25, supra (reproducing war risk exclusionary language and reviewing case law). Commercial Property Policy No. CP 10 20 06 95 (ISO 1994), reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 174.

n97 Policies often exclude riot-related damages as well. Two interesting and notable riot exclusion cases involved policies issued in connection with famed stuntman Evel Knievel's 1974 attempted motorcycle jump of the Snake River Canyon near Twin Falls, Idaho. See Foremost Ins. Co. v. Putzier, 606 P.2d 987 (Idaho 1980); Foremost Ins. Co. v. Putzier (Antonio Guanche), 627 P.2d 317 (Idaho 1981). The basic commercial property policy, even one that covers riot and looting losses, usually excludes losses for:

> (1) War, including undeclared or civil war;
> (2) Warlike action by a military force, including action in hindering or defending against an actual or expected attack, by any government, sovereign or other authority using military personnel or other agents; or

REV_00263849

(3) Insurrection, rebellion, revolution, usurped power, or action taken by governmental authority in hindering or defending against any of these.

See Commercial Property Policy No. CP 10 30 06 95 (ISO 1994), reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 222.

n98 See Commercial General Liability Policy No. CG 00 01 07 98 (ISO 1997), reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 461.

n99 See STEMPEL, supra note 14, at ch. 7. Nuclear Incident exclusions provide another example of an exclusion designed to further the insurer's goal of covering varied and uncorrelated risk in the nuclear disaster. This exclusion is usually made part of insurance policies by endorsement and is found in both property and liability policies. The exclusion provides that the insurance does not apply to any loss resulting from "nuclear material." See CGL Endorsement No. IL 00 21 04 98 (ISO 1997), reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 486.

In a similar vein, property insurers typically exclude coverage for flooding or "earth movement" (a/k/a earthquakes or mudslides) for reasons of protecting the risk pool. Specific flood policies are available from the federal government, n100 and earth movement coverage may be obtained by endorsement or through government-supported insurance. n101 The additional coverage is available at an additional premium and is made feasible by the widespread risk underwriting made possible by the government or an alliance of insurers. These types of arrangements are not being urged to permit insurers to offer coverage against terrorist acts in the future. In addition, insurers, particularly liability insurers, may exclude certain risks not so much because they are universal in scope when they take place but because they occur with sufficient frequency and severity so as to make underwriting and pricing very difficult. For example, the standard CGL policy, in a reaction to poor claims experience in the past, now broadly excludes coverage for pollution liability and often excludes asbestos-related claims. n102

n100 See National Flood Insurance Act of 1968, 42 U.S.C. §§ 4011-4128 (2000).

n101 See text and accompanying notes 195-205, infra (discussing government programs to aid catastrophic insurance markets).

n102 See STEMPEL, supra note 14, § 14.11.

The war risk exclusion thus has been a staple of insurance for decades or even centuries and has been used in some form even before its rationale was firmly articulated by insurance theory. Disputes over the effect of hostilities on coverage have been part of the insurance scene since at least the days of Lloyd's Coffee House and the Barbary Pirates. As the scope and lethality of war have increased, there have been further skirmishes between policyholder and insurer with mixed results. As discussed below, courts construing the common war risk exclusions tend to have protected policyholders, denying coverage only when the loss is quite clearly closely intertwined with military activity. Where the loss is only a collateral consequence of hostilities, coverage has usually been found.

V. KEY CASES CONSTRUING THE WAR RISK EXCLUSION

During World War I, commercial ships were occasionally the collateral victims of the war for control of the shipping lanes. Losses ensued, resulting in a leading case, Queen Insurance Co. v. Globe & Rutgers Fire Insurance Co. n103 in which the Court found that the collision of two commercial vessels was not excluded by the war risk exclusion even though the ships were part of two separate convoys bringing supplies to assist the war effort of the Allies.

REV_00263850

Because the commercial ships brought each other down and no military craft were involved, the Court found the exclusion inapplicable even though the convoys would not have been sailing "but for" the war. n104 Furthermore, the convoys were traveling in the dark without lights in order to avoid detection and one convoy had changed course because of an earlier submarine attack. n105 No matter; the collision itself was still not considered a sufficiently direct war casualty even though the policy language at issue was quite broad in that it excluded "all consequences . . . of hostilities or warlike operations." n106 This case rather neatly illustrates the insurance law distinction between a cause in fact and a sufficiently proximate cause (in time or dominance) to trigger or preclude insurance coverage. n107 The Globe & Rutgers Court relied on this principle and saw that it was well established in both American and English insurance law. n108

n103 263 U.S. 487 (1924).

n104 Writing for the Court, Oliver Wendell Holmes noted that the insurer had urged "with plausibility that the collision would not have happened but for the proceedings thus prescribed as an essential part of the conduct of war." Holmes also noted (but ultimately rejected) the insurers' argument that the purpose of policy and the differing nature of war risk argued for application of the exclusion. "[The insurer] states that, while the premiums upon war risk insurance were greatly increased, those upon marine risks underwent but little change." See id. at 491-92.

n105 The Court's description of the scene of the loss certainly sounds more like something out of a John Wayne war movie than business as usual in the shipping industry:

> The Napoli sailed from New York for Genoa with a cargo of which a part was intended for the Italian Government and a small part was munitions of war. All of it was contraband. At Gibraltar she joined a convoy, as it was practically necessary to do although nor [sic] ordered by the military powers. The convoy sailed with screened lights, pretected [sic] by British, Italian and American war vessels, and navigated by an Italian commander on the Napoli, subject to the command of a British captain as the senior naval officer present. . . . At about midnight July 4 another convoy similarly commanded met this one head on. It was seen only a very few minutes before the meeting, there was much confusion, and one of its vessels, the Lamington, a British steamship, struck the Napoli and sank her.

Id.

n106 Id. at 490. In another case close in time, where the direct and immediate cause of the loss was seizure, the Court had no difficulty finding for the insurer. See Standard Oil Co. v. United States (the Llama), 267 U.S. 76 (1925) (proximate cause of loss was seizure from war). Accord Magoun v. New England Marine Ins. Co., 16 F. Cas. 483 (No. 8,961) (C.C. Mass. 1840) (Storey, C.J.) (seizure by foreign authorities excluded from coverage).

n107 See STEMPEL, supra note 14, § 7.02; JERRY, supra note 69, § 67. See, e.g., Shinrone v. Ins. Co. of N. Am., 570 F.2d 715 (8th Cir. 1978) (applying South Dakota law); Graham v. Pub. Employees Mut. Ins. Co., 656 P.2d 1077 (Wash. 1983).

n108 See Globe & Rutgers, 263 U.S. at 492:

> The common understanding is that in construing these policies we are not to take > broad views but generally are to stop our inquiries with the cause nearest to the loss. This is a settled rule of construction, and, if it is understood, does not deserve much criticism, since theoretically at least the parties can shape their contract as they like.

REV_00263851

See also Britain Steamship Co. v. The King, 1.A.C. 99 (1921), affirming 2 K.B. 670 (1919). For a more recent application of this principle in settings, see York Ins. Co. v. Williams Seafood of Albany, Inc., 544 S.E.2d 156 (Ga. 2001) (cause of loss is covered sinkhole collapse rather than excluded flood that led to collapse); Medine v. Geico Gen. Ins. Co., 748 So. 2d 532 (La. Ct. App. 4th Cir. 1999) (parade exclusion does not apply when vehicle leaves parade and automobile mishap occurs; injury caused by ordinary accident rather than parade accident).

For a detailed discussion of the treatment of efficient proximate cause in New York, see footnote 80, supra.

Life insurance cases arising out of World War I were consistent with this approach: if life was lost due to an accident, coverage obtained even if the activity was spurred by the war effort; but where life was lost as a direct result of a hostile act, the war exclusion applied. n109 n109 See, e.g., Stankus v. N.Y. Life Ins. Co., 44 N.E. 2d 687 (Mass. 1942); Vanderbilt v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 184 N.Y.S. 54 (N.Y. 1920); Riche v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 84 N.Y.S.2d 832 (Sup. Ct. Cayuga Co. 1948) (presenting interesting twist in application of concept of efficient proximate cause; insured dies from antiaircraft fire while flying military mission; policy had aeronautic exclusion but not war risk exclusion; court held for coverage, finding that insured died of covered cause (war) and not the uncovered cause of ordinary plane flight).

Also during World War I, there arose disputes between policyholders and life insurers as to coverage when servicemen afflicted with influenza during the great epidemic of 1918-19 died. Decisions in these cases divided, as one court summarized:

> It is . . . recognized that there is a diversity in the holdings, arising not because one group of states follows one line of decision and another group follows another, but because of the difference in the wording of the policies themselves. The cases fall, broadly, into two groups, one holding that the status of the insured as a soldier or sailor is determinative, the other that the cause of death is determinative. n110 n110 See Coit v. Jefferson Standard Life Ins. Co., 168 P.2d 163, 164 (Cal. 1946) (emphasis in original) (reviewing influenza death cases of the World War I era).

During World War II, similar disputes arose and there were also a number of life insurance claims centering on the issue of whether the death at issue was the result of war or another, insured factor. n111 Life insurers generally enjoyed some success defeating claims related to the death of military personnel. n112 But life insurers were generally unable to take advantage of the exclusion after hostilities ceased in 1945, even if military personnel died under circumstances occasioned by the war effort (e.g., the argument that the decedent would never have been in Europe to have a mishap if not for the war). n113 The same approaches governed Korean War insurance claims notwithstanding the fact that war was never declared. n114

REV_00263852

Act-of-War Determination Will Influence Coverage, NAT'L UNDERWRITER, Sept. 17, 2001, at 5 ("The question of the day for the insurance industry and its policyholders might not simply be how many billions of dollars will be sustained in losses from last week's terrorist attack on the World Trade Center towers, but whether the action is proclaimed to be an act of war.") (suggesting that property insurers are waiting for more definitive account of persons or organizations responsible and that war risk exclusion may be invoked if tower attacks can be said to be the work of a hostile nation).

Although insurer pronouncements of noninvocation of the war risk defense to coverage are comforting in the short term, the events of September 11 are probably only the beginning of further examination of the exclusion's role in policies rather than an end to uncertainty. First, to state the obvious, each insurer is different and each policy is different (even though standardized language is characteristic of the industry). Some insurers that issued policies containing standard war risk exclusions may refuse to follow the insurance industry's announced refusal to invoke the exclusion. n7 Other insurers may have variants of the war exclusion or policies that they view as excluding terrorism or attacks other than conventional war. As a result, coverage litigation may soon follow.

n7 See McDonald, supra note 6, at 5.

The author anticipates not only questions about the war risk exclusion, but also countless case-specific disputes about the valuation of lost property, the applicability of business interruption coverage, and the legitimacy of claims. Insurers fear an avalanche of fraudulent or inflated claims. In perhaps the most publicized early coverage dispute, Swiss Re filed suit seeking a declaratory judgment that the September 11 damage to the towers was one "occurrence" rather than two, which would obligate the company to cover "only" an estimated $ 3.6 billion in property losses rather than the $ 7.2 billion sought by developer Larry A. Silverstein, who holds a ninety-nine-year lease on the affected area. n8 n8 See Stephen Labaton & Jonathan D. Glater, Twin Towers At the Center of Legal Brawl, N.Y. TIMES, Nov. 3, 2001, at C1 ("In the suit [Swiss Re] seeks to limit how much it will have to pay to cover the destruction of the twin towers. Lawyers representing the various parties involved agree that more lawsuits are likely to follow."). See also Douglas McLeod, Swiss Re sues over WTC loss amid debate on policy terms, BUS. INS., Oct. 29, 2001, at 1 (providing more extensive background on insurance coverage issues in the litigation).

Beyond the immediate questions of coverage and construction, the events of September 11 at a minimum suggest that insurers must reevaluate the efficacy of the standard war risk exclusion and their underwriting practices and reserves in light of the new face of terrorism. Perhaps as much as $ 100 billion of insurance capital was effectively eliminated on September 11 along with the lost towers, although the final tally will be slower in coming, as will the final payment to all claimants. Only serious hurricanes or earthquakes hitting populated areas come close to rivaling these sorts of insurance losses. Notwithstanding insurer assurances of adequate capacity to pay September 11 claims, n9 concerns remain. At a minimum, the September 11 tragedy has put pressure on insurers, including the financial health of particular carriers and the utility of common efforts to increase capacity such as reinsurance, fronting, and the use of captive insurers. n10 If insurance underwriting and coverage remains unchanged and terrorists follow their "success" of September 11 with further similar efforts, the losses could be staggering and industry decimating. Insurers have recognized this and have began to talk about a federally backed risk pool in the aftermath of the attacks, n11 with support from the Bush administration and others in government.

n9 See Lisa Howard & Susanne Sclafane, Reinsurers Face 'Moment of Truth,' NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Oct. 1, 2001, at 23; Agovino, supra note 6, at 4C.

n10 See Caroline McDonald, Terrorist Attacks Magnify Effects of Hardening Market, NAT'L n111 The presence of war risk exclusions in life insurance policies prompted Congress to enact the Servicemen's Group Life Insurance Act in 1965. Veterans of conflicts prior to the Vietnam War were obviously unaided by the Act. Even today, the maximum death benefit is only $ 20,000. See 38 U.S.C. §§ 765-776 (2000).

REV_00263826

n112 See, e.g., New York Life Ins. Co. v. Bennion, 158 F.2d 260 (10th Cir. 1946) (deaths arising out of Pearl Harbor attack excluded under war risk provisions of policy even though Japan did not formally declare war against United States before attacking). Captain Mervyn Bennion was in command of the Battleship West Virginia at Pearl Harbor and died at his post when hit by bombs dropped by Japanese military planes in an attack on a U.S. military installation. See id. at 261. It would be hard to imagine a more direct loss from an act of war. Nonetheless, Capt. Bennion's estate received the support of a dissenting judge, who found the exclusion insufficiently clear to preclude coverage. See id. at 266 (Huxman, J., dissenting) (War "is a word of many meanings. It cannot be said that it has but a single meaning. . . . In a legal sense, we are not and cannot be at war with another nation until Congress has declared war."). Accord Caruso v. John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co., 53 A.2d 222 (N.J. 1947). Contra Pang v. Sun Life Assur. Co., 37 Haw. 208 (1945) (death of fireman stationed near Pearl Harbor due to bombing was not death caused by act of war).

A closer case for the exclusion was presented in Coit, 168 P.2d at 163, where the insured soldier died in an army hospital after an appendectomy. The Coit court nonetheless found this to be a death incident to service during time of war and denied coverage. But see id. at 170 (Carter, J., dissenting) (finding that although decedent was in military service, his death was "in no way connected with, caused by or the result of that military service or war" and that policy language excluded only war risks, not risks causing injury to soldiers). See also Laurendeau v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 71 A.2d 588 (Vt. 1950) (policyholder denied double indemnity recovery pursuant to policy terms where insured killed in 1943 automobile accident while on furlough).

n113 See, e.g., Stinson v. N.Y. Life Ins. Co., 167 F.2d 233 (D.C. Cir. 1948) (exclusion loses force after actual fighting stops even though there had not been a formal declaration of the end of hostilities; insurer must provide coverage for soldier who accidently fell to death from window of Hotel du Nord in Reims, France, on October 2, 1945, five months after German surrender of military forces). Where death results from combat, the war risk exclusion generally applies irrespective of other legal issues surrounding the theater of war. See, e.g., Carson v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc., 317 A.2d 474 (Conn. Super. Ct. 1973) (no coverage where soldier died during combat on reconnaissance patrol in Vietnam that occurred while cease-fire truce was supposed to be in effect). But see Riche, 84 N.Y.S.2d at 832 (where insurer issued policy with flight risk but not war risk exclusion; court construes exclusion strictly against insurer and declares coverage where insured killed by enemy anti-aircraft fire). See also Pearce v. Am. Defender Life Ins. Co., 330 S.E.2d 9 (N.C. App. 1985) (insurer required to cover death stemming from 1979 training flight accident largely on grounds of estoppel due to unclear communication with opinion not definitive as to interpretation of war risk exclusion).

n114 See, e.g., Goodrich v. John Hancock Mut. Life Ins., 234 N.Y.S. 587 (N.Y. App. Div. 1962) (Korean Conflict clearly war and soldier's death, although result of accidental discharge of firearm rather than conflict with enemy, was incident to military service; case remanded on issue of whether war exclusion was sufficiently prominent in policy as required by state insurance regulations); Lynch v. Nat'l Life & Accident Ins. Co., 278 S.W.2d 32 (Mo. 1955) (war exclusion enforced against soldier claiming benefits after being maimed and losing foot in Korean Conflict); Stanbery v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 98 A.2d 134 (N.J. Super. Ct. 1953). As the Goodrich court put it:

REV_00263853

> We are not so far removed from reality but to recognize that in the language of the average person, the conflict in Korea was considered a war, not by declaration but by the fact that our armed forces were sent there and participated in the fighting and our solders were wounded and died on the battlefields of Korea.

World War II property insurers, acting under the precedent of Rutgers & Globe, assumed that commercial losses were covered even if craft were operating under blackout mode or attempting to evade warships. n115 This rationale appeared to hold during the Vietnam War, where one court found coverage when a commercial aircraft collided with a military plane. Although the planes were over Vietnam only because of the conflict, the efficient proximate cause of loss was deemed due to air travel rather than to an act of war and the exclusion did not bar coverage. n116 n115 See Susan Massman, War Risk Exclusion Legal History Outlined, FC&S On Lines Column, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Sept. 24, 2001, at 40, 45.

n116 See Aircraft Int'l, Inc. v. United States, 460 F.2d 1065 (5th Cir. 1972). See generally Jason B. Libby, War Risk Aviation Exclusions, 60 J. AIR. L. & COM. 609 (1994-95); Sidney I. Simon, The Dilemma of War and Military Exclusion Clauses in Insurance Contracts, 19 AM. BUS. L.J. 31, 34 (1981). Northwest Airlines, Inc. v. Globe Indem. Co., 225 N.W.2d 831 (Minn. 1975)) (the famous "D.B. Cooper" hijacking of an airplane followed by the perpetrator's parachuting into the Washington state wilderness with ransom money provides another example of a failed effort to assert the war risk exclusion and its cousins).

One commentator has read Globe & Rutgers as demonstrating that "courts will relegate the war exclusion to a nonperforming role if it can be shown that damage to covered property can otherwise be attributed to some specified cause of loss." n117 If this assessment is literally correct, policyholders who suffered losses by fire or other perils that emerged only as a consequence of the attack (and not from the initial impact) may be able to successfully argue that they are covered even if the September 11 terrorism is deemed an act of war (which, as discussed below, it is not). This seems plausible for policyholders on the periphery of Ground Zero and for policyholders with losses more attributable to fire than to the physical impact of the airplanes. It took an hour or so of raging fire culminating in building collapse (both covered causes of loss in the standard commercial property form) to cause the loss of the great bulk of the towers. However, efficient proximate cause analysis may not provide an avenue for coverage for losses caused by the initial airplane impacts if the crashes come within the war risk exclusion.

n117 See Massman, supra note 115, at 45.

In what appears to be the first reported case in a hijacking coverage dispute, an intermediate appellate state court ruled that a plane hijacked to Cuba was stolen rather than commandeered in a war. Hence, the theft coverage of the plane was applicable. The war risk exclusion was never seriously discussed as the insurer defended largely on the grounds that the plane had been borrowed rather than permanently taken. n118 The Florida Supreme Court reached this holding even though the hijacking had elements of military engagement. n119 This holding is consistent with the definitive modern case on the exclusion in Pan American World Airways v. Aetna Casualty and Surety Co., n120 in which the policyholder's airplane was hijacked and later totally destroyed as a result of armed hijackers claiming to be acting on behalf of a Palestinian liberation group motivated by political disputes with Israel.

n118 See Am. Fire and Cas. Co. v. Sunny S. Aircraft Serv., Inc., 151 So. 2d 276 (Fla. 1973).

REV_00263854

n119 After the passenger hijacked the small plane, the pilot was forced to land in Cuba in a pasture. When the pilot attempted to return to the United States, the plane was attacked by Cuban military aircraft and damaged by the gunfire. The pilot "escaped and made a forced landing. Rebel forces [apparently paramilitary troops backing the then-insurgent Fidel Castro rather than the soon-to-be deposed Juan Battista, but the opinion is ambiguous on this point] hid him and the plane for several days, after which he took off and returned to his point of departure in Broward County. See id. at 277.

n120 505 F.2d 989 (2d Cir. 1974) (applying New York law).

In Pan Am, the district court found the policy's version of the war exclusion inapplicable, as were the exclusions for government seizure and rebelling or insurrection. n121 The Second Circuit affirmed in an opinion that is a tour de force in limiting the reach of these war risk exclusions. n122 The Pan Am court described the hijack and the plane's odyssey and ultimate destruction by members of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP). n123 Ironically, the PFLP action, like the terrorist operations of September 11, involved efforts to seize multiple planes at approximately the same time. n124 Unlike the September 11 tragedy, the PFLP hijacked planes were "only" removed and destroyed rather than deployed as suicide bombs. Passengers were used as hostages as the PFLP bargained for the release of prisoners but this aspect of the drama was apparently resolved without any deaths.

n121 See Pan Am. World Airways, Inc. v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 368 F. Supp. 1098 (S.D.N.Y. 1973).

n122 Pan Am, 505 F. 2d at 998.

n123 Id. at 998-1000.

n124 Id. at 999. On the same date as the Pan Am hijacking, September 6, 1970, the PFLP hijacked TWA Flight 741 originating in Frankfurt and Swissair Flight 100 originating in Zurich. An attempt to hijack El Al Flight 219 was "foiled in the air by El Al security personnel." On September 9, a BOAC airplane was also hijacked as part of this connected activity.

The Pan Am court reasoned that the war risk exclusions, although lengthy, were ambiguous regarding the appropriate characterization of this event: whether the two gun-toting plane thieves were garden-variety hijackers, soldiers in an ongoing war of liberation, part of a "seizure" by a quasi-government, an incident of insurrection, or something else. Faced with the uncertainty, the court applied the ambiguity principle to find for the policyholder. n125 On a deeper level, the court assessed the language, purpose, and background of the war risk exclusions and concluded that they were not intended to apply to this type of event. n126

n125 See id. at 999-1001.

n126 See id. at 999-1004.

Of particular interest to the court was the history of hijacking and the lack of specific exclusionary language in the all-risk policies held by Pan Am. n127 In particular, the availability of specific hijacking exclusions used by insurers prompted the court to make the negative inference that the standard war exclusion was therefore not a hijacking exclusion unless the plane was taken by uniformed army personnel or a more obviously paramilitary group for a purpose resembling more traditional warfare activity. n128 Insurers were aware of both the terrorist risk and the availability of specific exclusions to bar coverage of the risk, prompting the court to conclude that when Pan Am's insurers "failed to exclude 'political risks in words descriptive of today's world events,' they acted at their own peril." n129

n127 See id. at 1000 (noting that "between 1960 and 1970 over 200 commercial aircraft were hijacked, eight of which belonged to Pan American"). In addition, the PFLP in 1969 hijacked a TWA plane to Damascus and damaged it through detonation. "The [Pan Am] all risk insurers took no steps to clarify their exclusions even after the Damascus loss made it clear that the London market did not consider the PFLP hijackings to be within the terms of [the standard war risk exclusions]."

REV_00263855

n128 See id. at 1000-01 (noting availability of London market forms for aviation policies that specifically excluded wrongful seizure by nongovernment entities, the AV-48 endorsement, and the AV-48A endorsement that specifically excluded "hijacking" and "acts for political or terrorist purposes").

n129 Id. at 1001.

The Pan Am court also assessed the case in light of the well-established insurance law doctrine of looking to the "efficient proximate cause" of the loss to determine coverage. n130 By analogy, the court found Pan Am's loss similar to the loss in Globe and Rutgers, n131 in which the Court refused to bar coverage where the loss was only an indirect consequence of hostilities rather than a direct casualty of military activity directed at the policyholder. n132 n130 See id. at 1006-07. The Pan Am court used the arguably disparaging term "mechanical" to describe the historically narrow New York law focus on temporal proximity between cause and loss. See id. at 1007-08. Whatever the apt term, the Second Circuit was sure that "for insurance purposes, the mechanical cause of the present loss was two men, who by force of arms, diverted Flight 093 from it intended destination." Id. at 1007.

n131 See Queen Ins. Co. v. Globe & Rutgers Fire Ins. Co., 282 F.2d 976 (2d Cir. 1922), aff'd, 263 U.S. 487 (1924), discussed at text and accompanying notes 104-114, supra, and by the Pan Am court. Pan Am, 505 F.2d at 1007.

n132 See Pan Am, 505 F.2d at 1005-07 (citing Britain S.S. Co. v. The Kin, 2 K.B. 670 (C.A. 1919), aff'd, 1921 1 A.C. 99 (1920) (convoy lost because it took different route to avoid hostilities); Ionides v. Universal Marine Ins. Co., 143 Eng. Rep. 445 (C.P. 1863) (ship running aground because Confederate military forces had extinguished Cape Hatteras lighthouse was covered marine peril rather than excluded war peril); Standard Oil v. United States, 340 U.S. 54 (1950) (commercial ship's collision with minesweeper was covered marine peril even though minesweeper was in harbor only because of war activities necessitating patrol for mines)). See also Welt v. Conn. Mut. Life Ins. Co., 48 N.Y. 34 (1871), cited in Pan Am, 505 F.2d at 1013 (death of insured during railroad robbery covered because four uniformed perpetrators could not be established as soldiers in Civil War conflict raging at time of decedent's death). Contra Int'l Dairy Eng. Co. v. Am. Home Assur. Co., 352 F. Supp. 827 (N.D. Cal. 1970), aff'd, 474 F.2d 1242 (9th Cir. 1973) (warehouse fire in Vietnam ignited by U.S. military parachute flare excluded war risk because of direct flow from hostile military act); Hamdi & Ibrahim Mango Co. v. Reliance Ins. Co., 291 F.2d 437 (2d Cir. 1961) (loss of auto parts due to mortar shelling during Battle of Haifa excluded war risk loss) (both cases cited in Pan Am, 505 F.2d at 1017).

Although the terms "insurrection," "rebellion," or "usurped power" all connote something less widely and militarily disruptive than a "war," n133 the Pan Am court found that even these lesser terms required more than the isolated acts of even a fairly large number of miscreants. Rather, there must be an effort to depose or replace a government and to offer something of an alternative (although anarchy might in some circumstances constitute the alternative). n134 Because the court found that the PFLP lacked sufficient indicia of a sovereign entity, it also found that the taking of the Pan Am plane constitute an excluded "seizure." n135 n133 See Home Ins. Co. v. Davila, 212 F.2d 731, 736 (1st Cir. 1954) (discussing terms as progression of hostility moving toward war) (cited in Pan Am, 505 F.2d at 1017).

REV_00263856

n134 See Pan Am, 505 F.2d at 1010-11 (suggesting that the usurped power exclusion would only apply in situations similar to Charles the Pretender's occupation of Derby in an effort to wrest the throne of England for himself and his followers). Despite the political agenda of the PFLP, the Pan Am court did not see such a concrete political objective emanating from the PFLP terrorism. See also id. at 1011 ("a de facto government is necessary to constitute a usurped power"); id. at 1014 (using 1916 Easter Rebellion in Dublin as example of civil war or usurped power).

n135 See id. at 1008-10, 1013-15.

The Pan Am holding and rationale is persuasive. The purpose of the war risk exclusion is to prevent insurers from being wiped out by correlated claims (those emanating from one source or affecting a discreet group rather than a cross-section or large population) that inflict abnormal losses throughout society. An act of terrorism, even repeated acts of terrorism, does not inflict the countrywide correlated losses of a state of armed conflict (be it civil commotion, insurrection, civil war, or war between established nations). Even where the conflict does not involve conventional troops or established governments, there is a difference between the occasional act of terror (e.g., a car bomb at a Jerusalem intersection) and the hostilities of insurrection, militias, or guerilla troops (e.g., raids throughout the countryside in Peru by the Shining Path rebels).

Although terrorist initiatives make normal loss prediction much more difficult, they do not pose the same risk calculation and risk distribution problems presented by more dispersed, semi-constant war. Although terrorism can of course strike anywhere or anytime, it tends not to engulf or affect entire regions on a sustained basis. For example, the WTC attack, although horrific, was relatively isolated in geography and intense hostilities (only two "shots" were fired). As of this writing, months have passed without similar incident and most people in New York and environs have returned to an essentially normal existence. Persons in other regions of the country are relatively untouched, at least in the sense of physical or financial loss. If, instead, September 11 had seen the emergence of guerilla forces based in the Catskills and raiding throughout the Northeast, there would be a different problem. The area involved would be large and consistently affected. The risk pool maintenance function of the war risk exclusion is not imperiled when it does not bar coverage for what is essentially an isolated crime, albeit one with political overtones.

In addition, there would usually be an element of civil war or insurrection associated with this hypothesized state of affairs. As the Second Circuit observed in Pan Am, the hijackers of that airplane were not part of an effort to overthrow or establish a government. They just wanted to destroy the property of a Western corporation. In related fashion, the bin Laden forces wanted to kill Westerners (many of the dead were not Americans) and destroy Western property for political ends (e.g., forcing U.S. troops out of Saudi Arabia, reducing or eliminating support for Israel, and driving a wedge between the West and more moderate Islamic elements). The September 11 terrorists did not want to conquer the United States (war), depose the government (insurrection), or support a faction during domestic strife (civil war). The September 11 terrorism, despite its awful magnitude, is more properly seen as a gruesomely heightened version of the Pan Am hijacking rather than as an incident of war.

The function of the war exclusion could, of course, be seriously jeopardized if courts construe it not to apply to widespread acts tantamount to armed conflict. When in doubt, courts dealing with either the war or riot exclusions should take a functional approach rather than a hypertextual one, asking whether granting the coverage claim would defeat the purpose of the exclusions and expose the insurer to dangerous losses outside the contemplation of the parties to the policy.

REV_00263857

But courts at times have taken an extremely narrow view of the exclusion. For example, one's first intuition might be that war exclusions would presumably apply if the unfortunate residents of Sarajevo (during the Bosnia crisis), Mogadishu (during the time of warlord feuding), or Beirut (during the late 1970s and 1980s) brought claims since those cities seemed at certain times essentially in the throes of ongoing military and paramilitary conflict despite the absence of a formal declaration of war. That intuition is apparently wrong, at least according to one prominent decision, Holiday Inns, Inc. v. Aetna Insurance Co., n136 a case arising out of Lebanese hostilities.

n136 571 F. Supp. 1460 (S.D.N.Y. 1983).

The Holiday Inn was one of the most prominent buildings in Beirut. The hotel became embroiled in a running battle between Christian and Muslim factions in Lebanon. The hotel "was severely damaged by events occurring during a period from October, 1975, to April 9, 1976." n137 On October 25, 1975, "a battle began for the possession and control of the Kantari district" near the hotel. n138 The conflict > marked the emergence of a new fighting force on the streets of Beirut. This was the Mourabitoun, the militia force of the Independent Nasserite Organization. The existence of the Independent Nasserite Organization was well known; it was one of numerous groups comprising what may generally be described as the "Moslem left" (as opposed to the Christian right). What had not been realized was the Independent Nasserite Organization had a large and effective militia. These were the Mourabitoun. On October 25, 1975, the Mourabitoun organized an attack from one of the Moslem suburbs to the south, driving west into Kantari toward the sea front. n139

>
> . . .
>
> In their attack upon the Kantari district, the Mourabitoun were joined by some Saiqa militiamen. The Saiqa was a Palestinian commando organization, backed by Syria [as well as militia from the PFLP]. The opponents of these forces consisted of militiamen from the Phalange and the Party of Liberal Nationalists ("P.N.L."). The Phalange was organized along paramilitary lines in the mid-1930s. It drew most of its support from the Christian population of Lebanon, although some Moslems were also to be found in its ranks. . . . Its militia, called the Tigers, numbered at least 3,500 men in 1975. n140
>
> . . .
>
> As the fighting in Kantari progressed, the bells of the Christian churches were rung, and all Phalangists in the area turned out to resist the Mourabitoun. In other parts of Kantari, the Phalangists were able to repel the attacks; the quick seizure of the Murr Tower constituted the Mourabitoun's main success of the night.
>
> Having seized the Murr Tower [the tallest building in the neighborhood and indeed the tallest building in Beirut], the Mourabitoun installed sand bags and heavy machine guns on the top floors. By doing so, the Mourabitoun were able to harass Phalangist street movements in several directions. n141

n137 Id.

n138 Id. at 1467.

REV_00263858

n139 Id. at 1468, citing JOHN BULLOCH, DEATH OF A COUNTRY (1977).

n140 Id.

n141 Id. at 1469 (citations omitted).

The court's description certainly sounds like something out of a war movie. From October 1975 to April 1976 this fighting continued, resulting in shelling that damaged the Holiday Inn, which was occupied by Phalangists during the course of continued fighting. Shots and hostilities were exchanged between the Holiday Inn occupants and opponents in other hotels.

> The Holiday Inn was finally wrested from Phalangist hands during fierce fighting between March 21 and 26, 1976. . . . During this fighting the Holiday Inn changed hands several times. By March 23, however, it was occupied by Moslem and Palestinian leftists. "This time the Inn was properly and effectively garrisoned, and ceased to be fought over, though it was frequently used as a sniper position." n142

n142 Id. at 1471 (citations omitted).

Notwithstanding this environment sounding like a theater of war, the court found that the Beirut conflict did not qualify as "war" under the standard war risk exclusion because the conflict surrounding the Holiday Inn was not one between governments or quasi-governments. n143 For similar reasons, the fighting was not civil war or insurrection. n144 It could be seen as more ganglike than a true political movement. At least the court could not with certainty describe the Beirut bloodshed as war, civil war, or an insurrection against a specific government. In the face of the ambiguity (a reasonable person could call the incidents one big gang battle or label it a civil war between factions competing to be quasi-governments), the insurer lost because it had the burden of establishing with clarity the applicability of the exclusion. n145 n143 See id. at 1498-99. Without doubt, however, there was plenty of fighting and bloodshed in the region. See id. at 1472-85 (reviewing tortured history of conflict in Lebanon and the Middle East).

n144 Id. at 1494: "'Insurrection' presents the key issue because 'rebellion,' 'revolution,' and 'civil war' are progressive stages in the development of civil unrest, the most rudimentary form of which is 'insurrection.'" (quoting Pan American World Airways, Inc. v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 505 F.2d 989, 1017 (2d Cir. 1974) (emphasis that of the Holiday Inns court; Pan Am court citing Home Ins. Co. v. Davila, 212 F. 2d 731, 736 (1st Cir. 1954), and The Brig Amy Warwick (The Prize Cases), 67 U.S. (2 Black) 635, 666 (1862))).

n145 See id. at 1503:

> Aetna, as an all risk insurer, had the burden of proving that the damage to the Holiday Inn was caused by a peril whose consequences were excluded by the policy. . . . Having failed to sustain that burden, Aetna is liable under the policy. The Holiday Inn was damaged by a series of factional "civil commotions" of increasing violence. The Lebanese government could not deal effectively with these commotions. The country came close to anarchy, but the constitutional government existed throughout; the requisite intent to overthrow it has not been > proved to the exclusion of other interpretations; and there was no "war" in Lebanon between sovereign or quasi-sovereign states.

REV_00263859

In reaching its decision in favor of coverage, the Holiday Inns court was strongly influenced by the Pan Am case, which was cited throughout the Holiday Inns decision. The Holiday Inns court was also influenced by a British decision involving insurance coverage and Lebanese hostilities. In Spinney's v. Royal Insurance Co., n146 the court faced the similar question of whether damage to commercial property stemming from the street fighting of the era was covered as an ordinary loss akin to vandalism or whether the loss resulted from war or civil war, making the exclusion applicable. The English court, in an opinion by the prominent Lord Michael Mustill, an acknowledged expert on insurance, concluded that it "cannot find that by January, 1976, matters had advanced between massive civil strife and virtual anarchy to the state of a civil war. Perhaps they did later, but that is not for decision here." n147 n146 1980 1 Lloyd's L. Rep. 406, 432 (Q.B.).

n147 See Holiday Inns, 571 F. Supp. at 1487, citing Spinney's, 1980 1 Lloyd's L. Rep., at 432 (emphasis added). Holiday Inns Judge Haight added:

> I do not cite the English court's judgment in Spinney's, on this point or any other, as precedent for findings of fact in my own judgment. That is because the evidence in the record of this trial constitutes the basis for this Court's findings, not the evidence adduced before another tribunal at a different trial. But I am free, as in the point of relevance under discussion, to accept Justice Mustill's legal analysis; or to adopt as useful his characterization of conditions in Lebanon if it conforms to the evidence in the trial before me.

See id. at 1487, n. 125. Despite the disclaimer and the utility of the Pan Am precedent, Judge Haight was clearly comforted by knowing that a respected English judge had viewed essentially the same imbroglio and found it to fall short of war.

The Holiday Inns decision suggests that American courts would be reluctant to find even guerilla troops in the Catskills to meet the terms of the standard war risk exclusion. Where there is a more distinct effort to overthrow a particular government, however, courts have characterized this as civil war. n148 In some cases a battle of "quasi-sovereign" forces for control of land can constitute a state of war. n149 Where regular troops of a sovereign government are involved, the war risk exclusion has been held to preclude coverage, even where the loss is not caused by the direct actions of the troops. For example, in TRT/FTC Communications, Inc. v. Insurance Company of the State of Pennsylvania, n150 the court denied coverage for merchandise removed from a store at gunpoint by armed men in civilian clothing because the loss took place in a commercial sector of Panama City during the disruption caused by the U.S. military operation against former Panamanian dictator Manuel Noriega. n151 Where troops are irregular but the context establishes civil war or its equivalent, losses sufficiently related to the conflict have been found excluded by language barring coverage for insurrection or civil commotion. For example, merchants with stores looted during factional fighting for control of Liberia were not covered. n152 Similarly, the seizure of ships owned by Nicaraguan dictator General Anastasio Sozmoza was deemed proximately caused by "ongoing civil war in Nicaragua," an excluded peril. n153 Short of these situations, however, case law, particularly the relatively recent precedents of Pan Am and Holiday Inns, suggests that the war risk exclusion is inapplicable. n154 n148 See, e.g., Davila, 212 F.2d at 736 (losses caused by competing forces in struggle for control of Puerto Rico constitute civil war, thereby precluding coverage); Wilker Bros. Co. v. Lumberman's Mut. Cas. Co., 529 F. Supp. 133, 116 (S.D.N.Y. 1981) ("civil war" existed in Nicaragua during 1978-79 as Sandinista rebels sought to oust government of dictator General Antonio Somoza); OPE Shipping, Ltd. v. Allstate Ins. Co., 521 F. Supp. 342, 349 (S.D.N.Y. 1981) (same).

REV_00263860

n149 See, e.g., Hamdi & Ibrahim Mango Co. v. Reliance Ins. Co., 291 F.2d 437, 442 (2d Cir. 1961) (clashes between armed and organized Arabs and Jews for control of Palestine (now Israel) constituted state of war; loss of cargo damaged by mortar fire in port of Haifa excluded from coverage under war risk exclusion). See also Int'l Rescue Comm. v. Reliance Ins. Co., 646 N.Y.S.2d 112 (N.Y. App. Div. 1996) (whether Somalia in 1993 was in a state of war was a question of fact precluding summary judgment for insurer in claim arising out of injury by land mine); but see id. at 114-115 (Ellerin, J., dissenting) (Somalia was in midst of civil war and insurrection as a matter of law during time of injury and injury clearly stemmed from warlike activity).

n150 847 F. Supp. 28 (Del. 1993).

n151 See id. at 30-31. But see Sherwin-Williams Co. v. Ins. Co. of State of Pa., 863 F. Supp. 542 (N.D. Ohio 1994) (policyholder with looting losses arising out of Panama conflict covered where it had specifically added "civil commotion" coverage by endorsement). But see also Sherwin-Williams Co. v. Ins. Co. of State of Pa., 105 F.3d 258 (6th Cir. 1997) (reversing in part for remand to require policyholder to prove inability to access primary coverage before it may recover from excess insurer).

n152 See Younis Bros. & Co., Inc. v. Cigna Worldwide Ins. Co., 91 F.3d 13 (3d Cir. 1996). The court reached this view even though some of the losses were due to fire, which arguably was a covered cause of loss nearer in time and more dominant than the de facto civil war raging in Liberia at the time. The losses took place during the June-October period of 1990 and in the court's view all stemmed from the "state of insurrection [that] existed in Liberia during the relevant time period; and, that the insurrection caused [the] losses." See id. at 14. The court cited Pan American World Airways, Inc. v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co. approvingly, suggesting that it viewed the case of Liberian civil war as different than the terrorist actions in Pan Am. See also Home Ins. Co. v. Davila, 212 F.2d 731, 736 (1st Cir. 1954) (defining "insurrection or rebellion" as "movement accompanied by action specifically intended to overthrow the constituted government and to take possession of the inherent powers thereof," a feature absent in the September 11 attacks).

n153 See OPE Shipping, 521 F. Supp. at 342. The OPE Shipping holding is both fact specific and debatable. It is arguably at odds with New York law on efficient proximate cause, which tends to focus on the cause closest to the loss to a greater degree than other states. In OPE Shipping, the immediate cause of the loss was the seizure by their own crews, apparently including the captains or masters of the voyage, which would ordinarily qualify as "barratry," a covered cause of loss under most marine insurance policies. The crews took the ships to Cuba and Panama, countries friendly with the Sandinistas, the anti-Somoza group that eventually deposed Somoza. The court found more than ordinary barratry, however, because the crew members spearheading the seizure were Sandinista supporters who acted "on direct orders from Sandinista authorities as agents of the insurrection and rebellion." See id. at 343. See also Productos Carnic, S.A. v. Central Am. Beef and Seafood Trading Co., 621 F. 2d 683 (5th Cir. 1980) (upholding injunction pending resolution of claims arising from Sandinista seizure of meat packing plant formerly owned by Somoza); Republic of China v. Nat'l. Union Fire Ins. Co. of Pittsburgh, 151 F. Supp. 211 (D. Md. 1957) (defection of ship's crew alone is not covered loss due to barratry; for barratry, master of ship must defect or betray vessel owner).

REV_00263861

n154 See Pan Am. World Airways, Inc. v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 505 F. 2d 989, 1012-13 (2d Cir. 1974):

> [War is] a course of hostility engaged in by entities that have at least significant attributes of sovereignty. Under international law war is waged by states or state-like entities.
>
> . . .
>
> English and American cases dealing with the insurance meaning of "war" have defined it in accordance with the ancient international law definition: war refers to and includes only hostilities carried on by entities that constitute governments at least de facto in character.

Accord N. Bay Sch. Ins. Auth. v. Indus. Indem. Co., 10 Cal. Rptr. 2d 88 (Cal. Ct. App. 1992) (vandalism of school by group of juvenile delinquents is not "riot" for purposes of triggering policy language regarding calculation of number of occurrences; although loss is not a riot, the holding is a victory for insurer, preventing attachment of coverage due to lack of aggregation of losses). But see id. at 92 (White, P.J., dissenting) (arguing that "riot" is ambiguous under the circumstances and that uncertainty should be resolved in favor of policyholder).

VI. THE WAR RISK EXCLUSION AND ITS POTENTIAL APPLICATION TO CONTESTED SEPTEMBER 11 COVERAGE CLAIMS

In light of the history of war risk exclusion litigation, insurers can hardly be accused of making a gratuitous gesture in the aftermath of the September 11 tragedy. n155 If insurers with standard war risk exclusions attempt to invoke the exclusions as a basis for denying coverage, they are likely to lose in courts of law as well as in the court of public opinion. n156 Case law, although limited, has carved a fairly clear demarcation between real "wars" and even the most bellicose, deadly, and destructive terrorist acts.

n155 See, e.g., Christopher Oster, On War Question, Insurers' Front Is Hardly United, WALL ST. J. Sept. 19, 2001, at B1, col. 3 (quoting AIG CEO Maurice Greenberg: "I don't think anybody in their right mind would [invoke the war risk exclusion]. [A] member of the administration termed it a war . . . but it's not a war in the conventional sense of the word. No one is going to deny claims on that basis."). But see Randy J. Maniloff, The War Risk Exclusion--Looking Beyond the Events of September 11th, MEALEY'S LITIG. REP.: INS., Sept. 25, 2001, at 37, 39 (attorney representing insurers arguing that standard war risk exclusion is potentially applicable to September 11 claims) ("cases make clear that, if their only consideration had been sanctity of their policy language, the insurance industry would not have been beyond the pale to have reserved their rights with respect to claims arising out of the September 11th attacks"). With due respect to this author, I am constrained to disagree.

n156 It appears that some insurers may attempt to invoke the war risk exclusion, notwithstanding the many public pronouncements to the contrary. See, e.g., Oster, supra note 155 (ACE Ltd. refrains from disavowal of exclusion and Arab Insurance Group appears to suggest that it is applicable). But see Oster, supra note 155 (quoting AIG CEO Maurice Greenberg).

The key case, of course, is Pan Am, in which the Second Circuit found that a hijacking and the destruction of an airliner was an act of larceny rather than an act of war. Neither could the episode be fairly characterized as the product of civil war, revolution, or domestic insurrection. Although the destruction of two skyscrapers is of greater magnitude than the destruction of an airplane, the analogy would likely be controlling should any war risk

REV_00263862

UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Oct. 1, 2001, at 10; E.E. Mazier, Hard Market Hikes Friction With Fronts, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Oct. 1, 2001, at 12; Mark E. Ruquet, Brokers See Big Boost in Captive Interest, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Oct. 1, 2001, at 13; Caroline McDonald, Captive Services May Be Harder to Find, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Oct. 1, 2001, at 11.

n11 See Steven Brostoff, Fed Role in Terror Re Debated, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Oct. 1, 2001, at 8; Steven Brostoff, AIA, Alliance Draft Pool Proposals, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Oct. 1, 2001, at 8; Steven Brostoff, No Easy Answers on Coverage for Future Losses from Terrorism, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Oct. 1, 2001, at 25.

In addition to the issue of counting occurrences, the September 11 terror raises a number of potentially difficult coverage issues. Brought particularly to the forefront is the seldom-litigated war risk exclusion. September 11 will prompt further examination of the exclusion, its function, its language, and its variants. Although the exclusion may be effectively overlooked under these extraordinary circumstances, the clause remains a staple of many insurance policies. As discussed below, the current standard war risk exclusion is not likely to bar coverage for even the extreme terrorism of September 11. n12 Historically, more specific exclusionary endorsements have been used to limit the terrorism risk, with considerable variance among policyholders, insurers, and reinsurers.

n12 See text and accompanying notes 103-175, infra.

If insurers wish to avoid terrorism risk as a standard matter, rewritten standard policy forms are required. Alternatively, insurers have argued that without federal financial backing, coverage will contract or uniformly be made subject to blanket terrorism exclusions. If insurers and policyholders wish to have protection against terrorism risks in the future, underwriting and pricing will obviously be affected regardless of the level of government aid.

This article focuses on the prominent issues of occurrence counting and the current status of the war risk exclusion but also touches upon other insurance issues likely to arise in connection with September 11 claims. Part II briefly outlines the types of insurance potentially applicable to the September 11 tragedy and resulting issues that may arise. Part III addresses the issue of whether the terrorist attack was one occurrence or two, a question with an answer that implicates $ 3.6 billion in property insurance written on the towers. Part IV discusses the rationale, history, and function of the war risk exclusion. Part V examines key precedent about the war risk exclusion. Part VI discusses the degree to which the September 11 tragedy does or does not fit the war risk exclusion. Part VII outlines possible government and industry reactions to the problems associated with terrorism losses and the future insurance coverage for such claims.

II. POTENTIALLY APPLICABLE INSURANCE AND COVERAGE QUESTIONS PRESENTED BY THE SEPTEMBER 11 TERRORISM

In the wake of the September 11 tragedy, economic loss and insurance claims are a given. To a perhaps unprecedented degree, a wide variety of coverages is implicated, touching upon practically all major lines of coverage, many of which usually contain some type of war risk exclusion and will also be affected by other coverage questions. n13 n13 See Tamara Loomis, Insurance Coverage: Terrorist Attack Raises Complex Issues, N.Y.L.J., Oct. 11, 2001, at 5. In addition, other terrorist events in the fall of 2001 and the ensuing military activity in Afghanistan and the conflict in the Middle East may raise insurance coverage disputes. This article will not address those issues although all of them might fall under the broad topic of terrorism. See Diane Richardson, Anthrax Exposure Raises Cover Questions, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Nov. 26, 2001, at 20 coverage litigation ensue from the September 11 episode. In both cases, the perpetrators were politically motivated but were not military employees of a foreign power. None were in the military or affiliated with any recognized government. Nor can they be said to have been guerrilla fighters.

REV_00263827

If anything, one can characterize the September 11 hijackers as less political than those who took the Pan Am plane thirty years earlier. The PFLP, however deplorable its methods, by comparison looked more like a political-governmental movement than al Qaida. The former had an avowed political goal: a separate Palestinian state carved from (or perhaps through the eradication of) Israel. The closest thing to a political platform for al Qaida seems to be the removal of American troops from Saudi Arabia. Osama bin Laden has not argued publically for a separate al Qaida nation, although his remarks can be interpreted to advocate the overthrow of certain Middle East governments. But to be replaced with what? Only after the United States began bombing Taliban positions in Afghanistan did bin Laden belatedly suggest that a Palestinian state was part of his goal, perhaps giving him as much geopolitical definition as the PFLP, which the Second Circuit nonetheless found not to be a government or military entity engaged in war.

Unless insurers can distinguish their situation from that of Aetna in the Pan Am case, they are unlikely to prevail in a coverage dispute about the September 11 attacks. Even critics of some of the Pan Am court's interpretations must concede that the court is correct in its general approach to insurance policy construction. Exclusions are strictly construed against the insurer; n157 any ambiguity is resolved against the insurer that drafted and implemented the relevant policy language. n158 According to these normal axioms of insurance policy construction, unless a terror situation clearly rises to the level of war, the policyholder should prevail. n159 n157 See BARRY R. OSTRAGER & THOMAS R. NEWMAN, HANDBOOK OF INSURANCE COVERAGE LITIGATION § 103[b][1] (10th ed. 2000); STEMPEL, supra note 14, § 2.06; EUGENE ANDERSON, LORELIE S. MASTERS & JORDAN S. STANZLER, INSURANCE COVERAGE LITIGATION §§ 2.01-2.06; Ace Wire & Cable Co. v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 457 N.E.2d 761 (N.Y. 1983).

n158 See OSTRAGER & NEWMAN, supra note 157; ANDERSON, MASTERS & STANZLER, supra note 157; STEMPEL, supra note 14, § 4.08; Ace Wire & Cable Co., 457 N.E.2d at 761.

n159 In one case arising out of the 1993 bombing of the WTC, the war risk exclusion issue was not raised, apparently because the case involved a contractual indemnity agreement between the WTC and Hilton Hotels, although Hilton's liability insurer was involved after having apparently paid claims by patrons injured in the bombing. See Nat'l Union Fire Ins. Co. v. Port Auth., 690 N.Y.S.2d 260 (N.Y. App. Div. 1999) (finding indemnity agreement in lease inapplicable as "it is plain that the planting of the bomb whose detonation led to the claimants' injuries, in a portion of the World Trade Center over which respondents indisputably exercised no control was not in any way attributable to the use of occupancy of the premises respondents leased and managed").

The insurer position in seeking to enforce a standard war risk exclusion is further undermined by two significant factors: (1) an exclusion clearly excluding terrorism can be drafted; and (2) despite the passage of considerable time, insurers have failed to rewrite the general war exclusion to exclude terrorism.

As to the first factor, and perhaps stating the obvious, an insurer can draft an exclusion that bars coverage for terrorism. Insurers have in fact drafted and used such exclusions. A specific terrorism exclusion was available in 1970 at the time of the Pan Am hijacking. This was of significant import to the Second Circuit, which correctly reasoned that it seemed erroneous to read the war exclusion as a terrorism exclusion when there was available a separate and clear terrorism exclusion that was not used in the policy. n160 This type of thinking is but common sense and a corollary to the ambiguity rule of contract law. If language is arguably unclear but could easily have been made clear if intended to have the result asserted by the drafter, the contra proferentem principle of construing ambiguities against the drafter takes on particular force. n161 n160 See text and accompanying notes 129, supra.

REV_00263863

n161 See George Backer Mgmt. Corp. v. Acme Quilting Co., 385 N.E.2d 1062 (N.Y. 1978). See also Kenneth S. Abraham, A Theory of Insurance Policy Interpretation, 95 MICH. L. REV. 531 (1996) (regarding the contra proferentem principle as key to insurance policy construction and assessing the principle in similar manner).

Regarding the second factor arguing against treating the war risk exclusion as a terrorism exclusion, the Pan Am case was decided more than a quarter of a century ago. During that time, terrorism has increased in magnitude, refinement, and deadliness. Palestinian terrorists murdered a dozen Israeli athletes at the 1972 Olympics in Munich. n162 Subsequent acts ratcheted up the death toll for terrorism: 241 Marines in Lebanon in 1983; n163 thirty-two American soldiers in Somalia in 1993; n164 nineteen Americans killed with the Khobar Towers bombing in Saudi Arabia in 1996; n165 224 killed and 4,500 wounded when the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania were hit by car bombs in 1998; n166 and thirty-two sailors killed in the suicide speedboat bombing attack on the U.S.S. Cole in 2000. n167 In addition, suicidal terrorists proved that not even well-guarded chief executives of nations were safe. n168 Of particular relevance is that insurers were constructively aware of a similar suicide bomb attempt to attack the Eiffel Tower that was thwarted by authorities. n169 Even more relevant is the fact that insurers had seen the WTC itself victimized by a 1993 terrorist bomb that killed several and injured more than 1,000, n170 a near miss that probably should have been recognized as a harbinger of more heinous acts to come. n171 n162 Jennifer Rosenberg, 20th Century History, The History of the Olympics: 1972--Munich, West Germany, THE HISTORY NET, available at http://history1900s.about.com/library/weekly/aa081000u.htm (visited Nov. 2, 2001) ("The 1972 Olympic Games will probably be best remembered for the murder of eleven Israeli Olympians.").

n163 See Philip Taubman, O'Neill Considers Backing a Change in Marine Mission, N.Y. TIMES, Dec. 30, 1983, at A1, col. 6.

n164 Vernon Loeb & Walter Pincus, Bomb Suspect Has Been a Target; Aides Say Bin Laden Had Motive, Means to Attack, WASH. POST, Aug. 13, 1998, at A1 (bin Laden "claimed responsibility for an attempted December 1992 bombing of 100 U.S. servicemen in Yemen, and he has publicly said that his soldiers fought U.S. troops during Operation Restore Hope in 1993 in Somalia, where U.S. officials believe that he supplied weapons that shot down American helicopters"); Mark Huband, Somalis shoot down two US helicopters, GUARDIAN, Oct. 4, 1993, at 8; Ann Devroy, Somalia Options Reviewed as Discontent in Congress Grows; New Deployment Raises Confusion on U.S. Goals, WASH. POST, Oct. 6, 1993, at A1 (twelve U.S. soldiers killed in Oct. 3-4, 1993, battle that became the subject of the book and movie Black Hawk Down). See MARK BOWDEN, BLACK HAWK DOWN: A STORY OF MODERN WAR (1999).

n165 See Editorial, The Bombing at Khobar, WASH. POST, June 27, 1996, at A28 ("Beirut, Oklahoma City; now add Khobar Towers to the bloody list. . . . As the attack on New York City's World Trade Center showed, even civilians are not exempt from such risks today.").

n166 See Ian Johnson & Alfred Kueppers, Until Last Month, a Traveler from Sudan Stumped Investigators, WALL ST. J., Oct. 19, 2001, at A1 (summarizing damage and widely held view that truck bombings of embassies were projects of bin Laden and al Qaida); William Claiborne, Bombs at 2 U.S. Embassies in Africa Kill 81; 8 Americans Among the Dead, WASH. POST, Aug. 8, 1998, at A1.

REV_00263864

n167 See Maitz & Melrio, supra note 44, at 9A.

n168 See Coll, supra note 44, at A1 (Rajiv Gandhi killed by suicide bomber who approached him at campaign rally with explosives hidden in basket of flowers); Susan B. Glasser, Alliance: U.S. killed al-Qaida leaders, LAS VEGAS SUN, Dec. 5, 2001, at 1A, 12A (Egyptian Premier Anwar Sadat killed by fanatical Muslims in his personal guard who were in turn killed by guards loyal to Sadat; assassination of Sadat is generally thought to have been masterminded by Ayman al-Zawahri, an Egyptian doctor and founder of Islamic Jihad, later thought to have become Osama bin Laden's chief deputy in al Qaida and possible mastermind of September 11 terrorism).

n169 See Gregory Katz, Algerian militants key to al-Qaida; Arrests suggest failed '94 hijacking was blueprint for attacks, LAS VEGAS REV.-J., Oct. 20, 2001, at 10A, col. 1.

n170 See William M. Carley, Explosive Theory: Bombing in New York Bears Some Hallmarks of Mideast Terrorists: A Motive Remains Unclear in Blast that Killed Five and Injured 1,000 or More: Businesses Find New Offices, WALL ST. J., Mar. 1, 1993, at A1, col. 6 ("tremendous power of the bomb, its strategic placement to knock out much of the lighting, power and communications in the World Trade Center, and its huge success in disrupting lower Manhattan bear all the characteristics of a professional terrorist operation").

n171 See News Summary, The FBI Determined that a bomb caused the World Trade Center explosion, WALL ST. J., Mar. 1, 1993, at A1, col. 3 ("Bomb, which left a four-story hole below New York's 110-story twin tower complex, may have contained as much as 1,500 pounds of explosives. Terrorism analysts said Friday's noontime attack had all the markings of certain Mideast terror groups."); News Summary, Bomb Inquiry Focuses on Links to Muslim Cleric, WALL ST. J., Mar. 8, 1993, at A1, col. 3.

Terrorism has not abated since 1974 and, if anything, appears to have accelerated. But the standard war risk exclusion of 2001 reads almost exactly as did the 1970 exclusion that was insufficient to preclude coverage in the Pan Am case. Further, almost everyone in liability insurance or related legal services is or reasonably should be aware of the Pan Am case. It is a famous case decided by a prominent federal appeals court that sits in the commercial heart of America, perhaps not more than a mile from Ground Zero. For more than twenty-five years, insurers have been on notice that the standard war risk exclusion would almost certainly not preclude coverage for losses caused by terrorism.

In deciding that the losses connected to the 1975-76 battle in Beirut were not excluded acts of war, the Holiday Inns court was strongly influenced not only by the ambiguity doctrine and the insurer's burden to prove the applicability of an exclusion but also by the insurer's failure to revise its war risk language in the wake of Pan Am v. Aetna.

The Second Circuit decided Pan Am on October 15, 1974. At that time Holiday Inn was negotiating, through brokers, with present defendant Aetna the all-risk policy forming the subject matter of the case at bar. The policy issued under date of March 11, 1975. The "Aetna" involved in Pan Am was a different company. But the Second Circuit, in a scholarly, thirty-three-page opinion by Judge Hays, with encyclopedic citation of authority, placed the insurance industry on notice when it declared certain principles of insurance law applicable to, and defined terms appearing in, all-risk property policies. It often happens that insurers and their insureds, ligating the question of coverage, draw analogies to judgments of prior centuries. The Second Circuit performed that historical analysis in Pan Am, updating the ancient insurance phrases within the general context of this century's tragic Middle East strife, and it did so during the gestation period of the very policy in suit. n172 n172 Holiday Inns, Inc. v. Aetna Ins. Co., 571 F. Supp. 1460, 1461 (S.D.N.Y. 1983).

REV_00263865

Despite this notice and the ready availability of clearly exclusionary language, insurers made no significant changes in the standard exclusion. Under these circumstances, insurers are in a difficult position when attempting to argue that the war exclusion is also a terrorism exclusion. Policyholders can argue that insurers with only a standard war exclusion are effectively estopped to provide coverage when terrorism causes losses. If otherwise valid September 11 coverable claims are opposed solely on the basis of the standard war risk exclusion, policyholders should win on summary judgment. n173 If insurers are to avoid covering the aftermath of September 11, they must incorporate more specific terrorism exclusions into their policies or have other valid grounds of defense (e.g., business loss that does not flow from physical damage).

n173 See FED. R. CIV. P. 56 (judgment may be entered for moving party, even party bearing burden of persuasion, if there is no genuine dispute of material fact and movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law). Conceivably, a war risk coverage dispute could have something more to raise a genuine dispute of material fact, such as communications between the parties that indicated a policyholder's understanding that terrorism losses were excluded or that a premium was reduced based on this understanding. Absent special facts like this (that are unlikely), however, September 11 policyholders should prevail on war risk issues without the need for full trial of the dispute.

For a different view making thoughtful arguments and invoking my own writings to argue that the September 11 terrorism is sufficiently distinct from the Pan Am terrorism to come within the exclusion, see Randy J. Maniloff, The 'War Risk' Exclusion: Distinguishing Between 'War' and 'Terrorism' After September 11, 16 MEALEY'S LITIG. REP.: INS. 6, Dec. 11, 2001, at 1, 8-9.

Insurers can argue with some force that September 11 was a quantum leap not only in terrorist impact but also in the response, both rhetorical and military, to terrorism. Within one day, political leaders and news organizations referred to the events as an "act of war" that placed America at "war" with al Qaida and with countries that aid or abet its activities. The ensuing weeks have seen continued references to "America at War," the "War on Terrorism," and the like. Much of this rhetoric has come straight from the top. Political leaders and the media of course condemned the Pan Am hijacking but the incident stirred no similar war rhetoric.

Nor did the United States respond to the 1970 hijacking with much more than rhetoric and diplomacy. By contrast, the killings of September 11 stirred the federal government into action. Hundreds of suspected terrorists or collaborators were detained or arrested. Diplomatic efforts to forge an anti-bin Laden, anti-Taliban coalition went into overdrive. Military forces were deployed. Afghanistan was bombed.

These responses give insurers fuel for arguing that there really was something different about this terrorist event that vaulted it from the ordinary into an excluded event of war. Although such arguments could give a court pause, they are unlikely to remove any September 11 coverage disputes from the precedential force and factual analogy provided by Pan Am. In addition, the theory and rationale of the war risk exclusion suggests that the exclusion cannot be appropriately applied to the September 11 losses.

As discussed above, the risk distribution rationale for the war exclusion is in the way that war changes the actuarial rules of insurance. In peacetime, fortuitous, isolated, episodic losses (even if large) do not fundamentally alter the law of averages, historical trends, and the law of large numbers. A prudent insurer can achieve a large pool of uncorrelated risk and price its products profitably even if the risks insured include even dangerous natural phenomena (e.g., wildfires, hurricanes, earthquakes) affecting miles of land and millions of people. During wartime, all risk is to a degree correlated, sometimes severely. Think of London or Dresden during World War II for property insurance; Normandy Beach for life insurance; and the Gulf War, where charred Iraqi and Kuwaiti vehicles appeared to dot the road to Baghdad, for auto insurance.

REV_00263866

Similarly, war changes the equation of risk fundamentally in that it engages hordes of people, usually at the government's behest, in intentional acts of death and destruction. Without war, actuaries and underwriters need worry only about individuals or relatively small groups that may inflict injury upon insureds. Even if these groups are rather large, widely dispersed across the country, or disproportionately and troublesomely concentrated in certain areas, the havoc that these groups can wreak, however large, is not as systemic as war and does not alter the norms of risk distribution as much as does war.

The insurance industry's historical practices confirm this distinction. Insurers never exclude coverage for losses resulting from thugs, even organized bands of thugs, much less the Cosa Nostra or other criminal organizations. These domestic groups have many "members," perhaps more than al Qaida and other terrorist organizations. Domestic gangs can be extremely destructive, acting with deliberate, far-flung, and sustained malice. Yet insurance policies do not exclude their damage except perhaps in cases where their activity rises to the level of a full-blown riot with looting and the policy contains a riot exclusion. In addition to covering such human-generated losses, insurers have also historically been willing to cover hurricanes and similarly widely dispersed natural disasters. Only with Hurricane Andrew's severe losses in 1992 was Florida required to take government action to make the risk insurable through a windstorm pool. Earth movement has historically be excluded in the standard policy but can be purchased with relative ease at premiums that are not particularly high. Floods have been excluded but are insurable under the government program.

From a contract construction and insurance law perspective, all of these examples tend to vindicate the accepted view (expressed in Pan Am) that the war risk exclusion does not apply to terrorism losses. These other exclusions (windstorm, flood, earth movement) are all more clear and comprehensive than the war risk exclusion. Some of the limitations on coverage are in the insuring agreement itself (e.g., they are not covered perils in a property policy). In those cases, the policyholder will not even enjoy the benefit of the legal rule that requires strict construction of an exclusion against an insurer. But for the war risk exclusion, the legal rules of insurance in construing ambiguous policy language and exclusions should result in policyholders winning any such coverage battles.

From a structural or instrumental perspective, the treatment of these other risks also suggests that real war is different and that terrorism, even the awful new terrorism of the post-September 11 world, is not enough like real war to meet the purpose and objective of the war risk exclusion. Put another way, one can address the war risk exclusion by asking what the September 11 terrorism most resembles: fire, crime, hurricane, earthquake, flood, or war? One can make decent arguments for any as the favored analogy but war seems the least likely. Although the September 11 horror was a terrible loss, it is probably more like the Northridge earthquake, Hurricane Andrew, or the Galveston Hurricane of 1906. These disasters caused great loss of property and life but were within the scope of insurance coverage. Put another way, Manhattan was dealt a terrible blow by the terrorists, but Manhattan is a long way from becoming Kabul. n174 n174 The generally excluded cause of loss most like the WTC attack is probably earthquake. The tragedy involved terrible destruction based on physical collapse of buildings and support--but destruction relatively confined (unlike the miles often affected by hurricane or flood). Although the earthquake risk is usually excluded in the standard policy, it is excluded with a clarity not found in the war risk exclusion, another factor suggesting the inapplicability of the war risk exclusion to bar coverage.

REV_00263867

But see Maniloff, supra note 173, at 8-9. Maniloff argues with some force that September 11 is a sufficiently different terrorist incident because its magnitude and dispersion give it the risk management problems normally associated with a conventional war. In making this argument, Maniloff notes that my prior writings can be invoked to support his position. See Maniloff, supra note 173, at 8-9 (quoting an excerpt of LAW OF INSURANCE CONTRACT DISPUTES, supra note 14, § 1.02[a], which states that the "purpose of the war exclusion is to prevent insurers from being wiped out by correlated claims . . . that inflict abnormal losses throughout society. The function of the war exclusion would be seriously jeopardized if courts did not construe it to prevent widespread terrorist acts tantamount to armed conflict.").

The Maniloff article makes a strong argument for insurers against the tide of popular opinion opposing application of the war risk exclusion. Nonetheless, I am constrained to disagree with Maniloff's analysis for two reasons. First, although the September 11 terrorism was indeed something tragically more than a car bomb or a deranged armed intruder, it nonetheless was a concentrated event--or at most four concentrated events. Severe as the damage may have been, it does not resemble the widespread but correlated loss inflicted when a nation is in a state of war. Again, the Manhattan versus Kabul comparison is instructive if perhaps corny. As also stated in my treatise (and fairly quoted by Maniloff), the function of the war exclusion "is not imperiled when it does not bar coverage for what is essentially an isolated crime, albeit one with political overtones." Maniloff, supra note 173, at 8-9 (quoting LAW OF INSURANCE CONTRACT DISPUTES, supra note 14, at 1-12 and 1-13). September 11 took terrorism to a new level but the hijackings of that awful day were not widespread enough to rise to the level of "war." Something like the Manhattan-wide terrorism portrayed in the movie Siege, if continued long enough in substantial degree, might qualify as terrorism cum war.

Second, the continued passage of time with no insurance industry revision of the war exclusion has led me to conclude that it would simply be unfair under the ground rules of contract law to construe the term "war" so broadly, particularly in light of the case law and the insurance norm that exclusions are construed narrowly and to the detriment of the insurers, even if the insurers' argument is reasonable. The language quoted by Maniloff was written in 1993 for the 1994 First Edition of my treatise. Further passage of time has made me less sympathetic to insurers' failure to revise the exclusion and more receptive to the policyholder argument that continued terrorism during the intervening years makes it less responsible to give insurers the benefit of any doubt as to the applicability of a war exclusion to terrorist losses. In retrospect, I should have seen this more clearly even in 1993 (ironically, the year of the WTC car bombing). It is also, of course, possible that the horror of September 11 and a desire to see victim policyholders compensated have unduly influenced my thinking. On balance, however, although I stand by the broad analysis cited by Maniloff, I do not think that it applies to the September 11 losses.

Terrible as it was, the nature of the September 11 loss is simply not all that close to that of war, even the low-tech brutality of guerilla war. Again, a comparison of Manhattan and Kabul is instructive as is a comparison with the United States and Afghanistan during much of the past twenty-two years. Since September 11, the news media have made much of fear gripping the United States. Notwithstanding that the national perspective has been changed by the atrocities of September 11, most of America has been engaged in business as usual in the months after the tragedy and is likely to continue to proceed with a high degree of normalcy. This would not be the case in the aftermath of the first battle of anything resembling a real war, civil war, rebellion, or insurrection. Compare the United States in September 2001 with the former Yugoslavia during September of any year between 1989 and 1995, and the distinction becomes clearer. The terrorists "achieved" a considerable amount on September 11 but they did not ignite a situation sufficiently similar to war to alter risk management axioms.

REV_00263868

The insurance industry essentially acknowledged the weakness of the war exclusion when so many of its members so quickly announced that they would not defend claims on the basis of the exclusion. Some, like AIG Chief Executive Officer and industry giant Maurice Greenberg, were openly dismissive of the possibility that the exclusion could apply to the September 11 losses. n175 In effect, insurers eschewing the war risk exclusion gave up almost nothing in the way of legal leverage in order to obtain useful, positive public relations. This is not to say, however, that the September tragedy will not change the insurance business for insurers and policyholders alike.

n175 See Oster, supra note 155.

VII. INSURANCE INDUSTRY AND GOVERNMENT REACTION; PROSPECTS FOR FUTURE COVERAGE OF TERRORISM LOSSES

Regardless of how they are characterized, the September 11 losses are dramatic. Covering them will put significant strain on insurers at all levels and may produce insolvencies. n176 As discussed above, the case law of the war risk exclusion suggests that insurers will not avoid payment on this basis for the September 11 losses and that the standard war risk exclusion will not protect insurers from similar claims in the future.

n176 See Sally Roberts, Market hardening rapidly: Intermediaries warn cedents of big rate hikes, tighter conditions in wake of attacks, BUS. INS., Nov. 5, 2001, at 10, 33, 34 (September 11 disaster unique in history of insurance loss not only because of magnitude but because it cut across virtually all lines of insurance); Meg Fletcher, Sept. 11 creates challenges for work comp, BUS. INS., Nov. 5, 2001, at 1, 60 (September 11 largest workers' compensation insurance loss in history due to concentration of employees at core site of disaster); Some European insurers seek to cancel policies, BUS. INS. ONLINE, available at businessinsurance.com (visited Oct. 4, 2001). The strain will be logistical as well as financial because of the need to quickly process a large volume of claims and ward off claimant opportunism without inviting a public relations problem. See Mark Maremont & Christopher Oster, Insurers Gird for Disaster-Related Fraud, WALL ST. J., Sept. 27, 2001, at B2 (quoting one industry insider as expecting "a wave of workers' compensation and disability claims" from persons not actually at site of the tragedy); New York Moves to Combat Insurance Fraud After Terror Attacks, BEST'S INS. NEWS, Oct. 4, 2001, at 2.

But precedent, history, and practice also show that insurers can deploy a clear terrorism exclusion that precludes coverage. n177 After September 11, insurers are likely to make this exclusion much more common as an endorsement or perhaps even in revised forms for standard coverage. The weakness of the war risk exclusion and the ravages of September 11 may prompt an industry shift to reduced coverage overall. Already, insurers have announced that they are canceling coverage, will not renew coverage absent specific terrorism exclusions, are raising premiums, or are withdrawing from certain markets. n178 Even venues far afield of the United States or obvious terror targets are affected. For example, the slated insurer of the 2002 World Cup soccer tournament withdrew coverage in the wake of September 11. n179 n177 See, e.g., Pan Am. World Airways, Inc. v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 505 F.2d 989, 1000-01 (noting existence in 1970 of clearly worded insurer endorsements excluding terrorism coverage). See also text and accompanying notes, supra (noting insurer failure to utilize established terrorism exclusions as indicating terrorism losses covered in standard policies).

n178 See Roberts, supra note 176, at 10, 33-34; UN Pulls Staff Out of Somalia After Losing Insurance Coverage, Dow Jones Int'l News Wire, Sept. 24, 2001, available at Westlaw ALLNEWSPLUS database; Coverage shortfall threatens airport operations, BUS. INS. ONLINE, available at www.businessinsurance.com/index.php3?action=view&id=959 (Sept. 25, 2001) (airports that are not government owned have liability limits ranging from $ 50 million to $ 1 billion, the higher amount difficult to keep in place or increase in aftermath of September 11).

REV_00263869

n179 See Sarah Veysey, Berkshire steps in to cover World Cup: FIFA replaces cancelled AXA-led cover, BUS. INS., Nov. 5, 2001, at 56 (after September 11 attacks, AXA Colonia, lead insurer on consortium that had agreed to provide up to $ 852 million (944 Euros) in coverage for the 2002 World Cup soccer games, canceled its coverage). As the headline of the cited article implies, alternative coverage was found when National Indemnity Co., a unit of Berkshire Hathaway, agreed to provide coverage. The "program's premium and limits were not disclosed," making it hard to evaluate the impact of terrorism on underwriting and pricing in this instance. The World Cup episode does, however, have implications for the ongoing debate regarding government support for insurers. Despite the underwriting challenges of the post-September 11 world, it appears that insurance coverage remains available, a trend that suggests caution and conservatism regarding the magnitude and type of government assistance to insurers.

As to the September 11 losses, insurers have stated that the blow, although a hard one, can be borne by the industry. n180 In fact, as the rubble has cleared, so have the prospects of insurers that appear to be able to profit in the long term from newfound customer willingness to pay higher premiums for coverage. n181 Requests for government assistance have focused on protecting insurers from future terrorism losses beyond their capacity and thus encouraging insurers to continue to write this coverage for acceptable rates notwithstanding that September 11 has changed the industry's view of terrorism risks and the feasibility of underwriting them.

n180 Regulators have not uniformly accepted all of these insurer assurances at face value. See, e.g., Joseph B. Treaster, Lloyd's Says It Can Pay, But Officials Seek Proof, N.Y. TIMES, Nov. 4, 2001, at B4, col. 1 ("Lloyd's has been staggered by heavy losses in the September 11 terrorist attacks. And now, insurance analysts, rating agencies and regulators are raising questions about Lloyd's ability to pay its share of coverage for the attacks, the worst single disaster ever for the insurance industry."). If Lloyd's is in a financial pinch because of the September 11 losses, it could of course have a significant ripple effect. For example, Lloyd's has 22 percent of the risk on the WTC properties that are the subject of the coverage litigation described in Part III of this article that, depending on how one counts occurrences, is either $ 3.6 billion or $ 7.2 billion in coverage, making Lloyd's syndicates responsible for $ 700 million or $ 1.5 billion in coverage. See also Treaster, at B4 (total Lloyd's liability for September 11 claims estimated at $ 8 billion; group of insurance regulators retains Arthur Andersen to audit Lloyd's finances for assurance).

n181 See Christopher Oster, Bouncing Back: Insurance Companies Benefit from Sept. 11, Still Seek Federal Aid, WALL ST. J., Nov. 15, 2001, at A1, col. 1.

Insurers have argued that substantial government backing is necessary to save the industry from additional calamities or the scary prospect that terrorism could become more frequent. n182 A number of proposals have surfaced, with considerable focus on one put forth by the U.S. Senate n183 and another from the House of Representatives, n184 with the White House offering a proposal more akin to the House bill. n185 Describing and commenting upon the proposals, one leading newspaper noted:

> In the Senate version, backed by the industry, insurance companies would commit their capital to a pool and if losses in any year exceed the pool, the government would be on the hook for the rest. The idea copies the British approach taken after the IRA destroyed $ 500 million of property in London in 1992. The problem is that this keeps government involved for all time and creates a new government entity (another Fannie Mae!) with great potential for mischief.

REV_00263870

For its part, the Bush administration proposes that the government reinsure the market, but only for three years. For 2002, the feds would cover 80% of terrorist claims up to $ 20 billion and 90% above $ 20 billion. The government share of the risk would decline in later years and stop altogether in 2005.

The flaw in the Bush plan is that it offers first-dollar coverage, which would leave taxpayers on the hook for most of anything Osama bin Laden does in the next year. But we still prefer a plan with a sunset provision because the problem itself is short term. The insurance industry needs more capital than it has right now to cover terrorism, and only the government has deep enough pockets. But over time the market will unfreeze--premiums for terror coverage will be priced and capital will return. n186

n182 See Christopher Oster, Reports on Insurers Covering Terrorism Stress Federal Role, WALL ST. J., Nov. 14, 2001, at A24, col. 2.

n183 The Senate bill was titled the "Terrorism Risk Insurance Act of 2001." The bill as drafted provides for a two-year program of government subsidy of excess losses from terrorism with the option of renewal for one year by the government. The subsidy of 90 percent sharing of losses would become operative when industry losses exceed $ 10 billion. During the second year of the proposed program, the attachment point would be $ 20 billion. Should terrorism losses exceed $ 100 billion, Congress would act to determine an appropriate aid or cost-sharing arrangement. As of this writing, the bill had not been formally introduced despite press coverage of the proposal. See Steven Brostoff, Federal Terrorism Bill Stalls, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Nov. 19, 2001, at 5.

n184 As of this writing, the House bill had been approved by the Financial Services Committee. See Steven Brostoff, Terrorism Insurance Loan Program Clears Committee, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Nov. 12, 2001, at 5 (describing provisions of H.R. 3210, Terrorism Risk Protection Act, and noting mixed insurer attitudes toward the bill and industry preference for Senate bill). See also Mark A. Hoffman & Roberto Ceniceros, Lukewarm response to House plan to offer loans for terrorism losses, BUS. INS., Nov. 12, 2001, at 3 (same); Jackie Spinner, Insurance Aid Plan Takes Shape; Parties Split on Repayment to U.S. for Terrorism Coverage, WASH. POST, Nov. 8, 2001, at A4. The House legislation would provide 90 percent subsidy in the form of loans for insurer terrorism losses exceeding $ 1 billion. If losses exceed $ 20 billion, policyholders would be assessed to provide coverage assistance and insurers would obtain tax breaks in order to facilitate building reserves against future losses. See Stephen Labaton, The Liability: Daschle Seeks Compromise on Aid Plan for Insurers, N.Y. TIMES, Nov. 12, 2001, at 10, col. 6. Subsequent differences between the House and the Senate prevented passage of any terror insurance legislation prior to congressional recess for the holidays. See Mark A. Hoffman, Insurers empty-handed: House, Senate impasse dooms terrorism relief bill, BUS. INS., Dec. 24, 2001/Dec. 31, 2001, at 1.

n185 This is perhaps not surprising because the primary sponsors of the House bill are Republicans generally allied with the president. Perhaps also unsurprisingly, the House bill not only addresses insurance assistance but provides for a ban on punitive damages in connection with any disputes over terrorism coverage with noneconomic damages exempted from any otherwise applicable rules of joint liability. See H.R. 3210 § 14 (b)(1), (2).

REV_00263871

n186 Editorial, Ensuring Insurance, WALL ST. J., Oct. 24, 2001, at A22, col. 2. The Senate Banking Committee version of the plan, as described in a subsequent news article, would require insurers to absorb the "first $ 10 billion in [terrorist] claims and the government would pay 90 percent of claims exceeding that [amount]." See also Oster, supra note 182, at A24, col. 2 (describing administration and other proposals in more detail); Mark A. Hoffman, White House suggests alternative to terror pool, BUS. INS., Oct. 22, 2001, at 4 (same); Stephen Labaton & Joseph B. Treaster, Bush Details Plan to Help Insurers on Future Terror Claims, N.Y. TIMES, Oct. 16, 2001, at C1, col. 2 (same).

Endorsing a government bailout/backup of private industry did not come easy to the newspaper's editorial writers, n187 but they, like insurer lobbyists, have made a colorable case for some form of government role in assuring a continued market for terrorism coverage. n188 Certainly, it seems to be a better case than existed for the airline bailout act, n189 which Congress rushed into law less than two weeks after the September 11 disaster. n190 In that instance, Congress gave short shrift to the possibility that we would all be better off if the airline crisis was handled through the bankruptcy and market systems. n191 Many think that this would have led, after some short-term discomfort, to a stronger system of consolidated, solvent carriers. n192 Irrespective of the merits of the airline bailout, the case for assistance to the insurance industry appears stronger. n193 n187 Ensuring Insurance, supra note 186:

> We would rather eat cabbage for the next 20 years than have to suggest that the insurance industry needs some government help.
> . . .
> But government does have the duty to provide for national defense, and in this case it clearly failed to deal with terrorist risk. On the other hand, any government aid must be constructed so that it doesn't put taxpayers at permanent risk.

n188 See Oster, supra note 182, at A24 (noting that reports by Weiss Ratings, Inc., Fitch Inc. and Standard & Poor's stress need for federal involvement in maintaining insurer capacity to underwrite terrorism risks.

> The reports from the ratings firms generally support the industry's contention that legislation is needed quickly because most reinsurers that normally take on some of the risk underwritten by insurers have said they will quit offering terrorism coverage after Jan. 1. About 70 percent of insurance contracts renew Jan. 1.

n189 See Stabilization Act, supra note 46, § 408(b)(3). The Act provides more than $ 5 billion in monetary aid to the airline industry and also limits airline liability to the amount of insurance in force through creating a federal cause of action for losses but making the federal action a claimant's "exclusive remedy for damages arising out of the hijacking and subsequent crashes of such flights." Id. § 408(b)(1). The Act also provides that all September 11 claims be venued in the Southern District of New York (§ 408(b)(3)), with applicable law to be that of the site where the crash occurred (§ 408(b)(2)).

n190 See id. (providing for $ 5 billion in direct financial assistance, $ 10 billion in loan

REV_00263872

(discussing possible insurance issues arising out of anthrax poisoning following September 11 tragedy).

A. Life Insurance

Life insurance, of course, is triggered if the insured life is lost in a manner not excluded by coverage. As compared to property, casualty, and health insurance, life insurance tends to have more stable risk pools and steady profits. Compared to other insurers, life insurers spend proportionately less on adjusting claims and defending claims. Their inquiry is relatively confined: Did the insured life expire? How? Is there any basis for denying coverage due to an excluded cause of death or other defense such as misrepresentation? n14 n14 See generally JEFFREY W. STEMPEL, LAW OF INSURANCE CONTRACT DISPUTES ch. 18 (2d ed. 1999 & Supp. 2002).

In the September 11 attack claims, the normal rules of life insurance were altered primarily by the difficulty of "proving" death and producing tangible physical evidence of death. Many of the bodies of the dead will never be found in any identifiable form, a consequence of the awful collapse of two huge buildings. In response, the New York State Insurance Department issued a rule providing that insurers licensed in New York "must accept affidavits from the families of those missing as proof of death when a death certificate was not readily available," with the department providing a standard form affidavit on its website. n15 n15 See Agovino, supra note 6, at 4C.

As to the possible use of the war risk exclusion, life insurers appear to be the least likely in the industry to use it and also made perhaps the strongest public assurances that they were strong enough to withstand the huge losses involved. n16 Like other industry leaders, life insurers have publicly stated that they would not invoke war risk exclusions to deny coverage. As discussed in Part VI, the war risk exclusion is unlikely to be successful even if invoked by some life insurers in response to September 11 claims. The war risk exclusion would appear to apply to any American military personnel killed in connection with retaliatory action against Taliban or terrorist organizations.

n16 See Agovino, supra note 6, at 4C (noting that financial consultant estimates that life insurers have net cash capital of $ 231 billion and that likely claims will not exceed $ 3 billion; giving example of MetLife, nation's largest life insurer, as estimating that it will pay $ 464 million in claims, a small percentage of its reserves and capital). See also Sclafane, supra note 3, at 6 (noting that another consultant estimates $ 20 billion in liability claims related to deaths, based on assumption of 10,000 deaths valued at $ 2 million per person). The actual final death toll is likely to be slightly less than 3,000. See Nationalities of victims listed/494 foreigners from 91 countries lost lives on 9/11, HOUSTON CHRON., Apr. 6, 2002, available at WL 3254505.

Unlike the more uniformly standardized policy forms found in property and casualty insurance, life insurance policies may vary considerably and frequently do not always contain a war exclusion, particularly if the policy is sold to a civilian who is not subject to a conceivable resumption of the military draft. For example, life insurance policies selected as representative for inclusion in the Insurance Professionals' Policy Kit do not contain war exclusions. n17 If nothing else, however, case law suggests that such exclusions are common in life insurance, perhaps more frequently when policies are issued or renewed during a time of open or prolonged hostilities.

n17 See, e.g., One Year Renewable and Convertible Term Life Policy, No. AM 627E1-80, reprinted in ALLIANCE OF AMERICAN INSURERS, INSURANCE PROFESSIONALS POLICY KIT (2001 ed.) at 149, 151 (suicide excluded but death from war or terrorism not excluded) guarantees, and liability limitation).

REV_00263828

Congress, of course, would regard the disappearance of airlines as a bad thing but appears to have misunderstood the consequences. Delta Airlines might, for example, fail, a prospect that Senator Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) candidly admitted was a large motivation for his vote because of the company's many workers in his state (see CONG. REC. S9594 (Sept. 21, 2001), which was a view voiced by all legislators from states with significant airline operations (see, e.g., Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich.; CONG. REC. S9595, Sept. 22, 2001). Airline failure does not, however, mean that the airplanes would disappear from the face of the earth or that other aspects of the operation would not be purchased and continue in some form or be reconstituted under a new entrepreneurial entity. Congress was concerned about airline health not only because of the role of air travel in the daily business economy but also because commercial airlines were likely to be needed in transporting soldiers and activated reservists to designated posts. See CONG. REC. S9591 (Statement of Sen. Jon Corzine (D-.N.J.) (Sept. 21, 2001) (Military officials "told us [Sen. Corzine and Sen. Robert Torricelli (D-N.J.)] that about 40 percent of the transportation that our military folks will need in a full war might be provided by our private aviation industry. The strength of that industry clearly is important for our national security.").

n191 The congressional debates on the Act suggest that legislators really did think, to pen a bad pun, that the sky was falling. Legislators appeared to believe that bankruptcy was imminent for the major airlines if financial assistance was not forthcoming. The airlines, of course, had been grounded for several days in the wake of the attacks and resumed flights were underpatronized while fixed costs of the airlines remained high, resulting in millions of dollars of losses each day. See supra note 190; see generally CONG. REC. S9590-9600 (Sept. 21, 2000).

Even though the Bankruptcy Code provides for Chapter 11 reorganization bankruptcies in which debtors can continue to operate their businesses while delaying and reducing payments to creditors, Congress must have unconsciously or implicitly believed that the airlines were in such dire straits that they could not give vendors adequate protection to continue to purchase fuel and the other necessities of operation. In addition, sufficiently dismal financial reports would require the Chapter 11 bankruptcy to be converted to a Chapter 7 liquidation bankruptcy. Under either of these scenarios, the airlines would be implicitly seen as heading for disappearance rather than as able to emerge from bankruptcy as a continuing industry.

n192 See Ensuring Insurance, supra note 186, at A22:

> We are especially sorry to have to consider government aid [for insurers] given the spending extravaganza in Washington at the moment. Any industry remotely affected by the events of September 11 has its hand out, and little of this special pleading makes any economic sense. The $ 15 billion bailout of the airline industry is a case in point. A few bankruptcies would not disturb the fact that airplanes would still be there to fly--albeit under new, and probably better, owners.

n193 See Ensuring Insurance, supra note 186, at A22:

> But property and casualty insurance is different. Unlike the airline industry, which involves hard assets, the insurance industry is a crucial part of the financial > underpinnings of the real economy. Without insurance, the real estate, construction and shipping industries would be moribund (and small businesses that are located in malls or have big landlords--florists, bookstores and shoe stores--might soon follow). Moreover, the [insurance] aid packages now being considered by Congress do not constitute a bailout in the sense that the industry has promised to pay off all claims from September 11.

REV_00263873

Before rushing to any insurance judgment along the lines of the airline bailout, insurers and policymakers need to step back and assess terrorist risks without panic even though the clock is ticking (and as of this writing may have expired in some cases) on policy renewal, reinsurance agreements, exclusionary language, and the like. n194 In particular, to determine the appropriateness and nature of any government assistance, the terror risk should be analogized to that presented by other tough risks such as flood, earthquake, or hurricane. To the extent that terrorism parallels these risks, the industry and government response should probably parallel the traditional treatment of those risks. To the extent that terrorism presents a truly more difficult risk, government aid is warranted, but only to the extent of that greater difficulty in the risk. Anything more gives insurers a bailout rather than measured assistance that can be justified by its utility to society.

n194 January 1, 2002, has been advanced as something of an absolute deadline by the insurance industry because it is the date on which many reinsurance agreements are up for renewal. If reinsurance is not renewed, the argument goes, primary and excess insurers will be unwilling or unable to write coverage for terrorism losses. Even if this insurance doomsday scenario is correct, the consequences appear manageable. Even without reinsurance, large primary or excess carriers would appear to have the capacity to write limited coverage for terrorism at higher premiums. For example, a business may not be able to get all of the terrorism coverage that it wants but can perhaps buy lower-limits terrorism coverage that will protect it from most risks. In the meantime, insurers and Congress could continue to work rationally toward a solution without undue haste.

If a second unthinkable terrorist act takes place (e.g., the Sears Tower destroyed by suicide bombers) before a considered resolution is enacted, there would be a large uninsured loss, requiring the government to step in with emergency assistance, just as the Federal Emergency Management Agency now does for society's less prominent victims of uninsured flood and tornado damage. This could be expensive, of course, but probably does not result in the federal government paying any more money than is planned under the various proposed means of assisting the insurance industry. Although insurance is an important underpinning of coverage, even a total unavailability of terrorism insurance is hardly likely to grind business to a halt. Will the tenants of the Sears Tower really stop coming to work without terrorism insurance?

Under that logic, one might initially think of the terrorist risk as something that should be addressed with a risk pool in which insurers are forced to participate as a condition of doing business, something like the hurricane and windstorm pools found in Florida or other hurricane-prone states. n195 Seven states have some form of government-sponsored windstorm plan. n196 These plans function in a manner similar to residual plans for high-risk homeowner and automobile insurance. If an individual insurer will not accept the risk, the pool takes the risk, usually at a high premium. The pool is backed by insurers on a prorated basis according to market share with the state standing in reserve should the losses in a given year threaten the pool. n197 n195 See SCOTT E. HARRINGTON & GREGORY R. NIEHAUS, RISK MANAGEMENT AND INSURANCE 584, 585-87 (1999) (describing beach and windstorm insurance coverage programs in Gulf Coast and Atlantic Coast states, with detailed description of Florida programs responding to hard market created by Hurricane Andrew); Sean F. Mooney, Are Terrorism Risks Really Uninsurable, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Oct. 22, 2001, at 49 ("terrorism coverage for single-family homes would at this point appear to not involve abnormally high catastrophic exposures, beyond that already covered for natural perils like hurricanes").

REV_00263874

n196 See HARRINGTON & NIEHAUS, supra note 195, at 584 (beach and windstorm insurance coverage programs operate in Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carlina, South Carolina, and Texas).

n197 See HARRINGTON & NIEHAUS, supra note 195, at 584 (also presenting graph of amounts of exposure for state plans) and at 585-87 (describing Florida situation, in which there is long-standing residual market mechanism of Florida Windstorm Underwriting Association/Residential Property and Casualty Joint Underwriting Association created in 1993 in the aftermath of Hurricane Andrew as the insurer of last resort and the Hurricane Catastrophe Fund that operates as reinsurer for property insurers). See also Mooney, supra note 195, at 49 (describing Hawaii Hurricane Relief Fund, which was established in the aftermath of Hurricane Iniki in 1992 but which was discontinued and implicitly deemed no longer necessary by 2000; "the fund was structured to encourage its eventual replacement by the private sector").

Another model is flood insurance. Under the National Flood Insurance Act of 1968, n198 the federal government offers flood insurance at subsidized rates on property in flood-risk zones, but only up to a relatively low limit. n199 Since 1983, the government has offered a "write-your-own" program that appears to have successfully encouraged insurers to offer flood coverage, with more than three-fourths of the nation's flood insurance being written on this basis. n200

n198 See 42 U.S.C. §§ 4011-4128 (2000).

n199 See GEORGE E. REJDA, PRINCIPLES OF RISK MANAGEMENT AND INSURANCE 192 (4th ed. 1992). Until 1978, the subsidized insurance program was operated jointly by the federal government and private insurers. In 1978, the federal government "took over the program." The limits of coverage under the emergency program for national flood insurance (as of 1992) were $ 35,000 for single-family homes and $ 10,000 for contents, with a residential structure maximum of $ 100,000. Under the "regular" program, the limits are $ 185,000 on the dwelling and $ 60,000 on contents. Id. See also HARRINGTON & NIEHAUS, supra note 195, at 581-83 (describing program); JAMES S. TRIESCHMANN & SANDRA G. GUSTAVSON, RISK MANAGEMENT & INSURANCE 244 (9th ed. 1995) (also describing program).

n200 See REJDA, supra note 199, at 192.

Under the write-your-own program, private insurers sell flood insurance under their own names, collect the premiums, retain a specified percentage for commissions and expenses, and invest the remaining premiums. The companies service the flood insurance contracts, adjust losses, and pay their own claims. If the insurers' losses are not covered by premiums and investment income, they are reimbursed for the difference. However, any profits go to the U.S. Treasury. n201 n201 REJDA, supra note 199, at 192, citing NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Nov. 11, 1983, at 2, and providing further explanation of the program at 192-93. See also TRIESCHMANN & GUSTAVSON, supra note 199, at 244 (also describing program).

Earthquake coverage is similar to flood coverage except that the insurance industry appears to have succeeded in making earthquake coverage available without direct government aid. Normally, earth movement, like flood, is excluded from the standard property policy. Specific coverage can usually be purchased at an additional premium except in certain high-risk areas. n202 After the 1994 Northridge earthquake, California established the California Earthquake Authority, a state-run but privately financed plan to insure against earthquakes. n203

REV_00263875

> In essence, each participating insurer can write CEA earthquake policies, keep a portion of the premium for administrative expenses, and have the risk borne by the CEA. . . . The CEA can obtain up to $ 10.5 billion from various sources to pay claims (in addition to the premium revenue from CEA earthquake policies). Given its capital sources, the CEA can be viewed as a pooling arrangement among participating insurers. n204 n202 See HARRINGTON & NIEHAUS, supra note 195, at 581.

n203 See HARRINGTON & NIEHAUS, supra note 195, at 587-88 (describing California program).

n204 See HARRINGTON & NIEHAUS, supra note 195, at 587-88.

For thirty years, the federal government has helped to facilitate the acceptance and pooling of hurricane, flood, and earthquake risks. This approach appears to have succeeded in prompting private insurers to write coverage, even where the risk involved is equivalent to the awful losses of September 11. n205 The subsidy approach is, of course, subject to criticism in that it arguably encourages unwise activity such as building in hurricane-, flood-, or earthquake-prone areas. Any subsidy program poses this danger: it involves the government assisting in activities that make so little economic sense that the private market would discourage or even prohibit them.

n205 See HARRINGTON & NIEHAUS, supra note 195, at 587, n.8 (if an earthquake with the intensity of the 1906 San Francisco earthquake were to hit populated areas of California today, potential losses "[would be] higher than $ 50 billion," a figure in accord with loss estimates for the September 11 tragedy). See text and accompanying notes 3-4, supra (discussing estimates of September 11 losses). Similarly, one can argue that because the government did not act to bail insurers out of the problems created by asbestos liability that exceeded the September 11 liability, then the government should be similarly reluctant to engage in terror insurance intervention. See Towers Perrin Reinsurance, September 11, 2001: Implications for the Insurance Industry, Sept. 26, 2001, at 5 (total insurer losses from asbestos liability of approximately $ 120 billion, $ 55 to $ 65 billion of which fell upon U.S. insurers). Asbestos liability, however, accumulated over time, giving insurers opportunities for gradual or phased response, while future terrorism losses could be rapid and unanticipated, as were the September 11 losses.

Government backing of "terrorism insurance" presents no real analogy to this problem except perhaps in rare circumstances. Terrorism coverage seems not to encourage the type of moral hazard or adverse selection posed by government efforts to facilitate hurricane, flood, or earthquake insurance. If these programs are defensible, some government role in fostering a market for terrorism coverage seems defensible. But the seeming comparability of these risks suggests that government programs aimed at terrorism coverage need not be more grand or generous than those existing for hurricane, flood, or earthquake risks. n206

n206 Arguably, the better case can be made for doing less in the arena of terrorism coverage and letting the proverbial chips fall where they may upon private insurers. See Morgan

REV_00263876

Stanley Equity Research North America, Insurance-Property-Casualty Bulletin, Sept. 17, 2001, at 12:

> There is a history of unsuccessful outcomes to ponder when Congress has interfered, with the best of intentions, to prop up insolvent financial institutions that got themselves in trouble through poor risk management. The savings and loan crisis comes to mind.
> . . .
> Anytime managements are allowed to make bad risk management decisions and escape the consequences, a precedent is set and lessons are learned. In the case of insurance, two unfortunate consequences result: 1) customers learn not to discriminate--that is, pay for--the value of good risk management and strong ratings, driving down margins so that returns support only the lowest common denominator; 2) some managements learn there are no bad consequences for bad behavior, and take more risk, threatening the system and ultimately increasing costs to everyone.
>
> The insurance business already suffers greatly from the fact that buyers do not discriminate adequately between companies with good and bad claims-paying ratings, and good and bad balance sheets. Now, a time has finally arrived in which the sheep and goats of the industry will be separated. It would be unfortunate if the sheep acquiesced with or even encouraged an effort by Congress to dress up the goats to look like sheep.

Some have argued that terrorism presents a bigger problem than other tough risks, at least right now because capacity is already strained by the September 11 attack. n207 In addition, weaker reinsurers will be strained, perhaps unable to pay claims, and subject to failure from the shock of these losses. n208 At least in the short term, and perhaps over the longer term as well, it has been argued that terrorism is simply too hard to underwrite because of its unpredictability and the lack of a historical actuarial record upon which to cost out the risk of exposure to terrorism. n209 One arguable analogy is the United Kingdom, which established a terrorism reinsurance program (Pool Re) in response to IRA attacks. n210 Of course, weather is unpredictable, too. But while we do not know when and where the next tornado will hit, insurers can average out the risk over time and collect a premium sufficient to protect themselves provided the risk is pooled and distributed.

n207 See Ensuring Insurance, supra note 186, at A22:

> The costs of another terrorist attack would be beyond the capacity of industry to bear. Right now, without paying any claims, the industry has about $ 300 billion in capital, but the capital of the firms that are most exposed comes to between $ 80 billion and $ 100 billion. If the total claims arising from September 11 amount to anything near the high end of the estimate--$ 100 billion--then bid goodbye to almost one-third of the industry.

n208 See Insurance-Property-Casualty Bulletin, supra note 206, at 6 (because of September 11 attacks, "capacity of the reinsurance market worldwide to take risk, currently around $ 120 billion annually of premium, will shrink significantly,--perhaps by one-third or more"). See also id. at 7 (Lloyd's syndicates may be particularly vulnerable because of "habit of reinsuring internally").

REV_00263877

n209 See Ensuring Insurance, supra note 186, at A22:

> The risk of more terrorist acts cannot be quantified at the moment, thus premiums for terror coverage can't be priced. The abominable events of September 11 were the largest human-made disaster the industry has ever seen. Until that date, the probability of terrorism was considered so low that coverage was included as a "give-away"--it was neither priced in premiums nor charged for--and no capital was set aside to pay for it. By now, although the probability of another terrorist attack is high, actuaries cannot quantify the risk.

n210 See September 11, 2001: Implications for the Insurance Industry, supra note 205, at 10 (analogizing U.K. program to U.S. flood insurance program).

In addition, the insurance industry has shown itself capable of underwriting other difficult risks without government assistance, although often not to the extent desired by policyholders or at prices deemed attractive by policyholders. There have also been occasionally severe shortages or unavailability of coverage. For example, during the mid-1970s, there was the medical malpractice "crisis." During the 1980s, there was a generally hard market noted for "crises" in product liability insurance, pollution, and D & O liability coverage. n211 n211 See Sarah Veysey, Lloyd's can absorb loss, BUS. INS., Oct. 1, 2001, at 1.

Without minimizing the seriousness of these problems, it appears that insurance markets have largely surmounted them. Various state governments actively assisted the formation of new carriers and the continuation of existing underwriting to provide medical malpractice coverage during the 1970s. But today, this coverage is largely provided by the private sector with some state government involvement through risk pools and physicians' catastrophe funds. A federal program of subsidized medical malpractice insurance has not been implemented, notwithstanding the difficulty and expense of medical malpractice insurance during the past thirty years.

Similarly, the perceived product liability insurance crises prompted unsuccessful efforts to federalize product liability law and some talk of federal aid on the insurance front. Instead, insurers and brokers worked to establish new carriers (e.g., Ace Ltd. and XL) n212 and policies (claims-made policies in lieu of the traditional occurrence policy) as well as to revise standard policies. Product liability insurance again became widely available, although at generally higher prices even during the largely soft market of the 1990s.

n212 See Christopher Oster, supra note 181, at A1, col. 1, and A17, col. 5 ("In the mid-1980s, [Marsh & McLennan] launched Ace Ltd. and Exel Capital, now known as XL. Those moves came in response to some established insurers ceasing to write liability coverage in the wake of huge jury awards for asbestos-related illnesses and big judgments against corporate directors and officers. Both Ace and XL went on to become publicly traded. Marsh retains small stakes in them."). Legislation enacted largely during the 1980s also facilitated the formation of risk retention groups and captive insurers.

The hard 1980s market for D & O insurance was a less extreme parallel of the product liability situation. The law of corporate director liability was seen as expanding too rapidly by many, n213 prompting D & O insurers to hike premiums or refuse to write coverage n214

REV_00263878

(and also prompting reluctance to take director posts). n215 State governments responded with remedial protective legislation. n216 Courts responded (although perhaps not consciously) by not aggressively expanding the potential new frontiers of liability. n217 Insurers responded with more careful underwriting practices and higher premiums. n218 D & O insurance is today not cheap but it is widely available, without significant government assistance.

n213 See, e.g., Smith v. Van Gorkom, 488 A.2d 858 (Del. 1985) (holding directors liable for insufficient vetting of proposed merger arranged by CEO); ROBERT W. HAMILTON, CORPORATIONS INCLUDING PARTNERSHIPS AND LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANIES; CASES AND MATERIALS 789 (7th ed. 2001) ("Response of the corporate bar to Van Gorkom was one of shocked incredulity," with many commentators suggesting that the decision had gutted protections directors previously enjoyed under the business judgment rule. Id. at 780-81.).

n214 The hard market in D & O insurance was not solely the result of any one case or doctrinal development, even when the case was one of Delaware law, a key jurisdiction for corporate governance matters. See HAMILTON, supra note 213, at 781, n.22:

> The decision in Van Gorkom was handed down during a "liability insurance crisis" in the United States. During this period insurance companies writing liability insurance in a variety of areas were reducing their exposure by reducing coverage limits, increasing premiums, and declining entirely to insure specific risks. Directors' and officers' liability insurance was involved in this process, and some of the activities described in the text may have been the consequence of the difficulties some companies were experiencing in obtaining or maintaining acceptable levels of liability insurance for their directors.

See also Tamar Lewin, Director Insurance Drying Up, N.Y. TIMES, Mar. 7, 1986, at D1, col. 3; William Glaberson, Liability Rates Flattening Out as Crisis Eases, N.Y. TIMES, Feb. 9, 1987, at A1, col. 5 (both cited by Hamilton).

n215 See Robert W. Hamilton, Reliance and Liability Standards for Outside Directors, 24 WAKE FOREST L. REV. 5, 28-29 (1989).

n216 See, e.g., DEL. GEN. CORP. LAW § 102(b)(7) (2000) (providing that corporation may by specific provision in certificate of incorporation eliminate or limit personal liability of director for breach of fiduciary duty, provided that director may still remain liable where there is breach of duty of loyalty, bad faith, violation of statutory provisions on dividends, or director improperly derives personal benefit). See also MODEL BUSINESS CORPORATION ACT § 2.02(b)(4) (1990 revision to Act) (similar provision reacting to Van Gorkom). As of 1999, "43 states had adopted statutes similar either to this section or to Del. CGL § 102(b)(7)." See HAMILTON, supra note 213, at 782.

n217 See, e.g., Cede & Co., Cinerama, Inc. v. Technicolor, Inc., 634 A. 2d 345 (Del. 1993) (finding no basis for plaintiff recovery merely because of director negligence or breach of duty; plaintiff must also show causality and damages).

n218 See William Glaberson, Liability Rates Flattening Out as Crisis Eases, N.Y. TIMES, Feb. 9, 1987, at A1, col. 5. The insurance industry also responded with the formation of new carriers better equipped to take on the D & O risk. See Oster, supra note 181, at A17, col. 5 (broker Marsh & McLennan formed Ace and XL insurers for this purpose as well as to provide high excess products coverage).

REV_00263879

Pollution coverage is a similar story. The standard CGL was revised to eliminate coverage for any pollution liability, without even the prior exception for sudden and accidental pollution. Although pollution coverage is not cheap or always easy to obtain, policyholders can buy back such coverage or purchase environmental impairment coverage, usually on a claims-made basis to avoid the problems of underwriting this risk on an occurrence basis. Although the government has not offered to be the pollution insurer of last resort (for the seemingly obvious reason that it does not want to encourage pollution), it arguably has done this indirectly through the Superfund program.

Distilled to its essence, the crucial question regarding government aid to insurers is whether terrorism is really all that distinct from these other tough risks. Determining which risk terrorism most resembles suggests the appropriate role--or nonrole--of government backing. The implicit view of the Bush administration and some commentators is that in the long term, terrorism can be underwritten, perhaps without the seemingly permanent government-backed protection seen with hurricane, flood, and earthquake insurance or with only state-by-state government intervention. n219 The necessary assumptions here are that government and society will obtain a better grasp of the terrorism problem and that insurers will acquire expertise sufficient to underwrite the risk. n220 This view assumes that the next several years will see a disabling of foreign powers that support terrorism, curtailment of terrorist funding, better intelligence, increasingly effective antiterror technology, and generally better homeland security (e.g., airport screeners who are competent and not engaged in illegal activities). This may be a necessary condition if effective insurer underwriting is to occur. If terrorism is contained, a track record will develop for which actuaries can make calculations based on a world of episodic but not overwhelming terrorist threat. n221 n219 See Ensuring Insurance, supra note 186, at A22. For example, perhaps New York, Illinois, and California will need to be more interventionist than Kansas, Missouri, and the Dakotas in view of the high concentration of potential terrorism targets in those skyscraperladen states with substantial urban commercial concentrations.

n220 Other respected commentators have argued that perhaps no government aid is needed for insurers. See Robert B. Reich, Subsidies Aren't a Wartime Necessity, WALL ST. J., Oct. 16, 2001, at A26, col. 4 (criticizing airline bailout and arguing against assistance requested by other businesses):

> The insurance industry has a somewhat stronger case. It's not seeking compensation for terrorist-induced losses, nor protection against future losses that it could otherwise cover. It wants protection against possible future claims so large and unpredictable as to be difficult to assess in advance--in effect, a new capacity it can't provide. Still, some skepticism may be in order. After all, insurers are in the business of assessing risk and setting premiums accordingly; it's hard to imagine why no insurer or reinsurer is capable of doing this for future terrorist attacks.

n221 See Mooney, supra note 195, at 49 (Mooney suggests caution before labeling terrorism an uninsurable risk. "Terrorism as such is now 'perceived' to be uninsurable. Prior to September 11 the perception was radically different--the coverage was practically given away. Even after September 11, it can be argued that not all terrorism acts need be viewed as uninsurable.").

If the campaign against terrorism is not particularly successful, the underwriting job is harder but perhaps not impossible. Even in a world where September 11 horrors take place with some frequency, insurers can control their exposure through policy limits, site-specific underwriting (e.g., willingness to insure the Bugtussle Mall but not the John Hancock building), large deductibles or self-insured retentions, very high premiums (for those unwilling to go bare or self-insure), and tailored exclusions. For example, a reasonable property insurer may be willing to cover the John Hancock building for everything but attacks by hijacked aircraft if the policyholder can demonstrate adequate protection against car bombers, ninja-like ground attackers, and demolition terrorists. In that case, the building may be "uninsurable" for hijacking attacks without a government program but there would still exist a de facto government program for airport security (regardless of who provides the security worker with a W-2 form) and military interdiction where commercial planes violate no-fly zones around major cities with skyscrapers that may be terrorist targets.

REV_00263880

Before making any long-term decisions about the government role in relation to terrorism coverage, policymakers should remember the rationale for assisting insurers in the first place. The goal is not to help insurers because they face financial difficulty but to assist insurers so that insurance will be available to permit business and society to continue to operate productively. If terrorism coverage can indeed continue to be offered at even high prices, it may be wiser to simply treat this as a cost of doing business. Notwithstanding the difficulties posed by September 11, one source estimates that during 2002 the cost of risk to corporations per $ 1,000 of revenue will be $ 9.42 as compared to a range of $ 5.20 to $ 8.30 during the last decade. n222 Although every dollar counts to the cost-conscious corporation, these figures can be read as suggesting that insurance rates will rise by something less than one-half of one percent even without government subsidies. This is hardly a compelling case for much of a bailout. Although there will be particularly hard segments of the insurance market, something modest and temporary seems more in order.

n222 Robert P. Harwig, 2002: Capitalism At Its Best (and Worst), NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Nov. 19, 2001, at 25 (presenting Prudential Securities estimates from 2000 Risk and Insurance Management Society Estimates).

One potentially positive aspect of the September 11 horror for the future of insurance underwriting is that property and liability insurers may assume the role that boiler and machinery insurers have long held--using the underwriting process to increase the safety of the policyholder's operations. With boiler and machinery insurance, the policyholder not only gets coverage but also gets the expert safety inspection of the boiler or other equipment. In the early twentieth century and to a continued extent, Underwriters Laboratories, a company begun by insurers to assist in reducing risk, improved the safety of electrical appliances by testing as a condition of insurability. Today's insurers might take a similar approach and require that policyholders demonstrate reasonable counterterrorism measures as a condition of obtaining insurance or price premiums aggressively according to the policyholder's self-protection against terrorism.

Under this scenario, it seems plausible that insurers can indeed still write some sort of terror coverage and make money, provided that they dodge the bullet of another WTC disaster before policies are renewed and increased premiums collected. If government backing is necessary, it may be required for as little as a year or two. Despite the depressing litany of terrorist incidents noted in Part VI of this article, including the 1993 bombing of the same WTC destroyed on September 11, insurers continued to write terrorism coverage at no cost (assuming that one accepts that the standard war risk exclusion is not a terrorism exclusion, even for the mega-terrorism of September 11). One can therefore argue with some force that, notwithstanding the cries for aid, insurers will provide some risk distribution and management options for terrorism. n223 Before adopting a permanent legislative approach to the problem, the United States would do well to study insurance activity in Israel, Britain, and Northern Ireland, all of which have faced substantial terrorist activity and continued to persevere with a modern economy. n224 n223 One can argue that despite the September 11 loss, the event was a financially positive one for the insurance industry as a whole. See Oster, supra note 181, at A1, col. 1 (brokers and investment bankers forming insurance companies to take advantage of business opportunities provided by September 11 disaster), and at A17, col. 2 (Marsh & McLennan CEO Jeffrey W. Greenberg, then at insurer AIG, was criticized for opportunism when in 1992 he described Hurricane Andrew destruction as presenting business prospects for insurers ("an opportunity to get price increases now") but history proved him correct notwithstanding Florida regulators' temporary moratorium on rate increases when Greenberg's memo was leaked); Henny Sender & Chrisopher Oster, Insurers Have Easy Time Raising Money, WALL ST. J., Oct. 24, 2001, at C1, col. 3; Thomas K. Meakin, Insurers Still Standing After WTC Attack, NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Oct. 22, 2001, at 28 (demonstrating that despite fall in stock prices in the wake of September 11, many insurers remain quite solvent); Andrew Ross Sorkin & Joseph B. Treaster, 2 Private Firms Taking Stake in Casualty Insurer, N.Y. TIMES, Oct. 24, 2001, at C1, col. 2. See also Morgan Stanley, World Trade Center Special Issue, EQUITY RESEARCH N.A., Sept. 17, 2001 (suggesting that weaker insurers and reinsurers may be brought down by September 11 losses but that stronger carriers will benefit from the shakeout due to a predicted "flight to quality" by buyers in coming policy placements).

REV_00263881

n224 See Mooney, supra note 195, at 49:

> Pool Re in the United Kingdom, designed to provide terrorism coverage in that country, allowed for the growth of a competitive private sector, and, prior to September 11, Pool Re had contracted substantially.
>
> In summary, the potential risk of terrorism appears to be too much for the existing insurance system to handle. Hence, there is a clear role for the federal government to act to avoid a financial calamity.
>
> However, this role should be carefully circumscribed and include strong incentives for the early reentry of private sector mechanisms for risk transfer.

See also Mazier, supra note 64, at 46, 48 (New York insurance coverage attorney notes that U.K. terrorism had damage of far lower magnitude than September 11 attack).

But on the proverbial other hand, insurers can also argue that twenty-first century terrorism is different. n225 It includes not only the elements of past terrorism (hate, ignorance, weapons, willingness to die for a cause no matter how bizarre, theological if warped commitment to the cause, aid and sanctuary from nations that wish to use the terrorist for political purposes) but also a new level of organization. Now the suicidal fanatic has learned to fly and through the support of a far-flung and well-heeled network is better able to infiltrate the target society and move undetected. Josef Stalin once grimly but accurately observed that a single death is a tragedy but a million deaths is a statistic. Paradoxically, terrorism has moved from an ability to inflict tragic but relatively contained losses to the threat of massive and mind- and emotion-numbing losses.

n225 See Calmetta Coleman, *Buffett Says Insurers Made Mistake on Terror as Berkshire Posts Loss, WALL ST. J., Nov. 12, 2001, at B3, col. 4 (billionaire investor Warren Buffett, head of Berkshire Hathaway, states in letter to shareholders that Berkshire's insurance operations made "'huge mistake' by not anticipating the need to collect extra premium for terrorist acts, and he outlined plans to revamp underwriting practices"). Although noting the seriousness of terrorism, Buffett's letter implicitly suggests that insurers can cover terrorism

REV_00263882

[hereinafter POLICY KIT]. See also Flexible-Premium (Universal) Life Insurance Policy, Form 7-82 MIAC, reprinted in POLICY KIT at 171, 177 (no war exclusion found in policy form).

B. Health Insurance

Many of those requiring medical care in the wake of the disaster were undoubtedly insured. Perhaps surprisingly, some health insurance policies contain war exclusions. n18 Generally, however, medical insurance is thought not to frequently contain war exclusions or to be subject to coverage defenses based on the war risk exclusion, although the presence of such an exclusion would be consistent with general insurance principles.

n18 See Major Medical Expense Policy No. IA 5710, reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 139, 142 ("We will not pay benefits for any charges incurred as a result of: . . . 3. war, declared or undeclared, or any act thereof.").

C. Property Insurance

First-party property insurance generally applies to loss caused by "direct physical loss" to covered property. n19 There would appear to be unquestionable coverage for the loss of the WTC towers and their contents (including company records but not currency or negotiable instruments), as well as for the physical damage to surrounding property due to the airplane collisions. Even if a resistant (and politically tone-deaf) court were to find the collapse of the towers to be only an indirect result of the attack, the more immediate cause of the collapse was the fire that weakened the steel frame of the buildings--and fire is an unquestionably covered cause of loss in property policies. n20 But, as with other policies, the typical property policy contains a war risk exclusion that could potentially be invoked. n21 In addition, standard property insurance typically excludes coverage for loss resulting from enforcement of the laws, government action, nuclear hazard, utility failures, n22 or business income losses stemming from utility service interruption. n23 n19 See, e.g., Building and Personal Property Coverage Form, CP 00 10 06 95 (ISO 1994), reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 185 ("We will pay for direct physical loss of or damage to Covered Property."). Renters' insurance will present issues similar to those found with real property insurance policies. See Jay Romano, A Lesson in Catastrophe, and Renter's Insurance, N.Y. TIMES, Oct. 4, 2001, at C1. In the aftermath of the attacks, at least one property insurance coverage dispute has arisen related to the mechanics of contracting and adding property to coverage. See Damien Tomlinson, *Aussie firm seeks cover for WTC loss, BUS. INS., Nov. 26, 2001, at 19 (Westfield Holdings Ltd., insured by Zurich, a developer of a WTC shopping mall, signed lease in July 2001 and claims coverage as automatically added property under blanket policy; Zurich contests). This type of dispute regarding covered items and effective dates is not peculiar to property insurance and may appear in slightly different form with other lines of insurance as well.

n20 Insurance law generally follows the concept of "efficient proximate cause" in determining the cause (or causes) of a loss. The determination of cause of loss is a function of both the cause nearest the loss and the dominant cause of the loss. When that determination is made, coverage then turns on whether the proximate cause (or concurrent proximate causes) is covered under the applicable policy. See STEMPEL, supra note 14, §§ 7.01-7.02. New York adheres particularly closely to this approach with an emphasis on the cause nearest the loss in time and space. See text and accompanying notes 65-75, infra. In the case of the towers, one can make a strong case that fire was both the cause nearest the loss in time and the dominant cause of the loss in connection with the collapse of the buildings. Although the terrorist suicide hijacking is clearly a cause-in-fact of the loss, the loss is not necessarily excluded under prevailing insurance law, even where the policy contains a terrorism exclusion, unless the exclusion is broadly worded enough to encompass remote or less significant causes.

REV_00263829

if they underwrite it correctly at an adequate premium. In effect, an arguable financial genius suggests no need for an extensive government role in assisting insurers in order to maintain terrorism coverage. Buffett's assessment also implicitly accepts the view that the standard war risk exclusions (that were undoubtedly contained in the Berkshire and General Re policies) do not preclude coverage for terrorism losses.

In the sense of now having potentially great magnitude, twenty-first century terrorism looks like a hurricane, flood, or earthquake. But these natural disasters, because of their very dispersion, seldom hit the wealthiest pockets of society. Many floods are in rural areas, as are earthquakes. Hurricanes often wreak the greatest havoc on areas of light development and population. When this is not the case, of course, the quantum of loss becomes industry threatening. Hurricane Andrew was the worst hurricane not because of its strength but because it hit Miami. Similarly, the Northridge earthquake was not the strongest earthquake but did the most damage because it took place in populated, developed, wealthy southern California. By their nature, terrorist attacks in the United States are likely to be aimed at population centers, particularly at landmarks, which tend to involve higher property damage and business losses.

Insurers can thus argue that terrorism has moved to a sufficiently higher-order magnitude with greater dispersion because of this potential intensity. In effect, a severe act of terrorism becomes a vertical hurricane, earthquake, or flood and therefore becomes the type of correlated risk that the private sector cannot underwrite alone. n226 Although not "war" in the classic sense or within the meaning of the standard war risk exclusion, it is warlike in its correlation and severity as well as in its unpredictability. If one accepts this view, a long-term or permanent government commitment to helping spur terrorism coverage that functions similarly to windstorm, flood, and earthquake programs may be justified.

n226 See Christopher E. Mandel, Impact of attacks felt across all lines, BUS. INS., Oct. 15, 2001, at 10.

What seems unjustified, except in only the shorted immediate term, is first-dollar or unlimited government coverage of terrorism losses. n227 The September 11 losses are different largely because they are so big. Prior to September 11, the insurance industry showed that it could absorb "little" terrorism losses and did so without apparent increase in premium. If the government starts picking up the terrorism tab from dollar one and does so to the full extent of the loss, it essentially bails out insurers with little in return. Even if this government underwriting is not at the 100 percent level, it would remain an unwarranted gift to the insurance industry. Government coverage at 90 percent or 80 percent levels is essentially the same thing, even at a level in excess of $ 10 billion of industry losses.

n227 See Mooney, supra note 195, at 49 (suggesting that after initial emergency role for government, insurers should be able to underwrite terrorism risks. "Can risk of $ 40 billion be transferred in the private sector of the U.S. economy? Yes, if the correct mechanisms are in place. For perspective, the stock market transfers the financial risks of corporations every day.").

One searches the trade literature in vain for any notion of how the industry or its congressional supporters derived these high percentages of required government subsidy. One could as easily argue for 50-50 cost sharing of high excess losses, although even this more reasonable figure has a pulled-from-thin-air quality. Perhaps a more studied analysis of insurance industry finances would show that far less government assistance is required or that the attachment point for such aid should be considerably higher (e.g., $ 25 billion). The burden in calculating and defending this figure, however, should be placed upon insurers. Until the amount of needed assistance is clearly demonstrated, government aid should be only what is necessary to keep the market functioning in some form. Because of looming reinsurance treaty renewal dates, some action is inevitable, but policymakers should not be stampeded into doing more than what is necessary.

REV_00263883

A rush to judgment toward excessive government generosity, as occurred in the airline bailout, would be a particularly unwise move by Congress. n228 Insurers and risk managers have made a strong case regarding the seriousness of the problem and a reasonably compelling case for having at least an emergency program in place in time for the next round of reinsurance renewals. n229 However, the short-term triage required for generally healthy insurers whose future looks brighter than their past hardly calls for the immediate establishment of a long-term government program of high loss subsidy. Quick action may be needed to preserve some semblance of coverage in the short term. There is no need to lock the United States into a massive program of insurance subsidies until the situation is better studied, understood, and steadied.

n228 As of this writing, Congress has yet to enact either a temporary or a permanent program for backing terrorism insurance. See Hoffman, supra note 184, at 1 (House-Senate disagreements prevent passage of legislation during 2001); Mark A. Hoffman, Insurers still await action by Congress, BUS. INS., Nov. 26, 2001, at 3. See also Steven Brostoff, Timing, Suspicion Hurts Insurers in D.C., NAT'L UNDERWRITER (Property & Casualty ed.), Dec. 3, 2001, at 41 (offering explanation for difference between swift congressional aid for airlines and other industries as contrasted with greater reluctance to aid insurers; explaining part of the difference as congressional regret from acting hastily and too generously on behalf of airlines); text and accompanying notes 40-45, supra (describing airline assistance legislation).

n229 See Editorial, Industry must lobby Congress now on terrorism coverage, BUS. INS., Nov. 12, 2001, at 8 (noting industry preference for Senate bill and arguing that situation is urgent):

> All in the insurance industry are holding their breath, waiting to see what federal law-makers will do next.
>
> The question of whether and how the U.S. government will alleviate the burden of insuring future terrorism risks is central to nearly all impending discussions of renewals among buyers and sellers of commercial insurance and reinsurance. Renewal negotiations must begin soon for 2002 programs to be completed by Jan. 1, but without knowing how the government might step in, it is impossible to discuss pricing and capacity for terrorism insurance. This looming question also creates uncertainty for all other coverage discussions.
>
> . . .
>
> The Senate approach is preferable because it would provide only catastrophic protection. It also would call for the government to provide true coverage of losses rather than simply loans with potentially onerous repayment terms, as under the House measure.

See also Jane Merriman, Insurers pressured as WTC bill heads toward $ 70bln, REUTERS ENGLISH NEWS SERV., Oct. 16, 2001, available at Westlaw ALLNEWSPLUS database; Dave Lenckus, Airports lose terror cover, BUS. INS., Oct. 1, 2001, at 1. There were many individual insurer acts of retrenchment. For example, in the immediate aftermath of the attacks, the St. Paul Companies sent a notice to its agents and brokers imposing a moratorium on writing any new business in the New York metropolitan area. The Lloyd's Underwriting Association on September 17, 2001, issued a General Notice of Cancellation of Hull War Risks to the members of its market Insurance Brokers Committee designed to effect notice as of September 19, 2001, and to provide for cancellation of these risks as soon as permitted by respective contracts of coverage.

REV_00263884

Source: News & Business > News > News Group File, Most Recent Two Years ⓘ
Terms: loss and "terrorism insurance" and loss and hurricane and billion (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Thursday, September 12, 2002 - 9:14 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

n21 See, e.g., Causes of Loss, Basic Form, No. CP 10 10 06 95 (ISO 1995), reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 220, 222 (bold in original):

> 1. We will not pay for loss or damage caused directly or indirectly by any of the following. Such loss or damage is excluded regardless of any other cause or event that contributes concurrently or in any sequence to the loss.
>
> . . .
> f. War and Military Action
> (1) War, including undeclared or civil war;
> (2) Warlike action by a military force, including action in hindering or defending an actual or expected attack by any government, sovereign or other authority using military personnel or other agents.
> (3) Insurrection, rebellion, revolution, usurped power, or action taken by governmental authority in hindering or defending against any of these.

n22 See id. at 221, excluding coverage for losses resulting from:

> a. Ordinance or Law
> The enforcement of any ordinance or law:
> (1) Regulating the construction, use or repair of any property; or > (2) Requiring the tearing down of any property, including the cost of removing its debris.
>
> This exclusion, Ordinance or Law, applies whether the loss results from:
> (1) An ordinance or law that is enforced even if the property has not been damaged; or > (2) The increased costs incurred to comply with an ordinance or law in the course of construction, repair, renovation, remodeling or demolition of property, or removal of its debris, following a physical loss to that property.
> . . .
> c. Governmental Action
> Seizure or destruction of property by order of governmental authority.
> But we will pay for loss or damage caused by or resulting from acts of destruction ordered by governmental authority and taken at the time of a fire to prevent its spread, if the fire would be covered under this Coverage part.
> d. Nuclear Hazard
> Nuclear reaction or radiation, or radioactive contamination, however caused.
> But if nuclear reaction or radiation, or radioactive contamination, results in fire, we will pay for the loss or damage caused by that fire.
>
> e. Utility Services
> The failure of power or other utility service supplied to the described premises, however caused, if the failure occurs away from the described premises.
>
> But if the failure of power or other utility service results in a Covered Cause of Loss, we will pay for the loss or damage caused by that Covered Cause of Loss.
>
> This exclusion does not apply to the Business Income coverage or to Extra

REV_00263830

Expense coverage. Instead, the Special Exclusion in paragraphs b.3.a(1) applies to these coverages.

n23 See, e.g., id. at 222 (excluding business income coverage from loss of utility services unless utility failure brings about another, covered cause of loss).

D. Business Interruption

Business interruption, also referred to as business income or BI, coverage is usually sold as an adjunct to property coverage but is also sold separately. Such coverage typically provides payments for lost earnings (and sometimes payroll, rent, insurance premiums, utility bills, and taxes) to businesses that are forced to close or slow down significantly due to a covered first-party property loss. n24 The September 11 attacks present pronounced business interruption claims because most of the property damage occurred in the core of one of the world's leading business centers. n25 Unlike other large historical losses from earthquakes or hurricanes, virtually all destruction on September 11 affected commercial enterprises.

n24 See STEMPEL, supra note 14, at ch. 15; Andrew M. Reidy & Robert L. Carter, Insurance Law: Business Interruption, NAT'L L.J., Oct. 1, 2001, at A23.

n25 See Dave Lenckus, Securities firms seek coverage for shutdown: Claims will test interruption provisions, BUS. INS., Nov. 5, 2001, at 1; Sylvia Hsieh, 'Business Interruption' Claims Soar in Terrorist Aftermath, LAW. WKLY. USA, Oct. 29, 2001, at 1.

To some extent, business interruption coverage issues will resemble straight property loss claims in that any claim excluded under the basic property policy is likely to be excluded under the business interruption coverage. n26 In addition, business interruption coverage has additional prerequisites that must be satisfied. Such policies typically require a "necessary suspension" of the business "operations" due to the loss for a "period of restoration" of the physical damage." n27 At a minimum, the towers themselves and surrounding businesses near the Ground Zero area that were physically damaged would appear to meet this prong of coverage. n28 Beyond this, the precise contours of business interruption coverage are harder to ascertain and may vary considerably by policy, policyholder, and situation. n29 n26 Some policies may, however, provide business interruption coverage, even when there is no physical loss to covered property. See, e.g., Sloan v. Phoenix of Hartford Ins. Co., 207 N.W.2d 434 (Mich. Ct. App. 1973) (coverage for movie theater that, although undamaged itself, was closed due to curfew imposed in response to urban riots). See text and accompanying note infra.

n27 See Business Income and Extra Expense Coverage Form, No. CP 00 30 06 95, reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 237.

n28 See Reidy & Carter, supra note 24, at A23; Hsieh, supra note 25, at 21 ("'If you were in the World Trade Center, there's no question you had a direct physical loss. But if a guy owns a sandwich shop or dry cleaner 12 blocks away, and his place is covered in half a foot of crud, does he have a direct physical loss?'," quoting policyholder attorney Lorelie Masters, who also noted possibility of separately applicable policy provisions concerning dust and debris.).

n29 See Susanne Sclafane, FC&S Ponders Business Income Claims, NAT'L UNDERWRITER, Oct. 8, 2001, at 51 (recording in-house discussion/debate of staff members at Fidelity Casualty & Surety regarding existence of business interruption coverage under variant scenarios from WTC loss with substantial disagreement and uncertainty). See, e.g., Two Caesars Corp. v. Jefferson Ins. Co., 280 A.2d 305 (D.C. 1971) (policy language provided for coverage for riot losses if there was direct physical damage to insured property; no coverage where business was lost due to government curfew occasioned by physical damage to property of others stemming from urban riots triggered by assassination of Martin Luther King).

REV_00263831

A common standard BI form does provide limited BI coverage from restricted access to the insured business because of physical damage that occurs but is not on the policyholder's premises. n30 This type of coverage usually requires a seventy-two-hour waiting period and typically carries a common benefit limit of $ 250,000 for up to three weeks of such closure. n31 For example, the Reagan National Airport serving Washington, D.C., was closed by government order for nearly a month after the September 11 attacks. Businesses at the airport probably have coverage under this policy provision but perhaps not nearly enough to provide full indemnity. After reopening, traffic was down at Reagan and other airports. This continuing, long-term business slowdown may become the subject of claims for additional coverage but the policyholder is unlikely to prevail unless it obtained special BI endorsements or an uncapped amount of benefits. n32 n30 See Hsieh, supra note 25, at 21 (noting property insurance coverage for "contingent business interruption" when policyholder's business is disrupted by direct physical loss to supplier or customer and that this type of coverage "has the potential to apply across the country," according to one policyholder attorney).

n31 See Business Income and Extra Expense Coverage Form, No. CP 00 30 06 95, reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 238:

> . . .
> b. Civil Authority. We will pay for the actual loss of Business Income you sustain and necessary Extra Expense caused by action of civil authority that prohibits access to the described premises due to direct physical loss of or damage to property, other than at the described premises, caused by or resulting from any Covered Cause of Loss.
>
> The coverage for Business Income will begin seventy-two hours after the time of that action and will apply for a period of up to three consecutive weeks after coverage begins.
>
> The coverage for Extra Expense will begin immediately after the time of that action and will end:
> (1) 3 consecutive weeks after the time of that action; or > (2) When your Business Income coverage ends; whichever is later.

See also Sclafane, supra note 29, at 52, 54.

n32 See Sclafane, supra note 29, at 54. Some policyholders may also have purchased specific ordinance or law coverage by endorsement. See Ordinance or Law Coverage, Form CP 04 05 06 95 (ISO 1994), reprinted in POLICY KIT, supra note 17, at 256.

In addition, notwithstanding the spirit of unity evidenced in the aftermath of the attack, there will be policyholder-insurer disputes as to valuation of claims and the validity of claimed extra expenses occasioned by the business interruption. n33 Claims may also arise under a relatively frequent endorsement providing "contingent" BI coverage where the policy-holder has a major supplier or customer that is lost through direct physical damage. For example, a

REV_00263832

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /5 reform and caps and date(aft 1997) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*36 U. Rich. L. Rev. 569, **

Copyright (c) 2002 University of Richmond Law Review Association University of Richmond Law Review

May, 2002

36 U. Rich. L. Rev. 569

LENGTH: 10136 words

COMMENT: THE INCALCULABLE RISK: HOW THE WORLD TRADE CENTER DISASTER ACCELERATED THE EVOLUTION OF INSURANCE TERRORISM EXCLUSIONS

Jane Kendall

SUMMARY:
... Welts illustrates the pattern that accounts for much of the divergence in modern cases involving terrorism, between the actuarial impetus for the war exclusion and its judicially bounded operation. ... An effective terrorism exclusion will be one that successfully marries simplicity of language with precision of purpose in identifying sources of inestimable loss capable of producing claims so catastrophic as to invalidate rate-setting models and destabilize the financial condition of the insurer. ... Given the history of war exclusion clauses, their probable ineffectiveness for eliminating terrorist acts from the universe of insured events, and the current opportunity for crafting and implementing effective terrorism exclusions, however, insurers need to differentiate between the two in order to ensure adequate protection from liability. ...

"The deliberate and deadly attacks, which were carried out yesterday against our country, were more than acts of terror. They were acts of war."

- President George W. Bush, September 12, 2001. [1]

"Based on our analysis it seems clear that the attacks in New York, on the Pentagon, or on the plane that crashed in Pennsylvania do not constitute "acts of war' as contemplated by the language of these [insurance policy] exclusions."

- Commissioner James C. Bernstein, Minnesota Commerce Department Insurance Division, September 24, 2001. [2]

TEXT:
[*569] I. Introduction

For all practical purposes - including the quintessentially utilitarian matter of insurance - the last vestiges of the distinction between war and international terrorism went up in smoke include the following:

REV_00263886

(1) A "war," whether declared or undeclared, can exist only where sovereign or quasi-sovereign entities engage in hostilities. [98] Terrorism exclusions should specify that terrorist acts may, but need not, be committed on behalf of or sponsored by any sovereign or quasi-sovereign entity.

(2) An act of war cannot be committed by a terrorist group other than a de facto government or an entity acting on behalf of a government. [99] Terrorism exclusions should stipulate that a terrorist act may, but need not, be committed by or on behalf of a group that comprises a de facto government or a recognized government.

(3) The actions of a "tiny non-governmental entity" fighting the United States do not constitute "war" between the United States and that entity. [100] Terrorism exclusions should make it clear that the size of a terrorist organization is not relevant to the determination as to whether or not its act is excluded.

(4) Words describing violent events commonly used in war-risk exclusions are construed as having "dimensions besides the level [*593] of violence," which may include requirements that multiple actors be involved. [101] For example, according to the Pan Am court, for there to be a ""riot' three or more actors must gather in the same place ... ." [102] Similarly, "for there to be a civil commotion, the agents causing the disorder must gather together and cause a disturbance ... ." [103] Drafters should specify that excluded acts of terrorism may be committed by one or more persons or entities.

Pan Am also provides a number of cautions for insurers with respect to practices that may result in findings of ambiguity:

(1) Terms stipulating a number of specific types of excluded conduct will not be construed as describing an inclusive continuum of violent acts; rather, at least one of the specific types of conduct must fairly describe the cause of the loss. [104] Terrorism exclusions should be carefully drafted to avoid interpretations that limit the excluded conduct to specific listed actions.

(2) An insurer's adoption of a new exclusion to deal with the particular type of loss sustained by an insured within a short time after the loss was incurred will be deemed evidence that the insurer's previous exclusion language was ambiguous. [105] Care should be taken to file and implement the most comprehensive and clearest exclusionary language possible and to avoid being forced to revise and refile after unanticipated losses have been incurred.

(3) In some jurisdictions, contra proferentem is applied in disputes between insurers and reinsurers as well as in those between insurers and unsophisticated insurance consumers. [106] In these jurisdictions, ambiguities may be resolved against the drafter, even where the opposing parties are the insurer and the reinsurer of the same risk and both are sophisticated parties. [107] [*594] Since the insurer's exclusions are subject to filing and approval by state insurance regulators, it is critical that the language filed for inclusion in the primary contract be consistent with any reinsurance agreement exclusions to avoid primary writer liability for losses that will be unrecoverable under the terms of the carrier's reinsurance agreements.

D. Revisiting the NAIC's Draft

Building upon the NAIC's draft definition and guided by both readability considerations and the admonitions of the Pan Am court, the author offers the following as a starting point from which insurers might develop terrorism exclusions appropriate for their particular products:

Losses due to acts of terrorism are not covered. For purposes of this exclusion:

REV_00263895

"Act of terrorism" means an act that is dangerous to or destructive of:

. human life;

. human health; or

. property of any kind. This includes both tangible and intangible property. It includes real property and personal property. It includes infrastructure such as roads, bridges, and tunnels; power systems and water systems; broadcasting systems and computer systems.

The act must be planned or carried out by a person or group acting on behalf of an organization based outside of the United States.

The organization may be, but is not limited to, one that:

. claims to be motivated by political, religious, or social beliefs; or

. aims to intimidate, influence, or coerce the United States government or its citizens.

[*595] The organization may, but need not, be:

. a sovereign entity--an independent state or government;

. a quasi-sovereign entity--one that has some traits of a sovereign entity; or

. a de facto government--one that has taken over or separated from a regular government.

It need not be an organization of a particular size.

"Acting on behalf of" an organization means:

. acting as its agent or representative;

. affiliated with it; or

. being sponsored or supported by it in any way. This includes receiving assistance, funding, training, direction, or equipment from the organization.

"Based outside of the United States" means founded, located, headquartered, or maintaining a presence outside of the United States.

"Losses due to acts of terrorism" includes losses incurred in attempted acts of terrorism. [108]

V. Conclusion

The risk of unpredictable multi-billion dollar losses due to acts of transnational terrorism is a risk that cannot currently be insured against without exposing the insurance industry to dangerous [*596] financial destabilization and particular insurers to insolvency. Traditional war-risk exclusions are ineffective devices for eliminating these exposures, despite certain present-day similarities between war and terrorism. To protect themselves and the ability of the industry to provide coverage for insurable risks, insurers must implement effective policy exclusions in order to effect the transfer of catastrophic terrorism risks and the assumption of such losses by an alternate mechanism still to be identified by Congress. Owing to the recent crisis, state insurance regulators have generally agreed to approve terrorism exclusions, and case law suggests that the courts will uphold them if - but only if - they are written in a clear and unambiguous manner. Insurers must be informed and guided by past judicial interpretations in crafting such legally adequate and enforceable plain English exclusions for losses due to terrorism.

REV_00263896

FOOTNOTES:

↑n1. President George W. Bush, Remarks at End of Cabinet Room Meeting with National Security Team (Sept. 12, 2001), in Text of Bush Statement, Wash. Post, Sept. 13, 2001, at A3.

↑n2. Press Release, Minnesota Commerce Department, Insurance Division, Statement of Minnesota Commerce Commissioner James C. Bernstein, Insurance Policy "Act of War" Exclusion (Sept. 24, 2001), available at http://www.commerce.state.mn.us/pages/NewsReleases/Releases2001/News010924.htm (last visited Apr. 4, 2002).

↑n3. A week after the attacks, Steven J. Dreyer, Managing Director for U.S. Insurance Industry Ratings at Standard & Poor's, commented that the insurance industry could "withstand an enormous financial hit ... . The totals would have to exceed [fifty billion dollars] before we would begin to worry about the insurance system." Scott Farley, U.S. Attack "Will Not Cripple the Insurance Industry,' Ins. Day (London), Sept. 18, 2001, at 3, available at LEXIS, News Library, Insday File. By recent estimates, the total financial impact on insurers worldwide could reach 70 billion dollars. Claire Wilkinson, Final Cost from WTC "Could Exceed $ 70bn,' Ins. Day (London), Nov. 7, 2001, available at LEXIS, News Library, Insday File. This would far surpass the $ 15.5 billion in total claims resulting from Hurricane Andrew in 1992, the most catastrophic single event on record prior to the September 11 attacks. Linda Stern, Processing a $ 25 Billion Claim: The Insurance Industry Gears Up for Massive Settlements, Newsweek, Sept. 24, 2001, at 56. It would dwarf the $ 775 million outlay for claims associated with the 1992 Los Angeles riots, the most expensive man-made disaster in the past one hundred years. At the Top of a Terrible List, Bus. Wk., Sept. 24, 2001, at 12. According to Insurance Services Office, Inc. and the National Association of Independent Insurers, for the first time ever, the property and casualty insurance industry in the United States reported a net loss for the nine months ending on September 30, 2001. Press Release, Insurance Services Office, Inc. and the National Association of Independent Insurers, First-Ever Nine-Month Net Loss for Property/Casualty Industry in Wake of September 11 Attack and Deterioration in Investment Results (Dec. 19, 2001), at http://www.iso.com/docs/pres260.htm (last visited Apr. 4, 2002). The $ 3.1 billion aggregate net loss after taxes through September was attributed primarily to the September 11 attacks and sharply contrasts with a net gain of $ 16.8 billion for the same period in 2000. Id.

↑n4. The National Association of Insurance Commissioners ("NAIC") is an organization comprised of the chief state insurance regulatory officials of the fifty states, the District of Columbia, and several U.S. territories. For more information about the NAIC, see NAIC's Web site at http://www.naic.org/1misc/aboutnaic/about/about01.htm (last visited Apr. 4, 2002).

REV_00263897

n5. Letter from Rep. Michael G. Oxley, Chairman, House Committee on Financial Services, et al. to Kathleen Sebelius, President, National Association of Insurance Commissioners (Sept. 17, 2001), available at http://www.naic.org/1news/releases/rel01/doc/091801lt.pdf (last visited Apr. 4, 2002).

n6. Id. (emphasis added).

n7. See Lee Bergquist, NML to Honor All Attack Claims; Insurer Won't Cite "Acts of War' Exclusion, Milwaukee J. Sentinel, Sept. 15, 2001, at 1D (Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company); Tamara Loomis, Crisis Management: Terrorist Actions Prompt Laudable Responses, N.Y. Law J., Sept. 20, 2001, at 5 (Chubb Corp., Swiss Re, and Hartford Financial Services Group); Christopher Oster, Ace Joins Insurers That Won't Invoke Act-of-War Clause, Wall St. J., Sept. 20, 2001, at B2 (Ace Ltd.); David Pilla, Life Insurers Dismiss War Exclusion, Best's Ins. News, Sept. 18, 2001, available at 2001 WL 24724943 (MetLife Inc., Prudential Financial, and CIGNA).

n8. See Scott Farley, Fitch Initial Review Is Complete, Ins. Day (London), Sept. 26, 2001, available at LEXIS, News Library, Insday File (commenting that "any efforts to invoke acts of war exclusions ... could backfire. Such action might reduce losses, but would cause severe long-term damage to reputations and franchise values ... ."); Loomis, supra note 7, at 5 (discussing the necessity for tactfulness in public statements following the disaster).

n9. The leading case pertaining to war exclusions as applied to losses incurred as the result of terrorist actions is Pan American World Airways, Inc. v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 505 F.2d 989 (2d Cir. 1974), in which a commercial plane was hijacked in mid-flight by terrorists, taken to Egypt, and destroyed. In a lengthy opinion, the court surveyed and summarized many of the earlier cases and held that the losses due to terrorism were not excluded under any of the several war exclusions of the all-risk insurer. See id. at 1012-15; see also discussion infra Parts III.A., IV.C.

n10. See Metro. Police Retiring Ass'n v. Tobriner, 306 F.2d 775, 777 (D.C. Cir. 1962). See generally Robert Riegel et al., Insurance Principles and Practices: Property and Liability, chs. 1-2 (6th ed. 1976) (explaining fundamental principles of risk, risk management, and the insurance mechanism).

n11. See, e.g., Jordan v. Group Health Ass'n, 107 F.2d 239, 244-45 (D.C. Cir. 1939); Mich. Hosp. Serv. v. Sharpe, 63 N.W.2d 638, 639 (Mich. 1954).

n12. See Riegel et al., supra note 10, at 17.

REV_00263898

↑n13. See Epmeier v. United States, 199 F.2d 508, 509-10 (7th Cir. 1952).

↑n14. See Metro. Life Ins. Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization, 652 P.2d 426, 428 (Cal. 1982); Riegel et al., supra note 10, at 23.

↑n15. The "Law of Large Numbers" is the statistical proposition that the more opportunities exist for an event to occur, the closer the actual relationship of occurrences to opportunities will be to the true probability. Lewis C. Workman, The Mathematical Foundations of Life Insurance 121 (1982). Once the true probability is estimated by observing a large sample of events, it must then be applied to a large number of exposures before the actual occurrences will approximate the true probability. Emmett J. Vaughan & Therese M. Vaughan, Fundamentals of Risk and Insurance 25 (7th ed. 1996). Extremely catastrophic events are generally considered to be uninsurable in part because by nature they fail to conform to models based on the Law of Large Numbers. Riegel et al., supra note 10, at 20-21. Past experience with events of such great magnitude is usually too sparse to accurately predict how often a similar event can be expected to occur. Id. Further, where a particular loss is grossly disproportionate to other losses that can be anticipated to occur within the pool of policyholders, the catastrophic loss invalidates the calculation of rates and has the potential to create insolvency for the insurer. Id. The device of reinsurance, which will be discussed below, can mitigate some of the deleterious effects of potentially catastrophic exposures. See discussion infra Part III.A.

↑n16. Riegel et al., supra note 10, at 18-21.

↑n17. See Jackie Spinner, Putting a Price on "What Ifs': Actuaries Lack Figures to Fix Premiums for Terrorism Insurance, Wash. Post, Oct. 24, 2001, at E1 (quoting John Purple, Chief Actuary at the Connecticut Department of Insurance, as commenting that "at its simplest, a model multiplies the probability of an event happening by the probability of how big it might be to determine the probable financial cost. The cost can then be translated into the price charged for insurance.").

↑n18. Riegel et al., supra note 10, at 17-18.

↑n19. See generally 1 Arthur Biddle, A Treatise on the Law of Insurance 487 (1893) (discussing the history and rationale for the war exclusion).

↑n20. Id. 487, at 440-41.

REV_00263899

With regard to war, the rule is that citizens or subjects of one country cannot trade with those of another at war with the former, without the license of the King, President, or other legal authority... . Therefore every insurance on alien property must be understood not to cover property lost during hostilities.

Id. (footnotes omitted).

↑n21. Id. 490, at 445.

↑n22. Id. 492, at 446 (citing The Prize Cases, 67 U.S. 635 (1862); Robinson v. Int'l Life Assurance Soc'y, 42 N.Y. 54 (1870)).

↑n23. Adverse selection is the phenomenon by which those most likely to incur losses tend to purchase and retain insurance coverage and those least likely to incur losses tend to refrain from purchasing coverage, thus skewing the probability of losses away from normal expected values that would result given random selection by the general population. See generally Vaughan & Vaughan, supra note 15, at 28-29. War exclusions address the issue by recognizing the tendency of those likely to be called to military service to obtain life insurance protection with more frequency than others, and by eliminating the additional hazard created by that adverse selection while still allowing the applicants the availability of life insurance. See William F. Meyer, Life and Health Insurance Law 7.6, at 205-06 (1972).

↑n24. See Riegel et al., supra note 10, at 20; Spinner, supra note 17, at E5 (quoting Laureen Regan, Associate Professor of Risk Management and Insurance at Temple University, as commenting that "when you can't rely on things happening by accident, the entire pricing process falls apart... . We have to be able to estimate how often this will happen.").

↑n25. A contract of adhesion is defined as "[a] standard-form contract prepared by one party, to be signed by the party in a weaker position, [usually] a consumer, who has little choice about the terms." Black's Law Dictionary 318-19 (7th ed. 1999). For cases treating insurance policies as contracts of adhesion, see, e.g., Healy Tibbits Constr. Co. v. Employers' Surplus Lines Ins. Co., 140 Cal. Rptr. 375, 379 (Cal. Ct. App. 1977); Princeton Ins. Co. v. Chunmuang, 698 A.2d 9, 12 (N.J. 1997).

↑n26. See, e.g., Schmutz v. Employees' Fire Ins. Co., 76 F.2d 119, 122 (2d Cir. 1935); Albritton v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 70 So. 2d 111, 113 (La. 1953); Raska v. Farm Bureau Mut. Ins. Co., 314 N.W.2d 440, 441 (Mich. 1982); Hoffman & Place v. Aetna Fire Ins. Co., 32 N.Y. 405, 411 (1865); Buckeye Union Ins. Co. v. Price, 313 N.E.2d 844, 846 (Ohio 1974).

↑n27. 48 N.Y. 34 (1871).

REV_00263900

↑n28. Id. at 38.

↑n29. Id.

↑n30. Id.

↑n31. Id. at 39.

↑n32. Id.

↑n33. Id. at 40.

↑n34. The interpretations of these terms by the Welts court retain their vitality today. For example, the case was cited for its interpretation of "war" in Pan American World Airways, Inc. v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 505 F.2d 989, 1013 (2d Cir. 1974), the leading modern case interpreting terms used in typical war exclusions. The comprehensive insurance law treatise, Couch on Insurance, cites Welts for its interpretation of "military service" in discussing the treatment of civilians under war exclusions. 10 Lee R. Russ, Couch on Insurance 143:45 (3d ed. 1998).

↑n35. Welts, 48 N.Y. at 40.

↑n36. See Pan Am, 505 F.2d at 1012.

↑n37. Although there is little case law directly on point as to the inefficacy of war exclusions relative to modern terrorist acts, an exception is Pan Am, discussed infra at Parts III.A, IV.C. The opinion extensively catalogs and examines the terms commonly used in war exclusions in the context of a terrorist hijacking, establishing persuasive precedent that seems likely to weigh heavily in the analysis of any court called upon to consider insurance exclusions invoked in denials of claims resulting from the events of September 11, 2001. A more recent case, Holiday Inns, Inc. v. Aetna Insurance Co., 571 F. Supp. 1460 (S.D.N.Y. 1983), cites Pan Am heavily in its rejection of an insurer's attempt to characterize the destruction of a hotel in Lebanon due to fighting between Christian and Moslem militia groups as the result of "war."

REV_00263901

↑n38. John T. Sinnott, Chairman and CEO of Marsh, Inc. explained as follows:

The problem with what happened on September 11 is that it presented a risk that no one could conceive would happen. When the buildings were built, loss scenarios did contemplate the impact of one Boeing 707 (the largest commercial aircraft at the time), however the idea of two, fully fueled 767s hitting both towers was unimaginable.

Terror Insurance Availability: Hearing on Terrorism Insurance Before the Senate Comm. on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, 107th Cong. (2001) [hereinafter Senate Hearing] (statement of John T. Sinnott, Chairman and CEO, Marsh, Inc.), 2001 WL 26187268. See also Blackest Day as Insurers Fear for Staff, Ins. Day (London), Sept. 12, 2001, at 1 ("The unprecedented events of yesterday are generally not even found in the "worst case scenarios' run by some firms."), available at LEXIS, News Library, Insday File; Richard A. Fogel, Sept. 11: Risk Management Lessons Learned, N.Y. Law J., Nov. 2, 2001, at 1, 6 ("Most commercial property insurance policies contain a standard war risk exclusion. Cases interpreting this exclusion, mostly as a result of litigation ensuing from the 1993 attack on the Twin Towers, limits its applicability."); Jon L. Gelman & Lewis L. Heller, World Trade Center Tragedy Creates Complex Workers' Compensation Issues, N.J. L.J., Oct. 8, 2001, at 108 ("Horrible and catastrophic events such as occurred on Sept. 11, 2001, were never contemplated in the legislative crafting of our nation's social, remedial insurance paradigm."); Christopher A. Jennings, Where Do We Go from Here? War Risk Exclusion Clauses and "Acts of War" by Non-Sovereign Entities, Fed. Law., Nov.-Dec. 2001, at 60, 64 ("Surprisingly, even after the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center, insurers continued to include risks arising from acts of terrorism in the basket of insurable risks under traditional all-risk insurance policies."); Spinner, supra note 17, at E1 (quoting John Purple, chief actuary at the Connecticut Department of Insurance, as commenting that "we model for catastrophes, but my guess is nobody ever modeled for a 767 full of fuel crashing into the World Trade Center. I doubt that anyone ever thought that was a possibility."); Walter Updegrave, How Strong Is the Safety Net?, Money, Nov. 2001, at 130, 134-35 ("Many [insurers] routinely run an RDS (realistic disaster scenario), such as two jumbo jets colliding over a large city or a major earthquake hitting Los Angeles, to determine their PML (probable maximum liability). But no one envisioned a catastrophe like the one that occurred on Sept. 11.").

↑n39. 505 F.2d 989 (2d Cir. 1974).

↑n40. Id. at 993.

↑n41. Id. at 994.

↑n42. Id. at 999.

↑n43. Id. at 999-1001 (citations omitted).

REV_00263902

↑n44. See Senate Hearing, supra note 38 (statement of Robert E. Vagley, President, American Insurance Association) (quoting Warren Buffet, CEO of Berkshire-Hathaway, one of the world's largest reinsurers, as stating that "terrorism today is not at all like terrorism of 25 years ago... . The power to inflict damage has gone up a factor of-- who knows what--10, 50 ... you can't price for that."), 2001 WL 26187266; Arthur H. Garrison, How the World Changed: A History of the Development of Terrorism, Address at the Delaware Criminal Justice Council (Oct. 28-29, 2001) (describing the progressive evolution of terrorist activity during the 1990s toward actions aimed at mass destruction for its own sake, fueled by hatred for the West and America and religious extremist thought, and marked by characteristics of "asymmetric warfare"), available at http://www.state.de.us/cjc/history.ppt (last visited Apr. 4, 2002).

↑n45. See generally Jonathan F. Bank & Lance A. Warrick, The Regulation of Reinsurance, in American Bar Association, The State of Insurance Regulation 127, 137-46 (Francine L. Semaya & Vincent J. Vitkowsky eds., 1991); Vaughan & Vaughan, supra note 15, at 150-52.

↑n46. Riegel et al., supra note 10, at 120; Updegrave, supra note 38, at 135.

↑n47. See Riegel et al., supra note 10, at 120.

↑n48. See Bank & Warrick, supra note 45, at 137-46; Alice Schroeder et al., Reinsurance Recoverables--The Lake Wobegon Problem, in Insurance-Property-Casualty: World Trade Center Special Issue (Morgan Stanley Dean Witter & Co., New York, N.Y.), Sept. 17, 2001, at 4.

↑n49. Riegel et al., supra note 10, at 121-26.

↑n50. See Tom Condon, Insuring Insurers; Little-Known Reinsurance Companies Play Big Roles in Spreading Out Huge Risk, Hartford Courant, Oct. 9, 2001, at E1; Joseph G. Finnerty III & Eric S. Connuck, Sept. 11: What Is the Impact on the Insurers?, N.Y. Law J., Nov. 26, 2001, at 1; Douglas McLeod, Insurers Shaken But Solvent--So Far, Bus. Ins., Oct. 1, 2001, at 1; Schroeder, supra note 48, at 4; Updegrave, supra note 38, at 132.

↑n51. See McLeod, supra note 50, at 1.

↑n52. See Gary Thompson, Insurance for Losses Resulting from the Terrorist Attacks of September 11, 2001, 12 Mealey's Litig. Rep.: Reinsurance No. 11, at 21 (Oct. 4, 2001); Updegrave, supra note 38, at 132-33.

REV_00263903

↑n53. See Finnerty & Connuck, supra note 50, at 6 ("A "clash event' of the magnitude of Sept. 11 contradicts the actuarial assumptions relied upon by reinsurers when they diversify risks in this manner."); Schroeder, supra note 48, at 4.

↑n54. See Updegrave, supra note 38, at 135 ("When large policies are involved--such as many in the World Trade Center incident--it's not uncommon to see a chain of twenty or more insurers.").

↑n55. See Christopher Oster, Lloyd's Faces Challenge Following Attack on Twin Towers, Wall St. J., Sept. 18, 2001, at A4; David Pilla, Tillinghast Says WTC Disaster May Hit $ 58 Billion, Best's Ins. News, Sept. 24, 2001, available at 2001 WL 24724985.

↑n56. Schroeder, supra note 48, at 5.

↑n57. Finnerty & Connuck, supra note 50, at 6.

↑n58. See Senate Hearing, supra note 38 (statement of Walter K. Knorr, Chief Financial Officer, City of Chicago) (testifying that the City of Chicago had been presented with a "premium increase of over 5,000 percent" to renew its insurance, including substantially less terrorism coverage for O'Hare and Midway airports); Adrian Ladbury, Life After Sept. 11: No Capacity Crisis, Ins. Day (London), Oct. 9, 2001, at 1 (quoting Ruud Bosman, Executive Vice President of global property insurer FM Global), available at LEXIS, News Library, Insday File.

↑n59. See Dawn Kopecki, Congress Mulls Insurer Aid as Rates for Some Jump 5,000%, Capital Markets Rep., Oct. 25, 2001 (quoting Ronald E. Ferguson, Chairman of General Re Corp., one of the four largest reinsurers in the world, while testifying before the Senate Banking Committee, as commenting, "I don't think we'll ever get back to the way we were before Sept. 11... . The question becomes, how many Sept. 11ths can we take? And the answer is, this one."), available at WL 10/25/01 Cap. Mkt. Rep. 15:12:00.

↑n60. See Senate Hearing, supra note 38 (statement of Ron E. Ferguson, Chairman, General Re Corporation) ("Before September 11 the threat of terrorism within our borders seemed remote. Because of that, no insurance or reinsurance premiums were collected for terrorism coverages, and no assets or reserves were allocated to terrorism exposures.").

↑n61. See sources cited supra notes 7-8.

REV_00263904

along with the twin towers of the World Trade Center on September 11, 2001. Though in many contexts these constructs remain viable and distinguishable in a theoretical legal sense, in the pragmatic mathematical realm of the actuary, both war and international terrorism now represent incalculable risks capable of rendering [*570] key elements of the insurance industry insolvent. [3] The line between transnational terrorism and warfare was obscured by the attacks to the point of nonexistence in the perception of Americans--irrespective of the intricacies of international law. That fact is evidenced not only by the words of President Bush, but ironically, by those of congressional leaders, who admonished the insurance industry, days after the attacks, not to lose sight of the distinction.

Fearful that insurers would attempt to invoke standard policy exclusions for losses due to "war or acts of war" in the aftermath of the disaster, members of the House Financial Services Committee and the Insurance Subcommittee directed a letter to the National Association of Insurance Commissioners ("NAIC"), [4] downplaying the President's war rhetoric as a mere reflection of "the passion and determination of our country, not the legal reality of Tuesday's destruction." [5] Yet, in subtly revealing terminology, [*571] the congressional letter went on to condemn "any attempt to evade coverage obligations by either primary insurers or reinsurers based on such legal maneuvering" as "unsupportable and unpatriotic." [6]

The congressmen need not have worried. Soon after the terrorist attacks, a number of large insurers with much at stake in the disaster issued public statements announcing their intentions not to invoke war exclusions. [7] Had the insurers been inclined to do so - negative public relations notwithstanding [8] - they would not likely have prevailed when challenged in court. [9]

This comment examines the intended function of war exclusions in insurance policies and discusses judicial interpretations of those exclusions in cases involving terrorist acts. It recounts the events leading to the terrorism insurance crisis of 2001 and the apparent resolution of that crisis. Finally, it suggests ways in which the insurance industry may employ prior lessons learned from the history of judicial interpretation of war exclusions to avoid possible legal pitfalls that might otherwise negate the legitimate and necessary purposes of terrorism exclusions.

[*572]

II. Insurance and the Rationale for Excluding Coverage for Losses Due to War

A. What Makes Insurance Insurance

Fundamentally, insurance represents the delicate balance between the uncertainty and the predictability of future events associated with unfavorable consequences. [10] Where there is no risk, there can be no insurance, and arrangements not involving risk which masquerade as insurance are more accurately understood as entitlement programs. [11] Nor can an insurance proposition operate where the risk is real but inestimable. [12] To produce a mutually beneficial arrangement, the insurance bargain must relieve one party of the burden of uncertainty associated with potential losses, while allowing the other party to profit from their reasonable calculability. [13]

Insurance is of value to the purchaser only because it allows for the sharing of risk across a pool of other similarly situated but widely distributed purchasers, guaranteeing for each purchaser protection against substantial but uncertain losses in exchange for the payment of premiums both certain and manageable. [14] The application of the "Law of Large Numbers" [15] allows insurers to [*573] predict losses accurately enough to calculate premium rates, which will not be prohibitively high, but which will nonetheless produce reserves adequate to pay claims when and if the losses insured against occur. [16] The cornerstone of the entire ↑n62. See Senate Hearing, supra note 38 (testimony of Robert E. Vagley, President, American Insurance Association) ("We have not attempted to invoke war exclusions, despite the militaristic nature of, and rhetoric surrounding, the attacks."); Randy J. Maniloff, The War Risk Exclusion--Looking Beyond the Events of September 11th, 13 Mealey's Litig. Rep.: Ins. Insolvency No. 9, at 21 (Oct. 11, 2001).

REV_00263887

[A] review of [Pan American World Airways, Inc., v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 505 F.2d 989 (2d Cir. 1974)] leaves no doubt that the question whether the "war risk" exclusion would apply to claims arising out of the recent attacks in New York and Washington is by no means as cut and dry as the impression one gets from reading the media reports that have simply cited [the case] and dismissed the issue out of hand.

Id.

The author identifies, inter alia, the possibility that there was sponsorship of the attacks by a state or other "sovereignty," the declaration by bin Laden of a "jihad" or holy war against the United States, and the fact that Congress authorized the use of force in response pursuant to the War Powers Resolution as distinguishing features of the events of September 11, 2001, that might have influenced judicial construction of particular war-risk exclusions in favor of insurers. See also Alexander Nicoll, US Advised to Concentrate on Victory, Fin. Times, Oct. 19, 2001, at 2. (commenting that "the US has a newly defined enemy which is ... international terrorism and terrorist-sponsored states") (emphasis added); Rod Norland et al., War on Terror, Newsweek, Dec. 17, 2001, at 22 (discussing the terrorist "colonization" and "hijacking" of Afghanistan).

↑n63. See sources cited supra note 7.

↑n64. See, e.g., Chubb CEO Says Industry is Strong, Warns of Unavailability of Future Terrorism Coverage, 11 Ins. Coverage Litig. Rep. (Andrews Publ'ns, Inc.) No. 44, at 989 (Oct. 5, 2001) (reporting warning of the chairman and chief executive officer of reinsurer Chubb Corp. that a series of terrorist attacks could threaten the solvency of the insurance industry), available at LEXIS, Insurance Library, Andrews File; NAIC Backs Federal Role on Terror Re, Ins. Chron., Oct. 29, 2001, at 1 (quoting David Mathis, Chief Executive Officer of Kemper Insurance Co., as telling the National Association of Insurance Commissioners that "reinsurers have already notified Kemper ... that they intend to exclude or dramatically scale back terrorism coverage in contracts up for renewal... . We recognize that this may be the only way to protect their solvency."), [hereinafter NAIC Backs] available at LEXIS, News Library, Allnews File; Douglas Quenqua, Insurers Act to Protect Against Attacks, PR Week, Nov. 2, 2001, at 6 (quoting Edward Morgan, Senior Vice President and Communications Officer of the Hartford Insurance Group as stating "Our primary message is that this industry has finite resources, and terrorism is something you can't predict, so the re-insurance markets can't protect it."), available at LEXIS, News Library, Allnews File.

↑n65. See NAIC Backs, supra note 64.

REV_00263905

↑n66. See id; see also America's Insurance Industry: Keeping the Promise: Hearing on the Impact of the September 11, 2001 Terrorist Attacks on America's Insurance System Before the House Comm. on Financial Services, 107th Cong. 25 (2001) [hereinafter House Hearing] (testimony of Kathleen Sebelius, President, National Association of Insurance Commissioners) ("We know the insurance industry cannot withstand multiple events of this magnitude without harm to all consumers."), available at http://www.house.gov/financialservices/107-45.pdf (last visited Apr. 4, 2002).

↑n67. For testimony of the insurance industry before Congress, see generally Senate Hearing, supra note 38, and House Hearing, supra note 66. "Pool Re" is the Pool Reinsurance Company, a mutual reinsurance company established by the British government as a mechanism for providing coverage of losses due to terrorism. For an in-depth description and analysis of Pool Re, see generally William B. Bice, Comment, British Government Reinsurance and Acts of Terrorism: The Problems of Pool Re, 15 U. Pa. J. Int'l Bus. L. 441 (1994).

↑n68. Senate Hearing, supra note 38 (testimony of Robert E. Vagley, President, American Insurance Association) ("More than two-thirds of annual reinsurance contracts--agreements by which primary insurance companies purchase their own insurance to adequately spread the risk of large-scale losses--are renewed each January 1."); Mike McNamee, Terror Insurance: How to Stop the Coming Crisis, Bus. Wk., Dec. 10, 2001, at 36; Christopher Oster & Michael Schroeder, Carriers Plan Lower-Cost Terror-Insurance Pool, Wall St. J., Nov. 8, 2001, at A10.

↑n69. See, e.g., Michael Schroeder, Senate Panel Is Set to Offer Bill to Back Terrorism Insurance, Wall St. J., Oct. 26, 2001, at A4 (reporting that Zurich Financial Services' Zurich Global Energy, insurer for oil, gas, mining, and power-generating companies, had announced to clients that it would not renew terrorism coverage on property policies).

↑n70. See 14 Eric Mills Holmes & L. Anthony Sutin, Holmes's Appleman on Insurance 2d 103.1, at 77 (2000).

↑n71. See id.

↑n72. Bank & Warrick, supra note 48, at 137-46.

↑n73. See Terrorism Risk, The Role of the Federal Government in Assuring That Insurance for Terrorist Acts Remains Available to Consumers: Hearing Before the Senate Comm. on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, 107th Cong. (2001) (statement of Diane Koken, Pa. Insurance Commissioner, testifying on behalf of the NAIC), available at 2001 WL 26187327.

REV_00263906

These are considered to be the product of free market negotiations among sophisticated insurance underwriters, brokers, and professional corporate risk managers who rely upon the traditional powers of buyers and sellers to bargain for the best deal they can get. The state regulatory interest in such large transactions is mainly that they not impair the overall financial health of an insurer, since monitoring insurer solvency is a major responsibility of the regulators.

Id. See also Holmes & Sutin, supra note 70.

↑n74. See Diane Brady & Mike McNamee, Give Insurers a Break--But Not a Free Ride, Bus. Wk., Oct. 29, 2001, at 38.

States, which regulate the industry, require underwriters to provide terrorism coverage, and will likely continue to do so. But the industry contends that it has no choice but to either forgo offering such coverage to businesses it considers an undue risk, or charge such exorbitant rates as to be prohibitive. The reason: reinsurance companies, which back up their policies, say they'll cut off terror insurance on Jan. 1, when trillions of dollars in policies expire. That could prompt underwriters to balk at writing policies altogether because they don't want to be left holding the bag. With no coverage, lenders won't lend, builders won't build, and business will grind to a halt.

Id.

↑n75. Senate Hearing, supra note 38 (testimony of Robert E. Vagley, President, American Insurance Association).

Primary carriers, however, do not have the same flexibility as reinsurers with respect to our own products because we are subject to tighter regulatory controls. Any terrorism exclusions we might choose to introduce must be approved by individual state insurance departments... . If exclusions were not approved, primary insurers would be left to shoulder 100 percent of future terrorist losses, which we simply cannot afford to do. Our only remaining option--one we would prefer not to consider--would be to simply withdraw from certain markets, and/or lines of coverage.

Id.

↑n76. See Press Release, NAIC, NAIC Urges Final Action on Terrorism Insurance Litigation (Dec. 17, 2001), at http://www.naic.org/1news/releases/rel01/121701<uscore>terrorism.htm (last visited Apr. 4, 2002) (quoting December 14, 2001 letter from Terri Vaughan, President of the NAIC, to Senators Thomas Daschle and Trent Lott).

↑n77. See generally Emeric Fischer & Peter Nash Swisher, Principles of Insurance Law 7.01

REV_00263907

(2d ed. 1994).

↑n78. Arthur D. Postal, Despite Terrorism "Crisis,' P/C Reinsurance Pool Will Be Tough Sell on Capitol Hill, Ins. Acct., Oct. 1, 2001, at 1 (quoting Kathleen Sebelius, Chairman of the NAIC), available at 2001 WL 2524499.

↑n79. See NAIC Backs, supra note 64.

↑n80. Press Release, NAIC, Members Adopt Resolution Regarding Availability of Terrorism Coverage (Oct. 24, 2001), at http://www.naic.org/1news/releases/rel01/102401mmbrsadoptrsltnregardavlbltyterrcov.htm (last visited Apr. 4, 2002).

↑n81. Under the administration's proposal, the government would have initially paid eighty percent of the first $ 20 billion in terrorism-related insurance claims and ninety percent thereafter, with the government's contribution gradually decreasing over the three-year period. See Terrorism Risk Insurance: Hearing Before the House Subcomm. on Capital Markets, Ins., and Gov't Sponsored Enters., 107th Cong. 5 (2001) (statement of Paul H. O'Neill, Secretary of the Treasury), 2001 WL 26187520.

↑n82. H.R. 3210, 107th Cong. (2001).

↑n83. The House measure would have created a temporary program by which financial assistance in the form of loans up to an aggregate total of $ 20 billion would be provided to property and casualty insurers affected by a triggering terrorist event, ninety percent of which would subsequently be repaid by the insurers in accordance with assessments capped at three percent of each insurer's aggregate written premium in any given year. Id. The text of H.R. 3210 is available on the Internet at the Library of Congress's federal legislative information system found at http://thomas.loc.gov.

↑n84. See Today's Debate: Terrorism Insurance, As Clock Ticks, Congress Sits on Quick Terror-Insurance Fix, USA Today, Dec. 7, 2001, at A16 ("The House leadership attached the liability protection to its otherwise worthwhile terrorism insurance bill that passed last week. Meanwhile, in the Senate, Republicans say no bill will pass without it, virtually guaranteeing gridlock with Democrats who oppose it."); Jackie Spinner, Congress Unable to Pass Terror Insurance Bill: Deadlock Ends Hope for Quick Action on Issue, Wash. Post, Dec. 21, 2001, at E1.

↑n85. On December 18, 2001, new NAIC President Terri Vaughan stated that "there is strong consensus among NAIC members that if Congress doesn't act, state insurance regulators will be left with no choice but to begin approving some exclusions for commercial lines." Press Release, NAIC, NAIC Members Make Decision Regarding Terrorism Insurance (Dec. 18, 2001), at http://www.naic.org/1news/releases/rel01/index.htm (last visited Apr. 4, 2002).

REV_00263908

↑n86. Dennis Kelly, Regulators Adopt Definition of Terrorist Act, Best's Ins. News, Dec. 11, 2001, available at 2001 WL 24726087.

↑n87. Press Release, NAIC, NAIC Members Come to Agreement Regarding Exclusions for Acts of Terrorism (Dec. 21, 2001) at http://www.naic.org/1news/releases/rel01/index.htm (last visited Apr. 4, 2002). According to the Insurance Services Office, Inc. ("ISO"), drafter of the NAIC-endorsed exclusion, the $ 25 million threshold (commonly used in the property and casualty insurance business to identify a catastrophic loss) would not apply where terrorist acts involve the use of nuclear, chemical, or biological materials. Press Release, ISO, ISO Gratified by Insurance Regulators' Call for Approval of Terrorism Exclusions; Wording Free to Non-Customers (Dec. 21, 2001), at http://www.iso.com/docs/pres262.htm (last visited Apr. 4, 2002); see also Hard Hit at the World Trade Center: At the Top of a Terrible List, Bus. Wk., Sept. 24, 2001, at 12 (listing insured losses from some man-made disasters of the last decade, including the 1993 World Trade Center bombing ($ 510 million) and the Oklahoma City bombing ($ 125 million)).

↑n88. See discussion supra Part II.B.

↑n89. Most states have "readability" statutes or regulations requiring that policy language achieve a certain "Flesch Reading Ease score" in order to be approved for use. See, e.g., Conn. Gen. Stat. 38a-295 to -300 (2001); Ind. Code Ann. 27-1-26-1 to -12 (Michie 2001); Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 304.14-420-.14-450 (Michie 2001); N.Y. Ins. Law 3102 (McKinney 2000); 14 Va. Admin. Code 5-110-10 to -80 (West 2001). In some states, readability requirements apply only to coverage intended for consumers, rather than those intended for more sophisticated commercial policyholders. However, given the impact of the World Trade Center disaster on carriers of individual and group life insurance, which are generally subject to these rules, contract exclusions intended for application across multiple lines of insurance should be drafted so as to achieve compliance with readability requirements.

↑n90. See discussion supra notes 77-87 and accompanying text.

↑n91. Kelly, supra note 86. According to Montana Insurance Commissioner John Morrison, the phrase "not an agent of a sovereign state" is "intended to distinguish terrorism from war, and the reference to motives is intended to distinguish acts of terrorism from acts of vandalism." Id.

↑n92. For example, calculated according to the methodology prescribed by Virginia's regulation for simplified and readable accident and sickness insurance policies, 14 Va. Admin.

REV_00263909

Code 5-110-50(D)(2) (West 2001), the text achieves a Flesch Reading Ease score of just 0.56, far below the minimum required score of 40.

n93. See id. 5-110-50. The Virginia readability regulation, like most others that employ the Flesch Reading Ease Test, specifies that "[a] unit of words ending with a period, semicolon, or colon, but excluding headings, captions, and subcaptions, shall be counted as a sentence." Id. 5-110-50(D)(4)(b).

n94. Readability rules often provide that changes made to policy terms to improve their readability must not interfere with the accuracy or adequacy of the contract. For example, the Virginia readability regulation states that "revision of the policy to make it more readable must not lead to its devaluation as a legal document." Id. 5-110-50(A).

n95. See sources cited supra note 62 and accompanying text.

n96. 505 F.2d 989 (2d Cir. 1974).

n97. See generally id. (discussing the proper manner by which to interpret exclusionary terms in an insurance policy).

n98. Id. at 1005; see also New York Life Ins. Co. v. Bennion, 158 F.2d 260, 264 (10th Cir. 1946); Vanderbilt v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 184 N.Y.S. 54, 55 (1920).

n99. Pan Am, 505 F.2d at 1012; see also Welts v. Conn. Mut. Life Ins. Co., 48 N.Y. 34, 40 (1871).

n100. Pan Am, 505 F.2d at 1019 n.15.

n101. Id. at 1005.

n102. Id.

n103. Id. at 1020 (citing Hartford Fire Ins. Co v. War Eagle Coal Co., 295 F. 663, 665 (4th Cir. 1924)).

REV_00263910

n104. Id. at 1005 ("The ... insurers' shotgun approach belies its claim that these terms have certain fixed meanings."); see also Younis Bros. & Co. v. CIGNA Worldwide Ins. Co., 899 F. Supp. 1385, 1392 (E.D. Pa. 1995); Holiday Inns Inc. v. Aetna Ins. Co., 571 F. Supp. 1460, 1461 (S.D.N.Y. 1983).

n105. Pan Am, 505 F.2d at 1000 (citing Orren v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 179 N.W.2d 166, 169 (Minn. 1970); Hartol Prod. Corp. v. Prudential Ins. Co., 47 N.E.2d 687, 690-91 (N.Y. 1943)).

n106. Id. at 1002.

n107. See Jeffrey W. Stempel, Reassessing the "Sophisticated" Policyholder Defense in Insurance Coverage Litigation, 42 Drake L. Rev. 807, 840-42 (1993).

n108. This draft exclusion is consistent with the NAIC's intent not to categorize domestic criminal acts as terrorism for purposes of its exclusion. See supra note 91 and accompanying text. Although it is beyond the scope of this Comment to address this decision, the 1995 bombing of the Murrah Building in Oklahoma City calls into question whether previously held assumptions about the capacity of the law enforcement system to prevent catastrophic terrorist acts perpetrated in the United States by United States citizens can survive as the basis for a determination of insurability. If the distinctions between war and transnational terrorism have vanished in the context of insurability, distinctions between transnational and domestic acts of terrorism, which may be equally unpredictable and result in losses of similar severity, should also be reconsidered.

In addition to the NAIC draft exclusion, several other defnitions were taken into consideration. See 18 U.S.C. 2331 (1994); S. 1751, 107th Cong. 3(1) (2001); H.R. 3210, 107th Cong. 16(1) (2001); S.B. 5798, 224th Sess. (N.Y. 2001); 28 C.F.R. 0.85(1) (2001).

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "punitive damages" /5 reform and caps and date(aft 1997) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Thursday, September 12, 2002 - 8:37 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00263911

structure is the application of actuarial probability principles using complex statistical models based on data gathered from past experience. [17] Discernment of a pattern that can be projected to forecast future losses is the sine qua non which, if lacking, eliminates the possibility of rational rate-setting. [18]

B. The Uninsurable Nature of Losses Due to War and the Pattern of Judicial Interpretation

War has for many years been recognized, both actuarially and legally, as an uninsurable hazard. [19] The actuarial rationales for excluding coverage of losses due to war have not always been fortified, however, by judicial constructions of the policy language used by insurers to effect the desired protection of their policyholder risk pools. In both life insurance and property and casualty insurance - two of the hardest hit markets in the World Trade Center disaster - some early judicial cases interpreting the meaning of "war" were based on general prohibitions against entering into illegal contracts. [20] Since contracts which would "aid [*574] the resources of the enemy" in time of war were forbidden, [21] it became necessary to pinpoint when a war had commenced. Those early decisions established that the existence of a state of war was a facts-and-circumstances determination rather than an issue merely of whether or not war had been declared. One treatise citing Civil War vintage decisions, for example, noted that "to create belligerent rights, it is not necessary that there should be war between separate and independent powers, but ... they may exist between parties to a civil war, and a state of war may exist without any formal declaration of it by either side." [22]

The courts reined in this broad interpretation, however, when they found it necessary to construe specific exclusions intended by insurers to protect themselves and their policyholder pools from adverse selection by life insurance applicants and from catastrophic losses under property insurance policies. [23] Conditions resulting in non-random selection of risks (adverse selection) or in the possibility of grossly non-uniform maximum exposures (catastrophic losses) interfere with the proper working of the Law of Large Numbers in ways that can destabilize the financial condition of the insurer, and are therefore categorized as uninsurable. [24] While not contesting the logic of the insurers' objectives in excluding war risks, courts have insisted upon precision in contract terms in order to prevent unfair claim denials. In deciding such cases, courts have consistently invoked the doctrine of contra proferentem - that ambiguities in contract language, especially [*575] in contracts of adhesion [25] such as insurance policies, must be construed strictly against the drafter and liberally in favor of the policyholder. [26]

In Welts v. Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Co., [27] for example, the court interpreted insurance policy language restricting the insured person from entering into "any military or naval service whatsoever" [28] and excluding death "from any of the casualties or consequences of war or rebellion, or from belligerent forces in any place where he may be." [29] The insured was shot and killed while employed by the government of the United States, supervising the building of railroad bridges to be used by the Union Army for military purposes during the Civil War. [30] Though his assailants demanded first to know whether anyone there "wore a federal uniform," there was no evidence that they were Confederate soldiers or were acting under Confederate authority. [31] The court, noting that "the company frames the policy and chooses the language" and that any uncertainty in the policy's terms should therefore be resolved in favor of the insured, held that "the general understanding of the term [military service] includes such persons only as are liable to do duty in the field as combatants." [32] The court further held that "the language used can be considered as including only death from casualties or consequences of war or rebellion, carried on or waged by authority of some de facto government, at least." [33]

Quite possibly, as would have been consistent with the justification for the exclusion, the insurer's intent was to exclude [*576] deaths resulting in any way from activity in furtherance of the war effort, which might subject the insured to significantly increased mortality risk. Yet, if that was the intent, the language failed to convey it clearly. The court found the exclusion to be ambiguously worded, and therefore construed it against the insurer, thus endowing the terms "military service" and "war," as used in insurance policies, with legal meanings that would thenceforth guide courts in construing war risk exclusions [34] - meanings distinct from and possibly contrary to those intended by the insurers who initially used the terms.

REV_00263888

Welts illustrates the pattern that accounts for much of the divergence in modern cases involving terrorism, between the actuarial impetus for the war exclusion and its judicially bounded operation. Where a terrorist act reproduces the conditions of uninsurability associated with traditional warfare, a determination as to whether the event was or was not "carried on or waged by authority of some de facto government" [35] (or the present-day equivalent determination of whether or not the entity possessed "at least significant attributes of sovereignty" [36]) is a judicial exercise that bears only the most attenuated relationship to a determination of whether the event ought or ought not be deemed insurable. Nevertheless, prevailing case law wrought by the reiterative interpretations of courts applying contra proferentem to generations of insurance policy exclusions has refined the legal meaning of war and related terms for insurance purposes to the extent that it is now generally anticipated that war exclusions will not be held to function effectively to exclude terrorist acts. [37]

[*577]

III. Inadequate Protection and the Post-September 11 Insurance Crisis

A. Industry Unreadiness and the Role of Reinsurance

Prior to September 11, 2001, the insurance industry failed to recognize and adjust to the dual realities that exposure from terrorist actions could be so financially devastating as to undermine the entire insurance system and that the industry's standard policy exclusions utterly failed to protect it from exposures of such enormous magnitude. [38] A wake-up call might have come as early as 1974, when the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit decided Pan American World Airways, Inc., v. Aetna Casualty & Surety [*578] Co. [39] The industry's failure to respond adequately to a strong admonition by the court in that case, even after the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center provided a preview of the disaster that ultimately occurred, is at least in part attributable to the false sense of security created by the widespread use of reinsurance in providing coverage for potentially catastrophic losses.

In Pan Am, the court was called upon to construe a number of all-risk policy exclusions in connection with the terrorist hijacking of a United States airliner by members of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, who forced the plane's crew to fly the plane to Egypt, where the plane was destroyed with explosives. [40] In holding that the losses resulting from the terrorist action were covered under the terms of the policy, notwithstanding exclusions pertaining inter alia to war, warlike operations, military or usurped power, insurrection, riot, and civil commotion, [41] the court forcefully emphasized that if the general rule is that ambiguous insurance policy terms are to be construed strictly against the insurer, then a fortiori, the doctrine of contra proferentem demands such interpretation when the insurer knew its exclusions were ambiguous and failed to clarify them accordingly. [42] Citing evidence that the risk of hijacking was well known to the insurers and that, moreover, the insurers were aware that their policy exclusions were ambiguous, the court concluded that "when the all risk insurers failed to exclude "political risks in words descriptive of today's world events,' they acted at their own peril." [43]

Given this judicial road-map provided by the Pan Am court and the geometric progression in the capacity for mass destruction by terrorists in the last decade, [44] the fact that there remained, in [*579] 2001, numerous insurance policies lacking detailed, explicit, and comprehensive terrorism exclusions would seem inexplicable but for certain industry practices that met instant obsolescence in the aftermath of September 11. One of the most significant of these was the prevalence of, and reliance on, reinsurance as a device used by insurers for spreading the risk of potentially catastrophic losses, such as those due to terrorism, that might exceed the amount which could be withstood solely on the basis of the insurers' own financial capacities.

REV_00263889

Reinsurance is a market mechanism that allows insurers to accept more risk than would otherwise be permitted by regulators monitoring their financial solvency. [45] Through a reinsurance agreement (or "treaty"), an insurance company that directly provides coverage to policyholders (a "primary writer") transfers (or "cedes") a portion of its risk to a reinsurance company, which may in turn transfer portions, through "retrocession," to other companies. [46] Each insurer in the chain thus limits, at least in theory, the liability it retains to a specified dollar amount or percentage of the total potential loss. [47] In financial reporting, the insurer is allowed to offset its claim liabilities by amounts it expects to receive from its reinsurers, provided the reinsurers' financial condition is acceptable to regulators in the primary writer's domiciliary state. [48]

Although reinsurance ordinarily functions beneficially for both insurers and policyholders by increasing the overall capacity of the market, stabilizing insurers' profits, and allowing for the acquisition of coverage on large risks without the necessity of negotiation with multiple insurers, [49] the World Trade Center disaster [*580] has brought into sharp focus a major drawback of this arrangement that can, in certain situations known as "clash events," result in a breakdown of the system. [50] In a clash event, an occurrence, often unanticipated or unpredictable but of catastrophic proportions, concentrates significant losses across multiple lines of insurance simultaneously. [51] The World Trade Center disaster, by far the most catastrophic clash event in insurance history, is generating claims in aviation, property, liability, life, workers' compensation, business interruption, health, disability, automobile, and other miscellaneous lines of insurance, all centralized within one concentrated area. [52] Where the complex, overlapping reinsurance arrangements of the primary writers of these coverages resulted in reinsurers being exposed to catastrophic losses across multiple lines of insurance, companies that in ordinary circumstances would have benefited by diversifying across product lines may instead find themselves over-leveraged and insolvent. [53]

Additionally, the retrocession arrangements behind policies providing benefits as large as those now payable due to World Trade Center losses are often multi-layered, involving extensive chains of insurers. [54] This practice creates further complex interdependencies and even more opportunities for reinsurer failures in clash events where reinsurers who are party to numerous retrocession agreements incur compound losses. [55]

When the dust settles after a catastrophic clash event and the losses are finally quantified, if any reinsurers have failed - and at [*581] least one industry analyst has placed the probability that some reinsurers will fail due to the World Trade Center event at close to one hundred percent [56] - the primary writers, still contractually bound to pay the full policy benefits to policyholders regardless of background reinsurance arrangements, are forced to make up the difference. [57]

B. The Terrorism Insurance Crisis and Its Outcome

As noted by insurers and financial analysts, the unprecedented magnitude and severity of the disaster that occurred on September 11, 2001, did not change the probability that another disaster of unimaginable proportions could occur at any time. [58] It was that eventuality, even more than that which had already occurred, that caused the breakdown of certain market mechanisms for providing terrorism-risk insurance and resulted in fundamental changes in insurance and reinsurance practices. [59] Industry unreadiness, disadvantageous aspects of the insurance and reinsurance regulatory scheme in the United States, and unfortunate timing each played a role in the accelerated sequence of events that culminated in the virtual elimination of terrorism coverage by insurers in the United States.

REV_00263890

Having failed, for the most part, to implement explicit terrorism exclusions because of factors such as the competitiveness of the market, the perception of adequate protection created by complex ceding and retrocession arrangements, and the failure of actuarial worst-case maximum liability models to contemplate a [*582] terrorism-generated clash event of such gigantic proportions, [60] most insurers and reinsurers had only war-risk exclusions to fall back on at the time the World Trade Center was destroyed. Assessing the negative public relations consequences and the perceived unlikelihood of withstanding legal challenges that might follow from an attempted invocation of these exclusions in connection with September 11 losses, insurers and their global reinsurers made the decision to refrain from invoking war risk exclusions and to treat the losses as covered. [61] They did so irrespective of the possibility that some war exclusions might have been found applicable, even under the intense scrutiny of courts applying contra proferentem, given that the events of September 11 were unique and distinguishable from prior terrorist activities in a number of ways. [62] Nevertheless, insurers agreed to provide benefits for losses under the existing policies, thereby waiving any application of war exclusions. [63] In so doing, however, they did not foreclose the possibility of excluding such losses in the future. [64] [*583] On the contrary, reinsurers pointedly reserved the right to exclude terrorism-related losses explicitly, as a matter of financial survival. [65]

A consensus quickly emerged among reinsurers that while the industry could survive the huge losses generated by the September 11 disaster, it could not absorb another shock of that magnitude in the near term. [66] In late September, the industry turned to Congress for intervention, proposing the creation of a federally-managed terrorism reinsurance pool modeled after the British system known as "Pool Re." [67] With seventy percent of the reinsurance agreements overlaying property insurance policies in the United States scheduled for renewal on January 1, 2002, reinsurers could not afford to delay taking action to revise their agreement terms so as to exclude terrorism coverage under renewing contracts. [68] Large reinsurers began announcing their intention to [*584] exclude all such coverage, while continuing to press for federal assistance. [69]

Reinsurers were able to revise their agreement terms, despite the consternation of Congress and state insurance regulators, because of the absence of state filing and approval requirements for reinsurance contract terms. [70] Whereas state regulatory agencies exercise veto power over the specific terms of insurance policies intended for issuance to consumers by direct writers, they exercise little power over the terms of reinsurance treaties as a matter of longstanding practice. [71] Although state regulators closely monitor the solvency of reinsurers, [72] their traditional willingness to allow flexibility in the terms of reinsurance treaties reflects a recognition that such agreements memorialize complex, negotiated financial arrangements between knowledgeable, sophisticated parties. Treaties are not amenable to standard terms; instead, they are customized to meet the unique needs and circumstances of particular insurers and their specific books of business. [73]

Since filing and approval of reinsurance contracts were not required, reinsurers were free to announce changes prior to renewing agreements with ceding primary writers for 2002, leaving the [*585] primary insurers without coverage for their excess risks attributable to terrorism. [74] The primary writers, however, could not in turn revise their contracts with policyholders, because they required approval by reluctant state regulators. [75] Mindful of the need for businesses to protect against losses due to terrorism, the regulators hesitated to allow direct insurers to file and obtain approval of terrorism exclusions. [76]

The NAIC, representing state insurance regulators who generally favor the preservation of the traditional role of the states in regulating the business of insurance, [77] initially opposed proposals for federal intervention, fearing that a federal terrorism reinsurance pool would

REV_00263891

"supplant the private market." [78] As reinsurers began to pull out, however, the NAIC joined the industry in supporting federal intervention to create an alternative mechanism, in recognition of the untenable position of the primary writers [*586] and the threat to their solvency presented by potential terrorism losses absent a federal "backstop." [79] On October 24, the organization adopted the following resolution:

Reinsurers are notifying their customers that they will no longer cover terrorism risk, and primary carriers are notifying state insurance regulators that they intend to seek exclusions of terrorism coverage in their contracts with policyholders. This lack of availability will have a severe adverse effect on our country's economy if, for example, lenders are unwilling to make loans without terrorism coverage.

We, the National Association of Insurance Commissioners, therefore pledge to work with the Congress and the White House and with other interested parties and take action as soon as possible to address this critical issue. [80]

Rejecting the industry's proposal for a federal reinsurance pool, the Bush administration proposed a plan in which the government would assume most terrorism losses during 2002, in order to give the industry time to recover from its September 11 losses, before gradually resuming responsibility for the full risk associated with providing terrorism coverage by the expiration of the program at the end of three years. [81] Both the House Financial Services Committee and the Senate Banking Committee held hearings on the subject in late October, followed by the introduction in the House on November 1, 2001, of the Terrorism Risk Protection Act, [82] a temporary program that would have provided financial assistance to property and casualty insurers in the form of loans. [83] Although the House passed its bill on November 29, the [*587] Senate became embroiled in a partisan dispute over an attached tort-reform measure barring punitive damages in lawsuits arising from terrorist attacks, and failed to reach agreement before adjourning on December 20, 2001. [84]

As Congress neared adjournment and it became less and less likely that federal safeguards would be in place soon enough to benefit insurers facing the year-end expiration of their reinsurance agreements, state regulators began to acknowledge that they would have no choice but to approve terrorism exclusions filed by primary insurers. [85] The NAIC took the step of adopting a definition of "act of terrorism" to be used as a guide for insurers who would file exclusions, [86] and when Congress adjourned without enacting federal legislation, the NAIC announced that "given Congress' failure to act, regulators will begin allowing insurers to exclude terrorism losses if a terrorist act causes total insured losses exceeding $ 25 million." [87] As a result, barring further federal legislative developments that could convince reinsurers to re-enter the terrorism insurance market and cause regulators to [*588] withdraw their approvals, explicit terrorism exclusions will now become ubiquitous across all lines of insurance that could be adversely affected by terrorist attacks like those of September 11, 2001.

IV. Lessons Learned: Avoiding the Pitfalls of Contra Proferentem

A. The Need for Unambiguous, Plain-English Terminology

Now that the World Trade Center disaster and the insurance crisis it generated have demonstrated, in no uncertain terms, the uninsurability of catastrophic acts of terrorism, insurers face the challenge of drafting and implementing exclusionary policy terms that state regulators will approve, yet will withstand judicial scrutiny. Case law attests to the dangers of ambiguity, in terms of both decisions adverse to particular insurers and of judicially precedential constructions contrary to insurer intent. [88] The insurance industry must take care not to squander the words and phrases that might be strung together to produce an effective policy exclusion by allowing each, in turn, to become invested with a legal meaning that confounds the purpose of the provision. At the same time, exclusionary terms must satisfy state "readability" requirements by using words calculated to be understood according to their "plain English" meanings by the majority of potential policyholders. [89] An effective terrorism exclusion will be one that successfully marries simplicity of language with precision of purpose in identifying sources of inestimable loss capable of producing claims so catastrophic as to invalidate rate-setting models and destabilize the financial condition of the insurer.

REV_00263892

[*589]

B. Exercise: The NAIC's Proposed Definition

Acknowledging that the NAIC, of necessity, crafted its proposal in the chaotic aftermath of September 11, [90] it is instructive, both as an illustration of the complexity of the insurers' task and as a cautionary exercise, to examine the regulators' proposed definition of "act of terrorism:"

An act, intentionally dangerous or destructive to human life, health, tangible or intangible property or infrastructure, carried out by a person or group that is not an agent of a sovereign state, but is acting on behalf of an organization based in a country other than the United States, and motivated by political, religious, or social beliefs. [91]

As a preliminary matter, the proposed definition, standing alone, does not satisfy the readability requirements imposed by many states for various types of coverage. [92] Although an isolated definition generally would not be evaluated separately but would be considered either as part of the policy form in its entirety or of a word sample selected in accordance with the regulation, the absence of sentence-differentiating punctuation and the number of multi-syllabic words used do not comport with the stated aims of these simplified policy language rules. [93] Corrective measures needed include the use of short sentences or clauses separated by semicolons or colons, the use of short, easily understood words, and the use of additional definitions, expressed in simplified language, to clarify any complex or technical terms that must be retained in order to preserve the precision and accuracy of the definition as part of a legal document. [94]

[*590] As to ambiguity, the grammatical structure of the NAIC's proposed definition gives rise to at least the following interpretive issues:

(1) Whether the modifier "intentionally" pertains only to "dangerous" or to both "dangerous" and "destructive";

(2) Whether "dangerous" stands alone, or pertains, like "destructive," to "human life, health, tangible or intangible property or infrastructure";

(3) Whether "human" modifies only "life"; both "life" and "health," or "life, health, tangible or intangible property or infrastructure";

(4) Whether the phrase "tangible or intangible" pertains only to "property," or to both "property" and "infrastructure";

(5) Whether "group" alone, or both "person" and "group," are modified by the phrase "that is not an agent of a sovereign state ..."; and

REV_00263893

(6) Whether it is the "person or group" or the "organization based in a country other than the United States" that must be "motivated by political, religious, or social beliefs."

Moreover, the elements of intent, sponsorship, and motivation imbedded in the definition invite courts to define the terms in the light "most favorable to the insured," which may create a result radically different from the exclusionary intent of the insurers. For example, if a hijacked airplane, intended to be flown into the White House, instead nose-dives into an office building in Pennsylvania as passengers attempt to foil the hijackers' plan, could it not be argued that contra proferentem compels the interpretation that the losses resulted from the acts of the brave passengers and were not due to "an act intentionally dangerous or destructive ... carried out by [terrorist(s)]?" If a terrorist "cell" comprised of foreign citizens legally residing in the United States who profess to be disciples of Osama bin Laden, but who have received no training, funding, or other sponsorship from Al Qaeda, undertake a suicide mission resulting in catastrophic loss of life and property, are the losses excluded as resulting from an "act of terrorism" as [*591] defined, or are they covered because they are the result of domestic criminal activity? If an organization claims motivation exclusively based on religion for its violent activities, yet those activities are abhorrent to the official tenets of that religion and are publicly renounced by its leaders, are these violent events "acts of terrorism," or do they fail the motivation prong of the definition?

Finally, the proposed terminology used by the NAIC, without further definition of key words and phrases, leaves room for misinterpretation. At a minimum, the terms "infrastructure," "sovereign," "acting on behalf of," and "based" require further clarification.

C. Where Traditional War Exclusions Failed

It may be irrelevant now whether war exclusions might have been construed to apply to the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, given certain salient features of those events that might have distinguished them from terrorist actions examined in earlier insurance cases. [95] In any case, after September 11, 2001, "war" and "terrorism" are now interchangeable terms when used as insurance shorthand for catastrophic acts of transnational violence constituting uninsurable risks. Given the history of war exclusion clauses, their probable ineffectiveness for eliminating terrorist acts from the universe of insured events, and the current opportunity for crafting and implementing effective terrorism exclusions, however, insurers need to differentiate between the two in order to ensure adequate protection from liability.

In crafting terrorism exclusions, insurers should be guided by the reasoning of courts that have held specific war-risk exclusions to be inadequate for purposes of excluding terrorism risks or have assigned legal meaning to specific terms that might appear within terrorism exclusions. If, conceptually, acts of war and acts of terrorism exist as distinct categories of risk, drafters should pay close attention to case law identifying the features courts view as essential for characterizing a given event as one or the other. Moreover, drafters should be guided by the overarching objective of deriving definitions appropriate for insurance purposes, [*592] even where legal definitions of terms for other purposes may be well established. In so doing, drafters should aim to eliminate any definitional gaps that could result in the failure of an exclusion to capture an uninsurable mega-catastrophe occurring in the gray area between "war" and "terrorism."

There are few judicial cases addressing the distinctions between "war" and "terrorism" for insurance purposes; the most relevant case and the one generally cited by commentators after the World Trade Center disaster is Pan American World Airways, Inc. v. The Aetna Casualty & Surety Co. [96] The court in Pan Am surveyed and summarized many of the earlier cases bearing on aspects of the distinction, making the case a key source of information on how various exclusionary terms will be construed. [97] Relevant delimiters provided by the case

REV_00263894

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 56 La. L. Rev. 825,AT 830

*56 La. L. Rev. 825, **

Copyright (c) 1996 Louisiana Law Review
Louisiana Law Review

Summer, 1996

56 La. L. Rev. 825

LENGTH: 8777 words

ARTICLE: PUNITIVE DAMAGES SYMPOSIUM: Punitive Damages Reform: The Case of Alabama

George L. Priest *

* John M. Olin Professor of Law and Economics and Director, Program in Civil Liability, Yale Law School.

SUMMARY:
... This paper addresses the modern grounds for punitive damages reform. ... During the 1993-94 fiscal year, an extraordinary 95.6% of tort cases filed in Bullock County included a punitive damages claim; 78.8%, in Lowndes County. ... Forty years ago, in a tort law regime that provided little in the way of consumer remedies, it might have been believed that ever-increasing civil liability verdicts, including punitive damages verdicts, would serve to reduce the number of accidents. ... Again, research of my own currently in progress shows that low-income consumers, if injured, are less likely to seek an attorney; even with an attorney, they are less likely to sue; less likely to recover; and, again by definition, less likely to recover large damage judgments since their lost income is typically low and pain and suffering awards, which are highly correlated with lost income, equally low. ... The Court found that a $ 2 million Alabama punitive damages verdict in a case involving a $ 6,000 compensatory economic loss to be constitutionally excessive. ... While the punitive damages experience in Alabama may appear unusual, there is always the potential for a substantial punitive damages verdict in any jurisdiction. ...

TEXT:
[*825]

This paper addresses the modern grounds for punitive damages reform. [1] It focuses on particular problems relating to punitive damages verdicts in Alabama, but the issue extends substantially beyond the Alabama case. Punitive damages verdicts are relatively infrequent in many jurisdictions. [2] From time to time, however, an occasional jury can render an enormous punitive damages verdict even in a jurisdiction where punitive damages awards are infrequent. Oftentimes, the trial or an appellate court will remit such a verdict, and the pattern of punitive damages infrequency will be restored. There is reason to believe, however, that in recent years the Alabama experience has been substantially different. As I shall describe in more detail below, beginning in the early 1990s, punitive damages verdicts increased in Alabama both in frequency and magnitude. While some of these verdicts were remitted in part on appeal, [3] there was no clear signal from the Alabama Supreme Court or any court of appeal as to what limits there might be to continued punitive damages awards. Perhaps as a consequence, the frequency and magnitude of punitive damages awards for excessiveness adopted by the Alabama Supreme Court. [40] Viewing the Alabama procedure on its face, few can contest [*838] that the review procedure appears reasonable. [41] In practice, however, as the Gallant case proves and as the statistics from the rural Alabama counties strongly suggest, the punitive damages problem in Alabama, under the procedures approved by the United States Supreme Court, has grown to epidemic proportions.

REV_00263912

The Court's recent BMW opinion, however, strikes out in a new direction. The Court found that a $ 2 million Alabama punitive damages verdict in a case involving a $ 6,000 compensatory economic loss to be constitutionally excessive. [42] The Court adopted three new metrics for the evaluation of excessiveness: the relation between the punitive damages verdict and 1) the "degree of reprehensibility" of the underlying tortious action; 2) the magnitude of compensatory losses; and, 3) criminal statutory penalties for similar offenses. [43] These metrics are likely to be far more successful in constraining punitive damages verdicts than the vague and overlapping "factors" under which Alabama courts previously reviewed punitive damages verdicts. [44]

Nevertheless, there remain serious questions as to how effective this form of comparison will prove in practice. Reprehensibility is a very vague concept and hardly susceptible of careful measurement. Similarly, the mathematical relationship between the compensatory and punitive damages elements is an odd judicial principle. Is there a principled reason that a ratio of 1 to 5 or 1 to 4 is constitutionally suspect in comparison to a ratio of 1 to 2 or less? Moreover, if the purpose of punitive damages is to deter behavior that is morally reprehensible, the relevance of the compensatory loss is not immediately evident unless an intent to affect the magnitude of loss was a specific element of the reprehensible action. Many totally inadvertent or accidental actions generate huge loss; many repugnant and reprehensible actions generate little harm, measured solely in compensatory terms of lost income, needed expense, and pain and suffering. Perhaps the most helpful metric is the relationship to statutory criminal penalties for comparable offenses. Here, legal analysis can be employed with some precision, though the question then arises why, given the existence of some criminal penalty for comparable action, punishment should be delegated to a civil jury through a punitive damages verdict in any case.

Upon reflection, it is not surprising that the Supreme Court has found it difficult to deal with excessive punitive damages. The Supreme Court's job, in general, is to define rights. Few would contest--I do not contest--that punitive damages may be appropriate in some contexts. I would not support a constitu- [*839] tional right of immunity from punitive damages (though that may well be an important improvement over the current state of the law).

What is needed for punitive damages reform is a prudential judgment of the appropriate cap or limit to punitive damages that will allow some room for punishing egregious behavior but constrain the deleterious effects of unlimited punitive damages judgments on consumers. For example, the proportional limit of three times economic losses or $ 250,000 in the recently enacted products liability legislation is a prudential judgment of that nature. But that prudential judgment is a uniquely legislative, not judicial, exercise. Regrettably, the President vetoed the legislation.

With respect to reform by the states, the question is somewhat different. Punitive damages verdicts implicate both interstate and foreign commerce in a manner that only Congress can address. Some have argued that a state without a significant manufacturing or interstate service sector could actually benefit its citizens by adopting an expansive civil liability regime at the expense of citizens of other states. Alabama may well be an example of this phenomenon. Congress is in the best position to provide a solution to this issue.

Secondly, there is one further effect of our modern punitive damages regime that should not go unnoticed: the effect on the competitiveness of American manufacturers and producers.

REV_00263921

Some have argued that large punitive damages verdicts in the U.S. are neutral with respect to competitiveness since 1) foreign courts do not award such verdicts against U.S. producers with respect to sales abroad; and, because 2) foreign producers are equally subject to such verdicts for sales in the United States. (Note that BMW is a German corporation.) Thus, for United States sales, foreign producers, just like United States producers, must add expected punitive damages and joint and several liability verdicts into the prices of products and services. (It is often lost on these observers that an increase in prices on account of punitive damages--even if operating neutrally--is not an affirmative argument on behalf of consumers.)

This analysis, however, is only partially correct. Increasingly, foreign courts are refusing to enforce extraordinary judgments from U.S. courts against foreign defendants. For example, the German Federal Court of Justice (Germany's highest court for civil and commerical matters) recently refused to enforce a $ 400,000 punitive damages verdict obtained in an American court by an American plaintiff against a German defendant on the grounds that the punitive damages verdict was inconsistent with German public policy. [45] In the same case, an intermediate United States court already had reduced the pain and suffering damages component from $ 200,000 to $ 70,000 on the same grounds. [46] [*840]

Foreign judgments of this nature should be alarming both to Congress and to United States courts. First, they are strong evidence that the current course of American law does not command widespread assent among reasoned commentators--yet another grounds for general punitive damages reform. Secondly, such judgments suggest an increasing competitiveness problem facing United States producers here in the United States. To the extent that United States punitive damages verdicts must be enforced abroad and foreign courts refuse to enforce them, foreign producers need not add the costs of the American civil justice system, including punitive damages and excessive pain and suffering awards, into the prices of products and services sold in the United States. Thus, foreign producers can underprice American producers in sales to American consumers here in the United States.

Ironically, although American producers and their employees are harmed by this effect, American consumers benefit because they can obtain products and services at lower prices without the effects of our punitive damages verdicts built in. [47] Put slightly differently, the refusal of foreign courts to enforce large punitive damages or pain and suffering awards from American courts represents a type of tort reform, regrettably however, only available--prior to punitive damages reform--to foreign, rather than to United States, producers.

These various reasons support an argument for widespread punitive damages reform. While the punitive damages experience in Alabama may appear unusual, there is always the potential for a substantial punitive damages verdict in any jurisdiction. In addition, there is the potential for punitive damages verdicts to increase in magnitude and frequency so as to become routine, as I believe to be the case in Alabama prior to BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore. It is too early to observe any effect of the BMW decision, and it is only speculation whether the seeming increase in precision of the three metrics defined by the Supreme Court can change the punitive damages environment in Alabama. If not, then some more drastic prudential judgment will be necessary to reduce the harm to consumers from excessive punitive damages awards.

FOOTNOTES:

↑n1 This paper is an expansion of testimony presented to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on Punitive Damages Tort Reform in April 1995. It presents some results of empirical work conducted since that presentation and discusses the recent U.S. Supreme Court opinion in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1966).

↑n2 See Michael Rustad, In Defense of Punitive Damages in Products Liability: Testing Tort Anecdotes with Empirical Data, 78 Iowa L. Rev. 1 (1992).

REV_00263922

n3 For a recent example, see Life Ins. Co. of Georgia v. Johnson, No. 1940357, 1996 WL 202543 (Ala. Apr. 26, 1996) ($ 12.5 million punitive damages verdict remitted to $ 5 million); but cf. Foster v. Life Ins. Co. of Georgia, 656 So. 2d 333 (Ala. 1994) ($ 250,000 punitive damages verdict by trial judge vacated by Alabama Supreme Court reinstating jury's $ 1 million punitive damages award).

n4 For the extraordinary effects that repeated punitive damages verdicts have had on tort claims, see infra text accompanying notes 16-20.

n5 See, e.g., Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 111 S. Ct. 1032 (1991); TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 113 S. Ct. 2711 (1993) (U.S. Supreme Court approval of Alabama punitive damages review procedures).

n6 BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996).

n7 Id.

n8 W. Page Keeton et al., Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts 9 (5th ed. 1984).

n9 See, e.g., Richard A. Posner, An Economic Approach to Legal Procedure and Judicial Administration, 2 J. Legal Stud. 399 (1973); George L. Priest, Selective Characteristics of Litigation, 9 J. Legal Stud. 399 (1980).

n10 These statistics are derived from a study by Forrest Latta, a summary of which formed the basis for the Alabama Supreme Court's statistical appendix in Life Ins. Co. of Georgia v. Johnson, No. 1940357, 1996 WL 202543 (Ala. April 26, 1996).

n11 See Rustad, supra note 2.

n12 All statistics presented are those for non-wrongful death cases only. Alabama procedures provide that the only measure of damages for wrongful death is punitive damages. It may well be appropriate to include wrongful death awards in this study both because the Alabama standards for wrongful death recoveries are equivalent to the standards for punitive damages recoveries in other cases and because the procedure for trial and appellate review is the same. See Green Oil Co. v. Hornsby, 539 So. 2d 218 (Ala. 1989). Nevertheless, the unusual character of Alabama verdicts in comparison to those of other states is best seen if the Alabama wrongful death experience is excluded since Alabama wrongful death procedures differ from those of virtually all other states.

n13 Gallant v. Prudential Life Ins. Co., Barbour County, AL, CV-93-50 (1994). See discussion infra text accompanying notes 27-36.

n14 See Rustad, supra note 2.

n15 George L. Priest, Private Litigants and the Court Congestion Problem, 69 B.U. L. Rev. 527, Table 1 at 540 (1989).

n16 These data were collected under a research project organized and directed by myself and Professor James R. Barth, Auburn University, and conducted by Cornerstone Research, Menlo Park, California, for the case Gallant v. Prudential. Data are available from the author.

n17 See George L. Priest, The Role of the Civil Jury in a System of Private Litigation, 1990 U. Chi. Leg. Forum 161 (1990) (65% of all jury trials in the Chicago trial courts deal with auto accidents).

REV_00263923

↑n18 Indeed, I present an anecdotal case--though a telling one--infra text accompanying notes 27-36.

↑n19 These statistics are taken from Alabama Dept. of Commerce, 1994 Economic Abstract of Alabama at Tables 5-1, 5-4, 5-7, 5-13, 5-17, 9-7, 9-11, 13-4, 13-5, 13-6, 13-7, 13-9.

↑n20 This figure again excludes wrongful death awards. See supra note 12. If such awards were included, the amount equals $ 109 million, equal to $ 26 per capita. See Life Ins. Co. of Georgia v. Johnson, No. 1940357, 1996 WL 202543 app. (Ala. Apr. 26, 1996).

↑n21 For a discussion of the development of modern tort law, see George L. Priest, The Invention of Enterprise Liability: A Critical History of the Intellectual Foundations of Modern Tort Law, 14 J. Legal Stud. 461 (1985).

↑n22 William M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, The Economic Structure of Tort Law (1987); Richard A. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law (4th ed., 1992); Steven Shavell, Economic Analysis of Accident Law (1987).

↑n23 See sources cited supra note 22. Of course, the latter is also a justification for the class action.

↑n24 See George L. Priest, The Current Insurance Crisis and Modern Tort Law, 96 Yale L.J. 1521 (1987).

↑n25 Again, I have endorsed limits on pain and suffering awards in contexts of expanded liability, though this issue is somewhat beyond the focus on punitive damages here. See id.

↑n26 Joseph E. Stigletz, Economics of the Public Sector 347 (1986).

↑n27 Gallant v. Prudential Life Ins. Co., Barbour County, AL, CV-93-50 (1994) [hereinafter cited as Gallant].

↑n28 Id.

↑n29 See generally American Law Institute, Restatement of Restitution and Unjust Enrichment (1936).

↑n30 Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 111 S. Ct. 1032 (1991). But see BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996), discussed infra.

↑n31 Gallant (mem. op.).

↑n32 BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996) (striking down a punitive damages verdict awarded by an Alabama court).

↑n33 Testimony of Professor James R. Barth, Auburn University in Gallant, supra note 27. Copy on file with author.

↑n34 Id.

↑n35 Gallant, supra note 27, Trial Transcript at 647, April 6, 1994.

↑n36 See supra text accompanying note 19.

↑n37 See, e.g., BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996); Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg, 114 S. Ct. 2331 (1994); TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509

REV_00263924

continued to escalate and to dramatically affect the entire civil dispute process. [4] As a consequence, punitive damages claims and awards have become a routine feature of the Alabama civil liability regime.

This paper addresses the Alabama phenomenon. While the Alabama experience, to my knowledge, is unique--there are no studies showing civil jury verdicts of this magnitude in any other American jurisdiction--there is no reason to believe that the phenomenon is unique to Alabama jurisprudence. Indeed, oddly enough, the procedures for trial and appellate review of punitive damages verdicts had been developed in the caselaw more completely for Alabama than for any other United States jurisdiction. [5] Instead, the recent Alabama experience [*826] seems reflective, more generally, of the consequences of permissive appellate review of jury trial punitive damages verdicts. As suggested by the Alabama experience, punitive damages verdicts can begin to snowball. As citizens see large punitive damages verdicts awarded in increasing numbers of cases, expectations and understandings begin to change. The large punitive damages verdict becomes the norm, rather than the exception. This paper documents that experience in Alabama and discusses the effects of such judgments on deterrence and on the welfare of consumers.

Within the past weeks, the United States Supreme Court has once again reviewed an Alabama punitive damages verdict and, for the first time, determined that the verdict and, to some extent, current Alabama punitive damages review procedures, fail constitutional norms. [6] This paper reviews that decision in the context of the broader Alabama experience, and discusses the likelihood that the new approach toward the review of punitive damages judgments adopted by the Supreme Court can halt the spiraling punitive damages experience in Alabama or other jurisdictions.

Part I reviews the Alabama experience to document what I regard to be the increasing commonality of Alabama punitive damages verdicts and claims. Parts II and III address the effects of routine punitive damages claims and verdicts. Part II focuses on deterrence, the principal rationale for punitive damages, and Part III discusses consumer welfare. Part II shows that the deterrent effect of punitive damages verdicts has been vastly overrated, especially with respect to corporate defendants. Part III explains how the principal victims of excessive punitive damages verdicts are consumers, and low-income consumers most of all. Finally, Part IV discusses whether effective punitive damages reform can be effected through the courts, reviewing the Supreme Court's decision in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, [7] or whether a legislative constraint on punitive damages is necessary. It is, of course, too early to determine what the effect of the BMW decision will be; indeed, it is premature to anticipate how the Alabama Supreme Court will respond to the decision. Part IV, however, hazards some preliminary thoughts on the extent to which the more careful inquiry now required by the United States Supreme Court can affect a punitive damages "environment," an environment now reaching to the level of citizen-juror expectations, such as that in Alabama. Part IV suggests that there are reasons to believe that legislative approaches to the punitive damages problem may still be required.

I. The Increasing Commonality of Punitive Damages

Forty years ago, punitive damages verdicts were exceptionally rare in all jurisdictions and were available against only the most extreme and egregious of [*827] defendant actions. [8] The world of civil litigation is surely different today, especially in Alabama. Both the number and, especially, magnitude of punitive damages judgments have increased dramatically. Indeed, in Alabama, the frequency of claims for punitive damages has increased to approach the routine. These claims affect the settlement process by increasing the litigation rate [9] and, necessarily, the ultimate magnitude of settlements, even in cases that are settled out of court.

A recent study of punitive damages trial verdicts illustrates the phenomenon. [10] Punitive damages verdicts of greater than $ 1 million are alleged to be rare, and verdicts in the multi-millions extremely rare. [11] Alabama appears to be an exception. In 1991, there were eleven reported punitive damages verdicts equal to or greater than $ 1 million and individual verdicts of $ 25 million, $ 45 million and $ 50 million. [12] In 1992, there were twenty-two reported punitive damages verdicts equal to or greater than $ 1 million and individual verdicts of $ 18 million, $ 25 million and $ 33.2 million. In 1993, there were fifteen verdicts equal to or greater than $ 1 million and individual verdicts of $ 12.5 million, $ 19.5 million and $ 65 million. Finally, in 1994, there were twelve verdicts equal to or greater than $ 1 million and individual verdicts of $ 22.7 million, $ 25 million [13] and $ 33.5 million.

REV_00263913

The frequency of million dollar and multi-million dollar verdicts over this time period is astounding and is suggestive of the commonality of punitive damages in Alabama. There remains, however, a better test of the commonality thesis. Some commentators continue to dismiss concerns about punitive damages on the grounds that even these numbers are not very large, given the number of jury verdicts reported across the country in any year. [14] In the American system of civil justice, of course, very few verdicts of any kind are reported, relative to the number of claims filed, since only two to five percent of civil cases filed [*828] ever proceed to a verdict. [15] The better test of the commonality of punitive damages verdicts derives from a study of claims.

Recently, I participated in an empirical study of the frequency of punitive damages claims in Alabama. A study of claims--the proportion of all tort cases filed that incorporate a claim for punitive damages--is the best test of the commonality of punitive damages expectations. The study, which to my knowledge is one of the only studies of punitive damages claims, was conducted in three Alabama counties: Bullock, Lowndes, and Barbour Counties. Each of these counties is a relatively rural locale with a small population and without substantial industry. We studied all tort actions filed in these counties in the past several fiscal years to determine the numbers in which punitive damages were claimed. To summarize the most recent statistics, we found that in the fiscal year 1992-93, 76.5% of all tort cases filed in Bullock County included a punitive damages claim; 65.1% in Lowndes County; and 78.3% in Barbour County. [16]

The exceptionally high proportion of punitive damages claims and the universality of such high proportions over each of the counties studied are striking and nearly incredible. Again, the study was not limited to claims involving high dollar amounts or product liability claims or, even, claims against corporate defendants; the study addressed all tort claims. Anyone familiar with our civil justice system knows that most tort actions involve relatively routine forms of accidents, such as traffic accidents. [17] That 65% to 78% of all tort actions over a given fiscal year included punitive damages claims starkly challenges the notion that punitive damages are an infrequent and seldom invoked remedy across American civil law.

Incredible as these numbers may seem, in the succeeding fiscal year, the proportion or number of tort cases including a punitive damages claim actually increased in each of the counties. During the 1993-94 fiscal year, an extraordinary 95.6% of tort cases filed in Bullock County included a punitive damages claim; 78.8%, in Lowndes County. In Barbour County, the proportion of tort cases including a punitive damages claim decreased from 78.3% to 72.1%, but the absolute number of punitive damages claims increased during 1993-94 by over 40%.

Much of the debate over punitive damages proceeds in the form of competing anecdotes in which a defender of our modern regime presents a case of exceptionally egregious defendant behavior deserving of punitive damages and [*829] a supporter of reform presents an opposite example. [18] The Alabama numbers belie anecdotes. No one can plausibly claim that 72.1% to 95.6% of all accident cases over an entire year in any county of the United States involve the form of exceptionally egregious defendant behavior that might merit substantial punitive damages. These numbers show that the role of punitive damages has changed dramatically in the Alabama civil justice system from an occasional remedy invoked against outrageous action to a commonplace of tort law practice.

REV_00263914

These numbers also belie the commonly-heard defense that actual punitive damages verdicts are rare and that many of those awarded by juries are later reduced on appeal such that there is no substantial effect. Debate can be had on what is meant by the term "rare" and what constitutes, in terms of magnitude of verdicts, a "substantial" effect. The impression is often suggested, however, that even for the nation in its entirety, punitive damages claims amount to nothing more than a handful.

Our Alabama study demonstrates that this is a great misimpression. Again, we did not select the largest cities in Alabama or industrial or manufacturing centers; in fact, we did just the opposite. The counties that we studied in Alabama are rural, with modest populations and a relatively non-urbanized citizenry. For example, Bullock County has a total population of only 11,042, 4,040 of whom are employed, and a per capita income of $ 9,212. Lowndes County has a total population of 12,658, with 5,300 employed, and a per capita income of $ 10,628. Barbour County is somewhat larger, with a total population of 25,417, with 12,400 employed, and a per capita income of $ 12,100. [19] None of these counties, however, resembles in the slightest metropolitan areas such as Miami, Los Angeles, or Dallas.

What did we find? In 1993-94, despite these small populations, punitive damages claims in these rural counties constituted far more than the claimed nationwide "handful." In Bullock County, 43 of 45 tort actions included a punitive damages claim; in Lowndes County, 52 of 66 tort actions included a punitive damages claim; in Barbour County, 93 of 129 tort actions included a punitive damages claim. Are punitive damages in Alabama insignificant? The claims reported above are quite recent and remain in the litigation pipeline. Looking to much earlier claims, however, our study in Alabama showed that the magnitude of punitive damages judgments affirmed by the Alabama Supreme Court from 1987 through the first half of 1994 totalled $ 53.2 million, [20] equal to roughly $ 13 per Alabama citizen.

This study demonstrates that the number and magnitude of affirmed punitive damages verdicts is only the very small tip of an extraordinary iceberg. Again, [*830] it is universally conceded that only 2% to 5% of cases filed ever proceed to verdict. Thus, it is not surprising that the systematic observation of any single type of verdict is relatively rare. What the Alabama numbers show is that the availability of unlimited punitive damages affects the 95% to 98% of cases that settle out of court prior to trial. It is obvious and indisputable that a punitive damages claim increases the magnitude of the ultimate settlement and, indeed, affects the entire settlement process, increasing the likelihood of litigation. Thus, as shown in the Bullock, Lowndes, and Barbour County figures, modern Alabama rules with respect to punitive damages impose these effects on a majority of even settled cases.

The next two Parts review the effects of punitive damages verdicts in contexts in which such verdicts have become commonplace. Part II discusses the deterrence justification of punitive damages. Part III addresses the effects of punitive damages on consumers, low-income consumers in particular.

II. Do Punitive Damages Serve a Necessary Deterrent Purpose?

Virtually every supporter defends punitive damages on the grounds of deterrence, accompanied by an anecdote or two involving persons who suffered serious losses in contexts in which most observers would agree that the respective defendant should have prevented the accident. Generally, the anecdotes speak for themselves: I have never once seen a careful study in a specific case showing that a punitive damages judgment of some particular amount was necessary to deter some particular wrongful behavior. Instead, the argument proceeds by implication. The basic defense of punitive damages--and I believe that it is the only serious defense--is the implication that large, unlimited punitive damages verdicts are necessary to control injurious activities in society. Put in a slightly different way, it is implied that without the availability of unlimited punitive damages awards, potential defendants, especially corporate defendants, would face no deterrent threat to prevent them from causing injuries.

REV_00263915

Forty years ago, in a tort law regime that provided little in the way of consumer remedies, it might have been believed that ever-increasing civil liability verdicts, including punitive damages verdicts, would serve to reduce the number of accidents. [21] That view, however, has been totally discredited today, and I know of no serious tort scholar publishing in a major legal journal who could maintain it. Instead, it is widely accepted--and it is a routine proposition of a first-year modern torts course--that compensatory damages--economic losses and pain and suffering--serve a complete deterrent purpose in addition to their role in compensating injured parties. Compensatory damages impose costs on [*831] defendants who wrongfully fail to prevent accidents, costs equal in amount to the injuries suffered. Compensatory damages internalize injury costs to defendants where some action has wrongfully injured an innocent party.

Indeed, the strongest theory in the modern tort academy is that full compensatory damages generate exactly the optimal level of deterrence of accidents--not too little and not too much. [22] For purposes of deterrence or accident prevention, there is no need for punitive damages of any dimension, not to mention unlimited punitive damages, given the availability of full compensatory damages. Of course, this is a theoretical conclusion, and there remains dispute in the academy as to whether, as an empirical matter, court, or juries calculate compensatory damages with perfection in every case or in every context. Thus, substantial academic attention has been given to the refinement of liability rules so that the deterrent effects of compensatory damages may be sharpened.

Given the role of compensatory damages as a deterrent, however, the analysis of punitive or other exemplary damages becomes substantially different. The only justification on grounds of deterrence for any exemplary award beyond the compensatory is that compensatory damages are inadequate for some reason, such as juries awarding damages which are too low in some dimension or some set of injuries going undetected or perhaps being too insignificant individually to justify litigation. [23] The only plausible defense of punitive damages on deterrence grounds is to restore aggregate damages to a level equal to that which is fully compensatory.

Opponents of punitive damages reform currently avoid this issue, but their failure to confront it suggests the ultimate weakness of their opposition. Again, anecdotes involving individuals suffering serious losses are not generally helpful to the analysis. I am extremely sympathetic--as all of us are--to individuals suffering serious injuries. We all wish that wrongfully injurious actions might have been avoided. Given a wrongful injury, we all want the victim to receive full compensation for economic losses and pain and suffering.

The question for punitive damages tort reform, however, is as follows: Given full compensation to the victim, is there some affirmative deterrent purpose served by awarding further damages? Is there some reason to believe that the payment of full compensatory damages will fail to deter the defendant, such that some further multiple through punitive damages is absolutely necessary? For corporate defendants, the answer surely is no. Corporate defendants who must maximize profits net of costs must necessarily take the prospect of compensatory damages into account when determining how to invest in accident prevention. Again, this analysis presumes full compensation. If there were some reason to believe that juries were systematically undervaluing economic losses or pain and suffering, [*832] punitive damages might be necessary to make up for the shortfall. Of course, the opposite may be true. Many, including myself, believe that juries overvalue compensatory damages, including pain and suffering, justifying increased limits on pain and suffering awards, especially in contexts of expanded liability. [24] Barring such a shortfall, however, there is no justification for punitive damages on deterrence grounds.

REV_00263916

The analysis is, perhaps, somewhat different in the context of individual, noncorporate defendants who are less subject to cost constraints and, perhaps, more inclined to behave unconscionably. This is the reason that exemplary or punitive damages are often awarded in cases involving intentional harms such as assault.

As administered by juries, however, our current civil liability regime approaches the issue exactly backwards. In our current regime, large punitive damages verdicts are seldom awarded against non-corporate defendants. I know of no one objecting to a punitive damages cap on the grounds that it will impair the deterrence of private individuals. Instead, large punitive damages verdicts are most typically awarded against corporate defendants who, as profit maximizers (a motivation often irrationally held against them), will be carefully responsive to compensatory damages. Corporate defendants need no punitive damages verdict to encourage them to take all cost-effective precautions to prevent injuries; compensatory damages alone achieve that result. Thus, the increasingly commonplace plaintiff lawyer's charge to a jury to "send the corporate defendant a signal" ignores entirely the universally accepted academic view that, to a corporate defendant, full compensatory damages are not only an effective signal, but also the only signal needed.

III. Do Punitive Damages Help or Hurt Consumers?

If the effect of punitive damages were to benefit consumers or if their effect were even neutral to the consumer interest, we might not be concerned that punitive damages are unnecessary to deter corporate defendants from injurious behavior. The central problem of punitive damages, however, is that, except in the rare cases of jury undervaluation of damages or underlitigation, punitive damages settlements and verdicts affirmatively harm consumers, low-income consumers most of all.

Where punitive damages become commonplace in civil litigation, as in Alabama, or even where they become a significant risk to business operations, consumers are harmed because expected punitive damages verdicts or settlements must be built into the prices of products and services. The effect of the increased frequency and magnitude of punitive damages recoveries of modern times has been to increase the price level for all products and services provided in the United States economy. To observe this phenomenon is not to say that [*833] injured consumers should go uncompensated. If a consumer suffers an injury that can be attributed to some wrongful activity of a defendant, whether manufacturer or service provider, that consumer should receive compensation for economic losses and for reasonable non-economic losses, such as pain and suffering. [25] In contrast, punitive damages, by definition, go beyond the compensatory. The problem with the increasing commonality of large punitive damages verdicts and settlements, such as those in Alabama, is that the awards to some consumers of greater than compensatory damages must be built into the prices paid by all other consumers.

It is an obvious implication of this proposition that low-income consumers are most seriously harmed by our current punitive damages regime. First, lowincome consumers have less money generally and, regardless of the product or service, are more seriously affected in terms of the purchasing power of their limited resources when price levels increase. Secondly, and most importantly, low-income consumers are not the typical beneficiaries of large punitive damages verdicts or settlements, at least not on a systematic basis. Again, research of my own currently in progress shows that low-income consumers, if injured, are less likely to seek an attorney; even with an attorney, they are less likely to sue; less likely to recover; and, again by definition, less likely to recover large damage judgments since their lost income is typically low and pain and suffering awards, which are highly correlated with lost income, equally low.

REV_00263917

Put more simply, where punitive damages verdicts and settlements are frequent and large, low-income consumers are forced to subsidize high-income consumers as expected punitive damages awards are built into the prices of products and services. All consumers--high-income and low-income alike--pay the increased prices; chiefly the high-income gain the return in high compensatory and punitive damages recoveries. Again, a low-income individual will receive a punitive damages windfall, but the far more systematic effect is to harm the low-income consumer as the prices of products and services generally are increased to adjust for the expectation of future punitive damages payouts.

It is important to recognize that the current effect of the doctrines of comparative negligence and joint and several liability is similar. Comparative negligence and joint and several liability have their most general effects on organizations or entities which engage in a large scope of activities, such as state and municipal governmental entities, public utilities, and the like. It has become a commonplace of modern civil litigation for plaintiffs' attorneys to join as defendants any governmental entity or utility remotely associated with an injury. Thus, state governments and municipalities are joined as defendants on claims that roads were misdesigned or poorly maintained, or that a guard rail or telephone pole could have been placed in a better position. Forty years ago, attorneys would not have thought to include entities whose causal relationship to [*834] the harm was so low or, alternatively, if they had attempted to join such entities, the claim would have been dismissed. Today, such litigation is routine and imposes substantial litigation expenses upon our state and municipal governments as well as liability expenses, infrequently but chiefly under the operation of the doctrines of comparative negligence and joint and several liability, where the truly responsible defendants have gone bankrupt, leaving our governments and utilities to suffer the remaining judgment.

It is clear that, for very similar reasons, operation of the doctrines of comparative negligence and joint and several liability harms citizens in general, but low-income citizens most of all. Damages judgments against state and municipal governments must be paid from state and municipal financial sources. It is well-established that state and, especially, municipal finance are seriously regressive in effect, charging more to middle- and low-income citizens, proportionate to income, than to relatively high-income citizens. [26]

These propositions about the effect of punitive damages, comparative negligence and joint and several liability on low-income citizens may appear abstract; however, I believe that they are generally accepted within the academic community. To illustrate their import with greater salience, however, I would like to present one recent example of a punitive damages verdict in Alabama: the case that inspired the research presented above. The case will both reaffirm the pressing need for punitive damages reform and illustrate why such reform should be expanded to all state and federal litigation.

In the case of Gallant v. Prudential, [27] decided by jury verdict in April 1994, Iran and Leslie Gallant sued Prudential Life Insurance Company based on the actions of a Prudential agent. The Gallants purchased a combination life insurance-annuity policy with a $ 25,000 face value at a monthly premium of roughly $ 39.00. At the time of sale, the agent told them that the value of the annuity was roughly twice what it in fact was. The agent had added together the table indicating "Projected Return" with the table indicating the lower "Guaranteed Return." A jury found this action fraudulent and held the agent liable and Prudential separately liable for failing to better supervise the agent. [28]

Fortunately, the problem was discovered before the policyholder had died or had retired to receive the annuity. Thus, to the time of trial, there was no true economic loss beyond the failed expectation of the larger future return. According to the transcript of the testimony, the Gallants testified that, between the time they discovered the misinformation and Prudential called them to offer a remedy (Prudential offered to return their premiums or to discuss adjusting the policy), they had suffered roughly two weeks of sleepless nights and substantial anger at having been misled. That was the extent of their "mental anguish." [*835]

REV_00263918

Twenty years ago, cases of this nature were part of the legal field entitled Restitution, in which the appropriate remedy was restitution of all paid premiums or out-of-pocket costs. On very rare occasions, such as especially egregious actions by a defendant, some courts considered awarding plaintiffs the benefit of the bargain, say, by increasing their annuity benefits. [29]

Our modern world has changed. After a one and one-half day trial, an Alabama jury awarded the Gallants damages equal to $ 30,000 in economic loss, $ 400,000 in mental anguish, and $ 25 million in punitive damages. Again, the face value of the insurance policy was only $ 25,000.

I do not wish to minimize the harm to the Gallants, especially the indignity of the misrepresentation, or condone the fraudulent actions of the agent, apparently perpetrated on several other Alabama citizens who recovered separately. Nevertheless, there is not a single person to whom I have described this case--not an attorney, whether plaintiff or defendant; not a liberal or a conservative; not even a radical or idealistic Yale Law student (or faculty member)--who has not been shocked by the outcome or who could defend it as a rational or sensible verdict in the context of the harm. Again, many defenders of punitive damages argue that exceptionally large verdicts are usually overturned on appeal. Alabama's review procedure for punitive damages verdicts had been carefully analyzed and approved by the United States Supreme Court shortly before the Gallant trial. [30] In the Gallant case, however, the judge conducting the review affirmed the $ 25 million award in its entirety, though directing part of the amount to be paid to the State. [31] The case was later settled prior to the United States Supreme Court's recent decision in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore. [32]

What will be the effect of a punitive damages verdict of this nature? The Gallants appear to be persons of modest means (at least before the verdict). Does a verdict of this nature help middle- or low-income consumers in the aggregate? Unfortunately, totally the opposite is true. The insurance policy in question--face value, $ 25,000--was the cheapest form of life insurance/annuity available on the market; its monthly premium was only $ 39.00. Obviously, at such a premium, the insurance carrier could not be expecting to make a substantial profit on the policy. Indeed, an economic expert in the case for Prudential estimated that, over the entire life of the policy, the premiums net of payouts paid by the Gallants would increase Prudential's assets by only $ 46.00. [33] Prudential, like most other life insurance companies, profits more [*836] substantially from large dollar, rather than small dollar, policies. The expert estimated that the verdict reduced dividends to every Alabama policyholder (Prudential is a mutual carrier) by $ 323. [34]

How do we analyze a case like this in terms of whether punitive damages serve a necessary deterrent effect? In his closing argument, the highly effective attorney for the Gallants asked the jury to determine a level of damages that would send a "message" to the giant Prudential Life Insurance Company that fraudulent behavior on the part of an agent would not be tolerated. [35] What kind of damages message is necessary to achieve that effect? Obviously, if the insurer stood to gain no more than $ 46 over the life of the policy, any damages judgment greater than $ 46 sends the insurer a message by making the policy unprofitable. (Of course, I ignore entirely Prudential's defense costs plus the reputational harm from the lawsuit.) The jury in the Gallant case went substantially beyond that amount, however, in awarding compensatory damages of $ 30,000 for economic loss and $ 400,000 for the mental anguish from the two weeks of lost sleep and anger. It certainly cannot be argued that the jury undervalued the Gallant's compensatory loss--indeed, the $ 400,000 mental anguish award itself is extreme. The median per capita income in Barbour County, where the Gallant case was tried, was $ 12,100. [36] Furthermore, there is no reason to think that the agent's behavior in other contexts would go undetected. (Prudential later settled other cases brought by the agent's clients.) As a consequence, there is little justification for a punitive damages award whatsoever.

What will be the effect of punitive damages verdicts such as that in the Gallant case? In the face of such a verdict, what is the rational response of an insurer like Prudential, or other insurers selling similar policies? Regrettably, but necessarily in a competitive industry, the rational response is to quit selling such low value policies altogether. It makes very little sense to expose the company and its policyholders to the risk of such a damages verdict given the very small gain from the sale of such a policy.

Is this the type of product that our civil liability system should drive from the market? Obviously not, and low-income consumers in Alabama are directly harmed as a result. Here, the dramatically differential effects of such verdicts on high-income versus low-income consumers are made clear. In my own view, it is far more important to our society--if a choice had to be made--to have our insurance industry provide life insurance coverage to low-income citizens than to high-income citizens, since the relatively affluent of our society have other means of providing financial security for their families. The availability of financial protection and security at relatively low cost will be substantially diminished if such low premium policies, as here, are no longer available. [*837]

More generally, where expected punitive damages verdicts are added to the prices of products and services, the first to feel the effect will be low-income consumers. And where the magnitude of punitive damages verdicts rises, imperiling the continued provision of the product or service, the first to be affected will be those products and services with the lowest profit margins, those most attractive to the low-income consumers. The Gallant case provides a dramatic example of the effect. Following Gallant and other large punitive damages verdicts, several insurers quit offering coverage in Alabama altogether.

Punitive damages reform would cure that ill to the benefit of all Americans, especially low-income Americans. Punitive damages verdicts such as the $ 25 million verdict in the Gallant case encourage wasteful litigation. Indeed, litigation seeking punitive damages judgments against financial service companies has become an industry in Alabama. By increasing the prices of all products and services, punitive damages verdicts and settlements reduce the purchasing power of all Americans, especially the poor.

IV. Punitive Damages Reform: Statutory or Judicial?

Many defenders of the current regime question why legislatures should become involved in civil liability reform, rather than leaving reform initiatives to the courts. The question is particularly appropriate given that the Supreme Court has addressed the issue of the excessiveness of punitive damages in several recent cases, including the BMW decision. [37]

First, it is evident, after many opportunities, that the Supreme Court has great difficulty proceeding beyond what might be called a "procedural" approach to the punitive damages problem. With the exception of the recent BMW opinion, the only form of punitive damages control that the Court has adopted has been purely procedural--approving a set of procedures at the state level for judicial review of punitive damages verdicts, [38] or disapproving a state judicial procedure as not providing sufficient review. [39] The recent BMW opinion, as I shall describe, addresses directly the question of the excessiveness of punitive damages verdicts, but chiefly adopts a new set of procedural comparisons for judicial evaluation.

In my view, a merely procedural approach to the punitive damages problem will never be successful. Indeed, we have stark evidence of its failure. In 1991 in the Haslip case, the Supreme Court specifically approved the procedure for reviewing punitive damages verdicts

REV_00263920

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: perry /2 apelbaum and "punitive damages" and y2k (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*8 Cornell J. L. & Pub. Pol'y 591, **

Copyright (c) 1999 Cornell University
Cornell Journal of Law and Public Policy

Spring, 1999

8 Cornell J. L. & Pub. Pol'y 591

LENGTH: 43858 words

ARTICLE: THE THIRD WAVE OF FEDERAL TORT REFORM: PROTECTING THE PUBLIC OR PUSHING THE CONSTITUTIONAL ENVELOPE?

Perry H. Apelbaum and Samara T. Ryder +

+ Minority General Counsel and Counsel, respectively, U.S. House Judiciary Committee. The opinions expressed herein represent the views of the authors and do not reflect the views of the House Judiciary Committee. The authors are grateful for comments received on earlier drafts by Victor Schwartz, Mark Behrens, Jeffrey White, Alan Morrison, Roger Ballantine, Andrew Popper, Jonathan Yarowsky, and Michael Rustad, and for the research assistance of Dawn Burton.

SUMMARY:
... In none of these statutes did Congress purport to leave state law in place while attempting to modify its content." ...

TEXT: [*592]

I. INTRODUCTION

The United States has experienced several phases of federal tort reforms. [1] Congress' initial legislative reform efforts sought to alter state tort law applicable between common carriers and their employees by eliminating a number of common law defenses and substituting a comparative negligence standard. [2] In this regard, after the 1906 Employers' Liability Act [3] was struck down on Commerce Clause grounds, [4] Congress narrowed the law and enacted a similar law, the 1908 Employers' Liability Act. [5]

Commencing in the middle part of the century, Congress sought to encourage a variety of forms of conduct - such as the construction of nuclear power facilities [6] and swine flu immunization [7] - by granting potential defendants partial immunity from tort liability. In exchange for forfeiting common law rights against these private parties, claimants were granted offsetting legal benefits, such as the ability to seek damages against the United States under the Federal Torts Claims Act. [8]

[*593] Beginning in the 1990's, Congress commenced what can be viewed as a third phase of, or wave of, tort reform. These laws and proposals limit or pare back a number of common

REV_00263925

As for the due process challenge, O'Conner rejected the contention that it was irrational to apply the 1988 Amendments to circumstances other than the Three Mile Island nuclear accident. [162] After noting the [*611] plaintiff must overcome a "strong presumption" [163] of constitutionality, the court found retroactive application of the removal and consolidation provisions of the 1988 Amendments could provide advantages and efficiencies to a broad class of nuclear incidents above and beyond the Three Mile Island accident. [164]

In TMI [165] the court applied a straightforward rational basis constitutional test, finding the 1988 Amendments furthered Congress' stated goals of " 'uniformity, equity, and efficiency in the disposition of public liability claims' arising from nuclear accidents." [166] The Third Circuit found that retroactive application applied the Price-Anderson Act to all parties and therefore eliminated the potential for inconsistent results between jurisdictions. [167] Furthermore, TMI asserted the 1988 Amendments promoted efficiency by allowing consolidation of all nuclear accident cases in a single forum, remedying what the court referred to as "procedural problems plaguing the TMI cases." [168]

F. Westfall Act

In reaction to the Supreme Court's decision in Westfall v. Erwin [169] limiting federal employees' immunity from tort, [170] Congress enacted the Federal Employees' Liability Reform and Tort Compensation Act of 1988 (the "Westfall Act"). [171] The Westfall Act broadened the Federal Drivers Act to provide for substitution of the United States as a defendant in actions arising from torts committed by federal employees acting within the scope of their employment, and applied retroactively to cases pending on the date of enactment. [172]

Rather than challenging the general limitations on liability set forth in the Westfall Act, plaintiffs focused on provisions applying to pending [*612] actions. However, claims that the Act's retroactivity provisions violated Fifth Amendment due process rights were rejected by the Eleventh Circuit in Sowell v. American Cyanimid; [173] the Sixth Circuit in Arbour v. Jenkins; [174] and the Tenth Circuit in Salmon v. Shwarz. [175] In each case, the courts found that "a legal claim [for tortious injury] affords no definite or enforceable property right until reduced to a final judgment," [176] and were therefore not subject to constitutional protection. In Salmon the court also argued that any disadvantages to plaintiffs were offset by the legal benefits available under the Westfall Act, noting "there are advantages afforded under the [Federal Torts Claims Act, such as] the administrative claim procedure for more expeditious resolutions, and the liability of the government in lieu of the risk that individual defendants may be judgment proof." [177]

IV. THE THIRD WAVE: PROTECTING THE PUBLIC OR PUSHING THE CONSTITUTIONALENVELOPE?

The third and most recent wave of federal tort reforms was initiated in the 1990's, when Congress enacted several narrowly tailored laws providing specific liability exemptions; such as a statute of repose for general aviation, exemptions from ordinary negligence for food donors and volunteers, caps on liability for rail passenger providers, and limitations on liability for medical implant suppliers who meet certain contractual and other product specifications, and limitations on liability in Y2K actions. [178] Due to the relatively narrow scope of these laws, they have not yet been applied in a manner giving rise to constitutional challenge. [179] [*613] Congress has also considered a number of far broader liability reforms involving areas such as products liability, medical malpractice and tobacco liability. [180] Collectively, this third wave of reforms raise a number of constitutional issues which have not been fully addressed in either the first or second wave of federal tort laws.

A. Recently Enacted Federal Tort Reforms

REV_00263934

1. General Aviation Revitalization Act of 1994

The General Aviation Revitalization Act of 1994 (the "General Aviation Act") [181] provides for an 18-year federal statute of repose for manufacturers of "general aviation aircraft" [182] and their component parts. As such, the law operates to prevent plaintiffs from bringing civil actions for death or injury or damage to property stemming from an accident against a manufacturer of a general aviation aircraft or component part which is more than 18 years old. The statute operates on a "rolling basis," so that if an original part is replaced, the new part would have a new 18-year statute of repose commencing with its replacement. [183]

The General Aviation Act does not apply in cases in which: (1) the manufacturer has misrepresented safety information to the Federal Aviation Administration; (2) the claimant was a passenger for purposes of receiving emergency medical treatment; (3) the claimant was not aboard the aircraft; and (4) actions are brought pursuant to written warranties. [184] The General Aviation Act is "one-way preemptive," that is to say it only supersedes state laws where there are no statutes of repose or which provide for a longer statute of repose. [185]

The General Aviation Act stems from concerns that the United States' general aviation industry was declining in part due to excessive liability burdens and the costs of defending so-called frivolous lawsuits. [*614] In their report on the legislation, the House Transportation Committee concluded that "an important factor in the decline of general aviation manufacturing has been the industry's product liability costs, which have increased from $ 24 million in 1978 to more than $ 200 million a year in recent years." [186] An additional factor justifying Congress' interest was the fact that the general aviation industry was considered uniquely susceptible to federal tort relief because it was otherwise subject to " 'cradle to grave'federal regulatory oversight" - including FAA approval of aircraft designs, federal licensing of pilots, mechanics and maintenance facilities, federal regulation of air routes and fuel handling, and FAA and National Transportation Safety Board review of aircraft accidents. [187]

The liability law which was ultimately enacted was far less comprehensive than previous versions of the legislation. As originally introduced by Senator Kassebaum (R-KA) and approved by the Senate Commerce Committee in 1986, general aviation reform would have established a uniform federal standard of negligence for general aviation accidents; mandated comparative negligence; altered the rules of evidence in general aviation cases (i.e., to explicitly provide that plaintiffs may not introduce evidence of subsequent remedial measures); set forth a federal standard for the award of punitive damages; created a two-year federal statute of limitations for bringing liability actions, and allowed automatic removal to federal courts as well as providing for a federal statute of repose (originally sought to be 12 years). [188]

Due to the controversy engendered by such a wide-ranging approach, [189] by 1993 the bill's sponsors settled on seeking a single reform - the imposition of a 15-year statute of repose. In order to obtain the consensus necessary to obtain clearance for consideration and approval in the Senate, the bill was further modified to extend the statute of repose period to 18-years, and exceptions were added to exempt cases involving misrepresentations to the FAA and written warranties, as well as persons injured on the ground and pursuant to medical evacuation. [190]

[*615]

2. Bill Emerson Good Samaritan Food Donation Act

The Bill Emerson Good Samaritan Food Donation Act (the "Food Donation Act"), [191] enacted in 1996, exempts persons who donate [192] food and grocery products to nonprofits [193] for distribution to the needy, as well as the non-profits themselves, from civil or criminal liability in connection with food which is "apparently wholesome" and grocery products which are "apparently fit" (i.e., meeting applicable quality and labeling standards). [194]

REV_00263935

The Food Donation Act allows persons to donate food and grocery products which do not meet applicable quality and labeling standards without fear of liability so long as the nonprofit organization is so informed, agrees to remedy the defect, and has the knowledge to do so. [195] The law also protects persons who permit food to be "gleaned" (harvested from their land free of charge) from civil or criminal liability arising from the gleaner, except in cases of gross negligence or intentional misconduct. [196] The Food Donation Act does not include a specific clause stating that it is one-way preemptive, however, it is written in such a manner that it provides only relief from liability in specified situations, and therefore does not appear to create any liability where gross negligence or intentional misconduct occur except as otherwise provided under state law. [197]

Proponents of the Food Donation Act asserted it was needed to provide a minimum federal floor of liability protection in order to encourage the various forms of food donation activity. [198] While it was acknowledged that all states had adopted some form of liability protection to food donors, supporters believed these laws were inconsistent and created confusion, particularly for large national food donors. [199]

[*616] The Food Donation Act was based on a model good samaritan statute which Congress adopted in 1990. [200] In March of 1996, a conference committee declined to extend the law into a federal mandate as part of the Agriculture bill because of stated federalism and jurisdictional concerns. [201] However, in the wake of the death of the proposal's principal supporter, Rep. Bill Emerson (R-MO), the legislation received renewed attention and was able to easily pass the House and Senate in substantially the same form as the introduced version. [202]

3. Volunteer Protection Act of 1997

The Volunteer Protection Act of 1997 (the "Volunteer Protection Act"), [203] provides a variety of protections from liability to individuals who volunteer for nonprofit organizations [204] or government agencies. [205] The principal form of protection provided by the Act insulates volunteers [206] from actions for harm caused by ordinary negligence (i.e., not caused by willful or criminal conduct, gross negligence, reckless misconduct or a conscious, or flagrant indifference to the rights or safety of others). [207] This protection from civil liability does not apply to volunteers acting outside the scope of their responsibility, volunteers acting without a required license, certification, or authorization, or harm caused by a motor vehicle. [208]

[*617] In addition, the Volunteer Protection Act provides special protections to volunteers for actions involving punitive damages and actions involving joint and several liability with respect to volunteers acting within the scope of their employment. [209] Punitive damages may only be allowed if the plaintiff establishes by clear and convincing evidence that the harm was caused by willful or criminal misconduct, or a conscious, flagrant indifference to the rights or safety of others. [210] Joint and several liability by volunteers is eliminated for "non-economic" damages (e.g., pain and suffering). Instead, under the Volunteer Protection Act volunteers are only responsible for paying non-economic damages to the extent of their "percentage of responsibility" (as determined by the trier of fact). [211]

The Volunteer Protection Act is one-way preemptive, superseding state laws "except to the extent that such laws are inconsistent with [the] Act, except that [the] Act shall not preempt any state law that provides additional protections from liability relating to volunteers...." [212] However, the Volunteer Protection Act permits the operation of certain state laws requiring that nonprofit organizations operate in a safe and sound manner, namely, laws requiring nonprofit organizations to adopt risk management procedures (e.g., training volunteers), be subject to respondeat superior (i.e., vicarious employer liability for employee negligence), and have a secure source of funds for victim recovery available. [213] [*618] States are also permitted to exempt lawsuits brought against volunteers by police officers and other state and local officials. [214] In addition, the Volunteer Protection Act allows states to enact stand alone legislation opting out of the new volunteer protection provisions entirely. [215]

REV_00263936

The legislation's supporters asserted that an increase in the number of lawsuits being brought against volunteers was having a negative impact on volunteerism. [216] Proponents also asserted that inconsistencies between the various state laws were having an adverse impact on national volunteer organizations. During House floor debate, Judiciary Chairman Hyde (R-IL) argued that "the Red Cross, for example, would like to be able to train people... for disaster relief... and it is important that they not have to concern themselves with the checkerboard of liability laws. In addition, there is a very small insurance market to cover volunteers. The cost of that insurance becomes prohibitive if it has to be complicated by a plethora of liability standards from state to state." [217]

The Volunteer Protection Act traces its roots to legislation introduced by Rep. Porter (R-IL) in 1987 as H.R. 911 and reintroduced as that bill number in each succeeding Congress. [218] Rather than mandating immunity for specified volunteer activity, the approach taken by these bills was to encourage the states to adopt volunteer liability protection provisions by offering the incentive of a one percent increase in their Social Security block grants. [219] During the 105[su'th'] Congress, however, proponents of volunteer liability legislation took a more aggressive approach, mandating the liability limitations, rather than encouraging them through [*619] block grants. [220] In order to obtain the consensus needed to pass the bill in the Senate, the legislation was revised to exclude the nonprofit organizations themselves from coverage and exempt motor vehicle liability cases. [221]

4. Section 161 of the Amtrak Reform and Accountability Act of 1997

Section 161 of the Amtrak Reform and Accountability Act of 1997 (the "Amtrak Act") [222] provides liability protections relating to the standards for awarding punitive damages and overall damage awards stemming from accidents in connection with the provision of rail passenger transportation. [223]

With regard to punitive damages, the Amtrak Act provides that such damages may only be awarded if a passenger establishes by clear and convincing evidence that the harm resulted from conduct carried out with a conscious, flagrant indifference to the rights or safety of others. [224] The Amtrak Act also limits the aggregate overall damages that may be awarded to all passengers for all claims (including punitive damages) from a particular rail accident to $ 200 million. [225]

The final law also specifies that Amtrak and other providers of rail transportation may enter into indemnification agreements allocating financial responsibility for passenger accidents. [226] This is apparently intended to preserve Amtrak's authority to enter into agreements with track owners and operators whom Amtrak assumes liability for in the event of a passenger accident, without resolving the issue of whether such agreements are ultimately enforceable in court. [227] In exchange for these various [*620] protections, the Amtrak Act mandates that Amtrak maintains a total minimum liability coverage through insurance and self-insurance of at least $ 200 million per accident or incident. [228] Proponents of passenger rail liability reforms sought to justify them on the basis that they would save the taxpayers' money, since Amtrak is a publicly-funded corporation. [229] Supporters also observed that there was precedent at the federal and state level for limiting liability associated with public transportation. [230]

The version of passenger rail liability limitations passed into law was far narrower than the originally proposed reforms. In addition to adopting a minimum federal standard for awarding punitive damages, proponents had initially sought: a non-economic damages cap at an amount equal to economic damages plus $ 250,000; a punitive damages cap at the greater of $ 250,000 or three times economic damages; and a mandate of the enforceability of indemnification agreements. [231] The original version of the bill would have also applied to all potential plaintiffs - passengers as well as non-passengers and property owners harmed by passenger rail accidents. [232] These latter provisions were opposed by many Democrats, [233] and after failing to pass the Senate, were deleted from the final bill.

REV_00263937

5. Biomaterials Access Assurance Act of 1998

The Biomaterials Access Assurance Act of 1998 ("Biomaterials Access Assurance Act"), [234] allows suppliers of raw materials and medical implant component parts to be dismissed from product liability actions if [*621] they meet certain contractual and other product specifications. [235] The concept behind the Biomaterials Access Assurance Act dates from the product liability bill vetoed by President Clinton during the 104[su'th'] Congress. That bill included a title exempting medical implant suppliers from product liability actions so long as they have met certain contractual and other product specifications. [236] Proponents of the Act argued that frivolous suits against implant suppliers, as well as the fear of such lawsuits, have an adverse impact on the availability of life-saving medical implants. [237]

During the 105[su'th'] Congress, however, proponents agreed to a number of legislative refinements which narrowed the overall impact of the Act. Most importantly, rather than permanently barring a liability action against suppliers who meet these conditions (as the 104[su'th'] Congress' version would have), under the Biomaterials Access Assurance Act, an implant supplier may subsequently be impleaded back into the action if a claimant or manufacturer can show by clear and convincing evidence that the supplier's negligence was the actual and proximate cause of the [*622] harm. [238] The Biomaterials Access Assurance Act excludes actions involving silicon breast implants completely. [239]

The dismissal and impleader provisions in the Biomaterials Access Assurance Act are enforceable through an elaborate set of procedural mandates. For example, in order to obtain a pre-trial dismissal, the Act specifies that a defendant may file a motion alleging that it has met the various legal requirements for dismissal, including the contractual and other product specifications. [240] While the motion is pending, the Biomaterials Access Assurance Act limits discovery and requires that state courts rule on the motion based on the pleadings and affidavits before it. [241] It also sets forth rules for the issuance of summary judgments and stays. [242] Post-trial motions to implead are also subject to limited discovery [*623] and the Act provides further opportunity for the supplier to supplement the record before any trial on the merits may proceed. [243]

6. Y2K Act

The most recent as well as wide ranging tort reform enacted by Congress is the Y2K Act signed into law by President Clinton on July 20, 1999. [244] The law provides liability relief for defendants in legal actions stemming from Year 2000 computer failures (e.g., where computer software or hardware fails to process a two digit code of 00 as being the year 2000) by enacting a number of substantive and procedural provisions which preempt state liability law. The law limits the liability exposure of Y2K defendants, and is intended to clarify the legal rules applicable to such actions, thereby, in the proponents' words, "reducing the potential for frivolous lawsuits" [245] and "increasing the likelihood that the entity who bears responsibility for the Y2K compliance will work quickly to fix the problem and reduce damages." [246]

The law limits punitive damage claims in Y2K actions by specifying that they must be proved by "clear and convincing evidence," [247] and capping the amount of such claims that may be brought against "small business" defendants (defined as individuals having a net worth of less than $ 500,000 and businesses with fewer than 50 employees) [248] at the lesser of 3 times compensatory damages or $ 250,000. The cap does not apply where the defendant acted with specific intent to injure. [249] The legislation also provides generally that defendants are only liable for their proportionate share of liability (in lieu of the common law rule of joint and several liability). This preemptive rule does not apply (i) in [*624] cases brought by consumers who sue individually, rather than as part of a larger class; or (ii) where the defendant acted with specific intent to injure the plaintiff or knowingly committed fraud. [250]

REV_00263938

The legislation also alters a number of statutory and common law rules in contract and tort actions involving Y2K claims. It mandates strict enforcement of all contractual terms, unless such enforcement is inconsistent with state statutory law, or the state common law doctrine of unconscionability, including adhesion, in effect on January 1, 1999. [251] The Act also specifically provides that damage limitations provided for in contracts relating to Y2K legal claims are strictly enforceable. [252] The Y2K Act further specifically codifies mitigation of damage requirements by providing that damage awards must exclude compensation for damages the plaintiff could reasonably have avoided in light of any disclosure or other information of which the plaintiff was or reasonably should have been aware. [253] The law also codifies the so-called "economic loss" rule, which prohibits tort plaintiffs from seeking economic or consequential damages (e.g., lost profits stemming from a Y2K failure) unless such damages are permitted by contract or they result from damage to personal or real property. [254]

In an effort to prevent states from enacting laws making it easier to sue perceived "deep pocket" corporate defendants in Y2K cases than in ordinary liability cases, the Act "freezes" certain aspects of state law into effect. Thus, for example, if a Y2K action for breach or repudiation of contract is brought, the bill specifies that state law doctrine on the doctrines of "impossibility" and "commercial impracticability" shall be determined by state law as it exists on January 1, 1999. [255]

[*625] The bill also makes a number of changes in order to prevent lawsuits from being brought against non-negligent defendants or those not in direct privity with the harmed party. As a result, the Act freezes state law concerning the standard of evidence needed to establish a defendant's state of mind in a tort action as of January 1, 1999, [256] and eliminates the doctrine of so-called "bystander liability" by providing that Y2K service providers are not liable to third parties who are not in privity with them unless the defendant actually knew, or recklessly disregarded a known and substantial risk, that a Y2K failure would occur. [257] This latter change makes it more difficult, for example, for a customer of a business that was certified to be Y2K compliant to sue the certifying consultant. Finally, in this regard, the law provides that the fact that a Y2K failure occurred in an environment within the control of the defendant shall not be permitted to constitute a sole basis for the recovery of damages. [258]

The Act further makes a number of procedural changes concerning legal actions involving Y2K claims. These include a notice and "cooling off" period preventing Y2K actions from proceeding to trial until the defendant has first had a 90-day opportunity to fix the Y2K failure after receiving written notice of the particular problem. [259] The law also provides for heightened pleading requirements by requiring that plaintiffs must provide specificity in the notice of damages sought in Y2K actions; the factual basis for the damages claim; a statement of specific information regarding the manifestations of the material defect and the facts supporting such material defect; and a statement of facts showing a strong inference that the defendant acted with a required state of mind. [260]

The law also overhauls the procedural rules applicable to Y2K class actions. Subject to certain limited exceptions, the Act requires that Y2K class actions be considered in federal, rather than state court. [261] (This provision is similar to broader legislation that would apply to all cases, rather than just Y2K cases. [262]) In addition, the bill only permits Y2K [*626] actions which involve "material" product defects to proceed as class actions and requires class members to receive direct notice of the class action (rather than mere notice by publication). [263]

REV_00263939

There are several important overall limitations in scope in the Y2K Act. First, the Act only applies to Y2K failures which occur on or before January 1, 2003. [264] This three-year time limitation was an important factor noted by President Clinton when he agreed to sign the legislation. [265] In addition, the legislation does not apply to any claims for personal injury or wrongful death, [266] and does not apply to securities actions. [267] The law is also written to be "one-way preemptive,"' so that its provisions do not supercede any state law having stricter liability restrictions. [268]

To a certain extent, the legislation signed into law reflected a compromise between tort reform supporters and high technology concerns, on the one hand, and tort reform opponents, on the other hand. This explains why Democrats opted to offer their own substitute Y2K liability legislation in the House and Senate, with some of these provisions being incorporated into the final legislative product. [269] This is also why many of the more far reaching provisions of the original House and Senate bills such as the "reasonable efforts" defense, "loser pays" provision, and limitations on the overall liability of officers and directors were dropped during the legislative process or in conference, [270] and why the Administration insisted on the inclusion of numerous provisions that exempted [*627] so-called "bad actors" (i.e., intentional tortfeasors) from the bill's protections. [271]

B. Recently Considered Tort Reform Proposals

1. Senate Product Liability Proposal

Congress has been considering product liability legislation as early as 1979 when Rep. John Dingell (D-MI) introduced legislation which would have federalized a number of areas of state liability law. [272] Proponents of such reforms argue, inter alia, that state laws have led to excessive product liability damage awards, and the unpredictable and "patchwork" nature of the state product liability system harms the competitiveness of domestic manufacturing firms. [273] After being unable to bring a product liability reform bill to either the House or Senate floor for a number of years, during the 104[su'th'] Congress the House and Senate agreed to product liability legislation. That legislation would have, inter alia, capped punitive damages for large and small businesses and narrowed the standards for awarding such damages; eliminated joint and several liability for non-economic damages; created a fifteen-year statute of repose and a two-year statute of limitations; limited seller liability; and limited liability for medical implant suppliers. President Clinton subsequently vetoed the legislation. [274]

In the wake of President Clinton's veto, the White House entered into negotiations with Senators Rockefeller (D-WVA) and Gorton (R- [*628] WA), culminating in a somewhat narrower form of product liability legislation (the "Senate Product Liability Proposal"). [275] The Senate Product Liability Proposal was brought directly to the Senate floor but its proponents were unable to obtain cloture to cut off debate. [276]

The Senate Product Liability Proposal would cap the maximum amount of punitive damages which may be awarded against "small businesses" [277] and individuals with a net worth of less than one-half million dollars at the lesser of two times "compensatory" damages or $ 250,000. [278] In addition, the proposal would narrow the grounds for the award of punitive damages to those cases where there is a "conscious, flagrant, indifference to the rights or safety of others" which can be established by "clear and convincing evidence." [279] The foregoing restrictions do not apply in cases where death results. [280]

The Senate Product Liability Proposal also provides for a national statute of limitations and statute of repose. [281] The statute of limitations would be two years from the date a product liability harm is discovered or should have been discovered "in the exercise of reasonable care." [282] The statute of repose is 18-years, but is limited to "durable goods," defined as goods used in the workplace which are subject to a claim for harm under the applicable workers compensation laws. [283] The proposal [*629] also preempts state tort law in cases where the claimant has used alcohol or drugs, or where the product has been misused or altered. It is a complete defense to liability where claimant's drug or alcohol use was more than 50% responsible for the harm. [284] With regard to product misuse or alteration, the Senate Proposal provides that claimant's damages shall be reduced by the portion of harm attributable to misuse (whether by the claimant or otherwise). [285] This applies where the defendant can prove that a percentage of the claimant's harm was proximately caused by use or alteration of a product in violation of or contrary to an express warning or involved a risk of harm which was known or should have been known by a reasonable person who uses the product. [286] Damages to a claimant as a result of workplace injuries would be exempt from this comparative negligence standard. [287]

REV_00263940

The Senate Proposal also offers relief to product sellers, lessors, and renters by specifying that they may only be subject to a product liability suit where they: (1) failed to exercise reasonable care; (2) violated an express warranty; or (3) engaged in intentional wrongdoing. [288] This has the effect of eliminating seller liability under theories of strict liability, failure to warn, or breach of an implied warranty.

The Senate Proposal includes provisions designed to encourage alternative dispute resolution ("ADR") and settlement negotiations. It grants the parties the option of using any applicable voluntary, non-binding ADR within specified time periods after a product liability suit is brought. [289]

The proposal exempts several categories of product liability actions from its provisions entirely. [290] These include actions involving "commercial loss" by other businesses; negligent gun sales; tobacco products; breast implants, defective tissues, organs and blood; and electricity, water and natural gas. [291] The proposal also includes a workers' compensation subrogation provision which would alter state law to provide if the [*630] trier of fact finds by clear and convincing evidence that fault of the employer was a substantial factor in causing a workplace injury, the employer would have to bear the costs of the worker. [292]

2. House Medical Malpractice Proposal

Over the last two Congresses, the House has passed medical malpractice reform legislation four separate times, [293] with the Senate failing to concur on each occasion. Supporters of these reforms claim that excessive and frivolous medical malpractice claims unduly increase the costs of health care, both directly (through increased insurance premiums) and indirectly (through the costs of so-called "defensive medicine"). [294]

The most recent proposal (the "House Medical Malpractice Proposal") [295] considered in the 105[su'th'] Congress would have preempted state law concerning "health care liability actions" [296] in a number of regards. It would limit "non-economic" damages [297] by capping their award at [*631] $ 250,000 [298] as well as eliminating claimants' rights to hold defendants jointly and severally liable for such non-economic damages. [299] The proposal also prohibits bringing any health care liability action more than two years after an injury and the cause of the injury is discovered, or, in the exercise of reasonable care, should have been discovered. [300]

The House Medical Malpractice proposal would also limit punitive damage awards by creating a maximum cap of the greater of $ 250,000 or three times "economic damages," [301] and narrow the grounds for awarding punitive damages to cases where it can be established by clear and convincing evidence that the injury was suffered by conduct

REV_00263941

manifesting a "conscious, flagrant indifference to the rights and safety of others." [302]

Other proposed changes would allow for the periodic payment of damages and modifications to the collateral source rule. [303] Under the House Medical Malpractice Proposal, a defendant is permitted to pay any health care liability damage award greater than $ 50,000 in periodic installments as determined by the court. [304] The proposal would alter the traditional collateral source rule [305] by allowing defendants to introduce [*632] evidence of any collateral payments received by claimants and eliminating rights to subrogation by third parties. [306]

3. Tobacco Settlement

Over the course of the 105[su'th'] Congress the House and Senate also considered enacting a variation of the global tobacco settlement (the "Tobacco Settlement") [307] which includes a number of provisions limiting claimants' ability to bring tobacco related lawsuits under state tort law. Proponents asserted that absent these litigation reforms there would be no incentive for the tobacco companies to agree to make the payments and accept the other restrictions set forth in the settlement. [308]

In many respects, the litigation restrictions contained in the Tobacco Settlement go well beyond the pending product liability and medical malpractice reform proposals. For example, instead of capping or narrowing the standards for the award of punitive damages, the Tobacco Settlement provides total immunity from punitive damages for any past misconduct by tobacco companies. [309] Moreover, in addition to completely eliminating liability by sellers or agents of the tobacco industry, [310] the agreement legislatively preempts any pending or future Attorney General actions and any "addiction/dependence" claims. [311]

[*633] The Tobacco Settlement provides for an annual cap on tobacco liability equal to 33% of the annual "Industry Base Payment" (an agreed upon amount equal to $ 6 billion in the first year, increasing to $ 15 billion in the ninth year and thereafter), [312] resulting in a maximum liability of $ 5 billion per year. [313] This amount is to be paid each year, regardless of whether the annual amount of judgments and settlements aggregate to the maximum figure (any shortfall is subject to allocation by a Presidential Commission). [314] In addition, because the Tobacco Settlement solely provides for the industry to receive an 80% credit against this maximum amount for any liability judgments or settlements entered into (a so-called 20% "litigation co-payment penalty"), the industry is also subject to a secondary liability of up to an additional $ 1 billion per year. [315] To the extent judgments and settlements exceed the maximum statutory amount in any given year, the liability carries over to the following year. [316] In addition, individual claimants may only recover $ 1 million in a given year, even if awarded more, unless there are funds left over from the Industry Base Payment. [317] In order to help ameliorate any perceived unfairness between the liability obligations of the participating companies and other tobacco companies, the Tobacco Settlement requires non-participating companies to place into an escrow fund 150% of what would otherwise have been their share of the annual payment pending their payment of any liability claims. Under the settlement "these escrowed funds would be earmarked for potential liability payments, and the manufacturer would reclaim them with interest 35 years later to the extent they had not been paid out in liability." [318] The Tobacco Settlement provides that tobacco manufacturers will pay their own legal defense [*634] fees, but is silent on the issue of the payment of plaintiff's fees for legal services performed on behalf of the State Attorneys General. [319]

The Tobacco Settlement eliminates joint liability between participating and non-participating tobacco companies, [320] requiring instead that tobacco companies agree to share responsibility with respect to suits brought against each other. [321] The Tobacco Settlement also bans third party payers from bringing suits (other than non-aggregated subrogation suits [322]) claiming they have paid a portion of damages which should have been paid by the tobacco companies. [323]

REV_00263942

The Tobacco Settlement additionally imposes a number of procedural and evidentiary requirements with respect to tobacco liability actions. Significantly, it bars current and future class actions in federal and state courts as well as all other devices for the consolidation and aggregation of claims without the tobacco companies' consent. [324] The proposal also provides for a panel of three federal judges to review all claims of privilege or trade secrets asserted at the state or federal level with respect to tobacco industry documents. [325] The Tobacco Settlement further specifies that the existence of "reduced risk tobacco products" [326] are neither admissible nor discoverable in civil liability actions. [327]

[*635]

C. Constitutional Analysis of Recent Federal Tort Reforms [328]

This Part analyzes the range of potential constitutional challenges which may be brought against federal tort reforms. As a threshold matter, there is a question whether these proposals constitute a valid exercise of Congress' commerce authority, and if not, whether they may be justified under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment. In addition, there are separate questions whether the reforms violate (1) Fifth Amendment due process and equal protection principles; (2) Seventh Amendment jury trial requirements; and (3) Tenth Amendment federalism principles.

1. Constitutional Authority

a. Commerce Clause [329]

Although The Employers' Liability Cases [330] placed limitations on Congress' ability to alter state tort law with respect to intrastate conduct, [331] the Court had subsequently deferred to Congress concerning commerce authority [332] matters for nearly sixty years (from 1937 to 1995). [333] In the wake of Lopez v. United States [334] striking down the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990, [335] however, there is concern that under appropriate circumstances federal tort reforms may again be invalidated [*636] on these grounds. [336] Both the Volunteer Protection Act and the Food Donation Act may present such cases. [337]

In Lopez, the Court identified three categories of activity Congress may regulate under its commerce power: the "use of the channels of interstate commerce," the "instrumentalities of interstate commerce," and activity "that substantially affects interstate commerce." [338] The Court found that the school gun ban at issue clearly did not implicate either of the first two categories, and, after reviewing a series of factors, found its affect on interstate commerce was too removed to comply with the third category. [339]

If challenged on Commerce Clause grounds, defenders of the Volunteer Protection Act and the Food Donation Act will no doubt attempt to distinguish Lopez by asserting that although volunteerism and food donation have significant local and non-commercial aspects, in the aggregate such activities can substantially affect interstate commerce because: they serve valuable community functions, are linked with federal expenditures and involve the use of federal tax exemptions, are subject to replacement by private commercial services, and implicate the interstate insurance market. Further, defenders of the Volunteer Protection Act [*637] will be able to argue that unlike the School-Gun ban struck down in Lopez, the Volunteer Protection Act contains detailed legislative findings to this effect [340] and is supported by abundant legislative history [341] reiterating its Commerce Clause rationale. Indeed, in his dissent in Lopez, Justice Souter suggested that if Congress had included explicit legislative finding that guns in schools have a substantial affect on interstate commerce, "the result in this case might well have been different." [342]

Defenders of these liability laws may also point to the fact that Lopez is a highly fact specific law rights of action, often without providing any direct substitute or alternative legal remedy to claimants. The initiatives affect a range of activities - from volunteerism to various types of commercial conduct. [9]

REV_00263943

A major unanswered question with respect to this "third wave" of tort reform is the extent to which these laws and proposals conform with constitutional requirements. We expect adversely impacted claimants to assert that the reforms: (1) exceed Congress' legislative authority under the Commerce Clause (and, to the extent applicable, section five of the Fourteenth Amendment); (2) violate Fifth Amendment due process and equal protection requirements; (3) violate Seventh Amendment jury trial rights; and (4) are inconsistent with Tenth Amendment federalism principles. To analyze and consider these claims, we review Supreme Court and lower court decisions considering the constitutionality of earlier federal tort reform laws.

We find that although all but one of the previous federal tort reform laws were ultimately upheld against a variety of constitutional challenges, [10] the current set of initiatives raise a number of novel legal questions that have yet to be directly and fully addressed by the Supreme Court. For example, several of the measures, such as the Bill Emerson Good Samaritan Food Donation Act [11] and the Volunteer Protection Act of 1997, [12] may have a significant impact on intrastate activity, and could therefore be found inconsistent with Congress' Commerce Clause authority, in light of the Supreme Court's recent decision in Lopez v. United States. [13]

In the event Congress' Commerce Clause authority is struck down with regard to a particular tort reform, defendants may assert that the law is based on Congress' authority to protect due process under section five of the Fourteenth Amendment, particularly to the extent the tort reform includes punitive damage limitations. While cases such as BMW of [*594] North America v. Gore [14] and Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg [15] invalidated particular state law punitive damage awards as violating due process, the Court has yet to evaluate legislative efforts by Congress to affirmatively codify limitations on punitive damages.

Supreme Court guidance may also be necessary to ascertain the extent the Seventh Amendment jury trial right operates as a constraint on Congress' ability to limit common law rights, such as capping the amount of non-economic damages payable in particular tort actions. On the few occasions this issue has been presented to the courts in the context of previous federal tort reforms, the Seventh Amendment issue has been side-stepped since the law in question provided for separate administrative remedies against the United States. [16]

A final potential constitutional issue presented by the recent set of tort reforms concerns federalism and state sovereignty. Tort reforms such as those relating to medical implant suppliers, [17] Y2K liability actions, [18] and the tobacco settlement [19] have and would impose detailed and rigorous procedural as well as substantive requirements upon state courts. If the Court is willing to extend the federalism concerns enunciated in New York v. United States [20] and Printz v. United States, [21] these initiatives could also be subject to credible challenges under the Tenth Amendment.

II. THE FIRST WAVE: EXPANDING EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BY WAIVING COMMON LAWDEFENSES

Although an analysis of state tort reform laws is beyond the scope of this article, according to a recent study, in the last fourteen years twenty-four states have handed down seventy-five separate decisions overturning all or part of these laws. At the same time, courts have issued one hundred twenty decisions upholding various aspects of the state laws. [22] Congress' [23] [*595] first effort to preempt state tort law [24] came in the form of the 1906 Employers' Liability Act [25] and the 1908 Employers' Liability Act. [26] Both laws represented efforts to eliminate certain common law employer defenses and substitute a comparative (as opposed decision, and the Court has subsequently upheld other laws having a seemingly precarious nexus to interstate commerce. Recently, for example, the Supreme Court failed to grant certiorari in two companion cases, United States v. Ramey [343] and United States v. Moore, [344] where the Fourth Circuit found the federal arson statute [345] to constitute an appropriate exercise of Congress' commerce power. In those cases, the principal linkage to interstate commerce was a burned trailer's usage of electricity derived from an interstate power grid. [346]

REV_00263926

At the same time, challengers of the Volunteer Protection Act and Food Donation Act's constitutionality will be able to argue that many of the factors used to strike down Lopez are also present in these laws. For example, the majority opinion placed great emphasis on the gun ban not [*638] constituting an "essential part of larger regulation of economic activity, in which the regulatory scheme could be undercut unless the intrastate activities were regulated." [347] The linkage between non-commercial volunteer and food donation activities and interstate commerce is also arguably somewhat attenuated. As the Court observed in Lopez, "to uphold the Government's contentions here, we would have to pile inference upon inference in a manner that would bid fair to convert congressional authority under the Commerce Clause to a general police power of the sort retained by the states [and]... there never will be a distinction between what is truly national and what is truly local." [348]

Another factor mitigating against the constitutionality of both the Volunteer Protection Act and the Food Donation Act is their lack of an interstate commerce jurisdictional requirement. According to the Court in Lopez, one of the problems with the school gun ban was that it contained "no express jurisdictional element which might limit its reach to a discrete set of firearms possessions that additionally have an explicit connection with or effect on interstate commerce." [349] Notably, the Ramey and Moore decisions [350] involved a statute which contained such an express jurisdictional element. [351] Further, when Congress acted in 1996 to remedy the constitutional infirmity in the school gun ban invalidated by Lopez, it limited the law to firearms that have "moved in or that otherwise [affect] interstate or foreign commerce." [352] This is also the lesson of The Employers' Liability Cases [353] and The Second Employers' Liability Cases [354] - only after the employers' liability law was changed to clearly limit its application to injuries involving persons employed in interstate commerce was the statute found to pass constitutional scrutiny. [355]

[*639] Finally, the Court in Lopez observed there were certain traditional areas of state law, such as criminal law and education, which should be off limits to federal intervention. [356] The concurrence by Justices Kennedy and O'Connor also reasoned that the Federal Government should avoid involving itself in areas which fall within the "traditional concern of the states," noting that over 40 states had adopted laws outlawing the possession of firearms on or near school grounds. [357] These same concerns could also lie with the Volunteer Protection Act and Food Donation Act, particularly given that all 50 states have adopted some form of special liability protection for volunteers in general and good samaritan food donation activities in particular. [358] Accordingly, if Lopez represents a substantial turning point in the Court's Commerce Clause jurisdiction, rather than a mere symbolic warning, it is likely to prove difficult to uphold laws which involve activity which is both intrastate and non-commercial in nature. [359]

b. Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment

While the Commerce Clause is the most obvious source of authority to justify federal tort legislation, Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment also grants Congress the power to legislatively enforce the constitutional requirement of due process. [360] Several recent tort reform proposals have made reference to this authority. For example, the product liability legislation reported by the Senate Commerce Committee in 1997 includes a finding that "it is the constitutional role of the national government to... protect due process rights." [361] Similarly, the Volunteer Protection Act of 1997 contains an express finding that "liability reform is an appropriate use of the powers contained in... the fourteenth amendment to the United States Constitution." [362]

REV_00263944

[*640] The Supreme Court has never considered whether Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment provides the necessary authority to support federal tort reforms, although it has validated the use of this authority in other contexts, most notably voting rights laws. [363] Significantly, in City of Boerne v. Flores, [364] in invalidating the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA), [365] the Court restated its understanding of the scope of legislative authority generally available under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Boerne Court held that Congress' power under Section Five extends only to " 'enforcing' the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment .. rather than decreeing the substance of the Fourteenth Amendment's restrictions on the states." [366]

Boerne emphasized the importance of developing a legislative record of constitutional infirmities supporting the need for legislation under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court emphasized:

While preventive rules are sometimes appropriate remedial measures, there must be a congruence between the means used and the ends achieved. The appropriateness of the remedial measures must be considered in light of the evil presented.... In contrast to the record which confronted Congress and the judiciary in the voting rights cases, RFRA's legislative record lacks examples of modern instances of generally applicable laws passed because of religious bigotry. [367]

Given these parameters, it would seem that the most plausible case for the use of congressional authority under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment pertains to limitations on punitive damages. Advocates of using this authority will be able to point to two recent Supreme Court precedents striking down specific punitive damage awards based on due process grounds. In 1996, in BMW of North America v. Gore, [368] the Court found that a judgment of $ 2 million in punitive damages awarded to a consumer fraud plaintiff sustaining actual damages of only $ 4,000 was so "grossly excessive" [369] as to violate due process. Two [*641] years earlier, in Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg, [370] the Court invalidated a punitive damage award of $ 5 million, finding that an Oregon law limiting the scope of judicial review of punitive damage awards [371] violated procedural due process.

In Gore the Court identified three "guideposts" for determining whether a punitive damage award is "grossly excessive": degree of reprehensibility, ratio between punitive award and plaintiff's actual harm, and legislative sanctions provided for possible misconduct. [372] The second of these guideposts, ratio between punitive damages award and actual harm, is arguably directly evocative of provisions in the Senate Product Liability Proposal which cap the maximum punitive damage award payable by "small businesses" at the lesser of $ 250,000 or two times compensatory damages. [373] In Gore, the Court made much of the fact that "the $ 2 million in punitive damages awarded to Dr. Gore by the Alabama Supreme Court is 500 times the amount of actual harm determined by the jury." [374] Furthermore, although the Supreme Court has previously found other challenged punitive damage awards not to violate due process in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip [375] and TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., [376] the Gore Court read these decisions as "endorsing the proposition that a comparison between the compensatory award and punitive award is significant" in assessing whether the award violated due process. [377]

[*642] Defenders of Congress' use of authority under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment to limit punitive damages also find support in the Court's decision in Honda. [378] The Court, in considering whether Oregon's existing procedures for awarding punitive damages were fair, observed in dicta, "the clear and convincing standard of proof [required under Oregon law] is an important check against the unwarranted imposition of punitive damages." [379] This would seem to favorably relate to the provisions in the various product liability reforms seeking to import this evidentiary requirement into federal law. [380]

REV_00263945

At the same time, while cases such as Gore and Honda have opened the door for Congress to use the Constitution's Fourteenth Amendment authority to limit punitive damages, a strong argument can be made that the proposed caps on punitive damages in the pending tort reform proposals do not fall within the "guideposts" laid down by the Court. [381] Although the Court has considered the punitive to compensatory damage ratios in its recent decisions, it has consistently rejected the notion of a straightforward arithmetic cut-off or cap. In Gore, the Majority declared:

We have consistently rejected the notion that the constitutional line [of due process] is marked by a simple mathematical formula, even one that compares actual and punitive damages to the punitive award. Indeed low awards of compensatory damages may properly support a higher ratio than high compensatory damage awards, if for example, a particularly egregious act has resulted in only a small amount of economic damages. A higher ratio may also be justified in cases in which the injury is hard to detect or the monetary value of the non-economic harm might have been difficult to determine. [382]

Similarly, the Courts in Haslip and TXO have rejected the formulaic use of punitive damage ratios in assessing due process. [383] Persons challenging congressional authority under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment in this regard will be able to note the ratio of punitive to compensatory damages permitted in those cases - 4 to 1 in Haslip, and more than 500 to one in TXO are both well in excess of the ratio permitted [*643] under the Senate Product Liability Proposal. [384] Moreover, since the Senate Product Liability Proposal provides for a punitive damages cap at the lesser of $ 250,000 or two times compensatory damages, it will not always be tied into the amount of compensatory damages. [385] To the extent that various punitive damage limitations go beyond the Court's pronouncements concerning due process, they may violate the admonition in Boerne that "Congress does not enforce a constitutional right by changing what the right is." [386]

It is also uncertain whether the incidence of punitive damage awards in product liability cases provides the extensive legislative record needed to comply with Boerne's mandate that the statutory remedy "be considered in light of the evil presented." [387] Although supporters of tort reforms can point to a number of instances of harmful punitive damage awards, [388] opponents can also cite studies detailing the limited incidence of punitive damage awards. [389] Further, in considering whether the standard for reviewing the constitutionality of punitive damage awards would require the federal courts to entangle themselves in innumerable disputes, Gore found such concerns to be "premature at best" [390] because of the "small number of punitive damages questions that we have reviewed in recent years, together with the fact that this is the first case in decades in which we have found that a punitive damages award exceeds the constitutional limit...." [391]

[*644]

2. Fifth Amendment [392]

The Fifth Amendment provides that no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," [393] a proscription which has been held to include an equal protection component. [394] In the past, claimants have unsuccessfully sought to challenge federal tort reforms on both due process (e.g., claiming the law was unfair as a substantive or a procedural matter) [395] and equal protection (e.g., the law provides differential treatment for classes of tort claimants) grounds. [396] Assuming the courts continue to apply the lenient "rational basis test," [397] plaintiffs challenging federal tort reforms under the Fifth Amendment will be placed in the difficult posture of overcoming the asserted legislative justifications. This is a standard claimants have been unable to meet in Supreme Court cases such as Usery [398] and Duke Power. [399]

REV_00263946

[*645] In addition to the issue of whether a particular tort reform is seen as "rational," plaintiffs may also argue that the law does not provide a legislative quid pro quo. The latter issue raises two separate questions: whether the reform provides any requisite benefit or advantage to offset the forfeiture of common law rights; and whether any such quid pro quo is required as a constitutional matter. With regard to the first question, a strong argument can be made that several recently enacted reforms such as the General Aviation Act, Volunteer Protection Act, Food Donation, Biomaterials Access Assurance Act and Y2K Act [400] do not provide any offsetting legal benefits, at least to the parties directly harmed by the loss of their common law rights. Unlike the Price-Anderson Act upheld in Duke Power, [401] these laws provide no recourse to a secure source of funds or waiver of any of the defendant's legal rights, and in contrast to the Swine Flu Act, Atomic Testing Liability Act, Westfall Act and various other federal laws immunizing volunteers associated with federal activities [402] the laws provide no substitution of the United States as a defendant for any harm caused by volunteer negligence. A related argument was articulated in Carr, when the Fourth Circuit observed that the Federal Drivers Act benefited all government employees - even potential [*646] plaintiffs - by providing them with protection against liability from automobile accidents. [403]

If these tort reforms are to be upheld in the face of a quid pro quo requirement, their defenders will likely resort to the argument that any necessary benefits may extend to society or persons who benefit from volunteerism generally, rather than impaired claimants directly. This is the contention accepted by the California Supreme Court in Fein v. Permanente Medical Group, [404] in upholding that state's medical malpractice reforms [405] against constitutional challenge. In Fein, the California court stated "even if due process principles required some 'quid pro quo' to support the statute, it would be difficult to say that the preservation of a viable medical malpractice insurance industry in this state was not an adequate benefit for the detriment the legislation imposes on malpractice plaintiffs." [406]

In contrast, other tort reforms such as the Amtrak Act and the Senate Product Liability Proposal [407] could be construed as providing a directly offsetting benefit to affected claimants. The constitutional difficulty with respect to these proposals may come from establishing that the quantum of offsetting statutory benefits approaches that found in Duke Power. For example, while both the Amtrak Act and the Price-Anderson Act require potential defendants to provide insurance in the event of an accident, [408] the Amtrak Act contains no waiver of any common law defenses and does not obligate the Federal Government to provide any indemnification or commit itself to take any actions to protect the public in the event of an accident. [409] In Duke Power, the Court found such assurances to be a "fair and reasonable substitute for the uncertain [*647] recovery of damages from a utility or component manufacturer." [410]

Some of the potential legal benefits available to plaintiffs under the Senate Product Liability Proposal include the provision of a two-way preemptive federal statute of limitations running from the time the harm was actually discovered (or should have been discovered) rather than the date of the actual harm, and standards for the award of punitive damages and statutes of repose which can also operate to preempt some current laws which are less favorable to plaintiffs. [411] A potential constitutional infirmity with this proposal is the class of claimants which would benefit from these provisions is not necessarily the same as those whose rights will be impaired by other proposed liability limitations. This stands in contrast to Duke Power, where the persons subject to forfeiture of their common law rights in the event of a nuclear accident appear to constitute the same class of individuals benefiting from the liability waivers contained in the Price-Anderson Act. [412]

While defenders of these tort reforms may have some difficulty establishing that the reforms adequately provide for an offsetting legal benefit of the type found in Duke Power, they may be more readily able to claim a quid pro quo is not a constitutional requirement in the first instance. Although as a formal matter in New York Central [413] and Duke Power [414] the Supreme Court reserved the question of whether a quid pro quo is necessary for compliance with due process and equal protection, there is a significant degree of dicta skeptical of such a requirement. In Duke Power, for example, before finding that the Price-Anderson Act provided an adequate quid pro quo, the Court noted, "it is not at all clear that the Due Process Clause in fact requires that a legislatively enacted compensation scheme either duplicate the recovery at common law or provide a reasonably just substitute for the common-law or state tort law remedies it replaces." [415] In upholding the Swine Flu Act against a constitutional due process challenge, the Fifth Circuit in Ducharme observed "legislation has even been upheld where no remedy was substituted in place of the cause of action that was taken away." [416] There also is sentiment [*648] in a number of cases upholding state laws altering common law rights such as Munn v. Illinois [417] and Silver v. Silver [418] for the propositions that: "[a] person has no property, no vested interest in any rule of the common law" [419] and "the Constitution does not forbid the creation of new rights, or the abolition of old ones recognized by the common law, to attain a permissible legislative object." [420]

REV_00263947

3. Seventh Amendment [421]

The Seventh Amendment provides, "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law." [422] The cases in which federal tort reforms have been directly subject to constitutional challenge to date do not provide a great deal of guidance concerning the scope and operation of the Seventh Amendment. The Employees' Liability Cases did not reach the issue of the Seventh Amendment's application to the 1906 Employers' Liability Act because the law was invalidated on other grounds, while the issue was not raised in The Second Employees' Liability Cases, [423] Usery, [424] or Duke Power. [425] While the Seventh Amendment issue was raised in challenges to the Federal Drivers Act, Swine Flu Act, and the Atomic Testing Liability Act, it was rejected in those instances because the Seventh Amendment was held not to apply to laws substituting an administrative remedy against the United States. [426]

Notwithstanding the lack of direct legal precedent in tort reform cases, defenders of proposals such as the House Medical Malpractice [*649] Proposal's cap on non-economic damages [427] (which appears to implicate jury trial rights most directly) [428] should be able to make several supporting legal arguments. They could first assert that to the extent the Seventh Amendment may apply to a particular federal tort reform, it would only limit Congress' ability to cap damages in diversity cases brought in federal court, rather than its ability to alter underlying state court jury rights. This concept is based on the Supreme Court's 1916 decision in Minneapolis & St. Louis RR v. Bombolis, [429] which upheld application of the 1908 Employers' Liability Act in state courts even though Minnesota law permitted civil claims to be adjudicated by less than a unanimous jury (in derogation of the common law). [430] In rejecting the constitutional argument, the Bombolis Court noted that the Seventh Amendment was expressly limited to "proceedings in the courts of the United States." [431]

Second, defenders of damage caps may assert that based on the Court's 1987 decision in Tull v. United States [432] statutory caps should be deemed to constitute "legal' rather than "factual" determinations which are not subject to the Seventh Amendment. In Tull, although the Court found that actions brought under the Clean Water Act [433] were generally subject to the Seventh Amendment, [434] it ultimately concluded the Seventh [*650] Amendment did not apply to the civil penalty determinations at issue under the Act. The Court found that since the assessment of civil penalties involved neither the " 'substance of a common-law right to a trial by jury' nor a 'fundamental element of a jury trial'" [435] it was not a required jury function under the Seventh Amendment. [436] In a footnote to its opinion, the Court suggested even more broadly, "nothing in the [Seventh] Amendment's language suggests that the right to a jury trial extends to the remedy phase of a civil trial." [437] Relying in part on this footnote, the Fourth Circuit in Boyd v. Bulala [438] held caps on damages did not violate the right to a jury trial, observing "it is not the role of the jury to determine the legal consequences of its factual findings.... That is a matter for the legislature.' [439] Similarly in Franklin v. Mazda Motor Corp., [440] a Maryland district court wrote that "juries always find facts on a matrix of laws given to them by the legislature and by precedent and it can hardly be argued that limitations imposed by law are a usurpation of the jury function." [441]

REV_00263948

Third, defenders of damage caps may argue that since legislatures have open-ended authority under the Seventh Amendment to eliminate a right of action completely, they should also have the authority to eliminate certain jury prerogatives. This is premised on the Court's 1917 decision in Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, [442] upholding against Seventh Amendment challenge the constitutionality of a Washington law eliminating causes of actions by employees against employers (and replacing [*651] them with a workers' compensation regime). [443] More recently, federal courts in Boyd and Franklin utilized supplemental arguments extending this line of reasoning to validate state laws limiting damage awards. In Boyd the Fourth Circuit upheld the constitutionality of Virginia's cap on damages, reasoning "if a legislature may completely abolish a cause of action without violating the right of trial by jury, we think it permissibly may limit damages recoverable for a cause of action as well." [444] Similarly, in Franklin the district court wrote, "the power of the legislature to define, augment, or even abolish complete causes of action must necessarily include the power to define by statute what damages may be recovered by a litigant with a particular cause of action." [445]

Those challenging damage caps on Seventh Amendment grounds may attempt to respond to these lines of argument through a variety of contentions. First, rather than giving Congress free rein to deny jury rights in state courts, a closer reading of Bombolis may indicate it should more properly be seen as an effort to limit congressional preemption of state court procedures. For example, language in Bombolis stating the Seventh Amendment should not be permitted to operate to void state court procedures lest "both federal and state courts... by fluctuating hybridization be bereft of all real, independent existence" [446] indicate more of a respect for federalism than antipathy to state jury trial rights.

With regard to the argument that damage caps involve legal rather than factual determinations, persons challenging the constitutionality of caps may point to several cases undercutting Tull and its progeny. In the 1935 case Dimick v. Schiedt [447] the Court held the federal practice of additur, by which a federal judge believing a jury award to be unduly low allowed defendants to choose between an increase in a damage award or a new trial, unconstitutional. Finding no evidence that English common law courts had the authority to increase the amount of jury verdicts, [448] the Court held that increasing the amount of a jury award was a question [*652] of fact [449] protected by the Seventh Amendment. [450] Moreover, district court decisions invalidating state damage caps in Boyd v. Bulala [451] and Reuwer v. Hunter [452] may have some residual intellectual import despite their being overruled by the Fourth Circuit. In Boyd the district court reasoned that "since the assessment of damages is a fact issue... a limitation on [their] performance... is a limitation on the role of the jury." [453] Reuwer distinguished Tull on the grounds it concerned "the assessment of a civil penalty" [454] rather than "the determination of damages" [455] and went on to find that "in terms of the jury's role, history justifies no distinction between the liability and the remedy phases of a trial of a common-law action." [456]

Third, those challenging damage caps may seek to distinguish Mountain Timber by asserting that rather than allowing for a legislature to completely eliminate common law rights, the Seventh Amendment merely permits the legislature to do so where it provides a comparable substitute regime, such as the workers compensation laws described in that case. As for the corollary claim that the greater legislative power (e.g., abrogating causes of action completely) includes the lesser (e.g., capping damages), this arguably proves too much. If Congress had such broad ranging authority, it could circumscribe any aspect of a common law or other legal action, thereby reducing the Seventh Amendment to a nullity.

REV_00263949

Ultimately it appears damage caps are likely to present another constitutional case of first impression for the Supreme Court. The trends in the relevant cases, however, would appear to favor those defending caps. The Court has previously countenanced the erosion of jury trial rights in the form of directed verdicts, six-person juries, and liberal use of collateral estoppel, among other procedural devices. [457] Moreover, the Supreme Court precedent most favorable to defenders of caps Tull (1987) is far more recent than the Dimick decision (1935). While lower federal court decisions concerning state damage caps reach varying conclusions, [*653] the circuit court precedent on this matter - the Fourth Circuit decision in Boyd v. Bulala [458] - favors the defenders of caps as well.

4. Tenth Amendment [459]

Courts have previously not been accommodating of Tenth Amendment federalism concerns [460] in the context of federal tort reform laws. The Second Employers' Liability Cases rejected the federalism contention raised in that case, finding that the Supremacy Clause made it clear that laws made "in pursuance of the Constitution" prevailed over any conflicting state laws. [461] Tenth Amendment concerns were also dismissed in lower court decisions reviewing the constitutionality of the Swine Flu Act [462] and Atomic Testing Liability Act. [463]

However, in recent years the general nature of federalism concerns has expanded. In 1992 in New York v. United States, [464] the Court invalidated a provision of the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act of 1985 (the "Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act') [465] requiring states to assume ownership of radioactive waste or accept legal liability for damages caused by the waste. Under New York v. United States, even if a particular law is found to constitute a valid exercise of Congress' Commerce Clause authority, it may still be struck down if it "commandeers the legislative processes of the states by directly compelling them to enact and enforce a federal regulatory program." [466] These concerns were reiterated more recently in Printz v. United States, [467] where the Court invalidated portions of the Brady Handgun [*654] Violence Protection Act [468] requiring local law enforcement officials to conduct background checks on prospective gun purchasers.

Whether any tort reforms are found to be unconstitutional on Tenth Amendment grounds is likely to depend in part on whether the Court is willing to extend and build upon the federalism concerns expressed in New York v. United States and Printz. As the case law currently stands, defenders of tort reform measures are likely to assert that a distinction can readily be drawn between the holding in New York v. United States - prohibiting federal commandeering of the state legislative process by compelling the enactment of a regulatory program - and federal tort reforms which merely require state courts to honor federal law. The Court itself observed as much when it distinguished a series of federal laws which were enforceable in state courts from the Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act:

These cases involve no more than an application of the Supremacy Clause's provisions that federal law "shall be the supreme Law of the Land," enforceable in every state. More to the point, all involve congressional regulation of individuals, not congressional requirements that states regulate. Federal statutes enforceable in state courts do, in a sense, direct state judgments to enforce them, but this sort of federal "direction" of state judges is mandated by the text of the Supremacy Clause. No comparable constitutional provision authorizes Congress to command state legislatures to regulate. [469]

Moreover, in Printz the Supreme Court continued to distinguish between legislation directly commandeering the legislature and the mere use by Congress of the state courts. In examining the laws enacted in the first several Congresses in order to clarify the legislative history of the Constitution and Bill of Rights, the Court identified a series of federal laws which made use of the state courts, writing, "these early laws establish, at most, that the Constitution was originally understood to permit imposition of an obligation on state judges to enforce federal prescriptions.... It is understandable why courts should have been viewed distinctively in this regard; unlike legislatures and executives, they applied the law of other sovereigns all the time." [470]

REV_00263950

[*655] On the other hand, parties seeking to challenge these tort reforms may assert that rather than provide for an alternative liability scheme (as the 1908 Act did) or substitute the United States as a defendant pursuant to the Federal Torts Claims Act (as the Federal Drivers Act, Swine Flu Act, and Atomic Testing Liability Act did), the reforms impermissibly set forth a limited number of federal limitations on liability, while reserving the remainder of the legal issues to state law. [471] One of the problems with the Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act identified by the Court in New York v. United States was that "where the Federal Government directs the states to regulate, it may be state officials who will bear the brunt of public disapproval, while the federal officials who devised the regulatory program may remain insulated from the electoral ramifications of their decision." [472]

A related contention is that unlike the laws early federal laws enforceable in state courts distinguished in Printz, recent tort reforms can be said to be more intrusive in that they affirmatively limit the application of state law. In a recent article in TRIAL Magazine, Jeffrey White, the Associate General Counsel of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America, argues that the early laws represent "instances in which Congress established a federal cause of action or federal administrative regulatory scheme affecting private conduct and preempted conflicting state law. In none of these statutes did Congress purport to leave state law in place while attempting to modify its content." [473]

Potentially more problematic may be the fact that specific proposals such as the Biomaterials Access Assurance Act, the Tobacco Settlement and the Y2K Act impose an elaborate set of procedural mandates directly on state courts with respect to state causes of action. This, it can be asserted, goes beyond requiring the supremacy of federal legal standards [*656] by proscribing detailed and potentially costly procedures on the state courts. For example, the Biomaterials Access Assurance Act specifies detailed rules concerning motions to dismiss, limits discovery pending ruling on such motions, requires that rulings be made solely on the basis of pleadings and affidavits, and specifies rules for consideration of summary judgment and stay motions. [474] The Tobacco Settlement prevents states from allowing any form of consolidation of tobacco claims, even if this is the least costly and most efficient means of resolving such lawsuits. [475] The Tobacco Settlement also prevents state courts from resolving attorney client privilege and trade secret disputes regarding tobacco documents and alters state court evidentiary rules by prohibiting the admission or discovery of any evidence concerning "reduced-risk" tobacco products. [476] The Y2K Act also mandates a variety of procedural rules upon state courts, such as notice, "cool-down" and heightened pleading requirements and prohibits state courts from considering most forms of Y2K class actions. [477]

Although we are aware of no direct Supreme Court precedent regarding whether Congress may mandate procedural rules on state courts concerning state causes of action, plaintiffs will be able to point to dicta in several recent decisions concerning the preemptive effect of civil rights claims brought under 42 U.S.C. 1983 indicating that such requirements may well cross the constitutional line. In Felder v. Casey, [478] the Court observed that it is an "unassailable proposition.... that states may establish the rules of procedure governing litigation in their own courts." In Johnson v. Fankell, [479] the Court reiterated what it termed "the general rule 'bottomed deeply in belief in the importance of state control of state judicial procedure... that federal law takes state courts as it finds them.'" [480] The Johnson Court also observed that judicial respect for the principal of federalism "is at its apex when we confront a claim that federal law requires a state to undertake something as fundamental [*657] as restructuring the operation of its courts" [481] and "it is a matter for each state to decide how to structure its judicial system." [482]

REV_00263951

Because of such concerns, during hearings concerning the Tobacco Settlement Professor Tribe testified "for Congress directly to regulate the procedures used by state courts in adjudicating state-law tort claims - to forbid them, for example, from applying their generally applicable class action procedures in cases involving tobacco suits - would raise serious questions under the Tenth Amendment and principles of federalism." [483] Although the Tobacco Settlement provides for removal to federal court of tobacco liability suits for which class action certification is sought [484] - presumably in an effort to ameliorate the Tenth Amendment concerns - this mechanism may still be subject to further constitutional problems. Such problems as whether it constitutes an impermissible attempt to extend federal jurisdiction where it is otherwise lacking in violation of Article III of the Constitution. This is similar to the issue the Third and Seventh Circuit dealt with in the context of the 1988 Amendments to the Price-Anderson Act, which converted nuclear accident claims into federal causes of action. [485]

V. CONCLUSION

Over the last several years, Congress has enacted a series of federal tort reform laws. These statutes have partially preempted state tort law in the [*658] areas of general aviation aircraft liability (the General Aviation Revitalization Act of 1994); donation of food for distribution to the needy (the Bill Emerson Good Samaritan Food Donation Act); volunteer activity generally (the Volunteer Protection Act of 1997); public railway transportation (Section 161 of the Amtrak Reform and Accountability Act of 1997); medical implant supplies (the Biomaterials Access Assurance Act) and year 2000 computer failures (the Y2K Act). [486] At the same time, Congress has considered a number of more far-reaching proposals, including legislation preempting state laws concerning product liability, medical malpractice, and tobacco litigation. [487]

In general, these enacted and pending reforms represent a third wave of federal tort reform. They seek to isolate a particular area of tort law (such as product liability or medical malpractice) or a sub-area (such as the general aviation or biomaterials supplies aspects of product liability), and carve out a set of protections designed to minimize the liability of defendants as compared to what their liability would be under state law. While the justification asserted for these reforms - encouraging beneficial social and economic activities - is similar to that proffered for earlier phases of tort reform, the nature of several of the proposals is sufficiently different to present a number of new constitutional issues.

With regard to the Commerce Clause, laws such as the Food Donation Act and Volunteer Protection Act will not only have a significant impact on intrastate activity, but also regulate non-commercial, volunteer activity. The question presented by these laws is whether the Commerce Clause permits preemption of state law where Congress finds there is a connection to interstate commerce, or the courts are required to consider whether the nexus is simply too tenuous to justify intrusion on the traditional state law tort system.

In the event Commerce Clause authority is struck down in the context of a particular tort reform, courts may also be presented with the issue of whether the law is authorized by Congress' power under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment. In particular, this issue may arise with respect to punitive damage limitations, given the Court's recent decisions in BMW of North America v. Gore [488] and Honda Motor Co. v. [*659] Oberg. [489] The critical question is whether these tort reforms would be viewed as merely implementing these court-made constitutional constraints, or whether the tort reforms represent an entirely new legislative restrictions on the states.

In terms of the Fifth Amendment, a number of recent tort reforms would abrogate common law rights without providing any direct offsetting legal benefit to plaintiffs. There is some doubt as to whether a legislative quid pro quo is constitutionally required to comport with the Fifth Amendment. However, if a court finds such a requirement does exist, the courts will be forced to consider whether any legal benefit provided by the laws must apply to impacted litigants in particular or society as a whole, and the extent the legal benefit must offer a reasonably comparable substitute to harmed plaintiffs.

REV_00263952

The Seventh Amendment jury trial issues raised by the tort reforms are also somewhat novel. If the Court takes up this question, it will need to consider whether the Seventh Amendment applies to federal legislation abrogating state court jury rights and the extent reforms such as damage caps represent factual issues (traditionally considered by juries) or legal issues (traditionally resolved by legislatures).

As for the Tenth Amendment, the third wave tort reforms described in this article not only alter state substantive tort law, but in some cases go on to proscribe detailed state court procedures. Although federalism-based challenges to federal tort reforms have been unsuccessful in the past, in recent years the Court has shown renewed interest in the Tenth Amendment in New York v. United States [490] and Printz. [491] Under these cases, the principal issue for pending tort reforms will be whether they constitute a "commandeering" of the state legislative process, or merely require that state courts honor federal law.

Political constraints have mandated that the third wave reforms enacted to date be relatively narrow and modest in their scope. It is perhaps because of these limitations that no case has yet arisen presenting these constitutional issues in the context of a recently enacted reform. [492] However, if Congress enacts any of the broader reforms currently being considered, the courts will likely be faced with the constitutional questions noted in this article.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. As used herein, the phrase "federal tort reform" is not intended to have a favorable or unfavorable connotation, but rather to generically describe a statutory law or proposal preempting state tort law.

n2. 1906 Employers' Liability Act, Pub. L. No. 59-219, 34 Stat. 232 (codified at 45 U.S.C. 51-60) (1906) (repealed 1907) and 1908 Employers' Liability Act, Pub. L. No. 60-100, 35 Stat. 65 (1908) (codified as amended at 45 U.S.C. 51-60 (1994)).

n3. Pub. L. No. 59-219, 34 Stat. 232 (codified at 45 U.S.C. 51-60) (1906) (repealed 1907).

n4. Infra note 29 and accompanying text.

n5. Pub. L. No. 60-100, 35 Stat. 65 (1908) (codified as amended at 45 U.S.C. 51-60 (1994)).

n6. Atomic Testing Liability Act, Pub. L. No. 101-510, 104 Stat. 1837, 42 U.S.C. 2212 (1994).

n7. National Swine Flu Immunization Program of 1976, Pub. L. No. 94-380, 90 Stat. 1113, 42 U.S.C. 247b (1976) (repealed 1978).

n8. 28 U.S.C. 2671-2680 (1994).

n9. Volunteer Protection Act of 1997, Pub. L. No. 105-19, 111 Stat. 218 (codified at 42 U.S.C.A. 14501-14505 (West Supp. III 1997)); General Aviation Revitalization Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103-298, 108 Stat. 1552-54 (1994) (codified at 49 U.S.C. 40101 note (1994)); to a contributory) [*596] negligence regime. [27] The principal constitutional issue raised in Supreme Court challenges was whether the laws were authorized under the Commerce Clause (although the Court also briefly considered issues in the nature of due process and federalism concerns). [28]

REV_00263953

A. 1906 Employers' Liability Act

The 1906 Employers' Liability Act (the "1906 Act") [29] required, inter alia, that common carriers compensate their employees for damages caused by defects in equipment or the negligence of their fellow employees, eliminated the common law doctrine of contributory negligence and substituted a form of comparative negligence, and eliminated any bars or defenses to liability set forth in employment contracts. [30] The 1906 Act applied to "every common carrier engaged in trade or commerce... between the several states... [with regard to] any of its employees...." [31]

In The Employers' Liability Cases, [32] the Court considered the constitutionality of the 1906 Act. The Court first considered the question of whether Congress had the authority to enact laws dealing with the master-servant relationship, "a subject hitherto treated as being exclusively within the control of the states." [33] The Court rejected this contention, holding, "the test of power is not merely the matter regulated, but whether the regulation is directly one of interstate commerce...." [34]

Next, the Court considered whether the 1906 Act constituted a valid exercise of Congress' authority to regulate interstate commerce under the Commerce Clause. [35] Although the statute was limited to carriers engaged in interstate commerce, the Court read the law as applying to instances where such carriers were transacting purely intrastate business. [36] Therefore, the court held the 1906 Act was being applied in an unconstitutional manner:

[*597] Concluding, as we do, that the statute, whilst it embraces subjects within the authority of Congress to regulate commerce, also includes subjects not within its constitutional power, and that the two are so interblended in the statute that they are incapable of separation, we are of the opinion that the courts below rightly held the statute to be repugnant of the Constitution and non-enforceable.... [37]

Having found the 1906 Act's asserted regulation of intrastate commerce to be unconstitutional, the Court put off considering arguments that the law violated employers' Fifth Amendment due process rights [38] (i.e., because it was claimed to have arbitrarily subjected common carriers to greater liability than other employers engaged in interstate commerce), and that it compromised employers' Seventh Amendment [39] right to a jury trial. [40]

Subsequently, in El Paso & Northeastern Railway Co. v. Gutierrez, [41] the Court found that the 1906 Act could be applied to United States territories "in view of the plenary power of Congress under the Constitution over the Territories of the United States." [42] Since the Court concluded that the provisions of the Act declared unconstitutional in The Employers' Liability Cases were separable and that Congress would have enacted them independently, it upheld the law in these areas. [43]

B. 1908 Employers' Liability Act

In 1908 Congress enacted a substantially similar version of the Employers' Liability Act (the "1908 Act"), limiting the statute to cases involving employees "suffering injury while... employed by [carriers engaged in interstate commerce] in such commerce...." [44] Employers again complained that the law imposed substantially more liability on them than they were subject to under the common law, and hence challenged its constitutionality. In 1912, the Court upheld the constitutionality of the law in The Second Employers' Liability Cases

REV_00263927

Y2K Act, Pub. L. No. 106-37, 113 Stat. 6601 (codified at 15 U.S.C. 6601-17 (1999)); Product Liability Reform Act of 1998, S. 2236, 105[su'th'] Cong. (1998).

↑n10. See infra note 29.

↑n11. Pub. L. No. 104-210, 110 Stat. 3011 (to be codified at 42 U.S.C.A. 1791 (West Supp. 1998)).

↑n12. Pub. L. No. 105-19, 111 Stat. 218 (codified at 42 U.S.C.A. 14501-14505 (West Supp. III 1997)).

↑n13. 514 U.S. 549 (1995).

↑n14. 517 U.S. 559 (1996).

↑n15. 512 U.S. 415 (1994).

↑n16. See infra note 393.

↑n17. The Biomaterials Access Assurance Act, H.R. 872, 105th Cong. (1997) (enacted).

↑n18. The Y2K Act, Pub. L. No. 106-37, 113 Stat. 6601 (codified at 15 U.S.C. 6601-17 (1999)).

↑n19. Proposed Tobacco Industry Settlement, 12.3 TPLR 3.203 (June 20, 1997).

↑n20. 505 U.S. 144 (1992).

↑n21. 521 U.S. 98 (1997).

↑n22. See Schwartz, Behrens & Taylor, Appendix A & B.

↑n23. In contrast to the relatively small number and modest scope of federal tort reforms, states have adopted numerous statutory changes to their own tort laws. In the early part of the 1900's, states enacted a series of workers' compensation laws ultimately upheld by the Supreme Court in cases such as New York Central R. Co. v. White and Mountain Timber v. Washington, 243 U.S. 188 (1917). See Silver v. Silver, 280 U.S. 117 (1929) (upholding Connecticut automobile guest statute); Chicago, Burlington & Quincy R. Co. v. McGuire, 219 U.S. 549 (1910) (upholding Iowa law abrogating fellow servant doctrine); Arizona Employers Liability Cases, 250 U.S. 400 (1919) (upholding Arizona law providing strict employer liability for inherently dangerous work).

More recently, states have enacted tort laws providing protections to defendants with every state adopting some form of tort reform in the last twenty some years. See Martha Middleton, A Changing Landscape, ABA JOURNAL, 56, 59 (1995). For useful summaries of the nature of the statutory changes made by the states, see VICTOR E. SCHWARTZ, MARK E. BEHRENS, & MARK D. TAYLOR, WHO SHOULD MAKE AMERICA'S TORT LAW: COURTS OR LEGISLATURES? (Washington Legal Foundation) (1997); Mark Thompson, Letting the Air out of Tort Reform, ABA JOURNAL, 64 (1997); Henry Cohen, Fifty-State Survey on Selected Product Liability Issues, May 24, 1995 (Congressional Research Service Report 95-300A).

↑n24. In addition to adopting laws preempting state common law of tort, Congress has enacted a number of liability laws pursuant to its maritime and international treaty authority. See Limitation of Vessel Owners Liability Act, 46 U.S.C. App. 181-196 (1994) (enacted in 1893) (setting shipping liability rules in case of damage or harm occurring without privity or knowledge of ship owner), found to constitute valid exercise of Congress' maritime and commerce authority in Providence & New York Steamship Co. v. Hill Manufacturing Co., 109 U.S. 578 (1883); Longshoreman and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, 33 U.S.C. 901-950 (1994) (enacted in 1927) (providing a workers' compensation scheme for injuries occurring in the navigable waters of the United States), upheld against due process challenge in Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22 (1932); Convention For the Unification of Certain Rules Relating to International Carriage By Air (Warsaw Convention), Oct. 12, 1929, 49 Stat. 3000 (1934), T.S. No. 876, 137 L.N.T.S. 11, as amended and supplemented by Agreement Relating to Liability Limitations of the Warsaw Convention and the Hague Protocol (Montreal Agreement), Agreement No. CAB 18,999, approved by Order No. E-28, 680, May 13, 1966 (CAB Docket 17,325), reprinted in 49 U.S.C. 1502 (1994) (limits international air carriers' potential liability for property loss or damage or personal injury to $ 75,000 and creates a presumption of liability for accidents and limiting passengers' recovery for injuries during transportation covered by the Convention) upheld against constitutional challenge in Indemnity Ins. Co. of North America v. Pan American Airways, 58 F. Supp. 338 (S.D.N.Y. 1944); Pierre v. Eastern Airlines, Inc., 152 F. Supp. 486 (D.N.J. 1957). See also Death on the High Seas by Wrongful Act, 46 U.S.C. App. 761 - 68 (setting liability rules for negligence and other misconduct on the high seas); 46 U.S.C. app. 688 (1994) (abrogating the fellow servant rule and granting seamen the same rights as railway workers under the Employers Liability Act of 1908); 46 U.S.C.A. 183 (West Supp. 1998) (recognizing certain limitations on non-economic damages set forth in cruise ship contracts and tickets and permitting international owners to rely on state statutory damage limitations relating to employee medical malpractice claims).

REV_00263954

n25. Pub. L. No. 59-219, 34 Stat. 232 (codified at 45 U.S.C. 51-60) (1906) (repealed 1907).

n26. Pub. L. No. 60-100, 35 Stat. 65 (1908) (codified as amended at 45 U.S.C. 51-60 (1994)).

n27. Under the doctrine of contributory negligence a plaintiff is completely barred from recovery if he or she bears any amount of fault, while comparative negligence reduces a plaintiff's recovery by his or her percentage of negligence. See Restatement (Second) of Torts 552A (1977).

n28. See The Employers' Liability Cases, 207 U.S. 463 (1907) and The Second Employers' Liability Cases (Mondou v. New York), 223 U.S. 1 (1912).

n29. Pub. L. No. 59-219, 34 Stat. 232 (codified at 45 U.S.C. 51-60) (1906) (repealed 1907).

n30. See id.

n31. Id. 51.

n32. 207 U.S. 463 (1907).

n33. 207 U.S. at 491.

n34. Id. at 495.

n35. See infra note 296.

n36. 207 U.S. at 503.

n37. 207 U.S. at 504.

REV_00263955

n38. See infra note 357 and accompanying text.

n39. See infra note 386 and accompanying text.

n40. 207 U.S. at 503.

n41. 215 U.S. 87 (1909).

n42. Id. at 93.

n43. Id. at 96-97.

n44. Pub. L. No. 60-100, 35 Stat. 65 (1908) (codified as amended at 45 U.S.C. 51-60 (1994)).

n45. 223 U.S. 1 (1912).

n46. Id.

n47. Id. at 51 (citations omitted).

n48. Id. at 49.

n49. Id.

n50. 94 U.S. 113 (1876) (Illinois statute setting maximum grain storage rates upheld against Fourteenth Amendment due process challenge that it abrogates the common law rule that such charges are required to be "reasonable").

n51. 223 U.S. at 50, citing Munn, 94 U.S. 113, 134 (additional citations omitted).

n52. 223 U.S. at 51.

n53. Id.

n54. Id. at 52.

n55. Id. at 53 (citations omitted).

n56. 17 U.S. 316 (1819).

n57. 223 U.S. at 53, citing McCulloch at 405.

n58. 223 U.S. at 58.

n59. 30 U.S.C. 901-945 (1994).

n60. Pub. L. No. 91-173, 83 Stat. 742 (1969).

n61. Rather than preempting state common law directly, the Black Lung Benefits Act had the effect of preempting state workers' compensation laws.

n62. The specific presumptions and evidentiary rules objected to included: (1) the definition of total disability under 402(f) of the Black Lung Benefits Act requiring compensation for former miners who might be employable in other lines of work; (2) the irrebuttable presumption of total disability under 411(c)(3) where there is clinical evidence of complicated pneumoconiosis; (3) the rebuttable presumptions under 411(c)(1) and (2) that operators were responsible for pneumoconiosis for miners employed more than ten years; (4) the rebuttable presumption under 411(c)(4) that miners employed for more than fifteen years who are able to marshal evidence demonstrating a totally disabling respiratory or pulmonary ailment have been disabled by pneumoconiosis; (5) the requirement under 413(b) that claims for benefits not be denied solely on the basis of negative chest X-rays; and (6) the limitation on the use of rebuttal evidence in cases under 411(c)(4). See Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., 428 U.S. 1, 22-37 (1976).

REV_00263956

n63. 428 U.S. 1 (1976). The case proceeded directly to the Supreme Court after being considered by a three-judge district court panel pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 2282, 2284 (1994). See Turner Elkhorn Mining Co. v. Brennan, 385 F. Supp. 424 (1974) (upholding the provisions of the Black Lung Benefits Act against constitutional challenge, with the exception of the limitation on the use of rebuttal evidence in cases under 411(c)(4)).

n64. 428 U.S. at 15 (citations omitted).

n65. Id., (citing New York Central R. Co. v. White, 243 U.S. 188 (1917)) (New Yorker workers' compensation law); Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington R. Co. v. Schubert, 224 U.S. 603 (1912) (1908 Employers Liability Act).

n66. Id. at 18-19 (citations omitted).

n67. Id. at 22-38.

n68. Id. at 26.

n69. Congress has enacted a number of federal tort reforms which have not been challenged on constitutional grounds in federal court. These include several instances in which Congress has elected to substitute the United States as a defendant for volunteers performing a variety of activity associated with the Federal Government. See, e.g., (1) Federally Supported Health Centers Assistance Act of 1992, 42 U.S.C. 233 (g) & (o) (1994) (health centers and their officers, employees, and contractors and health clinic professionals); (2) National Service Trust Act, 42 U.S.C. 12651b(f) & 12651g (a)(B) (1994) (enacted in 1993) (board members and volunteers in the National and Community Service program); (3) Take Pride in America Act, 16 U.S.C. 4604 (c)(2) (1994) (Take Pride in America Act volunteers) (enacted in 1990); (4) Support for East European Democracy Act of 1989, 22 U.S.C. 5422 (c)(2)(A) (1994) (volunteers providing technical assistance to Poland or Hungary); (5) Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976, 43 U.S.C. 1737 (f) (1994) (Bureau of Land Management volunteers); (6) Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973, 42 U.S.C. 5055(f)(3) (1994) (VISTA volunteers); (7) Volunteers in the National Forests Act of 1972, 16 U.S.C. 558c(b) (1994) (Forest Service volunteers); (8) Volunteers in Parks Act of 1969, 16 U.S.C. 18i(b) (1994) (National Parks volunteers); (9) Peace Corps Act, 22 U.S.C. 2504(h)(1994) (enacted in 1961) (Peace Corps volunteers); (10) Fish and Wildlife Act of 1956, 16 U.S.C. 742f(c)(4) (1994) (volunteers in Fish and Wildlife Service or National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration programs); (11) Federally Supported Health Centers Assistance Act of 1995, 42 U.S.C. 203 note (Supp. I 1995); and (12) 18 U.S.C.A. 1955 note (West Supp. IV 1997).

n70. Pub. L. No. 87-258, 1, 75 Stat. 539 (codified as amended at 28 U.S.C. 2679) (1994)).

n71. Id. 2679(b).

n72. See S. Rep. No. 87-736 (1961), reprinted in 1962 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2784.

n73. 422 F.2d 1007 (4[su'th'] Cir. 1970).

REV_00263957

n74. 539 F.2d 955 (3d Cir. 1976).

n75. 225 F. Supp. 881 (W.D. Mo. 1963).

n76. 422 F.2d 1007.

n77. 280 U.S. 117 (1929).

n78. Id. at 122.

n79. 422 F.2d at 1011.

n80. See id. at 1101. A Torts Claims Act remedy may not be available to federal workers because of the exclusivity provisions of the Employees' Compensation Act, 5 U.S.C. 8116(c).

n81. 422 F.2d at 1101.

n82. Id.

n83. Id. at 1012 (quoting McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 426).

n84. Id.

n85. 539 F.2d 955

n86. 539 F.2d 955, 959 (3d Cir. 1976) (citations omitted).

n87. Id. at 959-60.

n88. 225 F. Supp. 881.

n89. Id. at 881, 882.

n90. Pub. L. No. 85-256, 71 Stat. 576 (1957).

n91. Pub. L. No. 89-645, 80 Stat. 891 (1966).

n92. Pub. L. No. 94-197, 89 Stat. 1111-1115 (1975).

n93. Codified as amended in scattered sections of 42 U.S.C. (1994).

n94. 42 U.S.C. 2210(c) (1994). The Price-Anderson Act required the nuclear industry to purchase the maximum level of liability insurance available on the market - $ 60 million - and provided that the Federal Government would indemnify the industry, if necessary, up to $ 500 million.

n95. 42 U.S.C. 2210(n)(1), 2210(c) (1994).

n96. 438 U.S. 59 (1978).

n97. Id. at 72-81.

n98. Id. at 81-82.

n99. Id. at 82.

REV_00263958

n100. Id. at 83.

n101. Id. at 84.

n102. Id.

n103. Carolina Environmental Study Group v. Duke Power Co., 431 F. Supp. 203, 222 (W.D.N.C. 1977), rev'd, 438 U.S. 59 (1978).

n104. 438 U.S. at 84-85.

n105. Id. at 87.

n106. Id. at 87-88 (citations omitted).

n107. Id. at 88.

n108. Id. at 88, n.32, (quoting Munn v. Illinois, 94 U.S. 113, 134 (1877)). In the same footnote, the Court also quoted from its 1929 decision in Silver v. Silver, 280 U.S. 117 (1929), for the principle that "the 'Constitution does not forbid the creation of new rights, or the abolition of old ones recognized by the common law, to attain a permissible legislative object.'" Id.

n109. Id. at 88.

n110. Id. at 90.

n111. 1913 N.Y. Laws 816; 1914 N.Y. Laws 41, 316.

n112. 243 U.S. 188 (1917). In New York Central R. Co. v. White, the Court found the New York workers' compensation law to be "reasonable" and in conformance with "natural justice." Id. at 203. The Court specifically reserved the question of whether New York could have eliminated the parties' common law rights without setting up an alternative compensation scheme: "it perhaps may be doubted whether the state could abolish all rights of action on the one hand, or all defenses on the other, without setting up something adequate in their stead. No such question is here presented." Id. at 201. The New York workers' compensation law was further amended and upheld against due process challenge in New York Central R. Co. v. Bianc, 250 U.S. 596 (1919).

n113. 33 U.S.C. 901-950 (1994).

n114. 285 U.S. 22 (1932), overruled on other grounds, Director, Office of Workers' Compensation Programs v. Perini North River Assoc., 459 U.S. 297 (1983). In Crowell, the Court found the Federal Longshoreman and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, requiring employers to pay reasonable statutory compensation to maritime employees who are disabled or die from work injuries while on United States navigable waters, to conform to due process requirements since it was reasonable and similar to other workers' compensation schemes. Id. at 41. The Court found the employers' Seventh Amendment claim to be "unavailing" since the compensation arrangement had previously been governed by maritime law and fell within Congress' admiralty jurisdiction. Id. at 45.

n115. 438 U.S. at 88.

n116. Id. at 93.

REV_00263959

n117. Id. at 84 n.27.

n118. Id.

n119. Id. at 94. The Fifth Amendment "takings" clause provides that "private property [shall not] be taken for public use, without just compensation." U.S. Const. amend. V.

n120. 438 U.S. at 94. The Tucker Act, inter alia, waives United States sovereign immunity for claims founded on statutes, regulations, contracts or provisions of the Constitution that create substantive rights to money damages. 28 U.S.C. 1491 (1994).

n121. 438 U.S. at 94 n.39.

n122. Swine Flu Act, Pub. L. No. 94-380, 90 Stat. 1113, 42 U.S.C. 247b (1976) (repealed 1978).

n123. Under the Swine Flu Act, although the procedures of the Federal Tort Claims Act are made applicable to suits against the United States, the Act did not limit a plaintiff's theory of recovery to negligence alone. See 42 U.S.C. 247b(k)(2)(A); 28 U.S.C. 1346(b) and 2674 (1976). Instead, the United States is made liable upon any basis which would have been available against the program participant under applicable state law, "including negligence, strict liability in tort, and breach of warranty." 42 U.S.C. 247b(k)(2)(A)(I) (1976).

n124. 42 U.S.C. 247b(k)(7) (1976).

n125. 433 F. Supp. 231 (M.D. Tenn. 1977).

n126. 431 F. Supp. 411 (W.D. Okl. 1977).

n127. No. 77-L-0274-S (W.D. Ala., June 3, 1977).

n128. 574 F.2d 1307 (5th Cir. 1978).

n129. Id. at 1310. In Sparks, the court stated, "the statutory classification comes here clothed with a presumption of constitutionality and it 'will not be set aside if any state of facts reasonably may be conceived to justify it.'" 431 F. Supp. at 418. In Wolfe, the court adopted the reasoning of Sparks to the extent necessary to reach the issues raised by the plaintiff, but went on to observe that it need not necessarily reach the constitutional issues since the plaintiff, a doctor, had voluntarily consented to the legal limitations of the Swine Flu Act. 433 F. Supp. at 236, 237-238.

n130. 574 F.2d at 1311.

n131. Id. at 1310.

n132. 574 F.2d at 1311; 431 F. Supp. at 418.

n133. 431 F. Supp. at 418.

n134. Id. at 416.

n135. See infra note 427.

n136. Sparks, 431 F. Supp. at 419.

n137. Id. at 420.

REV_00263960

n138. Pub. L. No. 101-510, 104 Stat. 1837, 42 U.S.C. 2212 (1994). The statute provides "the remedy against the United States provided by [the FTCA] as appropriate, for injury, loss of property, personal injury, or death shall apply to any civil action for injury, loss of property, personal injury, or death due to exposure to radiation based on acts or omissions by a contractor in carrying out an atomic weapons testing program under a contract with the United States." Id. 2212(b)(1).

n139. 786 F.2d 8 (1st Cir. 1986).

n140. 820 F.2d 982 (9th Cir. 1987).

n141. Hammond, 786 F.2d at 12 & 820 F.2d at 989 (quoting New York Central R. Co. v. White, 243 U.S. 188, 198).

n142. Id.

n143. Id. at 12-14 (considering Fifth Amendment due process and equal protection challenges); In re Consolidated United States Atmospheric Testing Litigation, 820 F.2d at 989-91 (rejecting both procedural and substantive due process challenges).

n144. Id. at 991 (citing Hammond, 786 F.2d at 14).

n145. 786 F.2d at 15. In addition to the Fifth, Seventh, and Tenth Amendment arguments discussed supra, the court rejected claims that the law was unconstitutional because it was an "unexpected law," violated the Ninth Amendment (preserving all unenumerated rights for the people), right of access to the courts, and prohibition against ex post facto laws. Id.

n146. Id.

n147. Id. at 15 (citing National League of Cities, 426 U.S. 833 (1976), overruled by Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528 (1985) (Congress lacks authority to impose wage and hour standards on state and local government employees).

n148. Hammond, 786 F.2d at 15 (citing Garcia, 469 U.S. 528 (1985)).

n149. Pub. L. No. 100-408, 102 Stat. 1066 (codified as amended at 42 U.S.C. 2210 (1994)).

n150. The 1966 amendments to the Price-Anderson Act provided for transfer to federal district court of all actions arising out of an "extraordinary nuclear occurrence." 42 U.S.C. 2210(n)(2)(1994). The failure of such definition to apply to the Three Mile Island accident was seen as a significant impetus for Price-Anderson's 1988 expansion. See S. Rep. No. 100-218, at 13 (1987).

n151. 42 U.S.C. 2014 (1994).

n152. Id. 2219(n)(2).

n153. 13 F.3d 1090 (7[su'th'] Cir. 1994).

n154. 940 F.2d 832 (3d Cir. 1991).

n155. 89 F.3d 1106 (3d Cir. 1996), cert. denied, Aldrich v. General Pub. Utils. Corp., U.S. ; 117 S.Ct. 739; 136 L. Ed. 2d 678; 65 U.S.L.W. 3487 (U.S. 1997).

REV_00263961

n156. Article III of the Constitution provides that federal judicial power extends to cases "arising under the Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made... under their authority." U.S. Const. art. III, 2.

n157. 13 F.3d at 1099. In considering the Article III issue, O'Conner reviewed prior Supreme Court precedent such as Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat) 738 (1824), and Verlinden B.V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480 (1983). The court read these cases as establishing that "more than a jurisdictional grant is required for a matter to 'arise under' the Constitution or laws of the United States," but that "where Congress has the authority to legislate in a given area and substantively does so, a grant of federal subject matter jurisdiction will survive an Article III challenge." 13 F.3d at 1098-99 (citations omitted).

n158. 13 F.3d at 1100.

n159. Id.

n160. 940 F.2d at 857.

n161. Id.

n162. In O'Conner, plaintiff alleged he had been overexposed to radioactive materials in his position as a pipe fitter for Commonwealth Edison nuclear facility. Id. at 1093.

n163. Id. at 1102.

n164. Id.

n165. In TMI, plaintiffs asserted that retroactive application of the 1988 Amendments violated their due process rights by requiring resort to Pennsylvania's two-year statute of limitations (rather than Mississippi's six-year statute) thereby resulting in a dismissal of their action. 89 F.3d at 1110-11.

n166. Id. at 1113, (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 100-104, pt. 3, at 18 (1987)).

n167. Id. at 1113.

n168. Id. at 1114. In re TMI Litigation Cases Consol. II also rejected due process and equal protection claims as well as other "collateral" arguments relating to federalism and state sovereignty concerns. 940 F.2d at 860-61. See also O'Conner, 13 F.3d at 1102, n. 10. ("the removal of cases arising under [the laws of the United States] from state into federal courts is... no invasion of state domain.").

n169. 484 U.S. 292 (1988) (conduct by federal officials must be discretionary in nature as well as within the scope of their employment to enjoy absolute state-law tort immunity).

n170. Arbour v. Jenkins, 903 F.2d 416 (6[su'th'] Cir. 1990).

n171. Pub. L. No. 100-694, 102 Stat. 4563 (codified as amended at 28 U.S.C. 2679 (1994)).

n172. Id. The Westfall Act amended the Federal Torts Claims Act.

n173. 888 F.2d 802 (11[su'th'] Cir. 1989).

n174. 903 F.2d at 416.

REV_00263962

↑n175. 948 F.2d 1131 (10[su'th'] Cir. 1991).

↑n176. Salmon, 924 F.2d at 1143.

↑n177. Id.

↑n178. See infra nn.174, 184, 216, 228 & 244. Other recent examples of federal tort reforms include (1) 49 U.S.C. 28102 (1994) (enacted in 1990) (limiting passenger rail liability for Virginia commuter lines to $ 200 million per accident in the District of Columbia along with requiring such railways to maintain minimum liability coverage of $ 200 million); (2) Federal Credit Union Act, 12 U.S.C. 1787(c)(3)(A) (1994) (enacted in 1987) (limiting damages for lost profits, lost opportunity, and pain and suffering stemming from the liquidation of federal credit unions) (enacted in 1987); (3) National Childhood Vaccine Injury Compensation Act of 1986, 42 U.S.C. 300aa-1-34 (1994) (providing no-fault compensation scheme for injuries resulting from child vaccines and eliminating most forms of state law liability for vaccine manufacturers and administrators); and (4) Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 (Superfund), 42 U.S.C. 9612(e) & 9658 (a) (1994) (providing that bringing Superfund claim does not constitute a waiver of rights under state law and substituting federal for state statute of limitations). See also Year 2000 Information and Readiness Disclosure Act, 15 U.S.C. 1 note (1998) (preempting state contract actions and evidentiary rules stemming from the dissemination of information concerning the Year 2000 computer problems).

↑n179. See infra n.456.

↑n180. See infra notes 241, 261 & 273. A number of other tort reform proposals may be on the congressional agenda which are not discussed in detail herein. See e.g., Trade and Professional Association Free Flow of Information Act of 1997, H.R. 1542 & S. 1135, 105 [su'th'] Cong. (1997) (providing expanded liability protections for non-profit organizations); and Auto Choice Reform Act of 1997, H.R. 2021 & S. 625, 105[su'th'] Cong. (1997) (preempting state automobile liability law to permit motorists to of the ability to seek non-economic damages); Fairness in Asbestos Compensation Act of 1998, H.R. 3905, 105[su'th'] Cong. (1998) (preempting state law concerning liability for asbestos to provide an administrative procedure subject to a variety of caps and limitations on liability).

↑n181. Pub. L. No. 103-298, 108 Stat. 1552-54 (1994) (codified at 49 U.S.C. 40101 note (1994)).

↑n182. General Aviation Act 2(c). In the scope of this provision a "general aviation aircraft" is defined as aircraft of less than 20 seats not engaged in scheduled passenger carrying operations.

↑n183. Id. 2(a)(2) & 3.

↑n184. Id. 2(b). In excluding "written" warranties, the law would presumably apply to supersede any implied warranties which may have applied beyond the statute of repose period.

↑n185. Id. 2(d).

↑n186. See H.R. Rep. No. 103-525, pt. 1, at 2 (1994). Proponents had noted that production of general aviation aircrafts by domestic manufacturers had declined from 17,000 units in 1979 to 954 units in 1993. This in turn was asserted to have led to a direct loss of 20,000 aviation jobs and an indirect loss of another 80,000 jobs in related industries. Id.

REV_00263963

(Mondou v. New York). [45]

On this occasion, the Court found the law constituted a valid exercise of Congress' commerce authority. [46] Although the 1908 Act was limited to injuries involving persons employed in interstate commerce, it [*598] had been asserted the law should be struck down because co-employees causing the injury may not have been so engaged. The Court disagreed, observing "this is a mistaken theory, in that it treats the source of the injury, rather than its effect upon interstate commerce, as the criterion of congressional power." [47]

The Court also considered and rejected several objections to the 1908 Act in the nature of due process concerns - that it unreasonably abrogated common law rules, that it interfered with "liberty of contract," [48] and that it arbitrarily placed employers in a "disfavored class." [49] The Court disposed of the contention that the law unreasonably altered rules of common law, quoting from their 1876 decision in Munn v. Illinois [50] for the proposition that:

A person has no property, no vested interest, in any rule of the common law. That is only one of the forms of municipal law, and is no more sacred than any other. Rights of property which have been created by the common law cannot be taken away without due process; but the law itself, as a rule of conduct, may be changed at the will... of the legislature, unless prevented by constitutional limitations. Indeed, the greater office of statutes is to remedy defects in the common law as they are developed, and to adapt it to the changes of time and circumstances. [51]

The Court also found that changes in common law liability rules would promote workplace safety and were well within Congress' discretion. [52] The fact that other states had enacted special rules concerning workplace liability was of little importance to the Court, which observed that such laws "were far from uniform" and it was left to Congress to determine whether national law "would better serve the needs of commerce." [53]

The Court readily disposed of the "liberty of contract argument" raised by the employers. Recent decisions had established that "if Congress possesses the power to impose... liability, which we here hold that it does, it also possesses the power to insure its efficacy by prohibiting any contract, rule, regulation or device in evasion of it." [54]

As for the question of whether the 1908 Act effectuated an impermissible classification discriminating against railways, the Court found [*599] that even if it is assumed that the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause incorporates the same standards as the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause, the law was not unconstitutional:

[The Equal Protection Clause] does not take from Congress the power to classify, nor does it condemn exertions of that power merely because they occasion some inequalities. On the contrary, it admits of the exercise of a wide discretion in classifying according to general, rather than minute distinctions, and condemns what is done only when it is without any reasonable basis, and is therefore purely arbitrary.... Tested by these standards, this classification is not objectionable. [55]

The Court next considered a federalism-related question - whether Congress had the authority to preempt state laws concerning the same subject matter as the 1908 Act. Using a straightforward Supremacy Clause analysis to reject this concern, the Court quoted McCulloch v. Maryland [56] for the proposition that the "government of the United States... though limited in powers, is supreme; and its laws, when made in pursuance of the Constitution, form the supreme law of the land, 'anything in the Constitution or the laws of any state, to the contrary notwithstanding.'" [57]

The Court also used the Supremacy Clause as the constitutional justification for allowing the 1908 Act to be enforced in state court. The Court reasoned, "the fact that a state court

REV_00263928

n187. Id. at 5-6.

n188. See S. 2794, 99th Cong. (1986).

n189. See, e.g., S. Rep. No. 101-303, at 2 (1990) (Senate Judiciary Committee issued an adverse report on general aviation legislation, concluding, inter alia, that "the General Aviation Accident Liability Standards Act [S. 640] should not be passed by the Senate and enacted into law. The bill has not been proven to be necessary and would represent an unwise policy decision on the part of the Senate, if adopted. Further, a number of the specific substantive provisions of the bill are so problematic that the entire bill is fatally flawed.").

n190. The House version of the legislation further clarified that it would only apply to limit suits brought against general aviation manufacturers in their capacity as manufacturers. See General Aviation Act, 2(a).

n191. Pub. L. No. 104-210, 110 Stat. 3011 (codified at 42 U.S.C.A. 1791 (West Supp. 1998)).

n192. The Food Donation Act applies to persons who donate as well as "glean" food, with "gleaner" defined to mean "a person who harvests for free distribution to the needy... an agricultural crop that has been donated by the owner." Id. 1791(b)(5) & (c)(1).

n193. The Food Donation Act defines "nonprofit organization" as an entity that (A) is operated for religious, charitable, or educational purposes; and (B) does not provide net earnings or operate in a manner that benefits any of its officers, employees, or shareholders. Id. 1791(b) (9).

n194. Id. 1791(b)(1), (b)(2),(c)(1) & (c)(2).

n195. Id. 1791(d).

n196. Id. 1791(d).

n197. The operative provisions of the law provide that persons, gleaners, and nonprofit organizations "shall not be subject to civil or criminal liability" arising from a specified set of circumstances. Id. 1791(c)(1) & (c)(2).

n198. See, e.g., H.R. Rep. No. 104-661, at 3 (1996).

n199. See, e.g., The Good Samaritan Food Donation Act, Hearing on H.R. 2428 Before the Subcomm. on Postsecondary Education, Training and Life-Long Learning of the House Comm. on Economic and Educational Opportunities, 104th Cong., 5 (1996) (statement of Rep. Danner) ("while each of the 50 states have Good Samaritan legislation in place, the level of protection differs and the liability concerns of the national and regional donors are not uniformly addressed. Adoption of this bill would eliminate this disparity and facilitate greater support of private sector feeding programs....").

n200. National and Community Service Act of 1990, 42 U.S.C. 12571, 12671-12673 (1994).

n201. See H.R. Rep. No. 104-494, at 405 (1996).

n202. The Senate adopted amendments which clarified that "gross negligence" included a failure to act and that the law did not supersede state or local health regulations covering nonprofit organizations. See 142 Cong. Rec. S9532 -33 (daily ed. Aug. 2, 1996).

REV_00263964

n203. Pub. L. No. 105-19, 111 Stat. 218 (codified at 42 U.S.C.A. 14501-14505 (West Supp. III 1997)).

n204. "Nonprofit organization" is defined to include any organization exempt from federal taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code as well as any not-for-profit organized and conducted for the public benefit and operated primarily for charitable, civic, educational, religious, welfare or health purposes, so long as the group does not practice any action constituting a federal hate crime. Id. 14505(4).

n205. The Volunteer Protection Act does not provide any direct liability protections to the nonprofit organizations or government agencies. Id. 14503(c).

n206. "Volunteer" is defined to mean an individual (including a director or officer) performing services for a "nonprofit organization" or a governmental entity who does not receive compensation (other than reasonable expenses) in excess of $ 500 per year. Id. 14505 (6).

n207. Id. 14503(a)(3).

n208. Id. 14503(a)(1), (2) & (3). The Act also excludes from liability protection any specific misconduct constituting a crime of violence or international terrorism, hate crime, sexual offense, civil rights violation, or which is caused by the influence of alcohol or drugs in violation of state law as well as volunteers performing services for groups responsible for federal hate crimes (e.g., crimes that manifest evidence of prejudice based on race, religion, sexual orientation, or ethnicity). Id. 14503(f) & 14505(4). (Federal hate crimes are defined at 28 U.S.C. 534 note).

n209. Unlike the liability protections against acts of ordinary negligence, the Volunteer Protection Act's limitations on liability for punitive damages and joint and several liability for non-economic damages are not limited to actions where the volunteer was acting with any required license or was not caused by a motor vehicle. An additional variation in coverage concerns the scope of the joint and several liability damage limitations set forth in the Volunteer Protection Act. By its terms the provisions prohibiting actions against volunteers for ordinary negligence and limiting punitive damage actions do not apply to affect civil actions brought by a nonprofit or governmental entity against their volunteers. There is no such limitation contained in the provisions limiting non-economic damages in joint and several liability cases. See 42 U.S.C. 14503 (a), (c), (e) & 14504.

n210. Id. 14503(e)(1).

n211. Id. 14504(b)(1).

n212. Id. 14502(a). Under some scenarios, determinations regarding the interaction between state law and the Act could be problematic with regard to tort reforms. Consider a state such as Idaho where punitive damages may be established by a "preponderance of the evidence," but such awards are limited to "wanton, malicious or outrageous misconduct." Idaho Code 6-1604 (1996). In the event of a voluntary liability case in Idaho involving a punitive damage claim, it would be unclear whether a defendant would be permitted to use the stricter evidentiary requirement of the Volunteer Protection Act requiring "clear and convincing evidence" to establish punitive damages, while at the same time benefiting from the stricter state law requirement limiting punitive damages to "outrageous misconduct" (as compared to the Volunteer Protection Act's seemingly more lenient standard of "flagrant indifference to the rights or safety of others").

n213. Id. 14503(d)(1), (2) & (4).

REV_00263965

n214. Id. 14503(d)(3).

n215. Such opt-out authority would only apply to volunteer liability cases where all of the parties to the proceeding are residents of the state in question. Id. 14502(b).

n216. See, e.g., H.R. Rep. No. 105-101, pt. 1, at 5-8 (1997). In particular, supporters pointed to a 1996 report prepared by the Nonprofit Risk Management Center (an organization designed to meet the insurance and risk management needs of the nonprofit community) in cooperation with the ABA Section on Business Law which found that there had been a significant increase in the number of lawsuits brought against volunteers since the mid-1980's, and a study by the Independent Sector (an organization of foundations, charities, and businesses that tracks nonprofit activities) indicating that the rate of volunteerism had dropped from 54% in 1989 to 48% in 1993. Id. at 5-6 (1997); 143 Cong. Rec. S3861-62 (daily ed. May 1, 1997) (statement of Sen. Coverdell).

n217. 143 Cong. Rec. H3101 (daily ed. May 21, 1997) (statement of Rep. Hyde).

n218. See H.R. 911, 100th Cong. (1987).

n219. In 1993, Rep. Porter offered his bill as an amendment to the National Service Trust Act, and it was approved by the full House after a perfecting amendment offered by Rep. John Bryant was adopted (providing that as a condition of the volunteer immunity, the states require - rather than just permit - laws insuring that covered nonprofit organizations operate in a safe and sound manner). The Bryant amendment was approved by a vote of 239-194, and the Porter Amendment, as perfected by the Bryant Amendment, was agreed to by a vote of 362-61. See 139 Cong. Rec. H5376-82, H5422-23 (daily ed. July 28, 1993). The Porter amendment was subsequently dropped in conference with the Senate.

n220. See S. 543, 105th Cong. (1997); H.R. 1167, 105th Cong, 1st Sess. (1997).

n221. Further modest revisions were made to the bill when the House Judiciary Committee approved amendments providing that the bill would only apply to causes of action from events occurring after the bill's effective date and excluding from the bill's coverage volunteers performing services for groups responsible for federal hate crimes. See H.R. Rep. No. 105-101, pt. 1 at 9, 16 (1997).

n222. Pub. L. No. 105-134, 111 Stat. 2570 (codified at 49 U.S.C.A. 28103 (West Supp. 1998)).

n223. The Amtrak Act is analyzed as a federal tort reform herein because it operates to supersede state law, since Amtrak is not considered an agency or instrumentality for purposes of the Federal Torts Claims Act. See Senter v. Amtrak, 540 F. Supp. 557 (D.N.J. 1982) (Amtrak, unlike federal agencies and instrumentalities, found to be subject to punitive damage liability).

n224. 49 U.S.C. 28103(a)(1).

n225. Id. 28103(a)(2). It is unclear how the damage cap is to be apportioned in the event claims are established which exceed $ 200 million.

n226. Id. 28103(b).

n227. The introduced version of the legislation would have provided that such obligations "shall be enforceable, notwithstanding any other statutory or common law or public policy...." This was an effort to overturn a district court decision in National Railroad Passenger Corp v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 698 F. Supp. 951 (D.C. 1988), vacated, 892 F.2d 1066 (D.C. Cir.

REV_00263966

1990) (voiding an indemnification agreement between "mtrak and Conrail implicated by a 1987 Chase, Maryland collision as being against public policy). See H.R. 2247, 105th Cong. 401 (1997); H.R. Rep. No. 105-251, at 7, 22 (1997).

n228. 49 U.S.C. 28103(c).

n229. See, e.g., H.R. Rep. No. 105-251, at 21 (1997).

n230. Id. The report of the House Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure also rejected safety concerns raised by the liability limitations, due to the claimed extensive federal regulatory role: "Railroad safety is subject to regulation by the Federal Railroad Administration. Under current law, any single violation of a federal safety law or regulation can subject an individual or a company to a fine from $ 500 to $ 10,000 - with the maximum increased to $ 20,000 for willful violations." Id. at 22.

n231. H.R. 2247, 105th Cong. 401 (1997).

n232. Id.

n233. See, e.g., H.R. Rep. No. 105-251, at 93-94 (1997) (minority views contending that reforms initially approved by the Committee were "neither fair nor sensible." In particular, the views complained that punitive damages should not be linked to the amount of economic loss, non-economic damages should not be dependent on economic damages, and mandating the upholding of indemnification agreements would encourage recklessness by the freight railways).

n234. Biomaterials Access Assurance Act of 1988, Pub. L. No. 105-230, 112 Stat. 1519 (1998) (codified at 21 U.S.C. 1601-1606) (1998)).

n235. The Biomaterials Access Assurance Act of 1998 limits the liability under state product liability law of biomaterials suppliers that directly or indirectly supply component parts or raw materials for use in the manufacture of an implant, to only those who fail to meet contractual and other specifications and such conduct was an actual and proximate cause of the harm to the claimant. Id. 5(a).

A biomaterials supplier does not receive liability protection under the "failure to meet contractual specifications" exception if the raw materials or component parts delivered: (1) did not constitute the product described in the contract; (2) failed to meet any specifications that were provided to the supplier and not expressly repudiated; (3) failed to meet any specifications published by the biomaterials supplier; (4) failed to meet any specifications provided to the manufacturer by the biomaterials supplier; (5) failed to meet any specifications contained in a master file submitted by the supplier to the Secretary of Health and Human Services and that is currently maintained by the supplier for the purposes of premarket approval of medical devices; or (6) failed to meet any specifications included in the submissions for purposes of premarket approval or review by the FDA provided by the manufacturer to the supplier and not repudiated by the supplier. Id. 5(d).

The Biomaterials Access Assurance Act of 1998 also requires the manufacturer of an implant to be named a party unless the manufacturer is subject to service of process solely in a jurisdiction in which the biomaterials supplier is not domiciled or subject to a service of process, or if an action against the manufacturer is barred by applicable law. Id. 6(b).

n236. Common Sense Product Liability and Legal Reform Act, H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 104-481 (1996). Provisions to protect biomaterials suppliers were also included in the Senate Product Liability Proposal during the 105[su'th'] Congress.

REV_00263967

n237. Biomaterials Access Assurance Act of 1997: Hearing on H.R. 872 Before the Subcomm. on Commercial and Administrative Law of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 105th Cong., 1st Sess. 96 (1997) (statement of Jorge E. Ramirez, Sales and Marketing Manager, Hoechst Corp.). Proponents of the Act also argued that the patchwork of fifty separate product liability laws leads to venue-shopping and confusion and that the system can be improved by limiting the liability of materials suppliers. Id.

n238. See supra note 235 at 7. In order to implead a supplier back into the action, a manufacturer or a claimant must file a motion within 90 days after entry of a final judgment.

n239. Id. 3(2)(D)(iii). The Biomaterials Access Assurance Act also excludes actions involving: (1) health care providers where the sale or use of an implant is incidental to the transaction and where the essence of the transaction is the furnishing of judgment, skill, or services; and (2) a person acting in the capacity of a manufacturer, seller, or biomaterials supplier. Id. 3(2)(D)(i) & (ii).

n240. Id. 6(a). Grounds for the motion to dismiss include that the defendant is: (1) a biomaterials supplier; and (2) is not a manufacturer, or a seller of the implant or it has not been established that it supplied raw materials or component parts in violation of the contractual requirements or specifications.

n241. Id. 6(c). The Act specifies a number of rules pertaining to the motion to dismiss. For example, in a proceeding on a motion to dismiss, the defendant may submit an affidavit demonstrating that it has not included the implant on a list filed with the Secretary of Health and Human Services. Id. 6(c)(2)(A). The claimant may then submit an affidavit demonstrating that the Secretary of Health and Human services has issued a declaration with respect to the defendant and the implant or demonstrating that the defendant is liable as a seller of the implant. Id. 6(c)(2)(B). If a defendant files a motion to dismiss, no discovery will be permitted in connection to the action that is the subject of the motion, other than discovery necessary to determine a motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction until the court rules on the motion to dismiss based on the affidavits submitted by the parties. Id. 6(c)(1)(A). If a defendant files a motion to dismiss on the grounds that the biomaterials supplier did not supply raw material or component parts in violation of contractual requirements or specifications, the court may permit discovery that is limited to issues relevant to the pending motion to dismiss or the jurisdiction of the court. Id. 6(c)(1)(B). Unless the defendant is demonstrated to be a manufacturer or seller of the implant, the court will consider the defendant to be a biomaterials supplier who is not subject to an action for harm to a claimant caused by an implant, other than an action relating to liability for a violation of contractual requirements or specifications. Id. 6(c)(3)(A). The court is required to grant a motion to dismiss any action that asserts liability of the defendant on the grounds that the defendant is not a manufacturer or seller unless the claimant submits a valid affidavit demonstrating that the defendant is liable as a manufacturer or a seller. Id. 6(c)(3)(B). The court is required to rule on a motion to dismiss solely on the basis of the pleadings and affidavits submitted by the parties. Id. 6(c)(3). If the court determines that the pleadings and affidavits raise genuine issues of material facts with respect to a motion concerning contractual requirements and specifications, the court may deem the motion to dismiss to be a motion for summary judgment. Id. 6(c)(4).

n242. Id. 6(d) & 5(b)(3)(D). Under the Act, a biomaterials supplier is entitled to summary judgment only if the court finds no genuine issue of material fact as to the legal requirements for dismissal. Discovery prior to a ruling on a summary judgment motion is limited to establishing whether a genuine issue of material fact exists as to the legal requirements of dismissal. In response to a claimant's petition for a declaration, the court is required to stay all proceedings with respect to a defendant until the Secretary makes a final decision as to whether the defendant is a manufacturer and may incur liability.

REV_00263968

n243. Id. 7(c) & 7(b)(1).

n244. Pub. L. No. 106-37, 113 Stat. 6601 (codified at 15 U.S.C. 6601-17 (1999)).

n245. H.R. Rep. No. 106-131, pt. 1, at 14 (1999).

n246. Id.

n247. Id. 5(a).

n248. Id. 5(b)(2). Section 5(c) of the Y2K Act contains an absolute prohibition on the award of punitive damages in a Y2K action against a "government entity." Because of concern that this would protect public, but not private, universities, the Consolidated Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2000 amended Section 5 of the Y2K Act to prohibit the award of punitive damages against all institutions of higher education. Consolidated Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2000, Pub. L. No. 106-113, 311, 113 Stat. 151 (1999). (The provision will not apply to an institution of higher education if the Y2K failure in the Y2K action occurred in a computer-based student financial aid system of that institution of higher education, and the institution: (1) has not passed Y2K data exchange testing with the Department of Education or (2) is not or was not in the process of performing data exchange testing with the Department of Education at the time the Department terminates such testing.).

n249. Id. 5(b).

n250. Id. 6. In addition, if portions of the plaintiff's damage claim ultimately prove to be uncollectible, and the plaintiff is an individual with a net worth of less than $ 200,000 (a so-called "widow or orphan") and damages are greater than 10% of a plaintiff's net worth, a solvent defendant is responsible for paying an additional 100% share of their liability, or an additional 150% of this amount if they acted with "reckless disregard for the likelihood that its acts would cause injury."

n251. Id. 4(d).

n252. Id. 11. The legislation does not specify whether it would be appropriate to enforce a damage limitation that was found to be unconscionable or a provision of adhesion, as is generally the case under section 4(d) of the Act.

n253. Id. 9. This limitation on damages does not apply where the defendant has engaged in fraud.

n254. Id. 12. Some Democrats and the Administration sought to limit the applicability of the new rule so that it would not apply where there was fraud in the inducement. Ultimately, the legislation only excluded claims for intentional tort which arise independent of a contract.

n255. Id. 10. It is unclear if this would prevent courts from looking to common law interpretations on these doctrines which develop after January 1, 1999. It is also unclear whether this provision would apply to protect plaintiffs in the event a state changed their law to further expand these doctrines, given that section 16 says the law is not to be construed to affect state law affording greater protections to defendants in Y2K actions.

n256. Id. 13(a).

n257. Id. 13(b).

REV_00263969

n258. Id. 13(c).

n259. Id. 7.

n260. Id. 8.

n261. Id. 15(c). The only exceptions to the mandated federal court jurisdiction for Y2K class actions are where (1) a substantial majority of members of the plaintiff class are citizens of a single state, the primary defendants are citizens of that state, and the claims asserted will be governed primarily by the laws of that state; (2) the primary defendants are states or state officials; (3) the plaintiff class does not seek an award of punitive damages and the amount in controversy is less than $ 10 million; or (4) there are less than 100 members of the class. The burden is on the plaintiff to establish that any of these four exceptions apply.

n262. See, e.g., Interstate Class Action Jurisdiction Act of 1999, H.R. 1875, 106[su'th'] Cong. (1999); Class Action Fairness Act of 1999, S. 353, 106[su'th'] Cong. (1999). [ck nexis]

n263. Id. 15(a) & (b). The class notice is also required to include information concerning the attorney's fee arrangements.

The Y2K Act includes several other minor procedural and technical provisions, including regulatory relief from penalties for Y2K related reporting or monitoring violations (4 (g)); consumer protection to ensures that homeowners cannot be foreclosed on due to a Y2K failure (4(h)); authorizing federal courts to appoint special masters to consider Y2K matters (14); applying Rule 704 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (concerning the use of expert testimony) to state courts (17); and civil penalty waivers for first-time violations by a small business of federally enforceable rules or requirements that are caused by a Y2K failure (18);

n264. Id. 4(a).

n265. Statement on Signing Y2K Act, 35 Weekly Comp. Pres. Doc. 143 (July 20, 1999).

n266. Id. 4(c).

n267. Id. 4(i).

n268. Id. 16.

n269. See House Democratic substitute offered by Rep. Conyers (D-MI), 145 Cong. Rec. H3039-51(daily ed. May 12, 1999); Senate Democratic substitute offered by Sen. Kerry (D-MA), 145 Cong. Rec. S657B76 (daily ed. June 12, 1999).

n270. The House passed version of H.R. 775 included: (i) a "reasonable efforts" defense providing that the fact that a defendant took reasonable measures to prevent the Y2K-related failure was a complete defense to liability; (ii) a "loser pays" (or "English Rule") provision requiring a litigant to be liable to pay the other side's attorneys' fees if they rejected a pre-trial settlement offer and ultimately secured a less favorable verdict; and (iii) a provision capping the personal liability of corporate directors and officers at the greater of $ 100,000 or their past 12-months' compensation. See H.R. 775, 106[su'th'] Cong, 303, 507, & 305.

n271. See Y2K Act 5(b), 6, 9, & 12 (limiting protections relating to punitive damages, proportionate liability, duty to mitigate, and "economic loss" rule).

REV_00263970

n272. Among other things, the legislation would have created federal liability standards along with a statute of limitations and repose and restricted the availability of punitive damage awards. For a detailed legislative history of federal product liability reform efforts, see S. Rep. No. 105-32, at 15-19 (1997); Victor E. Schwartz & Mark A. Behrens, Federal Product Liability Reform in 1997: History and Public Policy Support Its Enactment Now, 64 Tenn. L. Rev. 595, 599 - 601 (1997); Sherman Joyce, Product Liability Law in the Federal Arena, 19 Seattle U. L. Rev. 421 (1996); Beth Rogers, Note, Legal Reform - at the Expense of Federalism? House Bill 956, Common Sense Civil Justice Reform Act and Senate Bill 565, Product Liability Reform Act, 21 U. Dayton L. Rev. 513, 517 - 519 (1996).

n273. Product Liability Reform: Hearing Before the Committee on the Judiciary, 105th Cong. 9 (1997) (statement of Peter H. Hickok, Owner, Hickok Manufacturing Co., Inc.); Product Liability and Legal Reform: Hearing on H.R. 10 Before the Committee on the Judiciary, 104th Cong. 1 (1995) (statement of Rep. Hyde). See also Michael Rustad, Nationalizing Tort Law: The Republican Attack on Women, Blue Collar Workers and Consumers, 48 Rutgers L. Rev. 673 (1996).

n274. Message on Returning Without Approval to the House of Representatives the Common Sense Product Liability Legal Reform Act of 1996, 32 Weekly Comp. Pres. Doc. 780 (May 2, 1996). The President's Veto Statement opposed, inter alia, provisions eliminating joint and several liability for non-economic damages and the limitations on punitive damages. It also noted that the legislation inappropriately intruded on state authority. The House failed to obtain the two-thirds vote necessary to override the President's veto on May 9, 1996 by a vote of 258 to 163. See 142 Cong. Rec. H4764 (daily ed. May 9, 1996).

n275. The Product Liability Reform Act of 1998, S. 2236, 105[su'th'] Cong. (1998). The Senate Proposal applies to a broad range of "product liability actions," defined as a civil action brought on any theory for harm caused by a product. Id. 101(16). It omits any provision concerning joint and several liability, and narrows the scope of a number of other provisions included in last Congress' product liability bill.

n276. See 144 Cong. Rec. S7255 (daily ed. June 26, 1998).

n277. A small business is defined as those with fewer than 25 full time employees and annual revenues of $ 5 million or less. Id. 110(b)(2)(A)(ii). The annual revenues and numbers of employees of a corporation include the annual revenues and employees of any parent corporation, subsidiary, branch, division, or unit of that corporation. Id. 110(b)(2)(B)(i) & (ii).

n278. Id. 110(b)(1)(A) & (B). Compensatory damages include both economic and non-economic damages. Id. 101(6).

n279. Id. 110(a)(1). The Senate Proposal also provides for a bifurcated determination of punitive damage awards. Under the proposal, any party may request that the court consider in a separate proceeding, subsequent to the determination of compensatory damages, whether punitive damages should be awarded. Id. 110(a)(2)(A).

n280. Id. 111.

n281. Id. 106(a), Id. 107(a).

n282. Id. 106(a). The proposal provides an exception to the statute of limitations so that persons with a legal disability may file a product liability action up to two years after the date in which the person ceases to have the disability. Id. 106(b)(1). It also provides that if a civil action is stayed or enjoined, the statute of limitations will be tolled until the end of the stay or injunction. Id. 106(b)(2). Finally, if a statute of limitations or statute of repose provision shortens the period during which a product liability action could be otherwise brought, the claimant may bring the product liability action within one year after the date of enactment of the legislation. Id. 108.

REV_00263971

n283. Id. 107(a). The proposal provides exceptions to the statute of repose for (1) motor vehicles, vessels, aircraft or trains used primarily to transport passengers for hire, (2) actions based on an express warranty in writing for longer than eighteen years, and (3) the limitation period established by the General Aviation Revitalization Act of 1994. Id. 107(c).

n284. Id. 104(a).

n285. Id. 105(a).

n286. Id. 105(a)(1)(A) & (B).

n287. Id. 105(b).

n288. Id. 103(a)(1). Under the proposal, a product seller will not be considered to have failed to exercise reasonable care if there was no reasonable opportunity to inspect the product, or if the inspection would not have revealed the aspect of the product that allegedly caused the claimant's harm. Id. 103(a)(2).

n289. Id. 109(a) & (b). Under the proposal, the claimant or defendant may offer to an adverse party to proceed under ADR within 60 days of the service of the initial complaint or the expiration of the period for a responsive pleading, and an offeree must file a written notice of acceptance or rejection within 20 days of receipt of the offer.

n290. Id. 101(15)(B) & 102(a)(2).

n291. Id.

n292. Title II of the Senate Product Liability Proposal also included relief for suppliers of raw materials and component parts for medical implants, a form of which was subsequently signed into law. See supra section IV.A.5.

The Senate Proposal includes a general preemption provision, indicating that except as otherwise provided, the legislation is to preempt certain state law on a "two-way" basis. As such, the bill could operate to preempt some laws that are more favorable to defendants than the draft provides. For example, under the Senate Proposal, actions brought in states which do not have a statute of limitations running from the time harm is discovered would be subject to a lengthier statute of limitations period than under their currently applicable law. See supra note 283 (for example, Virginia bars claims filed a specified number of years after a person has been injured, regardless of whether the person actually knew of the injury. See VA Code Ann. 8.01-243 (Michie 1997)). The preemption provisions are not drafted to provide causes of action where they do not otherwise exist. For example, the punitive damages caps would only apply in states which otherwise allow for punitive damages, rather than allowing for punitive damage actions in all states. Id. 110(a)(1).

n293. See Balanced Budget Act of 1997, H.R. 2015, 105th Cong. (1997); Health Care Coverage Availability and Affordability Act, H.R. 3160, 104th Cong. (1996); Balanced Budget Act of 1995, H.R. 2491, 104th Cong. (1995); Common Sense Product Liability and Legal Reform Act of 1995, H.R. 956, 104th Cong. (1995).

n294. See, e.g., Rep. Bill Thomas, Rest of Country Deserves Medical Liability Reforms State of California Passed for itself Two Decades Ago, Roll Call, Nov. 13, 1995 (Health Care Policy Briefing), at 9.

REV_00263972

n295. See supra note 294.

n296. A health care liability action is defined as a civil action brought in a state or federal court against a health care provider, an entity which is obligated to provide or pay for health benefits under any health plan (including any person or entity acting under a contract or arrangement to provide or administer a health benefit), or the manufacturer, distributor, supplier, marketer, promoter, or seller of a medical product in which the claimant alleges a health care liability claim. Id. 4802(10).

n297. Id. 4812(a)(1). Non-economic damages are defined as damages paid to an individual for pain and suffering, inconvenience, emotional distress, mental anguish, loss of society and companionship, injury to reputation, humiliation, and other subjective, nonpecuniary losses. Id. 4802(14).

n298. Id. Although there is no provision dealing with preemption issues, these provisions are written so they would not preempt any state law with higher liability caps.

n299. Id. 4812(a)(2).

n300. Id. 4811(a). The proposal provides an exception so that persons with a legal disability may file an action up to two years after the date on which they cease to have the legal disability. Id. 4811(b). It also provides a transitional provision so that if a provision under the statute of limitations shortens the period during which a health care liability action would be brought, the claimant may bring an action up to two years after the date of enactment of this Act. Id. 4811(c).

n301. Id. 4812(b)(2). Economic loss is defined in the proposal as any pecuniary loss resulting from harm (including the loss of earnings or other benefits related to employment, medical expense loss, replacement services loss, loss due to death, burial costs, and loss of business or employment opportunities), to the extent recovery for such loss is allowed under applicable state or federal law. Id. 4802(8).

n302. Id. 4812(b)(1). The proposal also allows for bifurcated proceedings for the consideration of punitive damage claims and ban punitive damage awards in the case of drugs or other devices that have been approved by the FDA or any other drug generally recognized as safe and effective pursuant to FDA-established conditions. Id. 4812(c)(2), (d)(1). The ban on punitive damages would not apply in cases where the defendant intentionally and wrongfully withheld from or misrepresented information to the Food and Drug Administration that is material and relevant to the harm suffered by the claimant. Id. 4812(d)(1)(B).

n303. In addition, the House Medical Malpractice Proposal requires that any ADR system used to resolve health care liability actions or claims must include provisions specified in the bill regarding statute of limitations, non-economic damages, joint and several liability, punitive damages, the collateral source rule, and periodic payments of damage awards. Id. 4813.

n304. Id. 4812(E). The judgment of the court awarding periodic payments may not be reopened to contest, amend, or modify the schedule or amount of the payments, absent any fraud.

n305. Under the collateral source rule, a victim is able to obtain compensation for the full amount of damages incurred, and his or her health insurance provider is able to seek subrogation in respect of its own payments to the victim. See Restatement (Second) Torts derives its existence and functions from the state laws is no reason why it should not afford relief; because it is subject also to the laws of the United States, and is just as much bound to recognize those laws as operative within the state as it is to recognize the state laws." [58]

REV_00263973

C. Black Lung Benefits Act of 1972

Title IV of the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969, as amended by the Black Lung Benefits Act of 1972 [59] ("Black Lung Benefits Act"), requires that employers provide benefits to coal miners suffering from "black lung disease" (pneumonoconiosis) and their survivor families. [60] Although enacted more than sixty years after the 1908 Employers' Liability Act, The Black Lung Benefits Act can be seen as consistent with the first wave of federal tort reforms through its restrictions on employer legal rights. [61]

[*600] Shortly after the Black Lung Benefits Act was enacted, a number of coal mine operators challenged its constitutionality, claiming it violated their Fifth Amendment due process rights because it applied "retrospectively" (by requiring the benefit payments be made to miners who had left employment before the law's effective date), and asserting that the presumptions and evidentiary rules were arbitrary and irrational. [62] In 1976, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of these provisions in Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co. [63]

In reviewing the retrospective applicability of the Black Lung Benefits Act, the Court observed it was "by now well established that legislative Acts adjusting the burdens and benefits of economic life come to the Court with a presumption of constitutionality," [64] and it had previously upheld laws effectuating "workmen's compensation principles analogous to those enacted here." [65] In this case, the Court found that the retrospective liability scheme in question was justified and rational, even though it applied to mine operators doing business prior to the law's enactment:

We are unwilling to assess the wisdom of Congress' chosen scheme by examining the degree to which the "cost-savings" enjoyed by operators in the pre-enactment period produced "excess" profits, or the degree to which the retrospective liability imposed on the early operators can now be passed on to the consumer. It is enough to say that the Act approaches the problem of cost spreading rationally; whether a broader cost-spreading scheme would have been wiser or more practical is not a question of constitutional dimension. [66]

[*601] The Court applied a similar analysis in considering the various challenges to the Black Lung Benefits Act's presumptions and evidentiary rules, finding each to have a rational basis. [67] In dicta, however, the Court refused to grant Congress totally unfettered discretion in setting liability rules, indicating it might face a far more difficult problem upholding legislation granting benefits retrospectively to families of miners who did not die of black lung disease and who were unaware and unaffected by the illness during their lives. [68]

III. THE SECOND WAVE: ENCOURAGING BENEFICIAL ACTIVITIES BY LIMITING PLAINTIFFS' COMMON LAW RIGHTS IN EXCHANGE FOR OFFSETTING LEGALBENEFITS

The second wave of federal tort reform began in the middle of the 20[su'th'] century when Congress enacted a number of laws granting liability protections for defendants while generally providing substitute remedies for harmed parties. The following is an analysis of these "second wave" laws which have been challenged on constitutional grounds. [69]

A. Federal Drivers Act

In 1961, Congress enacted the Federal Drivers Act, [70] making the Federal Torts Claims Act the exclusive remedy for injuries resulting from the operation of a motor vehicle by n306. Id. 4812(F). If the defendant introduces evidence of collateral source payments, the claimant may introduce evidence of the insurance amount that is paid or likely to be paid to secure the collateral source payment. Id. 4812(F)(1). The provider of the collateral source payment cannot recover any amount against the claimant or receive a lien or credit against the claimant's recovery, or be subrogated the right of the claimant, whether the action is settled or tried. Id. 4812(F)(2).

REV_00263929

920(A) (1979).

n307. Proposed Tobacco Industry Settlement, 12.3 TPLR 3.203 (June 20, 1997). Legislation was introduced in the 105[su'th'] Congress which would convert the provisions of the Proposed Resolution into legislative language. See Universal Tobacco Settlement Act, S. 1414, 105th Cong. (1997) . Eventually, the Senate considered a version of the legislation which excluded many of the litigation descriptions described herein, but the Senate failed to invoke cloture to cut off debate on the legislation. See Universal Tobacco Settlement Act, S. 1415, 105[su'th'] Cong. (1997); 144 Cong. Rec. S6743 (daily ed. June 17, 1998).

n308. The Civil Liability Portions of the Proposed Tobacco Settlement: Hearing Before the House Comm. On the Judiciary, 105[su'th'] Cong. (1998) (written statement of Meyer Koplow at 3-4).

n309. Id. at 3.221, Title VIII.B.1. The settlement deems a one-time $ 60 billion payment made by the tobacco industry to public health funds to constitute resolution of past punitive damage claims. Proponents also argue that given the poor record of private tobacco plaintiffs to date, these litigation "concessions" will have little practical impact. See 12.3 TPLR at 3.203-3.205 ("none of [the past civil actions] has to date resulted in the collection of any monies to compensate smokers or third-party payors").

n310. The Tobacco Settlement also eliminates claims against sellers entirely (Title VIII.B.5), whereas the Senate Product Liability Proposal would limit seller liability to claims involving failure to exercise reasonable care, violation of an express warranty, and intentional wrongdoing. See supra note 289 and accompanying text.

n311. 12.3 TPLR at 3.221, Title VIII.A.

n312. Id. at 3.218, Title VI.B.3. The Industry Base Payment is to be increased to account for inflation at a rate of the greater of 3% or the consumer price index, and is to be decreased to account for any cumulative decline in unit cigarette volume (from the 1996 base). Each participating company's share of the Industry Base Payment is to be based on their respective current market shares.

n313. Under the settlement proposal, obligations for annual payments apply only to entities selling into the domestic market. Id. Title VI.B.6

n314. Id. at 3.222, Title VIII.B.10. Under the settlement, "the Commission will be entitled to consider, among public health, governmental entities, and other uses of the funds, applications for compensation from persons, including non-subrogation claims of third party payors, not otherwise entitled to compensation under the Act."

n315. Id. at 3.221, Title VIII.B.9. The litigation co-payment provision was apparently included to provide an incentive for the tobacco industry to fully defend themselves in liability actions.

n316. Id. Title VIII.B.9.

n317. Id. Any excess rolls forward without interest to be paid at a rate of $ 1 million per year, until the first year that the annual aggregate cap is not exceeded, at which time the remainder is to be paid in full. The settlement treats any eligible third party payer actions not based on subrogation (i.e., those filed before June 9, 1997) as having been brought by a single plaintiff and subject to the $ 1 million rollover requirement.

REV_00263974

n318. Id. at 3.215, Title III.

n319. Id. Title VIII.B.11. Although not set forth in the settlement, several of the parties have separately agreed that the tobacco industry will pay up to $ 500 million per year to attorneys representing the states with the specific amounts to be determined by a panel of three arbitrators. See Suein Z. Hwang & Milo Geyelin, Tobacco Concerns Set Pact on Legal Fees, Wall St. J., Dec. 2, 1997, at A2.

n320. 12.3 TPLR at 3.221, Title VIII.B.4.

n321. Id.

n322. A subrogation suit would include a health insurer seeking to recoup any medical benefit payments it made to a claimant.

n323. 12.3 TPLR at 3.221, Title VIII.B.5.b. This means, for example, that asbestos defendants and union health and welfare funds which have paid workers for cancer and other disease claims would be unable to bring suit seeking reimbursement from tobacco companies for their portion of smoking related diseases.

n324. Id. Title VIII.B.2. The settlement provides for "individual trials only," specifically barring "class actions, joinder, aggregations, consolidations, extrapolations or other devices to resolve cases other than on the basis of individual trials, without defendant's consent." This provision is subject to enforcement by removal to federal court by the defendant "upon receipt or application to, or order of, state court providing for trial or other procedure in violation of the [individual trial] provision." Id.

n325. Id. at 3.232, Appendix VIII.3. The three judge panel is to be appointed by the Judicial Conference and is to decide the disputes in accordance with the ABI/ALI Model Rules and principles of federal law concerning privilege and the Uniform Trade Secrets Act concerning trade secrecy. The panel's costs are to be borne by the tobacco industry, which is also required to pay their opponents' costs and attorneys' fees if the tobacco company did not have a good faith factual and legal basis for the assertion of the privilege.

n326. Id. at 3.221, Title VIII(B)(7). An example of a reduced risk tobacco product would be a less carcinogenic cigarette.

n327. Id.

n328. For a general discussion of the constitutionality of various tort reform laws and proposals, see Henry Cohen, The Constitutionality of Federal Tort Reform Legislation, CRS Report for Congress (Oct. 24, 1997); Kathryn L. Vezina, Note, Constitutional Challenges to Caps on Tort Damages: Is Tort Reform the Dragon Slayer or is it the Dragon?, 42 ME. L. REV. 218 (1990); Susan C. Schmidt & Andrew B. Derman, The Constitutionality of Federal Products Liability/Toxic Tort Legislation, 6 J. PROD. LIAB. 171 (1983); Martin H. Redish, Legislative Responses to the Medical Malpractice Insurance Crisis: Constitutional Implications, 55 TEX L. REV759 (1977).

n329. For a general analysis of Commerce Clause issues in the context of federal tort reforms, see Jerry J. Phillips, Hoisted by One's Own Petard: When a Conservative Commerce Clause Interpretation Meets Conservative Tort Reform, 64 TENN L. REV 647 (1997).

REV_00263975

n330. 207 U.S. 463 (1907).

n331. See supra note 37 and accompanying text.

n332. Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution provides, inter alia, "Congress shall have Power... To regulate Commerce with foreign Nations and among the several States...." U.S. Const. art I, 8, cl. 3.

n333. The Court went from NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1 (1937), to Lopez v. United States, 514 U.S. 549 (1995), without striking down a single federal law on Commerce Clause grounds.

n334. 514 U.S. 549 (1995).

n335. 18 U.S.C. 922(q)(2)(A) (1994) (The Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990 made it a federal criminal offense to knowingly possess a firearm in a school zone).

n336. See, e.g., T.R. Goldman, Lopez Gives Tort Reform a New Weapon, Legal Times, May 8, 1995, at 2 (quoting Harvard Law School Professor Lawrence Tribe for the proposition that "Lopez is a reminder that the commerce clause is not a blank check. As such, it will operate to at least raise significant questions about some of the elements of proposed tort reforms pending in Congress").

n337. Commerce Clause concerns may also be raised in the context of other tort reforms. For conflicting views on the likely constitutionality of federal product liability and medical malpractice legislation, see Schwartz & Behrens, supra note 273 at 606-7 ("in contrast to [the Gun-Free School Zones Act struck down in Lopez], product liability is without question a matter of interstate commerce"); Phillips, supra note 330 at 663 ("the four factors of Lopez - legislative findings, jurisdictional fact, localness, and nature of the activity - all point to varying degrees to the conclusion that [product liability legislation] may well be unconstitutional if enacted under the authority of the Commerce Clause"); Rogers, supra note 273 at 540 ("Because Congress' claim to Commerce Clause authority is based on arbitrary conclusions [product liability legislation] is constitutionally questionable"); Robert M. Ackerman, Tort Law and Federalism: Whatever Happened to Devolution?, 14 YALE L. & POL'Y REV. 429, 441 (1996) ("the increasingly commercial nature of medical practice would almost certainly qualify [it] for federal regulation under the commerce power"); Gary T. Schwartz, Considering the Proper Federal Role in American Tort Law, 38 ARIZ. L. REV. 917, 922 ("the federal interest in malpractice is doubtful: malpractice seems strikingly lacking in either [interstate] spill-over effects or a clear uniformity need").

n338. 514 U.S. at 558-559.

n339. Id. at 559-568. If challenged, the laws' defenders should be able to assert that the mere fact that the regulated activity involves "non-profit" as opposed to "for-profit" activity is not necessarily dispositive of the Commerce Clause issue. For example, last term in Camps Newfound/Owatonna v. Town of Harrison, U.S. ; 117 S.Ct. 1590, 1602 (1997), the Supreme Court found that the so-called "dormant Commerce Clause" was implicated by a Maine law concerning non-profits, observing "there is no reason why an enterprise's nonprofit character should exclude it from the coverage of either the affirmative or the negative aspect of the [Commerce] Clause...."

n340. 42 U.S.C.A. 14501(a)(7) (West Supp. III 1997).

n341. See, e.g., H.R. Rep. No. 105-101, pt. 1, at 6-7 (1997) ("Volunteerism is a national activity and the decline in volunteerism is a national concern. And in many cases, volunteer activities cross state lines.... The patchwork quality of state volunteer liability laws also has a negative effect on the cost of insurance. Because of the small size of the market for volunteer liability insurance, insurers do not differentiate among the states."); 143 Cong. Rec. S3879 (daily ed. May 1, 1997) (statement of Sen. McConnell) ("If the Kentucky Red Cross volunteer wants to cross over into Tennessee or Ohio or Illinois or Indiana or West Virginia or Virginia and help his neighbor recover from a flood, then he should not have to call his lawyer to check on his liability potential in a surrounding state. We must have a uniform minimum standard.").

REV_00263976

n342. 514 U.S. at 612.

n343. 24 F.3d 602 (4th Cir. 1994), cert. denied, 514 U.S. 1103 (1995).

n344. 25 F.3d 1042 (4th Cir. 1994), cert. denied, 514 U.S. 1102 (1995). See also Leslie Salt Co. v. United States, 55 F.3d 1388 (9th Cir. 1995), cert. denied, Cargill, Inc. v. United States, 516 U.S. 955 (1995) (existence of migratory birds on property created sufficient nexus with interstate commerce to permit regulation of lands by Army Corps of Engineers under the Clean Water Act).

n345. 18 U.S.C. 844(I) (1994).

n346. See Ramey, 24 F.3d at 607; United States v. Moore, No. 93-5273, 1994 U.S. App. LEXIS 14314, at *10-11 (4th Cir. Apr. 13, 1994). See also Ackerman, supra note 338 at 439 (arguing Lopez is undercut by numerous circuit court decisions upholding the Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act on Commerce Clause grounds).

But see Brzonkala v. Virginia Polytechnic Institute & State Univ., 169 F.3d 820 (4th Cir. 1999)(en banc), cert. granted, sub. nom., U.S. v. Morrison, 120 S.Ct. 11 (U.S. Sept. 28, 1999) (No. 99-5, 99-29) (striking down the civil rights remedy of the Violence Against Women Act of 1994 as an unconstitutional exercise of Congress's powers under the Commerce Clause and Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment).

n347. 514 U.S. at 561 (emphasis added).

n348. Id. at 567-68.

n349. Id. at 562.

n350. Supra notes 345 & 346.

n351. 18 U.S.C. 844(I) (1994) (applying federal criminal law to crimes against property "used in interstate or foreign commerce or in any activity affecting interstate or foreign commerce").

n352. 18 U.S.C.A. 922(q)(2)(A) (1994) (amended 1996) (West Supp. 1998).

n353. 207 U.S. 463 (1907).

n354. 223 U.S. 1 (1912).

n355. This was one of the principal constitutional concerns with the Volunteer Protection Act highlighted by the Justice Department Office of Legal Counsel in their comments on the legislation. They wrote that even with an express congressional finding creating a nexus between volunteer liability and the Federal Government, "we are concerned that the bill might invite challenge as to Congress' source of authority because it is not directly tied to Congress' spending power... and not limited to volunteer organizations that engage in interstate commerce or liability that arises by reason of volunteer services affecting interstate commerce." (Office of Legal Counsel Comments on S. 543, Volunteer Protection Act of 1997 (on file with authors) (citations omitted)).

REV_00263977

n356. 514 U.S. at 641.

n357. Id. at 651-52.

n358. See Nonprofit Risk Management Center, State Liability Laws for Charitable Organizations and Volunteers (1996); La Vonne Grabiak, State Laws Limiting Liability of Food Donors, CRS Memorandum for Congress (March 16, 1987). But see The Second Employers' Liability Cases, supra note 53 (disregarding that state workplace liability laws "were far from uniform" in upholding the constitutionality of the 1908 Act).

n359. 514 U.S. 549.

n360. Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment grants Congress "the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of the [Fourteenth Amendment]." U.S. Const. amend XIV, 5.

n361. S. 648, 2 (a)(9) (1997). The Commerce Committee Report also concludes that "Federal legislation to reform punitive damages falls squarely within the 'broad power' of Congress to 'carry out' both the letter and spirit of the Fourteenth Amendment." S. Rep. No. 105-32, at 45 (1997).

n362. 42 U.S.C.A. 14501(a)(7)(D)(ii) (West Supp. III 1997). The House Judiciary Committee Report included a "Constitutional Authority Statement" stating that the legislation was authorized under both the Commerce Clause and the Fourteenth Amendment. H.R. Rep. No. 105-101, pt. 1, at 13 (1997).

n363. See, e.g., South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 326 (1966) (provisions in the Voting Rights Act of 1965); Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S. 641 (1966) (ban on literacy tests that had prevented certain persons schooled in Puerto Rico from voting); Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112 (1970) (5-year nationwide ban on literacy tests); City of Rome v United States, 446 U.S. 156 (1980) (extension of Voting Rights Act's requirement that certain jurisdictions pre-clear changes in voting procedures). These laws implicated Congress' due process power under the Fourteenth Amendment and voting rights powers under the Fifteenth Amendment.

n364. 521 U.S. ; 117 S.Ct. 2157; 138 L.Ed. 624; 65 U.S.L.W. 4612 (U.S. June 25, 1997).

n365. 42 U.S.C. 2000bb-2000bb-4 (1994) (prohibiting federal, state, and local governments from substantially burdening the exercise of religion).

n366. 65 U.S.L.W at 4615, quoting South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 326 (1966).

n367. 65 U.S.L.W. at 4618 (citations omitted).

n368. 517 U.S. 559, 116 S.Ct. 1589, 134 L. Ed. 2d 809, 64 U.S.L.W. 4335 (1996).

n369. 64 U.S.L.W. at 4339.

n370. 512 U.S. 415 (1994).

n371. An amendment to the Oregon Constitution prohibits judicial review of punitive damage amounts "unless the court can affirmatively say there is no evidence to support the verdict." See 512 U.S. at 418.

REV_00263978

n372. 64 U.S.L.W. at 4339.

n373. Supra note 279. A number of tort reform proposals seek to limit punitive damage awards. See Common Sense Product Liability and Legal Reform Act, H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 104-481 (1996) (capping punitive damages generally at greater of two times compensatory damages or $ 250,000, subject to judicial authority to increase up to jury award based on specified extenuating circumstances, with cap on small businesses and certain individuals set at lesser of these two amounts); House Medical Malpractice Proposal, supra note 302 (capping punitive damages at the greater of $ 250,000 or three times economic damages); the Tobacco Settlement, supra note 310, would eliminate punitive damage liability completely for past misconduct by the tobacco industry.

n374. 64 U.S.L.W. at 4342.

n375. 499 U.S. 1 (1991) (punitive damage award of more than $ 1 million where insurance company found responsible for fraud of employee found not to violate Fourteenth Amendment due process). In Haslip, the Court also considered in dicta the constitutionality of state imposition of a higher standard of proof to establish punitive damages, writing, "there is much to be said in favor of a State's requiring... a standard of 'clear and convincing evidence' or, even, 'beyond a reasonable doubt'.... We are not persuaded, however, that the Due Process Clause requires that much." Id. at 23 n.11.

n376. 509 U.S. 443 (1993) (punitive damage award of $ 10 million stemming from slander of title case found not to violate Fourteenth Amendment due process).

n377. 64 U.S.L.W. at 4341.

n378. 512 U.S. 415.

n379. 512 U.S. at 433 (although this aspect of Oregon law was determined in and of itself not sufficient to protect against arbitrary awards).

n380. See Bill Emerson Good Samaritan Food Donation Act, supra note 191; Volunteer Protection Act, supra note 204; Amtrak Act, supra note 223; Senate Product Liability Proposal, supra note 276; House Medical Malpractice Proposal, supra note 294.

n381. In his dissent to Gore, Justice Scalia wrote that the Majority's "' guideposts' mark a road to nowhere; they provide no real guidance at all." 64 U.S.L.W. at 4348.

n382. Id. at 4342.

n383. In Haslip, the Court wrote "we need not, and indeed we cannot draw a mathematical bright line between the constitutionally acceptable and the constitutionally unacceptable that would fit every case." 499 U.S. at 18. This language was affirmatively quoted in TXO. 509 U.S. at 458.

n384. See supra note 278 & 279. The Senate Product Liability Proposal caps the amount of punitive damages that may be awarded against "small businesses" and certain individuals.

n385. Id.

n386. 65 U.S.L.W at 4615.

REV_00263979

n387. Id. at 4618.

n388. See S. Rep. No. 105-32, at 46-47 (1997) (noting that excessive punitive damage awards were overturned involving the drug Benedictin and Sabin polio vaccine; and that recent studies by Texas Policy Foundation and Institute for Civil Justice had found marked increases in the frequency and size of punitive damage awards in Dallas and Houston and the size of punitive damage awards in Chicago). See also Haslip, 499 U.S. at 18 ("we note once again our concern about punitive damages that 'run wild.'"); Browning-Ferris Industries of Vermont v. Kelco Disposal, 492 U.S. 257, 282 (1989) (O'Connor, J., dissenting) ("awards of punitive damages are skyrocketing [and] the threat of such enormous awards has a detrimental effect on the research and development of new products.").

n389. See S. Rep. No. 105-32, at 74-75 (1997) (dissenting views noting a study by Dr. Stephen Daniels showed that between 1981-1985, punitive damages were only awarded in 4.9% of the cases reviewed and from 1988-1990 were only awarded in 4.8% of cases reviewed; study by Professors Michael Rustad and Thomas Koenig reviewing all product liability awards from 1965-1990 in federal and state courts and finding only 355 cases of punitive damage awards in 25 years).

n390. 64 U.S.L.W. at 4343 n.41.

n391. Id.

n392. For an analysis of Fifth Amendment issues in the context of tort reform, see Steven J. Werber, The Constitutional Dimension of a National Products Liability Statute of Repose, 40 VILL. L. REV. 985 (1995) (federal products liability statute of repose likely to violate equal protection because it cannot be supported under a rationale basis test); Marco de Sae Silva, Constitutional Challenges to Washington's Limit on Non-economic Damages in Cases of Personal Injury or Death, 63 WASH. L. REV. 653 (1988) (caps on non-economic damages appear not to violate due process and equal protection because only minimal level of judicial scrutiny will be applied); Mary Ann Willis, Comment, Limitation on Recovery of Damages: Medical Malpractice Cases: A Violation of Equal Protection?, 54 U. CINN. L. REV. 1329 (1986) (concluding that state limits on medical malpractice awards likely violate equal protection).

n393. U.S. Const. amend. V.

n394. See Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954) (Fifth Amendment due process found to incorporate equal protection guarantees in case involving public school desegregation by the Federal Government in the District of Columbia).

n395. Courts have varied on whether to differentiate between "substantive" and "procedural" due process when scrutinizing federal tort reforms. See, e.g., Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U.S. 1 (applying a generic due process analysis); In re Consolidated United States Atmospheric Testing Litigation, 820 F.2d at 989-91 (separately analyzing and rejecting substantive and procedural due process claims).

n396. A separate due process issue which has arisen in those tort reform laws which have been reviewed by the courts is whether the law operates as an unconstitutional taking. In the case of the initiatives described in this article, it seems doubtful a credible taking argument could be advanced, given Hammond's holding that a taking claim would not lie under the Atomic Testing Liability Act unless the claimant had been forced to forfeit a "final, unreviewable judgment." See 786 F.2d at 12.

n397. See Usery, 428 U.S. at 15; Carr, 539 F.2d at 959; Thomason, 438 U.S. at 84; Sparks, 574 F.2d at 1310; In re Consolidated United States Atmospheric Testing Litigation, 786 F.2d at 991; and O'Conner & TMI, 940 F.2d at 1102. But see Jones v. State Board of Medicine, 555 P.2d 399 (1976); Carson v. Maurer, 424 A.2d 825 (1980) (State courts applying the so-called "intermediate scrutiny" test where the tort reform is seen as depriving parties of their "fundamental" right to a jury trial).

REV_00263980

n398. In Usery, 428 U.S. at 33, the Court granted strong deference to Congress in its assessment concerning the efficacy of competing expert opinions: "The reliability of negative X-ray evidence was debated forcefully on both sides before the Congress, and the Operators here suggest nothing new to add to the debate; they are simply dissatisfied with Congress' conclusion." Id.

n399. 438 U.S. 59 (1978).

n400. It could be argued that several recently enacted and pending tort reform proposals, such as the Biomaterials Access Assurance Act and the Tobacco Settlement provide plaintiffs with no direct offsetting benefits. However, some may contend that individuals bringing tobacco lawsuits may benefit from provisions intended to provide for the development of a more orderly tobacco liability payout system and the potential of receiving any unused liability funds allocated by the presidential commission. See supra notes 313-315 and accompanying text.

n401. See 438 U.S. at 90. Although the Volunteer Protection Act permits states to adopt laws insuring that non-profits make a secure source of funds available in the event of injury, unlike Price-Anderson, the Act does not insure that such security is made available.

n402. See e.g., (1) Federally Supported Health Centers Assistance Act of 1992, 42 U.S.C. 233 (g) & (o) (1994) (health centers and their officers, employees, and contractors and health clinic professionals); (2) National Service Trust Act, 42 U.S.C. 12651b(f) & 12651g (a) (B) (1994) (enacted in 1993) (board members and volunteers in the National and Community Service program); (3) Take Pride in America Act, 16 U.S.C. 4604 (c)(2) (1994) (Take Pride in America Act volunteers) (enacted in 1990); (4) Support for East European Democracy Act of 1989, 22 U.S.C. 5422 (c)(2)(A) (1994) (volunteers providing technical assistance to Poland or Hungary); (5) Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976, 43 U.S.C. 1737 (f) (1994) (Bureau of Land Management volunteers); (6) Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973, 42 U.S.C. 5055(f)(3) (1994) (VISTA volunteers); (7) Volunteers in the National Forests Act of 1972, 16 U.S.C. 558c (b) (1994) (Forest Service volunteers); (8) Volunteers in Parks Act of 1969, 16 U.S.C. 18i (b) (1994) (National Parks volunteers); (9) Peace Corps Act, 22 U.S.C. 2504(h)(1994) (enacted in 1961) (Peace Corps volunteers); (10) Fish and Wildlife Act of 1956, 16 U.S.C. 742f(c)(4) (1994) (volunteers in Fish and Wildlife Service or National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration programs); (11) Federally Supported Health Centers Assistance Act of 1995, 42 U.S.C. 203 note (Supp. I 1995); and (12) 18 U.S.C.A. 1955 note (West Supp. IV 1997); 42 U.S.C. 247b (1976) (repealed 1978); 42 U.S.C. 2212 (1994); 28 U.S.C. 2679 (1994).

n403. See 5 U.S.C. 8116 (c).

n404. 695 P.2d 665, appeal dismissed for want of a substantial federal question, 474 U.S. 892. See also Roa v. Lodi Medical Group, Inc., 695 P.2d 164 (capping attorneys' fees in medical malpractice actions), appeal dismissed, 474 U.S. 990 (1985).

n405. The reforms upheld in Fein capped non-economic damages at $ 250,000 and modified the collateral source rule in medical malpractice cases. 695 P.2d at 665.

n406. Id. at 160 n.18. Justice White dissented from plaintiff's appeal of Fein, finding there was a clear split concerning the constitutionality of damage limitations in medical malpractice cases, noting, "one of the reasons for the division among the state courts is [the quid pro quo] question left unresolved by this Court in Duke Power...." See Fein v. Permanente n407. Another issue presented by the Senate Product Liability Proposal is whether caps on punitive damages, as opposed to compensatory damages, are the type of restrictions subject to constitutional challenge. Some commentators have concluded that there is no constitutional right to seek punitive damages. See Janet V. Hallahan, Social Interests Versus Plaintiffs' Rights: The Constitutional Battle Over Statutory Limitations on Punitive Damages, 26 LOY. U. CHI. L.J. 405 (1995); Malcolm E. Wheeler, The Constitutional Case for Reforming Punitive Damages Procedures, 69 VA. L. REV. 269 (1983).

REV_00263981

Medical Group, 474 U.S. 892, 894 (1985).

n408. See 42 U.S.C. 2210 (c) (1994); 49 U.S.C. 28103 (c).

n409. These provisions are included in the Price-Anderson Act. See 42 U.S.C. 2210 (n)(1), 2210 (c) (1994).

n410. 348 U.S. at 91.

n411. See supra notes 280-284 & 294 and accompanying text.

n412. The Senate Product Liability Proposal can also be contrasted with the Warsaw Convention, 49 Stat. 3000 (1934), which limits recoverable damages in exchange for providing all plaintiffs with a guaranteed recovery through its strict liability provisions.

n413. See 243 U.S. 188.

n414. See 438 U.S. 59.

n415. Id. at 88.

n416. Ducharme, 574 F.2d at 1310. See also Carr, 280 U.S. at 122. But see Sparks, 341 F. Supp. at 416 ("a replacement or substitution of remedies, while perhaps not technically necessary for due process, is nonetheless even more indicative of the satisfaction of due process requirements."); Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415 at 430 ("Oregon's abrogation of well-established common law protections against arbitrary deprivations of property raises a presumption that its procedures violate the Due Process Clause.").

n417. 94 U.S. 113 (1876).

n418. 280 U.S. 117 (1929).

n419. Munn, 94 U.S. at 134.

n420. Silver, 280 U.S. at 122.

n421. For an analysis of Seventh Amendment issues in the context of tort reforms, see Colleen P. Murphy, Determining the Tension Between Legislative Power and Jury Authority, 74 TEX. L. REV. 345 (1995) (raising questions concerning Congress' ability to cap, but not eliminate right to seek compensatory damages); James F. Tiu, Challenging Medical Malpractice Damage Awards on Seventh Amendment Grounds: Attack in Search of a Rationale, 59 U. CIN. L. REV. 213 (1990) (Federal courts have not found that statutory limits on damages in medical malpractice actions violate the Seventh Amendment); Paul B. Weiss, Comment, Reforming Tort Reform: Is there Substance to the Seventh Amendment?, 38 CATH. U. L. REV. 737 (1989) (disagreeing with courts recognizing legislative power to impose damage caps).

n422. U.S. Const. amend. VII.

REV_00263982

n423. 223 U.S. 1.

n424. 428 U.S. 1.

n425. 438 U.S. 59.

n426. See 225 F. Supp at 882; 574 F.2d at 1311; 786 F.2d at 15.

n427. The House Medical Malpractice Proposal would cap economic damages at $ 250,000. See supra note 299.

n428. A number of federal tort reforms can be claimed to abrogate Seventh Amendment jury trial protections by legislatively resolving matters previously considered by a jury at common law. For example, the Emerson Food Donation Act and the Volunteer Protection Act both eliminate liability for ordinary negligence; the General Aviation Act and the Senate Product Liability Proposal eliminate tort liability where a statute of repose applies; and the Senate Product Liability Proposal, House Medical Malpractice Proposal and the Tobacco Settlement would cap or eliminate punitive damages. But see Colleen P. Murphy, Integrating the Constitutional Authority of Civil and Criminal Juries, 61 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 723 (1993) (Seventh Amendment does not require juries to assess punitive damages because determination is unguided by meaningful standards).

n429. 241 U.S. 211 (1916). See also Simler v. Connor, 372 U.S. 221 (1963) (in federal district court diversity of citizenship action, federal rather than state law governs in determining whether the plaintiff is entitled to a jury trial).

n430. Minnesota law permits five members of a six person jury to reach a verdict in a civil action if the jury has deliberated for twelve hours without reaching a unanimous verdict. See 241 U.S. 211.

n431. 241 U.S. at 217. The Court also wrote that its decision was premised on the grounds that "the first ten Amendments, including of course the Seventh, are not concerned with state action and deal only with federal action." Id.

n432. 481 U.S. 412 (1987).

n433. 33 U.S.C. 1319 (1994).

n434. Although Clean Water Act actions were statutory in nature, the Court found the Seventh Amendment also applied to actions "that are analogous to 'suits at common law.'" 481 U.S. at 417. In the case of the Clean Water Act, the Court observed that although legal actions brought under it were similar to actions traditionally brought at law (such as debt actions) and equity (such as nuisance actions), the "'more important'" determination for Seventh Amendment purposes was the nature of the relief being sought. Id. at 421 (citations omitted). Since a civil penalty was traditionally sought in a court of law, the Court concluded that the core underlying question of legal responsibility should be heard by a jury under the Seventh Amendment. Id. at 425.

n435. Id.

n436. Since the text of the Seventh Amendment is silent on the question of whether a jury determination is required with respect to the remedy phase of a trial, the Court reasoned the "answer must depend on whether the jury must shoulder this responsibility as necessary to preserve the 'substance of the common-law right of trial by jury.'"Id. at 426 (citations omitted). The Court went on to argue since Congress had the clear authority to fix the government employees acting within [*602] the scope of their employment. [71] Unlike many private employers, the Federal Government did not obtain private liability insurance for its employees, and Congress considered the Act necessary to allow the government to attract competent drivers. [72] The Federal Drivers Act was upheld against a variety of constitutional challenges in Carr v. United States, [73] Thomason v. Sanchez, [74] and Nistendirk v. McGee. [75]

REV_00263983

Carr involved an action in which a federal employee brought an automobile liability action against a co-employee, claiming the Federal Drivers Act violated due process by abrogating common law rights without providing a legislative quid pro quo. [76] The Fourth Circuit responded first that the premise of that argument had been rejected in Silver v. Silver [77] (upholding the constitutionality of a Connecticut guest statute preventing non-paying guests from bringing negligence suits against owners or operators of automobiles), when the Supreme Court held "the Constitution does not forbid the creation of new rights, or the abolition of old rights recognized by the common law." [78] Secondly, Carr observed "in any event Congress provided an adequate quid pro quo for the common law cause of action which it abolished." [79] The court believed this to be the case even if the plaintiff, as a federal employee, was not entitled to bring suit against the Federal Government. [80] This was because the Federal Drivers Act benefited all federal employees - including the plaintiff - by providing them with protection against liability from automobile accidents. [81]

Carr also rejected the contention that the Federal Drivers Act denied the plaintiff his equal protection rights by treating automobile liability actions in a manner different from other liability actions involving government co-workers. [82] The court found that "the statutory classification comes here clothed with a presumption of constitutionality and it will not be set aside if any state of facts reasonably may be conceived to justify it." [83] In this instance, the Fourth Circuit found the Federal Drivers [*603] Act to be a justified response to the problem of an undue financial burden otherwise being placed on government drivers. [84]

Thomason represented another case where the Federal Drivers Act was upheld against a due process challenge. [85] The Third Circuit held that the right to sue a co-worker does not enjoy constitutional protection and that statutory classifications along these lines "need not be justified by a compelling governmental interest" and do not "create a suspect classification" or "involve a fundamental interest." [86] The court found the Federal Drivers Act to be a reasonable response to the financial burden imposed on government workers and that "the magnitude of the automobile insurance problem justified Congress' separate treatment of this specific problem." [87]

Finally, in Nistendirk, a federal district court considered and rejected the argument that the Federal Drivers Act violated the plaintiff's Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial. [88] The court found that where a common law action was eliminated entirely and an action against the government substituted in its place, "the guarantees of the Seventh Amendment do not apply." [89]

B. The Price-Anderson Act

As enacted in 1957, [90] and amended in 1966, [91] and 1975, [92] the Price-Anderson Act ("Price-Anderson") [93] provided for a maximum aggregate liability of $ 560 million in the event of a nuclear accident at a federally licensed nuclear power plant, such maximum amount to be distributed to claimants from a pool of funds derived from the owner's insurance, contributions from other nuclear plant owners, and the Federal Government. [94] In exchange for these benefits, the plant owner was required to waive all of its defenses to liability if sued as a result of a nuclear accident, and Congress was required to take whatever additional action was deemed necessary and appropriate to protect the public. [95]

[*604] In 1978, the Court upheld Price-Anderson in Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Environmental Study Group, [96] the most recent Supreme Court decision concerning the amount of the civil penalty, it could also delegate that authority to the court, particularly in actions such as those under the Clean Water Act which involved "highly discretionary calculations." Id. at 427.

REV_00263930

n437. 481 U.S. at 426 n.9 (citations omitted). The Court also observed, "we have been presented with no evidence that the Framers meant to extend the right to a jury to the remedy phase of a civil trial." Id.

n438. 877 F.2d 1191 (4th Cir. 1989).

n439. Id. at 1196 (citations omitted).

n440. 704 F. Supp. 1325 (D. Md. 1989). Both Boyd and Franklin raised Seventh Amendment issues because they involved diversity actions brought in federal court.

n441. Id. at 1331. See also Davis v. Omitowoju, 883 F.2d 1155 (3d Cir. 1989) (Seventh Amendment does not apply to the Virgin Island's cap on non-economic damages in medical malpractice actions because the second clause of the Seventh Amendment - preventing facts tried by the jury from being reexamined - apply to courts, not legislatures).

n442. 243 U.S. at 219.

n443. The Court found that the Seventh Amendment did not apply where a cause of action was completely eliminated, writing "as between employee and employer the act abolishes all right of recovery in ordinary cases, and therefore leaves nothing to be tried by jury." Id. at 235.

n444. 877 F.2d at 1196 (citations omitted).

n445. 704 F. Supp. at 1331.

n446. 241 U.S. at 221.

n447. 293 U.S. 474 (1935).

n448. The Court observed "in order to ascertain the scope and meaning of the Seventh Amendment, resort must be had to the appropriate rules of the common law established at the time of the adoption of that constitutional provision in 1791." Id. at 476. The Court went on to note that other than isolated exceptions it had found no historical evidence of English common law courts being able to increase the amount of a jury verdict, on either an absolute or conditional basis. Id. at 476-77.

n449. "The controlling distinction between the power of the court and that of the jury is that the former has the power to determine the law and the latter to determine the facts." Id. at 486.

n450. According to the Court, "where the verdict is too small, an increase by the court is an addition of something which in no sense can be said to be included in the verdict." Id.

n451. 647 F. Supp. 781 (W.D. Va. 1986), reaff'd, 672 F. Supp. 915 (W.D. Va. 1987), aff'd in part, rev'd in part, questions certified, 877 F.2d 1191 (4th Cir. 1989).

n452. 684 F. Supp. 1340 (1988).

n453. 647 F. Supp. at 789.

REV_00263984

n454. 684 F. Supp. at 1344.

n455. Id.

n456. Id.

n457. See Galloway v. United States, 319 U.S. 372 (1943) (directed verdict); Colgrove v. Battin, 413 U.S. 149 (1973) (six-person juries); Parklane Hosiery Co. v. Shore, 439 U.S. 322 (1979) (collateral estoppel).

n458. 877 F.2d 1191 (4th Cir. 1989).

n459. For an analysis of Tenth Amendment and related issues in the context of proposed product liability reforms, see Jeffrey White, Does the Products Bill Collide with Tenth Amendment?, Trial, Nov. 1997, at 30; Cynthia C. Lebow, Federalism and Product Liability Reform: A Warning Not Heeded, 64 TENN. L. REV. 665 (1997); Wendy E. Parmet, Stealth Preemption: The Proposed Federalization of State Court Procedures, 44 Vill. L. Rev. 1 (1999).

n460. The Tenth Amendment provides "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people." U.S. Const. amend. X.

n461. 223 U.S. at 53. The Employers' Liability Cases also found that Congress had the authority to enact a law dealing with master-servant relationships so long as it involved interstate commerce. See Restatement (Second) of Torts 552A (1977); The Employers' Liability Cases, 207 U.S. 463 (1907) and The Second Employers' Liability Cases (Mondou v. New York), 223 U.S. 1 (1912); Pub. L. No. 59-219, 34 Stat. 232 (codified at 45 U.S.C. 51-60) (1906) (repealed 1907); 207 U.S. 463 (1907).

n462. See 431 F. Supp. at 419.

n463. See 786 F.2d at 15.

n464. 505 U.S. at 144.

n465. 42 U.S.C. 2021b-2021j (1994).

n466. 505 U.S. at 161 (quoting Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, 452 U.S. 264, 288 (1981)).

n467. 117 S.Ct. 2365; 138 L.Ed. 2d 914; 65 U.S.L.W. 4731 (U.S. June 27, 1997) (5-4 decision).

n468. 18 U.S.C. 922(s) (1994).

n469. 505 U.S. at 178-79. Lebow, supra note 460 at 689 concludes that last year's product liability bill would have violated Tenth Amendment federalism principles, and distinguishes this line of cases, in part because it "directs the state courts to actually alter state tort law and related procedures as mandated by Congress."

n470. 65 U.S.L.W. at 4733-34. It may be significant, however, that the laws cited by the Court in Printz involved using state courts to effectuate uniquely federal policies, such as those relating to immigration, rather than matters which typically fell within state prerogatives, such as tort law.

REV_00263985

n471. The Court in New York v. United States also noted a constitutional line between congressional and state legislative responsibilities: "The allocation of power contained in the Commerce Clause, for example, authorizes congress to regulate interstate commerce directly; it does not authorize Congress to regulate state governments' regulation of interstate commerce." 505 U.S. at 166.

n472. 505 U.S. at 169. Cf. Erie Railroad Co. v. Tomkins, 304 U.S. 64, 78 (1938) ("Congress has no power to declare state substantive rules of common law applicable in a state... be they commercial law or a part of the law of torts. Moreover, no clause in the Constitution purports to confer such a power upon the federal courts."); Guaranty Trust Co. v. New York, 326 U.S. 99 (1945) (Federal courts bound by state statutes of limitations since they are substantive, not procedural).

n473. White, supra note 460, at 32. One could argue that The Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U.S. 1 (1912), constituted a tort reform which altered state law in eliminating certain common law employer liability defenses. However, the Majority in Printz read this precedent somewhat narrowly when it said "the Second Employers' Liability Cases stand for the proposition that a state court must entertain a claim arising under federal law only 'when its ordinary jurisdiction as prescribed by local law is appropriate to the occasion and is invoked in conformity with those laws.' "65 U.S.L.W. at 4733, citing Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U.S at 56-57.

n474. See Biomaterials Access Assurance Act of 1997: Hearing on H.R. 872 Before the Subcomm. on Commercial and Administrative Law of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 105th Cong., 1st Sess. 96 (1997).

n475. See 12.3 TPLR at 3.221, Title VIII.B.2.

n476. See 12.3 TPLR at 3.232, Appendix VIII.3; 3.221, Title VIII (B)(7).

n477. See Y2K Act 7, 8 & 15.

n478. 487 U.S. 131, 138 (1988) (Wisconsin notice of claim statute found to be inconsistent with and preempted by 42 U.S.C. 1983).

n479. 117 S. Ct. 1800 (1997) (42 U.S.C. 1983 held not to preempt Idaho procedural rules concerning appealability of orders).

n480. Id. at 1805 (citing Howlett v. Rose, 496 U.S. 356, 372 (1990)) quoting Henry Hart, The Relations Between State and Federal Law, 54 COLUM. L. REV. 489, 508 (1954)).

n481. Id. at 1807.

n482. Id. n.13. For their part, defendants may attempt to assert that procedural requirements such as those set forth in the Biomaterials Access Assurance Act and the Tobacco Settlement are no more burdensome on state courts than the comparative negligence determinations required under the 1908 Employers' Liability Act and that given the Court's recent decision in Amchem Products v. George Windsor, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 138 L.Ed. 2d 689, 65 U.S.L.W. 4635 (1997) (narrowing ability to obtain class certifications in mass product liability cases under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure), it is unlikely the class action rules would prove to be of significant benefit in tobacco litigation in any event.

n483. The Global Tobacco Settlement: Hearings Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 105[su'th'] Cong., (1997) (Statement of Lawrence H. Tribe, Tyler Professor of Law, Harvard Law School).

REV_00263986

n484. See 12.3 TPLR at 3.221, Title VIII.B.2. The Universal Tobacco Settlement Act, S. 1414, 105th Cong. (1997) contains a general prohibition on class actions, along with a mechanism for removal by a defendant of "an action that involves a violation of [the class action prohibition]... to an appropriate federal court."

n485. See 13 F.3d at 1099, 940 F.2d at 857. For an analysis of the possible Article III issue in the context of the Tobacco Settlement, see The Global Tobacco Settlement: Hearings Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 105th Cong., (1997) (statement of Lawrence H. Tribe, Tyler Professor of Law, Harvard Law School) ("Although Congress may as a general proposition regulate the the jurisdiction of the federal courts, it may not by statute enlarge their Article III jurisdiction.... Accordingly, I do not think that the proposed statute could be applied to permit the removal of an action where federal jurisdiction were otherwise lacking"); Hearing on the Civil Liability Portions of the Proposed Tobacco Settlement Before the House Comm. On the Judiciary, 105[su'th'] Cong., 2d Sess. (1998) (statement of James F. Pfander, University of Illinois College of Law) ("The existence of a federal question, even by way of defense, should solve any Article III problem with the removal scheme").

n486. See Pub. L. No. 103-298, 108 Stat. 1552-54 (1994) (codified at 49 U.S.C. 40101 note (1994));Pub. L. No. 104-210, 110 Stat. 3011 (codified at 42 U.S.C.A. 1791 (West Supp. 1998));Pub. L. No. 105-19, 111 Stat. 218 (codified at 42 U.S.C.A. 14501-14505 (West Supp. III 1997));Pub. L. No. 105-134, 111 Stat. 2570 (codified at 49 U.S.C.A. 28103 (West Supp. 1998)); Biomaterials Access Assurance Act of 1988, Pub. L. No. 105-230, 112 Stat. 1519 (1998) (codified at 21 U.S.C. 1601-1606 (1998)); Y2K Act, Pub. L. No. 106-37, 113 Stat. 6601 (codified at 15 U.S.C. 6601-17 (1999)).

n487. See The Product Liability Reform Act of 1998, S. 2236, 105[su'th'] Cong. (1998); Balanced Budget Act of 1997, H.R. 2015, 105[su'th'] Cong. (1997); Proposed Tobacco Industry Settlement, 12.3 TPLR 3.203 (June 20, 1997).

n488. 64 U.S.L.W. at 4339.

n489. See 512 U.S. at 418.

n490. 505 U.S. at 144.

n491. 117 S.Ct. 2365; 138 L.Ed. 2d 914; 65 U.S.L.W. 4731 (U.S. June 27, 1997) (5-4 decision).

n492. For example, the dissenting views to the House Judiciary Report on the Volunteer Protection Act noted that a Westlaw search of indicated the legislation would not have altered the decision of any case reported over the prior seven years. H.R. Rep. No. 105-101, pt. 1, at 17 (1997).

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined (i)
Terms: perry /2 apelbaum and "punitive damages" and y2k (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, October 16, 2002 - 7:00 AM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00263988

constitutionality of a federal tort reform. In Duke Power, after finding the plaintiffs - a group of individuals who lived near proposed new nuclear power plants along with an environmental group and a labor union - had standing to challenge the law [97] and that it was "ripe" for adjudication, [98] the Court held Price-Anderson did not violate their Fifth Amendment due process rights. [99] The Court found Price-Anderson to be a "classic example of an economic regulation," [100] which should be upheld unless it can be established that Congress' judgment was "demonstrably arbitrary or irrational." [101] Based on this review standard, the Court found it was appropriate for Congress to encourage the construction of nuclear power facilities in the manner set forth in the Price-Anderson Act. [102]

The Court rejected the district court's assertion [103] that the $ 560 million damage limitation was arbitrary and not rationally related to the potential damages caused by a possible nuclear accident. Instead, the Court found the dollar limitation a reasonable starting point given that the risk of a nuclear accident was very small, and that in the event an accident did occur, it was likely Congress would take further action ameliorating the hardship (as Congress had done with respect to previous natural disasters). [104] The Court also disagreed with the district court's determination that liability limitations in the Price-Anderson Act would encourage irresponsibility, pointing to the rigorous regulatory review process and the still significant damages a power plant owner would face in the event of an accident. [105]

Finally, the Court disagreed with the lower court's conclusion that the Price-Anderson Act should not survive scrutiny under the Due Process Clause because it failed to provide injured parties with a satisfactory quid pro quo to compensate for the forfeiture of their common law rights. [106] First, the Court noted "it is not at all clear that the Due Process Clause in fact requires that a legislatively enacted compensation scheme either duplicate the recovery at common law or provide a reasonable substitute [*605] remedy." [107] In so doing, the Court observed in a footnote that the Second Employers' Liability Cases stood for the proposition that "our cases have clearly established that '[a] person has no property, no vested interest, in any rule of the common law.'" [108]

Ultimately, however, the Court failed to resolve whether or not a quid pro quo was required to satisfy the Due Process Clause, since it found the requisite substitute remedy had been effectuated by the Price-Anderson Act. [109] The Court noted the Price-Anderson Act provided a secure source of funds to victims harmed by a nuclear accident, mandated a waiver of the owner's common law defenses, and allowed claims to be satisfied without resulting in an inequitable "race to the courthouse." [110] In this respect, the Court observed that the Price-Anderson Act was somewhat comparable to the New York worker's compensation statute [111] upheld in New York Central R. Co. v. White, [112] and the Federal Longshoremen and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act [113] upheld in Crowell v. Benson [114] (both being upheld against due process challenges). [115] The Court also rejected the plaintiff's Fifth Amendment equal protection claim, finding that this argument "largely tracked and duplicated those made in support of the due process claim." [116]

[*606] The Court did not separately consider any federalism issues. The plaintiffs had sought to argue that Price-Anderson "encroaches on substantial state governmental interests" [117] and should therefore be subject to an augmented standard of review under the Due Process Clause, but the Court could find no basis in law for this contention. [118]

The Court also did not reach the plaintiffs' argument that the Price-Anderson Act effectuated an unconstitutional Fifth Amendment "taking". [119] The Court found that it was not necessary to consider this argument because in their view the Price-Anderson Act did not withdraw plaintiffs' ability to bring a claim for an unjust taking under the Tucker Act. [120] In the Court's view, the question as to whether a takings claim could be established under the Fifth Amendment "is a matter appropriately left for another day." [121]

C. Swine Flu Act

REV_00263931

In 1976, Congress adopted the Swine Flu Act, [122] substituting the liability of the United States under the Federal Torts Claim Act for the liability of manufacturers, distributors, and volunteer medical personnel in connection with the administration of the swine flu vaccine. [123] Under the Swine Flu Act, although these program participants are not directly liable to harmed individuals for personal injury or death, the United States is permitted to seek indemnification from them on the basis of their negligence or breach of contract. [124]

The Swine Flu Act was upheld against constitutional challenge by district courts in Tennessee (Wolfe v. Merrill National Laboratories [125]), Oklahoma (Sparks v. Wyeth Laboratories, Inc. [126]), and Alabama (Stephens v. Wyeth Laboratories, Inc. [127]) in 1977, as well as by the Fifth [*607] Circuit in Ducharme v. Merrill-National Laboratories [128] the following year. The courts found the Swine Flu Act to involve "the area of social and economic welfare" and applied a rational basis standard of review in rejecting plaintiffs' Fifth Amendment due process and equal protection arguments. [129] Applying this standard, the Fifth Circuit in Ducharme concluded that "the procedure established under the [Swine Flu] Act is rationally related to achieving the goal of assuring interstate distribution of the swine flu vaccine." [130] The court also rejected the plaintiff's takings assertion, finding the law did not apply retroactively to remove any "vested" property rights from claimants. [131]

The Ducharme and Sparks courts also rejected the contention that the Swine Flu Act violated plaintiffs' Seventh Amendment rights, holding the United States as the "sovereign" was not subject to the Seventh Amendment. [132] In Sparks, the Oklahoma district court observed, "it is axiomatic that if a cause of action against [the sovereign] can be abolished, the jury trial of that action is also abolished. The elemental fact is that suits against the sovereign were unknown at common law." [133] The court noted that similar arguments had been raised - and rejected - in the context of the Federal Drivers Act. [134]

In Sparks, the district court further rejected the plaintiff's argument that the Swine Flu Act violated the Tenth Amendment [135] by calling for the assistance of state and local governments. The court noted that in our modern economy it was appropriate for the federal and state governments to work together in responding to common problems, so long as the legislation does not impose a "coercion on the states," [136] and in the case of the Swine Flu Act, the law specifically sanctioned voluntary cooperation by state governments concerning health matters. [137]

[*608]

D. Atomic Testing Liability Act

The 1984 Atomic Testing Liability Act ("Atomic Testing Liability Act") made an action against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act the exclusive remedy for injury or death due to exposure to radiation from atomic weapons testing programs carried out by government contractors. [138] The law was found to be constitutional by the First Circuit in Hammond v. United States [139] in 1986 and by the Ninth Circuit in In re Consolidated United States Atmospheric Testing Litigation [140] in 1987.

As was the case with the Swine Flu Act, the courts readily disposed of plaintiffs' Fifth Amendment takings assertion, citing New York Central R. Co. v. White for the proposition that "no person has a vested interest in any rule of law entitling him to insist that it shall remain unchanged for his benefit." [141] In Hammond, the First Circuit concluded that a takings claim would not lie unless and until a harmed party has a "final, unreviewable judgment." [142]

As for the Fifth Amendment due process challenge, like other tort reforms, the courts use a rational basis review standard to conclude the Atomic Testing Liability Act was reasonably designed to encourage federal contractors to participate in the nuclear weapons program. [143]

REV_00263932

In reaching this conclusion, the courts in Hammond and In re Consolidated United States Atmospheric Testing Litigation stated that the Due Process Clause permitted Congress to choose from a range of alternative compensation schemes when it preempted state tort law:

Although Congress could have relieved the independent contractors of their burden of defending suits for radiation and still provided those injured by radiation a more generous substitute compensation scheme, we cannot say that Congress' choice of means was without any rational basis.... When the program began Congress could have mandated that all tort claims arising from it be litigated through the [Federal Tort Claims Act]. [144]

[*609] The First Circuit in Hammond also disposed of a number of other constitutional challenges to the Atomic Testing Liability Act, including the assertion that the law violated the Seventh and Tenth Amendments. [145] Using the same reasoning developed in upholding the Swine Flu Act (and the Federal Drivers Act before that), the Court found the Seventh Amendment did not apply to federal laws involving the sovereign, concluding, "when the United States abolishes a cause of action and then sets up a separate administrative remedy against itself, as it has here, the seventh amendment does not require that it must also provide a jury trial." [146]

Finally, in Hammond, the plaintiff asserted the Atomic Testing Liability Act improperly invaded state prerogatives in light of the Court's 1976 decision in National League of Cities v. Usery. [147] In rejecting this argument, the court responded that not only was National League of Cites distinguishable because it involved a limitation on Congress' commerce authority (rather than the war powers authority implicated by the Atomic Testing Liability Act), but that National League of Cities had been overruled by the Supreme Court in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority. [148]

E. 1988 Amendments to the Price-Anderson Act

In 1988, Price-Anderson was amended for a third time pursuant to the Price-Anderson Amendments Act of 1988 (the "1988 Amendments"). [149] Under the 1988 Amendments, claims arising from "nuclear incidents" were considered to be exclusively federal causes of action. [150] Such actions, denoted as "public liability actions," are to be based on the applicable state law where the nuclear accident occurred except to the extent such law is inconsistent with federal law (e.g., Price-Anderson). [151] The 1988 Amendments also provided for consolidation of all claims in the [*610] federal district court where the accident occurred, and were made to apply retroactively to any claim pending on the date of enactment. [152]

The constitutionality of the 1988 Amendments was upheld by the Seventh Circuit in O'Conner v. Commonwealth Edison Co., [153] and by the Third Circuit in In re TMI Litigation Cases Consol. II [154] and In re TMI. [155] These cases principally considered two constitutional questions - whether the 1988 Amendments conferred jurisdiction in the federal courts in violation of Article III of the Constitution, [156] and whether the retroactive nature of the law violated Fifth Amendment due process. With regard to the Article III issue, O'Conner found that the 1988 Amendments did not "merely create federal jurisdiction for a state claim, rather [they] affirmatively 'embodied substantive federal policies.'" [157] O'Conner further noted that rather than "adopting in wholesale fashion state law," [158] the Price-Anderson Act created a "new and entirely federal cause of action." [159] In re TMI Litigation Cases Consol. II reached the same conclusion, finding that "the Act while relying for definition upon state law elements, contains the federal components necessary to survive the constitutional challenge." [160] The court went on to note there were numerous features of federal law for a court to consider in a Price-Anderson Act public liability action, such as whether the cause of action resulted from a nuclear incident, the waiver of state law defenses, the limited availability of punitive damages, and whether the action is otherwise inconsistent with federal law. [161]

REV_00263933

REV_00263989

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Binder - Transportation Security Administration: TSA Regulations

OA/NARA#: 1649/1517
9600

Box 61
Folder 3

REV_00263990

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Binder - Transportation Security Administration: US Air Carriers (1544), Foreign Air Carriers (1546), Indirect Air Carriers (1548), and US Airports (1542) [1]

OA/NARA#: 1649/1517
9600

Box 61
Folder 4

REV_00263991

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Binder - Transportation Security Administration: US Air Carriers (1544), Foreign Air Carriers (1546), Indirect Air Carriers (1548), and US Airports (1542) [2]

OA/NARA#: 1649/1517
9600

Box 61
Folder 5

Travel Expense Forms (Bush 43)

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 2165/2076
9695

Box 61
Folder 6

REV_00263992

FAX TO RACHEL BRAND: 679906

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Jeannie Russell

PHONE NUMBER: 456-5805

DATE OF REQUEST: March 12, 2002

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
Lawrence B. Lindsey: Assistant to the President for Economic Policy

Nature of Meeting or Event: [redacted] ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
Larry Lindsey is traveling to Atlanta, GA as part of the "Realizing the Dream Iniaitive." In the morning he will meet with Mrs. Coretta King and Mr. Martin King III to disucss the project (official meeting.) At noon he will give the luncheon speech at a political fundraiser (political). Later in the day he will take part ina roundtable discussion with area CEOs (official discussion)

Dates of Travel: Mon 3/18/02 Destination(s): Atlanta, GA

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
The Georgia State Republican Party will pay 1/3 of the costs of the ticket of the trip. The rest will come from ~~official sources.~~ the WH.
[redacted]

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Tamara Hyatt

Address of Organization: Georgia State Republican Party
Address TBD

Phone: 404-257-5559

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): 1/3 the Airline Ticket	$166.66	☐ In Kind ☒ Reimbursable [redacted]
Lodging:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify): Ground Transportation	private vehicle TBD	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization.
You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☐ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☐ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature: Date:

(REV. 7/96)

Approved 3/12/02 per 5 CFR 2635.204(f)

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Christal West

PHONE NUMBER: 6-6620

DATE OF REQUEST: 3-12-02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
David Hobbs, Deputy Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
NRCC Winter Meeting

Dates of Travel: 2/14/02 - 2/17/02 Destination(s): Miami, FL

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
NRCC

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Elizabeth Sabin

Address of Organization: 320 First Street, SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: 479-7075

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Air fare	$400.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging: Hotel	$395 per night (3 nights)	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals: Per Diem	$30 ($240 total)	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. §1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature [signature] Date 3/13/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00263994

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Christal West

PHONE NUMBER: 6-6620

DATE OF REQUEST: 3-12-02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
David Hobbs, Deputy Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:

NRCC Annual "Bright Lights and Broadway" Participant in Legislative Affairs Briefing

Dates of Travel: 12/9/01 - 12/11/01 Destination(s): New York City

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):

National Republican Congressional Committee

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Elizabeth Sabin

Address of Organization: 320 First Street, SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: 479-7020

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Amtrak Train	$172.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging: Hotel	$560.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE: ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature: [signature] Date: 3/13/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00263995

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Caroline Boeckel

PHONE NUMBER: 456-6421

DATE OF REQUEST: March 12, 2002

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
Dylan Glenn: Special Assistant to the President for Economic Policy

Nature of Meeting or Event: [redacted] ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
Dylan Glenn is traveling to Atlanta, GA as part of the "Realizing the dream Initiative." In the morning he will meet with Mrs. Coretta King and Mr. Martin King III to discuss the project (official meeting). At noon he will give the luncheon speech at a political fundraiser (political). Later in the day he will take part in a roundtable discussion with area CEOs (official discussion).

Dates of Travel: 3-18-02 3-19-02 Destination(s): Atlanta, GA

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
The Georgia State Republican Party will pay 1/3 of the costs of the ticket of the trip. The rest will come from the White House.

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Tamara Hyatt

Address of Organization: Georgia State Republican Party
Address TBD

Phone: 404-257-5559

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): 1/3 the Delta Airline ticket	$502.02	☒ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify): Ground Transportation	TBD	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury: you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature: [signature] Date: 3/12/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00263996

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Christal West

PHONE NUMBER: 6-6620

DATE OF REQUEST: 3-12-02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
David Hobbs; Deputy Assistant to the President for Leg. Affairs

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
Will speak to the House-Senate Republican CoS's at their Annual Retreat

Dates of Travel: 2/19/02 - 2/21/02 Destination(s): The Greenbriar; White Sulphur Springs, WV

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
Republican National Committee

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Jack Oliver

Address of Organization: 310 First Street, SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: (202) 863-8700

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): —	—	☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging: The Greenbriar (2 nights)	$655.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization.
You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. §1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. §2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature [signature] Date 3/13/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00263997

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Dan Keniry

PHONE NUMBER: 6-6620

DATE OF REQUEST: 3-14-02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
Dan Keniry ; Special Assistant for Legislative Affairs

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
NRCC 2002 Ski Trip
Will speak at Legislative Breakfast

Dates of Travel: 3/14/02 - 3/18/02 Destination(s): Lake Tahoe, CA

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
NRCC

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Elizabeth Sabin

Address of Organization: 320 First Street, SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: (202) 479-7075

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Airfare	$665.50	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging: Hotel - 4 Nights	$1036.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals: 3 meals	$100.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify): Lift Tickets (4day)	$224.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization.
You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. §1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature [signature] Date 3/14/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00263998

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: David Thomas

PHONE NUMBER: 6-7944

DATE OF REQUEST: 3-14-02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:

David Thomas Associate Political Director

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:

Political meeting

Dates of Travel: 3-19-02 / 3-21-02 Destination(s): Washington Dulles, to Sacramento CA, to Washington Dulles

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):

RNC

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Lynn Jaskulski

Address of Organization: RNC

310 First St. SE

Washington DC 20003

Phone:

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): United Airlines	1,460 00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging: HYATT	218 00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature [signature] Date 3/15/02

REV_00263999

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Kirk Blalock

PHONE NUMBER: 63771

DATE OF REQUEST: 3/18/02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
Kirk Blalock, SAP and Dep. Director of OPL

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
To attend RNC Majority Fund Spring Meeting - To promote adminstration policy

Dates of Travel: 3/21/02 - 3/24/02 Destination(s): Tampa, FL

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
Republican National Committee

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Jay Banning

Address of Organization: 310 First Street, SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: 202-863-8700

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Air	$1100.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging: Hotel	$950.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☐ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☐ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature _____ Date _____

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264000

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Shannon Burkhart

PHONE NUMBER: 456-6155

DATE OF REQUEST: 3/20/02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position: Jim Wilkinson, Special Asst. to the Pres. & Dep. Dir. of Communications

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☑ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:

RNC Majority Fund / Spring Training Event
Jim Wilkinson will participate in a panel discussion on Saturday afternoon as a WH communicator.

Dates of Travel: 3/22 - 3/24/02 Destination(s): Don CeSar Hotel, St Petersburg, FL

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):

RNC

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Stephanie Strategos

Address of Organization: 310 First Street, SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: 202-863-8713

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Air - Northwest Airlines	$489.74	☑ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging: 2 nights @ Don CeSar Hotel	approx $350/night	☑ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals: At Hotel		☑ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify): 2 Baseball preseason tix		☑ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature [signature] Date 3/20/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264001

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Kirk Blalock

PHONE NUMBER: 63771

DATE OF REQUEST: 3/20/02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
Kirk Blalock, SAP and Deputy Director of Public Liaison

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
To attend RNC Majority Fund Summer Meeting

Dates of Travel: 3/21 - 3/24/02 Destination(s): Tampa, FL

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
Republican National Committee

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Jay Banning

Address of Organization: 310 First Street, SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: 202-863-8500

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Air	$1050.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging: Hotel	$950.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization.
You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature [signature] Date 3/20/02

(REV. 7/98)

REV_00264002

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Christal West

PHONE NUMBER: 6-6620

DATE OF REQUEST: 3-20-02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
David Hobbs; Deputy Asst. to the President for Leg. Affairs

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
RNC Majority Fund Spring Training Event
Participating in Legislative Affairs Briefings (Roundtable)

Dates of Travel: 3/22/02 - 3/24/02 Destination(s): St. Petersburg Beach, FL

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
RNC

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Stephanie Strategas

Address of Organization: 310 First Street, SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: (202) 863-8713/8700

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Airfare	$450.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging: Hotel (2 nights)	$618.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals: 5 meals	$225.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify): green fees	$200.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353; ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature: [signature] Date: 3/21/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264003

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Christal West

PHONE NUMBER: 6-66620

DATE OF REQUEST: 3-20-02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position: Brian Conklin, Special Asst. to the President for Leg Affairs

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:

RNC Majority Fund Spring Training Event
Participating in Legislative Affairs Briefings

Dates of Travel: 3/22/02 - 3/24/02 Destination(s): St. Petersburg Beach, FL

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):

RNC

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Stephanie Strategas

Address of Organization: 310 First Street, SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: (202) 863-8700

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Airfare	$450.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging: Hotel (2 nights)	$618.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals: 5 meals	$225.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify): green fee	9100.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature: RW Cobb Date: 3/21/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264004

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: PAUL DICK

PHONE NUMBER: 66508

DATE OF REQUEST: 3/25

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
KARL ROVE SENIOR ADVISOR TO THE PRESIDENT

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
CHAMBLISS FOR SENATE POLITICAL ROUNDTABLE

Dates of Travel: 3/26 Destination(s): SAVANNAH, MACON, SAVANNAH

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
CHAMBLISS FOR SENATE

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: ROB LEEBERN

Address of Organization: CHAMBLISS FOR SENATE
3224 PEACHTREE RD NE ATLANTA, GA 30305

Phone: 404-949-9688

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): CHARTER	$2540	☑ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature [signature] Date 3/26/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264005

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Kate Marinis

PHONE NUMBER: 456522

DATE OF REQUEST: 3/25/02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position: Ken Mehlman

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:

Ken is traveling w/ the President to SC, GA, and FL. Then he is doing an event for Kay Granger in Ft. Worth, then returning to DC.

Dates of Travel: 3/28/02 Destination(s): Washington, DC

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):

RNC

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Kay Banning

Address of Organization: 310 First Street, SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: 863-8500

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): American Airlines	$419.50	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature [signature] Date 3/26/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264006

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: David Thomas

PHONE NUMBER: 6-7944

DATE OF REQUEST: 3-27-02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
David Thomas Associate Political Director

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
Political meetings to be paid for by RNC

Dates of Travel: 4-3-02 / 4-7-02 Destination(s): Denver CO / Phoenix AZ / Albuquerque NM

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
RNC

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Lynn Jaskwiski

Address of Organization: RNC
310 First St SE
Washington DC 20003

Phone:

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Air United Airlines	1606 ea	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging: Phoenix 70 Albuquerque 100	170 ea	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature: [signature] Date: 3/28/02

REV_00264007

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Parker Hamilton

PHONE NUMBER: 6-6238

DATE OF REQUEST: 3/28/02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
Nicolle Devenish, Special Assistant to the President and Director of Media Affairs

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:

RNC State Chairmen's Meeting
~~Coordinate media message with Republican state parties, participate in communications training sessions for state party officials and~~ employees, meet with reporters and staff members from White House and RNC Communications and Political offices

Dates of Travel: 4/17/02-4/19/02 Destination(s): New Orleans, LA

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):

~~Republican National Committee~~

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Karen Willard

Address of Organization: ~~310 First Street, SE~~
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: (202) 863-8834

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): commercial air	$194.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging: The Fairmont Hotel	$382.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals: some included	$100.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature [signature] Date 3/27/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264008

TRAVEL AUTHORIZATION

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

DATE OF REQUEST: 4/1/02

TRAVEL AUTHORIZATION NUMBER: _____

Please Print

Last Name	First Name
Davis	Alicia
Extension: 6-6173	Room: 100	Title: AD	Office: OPA
Contact Person: please print Alicia Davis			Extension: 6-6173

ATTACHMENTS:

☒ Invitation/Documentation Regarding Event ☒ Travel Expenses From Outside Sources Form

PURPOSE OF TRAVEL (include event dates and host information, if applicable):

Karl Rove is the keynote speaker at an RNC fundraiser and a fundraiser for Congresswoman Sue Kelly.

DEPARTURE:			RETURN:
Date:	Time:	Mode:	Date:	Time:	Mode:
04/04/02	10:00 AM	Plane	04/04/02	8:30 PM	Plane

ITINERARY (List all cities including those through which flights are routed):

Origin: Washington, DC

Destination: New York, New York

Return to: Washington, DC

FUNDING SOURCE:

☐ Official ☒ Political ☐ Mixed ☐ 501 (c)(3) ☐ Other: _____

NOTE: For travel funded by political, 501(c)(3) or other sources, an approved "Travel Expenses From Outside Source" form must be attached.

SPECIAL EXPENSES

Hotel:		Per Diem:		Privately Owned Vehicle:	$500.00
Air Fare:	$252.00	Taxi:		Standard Vehicle Rental:
Train Fare:		Mini-Van Rental:		TOTAL ESTIMATED EXPENSES:	$752.00

APPROVING SIGNATURES:

Office Head:	Chief of Staff or Designee:
White House Management:	Political Travel:

(REV. 1/02)

ORIGINAL (WH MANAGEMENT COPY)

REV_00264009

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Alicia Davis

PHONE NUMBER: 6-6173

DATE OF REQUEST: 4/1/02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
Alicia Davis, Associate Director

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
Karl Rove is the keynote speaker at 2 events in New York City. I will be staffing the event.

Dates of Travel: 4/4/02 Destination(s): New York City

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
Republican National Committee

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Jay Banning

Address of Organization: 310 1st Street SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: 202-863-8500

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Airplane	$252.00	☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☒ Other (Political Only) RNC
Lodging:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify): Car	$500.00	☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☒ Other (Political Only) RNC

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☐ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☐ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature _____ Date _____

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264010

DRAFT DRAFT DRAFT DRAFT DRAFT DRAFT DRAFT DRAFT

Carrier Envelope: Sue Kelly for Congress
P.O. Box 599
Katonah, New York 10536

Response Envelope: Sue Kelly for Congress
P.O. Box 599
Katonah, New York 10536

Invitation:

Honorary Co-Chair Governor George E. Pataki

and

The Honorable Michael R. Bloomberg

invite you to attend a reception in support of

Congresswoman Sue Kelly

With Special Guest

Karl Rove

Thursday, April 4, 2002

5:30 p.m. – 7:30 p.m.

The Yale Club
50 Vanderbilt Avenue
Manhattan

$1,000 per person

R.S.V.P. to Jennie Esterow
(212) 290-1393 or by enclosed response card

Response Card:

_____ Yes, I will attend the reception in support of Congresswoman Kelly on April 4th. Enclosed is my contribution of $_____.

_____ No, I will not be able to attend the reception in support of Congresswoman Kelly on April 4th. Enclosed is my contribution of $_____.

Please make all checks payable to Sue Kelly for Congress.
All checks should be received by March 31st.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____State_____Zip_____

Home Phone_____Work Phone_____

Employer_____

Occupation_____

Business Address_____

City_____State_____Zip_____

Federal law prohibits any corporate, Ltd. or P.C. checks. $1,000 maximum contribution per person per primary election and $1,000 maximum contribution per person per general election. Federal law requires political committees to report the name, mailing address, occupation and name of employer for each individual whose contributions aggregate in excess of $2000 in a calendar year. Contributions are not deductible for Federal income tax purposes.

Paid for by Sue Kelly for Congress

TRAVEL AUTHORIZATION

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

DATE OF REQUEST: 4/1/02

Please Print

TRAVEL AUTHORIZATION NUMBER: _____

Last Name	First Name
Rove	Karl
Extension: 6-2369	Room: 2nd Fl WW	Title: Senior Advisor	Office: OSI
Contact Person: please print Alicia Davis			Extension: 6-6173

ATTACHMENTS:

☒ Invitation/Documentation Regarding Event ☒ Travel Expenses From Outside Sources Form

PURPOSE OF TRAVEL (include event dates and host information, if applicable):

Karl Rove is the keynote speaker at an RNC fundraiser and a fundraiser for Congresswoman Sue Kelly.

DEPARTURE:			RETURN:
Date:	Time:	Mode:	Date:	Time:	Mode:
04/04/02	10:00 AM	Plane	04/04/02	8:30 PM	Plane

ITINERARY (List all cities including those through which flights are routed):

Origin: Washington, DC

Destination: New York, New York

Return to: Waco, Texas

FUNDING SOURCE:

☐ Official ☒ Political ☐ Mixed ☐ 501 (c)(3) ☐ Other: _____

NOTE: For travel funded by political, 501(c)(3) or other sources, an approved "Travel Expenses From Outside Source" form must be attached.

SPECIAL EXPENSES

Hotel:		Per Diem:		Privately Owned Vehicle:	$500.00
Air Fare:	$252.00	Taxi:		Standard Vehicle Rental:
Train Fare:		Mini-Van Rental:		TOTAL ESTIMATED EXPENSES:	$752.00

APPROVING SIGNATURES:

Office Head:	Chief of Staff or Designee:
White House Management:	Political Travel:

(REV. 1/02)

ORIGINAL (WH MANAGEMENT COPY)

REV_00264013

TRAVEL AUTHORIZATION

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

DATE OF REQUEST: 4/1/02

TRAVEL AUTHORIZATION NUMBER: _____

Please Print

Last Name	First Name
Rove	Karl
Extension: 6-2369	Room: WW 2nd Floor	Title: Senior Advisor	Office: OSI
Contact Person: please print Alicia Davis			Extension: 6-6173

ATTACHMENTS:

☒ Invitation/Documentation Regarding Event ☒ Travel Expenses From Outside Sources Form

PURPOSE OF TRAVEL (include event dates and host information, if applicable):

Karl Rove is the keynote speaker at an RNC fundraiser and a fundraiser for Congresswoman Sue Kelly.

DEPARTURE:			RETURN:
Date: 04/04/02	Time: 10:00 AM	Mode: Plane	Date: 04/04/02	Time: 8:30 PM	Mode: Plane

ITINERARY (List all cities including those through which flights are routed):

Origin: Washington, DC

Destination: New York, New York

Return to: Washington, DC

FUNDING SOURCE:

☐ Official ☒ Political ☐ Mixed ☐ 501 (c)(3) ☐ Other: _____

NOTE: For travel funded by political, 501(c)(3) or other sources, an approved "Travel Expenses From Outside Source" form must be attached.

SPECIAL EXPENSES

Hotel:		Per Diem:		Privately Owned Vehicle:	$500.00
Air Fare:	$252.00	Taxi:		Standard Vehicle Rental:
Train Fare:		Mini-Van Rental:		TOTAL ESTIMATED EXPENSES:	$752.00

APPROVING SIGNATURES:

Office Head:	Chief of Staff or Designee:
White House Management:	Political Travel:

(REV. 1/02)

ORIGINAL (WH MANAGEMENT COPY)

REV_00264014

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Alicia Davis

PHONE NUMBER: 6-6173

DATE OF REQUEST: 4/1/02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
Karl Rove, Senior Advisor

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
Karl Rove is the keynote speaker at 2 events in New York City.

Dates of Travel: 4/4/02 Destination(s): New York City

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
Republican National Committee

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Jay Banning

Address of Organization: 310 1st Street SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: 202-863-8500

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Airplane	$252.00	☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☒ Other (Political Only) RNC
Lodging:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify): Car	$500.00	☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☒ Other (Political Only) RNC

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization.
You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☐ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☐ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature _____ Date _____

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264015

DRAFT DRAFT DRAFT DRAFT DRAFT DRAFT DRAFT DRAFT

Carrier Envelope: Sue Kelly for Congress
P.O. Box 599
Katonah, New York 10536

Response Envelope: Sue Kelly for Congress
P.O. Box 599
Katonah, New York 10536

Invitation:

Honorary Co-Chair Governor George E. Pataki

and

The Honorable Michael R. Bloomberg

invite you to attend a reception

in support of

Congresswoman Sue Kelly

With Special Guest

Karl Rove

Thursday, April 4, 2002

5:30 p.m. – 7:30 p.m.

The Yale Club
50 Vanderbilt Avenue
Manhattan

$1,000 per person

R.S.V.P. to Jennie Esterow
(212) 290-1393 or by enclosed response card

Response Card:

_____ Yes, I will attend the reception in support of Congresswoman Kelly on April 4th. Enclosed is my contribution of $_____.

_____ No, I will not be able to attend the reception in support of Congresswoman Kelly on April 4th. Enclosed is my contribution of $_____.

Please make all checks payable to Sue Kelly for Congress.
All checks should be received by March 31st.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____State_____Zip_____

Home Phone_____Work Phone_____

Employer_____

Occupation_____

Business Address_____

City_____State_____Zip_____

Federal law prohibits any corporate, Ltd. or P.C. checks. $1,000 maximum contribution per person per primary election and $1,000 maximum contribution per person per general election. Federal law requires political committees to report the name, mailing address, occupation and name of employer for each individual whose contributions aggregate in excess of $2000 in a calendar year. Contributions are not deductible for Federal income tax purposes.

Paid for by Sue Kelly for Congress

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Alicia Davis

PHONE NUMBER: 6-6173

DATE OF REQUEST: 4/1/02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
Karl Rove, Senior Advisor

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
Karl Rove is the keynote speaker at 2 events in New York City.

Dates of Travel: 4/4/02 Destination(s): New York City

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
Republican National Committee

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Jay Banning

Address of Organization: 310 1st Street SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: 202-863-8500

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Airplane	$252.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☒ Other (Political Only) RNC
Lodging:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify): Car	$500.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☒ Other (Political Only) RNC

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature [signature] Date 4/3/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264018

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Alicia Davis

PHONE NUMBER: 6-6173

DATE OF REQUEST: 4/1/02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
Alicia Davis, Associate Director

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
Karl Rove is the keynote speaker at 2 events in New York City. I will be staffing the event.

Dates of Travel: 4/4/02 Destination(s): New York City

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
Republican National Committee

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Jay Banning

Address of Organization: 310 1st Street SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: 202-863-8500

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Airplane	$252.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☒ Other (Political Only) RNC
Lodging:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify): Car	$500.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☒ Other (Political Only) RNC

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature [signature] Date 4/3/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264019

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

CONTACT PERSON: Jason Cole

PHONE NUMBER: 60345

DATE OF REQUEST: 04/03/2002

Your Name and Position:
Sara Taylor

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
St. Louis 72 RNC Meeting
Iowa College Republican Grassroots Training and Convention

Dates of Travel: 04/04/2002-04/07/2002 Destination(s): St. Louis, MO / Des Moines, IA

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
Republican National Committee

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Amber Lyons

Address of Organization: 310 First Street SE
Washington, D.C. 20003

Phone: 202-863-8586

Expense:	Amount	Method:*
Transportation (specify): American Airlines	$851.05	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify): Rental Car	$39.01	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE: ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature: [signature] Date: 4/4/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264020

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Kate Marinis

PHONE NUMBER: x66522

DATE OF REQUEST: 4/3/02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
Karl Rove, Senior Advisor

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
Karl is headlining a lunch for the Republican National Committee in Cincinnati, OH. It is a fundraiser for the 2002 RNC Gala.

Dates of Travel: 4/8/02 Destination(s): Cincinnati, OH

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
~~Republican National Committee~~

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Jay Banning

Address of Organization: ~~310 First Street, SE~~
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: 202-863-8560

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Delta Airlines	$972.50	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization.
You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature [signature] Date 3/4/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264021

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Kate Marinis

PHONE NUMBER: x66522

DATE OF REQUEST: 4/3/02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
Ken Mehlman, Deputy Assistant to the President and Director of Political Affairs

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES: RNC 72-hour Task Force Meeting

Dates of Travel: 4/4/02 - 4/6/02 Destination(s): St. Louis, MO

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
~~Republican National Committee~~

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Jay Banning

Address of Organization: ~~310 First Street, SE~~
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: 863-8560

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): American Airlines / charter	$216	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging: Sheraton Westport	$90	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☐ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature [signature] Date 4/3/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264022

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Kathy Rust

PHONE NUMBER: 6-6581

DATE OF REQUEST: April 4, 2002

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position: Deborah Spagnoli, Special Asst. to the President for Intergovernmental Affairs

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:

Particpate and attend Republican Governor's Conference in Naples, Florida.

Dates of Travel: 04/07/02-04/09/02 Destination(s): Naples, Florida

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):

Republican Governors Association

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Susan Nelson

Address of Organization: 310 First Street, SE
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: 202/863-8587

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): US Airways	1007.50	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging: Ritz Carlton, Naples, FL	490.00 plus tx	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals: Lunch/Dinners	100.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify): Ground Transportation	100.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☒ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☒ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature [signature] Date 4/4/02

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00264023

REV_00264024

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Travel - Mission Designations

OA/NARA#: 1824/1742
9632

Box 61
Folder 7

February 6, 2002

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: Joe M. Allbaugh, Director of FEMA

SUBJECT: Request White House Mission Designation for Travel

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Joe M. Allbaugh, Director of FEMA

2. Purpose of the trip: To conduct emergency disaster site visits to Oklahoma, Kansas and Missouri.

3. 24 hour Point Of Contact: Kevin M. Caulfield, Cell: PRA 6

4. Travel Itinerary:
a. Dates: 07 February and 08 February 2002
b. Requested time of departure: Would like to depart Andrews AFB at or about 0800 on 07 Feb. bound for Oklahoma City, Ok. , and Remain Over Night (RON) in OK City. On 08 February, 2002, requesting to depart Oklahoma City at or about 0700 bound for Wichita, Kansas. Then at or about 1230 Depart Wichita, KN, bound for Kansas City, Missouri. At or about 1830, Depart Kansas City, MO, bound for Andrews Air Force Base.

5. Total number of passengers: Seven (7)

6. Special considerations: There are hundreds of thousands of American's without electrical power in freezing weather.

REVIEW:

HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, Jr.
Deputy Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

APPROVAL:

APPROVED ~~DISAPPROVED~~
~~JOSEPH HAGIN~~ ANDREW CARD
~~Deputy~~ Chief of Staff ~~for Operations~~

Cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

OFFICE OF THE VICE PRESIDENT

WASHINGTON

February 7, 2002

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: ERIC EDELMAN
PRINCIPAL DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE VICE PRESIDENT FOR NATIONAL SECURITY AFFAIRS

SUBJECT: REQUEST WHITE HOUSE MISSION DESIGNATION FOR TRAVEL

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Eric Edelman, Principal Deputy Assistant to the Vice President for National Security Affairs

2. Purpose of the trip: To conduct Site Survey for Vice Presidential travel to Europe and the Middle East.

3. 24 Hour Point of Contact: Dan Wilmot, Cell- PRA 6

4. Travel Itinerary:
   a. Date: 8 – 23 February 2002
   b. Requested time of Departure: See attached schedule

5. Total number of passengers: Seventeen (17)

6. Special considerations: Helicopter support is also requested in countries as needed.

REVIEW:

HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
Deputy Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

APPROVAL

2/7/02

APPROVED _____ DISAPPROVED

ANDREW CARD
CHIEF OF STAFF TO THE PRESIDENT

Cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

SITE SURVEY TEAM'S SCHEDULE

Friday, 8 February 2002

6:00 pm — Depart Andrews Air Force Base en route Gander, Newfoundland
Flight Time: 2+45
Time Change: +1.5 (EST)

10:15 pm — Arrive Gander, Newfoundland (Refuel 45 min minimum)

11:00 pm — Depart Gander, Newfoundland en route Shannon, Ireland
Flight Time: 3+55
Time Change: +5 (EST)
+3.5 (Newfoundland)

Saturday, 9 February 2002

6:25 am — Arrive Shannon, Ireland (Crew Rest 15 hr minimum)

9:25 pm — Depart Shannon, Ireland en route Souda, Greece
Flight Time: 4+00
Time Change: +7 (EST)
+2 (Ireland)

Sunday, 10 February 2002

3:15 am — Arrive Souda, Greece (Refuel 45 minutes minimum)

4:00 am — Depart Souda, Greece en route Jeddah, Saudi Arabia
Flight Time: 2+50
Time Change: +8 (EST)
+1 (Greece)

7:50 am — Arrive Jiddah, Saudi Arabia

1:00 pm — Depart Jiddah, Saudi Arabia en route Riyadh, Saudi Arabia
Flight Time: 1+20
Time Change: +8 (EST)
NC (Jiddah)

2:20 pm — Arrive King Khalid International Airport

RON — Riyadh, Saudi Arabia

Monday, 11 February 2002

3:00 pm — Depart Riyadh, Saudi Arabia en route Salalah, Oman
Flight Time: 1+45
Time Change: +9 (EST)
+1 (Saudi Arabia)

5:45 pm — Arrive Salalah International Airport

RON — Salalah, Oman

REV_00264028

Tuesday, 12 February 2002

10:00 am Depart Salalah, Oman en route Muscat Oman
Flight Time: 1+20
Time Change: +9 (EST)
NC

11:20 am Arrive Seeb International Airport

RON Muscat, Oman

Wednesday, 13 February 2002

10:00 am Depart Muscat, Oman en route Abu Dhabi, United Arab Emirates
Flight Time: 0+50
Time Change:+9 (EST)
+NC (Oman)

10:50 am Arrive Abu Dhabi International Airport, United Arab Emirates

6:00 pm Depart Abu Dhabi, United Arab Emirates en route Doha, Qatar
Flight Time: 0+50
Time Change:+8 (EST)
-1 (UAE)

5:50 pm Arrive Doha International Airport

RON Doha, Qatar

Thursday, 14 February 2002

5:00 pm Depart Doha, Qatar en route Manama, Bahrain
Flight Time: 0+30
Time Change:+8 (EST)
NC (Qatar)

5:30 pm Arrive Bahrain International Airport

RON Manama, Bahrain

Friday, 15 February 2002

5:00 pm Depart Manama, Bahrain en route Kuwait City, Kuwait
Flight Time: 0+55
Time Change: +8 (EST)
NC (Bahrain)

5:55 pm Arrive Kuwait City International Airport

RON Kuwait City, Kuwait

Saturday, 16 February 2002

RON Kuwait City, Kuwait

Sunday, 17 February 2002

10:00 am Depart Kuwait City, Kuwait en route Cairo, Egypt
Flight Time: 2+40
Time Change: +7 (EST)
-1 (Kuwait)

11:40 am Arrive Cairo, Egypt

RON Cairo, Egypt

Monday, 18 February 2002

RON Cairo, Egypt

Tuesday, 19 February 2002

8:00 am Depart Cairo, Egypt en route Amman, Jordan
Flight Time: 0+55
Time Change: +7 (EST)
NC (Egypt)

8:55 am Arrive Amman, Jordan

5:00 pm Depart Amman, Jordan en route Tel Aviv, Israel
Flight Time: 0+30
Time Change: +7 (EST)
NC (Jordan)

5:30 pm Arrive Israel International Airport

RON Tel Aviv, Israel

Wednesday, 20 February 2002

RON Tel Aviv, Israel

Thursday, 21 February 2002

10:00 am Depart Tel Aviv, Israel en route Ankara, Turkey
Flight Time: 1+30
Time Change: +7 (EST)
NC (Israel)

11:30 am Arrive Ankara, Turkey

6:00 pm Depart Ankara, Turkey en route London, England
Flight Time: 4+15
Time Change: +6 (EST)
-2 (Turkey)

8:15 pm Arrive London, England

RON London, England

Friday, 22 February 2002
RON England

Saturday, 23 February 2002

8:00 am Depart London, England en route Keflavik, Iceland
Flight Time: 2+55
Time Change: +5 (EST)
NC (England)

10:55 am Arrive Keflavik, Iceland (Refuel 45 min minimum)

11:40 am Depart Keflavik, Iceland en route Gander, Newfoundland
Flight Time: 4+00
Time Change: 1+5 (EST)
-3.5 (Iceland)

Sunday, 23 February 2002

12:20 pm Arrive Gander, Newfoundland (Refuel 45 min minimum)

1:05 pm Depart Gander, Newfoundland en route Andrews AFB
Flight Time: 3+25
Time Change: - 1.5 (Iceland)

3:00 pm Arrive Andrews AFB

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

MEMORANDUM

Sic AHCard 2/4/02

TO: ANDREW H. CARD, JR.
CHIEF OF STAFF

THROUGH: HECTOR IRASTORZA
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: BRADLEY A. BLAKEMAN BAB
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR APPOINTMENTS AND SCHEDULING

DATE: FEBRUARY 1, 2002

SUBJECT: MILITARY AIR REQUEST FOR TRAVEL TO MEXICO, EL SALVADOR, AND PERU

The President will travel to Latin America in March. In direct support of the President's visit a Site Survey team will travel from Washington, DC to Mexico on Monday, February 11, 2002. The Site Survey team will then travel to El Salvador and Peru finishing the trip in Washington, DC on Sunday, February 17, 2002. The use of commercial air transportation is not feasible due to time constraints on the team's travel itinerary and the unavailability of acceptable connections to the desired destinations. Request a military aircraft to transport approximately 30 members of the Site Survey team in accordance with the itinerary below.

Monday, February 11, 2002

8:00 am	Depart Andrews Air Force Base en route Monterrey, Mexico
	Flight Time: 3 hours, 45 minutes
	Time Change: -1
10:45 am	Arrive Monterrey, Mexico
RON	Monterrey, Mexico

Tuesday, February 12, 2002

RON	Monterrey, Mexico

Wednesday, February 13, 2002

8:00 am	Depart Monterrey, Mexico en route San Salvador, El Salvador
	Flight Time: 2 hours, 30 minutes
	Time Change: No Time Change
10:30 am	Arrive San Salvador, El Salvador
RON	San Salvador, El Salvador

Thursday, February 14, 2002

RON	San Salvador, El Salvador

Friday, February 15, 2002

8:00 am	Depart San Salvador, El Salvador en route Lima, Peru
	Flight Time: 4 hours, 5 minutes
	Time Change: +1 hour
1:05 pm	Arrive Lima, Peru
RON	Lima, Peru

Saturday, February 16, 2002

RON	Lima, Peru

Sunday, February 17, 2002

8:00 am	Depart Lima, Peru en route Andrews Air Force Base
	Flight Time: 7 hours, 15 minutes
	Time Change: -1 hour
3:15 pm	Arrive Andrews Air Force Base
RON	Washington, DC

Helicopter support is also requested in countries as needed.
It is respectfully requested that you approve the mission set forth.

APPROVE / DISAPPROVE

ANDREW H. CARD, JR 2/4/02
CHIEF OF STAFF

CC: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Director, Airlift Operations

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

MEMORANDUM

TO: ANDREW H. CARD, JR.
CHIEF OF STAFF

THROUGH: HECTOR IRASTORZA HI
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: GOVERNOR TOM RIDGE Tom Ridge
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND HOMELAND SECURITY ADVISOR

DATE: FEBRUARY 7, 2002

SUBJECT: MILITARY AIR REQUEST FOR TRAVEL TO MEXICO CITY AND EL PASO

I will travel to Mexico City and El Paso in early March. The use of commercial air transportation is not feasible due to time constraints and the unavailability of acceptable commercial connections to the desired destinations. Request a military aircraft to transport approximately 35 members of the delegation, including security and press, in accordance with the itinerary below.

Monday, March 4, 2002

9:00 am	Depart Andrews Air Force Base en route Mexico City, Mexico
11:50 am	Arrive Mexico City
RON	Mexico City

Tuesday, March 5, 2002

RON	Mexico City

Wednesday, March 6, 2002

8:30 am	Depart Mexico City
9:40 am	Arrive El Paso, Texas
1:30 pm	Depart El Paso
7:45 pm	Arrive Andrews Air Force Base

REV_00264034

It is respectfully requested that you approve the mission set forth.

APPROVE/DISAPPROVE

ANDREW H. CARD, JR.
CHIEF OF STAFF

CC: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Director, Airlift Operations

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

January 18, 2002

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: CONDOLEEZZA RICE

SUBJECT: Request White House Mission Designation for President Karzai of Afghanistan to Travel to Washington

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Secretary of State Powell.

2. Purpose of the Trip: To provide transportation for President Karzai to Washington DC to meet with President Bush and other senior United States Government officials.

3. 24 hour Point of Contact: Jeff Lunstead PRA 6 Steve Young PRA 6

4. Travel Itinerary:

a. Dates: January 26, 2002 - February 1, 2002

b. Requested Time of Departure: Depart Kabul to arrive in Washington DC on the afternoon of January 27. Travel to New York City early a.m. on January 30. Depart New York City on January 31 to London and then possibly back to Kabul.

5. Total Number of Passengers: Maximum of 10

6. Special Considerations: If possible, request an aircraft without U.S. markings.

APPROVED / DISAPPROVED

JOSEPH HAGIN AHCard
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

9340
Add-on

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

January 18, 2002

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: CONDOLEEZZA RICE

SUBJECT: Revised White House Mission Designation Request for Presidential Delegation to Honduras

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Department of State

2. Purpose of Trip: You previously approved a White House Mission to transport a presidential delegation to attend the inauguration of president-elect Ricardo Maduro in Tegucigalpa, Honduras. The Department of State has subsequently requested the use of in-theater U.S. military helicopter support stationed at Soto Cano Air Base in Honduras to transport the U.S. delegation from Tegucigalpa to Copan on January 27 and from Copan to San Pedro Sula on January 28 for the farewell of President Maduro.

3. 24 hour Point of Contact: Terry Steers Gonzalez PRA 6
PRA 6 Back up: Arnold Chacon PRA 6

4. Travel Itinerary: Depart Washington DC on January 26 onboard appropriate military aircraft transportation to destination described above
   a. Dates: January 26-28, 2002
   b. Requested time of departure: January 26, TBD

5. Total Number of Passengers: Maximum of 8

6. Special Considerations: Milair support is necessary as commercial transportation is not viable. The Government of Honduras offered transportation arrangements but will require a three-hour bus ride from San Pedro to Copan and back the following morning. For security and safety concerns, as well as time constraints for the delegation, U.S. military helicopter support is recommended.

APPROVED/DISAPPROVED

JOSEPH HAGIN
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

Attachment
Tab A Incoming Correspondence

cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

S/S 200201128

United States Department of State

Washington, D.C. 20520
www.state.gov

January 17, 2002

UNCLASSIFIED

MEMORANDUM FOR STEPHEN E. BIEGUN
EXECUTIVE SECRETARY
NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL

Subject: Request for In-theater Military Air Support for Honduran Inauguration

The U.S. Embassy in Honduras has informed us that the Government of Honduras will be holding the official inaugural events scheduled for January 27 - 28 in three separate locations throughout the country. Consequently, the Department of State is requesting the NSC to authorize the non-reimbursable use of U.S. military helicopter support stationed at Soto Cano Air Base in Honduras to transport the U.S. delegation from Tegucigalpa to Copan on January 27 and from Copan to San Pedro Sula on January 28 for the farewell by President Maduro. Military air support to and from Honduras has already been approved.

While the Government of Honduras has offered to transport the U.S. delegation to the second of three inaugural events in Copan, the current arrangements call for a three hour bus ride from San Pedro Sula to Copan and back the following morning. For security and safety concerns, as well as time considerations for the delegation, U.S. military helicopter support is recommended.

The U.S. delegation, including U.S. Embassy officials and security detail, may number as many as 25 persons. It will be led by a cabinet-level U.S. official.

The point of contact for this mission is Terry Steers-Gonzalez, Honduras Desk Officer. He can be reached at 202-647-3330.

Deborah Kennedy for Maura Harty
Executive Secretary

JAN 18 8:24

UNCLASSIFIED

REV_00264040

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

January 7, 2002

MEMORANDUM FOR JOE HAGIN
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: ALBERT HAWKINS
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND CABINET SECRETARY

SUBJECT: WHITE HOUSE MISSION TO THE 2002 OLYMPICS FOR THE OFFICIAL DELEGATION

I request a White House Mission for the official delegation to the Opening Ceremonies of the 2002 Winter Olympics. The proposed trip would take place Friday, February 8, 2002. The delegation would include Cabinet Secretaries, others named as part of the delegation, and White House senior staff, as appropriate.

1. Requesting Principal: Albert Hawkins

2. Purpose of the Trip: To participate with the President in the Opening Ceremonies of the 2002 Olympic Games in Salt Lake City, Utah

3. 24-hour Point of Contact: Albert Hawkins [White House Signal]

4. Travel Itinerary:
   Travel directly to Salt Lake City, Utah, February 8, 2002
   Attend the Opening Ceremonies
   Return to Washington, D.C. (either return immediately or remain overnight with return on February 9)

5. Total number of Passengers: TBD

6. Special Considerations: Security risks and the limited availability of commercial transportation during this time

Thank you for your consideration of this request.

REVIEW:

HECTOR IRASTORZA, JR.
Deputy Assistant to the president for Management and Administration

APPROVAL: Pending Presidential trip assets utilized

APPROVED DISAPPROVED

SECRETARY ANDREW H. CARD, JR.
Chief of Staff to the President

cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations
Cabinet Secretary

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

JANUARY 15, 2002

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: TIM ADAMS, CHIEF OF STAFF
US DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

SUBJECT: Request White House Mission Designation for Travel

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Deputy Secretary Ken Dam, US Department of the Treasury

2. Purpose of the trip: For Deputy Secretary Dam to conduct official meeting in Pakistan and India with Cabinet-level ministers and, in the case of Pakistan, a likely meeting with President General Musharraf. The current political situation and lack of reliable civilian commercial air service between Pakistan and India does not allow the mission to be completed in a timely or efficient manner.

3. 24 Hour Point of Contact: Robb LaKritz, Special Assistant to the Deputy Secretary. (202)622-0497 (office)

PRA 6

4. Travel Itinerary:

	Dates & Times
NYC to Ramstein AFB	Feb. 2-3, 2002
	Dep. 6:00 pm EST
	Arr. 7:30 am GER
Ramstein AFB to Islamabad	Feb. 3, 2002
	Dep. 8:30 am GER
	Arr. 7:30 pm ISB
Islamabad to Delhi	Feb. 5, 2002
	Dep. 5:00 pm ISB
	Arr. 6:45 pm DEL

4.Travel Itinerary:

Delhi to Bangalore	Feb. 9, 2002
	Dep. 5:00 pm DEL
	Arr. 7:35 pm BAN
Bangalore to Mumbai	Feb. 10, 2002
	Dep. 6:00 pm BAN
	Arr. 7:30 pm MUM
Mumbai to Ramstein AFB	Feb. 13, 2002
	Dep. 8:00 am MUM
	Arr. 8:00 am GER
Ramstein AFB to WDC	Feb. 13, 2002
	Dep. 9:00 am GER
	Arr. 12:00 pm WDC

5. Total Number of Passengers: 9

6. Special Considerations:

REVIEW:

HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, Jr.
Deputy Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

APPROVAL:

APPROVED
JOSEPH HAGIN
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

DISAPPROVED

Cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations
Office of Cabinet Affairs

THE WHITE HOUSE
MILITARY OFFICE

OPERATIONS
WASHINGTON, DC 20502

File

7 JAN 2002

MEMO FOR: Cathy Alix
THROUGH: General Rosenker
SUBJECT: Request for WH Mission for Mrs Cheney

a. Air Ops created the attached request (TAB A) for C-21 support for Mrs Cheney for travel from DC to Minneapolis on 9 Jan, and follow on to Westchester County, NY on 10 Jan. Return to DC scheduled for 11 Jan.

b. This request is based on request from Secret Service (Tony Zotto) at TAB B. Discussions with POC from Secret Service indicate that this request came directly from the Vice President. Commercial travel arrangements were previously made, however the Vice President requested that possibility of Military Air be explored.

c. Secret Service is requesting this as a reimbursable mission. Approximate total flight time will be 5+ 30 (2+30 Andrews to Minneapolis, 2+10 Minneapolis to Westchester and 0+50 Westchester to DC) for a cost of approximately $4800 providing the C-21 is able to be tasked from the unit at Andrews.

d. In anticipation of approval, we've tasked OSD to support this mission (TAB C)

e. Recommendation: Approve mission on a reimbursable basis as requested.

V/R Mike Irwin

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

January 7, 2002

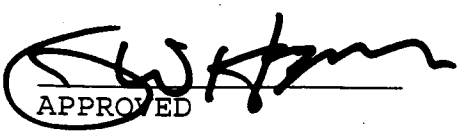
MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH W. HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: MARK V. ROSENKER
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DIRECTOR, WHITE HOUSE MILITARY OFFICE

SUBJECT: Request for Presidential Executive Airlift Support

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:



1. Requesting principal: Anthony M. Zotto.

2. Purpose of the support: Provide transportation (C-21 aircraft) for the Vice President's spouse from Andrews AFB, Maryland to Minneapolis, Minnesota, and Westchester County, New York during the period of January 9-11, 2002. This mission should be conducted on a reimbursable basis.

3. A 24-hour point of contact (POC): Airlift Operations director on-call. Contact through White House Signal Switchboard at (202) 757-6000.

REVIEW:

HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
Deputy Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

APPROVED

DISAPPROVED

JOSEPH HAGIN
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

cc:
White House Counsel
Director, White House Airlift Operations

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY
UNITED STATES SECRET SERVICE

January 4, 2002

MEMORANDUM FOR: MARK V. ROSENKER
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND DIRECTOR,
WHITE HOUSE MILITARY OFFICE

FROM: ANTHONY M. ZOTTO
SPECIAL AGENT IN CHARGE
VICE PRESIDENTIAL PROTECTIVE DIVISION
U.S. SECRET SERVICE

SUBJECT: AIRCRAFT SUPPORT FOR MRS. CHENEY FOR TRAVEL TO MINNEAPOLIS, MN ON JANUARY 9, 2002 AND TO PLEASANTVILLE, NY ON JANUARY 10, 2002.

The Vice President has requested the U.S. Secret Service to coordinate with the White House Military Office to support Mrs. Cheney's travel. Mrs. Cheney is scheduled to travel from Washington, DC to Minneapolis, MN on January 9, 2002 and remain overnight. Mrs. Cheney will then travel from Minneapolis, MN to Westchester County New York on January 10, 2002 and remain overnight. Mrs. Cheney will return to Washington, DC on January 11, 2002.

The U.S. Secret Service is requesting a C-21 aircraft to support Mrs. Cheney's upcoming travel. The cost of the aircraft will be split between the staff for Mrs. Cheney, and the U.S. Secret Service. There will be a total of four passengers traveling on this trip.

The requested time of departure from Andrews AFB on January 9, 2002 is approximately 8:30AM. The approximate departure time from Minneapolis, MN to Westchester County New York is approximately 12:30PM, and the approximate departure time from Westchester County to Andrews AFB is 2:00PM.

I can be reached at PRA 6 should you have any questions regarding this request.

THE WHITE HOUSE

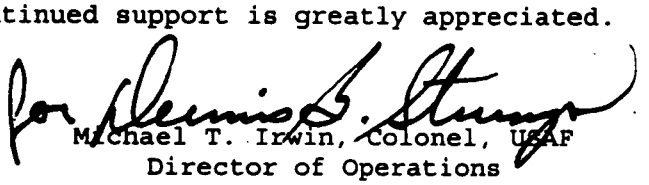
WASHINGTON

January 4, 2002

MEMORANDUM FOR LT COL TIM GROSZ, USAF
MILITARY ASSISTANT TO THE EXECUTIVE SECRETARY

SUBJECT: DoD Airlift Support for Spouse of the Vice President

The Vice President has requested military airlift support (C-21) for Mrs. Cheney's travel to Minneapolis, MN and Westchester County, NY during the period January 9-11, 2002. Her party will consist of four passengers, and the tentative scenario is as follows:



Jan 09, 2002/0830L:	Depart Andrews AFB, MD (KADW)
Jan 09, 2002/TBD:	Arrive Minneapolis, MN (KMSP)
Jan 10, 2002/1230L:	Depart Minneapolis, MN (KMSP)
Jan 10, 2002/TBD:	Arrive Westchester, NY (KHPN)
Jan 11, 2002/1400L:	Depart Westchester, NY (KHPN)
Jan 11, 2002/TBD:	Arrive Andrews AFB, MD (KADW)

This is a White House directed mission requirement as verbally received from Special Agent in Charge Anthony Zotto, United States Secret Service. This travel support has been requested in accordance with Section 6 of the Presidential Protection Assistance Act of 1976, and should be conducted on a reimbursable basis.

The Secret Service point of contact for operational issues is Special Agent Mark Ouellette. He may be contacted at (202) 757-1850.

The staff point of contact for funding issues is Ms. Claire O'Donnell, Deputy Assistant to the Vice President for Operations. She may be contacted at (202) 456-5307.

Our unit point of contact is Mr. Dennis Stump. He may be contacted at (202) 757-1263, or through the White House Signal Switchboard at (202) 757-6000. As always, your continued support is greatly appreciated.

Michael T. Irwin, Colonel, USAF
Director of Operations
White House Military Office

REV_00264049

THE WHITE HOUSE
MILITARY OFFICE

OPERATIONS
WASHINGTON, DC 20502

2 JAN 2002

MEMO FOR: Cathy Alix
SUBJECT: Request for WH Mission Status for Former Senator John Danforth to Africa

Delegation to Egypt, Eritrea, Kenya, and the Sudan

a. Mission is scheduled for 10-18 Jan 02.

b. DoD Exec Sec is aware of the request and views this as a State Department (vice White House) mission. They agree that military air is probably required due to lack of adequate/robust service into many of the locations. Hhowever DoD believes that State Department should accomplish on a reimbursable basis.

c. In our discussions with State Dept POC, we've asked them to look at commercial service into Cairo (vice Germany) as well to increase DoD options. Commercial service is readily available into Cairo and there is no business to be conducted in Germany.

d. DoD would evaluate stops and aircraft available, but would most likely support with C-130/C-12 and or C-21 assets or some combination there of from In-theater assets.

e. Two ways to support this mission if it is to be reimbursable: a) Have State Forward the request directly to DoD Exec Sec as a reimbursable mission under the Economy Act. b) Approve as a White House reimbursable missions. This would give it the priority to be supported, but also insure that State Dept vice DoD picks up the cost of the mission.

e. Recommendation: Based on mission, and recognition by all that commercial service won't accommodate entire requirement, would recommend consideration for White House designation, but on a reimbursable basis.

V/R Mike Irwin

REV_00264050

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

January 3, 2002

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: CONDOLEEZZA RICE

SUBJECT: Request White House Mission Designation for Special Envoy Danforth

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Department of State.

2. Purpose of the Trip: In furtherance of the President's foreign policy objectives regarding the peace process in Sudan, Special Envoy Danforth will travel to the region to measure progress in the peace process and to secure agreement to and implementation of proposals establish in his previous visit.

3. 24-hour Point of Contact: John Sheely, PRA 6

PRA 6

4. Travel Itinerary: Depart Frankfurt, GE on January 11 for Cairo, Asmara, Nairobi, Khartoum, Nuba Mountais, Rumbek, location TBD (Garang's location), and Khartoum. (See attached Department of State request for details of itinerary.)

a. Dates: January 11 - January 18, 2002
b. Requested Time of Departure: TBD

5. Total Number of Passengers: 7

6. Special Considerations: Milair support is necessary to maintain secure communications and due to the inability to complete the mission through commercial transportation within the given time constraints.

APPROVED ON A NON-REIMBURSABLE BASIS

APPROVED ON A REIMBURSABLE BASIS

DISAPPROVED

JOSEPH HAGIN
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

Attachments
Tab A Incoming Correspondence

cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

S/S 200130120

United States Department of State

Washington, D.C. 20520
www.state.gov

December 31, 2001

UNCLASSIFIED

MEMORANDUM FOR STEPHEN E. BIEGUN
EXECUTIVE SECRETARY
NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL

SUBJECT: Request for Special Air Missions Aircraft

In furtherance of the President's foreign policy, John Danforth, Special Envoy of the President for Peace in Sudan and a delegation of six others will travel to Egypt, Eritrea, Kenya and Sudan from January 10 through January 18, 2002 (see attached itinerary). The purpose of the trip is to measure progress by the Government of Sudan and the Sudanese Peoples' Liberation Movement (SPLM) in securing agreement to and implementation of the four proposals established during the Special Envoy's November visit to this region.

The Department requests that this trip be declared a White House Mission and that an appropriate aircraft be made available on a non-reimbursable basis. A military aircraft is necessary because of the need to have secure communication links with the White House, the National Security Council and the Department at all times. In addition, unreliable and time-consuming commercial air schedules within Africa make it impossible for the Special Envoy to visit the numerous countries within the time he is free to travel. The delegation will travel to and from Frankfurt, Germany via commercial air.

The point of contact in the Department is John Sheely, Bureau of African Affairs Deputy Executive Director. Mr. Sheely can be reached at (202) 647-4417, and pager (202) 409-2420. Mr. Sheely can also be reached after-hours through the State Department's Operations Center at (202) 647-1512.

This request has been cleared by the State Department's Office of the Legal Adviser.

Maura Harty
Executive Secretary

Attachment: As stated

UNCLASSIFIED

REV_00264053

Notional Schedule
Senator Danforth, Regional Trip
January 8 - 16, 2002

Thursday, January 10th
3:48pm Depart for Frankfurt from St. Louis (overnight)(tentative)

Friday, January 11th
9:55am Arrive Frankfurt
11:30am Depart Frankfurt to Cairo (Milair)
5:30pm Arrive Cairo
RON Cairo

Saturday, January 12th
Meetings with President Mubarak and Sudan POC Suliman
3:00pm Depart for Asmara (Milair)
7:00pm Arrive Asmara
RON Asmara

NOTE: MAY ADD ADDIS ABABA LEG (+1 DAY)

Sunday, January 13th
Meetings with President Asias and FM Said Abdalla Ali
3:00pm Depart for Nairobi (milair)
6:00pm Arrive Nairobi
RON Nairobi

Monday, January 14th
Meetings with President Moi and General Sumbeiywo
2:00pm Depart for Khartoum (Milair)
4:30pm Arrive Khartoum (before sundown)
RON Khartoum

Tuesday, January 15th
Meetings with Bashir and/or Ghazi
RON Khartoum

Wednesday, January 16th
6:00am Sunrise departure for Nuba Mountais (WFP aircraft)
8:00am Arrive site
11:00am Depart for Polio eradication location (WFP transport)
12:00pm Arrive site
3:00pm Depart for Rumbek (WFP transport)
5:00pm Arrive Rumbek (before sundown)

REV_00264054

RON Rumbek

Thursday, January 17th

6:00am Sunrise departure for Garang's location (WFP Acft)
Meetings with Garang
3:00pm Depart for Khartoum (WFP Acft)
5:00pm Arrive Khartoum (before sundown)
Final briefings, meeting make-ups, press conference if any.
RON Khartoum

Friday, January 18th

9:00am Depart for Frankfurt (Milair)
2:00pm Arrive Frankfurt
5:00pm Flight to St. Louis (Tentative)
10:45pm Arrive St. Louis (Tentative)

REV_00264055

Brett Kavanaugh

THE WHITE HOUSE
MILITARY OFFICE

OPERATIONS
WASHINGTON, DC 20502

2 JAN 2002

MEMO FOR: Cathy Alix
SUBJECT: Request for WH Mission Status for EPA trip to Asia

Delegation to Egypt, Eritrea, Kenya, and the Sudan

a. Mission is requested for 11-20 January. During this time frame, the 89th is overcommitted and does not have the airframes to support this mission. (We are already challenged supporting the existing White House missions currently scheduled during this time frame; i.e. Delegation to Nicaragua, VP Missions, Sec Principi (COG) mission, Governor Ridge Mission, First Lady mission)

b. Request is incorrect in that it mentions "in accordance with the Economy Act." Economy Act request are submitted to DoD as reimbursable missions to be considered on an "as capable / no mission impact " basis. Discussions with the POC at EPA make clear that the intent of this request is to have mission designated a White House non-reimbursable mission.

c. DoD perspective is that nature of this mission is strictly EPA vice White House business. In addition, commercial air is available into the mission locations. Security concerns mentioned as justification is not compelling.

d. Estimated total flight time for the entire mission would be approximately 49.5 hours. Based on a C-20 rate of approximately $3600/hr, total cost of the mission would be over $178K. Even at a reimbursable rate, DoD would need to cancel other justifiable missions to support

e. Recommendation: Suggest mission not be approved as a White House mission since it does not meet the common White House designated criteria. At $178K EPA could probably not support on a reimbursable basis; in addition DoD would have difficulty supporting without canceling other missions (primarily CODEL) previously scheduled.

V/R Mike Irwin

REV_00264056

UNITED STATES ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20460

JAN 3 2002

OFFICE OF THE ADMINISTRATOR

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: EILEEN MCGINNIS
CHIEF OF STAFF
ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY

SUBJECT: Request White House Mission Designation for Travel

In accordance with the Economy Act, 31 U.S.C. § 1535, I request approval of the following White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Christine Todd Whitman, Administrator, U.S. Environmental Protection Agency.

2. Purpose of the trip; The purpose of this trip is to visit Thailand and India, to further the environmental cooperation between the U.S. and these countries. Her trip will include the following official duties: meeting with the Thai Royal Family (the first visit of a Bush Administration cabinet official) to explore EPA cooperation on Thai environmental projects; meeting with Thai Prime Minister Thaksin Shinnawat and signing of the Tropical Forest Agreement; meetings with Thai Cabinet officials including the Foreign Minister and the Minister of Science, Technology and Environment; meetings with Indian Prime Minister Vajpayee and External Affairs Minister Jaswant Singh, signing a Memorandum of Understanding between EPA and the Indian Ministry of Environment and Forests; and a meeting with the Minister of Power. In view of the currently volatile border situation involving India and Pakistan, this trip takes on added significance.

The Administrator, EPA, has determined, in accordance with the Economy Act, that it is in the interests of the Government to designate this trip as a White House Mission, and to provide transportation pursuant to the Economy Act. Specifically, security concerns in the wake of the September 11 terrorist attacks raise significant concerns about U.S. Cabinet officials traveling without appropriate security measures in foreign countries.

REV_00264057

Draft #9 (02Jan02)

6:00 pm Reception at DCM's Residence

The reception will be attended by 50-60 invited guests. Brief CTW remarks/toast.

Location: 17, Amrita Shergill Marg, New Delhi 110 003

7:00 pm Depart for Roosevelt House

7:30 pm Dinner at Roosevelt House

RON : Maurya Sheraton Hotel and Towers

Diplomatic Enclave:
Sadar Patel Marg
New Delhi, India 110 021
Phone: 91-11-6112233
Fax: 91-11-613333

Thursday, January 17, 2002 – Delhi/Agra

8:00 am Breakfast Meeting with American Chamber of Commerce (CTW remarks on public-private partnerships)

9:45 am Depart for Roundtable Hosted by MoEF

10:00 am Roundtable on Environmental Health

Purpose: Hosted by the Ministry of Environment and Forests (MOEF), with the Ministry of Health, and focusing on children's environmental health and POP/PBTs, the Roundtable will serve as the platform for Governor Whitman to engage senior India officials on children's health agenda with India, and explore specific opportunities to engage with India on capacity building agenda related to implementation of Stockholm Convention on Persistent Organic Pollutants, as well as cooperation on mercury. (India is not presently a signatory of Stockholm Convention.) Representatives from the World Health Organization (WHO) and the U.N. Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) will also participate.

Location: TBD

REV_00264066

Draft #9 (02Jan02)

1:30 pm Luncheon and Roundtable on Environmental Management in the Information Age hosted by Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry (FICCI). (The Federal includes many American companies.)

Purpose: Brief remarks by CTW. The Roundtable will showcase U.S. experience in using information technology to more effectively understand and manage environmental problems. It will also underscore the importance of providing the with general public credible and useful information on environmental quality in their communities. (Note: the Community-Right-To-Know provisions in U.S. environmental law emerged as result of the Bhopal tragedy, but, despite interest, no similar system currently exists in India.) Finally the event will be used to explore opportunities for further EPA/USG activities in view of the highly developed IT industry in India.

Location: Federation House, 1 Tansen Marg, New Delhi 110001

2:05 pm Depart for Ministry of Non-Conventional Energy Sources. (Coach leaves for Agra at 2:30 pm)

2:20 pm Courtesy call on M. Kannappan, Minister of State-Independent Charge, Ministry of Non-Conventional Energy Sources

Location: Block 14, CGO Complex, Lodi Road, New Delhi 110 003

2:45 pm Depart for Maurya Sheraton

4:00 pm Depart for Indira Ghandi International Airport – Domestic Terminal

5:00 pm Travel from Delhi to Agra (flying time 45 minutes) – Governor and key staff and mission personnel by Span Air, chartered aircraft

6:00 pm Arrive at Agra airport and Depart for Oberoi Amarvila Hotel

6:30 pm Coach arrives at Agra-Oberoi Amarvilas Hotel

7:00 pm Dinner and moonlight viewing of Taj Mahal from Oberoi Hotel

RON at Oberoi Hotel in Agra

Amarvilas
Taj East Gate Road

REV_00264067

Draft #9 (02Jan02)

1:30 pm Luncheon and Roundtable on Environmental Management in the Information Age hosted by Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry (FICCI). (The Federal includes many American companies.)

Purpose: Brief remarks by CTW. The Roundtable will showcase U.S. experience in using information technology to more effectively understand and manage environmental problems. It will also underscore the importance of providing the with general public credible and useful information on environmental quality in their communities. (Note: the Community-Right-To-Know provisions in U.S. environmental law emerged as result of the Bhopal tragedy, but, despite interest, no similar system currently exists in India.) Finally the event will be used to explore opportunities for further EPA/USG activities in view of the highly developed IT industry in India.

Location: Federation House, 1 Tansen Marg, New Delhi 110001

2:05 pm Depart for Ministry of Non-Conventional Energy Sources. (Coach leaves for Agra at 2:30 pm)

2:20 pm Courtesy call on M. Kannappan, Minister of State-Independent Charge, Ministry of Non-Conventional Energy Sources

Location: Block 14, CGO Complex, Lodi Road, New Delhi 110 003

2:45 pm Depart for Maurya Sheraton

4:00 pm Depart for Indira Ghandi International Airport – Domestic Terminal

5:00 pm Travel from Delhi to Agra (flying time 45 minutes) – Governor and key staff and mission personnel by Span Air, chartered aircraft

6:00 pm Arrive at Agra airport and Depart for Oberoi Amarvila Hotel

6:30 pm Coach arrives at Agra-Oberoi Amarvilas Hotel

7:00 pm Dinner and moonlight viewing of Taj Mahal from Oberoi Hotel

RON at Oberoi Hotel in Agra

Amarvilas
Taj East Gate Road

REV_00264068

Taj Tagri Scheme
Agra, India
Tel # 91-562-231515
Fax # 91-562-231516

JANUARY 18 (FRIDAY) – Agra/New Delhi

8:00 am — Early morning visit to Taj Mahal

11:00 am — Meeting with MOEF/Central Pollution Control Board in projects in Uttar Pradesh

Location: Amarvillas Hotel, Agra

12:30 pm — Meeting with Asian Development Bank on Taj Environmental Improvement Project followed by luncheon.

Purpose: Explore opportunities for EPA cooperation under Taj Mahal environmental improvement project. We are awaiting more details on MOEF project

Location: TBD

2:30 pm — Return to New Delhi by charter flight

JANUARY 19 (SATURDAY) – Travel – New Delhi to New York (via Paris)

1:05am — Depart New Delhi (Air France # 147) non-stop to Paris

6:30 am — Arrive Paris Charles de Gaulle Airport

8:30 am — Depart Paris Charles de Gaulle Airport (Delta #8600) non-stop to New York/JFK

10:40 am — Arrive New York/JFK

4:30 pm — Delhi Cultural Site Visit

REV_00264069

Designating this trip as a White House Mission will facilitate providing appropriate security measures for the Administrator on this trip. In addition, the locations and destinations on the Administrator's itinerary are not easily reached and served by commercially available transportation, and for efficiency would be more easily reached by U.S. government transportation, given the various destinations and the time schedule of the trip.

3. 24 Hour Point of Contact: PRA 6

4. Travel Itinerary: See Attached Itinerary

5. Total Number of Passengers (including principal): 12

6. Special Considerations: None

REVIEW:

HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, Jr.
Deputy Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

APPROVAL:

Joseph M Hagin
DISAPPROVED

APPROVED

JOSEPH HAGIN
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

DRAFT

Draft #10 (02Jan02)

GOVERNOR WHITMAN TRIP TO ASIA:

Draft Itinerary for Thailand and India
January 11-20, 2002

JANUARY 11 (FRIDAY) – Travel – Phoenix to Los Angeles to Tokyo

8:38 am Depart Phoenix (Northwest #4804) for Los Angeles

9:05 am Arrive Los Angeles

11:25 am Depart Los Angeles (Northwest #0001) for Tokyo

JANUARY 12 (SATURDAY) – Travel – Tokyo to Bangkok

4:25 pm Arrive Tokyo Narita Airport

5:50 pm Depart Tokyo Narita (Northwest #0001) for Bangkok

10:45 pm Arrive Bangkok Airport. Motorcade to hotel

RON at Regent Hotel

155 Ratchadamri Road
Bangkok 10330
Tel #662-251-6127 Fax #662-253-9195
Hotel Floor Reserved for U.S. Delegation, with suite for Governor

JANUARY 13 (SUNDAY) – Travel – Bangkok

9:00 am Optional Visit to Grand Palace and River City

1:30am Country Team Briefing

Purpose: Receive briefing from Ambassador and senior Embassy officials on country context and discuss U.S. environment strategy for Thailand.

Location: Regent Hotel

Draft #illegible

2:30pm Protocol Briefing for Royal Audience (Regent Hotel)

3:00 pm Depart hotel for Hua Hin, Thailand, via Embassy twin-prop C-12.

4:30pm Orientation for Royal Audience

5:00pm Royal Audience with His Majesty King Bhumibol Adulyadej (Protocol requires limiting audience to Ambassador and CTW). [Note: "King Bhumibol" – people addressed by first name in Thailand]

Purpose: Discuss His Majesty's interest in environmental issues. Draw national attention to U.S.-Thai cooperation on the environment in Thailand.

Location: Klai-Kangwong Palace, Hua Hin, Thailand
Dress: Business Formal. Shoes should be easy to slip on/off, preferably flats, and not open-toed.
Press: Photo Op for Press

Evening Return to Bangkok. Exact time depends on how long royal audience lasts.

Dinner Free/Optional Shopping
Dress: Smart Casual

Option 1 for Dinner: Spice Market Restaurant, Regent Hotel Thai Food

Option 2 for Dinner: Sala Rim Naam Restaurant, Oriental Hotel Thai Dinner and Cultural Show on Chao Praya River Show starts at 8:30pm.

RON at Regent Hotel

155 Ratchadamri Road
Bangkok 10330
Tel #662-251-6127 Fax #662-253-9195
Hotel Floor Reserved for U.S. Delegation

JANUARY 14 (MONDAY) – Bangkok

REV_00264060

7:30 am Breakfast meeting with American Chamber of Commerce (Brief CTW remarks on public-private partnerships) Draft #(x)(02Jan02)

Purpose: Represent Administration to U.S. business community in Thailand. The Governor will meet with members of the U.S. business community, including both large companies (e.g., General Motors, United Airlines, Coca Cola) and small consulting and engineering firms. Emphasis will be on public-private partnerships and voluntary programs (e.g., Energy Star).

Location: Regent Hotel
Dress: Business Dress all Day
Press: Closed to Press

9:30am Meeting with Foreign Minister Surakiet Satirathai (exchange of gifts)

Location: Ministry of Foreign Affairs
Press: Open to Press

10:30 am Meeting with Prime Minister Thaksin Shinnawat (exchange of gifts)

Purpose: Convey Bush Administration message on importance of U.S.-Thai relations. Highlight U.S.-Thai cooperation on the environment. The Prime Minister and Governor will also sign Tropical Forest Agreement, which will generate $9.5 million over 28 years on behalf of forest conservation in Thailand in this debt-for-nature agreement.

Location: Office of the Prime Minister, Protocol Room
Press: Open to Press

12:30 pm Luncheon Hosted by Ambassador Johnson (CTW table discussion only)

Purpose: Recognize key Thai environmental reformers and EPA partners. Guests will include the Secretary General of the Council State (cabinet official responsible for national legislation passed by Parliament), Vice President for the Supreme Administrative Court, the Secretary to the President of the Supreme Court, the Permanent Secretary of MOSTE, and the Chairman of the Board of the Community Organizations Development Institute.

Location: Residence of Deputy Chief of Mission Press: Closed to Press, Photo Op

2:00 pm Meeting with Minister Sonthaya of the Ministry of Science, Technology and

REV_00264061

Environment (MOSTE) and structured discussion of MOU

Purpose: Discuss U.S.-Thai environmental cooperation with MOSTE Minister Sonthaya and receive presentations on success stories. Remarks to draw attention to EPA-MOSTE Memorandum of Understanding. CTW will present the first honorary degree from the EPA Air Pollution Training Institute to Dr. Supat (Director, Air Division, Pollution Control Department).

Location: Ministry of Science Technology and Environment
Press: Open to Press

6:30 pm Ambassador's Cocktail Reception

Guests will include 100-150 senior U.S. and Thai government officials, members of the U.S. business and non-governmental community, and representatives from Thai industry and NGO community. CTW will present EPA Certificate of Appreciation to the U.S.-Asia Environmental Partnership (U.S.-AEP) in connection with the organization's 10-year anniversary. CTW will present EPA Certificate of Appreciation to Thitima Klasnimi who has provided outstanding support to EPA activities in Thailand for many years. Potentially sponsored by American Chamber of Commerce, the U.S.-ASEAN (Association of Southeast Asian Nations) Business Council and/or the U.S.-Thai Business Council. List of attendees forthcoming.

Location: Poolside, Regent Hotel (inside ballroom if raining)
Press: Open to Press

9:00pm Dinner
Options: Biscotti Italian Restaurant, Regent Hotel

Japanese Restaurant, Regent Hotel

RON at Regent Hotel

155 Ratchadamri Road
Bangkok 10330
Tel #662-251-6127 Fax #662-253-9195

JANUARY 15 (TUESDAY) – Bangkok/Chiang Mai/New Delhi

REV_00264062

Draft #9 (02Jan02)

7:00 am Breakfast Meeting with World Bank (CTW no remarks)

Purpose: To discuss past and potential cooperation on environmental institution building in Thailand. The Governor will meet with the World Bank's country director for Thailand and environmental project managers. The World Bank is currently funding a major environmental institution-building project for the country.

Location: Regent Hotel
Dress: Business Dress all Day (pantsuit is fine)
Press: Closed to Press

9:20 am Depart Bangkok (Thai Airlines #104) for Chiang Mai

10:30 am Arrive Chiang Mai

11:00am Meeting with Mayor of Chiang Mai (exchange of gifts)

Purpose: Receive key to the City on behalf of EPA's work on Air Quality in Chiang Mai

Location: Municipal Building
Press: Open to Press

11:45 am Buffet luncheon hosted by U.S. Consul General in Chiang Mai with Chiang Mai Mayor et al (CTW no remarks/exchange of gifts)

Purpose: Discuss Clean Air Initiative in Chiang Mai. Opportunity to introduce Cabinet Official to up to 60 guests of Chiang Mai society.

Location: Consul General's Residence, U.S. Consulate General Compound
Press: Closed to Press

1:30 pm Participate in Closing Ceremony for Chiang Mai Air Quality Workshop (CTW 5-minute remarks)

Purpose: Highlight U.S. support for Clean Air Initiative in Thailand. Community participants in an EPA/State of Maryland project will report out on their progress in developing an air quality management plan for the city. Emphasizing the importance of public participation, the Governor will discuss U.S. experience in this area

REV_00264063

Location: Chiang Mai Inn
Press: Open to Press

2:45pm Depart for Airport

3:15 pm Depart Chiang Mai (Thai Airlines #113) for Bangkok

4:25 pm Arrive Bangkok Airport

5:35 pm Depart Bangkok (Thai Airlines #315) for New Delhi

8:30 pm Arrive New Delhi – Met by Senior Embassy Counselor.

RON : Maurya Sheraton Hotel and Towers

Diplomatic Enclave:
Sadar Patel Marg
New Delhi, India 110 021
Phone: 91-11-6112233
Fax: 91-11-613333

JANUARY 16 (WEDNESDAY) – New Delhi

JW Joins Party

8:05 am Depart Hotel for Roosevelt House, American Embassy Compound Shantipath, Chanakyapuri

8:15 am Breakfast with Ambassador Blackwill at Roosevelt House. Also present will be Deputy Chief of Mission (DCM)Al Thibault, Judith Ayres and Kelly Glazier

8:55 am Walk to American Embassy

9:00 am Meeting with U.S. Ambassador Robert Blackwill and Country Team. Also present will be Deputy Chief of Mission, U.S. AID Mission Director, and senior Embassy officials.

Purpose: Receive briefing from Ambassador on country context and discuss U.S. environment strategy for India. The Governor will also present EPA Certificate of Appreciation to the U.S.-Asia Environmental Partnership (U.S.-AEP) in connection with the organization's 10-year anniversary.

REV_00264064

Location: Ambassador's Conference Room
U.S. Embassy, Shantipath

10:30 am — Meeting with T.R. Baalu, Minister of Environment & Forests (MOEF)

Purpose: Accompanied by Judith Ayres and Kelly Glazier, the Governor will hold small, getting-to-know-you meeting with the Minister while the rest of the EPA delegation meets separately with Indian counterparts.

Location: MOEF to confirm location

11:00 am — Signing Ceremony for Memorandum of Understanding Between EPA and the Ministry of Environment and Forests (MOEF), and Follow-up Discussions with Minister of Environment and Forests

Purpose: The EPA-MOEF Memorandum of Understanding will provide a framework for long-term environmental cooperation in areas of mutual interest. It represents a significant deliverable in following up on President Bush's commitment to the Prime Minister. T.R. Baalu, India's Union Minister for Environment and Forests (MOEF), will sign for India.

Follow up discussions would review areas of planned and prospective cooperation to emphasize air quality (including greenhouse gas, black soot and NOx emission reductions), toxics (incl. POPs/PBTs), improving environmental governance, and children's environmental health.

Location: MOEF to confirm location.

11:30 am — [Press Conference] – strongly recommended by Ambassador Blackwill

12:30 pm — Luncheon Hosted by Ministry of Environment and Forests (CTW no remarks)

Attendees to be determined.

2:05 pm — Depart for meeting with Ministry of Power

2:15 pm — Courtesy Call on Minister Suresh Prabhu, Minister for Power, and possibly new Minister for Non-Conventional Energy.

Location: Minister's Office, Shram Shakti-Bhavan, Rafi Marg, New Delhi 110 011

REV_00264065

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

December 14, 2001

file

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: CONDOLEEZZA RICE SCR for

SUBJECT: Request for White House Mission Designation for Dr. Zalmay Khalilzad

Request approval of the following White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Condoleezza Rice.

2. Purpose of the Trip: In furtherance of the President's foreign policy objectives regarding the continuing situation in Afghanistan, Special Assistant to the President Khalilzad will lead a delegation to Tashkent, Kabul, Islamabad, Mazar-e Sharif, Herat, Bamian, Jalalabad, New Delhi, and Kandahar. Due to unavailability of commercial transportation request military transportation on appropriate military aircraft on a non-reimbursable basis.

3. 24-hour Point of Contact: Kathy Cooper, 202-456-9121 (W); 24 hour contact through White House Situation Room 202-456-9431.

4. Travel Itinerary: Tashkent, Kabul, Islamabad, Mazar-e Sharif, Herat, Bamian, Jalalabad, and Kandahar.
   a. Dates: December 26, 2001 - January 9, 2002
   b. Requested Time of Departure: From Tashkent, Uzbekistan or Islamabad, Pakistan on or about December 26, 2001.

5. Total Number of Passengers: 3

6. Special Considerations: Dr Khalilzad will travel to Tashkent or Islamabad via commercial transportation. Final itinerary and timing will be flexible based on the developing situation in Afghanistan.

for NSN Reimbursement

APPROVED DISAPPROVED

JOSEPH HAGIN
[redacted]y Chief of Staff [redacted]

Cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

December 14, 2001

File

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: CONDOLEEZZA RICE

SUBJECT: Request White House Mission Designation for Presidential Delegation to Nicaraguan Inauguration January 10

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Secretary of State Powell.

2. Purpose of the Trip: A Cabinet member or high-level official TBD will head a delegation to the inauguration of the Nicaraguan President.

3. 24 hour Point of Contact: Maeve Dwyer, 647-3518 (until January 1; Vicky Alvarado, 647-1510 (after January 1); Arnold Chacon, 647-4292 (backup)

4. Travel Itinerary:

a. Dates: January 9-11, 2002

b. Requested Time of Departure: The aircraft will depart TBD from Andrews AFB on January 9, and depart from Nicaragua TBD on January 11, 2002, for Andrews AFB.

5. Total Number of Passengers: The SAM aircraft should support 10-15 passengers.

6. Special Considerations: None.

APPROVED / DISAPPROVED

[redacted]SIN
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

for NONreimbursable per Atte

Attachment
Incoming Correspondence

cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

S/S 200129083 9329

United States Department of State

Washington, D.C. 20520
www.state.gov

December 14, 2001

UNCLASSIFIED

MEMORANDUM FOR STEPHEN E. BIEGUN
EXECUTIVE SECRETARY
NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL

Subject: Request for Special Air Missions Aircraft

The NSC has recommended that a 10-15 member presidential delegation, headed by a Cabinet member, be appointed to attend the January 10 inauguration of president-elect Enrique Bolaños, in Managua, Nicaragua. The delegation will convey the U.S. Government's support for the new Nicaraguan president, elected in a free and fair electoral process that constituted an historic step toward consolidation of democracy in Nicaragua, and will signal the USG's intention to remain engaged in the region.

The exact composition of the delegation is currently being determined, but is unlikely to become final until close to departure time. In order to ensure that an appropriate delegation can be assembled, the Department of State requests that a Special Air Missions Aircraft be made available on a non-reimbursable basis, from January 9 through January 11, to transport the delegation from Washington to Managua and return. Because Cabinet members generally have very demanding schedules and commercial air schedules are unreliable and time-consuming, using a commercial flight is not a viable option.

This request has been cleared by the State Department's Office of the Legal Adviser.

Maura Harty
Executive Secretary

UNCLASSIFIED

REV_00264074

S/S 200129083

United States Department of State

Washington, D.C. 20520
www.state.gov

December 14, 2001

UNCLASSIFIED

MEMORANDUM FOR STEPHEN E. BIEGUN
EXECUTIVE SECRETARY
NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL

Subject: Request for Special Air Missions Aircraft

The NSC has recommended that a 10-15 member presidential delegation, headed by a Cabinet member, be appointed to attend the January 10 inauguration of president-elect Enrique Bolaños, in Managua, Nicaragua. The delegation will convey the U.S. Government's support for the new Nicaraguan president, elected in a free and fair electoral process that constituted an historic step toward consolidation of democracy in Nicaragua, and will signal the USG's intention to remain engaged in the region.

The exact composition of the delegation is currently being determined, but is unlikely to become final until close to departure time. In order to ensure that an appropriate delegation can be assembled, the Department of State requests that a Special Air Missions Aircraft be made available on a non-reimbursable basis, from January 9 through January 11, to transport the delegation from Washington to Managua and return. Because Cabinet members generally have very demanding schedules and commercial air schedules are unreliable and time-consuming, using a commercial flight is not a viable option.

This request has been cleared by the State Department's Office of the Legal Adviser.

Maura Harty
Executive Secretary

UNCLASSIFIED

REV_00264075

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: CONDOLEEZZA RICE SCB for

SUBJECT: Request for White House Mission to Crawford, Texas

Request approval of the following White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Condoleezza Rice.

2. Purpose of the Trip: To take White House and Russian pre-advance teams to Crawford, Texas to survey sites on the itinerary for Russian President Vladimir Putin's visit to President Bush's ranch in November 2001.

3. 24-hour NSC Point of Contact: Mary Haines 202-456-9461

4. Travel Itinerary: Washington to Texas to Washington
   a. Dates: TBD in October 2001
   b. Requested Time of Departure: TBD

5. Total Number of Passengers: approximately 40

6. Special Considerations: The President invited Russian President and Mrs. Vladimir Putin to his ranch in November 2001. On September 7, 2001, the Political Counselor from the Russian Embassy asked NSC staff if a Russian pre-advance team from Moscow could visit the sites on President Putin's itinerary in Texas. A White House team will accompany the Russian team to Texas in September or October 2001. The use of commercial air transportation is not feasible due to time constraints of the two teams and the unavailability of acceptable connections.

APPROVED/DISAPPROVED

JOSEPH HAGIN
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

Cc: ✓White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations
Director, Advance Office
Director of Appointments and Scheduling

THE WHITE HOUSE
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

Date: 8/20/01

To: Al Gonzales

From: MM&A

- ☐ For Your Information
- ☑ For Your Files
- ☐ As Requested
- ☐ For Your Comments and Suggestions
- ☐ For Your Signature
- ☐ Please Return
- ☐ Please Handle

Other Remarks:

Document Originally Attached to Following Page

July 20, 2001

MEMORANDUM FOR: JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: JOE ALLBAUGH, DIRECTOR OF FEDERAL EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT AGENCY, (FEMA)

SUBJECT: Request White House Mission Designation for Travel

1. Requesting Principal: Joe Allbaugh, Director of FEMA

2. Purpose of trip: At the request of the President, Director Allbaugh and Secretary Venaman, will attend the Memorial Service of four deceased firefights killed during the "Thirty Mile Fire" in Wanatchee, WA. and return. The Memorial service will be held in Yakima, WA on July 24, 2001

3. Point-of-contact: Kevin Caulfield, Special Assistant to Director Allbaugh, PRA 6

4. Travel Itinerary:

Tuesday, July 24, 2001
9:40 A.M. (EDT) Tuesday, July 24, 2001
Depart Andrews Air Force Base for Yakima, WA

11:45 A.M. (PDT) Tuesday, July 24, 2001
Arrive Yakima, WA, Attend Fire Briefing at Airport

2:00 P.M. (PDT) Tuesday, July 24, 2001
Attend Memorial Service at Yakima Sun Dome

4:00 P.M. (PDT) Tuesday, July 24, 2001
Depart Yakima, WA

4:35 P.M. (PDT) Tuesday, July 24, 2001
Arrive Boeing Field (Seattle, WA)

6:00P.M. (PDT) Tuesday, July 24, 2001
Visit injured firefighter Jason Emhoff at Harbor View Hospital Burn Unit

RON

Wednesday, July 25, 2001
10:00 A.M. (PDT) Wednesday, July 25, 2001
Depart Boeing Field

12:15 P.M. (MDT) Wednesday, July 24, 2001
Arrive Missoula, MT

2:30 P.M. (MDT) Wednesday, July 24, 2001
Depart Missoula, MT

9:30 P.M. (EDT) Wednesday, July 2001
Arrive Andrews Air Force Base

5. Number of passengers: Pending, with a maximum of 12 passingers

6. Special Considerations: This is a White House Designated flight from Andrews Air Force Base to Yakima, WA. The Yakima to Boeing Field (Seattle, WA) leg is FEMA related and FEMA will pay for this part of the trip. The Boeing Field to Missoula, MT leg is Department of Agriculture related and will be paid for by the Department of Agriculture. The Missoula to Andrews Air Force Base leg is once again a White House Designated flight.

Review:

HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
Deputy Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

Approval: Disapproval

APPROVED
Joseph Hagin
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

Cc: White House Council
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, white House Airlift Operations
Cabinet Secreatary

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

Brett

August 3, 2001

MEMORANDUM FOR JOE HAGIN
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: ALBERT HAWKINS
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND SECRETARY TO THE CABINET

HECTOR IRASTORZA, JR
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: SECRETARY ANN VENEMAN

SUBJECT: REQUEST FOR WHITE HOUSE MISSION DESIGNATION FOR TRAVEL

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principals: Secretary Ann Veneman and Ambassador Bob Zoellick

2. Purpose of the Trip: To represent the United States at the 22nd Cairns Group Ministerial Meeting in Punta del Este, Uruguay. Due to the following factors I am requesting this designation:

   Designation as a Presidential Mission is necessary in order to secure a USG aircraft, without which the trip will not be possible because of scheduling conflicts with the U.S.-Mexico Binational Commission meeting scheduled for September 5.

   The Cairns Group Ministerial was originally scheduled for September 4-5, but has been rearranged to accommodate Ambassador Zoellick and myself. We will participate in the Ministerial on September 3 and have an opportunity for bilaterals on the morning of September 4.

   Ambassador Zoellilck and I need to be in Washington on September 5 to brief Presidents Bush and Fox on the results of our activities under the U.S.-Mexico Binational Commission. Use of commercial aircraft would not allow us to return in time for the meeting with the Presidents on the 5th. If this trip is designated as a Presidential Mission we will be able to use a USG aircraft and return to Washington on the evening of September 4.

3. 24 Hour Point of Contact:

Chief of Staff Dale Moore (202-720-7971 office; PRA 6
PRA 6

4. Travel Itinerary:
   - Depart Washington, D.C. the morning of Sunday, September 2, 2001, arriving in Moldonado, Uruguay, in the late evening.
   - Depart Punta del Este on Tuesday, September 4, in the early afternoon, arriving in Washington, D.C., in the late evening.

5. Total number of passengers: The U.S. delegation would include participants from the Department of Agriculture, the Office of the United States trade Representative and perhaps the State Department and the NSC.

REVIEW:

HECTOR IRASTORZA, JR.
Deputy Assistant to the president for Management and Administration

APPROVAL:

APPROVED 8/6/01 DISAPPROVED

JOE HAGIN ANDREW H. CARD, JR.
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

Cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations
Cabinet Affairs

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20220

MONDAY, AUGUST 6, 2001

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: TIM ADAMS, CHIEF OF STAFF
US DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

SUBJECT: Request White House Mission Designation for Travel

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Secretary Paul O'Neill, US Department of the Treasury

2. Purpose of the trip: For Secretary O'Neill to take the Administration's vision for increasing productivity to developing African nations. Available commercial airline traffic is incompatible with the planned itinerary. Travelling between countries on the African continent involves either transit back to Europe or making stops in locations well outside the desired travel route. Transit opportunities are also unreliable within the interior of the African continent. In addition, there is the distinct possibility that there will be officials from other agencies as well as Members of Congress travelling with the Secretary. The mission cannot be completed adequately if relying solely on commercial aviation.

3. 24 Hour Point of Contact: Reed Galen, Director of Advance, US Department of the Treasury

(202)622-0054 (office)

PRA 6

4. Travel Itinerary: a. Dates & Times

WDC to Dakar, Senegal	Oct. 14-15, 2001
	Dep. 7:00 pm EDT
	Arr. 7:00 am AST

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20220

4.	Travel Itinerary:	Dakar to Accra, Ghana	Oct. 15, 2001
			Dep. 7:00 pm
			Arr. 9:30 pm
		Accra to Entebbe, Uganda	Oct. 17, 2001
			Dep. 7:00 am
			Arr. 2:00 pm
		Entebbe to Johannesburg	Oct. 18, 2001
			Dep. 4:00 pm
			Arr. 10:00 pm
		Johannesburg to WDC	Oct. 20, 2001
			Dep. 9:00 am AST
			Arr. 7:00 pm EDT

5. Total Number of Passengers: 30

6. Special Considerations:

REVIEW:

HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, Jr.
Deputy Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

APPROVAL:

_____ _____
APPROVED DISAPPROVED
JOSEPH HAGIN
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

Cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

August 2, 2001

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: CONDOLEEZZA RICE Sent for

SUBJECT: Request for White House Mission Designation for U.S Trade Representative Zoellick to Travel from India to Indonesia

Request approval of the following White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Condoleezza Rice

2. Purpose of the Trip: To travel to Jakarta, Indonesia, to meet with Indonesia's President Megawati. Ambassador Zoellick will present President Megawati a letter from President Bush and convey the importance of a stable Indonesia to the United States.

3. 24 hour Point of Contact: B. Oglesby (202) 395-6850

4. Travel Itinerary: New Delhi, India to Jakarta, Indonesia

a. Dates: August 10, 2001
b. Requested Time of Departure: Depart New Delhi midday on August 10.

5. Total Number of Passengers: 6

6. Special Considerations: Ambassador Zoellick is meeting with Indian Prime Minister on August 10 in New Delhi and will meet with President Megawati in Jakarta on August 11. There are no commercial airline flights available from India to Jakarta which could transport Ambassador Zoellick to Jarkata in time to meet with President Megawati.

APPROVED/DISAPPROVED

JOSEPH HAGIN
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

Cc: White House Counsel
White House Cabinet Affairs
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20220

MONDAY, AUGUST 6, 2001

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: TIM ADAMS, CHIEF OF STAFF T.A.
US DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

SUBJECT: Request White House Mission Designation for Travel

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Secretary Paul O'Neill, US Department of the Treasury

2. Purpose of the trip: For Secretary O'Neill to take the Administration's vision for increasing productivity to developing African nations. Available commercial airline traffic is incompatible with the planned itinerary. Travelling between countries on the African continent involves either transit back to Europe or making stops in locations well outside the desired travel route. Transit opportunities are also unreliable within the interior of the African continent. In addition, there is the distinct possibility that there will be officials from other agencies as well as Members of Congress travelling with the Secretary. The mission cannot be completed adequately if relying solely on commercial aviation.

3. 24 Hour Point of Contact: Reed Galen, Director of Advance, US Department of the Treasury

(202)622-0054 (office)

PRA 6

4. Travel Itinerary: a. Dates & Times

WDC to Dakar, Senegal	Oct. 14-15, 2001
	Dep. 7:00 pm EDT
	Arr. 7:00 am AST

REV_00264087

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20220

4.	Travel Itinerary:	Dakar to Accra, Ghana	Oct. 15, 2001 Dep. 7:00 pm Arr. 9:30 pm
		Accra to Entebbe, Uganda	Oct. 17, 2001 Dep. 7:00 am Arr. 2:00 pm
		Entebbe to Johannesburg	Oct. 18, 2001 Dep. 4:00 pm Arr. 10:00 pm
		Johannesburg to WDC	Oct. 20, 2001 Dep. 9:00 am AST Arr. 7:00 pm EDT

5. Total Number of Passengers: 30

6. Special Considerations:

REVIEW:

HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, Jr.
Deputy Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

APPROVAL:

APPROVED _____ DISAPPROVED _____

~~JOSEPH HAGIN~~ ANDREW H. CARD, JR
~~Deputy~~ Chief of Staff ~~for Operations~~

Cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

REV_00264088

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

MEMORANDUM

TO: ANDREW H. CARD, JR.
CHIEF OF STAFF

THROUGH: HECTOR IRASTORZA
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: BRADLEY A. BLAKEMAN
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR APPOINTMENTS AND SCHEDULING

DATE: JULY 30, 2001

SUBJECT: MILITARY AIR REQUEST FOR TRAVEL TO ALASKA, JAPAN, SOUTH KOREA, CHINA, AND HAWAII

The President will travel to Asia in October. In direct support of the President's visit a Site Survey team will travel from Washington, DC to Alaska on Sunday, August 20, 2001. The Site Survey team will then travel to Tokyo, Japan; Seoul, South Korea; Shanghai and Beijing, China, and Oahu, Hawaii, finishing the trip in Washington, DC on Thursday, August 31, 2001. The use of commercial air transportation is not feasible due to time constraints on the team's travel itinerary and the unavailability of acceptable connections to the desired destinations. Request a military aircraft to transport approximately 34 members of the Site Survey team in accordance with the itinerary below.

August 20, 2001

8:00 am	Depart Andrews Air Force Base en route Anchorage, Alaska Flight Time: 7 hours, 10 min Time Change: -4
11:10 am	Arrive Anchorage, Alaska
3:30 pm	Depart Anchorage, Alaska en route Tokyo, Japan Flight Time: 7 hours, 45 min Time Change: +17

August 21, 2001

4:15 pm	Arrive Tokyo, Japan
RON	Tokyo, Japan

August 22, 2001
RON	Tokyo, Japan
August 23, 2001
3:00 pm	Depart Tokyo, Japan en route Seoul, Korea
	Flight Time: 1 hour, 30 min
	Time Change: NC
4:30 pm	Arrive Seoul, Korea
August 24, 2001
RON	Seoul, South Korea
August 25, 2001
3:00 pm	Depart Seoul, South Korea en route Shanghai, China
	Flight Time: 2 hour, 10 min
	Time Change: -1
4:10 pm	Arrive Shanghai, China
RON	Shanghai, China
August 26, 2001
RON	Shanghai, China
August 27, 2001
3:00pm	Depart Shanghai, China en route Beijing, China
	Flight Time: 1 hour, 40 min
	Time Change: NC
4:40pm	Arrive Beijing, China
RON	Beijing, China
August 28, 2001
RON	Beijing, China
August 29, 2001
3:00pm	Depart Beijing, China en route Oahu, Hawaii
	Flight Time: 9 hours, 45 min
	Time Change: -18
6:45am	Arrive Oahu, Hawaii
RON	Oahu, Hawaii
August 30, 2001
RON	Oahu, Hawaii

August 31, 2001

7:00am	Depart TBD, Hawaii en route Washington, DC
	Flight Time: 9 hours, 35 min
	Time Change: +6 hours
10:35pm	Arrive Andrews Air Force Base
RON	Washington, DC

Helicopter support is also requested in countries as needed. — only as needed!.
It is respectfully requested that you approve the mission set forth.

APPROVE / DISAPPROVE

ANDREW H. CARD, JR
CHIEF OF STAFF

CC: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Director, Airlift Operations

Brett

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

July 30, 2001

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH W. HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: MARK V. ROSENKER
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DIRECTOR, WHITE HOUSE MILITARY OFFICE

SUBJECT: Request White House Mission Designation for Travel

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Mark V. Rosenker

2. Purpose of the trip: Former President Carter will be coming to Washington DC to meet with President Bush and participate in a Rose Garden event.

3. 24 hour Point of Contact: Nancy Konigsmark, PRA 6 or Julie Taub, PRA 6 Ext. 202

4. Travel Itinerary:
   a. Date: From Souther Field, GA to Andrews AFB and back to Souther Field, GA on 31 July 01.
   b. Requested time of departure: Departure time from Souther Field, GA to Andrews AFB will be at 0800L. Departure time from Andrews AFB back to Hartsfield will be TBD/NLT 1400L.

5. Total number of passengers: 5

6. Special considerations: Request received over the weekend to support Former President Carter.

Review:

HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, Jr.
Deputy Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

APPROVED

DISAPPROVED

JOSEPH W. HAGIN
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

Cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

REV_00264093

Cathy Alix

July 20, 2001

MEMORANDUM FOR: JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: JOE ALLBAUGH, DIRECTOR OF FEDERAL EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT AGENCY, (FEMA)

SUBJECT: Request White House Mission Designation for Travel

1. Requesting Principal: Joe Allbaugh, Director of FEMA

2. Purpose of trip: At the request of the President, Director Allbaugh and Secretary Venaman, will attend the Memorial Service of four deceased firefights killed during the "Thirty Mile Fire" in Wanatchee, WA. and return. The Memorial service will be held in Yakima, WA on July 24, 2001

3. Point-of-contact: Kevin Caulfield, Special Assistant to Director Allbaugh, PRA 6

4. Travel Itinerary:

Tuesday, July 24, 2001
9:40 A.M. (EDT) Tuesday, July 24, 2001
Depart Andrews Air Force Base for Yakima, WA

11:45 A.M. (PDT) Tuesday, July 24, 2001
Arrive Yakima, WA, Attend Fire Briefing at Airport

2:00 P.M. (PDT) Tuesday, July 24, 2001
Attend Memorial Service at Yakima Sun Dome

4:00 P.M. (PDT) Tuesday, July 24, 2001
Depart Yakima, WA

NO

4:35 P.M. (PDT) Tuesday, July 24, 2001
Arrive Boeing Field (Seattle, WA)

6:00P.M. (PDT) Tuesday, July 24, 2001
Visit injured firefighter Jason Emhoff at Harbor View Hospital Burn Unit

Michael Brown

PRA 6

RON

Wednesday, July 25, 2001
10:00 A.M. (PDT) Wednesday, July 25, 2001
Depart Boeing Field

12:15 P.M. (MDT) Wednesday, July 24, 2001
Arrive Missoula, MT

2:30 P.M. (MDT) Wednesday, July 24, 2001
Depart Missoula, MT

9:30 P.M. (EDT) Wednesday, July 2001
Arrive Andrews Air Force Base

5. Number of passengers: Pending, with a maximum of 12 passingers

6. Special Considerations: This is a White House Designated flight from Andrews Air Force Base to Yakima, WA. The Yakima to Boeing Field (Seattle, WA) leg is FEMA related and FEMA will pay for this part of the trip. The Boeing Field to Missoula, MT leg is Department of Agriculture related and will be paid for by the Department of Agriculture. The Missoula to Andrews Air Force Base leg is once again a White House Designated flight.

Review:

HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
Deputy Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

Approval: _____ Disapproval _____

APPROVED
Joseph Hagin
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

Cc: White House Council
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, white House Airlift Operations
Cabinet Secreatary

DI C11

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

August 3, 2001

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH W. HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: MARK V. ROSENKER
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DIRECTOR, WHITE HOUSE MILITARY OFFICE

SUBJECT: Request for Presidential Executive Airlift Support

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:

Requesting Principal: Mark V. Rosenker.

Purpose of the trip: provide transport for Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, Dr. Condoleezza Rice between Washington DC, Palo Alto, California, White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia and Waco, Texas, as required when directed by the President from 5 August through 1 September, 2001. Due to scheduling constraints, commercial aircraft accommodations are not available on a timely basis.

24-hour point of contact (POC): Airlift Operations director on-call. Contact through White House Signal Switchboard, at (202) 757-6000.

Travel Itinerary:

a. Dates: TBD, as directed by the President from 5 August 01 through 1 September 01.

b. Requested time of departure: to be coordinated through White House Airlift Operations on a case-by-case basis.

Total number of passengers: TBD.

Special considerations: N/A.

REVIEW:

HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, Jr.
Deputy Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

APPROVED _____ DISAPPROVED _____

JOSEPH W. HAGIN
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

Cc:
White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

REV_00264097

Brett

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

August 3, 2001

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH W. HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR.
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: MARK V. ROSENKER
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DIRECTOR, WHITE HOUSE MILITARY OFFICE

SUBJECT: Request for Presidential Executive Airlift Support

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:

Requesting Principal: Mark V. Rosenker.

Purpose of the trip: provide transport for White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card between Portland, Maine, and Waco, Texas, as required when directed by the President from 5 August through 31 August, 2001. Due to scheduling constraints, commercial aircraft accommodations are not available on a timely basis.

24-hour point of contact (POC): Airlift Operations director on-call. Contact through White House Signal Switchboard, at (202) 757-6000.

Travel Itinerary:

a. Dates: TBD, as directed by the President from 5 August 01 through 31 August 01.

b. Requested time of departure: to be coordinated through White House Airlift Operations on a case-by-case basis.

Total number of passengers: TBD.

Special considerations: N/A.

REVIEW:

HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, Jr.
Deputy Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

APPROVED

DISAPPROVED

JOSEPH W. HAGIN
Assistant to the President and
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

Cc:
White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

REV_00264099

Brett

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

October 4, 2001

MEMORANDUM FOR JOE HAGIN
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: ALBERT HAWKINS AH
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND SECRETARY TO THE CABINET

FROM: SECRETARY DON EVANS

SUBJECT: REQUEST FOR WHITE HOUSE MISSION DESIGNATION FOR TRAVEL

Request approval of the following proposed White House Mission:

1. Requesting Principal: Secretary Don Evans

2. Purpose of the Trip: To represent the United States on a trade mission with Russian leaders and the business community, to attend the Asia Pacific Economic Conference in Shanghai, China. Due to the following factors I am requesting this designation:

   1) Heightened safety and security concerns in this region, and ability for safe and swift return to the United States should circumstances arise, necessitate this request.

3. 24 Hour Point of Contact:

   - Director of External Affairs Darren Grubb (202-482-2158 office, PRA 6 cell, PRA 6

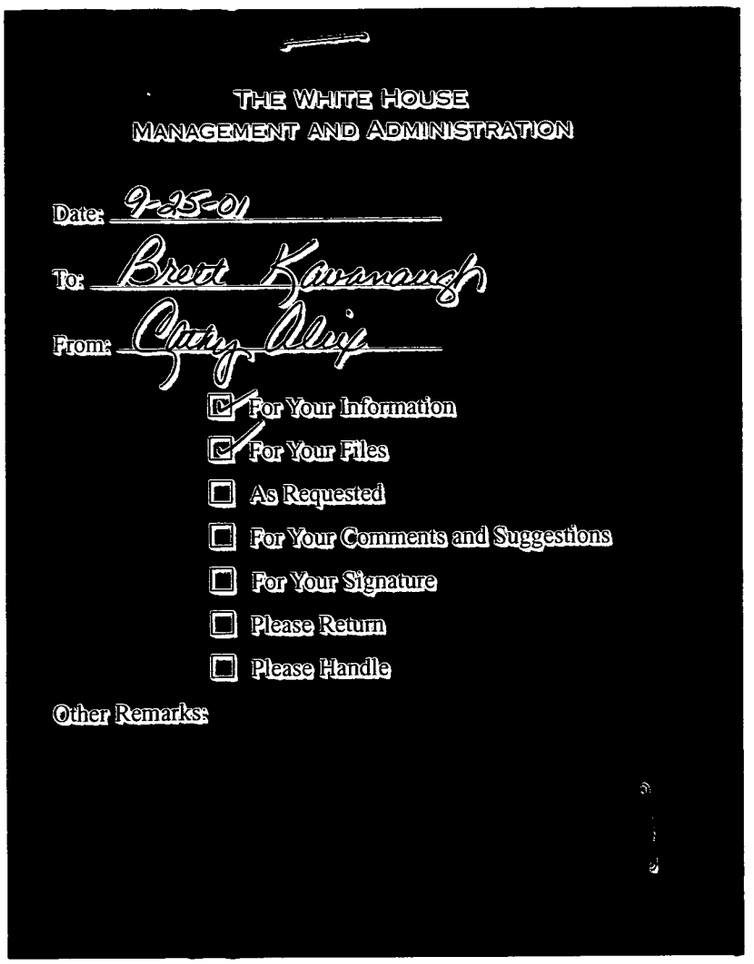
   - Director of Advance Sergio Gutierrez (202-482-5880 office, PRA 6)

4. Travel Itinerary
   a) Dates: October 12-20 (or return possibly October 19)
   b) Requested time of departure: the itinerary is not complete enough, but I anticipate a Friday evening October 12 departure from Washington and arrive Moscow Saturday afternoon October 13.
   c) Lead Trade Mission October 14-17

d) Depart Moscow October 17 arrive Shanghai, China October 18
e) Attend APEC Ministerial meetings October 18. Meet with Premier Zhu Rongji October 18 or 19 (depending on the Premier's schedule)
f) Depart Shanghai October 20 (or possibly October 19)

5. Total number of passengers: The Secretary's immediate delegation would be approximately 10-12 including security

REVIEW:



HECTOR IRASTORZA, JR.
Deputy Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

APPROVAL:

APPROVED ON A REIMBURSABLE BASIS DISAPPROVED

SECRETARY ANDREW H. CARD, JR.
Chief of Staff to the President

CC: ✓White House Counsel
Cabinet Secretary
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

THE WHITE HOUSE
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

Date: 9-25-01

To: Brett Kavanaugh

From: Gary Walker

- [x] For Your Information
- [x] For Your Files
- [ ] As Requested
- [ ] For Your Comments and Suggestions
- [ ] For Your Signature
- [ ] Please Return
- [ ] Please Handle

Other Remarks:

Document Originally Attached to Following Page

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

05 September, 2001

MEMORANDUM FOR JOSEPH HAGIN
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF FOR OPERATIONS

THROUGH: HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, JR
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR
MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

FROM: MARK V. ROSENKER
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND DIRECTOR OF THE WHITE HOUSE MILITARY OFFICE

SUBJECT: Request White House Mission Designation for the White House Historical Society

1. White House Designated mission status is requested for the use of a Presidential Helicopter (VH-3D) for the unique purpose of filming documentary footage for distribution to television networks.

2. Purpose of the event: To enhance the accuracy of file footage depicting the Presidential Pilots view from Marine One.

3. 24 hour Point Of Contact: White House Military Office.

4. Travel Itinerary
   a. Dates:6 September
   b. Requested time of departure: 1330 from Anacostia Facility, MD to White House South Lawn and surrounding Washington D.C. area to Anacostia Facility, MD

5. Total number of passengers: (5)

REVIEW:

HECTOR F. IRASTORZA, Jr.
Deputy Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

APPROVAL:

APPROVED DISAPPROVED

JOSEPH HAGIN
Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations

Cc: White House Counsel
Director, White House Military Office
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
Director, White House Airlift Operations

REV_00264104

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

[Treasury Department Policy on Communications with the White House Concerning Open Investigations]

Box C01
Folder 8

OA/NARA#: 2162/2073
9692

Brett

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY
OFFICE OF THE GENERAL COUNSEL

June 6, 2001

FAX TRANSMITTAL

To: Tim Flanigan
Fax No.: 456-6279

From: Stephen J. McHale
Tel. No.: (202) 622-0287

No. of pages: 4 (including cover sheet)

Subject: Dept Treasury Policy on Communications with the White House Concerning Open Investigations

Comments: David Aufhauser asked me to send this to you.

If you receive this document in error or the transmission is incomplete, please contact the sender immediately.

BY ORDER OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

TREASURY ORDER 107-05

DATE: March 02, 1995

REAFFIRMED: December 2, 1999

SUNSET REVIEW: December 02, 2004

SUBJECT: Communications with the White House Regarding Open Investigations, Adjudications or Civil and Criminal Enforcement Actions

By virtue of my authority as Secretary of the Treasury, including the authority contained in 31 U.S.C. 321(b) and 5 U.S.C. 301 and 302, I hereby issue the following procedures for communications between the Department of the Treasury and the White House regarding open Department investigations, adjudications or civil or criminal enforcement actions.

1. GENERAL PROCEDURES.

a. General Policy. In order to ensure the President's ability to perform his constitutional obligation to Take care that the laws be faithfully executed, it is the policy of the Treasury Department to provide the White House with information on open investigations, adjudications, or civil (including administrative or regulatory) or criminal enforcement actions pending before or within any regulatory or law enforcement agency within the Department, where important for the performance of the President's duties, where appropriate from a law enforcement and regulatory perspective and where consistent with these procedures.

b. Referral Procedures. The below listed procedures are established to ensure the flow of appropriate information between the Department and the White House. Central to these procedures is the need for consultation with Department senior policy officials[1], including the General Counsel. The General Counsel is authorized to issue more detailed guidance should he or she determine it to be necessary.

(1) Action to be Taken by Department Employees/Senior Policy Officials. If a Department employee determines that a matter involving an open investigation, adjudication, or enforcement action under his or her jurisdiction should be communicated to the White House, he or she shall inform, through the appropriate Department senior policy official, the General Counsel about this maker.

OPI: AGC (Enforcement)

[1]Department senior policy officials shall include those Treasury officials at the Assistant Secretary level and above as set forth in Treasury Order 10145 and the organization chart attached thereto.

(2) Action to be Taken by Treasury Bureau Employees/Bureau Heads. If an employee of a Treasury law enforcement or financial regulatory bureau or the Office of Foreign Assets Control ("Treasury Bureaus") believes that a matter involving an open investigation, adjudication or enforcement action under his or her jurisdiction should be communicated to the White House, he or she shall contact, through the Treasury Bureau head, the Department senior policy official to whom that Treasury Bureau head directly reports. If the senior policy official concurs with that recommendation, he or she shall then inform the General Counsel about this matter.

(3) General Counsel Review and Final Determination. The General Counsel shall provide the Department senior policy official with his or her recommendation concerning the advisability of disclosing the information to the White House. The General Counsel is authorized to preclude transmittal of the information on legal or ethical grounds. If the General Counsel believes that disclosure should not be made based on other than legal or ethical grounds, the General Counsel shall inform the appropriate senior policy official of this recommendation.

(4) Other Final Determinations. Unless precluded on legal or ethical grounds by the General Counsel, the Department senior policy official referred to in paragraph 1.b.(1) or 1.b.(2) shall make the final determination on whether the information should be communicated to the White House. If the Department senior policy official determines that such information should be communicated to the White House, he or she shall request the General Counsel to make the initial communication.

c. Communications.

(1) Initial Contact with White House. Initial communications between the White House and the Treasury Department regarding any pending Department investigation, adjudication or criminal or civil enforcement action shall involve only the Counsel to the President or the Deputy Counsel and the General Counsel or the Deputy General Counsel. No Treasury or bureau employee shall initiate communications on these matters with the White House other than as provided in paragraph 1.c. Any Treasury or bureau employee in possession of information pertaining to any pending criminal referrals and criminal investigations shall keep the information in strict confidence and shall not disclose the information to any person except in accordance with applicable law, Treasury standards and this Order.

(2) Continuing Contact. After the initial contact, further contact on a matter deemed appropriate for communications pursuant to this Order shall be directed to the White House Counsel's Office by the General Counsel, the Deputy General Counsel or the appropriate senior policy official designated by the General Counsel or any other lawyer in the Office of the General Counsel, as designated by the General Counsel.

d. Writing Requirements. All proposals and decisions involving open Department investigations, adjudications or enforcement actions discussed herein that either propose or result in communications with the White House shall be detailed in contemporaneous, written memoranda.

(1) Treasury Bureau Heads and Department Senior Policy Officials. All requests from Treasury Bureau Heads to Department senior policy officials and from Department senior policy officials to the General Counsel requesting a communication to the White House concerning an open investigation, adjudication or enforcement action shall be in writing. Such memoranda shall explain why the communication of information is important for the performance of the President's duties and appropriate from a law enforcement perspective.

(2) General Counsel. The General Counsel shall also issue in writing his or her legal or ethical recommendation to the appropriate Department senior policy official in response to such request for communication with the White House.

(3) Emergency Situations. If an emergency situation is present, the memoranda requested by paragraph 1.d. may be prepared as soon as practicable thereafter.

e. Information Requests by the White House. Requests by the White House for information concerning open Department investigations, adjudications or civil or criminal enforcement actions shall be referred in all cases to the General Counsel. The General Counsel shall ensure that such requests are processed consistent with the provisions of this Order and any applicable White House guidance.

2. OPEN INVESTIGATIONS, ADJUDICATIONS OR ENFORCEMENT ACTIONS DIRECTLY INVOLVING THE WHITE HOUSE.

a. Contacts Directly Involving the White House. If the President, the Vice-President, a member of their families, a senior advisor or an employee of an office which the Chief of Staff (or any similar successor position) directly supervises, is an actual or potential subject, target or witness of an open investigation, adjudication or enforcement action under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Bureaus, the determination of whether it is appropriate to disclose this information to the White House shall be made in accordance with this Order taking into consideration, among other things, the following:

(1) whether disclosure would detrimentally affect the fundamental operation of an agency or other organization in the executive branch of the federal government;

(2) whether disclosure of the information would promote or reduce the public confidence and trust in the integrity of elected officials and public servants or the Department's regulatory and law enforcement activities;

(3) whether there exists an immediate threat of harm or injury to White House persons or property which disclosure will help to avoid;

(4) whether the matter involves any sensitive or urgent national security or foreign policy concern that should be brought to the White House's attention;

(5) whether disclosure of the information would interfere or assist with the Department's law enforcement and regulatory mission or an ongoing law enforcement or regulatory activity; and

(6) whether non-disclosure could cause the White House to convey inaccurate or misleading information to the public.

b. Secretary/Deputy Secretary Consultation. The Deputy Secretary shall be informed prior to any Department communications with the White House involving the matters subject to paragraph 2. The Deputy Secretary, in turn, may consult with the Secretary. The Secretary or Deputy Secretary may consult with the Attorney General or any other appropriate senior government official concerning the advisability of such disclosure or non-disclosure.

c. Procedures. Subject to the procedures specified in paragraph 2., the procedures described in paragraph 1. herein shall apply to the communications described in paragraph 2.

3. SCOPE. In the day-to-day functioning of the Department, there exist activities necessary to carry out the Department's law enforcement and regulatory mission. These may include routine law enforcement contacts, including administrative and regulatory contacts, designed to collect information through document requests, interviews, depositions or otherwise. Nothing in this Order shall be construed to amend the Department's current approach with respect to its handling of these routine activities.

In addition, the procedures set forth in this Order do not apply to the following circumstances.

a. Any communication subject to a specific statutory provision prohibiting or governing the disclosure of the information. (am, e.gr., 12 U.S.C. 1462a(b)(3) and 26 U.S.C. 6103.)

b. Communications between the Secret Service and the White House concerning the Service's protective responsibilities.

c. Communications between a Treasury Bureau and the National Security Council concerning open investigations or cases, if such disclosure is necessary for the conduct, determination or coordination of national security or foreign policy issues.

d. Communications between the Department and the White House appropriate to properly respond to inquiries or requests for information or documents in the form of (I) civil and criminal discovery requests; (ii) subpoenas, including but not limited to, grand jury and congressional; (iii) other congressional requests for documents and information; and (iv) any other requests for information and documents authorized by law; provided that the exception created by paragraph 3.d. shall not apply to requests for information pertaining to those officials and individuals identified in paragraph 2. who are the subject, target or witness in an open investigation, adjudication or enforcement action.

e. Communications between the Department and the White House appropriate to formulate an Administration position with respect to judicial review or settlement of pending litigation.

f. Tax, security and background checks on prospective Federal employees and appointees, including Executive and Judicial Branch appointments under consideration by the President or the Department.

g. Communications between the Inspector General or his or her authorized officials and the White House in furtherance of the duties and responsibilities of the Inspector General undertaken pursuant to the Inspector General Act of 1978, 5 U.S.C.A. App. 3.

Robert E. Rubin

Secretary of the Treasury

REV_00264110

Trophy Mart

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 2165/2076
9695

Box 61
Folder 9

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

April 25, 2002

MEMORANDUM FOR HARRIET MIERS

FROM: BRETT KAVANAUGH BK

SUBJECT: Request for Use of President's Signature for Crime Victims Awards Plaques

Attached is an agreement signed by me that would authorize Trophy Mart to use the President's signature for the crime victims award plaques, as requested in the attached letter from the Attorney General that your Office forwarded to Counsel's Office. Unless you would prefer a different approach, your Office may send the agreement to Trophy Mart for its signature and also send the signature templates.

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

AGREEMENT

By this agreement, the White House Office authorizes Trophy Mart to use the Presidential template and inscription for Crime Victims Awards plaques ordered by the Office for Victims of Crime of the United States Department of Justice. Trophy Mart agrees that this authorization applies only to the plaques requested by the Office for Victims of Crime. Trophy Mart also agrees that it may not alter the signature or use it in any other manner whatsoever without the written approval of the White House Office.

Brett M. Kavanaugh DATE: April 25, 2002

Brett M. Kavanaugh
Associate Counsel to the President

_____ DATE: _____

for Trophy Mart

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

[United States District Court for the District of South Carolina]

Box 61
Folder 10

OA/NARA #: 1825/1743
9633

REV_00264113

REV_00264114

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

USTR (United States Trade Representative)
FOIA (Freedom of Information Act) Cases

OA/NARA#: 2181/2092
9801

Box 61
Folder 11

U.S. Department of Justice

Office of the Associate Attorney General

Washington, D.C. 20530

January 7, 2003

MEMORANDUM FOR BRETT M. KAVANAUGH
Associate Counsel to President

FROM: Peter D. Keisler PDK
Acting Associate Attorney Geneeral

SUBJECT: USTR Cases

As discussed, attached are: (1) the District Court in Center for International Environment Law v. Office of the United States Trade Representative, and (2) American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations v. George W. Bush.

Attachments

determines that unauthorized disclosure "reasonably could be expected to result in damage to the national security," and the original classification authority is "able to identify or describe the damage." Exec. Order No. 12, 958, § 1.2(a), 60 Fed.Reg. 19,825 (Apr. 17, 1995), reprinted in the Historical and Statutory Notes to 50 U.S.C. § 435 (West Supp.2002); see Salisbury v. United States, 690 F.2d 966, 972 (D.C.Cir.1982). While the Court determines de novo whether the records have been properly withheld, a court must give "substantial weight" to agency declarations and affidavits in determining whether records have been properly classified, so long as those declarations "contain reasonable specificity in detail." Halperin v. Central Intelligence Agency, 629 F.2d 144, 148 (D.C.Cir.1980); see American Civil Liberties Union v. Department of Justice, 548 F.Supp. 219, 222 (D.D.C.1982); Iglesias v. Central Intelligence Agency, 525 F.Supp. 547, 552 (D.D.C.1981).

12 The Court has reviewed the declarations submitted by defendants in support of the claimed exemption and concludes that defendants properly invoked Exemption 1 to withhold these five documents. In his declaration in support of the classification and withholding of these documents, Assistant United States Trade Representative Joseph Papovich affirmed the proper classification of all five documents pursuant to Executive Order 12, 958. See Def. Mem., Exhibit 3, Declaration of Joseph Papovich ¶ 6 ("Papovich Decl."). With respect to three of the withheld documents (Documents 211, 212 and 213), Mr. Papovich explained:

> The issues brought to the TPRG [Trade Policy Review Group] are often sensitive and controversial. In connection with the U.S.-Chile free trade negotiations, one issue that came before the TPRG was the U.S. negotiating position on rules and procedures governing foreign investment. Foreign investment rules and procedures have generated considerable controversy in the United States and abroad. Historically, foreign investment has been a particularly controversial issue in Latin America. Documents 211, 212, and 213 are TPRG papers that address proposed U.S.-Chile investment rules.... Public release of documents 211, 212, and 213 would reveal high-level internal government deliberations on foreign investment issues and thus undermine the U.S. government's ability to debate and resolve some of the most complex and sensitive issues at stake in the negotiations. Disclosure of these documents would not only expose U.S. legal, policy, and strategic analysis of these issues, but also differing agency viewpoints on key investment rules and procedures. If information of that kind were in the public sector, it would permit other governments with which the United States is seeking to negotiate investment rules to gauge the strength of U.S. negotiating positions and exploit interagency differences. Accordingly, disclosure of these documents would make it considerably more difficult for U.S. negotiators to conclude a free trade agreements [sic] with other governments that fully secure U.S. economic interests.
>
> Id. at ¶¶ 5, 7.

As to the remaining two classified documents, Documents 209 and 214, Mr. Papovich stated:

> Revealing the TPRG's discussions concerning exceptions [to be included in the Free Trade Agreement] and competition could undermine U.S. negotiating positions and make it more difficult to conclude the agreement. Moreover, although the TPRG deliberations on both these subjects were initiated in the context of the Chile FTA, they have important implications for current and future U.S. economic relations with other trading partners.... The disclosure of these documents would pose a serious risk of harm to our relations with U.S. trading partners.... If high-level internal discussions on these topics were made public, it might be understood to signal a change in U.S. policy in these areas and raise questions about the U .S. government's willingness to apply current standards. Hence, the release of these documents could seriously harm diplomatic relations with our trading partners.
>
> 13 Id. at ¶¶ 8-10.

Based on these statements, the Court concludes that Joseph Papovich's declaration "describe[s] the documents withheld and the justifications for nondisclosure in enough detail and with sufficient specificity to demonstrate that material withheld is logically within the domain of the exemption claimed," and is "neither controverted by contrary record evidence nor impugned by bad faith on the part of the agency." King v. Dep't of Justice, 830 F.2d 210, 217 (D.C.Cir.1980). Because defendants have demonstrated proper classification pursuant to Executive Order 12,958 and a reasonable expectation of harm to national security if these documents are publicly released, the Court finds that Documents 209 and 211-214 properly were withheld pursuant to Exemption 1. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1); Exec. Order No. 12,958, § 1.2(a), 60 Fed.Reg. 19,825 (Apr. 17, 1995); see also Halperin v. Central Intelligence Agency, 629 F.2d at 148.

Copr. © West 2003 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

3. Waiver by Public Disclosure

Plaintiffs argue that irrespective of the Court's rulings under Exemptions 1 and 5, certain documents (at least 14 in number) must be disclosed on the ground that defendants have waived the right to assert either exemption for these documents by publicly releasing information similar to that contained in the documents. See Pl. Mem. at 26, 29 n. 12; Pl. Reply at 14-16. Based on two letters written to USTR by four individuals, plaintiffs claim that USTR released information to these individuals relating to United States proposals and certain inter-agency communications concerning the investment provisions of the proposed trade agreement. See Pl. Mot, Exhibit 6, Letter from Tom Niles to Peter Allgeier, USTR, dated November 19, 2001 ("Niles Letter"); Pl. Reply, Exhibit 1, Letter from Thomas Niles, U.S. Council for International Business; Calman Cohen, Emergency Committee for American Trade; William Reinsch, National Foreign Trade Council; and Jerry Jasinowski, National Association of Manufacturers, to Robert Zoellick, USTR, dated August 30, 2001 ("Niles, Cohen, Reinsch and Jasinowski Letter").

Furthermore, plaintiffs assert that defendants have failed to describe the withheld documents with sufficient specificity to enable plaintiffs to identify those that relate to the publicly disclosed information. Id. at 16.

Because the Court has held that those documents withheld by defendants under Exemption 5 are not "inter-agency" and thus are not protected by that exemption, see supra, Section II.B.1, the Court need not address plaintiffs' waiver argument with respect to such documents. As to those documents withheld under Exemption 1, the Court finds that plaintiffs have failed to demonstrate waiver because they have not satisfied their "initial burden of pointing to specific information in the public domain that appears to duplicate that being withheld." Afshar v. Dep't of State, 702 F .2d 1125, 1130 (D.C.Cir.1983); see also Public Citizen v. Dep't of State, 11 F.3d 198, 201 (D.C.Cir.1993) ("FOIA plaintiffs cannot simply show that similar information has been released, but must establish that a specific fact already has been placed in the public domain."). Although plaintiffs suggest that defendants have disclosed "in great detail proposals being considered for investment provisions in U.S. free trade agreements," the letters upon which plaintiffs base this argument do not contain or reference any specific information. Instead, the letters merely reflect the authors' belief that certain issues are under consideration by the Trade Policy Review Group, with no indication of specific agency positions or TPRG's analysis of the issues. See Niles Letter; Niles, Cohen, Reinsch and Jasinowski Letter; Def. Opp. at 11-12.

*14 Furthermore, USTR directly refutes plaintiff's claim of waiver with the declaration of Frances Huegel, Director of Investment for USTR. See Def. Surreply, Exhibit 1, Declaration of Frances Huegel ("Huegel Decl."). Huegel, who has direct knowledge of the briefing sessions and information releases upon which plaintiffs base their claim of waiver, clearly stated that "[d]uring these sessions, the USTR did not provide its own views as to the pros and cons of maintaining, amending, or eliminating NAFTA-like provisions on investment with respect to the proposed United States-Chile Free Trade Agreement." Huegel Decl. at ¶¶ 1-3, 5.

Plaintiffs' claim also is belied by the sworn declarations of Susan P. Cronin and Joseph Papovich, USTR officials familiar with the requested documents and the ongoing negotiations with Chile. See Def. Mem., Exhibit 2, Declaration of Susan P. Cronin ("Cronin Decl."); Papovich Decl. Both Cronin and Papovich stated that, to the best of their knowledge, the documents withheld in response to plaintiffs' request "have not been circulated outside the executive branch" other than to the Chilean government and trade advisory committees established pursuant to statute as advisors to USTR. Cronin Decl. at ¶¶ 21-26; Papovich Decl. at ¶ 13.

In light of these sworn statements denying public disclosure and plaintiffs' failure to present evidence of "specific information in the public domain that appears to duplicate that being withheld," the Court concludes that defendants have not waived the right to claim Exemption 1 privilege for the contested documents. Afshar v. Dep't of State, 702 F.2d at 1130; see Public Citizen v. Dep't of State, 11 F.3d at 201, 203 (to show waiver of Exemption 1, plaintiff must demonstrate that "specific information at issue has been officially disclosed.... We recognize that this is a high hurdle for a FOIA plaintiff to clear, but the Government's vital interest in information relating to national security and foreign affairs dictates that it must be.") (emphasis in original); see also In re Sealed Case, 121 F.3d 729, 741 (D.C.Cir.1997) (waiver of executive privilege should not be lightly inferred; waiver applies only to documents that are identical to documents publicly released).

For all of these reasons, the Court grants in part and denies in part both plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment and defendants' motion for summary judgment. An Order consistent with this Opinion shall issue this same day.

Copr. © West 2003 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

SO ORDERED.

ORDER

For the reasons stated in the Opinion issued this same day, it is hereby

ORDERED that the Court GRANTS IN PART and DENIES IN PART plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment [8]; it is

FURTHER ORDERED that the Court GRANTS IN PART and DENIES IN PART defendants' motion for summary judgment [6]; it is FURTHER ORDERED that defendants are enjoined from withholding any documents produced by or shared with the Government of Chile during the negotiations of the United States-Chile Free Trade Agreement, including documents 9, 15, 16, 19, 23, 27-29, 52, 57, 89-94, 97, 99, 111, 124, 134, 141, 142, 145-149, 154, 156-59, 167, 173, 180-81, 186-191 and 215-280. Such documents shall be released to plaintiffs on or before January 17, 2003; it is

*15 FURTHER ORDERED that defendants are enjoined from withholding any reasonably segregable portions of documents produced by or shared with the Government of Chile during the negotiations of the United States-Chile Free Trade Agreement, including documents 22, 36, 130, 152, 153, 155, 156, 160-162, 164-166, 169-172, 176, 177, 182-185. Such documents shall be released to plaintiffs on or before January 17, 2003; it is FURTHER ORDERED that on or before January 17, 2003, defendants shall identify and release all reasonably segregable portions of documents containing factual information relating to communications to or from the Government of Chile during the negotiations of the United States-Chile Free Trade Agreement; it is

FURTHER ORDERED that defendants need not disclose any portions of documents 209, 211, 212, 213 and 214; and it is FURTHER ORDERED that this Order shall constitute a FINAL JUDGMENT in this case. This is a final appealable order. See Rule 4(a), Fed. R.App. P.

SO ORDERED.

2002 WL 31840970, 2002 WL 31840970 (D.D.C.)

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2003 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, 815 16th Street, N.W. Washington, D.C. 20006 Plaintiff,	Case No.
v.
George W. Bush, President of the United States, and Robert W. Zoellick, United States Trade Representative, Defendants.

COMPLAINT FOR INJUNCTIVE, DECLARATORY, AND OTHER RELIEF

Parties

1. Plaintiff, the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO or Federation), is an association of approximately 65 affiliated national and international labor unions with a combined membership of approximately 13 million working people.

2. Defendant George W. Bush is the President of the United States (President). Defendant Robert W. Zoellick is the United States Trade Representative (USTR).

3. Plaintiff, on behalf of itself and its affiliates, brings this suit against defendants for failing to appoint representatives of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests to the Advisory Committee for Trade Policy and Negotiations (ACTPN or the Committee), in violation of Section 135(b)(1) of the Federal Trade Act of 1974 (1974 Trade Act), 19 U.S.C. § 2155(b)(1), Section 5 of the Federal Advisory Committee Act (FACA), 5 U.S.C. App. §5, and Sections 2103 and 2104 of the Trade Act of 2002 (2002 Trade Act), 19 U.S.C. §§ 3803, 3804. Plaintiff seeks an order compelling defendants to make the required appointments, enjoining the USTR from calling any meetings of the Committee before such appointments occur, and enjoining all Committee action until that time.

Jurisdiction and Venue

4. This Court has jurisdiction of the action under 28 U.S.C. § 1331 for violation of federal statutes and 28 U.S.C. § 1361 to compel defendants to act in fulfillment of their statutory responsibilities.

5. Venue lies in this Court under 28 U.S.C. § 1391(e).

Organizational Status of the AFL-CIO

6. The AFL-CIO is a labor organization as that term is used under the Nation's labor laws, such as the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §151 et seq., and the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, 29 U.S.C. §401 et seq. The Federation is dedicated to advancing the cause of labor and workers. It is the spokesperson for its affiliated unions and the individual workers those unions. As such, the Federation represents the interests of its member unions and the workers they represent in many fora, including all three branches of the federal government.

REV_00264128

7. Because of the direct and increasingly strong connection between the global and domestic economy, and the impact of that connection on the security of American workers, millions of whom are represented by the AFL-CIO's affiliates, the Federation focuses its efforts in part on ensuring that United States trade policy and negotiations take into account the interests of those workers. Many departments within the AFL-CIO, including Legislation, Public Policy, and International Affairs, devote substantial time and attention to these issues.

8. One of the ways in which the AFL-CIO has focused its attention on international trade issues has been to is to try to persuade the President, the Congress, the USTR, and the public that trade agreements must take into account the interests of affected workers. This includes protecting the rights of workers involved in trade in order to promote development and raise the standard of living worldwide, and to prevent violations of workers' rights abroad from contributing to unemployment and depressed wages for American workers.

Statutory Framework

9. Section 135(a) of the 1974 Trade Act, requires the President to "seek information and advice from representative elements of the private sector" with respect to the objectives, negotiations, operations, and effectiveness of trade agreements.

10. Section 135(b)(1) of the 1974 Trade Act, 29 U.S.C. § 2155(b)(1), implements that requirement by directing the President to establish an Advisory Committee for Trade Policy and Negotiations (ACTPN or Committee).

11. Section 135(b)(1) requires the President, upon recommendation of the USTR, to appoint no more than 45 individuals to the Committee for terms of two years. Under that provision, "the Committee shall be broadly representative of the key sectors and groups of the economy, particularly with respect to those sectors and groups which are affected by trade."

REV_00264129

12. In addition, Section 135(b)(1) specifies the sectors and groups of the economy which must be represented on the Committee. It provides that ACTPN "shall include representatives of non-Federal governments, labor, industry, agriculture, small business, service industries, retailers, nongovernmental environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests."

13. ACTPN is also subject to Section 5(b)(2) of the FACA, which provides that the Committee's membership must "be fairly balanced in terms of the points of view represented and the functions to be performed."

14. Pursuant to Section 135(b)(2) of the 1974 Trade Act, 19 U.S.C. § 2155(b)(2), the Committee "shall meet as needed at the call of the United States Trade Representative or at the call of two thirds of the members of the committee."

15. ACTPN has statutory responsibilities with respect to evaluating the merits of United States trade agreements before they become U.S. law. Section 135(e)(1) of the 1974 Trade Act, 19 U.S.C.§ 2155(e)(1), requires the Committee to meet whenever negotiations have concluded for a trade agreement negotiated under Section 1102 of the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988, 29 U.S.C. § 2902 (Omnibus Trade Act). The purpose of this meeting is to enable the Committee to provide a report on such agreement to the President, Congress, and the USTR no later than the date on which the President notifies Congress of the President's intent to enter into the agreement. Section 135(e)(2) of the 1974 Trade Act, 19 U.S.C. § 2155(e)(2), states that

REV_00264130

ACTPN's report must include the Committee's opinion on whether, and the extent to which, the agreement "promotes the economic interests of the United Sates and achieves" the negotiating objectives set forth in the Omnibus Trade Act.

16. Pursuant to this statutory mandate, ACTPN has submitted reports to Congress on agreements such as, but not limited to, the North American Free Trade Agreement, the agreement between the U.S. and China establishing permanent normal trade relations between the two countries, the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations under the auspices of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and the free trade agreement between the U.S. and Jordan. Each of these agreements contained provisions of significance to labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests.

17. The United States is concluding free trade agreement negotiations with with Chile and Singapore. Both agreements are likely to be signed in 2003. Under Section 135(e)(1) of the Trade Act of 1974, ACTPN will be required to submit a report to the President, Congress, and the USTR with respect to whether these agreements promote the United States' economic interests. Both agreements contain provisions that are of major significance to labor, environmental and conservation organizations and consumer interests. Each of these sectors will have points of view on the issues that ACTPN must address in its reports.

18. According to the USTR, the United States intends to commence negotiations in 2003 for free trade agreements with Central America, Morocco, the Southern African Customs Union, and Australia. Under Section 135(e)(1), ACTPN will be required to submit a report to Congress on each of these agreements when they are concluded as to whether they promote the economic interests of the United States. These agreements are likely to contain provisions that are of major interest and significance to labor, environmental and conservation organizations and consumer interests. Each of these sectors will have points of view on the issues that ACTPN must address in its reports .

REV_00264131

19. The 2002 Trade Act authorizes the President to negotiate trade agreements and submit them for approval to Congress without their undergoing congressional amendment (fast track authority). Many sectors of society, including labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests, opposed the passage of the 2002 Act because of fast track authority.

20. ACTPN's responsibility to submit reports under Section 135(e) of the 1974 Act also applies to trade agreements that are negotiated under the 2002 Trade Act. Section 2104 of the Trade Act of 2002 requires that such reports be submitted to the President, Congress, and the USTR no later than 30 days after the President notifies Congress of an intention to enter into the agreement. Under this provision, the Committee's reports on the Chile and Singapore agreements will be due in the first few months of 2003.

21. In addition, Section 2103 of the 2002 Trade Act directs ACTPN to submit a report to Congress as soon as is practicable, but no later than May 1, 2005 that expresses the Committee's "views regarding the progress that has been made in negotiations to achieve the purposes, policies, priorities, and objectives" of fast track authority, and that states the Committee's views as to whether the President's fast track authority should be extended to 2007. Labor, environmental and conservation organizations and consumer interests will all have points of view on the effectiveness of fast track authority and whether Congress should extend it.

REV_00264132

22. The presence of labor representatives on the Committee led to a number of significant developments that have benefitted the interests of the AFL-CIO and American workers with respect to, among other issues, the recognition of the role of labor standards in trade agreements and trade policy. For example:

a) Labor representatives on the Committee helped to persuade then-President Clinton to negotiate the North American Agreement on Labor Cooperation, NAFTA's labor side accord;

b) The labor standards provisions of the Jordan free trade agreement, under which each party agrees to abide by its own labor laws, and which are enforceable under the agreement's overall dispute settlement procedures, came about in part because of the insistence of the labor representatives on the Committee;

c) ACTPN's labor representatives persuaded the entire Committee to submit a letter to then-President Clinton supporting the creation of a working group on workers' rights at the World Trade Organization; the President announced during the WTO Ministerial in Seattle that creation of such a working group had become U.S. policy.

23. The AFL-CIO, on behalf of its affiliates and their members, has increasingly come to rely

REV_00264133

2002 WL 31840970
--- F.Supp.2d --- (Cite as: 2002 WL 31840970 (D.D.C.))

Only the Westlaw citation is currently available.

United States District Court, District of Columbia.

CENTER FOR INTERNATIONAL ENVIRONMENTAL LAW, et al., Plaintiffs,
v.
OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES TRADE REPRESENTATIVE, et al., Defendants.

No. Civ.A. 01-2350PLF.

Dec. 19, 2002.

OPINION

FRIEDMAN, District Judge.

*1 On November 9, 2001, plaintiffs Center for International Environmental Law, Friends of the Earth and Public Citizen, three non-profit groups that monitor international trade and environmental issues, filed suit under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 522 et seq., against the Office of the United States Trade Representative ("USTR") and Robert B. Zoellick, in his official capacity as the United States Trade Representative. [FN1] Plaintiffs seek to obtain information relating to the just-completed negotiation of a United States-Chile Free Trade Agreement, specifically documents that were produced by or exchanged with Chile or that relate to communications or meetings with Chile.

FN1. Defendants assert that Section 522(a)(4)(B) of the Freedom of Information Act precludes suit against individuals in their official capacities, thus requiring the dismissal of Mr. Zoellick. See Defendants' Memorandum in Support of Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment at 2 n.1. Because the Court finds no case law supporting this proposition, it will not dismiss Mr. Zoellick as a defendant.

This matter is before the Court on cross motions for summary judgment. For the reasons stated below, the Court grants in part and denies in part both plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment and defendants' motion for summary judgment. Because the Court concludes that documents exchanged with the government of Chile are not "inter-agency" documents under Exemption 5 of the Freedom of Information Act, the Court directs USTR to release these documents to plaintiffs. It also directs USTR to identify and release any internal USTR documents that contain factual information relating to meetings or communications with Chilean officials. The Court concludes that documents withheld by USTR pursuant to Exemption 1 were properly withheld and need not be released. Finally, the Court concludes that defendants have not waived their right to assert privileges by publicly disclosing information similar to that contained in withheld documents.

I. BACKGROUND

In November of 2000, United States President William Jefferson Clinton and Chilean President Ricardo Lagos announced that their respective governments would begin work toward a bilateral free trade agreement. The Office of the United States Trade Representative spearheaded the negotiations for the United States. On June 29, 2001, plaintiffs filed a Freedom of Information Act request with USTR asking for "[a]ll records containing either U.S. positions shared with Chile, or Chilean positions shared with the United States, at any in- person meeting or in any other manner" as well as "[a]ll records prepared ... during the inter-agency and/or intra-agency processes of the U.S. government coming to positions reflected in the records referred to above." Plaintiffs' Motion for Summary Judgment ("Pl.Mot."), Exhibit 1, Letter from Scott Pasternack, Earthjustice Legal Defense Fund, to Sybia Harrison, FOIA Officer, USTR, dated June 29, 2001 at 1.

In response to plaintiffs' request, USTR conducted a hard-copy and electronic search for all documents relating to the U.S.-Chile Free Trade Agreement negotiations, completing its initial search in early 2002. USTR's initial search, the adequacy of which plaintiffs do not challenge, identified 214 responsive documents, of which nine were released in full and 90 were released in part. Defendants subsequently located an additional 66 documents and released one of these in full, raising the total number of responsive documents to 280, of which a total of 270 were withheld in whole or in part. Defendants' Memorandum in Support of Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment at 2 n.1 ("Def.Mem."), Exhibit 1, Declaration of Sybia Harrison at ¶¶ 8-10; Defendants' Memorandum in Opposition to Plaintiffs' Motion for Summary Judgment and Reply in Further Support of Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment ("Def.Opp."), Exhibit 1, Supplemental Declaration of Susan P. Cronin at ¶¶ 5-6. Plaintiffs have conceded that defendants properly withheld one of these documents (No. 110) pursuant to Exemption 4, but seek the release of the remaining 269 documents (or reasonably segregable portions thereof) on the presence of labor representatives on ACTPN as an effective means of communicating labor's point of view to the President, the Congress, and the USTR, and of incorporating that point of view in trade policy and specific trade agreements, as described above.

Copr. © West 2003 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

24. The presence of environmental and conservation organizations and consumer interests on the Committee has also benefitted American workers. For example, the environmental representatives to the Committee were instrumental in then-President Clinton's negotiation of an environmental side accord to NAFTA and in the negotiation of environmental protections in the Jordan Free Trade Agreement. In addition, issues of public health and safety have been brought to the attention of the President, Congress, and the USTR that otherwise would not have been raised.

Unlawful Failure to Appoint Labor and Other Representatives to the ACTPN

25. From its inception until September 2002, ACTPN has included in its membership representatives of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests, as the 1974 Trade Act and FACA require.

26. In 2000 the President of the United States appointed three individuals to the Committee to represent the views and interests of labor. These individuals were John J. Sweeney, President of the AFL-CIO, Jay Mazur, then-President of UNITE!, and George Becker, then-President of the United Steelworkers of America. These individuals continued to serve as labor representatives on the Committee in 2002.

REV_00264134

27. In 2002, Fred Krupp, President of the Environmental Defense Fund served as the representative of environmental and conservation. Rhoda Karpatkin, President Emeritus of the Consumers Union, served as the representative of consumer interests.

28. ACTPN's last meeting was held on or about September 19, 2002. At that meeting all of the members of the Committee submitted their resignations at the request of the USTR, acting as the President's representative, so that the President could appoint an entirely new Committee. On or about December 9, 2002, these representatives received notice from the White House that their appointments were terminated as of the close of business that day.

29. On December 9, 2002, the President appointed thirty-two individuals to serve on ACTPN for two years. A copy of the list of appointees is attached to this Complaint as Exhibit A. With a few exceptions for state government officials and scholars, the new appointees hail exclusively from business and industry.

30. The thirty-two appointees do not include a single representative of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, or consumer interests, despite the requirements of the 1974 Trade Act and the FACA.

31. Since December 9, 2002, the President has not appointed any representatives of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, or consumer interests to the ACTPN, nor has he announced his intention to do so, despite the requirements of the 1974 Trade Act and the FACA.

32. None of the individuals currently appointed to the Committee is capable of representing, or have the authority to represent the points of view of those key sectors of the economy that are absent from ACTPN namely, labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests.

REV_00264135

33. A currently constituted, ACTPN cannot provide to the President, Congress, or the USTR, any advice or information that is broadly representative of key sectors and groups of the economy, particularly those groups that are affected by trade.

34. Experience has shown that business and industry are likely to take positions on trade agreements and trade policy that are contrary to those of labor, environmental, conservation, and consumer organizations. Therefore, the fact that there is virtually exclusive representation of business and industry on the Committee threatens the interests of labor, environmental, conservation, and consumer organizations.

35. Because of the statutory role that the Committee's reports play in the formulation of trade policy and negotiations, the absence of labor representatives on the Committee, as well as environmental, conservation, and consumer representatives, will significantly alter the advice that the President, Congress, and the USTR receive and will therefore affect U.S. trade policy and negotiations in a manner that disadvantages these key sectors of the economy in violation of the 1974 Trade Act.

Count 1

36. Plaintiff incorporates by reference the allegations of Paragraphs 1 through 35 of this Complaint.

REV_00264136

37. Defendants' failure to appoint any representatives of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, or consumer interests to ACTPN violates Section 135(b)(1) of the Trade Act of 1974, which requires the appointment of such representatives.

38. As a result of defendants' unlawful act, plaintiff and its affiliated unions and their members have been deprived, and continue to be deprived, of representatives of labor on ACTPN who express a point of view to the President, Congress, and the USTR that promotes and protects the interests of American workers on important trade negotiation and trade policy matters. Plaintiff and its affiliated unions and their members have also been deprived, and continue to be deprived, of representatives of environmental and conservation organizations and consumer interests on the ACTPN who express a point of view to the President, the Congress, and the USTR that also benefits the interests of American workers on important trade negotiation and trade policy matters. Currently, ACTPN can only the interests of business and industry, and these views are antithetical on many points to those of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests. Plaintiff, on behalf of its affiliated unions and their members, will be forced to spend additional resources in order to make labor's viewpoint heard, instead of relying on the representatives of ACTPN to do so. Plaintiff will also be forced to spend resources to counteract the impact of ACTPN's reports and other actions, which are made without regard to the interests of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests, so that they do not lead to the development of policies adverse to the interests of these key sectors of the economy.

REV_00264137

39. Plaintiff's injury can only be redressed through appointment of representatives of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests representatives to the ACTPN before the Committee meets or takes any action whatsoever, including consideration of any aspect of trade agreements or trade policy.

Count 2

40. Plaintiff incorporates Paragraphs 1 through 39 of this Complaint.

41. Defendants' failure to appoint any representatives of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests to the Committee violates Section 5 of the FACA because it deprives the Committee of the fair balance of points of view and functions performed by the Committee that FACA requires.

42. As a result of defendants' unlawful act, plaintiff and its affiliated unions and their members have been deprived, and continue to be deprived, of their right to have the ACTPN submit reports and opinions to the President, Congress, and the USTR that are fairly balanced in terms of the points of view represented on the Committee within the meaning of the FACA. Currently, ACTPN can express only the interests of business and industry. These views are not fairly balanced and are antithetical on many points to those of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests. Plaintiff, on behalf of its affiliated unions and their members, will be forced to spend additional resources in order to make labor's viewpoint heard, instead of relying on the representatives of ACTPN to do so. Plaintiff will also be forced to spend resources to counteract the impact of ACTPN's reports and other actions, which are made without regard to the interests of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests, so that they do not lead to the development of policies adverse to the interests of these key sectors of the economy.

REV_00264138

43. This injury can only be redressed through the appointment of representatives of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests, to the ACTPN before the Committee meets or takes any action whatsoever, including consideration of any aspect of trade agreements or trade policy.

Count 3

44. Plaintiff hereby incorporates Paragraphs 1 through 43 of this Complaint.

45. Defendants' failure to appoint any representatives of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer groups to the Committee violates Section 2104 of the 2002 Trade Act, which requires ACTPN to submit reports under section 135(e) of the 1974 Trade Act with respect to certain agreements negotiated under the 2002 Trade Act.

46. As a result of defendants' unlawful act, plaintiff and its affiliated unions and their members have been deprived, and continue to be deprived, of representatives of labor on the ACTPN who express a point of view to the President, Congress, and the USTR that promotes and protects the interests of American workers on important trade negotiation and trade policy matters. Plaintiff and its affiliated unions and their members have been deprived, and continue to be deprived, of representatives of environmental and conservation organizations and consumer interests on the ACTPN who express a point of view to the President, the Congress, and the USTR that also benefits the interest of American workers on important trade negotiation and trade policy matters. Currently, ACTPN can only the interests of business and industry, and these views are antithetical on many points to those of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests. Plaintiff, on behalf of its affiliated unions and their members, will be forced to spend additional resources in order to make labor's viewpoint heard, instead of relying on the representatives of ACTPN to do so. Plaintiff will also be forced to spend resources to counteract the impact of ACTPN's reports and other actions, which are made without regard to the interests of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests, so that they do not lead to the development of policies adverse to the interests of these key sectors of the economy.

REV_00264139

47. Defendant's failure to appoint any representatives of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer groups to the Committee also violates Section 2103 of the 2002 Trade Act, as that provision requires ACTPN to submit a report to Congress with respect to the extension of fast track authority.

48. As a result of defendants' unlawful act, plaintiff has been deprived, and continues to be deprived, of representatives of labor on the ACTPN who will express a point of view to the Congress, and on the critically important matter of fast track authority and its extension. Plaintiff has also been deprived of, and continues to be deprived of, representatives of environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests who will express a point of view to the Congress on this same matter. Plaintiff and its affiliated unions and their members have been deprived, and continue to be deprived, of representatives of environmental and conservation organizations and consumer interests on the ACTPN who express a point of view to the President, the Congress, and the USTR that also benefits the interest of American workers on important trade negotiation and trade policy matters.

REV_00264140

Currently, ACTPN can only represent the interests of business and industry, and these views are antithetical on many points to those of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests. Plaintiff, on behalf of its affiliated unions and their members, will be forced to spend additional resources in order to make labor's viewpoint heard, instead of relying on the representatives of ACTPN to do so. Plaintiff will also be forced to spend resources to counteract the impact of ACTPN's reports and other actions, which are made without regard to the interests of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests, so that they do not lead to the development of policies adverse to the interests of these key sectors of the economy.

49. This injury can only be redressed through the appointment of representatives of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests, to the ACTPN before the ACTPN meets or takes any action whatsoever with respect to trade agreements negotiated under the 2002 Trade Act or the report that ACTPN must submit to Congress with respect to fast track authority.

Prayer for Relief

Wherefore, plaintiff respectfully requests that the Court issue an order that :

1. directs the USTR to recommend to the President the appointment of specific individuals to the ACTPN to represent labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests;

REV_00264141

2. directs the President to appoint individuals to the ACTPN to represent labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests in a manner consistent with Section 135(b)(1) of the 1974 Trade Agreement and Section 5 of FACA;

3. declares that the ACTPN has no legal authority to act until appointments are made that fulfill the requirements of Section 135(b)(1) of the 1974 Trade Act and Section 5 of FACA;

4. enjoins the USTR from calling any meeting of ACTPN until such appointments have taken place; and

5. enjoins the USTR from calling upon ACTPN to take any action whatsoever towards fulfilling its statutory responsibilities, including but not limited to consideration of any matters of trade agreements, trade policy, or the drafting and issuance of reports to the President, Congress, and the USTR, until representatives of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests have been appointed to the Committee and have had as full an opportunity as other members of the Committee to participate in such work of the Committee;

6. enjoins the USTR or his designees from providing any direction or assistance to the Committee in accomplishing any of its statutory responsibilities until representatives of labor, environmental and conservation organizations, and consumer interests have been appointed to the Committee.

7. awards attorneys' fees to plaintiff; and

8. awards such other relief as the Court deems appropriate.

REV_00264142

Respectfully submitted,

Jonathan P. Hiatt
AFL-CIO
815 16th Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20006
202-637-5323
D.C. Bar No. 427856

Deborah Greenfield
AFL-CIO
815 16th Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20006
202-637-5397
D.C. Bar No. 358317

Jeremiah A. Collins
Bredhoff & Kaiser, PLLC
805 15th Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20005
202-842-2600
D.C. Bar No. 241935

REV_00264143

in this action.

*2 The 269 documents in question can be grouped into three categories: (1) documents exchanged between the United States and Chile (131); (2) internal United States documents that describe meetings with Chilean negotiators or proposals received from Chilean officials (156); and (3) classified documents created by or for the Trade Policy Review Group, an inter-agency group of senior officials that considers and determines United States trade policy (5). [FN2] To justify withholding the documents in the first two categories, USTR relies on Exemption 5 of the FOIA, which protects from disclosure any "inter-agency" or "intra-agency" documents that reveal an agency's deliberative process. 5 U.S.C. § 522(b)(5). Plaintiffs contest all claims of Exemption 5 privilege, both with respect to documents that were exchanged between Chile and the United States and with respect to internal documents that describe meetings with or proposals from Chilean officials. The parties have agreed on the identity of all documents exchanged with Chile. See Defendants' Report on Documents Exchanged Between the United States and Chile at ¶ 4. [FN3]

FN2. Because many of these documents contain multiple parts (e.g., e- mails with multiple documents attached), the categories are not mutually exclusive and 23 of the documents fall into multiple categories. See Defendants' Report on Documents Exchanged Between the United States and Chile ¶ 3; see also infra n. 3. As a result, the sum of the number of documents in each category exceeds the total number of documents withheld by USTR.

FN3. The complete set of documents shared between the United States and Chile in conjunction with the Free Trade Agreement negotiations consists of documents 9, 15, 16, 19, 22, 23, 27-29, 36, 52, 57, 89-94, 97, 99, 111, 124, 130, 134, 141, 142, 145-149, 152-162, 164-167, 169-173, 176, 177, 180-191 and 215-280. See Defendants' Report on Documents Exchanged Between the United States and Chile at ¶ 2. As noted above, however, 23 of these documents contain both material that was exchanged with Chile and material that was not exchanged. These overlapping documents are: documents 22, 36, 130, 152, 153, 155, 156, 160-162, 164-166, 169-172, 176, 177, 182- 185. See id. at ¶ 3.

Plaintiffs also challenge USTR's withholding of five documents under Exemption 1 of the FOIA, which exempts from disclosure any documents that are "(A) specifically authorized under criteria established by an Executive order to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or foreign policy and (B) are in fact properly classified pursuant to such Executive order; ...." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)(A). In addition, plaintiffs assert that defendants have waived the right to assert any privilege with respect to certain documents by publicly releasing information similar to that contained in the documents. Based on these arguments, plaintiffs seek declaratory and injunctive relief, including the release, in full or in part, of 269 documents withheld by USTR, as well as the identification and release of any additional relevant documents not yet identified by USTR.

II. DISCUSSION

A. The Freedom of Information Act

The fundamental purpose of the Freedom of Information Act is to assist citizens in discovering "what their government is up to." United States Dep't of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 773 (1989). As such, "the Act is broadly conceived," EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 79-80 (1973), and "disclosure, not secrecy, is the dominant objective of the Act." Dep't of the Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 361 (1976); see also NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 220 (1978). The FOIA requires public disclosure of agency records unless the requested records fall within one or more of nine carefully-structured statutory exemptions. See NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. at 220; Burka v. United States Dep't of Health and Human Serv., 87 F.3d 508, 515 (D.C.Cir.1996); Oglesby v. United States Dep't of the Army, 79 F.3d 1172, 1176 (D.C.Cir.1996). Consistent with the Act's "goal of broad disclosure, these exemptions have been consistently given a narrow compass," United States Dep't of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U .S. 136, 151 (1989), and the agency bears the burden of justifying the withholding. The court determines de novo whether the exemption claimed is appropriate. See 5 U.S.C. § 522(a)(4)(B); Dep't of State v. Ray, 502 U.S. 164, 173 (1991).

*3 In assessing a claimed exemption, a court will require the agency to provide a "[r]elatively detailed justification" through the submission of an index of documents, known as a Vaughn Index, sufficiently detailed affidavits or declarations, or both. Mead Data Central, Inc. v. United States Dep't of the Air Force, 566 F.2d 242, 251 (D.C.Cir.1977); see Oglesby v. United States Dep't of the Army, 79 F.3d at 1178; Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820, 827-28 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977 (1974). Furthermore, the FOIA requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided ...

Copr. © West 2003 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

ATTACHMENT A

MEMBERS OF ACTPN AS OF 12/9/02

Margaret Cushing Whitman, President and CEO, eBay Inc.

Steven Rollie Rogel, Chairman, President and CEO, Weyerhaeuser Company

Frank Henry Habicht II, CEO, Global Environment and Technology Foundation

Jerome Jasinowski, President, National Association of Manufacturers

William Frenzel, Guest Scholar, Brookings Institute

Rodolphe Vallee, Chairman, CEO and Owner, R.L. Vallee, Inc.

Bernard Aronson, Managing Partner, ACON Investments, LLC

Edward Emma, President and CEO, Jockey International, Inc.

Jill Considine, Chair and CEO, The Depository Trust and Clearing Corporation

Wythe Willey, President, National Cattlemen's Beef Association

Edward Perkins, Crowe Professor in Geo-Politics and Executive Director of International Programs, University of Oklahoma

Richard Rivera, Vice Chairman, Darden Restaurants

Pete Hanna, Chairman, President and CEO, Hanna Steel Corporation

John Rowland, Governor of Connecticut

Jean-Pierre Rosso, Chairman, CNH Global

Hersh Kozlov, Senior Partner, Wolf, Block, Schorr and Solis-Cohen LLP

Samuel Palmisano, President and CEO, IBM

JoAnn Brouillette, President, Demeter Corporation

Herbert Johnson, Chairman, SC Johnson & Son, Inc.

Hector Ruiz, President and CEO, Advanced Micro Devices

Melinda Bush, President and CEO, HRW Holdings, LLC

Richard Wardrop, Jr., Chairman, CEO and President, AK Steel Corporation

Grace Nichols, President and CEO, Victoria's Secret Stores

Larry Liebenow, President and CEO, Quaker Fabric

REV_00264144

Michael Goldstein, Chairman, Toys "R" Us Children's Fund

Thomas Mottola, Chairman and CEO, Sony Music Entertainment

George Fitch, President, IOP Associates, Mayor of Warrenton, Va.

Luis Lauredo, President, Hunton & Williams, Latin American Services, LLC

James Winston Morrison, President, Small Business Exporters Association

Walter Bernard Duffy Hickey, Jr., Chairman, Hickey Freeman Company, Inc.

Robert Edward Grady, Managing Director, The Carlyle Group Morgan

Yaping Wang, CEO and Chairman, Angeles Optics, Inc.

REV_00264145

after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). This comports with the policy of disclosure and prevents the withholding of entire documents, see Billington v. Dep't of Justice, 233 F.3d 581, 586 (D.C.Cir.2000), unless the agency can demonstrate that the non-exempt portions of a document are "inextricably intertwined with exempt portions." Trans-Pacific Policing Agreement v. United States Customs Serv., 177 F.3d 1022, 1027 (D.C.Cir.1999) (quoting Mead Data Central, Inc. v. United States Dep't of the Air Force, 566 F.2d at 260).

The Court may award summary judgment to a government agency solely on the basis of information provided in affidavits or declarations when the affidavits or declarations describe "the documents and the justifications for nondisclosure with reasonably specific detail, demonstrate that the information withheld logically falls within the claimed exemption, and are not controverted by either contrary evidence in the record or by evidence of agency bad faith." Military Audit Project v. Casey, 656 F.2d 724, 738 (D.C.Cir.1981); see also Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d at 826-28. An agency must demonstrate that "each document that falls within the class requested either has been produced, is unidentifiable, or is wholly [or partially] exempt from the Act's inspection requirements." Goland v. CIA, 607 F.2d 339, 352 (D.C.Cir.1978) (internal citation and quotation omitted).

B. Analysis

For the reasons stated below, the Court concludes that all documents withheld by USTR under Exemption 5 were improperly withheld, while the five documents withheld pursuant to Exemption 1 were properly withheld. The Court further finds that defendants have not waived their right to claim exemptions by releasing similar but not identical information to private individuals. [FN4]

FN4. Plaintiffs also claim that USTR has failed to identify communications or information shared with Chile in sufficient detail to permit judicial review of USTR's compliance with an order requiring the release of such information. See Plaintiffs' Memorandum of Points and Authorities In Opposition to Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment and In Support of Plaintiffs' Motion for Summary Judgment at 30-31 ("Pl.Mem."). Upon review of defendants' revised Index of Documents and supporting declarations, however, the Court concludes that defendants have identified and described in sufficient detail all documents containing information received from or exchanged with Chile. See Def. Opp., Exhibit 1, Supplemental Declaration of Susan P. Cronin at ¶¶ 5-6; Def. Opp., Exhibit 2, Revised Index of Documents; see also Quinon v. FBI, 86 F .3d 1222, 1227 (D.C.Cir.1996) (FOIA requires only that an agency describe withheld documents in sufficient detail to demonstrate why they fall within the claimed exemption, which can be done through a Vaughn index of documents or through supporting affidavits or declarations).

1. Exemption 5

Exemption 5 excludes from disclosure any documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. 522(b)(5). This provision protects from disclosure those documents traditionally afforded protection "pursuant to evidentiary privileges in the civil discovery context," including those covered by the deliberative process privilege. Dow Jones & Co. v. Dep't of Justice, 917 F.2d 571, 573 (D.C.Cir.1990) (quoting Formaldehyde Inst. v. Dep't of Health and Human Serv., 889 F.2d 1118, 1121 (D.C.Cir.1989) (internal quotation marks omitted). In keeping with the FOIA's goal of broad disclosure, the Section 522(b)(5) exemption is construed narrowly. Dep't of the Interior & Bureau of Indian Affairs v. Klamath Water Users Protective Ass'n, 532 U.S. 1, 8 (2001) ("Klamath Water Users").

*4 The purpose of the deliberative process privilege is to encourage the frank discussion of policy issues among government officials and to protect the government's decisionmaking processes. See Wolfe v. Dep't of Health & Human Serv., 839 F.2d 768, 773 (D.C.Cir.1988) (en banc) (quoting S.REP. NO. 813, 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 9 (1965)). Such protection is necessary to > assure that subordinates within an agency will feel free to provide the decisionmaker with their uninhibited opinions and recommendations without fear of later being subject to public ridicule or criticism; to protect against premature disclosure of proposed policies before they have been finally formulated or adopted; and to protect against confusing the issues and misleading the public by dissemination of documents suggesting reasons and rationales for a course of action which were not in fact the ultimate reasons for the agency's action.

Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Dep't of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 866 (D.C.Cir.1980). See also Klamath Water Users, 532 U.S. at 8, quoting NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 151 (1975) (government officials "will not communicate candidly among themselves if each remark is a potential item of discovery and front page news"; the object of the deliberative process privilege is "to enhance 'the quality of agency decisions.' "); Wolfe v. Dep't of Health & Human Serv., 839 F.2d at 773 ("[T]he quality of administrative decision-making would be seriously undermined if agencies were forced to operate in a fishbowl.").

Copr. © West 2003 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

In order to qualify for protection under the deliberative process privilege of Exemption 5, a document must satisfy two conditions: (1) it must be either inter-agency or intra-agency in nature, [FN5] and (2) it must be both predecisional and part of the agency's deliberative or decisionmaking process. See Klamath Water Users, 532 U.S. at 8-9; Dow Jones & Co. v. Dep't of Justice, 917 F.2d at 574. Defendants argue that Exemption 5 applies to two categories of documents: those produced by or exchanged with Chile, and those that contain information concerning meetings with or proposals from Chilean officials. Plaintiffs challenge both applications of Exemption 5.

FN5. For ease of discussion, the Court will use the term "inter- agency" to refer to both inter- and intra-agency documents.

a. Documents Produced By or Exchanged With Chile

In support of their decision to withhold all documents or portions of documents produced by or shared with Chile during negotiations, defendants characterize the Chilean officials as allies of USTR, a government agency, in pursuit of a mutually beneficial agreement who thus qualify as outside consultants to the agency and whose communications therefore are protected as inter-agency under Exemption 5. See Def. Mem. at 23-25. Plaintiffs respond that Chile is not a consultant but rather is necessarily adverse to USTR in the context of trade negotiations; therefore communications between Chile and the United States are not protected. See Pl. Mem. at 6-7. Disclosure of the contested documents thus turns on the definitions of "consultant" and "inter- agency" under the statute and case law and raises an issue of first impression: Are communications between the United States and a foreign government in the course of treaty negotiations "inter-agency" under Exemption 5 such that any shared documents are protected from disclosure?

*5 For purposes of the inter-agency requirement, the Supreme Court has noted that the term " 'agency' means 'each authority of the Government of the United States,' § 551(1), and 'includes any executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch of the Government ..., or any independent regulatory agency,' § 522(f)." Klamath Water Users, 532 U.S. at 9. In general, this definition establishes that communications between agencies and outside parties are not protected under Exemption 5. See, e.g., Brownstein Zeidman & Schomer v. Dep't of the Air Force, 781 F.Supp. 31, 35 (D.D.C.1991) "While FOIA exemption 5 does protect intragovernmental deliberations, it does not cover negotiations between the government and outside parties."); see also Mead Data Central, Inc. v. United States Dep't of the Air Force, 566 F.2d at 257-58 (policy objectives of Exemption 5 not applicable to negotiations between agency and outside party). The terms "inter-agency and intra-agency," however, are not meant to be "rigidly exclusive terms." Dow Jones & Co. v. Dep't of Justice, 917 F.2d at 574 (quoting Ryan v. Dep't of Justice, 617 F.2d 781, 790 (1980)). The D.C. Circuit therefore has recognized that agencies often need "to rely on the opinions and recommendations of temporary consultants" and that "[s]uch consultations are an integral part of [the agency's] deliberative process." Dow Jones & Co. v. Dep't of Justice, 917 F.2d at 574-75.

This exception to the literal terms of the inter-agency requirement, recognized and affirmed by the Supreme Court as "the consultant corollary to Exemption 5" in Klamath Water Users, is not without limits. 532 U.S. at 11. See County of Madison v. Dep't of Justice, 641 F.2d 1036, 1040 (1st Cir.1981); Center for Auto Safety v. Dep't of Justice, 576 F.Supp. 739, 745- 46 (D.D.C.1983). Communications with outside consultants have been deemed part of an agency's deliberative process only where the documents prepared by or communications to or from the outside consultants "played essentially the same part in an agency's process of deliberation as documents prepared by agency personnel might have done," or where "the consultant functions just as an [agency] employee would be expected to do." Klamath Water Users, 532 U.S. at 10, 11; see Public Citizen v. Dep't of Justice, 111 F.3d 168, 170-71 (D.C.Cir.1997). In Klamath Water Users, the Supreme Court's only direct interpretation of the inter-agency requirement, the Court reiterated these limits, stating that an outside party is not an agency consultant where it represents its own interests "at the expense of others seeking benefits inadequate to satisfy everyone." Klamath Water Users, 532 U.S. at 12. While not reaching the question of whether such independent interests in and of themselves always preclude an outside party's qualification as a consultant for Exemption 5 purposes, the Court found that self-advocacy at others' expense was preclusive: "[T]he dispositive point is that the apparent object of the Tribe's communications is a decision by an agency of the Government to support a claim by the Tribe that is necessarily adverse to the interests of competitors." Id. at 14.

Copr. © West 2003 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

*6 Here, defendants concede that Chile does not act as a neutral consultant to USTR but argue that the relationship nonetheless is consultative and that any shared documents are inter-agency by virtue of the "co-regulatory" nature of bilateral free trade negotiations, where both parties seek to "create and implement a policy for their mutual benefit." Def. Mem. at 22. Defendants assert that the mutual advantage to be gained from the existence of a trade agreement between the United States and Chile demonstrates that the relationship is non-adversarial. They urge the Court to adopt a broad interpretation of the "outside consultant" exception to the inter-agency requirement and to protect any shared documents as "an integral part" of USTR's deliberative process. Def. Mem. at 19 (citing Ryan v. Dep't of Justice, 617 F.2d at 789).

The Court cannot accept defendants' characterization of Chile as a non- adversarial consultant to USTR. Chile is an independent party promoting its own interests, whose communications with USTR necessarily fall beyond the scope of Exemption 5. Despite the ultimate goal of cooperation between these two nations, Chilean negotiators undoubtedly approached the talks with their own best interests in mind, as any country must in such negotiations. Chile is an independent sovereign state and its participation in the development of a trade agreement with the United States, however mutually advantageous, cannot rightly be characterized as advice or consultation. Here, as in County of Madison, "[w]hile the [outside parties] came to parley, they were past and potential adversaries, not coopted colleagues." County of Madison v. Dep't of Justice, 641 F.2d at 1040. This Court agrees with the First Circuit's conclusion that "expanding exemption five to include self-seeking petitioners 'within' agencies would do more violence to statutory language than Congress' direction permits." Id.; see also Center for Auto Safety v. Dep't of Justice, 576 F.Supp. at 746-47 (documents received from outside party were not "inter- agency" because they were "submitted by an adversary as part of an effort to convince the agency to adopt the adversary's proposals," and shared documents were not "inter-agency" because "when the [agency] elected to use them as tools in their [settlement] negotiations with the public [opposing parties in a lawsuit] ... they lost their internal status, and their qualification for Exemption 5.").

Despite defendants' argument to the contrary, this conclusion finds support in the Supreme Court's recent discussion in Klamath Water Users of the nature and limits of the inter-agency requirement of Exemption 5. As explained above, the Court emphasized the importance of the inter-agency requirement, stating that "the first condition of Exemption 5 is no less important than the second; the communication must be 'inter-agency or intra-agency.' " 532 U.S. at 9. In addition, while recognizing (without affirming or rejecting) the conclusions by some courts that certain documents prepared by outside consultants were "inter-agency" documents for purposes of Exemption 5 in some contexts, the Court noted a common factor in all such cases: "[T]he fact about the consultant that is constant in the typical cases is that the consultant does not represent an interest of its own, or the interest of any other client, when it advises the agency that hires it. Its only obligations are to truth and its sense of what good judgment calls for, and in those respects the consultant functions just as an employee would be expected to do." Id. at 10-11; see id. at 12 (typically, consultants whose communications have been held exempt "have not been communicating with the Government in their own interest or on behalf of any person or group whose interests might be affected by the Government action addressed by the consultant."). That is manifestly not the situation presented here.

*7 While the Court in Klamath Water Users emphasized that most outside parties who have been deemed consultants by the courts lacked independent interests of their own, see 532 U.S. at 11, it stopped short of concluding that the pursuit of any independent interest by an outside party always precludes a finding that its communications are inter-agency. See id. at 10-11 ("nor do we read the cases as necessarily assuming that an outside consultant must be devoid of a definite point of view when the agency contracts for its services"). The Court explicitly limited its holding: "While [the fact that the Tribe advocated its own interests] alone distinguishes tribal communications from the consultants' examples recognized by several Courts of Appeals, the distinction is even sharper, in that the Tribes are self-advocates at the expense of others seeking benefits inadequate to satisfy everyone.... [T]he dispositive point is that the apparent object of the Tribe's communications is a decision by the agency of the Government to support a claim by the Tribe that is necessarily adverse to the interests of competitors." Id. at 12, 14.

Copr. © West 2003 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The critical factor in deciding the inter-agency status of an outside party is the degree of self-interest pursued by that party, as compared to its interest in providing neutral advice or consultation to the agency. Where an outside party's self-interest predominates over its interest in informing or assisting the agency, that party's communications cannot be considered inter-agency for purposes of Exemption 5. Here, it is not just that Chile was not "devoid of a definite point of view" (532 U.S. at 11); it was an advocate for its own interests and not a provider of independent advice to the United States. Like the Tribes in Klamath Water Users, Chile "communicated with the [USTR] with [its] own, albeit entirely legitimate, interests in mind." Klamath Water Users, 532 U.S. at 12. No matter what shared interests Chile and the United States may have with respect to free trade and the desirability of negotiating a free trade agreement, the interests of Chile are manifestly independent of those of the United States. The Court concludes that Chile's communications with USTR are not inter-agency communications for purposes of Exemption 5.

This conclusion is not inconsistent with the D.C. Circuit's decisions in Public Citizen, Inc. v. Dep't of Justice or Ryan v. Dep't of Justice. [FN6] In Public Citizen, former Presidents of the United States were consulted by the National Archives and Records Administration on the release of their presidential documents. Because any former President has an interest in protecting the confidentiality of documents produced during his tenure, the former Presidents undoubtedly had their own interests beyond an obligation to "truth and [a] sense of what good judgment calls for." Klamath Water Users, 532 U.S. at 11. Nonetheless, because each former President "clearly qualifies as an expert on the implications of disclosure of Presidential records from his administration," and because it may be assumed that a former President of the United States is not in an adversarial or potentially adversarial posture with the government he led--"[h]e retains aspects of his former role"--the former Presidents' \input was held to fall within the consultant exception to the inter-agency requirement under Exemption 5. See Public Citizen v. Dep't of Justice, 111 F.3d at 170, 171. Chile possesses no analogous expertise or presumed loyalty. Furthermore, consultation between the National Archives Records Administration and the former Presidents was expressly mandated by statute. See Public Citizen v. Dep't of Justice, 111 F.3d at 170. Here, no such statutory mandate exists.

FN6. The Supreme Court in Klamath Water Users called into question but refused to decide the continuing validity of these two cases in which the court of appeals treated communications with outside parties as inter- agency despite the outside parties' independent interests. See Klamath Water Users, 532 U.S. at 12 n. 4 (noting that both Ryan v. Dep't of Justice 617 F.2d 781, and Public Citizen v. Dep't of Justice, 111 F.3d 168, "arguably extend beyond what we have characterized as the typical examples.") Because Klamath Water Users did not directly overrule these two cases, the Court finds it appropriate to address them, and it finds them distinguishable from the case at hand.

*8 Contrary to defendants' assertion that Public Citizen supports their position that disclosure is prohibited in this case, that decision explicitly recognized that an outside party with a predominantly adversarial relationship would not enjoy the protection of Exemption 5. Acknowledging that there were non-consultative aspects to the relationship between the agency and the former Presidents, the Court noted that "[a]t some point of course, features of the other relationships (above all, a possible future adversary one) might come to eclipse the consultative relationship," but found that the plaintiff had failed to offer concrete evidence of such a shift. Public Citizen v. Dep't of Justice, 111 F.3d at 171. Because the government plausibly had described the relationship as aiming " 'to facilitate correct and consistent application of the Presidential Records Act" ' and achieve other agency goals, the court found that the consultative relationship predominated over the Presidents' self-interest. Id. The court expressly noted, however, that if the Presidents' independent interests were stronger, the adversarial features of the relationship might preclude application of Exemption 5. See id.

Unlike the former Presidents in Public Citizen, Chilean officials are not "enough like the agency's own personnel to justify calling their communications 'intra-agency.' " Klamath Water Users, 532 U.S. at 12. Nor did the documents that Chile submitted to USTR play "essentially the same part in [the] agency's process of deliberation as documents prepared by agency personnel might have done." Id. at 11. It may be true, as defendants assert, that Chilean proposals and responses are essential to USTR's development of its own negotiating positions, but the role played by such documents is unmistakably different from the role of internally created documents; Chile shares its positions not in order to advise or educate USTR but in order to promote its own interests. See Def. Mem. at 22 (acknowledging that "Chile seeks to achieve its own objectives through the negotiations"). Nor does the fact that USTR "needs to understand what is important to Chile in order to develop its own positions" confer inter-agency status on these external documents. Def. Mem. at 21.

Copr. © West 2003 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The decision in Ryan v. Dep't of Justice, 617 F.2d 781, also is distinguishable. In Ryan, the court of appeals held that communications produced by Senators in response to an agency questionnaire regarding nominating procedures for judicial candidates fell within the narrow ambit of Exemption 5. The court characterized the Senators as "temporary consultants" who were "solicited to give advice only for specific projects." Id. at 789- 90. In the instant case, by contrast, the Chilean officials were not solicited for advice but rather negotiated with and treated as adversaries openly seeking to advance their own interests. Furthermore, the court in Ryan made much of the fact that the documents in that case were produced in response to an agency initiative. See id. at 790; see also Center for Auto Safety v. Dep't of Justice, 576 F.Supp. at 745 (central to the decision in Ryan "was the fact that the advice was obtained on the Department's initiative."). Here, the documents exchanged between the United States and Chile do not reflect a similar solicitation and response.

9 Other cases cited by defendants also are distinguishable. In Formaldehyde Inst. v. Dep't of Health and Human Serv., 889 F.2d 1118 (D.C.Cir.1989), the court of appeals allowed HHS to withhold unpublished reports by employees and corresponding comments made by outside journals acting as referees on the ground that such outside reviews were essential to the agency's evaluation of the readiness of a work for publication and thus were predecisional. See 889 F .2d at 1124. The court found that HHS relied on this exchange between government scientists and outside scientific journals to decide whether and in what form to publish scientific reports in the agency's name. Thus the confidential comments of outside reviewers were protected under Exemption 5 because they were predecisional. See id. The court in Formaldehyde v. HHS did not address the inter-agency requirement of Exemption 5 at all and made no finding that the outside reviews were inter- agency in nature. See id. at 1121. The continued vitality of Formaldehyde v. HHS is questionable in light of the Supreme Court's recent emphasis on the importance of the inter-agency requirement under Exemption 5.

Formaldehyde v. HHS is distinguishable for an additional reason: The outside reviewers did not pursue any potentially adverse interests in reviewing the submitted report; they merely considered and commented on the agency's submission "[p]ursuant to [each journal's] normal review process" and provided editorial feedback that informed the agency's decision on publication Formaldehyde v. HHS, 889 F.2d at 1120. In the instant case, by contrast, the Chilean negotiators did not merely review USTR's proposals and offer evaluations to inform USTR's decision on how to proceed. Rather, the Chilean officials responded to USTR's proposals with Chile's interests in mind and with the explicit goal of influencing USTR policy to their own advantage.

Nor does Judge June Green's decision in Fulbright & Jaworski v. Dep't of Treasury, 545 F.Supp. 615 (D.D.C.1982), support defendants' argument. In that case, one of very few to consider Exemption 5 in the context of foreign relations, individual notes taken by a United States negotiator during treaty discussions with France were protected from release under Exemption 5. The court held that "releasing these snapshot views of the negotiations would be comparable to releasing drafts of the treaty" and consequently would risk great harm to the negotiations process. Id. at 620. Despite the superficial similarity of context--the "give-and-take" of treaty negotiations (id.)--the difference is that the negotiator's notes at issue in Fulbright & Jaworski were clearly internal. The question of disclosure turned not on the inter- agency requirement of Exemption 5 but on whether or not the documents were part of the agency's predecisional deliberative process. See id. at 620. Judge Green's discussion of the harm that could result from disclosure therefore is irrelevant, since the documents at issue here are not inter-agency, and the Court does not reach the question of deliberative process.

10 The Court is not oblivious to defendants' concern that disclosure of these documents may complicate international negotiations on free trade and other issues, and it recognizes the importance of confidentiality in treaty negotiations, particularly where, as here, the United States has promised confidentiality to its partner from the outset. Indeed, concern about confidentiality in communications between the government and the Tribes was at issue in Klamath Water Users. See 532 U.S. at 11. Ultimately, however, the Supreme Court concluded that such policy concerns cannot trump the plain language of the Freedom of Information Act or the underlying policy of the FOIA favoring public disclosure. See Klamath

Copr. © West 2003 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Water Users, 532 U.S. at 15-16 (refusing to read an "Indian Trust" exemption into the statute because "[t]here is simply no support for the exemption in the statutory text, which we have elsewhere insisted be read strictly in order to serve FOIA's mandate of broad disclosure.... In FOIA, after all, a new conception of Government conduct was enacted into law, 'a general philosophy of full agency disclosure.' " (quoting United States Dep't of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 142 (1989)); see also County of Madison v. United States Dep't of Justice, 641 F.2d at 1040 (requiring that "sound policy arguments, however appealing, be grounded in a reading of statutory language that fairly reconciles rather than simply ignores the FOIA's phrasing."); Center for Auto Safety v. Dep't of Justice, 576 F.Supp. at 748 ("The Court is sympathetic to the DOJ's predicament. Disclosure of these documents may arguably stifle consent decree negotiations. These factors, however, are for legislative not judicial concern, ..."). For these reasons, the Court concludes that all documents or portions thereof that were produced by or shared with the Government of Chile do not qualify as "inter-agency or intra-agency" documents and thus are not protected from disclosure by Exemption 5. [FN7]

FN7. Because these documents fail the first prong of the test for protection under Exemption 5 because they are not inter-agency or intra- agency documents, the Court does not reach the second prong of the test, namely the question of whether or not these documents are predecisional and deliberative in nature. See Klamath Water Users, 532 U.S. at 12 n.3.

b. Documents Containing Information Relating to Communications From or Meetings With Chile

The FOIA mandates that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such a record after deletion of the portions which are exempt." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Furthermore, "[i]t has long been a rule in this Circuit that non-exempt portions of a document must be disclosed unless they are inextricably intertwined with exempt portions." Mead Data Central, Inc. v. United States Dep't of the Air Force, 566 F.2d at 260. Plaintiffs therefore have challenged defendants' withholding of any reasonably segregable portions of internal documents containing " 'purely factual, nonexempt information" ' that relates to the negotiations with Chile. See Pl. Mem. (quoting Army Times Publishing Co. v. Dep't of the Air Force, 998 F.2d 1067, 1071 (D.C.Cir.1993) (citations omitted)). Plaintiffs claim that the index of documents reveals that several documents were withheld that contain factual descriptions or summaries of communications or meetings with Chile. Plaintiffs argue that such factual portions must be released. See Pl. Mem. at 25-26; Plaintiffs' Reply in Support of Plaintiffs' Motion for Summary Judgment at 12-13 ("Pl.Reply").

*11 In opposition, defendants argue that releasing such portions would expose USTR's deliberative process, either by revealing substantive information about the countries' negotiating positions or by revealing USTR's internal impressions and evaluations of the negotiations. See Def. Opp. at 9-10. As plaintiffs concede, even purely factual documents may be exempt from disclosure under Exemption 5 if the selection of facts for summary or description reflects an agency's deliberative process. See Pl. Reply at 12; Army Times Publishing Co. v. Dep't of the Air Force, 998 F.2d at 1071. But see Brownstein Zeidman & Schomer v. Dep't of the Air Force, 781 F.Supp. at 35 (requiring disclosure of running summaries of offers and counteroffers because, while the documents were not completely factual in nature, they also did not "include much in the way of negotiating strategy").

The Court has held that any documents produced by or exchanged with Chile are not protected by Exemption 5 because they are not inter-agency or intra-agency records. See supra, Section II.B.1(a). It follows that any factual portions of documents describing or summarizing such communications to or from Chile likewise are not protected. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. at 88. Furthermore, plaintiffs seek only those portions of documents that are non-deliberative in nature; any portions that reveal USTR's subjective impressions of Chile's proposals or the negotiations are necessarily excluded from this request. See Pl. Mem. at 25-26; Pl. Reply at 12-14. For these reasons, the Court holds that defendants must identify and release all reasonably segregable and factual, nondeliberative portions of documents relating to USTR's meetings or communications with Chile.

2. Exemption 1

Exemption 1 of the FOIA protects from disclosure any records that are "(A) specifically authorized under criteria established by an Executive order to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or foreign policy and (B) are in fact properly classified pursuant to such Executive order." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1). USTR has withheld five documents--Documents 209 and 211-214-- pursuant to this exemption under Executive Order 12, 958. The Executive Order allows classification where the original classification authority

Copr. © West 2003 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

REV_00264146

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Vacancies Act [1]

OA/NARA#: 340 / 236
9121

Box 61
Folder 12

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : USCS - United States Code Service; Code, Const, Rules, Conventions & Public Laws
Terms: "attorney general" /10 vacanc! (Edit Search)

5 USCS § 3345

UNITED STATES CODE SERVICE
Copyright 2000, LEXIS Law Publishing, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc.
All rights reserved.

 CURRENT THROUGH P.L. 106-418, APPROVED 11/1/00 ***
 WITH GAPS OF 106-398, 402, 405, 408, 411, 414, 415, 417 ***

TITLE 5. GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION AND EMPLOYEES
PART III. EMPLOYEES
SUBPART B. EMPLOYMENT AND RETENTION
CHAPTER 33. EXAMINATION, SELECTION, AND PLACEMENT
SUBCHAPTER III. DETAILS, VACANCIES, AND APPOINTMENTS

5 USCS § 3345 (2000)

§ 3345. Acting officer

(a) If an officer of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) whose appointment to office is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, dies, resigns, or is otherwise unable to perform the functions and duties of the office--

(1) the first assistant to the office of such officer shall perform the functions and duties of the office temporarily in an acting capacity subject to the time limitations of section 3346;

(2) notwithstanding paragraph (1), the President (and only the President) may direct a person who serves in an office for which appointment is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to perform the functions and duties of the vacant office temporarily in an acting capacity subject to the time limitations of section 3346; or

(3) notwithstanding paragraph (1), the President (and only the President) may direct an officer or employee of such Executive agency to perform the functions and duties of the vacant office temporarily in an acting capacity, subject to the time limitations of section 3346, if--

(A) during the 365-day period preceding the date of death, resignation, or beginning of inability to serve of the applicable officer, the officer or employee served in a position in such agency for not less than 90 days; and

(B) the rate of pay for the position described under subparagraph (A) is equal to or greater than the minimum rate of pay payable for a position at GS-15 of the General Schedule.

(b) (1) Notwithstanding subsection (a)(1), a person may not serve as an acting officer for an office under this section, if--

(A) during the 365-day period preceding the date of the death, resignation, or beginning of inability to serve, such person--

(i) did not serve in the position of first assistant to the office of such officer; or

(ii) served in the position of first assistant to the office of such officer for less than 90 days; and

(B) the President submits a nomination of such person to the Senate for appointment to such office.

(2) Paragraph (1) shall not apply to any person if--

(A) such person is serving as the first assistant to the office of an officer described under subsection (a);

(B) the office of such first assistant is an office for which appointment is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and

(C) the Senate has approved the appointment of such person to such office.

(c) (1) Notwithstanding subsection (a)(1), the President (and only the President) may direct an officer who is nominated by the President for reappointment for an additional term to the same office in an Executive department without a break in service, to continue to serve in that office subject to the time limitations in section 3346, until such time as the Senate has acted to confirm or reject the nomination, notwithstanding adjournment sine die.

(2) For purposes of this section and sections 3346, 3347, 3348, 3349, 3349a, and 3349d, the expiration of a term of office is an inability to perform the functions and duties of such office.

HISTORY:

(Added Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, Div C, Title I, § 151(b), 112 Stat. 2681-611.)

HISTORY; ANCILLARY LAWS AND DIRECTIVES

Prior law and revision:

Derivation	U.S. Code	Revised Statutes and Statutes at Large
.....	5 USC Sec. 4	R.S. Sec. 177.

The words "Executive department" are substituted for "department" as the definition of "department" applicable to this section is coextensive with the definition of "Executive department" in 5 USCS § 101.

The words "or military department" are inserted to preserve the application of the source law. Before enactment of the National Security Act Amendments of 1949 (63 Stat. 578), the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, and the Department of the Air Force were Executive departments. The National Security Act Amendments of 1949 established the Department of Defense as an Executive Department including the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, and the Department of the Air Force as military departments, not as Executive departments. However, the source law for this section, which was in effect in 1949, remained applicable to the Secretaries of the military departments by virtue of section 12(g) of the National Security Act Amendments of 1949 (63 Stat. 591), located at 5 USCS § 301 note.

This section was part of title IV of the Revised Statutes. Act July 26, 1947, ch 343, § 201 (d), as added Aug. 10, 1949, ch 412, § 4, 63 Stat. 579 (former 5 USC § 171-1), which provides "Except to the extent inconsistent with the provisions of this Act [National Security Act of 1947], the provisions of title IV of the Revised Statutes as now or hereafter amended shall be applicable to the Department of Defense" is omitted from this title but is not repealed.

Standard changes are made to conform with the definitions applicable and the style of this title.

Explanatory notes:

A prior § 3345 (Act Sept. 6, 1966, P.L. 89-554, § 1, 80 Stat. 425; Aug. 17, 1988, P.L. 100-398, § 7(a)(1), (2), 102 Stat. 988) was repealed by Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, Div C, Title I, § 151(b), 112 Stat. 2681-611, effective and applicable as provided by § 151(d) of such Act, which appears as a note to this section. Such section provided for details to office of head of Executive agency or military department.

Effective date of section:

This section took effect 30 days after enactment, pursuant to § 151(d)(1) of Division C of Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, which appears as a note to this section.

REV_00264148

Other provisions:

Order of succession of officers to act as Secretary of Defense. Ex. Or. 13000 of April 24, 1996, 61 Fed. Reg. 18483, provides:

"By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, including section 3347 of title 5, United States Code, it is hereby ordered as follows:

"Section 1. Succession to Act as the Secretary of Defense. (a) In the event of the death, permanent disability, or resignation of the Secretary of Defense, the incumbents holding the Department of Defense positions designated below, in the order indicated, shall act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of Defense as Acting Secretary of Defense:

"(1) Deputy Secretary of Defense.

"(2) Secretary of the Army.

"(3) Secretary of the Navy.

"(4) Secretary of the Air Force.

"(5) Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition and Technology [Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics].

"(6) Under Secretary of Defense for Policy.

"(7) Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller).

"(8) Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness.

"(9) Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition and Technology.

"(10) Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Policy.

"(11) Director of Defense Research and Engineering.

"(12) The Assistant Secretaries of Defense, the Director of Operational Test and Evaluation, and the General Counsel of the Department of Defense, in the order fixed by their length of service as permanent appointees in such positions.

"(13) Under Secretaries of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force, in the order fixed by their length of service as permanent appointees in such positions.

"(14) Assistant Secretaries of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force whose appointments are vested in the President, and General Counsels of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force, in the order fixed by their length of service as permanent appointees in such positions.

"(b) In the event of the temporary absence or temporary disability of the Secretary of Defense, the incumbents holding the Department of Defense positions designated in paragraph (a) of this section, in the order indicated, shall act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of Defense as Acting Secretary of Defense.

"(1) In these instances, the designation of an Acting Secretary of Defense applies only for the duration of the Secretary's absence or disability, and does not affect the authority of the Secretary to resume the powers of his office upon his return.

"(2) In the event that the Secretary of Defense is temporarily absent from his position, the Secretary may continue to exercise the powers and fulfill the duties of this office during his absence, notwithstanding the provisions of this order.

"(c) Precedence among those officers designated in paragraphs (a)(12)-(14) of this section who have the same appointment date shall be determined by the Secretary of Defense at the time that such appointments are made.

"(d) Notwithstanding paragraphs (a) and (b) of this section, an officer shall not act for or exercise the powers of the Secretary of Defense under this order if that officer serves only in an acting capacity in the position that would otherwise entitle him to do so.

"Sec. 2. Temporary Nature of Succession. Succession to act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of Defense pursuant to this order shall be on a temporary or interim basis and shall not have the effect of vacating the statutory appointment held by the successor.

"Sec. 3. Revocation of Prior Executive Order. Executive Order No. 12787 of December 31, 1991, is hereby revoked.".

Effective date and application of Oct. 21, 1998 amendments. Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, Div C, Title I, § 151(d), 112 Stat. 2681-616, provides:

"(1) Effective date. Subject to paragraph (2), this section and the amendments made by this section [amending 5 USCS §§ 3345 et seq. generally; for full classification, consult USCS

REV_00264149

Tables volumes] shall take effect 30 days after the date of enactment of this section.

"(2) Application.

(A) In general. This section shall apply to any office that becomes vacant after the effective date of this section.

"(B) Immediate application of time limitation. Notwithstanding subparagraph (A), for any office vacant on the effective date of this section, the time limitations under section 3346 of title 5, United States Code (as amended by this section) shall apply to such office. Such time limitations shall apply as though such office first became vacant on the effective date of this section.

"(C) Certain nominations. If the President submits to the Senate the nomination of any person after the effective date of this section for an office for which such person had been nominated before such date, the next nomination of such person after such date shall be considered a first nomination of such person to that office for purposes of sections 3345 through 3349 and section 3349d of title 5, United States Code (as amended by this section).".

NOTES:

CROSS REFERENCES

Additional pay prohibited for officer performing duties of vacant office as authorized by this section, 5 USCS § 5535.

Agricultural Department, application to Under Secretary, 7 USCS § 2211.

INTERPRETIVE NOTES AND DECISIONS

1. Generally
2. Presumption of authority
3. Challenges of authority
4. Authority of particular officials
5. Signature of documents

1. Generally

The language of 28 USCS § 508 concerning vacancy in the office of Attorney General differed from that of former 5 USCS § 3345 in one significant respect: § 508 speaks of any vacancy while former § 3345 spoke of specific reasons for the vacancy; thus, § 508 applies to a vacancy caused for any reason, including the expiration of the 30 day limit of the Vacancies Act. United States v Lucido (1974, ED Mich) 373 F Supp 1142, affd (1975, CA6 Mich) 517 F2d 1.

2. Presumption of authority

Tax appeal decided by Assistant Secretary of Treasury during absence or sickness of Secretary was presumed to be lawfully decided. John Shillito Co. v McClung (1892, CA6 Ohio) 51 F 868.

In absence of proof to contrary, it was presumed that second Assistant Secretary of Labor had authority to act under predecessor to 5 USCS § 3345. MacKusick ex rel. Pattavina v Johnson (1924, CA1 Mass) 3 F2d 398.

Closing agreement under Internal Revenue law was valid though signed by Acting Secretary since it is to be presumed that Secretary was absent or ill. Perry v Page (1933, CA1 RI) 67 F2d 635, 3 USTC P 1171, 13 AFTR 362, cert den (1934) 292 US 632, 78 L Ed 1485, 54 S Ct 641.

Court would assume, in absence of evidence to contrary, that Acting Secretary of Commerce and Labor was lawfully exercising powers of secretary in hearing appeal in deportation proceedings and that deportation writ was properly signed by Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Labor. United States ex rel. Calamia v Redfern (1910, CC La) 180 F 506.

3. Challenges of authority

In deportation proceedings, Chinese immigrant was entitled to have his appeal heard by the Secretary of Commerce instead of his assistant except under conditions provided in predecessor to 5 USCS § 3345; and point could be raised by habeas corpus. Ex parte Tsuie Shee (1914, DC Cal) 218 F 256.

REV_00264150

4. Authority of particular officials

Acting Secretary of War had authority of Secretary. Ryan v United States (1890) 136 US 68, 34 L Ed 447, 10 S Ct 913.

During absence of Secretary and Assistant Secretary of war, chief clerk might be authorized to sign documents. 24 OP Atty Gen 646.

5. Signature of documents

When Assistant Secretary of Interior acts at time secretary is not absent or sick under regulation made by Secretary prescribing his powers, he should sign with his own proper official designation; when secretary is sick or absent, if assistant is in charge of department, he should sign as acting secretary. 19 OP Atty Gen 133.

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : USCS - United States Code Service; Code, Const, Rules, Conventions & Public Laws
Terms: "attorney general" /10 vacanc! (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, January 12, 2001 - 2:24 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

REV_00264151

Service: LEXSTAT®
Citation: 5 u.s.c. 3346

5 USCS § 3346

UNITED STATES CODE SERVICE
Copyright 2000, LEXIS Law Publishing, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc.
All rights reserved.

 CURRENT THROUGH P.L. 106-418, APPROVED 11/1/00 ***
 WITH GAPS OF 106-398, 402, 405, 408, 411, 414, 415, 417 ***

TITLE 5. GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION AND EMPLOYEES
PART III. EMPLOYEES
SUBPART B. EMPLOYMENT AND RETENTION
CHAPTER 33. EXAMINATION, SELECTION, AND PLACEMENT
SUBCHAPTER III. DETAILS, VACANCIES, AND APPOINTMENTS

5 USCS § 3346 (2000)

§ 3346. Time limitation

(a) Except in the case of a vacancy caused by sickness, the person serving as an acting officer as described under section 3345 may serve in the office--
(1) for no longer than 210 days beginning on the date the vacancy occurs; or
(2) subject to subsection (b), once a first or second nomination for the office is submitted to the Senate, from the date of such nomination for the period that the nomination is pending in the Senate.

(b) (1) If the first nomination for the office is rejected by the Senate, withdrawn, or returned to the President by the Senate, the person may continue to serve as the acting officer for no more than 210 days after the date of such rejection, withdrawal, or return.
(2) Notwithstanding paragraph (1), if a second nomination for the office is submitted to the Senate after the rejection, withdrawal, or return of the first nomination, the person serving as the acting officer may continue to serve--
(A) until the second nomination is confirmed; or
(B) for no more than 210 days after the second nomination is rejected, withdrawn, or returned.

(c) If a vacancy occurs during an adjournment of the Congress sine die, the 210-day period under subsection (a) shall begin on the date that the Senate first reconvenes.

HISTORY:
(Added Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, Div C, Title I, § 151(b), 112 Stat. 2681-612.)

HISTORY; ANCILLARY LAWS AND DIRECTIVES

Prior law and revision:

Derivation	U.S. Code	Revised Statutes and Statutes at Large
.....	5 USC Sec. 5	R.S. Sec. 178.

The words "his first assistant" are substituted for "the assistant or deputy of such chief or of such officer, or if there be none, then the chief clerk of such bureau". A chief of a bureau is an officer within the meaning of this section. The words "Executive department" are substituted for "department" as the definition of "department" applicable to this section is coextensive with the definition of "Executive department" in 5 USCS § 101.

The words "or military department" are inserted to preserve the application of the source law. Before enactment of the National Security Act Amendments of 1949 (63 Stat. 578), the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, and the Department of the Air Force were Executive departments. The National Security Act Amendments of 1949 established the Department of Defense as an Executive Department including the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, and the Department of the Air Force as military departments, not as Executive departments. However, the source law for this section, which was in effect in 1949, remained applicable to the Secretaries of the military departments by virtue of section 12(g) of the National Security Act Amendments of 1949 (63 Stat. 591), located at 5 USCS § 301 note.

Standard changes are made to conform with the definitions applicable and the style of this title.

Explanatory notes:

A prior § 3346 (Act Sept. 6, 1966, P.L. 89-554, § 1, 80 Stat. 426) was repealed by Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, Div C, Title I, § 151(b), 112 Stat. 2681-611, effective and applicable as provided by § 151(d) of such Act, which appears as 5 USCS § 3345 note. Such section provided for details to subordinate offices.

Effective date of section:

This section took effect 30 days after enactment, pursuant to § 151(d)(1) of Division C of Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, which appears as 5 USCS § 3345 note.

Other provisions:

Applicability of section. For provisions relating to applicability of this section, see § 151(d)(2) of Division C of Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, which appears as 5 USCS § 3345 note.

INTERPRETIVE NOTES AND DECISIONS

1. Generally
2. Relationship with other laws
3. Computation of period
4. Effect of expiration of period
5. Challenges to legality of detail after period expires
6. Particular vacancies

1. Generally

Predecessor to 5 USCS § 3346 limited period during which vacancy might be filled either by statutory succession or by designation by President, or by both. 17 Op Atty Gen 535.

2. Relationship with other laws

Wiretaps authorized by the Deputy Attorney General after expiration of 30-day [now 210-day] limitation period were valid, since even if time limitations imposed by former 5 USCS § 3348 had expired, provisions of 28 USCS § 508 came into play. United States v Lucido (1974, ED Mich) 373 F Supp 1142, affd (1975, CA6 Mich) 517 F2d 1.

Thirty day [now 210-day] limitation imposed by former 5 USCS § 3348 was not applicable to Solicitor General, who became Acting Attorney General pursuant to 28 USCS § 508(b), rather than as "first assistant" pursuant to former 5 USCS § 3348. United States v Halmo (1974, ED Wis) 386 F Supp 593.

3. Computation of period

Time limit for filling vacancy caused by death or resignation of constitutionally appointed officer did not begin to run until someone actually took office pursuant to Vacancies Act, either through detail under former §§ 3345 or 3346, or through Presidential directive pursuant to former § 3347; language of former § 3348 said how long position could be filled, not when President had to do filling. Doolin Sec. Sav. Bank, F.S.B. v Office of Thrift Supervision (1998, App DC) 139 F3d 203.

REV_00264153

Limitation was computed from time of appointment. 15 Op Atty Gen 457.

4. Effect of expiration of period

Position of Insurance Administrator under 42 USCS § 3533a could be filled by Acting Administrator for 30 days [now 210-days] only pursuant to former 5 USCS § 3348; thereafter, there was no legal authority for incumbent or anyone else to serve as Acting Insurance Administrator. (1977) 56 Op Comp Gen 761.

5. Challenges to legality of detail after period expires

Government employee was estopped to attack illegality of overly long detail in "acting" position while being paid at lower rate, since he had been willing to retain status beyond time limit since he hoped to obtain promotion. Peters v United States (1975) 208 Ct Cl 373, 534 F2d 232.

Plaintiff, who had been in "acting" position for more than specified time period, was not estopped from challenging legality of overly long appointment. Goutos v United States (1976) 212 Ct Cl 95, 552 F2d 922.

Individuals occupying offices pursuant to Vacancies Act (5 USCS §§ 3345 et seq.) should refrain from taking action at end of 30-day [now 210-day] period as such actions taken subsequent to expiration of 30-day [now 210-day] time limitation are of uncertain validity. (1986) 65 Op Comp Gen p. 626.

6. Particular vacancies

Thirty day [now 120-day] limitation imposed by former 5 USCS § 3348 was not applicable to Solicitor General, who became Acting Attorney General pursuant to 28 USCS § 508(b), rather than as "first assistant" pursuant to 5 USCS § 3348. United States v Halmo (1974, ED Wis) 386 F Supp 593.

Predecessor to 5 USCS § 3348 applied to statutory succession of deputy auditor. 18 Op Atty Gen 50.

Predecessor to 5 USCS § 3348 was applicable upon death of Secretary of Treasury. 18 Op Atty Gen 58.

Predecessor to 5 USCS § 3348 was applicable to position of Secretary of State, whether filled by statutory succession or appointment. 32 Op Atty Gen 139.

Service: LEXSTAT®
Citation: 5 u.s.c. 3346
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, January 12, 2001 - 2:50 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

Service: LEXSTAT®
Citation: 5 u.s.c. 3347

5 USCS § 3347

UNITED STATES CODE SERVICE
Copyright 2000, LEXIS Law Publishing, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc.
All rights reserved.

 CURRENT THROUGH P.L. 106-418, APPROVED 11/1/00 ***
 WITH GAPS OF 106-398, 402, 405, 408, 411, 414, 415, 417 ***

TITLE 5. GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION AND EMPLOYEES
PART III. EMPLOYEES
SUBPART B. EMPLOYMENT AND RETENTION
CHAPTER 33. EXAMINATION, SELECTION, AND PLACEMENT
SUBCHAPTER III. DETAILS, VACANCIES, AND APPOINTMENTS

5 USCS § 3347 (2000)

§ 3347. Exclusivity

(a) Sections 3345 and 3346 are the exclusive means for temporarily authorizing an acting official to perform the functions and duties of any office of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) for which appointment is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, unless--

(1) a statutory provision expressly--

(A) authorizes the President, a court, or the head of an Executive department, to designate an officer or employee to perform the functions and duties of a specified office temporarily in an acting capacity; or

(B) designates an officer or employee to perform the functions and duties of a specified office temporarily in an acting capacity; or

(2) the President makes an appointment to fill a vacancy in such office during the recess of the Senate pursuant to clause 3 of section 2 of article II of the United States Constitution.

(b) Any statutory provision providing general authority to the head of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) to delegate duties statutorily vested in that agency head to, or to reassign duties among, officers or employees of such Executive agency, is not a statutory provision to which subsection (a)(1) applies.

HISTORY:

(Added Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, Div C, Title I, § 151(b), 112 Stat. 2681-613; May 21, 1999, P.L. 106-31, Title V, § 5011, 113 Stat. 112.)

HISTORY; ANCILLARY LAWS AND DIRECTIVES

Derivation	U.S. Code	Revised Statutes and Statutes at Large
.....	5 USC Sec. 6	R.S. Sec. 179.

The words "in his discretion", "vacant", and "incumbent" are omitted as surplusage. The words "Executive department" are substituted for "department" as the definition of "department" applicable to this section is coextensive with the definition of "Executive department" in 5 USCS § 101. As used, the word "an" is coextensive with and substituted for "either".

The words "or military department" are inserted to preserve the application of the source law. Before enactment of the National Security Act Amendments of 1949 (63 Stat. 578), the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, and the Department of the Air Force were Executive departments. The National Security Act Amendments of 1949 established the Department of Defense as an Executive Department including the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, and the Department of the Air Force as military departments, not as Executive departments. However, the source law for this section, which was in effect in 1949, remained applicable to the secretaries of the military departments by virtue of section 12(g) of the National Security Act Amendments of 1949 (63 Stat. 591), located at 5 USCS § 301 note.

Standard changes are made to conform with the definitions applicable and the style of this title.

Explanatory notes:

A prior § 3347 (Act Sept. 6, 1966, P.L. 89-554, § 1, 80 Stat. 426) was repealed by Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, Div C, Title I, § 151(b), 112 Stat. 2681-611, effective and applicable as provided by § 151(d) of such Act, which appears as 5 USCS § 3345 note. Such section provided for details; Presidential authority.

Effective date of section:

This section took effect 30 days after enactment, pursuant to § 151(d)(1) of Division C of Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, which appears as 5 USCS § 3345 note.

Amendments:

1999. Act May 21, 1999, in subsec. (b), substituted "provision to which subsection (a)(1) applies" for "provision to which subsection (a)(2) applies".

Other provisions:

Ex. Or. No. 9967. Ex. Or. No. 9967 of June 12, 1948, 13 Fed. Reg. 3249, formerly classified as a note to this section, was superseded by Ex. Or. No. 10481 of Aug. 15, 1953, 18 Fed. Reg. 4944. These orders related to the designation of officers of the Department of Agriculture to act as the Secretary of Agriculture.

Ex. Or. No. 10148. Ex. Or. No. 10148 of Aug. 5, 1950, 15 Fed. Reg. 5067, formerly classified to 15 USCS § 1502, was superseded by Ex. Or. No. 11388 of Jan. 15, 1968, 33 Fed. Reg. 563, formerly classified as a note to this section. Ex. Or. No. 10148 related to the designation of officers of the Department of Commerce to act as the Secretary of Commerce.

Ex. Or. No. 10481. Ex. Or. No. 10481 of Aug. 15, 1953, 18 Fed. Reg. 4944, formerly classified as a note to this section, was revoked by Ex. Or. No. 11793 of July 10, 1954, 39 Fed. Reg. 25631, formerly classified as a note to this section. Ex. Or. No. 10481 related to the designation of certain officers of the Department of Agriculture to act as the Secretary of Agriculture.

Designation of officers to act as Secretary of Labor. Ex. Or. No. 10513 of Jan. 19, 1954, 19 Fed. Reg. 369, provides: "I hereby authorize and direct the Assistant Secretaries of Labor and the Solicitor of Labor, in the order designated as hereinafter provided, to perform the duties of the office of the Secretary of Labor in case of the absence, sickness, resignation, or death of both the Secretary of Labor and the Under Secretary of Labor.

"The Assistant Secretaries of Labor and the Solicitor of Labor shall act as Secretary of Labor as herein provided (1) in such order as the Secretary of Labor (or the Under Secretary when acting as Secretary) may by order designate from time to time, or (2) if no such designation order is in effect at the time, in the order of the respective dates of their commissions, or in the event that two or more of their commissions bear the same date, in the order in which they shall have taken their oath of office.

"This order supersedes Executive Order No. 9968 of June 17, 1948, entitled 'Designation of Certain Officers To Act as Secretary of Labor.'".

REV_00264156

Ex. Or. No. 10753. Ex. Or. No. 10753 of Feb. 18, 1958, 23 Fed. Reg. 1107, formerly classified as a note to this section, was superseded by Ex. Or. No. 11487 of Oct. 6, 1969, 34 Fed. Reg. 15593, which appears as a note to this section. Ex. Or. No. 10753 related to the designation of officers of the Department of the Interior to act as the Secretary of the Interior.

Ex. Or. No. 10820. Ex Or. No. 10820 of May 18, 1959, 24 Fed Reg. 4045, formerly classified as a note to this section, was revoked by Ex. Or. No. 12514 of May 14, 1985, 50 Fed. Reg. 20383. It provided for the order of succession of officers in certain posts.

Ex. Or. No. 10839. Ex. Or. No. 10839 of Sept. 30, 1959, 24 Fed. Reg. 7339, formerly classified as a note to this section, was revoked by Ex. Or. No. 12343 of Jan. 27, 1982, § 3, 47 Fed. Reg. 4225, which appears as a note to this section. It provided for an order of succession in the Department of State.

Ex. Or. 10941. Ex. Or. No. 10941 of May 16, 1961, 26 Fed. Reg. 4277, formerly classified as a note to this section, was revoked by Ex. Or. No. 11680 of Aug. 21, 1972, 37 Fed. Reg. 16907, formerly classified as a note to this section. Ex. Or. No. 10941 provided for the order of succession in the Treasury Department.

Designation of officers to act as Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. Ex. Or. No. 11274 of March 30, 1966, 31 Fed. Reg. 5243, provides:

"1. In the event of a vacancy in the Office of the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development or during the absence or disability of the Secretary, the Under [Deputy] Secretary shall act as Secretary of Housing and Urban Development.

"2. During any period when, by reason of absence, disability, or vacancy in office, neither the Secretary nor the Under [Deputy] Secretary is available to exercise the powers or perform the duties of the Office of the Secretary, an Assistant Secretary or the General Counsel, in such order as the Secretary may from time to time prescribe, shall act as Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. If no such order of succession is in effect at that time, then they shall act in the order in which they shall have taken office as Assistant Secretaries or General Counsel.".

Designation of officers to act as Postmaster General. Ex. Or. No. 11313 of Oct. 15, 1966, 31 Fed. Reg. 13417, provides:

"Section 1. In the event of a vacancy in the office of Postmaster General or during the absence or disability of the Postmaster General, the Deputy Postmaster General shall act as Postmaster General.

"Sec. 2. During any period when, by reason of absence, disability, or vacancy in office, neither the Postmaster General nor the Deputy Postmaster General is available to exercise the powers or perform the duties of the office of Postmaster General, an Assistant Postmaster General or the General Counsel of the Post Office Department, in such order as the Postmaster General may from time to time prescribe in writing, shall act as Postmaster General. If no such order of succession is in effect at that time, they shall act as Postmaster General in the order in which they shall have taken office as Assistant Postmasters General or General Counsel.

"Sec. 3. The following are hereby superseded:

"(1) Executive Order No. 10154 of August 22, 1950.

"(2) Executive Order No. 10558 of September 8, 1954.

"(3) Executive Order No. 10686 of November 1, 1956.".

Ex. Or. No. 11388. Ex. Or. No. 11388 of Jan. 15, 1968, 33 Fed. Reg. 562, formerly classified as a note to this section, was superseded by Ex. Or. No. 11880 of Oct. 2, 1975, 40 Fed. Reg. 46089, which appears as a note to this section. Ex. Or. No. 11388 related to the designation of officers of the Department of Commerce to act as the Secretary of Commerce.

Designation of officers to act as Secretary of Interior. Ex. Or. No. 11487 of Oct. 6, 1969, 34 Fed. Reg. 15593, provides:

"Section 1. During any period when by reason of absence, disability, or vacancy in office, neither the Secretary of the Interior nor the Under [Deputy] Secretary of the Interior is available to exercise the powers or perform the duties of the office of Secretary, as Assistant

REV_00264157

Secretary of the Interior or the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior, in such order as the Secretary of the Interior may from time to time prescribe, shall act as Secretary. If no such order of succession is in effect at that time, they shall act as Secretary in the order in which they shall have taken office as Assistant Secretaries or Solicitor.

"Sec. 2. This order supersedes Executive Order No. 10753 of February 15, 1958, entitled 'Designation of certain officers of the Department of the Interior to act as Secretary of the Interior.".

Ex. Or. No. 11680. Ex. Or. No. 11680 of Aug. 21, 1972, 37 Fed. Reg. 16907, formerly classified as a note to this section, was revoked by Ex. Or. No. 11822 of Dec. 10, 1974, 39 Fed. Reg. 43275, classified as a note to this section. Ex. Or. No. 11680 provided for the order of succession in the Treasury Department.

Ex. Or. No. 11793. Ex. Or. No. 11793 of July 10, 1974, 39 Fed. Reg. 25631, formerly classified as a note to this section, was revoked by Ex. Or. No. 11957 of Jan. 13, 1977, 42 Fed. Reg. 3295, which appears as a note to this section. Ex. Or. No. 11793 provided for the designation of certain officers of the Agriculture Department to act as Secretary of Agriculture.

Designation of officers to act as Secretary of Treasury. Ex. Or. No. 11822 of Dec. 10, 1974, 39 Fed. Reg. 43275, provides:

"Section 1. During any period when, by reason of absence, disability, or vacancy in office, either the Secretary of the Treasury or his Deputy Secretary is not available to exercise the powers or perform the duties of the office of Secretary, an officer from the Department of the Treasury appointed by the President--by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in such order as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe--shall act as Secretary until the absence or the disability of the incumbent shall cease, or until a successor is appointed. If no such order of succession is in effect at that time, then such officers shall act as Secretary in the descending order of rank, as established by their offices being listed in sections 5314, 5315 or 5316 of title 5 of the United States Code and, at each level of the Executive Schedule, in the order which they shall have taken the oath as such officers.

"Section 2. Executive Order No. 11680 of August 21, 1972, entitled 'Designation of Certain Officers to Act as Secretary of the Treasury' is hereby revoked.".

Designation of officers to act as Secretary of Commerce. Ex. Or. No. 11880 of Oct. 2, 1975, 40 Fed. Reg. 46089, as amended by Ex. Or. No. 12608 of Sept. 9, 1987, 52 Fed. Reg. 34617; Ex. Or. No. 12998 of April 5, 1996, 61 Fed. Reg. 15873, provides:

"Section 1. During any period when, by reason of absence, disability or vacancy in office, both the Secretary of Commerce and the Deputy Secretary of Commerce are not available to exercise the powers or perform the duties of the Office of Secretary, an Assistant Secretary of Commerce, the General Counsel of the Department of Commerce, or an officer of the Department of Commerce appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate in such order as the Secretary of Commerce may from time to time prescribe, shall act as Secretary. If no such order of succession is in effect at that time, an Assistant Secretary or the General Counsel shall act as Secretary in the order in which they shall have taken office as Assistant Secretaries or General Counsel.

Sec. 2. The President may at any time, pursuant to law but without regard to the foregoing provisions of this order, direct that an officer, as defined in 5 U.S.C. 3347, and specified by the President shall act as Secretary of Commerce.

"Sec. 3. This Order supersedes Executive Order No. 11388 [former note to this section] of January 15, 1968.".

Designation of officers to act as Secretary of Agriculture. Ex. Or. No. 11957 of Jan. 13, 1977, 42 Fed. Reg. 3295, provides:

"Section 1. During any period when, by reason of absence, disability, or vacancy in office, both the Secretary of Agriculture and the Deputy Secretary of Agriculture are not available to exercise the powers or perform the duties of the Office of Secretary, the officers from the Department of Agriculture whose appointments are vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall act as Secretary in such order as the Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time prescribe. If no such order of succession is in effect at that time, then such officers shall act as Secretary in the descending order of rank, as established by the listing of their offices in Sections 5314, 5315 or 5316 of Title 5 of the United States Code and, at each level of the Executive Schedule, in the order in which they shall have taken oath as such officers.

REV_00264158

"Sec. 2. Executive Order No. 11793 of July 10, 1974, is hereby revoked.".

Designation of officers to act as Secretary of State. Ex. Or. No. 12343 of Jan. 27, 1982, 47 Fed. Reg. 4225, provides:

"By the authority vested in me as President of the United States of America by Section 3347 of Title 5 and Section 301 of Title 3 of the United States Code, it is hereby ordered as follows:

"Section 1. During any period when, by reason of absence, disability, or vacancy in office, neither the Secretary of State nor the Deputy Secretary of State, is available to exercise the powers or perform the duties of the Office of the Secretary, an officer from the Department of State who has been appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in such order as the Secretary of State may from time to time prescribe, shall act as Secretary. If no such order of succession is in effect at that time, then such officers shall act as Secretary in descending order of rank, as established by the listing of their offices in Sections 5314 or 5315 of Title 5 of the United States Code, and at each level of the Executive Schedule in the order in which they shall have taken the oath as such officers.

"Sec. 2. The President may at any time, pursuant to law but without regard to the foregoing provisions of this Order, direct that an officer specified by the President shall act as Secretary of State.

"Sec. 3. Executive Order No. 10839 [former note to this section] is revoked.".

Ex. Or. No. 12514. Ex. Or. No. 12514 of May 14, 1985, 50 Fed. Reg. 20383, formerly classified as a note to this section, was revoked by § 3 of Ex. Or. 12787 of Dec. 31, 1991, 57 Fed. Reg. 517, which appears as a note to this section. The order provided for the order of succession of officers in certain posts to the position of Secretary of Defense.

Ex. Or. No. 12787. Ex. Or. No. 12787 of Dec. 31, 1991, 57 Fed. Reg. 517, formerly classified as a note to this section, was revoked by Ex. Or. No. 13000 of April 24, 1996, 61 Fed. Reg. 18483. It provided for the order of succession of officers to act as Secretary of Defense.

Order of succession of officers to act as Secretary of the Navy. Ex. Or. No. 12879 of Nov. 8, 1993, 58 Fed. Reg. 59929, provides:

"By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, including section 3347 of title 5, United States Code, it is hereby ordered as follows:

"Section 1. Succession to the Authority of the Secretary of the Navy.

(a) In the event of the death, permanent disability, or resignation of the Secretary of the Navy, the incumbents holding the positions designated below, in the order indicated, shall act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of the Navy:

"(1) The Under Secretary of the Navy.

"(2) The Assistant Secretaries and General Counsel of the Navy, in the order fixed by their length of services as permanent appointees in such positions.

"(3) The Chief of Naval Operations.

"(4) The Commandant of the Marine Corps.

"(b) In the event of the temporary absence or temporary disability of the Secretary of the Navy, the incumbents holding the Department of the Navy positions designated in paragraph (a) of this section, in the order indicated, shall act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of the Navy.

"(1) In these instances, the designation of an Acting Secretary of the Navy applies only for the duration of the Secretary's absence or disability, and does not affect the authority of the Secretary to resume the powers of his office upon his return.

"(2) In the event that the Secretary of the Navy is merely absent from this position, the Secretary of the Navy may continue to exercise the powers and fulfill the duties of his office during his absence, notwithstanding the provisions of this order.

"(c) Precedence among those officers designated in paragraph (a) of this section who have the same date of appointment shall be determined by the Secretary of the Navy at the time that such appointments are made.

REV_00264159

"(d) Notwithstanding paragraph (a) and (b) of this section, an officer shall not act for or exercise the powers of the Secretary of the Navy under this order if that officer serves only in an acting capacity in the position that would otherwise entitle him to do so.

"Sec. 2. Temporary Nature of Succession. Succession to act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of the Navy pursuant to this order shall be on a temporary or interim basis and shall not have the effect of vacating the statutory appointment held by the successor.".

Order of succession of officers to act as Secretary of the Army. Ex. Or. No. 12908 of April 22, 1994, 59 Fed. Reg. 21907, provides:

"By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, including section 3347 of title 5, United States Code, it is hereby ordered as follows:

"Section 1. Succession to act as the Secretary of the Army.

"(a) In the event of the death, permanent disability, or resignation of the Secretary of the Army, the incumbents holding the positions designated below, in the order indicated, shall act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of the Army:

"(1) The Under Secretary of the Army.

"(2) The Assistant Secretaries and General Counsel of the Army, in the order fixed by their length of service as permanent appointees in such positions.

"(3) The Chief of Staff of the Army.

"(b) In the event of the absence or temporary disability of the Secretary of the Army, the incumbents holding the Department of the Army positions designated in paragraph (a) of this section, in the order indicated, shall act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of the Army.

"(1) The designation of an Acting Secretary of the Army under this subsection applies only for the duration of the Secretary's absence or disability, and does not affect the authority of the Secretary to resume the powers of the Secretary's office.

"(2) When the Secretary of the Army is temporarily absent from the position, the Secretary of the Army may continue to exercise the powers and fulfill the duties of his office during his absence, notwithstanding the provisions of this order.

"(c) Precedence among those officers designated in paragraph (a) of this section who have the same date of appointment shall be determined by the Secretary of the Army at the time that such appointments are made.

"(d) Notwithstanding paragraphs (a) and (b) of this section, an officer shall not act for or exercise the powers of the Secretary of the Army under this order if that officer serves only in an acting capacity in the position that would otherwise entitle him to do so.

"Sec. 2. Temporary nature of succession. Succession to act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of the Army pursuant to this order shall be on a temporary or interim basis and shall not have the effect of vacating the statutory appointment held by the successor.".

Order of succession of officers to act as Secretary of the Air Force. Ex. Or. No. 12909 of April 22, 1994, 59 Fed. Reg. 21909, provides:

"By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, including section 3347 of title 5, United States Code, it is hereby ordered as follows:

"Section 1. Succession to act as the Secretary of the Air Force.

"(a) In the event of the death, permanent disability, or resignation of the Secretary of the Air Force, the incumbents holding the positions designated below, in the order indicated, shall act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of the Air Force:

"(1) The Under Secretary of the Air Force.

"(2) The Assistant Secretaries and General Counsel of the Air Force, in the order fixed by their length of service as permanent appointees in such positions.

"(3) The Chief of Staff of the Air Force.

"(b) In the event of the absence or temporary disability of the Secretary of the Air Force, the incumbents holding the Department of the Air Force positions designated in paragraph (a) of this section, in the order indicated, shall act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of the Air Force.

REV_00264160

"(1) The designation of an Acting Secretary of the Air Force applies only for the duration of the Secretary's absence or disability, and does not affect the authority of the Secretary to resume the powers of the Secretary's office.

"(2) In the event that the Secretary of the Air Force is temporarily absent from the position, the Secretary of the Air Force may continue to exercise the powers and fulfill the duties of his office during the absence, notwithstanding the provisions of this order.

"(c) Precedence among those officers designated in paragraph (a) of this section who have the same date of appointment shall be determined by the Secretary of the Air Force at the time that such appointments are made.

"(d) Notwithstanding paragraphs (a) and (b) of this section, an officer shall not act for or exercise the powers of the Secretary of the Air Force under this order if that officer serves only in an acting capacity in the position that would otherwise entitle him to do so.

"Sec. 2. Temporary nature of succession. Succession to act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of the Air Force pursuant to this order shall be on a temporary or interim basis and shall not have the effect of vacating the statutory appointment held by the successor.".

Transfer of order relating to succession of officers to act as Secretary of Defense. Ex. Or. 13000 of April 24, 1996, 61 Fed. Reg. 18483, which formerly appeared as a note to this section, was transferred to 5 USCS § 3345 note.

Applicability of section. For provisions relating to applicability of this section, see § 151(d)(2) of Division C of Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, which appears as 5 USCS § 3345 note.

Service: LEXSTAT®
Citation: 5 u.s.c. 3347
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, January 12, 2001 - 6:12 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

Service: LEXSTAT®
Citation: 5 USCS § 3348

5 USCS § 3348

UNITED STATES CODE SERVICE
Copyright 2000, LEXIS Law Publishing, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc.
All rights reserved.

 CURRENT THROUGH P.L. 106-418, APPROVED 11/1/00 ***
 WITH GAPS OF 106-398, 402, 405, 408, 411, 414, 415, 417 ***

TITLE 5. GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION AND EMPLOYEES
PART III. EMPLOYEES
SUBPART B. EMPLOYMENT AND RETENTION
CHAPTER 33. EXAMINATION, SELECTION, AND PLACEMENT
SUBCHAPTER III. DETAILS, VACANCIES, AND APPOINTMENTS

5 USCS § 3348 (2000)

§ 3348. Vacant office

(a) In this section--
(1) the term "action" includes any agency action as defined under section 551(13); and
(2) the term "function or duty" means any function or duty of the applicable office that--
(A) (i) is established by statute; and
(ii) is required by statute to be performed by the applicable officer (and only that officer); or
(B) (i) (I) is established by regulation; and
(II) is required by such regulation to be performed by the applicable officer (and only that officer); and
(ii) includes a function or duty to which clause (i) (I) and (II) applies, and the applicable regulation is in effect at any time during the 180-day period preceding the date on which the vacancy occurs.

(b) Unless an officer or employee is performing the functions and duties in accordance with sections 3345, 3346, and 3347, if an officer of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) whose appointment to office is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, dies, resigns, or is otherwise unable to perform the functions and duties of the office--
(1) the office shall remain vacant; and
(2) in the case of an office other than the office of the head of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office), only the head of such Executive agency may perform any function or duty of such office.

(c) If the last day of any 210-day period under section 3346 is a day on which the Senate is not in session, the second day the Senate is next in session and receiving nominations shall be deemed to be the last day of such period.

(d) (1) An action taken by any person who is not acting under section 3345, 3346, or 3347, or as provided by subsection (b), in the performance of any function or duty of a vacant office to which this section and sections 3346, 3347, 3349, 3349a, 3349b, and 3349c apply shall have no force or effect.
(2) An action that has no force or effect under paragraph (1) may not be ratified.

(e) This section shall not apply to--
(1) the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board;
(2) the General Counsel of the Federal Labor Relations Authority;
(3) any Inspector General appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;
(4) any Chief Financial Officer appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; or
(5) an office of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) if a statutory provision expressly prohibits the head of the Executive agency from performing the functions and duties of such office.

HISTORY:
(Added Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, Div C, Title I, § 151(b), 112 Stat. 2681-613.)

HISTORY; ANCILLARY LAWS AND DIRECTIVES

Prior law and revision:

Derivation	U.S. Code	Revised Statutes and Statutes at Large
.....	5 USC Sec. 7	R.S. Sec. 180. Feb. 6, 1891, ch 113, 26 Stat. 733.

Standard changes are made to conform with the definitions applicable and the style of this title.

Explanatory notes:
A prior § 3348 (Act Sept. 6, 1966, P.L. 89-554, § 1, 80 Stat. 426; Aug. 17, 1988, P.L. 100-398, § 7(b), 102 Stat. 988) was repealed by Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, Div C, Title I, § 151(b), 112 Stat. 2681-611, effective and applicable as provided by § 151(d) of such Act, which appears as 5 USCS § 3345 note. Such section provided for limitation of details with respect to time.

Effective date of section:
This section took effect 30 days after enactment, pursuant to § 151(d)(1) of Division C of Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, which appears as 5 USCS § 3345 note.

Other provisions:
Applicability of section. For provisions relating to applicability of this section, see § 151(d)(2) of Division C of Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, which appears as 5 USCS § 3345 note.

Service: LEXSTAT®
Citation: 5 USCS § 3348
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, January 12, 2001 - 6:41 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

REV_00264163

REV_00264164

Service: LEXSTAT®
Citation: 5 USCS § 3349

5 USCS § 3349

UNITED STATES CODE SERVICE
Copyright 2000, LEXIS Law Publishing, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc.
All rights reserved.

 CURRENT THROUGH P.L. 106-418, APPROVED 11/1/00 ***
 WITH GAPS OF 106-398, 402, 405, 408, 411, 414, 415, 417 ***

TITLE 5. GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION AND EMPLOYEES
PART III. EMPLOYEES
SUBPART B. EMPLOYMENT AND RETENTION
CHAPTER 33. EXAMINATION, SELECTION, AND PLACEMENT
SUBCHAPTER III. DETAILS, VACANCIES, AND APPOINTMENTS

CRS Report 95-92A

5 USCS § 3349 (2000)

§ 3349. Reporting of vacancies

(a) The head of each Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) shall submit to the Comptroller General of the United States and to each House of Congress--

(1) notification of a vacancy in an office to which this section and sections 3345, 3346, 3347, 3348, 3349a, 3349b, 3349c, and 3349d apply and the date such vacancy occurred immediately upon the occurrence of the vacancy;

(2) the name of any person serving in an acting capacity and the date such service began immediately upon the designation;

(3) the name of any person nominated to the Senate to fill the vacancy and the date such nomination is submitted immediately upon the submission of the nomination; and

(4) the date of a rejection, withdrawal, or return of any nomination immediately upon such rejection, withdrawal, or return.

(b) If the Comptroller General of the United States makes a determination that an officer is serving longer than the 210-day period including the applicable exceptions to such period under section 3346 or section 3349a, the Comptroller General shall report such determination immediately to--

(1) the Committee on Governmental Affairs of the Senate;
(2) the Committee on Government Reform and Oversight of the House of Representatives;
(3) the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Reqresentatives;
(4) the appropriate committees of jurisdiction of the Senate and House of Representatives;

(5) the President; and
(6) the Office of Personnel Management.

HISTORY:

(Added Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, Div C, Title I, § 151(b), 112 Stat. 2681-614.)

HISTORY; ANCILLARY LAWS AND DIRECTIVES

Prior law and revision:

Derivation	U.S. Code	Revised Statutes and Statutes at Large

REV_00264165

..... 5 USC Sec. 8 R.S. Sec. 181.

The prohibition is restated in positive form.

This section was part of title IV of the Revised Statutes. Act July 26, 1947, ch 343, § 201 (d), as added Aug. 10, 1949, ch 412, § 4, 63 Stat. 579 (former 5 USC § 171-1), which provides "Except to the extent inconsistent with the provisions of this Act [National Security Act of 1947], the provisions of title IV of the Revised Statutes as now or hereafter amended shall be applicable to the Department of Defense" is omitted from this title but is not repealed.

Standard changes are made to conform with the definitions applicable and the style of this title.

Explanatory notes:

A prior § 3349 (Act Sept. 6, 1966, P.L. 89-554, § 1, 80 Stat. 426) was repealed by Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, Div C, Title I, § 151(b), 112 Stat. 2681-611, effective and applicable as provided by § 151(d) of such Act, which appears as 5 USCS § 3345 note. Such section provided for details to fill vacancies; restrictions.

Effective date of section:

This section took effect 30 days after enactment, pursuant to § 151(d)(1) of Division C of Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, which appears as 5 USCS § 3345 note.

Other provisions:

Applicability of section. For provisions relating to applicability of this section, see § 151(d)(2) of Division C of Act Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. 105-277, which appears as 5 USCS § 3345 note.

Service: LEXSTAT®
Citation: 5 USCS § 3349
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, January 12, 2001 - 6:41 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

REV_00264166

§ 3345. Acting officer

(a) If an officer of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) whose appointment to office is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, dies, resigns, or is otherwise unable to perform the functions and duties of the office—

(1) the first assistant to the office of such officer shall perform the functions and duties of the office temporarily in an acting capacity subject to the time limitations of section 3346;

(2) notwithstanding paragraph (1), the President (and only the President) may direct a person who serves in an office for which appointment is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to perform the functions and duties of the vacant office temporarily in an acting capacity subject to the time limitations of section 3346; or

(3) notwithstanding paragraph (1), the President (and only the President) may direct an officer or employee of such Executive agency to perform the functions and duties of the vacant office temporarily in an acting capacity, subject to the time limitations of section 3346, if—

(A) during the 365–day period preceding the date of death, resignation, or beginning of inability to serve of the applicable officer, the officer or employee served in a position in such agency for not less than 90 days; and

(B) the rate of pay for the position described under subparagraph (A) is equal to or greater than the minimum rate of pay payable for a position at GS–15 of the General Schedule.

(b)(1) Notwithstanding subsection (a)(1), a person may not serve as an acting officer for an office under this section, if—

(A) during the 365–day period preceding the date of the death, resignation, or beginning of inability to serve, such person—

(i) did not serve in the position of first assistant to the office of such officer; or

(ii) served in the position of first assistant to the office of such officer for less than 90 days; and

(B) the President submits a nomination of such person to the Senate for appointment to such office.

(2) Paragraph (1) shall not apply to any person if—

(A) such person is serving as the first assistant to the office of an officer described under subsection (a);

(B) the office of such first assistant is an office for which appointment is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and

(C) the Senate has approved the appointment of such person to such office.

(c)(1) Notwithstanding subsection (a)(1), the President (and only the President) may direct an officer who is nominated by the President for reappointment for an additional term to the same office in an Executive department without a break in service, to continue to serve in that office subject to the time limitations in section 3346, until such time as the Senate has acted to confirm or reject the nomination, notwithstanding adjournment sine die.

(2) For purposes of this section and sections 3346, 3347, 3348, 3349, 3349a, and 3349d, the expiration of a term of office is an inability to perform the functions and duties of such office.

(Added Pub.L. 105–277, Div. C, Title 1, § 151(b), Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681–611.)

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Revision Notes and Legislative Reports

1998 Acts. Statement by President, see 1998 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 582.

Effective and Applicability Provisions

1998 Acts. Section 151(d) of Pub.L. 105–277 provided that:

"(1) Effective date.—Subject to paragraph (2) [of this note], this section and the amendments made by this section [repealing former sections 3345 to 3349 of this title and enacting new sections 3345 to 3349 and 3349a to 3349d of this title, and enacting provisions set out as a note under section 3301 of this title] shall take effect 30 days after the date of enactment of this section [Oct. 21, 1998].

REV_00264167

"(2) Application.—

"(A) In general.—This section [repealing former sections 3345 to 3349 of this title and enacting new sections 3345 to 3349 and 3349a to 3349d of this title and enacting provisions set out as a note under section 3301 of this title] shall apply to any office that becomes vacant after the effective date of this section [set forth in par. (1) of this note].

"(B) Immediate application of time limitation.—Notwithstanding subparagraph (A), for any office vacant on the effective date of this section, the time limitations under section 3346 of title 5, United States Code (as amended by this section) shall apply to such office. Such time limitations shall apply as though such office first became vacant on the effective date of this section [set forth in par. (1) of this note].

"(C) Certain nominations.—If the President submits to the Senate the nomination of any person after the effective date of this section [set forth in par. (1) of this note] for an office for which such person had been nominated before such date, the next nomination of such person after such date shall be considered a first nomination of such person to that office for purposes of sections 3345 through 3349 and section 3349d of title 5, United States Code (as amended by this section)."

Prior Provisions

A prior section 3345, Pub.L. 89–554, Sept. 6, 1966, 80 Stat. 425, Pub.L. 100–398, § 7(a)(1), (2), Aug. 17, 1988, 102 Stat. 988, which provided for the first assistant to perform the duties of a head of an Executive agency in case of death, resignation, sickness, or absence, was repealed by Pub.L. 105–277, Div. C, Title I, § 151(b), Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681–611.

EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 13060

Apr. 24, 1996, 61 F.R. 18483

ORDER OF SUCCESSION OF OFFICERS TO ACT AS SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, including section 3347 of title 5, United States Code [this section], it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1. Succession to Act as the Secretary of Defense. (a) In the event of the death, permanent disability, or resignation of the Secretary of Defense, the incumbents holding the Department of Defense positions designated below, in the order indicated, shall act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of Defense as Acting Secretary of Defense:

(1) Deputy Secretary of Defense.

(2) Secretary of the Army.

(3) Secretary of the Navy.

(4) Secretary of the Air Force.

(5) Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition and Technology.

(6) Under Secretary of Defense for Policy.

(7) Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller).

(8) Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness.

(9) Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition and Technology.

(10) Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Policy.

(11) Director of Defense Research and Engineering.

(12) The Assistant Secretaries of Defense, the Director of Operational Test and Evaluation, and the General Counsel of the Department of Defense, in the order fixed by their length of service as permanent appointees in such positions.

(13) Under Secretaries of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force, in the order fixed by their length of service as permanent appointees in such positions.

(14) Assistant Secretaries of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force whose appointments are vested in the President, and General Counsels of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force, in the order fixed by their length of service as permanent appointees in such positions.

(b) In the event of the temporary absence or temporary disability of the Secretary of Defense, the incumbents holding the Department of Defense positions designated in paragraph (a) of this section, in the order indicated, shall act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of Defense as Acting Secretary of Defense.

(1) In these instances, the designation of an Acting Secretary of Defense applies only for the duration of the Secretary's absence or disability, and does not affect the authority of the Secretary to resume the powers of his office upon his return.

(2) In the event that the Secretary of Defense is temporarily absent from his position, the Secretary may continue to exercise the powers and fulfill the duties of this office during his absence, notwithstanding the provisions of this order.

(c) Precedence among those officers designated in paragraphs (a)(12)–(14) of this section who have the same appointment date shall be determined by the Secretary of Defense at the time that such appointments are made.

(d) Notwithstanding paragraphs (a) and (b) of this section, an officer shall not act for or exercise the powers of the Secretary of Defense under this order if that officer serves only in an acting capacity in the position that would otherwise entitle him to do so.

Sec. 2. Temporary Nature of Succession. Succession to act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of Defense pursuant to this order shall be on a temporary or interim basis and shall not have the effect of vacating the statutory appointment held by the successor.

REV_00264168

Sec. 3. Revocation of Prior Executive Order. Executive Order No. 12787 of December 31, 1991 [formerly set out as a note under this section], is hereby revoked.

WILLIAM J. CLINTON

[Pub.L. 106–65, Div. A, Title XI, § 911(a)(1), Oct. 5, 1999, 113 Stat. 717, classified as 10 U.S.C.A. § 133 note, changed the name of the position of the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition and Technology to the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics.]

§ 3346. Time limitation

(a) Except in the case of a vacancy caused by sickness, the person serving as an acting officer as described under section 3345 may serve in the office—

(1) for no longer than 210 days beginning on the date the vacancy occurs; or

(2) subject to subsection (b), once a first or second nomination for the office is submitted to the Senate, from the date of such nomination for the period that the nomination is pending in the Senate.

(b)(1) If the first nomination for the office is rejected by the Senate, withdrawn, or returned to the President by the Senate, the person may continue to serve as the acting officer for no more than 210 days after the date of such rejection, withdrawal, or return.

(2) Notwithstanding paragraph (1), if a second nomination for the office is submitted to the Senate after the rejection, withdrawal, or return of the first nomination, the person serving as the acting officer may continue to serve—

(A) until the second nomination is confirmed; or

(B) for no more than 210 days after the second nomination is rejected, withdrawn, or returned.

(c) If a vacancy occurs during an adjournment of the Congress sine die, the 210–day period under subsection (a) shall begin on the date that the Senate first reconvenes.

(Added Pub.L. 105–277, Div. C, Title I, § 151(b), Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681–612.)

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Revision Notes and Legislative Reports

1998 Acts. Statement by President, see 1998 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 582.

Effective and Applicability Provisions

1998 Acts. Section to take effect 30 days after Oct. 21, 1998, applicable to any office that becomes vacant after such effective date, with certain exceptions and qualifications relating to immediate applicability of time limitations for offices vacant on such effective date, and the submission to the Senate after such effective date of nominations of persons for offices for which such persons were previously nominated prior to such effective date, see section 151(d) of Pub.L. 105–277, set out as a note under section 3345 of this title.

Prior Provisions

A prior section 3346, Pub.L. 89–554, Sept. 6, 1966, 80 Stat. 426, which provided for the first assistant to perform the duties of an officer of a bureau of an Executive department or military department, whose appointment is not vested in the head of the department, in case of death, resignation, sickness, or absence, was repealed by Pub.L. 105–277, Div. C, Title I, § 151(b), Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681–613.

§ 3347. Exclusivity

(a) Sections 3345 and 3346 are the exclusive means for temporarily authorizing an acting official to perform the functions and duties of any office of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) for which appointment is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, unless—

(1) a statutory provision expressly—

(A) authorizes the President, a court, or the head of an Executive department, to designate an officer or employee to perform the functions and duties of a specified office temporarily in an acting capacity; or

(B) designates an officer or employee to perform the functions and duties of a specified office temporarily in an acting capacity; or

(2) the President makes an appointment to fill a vacancy in such office during the recess of the Senate pursuant to clause 3 of section 2 of article II of the United States Constitution.

(b) Any statutory provision providing general authority to the head of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General

REV_00264169

Accounting Office) to delegate duties statutorily vested in that agency head to, or to reassign duties among, officers or employees of such Executive agency, is not a statutory provision to which subsection (a)(1) applies.

(Added Pub.L. 105–277, Div. C, Title I, § 151(b), Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681–613, and amended Pub.L. 106–31, Title V, § 5011, May 21, 1999, 113 Stat. 112.)

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Revision Notes and Legislative Reports

1998 Acts. Statement by President, see 1998 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 582.

1999 Acts. House Conference Report No. 106–143 and Statement by President, see 1999 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 27.

Amendments

1999 Amendments. Subsec. (b). Pub.L. 106–81, § 5011, substituted "provision to which subsection (a)(1) applies." for "provision to which subsection (a)(2) applies."

Effective and Applicability Provisions

1998 Acts. Section to take effect 30 days after Oct. 21, 1998, applicable to any office that becomes vacant after such effective date, with certain exceptions and qualifications relating to immediate applicability of time limitations for offices vacant on such effective date, and the submission to the Senate after such effective date of nominations of persons for offices for which such persons were previously nominated prior to such effective date, see section 151(d) of Pub.L. 105–277, set out as a note under section 3345 of this title.

Prior Provisions

A prior section 3347, Pub.L. 89–554, Sept. 6, 1966, 80 Stat. 426, which allowed the President to direct the head of another Executive department or military department or another officer of an Executive department or military department, whose appointment is vested in the President, to perform the duties of an office until a successor is appointed or the absence or sickness stops, was repealed by Pub.L. 105–277, Div. C, Title I, § 151(b), Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681–611.

EXECUTIVE ORDERS

EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 11880

Oct. 2, 1975, 40 F.R. 46089, as amended by Ex. Ord. No. 12608, Sept. 9, 1987, 52 F.R. 34617; Ex. Ord. No. 12998, Apr. 5, 1996, 61 F.R. 15873

DESIGNATION OF OFFICERS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE TO ACT AS SECRETARY OF COMMERCE

By virtue of the authority vested in me by section 3347 of Title 5 of the United States Code [this section] and section 301 of Title 3 of the United States Code [section 301 of Title 3, The President], and as President of the United States, it is hereby ordered as follows:

[See main volume for text of Sec. 1]

Sec. 2. The President may at any time, pursuant to law but without regard to the foregoing provisions of this order, direct that an officer, as defined in 5 U.S.C. 3347, and specified by the President, shall act as Secretary of Commerce.

Sec. 3. This Order supersedes Executive Order No. 11888 of January 15, 1968 [formerly set out as a note under this section].

EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 12787

Ex. Ord. No. 12787, Dec. 31, 1991, 57 F.R. 517, relating to the order of succession of officers to act as the Secretary of Defense, was revoked by Ex. Ord. No. 13000, Apr. 24, 1996, 61 F.R. 18483, set out as a note under section 3345 of this title.

§ 3348. Vacant office

(a) In this section—

(1) the term "action" includes any agency action as defined under section 551(13); and

(2) the term "function or duty" means any function or duty of the applicable office that—

(A)(i) is established by statute; and

(ii) is required by statute to be performed by the applicable officer (and only that officer); or

(B)(i)(I) is established by regulation; and

(II) is required by such regulation to be performed by the applicable officer (and only that officer); and

(ii) includes a function or duty to which clause (i)(I) and (II) applies, and the applicable regulation is in effect at any time during the 180–day period preceding the date on which the vacancy occurs.

REV_00264170

(b) Unless an officer or employee is performing the functions and duties in accordance with sections 3345, 3346, and 3347, if an officer of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) whose appointment to office is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, dies, resigns, or is otherwise unable to perform the functions and duties of the office—

(1) the office shall remain vacant; and

(2) in the case of an office other than the office of the head of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office), only the head of such Executive agency may perform any function or duty of such office.

(c) If the last day of any 210–day period under section 3346 is a day on which the Senate is not in session, the second day the Senate is next in session and receiving nominations shall be deemed to be the last day of such period.

(d)(1) An action taken by any person who is not acting under section 3345, 3346, or 3347, or as provided by subsection (b), in the performance of any function or duty of a vacant office to which this section and sections 3346, 3347, 3349, 3349a, 3349b, and 3349c apply shall have no force or effect.

(2) An action that has no force or effect under paragraph (1) may not be ratified.

(e) This section shall not apply to—

(1) the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board;

(2) the General Counsel of the Federal Labor Relations Authority;

(3) any Inspector General appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;

(4) any Chief Financial Officer appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; or

(5) an office of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) if a statutory provision expressly prohibits the head of the Executive agency from performing the functions and duties of such office.

(Added Pub.L. 105–277, Div. C, Title I, § 151(b), Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681–613.)

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Revision Notes and Legislative Reports

1998 Acts. Statement by President, see 1998 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 582.

Effective and Applicability Provisions

1998 Acts. Section to take effect 30 days after Oct. 21, 1998, applicable to any office that becomes vacant after such effective date, with certain exceptions and qualifications relating to immediate applicability of time limitations for offices vacant on such effective date, and the submission to the Senate after such effective date of nominations of persons for offices for which such persons were previously nominated prior to such effective date, see section 151(d) of Pub.L. 105–277, set out as a note under section 3345 of this title.

Prior Provisions

A prior section 3348, Pub.L. 89–554, Sept. 6, 1966, 80 Stat. 426; Pub.L. 100–398, § 7(b), Aug. 17, 1988, 102 Stat. 988, which dealt with temporarily filling a vacancy caused by death or resignation, was repealed by Pub.L. 105–277, Div. C, Title I, § 151(b), Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681–611.

NOTES OF DECISIONS

Title of position 8

4. Computation of period

Time limit provision of Vacancies Act, which permits president to appoint certain officers temporarily, does not begin to run immediately upon "vacancy" caused by death or resignation of constitutionally appointed officer, but begins to run only when someone takes office, either through "detail" or through presidential directive. Doolin Sec. Sav. Bank, F.S.B. v. Office of Thrift Supervision, C.A.D.C.1998, 139 F.3d 203, 329 U.S.App.D.C. 166, motion to recall mandate denied 156 F.3d 190, 332 U.S.App.D.C. 189.

8. Title of position

Nomination of deputy assistant secretary of Administration for Children and Families (ACF) to replace previous Assistant Secretary was sufficient to bring deputy within exception to 120–day limit in Vacancies Act and permit her to take valid actions in Assistant Secretary's stead, despite fact that deputy's nomination letter designated position she was being nominated to fill as "Assistant Secretary for Family Support"; ACF's previous Assistant Secretary had originally been confirmed as "Assistant Secretary for Family Support" and had held both titles prior to her resignation. Action for Boston Community Development, Inc. v. Shalala, D.Mass.1997, 983 F.Supp. 222, affirmed 136 F.3d 29.

REV_00264171

Note 8

§ 3349. Reporting of vacancies

(a) The head of each Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) shall submit to the Comptroller General of the United States and to each House of Congress—

(1) notification of a vacancy in an office to which this section and sections 3345, 3346, 3347, 3348, 3349a, 3349b, 3349c, and 3349d apply and the date such vacancy occurred immediately upon the occurrence of the vacancy;

(2) the name of any person serving in an acting capacity and the date such service began immediately upon the designation;

(3) the name of any person nominated to the Senate to fill the vacancy and the date such nomination is submitted immediately upon the submission of the nomination; and

(4) the date of a rejection, withdrawal, or return of any nomination immediately upon such rejection, withdrawal, or return.

(b) If the Comptroller General of the United States makes a determination that an officer is serving longer than the 210–day period including the applicable exceptions to such period under section 3346 or section 3349a, the Comptroller General shall report such determination immediately to—

(1) the Committee on Governmental Affairs of the Senate;

(2) the Committee on Government Reform and Oversight of the House of Representatives;

(3) the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives;

(4) the appropriate committees of jurisdiction of the Senate and House of Representatives;

(5) the President; and

(6) the Office of Personnel Management.

(Added Pub.L. 105–277, Div. C, Title I, § 151(b), Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681–614.)

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Revision Notes and Legislative Reports.

1998 Acts. Statement by President, see 1998 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 582.

Effective and Applicability Provisions.

1998 Acts. Section to take effect 30 days after Oct. 21, 1998, applicable to any office that becomes vacant after such effective date, with certain exceptions and qualifications relating to immediate applicability of time limitations for offices vacant on such effective date, and the submission to the Senate after such effective date of nominations of persons for offices for which such persons were previously nominated prior to such effective date, see section 151(d) of Pub.L. 105–277, set out as a note under section 3345 of this title.

Prior Provisions.

A prior section 3349, Pub.L. 89–554, Sept. 6, 1966, 80 Stat. 426, which limited the temporary authority to appoint, was repealed by Pub.L. 105–277, Div. C, Title I, § 151(b), Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681–611.

§ 3349a. Presidential inaugural transitions

(a) In this section, the term "transitional inauguration day" means the date on which any person swears or affirms the oath of office as President, if such person is not the President on the date preceding the date of swearing or affirming such oath of office.

(b) With respect to any vacancy that exists during the 60–day period beginning on a transitional inauguration day, the 210–day period under section 3346 or 3348 shall be deemed to begin on the later of the date occurring—

(1) 90 days after such transitional inauguration day; or

(2) 90 days after the date on which the vacancy occurs.

(Added Pub.L. 105–277, Div. C, Title I, § 151(b), Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681–615.)

REV_00264172

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Revision Notes and Legislative Reports

1998 Acts. Statement by President, see 1998 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 582.

Effective and Applicability Provisions

1998 Acts. Section to take effect 30 days after Oct. 21, 1998, applicable to any office that becomes vacant after such effective date, with certain exceptions and qualifications relating to immediate applicability of time limitations for offices vacant on such effective date, and the submission to the Senate after such effective date of nominations of persons for offices for which such persons were previously nominated prior to such effective date, see section 151(d) of Pub.L. 105–277, set out as a note under section 3345 of this title.

LIBRARY REFERENCES

American Digest System

United States ⇐35.

Encyclopedias

C.J.S. United States §§ 35, 37, 62 to 64.

WESTLAW ELECTRONIC RESEARCH

United States cases: 393k[add key number]

§ 3349b. Holdover provisions

Sections 3345 through 3349a shall not be construed to affect any statute that authorizes a person to continue to serve in any office—

(1) after the expiration of the term for which such person is appointed; and

(2) until a successor is appointed or a specified period of time has expired.

(Added Pub.L. 105–261, Div. C, Title I, § 151(b), Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681–615.)

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Revision Notes and Legislative Reports

1998 Acts. Statement by President, see 1998 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 582.

Effective and Applicability Provisions

1998 Acts. Section to take effect 30 days after Oct. 21, 1998, applicable to any office that becomes vacant after such effective date, with certain exceptions and qualifications relating to immediate applicability of time limitations for offices vacant on such effective date, and the submission to the Senate after such effective date of nominations of persons for offices for which such persons were previously nominated prior to such effective date, see section 151(d) of Pub.L. 105–277, set out as a note under section 3345 of this title.

LIBRARY REFERENCES

American Digest System

United States ⇐35.

Encyclopedias

C.J.S. United States §§ 35, 37, 62 to 64.

WESTLAW ELECTRONIC RESEARCH

United States cases: 393k[add key number]

§ 3349c. Exclusion of certain officers

Sections 3345 through 3349b shall not apply to—

(1) any member who is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to any board, commission, or similar entity that—

(A) is composed of multiple members; and

(B) governs an independent establishment or Government corporation;

(2) any commissioner of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission;

(3) any member of the Surface Transportation Board; or

(4) any judge appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to a court constituted under article I of the United States Constitution.

(Added Pub.L. 105–277, Div. C, Title I, § 151(b), Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681–615.)

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Revision Notes and Legislative Reports

1998 Acts. Statement by President, see 1998 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 582.

Effective and Applicability Provisions

1998 Acts. Section to take effect 30 days after Oct. 21, 1998, applicable to any office that becomes vacant after such effective date, with certain exceptions and qualifications relating to immediate applicability of time limitations for offices vacant on such effective date, and the submission to the Senate after such effective date of nominations of persons for offices for which such persons were previously nominated prior to such effective date, see section 151(d) of Pub.L. 105–277, set out as a note under section 3345 of this title.

REV_00264173

LIBRARY REFERENCES

American Digest System
United States ⇐35.

Encyclopedias
C.J.S. United States §§ 35, 37, 62 to 64.

WESTLAW ELECTRONIC RESEARCH

United States cases: 393k[add key number]

§ 3349d. Notification of intent to nominate during certain recesses or adjournments

(a) The submission to the Senate, during a recess or adjournment of the Senate in excess of 15 days, of a written notification by the President of the President's intention to submit a nomination after the recess or adjournment shall be considered a nomination for purposes of sections 3345 through 3349c if such notification contains the name of the proposed nominee and the office for which the person is nominated.

(b) If the President does not submit a nomination of the person named under subsection (a) within 2 days after the end of such recess or adjournment, effective after such second day the notification considered a nomination under subsection (a) shall be treated as a withdrawn nomination for purposes of sections 3345 through 3349c.

(Added Pub.L. 105–277, Div. C, Title I, § 151(b), Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681–615.)

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Revision Notes and Legislative Reports

1998 Acts. Statement by President, see 1998 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 582.

Effective and Applicability Provisions

1998 Acts. Section to take effect 30 days after Oct. 21, 1998, applicable to any office that becomes vacant after such effective date, with certain exceptions and qualifications relating to immediate applicability of time limitations for offices vacant on such effective date, and the submission to the Senate after such effective date of nominations of persons for offices for which such persons were previously nominated prior to such effective date, see section 151(d) of Pub.L. 105–277, set out as a note under section 3345 of this title.

LIBRARY REFERENCES

American Digest System
United States ⇐35.

Encyclopedias
C.J.S. United States §§ 35, 37, 62 to 64.

WESTLAW ELECTRONIC RESEARCH

United States cases: 393k[add key number]

SUBCHAPTER IV—TRANSFERS

§ 3351. Preference eligibles; transfer; physical qualifications; waiver

CROSS REFERENCES

"Veterans' preference" defined as in this section for purposes of Department of Defense practice, see 10 USCA § 1599c.

§ 3352. Preference in transfers for employees making certain disclosures

CROSS REFERENCES

"Veterans' preference" defined as in this section for purposes of Department of Defense practice, see 10 USCA § 1599c.

REV_00264174

P.L. 105-277

105TH CONGRESS
2d Session

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

REPORT
105–825

MAKING OMNIBUS CONSOLIDATED AND EMERGENCY SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1999

CONFERENCE REPORT

TO ACCOMPANY

H.R. 4328

OCTOBER 19, 1998.—Ordered to be printed

REV_00264175

SEC. 148. Section 8135 of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1992 (Public Law 102–172; 105 Stat. 1212; 37 U.S.C. 301b note), is amended—

(1) in subsection (a), by inserting before the period at the end the following: "or as a supplemental payment if the officer's final military pay account is already settled"; and

(2) in subsection (b)—

(A) by inserting "applies" after "subsection (a)";

(B) by striking "January 17, 1991" and inserting "August 2, 1990";

(C) by inserting "(regardless of the date of the commencement of combatant activities in such zone as specified in that Executive Order)" after "as a combat zone"; and

(D) by striking "section 302b" and inserting "section 301b".

SEC. 149. (a) Chapter 12 of title 11 of the United States Code, as in effect on September 30, 1998, is hereby reenacted for the period beginning on October 1, 1998, and ending on April 1, 1999.

(b) All cases commenced or pending under chapter 12 of title 11, United States Code, as reenacted under subsection (a), and all matters and proceedings in or relating to such cases, shall be conducted and determined under such chapter as if such chapter were continued in effect after April 1, 1999. The substantive rights of parties in connection with such cases, matters, and proceedings shall continue to be governed under the laws applicable to such cases, matters, and proceedings as if such chapter were continued in effect after April 1, 1999.

(c) This section shall take effect on October 1, 1998.

SEC. 150. (a) EXTENSION OF AGREEMENT FOR STATE OF MISSISSIPPI.—The Secretary of the Interior shall offer to reinstate the Memorandum of Agreement between the Mississippi Department of Wildlife Conservation and the United States Fish and Wildlife Service concerning the framework closing dates for the 1979–1980 through 1981–1982 duck hunting seasons, executed in November 1979, for the 1998–1999 duck hunting season in the State of Mississippi, except that—

(1) the duck hunting season shall end on January 31, 1999; and

(2) the total number of days for the duck hunting season in the State of Mississippi shall not exceed 51 days.

(b) EXTENSION OF AGREEMENT TO OTHER STATES.—At the request of any other State represented on the Lower-Region Regulations Committee of the Mississippi Flyway Council, the Secretary of the Interior shall extend the agreement described in subsection (a) to that State for the 1998–1999 duck hunting season if the State agrees to reduce the total number of days of the duck hunting season in the State to the extent necessary to result in no net increase in the duck harvest in the State for that season.

Div. C →

SEC. 151. FEDERAL VACANCIES AND APPOINTMENTS.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This section may be cited as the "Federal Vacancies Reform Act of 1998".

(b) IN GENERAL.—Chapter 33 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by striking sections 3345 through 3349 and inserting the following:

REV_00264176

"§3345. Acting officer

"(a) If an officer of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) whose appointment to office is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, dies, resigns, or is otherwise unable to perform the functions and duties of the office—

"(1) the first assistant to the office of such officer shall perform the functions and duties of the office temporarily in an acting capacity subject to the time limitations of section 3346;

"(2) notwithstanding paragraph (1), the President (and only the President) may direct a person who serves in an office for which appointment is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to perform the functions and duties of the vacant office temporarily in an acting capacity subject to the time limitations of section 3346; or

"(3) notwithstanding paragraph (1), the President (and only the President) may direct an officer or employee of such Executive agency to perform the functions and duties of the vacant office temporarily in an acting capacity, subject to the time limitations of section 3346, if—

"(A) during the 365-day period preceding the date of death, resignation, or beginning of inability to serve of the applicable officer, the officer or employee served in a position in such agency for not less than 90 days; and

"(B) the rate of pay for the position described under subparagraph (A) is equal to or greater than the minimum rate of pay payable for a position at GS–15 of the General Schedule.

"(b)(1) Notwithstanding subsection (a)(1), a person may not serve as an acting officer for an office under this section, if—

"(A) during the 365-day period preceding the date of the death, resignation, or beginning of inability to serve, such person—

"(i) did not serve in the position of first assistant to the office of such officer; or

"(ii) served in the position of first assistant to the office of such officer for less than 90 days; and

"(B) the President submits a nomination of such person to the Senate for appointment to such office.

"(2) Paragraph (1) shall not apply to any person if—

"(A) such person is serving as the first assistant to the office of an officer described under subsection (a);

"(B) the office of such first assistant is an office for which appointment is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and

"(C) the Senate has approved the appointment of such person to such office.

"(c)(1) Notwithstanding subsection (a)(1), the President (and only the President) may direct an officer who is nominated by the President for reappointment for an additional term to the same office in an Executive department without a break in service, to continue to serve in that office subject to the time limitations in section

REV_00264177

3346, until such time as the Senate has acted to confirm or reject the nomination, notwithstanding adjournment sine die.

"(2) For purposes of this section and sections 3346, 3347, 3348, 3349, 3349a, and 3349d, the expiration of a term of office is an inability to perform the functions and duties of such office.

"§3346. Time limitation

"(a) Except in the case of a vacancy caused by sickness, the person serving as an acting officer as described under section 3345 may serve in the office—

"(1) for no longer than 210 days beginning on the date the vacancy occurs; or

"(2) subject to subsection (b), once a first or second nomination for the office is submitted to the Senate, from the date of such nomination for the period that the nomination is pending in the Senate.

"(b)(1) If the first nomination for the office is rejected by the Senate, withdrawn, or returned to the President by the Senate, the person may continue to serve as the acting officer for no more than 210 days after the date of such rejection, withdrawal, or return.

"(2) Notwithstanding paragraph (1), if a second nomination for the office is submitted to the Senate after the rejection, withdrawal, or return of the first nomination, the person serving as the acting officer may continue to serve—

"(A) until the second nomination is confirmed; or

"(B) for no more than 210 days after the second nomination is rejected, withdrawn, or returned.

"(c) If a vacancy occurs during an adjournment of the Congress sine die, the 210-day period under subsection (a) shall begin on the date that the Senate first reconvenes.

"§3347. Exclusivity

"(a) Sections 3345 and 3346 are the exclusive means for temporarily authorizing an acting official to perform the functions and duties of any office of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) for which appointment is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, unless—

"(1) a statutory provision expressly—

"(A) authorizes the President, a court, or the head of an Executive department, to designate an officer or employee to perform the functions and duties of a specified office temporarily in an acting capacity; or

"(B) designates an officer or employee to perform the functions and duties of a specified office temporarily in an acting capacity; or

"(2) the President makes an appointment to fill a vacancy in such office during the recess of the Senate pursuant to clause 3 of section 2 of article II of the United States Constitution.

"(b) Any statutory provision providing general authority to the head of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) to delegate duties statutorily vested in that agency head to, or to reassign duties among, officers or employees of such Executive agency, is not a statutory provision to which subsection (a)(2) applies.

REV_00264178

"§3348. Vacant office

"(a) In this section—

"(1) the term 'action' includes any agency action as defined under section 551(13); and

"(2) the term 'function or duty' means any function or duty of the applicable office that—

"(A)(i) is established by statute; and

"(ii) is required by statute to be performed by the applicable officer (and only that officer); or

"(B)(i)(I) is established by regulation; and

"(II) is required by such regulation to be performed by the applicable officer (and only that officer); and

"(ii) includes a function or duty to which clause (i) (I) and (II) applies, and the applicable regulation is in effect at any time during the 180-day period preceding the date on which the vacancy occurs.

"(b) Unless an officer or employee is performing the functions and duties in accordance with sections 3345, 3346, and 3347, if an officer of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) whose appointment to office is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, dies, resigns, or is otherwise unable to perform the functions and duties of the office—

"(1) the office shall remain vacant; and

"(2) in the case of an office other than the office of the head of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office), only the head of such Executive agency may perform any function or duty of such office.

"(c) If the last day of any 210-day period under section 3346 is a day on which the Senate is not in session, the second day the Senate is next in session and receiving nominations shall be deemed to be the last day of such period.

"(d)(1) An action taken by any person who is not acting under section 3345, 3346, or 3347, or as provided by subsection (b), in the performance of any function or duty of a vacant office to which this section and sections 3346, 3347, 3349, 3349a, 3349b, and 3349c apply shall have no force or effect.

"(2) An action that has no force or effect under paragraph (1) may not be ratified.

"(e) This section shall not apply to—

"(1) the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board;

"(2) the General Counsel of the Federal Labor Relations Authority;

"(3) any Inspector General appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;

"(4) any Chief Financial Officer appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; or

"(5) an office of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) if a statutory provision expressly prohibits the head of the Executive agency from performing the functions and duties of such office.

REV_00264179

"§3349. Reporting of vacancies

"(a) The head of each Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) shall submit to the Comptroller General of the United States and to each House of Congress—

"(1) notification of a vacancy in an office to which this section and sections 3345, 3346, 3347, 3348, 3349a, 3349b, 3349c, and 3349d apply and the date such vacancy occurred immediately upon the occurrence of the vacancy;

"(2) the name of any person serving in an acting capacity and the date such service began immediately upon the designation;

"(3) the name of any person nominated to the Senate to fill the vacancy and the date such nomination is submitted immediately upon the submission of the nomination; and

"(4) the date of a rejection, withdrawal, or return of any nomination immediately upon such rejection, withdrawal, or return.

"(b) If the Comptroller General of the United States makes a determination that an officer is serving longer than the 210-day period including the applicable exceptions to such period under section 3346 or section 3349a, the Comptroller General shall report such determination immediately to—

"(1) the Committee on Governmental Affairs of the Senate;

"(2) the Committee on Government Reform and Oversight of the House of Representatives;

"(3) the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives;

"(4) the appropriate committees of jurisdiction of the Senate and House of Representatives;

"(5) the President; and

"(6) the Office of Personnel Management.

"§3349a. Presidential inaugural transitions

"(a) In this section, the term 'transitional inauguration day' means the date on which any person swears or affirms the oath of office as President, if such person is not the President on the date preceding the date of swearing or affirming such oath of office.

"(b) With respect to any vacancy that exists during the 60-day period beginning on a transitional inauguration day, the 210-day period under section 3346 or 3348 shall be deemed to begin on the later of the date occurring—

"(1) 90 days after such transitional inauguration day; or

"(2) 90 days after the date on which the vacancy occurs.

"§3349b. Holdover provisions

"Sections 3345 through 3349a shall not be construed to affect any statute that authorizes a person to continue to serve in any office—

REV_00264180

"(1) after the expiration of the term for which such person is appointed; and

"(2) until a successor is appointed or a specified period of time has expired.

"§3349c. Exclusion of certain officers

"Sections 3345 through 3349b shall not apply to—

"(1) any member who is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to any board, commission, or similar entity that—

"(A) is composed of multiple members; and

"(B) governs an independent establishment or Government corporation;

"(2) any commissioner of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission;

"(3) any member of the Surface Transportation Board; or

"(4) any judge appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to a court constituted under article I of the United States Constitution.

"§3349d. Notification of intent to nominate during certain recesses or adjournments

"(a) The submission to the Senate, during a recess or adjournment of the Senate in excess of 15 days, of a written notification by the President of the President's intention to submit a nomination after the recess or adjournment shall be considered a nomination for purposes of sections 3345 through 3349c if such notification contains the name of the proposed nominee and the office for which the person is nominated.

"(b) If the President does not submit a nomination of the person named under subsection (a) within 2 days after the end of such recess or adjournment, effective after such second day the notification considered a nomination under subsection (a) shall be treated as a withdrawn nomination for purposes of sections 3345 through 3349c.".

(c) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—

(1) TABLE OF SECTIONS.—The table of sections for chapter 33 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by striking the matter relating to subchapter III and inserting the following:

"SUBCHAPTER III—DETAILS, VACANCIES, AND APPOINTMENTS

"3341. Details; within Executive or military departments.
"[3342. Repealed.]
"3343. Details; to international organizations.
"3344. Details; administrative law judges.
"3345. Acting officer.
"3346. Time limitation.
"3347. Exclusivity.
"3348. Vacant office.
"3349. Reporting of vacancies.
"3349a. Presidential inaugural transitions.
"3349b. Holdover provisions relating to certain independent establishments.
"3349c. Exclusion of certain officers.
"3349d. Notification of intent to nominate during certain recesses or adjournments.".

REV_00264181

(2) SUBCHAPTER HEADING.—The subchapter heading for subchapter III of chapter 33 of title 5, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"SUBCHAPTER III—DETAILS, VACANCIES, AND APPOINTMENTS".

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE AND APPLICATION.—

(1) EFFECTIVE DATE.—Subject to paragraph (2), this section and the amendments made by this section shall take effect 30 days after the date of enactment of this section.

(2) APPLICATION.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—This section shall apply to any office that becomes vacant after the effective date of this section.

(B) IMMEDIATE APPLICATION OF TIME LIMITATION.—Notwithstanding subparagraph (A), for any office vacant on the effective date of this section, the time limitations under section 3346 of title 5, United States Code (as amended by this section) shall apply to such office. Such time limitations shall apply as though such office first became vacant on the effective date of this section.

(C) CERTAIN NOMINATIONS.—If the President submits to the Senate the nomination of any person after the effective date of this section for an office for which such person had been nominated before such date, the next nomination of such person after such date shall be considered a first nomination of such person to that office for purposes of sections 3345 through 3349 and section 3349d of title 5, United States Code (as amended by this section).

TITLE II—FISHERIES

Subtitle I—Fishery Endorsements

SEC. 201. SHORT TITLE.

This title may be cited as the "American Fisheries Act".

SEC. 202. STANDARD FOR FISHERY ENDORSEMENTS.

(a) STANDARD.—Section 12102(c) of title 46, United States Code, is amended to read as follows—

"(c)(1) A vessel owned by a corporation, partnership, association, trust, joint venture, limited liability company, limited liability partnership, or any other entity is not eligible for a fishery endorsement under section 12108 of this title unless at least 75 per centum of the interest in such entity, at each tier of ownership of such entity and in the aggregate, is owned and controlled by citizens of the United States.

"(2) The Secretary shall apply section 2(c) of the Shipping Act, 1916 (46 App. U.S.C. 802(c)) in determining under this subsection whether at least 75 per centum of the interest in a corporation, partnership, association, trust, joint venture, limited liability company, limited liability partnership, or any other entity is owned and controlled by citizens of the United States. For the purposes of this subsection and of applying the restrictions on controlling interest in section 2(c) of such Act, the terms 'control' or 'controlled'—

REV_00264182

Calendar No. 469

105TH CONGRESS
2D SESSION

S. 2176

[Report No. 105–250]

To amend sections 3345 through 3349 of title 5, United States Code (commonly referred to as the "Vacancies Act") to clarify statutory requirements relating to vacancies in and appointments to certain Federal offices, and for other purposes.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

JUNE 16, 1998

Mr. THOMPSON (for himself, Mr. BYRD, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. LOTT, Mr. ROTH, Mr. COCHRAN, and Mr. HATCH) introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Governmental Affairs

JULY 15, 1998

Reported by Mr. THOMPSON, with amendments

[Omit the part struck through and insert the part printed in italic]

A BILL

To amend sections 3345 through 3349 of title 5, United States Code (commonly referred to as the "Vacancies Act") to clarify statutory requirements relating to vacancies in and appointments to certain Federal offices, and for other purposes.

REV_00264183

"(ii) is the performance of a function or duty of such vacant office.

"(2) An action that has no force or effect under paragraph (1) may not be ratified.

"(d) This section shall not apply to—

"(1) the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board;

"(2) the General Counsel of the Federal Labor Relations Authority; or

"(3) any Inspector General appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

"§ 3349. Reporting of vacancies

"(a) The head of each Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) shall submit to the Comptroller General of the United States and to each House of Congress—

"(1) notification of a vacancy and the date such vacancy occurred immediately upon the occurrence of the vacancy;

"(2) the name of any person serving in an acting capacity and the date such service began immediately upon the designation;

REV_00264192

"(3) the name of any person nominated to the Senate to fill the vacancy and the date such nomination is submitted immediately upon the submission of the nomination; and

"(4) the date of a rejection, withdrawal, or return of any nomination immediately upon such rejection, withdrawal, or return.

"(b) If the Comptroller General of the United States makes a determination that an officer is serving longer than the 150-day period including the applicable exceptions to such period under section 3346, the Comptroller General shall report such determination to—

"(1) the Committee on Governmental Affairs of the Senate;

"(2) the Committee on Government Reform and Oversight of the House of Representatives;

"(3) the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives;

"(4) the appropriate committees of jurisdiction of the Senate and House of Representatives;

"(5) the President; and

"(6) the Office of Personnel Management.

"§ 3349a. Presidential inaugural transitions

"(a) In this section, the term 'transitional inauguration day' means the date on which any person swears or affirms the oath of office as President, if such person is not the President on the date preceding the date of swearing or affirming such oath of office.

REV_00264193

~~"(b) With respect to any vacancy that exists during the 60-day period beginning on a transitional inauguration day, the 150-day period under section 3346 or 3348 shall be deemed to—~~

~~"(1) begin on the later of—~~

~~"(A) the date following such transitional inauguration day; or~~

~~"(B) the date the vacancy occurs; and~~

~~"(2) be a period of 180 days.~~

"(b) With respect to any vacancy that exists during the 60-day period beginning on a transitional inauguration day, the 150-day period under section 3346 or 3348 shall be deemed to begin on the later of the date occurring—

"(1) 90 days after such transitional inauguration day; or

"(2) 90 days after the date on which the vacancy occurs.

"§ 3349b. Holdover provisions relating to certain independent establishments

"With respect to any independent establishment for which a single officer is the head of the establishment, sections 3345 through 3349a shall not be construed to affect any statute that authorizes a person to continue to serve in any office—

REV_00264194

"(1) after the expiration of the term for which such person is appointed; and

"(2) until a successor is appointed or a specified period of time has expired.

"§ 3349c. Exclusion of certain officers

"Sections 3345 through 3349b shall not apply to—

"(1) any member who is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to any board, commission, or similar entity that—

"(A) is composed of multiple members; and

"(B) governs an independent establishment or Government corporation; or

"(2) any commissioner of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.".

(b) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—

(1) TABLE OF SECTIONS.—The table of sections for chapter 33 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by striking the matter relating to subchapter III and inserting the following:

"SUBCHAPTER III—DETAILS, VACANCIES, AND APPOINTMENTS

"3341. Details; within Executive or military departments.
"[3342. Repealed.]
"3343. Details; to international organizations.
"3344. Details; administrative law judges.
"3345. Acting officer.
"3346. Time limitation.

REV_00264195

"3347. Application.
"3348. Vacant office.
"3349. Reporting of vacancies.
"3349a. Presidential inaugural transitions.
"3349b. Holdover provisions relating to certain independent establishments.
"3349c. Exclusion of certain officers.".

(2) SUBCHAPTER HEADING.—The subchapter heading for subchapter III of chapter 33 of title 5, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"SUBCHAPTER III—DETAILS, VACANCIES, AND APPOINTMENTS".

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE AND APPLICATION.

(a) EFFECTIVE DATE.—This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) APPLICATION.—This Act shall apply to any office that—

(1) becomes vacant after the date of enactment of this Act; or

(2) is vacant on such date, except sections 3345 through 3349 of title 5, United States Code (as amended by this Act), shall apply as though such office first became vacant on such date.

REV_00264196

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Federal Vacancies Reform Act of 1998".

SEC. 2. FEDERAL VACANCIES AND APPOINTMENTS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Chapter 33 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by striking sections 3345 through 3349 and inserting the following:

"§ 3345. Acting officer

"(a) If an officer of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) whose appointment to office is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, dies, resigns, or is otherwise unable to perform the functions and duties of the office—

"(1) the first assistant of such officer shall perform the functions and duties of the office temporarily in an acting capacity, subject to the time limitations of section 3346; or

"(2) notwithstanding paragraph (1), the President (and only the President) may direct a person who serves in an office for which appointment is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to perform the functions and duties of the office temporarily in an acting capacity, subject to the time limitations of section 3346.

REV_00264184

"(b) Notwithstanding section 3346(a)(2), a person may not serve as an acting officer for an office under this section, if—

"(1) on the date of the death, resignation, or beginning of inability to serve of the applicable officer, such person serves in the position of first assistant to such officer;

"(2) during the 365-day period preceding such date, such person served in the position of first assistant to such officer for less than 180 days; and

"(3) the President submits a nomination of such person to the Senate for appointment to such office.

"(c) With respect to the office of the Attorney General of the United States, the provisions of section 508 of title 28 shall be applicable.

"§ 3346. Time limitation

"(a) The person serving as an acting officer as described under section 3345 may serve in the office—

"(1) for no longer than 150 days beginning on the date the vacancy occurs; or

REV_00264185

"(2) subject to subsection (b), once a first or second nomination for the office is submitted to the Senate, from the date of such nomination for the period that the nomination is pending in the Senate.

"(b)(1) If the first nomination for the office is rejected by the Senate, withdrawn, or returned to the President by the Senate, the person may continue to serve as the acting officer for no more than 150 days after the date of such rejection, withdrawal, or return.

"(2) ~~If~~ Notwithstanding paragraph (1), if a second nomination for the office (of a different person than first nominated in the case of a rejection or withdrawal) is submitted to the Senate ~~during the 150-day period~~ after the rejection, withdrawal, or return of the first nomination, the person serving as the acting officer may continue to serve—

"(A) until the second nomination is confirmed; or

"(B) for no more than 150 days after the second nomination is rejected, withdrawn, or returned.

"(c) If a person begins serving as an acting officer during an adjournment of the Congress sine die, the 150-day period under subsection (a) shall begin on the date that the Senate first reconvenes.

REV_00264186

"§ 3347. Application

"(a) Sections 3345 and 3346 are applicable to any office of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) for which appointment is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, unless—

"(1) another statutory provision expressly provides that such provision supersedes sections 3345 and 3346;

~~"(2) a statutory provision in effect on the date of enactment of the Federal Vacancies Reform Act of 1998 expressly authorizes the President, or the head of an Executive department, to designate an officer to perform the functions and duties of a specified office temporarily in an acting capacity; or~~

"(2) a statutory provision in effect on the date of enactment of the Federal Vacancies Reform Act of 1998 expressly—

"(A) authorizes the President, a court, or the head of an Executive department, to designate an officer or employee to perform the functions and duties of a specified office temporarily in an acting capacity; or

REV_00264187

"(B) designates an officer or employee to perform the functions and duties of a specified office temporarily in an acting capacity; or

"(3) the President makes an appointment to fill a vacancy in such office during the recess of the Senate pursuant to clause 3 of section 2 of article II of the United States Constitution.

"(b) Any statutory provision providing general authority to the head of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) to delegate duties to, or to reassign duties among, officers or employees of such Executive agency, is not a statutory provision to which subsection (a)(2) applies.

"§ 3348. Vacant office

"(a) In this section—

"(1) the term 'action' includes any agency action as defined under section 551(13); and

"(2) the term 'function or duty' means any function or duty of the applicable office that—

"(A)(i) is established by statute; and

"(ii) is required by statute to be performed by the applicable officer (and only that officer); or

"(B)(i)(I) is established by regulation; and

REV_00264188

"(II) is required by such regulation to be performed by the applicable officer (and only that officer); and

"(ii) includes a function or duty to which clause (i) (I) and (II) applies, and the applicable regulation is in effect at any time during the 180-day period preceding the date on which the vacancy occurs, notwithstanding any regulation that—

"(I) is issued on or after the date occurring 180 days before the date on which the vacancy occurs; and

"(II) limits any function or duty required to be performed by the applicable officer (and only that officer).

"(b) Subject to section 3347 and subsection (c)—

"(1) if the President does not submit a first nomination to the Senate to fill a vacant office within 150 days after the date on which a vacancy occurs—

"(A) the office shall remain vacant until the President submits a first nomination to the Senate; and

"(B) in the case of an office other than the office of the head of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office), only the head of such Executive agency may perform any function or duty of such office, until a nomination is made in accordance with subparagraph (A);

REV_00264189

"(2) if the President does not submit a second nomination to the Senate within 150 days after the date of the rejection, withdrawal, or return of the first nomination—

"(A) the office shall remain vacant until the President submits a second nomination to the Senate; and

"(B) in the case of an office other than the office of the head of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office), only the head of such Executive agency may perform any function or duty of such office, until a nomination is made in accordance with subparagraph (A); and

"(3) if an office is vacant after 150 days after the rejection, withdrawal, or return of the second nomination—

REV_00264190

"(A) the office shall remain vacant until a person is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and

"(B) in the case of an office other than the office of the head of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office), only the head of such Executive agency may perform any function or duty of such office, until an appointment is made in accordance with subparagraph (A).

"(c) If the last day of any 150-day period under subsection (b) is a day on which the Senate is not in session, the first day the Senate is next in session and receiving nominations shall be deemed to be the last day of such period.

"(d)(1) Except as provided under paragraphs (1)(B), (2)(B), and (3)(B) of subsection (b), an action shall have no force or effect if such action—

"(A)(i) is taken by any person who fills a vacancy in violation of subsection (b); and

"(ii) is the performance of a function or duty of such vacant office; or

"(B)(i) is taken by a person who is not filling a vacant office; and

REV_00264191

Calendar No. 469

105TH CONGRESS
2D SESSION

S. 2176

[Report No. 105–250]

A BILL

To amend sections 3345 through 3349 of title 5, United States Code (commonly referred to as the "Vacancies Act") to clarify statutory requirements relating to vacancies in and appointments to certain Federal offices, and for other purposes.

JULY 15, 1998

Reported with amendments

REV_00264197

Service: LEXSTAT®
Citation: 28 USC 510

28 USCS § 510

UNITED STATES CODE SERVICE
Copyright 2000, LEXIS Law Publishing, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc.
All rights reserved.

 CURRENT THROUGH P.L. 106-418, APPROVED 11/1/00 ***
 WITH GAPS OF 106-398, 402, 405, 408, 411, 414, 415, 417 ***

TITLE 28. JUDICIARY AND JUDICIAL PROCEDURE
PART II. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
CHAPTER 31. THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

28 USCS § 510 (2000)

§ 510. Delegation of authority

The Attorney General may from time to time make such provisions as he considers appropriate authorizing the performance by any other officer, employee, or agency of the Department of Justice of any function of the Attorney General.

HISTORY:
(Sept. 6, 1966, P.L. 89-554, § 4(c), 80 Stat. 612.)

HISTORY; ANCILLARY LAWS AND DIRECTIVES

Prior law and revision:

Derivation	U.S. Code	Revised Statutes and Statutes at Large
.....	[Uncodified].	1950 Reorg. Plan No. 2, S 2, eff. May 24, 1950, 64 Stat. 1261.

The words "including any function transferred to the Attorney General by the provisions of this reorganization plan" are omitted as executed and unnecessary as the words "any function of the Attorney General" include the functions transferred to the Attorney General by 1950 Reorg. Plan. No. 2.

Explanatory notes:
A prior § 510 (Act June 25, 1948, ch 646, § 1, 62 Stat. 910) was repealed by Act Sept. 6, 1966, P.L. 89-554, § 8(a), 80 Stat. 663. It provided for clerical assistants and messengers for United States attorneys. Similar provisions are contained in 28 USCS § 550.

NOTES:

CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS

Judicial Administration in the Department of Justice, 28 CFR Parts 1-5, 12, 14-17, 25, 47, 55, 58, 60.

Department of Justice, Bureau of Prisons, 28 CFR Parts 500 et seq.

REV_00264198

Federal Acquisition Regulations System, Department of Justice, 48 CFR Parts 2801 et seq.

Add:
8 CFR Part 3
21 CFR Part 1316
28 CFR Part 5
28 CFR Parts 11, 14, 71, 73, 600-602
28 CFR Part 26
28 CFR Parts 35, 36
28 CFR Parts 37, 77
28 CFR Part 81
28 CFR Parts 0, 46, 76
48 CFR Part 2845

This section is no longer cited as authority for:
28 CFR Part 25
28 CFR Part 546

RESEARCH GUIDE

Federal Procedure:
Witnesses, Fed Proc, L Ed § 80:160.
9A Fed Proc L Ed, Criminal Procedure § 22:2265.
33A Fed Proc L Ed, Witnesses § 80:304.

Am Jur:
7 Am Jur 2d, Attorney General § 49.

INTERPRETIVE NOTES AND DECISIONS

1. Generally
2. Wiretapping
3. Immunity of witnesses
4. Delegation of authority to appoint special attorneys
5. Delegation to special prosecutor
6. Miscellaneous

1. Generally

Acting Associate Attorney General had authority to sign certification for prosecution since acting official possesses all powers that official would normally possess. United States v McGee (1999, CA6 Tenn) 173 F3d 952, 1999 FED App 121P.

Attorney General possessed statutory authority to create Office of Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra and to convey to it same investigative and prosecutorial functions and powers provided to an independent counsel by the Ethics Act. Re Sealed Case (1987, App DC) 829 F2d 50, cert den (US) 98 L Ed 2d 765, 108 S Ct 753.

Attorney General is vested with functions of all agencies, employees and officers of Department, and may delegate to any employee, officer or agency of Department any of Attorney General's functions. United States v Weiner (1975, ND Ill) 392 F Supp 81.

Attorney General has authority to seek assistance from independent counsel in function of his official duties, as decided in Nixon v. United States, 418 U.S. 683, 94 S. Ct. 3090, 41 L. Ed. 2d 1039 (1974), under 28 USCS §§ 509, 510 and 515, and 5 USCS § 301. Re Sealed Case (1987, DC Dist Col) 666 F Supp 231.

2. Wiretapping

Provision of Title III of Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (18 USCS § 2516(1)) conferring power on "Attorney General, or any Assistant Attorney General specially designated by Attorney General" to authorize application to federal judge for wiretap order, limits power to authorize wiretap applications to Attorney General himself and to any

REV_00264199

Assistant Attorney General he might designate, and thus Attorney General's Executive Assistant may not be designated to authorize wiretap applications, notwithstanding provisions of 28 USCS § 510 authorizing Attorney General to delegate his functions to any other officer, employee, or agency of Department of Justice. United States v Giordano (1974) 416 US 505, 40 L Ed 2d 341, 94 S Ct 1820.

Under 28 USCS § 510, Attorney General is free to delegate such departmental functions as he sees fit; consequently, regulation amending certain procedures so that advance authorization for consensual monitoring of conversations during criminal investigations could be obtained from any Deputy Assistant Attorney General, as well as designated Assistant Attorneys General and Attorney General, was within power of Attorney General to promulgate. United States v Caceres (1976, CA9 Cal) 545 F2d 1182, 77-1 USTC P 9226, 38 AFTR 2d 76-6215, revd 440 US 741, 59 L Ed 2d 733, 99 S Ct 1465, 79-1 USTC P 9294, 43 AFTR 2d 79-872.

In wiretap matters, 28 USCS § 510 has been superseded by 18 USCS § 2516. United States v Robinson (1973, SD Fla) 359 F Supp 52.

The application for a wire tap must be made by the attorney general or the specially designated assistant attorney general; if made by anyone else the evidence obtained by such wire tap must be suppressed; the general authorization to the attorney general to delegate powers is, in respect to wire taps, limited by the specific statute. United States v Baldassari (1972, MD Pa) 338 F Supp 904; United States v Aquino (1972, ED Mich) 338 F Supp 1080.

3. Immunity of witnesses

Provisions of 28 USCS § 510, allowing Attorney General to delegate his authority in certain cases, are applicable to Attorney General's power to approve applications for immunity from prosecution. Re Horn (1972, CA3 Pa) 458 F2d 468.

Argument that delegation of authority to Assistant Attorney General to grant immunity made by former, rather than present, Attorney General invalidates statutory grant of immunity is untenable, since power to delegate authority provided in 28 USCS § 510 is made to office of Attorney General and not to individual holding that office. December 1968 Grand Jury v United States (1970, CA7 Ill) 420 F2d 1201, cert den 397 US 1021, 25 L Ed 2d 531, 90 S Ct 1260.

4. Delegation of authority to appoint special attorneys

Nothing in 28 USCS § 515(a) or its legislative history evidences congressional intent to limit delegation of authority of Attorney General under 28 USCS § 510; Attorney General can delegate to subordinate officers his authority under § 515(a) to appoint special attorney, and where by regulation supervision of Criminal Division of Department of Justice had been delegated to Assistant Attorney in charge of that division, and such delegation included power to designate attorneys to present evidence to grand juries, delegation was proper and included power to appoint special attorneys. United States v Agrusa (1975, CA8 Mo) 520 F2d 370.

Power to appoint special attorneys under 28 USCS § 515(a) may be delegated by Attorney General to another officer of Department of Justice. DiGirlomo v United States (1975, CA8 Mo) 520 F2d 372, cert den 423 US 1033, 46 L Ed 2d 407, 96 S Ct 565.

28 USCS § 510 permits Attorney General to delegate to any other Department of Justice official any function of Attorney General which includes power to appoint special attorneys under 28 USCS § 515(a), and by regulation (CFR §§ 0.55, 0.60), Attorney General delegated to Assistant Attorney General in charge of Criminal Division, power to designate attorneys to present evidence to grand juries in all cases under his control. United States v Cravero (1976, CA5 Fla) 545 F2d 406, 2 Fed Rules Evid Serv 223, cert den 429 US 1100, 51 L Ed 2d 549, 97 S Ct 1123 and cert den 430 US 983, 52 L Ed 2d 377, 97 S Ct 1679, reh den 431 US 960, 53 L Ed 2d 279, 97 S Ct 2689 and reh den 433 US 915, 53 L Ed 2d 1102, 97 S Ct 2990.

28 USCS § 510 authorizes delegation of Attorney General's appointment powers under 28 USCS § 543; Congress expressly gave AG permission to delegate any of his functions and there is no indication Congress meant to exclude § 543 appointment power from this otherwise unqualified statutory authorization of delegation. United States v Plesinski (1990, CA9 Cal) 912 F2d 1033.

REV_00264200

Since prosecutions for federal crimes not otherwise specifically assigned to another officer of Department of Justice, and coordination of enforcement activities directed against organized crime and racketeering have been delegated by Attorney General to Assistant Attorney General in charge of criminal division, such Assistant Attorney General is authorized and empowered under 28 USCS § 510 to commission special attorney to conduct grand jury proceedings. United States v Brodson (1975, ED Wis) 390 F Supp 774.

Defendants' motions to dismiss indictments on ground that Special Attorneys who presented matters to grand jury were acting without statutory authority were denied, since under 28 USCS § 515(a), Attorney General may designate Special Attorney to appear before grand jury on ongoing basis, since by reason of 28 USCS § 510, Attorney General's powers under § 515(a) are delegable, and since Attorney General had properly delegated his power to appoint Special Attorneys to appear before grand jury to Assistant Attorney General, who properly exercised it. United States v Badalamenti (1975, DC NJ) 394 F Supp 807.

Attorney General of United States has, and had on May 20, 1971, authority to delegate his 28 USCS § 515(a) power to appoint special attorneys, this authorization deriving from 28 USCS § 510; § 515(a) does not, as do other statutes, contain express or implied prohibition which would preclude attorney general from delegating power to appoint special attorneys, and hence it cannot be considered to supersede general and permissive delegation language in § 510. Re Patriarca (1975, DC RI) 396 F Supp 859.

In view of power of Attorney General to delegate authority, Acting Assistant Attorney General had authority to appoint special attorney. United States v Poe (1975, WD Okla) 398 F Supp 487.

5. Delegation to special prosecutor

As long as it remains in force, regulation issued by Attorney General which (1) delegates Attorney General's authority to represent United States in criminal proceeding to Special Prosecutor, (2) gives special prosecutor explicit power to contest invocation of executive privilege in process of seeking evidence deemed relevant to performance of specially delegated duties and (3) provides that Special Prosecutor is not to be removed without consensus of eight designated leaders of Congress, has force of law; executive branch is bound by it, and United States is bound to respect and enforce it. United States v Nixon (1974) 418 US 683, 41 L Ed 2d 1039, 94 S Ct 3090 (not followed United States v Wiley (CA2 NY) 519 F2d 1348, cert den 423 US 1058, 46 L Ed 2d 648, 96 S Ct 793) as stated in United States v Mangan (CA2 NY) 575 F2d 32, 78-1 USTC P 9349, 3 Fed Rules Evid Serv 315, 41 AFTR 2d 78-1174, cert den 439 US 931, 58 L Ed 2d 324, 99 S Ct 320 and (not followed Kerttula v Abood (Alaska) 686 P2d 1197) and (superseded by statute on other grounds as stated in Bourjaily v United States (US) 97 L Ed 2d 144, 107 S Ct 2775, 22 Fed Rules Evid Serv 1105).

Since Attorney General derived his authority to hire Watergate Special Prosecutor from Congress, Congress therefore had power to limit circumstances in which Special Prosecutor could be discharged; in this case Attorney General chose to limit his own authority by promulgating formal Department of Justice regulation giving Special Prosecutor broad powers of investigation and prosecution, and providing that Special Prosecutor would not be removed from his duties except for extraordinary improprieties, and it is well settled that in such circumstances agency regulation has force and effect of law; existence of agency regulation thus made the discharge of Special Prosecutor for insisting upon executive compliance with final court order illegal. Nader v Bork (1973, DC Dist Col) 366 F Supp 104.

6. Miscellaneous

Attorney General could and validly did delegate his power to assign government attorneys to grand jury to Assistant Attorney General in charge of Criminal Division of Department of Justice. Re Persico (1975, CA2 NY) 522 F2d 41.

Since statute relating to certification of juveniles for federal proceedings (18 USCS § 5032) says nothing about delegation of Attorney General's authority, 28 USCS § 510 is presumptively applicable, and order of Attorney General authorizing Assistant Attorney General to redelegate authority to United States attorneys regarding certification of juveniles is within scope of 28 USCS § 510. United States v Cuomo (1976, CA5 Tex) 525 F2d 1285.

REV_00264201

Attorney General has authority pursuant to 28 USCS § 510 to delegate his power to schedule certain drugs as controlled substances to acting administrator of Drug Enforcement Administration. United States v Goodman (1979, CA5 Tex) 605 F2d 870, 5 Fed Rules Evid Serv 96.

In juvenile delinquency proceeding involving Columbian juvenile, District Court sitting in Florida and Court of Appeals of Eleventh Circuit are bound by former Fifth Circuit's determination that United States Attorney General has delegated his authority under 18 USCS § 5032 to United States Attorney of District in which juvenile offense occurs and that under 28 USCS § 510 such delegation is valid. United States v Bent (1983, CA11 Fla) 702 F2d 210.

Appellant's contention that writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum should be quashed because application for writ by Assistant U.S. Attorney rather than Attorney General violates terms of applicable law is without merit, since 28 USCS § 510 is presumed to control delegation by Attorney General in absence of statutory provision which explicitly supersedes it. Re Application of President's Com. on Organized Crime (1985, CA11 Fla) 763 F2d 1191 (disagreed with Re President's Com. on Organized Crime etc. (CA3 NJ) 783 F2d 370 (not followed Re Shafer & Miller Industries, Inc. (SD Fla) 66 BR 578)).

Attorney General had authority under general delegation provision to delegate to DEA Administrator his authority to temporarily schedule drugs under 21 USCS § 811. United States v Touby (1990, CA3 NJ) 909 F2d 759 (disagreed with by United States v Widdowson (CA10) 1990 US App LEXIS 18070).

@(P)Justice Department regulations delegating AG's authority to compromise claims do not create right of action for relators to challenge validity of settlement agreements since they do not create enforceable rights and only regulations having force and effect of law can create private right of action. United States ex rel. Papazian v American Prod. Indus. (1995, CA9 Cal) 58 F3d 404, 95 CDOS 4308, 95 Daily Journal DAR 7391, 40 CCF P 76790.

Attorney General may delegate her power to Assistant Attorney General who in turn may delegate his power to United States Attorneys who may delegate their power to Assistant United States Attorneys, and regulations delegating to Assistant Attorney General in charge of Criminal Division and his Deputy Assistant Attorneys General authority to sign government's need certification to transfer criminal case against juvenile to adult status was consistent with that chain of delegation. United States v Angelo D. (1996, CA10 NM) 88 F3d 856.

Attorney general was authorized to delegate authority vested in him by 18 USCS § 6004 to approve issuance by agency of United States of order compelling testimony or production of information by witness in proceeding before agency. Federal Trade Com. v Foucha (1973, ND Ala) 356 F Supp 21.

15 USCS § 77t(b) is designed to affect power of Securities Exchange Commission and not designed to limit normal power of delegation entrusted to Attorney General. United States v Tallant (1975, ND Ga) 407 F Supp 878.

Attorney General duly delegated to Director, United States Marshals Service, authority vested in Attorney General to take final action in matters pertaining to employment, direction and general administration of personnel of Marshals Service. Craig v Colburn (1976, DC Kan) 414 F Supp 185, affd (CA10 Kan) 570 F2d 916.

Defendant's drug conviction is vacated where he was convicted of manufacture and distribution of drug which had been temporarily scheduled on controlled substances list pursuant to 21 USCS § 811(h) by DEA under general delegation of authority by Attorney General, because although subdelegation of Attorney General's power under § 811(h) is proper, express subdelegation of particular power temporarily to schedule drugs is necessary in view of drastic impact on those accused of violating schedule prohibitions. United States v Hovey (1987, DC Del) 674 F Supp 161.

REV_00264202

Service: LEXSTAT®
Citation: 28 USC 510
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, January 13, 2001 - 6:32 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

REV_00264203

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)

28 CFR 0.85

LEXIS PUBLISHING'S CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS
Copyright © 2000, LEXIS Publishing

 THIS SECTION IS CURRENT THROUGH THE DECEMBER 22, 2000 ISSUE OF ***
 THE FEDERAL REGISTER ***

TITLE 28 -- JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION
CHAPTER I -- DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
PART 0 -- ORGANIZATION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
SUBPART P -- FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

28 CFR 0.85

§ 0.85 General functions.

The Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation shall:

(a) Investigate violations of the laws, including the criminal drug laws, of the United States and collect evidence in cases in which the United States is or may be a party in interest, except in cases in which such responsibility is by statute or otherwise specifically assigned to another investigative agency. The Director's authority to investigate violations of and collect evidence in cases involving the criminal drug laws of the United States is concurrent with such authority of the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration under § 0.100 of this part. In investigating violations of such laws and in collecting evidence in such cases, the Director may exercise so much of the authority vested in the Attorney General by sections 1 and 2 of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1968, section 1 of Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1973 and the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, as amended, as he determines is necessary. He may also release FBI information on the same terms and for the same purposes that the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration may disclose DEA information under § 0.103 of this part. The Director and his authorized delegates may seize, forfeit and remit or mitigate the forfeiture of property in accordance with 21 U.S.C. 881, 21 CFR 1316.71 through 1316.81, and 28 CFR 9.1 through 9.7.

(b) Conduct the acquisition, collection, exchange, classification and preservation of fingerprints and identification records from criminal justice and other governmental agencies, including fingerprints voluntarily submitted by individuals for personal identification purposes; provide expert testimony in Federal, State and local courts as to fingerprint examinations; and provide fingerprint training and provide identification assistance in disasters and for other humanitarian purposes.

(c) Conduct personnel investigations requisite to the work of the Department of Justice and whenever required by statute or otherwise.

(d) Carry out the Presidential directive of September 6, 1939, as reaffirmed by Presidential directives of January 8, 1943, July 24, 1950, and December 15, 1953, designating the Federal Bureau of Investigation to take charge of investigative work in matters relating to espionage, sabotage, subversive activities, and related matters.

(e) Establish and conduct law enforcement training programs to provide training for State and local law enforcement personnel; operate the Federal Bureau of Investigation National Academy; develop new approaches, techniques, systems, equipment, and devices to improve and strengthen law enforcement and assist in conducting State and local training programs, pursuant to section 404 of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, 82 Stat. 204.

(f) Operate a central clearinghouse for police statistics under the Uniform Crime Reporting Program, and a computerized nationwide index of law enforcement information under the National Crime Information Center.

(g) Operate the Federal Bureau of Investigation Laboratory to serve not only the Federal Bureau of Investigation, but also to provide, without cost, technical and scientific assistance, including expert testimony in Federal or local courts, for all duly constituted law enforcement agencies, other organizational units of the Department of Justice, and other Federal agencies, which may desire to avail themselves of the service. As provided for in procedures agreed upon between the Secretary of State and the Attorney General, the services of the Federal Bureau of Investigation Laboratory may also be made available to foreign law enforcement agencies and courts.

(h) Make recommendations to the Office of Personnel Management in connection with applications for retirement under 5 U.S.C. 8336(c).

(i) Investigate alleged fraudulent conduct in connection with operations of the Department of Housing and Urban Development and other alleged violations of the criminal provisions of the National Housing Act, including 18 U.S.C. 1010.

(j) Exercise the power and authority vested in the Attorney General to approve and conduct the exchanges of identification records enumerated at § 50.12(a) of this chapter.

(k) Payment of awards (including those over $ 10,000) under 28 U.S.C. 524(c)(2), and purchase of evidence (including the authority to pay more than $ 100,000) under 28 U.S.C. 524(c)(1)(F).

(l) Exercise Lead Agency responsibility in investigating all crimes for which it has primary or concurrent jurisdiction and which involve terrorist activities or acts in preparation of terrorist activities within the statutory jurisdiction of the United States. Within the United States, this would include the collection, coordination, analysis, management and dissemination of intelligence and criminal information as appropriate. If another Federal agency identifies an individual who is engaged in terrorist activities or in acts in preparation of terrorist activities, that agency is requested to promptly notify the FBI. Terrorism includes the unlawful use of force and violence against persons or property to intimidate or coerce a government, the civilian population, or any segment thereof, in furtherance of political or social objectives.

(m) Carry out the Department's responsibilities under the Hate Crime Statistics Act.

(n) Exercise the authority vested in the Attorney General under section 528(a), Public Law 101-509, to accept from federal departments and agencies the services of law enforcement personnel to assist the Department of Justice in the investigation and prosecution of fraud or other criminal or unlawful activity in or against any federally insured financial institution or the Resolution Trust Corporation, and to coordinate the activities of such law enforcement personnel in the conduct of such investigations and prosecutions.

(o) Carry out the responsibilities conferred upon the Attorney General under the Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act, Title I of Pub. L. 103-414 (108 Stat. 4279), subject to the general supervision and direction of the Attorney General.

HISTORY:

REV_00264205

[Order No. 423-69, 34 FR 20388, Dec. 31, 1969, as amended by Order No. 884-80, 45 FR 22023, Apr. 3, 1980; Order No. 960-81, 46 FR 52347, Oct. 27, 1981; Order No. 967-82, 47 FR 4513, Feb. 1, 1982; Order No. 968-82, 47 FR 4989, Feb. 3, 1982; Order No. 1024-83, 48 FR 35088, Aug. 3, 1983; Order No. 1126-86, 51 FR 7443, Mar. 4, 1986; Order No. 1403-90, 55 FR 11585, Mar. 29, 1990; Order No. 1427-90, 55 FR 28610, July 12, 1990; Order No. 1479-91, 56 FR 10510, Mar. 13, 1991; Order No. 1951-95, 60 FR 11907, Mar. 3, 1995; Order No. 2258-99, 64 FR 52223, 52226, Sept. 28, 1999]

AUTHORITY:
AUTHORITY NOTE APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE PART:
5 U.S.C. 301; 28 U.S.C. 509, 510, 515-519.

NOTES:
[PUBLISHER'S NOTE: For Federal Register citations affecting § 0.85, see the list of Sections Affected in the Finding Aids section of the current annual edition of the GPO's Code of Federal Regualtions.]
[EFFECTIVE DATE NOTE: 64 FR 52223, 52226, Sept. 28, 1999, amended pargraph (b) and revised paragraph (j), effective Oct. 28, 1999.]

NOTES APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE CHAPTER:
CROSS REFERENCES: Customs Service, Department of the Treasury: See Customs Duties, 19 CFR chapter I.
Internal Revenue Service, Department of the Treasury: See Internal Revenue Service, 26 CFR chapter I.
Employees' Benefits: See title 20.
Federal Trade Commission: See Commercial Practices, 16 CFR chapter I.
Other regulations issued by the Department of Justice appear in title 4; title 8; title 21; title 45; title 48.

NOTES APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE SUBPART:
CROSS REFERENCE: For regulations pertaining to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, see part 3 of this chapter.

1037 words

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, January 13, 2001 - 6:33 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)

28 CFR 0.145

LEXIS PUBLISHING'S CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS
Copyright © 2000, LEXIS Publishing

 THIS SECTION IS CURRENT THROUGH THE DECEMBER 22, 2000 ISSUE OF ***
 THE FEDERAL REGISTER ***

TITLE 28 -- JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION
CHAPTER I -- DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
PART 0 -- ORGANIZATION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
SUBPART X -- AUTHORIZATIONS WITH RESPECT TO PERSONNEL AND CERTAIN ADMINISTRATIVE MATTERS

28 CFR 0.145

§ 0.145 Overtime pay.

The Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, the Commissioner of Federal Prison Industries, the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Director of the Office of Justice Assistance, Research and Statistics and the Director of the U.S. Marshals Service as to their respective jurisdictions, and the Assistant Attorney General for Administration, as to all other organizational units of the Department (including U.S. Attorneys), may, subject to any regulations which the Attorney General may prescribe, authorize overtime pay (including additional compensation in lieu of overtime of not less than 10 percent nor more than 25 percent pursuant to section 5545(c)(2) of title 5, U.S. Code) for such positions as may be designated by them.

HISTORY:
[Order No. 423-69, 34 FR 20388, Dec. 31, 1969, as amended by Order No. 516-73, 38 FR 12918, May 17, 1973; Order No. 520-73, 38 FR 18380, July 10, 1973; Order No. 960-81, 46 FR 52350, Oct. 27, 1981]

AUTHORITY:
AUTHORITY NOTE APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE PART:
5 U.S.C. 301; 28 U.S.C. 509, 510, 515-519.

NOTES:
NOTES APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE CHAPTER:
CROSS REFERENCES: Customs Service, Department of the Treasury: See Customs Duties, 19 CFR chapter I.
Internal Revenue Service, Department of the Treasury: See Internal Revenue Service, 26 CFR chapter I.
Employees' Benefits: See title 20.
Federal Trade Commission: See Commercial Practices, 16 CFR chapter I.
Other regulations issued by the Department of Justice appear in title 4; title 8; title 21; title 45; title 48.

144 words

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, January 13, 2001 - 6:37 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

REV_00264208

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)

28 CFR 0.144

LEXIS PUBLISHING'S CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS
Copyright © 2000, LEXIS Publishing

 THIS SECTION IS CURRENT THROUGH THE DECEMBER 22, 2000 ISSUE OF ***
 THE FEDERAL REGISTER ***

TITLE 28 -- JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION
CHAPTER I -- DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
PART 0 -- ORGANIZATION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
SUBPART X -- AUTHORIZATIONS WITH RESPECT TO PERSONNEL AND CERTAIN ADMINISTRATIVE MATTERS

28 CFR 0.144

§ 0.144 Determination of basic workweek.

The Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Director of the Bureau of Prisons, Commissioner of Federal Prison Industries, Inc., Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, Director of the Office of Justice Assistance, Research and Statistics, Director of the Executive Office for United States Attorneys and Director of the United States Marshals Service, as to their respective jurisdictions, and the Assistant Attorney General for Administration, as to all other organizational units of the Department, are authorized to exercise the authority vested in the Attorney General by 5 U.S.C. 6101(a), to determine that the organizational unit concerned would be seriously handicapped in carrying out its functions or that costs would be substantially increased except upon modification of the basic workweek, and when such determination is made to fix the basic workweek of officers and employees of the unit concerned.

HISTORY:
[Order No. 960-81, 46 FR 52350, Oct. 27, 1981]

AUTHORITY:
AUTHORITY NOTE APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE PART:
5 U.S.C. 301; 28 U.S.C. 509, 510, 515-519.

NOTES:
NOTES APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE CHAPTER:
CROSS REFERENCES: Customs Service, Department of the Treasury: See Customs Duties, 19 CFR chapter I.
Internal Revenue Service, Department of the Treasury: See Internal Revenue Service, 26 CFR chapter I.
Employees' Benefits: See title 20.
Federal Trade Commission: See Commercial Practices, 16 CFR chapter I.
Other regulations issued by the Department of Justice appear in title 4; title 8; title 21; title 45; title 48.

168 words

REV_00264209

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, January 13, 2001 - 6:37 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

REV_00264210

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)

28 CFR 0.143

LEXIS PUBLISHING'S CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS
Copyright © 2000, LEXIS Publishing

 THIS SECTION IS CURRENT THROUGH THE DECEMBER 22, 2000 ISSUE OF ***
 THE FEDERAL REGISTER ***

TITLE 28 -- JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION
CHAPTER I -- DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
PART 0 -- ORGANIZATION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
SUBPART X -- AUTHORIZATIONS WITH RESPECT TO PERSONNEL AND CERTAIN ADMINISTRATIVE MATTERS

28 CFR 0.143

§ 0.143 Incentive Awards Plan.

The Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, the Commissioner of Federal Prison Industries, the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Director of the Office of Justice Assistance, Research and Statistics, the Director of the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys, and the Director of the U.S. Marshals Service, as to their respective jurisdictions, and the Assistant Attorney General for Administration, as to all other organizational units of the Department are authorized to exercise the power and authority vested in the Attorney General by law with respect to the administration of the Incentive Awards Plan and to approve honorary awards and cash awards under such plan not in excess of $ 5,000.

HISTORY:
[Order No. 423-69, 34 FR 20388, Dec. 31, 1969, as amended by Order No. 516-73, 38 FR 12918, May 17, 1973; Order No. 520-73, 38 FR 18380, July 10, 1973; Order No. 772-78, 43 FR 14009, Apr. 4, 1978; Order No. 960-81, 46 FR 52350, Oct. 27, 1981]

AUTHORITY:
AUTHORITY NOTE APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE PART:
5 U.S.C. 301; 28 U.S.C. 509, 510, 515-519.

NOTES:
NOTES APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE CHAPTER:
CROSS REFERENCES: Customs Service, Department of the Treasury: See Customs Duties, 19 CFR chapter I.
Internal Revenue Service, Department of the Treasury: See Internal Revenue Service, 26 CFR chapter I.
Employees' Benefits: See title 20.
Federal Trade Commission: See Commercial Practices, 16 CFR chapter I.
Other regulations issued by the Department of Justice appear in title 4; title 8; title 21; title 45; title 48.

138 words

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, January 13, 2001 - 6:36 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

REV_00264212

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)

28 CFR 0.142

LEXIS PUBLISHING'S CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS
Copyright © 2000, LEXIS Publishing

 THIS SECTION IS CURRENT THROUGH THE DECEMBER 22, 2000 ISSUE OF ***
 THE FEDERAL REGISTER ***

TITLE 28 -- JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION
CHAPTER I -- DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
PART 0 -- ORGANIZATION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
SUBPART X -- AUTHORIZATIONS WITH RESPECT TO PERSONNEL AND CERTAIN ADMINISTRATIVE MATTERS

28 CFR 0.142

§ 0.142 Per diem and travel allowances.

The Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Director of the Bureau of Prisons, Commissioner of Fedeal Prison Industries, Inc., Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization Service, Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, Director of the United States Marshals Service, and Assistant Attorney General, Office of Justice Programs, as to their respective jurisdictions, and the Assistant Attorney General for Administration as to all other organizational units of the Department (including U.S. Attorneys), except as provided in paragraphs (f) and (g) of this section, are authorized to exercise the authority of the Attorney General to take final action in the following matters:

(a) Authorizing travel, subsistence, and mileage allowances under sections 5702-5707 of title 5 of the U.S. Code in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Administrator of General Services and the Assistant Attorney General for Administration.

(b) Fixing rates in accordance with sections 5702-5704 and 5707 of title 5, U.S. Code, and regulations prescribed by the Administrator of General Services and the Assistant Attorney General for Administration.

(c) Authorizing travel advances pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 5705 in accordance with the regulations prescribed by the Administrator of General Services and the Assistant Attorney General for Administration.

(d) Authorizing travel and transportation expenses, and, when applicable, relocation expenses for transferred employees, new appointees and student trainees, in accordance with 5 U.S.C. 5721-5733 and regulations prescribed by the Administrator of General Services and the Assistant Attorney General for Administration.

(e) Authorizing or approving, for purposes of security, the use of compartments or other transportation accommodations superior to lowest first-class accommodations under applicable travel regulations subject to 5 U.S.C. 5731.

(f) The heads of Offices, Boards and Divisions, in addition to the Bureaus, have the authority to approve the use of cash in excess of $ 100 in lieu of Government Transportation Requests in emergency circumstances, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Administrator of the General Services Administration.

(g) The Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Aministrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration are authorized to approve travel expenses of newly appointed special agents and the transportation expenses of their families and household goods and personal effects from place of residence at time of selection to the first duty station, in accordance with 28 U.S.C. 530 and regulations prescribed by the Assistant Attorney General for Administration.

HISTORY:
[Order No. 423-69, 34 FR 20388, Dec. 31, 1969, as amended by Order No. 520-73, 38 FR 18380, July 10, 1973; Order No. 565-74, 39 FR 15877, May 6, 1974; Order No. 787-78, 43 FR 22969, May 30, 1978; Order No. 800-78, 43 FR 43297, Sept. 25, 1978; Order No. 864-79, 44 FR 69927, Dec. 5, 1979; Order No. 960-81, 46 FR 52350, Oct. 27, 1981; Order No. 1093-85, 50 FR 20908, May 21, 1985]

AUTHORITY:
AUTHORITY NOTE APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE PART:
5 U.S.C. 301; 28 U.S.C. 509, 510, 515-519.

NOTES:
NOTES APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE CHAPTER:
CROSS REFERENCES: Customs Service, Department of the Treasury: See Customs Duties, 19 CFR chapter I.
Internal Revenue Service, Department of the Treasury: See Internal Revenue Service, 26 CFR chapter I.
Employees' Benefits: See title 20.
Federal Trade Commission: See Commercial Practices, 16 CFR chapter I.
Other regulations issued by the Department of Justice appear in title 4; title 8; title 21; title 45; title 48.

455 words

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, January 13, 2001 - 6:36 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)

28 CFR 0.140

LEXIS PUBLISHING'S CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS
Copyright © 2000, LEXIS Publishing

 THIS SECTION IS CURRENT THROUGH THE DECEMBER 22, 2000 ISSUE OF ***
 THE FEDERAL REGISTER ***

TITLE 28 -- JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION
CHAPTER I -- DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
PART 0 -- ORGANIZATION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
SUBPART X -- AUTHORIZATIONS WITH RESPECT TO PERSONNEL AND CERTAIN ADMINISTRATIVE MATTERS

28 CFR 0.140

§ 0.140 Authority relating to advertisements, and purchase of certain supplies and services.

The Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, the Commissioner of Federal Prison Industries, the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Director of the Office of Justice Research and Statistics and the Director of the United States Marshals Service as to their respective jurisdictions, and the Assistant Attorney General for Administration, as to all other organizational units of the Department (including U.S. Attorneys), are authorized to exercise the power and authority vested in the Attorney General by law to take final action in the following-described matters:

(a) Authorizing the publication of advertisements, notices, or proposals under (44 U.S.C. 3702).

(b) Making determinations as to the acquisition of articles, materials, or supplies in accordance with sections 2 and 3 of the Buy American Act (47 Stat. 1520; 41 U.S.C. 10a, 10b).

(c) Placing orders with other agencies of the Government for materials or services, and accepting orders therefor, in accordance with section 686 of title 31 of the U.S. Code.

HISTORY:
[Order No. 423-69, 34 FR 20388, Dec. 31, 1969, as amended by Order No. 516-73, 38 FR 12918, May 17, 1973; Order No. 520-73, 38 FR 18380, July 10, 1973; Order No. 960-81, 46 FR 52350, Oct. 27, 1981]

AUTHORITY:
AUTHORITY NOTE APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE PART:
5 U.S.C. 301; 28 U.S.C. 509, 510, 515-519.

NOTES:
NOTES APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE CHAPTER:
CROSS REFERENCES: Customs Service, Department of the Treasury: See Customs Duties, 19 CFR chapter I.
Internal Revenue Service, Department of the Treasury: See Internal Revenue Service, 26

REV_00264215

CFR chapter I.
Employees' Benefits: See title 20.
Federal Trade Commission: See Commercial Practices, 16 CFR chapter I.
Other regulations issued by the Department of Justice appear in title 4; title 8; title 21; title 45; title 48.

194 words

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, January 13, 2001 - 6:36 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

REV_00264216

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)

28 CFR 0.138

LEXIS PUBLISHING'S CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS
Copyright © 2000, LEXIS Publishing

 THIS SECTION IS CURRENT THROUGH THE DECEMBER 22, 2000 ISSUE OF ***
 THE FEDERAL REGISTER ***

TITLE 28 -- JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION
CHAPTER I -- DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
PART 0 -- ORGANIZATION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
SUBPART X -- AUTHORIZATIONS WITH RESPECT TO PERSONNEL AND CERTAIN ADMINISTRATIVE MATTERS

28 CFR 0.138

§ 0.138 Federal Bureau of Investigation, Drug Enforcement Administration, Bureau of Prisons, Federal Prison Industries, Immigration and Naturalization Service, United States Marshals Service, Office of Justice Programs, Executive Office for Immigration Review, Executive Office for United States Attorneys, Executive Office for United States Trustees.

(a) The Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, the Commissioner of Federal Prison Industries, the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization Service, the Director of the United States Marshals Service, the Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Justice Programs, the Director of the Executive Office for Immigration Review, the Director of the Executive Office for United States Attorneys, and the Director of the Executive Office for United States Trustees are, as to their respective jurisdictions, authorized to exercise the power and authority vested in the Attorney General by law to take final action in matters pertaining to the employment, direction, and general administration (including appointment, assignment, training, promotion, demotion, compensation, leave, awards, classification, and separation) of personnel in General Schedule grades GS-1 through GS-15 and in wage board positions, but excluding therefrom all attorney and U.S. Marshal positions. Such officials are, as to their respective jurisdictions, authorized to exercise the power and authority vested in the Attorney General by law to employ on a temporary basis experts or consultants or organizations thereof, including stenographic reporting services (5 U.S.C. 3109(b)).

(b) All personnel actions taken under this section shall be subject to post-audit and correction by the Assistant Attorney General for Administration.

HISTORY:
[Order No. 893-80, 45 FR 34268, May 22, 1980, as amended by Order No. 960-81, 46 FR 52350, Oct. 27, 1981; Order No. 1975-95, 60 FR 35335, July 7, 1995; Order No. 2250-99, 64 FR 46845, 46846, Aug. 27, 1999]

AUTHORITY:
AUTHORITY NOTE APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE PART:
5 U.S.C. 301; 28 U.S.C. 509, 510, 515-519.

NOTES:
[EFFECTIVE DATE NOTE: 64 FR 46845, 46846, Aug. 27, 1999, revised this section, effective Aug. 17, 1999.]

NOTES APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE CHAPTER:
CROSS REFERENCES: Customs Service, Department of the Treasury: See Customs Duties, 19 CFR chapter I.
Internal Revenue Service, Department of the Treasury: See Internal Revenue Service, 26 CFR chapter I.
Employees' Benefits: See title 20.
Federal Trade Commission: See Commercial Practices, 16 CFR chapter I.
Other regulations issued by the Department of Justice appear in title 4; title 8; title 21; title 45; title 48.

256 words

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, January 13, 2001 - 6:35 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

REV_00264218

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)

28 CFR 0.89a

LEXIS PUBLISHING'S CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS
Copyright © 2000, LEXIS Publishing

 THIS SECTION IS CURRENT THROUGH THE DECEMBER 22, 2000 ISSUE OF ***
 THE FEDERAL REGISTER ***

TITLE 28 -- JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION
CHAPTER I -- DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
PART 0 -- ORGANIZATION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
SUBPART P -- FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

28 CFR 0.89a

§ 0.89a Delegations respecting claims against the FBI.

(a) The Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation is authorized to exercise the power and authority vested in the Attorney General Under 28 U.S.C. 2672 to consider, ascertain, adjust, determine, and settle any claim thereunder not exceeding $ 50,000 in any one case caused by the negligent or wrongful act or omission of any employee of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

(b) The Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation is further authorized to exercise the power and authority vested in the Attorney General under the Act of December 7, 1989, Public Law 101-203, 103 Stat. 1805 (31 U.S.C. 3724) with regard to claims thereunder not exceeding $ 50,000 in any one case.

(c) The Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation is authorized to redelegate to the General Counsel of the FBI or his designee within the Office of the General Counsel or to the primary legal advisors of the FBI field offices, any of the authority, functions, or duties vested in him by paragraphs (a) and (b) of this section. This authority shall not be further redelegated.

HISTORY:
[Order No. 884-80, 45 FR 22023, Apr. 3, 1980, as amended by Order No. 1417-90, 55 FR 27808, July 6, 1990; Order No. 1551-91, 56 FR 64192, Dec. 9, 1991; Order No. 1906-94, 59 FR 41242, Aug. 11, 1994; Order No. 2314-2000, 65 FR 44682, 44683, July 19, 2000]

AUTHORITY:
AUTHORITY NOTE APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE PART:
5 U.S.C. 301; 28 U.S.C. 509, 510, 515-519.

NOTES:
[EFFECTIVE DATE NOTE: 65 FR 44682, 44683, July 19, 2000, revised paragraph (a), effective July 19, 2000.]

NOTES APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE CHAPTER:
CROSS REFERENCES: Customs Service, Department of the Treasury: See Customs Duties, 19 CFR chapter I.
Internal Revenue Service, Department of the Treasury: See Internal Revenue Service, 26

REV_00264219

CFR chapter I.
Employees' Benefits: See title 20.
Federal Trade Commission: See Commercial Practices, 16 CFR chapter I.
Other regulations issued by the Department of Justice appear in title 4; title 8; title 21; title 45; title 48.

NOTES APPLICABLE TO ENTIRE SUBPART:
CROSS REFERENCE: For regulations pertaining to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, see part 3 of this chapter.

181 words

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : CFR
Terms: (28 w/3 510) and ("director" /5 ("fbi" or "federal")) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, January 13, 2001 - 6:34 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

Source: All Sources : Secondary Legal : Law Reviews & Journals : Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: 508 and 3345 and (acting w/2 "attorney general") (Edit Search)

*76 Wash. U. L. Q. 1039, **

Copyright (c) 1998 Washington University
Washington University Law Quarterly

1998

76 Wash. U. L. Q. 1039

LENGTH: 16079 words

ARTICLES: ARTICLE II, THE VACANCIES ACT AND THE APPOINTMENT OF "ACTING" EXECUTIVE BRANCH OFFICIALS

BRANNON P. DENNING *

* LL.M. Candidate, Yale Law School. Research Associate & Senior Fellow, Yale Law School, 1997-1998. J.D. 1995, The University of Tennessee, Knoxville; B.A. 1992, The University of the South. I would like to thank the following people for welcome comments on earlier drafts: Boris I. Bittker, Nick McCall, Jerry Phillips, Glenn Reynolds, John Vile and John Yoo. Special thanks are due Professor Walter E. Dellinger, whose generous assistance provided much information and saved me from embarrassing oversights early on. Embarrassing oversights that might have crept in later are, of course, not his fault.

SUMMARY:
... Under Article II of the Constitution, Mr. Lee's recess appointment would have been good for a year. ... Even if the Administration were suddenly to drop its contention that the Vacancies Act does not apply, differences between Mr. Lee's appointment and the appointment of Professor Dellinger place in doubt Mr. Lee's very eligibility for a temporary appointment under the Act. ... Under the Act, only one who is "the head of another Executive department or military department or another officer of an Executive department or military department, whose appointment is vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" is eligible to fill a temporary vacancy. ... The present interpretation suggested by the Administration allowing the Attorney General to make appointments without Senate confirmation and without a time limit is incompatible with the Vacancies Act and with the Constitution itself. ... (1) if a first or second nomination to fill such vacancy has been submitted to the Senate, the position may be filled temporarily under section 3345, 3346, or 3347 of this title - ...

TEXT:
[*1039]

In late 1997, when the Senate Judiciary Committee refused to refer Bill Lann Lee, President Clinton's nominee to head the Justice Department's Office of Civil Rights, for a Senate vote because of concerns about Mr. Lee's position on race-based preferences and affirmative action, [1] President Clinton briefly considered waiting until the Senate had gone into recess for Christmas to appoint Mr. Lee to his position. [2] Under Article II of the Constitution, Mr. Lee's recess appointment would have been good for a year. [3] When Senate leaders threatened retaliation [4] if the President followed through with this constitutionally authorized end run around the confirmation process, [5] the President appointed Mr. Lee "Acting" Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights, which, it was reported, meant that Mr. Lee might actually under 28 U.S.C. 509 and 510, the statutes creating both the position of Solicitor General and Assistant Attorney General are clear: the President nominates, and with the advice and consent [*1061] of the Senate, appoints--just like the Constitution says.

REV_00264221

The Administration, regrettably, leaves the impression in its handling of both the Dellinger and the Lee appointments that it simply cannot be bothered with observation of what it deems to be constitutional minutiae. [103] On occasion, its impatience with constitutional forms and formalities is expressed candidly. When asked about Mr. Lee's nomination, and the implications of his being an acting, as opposed to a recess, appointee, White House adviser Rahm Emanuel responded, "The process is not what's important. The goal line is what's important." [104] On the contrary, our Constitution is in large part about process, and it is important that the procedures set forth therein are scrupulously observed. It should have given pause to the Administration that the position it is taking - that the Vacancies Act does not apply to the Justice Department - was first argued by the Nixon Administration as the Watergate scandal decimated its Justice Department. [105]

In the end, a combination of Senate vigilance, public pressure and congressional resolution of statutory ambiguities is needed to prevent these problems from arising again. Moreover, the branches should work together to fill vacancies, each exercising its constitutional responsibilities in good faith, without unnecessary provocation of, or embarrassment to, the other. Both the President and the Senate should remember that they exercise their respective constitutional prerogatives not for their own benefit, but for the benefit of "We the People." As one judge put it:

The Constitution was not written to protect the interests of the Senate, the Congress, the President, or any other branch or division of government. The Constitution and its system of checks and balances was written to protect the people. The restrictions it placed upon the branches' exercise of power were not designed to ensure the branches' interest in equal power, but to ensure that citizens would not find themselves governed by a single branch .... [106]

[*1062] The federal appointments process is slow and cumbersome, some would say grossly inefficient, even when working as it should. [107] It is certainly often inconvenient to a President desiring to see nominees confirmed. But those are not good reasons to ignore either the commands of Congress or of the Constitution itself. The Constitution, after all, was not framed for the convenience of members of the political class; following the formalities of the Constitution is often inconvenient for such persons, as it should be.

VIII. Epilogue

As this Article was being readied for publication this summer, members of the Senate, led by Senators Fred D. Thompson (R-TN), the majority leader Trent Lott (R-MS), Strom Thurmond (R-SC) and Robert Byrd (D-WV), apparently heeding advice from academics to provide a legislative solution to the Vacancies Act conundrum, [108] introduced legislation that would rewrite the Vacancies Act. [109] The proposed Federal Vacancies Reform Act of 1998 (the "FVRA") rewrites section 3345 and requires the President (and only the President) to make temporary appointments to vacant positions, as an alternative to automatic succession by the first assistant. [110] In addition, new section 3345 limits the first assistant succession by disqualifying persons (i) who are first assistants as of the date of the vacancy; (ii) who served in the position of first assistant for less than 180 days during the previous year; and (iii) who are nominated by the President for that position. [111]

The FVRA rewrites section 3346 to extend the period of time for which a temporary appointment may serve from 120 to 150 days. [112] Section 3347 clarifies the applicability of the FVRA; it applies sections 3345 and 3346 to "any office of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) for which appointment is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," unless: (i) an act of Congress "expressly [*1063] supersedes" the FVRA; (ii) the President or the head of a department is "expressly authorized" by Congress to designate an acting appointee; or (iii) the President makes a recess appointment. [113] Section 3347 also preempts arguments that the Justice Department was making with regard to sections 509 and 510 by specifying that a statutory delegation of "general authority to the head of an Executive agency ... to delegate duties to, or to reassign duties among, officers or employees of such Executive agency" is not an express authorization to make temporary appointments contemplated by that section. [114]

REV_00264230

The FVRA also includes provisions calculated to increase pressure on the President to make timely appointments. If the President does not submit a name to the Senate within 150 days of the vacancy, section 3348 provides that the office must remain vacant until a name is submitted and except in the case of a vacancy involving the head of an Executive agency, only the head of the agency "may perform any function or duty of such office, until a nomination is made ...." [115] The same section also gives no force or effect to actions taken by persons in violation of the FVRA. Remaining sections require reports of vacancies, persons acting as temporary appointees, and the names of persons who have been submitted to the Senate for confirmation to be made to Comptroller General, and make provisions for the transition of personnel following Presidential inaugurations. [116]

The Senate took up the FVRA in September 1998, but Republicans were unable to muster the necessary votes to stop debate and force a vote. [117] The failure to cut off debate was attributed both to the desire of Democrats to see wide-ranging reforms in the way the Senate acts on presidential nominees [118] and to add unrelated amendments on managed-care reform to the FVRA. [119]

[*1064]

APPENDIX A

"The Vacancies Act," 5 U.S.C. 3345-3349 (1994).

3345. Details; to office of head of Executive agency or military department

When the head of an Executive agency (other than the General Accounting Office) or military department dies, resigns, or is sick or absent, his first assistant, unless otherwise directed by the President under section 3347 of this title, shall perform the duties of the office until a successor is appointed or the absence or sickness stops.

3346. Details; to subordinate offices

When an officer of a bureau of an Executive department or military department, whose appointment is not vested in the head of the department, dies, resigns, or is sick or absent, his first assistant, unless otherwise directed by the President under section 3347 of this title, shall perform the duties of the office until a successor is appointed or the absence or sickness stops.

3347. Details; Presidential authority

Instead of a detail under section 3345 or 3346 of this title, the President may direct the head of another Executive department or military department or another officer of an

REV_00264231

Executive department or military department, whose appointment is vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to perform the duties of the office until a successor is appointed or the absence or sickness stops. This section does not apply to a vacancy in the office of Attorney General.

3348. Details; limited in time

(a) A vacancy caused by death or resignation may be filled temporarily under section 3345, 3346, or 3347 of this title for not more than 120 days, except that -

(1) if a first or second nomination to fill such vacancy has been submitted to the Senate, the position may be filled temporarily under section 3345, 3346, or 3347 of this title -

(A) until the Senate confirms the nomination; or

(B) until 120 days after the date on which either the Senate rejects the nomination or the nomination is withdrawn; or

(2) if the vacancy occurs during an adjournment of Congress sine die, the position may be filled temporarily until 120 days after the Congress next convenes, subject thereafter to the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection.

(b) Any person filling a vacancy temporarily under section 3345, 3346, or 3347 of this title whose nomination to fill such vacancy has been submitted to the Senate may not serve after the end of the 120-day period referred to in [*1065] paragraph (1)(B) or (2) of subsection (a) of this section, if the nomination of such person is rejected by the Senate or is withdrawn.

3349. Details; to fill vacancies; restrictions

A temporary appointment, designation, or assignment of one officer to perform the duties of another under section 3345 or 3346 of this title may not be made otherwise than as provided by those sections, except to fill a vacancy occurring during a recess of the Senate.

APPENDIX B

28 U.S.C. 509-510 (1994).

509. Functions of the Attorney General

All functions of other officers of the Department of Justice and all functions of agencies and employees of the Department of Justice are vested in the Attorney General except for the functions -

(1) vested by subchapter II of chapter 5 of title 5 in administrative law judges employed by the Department of Justice;

(2) of the Federal Prison Industries, Inc.; and

(3) of the Board of Directors and officers of the Federal Prison Industries, Inc..[sic]

510. Delegation of authority

The Attorney General may from time to time make such provisions as he considers appropriate authorizing the performance by any other officer, employee, or agency of the Department of Justice of any function of the Attorney General.

REV_00264232

FOOTNOTES:

n1. See Democrat Wants New Hearing for Embattled Nominee, AP, Nov. 8, 1997, available in 1997 WL 4891645; Naftali Bendavid, Democrats Delay Panel's Vote on Civil Rights Nominee, Chi. Trib., Nov. 7, 1997, 1, at 3; Eva M. Rodriguez & Edward Felthensal, Vote on Nominee for Civil-Rights Post Delayed as Clinton's Choice is in Peril, Wall St. J., Nov. 7, 1997, at A20. On Mr. Lee generally, and his nomination, see Roberto Suro, Civil Rights Nominee Has Made Allies of Adversaries; Solution-Oriented Lee Faces Scrutiny in Senate, Wash. Post, Aug. 20, 1997, at A23.

n2. Republican Senator Orrin Hatch, Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, characterized a recess appointment as a "finger in the eye" of the Senate and suggested that Lee's temporary appointment as Acting Assistant Attorney General would be less offensive and less likely to invite retaliation. Jackie Calmes, Hatch Suggests Means of Filling Civil-Rights Job, Wall St. J., Dec. 15, 1997, at A6; Helen Dewar, Appointment of Lee on Acting Basis Would Upset GOP Less, Hatch Suggests, Wash. Post, Dec. 15, 1997, at A12; Edwin Meese & Todd Gaziano, Recessing Mr. Lee?, Wash. Times, Dec. 15, 1997, at A19; Jonathan Peterson, Putting Lee in Rights Post Seen as Risky Clinton Move, L.A. Times, Dec. 15, 1997, at A1.

n3. See U.S. Const. art. II, 2, cl. 3.

n4. See Peterson, supra note 2 ("Senate Republicans have warned that if Clinton makes a recess appointment, they are prepared to retaliate on other White House nominees, program funding and Democratic legislation.").

n5. Others were urging him to exercise his Article II power to fill federal judicial vacancies as soon as Congress went into recess. See, e.g., Neal Kumar Katyal, Clinton Has the Power To Fill the Vacant Seats, L.A. Times, Oct. 1, 1997, at B7.

n6. See Stewart M. Powell, Lee Wins Civil Rights Job Despite GOP Block: President Dodges Senate Opposition and Names L.A. Lawyer to Post on an Acting Basis, S.F. Examiner, Dec. 15, 1997, at A1 (reporting that, "as an acting attorney general, Lee could manage the day-to-day operations of the 250 lawyers in the Justice Department's civil rights division potentially for as long as three years, with successive temporary appointments as an acting official"); see also Julia Malone, Lee Tapped as Acting Rights Chief Clinton Bypasses Congress but Takes Tack Considered Less Offensive by GOP, Austin Am.-Statesman, Dec. 16, 1997, at A2.

n7. See 5 U.S.C. 3345-3349 (1994).

n8. See Letter from Sen. Orrin G. Hatch to Attorney General Janet Reno (Dec. 19, 1997), available in 1997 WL 12105430 (requesting to know "how long [Attorney General Reno] intends to have Mr. Lee serve in an acting capacity" and requesting a written opinion as to the applicability of the Vacancies Act to Lee's appointment or reasons why the Act is not applicable); Hatch Finds Provision to Challenge Lee's Appointment, Chi. Trib., Dec. 21, 1997, 1, at 9; Helen Dewar, Senators Question How Long Lee Can Stay in Rights Post, Wash. Post, Dec. 20, 1997, at A8; Nancy E. Roman, Hatch Hobbles Tenure of Lee with Time Limit, Wash. Times, Dec. 20, 1997, at A1; David Stout, Senator Asks How Long Rights Choice Will Remain, N.Y. Times, Dec. 20, 1997, at A9 (noting that Senator Hatch argued that Lee's tenure should be limited to four months); see also Letter from Sen. Strom Thurmond to Attorney General Janet Reno (Jan. 23, 1998), available in 1998 WL 7380358 (also questioning the legitimacy of Lee's appointment).

REV_00264233

n9. See, e.g., Sean Scully, Bid to Reform Vacancies Act up in Air, Wash. Times, Sept. 29, 1998, at A6 ("Democratic opponents of the bill don't deny that presidents routinely ignore the Vacancies Act...."); Vacant Government, Wall St. J., Mar. 30, 1998, at A18 ("Clinton aids privately dismiss the ... Vacancies Act as burdensome and obscure ...."); The Vacancy Act Fight, Wash. Post, Dec. 29, 1997, at A16 ("obscure statute"); The Clinton-Lee Loophole, Times-Picayune (New Orleans), Dec. 20, 1997, at B6 ("little-known"). But see Matthew M. Hoffman, The Art of "Acting," Wash. Post, Jan. 1, 1998, at A25 (arguing that the Vacancies Act is neither "obscure" nor particularly cumbersome).

n10. See infra notes 34-48 and accompanying text.

n11. Article II provides:

[The President] shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The President shall have Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the End of their next Session.

U.S. Const. art. II, 2, cls. 2-3.

n12. U.S. Const. art II, 2, cl. 2. For an argument that there ought to be a little more "advice" in the Senate's "advice and consent" role and suggestions on how that might be accomplished, see Glenn Harlan Reynolds, Taking Advice Seriously: An Immodest Proposal for Reforming the Confirmation Process, 65 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1577 (1992). See also John C. Yoo, Criticizing Judges, 1 Green Bag 2d 277, 282-86 (1998).

n13. U.S. Const. art. II, 2, cl. 2.

n14. U.S. Const. art. II, 2, cl. 3.

n15. See The Federalist No. 69, at 421 (Alexander Hamilton) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961) (contrasting the King of England's patronage power with the circumscribed appointment power of the President).

n16. See The Declaration of Independence paras. 12-13 (U.S. 1776) ("He has made Judges dependent on his Will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries. He has erected a multitude of New Offices and sent hither swarms of Officers to harass our People, and eat out their Substance.").

n17. For example, Samuel Spencer argued in the North Carolina ratifying convention that because of the Senate's ability to veto the President's nominees, the lines of separation between the executive and legislative branches would become blurred:

It is easy to perceive, that the President, in order to do any business, or to answer any purpose in his department of his office, and to keep himself out of perpetual hot water, will be under a necessity to form a connection with that powerful body, and be contented to put himself at the head of the leading members who compose it.

REV_00264234

2 The Debate on the Constitution 879 (Bernard Bailyn ed., The Library of America 1993); see also Bruce Fein, Appointments Are the President's Game Politics: The Confirmation Process Should be Limited to Scrutiny of Cronyism, Competence & Corruption, L.A. Times, Nov. 7, 1997, at B9 (arguing that "the confirmation process should be confined to scrutiny for cronyism, competence and corruption").

n18. See, e.g., The Federalist No. 76, supra note 15, at 457 (Alexander Hamilton) (arguing that the role of the Senate "would have a powerful, though, in general, a silent operation. It would be an excellent check on the spirit of favoritism in the President ....").

n19. See U.S. Const. art. II, 3 ("He shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.").

n20. See George v. Ishimaru, 849 F. Supp. 68, 71-72 (D.D.C. 1994); Olympic Fed. Sav. & Loan v. Office of Thrift Supervision, 732 F. Supp. 1183, 1199-1200 (D.D.C. 1990); Williams v. Phillips, 360 F. Supp. 1363, 1369 (D.D.C. 1973).

n21. Cf. Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976). In Buckley, the Court rejected the argument that Congress could, under the Necessary and Proper Clause, see U.S. Const. art. I, 8, cl. 18, appoint members of the Federal Election Commission:

Congress could not, merely because it concluded that such a measure was "necessary and proper" to the discharge of its substantive legislative authority, pass a bill of attainder or ex post facto law contrary to the prohibitions contained in [the Constitution]. No more may it vest in itself, or in its officers, the authority to appoint officers of the United States when the Appointments Clause by clear implication prohibits it from doing so.

Buckley, 424 U.S. at 135.

n22. See Act of July 23, 1868, ch. 227, 15 Stat. 168 (1868) (authorizing the temporary filling of vacancies in the Executive Department).

n23. Olympic Fed. Sav. & Loan v. Office of Thrift Supervision, 732 F. Supp. 1183, 1194 (D.D.C. 1990).

n24. See 5 U.S.C. 3345-3346 (1994).

n25. Section 3345 of the Act provides for the filling of a vacancy that occurs when "the head of an executive agency (other than the General Accounting Office) or military department dies, resigns, or is sick or absent ... ," 5 U.S.C. 3345 (emphasis added), but otherwise functions like section 3346.

n26. 5 U.S.C. 3346.

n27. 5 U.S.C. 3346 (emphasis added).

n28. 5 U.S.C. 3347.

n29. 5 U.S.C. 3348(a) (emphasis added). Originally, the time limit for the temporary appointments was 10 days. See Act of July 23, 1868, ch. 227, 3, 15 Stat. 168 (1868). The Act was amended in 1891 to increase the time limit to 30 days. See Act of Feb. 6, 1891, ch. 113, 26 Stat. 733 (1891). The time limit was increased again in 1988 to the present limit of 120 days. See Presidential Transition Effectiveness Act, Pub. L. No. 100-398, 7, 102 Stat.

REV_00264235

985, 988 (1988).

n30. 5 U.S.C. 3348(a)(1) (1994).

n31. 5 U.S.C. 3348(a)(2).

n32. 5 U.S.C. 3348(b). This makes sense. If the temporary appointee is the first nominee referred to in subsection (a), and that nominee is either rejected or is withdrawn, that person should not get to serve for an additional120 days while a second nominee is vetted by the Senate.

n33. 5 U.S.C. 3349.

n34. 5 U.S.C. 3347 (1998).

n35. See infra notes 38-40 and accompanying text.

n36. 28 U.S.C. 509 (1994).

n37. See 28 U.S.C. 510 (1994). Specifically, "the Attorney General may from time to time make such provisions as he considers appropriate authorizing the performance by any other officer, employee, or agency of the Department of Justice of any function of the Attorney General." Id.

n38. See Oversight of the Implementation of the Vacancies Act, Hearings Before the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs, Mar. 18, 1998 (Statement of Joseph N. Onek, Principal Deputy Associate Attorney General, Department of Justice and Daniel Koffsky, Special Counsel, Office of Legal Counsel), available in 1998 WL 8993549 [hereinafter Onek Statement].

n39. See Letter from Andrew Fois, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, Department of Justice to Senator Orrin G. Hatch (Jan. 14, 1998), quoted in Steven J. Duffield & James C. Ho, The Illegal Appointment of Bill Lann Lee, 2 Tex. Rev. L. & Pol. 335, 353 & nn.108-09 (1998).

n40. Onek Statement, supra note 38.

n41. Id.

n42. 5 U.S.C. 3347.

REV_00264236

be able to serve longer than if the President had appointed Lee while the Senate was in [*1040] recess. [6]

Soon after the appointment, however, Senator Orrin Hatch, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, wrote a letter to Attorney General Janet Reno in which he cited a federal statute, the Vacancies Act, [7] which imposes a time limit on the service of acting executive branch officials. [8] The letter and the statute attracted the attention of the press, though many dismissed the statute, which was variously described as "burdensome," "obscure," "little known" and even "routinely ignored." [9] The White House responded by citing another statute allegedly vesting the Attorney General with broad powers to fill any and all vacancies at the Department of Justice that, it claimed, superseded the Vacancies Act and its statutory time limit. [10]

This Article looks at both the Vacancies Act, as well as the provisions with which the Administration countered, in the context of both the Lee nomination and one other case (largely ignored by the press) involving Duke law professor Walter E. Dellinger's service as acting Solicitor General from July 1996 until August 1997. Contrary to Administration claims, I conclude that the Vacancies Act does apply to Justice Department officials, and that the statute cited by the Administration allegedly superseding the Vacancies [*1041] Act, if not read in harmony with that Act, unconstitutionally allows the President and the Attorney General to circumvent the Senate's constitutional advice and consent role set forth in Article II.

I. The Constitution and Presidential Appointments

The power of the President to appoint executive branch officials and the conditions for the exercise of that power are contained in Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution (the "Appointments Clause"). [11] Under the plain language of Article II, there are three ways the President may make appointments. The first is the usual process of nomination by the President and confirmation by the Senate for "Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States...." [12] Second, Congress may, by law, authorize the President or others to appoint "inferior Officers." [13] Finally, the President may fill "all Vacancies" occurring while the Senate is in recess, and such commissions are good until the end of the Senate's next session. [14]

By involving the Senate in the appointment of executive and judicial officers, the Framers intended to provide a check on the power of the Executive. [15] The fear at the time was that the President would use the power of appointment, if vested exclusively in that Office, like the King of England used his powers of patronage. [16] Though some felt the President alone should [*1042] have the power to make all appointments, [17] most agreed the Senate's role was necessary to avoid Executive abuses. [18]

As a result of the Framers' design, courts have consistently rejected the proposition that the President may evade the Appointments Clause by claiming an inherent power to fill vacancies under the so-called Take Care Clause, [19] which obligates the President to see that the laws are faithfully executed. [20] If the Constitution denies any inherent power to the President to fill vacancies outside the processes set forth in Article II, it would seem absurd to argue that such power is possessed by one of the President's subordinates. [21] Yet this is the position that the Administration has taken in the cases of Bill Lann Lee and Professor Dellinger. Before probing the weaknesses of the Administration's argument in Part III, this Article first discusses the operation of the Vacancies Act.

[*1043]

REV_00264222

II. The Vacancies Act

The Vacancies Act (the "Act"), first passed in 1868, [22] is an attempt to reconcile the requirements of Article II with the need to keep the executive branch functioning in the face of vacancies occasioned by death, resignation, or by delays in the confirmation process. The Act (reprinted in Appendix A) is now found in 5 U.S.C. 3345-3349, and "delegates to the President limited authority to temporarily fill certain vacancies" [23] in Executive agencies or military departments. [24]

Section 3346 [25] provides for the filling of vacancies occurring when "an officer of a bureau of an Executive department or military department, whose appointment is not vested in the head of the department, dies, resigns, or is sick or absent ...." [26] When such a vacancy is created and the absent officer's appointment is not vested in the head of that department, "his first assistant, unless otherwise directed by the President under section 3347 of this title shall perform the duties of the office until a successor is appointed or the absence or sickness stops." [27]

Under section 3347, "the President may direct the head of another Executive department or military department or another officer of an Executive department or military department, whose appointment is vested in the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to perform the duties of the office until a successor is appointed or the absence or sickness stops." [28]

Any such appointment, however, is circumscribed by section 3348, which limits the amount of time that a temporary appointee may serve without Senate action. Section 3348(a) reads: "A vacancy caused by death or resignation may be filled temporarily under section 3345, 3346, or 3347 of this title for not more than 120 days ...." [29]

[*1044] There are exceptions to the 120-day rule. First, "if a first or second nomination to fill such vacancy has been submitted to the Senate, the position may be filled temporarily under section 3345, 3346, or 3347 of this title -

(A) until the Senate confirms the nomination; or

(B) until 120 days after the date on which either the Senate rejects the nomination or the nomination is withdrawn ...." [30]

The second exception states that "if the vacancy occurs during an adjournment of the Congress sine die, the position may be filled temporarily until 120 days after the Congress next convenes ...." [31] Section 3348 also contains an unequivocal statement that temporary appointees under the Act "whose nomination to fill such vacancy has been submitted to the Senatemay not serve after the end of the 120-day period [set forth in section 3348 (a)(1)(B) or (a)(2)] if the nomination of such person is rejected by the Senate or is withdrawn." [32]

Finally, section 3349 states flatly that a "temporary appointment, designation, or assignment of one officer to perform the duties of another under section 3345 or 3346 of this title may not be made otherwise than as provided by those sections, except to fill a vacancy occurring during a recess of the Senate." [33] Thus, if a vacancy occurs under the Act, either (i) the first assistant will temporarily fill the post, (ii) a replacement will be appointed by the head of the agency (if the head has the power to do so) or (iii) the President shall name a replacement under the procedures set forth in section 3347. Section 3349 makes it clear that these methods of appointment, all of which are subject to the 120-day rule of section 3348, are the exclusive methods of filling vacancies.

REV_00264223

III. The Vacancies Act and Justice Department Vacancies

There is one very relevant exception to section 3347, which reads: "This section does not apply to a vacancy in the office of Attorney General." [34] Under the Administration's liberal interpretation of this section, "the office of [*1045] Attorney General" includes the entire Justice Department. [35] Meanwhile, 28 U.S.C. 509 (reprinted in Appendix B) states, in pertinent part, "All functions of other officers of the Department of Justice and all functions of agencies and employees of the Department of Justice are vested in the Attorney General ...." [36] Section 510 (also reprinted in Appendix B) states that the Attorney General may delegate that authority as "he considers appropriate." [37]

In both testimony to Congress [38] and in a written response to Senator Hatch's letter, [39] the Administration maintained that sections 509-510 (sometimes referred to as the Justice Department's "Organic Act") superseded the Vacancies Act, and that the Organic Act subjects acting appointees to "no precise limit on the time during which an official may carry out the duties of a vacant Senate-confirmed office...." [40]

Though the Administration denies that this means "that such an office may remain unfilled indefinitely," neither the Administration nor the Justice Department has suggested when a permissible "temporary" appointment becomes an admittedly impermissible "indefinite" one. [41]

The origin of the exception to section 3347, however, makes it clear that the exemption applies solely to "a vacancy in the office of Attorney General" [42] and no other. The reason is simple: Congress specified by statute who succeeds to the Attorney General's post should a vacancy occur. [43] When the Department of Justice was created in 1870, [44] the enabling legislation provided:

There shall be in said Department an officer learned in the law, to [*1046] assist the Attorney-General in the performance of his duties, to be called the solicitor-general, and who, in case of a vacancy in the office of Attorney-General ... shall have power to exercise all the duties of that office. [45]

The Attorney General exemption was carved out when the Vacancies Act was codified in the Revised Statutes of the United States. [46] The exception remains today, although the line of succession is somewhat different. [47] It does not appear that the intent was to exempt other Justice Department officials from the operation of the Vacancies Act. Significantly, there is no similar exemption for the Attorney General, or any other temporary appointee in the section of the Act containing the 120-day time limit.

According to testimony given before the Senate in early 1998, the Administration maintains that the Vacancies Act does not apply to those vacancies occurring in the Justice Department. [48] The argument hinges in part on the exemption of the office of the Attorney General from section 3347 of the Vacancies Act, which the Administration argues exempts it (and by extension all other Justice Department officials) from all sections of the Act, including the 120-day limit. The Administration further argues that the Attorney General, by virtue of the Organic Act, has broad powers to fill departmental vacancies independent of both the constitutional appointments process and the time limit of the Vacancies Act. Assuming arguendo that the Administration is correct in its reading, such a statute would raise serious constitutional questions under the Appointments Clause.

[*1047]

REV_00264224

IV. Assessing the Administration's Case

There are several problems with the Administration's position, which I will address in turn. First, I argue that Justice Department officials are not, as suggested by the Administration, exempt from the provisions of the Vacancies Act. Second, assuming arguendo that Congress intended to include the entire Justice Department in the exemption crafted for "the office of Attorney General," that would clearly be unconstitutional because it would enable the President and the Attorney General to fill every office below that of Attorney General without Senate confirmation. Finally, in Part V, I argue that even if the Administration agrees that it is bound by the Vacancies Act, Mr. Lee would still be ineligible to serve as a temporary appointee because he was not, prior to his present appointment, occupying a position requiring Presidential appointment and Senate confirmation as required by the Act.

A. Is the Department of Justice Exempt from the Vacancies Act?

It is fairly clear that the "office of Attorney General" exemption in 5 U.S.C. 3347 does not apply to a vacancy in the Solicitor General's office, the office of Assistant Attorney General or any other office in the Justice Department. [49] The exemption explicitly mentions only the Attorney [*1048] General. [50] As stated above, that exception was placed in the Vacancies Act because Congress had already prescribed the line of succession for that office. [51] Further, even if the exemption in section 3347 was intended to include vacancies in the Solicitor General's Office, which the Attorney General filled under 28 U.S.C. 509-510, there is no language exempting the Attorney General's vacancy appointments from the time limit set forth in the Vacancies Act. [52]

[*1049] When asked to interpret these provisions in the early 1970s, a federal district court in United States v. Lucido [53] read the two statutes together and concluded that Congress had not intended for the Attorney General to be able to fill vacancies with persons who could serve without regard to the 120-day time limit of the Vacancies Act, despite the application of 28 U.S.C. 509-510. [54] The Lucido court rejected the Nixon Administration's version of the same argument presently being made by the Clinton Administration: that because the office of the Attorney General was exempt from section 3347, the Vacancies Act, including the time limit, did not apply. [55] The court acknowledged that the office of Attorney General was exempt from section 3347 and vacancies in that office were covered by the provisions of 28 U.S.C. 508, but also noted that the office of Attorney General was not specifically exempted from the strictures of section 3348. [56] The court reasoned that if that had been Congress's intent, Congress would have included a specific exemption in section 3348 to make it parallel section 3347. [57] "But," the court wrote:

they did not do so and they did provide for the filling of vacancies in 508. It is perfectly plausible that the Congress was concerned about the possibility of a lengthy vacancy in the office of Attorney General. Many duties vital to the everyday functioning of the Justice Department are exercised by the Attorney General, which duties may not be delegated to another official on the resignation of the Attorney General and obviously not delegable upon his death. But at the same time the Congress remained concerned about its constitutional responsibility to advise and consent. Thus, they retained some of the impetus for the President's sending a name to the Senate in a timely fashion rather than allowing a "temporary" Attorney General to [*1050] serve indefinitely. In this regard it is important to note that the purpose of [section 3348] was carried out in the instant case as Mr. Kleindienst's name was sent to the Senate for confirmation even before he assumed the duties of Attorney General. Had the President been dilatory in sending a name to Congress, perhaps a different situation would be present. [58]

REV_00264225

Of course, the Lucido court could have gotten it wrong; there is at least one case holding that a Solicitor General who became Acting Attorney General had no limit on his tenure. [59] The support for the court's conclusion in that case, however, was slight, to say the least. [60] More importantly for our [*1051] purposes, neither court indicated that the exemption contained in section 3347 of the Act applied to anyone other than the Attorney General.

B. Could Congress Authorize the Attorney General to Fill Justice Department Vacancies Requiring Senate Confirmation?

The Lucido court was trying to avoid larger constitutional questions that emerge from an interpretation of the Vacancies Act that bootstraps the Attorney General's power to delegate in 28 U.S.C. 509-510 into an extra-constitutional appointment power. Article II is clear that unless Congress otherwise indicates (or the Senate is in recess), Senate approval is required for the appointment of executive officers. [61] Though Congress could, if it desired, designate either the Assistant Attorney General or the Solicitor General as "inferior Officers," [62] it has not done so. The statutes creating those offices, moreover, specify that those positions are to be occupied by persons nominated by the President and appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate. [63] Yet, according to the Administration, sections 509 and 510 enable the Attorney General to "temporarily" fill vacancies with persons who could conceivably serve indefinitely without ever having to undergo Senate confirmation. Taking the Administration's position seriously would mean that no confirmation hearings for any Department of Justice official below the Attorney General would be necessary; and that the Senate has no role to play. [64] Such a position is, of course, absurd. Yet the Administration has pressed this claim on behalf of both Bill Lee and Professor Dellinger.

[*1052]

V. The Cases of Dellinger and Lee

A. Walter Dellinger

Professor Dellinger was serving as the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Office of Legal Counsel [65] when then Solicitor General Drew Days resigned his post in the summer of 1996 to return to his teaching position at Yale Law School. [66] In the interim, Professor Dellinger was named by Attorney General Reno [67] as "Acting Solicitor General." [68] Dellinger served in that capacity until his resignation, which became effective as of mid-August 1997. [69] Primarily because of the impending presidential election, which deterred the Judiciary Committee from acting upon nominations, there were no plans to submit Professor Dellinger's name to the Senate at the time he assumed his duties. [70] After the election, the Supreme Court's term was in full swing; submitting Dellinger's name at that time would have distracted him from his appearances before the Court in a number of high-profile cases in which the Administration had a stake. [71] In addition, Dellinger made it known, before he accepted the acting appointment, that he was anxious to return to North Carolina for personal reasons. [72] Therefore, the Administration and the Justice Department informed the Senate Judiciary Committee that they did not intend to submit Dellinger's name for confirmation, but that Dellinger would likely serve only through the end of the 1996-97 Supreme Court Term. [73] Apparently, there were no objections to [*1053] this arrangement. [74] Though it drew scant notice at the time, [75] Professor Dellinger's tenure clearly exceeded the statutory time limit imposed by the Vacancies Act. [76]

B. Bill Lann Lee's Appointment

The controversy surrounding Bill Lann Lee's nomination recalls the politically charged days of the early Clinton Administration in which partisan opposition caused the Administration to withdraw the nominations of Zoe Baird and Kimba Wood, the President's first two choices for Attorney General, as well as Professor Lani Guinier, who was nominated for the civil rights post Lee now holds. [77] In contrast to the appointment of Professor Dellinger, editors and opinion columnists, [78] and more importantly, lawmakers, raised the issue of the Vacancies Act. Senator Hatch, while silent on Dellinger, sent a letter in early 1998 to Attorney General Reno asking whether Lee, a former litigator with the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, would be serving after the 120-day limit prescribed in the Act. [79] As noted, the Administration responded by citing the Justice Department's Organic Act, asserting that it superseded the Vacancies Act, and that Mr. Lee could serve without Senate confirmation for an indeterminate amount of time.

REV_00264226

Even if the Administration were suddenly to drop its contention that the Vacancies Act does not apply, differences between Mr. Lee's appointment [*1054] and the appointment of Professor Dellinger place in doubt Mr. Lee's very eligibility for a temporary appointment under the Act.

Under the Act, only one who is "the head of another Executive department or military department or another officer of an Executive department or military department, whose appointment is vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" is eligible to fill a temporary vacancy. [80] Mr. Lee came to the job from the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, and prior to his appointment, Mr. Lee had no position in the Clinton Administration, much less one that required Senate confirmation. In contrast, Professor Dellinger had undergone Senate confirmation when he was nominated as head of the Office of Legal Counsel; this prior confirmation was apparently one of the factors making his service as Solicitor General more tolerable to the Senate. [81]

Curiously, though the Justice Department denies the Vacancies Act even applies to its temporary appointees, the mechanics of Mr. Lee's appointment were calculated to appear compliant with the Act. [82] The Act provides for automatic succession of "first assistants." [83] After Deval Patrick, the former Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights, resigned in January of 1997, the Attorney General delegated the responsibilities of that office to Isabelle Katz Pinzler, then Deputy Assistant Attorney General, a position not subject to Senate confirmation. After Ms. Pinzler served six months in that position, Mr. Lee's name was submitted to the Senate, which returned his name to the President in November. Though Lee was named Acting Assistant Attorney General by the President on December 15, 1997, concurrent with Ms. Pinzler's resignation, the Attorney General had earlier named Mr. Lee to the position that Ms. Pinzler formerly held - Principal Deputy Assistant Attorney General.

As other commentators have pointed out, this does not legitimize Mr. Lee's service because Ms. Pinzler's service itself exceeded the 120-day time limit, and thus by the summer of 1997 she was no longer validly serving as acting head of the Civil Rights Division; therefore, Mr. Lee could not have [*1055] succeeded to the office as first assistant, because there was no one lawfully in that position whom he could have succeeded. [84] More importantly, the attempts to make Mr. Lee's appointment a first assistant succession under sections 3345-46 is inconsistent with the President's announcement that he was appointing Mr. Lee as Acting Assistant Attorney General, which would seem to fall under section 3347. The difference is that under section 3347, the President is only entitled to make a temporary appointment of someone who has previously been confirmed by the Senate, which Mr. Lee was not.

VI. Remedies

It is possible that the Senate will, one way or the other, act on Mr. Lee's nomination and, like Professor Dellinger's service as acting Solicitor General, the present controversy will become moot. However, given the increasing frustration expressed over the pace and tenor of executive and judicial appointments, [85] and the fact that the Lee clamor followed closely on the heels of questions about Professor Dellinger's tour of duty, consideration of solutions for a situation that seems, "capable of repetition, yet evading review" [86] seems overdue. In this section, I suggest three easy solutions that could prevent future crises.

REV_00264227

A. Clarify Statutory Ambiguities

At the very least, the statutes cry out for amendment. Congress should make it clear that although the Attorney General is exempt from the Act because the line of succession is set by another statute, an Acting Attorney General and all other acting Justice Department officials are subject to the time limits set forth in 5 U.S.C. 3348. This clarification would effect the attempt made in Lucido [87] to read the Vacancies Act and the Attorney General succession statute in harmony with the Appointments Clause. The present interpretation suggested by the Administration allowing the Attorney General to make appointments without Senate confirmation and without a time limit is incompatible with the Vacancies Act and with the Constitution itself. In addition, so that there is no doubt about the Act's enforceability, Congress should include a provision for challenging appointees whose time in office has exceeded the 120-day limit.

[*1056]

B. Greater Senate Vigilance

Senators have inexplicably stated publicly that they would have considered a recess appointment of Mr. Lee more of an affront to senatorial privilege than the Administration's extraconstitutional acting appointment. [88] At least the former is constitutionally authorized, [89] though its exercise is admittedly a bit at odds with the spirit in which the procedure was conceived originally. [90] Of course, it could be that Senators were simply hoping that the President would make an acting appointment, and they could lower the boom with the Vacancies Act argument. A recess appointment, on the other hand, would have meant that they would have been stuck with Mr. Lee for at least one year and could have done nothing about it.

Curiously, many commentators and Senators have also groused about the lack of an explicit enforcement provision in the Vacancies Act - the implication being that if Mr. Lee were temporarily appointed, there would be no way to force the Administration to observe the 120-day limit. This reasoning makes no sense. Why could not litigious Senators simply challenge the status of an acting appointee in court and claim that they were being deprived of their right to offer advice and consent? In Williams v. Phillips, [91] a group of Senators did just that, [92] and a district court held that the [*1057] deprivation of the opportunity to give their advice and consent to the President regarding certain nominees constituted the sort of particularized injury necessary to maintain standing. [93] The court stated:

In this case, a declaration that the defendant is unlawfully serving in office would bear upon the plaintiffs' duties to consider appropriations for OEO, or other legislative matters affecting OEO or the position of OEO Director. Moreover, the service by the defendant as Acting Director of OEO, rather than Director, does not remove the direct injury to the plaintiffs' alleged right to pass on the individual nominated to be Director. The injury is aggravated, if anything, because the Acting Director is performing the duties of the Director without the advice and consent which the plaintiffs' would have been able to assert over an individual whose name had been submitted to the Senate for confirmation. [94]

Suing the Administration over a questionable appointment may be just the impetus needed to encourage the Administration to submit the acting official or an alternative nominee for confirmation.

REV_00264228

[*1058] Oaths to uphold the Constitution aside, the Senate ought to be extremely protective of its constitutional prerogatives. Senators can bet that no one else will be; and once surrendered such prerogatives are often difficult to reclaim. Just as the Senate would not sit back and allow an "Acting" Associate Justice to be named to the Supreme Court, their response should be the same when the Solicitor General [95] or an Assistant Attorney General is involved. "The Appointments Clause," one judge has written, "subjects the selection process to public scrutiny, thereby affecting who takes office, how they perceive their function, and how they exercise their powers." [96] That safeguard, and our system of checks and balances in general, is not effective when one branch fails to act, thus circumventing the Constitution's requirements, as the Senate did when it acquiesced in Professor Dellinger's appointment. Nor are those constitutional provisions theirs to waive. While it has not adopted the same "no harm-no foul" attitude toward Mr. Lee, the Senate contributed to the current situation involving Bill Lee, first by not allowing a floor vote to be taken on Mr. Lee, then by suggesting his acting appointment would be less offensive than a recess appointment.

C. Suasion

Perhaps future Presidents will, as a matter of course or in response to heretofore absent public pressure, follow both the text and the spirit of the Constitution and promptly submit acting appointees to the Senate for confirmation. [97] Though Professor Dellinger, at least, had been confirmed once by the Senate, the absurdity of maintaining that one Senate confirmation is good for the duration of one's government service should at once become evident. Imagine then President Reagan defending a decision not to submit "Acting" Associate Supreme Court Justice Robert Bork to the Senate for confirmation in part on the grounds that he had previously been confirmed for his seat on the court of appeals.

Circumvention of the Senate's Advice and Consent role is not only unconstitutional, it is dangerous, especially when the appointments involve [*1059] federal law enforcement officials. The increase in the number of federal criminal statutes [98] - a phenomenon of relatively recent vintage [99] - places enormous power in the hands of the Department of Justice and myriad other federal agencies. [100] While good sense is often exercised by those charged with enforcing the nation's laws, there is always a danger that the executive branch will be tempted to misuse its power. [101] Part of the Senate's responsibility is to evaluate these individuals for qualities like prudence, honesty and sensitivity to the rule of law - virtues necessary to prevent federal prosecutions from becoming persecutions.

VII. Conclusion

Twice in the last two years, the Clinton Administration has sought to avoid the inconvenience of the appointment process set forth in the Constitution. Through a questionable reading of the Attorney General's authority, it claims a broad exemption from the Vacancies Act. [102] In the case [*1060] of Walter Dellinger, who served for over a year as Acting Solicitor General without his name even being submitted to the Senate for confirmation, any questions became moot with his resignation from the Justice Department and his return to academia. With Bill Lann Lee, however, the issues are very much alive, and in desperate need of resolution. Not only are Justice Department officials,other than the Attorney General, not exempt from the plain language of the Act, but the President can only fill temporary vacancies under the Act with persons who have already been confirmed by the Senate for a particular job. Mr. Lee held no such position in the Clinton Administration.

Moreover, despite attempts to create ex nihilo the Attorney General's authority to fill vacancies through a synergistic interpretation of the Act and the Attorney General's power

REV_00264229

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Vacancies Act [2]

OA/NARA#: 310 / 236
9121

Box 62
Folder 1

REV_00264237

Service: LEXSTAT®
Citation: 28 USC 509

28 USCS § 509

UNITED STATES CODE SERVICE
Copyright 2000, LEXIS Law Publishing, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc.
All rights reserved.

 CURRENT THROUGH P.L. 106-418, APPROVED 11/1/00 ***
 WITH GAPS OF 106-398, 402, 405, 408, 411, 414, 415, 417 ***

TITLE 28. JUDICIARY AND JUDICIAL PROCEDURE
PART II. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
CHAPTER 31. THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

28 USCS § 509 (2000)

§ 509. Functions of the Attorney General

All functions of other officers of the Department of Justice and all functions of agencies and employees of the Department of Justice are vested in the Attorney General except the functions--

(1) vested by subchapter II of chapter 5 of title 5 [5 USCS §§ 551 et seq.] in administrative law judges employed by the Department of Justice;

(2) of the Federal Prison Industries, Inc.; and

(3) of the Board of Directors and officers of the Federal Prison Industries, Inc.[.]

HISTORY:

(Sept. 6, 1966, P.L. 89-554, § 4(c), 80 Stat. 612; Mar. 27, 1978, P.L. 95-251, § 2(a)(6), 92 Stat. 183; Oct. 12, 1984, P.L. 98-473, Title II, Ch II, § 228(a), 98 Stat. 2030.)

HISTORY; ANCILLARY LAWS AND DIRECTIVES

Prior law and revision:

Derivation	U.S. Code	Revised Statutes and Statutes at Large
.....	[Uncodified].	1950 Reorg. Plan No. 2, S 1, eff. May 24, 1950, 64 Stat. 1261.

The section is restated to allow incorporation into this chapter.

For Reviser's Note covering former section 507, upon which this section is partially derived, see Reviser's Note set out under section 547 of this title.

Explanatory notes:

A prior § 509 (Act June 25, 1948, ch 646, § 1, 62 Stat. 910) was repealed by Act Sept. 6, 1966, P.L. 89-554, § 8, 80 Stat. 663. It provided for expenses of United States attorneys. Similar provisions are contained in 28 USCS § 549.

Act Mar. 27, 1978, P.L. 95-251, § 2(a)(6), 92 Stat. 183, provided for substituting "administrative law judges" for "hearing examiners" in "section 509(i) of title 28, United States Code". 28 USCS § 509(1) was so amended to reflect the probable intent of Congress.

REV_00264238

PERSONALIZE YOUR APB HOME PAGE Click Here
ADVERTISING DO YOU KNOW WHAT TODAY IS? FREE!

FBI to Double Force of Digital G-Men

Bureau Plans 40 New Cyber-Squads Nationwide

March 10, 2000

By James Gordon Meek

James Gordon Meek/APBnews.com
FBI Deputy Director Thomas Pickard

WASHINGTON (APBnews.com) -- The FBI is planning to double its force of digital G-men over the next two years by deploying computer crime squads in all 56 field offices nationwide to fight cybercrime and cyberterrorism.

FBI Deputy Director Thomas Pickard told APBnews.com that the federal law enforcement agency also wants to boost the number of investigators focused on high-tech crime at the National Infrastructure Protection Center (NIPC) at FBI headquarters here.

"The workforce is going to be beefed up in the NIPC," Pickard said in an interview Thursday. "You're going to see eventually, I would say, 56 NIPC-like squads out there in all our offices."

Related Audio:
Deputy Director Details the Bureau's Cybercrime Plans

But he cautioned: "It doesn't happen overnight -- you can't turn on a faucet and make this happen."

Hacking and espionage threats

The plan emerged in recent weeks as the FBI and Justice Department scrambled to investigate high-profile hacker attacks on top e-commerce and media Web sites that shut down many of them for several hours in February.

ADVERTISING Find a Great Deal now! go! web swap

APB Services FREE daily e-mail alert

APB Story FBI Monitored Newspaper Editors' Group for Decades

The Back Door Into Cyber-Terrorism

The Top 10 Computer Security Flaws

Girl's Gift Computer Comes Loaded With Porn

Bill Would Put Megan's Law in Cyberspace

Little Damage After 'Killer Resume' Attack

FBI: New Computer Virus Spreading

Ruling Could Strip Online Anonymity

REV_00264239

Related Stories:

Wanted by the FBI: High-Tech Crime Fighters

FBI Breaks Ground for a New Crime Lab

Report: FBI Should Absorb DEA, ATF

Federal Cyber-Cops Seek Broader Warrant Power

Fed Computers Need More Security, Senators Say

The deputy director's comments contrast with those from other FBI officials, who have expressed concern about the lack of new funding for the NIPC in the Clinton administration's 2001 budget proposal. And one knowledgeable official recently said that 14 special agents were reassigned from the NIPC force and not replaced.

Pickard said the bureau's cybercrime-fighting abilities have been boosted in other ways, including the addition of new computer forensics labs in San Diego and Baltimore.

In the future, he predicted, FBI computer crime investigators likely will "migrate through" the command center in Washington, then fan out into eight- or 10-person squads across the country to investigate online fraud, hacking and espionage.

"There's no better training you can get than working on the most complex cases here than going out to the field offices and helping with that," he said.

'Coming into the digital age'

Sixteen cybercrime squads already operate in the United States under the direction of the NIPC, ensconced within the FBI's counterterrorism division. Pickard said they have succeeded in stopping significant criminal enterprises. He cited a recent bust in Charlotte, N.C., where the new NIPC squad there recovered $250,000 paid to an extortionist.

In Washington, the NIPC has 100 agents drawn from the FBI, Central Intelligence Agency, National Security Agency and other government sectors, with 193 additional agents posted in field offices who answer to NIPC Director Michael Vatis. Some of the supervisors in the field cybersquads were dispatched from the NIPC command center bunkered inside the FBI's downtown headquarters.

Increasingly, Pickard said, when the FBI executes search warrants in drug or white-collar crime cases, agents find that suspects have computers and removable media, such as floppy discs, that contain information pertaining to their illegal activities.

"That wasn't the case five years ago," he said. "We are getting inundated with more and more cases coming into the digital age."

White House Seeks Curbs on Internet Drug Sales

Businesses Use $12 Billion of Stolen Software

Killer Put Tickets to His Execution on EBay

Student Charged With Online Extortion Attempt

Hacker Attack Disables Official NHL Web Site

Feds Debunk E-mail on Deadly Sponges

Feds Want to Regulate Internet Privacy

EBay Halts Auction of Waco Rifle

Report: Feds Slow to React to 'Love Bug'

Fake IDs Flourish on Internet

Chameleon-like Virus Hits Internet

INTERNET CRIME ARCHIVES

TALK ABOUT IT

APBnews.com Poll:

Should public libraries be held criminally liable if children see pornography on the Internet through their computers?

○ Yes ○ No Vote

Share your thoughts about corporate snooping habits of e-mail, phone, and web surfing.

Are hackers crushing the

REV_00264240

Finding forensic cyber-evidence

Terrorism is another FBI priority where skilled computer forensic technicians and agents could have a bright future.

Pickard cited as an example the case of Khalil Deek, a naturalized U.S. citizen born in the Middle East, who was arrested in Pakistan, extradited to Jordan and charged as a suspected ringleader in accused terrorist Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda organization. Pickard said a laptop computer taken from Deek was "exploited" in the hunt for evidence of an alleged conspiracy to facilitate foiled attacks against tourist sites in Jordan.

Since becoming FBI deputy director three months ago, Pickard has been busy investigating terrorist plots and computer hack attacks that continue to fuel criticism about the FBI's ability to fight sophisticated cybercrimes.

Pickard dismissed reports that the FBI hasn't moved quickly enough to catch what he characterized as a "loose confederation" of computer hackers who used distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) assaults staged from dozens of commandeered computers to temporarily shut down a dozen top commercial Web sites in February -- and even the FBI's site last week.

"This is not a 60-minute investigation that will conclude at the end of your evening hour," he said of the international probe. "We can always do things better. We could be criticized for letting it happen at all, but we've gone out on the offensive."

'Significant progress' being made

He said the FBI released software tools in November that allowed companies to better detect DDoS attacks that cripple systems with floods of junk data.

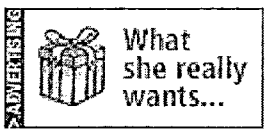
Pickard said the bureau is making significant progress in the probe and has received information from both informants and foreign governments as it follows a digital trail that has the FBI globe-trotting from one Internet service provider to the next -- a task many security experts say could be endless.

While the FBI hopes its agents will simply be tipped off to the identity of the hackers who knocked out eBay, Yahoo and other Web sites, the deputy director said the painstaking data-gathering is necessary to make a criminal case against anyone eventually arrested.

"The informants are going to help, and we do have sources who have been helping us," he said. "We're going down a number of different avenues with this, but the progress we've made going down the electronic trail, I've been very pleased with."

James Gordon Meek is an APBnews.com staff writer in Washington (james.meek@apbnews.com).

More from APBnews.com:



Internet economy?

Do we need tougher gun control initiatives?

More NewsCenter Forums.

ELSEWHERE ON THE WEB

Hacker Attacks D.C. City Web Site

Man Dies in 'William Tell' Holiday Gunplay

Mother, Sons Killed During Rape Attack

Downey Pleads Innocent to New Drug Charges

Wife Stakes Infidelity Claim on DNA Test

Cops Seek More Victims of Accused Cannibal

| HOME | NEWS | SAFETY | CRIMESOLVERS | MEDIA | CJ PROS | RESOURCES | CJ SYSTEM | VIDEO | FORUMS |

©Copyright 2000 APB Multimedia Inc. All rights reserved.

ABOUT APB

REV_00264242

U.S. Department of Justice
Federal Bureau of Investigation

For Immediate Release Washington D.C.
December 23, 1997 FBI National Press Office

Director Louis J. Freeh announced today the appointment of Thomas J. Pickard, a 22-year veteran of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, as an Assistant Director of the FBI who will head the Criminal Investigative Division at FBI Headquarters.

Freeh said "Tom Pickard has distinguished himself as an investigator, supervisor, and innovator in the criminal field, demonstrating the qualities necessary to lead one of the most important posts in the FBI. During the course of his career, he had major city assignments in key investigative areas that include violent crimes, white collar crime, foreign counterintelligence, and counterterrorism."

"For example, he has most recently been involved in the on-going investigation into police corruption in the Washington Metropolitan Police Department and the apprehension and transportation of Mir Aimal Kansi to the United States," Freeh said.

"Tom Pickard also played a primary role in the investigation into the crash of TWA flight 800," Freeh said. " He supervised the trials of the first four Trade Center defendants; the trial of the Blind Sheik and his coconspirators, and the Manila Air conviction of Ramzi Youssef and his associates," Freeh said. "In addition, he personally traveled to conduct renditions of two terrorists, one from the Middle East and the other from Southeast Asia."

Pickard, 47, has most recently been the Assistant Director in Charge of the Washington Field Office. As head for the Criminal Investigative Division, he will be responsible for a growing number of investigations abroad as well as investigative matters concerning organized crime/drugs, violent crimes, white-collar crime, public corruption, civil rights, fugitives, crimes on government reservations, and interstate theft.

He earlier was the Special Agent in Charge of the National Security Division of the New York Office, and the Assistant Special Agent in Charge for all White-Collar Crime investigations and eventually Violent Crimes Matters in New York. He also served in an undercover capacity in a highly sensitive investigation code named "ABSCAM" in April 1979.

A native of Woodside, New York, Pickard holds a Bachelor of Business Administration degree in Accounting from St. Francis College, Brooklyn, New York, and a Master of Business Administration degree in Taxation from St. John's University, Jamaica, New York. He is a Certified Public Accountant.

The FBI has 14 Assistant Directors -- eleven who head divisions at Headquarters and three who head Field Offices in New York, Los Angeles, and Washington D.C. This position is the third-highest in the FBI after the Director and the Deputy Director.

| 1997 Press Releases | FBI Press Room | FBI Home Page |

REV_00264243

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Legislative Histories & Materials : Committee Reports
Terms: "vacancies act" and date aft 1997 (Edit Search)
Focus: "attorney general"

1998 Committee Reports, July 5, 1998

Copyright 1998 LEXIS-NEXIS, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved Committee Reports

105th Congress, 2nd Session

Senate Report 105-250

105 S. Rpt. 250

FEDERAL VACANCIES REFORM ACT OF 1998

DATE: July 5, 1998. Ordered to be printed

SPONSOR: Mr. Thompson submitted the following together with ADDITIONAL AND MINORITY VIEWS
(To accompany S. 2176)

COMMITTEE: from the Committee on Governmental Affairs

REPORT

TEXT:
The Committee on Governmental Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2176) to provide a mechanism for the temporary filling of positions that are legally appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and having considered the same, reports favorably on the bill as amended and recommends that the bill as amended do pass.

I. Purpose

The purpose of S. 2176, the Federal Vacancies Reform Act, is to create a clear and exclusive process to govern the performance of duties of offices in the Executive Branch that are filled through presidential appointment by and with the consent of the Senate when a Senate confirmed official has died, resigned, or is otherwise unable to perform the functions and duties of the office.

II. Summary of S. 176

S. 2176 provides that upon the death, resignation, or inability to serve of an officer of an executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President), the first assistant to the officer becomes the acting officer, subject to the bills time limits. If the President so directs, a person who has already received Senate confirmation can be made the acting officer in lieu of the first assistant. The bill also requires that a first assistant who has not received Senate confirmation, but who is nominated to fill the office permanently, can be made the acting officer only if he has been the first assistant for at least 180 days in the year preceding the vacancy. The acting officer may serve for 150 days beginning on the date the vacancy occurs. In the event a first or second nominee is withdrawn, rejected or returned, the person may serve as the acting official until 150 days after the withdrawal, rejection, or return.

REV_00264244

history of use in the Vacancies Act. As under current law, the term "first assistant" is used to refer to the first assistant to the "officer." However, the practice under current law, which would be continued by this bill, is that the first assistant is actually the first assistant to the vacant office. Certain officers have first assistants designated by statute. See, e.g., 28 U.S.C. 508(a) ("for the purpose of section 3345 of title 5 the Deputy Attorney General is the first assistant to the Attorney General.") Other departments and agencies have established first assistants by regulation. The Vacancies Act provides for the automatic performance of the functions and duties of the vacant office by the first assistant because such person is often a career official with knowledge of the office or a Senate-confirmed individual, and the Committee believes that the routine functions of the office should be allowed to continue for a limited period of time by that one person. The provision therefore emphasizes the limit on presidential power to select an acting officer without that individual having received Senate confirmation, while permitting flexibility in the performance of governmental operations since, if a first assistant exists, the President need not take any action for an acting official to serve.

If there is no first assistant, or if the President following the assumption of acting status by the first assistant, but within the time limits prescribed by section 3346 so chooses, the President (and only the President) may direct a person who has already received Senate confirmation for another position to perform the functions and duties of the office temporarily in an acting capacity, subject to the time limits of section 3346. This provision allows the President limited flexibility in appointing temporary officers, restricting the pool to persons who have already received Senate confirmation for their current position. If there is no first assistant, no one is permitted by law to become an acting officer until the President designates a Senate-confirmed individual to be the acting officer.

In either case, the acting officers service is limited to the time period specified in section 3346. This marks a repeal of the current statutory provision in both sections 3345 and 3346 that the acting officer "shall perform the duties of the office until a successor is appointed or the absence or sickness stops," language that has been a part of each Vacancies Act since 1792.

Notwithstanding a first assistant on the day of the vacancys automatic functioning as the acting officer, such first assistant who has not served as first assistant for 180 days of the 365 days prior to the vacancy may not serve as the acting officer if the President nominates that person for appointment to that position. If the President nominates the former first assistant, who served for less than 180 of the 365 days preceding the vacancy, to the permanent position, the first assistant must cease performing the functions and duties of the office. In that instance, for an acting person to continue to perform those duties, the President would be required to designate as the acting officer a person who has received Senate confirmation to another post, who can serve as the acting officer for the remainder of the time period established under section 3346 that was not consumed by the first assistant.

A first assistant who is a career person will ordinarily have served more than 180 days as first assistant at the time the vacancy arises. Such a person will be able to serve both as the acting officer and as the permanent nominee. The 180-day requirement is not confined to the 180 days immediately preceding the vacancy, as, for instance, the first assistant may have been ill for part of that period. The Presidents power to nominate is not disturbed in any way; however, if he chooses to nominate a brief-serving first assistant, that person may no longer serve as the acting officer. The President would retain his existing power to designate first assistants to those officers where he currently enjoys such power. The Committee believes that the length of service of the first assistant eligible to be both the nominee and the acting officer should be sufficiently long to prevent manipulation of first assistants to include persons highly unlikely to be career officials.

With respect to a vacancy in the office of Attorney General, 28 U.S.C. 508 will remain applicable. That section ensures that Senate confirmed Justice Department officials will be the only persons eligible to serve as Acting Attorney General.

REV_00264253

The new section 3346 limits the length of the acting officers service to 150 days, beginning on the date the vacancy occurs. The Committee believes that while the background check process takes no longer today than in 1988, when the Vacancies Act limitation was set at 120 days, the vagaries of the vetting and nomination process now make 150 days a more realistic time limit. Even if there is no first assistant, and the President declines to designate a Senate-confirmed person to be the acting person, the 150-day period begins to run. Thus, the designated person would serve for 150 days less the time that elapsed between the vacancy and the designation. If the vacancy arises while the Senate is in adjournment sine die, and thus the acting officer begins to serve during such period, the 150-day period is to begin on the date that the Senate first reconvenes. The only time this provision is relevant is when the Senate-confirmed person dies, resigns, or becomes ineligible to serve when the Senate is in adjournment sine die.

The 150 days is a maximum period, but an acting officer need not serve the full 150 days. Besides the obvious ending of service within 150 days if a nominee is confirmed in that time, the Vacancies Act also applies to the beginning of an inability of the applicable officer to serve. When that officer is again eligible to resume service, he or she may return to the office, thus ending the service of the acting officer.

The 150 days runs from the vacancy, "vacancy" referring to the death, resignation, or beginning of inability to serve of the Senate-confirmed officer. This meaning of "vacancy" applies each time it is used in the legislation. When the acting persons 150 days expires, the position again becomes vacant, but there is no "vacancy" that permits another person to serve as acting for another 150 days. Otherwise, a string of acting officials could serve for 150 days. That has never been the understanding of the functioning of the Vacancies Act, and the Committee reaffirms that there is only one vacancy that triggers the 150 days.

An acting officer may die or resign. In that event, the first assistant, if there is one, or a new presidential designee of a Senate-confirmed officer may become the acting officer, limited in service as acting officer to 150 days less the time of service of the first acting officer. No one else may serve as acting officer. Once again, that means that if there is no first assistant, and no presidential designation, no one may serve as acting officer. The prohibition on an acting officer who was first assistant for less than 180 days of the 365 days prior to the vacancy becoming the nominee for the position would still be applicable, since the original vacancy, not the subsequent departure of the acting officer, is the measuring event.

Under new section 3346(a)(2), and subject to section 3346(b), an acting officer may serve more than 150 days if a first or second nomination is submitted to the Senate, and may serve while that nomination is pending from the date the nomination is submitted. The acting officer may serve even if the nomination is submitted after the 150 days has passed although, as discussed below, the acting officer may not serve between the 151st day and the day the nomination is submitted. The Committee extends the time period for acting service so as to create an incentive for the President to submit a nomination. The submission of nominations also will lead to a reduction in the number of acting officials, a goal the Committee finds highly desirable.

The statutory language refers to "(t)he person serving as an acting officer as described under section 3345." The Committee chose this wording deliberately. That is the only person eligible to be the acting officer, whether during the 150 days or upon submission of a nomination. The same considerations apply to the bills references to "the person" in subsections (b) and (c).

If the first nomination for the office is rejected by the Senate, withdrawn, or returned to the

REV_00264254

President by the Senate, the person may continue to serve as the acting officer for no more than 150 days after the date of such rejection, withdrawal, or return. "Return" refers to Senate Rule XXXI, which provides that, "(I)f the Senate shall adjourn or take a recess for more than thirty days, all nominations pending and not finally acted upon at the time of taking such adjournment or recess shall be returned by the Secretary to the President, and shall not again be considered unless they shall again be made to the Senate by the President." This provision allows the office to be temporarily filled by "the person" who was originally eligible to be the acting officer at the time the vacancy arose while the President is provided 150 days to submit a second nomination.

Notwithstanding the 150-day limit on service of an acting officer following the rejection, withdrawal, or return of a first nomination, "the person serving as the acting officer" may serve longer than 150 days if, in the cases of rejection or withdrawal of the first nominee, a second nomination of a different individual for the office is submitted to the Senate. If the second nomination is submitted after more than 150 days after the rejection, withdrawal or return of the first nomination, the provisions of revised section 3348 will apply until the second nomination is submitted. If the second nominee is confirmed within 150 days of the nomination, the term of the acting officer ceases. In the case of a return, the second nomination could be of the same individual first nominated. The "person serving as the acting officer" may serve for 150 days following the rejection, withdrawal, or rejection of the second nomination. However, after that 150-day period has elapsed, if no permanent nominee has been confirmed, the provisions of revised section 3348 apply.

The revised section 3347 provides that the Vacancies Reform Act applies to any office of an executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President) for which appointment is required to be made by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The section does allow temporary appointments to be made other than through the Vacancies Reform Act in three narrowly delineated exceptions. First, where Congress provides that a statutory provision expressly provides that it supersedes the Vacancies Reform Act, the other statute will govern. But statutes enacted in the future purporting to or argued to be construed to govern the temporary filling of offices covered by this statute are not to be effective unless they expressly provide that they are superseding the Vacancies Reform Act.

Second, the bill retains existing statutes that are in effect on the date of enactment of the Vacancies Act of 1998 that expressly authorize the President, or the head of an executive department to designate an officer to perform the functions and duties of a specified office temporarily in an acting capacity, as well as statutes that expressly provide for the temporary performance of the functions and duties of an office by a particular officer or employee. (This includes statutes that provide for an automatic designation, unless the President designates another official). The Committee is aware of the existence of statutes specifically governing a vacancy in 41 specific offices, 40 of which would be retained by this bill:

1. Administrator, Drug Enforcement Administration (5 U.S.C. Reorg. Plan No. 2 of 1973) (two alternatives);

2. Administrator, Environmental Protection Agency (5 U.S.C. Appendix 1);

3. Administrator, Federal Aviation Administration (49 U.S.C. 106(I));

4. Administrator, General Services Administration (40 U.S.C. 751(c));

5. Administrator, National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (5 U.S.C. Appendix 1);

6. Administrator, Small Business Administration (15 U.S.C. 633(b)(1));

REV_00264255

7. Archivist, National Archives and Records Administration (44 U.S.C. 2103(c));

8. Attorney General (28 U.S.C. 508(a));

9. Attorney General (28 U.S.C. 508(b));

10. Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff (10 U.S.C. 154(d));

11. Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff (10 U.S.C. 154(e));

12. Chief Judge, Court of Veterans Appeals (38 U.S.C. 7254(d));

13. Chief of Naval Operations (10 U.S.C. 5035(d)(2));

14. Chief of Staff of the Air Force (10 U.S.C. 8034(d)(2));

15. Chief of Staff of the Army (10 U.S.C. 3034(d)(2));

16. Commandant of the Marine Corps (10 U.S.C. 5044(d)(2));

17. Commissioner, Social Security Administration (42 U.S.C. 902(b)(4));

18. Comptroller General (31 U.S.C. 703(c));

19. Director, Office of Management and Budget (31 U.S.C. 502(f));

20. Director, U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency (22 U.S.C. 2563);

21. Director, U.S. Information Agency (5 U.S.C. Appendix 1);

22. Director, U.S. International Development Cooperation Agency (5 U.S.C. Appendix 1);

23. General Counsel, Department of the Treasury (31 U.S.C. 301(f)(1));

24. General Counsel, National Labor Relations Board (29 U.S.C. 153(d));

25. President, Export-Import Bank (12 U.S.C. 635a(b));

28. Public Printer, Government Printing Office (44 U.S.C. 304);

29. Secretary of Defense (10 U.S.C. 132(b));

30. Secretary of Education (20 U.S.C. 3412(a)(1) (two alternatives);

31. Secretary of Energy (42 U.S.C. 7132(a)) (two alternatives);

32. Secretary of Health and Human Services (5 U.S.C. Appendix 1) (two alternatives);

33. Secretary of Labor (29 U.S.C. 552);

34. Secretary of Transportation (49 U.S.C. 102(c)(2));

35. Secretary of Transportation (49 U.S.C. 102(e));

36. Secretary of the Treasury (31 U.S.C. 301(c)(2));

REV_00264256

37. Secretary of Veterans Affairs (38 U.S.C. 304);

38. Special Counsel, Immigration-Related Unfair Employment Practices (8 U.S.C. 1324b(c)(1));

39. United States Attorney (28 U.S.C. 546(a)-(d)); and

40. United States Marshal (28 U.S.C. 562(a)-(b)).

A statute, 42 U.S.C. 206(a), provides that the Surgeon General shall assign one commissioned officer from the Regular Corps to act as Surgeon General in the event of disability or vacancy in that office. The language of this bill does not retain this statutory means for filling a vacancy in a specific position.

Most of these retained statutes do not place time restrictions on the length of an acting officer. The various authorizing committees may choose in the future to reexamine whether these positions should continue to be filled through the existing procedure, or whether it would be advisable to repeal those statutes in favor of the procedures contained in the Vacancies Reform Act. The Committee believes that some of these statutes may have been passed without knowledge of the Vacancies Act. In any event, even with respect to the specific positions in which temporary officers may serve under the specific statutes this bill retains, the Vacancies Act would continue to provide an alternative procedure for temporarily occupying the office.

The third exception to the applicability of the Vacancies Reform Act to all executive agency offices that are appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate is the Presidents constitutional power under Article II, sec. 2, cl. 3 to make appointments during the recess of the Senate.

The bill provides that any statutory provision providing general authority to the head of an executive agency to delegate or reassign duties within that executive agency is not a statutory provision that qualifies within the exception contained in section 3347(a)(2) for existing statutes that provide for the filling of a vacancy in a specific office. This provision forecloses the argument raised by the Justice Department that sections 28 U.S.C. 509 and 510, rather than the Vacancies Act, apply to vacancies in that department. This provision also forecloses the argument that similar language of vesting and delegation contained in the organic statutes of other departments, rather than the Vacancies Act, applies to those departments.

New section 3348 provides an enforcement mechanism for the legislation. If the President does not submit a nominee for a vacant executive agency position requiring the advice and consent of the Senate within 150 days of the vacancy caused by the departure of the last Senate-confirmed officer, the functions and duties of the office can be performed only by the head of that agency until a nomination is forwarded to the Senate.

The bill defines "function or duty" of the office as those functions or duties that (1) are established by statute and are required to be performed only by the applicable officer; (2) are established by regulation and are required to be performed only by the applicable officer; (3) were established by regulation and were required to be performed only by the applicable officer at any time in the 180 days preceding the vacancy, notwithstanding any regulation issued more recently than 180 days before the vacancy occurred that limits or eliminates any function or duty required to be performed only by the applicable officer. The functions or duties of the office that can be performed only by the head of the executive agency are therefore defined as the non-delegable functions or duties of the officer as they existed at any point during the 180 days prior to the death, resignation, or inability to serve of the last Senate-confirmed person to hold the applicable office, less any such duties subsequently limited by statute, but including duties subsequently limited or repealed by regulation, and including any such duties subsequently imposed by statute or regulation. Since so many executive agency positions filled with the advice and consent of the Senate lack any meaningful statutory duties, and because internal departmental regulations such as those providing duties for specific officers can be changed at will without undergoing the notice and comment process, 5 U.S.C. 553(b)(3)(A), the Committee defined the functions and duties of a particular office to be those that existed at any point in the 180 days prior to the vacancy and those subsequently added, but not subtracted. Otherwise, agencies and departments could avoid the enforcement mechanism of making the office vacant by simply issuing regulations providing that the office has no non-delegable duties. The Committee believes that the duties as established 180 days before the vacancy is the appropriate period for freezing the duties because in many instances, the administration will know of an upcoming vacancy. The bill does not include as duties or functions of the office those duties that are limited or eliminated by statute after the date 180 days preceding the vacancy. When Congress shifts statutory duties from one agency to another, or changes the statutory underpinnings of a regulation affecting the duties of an officer, this bill does not extend the life of those affected regulations. Functions and duties of the office added by statute or regulation on or after 180 days preceding the vacancy are defined as functions and duties of the office, and thus, cannot be performed except by the head of the department or agency if the vacant office provisions apply.

REV_00264257

Subject to section 3347 and a special rule discussed below when the 150th day is one on which the Senate is not in session, if 150 days elapses from a vacancy to which this legislation applies without the President having submitted a nomination for the vacant office to the Senate, the office shall remain vacant until the President submits a nomination to the Senate. After the 151st day until the date the nomination was made, neither the acting officer nor anyone else could fill the vacant office. In addition, except in the case of the head of an executive agency, only the head of that agency himself or herself could perform any function or duty of the office as defined in the legislation. Delegable functions of the office could still be performed by other officers or employees, but the functions and duties to be performed only by the officer whose appointment is by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate could be performed solely by the head of the executive agency. For any such office located within a department, that would mean that only the head of the department could perform those functions. All the normal functions of government thus could still be performed. The legislation only limits the person who may perform them. The goal is not to punish or to obstruct, nor to inconvenience for the purpose of inconveniencing, but, rather, to encourage that a nomination be forwarded to the Senate after more than sufficient time for doing so has elapsed. Any inconvenience to the executive branch can be eliminated instantly by the Presidents unilateral decision to make a nomination, for once such a nomination is made, the acting officer can resume service, including performing the non-delegable duties of the office.

If the head of the agency position is vacant for more than 150 days without a nomination being sent to the Senate, the office is to remain vacant.

If the President does not submit a second nomination to the Senate within 150 days after the rejection, withdrawal, or return of the first nomination, the office will remain vacant, and the non-delegable functions and duties of the office can be performed only by the head of the executive agency as described above. If an office is vacant after 150 days after the rejection, withdrawal, or return of the second nomination, then the office shall remain vacant until a person is appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and only the head of the executive agency may perform any function or duty of such office until the Senate has confirmed a nominee for the office, as described above. This provision tracks other provisions in the bill that allow the acting officer to serve once a first or second nomination is made, even if more than 150 days have elapsed, but do not permit an additional opportunity for the acting officer to serve in the event of exceeding the bills time limits after disposition of the second nomination.

REV_00264258

If the 150th day following the vacancy, following disposition of a first nomination other than by confirmation, or following disposition of a second nomination other than by confirmation falls on a date the Senate is not in session, then the first day the Senate is next in session and receiving nominations shall be deemed to be the last day of such period.

To enforce section 3348s vacant office and performance of duties and functions of the office only by the agency head provisions be enforced, any function or duty of the office taken by a person who fills that vacancy despite the vacant office provision or who, not being the agency head, performs such a function duty without filling the office, shall be of no force or effect. Such actions cannot be made to have force or effect through ratification. For example, the successor in the office by virtue of his appointment by the President by and with the advice and the consent of the Senate may not ratify the actions of a person who filled the office in violation of the legislations provisions or who, not being the agency head, performed nondelegable duties of the office. A lawfully serving acting officer cannot ratify the actions of a temporary officer whose service does not comply with the Vacancies Reform Act. The agency head may not ratify an action that is of no force or effect under this legislation that was performed by another official. Nor under well-established principles of constitutional law may the President ratify actions taken by officials that the law has provided shall be performed solely by lower-level executive branch officials. The Committee expects that litigants with standing to challenge purported agency actions taken in violation of these provisions will raise noncompliance with this legislation in a judicial proceeding challenging the lawfulness of the agency action. It is concerned that the ratification approach taken by the court in Doolinwould render enforcement of the Vacancies Reform Act a nullity in many instances.

Section 3348 does not apply to the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, the General Counsel of the Federal Labor Relations Authority or any inspector general appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Although the Committee believes that it has retained the specific statute that governs vacancies in the office of general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, the Committee desires to make certain that the vacant office provisions do not apply to that position or its equivalent at the Federal Labor Relations Authority. These are two unusual positions that require appointment by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The positions are within multimember commissions but are not members of those commissions. Congress provided for Senate confirmation for these positions because it demands that these officials be independent of the commissioners. Specifically, it wanted to separate the official who would investigate and charge potential violations of the underlying regulatory statute from the officials who would determine whether that statute had actually been violated. If the non-delegable duties of these general counsel were somehow to be performed by the commissioners, that policy would be obliterated. Thus, section 3345 applies to all advice and consent positions, but section 3347 retains the existing statutory procedure for filling a vacancy in the general counsel of the NLRB. Section 3348 states clearly its inapplicability to the general counsel of the NLRB.

Under current law, the general counsel of the FLRA is not covered by the Vacancies Act because of the peculiarity that the position requires the advice and consent of the Senate but is not the head of an agency. Whereas the Justice Department has argued that its non-coverage under the Vacancies Act means that other provisions govern acting appointments for its offices, the Department has concluded that no statute permits an acting general counsel at the FLRA. Accordingly, in recent years, when that position has become vacant, no one has performed its duties until a permanent successor has been confirmed by the Senate. Since one of the duties of that position is to institute proceedings, this has resulted essentially in the cessation of the agencys functions. S. 2176 covers the general counsel of the FLRA under sections 3345 and 3346, permitting an acting officer to serve in case of a vacancy, but excludes the position from the enforcement mechanisms of section 3348 to preserve the independence of the position.

REV_00264259

Similarly, agency inspectors general are to be independent of the agencies to which they are assigned. Inspectors general are to investigate mismanagement in their agency, and often may be critical of the agency head. If an inspector general whose appointment was made by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate were to have his functions performed by the agency head, the agency head might be delighted not to perform them vigilantly. Thus, section 3348 will not apply to this class of inspectors general.

Revised section 3349 of the bill requires the head of each executive agency to submit to the Comptroller General and to each house of Congress notification of vacancies in positions in their agencies requiring Senate confirmation, the name of any person serving in an acting capacity and the date such service began as soon as such service began, the name of any person nominated to the Senate to fill the vacancy as soon as such nomination is submitted, and the date of a rejection, withdrawal, or return of any nomination as soon as such rejection, withdrawal, or return occurs. If the Comptroller General makes a determination that an officer is serving longer than the 150-day period, including the applicable exceptions to such period in the legislation, the Comptroller General is to report such determination to the relevant committees listed in the legislation, the President, and the Office of Personnel Management. This function is informational only and does not provide the Comptroller General with any function properly to be performed only by an executive branch official. The Committee designated the recipients of the report so that appropriate action can be taken by the individuals who are informed of possible violations of the law.

New section 3349a extends the 150-day period in sections 3346 and 3348 for vacancies that exist on or that arise within 60 days after a presidential inaugural transition. In effect, the 150-day period becomes 240 days in this circumstance, running from the later of the date the vacancy arose or the transitional inauguration day. The bill defines a presidential inaugural transition as a date on which any person swears or affirms the oath of office as President, if such person was not the President on the date preceding the date of the swearing or affirming such oath of office. The time limit is extended in this circumstance because a new president will have essentially all positions in the executive branch requiring Senate confirmation to fill when he assumes office and may require additional time to nominate individuals to fill them. By the time the 240 days has run, the President would have confirmed sufficient of his own Senate-confirmed officials to designate as acting officers if he chose to exercise his power under section 3346, and that could continue to serve as the acting officer if a permanent nominee were submitted to the Senate. The provision covers vacancies in positions requiring Senate confirmation that arise in the 60 days following the presidential inauguration transition because each department keeps a Senate-confirmed person into a new administration for a short time in case vacancies in that department are not able to be filled as quickly as anticipated. The filling of those holdover offices should also be subject to the 90-day tolling of the 150-day period.

New section 3349b retains existing statutes that provide, with respect to any independent establishment headed by a single officer, that that officer can serve after the expiration of his term and until a successor is appointed or a specified period of time has elapsed. Whereas section 3347 retains those statutes that provide a means of succession for an acting person to perform the duties of a specified office, section 3349b retains statutes affecting specific independent establishments headed by a single officer that do not provide for an acting officer, but which instead permit the officer to serve until his successor is appointed or for a specified period of time. These statutes govern the Chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts (20 U.S.C. 954(b)(2)), the Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities (20 U.S.C. 956(b)(2)), the Special Counsel of the Office of Special Counsel (5 U.S.C. 1211 (b)), and the Commissioner of the Social Security Administration (42 U.S.C. 901(a)(3)). Independent establishments headed by a single officer previously covered by the Vacancies

REV_00264260

Act continue to be so covered under this legislation.

New section 3349c provides that the Vacancies Reform Act shall not apply to any member appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to a board, commission, or similar entity that is composed of multiple members, and governs an independent establishment or Government corporation. The Committee believes that this has always been the case with the respect to the Vacancies Act and wishes to avoid any confusion that might result from the enactment of a replacement statute on this point. Thus, vacancies in these positions are not covered by this legislation. Section 3349c excludes commissioners of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission from the Vacancies Act as well, since it is an anomaly: the only multi-member independent agency that Congress has not placed in an independent establishment but in a department. Subsection (b) of section 3349c makes technical and confirming changes.

Section 3 of the legislation specifies its effective date. The legislation takes effect on the date of enactment, and shall apply to any office that becomes vacant after the date of enactment of this legislation or that is vacant on that date, although, as to the latter, its provisions shall apply as though such office first became vacant on that date. Thus, the 150-day period for those offices that are vacant on the date the legislation is enacted begins on the date the legislation is enacted, rather than the date the vacancy arose.

VII. Regulatory Impact Statement

Paragraph 11(b)(1) of rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate requires that each report accompanying a bill evaluate "the regulatory impact which would be incurred in carrying out this bill."

The enactment of this legislation will not have significant regulatory impact.

VIII. Cost Estimate of the Legislation U.S. Congress, Congressional Budget Office, Washington, DC, July 1, 1998. Hon. Fred D. Thompson, Chairman, Committee on Governmental Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

Dear Mr. Chairman:The Congressional Budget Office has prepared the enclosed cost estimate for S. 2176, the Federal Vacancies Reform Act of 1998.

If you wish further details on this estimate, we will be pleased to provide them. The CBO staff contact is John R. Righter.

Sincerely, June E. ONeill, Director.

Enclosure.

congressional budget office cost estimate
S. 2176 Federal Vacancies Reform Act of 1998

S. 2176 would amend the Vacancies Act to clarify requirements relating to vacancies in and appointments to executive branch positions, including limitations on the amount of time that unconfirmed appointees can remain in office. It also would require the head of each executive branch agency to submit certain information regarding vacancies and appointments to the General Accounting Office. CBO estimates that enacting S. 2176 would have no significant impact on the federal budget.

Pay-as-you-go considerations: None.

Intergovernmental and private-sector impact: S. 2176 contains no intergovernmental or private-sector mandates as defined in the Unfunded Mandates Reform Act and would have no impact on state, local, or tribal governments.

REV_00264261

Estimate prepared by: John R. Righter.

Estimate approved by: Paul N. Van de Water, Assistant Director for Budget Analysis.

IX. Changes in Existing Law

In compliance with paragraph 12 of rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, changes in existing law made by the bill, as reported are shown as follows (existing law proposed to be omitted is enclosed in black brackets, new matter is printed in italic, existing law with no change proposed is shown in roman):
UNITED STATES CODE TITLE 5, GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION AND EMPLOYEES

TABLE OF CONTENTS
PART III EMPLOYEES
Subpart B Employment and Retention

CHAPTER 33 EXAMINATION, SELECTION, AND PLACEMENT

Subchapter III Details

3341. Details; within Executive or military departments.

(3342. Repealed.

3343. Details; to international organizations.

3344. Details; administrative law judges.

3345. Details; to office of head of Executive agency or military department.

3346. Details; to subordinate offices.

3347. Details; Presidential authority.

3348. Details; limited in time.

3349. Details; to fill vacancies; restrictions.

Subchapter III Details, Vacancies, and Appointments

3341. Details; within Executive or military departments.

(3342. Repealed.)

3343. Details; to international organizations.

3344. Details; administrative law judges.

3345. Acting officer.

3346. Time limitation.

3347. Application.

REV_00264262

The bill applies to all vacancies in Senate-confirmed positions in executive agencies with a few express exceptions. First, those laws that expressly provide that they supersede the Vacancies Act will do so. Second, current laws (there are approximately 41) that provide for the President or the head of an executive department to designate an officer to perform the functions and duties of a specified office in an acting capacity are maintained, as are those statutes that themselves stipulate who shall serve in a specific office in an acting capacity. Statutes that generally permit agency heads to delegate or reassign duties within their agencies are specified not to constitute statutes that provide for the temporary filling of particular offices.

The bills enforcement mechanism is to make an office vacant if, 150 days after the vacancy arises, no presidential nominee has been submitted to the Senate for the office. For offices other than the heads of agencies, the functions and duties specifically to be performed by the vacant officer are to be performed only by the head of the agency. Such duties include duties established by regulation for the officer during any part of the 180 days before the vacancy occurred, notwithstanding subsequent regulations that purported to limit those duties. The sanction can be ended if the President submits a nominee after the 150-day period, whereupon the acting officer can resume service. Actions taken in violation of the vacant officer provisions are of no effect and are not permitted to be ratified by anyone else. The shifting of duties to the agency head does not apply to vacancies in the positions of general counsel to the National Labor Relations Board and Federal Labor Relations Authority or to Senate-confirmed inspectors general, given the specific goal Congress established for those positions of independence from the agency heads.

The bill also requires heads of agencies to report to the General Accounting Office on the existence of vacancies, persons serving in an acting capacity, the names of any nominees, and dates of disposition of such nominees. The Comptroller General then reports to the Congress, the President, and the Office of Personnel Management of the existence of any violations of the Vacancies Act.

The 150-day period for submitting nominations is extended for an additional 90 days for vacancies that exist when the President changes or that arise in the 60 days thereafter. And the bill maintains holdover provisions in current law that apply to single-member independent agencies, and exempts members of multi-member independent agencies altogether, as does the present Vacancies Act.

The bill applies to any office that becomes vacant after the date of enactment, as well as to offices that are vacant on the date of enactment, except that the bill shall apply to those offices as though they first became vacant on the date of enactment.

III. Need for Legislation

The need for legislation to govern the performance of the functions and duties of vacant offices ultimately derives from Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution, which, inter alia, ests the President with the authority to appoint all officers of the United States, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate, but that Congress, by law, may vest the appointment of inferior officers in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments. Congress has passed legislation since the Washington Administration to provide for temporary officials to perform the functions and duties of vacant positions requiring the advice and consent of the Senate. Over the years, the time of temporary service has been lengthened, but Congress has always placed time limits on such acting officials.

In recent decades, the Department of Justice has argued that its advise and consent positions are not covered by the Vacancies Act. It construes its enabling legislation, and now the enabling legislation of other departments, as exempting its compliance with the 3348. Vacant office.

REV_00264245

3349. Reporting of vacancies.

3349a. Presidential inaugural transitions.

3349b. Holdover provisions relating to certain independent establishments.

3349c. Exclusion of certain officers.
PART III EMPLOYEES
Subpart B Employment and Retention

CHAPTER 33 EXAMINATION, SELECTION, AND PLACEMENT

Subchapter III Details

Subchapter III Details, Vacancies, and Appointments 3345. Details; to office of head of Executive agency or military department

When the head of an Executive agency (other than the General Accounting Office) or military department dies, resigns, or is sick or absent, his first assistant, unless otherwise directed by the President under section 3347 of this title, shall perform the duties of the office until a successor is appointed or the absence or sickness stops.
3345. Acting officer

(a) If an officer of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) whose appointment to office is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, dies, resigns, or is otherwise unable to perform the functions and duties of the office

(1) the first assistant of such officer shall perform the functions and duties of the office temporarily in an acting capacity, subject to the time limitations of section 3346; or

(2) notwithstanding paragraph (1), the President (and only the President) may direct a person who serves in an office for which appointment is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to perform the functions and duties of the office temporarily in an acting capacity, subject to the time limitations of section 3346.

(b) Notwithstanding section 3346(a)(2), a person may not serve as an acting officer for an office under this section, if

(1) on the date of the death, resignation, or beginning of inability to server of the applicable officer, such person serves in the position of first assistant to such officer;

(2) during the 365-day period preceding such date, such person served in the position of first assistant to such officer for less than 180 days; and

(3) the President submits a nomination of such person to the Senate for appointment to such office.

(c) With respect to the office of the Attorney General of the United States, the provisions of section 508 of title 28 shall be applicable.
3346. Details; to subordinate offices

REV_00264263

When an officer of a bureau of an Executive department or military department, whose appointment is not vested in the head of the department, dies, resigns, or is sick or absent, his first assistant, unless otherwise directed by the President under section 3347 of this title, shall perform the duties of the office until a successor is appointed or the absence or sickness stops.
3346. Time limitation

(a) The person serving as an acting officer as described under section 3345 may serve in the office

(1) for no longer than 150 days beginning on the date the vacancy occurs; or

(2) subject to subsection (b), once a first or second nomination for the office is submitted to the Senate from the date of such nomination, for the period that the nomination is pending in the Senate.

(b)(1) If the first nomination for the office is rejected by the Senate, withdrawn, or returned to the President by the Senate, the person may continue to serve as the acting officer for no more than 150 days after the date of such rejection, withdrawal, or return.

(2) Notwithstanding paragraph (1), if a second nomination for the office (of a different person than first nominated in the case of a rejection or withdrawal) is submitted to the Senate after the rejection, withdrawal, or return of the first nomination, the person serving as the acting officer may continue to serve

(A) until the second nomination is confirmed; or

(B) for no more than 150 days after the second nomination is rejected, withdrawn, or returned.

(c) If a person begins serving as an acting officer during an adjournment of the Congress sine die, the 150-day period under subsection (a) shall begin on the date that the Senate first reconvenes.
3347. Details; Presidential authority

Instead of a detail under section 3345 or 3346 of this title, the President may direct the head of another Executive department or military department or another officer of an Executive department or military department, whose appointment is vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to perform the duties of the office until a successor is appointed or the absence or sickness stops. This section does not apply to a vacancy in the office of Attorney General.
3347. Application.

(a) Sections 3345 and 3346 are applicable to any office of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) for which appointment is required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, unless

(1) another statutory provision expressly provides that the such provision supersedes sections 3345 and 3346;

(2) a statutory provision in effect on the date of enactment of the Federal Vacancies Reform Act of 1998 expressly

(A) authorizes the President, a court, or the head of an Executive department, to designate an officer or employee to perform the functions and duties of a specified office temporarily in

REV_00264264

an acting capacity; or

(B) designates an officer or employee to perform the functions and duties of a specified office temporarily in an acting capacity; or

(3) the President makes an appointment to fill a vacancy in such office during the recess of the Senate pursuant to clause 3 of section 2 of article II of the United States Constitution.

(b) Any statutory provision providing general authority to the head of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) to delegate duties to, or to reassign duties among, officers or employees of such Federal agency, is not a statutory provision to which subsection (a)(2) applies.
3348. Details; limited in time

(a) A vacancy caused by death or resignation may be filled temporarily under section 3345, 3346, or 3347 of this title for not more than 120 days, except that

(1) if a first or second nomination to fill such vacancy has been submitted to the Senate, the position may be filled temporarily under section 3345, 3346, or 3347 of this title

(A) until the Senate confirms the nomination; or

(B) until 120 days after the date on which either the Senate rejects the nomination or the nomination is withdrawn; or

(2) if the vacancy occurs during an adjournment of the Congress sine die, the position may be filled temporarily until 120 days after the Congress next convenes, subject thereafter to the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection.

(b) Any person filling a vacancy temporarily under section 3345, 3346, or 3347 of this title whose nomination to fill such vacancy has been submitted to the Senate may not serve after the end of the 120-day period referred to in paragraph (1)(B) or (2) of subsection (a) of this section, if the nomination of such person is rejected by the Senate or is withdrawn.
3348. Vacant office

(a) In this section

(1) the term "action" includes any agency actions as defined under section 551(13); and

(2) the term "function or duty" means any function or duty of the applicable office that

(A)(i) is established by statute; and

(ii) is required by statute to be performed by the applicable officer (and only that officer); or

(B)(i)(I) is established by regulation; and

(II) is required by such regulation to be performed by the applicable officer (and only that officer); and

(ii) includes a function or duty to which clause (I) (I) and (II) applies, and the applicable regulation is in effect at any time during the 180-day period preceding the date on which the vacancy occurs, notwithstanding any regulation that

(I) is issued on or after the date occurring 180 days before the date on which the vacancy occurs; and

REV_00264265

(II) limits any function or duty required to be performed by the applicable officer (and only that officer).

(b) Subject to section 3347 and subsection (c)

(1) if the President does not submit a first nomination to the Senate to fill a vacant office within 150 days after the date on which a vacancy occurs

(A) the office shall remain vacant until the President submits a first nomination to the Senate; and

(B) in the case of an office other than the office of the head of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office), only the head of such Executive agency may perform any function or duty of such office, until a nomination is made in accordance with subparagraph (A);

(2) if the President does not submit a second nomination to the Senate within 150 days after the date of the rejection, withdrawal, or return of the first nomination

(A) the office shall remain vacant until the President submits a second nomination to the Senate; and

(B) in the case of any office other than the office of the head of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office), only the head of such Executive agency may perform any function or duty of such officer, until a nomination is made in accordance with subparagraph (A); and

(3) if an office is vacant after 150 days after the rejection, withdrawal, or return of the second nomination

(A) the office shall remain vacant until a person is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and

(B) in the case of an office other than the office of the head of an Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office), only the head of such Executive agency may perform any function or duty of such office, until an appointment is made in accordance with subparagraph (A).

(c) If the last day of any 150-day period under subsection (b) is a day on which the Senate is not in session, the first day the Senate is next in session and receiving nominations shall be deemed to be the last day of such period.

(d)(1) Except as provided under paragraphs (1)(B), (2)(B), and (3)(B) of subsection (b), an action shall have no force or effect if such action

(A)(i) is taken by any person who fills a vacancy in violation of subsection (b); and

(ii) is the performance of a function or duty of such vacant office; or

(B)(i) is taken by a person who is not filling a vacant office; and

(ii) is the performance of a function or duty of such vacant office.

(2) An action that has no force or effect under paragraph (1) may not be ratified.

REV_00264266

(e) this section shall not apply to

(1) the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board;

(2) the General Counsel of the Federal Labor Relations Authority; or

(3) any Inspector General appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. 3349. Details; to fill vacancies; restrictions

A temporary appointment, designation, or assignment of one officer to perform the duties of another under section 3345 or 3346 of this title may not be made otherwise than as provided by those sections, except to fill a vacancy occurring during a recess of the Senate.
3349. Reporting of vacancies

(a) The head of each Executive agency (including the Executive Office of the President, and other than the General Accounting Office) shall submit to the Comptroller General of the United States and to each House of Congress

(1) notification of a vacancy and the date such vacancy occurred immediately upon the occurrence of the vacancy;

(2) the name of any person serving in an acting capacity and the date such service began immediately upon the designation;

(3) the name of any person nominated to the Senate to fill the vacancy and the date such nomination is submitted immediately upon the submission of the nomination; and

(4) the date of a rejection, withdrawal, or return of any nomination immediately upon such rejection, withdrawal, or return.

(b) If the Comptroller General of the United States makes a determination that an officer is serving longer than the 150-day period including the applicable exceptions to such period under section 3346, the Comptroller General shall report such determination to

(1) the Committee on Governmental Affairs of the Senate;

(2) the Committee on Government Reform and Oversight of the House of Representatives;

(3) the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives;

(4) the appropriate committees of jurisdiction of the Senate and House of Representatives;

(5) the President; and

(6) the Office of Personnel Management.
3349a. Presidential inaugural transitions

(a) In this section, the term "transitional inauguration day" means the date on which any person swears or affirms the oath of office as President, if such person is not the President on the date preceding the date of swearing or affirming such oath of office.

(b) With respect to any vacancy that exists during the 60-day period beginning on a transitional inauguration day, the 150-day period under section 3346 or 3348 shall be deemed to begin on the later of the date occurring

(1) 90 days after such transitional inauguration day; or

REV_00264267

(2) 90 days after the date on which the vacancy occurs.
3349b. Holdover provisions relating to certain independent establishments

With respect to any independent establishment for which a single officer is the head of the establishment, sections 3345 through 3349a shall not be construed to affect any statute that authorizes a person to continue to serve in any office

(1) after the expiration of the term for which such person is appointed; and

(2) until a successor is appointed or a specified period of time has expired.
3349c. Exclusion of certain officers

Sections 3345 through 3349b shall not apply to

(1) any member who is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to any board, commission, or similar entity that

(A) is composed of multiple members; and

(B) governs an independent establishment or Government corporation; or

(2) any commissioner of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

ADDITIONAL VIEWS

The Committee on Governmental Affairs has a long list of legislative accomplishments that have enhanced the efficiency and effectiveness of the Federal government. These milestones were achieved with bipartisan support in both Democratic and Republican controlled Administrations and Congresses. The Vacancies Act should be no exception. As the Majoritys Report well explains, the Vacancies Act is in need of reform. For too long, the Executive Branchs interpretation and implementation of that law have stripped it of its original intent and, on occasion, effectively deprived the Senate of its constitutional right to partake in the appointment of a number of Federal officers. Nevertheless, although we share the Majoritys desire to amend the Vacancies Act and agree with many, if not most, of the policy choices contained in S. 2176 we write separately to emphasize a number of concerns we have about the current draft of the bill. Although these concerns were not sufficient to prevent us from voting to report the bill out of Committee, they are nonetheless serious and, we believe, need to be addressed before the bill is ready for final action on the Senate floor.

Some of our reservations about the bill are largely technical, reflecting our concern that the bill, in fact, could be misinterpreted and fail to do what the Committee intends it to do. Others are more substantive in nature and rest on our fear that the Committees understandable desire to protect the Senates constitutional prerogatives may have led it to create a situation that could prevent the Executive Branch from efficiently and effectively fulfilling its constitutional duties to execute the Congress laws. We discuss these concerns in detail below. We remain hopeful that, in the bipartisan spirit in which this legislation has thus far progressed, we can work out all of them before moving this bill further in the legislative process.

We are pleased that the Majority included us in the discussions leading up to the introduction and markup of S. 2176, and we believe that, due to those discussions, agreement was reached in four significant areas: (1) the time period of 150 days for service by an acting official absent a nomination, (2) the need for a "cure" in the case of a nomination made subsequent to the expiration of such period to allow an acting official to resume the functions and duties of the vacant office, (3) the exclusivity of the Act except in cases in which Congress makes clear it is specifying an alternative or supplemental means for filling vacancies, and (4) the necessity of an enforcement mechanism to encourage nominations to be made in a timely manner.

REV_00264268

While these four areas are addressed in the bill, we remain concerned that 3348, the enforcement mechanism, as drafted, may not operate to achieve our goals. We must be sure that the operation of this provision does not cause an unintended shutdown of the Federal agency within which the vacancy exists due to administrative paralysis and that the provision is drafted clearly so that its scope, mainly the extent of government functions and duties it would affect, is well understood. We must be clear that the non-delegable duties we intend to have performed only by the agency head in the event of a vacancy beyond the 150 days without a nomination are only those expressly vested by law or regulation exclusively in the vacant position. In this regard, we acknowledge and appreciate the Majoritys statement that "all the normal functions of government thus could still be performed." For example, where a statute or regulation specifies that an Assistant Secretary for Policy Development is responsible for overseeing policy development, the development of policy would continue, but if a non-delegable approval is necessary to implement the policy, that approval must be performed by the agency head during a vacancy.

One other concept in 3348 bears emphasis. The non-delegable duties of an agency head are not addressed in this legislation because the Committee expects that there will never be a case where a nomination for these positions is not timely submitted.

We would like to see serious consideration given to who, other than the first assistant or another Presidentially-appointed, Senate confirmed official designated by the President, as a qualifying acting official. We recognize the policy of maintaining the continuity and regularity of the vacated office by allowing a first assistant to automatically succeed to the position and the policy of allowing any individual nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate to fill any "advice and consent" position. However, we believe that more flexibility is advisable and that our ultimate goal should be to ensure that the most qualified individual available fills the position. One possible alternative would be to allow a third category of individuals to temporarily fill positions, such as a qualified individuals who have worked within the agency in which the vacancy occurs for a minimum number of days and who are of a minimum grade level.

On related point, we believe the length of service requirement for first assistants who are nominees should be reevaluated. Senator Glenn offered an amendment at the Committees June 17, 1998 markup to shorten the period required for an acting official who was a first assistant to be a nominee. As Senator Glenn noted at markup, this requirement would preclude service by a first assistant who naturally ascends to that position from within the agency, who might be a logical choice to fill the vacancy on a permanent basis. In considering shortening this requirement, we should strive to ensure the smooth flow of government activity, not penalize the individual, the agency or the taxpayers. We reiterate our preference for shortening this requirement.

We would also like to see a "safety valve" provision considered which would extend the 150-day period for a temporary appointment for an additional period of time if the President certifies that it is in the national interest to suspend or lengthen the period. Such "interests" could include reasons relating to national security, public health and safety, or financial stability. We recommend that information be gathered to determine which critical functions affect such interests.

We believe that special consideration should be given to a situation in which a new president is being inaugurated. In such a case, especially when there is a change in the political party of the new president, there is unlikely, in many cases, to be a first assistant who, according to the bills length of service requirement, would be eligible to both serve as the acting official and be the nominee. This limits a new Administration which may want to put its qualified people in acting positions and nominate them as well. The Senate should consider whether it is advisable to prohibit this type of service categorically or whether a more narrow compromise would be possible. In addition, we should ensure that the extended time period for temporary appointments at the beginning of a new Administration 1 accurately reflects the reality of the nomination process when a new President assumes office. We would not want to hamper future Administrations ability to become operational as quickly as possible.

REV_00264269

1The extended time periods provided in 3349b total 240 days as the period for temporary appointments in a new Administration. This time period is applicable to all vacancies that arise from the date of the inauguration of the new President and for the subsequent 60 days.

At markup, the Committee also discussed whether nominations could be sent up during a recess of the Senate. Specifically, we believe it is still unclear whether the bill, as written, would allow the Administration to cure a violation by making a nomination during recesses of the Senate. While it is clear that the Senate regularly authorizes itself to accept Presidential messages during its recesses, and the President is permitted to submit nominations to the Senate at any time, in practice, nominations are not sent up during recesses. We are concerned with assuring the smooth functioning of Government. One of our overriding concerns in reforming the Vacancies Act should be to ensure that we are not overburdening an agency head with the non-delegable responsibilities of other positions where such a situation can be avoided. We urge the Senate to consider remedying this situation by allowing the President to effectively notice the Senate with a letter of intent including the name of a nominee and a statement that he intends to nominate that person when the Senate reconvenes. By allowing such letter, the Senate would allow the President to exercise good faith where he wants to avoid using a recess appointment.

See 139 CR 8 (1993), 141 CR S9 (daily ed. Jan. 4, 1995), 143 CR S8 (daily ed. Jan. 7, 1997).

See Floyd M. Riddick and Alan S. Frumin, Riddicks Senate Procedure, p. 949 (Rev. Ed. 1992).

President Clinton has exercised his Constitutionally mandated recess appointment power 45 times in five years, President Bush made 78 recess appointments in four years and President Reagan made 239 in eight years.

Finally, we would hope that consideration will be given to increasing the one-day requirement of 3348(c). While we are pleased that a recess will toll the temporary appointment period, to guard against an Administrations inadvertently missing the one-day window and certain functions and duties unnecessarily being delegated to the agency head, we recommend adding two days to the requirement that the President submit a nomination the day the Senate reconvenes.

As mentioned above, there are several other issues of concern to us which we believe are of a technical nature. While they are important issues in that their resolution affects the way a new law could be interpreted, because there is agreement between Majority and Minority staffs to aim to address these issues in a Managers Amendment as the bill is considered by the full Senate, such issues will not be enumerated here. It is our hope that all of our concerns will be addressed in future discussions before S. 2176 is presented for debate on the Senate floor.

We cannot leave the topic of the process by which the President nominates federal officials without touching on the process by which the Senate confirms them. It is getting increasingly difficult to attract the best and brightest to government service, and those who serve in Presidentially-appointed, Senate confirmed positions are doing so for an average of less than two and a half years. And because the time period from vacancy through confirmation has become increasingly lengthy, we must go through this arduous process often multiple times within a single Administration. We agree that the Executive Branch too often takes too long to submit nominations to the Senate and that this delay not only intrudes upon the Senates constitutional prerogatives but also impedes the good functioning of government. At the same time, however, we would be truly remiss if we failed to acknowledge that blame in this area does not rest in the Executive Branch alone; the Senate has frequently declined to exercise its advice and consent responsibility in a timely and appropriate manner. Too often, nominations die in Committee, languish on the Executive Calendar, or simply take months or years to move through this Chamber. While the Senate remains free to reject the Presidents nominees when appropriate, it owes it to both the Executive, and more importantly, the American people, to discharge its constitutional duty to offer and not withhold its advice and, where appropriate, timely consent. We hope that in the future the Senate is willing to commit itself to act to reform its confirmation process in the same bi-partisan spirit we expect it to exhibit in enacting this legislation.

REV_00264270

John Glenn.

Carl Levin.

Joe Lieberman.

Max Cleland.

Robert Torricelli.

MINORITY VIEWS

While we associate ourselves with the concerns outlined in the Additional Views of Senator John Glenn, our serious reservations abut the bill prevents us from supporting this legislation in its present form. Revisions to the Vacancies Act must reflect the realities of the nomination and confirmation process as it have evolved over the last several years. Furthermore, it is important to recognize the implication of imposing unrealistic expectations or restrictions on the process which could force the President to expand the use of recess appointment authority.

We recognize the need to safeguard the Senates constitutional prerogative to advise and consent to nominations of executive officers, and do not oppose efforts to clarify and bolster the Vacancies Act as the executive mechanism (with limited and explicit exception) for the President to designate officials to temporarily fill vacancies in positions requiring Senate confirmation. Unfortunately, this bill goes well beyond that justifiable but limited goals.

We are concerned that this bill would impede the functioning of the Executive Branch. Concerns about the inability of Presidents to promptly submit nominees to fill positions requiring Senate confirmation has been a driving force prompting periodic reevaluation of Vacancies Act provisions throughout the last two centuries, including the present instance. Yet merely adding 30 days to the time permitted under current law for positions to be temporarily filled by an acting official is, in our opinion, wholly inadequate and impractical.

While the White House certainly bears some responsibility for the time it takes to select and advance nominees, it is a responsibility that is shared by the Senate. Given that the protracted, arduous, and unduly politicized Senate confirmation process contributes to making it increasingly more difficult to identify, recruit, and screen candidates for Federal appointments, it is imprudent to impose rigid statutory deadlines and to limit the persons eligible to serve temporarily as acting officers in vacant positions. Within substantial changes, we cannot support this bill.

REV_00264271

First, this legislation too narrowly restricts who can function in an "acting" capacity. Section 3345(a)(1) of the bill can be read to provide that, aside from another Senate-confirmed Presidential appointee designated by the President, only the "first assistant" to the particular Senate confirmed officer who dies, resigns or is other unable to perform the functions and duties of the position, can be an acting officer. Early in the Administration of a newly-inaugurated President, virtually the only person who could serve as acting officers would be the first assistants from the prior Administration, since transferring another PAS person would merely create a new vacancy elsewhere. Moreover, the Senate could prolong the tenure of those holdover officers simply by delaying or failing to confirm the Presidents nominee. No President should have to accept such a state of affairs.

Moreover, mandating that only first assistant or Senate-confirmed officials are eligible to serve as acting officers promotes no legitimate public policy. Indeed, this limitation prevents a President from naming an experienced career employee as an acting official, in favor of a person lacking broad experience who was brought into Department by the departing official. Consequently, the bill could preclude the President from naming the most qualified person to serve as an acting officer. In addition, the lack of a first assistant to a particular office that becomes vacant would leave the position vacant until such time as the President designates a previously Senate-confirmed official to temporarily fill that vacancy as an acting official. Given the tight time period of the Act, we fail to see why this provision should be so narrowly drawn. Without any justification based on its institutional interests, the Senate would do a great disservice by adopting such a restrictive measure. Therefore, we endorse Senator Glenns suggestion that serious consideration be given to establishing a third category of individuals eligible to temporarily fill vacant positions.

Second, the unalterable 150 day time limit on service by acting officers is far too rigid. Indeed, it could impair the national interest. Circumstances may arise under which the President is unable to nominate an individual for a particular office within 150 days of a vacancy. Under this bill, the office would have to remain vacant even if that vacancy would undermine national security, impede public health and safety, threaten financial stability, or interfere with law enforcement. We believe there should be a flexible "safety valve" available for exceptional situations, whereby the President could certify to the Senate that a reasonable amount of additional time is needed to designate the appropriate nominee and that it is essential for the acting officer to continue to perform these critical tasks in the interim without interruption.

Third, while it would not affect this President, experience has shown that at the beginning of a new Administration, filling positions in the government requires time far longer than that specified in this bill. At the outset of a new Administration, a President must nominate individuals to at least 320 positions in the 14 executive departments in addition to appointing hundreds of other employees who do not require confirmation. The new President cannot possibly make all required nominations within the 240 days allowed by the bill. In 1993, when the nominations process was, if anything, simpler than it is today, the new Administration was able to forward only 68% of nominations within the first 240 days, leaving 32% of positions unfilled. Unless this time period is changed, the next Administration could effectively be facing departmental shutdowns before the new President can even begin to accomplish what he was elected to do.

Finally, our concern about these time limitations and the constraints on who can be appointed is magnified many times by the enforcement mechanism the bill establishes. It is essentially a sanction of administrative immobilization. Section 3348 of the bill specifies that if the President fails to forward a nomination within the 150-day span following the occurrence of a vacancy or the withdrawal, rejection, or return of a first nomination, the office in question must remain vacant until a nomination is made. No one apart from the Vacancies Act. Specifically, the Department of Justice maintains that where a departments organic act vests the powers and functions of the department in its head and authorizes that officer to delegate such powers and functions to subordinate officials or employees as she sees fit, such authority supersedes the Vacancies Acts restrictions on temporarily filling vacant advice and consent positions, allowing for designation of acting officials for an indefinite period, even without submitting a nomination to the Senate to fill the position on a permanent basis. This interpretation of the law is wholly lacking in logic, history, or language, as evidenced by repeated opinions of the Comptroller General. Opinion B-150136, Feb. 19, 1976; 65 Op. Comp. Gen. 626, 631-33 (1986); Opinion B-220522.2, Oct. 17, 1986. By May, 1997, seven statutory offices in the Justice Department requiring presidential nomination and Senate confirmation were vacant. One vacancy had existed for twenty-one months, three were vacant for more than 120 days, and three positions were unfilled for less than 120 days. In at least four instances, positions were filled by an order of the Attorney General designating a person to act in the vacant position. For example, the Solicitor Generals position was occupied by an acting officer for more than one year without a nomination ever being submitted to the Senate.

REV_00264272

Despite attempts to do so through 1988 amendments to the Vacancies Act, described below, Congress was not successful in gaining the Justice Departments agreement that its advice and consent positions are subject to the Vacancies Act. Given the growing number of federal departments and agencies that now claim exemption from the Vacancies Act, Congress must explicitly reject the position that general organic statutes for various agencies and departments, such as 28 U.S.C. 509 and 510, trump the specific provisions of the Vacancies Act. Otherwise, the Vacancies Act will be of no practical effect, thwarting the constitutional mandate that persons serving in advice and consent positions do so through the Senates approval of such service.

the 1988 amendments

The Justice Departments aggressive claims of exemption from the Vacancies Act led Congress in 1988 to make the first significant changes in the Vacancies Act since 1868. The 1988 amendments changed the laws coverage to apply to all executive departments and agencies, overruling a 1973 court decision that had limited the applicability of the Act to executive and military departments. The length of time that an acting official was permitted to serve was extended to 120 days, rather than the previous 30, and the acting officer could serve more than 120 days if the President submitted a nominee. An additional 120 days of acting service was provided if the Senate rejected the nomination or if it was withdrawn. Through this mechanism, Congress created an incentive for the President to submit nominations in a timely manner, and allowed temporary officials to serve until the Senate completed its advice and consent function. This Committees report accompanying the Senate bill stated, "The Committee also believes that the present language, however old, makes clear that the Vacancies Act is the exclusive authority for the temporary appointment, designation, or assignment of one officer to perform the duties of another whose appointment requires Senate confirmation. The exclusive authority of the Vacancies Act would only be overcome by specific statutory language providing some other means for filling vacancies." S. Rep. No. 100--317, 100th Cong., 2d Sess. 14 (1988). In 1989, the Justice Departments Office of Legal Counsel recognized the Senates view, but continued to interpret the Vacancies Act as not precluding the Attorney Generals authority to appoint temporary officials under the Departments organic statute, characterizing the Senate report as an improper and ineffective effort to "alter the proper construction of a statute through subsequent legislative history." 13 O.L.C. 173, 175 (1989). If the Vacancies Act is to function as it is designed to uphold the Senates prerogative to advise and consent to nominations through placing a limit on presidential power to appoint temporary officials the Justice Departments interpretation of the existing statute must be ended. Legislation is needed to ensure this result, a primary reason for the Committees reporting of S. 2176.

REV_00264246

head of the agency can perform the functions and duties of the office. It is imperative that the bill unequivocally ensure that the affected functions and duties of the office are only those that are expressly deemed nondelegable by statute or regulation. Absent that clarity, whole components of federal agencies would have to stop their work. The potential bottleneck created by this provision would prevent the Executive Branch from doing its job. The Senate has tried before to enforce its policy preferences by shutting down the federal government. It was a bad idea then, and its still is now.

As we noted, the Senate bears partial responsibility for the time it takes to nominate officials from Senate confirmed positions. To further amplify, this Congress has subjected the Administrations nominees to unprecedented scrutiny, using almost any prior alleged indiscretion no matter how trivial by a nominee as an excuse to delay or prevent a vote. Senators have also interjected themselves into the Presidents nominations process to an unparalleled degree. As a result, that process the selection, recruitment, and vetting of candidates takes longer than ever before. While the Administration may well bear some responsibility for the slow pace of nominations, we find it troublesome that the Senate would so severely restrict the ability to fill vacant positions temporarily and to conduct the peoples business while at the same time impeding the nominations process and confirming nominees at a snails pace.

This President has made every effort to accommodate Senators views about particular positions and nominees. Moreover, this President has used his power to make recess appointments far less than his predecessors. President Reagan made 239 recess appointments in eight years; President Bush made 78 recess appointments in four years. President Clinton has made only 45 recess appointments in his first five years in office. If this bill passes, we anticipate that the President will have no alternative but to make more recess appointments. That will hardly vindicate the Senates advise and consent function.

We are anxious to craft a bill that fully protects the Senates advise and consent function, while affording the Executive Branch the flexibility it needs to faithfully discharge the laws. In its current form, this bill does not do that. Without changes to address the problems identified above, we cannot support it.

Richard Durbin.

Daniel K. Akaka.

SUBJECT: LEGISLATION (90%); RESIGNATIONS (78%);

LOAD-DATE: September 04, 1998

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Legislative Histories & Materials : Committee Reports
Terms: "vacancies act" and date aft 1997 (Edit Search)
Focus: "attorney general"
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, January 12, 2001 - 7:05 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

The Constitutional Need for Legislation

The selection of officers is not a presidential power. The President may choose whom he wishes to nominate, but the Senate has the power to advise and consent before those nominees may assume office. The Appointments Clause "is more than a matter of tiquette or protocol; it is among the significant structural safeguards of the constitutional scheme." Edmond . United States,117 S. Ct. 1573, 1579 (1997). The Appointments Clause was adopted against a historical background: "The anipulation of official appointments had long been one of the American revolutionary generations greatest grievances against executive power because he power of appointment to offices " was deemed "the most insidious and powerful weapon of eighteenth century despotism." Freytagv. Commissioner of Internal Revenue,501 U.S. 868, 883 (1991) (citations omitted).

Nonetheless, vacancies occur in such positions, and since the President lacks any inherent appointment authority for government officers, legislation authorizing some non-Senate confirmed persons to perform the functions and duties of vacant offices is necessary if the governments operations are to be performed. The presidents duty is to submit nominees for offices to the Senate, not to fill those offices himself. The Presidents power to take care that the laws shall be enforced is a duty, and not a source of power, since the President takes care that the laws be executed, and has no right to enforce the laws himself where Congress vests such responsibility in an inferior officer. See, e.g., Kendall ex rel. Stokes . United States,12 Pet. (37 U.S.) 522, 612-613 (1838); Georgev. shimaru,849 F. Supp. 68 (D.D.C. 1994). In the absence of affirmative statutory authority to fill a vacancy, the office must remain vacant. The Vacancies Act limits presidential authority to make acting appointments, while preserving the Senates power to advise and consent. Therefore, its scope must be government-wide unless Congress chooses clearly and specifically to exempt specifically identified officers from its reach when countervailing considerations apply.

Because the Justice Department maintains that it is exempt for the Vacancies Act, it has permitted positions to be held by acting officers for years without the submission to the Senate of a nominee. Its contentions are broadly applicable to virtually all other departments given the broad language of vesting and delegation contained in those departments organic statutes. By early in 1998, 64 of 320 advise and consent positions in the executive branch were held by acting officials, 43 of whom had served more than 120 days without a nominee. Acting officials served in each of the 14 Cabinet departments. If the Constitutions separation of powers is to be maintained, and officers of the government subjected to the scrutiny of the Senate for the benefit of the liberty of the people, legislation to address the deficiencies in the operation of the current Vacancies Act is necessary. The 1988 legislation unfortunately has not succeeded in encouraging presidents to submit nominees in a timely fashion, and it has not resulted in the Justice Departments agreement that is covered by the Act. Indeed, given the number of acting officials and the growing number of departments that claim not to be covered by the Vacancies Act, the Senates confirmation power is being undermined as never before.

The "Doolin" Decision

Most recently, the need for new legislation was underscored by the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in Doolin Security Savings Bank, F.S.B. . Office of Thrift Supervision,139 F.3d 203 (D.C. Cir. 1998). In that case, the validity of an Office of Thrift Supervision administrative enforcement action was challenged by a bank subject to the order on the ground that the absence of a lawfully appointed director of the agency rendered the enforcement action void. The Senate-confirmed director of OTS resigned in December, 1992, and purported to delegate all his authority to OTSs Deputy Director for Washington Operations. That individual, who was neither the first assistant nor a Senate-confirmed individual, served as the acting director until October, 1996. Two days later, the President invoked the Vacancies Act to designate a Senate-confirmed official from the Department of Housing and Urban Development to serve as acting director. Within 120 days of the second acting directors appointment, the President submitted a permanent nominee to the Senate. The new acting director issued the final order against the bank in March, 1997.

REV_00264247

The bank maintained that the 120-day limitation on acting service contained in the Vacancies Act lapsed long before the second acting director was ever named. The court agreed that the Vacancies Act may be used only when there is a vacancy caused by the departure of an officer appointed in compliance with Article II, and that the departure of an appointed acting official does not trigger the Vacancies Act. The court found that merely because a person temporarily performs the functions of an office does not make that individual an "officer" for purposes of the Vacancies Act. "Otherwise, 3348s time limitation could be easily avoided by a series of temporary resignations, with each resignation triggering a new 120-day period." 139 F.3d at 208. Thus, the departure of the Senate-confirmed Director triggered the presidents authority under 3347 to designate an acting official, not the departure of the acting official. The Committee accepts this reaffirmation of the longstanding operation of the Vacancies Act.

Notwithstanding its recognition that the Presidents designation of the second acting official took place approximately four years after the vacancy in the position arose, however, the court upheld the second acting directors 1997 final order. The court agreed with the Justice Department that the 120-day time limit contained in 3348 does not begin to run until someone actually takes office pursuant to the Vacancies Act, either by detail or by presidential directive. Under that interpretation of the statute, the second acting director served lawfully at the time the order was issued against the bank. The court rejected the banks position that the 120-day period begins immediately upon the death or resignation of a constitutionally appointed officer.

According to the court, "Nothing in the Act expressly deals with the amount of time that may transpire before the President exercises his 3347 authority to designate a temporary replacement." 139 F.3d at 209. In its view, the Vacancies Act governs how long a position may be temporarily filled, but does not specify when the President must undertake the filling of the position. "The time limit is placed not on Presidential action, but on the tenure of the Presidents designee." Id The 120-day period will commence with the vacancy when the first assistant assumes the office or the President under 3347 immediately designates an acting official. But if there is no first assistant and the President does not immediately act, the vacancy has not been "filled" and the 120-day period does not run. Id.

The Committee believes that this portion of the courts opinion necessitates legislative action. Whether or not the court properly interpreted the existing law, the Committee believes that the 120-day time limit must run from the date of the vacancy caused by the death or resignation of the Senate-confirmed official, and not from the date that the President designates an acting official. A limit must be placed on the Presidents time to act to fill a position. If the purpose of the Vacancies Act is to limit the Presidents power to designate temporary officers, a position requiring Senate confirmation may not be held by a temporary appointment for as long as the President unilaterally decides. Such a scheme obliterates the constitutional requirement that the officer serve only after the Senate confirms the nominee. If there is no first assistant, the President must designate another Senate-confirmed official. By contrast, the Doolin ourt would allow the President to accept a resignation on the second day of his term, allow an acting person to assume the functions and duties of the office (in this case, an acting officer not appointed by the President), and then, so long as there is no first assistant, by unilaterally not invoking the Vacancies Act, allow that position to be filled by an "acting" official who has never received Senate confirmation for so long as the president holds office. The Committee finds this state of affairs to be unacceptable and constitutionally suspect. Nor does it believe that the vacancy has not been "filled" when an acting person has been performing the functions and duties of the office for four years.

REV_00264248

Notwithstanding the 1988 Vacancies Act amendments that provide for a tolling of the 120-day period when the President submits a nomination to the Senate to fill the vacant position, the court stated, "The Vacancies Act was never meant to give the President an "incentive" to fill vacant positions with appointees confirmed by the Senate. The function of the Act is to allow some breathing room in the constitutional system for appointing officers to vacant positions, to validate the actions of those temporarily occupying the positions." Id.at 211. The Committee believes that the reason why in 1988, for the first time, the period of acting service was extended beyond 120 days if the President submitted a nominee is that, in light of the frequent noncompliance with the Vacancies Act by presidents who allowed acting officials to serve more than 120 days, Congress wanted to encourage the President to submit a nominee within the Vacancies Act period. If an acting person served beyond 120 days, the Senate at that point would bear the responsibility for the fact that a Senate-confirmed person for that office was not in place.

The court recognized that under its interpretation of the statute, if no one is detailed or directed to fill the position, or the 120 days expires without a nomination, the position will be vacant or occupied by someone not constitutionally entitled to perform the duties of the office. But in its view, that situation will create an incentive for the President to submit a nomination, for fear that the actions of part of his administration will be declared void. The Committee believes that this part of the courts opinion also shows the need for Congressional corrective action. Under the Justice Departments interpretation of the many vesting and delegation provisions in the organic statutes of various departments, few positions would remain vacant. This fact, combined with the lack of an effective enforcement process, would give the President no reason to comply with the Vacancies Act. The court seems not to understand the fundamental purpose of the Vacancies Act, which is not to ensure the legality of the actions of acting officials, but rather to limit the power of the President to name acting officials, as well as the length of service of those officials.

If the Constitution or Congress requires that an office be held only by a person appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, then unless legislation provides to the contrary, only a person the President has nominated for that position and who has received Senate confirmation may fill the position. The President has the duty to take care that the law be faithfully executed, and that duty includes adherence to Article II. He does not have the power to execute the law himself when Congress has given statutory duties to lower-level officials in the executive branch. Nor can he name temporary officers of his unfettered choice. That is why the Vacancies Act or other statutes providing for the temporary filling of a specific position are the exclusive authority setting forth the procedures by which acting officials can serve, with the exception only of the Presidents power to make appointments during the recess of the Senate. The courts opinion overlooks this central concept. The Vacancies Act does recognize that when vacancies arise in those positions, it may be necessary, due to time constraints on the nomination and confirmation processes, for someone who has not received Senate confirmation for that particular post to serve temporarily to keep the government functioning. But the Vacancies Act requires that those acting officers be either (1) first assistants or (2) persons who have already received Senate confirmation for some other post and are selected by the President to be the acting officer.

The court did not reach the question whether the OTS Directors designation of the first acting director satisfied the Vacancies Act. For the court, any error was harmless in light of the legality of the second acting directors appointment under the Vacancies Act, and the ratification by the second acting officer of any actions taken by the first acting director. The Committee also finds that this portion of the courts position demands legislative response. First, it is constitutionally unacceptable for any acting official to serve for four years, especially an officer "appointed" not by the President, nor by a department head, but a mere agency head. The Appointments Clause limits appointing powers to hold individuals accountable for their selections. Second, if any subsequent acting official or anyone else can ratify the actions of a person who served beyond the length of time provided by the Vacancies Act, then no consequence will derive from an illegal acting designation. This result also undermines the constitutional requirement of advice and consent.

REV_00264249

In short, in light of various administrations noncompliance with the Vacancies Act and a recent court decision undermining its operation, it is imperative that Congress enact legislation to restore constitutionally mandated procedures that must be satisfied before acting officials may serve in positions that require Senate confirmation. The issue is not simply the prerogative of the Senate. Like other structural constitutional provisions, the Appointments Clause was designed to protect the liberty of the people. Although the President has the sole power to nominate, as a single officer may feel a greater sense of duty in selecting an individual for consideration to a particular post, the "the necessity of (the Senates) concurrence would have a powerful, though in general a silent operation. It would be an excellent check upon a spirit of favoritism in the President, and would tend greatly to preventing the appointment of unfit characters from State prejudice, from family connection, from personal attachment, or from a view to popularity. And, in addition to this, it would be an efficacious source of stability in the administration." Federalist LXXVI (Hamilton). Legislation is needed to restore these goals of the Founders.

IV. Legislative History of S.2176

The Federal Vacancies Reform Act of 1998 was introduced as S. 2176 in the Senate on June 16, 1998 by Senators Fred Thompson, Robert C. Byrd, Strom Thurmond, Trent Lott, and William Roth. Introduction of S. 2176 followed the March 16, 1998 introductions of S. 1761, the Federal Vacancies Compliance Act, by Senator Byrd and S. 1764, the Vacancies Clarification Act, by Senators Thurmond and Lott. The latter two bills sought to enforce the Vacancies Act through withholding the pay of any acting officer who exceeded the time period provided by the Vacancies Act, and S. 1764 specifically provided that the time period for acting service ran from the date of the vacancy. In addition, both bills made the Vacancies Act supersede other laws governing the temporary service of non-confirmed officials, ending the argument that statutes vesting in department heads the general authority to delegate powers to other officials provided an alternative method of empowering acting officials apart from the Vacancies Act. Both bills also created a reporting mechanism to the President, the General Accounting Office, and the Congress on the length of time that each acting official had served.

A hearing was held at the Governmental Affairs Committee on oversight of compliance with the Vacancies Act on March 18, 1998. Senator Thompson chaired the hearing, which addressed the general issues of noncompliance with the law, as well as the legislative proposals that had by then been introduced. The following witnesses provided testimony: Senator Robert C. Byrd, State of West Virginia; Joseph N. Onek, Principal Deputy Associate Attorney General, Department of Justice, accompanied by Daniel Koffsky, Special Counsel, Office of Legal Counsel, Department of Justice; Joan M. Hollenback, Associate General Counsel, General Accounting Office; Senator Strom Thurmond, State of South Carolina; Michael J. Gerhardt, Professor of Law, Case Western Reserve University; Morton Rosenberg, Specialist in American Public Law, Congressional Research Service; and Paul C. Light, Director, Public Policy Program, The Pew Charitable Trusts.

All of the witnesses but Messrs. Onek and Koffsky supported legislation that would overturn the Justice Departments arguments of exemption from the Vacancies Act and that would create an enforcement mechanism. Senator Byrd also pointed out the Senates responsibility to demand strict compliance with the Vacancies Act from the Administration. He expressed his hope that the Senate would make the Vacancies Act "so tight, so air-tight, that no department can find a crack or crevice anywhere through which to creep." He expressed his view that the Committee could draft legislation to address the problem other than S. 1761. Ms. Hollenbeck provided reasons why the Justice Departments interpretation of the Vacancies Act is contrary to the language and legislative history of both the Vacancies Act and the Justice Departments organic statute, and pointed out that Congress passage of statutes governing temporary officers in particular governmental positions shows that Congress knew how to create specific exceptions to the application of the Vacancies Act. She offered GAOs recommendation that legislation be passed to explicitly provide that the Vacancies Act can be superseded only by a statute providing an alternative means for filling a particular vacancy. GAO also recommended reporting provisions and the withholding of pay of acting officials who served in violation of the Vacancies Act. Mr. Koffsky noted that there are no statutory duties that are to be performed by assistant attorneys general.

REV_00264250

Senator Thurmond testified to the need to rewrite, not simply amend, the Vacancies Act. He demonstrated that the 1988 amendments had not solved the problem of excessive service by acting officials. He also stressed the need to prevent the Justice Department from arguing that it is exempt from the Vacancies Act, which he would accomplish by requiring statutes exempting particular positions from the Vacancies Act to specifically cite the Vacancies Act. Prof. Gerhardt testified to the need to change some of the terms of art used in the Vacancies Act, and suggested lengthening the 120-day time period. Mr. Rosenberg testified to the errors in the Justice Departments exemption argument in light of the language of the Vacancies Act, the Departments organic statute, and its legislative history. He also spoke of the problem of transferring assistant secretaries from one position to another without their undergoing Senate reconfirmation. He recommended adding an enforcement mechanism to freeze the duties of the office as they existed on the date of the vacancy after the 120-day period has expired. Mr. Light testified that one of the problems with noncompliance with the Vacancies Act is the unnecessary proliferation of political appointees in the government at a time when total federal employment was declining.

Following the hearing, Senator Thompson considered whether to introduce his own legislative proposal. After careful consideration, he determined to address only the Vacancies Act issues involved in the Senates advise and consent powers. The Committee believes that authorizing committees may wish to consider whether statutory duties should be given to assistant secretaries and assistant attorneys general in those departments in which the only current statutory duty of such officials is to assist the secretary or the attorney general. Staff from both parties tried to resolve as many issues as possible. Staff also attempted to respond to the suggestions of the Justice Department and the White House. S. 2176 reflects these discussions. The Committee was told informally that the Justice Department recognizes that the legislation offered effectively prevents it from arguing that departments with vesting and delegation statutes are exempt from the Vacancies Act.

V. Committee Action

On June 17, 1998, the Committee held a business meeting at which S. 2176, the Federal Vacancies Reform Act of 1998, was considered. Senator Lieberman offered an amendment to retain existing statutes that by their own terms provide a process for the filling of specific advice and consent positions, as well as the statues referenced in S. 2176 as introduced, which preserved existing statutes that allow the heads of departments to designate an acting official. That amendment was agreed to by voice vote.

Senator Glenn offered two amendments. The first amendment would have reduced the length of time that a first assistant need serve to be both the acting officer and eligible to be nominated permanently to the position from 180 of the 365 days preceding the vacancy to 30 days prior to the vacancy. The amendment failed on a roll call vote of 6 Yeas (Glenn, Levin, Lieberman, Akaka by proxy, Durbin, and Cleland) and 8 Nays (Roth by proxy, Stevens, Collins, Brownback by proxy, Domenici, Cochran, Nickles by proxy, and Thompson).

Senator Glenns second amendment would permit the acting officer to serve even after the 150-day period following the rejection, withdrawal, or return of the first nomination, once a second nomination was made. The amendment was agreed to by voice vote.

REV_00264251

Senator Levin offered an amendment to begin the time limit on the service of acting officers in vacant positions arising on or in the 60 days after a transitional inauguration day 120 days after the transitional inauguration or the arising of the vacancy, whichever is later. After Senator Levin agreed to shorten the additional period to 90 days, the amendment was agreed to by voice vote.

With no other amendments being offered, Chairman Thompson moved adoption of S. 2176 as amended. The bill was ordered favorably reported by a vote of 9 Yeas (Stevens, Collins, Domenici, Cochran, Glenn, Levin, Lieberman, Cleland, Thompson) and 1 Nay (Durbin). Senators Roth, Brownback, and Nickles voted Aye by proxy.

VI. Section-by-Section Analysis

Section 1 states the short title of the legislation the "Federal Vacancies Reform Act of 1998."

Section 2 strikes sections 3345 through 3349 of Title 5 and replaces the existing law with a reformed version of the Vacancies Act. The Committee believes that amending existing legislation, given the ineffectiveness of the 1988 amendments, may again fail to ensure the exclusivity of the applicability of the Vacancies Act. To ensure an effective enforcement mechanism and to overturn the recent decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in Doolin Security Savings Bank . Office of Thrift Supervision, 39 F.3d 203 (D.C. Cir. 1998), the Committee believes that replacement of the existing Vacancies Act is necessary.

Under current law, section 3345 covers heads of executive agencies, and section 3346 affects "an officer of a bureau of an Executive department or military department, whose appointment is not vested in the head of the department * * *" Section 2 creates a new section 3345, applicable to all officers of executive agencies whose appointment to office is required to be made by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. References to the term of art "bureau" have been eliminated. The purpose of this change is to clearly make the Vacancies Act applicable to all officers of executive agencies whose appointments require Senate confirmation. The Vacancies Act would now apply to such officers in all departments, regardless of the department or agencys organic statute.

"Executive agency" is defined at 5 U.S.C. 105. Because the Department of Defense is a department within the meaning of 5 U.S.C. 101, the military departments, which are located in the Department of Defense, are also covered by this Act, notwithstanding the omission of the term "military department" from current sections 3345 and 3346.

The section applies when an officer in an executive agency whose appointment is made by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate dies, resigns, or is otherwise unable to perform the functions and duties of the office. The law applies when any of those factual situations arises, regardless of how the situation is characterized. For instance, the Vacancies Act would apply in situations such as Doolin, hen the first acting director of the Office of Thrift Supervision was purportedly designated by virtue of the departing confirmed directors invocation of a statute providing for his duties to be temporarily delegated in the directors "absence." Under this legislation, when an acting officer is to be designated, as opposed to automatically gaining acting status as a first assistant, only the President may designate an acting officer in a position that requires Senate confirmation.

When a vacancy arises, the bill provides an exclusive set of procedures that may be followed. If the vacant officer has a first assistant, the first assistant performs the functions and duties of the office temporarily in an acting capacity, subject to the time limitations of section 3346. The Committee does not establish a definition of "first assistant." That term has a long

REV_00264252

THE INAPPLICABILITY OF FEDERAL VACANCIES REFORM ACT'S REPORTING OBLIGATIONS FOR PAS OFFICERS SERVING UNDER STATUTORY HOLDOVER PROVISIONS

There is no "vacancy" within the meaning of the Federal Vacancies Reform Act of 1998 when a presidentially appointed, Senate-confirmed officer continues to hold a position under a statutory holdover provision and therefore the holdover service is not reportable under the Act.

July 30, 1999

MEMORANDUM FOR THE GENERAL COUNSEL
OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET

We recently received two inquires that raised the question whether service of a presidentially appointed, Senate-confirmed ("PAS") officer under a statutory holdover provision is reportable as a vacancy under the Federal Vacancies Reform Act of 1998 ("Vacancies Reform Act" or "Act"). As discussed below, we have concluded that holdover service is not a vacancy for purposes of the Act and therefore is not reportable. We wanted to inform you of our conclusion to facilitate a uniform approach among the Executive agencies on the reporting of this information. Because the Act is somewhat confusing on the point, however, we also would strongly urge (and Mark Childress of the White House Counsel's Office concurs) that you notify the General Accounting Office that the Administration is not reporting holdover positions as vacancies.

Statutory holdover provisions provide for an officer appointed for a term of years to continue to serve in the office at the expiration of the term for which he or she was appointed. In some cases that period is open-ended - statutorily defined as continuing until a successor is appointed. In other cases, the period continues until either a successor is appointed or a specific period of time has expired. In either case, the PAS officer's term in the office continues until the expiration of the statutorily defined holdover period.

As a matter of constitutional law, the executive branch consistently has taken the position that there is a vacancy for purposes of the Recess Appointments Clause when an appointment for a term of years expires and the officer continues serving under a holdover provision.[1] There is, however, no necessary correspondence between the meaning of a "vacancy" for purposes of the Recess Appointments Clause and the meaning of a "vacancy" as used in a statute, such as the Vacancies Reform Act.

Under the Vacancies Reform Act, a "vacancy" occurs when a PAS officer "dies, resigns, or is otherwise unable to perform the functions and duties of the office."5 U.S.C.A. § 3345 (a) (West Supp. 1999). This is a narrower idea of a vacancy than is applicable in the context of the Recess Appointments Clause. It is, as well, a definition that is not, by its terms, applicable to an officer serving under a statutory holdover provision. Under a holdover provision, the Senate-confirmed officer continues to serve in the office and therefore has not died, resigned, or become unable to perform the functions and duties of the office.

REV_00264274

In addition, the Vacancies Reform Act provides, in a separate section specifically addressing service under a holdover provision, that the Act is not intended to affect the service of a PAS officer under such a provision:

> Sections 3345 through 3349a shall not be construed to affect any statute that authorizes a person to continue to serve in any office -
>
> (1) after the expiration of the term for which such person is appointed; and
>
> (2) until a successor is appointed or a specified period of time has expired.

5 U.S.C.A. § 3349b (West Supp. 1999). As a result, we believe that there is no vacancy to be reported under the Act when a PAS officer continues service under a holdover provision.

Although we believe that this is the proper understanding of the Act, § 3345(c)(2) makes what would otherwise be a clear result somewhat less clear. Section 3345(c)(2) provides that "[f]or purposes of this section and sections 3346, 3347, 3348, 3349, 3349a, and 3349d, the expiration of a term of office is an inability to perform the functions and duties of such office." Viewed in isolation, this provision could be interpreted to extend the definition of a vacancy to cover service under a holdover provision. Section 3345(c)(2), however, must be interpreted in light of the purpose of § 3345(c) as a whole, and, as so interpreted, it does not alter the conclusion provided by examining the other provisions of the Act.[(2)]

Section 3345(c) was added as a late amendment to the Act for the purpose of creating an additional class of acting officers for a specific, narrow situation: officers holding fixed terms with no holdover provision who are renominated to the office. See 144 Cong. Rec. S12,823 (daily ed. Oct. 21, 1998) (statement of Sen. Thompson) ("New § 3345(c) was added to address the special case of an executive department (not executive agency) officer who serves not at the pleasure of the President, but under a fixed term, and without a holdover provision that governs acting service in that office following expiration of the fixed term." (emphasis added)). Section 3345(c) was not intended to, and does not, supplant or alter the specific statement in § 3349b that the Act does not affect service under a statutory holdover provision.[(3)]

For these reasons, we believe that when an officer serves under a holdover provision, there is no reportable vacancy under the Act.

BETH NOLAN
Deputy Assistant Attorney General
Office of Legal Counsel

---

1. Judicial decisions on the issue have been mixed.Compare Staebler v. Carter, 464 F. Supp. 585, 588-601 (D.D.C. 1979) (holding that an FEC office was vacant for Recess Appointments Clause purposes when the incumbent continued to exercise authority pursuant to a holdover provision that provided that "[a] member of the [FEC] may serve on the Commission after the expiration of his term until his successor has taken office")with Mackie v. Clinton, 827 F. Supp. 56, 58 (D.D.C. 1993) (whether a vacancy exists for Recess Appointments Clause purposes depends on the wording and structure of the particular holdover provision; deciding that the Postal Service holdover provision did not create a vacancy), vacated as moot, Nos. 93-5287 & 93-5289, 1994 WL 163761 (D.C. Cir. Mar. 9, 1994).

REV_00264275

2. The other part of section 3345(c) is subsection (c)(1), which provides:

> Notwithstanding subsection (a)(1), the President (and only the President) may direct an officer who is nominated by the President for reappointment for an additional term to the same office in an Executive department without a break in service, to continue to serve in that office subject to the time limitations in section 3346, until such time as the Senate has acted to confirm or reject the nomination, notwithstanding adjournment sine die.

3. Section 3345(c) refers to "the expiration of a term of office," and § 3349b refers to "the expiration of the term for which such person is appointed." The different phrases convey different meanings. As we discussed above, § 3345(c)(2) was meant to apply to situations in which there is no holdover provision and was not intended to supplant or alter the clear statement in § 3349b that the Act does not affect service under a holdover provision. But to the extent § 3345(c)(2) encompasses positions with holdover provisions, its reference to a term of office would sensibly include the full period of service in the office, including the holdover period. Section 3349b, on the other hand, refers to "the expiration of the term for which such person is appointed" (emphasis added) when it unquestionably intends to exclude the holdover period. This is the term of years designated as the term of appointment in the statute governing appointment to the position. See, e.g., 28 U.S.C. § 541(b) (1994) ("Each United States attorney shall be appointed for a term of four years. On the expiration of his term, a United States attorney shall continue to perform the duties of his office until his successor is appointed and qualifies.").

REV_00264276

Service: LEXSTAT®
Citation: 5 USC 5533

5 USCS § 5533

UNITED STATES CODE SERVICE
Copyright 2000, LEXIS Law Publishing, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc.
All rights reserved.

 CURRENT THROUGH P.L. 106-418, APPROVED 11/1/00 ***
 WITH GAPS OF 106-398, 402, 405, 408, 411, 414, 415, 417 ***

TITLE 5. GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION AND EMPLOYEES
PART III. EMPLOYEES
SUBPART D. PAY AND ALLOWANCES
CHAPTER 55. PAY ADMINISTRATION
SUBCHAPTER IV. DUAL PAY AND DUAL EMPLOYMENT

5 USCS § 5533 (2000)

§ 5533. Dual pay from more than one position; limitations; exceptions

(a) Except as provided by subsections (b), (c), and (d) of this section, an individual is not entitled to receive basic pay from more than one position for more than an aggregate of 40 hours of work in one calendar week (Sunday through Saturday).

(b) Except as otherwise provided by subsection (c) of this section, the Office of Personnel Management, subject to the supervision and control of the President, may prescribe regulations under which exceptions may be made to the restrictions in subsection (a) of this section when appropriate authority determines that the exceptions are warranted because personal services otherwise cannot be readily obtained.

(c) (1) Unless otherwise authorized by law and except as otherwise provided by paragraph (2) or (4) of this subsection, appropriated funds are not available for payment to an individual of pay from more than one position if the pay from one of the positions is paid by the Secretary of the Senate or the Chief Administrative Officer of the House of Representatives, or one of the positions is under the Office of the Architect of the Capitol, and if the aggregate gross pay from the positions exceeds $ 7,724 a year ($ 10,540, in the case of pay disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate).

(2) Notwithstanding paragraph (1) of this subsection, appropriated funds are not available for payment to an individual of pay from more than one position, for each of which the pay is disbursed by the Chief Administrative Officer of the House of Representatives, if the aggregate gross pay from those positions exceeds the maximum per annum gross rate of pay authorized to be paid to an employee out of the clerk hire allowance of a Member of the House.

(3) For the purposes of this subsection, "gross pay" means the annual rate of pay (or equivalent thereof in the case of an individual paid on other than an annual basis) received by an individual.

(4) Paragraph (1) of this subsection does not apply to pay on a when-actually-employed basis received from more than one consultant or expert position if the pay is not received for the same day.

(d) Subsection (a) of this section does not apply to--

(1) pay on a when-actually-employed basis received from more than one consultant or expert position if the pay is not received for the same hours of the same day;

(2) pay consisting of fees paid on other than a time basis;

REV_00264277

(3) pay received by a teacher of the public schools of the District of Columbia for employment in a position during the summer vacation period;

(4) pay paid by the Tennessee Valley Authority to an employee performing part-time or intermittent work in addition to his normal duties when the Authority considers it to be in the interest of efficiency and economy;

(5) pay received by an individual holding a position--

(A) the pay of which is paid by the Secretary of the Senate or the Chief Administrative Officer of the House of Representatives; or

(B) under the Architect of the Capitol;

(6) pay paid by the United States Coast Guard to an employee occupying a part-time position of lamplighter; and

(7) pay within the purview of any of the following statutes:

(A) section 162 of title 2;

(B) section 23(b) of title 13;

(C) section 327 of title 15;

(D) section 907 of title 20;

(E) section 873 of title 33; or

(F) section 631 or 631a of title 31, District of Columbia Code.

(e)

(1) This section does not apply to an individual employed under sections 174j-1 to 174j-7 or 174k of title 40.

(2) Subsection (c) of this section does not apply to pay received by a teacher of the public schools of the District of Columbia for employment in a position during the summer vacation period.

HISTORY:

(Sept. 6, 1966, P.L. 89-554, § 1, 80 Stat. 483; July 28, 1967, P.L. 90-57, § 105(h), 81 Stat. 143; Dec. 16, 1967, P.L. 90-206, Title II, § 214(o), 81 Stat. 637; Oct. 26, 1970, P.L. 91-510, Title IV, Part 7, § 477(d), 84 Stat. 1195; Oct. 26, 1973, P.L. 93-140, § 23, 87 Stat. 508; Nov. 1, 1973, P.L. 93-145, § 101, 87 Stat. 532; Dec. 31, 1975, P.L. 94-183, § 2(21), 89 Stat. 1058; Oct. 1, 1976, P.L. 94-440, Title I, § 103, 90 Stat. 1443; Oct. 13, 1978, P.L. 95-454, Title IX, § 906(a)(2), 92 Stat. 1224.)

(As amended Aug. 20, 1996, P.L. 104-186, Title II, § 215(7), 110 Stat. 1745.)

HISTORY; ANCILLARY LAWS AND DIRECTIVES

Prior law and revision:

Derivation	U.S. Code	Revised Statutes and Statutes at Large
.....	5 USC Sec. 3105 (less (e)).	Aug. 19, 1964, P.L. 88-448, Sec. 301 (less (e)), 78 Stat. 488.

In subsec. (a), the words "an individual" are substituted for "civilian personnel".

In subsec. (b), the words "and issue" are omitted as surplusage.

In subsec. (c), the words "appropriated funds are not" are substituted for "no funds appropriated by any Act shall be". The words "$ 2,000 a year" are substituted for "the sum of $ 2,000 per annum".

In subsec. (d)(7)(D), reference to "section 907 of title 20" is substituted for 5 U.S.C. 3105 (d)(7)(F) to reflect the scheduled transfer of 5 USC § 2358(b) to title 20.

In subsec. (d)(7)(H), the words "of chapter 7" are omitted as surplusage.

Standard changes are made to conform with the definitions applicable and the style of this title.

REV_00264278

References in text:
"Section 631 and 631a of title 31, District of Columbia Code", referred to in subsec. (d)(7)(F), were recodified as sections 31-1009 and 31-1010, respectively, of Title 31, of the District of Columbia Code.

Amendments:
1967. Act July 28, 1967 (effective 8/1/67, as provided by § 105(k) of such Act), substituted subsec. (c) for one which read:
"(c) Unless otherwise authorized by law, appropriated funds are not available for payment to an individual of pay from more than one position if the aggregate amount of the basic pay from the positions is more than $ 2,000 a year, and if--
"(1) the pay of one of the positions is paid by the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives; or
"(2) one of the positions is under the Office of the Architect of the Capitol.".
Act Dec. 16, 1967 (effective at the beginning of the first pay period which begins on or after 12/16/67, as provided by § 220(a)3) of such Act), substituted subsec. (c) for one which read:
"(c)
(1) Except as provided by paragraph (2) of this subsection, unless otherwise authorized by law, appropriated funds are not available for payment to an individual of pay from more than one position if the aggregate amount of the basic pay from the positions exceeds $ 2,000 a year, and if--
"(A) the pay of one of the positions is paid by the Clerk of the House of Representatives (in the case of employees receiving basic rates of compensation); or
"(B) one of the positions is under the Office of the Architect of the Capitol.
"(2) Unless otherwise authorized by law, appropriated funds are not available for payment to an individual of pay from more than one position if the aggregate (gross) compensation from the positions exceeds $ 5,987 a year, and if the pay of one of the positions is paid by the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives (in the case of employees receiving single per annum rates of compensation).".
1970. Act Oct. 26, 1970 (effective immediately prior to noon on 1/3/71, as provided by § 601(1) of such Act), in subsec. (c), in para. (1), inserted "and except as otherwise provided by paragraph (2) of this section", substituted "if the aggregate gross pay from the positions exceeds $ 7,724 a year" for "if-- "(A) the pay of one or more of the positions is fixed at a single gross per annum rate, and the aggregate gross pay from the positions exceeds $ 6,256 a year, or
"(B) the pay of each such position is fixed at a basic rate plus additional compensation authorized by law, and the aggregate basic pay of the positions exceeds $ 2,000 a year", redesignated para. (2), as para. (3), added a new para. (2), and, in para (3), as redesignated, deleted ", and, in the case of an individual receiving basic pay plus additional compensation provided by law, includes the aggregate amount received as basic and additional compensation, but does not include sums received as premium pay under subchapter V of this chapter.", following "received by an individual".
1973. Act Oct. 26, 1973, in subsec. (e), designated existing matter as para. (1), and added para. (2).
Act Nov. 1, 1973, in subsec. (c), in para. (1), inserted "or (4)", and added para. (4).
1975. Act Dec. 31, 1975, in subsec. (d)(7), deleted subpara. (F), which read: "section 3335(a) or (c) of title 39;", and redesignated subparas. (G) and (H) as subparas. (F) and (G), respectively.
1976. Act Oct. 1, 1976, in subsec. (c)(1), inserted "($ 10,540, in the case of pay disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate)".
1978. Act Oct. 13, 1978 (effective 90 days after enactment on 10/13/78, as provided by § 907 of such Act, which appears as 5 USCS § 1101 note), in subsec. (b), substituted "Office of Personnel Management" for "Civil Service Commission".
1979. Act Sept. 27, 1979 (effective 10/1/79, as provided by § 3304 of such Act, which appears as 22 USCS § 3601 note), in subsec. (d)(7), in subpara. (E), substituted "; or" for a semicolon, in subpara. (F), substituted a period for "; or"; and deleted subpara. (G), which read: "(G) section 102 of title 2, Canal Zone Code.".

REV_00264279

1996. Act Aug. 20, 1996, in subsec. (c), in paras. (1) and (2), and in subsec. (d), in para. (5)(A), substituted "Chief Administrative Officer" for "Clerk".

Other provisions:

Increases in compensation of individuals whose pay is disbursed by Secretary of the Senate. For Increases in compensation of individuals whose pay is disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate, see 2 USCS § 60a-1 notes.

Increase in pay rates of certain employees of legislative branch. For increase in pay rates of legislative branch employees subject to the General Schedule, see 5 USCS § 5332 note.

Transfer of functions of Clerk of House of Representatives. H. Resolution No.423, § 7, One Hundred Second Congress, April 9, 1992, provided that certain non-legislative and financial functions of the Clerk of House of Representatives were transferred to the Director of Non-legislative and Financial Services.

NOTES:

CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS

Office of Personnel Management-Pay administration (general), 5 CFR Part 550.

CROSS REFERENCES

Time limitation on claims against Government employees who received dual compensation in violation of the dual compensation laws, 31 USCS § 3712.

This section is referred to in 2 USCS § 162; 5 USCS § 5531; 13 USCS § 23; 15 USCS § 327; 20 USCS § 907; 22 USCS § 2396; 25 USCS § 2011; 33 USCS § 873; 39 USCS § 1001.

RESEARCH GUIDE

Am Jur:

15A Am Jur 2d, Civil Service § 43.

INTERPRETIVE NOTES AND DECISIONS

1. Generally
2. Compensation for different jobs
3. Compensation for services not related to official duties

1. Generally

Dual compensation prohibitions of 5 USCS § 5533 apply only to basic pay; severance pay is not basic pay from position, and payment of severance pay following retroactive reduction in force is not barred by dual compensation prohibition. (1983) 62 Op Comp Gen p 435.

2. Compensation for different jobs

Statutes forbidding extra compensation to public officers are inapplicable to one who holds at same time 2 distinct offices each with its own duties and compensation. United States v Saunders (1887) 120 US 126, 30 L Ed 594, 7 S Ct 467.

Two offices may be held by same person, and compensation for both may be recovered. Wyman v United States (1891) 26 Ct Cl 103.

Dual compensation prohibitions of 5 USCS § 5533 do not prohibit appointment of president of Government National Mortgage Association as president of Solar Energy and Energy Conservation Bank pursuant to 12 USCS § 3605, since Solar Energy and Energy Conservation Act (12 USCS §§ 3601 et seq.) does not require president of bank to sit on full-time basis, nor is there reason to assume that president would be paid additional compensation in violation of § 5533. Dabney v Reagan (1982, SD NY) 559 F Supp 861, costs/fees proceeding (1990, SD NY) 1990 US Dist LEXIS 115, costs/fees proceeding (1992, SD NY) 1992 US Dist LEXIS 17599.

REV_00264280

3. Compensation for services not related to official duties

5 USCS § 5533 did not preclude officer from receiving compensation other than his salary for services in employment having no affinity or connection with his official duties. Meigs v United States (1884) 19 Ct Cl 497.

Prohibition of double compensation applied only to official services. United States v Stowe (1884, DC Minn) 19 F 807.

Service: LEXSTAT®
Citation: 5 USC 5533
View: Full
Date/Time: Monday, January 15, 2001 - 9:26 AM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Federal Register
Terms: "electronic mail" and "office of government ethics" (Edit Search)

*62 FR 23941, **

FEDERAL REGISTER

Vol. 62, No. 85

Rules and Regulations

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE (DOJ)

28 CFR Part 45

RIN 3209-AA15

Supplemental Standards of Ethical Conduct for Employees of the Department of Justice

62 FR 23941

DATE: Friday, May 2, 1997

ACTION: Final rule.

To view the next page, type .np* TRANSMIT.
To view a specific page, transmit p* and the page number, e.g. p*1

[*23941]

SUMMARY: The Department of Justice, with the concurrence of the Office of Government Ethics (OGE), is issuing a final rule for Department employees as a supplement to the Uniform Standards of Ethical Conduct for Employees of the Executive Branch (Uniform Standards) issued by OGE. The regulations established by the final rule, which adopt the prior interim regulations as final with two minor changes, are a necessary supplement to the Uniform Standards because they address statutory requirements and issues that are unique to the Department. The Department is also finalizing the revision of its residual employee responsibilities regulation, with certain changes.

EFFECTIVE DATE: May 2, 1997.

FOR FURTHER INFORMATION CONTACT: Mary Braden, U.S. Department of Justice, Justice Management Division, Departmental Ethics Office, (202) 514-8196.

SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION:

REV_00264282

I. Rulemaking History

On August 7, 1992, the Office of Government Ethics published the Uniform Standards. See 57 FR 35006-35067, as corrected at 57 FR 48557, 57 FR 52583, and 60 FR 51667, and amended at 61 FR 42965-42970 (as corrected at 61 FR 48733) and 61 FR 50689-50691 (interim rule revisions adopted as final at 62 FR 12531), with additional grace period extensions at 59 FR 4779-4780, 60 FR 6390-6391, 60 FR 66857-66858, and 61 FR 40950-40952. The Uniform Standards, codified at 5 CFR part 2635 and effective February 3, 1993, established uniform standards of ethical conduct for executive branch personnel. Pursuant to E.O. 12674 (54 FR 15159, 3 CFR, 1989 Comp., p. 215, as modified by E.O. 12731, 55 FR 42547, 3 CFR, 1990 Comp., p. 306) and 5 CFR 2635.105, executive branch agencies may issue agency-specific regulations, with the concurrence of OGE, that supplement the Uniform Standards. After considering its unique operations, the Department, with the concurrence of OGE, has determined that the regulations established by the final rule, based on the prior interim rule with two minor changes, are necessary to implement the Department's ethics program successfully.

II. Comments

On November 25, 1996, the Department, with the concurrence of OGE, issued interim supplemental standards regulations. See 61 FR 59811-59815, which provided for a 45-day comment period that ended January 9, 1997. We received only one comment on the interim rule. The comment was in regard to 5 CFR 3801.106 of the interim rule dealing with outside employment. Section 3801.106(b)(1)(i) of the interim rule, which generally prohibits outside employment that involves the practice of law, contains an exception for the practice of law on behalf of certain family members, specifically, the employee, his parents, spouse, or minor children. The commenter noted that the regulation did not conform to the exceptions for representing family members found in 18 U.S.C. 203(d) and 205(e). 18 U.S.C. 203 and 205 generally prohibit an employee from acting as agent or attorney for anyone, with or without compensation, before any agency or court of the United States on a matter in which the United States is a party or has a direct and substantial interest. Exceptions in these two statutes permit representations on behalf of the employee's parents, spouse, child and certain other persons. There is no qualification that the child must be a minor in the language of these statutes. Therefore, we agree with the commenter that the regulation should conform to the representational statutes and have been told that the Office of Government Ethics has no objection to our amending the rule by removing the word "minor" which appears before the word "children" in 5 CFR 3801.106(b)(1)(i). For ease of reference, the Department is publishing in this rulemaking document the part 3801 regulation in its entirety.

III. Additional Changes to 28 CFR Part 45

We are also making two additional changes to the Department's agency conduct regulations at 28 CFR part 45, as revised in the prior interim rule. First, in addition to the sections the Department repealed because they were superseded by the Uniform Standards, we are now also repealing previously redesignated and amended § 45.3 (old § 45.735-5(b)), because it was superseded by regulations at 5 CFR part 2640 which the Office of Government Ethics issued as a final rule on December 18, 1996, 61 FR 66830-66851 (part III), as corrected at 62 FR 1361 (January 9, 1997), and which became effective January 17, 1997.

Second, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 301, we are publishing a Department rule at 28 CFR 45.4 which was issued earlier as policy on April 21, 1995. This rule authorizes Department of Justice office and library equipment and facilities. This policy has actually been in effect in a modified form since 1989. We believe that it is reasonable to authorize employees to make certain limited personal use of Department property as long as managers have the right to limit or revoke such use should it interfere with the conduct of official business. We have also amended 5 CFR 3801.105 which refers employees to the Department policy authorizing certain use of Department property to refer instead to 28 CFR 45.4.

REV_00264283

IV. Matters of Regulatory Procedure

Executive Order 12866

In promulgating this final regulation, the Department of Justice has adhered to the regulatory philosophy and the applicable principles of regulation set forth in section 1 of Executive Order 12866, Regulatory Planning and Review. This regulation has not been reviewed by the Office of Management and Budget under the Executive Order, it [*23942] deals with agency organizational, management, and personnel matters and is not in any event, deemed "significant" thereunder.

Regulatory Flexibility Act

Pursuant to the Regulatory Flexibility Act, 5 U.S.C. chapter 6, as Assistant Attorney General for Administration of the Department of Justice, I have determined that this regulation will not have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities, because it affects only Department of Justice employees.

Paperwork Reduction Act

As Assistant Attorney General for Administration of the Department of Justice, I have determined that the Paperwork Reduction Act, 44 U.S.C. chapter 35, does not apply to the regulation established by the final rule, because the regulation does not contain any information collection requirements that require the approval of the Office of Management and Budget.

List of Subjects in 5 CFR Part 3801 and 28 CFR Part 45

Conflicts of interest, Executive branch standards of conduct, Government employees.

Dated: April 23, 1997.

Stephen R. Colgate.

Assistant Attorney General for Administration, Department of Justice.

Approved: April 25, 1997.

Stephen D. Potts,

*Director, Office of Government Ethics.

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth in the preamble, the Department of Justice, with the concurrence of the Office of Government Ethics, is amending title 5 of the Code of Federal Regulations and the Department is also amending title 28 of the Code of Federal Regulations as follows:

TITLE 5--[AMENDED]

CHAPTER XXVIII--DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

1. Part 3801 is revised to read as follows:

REV_00264284

PART 3801--SUPPLEMENTAL STANDARDS OF ETHICAL CONDUCT FOR EMPLOYEES OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Sec.

3801.101 General.

3801.102 Detailed or assigned special agents of certain Departmental components.

3801.103 Designation of separate Departmental components.

3801.104 Purchase or use of certain forfeied and other property.

3801.105 Personal use of Government property.

3801.106 Outside employment.

Authority: 5 U.S.C. 301, 7301; 5 U.S.C. App. (Ethics in Government Act of 1978); E.O. 12674, 54 FR 15159, 3 CFR, 1989 Comp., p. 215, as modified by E.O. 12731, 55 FR 42547, 3 CFR, 1990 Comp., p. 306; E.O. 12988, 61 FR 4739; 5 CFR 2635.105, 2635.203(a), 2635.403(a), 2635.701-2635.705, 2635.803, 2635.807(a)(2)(ii); and DOJ Order 1735.1.

§ 3801.101 -- General.

In accordance with § 2635.105 of this title, the regulations in this part apply to employees of the Department of Justice and supplement the Standards of Ethical Conduct for Employees of the Executive Branch in part 2635 of this title. In addition to the regulations contained in part 2635 of this title and in this part, employees are subject to the conduct regulations contained in part 735 of this title and 28 CFR part 45.

§ 3801.102 -- Detailed or assigned special agents of certain Departmental components.

Notwithstanding a detail or assignment to another entity, any special agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation or Drug Enforcement Administration who is subject to the regulations or standards of ethical conduct of that entity pursuant to § 2635.104 of this title shall also remain subject to the regulations in this part.

§ 3801.103 -- Designation of separate Departmental components.

(a) Pursuant to § 2635.203(a) of this title, each of the following components is designated as a separate agency for purposes of the regulations contained in subpart B of part 2635 of this title governing gifts from outside sources, and, accordingly, § 2635.807 of this title governing teaching, speaking, and writing:

Antitrust Division

Bureau of Prisons

(including Federal Prison Industries, Inc.)

Civil Division

Civil Rights Division

REV_00264285

Community Relations Service

Criminal Division

Drug Enforcement Administration

Environment and Natural Resources Division

Executive Office for Immigration Review

Executive Office for United States Attorneys

(The Executive Office for United States Attorneys shall not be considered separate from any Office of the United States Attorney for a judicial district, but only from other designated components of the Department of Justice.)

Executive Office for United States Trustees

(The Executive Office for United States Trustees shall not be considered separate from any Office of the United States Trustee for a region, but only from other designated components of the Department of Justice.)

Federal Bureau of Investigation

Foreign Claims Settlement Commission

Immigration and Naturalization Service

Independent Counsel appointed by the Attorney General

INTERPOL

National Drug Intelligence Center

Justice Management Division

Office of Information and Privacy

Office of Intelligence Policy and Review

Office of Community Oriented Policing Services

Office of Justice Programs

Office of the Pardon Attorney

Office of Policy Development

Offices of the United States Attorney (94)

(Each Office of the United States Attorney for a judicial district shall be considered a separate component from each other such office.)

Offices of the United States Trustee (21)

(Each Office of the United States Trustee for a region shall be considered a separate component from each other such office.)

REV_00264286

Tax Division

United States Marshals Service

United States Parole Commission

(b) Employees serving in positions within the Department but outside of the components designated in paragraph (a) of this section must continue to treat the entire Department of Justice as their employing agency for purposes of the gift rules of subpart B of part 2635 of this title and the application of the teaching, speaking and writing provisions found in § 2635.807 of this title.

§ 3801.104 -- Purchase or use of certain forfeited and other property.

(a) In the absence of prior approval by the agency designee, no employee shall purchase, directly or indirectly, from the Department of Justice or its agents property forfeited to the United States and no employee shall use property forfeited to the United States which has been purchased, directly or indirectly, from the Department of Justice or its agents by his spouse or minor child. Approval may be granted only on the basis of a written determination by the agency designee that in the mind of a reasonable person with knowledge of the circumstances, purchase or use by the employee of the asset will not raise a question as to whether the employee has used his official position or nonpublic information to obtain or assist in an advantageous purchase or create an appearance of loss of impartiality in the performance of the employee's duties. A copy of the written determination shall be filed with the Deputy Attorney General.

(b) No employee of the United States Marshals Service, Federal Bureau of Investigation, or Drug Enforcement [*23943] Administration shall purchase, directly or indirectly, from his component, the General Services Administration, or the agent of either, property formerly used by that component and no such employee shall use property formerly used by his component which has been purchased, directly or indirectly, by his spouse or minor child from his component, the General Services Administration, or to the agent of either.

§ 3801.105 -- Personal use of Government property.

Employees are prohibited by part 2635 of this title from using Government property for other than authorized purposes. The Department rule authorizing limited personal use of Department of Justice office and library equipment and facilities by its employees is at 28 CFR 45.4.

§ 3801.106 -- Outside employment.

(a) Definition. For purposes of this section, outside employment means any form of employment, business relationship or activity, involving the provision of personal services whether or not for compensation, other than in the discharge of official duties. It includes, but is not limited to, services as a lawyer, officer, director, trustee, employee, agent, consultant, contractor, or general partner. Speaking, writing and serving as a fact witness are excluded from this definition, so long as they are not combined with the provision of other services that do fall within this definition, such as the practice of law. Employees who wish to engage in compensated speaking and writing should review § 2635.807 of this title.

(b) Prohibitied outside employment. (1) No employee may engage in outside employment that involves:

REV_00264287

(i) The practice of law, unless it is uncompensated and in the nature of community service, or unless it is on behalf of himself, his parents, spouse, or children;

(ii) Any criminal or have as corpus matter, be it Federal, State, or local; or

(iii) Litigation, investigations, grants or other matters in which the Department of Justice is or represents a party, witness, litigant, investigator or grant-maker.

(2) Where application of the restrictions of paragraph (b)(1) of this section will cause undue personal or family hardship; unduly prohibit an employee from completing a professional obligation entered into prior to Government service; or unduly restrict the Department from securing necessary and uniquely specialized services, the restrictions may be waived in writing based upon a determination that the activities covered by the waiver are not expected to involve conduct prohibited by statute or Federal regulation. Employees should refer to DOJ Order 1735.1 on obtaining waivers. The Order is available from the agency designee which, for purposes of this rule, shall be the Deputy Designated Agency Ethics Official for the component.

(c) Prior approval for outside employment. (1) An employee must obtain written approval before engaging in outside employment, not otherwise prohibited by paragraph (b) of this section that involves:

(i) The practice of law; or

(ii) A subject matter, policy,or program that is in his component's area of responsibility.

(2) Employees should refer to DOJ Order 1735.1 for procedures on obtaining prior approval. A waiver granted pursuant to paragraph (b)(2) of this section will be sufficient to satisfy this prior approval requirement.

(3) Approval shall be granted only upon a determination that the outside employment is not expected to involve conduct that is prohibited by statute or Federal regulation.

TITLE 28--[AMENDED]

CHAPTER I--DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

PART 45--[AMENDED]

2. The authority citation for part 45 is revised to read as follows:

Authority: 5 U.S.C. 301, 7301; 18 U.S.C. 207; 28 U.S.C. 503, 528; DOJ Order 1735.1.

3. Section 45.1 is republished to read as follows:

§ 45.1 -- Cross-reference to ethical standards and financial disclosure regulations.

Employees of the Department of Justice are subject to the executive branch-wide Standards of Ethical Conduct at 5 CFR part 2635, the Department of Justice regulations at 5 CFR part 3801 which supplement the executive branch-wide standards, the executive branch-wide financial disclosure regulations at 5 CFR part 2634 and the executive branch-wide employee responsibilities and conduct regulations at 5 CFR part 735.

§ 45.3 -- [Removed]

§ 45.4 -- [Redesignated as § 45.3]

REV_00264288

4. Section 45.3 is removed and § 45.4 is redesignated as § 45.3.

5. A new § 45.4 is added to read as follows:

§ 45.4 -- Personal use of Government property.

(a) Employees may use Government property only for official business or as authorized by the Government. See 5 CFR 2635.101(b)(9), 2635.704(a). The following uses of Government office and library equipment and facilities are hereby authorized:

(1) Personal uses that involve only negligible expense (such as electricity, ink, small amounts of paper, and ordinary wear and tear); and

(2) Limited personal telephone/fax calls to locations within the office's commuting area, or that are charged to non-Government accounts.

(b) The foregoing authorization does not override any statutes, rules, or regulations governing the use of specific types of Government property (e.g. internal Departmental policies governing the use of electronic mail; and 41 CFR (FPMR) 101-35.201, governing the authorized use of long-distance telephone services), and may be revoked or limited at any time by any supervisor or component for any business reason.

(c) In using Government property, employees should be mindful of their responsibility to protect and conserve such property and to use official time in an honest effort to perform official duties. See 5 CFR 2635.101(b)(9), 2635.704(a), 2635.705(a).

[FR Doc. 97-11476 Filed 5-1-97; 8:45 am]

BILLING CODE 4410-AR-M

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Federal Register
Terms: "electronic mail" and "office of government ethics" (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Sunday, January 14, 2001 - 3:35 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

REV_00264289

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : USCS - United States Code Service; Code, Const, Rules, Conventions & Public Laws
Terms: ("director" /5 "federal bureau of investigation") and ("attorney general") (Edit Search)

42 USCS § 3771

UNITED STATES CODE SERVICE
Copyright 2000, LEXIS Law Publishing, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc.
All rights reserved.

 CURRENT THROUGH P.L. 106-418, APPROVED 11/1/00 ***
 WITH GAPS OF 106-398, 402, 405, 408, 411, 414, 415, 417 ***

TITLE 42. THE PUBLIC HEALTH AND WELFARE
CHAPTER 46. JUSTICE SYSTEM IMPROVEMENT
FBI TRAINING OF STATE AND LOCAL CRIMINAL JUSTICE PERSONNEL

42 USCS § 3771 (2000)

§ 3771. Training and manpower development

(a) Functions, powers, and duties of Director of Federal Bureau of Investigation. The Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation is authorized to--

(1) establish and conduct training programs at the Federal Bureau of Investigation National Academy at Quantico, Virginia, to provide, at the request of a State, unit of local government, or rail carrier, training for State and local criminal justice personnel, including railroad police officers;

(2) develop new or improved approaches, techniques, systems, equipment, and devices to improve and strengthen criminal justice; and

(3) assist in conducting, at the request of a State, unit of local government, or rail carrier, local and regional training programs for the training of State and local criminal justice personnel engaged in the investigation of crime and the apprehension of criminals. Training for rural criminal justice personnel shall include, when appropriate, effective use of regional resources and methods to improve coordination among criminal justice personnel in different areas and in different levels of government. Such training shall be provided only for persons actually employed as State police or highway patrol, police of a unit of local government, sheriffs, and their deputies, railroad police officer, and other persons as the State, unit of local government, or rail carrier unit may nominate for police training while such persons are actually employed as officers of such State, unit of local government, or rail carrier.

(b) General authority of Attorney General over Director. In the exercise of the functions, powers, and duties established under this section the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation shall be under the general authority of the Attorney General.

(c) Training programs for State and local personnel at Federal Training Center. Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a), the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish, develop, and conduct training programs at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center at Glynco, Georgia, to provide, at the request of a State or unit of local government, training for State and local criminal justice personnel provided that such training does not interfere with the Center's mission to train Federal law enforcement personnel.

(d) Rail carrier costs. No Federal funds may be used for any travel, transportation, or subsistence expenses incurred in connection with the participation of a railroad police officer in a training program conducted under subsection (a).

(e) Definitions. In this section--

REV_00264290

(1) the terms "rail carrier" and "railroad" have the meanings given such terms in section 20102 of title 49, United States Code; and

(2) the term "railroad police officer" means a peace officer who is commissioned in his or her State of legal residence or State of primary employment and employed by a rail carrier to enforce State laws for the protection of railroad property, personnel, passengers, or cargo.

HISTORY:

(June 19, 1968, P.L. 90-351, Title I, Part G, § 701, as added Oct. 12, 1984, P.L. 98-473, Title II, Ch VI, Div I, Subdiv A, § 609A(a), 98 Stat. 2090.)

(As amended Nov. 24, 1999, P.L. 106-110, § 1, 113 Stat. 1497.)

HISTORY; ANCILLARY LAWS AND DIRECTIVES

Explanatory notes:

A prior § 3771 (Act June 19, 1968, P.L. 90-351, Title I, Part G, § 701, as added Dec. 27, 1979, P.L. 96-157, § 2, 93 Stat. 1198) was omitted in the general revision of this chapter by Act Oct. 12, 1984, P.L. 98-473, Title II, Ch VI, Division I, Subdiv A, 98 Stat. 2077. It stated the congressional purpose of training and manpower development.

Another prior § 3771 (Act June 19, 1968, P.L. 90-351, Title I, Part F, § 524, as added Aug. 6, 1973, P.L. 93-83, § 2, 87 Stat. 215) was omitted in the general revision of this Chapter by Act Dec. 27, 1979, P.L. 96-157, 93 Stat. 1167. Such section provided for prohibition against use or revelation of information for improper purpose.

Another prior § 701 of Act June 19, 1968, P.L. 90-351, Title I, as added Sept. 29, 1976, P.L. 94-430, § 2, 90 Stat. 1346, which provided for payments of Public safety officers' death benefits was classified to former 42 USCS 3796 and was omitted in the general revision of this Chapter by Act Dec. 27, 1979, P.L. 96-157, 93 Stat. 1167. For similar provision, see 42 USCS § 3796.

Another prior § 701 of Act June 19, 1968, P.L. 90-351, Title II, 82 Stat. 210, is classified to 18 USCS §§ 3501, 3502.

Effective date of section:

This section took effect on enactment, pursuant to § 609AA(a) of Act Oct. 12, 1984, P.L. 98-473, which appears as 42 USCS § 3711 note.

Amendments:

1999. Act Nov. 24, 1999, in subsec. (a), in para. (1), substituted "State, unit of local government, or rail carrier" for "State or unit of local government" and inserted ", including railroad police officers", in para. (3), substituted "State, unit of local government, or rail carrier" for "State or unit of local government" following "request of a", inserted "railroad police officer,", substituted "State, unit of local government, or rail carrier" for "State or such unit" following "persons as the", and substituted "State, unit of local government, or rail carrier." for "State or unit."; and added subsecs. (d) and (e).

Other provisions:

Travel and subsistence expenses of State and local law enforcement officers attending meetings, courses, etc., at FBI National Academy. Act Oct. 18, 1986, P.L. 99-500, and Act Oct. 30, 1986, P.L. 99-591, Title I, § 101(b) in part, 100 Stat. 3341-39, 3341-48 [Act Oct. 30, 1986, P.L. 99-591, is a corrected version of Act Oct. 18, 1986, P.L. 99-500.], provided: "Notwithstanding section 1345 of title 31, United States Code, funds made available to the Drug Enforcement Administration in any fiscal year may be used for travel, transportation, and subsistence expenses of State, county, and local law enforcement officers attending conferences, meetings, and training courses at the FBI Academy, Quantico, Virginia.".

