MEMORANDUM FOR WHITE HOUSE STAFF

FROM: ARTHUR B. CULVAHOUSE, JR.
COUNSEL TO THE PRESIDENT

SUBJECT: Presidential Records Act Obligations of Departing White House Staff

As President Reagan's term begins to draw to a close, increasing numbers of White House staff members are requesting advice with respect to the disposition of the records they have accumulated during their tenure. While guidance on the disposition of White House records is contained in the White House Staff Manual, this appears to be an appropriate time to remind you of your obligations under the Presidential Records Act, and to provide you with a timetable for the transfer of records to the Office of Records Management.

In addition, Counsel's Office is planning on holding one or more briefings in the next month to provide further guidance on the disposition of Presidential records for interested staff members. In the interim, any questions that you have about the requirements of the Presidential Records Act should be addressed to Counsel's Office. Questions concerning the logistics of transferring your records to White House Central Files should be addressed to the Office of Records Management.

Presidential Records Act Obligations

As discussed at greater length in the White House Staff Manual, the ownership, maintenance and disposition of Presidential documents are governed by the Presidential Records Act. The requirements of that Act apply to all records of the White House Office, the Office of Policy Development, the Council of Economic Advisers, the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board and the President's Intelligence Oversight Board. Those requirements also apply to certain records of the National Security Council and to records produced or received by the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy in his role as science adviser to the President.

The Presidential Records Act requires that staff members adequately document the performance of the President's constitutional, statutory and ceremonial duties; the decision as to whether information should be memorialized in the first instance rests with each staff member. In general, papers and similar materials found in the White House fall into one of three categories, */ each of which are subject to different treatment:

1. Presidential Records: Presidential records are the official documents written and received not only by the President but also by his staff. These records encompass any form of memorializing information concerning the President's constitutional, statutory and ceremonial duties, including but not limited to written documents, models, pictures, films and audio and electronic recordings. Presidential records are the property of the United States and when you leave the White House, you should deliver all Presidential records to the Office of Records Management at the White House. To ensure that the President maintains the maximum controls permitted by law, staff members may not retain copies of Presidential records upon departure from the White House.

2. Personal Records: Personal records are the private papers that staff members might keep in their offices. Examples of such papers include insurance claim forms, purely personal correspondence, or personal diaries or journals. Personal documents and files, as indicated in the White House Staff Manual, should have been stored separately from official records. They are your personal property and may be removed by you upon your departure from the White House, or handled in any other manner you so desire.

3. Nonrecord Materials: These are materials that do not rise to the level of a record, meaning that the material (1) does not contain information that either must be memorialized or is not available in a later version of the same document and (2) has been kept by you exclusively for your own use and reference and not made accessible to others on the staff. Examples of nonrecord materials include preliminary drafts of memoranda that are modified before being forwarded to another individual, unimportant notes to your secretary, notes of meetings taken solely for your convenience, and certain telephone and visitor logs. While staff members are free to dispose of materials that are truly nonrecord, because such materials contain official information, you may not remove them from the White House.

*/ The NSC and OSTP have a fourth category of records, federal records, which are official government records not subject to the Presidential Records Act. A staff member departing from these offices is required to leave the originals of his federal records with his office. Staff members may take copies of their federal records as authorized by the Freedom of Information Act and the guidelines of their respective offices.

Preparation of Presidential Records for Delivery to ORM

Prior to transferring files to ORM, staff members should ensure that they have gathered together all Presidential records and appropriately filed them. While the vast bulk of your records should already appear in well-organized files, you should take care to review your word-processing and/or PROFS computer memory to ensure that you have made a hard copy of all "record" material appearing there which can be transferred to ORM. Users of the EOP Electronic Mail system should be aware that while many electronic mail messages may be the equivalent of telephone calls and not rise to the level of record materials, some of them may contain information concerning the President's constitutional, statutory and ceremonial duties that you are required, under the terms of the Presidential Records Act, to memorialize. Those messages that do contain that information should be converted into hard copy for transfer to ORM.

In addition, staff members should, to the extent possible, ensure that any files that they have which contain particularly sensitive information are clearly labelled to reflect that fact. Under the terms of the Presidential Records Act, as well as available constitutional and common law privileges, most of the sensitive Presidential records can be protected, at least for a specified time period, from public access. While Archives personnel, in consultation with President Reagan or his designees, will review all Presidential records and segregate out at least those records that are to be protected under the Presidential Records Act, to avoid inadvertant release of sensitive information it is useful for those who created them, to the extent possible, to mark those files. Possible file labels may include:

(1) This file contains classified information (in general, this label should be unnecessary as classified files should already be clearly marked).

(2) This file contains information the release of which may be prejudicial to the maintenance of good relations with foreign nations (the vast bulk of such information should be classified and therefore would fall within category Number 1 above).

(3) This file contains sensitive personal information the release of which may be embarrassing to the individuals mentioned or to their families.

(4) This file contains sensitive information involving the confidential advice requested by or provided to the President or his advisers.

(5) This file contains sensitive law enforcement materials.

(6) This file contains trade secrets or sensitive commercial or financial information.

Delivery of Presidential Records to ORM

As noted above, departing staff members are responsible for ensuring that their Presidential Records are appropriately filed and transferred to ORM. In fact, as part of the official check-out procedures, departing staff members must certify that they have transferred their Presidential records to ORM. Under the Presidential Records Act, the United States Archivist will, upon the completion of the Administration, assume custody of the official records of President Reagan and his staff and will transport them to California where they eventually will be housed in the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library. While, as a general matter, staff members should transfer their files to ORM as they depart from the White House, in order to complete in a timely manner the logistical arrangements for moving these records to California, staff members who are staying on until or through January 20, 1989 / should comply with the following timetables:

1. Staff members should deposit in Central Files no later than Monday, January 10, all of their Presidential records, with the exception of those records which are essential for the President to carry out his official duties.

2. Those essential records not deposited on or before January 10, along with other records generated after January 10, must be deposited with Central Files by 5:00 p.m. on January 19. (Failure to transfer these records to ORM by January 19 may result in providing members of the new Administration with sensitive information to which they would otherwise not have access.)

To further aid in efforts to prepare these records for shipping to California, each staff member should, as soon as possible, deposit those of his or her Presidential records that are not needed for ongoing business with White House Central Files. Those records can, of course, be returned to the staff member from Central Files if they later become needed.

Archives' Assessments of Records Volume

Finally, staff members should be aware that as part of the preparations for transporting President Reagan's records to California, representatives of the Archivist will, beginning next week, visit individual offices solely for the purpose of ascertaining the volume of records stored there. White House staff members should cooperate fully with the efforts of Archives personnel to make these assessments.

/ It is important for those members of the White House staff who may be remaining at the White House after January 20 to realize that you must nevertheless transfer all of your official records of the Reagan Administration to ORM in accordance with the timetables specified in this memorandum.

REV_00255085

REV_00255086

PRESIDENTIAL RECORDS ACT

The requirements governing the ownership, maintenance and disposition of Presidential documents under the Presidential Records Act, 44 U.S.C. sections 2201-07 (the "Act") are listed in summary and are explained in more detail in the material that follows.

Summary of Presidential Records Act Requirements

- Staff members must adequately document the performance of the President's constitutional, statutory, and ceremonial duties.

- Staff members must preserve the original of any Presidential record. Duplicate copies may be destroyed.

- Staff members should preserve Presidential records in complete and orderly files and should keep non-Presidential records that is, personal records, Federal records or non-record materials segregated, preferably through the use of separate filing systems.

- Staff members departing from the White House must turn over to the Office of Records Management the originals of all Presidential records in their possession.

- Staff members are prohibited from taking copies of any Presidential records with them when they depart from the White House, unless those records have clearly been made public previously (e.g,., copies of press releases).

- Staff members in some instances may dispose of "non-record" materials such as notes of meetings, rough drafts not circulated to others, visitor logs, duplicate copies, etc.; however, because such records contain official information, staff members are prohibited from removing them (or copies of them) from the White House.

Types of Records Covered by the Act

The Act defines "Presidential records" to include not only the official documents written and received by the President but also the official records created or received by his staff. "Presidential records" encompass any form of memorializing information, including but not limited to written documents, models, pictures, films and audio and electronic recordings.

While the Act requires that staff members adequately document the performance of the President's constitutional, statutory, and ceremonial duties, the decision whether information should be memorialized in the first instance remains with each staff member. For example, it is within the discretion of a staff member to dispose of materials that do not rise to the level of a record, such as scratch pads, unimportant notes to one's secretary, phone logs, visitor logs, notes of meetings, etc., provided this is based upon a determination that creation of a record is not required in the circumstance. However, if non-record material is not disposed of contemporaneously, staff members must be careful to ensure that it is kept by them exclusively for their own use. It should not be made accessible to others on the staff; making non-record material accessible to others on the staff will convert it into "record" material.

Records relating to political activities that are undertaken in the course of carrying out the President's official or ceremonial duties are Presidential records (e.g., political briefing papers for official trips and official meetings are Presidential records). Records relating to political activities not associated with the President's official duties are not Presidential records (e.g., materials for political and campaign-related meetings and trips).

Private papers, which staff members might keep in their offices are personal, not Presidential records. Personal records include diaries or journals that are kept by a staff member exclusively for his or her own use and reference, are not accessible to others on the staff, and are not used for transacting government business. Personal documents and files should be segregated and stored separately from official records.

Units of the Executive Office of the President Covered by the Act

All records of the White House Office, the Office of Policy Development, the Council of Economic Advisers, the President's Intelligence Oversight Board, and the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board are Presidential records.

Records of the Office of Management and Budget, the Office of the United States Trade Representative, the Council on Environmental Quality, and the Office of Administration are Federal, not Presidential, records.

The records of the National Security Council staff are Federal records if they were received or created in connection with the work of the statutorily created National Security Council. Additionally the NSC's internal administrative records are Federal records. The records of the National Security Council staff are Presidential records if they were received or created for the President, the Assistant to the President for National Security, his Deputy, or a member of the White House staff independently of any meeting or policy and staff actions of the NSC.

The records of the Office of Science and Technology Policy are Federal records; however, those records produced or received by the Director of OSTP in his role as Science Advisor to the President are Presidential records and should be segregated as such.

Maintenance of Presidential Records

The law imposes an affirmative obligation on staff members to document adequately the performance of the President's constitutional, statutory, and ceremonial duties. Staff members are urged to document the performance of their duties and preserve these records in complete and orderly files. Personal records should be kept apart from official records and clearly labeled as such. Moreover, those officials or units that maintain both Presidential records and Federal records should file them separately with a clear indication of whether they are Presidential or Federal.

Assistance in distinguishing among Presidential, Federal and personal records may be obtained from the Office of the Counsel to the President. Assistance in establishing file systems may be obtained from the White House Office of Records Management.

In addition, staff members should, to the extent possible, ensure that any files that they have which contain certain types of particularly sensitive information are clearly labeled to reflect that fact. Under the terms of the Presidential Records Act, as well as available constitutional and common law privileges, most of such sensitive Presidential records will be protected, at least for a specified time period, from public access. Archives personnel, in consultation with the President or his designees, will review all Presidential records and segregate out those records that are to be protected under the Presidential Records Act. However, to avoid inadvertent release of sensitive information, it would be useful for those who created them, to the extent possible, to mark those files. Possible file labels may include:

- "Classified information" (in general, this label should be unnecessary as classified files should already be clearly marked).

- "Information the release of which may be prejudicial to the maintenance of good relations with foreign nations" (the vast bulk of such information should be classified and, therefore, would fall within category Number 1 above).

- "Sensitive personal information" (information the release of which may be embarrassing to the individuals mentioned or to their families).

- "Sensitive information involving the confidential advice requested by or provided to the President or his advisers."

- "Sensitive law enforcement materials."

- "Trade secrets or sensitive commercial or financial information."

- "Information subject to attorney-client or attorney work product privileges."

Disposition and Destruction of Presidential Records

Once a decision is made to memorialize and maintain information as a Presidential record, it becomes the property of the United States and may be disposed of only in accordance with procedures established by the Archivist of the United States. The Act prohibits the disposal of Presidential records unless those records no longer have administrative, historical, informational, or evidential value. Moreover, before disposing of any records the President must notify the Archivist and under some circumstances appropriate congressional committees.

The White House Office of Records Management ("ORM") maintains records disposal schedules, which are approved by the Archivist, for certain recurring types of disposable papers, such as form letter public mail, anonymous public mail, unsuccessful and unsolicited applications for employment, and enclosures received in public mail. If you have a recurring type of disposable material in your office, you may wish to request that ORM enter it on the records disposal schedule. Before you dispose of any documents, contact ORM to determine whether the category of items involved has been approved for disposal. Such prior notice is not necessary for destruction of exact duplicates of documents that are being maintained, or for copies of officially published documents, such as printed reports, etc.

ORM can also arrange for storage of records that are to be preserved, but for which there is no longer a current need. Offices are encouraged to develop systematic records retirement schedules, reserving filing space for those records for which there is a current need.

Legal Control of Presidential Records

Presidential records remain in the custody and control of the President during his term of office and are not accessible to the public under the Freedom of Information Act. In contrast, Federal records are accessible to the public under the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act.

REV_00255089

Upon completion of the Administration, the Archivist acquires custody of Presidential records. However, the President may assert control for 12 years over public access to certain categories of records. Basically, these categories are: (a) security classified items; (b) documents related to appointments to Federal office; (c) items specifically exempted from disclosure by other statutes; (d) trade secrets and commercial or financial information; (e) confidential communications requesting or submitting advice between the President and his advisers, or between such advisers; and (f) personnel or medical files, the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Thereafter, public access is determined by the Freedom of Information Act, subject in all cases to the President's right to invoke any constitutional privilege against disclosure.

Records that May be Retained by Staff Members Upon Departure

To insure that the President maintains the maximum controls permitted by law, staff members may not remove copies of Presidential records from their offices either now or at the end of the Administration. When a staff member leaves the White House, he or she shall deliver all files and records to ORM at the White House or, in the case of the National Security Council staff, to the Executive Secretariat of the National Security Council. Federal records shall be left with the appropriate agency. Staff members may remove only those records that are purely personal.

The foregoing is designed to provide general guidance with respect to the Presidential Records Act. Specific questions of coverage or interpretation should be addressed to the Counsel's Office. Assistance in records maintenance and storage may be obtained from the White House Office of Records Management.

MEMORANDUM FOR WHITE HOUSE OFFICE STAFF

FROM: JOHN PODESTA
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND STAFF SECRETARY

MARVIN KRISLOV
ASSISTANT COUNSEL TO THE PRESIDENT

TERRY GOOD
DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF RECORDS MANAGEMENT

SUBJECT: Disposition of Office Records

As we approach the end of the second year of the Administration, we remind you that the Office of Records Management is prepared to accept files from your offices for processing and storage. Many of you have already submitted your files -- to date, over 3,000 cubic feet of records have been sent. The more important of these files are now included in two computer data bases: one containing textual abstracts, and one containing optical images.

Proper disposition of your office files and records is required by the Presidential Records Act and is a sound management practice. We encourage you to call on the staff of Records Management for assistance in organizing your files prior to forwarding them for cataloging. Your cooperation will assist the ongoing operations of your offices, and will contribute to writing the history of the Clinton Administration.

MEMORANDUM FOR ALL EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT STAFF

FROM: JOHN D. PODESTA JDP
Assistant to the President and Staff Secretary

STEPHEN R. NEUWIRTH
Associate Counsel to the President

RE: Presidential Records

The offices within the Executive Office of the President generate two categories of records: "Presidential Records" and Federal Records." A separate memo from David Watkins and Bruce Overton has been circulated today concerning "federal records."

This memorandum sets forth guidance on the creation, maintenance and disposition of "Presidential records" -- records "created or received by the President, his immediate staff, or a unit or individual of the Executive Office of the President whose function is to advise and assist the President, in the course of conducting activities which relate to or have an effect upon the carrying out of the constitutional, statutory, or other official or ceremonial duties of the President."

It is important that all staff in the Executive Office of the President review this memorandum carefully. The failure to designate documents and other materials properly can have serious implications, including possibly subjecting those materials to public disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act during the President's term of office.

I. UNITS WITHIN THE EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT THAT GENERATE PRESIDENTIAL RECORDS

All records of the White House Office, the Office of Policy Development, the National Economic Council, the Council of Economic Advisors, the President's Intelligence Oversight Board disposition can be obtained from the White House Office of Records Management (or, in the case of the Office of the Vice President, from the Vice President's records management staff).

REV_00255102

and the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board are Presidential records.

As discussed below, records of the Office of the Vice President are Vice Presidential records and are treated under the Presidential Records Act in the same manner as Presidential records. The records of the Office of the Vice President are not federal records.

The records of the National Security Council staff are Presidential records if they were received or created by or for the President, the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, the Deputy Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, the White House Office, or a unit or an individual within the NSC in advising or assisting the President, and are not official records of the NSC. All other NSC records are federal records.

Records produced or received by the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy in his role as Science Advisor to the President are Presidential records; all other OSTP records are federal records.

Records of the Office of Management and Budget, the Office of the United States Trade Representative, the Council on Environmental Quality, and the Office of Administration are federal, not Presidential, records.

II. Types of Records Covered by the Act

The Presidential Records Act defines "documentary materials" as "all books, correspondence, memorandums, documents, papers, pamphlets, works of art, models, pictures, photographs, plats, maps, films, and motion pictures, including, but not limited to, audio, audio-visual, or other electronic or mechanical recordations." 44 U.S.C. § 2201(1).

The Act defines "Presidential records," in turn, to mean:

> documentary materials, or any reasonably segregable portion thereof, created or received by the President, his immediate staff, or a unit or individual of the Executive Office of the President whose function is to advise and assist the President, in the course of conducting activities which relate to or have an effect upon the carrying out of the constitutional, statutory, or other official or ceremonial duties of the President. Such term --
> (A) includes any documentary materials relating to the political activities of the President or members > of his staff, but only if such activities relate to or have a direct effect upon the carrying out of constitutional, statutory, or other official or ceremonial duties of the President.

44 U.S.C. § 2201(2).

Under this definition, Presidential records are documentary materials that meet two tests. First, the materials must have been created or received by the President, his immediate staff, or a unit or individuals (including volunteers) in the EOP whose function it is to advise and assist the President. Second, the records must relate to or have an effect upon the carrying out of the constitutional, statutory, or other official or ceremonial duties of the President. Presidential records may be in any physical form, including paper, film and disk. The method used to record information may be manual, mechanical, photographic, electronic, or any combination of these or other technologies.

A document created by personnel in a White House office, or an EOP office that advises and assists the President, normally is a Presidential record once it is circulated to others in the course of conducting activities which relate to or have an effect upon the carrying out of Presidential duties. Moreover, even documents that are not circulated can be Presidential records if, in the judgment of the office at issue, those documents are needed to conduct business that relates to or has an effect upon the carrying out of Presidential duties.

Materials received by personnel in the White House office, or in EOP offices that advise and assist the President, similarly become Presidential records when they are received in the course of conducting activities which relate to or have an effect upon the carrying out of Presidential duties. Materials received may be Presidential records whether they have been transmitted in person, by messenger, by mail, by electronic communication, or by any other means.

At the same time, several types of documentary materials are not subject to the Presidential Records Act. The Act expressly excludes documentary materials that are (1) official records of an agency; (2) stocks of publications and stationery; and (3) extra copies of documents produced only for convenience of reference, when such copies are clearly so identified.

The Act also excludes "personal records," defined to include all documentary materials, or any reasonably segregable portion thereof, "of a purely private or nonpublic character which do not relate to or have an effect upon the carrying out of the constitutional, statutory, or other official or ceremonial duties of the President." Personal records may include:

-- diaries, journals, or other personal notes serving as the functional equivalent of a diary or journal, which are not prepared or utilized for, or circulated or communicated in the course of, transacting government business;

-- materials relating to private political associations, and having no relation to or direct effect upon the carrying out of constitutional, statutory, or other official or ceremonial duties of the President;

-- papers and other materials accumulated by a staff member before joining government service and not used in the course of transacting government business;

-- materials that relate to a staff member's private affairs, such as personal financial records, insurance forms, and materials relating to an individual's professional activities and outside business and political pursuits;

-- personal photographs;

-- materials relating exclusively to the President's own election to the office of the Presidency; and

-- materials directly relating to the election of a particular individual or individuals to Federal, State, or local office, which have no relation to or direct effect upon the carrying out of constitutional, statutory, or other official or ceremonial duties of the President.

Further examples of materials not covered by the Presidential Records Act may include items such as those listed below:

-- preliminary drafts, that are not circulated to any other individual, of correspondence, reports, and studies;

-- preliminary drafts, work sheets and informal notes that contain information reflected in final documents and that do not document policy development or execution;

REV_00255096

-- tickler, follow-up or suspense copies of correspondence, provided there are copies of such documents in the official files;

-- newspaper clippings or news summaries, that have not been annotated, or organized or arranged for some official purpose;

-- copies of printed or processed materials, such as operating and procedural manuals, directives, and notices, distributed for the information and use of office employees;

-- shorthand and other notes that have been transcribed or converted to formal documents that have been verified for accuracy and completeness; and

-- catalogs, trade journals, and other publications that are received from other government agencies, commercial firms, or private institutions and that are maintained for reference purposes.

It is important to remember, however, that certain documents in the categories listed above may be Presidential records -- particularly given that, in the White House, drafts, working papers and other similar materials often document policy development, significant decisions, or other matters related to the carrying out of Presidential duties, as discussed below.

III. Requirements for creation and maintenance of Presidential records

When advising or assisting the President in carrying out his duties, White House and EOP employees are responsible for complying with the Presidential Records Act and related regulations.

The law imposes an affirmative obligation on staff members to document adequately the performance of the President's constitutional, statutory and ceremonial duties. Where appropriate, staff members should document -- through notes, minutes or memoranda -- meetings, conversations and other business in connection with, or related to, the carrying out of the President's duties.

Presidential records should be maintained in organized files. For offices creating both Presidential and federal records, it is critical that staff members carefully segregate Presidential and federal records. Federal records are subject to the Federal Records Act and may be subject to public disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act during the President's term of office. Presidential records, by contrast, are not subject to the Federal Records Act and are not subject to the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act during the President's term of office. Those offices (such as the National Security Council) that create or receive both Presidential records and federal records should file them separately with a clear indication of which records are Presidential and which are federal.

In addition, staff members should, to the extent possible, ensure that any files containing particularly sensitive records are clearly marked to reflect that fact. Designations for files containing sensitive records may include:

(1) "classified information";[1]

(2) "information the release of which may be prejudicial to the maintenance of good relations with foreign nations";

(3) "sensitive personal information" (i.e., information the release of which may be embarrassing to the individuals mentioned or to their families);

(4) "sensitive law enforcement materials";

(5) "trade secrets or sensitive commercial or financial information"; and

(6) "information subject to attorney-client or attorney work product privileges."

Finally, personal records should be clearly labeled, kept apart from Presidential records (and federal records) and not made available to other staff in connection with any official purpose.

IV. Electronic Presidential records

Increasingly, Presidential records may be created electronically. Records may be generated on word processing or electronic mail ("e-mail") systems, or on electronic databases.

[1] Please note that nothing in this memorandum should be construed to override existing Executive Orders setting forth who may designate specific documents as classified and what terms must be used in connection with such designations.

REV_00255098

Records generated electronically must be incorporated into an official recordkeeping system. Thus, no word processing or e-mail document that is a Presidential record should be deleted unless it has been (a) printed and placed in an appropriate file, or (b) preserved in an appropriate electronic system. Questions concerning the record status of electronically generated materials should be directed to the White House Records Management Office. That office will periodically monitor electronic systems to ensure that correct records status determinations have been made.

As is the case for all record matters, the White House Records Management Office will continue to work with the White House Counsel's Office to coordinate policy and practices with respect to electronic Presidential records.

V. Disposition and destruction of Presidential records

Presidential records are the property of the United States and may be disposed of only in accordance with procedures established by the Archivist of the United States. The Presidential Records Act prohibits the disposal of Presidential records unless those records no longer have administrative, historical, informational, or evidentiary value. Moreover, before disposing of any Presidential records, the President must notify the Archivist who, under certain clearly defined circumstances, will notify appropriate Congressional committees.

The White House Records Management Office will provide guidance concerning disposal of certain recurring types of papers, including form letter public mail, unsolicited public mail that is not reviewed by any person in the White House with decision-making authority and not answered by any member of the White House staff, anonymous public mail, and enclosures received in public mail -- most of which may be destroyed after notification to the Archivist of the United States or the Archivist's representative.

Offices that have these recurring types of disposable material should coordinate all disposal procedures through the Office of Records Management. Under no circumstances should such material be disposed of without prior approval of the White House Records Management Office. (Prior approval is not necessary for the destruction of exact duplicates of documents which are being retained, or for unmarked copies of officially published documents, such as printed reports.)

The White House Office of Records Management serves as a central file for all Presidential records. Its primary role is to manage, process, maintain and store records for the daily use of the President and all the policy units in the White House. Concurrently, it preserves these same records to ensure a comprehensive history of the Administration. All EOP staff members are encouraged to consult with this office for guidance on the creation and maintenance of files and on procedures for appropriate and systematic filing of documents.

VI. Legal control of Presidential records

Presidential records remain in the custody and control of the President during his term of office and are not subject to disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act during that term. As noted above, federal records are, by contrast, subject to the FOIA public disclosure provisions.

Upon completion of the Administration, the Archivist acquires custody of Presidential records. Many of these records will become available to the public under the FOIA five years after the end of the President's term of office. The President, however, may assert control over public access to certain categories of information -- generally including classified materials, documents related to appointments to federal offices, items specifically exempted from disclosure by other statutes, trade secrets or commercial information, confidential communications requesting or submitting advice between the President and his advisers (or between such advisers), and information implicating personal privacy concerns -- for up to twelve years after the end of the President's term. After twelve years, public access to these categories of documents is governed by the FOIA, subject to any Constitutional privilege against disclosure.

VII. Records that may be retained by staff members upon departure from office

Staff members may not remove Presidential records, or copies of such records, from their offices at any time, except in connection with an official function. Classified Presidential records may not be removed from the office at any time without compliance with the rules applicable to such materials. Records used in an official capacity should be returned to proper files immediately after such use.

When a staff member leaves the White House or another office in the EOP, he or she must deliver all Presidential records to the White House Records Management Office (or leave records in his or her office for pick-up). Staff members are not entitled to retain copies of any Presidential records for personal use, except copies of documents that have already been publicly released.

Federal records should be left at the appropriate agency, and disposed of in accordance with the advice set forth in the federal records guidance memorandum from David Watkins and Bruce Overton.

Purely personal, unclassified materials may be removed from the office by staff members at any time, subject to any agency procedures regulating such removal. If, during the course of service at the White House, a staff member wishes to store personal (including private political) materials at the White House Office of Records Management, the staff member must clearly designate those materials as "personal."

VIII. Records in the Office of the Vice President

The Presidential Records Act expressly provides that records of the Office of the Vice President are Vice-Presidential records and are to be treated under the Presidential Records Act in the same manner as Presidential records. Thus, materials created or received in the Office of the Vice President should be treated in accordance with the guidance set forth above. The Office of the Vice President has its own records management staff, and personnel in the Office of the Vice President should consult with that staff for additional guidance regarding the filing and disposition of Vice President's Office records.

The Presidential Records Act further provides that "[t]he authority of the Archivist with respect to Vice-Presidential records shall be the same as the authority of the Archivist with respect to Presidential records, except that the Archivist may, when the Archivist determines that it is in the public interest, enter into an agreement for the deposit of Vice-Presidential records in a non-Federal archival depository."

IX. Training

The White House Office of Records Management and other appropriate personnel will be providing records management training in the near future.

MEMORANDUM FOR ALL EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT STAFF

FROM: DAVID WATKINS
Assistant to the President for Management and Administration

BRUCE OVERTON
General Counsel, Office of Administration

RE: Federal Records

INTRODUCTION

Records are "Presidential" if they are "created or received by the President, his immediate staff, or a unit or individual of the Executive Office of the President whose function is to advise and assist the President, in the course of conducting activities which relate to or have an effect upon the carrying out of the constitutional, statutory or other official or ceremonial duties of the President." Such Presidential records are subject to the provisions of the Presidential Records Act, 44 U.S.C. § 2201. Presidential records remain in the custody and control of the President during his term of office and are not accessible to the public until five years after the end of the Administration, at the earliest. The treatment of Presidential records will be addressed in a separate memorandum issued today by the White House Office.

It is the purpose of this memorandum to discuss the identification, maintenance and disposition of "federal" records. Materials are "federal records" if (1) the materials have been created or received by agency personnel in connection with their official duties in a federal agency, and (2) the materials are appropriate for preservation as evidence of the agency's activities or because they contain information of value. Federal records are subject to the provisions of the Federal Records Act, 44 U.S.C. Chapters 29, 31 and 33. Unlike Presidential records, federal records are accessible to the public during the

Administration's term, unless exempt from disclosure under the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act.[1]

The Federal Records Act imposes certain legal obligations with respect to the creation and receipt, custody and maintenance, and disposition of federal records. The responsibilities apply regardless of whether the records are generated in paper form or by automated systems.

It is critical that staff members in offices, such as the National Security Council, that create or receive both federal and Presidential records, file those records separately in clearly designated files. Once a document is filed as a federal record, it becomes subject to the Federal Records Act and may be subject to public disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act. Presidential records, by contrast, are not subject to the Federal Records Act and are not subject to the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act during the President's term of office. Personal records (defined and discussed below) also should be segregated, and filed separately, from official records.

[1] All records of the White House Office, the Office of Policy Development, the National Economic Council, the Council of Economic Advisers, the President's Intelligence Oversight Board and the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board are Presidential records.

The records of the Office of the Vice President are treated in the same manner as Presidential records under the Presidential Records Act. The records of the Office of the Vice President are not federal records.

Records of the National Security Council staff are Presidential Records if they were received or created by or for the President, the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, the Deputy Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, the White House office, or a unit or an individual within the NSC in advising or assisting the President, and not official records of the NSC.

Records produced or received by the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy in his role as Science Advisor to the President are Presidential records and should be segregated as such. Other records of the OSTP are federal records.

Records of the Office of Management and Budget, the Office of the United States Trade Representative, the Council on Environmental Quality, and the Office of Administration are federal, not Presidential records.

The guidance that follows will assist EOP staff in complying with the Federal Records Act, which is designed to ensure that documentation of official activities is adequately created and preserved. See 44 U.S.C. § 3101. As explained below, not every document that you create or receive will be subject to the Federal Records Act, and it is therefore important to review this guidance to understand when Federal Records Act obligations do apply. In preparing this guidance, we have consulted with officials of the National Archives and Records Administration.

DEFINITION OF FEDERAL RECORDS

The Federal Records Act defines federal records as:

> [A]ll books, papers, maps, photographs, machine readable materials, or other documentary materials, regardless of physical form or characteristics, made or received by an agency of the United States under Federal law or in connection with the transaction of public business and preserved or appropriate for preservation by that agency or its legitimate successor as evidence of the organization, functions, policies, decisions, procedures, operations, or other activities of the Government or because of the informational value of data in them.

Under this definition, federal records are documentary materials that meet two tests. First, the materials must have been created or received by agency personnel in connection with their official duties in a federal agency. Second, the materials must be appropriate for preservation as evidence of the agency's activities or because they contain information of value. Federal records may be in any physical form, including paper, film and disk. The method used to record information may be manual, mechanical, photographic, electronic, or any combination of these or other technologies.

A document created in any agency normally becomes a federal record once it is circulated to others in the course of conducting agency business, or once it is placed in files accessible to others. Moreover, even documents that are not circulated can become federal records if, in the judgment of the agency, those documents are needed to conduct agency business -- and whether or not those documents are accommodated by current filing systems employed by the agency.

Materials received by agency personnel are federal records when they are received in the course of official business. Materials received can become federal records whether they have been transmitted in person, by messenger, by mail, by electronic communication, or by any other means.

At the same time, certain types of documentary materials are not subject to the Federal Records Act. The Act specifically excludes (1) library and museum materials created, or acquired and preserved, solely for reference or exhibit purposes; (2) extra copies of documents kept only for convenience of reference; and (3) stocks of publications and processed documents. These and other types of transitory or duplicate records are considered "nonrecord" because they are not "appropriate for preservation" as defined in the Act. Such materials are not needed to provide full and accurate documentation of an agency's policies, decisions, procedures, and program activities. These materials need not be maintained in official files, and, unlike federal records, may be destroyed when no longer needed and without prior approval of the National Archives and Records Administration.

Other examples of "nonrecord" materials not covered by the Federal Records Act may include:

-- Preliminary drafts, that are not circulated to any other individual, of correspondence, reports, and studies.

-- Preliminary drafts, work sheets and informal written notes that contain information reflected in final documents and that do not document policy development or execution.

-- Tickler, follow-up or suspense copies of correspondence, provided there are copies of documents in the official files.

-- Newspaper clippings or news summaries, particularly if they are not annotated.

-- Copies of printed or processed agency materials, such as operating and procedural manuals, directives, and notices, distributed for the information or use of agency employees.

-- Shorthand and other notes that have been transcribed or converted to formal documents that have been verified for accuracy and completeness.

-- Catalogs, trade journals, and other publications that are received from other government agencies, commercial firms, or private institutions and that are maintained for reference purposes.

In addition, certain "personal papers" fall outside the scope of the Federal Records Act. Personal papers are documentary materials that are not used in the transaction of agency business. Examples include:

-- Papers and other materials accumulated by a staff member before joining government service.

-- Materials that relate to a staff member's private affairs, such as personal financial records, insurance forms, and materials relating to an individual's professional activities and outside business and political pursuits.

-- Personal photographs.

-- Materials that may refer to official duties but are not directly used to carry out those duties. These include diaries, personal calendars, journals, and notes intended for an individual's personal use (memory aids and personal observations on work-related matters).[2]

It is important to remember, however, that certain informal documents may be federal records. In the Executive Office of the President, to a greater extent than in many other government offices, drafts, notes, background materials or working papers can be considered federal records because they document policy development, significant decisions, major activities, or other matters basic to an understanding of the office and its role in government operations. Such materials should be treated as federal records and maintained in official files if they were circulated for review or clearance, and if they have been modified substantively.

When it is difficult to determine whether documents or other records should be treated as federal records, you should tentatively treat them as federal records and contact the appropriate EOP agency records management office for a final determination. Legal questions will be referred by the records management office to appropriate counsel.

[2] For further information on personal papers, consult Personal Papers of Executive Branch Officials: A Management Guide, published by the National Archives and Records Administration. Copies are available in the Office of Administration, Records Management Office.

REV_00255107

RECORDS CREATION AND MAINTENANCE REQUIREMENTS

When acting in their capacity as employees of a federal agency, such agency employees are responsible for complying with the Federal Records Act and related regulations.

The law requires that adequate and proper records be created and preserved to document the organization, functions, policies, decisions, procedures and essential transactions of the agency. The law also specifically requires that records be kept for appropriate periods if they can be used to protect the legal and financial rights of the Government or individuals directly affected by the agency's activities.

In order to ensure that agency records contain an adequate and proper account of policy development, implementation and decision-making, each employee must document those discussions, meetings and telephone conversations that are necessary to understand these functions. Where appropriate, in formal settings, minutes or notes should be taken for the purpose of including them in official files.

All staff members are responsible for complying with procedures that result in adequate and proper records creation and maintenance. All materials meeting federal records criteria must be incorporated into appropriate agency files or records systems. EOP staff members should consult with the appropriate EOP agency records management office to address any questions concerning the creation and maintenance of federal records.

ELECTRONIC FEDERAL RECORDS

Increasingly, federal records may be created electronically. Records may be generated on word processing, or electronic mail ("e-mail"), systems or other computer applications.

Records generated electronically must be incorporated into an official recordkeeping system. Thus, no word processing or e-mail document that is a federal record should be deleted unless it has been (a) printed and placed in an appropriate file, or (b) preserved in an appropriate electronic system.

On January 6 and 11, 1993, in the case of Armstrong v. Executive Office of the President, United States District Judge Charles R. Richey directed the National Archives and Records Administration to work with components of the EOP to develop further recordkeeping guidance both for e-mail communications in the EOP and for disposition of EOP electronic federal records generally. Pursuant to these orders, and until further instructions, the following special rules should be observed by components of the EOP that generate federal records:

1. Material may not be deleted from any e-mail file unless (a) the material has been retained in full on a back-up tape or other comparable medium, and (b) the retained version includes both full text and all available transmittal information; and

2. EOP staff members with records management responsibility must monitor the implementation of guidance on federal records (including the status of records) to ensure consistent application of the court's order.

Questions concerning the status of electronic records, or the application of these rules to particular computer systems, should be directed to the appropriate EOP agency records management office. Those offices will periodically monitor electronic records systems to ensure that correct records status determinations have been made.

DESTRUCTION OR REMOVAL OF FEDERAL RECORDS

Federal records, as defined by the Federal Records Act, may not be destroyed, or permanently removed from appropriate official files, without the prior approval of the National Archives and Records Administration.

Federal records should be maintained in organized files and may not be damaged or altered by any staff member. Nor may federal records be temporarily removed from official files except for official purposes, and only if returned to the official files upon completion of that official function.

Policies and procedures governing the disposition of federal records are prescribed by the National Archives and Records Administration and are incorporated into the EOP records management program. Further information concerning these policies and procedures should be obtained from the appropriate EOP records management office.

REMOVAL OF NONRECORD AND PERSONAL MATERIALS

Purely personal, unclassified materials may be removed from the office by staff members at any time, subject to any agency procedures regulating such removal.

REV_00255109

Unclassified nonrecord materials, with the exception of copies of records, may be removed with the prior approval of an agency official with records management responsibility.

Except where expressly authorized by appropriate agency officials, copies of federal records, regardless of the reason for which they have been duplicated, may not be taken by staff members for any purpose other than an official purpose related to the staff members' official duties and responsibilities.

No classified materials may be removed from the office at any time, without compliance with the rules applicable to such materials.

TRAINING

EOP agency records management offices and other appropriate personnel will be providing records management training for all employees who generate or receive federal records.

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

May 9, 1997

MEMORANDUM FOR EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT STAFF

FROM: Charles F.C. Ruff
Counsel to the President

SUBJECT: Presidential Records

The Presidential Records Act, 44 U.S.C. §§ 2201-07, imposes certain requirements regarding Presidential documents. This Guidance will first summarize the White House policies regarding the statute, and then discuss them in more detail.

Summary of White House Policies Regarding the Presidential Records Act

- The purpose of the Presidential Records Act is to document the performance of the President's constitutional, statutory and ceremonial duties.
- To accomplish this purpose, the Act requires the preservation of all original Presidential records. You do not have to keep identical copies.
- You need not keep "nonrecord" materials, such as notes for your own use, rough drafts not circulated to others, or call and visitor logs.
- You should file Presidential Records -- those pertaining to the performance of the President's duties -- separately from your personal records.
- When you leave the White House, send the Office of Records Management all original Presidential Records you have.
- Unless they have been publicly released, you may not take copies of Presidential Records when you leave, without permission from Counsel's Office.
- If you have any questions whether particular documents are Presidential Records, contact Robert Weiner in Counsel's Office (6-6297).
- This Guidance addresses your obligations under the Presidential Records Act. In addition, the White House has received subpoenas and document requests. You must preserve all materials that are covered by such subpoenas or requests.

GUIDELINES FOR THE PRESIDENTIAL RECORDS ACT

I. What are Presidential Records?

Presidential Records must meet two tests:

1 They must be created or received by the President, his immediate staff, or others in the EOP whose job is to advise and assist the President, and

2. They must relate to or directly affect the performance of the President's constitutional, statutory, ceremonial or other official duties.

II. What units in the EOP generate Presidential Records?

Records of the following units which meet the two tests above are Presidential Records:

White House Office
National Security Council
Office of Policy Development
National Economic Council
Council of Economic Advisors
President's Intelligence Oversight Board
President's Foreign Intelligence Board

Records of the Office of the Vice President are treated in the same manner as Presidential Records. Records of other units in the Executive Office of the President are not Presidential Records, but may be subject to the Federal Records Act if they were created or received by employees of the agency and reflect the agency's activities or otherwise contain information of value.

III. What types or forms of records are included as Presidential Records?

A Presidential Record may be in any physical form, including: "books, correspondence, memorandums, documents, papers, pamphlets, works of art, models, pictures, photographs, plats, maps, films, and motion pictures, including, but not limited to, audio, audio-visual, or other electronic or mechanical recordations." E-mails and documents existing only on computer are also included.

IV. What materials are not Presidential Records?

The following are not Presidential Records:

1. Personal records.

2. Nonrecord materials.

3. Official records of an agency.

4. Stocks of publications and stationery.

5. Extra copies of documents produced only for convenience or reference, when the copies are clearly identified as such.

V. What are "personal records?"

Personal records have a "purely private or nonpublic character" and do not relate to or affect the President's official duties. Personal records may include:

1. Diaries, journals, and the like if they are not prepared, used or circulated for government business.

2. Materials gathered by a staff member before joining government service, if not used for government business.

3. Materials relating solely to the staff member's private affairs, such as financial records, insurance forms, and outside professional associations.

4. Personal photographs.

5. Materials relating to the election of others to federal, state, or local office, which have no relation or direct effect on the performance of the President's official duties.

VI. Are political documents Presidential Records?

Under the statute, materials regarding the political activities of the President and his staff which do not relate to or directly affect the performance of the President's official duties are not Presidential Records. Neither are materials relating exclusively to the President's own election. Because it sometimes can be difficult to judge which documents fall into these categories, you should consult the Office of White House Counsel regarding the records you may remove.

VII. What are "nonrecord materials?"

The following types of materials may not be Presidential Records:

1. Preliminary drafts not circulated to persons besides the authors.

2. Preliminary drafts, work sheets, and notes if they are reflected in the final product and they do not document the development or implementation of policy.

3. Shorthand and other notes once they are transcribed or converted to formal documents which are verified for accuracy and completeness.

4. Scratch pads, visitor and call logs, and similar nonsubstantive documents.

VIII. What are your obligations regarding the creation of Presidential Records?

The Presidential Records Act requires that staff members adequately document the performance of the President's constitutional, statutory, and ceremonial duties. The decision whether to memorialize information rests in the first instance with each staff member.

IX. How should you maintain Presidential Records?

Maintain Presidential Records in organized files. Label and keep personal records separate from Presidential Records, and do not make personal records available to other staff for official business.

If your office has both Presidential and Federal Records, keep them separate. You may have to disclose Federal Records under the Freedom of Information Act. Presidential Records are not subject to such disclosure.

X. Can you destroy Presidential Records?

No. Presidential Records are the property of the United States, and may be disposed of only in accordance with procedures established by the Archivist.

One narrow exception: If your office receives certain recurring types of papers, including form letter public mail, unsolicited public mail not reviewed or answered by anyone in the White House, anonymous public mail, or enclosures in public mail, the White House Records Management Office will provide guidance regarding when you may dispose of those materials. Consult that Office before disposing of any such records.

XI. What happens to Presidential Records?

During his term, the President retains custody and control of Presidential Records.

At the end of the Administration, Presidential Records go to the Archives. Some will become subject to disclosure five years later. The President can restrict public access to certain documents, such as classified materials, documents related to appointments to federal office, or trade secrets, for up to 12 years. The materials then become publicly available as limited by any constitutional or other privilege.

XII. What can you take with you when you leave the EOP?

You may not take Presidential Records with you at the end of your employment. You also may not take copies of Presidential Records unless the records have been publicly released, or you have received permission from Counsel's Office. You may not remove classified documents from your office at any time without complying with the rules applicable to those materials. You may take political documents only with the approval of Counsel when you leave the EOP. You may also take personal records with you.

When a staff member leaves the White House or the EOP, he or she must deliver all Presidential Records to the White House Records Management Office (or leave the records in his or her office). NSC staff should provide their records to the NSC Records Management Office.

XIII. Who should you ask about the Presidential Records Act?

If you have questions regarding the coverage or interpretation of the Act, call Robert Weiner in the Office of White House Counsel (6-6297). Direct your questions about records maintenance and disposition of files to the White House Office of Records Management (or, for the Office of the Vice President, to the Vice President's records management staff, and for the NSC, the NSC Records Management Office).

MEMORANDUM FOR: MICHELLE SALINAS

FROM: TERRY GOOD
OFFICE OF RECORDS MANAGEMENT

RE: DRAFT OF "FILES" SECTION FOR WHITE HOUSE STAFF MANUAL

I have taken the liberty to revise this section, having found that the previous section left many staff confused. What follows will clarify and answer some of the most frequent questions that we received.

The Presidential Records Act, 44 U.S.C.§§2201-07, imposes certain requirements on the President and his staff regarding Presidential documents. The purpose of the Act is to ensure that documentation is created and preserved of the President's constitutional, statutory, and ceremonial actions. The Act applies to both the President and his staff who are his delegates. Thus staff must create and preserve documentation of their actions in carrying out the President's responsibilities. Some documents are considered "nonrecord," including identical copies, stocks of publications, notes for your own use, rough drafts not circulated to others, and logs of visitors and telephone calls. Any records relating to you personally, having nothing to do with your official duties, must be maintained separately from the official records.

At the end of your White House service, the official records in your custody must be left with either your successor or forwarded to the Office of Records Management. Unless they have been publicly released, you may not take copies of Presidential records when you leave, without permission of the Counsel's Office. If you have any questions about whether particular documents are Presidential records, contact the Counsel to the President (Room 128, EEOB, x67900).

In addition to the provisions of the Presidential Records Act, the White House may receive subpoenas and other requests for documents. You must preserve all materials that are covered by such subpoenas or requests.

How NARA Can Help You with Records Management

What Is Records Management?
In government we all create records to do our business. In the Executive Office of the President (EOP), records that are created are either covered by the Presidential Records Act (PRA) or the Federal Records Act (FRA) which set legal requirements for recordkeeping and define the authorities and responsibilities of the President and his appointees.

The two acts differ to some extent in what they require (see attached), but records management is the common discipline that provides assistance in determining the most effective ways of meeting those differing requirements. The foundation of records management is that records go through a "life cycle" that applies to all records in all media.

- Creation phase - whereby an organization creates the records it needs to do its business
- Active phase - where the records are used to conduct the organization's business
- Disposition phase – where decisions are made about the length of time records must be retained.

What Are the Advantages of Good Records Management?
Good records management helps you in four basic ways:

1. It helps you conduct your business more effectively and efficiently throughout the life cycle by:
   - Specifying what documentation is necessary to conduct business to minimize the number of records that must be created and to maximize their value to meet business needs.
   - Identifying the most cost effective ways to organize, index, file, retrieve, and store records to achieve the maximum benefit for the money invested.
   - Determining the proper length of time to retain records for business purposes and identifying those records that warrant preservation in the National Archives or Presidential Library suitable for destruction and those and regularly carrying out those disposition instructions.
   - Developing requirements for computer systems to manage your records to meet your business needs.
2. It helps you comply with applicable governmental records management requirements.
3. It helps you respond completely and efficiently to requests for access to records
4. It ensures a good historical record that will allow those in the future to understand the accomplishments of the administration.

How Can NARA Assist You in Improving Records Management?
NARA recognizes that the EOP and its components have active records management programs, and NARA staff members have worked with these programs for many years. With the change of administrations, NARA would like to help the EOP through targeted assistance projects that support records management in the Bush administration. NARA staff can assist in all phases of records management. Here are examples of where NARA staff can help:

- Understanding and interpreting relevant records management statutes and applicable regulations and suggesting practices for implementing them effectively and efficiently.
- Developing criteria for identifying personal, presidential, and federal records.
- Selecting records management software and improving the records management capabilities of new and planned systems.
- Developing EOP specific guidance for FRA and PRA organizations
- Training staff in records management responsibilities
- Storing PRA (Presidential and Vice Presidential) and FRA records, personal materials, and gifts.
- Determining the appropriate disposition of records in all media within the context of applicable statutory requirements
- Planning for the transfer of records to NARA.

Implementing the Presidential Records Act and Federal Records Act Requirements.

As noted above, in the Executive Office of the President (EOP), records that are created are either covered by the Presidential Records Act (PRA) or the Federal Records Act (FRA). The Presidential Records Act applies to records created by components of the EOP that solely advise and assist the President.

The components of the EOP that create Presidential records are:

- The White House Office
- The Office of the Vice President
- Office of Policy Development
- Council of Economic Advisors
- The President's Intelligence Oversight Board
- The National Security Council
- The President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board
- The National Economic Council

The EOP components that generate Federal records that are governed by the Federal Records Act are:

- Office of Management and Budget
- Office of the United States Trade Representative
- The Council on Environmental Quality
- The Office of Administration
- The Office of Science and Technology Policy
- The Office of National Drug Control Policy

Both acts require the head of the organization (President or agency head) to take the necessary steps to ensure that adequate documentation of activities is created and maintained. Records management provides common tools for doing that in an effective and efficient manner. However, there are differences between the acts that will affect how records management is implemented.

- The FRA is supported by a series of Federal regulations that provide more specific direction about how agencies should implement a records management program. There are no similar regulations for the PRA.
- The FRA assumes that most Federal records will eventually be destroyed and only a small percentage will eventually come to NARA. The PRA assumes that most Presidential records will be preserved.
- The FRA and PRA set out different procedures for records disposition. Under the FRA agency heads submit records schedules to request the Archivist's approval for the disposition of records. In the case of Presidential records, the PRA states that the incumbent President must obtain the views in writing of the Archivist before disposing of any Presidential records, 44 USC §2203 (c) –(f).
- Access restrictions are different for PRA and FRA records. FRA records will be subject to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) during the Bush administration. PRA records are not subject to the FOIA until five years after the end of the administration.

NARA Records Management Issues for Discussion with Bush Transition Team
Draft of 01/16/01

This document lays out a series of recommendations for improving records management and related information technology (IT) infrastructure based on the experience of National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) staff. These recommendations are meant to start a dialogue with the incoming administration on records management generally and the assistance NARA can provide.

Issues Requiring Immediate Attention

- Give guidance and training to all EOP staff on PRA, FRA, and personal records. Provide clear guidance on personal records to the appropriate staff handling these materials for the President, Vice President, and First Lady.
- Issue a memorandum on records management responsibilities to all staff.
- From the beginning of the administration clearly delineate and separate out what are records under the Presidential Records Act (PRA), what are personal papers under the PRA, and what are federal records under the Federal Records Act (FRA). This should be done for paper and electronic records.
- Establish by the President the ownership of personal (including political) materials generated by White House Staff and the appropriate disposition of such materials. This includes identifying for White House Staff what personal material belongs to the employee and what belongs to the President.

Priority Issues to Address Shortly After the Transition

- Develop a joint list of records management priorities reflecting EOP and NARA needs.
- Establish an overall management perspective for records at the Administration and Management level. Evaluate the potential for establishing a Chief Information Officer (CIO) for the EOP and having a records officer for the EOP reporting directly to the CIO.
- To the extent possible, establish common practices for managing PRA records (including records of the Vice President and First Lady), personal papers under the PRA, and FRA records in all media.
- Develop a system to replace ARMS II that meets both business and records management needs, including the need to maintain PRA, FRA, and personal records separately and the ability to distinguish between non-record material, and short-term and long-term FRA records.
- Determine whether these requirements (and other business requirements) are best met by a system developed in-house, a COTS/GOTS product, or a records management application.
- Incorporate records management requirements in all EOP systems as they are redesigned or upgraded, e.g., the Presidential Diary System.
- Establish in accordance with the PRA a regular process for disposal of Presidential records that are not needed for EOP or statutory or archival reasons. Examples include bulk mail (and bulk e-mail) and backup tapes.
- Work with the White House Gift Unit on implementing guidance for the disposal or other disposition of Presidential gifts that are not appropriate for retention in a Presidential Library.
- Establish a routine process for recycling backup tapes once authorization is obtained from the Archivist as required by statute. Develop a process to maintain backups of PRA and FRA records separately.

Specific Issues That Need to Be Addressed as Part of the Review

- The management of Vice President's Records, both paper and electronic, needs to be addressed, including the issue of the records of the Vice President in the Senate. The two systems are not integrated, although V.P. email could be routed into ARMS.
- The filing procedures for the central file for Presidential records should be reviewed. Sometimes, current filing practices result in the interfiling of personal and Presidential records.
- Review the management of the electronic directory of EOP employees. Could it be modified to serve as a historical record of employees as well as a record of those currently employed?
- Provide guidance to staff on the appropriate way to file electronic records to efficiently use the available drives and effectively manage the electronic records on them. Determine how best to manage the electronic versions of textual documents.
- Provide assistance in the management of First Lady's files, both electronic and paper.
- Designate clear records status at the point of establishment for the records of Task Forces and Commission and provide records management guidance to the staff of the Task Force or Commission including information on closing out the Task Force/Commission and the appropriate disposition of the records.
- Provide regular records management briefings for new employees, including interns. Where necessary, training should include or be supplemented with training on records classification, declassification, and redaction.
- Develop clear recordkeeping requirements for all types of transactions so that staff know what records must be created and maintained to document their work.

MEMORANDUM FOR WHITE HOUSE OFFICE
OFFICE OF POLICY DEVELOPMENT
COUNCIL OF ECONOMIC ADVISORS
PRESIDENT'S INTELLIGENCE OVERSIGHT BOARD
NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL
PRESIDENT'S FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE ADVISORY BOARD
NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL

FROM: ALBERTO R. GONZALES

SUBJECT: PRESIDENTIAL RECORDS ACT

The Presidential Records Act applies to all officers and employees in the above units within the Executive Office of the President. This memorandum, issued at the direction of President Bush, summarizes and explains your obligations under the Act.

The President has the statutory authority and responsibility under the Presidential Records Act (Section 2201-2207 of Title 44) to establish records management controls "to assure that the activities, deliberations, decisions, and policies that reflect the performance of his constitutional, statutory, or other official or ceremonial duties are adequately documented." The Act provides that "[d]ocumentary materials produced or received by the President, his staff, or units or individuals in the Executive Office of the President the function of which is to advise and assist the President, shall, to the extent practicable, be categorized as Presidential records or personal records upon their creation and be filed separately." The Act thus grants the President substantial discretion to determine the most "practicable" means for ensuring that records "adequate" to document the activities, deliberations, decisions, and policies reflecting the performance of his duties are created and preserved. In light of the President's substantial discretion, the President's records policies, as applied to those units in the EOP covered by the Presidential Records Act, are not subject to judicial review. See Armstrong v. Executive Office of the President, 1 F.3d 1274 (D.C. Cir. 1993).

This memorandum provides guidance for you to determine (i) which of your records must be preserved and (ii) which records can be handled or discarded as you see fit. In preparing this memorandum, Counsel has carefully examined the Presidential Records Act, its statutory history, relevant court precedents, and regulations issued by the Archivist interpreting the analogous definition of records in the Federal Records Act, see 36 C.F.R. 1222.34, 1222.36. In addition, Counsel has closely studied the policies and practices of past Administrations, which are reflected in numerous memoranda, and has consulted with officials from the National Archives.

D. Counsel's Office

If you have any doubt whether particular documents are Presidential records, preserve the documents and contact the Counsel's office. The Counsel's Office will assist with any specific questions you have. As recurring questions occur, as they almost certainly will, the Counsel's Office will issue updates and revisions to this policy as necessary and appropriate.

The executive summary immediately below provides the guidance you will need on a day-to-day basis in order to comply with the Act. The remainder of the memorandum explains in greater detail the Counsel's interpretation of the Presidential Records Act and how that Act applies to particular categories of documents.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY:
What records must be preserved and when, if ever, will they become public?

As a general matter, you must ensure preservation of any document that (i) is related to your official White House business and (ii) is received from or circulated to another person, regardless whether that other person is inside or outside the White House. That includes letters, memos, e-mails, notes, speeches, and other similar documents that relate to your official business and are received from or circulated to another person.

You must ensure preservation of all official documents that you receive from anyone outside the White House -- including Congress, departments and agencies of the Executive Branch, state governments, and private individuals and groups. In addition, you must ensure preservation of a copy of all official documents that you send to anyone outside the White House -- including Congress, departments and agencies of the Executive Branch, state governments, and private individuals and groups.

You are not required to preserve:

copies of documents if you are aware that someone else is maintaining a copy personal documents

election- or campaign-related documents

notes or rough drafts so long as the notes or drafts are not circulated or made available to others (A document is not considered circulated to another person merely because an assistant helps in the physical preparation of a document, such as by typing drafts.)

publications such as congressional reports, books, newspapers, magazines, or news summaries and news clips rolodexes, telephone logs, message logs, message slips, calendars, and visitor logs (unless, for example, a message slip communicates a substantive official message)

If you have any doubt whether particular documents or records must be preserved, you should preserve the documents and contact the Counsel's office.

Notwithstanding the minimum requirements of the Presidential Records Act, it bears mention that a fundamental purpose of the National Archives system and the Presidential Records Act is to preserve for history significant documents that accurately reflect the workings of a President and his White House advisors. Therefore, if you create or receive documents that are not covered by the requirements of the Presidential Records Act, but that you nonetheless conclude would assist future historians in understanding the workings of this Administration (such as careful and accurate notes of particular meetings), you may donate them to the National Archives. You can simply give such documents, along with your Presidential records, to the Office of Records Management when you conclude your White House service.

We have several concerns/questions re this paragraph:

1) While the staff person can donate them to NARA, it is incorrect to state that they can "simply give such documents to the Office of Records Management. . .," ORM will not accept personal records.
2) One might read this paragraph and draw the conclusion that ORM is only an archival operation where inactive records are stored. We do provide daily support to many offices in a variety of ways. This is more fully addressed later in our comments on the Section entitled "Office of Records Management."

It also is important for you to understand w*hen* and how the public can gain access to Presidential records. To begin with, the White House Office and the other offices listed at the top of this memorandum, are not subject to the Freedom of Information Act while the President is in office. At the end of the Administration, the National Archives will take control of Presidential records (and will operate in conjunction with the designated Presidential library). The Archives must make most documents available for public release beginning 12 years after the end of the President's term or second term in the event of a two-term Presidency. The 12-year period has exceptions: The Archives must allow release of certain non-sensitive documents after 5 years, and the Archives must protect certain highly sensitive documents, such as national security documents and privacy information, forever.

We would offer a rephrasing of the last sentence above:

Following the conclusion of the Administration, the archivists at the Presidential Library where these records will be preserved, will begin a review process in anticipation of opening them to the public. Some documents will be available in their entirety 5 years after the Administration's end. Those containing national security or other sensitive information will be closed for longer time periods, until the information's classified or sensitive nature passes. Some privacy information may never be opened.

Finally, it is critical for you to read and understand Counsel's separate memorandum regarding the process that the White House will employ in the event it is ever necessary to respond to a subpoena or document request from Congress, a grand jury, or another investigative body. As is explained in that memorandum, your obligations in response to a subpoena or document request often will be more onerous than the more limited requirements of the Presidential Records Act outlined here. In particular, a subpoena or document request usually will require preservation of all documents (including notes, drafts, and potentially even your personal documents) that refer or relate to a particular subject matter and that you possess at the time of the document request or thereafter create or receive.

You always must comply with all of the terms of any subpoena or document request even in those circumstances where those requirements are more stringent than your obligations under the Presidential Records Act.

II. DISCUSSION

1. General Definition of Presidential Records

The Presidential Records Act defines "Presidential records" to include "documentary materials, or any reasonably segregable portion thereof, created or received by the President" – or created or received by members of the staff of the covered EOP components – "in the course of conducting activities which relate to or have an effect upon the carrying out of the constitutional, statutory, or other official or ceremonial duties of the President." The definition expressly encompasses not only written documents, but also models, pictures, films, and audio recordings.

We would offer a slight rephrasing of the last sentence above:

"The definition expressly encompasses not only written documents, but other materials such as, but not limited to, models, pictures, films, and audio recordings."

Congress intended that this definition be interpreted in accord with the definition of "federal records" in the analogous Federal Records Act, a separate records statute that was enacted before the Presidential Records Act and that applies to most federal departments and agencies in the Executive Branch. As the House Committee report accompanying the Presidential Records Act explained, "[t]o the extent that certain categories of documentary materials are not considered to be records under [the Federal Records Act], the same categories of materials generated or received by the President and his aides would generally also fall outside the ambit of what constitutes a record." H. Rep. No. 95-1487, at 11 (1978). That Congressional direction is instructive, for the National Archives has established regulations interpreting the Federal Records Act that, in turn, have guided our interpretation of the Presidential Records Act.

2. Act's Application to Particular Subject Matters

The Act expressly exempts two specific categories of documents -- political documents and personal-private documents – from the definition of Presidential records.

Political Documents Relating to Elections and Private Political Associations

The Act does not cover certain political and election-related documents.

First, the Act does not apply to (i) "materials relating exclusively to the President's own election to the office of the Presidency" and (ii) "materials directly relating to the election of a particular individual or individuals to Federal, state, or local office, which have no relation to or direct effect upon the carrying out of the constitutional, statutory, or other official or ceremonial duties of the President."

Second, the Act does not cover "materials relating to private political associations and having no relation to or direct effect upon the carrying out of the constitutional, statutory, or other official or ceremonial duties of the President."

The purpose of this exception is to ensure that documents related to political associations, elections, and campaigns are not classified as Presidential records. This exclusion from the Presidential records act works in tandem with the Hatch Act's express authorization of political activities by EOP employees. (Political activities are those activities primarily related to specific elections, to a campaign, or to the success of a political party.)

b. Personal documents

The Act also does not apply to records of "a purely private or nonpublic character which do not relate to or have an effect upon the carrying out of the constitutional, statutory, or other official or ceremonial duties of the President." That includes any personal letters notes, private financial documents, or other documents that you may create, receive, or possess in your office.

c. Transition Records

Transition records are not Presidential records. However, if you bring transition or other records into the White House and then use them for official purposes in a manner that otherwise would make them Presidential records, then those records are in fact Presidential records.

We would offer a semantic change in the sentence above:
". . . . . then those records become in fact Presidential records."

---

d. Documents Containing Both Record and Non-Record Portions

The Act expressly recognizes that some documents may contain portions that are a Presidential record and portions that are a non-record (because they are either political or personal). The definition of

We would suggest that "a" be inserted here.

Presidential record provides that only the "reasonably segregable" portion of the document that would qualify as a Presidential record is a Presidential record. Therefore, White House officials may segregate the official portions of a document from the personal portions (by redaction or by copying only the official portions and preserving that copy as the Presidential record) and preserve as a Presidential record only that portion of the document that actually qualifies as such.

The suggestion that staff may segregate official portions of a document from the non-record portions is unreasonable and impractical. They will not take the time, nor be consistent in their effort. No two people will agree. Having wrestled with this issue during three previous PRA Administrations, we can say that it was never tried and for good reason. Is it not far better to error on the side of history and state that, in instances of documents with mixed heritage, Presidential trumps non-record.

Official Documents that meet the definition of Presidential Records.

The Act requires preservation of virtually every document related to official business that you (i) show or send to another person (other than to an administrative or secretarial assistant involved in physically preparing the document) or (ii) receive from another person. That includes:

memos, letters, and other written communications circulated to or received from others, including documents to or from those outside the Government;

draft documents that are circulated or shown to a person other than the author; marked-up edits or comments that are circulated or shown to another person; and notes or minutes of meetings that are circulated or shown to others.

Post-it notes are no different from other kinds of documents. If they relate to official business and are circulated to others (for example, if you attach post-it notes on a draft document returned to its author), they are Presidential records and must be preserved, whether attached or unattached to other documents.

Similarly, e-mail is no different from other kinds of documents. Any e-mail relating to official business therefore qualifies as a Presidential record. All e-mail to your official e-mail address is automatically archived as if it were a Presidential record, and all e-mail from your official e-mail address is treated as a Presidential record unless you designate otherwise (which you should not do unless it is clearly personal).

Finally, if you happen to receive an e-mail on a personal e-mail account or receive a letter or memorandum at home that otherwise would qualify as a Presidential record, it is your duty to treat that record as a Presidential record and to ensure that it is preserved and filed as such.

Non-Record Documents

a. Notes that are not shown or circulated to others

The 1978 House Committee Report accompanying the Presidential Records Act indicates that Congress intended the scope of covered "records" to be the same under both the Federal Records Act and the Presidential Records Act. That Congressional mandate is important because the National Archives has already issued regulations governing work-related notes for purposes of the Federal Records Act. Those regulations provide:

"Working files, such as . . . rough notes, and other similar materials shall be maintained . . . if (1) [t]hey were circulated or made available to employees, other than the creator, for official purposes . . .; and (2) [t]hey contain unique information, such as substantive annotations or comments included therein, that adds to a proper understanding of the agency's formulation and execution of basic policies, decisions, actions, or responsibilities."

Consistent with the express Congressional direction regarding the equivalent scope of the two Acts, Counsel has followed this analogous Federal Records Act regulation in determining the requirements of the Presidential Records Act. In addition, Counsel also has carefully studied and obtained guidance from the past policies and practices of Presidents Reagan, Bush, and Clinton. The policy reflected in this memo with regard to uncirculated notes is consistent with the policies and practices of these three Presidents.

b. Drafts that are not circulated to or shown to others.

In determining the point at which a draft document rises to the level of a Presidential record, Counsel again has examined both the regulations of the National Archives interpreting the analogous definition for "federal records" and to the past policies and practices of Presidents Reagan, Bush, and Clinton.

The regulations provide that drafts must be preserved only if "(1) [t]hey were circulated or made available to employees, other than the creator, for official purposes . . .; and (2) [t]hey contain unique information, such as substantive annotations or comments included therein, that adds to a proper understanding of the agency's formulation and execution of basic policies, decisions, actions, or responsibilities." Moreover, prior Administrations did not require White House staffers to preserve uncirculated drafts.

For that reason, Counsel has concluded that drafts that are not circulated to others are not Presidential records. However, any draft that is circulated to others is a Presidential record and must be preserved along with any comments or suggested edits on the draft.

c. Newspaper Clippings or News Summaries

The Act does not require maintenance of "stocks of publications," which applies to news clippings and news summaries, as well as extra copies of publications such as congressional reports, congressional records, and newspapers. If, however, you circulate or receive a news clip with a handwritten note or a post-it note, that would qualify as a Presidential record and must be preserved.

d. Copies

The Act does not require preservation of extra copies of documents that are produced only for convenience of reference, but this exception applies only to copies are clearly identified as such.

Telephone and Visitor Logs, Message Slips, and Calendars

White House staffers need not preserve message slips, message logs, visitor logs, and official calendars unless a message slip or log records a substantive message communicating a substantive decision or course of action.

f. Voice Mail

The White House voice mail system (like most voice mail systems currently in operation) does not have the capacity to maintain voice mail recordings as opposed to overwriting them (unlike the e-mail system, which archives e-mails). In addressing the question of voice mail, therefore, the Counsel has taken into account the Act's requirements that the President, in establishing record management controls, take such steps "as may be necessary to assure" that Presidential decisionmaking is "adequately documented" and that documentary materials be categorized "to the extent practicable" as Presidential records. Given the present state of White House voice mail technology (as is also true with most other government and corporate voice mail systems today), voice mails cannot reasonably be preserved on an ongoing basis without technological upgrades. Therefore, they do not qualify as Presidential records.

C. Office of Records Management

White House staffers should maintain their personal records separately from their Presidential records and label their folders accordingly. The White House Office of Records Management can provide assistance in establishing appropriate file systems and in storing files that are no longer needed on an ongoing basis.

When terminating White House employment, you must leave your Presidential records with the Office of Records Management and you may not take any Presidential records (or copies thereof) absent the express approval of the Counsel.

We would prefer a fuller treatment of ORM's mission. What follows appeared in an early Clinton Administration memorandum of records.

"The White House Office of Records Management (ORM) serves as a central file for all Presidential records. Its primary role is to manage, process, maintain and store records for the daily use of the President and all the policy units in the White House. Concurrently, it preserves these same records to ensure a comprehensive history of the Administration. All White House staff members are encouraged to consult with this office for guidance on the creation and maintenance of files and procedures for appropriate and systematic filing of documents."

Perhaps the last sentence could be modified with the phrase, ". . .as discussed in this memorandum."

The second paragraph might be worded as follows, to provide another option, in addition to the departure guidelines.

"Staff members, upon termination of White House employment, may elect to leave their office files for their successor or turn them over to ORM. They may not take with them any Presidential records or copies, absent the express approval of the Counsel. However, the departing staff member may take personal records. To reduce last minute confusion, the Counsel's Office and ORM encourage staff, throughout their tenure, to maintain these records separately from their official records."

MEMORANDUM FOR EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT AGENCY HEADS

FROM: DAVID WATKINS
ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT FOR THE OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

SUBJECT: Guidance Regarding Records Retention

Attached for your information is guidance from the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) regarding the preservation of electronic Federal records. Pursuant to court orders issued in the Armstrong v. Executive Office of the President (EOP) case, electronic materials may not be removed, deleted, or altered on EOP electronic communications systems until action is taken to prevent the destruction of Federal records. This guidance does not affect those EOP components that solely create Presidential records.

Once sufficient safeguard measures are in place that meet the requirements of the orders, such as backup tapes, agencies may again delete from their systems. More detailed guidance is expected from NARA on adequate safeguard measures. Concurrent with the Archivist's letter, the Office of Administration (OA) has been consulting with the Department of Justice (DOJ) and NARA with respect to implementing interim steps, consistent with the courts' orders, that affect the operation of its systems.

However, until adequate preservation safeguards are in place, each EOP agency should advise its staff that electronic materials are not to be deleted from electronic communications systems by individual users who create Federal records. Further clarification of the scope of the orders and questions should be directed to the OA Library and Information Services Division (LISD). Please call Mary H. Anton, LISD director, at 395-2527.

Dear Mr. Stern:

This letter is to inform you that President Bush will not assert any constitutionally based privileges as to any records in boxes labeled 1, 2, 3, and 4 of Reagan Library records that recently were transmitted to the Counsel's office. This represents all of the records that had been provided to President Bush as of the beginning of this week and all that the Administration's attorneys have thus far reviewed.

Because President Reagan also has chosen not to assert any constitutionally based privilege over these records, please take all appropriate steps to make these records available to researchers as rapidly as possible.

Thank you for your assistance in this matter.

Sincerely,

Alberto R. Gonzales
Counsel to the President

Title 3 -- The President

Presidential Records

Executive Order 12667 of January 18, 1989

TEXT:
By virtue of the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, and in order to establish policies and procedures governing the assertion of Executive privelege by incumbent and former Presidents in connection with the release of Presidential records by the National Archives and Records Administration pursuant to the Presidential Records Act of 1978, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1 Definitions. For purposes of this Order:

(a) "Archivist" refers to the Archivist of the United States or his designee.

(b) "NARA" refers to the National Archives and Records Administration.

(d) "NARA regulations" refers to the NARA regulations implementing the Presidential Records Act. 53 Fed. Reg. 50404 (1988), codified at 36 C.F.R. Part 1270.

(e) "Presidential records" refers to those documentary materials maintained by NARA pursuant to the Presidential Records Act and the NARA regulations.

(f) "Former President" refers to the former President during whose term or terms of office particular Presidential records were created.

(g) A "substantial question of Executive privilege" exists if NARA's disclosure of Presidential records might impair the national security (including the conduct of foreign relations), law enforcement, or the deliberative processes of the Executive branch.

(h) A "final court order" is a court order from which no appeal may be taken.

Sec. 2. Notice of Intent to Disclose Presidential Records.

(a) When the Archivist provides notice to the incumbent and former Presidents of his intent to disclose Presidential records pursuant to section 1270.46 of the NARA regulations, the Archivist, utilizing any guidelines provided by the incumbent and former Presidents, shall identify any specific materials, the disclosure of which he believes may raise a substantial question of Executive privilege. However, nothing in this Order is intended to affect the right of the incumbent or former Presidents to invoke Executive privilege with respect to materials not identified by the Archivist. Copies of the notice for the incumbent President shall be delivered to the President (through the Counsel to the President) and the Attorney General (through the Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel). The copy of the notice for the former President shall be delivered to the former President or his designated representative.

(b) Upon the passage of 30 days after receipt by the incumbent and former Presidents of a notice of intent to disclose Presidential records, the Archivist may disclose the records covered by the notice, unless during that time period the Archivist has received a claim of Executive privilege bythe incumbent or former President or the Archivist has been instructed by the incumbent president or his designee to extend the time period. If a shorter time period is required under the circumstances set forth in section 1270.44 of the NARA regulations, the Archivist shall so indicate in the notice.

Sec. 3. Claim of Executive Privilege by Incumbent President.

(a) Upon receipt of a notice of intent to disclose Presidential records, the Attorney General (directly or through the Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel) and the Counsel to the President shall review as they deem appropriate the records covered by the notice and consult with each other, the Archivist, and such other Federal agencies as they deem appropriate concerning whether invocation of Executive privilege is justified.

(b) The Attorney General and the Counsel to the President, in the exercise of their discretion and after appropriate review and consultation under subsection (a) of this section, may jointly determine that invocation of Executive privilege is not justified. The Archivist shall be promptly notified of an such determination.

(c) If after appropriate review and consultation under subsection (a) of this section, either the Attorney General or the Counsel to the President believes that the circumstances justify invocation of Executive privilege, the issue shall be presented to the President by the Counsel to the President and the Attorney General.

(d) If the President decides to invoke Executive privilege, the Counsel to the President shall notify the former President, the Archivist, and the Attorney General in writing of the claim of privilege and the specific Presidential records to which it relates. After receiving such notice, the Archivist shall not disclose the privileged records unless directed to do so by an incumbent President or by a final court order.

Sec. 4. Claim of Executive Privilege by Former President.

(a) Upon receipt of a claim of Executive privilege by a former President, the Archivist shall consult with the Attorney General (through the Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel), the Counsel to the President, and such other Federal agencies as he deems appropriate concerning the Archivist's determination as to whether to honor the former President's claim of privilege or istead to disclose the Presidential records notwithstanding the claim of privilege. An determination under section 3 of this Order that Executive privilege shall not be invoked by the incumbent President shall not prejudice the Archivist's determination with respect to the former President's claim of privilege.

(b) In making the determination referred to in subsection (a) of this section, the Archivist shall abide by any instructions given him by the incumbent President or his designee unless otherwise directed by a final court order. The Archivist shall notify the incumbent and former Presidents of his determination at least 30 days prior to disclosure of the Presidential records, unless a shorter time period is required in the circumstances set forth in section 1270.44 of the NARA regulations. Copies of the notice for the incumbent President shall be delivered to the President (through the Counsel the President) and the Attorney General (through the Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel). The copy of the notice for the former President shall be delivered to the former President or his designated representative.

Sec. 5. Judicial Review. This Order is intended only to improve the internal management of the Executive branch and is not intended to create any right or benefit, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law by a party against the United States, its agencies, its officers, or any person.

November 2, 2001

Dear Chairman Horn:

I have learned that on November 6 the House Subcommittee on Government Efficiency, Financial Management, and Intergovernmental Relations will hold its previously postponed hearing on the Presidential Records Act. In advance of that hearing, we wanted to inform you of a recent development.

President Bush yesterday signed an executive order implementing section 2204(c) of the Presidential Records Act, the provision of the Act that states: "Nothing in this Act shall be construed to confirm, limit, or expand any constitutionally-based privilege which may be available to an incumbent or former President." That statutory provision is necessary, of course, to the Act's constitutionality, for the Supreme Court held in 1977 that both former and current Presidents retain the constitutional right to assert privileges over the records of a former President, including after expiration of a 12-year period of presumptive non-disclosure. See Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425 (1977). Furthermore, Congress contemplated that such constitutional privileges would be available and could be asserted, even after expiration of the 12-year period: At the time the Act was enacted, Senator Percy stated that if a President "believe[d] that the 12-year closure period does not suffice, that President could object to the release of some document in the 13th or 15th or 20th year." Cong. Record S36844 (Oct. 13, 1978).

The Act and its legislative history, as well as the Supreme Court's decision in Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, obviously necessitate procedures for former and current Presidents to review Presidential records of a former President and, if they choose, to assert constitutional privileges. President Bush's order responds to that need by establishing clear and sensible procedures for former and current Presidents to exercise their rights and responsibilities in a timely manner. The order replaces an earlier executive order (Executive Order 12667 of January 18, 1989) that had established some skeletal procedures for assertion of privileges over Presidential records and had provided that the current President would have the primary responsibility for asserting privileges over the records of a former President. President Bush's new order supercedes that prior order both to set forth clearer procedures and to establish, consistent with the Supreme Court's decision in Nixon v. Administrator of General Services and with what the Administration believes to be sound policy and procedure, that former Presidents are to have the primary responsibility for asserting privileges over their records. Indeed, section 4 of President Bush's order, which is its most critical component, provides that the current President will defer, absent compelling circumstances, to the decisions of the former President regarding the former President's records. In sum, therefore, the new executive order grants the current President less relative authority over the records of a former President than did the prior executive order. We believe this point is critical to a proper understanding of the executive order, and has been largely overlooked in public commentary thus far.

In addition, President Bush's order does not purport to guide former Presidents as to their privilege assertions. Section 9 of the order provides that the order does not purport to indicate "whether and under what circumstances a former President should assert or waive any privilege." Indeed, it would have been improper, if not illegal, for President Bush to attempt to limit or override the constitutional rights and privileges of former Presidents -- rights that have been guaranteed by the Supreme Court. But it also bears mention that Section 2 of the order refers to the historical practice before enactment of the Presidential Records Act by which former Presidents, over time, have released a vast majority of their records even though under no legal obligation to do so. We anticipate that this historical practice will continue. At a minimum, contrary to the claims of some commentators, there is no logical basis for assuming that former Presidents will exercise their constitutional and statutory authority to seek withholding of privileged records more aggressively than earlier Presidents -- from President Washington to President Carter -- exercised their plenary and far broader authority to withhold all records.

Finally, you should know that the Administration consulted extensively with the National Archives and Records Administration, the Department of Justice, and former Presidents' representatives before President Bush issued this order. We benefited greatly from that consultation.

Please do not hesitate to contact me if you have any questions about the order.

Sincerely,

Alberto R. Gonzales

Congress of the United States

November 6, 2001

Chairman Horn, Congresswoman Schakowsky, members of the Subcommittee, and Subcommittee staff, I am John Carlin, Archivist of the United States, and I thank you for the opportunity to appear before you this morning on the implementation of the Presidential Records Act. Mr. Chairman, I particularly want to thank you for holding this hearing and for your continued interest in the programs and responsibilities of the National Archives and Records Administration. We are fully aware that with the jurisdiction of this subcommittee, attention to NARA is your job. However, you have taken a particular interest in our mission during your career in Congress and the people of NARA and our many constituent groups thank you for that interest.

In order to set the foundation for this dialogue today, I would like to set out the history of the Presidential Records Act and provide the Subcommittee with an overview of our implementation to date. The Presidential Records Act (PRA) was enacted in 1978 to establish public ownership of the records created by subsequent Presidents and their staffs and to establish procedures governing the preservation and public availability of the records. As noted in the House Report accompanying the pending bill:

> The legislation would terminate the tradition of private ownership of Presidential papers and the reliance on volunteerism to determine the fate of their disposition. Instead, the preservation of the historical record of future Presidents would be assured and public access to the materials would be consistent under standards affixed in law. The primary function of the Presidential libraries remains unchanged. The libraries are to continue to provide information about their holdings and to make records available to researchers upon request on an impartial basis.

H. Rep. 95-1487, at 2-3 (95th Cong., 2d Sess., Aug. 14, 1978).

The PRA mandates that the Presidential records of an Administration be transferred to the legal and physical custody of the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) immediately upon the end of the President's last term of office. The Archivist of the United States is given the "responsibility for the custody, control, and preservation of, and access to, the Presidential records of th[e former] President." 44 U.S.C. § 2203(f)(1). The PRA also requires the Archivist to appoint a Library Director in "consultation with the former President." Id. § 2203(f)(2). The Library Director balances archival and public access considerations with national security, confidentiality, and privacy concerns.

Since its enactment, NARA has taken legal custody of the Presidential records of Presidents Ronald Reagan, George H.W. Bush, and William J. Clinton. The Reagan and Bush records are housed in Presidential Libraries in Simi Valley, California and College Station, Texas, respectively. The Clinton records are stored in a records storage facility in Little Rock, Arkansas, until they can be transferred to a Presidential Library that is being constructed by former President Clinton.

The PRA applies to all Vice-Presidential records in same manner as Presidential records, and affords the former Vice-Presidents the same authority as the former Presidents. Accordingly, all of the procedures and authorities that are ascribed in this testimony to the former Presidents also apply to the former Vice-Presidents (except that Vice-Presidential records may be stored at a separate location from the Presidential records).

Responsibilities of the Archivist of the United States Under the PRA

The PRA established Government control over Presidential records while codifying and preserving some of the basic practices that long existed with respect to the papers that Presidents had donated to the National Archives (dating back to President Hoover). As the House Report on the PRA bill stated: "It is anticipated that the Archivist will process the former Administration's papers in a manner roughly similar to current practices." H. Rep. 95-1487, at 15. The report also stated that "the determination whether access to a Presidential record or reasonably segregable portion thereof shall be restricted shall be made by the Archivist, in his discretion, after consultation with the former President." Id. § 2204(b)(3).

The PRA mandates that "[t]he Archivist shall have an affirmative duty to make such records available to the public as rapidly and completely as possible consistent with the provisions of this Act." Id. § 2203(f)(1). Overall, the PRA represents an effort to legislate a "careful balance between the public's right to know, with its vast implications to historians and other academic interests, and the rights of privacy and confidentiality of certain sensitive records generated by the President and his staff during the course of their White House activities." Floor Statement of Congressman Thompson, Cong. Rec., Oct. 10, 1978, at 34897.

Presidential Papers and Materials Prior to the PRA

Prior to the PRA, and with the exception of the materials of former President Richard M. Nixon, the Presidential papers and materials maintained under NARA's control at the Presidential Libraries of former Presidents Hoover, Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Ford, and Carter are controlled by the terms of the deeds of gift by which the former Presidents donated their records to the National Archives. Each of these deeds has provisions outlining categories of records that may be withheld from public access for some period of time. All of them seek to protect information that could harm national security, invade personal privacy, or cause embarrassment or harassment. Some also seek to protect documents involving confidential communications directly with the President. The deeds of Presidents Ford and Carter model the restrictions on the PRA exemptions.

In all instances, the Director of the Presidential Library, who is appointed by NARA in close consultation with the former President or representative, was given the independent authority and discretion to process and open the papers, with very limited involvement by the former President or representative. Living former Presidents in some cases would establish priorities for the processing of particular subjects or series of records. In other cases, a representative or review board was established – such as for Presidents Roosevelt and Kennedy because they died in office, as well as for Truman and Eisenhower – that exercised limited control over the decisions made by the Libraries. The boards' principal concern was with respect to the President's personal and family matters, and, in most cases, they disbanded after a short period of time.

Under these deeds of gift, NARA processed and opened Presidential materials based on the deeds and professional archival considerations. Moreover, because the materials at these Libraries were donated to the United States, they are not subject to request under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) or any other public access statute. This meant that the Library staff were able to process and open most records in an organized and systematic way based on how the records were filed or arranged. Such "systematic processing" is generally much more efficient and less time consuming than processing in response to FOIA requests. However, researchers have no legal recourse to challenge the withholding of records or delays in responding to requests.

The records of President Nixon are governed by the Presidential Recordings and Materials Preservation Act (PRMPA), 44 U.S.C. § 2111, note, which was passed by Congress in 1974 to ensure government control over the Nixon papers and tapes. The PRMPA also established a National Study Commission on Records and Documents of Federal Officials, which was charged with studying, among other things, "whether the historical practice regarding the records and documents produced by or on behalf of Presidents of the United States should be rejected or accepted and whether such practice should be made applicable with respect to all federal officials." Pub. L. 93-526, 88 Stat. 1695 (December 19, 1974), sec. 202. That commission produced a final report in 1977, and its recommendations were considered by Congress in drafting the PRA. See Hearings before a Subcommittee of the Committee on Government Operations on H.R. 10998 (the Presidential Records Act of 1978) and Related Bills, 95th Cong., 2d Sess., (Feb. 23, 28, Mar. 2, 7, 1978) (PRA Hearings).

Public Access to Presidential Records

Presidential records are not subject to public access requests during the President's term of office, and may be made available only by decision of the incumbent President. After the President leaves office, the records are also not available to public access requests for five years, unless NARA has processed an integral file segment sooner than five years. This five year period was intended principally to give NARA an opportunity to organize the records and begin systematic archival processing. At the end of the five year period, all Presidential records are subject to public access requests in accordance with the FOIA. However, for a period not to exceed 12 years from when the President leaves office, the President is authorized, but not required, to impose up to six Presidential restrictions (which must be imposed before the President leaves office and which are not subject to judicial review).

In addition, the PRA establishes that eight of the nine FOIA exemptions shall apply to Presidential records, which stay in effect after the Presidential restrictions expire. Congress specifically excluded Presidential records from the FOIA (b)(5) exemption concerning the deliberative process and other recognized privileges. Four of the six presidential restrictions are identical to corresponding FOIA exemptions: exemptions 1, for classified national security information; exemptions 3, for information protected by other statute; exemptions 4, for trade secrets and confidential business information; and exemptions 6, for unwarranted invasions of personal privacy. Presidential exemption 2 ("P2"), for "appointments to Federal office," has no

FOIA counterpart, but is subsumed, in large part, under FOIA exemption (b)(6). Presidential exemption 5 ("P5"), concerning "confidential communications requesting or submitting advice, between the President and his advisers, or between such advisers," is similar to FOIA exemption (b)(5), and protects the disclosure of presidential communications, deliberations, and other information that could be subject to a common law or constitutionally-based privilege.

Because the PRA subjects all Presidential records to public access through the FOIA, PRA Libraries open records almost exclusively in response to FOIA requests (or mandatory declassification review requests under Executive Order 12958 on Classified National Security Information), and have very little opportunity to conduct systematic processing of records after the first five years. Moreover, Congressional and grand jury investigations and other litigation has significantly limited systematic processing even during the first five years.

PRA Restrictions

The PRA does not mandate the Presidential restrictions, but rather makes clear that they may be narrowed or waived any time after the President leaves office. Moreover, in the legislative history, Congress anticipated that the Archivist to do just that:

> It is also expected that the Archivist will follow past practice in applying the restrictive categories in former Presidents' deeds of gift, and negotiate with the ex-President or his representative on an on-going basis to lessen the number of years chosen for particular mandatory restriction categories, to eliminate entire categories, or to permit release of particular records otherwise restricted.

H. Rep. 95-1487, at 15. Former Presidents Reagan and Bush have both narrowed the application of PRA exemptions P2 and P5 to their records, allowing significantly more records to be opened than what might otherwise be authorized. NARA will work with former President Clinton and his representative regarding the application of these exemptions as well.

The PRA also removes the authority to withhold Presidential records under FOIA exemption (b)(5) after the expiration of the P5 exemption. The elimination of a statutory exemption in no way prevents a proper assertion of Executive privilege by the former or incumbent President. As the PRA itself notes, the incumbent and former Presidents have clear legal authority to assert an Executive privilege over the Presidential records of former Presidents: "Nothing in this Act shall be construed to confirm, limit, or expand any constitutionally-based privilege which may be available to an incumbent or former President." 44 U.S.C. § 2204(c)(2). This provision reflects the holding by the Supreme Court that the constitutionally based privileges available to a President "survive[] the individual President's tenure." Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425, 449 (1977). Although the Supreme Court also noted the privileges are "subject to erosion over time after an administration leaves office." Id. at 451.

Special Access to Presidential Records

In addition to establishing procedures for public access, the PRA also establishes procedures for what NARA calls "special access" to Presidential records that are otherwise closed from public access. These special access provisions are designed to accommodate requests by Congressional investigators, Federal prosecutors, other parties in litigation, and the incumbent President for the ongoing business of the current Administration. However, prior to providing such access, NARA must notify the former and incumbent Presidents and provide them an opportunity to review the records and consider whether to assert any constitutionally-based privilege. Accordingly, either House of Congress, or a Committee or Subcommittee with appropriate jurisdiction, may request access to Presidential records. Similarly, Federal prosecutors may seek access through a grand jury subpoena, and other parties in litigation may seek access through court orders. The incumbent President may also obtain access to the records of a predecessor on behalf of his staff, such as the NSC, or any other agency, "for the conduct of current business." 44 U.S.C. § 2205(2)(B). The former President and his designated representative are always entitled to access to the Presidential records of his Administration.

That concludes my formal statement, Mr. Chairman, and I would be happy to answer any questions at the appropriate time.

Mr. Chairman, Congresswoman Schakowsky, and members of the Subcommittee: Thank you for affording me the opportunity to speak on behalf of the Administration on the important topic before you.

As you are aware, last week President Bush signed an executive order that implements the Presidential Records Act. Specifically, President Bush's executive order implements section 2204(c) of the Presidential Records Act. That section provides that the Act shall not be "construed to confirm, limit, or expand any constitutionally-based privilege which may be available to an incumbent or former President." In the Act, Congress thus expressly recognized that both the incumbent President and former Presidents might invoke constitutionally based privileges to prevent the disclosure of presidential records that might otherwise be disclosed pursuant to other provisions of the Act, including after the expiration of the 12-year period of presumptive nondisclosure under the Act. As Senator Percy explained, if a President "believe[d] that the 12-year closure period does not suffice, that President could object to the release of some document in the 13th or 15th or 20th year." Cong. Record S36844 (Oct. 13, 1978).

Congress's recognition that former Presidents, as well as the incumbent President, might assert constitutionally based privileges is consistent with, and compelled by, Supreme Court case law. In Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425 (1977), the Supreme Court embraced the view that "[u]nless [the President] can give his advisers some assurance of confidentiality, a President could not expect to receive the full and frank submissions of facts and opinions upon which effective discharge of his duties depends." 433 U.S. at 448-49. In order to provide this necessary assurance of confidentiality, the Court ruled that the President's constitutionally based privileges for confidential communications must "survive[] the individual President's tenure." Id. at 449. The Court further held that a former President, although no longer a government official, is entitled to assert constitutionally based privileges with respect to his Administration's presidential records, and it expressly rejected the argument that "only an incumbent President can assert the privilege of the Presidency." Id. at 448.

The Supreme Court's ruling that both a former President and the incumbent President are entitled to assert constitutional privileges with respect to the records of the former President, and Congress's express accommodation of that ruling in section 2204(c) of the Presidential Records Act, entail the need for procedures to govern review of any records to which such privileges may apply. President Bush's executive order establishes clear, sensible, and workable procedures that will govern the decisions by former Presidents and the incumbent President whether to withhold or release privileged documents.

Consistent with the Supreme Court's decision in Nixon v. Administrator of General Services and with sound policy, President Bush's executive order confers on former Presidents the primary responsibility for asserting privileges with respect to their presidential records. Indeed, by providing (in section 4) that the incumbent President will, absent compelling circumstances, defer to the former President's decision whether or not to invoke a privilege, President Bush's executive order grants the incumbent President less authority over the records of a former President than the incumbent President had under the previous 1989 executive order implementing the Act.

Let me emphasize, moreover, that the executive order is wholly procedural in nature. By its express terms, it does not, and is not intended to, "indicate whether and under what circumstances a former President should assert or waive any privilege." (Executive order § 9.) Nor does it in any respect purport to redefine the substantive scope of any constitutional privilege.

Before the Presidential Records Act took effect, former Presidents generally released the vast majority of their presidential records even though they were under no legal obligation to do so. The Administration anticipates that this historical practice will continue. Indeed, because the Act and the executive order give former Presidents less power to withhold records than they had before the Act was enacted, there is no reason to anticipate that former Presidents will exercise their constitutional privileges in a way that leads to greater withholding of records.

I hope that this information is helpful and would be pleased to respond to any questions you may have about this matter.

Anna K. Nelson

Subcommittee on Government Efficiency, Financial Management and Intergovernmental Relations

November 6, 2001

My name is Anna K. Nelson. I am the Distinguished Adjunct Historian in Residence at the American University. I have done research in five presidential libraries, Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson. I have also used the Nixon papers and done extensive research over the years at the National Archives in Washington. I was a staff member of the Public Documents Commission, 1976-77. Their report was partly responsible for the passage of the Presidential Records Act. From 1994-1998 I was a member of the John F. Kennedy Records Review Board.

Today I am representing the members of the American Historical Association, the Organization of American Historians, and the Society of American Archivists.

Influenced by the actions of former president Nixon, Congress passed the Presidential Records Act in 1978 for two reasons that are very apparent in the statute. First, to insure the protection of these records so they could not be destroyed. Second, to insure the records of the incumbent president would be open within a reasonable period of time. Declaring presidential records to be Federal Records, they protected the documents through Archives oversight. Establishing a time for disclosure, the statute gives a president twelve years to protect his records before they become available to the public. Meanwhile, other safeguards within the Act guaranteed that certain records, including national security records, could continue to be exempt from public scrutiny for many years to come. This law also deliberately excludes many personal papers of the president including diaries and private, political papers. With these exemptions, the Congress felt it had duly protected each former president.

Unfortunately, two days before he left office, President Ronald Reagan issued Executive Order 12667 which is now being used to nullify the Congressional intent to open presidential papers within a reasonable time. This Executive Order (E.O) required the U.S. Archivist to notify both the former and incumbent president when records are to be released after the 12 year period. After examining the records, the incumbent and former president can invoke Executive Privilege if they find records they do not wish to open. An incumbent president was given 30 days after notification by the Archivist to make his decision and respond. In other words, this E.O. allows Executive Privilege to be invoked long after the president has left office.

Taking advantage of the Reagan Executive Order, the Bush administration took 9 months to make their decision thus delaying the release of the Reagan records three time since taking office. Although the original E.O. provides for the president to "identify any specific materials," the Bush administration proceeded in a different way. Rather than examine the records, they began reviewing legal and constitutional issues raised by the potential release of sensitive documents, including, one assumes, the use of Executive Privilege to keep 12 year old records closed. The result of that review is new Executive Order dated November 29, 2001 which confirms the previous order while adding an additional set of regulations.

The papers of President Reagan are the first to be organized and opened under the Presidential Records Act. Thus the Reagan papers will set the precedent for all other papers opened under the Act. It is difficult to know just why President Reagan chose to allow the incumbent to review these records but by capitalizing on this review and further extending its provisions, the Bush Administration, unwittingly perhaps, has thwarted the intention of Congress to open these government records to the public. We should also note that neither Mr. Reagan nor President Bush put a time limitation on the incumbent's ability to review . For example, theoretically a president in 2050 can continue to review for closure the records of the current Bush Administration.

Mr. Chairman, now more than ever we need to know the history of our recent past. The policies made more than 12 years ago still affect us. We need to know about those policies, the failures as well as the successes so that we can understand our own recent history. The release of 12 - 25 year old records is not the same as yesterday's leak to a favorite journalist. Nor need we fear the release of national security information which is protected by the Presidential Records Act, the Freedom of Information Act and other statutes.

The records in presidential libraries have become more important to American history as the power of the presidency has grown with each passing year. Unfortunately, it is not unusual for past presidents and their staffs to worry about the content of papers they no longer remember. Yet, most presidents gain stature from an examination of their records which tend to highlight pervasive problems and illustrate the competence and skills of the president and his staff.

Congress passed the Presidential Records Act so that the American people could learn about their recent past. Congress acted wisely. This E.O. should not be allowed to nullify that Act.

Testimony of Scott L. Nelson

Attorney, Public Citizen Litigation Group

Hearing on "Oversight of the Presidential Records Act"
Before the Subcommittee on Government Efficiency, Financial Management

Good afternoon, Mr. Chairman and members of the Subcommittee, and thank you for inviting me to testify before you this afternoon. The subject of my testimony is the most immediate and controversial issue affecting implementation of the Presidential Records Act ("PRA" or "Act") – namely, the legality of the recently issued Executive Order concerning the assertion of constitutional privileges to bar releases of records under the Act. The Order is troubling in a number of respects. Most significantly, it violates the PRA – and exceeds the bounds of legitimate protection of executive privilege –because it gives a former president the power to veto public releases of materials by the National Archives.

Before I explain the basis for my conclusions, I would like to take a few moments to describe my background in this area of law. I am currently an attorney with the Public Citizen Litigation Group here in Washington. Public Citizen has long had an interest in ensuring public access to governmental records, including the materials of former presidents, and has been involved in much of the litigation that has established the governing legal principles in this area, including litigation over materials of former Presidents Nixon, Reagan, and Bush. My own experience in the area includes approximately 15 years spent in private practice representing former President Nixon and, later, his executors, in litigation involving access to the Nixon presidential materials under the special legislation that governs those materials – legislation that is similar in many respects to the PRA. Some of that litigation also involved Public Citizen, and are subject to a constitutionally based privilege of the former or incumbent president. Thus, to the extent that the Bush Order imposes standards that extend the secrecy of such materials beyond the PRA's 12-year limit, it is lawful only if those standards are constitutionally required. Clear judicial precedent indicates that they are not.

The most plainly improper feature of the Bush Order is its requirement that the Archivist withhold materials from the public whenever the former president has asserted a claim of privilege, even if the incumbent president disagrees with that claim. The Bush Order claims to find authority for this requirement in the Supreme Court's decision in Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425 (1977), which held, among other things, that a former president retains a limited right to assert executive privilege independently from the incumbent president. Although the Court recognized this right, it also emphasized that the protection afforded historical presidential records was limited and eroded steadily as time passed. Thus, while recognizing a former president's right to assert a claim of privilege, the Supreme Court by no means implied that all such claims were valid or that incumbent executive branch officials were bound to honor such claims regardless of their merit. Rather, the implication of Nixon v. Administrator was that although former presidents could make claims of privilege, the Constitution permits such claims to be evaluated and rejected by current executive branch officials when, as is usually the case, the public's need for access to historical materials involving official government actions outweighs the former president's attenuated interest in confidentiality after he has been out of office for a number of years.

These implications of Nixon v. Administrator were made explicit by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit a few years later in its decision in Public Citizen v. Burke, 843 F.2d 1473 (D.C. Cir. 1988). That case concerned a directive by the Reagan

Justice Department that closely parallels the terms of the Bush Executive Order. The Justice Department directive at issue in Public Citizen v. Burke instructed the Archives that it must defer to any claim of privilege asserted by former President Nixon to block public release of any of his presidential materials, which are held by the Archives under legislation that is applicable only to President Nixon but is similar to the PRA in its provisions encouraging public access to presidential records. The Justice Department argued that such deference was constitutionally required in order to protect the former president's ability to assert privilege claims under Nixon v. Administrator.

The D.C. Circuit, in an opinion written by Judge Silberman and joined by Judge Sentelle (both Reagan appointees) roundly rejected the Justice Department's view. The court held that the Archivist, as an executive branch official obligated to assist the incumbent president in fulfilling his constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, could not permissibly defer to a former president's claim of privilege if the claim was not legally proper. Thus, the court held, the Archivist (and the incumbent president) was obligated to assess independently a former president's assertion of privilege, to reject the claim if it were not well founded legally, and to release materials to the public as required by the statute if the privilege claim were rejected. The court further rejected the government's assertion – again echoed in the Bush Executive Order – that it is permissible for the Archivist to rubber-stamp a former president's privilege claim as long as a member of the public can challenge it in court. The court stated: "To say ... that [the former president's] invocation of executive privilege cannot be disputed by the Archivist, a subordinate of the incumbent President, but must rather be evaluated by the Judiciary in the first instance is in truth to delegate to the Judiciary the Executive Branch's responsibility" to carry out the law. 843 F.2d at 1479.

The reasoning of Public Citizen v. Burke applies fully here, and the Bush Executive Order is plainly incompatible with it. Under the PRA, the Archivist is required to make materials available to the public after the expiration of the 12-year restriction period, unless there is some valid constitutionally based privilege that bars their release. By compelling the Archivist to withhold release of materials whenever the former president makes a claim of privilege, regardless of its legal merit, the Bush Executive Order, like the Justice Department directive struck down in Burke, allows current executive branch officials (including the incumbent president) to abdicate their responsibility to conform their actions to the law. Indeed, by requiring materials to be kept secret even when the incumbent president disagrees with a former president's claim of privilege, the Bush Order explicitly requires the executive branch to take actions the president has determined are not legally justified, in clear violation of the constitutional duty to execute the law faithfully and in plain defiance of the PRA. Moreover, the Bush Order goes so far as to bind the administration to support the former president's privilege claims in court even when it disagrees with them – a truly extraordinary abdication of the executive branch's obligation of fidelity to the law. In these respect, the Bush Order is even more obviously unlawful than the Justice Department directive at issue in Burke.

Another respect in which the Bush Order departs from the terms of the PRA and from judicial precedents involving access to presidential historical materials is in its apparent insistence that a person requesting access to presidential materials must, even after the Act's 12-year restriction period has expired, show some specific, demonstrable need for access in order to overcome executive privilege. This requirement is a departure from the plain terms of the PRA, which makes such materials available under FOIA standards – standards that do not require the showing of any specific need. See 44 U.S.C. § 2204(c)(1). Moreover, the Order conflicts with another ruling of the D.C. Circuit in litigation over the Nixon materials, Nixon v. Freeman, 670 F.2d 346 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1035 (1982). In that decision, the Court of Appeals specifically rejected the argument that the constitutional privilege requires persons seeking access to presidential historical materials years after the president leaves office to show a specific need for access. Id. at 359. Because the privilege erodes with the passing of time, the court held that it was proper for the Archives to open materials to all comers, without a showing of need, and to place the burden on the former president to establish that particular disclosures would violate the privilege. That is exactly what the Presidential Records Act is designed to do. The new Executive Order, by contrast, turns the Act's requirement of public access on its head.

These are not the only features of the Bush Order that are legally suspect. The Order's provision that the constitutional executive privilege may be asserted by a deceased or disabled former president's family or personal representative is novel and highly debatable. The privilege is not, after all, a personal right of the former president. He is authorized to exercise it solely on behalf of the branch of government that he once headed. His family members or designees have no such claim of authority. To suggest, as does the Bush Order, that the incumbent president must defer to claims of privilege asserted not by a former officeholder, but simply by the former president's family, friends, or designees, threatens to expand the constitutional privilege beyond legitimate bounds.

5. The Bush Order Is Bad Policy. Beyond its legal flaws, the Bush Order threatens to subvert significantly the policies underlying the PRA. The PRA's premise is that public access to historically significant presidential records is desirable and that, once a decent interval has passed after a president leaves office, the grounds for restricting public access should be quite limited.

The Bush Order represents a substantial threat to the PRA's fundamental goals. First, it creates the possibility that a former president may indefinitely delay access to records while he simply considers whether to assert a claim of privilege. Second, it permits him to declare large blocks of the materials off-limits to public access merely by asserting a claim of privilege, which the Archivist must respect however unfounded it may be, and which may only be challenged in court by a requester who can show a specific, demonstrable need for access (whatever that may mean).

This is not to suggest that the representatives of former President Reagan, or any other former president, will consciously act in bad faith to bar access to their materials. But with the ability to block access will come the temptation to use it, particularly when records that are (or may be) embarrassing to the former president or his close associates are concerned. It is easy in such a situation for a former president to confuse his own personal interest in denying access with an institutional executive branch interest that might support a claim of privilege. And experience teaches time and again that, given the chance, officials often err on the side of over-withholding materials and asserting interests in secrecy that, upon inspection, are without justification. For these reasons, it is a bad idea to give former presidents carte blanche authority to direct the Archivist to withhold materials from the public. And since this bad idea is plainly not constitutionally required, there can be no justification for enshrining it in an Executive Order.

Nor can the Bush Order's expansion of the secrecy of historical presidential records be justified, as some in the administration have suggested, on the basis of national security concerns. Even without the new Order, the Presidential Records Act and existing Executive Orders on national security classification provide ample authority to prevent the release of materials that could potentially damage national security. Simply put, the Act already provides protection to properly classified information even after the expiration of the 12-year restriction period, and it will continue to do so with or without the Bush Order. See 44 U.S.C. §§ 2204(a)(1) & (c)(1).

The new Order extends the secrecy not of information relating to national security, but of materials relating to communications between the former president and his advisers that do not implicate national security. The 68,000-some pages of Reagan materials that the Archives notified the White House it was prepared to release in February of this year, for example, were materials that were not subject to protection for national security reasons (or to restriction under any of the other categories that survive the 12-year limit under the Act). Rather, they had been withheld from release solely because they reflected communications between the former president and his advisers that were subject to the 12-year restriction. The new Order would allow the former President (or the incumbent) to impose an indefinite, blanket ban on release of these materials even though they contain no sensitive national security information.

In addition, national security reasons can provide no possible justification for the Order's provisions that effectively give a former president veto power over the release of materials by the Archivist. It is the incumbent president, not his predecessors, who has the constitutional power and duty to make judgments about the nation's security needs. If the incumbent president sees no national security justification for keeping particular materials secret, there can be no reason to allow a former president to override that determination.

In the final analysis, what the Bush Order reflects is a fundamental change in the PRA paradigm. The PRA is premised on the notion that the public is entitled to access to historical presidential materials subject only to defined exceptions set forth in the statute. Only for a limited, 12-year period is that access subject to restrictions imposed by the will of the former president. After the 12 years expire, the only limits are those imposed by the statute or – in rare cases – by constitutional doctrines of privilege.

The Bush Order reflects another model entirely. It is an attempt to resurrect the pre-PRA regime in which access to presidential materials was controlled by the former presidents (usually through restrictions in the deeds of gift through which the former presidents donated their materials to the public). Thus, the Bush Order repeatedly states that the public will be permitted access to materials only if the former president and the incumbent decide to "authorize" access.

That is not what the PRA is all about. Under the PRA, it is the statute that "authorizes" public access, whether the former president (or the incumbent) approves or not. Only in the exceptional circumstances where the former or incumbent president has a legally enforceable, constitutionally based privilege can the access authorized by the statute be denied. The Bush Order is incompatible with this statutory scheme. It is bad policy and bad law. I urge this Subcommittee to do anything it can to discourage the administration from implementing it.

Thank you.

the principles established in that litigation are directly applicable to the issues posed by the new Executive Order.

1. The Presidential Records Act. The Presidential Records Act was enacted in 1978 to ensure permanent governmental control over presidential records and to broaden public access to them. In contrast to prior law, under which presidents were considered owners of all their papers, the PRA provides that presidential records are property of the federal government from the moment of their creation. Under the Act, they remain largely under the control of the president during his term in office. Once the president leaves office, however, the Act gives custody and control over the papers to the Archivist of the United States, and the National Archives and Records Administration ("NARA" or "the Archives") is responsible for processing the materials for release to the public under the terms of the Act.

Although the Act vests the Archivist with authority over presidential records, it does give former presidents the right to impose limited restrictions on public access to some of their materials. Specifically, the Act allows a president leaving office to direct that records falling within six specific categories may be kept from the public for up to 12 years after the president's last day in office. The categories of materials that may be restricted include, by way of example, information that is properly subject to national security classification, information whose release would infringe an individual's right to privacy, and trade secrets. One of the categories, and the one of most relevance for present purposes, encompasses confidential communications between the president and his senior advisers – that is, communications that are potentially within the scope of "executive privilege."

During the first five years after a president leaves office, the Act provides that none of his records will be generally available to the public, in order to allow NARA to gain control over the materials, move them into a presidential library, and begin the process of preparing them for public access. After the five years are up, any person may request access to presidential records, and the standards governing such a request are generally equivalent to those under the Freedom of Information Act. Between year five and year 12, however, no records that fall within any of the 12-year restriction categories may be released.

After the 12-year restriction period ends, all the former president's records become available for release to the public under FOIA standards – including, with one exception, FOIA's exemptions. The applicability of the FOIA exemptions means, for example, that classified materials, which are categorically exempt from release under FOIA, are not subject to release under the PRA even after the 12-year restriction period ends.

The one FOIA exemption that does not apply under the PRA is the so-called FOIA "exemption 5," which covers materials that are subject to the executive privilege. Thus, when the 12-year PRA restriction period for materials reflecting confidential communications between the president and his advisers runs out, those materials will generally not fall within any statutory exemption from public release (assuming they do not relate to national security matters). This reflects Congress' judgment that 12 years will generally be long enough to protect records containing the deliberations of the president and his advisers. After that lapse of time, the drafters of the Act concluded, the interest in public access to the historical record would outweigh any embarrassment that might otherwise attend the disclosure of the inner workings of the White House decisionmaking process.

To be sure, the Act does provide that it is not intended to limit (nor to confirm or expand) any constitutionally based privilege that may be available to the former president, or to the incumbent. And, at some level, the executive privilege is constitutionally based. But the Supreme Court has also emphasized that executive privilege is subject to "erosion over time" after a president leaves office. See Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425 (1977). The congressional judgment underlying the PRA is that that erosion would be such that, after the passage of 12 years, there would be little (if anything) in the president's communications with his advisers that should legitimately remain secret. To the extent that there may be some presidential communications that would remain constitutionally privileged against public release even after a lapse of 12 years, the Act's recognition of the possibility that the former president may have a constitutional privilege to assert provides the necessary safety valve to prevent any possible claim that its provisions for public access are unconstitutional.

2. The Reagan Presidential Records. To avoid problems that might result from the retroactive application of the PRA, it was made applicable beginning with the president who took office on January 20, 1981. That turned out to be President Ronald Reagan. Before leaving office, President Reagan invoked the maximum 12-year restriction for all categories of materials permitted under the Act, including the category of communications between the president and his advisers. President Reagan left office on January 20, 1989, and thus the 12-year restrictions expired on January 20 of this year, marking the first time in the history of the PRA that materials subject to the Act are available without regard to such restrictions – at least in theory.

Over the seven years that preceded the expiration of the 12-year restriction period, many requests for the release of Reagan presidential materials had been made at the new Reagan Presidential Library operated by NARA in Simi Valley, California. According to NARA estimates, over 4 million pages of records, from among the Library's total holdings of in excess of 40 million pages, had been opened to the public in response to those requests. From those files, however, NARA had withheld materials that were subject to the 12-year restriction imposed by President Reagan under the PRA. Among the materials withheld were about 68,000 pages of records that were withheld solely because they fell within the restriction category for communications between the former president and his advisers. In other words, these 68,000 pages were not subject to any other restriction (such as the restriction for materials that were national security classified).

When the 12-year restriction expired in January of this year, the 68,000 pages of materials reflecting communications between the former president and his advisers were no longer subject to any limitation on public access under the PRA. Accordingly, NARA advised the White House in February of this year that it intended to release those materials to the public. NARA provided this notification as required by an Executive Order issued by President Reagan shortly before he left office. That Order (Executive Order No. 12,667) provided that before the Archives released such materials, it must give at least 30 days' notice to both the incumbent and the former president, in order to give them the opportunity to assert any claim that a constitutionally based privilege prevents release of the materials. Notably, the Reagan Executive Order contemplated that if a former president made a privilege claim, the records that were the subject of the claim could still be released by NARA if the Archivist (acting subject to the direction of the incumbent president) rejected the claim of privilege. In that event, it would be up to the former president to seek judicial relief if he continued to press his claim of privilege.

Following the White House's receipt of the Archives' notice of intent to release the 68,000 pages of Reagan records, White House Counsel Gonzales three times extended the time permitted for the incumbent president's review of the materials under the Reagan Executive Order. The stated purpose of these extensions was to provide the White House Counsel's Office time to review what Mr. Gonzales referred to as "many constitutional and legal questions" raised by the impending release of these materials under the PRA. Pending the White House's review of those questions, the 68,000 pages of records have remained closed to the public for nearly ten months beyond the date when the restriction on their release under the PRA expired, even though no claim of a constitutionally based privilege has yet been made by the incumbent president. It is not yet known whether former President Reagan's representatives have asserted any claim of privilege as to any of the materials.

3. The New Executive Order. On November 1, 2001, the White House's review of "many constitutional and legal questions" culminated in the issuance of a new Executive Order governing the implementation of the PRA, which abrogates and supersedes the Reagan Order. The Bush Order sets forth procedures and substantive standards governing the assertion of claims of executive privilege by both former and incumbent Presidents following the expiration of the 12-year restriction period for materials involving communications between presidents and their advisers. The Bush Order has a number of troublesome features, which are described in detail below. The most striking of these is that it grants a former president the unfettered power to block the Archivist from releasing any materials to the public simply by making a claim of privilege (however unfounded that claim may be), leaving the burden on those who desire public access to challenge that claim in court.

The Bush Order does not only reverse the burden of seeking judicial review. It also, in contrast to the PRA (which makes access to presidential materials after the 12-year restriction period has ended available under FOIA standards that do not require requesters to show a need for access), asserts that "a party seeking to overcome the constitutionally based privileges that apply to Presidential records must establish at least a 'demonstrated, specific need' for particular records, a standard that turns on the nature of the proceeding and the importance of the information to that proceeding." Bush Order, § 2(c).

The Bush Order further provides that the Archivist must notify both the former president and the incumbent of any request for access to presidential records that are subject to the PRA, and must provide them with copies of the relevant records upon their request. Bush Order, § 3(a). The Order states that the former president shall review the records "as expeditiously as possible, and for no longer than 90 days for requests that are not unduly burdensome." Bush Order § 3(b). However, the Order goes on to provide that if the Archivist receives a request for an extension of time from the former president, the Archivist "shall not permit [public] access" to the materials, regardless of whether the former president's request is reasonable. Id. The Bush Order thus permits a former president to delay the release of materials indefinitely simply by requesting additional time to review them. Only after the former president has used whatever time he chooses to review the records must he advise the Archivist whether he "authorizes" access to the materials or whether he requests that some or all of the documents be withheld on the basis of a constitutionally based claim of privilege. Bush Order, § 3(c).

The Bush Order further provides that either concurrently with or after the review by the former president, the incumbent president has an unlimited amount of time in which to review any presidential materials that are subject to a request for access under the PRA. Bush Order, § 3(d). Upon completion of the incumbent's review process, the Order states that the incumbent is to decide whether he "concurs in" the former president's decision either to "request withholding of or authorize access to the records." Bush Order § 3(d). The Order tilts the scale in favor of secrecy by providing that "[a]bsent compelling circumstances, the incumbent President will concur in the privilege decision of the former President" and "will support" a former president's privilege claim "in any forum in which the privilege claim is challenged." Bush Order § 4.

When the incumbent president "concurs in" a former president's request that materials be withheld on privilege grounds, the Order provides that the incumbent shall so inform the Archivist, and that the Archivist thereafter shall not permit access to the materials unless both presidents change their minds or a court orders that the materials be released. Bush Order § 3(d)(1)(i). (Such a court order could only come about if a requester sued for access, since nothing in the PRA would permit the Archivist to bring an action against the former president or the incumbent to require that materials be released.)

Moreover, even when the incumbent president has found that there are "compelling circumstances" that require him to disagree with a former president's request that materials be withheld on grounds of privilege, the Bush Order provides that the Archivist is still forbidden to disclose the assertedly privileged materials to the public, "[b]ecause the former President independently retains the right to assert constitutionally based privileges." Bush Order, § 3(d)(1)(ii). Under such circumstances, the Bush Order provides that the Archivist must deny public access to the materials claimed to be privileged by the former president unless and until the incumbent president informs the Archives that both he and the former president agree to their release, or there is a final, nonappealable court order requiring that the records be released.

The Bush Order also provides that when the former president has "authorized access," the Archivist must nonetheless deny public access to records when the incumbent president so directs. Bush Order § 3(d)(2)(ii). Only when both the former president and the incumbent president "authorize access" does the Order permit the Archivist to grant public access to presidential records under the PRA. The Bush Order also forbids the Archivist to make presidential records available in response to judicial or congressional subpoenas unless both the incumbent and former presidents "authorize access" or there is a final, nonappealable court order requiring access. Bush Order, § 6.

Finally, the Bush Order purports to authorize private citizens other than a former president to assert constitutionally based privileges on behalf of a former president after he dies or when he is disabled. The Order provides that a former president may designate such a representative (or representatives) "to act on his behalf for purposes of the Presidential Records Act and this order." Bush Order, § 10. Upon the former president's death or disability, such a designated representative "shall act" on the former president's behalf, "including with respect to the assertion of constitutionally based privileges." Id. If the former president fails to designate such a representative, the Order provides that his family may do so. Id.

4. The Bush Order's Legal Flaws. The Bush Executive Order is fundamentally flawed, legally, constitutionally, and as a matter of policy. Although the Bush Order was described by administration officials upon its release as merely establishing a procedural mechanism for the assertion of privilege claims, the Reagan Executive Order that the Bush Order supersedes already provided more than adequate procedures for the assertion of privileges. What the Bush Order adds are new and improper substantive standards that displace and subvert the PRA's provisions for public access to presidential materials.

It must be remembered at the outset that the PRA is based on the concept that a president leaving office can impose only a 12-year restriction on materials reflecting communications with his advisers. Thereafter, those materials are presumptively open to the public unless they involve national security matters or other specific content exempt from disclosure, or unless they fall within the small category, which steadily diminishes with the passing of time, of materials that

Introduction

1. Plaintiffs, the American Historical Association, Hugh Davis Graham, Stanley I. Kutler, the Organization of American Historians, the National Security Archive, Public Citizen, Inc., and the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press bring this action under the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA"), 5 U.S.C. " 701 et seq., under their nonstatutory right to judicial review of unlawful executive action, and under the Presidential Records Act ("PRA"), 44 U.S.C. " 2201 et seq., to obtain a declaratory judgment that the Archivist of the United States and the National Archives and Records Administration ("NARA") must administer the Presidential Records Act without regard to the terms of Executive Order No. 13,233 (the "Bush Order"), and to compel the release of presidential materials of former President Ronald Reagan that are in the custody of NARA and are being withheld in violation of the PRA.

2. This Court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. " 1331 and 1361.

Parties

3. Plaintiff American Historical Association ("AHA") is a nonprofit membership organization founded in 1884 and incorporated by Congress in 1889 for the promotion of historical studies, the collection and preservation of historical documents and artifacts, and the dissemination of historical research. As the largest historical society in the United States, with approximately 15,000 members, the AHA serves as the umbrella organization for historians working in every period and geographical area. As a part of their historical research activities, AHA's members regularly request and make use of presidential and vice presidential records held by NARA, including the records of former President Reagan and former Vice President Bush.

4. Plaintiff Hugh Davis Graham holds appointments as the Holland N. McTyeire Professor of History and as Professor of Political Science at Vanderbilt University, as well as a three-year appointment as Adjunct Professor of History at the University of California at Santa Barbara. He is a member of both the AHA and the OAH. His historical research has emphasized the development of domestic federal policy since World War II, especially in the fields of education, civil rights, and immigration policy, and he has published a number of books in those and other areas. Professor Graham conducts much of his research in presidential libraries, Eisenhower through Reagan. Among the specific subjects he has researched at the Reagan Presidential Library is President Reagan=s civil rights policy. He is co-director of a conference on the Reagan Presidency to be held in March 2002 and co-editor of a volume of papers, The Reagan Presidency, to be published in 2003.

5. Plaintiff Stanley I. Kutler is Professor Emeritus of History and Law at the University of Wisconsin, where he has taught since 1964. He is the founder and editor of the journal Reviews in History and the author of many books and papers on American presidents. In his research, he makes extensive use of the records of former presidents and vice presidents at presidential libraries and other NARA facilities. Professor Kutler was historical consultant for the forthcoming Showtime film, The Day Reagan Was Shot, and made use of records from the Reagan Presidential Library for his work on the film.

6. Plaintiff National Security Archive ("the Archive") is an independent non-governmental research institute and library located at The George Washington University in Washington, D.C. The Archive collects and publishes declassified documents acquired through the Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA"). The Archive is the world's largest nongovernmental library of declassified documents, has published more than 500,000 pages of declassified documents in various formats, and has become the leading non-profit user of FOIA. The Archive has made extensive requests for presidential and vice presidential records in NARA's custody, including Reagan presidential records maintained by NARA at the Reagan Presidential Library and Bush vice presidential records maintained by NARA at the Bush Presidential Library.

7. Plaintiff Organization of American Historians ("OAH") is a nonprofit membership organization devoted to promoting the study and teaching of American history. The OAH's 11,000 members in the U.S. and abroad include individual historians working in a variety of scholarly settings as well as institutions such as libraries, museums, and historical societies. The OAH promotes the widest possible access to historical sources and scholarship, and supports the preservation, dissemination, and exhibition of historical sources. As a part of their historical research activities, the OAH's members regularly request and make use of presidential and vice presidential records held by NARA, including the records of former President Reagan and former Vice President Bush.

8. Plaintiff Public Citizen, Inc. ("Public Citizen"), is a public interest organization headquartered in Washington, D.C. Public Citizen is dedicated to protecting the rights of members of the public as both consumers and citizens. Public Citizen has long sought to preserve and advance the interest of citizens in open access to the records of their government, including presidential and vice presidential records. Public Citizen and its members regularly request government records and make use of them in their efforts to promote government reform and protect consumers.

9. Plaintiff Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press is a nonprofit, unincorporated association of reporters and editors dedicated to protecting freedom of the press and the right of journalists to open access to government information. The Reporters Committee has a longstanding interest in securing public and press access to presidential records.

10. Defendant John W. Carlin is the Archivist of the United States. In that capacity, he has custody and control under the PRA of all the presidential materials of former President Ronald Reagan as well as the vice presidential materials of former Vice President George H.W. Bush, and is charged with the responsibility of making them available to the public at the earliest practical date.

11. Defendant NARA is an agency of the United States operating under the direction of defendant Carlin. NARA is responsible for carrying out defendant Carlin's responsibilities under the PRA and has promulgated regulations implementing the PRA. The presidential records of former President Reagan are housed in NARA facilities including the Reagan Presidential Library in Simi Valley, California, and the vice presidential records of former Vice President George H.W. Bush are housed in NARA facilities including the Bush Presidential Library in College Station, Texas.

The Presidential Records Act

12. For much of our nation's history, the documentary materials generated during a president's term in office were largely subject to the president's control, both during and after his presidency, unless the president chose to donate them to the United States. Congress enacted the PRA in 1978 to limit presidential control over presidential records and to provide for public access to presidential records after a president leaves office. The PRA was made applicable to the materials of presidents beginning with the president who would take office on January 20, 1981, making President Ronald Reagan the first president subject to the PRA.

13. The PRA provides that when a president leaves office, custody and control over all his presidential records as defined in 44 U.S.C. § 2201(2) are immediately vested in the Archivist of the United States, 44 U.S.C. § 2203(f)(1), who thereafter is solely responsible for preserving and securing the records and preparing them for public access. The PRA specifically charges the Archivist with the "affirmative duty to make such records available to the public as rapidly and completely as possible consistent with the provisions of this Act." Id.

14. The PRA does not provide for public access to the records of an outgoing president for the first five years after the Archivist acquires them. 44 U.S.C. § 2204(b)(2)(A). After the expiration of the five-year period, the records become subject to public availability through the provisions of FOIA, which are incorporated in the PRA. Id. § 2204(c)(1).

15. The availability of presidential records through FOIA requests, however, is limited by an outgoing president's right to restrict certain records from access for a period not to exceed 12 years after he leaves office. 44 U.S.C. § 2204(a). Specifically, a president about to leave office may specify a period of restriction, not to exceed 12 years, for records that contain:

i. National security information that is "properly classified pursuant to ... Executive order," id. § 2204(a)(1);

ii. Information "relating to appointments to Federal office," id. § 2204(a)(2);

iii. Information "specifically exempted from disclosure by statute," id. § 2204(a)(3);

iv. "Trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential," id. § 2204(a)(4);

REV_00255237

v. "Confidential communications requesting or submitting advice, between the President and his advisers, or between such advisers," id. § 2204(a)(5); and

vi. Information "the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." Id. § 2204(a)(6).

16. After expiration of the 12-year restriction period, formerly restricted materials become available to the public through FOIA to the same extent as materials that were not restricted by the former president. The PRA provides that presidential records are subject to all the exemptions from release under FOIA, except for the exemption set forth in 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5), generally referred to as "exemption 5," which incorporates the "deliberative process" and "executive" privileges. 44 U.S.C. §§ 2204(c)(1).

17. The effect of these provisions is that, under the PRA, a president may prevent disclosure of records that reflect confidential communications with or among his advisers for no more than 12 years. Thereafter, such materials may not be withheld on the basis of nonconstitutional privileges that may otherwise shield deliberative executive branch communications, but must be released to the public unless they continue to fall into some other FOIA exemption (for example, the exemptions for materials that are properly subject to national security classification or that relate to law enforcement investigations), or unless there is some "constitutionally based" right or privilege that prevents public release. See 44 U.S.C. § 2204(c)(2).

18. The PRA provides that vice presidential records are also public property and are to be opened for access to the public on the same terms as presidential records. 44 U.S.C. § 2207. Thus, the 12-year limit on the restriction of confidential communications (id. § 2204(a)(5)) applies to vice presidential records as well.

19. The PRA provides that the Archivist must give the former president notice "when the disclosure of particular documents may adversely affect any rights and privileges which the former President may have." 44 U.S.C. § 2206(3). NARA has implemented this requirement through a regulation providing that whenever the Archivist intends to make public any presidential record, he must provide 30 days' notice to the former president to allow him (or his designated representative) to assert any rights or privileges that would foreclose access to the materials. 36 C.F.R. § 1270.46(a), (b), (d). NARA's implementing regulation further provides that the Archivist may reject such assertion of a right or privilege by the former president provided that the Archivist states the basis for his decision in writing and notifies the former president of the date on which he will disclose the records in question. Id. § 1270.50(c). The regulation further provides that when the Archivist rejects a former president's claim of privilege, public access will be withheld for an additional 30 days to allow the former president to seek judicial review. Id. § 1270.46(c), (d). Finally, the regulation states that a copy of any notice to the former president of the impending release of his records shall also be provided to the incumbent president. Id. § 1270.46(e).

The Reagan Executive Order

20. On January 16, 1989, President Reagan issued Executive Order 12,667, 54 Fed. Reg. 3403 (the "Reagan Order"), which purported to direct the Archivist with respect to the performance of certain of his functions under the PRA.

21. The Reagan Order provided that when the Archivist notified the incumbent and former presidents of his intent to open records, he also was required to "identify any specific materials, the disclosure of which [the Archivist] believes may raise a substantial question of Executive privilege." Reagan Order, § 2 (a).

22. The Reagan Order purported to empower the president or his "designee" to extend beyond 30 days the time during which the Archivist must withhold from release, pending review by the incumbent president, presidential materials otherwise subject to public access under the PRA. Reagan Order, § 2(b).

23. The Reagan Order provided that the incumbent president, acting on advice of the Attorney General and the White House Counsel, could assert executive privilege and, on that basis, direct the Archivist not to release records of a former president. The Reagan Order required the Archivist to abide by any such direction unless otherwise ordered by a court or by a sitting president. Reagan Order, § 3.

24. The Reagan Order also provided that a former president could assert a claim of executive privilege to seek to bar the Archivist from releasing materials to the public, but that the Archivist would not be bound to accept such a claim of privilege. The Reagan Order required the Archivist to abide by any direction from the incumbent president or his "designee" as to whether to accept or deny a former president=s claim of privilege, unless otherwise ordered by a court. Reagan Order, § 4.

The Reagan Presidential Materials

25. President Reagan left office on January 20, 1989. Thereafter, the Archivist received his presidential records, which include almost 44 million pages of documents, a great number of electronic records including e-mail messages, and many thousands of photographs and audio-visual materials. The Reagan presidential records are housed in the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library, a facility made available to the federal government under the Presidential Libraries Act (44 U.S.C. § 2112) and operated by NARA.

26. Before leaving office, President Reagan exercised his right under the PRA to restrict for the maximum period of 12 years all materials falling within the restriction categories specified by 44 U.S.C. § 2204(a)(1)-(6).

27. The 12-year period of restriction specified by President Reagan expired on January 20, 2001.

28. During the 12-year restriction period, NARA's Reagan Library opened to the public, in response to FOIA requests, approximately 4 million pages of documents. In accordance with the PRA, NARA withheld from public access documents that fell within any of the categories of material restricted by President Reagan, including the restriction category for "confidential communications" with advisers.

29. Members of plaintiff AHA were among those who requested access to Reagan presidential records, and who did not receive access to restricted records.

30. For example, Professor Graham made specific requests on July 10, 1996, and July 20, 1999, for Reagan presidential records concerning Edwin Meese's role in developing Reagan Administration policy on civil rights, affirmative action, and voting rights. In its responses to those requests on June 9, 1997, and August 24, 2000, NARA's Reagan Library withheld a total of 257 pages of records under the PRA's restriction category for "confidential communications."

31. As of the date the 12-year restriction period expired, NARA had identified approximately 68,000 pages of documents that were restricted solely because of President Reagan's invocation of the PRA's "confidential communications" restriction category. Those 68,000 pages of documents were not otherwise subject to restriction under the PRA or exempt from release under FOIA on grounds of national security classification or any other basis.

32. But for the "confidential communications" restriction, NARA would have made the 68,000 pages of documents available to those persons who requested them and to the public at large.

33. On or about February 28, 2001, NARA provided notice to President George W. Bush and to former President Reagan that it intended to disclose to the public the approximately 68,000 pages of Reagan presidential records that had formerly been restricted as "confidential communications requesting or submitting advice" and that were now no longer subject to that restriction as a result of the expiration of the 12-year period. NARA's notice did not state that any of the records "raise a substantial question of Executive privilege" within the meaning of § 2(a) of the Reagan Order.

34. As defendant Carlin has acknowledged in an article entitled "Presidential Papers and the NARA," published in the OAH Newsletter, there is "keen interest" in the 68,000 pages of formerly restricted Reagan presidential records "on the part of historians, journalists, lawyers, members of Congress, students, and others--all of them seeking to discover the inner workings of the Executive Office of the President in the not-too-distant past." Moreover, NARA's decision to notify the White House and former President Reagan of its intention to open these formerly restricted documents to public access reflected its determination that, but for the now-expired restriction imposed by former President Reagan, there was no statutory basis under the PRA for withholding them from the public.

35. NARA's notice to the White House was provided in two letters, both of which included records schedules that identified and described in general terms the 68,000 pages of formerly restricted records. The White House did not receive from NARA actual copies of the 68,000 pages of records that NARA intended to open to the public, nor did the president or his staff seek to review those records during the 30 days provided for in Executive Order 12,667.

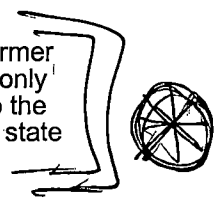
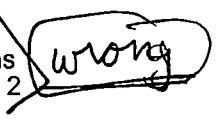
36. After receiving the Archives' notice, White House Counsel Alberto R. Gonzales twice sent letters to defendant Carlin instructing him to extend for 90 days the time for President Bush to review the materials and claim privilege under the Reagan Order. During the consecutive 90-day extensions that Mr. Gonzales granted to the White House, neither he, the president, nor other White House staff members reviewed the 68,000 pages of formerly restricted documents that NARA intended to open to the public. According to defendant Carlin in his OAH Newsletter article "Presidential Records and the NARA," rather than reviewing whether there was a basis for objecting to the release of particular documents that was consistent with the terms of the PRA, the White House was instead "conduct[ing] a thorough legal review of the PRA and consider[ing] its long-term implications on the deliberative process for the Presidency and the Executive Branch."



37. On August 31, 2001, Mr. Gonzales again wrote defendant Carlin, this time granting the White House a further, indefinite extension of time to respond to NARA's notice of intention to release the formerly restricted documents. Mr. Gonzales' letter confirmed that the White House had not been reviewing particular documents to determine whether a basis existed for the president to invoke a constitutional privilege against their release, but had instead been considering what Mr. Gonzales referred to as "constitutional and legal questions" in order to arrive at some "legal framework and process" (other than the PRA and its implementing regulations) that would govern the release of the documents. The letter further stated that, at NARA's urging, the White House would consult with former presidents and review a "small sample of Presidential records" before taking action.

The Bush Executive Order



38. On November 1, 2001, President George W. Bush issued Executive Order 13,233 (the "Bush Order"), superseding the Reagan Order.

39. The Bush Order, entitled "Further Implementation of the Presidential Records Act," purports to set forth procedures and substantive standards governing the assertion of claims of executive privilege by both former and incumbent presidents following the expiration of the 12-year restriction period for materials involving communications between presidents and their advisers.

40. The Bush Order purports to describe the scope of the constitutional executive privilege of former presidents and vice presidents as well as incumbent presidents, and includes within that scope not only the privilege for confidential communications between the president and his close advisers, but also the common-law attorney-client and work-product privileges, the deliberative process privilege, and the state secrets privilege. Bush Order, § 2(a).

41. In contrast to the PRA, which makes presidential records available after the 12-year restriction period has ended under FOIA standards (which require no showing of need for access), the Bush Order asserts that "a party seeking to overcome the constitutionally based privileges that apply to Presidential records must establish at least a 'demonstrated, specific need' for particular records, a standard that turns on the nature of the proceeding and the importance of the information to that proceeding." Bush Order, § 2 (b).

42. The Bush Order provides that the Archivist must notify both the former president and the incumbent of any request for access to presidential records that are subject to the PRA, and must provide them with copies of the relevant records upon their request. Bush Order, § 3(a). The Order states that the former president shall review the records "as expeditiously as possible, and for no longer than 90 days for requests that are not unduly burdensome." Bush Order § 3(b). However, the Order goes on to provide that if the Archivist receives a request for an extension of time from the former president, the Archivist "shall not permit [public] access" to the materials, regardless of whether the former president's request is reasonable. Id.

43. The Bush Order provides that upon the completion of the former president's review, the former president shall either request that the records be withheld on the basis of executive privilege or "authorize access" to them. Bush Order § 3(c).

44. The Bush Order further provides that either concurrently with or after the review by the former president, the incumbent president has an unlimited amount of time in which to review any presidential materials that are subject to a request for access under the PRA. Bush Order, § 3(d).

45. The Bush Order states that, upon completion of the incumbent's review process, the incumbent shall decide whether he "concurs in" the former president's decision either to "request withholding of or authorize access to the records." Bush Order § 3(d). The Order provides that "[a]bsent compelling circumstances, the incumbent President will concur in the privilege decision of the former President" and "will support" a former president's privilege claim "in any forum in which the privilege claim is challenged." Bush Order § 4.

46. When the incumbent president "concurs in" a former president's request that materials be withheld on privilege grounds, the Order provides that the incumbent shall so inform the Archivist, and that the Archivist thereafter shall not permit access to the materials unless both presidents change their minds or a court orders that the materials be released. Bush Order § 3(d)(1)(i).

47. Even when the incumbent president finds that there are "compelling circumstances" that require him to disagree with a former president's request that materials be withheld on grounds of privilege, the Bush Order provides that the Archivist is still forbidden to disclose the assertedly privileged materials to the public, "[b]ecause the former President independently retains the right to assert constitutionally based privileges." Bush Order, § 3(d)(1)(ii). Under such circumstances, the Bush Order provides that the Archivist must deny public access to the materials claimed to be privileged by the former president unless and until the incumbent president informs the Archives that both he and the former president agree to their release, or there is a final, nonappealable court order requiring that the records be released.

48. The Bush Order further provides that when the former president has "authorized access," the Archivist must nonetheless deny public access to records when the incumbent president so directs. Bush Order § 3(d)(2)(ii). Only when both the former president and the incumbent president "authorize access" does the Order permit the Archivist to grant public access to presidential records under the PRA.

49. The Bush Order also forbids the Archivist to make presidential records available in response to judicial or congressional subpoenas unless both the incumbent and former presidents "authorize access" or there is a final, nonappealable court order requiring access. Bush Order, § 6.

50. The Bush Order purports to authorize surrogates to assert constitutionally based privileges on behalf of a former president. The Order provides that a former president or his family may designate a representative "to act on his behalf for purposes of the Presidential Records Act and this order." Bush Order, § 10. Upon the former president's death or disability, such a designated representative "shall act" on the former president's behalf, "including with respect to the assertion of constitutionally based privileges." Id.

51. Finally, the Bush Order provides that a former vice president may assert an independent claim of executive privilege to bar access to his materials under the PRA, and that such a claim will be subject to all the provisions of the Bush Order, including that the Archivist must withhold access to materials once such a claim has been made, regardless of its validity, until the former vice president agrees that the materials may be made public or a court so orders. Bush Order, § 11.

52. Defendant Carlin has publicly announced his intention to abide by and implement the Bush Order.

NARA's Continued Withholding of Records

53. During the months that have elapsed since former President Reagan's restrictions on the 68,000 pages of documents containing "confidential communications" expired, defendants Carlin and NARA have continued to withhold those documents from public access.

54. Former President Reagan's representatives did not, at any time between NARA's notice of its intent to open the 68,000 pages of records and the issuance of the Bush Order, review the 68,000 pages of records to determine whether a claim of privilege to bar the release of particular records would be made on former President Reagan's behalf.

55. President Bush and his aides have also not reviewed the 68,000 pages of records to determine whether to claim a privilege that would bar the release of particular records.

56. No one has asserted a constitutionally based right or privilege that would preclude release of the 68,000 pages of documents as otherwise required by the PRA.

57. As a result of the withholding of the 68,000 pages of records, plaintiffs have been denied the ability to make use of those records for historical research. For example, Professor Graham has been unable to review the documents withheld in response to his requests for records concerning Edwin Meese's role in civil rights policy, and his research in that area has been impaired as a result. Professor Graham and other members of the AHA and OAH who intend to participate in the upcoming March 2002 conference on the Reagan Presidency have been impeded in their ability to prepare for that conference B which was originally scheduled to allow scholars at least a year to work with the Reagan presidential records after the expiration of the 12-year restriction period B by the continued unavailability of the formerly restricted Reagan records.

First Claim for Relief B APA, Nonstatutory Judicial Review and PRA B Declaratory Relief Against Implementation of Bush Order

58. Plaintiffs incorporate the allegations of paragraphs 1 through 57 above.

59. The PRA requires the Archivist to release to the public presidential and vice presidential records formerly subject to the restriction for confidential communications between the president and his advisers after the 12-year restriction period has expired, unless an applicable FOIA exemption applies or the materials are subject to a valid claim that the Constitution bars release. Thus, after the 12-year period expires, only a valid, constitutionally based claim of right or privilege can bar release of records that are no longer subject to any statutory restriction or exemption from release. When the Archivist withholds such records from release in the absence of a valid claim of constitutional right or privilege, as defendant Carlin is now doing, he violates the express terms of the PRA.

60. The Bush Order violates the PRA by instructing the Archivist, after the expiration of the 12-year restriction period, to withhold the release of records that are not restricted under the Act and that are not subject to a valid claim of constitutional privilege. Terms of the Bush Order that are contrary to law include:

i. The Bush Order provides that access to materials may be delayed for an unlimited period of time after the expiration of the 12-year restriction period while a former president and the incumbent president "review" materials proposed for release by NARA, in violation of the PRA's commands that records may not be restricted after the 12-year period expires and that the Archivist has an affirmative duty to make them public as soon as possible;

ii. The Bush Order provides that when a former president makes a claim of executive privilege seeking to bar release of materials whose disclosure is otherwise required by the PRA, the incumbent president "will concur" in that claim absent "compelling circumstances," and "will support that privilege claim in any forum in which the privilege claim is challenged" B even if the privilege claim is legally improper or unfounded;

iii. The Bush Order provides that, regardless of whether the incumbent president "concurs" in a former president's claim of privilege under the "compelling circumstances" standard, the Archivist "shall not permit access to the records" unless and until the former president agrees, or a court orders that materials be released, even if the claim of privilege is legally improper or unfounded;

iv. The Bush Order provides that the constitutional privileges of the executive branch may be asserted by a surrogate who has never held the office of the presidency, if the surrogate has been "designated" to do so by a former president who is deceased or disabled or by the family of a deceased or disabled former president, even though the Constitution does not allow for assertion of a claim of executive privilege by someone who has not held the office of president; and

v. The Bush Order provides that a former vice president may assert a claim of executive privilege independent of the privilege of the former or incumbent president, and the Order compels the Archivist to accord such a claim the same respect as a claim of privilege made by a former president, even though there is no constitutional basis for a vice presidential executive privilege.

61. The Bush Order is also contrary to NARA's regulations. NARA's regulations explicitly provide that when a former president asserts a claim of privilege seeking to bar access to a presidential record, the Archivist may "nevertheless determin[e] that the record in question should be disclosed" (36 C.F.R. § 1270.46(c)) and may open the record to the public 30 days after giving the former president notice of the denial of his claim of privilege. Id. § 1270.46(d). The Bush Order's command that the Archivist withhold records whenever the former president asserts a claim of privilege is directly at odds with these regulatory provisions. The regulations, having been lawfully promulgated under the notice-and-comment procedures of the APA (5 U.S.C. § 553) pursuant to authority properly delegated to NARA by the PRA (see 44 U.S.C. § 2206), take precedence over the Bush Order, which is based on no statutory authority and was issued without adherence to the APA rulemaking process.

62. The terms of the Bush Order are not required by, and are in fact contrary to, the proper constitutional scope of executive privilege.

63. The issuance and implementation of the Bush Order have harmed and will continue to harm the plaintiffs and their members by depriving them of access to presidential and vice presidential records and the ability to make use of those records for historical research.

64. Implementation of the Bush Order by the Archivist constitutes agency action that is arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, not in accordance with law, and in excess of statutory authority and limitations within the meaning of the APA (5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A)&(C)). Plaintiffs have a right to judicial review of, and declaratory relief against, such action under 5 U.S.C. " 702, 704 and 706 and 28 U.S.C. § 2201.

65. In the alternative, and regardless of whether there has yet been agency action with respect to the Bush Order, plaintiffs have a nonstatutory right to obtain judicial review of the lawfulness of the Bush Order's restrictions on the defendants' ability to comply with their legal obligations. Because the Bush Order is contrary to the terms of the PRA and lacks a valid constitutional basis, plaintiffs are entitled to a declaration under 28 U.S.C. § 2201 that the Order is unlawful and that the defendants may not implement it.

Second Claim for Relief B APA and PRA B Injunction Requiring Release of Records

66. Plaintiffs incorporate the allegations of paragraphs 1 through 65 above.

67. The approximately 68,000 pages of materials that were the subject of NARA's notice to the White House on February 28, 2001, are "presidential records" of Ronald Reagan as defined by the PRA, 44 U.S.C. § 2201(2), and thus are required to be "administered in accordance with the provisions of [the PRA]." 44 U.S.C. § 2202.

68. Under the PRA, defendants Carlin and NARA are "responsib[le] for the custody, control, and preservation of, and access to" the Reagan presidential records, and they "have an affirmative duty to make such records available to the public as rapidly and completely as possible consistent with the provisions of this Act." 44 U.S.C § 2203(f)(1).

69. The 12-year restriction imposed by former President Reagan under the PRA against release of records containing "confidential communications requesting or submitting advice, between the President and his advisers, or between such advisers" (44 U.S.C. § 2204(a)(5)) expired on January 20, 2001. The PRA does not permit extension of this restriction beyond the 12-year limit.

70. There is no statutory basis for the invocation of any nonconstitutional privilege to withhold the 68,000 pages of records, since FOIA's "exemption 5," 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5), which otherwise would permit invocation of such privileges, is inapplicable to records under the PRA. See 44 U.S.C. § 2204(c)(1).

71. NARA has determined that the 68,000 pages of formerly restricted records are not subject to any statutory bar to disclosure under the PRA and has stated its intention that they should be opened to the public. There is no statutory basis under the PRA for withholding these materials, and no such basis has been asserted by former President Reagan or by President Bush. Defendants' continued withholding of the records is therefore contrary to law.

72. Because the Bush Order is unlawful and in violation of the PRA, its terms cannot be relied upon as a basis for continued withholding of the 68,000 pages of records.

73. Defendants have a mandatory, nondiscretionary duty to make the 68,000 pages of Reagan presidential records available to the public.

74. Plaintiffs and their members have been injured and continue to suffer injury through the denial of access to the 68,000 pages of records and the deprivation of the opportunity to make use of them for historical research.

75. The refusal by defendants Carlin and NARA to make the 68,000 pages of formerly restricted materials available to the public upon the conclusion of the 12-year restriction period in accordance with

Representative Doug Ose
Opening Statement
Opening a New Door to History: The Presidential Records Act Takes Effect
November 6, 2001

Last February, after press accounts of President Clinton's last financial disclosure report and some furniture gifts which were ultimately returned by the Clintons to the White House residence, the Subcommittee on Energy Policy, Natural Resources and Regulatory Affairs, which I chair, began an investigation of Presidential gifts. Among other records, the Subcommittee sought to examine the White House Gifts Unit's database and related records for the Clinton Administration. As a consequence, I have first-hand experience with requests, under the Presidential Records Act of 1978, for Presidential records relevant to a Congressional investigation.

President Reagan's 1989 Executive Order (E.O. 12267) expanded on the implementing regulations issued by National Archives and Records Administration (NARA). NARA's regulations were authorized by Section 2206 of the Act. The Order clarified some areas not specifically addressed in NARA's regulations. Most importantly, the Order identified only three areas where access to Presidential records could be limited -- if disclosure might impair national security, law enforcement, or the deliberative processes of the executive branch. I asked President Clinton's representative which of these three privileges, if any, could be asserted to deny my request for access to specific records. In the end, President Clinton's representative claimed no privileges for any of the requested records. As a result, NARA provided the Subcommittee with unfettered access to the requested records.

President Bush's new Executive Order (E.O. 13223), issued last Thursday, changed these access limitations. In a nutshell, law enforcement is dropped and two areas are added: "communications of the President or his advisors (the presidential communications privilege); [and] legal advice or legal work (the attorney-client or attorney work product privileges)." I am deeply concerned about the two new, broad limitations in the Order. Both - especially the Presidential communications privilege - could severely limit Congressional access to key documents in its investigations of a former Administration.

In today's hearing, I plan to question the Bush Administration's witnesses about the legal and substantive justification for this restrictive policy change. The bottom line is that the new Order appears to violate not only the spirit but also the letter of the Presidential Records Act. In 1978, Congress expressed its clear intent to make Presidential records available for Congressional investigations and then for the public after a 12-year period. This new Order undercuts the public's rights to be fully informed about how its government operated in the past.

STATEMENT
by John W. Carlin Archivist of the United States to the Subcommittee on Government Efficiency, Financial Management, and Intergovernmental Relations of the Committee on Government Reform

House of Representatives
Congress of the United States

November 6, 2001

Chairman Horn, Congresswoman Schakowsky, members of the Subcommittee, and Subcommittee staff, I am John Carlin, Archivist of the United States, and I thank you for the opportunity to appear before you this morning on the implementation of the Presidential Records Act. Mr. Chairman, I particularly want to thank you for holding this hearing and for your continued interest in the programs and responsibilities of the National Archives and Records Administration. We are fully aware that with the jurisdiction of this subcommittee, attention to NARA is your job. However, you have taken a particular interest in our mission during your career in Congress and the people of NARA and our many constituent groups thank you for that interest.

In order to set the foundation for this dialogue today, I would like to set out the history of the Presidential Records Act and provide the Subcommittee with an overview of our implementation to date. The Presidential Records Act (PRA) was enacted in 1978 to establish public ownership of the records created by subsequent Presidents and their staffs and to establish procedures governing the preservation and public availability of the records. As noted in the House Report accompanying the pending bill:

> The legislation would terminate the tradition of private ownership of Presidential papers and the reliance on volunteerism to determine the fate of their disposition. Instead, the preservation of the historical record of future Presidents would be assured and public access to the materials would be consistent under standards affixed in law. The primary function of the Presidential libraries remains unchanged. The libraries are to continue to provide information about their holdings and to make records available to researchers upon request on an impartial basis.

H. Rep. 95-1487, at 2-3 (95th Cong., 2d Sess., Aug. 14, 1978).

The PRA mandates that the Presidential records of an Administration be transferred to the legal and physical custody of the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) immediately upon the end of the President's last term of office. The Archivist of the United States is given the "responsibility for the custody, control, and preservation of, and access to, the Presidential records of th[e former] President." 44 U.S.C. § 2203(f)(1). The PRA also requires the Archivist to appoint a Library Director in "consultation with the former President." Id. § 2203(f)(2). The Library Director balances archival and public access considerations with national security, confidentiality, and privacy concerns.

Since its enactment, NARA has taken legal custody of the Presidential records of Presidents Ronald Reagan, George H.W. Bush, and William J. Clinton. The Reagan and Bush records are housed in Presidential Libraries in Simi Valley, California and College Station, Texas, respectively. The Clinton records are stored in a records storage facility in Little Rock, Arkansas, until they can be transferred to a Presidential Library that is being constructed by former President Clinton.

The PRA applies to all Vice-Presidential records in same manner as Presidential records, and affords the former Vice-Presidents the same authority as the former Presidents. Accordingly, all of the procedures and authorities that are ascribed in this testimony to the former Presidents also apply to the former Vice-Presidents (except that Vice-Presidential records may be stored at a separate location from the Presidential records).

The PRA established Government control over Presidential records while codifying and preserving some of the basic practices that long existed with respect to the papers that Presidents had donated to the National Archives (dating back to President Hoover). As the House Report on the PRA bill stated: "It is anticipated that the Archivist will process the former Administration's papers in a manner roughly similar to current practices." H. Rep. 95-1487, at 15. The report also stated that "the determination whether access to a Presidential record or reasonably segregable portion thereof shall be restricted shall be made by the Archivist, in his discretion, after consultation with the former President." Id. § 2204(b)(3).

The PRA mandates that "[t]he Archivist shall have an affirmative duty to make such records available to the public as rapidly and completely as possible consistent with the provisions of this Act." Id. § 2203(f)(1). Overall, the PRA represents an effort to legislate a "careful balance between the public's right to know, with its vast implications to historians and other academic interests, and the rights of privacy and confidentiality of certain sensitive records generated by the President and his staff during the course of their White House activities." Floor Statement of Congressman Thompson, Cong. Rec., Oct. 10, 1978, at 34897.

Presidential Papers and Materials Prior to the PRA

Prior to the PRA, and with the exception of the materials of former President Richard M. Nixon, the Presidential papers and materials maintained under NARA's control at the Presidential Libraries of former Presidents Hoover, Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Ford, and Carter are controlled by the terms of the deeds of gift by which the former Presidents donated their records to the National Archives. Each of these deeds has provisions outlining categories of records that may be withheld from public access for some period of time. All of them seek to protect information that could harm national security, invade personal privacy, or cause embarrassment or harassment. Some also seek to protect documents involving confidential communications directly with the President. The deeds of Presidents Ford and Carter model the restrictions on the PRA exemptions.

In all instances, the Director of the Presidential Library, who is appointed by NARA in close consultation with the former President or representative, was given the independent authority and discretion to process and open the papers, with very limited involvement by the former President or representative. Living former Presidents in some cases would establish priorities for the processing of particular subjects or series of records. In other cases, a representative or review board was established – such as for Presidents Roosevelt and Kennedy because they died in office, as well as for Truman and Eisenhower – that exercised limited control over the decisions made by the Libraries. The boards' principal concern was with respect to the President's personal and family matters, and, in most cases, they disbanded after a short period of time.

Under these deeds of gift, NARA processed and opened Presidential materials based on the deeds and professional archival considerations. Moreover, because the materials at these Libraries were donated to the United States, they are not subject to request under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) or any other public access statute. This meant that the Library staff were able to process and open most records in an organized and systematic way based on how the records were filed or arranged. Such "systematic processing" is generally much more efficient and less time consuming than processing in response to FOIA requests. However, researchers have no legal recourse to challenge the withholding of records or delays in responding to requests.

The records of President Nixon are governed by the Presidential Recordings and Materials Preservation Act (PRMPA), 44 U.S.C. § 2111, note, which was passed by Congress in 1974 to ensure government control over the Nixon papers and tapes. The PRMPA also established a National Study Commission on Records and Documents of Federal Officials, which was charged with studying, among other things, "whether the historical practice regarding the records and documents produced by or on behalf of Presidents of the United States should be rejected or accepted and whether such practice should be made applicable with respect to all federal officials." Pub. L. 93-526, 88 Stat. 1695 (December 19, 1974), sec. 202. That commission produced a final report in 1977, and its recommendations were considered by Congress in drafting the PRA. See Hearings before a Subcommittee of the Committee on Government

Presidential records are not subject to public access requests during the President's term of office, and may be made available only by decision of the incumbent President. After the President leaves office, the records are also not available to public access requests for five years, unless NARA has processed an integral file segment sooner than five years. This five year period was intended principally to give NARA an opportunity to organize the records and begin systematic archival processing. At the end of the five year period, all Presidential records are subject to public access requests in accordance with the FOIA. However, for a period not to exceed 12 years from when the President leaves office, the President is authorized, but not required, to impose up to six Presidential restrictions (which must be imposed before the President leaves office and which are not subject to judicial review).

In addition, the PRA establishes that eight of the nine FOIA exemptions shall apply to Presidential records, which stay in effect after the Presidential restrictions expire. Congress specifically excluded Presidential records from the FOIA (b)(5) exemption concerning the deliberative process and other recognized privileges. Four of the six presidential restrictions are identical to corresponding FOIA exemptions: exemptions 1, for classified national security information; exemptions 3, for information protected by other statute; exemptions 4, for trade secrets and confidential business information; and exemptions 6, for unwarranted invasions of personal privacy. Presidential exemption 2 ("P2"), for "appointments to Federal office," has no

FOIA counterpart, but is subsumed, in large part, under FOIA exemption (b)(6). Presidential exemption 5 ("P5"), concerning "confidential communications requesting or submitting advice, between the President and his advisers, or between such advisers," is similar to FOIA exemption (b)(5), and protects the disclosure of presidential communications, deliberations, and other information that could be subject to a common law or constitutionally-based privilege.

Because the PRA subjects all Presidential records to public access through the FOIA, PRA Libraries open records almost exclusively in response to FOIA requests (or mandatory declassification review requests under Executive Order 12958 on Classified National Security Information), and have very little opportunity to conduct systematic processing of records after the first five years. Moreover, Congressional and grand jury investigations and other litigation has significantly limited systematic processing even during the first five years.

PRA Restrictions

The PRA does not mandate the Presidential restrictions, but rather makes clear that they may be narrowed or waived any time after the President leaves office. Moreover, in the legislative history, Congress anticipated that the Archivist to do just that:

> It is also expected that the Archivist will follow past practice in applying the restrictive categories in former Presidents' deeds of gift, and negotiate with the ex-President or his representative on an on-going basis to lessen the number of years chosen for particular mandatory restriction categories, to eliminate entire categories, or to permit release of particular records otherwise restricted.

H. Rep. 95-1487, at 15. Former Presidents Reagan and Bush have both narrowed the application of PRA exemptions P2 and P5 to their records, allowing significantly more records to be opened than what might otherwise be authorized. NARA will work with former President Clinton and his representative regarding the application of these exemptions as well.

The PRA also removes the authority to withhold Presidential records under FOIA exemption (b)(5) after the expiration of the P5 exemption. The elimination of a statutory exemption in no way prevents a proper assertion of Executive privilege by the former or incumbent President. As the PRA itself notes, the incumbent and former Presidents have clear legal authority to assert an Executive privilege over the Presidential records of former Presidents: "Nothing in this Act shall be construed to confirm, limit, or expand any constitutionally-based privilege which may be available to an incumbent or former President." 44 U.S.C. § 2204(c)(2). This provision reflects the holding by the Supreme Court that the constitutionally based privileges available to a President "survive[] the individual President's tenure." Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425, 449 (1977). Although the Supreme Court also noted the privileges are "subject to erosion over time after an administration leaves office." Id. at 451.

Special Access to Presidential Records

In addition to establishing procedures for public access, the PRA also establishes procedures for what NARA calls "special access" to Presidential records that are otherwise closed from public access. These special access provisions are designed to accommodate requests by Congressional investigators, Federal prosecutors, other parties in litigation, and the incumbent President for the ongoing business of the current Administration. However, prior to providing such access, NARA must notify the former and incumbent Presidents and provide them an opportunity to review the records and consider whether to assert any constitutionally-based privilege. Accordingly, either House of Congress, or a Committee or Subcommittee with appropriate jurisdiction, may request access to Presidential records. Similarly, Federal prosecutors may seek access through a grand jury subpoena, and other parties in litigation may seek access through court orders. The incumbent President may also obtain access to the records of a predecessor on behalf of his staff, such as the NSC, or any other agency, "for the conduct of current business." 44 U.S.C. § 2205(2)(B). The former President and his designated representative are always entitled to access to the Presidential records of his Administration.

That concludes my formal statement, Mr. Chairman, and I would be happy to answer any questions at the appropriate time.

Testimony of Scott L. Nelson

Attorney, Public Citizen Litigation Group

Hearing on "Oversight of the Presidential Records Act"
Before the Subcommittee on Government Efficiency, Financial Management

Good afternoon, Mr. Chairman and members of the Subcommittee, and thank you for inviting me to testify before you this afternoon. The subject of my testimony is the most immediate and controversial issue affecting implementation of the Presidential Records Act ("PRA" or "Act") – namely, the legality of the recently issued Executive Order concerning the assertion of constitutional privileges to bar releases of records under the Act. The Order is troubling in a number of respects. Most significantly, it violates the PRA – and exceeds the bounds of legitimate protection of executive privilege –because it gives a former president the power to veto public releases of materials by the National Archives.

Before I explain the basis for my conclusions, I would like to take a few moments to describe my background in this area of law. I am currently an attorney with the Public Citizen Litigation Group here in Washington. Public Citizen has long had an interest in ensuring public access to governmental records, including the materials of former presidents, and has been involved in much of the litigation that has established the governing legal principles in this area, including litigation over materials of former Presidents Nixon, Reagan, and Bush. My own experience in the area includes approximately 15 years spent in private practice representing former President Nixon and, later, his executors, in litigation involving access to the Nixon presidential materials under the special legislation that governs those materials – legislation that is similar in many respects to the PRA. Some of that litigation also involved Public Citizen, and are subject to a constitutionally based privilege of the former or incumbent president. Thus, to the extent that the Bush Order imposes standards that extend the secrecy of such materials beyond the PRA's 12-year limit, it is lawful only if those standards are constitutionally required. Clear judicial precedent indicates that they are not.

The most plainly improper feature of the Bush Order is its requirement that the Archivist withhold materials from the public whenever the former president has asserted a claim of privilege, even if the incumbent president disagrees with that claim. The Bush Order claims to find authority for this requirement in the Supreme Court's decision in Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425 (1977), which held, among other things, that a former president retains a limited right to assert executive privilege independently from the incumbent president. Although the Court recognized this right, it also emphasized that the protection afforded historical presidential records was limited and eroded steadily as time passed. Thus, while recognizing a former president's right to assert a claim of privilege, the Supreme Court by no means implied that all such claims were valid or that incumbent executive branch officials were bound to honor such claims regardless of their merit. Rather, the implication of Nixon v. Administrator was that although former presidents could make claims of privilege, the Constitution permits such claims to be evaluated and rejected by current executive branch officials when, as is usually the case, the public's need for access to historical materials involving official government actions outweighs the former president's attenuated interest in confidentiality after he has been out of office for a number of years.

These implications of Nixon v. Administrator were made explicit by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit a few years later in its decision in Public Citizen v. Burke, 843 F.2d 1473 (D.C. Cir. 1988). That case concerned a directive by the Reagan

Justice Department that closely parallels the terms of the Bush Executive Order. The Justice Department directive at issue in Public Citizen v. Burke instructed the Archives that it must defer to any claim of privilege asserted by former President Nixon to block public release of any of his presidential materials, which are held by the Archives under legislation that is applicable only to President Nixon but is similar to the PRA in its provisions encouraging public access to presidential records. The Justice Department argued that such deference was constitutionally required in order to protect the former president's ability to assert privilege claims under Nixon v. Administrator.

The D.C. Circuit, in an opinion written by Judge Silberman and joined by Judge Sentelle (both Reagan appointees) roundly rejected the Justice Department's view. The court held that the Archivist, as an executive branch official obligated to assist the incumbent president in fulfilling his constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, could not permissibly defer to a former president's claim of privilege if the claim was not legally proper. Thus, the court held, the Archivist (and the incumbent president) was obligated to assess independently a former president's assertion of privilege, to reject the claim if it were not well founded legally, and to release materials to the public as required by the statute if the privilege claim were rejected. The court further rejected the government's assertion – again echoed in the Bush Executive Order – that it is permissible for the Archivist to rubber-stamp a former president's privilege claim as long as a member of the public can challenge it in court. The court stated: "To say ... that [the former president's] invocation of executive privilege cannot be disputed by the Archivist, a subordinate of the incumbent President, but must rather be evaluated by the Judiciary in the first instance is in truth to delegate to the Judiciary the Executive Branch's responsibility" to carry out the law. 843 F.2d at 1479.

The reasoning of Public Citizen v. Burke applies fully here, and the Bush Executive Order is plainly incompatible with it. Under the PRA, the Archivist is required to make materials available to the public after the expiration of the 12-year restriction period, unless there is some valid constitutionally based privilege that bars their release. By compelling the Archivist to withhold release of materials whenever the former president makes a claim of privilege, regardless of its legal merit, the Bush Executive Order, like the Justice Department directive struck down in Burke, allows current executive branch officials (including the incumbent president) to abdicate their responsibility to conform their actions to the law. Indeed, by requiring materials to be kept secret even when the incumbent president disagrees with a former president's claim of privilege, the Bush Order explicitly requires the executive branch to take actions the president has determined are not legally justified, in clear violation of the constitutional duty to execute the law faithfully and in plain defiance of the PRA. Moreover, the Bush Order goes so far as to bind the administration to support the former president's privilege claims in court even when it disagrees with them – a truly extraordinary abdication of the executive branch's obligation of fidelity to the law. In these respect, the Bush Order is even more obviously unlawful than the Justice Department directive at issue in Burke.

Another respect in which the Bush Order departs from the terms of the PRA and from judicial precedents involving access to presidential historical materials is in its apparent insistence that a person requesting access to presidential materials must, even after the Act's 12-year restriction period has expired, show some specific, demonstrable need for access in order to overcome executive privilege. This requirement is a departure from the plain terms of the PRA, which makes such materials available under FOIA standards – standards that do not require the showing of any specific need. See 44 U.S.C. § 2204(c)(1). Moreover, the Order conflicts with another ruling of the D.C. Circuit in litigation over the Nixon materials, Nixon v. Freeman, 670 F.2d 346 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1035 (1982). In that decision, the Court of Appeals specifically rejected the argument that the constitutional privilege requires persons seeking access to presidential historical materials years after the president leaves office to show a specific need for access. Id. at 359. Because the privilege erodes with the passing of time, the court held that it was proper for the Archives to open materials to all comers, without a showing of need, and to place the burden on the former president to establish that particular disclosures would violate the privilege. That is exactly what the Presidential Records Act is designed to do. The new Executive Order, by contrast, turns the Act's requirement of public access on its head.

These are not the only features of the Bush Order that are legally suspect. The Order's provision that the constitutional executive privilege may be asserted by a deceased or disabled former president's family or personal representative is novel and highly debatable. The privilege is not, after all, a personal right of the former president. He is authorized to exercise it solely on behalf of the branch of government that he once headed. His family members or designees have no such claim of authority. To suggest, as does the Bush Order, that the incumbent president must defer to claims of privilege asserted not by a former officeholder, but simply by the former president's family, friends, or designees, threatens to expand the constitutional privilege beyond legitimate bounds.

5. The Bush Order Is Bad Policy. Beyond its legal flaws, the Bush Order threatens to subvert significantly the policies underlying the PRA. The PRA's premise is that public access to historically significant presidential records is desirable and that, once a decent interval has passed after a president leaves office, the grounds for restricting public access should be quite limited.

The Bush Order represents a substantial threat to the PRA's fundamental goals. First, it creates the possibility that a former president may indefinitely delay access to records while he simply considers whether to assert a claim of privilege. Second, it permits him to declare large blocks of the materials off-limits to public access merely by asserting a claim of privilege, which the Archivist must respect however unfounded it may be, and which may only be challenged in court by a requester who can show a specific, demonstrable need for access (whatever that may mean).

This is not to suggest that the representatives of former President Reagan, or any other former president, will consciously act in bad faith to bar access to their materials. But with the ability to block access will come the temptation to use it, particularly when records that are (or may be) embarrassing to the former president or his close associates are concerned. It is easy in such a situation for a former president to confuse his own personal interest in denying access with an institutional executive branch interest that might support a claim of privilege. And experience teaches time and again that, given the chance, officials often err on the side of over-withholding materials and asserting interests in secrecy that, upon inspection, are without justification. For these reasons, it is a bad idea to give former presidents carte blanche authority to direct the Archivist to withhold materials from the public. And since this bad idea is plainly not constitutionally required, there can be no justification for enshrining it in an Executive Order.

Nor can the Bush Order's expansion of the secrecy of historical presidential records be justified, as some in the administration have suggested, on the basis of national security concerns. Even without the new Order, the Presidential Records Act and existing Executive Orders on national security classification provide ample authority to prevent the release of materials that could potentially damage national security. Simply put, the Act already provides protection to properly classified information even after the expiration of the 12-year restriction period, and it will continue to do so with or without the Bush Order. See 44 U.S.C. §§ 2204(a)(1) & (c)(1).

The new Order extends the secrecy not of information relating to national security, but of materials relating to communications between the former president and his advisers that do not implicate national security. The 68,000-some pages of Reagan materials that the Archives notified the White House it was prepared to release in February of this year, for example, were materials that were not subject to protection for national security reasons (or to restriction under any of the other categories that survive the 12-year limit under the Act). Rather, they had been withheld from release solely because they reflected communications between the former president and his advisers that were subject to the 12-year restriction. The new Order would allow the former President (or the incumbent) to impose an indefinite, blanket ban on release of these materials even though they contain no sensitive national security information.

In addition, national security reasons can provide no possible justification for the Order's provisions that effectively give a former president veto power over the release of materials by the Archivist. It is the incumbent president, not his predecessors, who has the constitutional power and duty to make judgments about the nation's security needs. If the incumbent president sees no national security justification for keeping particular materials secret, there can be no reason to allow a former president to override that determination.

In the final analysis, what the Bush Order reflects is a fundamental change in the PRA paradigm. The PRA is premised on the notion that the public is entitled to access to historical presidential materials subject only to defined exceptions set forth in the statute. Only for a limited, 12-year period is that access subject to restrictions imposed by the will of the former president. After the 12 years expire, the only limits are those imposed by the statute or – in rare cases – by constitutional doctrines of privilege.

The Bush Order reflects another model entirely. It is an attempt to resurrect the pre-PRA regime in which access to presidential materials was controlled by the former presidents (usually through restrictions in the deeds of gift through which the former presidents donated their materials to the public). Thus, the Bush Order repeatedly states that the public will be permitted access to materials only if the former president and the incumbent decide to "authorize" access.

That is not what the PRA is all about. Under the PRA, it is the statute that "authorizes" public access, whether the former president (or the incumbent) approves or not. Only in the exceptional circumstances where the former or incumbent president has a legally enforceable, constitutionally based privilege can the access authorized by the statute be denied. The Bush Order is incompatible with this statutory scheme. It is bad policy and bad law. I urge this Subcommittee to do anything it can to discourage the administration from implementing it.

Thank you.

the principles established in that litigation are directly applicable to the issues posed by the new Executive Order.

1. The Presidential Records Act. The Presidential Records Act was enacted in 1978 to ensure permanent governmental control over presidential records and to broaden public access to them. In contrast to prior law, under which presidents were considered owners of all their papers, the PRA provides that presidential records are property of the federal government from the moment of their creation. Under the Act, they remain largely under the control of the president during his term in office. Once the president leaves office, however, the Act gives custody and control over the papers to the Archivist of the United States, and the National Archives and Records Administration ("NARA" or "the Archives") is responsible for processing the materials for release to the public under the terms of the Act.

Although the Act vests the Archivist with authority over presidential records, it does give former presidents the right to impose limited restrictions on public access to some of their materials. Specifically, the Act allows a president leaving office to direct that records falling within six specific categories may be kept from the public for up to 12 years after the president's last day in office. The categories of materials that may be restricted include, by way of example, information that is properly subject to national security classification, information whose release would infringe an individual's right to privacy, and trade secrets. One of the categories, and the one of most relevance for present purposes, encompasses confidential communications between the president and his senior advisers – that is, communications that are potentially within the scope of "executive privilege."

During the first five years after a president leaves office, the Act provides that none of his records will be generally available to the public, in order to allow NARA to gain control over the materials, move them into a presidential library, and begin the process of preparing them for public access. After the five years are up, any person may request access to presidential records, and the standards governing such a request are generally equivalent to those under the Freedom of Information Act. Between year five and year 12, however, no records that fall within any of the 12-year restriction categories may be released.

After the 12-year restriction period ends, all the former president's records become available for release to the public under FOIA standards – including, with one exception, FOIA's exemptions. The applicability of the FOIA exemptions means, for example, that classified materials, which are categorically exempt from release under FOIA, are not subject to release under the PRA even after the 12-year restriction period ends.

The one FOIA exemption that does not apply under the PRA is the so-called FOIA "exemption 5," which covers materials that are subject to the executive privilege. Thus, when the 12-year PRA restriction period for materials reflecting confidential communications between the president and his advisers runs out, those materials will generally not fall within any statutory exemption from public release (assuming they do not relate to national security matters). This reflects Congress' judgment that 12 years will generally be long enough to protect records containing the deliberations of the president and his advisers. After that lapse of time, the drafters of the Act concluded, the interest in public access to the historical record would outweigh any embarrassment that might otherwise attend the disclosure of the inner workings of the White House decisionmaking process.

To be sure, the Act does provide that it is not intended to limit (nor to confirm or expand) any constitutionally based privilege that may be available to the former president, or to the incumbent. And, at some level, the executive privilege is constitutionally based. But the Supreme Court has also emphasized that executive privilege is subject to "erosion over time" after a president leaves office. See Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425 (1977). The congressional judgment underlying the PRA is that that erosion would be such that, after the passage of 12 years, there would be little (if anything) in the president's communications with his advisers that should legitimately remain secret. To the extent that there may be some presidential communications that would remain constitutionally privileged against public release even after a lapse of 12 years, the Act's recognition of the possibility that the former president may have a constitutional privilege to assert provides the necessary safety valve to prevent any possible claim that its provisions for public access are unconstitutional.

2. The Reagan Presidential Records. To avoid problems that might result from the retroactive application of the PRA, it was made applicable beginning with the president who took office on January 20, 1981. That turned out to be President Ronald Reagan. Before leaving office, President Reagan invoked the maximum 12-year restriction for all categories of materials permitted under the Act, including the category of communications between the president and his advisers. President Reagan left office on January 20, 1989, and thus the 12-year restrictions expired on January 20 of this year, marking the first time in the history of the PRA that materials subject to the Act are available without regard to such restrictions – at least in theory.

Over the seven years that preceded the expiration of the 12-year restriction period, many requests for the release of Reagan presidential materials had been made at the new Reagan Presidential Library operated by NARA in Simi Valley, California. According to NARA estimates, over 4 million pages of records, from among the Library's total holdings of in excess of 40 million pages, had been opened to the public in response to those requests. From those files, however, NARA had withheld materials that were subject to the 12-year restriction imposed by President Reagan under the PRA. Among the materials withheld were about 68,000 pages of records that were withheld solely because they fell within the restriction category for communications between the former president and his advisers. In other words, these 68,000 pages were not subject to any other restriction (such as the restriction for materials that were national security classified).

When the 12-year restriction expired in January of this year, the 68,000 pages of materials reflecting communications between the former president and his advisers were no longer subject to any limitation on public access under the PRA. Accordingly, NARA advised the White House in February of this year that it intended to release those materials to the public. NARA provided this notification as required by an Executive Order issued by President Reagan shortly before he left office. That Order (Executive Order No. 12,667) provided that before the Archives released such materials, it must give at least 30 days' notice to both the incumbent and the former president, in order to give them the opportunity to assert any claim that a constitutionally based privilege prevents release of the materials. Notably, the Reagan Executive Order contemplated that if a former president made a privilege claim, the records that were the subject of the claim could still be released by NARA if the Archivist (acting subject to the direction of the incumbent president) rejected the claim of privilege. In that event, it would be up to the former president to seek judicial relief if he continued to press his claim of privilege.

Following the White House's receipt of the Archives' notice of intent to release the 68,000 pages of Reagan records, White House Counsel Gonzales three times extended the time permitted for the incumbent president's review of the materials under the Reagan Executive Order. The stated purpose of these extensions was to provide the White House Counsel's Office time to review what Mr. Gonzales referred to as "many constitutional and legal questions" raised by the impending release of these materials under the PRA. Pending the White House's review of those questions, the 68,000 pages of records have remained closed to the public for nearly ten months beyond the date when the restriction on their release under the PRA expired, even though no claim of a constitutionally based privilege has yet been made by the incumbent president. It is not yet known whether former President Reagan's representatives have asserted any claim of privilege as to any of the materials.

3. The New Executive Order. On November 1, 2001, the White House's review of "many constitutional and legal questions" culminated in the issuance of a new Executive Order governing the implementation of the PRA, which abrogates and supersedes the Reagan Order. The Bush Order sets forth procedures and substantive standards governing the assertion of claims of executive privilege by both former and incumbent Presidents following the expiration of the 12-year restriction period for materials involving communications between presidents and their advisers. The Bush Order has a number of troublesome features, which are described in detail below. The most striking of these is that it grants a former president the unfettered power to block the Archivist from releasing any materials to the public simply by making a claim of privilege (however unfounded that claim may be), leaving the burden on those who desire public access to challenge that claim in court.

The Bush Order does not only reverse the burden of seeking judicial review. It also, in contrast to the PRA (which makes access to presidential materials after the 12-year restriction period has ended available under FOIA standards that do not require requesters to show a need for access), asserts that "a party seeking to overcome the constitutionally based privileges that apply to Presidential records must establish at least a 'demonstrated, specific need' for particular records, a standard that turns on the nature of the proceeding and the importance of the information to that proceeding." Bush Order, § 2(c).

The Bush Order further provides that the Archivist must notify both the former president and the incumbent of any request for access to presidential records that are subject to the PRA, and must provide them with copies of the relevant records upon their request. Bush Order, § 3(a). The Order states that the former president shall review the records "as expeditiously as possible, and for no longer than 90 days for requests that are not unduly burdensome." Bush Order § 3(b). However, the Order goes on to provide that if the Archivist receives a request for an extension of time from the former president, the Archivist "shall not permit [public] access" to the materials, regardless of whether the former president's request is reasonable. Id. The Bush Order thus permits a former president to delay the release of materials indefinitely simply by requesting additional time to review them. Only after the former president has used whatever time he chooses to review the records must he advise the Archivist whether he "authorizes" access to the materials or whether he requests that some or all of the documents be withheld on the basis of a constitutionally based claim of privilege. Bush Order, § 3(c).

The Bush Order further provides that either concurrently with or after the review by the former president, the incumbent president has an unlimited amount of time in which to review any presidential materials that are subject to a request for access under the PRA. Bush Order, § 3(d). Upon completion of the incumbent's review process, the Order states that the incumbent is to decide whether he "concurs in" the former president's decision either to "request withholding of or authorize access to the records." Bush Order § 3(d). The Order tilts the scale in favor of secrecy by providing that "[a]bsent compelling circumstances, the incumbent President will concur in the privilege decision of the former President" and "will support" a former president's privilege claim "in any forum in which the privilege claim is challenged." Bush Order § 4.

When the incumbent president "concurs in" a former president's request that materials be withheld on privilege grounds, the Order provides that the incumbent shall so inform the Archivist, and that the Archivist thereafter shall not permit access to the materials unless both presidents change their minds or a court orders that the materials be released. Bush Order § 3(d)(1)(i). (Such a court order could only come about if a requester sued for access, since nothing in the PRA would permit the Archivist to bring an action against the former president or the incumbent to require that materials be released.)

Moreover, even when the incumbent president has found that there are "compelling circumstances" that require him to disagree with a former president's request that materials be withheld on grounds of privilege, the Bush Order provides that the Archivist is still forbidden to disclose the assertedly privileged materials to the public, "[b]ecause the former President independently retains the right to assert constitutionally based privileges." Bush Order, § 3(d)(1)(ii). Under such circumstances, the Bush Order provides that the Archivist must deny public access to the materials claimed to be privileged by the former president unless and until the incumbent president informs the Archives that both he and the former president agree to their release, or there is a final, nonappealable court order requiring that the records be released.

The Bush Order also provides that when the former president has "authorized access," the Archivist must nonetheless deny public access to records when the incumbent president so directs. Bush Order § 3(d)(2)(ii). Only when both the former president and the incumbent president "authorize access" does the Order permit the Archivist to grant public access to presidential records under the PRA. The Bush Order also forbids the Archivist to make presidential records available in response to judicial or congressional subpoenas unless both the incumbent and former presidents "authorize access" or there is a final, nonappealable court order requiring access. Bush Order, § 6.

Finally, the Bush Order purports to authorize private citizens other than a former president to assert constitutionally based privileges on behalf of a former president after he dies or when he is disabled. The Order provides that a former president may designate such a representative (or representatives) "to act on his behalf for purposes of the Presidential Records Act and this order." Bush Order, § 10. Upon the former president's death or disability, such a designated representative "shall act" on the former president's behalf, "including with respect to the assertion of constitutionally based privileges." Id. If the former president fails to designate such a representative, the Order provides that his family may do so. Id.

4. The Bush Order's Legal Flaws. The Bush Executive Order is fundamentally flawed, legally, constitutionally, and as a matter of policy. Although the Bush Order was described by administration officials upon its release as merely establishing a procedural mechanism for the assertion of privilege claims, the Reagan Executive Order that the Bush Order supersedes already provided more than adequate procedures for the assertion of privileges. What the Bush Order adds are new and improper substantive standards that displace and subvert the PRA's provisions for public access to presidential materials.

It must be remembered at the outset that the PRA is based on the concept that a president leaving office can impose only a 12-year restriction on materials reflecting communications with his advisers. Thereafter, those materials are presumptively open to the public unless they involve national security matters or other specific content exempt from disclosure, or unless they fall within the small category, which steadily diminishes with the passing of time, of materials that

Thank you Mr. Chairman for the invitation to address the committee on the constitutional principle of executive privilege. Although nowhere mentioned in the Constitution, executive privilege has a long history in presidential politics. Presidents since George Washington have claimed the right to withhold information from either Congress or the judicial branch. Despite this long history and the many precedents for its exercise, executive privilege remains a controversial power. That is understandable because the very notion that a president may withhold information from those who have compulsory powers strikes at the core of our democratic principles, especially accountability in government.

My comments today focus on the proper definition of executive privilege and the evolution of its exercise. Executive privilege is a legitimate presidential power when exercised under the appropriate circumstances. Like most other presidential powers, it is limited by the legitimate needs of the other branches. Executive privilege also is limited by the democratic principle of openness in government. Therefore, throughout U.S. history claims of executive privilege have been subject to various balancing tests. No claim of executive privilege should stand merely because a president or a high ranking administration official has uttered the words "national security" or "ongoing criminal investigation". A president's claim of executive privilege must be balanced against other needs and also must meet certain standards of acceptability.

every step of the way by the opposition party-led Congress. Reagan ultimately backed down from his several claims of executive privilege and did more to weaken the doctrine as a result (Rozell, 1994: chapters 4-5).

President George H.W. Bush did not initiate any new executive privilege procedures. The 1982 Reagan memorandum remained in effect as official executive privilege policy during the Bush years. Bush frequently withheld information without invoking executive privilege. Like Ford and Carter, he avoided the negative taint of executive privilege and generally used other bases of authority for withholding information. When the Bush administration wanted to withhold information from the Congress, it used a variety of names other than executive privilege to justify that action. Among them were "internal departmental deliberations", "deliberations of another agency", and the "secret opinions policy" (Rozell, 1994: chapter 5). The chief investigator to the House Committee on the Judiciary during the Bush years said that Bush "avoided formally claiming executive privilege and instead called it other things. In reality, executive privilege was in full force and effect during the Bush years, probably more so than under Reagan" (Lewin interview).

President Clinton used executive privilege elaborately. Unlike former president Bush, he did not conceal executive privilege. Like Nixon, he concealed wrongdoing – or tried to – by resorting to executive privilege. Like Nixon, Clinton gave executive privilege a bad name and made it difficult once again for a future president to reestablish the legitimacy of this constitutional doctrine.

In 1994, the Clinton administration issued its own executive privilege procedures. The memorandum from the special counsel to the president Lloyd Cutler stated: "The policy of this Administration is to comply with congressional requests for information to the fullest extent consistent with the constitutional and statutory obligations of the Executive Branch..... [E]xecutive privilege will be asserted only after careful review demonstrates that assertion of the privilege is necessary to protect Executive Branch prerogatives. The memorandum further stated that: "Executive privilege belongs to the President, not individual departments or agencies".

The Cutler memorandum described formal procedures for the use of executive privilege and these were not significantly different from those outlined in the Reagan memorandum. In light of Clinton's aggressive use of executive privilege in the presidential scandal of 1998-1999, one sentence stands out: "In circumstances involving communications relating to investigations of personal wrongdoing by government officials, it is our practice not to assert executive privilege, either in judicial proceedings or in congressional investigations and hearings" (Memorandum from Lloyd Cutler, 1994).

The Clinton administration also adopted the very broad view that all White House communications are presumptively privileged and that Congress has a less valid claim to executive branch information when conducting oversight than when considering legislation (Letters from Attorney General Janet Reno to President Clinton).[i] On several occasions the Clinton administration used executive privilege to thwart congressional investigations of alleged White House wrongdoing.

The George W. Bush Administration

The Bush administration is making far-reaching efforts to expand the scope of executive privilege. In one such case the administration has made the claim that Congress can be refused access to documents in the Department of Justice regarding prosecutorial matters. In this particular case the administration maintains that it has the right to refuse a congressional request for access to such documents, even though the Department of Justice has closed down the particular investigation under dispute. A congressional hearing on that controversy scheduled for September 13 was understandably postponed due the overriding emphasis on fighting terrorism. In due time Congress needs to take up this issue again because if allowed to stand, the administration's position on expanding executive privilege any time the Department of Justice utters the words "prosecutorial" would set an impossible standard for Congress to overcome in trying to conduct its oversight function. In short, it would set a terrible precedent.

Today Congress rightly is concerned about the administration's executive order that would allow executive privilege to be vastly expanded to prevent the release of past presidents' official papers. I have several reactions:

First, the handling of presidential papers is a matter that should be handled by statute and not by executive order. Presidential papers are ultimately public documents – a part of our national records - and they are paid for with public funds. They should not be treated merely as private papers.

Second, there is legal precedent for allowing an ex-president to assert executive privilege. Yet the standard for allowing such a claim is very high and executive privilege cannot stand merely because an ex-president has some personal or political interest in preserving secrecy. An ex-president's interest in maintaining confidentiality erodes substantially once he leaves office and it continues to erode even further over time.

Third, this executive order makes it easy for such claims by former presidents to stand and almost impossible for those challenging the claims to get information in a timely way to be useful. The legal constraints will effectively delay requests for information for years as these matters are fought out in the courts. These obstacles alone will settle the issue in favor of former presidents because many with an interest in access to information will conclude that they do not have the ability or the resources to stake a viable challenge. The burden will shift from those who must justify withholding information to fall instead on those who have made a claim for access to information.

Fourth, executive privilege may actually be frivolous in this case because there are already other secrecy protections in place for national security purposes. Why expand executive privilege so dramatically to cover what is already potentially covered by existing statutes and regulations? Furthermore, a general interest in confidentiality is not enough to sustain a claim of executive privilege over old documents that may go back as far as twenty years.

Executive privilege traditionally has been limited to withholding information regarding current matters of substantial national interest. In a democratic system the presumption is generally in favor of openness, not secrecy. There is no denying that presidents have needs of confidentiality. Yet the president's current efforts appear designed to substantially tip the balance in favor of secrecy. If the president's support for limiting access to Department of Justice memoranda and this executive order are allowed to stand, the administration will be able to withhold just about any materials going back many years as long as someone in the administration utters the words "national security" or "prosecutorial". Congress and the American public have an interest in making sure that does not happen.

What is striking about these latest executive privilege controversies is that the administration seeks to protect secrecy in the one case over documents regarding a terminated investigation and in the other case over the presidential papers of past administrations. Usually when an administration seeks to protect secrecy with executive privilege, it does so with regard to some matter of immediate national concern. That is not to suggest that all such claims necessarily have been valid, but just that the current administration has chosen some very untraditional cases with which to expand executive privilege. Neither case fits the traditional standards for valid claims of executive privilege.

With regard to legislative-executive disputes over information, the burden is on the president to demonstrate a need for confidentiality and not on Congress to prove that it has the right to conduct oversight. Similarly, the burden should be on a president or ex-president to demonstrate a need to close off access to past presidential records and not on citizens to prove that they have a right to examine public records. The Bush administration actions on executive privilege dramatically shift the burden away from where it belongs.

Resolving Executive Privilege Disputes

Executive privilege clearly is a constitutional power when exercised under the proper circumstances. Since the Nixon years, presidents have not made effective use of that power. Some have devised means of concealing executive privilege and some have used that power improperly. Congress has shown little deference toward presidential secrecy. The reality is that presidents have some needs of confidentiality and Congress has investigative powers. Executive privilege inevitably leads to interbranch clashes – usually between the president and Congress, but also recently between a president and the Office of the Independent Council (OIC).

It is understandable why, especially in light of recent events, that some would find appealing a statutory definition of executive privilege or a judicial clarification of the limits of that power. Yet over the course of presidential history there has evolved an understanding of executive privilege that has been established through precedent, court decisions, and presidential declarations. Executive privilege is legitimate when it applies to two broad circumstances: (1) protecting the national security, and (2) protecting the privacy of official White House deliberations when it is in the public interest to do so. In our democratic system, the presumption must be in favor of openness. The burden is on presidents to prove that they have a compelling need for secrecy, not on those who have legitimate compulsory powers to prove that they need information.

Resolving such disputes cannot occur through statutory guidelines or court-directed definitions. The proper resolution to conflict over presidential secrecy is rooted in the separation of powers. Congress and the courts already have the institutional means to challenge executive privilege. The proper solution to the potential abuse of executive privilege is not legalistic precision, but rather for the other branches to fully use the powers that they already possess.

If members of Congress are not satisfied with the president's response to their requests for information or testimony, they have numerous options. Congress can issue a subpoena and perhaps ultimately a contempt of Congress resolution, or retaliate by withholding support for the president's agenda or for one or more of his nominees, or simply withhold funding for presidential favored programs. These actions give the president the option of weighing the importance of secrecy against such interbranch conflict and the problems it may cause for him. If executive privilege can be exercised only for the most compelling reasons – a real threat to the national security or compromising internal discussions in a way that will clearly harm the public – then it is not unreasonable to force the president's hand in this fashion. Presumably, information being withheld for such vital purposes would take precedence over pending legislation or a presidential appointment.

In most cases in which presidents have withheld information or testimony and Congress has retaliated in some form, presidents ultimately have either ceded to Congress's demands or worked out some form of agreement to accommodate both sides in the dispute. In my studies of the history of executive privilege I have not come across a single incident in which a president gave in to Congress's demands and thereby committed a substantial harm to the national security or created a precedent that undermined the right of confidential deliberations for his successors.

Presidents simply are not powerless in these disputes. They have the ability to rally opinion against members of Congress for bottling up the agenda, program spending, or nominations. They can shift the burden to Congress to decide how important the information they seek is and how much political heat they should withstand. Presidents also have the powers of their office to help or to frustrate the needs of individual members of Congress.

The history of executive privilege shows that the president and Congress usually resolve these disputes and that the lack of precise legal guidelines on the use of that power has not resulted in constitutional crises. Someone gives in or there is an agreed upon accommodation. The extreme case would of course involve Congress using its power of impeachment against the president who refused to cooperate with demands for information. President Theodore Roosevelt in one case personally seized government papers and dared Congress to impeach him for doing so. But Congress could have tried to get the documents by retaliating in less dramatic ways. The key point is that in legislative-executive disputes over information, the legislative possesses the ultimate weapon of impeachment should no action short of that step resolve the situation.

Rarely does either side benefit from disputes over information that result in retaliatory measures. There are powerful incentives for both branches to reach some accommodation. One approach has been for the executive to allow a few members of Congress – for example, the chair and ranking minority member of the committee seeking the information – to privately review confidential documents. There is nothing improper with having the executive limit access to secret information to some members of Congress who can attest to the validity of the need for secrecy.

The judicial branch sometimes is a party to an interbranch dispute over access to information. President Clinton tried to shield White House information and testimony from the Office of Independent Counsel (OIC) in 1998, but a federal judge ultimately decided that the constitutional balancing test weighed in favor of the OIC's need for information. The process of accommodation is obviously more difficult between the president and a judicial entity than between a president and Congress. But the same principle applies: each side should use the powers already at its disposal as fully as possible.

When a dispute over information rises to the level of a constitutional crisis, the courts may get involved, as happened in the Watergate episode. The unanimous court in U.S. v. Nixon declared the privilege "constitutionally based" and that on matters of national security or foreign policy deliberations, such a power is difficult for another branch to overcome. Yet the court made it clear that the privilege may, at times, have to defer to the constitutionally based powers of the coordinate branches of the government. In that case, the need for information in a criminal trial had to outweigh any presidential claim to secrecy. The Supreme Court in that case upheld the legitimacy of the judicial to pose as a viable check on the abuse of executive privilege.

There is also considerable legal precedent for in camera review of sensitive information by the courts. Rather than compelling disclosure of information for open court review, the executive may satisfy the court in secret chambers of the need for non-disclosure. The courts have repeatedly affirmed their right to decide in particular cases whether the necessity of protecting sensitive information does indeed outweigh the need for evidence in criminal justice matters.

Disputes over executive privilege cannot be resolved with constitutional or statutory exactitude. Such disputes can best be resolved through the normal ebb and flow of politics as provided for in the system of separation of powers.

Some scholars have argued that executive privilege is a "myth" (Berger, 1974). During the Watergate scandal former president Richard Nixon claimed that executive privilege was a power that belonged to the entire executive branch of the government and that it was not subject to any limits. Both of these views are unsupportable. The relevant debate today is over the proper scope and limits of executive privilege. Few any longer argue that executive privilege is a "myth". Fewer still cling to the belief that the privilege is an absolute presidential power not subject to the compulsory powers of the other branches. Presidents have legitimate needs of confidentiality. The other branches and the public have legitimate needs of access to executive branch information. The question is not whether executive privilege is a legitimate power, but rather how to balance competing needs when a president makes a privilege claim.

The Definition and Application of Executive Privilege

Critics of executive privilege are quick to point out that the phrase "executive privilege" does not appear in the Constitution. To be precise, that phrase was not a part of the common language until the Eisenhower administration, leading some to suggest that executive privilege therefore cannot be constitutional (Berger, 1974; Prakash, 1999). This argument ultimately fails because every president since Washington has exercised some form of what we today call executive privilege, regardless of the words used to describe their actions. As Louis Fisher has pointed out, "one could play similar word games with 'impoundment', also of recent vintage, but only by ignoring the fact that, under different names, Presidents have from an early date declined to spend funds appropriated by Congress" (Fisher, 1978: 181).

[i] The administration draws its view that Congress lacks a compelling need for executive branch information in cases of oversight from a dubious interpretation of the D.C. Circuit Court's 1974 ruling in Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities v. Nixon (498 F. 2d 725). Although the court did not explicitly acknowledge Congress's need for information in cases of oversight, that is not the same as saying that the court over-ruled the well-established investigative powers of legislative committees. The Reagan and Bush administrations made similarly too broad claims in this regard.

Executive privilege is an implied power derived from Article II. It is most easily defined as the right of the president and high-level executive branch officers to withhold information from those who have compulsory power – Congress and the courts (and, therefore, ultimately the public). This right is not absolute. The modern understanding of executive privilege has evolved over a long period, the result of presidential actions, official administration policies, and court decisions.

As he did in so many areas, President Washington had a profound influence on the development of executive privilege because of the precedents he established. In the first controversy over executive withholding of information from Congress, the president decided that he indeed possessed such a power, but only if his actions were in the service of the public interest. Washington determined that he could not withhold information merely for the purpose of concealing politically damaging or embarrassing information.

The particular circumstance involved the disastrous November 1791 St. Clair military expedition against Native American Indians in which General St. Clair lost many of his troops and supplies. A huge embarrassment to the administration, Congress convened an investigation and directed the president to turn over any documents or information germane to the decision to initiate the expedition. The political temptation for the president not to cooperate was clear.

With the unanimous advice of his cabinet, the president determined that he had the right under the Constitution to withhold the information, as long as it was in the public interest to do so. Thomas Jefferson attended the Cabinet discussion and later recorded in his notes that the Cabinet members had all determined "that the executive ought to communicate such papers as the public good would permit, and ought to refuse those, the disclosure of which would injure the public" (Ford, 1892: 189-190). In the end Washington determined that there were no potentially serious public consequences to divulging the information and he cooperated with the congressional investigation.

That Washington turned over all information requested by Congress in this controversy leads some to argue that this incident actually argues against the constitutional legitimacy of executive privilege (Berger, 1974; Prakash, 1999). The key point is that Washington first addressed the issue of the legitimacy of presidential withholding of information from Congress and concluded that the Constitution allows such an action. And of equal importance is that Washington set the precedent for use of executive privilege to protect the public interest, not the president's own political interests. On other occasions Washington asserted a right to withhold information and he followed through on those claims.

Washington established the appropriate standard when he determined that any presidential withholding of information must be in the service of the public interest, not the administration's own political interest. Unfortunately, not all of our presidents have acted so honorably. But over the course of U.S. history executive privilege has evolved into a constitutional principal that is recognized as legitimate when used under the proper circumstances. An examination of the modern evolution of executive privilege better helps us to understand how to resolve controversies over the exercise of that power today.

Executive Privilege and the Modern Presidents

Most prominently, President Eisenhower holds the presidential record for assertions of executive privilege at more than 40. Many of those assertions amounted to refusals to comply with congressional requests for testimony from White House officials.

Eisenhower felt so strongly about the principle that at one point he stated "any man who testifies as to the advice he gave me won't be working for me that night" (Greenstein, 1982: 205). A key event in the development of executive privilege was Eisenhower's letter of May 17, 1954 to the secretary of defense instructing department employees not to comply with a congressional request to testify about confidential matters in the army-McCarthy hearings. Eisenhower articulated the principle that candid advice was essential to the proper functioning of the executive branch and that limiting candor would ultimately harm "the public interest" (Public Papers of the Presidents, 1954: 483-484).

Although many of Eisenhower's uses of executive privilege were clearly justified, the breadth of his understanding of that power disturbed many. At one point he effectively declared that executive privilege belonged to the entire executive branch, when in fact over the course of history the practice had been to confine its use to the president and high-level White House officials when directed by the president. He declared all advice to the president not subject to the compulsory powers of the other branches, although the development of executive privilege law more recently has resulted in a key distinction between discussions about official governmental matters and those about private matters.

Eisenhower's administration originated the use of the phrase executive privilege and expanded the actual practice of that power. Members of Congress rightfully concerned about the expanded practice sought to rein in Eisenhower's successors through the articulation of standards for the use of executive privilege. Rep. John Moss (D-CA), the chairman of the House Subcommittee on Government Information, led the effort. Beginning with the Kennedy administration, Moss sent letters to successive presidents requesting written clarification of policy toward the use of executive privilege. President John Kennedy replied that executive privilege "can be invoked only by the president and will not be used without specific presidential approval" (Mollenhoff, 1962: 239). President Lyndon Johnson similarly responded to a letter from Moss that "the claim of 'executive privilege' will continue to be made only by the president" (Executive Privilege, 1971: 35).

Ironically, President Richard Nixon responded most forthrightly to Moss's inquiry when he wrote: "the scope of executive privilege must be very narrowly construed. Under this Administration, executive privilege will not be asserted without specific presidential approval.... I want open government to be a reality in every way possible" (Letter from President Richard M. Nixon to Rep. John E. Moss). Nixon issued the first detailed presidential memorandum specifically on the proper use of executive privilege.

> The policy of this Administration is to comply to the fullest extent possible with Congressional requests for information. While the Executive branch has the responsibility of withholding certain information the disclosure of which would be incompatible with the public interest, this Administration will invoke this authority only in the most compelling circumstances and after a rigorous inquiry into the actual need for its exercise. For those reasons Executive privilege will not be used without specific Presidential approval (Memorandum from President Richard M. Nixon to Executive Department Heads).

The memorandum outlined the procedure to be used whenever a question of executive privilege was raised. If a department head believed that a congressional request for information might concern privileged information, he would consult with the attorney general. The two of them would then decide whether to release the information to Congress, or to submit the matter to the president through the counsel to the president. At that stage, the president either would instruct the department head to claim executive privilege with presidential approval, or request that Congress give some time to the president to make a decision.

The story of Nixon's vast abuse of executive privilege is well known and analyzed in detail elsewhere (Rozell, 1994: chapter 3). Nonetheless, Nixon's response to Moss and the executive privilege memorandum were important to the development of standard procedures on the scope and application of that doctrine.

Unfortunately Nixon's practices gave executive privilege a bad name and had a profoundly chilling effect on the ability of his immediate successors either to clarify procedures or properly exercise that power. President Gerald Ford began what became a common post-Watergate practice of avoiding executive privilege inquiries and using other constitutional or statutory powers to justify withholding information. Within a week of Ford's inauguration, Rep. Moss sent his usual inquiry to the president requesting a statement on executive privilege policy (Letter from Rep. John E. Moss to President Gerald R. Ford). Unlike Presidents Kennedy, Johnson, and Nixon, Ford ignored the letter. Other members of Congress weighed in with their own requests and Ford ignored their letters too. Numerous discussions took place within the White House over the need for the president to either reaffirm or modify Nixon's official executive privilege procedures. Ford took no action on the recommendations.

The associate counsel to the president summed up the dilemma nicely when he suggested three options: (1) cite exemptions from the Freedom of Information Act as the basis for withholding information "rather than executive privilege"; (2) use executive privilege only as a last resort – even avoid the use of the phrase in favor of "presidential" or "constitutional privilege"; (3) issue formal guidelines on executive privilege

(Memorandum from Dudley Chapman to Philip W. Buchen). Ford chose to handle executive privilege controversies on a case-by-case basis rather than to issue general guidelines. He understood that for many people "executive privilege" and "Watergate" had become joined.

President Jimmy Carter similarly did not respond to congressional requests for clarification of administration policy on executive privilege. It was not until the week before the 1980 election that the Carter administration established some official executive privilege procedures. On October 31, 1980, the White House Counsel Lloyd Cutler issued an executive privilege memorandum to White House staff and heads of units within the Executive Office of the President. The memorandum established that those considering the use of executive privilege must first seek the concurrence of the office of counsel to the president. The memorandum also emphasized that only the president had the authority to waive executive privilege (Memorandum from Lloyd Cutler, 1980). Cutler later would become counsel to the president in the Clinton administration and would write new procedures on the use of executive privilege in 1994.

On November 4, 1982 President Ronald Reagan issued an executive privilege memorandum to heads of executive departments and agencies. The Reagan procedures dovetailed closely with the 1969 Nixon memorandum. For example, Reagan's guidelines affirmed the administration policy "to comply with congressional requests for information to the fullest extent consistent with the constitutional and statutory obligations of the executive branch". The memorandum reaffirmed the need for "confidentiality of some communications" and added that executive privilege would be used "only in the most compelling circumstances, and only after careful review demonstrates that assertion of the privilege is necessary". Finally, "executive privilege shall not be invoked without specific presidential authorization".

The Reagan memorandum developed greater clarity of procedures than before. All congressional requests must be accommodated unless "compliance raises a substantial question of executive privilege." Such a question arises if the information "might significantly impair the national security (including the conduct of foreign relations), the deliberative process of the executive branch or other aspects of the performance of the executive branch's constitutional duties". Under these procedures, if a department head believed that a congressional request for information might concern privileged information, he or she would notify and consult with both the attorney general and the counsel to the president. Those three individuals would then decide to release the information to Congress, or have the matter submitted to the president for a decision if any one of them believes that it is necessary to invoke executive privilege. At that point, the department head would ask Congress to await a presidential decision. If the president chose executive privilege, he instructed the department head to inform Congress "that the claim of executive privilege is being made with the specific approval of the president". The Reagan memorandum allowed for the use of executive privilege, even if the information originated from staff levels far removed from the Oval Office (Memorandum from President Reagan to Heads of Executive Departments and Agencies).

By avoiding executive privilege, presidents Ford and Carter actually succeeded more than Reagan did at protecting secrecy. Ford and Carter understood in the post-Watergate era the negative connotations of executive privilege. President Reagan tried to reestablish the legitimacy of executive privilege, only to be harshly criticized and fought

The Honorable Stephen Horn
Chairman
Subcommittee on Government Efficiency,
Financial Management and Intergovernmental Relations
Committee on Government Reform
U.S. House of Representatives
Washington, D.C. 20515

Dear Mr. Chairman:

This responds to your letters, dated November 9, 2001 and November 13, 2001, which enclosed written questions to then-Acting Assistant Attorney General Edward Whelan, following his testimony at the Subcommittee's hearing on November 6, 2001, concerning the Presidential Records Act ("PRA") and Executive Order 13233, which sets forth policies and procedures for the implementation of the PRA with respect to the possible assertion of constitutionally-based privileges by former and incumbent Presidents. We are sending a similar letter to Congressman Ose, who also sent follow-up questions regarding the hearing.

On November 28, 2001, a complaint was filed in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, initiating a lawsuit seeking a declaratory judgment that Executive Order 13233 is unlawful and an injunction requiring the release of approximately 68,000 pages of documents that are under review pursuant to Executive Order 13233. The questions that you and Chairman Ose have posed go to the very heart of the issues raised by the complaint. The Department is representing the defendants in this action and must, therefore, respectfully decline to answer your questions at this time. I trust you will appreciate that the litigation interests of the United States require that we present our legal positions first in the court proceedings themselves, before discussing them in other forums. We have consulted the White House Counsel's Office concerning whether the Department should respond to your questions before we address these issues in court, and that Office concurs in our determination that we should first address these issues in court.

We will keep you informed regarding developments in the litigation and the ongoing review under Executive Order 13233. In the latter regard, we understand that all decisions regarding whether to assert privilege with respect to any of the 68,000 pages will be completed in the next several months. Please do not hesitate to contact me if you would like additional assistance regarding this or any other matter.

Sincerely,

Daniel J. Bryant

The Honorable Doug Ose
Subcommittee on Government Efficiency,
Financial Management and Intergovernmental Relations
Committee on Government Reform
U.S. House of Representatives
Washington, D.C. 20515

Dear Congressman Ose:

This responds to your letter, dated November 8, 2001, which enclosed written questions to then-Acting Assistant Attorney General Edward Whelan, following his testimony at the Subcommittee's hearing on November 6, 2001, concerning the Presidential Records Act ("PRA") and Executive Order 13233, which sets forth policies and procedures for the implementation of the PRA with respect to the possible assertion of constitutionally-based privileges by former and incumbent Presidents. We are sending a similar letter to Chairman Horn, who also sent follow-up questions regarding the hearing.

On November 28, 2001, a complaint was filed in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, initiating a lawsuit seeking a declaratory judgment that Executive Order 13233 is unlawful and an injunction requiring the release of approximately 68,000 pages of documents that are under review pursuant to Executive Order 13233. The questions that you and Chairman Ose have posed go to the very heart of the issues raised by the complaint. The Department is representing the defendants in this action and must, therefore, respectfully decline to answer your questions at this time. I trust you will appreciate that the litigation interests of the United States require that we present our legal positions first in the court proceedings themselves, before discussing them in other forums. We have consulted the White House Counsel's Office concerning whether the Department should respond to your questions before we address these issues in court, and that Office concurs in our determination that we should first address these issues in court.

We will keep you informed regarding developments in the litigation and the ongoing review under Executive Order 13233. In the latter regard, we understand that all decisions regarding whether to assert privilege with respect to any of the 68,000 pages will be completed in several months. Please do not hesitate to contact me if you would like additional assistance regarding this or any other matter.

Sincerely,

Daniel J. Bryant
Assistant Attorney General

PLAINTIFFS' RESPONSE TO DEFENDANTS' "NOTICE WITH RESPECT TO PROCESSING OF RECORDS"

INTRODUCTION

In the guise of a "notice to generally update the Court with respect to processing of presidential records ... and vice presidential records ... under Executive Order 13,233" (Notice with Respect to Processing of Records, at 1), the government has revealed that its justiciability arguments, which were premised on the absence of any claim of privilege by a former officeholder (or his representative) under the Executive Order, have no remaining factual basis. The government's notice and the attached letter to the Archivist from White House Counsel Alberto Gonzales disclose that former President Reagan's representative has made a claim of privilege under Executive Order 13,233 to bar the release of 74 pages of documents and 15 minutes of videotape. Under the Executive Order, with which the Archivist is complying (see Pl. Statement of Undisputed Facts, ¶ 8; Pl. Supp. Statement of Undisputed Facts, ¶ 5), those materials will now be withheld from the public. Because the challenged features of the Executive Order have been expressly invoked and implemented, there is no remaining doubt that the Court may proceed to resolve the merits of plaintiffs' challenge to the lawfulness of the Executive Order. As plaintiffs have previously explained, the government's justiciability arguments were never valid, but now, with the disappearance of their factual underpinnings, they have lost any semblance of merit.

THE NOTICE'S PROCEDURAL CONTEXT AND CONSEQUENCES

A brief review of the bidding up to this point may be of assistance to the Court in understanding the impact on the justiciability issues of the facts set forth in the government's notice. The Executive Order was issued on November 1, 2001. At that time, approximately 68,000 pages of Reagan documents whose 12-year statutory restriction under the Presidential Records Act had expired in January 2001 were withheld from the public pending review pursuant to the Executive Order. Plaintiffs filed this lawsuit on November 28, 2001. Their complaint sought (1) to compel the release of the 68,000 pages of Reagan documents and (2) relief against the ongoing operation of Executive Order 13,233.

On January 3, 2002, the Archives released approximately 8,000 of the 68,000 pages of withheld documents. On February 8, 2002, plaintiffs filed their motion for summary judgment, requesting permanent injunctive and declaratory relief that would (1) require release of the remaining 60,000 pages of documents and (2) forbid further implementation of Executive Order 13,233. Simultaneously, the government filed its motion to dismiss. On the same day, the government announced that approximately 59,000 more of the Reagan records had been cleared for release under the Order, leaving about 1,000 remaining to be reviewed.

The government's motion to dismiss argued that plaintiffs' claims were largely moot to the extent they sought release of the 68,000 pages of Reagan records, and that the claims for declaratory and injunctive relief with respect to Executive Order 13,233 were nonjusticiable for lack of standing or ripeness because there had as yet been no claim of privilege by a former President or Vice President (or his representative), and thus no records were being withheld as a result of such a claim. The government explained its position on standing as follows: "Because neither President Bush nor former President Reagan has asserted privilege over any of the 68,000 pages, Plaintiffs cannot establish a 'causal connection' between their alleged 'injury' and [the challenged] sections of the Bush Order, which have caused Plaintiffs no harm." Def. Mem. in Support of Mot. to Dismiss, at 16. As for ripeness, the government argued that plaintiffs' "claims are not constitutionally ripe because they are directed to provisions of the Bush Order that rest, for their application, upon a future event: an assertion of privilege by an incumbent or former President." Id. at 22.

The parties filed simultaneous oppositions to the motions on March 8, 2002. By that time, the government had announced its intention to release all but approximately 150 of the 68,000 pages of Reagan records. The government's opposition to plaintiffs' summary judgment motion argued that plaintiffs' request for the 68,000 pages was "largely (and will soon be fully) moot." Def. Opp. to Pl. Mot. for Summary Judgment, at 8. As for plaintiffs' request for declaratory and injunctive relief against the Executive Order itself, the government's opposition again contended that it was not justiciable because no assertion of privilege had been made, and thus, plaintiffs had not been "affected in any way by the Bush Order provisions they challenge." Id. at 6.

Plaintiffs, in their opposition to the government's motion to dismiss, pointed out that the dispute over the 68,000 pages was not yet "moot," because 150 pages were still being withheld. As for their broader request for declaratory and injunctive relief against the operation of Executive Order 13,233, plaintiffs explained that the dispute was justiciable because the Executive Order had caused, and was continuing to cause, an ongoing injury by impeding access to presidential and vice presidential records during the lengthy privilege reviews that it required, and because it threatened an imminent and impending injury in the form of outright denial of access to materials once a claim of privilege was asserted. Pl. Opp. to Mot. to Dismiss, at 3-21.

The parties submitted simultaneous replies on March 22, 2002. Plaintiffs' reply on the issue of justiciability emphasized both that they had already suffered injury through the operation of the order and that they alleged a likelihood of imminent future injury sufficient to satisfy Article III. Pl. Reply Mem. in Support of Mot. for Summary Judgment, at 2-3. The defendants' reply, by contrast, repeated the government's position that the plaintiffs' claims for relief against the operation of the Executive Order would not satisfy Article III justiciability standards "until a former President, Vice President, or representative unilaterally asserts a constitutional privilege over a record they seek." Reply in Support of Def. Mot. to Dismiss, at 11 (emphasis added). The government continued (id. at 12):

> The issue, for ripeness purposes, is not whether the Archivist will withhold materials upon an assertion of constitutional privilege under the Bush Order (he will). The issue is whether a former President, Vice President, or presidential/vice-presidential representative will assert a privilege, thereby requiring a withholding. See, e.g., Public Citizen v. Burke, 843 F.2d 1473, 1477 n.5 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (challenge to regulations implementing public-access provisions of the Presidential Record[ing]s and Materials Preservation Act ("PRMPA") ripe in light of former President Nixon's "pending claims of executive privilege").[1]

[1] The government's reply went on to assert that plaintiffs' challenge would not be constitutionally ripe until a former officeholder asserted a privilege with which the incumbent did not "concur" under Section 4 of the Order. Id. at 12-13. This contention, however, was based on the misconception that plaintiffs challenge only the Order's requirement that materials be withheld even when the incumbent does not "concur" in an assertion of privilege. See id. at 5. As plaintiffs have made clear, however, they challenge the lawfulness of giving a former officeholder the authority to require withholding of materials regardless of whether the incumbent finds "exceptional circumstances" that prevent him from "concurring" in the assertion of privilege. See Mem. of Points & Auth. in Support of Pl. Mot. for Summary Judgment, at 15.

Four months after the filing of the parties' replies, the Archives finally released the last 150 of the 68,000 pages of Reagan records that were referred to in plaintiffs' complaint — an action that plaintiffs acknowledge moots one of the forms of relief originally requested in this action (i.e., an order compelling release of the 68,000 pages), but that even defendants do not contend moots the request for declaratory and injunctive relief against the Executive Order itself. Moreover, even as the Archives was proceeding to release the 150 pages, discovery and correspondence with the Archives had revealed that there were additional Reagan records whose statutory restriction expired in January 2001 that had not been released. As set forth in the Supplemental Statement of Undisputed Facts filed by the plaintiffs in October 2002, those records, comprising 1,654 pages of documents and 15 minutes of videotape, were also subjected to review under the Executive Order after plaintiffs requested that they be released.[2] As of the time of filing of the Supplemental Statement, the records were still under review, and no determination had yet been made whether they would be subject to a claim of privilege under the Executive Order. Thus, defendants contended that the facts set forth in the Supplemental Statement "do not affect the resolution of the justiciability issue currently before the Court (i.e., the issue whether plaintiffs' facial challenge to EO 13233 is justiciable)." Def. Resp. to Pl. Supp. Statement of Undisputed Facts, at 2.

Now, after ten full months of review of the 1,654 pages of documents and 15 minutes of video, the government has announced that President Reagan's representative has claimed a constitutional executive privilege to bar release of 74 pages of the documents, as well as the 15

[2] The Supplemental Statement also provides information about the number of George H.W. Bush vice presidential records whose release was impeded, though not ultimately prevented, by review under the Order.

minutes of video. White House Counsel Gonzales' letter to the Archivist states that, applying the standard of Section 4 of the Executive Order, President Bush "will concur in and support" the Reagan representative's decision to assert privilege, not because he has judged it to be proper, but rather because there is no "compelling circumstance" that, in his view, requires disclosure against the wishes of the former President's representative. Given the government's own acknowledgment that the Archivist will abide by the terms of the Executive Order (see supra, p. 4), it is now a certainty that these materials will continue to be withheld from the public until President Reagan's representative "authorizes" their release.

The assertion of privilege and the resultant withholding of these materials from the public suffices, even under the government's unduly restrictive theories of standing and ripeness, to make plaintiffs' claims justiciable. As demanded by the government, the precise features of the Order that are at the heart of plaintiffs' challenge have now been invoked and implemented to the injury of the plaintiffs.[3] No more could possibly be required to render the issues justiciable.[4]

[3] Plaintiffs acknowledge there has as yet been no assertion of privilege by a former Vice President, but the months of delays in the release of vice presidential records that have already occurred, while the former Vice President considered whether to "authorize" their release, are sufficient to place issues as to the validity of the Executive Order's treatment of vice presidential records before the Court.

[4] The defendants' notice states in passing that the documents and video segments now being withheld "are not subject to plaintiffs' complaint." Def. Notice with Respect to Processing of Records, at 2. That is true in the sense that the complaint did not seek to compel the release of those specific documents (since their existence was not known at the time). But it is also irrelevant. The complaint seeks not only the release of specific documents, but also relief against the operation of the Executive Order. See Complaint at ¶¶ 1, 58-65, and "Relief Requested" ¶¶ (iv) & (vi). The assertion of privilege as to the 74 pages and the video segments is relevant because defendants have contended that, absent such a claim of privilege, plaintiffs' challenge to the Order itself is nonjusticiable. Now that such a claim has been made, the government's own criteria for establishing injury resulting from the Executive Order have been satisfied. Thus, although these particular Reagan documents and videos were not specifically sought in the complaint, their withholding supplies the present injury and concreteness that defendants previously claimed were lacking from plaintiffs' challenge to the Executive Order.

In similar circumstances, the D.C. Circuit held in Public Citizen v. Burke, 843 F.2d 1473, 1477 n.5 (1988), that the challenge to an OMB directive requiring the Archives to defer to former President Nixon's claims of privilege was "now ripe for review in light of former President Nixon's pending claims of executive privilege and the Archivist's expressed intention to follow the OLC memorandum." So, here, plaintiffs' challenge to Executive Order 13,233 must necessarily be justiciable now that former President Reagan, through his representative, has made claims of executive privilege, and specific documents and videotapes are being withheld from the public as a result of the Archivist's expressed intention to abide by the terms of the Executive Order and withhold those documents.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, this Court should proceed to resolve the merits of the issues presented by plaintiffs' Motion for Summary Judgment.

The Honorable Alberto R. Gonzales
Counsel to the President
The White House
Washington, D.C. 20502

Dear Judge Gonzales:

In accordance with the requirements of the Presidential Records Act (PRA), 44 U.S.C. §§2201-2207 and Executive Order 13233, this letter constitutes a formal notice from the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) to the incumbent President of our intent to open Reagan Presidential records in response to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) requests, mandatory review requests and systematic processing projects listed in Attachment A.

This material, consisting of 1,898 pages, was previously restricted from release under 44 U.S.C. §2204(a)(1) and/or 5 U.S.C. §552(b)(1). In accordance with sections 3.6 and 3.7 of Executive Order 12958, archivists at the Ronald Reagan Library returned copies of these documents to the originating and equity agencies for a classification review. These documents have subsequently been declassified in whole or in part by those agencies.

Please note that NARA has previously notified the White House of our intent to release all 1,898 pages in this notification in accordance with E.O. 12667. In letters dated April 6, 2001, May 9, 2001, and July 11, 2001, NARA notified the incumbent President of our intent to release a total of 36,191 pages and 43 minutes of tape recordings, of which these records are a part. The incumbent President made no decision with respect to these three notifications as issued under E.O. 12667. Therefore, in accordance with E.O. 13233, NARA is now providing notification of our intent to open this material.

Additionally, NARA also informed former President Reagan's representative, Joanne Drake, of our intent to release these records under E.O. 12667, as part of the 36,191 pages. Even though Ms. Drake informed us then that former President Reagan had no objection to the release of these records at that time, we are now providing notice to her under E.O. 13233.

In order to fulfill the White House Counsel's Office request that NARA provide the incumbent President with document-level information about formerly classified material proposed for release as well as the agencies authorizing their declassification, copies of these Reagan Presidential records can be found at Attachment B. These copies are annotated to include a list of all reviewing agencies for each document. Further, it should be noted that 73 pages of the 1,898 pages proposed for opening in this notification contain confidential communications requesting or submitting advice that would normally have been withheld prior to January 20, 2001, under the PRA restrictions in 44

U.S.C. §2204(a)(5), as they were asserted and narrowed by President Reagan. Copies of these documents have been segregated from the other documents and can be found at Attachment C.

Please inform us at your earliest convenience of your decision with respect to any privilege claims. Pursuant to E.O. 13233, NARA will not release the documents unless and until former President Reagan and the incumbent President agree to authorize access to the records.

If you have any questions relating to this request, please contact me at (202) 501-5700 or NARA General Counsel Gary M. Stern at (301) 837-3026.

Dear Judge Gonzales:

In accordance with the requirements of the Presidential Records Act (PRA), 44 U.S.C. §§2201-2207 and Executive Order 13233, this letter constitutes a formal notice from the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) to the incumbent President of our intent to open Reagan Presidential records in response to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request listed in Attachment A.

This material, consisting of 14,958 pages, has been reviewed for all applicable FOIA exemptions, resulting in a total of 268 pages restricted in whole and 22 pages restricted in part. NARA is proposing to open 14,690 pages in full and 22 pages in part. Reagan Presidential records are no longer subject to closure under the Presidential restrictive categories of the PRA. However, it should be noted that the material proposed for opening in this notice includes 220 pages of documents containing confidential communications requesting or submitting advice or other information that would normally have been withheld prior to January 20, 2001, under the PRA restrictions in 44 U.S.C. §2204(a), as they were asserted and narrowed by President Reagan. A copy of these documents is included at Attachment B. Additionally, nine pages of the records proposed for opening were declassified by Reagan Library staff using Department of State declassification guidelines. A copy of these declassified documents is included at Attachment C.

Copies of all other documents proposed for release under this notice will be provided to you upon request. We are also concurrently informing former President Reagan's representative, Joanne Drake, of our intent to release these records. Please inform us at your earliest convenience of your decision with respect to any privilege claims. Pursuant to E.O. 13233, NARA will not release the documents unless and until former President Reagan and the incumbent President agree to authorize access to the records.

Dear Judge Gonzales:

In accordance with the requirements of the Presidential Records Act (PRA), 44 U.S.C. §§2201-2207 and Executive Order 13233, this letter constitutes a formal notice from the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) to the incumbent President of our intent to open Bush Vice Presidential records in response to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request listed in Attachment A.

This material, consisting of 14 pages, has been reviewed for all applicable FOIA exemptions, resulting in no pages restricted in whole or in part. Therefore, NARA is proposing to open all 14 pages in full. Bush Vice Presidential records are no longer subject to closure under the Presidential restrictive categories of the PRA. However, it should be noted that the material proposed for opening in this notice contains no confidential communications requesting or submitting advice or information relating to appointment to Federal office that would normally have been withheld prior to January 20, 2001, under the PRA restrictions in 44 U.S.C. §2204(a), as they were asserted and narrowed by President Bush. *1

This request pertains to selected folders from the files of Kenneth Duberstein, Robert Kabel, and M.B. Oglesby, Jr., that pertain to their duties in the White House Office of Legislative Affairs. The records to be opened consist of material relating to a large array of issues involving the Reagan Administration's interactions with Congress between 1981 and 1986. This includes routine correspondence with members of Congress on various topics, routine information regarding proposed or pending legislation, requests for appointments, and requests for Presidential and Vice Presidential telephone calls to support various pieces of pending legislation. Also included are copies of legislation that were under consideration by Congress, reports on Congressional hearings and the testimony of various administration officials at those hearings, and memoranda regarding approaches taken by the Reagan Administration with executive agency officials and members of Congress in support of or opposition to legislation. Other records consist of memoranda that relate to appointment nominations by the President, legislative strategies employed by the Reagan Administration, and discussions concerning advice given by the Republican leadership in Congress. Finally, the chronological memoranda files maintained by these staff members in the Office of Legislative Affairs and processed for this FOIA request are generally routine in nature and document changes in various bills or relate to scheduling issues. This material contains 220 pages that would have been closed under restriction P-5 of the PRA prior to January 20, 2001. Copies of these pages can be found at Attachment B. It also includes nine pages declassified using Department of State guidelines. Copies of these pages can be found at Attachment C.

MEMORANDUM

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

May 8, 1981

TO: Max

FROM: Bill Gribbin

RE: Judicial selection process - Senate role

There was long discussion at yesterday's meeting about the way the Senate will figure in the President's judicial nominations. The senior staff at the meeting all understand the traditional blue slip system. They all agree, however, that the President will simply not abide by it.

Currently, we are asking senators for at least three names for each vacancy to which they want to propose someone. Baker and Thurmond have toyed with the names being proposed seriatim. But this has not placated Senators who insist upon their traditional habit of sending up only one name.

(Senators who "named" a candidate before the Attorney General issued his guidelines in March are being grandfathered into this system and handled on a separate basis.)

The President definitely considers these his appointments under the Constitution. Meese, Baker, et al. are ready to encounter senatorial resistance and, in effect, to call upon public opinion if any of the President's choices are stalled in Judiciary.

To avoid as much trouble as we can, it was agreed to continue to accept lists of three names from everyone who will comply. In almost all cases, the President's choices will come from those lists. As Senators see judges and others being appointed from the lists of their colleagues, it is hoped they will be more likely to go along with this system.

In recalcitrant cases, a Senator may be permitted to submit three names seriatim. He takes his chances of being embarassed. He sends in a single name. We tell him it's not what we want. He sends in another. Same response. He sends down a third. We then take all three and see if the President wants any of them.

The catch to this entire system, however, is something which Senators do not yet understand, thank heaven. There will be hell to pay when they find out that, if the White House does not like anyone on their list, the President feels free to select anybody at all from their state. Someone recommended by party leaders, friends, interest groups, etc. The example Meese, Baker and others keep returning to is Illinois. (I suspect that Connecticut and Rhode Island may figure in this too, although so far there has been no problem with the Washington selections!)

Subject: EXECUTIVE ORDER: FURTHER IMPLEMENTATION OF THE PRESIDENTIAL RECORDS ACT

THE WHITE HOUSE

Office of the Press Secretary

For Immediate Release November 1, 2001

EXECUTIVE ORDER

- - - - - - -

FURTHER IMPLEMENTATION OF THE PRESIDENTIAL RECORDS ACT

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, and in order to establish policies and procedures implementing section 2204 of title 44 of the United States Code with respect to constitutionally based privileges, including those that apply to Presidential records reflecting military, diplomatic, or national security secrets, Presidential communications, legal advice, legal work, or the deliberative processes of the President and the President's advisors, and to do so in a manner consistent with the Supreme Court's decisions in Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425 (1977), and other cases, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1. Definitions.

For purposes of this order:

(a) "Archivist" refers to the Archivist of the United States or his designee.

(b) "Presidential records" refers to those documentary materials maintained by the National Archives and Records Administration pursuant to the Presidential Records Act, 44 U.S.C. 2201-2207.

(c) "Former President" refers to the former President during whose term or terms of office particular Presidential records were created.

Sec. 2. Constitutional and Legal Background.

(a) For a period not to exceed 12 years after the conclusion of a Presidency, the Archivist administers records in accordance with the limitations on access imposed by section 2204 of title 44. After expiration of that period, section 2204(c) of title 44 directs that the Archivist administer Presidential records in accordance with section 552 of title 5, the Freedom of Information Act, including by withholding, as appropriate, records subject to exemptions (b)(1), (b)(2), (b)(3), (b)(4), (b)(6), (b)(7), (b)(8), and (b)(9) of section 552. Section 2204(c)(1) of title 44 provides that exemption (b)(5) of section 552 is not available to the Archivist as a basis for withholding records, but section 2204(c)(2) recognizes that the former President or the incumbent President may assert any constitutionally based privileges, including those ordinarily encompassed within exemption (b)(5) of section 552. The President=s constitu-tionally based privileges subsume privileges for records that reflect: military, diplomatic, or national security secrets (the state secrets privilege); communications of the President or his advisors (the presidential communications privilege); legal advice or legal work (the attorney-client or attorney work product privileges); and the deliberative processes of the President or his advisors (the deliberative process privilege).

(b) In Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, the Supreme Court set forth the constitutional basis for the President's privileges for confidential communications: "Unless [the President] can give his advisers some assurance of confidentiality, a President could not expect to receive the full and frank submissions of facts and opinions upon which effective discharge of his duties depends." 433 U.S. at 448-49. The Court cited the precedent of the Constitutional Convention, the records of which were "sealed for more than 30 years after the Convention." Id. at 447 n.11. Based on those precedents and principles, the Court ruled that constitutionally based privileges available to a President "survive[] the individual President's tenure." Id. at 449. The Court also held that a former President, although no longer a Government official, may assert constitutionally based privileges with respect to his Administration's Presidential records, and expressly rejected the argument that "only an incumbent President can assert the privilege of the Presidency." Id. at 448.

(c) The Supreme Court has held that a party seeking to overcome the constitutionally based privileges that apply to Presidential records must establish at least a "demonstrated, specific need" for particular records, a standard that turns on the nature of the proceeding and the importance of the information to that proceeding. See United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 713 (1974). Notwithstanding the constitutionally based privileges that apply to Presidential records, many former Presidents have authorized access, after what they considered an appropriate period of repose, to those records or categories of records (including otherwise privileged records) to which the former Presidents or their representatives in their discretion decided to authorize access. See Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. at 450-51.

Sec. 3. Procedure for Administering Privileged Presidential Records.

Consistent with the requirements of the Constitution and the Presidential Records Act, the Archivist shall administer Presidential records under section 2204(c) of title 44 in the following manner:

(a) At an appropriate time after the Archivist receives a request for access to Presidential records under section 2204(c)(1), the Archivist shall provide notice to the former President and the incumbent President and, as soon as practicable, shall provide the former President and the incumbent President copies of any records that the former President and the incumbent President request to review.

(b) After receiving the records he requests, the former President shall review those records as expeditiously as possible, and for no longer than 90 days for requests that are not unduly burdensome. The Archivist shall not permit access to the records by a requester during this period of review or when requested by the former President to extend the time for review.

(c) After review of the records in question, or of any other potentially privileged records reviewed by the former President, the former President shall indicate to the Archivist whether the former President requests withholding of or authorizes access to any privileged records.

(d) Concurrent with or after the former President's review of the records, the incumbent President or his designee may also review the records in question, or may utilize whatever other procedures the incumbent President deems appropriate to decide whether to concur in the former President's decision to request withholding of or authorize access to the records.

(1) When the former President has requested withholding of the records:

(i) If under the standard set forth in section 4 below, the incumbent President concurs in the former President's decision to request withholding of records as privileged, the incumbent President shall so inform the former President and the Archivist. The Archivist shall not permit access to those records by a requester unless and until the incumbent President advises the Archivist that the former President and the incumbent President agree to authorize access to the records or until so ordered by a final and nonappealable court order.

(ii) If under the standard set forth in section 4 below, the incumbent President does not concur in the former President's decision to request withholding of the records as privileged, the incumbent President shall so inform the former President and the Archivist. Because the former President independently retains the right to assert constitutionally based privileges, the Archivist shall not permit access to the records by a requester unless and until the incumbent President advises the Archivist that the former President and the incumbent President agree to authorize access to the records or until so ordered by a final and nonappealable court order.

(2) When the former President has authorized access to the records:

(i) If under the standard set forth in section 4 below, the incumbent President concurs in the former President's decision to authorize access to the records, the Archivist shall permit access to the records by the requester.

(ii) If under the standard set forth in section 4 below, the incumbent President does not concur in the former President's decision to authorize access to the records, the incumbent President may independently order the Archivist to withhold privileged records. In that instance, the Archivist shall not permit access to the records by a requester unless and until the incumbent President advises the Archivist that the former President and the incumbent President agree to authorize access to the records or until so ordered by a final and nonappealable court order.

Sec. 4. Concurrence by Incumbent President.

Absent compelling circumstances, the incumbent President will concur in the privilege decision of the former President in response to a request for access under section 2204(c)(1). When the incumbent President concurs in the decision of the former President to request withholding of records within the scope of a constitutionally based privilege, the incumbent President will support that privilege claim in any forum in which the privilege claim is challenged.

Sec. 5. Incumbent President's Right to Obtain Access.

This order does not expand or limit the incumbent President's right to obtain access to the records of a former President pursuant to section 2205(2)(B).

Sec. 6. Right of Congress and Courts to Obtain Access.

This order does not expand or limit the rights of a court, House of Congress, or authorized committee or subcommittee of Congress to obtain access to the records of a former President pursuant to section 2205(2)(A) or section 2205(2)(C). With respect to such requests, the former President shall review the records in question and, within 21 days of receiving notice from the Archivist, indicate to the Archivist his decision with respect to any privilege. The incumbent President shall indicate his decision with respect to any privilege within 21 days after the former President has indicated his decision. Those periods may be extended by the former President or the incumbent President for requests that are burdensome. The Archivist shall not permit access to the records unless and until the incumbent President advises the Archivist that the former President and the incumbent President agree to authorize access to the records or until so ordered by a final and nonappealable court order.

Sec. 7. No Effect on Right to Withhold Records.

This order does not limit the former President's or the incumbent President's right to withhold records on any ground supplied by the Constitution, statute, or regulation.

Sec. 8. Withholding of Privileged Records During 12-Year Period.

In the period not to exceed 12 years after the conclusion of a Presidency during which section 2204(a) and section 2204(b) of title 44 apply, a former President or the incumbent President may request withholding of any privileged records not already protected from disclosure under section 2204. If the former President or the incumbent President so requests, the Archivist shall not permit access to any such privileged records unless and until the incumbent President advises the Archivist that the former President and the incumbent President agree to authorize access to the records or until so ordered by a final and nonappealable court order.

Sec. 9. Establishment of Procedures.

This order is not intended to indicate whether and under what circumstances a former President should assert or waive any privilege. The order is intended to establish procedures for former and incumbent Presidents to make privilege determinations.

Sec. 10. Designation of Representative.

The former President may designate a represen-tative (or series or group of alternative representatives, as the former President in his discretion may determine) to act on his behalf for purposes of the Presidential Records Act and this order. Upon the death or disability of a former President, the former President's designated represen-tative shall act on his behalf for purposes of the Act and this order, including with respect to the assertion of constitutionally based privileges. In the absence of any designated representative after the former President's death or disability, the family of the former President may designate a representative (or series or group of alternative representa-tives, as they in their discre-tion may determine) to act on the former President's behalf for purposes of the Act and this order, including with respect to the assertion of constitutionally based privileges.

Sec. 11. Vice Presidential Records.

(a) Pursuant to section 2207 of title 44 of the United States Code, the Presidential Records Act applies to the executive records of the Vice President. Subject to subsections (b) and (c), this order shall also apply with respect to any such records that are subject to any constitutionally based privilege that the former Vice President may be entitled to invoke, but in the administration of this order with respect to such records, references in this order to a former President shall be deemed also to be references to the relevant former Vice President.

(b) Subsection (a) shall not be deemed to authorize a Vice President or former Vice President to invoke any constitutional privilege of a President or former President except as authorized by that President or former President.

(c) Nothing in this section shall be construed to grant, limit, or otherwise affect any privilege of a President, Vice President, former President, or former Vice President.

Sec. 12. Judicial Review.

This order is intended to improve the internal management of the executive branch and is not intended to create any right or benefit, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law by a party, other than a former President or his designated representative, against the United States, its agencies, its officers, or any person.

Sec. 13. Revocation.

Executive Order 12667 of January 18, 1989, is revoked.

PRESS ROUNDTABLE WITH WHITE HOUSE COUNSEL ALBERTO GONZALES

Room 180
Dwight D. Eisenhower Executive Office Building

1:20 P.M. EST

JUDGE GONZALES: We're here to talk about presidential records. Before 1978, presidential records belonged to the outgoing President of the United States, and they would make inappropriate and something that would be threatening to the nation? You just said those would be two standards, something that might be inappropriate or something that would be threatening to the nation. Could you distinguish the two?

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, the standard would be whether or not it satisfies the constitutional requirements for fitting in one of the recognized privileges.

Q On the Reagan documents, the 68,000 pages of Reagan documents, tell me again, where are you on that? You are still opposed to that release? You indicated they were going to be released?

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, I don't know what specific requests have been made of the archivist. I do know there have been --

Q The Washington Post reported this morning that you -- that this administration had blocked the release of 68,000 pages of documents that the Reagan administration wanted to be made public. Where are you on --

JUDGE GONZALES: I disagree with that.

Q You did -- that is not accurate?

JUDGE GONZALES: The Reagan representative is on board with this process and supports this process.

Q So therefore -- are we talking about the same thing here?

Q Those records were supposed to be released, by law, in January.

JUDGE GONZALES: They're available for release, but the statute makes quite clear -- makes quite clear that the statue in no way limits the constitutional prerogatives or privileges available to an incumbent President, or a former President. So on January --

Q Those are not national security documents, those are simply policy documents, and policy deliberation documents.

JUDGE GONZALES: But there may be implications for national security reasons. We don't know that. We don't know that, because --

Q Some historians are saying to us that the administration is using this current war on terrorism as a reason to champion national security as a reason to hold back on presidential records.

JUDGE GONZALES: We began this process back in May --

Q And also they say that this is just one more indication of the administration's attempts to restrict access to government records.

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, again, I think this not inconsistent with the battles that -- not battles, but the disagreements that have arisen between an administration and a Congress with respect to access to information. And all we have done here -- again, we have not created any new privileges, we haven't created any new obstacles. We've simply implemented an orderly process to deal with this information.

Q May I go back over two things, please, Judge? First, would you explain to us again why you felt it necessary to write a new executive order to replace the Reagan-era executive order? And, second, I'd like to return to the Freedom of Information question. The Post article says that for documents which are not covered by constitutionally based privileges, but are subject to requests under FOIA, the order states that the archivist "must withhold, if possible."

JUDGE GONZALES: I disagree with that. If there is no constitutional basis to assert a privilege, then the archivist -- the mandate on the archivist relates to a decision by a President or a former President. Whether or not that decision by a President or former President is in fact a legitimate one is one that has to be grounded on constitutional precedent.

Q Could you restate the reason for rewriting the executive order?

JUDGE GONZALES: The Reagan documents -- the Reagan executive order does not take into account the desires of a former President. It basically gives entirely the decision about what to do with documents to the incumbent President. We felt that that was inconsistent with Supreme Court precedent, which says that a former President, even though the former President is out of office, still has the ability and right to assert constitutional privileges.

And we also felt it was simply bad policy. We felt that the former President had as much, if perhaps not even more, of a right to decide what happens to his documents. And that was the reason that the executive order will be rescinded.

Q Former Presidents were, at one point, as I understand, given national security briefing updates. Is this still the case? And if that's the case, wouldn't they have a basis, given that information, to make a decision on what documents they want to release?

JUDGE GONZALES: Even if that is true today -- and I'm not going to confirm whether that's true today -- you don't know. I mean, I would venture to guess that that former President is not going to have all of the same information that an incumbent President has, and that the incumbent President will always have more information, and may be in a better position -- well, will be in a better position to decide whether or not the release of documents of a former President do, in fact, jeopardize, say, the national security of this country.

Q So you're not going to confirm whether they get updates or not?

JUDGE GONZALES: No.

Q Well, what if a document has been released? Will that be released in perpetuity, so anybody can have access to that same document? Do you envision a process where large categories of documents will be reviewed, and then just opened, released for anyone?

JUDGE GONZALES: It would be like a FOIA request. Someone makes a request for -- these documents, I guess they would be catalogued; and you say, I want documents one through 50. The archivist will then provide a copy to the former President, and the incumbent President. We will review them, the former President's representative will review them, and make a decision whether or not those documents should be released. If they should be, then they get released to the person who requested the documents.

Q So every time somebody wants documents one-two-three, that has to go through that process?

JUDGE GONZALES: Will we go through that process? I don't believe it will go through that process.

Q Okay, so once it's been released, it will be rubber-stamped?

JUDGE GONZALES: It's out in the public domain.

Q And that process you outlined has to happen in 90 days, is that correct?

JUDGE GONZALES: Yes. We call for it to happen in 90 days, if at all possible.

Q Accepting the possibility that something like this becomes law, let's think for a minute about the court challenge. I mean, if you've got a secret document, and we, you know --

JUDGE GONZALES: It's not a secret document.

Q A withheld document that is not part of the public domain.

JUDGE GONZALES: It's a privilege document.

Q A privilege document. How do you have a court proceeding? How does a court proceeding work, and how can the public be satisfied that legitimate standards have been --

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, the statute clearly provides that, with respect to a former President who wants to assert a privilege, that the court of original jurisdiction is the District Court for the District of Columbia. And at that point, the President will have to come in and prove the privilege -- assert the privilege. The requester will have to show compelling circumstance or need to override that privilege.

Q Can I back up to when you all got -- you all got this sort of voluminous request for records from the Reagan Library. Where in the process did you all get to the point where you decided, look, we need to either formalize this, or -- what was it that created a trigger?

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, we realized very early we didn't have a process to deal with this.

Q Right, and you could have just developed a process. You didn't have to move to the point where you formalized this --

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, we wanted a process that was binding upon the archivist, who is within the executive branch, and the best way to do that is through an executive order. And that's why we did it through this process.

Q But you could not -- you don't believe that the archivist would have simply worked with you all on this? If all of these exemptions -- if you all aren't really writing any new law with this, and if this is, as you say, simply a matter of process, and setting down some clear dates, and that sort of thing, then why did you not believe the archivist would have simply worked with you? Why did you need to rise and take this to the level of an executive order?

JUDGE GONZALES: I guess we wanted to give comfort to the American people that we would have a process in place to ensure that within a reasonable period of time most documents would be released in due course.

Q Judge, is there any -- pardon me if you've already mentioned this, but has there been an instance where a past President has agreed to release papers --

JUDGE GONZALES: Oh, sure.

Q No -- that eventually endangered national security, that actually breached national security somewhere along the line?

JUDGE GONZALES: I'm not aware of that. But, again --

Q Then why would you need a new process to make sure that doesn't happen in the future? The system then was working, was it not?

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, the difference is that, of course, before, those papers belonged to the former President. Now, these papers belong to the United States of America. So there is a difference. There is a difference.

Q How much input did the Bush Library have in this? Do they have any big document requests pending that they're worried about?

JUDGE GONZALES: I don't know of any document requests. But we did consult with former President Bush's representative on it.

Q Is the burden on proof on the historian or the scholar, if this goes to court, to prove that the President who asserts, the former President or the administration is --

JUDGE GONZALES: Major, I'm not certain, so I don't want to answer that question. I don't know. I just don't know the answer to that question.

Q Judge, can I ask on what you just said about -- that this process now, before, the papers belonged to the former President, and now they belong to the United States of America. This sounds to me -- I mean, coming late, but a major change.

JUDGE GONZALES: A major change from --

Q From once belonging to the former Presidents to --

JUDGE GONZALES: I began my remarks by explaining that before 1978, presidential records belonged to the outgoing President. So President Kennedy, President Nixon, President Carter, when they left office, their documents went with them. And they would decide, entirely on their own, which documents to release, on what timetable they would release those documents -- they could refuse to release any documents they wanted to for whatever reason.

In 1978, the Presidential Records Act was passed -- it was made effective, I think, in 1981 -- which basically provided that hereinafter, the presidential records of an outgoing President would belong to the National Archives. The Congress made quite clear that there would be limitations, restrictions on access to presidential records. And this executive order was passed merely to implement an orderly process to deal with requests for presidential records.

Q So one of your goals is to bring the former Presidents back into it?

Q Right, it doesn't sound like you're ensuring that the public has a clear set of guidelines, it sounds like this executive order guarantees a former President a new sense of authority in terms of what they can control and --

JUDGE GONZALES: No, this executive order doesn't create that. Again, the law clearly recognizes that a former President has a constitutional privilege that can be asserted even without this executive order. What we've done is simply implement a process, in terms of educating American citizens, about how that privilege is going to rightfully be asserted.

Q And it also is a process by which the former President can execute those privileges.

JUDGE GONZALES: Sure.

Q If the court gave them the privileges, then it may have been unclear to former Presidents about how and when they should insert themselves in the process, if they want to implement or exercise. This process gives the former Presidents a clear --

Q Blueprint.

Q Blueprint, right -- of how then to exercise any kind of exemptions or objections, if they may want to; is that not also what this does?

JUDGE GONZALES: It does not -- I think it's giving us too much credit to say that we're providing a blueprint as to how a former President can assert a privilege. I think a former President knows very well how to assert a privilege, and when that privilege can be asserted.

Q Other than reasons of national security, what other reasons can you see a current President or former President saying, these papers shouldn't be released?

JUDGE GONZALES: Again, I don't want to get into that. There could be circumstances I just can't foresee, so --

Q Well, they're on the law, aren't they? That's in the law, isn't it?

JUDGE GONZALES: Yes, but it's all very fact-specific, depending upon the facts, and depending upon the document that's being requested.

Q Judge, you mentioned a moment ago that if a scholar or historian takes a President to court, that scholar or historian would need to prove a "compelling need" for the document. Is that a judicially defined term of art?

JUDGE GONZALES: Yes. If you want to check with me later, I can give you the exact language from the U.S. Supreme Court case of Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, where the Court said what has to be shown to overcome a constitutionally based privilege. Don't tie me to those words. I can't remember now -- compelling, or something. Compelling need, or --

Q But there is a judicially defined standard by which a scholar or historian --

JUDGE GONZALES: Yes, there is.

Q -- would have to meet, to prove to the judge, to adjudicate this case, that there was this need to get this past the assertion of either a current President or a former President's privilege?

JUDGE GONZALES: Right. This is not a standard that we've made up. This is a standard that's recognized by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Q Judge, so that we may describe this as precisely as possible, would you be willing to make available to us the draft of the executive order?

JUDGE GONZALES: No.

Q Why not? You know, you're asking for --

JUDGE GONZALES: First of all, it may change. And, hopefully, we'll get it done quickly, and at that point you'll have a copy of the signed executive order.

Q Earlier you said in most cases 90 days, or you would try to make it?

JUDGE GONZALES: Yes.

Q Will it -- are there specific provisions in the order for going beyond 90 days --

JUDGE GONZALES: The order says 90 days. The truth of the matter is, if there's a request for 68,000 documents, and the Reagan representative has to review 68,000 documents, the Reagan representative may not be able to get it done in 90 days. It may take him 95 days. And so --

Q Well, it could take him 10 years. Is there any -- is there some specific end point to the review? Ninety days or never?

JUDGE GONZALES: Our objective, again, is to try to have the decision made within 90 days. Obviously, we have limited control upon the representative of a former President. But we would certainly do what we can, what we could do to ensure that we would have a decision within 90 days. That's our goal. We're going to make a good faith effort to make sure the decision is made with 90 days. And so we'll know where we're at in 90 days.

Q Obviously, that's not a binding requirement, and this could, in fact, if it's a document request like this, could take not weeks, not months, but years; isn't that true?

JUDGE GONZALES: I don't know how long it would take. Again, our objective is to try to get an answer to these requests as soon as possible.

Q Is 90 days in the executive order?

JUDGE GONZALES: Yes, 90 days is in the executive order.

Q Is it your goal, Judge, or will it be the goals of the administration on its end, to make its decision within 90 days?

JUDGE GONZALES: Absolutely.

Q So when do you hope to put this out?

JUDGE GONZALES: As soon as we can. I mean, we're still -- we need to finalize it, and get it approved by the President. And we'll get it out as soon as we can.

Q I realize that this isn't your purview, Judge, but it's hard to escape the suspicion that there could be political motives for not disclosing materials which might apply to people who served in this administration, who have served in past administrations -- the Reagan administration to begin with. And that is one thing, I guess, that has put this whole thing under a cloud of suspicion for many who look at it. I know that's not to do with the legality of it, but I think that's the elephant in the room here.

JUDGE GONZALES: Is there a question there?

Q Nope. (Laughter.) Not unless you care to respond to it.

Q I have a question. Do you have concerns about that perception?

Q Yes. Is there no response to that?

Q How concerned are you about the perception, no matter how diligently this is reported, that this administration is doing everything it can to withhold information?

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, first of all --

Q And using the war as cloak.

JUDGE GONZALES: First of all, again, it wasn't until August, after the executive order had really been drafted, that we even looked at the contents. We don't know what's in those documents. There may, in fact, be embarrassing documents. There may not be any embarrassing documents. We don't know.

If a document is embarrassing, and we assert a privilege, we're going to lose when that claim is litigated. We're going to lose, because that's not a legitimate reason to assert a privilege.

Q But that would be years down the road, wouldn't it, Judge?

JUDGE GONZALES: I don't know how long it will take. I don't know how long. But the bottom line is that this administration does not intend to assert privilege unless there's a constitutional basis to do so. It will not be driven by politics or by what looks good. It will be driven by what is in fact allowed under the Constitution.

Q And can you address Bill's other point, which was the perception by some that there is an effort -- because some of the Reagan people, the people who worked in the Reagan administration now work in this administration -- that there might be some effort to try to make sure there isn't information -- try to protect people who have served in both administrations, that sort of layover that this --

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, again, I don't know what the documents hold. And we will assert a privilege only when there's a legitimate reason to do so. Look, we haven't withheld a single document yet. There's been a delay, no question about it. But there's been no decision not to release a document. Let's see how this process works.

Q Sir, in your conversations with the Reagan folks, was that concern expressed to you or your office that there may be, in fact, some embarrassing documents here?

JUDGE GONZALES: No, not that I'm aware of.

THE PRESS: Thank you.

their own decision about what to do with their own records, what type of records to release, and when to release them. And typically, someone would make a request -- let's say for Jimmy Carter's records -- of the Carter Library. And President Carter or his representatives would make the decision what kind of documents to release. And they had the unfettered right to withhold any documents they wanted to, for however long they wanted to.

In 1978, the Presidential Records Act was passed, and I think it went into effect in 1981. And pursuant to that act, presidential records then became the property of the National Archives. And it first affects Ronald Reagan's records; he is the first President, former President, whose records are going to be subject to the Presidential Records Act.

Now, the act clearly recognizes that not all documents are to be released. In fact, I brought a copy of the statute that governs this. And the relevant statute is entitled, "Restrictions on Access to Presidential Records." So, clearly, Congress anticipated that certain documents would not be released.

And what we have done in this executive order is to provide a process, an orderly process, to help the Archivist, the former President, and the incumbent President deal with requests for information with respect to the presidential records of a former President. And that is what this order is intended to do. It does not in any way decide what kind of documents can be released. That decision is ultimately to be made by the former President and by the incumbent President.

There was an executive order that was signed by Ronald Reagan dealing with his presidential records. That will be rescinded by this order. And the reason that we are rescinding that order is because that order gives no deference whatsoever to the opinions of a former President. It basically says -- it gives, basically, the decision making to the incumbent President.

And we felt that was inconsistent with current Supreme Court precedent, and also, quite frankly, reflected bad policy. And we thought it would be more appropriate to really give the primary responsibility regarding presidential records to the former President whose records they belong to, and to have the incumbent President sort of be the backstop in making decisions about whether or not those documents should in fact be released.

So, with that, I'm happy to take any questions.

Q Some of the historians are saying that the proposed executive order is pretty much putting the PRA on its head, that there are plenty of exemptions under the current PRA to withhold things that are of national security concern, or personal concern, or third-party concerns, or even proprietary concerns, and that there's really no need for any further restriction.

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, this does not impose any additional restrictions. I want to be very clear about this: the privileges that can be asserted by a former President or by an incumbent President exist pursuant to the laws -- by decisions by the U.S. Supreme Court. This order could not create, you know, that kind of privilege. It is a privilege that exists out there already, irrespective of this order.

All this order does is provide the process by which, again, as I said, the archivist, the former President, and the incumbent President can deal with requests for information. But even if we didn't have this order -- even if we didn't have this order -- if Ronald Reagan's representative wanted to assert a privilege because he felt a privilege was appropriate, he could go ahead and assert it without this order.

Q Well, Judge, as you noted, the Reagan papers are the first to come under this situation. And both the Reagan Library and the National Archives, which obviously are reviewing national security concerns, okayed these papers for release. What's wrong with letting these -- what's wrong with letting these papers out?

JUDGE GONZALES: There hasn't been a decision by the Reagan representative to allow specific documents to be released. This is not something that this White House developed entirely on its own. The reason it has taken some time to put this executive order in place is because we consulted extensively with representatives of the Reagan Library, the Bush 41 Library, representatives from President Clinton. We have consulted extensively with the Department of Justice, and we consulted extensively with the archivist and the officials there, to put together a process that we think provides an orderly way to deal with requests for information.

And, listen, there is no way to anticipate -- I mean, I fully anticipate that a lot of the documents that are within the Reagan Library will be released, and will be released in due course. But there are certain kinds of documents that I think it is appropriate, particularly for national security reasons, that we have a process in place to make sure that you don't release something that hurts the national security of this country.

Q What prompted you to do this? If all of these exemptions existed, and there's a process that is already being worked out when it comes to the Reagan papers, why insert yourself in the middle of it?

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, we didn't insert ourselves in the middle of it. What really prompted this was because in -- I think in May, there was a huge request for documentation from the Reagan Library. And they didn't know how to deal with it. And so it made us realize we need to have some kind of process in place to deal with this.

And so we began in May, I believe, to work on the executive order. We worked on it through the summer, had it basically ready to go at the end of August. The archivist came to us, asked that we actually sample some of the documents, which we did. I think we sampled something like 2,000 documents provided to us by the archivist. And we -- but basically we have been ready to go with this executive order.

Again, what motivated this was the need to have an orderly process. That's what motivated this effort.

Q Well, let me ask this. I haven't read the order. But if the reports that I read are correct, the presumption ~~really~~ is in favor of not disclosing. For example --

JUDGE GONZALES: I don't agree.

Q Well, for example, if it is ~~true~~, as I read, that the order states that the archivist "must withhold, if possible," when requests are made under the Freedom of Information Act, that would seem to be an attempt not to disclose.

JUDGE GONZALES: I don't believe that the order provides for that. What the order provides for is a request be made to the archivist, for the incumbent President and the former President to be given a copy of those documents, and to make a decision within a certain period of time as to whether or not it's appropriate to assert a privilege. That's what it provides for.

Q Is there a "must withhold"?

JUDGE GONZALES: They ~~must withhold it if the former~~ President or the incumbent President wants to assert a privilege.

Now, let me make sure that everyone understands that this is not the end of the dispute, when that decision is made. That can be appealed to a court of law. And the President or the former President will only succeed on their decision to assert a privilege if, in fact, there ~~is a legitimate reason to do so.~~ This is not about trying to protect from embarrassing documentation or anything like that. This is about legitimately asserting privileges provided for under the Constitution.

Q Will there be a special office created to deal with this? Because I would imagine that you, if you say you had a huge number of requests in May, somebody's got to deal with those huge number of requests, both getting them through you and former Presidents. Are you creating a special office to, essentially, deal with these requests?

JUDGE GONZALES: We -- quite frankly, we haven't thought much about that. I think it will be headed primarily through the Counsel's Office, but we haven't thought about establishing a special office to deal with this.

We are going to give a lot of deference to the former President, because they are, in fact, his documents. And so we will look to the representative of the former President to decide whether or not a privilege should be asserted. And the executive order makes clear that except for compelling circumstances, that this administration will agree with the decision by President Reagan's representative.

Q What about the just cause burden, that you have to show that there's a real reason that you need to make this request?

JUDGE GONZALES: That's language that comes from the U.S. Supreme Court. The Supreme Court says that when there is a legitimate privilege, constitutional privilege that has been asserted, and can be made, that the only way to override that is to show a just cause reason to do so. So this is not a standard that we created. This is a standard created in law, by the --

Q Does this apply to all the documents, or is there a category where -- just broad, general public access, and a category where this --

JUDGE GONZALES: Again, every request made for documentation will go through the archivist, through this very orderly process. And the process applies to all the documents. I think for the vast majority of the documents, there will not be any privileges asserted.

Q But all must be reviewed?

JUDGE GONZALES: All will be reviewed. But a decision -- the executive order provides, and this is one of the reasons why it's less restrictive than, say, former Presidents' programs have been, in that the incumbent President and the former President have to try to make a decision as to whether or not to assert a privilege within 90 days. And, hopefully, within that period of time a decision is made to release the documents, and people will have the opportunity to look at these documents.

Q Okay, well, what if there's no decision? Does it default to releasing them or does it default to --

JUDGE GONZALES: There will be a decision made. I mean, the full intent is to have a decision made by the representative of President Reagan and by this administration within 90 days, if at all possible.

Q There are people such as Congressman Hefley, a Republican, who basically says that the administration, either this administration or past administrations, tends to use executive orders in a much wider scope. Do you feel that -- I mean, obviously you don't feel, but what about the question, that this executive order may be really legislating Congress, rather than Congress legislating the law?

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, Congress did not provide for any kind of mechanism or process to deal with this -- to deal with how to deal with the former President's records. And we have an obligation to make sure the laws are faithfully executed, that we have an orderly process in place to deal with this. And that's what this executive order is intended to do.

Q But the presumption seems to be for secrecy, Judge.

JUDGE GONZALES: This presumption is not --

Q It seems to be for secrecy.

JUDGE GONZALES: Sir, I don't know -- when you say "the presumption is for secrecy", I disagree with that. I don't think you can presume. There's no way of knowing how many of these documents will in fact be released. A lot will depend on the type of documents that are requested, and the review and the final decisions by the incumbent President and the former President.

Q That's a Catch-22. It can be blocked by either one.

JUDGE GONZALES: And can be released by either one.

Q No, not if the other one disagrees.

JUDGE GONZALES: But, again, there is a strong presumption in favor of the former President. If he wants to release documents, except for exceptional circumstances, this administration will abide by that decision.

Q Well, at the top here, you walked us through what had been the case prior to 1978, and obviously the big changes that we had then with the Records Release Act. And you just said twice, we are going to give a lot of deference to former Presidents. I mean, how does that not take us back to the pre-1978 period, when in fact they had almost exclusive control over their own papers?

JUDGE GONZALES: Because today, now, the former President cannot withhold documents if there is not a legitimate constitutional privilege basis on which to do so. And also now, today, the former President has to make that decision within a certain period of time. So in those two respects, this mechanism may in fact make it easier to get documents than before.

Q What would prevent a former President, though, from saying -- giving any reason, let's say, for saying I don't want these documents released? National security, privacy -- I mean, you're saying that unless he can make a strong case on why they shouldn't be released, they will be released. But what will stop that former President from coming up with any argument to hold on to those papers?

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, again, a former President could attempt to do that. And then if that former President is challenged in court -- if, in fact, there's not a legitimate reason to assert that privilege, the public will have access to that information.

better answer

Q Is this executive order in effect right now? Has it taken effect?

JUDGE GONZALES: No, it is not in effect.

Q Well, where is it right now in the process?

JUDGE GONZALES: We are in the final stages of trying to finalize it. And hopefully we will get it done relatively soon.

Q What about the issue of redaction? What about the issue of redaction? I mean, lots of documents that have come out relating to Iran-Contra, for instance, were released but redacted almost to the point of uselessness. I mean, will that be part of this process, too?

JUDGE GONZALES: This executive order, again, does not deal with redaction at all.

Q Do you try to establish what is a legitimate reason to withhold?

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, part of our job will be to advise this President with respect to whether or not we think there's a constitutional basis to assert a privilege.

better answer

Now, the President may decide not to assert the privilege. There are many instances where, in the past, a former President may release documents, even though that President or the President's representatives may view it okay to go ahead and release the documents, even though a privilege can be asserted. That will still continue. There will be instances where former Presidents and this President will go ahead and decide to release documents, even though a privilege could be asserted. There's no reason to believe that that won't continue.

MR. FLEISCHER: Judge, excuse me one second. Before you walked in, Larry and Ed, the Judge held up the statute that Congress wrote that created this process, that led to the process that the Judge has created. And it says in the statute that there is a restriction on documents that can be released. So that is from the organic statute; this EO is a reflection of that.

Q Regardless of whether or not the documents will eventually be released, or how many, it does set up another obstacle. It does set up another barrier.

JUDGE GONZALES: It provides an orderly process, is what it does. Because you have to -- even without this EO, what would happen --

Q It must -- it will mean delay in the release of papers.

JUDGE GONZALES: But even without this EO, what would happen is that you would have to go to the archivist and get the papers anyway, ask for the papers. The archivist, because the archivist understands that a former President and an incumbent President have a constitutional basis to assert a privilege, will check with the former President and with the incumbent President to see, can I release these documents?

This provides an orderly process, trying to impose some time restraints, so that the decision can be made in an orderly fashion as quickly as possible.

Q Judge, how much time do you figure that you and your office have spent on this issue? And, prospectively, how time consuming do you expect it to be after the executive order is in effect?

JUDGE GONZALES: I can't anticipate the latter -- I don't know. We spent -- you know, this is an important issue. It's the first time this process has had to have been implemented. And as I said before, we have consulted with a lot of folks to make sure this is a process that makes sense under these circumstances.

Q Judge, in the process of deferring to former Presidents, if they give you the green light, will you -- and are you telling us and historians who are curious about this that in almost every case, if the former President gives you the green light, you are going to respect that green light? Or do you see part of your obligation to assert the President's wishes, and contravene the wishes of a former President, if there are issues you think need to be asserted, either constitutionally or on national security?

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, you'll have to remember that a former President may not have knowledge that this President has about, for example, national security issues that are ongoing; and that there may be reasons in which this President may want to go ahead and assert a privilege, even though the former President does not wish to do so, because this President may have knowledge. And it is the responsibility of this President, now, to protect the national security of this country.

Q How do you insulate yourself, then, against questions about that being simply a variation on the current prohibition we have, under the circumstances we're in now, of "not discussing operational details." I mean, isn't that a cloak that you can use to throw over -- how do you counter the accusations that will come from historians and scholars that you're using that, each and ever time you do it, as an excuse not to release stuff that is probably of legitimate public value? I mean, you know, how do you plan to deal with that? Because the questions most certainly are going to come, not just today, but every time this happens down the road.

JUDGE GONZALES: Again, all of these decisions can be tested in court. And if in fact we are not making a good faith effort to assert legitimate privileges, that will soon be revealed.

Q Do you anticipate that only the national security exemption would be applied in overruling a previous President's wishes? Or can you see, like, executive communication or --

JUDGE GONZALES: I can't anticipate -- again, it would be unfair for me to restrict this President's decision making, in terms of when he may override a decision of the former President. All I can say is the statute clearly provides for it, but it would require an exceptional circumstance.

Q The average citizen's recourse, if I understand this, the stopgap here, is to take a President or a former President to court.

JUDGE GONZALES: But that would be the recourse even without the order. That's the recourse without the order, because the President and former President still have that privilege, without the order. And so, even without the order, if a citizen wanted access to information, and a former President decides to assert his privilege, the only thing that a citizen can do is take them to court. We're not changing that.

Q Judge, in your conversations with the President, if you've had any on this particular subject, has he given you any indication of what he wants your sort of baseline assumptions to be? The assumption is, release as much as you can, if the former President gives you a green light, or filter everything very carefully and make sure that we are on the other side of the ledger, more toward asserting this privilege?

JUDGE GONZALES: Well, I think that there's a recognition of the importance, for historical reasons, of releasing as much information as we can, being mindful of the fact that there may be reasons that it's inappropriate or harmful to this country not to release certain information. I think we would err on trying to release as much information as we possibly can.

Q On that point, Judge, could you differentiate between

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

November 2, 2001

Dear Chairman Horn:

I have learned that on November 6 the House Subcommittee on Government Efficiency, Financial Management, and Intergovernmental Relations will hold its previously postponed hearing on the Presidential Records Act. In advance of that hearing, we wanted to inform you of a recent development.

President Bush yesterday signed an executive order implementing section 2204(c) of the Presidential Records Act, the provision of the Act that states: "Nothing in this Act shall be construed to confirm, limit, or expand any constitutionally-based privilege which may be available to an incumbent or former President." That statutory provision is necessary, of course, to the Act's constitutionality, for the Supreme Court held in 1977 that both former and current Presidents retain the constitutional right to assert privileges over the records of a former President, including after expiration of a 12-year period of presumptive non-disclosure. See Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425 (1977). Furthermore, Congress contemplated that such constitutional privileges would be available and could be asserted, even after expiration of the 12-year period: At the time the Act was enacted, Senator Percy stated that if a President "believe[d] that the 12-year closure period does not suffice, that President could object to the release of some document in the 13th or 15th or 20th year." Cong. Record S36844 (Oct. 13, 1978).

The Act and its legislative history, as well as the Supreme Court's decision in Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, obviously necessitate procedures for former and current Presidents to review Presidential records of a former President and, if they choose, to assert constitutional privileges. President Bush's order responds to that need by establishing clear and sensible procedures for former and current Presidents to exercise their rights and responsibilities in a timely manner. The order replaces an earlier executive order (Executive Order 12667 of January 18, 1989) that had established some skeletal procedures for assertion of privileges over Presidential records and had provided that the current President would have the primary responsibility for asserting privileges over the records of a former President. President Bush's new order supercedes that prior order both to set forth clearer procedures and to establish, consistent with the Supreme Court's decision in Nixon v. Administrator of General Services and with what the Administration believes to be sound policy and procedure, that former Presidents are to have the primary responsibility for asserting privileges over their records. Indeed, section 4 of President Bush's order, which is its most critical component, provides that the current President will defer, absent compelling circumstances, to the decisions of the former President regarding the former President's records. In sum, therefore, the new executive order grants the current President less relative authority over the records of a former President than did the prior executive order. We believe this point is critical to a proper understanding of the executive order, and has been largely overlooked in public commentary thus far.

In addition, President Bush's order does not purport to guide former Presidents as to their privilege assertions. Section 9 of the order provides that the order does not purport to indicate "whether and under what circumstances a former President should assert or waive any privilege." Indeed, it would have been improper, if not illegal, for President Bush to attempt to limit or override the constitutional rights and privileges of former Presidents -- rights that have been guaranteed by the Supreme Court. But it also bears mention that Section 2 of the order refers to the historical practice before enactment of the Presidential Records Act by which former Presidents, over time, have released a vast majority of their records even though under no legal obligation to do so. We anticipate that this historical practice will continue. At a minimum, contrary to the claims of some commentators, there is no logical basis for assuming that former Presidents will exercise their constitutional and statutory authority to seek withholding of privileged records more aggressively than earlier Presidents -- from President Washington to President Carter -- exercised their plenary and far broader authority to withhold all records.

Finally, you should know that the Administration consulted extensively with the National Archives and Records Administration, the Department of Justice, and former Presidents' representatives before President Bush issued this order. We benefited greatly from that consultation.

Please do not hesitate to contact me if you have any questions about the order.

Sincerely,

Alberto R. Gonzales

NEWS RELEASE

MEDIA ALERT

December 20, 2001

Previously Withheld Reagan Presidential Materials to be Released

WHAT: College Park, MD. . .Approximately 8,000 pages of materials from the records of Ronald Reagan's Presidency that were previously withheld under the Presidential Records Act restriction for confidential advice between White House officials. These records are the first segment of the approximately 68,000 pages of records that the National Archives Records Administration proposed to release earlier this year. In accordance with Executive Order 13233, representatives of former President Reagan and President Bush have reviewed these records and have chosen not to assert any constitutionally based privilege.

This opening consists of records from the staff member and office files, National Security Council files, and the alphabetically arranged Subject Files of the White House Office of Records Management (WHORM), beginning with Agriculture, Arts, Atomic/Nuclear Energy, and Business/Economics.

Judge Alberto Gonzales
The White House OEOB-175

Dear Judge Gonzales:

I am among the many writers and scholars who regularly work in the National Archives and Presidential libraries. My best known books based largely on such archival research are "President Kennedy: Profile of Power" and "President Nixon: Alone in the White House", published this month by Simon and Schuster. Those books were considered successes, I believe, and have been cited by presidents, including George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton, as important contributions to not only understanding but to the operations of the White House.

As you know, I tried to send copies of those books to your office this morning, but was informed that the White House is not accepting packages because of the current crisis. Instead, I am faxing this note and putting the books (and a copy of a letter from George H.W. Bush) in ordinary U.S. Mail to be picked up at a date uncertain. My purpose is to try to bring to the White House's attention the implications of your order on the understanding of the the role of the Presidency in the future. It may be inconvenient in the present, but history is not about the past, it is a guide to the future.

I am also in the process of writing an assigned Op-Ed piece for The New York Times on this subject and would appreciate a call from you to discuss your viewpoint. As reported in the press, the order could essentially end most archival research on presidents (and vice presidents) by making it too expensive and too time-consuming. We are writers not lawyers. I will also attempt to organize other historians and journalists to dramatize the anti-history nature of the executive order.

I look forward to speaking with you and have attached a short biography for your information.

Sincerely,

Richard Reeves

Title 3 -- The President

Presidential Records

Executive Order 12667 of January 18, 1989

54 FR 3403

TEXT:
By virtue of the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, and in order to establish policies and procedures governing the assertion of Executive privelege by incumbent and former Presidents in connection with the release of Presidential records by the National Archives and Records Administration pursuant to the Presidential Records Act of 1978, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1 Definitions. For purposes of this Order:

(a) "Archivist" refers to the Archivist of the United States or his designee.

(b) "NARA" refers to the National Archives and Records Administration.

(d) "NARA regulations" refers to the NARA regulations implementing the Presidential Records Act. 53 Fed. Reg. 50404 (1988), codified at 36 C.F.R. Part 1270.

(e) "Presidential records" refers to those documentary materials maintained by NARA pursuant to the Presidential Records Act and the NARA regulations.

(f) "Former President" refers to the former President during whose term or terms of office particular Presidential records were created.

(g) A "substantial question of Executive privilege" exists if NARA's disclosure of Presidential records might impair the national security (including the conduct of foreign relations), law enforcement, or the deliberative processes of the Executive branch.

(h) A "final court order" is a court order from which no appeal may be taken.

Sec. 2. Notice of Intent to Disclose Presidential Records.

(a) When the Archivist provides notice to the incumbent and former Presidents of his intent to disclose Presidential records pursuant to section 1270.46 of the NARA regulations, the Archivist, utilizing any guidelines provided by the incumbent and former Presidents, shall identify any specific materials, the disclosure of which he believes may raise a substantial question of Executive privilege. However, nothing in this Order is intended to affect the right of the incumbent or former Presidents to invoke Executive privilege with respect to materials not identified by the Archivist. Copies of the notice for the incumbent President shall be delivered to the President (through the Counsel to the President) and the Attorney General (through the Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel). The copy of the notice for the former President shall be delivered to the former President or his designated representative.

(b) Upon the passage of 30 days after receipt by the incumbent and former Presidents of a notice of intent to disclose Presidential records, the Archivist may disclose the records covered by the notice, unless during that time period the Archivist has received a claim of Executive privilege bythe incumbent or former President or the Archivist has been instructed by the incumbent president or his designee to extend the time period. If a shorter time period is required under the circumstances set forth in section 1270.44 of the NARA regulations, the Archivist shall so indicate in the notice.

Sec. 3. Claim of Executive Privilege by Incumbent President.

(a) Upon receipt of a notice of intent to disclose Presidential records, the Attorney General (directly or through the Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel) and the Counsel to the President shall review as they deem appropriate the records covered by the notice and consult with each other, the Archivist, and such other Federal agencies as they deem appropriate concerning whether invocation of Executive privilege is justified.

(b) The Attorney General and the Counsel to the President, in the exercise of their discretion and after appropriate review and consultation under subsection (a) of this section, may jointly determine that invocation of Executive privilege is not justified. The Archivist shall be promptly notified of an such determination.

(c) If after appropriate review and consultation under subsection (a) of this section, either the Attorney General or the Counsel to the President believes that the circumstances justify invocation of Executive privilege, the issue shall be presented to the President by the Counsel to the President and the Attorney General.

(d) If the President decides to invoke Executive privilege, the Counsel to the President shall notify the former President, the Archivist, and the Attorney General in writing of the claim of privilege and the specific Presidential records to which it relates. After receiving such notice, the Archivist shall not disclose the privileged records unless directed to do so by an incumbent President or by a final court order.

Sec. 4. Claim of Executive Privilege by Former President.

(a) Upon receipt of a claim of Executive privilege by a former President, the Archivist shall consult with the Attorney General (through the Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel), the Counsel to the President, and such other Federal agencies as he deems appropriate concerning the Archivist's determination as to whether to honor the former President's claim of privilege or istead to disclose the Presidential records notwithstanding the claim of privilege. An determination under section 3 of this Order that Executive privilege shall not be invoked by the incumbent President shall not prejudice the Archivist's determination with respect to the former President's claim of privilege.

(b) In making the determination referred to in subsection (a) of this section, the Archivist shall abide by any instructions given him by the incumbent President or his designee unless otherwise directed by a final court order. The Archivist shall notify the incumbent and former Presidents of his determination at least 30 days prior to disclosure of the Presidential records, unless a shorter time period is required in the circumstances set forth in section 1270.44 of the NARA regulations. Copies of the notice for the incumbent President shall be delivered to the President (through the Counsel the President) and the Attorney General (through the Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel). The copy of the notice for the former President shall be delivered to the former President or his designated representative.

Sec. 5. Judicial Review. This Order is intended only to improve the internal management of the Executive branch and is not intended to create any right or benefit, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law by a party against the United States, its agencies, its officers, or any person.

OPINION OF THE OFFICE OF LEGAL COUNSEL

CONFIDENTIALITY OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S COMMUNICATIONS IN COUNSELING THE PRESIDENT

1982 OLC LEXIS 77; 6 Op. O.L.C. 481

August 2, 1982

CORE TERMS: disclosure, exemption, attorney-client, confidentiality, deliberative process, memorandum, adviser, deliberative, law enforcement, confidential, advice, informant, advisory, duty, secret, claim of privilege, deliberations, investigatory, Freedom Of Information Act, legal advice, presidential, discovery, exempt, national security, military, evidentiary, common law, predecisional, work-product, privileged

[The following memorandum examines the scope of confidentiality accorded the Attorney General's communications with the President, and the extent to which those communications may be shielded from compulsory disclosure to Members of Congress, the courts, and members of the public. It considers the dual nature of the Attorney General's role as Cabinet member and as principal legal adviser to the President, and extends to the broader question of the confidentiality of the deliberative materials generated by the Attorney General and those who assist him. The memorandum discusses the applicability of the doctrine of executive privilege, and the appropriate circumstances for its invocation. It also analyzes the scope of the deliberative process and attorney-client privileges under the Freedom of Information Act, and of the traditional governmental evidentiary privileges and their statutory counterparts.]

ADDRESSEE:
Memorandum for the Attorney General

OPINIONBY: OLSON

OPINION:
[481] You have asked this Office to advise you regarding the scope of confidentiality accorded your communications with the President in your role as Attorney General. Your inquiry focused particularly on the extent to which legal advice [*2] rendered by you to the President may be shielded from compulsory disclosure to Members of Congress, the courts, and members of the public. Our analysis of these issues includes the broader subject of the confidentiality of the deliberative materials generated by you, and those who assist you, in the performance of your responsibilities as adviser to the President. We also discuss briefly certain privileges which protect other communications generated by the Department of Justice in the course of performing its duties.

Any discussion of the confidential nature of the Attorney General's communications with the President must begin with a recognition of the dual counseling functions performed by the Attorney General. The Attorney General serves as both a Cabinet adviser and the principal legal adviser to the President. n1 As a member of the President's Cabinet, the Attorney

While it is unlikely that very many of the Attorney General's communications will be in the category of communications with regard to which claims of privilege are entitled to the strictest deference, e.g., military, diplomatic, or sensitive national security matters, his communications to the President may nevertheless demand greater confidentiality than those of some other Cabinet advisers, because of the nature of the Attorney General's responsibilities to the Executive and his special areas of expertise, e.g., legal advice and law enforcement. See Harmon Memorandum, supra, at 26. n17 n17 In his memorandum to the Attorney General regarding a congressional subcommittee's demand for certain documents from the Department of Energy, Assistant Attorney General Harmon advised:

[T]o whatever extent the customary attorney-client privilege applies to government attorneys, we believe that the reasons for the constitutional privilege against the compelled disclosure of executive branch deliberations have special force when legal advice is involved. None of the President's obligations is more solemn than his duty to obey the law. The Constitution itself places this responsibility on him, in his oath of office and in the requirement of article II, section 3 that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Because this obligation is imposed by the Constitution itself, Congress cannot lawfully undermine the President's ability to carry it out. Moreover, legal matters are likely to be among those on which high government officials most need, and should be encouraged to seek, objective, expert advice. As crucial as frank debate on policy matters is, it is even more important that legal advice be "candid, objective, and even blunt or harsh," see United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 708 (1974), where necessary. Any other approach would jeopardize not just particular policies and programs but the principle that the government must obey the law. For these reasons, it is critical that the President and his advisers be able to seek, and give, candid legal advice and opinions free of the fear of compelled disclosure.

Harmon Memorandum, supra, at 26. [*24]

II. The Freedom of Information Act -- Exemption 5: The Deliberative Process Privilege and the Attorney-Client Privilege

Exemption 5 of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) n18 protects from compulsory disclosure to the public, government materials which are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). This exemption thus codifies the traditional common law privileges afforded certain documents in the context of civil litigation and discovery, see Fed. R. Civ. P. 26; Fed. R. Evid. 501, including the executive "deliberative [491] process" privilege, NLRB v. Sears, supra, EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73 (1973); Taxation With Representation v. IRS, 646 F.2d 666 (D.C. Cir. 1981); the attorney-client privilege, Brinton v. Department of State, 636 F.2d 600, 603-04 (D.C. Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 452 U.S. 905 (1981); Mead Data Central v. United States Department of Air Force, 566 F.2d 242, 252-55 (D.C. Cir. 1977); and the attorney work-product privilege, NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 154 (1975); [*25] Bristol-Myers Co. v. FTC, 598 F.2d 18 (D.C. Cir. 1978), as applied to document requests of government agencies from members of the public. See also Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854 (D.C. Cir. 1980). All of these privileges encompassed by exemption 5 may be claimed, in appropriate circumstances, to protect communications between the Attorney General's Office and the Office of the President from compulsory disclosure to members of the press and the general public. n19 Nevertheless, even though the FOIA exemptions noted above are analogous to the common law evidentiary privileges which have been incorporated by implication into the Act, the standards for asserting the evidentiary privileges can serve only as a "rough guide" to the courts in determining the validity of FOIA exemption claims. This is so because decisions as to discovery are usually based on a balancing of the relative need of the parties, and standards vary according to the kind of litigation involved. Furthermore, the most fundamental discovery and evidentiary principle, relevance to the issues being litigated, plays no part in FOIA cases.

Coastal States, supra, [*26] at 862, citing EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 86 (1973). See also Playboy Enterprises v. Department of Justice, 677 F.2d 931, 936 (D.C. Cir. 1982); McClelland v. Andrus, 606 F.2d 1278, 1287 nn. 54, 55 (D.C. Cir. 1979). n20 n18 While other exemptions to the FOIA occasionally may be applicable to the types of communications discussed in this memorandum, e.g., the exemption 7 privilege for law enforcement investigatory records, see 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7) discussed in part III.C., infra, because of the Attorney General's advisory relationship to the President, most such communications will come within the privileges embraced by exemption 5.

n19 The exemptions contained in the Freedom of Information Act do "not [provide] authority to withhold information from Congress." 5 U.S.C. § 552(c).

n20 In explaining the relationship between the privileges under FOIA and the evidentiary privileges in litigation, the D.C. Circuit stated:

[T]he analysis contained in Exemption 5 cases is applicable [to common law discovery cases] because Exemption 5 exempts only those documents normally privileged in the civil discovery context. NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 148-49 . . . (1975); EPA v. Mink, . . . 410 U.S. at 85-86 . . . (1973); Vaughn v. Rosen, . . . 523 F.2d at 1143 (1975). Thus in effect Exemption 5 is co-extensive with the common law discovery privileges: Exemption 5 shields from a member of the public seeking a document under FOIA that which would be shielded from a litigant seeking discovery from an agency. There is, however, an additional factor to be considered in the discovery context that is not considered in the FOIA context. . . . When a party seeks discovery against the Government and the Government interposes a claim of privilege, it is appropriate for the court to consider the litigant's need for the material. But when a member of the public seeks access to material under FOIA and the Government claims that the material comes within the purview of Exemption 5, disclosure is permitted of that which would "routinely be disclosed" in private litigation. H.R. Rep. No. 1497, 89th Cong., 2d Sess. 10 (1966). Stated differently, the extent of the requester's need is not considered in the FOIA context.

McClelland v. Andrus, supra, at 1287, n.54 (emphasis supplied). [*27]

A. "Deliberative Process" Privilege

The "deliberative process" privilege under FOIA is substantially similar in scope and purpose to the deliberative process aspect of executive privilege, [492] discussed above. Although both privileges apply generally to the same types of documents, the primary differences between the two privileges lie in their respective applications. First, executive privilege traditionally has been invoked only by the President to shield documents from disclosure to Congress, and by the President or the head of any executive department or agency in judicial proceedings. n21 FOIA exemptions, in contrast, may be claimed by the head, or other designated official, of any government agency in possession of documents for which a request has been made by a member of the public. Second, as noted above, claims of executive privilege for deliberative documents must be balanced against the public interest in disclosure, which is frequently analyzed in terms of the requesting government institution's ability to perform its functions responsibly -- whether legislative investigations or judicial resolution of disputes -- without gaining access to the disputed [*28] materials. In considering the claims of exemptions under FOIA, however, the requestor's interest in or need for the documents is irrelevant. See H.R. Rep. No. 1497, 89th Cong., 2d Sess. 10 (1966); McClelland v. Andrus, supra. Notwithstanding these differences, the analyses involved in the applications of the two privileges are very similar.

n21 See nn. 4, 5, supra.

As in the case of executive privilege, the "deliberative process" privilege embraced by exemption 5 was intended to protect the integrity of the decision-making process and to promote full and frank deliberations during that process. However, consistent with the strong disclosure policy of FOIA, the privilege is to be considered "'as narrowly as [is] consistent with efficient Government operation.'" Coastal States, supra, 617 F.2d at 868, quoting from S. Rep. No. 813, 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 9 (1965). See also FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 629-32 (1982); Department of Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 360-62 (1976). The privilege exempts documents which are advisory or recommendatory in nature, reflecting "the give-and-take of the consultative process . . ., weighing the [*29] pros and cons of agency adoption of one viewpoint or another," Coastal States, supra, 617 F.2d at 866, and "other subjective documents that reflect the personal opinions of the writer prior to the agency's adoption of a policy." Taxation With Representation, supra, 646 F.2d at 677. See also NLRB v. Sears, supra, 421 U.S. at 150; Brinton v. Department of State, supra, 636 F.2d at 604-06. In the words of the D.C. Circuit, which has developed a considerable body of law construing the deliberative process privilege:

[The privilege] was created to protect the deliberative process of the government, by ensuring that persons in an advisory role would be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision-makers without fear of publicity. . . . Such consultations are an integral part of [an agency's] deliberative process; to conduct this process in public view would inhibit frank discussion of policy matters and likely impair the quality of decisions.

[493] Ryan v. Department of Justice, 617 F.2d 781, 789-90 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (footnote omitted). In addition, the privilege was designed to protect against premature disclosure of proposed policies [*30] before they have been finally formulated or adopted; and to protect against confusing the issues and misleading the public by dissemination of documents suggesting reasons and rationales for a course of action which were not in fact the ultimate reasons for the agency's action.

Coastal States, supra, 617 F.2d at 866.

Applying this standard to the materials discussed in this memorandum, documents reflecting the internal details involved in the preparation of formal Attorney General opinions or Office of Legal Counsel opinions, as well as the more informal predecisional working papers which pass between and within the Attorney General's Office and the Office of the President, would be included in this category of deliberative documents protected by exemption 5. See, e.g., Brinton v. Department of State, supra (holding that opinions prepared by the Office of the Legal Adviser for the Secretary of State fell within the deliberative process privilege of exemption 5).

The courts have held, however, that "deliberative process" privilege does not protect documents which reflect final opinions, statements of reasons supplying the bases for decisions, or policies actually [*31] adopted, or documents that otherwise constitute the "working law" of an agency. See NLRB v. Sears, supra, 421 U.S. at 152-53; Taxation With Representation, supra, 646 F.2d at 678; Coastal States, supra, 617 F.2d at 866-68. The rationale underlying the "final opinion" exception to the deliberative process privilege is to prevent agencies from developing a body of "secret law" veiled by the exemption 5 privilege -- the maintenance of which "would weigh heavily against the public interest." Sterling Drug, Inc. v. FTC, 450 F.2d 698, 715 (D.C. Cir. 1971). See Brinton v. Department of State, supra, 636 F.2d at 605. Thus, decision documents of the Office of the President, deliberative materials "incorporated" into those documents, and opinions of the Attorney General which have been "incorporated" into the President's final document, would be subject to disclosure under FOIA. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73 (1973). n22 n22 "Final opinions" of the Office of Legal Counsel or the Attorney General, which were written for the President and form part of the basis of the President's final action, but which have not been "incorporated" into the President's final decision document, would be protected from disclosure under exemption 5's privilege for attorney-client communications, as well as the deliberative process privileges. See Brinton v. Dep't of State, supra; Mead Data Central, supra.

If the "final opinions" from the Attorney General's Office are not of a legal advisory nature -- or are otherwise ineligible for a claim of attorney-client privilege -- an analysis must be made regarding the purpose of the opinion documents in issue. If the opinion is a predecisional document -- i.e., the document presents the Attorney General's views on a particular matter which will be considered by the President in taking final executive action, or in the case where final executive action has already been taken but the Attorney General submits a document which "provide[s] guides for decisions of similar or analogous cases arising in the future" -- the Supreme Court has stated that the document is exempted from FOIA's disclosure mandate as a deliberative document. NLRB v. Sears, supra, 421 U.S. at 152, n.19. If the Attorney General's "final opinion" is postdecisional, as are most final opinions -- i.e., communications which "look[] back on and explain[] . . . a decision already reached or a policy already adopted" -- the opinion would not be exempt from FOIA's disclosure mandate, since disclosure would pose "a negligible risk of denying to agency decisionmakers the uninhibited advice which is so important to agency decisions." Id.

In its companion case to NLRB v. Sears, supra, Renegotiation Bd. v. Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp., 421 U.S. 168, 184-85 (1975), the Court set forth the additional consideration of whether the author of the "final opinion" possesses decisional authority with reference to matters addressed in the opinion. Thus, if the subject of the Attorney General's opinion, or other Department of Justice communication, involves a matter over which the Office of the President has final decisional authority, the opinion necessarily is predecisional, and therefore exempt from disclosure, even if the opinion represents the "final" view or disposition of the Department of Justice on the matter. Of course, the final action taken by the Office of the President may incorporate the Attorney General's advisory opinion -- in which case, it would lose its predecisional character and become subject to disclosure. See also Brinton v. Dep't of State, supra, 636 F.2d at 605 (holding that legal opinions prepared by the Office of the Legal Adviser for the Secretary of State were properly withheld on the ground that the Legal Adviser's opinions were not "final opinions" as contemplated by the FOIA, inasmuch as the Legal Adviser "has no authority to make final decisions concerning United States policy . . . [;] [i]nstead, his role is to give advice to those in the State Department who do make the policy decisions."). [*32]

[494] Nor does the privilege extend to documents of a purely factual nature. In the case of documents of a mixed factual/deliberative nature, factual materials which can reasonably be severed from the deliberative or advisory segments of the document without compromising the confidential remainder of the document must be disclosed. EPA v. Mink, supra, 410 U.S. at 91. However, "factual segments [of advisory documents] are protected from disclosure as not being purely factual if the manner of selecting or presenting those facts would reveal the deliberate process, or if the facts are 'inextricably intertwined' with the policymaking process." Ryan v. Department of Justice, supra, 617 F.2d at 790 (footnotes omitted). See Playboy Enterprises v. Department of Justice, supra. n23 n23 The D.C. Circuit recently rejected the Department's claim of privilege for a 302-page document prepared by a task force of the Office of Professional Responsibility of the Department of Justice for the Attorney General. The document reported the results of an eight-month investigation into the circumstances surrounding the infiltration of an FBI informant into the Ku Klux Klan. Playboy Enterprises v. Dep't of Justice, supra, 677 F.2d 931. Against the Department's claim that the entire report "reflect[ed] the 'choice, weighing and analysis of facts' by the task force and [was] therefore protected as a part of the deliberative process," 677 F.2d at 935, the court of appeals held that the report was, for the most part, not exempt from disclosure, and remanded to the district court for a determination of those limited portions of the report which were properly exempt, as containing conclusions, recommendations, or opinions and were severable from the factual portions of the document. The court stated:

We are not persuaded by the Department's argument. Anyone making a report must of necessity select the facts to be mentioned in it; but a report does not become a part of the deliberative process merely because it contains only those facts which the person making the report thinks material. If this were not so, every factual report would be protected as part of the deliberative process.

B. Attorney-Client Privilege

Exemption 5 of FOIA also embraces the common law evidentiary privilege for attorney-client communications. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); Fed. R. Civ. P. 26; Fed. R. Evid. 501. n24 See NLRB v. Sears, supra, 421 U.S. at 154; Mead Data Central, supra. The attorney-client privilege protects confidential disclosures of a client to his or her attorney, which were made in order to obtain legal assistance and not for the purpose of committing a crime or tort. 8 Wigmore, Evidence § 2290-2329 [495] (McNaughton rev. 1961). See Upjohn v. United States, 449 U.S. 383 (1981); Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976). Notwithstanding its overall purpose to protect the client's factual disclosures, the privilege has been extended by federal courts to include an attorney's communications to his or her client in order to prevent inadvertent disclosure, either directly or by implication, of information which the client had previously confided to the attorney, as well as to foster the attorney's ability to give sound and informed professional advice. Coastal States, supra, 617 F.2d at 862; Mead Data Central, supra, 566 F.2d [*34] at 254 n.25.

n24 The attorney-client privilege is a common law evidentiary privilege which has been codified in Rule 501 of the Federal Rules of Evidence and Rule 26 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for use in civil litigation and discovery. While the Rules are not applicable to congressional subpoenas, the interests implicated by the attorney-client privilege generally are subsumed under a claim of executive privilege when a dispute arises over documents between the Executive and Legislative Branches, and the considerations of separation of powers and effective performance of constitutional duties determine the validity of the claim of privilege.

Like the executive and deliberative process privileges, the attorney-client privilege is designed to encourage full and frank discussions among the persons whose communications are protected and thereby to "promote [the] broader public interests in the observance of law and administration of justice." Upjohn, supra, 449 U.S. at 389. To this end, "[t]he privilege recognizes that sound legal advice or advocacy . . . depends upon the lawyer's being fully informed by the client." Id. See also Mead Data Central, supra, [*35] 566 F.2d at 252 ("The opinion of even the finest attorney . . . is no better than the information which his client provides. In order to ensure that a client receives the best possible legal advice, based on a full and frank discussion with his attorney, the attorney-client privilege assures him that confidential communications to his attorney will not be disclosed without his consent."). See generally 2 J. Weinstein and M. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence P503 (1982).

Although the attorney-client privilege traditionally has been recognized in the context of private attorney-client relationships, the privilege also functions to protect communications between government attorneys and client agencies or departments, as evidenced by its inclusion in the FOIA, much as it operates to protect attorney-client communications in the private sector. See Brinton v. Department of State, supra, 636 F.2d at 603-04; Mead Data Central, supra, 566 F.2d at 252-55; Jupiter Painting Contracting Co. v. United States, 87

F.R.D. 593, 598 (E.D. Pa. 1980); Falcone v. Internal Revenue Service, 479 F.Supp. 985, 989-90 (E.D. Mich. 1979). See also Office of Legal Counsel, "Memorandum [*36] for Helen S. Lessin, Director, Federal Legal Council, re: OLC Policies Regarding Issuance and Release of Opinions" (Sept. 10, 1980). n25

n25 In addition, Government attorneys, no less than private attorneys, are bound by the ABA Code of Professional Responsibility's disciplinary rule DR 4-101(B), which provides that a lawyer shall not knowingly reveal a confidence or secret of his client unless the client consents to such disclosure.

The Supreme Court's recent opinion in Upjohn, supra, analyzing the scope of the corporate "client" for purposes of the attorney-client privilege, is helpful to our consideration of the privilege in the context of the Attorney General and the Office of the President. In Upjohn, supra, the Court discarded the restrictive "control group" test n26 for determining which communications are within the scope of the privilege in a corporate setting, in favor of a broader scope of "client," more suited to the purposes of the privilege. The Court noted that the [496] privilege was designed to protect both the giving of professional advice to those who are charged with the actual implementation of the client corporation's policies, as well as [*37] the communication of information to the attorney sufficiently specific to enable him or her to provide sound, practical, and informed legal advice. Id. at 390. These purposes were frustrated by the narrow scope of privileged communications recognized by the "control group" test.

n26 The control group test restricts the definition of "client" for purposes of the privilege to "upper-echelon management" officials "responsible for directing [the client corporation's] actions in response to legal advice." 449 U.S. at 388, 391.

While the Upjohn decision studiously avoided setting forth a precise formulation of the scope of the attorney-client privilege in the corporate or governmental setting, the Court was nonetheless insistent in its view that application of the privilege had to be determined in each case to serve the purposes of the privilege. In view of the criticism expressed in the Upjohn decision of the control group test, it is likely that, in most instances, the "client" in the context of communications between the President and the Attorney General, and their respective aides, would include a broad scope of White House advisers in the Office of the President. [*38] The "functional" analysis suggested by Upjohn focuses on whether the privilege would encourage the communication of relevant and helpful information from advisers most familiar with the matters on which legal assistance is sought, as well as whether the privilege is necessary to protect and encourage the communication of frank and candid advice to those responsible for executing the recommended courses of action. A corollary to this expanded concept of the "client," which reflects the realities of the governmental setting, is that the "attorney" whose communications are subject to the attorney-client privilege may, in fact, be several attorneys responsible for advising the "client" agency or division regarding the prudence and propriety of proposed courses of conduct. Thus, advice given by the various Assistant Attorneys General and their staffs may be subject to the privilege. See, e.g., Brinton v. Department of State, supra. n27 n27 Although the Brinton decision was ultimately decided on deliberative process grounds, the attorney-client privilege aspect of exemption 5 was discussed at length by the court.

Notwithstanding these notions of "attorney" [*39] and "client" which the Court has expanded to implement fully the purposes of the privilege, the actual operation of the privilege continues to be governed by the traditional guidelines and procedures. n28 As in the traditional attorney-client context, once the privilege has attached, only the client, in this case the President or some other high level official in the Office of the President who is responsible for receiving and acting on the legal advice, may waive it. Thus, for example, a FOIA request lodged with the Department of Justice for information communicated to the Office of the President by the Attorney General which is protected by the attorney-client privilege should not be honored unless the Office of the President consents to release of the information. See Office of Legal Counsel, "Memorandum for Helen S. Lessin," supra. See generally Harmon, Memorandum for Patricia M. [497] Wald, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legislative Affairs, "Formulation of Policy on Disclosure of Information to Congress" at 8, 10 (July 19, 1977).

n28 See United States v. Anderson, 34 F.R.D. 518, 523 (D. Colo. 1963), for application of the traditional attorney-client privilege formulation in the governmental context:

[T]he documents are privileged insofar as they do not comment or report on information coming from persons outside the government or from public documents, or are summaries of conferences held with or in the presence of outsiders, and were produced with the idea of obtaining or receiving legal advice. [*40]

In addition, the person seeking to assert the privilege -- either the client or the attorney on the client's behalf -- must be able to demonstrate that the confidential disclosures "might not have been made absent the privilege," Fisher v. United States, supra, at 403, and that the underlying facts for which the privilege is claimed have remained confidential. Mead Data Central, supra, at 253. See also Permian Corp. v. United States, 665 F.2d 1214 (D.C. Cir. 1981); Brinton v. Department of State, supra. n29 Applying this rule to President-Attorney General communications, the circulation of advisory documents outside the operative circle of officials responsible for giving or receiving advice in the Office of the President or the Department of Justice, or, the reporting of factual information acquired from persons or sources outside the privileged relationship, would constitute a waiver, whether express or implied, of the privilege with respect to those documents and would subject them to disclosure, unless exempt from the Freedom of Information Act pursuant to some other exemption. See Permian Corp. v. United States, supra; n30 Brinton [*41] v. Department of State, supra. Advisory documents from the Attorney General which have been turned over to congressional committees are presumed to be no longer confidential and may not be the basis of a claim of attorney-client privilege. See generally Harmon, "Formulation of Policy on Disclosure of Information to Congress," supra. n31 See also Permian Corp. v. United States, supra, at 1220-22. However, these same documents may be subject to the deliberative process privilege under exemption 5. n32 n29 The requirement that the confidential disclosures for which the privilege is sought have remained confidential does not preclude the privilege's proper attachment to communications which have been circulated in a limited fashion beyond the attorney and the person within the group requesting legal advice. See Upjohn v. United States, supra, at 395; Coastal States, supra, at 863; Mead Data Central, supra, at 253 n.24. This broader scope of the confidentiality requirement is particularly appropriate in the corporate and governmental contexts. See discussion, infra.

n30 In Permian Corp., supra, the D.C. Circuit held that the voluntary disclosure of confidential materials to a third party outside the privileged relationship, in this case, the SEC, constituted a waiver of the privilege with respect to those documents, notwithstanding the SEC's agreement to protect the documents from further disclosure. Thus, the court rejected the rule of "limited waiver," followed by the Eighth Circuit in Diversified Industries, Inc. v. Meredith, 572 F.2d 596 (1977) (en banc), and concluded that the privilege could no longer be invoked to protect the documents from being disclosed by the SEC to another government agency:

The Eighth Circuit's "limited waiver" rule has little to do with [the] confidential link between the client and his legal advisor. Voluntary cooperation with government investigations may be a laudable activity, but it is hard to understand how such conduct improves the attorney-client relationship. If the client feels the need to keep his communications with his attorney confidential, he is free to do so under the traditional rule by consistently asserting the privilege, even when the discovery request comes from a "friendly" agency.

[T]he attorney-client privilege should be available only at the traditional price: a litigant who wishes to assert confidentiality must maintain genuine confidentiality.

n31 Former Assistant Attorney General Harmon suggested that even the "limited disclosure" involved in disclosing privileged materials to an executive session of Congress, or in a nonpublic administrative hearing, "would appear to undermine the theoretical predicate of the privilege," as applied in the civil discovery context. "The purpose of a privilege is to protect confidential communications necessary to promote certain relationships; once this confidentiality is breached, the rationale for granting the privilege no longer applies." "Formulation of Policy on Disclosure of Information to Congress," supra, at 5 (citations omitted).

n32 There is an additional privilege available under exemption 5 which may be invoked, when appropriate, to protect communications from the Office of the Attorney General to the Office of the President -- the work-product privilege. The work-product privilege under exemption 5 of the FOIA protects documents prepared in contemplation of litigation which reflect the "mental processes" of attorneys. The work-product privilege is distinct from the attorney-client privilege in that "it provides a working attorney with a 'zone of privacy' within which to think, plan, weigh facts and evidence, candidly evaluate a client's case, and prepare legal theories." Coastal States, supra, at 864. While the attorney-client privilege is designed to protect the client's interest in confidentiality, the purpose of the work-product privilege is to protect "the adversary trial process itself." Id.

Because it is limited to documents prepared in contemplation of litigation, the work-product privilege is the least invoked of the exemption 5 privileges in the context of President-Attorney General communications. The broad advisory role that the Attorney General plays vis-a-vis the President, together with the President's general lack of involvement in litigation strategies, makes their communications far more suited to the deliberative process and attorney-client privileges as a basis for nondisclosure in litigation or under FOIA. [*42]

[498] III. The "Governmental" Evidentiary Privileges -- and Their Freedom of Information Act Counterparts

The so-called "governmental" evidentiary privileges are common law privileges, now incorporated into the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the Federal Rules of Evidence, which have traditionally been available exclusively to the government as a litigant. Daniel, Assistant Attorney General, Civil Division, "Memorandum to All Civil Division Attorneys re: Asserting Claims of Official Government Privilege in Litigation" (Nov. 1980). See generally McClelland v. Andrus, supra, at 1286, n.53, quoting Association for Women in Science v. Califano, 566 F.2d 339 (D.C. Cir. 1977). These privileges -- the informant's privilege, the law enforcement investigatory files privilege, n33 and the privilege for confidential information on required reports n34 -- supplement the deliberative process, attorney-client and work-product privileges discussed above which are available to governmental as well as private parties in the civil litigation and discovery contexts. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 26; Fed. R. Evid. 501. These "governmental" privileges are necessary to protect [*43] the ability of the Executive Branch to discharge its duties under the Constitution and the laws of the United States, but because their assertion in litigation does not raise the problems of a constitutional conflict with a coequal branch, these privileges may be invoked by the head of the executive department in possession or control of the requested documents, or his or her delegate. n35 See Association for Women in Science v. Califano, supra. See also McClelland v. Andrus, supra; Daniel, "Asserting Claims of Official Governmental Privilege in Litigation" (Nov. 1980). These privileges also have [499] analogues in the Freedom of Information Act under exemptions 6 and 7, 5 U.S.C. §§ 552(b)(6),(7), to shield documents of the same general type from disclosure to members of the public. As noted in the foregoing discussion of the evidentiary privileges incorporated into exemption 5 of the FOIA, the court must strike a balance between "the public concern in revelations facilitating the just resolution of legal disputes [on the one hand,] and, on the other, occasional but compelling needs for confidentiality," McClelland v. Andrus, supra at 1287, n.55, in deciding [*44] claims of privilege in the litigation context.

n33 The investigatory files privilege -- which frequently encompasses information which might reveal the identity or statements of informants -- protects interests which may be asserted under a claim of executive privilege also, if the interests are sufficiently strong in a particular case to implicate constitutional concerns. See 40 Op. Att'y Gen. 45. See also Office of Legal Counsel, "Executive Privilege in Litigation for Investigative Files" (September 18, 1981); Harmon, "Memorandum to All Heads of Offices, Divisions, Bureaus, and Boards of the Department of Justice," (May 23, 1977); Rehnquist Testimony, supra. However, because these interests rarely impinge on the performance of constitutional functions of the Executive Branch to the same degree as the "state secrets" or deliberative process components of the privilege, the privilege is generally asserted simply as an evidentiary privilege in litigation.

n34 The privilege for confidential information on required government reports is similar to the informant's privilege, see discussion at 31, infra, in that it protects information solicited by the government for its purposes on a promise of confidentiality. This privilege, like its FOIA-exemption 6 counterpart, protects accident reports, employment history reports, financial disclosures, conflict-of-interest reports, and other information, the disclosure of which would constitute a "clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6). See Dep't of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595 (1982). Dep't of the Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352 (1976); Ass'n for Women in Science, supra. Of the privileges discussed in this memorandum, this is the least likely privilege to be invoked in the context of President-Attorney General communications.

n35 See generally n.5, supra. [*45]

A. Informant's Privilege

The informant's privilege permits the government to withhold the identity of persons who furnish information concerning violations of the law, or otherwise render assistance, to officers charged with law enforcement responsibilities. See 8 C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice & Procedure, § 2019 at 155 (1970); Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53 (1957); Black v. Sheraton Corp. of America, 47 F.R.D. 263 (D.D.C. 1969), aff'd 564 F.2d 550 (D.C. Cir. 1977). The informant's privilege recognizes that prospective informants usually condition their cooperation with law enforcement officers on an assurance of anonymity in order to protect against physical harm or other undesirable consequences to themselves and their families which would very likely result as a consequence of disclosure. United States v. Tucker, 380 F.2d 206, 213 (2d Cir. 1967). Although this privilege protects only the identity of the informant, information provided by the informant may also be shielded under this privilege if its disclosure would reveal the informer's identity. Rovario v. United States, supra, at 60. The informant's privilege, [*46] like the other privileges discussed above, is qualified; therefore, the government must show that its interest in effective law enforcement outweighs the litigant's need for the information. See Rovario v. United States, supra; In re Attorney General of United States, 596 F.2d 58 (2d Cir. 1979); 2 J. Weinstein and M. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence P510[02] at 510-18 (1982).

B. Law Enforcement Investigatory Files Privilege

Like the informant's privilege, the privilege for law enforcement investigatory files is necessary to protect against the harm that would flow from public disclosure of information contained in the files and to facilitate the government's law enforcement process. See Black v. United States, 564 F.2d 531 (D.C. Cir. 1977); Brown v. Thompson, 430 F.2d 1214 (5th Cir. 1970). Disclosure of open investigatory files n36 would undercut the government's efforts to prosecute criminals by disclosing investigative techniques, forewarning suspects under investigation, [500] deterring witnesses from coming forward, and prematurely revealing facts supporting the government's case. n37 The privilege for law enforcement investigatory files is a [*47] qualified privilege, and may be overcome by a strong showing of need or interest in disclosure of the information. See Black v. United States, supra.

n36 As is apparent from the reasons underlying the privilege, the law enforcement investigatory files privilege does not apply to files pertaining to investigations which have been closed, although information protected by another privilege, e.g., the informant's privilege, would continue to be shielded. See 2 Weinstein's Evidence P509(07) at 509-52-58 (1982). Cf. Supreme Court's recent discussion of FOIA exemption 7 in FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615 (1982).

n37 See also former Attorney General Jackson's opinion at 40 Op. Att'y Gen. 45 (1941), concluding that premature disclosure of law enforcement investigative reports to Congress or the public could prejudice the rights of prospective defendants whose investigations are the subject of the reports.

C. FOIA Exemption 7

Exemption 7 of the Freedom of Information Act incorporates these privileges for law enforcement records to protect the information contained therein from compulsory disclosure to members of the public. Exemption 7 exempts [*48] from the general disclosure mandate of the FOIA those matters which are investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such records would (A) interfere with enforcement proceedings, (B) deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or an impartial adjudication, (C) constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, (D) disclose the identity of a confidential source and, in the case of a record compiled by a criminal law enforcement authority in the course of a criminal investigation, or by an agency conducting a lawful national security intelligence investigation, confidential information furnished only by the confidential source, (E) disclose investigative techniques and procedures, or (F) endanger the life or physical safety of law enforcement personnel[.]

5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7). The subparts of § 552(b)(7) make clear that the interests protected therein are roughly analogous to those protected by the "governmental" privileges in litigation for informant's identity and law enforcement investigatory files. See generally FBI v. Abramson, supra; NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214 (1978); Lesar [*49] v. Department of Justice, 636 F.2d 472 (D.C. Cir. 1980), Church of Scientology of Calif. v. Department of Justice, 612 F.2d 417 (9th Cir. 1979).

IV. Conclusion

The privileges available to protect the confidentiality of the Attorney General's communications with the Office of the President can be roughly categorized into three classes, depending upon the nature of the communications for which the privilege is asserted, the interests which are sought to be protected by the claim of privilege, and the persons against whom the claim is made. This memorandum represents an effort by this Office to provide the Attorney General with a general outline of the privileges available to him to protect his confidential communications [501] and working papers from compulsory disclosure when he believes that disclosure would be against the interests of the Department, the President, or the broader "public," and to provide guidelines for the assertion of those privileges. While the foregoing discussion should prove helpful in providing a framework for

General maintains a close and confidential advisory relationship with the President over a broad range of policy issues, including the highest and most delicate affairs of state. See, e.g., Rankin, [482] Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, "Memorandum for the Attorney General re: Secrecy [*3] of Cabinet Proceedings and Papers" (Oct. 15, 1954). This advisory relationship to the President, a relationship shared by all members of the President's Cabinet, is constitutionally based. Article II, § 2, of the Constitution provides that the President may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices. . . .

n1 In 1828 Attorney General Wirt described the Attorney General as "confidential law adviser to the Executive branch of the government." See H. Cummings and C. McFarland, Federal Justice 91 (1937). In two lengthy essays analyzing the executive departments and the Attorney General in particular, former Attorney General Cushing described the department heads as the President's "constitutional counsellors," his "political or confidential ministers," and his "constitutional advisers." 7 Op. Att'y Gen. 453 (1855); 6 Op. Att'y Gen. 326 (1854).

With respect to the Attorney General, this constitutional duty was carried over into statute by § 35 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. 93, which required the Attorney General "to give his advice and opinions [*4] upon questions of law when required by the President of the United States." This provision is now codified in 28 U.S.C. § 511. n2 n2 The original language of § 35 of the 1789 Judiciary Act has remained virtually intact through subsequent codifications of the provision. See 28 U.S.C. § 511 (1976), which provides:

The Attorney General shall give his advice and opinion on questions of law when required by the President.

We note, as a preliminary matter, that the confidentiality of the communications discussed herein cannot be analyzed without consideration of the contents of the communications, including the identities of the persons generating the communications and the persons to whom they are addressed, as well as the identities of the persons seeking disclosure. Generally speaking, however, the conclusions reached in this memorandum, and discussed in detail below, are as follows:

1. The President may assert an arguably absolute executive privilege against the Legislative Branch and in the courts to protect from disclosure communications involving military, diplomatic, or national security secrets, n3 a qualified [483] executive privilege may be claimed to protect [*5] law enforcement investigatory files and sensitive deliberative communications between the Office of the President and the Attorney General's Office, as well as staff communications within the two offices which are reflective of the deliberative process. The President customarily reserves exclusively to himself the power to assert the claim of executive privilege against Congress. n4 However, the Attorney General, as "head of [an executive] department which has control over the matter," may, after personal consideration of the matter, invoke the privilege against others in court. United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1, 8 (1953). n5 n3 See Halkin v. Helms, 598 F.2d 1 (D.C. Cir. 1978), holding that "[t]he state secrets privilege is absolute[,]" id. at 7, but permitting the district court to examine a classified affidavit in camera, in order to satisify itself of the validity of the claim of privilege with respect to the underlying classified information.

Although the Supreme Court has not stated expressly that the privilege for military, diplomatic, and national security secrets is absolute, it has used very strong language to this effect. See, e.g., the Court's suggestion in United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 711 (1974), analysis of potential claims of privilege, we would caution that the applicability of any privilege to a given set of circumstances [*50] will almost always involve a judgment of competing values. While the Attorney General or the client must decide initially whether to assert the privilege, the task of resolving conflicts arising out of such competing values, in the final analysis, is one that is reserved to the courts.

that even in camera examination of documents may be inappropriate when a court is satisfied, "from all the circumstances of the case," that there exists a reasonable danger of disclosure of military, diplomatic, or national security secrets:

As to the areas of Art. II duties [involving military or diplomatic secrets,] the courts have traditionally shown the utmost deference to Presidential responsibilities. In C. & S. Air Lines v. Waterman S.S. Corp., 333 U.S. 103, 111 (1948) [(emphasis added)], dealing with Presidential authority involving foreign policy considerations, the Court said:

"The President, both as Commander-in-Chief and as the Nation's organ for foreign affairs, has available intelligence services whose reports are not and ought not to be published to the world. It would be intolerable that courts, without the relevant information, should review and perhaps nullify actions of the Executive taken on information properly held secret."

In United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1 [,10] (1953), . . . the Court said:

"It may be possible to satisfy the court, from all the circumstances of the case, that there is a reasonable danger that compulsion of the evidence will expose military matters which, in the interest of national security, should not be divulged. When this is the case, the occasion for the privilege is appropriate, and the court should not jeopardize the security which the privilege is meant to protect by insisting upon an examination of the evidence, even by the judge alone, in chambers."

418 U.S. at 710-11 (emphasis added). See also United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1 (1953):

In each case, the showing of necessity [for access to the documents] which is made will determine how far the court should probe in satisfying itself that the occasion for invoking the privilege is appropriate. Where there is a strong showing of necessity, the claim of privilege should not be lightly accepted, but even the most compelling necessity cannot overcome the claim of privilege if the court is ultimately satisfied that military secrets are at stake.

Brown, 619 F.2d 1170 (7th Cir. 1980) (en banc), and Halkin v. Helms, supra, both construing Reynolds, supra, and Nixon, supra, to permit in camera examinations of documents for which the state secrets privilege was claimed in certain exceptional circumstances. American Civil Liberties Union, supra, held that a litigant's strong showing of need, e.g., that withheld documents were critical to substantiate a claim of constitutional violation, may compel the district court to conduct in camera review of documents allegedly covered by state secrets privilege in order to determine whether they are properly classified.

n4 This limitation on the exercise of the privilege against Congress stems from a practice instituted by Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, that "Executive privilege can be invoked only by the President and will not be used without specific Presidential approval," letter from President Kennedy to Congressman Moss (Mar. 7, 1962), and formalized in President Nixon's "Memorandum for the Heads of Executive Departments and Agencies" (Mar. 24, 1969). To date, subsequent administrations have followed this practice. See Olson, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, "Memorandum to the Attorney General re: Executive Privilege" (Oct. 9, 1981); Harmon, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, "Memorandum to All Heads of Offices, Divisions, Bureaus and Boards of the Department of Justice" (May 23, 1977). See generally Common Cause v. NRC, 674 F.2d 921, 935 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (dictum to the effect that only the President may assert executive privilege).

n5 Although assertion of the state secrets privilege clearly requires that the claim be made by the head of an agency, the case law governing other claims of executive privilege in litigation is not settled with respect to who must assert the privilege. Compare Union Oil v. Morton, 56 F.R.D. 643 (C.D. Cal. 1972); FTC v. Bramman, 54 F.R.D. 364 (W.D. Mo. 1972); (recognizing claims made by persons other than agency heads), with Anchem Products v. GAF Corp., 64 F.R.D. 550 (N.D. Ga. 1974); Carter v. 2. The Attorney General may assert a "deliberative process" privilege pursuant to exemption 5 of the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5), to withhold from the public nonfactual deliberative communications; absent a breach of the confidentiality of the privileged communication, the President, or the Attorney General on his behalf, may assert the attorney-client privilege pursuant to exemption 5 of the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). Similarly, absent a waiver of the privilege, the Attorney General may assert the common-law privilege for attorney-client communications, which has been codified in Rule 501 of the Federal Rules of Evidence, and Rule 26 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, to protect from disclosure in litigation certain confidential communications of a legal advisory nature which were prepared for the Office of the President.

3. Finally, this memorandum addresses the traditional "governmental" evidentiary privileges which, although available to the Attorney General, only [484] rarely would be applicable to his communications with the President. These privileges, which have analogues in the Freedom of Information Act, protect [*7] (a) confidential information which certain employees or members of the public are required to report on government records, (b) the identity of government informants, and (c) certain law enforcement investigatory files. n6 n6 See Daniel, "Asserting Claims of Official Governmental Privilege in Litigation," supra note 3. See also FOIA exemption 6, which protects "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy," § 552(b)(6); and exemption 7, which shields certain law enforcement investigatory records, § 552(b)(7).

I. Executive Privilege

The doctrine of executive privilege defines the constitutional authority of the Executive Branch to protect documents or information in its possession from public disclosure and from the compulsory process of the Legislative and Judicial Branches. See Rehnquist, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, Testimony on Executive Privilege Before Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Separation of Powers (Aug. 4, 1971). Executive privilege protects material the disclosure of which would significantly impair the conduct of foreign relations, [*8] the national security, or the performance of the Executive's lawful duties. n7 It also shields confidential deliberative communications which have been generated within the Executive Branch from compulsory disclosure, in the absence of a strong showing of need by the branch seeking disclosure that access to the privileged communications is critical to the responsible fulfillment of its constitutional functions. Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425, 441-55 (1977); United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 711-12 (1974); Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities v. Nixon, 498 F.2d 725, 730-31 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (en banc). This privilege is based on the need for confidentiality of communications among high-level government officials, as well as the constitutional doctrine of separation of powers, which provides that each branch of government is "suprem[e] . . . within its own assigned area of constitutional duties." United States v. Nixon, supra at 705.

n7 Because the types of communications discussed in this memorandum are less likely to implicate military, diplomatic, or national security interests, the qualified privilege for law enforcement files, see n.33 infra, and for sensitive advisory or deliberative communications, provides a more appropriate focus for our analysis. [*9]

A. Constitutional and Practical Bases of the Privilege

The necessity for confidentiality in the advisory relationships between Cabinet advisers and the President, and their respective aides, is of both constitutional and practical significance. See United States v. Nixon, supra; Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities v. Nixon, supra. See also Opinion of the Attorney General for the President, "Assertion of Executive Privilege in Response to a Congressional Subpoena," 43 Op. Att'y Gen. , 5 Op. O.L.C. 27 (Oct. 13, 1981) (hereafter 1981 Attorney General Opinion); Harmon, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, "Memorandum for the [485] Attorney General re: The Constitutional Privilege for Executive Branch Deliberations: The Dispute with a House Subcommittee over Documents Concerning Gasoline Conservation Fee" (Jan. 18, 1981) (hereafter Harmon Memorandum); Rehnquist Testimony, supra. n8 It is premised on the need to discuss confidential matters which arise within the Executive Branch and to assist the President in the discharge of his constitutional powers and duties, by ensuring discussion that is free-flowing and frank, [*10] unencumbered by fear of disclosure or intrusion by the public or the other branches of government. The President and those who assist him require candid advice on the wide range of issues which confront the Executive, and such candid advice may not be forthcoming if Cabinet advisers or their aides must anticipate disclosure of the advice rendered by them and the potential public or legislative criticism which might result therefrom.

n8 See generally Rankin, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, "Memorandum for the Attorney General re: Secrecy of Cabinet Proceedings and Papers" at 3 (Oct. 15, 1954):

[T]he special and perhaps most significant aspect of [Cabinet members'] office is that of trusted adviser to the Chief Executive in the affairs of the Nation, a relationship which cannot long be maintained with respect to those feeling themselves at liberty to make unauthorized disclosures of information imparted to them at Cabinet meetings in strict confidence; and accordingly . . . each member, to retain the confidence of the President, must constantly bear in mind the overriding need for scrupulous observance of the secrecy of Cabinet proceedings and papers. [*11]

A unanimous n9 Supreme Court in United States v. Nixon, supra, affirmed the constitutional underpinnings of the privilege, recognizing the "protection of communications between high Government officials and those who advise and assist them in the performance of their manifold duties" as supported by the doctrine of separation of powers, and by historic practice. n10 The Court described this constitutional and historic basis as "too plain to require further discussion." Id. at 705. See also Senate Select Committee, supra. The Court went on to state that "human experience teaches that those who expect public dissemination of their remarks may well temper candor with a concern for appearances and for their own interests to the detriment of the decisionmaking process." United States v. Nixon, supra at 705. Such "temper[ed] candor" in presidential advisers' deliberations clearly would impede the President's performance of his constitutional duty to exercise the executive powers described in Art. II, § 3 of the Constitution. See Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, supra; United States v. Nixon, supra.

n9 Justice Rehnquist did not participate in this decision. 418 U.S. at 685.

n10 The Court noted that the 1787 Constitutional Convention had been conducted by the Framers in complete privacy, and that the records of the Convention were sealed for more than 30 years thereafter. 418 U.S. at 705, n.15. See 1 M. Farrand, The Records Of The Federal Convention of 1787, pp. xi-xxv (1911); 3 Stat. 475, 15th Cong., 1st Sess., Res. 8 (1818). See also C. Warren, The Making Of The Constitution 134-39 (1937).

The need for confidential deliberations is not unique to the Executive Branch. The Framers recognized that some congressional deliberations would of necessity be privileged from publication, Art. I, § 5, cl. 3, or from questioning beyond the House or Senate floor, Art. I, § 6, cl. 1. Similarly, judicial deliberations, as well as discussions between judges and their law clerks, are undoubtedly privileged, although neither the Executive nor the Legislative Branches has ever attempted to challenge the right of courts to withhold such information. See generally Nixon v. Sirica, 487 F.2d 700, 717 (D.C. Cir. 1973) (en banc); Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1080-81 (D.C. Cir. 1971) (Wilkey, J., concurring); Henkin, "The Right to Know and the Duty to Withhold: The Case of the Pentagon Papers," 120 U. Pa. L. Rev. 271, 274 (1971). [*12]

The Supreme Court and lower federal courts have made clear that the presumption of confidentiality accorded presidential communications is intended to protect not only the substance of sensitive communications between the President [486] and his advisers but the integrity of the decisionmaking process within the Executive Branch as well. n11 See Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, supra; Senate Select Committee, supra; Nixon v. Sirica, 487 F.2d 700 (D.C. Cir. 1973) (en banc). See also 1981 Attorney General Opinion supra; Harmon Memorandum, supra. It is these concerns which justify the invocation of executive privilege by the President, or, where appropriate, the heads of executive departments, as well as the "deliberative process" privilege, which may be claimed by any federal agency pursuant to exemption 5 of the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5), to withhold documents requested by members of the public. n12 n11 In its analysis of executive privilege in United States v. Nixon, supra, the Supreme Court discussed the role of confidentiality among presidential advisers and concluded:

The expectation of a President to the confidentiality of his conversations and correspondence . . . is [grounded on] the necessity for protection of the public interest in candid, objective, and even blunt or harsh opinions in Presidential decisionmaking. A President and those who assist him must be free to explore alternatives in the process of shaping policies and making decisions and to do so in a way many would be unwilling to express except privately. These are the considerations justifying a presumptive privilege for Presidential communications. The privilege is fundamental to the operation of Government and inextricably rooted in the separation of powers under the Constitution.

418 U.S. at 708 (footnote omitted).

n12 The deliberative process privilege will be discussed infra in part II.A. [*13]

B. Limitations on the Scope of the Privilege

Notwithstanding the necessity for confidentiality in executive deliberations, the privilege against their disclosure to Congress and the courts is qualified, in both scope and application. First, the executive privilege for intragovernmental deliberations does not protect materials the disclosure of which would not implicate or hinder the Executive Branch's decisionmaking processes. United States v. Nixon, supra. Thus, factual, nonsensitive materials -- communications from the Attorney General which do not contain advice, recommendations, tentative legal judgments, drafts of documents, or other material reflecting deliberative or policymaking processes -- do not fall within the scope of materials for which executive privilege may be claimed as a basis of nondisclosure. Cf., e.g., NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132 (1975); Taxation With Representation v. IRS, 646 F.2d 666 (D.C. Cir. 1981); Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 866-69 (D.C. Cir. 1980). n13 n13 The standard for nondisclosure under a claim of executive privilege is analogous to the "deliberative process" privilege codified in the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5), which exempts predecisional and deliberative documents from the general disclosure mandate of the Act. See generally McClelland v. Andrus, 606 F.2d 1278, 1287 n.54 (D.C. Cir. 1979). However, Congress may not expand the public's statutory right to disclosure under FOIA beyond those limits set, in any given case, by the constitutional doctrine of executive privilege, Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1071-72, n.9, 1081-83 (D.C. Cir. 1971); conversely, because of its constitutional basis independent of FOIA, Congress may not limit the scope of executive privilege by altering the standards for disclosure under FOIA. Id. [*14]

Second, even in cases involving sensitive deliberative materials for which a claim of privilege may be appropriate, the executive interest in nondisclosure must be balanced against the needs of the requesting branch before the validity of the claim of privilege can be determined. It is in these cases of potential conflict and competing claims of legitimate need by each branch that the separation of [487] powers principle on occasion must yield to the principles of "a workable government" -- "separateness but interdependence, autonomy but reciprocity." United States v. Nixon, supra at 707 (quoting Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 635 (1952) (Jackson, J., concurring)). These principles recognize a "spirit of dynamic compromise" among the coordinate branches when a conflict in authority arises -- a spirit which requires each branch to "take cognizance of an implicit constitutional mandate to seek optimal accommodation through a realistic evaluation of the needs of the conflicting branches in a particular fact situation." United States v. AT&T, 567 F.2d 121, 127 (D.C. Cir. 1977). This duty to recognize and accommodate the legitimate [*15] needs of the other branches was examined in its constitutional context by the D.C. Circuit in United States v. AT&T, id. at 130 (footnote omitted):

[I]t was a deliberate feature of the constitutional scheme to leave the allocation of powers unclear in certain situations . . . [Thus,] the resolution of conflict between the coordinate branches in these situations must be regarded as an opportunity for a constructive modus vivendi, which positively promotes the functioning of our system. The Constitution contemplates such accommodation. Negotiation between the two branches should thus be viewed as a dynamic process affirmatively furthering the constitutional scheme.

See also 1981 Attorney General Opinion, supra, 5 Op. O.L.C. at 30 ("The accommodation required is not simply an exchange of concessions or a test of political strength. It is an obligation of each branch to make a principled effort to acknowledge, and if possible to meet, the legitimate needs of the other branch.").

The more generalized the executive interest in withholding the disputed information, the more likely it is that the claim of privilege will yield to a specific, articulated need related [*16] to the effective performance by the coordinate branches of their constitutionally assigned functions. Conversely, the more specific the need for confidentiality, and the less specific the articulated need of the requesting branch for the information, the more likely it is that the Executive's need for confidentiality will prevail. Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, supra; United States v. Nixon, supra. See generally 1981 Attorney General Opinion, supra; Harmon Memorandum, supra. Thus, in determining whether to assert the privilege, the Executive, in the first instance, must balance the "public" interest n14 inherent in the "general privilege of confidentiality of Presidential communications in performance of the President's responsibilities" against the national or public interest in disclosure, as determined by the ability [488] of the requesting branch responsibly to fulfill its constitutional duties without the assistance provided by the requested documents. United States v. Nixon, supra, 418 U.S. at 706, 711-712. See Nixon v. Sirica, supra, 487 F.2d at 716-17. In making such a determination, each document -- and the role that [*17] it plays in the decisionmaking process -- must be examined individually. Playboy Enterprises v. Department of Justice, 677 F.2d 931, 935 (D.C. Cir. 1982); Coastal States, supra, 617 F.2d at 867.

n14 The "public" interest in nondisclosure derives from the recognized value which accrules to the public from an effective executive decisionmaking process, supported by the exchange of "candid, objective, and even blunt or harsh opinions," United States v. Nixon, supra at 708, and fostered by ensuring the confidentiality of such opinions. Nixon v. Sirica, supra at 717. See also McClelland v. Andrus, 606 F.2d 1278, 1287 n.55 (D.C. Cir. 1979) (citations omitted) (recognizing the "compelling public [interest in] confidentiality" which is "[n] owhere . . . more vitally involved than in the fidelity of the sovereign's decision and policymaking resources.") See generally Rehnquist Testimony, supra.

In the case of Congress, the grant of legislative power in Article I of the Constitution implies a requirement that Congress have access to pertinent information, as well as the authority to summon witnesses and to compel the production of needed evidence, [*18] as a prerequisite to the proper performance of its legislative function. Jurney v. MacCracken, 294 U.S. 125 (1935); McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U.S. 135 (1927). See generally Rehnquist Testimony, supra. Congress' duty to investigate and inform itself of matters which may involve the Executive is very broad, extending "over the whole range of the national interests concerning which Congress might legislate or decide upon due investigation not to legislate." Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109, 111 (1959). See also Eastland v. United States Servicemen's Fund, 421 U.S. 491, 504-07 (1975); Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 187 (1957). See generally Cox, "Executive Privilege," 122 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1383, 1426 (1974). This broad-based power of inquiry includes matters requiring new or remedial legislation, appropriations of funds, congressional probes into various governmental departments to expose corruption, inefficiency, or waste, as well as the administration of existing laws or proposed statutes. Yet, these very sources of Congress' power to obtain information also outline the limits of that power: Congress may only inquire [*19] into those matters on which it may potentially legislate or appropriate -- it may not inquire into those matters "which are within the exclusive province" of the Executive or the Judiciary. Barenblatt, supra at 112. See Watkins, supra. Nevertheless, the validity of a claim of privilege for documents demanded by Congress in the performance of its legitimate legislating functions, including the "oversight" function, can only be determined by balancing the particular interests of the Legislative and Executive Branches against each other in each case, in light of the possibility of accommodation. Senate Select Committee, supra. n15 n15 See, e.g., 1981 Attorney General Opinion, supra, discussing the relatively weak congressional interest in obtaining predecisional, deliberative Executive Branch documents in the context of Congress' performance of its general "oversight" function, as compared to its consideration of specific legislative proposals:

At the stage of oversight, the congressional interest is a generalized one of ensuring that the laws are well and faithfully executed and of proposing remedial legislation if they are not. The information requested is usually broad in scope and the reasons for the request correspondingly general and vague. In contrast, when Congress is examining specific proposals for legislation, the information which Congress needs to enable it to legislate effectively is usually quite narrow in scope and the reasons for obtaining that information correspondingly specific. A specific, articulated need for information will weigh substantially more heavily in the constitutional balancing than a generalized interest in obtaining information.

[Moreover,] the congressional oversight interest will support a demand for predecisional, deliberative documents in the possession of the Executive Branch only in the most unusual circumstances. It is important to stress that congressional oversight of Executive Branch actions is justifiable only as a means of facilitating the legislative task of enacting, amending, or repealing laws. When such "oversight" is used as a means of participating directly in an ongoing process of decisionmaking within the Executive Branch, it oversteps the bounds of the proper legislative function. Restricted to its proper sphere, the congressional oversight function can almost always be properly conducted with reference to information concerning decisions which the Executive Branch has already reached. Congress will have a legitimate need to know the preliminary positions taken by Executive Branch officials during internal deliberations only in the rarest of circumstances.

5 Op. O.L.C. at 29 (citations omitted). [*20]

[489] Similarly, with respect to judicial functions, an evaluation must be made of the impact of a successful claim of executive privilege on the ability of the Judiciary to perform effectively its duties of fair adjudication of controversies and supervision of grand jury investigations. See United States v. Nixon, supra; Nixon v. Sirica, supra. As is the case when the privilege is asserted against the Legislative Branch, if the information withheld by the Executive is "demonstrably critical to the responsible fulfillment" of the Judiciary's functions, a generalized claim of privilege must fail. Nixon v. Sirica, 487 F.2d at 717 ("the general confidentiality privilege must recede before the grand jury's showing . . . that the subpoenaed [information] contain[s] evidence peculiarly necessary to the carrying out of [its] vital function."). Cf. Senate Select Committee, 498 F.2d at 731.

Notwithstanding these limitations on the scope of the privilege for Executive Branch communications, it is not essential that the communications for which the privilege is claimed have been directed to or emanated from the President himself. See Nixon, "Memorandum [*21] for the Heads of Executive Departments and Agencies" (March 24, 1969). See also United States v. AT&T, supra; Harmon Memorandum, supra. The underlying rationale of the privilege to foster robust and honest debate in the presidential decisionmaking process is as applicable to Executive Branch advisers both within and outside the immediate Office of the President as it is to the President himself. The Supreme Court, in United States v. Nixon, supra, recognized the need for the President "and those who assist him [to] be free to explore alternatives in the process of shaping policies and making decisions and to do so in a way many would be unwilling to express except privately." 418 U.S. 708 (emphasis supplied). In addition, this office has recently expressed the view that because of the importance of the executive department heads and their advisers to the President and his closest advisers in presidential decisionmaking, it would be "artificial" to draw a rigid and inflexible line between the executive departments and the President's Office, limiting the reach of the constitutional privilege only to the latter. Harmon Memorandum, supra at 13-14. n16 Thus, [*22] memoranda prepared by the Attorney General or his assistants containing legal or policy advice on issues under consideration by the President and his advisers may be properly encompassed by a claim of executive privilege. This category of documents would include, for example, staff level advice to Assistant Attorneys General concerning matters on which the President has [490] sought advice, staff level advice to officials in the Office of the President, notes of middle level staff meetings concerning issues before the President or members of his staff, and tentative legal judgments or draft policy statements prepared for the President or his staff.

n16 Nevertheless, former Assistant Attorney General Harmon's January 18, 1981, memorandum recognized that there exist "differences of degree" of sensitivity inherent in the broad category of executive deliberations. The memorandum pointed out that in deciding whether to claim the privilege, it is especially important to protect the integrity of deliberations involving the President himself and his closest advisers:

In accommodating Congress's legitimate need for certain information, the executive branch should be least willing to reveal deliberations directly involving the President and his closest advisers, and more willing to disclose material from within the executive departments.

Harmon Memorandum, supra, at 13. [*23]

For purposes of invoking executive privilege, communications from the Attorney General, qua the President's chief legal adviser, should be analyzed in the same fashion as communications from other Cabinet advisers and trusted high-level officials. Unlike the attorney-client privilege, which focuses exclusively on communications of a legal advisory nature, executive privilege may be claimed for any nonfactual, sensitive deliberative communication for which there exists a sufficiently strong public interest in nondisclosure.

Dear Mr. Whelan:

This letter follows up on your testimony yesterday before the Government Reform Subcommittee on Government Efficiency, Financial Management and Intergovernmental Relations about President Bush's new Executive Order 13223, "Further Implementation of the Presidential Records Act." I would appreciate your providing the Administration's legal opinion for each of the attached questions.

Please contact Subcommittee Deputy Staff Director Barbara Kahlow at 226-3058 if you have any questions about this request. Please provide the requested information by November 30, 2001 to the Subcommittee majority staff in B-377 Rayburn House Office Building and the minority staff in B-350A Rayburn House Office Building.

Thank you in advance for your attention to this request.

Questions for OLC on E.O. 13233

Q1. Section 1(g) of President Reagan's Executive Order (E.O.) 12667 defined that a "substantial question of Executive privilege" exists if "disclosure of Presidential records might impair the national security ..., law enforcement, or the deliberative processes of the Executive branch." What is the legal basis for the two new, broad categories of records with access restrictions -- "communications of the President or his advisors (the presidential communications privilege); [and] legal advice or legal work (the attorney-client or attorney work product privileges)" -- in Section 2(a) of E.O. 13233?

Q2. During the hearing, I questioned you about the apparent inconsistency between Sections 2204(c)(1) and 2204(c)(2) of the Presidential Records Act (PRA) and Section 2(a) of E.O. 13233. Section 2204(c)(1) provides that, after a 12-year period, the Archivist shall provide public access in accordance with the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) but with one important exception. Namely, Section (b)(5) of FOIA, which provides an exemption for certain common law evidentiary privileges (such as the attorney-client, attorney work product and deliberative process privileges), cannot be used to withhold documents. This section also directs that access to Presidential records "shall be granted on nondiscriminatory terms." Section 2204(c)(2) states that "Nothing in this Act shall be construed to confirm, limit, or expand any constitutionally-based privilege."

Section 2(a) of the Order, however, provides that the President's constitutionally-based privileges "subsume" the attorney-client, attorney work product, and deliberative process privileges. I understand that courts have interpreted FOIA exemption (b)(5) to cover only common law evidentiary privileges. For example, see NLRB v. Sears & Roebuck Co., 421 U.S. 132, 150-54 (1975); EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 85-91(1973); and FTC v. Grolier, Inc., 462 U.S. 19 (1983). I also understand that there is no judicial precedent according Constitutional status to such privileges. You agreed with me on this point. However, you explained that, if an incumbent or former President asserted a general claim of executive privilege with respect to a communication, the claim would encompass any common law privilege that could have otherwise been raised with respect to the communication. I am concerned by what seems to be a backdoor way of accomplishing what Congress intended to preclude.

Your explanation also appears to be irreconcilable with recent appellate court rulings. In In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum, 112 F.3d 910 (8th Cir. 1997), cert. denied 117 S. Ct. 2482 (1997), the court held that the White House could not invoke any form of governmental attorney-client privilege to withhold potentially relevant information from a grand jury. In In re Bruce Lindsey, 158 F. 3d 1263 (D.C. Cir. 1998), cert. denied 119 S. Ct. 466 (1998), the court similarly denied assertions of attorney-client and attorney work product privileges by a White House counsel, holding that a government attorney cannot invoke these common law privileges in response to questions seeking information related to the commission of a crime. Finally, in In re Sealed Case (Espy), 121 F. 3d 729 (D.C. Cir. 1997), the court distinguished the Presidential communications privilege and the deliberative process privilege. The court observed that both are executive privileges meant to protect the confidentiality of executive branch decisionmaking. But, the deliberative process privilege applies to executive branch officials generally and is a common law privilege that requires a lower threshold of need to be overcome. The Presidential communications privilege is rooted in "constitutional separation of powers principle and the President's unique role" and applies only to "direct decisionmaking by the President" relating to only those functions that form the core of Presidential authority, involving what the court characterized as "quintessential and non-delegable Presidential power", i.e., those functions expressly vested in the President by the Constitution. This case law appears to conclude that common law privileges that might arise in general communications with the President cannot automatically be "subsumed" under a general claim of executive privilege.

Based on this case law, please reconsider your incorporation theory. After your review of this case law, do you now think that the two new, broad categories in Section 2(a) of E.O. 13233 could withstand a court challenge?

Q3. Section 2(c) of E.O. 13233 sets a new standard - "demonstrated, specific need" - for citizens to meet to access some Presidential records. This standard is not in FOIA. Therefore, what is the policy basis for this change?

SUBPART C -- DISPOSAL OF PRESIDENTIAL RECORDS

36 CFR 1270.30

§ 1270.30 Disposal of Presidential records by incumbent President.

A President may, while in office, dispose of any Presidential records which in his opinion lack administrative, historical, informational, or evidentiary value if one of the following two sets of requirements is satisfied:

(a)(1) The President has obtained the written views of the Archivist concerning the proposed disposal; and

(2) The Archivist states in his written views to the President that he does not intend to request, with respect to the President's proposed disposal of Presidential records, the advice of the Committees on Rules and Administration and Governmental Affairs of the Senate, and the Committees on House Administration and Government Operations of the House of Representatives because he does not consider--

(i) The records proposed for disposal to be of special interest to the Congress; or

(ii) Consultation with the Congress concerning the proposed disposal to be in the public interest; or

(b)(1) The President has obtained the written views of the Archivist concerning the proposed disposal;

(2) The Archivist states in his written views either--

(i) That the records proposed for disposal may be of special interest to the Congress; or

(ii) That consultation with the Congress concerning the proposed disposal is in the public interest; and

(3) The President submits copies of the proposed disposal schedule to the Committees on Rules and Administration and Governmental Affairs of the Senate and the Committees on House Administration and Government Operations of the House of Representatives at least 60 calendar days of continuous session of Congress in advance of the proposed disposal date. For the purpose of this section, continuity of session is broken only by an adjournment of Congress sine die, and the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than 3 days to a day certain are excluded in the computation of the days in which Congress is in continuous session.

§ 1270.32 Disposal of Presidential Records in the custody of the Archivist.

(a) The Archivist may dispose of Presidential records which he has appraised and determined to have insufficient administrative, historical, informational, or evidentiary value to warrant their continued preservation.

(b) When Presidential records are scheduled for disposal pursuant to paragraph (a) of this section, the Archivist shall publish a notice of this disposal in the Federal Register at least 60 days before the proposed disposal date.

(c) The notice required by paragraph (b) of this section, shall include the following:

(1) A reasonably specific description of the records scheduled for disposal; and

(2) A concise statement of the reason for disposal of the records.

(d) Publication in the FEDERAL REGISTER of the notice required by paragraph (b) of this section shall constitute a final agency action for purposes of review under chapter 7 of title 5 U.S.C. (5 U.S.C. 701-706).

§ 1270.40 Identification of restricted records.

(a) If a President, prior to the conclusion of his term of office or last consecutive term of office, as the case may be, specifies durations, not to exceed 12 years, for which access to certain information contained in Presidential records shall be restricted, in accordance with 44 U.S.C. 2204, the Archivist or his designee shall identify the Presidential records affected, or any reasonably segregable portion thereof, in consultation with that President or his designated representative(s).

(b) The Archivist shall restrict public access to the information contained in those records identified as affected until--

(1) The date on which the former President waives the restriction on disclosure of the record or information contained within;

(2) The expiration of the period of restriction specified under 44 U.S.C. 2204(a) for the category of information under which a certain record, or a portion thereof, was restricted; or

(3) The Archivist has determined that the former President or an agent of the former President has placed in the public domain through publication a restricted record or a reasonably segregable portion thereof, if this date is earlier than either of the dates specified in paragraph (b)(1) or (2) of this section.

§ 1270.42 Denial of access to public; right to appeal.

(a) Any person denied access to a Presidential record (hereinafter the requester) because of a determination that the record or a reasonably segregable portion thereof was (1) properly restricted under 44 U.S.C. 2204(a), and (2) not placed in the public domain by the former President or his agent, may file an administrative appeal with the Assistant Archivist for Presidential Libraries (NL), Washington, DC 20408.

(b) Appeals shall be filed no later than 10 working days after the requester receives written notification that access to Presidential records has been denied.

(c) Appeals shall be in writing and shall set forth the reason(s) why the requester believes access to the records sought should be allowed. The requester shall identify the specific records sought.

(d) Upon receipt of an appeal, the Assistant Archivist for Presidential Libraries shall have 30 working days from the date an appeal is filed to consider the appeal and to respond in writing to the requester. The Assistant Archivist's response shall state whether or not the Presidential records requested are to be released and the basis for this determination. The decision of the Assistant Archivist to withhold release of Presidential records is final and not subject to judicial review.

§ 1270.46 Notice of intent to disclose Presidential records.

(a) The Archivist or his designee shall notify a former President or his designated representative(s) before any Presidential records of his Administration are disclosed.

(b)(1) The notice given by the Archivist or his designee shall:

(i) Be in writing;

(ii) Identify the particular records with reasonable specificity;

(iii) State the reason for the disclosure; and

(iv) Specify the date on which the record will be disclosed.

(2) In the case of records to be disclosed in accordance with § 1270.44, the notice shall also:

(i) Identify the requester and the nature of the request;

(ii) Specify whether the requested records contain materials to which access would otherwise be restricted pursuant to 44 U.S.C. 2204(a) and identify the category of restriction within which the record to be disclosed falls; and

(iii) Specify the date of the request.

(c) If, after receiving the notice required by paragraph (a) of this section, a former President raises rights or privileges which he believes should preclude the disclosure of a Presidential record, and the Archivist nevertheless determines that the record in question should be disclosed, in whole or in part, the Archivist shall notify the former President or his representative of this determination. The notice given by the Archivist or his designee shall:

(1) Be in writing;

(2) State the basis upon which the determination to disclose the record is made; and

(3) Specify the date on which the record will be disclosed.

(d) The Archivist shall not disclose any records covered by any notice required by paragraph (a) or (c) of this section for at least 30 calendar days from receipt of the notice by the former President, unless a shorter time period is required by a demand for Presidential records under § 1270.44.

(e) Copies of all notices provided to former Presidents under this section shall be provided at the same time to the incumbent President.

(a) For the processing of Presidential records compiled for law enforcement purposes that may be subject to 5 U.S.C. 552(b)(7), the Archivist shall request specific guidance from the appropriate Federal agency on the proper treatment of a record if there is no general guidance applicable, if the record is particularly sensitive, or if the type of record or information is widespread throughout the files.

(b) When specific agency guidance is requested under paragraph (a) of this section, the Archivist shall notify the appropriate Federal agency of the decision regarding disclosure of the specific documents. Notice shall include the following:

(1) A description of the records in question;

(2) Statements that the records described contain information compiled for law enforcement purposes and may be subject to the exemption provided by 5 U.S.C. 552(b)(7) for records of this type; and,

(3) The name of a contact person at NARA.

(c) Agency guidance under this section is not binding on the Archivist. The final determination on whether Presidential records may be subject to the exemption in 5 U.S.C. 552(b)(7) is the Archivist's responsibility.

54 FR 3403

Title 3 -- The President

Presidential Records

Executive Order 12667 of January 18, 1989

54 FR 3403

TEXT:
By virtue of the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, and in order to establish policies and procedures governing the assertion of Executive privelege by incumbent and former Presidents in connection with the release of Presidential records by the National Archives and Records Administration pursuant to the Presidential Records Act of 1978, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1 Definitions. For purposes of this Order:

(a) "Archivist" refers to the Archivist of the United States or his designee.

(b) "NARA" refers to the National Archives and Records Administration.

(d) "NARA regulations" refers to the NARA regulations implementing the Presidential Records Act. 53 Fed. Reg. 50404 (1988), codified at 36 C.F.R. Part 1270.

(e) "Presidential records" refers to those documentary materials maintained by NARA pursuant to the Presidential Records Act and the NARA regulations.

(f) "Former President" refers to the former President during whose term or terms of office particular Presidential records were created.

(g) A "substantial question of Executive privilege" exists if NARA's disclosure of Presidential records might impair the national security (including the conduct of foreign relations), law enforcement, or the deliberative processes of the Executive branch.

(h) A "final court order" is a court order from which no appeal may be taken.

Sec. 2. Notice of Intent to Disclose Presidential Records.

(a) When the Archivist provides notice to the incumbent and former Presidents of his intent to disclose Presidential records pursuant to section 1270.46 of the NARA regulations, the Archivist, utilizing any guidelines provided by the incumbent and former Presidents, shall identify any specific materials, the disclosure of which he believes may raise a substantial question of Executive privilege. However, nothing in this Order is intended to affect the right of the incumbent or former Presidents to invoke Executive privilege with respect to materials not identified by the Archivist. Copies of the notice for the incumbent President shall be delivered to the President (through the Counsel to the President) and the Attorney General (through the Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel). The copy of the notice for the former President shall be delivered to the former President or his designated representative.

(b) Upon the passage of 30 days after receipt by the incumbent and former Presidents of a notice of intent to disclose Presidential records, the Archivist may disclose the records covered by the notice, unless during that time period the Archivist has received a claim of Executive privilege bythe incumbent or former President or the Archivist has been instructed by the incumbent president or his designee to extend the time period. If a shorter time period is required under the circumstances set forth in section 1270.44 of the NARA regulations, the Archivist shall so indicate in the notice.

Sec. 3. Claim of Executive Privilege by Incumbent President.

(a) Upon receipt of a notice of intent to disclose Presidential records, the Attorney General (directly or through the Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel) and the Counsel to the President shall review as they deem appropriate the records covered by the notice and consult with each other, the Archivist, and such other Federal agencies as they deem appropriate concerning whether invocation of Executive privilege is justified.

(b) The Attorney General and the Counsel to the President, in the exercise of their discretion and after appropriate review and consultation under subsection (a) of this section, may jointly determine that invocation of Executive privilege is not justified. The Archivist shall be promptly notified of an such determination.

(c) If after appropriate review and consultation under subsection (a) of this section, either the Attorney General or the Counsel to the President believes that the circumstances justify invocation of Executive privilege, the issue shall be presented to the President by the Counsel to the President and the Attorney General.

(d) If the President decides to invoke Executive privilege, the Counsel to the President shall notify the former President, the Archivist, and the Attorney General in writing of the claim of privilege and the specific Presidential records to which it relates. After receiving such notice, the Archivist shall not disclose the privileged records unless directed to do so by an incumbent President or by a final court order.

Sec. 4. Claim of Executive Privilege by Former President.

(a) Upon receipt of a claim of Executive privilege by a former President, the Archivist shall consult with the Attorney General (through the Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel), the Counsel to the President, and such other Federal agencies as he deems appropriate concerning the Archivist's determination as to whether to honor the former President's claim of privilege or istead to disclose the Presidential records notwithstanding the claim of privilege. An determination under section 3 of this Order that Executive privilege shall not be invoked by the incumbent President shall not prejudice the Archivist's determination with respect to the former President's claim of privilege.

(b) In making the determination referred to in subsection (a) of this section, the Archivist shall abide by any instructions given him by the incumbent President or his designee unless otherwise directed by a final court order. The Archivist shall notify the incumbent and former Presidents of his determination at least 30 days prior to disclosure of the Presidential records, unless a shorter time period is required in the circumstances set forth in section 1270.44 of the NARA regulations. Copies of the notice for the incumbent President shall be delivered to the President (through the Counsel the President) and the Attorney General (through the Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel). The copy of the notice for the former President shall be delivered to the former President or his designated representative.

Sec. 5. Judicial Review. This Order is intended only to improve the internal management of the Executive branch and is not intended to create any right or benefit, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law by a party against the United States, its agencies, its officers, or any person.

[1] Seeking Senate's advice and consent on treaty with the southern Indians. President Washington also returned to the Senate on August 24 for further discussion of the treaty, but the Senate's insistence on referring the matter to a committee and on altering some provisions of the proposed treaty led him to conduct all future treaty business in writing. The Honorable Alberto R. Gonzales
Counsel to the President
The White House
Washington, D.C. 20502

Dear Judge Gonzales:

This is in further reference to my letter dated February 4, 2003 providing you, on behalf of the incumbent President, with formal notice from the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) of our intent to open 40 pages of Bush Vice Presidential records.

In accordance with the requirements of the Presidential Records Act (PRA), 44 U.S.C. §§ 2201-2207 and Executive Order 13233, we also informed former President Bush's representative, James W. Cicconi, and former President Reagan's representative, John Mintz, of our intent to release these records. We have subsequently been informed by both Mr. Cicconi and Mr. Mintz that they have no objection to the release of this material. Please note that the material proposed for opening in this notice includes 14 pages of documents containing confidential communications requesting or submitting advice and four pages containing information related to appointments to federal office that would normally have been withheld prior to January 20, 2001, under the PRA restrictions in 44 U.S.C. §2204(a), as they were asserted and narrowed by President Bush. A copy of these documents was provided to Brett Kavanaugh on February 4, 2003.

Pursuant to E.O. 13233, NARA will await a decision from the incumbent President regarding the release of these records. We look forward to hearing the views of the incumbent President regarding this notification as soon as possible, hopefully within 45 days of this letter, which would be July 5, 2003.

If you have any questions relating to this request, please contact me at (202) 501-5700 or NARA General Counsel Gary M. Stern at (301) 837-3026.

THE WHITE HOUSE

Office of the Press Secretary

For Immediate Release January 14, 1991

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

Today I am signing H.J. Res. 77, the "Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Iraq Resolution." By passing H.J. Res. 77, the Congress of the United States has expressed its approval of the use of U.S. Armed Forces consistent with U.N. Security Council Resolution 678. I asked the Congress to support implementation of U.N. Security Council Resolution 678 because such action would send the clearest possible message to Saddam Hussein that he must withdraw from Kuwait without condition or delay. I am grateful to those of both political parties who joined in the expression of resolve embodied in this resolution. To all, I emphasize again my conviction that this resolution provides the best hope for peace.

The debate on H.J. Res. 77 reflects the profound strength of our constitutional democracy. In coming to grips with the issues at stake in the Gulf, both Houses of Congress acted in the finest traditions of our country. This resolution provides unmistakable support for the international community's determination that Iraq's ongoing aggression against, and occupation of, Kuwait shall not stand. As I made clear to congressional leaders at the outset, my request for congressional support did not, and my signing this resolution does not, constitute any change in the long-standing positions of the executive branch on either the President's constitutional authority to use the Armed Forces to defend vital U.S. interests or the constitutionality of the War Powers Resolution. I am pleased, however, that differences on these issues between the President and many in the Congress have not prevented us from uniting in a common objective. I have had the benefit of extensive and meaningful consultations with the Congress throughout this crisis, and I shall continue to consult closely with the Congress in the days ahead.

GEORGE BUSH

OPINION OF THE OFFICE OF LEGAL COUNSEL

PAYMENT OF EXPENSES ASSOCIATED WITH TRAVEL BY THE PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

March 24, 1982

CORE TERMS: trip, travel, appropriated, political committee, apportionment, expenses associated, duties, appropriation, used to pay, defray, expenses incurred, augmentation, gift, campaign, political activities, campaign committee, federal office, unauthorized, non-official, apportioned, contributed, regulation, candidate, mixed, funds appropriated, political activity, political party, giving rise, incremental, reimbursed

SYLLABUS:

Funds appropriated for the official functioning of the offices of the President and the Vice President may be used for travel expenses only if the travel is reasonably related to an official purpose; and, official activities may be funded only from funds appropriated for such purposes. Thus appropriated funds should not be used to pay for political travel and political funds should not be used to pay for official travel.

Whether an event is official or political for purposes of paying its expenses must be determined on a case-by-case basis, and both the nature of the event and the nature of the individual involved should be considered.

Where both official and political activities occur on the same trip, the expenses of individuals on the trip for both political and official reasons can be apportioned between the government and a political committee on a basis which reflects the time spent on the respective activities. During the period of a presidential election campaign, Federal Election Commission regulations may require a different rule of allocation.

ADDRESSEE:
Memorandum Opinion for the Counsel to the President

OPINION:
[214] This memorandum responds to your request for our advice [*2] about the payment of expenses associated with travel by the President or Vice President. We are to assume that travel by the President or Vice President may often include both official events, undertaken as part of the President's or Vice President's official roles as governmental leaders, and purely political events, undertaken for partisan purposes in order to advance the interests of the President's and Vice President's political party. This mixed character of much presidential and vice presidential travel follows naturally from their dual roles as governmental officials and leaders of their party. You have asked us to articulate the legal principles governing the allocation and payment of costs associated with such travel.

Several caveats must be noted at the outset. First, our opinion should not be read as a declaration that the generally applicable principles will necessarily lead to an inflexible result in a particular case. In fact, the principles are of such generality that they often will generate few determinate results. They thus must be viewed as general guides to decisionmaking. Second, the principles should be applied to a particular trip by the officials most [*3] familiar with the facts of the trip. Each case may present unique circumstances that will need to be taken into [215] account in determining, for instance, whether an event is "official" or "political" in character. As we will indicate, there is considerable room in this context for the careful use of informed discretion. Third, this opinion focuses on broadly applicable legal principles, not on the specific rules adopted by the Federal Election Commission for election activity. See 11 C.F.R. Chapter 1 (1981). If, in light of this opinion, particular questions arise, we will, of course, be glad to address them.

Furthermore, the principles discussed in this opinion may be fully understood only with an appreciation of the unique context presented by the peculiar functions and responsibilities of the President and Vice President in our system of government. They are the senior officials of the Executive Branch of government. Their official roles are necessarily political in the broad sense that they must formulate, explain, advocate, and defend policies. To the extent that the President and Vice President generate support for their policies and programs, they are also [*4] executing and fulfilling their official responsibilities. Even the most clearly partisan activity is not without some impact on the official activities of the President and Vice President.

By the same token, official success or failure by the President and Vice President has an inevitable and unavoidable impact on the standing of their political party, members of their party, and their party's candidates for public office. Thus, it is simply not possible to divide many of the actions of the President and Vice President into utterly official or purely political categories. To attempt to do so in most cases would ignore the nature of our political system and the structure of our government. Accordingly, efforts to establish such divisions must be approached with common sense and a good faith effort to apply the spirit of the principles we discuss in this memorandum, and they must be judged with considerable deference to the decisions of the persons directly involved in making the determinations.

With this background, our discussion will focus on three major questions. First, what are the basic legal principles to be applied, putting aside specialized restrictions formulated by [*5] the Federal Election Commission with regard to election activities? Second, how does one determine whether an event giving rise to an expense is "official" or "non-official" in character? Third, assuming that a trip involves events that are both official and non-official (or political) in character, may certain of the expenses for such a mixed trip be apportioned between the government, on the one hand, and a political committee, on the other hand? In the fourth section, we will discuss other considerations that bear on the issues discussed herein.

I. Two Basic Norms

When considering payment of expenses associated with presidential and vice presidential travel, two major principles governing the use of appropriated funds must be borne in mind. First, appropriated funds may be spent only for the purposes for which they have been appropriated. 31 U.S.C. § 628; 52 Comp. [216] Gen. 504 (1973); 50 Comp. Gen. 534 (1971). Thus, funds appropriated for the official functioning of the offices of the President and the Vice President may be used for travel expenses only if the travel is reasonably related to an official purpose. If, however, there is no reasonable connection between [*6] the expense incurred and the official purposes to be served by an appropriation -- as, generally speaking, there would not be when an expense is incurred purely for partisan political purposes -- official funds may not be used to pay the expense.

The second basic principle is that, in general, official activities should be paid for only from funds appropriated for such purposes, unless Congress has authorized the support of such activities by other means. Stated another way, although appropriated funds should not be used for non-official purposes, it is equally true that outside sources of funds may not be used to pay for official activities. This latter principle, which prevents the unauthorized augmentation of appropriations, has been recognized by the Comptroller General on numerous occasions. n1 A problem concerning an unauthorized augmentation of an appropriation does not arise when a trip is purely non-official in character and non-official funds are used to pay for it. Rather, the issue arises only where an official activity is supported by non-appropriated funds and where there is no authority for that to occur.

n1 See, e.g., 23 Comp. Gen. 694 (1944); 46 Comp. Gen. 689 (1967). See also 9 Comp. Dec. 174 (1902); 17 Comp. Dec. 712 (1911). [*7]

In short, appropriated funds should not be used to pay for political events, and absent authority to the contrary, political funds should not be used to pay for official events. The difficulties of applying these principles arise because both types of activities may occur on the same trip and because it is exceedingly difficult in many instances to determine what is official and what is political.

II. What Tests Should Be Used for Determining Whether an Expense Should Be Considered "Political" or "Official?"

Because officials will wish to ensure that appropriated funds are used only to pay for expenses associated with official events and are not used to pay for political expenses, it will be necessary to determine on a case-by-case basis whether an expense is official or political in character. As discussed generally above, there is unfortunately no single litmus test for making such judgments. Indeed, many events could be characterized properly as either political or official or both. Therefore, in making this determination the persons most familiar with the facts of a particular trip will have to assess all of the circumstances involved and apply a large measure of common [*8] sense. There are, however, two major variables concerning the source of the expense to be borne in mind: the nature of the event involved, and the nature of the individual involved. Either, or both, of these indicia may be useful in a particular case in determining whether a particular expense should be considered official or political.

With respect to the nature of the event giving rise to an expense, an earlier opinion of this Office, entitled "Political Trips" and transmitted to the Counsel to the President on March 15, 1977, stated the following guidelines:

[217] As a general rule, Presidential and Vice Presidential travel should be considered 'political' if its primary purpose involves their positions as leaders of their political party. Appearing at party functions, fundraising, and campaigning for specific candidates are the principal examples of travel which should be considered political. On the other hand, travel for inspections, meetings, non-partisan addresses, and the like ordinarily should not be considered 'political' travel even though they [sic] may have partisan consequences or concern questions on which opinion is politically divided. The President [*9] cannot perform his official duties effectively without the understanding, confidence, and support of the public. Travel and appearances by the President and Vice President to present, explain, and secure public support for the Administration's measures are therefore an inherent part of the President's and Vice President's official duties (pages 11-12).

We concur with the foregoing rules of thumb, which are based largely on a common sense understanding of the nature of political and official activities. n2 n2 Although we generally agree with this earlier opinion of this Office, we would note that much of its advice is of a prudential, not strictly legal, character. In the present memorandum, we do not undertake to specify rules that are not legally mandated. Moreover, the earlier opinion itself takes pains to stress the flexibility that exists in determining whether, in a particular case, travel by the President is official or political (see page 7).

While we would hope that the foregoing generalities may be useful guides for the future, they should not be viewed as inflexible. There clearly is much room for discretion in determining whether an event giving rise to an [*10] expense is political or official. At bottom, the question is a factual one that can only be answered by those most familiar with the particular facts of a given situation. Nonetheless, in general, if the purpose of an event on a trip is to promote the partisan aims of the President's or Vice President's party or candidates of that party, then expenses incurred in performing the event would generally be political in character. Should particular questions arise about specific events, we would be glad to provide more concrete advice concerning them.

The second variable that may, in some circumstances, determine the character of a particular expense incurred on a trip is the nature of the individual whose activity generates the expense. There are some individuals who, in particular situations, are on a trip for inherently official or political purposes. Expenses incurred by them should generally be viewed as either official or political depending on their particular role. For instance, there are some persons whose official duties require them to be with the President, whether or not the President himself is on official business. n3 This group includes the President's doctor, his [*11] military aide, and the Secret Service agents responsible for his protection. n4 A similar group would exist for the Vice President. Expenses incurred during travel with the President or Vice President by this group of individuals should be [218] considered official regardless of the character of the event that may be involved in a given trip.

n3 This point is the same as stated in the March 15, 1977, opinion of this Office, entitled "Political Trips" (pages 9, 15-16).

n4 This list is not intended to be exhaustive. The President may, in his discretion, determine that others are necessary members of his official party whenever he travels.

Similarly, on an otherwise entirely official trip, an individual may accompany the group for purely political reasons. As a rule, any expenses specifically incurred by such individuals should be considered political expenses, regardless of the events involved in the trip.

In short, as we noted at the outset of this section, there is no single test for determining whether an expense is political or official in character. Viewed generally, expenses of individuals whose official duties require them to travel with the President or Vice [*12] President should normally be considered official. Expenses of individuals who are on a trip for purely political reasons should normally be considered political. Expenses associated with individuals who are not necessarily serving in either a wholly official or wholly political capacity -- such as the President or Vice President or other individuals in the White House who may, consistent with their official duties, perform political functions -- should normally be judged to be official or political depending on the character of the event giving rise to the expense.

III. On a Mixed Trip Including Both Official and Political Activities, Can Certain Expenses Be Apportioned Between the Government and a Political Committee?

Based on what we have said thus far, the following conclusions may be stated. First, if all events during a trip are political in character, the only official expenses on the trip would be those associated specifically with the group of individuals whose official duties require them to accompany the President and Vice President. Second, if all events on a trip are official in character, the only political expenses would be those associated specifically with individuals [*13] who accompany the President and Vice President on the trip for purely political reasons. This means that on a trip that is entirely official, any expenses associated with the President or Vice President or others who are not necessarily on the trip for purely official or purely political reasons should be considered official. Conversely, on a trip that is entirely political, expenses associated with persons who are not necessarily on the trip for wholly official or wholly political reasons should be considered political.

A question remains, however, concerning expenses associated with individuals whose purpose for being on a trip is not necessarily only political or only official, when the trip itself is for both official and political purposes. Specifically, on a mixed trip involving a substantial official element and a substantial political element, can the expenses associated with the President or Vice President or others who are on the trip for both reasons be apportioned between the government and a political committee? There are several possible views on this question.

It might be argued, for example, that the performance of an official event during a trip could not have [*14] been accomplished without incurring certain expenditures [219] and that, therefore, the entire cost of the trip should be treated as official and should be paid out of appropriated funds, with the sole exception being incremental expenses associated specifically with a political activity (e.g., a hotel bill for an extra night's lodging necessitated entirely by a political event on the following day). This approach is grounded on the assumption that to permit any other apportionment of the cost of a trip to a political committee would allow the official budget to benefit from an unauthorized augmentation of appropriations. Since the expenses incurred were necessary to accomplish an official purpose, on this view they must be paid for in full with appropriated funds.

The opposite theory could also be advanced. That is, if there is any political activity on a trip, a political committee could theoretically be required to pay for the trip's entire cost (except for incremental expenses specifically attributable to an official event). This theory proceeds on the assumption that any other approach would allow the President's or Vice President's political activities to be subsidized [*15] by their official appropriations.

A third approach, which in effect combines the first two, is suggested by a prior opinion of this Office, transmitted to the Counsel to the President on September 17, 1980, and entitled "Reimbursement of Travel Expenses Incurred by Government Officials on Mixed Official and Campaign Trips." That opinion responded to a question about the operation of a Federal Election Commission (FEC) rule under which a campaign committee's share of the costs of a mixed official-political trip is the full cost of the trip from the point of origin through each campaign-related stop and back to the point of origin. 11 C.F.R. § 9004.F. n5 After the FEC adopted this rule, the White House Counsel's Office assumed that the expense to the government for such a trip would be the difference between the trip's actual cost and the amount reimbursed by the campaign committee. However, the Counsel's Office was concerned that such diminishment of the actual expense to the government could constitute an unauthorized augmentation of appropriations. For that reason, it sought an opinion of this Office.

n5 For instance, if a trip from Washington, D.C., to Chicago were taken for official purposes, and then a trip from Chicago to Denver were taken for campaign purposes (with a return from Denver to Washington, D.C.), under the FEC rule the campaign committee would have to make reimbursement for the cost of travel from Washington, D.C., to Denver and back to Washington, D.C. [*16]

The September 17, 1980, opinion concluded that, if the government were to pay only the difference between the actual cost of a trip and the amount reimbursed by the campaign committee under the FEC rule, there would be an unauthorized augmentation of appropriations (assuming no authority to accept contributions) so long as the government were allowed to "reap the benefit" of the enhanced payment of expenses by the campaign committee under the FEC rule. To cure this problem, the opinion stated that an accounting system should be devised to charge "the full allocated travel costs to both the Campaign Committee and the government agency," with a deposit of any excess funds in the Treasury (page 4, emphasis added).

While we express no view regarding the correctness of this third approach during the period of a presidential election campaign when the Federal Election [220] Commission's regulations would be applicable, we do not believe that the approach correctly reflects the requirements that apply outside the campaign period. We believe that the first two approaches are unreasonable solutions to the problem because each tilts the scales completely toward one of the two conflicting [*17] guiding principles and results either in an inappropriate augmentation of appropriated funds or the subsidization of political activity with appropriated funds. The approach of the September 17, 1980, Office of Legal Counsel opinion attempts to address these problems in, we believe, an unrealistic and unnecessary way by requiring one trip to be paid for twice -- both with official funds and with political funds.

In our view, a fourth approach which attempts in good faith to apportion the costs of such a trip on the basis of a reasonable division between the time spent on political activities and the time spent on official activities is a more reasonable and a legal resolution of the underlying problems. For example, if 50 percent of a single day's events are political and 50 percent are official, approximately 50 percent of the costs associated with participants whose roles are not necessarily either official or political should be reimbursed by the political committee and 50 percent should be paid from appropriated funds, unless such an apportionment, under the particular circumstances, would on some basis be unreasonable or inequitable. We believe that such an approach faithfully [*18] accommodates both of the basic norms discussed in part I.

Thus, when there is a mixed trip involving the President or Vice President, the purpose of which is both substantially political and substantially official, expenses should be paid in the following manner: first, expenses for individuals who are necessarily official (Secret Service, etc.) should be paid for with appropriated funds; second, expenses for individuals who are necessarily political (campaign officials) should be reimbursed by a political committee; third, incremental expenses specifically attributable to an official event should be paid from appropriated funds, and incremental expenses specifically attributable to a political event should be paid from political funds; and finally, expenses for individuals whose official roles permit them to perform political activity should be reasonably and equitably apportioned so that a share reflecting the amount of a trip that is political in character should be paid by a political committee. If these general guidelines are followed, then the purposes of using appropriated funds for official purposes but not using such funds for political purposes will be achieved.

We must [*19] reaffirm the limited nature of our conclusion about apportionment. As we have indicated, some categories of expenses may have to be treated as entirely official or entirely political, and thus they would not be subject to apportionment. Apportionment would be appropriate only with respect to expenses associated with individuals whose official roles permit them to perform political functions, and only when those individuals are on a trip that itself is not entirely political or wholly official in nature. n6 In such circumstances, to accommodate [221] both of the guiding norms noted in part I, we believe that an apportionment of expenses between appropriated funds and the funds of a political committee which reflects the relationship between official and political activities may be made. We urge caution in applying such an approach, particularly in retaining records to substantiate any characterization of an event or trip as political or official that could be used in the future if, for instance, there should be an audit by the General Accounting Office. n7 n6 We are not suggesting any specific formula for apportionment, for several formulae may be equally reasonable and some may be particularly well suited to particular trips. For example, a formula may be predicated on the number of hours spent on each event, the number of hours on the entire trip (including travel time) devoted to official or political affairs, the number of events devoted to each, or if a trip is devoted to one type of event in a distant city and another type in a nearby city on the return flight, on the relative distances travelled to each. While some general guidelines within these limits should be established for consistency in application, the overriding factor is the reasonableness of the apportionment in a specific situation. We would not exclude the possibility of creating an exception for de minimis involvement in official activity during a trip that would be treated as entirely political, and vice versa. We note that previous Administrations have made use of such a de minimis exception, as indicated in the background materials supplied to us by your office.

n7 In two opinions to several Senators, dated October 6, 1980, and March 6, 1981, the Comptroller General discussed the apportionment of travel expenses for purposes of their payment by official and political funds under the Carter Administration (B-196862). Apportionment was not objected to by the Comptroller General. The Comptroller General expressly noted, as we have observed here, that there are "no guidelines of a legally binding nature [which] have been established by legislation, judicial decision, or otherwise" (page 2 of March 6, 1981, opinion). These opinions, coupled with prior practice by the White House, buttress our conclusion that a reasonable apportionment may be made in the circumstances we have described. [*20]

IV. Other Considerations

We would add one qualification to the preceding discussion. As noted in part I, official expenses, including expenses incurred during the President's and the Vice President's travel for official purposes, may not be paid for by funds other than those appropriated for official purposes unless there is authority to the contrary. An acceptable source of such authority would be a congressional authorization, in the form of a statute, for the President and the Vice President (or their respective offices) to accept gifts to defray their official expenses. This Office has concluded in the past that the White House Office and the Office of the Vice President do not have statutory authority to accept contributions or gifts. This legal premise provides the basis for the conclusion that the payment by a political committee of official travel expenses incurred by the President or Vice President would be an impermissible augmentation of the appropriations for these offices.

However, in the course of our research for this opinion, we reviewed a provision of law, 2 U.S.C. § 439a (1982), not considered in any of the prior opinions on this subject by this Office or [*21] by the Comptroller General, which appears to grant the President and Vice President gift authority, at least to the extent of authorizing them to accept contributions to defray their ordinary and necessary official expenses. Section 439a states in full:

Amounts received by a candidate as contributions that are in excess of any amount necessary to defray his expenditures, and any other amounts contributed to an individual for the purpose of supporting his or her activities as a holder of Federal office, may be used by such candidate or individual, as the case may be, to [222] defray any ordinary and necessary expenses incurred in connection with his or her duties as a holder of Federal office, may be contributed to any organization described in section 170(c) of . . . [the Internal Revenue Code of 1954], or may be used for any other lawful purpose, including transfers without limitation to any national, State, or local committee of any political party; except that, with respect to any individual who is not a Senator or Representative in, or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress on January 8, 1980, no such amounts may be converted by any person to any [*22] personal use, other than to defray any ordinary and necessary expenses incurred in connection with his or her duties as a holder of Federal office.

(Emphasis added.)

The foregoing provision authorizes "amounts contributed to an individual for the purpose of supporting his or her activities as a holder of Federal office" to be used by such individual "to defray any ordinary and necessary expenses incurred in connection with his or her duties. . . ." The term "Federal office" is defined separately as including the Offices of the President, the Vice President, and Members of Congress. 2 U.S.C. § 431(c). Accordingly, on its face, this provision would appear to authorize use by the President and Vice President of amounts contributed to such individuals for the purpose of supporting their activities as President or Vice President. This would include expenses incurred in the course of official travel. n8 n8 Of course, any applicable conflict of interest provisions would have to be borne in mind if § 439a were to be used as authority for the receipt of contributions for the President's or Vice President's travel expenses.

We have consulted the legislative history of 2 U.S.C. § [*23] 439a, first adopted as part of the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974, Pub. L. No. 93-443, 88 Stat. 1289, and have found nothing that would be inconsistent with such an interpretation. However, in the limited time available, we similarly have found nothing to indicate that Congress specifically considered the provision's application to the Office of the President or Vice President. The brief floor discussion of this provision n9 and of a similar provision in a predecessor bill n10 merely focused on its application to Members of Congress, who traditionally have been permitted to accept gifts to defray the expenses of their offices. n11 A regulation promulgated by the Federal Election Commission under this provision repeats the language of the statute. See 11 C.F.R. §§ 113.1 & 113.2. Thus, we are aware of no indication that Congress intended it to mean anything other than what it clearly says: that elected officials including the President and the Vice President may accept gifts to defray expenses incurred in connection with the performance of their duties.

n11 Congress amended the provision in 1980, Pub. L. No. 96-187, §§ 105(4), 113, 93 Stat. 1354, 1366 (1980), generally to prohibit a federal official from converting contributed funds for his or her personal use. A specific exemption to this provision also was added for individuals who were Senators and Representatives on January 8, 1980. [*24]

[223] Nevertheless, we would caution against complete reliance on § 439a until further consideration has been given to the authority under that statute for political committees to make contributions, and until the matter has been coordinated with the Federal Election Commission. In this connection, the Federal Election Commission has authority to render advisory opinions to federal officeholders about "the application of a general rule of law stated in" the Federal Election Commission Act, of which § 439a is a part. See 2 U.S.C. § 437 (b). To our knowledge, the Commission has not been called upon to and thus has not formally addressed the application of § 439a to gifts made to the President or the Vice President to defray the expenses of their offices.

Moreover, even if § 439a ultimately is to be relied upon to grant gift authority for the President and Vice President, we would advise that guidelines be established for the receipt of contributions under the provision. This will be necessary since the Standards of Conduct regulations applicable to agencies in the Executive Office of the President, 3 C.F.R. §§ 100.735-(1)-(32), were not drafted with the intent of regulating [*25] contributions to meet the official expenses of the President and Vice President. Those regulations as currently drafted might not be consistent with full implementation of § 439a if that were desired.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY POWERS

SUMMARY

The President of the United States has available certain powers that may be exercised in the event that the Nation is threatened by crisis, exigency, or emergency circumstances (other than natural disasters, war, or near-war situations). Such powers may be stated explicitly or implied by the Constitution, assumed by the Chief Executive to be constitutionally permissible, or inferred from or specified by statute. Through legislation, Congress has made a great many delegations of authority in this regard over the past 200 years.

There are, however, limits and restraints upon the President in his exercise of emergency powers. With the exception of the habeas corpus clause, the Constitution makes no allowance for the suspension of

In its final report, issued in late May of 1976, the Special Committee concluded "by reemphasizing that emergency laws and procedures in the United States have been neglected for too long, and that Congress must pass the National Emergencies Act to end a potentially dangerous situation./64 The panel's recommended legislation, of course, was enacted into law before the end of the year.

Other issues identified by the Special Committee as deserving attention in the future, however, did not fare so well. The panel, for example, was hopeful that standing committees of both Houses of Congress would review statutory emergency power provisions within their respective jurisdictions with a view to the continued need for and possible adjustment of such authority./65 Actions in this regard probably were not as ambitious as the Special Committee expected. A title of the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950, granting the President or Congress power to declare a civil defense emergency in the event an attack on the United States occurred or was anticipated, expired in June of 1974 after the House Committee on Rules failed to report a measure continuing the statute./66

A provision of emergency law was refined in May of 1976. Legislation was enacted granting the President the authority to order certain selected members of an armed services reserve component to active duty without a declaration of war or national emergency./67 Previously, such an activation of military reserve personnel had been limited to a "time of national emergency declared by the President" or "when otherwise authorized by law."/68

Another refinement of emergency law occurred in 1977 when action was completed on the International Emergency Economic Powers Act./69 Reform legislation containing this statute/70 modified a provision of the Trading With the Enemy Act of 1917 authorizing the President to regulate the Nation's international and domestic finance during periods of declared war or national emergency./71 The enacted bill limited the President's Trading With the Enemy Act power to regulate the country's finances to times of declared war. In the International Emergency Economic Powers Act; it conferred authority on the Chief Executive to exercise controls over international economic transactions in the future during a declared national emergency and established procedures governing the use of this power, including close consultation with Congress when declaring a national emergency to activate the IEEPA. Such a declaration would be subject to congressional regulation under the procedures of the National Emergencies Act./72

Other matters identified in the final report of the Special Committee for congressional scrutiny included--

- investigation of emergency preparedness efforts conducted by the executive branch;
- attention to congressional preparations for an emergency and continual review of emergency law; ending open-ended grants of authority to the Executive;
- investigation and institution of stricter controls over delegated powers; and
- improving the accountability of Executive decision making./73

There is some public record indication that certain of these points, particularly the first and the last, have been addressed in the past decade and a half by congressional overseers./74

Index.

CONCLUSION

The development, exercise, and regulation of emergency powers, from the days of the Continental Congress to the present, reflect at least one highly discernible trend: those authorities available to the Executive in time of national crisis or exigency have, since the time of the Lincoln Administration, come to be increasingly rooted in statutory law. The discretion available to a Civil War President in his exercise of emergency power has, to a considerable extent, been harnessed in the contemporary period. Furthermore, due to greater reliance upon statutory expression, the range of this authority has come to be more circumscribed, and the options for its use have come to be regulated procedurally through the National Emergencies Act. Since its enactment, however, the National Emergencies Act has not been revisited by congressional overseers. Nonetheless, as the final report of the Senate Special Committee on National Emergencies suggests, the prospect remains that further improvements and reforms in this policy area might be pursued and perfected.

15. While the concept of emergency powers can arguably be extended to embrace authority exercised in response to circumstances of natural disaster, this dimension is not within the scope of this report. Various Federal response arrangements and programs for dealing with natural disasters have been established and administered with no potential or actual disruption of constitutional arrangements. With regard to Corwin's characterization of emergency conditions, these long-standing arrangements and programs suggest that natural disasters do "admit of their being dealt with according to rule.

any of its provisions during a national emergency. Disputes over the constitutionality or legality of the exercise of emergency powers are judicially reviewable. Indeed, both the Judiciary and Congress, as co-equal branches, can restrain the Executive regarding emergency powers. So can public opinion. Furthermore, since 1976, the President has been subject to certain procedural formalities in utilizing some statutorily delegated emergency authority. The National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1601-1651) eliminated or modified some statutory grants of emergency authority, required the President to declare formally the existence of a national emergency and to specify what statutory authority, activated by the declaration, would be used, and provided Congress a means to countermand the President's declaration and the activated authority being sought.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY POWERS

Federal law provides a variety of powers for the President to use in response to crisis, exigency, or emergency circumstances threatening the Nation. Moreover, they are not limited to military or war situations. Some of these authorities, deriving from the Constitution or statutory law, are continuously available to the President with little or no qualification. Others--statutory delegations from Congress--exist on a stand-by basis and remain dormant until the President formally declares a national emergency. These delegations, or grants of power, authorize the President to meet the problems of governing effectively in times of crisis. Under the powers delegated by such statutes, the President may seize property, organize and control the means of production, seize commodities, assign military forces abroad, institute martial law, seize and control all transportation and communication, regulate the operation of private enterprise, restrict travel, and, in a variety of ways, control the lives of United States citizens. Furthermore, Congress may modify, rescind, or render dormant such delegated emergency authority.

Until the crisis of World War I, Presidents utilized emergency powers at their own discretion. Proclamations announced their exercise of exigency authority. However, during World War I and thereafter, Chief Executives have had available to them a growing body of stand-by emergency authority which became operative upon the issuance of a proclamation declaring a condition of national emergency. Sometimes such proclamations confined the matter of crisis to a specific policy sphere, and sometimes they placed no limitation on the pronouncement whatsoever. These activations of stand-by emergency authority remained acceptable practice until the era of the Vietnam war. In 1976, Congress curtailed this practice with the passage of the National Emergencies Act.

BACKGROUND AND HISTORY

The exercise of emergency powers had long been a concern of the classical political theorists, including the eighteenth century English philosopher John Locke, who had a strong influence upon the Founding Fathers in the United States. A preeminent exponent of a government of laws and not of men, Locke argued that occasions may arise when the Executive must exert a broad discretion in meeting special exigencies or "emergencies" for which the legislative power has provided no relief or existing law grants no necessary remedy. He did not regard this prerogative as limited to wartime, or even to situations of great urgency. It was sufficient if the "public good" might be advanced by its exercise./1

Emergency powers were first expressed prior to the actual founding of the Republic. Between 1775 and 1781, the Continental Congress passed a series of acts and resolves which count as the first expressions of emergency authority./2 These instruments dealt almost exclusively with the prosecution of the Revolutionary War.

At the Constitutional Convention of 1787, emergency powers, as such, failed to attract much attention during the course of debate over the charter for the new government. It may be argued, however, that the granting of emergency powers by Congress is implicit in its Article I, section 8 authority to "provide for the common Defense and general Welfare," the commerce clause, its war, armed forces, and militia powers, and the "necessary and proper" clause empowering it to make such laws as are required to fulfill the executions of "the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof."

There is a tradition of constitutional interpretation that has resulted in so-called implied powers, which may be invoked in order to respond to an emergency situation. Locke seems to have anticipated this practice. Furthermore, Presidents have occasionally taken an emergency action which they assumed to be constitutionally permissible. Thus, in the American governmental experience, the exercise of emergency powers has been somewhat dependent upon the Chief Executive's view of the Presidential office.

Perhaps the President who most clearly articulated a view of his office in conformity with the Lockean position was Theodore Roosevelt. Describing what came to be called the "stewardship" theory of the Presidency, Roosevelt wrote of his "insistence upon the theory that the executive power was limited only by specific restrictions and prohibitions appearing in the Constitution or imposed by the Congress under its constitutional powers. "It was his view " that every executive officer, and above all every executive officer in high position, was a steward of the people," and he "declined to adopt the view that what was imperatively necessary for the Nation could not be done by the President unless he could find some specific authorization to do it." Indeed, it was Roosevelt's belief that, for the President, "it was not only his right but his duty to do anything that the needs of the Nation demanded unless such action was forbidden by the Constitution or by the laws."/3

Opposed to this view of the Presidency was Roosevelt's former Secretary of War, personal choice for, and actual successor as Chief Executive, William Howard Taft. America's twenty-seventh President viewed his office in more limited terms, writing "that the President can exercise no power which cannot be fairly and reasonably traced to some specific grant of power or justly implied and included within such express grant as proper and necessary to its exercise. In his view, such a "specific grant must be either in the Federal Constitution or in an act of Congress passed in pursuance thereof. There is, "Taft concluded," no undefined residuum of power which he can exercise because it seems to him to be in the public interest .... /4

Between these two views of the Presidency lie various gradations of opinion, resulting in perhaps as many conceptions of the office as there have been holders. One authority has summed up the situation in the following words:

> Emergency powers are not solely derived from legal sources. The extent of their invocation and use is also contingent upon the personal conception which the incumbent of the Presidential office has of the Presidency and the premises upon which he interprets his legal powers. In the last analysis, the authority of a President is largely determined by the President himself./5

Finally, apart from the Constitution, but resulting from its prescribed procedures, there are statutory grants of power for emergency conditions. The President is authorized by Congress to take some special or extraordinary action, ostensibly to meet the problems of governing effectively in times of exigency. Sometimes these laws are only of temporary duration. The Economic Stabilization Act of 1970, for example, allowed the President to impose certain wage and price controls for about three years before it eventually expired automatically in 1974./6 The statute gave the President emergency authority to address a crisis in the Nation's economy.

Of course, many of these laws are continuously maintained or permanently available for the President's ready use in responding to an emergency. The Defense Production Act, originally adopted in 1950 to prioritize and regulate the manufacture of military material, is exemplary of this type of statute./7

Lastly, there are various stand-by laws which convey special emergency powers once the President formally declares a national emergency activating them. In 1973, a Senate special committee studying emergency powers published a compilation identifying some 470 provisions of Federal law delegating to the Executive extraordinary authority in time of national emergency./8 The vast majority of them are of the stand-by kind-dormant until activated by the President. However, formal procedures for invoking these authorities, accounting for their use, and regulating their activation and application were only recently established by the National Emergencies Act of 1976./9

THE EMERGENCY CONCEPT

Relying upon constitutional authority or congressional delegations made at various times over the past 200 years, the President of the United States may exercise certain powers in the event that the continued existence of the Nation is threatened by crisis, exigency, or emergency circumstances. What is a national emergency?

In the simplest understanding of the term, the dictionary defines an emergency as "an unforeseen combination of circumstances or the resulting state that calls for immediate action."/10 In the midst of the crisis of the Great Depression, a 1934 Supreme Court majority opinion characterized an emergency in terms of urgency and relative infrequency of occurrence as well as equivalence to a public calamity resulting from fire, flood, or like disaster not reasonably subject to anticipation./11 An eminent constitutional scholar, the late Edward S. Corwin, explained emergency conditions as being those which have not attained enough of stability or recurrency to admit of their being dealt with according to rule."/12 During congressional committee hearings on emergency powers in 1973, a political scientist described an emergency in the following terms: "It denotes the existence of conditions of varying nature, intensity and duration, which are perceived to threaten life or well-being beyond tolerable limits."/13 Corwin also indicated it "connotes the existence of conditions suddenly intensifying the degree of existing danger to life or well-being beyond that which is accepted as normal."/14

There are perhaps at least four aspects of an emergency condition. The first is its temporal character: an emergency is sudden, unforeseen, and of unknown duration. The second is its potential gravity: an emergency is dangerous and threatening to life and well-being. The third, in terms of governmental role and authority, is the matter of perception: who discerns this phenomenon? The Constitution may be guiding on this question, but not always conclusive. Fourth, there is the element, of response: by definition, an emergency requires immediate action, but is, as well, unanticipated and, therefore, as Corwin notes, cannot always be "dealt with according to rule." From these simple factors arise the dynamics of national emergency powers./15 These dynamics can be seen in the history of the exercise of emergency powers.

LAW AND PRACTICE

During the summer of 1792, residents of western Pennsylvania, Virginia, and the Carolinas began forcefully opposing the collection of a Federal excise tax on whiskey. Anticipating rebellious activity, Congress enacted legislation providing for the calling forth of the militia to suppress insurrections and repel invasions./16 Section 3 of this statute required that a Presidential proclamation be issued to warn insurgents to cease their activity./17 If hostilities persisted, the militia could be dispatched. On August 17, 1794, President Washington issued such a proclamation. The insurgency continued. The President then took command of the forces organized to put down the rebellion./18

Here was the beginning of a pattern of policy expression and implementation regarding emergency powers. Congress legislated extraordinary or special authority for discretionary use by the President in a time of emergency. In issuing a proclamation, the Chief Executive notified Congress that he was making use of this power and also apprised other affected parties of his emergency action.

Over the next 100 years, Congress enacted various permanent and stand-by laws for responding largely to military, economic, and labor emergencies. During this span of years, however, the exercise of emergency powers by President Lincoln brought the first great dispute over the authority and discretion of the Chief Executive to engage in emergency actions.

By the time of Lincoln's inauguration (March 4, 1861), seven States of the lower South had announced their secession from the Union; the Confederate provisional government had been established (February 4, 1861); Jefferson Davis had been elected (February 9, 1861) and installed as president of the Confederacy (February 18, 1861); and an army was being mobilized by the secessionists. Lincoln had a little over two months to consider his course of action.

When the new President assumed office, Congress was not in session. For reasons of his own, Lincoln delayed calling a special meeting of the legislature, but soon ventured into its constitutionally designated policy sphere. On April 19, he issued a proclamation establishing a blockade on the ports of the secessionist States,/19 "a measure hitherto regarded as contrary to both the Constitution and the law of nations except when the government was embroiled in a declared, foreign war."/20 Congress, of course, had not been given an opportunity to consider a declaration of war.

The next day, the President ordered the addition of 19 vessels to the Navy "for purposes of public defense."/21 A short time later, the blockade was extended to the ports of Virginia and North Carolina./22

By a proclamation of May 3, Lincoln ordered that the regular army be enlarged by 22,714 men, that Navy personnel be increased by 18,000, and that 42,032 volunteers be accommodated for three-year terms of service./23 Such a directive, of course, antagonized many Representatives and Senators, because Congress is specifically authorized by Article I, Section 8, of the Constitution

"to raise and support armies."

In his July message to the newly assembled Congress, Lincoln suggested that, while his actions with regard to the expansion of the armed forces might be legally suspect, "[t]hese measures, whether strictly legal or not, were ventured upon under what appeared to be a popular and a public necessity, trusting then, as now, that Congress would readily ratify them. It is believed," he wrote, "that nothing has been done beyond the constitutional competency of Congress."/24

Indeed, Congress subsequently did legislatively authorize, and thereby approve, the President's actions regarding his increasing armed forces personnel, and would do the same later concerning some other questionable emergency actions. In the case of Lincoln, the opinion of scholars and experts is "that neither Congress nor the Supreme Court exercised any effective restraint upon the President./25 The emergency actions of the Chief Executive were either unchallenged or approved by Congress, and were either accepted or, because of almost no opportunity to render judgment, went largely without notice by the Supreme Court. The President made a quick response to the emergency at hand, a response which Congress or the Court might have rejected in law, but which, nonetheless, had been made in fact and with some degree of popular approval. Similar controversy would arise concerning the emergency actions of Presidents Woodrow Wilson and Franklin D. Roosevelt. Both men exercised extensive emergency powers with regard to world hostilities, and Roosevelt also used emergency authority to deal with the Great Depression. Their emergency actions, however, were largely supported by statutory delegations and a high degree of approval on the part of both Congress and the public.

Furthermore, during the Wilson and Roosevelt presidencies, a major procedural development occurred in the exercise of emergency powers -- use of a proclamation to declare a national emergency and, thereby, to activate all stand-by statutory provisions delegating authority to the President during a national emergency. The first such national emergency proclamation was issued by President Wilson on February 5, 1917./26 Promulgated on the authority of a statute establishing the United States Shipping Board, the proclamation concerned water transportation policy./27 It Was statutorily terminated along with a variety of other wartime measures on March 3, 1921./28

President Franklin D. Roosevelt issued the next national emergency proclamation some 48 hours after assuming office./29 Proclaimed March 6, 1933, on the somewhat questionable authority of the Trading With the Enemy Act of 1917,/30 the proclamation declared a so-called "bank holiday" and halted a major class of financial transactions by closing the banks. Congress subsequently gave specific statutory support for the Chief Executive's action with the passage of the Emergency Banking Act on March 9./31 Upon signing this legislation into law, the President issued a second banking proclamation, based upon the authority of the new law, continuing the bank holiday until it was determined that banking institutions were capable of conducting business in accordance with new banking policy./32

Next, on September 8, 1939, President Roosevelt promulgated a proclamation of "limited" national emergency, though the qualifying term had no meaningful legal significance./33 Almost two years later, on May 27, 1941, he issued a proclamation of "unlimited" national emergency./34 This action, however, actually did not make any important new powers available to the Chief Executive in addition to those activated by the 1939 proclamation. The President's purpose in making the second proclamation was largely to apprise the American people of the worsening conflict in Europe and growing tensions in Asia.

These two war-related proclamations of a general condition of national emergency remained operative until 1947 when certain of the provisions of law they had activated were statutorily rescinded./35 Then, in 1951, Congress terminated the declaration of war against Germany./36 In the spring of the following year, the Senate ratified the treaty of peace with Japan. Because these actions marked the end of World War II for the United States, legislation was required to keep certain emergency provisions in effect. Initially, the Emergency Powers Interim Continuation Act temporarily maintained this emergency authority./37 It was subsequently supplanted by the Emergency Powers Continuation Act, which kept selected emergency delegations in force until August of 1953./38 By proclamation in April of 1952, President Harry S. Truman terminated the 1939 and 1941 national emergency declarations, leaving operative only those emergency authorities continued by statutory specification./39

Truman's 1952 termination, however, specifically exempted a December, 1950, proclamation of national emergency he had issued in response to hostilities in Korea./40 Furthermore, this condition of national emergency would remain in force and unimpaired well into the era of the Vietnam war.

Two other proclamations of national emergency also would be promulgated before Congress once again turned its attention to these matters. Faced with a postal strike, President Richard M. Nixon declared a national emergency in March of 1970,/41 thereby permitting him to use units of the military Ready Reserve to assist in moving the mail./42 A second national emergency was proclaimed by Nixon in August, 1971, to control the balance of payments flow by terminating temporarily certain trade agreement provisos and imposing supplemental duties on some imported goods./43

CONGRESSIONAL CONCERNS

In the years following the conclusion of U.S. armed forces involvement in active military conflict in Korea, occasional expressions of concern were heard in Congress regarding the continued existence of Truman's 1950 national emergency proclamation long after the conditions prompting its issuance had disappeared. There was some annoyance that the President was retaining extraordinary powers intended only for time of genuine emergency, and a feeling that the Chief Executive was thwarting the legislative intent of Congress by continuously failing to terminate the declared national emergency./44

Growing public and congressional displeasure with the President's exercise of his war powers and deepening U.S. involvement in hostilities in Vietnam prompted interest in a variety of related matters. For Senator Charles McC. Mathias, a leader in this policy area, interest in the question of emergency powers developed out of U.S. involvement in Vietnam and the incursion into Cambodia. "It became clear," he said, "that the President had powers to commit us to warfare without adequate respect for the constitutional requirement that Congress alone can declare a state of war. In response, among other actions, Mathias, together with Senator Frank Church, sought to establish a Senate special committee to study and investigate the termination of a 1950 proclamation of national emergency that was being used to prosecute the Vietnam war, "to consider problems which might arise as the result of the termination and to consider what administrative or legislative actions might be necessary." Such a panel was initially chartered by S. Res. 304 as the Special Committee on the Termination of the National Emergency in June of 1972, but did not begin operations before the end of the year./45

With the convening of the 93rd Congress in 1973, the Special Committee was approved again with S. Res. 9. Upon exploring the subject matter of national emergency powers, however, the mission of the Special Committee became more burdensome. There was not just one proclamation of national emergency in effect, but four such instruments, issued in 1933, 1950, 1970, and 1971. The United States was in a condition of national emergency four times over, and with each proclamation, the whole collection of statutorily delegated emergency powers was activated. Consequently, in 1974, with S. Res. 242, the study panel was rechartered as the Special Committee on National Emergencies and Delegated Emergency Powers to reflect its focus upon matters larger than the 1950 emergency proclamation. It's final mandate was provided by S. Res. 10 in the 94th Congress, although its termination date was necessarily extended briefly in 1976 by S. Res. 370. Senator Church and Senator Mathias co-chaired the panel./46

The Special Committee conducted and produced various studies during its existence./47 After scrutinizing the United States Code and uncodified statutory emergency powers, the panel identified 470 provisions of Federal law which delegated extraordinary authority to the Executive in time of national emergency./48 Not all of them required a declaration of national emergency to be operative, but they were, nevertheless, extraordinary grants. The Special Committee also found that no process existed for automatically terminating the four outstanding national emergency proclamations. Thus, the panel began developing legislation containing a formula for regulating emergency declarations in the future and otherwise adjusting the body of statutorily delegated emergency powers by abolishing some provisions, relegating others to permanent status, and continuing others in a stand-by capacity. In addition, the panel also began preparing a report offering its findings and recommendations regarding the state of national emergency powers in the Nation.

THE NATIONAL EMERGENCIES ACT

The Special Committee, in July of 1974, unanimously recommended legislation establishing a procedure for the Presidential declaration and congressional regulation of a national emergency. The proposal also modified various statutorily delegated emergency powers./49 In arriving at this reform measure, the panel consulted with various executive branch agencies regarding the significance of existing emergency statutes, recommendations for legislative action, and views as to the repeal of some provisions of emergency law./50

This recommended legislation was introduced by Senator Frank Church for himself and others on August 22, 1974, and became S. 3957. It was reported from the Senate Committee on Government Operations on September 30 without public hearings or amendment./51 The bill was subsequently discussed on the Senate floor on October 7, when it was amended and passed./52

Although a version of the reform legislation had been introduced in the House on September 16, becoming H.R. 16668, the Committee on the Judiciary, to which the measure was referred, did not have an opportunity to consider either that bill or the Senate adopted version due to the press of other business--chiefly the impeachment of President Nixon and the nomination of Nelson A. Rockefeller to be Vice President of the United States. Thus, the National Emergencies Act failed to be considered on the House floor before the final adjournment of the 93rd Congress.

With the convening of the next Congress, the proposal was introduced in the House on February 27, 1975, becoming H.R. 3884, and in the Senate on March 6, becoming S. 977. House hearings occurred in March and April before the Subcommittee on Administrative Law and Governmental Relations of the Committee on the Judiciary./53 The bill was subsequently marked-up and, on April 15, was reported in amended form to the full committee on a 4-0 vote. On May 21, the

Committee on the Judiciary, on a voice vote, reported the bill with technical amendments./54 During the course of House debate on September 4, there was agreement to both the committee amendments and a floor amendment providing that national emergencies end automatically one year after their declaration unless the President informs Congress and the public of a continuation. The bill was then passed on a 388-5 yea and nay vote and sent to the Senate, where it was referred to the Committee on Government Operations./55

The Senate Committee on Government Operations held a hearing on H.R. 3884 on February 25, 1976,/56 The bill was subsequently reported on August 26 with one substantive and several technical amendments./57 The following day, the amended bill was passed and returned to the House./58 On August 31, the House agreed to the Senate amendments,/59 clearing the proposal for President Gerald Ford's signature on September.l4./60

As enacted, the National Emergencies Act consists of five titles. The first of these generally returned all stand-by statutory delegations of emergency power activated by an outstanding declaration of national emergency to a dormant state two years after the statute's approval. However, the Act did not cancel the 1933, 1950, 1970, and 1971 national emergency proclamations because these were issued by the President pursuant to his Article II constitutional authority. Nevertheless, it did render them ineffective by returning to dormancy the statutory authorities they had activated, thereby necessitating a new declaration to activate stand-by statutory emergency authorities.

Title II provides a procedure for future declarations of national emergency by the President and prescribes arrangements for their congressional regulation. The statute establishes an exclusive means for declaring a national emergency. Furthermore, emergency declarations shall automatically terminate after one year unless formally continued for another year by the President, but may be terminated earlier by either the President or Congress, Originally, the prescribed method for congressional termination of a declared national emergency originally was a concurrent resolution adopted by both Houses of Congress. This type of so-called "legislative veto" was effectively invalidated by the Supreme Court in 1983./61 The National Emergencies Act was amended in 1985 to substitute a joint resolution as the vehicle for rescinding a national emergency declaration./62

When declaring a national emergency, the President must indicate, according to Title III, the powers and authorities being activated to respond to the exigency at hand.

Certain Presidential accountability and reporting requirements regarding national emergency declarations are specified in Title IV, and the repeal and continuation of various statutory provisions delegating emergency powers is accomplished in Title V.

Since the 1976 enactment of the National Emergencies Act, the following national emergencies have been declared pursuant to its provisions. With the exception of the 1983 and 1984 actions continuing export control regulations, all of these emergency declarations are operative.

(2) Affirmative evidence

The presumption described in paragraph (1) may be rebutted only on production of affirmative evidence that the State or local government did not maintain documentation described in that paragraph.

(3) Inability to produce documentation

The inability of the Federal, State, or local government to produce source documentation supporting expenditure reports later than 3 years after the date of transmission of the final expenditure report shall not constitute evidence to rebut the presumption described in paragraph (1).

(4) Right of access

The period during which the Federal, State, or local government has the right to access source documentation shall not be limited to the required 3-year retention period referred to in paragraph (3), but shall last as long as the records are maintained.

(c) Binding nature of grant requirements

A State or local government shall not be liable for reimbursement or any other penalty for any payment made under this chapter if—

(1) the payment was authorized by an approved agreement specifying the costs;

(2) the costs were reasonable; and

(3) the purpose of the grant was accomplished.

(a) Compliance with Buy American Act

No funds authorized to be appropriated under this Act or any amendment made by this Act may be expended by an entity unless the entity, in expending the funds, complies with the Buy American Act (41 U.S.C. 10a et seq.).

(b) Debarment of persons convicted of fraudulent use of "made in america" labels

(1) In general

If the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency determines that a person has been convicted of intentionally affixing a label bearing a "Made in America" inscription to any product sold in or shipped to the United States that is not made in America, the Director shall determine, not later than 90 days after determining that the person has been so convicted, whether the person should be debarred from contracting under the Robert T. Stafford Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Act (42 U.S.C. 5121 et seq.).

(2) Definition of debar

In this subsection, the term "debar" has the meaning given the term in section 2393(c) of Title 10.

§ 5172. Repair, restoration, and replacement of damaged facilities

(a) Contributions

(1) In general

The President may make contributions—

(A) to a State or local government for the repair, restoration, reconstruction, or replacement of a public facility damaged or destroyed by a major disaster and for associated expenses incurred by the government; and

(B) subject to paragraph (3), to a person that owns or operates a private nonprofit facility damaged or destroyed by a major disaster for the repair, restoration, reconstruction, or replacement of the facility and for associated expenses incurred by the person.

(2) Associated expenses

For the purposes of this section, associated expenses shall include—

(A) the costs of mobilizing and employing the National Guard for performance of eligible work;

(B) the costs of using prison labor to perform eligible work, including wages actually paid, transportation to a worksite, and extraordinary costs of guards, food, and lodging; and

(C) base and overtime wages for the employees and extra hires of a State, local government, or person described in paragraph (1) that perform eligible work, plus fringe benefits on such wages to the extent that such benefits were being paid before the major disaster.

(3) Conditions for assistance to private nonprofit facilities

(A) In general

The President may make contributions to a private nonprofit facility under paragraph (1)(B) only if—

(i) the facility provides critical services (as defined by the President) in the event of a major disaster; or

(ii) the owner or operator of the facility—

(I) has applied for a disaster loan under section 636(b) of Title 15; and

(II)(aa) has been determined to be ineligible for such a loan; or

(bb) has obtained such a loan in the maximum amount for which the Small Business Administration determines the facility is eligible.

(B) Definition of critical services

In this paragraph, the term "critical services" includes power, water (including water provided by an irrigation organization or facility), sewer, wastewater treatment, communications, and emergency medical care.

(4) Notification to Congress

Before making any contribution under this section in an amount greater than $20,000,000, the President shall notify—

(A) the Committee on Environment and Public Works of the Senate;

(B) the Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure of the House of Representatives;

(C) the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate; and

(D) the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives.

(b) Federal share

(1) Minimum Federal share

Except as provided in paragraph (2), the Federal share of assistance under this section shall be not less than 75 percent of the eligible cost of repair, restoration, reconstruction, or replacement carried out under this section.

(2) Reduced Federal share

The President shall promulgate regulations to reduce the Federal share of assistance under this section to not less than 25 percent in the case of the repair, restoration, reconstruction, or replacement of any eligible public facility or private nonprofit facility following an event associated with a major disaster—

(A) that has been damaged, on more than one occasion within the preceding 10–year period, by the same type of event; and

(B) the owner of which has failed to implement appropriate mitigation measures to address the hazard that caused the damage to the facility.

(c) Large in-lieu contributions

(1) For public facilities

(A) In general

In any case in which a State or local government determines that the public welfare would not best be served by repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing any public facility owned or controlled by the State or local government, the State or local government may elect to receive, in lieu of a contribution under subsection (a)(1)(A), a contribution in an amount equal to 75 percent of the Federal share of the Federal estimate of the cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing the facility and of management expenses.

(B) Areas with unstable soil

In any case in which a State or local government determines that the public welfare would not best be served by repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing any public facility owned or controlled by the State or local government because soil instability in the disaster area makes repair, restoration, reconstruction, or replacement infeasible, the State or local government may elect to receive, in lieu of a contribution under subsection (a)(1)(A), a contribution in an amount equal to 90 percent of the Federal share of the Federal estimate of the cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing the facility and of management expenses.

(C) Use of funds

Funds contributed to a State or local government under this paragraph may be used—

(i) to repair, restore, or expand other selected public facilities;

(ii) to construct new facilities; or

(iii) to fund hazard mitigation measures that the State or local government determines to be necessary to meet a need for governmental services and functions in the area affected by the major disaster.

(D) Limitations

Funds made available to a State or local government under this paragraph may not be used for—

(i) any public facility located in a regulatory floodway (as defined in section 59.1 of title 44, Code of Federal Regulations (or a successor regulation)); or

(ii) any uninsured public facility located in a special flood hazard area identified by the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency under the National Flood Insurance Act of 1968 (42 U.S.C. 4001 et seq.).

(2) For private nonprofit facilities

(A) In general

In any case in which a person that owns or operates a private nonprofit facility determines that the public welfare would not best be served by repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing the facility, the person may elect to receive, in lieu of a contribution under subsection (a)(1)(B), a contribution in an amount equal to 75 percent of the Federal share of the Federal estimate of the cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing the facility and of management expenses.

(B) Use of funds

Funds contributed to a person under this paragraph may be used—

(i) to repair, restore, or expand other selected private nonprofit facilities owned or operated by the person;

(ii) to construct new private nonprofit facilities to be owned or operated by the person; or

(iii) to fund hazard mitigation measures that the person determines to be necessary to meet a need for the person's services and functions in the area affected by the major disaster.

(C) Limitations

Funds made available to a person under this paragraph may not be used for—

(i) any private nonprofit facility located in a regulatory floodway (as defined in section 59.1 of title 44, Code of Federal Regulations (or a successor regulation)); or

(ii) any uninsured private nonprofit facility located in a special flood hazard area identified by the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency under the National Flood Insurance Act of 1968 (42 U.S.C. 4001 et seq.).

[See main volume for text of (d)]

(e) Eligible cost

(1) Determination

(A) In general

For the purposes of this section, the President shall estimate the eligible cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing a public facility or private nonprofit facility—

(i) on the basis of the design of the facility as the facility existed immediately before the major disaster; and

(ii) in conformity with codes, specifications, and standards (including floodplain management and hazard mitigation criteria required by the President or under the Coastal Barrier Resources Act (16 U.S.C. 3501 et seq.)) applicable at the time at which the disaster occurred.

(B) Cost estimation procedures

(i) In general

Subject to paragraph (2), the President shall use the cost estimation procedures established under paragraph (3) to determine the eligible cost under this subsection.

(ii) Applicability

The procedures specified in this paragraph and paragraph (2) shall apply only to projects the eligible cost of which is equal to or greater than the amount specified in section 5189 of this title.

(2) Modification of eligible cost

(A) Actual cost greater than ceiling percentage of estimated cost

In any case in which the actual cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing a facility under this section is greater than the ceiling percentage established under paragraph (3) of the cost estimated under paragraph (1), the President may determine that the eligible cost includes a portion of the actual cost of the repair, restoration, reconstruction, or replacement that exceeds the cost estimated under paragraph (1).

(B) Actual cost less than estimated cost

(i) Greater than or equal to floor percentage of estimated cost

In any case in which the actual cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing a facility under this section is less than 100 percent of the cost estimated under paragraph (1), but is greater than or equal to the floor percentage established under paragraph (3) of the cost estimated under paragraph (1), the State or local government or person receiving funds under this section shall use the excess funds to carry out cost-effective activities that reduce the risk of future damage, hardship, or suffering from a major disaster.

(ii) Less than floor percentage of estimated cost

In any case in which the actual cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing a facility under this section is less than the floor percentage established under paragraph (3) of the cost estimated under paragraph (1), the State or local government or person receiving assistance under this section shall reimburse the President in the amount of the difference.

(C) No effect on appeals process

Nothing in this paragraph affects any right of appeal under section 5189a of this title.

(3) Expert panel

(A) Establishment

Not later than 18 months after October 30, 2000, the President, acting through the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, shall establish an expert panel, which shall include representatives from the construction industry and State and local government.

(B) Duties

The expert panel shall develop recommendations concerning—

(i) procedures for estimating the cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing a facility consistent with industry practices; and

(ii) the ceiling and floor percentages referred to in paragraph (2).

(C) Regulations

Taking into account the recommendations of the expert panel under subparagraph (B), the President shall promulgate regulations that establish—

(i) cost estimation procedures described in subparagraph (B)(i); and

(ii) the ceiling and floor percentages referred to in paragraph (2).

(D) Review by President

Not later than 2 years after the date of promulgation of regulations under subparagraph (C) and periodically thereafter, the President shall review the cost estimation procedures and the ceiling and floor percentages established under this paragraph.

(E) Report to Congress

Not later than 1 year after the date of promulgation of regulations under subparagraph (C), 3 years after that date, and at the end of each 2-year period thereafter, the expert panel shall submit to Congress a report on the appropriateness of the cost estimation procedures.

(4) Special rule

In any case in which the facility being repaired, restored, reconstructed, or replaced under this section was under construction on the date of the major disaster, the cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing the facility shall include, for the purposes of this section, only those costs that, under the contract for the construction, are the owner's responsibility and not the contractor's responsibility.

(f) Repealed. Pub.L. 106–390, Title II, § 205(e), Oct. 30, 2000, 114 Stat. 1566

Subsec. (b). Pub.L. 106–390, § 205(b), rewrote subsec. (b), which formerly read:

"(b) Minimum Federal share

"The Federal share of assistance under this section shall be not less than—

"(1) 75 percent of the net eligible cost of repair, restoration, reconstruction, or replacement carried out under this section;

"(2) 100 percent of associated expenses described in subsections (f)(1) and (f)(2) of this section; and

"(3) 75 percent of associated expenses described in subsections (f)(3), (f)(4), and (f)(5) of this section."

Subsec. (c). Pub.L. 106–390, § 205(c), rewrote subsec. (c), which formerly read:

"(c) Large in lieu contributions

"(1) For public facilities

"In any case where a State or local government determines that the public welfare would not be best served by repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing any public facility owned or controlled by such State or local government, it may elect to receive, in lieu of a contribution under subsection (a)(1) of this section, a contribution of not to exceed 90 percent of the Federal share of the Federal estimate of the cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing such facility and of associated expenses. Funds contributed under this subsection may be used to repair, restore, or expand other selected public facilities, to construct new facilities, or to fund hazard mitigation measures which the State or local government determines to be necessary to meet a need for governmental services and functions in the area affected by the major disaster.

"(2) For private nonprofit facilities

"In any case where a person who owns or operates a private nonprofit facility determines that the public welfare would not be best served by repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing such facility, such person may elect to receive, in lieu of a contribution under subsection (a)(2) of this section, a contribution of not to exceed 90 percent of the Federal share of the Federal estimate of the cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing such facility and of associated expenses. Funds contributed under this subsection may be used to repair, restore, or expand other selected private nonprofit facilities owned or operated by such person, to construct new private nonprofit facilities to be owned or operated by such person, or to fund hazard mitigation measures which such person determines to be necessary to meet a need for its services and functions in the area

"(3) Restriction on use for State or local contribution

"Funds provided under this subsection shall not be used for any State or local government cost-sharing contribution required under this chapter."

Subsec. (e). Pub.L. 106–390, § 205(d)(1), rewrote subsec. (e), which formerly read:

"(e) Net eligible cost

"(1) General rule

"For purposes of this section, the cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing a public facility or private nonprofit facility on the basis of the design of such facility as it existed immediately prior to the major disaster and in conformity with current applicable codes, specifications, and standards (including floodplain management and hazard mitigation criteria required by the President or by the Coastal Barrier Resources Act (16 U.S.C. 3501 et seq.)) shall, at a minimum, be treated as the net eligible cost of such repair, restoration, reconstruction, or replacement.

"(2) Special rule

"In any case in which the facility being repaired, restored, reconstructed, or replaced under this section was under construction on the date of the major disaster, the cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing such facility shall include, for purposes of this section, only those costs which, under the contract for such construction, are the owner's responsibility and not the contractor's responsibility."

Subsec. (f). Pub.L. 106–390, § 205(e), repealed subsec. (f), which formerly read:

"(f) Associated expenses

"For purposes of this section, associated expenses include the following:

"(1) Necessary costs

"Necessary costs of requesting, obtaining, and administering Federal assistance based on a percentage of assistance provided as follows:

"(A) For an applicant whose net eligible costs equal less than $100,000, 3 percent of such net eligible costs.

"(B) For an applicant whose net eligible costs equal $100,000 or more but less than $1,000,000, $3,000 plus 2 percent of such net eligible costs in excess of $100,000.

"(C) For an applicant whose net eligible costs equal $1,000,000 or more but less than $5,000,000, $21,000 plus 1 percent of such net eligible costs in excess of $1,000,000.

"(D) For an applicant whose net eligible costs equal $5,000,000 or more, $61,000 plus ½ percent of such net eligible costs in excess of $5,000,000.

"(2) Extraordinary costs

"Extraordinary costs incurred by a State for preparation of damage survey reports, final inspection reports, project applications, final audits, and related field inspections by State employees, including overtime pay and per diem and travel expenses of such employees, but not including pay for regular time of such employees, based on the total amount of 5170c, 5172, 5173, 5192, and 5193 of this title in such State in connection with the major disaster as follows:

"(A) If such total amount is less than $100,000, 3 percent of such total amount.

"(B) If such total amount is $100,000 or more but less than $1,000,000, $3,000 plus 2 percent of such total amount in excess of $100,000.

"(C) If such total amount is $1,000,000 or more but less than $5,000,000, $21,000 plus 1 percent of such total amount in excess of $1,000,000.

"(D) If such total amount is $5,000,000 or more, $61,000 plus ½ percent of such total amount in excess of $5,000,000.

"(3) Costs of National Guard

"The costs of mobilizing and employing the National Guard for performance of eligible work.

"(4) Costs of prison labor

"The costs of using prison labor to perform eligible work, including wages actually paid, transportation to a worksite, and extraordinary costs of guards, food, and lodging.

"(5) Other labor costs

"Base and overtime wages for an applicant's employees and extra hires performing eligible work plus fringe benefits on such wages to the extent that such benefits were being paid before the disaster.".

§ 5174. Temporary housing assistance

Amendment of Section

Pub.L. 106–390, Title II, § 206(a), (d), Oct. 30, 2000, 114 Stat. 1566, provided that, effective 18 months after October 30, 2000, this section is amended to read as follows:

§ 5174. Federal assistance to individuals and households

(a) In general

(1) Provision of assistance

In accordance with this section, the President, in consultation with the Governor of a State, may provide financial assistance, and, if necessary, direct services, to individuals and households in the State who, as a direct result of a major disaster, have necessary expenses and serious needs in cases in which the individuals and households are unable to meet such expenses or needs through other means.

(2) Relationship to other assistance

Under paragraph (1), an individual or household shall not be denied assistance under paragraph (1), (3), or (4) of subsection (c) solely on the basis that the individual or household has not applied for or received any loan or other financial assistance from the Small Business Administration or any other Federal agency.

(b) Housing assistance

(1) Eligibility

The President may provide financial or other assistance under this section to individuals and households to respond to the disaster-related housing needs of individuals and households who are displaced from their predisaster primary residences or whose predisaster primary residences are rendered uninhabitable as a result of damage caused by a major disaster.

(2) Determination of appropriate types of assistance

(A) In general

The President shall determine appropriate types of housing assistance to be provided under this section to individuals and households described in subsection (a)(1) based on considerations of cost effectiveness, convenience to the individuals and households, and such other factors as the President may consider appropriate.

(B) Multiple types of assistance

One or more types of housing assistance may be made available under this section, based on the suitability and availability of the types of assistance, to meet the needs of individuals and households in the particular disaster situation.

(c) Types of housing assistance

(1) Temporary housing

(A) Financial assistance

(i) In general

The President may provide financial assistance to individuals or households to rent alternate housing accommodations, existing rental units, manufactured housing, recreational vehicles, or other readily fabricated dwellings.

(ii) Amount

The amount of assistance under clause (i) shall be based on the fair market rent for the accommodation provided plus the cost of any transportation, utility hookups, or unit installation not provided directly by the President.

(B) Direct assistance

(i) In general

The President may provide temporary housing units, acquired by purchase or lease, directly to individuals or households who, because of a lack of available housing resources, would be unable to make use of the assistance provided under subparagraph (A).

(ii) Period of assistance

The President may not provide direct assistance under clause (i) with respect to a major disaster after the end of the 18–month period beginning on the date of the declaration of the major disaster by the President, except that the President may extend that period if the President determines that due to extraordinary circumstances an extension would be in the public interest.

(iii) Collection of rental charges

After the end of the 18–month period referred to in clause (ii), the President may charge fair market rent for each temporary housing unit provided.

(2) Repairs

(A) In general

The President may provide financial assistance for—

(i) the repair of owner-occupied private residences, utilities, and residential infrastructure (such as a private access route) damaged by a major disaster to a safe and sanitary living or functioning condition; and

(ii) eligible hazard mitigation measures that reduce the likelihood of

REV_00255584

(B) Relationship to other assistance

A recipient of assistance provided under this paragraph shall not be required to show that the assistance can be met through other means, except insurance proceeds.

(C) Maximum amount of assistance

The amount of assistance provided to a household under this paragraph shall not exceed $5,000, as adjusted annually to reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers published by the Department of Labor.

(3) Replacement

(A) In general

The President may provide financial assistance for the replacement of owner-occupied private residences damaged by a major disaster.

(B) Maximum amount of assistance

The amount of assistance provided to a household under this paragraph shall not exceed $10,000, as adjusted annually to reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers published by the Department of Labor.

(C) Applicability of flood insurance requirement

With respect to assistance provided under this paragraph, the President may not waive any provision of Federal law requiring the purchase of flood insurance as a condition of the receipt of Federal disaster assistance.

(4) Permanent housing construction

The President may provide financial assistance or direct assistance to individuals or households to construct permanent housing in insular areas outside the continental United States and in other remote locations in cases in which—

(A) no alternative housing resources are available; and

(B) the types of temporary housing assistance described in paragraph (1) are unavailable, infeasible, or not cost-effective.

(d) Terms and conditions relating to housing assistance

(1) Sites

(A) In general

Any readily fabricated dwelling provided under this section shall, whenever practicable, be located on a site that—

(i) is complete with utilities; and

(ii) is provided by the State or local government, by the owner of the site, or by the occupant who was displaced by the major disaster.

(B) Sites provided by the President

A readily fabricated dwelling may be located on a site provided by the President if the President determines that such a site would be more economical or accessible.

(2) Disposal of units

(A) Sale to occupants

(i) In general

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a temporary housing unit purchased under this section by the President for the purpose of housing disaster victims may be sold directly to the individual or household who is occupying the unit if the individual or household lacks permanent housing.

(ii) Sale price

A sale of a temporary housing unit under clause (i) shall be at a price that is fair and equitable.

(iii) Deposit of proceeds

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the proceeds of a sale under clause (i) shall be deposited in the appropriate Disaster Relief Fund account.

(iv) Hazard and flood insurance

A sale of a temporary housing unit under clause (i) shall be made on the condition that the individual or household purchasing the housing unit agrees to obtain and maintain hazard and flood insurance on the housing unit.

(v) Use of GSA services

The President may use the services of the General Services Administration to accomplish a sale under clause (i).

(B) Other methods of disposal

If not disposed of under subparagraph (A), a temporary housing unit purchased under this section by the President for the purpose of housing disaster victims—

(i) may be sold to any person; or

(ii) may be sold, transferred, donated, or otherwise made available directly to a State or other governmental entity or to a voluntary organization for the sole purpose of providing temporary housing to disaster victims in major disasters and emergencies if, as a condition of the sale, transfer, or donation, the State, other governmental agency, or voluntary organization agrees—

(I) to comply with the nondiscrimination provisions of section 5151 of this title; and

(II) to obtain and maintain hazard and flood insurance on the housing unit.

(e) Financial assistance to address other needs

(1) Medical, dental, and funeral expenses

The President, in consultation with the Governor of a State, may provide financial assistance under this section to an individual or household in the State who is adversely affected by a major disaster to meet disaster-related medical, dental, and funeral expenses.

(2) Personal property, transportation, and other expenses

The President, in consultation with the Governor of a State, may provide financial assistance under this section to an individual or household described in paragraph (1) to address personal property, transportation, and other necessary expenses or serious needs resulting from the major disaster.

(f) State role

(1) Financial assistance to address other needs

(A) Grant to State

Subject to subsection (g), a Governor may request a grant from the President to provide financial assistance to individuals and households in the State under subsection (e).

(B) Administrative costs

A State that receives a grant under subparagraph (A) may expend not more than 5 percent of the amount of the grant for the administrative costs of providing financial assistance to individuals and households in the State under subsection (e).

(2) Access to records

In providing assistance to individuals and households under this section, the President shall provide for the substantial and ongoing involvement of the States in which the individuals and households are located, including by providing to the States access to the electronic records of individuals and make available any additional State and local assistance to the individuals and households.

(g) Cost sharing

(1) Federal share

Except as provided in paragraph (2), the Federal share of the costs eligible to be paid using assistance provided under this section shall be 100 percent.

(2) Financial assistance to address other needs

In the case of financial assistance provided under subsection (e)—

(A) the Federal share shall be 75 percent; and

(B) the non-Federal share shall be paid from funds made available by the State.

(h) Maximum amount of assistance

(1) In general

No individual or household shall receive financial assistance greater than $25,000 under this section with respect to a single major disaster.

(2) Adjustment of limit

The limit established under paragraph (1) shall be adjusted annually to reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers published by the Department of Labor.

(i) Rules and regulations

The President shall prescribe rules and regulations to carry out this section, including criteria, standards, and procedures for determining eligibility for assistance.

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Revision Notes and Legislative Reports

2000 Acts. House Report No. 106–40, see 2000 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 1456.

Amendments

2000 Amendments. Pub.L. 106–390, § 206(a), rewrote this section, which formerly read:

"§ 5174. Temporary housing assistance

"(a) Provision of temporary housing

"(1) In general

"The President may—

"(A) provide, by purchase or lease, temporary housing (including unoccupied habitable dwellings), suitable rental housing, mobile homes, or other readily fabricated dwellings to persons who, as a result of a major disaster, require temporary housing; and

"(B) reimburse State and local governments in accordance with paragraph (4) for the cost of sites provided under paragraph (2).

"(2) Mobile home site

"(A) In general

"Any mobile home or other readily fabricated dwelling provided under this section shall whenever possible be located on a site which—

"(i) is provided by the State or local government; and

"(ii) has utilities provided by the State or local government, by the owner of the site, or by the occupant who was displaced by the major disaster.

"(B) Other sites

"Mobile homes and other readily fabricated dwellings may be located on sites provided by the President if the President determines that such sites would be more economical or accessible than sites described in subparagraph (A).

"(3) Period

"Federal financial and operational assistance under this section shall continue for not longer than 18 months after the date of the major disaster declaration by the President, unless the President determines that due to extraordinary circumstances it would be in the public interest to extend such 18–month period.

"(4) Federal share

"The Federal share of assistance under this section shall be 100 percent; except that the Federal share of assistance under this section for construction and site development costs (including installation of utilities) at a mobile home group site shall be 75 percent of the eligible cost of such assistance. The State or local government receiving assistance under this section shall pay any cost which is not paid for from the Federal share.

"(b) Temporary mortgage and rental payments

"The President is authorized to provide assistance on a temporary basis in the form of mortgage or rental payments to or on behalf of individuals and families who, as a result of financial hardship caused by a major disaster, have received written notice of dispossession or eviction from a residence by reason of a foreclosure of any mortgage or lien, cancellation of any contract of sale, or termination of any lease entered into prior to such disaster. Such assistance shall be provided for the duration of the period of financial hardship but not to exceed 18 months.

"(c) In lieu expenditures

"In lieu of providing other types of temporary housing after a major disaster, the President is authorized to make expenditures for the purpose of repairing or restoring to a habitable condition owner-occupied private residential structures made uninhabitable by a major disaster which are capable of being restored quickly to a habitable condition.

"(d) Transfer of temporary housing

"(1) Direct sale to occupants

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any temporary housing acquired by purchase may be sold directly to individuals and families who are occupants of temporary housing at prices that are fair and equitable, as determined by the President.

"(2) Transfers to States, local governments, and voluntary organizations

"The President may sell or otherwise make available temporary housing units directly to States, other governmental entities, and voluntary organizations. The President shall impose as a condition of transfer under this paragraph a covenant to comply with the provisions of section 5151 of this title requiring nondiscrimination in occupancy of such temporary housing units. Such disposition shall be limited to units purchased under the provisions of subsection (a) of this section and to the purposes of providing temporary housing for disaster victims in major disasters or emergencies.

"(e) Notification

"(1) In general

"Each person who applies for assistance under this section shall be notified regarding the type and amount of any assistance for which such person qualifies. Whenever practicable, such notice shall be provided within 7 days after the date of submission of such application.

"(2) Information

"Notification under this subsection shall provide information regarding—

"(A) all forms of such assistance available;

"(B) any specific criteria which must be met to qualify for each type of assistance that is available;

"(C) any limitations which apply to each type of assistance; and

"(D) the address and telephone number of offices responsible for responding to—

"(i) appeals of determinations of eligibility for assistance; and

"(ii) requests for changes in the type or amount of assistance provided.

"(f) Location

"In providing assistance under this section, consideration shall be given to the location of and travel time to—

"(1) the applicant's home and place of business;

"(2) schools which the applicant or members of the applicant's family who reside with the applicant attend; and

"(3) crops or livestock which the applicant tends in the course of any involvement in farming which provides 25 percent or more of the applicant's annual income.".

"Sec. 301. It is recognized that natural and manmade hazards may not be independent of one another in any given disaster, and it is also recognized that emergency personnel are often called upon to meet emergencies outside of their primary field of service. Furthermore, planning for and responding to different hazards have certain common elements. To make maximum use of these commonalities, the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (hereinafter referred to as the 'Director') is authorized and directed to:

"(1) initiate, within one year after the date of enactment of this Act [Oct. 19, 1980], studies with the objective of defining and developing a multihazard research, planning, and implementation process within the Agency;

"(2) develop, within one year after the date of enactment of this Act [Oct. 19, 1980], in cooperation with State and local governments, prototypical multihazard mitigation projects which can be used to evaluate several approaches to the varying hazard mitigation needs of State and local governments and to assess the applicability of these prototypes to other jurisdictions with similar needs;

"(3) investigate and evaluate, within one year after the date of enactment of this Act [Oct. 19, 1980], the effectiveness of a range of incentives for hazard reductions that can be applied at the State and local government levels;

"(4) prepare recommendations as to the need for legislation that will limit the legal liability of those third party persons or groups assistance and advice to public employees, including policemen, firemen, and transportation employees, who are generally the first to respond to a hazardous incident; which recommendations shall be provided to the appropriate committees of Congress within one hundred and eighty days after the date of enactment of this Act [Oct. 19, 1980];

"(5) prepare, within one hundred and eighty days after the date of enactment of this Act [Oct. 19, 1980], a report on the status of the Agency's emergency information and communications systems which will provide recommendations on—

"(A) the advisability of developing a single, unified emergency information and communication system for use by the Agency in carrying out its emergency management activities;

"(B) the potential for using communication and remote sensing satellites as part of the Agency's emergency information and communication system; and

"(C) the type of system to be developed, if needed, including the relationship of the proposed system and its needs to the existing and emerging information and communication systems in other Federal agencies;

"(6) conduct a program of multihazard research, planning, and mitigation in coordination with those studies and evaluations authorized in paragraphs (1) through (5), as well as other hazard research, planning, and mitigation deemed necessary by the Director;

"(7) conduct emergency first response programs so as to better train and prepare emergency personnel to meet emergencies outside of their primary field of service; and

"(8) conduct a program of planning, preparedness, and mitigation related to the multiple direct and indirect hazards resulting from the occurrence of large earthquakes.

"Sec. 302. (a) For the fiscal year ending September 30, 1981, there are authorized to be appropriated to the Director $1,000,000 to carry out paragraphs (1) through (5) of section 301 and such sums as may be necessary to carry out paragraph (6) of such section.

"(b) For the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982, there are authorized to be appropriated to the Director—

"(1) $4,939,000 to carry out section 301, which amount shall include—

"(A) not less than $700,000 to carry out the purposes of paragraphs (1) through (6) of such section;

"(B) such sums as may be necessary, but in any case not less than $939,000, for use by the United States Fire Administration in carrying out paragraph (7) of such section; and

"(C) not less than $3,300,000 to carry out paragraph (8) of such section with respect to those large California earthquakes which were identified by the National Security Council's Ad Hoc Committee on Assessment of Consequences and Preparations for a Major California Earthquake; and

"(2) such further sums as may be necessary for adjustments required by law in salaries, pay, retirement, and employee benefits incurred in the conduct of activities for which funds are authorized by paragraph (1) of this subsection."

"(c) For the fiscal year ending September 30, 1983, there are authorized to be appropriated to the Director—

"(1) $2,774,000 to carry out section 301, which amount shall include—

"(A) not less than $300,000 to carry out the purposes of paragraphs (1) through (6) of such section;

"(B) such sums as may be necessary, but in any case not less than $939,000, for use by the United States Fire Administration in carrying out paragraph (7) of such section; and

"(C) not less than $1,535,000 to carry out paragraph (8) of such section with respect to those large California earthquakes which were identified by the National Security Council's Ad Hoc Committee on Assessment of Consequences and Preparations for a Major California Earthquake and with respect to other high seismic risk areas in the United States; and

"(2) such further sums as may be necessary for adjustments required by law in salaries, pay, retirement, and employee benefits incurred in the conduct of activities for which funds are authorized by paragraph (1) of this subsection."

CIVILIAN MOBILIZATION

Section 1. Transfer of Functions to the President.—

(a) There are hereby transferred to the President of the United States all functions vested by law (including reorganization plan) in the following: The Office of Defense Mobilization, the Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization, the Federal Civil Defense Administration, and the Federal Civil Defense Administrator.

(b) The President may from time to time delegate any of the functions transferred to him by subsection (a) of this section to any officer, agency, or employee of the executive branch of the Government, and may authorize such officer, agency, or employee to redelegate any of such functions delegated to him.

Sec. 2. Office of Emergency Preparedness.

[The Office of Emergency Preparedness including the offices of Director and Deputy Director, and all offices of Assistant Director, were abolished by Reorg. Plan No. 1 of 1973, § 3(a)(1), eff. July 1, 1973, 38 F.R. 9579, 87 Stat. 1089, set out under this section.]

Sec. 3. Regional Directors.

[All offices of Regional Director of the Office of Emergency Preparedness were abolished by Reorg. Plan No. 1 of 1973, § 3(a)(1), eff. July 1, 1973, 38 F.R. 9579, 87 Stat. 1089, set out under this section.]

Sec. 4. Membership on National Security Council.

[The functions of the Director of the Office of Emergency Preparedness as a member of the National Security Council were abolished by Reorg. Plan No. 1 of 1973, § 3(a)(2), eff. July 1, 1973, 38 F.R. 9579, 87 Stat. 1089, set out under this section.]

Sec. 5. Civil Defense Advisory Council.

[The Civil Defense Advisory Council, together with its functions, was abolished by Reorg. Plan No. 1 of 1973, § 3(a)(3), eff. July 1, 1973, 38 F.R. 9579, 87 Stat. 1089, set out under this section.]

Sec. 6. Abolitions.

The offices of Federal Civil Defense Administrator and Deputy Administrator provided for in section 101 of the Federal Civil Defense Act (50 U.S.C.App. 2271) and the offices of the Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization and Deputy Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization provided for in section 1 of Reorganization Plan Numbered 3 of 1953 (67 Stat. 634) are hereby abolished. The Director of the Office of Emergency Preparedness shall make such provisions as may be necessary in order to wind up any outstanding affairs of the offices abolished by this section which are not otherwise provided for in this reorganization plan. [As amended by Pub.L. 90-608, c. IV, § 402, Oct. 21, 1968, 82 Stat. 1194].

Sec. 7. Records, Property, Personnel, and Funds.

(a) The records, property, personnel, and unexpended balances, available or to be made available, of appropriations, allocations, and other funds of the Office of Defense Mobilization and of the Federal Civil Defense Administration shall, upon the taking effect of the provisions of this reorganization plan, become records, property, personnel, and unexpended balances of the Office of Emergency Preparedness.

(b) Records, property, personnel, and unexpended balances, available or to be made available, of appropriations, allocations, and other funds of any agency (including the Office of Emergency Preparedness), relating to functions vested in or delegated or assigned to the office of Defense Mobilization or the Federal Civil Defense Administration immediately prior to the taking effect of the provisions of this reorganization plan, may be transferred from time to time to any other agency of the Government by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget under authority of this subsection for use, subject to the provisions of the Reorganization Act of 1949, as amended, in connection with any of the said functions authorized at time of transfer under this subsection to be performed by the transferee agency.

(c) Such further measures and dispositions as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine to be necessary in connection with the provisions of subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall be carried out in such manner as he shall direct and by such agencies as he shall designate [As amended by Pub.L. 90-608, c. IV, § 402, Oct. 21, 1968, 82 Stat. 1194].

Sec. 8. Interim Provisions.—

The President may authorize any person who immediately prior to the effective date of this reorganization plan holds an office abolished by section 6 hereof to hold any office established by section 2 of this reorganization plan until the latter office is filled pursuant to the said section 2 or by recess appointment, as the case may be, but in no event for any period extending more than 120 days after the said effective date.

Sec. 9. Effective Date.—

The provisions of this reorganization plan shall take effect at the time determined under the provisions of section 6(a) of the Reorganization Act of 1949, as amended, or on July 1, 1958, whichever is later.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1958, prepared in accordance with the Reorganization Act of 1949, as amended. The reorganization plan provides new arrangements for the conduct of Federal defense mobilization and civil defense functions.

In formulating Reorganization Plan No. 1, I have had the benefit of several studies made by the executive branch as well as those conducted by the Congress. The reorganization plan will overcome the major difficulties revealed by those studies and mentioned in my 1959 budget message where I made the following statement:

The structure of Federal organization for the planning, coordination, and conduct of our nonmilitary defense programs has been reviewed, and I have concluded that the existing statutes assigning responsibilities for the central coordination and direction of these programs are out of date. The rapid technical advances of military science have led to a serious overlap among agencies carrying on these leadership and planning functions. Because the situation will continue to change and because these functions transcend the responsibility of any single department or agency, I have concluded that they should be vested in no one short of the President. I will make recommendations to the Congress on this subject.

The principal effects of the organization plan are:

First, it transfers to the President the functions vested by law in the Federal Civil Defense Administration and those so vested in the Office of Defense Mobilization. The result is to establish a single pattern with respect to the vesting of defense mobilization and civil defense functions. At the present time disparity exists in that civil defense functions are vested in the President only to a limited degree while a major part of the functions administered by the Office of Defense Mobilization are vested by law in the President and delegated by him to that Office. Under the plan, the broad program responsibilities for coordinating and conducting the interrelated defense mobilization and civil defense functions will be vested in the President for appropriate delegation as the rapidly changing character of the nonmilitary preparedness program warrants.

Second, the reorganization plan consolidates the Office of Defense Mobilization and the Federal Civil Defense Administration to form a new Office of Defense and Civilian Mobilization [Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization] in the Executive Office of the President. I have concluded that, in many instances, the interests and activities of the Office of Defense Mobilization and the Federal Civil Defense Administration overlap to such a degree that it is not possible to work out a satisfactory division of those activities and interests between the two agencies. I have also concluded that a single civilian mobilization agency of appropriate stature and authority is needed and that such an agency will ensue from the consolidation and from the granting of suitable authority to that agency for directing and coordinating the preparedness activities of the Federal departments and agencies and for providing unified guidance and assistance to the State and local governments.

Third, the reorganization plan transfers the membership of the Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization on the National Security Council to the Director of the Office of Defense and Civilian Mobilization [Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization] and also transfers the Civil Defense Advisory Council to the Office of Defense and Civilian Mobilization [Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization].

Initially, the Office of Defense and Civilian Mobilization [Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization] will perform the civil defense and defense mobilization functions now performed by the Office of Defense Mobilization and the Federal Civil Defense Administration. One of its first tasks will be to advise me with respect to the actions to be taken to clarify and expand the roles of the Federal departments and agencies in carrying out nonmilitary defense preparedness functions. After such actions are taken, the direction and coordination of the civil defense and defense mobilization activities assigned to the departments and agencies will comprise a principal remaining responsibility of the Office of Defense and Civilian Mobilization [Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization].

After investigation, I have found and hereby declare that each reorganization included in Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1958 is necessary to accomplish one or more of the purposes set forth in section 2(a) of the Reorganization Act of 1949, as amended.

I have also found and hereby declare that it is necessary to include in the accompanying reorganization plan, by reason of reorganizations made thereby, provisions for the appointment and compensation of new officers specified in sections 2 and 3 of the plan. The rates of compensation fixed for these officers are, respectively those which I have found to prevail in respect of comparable officers in the executive branch of the Government.

The taking effect of the reorganizations included in Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1958 will immediately reduce the number of Federal agencies by one and, by providing sounder organizational arrangements for the administration of the affected functions, should promote the increased economy and effectiveness of the Federal expenditures concerned. It is, however, impracticable to itemize at this time the reduction of expenditures which it is probable will be brought about by such taking effect.

I urge that the Congress allow the reorganization plan to become effective.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT

To the Congress of the United States:

On January 5 I announced a three-part program to streamline the executive branch of the Federal Government. By concentrating less responsibility in the President's immediate staff and more in the hands of the departments and agencies, this program should significantly improve the services of the Government. I believe these reforms have become so urgently necessary that I intend, with the cooperation of the Congress, to pursue them with all of the resources of my office during the coming year.

The first part of this program is a renewed drive to achieve passage of my legislative proposals to overhaul the Cabinet departments. Secondly, I have appointed three Cabinet Secretaries as Counsellors to the President with coordinating responsibilities in the broad areas of human resources, natural resources, and community development, and five Assistants to the President with special responsibilities in the areas of domestic affairs, economic affairs, foreign affairs, executive management, and operations of the White House.

The third part of this program is a sharp reduction in the overall size of the Executive Office of the President and a reorientation of that office back to its original mission as a staff for top-level policy formation and monitoring of policy execution in broad functional areas. The Executive Office of the President should no longer be encumbered with the task of managing or administering programs which can be run more effectively by the departments and agencies. I have therefore concluded that a number of specialized operational and program functions should be shifted out of the Executive Office into the line departments and agencies of the Government. Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1973, transmitted herewith, would effect such changes with respect to emergency preparedness functions and scientific and technological affairs.

STREAMLINING THE FEDERAL SCIENCE ESTABLISHMENT

When the National Science Foundation was established by an act of the Congress in 1950, its statutory responsibilities included evaluation of the Government's scientific research programs and development of basic science policy. In the late 1950's, however, with the effectiveness of the U.S. science effort under serious scrutiny as a result of Sputnik, the post of Science Adviser to the President was established. The White House became increasingly involved in the evaluation and coordination of research and development programs and in science policy matters, and that involvement was institutionalized in 1962 when a reorganization plan established the Office of Science and Technology within the Executive Office of the President, through transfer of authorities formerly vested in the National Science Foundation.

With advice and assistance from OST during the past decade, the scientific and technological capability of the Government has been markedly strengthened. This administration is firmly committed to a sustained, broadbased national effort in science and technology, as I made plain last year in the first special message on the subject ever sent by a President to the Congress. The research and development capability of the various executive departments and agencies, civilian as well as defense, has been upgraded. The National Science Foundation has broadened from its earlier concentration on basic research support to take on a significant role in applied research as well. It has matured in its ability to play a coordinating and evaluative role within the Government and between the public and private sectors.

I have therefore concluded that it is timely and appropriate to transfer to the Director of the National Science Foundation all functions presently vested in the Office of Science and Technology, and to abolish that office. Reorganization Plan No. 1 would effect these changes.

The multi-disciplinary staff resources of the Foundation will provide analytic capabilities for performance of the transferred functions. In addition, the Director of the Foundation will be able to draw on expertise from all of the Federal agencies, as well as from outside the Government, for assistance in carrying out his new responsibilities.

It is also my intention, after the transfer of responsibilities is effected, to ask Dr. H. Guyford Stever, the current Director of the Foundation, to take on the additional post of Science Adviser. In this capacity, he would advise and assist the White House, Office of Management and Budget, Domestic Council, and other entities within the Executive Office of the President on matters where scientific and technological expertise is called for, and would act as the President's representative in selected cooperative programs in international scientific affairs, including chairing such joint bodies as the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Joint Commission on Scientific and Technical Cooperation.

In the case of national security, the Department of Defense has strong capabilities for assessing weapons needs and for undertaking new weapons development, and the President will continue to draw primarily on this source for advice regarding military technology. The President in special situations also may seek independent studies or assessments concerning military technology from within or outside the Federal establishment using the machinery of the National Security Council for this purpose, as well as the Science Adviser when appropriate.

In one special area of technology—space and aeronautics—a coordinating council has existed within the Executive Office of the President since 1958. This body, the National Aeronautics and Space Council, met a major need during the evolution of our nation's space program. Vice President Agnew has served with distinction as its chairman for the past four years. At my request, beginning in 1969, the Vice President also chaired a special Space Task Group charged with developing strategy alternatives for a balanced U.S. space program in the coming years.

As a result of this work, basic policy issues in the United States space effort have been resolved, and the necessary interagency relationships have been established. I have therefore concluded, with the Vice President's concurrence, that the Council can be discontinued. Needed policy coordination can now be achieved through the resources of the executive departments and agencies, such as the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, augmented by some of the former Council staff. Accordingly, my reorganization plan proposes the abolition of the National Aeronautics and Space Council.

A NEW APPROACH TO EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

The organization within the Executive Office of the President which has been known in recent years as the Office of Emergency Preparedness dates back, through its numerous predecessor agencies, more than 20 years. It has performed valuable functions in developing plans for emergency preparedness, in administering Federal disaster relief, and in overseeing and assisting the agencies in this area.

OEP's work as a coordinating and supervisory authority in this field has in fact been so effective—particularly under the leadership of General George A. Lincoln, its director for the past four years, who retired earlier this month after an exceptional military and public service career—that the line departments and agencies which in the past have shared in the performance of the various preparedness functions now possess the capability to assume full responsibility for those functions. In the interest of efficiency and economy, we can now further streamline the Executive Office of the President by formally relocating those responsibilities and closing the Office of Emergency Preparedness.

I propose to accomplish this reform in two steps. First, Reorganization Plan No. 1 would transfer to the President all functions previously vested by law in the Office or its Director, except the Director's role as a member of the National Security Council, which would be abolished; and it would abolish the Office of Emergency Preparedness.

The functions to be transferred to the President from OEP are largely incidental to emergency authorities already vested in him. They include functions under the Disaster Relief Act of 1970 [42 U.S.C.A. § 4401 et seq.]; the function of determining whether a major disaster has occurred within the meaning of (1) Section 7 of the Act of September 30, 1950, as amended, 20 U.S.C. 241-1, or (2) Section 762(a) of the Higher Education Act of 1965, as added by Section 161(a) of the Education Amendments of 1972, Public Law 92-318, 86 Stat. 288 at 299 (relating to the furnishing by the Commissioner of Education of disaster relief assistance for educational purposes) [20 U.S.C.A. § 1132d-1]; and functions under Section 232 of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962, as amended (19 U.S.C. 1862), with respect to the conduct of investigations to determine the effects on national security of the importation of certain articles.

The Civil Defense Advisory Council within OEP would also be abolished by this plan, as changes in domestic and international conditions since its establishment in 1950 have now obviated the need for a standing council of this type. Should advice of the kind the Council has provided be required again in the future, State and local officials and experts in the field can be consulted on an ad hoc basis.

Second, as soon as the plan became effective, I would delegate OEP's former functions as follows:

All OEP responsibilities having to do with preparedness for and relief of civil emergencies and disasters would be transferred to the Department of Housing and Urban Development. This would provide greater field capabilities for coordination of Federal disaster assistance with that provided by States and local communities, and would be in keeping with the objective of creating a broad, new Department of Community Development.

OEP's responsibilities for measures to ensure the continuity of civil government operations in the event of major military attack would be reassigned to the General Services Administration, as would responsibility for resource mobilization including the management of national security stockpiles, with policy guidance in both cases to be provided by the National Security Council, and with economic considerations relating to changes in stockpile levels to be coordinated by the Council on Economic Policy.

Investigations of imports which might threaten the national security—assigned to OEP by Section 232 [19 U.S.C.A. § 1862] of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 [19 U.S.C.A. § 1862]—would be reassigned to the Treasury Department, whose other trade studies give it a readymade capability in this field; the National Security Council would maintain its supervisory role over strategic imports.

Those disaster relief authorities which have been reserved to the President in the past, such as the authority to declare major disasters, will continue to be exercised by him under these new arrangements. In emergency situations calling for rapid interagency coordination, the Federal response will be coordinated by the Executive Office of the President under the general supervision of the Assistant to the President in charge of executive management.

The Oil Policy Committee will continue to function as in the past, unaffected by this reorganization, except that I will designate the Deputy Secretary of the Treasury as chairman in place of the Director of OEP. The Committee will operate under the general supervision of the Assistant to the President in charge of economic affairs.

DECLARATIONS

After investigation, I have found that each action included in the accompanying reorganization plan is necessary to accomplish one or more of the purposes set forth in Section 901(a) of title 5 of the United States Code. In particular, the plan is responsive to the intention of the Congress as expressed in Section 901(a)(1), "to promote better execution of the laws, more effective management of the executive branch and of its agencies and functions, and expeditious administration of the public business;" and in Section 901(a)(3), "to increase the efficiency of the operations of the Government to the fullest extent practicable;" and in Section 901(a)(5), "to reduce the number of agencies by consolidating those having similar functions under a single head, and to abolish such agencies or functions as may not be necessary for the efficient conduct of the Government."

While it is not practicable to specify all of the expenditure reductions and other economies which will result from the actions proposed, personnel and budget savings from abolition of the National Aeronautics and Space Council and the Office of Science and Technology alone will exceed $2 million annually, and additional savings should result from a reduction of Executive Pay Schedule positions now associated with other transferred and delegated functions.

The plan has as its one logically consistent subject matter the streamlining of the Executive Office of the President and the disposition of major responsibilities currently conducted in the Executive Office of the President, which can better be performed elsewhere or abolished.

The functions which would be abolished by this plan, and the statutory authorities for each, are:

(1) the functions of the Director of the Office of Emergency Preparedness with respect to being a member of the National Security Council (Sec. 101, National Security Act of 1947, as amended, 50 U.S.C. 402; and Sec. 4, Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1958);

(2) the functions of the Civil Defense Advisory Council (Sec. 102(a), Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950; 50 U.S.C.App. 2272(a)); and

(3) the functions of the National Aeronautics and Space Council (Sec. 201, National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958; 42 U.S.C. 2471).

The proposed reorganization is a necessary part of the restructuring of the Executive Office of the President. It would provide through the Director of the National Science Foundation a strong focus for Federal efforts to encourage the development and application of science and technology to meet national needs. It would mean better preparedness for and swifter response to civil emergencies, and more reliable precautions against threats to the national security. The leaner and less diffuse Presidential staff structure which would result would enhance the President's ability to do his job and would advance the interests of the Congress as well.

I am confident that this reorganization plan would significantly increase the overall efficiency and effectiveness of the Federal Government. I urge the Congress to allow it to become effective.

RICHARD NIXON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
January 26, 1973.

EXECUTIVE ORDERS

EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 10186

Ex. Ord. No. 10186, Dec. 1, 1950, 15 F.R. 8557, established the Federal Civil Defense Administration in the Office for Emergency Management of the Executive Office of the President, provided for the appointment of an Administrator and a Deputy Administrator, and delineated the purposes, functions, and authority of the Administration and the Administrator.

EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 10222

Ex. Ord. No. 10222, Mar. 8, 1951, 16 F.R. 2247, which transferred to Federal Civil Defense Administration functions of Health Resources Office of National Security Resources Board, was revoked by section 904(a)(2) of Ex. Ord. No. 12919, June 3, 1994, 59 F.R. 29533, set out as a note under section 2153 of Title 50, Appendix, War and National Defense.

Act of 1950 (31 U.S.C. 581c) [31 U.S.C.A. § 1531], and Section 301 of Title 3 of the United States Code [section 301 of Title 3, The President], and in order to transfer emergency functions to the Federal Emergency Management Agency, it is hereby ordered as follows:

1–1. Transfer or Reassignment of Existing Functions.

1–101. All functions vested in the President that have been delegated or assigned to the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency, Department of Defense, are transferred or reassigned to the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

1–102. All functions vested in the President that have been delegated or assigned to the Federal Disaster Assistance Administration, Department of Housing and Urban Development, are transferred or reassigned to the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, including any of those functions redelegated or reassigned to the Department of Commerce with respect to assistance to communities in the development of readiness plans for severe weather-related emergencies.

1–103. All functions vested in the President that have been delegated or assigned to the Federal Preparedness Agency, General Services Administration, are transferred or reassigned to the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

1–104. All functions vested in the President by the Earthquake Hazards Reduction Act of 1977 (42 U.S.C. 7701 et seq.) [section 7701 et seq. of this title], including those functions performed by the Office of Science and Technology Policy, are delegated, transferred, or reassigned to the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

1–2. Transfer or Reassignment of Resources.

1–201. The records, property, personnel and positions, and unexpended balances of appropriations, available or to be made available, which relate to the functions transferred, reassigned, or redelegated by this Order are hereby transferred to the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

1–202. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall make such determinations, issue such orders, and take all actions necessary or appropriate to effectuate the transfers or reassignments provided by this Order, including the transfer of funds, records, property, and personnel.

2–1. General.

2–101. The Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency shall establish Federal policies for, and coordinate, all civil defense and civil emergency planning, management, mitigation, and assistance functions of Executive agencies.

2–102. The Director shall periodically review and evaluate the civil defense and civil emergency functions of the Executive agencies. In order to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of those functions, the Director shall recommend to the President alternative methods of providing Federal planning, management, mitigation, and assistance.

2–103. The Director shall be responsible for the coordination of efforts to promote dam safety, for the coordination of natural and nuclear disaster warning systems, and for the coordination of preparedness and planning to reduce the consequences of major terrorist incidents.

2–104. The Director shall represent the President in working with State and local governments and private sector to stimulate vigorous participation in civil emergency preparedness, mitigation, response, and recovery programs.

2–105. The Director shall provide an annual report to the President for subsequent transmittal to the Congress on the functions of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. The report shall assess the current overall state of effectiveness of Federal civil defense and civil emergency functions, organizations, resources, and systems and recommend measures to be taken to improve planning, management, assistance, and relief by all levels of government, the private sector, and volunteer organizations.

2–2. Implementation.

2–201. In executing the functions under this Order, the Director shall develop policies which provide that all civil defense and civil emergency functions, resources, and systems of Executive agencies are:

(a) founded on the use of existing organizations, resources, and systems to the maximum extent practicable;

(b) integrated effectively with organizations, resources, and programs of State and local governments, the private sector and volunteer organizations; and

(c) developed, tested and utilized to prepare for, mitigate, respond to and recover from the effects on the population of all forms of emergencies.

2–202. Assignments of civil emergency functions shall, whenever possible, be based on extensions (under emergency conditions), of the regular missions of the Executive agencies.

2–203. For purposes of this Order, "civil emergency" means any accidental, natural, man-caused, or wartime emergency or threat thereof, which causes or may cause substantial injury or harm to the population or substantial damage to or loss of property.

2–204. In order that civil defense planning continues to be fully compatible with the Nation's overall strategic policy, and in order to maintain an effective link between strategic nuclear planning and nuclear attack preparedness planning, the development of civil defense policies and programs by the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency shall be subject to oversight by the Secretary of Defense and the National Security Council.

2–205. To the extent authorized by law and within available resources, the Secretary of Defense shall provide the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency with support for civil defense programs in the areas of program development and administration, technical support, research, communications, transportation, intelligence, and emergency operations.

2–206. All Executive agencies shall cooperate with and assist the Director in the performance of his functions.

2–3. Transition Provisions.

2–301. The functions which have been transferred, reassigned, or redelegated by Section 1 of this Order are recodified and revised as set forth in this Order at Section 4, and as provided by the amendments made at Section 5 to the provisions of other Orders.

2–302. Notwithstanding the revocations, revisions, codifications, and amendments made by this Order, the Director may continue to perform the functions transferred to him by Section 1 of this Order, except where they may otherwise be inconsistent with the provisions of this Order.

4–1. Delegation of Functions Transferred to the President.

4–101. [Revoked by Ex. Ord. No. 12155, Sept. 10, 1979, 44 F.R. 53071.]

4–102. EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 12472

Apr. 3, 1984, 49 F.R. 13471

ASSIGNMENT OF NATIONAL SECURITY AND EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS TELECOMMUNICATIONS FUNCTIONS

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, including the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (47 U.S.C. 151) [47 U.S.C.A. §§ 151 et seq., 609], the National Security Act of 1947, as amended [50 U.S.C.A. § 401 note], the Defense Production Act of 1950, as amended (50 U.S.C. App. 2061) [50 U.S.C.A. App. § 2061 et seq.], the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950, as amended (50 U.S.C. App. 2251) [50 U.S.C.A. App. § 2251 et seq.], the Disaster Relief Act of 1974 (42 U.S.C. 5121) [42 U.S.C.A. § 5121], Section 5 of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (3 C.F.R. 197, 1978 Comp.) [see Appendix to Title 5, Government Organization and Employees], and Section 203 of Reorganization Plan No. 3 of 1978 (3 C.F.R. 389, 1978 Comp.) [see 5 U.S.C.A. App.], and in order to provide and maintain adequate, reliable telecommunications for the national security and emergency preparedness needs of the Federal Government, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1. The National Communications System. (a) There is hereby established the National Communications System (NCS). The NCS shall consist of the telecommunications assets of the entities represented on the NCS Committee of Principals and an administrative structure consisting of the Executive Agent, the NCS Committee of Principals and the Manager. The NCS Committee of Principals shall consist of representatives from those Federal departments, agencies or entities, designated by the President, which lease or own telecommunications facilities or services of significance to national security or emergency preparedness, and entities which bear policy, regulatory or enforcement responsibilities of importance to national security or emergency preparedness telecommunications capabilities.

(b) The mission of the NCS shall be to assist the President, the National Security Council, the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget in:

(1) the exercise of the telecommunications functions and responsibilities set forth in Section 2 of this Order; and

(2) the coordination of the planning for and provision of national security and emergency preparedness communications for the Federal government under all circumstances, including crisis or emergency, attack, recovery and reconstitution.

(c) The NCS shall seek to ensure that a national telecommunications infrastructure is developed which:

(1) Is responsive to the national security and emergency preparedness needs of the President and the Federal departments, agencies and other entities, including telecommunications in support of national security leadership and continuity of government;

(2) Is capable of satisfying priority telecommunications requirements under all circumstances through use of commercial, government and privately owned telecommunications resources;

(3) Incorporates the necessary combination of hardness, redundancy, mobility, connectivity, interoperability, restorability and security to obtain, to the maximum extent practicable, the survivability of national security and emergency preparedness telecommunications in all circumstances, including conditions of crisis or emergency; and

(4) Is consistent, to the maximum extent practicable, with other national telecommunications policies.

(d) To assist in accomplishing its mission, the NCS shall:

(1) serve as a focal point for joint industry-government national security and emergency preparedness telecommunications planning; and

(2) establish a joint industry-government National Coordinating Center which is capable of assisting in the initiation, coordination, restoration and reconstitution of national security or emergency preparedness telecommunications services or facilities under all conditions of crisis or emergency.

(e) The Secretary of Defense is designated as the Executive Agent for the NCS. The Executive Agent shall:

(1) Designate the Manager of the NCS;

(2) Ensure that the NCS conducts unified planning and operations, in order to coordinate the development and maintenance of an effective and responsive capability for meeting the domestic and international national security and emergency preparedness telecommunications needs of the Federal government; and

(3) Ensure that the activities of the NCS are conducted in [illegible]

gency management activities of the Federal Emergency Management Agency;

(4) Recommend, in consultation with the NCS Committee of Principals, to the National Security Council, the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy, or the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, as appropriate:

a. The assignment of implementation or other responsibilities to NCS member entities;

b. New initiatives to assist in the exercise of the functions specified in Section 2; and

c. Changes in the composition or structure of the NCS;

(5) Oversee the activities of and provide personnel and administrative support to the Manager of the NCS;

(6) Provide staff support and technical assistance to the National Security Telecommunications Advisory Committee established by Executive Order No. 12382, as amended; and

(7) Perform such other duties as are from time to time assigned by the President or his authorized designee.

(f) The NCS Committee of Principals shall:

(1) Serve as the forum in which each member of the Committee may review, evaluate, and present views, information and recommendations concerning ongoing or prospective national security or emergency preparedness telecommunications programs or activities of the NCS and the entities represented on the Committee;

(2) Serve as the forum in which each member of the Committee shall report on and explain ongoing or prospective telecommunications plans and programs developed or designed to achieve national security or emergency preparedness telecommunications objectives;

(3) Provide comments or recommendations, as appropriate, to the National Security Council, the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Executive Agent, or the Manager of the NCS, regarding ongoing or prospective activities of the NCS; and

(4) Perform such other duties as are from time to time assigned by the President or his authorized designee.

(g) The Manager of the NCS shall:

(1) Develop for consideration by the NCS Committee of Principals and the Executive Agent:

a. A recommended evolutionary telecommunications architecture designed to meet current and future Federal government national security and emergency preparedness telecommunications requirements;

b. Plans and procedures for the management, allocation and use, including the establishment of priorities or preferences, of Federally owned or leased telecommunications assets under all conditions of crisis

c. Plans, procedures and standards for minimizing or removing technical impediments to the interoperability of government-owned and/or commercially-provided telecommunications systems;

d. Test and exercise programs and procedures for the evaluation of the capability of the Nation's telecommunications resources to meet national security or emergency preparedness telecommunications requirements; and

e. Alternative mechanisms for funding, through the budget review process, national security or emergency preparedness telecommunications initiatives which benefit multiple Federal departments, agencies, or entities. Those mechanisms recommended by the NCS Committee of Principals and the Executive Agent shall be submitted to the Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

(2) Implement and administer any approved plans or programs as assigned, including any system of priorities and preferences for the provision of communications service, in consultation with the NCS Committee of Principals and the Federal Communications Commission, to the extent practicable or otherwise required by law or regulation;

(3) Chair the NCS Committee of Principals and provide staff support and technical assistance thereto;

(4) Serve as a focal point for joint industry-government planning, including the dissemination of technical information, concerning the national security or emergency preparedness telecommunications requirements of the Federal government;

(5) Conduct technical studies or analyses, and examine research and development programs, for the purpose of identifying, for consideration by the NCS Committee of Principals and the Executive Agent, improved approaches which may assist Federal entities in fulfilling national security or emergency preparedness telecommunications objectives;

(6) Pursuant to the Federal Standardization Program of the General Services Administration, and in consultation with other appropriate entities of the Federal government including the NCS Committee of Principals, manage the Federal Telecommunications Standards Program, ensuring wherever feasible that existing or evolving industry, national, and international standards are used as the basis for Federal telecommunications standards; and

(7) Provide such reports and perform such other duties as are from time to time assigned by the President or his authorized designee, the Executive Agent, or the NCS Committee of Principals. Any such assignments of responsibility to, or reports made by, the Manager shall be transmitted through the Executive Agent.

Sec. 2. Executive Office Responsibilities.

(a) Wartime Emergency Functions. (1) The National Security Council shall provide policy direction for the exercise of the war power functions of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (47 U.S.C. 606) [section 606 of Title 47, Telegraphs, Telephones and Radiotelegraphs], should the President issue implementing instructions in accordance with the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1601) [section 1601 et seq. of Title 50, War and National Defense].

(2) The Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy shall direct the exercise of the war power functions of the President under Section 606(a), (c)–(e), of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (47 U.S.C. 606) [section 606 of Title 47], should the President issue implementing instructions in accordance with the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1601) [section 1601 et seq. of Title 50].

(b) Non-Wartime Emergency Functions. (1) The National Security Council shall:

a. Advise and assist the President in coordinating the development of policy, plans, programs and standards within the Federal government for the identification, allocation, and use of the Nation's telecommunications resources by the Federal government, and by State and local governments, private industry and volunteer organizations upon request, to the extent practicable and otherwise consistent with law, during those crises or emergencies in which the exercise of the President's war power functions is not required or permitted by law; and

b. Provide policy direction for the exercise of the President's non-wartime emergency telecommunications functions, should the President so instruct.

(2) The Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy shall provide information, advice, guidance and assistance, as appropriate, to the President and to those Federal departments and agencies with responsibilities for the provision, management, or allocation of telecommunications resources, during those crises or emergencies in which the exercise of the President's war power functions is not required or permitted by law;

(3) The Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy shall establish a Joint Telecommunications Resources Board (JTRB) to assist him in the exercise of the functions specified in this subsection. The Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy shall serve as chairman of the JTRB; select those Federal departments, agencies, or entities which shall be members of the JTRB; and specify the functions it shall perform.

(c) Planning and Oversight Responsibilities. (1) The National Security Council shall advise and assist the President in:

a. Coordinating the development of policy, plans, programs and standards for the mobilization and use of the Nation's commercial, government, and privately owned telecommunications resources, in order to meet national security or emergency preparedness requirements;

b. Providing policy oversight and direction of the activities of the NCS; and

c. Providing policy oversight and guidance signed to the Federal departments and agencies by this Order.

(2) The Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy shall make recommendations to the President with respect to the test, exercise and evaluation of the capability of existing and planned communications systems, networks or facilities to meet national security or emergency preparedness requirements and report the results of any such tests or evaluations and any recommended remedial actions to the President and to the National Security Council;

(3) The Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy or his designee shall advise and assist the President in the administration of a system of radio spectrum priorities for those spectrum dependent telecommunications resources of the Federal government which support national security or emergency preparedness functions. The Director also shall certify or approve priorities for radio spectrum use by the Federal government, including the resolution of any conflicts in or among priorities, under all conditions of crisis or emergency; and

(4) The National Security Council, the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall, in consultation with the Executive Agent for the NCS and the NCS Committee of Principals, determine what constitutes national security and emergency preparedness telecommunications requirements.

(d) Consultation with Federal Departments and Agencies. In performing the functions assigned under this Order, the National Security Council and the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy, in consultation with each other, shall:

(1) Consult, as appropriate, with the Director of the Office of Management and Budget; the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency with respect to the emergency management responsibilities assigned pursuant to Executive Order No. 12148, as amended [set out as a note under this section]; the Secretary of Commerce, with respect to responsibilities assigned pursuant to Executive Order No. 12046 [47 U.S.C.A. § 305 note]; the Secretary of Defense, with respect to communications security responsibilities assigned pursuant to Executive Order No. 12333 [50 U.S.C.A. § 401 note]; and the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission or his authorized designee; and

(2) Establish arrangements for consultation among all interested Federal departments, agencies or entities to ensure that the national security and emergency preparedness communications needs of all Federal government entities are identified; that mechanisms to address such needs are incorporated into pertinent plans and procedures; and that such needs are met in a manner consistent, to the maximum extent practicable, with other national telecommunications policies.

(e) Budgetary Guidelines. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, in consultation with the National Security Council and the NCS, will prescribe general guidelines and procedures for reviewing the financing of the NCS within the budgetary process and for preparation of budget estimates by participating agencies. These guidelines and procedures may provide for mechanisms for funding, through the budget review process, national security and emergency preparedness telecommunications initiatives which benefit multiple Federal departments, agencies, or entities.

Sec. 3. Assignment of Responsibilities to Other Departments and Agencies. In order to support and enhance the capability to satisfy the national security and emergency preparedness telecommunications needs of the Federal government, State and local governments, private industry and volunteer organizations, under all circumstances including those of crisis or emergency, the Federal departments and agencies shall perform the following functions:

(a) Department of Commerce. The Secretary of Commerce shall, for all conditions of crisis or emergency: (1) Develop plans and procedures concerning radio spectrum assignments, priorities and allocations for use by Federal departments, agencies and entities; and

(2) Develop, maintain and publish policy, plans, and procedures for the control and allocation of frequency assignments, including the authority to amend, modify or revoke such assignments, in those parts of the electromagnetic spectrum assigned to the Federal government.

(b) Federal Emergency Management Agency. The Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency shall:

(1) Plan for and provide, operate and maintain telecommunications services and facilities, as part of its National Emergency Management System, adequate to support its assigned emergency management responsibilities;

(2) Advise and assist State and local governments and volunteer organizations, upon request and to the extent consistent with law, in developing plans and procedures for identifying and satisfying their national security or emergency preparedness telecommunications requirements;

(3) Ensure, to the maximum extent practicable, that national security and emergency preparedness telecommunications planning by State and local governments and volunteer organizations is mutually supportive and consistent with the planning of the Federal government; and

(4) Develop, upon request and to the extent consistent with law and in consonance with regulations promulgated by and agreements with the Federal Communications Commission, plans and capabilities for, and provide policy and management oversight of, the Emergency Broadcast System, and advise and assist private radio licensees of the Commission in developing emergency communications plans, procedures and capabilities.

(c) Department of State. The Secretary of State, in accordance with assigned responsibilities within the Diplomatic Telecommunications System, shall plan for and provide, operate and maintain rapid, reliable and secure telecommunications services to those Federal elements located at United States diplomatic missions and consular offices overseas. This responsibility shall include the provision and operation of domestic telecommunications in support of assigned national security or emergency preparedness responsibilities.

(d) Department of Defense. In addition to the other responsibilities assigned by this Order, the Secretary of Defense shall:

(1) Plan for and provide, operate and maintain telecommunications services and facilities adequate to support the National Command Authorities and to execute the responsibilities assigned by Executive Order No. 12333 [50 U.S.C.A. § 401 note]; and

(2) Ensure that the Director of the National Security Agency provides the technical support necessary to develop and maintain plans adequate to provide for the security and protection of national security and emergency preparedness telecommunications.

(e) Department of Justice. The Attorney General shall, as necessary, review for legal sufficiency, including consistency with the antitrust laws, all policies, plans or procedures developed pursuant to responsibilities assigned by this Order.

(f) Central Intelligence Agency. The Director of Central Intelligence shall plan for and provide, operate, and maintain telecommunications services adequate to support its assigned responsibilities, including the dissemination if intelligence within the Federal government.

(g) General Services Administration. Except as otherwise assigned by this Order, the Administrator of General Services, consistent with policy guidance provided by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, shall ensure that Federally owned or managed domestic communications facilities and services meet the national security and emergency preparedness requirements of the Federal Civilian departments, agencies and entities.

(h) Federal Communications Commission. The Federal Communications Commission shall, consistent with Section 4(c) of this Order:

(1) Review the policies, plans and procedures of all entities licensed or regulated by the Commission that are developed to provide national security or emergency preparedness communications services, in order to ensure that such policies, plans and procedures are consistent with the public interest, convenience and necessity;

(2) Perform such functions as required by law with respect to all entities licensed or regulated by the Commission, including (but not limited to) the extension, discontinuance or reduction of common carrier facilities or services; the control of common carrier rates, charges, practices and classifications; the construction, authorization, activation, deactivation or closing of radio stations, services and facilities; the assignment of radio frequencies to Commission licensees; the investigation of violations of pertinent law and regulation; and the initiation of appropriate enforcement actions;

(3) Develop policy, plans and procedures signed in this Order under all conditions or crisis or emergency; and

(4) Consult as appropriate with the Executive Agent for the NCS and the NCS Committee of Principals to ensure continued coordination of their respective national security and emergency preparedness activities.

(i) All Federal departments and agencies, to the extent consistent with law (including those authorities and responsibilities set forth in Section 4(c) of this Order), shall:

(1) Determine their national security and emergency preparedness telecommunications requirements, and provide information regarding such requirements to the Manager of the NCS;

(2) Prepare policies, plans and procedures concerning telecommunications facilities, services or equipment under their management or operational control to maximize their capability of responding to the national security or emergency preparedness needs of the Federal government;

(3) Provide, after consultation with the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, resources to support their respective requirements for national security and emergency preparedness telecommunications; and provide personnel and staff support to the Manager of the NCS as required by the President;

(4) Make information available to, and consult with, the Manager of the NCS regarding agency telecommunications activities in support of national security or emergency preparedness;

(5) Consult, consistent with the provisions of Executive Order No. 12046, as amended [47 U.S.C.A. § 305 note], and in conjunction with the Manager of the NCS, with the Federal Communications Commission regarding execution of responsibilities assigned by this Order;

(6) Submit reports annually, or as otherwise requested, to the Manager of the NCS, regarding agency national security or emergency preparedness telecommunications activities; and

(7) Cooperate with and assist the Executive Agent for the NCS, the NCS Committee of Principals, the Manager of the NCS, and other departments and agencies in the execution of the functions set forth in this Order, furnishing them such information, support and assistance as may be required.

(j) Each Federal department or agency shall execute the responsibilities assigned by this Order in conjunction with the emergency management activities of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and in regular consultation with the Executive Agent for the NCS and the NCS Committee of Principals to ensure continued coordination of NCS and individual agency telecommunications activities.

Sec. 4. General Provisions. (a) All Executive departments and agencies may issue such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the functions assigned under this Or-

(b) In order to reflect the assignments of responsibility provided by this Order,

(1) Sections 2-414, 4-102, 4-103, 4-202, 4-302, 5-3, and 6-101 of Executive Order No. 12046, as amended [47 U.S.C.A. § 305 note], are revoked;

(2) The Presidential Memorandum of August 21, 1963, as amended, entitled "Establishment of the National Communications System", is hereby superseded; and

(3) Section 2-411 of Executive Order No. 12046, as amended [47 U.S.C.A. § 305 note], is further amended by deleting the period and inserting ", except as otherwise provided by Executive Order No." and inserting the number assigned to this Order.

(c) Nothing in this Order shall be deemed to affect the authorities or responsibilities of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, or any Office or official thereof; or reassign any function assigned any agency under the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended [40 U.S.C.A. § 471 note]; or under any other law; or any function vested by law in the Federal Communications Commission.

Sec. 5. This Order shall be effective upon publication in the Federal Register.

EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 12656

Nov. 18, 1988, 53 F.R. 47491, as amended Ex. Ord. No. 13074, Feb. 9, 1998, 63 F.R. 7277

ASSIGNMENT OF EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS RESPONSIBILITIES

WHEREAS our national security is dependent upon our ability to assure continuity of government, at every level, in any national security emergency situation that might confront the Nation; and

WHEREAS effective national preparedness planning to meet such an emergency, including a massive nuclear attack, is essential to our national survival; and

WHEREAS effective national preparedness planning requires the identification of functions that would have to be performed during such an emergency, the assignment of responsibility for developing plans for performing these functions, and the assignment of responsibility for developing the capability to implement those plans; and

WHEREAS the Congress has directed the development of such national security emergency preparedness plans and has provided funds for the accomplishment thereof;

NOW, THEREFORE, by virtue of the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, and pursuant to Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1958 (72 Stat. 1799) [set out above], the National Security Act of 1947, as amended [50 U.S.C.A. § 401 et seq.], the Defense Production Act of 1950, as amended [50 U.S.C.A. § 2061 et seq.], and the Federal Civil Defense Act, as amended, it is hereby ordered that the responsibilities of the Federal departments and agencies in national security emergencies shall be as follows:

PART 1—PREAMBLE

Section 101. National Security Emergency Preparedness Policy.

(a) The policy of the United States is to have sufficient capabilities at all levels of government to meet essential defense and civilian needs during any national security emergency. A national security emergency is any occurrence, including natural disaster, military attack, technological emergency, or other emergency, that seriously degrades or seriously threatens the national security of the United States. Policy for national security emergency preparedness shall be established by the President. Pursuant to the President's direction, the National Security Council shall be responsible for developing and administering such policy. All national security emergency preparedness activities shall be consistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States and with preservation of the constitutional government of the United States.

(b) Effective national security emergency preparedness planning requires: identification of functions that would have to be performed during such an emergency; development of plans for performing these functions; and development of the capability to execute those plans.

Sec. 102. Purpose.

(a) The purpose of this Order is to assign national security emergency preparedness responsibilities to Federal departments and agencies. These assignments are based, whenever possible, on extensions of the regular missions of the departments and agencies.

(b) This Order does not constitute authority to implement the plans prepared pursuant to this Order. Plans so developed may be executed only in the event that authority for such execution is authorized by law.

Sec. 103. Scope.

(a) This Order addresses national security emergency preparedness functions and activities. As used in this Order, preparedness functions and activities include, as appropriate, policies, plans, procedures, and readiness measures that enhance the ability of the United States Government to mobilize for, respond to, and recover from a national security emergency.

(b) This Order does not apply to those natural disasters, technological emergencies, or other emergencies, the alleviation of which is normally the responsibility of individuals, the private sector, volunteer organizations, State and local governments, and Federal departments and agencies unless such situations also constitute a national security emergency.

(c) This Order does not require the provision of information concerning, or evaluation of, military policies, plans, programs, or states of military readiness.

(d) This Order does not apply to national security emergency preparedness telecommunications functions and responsibilities that are otherwise assigned by Executive Order 12472 [set out as a note under this section].

Sec. 104. Management of National Security Emergency Preparedness.

(a) The National Security Council is the principal forum for consideration of national security emergency preparedness policy.

(b) The National Security Council shall arrange for Executive branch liaison with, and assistance to, the Congress and the Federal judiciary on national security-emergency preparedness matters.

(c) The Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency shall serve as an advisor to the National Security Council on issues of national security emergency preparedness, including mobilization preparedness, civil defense, continuity of government, technological disasters, and other issues, as appropriate. Pursuant to such procedures for the organization and management of the National Security Council process as the President may establish, the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency also shall assist in the implementation of and management of the National Security Council process as the President may establish, the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency also shall assist in the implementation of national security emergency preparedness policy by coordinating with the other Federal departments and agencies and with State and local governments, and by providing periodic reports to the National Security Council on implementation of national security emergency preparedness policy.

(d) National security emergency preparedness functions that are shared by more than one agency shall be coordinated by the head of the Federal department or agency having primary responsibility and shall be supported by the heads of other departments and agencies having related responsibilities.

(e) There shall be a national security emergency exercise program that shall be supported by the heads of all appropriate Federal departments and agencies.

(f) Plans and procedures will be designed and developed to provide maximum flexibility to the President for his implementation of emergency actions.

Sec. 105. Interagency Coordination.

(a) All appropriate Cabinet members and agency heads shall be consulted regarding national security emergency preparedness programs and policy issues. Each department and agency shall support interagency coordination to improve preparedness and response to a national security emergency and shall develop and maintain decentralized capabilities wherever feasible and appropriate.

(b) Each Federal department and agency shall work within the framework established by, and cooperate with those organizations assigned responsibility in, Executive Order No. 12472 [set out as a note under this section], to ensure adequate national security emergency preparedness telecommunications in support of the functions and activities addressed by this Order.

PART 2—GENERAL PROVISIONS

Sec. 201. General. The head of each Federal department and agency, as appropriate, shall:

(1) Be prepared to respond adequately to all national security emergencies, including those that are international in scope, and those that may occur within any region of the Nation;

(2) Consider national security emergency preparedness factors in the conduct of his or her regular functions, particularly those functions essential in time of emergency. Emergency plans and programs, and an appropriate state of readiness, including organizational infrastructure, shall be developed as an integral part of the continuing activities of each Federal department and agency;

(3) Appoint a senior policy official as Emergency Coordinator, responsible for developing and maintaining a multi-year, national security emergency preparedness plan for the department or agency to include objectives, programs, and budgetary requirements;

(4) Design preparedness measures to permit a rapid and effective transition from routine to emergency operations, and to make effective use of the period following initial indication of a probable national security emergency. This will include:

(a) Development of a system of emergency actions that defines alternatives, processes, and issues to be considered during various stages of national security emergencies;

(b) Identification of actions that could be taken in the early stages of a national security emergency or pending national security emergency to mitigate the impact of or reduce significantly the lead times associated with full emergency action implementation;

(5) Base national security emergency preparedness measures on the use of existing authorities, organizations, resources, and systems to the maximum extent practicable;

(6) Identify areas where additional legal authorities may be needed to assist management and, consistent with applicable Executive orders, take appropriate measures toward acquiring those authorities;

(7) Make policy recommendations to the National Security Council regarding national security emergency preparedness activities and functions of the Federal Government;

(8) Coordinate with State and local government agencies and other organizations, including private sector organizations, when appropriate. Federal plans should include appropriate involvement of and reliance upon private sector organizations in the response to national security emergencies;

(9) Assist State, local, and private sector entities in developing plans for mitigating the effects of national security emergencies and for providing services that are essential to a national response;

(10) Cooperate, to the extent appropriate, in compiling, evaluating, and exchanging relevant data related to all aspects of national security emergency preparedness;

(11) Develop programs regarding congressional relations and public information that could be used during national security emergencies;

(12) Ensure a capability to provide, during a national security emergency, information concerning Acts of Congress, presidential proclamations, Executive orders, regulations, and notices of other actions to the Archivist of the United States, for publication in the Federal Register, or to each agency designated to maintain the Federal Register in an emergency;

(13) Develop and conduct training and education programs that incorporate emergency preparedness and civil defense information necessary to ensure an effective national response;

(14) Ensure that plans consider the consequences for essential services provided by State and local governments, and by the private sector, if the flow of Federal funds is disrupted;

(15) Consult and coordinate with the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency to ensure that those activities and plans are consistent with current National Security Council guidelines and policies.

Sec. 202. Continuity of Government. The head of each Federal department and agency shall ensure the continuity of essential functions in any national security emergency by providing for: succession to office and emergency delegation of authority in accordance with applicable law; safekeeping of essential resources, facilities, and records; and establishment of emergency operating capabilities.

Sec. 203. Resource Management. The head of each Federal department and agency, as appropriate within assigned areas of responsibility, shall:

(1) Develop plans and programs to mobilize personnel (including reservist programs), equipment, facilities, and other resources;

(2) Assess essential emergency requirements and plan for the possible use of alternative resources to meet essential demands during and following national security emergencies;

(3) Prepare plans and procedures to share between and among the responsible agencies resources such as energy, equipment, food, land, materials, minerals, services, supplies, transportation, water, and workforce needed to carry out assigned responsibilities and other essential functions, and cooperate with other agencies in developing programs to ensure availability of such resources in a national security emergency;

(4) Develop plans to set priorities and allocate resources among civilian and military claimants;

(5) Identify occupations and skills for which there may be a critical need in the event of a national security emergency.

Sec. 204. Protection of Essential Resources and Facilities. The head of each Federal department and agency, within assigned areas of responsibility, shall:

(1) Identify facilities and resources, both government and private, essential to the national defense and national welfare, and assess their vulnerabilities and develop strategies, plans, and programs to provide for the security of such facilities and resources, and to avoid or minimize disruptions of essential services during any national security emergency;

(2) Participate in interagency activities to assess the relative importance of various facilities and resources to essential military and civilian needs and to integrate preparedness and response strategies and procedures;

(3) Maintain a capability to assess promptly the effect of attack and other disruptions during national security emergencies.

Sec. 205. Federal Benefit, Insurance, and Loan Programs. The head of each Federal department and agency that administers a loan, insurance, or benefit program that relies upon the Federal Government payment system shall coordinate with the Secretary of the Treasury in developing plans for the continuation or restoration, to the extent feasible, of such programs in national security emergencies.

Sec. 206. Research. The Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy and the heads of Federal departments and agencies having significant research and development programs shall advise the National Security Council of scientific and technological developments that should be considered in national security emergency preparedness planning.

Sec. 207. Redelegation. The head of each Federal department and agency is hereby authorized, to the extent otherwise permitted by law, to redelegate the functions assigned by this Order, and to authorize successive redelegations to organizations, officers, or employees within the department or agency.

Sec. 208. Transfer of Functions. Recommendations for interagency transfer of any emergency preparedness function assigned under this Order or for assignment of any new emergency preparedness function shall be coordinated with all affected Federal departments and agencies before submission to the National Security Council.

Sec. 209. Retention of Existing Authority. Nothing in this Order shall be deemed to derogate from assignments of functions to any Federal department or agency or officer thereof made by law.

PART 3—DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Sec. 301. Lead Responsibilities. In addition to the applicable responsibilities covered in Parts 1 and 2, the Secretary of Agriculture shall:

(1) Develop plans to provide for the continuation of agricultural production, food processing, storage, and distribution through the wholesale level in national security emergencies, and to provide for the domestic distribution of seed, feed, fertilizer, and farm equipment to agricultural producers;

(2) Develop plans to provide food and agricultural products to meet international responsibilities in national security emergencies;

(3) Develop plans and procedures for administration and use of Commodity Credit Corporation inventories of food and fiber resources in national security emergencies;

(4) Develop plans for the use of resources under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture and, in consultation with the Secretaries of Commerce, Defense, and the Interior, the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority, and the heads of other government entities, plan for the national security emergency management, production, and processing of forest products;

(5) Develop, in coordination with the Secretary of Defense, plans and programs for water to be used in agricultural production and food processing in national security emergencies;

(6) In cooperation with Federal, State, and local agencies, develop plans for a national program relating to the prevention and control of fires in rural areas of the United States caused by the effects of enemy attack or other national security emergencies;

(7) Develop plans to help provide the Nation's farmers with production resources, including national security emergency financing capabilities;

(8) Develop plans, in consonance with those of the Department of Health and Human Services, the Department of the Interior, and the Environmental Protection Agency, for national security emergency agricultural health services and forestry, including:

(a) Diagnosis and control or eradication of diseases, pests, or hazardous agents (biological, chemical, or radiological) against animals, crops, timber, or products thereof;

(b) Protection, treatment, and handling of livestock and poultry, or products thereof, that have been exposed to or affected by hazardous agents;

(c) Use and handling of crops, agricultural commodities, timber, and agricultural lands that have been exposed to or affected by hazardous agents; and

(d) Assuring the safety and wholesomeness, and minimizing losses from hazards, of animals and animal products and agricultural commodities and products subject to continuous inspection by the Department of Agriculture or owned by the Commodity Credit Corporation or by the Department of Agriculture;

(9) In consultation with the Secretary of State and the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, represent the United States in agriculture-related international civil emergency preparedness planning and related activities.

Sec. 302. Support Responsibility. The Secretary of Agriculture shall assist the Secretary of Defense in formulating and carrying out plans for stockpiling strategic and critical agricultural materials.

PART 4—DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

Sec. 401. Lead Responsibilities. In addition to the applicable responsibilities covered in Parts 1 and 2, the Secretary of Commerce shall:

(1) Develop control systems for priorities, allocation, production, and distribution of materials and other resources that will be available to support both national defense and essential civilian programs in a national security emergency;

(2) In cooperation with the Secretary of Defense and other departments and agencies, identify those industrial products and facilities that are essential to mobilization readiness, national

(3) In cooperation with the Secretary of Defense and other Federal departments and agencies, analyze potential effects of national security emergencies on actual production capability, taking into account the entire production complex, including shortages of resources, and develop preparedness measures to strengthen capabilities for production increases in national security emergencies;

(4) In cooperation with the Secretary of Defense, perform industry analyses to assess capabilities of the commercial industrial base to support the national defense, and develop policy alternatives to improve the international competitiveness of specific domestic industries and their abilities to meet defense program needs;

(5) In cooperation with the Secretary of the Treasury, develop plans for providing emergency assistance to the private sector through direct or participation loans for the financing of production facilities and equipment;

(6) In cooperation with the Secretaries of State, Defense, Transportation, and the Treasury, prepare plans to regulate and control exports and imports in national security emergencies;

(7) Provide for the collection and reporting of census information on human and economic resources, and maintain a capability to conduct emergency surveys to provide information on the status of these resources as required for national security purposes;

(8) Develop overall plans and programs to ensure that the fishing industry continues to produce and process essential protein in national security emergencies;

(9) Develop plans to provide meteorological, hydrologic, marine weather, geodetic, hydrographic, climatic, seismic, and oceanographic data and services to Federal, State, and local agencies, as appropriate;

(10) In coordination with the Secretary of State and the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, represent the United States in industry-related international (NATO and allied) civil emergency preparedness planning and related activities.

Sec. 402. Support Responsibilities. The Secretary of Commerce shall:

(1) Assist the Secretary of Defense in formulating and carrying out plans for stockpiling strategic and critical materials;

(2) Support the Secretary of Agriculture in planning for the national security management, production, and processing of forest and fishery products;

(3) Assist, in consultation with the Secretaries of State and Defense, the Secretary of the Treasury in the formulation and execution of economic measures affecting other nations.

(2) In coordination with the Secretary of Commerce, develop, with industry, government, and the private sector, reliable capabilities for the rapid increase of defense production to include industrial resources required for that production;

(3) Develop and maintain, in cooperation with the heads of other departments and agencies, national security emergency plans, programs, and mechanisms to ensure effective mutual support between and among the military, civil government, and the private sector;

(4) Develop and maintain damage assessment capabilities and assist the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the heads of other departments and agencies in developing and maintaining capabilities to assess attack damage and to estimate the effects of potential attack on the Nation;

(5) Arrange, through agreements with the heads of other Federal departments and agencies, for the transfer of certain Federal resources to the jurisdiction and/or operational control of the Department of Defense in national security emergencies;

(6) Acting through the Secretary of the Army, develop, with the concurrence of the heads of all affected departments and agencies, overall plans for the management, control, and allocation of all usable waters from all sources within the jurisdiction of the United States. This includes:

(a) Coordination of national security emergency water resource planning at the national, regional, State, and local levels;

(b) Development of plans to assure emergency provision of water from public works projects under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Army to public water supply utilities and critical defense production facilities during national security emergencies;

(c) Development of plans to assure emergency operation of waterways and harbors; and

(d) Development of plans to assure the provision of potable water;

(7) In consultation with the Secretaries of State and Energy, the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and others, as required, develop plans and capabilities for identifying, analyzing, mitigating, and responding to hazards related to nuclear weapons, materials, and devices; and maintain liaison, as appropriate, with the Secretary of Energy and the Members of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to ensure the continuity of nuclear weapons production and the appropriate allocation of scarce resources, including the recapture of special nuclear materials from Nuclear Regulatory Commission licensees when appropriate;

(8) Coordinate with the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Adminstration [sic] and the Secretary of Energy, as appropriate, to prepare for the use, maintenance, and development of technologically advanced aerospace and aeronautical-related systems, equipment, and methodologies applicable to national security emergencies;

(9) Develop, in coordination with the Secretary of Health and Human Services, the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the Director of the Federal Preparedness Agency of the General Services Administration, the Director of the Selective Service System, the Office of Personnel Management, and the Federal Emergency Management Agency, plans and systems to ensure that the Nation's human resources are available to meet essential military and civilian needs in national security emergencies;

(10) Develop national security emergency operational procedures, and coordinate with the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development with respect to residential property, for the control, acquisition, leasing, assignment and priority of occupancy of real property within the jurisdiction of the Department of Defense;

(11) Review the priorities and allocations systems developed by other departments and agencies to ensure that they meet Department of Defense needs in a national security emergency; and develop and maintain the Department of Defense programs necessary for effective utilization of all priorities and allocations systems;

(12) Develop, in coordination with the Attorney General of the United States, specific procedures by which military assistance to civilian law enforcement authorities may be requested, considered, and provided;

(13) In cooperation with the Secretary of Commerce and other departments and agencies, identify those industrial products and facilities that are essential to mobilization readiness, national defense, or post-attack survival and recovery;

(14) In cooperation with the Secretary of Commerce and other Federal departments and agencies, analyze potential effects of national security emergencies on actual production capability, taking into account the entire production complex, including shortages of resources, and develop preparedness measures to strengthen capabilities for production increases in national security emergencies;

(15) With the assistance of the heads of other Federal departments and agencies, provide management direction for the stockpiling of strategic and critical materials, conduct storage, maintenance, and quality assurance operations for the stockpile of strategic and critical materials, and formulate plans, programs, and reports relating to the stockpiling of strategic and critical materials.

(16) Subject to the direction of the President, and pursuant to procedures to be developed jointly by the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of State, be responsible for the deployment and use of military forces for the protection of United States citizens and nationals and, in connection therewith, designated other persons or categories of persons, in support of their evacuation from threatened areas overseas.

Sec. 502. Support Responsibilities. The Secretary of Defense shall:

(1) Advise and assist the heads of other Federal departments and agencies in the development of plans and programs to support national mobilization. This includes providing, as appropriate:

(a) Military requirements, prioritized and time-phased to the extent possible, for selected end-items and supporting services, materials, and facilities;

(b) Recommendations for use of financial incentives and other methods to improve defense production as provided by law; and

Title VII, § 753, Oct. 22, 1999, 113 Stat. 1170, provided that:

"Section 1. Short title.

"This Act [this note] may be cited as the 'National Drought Policy Act of 1998'.

"Sec. 2. Findings.

"Congress finds that—

"(1) the United States often suffers serious economic and environmental losses from severe regional droughts and there is no coordinated Federal strategy to respond to such emergencies;

"(2) at the Federal level, even though historically there have been frequent, significant droughts of national consequences, drought is addressed mainly through special legislation and ad hoc action rather than through a systematic and permanent process as occurs with other natural disasters;

"(3) there is an increasing need, particularly at the Federal level, to emphasize preparedness, mitigation, and risk management (rather than simply crisis management) when addressing drought and other natural disasters or emergencies;

"(4) several Federal agencies have a role in drought from predicting, forecasting, and monitoring of drought conditions to the provision of planning, technical, and financial assistance;

"(5) there is no single Federal agency in a lead or coordinating role with regard to drought;

"(6) State, local, and tribal governments have had to deal individually and separately with each Federal agency involved in drought assistance; and

"(7) the President should appoint an advisory commission to provide advice and recommendations on the creation of an integrated, coordinated Federal policy designed to prepare for, mitigate the impacts of, respond to, and recover from serious drought emergencies.

"Sec. 3. Establishment of Commission.

"(a) Establishment.—There is established a commission to be known as the National Drought Policy Commission (hereafter in this Act [this note] referred to as the 'Commission').

"(b) Membership.—

"(1) Composition.—The Commission shall be composed of 16 members. The members of the Commission shall include—

"(A) the Secretary of Agriculture, or the designee of the Secretary, who shall chair the Commission;

"(B) the Secretary of the Interior, or the designee of the Secretary;

"(C) the Secretary of the Army, or the designee of the Secretary;

"(D) the Secretary of Commerce, or the designee of the Secretary;

"(E) the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, or the designee of the Director;

"(F) the Administrator of the Small Business Administration, or the designee of the Administrator;

"(G) two governors, who may be represented on the Commission by their respective designees, nominated by the National Governors' Association and appointed by the President, of whom—

"(i) one shall be the governor of a State east of the Mississippi River; and

"(ii) one shall be a governor of a State west of the Mississippi River;

"(H) a person nominated by the National Association of Counties and appointed by the President;

"(I) a person nominated by the United States Conference of Mayors and appointed by the President; and

"(J) six persons, appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture in coordination with the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Army, who shall be representative of groups acutely affected by drought emergencies, such as the agricultural production community, the credit community, rural and urban water associations, Native Americans, and fishing and environmental interests.

"(2) Date.—The appointments of the members of the Commission shall be made no later than 60 days after the date of the enactment of this Act [July 16, 1998].

"(c) Period of appointment; vacancies.—Members shall be appointed for the life of the Commission. Any vacancy in the Commission shall not affect its powers, but shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

"(d) Initial meeting.—No later than 30 days after the date on which all members of the Commission have been appointed, the Commission shall hold its first meeting.

"(e) Meetings.—The Commission shall meet at the call of the chair.

"(f) Quorum.—A majority of the members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum, but a lesser number of members may hold hearings.

"(g) Vice chair.—The Commission shall select a vice chair from among the members who are not Federal officers or employees.

"Sec. 4. Duties of the Commission.

"(a) Study and report.—The Commission shall conduct a thorough study and submit a report on national drought policy in accordance with this section [section 4 of this note].

"(b) Content of study and report.—In conducting the study and report, the Commission shall—

"(1) determine, in consultation with the National Drought Mitigation Center in Lincoln, Nebraska, and other appropriate entities, what needs exist on the Federal, State, local, and tribal levels to prepare for and respond to drought emergencies;

"(2) review all existing Federal laws and programs relating to drought;

"(3) review State, local, and tribal laws and programs relating to drought that the Commission finds pertinent;

"(4) determine what differences exist between the needs of those affected by drought and the ability of Federal, State, local, and tribal governments to mitigate the impacts of and respond to drought;

"(5) collaborate with the Western Drought Coordination Council and other appropriate entities in order to consider regional drought initiatives and the application of such initiatives at the national level;

"(6) make recommendations on how Federal drought laws and programs can be better integrated with ongoing State, local, and tribal programs into a comprehensive national policy to mitigate the impacts of and respond to drought emergencies without diminishing the rights of States to control water through State law and considering the need for protection of the environment;

"(7) make recommendations on improving public awareness of the need for drought mitigation, and prevention; and response on developing a coordinated approach to drought mitigation, prevention, and response by governmental and nongovernmental entities, including academic, private, and nonprofit interests; and

"(8) include a recommendation on whether all Federal drought preparation and response programs should be consolidated under one existing Federal agency and, if so, identify such agency.

"(c) Submission of report.—

"(1) In general.—No later than 18 months after the date of the enactment of this Act [July 16, 1998], the Commission shall submit a report to the President and Congress which shall contain a detailed statement of the findings and conclusions of the Commission, together with its recommendations for such legislation and administrative actions as it considers appropriate.

"(2) Approval of report.—Before submission of the report, the contents of the report shall be approved by unanimous consent or majority vote. If the report is approved by majority vote, members voting not to approve the contents shall be given the opportunity to submit dissenting views with the report.

"Sec. 5. Powers of the Commission.

"(a) Hearings.—The Commission may hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, and receive such evidence as the Commission considers necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act [this note].

"(b) Information from Federal agencies.—The Commission may secure directly from any Federal department or agency such information as the Commission considers necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act [this note]. Upon request of the chair of the Commission, the head of such department or agency shall furnish such information to the Commission.

"(c) Postal services.—The Commission may use the United States mails in the same manner and under the same conditions as other departments and agencies of the Federal Government.

"(d) Gifts.—The Commission may accept, use, and dispose of gifts or donations of services or property.

"Sec. 6. Commission personnel matters.

"(a) Compensation of members.—Each member of the Commission who is not an officer or employee of the Federal Government shall not be compensated for service on the Commission, except as provided under subsection (b). All members of the Commission who are officers or employees of the United States shall serve without compensation in addition to that received for their services as officers or employees of the United States.

"(b) Travel expenses.—The members of the Commission shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, at rates authorized for employees of agencies under subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5, United States Code [section 5701 et seq. of Title 5], while away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance of services for the Commission.

"(c) Detail of Government employees.—Any Federal Government employee may be detailed to the Commission without reimbursement, and such detail shall be without interruption or loss of civil service status or privilege.

"(d) Administrative support.—The Secretary of Agriculture shall provide all financial, administrative, and staff support services for the Commission.

"Sec. 7. Termination of the Commission.

"The Commission shall terminate 90 days after the date on which the Commission submits its report under section 4 [of this note]."

(7) Develop and coordinate with all appropriate agencies civil defense programs to enhance Federal, State, local, and private sector capabilities for national security emergency crisis management, population protection, and recovery in the event of an attack on the United States;

(8) Develop and support public information, education and training programs to assist Federal, State, and local government and private sector entities in planning for and implementing national security emergency preparedness programs;

(9) Coordinate among the heads of Federal, State, and local agencies the planning, conduct, and evaluation of national security emergency exercises;

(10) With the assistance of the heads of other appropriate Federal departments and agencies, develop and maintain capabilities to assess actual attack damage and residual recovery capabilities as well as capabilities to estimate the effects of potential attacks on the Nation;

(11) Provide guidance to the heads of Federal departments and agencies on the appropriate use of defense production authorities, including resource claimancy, in order to improve the capability of industry and infrastructure systems to meet national security emergency needs;

(12) Assist the Secretary of State in coordinating the formulation and implementation of United States policy for NATO and other allied civil emergency planning, including the provision of:

(a) advice and assistance to the departments and agencies in alliance civil emergency planning matters;

(b) support to the United States Mission to NATO in the conduct of day-to-day civil emergency planning activities; and

(c) support facilities for NATO Civil Wartime Agencies in cooperation with the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Energy, State, and Transportation.

Sec. 1702. Support Responsibilities. The Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency shall:

(1) Support the heads of other Federal departments and agencies in preparing plans and programs to discharge their national security emergency preparedness responsibilities, including, but not limited to, such programs as mobilization preparedness, continuity of government planning, and continuance of industry and infrastructure functions essential to national security;

(2) Support the Secretary of Energy, the Secretary of Defense, and the Members of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission in developing plans and capabilities for identifying, analyzing, mitigating, and responding to emergencies related to nuclear weapons, materials, and devices, including mobile and fixed nuclear facilities, by providing, inter alia, off-site coordination;

(3) Support the Administrator of General Services in efforts to promote a government-wide program with respect to Federal buildings and installations to minimize the effects of attack and establish shelter management organizations.

PART 18—GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION

Sec. 1801. Lead Responsibilities. In addition to the applicable responsibilities assigned in Parts 1 and 2, the Administrator of General Services shall:

(1) Develop national security emergency plans and procedures for the operation, maintenance, and protection of federally owned and occupied buildings managed by the General Services Administration, and for the construction, alteration, and repair of such buildings;

(2) Develop national security emergency operating procedures for the control, acquisition, leasing, assignment, and priority of occupancy of real property by the Federal Government, and by State and local governments acting as agents of the Federal Government, except for the military facilities and facilities with special nuclear materials within the jurisdiction of the Departments of Defense and Energy;

(3) Develop national security emergency operational plans and procedures for the use of public utility services (other than telecommunications services) by Federal departments and agencies, except for Department of Energy-operated facilities;

(4) Develop plans and operating procedures of government-wide supply programs to meet the requirements of Federal departments and agencies during national security emergencies;

(5) Develop plans and operating procedures for the use, in national security emergencies, of excess and surplus real and personal property by Federal, State, and local governmental entities;

(6) Develop plans, in coordination with the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, with respect to Federal buildings and installations, to minimize the effects of attack and establish shelter management organizations;

Sec. 1802. Support Responsibility. The Administrator of General Services shall develop plans to assist Federal departments and agencies in operation and maintenance of essential automated information processing facilities during national security emergencies:[.]

PART 19—NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION

Sec. 1901. Lead Responsibility. In addition to the applicable responsibilities covered in Parts 1 and 2, the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration shall coordinate with the Secretary of Defense to prepare for the use, maintenance, and development of technologically advanced aerospace and aeronautical-related systems, equipment, and methodologies applicable to national security emergencies.

PART 20—NATIONAL ARCHIVES AND RECORDS ADMINISTRATION

Sec. 2001. Lead Responsibilities. In addition to the applicable responsibilities covered in Parts 1 and 2, the Archivist of the United States shall:

(1) Develop procedures for publication during national security emergencies of the Federal Register for as broad public dissemination as is practicable of presidential proclamations and Executive orders, Federal emergency notices and actions, and Acts of Congress;

(2) Develop emergency procedures for providing instructions and advice on the handling and preservation of records critical to the operation of the Federal Government in national security emergencies.

PART 21—NUCLEAR REGULATORY COMMISSION

Sec. 2101. Lead Responsibilities. In addition to the applicable responsibilities covered in Parts 1 and 2, the Members of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission shall:

(1) Promote the development and maintenance of national security emergency preparedness programs through security and safeguards programs by licensed facilities and activities;

(2) Develop plans to suspend any licenses granted by the Commission; to order the operations of any facility licensed under Section 103 or 104; Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended (42 U.S.C. 2133 or 2134); to order the entry into any plant or facility in order to recapture special nuclear material as determined under Subsection (3) below; and operate such facilities;

(3) Recapture or authorize recapture of special nuclear materials from licensees where necessary to assure the use, preservation, or safeguarding of such materials for the common defense and security, as determined by the Commission or as requested by the Secretary of Energy.

Sec. 2102. Support Responsibilities. The Members of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission shall:

(1) Assist the Secretary of Energy in assessing damage to Commission-licensed facilities, identifying useable facilities, and estimating the time and actions necessary to restart inoperative facilities;

(2) Provide advice and technical assistance to Federal, State, and local officials and private sector organizations regarding radiation hazards and protective actions in national security emergencies.

PART 22—OFFICE OF PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT

Sec. 2201. Lead Responsibilities. In addition to the applicable responsibilities covered in Parts 1 and 2, the Director of the Office of Personnel Management shall:

(1) Prepare plans to administer the Federal civilian personnel system in national security emergencies, including plans and procedures for the rapid mobilization and reduction of an emergency Federal workforce;

(2) Develop national security emergency work force policies for Federal civilian personnel;

(3) Develop plans to accommodate the surge of Federal personnel security background and pre-employment investigations during national security emergencies.

Sec. 2202. Support Responsibilities. The Director of the Office of Personnel Management

REV_00255603

(1) Assist the heads of other Federal departments and agencies with personnel management and staffing in national security emergencies, including facilitating transfers between agencies of employees with critical skills;

(2) In consultation with the Secretary of Defense and the Director of Selective Service, develop plans and procedures for a system to control any conscription of Federal civilian employees during national security emergencies.

PART 23—SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM

Sec. 2301. Lead Responsibilities. In addition to the applicable responsibilities covered in Parts 1 and 2, the Director of Selective Service shall:

(1) Develop plans to provide by induction, as authorized by law, personnel that would be required by the armed forces during national security emergencies;

(2) Develop plans for implementing an alternative service program.

PART 24—TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

Sec. 2401. Lead Responsibility. In addition to the applicable responsibilities covered in Parts 1 and 2, the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority shall develop plans and maintain river control operations for the prevention or control of floods affecting the Tennessee River System during national security emergencies.

Sec. 2402. Support Responsibilities. The Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority shall:

(1) Assist the Secretary of Energy in the development of plans for the integration of the Tennessee Valley Authority power system into nationwide national security emergency programs;

(2) Assist the Secretaries of Defense, Interior, and Transportation and the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the development of plans for operation and maintenance of inland waterway transportation in the Tennessee River System during national security emergencies.

PART 25—UNITED STATES INFORMATION AGENCY

Sec. 2501. Lead Responsibilities. In addition to the applicable responsibilities covered in Parts 1 and 2, the Director of the United States Information Agency shall:

(1) Plan for the implementation of information programs to promote an understanding abroad of the status of national security emergencies within the United States;

(2) In coordination with the Secretary of State's exercise of telecommunications functions affecting United States diplomatic missions and consular offices overseas, maintain the capability to provide television and simultaneous direct radio broadcasting in major languages to all areas of the world, and the capability to provide wireless file to all United States embassies during national security emergencies.

Sec. 2502. Support Responsibility. The Director of the United States Information Agency shall assist the heads of other Federal departments and agencies in planning for the use of media resources and foreign public information programs during national security emergencies.

PART 26—UNITED STATES POSTAL SERVICE

Sec. 2601. Lead Responsibility. In addition to the applicable responsibilities covered in Parts 1 and 2, the Postmaster General shall prepare plans and programs to provide essential postal services during national security emergencies.

Sec. 2602. Support Responsibilities. The Postmaster General shall:

(1) Develop plans to assist the Attorney General of the United States in the registration of nationals of enemy countries residing in the United States;

(2) Develop plans to assist the Secretary of Health and Human Services in registering displaced persons and families;

(3) Develop plans to assist the heads of other Federal departments and agencies in locating and leasing privately owned property for Federal use during national security emergencies.

PART 27—VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Sec. 2701. Lead Responsibilities. In addition to the applicable responsibilities covered in Parts 1 and 2, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs [now Secretary of Veterans Affairs] shall:

(1) Develop plans for provision of emergency health care services to veteran beneficiaries in Veterans' Administration [now Department of Veterans Affairs] medical facilities, to active duty military personnel and, as resources permit, to civilians in communities affected by national security emergencies;

(2) Develop plans for mortuary services for eligible veterans, and advise on methods for interment of the dead during national security emergencies.

Sec. 2702. Support Responsibilities. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs [now Secretary of Veterans Affairs] shall;

(1) Assist the Secretary of Health and Human Services in promoting the development of State and local plans for the provision of medical services in national security emergencies, and develop appropriate plans to support such State and local plans;

(2) Assist the Secretary of Health and Human Services in developing national plans to mobilize the health care industry and medical resources during national security emergencies;

(3) Assist the Secretary of Health and Human Services in developing national plans to set priorities and allocate medical resources among civilian and military claimants.

PART 28—OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET

Sec. 2801. In addition to the applicable responsibilities covered in Parts 1 and 2, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall prepare plans and programs to maintain its functions during national security emergencies. In connection with these functions, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall:

(1) Develop plans to ensure the preparation, clearance, and coordination of proposed Executive orders and proclamations;

(2) Prepare plans to ensure the preparation, supervision, and control of the budget and the formulation of the fiscal program of the Government;

(3) Develop plans to coordinate and communicate Executive branch views to the Congress regarding legislation and testimony by Executive branch officials;

(4) Develop plans for keeping the President informed of the activities of government agencies, continuing the Office of Management and Budget's management functions, and maintaining presidential supervision and direction with respect to legislation and regulations in national security emergencies.

PART 29—GENERAL

Sec. 2901. Executive Order Nos. 10421 [formerly set out as a note under Section 404 of Title 50, War and National Defense], and 11490 [formerly set out as a note under this section], as amended, are hereby revoked. This Order shall be effective immediately.

EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 12657

Nov. 18, 1988, 53 F.R. 47513

FEDERAL EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT AGENCY ASSISTANCE IN EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS PLANNING AT COMMERCIAL NUCLEAR POWER PLANTS

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, including the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950, as amended (50 U.S.C.App. 2251 et seq.), the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5121 et seq.), the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended (42 U.S.C. 2011 et seq.), Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1958 [set out above], Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1973 [set out above], and Section 301 of Title 3 of the United States Code, and in order to ensure that plans and procedures are in place to respond to radiological emergencies at commercial nuclear power plants in operation or under construction, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1. Scope. (a) This Order applies whenever State or local governments, either individually or together, decline or fail to prepare commercial nuclear power plant radiological emergency preparedness plans that are sufficient to satisfy Nuclear Regulatory Commission ("NRC") licensing requirements or to participate adequately in the preparation, demonstration, testing, exercise, or use of such plans.

(b) In order to request the assistance of the Federal Emergency Management Agency ("FEMA") provided for in this Order, an affected nuclear power plant applicant or licensee ("licensee") shall certify in writing to FEMA that the situation described in Subsection (a) exists.

Sec. 2. Generally Applicable Principles and Directives. (a) Subject to the principles articulated in this Section, the Director of FEMA is hereby authorized and directed to take the actions specified in Sections 3 through 6 of this Order.

(b) In carrying out any of its responsibilities under this Order, FEMA:

(1) shall work actively with the licensee, and, before relying upon its resources or those of any other Department or agency within the Executive branch, shall make maximum feasible use of the licensee's resources;

(2) shall take care not to supplant State and local resources. FEMA shall substitute its own resources for those of the State and local governments only to the extent necessary to compensate for the nonparticipation or inadequate participation of those governments, and only as a last resort after appropriate consultation with the Governors and responsible local officials in the affected area regarding State and local participation;

(3) is authorized, to the extent permitted by law, to enter into interagency Memoranda of Understanding providing for utilization of the resources of other Executive branch Departments and agencies and for delegation to other Executive branch Departments and agencies and for delegation to other Executive branch Departments and agencies of any of the functions and duties assigned to FEMA under this Order; however, any such Memorandum of Understanding shall be subject to approval by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget ("OMB") and published in final form in the Federal Register; and

(4) shall assume for purposes of Sections 3 and 4 of this Order that, in the event of an actual radiological emergency or disaster, State and local authorities would contribute their full resources and exercise their authorities in accordance with their duties to protect the public from harm and would act generally in conformity with the licensee's radiological emergency preparedness plan.

(c) The Director of OMB shall resolve any issue concerning the obligation of Federal funds arising from the implementation of this Order. In resolving issues under this Subsection, the Director of OMB shall ensure:

(1) that FEMA has utilized to the maximum extent possible the resources of the licensee and State and local governments before it relies upon its appropriated and lawfully available resources or those of any Department or agency in the Executive branch;

(2) that FEMA shall use its existing resources to coordinate and manage, rather than duplicate, other available resources;

(3) that implementation of this Order is accomplished with an economy of resources; and

(4) that full reimbursement to the Federal Government is provided, to the extent permitted by law.

REV_00255604

Sec. 3. FEMA Participation in Emergency Preparedness Planning. (a) FEMA assistance in emergency preparedness planning shall include advice, technical assistance, and arrangements for facilities and resources as needed to satisfy the emergency planning requirements under the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended [42 U.S.C.A. § 2011 et seq.], and any other Federal legislation or regulations pertaining to issuance or retention of a construction permit or an operating license for a nuclear power plant.

(b) FEMA shall make all necessary plans and arrangements to ensure that the Federal Government is prepared to assume any and all functions and undertakings necessary to provide adequate protection to the public in cases within the scope of this Order. In making such plans and arrangements,

(1) FEMA shall focus planning of Federal response activities to ensure that:

(A) adequate resources and arrangements will exist, as of the time when an initial response is needed, given the absence or inadequacy of advance State and local commitments; and

(B) attention has been given to coordinating (including turning over) response functions when State and local governments do exercise their authority, with specific attention to the areas where prior State and local participation has been insufficient or absent;

(2) FEMA's planning for Federal participation in responding to a radiological emergency within the scope of this Order shall include, but not be limited to, arrangements for using existing Federal resources to provide prompt notification of the emergency to the general public; to assist in any necessary evacuation; to provide reception centers or shelters and related facilities and services for evacuees; to provide emergency medical services at Federal hospitals, including those operated by the military services and by the Veterans' Administration [now Department of Veterans Affairs]; and to ensure the creation and maintenance of channels of communication from commercial nuclear power plant licensees or applicants to State and local governments and to surrounding members of the public.

Sec. 4. Evaluation of Plans. (a) FEMA shall consider and evaluate all plans developed under the authority of this Order as though drafted and submitted by a State or local government.

(b) FEMA shall take all actions necessary to carry out the evaluation referred to in the preceding Subsection and to permit the NRC to conduct its evaluation of radiological emergency preparedness plans including, but not limited to, planning, participating in, and evaluating exercises, drills, and tests, on a timely basis, as necessary to satisfy NRC requirements for demonstrations of off-site radiological emergency preparedness.

Sec. 5. Response to a Radiological Emergency. (a) In the event of an actual radiological emergency or disaster, FEMA shall take all steps necessary to ensure the implementation of the plans developed under this Order and shall coordinate the actions of other Federal agencies to achieve the maximum effectiveness of Federal efforts in responding to the emergency.

(b) FEMA shall coordinate Federal response activities to ensure that adequate resources are directed, when an initial response is needed, to activities hindered by the absence or inadequacy of advance State and local commitments. FEMA shall also coordinate with State and local governmental authorities and turn over response functions as appropriate when State and local governments do exercise their authority.

(c) FEMA shall assume any necessary command-and-control function, or delegate such function to another Federal agency, in the event that no competent State and local authority is available to perform such function.

(d) In any instance in which Federal personnel may be called upon to fill a command-and-control function during a radiological emergency, in addition to any other powers it may have, FEMA or its designee is authorized to accept volunteer assistance from utility employees and other nongovernmental personnel for any purpose necessary to implement the emergency response plan and facilitate off-site emergency response.

Sec. 6. Implementation of Order. (a) FEMA shall issue interim and final directives and procedures implementing this Order as expeditiously as is feasible and in any event shall issue interim directives and procedures not more than 90 days following the effective date of this Order and shall issue final directives and procedures not more than 180 days following the effective date of this Order.

(b) Immediately upon the effective date of this Order, FEMA shall review, and initiate necessary revisions of, all FEMA regulations, directives, and guidance to conform them to the terms and policies of this Order.

(c) Immediately upon the effective date of this Order, FEMA shall review, and initiate necessary renegotiations of, all interagency agreements to which FEMA is a party, so as to conform them to the terms and policies of this Order. This directive shall include, but not be limited to, the Federal Radiological Emergency Response Plan (50 Fed.Reg. 46542 (November 8, 1985)).

(d) To the extent permitted by law, FEMA is directed to obtain full reimbursement, either jointly or severally, for services performed by FEMA or other Federal agencies pursuant to this Order from any affected licensee and from any affected nonparticipating or inadequately participating State or local government.

Sec. 7. Amendments. This Executive Order amends Executive Order Nos. 11490 (34 Fed. Reg. 17567 (October 28, 1969)) [formerly set out as a note under this section], 12148 (44 Fed.Reg. 43239 (July 20, 1979)) [set out as a note under this section], and 12241 (45 Fed.Reg. 64879 (September 29, 1980)) [not classified to the Code], and the same are hereby superseded to the extent that they are inconsistent with this Order.

Sec. 8. Judicial Review. This Order is intended only to improve the internal management of the Executive branch, and is not intended to create any right or benefit, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law by a party against the United States, its agencies, its officers, or any person.

Sec. 9. Effective Date. This Order shall be effective November 18, 1988.

EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 12673

Mar. 23, 1989, 54 F.R. 12571

DELEGATION OF DISASTER RELIEF AND EMERGENCY ASSISTANCE FUNCTIONS

By virtue of the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, including the Robert T. Stafford Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Act, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5121 et seq.) [section 5121 et seq. of this title], and in order to conform delegations of authority to recent legislation, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1. Section 4-203 of Executive Order No. 12148 [set out as a note under this section] is amended to read:

Section 4-203. The functions vested in the President by the Robert T. Stafford Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Act, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5121 et seq.), except those functions vested in the President by Section 401 (relating to the declaration of major disasters and emergencies) [section 5170 of this title], Section 501 (relating to the declaration of emergencies) [section 5191 of this title], Section 405 (relating to the repair, reconstruction, restoration, or replacement of Federal facilities) [section 5171 of this title], and Section 412 (relating to food coupons and distribution) [section 5179 of this title], are hereby delegated to the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Sec. 2. Section 3 of Executive Order No. 11795 [set out as a note under section 5121 of this title] is amended by removing the words "Section 409" and inserting "Section 412" in place thereof.

Sec. 3. The functions vested in the President by Section 103(e)(2) of the Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Amendments of 1988, Public Law 100-707 (relating to the transmission of a report to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation of the House of Representatives and to the Committee on Environment and Public Works of the Senate) [set out as a note under section 5122 of this title], are hereby delegated to the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Sec. 4. The functions vested in the President by Section 110 of the Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Amendments of 1988, Public Law 100-707 [set out as a note under section 5121 of this title], are hereby delegated to the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Sec. 5. The functions vested in the President by Section 113 of the Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Amendments of 1988, Public Law 100-707 [set out as a note under section 5201 of this title], are hereby delegated to the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Sec. 6. The amendments to Executive Order No. 12148 [set out as a note under this section] that are made by Section 1 of this Executive Order shall not affect the administration of any assistance for major disasters or emergencies declared by the President before the effective date of "The Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Amendments of 1988 [probably means the date of enactment of Pub.L. 100-707, which was approved Nov. 23, 1988]."

GEORGE BUSH

EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 13010

July 15, 1996, 61 F.R. 37347, as amended by Ex. Ord. No. 13025, Nov. 13, 1996, 61 F.R. 58623; Ex. Ord. No. 13041, Apr. 3, 1997, 62 F.R. 17039; Ex. Ord. No. 13064, Oct. 11, 1997, 62 F.R. 53711; Ex. Ord. No. 13077, Mar. 10, 1998, 63 F.R. 12381; Ex. Ord. No. 13138, Sept. 30, 1999, 64 F.R. 53879

CRITICAL INFRASTRUCTURE PROTECTION

Certain national infrastructures are so vital that their incapacity or destruction would have a debilitating impact on the defense or economic security of the United States. These critical infrastructures include telecommunications, electrical power systems, gas and oil storage and transportation, banking and finance, transportation, water supply systems, emergency services (including medical, police, fire, and rescue), and continuity of government. Threats to these critical infrastructures fall into two categories: physical threats to tangible property ("physical threats"), and threats of electronic, radio-frequency, or computer-based attacks on the information or communications components that control critical infrastructures ("cyber threats"). Because many of these critical infrastructures is essential that the government and private sector work together to develop a strategy for protecting them and assuring their continued operation.

NOW, THEREFORE, by the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1. Establishment. There is hereby established the President's Commission on Critical Infrastructure Protection ("Commission").

(a) Chair. A qualified individual from outside the Federal Government shall be designated by the President from among the members to serve as Chair of the Commission. The Commission Chair shall be employed on a full-time

REV_00255605

(b) Members. The head of each of the following executive branch departments and agencies shall nominate not more than two full-time members of the Commission:

(i) Department of the Treasury;

(ii) Department of Justice;

(iii) Department of Defense;

(iv) Department of Commerce;

(v) Department of Transportation;

(vi) Department of Energy;

(vii) Central Intelligence Agency;

(viii) Federal Emergency Management Agency;

(ix) Federal Bureau of Investigation;

(x) National Security Agency.

One of the nominees of each agency may be an individual from outside the Federal Government who shall be employed by the agency on a full-time basis. Each nominee must be approved by the Steering Committee.

Sec. 2. The Principals Committee. The Commission shall report to the President through a Principals Committee ("Principals Committee"), which shall review any reports or recommendations before submission to the President. The Principals Committee shall comprise the:

(i) Secretary of the Treasury;

(ii) Secretary of Defense;

(iii) Attorney General;

(iv) Secretary of Commerce;

(v) Secretary of Transportation;

(vi) Secretary of Energy;

(vii) Director of Central Intelligence;

(viii) Director of the Office of Management and Budget;

(ix) Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency;

(x) Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs;

(xi) Assistant to the Vice President for National Security Affairs.

(xii) Assistant to the President for Economic Policy and Director of the National Economic Council; and (xiii) Assistant to the President and Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy.

Sec. 3. The Steering Committee of the President's Commission on Critical Infrastructure Protection. A Steering Committee ("Steering Committee") shall oversee the work of the Commission on behalf of the Principals Committee. The Steering Committee shall comprise five members. Four of the members shall be appointed by the President, and the fifth member shall be the Chair of the Commission. Two of the members of the Committee shall be employees of the Executive Office of the President. The Steering Committee will receive regular reports on the progress of the Commission's work and approve the submission of reports to the Principals Committee.

Sec. 4. Mission. The Commission shall: (a) within 30 days of this order, produce a statement of its mission objectives, which will elaborate the general objectives set forth in this order, and a detailed schedule for addressing each mission objective, for approval by the Steering Committee;

(b) identify and consult with: (i) elements of the public and private sectors that conduct, support, or contribute to infrastructure assurance; (ii) owners and operators of the critical infrastructures; and (iii) other elements of the public and private sectors, including the Congress, that have an interest in critical infrastructure assurance issues and that may have differing perspectives on these issues;

(c) assess the scope and nature of the vulnerabilities of, and threats to, critical infrastructures;

(d) determine what legal and policy issues are raised by efforts to protect critical infrastructures and assess how these issues should be addressed;

(e) recommend a comprehensive national policy and implementation strategy for protecting critical infrastructures from physical and cyber threats and assuring their continued operation;

(f) propose any statutory or regulatory changes necessary to effect its recommendations; and

(g) produce reports and recommendations to the Steering Committee as they become available; it shall not limit itself to producing one final report.

Sec. 5. Advisory Committee to the President's Commission on Critical Infrastructure Protection. [Revoked by Ex. Ord. No. 13138, Sept. 30, 1999, 64 F.R. 53879]

Sec. 6. Administration. (a) All executive departments and agencies shall cooperate with the Commission and provide such assistance, information, and advice to the Commission as it may request, to the extent permitted by law.

(b) The Commission and the Advisory Committee may hold open and closed hearings, conduct inquiries, and establish subcommittees, as necessary.

(c) Members of the Advisory Committee shall serve without compensation for their work on the Advisory Committee. While engaged in the work of the Advisory Committee, members may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by law for persons serving intermittently in the government service.

(d) To the extent permitted by law, and subject to the availability of appropriations, the Department of Defense shall provide the Commission and the Advisory Committee with administrative services, staff, other support services, and such funds as may be necessary for the performance of its functions and shall reimburse the executive branch components that provide representatives to the Commission for the compensation of those representatives.

(e) In order to augment the expertise of the Commission, the Department of Defense may, at the Commission's request, contract for the services of nongovernmental consultants who may prepare analyses, reports, background papers, and other materials for consideration by the Commission. In addition, at the Commission's request, executive departments and agencies shall request that existing Federal advisory committees consider and provide advice on issues of critical infrastructure protection, to the extent permitted by law.

(f) [Revoked by Ex. Ord. No. 13138, Sept. 30, 1999, 64 F.R. 53879.]

(g) The person who served as Chair of the Commission may continue to be a member of the Steering Committee after termination of the Commission.

Sec. 7. Review of Commission's Report. (a) Upon the termination of the Commission as set out in section 6(f) of this order, certain of the Commission's staff may be retained no later than September 30, 1998, solely to assist the Principals, Steering, and Advisory Committees in reviewing the Commission's report and preparing recommendations to the President. They shall act under the direction of the Steering Committee or its designated agent. The Department of Defense shall continue to provide funding and administrative support for the retained Commission staff.

(b) Pursuant to Executive Order 12958 [set out as a note under section 435 of Title 50, War and National Defense], I hereby designate the Executive Secretary of the National Security Council to exercise the authority to classify information originally as "Top Secret" with respect to the work of the Commission staff, the Principals Committee, the Steering Committee, the Advisory Committee, and the Infrastructure Protection Task Force.

Sec. 8. Interim Coordinating Mission. (a) While the Commission is conducting its analysis and until the President has an opportunity to consider and act on its recommendations, there is a need to increase coordination of existing infrastructure protection efforts in order to better address, and prevent, crises that would have a debilitating regional or national impact. There is hereby established an Infrastructure Protection Task Force ("IPTF") within the Department of Justice, chaired by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, to undertake this interim coordinating mission.

(b) The IPTF will not supplant any existing programs or organizations.

(c) The Steering Committee shall oversee the work of the IPTF.

(d) The IPTF shall include at least one full-time member each from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Department of Defense, and the National Security Agency. It shall also receive part-time assistance from other executive branch departments and agencies. Members shall be designated by their departments or agencies on the basis of their expertise in the protection of critical infrastructures. IPTF members' compensation shall be paid by their parent agency or department.

(e) The IPTF's function is to identify and coordinate existing expertise, inside and outside of the Federal Government, to:

(i) provide, or facilitate and coordinate the provision of, expert guidance to critical infrastructures to detect, prevent, halt, or confine an attack and to recover and restore service;

(ii) issue threat and warning notices in the event advance information is obtained about a threat;

(iii) provide training and education on methods of reducing vulnerabilities and responding to attacks on critical infrastructures;

(iv) conduct after-action analysis to determine possible future threats, targets, or methods of attack; and

(v) coordinate with the pertinent law enforcement authorities during or after an attack to facilitate any resulting criminal investigation.

(f) All executive departments and agencies shall cooperate with the IPTF and provide such assistance, information, and advice as the IPTF may request, to the extent permitted by law.

(g) All executive departments and agencies shall share with the IPTF information about threats and warning of attacks, and about actual attacks on critical infrastructures, to the extent permitted by law.

(h) The IPTF shall terminate no later than 180 days after the termination of the Commission, unless extended by the President prior to that date.

Sec. 9. General. (a) This order is not intended to change any existing statutes or Executive orders.

(b) This order is not intended to create any right, benefit, trust, or responsibility, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law or equity by a party against the United States, its agencies, its officers, or any person.

EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 13130

July 14, 1999, 64 F.R. 38535

NATIONAL INFRASTRUCTURE ASSURANCE COUNCIL

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, including the Federal Advisory Committee Act, as amended (5 U.S.C. App.), and in order to support a coordinated effort by both government and private sector entities to address threats to our Nation's critical infrastructure, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1. Establishment. (a) There is established the National Infrastructure Assurance Council (NIAC). The NIAC shall be composed of not more than 30 members appointed by the President. The members of the NIAC shall be selected from the private sector, including private sector entities representing the critical infrastructures identified in Executive Order 13010 [set out as a note under this section], and from State and local government. The members of the NIAC shall have expertise relevant to the functions of the NIAC and shall not be full-time officials or employees of the executive branch of the Federal Government.

(b) The President shall designate a Chairperson and Vice-Chairperson from among the members of the NIAC.

(c) The National Coordinator for Security, Infrastructure Protection and Counter-Terrorism at the National Security Council (National Coordinator) will serve as the Executive Director of the NIAC.

(d) The Senior Director for Critical Infrastructure Protection at the National Security Council will serve as the NIAC's liaison to other agencies.

(e) Individuals appointed by the President will serve for a period of 2 years. Service shall be limited to no more than 3 consecutive terms.

Section 2. Functions. (a) The NIAC will meet periodically to:

(1) enhance the partnership of the public and private sectors in protecting our critical infrastructure and provide reports on this issue to the President as appropriate;

(2) propose and develop ways to encourage private industry to perform periodic risk assessments of critical processes, including information and telecommunications systems; and

(3) monitor the development of Private Sector Information Sharing and Analysis Centers (PSISACs) and provide recommendations to the National Coordinator and the National Economic Council on how these organizations can best foster improved cooperation among the PSISACs, the National Infrastructure Protection Center (NIPC), and other Federal Government entities.

(b) The NIAC will report to the President through the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, who shall assure appropriate coordination with the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy.

(c) The NIAC will advise the lead agencies with critical infrastructure responsibilities, sector coordinators, the NIPC, the PSISACs and the National Coordinator on the subjects of the NIAC's function in whatever manner the Chair of the NIAC, the National Coordinator, and the head of the affected entity deem appropriate.

(d) Senior Federal Government officials will participate in the meetings of the NIAC as appropriate.

(e) The Department of Commerce shall perform the functions of the President under the Federal Advisory Committee Act [5 U.S.C.A. App. 2] for the NIAC, except that of reporting to the Congress, in accordance with the guidelines and procedures established by the Administrator of General Services.

Section 3. Administration. To the extent permitted by law:

(a) The NIAC may hold open and closed hearings, conduct inquiries, and establish subcommittees as necessary.

(b) All executive departments and agencies shall cooperate with the NIAC and provide such assistance, information, and advice to the NIAC as it may request, as appropriate.

(c) Members of the NIAC shall serve without compensation for their work on the NIAC. While engaged in the work of the Council, members will be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence as authorized by law for persons serving intermittently in the Government service.

(d) To the extent permitted by law, and subject to the availability of appropriations, the Department of Commerce, through the Critical Infrastructure Assurance Office, shall provide the NIAC with administrative services, staff, and other support services, and such funds as may be necessary for the performance of its functions.

(e) The Council shall terminate 2 years from the date of this order, unless extended by the President prior to that date.

Section 4. Judicial Review. This order is not intended to create any right, benefit, trust, or responsibility, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law or equity by a party against the United States, its agencies, its officers, or any person.

EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 13151

Apr. 27, 2000, 65 F.R. 25619

GLOBAL DISASTER INFORMATION NETWORK

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, and in order to establish a Global Disaster Information Network to use information technology more effectively to reduce loss of life and property from natural and man-made disasters, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1. Policy. (a) It is the policy of this Administration to use information technology more effectively to coordinate the Federal Government's collection and dissemination of information to appropriate response agencies and State governments to prepare for and respond to natural and man-made disasters (disasters). As a result of changing population demographics in our coastal, rural, and urban areas over the past decades, the loss of life and property (losses) from disasters has nearly [illegible] the ways the Federal Government can reduce these losses is to use technology more effectively to coordinate its collection and dissemination (hereafter referred to collectively as "provision") of information which can be used in both planning for and recovering from disasters. While many agencies provide disaster-related information, they may not always provide it in a coordinated manner. To improve the provision of disaster-related information, the agencies shall, as set out in this order, use information technology to coordinate the Federal Government's provision of information to prepare for, respond to, and recover from domestic disasters.

(b) It is also the policy of this Administration to use information technology and existing channels of disaster assistance to improve the Federal [illegible] could be helpful to foreign governments preparing for or responding to foreign disasters. Currently, the United States Government provides disaster-related information to foreign governments and relief organizations on humanitarian grounds at the request of foreign governments and where appropriate. This information is supplied by Federal agencies on an ad hoc basis. To increase the effectiveness of our response to foreign disasters, agencies shall, where appropriate, use information technology to coordinate the Federal Government's provision of disaster-related information to foreign governments.

(c) To carry out the policies in this order, there is s established the Global Disaster Information Network (Network). The Network is defined as the coordinated effort by Federal agencies to develop a strategy and to use existing technical infrastructure, to the extent permitted by law and subject to the availability of appropriations and under the guidance of the Interagency Coordinating Committee and the Committee Support Office, to make more effective use of information technology to assist our Government, and foreign governments where appropriate, by providing disaster-related information to prepare for and respond to disasters.

Sec. 2. Establishment. (a) There is established an Interagency Coordinating Committee (Committee) to provide leadership and oversight for the development of the Network. The Office of the Vice President, the Department of Commerce through the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, and the Department of State, respectively, shall designate a representative to serve as Co-chairpersons of the Committee. The Committee membership shall comprise representatives from the following departments and agencies:

(1) Department of State;

(2) Department of Defense;

(3) Department of the Interior;

(4) Department of Agriculture;

(5) Department of Commerce;

(6) Department of Transportation;

(7) Department of Energy;

(8) Office of Management and Budget;

(9) Environmental Protection Agency;

(10) National Aeronautics and Space Administration;

(11) United States Agency for International Development;

(12) Federal Emergency Management Agency; and

(13) Central Intelligence Agency.

At the discretion of the Co-chairpersons of the Committee, other agencies may be added to the Committee membership. The Committee shall include an Executive Secretary to effect coordination between the Co-chairpersons of the Committee and the Committee Support Office.

(b) There is established a Committee Support Office (Support Office) to assist the Committee by developing plans and projects that would further the creation of the Network. The Support Office shall, at the request of the Co-chairpersons of the Committee, carry out tasks

(c) The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration shall provide funding and administrative support for the Committee and the Support Office. To the extent permitted by law, agencies may provide support to the Committee and the Support Office to assist them in their work.

Sec. 3. Responsibilities. (a) The Committee shall:

(1) serve as the United States Government's single entity for all matters, both national and international, pertaining to the development and establishment of the Network;

(2) provide leadership and high-level coordination of Network activities;

(3) provide guidance for the development of Network strategies, goals, objectives, policies, and legislation;

(4) represent and advocate Network goals, objectives, and processes to their respective agencies and departments;

(5) provide manpower and material support for Network development activities;

(6) develop, delegate, and monitor interagency opportunities and ideas supporting the development of the Network; and

(7) provide reports, through the Co-chairpersons of the Committee, to the President as requested or at least annually.

(b) The Support Office shall:

(1) provide management and administrative support for the committee;

(2) develop Network strategies, goals, objectives, policies, plans, and legislation in accordance with guidance provided by the Committee;

(3) consult with agencies, States, nongovernment organizations, and international counterparts in developing Network development tasks;

(4) develop and make recommendations concerning Network activities to the agencies as approved by the Committee; and

(5) participate in projects that promote the goals and objectives of the Network.

Sec. 4. Implementation. (a) The Committee, with the assistance of the Support Office, shall address national and international issues associated with the development of the Network within the context of:

(1) promoting the United States as an example and leader in the development and dissemination of disaster information, both domestically and abroad, and, to this end, seeking cooperation with foreign governments and international organizations;

(2) striving to include all appropriate stakeholders in the development of the Network; and

(3) facilitating the creation of a framework that involves public and private stakeholders in a partnership for sustained operations of the Network.

(b) Intelligence activities, as determined by the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, as well as national security-related activities of the Department of Defense and of the Department of Energy, are exempt from compliance

SUBCHAPTER I—FINDINGS, DECLARATIONS, AND DEFINITIONS

§ 5121. Congressional findings and declarations

(a) In general

The Congress hereby finds and declares that—

(1) because disasters often cause loss of life, human suffering, loss of income, and property loss and damage; and

(2) because disasters often disrupt the normal functioning of governments and communities, and adversely affect individuals and families with great severity; special measures, designed to assist the efforts of the affected States in expediting the rendering of aid, assistance, and emergency services, and the reconstruction and rehabilitation of devastated areas, are necessary.

(b) Intent of Congress

It is the intent of the Congress, by this chapter, to provide an orderly and continuing means of assistance by the Federal Government to State and local governments in carrying out their responsibilities to alleviate the suffering and damage which result from such disasters by—

(1) revising and broadening the scope of existing disaster relief programs;

(2) encouraging the development of comprehensive disaster preparedness and assistance plans, programs, capabilities, and organizations by the States and by local governments;

(3) achieving greater coordination and responsiveness of disaster preparedness and relief programs;

(4) encouraging individuals, States, and local governments to protect themselves by obtaining insurance coverage to supplement or replace governmental assistance;

(5) encouraging hazard mitigation measures to reduce losses from disasters, including development of land use and construction regulations; and

(6) providing Federal assistance programs for both public and private losses sustained in disasters [1]

References in Text

This chapter, referred to in subsec. (b), was in the original "this Act", meaning Pub.L. 93–288, May 22, 1974, 88 Stat. 143, as amended. For complete classification of this Act to the Code, see Short Title of 1974 Acts note under this section and Tables.

Amendments

1988 Amendments. Subsec. (b)(5) to (7). Pub.L. 100–707, § 103(a)(1)-(3), struck out par. (7) expressing Congressional intent to provide disaster assistance through a long-range economic recovery program for major disaster areas; struck out "; and" at the end of par. (6); and inserted "and" at the end of par. (5).

Effective Dates

1974 Acts. Section 605 of Pub.L. 93–288, which provided for an effective date for Pub.L. 93–288, with the exception of section 5178 of this title, was repealed by Pub.L. 100–707, Title I, § 108(b), Nov. 23, 1988, 102 Stat. 4708.

Delegation of Functions

Functions of the President under the Disaster Relief Acts of 1970 and 1974, with certain exceptions, were delegated to the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, see sections 4–201 and 4–203 of Ex. Ord. No. 12148, July 20, 1979, 44 F.R. 43239, set out as a note under section 2251 of Title 50, Appendix, War and National Defense.

Short Title

1993 Amendments. Pub.L. 103–181, § 1, Dec. 3, 1993, 107 Stat. 2054, provided that: "This Act [amending section 5170c of this title and enacting provisions set out as notes under sections 4601 and 5170c of this title] may be cited as the 'Hazard Mitigation and Relocation Assistance Act of 1993'."

1988 Amendments. Section 101(a) of Title I of Pub.L. 100–707 provided that: "This title [enacting sections 5141, 5153 to 5157, 5159 to 5164, 5170 to 5170c, 5172, 5174, 5178, 5189 to 5189b, and 5191 to 5193 of this title, amending this section, sections 1382a, 3030, 3231, 3232, 3539, 4003, 4013, 5122, 5131, 5143, 5144, 5147 to 5152, 5158, 5171, 5173, 5176, 5177, 5179 to 5188, 5201, 7704, and 9601 of this title, sections 1421, 1427, 1427a, 1961, 1964, and 2014 of Title 7, Agriculture, sections 1706c, 1709, and 1715l of Title 12, Banks and Banking, section 636 of Title 15, Commerce and Trade, sections 1536 and 3505 of Title 16, Conservation, sections 241–1 and 646 of Title 20, Education, section 125 of Title 23, Highways, sections 165, 5064, and 5708 of Title 26, Internal Revenue Code, section 701n of Title 33, Navigation and Navigable Waters, and former section 1820 of Title 38, Veterans' Benefits, repealing sections 5142, 5145, 5146, 5175, and 5202 of this title and former sections 5141, 5153 to 5157, 5172, 5174, 5178, and 5189 of this title, enacting provisions set out as notes under sections 3231, 5121, 5122, and 5201 of this title, amending provisions set out as a note under this section and section 1681 of Title 48, Territories and Insular Possessions, and repealing provisions set out as notes under section 5121 and former section 5178 of this title] may be cited as 'The Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Amendments of 1988'."

1980 Amendments. Pub.L. 96–568, § 1, Dec. 22, 1980, 94 Stat. 3334, provided: "That this Act [amending former section 5202 of this title] may be cited as the 'Disaster Relief Act Amendments of 1980'."

1974 Acts. Section 1 of Pub.L. 93–288, as amended by Pub.L. 100–707, Title I, § 102(a), Nov. 23, 1988, 102 Stat. 4689, provided: "That this Act [enacting this section and sections 3231 to 3236, 5122, 5131, 5132, 5141 to 5158, 5171 to 5189, 5201, and former 5202 of this title, and section 1264 of former Title 31, Money and Finance, amending sections 1706c, 1709, 1715l of Title 12, Banks and Banking, sections 241–1, 646, 758 of Title 20, Education, sections 165, 5064, 5708 of Title 26, Internal Revenue Code, former section 1820 of Title 38, Veterans' Bene-Stafford Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Act.' "

Declared Disasters and Emergencies Not Affected

Section 112 of Title I of Pub.L. 100–707 provided that: "This title [see Short Title of 1988 Amendments note under this section] shall not affect the administration of any assistance for a major disaster or emergency declared by the President before the date of the enactment of this Act [Nov. 23, 1988]."

Recommendations Concerning Improvement of Relationships Among Disaster Management Officials

Section 110 of Pub.L. 100–707 provided that: "Not later than 1 year after the date of the enactment of this Act [Nov. 23, 1988], the President shall recommend to the Congress proposals to improve the operational and fiscal relationships that exist among Federal, State, and local major disaster and emergency management officials. Such proposals should include provisions which—

"(1) decrease the amount of time for processing requests for major disaster and emergency declarations and providing Federal assistance for major disasters and emergencies;

"(2) provide for more effective utilization of State and local resources in major disaster and emergency relief efforts; and

"(3) improve the timeliness of reimbursement of State and local governments after the submission of necessary documentation."

[Functions of President under section 110 of Pub.L. 100–707 delegated to Director of Federal Emergency Management Agency by section 4 of Ex. Ord. 12673, Mar. 23, 1989, 54 F.R. 12571, set out as a note under section 2251 of Title 50, Appendix, War and National Defense.]

References to Disaster Relief Act of 1970

Section 702(m), formerly section 602(m) of Pub.L. 93–288, renumbered section 702(m) of Pub.L. 103–337, Div. A, Title XXXIV, § 3411(a)(2), Oct. 5, 1994, 108 Stat. 3100, provided that: "Whenever reference is made in any provision of law (other than this Act [the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, see Short Title of 1974 Acts note under this section]), regulation, rule, record, or document of the United States to provisions of the Disaster Relief Act of 1970 (84 Stat. 1744), repealed by this Act such reference shall be deemed to be a reference to the appropriate provision of this Act."

References to Disaster Relief Act of 1974

Section 102(b) of Title I of Pub.L. 100–707 provided that: "Whenever any reference is made in any law (other than this Act [see Tables for classification]), regulation, document, rule, record, or other paper of the United States to a section or provision of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974 [former short title of Pub.L. 93–288], such reference shall be deemed to be a reference to such section or provision of the Robert T. Stafford Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Act [Pub.L. 93–288, see Short Title of 1974 Acts note under this section]."

lation of Disaster Relief Act by Federal Emergency Management Agency, in view of express will of Congress that Act provide federal assistance to state and local governments in carrying out their responsibilities to alleviate suffering and damages and governor's interest in assuring that state's citizens were not denied full benefit of federal law designed to address unemployment caused by disaster. State of Kan. ex rel. Hayden v. U.S., D.Kan. 1990, 748 F.Supp. 797, on reconsideration 751 F.Supp. 1495, affirmed 953 F.2d 1392.

§ 5122. Definitions

As used in this chapter—

(1) Emergency

"Emergency" means any occasion or instance for which, in the determination of the President, Federal assistance is needed to supplement State and local efforts and capabilities to save lives and to protect property and public health and safety, or to lessen or avert the threat of a catastrophe in any part of the United States.

(2) Major disaster

"Major disaster" means any natural catastrophe (including any hurricane, tornado, storm, high water, winddriven water, tidal wave, tsunami, earthquake, volcanic eruption, landslide, mudslide, snowstorm, or drought), or, regardless of cause, any fire, flood, or explosion, in any part of the United States, which in the determination of the President causes damage of sufficient severity and magnitude to warrant major disaster assistance under this chapter to supplement the efforts and available resources of States, local governments, and disaster relief organizations in alleviating the damage, loss, hardship, or suffering caused thereby.

(3) "United States" means the fifty States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

(4) "State" means any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Northern Mariana Islands, or the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

(5) "Governor" means the chief executive of any State.

(6) "Local government" means (A) any county, city, village, town, district, or other political subdivision of any State, any Indian tribe or authorized tribal organization, or Alaska Native village or organization, and (B) includes any rural community or unincorporated town or village or any other public entity for which an application for assistance is made by a State or political subdivision thereof.

(7) "Federal agency" means any department, independent establishment, Government corporation, or other agency of the executive branch of the Federal Government, including the United States Postal Service, but shall not include the American National Red Cross.

(8) Public facility

"Public facility" means the following facilities owned by a State or local government:

(A) Any flood control, navigation, irrigation, reclamation, public power, sewage treatment and collection, water supply and distribution, watershed development, or airport facility.

(B) Any non-Federal-aid street, road, or highway.

(C) Any other public building, structure, or system, including those used for educational, recreational, or cultural purposes.

(D) Any park.

(9) Private nonprofit facility

"Private nonprofit facility" means private nonprofit educational, utility, emergency, medical, rehabilitational, and temporary or permanent custodial care facilities (including those for the aged and disabled), other private nonprofit facilities which provide essential services of a governmental nature to the general public, and facilities on Indian reservations as defined by the President.

Amendments

1992 Amendments. Pars. (3), (4). Pub.L. 102–247 inserted "the Northern Mariana Islands,".

1988 Amendments. Par. (1). Pub.L. 100–707, § 103(b), inserted the heading "Emergency" and substituted a clarified and generalized definition for the term "emergency" previously meaning "any hurricane, tornado, storm, flood, high water, wind-driven water, tidal wave, tsunami, earthquake, volcanic eruption, landslide, mudslide, snowstorm, drought, fire, explosion, or other catastrophe in any part of the United States which requires Federal emergency assistance to supplement State and local efforts to save lives and protect property, public health and safety or to avert or lessen the threat of a disaster".

Par. (2). Pub.L. 100–707, § 103(c), inserted the heading "Major Disaster" and amended text generally. Prior to amendment, text read as follows: "'Major disaster' means any hurricane, tornado, storm, flood, high water, wind-driven water, tidal wave, tsunami, earthquake, volcanic eruption, landslide, mudslide, snowstorm, drought, fire, explosion, or other catastrophe in any part of the United States which, in the determination of the President, causes damage of sufficient severity and magnitude to warrant major disaster assistance under this chapter, above and beyond emergency services by the Federal Government, to supplement the efforts and available resources of States, local governments, and disaster relief organizations in alleviating the damage, loss, hardship, or suffering caused thereby."

Pars. (3), (4). Pub.L. 100–707, § 103(d), excluded the Canal Zone from the definition of the terms "United States" and "State".

Pars. (8), (9). Pub.L. 100–707, § 103(f), added pars. (8) and (9).

Local Government

Section 103(e) of Pub.L. 100–707 provided that:

"(1) In general.—The term 'local government' is deemed to have the same meaning in the Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Act [Pub.L. 93–288; see Short Title of 1974 Acts note under section 5121 of this title], as amended by this Act [Pub.L. 100–707; see Short Title of 1988 Amendments note under section 5121 of this title], as that term had on October 1, 1988, under section 102(6) of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974 [par. (6) of this section] and regulations implementing the Disaster Relief Act of 1974 [42 U.S.C.A. § 5121 et seq.].

"(2) Termination of effectiveness.—Paragraph (1) shall not be effective on and after the 90th day after the President transmits to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation of the House of Representatives and to the Committee on Environment and Public Works of the Senate a report which includes an interpretation of the term 'local government' for purposes of the Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Act, as amended by this Act."

[Functions of President under section 103(e)(2) of Pub.L. 100–707 delegated to Director of Federal Emergency Management Agency by section 3 of Ex. Ord. No. 12673, Mar. 23, 1989, 54 F.R. 12571, set out as a note under section 2251 of Title 50, Appendix, War and National Defense.]

NOTES OF DECISIONS

Emergency
Generally 1
Immigration 2

1. Emergency—Generally

Definition of "emergency" in this section did not support the application of this chapter to Cuban and Haitian refugee situation in Florida; the definition encompasses only natural disasters; accordingly, the provisions of § 4332 of this title were not inapplicable. Colon v. Carter, D.C.Puerto Rico 1980, 507 F.Supp. 1026, vacated on other grounds 633 F.2d 964.

2. —— Immigration

It is within the discretion of the President to determine whether an immigration emergency so threatens property or human life as to fall within the scope of this chapter. 1982 (Counsel–Inf.Op.) 6 Op.O.L.C. 708.

SUBCHAPTER II—DISASTER PREPAREDNESS ASSISTANCE

§ 5131. Federal and State disaster preparedness programs

(a) Utilization of services of other agencies

The President is authorized to establish a program of disaster preparedness that utilizes services of all appropriate agencies and includes—

(1) preparation of disaster preparedness plans for mitigation, warning, emergency operations, rehabilitation, and recovery;

(2) training and exercises;

(3) postdisaster critiques and evaluations;

(4) annual review of programs;

(5) coordination of Federal, State, and local preparedness programs;

(6) application of science and technology;

(7) research.

(b) Technical assistance for development of plans and programs

The President shall provide technical assistance to the States in developing comprehensive plans and practicable programs for preparation against disasters, including hazard reduction, avoidance, and mitigation; for assistance to individuals, businesses, and State and local governments following such disasters; and for recovery of damaged or destroyed public and private facilities.

(c) Grants to States for development of plans and programs

Upon application by a State, the President is authorized to make grants, not to exceed in the aggregate to such State $250,000, for the development of plans, programs, and capabilities for disaster preparedness and prevention. Such grants shall be applied for within one year from May 22, 1974. Any State desiring financial assistance under this section shall designate or create an agency to plan and administer such a disaster preparedness program, and shall, through such agency, submit a State plan to the President, which shall—

(1) set forth a comprehensive and detailed State program for preparation against and assistance following, emergencies and major disasters, including provisions for assistance to individuals, businesses, and local governments; and

(2) include provisions for appointment and training of appropriate staffs, formulation of necessary regulations and procedures and conduct of required exercises.

NOTES OF DECISIONS

Disaster assistance agreements 1

---

1. Disaster assistance agreements

Disaster assistance agreement was binding contract which obligated United States to provide such assistance as was called for therein. State of Tex., v. U.S., 1976, 537 F.2d 466, 210 Ct.Cl. 522.

§ 5132. Disaster warnings

(a) Readiness of Federal agencies to issue warnings to State and local officials

The President shall insure that all appropriate Federal agencies are prepared to issue warnings of disasters to State and local officials.

(b) Technical assistance to State and local governments for effective warnings

The President shall direct appropriate Federal agencies to provide technical assistance to State and local governments to insure that timely and effective disaster warning is provided.

(c) Warnings to governmental authorities and public endangered by disaster

The President is authorized to utilize or to make available to Federal, State, and local agencies the facilities of the civil defense communications system established and maintained pursuant to section 5196(c) of this title, or any other Federal communications system for the purpose of providing warning to governmental authorities and the civilian population in areas endangered by disasters.

(d) Agreements with commercial communications systems for use of facilities

The President is authorized to enter into agreements with the officers or agents of any private or commercial communications systems who volunteer the use of their systems on a reimbursable or nonreimbursable basis for the purpose of providing warning to governmental authorities and the civilian population endangered by disasters.

SUBCHAPTER III—MAJOR DISASTER AND EMERGENCY ASSISTANCE ADMINISTRATION

§ 5141. Waiver of administrative conditions

Any Federal agency charged with the administration of a Federal assistance program may, if so requested by the applicant State or local authorities, modify or waive, for a major disaster, such administrative conditions for assistance as would otherwise prevent the giving of assistance under such programs if the inability to meet such conditions is a result of the major disaster.

NOTES OF DECISIONS

1. Rules and regulations

Regulatory 30–day submission requirement promulgated by the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), within which request for declaration of major disaster under the Disaster Relief Act had to be submitted, was valid; submission requirement was reasonably related to administrative enforcement of Act and was not contrary to any provision of Act. State of Kan. ex rel. Hayden v. U.S., D.Kan.1990, 751 F.Supp. 1495, affirmed 953 F.2d 1392.

§ 5142. Repealed. Pub.L. 100–707, Title I, § 105(a)(2), Nov. 23, 1988, 102 Stat. 4691

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Section, Pub.L. 93–288, Title III, § 302, May 22, 1974, 88 Stat. 146, related to Federal assistance and its coordination with State and local disaster assistance.

§ 5143. Coordinating officers

(a) Appointment of Federal coordinating officer

Immediately upon his declaration of a major disaster or emergency, the President shall appoint a Federal coordinating officer to operate in the affected area.

(b) Functions of Federal coordinating officer

In order to effectuate the purposes of this chapter, the Federal coordinating officer, within the affected area, shall—

(1) make an initial appraisal of the types of relief most urgently needed;

(2) establish such field offices as he deems necessary and as are authorized by the President;

(3) coordinate the administration of relief, including activities of the State and local governments, the American National Red Cross, the Salvation Army, the Mennonite Disaster Service, and other relief or disaster assistance organizations, which agree to operate under his advice or direction, except that nothing contained in this chapter shall limit or in any way affect the responsibilities of the American National Red Cross under the Act of January 5, 1905, as amended (33 Stat. 599) [36 U.S.C.A. § 1 et seq.]; and

(4) take such other action, consistent with authority delegated to him by the President, and consistent with the provisions of this chapter, as he may deem necessary to assist local citizens and public officials in promptly obtaining assistance to which they are entitled.

(c) State coordinating officer

When the President determines assistance under this chapter is necessary, he shall request that the Governor of the affected State designate a State coordinating officer for the purpose of coordinating State and local disaster assistance efforts with those of the Federal Government.

NOTES OF DECISIONS

Declarations of disaster 2
Presidential decisions 3
Regulation promulgation 1

1. Regulation promulgation

Section of Disaster Relief Act precluding judicial review of disaster relief claims based upon discretionary actions of federal employees precluded review of claim that regulation restricting disaster unemployment benefits to those actually working or scheduled to work at time of disaster was an improper interpretation of relevant federal regulations; promulgation of challenged regulation was exactly the sort of exercise of discretion that Congress intended to insulate from judicial review. Rosas v. Brock, C.A.11 (Fla.) 1987, 826 F.2d 1004.

2. Declarations of disaster

Any decision of Federal Emergency Management Agency or its officials not to submit to President governor's request for "major disaster" declaration, which complied with procedural requirements, would be beyond their discretion and their statutory authority, and would be subject to judicial review. State of Kan. ex rel. Hayden v. U.S., D.Kan.1990, 748 F.Supp. 797, on reconsideration 751 F.Supp. 1495, affirmed 953 F.2d 1392.

3. Presidential decisions

President's decision on request for declaration of "major disaster" was not subject to judicial review, as decision involved discretionary function statutorily precluded from judicial review; therefore, district court lacked subject matter jurisdiction over governor's claims seeking to challenge denial of request for declaration of major disaster. State of Kan. ex rel. Hayden v. U.S., D.Kan.1990, 748 F.Supp. 797, on reconsideration 751 F.Supp. 1495, affirmed 953 F.2d 1392.

§ 5149. Performance of services

(a) Utilization of services or facilities of State and local governments

In carrying out the purposes of this chapter, any Federal agency is authorized to accept and utilize the services or facilities of any State or local government, or of any agency, office, or employee thereof, with the consent of such government.

(b) Appointment of temporary personnel, experts, and consultants; acquisition, rental, or hire of equipment, services, materials and supplies

In performing any services under this chapter, any Federal agency is authorized—

(1) to appoint and fix the compensation of such temporary personnel as may be necessary, without regard to the provisions of Title 5 governing appointments in competitive service;

(2) to employ experts and consultants in accordance with the provisions of section 3109 of such Title, without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such

Title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates; and

(3) to incur obligations on behalf of the United States by contract or otherwise for the acquisition, rental, or hire of equipment, services, materials, and supplies for shipping, drayage, travel, and communications, and for the supervision and administration of such activities. Such obligations, including obligations arising out of the temporary employment of additional personnel, may be incurred by an agency in such amount as may be made available to it by the President.

§ 5150. Use of local firms and individuals

In the expenditure of Federal funds for debris clearance, distribution of supplies, reconstruction, and other major disaster or emergency assistance activities which may be carried out by contract or agreement with private organizations, firms, or individuals, preference shall be given, to the extent feasible and practicable, to those organizations, firms, and individuals residing or doing business primarily in the area affected by such major disaster or emergency. § 5151. Nondiscrimination in disaster assistance

(a) Regulations for equitable and impartial relief operations

The President shall issue, and may alter and amend, such regulations as may be necessary for the guidance of personnel carrying out Federal assistance functions at the site of a major disaster or emergency. Such regulations shall include provisions for insuring that the distribution of supplies, the processing of applications, and other

AMERICAN UNIVERSITY
REV_00255620

(B) Deadline for submission

The recommendations under subparagraph (A) shall be submitted to the President not later than October 1, 2001, and each October 1st thereafter or such later date in the year as the President may establish.

(C) Criteria

In making recommendations under subparagraph (A), a Governor shall consider the criteria specified in subsection (g).

(2) Use

(A) In general

Except as provided in subparagraph (B), in providing assistance to local governments under this section, the President shall select from local governments recommended by the Governors under this subsection.

(B) Extraordinary circumstances

In providing assistance to local governments under this section, the President may select a local government that has not been recommended by a Governor under this subsection if the President determines that extraordinary circumstances justify the selection and that making the selection will further the purpose of this section.

(3) Effect of failure to nominate

If a Governor of a State fails to submit recommendations under this subsection in a timely manner, the President may select, subject to the criteria specified in subsection (g), any local governments of the State to receive assistance under this section.

(e) Uses of technical and financial assistance

(1) In general

Technical and financial assistance provided under this section—

(A) shall be used by States and local governments principally to implement predisaster hazard mitigation measures that are cost-effective and are described in proposals approved by the President under this section; and

(B) may be used—

(i) to support effective public-private natural disaster hazard mitigation partnerships;

(ii) to improve the assessment of a community's vulnerability to natural hazards; or

(iii) to establish hazard mitigation priorities, and an appropriate hazard mitigation plan, for a community.

(2) Dissemination

A State or local government may use not more than 10 percent of the financial assistance received by the State or local government under this section for a fiscal year to fund activities to disseminate information regarding cost-effective mitigation technologies.

(f) Allocation of funds

The amount of financial assistance made available to a State (including amounts made available to local governments of the State) under this section for a fiscal year—

(1) shall be not less than the lesser of—

(A) $500,000; or

(B) the amount that is equal to 1.0 percent of the total funds appropriated to carry out this section for the fiscal year;

(2) shall not exceed 15 percent of the total funds described in paragraph (1)(B); and

(3) shall be subject to the criteria specified in subsection (g).

(g) Criteria for assistance awards

In determining whether to provide technical and financial assistance to a State or local government under this section, the President shall take into account—

(1) the extent and nature of the hazards to be mitigated;

(2) the degree of commitment of the State or local government to reduce damages from future natural disasters;

(3) the degree of commitment by the State or local government to support ongoing non-Federal support for the hazard mitigation measures to be carried out using the technical and financial assistance;

(4) the extent to which the hazard mitigation measures to be carried out using the technical and financial assistance contribute to the mitigation goals and priorities established by the State;

(5) the extent to which the technical and financial assistance is consistent with other assistance provided under this chapter;

(6) the extent to which prioritized, cost-effective mitigation activities that produce meaningful and definable outcomes are clearly identified;

(7) if the State or local government has submitted a mitigation plan under section 5165 of this title, the extent to which the activities identified under paragraph (6) are consistent with the mitigation plan;

(8) the opportunity to fund activities that maximize net benefits to society;

(9) the extent to which assistance will fund mitigation activities in small impoverished communities; and

(10) such other criteria as the President establishes in consultation with State and local governments.

(h) Federal share

(1) In general

Financial assistance provided under this section may contribute up to 75 percent of the total cost of mitigation activities approved by the President.

(2) Small impoverished communities

Notwithstanding paragraph (1), the President may contribute up to 90 percent of the total cost of a mitigation activity carried out in a small impoverished community.

(i) National predisaster mitigation fund

(1) Establishment

The President may establish in the Treasury of the United States a fund to be known as the "National Predisaster Mitigation Fund", to be used in carrying out this section.

(2) Transfers to fund

There shall be deposited in the Fund—

(A) amounts appropriated to carry out this section, which shall remain available until expended; and

(B) sums available from gifts, bequests, or donations of services or property received by the President for the purpose of predisaster hazard mitigation.

(3) Expenditures from fund

Upon request by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury shall transfer from the Fund to the President such amounts as the President determines are necessary to provide technical and financial assistance under this section.

(4) Investment of amounts

(A) In general

The Secretary of the Treasury shall invest such portion of the Fund as is not, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, required to meet current withdrawals. Investments may be made only in interest-bearing obligations of the United States.

REV_00255576

relief and assistance activities shall be accomplished in an equitable and impartial manner, without discrimination on the grounds of race, color, religion, nationality, sex, age, or economic status.

(b) Compliance with regulations as prerequisite to participation by other bodies in relief operations

As a condition of participation in the distribution of assistance or supplies under this chapter or of receiving assistance under this chapter, governmental bodies and other organizations shall be required to comply with regulations relating to nondiscrimination promulgated by the President, and such other regulations applicable to activities within an area affected by a major disaster or emergency as he deems necessary for the effective coordination of relief efforts.

§ 5152. Utilization of relief organizations

(a) Personnel and facilities

In providing relief and assistance under this chapter, the President may utilize, with their consent, the personnel and facilities of the American National Red Cross, the Salvation Army, the Mennonite Disaster Service, and other relief or disaster assistance organizations, in the distribution of medicine, food, supplies, or other items, and in the restoration, rehabilitation, or reconstruction of community services housing and essential facilities, whenever the President finds that such utilization is necessary.

(b) Coordination

The President is authorized to enter into agreements with the American National Red Cross, the Salvation Army, the Mennonite Disaster Service, and other relief or disaster assistance organizations under which the disaster relief activities of such organizations may be coordinated by the Federal coordinating officer whenever such organizations are engaged in providing relief during and after a major disaster or emergency. Any such agreement shall include provisions assuring that use of Federal facilities, supplies, and services will be in compliance with regulations prohibiting duplication of benefits and guaranteeing nondiscrimination promulgated by the President under this chapter, and such other regulation as the President may require.

§ 5153. Priority to certain applications for public facility and public housing assistance

(a) Priority

In the processing of applications for assistance, priority and immediate consideration shall be given by the head of the appropriate Federal agency, during such period as the President shall prescribe, to applications from public bodies situated in areas affected by major disasters under the following Acts:

(1) The United States Housing Act of 1937 [42 U.S.C.A. § 1437 et seq.] for the provision of low-income housing.

(2) Section 462 of Title 40 for assistance in public works planning.

(3) The Community Development Block Grant Program under title I of the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974 [42 U.S.C.A. § 5301 et seq.].

(4) Section 1926 of Title 7.

(5) The Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965 [42 U.S.C.A. § 3121 et seq.].

(6) The Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965.

(7) The Federal Water Pollution Control Act [33 U.S.C.A. § 1251 et seq.].

(b) Obligation of certain discretionary funds

In the obligation of discretionary funds or funds which are not allocated among the States or political subdivisions of a State, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development and the Secretary of Commerce shall give priority to applications for projects for major disaster areas.

§ 5154. Insurance

(a) Applicants for replacement of damaged facilities

(1) Compliance with certain regulations

An applicant for assistance under section 5172 of this title (relating to repair, restoration, and replacement of damaged facilities), section 5189 of this title (relating to simplified procedure) or section 3233 of this title shall comply with regulations prescribed by the President to assure that, with respect to any property to be replaced, restored, repaired, or constructed with such assistance, such types and extent of insurance will be obtained and maintained as may be reasonably available, adequate, and necessary, to protect against future loss to such property.

(2) Determination

In making a determination with respect to availability, adequacy, and necessity under paragraph (1), the President shall not require greater types and extent of insurance than are certified to him as reasonable by the appropriate State insurance commissioner responsible for regulation of such insurance.

(b) Maintenance of insurance

No applicant for assistance under section 5172 of this title (relating to repair, restoration, and replacement of damaged facilities), section 5189 of this title (relating to simplified procedure), or section 3233 of this title may receive such assistance for any property or part thereof for which the applicant has previously received assistance under this chapter unless all insurance required pursuant to this section has been obtained and maintained with respect to such property. The requirements of this subsection may not be waived under section 5141 of this title.

(c) State acting as self-insurer

A State may elect to act as a self-insurer with respect to any or all of the facilities owned by the State. Such an election, if declared in writing at the time of acceptance of assistance under section 5172 or 5189 of this title or 3233 of this title or subsequently and accompanied by a plan for self-insurance which is satisfactory to the President, shall be deemed compliance with subsection (a) of this section. No such self-insurer may receive assistance under section 5172 or 5189 of this title for any property or part thereof for which it has previously received assistance under this chapter, to the extent that insurance for such property or part thereof would have been reasonably available.

§ 5154a. Prohibited flood disaster assistance

(a) General prohibition

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no Federal disaster relief assistance made available in a flood disaster area may be used to make a payment (including any loan assistance payment) to a person for repair, replacement, or restoration for damage to any personal, residential, or commercial property if that person at any time has received flood disaster assistance that was conditional on the person first having obtained flood insurance under applicable Federal law and subsequently having failed to obtain and maintain flood insurance as required under applicable Federal law on such property.

(b) Transfer of property

(1) Duty to notify

In the event of the transfer of any property described in paragraph (3), the transferor shall, not later than the date on which such transfer occurs, notify the transferee in writing of the requirements to—

AMERICAN UNIVERSITY WASHINGTON COLLEGE OF LAW LIBRARY
REV_00255623

AMERICAN UNIVERSITY LAW LIBRARY
MYERS II BLDG

(A) obtain flood insurance in accordance with applicable Federal law with respect to such property, if the property is not so insured as of the date on which the property is transferred; and

(B) maintain flood insurance in accordance with applicable Federal law with respect to such property.

Such written notification shall be contained in documents evidencing the transfer of ownership of the property.

(2) Failure to notify

If a transferor described in paragraph (1) fails to make a notification in accordance with such paragraph and, subsequent to the transfer of the property—

(A) the transferee fails to obtain or maintain flood insurance in accordance with applicable Federal law with respect to the property,

(B) the property is damaged by a flood disaster, and

(C) Federal disaster relief assistance is provided for the repair, replacement, or restoration of the property as a result of such damage, the transferor shall be required to reimburse the Federal Government in an amount equal to the amount of the Federal disaster relief assistance provided with respect to the property.

(3) Property described

For purposes of paragraph (1), a property is described in this paragraph if it is personal, commercial, or residential property for which Federal disaster relief assistance made available in a flood disaster area has been provided, prior to the date on which the property is transferred, for repair, replacement, or restoration of the property, if such assistance was conditioned upon obtaining flood insurance in accordance with applicable Federal law with respect to such property.

(c) Omitted

(d) Definition

For purposes of this section, the term "flood disaster area" means an area with respect to which—

(1) the Secretary of Agriculture finds, or has found, to have been substantially affected by a natural disaster in the United States pursuant to section 1961(a) of Title 7; or

(2) the President declares, or has declared, the existence of a major disaster or emergency pursuant to the Robert T. Stafford Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Act (42 U.S.C. 5121 et seq.), as a result of flood conditions existing in or affecting that area.

(e) Effective date

This section and the amendments made by this section shall apply to disasters declared after September 23, 1994.

§ 5155. Duplication of benefits

(a) General prohibition

The President, in consultation with the head of each Federal agency administering any program providing financial assistance to persons, business concerns, or other entities suffering losses as a result of a major disaster or emergency, shall assure that no such person, business concern, or other entity will receive such assistance with respect to any part of such loss as to which he has received financial assistance under any other program or from insurance or any other source.

(b) Special rules

(1) Limitation

This section shall not prohibit the provision of Federal assistance to a person who is or may be entitled to receive benefits for the same purposes from another source if such person has not received such other benefits by the time of application for Federal assistance and if such person agrees to repay all duplicative assistance to the agency providing the Federal assistance.

REV_00255624

AMERICAN UNIVERSITY LAW LIBRARY
WASHINGTON, D.C.

(2) Procedures

The President shall establish such procedures as the President considers necessary to ensure uniformity in preventing duplication of benefits.

(3) Effect of partial benefits

Receipt of partial benefits for a major disaster or emergency shall not preclude provision of additional Federal assistance for any part of a loss or need for which benefits have not been provided.

(c) Recovery of duplicative benefits

A person receiving Federal assistance for a major disaster or emergency shall be liable to the United States to the extent that such assistance duplicates benefits available to the person for the same purpose from another source. The agency which provided the duplicative assistance shall collect such duplicative assistance from the recipient in accordance with chapter 37 of Title 31, relating to debt collection, when the head of such agency considers it to be in the best interest of the Federal Government.

(d) Assistance not income

Federal major disaster and emergency assistance provided to individuals and families under this chapter, and comparable disaster assistance provided by States, local governments, and disaster assistance organizations, shall not be considered as income or a resource when determining eligibility for or benefit levels under federally funded income assistance or resource-tested benefit programs.

§ 5157. Penalties

(a) Misuse of funds

Any person who knowingly misapplies the proceeds of a loan or other cash benefit obtained under this chapter shall be fined an amount equal to one and one-half times the misapplied amount of the proceeds or cash benefit.

(b) Civil enforcement

Whenever it appears that any person has violated or is about to violate any provision of this chapter, including any civil penalty imposed under this chapter, the Attorney General may bring a civil action for such relief as may be appropriate. Such action may be brought in an appropriate United States district court.

(c) Referral to Attorney General

The President shall expeditiously refer to the Attorney General for appropriate action any evidence developed in the performance of functions under this chapter that may warrant consideration for criminal prosecution.

(d) Civil penalty

Any individual who knowingly violates any order or regulation issued under this chapter shall be subject to a civil penalty of not more than $5,000 for each violation.

§ 5158. Availability of materials

The President is authorized, at the request of the Governor of an affected State, to provide for a survey of construction materials needed in the area affected by a major disaster on an emergency basis for housing repairs, replacement housing, public facilities repairs and replacement, farming operations, and business enterprises and to take appropriate action to assure the availability and fair distribution of needed materials, including, where possible, the allocation of such materials for a period of not more than one hundred and eighty days after such major disaster. Any allocation program shall be implemented by the President to the extent possible, by working with and through those companies which traditionally supply construction materials in the affected area. For the purposes of this section "construction materials" shall include building materials and materials required for repairing housing, replacement housing, public facilities repairs and replacement, and for normal farm and business operations.

§ 5160. Recovery of assistance

(a) Party liable

Any person who intentionally causes a condition for which Federal assistance is provided under this chapter or under any other Federal law as a result of a declaration of a major disaster or emergency under this chapter shall be liable to the United States for the reasonable costs incurred by the United States in responding to such disaster or emergency to the extent that such costs are attributable to the intentional act or omission of such person which caused such condition. Such action for reasonable costs shall be brought in an appropriate United States district court.

(b) Rendering of care

A person shall not be liable under this section for costs incurred by the United States as a result of actions taken or omitted by such person in the course of rendering care or assistance in response to a major disaster or emergency.

§ 5162. Advance of non-Federal share

(a) In general

The President may lend or advance to an eligible applicant or a State the portion of assistance for which the State is responsible under the cost-sharing provisions of this chapter in any case in which—

(1) the State is unable to assume its financial responsibility under such cost-sharing provisions—

(A) with respect to concurrent, multiple major disasters in a jurisdiction, or

(B) after incurring extraordinary costs as a result of a particular disaster; and

(2) the damages caused by such disasters or disaster are so overwhelming and severe that it is not possible for the applicant or the State to assume immediately their financial responsibility under this chapter.

(b) Terms of loans and advances

(1) In general

Any loan or advance under this section shall be repaid to the United States.

(2) Interest

Loans and advances under this section shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current market yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States with remaining periods to maturity comparable to the reimbursement period of the loan or advance.

(c) Regulations

The President shall issue regulations describing the terms and conditions under which any loan or advance authorized by this section may be made.

SUBCHAPTER IV—MAJOR DISASTER ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

§ 5170. Procedure for declaration

All requests for a declaration by the President that a major disaster exists shall be made by the Governor of the affected State. Such a request shall be based on a finding that the disaster is of such severity and magnitude that effective response is beyond the capabilities of the State and the affected local governments and that Federal assistance is necessary. As part of such request, and as a prerequisite to major disaster assistance under this chapter, the Governor shall take appropriate response action under State law and direct execution of the State's emergency plan. The Governor shall furnish information on the nature and amount of State and local resources which have been or will be committed to alleviating the results of the disaster, and shall certify that, for the current disaster, State and local government obligations and expenditures (of which State commitments must be a significant proportion) will comply with all applicable cost-sharing requirements of this chapter. Based on the request of a Governor under this section, the President may declare under this chapter that a major disaster or emergency exists.

§ 5170a. General Federal assistance

In any major disaster, the President may—

(1) direct any Federal agency, with or without reimbursement, to utilize its authorities and the resources granted to it under Federal law (including personnel, equipment, supplies, facilities, and managerial, technical, and advisory services) in support of State and local assistance efforts;

(2) coordinate all disaster relief assistance (including voluntary assistance) provided by Federal agencies, private organizations, and State and local governments;

(3) provide technical and advisory assistance to affected State and local governments for—

(A) the performance of essential community services;

(B) issuance of warnings of risks and hazards;

(C) public health and safety information, including dissemination of such information;

(D) provision of health and safety measures; and

(E) management, control, and reduction of immediate threats to public health and safety; and

(4) assist State and local governments in the distribution of medicine, food, and other consumable supplies, and emergency assistance.

§ 5170b. Essential assistance

(a) In general

Federal agencies may on the direction of the President, provide assistance essential to meeting immediate threats to life and property resulting from a major disaster, as follows:

(1) Federal resources, generally

Utilizing, lending, or donating to State and local governments Federal equipment, supplies, facilities, personnel, and other resources, other than the extension of credit, for use or distribution by such governments in accordance with the purposes of this chapter.

(2) Medicine, food, and other consumables

Distributing or rendering through State and local governments, the American National Red Cross, the Salvation Army, the Mennonite Disaster Service, and other relief and disaster assistance organizations medicine, food, and other consumable supplies, and other services and assistance to disaster victims.

(3) Work and services to save lives and protect property

Performing on public or private lands or waters any work or services essential to saving lives and protecting and preserving property or public health and safety, including—

REV_00255630

(B) Acquisition of obligations

For the purpose of investments under subparagraph (A), obligations may be acquired—

(i) on original issue at the issue price; or

(ii) by purchase of outstanding obligations at the market price.

(C) Sale of obligations

Any obligation acquired by the Fund may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury at the market price.

(D) Credits to fund

The interest on, and the proceeds from the sale or redemption of, any obligations held in the Fund shall be credited to and form a part of the Fund.

(E) Transfers of amounts

(i) In general

The amounts required to be transferred to the Fund under this subsection shall be transferred at least monthly from the general fund of the Treasury to the Fund on the basis of estimates made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

(ii) Adjustments

Proper adjustment shall be made in amounts subsequently transferred to the extent prior estimates were in excess of or less than the amounts required to be transferred.

(j) Limitation on total amount of financial assistance

The President shall not provide financial assistance under this section in an amount greater than the amount available in the Fund.

(k) Multihazard advisory maps

(1) Definition of multihazard advisory map

In this subsection, the term "multihazard advisory map" means a map on which hazard data concerning each type of natural disaster is identified simultaneously for the purpose of showing areas of hazard overlap.

(2) Development of maps

In consultation with States, local governments, and appropriate Federal agencies, the President shall develop multihazard advisory maps for areas, in not fewer than five States, that are subject to commonly recurring natural hazards (including flooding, hurricanes and severe winds, and seismic events).

(3) Use of technology

In developing multihazard advisory maps under this subsection, the President shall use, to the maximum extent practicable, the most cost-effective and efficient technology available.

(4) Use of maps

(A) Advisory nature

The multihazard advisory maps shall be considered to be advisory and shall not require the development of any new policy by, or impose any new policy on, any government or private entity.

(B) Availability of maps

The multihazard advisory maps shall be made available to the appropriate State and local governments for the purposes of—

(i) informing the general public about the risks of natural hazards in the areas described in paragraph (2);

(ii) supporting the activities described in subsection (e); and

(iii) other public uses.

(l) Report on Federal and State administration

Not later than 18 months after October 30, 2000, the President, in consultation with State and local governments, shall submit to Congress a report evaluating efforts to implement this section and recommending a process for transferring greater authority and responsibility for administering the assistance program established under this section to capable States.

(m) Termination of authority

The authority provided by this section terminates December 31, 2003.

(Pub.L. 93–288, Title II, § 203, as added Pub.L. 106–390, Title I, § 102(a), Oct. 30, 2000, 114 Stat. 1553.)

Findings and Purpose

Pub.L. 106–390, Title I, § 101, Oct. 30, 2000, 114 Stat. 1552, provided that:

"(a) Findings.—Congress finds that—

"(1) natural disasters, including earthquakes, tsunamis, tornadoes, hurricanes, flooding, and wildfires, pose great danger to human life and to property throughout the United States;

"(2) Greater emphasis needs to be placed on—

"(A) identifying and assessing the risks to States and local governments (including Indian tribes) from natural disasters;

"(B) implementing adequate measures to reduce losses from natural disasters; and

"(C) ensuring that the critical services and facilities of communities will continue to function after a natural disaster;

"(3) expenditures for postdisaster assistance are increasing without commensurate reductions in the likelihood of future losses from natural disasters;

"(4) In the expenditure of Federal funds under the Robert T. Stafford Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Act (42 U.S.C. 5121 et seq.), high priority should be given to mitigation of hazards at the local level; and

"(5) With a unified effort of economic incentives, awareness and education, technical assistance, and demonstrated Federal support, States and local Governments (including indian tribes) will be able to—

"(A) form effective community-based partnerships for hazard mitigation purposes;

"(B) implement effective hazard mitigation measures that reduce the potential damage from natural disasters;

"(C) ensure continued functionality of critical services;

"(D) leverage additional non-Federal resources in meeting natural disaster resistance goals; and

"(E) make commitments to long-term hazard mitigation efforts to be applied to new and existing structures.

"(b) Purpose.—The purpose of this title [Title I of Pub.L. 106–390, Oct. 30, 2000, 114 Stat. 1552, which enacted this section and sections 5134, 5165, and 5165a of this title, amended section 5170c of this title, and repealed section 5176 of this title] is to establish a national disaster hazard mitigation program—

"(1) to reduce the loss of life and property, human suffering, economic disruption, and disaster assistance costs resulting from natural disasters; and

"(2) to provide a source of predisaster hazard mitigation funding that will assist States and local governments (including Indian tribes) in implementing effective hazard mitigation measures that are designed to ensure the continued functionality of critical services and facilities after a natural disaster."

(c) Utilization of DOD resources

(1) General rule

During the immediate aftermath of an incident which may ultimately qualify for assistance under this subchapter or subchapter IV–A of this chapter, the Governor of the State in which such incident occurred may request the President to direct the Secretary of Defense to utilize the resources of the Department of Defense for the purpose of performing on public and private lands any emergency work which is made necessary by such incident and which is essential for the preservation of life and property. If the President determines that such work is essential for the preservation of life and property, the President shall grant such request to the extent the President determines practicable. Such emergency work may only be carried out for a period not to exceed 10 days.

(2) Rules applicable to debris removal

Any removal of debris and wreckage carried out under this subsection shall be subject to section 5173(b) of this title, relating to unconditional authorization and indemnification for debris removal.

(3) Expenditures out of disaster relief funds

The cost of any assistance provided pursuant to this subsection shall be reimbursed out of funds made available to carry out this chapter.

(4) Federal share

The Federal share of assistance under this subsection shall be not less than 75 percent.

(5) Guidelines

Not later than 180 days after November 23, 1988, the President shall issue guidelines for carrying out this subsection. Such guidelines shall consider any likely effect assistance under this subsection will have on the availability of other forms of assistance under this chapter.

(6) Definitions

For purposes of this section—

(A) Department of Defense

The term "Department of Defense" has the meaning the term "department" has under section 101 of Title 10.

(B) Emergency work

The term "emergency work" includes clearance and removal of debris and wreckage and temporary restoration of essential public facilities and services.

§ 5170c. Hazard mitigation

(a) In general

The President may contribute up to 75 percent of the cost of hazard mitigation measures which the President has determined are cost-effective and which substantially reduce the risk of future damage, hardship, loss, or suffering in any area affected by a major disaster. Such measures shall be identified following the evaluation of natural hazards under section 5176 of this title and shall be subject to approval by the President. The total of contributions under this section for a major disaster shall not exceed 15 percent of the estimated aggregate amount of grants to be made (less any associated administrative costs) under this chapter with respect to the major disaster.

(b) Property acquisition and relocation assistance

(1) General authority

In providing hazard mitigation assistance under this section in connection with flooding, the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency may provide property acquisition and relocation assistance for projects that meet the requirements of paragraph (2).

(2) Terms and conditions

An acquisition or relocation project shall be eligible to receive assistance pursuant to paragraph (1) only if—

(A) the applicant for the assistance is otherwise eligible to receive assistance under the hazard mitigation grant program established under subsection (a) of this section; and

(B) on or after December 3, 1993, the applicant for the assistance enters into an agreement with the Director that provides assurances that—

(i) any property acquired, accepted, or from which a structure will be removed pursuant to the project will be dedicated and maintained in perpetuity for a use that is compatible with open space, recreational, or wetlands management practices;

(ii) no new structure will be erected on property acquired, accepted or from which a structure was removed under the acquisition or relocation program other than—

(I) a public facility that is open on all sides and functionally related to a designated open space;

(II) a rest room; or

(III) a structure that the Director approves in writing before the commencement of the construction of the structure; and

(iii) after receipt of the assistance, with respect to any property acquired, accepted or from which a structure was removed under the acquisition or relocation program—

(I) no subsequent application for additional disaster assistance for any purpose will be made by the recipient to any Federal entity; and

(II) no assistance referred to in subclause (I) will be provided to the applicant by any Federal source.

(3) Statutory construction

Nothing in this subsection is intended to alter or otherwise affect an agreement for an acquisition or relocation project carried out pursuant to this section that was in effect on the day before December 3, 1993.

§ 5171. Federal facilities

(a) Repair, reconstruction, restoration, or replacement of United States facilities

The President may authorize any Federal agency to repair, reconstruct, restore, or replace any facility owned by the United States and under the jurisdiction of such agency which is damaged or destroyed by any major disaster if he determines that such repair, reconstruction, restoration, or replacement is of such importance and urgency that it cannot reasonably be deferred pending the enactment of specific authorizing legislation or the making of an appropriation for such purposes, or the obtaining of congressional committee approval.

(b) Availability of funds appropriated to agency for repair, reconstruction, restoration, or replacement of agency facilities

In order to carry out the provisions of this section, such repair, reconstruction, restoration, or replacement may be begun notwithstanding a lack or an insufficiency of funds appropriated for such purpose, where such lack or insufficiency can be remedied by the transfer, in accordance with law, of funds appropriated to that agency for another purpose.

(c) Steps for mitigation of hazards

In implementing this section, Federal agencies shall evaluate the natural hazards to which these facilities are exposed and shall take appropriate action to mitigate such hazards, including safe land-use and construction practices, in accordance with standards prescribed by the President.

§ 5172. Repair, restoration, and replacement of damaged facilities

(a) Contributions

The President may make contributions—

(1) to a State or local government for the repair, restoration, reconstruction, or replacement of a public facility which is damaged or destroyed by a major disaster and for associated expenses incurred by such government; and

(2) to a person who owns or operates a private nonprofit facility damaged or destroyed by a major disaster for the repair,

AMERICAN UNIVERSITY LAW LIBRARY
MAYER, BROWN & PLATT

restoration, reconstruction, or replacement of such facility and for associated expenses incurred by such person.

(b) Minimum Federal share

The Federal share of assistance under this section shall be not less than—

(1) 75 percent of the net eligible cost of repair, restoration, reconstruction, or replacement carried out under this section;

(2) 100 percent of associated expenses described in subsections (f)(1) and (f)(2) of this section; and

(3) 75 percent of associated expenses described in subsections (f)(3), (f)(4), and (f)(5) of this section.

(c) Large in lieu contributions

(1) For public facilities

In any case where a State or local government determines that the public welfare would not be best served by repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing any public facility owned or controlled by such State or local government, it may elect to receive, in lieu of a contribution under subsection (a)(1) of this section, a contribution of not to exceed 90 percent of the Federal share of the Federal estimate of the cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing such facility and of associated expenses. Funds contributed under this subsection may be used to repair, restore, or expand other selected public facilities, to construct new facilities, or to fund hazard mitigation measures which the State or local government determines to be necessary to meet a need for governmental services and functions in the area affected by the major disaster.

(2) For private nonprofit facilities

In any case where a person who owns or operates a private nonprofit facility determines that the public welfare would not be best served by repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing such facility, such person may elect to receive, in lieu of a contribution under subsection (a)(2) of this section, a contribution of not to exceed 90 percent of the Federal share of the Federal estimate of the cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing such facility and of associated expenses. Funds contributed under this subsection may be used to repair, restore, or expand other selected private nonprofit facilities owned or operated by such person, to construct new private nonprofit facilities to be owned or operated by such person, or to fund hazard mitigation measures which such person determines to be necessary to meet a need for its services and functions in the area affected by the major disaster.

(3) Restriction on use for State or local contribution

Funds provided under this subsection shall not be used for any State or local government cost-sharing contribution required under this chapter.

(d) Flood insurance

(1) Reduction of Federal assistance

If a public facility or private nonprofit facility located in a special flood hazard area identified for more than 1 year by the Director pursuant to the National Flood Insurance Act of 1968 (42 U.S.C. 4001 et seq.) is damaged or destroyed, after the 180th day following November 23, 1988, by flooding in a major disaster and such facility is not covered on the date of such flooding by flood insurance, the Federal assistance which would otherwise be available under this section with respect to repair, restoration, reconstruction, and replacement of such facility and associated expenses shall be reduced in accordance with paragraph (2).

(2) Amount of reduction

The amount of a reduction in Federal assistance under this section with respect to a facility shall be the lesser of—

(A) the value of such facility on the date of the flood damage or destruction, or

(B) the maximum amount of insurance proceeds which would have been payable with respect to such facility if such facility had been covered by flood insurance under the National Flood Insurance Act of 1968 [42 U.S.C.A. § 4001 et seq.] on such date.

(3) Exception

Paragraphs (1) and (2) shall not apply to a private nonprofit facility which is not covered by flood insurance solely because of the local government's failure to participate in the flood insurance program established by the National Flood Insurance Act.

(4) Dissemination of information

The President shall disseminate information regarding the reduction in Federal assistance provided for by this subsection to State and local governments and the owners and operators of private nonprofit facilities who may be affected by such a reduction.

REV_00255634

(e) Net eligible cost

(1) General rule

For purposes of this section, the cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing a public facility or private nonprofit facility on the basis of the design of such facility as it existed immediately prior to the major disaster and in conformity with current applicable codes, specifications, and standards (including floodplain management and hazard mitigation criteria required by the President or by the Coastal Barrier Resources Act (16 U.S.C. 3501 et seq.)) shall, at a minimum, be treated as the net eligible cost of such repair, restoration, reconstruction, or replacement.

(2) Special rule

In any case in which the facility being repaired, restored, reconstructed, or replaced under this section was under construction on the date of the major disaster, the cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing such facility shall include, for purposes of this section, only those costs which, under the contract for such construction, are the owner's responsibility and not the contractor's responsibility.

(f) Associated expenses

For purposes of this section, associated expenses include the following:

(1) Necessary costs

Necessary costs of requesting, obtaining, and administering Federal assistance based on a percentage of assistance provided as follows:

(A) For an applicant whose net eligible costs equal less than $100,000, 3 percent of such net eligible costs.

(B) For an applicant whose net eligible costs equal $100,000 or more but less than $1,000,000, $3,000 plus 2 percent of such net eligible costs in excess of $100,000.

(C) For an applicant whose net eligible costs equal $1,000,000 or more but less than $5,000,000, $21,000 plus 1 percent of such net eligible costs in excess of $1,000,000.

(D) For an applicant whose net eligible costs equal $5,000,000 or more, $61,000 plus ½ percent of such net eligible costs in excess of $5,000,000.

(2) Extraordinary costs

Extraordinary costs incurred by a State for preparation of damage survey reports, final inspection reports, project applications, final audits, and related field inspections by State employees, including overtime pay and per diem and travel expenses of such employees, but not including pay for regular time of such employees, based on the total amount of assistance provided under sections 5170b, 5170c, 5172, 5173, 5192, and 5193 of this title in such State in connection with the major disaster as follows:

(A) If such total amount is less than $100,000, 3 percent of such total amount.

(B) If such total amount is $100,000 or more but less than $1,000,000, $3,000 plus 2 percent of such total amount in excess of $100,000.

(C) If such total amount is $1,000,000 or more but less than $5,000,000, $21,000 plus 1 percent of such total amount in excess of $1,000,000.

(D) If such total amount is $5,000,000 or more, $61,000 plus ½ percent of such total amount in excess of $5,000,000.

(3) Costs of National Guard

The costs of mobilizing and employing the National Guard for performance of eligible work.

(4) Costs of prison labor

The costs of using prison labor to perform eligible work, including wages actually paid, transportation to a worksite, and extraordinary costs of guards, food, and lodging.

(5) Other labor costs

Base and overtime wages for an applicant's employees and extra hires performing eligible work plus fringe benefits on such wages to the extent that such benefits were being paid before the disaster.

§ 5173. Debris removal

(a) Presidential authority

The President, whenever he determines it to be in the public interest, is authorized—

(1) through the use of Federal departments, agencies, and instrumentalities, to clear debris and wreckage resulting from a major disaster from publicly and privately owned lands and waters; and

(2) to make grants to any State or local government or owner or operator of a private nonprofit facility for the purpose of removing debris or wreckage resulting from a major disaster from publicly or privately owned lands and waters.

(b) Authorization by State or local government; indemnification agreement

No authority under this section shall be exercised unless the affected State or local government shall first arrange an unconditional authorization for removal of such debris or wreckage from public and private property, and, in the case of removal of debris or wreckage from private property, shall first agree to indemnify the Federal Government against any claim arising from such removal.

(c) Rules relating to large lots

The President shall issue rules which provide for recognition of differences existing among urban, suburban, and rural lands in implementation of this section so as to facilitate adequate removal of debris and wreckage from large lots.

(d) Federal share

The Federal share of assistance under this section shall be not less than 75 percent of the eligible cost of debris and wreckage removal carried out under this section.

§ 5174. Temporary housing assistance

(a) Provision of temporary housing

(1) In general

The President may—

(A) provide, by purchase or lease, temporary housing (including unoccupied habitable dwellings), suitable rental housing, mobile homes, or other readily fabricated dwellings to persons who, as a result of a major disaster, require temporary housing; and

(B) reimburse State and local governments in accordance with paragraph (4) for the cost of sites provided under paragraph (2).

(2) Mobile home site

(A) In general

Any mobile home or other readily fabricated dwelling provided under this section shall whenever possible be located on a site which—

(i) is provided by the State or local government; and

(ii) has utilities provided by the State or local government, by the owner of the site, or by the occupant who was displaced by the major disaster.

(B) Other sites

Mobile homes and other readily fabricated dwellings may be located on sites provided by the President if the President determines that such sites would be more economical or accessible than sites described in subparagraph (A).

(3) Period

Federal financial and operational assistance under this section shall continue for not longer than 18 months after the date of the major disaster declaration by the President, unless the President determines that due to extraordinary circumstances it would be in the public interest to extend such 18–month period.

(4) Federal share

The Federal share of assistance under this section shall be 100 percent; except that the Federal share of assistance under this section for construction and site development costs (including installation of utilities) at a mobile home group site shall be 75 percent of the eligible cost of such assistance. The State or local government receiving assistance under this section shall pay any cost which is not paid for from the Federal share.

(b) Temporary mortgage and rental payments

The President is authorized to provide assistance on a temporary basis in the form of mortgage or rental payments to or on behalf of individuals and families who, as a result of financial hardship caused by a major disaster, have received written notice of dispossession or eviction from a residence by reason of a foreclosure of any mortgage or lien, cancellation of any contract of sale, or termination of any lease, entered into prior to such disaster. Such assistance shall be provided for the duration of the period of financial hardship but not to exceed 18 months.

(c) In lieu expenditures

In lieu of providing other types of temporary housing after a major disaster, the President is authorized to make expenditures for the purpose of repairing or restoring to a habitable condition owner-occupied private residential structures made uninhabitable by a major disaster which are capable of being restored quickly to a habitable condition.

(d) Transfer of temporary housing

(1) Direct sale to occupants

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any temporary housing acquired by purchase may be sold directly to individuals and families who are occupants of temporary housing at prices that are fair and equitable, as determined by the President.

(2) Transfers to States, local governments, and voluntary organizations

The President may sell or otherwise make available temporary housing units directly to States, other governmental entities, and voluntary organizations. The President shall impose as a condition of transfer under this paragraph a covenant to comply with the provisions of section 5151 of this title requiring nondiscrimination in occupancy of such temporary housing units. Such disposition shall be limited to units purchased under the provisions of subsection (a) of this section and to the purposes of providing temporary housing for disaster victims in major disasters or emergencies.

(e) Notification

(1) In general

Each person who applies for assistance under this section shall be notified regarding the type and amount of any assistance for which such person qualifies. Whenever practicable, such notice shall be provided within 7 days after the date of submission of such application.

(2) Information

Notification under this subsection shall provide information regarding—

(A) all forms of such assistance available;

(B) any specific criteria which must be met to qualify for each type of assistance that is available;

(C) any limitations which apply to each type of assistance; and

(D) the address and telephone number of offices responsible for responding to—

(i) appeals of determinations of eligibility for assistance; and

(ii) requests for changes in the type or amount of assistance provided.

(f) Location

In providing assistance under this section, consideration shall be given to the location of and travel time to—

(1) the applicant's home and place of business;

(2) schools which the applicant or members of the applicant's family who reside with the applicant attend; and

(3) crops or livestock which the applicant tends in the course of any involvement in farming which provides 25 percent or more of the applicant's annual income.

NOTES OF DECISIONS

Unpublished policies, reliance upon 1

1. Unpublished policies, reliance upon

Hurricane victims' claim that reliance by Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) on "unpublished" policy to deny temporary housing assistance to otherwise eligible hurricane victims based on finding that another person in predisaster housing unit received assistance, without proof that applicant actually received such assistance, violated provision of Administrative Procedure Act (APA) was not within penumbra of district court's jurisdiction, since that policy was part and parcel of discretionary authority given to FEMA in Stafford Disaster Relief Act. § 5177. Unemployment assistance

(a) Benefit assistance

The President is authorized to provide to any individual unemployed as a result of a major disaster such benefit assistance as he deems appropriate while such individual is unemployed for the weeks of such unemployment with respect to which the individual is not entitled to any other unemployment compensation (as that term is defined in section 85(b) of Title 26) or waiting period credit. Such assistance as the President shall provide shall be available to an individual as long as the individual's unemployment caused by the major disaster continues or until the individual is reemployed in a suitable position, but no longer than 26 weeks after the major disaster is declared. Such assistance for a week of unemployment shall not exceed the maximum weekly amount authorized under the unemployment compensation law of the State in which the disaster occurred. The President is directed to provide such assistance through agreements with States which, in his judgment, have an adequate system for administering such assistance through existing State agencies.

(b) Reemployment assistance

(1) State assistance

A State shall provide, without reimbursement from any funds provided under this chapter, reemployment assistance services under any other law administered by the State to individuals receiving benefits under this section.

(2) Federal assistance

The President may provide reemployment assistance services under other laws to individuals who are unemployed as a result of a major disaster and who reside in a State which does not provide such services.

§ 5177a. Emergency grants to assist low-income migrant and seasonal farmworkers

(a) In general

The Secretary of Agriculture may make grants, not to exceed $20,000,000 annually, to public agencies or private organizations with tax exempt status under section 501(c)(3) of Title 26, that have experience in providing emergency services to low-income migrant and seasonal farmworkers where the Secretary determines that a local, State or national emergency or disaster has caused low-income migrant or seasonal farmworkers to lose income, to be unable to work, or to stay home or return home in anticipation of work shortages. Emergency services to be provided with assistance received under this section may include such types of assistance as the Secretary of Agriculture determines to be necessary and appropriate.

(b) "Low-income migrant or seasonal farmworker" defined

For the purposes of this section, the term "low-income migrant or seasonal farmworker" means an individual—

(1) who has, during any consecutive 12 month period within the preceding 24 month period, performed farm work for wages;

(2) who has received not less than one-half of such individual's total income, or been employed at least one-half of total work time in farm work; and

(3) whose annual family income within the 12 month period referred to in paragraph (1) does not exceed the higher of the poverty level or 70 percent of the lower living standard income level.

(c) Authorization of appropriations

There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out this section.

§ 5178. Individual and family grant programs

(a) In general

The President is authorized to make a grant to a State for the purpose of making grants to individuals or families adversely affected by a major disaster for meeting disaster-related necessary expenses or serious needs of such individuals or families in those cases where such individuals or families are unable to meet such expenses or needs through assistance under other provisions of this chapter or through other means.

(b) Cost sharing

(1) Federal share

The Federal share of a grant to an individual or a family under this section shall be equal to 75 percent of the actual cost incurred.

(2) State contribution

The Federal share of a grant under this section shall be paid only on condition that the remaining 25 percent of the cost is

REV_00255640

(b) Chairperson

The Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency shall serve as the chairperson of the task force.

(c) Membership

The membership of the task force shall include representatives of—

(1) relevant Federal agencies;

(2) State and local government organizations (including Indian tribes); and

(3) the American Red Cross.

NOTES OF DECISIONS

Discretionary function 5
Persons protected 4

4. Persons protected

Police officer who had been deputized, at request of Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), by United States Marshals Service in aftermath of hurricane, and who was involved in automobile accident while driving government vehicle in course of performing his duties of protecting FEMA workers and property, was not engaged in discretionary function at time of accident, and thus, officer and United States were not protected from liability under immunity provision of Disaster Relief Act; while FEMA's decision to establish disaster assistance centers was exercise of discretionary function, allegedly negligent operation of vehicle by government employee was performance of non-discretionary, operational function. Torres v. Government of the U.S. (Federal Emergency Management Agency and U.S. Marshal's Service), D.Virgin Islands 1997, 979 F.Supp. 1054.

5. Discretionary function

Stafford Act's discretionary function exception, which immunized federal government from liability arising out of its performance of discretionary function in providing disaster relief, did not apply to bar breach of contract claims asserted by trustee for owner of mobile home park and park's lessee-operator, based on alleged failure of Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and Army Corps of Engineers to ensure that cleanup of hurricane damage to park was conducted according to alleged contract; once FEMA entered into contract governing cleanup of park, its actions did not involve element of judgment or choice, but rather were mandated by agreed-upon standards. Dureiko v. U.S., C.A.Fed.2000, 209 F.3d 1345.

Property owner's breach of contract claims against the government arising from government contractor's removal of debris on the property after hurricane were barred under discretionary function exception of the Stafford Act precluding government liability for discretionary actions during disaster efforts authorized by the President pursuant to the Act. Sunrise Village Mobile Home Park, L.C. v. U.S., Fed.Cl.1998, 42 Fed.Cl. 392.

§ 5149. Performance of services

NOTES OF DECISIONS

Compensation 1

1. Compensation

As used in statute authorizing Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) to appoint and fix "compensation" of temporary personnel without regard to requirements of federal civil service laws, term "compensation" includes leave and holiday pay, and thus FEMA is authorized to set compensation for temporary Disaster Assistance Employees without regard to provisions of Federal Leave Act. Thiess v. Witt, C.A.Fed. (Dist.Col.) 1996, 100 F.3d 915, exceptions sustained in part.

§ 5154. Insurance

(a) Applicants for replacement of damaged facilities

(1) Compliance with certain regulations

An applicant for assistance under section 5172 of this title (relating to repair, restoration, and replacement of damaged facilities), section 5189 of this title (relating to simplified procedure) or section 3149(c)(2) of this title shall comply with regulations prescribed by the President to assure that, with respect to any property to be replaced, restored, repaired, or constructed with such assistance, such types and extent of insurance will be obtained and maintained as may be reasonably available, adequate, and necessary, to protect against future loss to such property.

[See main volume for text of (2)]

(b) Maintenance of insurance

No applicant for assistance under section 5172 of this title (relating to repair, restoration, and replacement of damaged facilities), section 5189 of this title (relating to simplified procedure), or section 3149(c)(2) of this title may receive such assistance for any property or part thereof for which the applicant has previously received assistance under this chapter unless all insurance required pursuant to this section has been obtained and maintained with respect to such property. The requirements of this subsection may not be waived under section 5141 of this title.

(c) State acting as self-insurer

A State may elect to act as a self-insurer with respect to any or all of the facilities owned by the State. Such an election, if declared in writing at the time of acceptance of assistance under section 5172 or 5189 of this title or section 3149(c)(2) of this title or subsequently and accompanied by a plan for self-insurance which is satisfactory to the President, shall be deemed compliance with subsection (a) of this section. No such self-insurer may receive assistance under section 5172 or 5189 of this title for any property or part thereof for which it has previously received assistance under this chapter, to the extent that insurance for such property or part thereof would have been reasonably available.

(c) Regulations

The President shall promulgate regulations to carry out this section and such regulations shall include national criteria, standards, and procedures for the determination of eligibility for grants and the administration of grants under this section.

(d) Administrative expenses

A State may expend not to exceed 5 percent of any grant made by the President to it under subsection (a) of this section for expenses of administering grants to individuals and families under this section.

(e) Administration through Governor

The Governor of a State shall administer the grant program authorized by this section in the State.

(f) Limit on grants to individual

No individual or family shall receive grants under this section aggregating more than $10,000 with respect to any single major disaster. Such $10,000 limit shall annually be adjusted to reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers published by the Department of Labor.

NOTES OF DECISIONS

Persons eligible 1

1. Persons eligible

This section under which governor could make grants to cover portion of adjusted loss from damage or destruction of nonbusiness or nonfarm personal property from floods gave claimants opportunity to apply for grants but created no right to grant enforceable by heirs of decedent who suffered such loss. Kosjer v. Com., Dept. of Public Welfare, 1983, 464 A.2d 687, 76 Pa.Cmwlth. 614.

§ 5179. Food coupons and distribution

(a) Persons eligible; terms and conditions

Whenever the President determines that, as a result of a major disaster, low-income households are unable to purchase adequate amounts of nutritious food, he is authorized, under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, to distribute through the Secretary of Agriculture or other appropriate agencies coupon allotments to such households pursuant to the provisions of the Food Stamp Act of 1964 (P.L. 91–671; 84 Stat. 2048) [7 U.S.C.A. § 2011 et seq.] and to make surplus commodities available pursuant to the provisions of this chapter.

(b) Duration of assistance; factors considered

The President, through the Secretary of Agriculture or other appropriate agencies, is authorized to continue to make such coupon allotments and surplus commodities available to such households for so long as he determines necessary, taking into consideration such factors as he deems appropriate, including the consequences of the major disaster on the earning power of the households, to which assistance is made available under this section.

(c) Food Stamp Act provisions unaffected

Nothing in this section shall be construed as amending or otherwise changing the provisions of the Food Stamp Act of 1964 [7 U.S.C.A. § 2011 et seq.] except as they relate to the availability of food stamps in an area affected by a major disaster.

§ 5184. Community disaster loans

(a) In general

The President is authorized to make loans to any local government which may suffer a substantial loss of tax and other revenues as a result of a major disaster, and has demonstrated a need for financial assistance in order to perform its governmental functions. The amount of any such loan shall be based on need, and shall not exceed 25 per centum of the annual operating budget of that local government for the fiscal year in which the major disaster occurs. Repayment of all or any part of such loan to the extent that revenues of the local government during the three full fiscal year period following the major disaster are insufficient to meet the operating budget of the local government, including additional disaster-related expenses of a municipal operation character shall be cancelled.

(b) No effect on grants or other assistance

Any loans made under this section shall not reduce or otherwise affect any grants or other assistance under this chapter.

Community Emergency Drought Relief

Pub.L. 95–31, Title I, May 23, 1977, 91 Stat. 169, provided: "That this Act be cited as the 'Community Emergency Drought Relief Act of 1977'.

"Sec. 101. (a) Upon the application of any State, political subdivision of a State, Indian tribe, or public or private nonprofit organization, the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to make grants and loans to applicants in drought impacted areas for projects that implement short-term actions to augment community water supplies where there are severe problems due to water shortages. Such assistance may be for the improvement, expansion, or construction of water supplies, and purchase and transportation of water, which in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce will make a substantial contribution to the relief of an existing or threatened drought condition in a designated area.

"(b) The Secretary of Commerce may designate any area in the United States as an emergency drought impact area if he or she finds that a major and continuing adverse drought condition exists and is expected to continue, and such condition is causing significant hardships on the affected areas.

"(c) Eligible applicants shall be those States or political subdivisions of States with a population of ten thousand or more, Indian tribes, or public or private nonprofit organizations within areas designated pursuant to subsection (b) of this section.

"(d) Projects assisted under this Act shall be only those with respect to which assurances can be given to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce that the work can be completed by April 30, 1978, or within such extended time as the Secretary may approve in exceptional circumstances.

"Sec. 102. Grants hereunder shall be in an amount not to exceed 50 per centum of allowable project costs. Loans shall be for a term not to exceed 40 years at a per annum interest rate of 5 per centum and shall be on such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Commerce shall determine. In determining the amount of a grant assistance for any project, the Secretary of Commerce may take into consideration such factors as are established by regulation and are consistent with the purposes of this Act.

"Sec. 103. In extending assistance under this Act the Secretary shall take into consideration the relative needs of applicant areas for the projects for which assistance is requested, and the appropriateness of the project for relieving the conditions intended to be alleviated by this Act.

"Sec. 104. The Secretary of Commerce shall have such powers and authorities under this Act as are vested in the Secretary by sections 701 and 708 of the Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965, as amended [sections 3211 and 3218 of this title], with respect to that Act [section 3121 et seq. of this title].

"Sec. 105. The National Environmental Protection Act of 1969, as amended [section 4321 et seq. of this title], shall be implemented to the fullest extent consistent with but subject to the time constraints imposed by this Act, and the Secretary of Commerce when making the final determination regarding an application for assistance hereunder shall give consideration to the environmental consequences determined within that period.

"Sec. 106. (a) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1977, $225,000,000 of which sum $150,000,000 is to be for the loan program herein, including administration thereof, and $75,000,000 of which is to be used for the grant program herein, including administration thereof, and such additional amounts for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978, as may be reasonably needed for administrative expenses in monitoring and closing out the program authorized by the Act. Funds authorized by this Act shall be obligated by December 31, 1977.

"(b) Funds available to the Secretary for this Act shall be available for expenditure for drought impact projects conducted heretofore by eligible applicants during fiscal year 1977 if such projects are found to be compatible with the broad purposes of this Act."

§ 5188. Timber sale contracts

(a) Cost-sharing arrangement

Where an existing timber sale contract between the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of the Interior and a timber purchaser does not provide relief from major physical change not due to negligence of the purchaser prior to approval of construction of any section of specified road or of any other specified development facility and, as a result of a major disaster, a major physical change results in additional construction work in connection with such road or facility by such purchaser with an estimated cost, as determined by the appropriate Secretary, (1) of more than $1,000 for sales under one million board feet, (2) of more than $1 per thousand board feet for sales of one to three million board feet, or (3) of more than $3,000 for sales over three million board feet, such increased construction cost shall be borne by the United States.

(b) Cancellation of authority

If the appropriate Secretary determines that damages are so great that restoration, reconstruction, or construction is not practical under the cost-sharing arrangement authorized by subsection (a) of this section, he may allow cancellation of a contract entered into by his Department notwithstanding contrary provisions therein.

(c) Public notice of sale

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to reduce to seven days the minimum period of advance public notice required by section 476 of Title 16, in connection with the sale of timber from national forests, whenever the Secretary determines that (1) the sale of such timber will assist in the construction of any area of a State damaged by a major disaster, (2) the sale of such timber will assist in sustaining the economy of such area, or (3) the sale of such timber is necessary to salvage the value of timber damaged in such major disaster or to protect undamaged timber.

(d) State grants for removal of damaged timber; reimbursement of expenses limited to salvage value of removed timber

The President, when he determines it to be in the public interest, is authorized to make grants to any State or local government for the purpose of removing from privately owned lands timber damaged as a result of a major disaster, and such State or local government is authorized upon application, to make payments out of such grants to any person for reimbursement of expenses actually incurred by such person in the removal of damaged timber, not to exceed the amount that such expenses exceed the salvage value of such timber.

§ 5189. Simplified procedure

If the Federal estimate of the cost of—

(1) repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing under section 5172 of this title any damaged or destroyed public facility or private nonprofit facility,

(2) emergency assistance under section 5170b or 5192 of this title, or

(3) debris removed under section 5173 of this title, is less than $35,000, the President (on application of the State or local government or the owner or operator of the private nonprofit facility) may make the contribution to such State or local government or owner or operator under section 5170b, 5172, 5173, or 5192 of this title, as the case may be, on the basis of such Federal estimate. Such $35,000 amount shall be adjusted annually to reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers published by the Department of Labor.

NOTES OF DECISIONS

Exhaustion of remedies 1

1. Exhaustion of remedies

Administrative exhaustion of remedies was not required before hurricane victims could bring action challenging administrative temporary housing eligibility decisions of Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), where exhaustion was not expressly required by statute, and regulation did not require appeal before review and did not compel the initial decision to be made inoperative pending that review. Lockett v. Federal Emergency Management Agency, S.D.Fla. 1993, 836 F.Supp. 847.

§ 5189b. Date of eligibility; expenses incurred before date of disaster

Eligibility for Federal assistance under this subchapter shall begin on the date of the occurrence of the event which results in a declaration by the President that a major disaster exists; except that reasonable expenses which are incurred in anticipation of and immediately preceding such event may be eligible for Federal assistance under this chapter.

(Pub.L. 93–288, Title IV, § 424, as added Pub.L. 100–707, Title I, § 106(l), Nov. 23, 1988, 102 Stat. 4706.)

REV_00255647

§ 5191. Procedure for declaration

(a) Request and declaration

All requests for a declaration by the President that an emergency exists shall be made by the Governor of the affected State. Such a request shall be based on a finding that the situation is of such severity and magnitude that effective response is beyond the capabilities of the State and the affected local governments and that Federal assistance is necessary. As a part of such request, and as a prerequisite to emergency assistance under this chapter, the Governor shall take appropriate action under State law and direct execution of the State's emergency plan. The Governor shall furnish information describing the State and local efforts and resources which have been or will be used to alleviate the emergency, and will define the type and extent of Federal aid required. Based upon such Governor's request, the President may declare that an emergency exists.

(b) Certain emergencies involving Federal primary responsibility

The President may exercise any authority vested in him by section 5192 of this title or section 5193 of this title with respect to an emergency when he determines that an emergency exists for which the primary responsibility for response rests with the United States because the emergency involves a subject area for which, under the Constitution or laws of the United States, the United States exercises exclusive or preeminent responsibility and authority. In determining whether or not such an emergency exists, the President shall consult the Governor of any affected State, if practicable. The President's determination may be made without regard to subsection (a) of this section.

§ 5192. Federal emergency assistance

(a) Specified

In any emergency, the President may—

(1) direct any Federal agency, with or without reimbursement, to utilize its authorities and the resources granted to it under Federal law (including personnel, equipment, supplies, facilities, and managerial, technical and advisory services) in support of State and local emergency assistance efforts to save lives, protect property and public health and safety, and lessen or avert the threat of a catastrophe;

(2) coordinate all disaster relief assistance (including voluntary assistance) provided by Federal agencies, private organizations, and State and local governments;

(3) provide technical and advisory assistance to affected State and local governments for—

(A) the performance of essential community services;

(B) issuance of warnings of risks or hazards;

(C) public health and safety information, including dissemination of such information;

(D) provision of health and safety measures; and

(E) management, control, and reduction of immediate threats to public health and safety;

(4) provide emergency assistance through Federal agencies;

(5) remove debris in accordance with the terms and conditions of section 5173 of this title;

(6) provide temporary housing assistance in accordance with section 5174 of this title; and

(7) assist State and local governments in the distribution of medicine, food, and other consumable supplies, and emergency assistance.

(b) General

Whenever the Federal assistance provided under subsection (a) of this section with respect to an emergency is inadequate, the President may also provide assistance with respect to efforts to save lives,

§ 5193. Amount of assistance

(a) Federal share

The Federal share for assistance provided under this subchapter shall be equal to not less than 75 percent of the eligible costs.

(b) Limit on amount of assistance

(1) In general

Except as provided in paragraph (2), total assistance provided under this subchapter for a single emergency shall not exceed $5,000,000.

(2) Additional assistance

The limitation described in paragraph (1) may be exceeded when the President determines that—

(A) continued emergency assistance is immediately required;

(B) there is a continuing and immediate risk to lives, property, public health or safety; and

(C) necessary assistance will not otherwise be provided on a timely basis.

(3) Report

Whenever the limitation described in paragraph (1) is exceeded, the President shall report to the Congress on the nature and extent of emergency assistance requirements and shall propose additional legislation if necessary.

SUBCHAPTER IV–B—EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

§ 5195. Declaration of policy

The purpose of this subchapter is to provide a system of emergency preparedness for the protection of life and property in the United States from hazards and to vest responsibility for emergency preparedness jointly in the Federal Government and the States and their political subdivisions. The Congress recognizes that the organizational structure established jointly by the Federal Government and the States and their political subdivisions for emergency preparedness purposes can be effectively utilized to provide relief and assistance to people in areas of the United States struck by a hazard. The Federal Government shall provide necessary direction, coordination, and guidance, and shall provide necessary assistance, as authorized in this subchapter so that a comprehensive emergency preparedness system exists for all hazards.

(Pub.L. 93–288, Title VI, § 601, as added Pub.L. 103–337, Div. C, Title XXXIV, § 3411(a)(3), Oct. 5, 1994, 108 Stat. 3100.)

§ 5195a. Definitions

(a) Definitions

For purposes of this subchapter only:

(1) Hazard

The term "hazard" means an emergency or disaster resulting from—

(A) a natural disaster; or

(B) an accidental or man-caused event.

(2) Natural disaster

The term "natural disaster" means any hurricane, tornado, storm, flood, high water, wind-driven water, tidal wave, tsunami, earthquake, volcanic eruption, landslide, mudslide, snowstorm, drought, fire, or other catastrophe in any part of the United States which causes, or which may cause, substantial damage or injury to civilian property or persons.

(3) Emergency preparedness

The term "emergency preparedness" means all those activities and measures designed or undertaken to prepare for or minimize the effects of a hazard upon the civilian population, to deal with the immediate emergency conditions which would be created by the hazard, and to effectuate emergency repairs to, or the emergency restoration of, vital utilities and facilities destroyed or damaged by the hazard. Such term includes the following:

(A) Measures to be undertaken in preparation for anticipated hazards (including the establishment of appropriate organizations, operational plans, and supporting agreements, the recruitment and training of personnel, the conduct of research, the procurement and stockpiling of necessary materials and supplies, the provision of suitable warning systems, the construction or preparation of shelters, shelter areas, and control centers, and, when appropriate, the non-military evacuation of the civilian population).

(B) Measures to be undertaken during a hazard (including the enforcement of passive defense regulations prescribed by duly established military or civil authorities, the evacuation of personnel to shelter areas, the control of traffic and panic, and the control and use of lighting and civil communications).

(C) Measures to be undertaken following a hazard (including activities for fire fighting, rescue, emergency medical, health and sanitation services, monitoring for specific dangers of special weapons, unexploded bomb reconnaissance, essential debris clearance, emergency welfare measures, and immediately essential emergency repair or restoration of damaged vital facilities).

(4) Organizational equipment

The term "organizational equipment" means equipment determined by the Director to be necessary to an emergency preparedness organization, as distinguished from personal equipment, and of such a type or nature as to require it to be financed in whole or in part by the Federal Government. Such term does not include those items which the local community normally uses in combating local disasters, except when required in unusual quantities dictated by the requirements of the emergency preparedness plans.

(5) Materials

The term "materials" includes raw materials, supplies, medicines, equipment, component parts and technical information and processes necessary for emergency preparedness.

(6) Facilities

The term "facilities", except as otherwise provided in this subchapter, includes buildings, shelters, utilities, and land.

(7) Director

The term "Director" means the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

§ 5165. Mitigation planning

(a) Requirement of mitigation plan

As a condition of receipt of an increased Federal share for hazard mitigation measures under subsection (e), a State, local, or tribal government shall develop and submit for approval to the President a mitigation plan that outlines processes for identifying the natural hazards, risks, and vulnerabilities of the area under the jurisdiction of the government.

(b) Local and tribal plans

Each mitigation plan developed by a local or tribal government shall—

(1) describe actions to mitigate hazards, risks, and vulnerabilities identified under the plan; and

(2) establish a strategy to implement those actions.

(c) State plans

The State process of development of a mitigation plan under this section shall—

(1) identify the natural hazards, risks, and vulnerabilities of areas in the State;

(2) support development of local mitigation plans;

(3) provide for technical assistance to local and tribal governments for mitigation planning; and

(4) identify and prioritize mitigation actions that the State will support, as resources become available.

(d) Funding

(1) In general

Federal contributions under section 5170c of this title may be used to fund the development and updating of mitigation plans under this section.

(2) Maximum Federal contribution

With respect to any mitigation plan, a State, local, or tribal government may use an amount of Federal contributions under section 5170c of this title not to exceed 7 percent of the amount of such contributions available to the government as of a date determined by the government.

(e) Increased Federal share for hazard mitigation measures

(1) In general

If, at the time of the declaration of a major disaster, a State has in effect an approved mitigation plan under this section, the President may increase to 20 percent, with respect to the major disaster, the maximum percentage specified in the last sentence of section 5170c(a) of this title.

(2) Factors for consideration

In determining whether to increase the maximum percentage under paragraph (1), the President shall consider whether the State has established—

(A) eligibility criteria for property acquisition and other types of mitigation measures;

(B) requirements for cost effectiveness that are related to the eligibility criteria;

(C) a system of priorities that is related to the eligibility criteria; and

(D) a process by which an assessment of the effectiveness of a mitigation action may be carried out after the mitigation action is complete.

§ 5165a. Minimum standards for public and private structures

(a) In general

As a condition of receipt of a disaster loan or grant under this chapter—

(1) the recipient shall carry out any repair or construction to be financed with the loan or grant in accordance with applicable standards of safety, decency, and sanitation and in conformity with applicable codes, specifications, and standards; and

(2) the President may require safe land use and construction practices, after adequate consultation with appropriate State and local government officials.

(b) Evidence of compliance

A recipient of a disaster loan or grant under this chapter shall provide such evidence of compliance with this section as the President may require by regulation.

PART A—POWERS AND DUTIES

§ 5196. Detailed functions of administration

(a) In general

In order to carry out the policy described in section 5195 of this title, the Director shall have the authorities provided in this section.

(b) Federal emergency response plans and programs

The Director may prepare Federal response plans and programs for the emergency preparedness of the United States and sponsor and direct such plans and programs. To prepare such plans and programs and coordinate such plans and programs with State efforts, the Director may request such reports on State plans and operations for emergency preparedness as may be necessary to keep the President, Congress, and the States advised of the status of emergency preparedness in the United States.

(c) Delegation of emergency preparedness responsibilities

With the approval of the President, the Director may delegate to other departments and agencies of the Federal Government appropriate emergency preparedness responsibilities and review and coordinate the emergency preparedness activities of the departments and agencies with each other and with the activities of the States and neighboring countries.

(d) Communications and warnings

The Director may make appropriate provision for necessary emergency preparedness communications and for dissemination of warnings to the civilian population of a hazard.

(e) Emergency preparedness measures

The Director may study and develop emergency preparedness measures designed to afford adequate protection of life and property, including—

AMERICAN UNIVERSITY LAW LIBRARY
MYERS II BLDG.

(1) research and studies as to the best methods of treating the effects of hazards;

(2) developing shelter designs and materials for protective covering or construction; and

(3) developing equipment or facilities and effecting the standardization thereof to meet emergency preparedness requirements.

(f) Training programs

(1) The Director may—

(A) conduct or arrange, by contract or otherwise, for training programs for the instruction of emergency preparedness officials and other persons in the organization, operation, and techniques of emergency preparedness;

(B) conduct or operate schools or including the payment of travel expenses, in accordance with subchapter I of chapter 57 of Title 5, and the Standardized Government Travel Regulations, and per diem allowances, in lieu of subsistence for trainees in attendance or the furnishing of subsistence and quarters for trainees and instructors on terms prescribed by the Director; and

(C) provide instructors and training aids as necessary.

(2) The terms prescribed by the Director for the payment of travel expenses and per diem allowances authorized by this subsection shall include a provision that such payment shall not exceed one-half of the total cost of such expenses.

(3) The Director may lease real property required for the purpose of carrying out this subsection, but may not acquire fee title to property unless specifically authorized by law.

(g) Public dissemination of emergency preparedness information

The Director may publicly disseminate appropriate emergency preparedness information by all appropriate means.

(h) Interstate emergency preparedness compacts

(1) The Director may—

(A) assist and encourage the States to negotiate and enter into interstate emergency preparedness compacts;

(B) review the terms and conditions of such proposed compacts in order to assist, to the extent feasible, in obtaining uniformity between such compacts and consistency with Federal emergency response plans and programs;

(C) assist and coordinate the activities under such compacts; and

(D) aid and assist in encouraging reciprocal emergency preparedness legislation by the States which will permit the furnishing of mutual aid for emergency preparedness purposes in the event of a hazard which cannot be adequately met or controlled by a State or political subdivision thereof threatened with or experiencing a hazard.

(2) A copy of each interstate emergency preparedness compact shall be transmitted promptly to the Senate and the House of Representatives. The consent of Congress is deemed to be granted to each such compact upon the expiration of the 60–day period beginning on the date on which the compact is transmitted to Congress.

(3) Nothing in this subsection shall be construed as preventing Congress from disapproving, or withdrawing at any time its consent to, any interstate emergency preparedness compact.

(i) Materials and facilities

(1) The Director may procure by condemnation or otherwise, construct, lease, transport, store, maintain, renovate or distribute materials and facilities for emergency preparedness, with the right to take immediate possession thereof.

(2) Facilities acquired by purchase, donation, or other means of transfer may be occupied, used, and improved for the purposes of this subchapter before the approval of title by the Attorney General as required by section 255 of Title 40.

(3) The Director shall submit to Congress a report, at least quarterly, describing all property acquisitions made pursuant to this subsection.

(4) The Director may lease real property required for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this subsection, but shall not acquire fee title to property unless specifically authorized by law.

(5) The Director may procure and maintain under this subsection radiological, chemical, bacteriological, and biological agent monitoring and decontamination devices and distribute such devices by loan or grant to the States for emergency preparedness purposes, under such terms and conditions as the Director shall prescribe.

(j) Financial contributions

(1) The Director may make financial contributions, on the basis of programs or projects approved by the Director, to the States for emergency preparedness purposes, including the procurement, construction, leasing, or renovating of materials and facilities. Such contributions shall be made on such terms or conditions as the Director shall prescribe, including the method of purchase, the

MYERS II BLDG.
REV_00255652

quantity, quality, or specifications of the materials or facilities, and such other factors or care or treatment to assure the uniformity, availability, and good condition of such materials or facilities.

(2) No contribution may be made under this subsection for the procurement of land or for the purchase of personal equipment for State or local emergency preparedness workers.

(3) The amounts authorized to be contributed by the Director to each State for organizational equipment shall be equally matched by such State from any source it determines is consistent with its laws.

(4) Financial contributions to the States for shelters and other protective facilities shall be determined by taking the amount of funds appropriated or available to the Director for such facilities in each fiscal year and apportioning such funds among the States in the ratio which the urban population of the critical target areas (as determined by the Director) in each State, at the time of the determination, bears to the total urban population of the critical target areas of all of the States.

(5) The amounts authorized to be contributed by the Director to each State for such shelters and protective facilities shall be equally matched by such State from any source it determines is consistent with its laws and, if not matched within a reasonable time, the Director may reallocate such amounts to other States under the formula described in paragraph (4). The value of any land contributed by any State or political subdivision thereof shall be excluded from the computation of the State share under this subsection.

(6) The amounts paid to any State under this subsection shall be expended solely in carrying out the purposes set forth herein and in accordance with State emergency preparedness programs or projects approved by the Director. The Director shall make no contribution toward the cost of any program or project for the procurement, construction, or leasing of any facility which (A) is intended for use, in whole or in part, for any purpose other than emergency preparedness, and (B) is of such kind that upon completion it will, in the judgment of the Director, be capable of producing sufficient revenue to provide reasonable assurance of the retirement or repayment of such cost; except that (subject to the preceding provisions of this subsection) the Director may make a contribution to any State toward that portion of the cost of the construction, reconstruction, or enlargement of any facility which the Director determines to be directly attributable to the incorporation in such facility of any feature of construction or design not necessary for the principal intended purpose thereof but which is, in the judgment of the Director necessary for the use of such facility for emergency preparedness purposes.

(7) The Director shall submit to Congress a report, at least annually, regarding all contributions made pursuant to this subsection.

(8) All laborers and mechanics employed by contractors or subcontractors in the performance of construction work financed with the assistance of any contribution of Federal funds made by the Director under this subsection shall be paid wages at rates not less than those prevailing on similar construction in the locality as determined by the Secretary of Labor in accordance with the Act of March 3, 1931 (commonly known as the Davis-Bacon Act (40 U.S.C. 276a to 276a–5)), and every such employee shall receive compensation at a rate not less than one and ½ times the basic rate of pay of the employee for all hours worked in any workweek in excess of eight hours in any workday or 40 hours in the workweek, as the case may be. The Director shall make no contribution of Federal funds without first obtaining adequate assurance that these labor standards will be maintained upon the construction work. The Secretary of Labor shall have, with respect to the labor standards specified in this subsection, the authority and functions set forth in Reorganization Plan Numbered 14 of 1950 (5 U.S.C.App.) and section 276c of Title 40.

(k) Sale or disposal of certain materials and facilities

The Director may arrange for the sale or disposal of materials and facilities found by the Director to be unnecessary or unsuitable for emergency preparedness purposes in the same manner as provided for excess property under the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (40 U.S.C. 471 et seq.). Any funds received as proceeds from the sale or other disposition of such materials and facilities shall be deposited into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

§ 5196b. Contributions for personnel and administrative expenses

(a) General authority

To further assist in carrying out the purposes of this subchapter, the Director may make financial contributions to the States (including interstate emergency preparedness authorities established pursuant to section 5196(h) of this title) for necessary and essential State and local emergency preparedness personnel and administrative expenses, on the basis of approved plans (which shall be consistent with the Federal emergency response plans for emergency preparedness) for the emergency preparedness of the States. The financial contributions to the States under this section may not exceed one-half of the total cost of such necessary and essential State and local emergency preparedness personnel and administrative expenses.

(b) Plan requirements

A plan submitted under this section shall—

(1) provide, pursuant to State law, that the plan shall be in effect in all political subdivisions of the State and be mandatory on them and be administered or supervised by a single State agency;

(2) provide that the State shall share the financial assistance with that provided by the Federal Government under this section from any source determined by it to be consistent with State law;

(3) provide for the development of State and local emergency preparedness operational plans, pursuant to standards approved by the Director;

(4) provide for the employment of a full-time emergency preparedness director, or deputy director, by the State;

(5) provide that the State shall make such reports in such form and content as the Director may require; and

(6) make available to duly authorized representatives of the Director and the Comptroller General, books, records, and papers necessary to conduct audits for the purposes of this section.

(c) Terms and conditions

The Director shall establish such other terms and conditions as the Director considers necessary and proper to carry out this section.

(d) Application of other provisions

In carrying out this section, the provisions of sections 5196(h) and 5197(h) of this title shall apply.

(e) Allocation of funds

For each fiscal year concerned, the Director shall allocate to each State, in accordance with regulations and the total sum appropriated under this subchapter, amounts to be made available to the States for the purposes of this section. Regulations governing allocations to the States under this subsection shall give due regard to (1) the criticality of the areas which may be affected by hazards with respect to the development of the total emergency preparedness readiness of the United States, (2) the relative state of development of emergency preparedness readiness of the State, (3) population, and (4) such other factors as the Director shall prescribe. The Director may reallocate the excess of any allocation not used by a State in a plan submitted under this section. Amounts paid to any State or political subdivision under this section shall be expended solely for the purposes set forth in this section.

(f) Submission of plan

If a State fails to submit a plan for approval as required by this section within 60 days after the Director notifies the States of the allocations under this section, the Director may reallocate such funds, or portions thereof, among the other States in such amounts as, in the judgment of the Director, will best assure the adequate development of the emergency preparedness capability of the United States.

(g) Annual reports

The Director shall report annually to the Congress all contributions made pursuant to this section.

PART B—GENERAL PROVISIONS

§ 5197. Administrative authority

(a) In general

For the purpose of carrying out the powers and duties assigned to the Director under this subchapter, the Director may exercise the administrative authorities provided under this section.

(b) Advisory personnel

(1) The Director may employ not more than 100 part-time or temporary advisory personnel (including not to exceed 25 subjects of the United Kingdom or citizens of Canada) as the Director considers to be necessary in carrying out the provisions of this subchapter.

(2) Persons holding other offices or positions under the United States for which they receive compensation, while serving as advisory personnel, shall receive no additional compensation for such service. Other part-time or temporary advisory personnel so employed may serve without compensation or may receive compensation at a rate not to exceed $180 for each day of service, plus authorized subsistence and travel, as determined by the Director.

(c) Services of other agency personnel and volunteers

The Director may—

(1) use the services of Federal agencies and, with the consent of any State or local government, accept and use the services of State and local agencies;

(2) establish and use such regional and other offices as may be necessary; and

(3) use such voluntary and uncompensated services by individuals or organizations as may from time to time be needed.

(d) Gifts

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Director may accept gifts of supplies, equipment, and facilities and may use or distribute such gifts for emergency preparedness purposes in accordance with the provisions of this subchapter.

(e) Reimbursement

The Director may reimburse any Federal agency for any of its expenditures or for compensation of its personnel and use or consumption of its materials and facilities under this subchapter to the extent funds are available.

(f) Printing

The Director may purchase such printing, binding, and blank-book work from public, commercial, or private printing establishments or binderies as the Director considers necessary upon orders placed by the Public Printer or upon waivers issued in accordance with section 504 of Title 44.

(g) Rules and regulations

The Director may prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper to carry out any of the provisions of this subchapter and perform any of the powers and duties provided by this subchapter. The Director may perform any of the powers and duties provided by this subchapter through or with the aid of such officials of the Federal Emergency Management Agency as the Director may designate.

(h) Failure to expend contributions correctly

(1) When, after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing to the State or other person involved, the Director finds that there is a failure to expend funds in accordance with the regulations, terms, and conditions established under this subchapter for approved emergency preparedness plans, programs, or projects, the Director may notify such State or person that further payments will not be made to the State or person from appropriations under this subchapter (or from funds otherwise available for the purposes of this subchapter for any approved plan, program, or project with respect to which there is such failure to comply) until the Director is satisfied that there will no longer be any such failure.

(2) Until so satisfied, the Director shall either withhold the payment of any financial contribution to such State or person or limit payments to those programs or projects with respect to which there is substantial compliance with the regulations, terms, and conditions governing plans, programs, or projects hereunder.

(3) As used in this subsection, the term "person" means the political subdivision of any State or combination or group thereof or any person, corporation, association, or other entity of any nature

§ 5197a. Security regulations

(a) Establishment

The Director shall establish such security requirements and safeguards, including restrictions with respect to access to information and property as the Director considers necessary.

(b) Limitations on employee access to information

No employee of the Federal Emergency Management Agency shall be permitted to have access to information or property with respect to which access restrictions have been established under this section until it shall have been determined that no information is contained in the files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation or any other investigative agency of the Government indicating that such employee is of questionable loyalty or reliability for security purposes, or if any such information is so disclosed, until the Federal Bureau of Investigation shall have conducted a full field investigation concerning such person and a report thereon shall have been evaluated in writing by the Director.

(c) National security positions

No employee of the Federal Emergency Management Agency shall occupy any position determined by the Director to be of critical importance from the standpoint of national security until a full field investigation concerning such employee shall have been conducted by the Director of the Office of Personnel Management and a report thereon shall have been evaluated in writing by the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. In the event such full field investigation by the Director of the Office of Personnel Management develops any data reflecting that such applicant for a position of critical importance is of questionable loyalty or reliability for security purposes, or if the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency for any other reason considers it to be advisable, such investigation shall be discontinued and a report thereon shall be referred to the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency for evaluation in writing. Thereafter, the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency may refer the matter to the Federal Bureau of Investigation for the conduct of a full field investigation by such Bureau. The result of such latter investigation by such Bureau shall be furnished to the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency for action.

(d) Employee oaths

Each Federal employee of the Federal Emergency Management Agency acting under the authority of this subchapter, except the subjects of the United Kingdom and citizens of Canada specified in section 5197(b) of this title, shall execute the loyalty oath or appointment affidavits prescribed by the Director of the Office of Personnel Management. Each person other than a Federal employee who is appointed to serve in a State or local organization for emergency preparedness shall before entering upon duties, take an oath in writing before a person authorized to administer oaths, which oath shall be substantially as follows:

"I, _____, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties upon which I am about to enter.

"And I do further swear (or affirm) that I do not advocate, nor am I a member or an affiliate of any organization, group, or combination of persons that advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence; and that during such time as I am a member of _____ (name of emergency preparedness organization), I will not advocate nor become a member or an affiliate of any organization, group, or combination of persons that advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence."

After appointment and qualification for office, the director of emergency preparedness of any State, and any subordinate emergency preparedness officer within such State designated by the director in writing, shall be qualified to administer any such oath within such State under such regulations as the director shall prescribe. Any person who shall be found guilty of having falsely taken such oath shall be punished as provided in section 1621 of Title 18.

§ 5197b. Use of existing facilities

In performing duties under this subchapter, the Director—

(1) shall cooperate with the various departments and agencies of the Federal Government;

(2) shall use, to the maximum extent, the existing facilities and resources of the Federal Government and, with their consent, the facilities and resources of the States and political subdivisions thereof, and of other organizations and agencies; and

(3) shall refrain from engaging in any form of activity which would duplicate or parallel activity of any other Federal department or agency unless the Director, with the written approval of the President, shall determine that such duplication is necessary to accomplish the purposes of this subchapter.

SUBCHAPTER V—MISCELLANEOUS

§ 5201. Rules and regulations

(a) Generally

(1) Necessary and proper rules and regulations

The President may prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper to carry out any of the provisions of this chapter, and he may exercise any power or authority conferred on him by any section of this chapter either directly or through such Federal agency or agencies as he may designate.

(2) Deadline for payment of assistance

Rules and regulations authorized by paragraph (1) shall provide that payment of any assistance under this chapter to a State shall be completed within 60 days after the date of approval of such assistance.

(b) Acceptance of gifts

In furtherance of the purposes of this chapter, the President or his delegate may accept and use bequests, gifts, or donations of service, money, or property, real, personal, or mixed, tangible, or intangible. All sums received under this subsection shall be deposited in a separate fund on the books of the Treasury and shall be available for expenditure upon the certification of the President or his delegate. At the request of the President or his delegate, the Secretary of the Treasury may invest and reinvest excess monies in the fund. Such investments shall be in public debt securities with maturities suitable for the needs of the fund and shall bear interest at rates determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration current market yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturities. The interest on such investments shall be credited to, and form a part of, the fund.

In this section, the term " management cost" includes any indirect cost, any administrative expense, and any other expense not directly chargeable to a specific project under a major disaster, emergency, or disaster preparedness or mitigation activity or measure.

(b) Establishment of management cost rates

Notwithstanding any other provision of law (including any administrative rule or guidance), the President shall by regulation establish management cost rates, for grantees and subgrantees, that shall be used to determine contributions under this chapter for management costs.

(c) Review

The President shall review the management cost rates established under subsection (b) not later than 3 years after the date of establishment of the rates and periodically thereafter.

§ 5165c. Public notice, comment, and consultation requirements

(a) Public notice and comment concerning new or modified policies

(1) In general

The President shall provide for public notice and opportunity for comment before adopting any new or modified policy that—

(A) governs implementation of the public assistance program administered by the Federal Emergency Management Agency under this chapter; and

(B) could result in a significant reduction of assistance under the program.

(2) Application

Any policy adopted under paragraph (1) shall apply only to a major disaster or emergency declared on or after the date on which the policy is adopted.

(b) Consultation concerning interim policies

(1) In general

Before adopting any interim policy under the public assistance program to address specific conditions that relate to a major disaster or emergency that has been declared under this chapter, the President, to the maximum extent practicable, shall solicit the views and recommendations of grantees and subgrantees with respect to the major disaster or emergency concerning the potential interim policy, if the interim policy is likely—

(A) to result in a significant reduction of assistance to applicants for the assistance with respect to the major disaster or emergency; or

(B) to change the terms of a written agreement to which the Federal Government is a party concerning the declaration of the major disaster or emergency.

(2) No legal right of action

Nothing in this subsection confers a legal right of action on any party.

(c) Public access

The President shall promote public access to policies governing the implementation of the public assistance program.

SUBCHAPTER IV—MAJOR DISASTER ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

§ 5170c. Hazard mitigation

(a) In general

The President may contribute up to 75 percent of the cost of hazard mitigation measures which the President has determined are cost-effective and which substantially reduce the risk of future damage, hardship, loss, or suffering in any area affected by a major disaster. Such measures shall be identified following the evaluation of natural hazards under section 5165 of this title and shall be subject to approval by the President. Subject to section 5165 of this title, the total of contributions under this section for a major disaster shall not exceed 15 percent of the estimated aggregate amount of grants to be made (less any associated administrative costs) under this chapter with respect to the major disaster.

§ 5204b. Technical assistance for insular areas

(a) Presidential assessment of response capability; recovery plans

Upon the declaration by the President of a disaster in an insular area, the President, acting through the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, shall assess, in cooperation with the Secretary and chief executive of such insular area, the capability of the insular government to respond to the disaster, including the capability to assess damage; coordinate activities with Federal agencies, particularly the Federal Emergency Management Agency; develop recovery plans, including recommendations for enhancing the survivability of essential infrastructure; negotiate and manage reconstruction contracts; and prevent the misuse of funds. If the President finds that the insular government lacks any of these or other capabilities essential to the recovery effort, then the President shall provide technical assistance to the insular area which the President deems necessary for the recovery effort.

(b) Report to Congress

One year following the declaration by the President of a disaster in an insular area, the Secretary, in consultation with the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, shall submit to the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources and the House Committee on Natural Resources a report on the status of the recovery effort, including an audit of Federal funds expended in the recovery effort and recommendations on how to improve public health and safety, survivability of infrastructure, recovery efforts, and effective use of funds in the event of future disasters.

CFJ Applauds Cornyn for Hearing on Judicial Confirmation Process Reform

"Filibuster strategy is unconstitutional, illegitimate," Gray says.

Washington, D.C. – The Committee for Justice (CFJ), a group supporting constitutionalist judicial nominees, today applauded Constitution Subcommittee Chairman Sen. John Cornyn (R-TX) for holding a hearing to explore constructive solutions to the unprecedented uses and abuse of the filibuster against judicial nominees.

"The federal courts are suffering from a vacancy crisis, but the Senate Democrats, on orders from People for the American Way, have resorted to reckless tactics to block qualified nominees from the federal bench," CFJ Chairman C. Boyden Gray said. "The Democrats' decision to filibuster not one but two highly qualified judicial nominees will go down in history as a corrupt act of constitutional malpractice. It amounts to a temper tantrum to deny each member of the Senate his or her constitutional right to offer advice and consent. One way or another, the responsible members of the Senate must end this destructive and unconstitutional obstruction."

"The judicial selection process, damaged by the Senate Democrats during the Robert Bork episode, has now been ridden completely off the rails," Gray also said. "Moderate Democrats should join Republicans in reforming the confirmation process to give all nominees, regardless of party, a fair hearing and then a floor-vote within a reasonable time period. Fifteen of this President's circuit court nominees have waited for over one year for floor votes; some almost two years. That level of obstruction, particularly before the end of a President's term, is unprecedented."

"There was once a time when the members of the academic and legal communities, regardless of politics, would raise their voices to decry misuse of the filibuster against federal court nominees," Gray concluded. "We attach a letter stating such opposition from 1968, regarding the filibuster of Abe Fortas, in hopes it will stir some of our current law school deans and past American Bar Association presidents to raise a similar protest today."

The Committee for Justice supports constitutionalist judicial nominees.

SENATE— Tuesday, October 1, 1968

(Legislative day of Tuesday, September 24, 1968)

The Senate met in executive session at 12 noon, on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, who committest to us the swift and solemn trust of life, since we know not what a day may bring forth, but only that the hour for serving Thee is always present, may we wake to the instant claims of Thy holy will, not waiting for tomorrow, but yielding today. Consecrate with Thy presence the way our feet may go, and the humblest work will shine and the roughest places be made plain.

May our individual lives be as lighted windows amid the encircling gloom. In this global contest beyond the light and darkness, make us as individuals the kind of persons which Thou canst use as the instruments of Thy purpose for all mankind.

Thus may we—

"Rise up, O men of God
Have done with lesser things.
Give heart and mind and soul and strength,
To serve the King of Kings."

In Thy name we ask it. Amen.

SUBCOMMITTEE MEETING DURING SENATE SESSION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Indian Education of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the nomination of Mr. Abe Fortas to be Chief Justice of the United States.

The time is equally divided between the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPONG in the chair). Who yields time?

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

It takes less time than that for me to advise my colleagues that I support this nomination. I believe the background of Mr. Justice Fortas as a law professor and a public servant, the outstanding career which was his at the bar, and his past 3 years of distinguished service on the Supreme Court leave no doubt about his qualifications. That is not a partisan assessment. It is the sentiment of the overwhelming majority of nonpartisans who have considered this nomination, free from the pressure of personal involvement and political involvement.

I hope I do not do a disservice when I oversimplify, in the interest of time, to say that there are approximately four categories of opposition, when the theme of the opposition is boiled down to its substance. There is the critic of the Warren court. There is the opponent of civil rights progress. There is political partisanship. There is the rightwing pressure group. None of this bears on what I conceive to be what should be the relevant question before us—the qualifications of Abe Fortas.

But put aside the question of partisanship and motivation, and simply accept the fact that some Members of the Senate do not wish to see Mr. Justice Fortas become Chief Justice. Let us accept that. It is neither startling nor remarkable. Except for the most inconsequential routine matters in the Senate, there will always be opposition views. The old saw is that neither the Ten Commandments nor the Bill of Rights would get through the Senate without some opposition.

That is the reason why the rules provide a very simple yet decisive means of resolving disagreement. After debate has been had, let us call the roll. If the "yeas" prevail, the question carries. If the "nays" prevail, the question fails. I have no doubt that if such a rollcall were permitted on this nomination, the "yeas" would prevail, and Mr. Justice Fortas would become Chief Justice. What I hope will not happen is that that kind of vote on the merits will be denied us.

Never in our history has a matter of the nomination of a Justice to the Supreme Court been resolved by filibuster. I hope that those who treasure precedent in this body will recognize the danger to the Court, to the country, and to the Senate if we, for the first time, establish that kind of precedent.

A very recent editorial quoted the dean of the Yale Law School as saying that a filibuster in this situation is an assault upon our constitutional system.

What is the question before us? That we advise and consent or not to the question of Mr. Justice Fortas? No. The question is, Shall we be permitted to consider the nomination?

The Constitution is clear. In this situation, the President shall nominate and the Senate shall advise either to consent or withhold its consent. The first duty under the Constitution has been discharged. Let us be put in a position to meet our responsibility under the Constitution, to advise and to permit a majority to say "We consent" or "We withhold our consent."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement issued by the Lawyers' Committee on Supreme Court nominations, including a list of its members; a resolution adopted by the National Bar Association; and some letters bearing on the subject under discussion.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF LAWYERS' COMMITTEE ON SUPREME COURT NOMINATIONS, SEPTEMBER 29, 1968

The Lawyers' Committee on Supreme Court Nominations today issued the attached statement urging the Senate to act promptly on the merits of the Supreme Court nominations pending before it. The Committee was formed September 12, 1968, and its membership comprises 162 lawyers from 49 states and the District of Columbia. The Committee opposes the use of the filibuster or other obstructive techniques to frustrate the appointive process. It also opposes the use of that process for indiscriminate attacks on the Supreme Court.

Included among this broadly representative group of lawyers are seven past presidents of the American Bar Association, many past and present officers of state bar associations and 23 law school deans. A list of the members is attached. The statement represents the personal views of the members of the Committee, and does not reflect the views of any institution with which they may be affiliated.

Inquiries may be directed to Jefferson B. Fordham, Dean of the University of Pennsylvania Law School.

STATEMENT

The Lawyers' Committee on Supreme Court Nominations respectfully urges the Senators opposed to the pending nominees to put their views to the test of a vote on the merits.

Over three months ago, the President submitted to the Senate for its "advice and consent" a nomination for Chief Justice of the United States. The nominee was questioned extensively before the Senate Judiciary Committee. A detailed record was compiled. Last week, a majority of the Senate Judiciary Committee reported out the nomination favorably. The sole question now before the Senate should be the qualification and fitness of the nominee for the position of Chief Justice.

No one would deny the need for careful consideration by the Senate of the qualifications of nominees to the highest court in the land. Nor is there any doubt that some period of debate and deliberation for that purpose is appropriate. But just as surely, the Senate has a duty not only to explore the issues but also to render a decision either granting or withholding its consent to the nominations.

If the pending nominations do not win the support of a majority of the Senate, they will fail. If they do win such support, they deserve the Senate's consent. Nothing would more poorly serve our constitutional system than for the nominations to have earned the approval of the Senate majority, but to be thwarted because the majority is denied a chance to vote.

Senators have never before employed a filibuster against a Supreme Court nomination. Indeed, prior Supreme Court appointments have seldom been debated more than one day, and none has been debated more than 8 days. Whatever the merits of the filibuster as a device to defeat disliked legislation, its use to frustrate a judicial appointment creates a dangerous precedent with important implications for the very structure of our Government.

Senators concerned about whether the courts have correctly applied the Constitution ought not to ignore their own constitutional duties. We therefore urge that after a reasonable time for debate the nominations to voted up or down on their merits.

RESOLUTION OF 43D ANNUAL CONVENTION, NATIONAL BAR ASSOCIATION, INC., WASHINGTON, D.C.

(By the Resolutions Committee)

Whereas, the National Bar Association has always supported the Constitutional principle that the independence and the integrity of the Judiciary shall be inviolate; and

Whereas, the now Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, Abe Fortas, has achieved the highest honor that may be bestowed upon any lawyer and/or Judge; and

Whereas, the now Associate Justice Fortas has been nominated to be the Chief Justice and administrator of that Highest Court; and

Whereas, the now Associate Justice is awaiting confirmation to that position to which he has been nominated by our President; and

Whereas, we now note with dismay, the prolonged inquiry into the qualifications of Mr. Justice Fortas and particularly the efforts of some to relate their inquiries to decisions rendered by the Supreme Court; and

Whereas, we recognize the responsibility of the United States Senate to discharge its obligations to the American People;

Be it resolved that the National Bar Association assembled at Washington, D.C., in its 43rd Convention, does unequivocally, and without reservation, urge the Senate Judiciary Committee to recommend confirmation of Associate Justice Abe Fortas forthwith; respecting and supporting the wisdom of President Lyndon B. Johnson's judgment in naming Associate Justice Abe Fortas of the United States Supreme Court to be its Chief Justice;

And be it further resolved, that a copy of this Resolution be dispatched to the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee and to the Leadership of the United States Senate.

And be it further resolved, that a copy of this Resolution be dispatched to the Chairman and members of the Judiciary Committee and to the Leadership of the United States Senate.

Done this 30th day of July, 1968.

REVIUS O. ORTIQUE,
Chairman.

GEORGE LAWRENCE, Cochairman.

Attest:

BILLY JONES,
President.

LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE ON CIVIL RIGHTS,
Washington, D.C., September 26, 1968.

DEAR SENATOR: Our long opposition to the filibuster, particularly, when it has been used to oppose the fight for full equality, leads us, now, to protest its impending use against the nomination of Justice Abe Fortas as Chief Justice of the United States.

As a non-partisan organization, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights does not take positions on individual nominations. However, we believe there are issues, here, that threaten the independence of the Judiciary.

We express our concern in the enclosed statement.

We hope you will do all in your power to see that a filibuster is stopped and the Senate is given an opportunity to work its will.

Sincerely yours,

ROY WILKINS, Chairman.

Reforming The Judicial Selection Process

Bush Makes The Case For Timely Action While Leahy Suddenly Drops His Support For Deadlines

On October, 30, 2002, President Bush proposed what he called "a clean start for the process of nominating and confirming federal judges." While standing in the East Room, where he presented his first 11 nominees almost a year and a half ago, Bush said the existing process is so poisoned and polarized that nominees clearly are not being treated fairly.

Bush's proposals this week were simple and straightforward. He asked judges who expect to retire or take senior status to notify the President a year in advance, if possible. As he explained, the goal should be to have an appointee in place when the seat becomes vacant.

To further that goal, he proposed that Presidents submit a nomination within 180 days of receiving notice from the judge, that the Judiciary Committee hold a hearing within 90 days of the nomination, and that the Senate bring the nomination to a vote another 90 days later.

"The plan would be fair and would apply to—regardless of who the President is," he said. "It doesn't matter who the President is. What matters is a system which works."

For the past year and a half, that system has not worked. Bush has had to deal with a confirmation process run by Senators Patrick Leahy and Tom Daschle, who have made every effort to stall as many nominations as they can.

Their treatment of Bush's court of appeals nominees has been deplorable. Former President Reagan saw 95 percent of his court of appeals nominees confirmed during the first two years of his presidency. George H.W. Bush had 96 percent confirmed during the same period. Bill Clinton's figure was 85 percent. They have refused to show George W. Bush the same courtesy, only allowing 47 percent of his court of appeals nominees to be confirmed.

Some, like Priscilla Owen and Charles Pickering, had the votes in the Senate but were denied the chance for a vote. Others, like Dennis Shedd, had the votes in the Judiciary Committee and the Senate, but were denied a chance for a vote in either body—until his party's losses in the election prodded Leahy into action. As Bush said, it is a lousy record.

The vacancy crisis and confirmation slowdown have very real effects, not just on the nominees and the judicial system, but also on ordinary people who look to the courts for justice. But when certain Senators decide that it is fine for the Sixth Circuit to operate with 7 of its 16 seats vacant for nearly a year, or for the D.C. Circuit to operate with 4 of its 12 seats vacant for months on end -- despite the availability of highly qualified nominees whose names are before them -- those Senators have signaled that they simply do not care.

Bush's proposal is a common sense resolution to a lot of the difficulties plaguing the confirmation process. Unfortunately, Judiciary Committee Democrats have declined to embrace it.

Outgoing committee chairman Patrick Leahy (D-VT) was especially critical of the proposal. "The President should understand that the Senate does not need arbitrary deadlines," he declared.

But until George W. Bush was elected President, Leahy had no problem at all with arbitrary deadlines for the Senate. In fact, the Congressional Record is full of examples of his outspoken support for deadlines and a few other reforms that he thinks are unimportant of late.

"I have said on the floor, although we are different parties, I have agreed with Gov. George Bush, who has said that in the Senate a nominee ought to get a vote, up or down, within 60 days."
146 Cong. Rec. S 10174, October 11, 2000

"Governor Bush of Texas recently also proposed that presidential nominations be acted upon by the Senate within 60 days . . . Governor Bush is right."
146 Cong. Rec. S 7436, July 21, 2000.

"The soon-to-be presidential nominee of the Republican Party has said—and I agree with him—that this is wrong, the Senate ought to vote these people up or down in 60 days."
146 Cong. Rec. S 7532, July 25, 2000.

"I mention this because Governor Bush and I, while we disagree on some issues, have one very significant issue on which we agree. He gave a speech a while back and criticized what has happened in the Senate where confirmations are held up not because somebody votes down a nominee but because they cannot ever get a vote. Governor Bush said: You have the nominee. Hold the hearing. Then, within 60 days, vote them up or vote them down. Don't leave them in limbo."
146 Cong. Rec. S 9672, October 3, 2000.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled . . . that Section 46 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following . . . the Senate shall not recess for more than nine days without first voting on a judicial nomination in any case in which the nomination . . . has been pending before the Senate for a period of 60 days or longer; and a judicial emergency is declared . . . due to vacancies in the affected circuit court."

S. 1906, a bill introduced by Leahy on April 2, 1998.

"As I have said before, it should not take more than 4 months to consider a judicial nominee. . . ."

143 Cong. Rec. S 7207, July 10, 1997.

"Any week in which the Senate does not confirm three judges is a week in which the Senate is failing to address the vacancy crisis. Any fortnight in which we have gone without a judicial confirmation hearing marks 2 weeks in which the Senate is falling behind."

105 Cong. Rec. S 76, January 28, 1998.

"A President should be given a great deal of latitude on who he nominates to the Federal court. If we disagree with a nomination, then we can vote against it. But, frankly, Mr. President, not only does it damage the integrity and the independence of the Federal judiciary by just holding judicial nominations hostage where nobody ever even votes on them, but I think it damages the integrity of the U.S. Senate."

143 Cong. Rec. S 5654, June 16, 1997.

"The Founding Fathers certainly intended that the Senate advise as to judicial nominations, i.e., consider, debate and vote up or down. They surely did not intend that the Senate, for partisan or factional reasons, would remain silent and simply refuse to give any advice or consider and vote at all, thereby leaving the courts in limbo, understaffed and unable properly to carry out their responsibilities for years."

Prepared Statement, Senate Judiciary Committee, May 10, 2000.

"Now, every Senator can vote against any nominee. Every Senator has that right. They can vote against them in [the Judiciary Committee] and on the floor. But it is the responsibility of the U.S. Senate to at least bring them to a vote. It is our responsibility under the Constitution, it is our responsibility to the Senate itself, it is our responsibility to the American public not to allow one Senator to determine for all 100 Senators whether a person will be confirmed to a federal judicial position or not."

143 Cong. Rec. S 10926, October 22, 1997.

Cato scholar praises Bush plan to end delays in confirmation hearings

Democrats controlling Senate Judiciary Committee politicize confirmation process

WASHINGTON—This afternoon, President Bush announced his plan to end the crisis that has paralyzed his nominations to the federal bench. James L. Swanson, editor in chief of the Cato Supreme Court Review and a senior fellow in constitutional studies at the Cato Institute, commented:

"For a year and a half, since May 2001, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee have thwarted President Bush's efforts to fill vacancies on an understaffed federal bench. Democrats controlling that committee have politicized the confirmation process by refusing to hold hearings for many nominees—or once hearings have been held, by refusing to allow the full Senate to vote on many of the nominations. That scheme subverts the Constitution, undermines the rule of law, and impedes the administration of justice."

Commenting on the president's call for the Senate Judiciary Committee to hold a hearing within 90 days of receiving a nomination, Swanson added, "It was high time for the president to object to the Judiciary Committee's tactic of paralyzing nominations through delay. Stalling harms the nominees, the courts and the American people."

Regarding President Bush's proposal that the full Senate vote a nomination up or down no later than 180 days after the nomination is submitted, Swanson said: "The president is right to call for action by the full Senate, and in a timely manner. As James Madison suggested, the vote of 100 senators is preferable to the vote of a small and more radical cabal or committee."

PRESIDENT BUSH ANNOUNCES HIS PLAN TO ENSURE TIMELY CONSIDERATION OF JUDICIAL NOMINEES

Today the President outlined his plan to ensure timely consideration of judicial nominees. The President calls on the Senate and the Judiciary to join him in adopting this plan and applying it both now and in the future, no matter who is President or which party controls the Senate. The objective is to fix, on a permanent and bipartisan basis, a judicial confirmation process that is clearly broken.

THE CURRENT CRISIS

- There is a vacancy crisis in the federal Judiciary. As of this week, there are 79 vacancies out of the 849 authorized federal judgeships, a 9% vacancy rate. The 12 regional federal appeals courts face a particularly serious crisis, with 28 vacancies out of 167 judgeships, a 17% vacancy rate.

    - ✓ Chief Justice Rehnquist's 2001 Year-End Report on the Federal Judiciary, issued when there were 94 vacancies, called the situation "alarming."
    - ✓ The Secretary of the Judicial Conference of the United States, which is the federal Judiciary's governing body, stated in May 2002 that the overall shortage of federal judges is "staggering."
    - ✓ The American Bar Association report in August 2002 described the status of the federal Judiciary as an "emergency situation."
    - ✓ In 1998, when there were 50 judicial vacancies, Chairman Leahy stated that the number of vacancies represented a "judicial vacancy crisis." (AP, 10/22/98)
    - ✓ Caseloads in the federal courts continue to grow dramatically. Filings in the federal appeals courts reached an all-time high last year.

- The Senate has not lived up to its responsibility to hold fair hearings and prompt votes on judicial nominees.

    - ✓ The Senate has voted on only 80 of the President's 131 nominees overall and, even more problematic, has voted on only 14 of the President's 32 appeals court nominees. By contrast, in the first two years of the past three Administrations, 60 of the 65 appeals court nominees were confirmed.
    - ✓ As of November, 15 of President Bush's appeals court nominees will have been forced to wait more than a year just for a hearing (many are still waiting). That number is more than the number of appeals court nominees who had to wait a year for a hearing in the last 50 years combined.
    - ✓ The Chief Justice of the United States, speaking on behalf of the Judiciary in his 2001 Year-End Report, "ask[ed] the Senate to schedule up or down votes on judicial nominees within a reasonable time after receiving the nomination."
    - ✓ The American Bar Association report in August 2002 stated that as a result of delays in the judicial confirmation process, "the federal courts . . . suffer, and so does the rule of law." The report stated that the Senate Judiciary Committee's refusal to allow "confirmation proceedings in the full Senate is simply unacceptable to our notion of an appropriate and constitutional nomination process" and added: "Vote them up or down, but don't hang them out to dry."
    - ✓ The 2000 report of the bipartisan Citizens for Independent Courts stated that "the views of individual senators, while vital, should not be allowed to undermine collective decision-making in an open, deliberative process" and stated that "the Senate process should proceed expeditiously to a committee hearing, committee review and voting, and floor consideration and voting."

THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL

This President's plan requires specific commitments from everyone involved in the nomination and confirmation of federal judges:

- First, the President calls on federal court of appeals and district court judges to notify the President of their intended retirement dates at least a year in advance whenever possible. Because the nomination and confirmation of a federal judge can be a lengthy process even under the best of circumstances, advance notice is necessary to prevent extended unnecessary judicial vacancies. The President's call to the Judiciary builds on existing Judicial Conference recommendations and is intended to create a seamless process whereby a new federal judge is ready to take the bench at or near the time a sitting federal judge retires.

- Second, Presidents should submit a nomination to the Senate within 180 days of receiving notice of a federal court vacancy or intended retirement. This would help expedite the process by which home-State Senators, Representatives, bar leaders, and others provide their recommendations and evaluations of possible judicial candidates to the President, while leaving ample time for Presidents to vet and choose nominees of the highest quality.

- Third, the President calls on the Senate Judiciary Committee to hold a hearing within 90 days of receiving a nomination. The Committee has engaged in too many delays of too many nominees for too many years. A strict deadline, which will apply no matter who is President and which party controls the Senate, is the best way to ensure that judicial nominees are promptly and fairly considered. Ninety days is more than enough time for the Committee to conduct any necessary research before holding a hearing.

- Fourth, the President calls on the full Senate to hold an up-or-down floor vote within 180 days of receiving a judicial nomination. That is a generous period designed to give both the Committee and the full Senate ample time to evaluate nominees and answer any questions they may have. And all Senators will have an opportunity to have their voices heard and their votes counted.

WBA Starts Season With Open House

The Women's Bar Association (WBA) of the District of Columbia kicks off the fall season with a networking reception and open house on September 19 from 6 to 8 p.m. at the Homer Building, 601 13th Street NW, atrium level.

"Attendees will have an opportunity to network, make new contacts, and reestablish old ties," says WBA President Ellen Jakovic. "Most importantly, we hope attendees will enjoy the camaraderie and spirit of friendship which is an essential part of the WBA's mission."

The event, cosponsored by White & Case LLP, provides an opportunity for members and potential members to learn about the mission of the WBA and its programs and committees.

"The WBA helps its members advance and enhance their careers on many different levels," says Jakovic. "The WBA provides leadership training; personal and professional development opportunities; a forum for addressing issues of importance to the profession and the advancement of women; and a network of more than 1,000 attorneys."

For more information on attending or becoming a member of the WBA, call 202-639-8880, e-mail wba@wbadc.org, or visit www.wbadc.org.

Checking Conflicts When Moving to a New Firm

Mick Wiggins

When a lawyer contemplates moving to a new firm, it is necessary to determine whether prior work done by the lawyer on client matters may create a conflict of interest for the new firm. To check whether such conflicts exist, only information that does not constitute "confidences" or "secrets" may be revealed without client consent. In most cases, however, sufficient information may be disclosed to permit a check of conflicts.

In Opinion 273 (1997) the D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee discussed a number of issues raised by the movement of lawyers from one firm to another. One issue mentioned was the need to check for possible conflicts of interest between current and former clients of the lawyer's existing firm and the clients of the new firm. Seeking to address the uncertainty among lawyers who are proposing to move to a new firm, the Legal Ethics Committee in recent Opinion 312 considers the extent to which the moving lawyers may reveal information to their prospective new firms for the purpose of undertaking such checks.

The need for checking conflicts arises from Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification) of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. At paragraph (b) the rule provides that "[w]hen a lawyer becomes associated with a firm, the firm may not knowingly represent a person in a matter which is the same as, or substantially related to, a matter with respect to which the lawyer had previously represented a client whose interests are materially adverse" to the present firm's client, but only when the moving lawyer has in fact acquired information protected by Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information) that is material to the matter.

Where a lawyer joining a firm is concerned about conflicts that may have been caused by work done before becoming a lawyer, as a law clerk, summer associate, paralegal assistant, or other nonlawyer assistant, Rule 1.10(b) does not require disqualification of the firm that the lawyer is joining in any event, but other considerations apply. See D.C. Ethics Op. 227 (1992).

Not every client of the former firm is deemed to be a former client of the moving lawyer, but only those with whom the lawyer had an attorney–client relationship. See Comment [19] to Rule 1.10. The result is that conflicts that applied to the lawyer while in firm A only because of imputation required by Rule 1.10(a) do not apply when the lawyer is moving to another firm.

This narrower scope of Rule 1.10(b) reflects the policy favoring attorney mobility. See Comment [10] to Rule 1.10. Typically, when a lawyer contemplates joining a new firm, the lawyer provides information to that firm indicating the clients, adversaries, and subject matter on which the lawyer has worked so that the new firm may check if the lawyer's joining would create a conflict of interest with any of the firm's clients.

It is not possible to generalize about how this process does or should occur. What a lawyer may disclose is considered in Rule 1.6, which requires lawyers not to reveal confidences and secrets of a client or former client. Without a former client's consent, therefore, a lawyer may, in checking conflicts at a new firm, reveal information about representations that is not privileged and is not secret. "Secret" refers to other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing or would likely be detrimental to the client. In the great majority of cases, this leaves the lawyer free to reveal sufficient information to carry out a reliable check of conflicts.

There are many instances when the facts surrounding a representation may be so sensitive and fraught with the possibility of injury or embarrassment to the client that, absent a waiver, the information is not subject to disclosure even for conflict-checking purposes. In those cases Opinion 312 suggests some rough guidelines to be applied on a case-by-case basis:

- As a general rule, to check conflicts it is merely necessary to compare the client name and the general subject of the representation.
- In some cases, identifying a particular issue or subject matter without identifying the client name may be sufficient to determine the lack of any conflict. See D.C. Ethics Op. 265 (1996).
- If the subject matter but not the client name is sensitive, it may be possible to avoid the sensitive area if the moving lawyer mentions only the client's name.
- If the identity of the client creates a problem, it may be possible to name those persons or entities to which that client is adverse.
- As a first stage in an inquiry, it may be possible to avoid revealing confidences and secrets by providing a list of names to the firm without revealing which are clients and which are adverse parties.

New Web Site Coming

Mick Wiggins

A fresh, new D.C. Bar Web site is coming! Since the site's last redesign in June 1999, we've experienced a classic case of a site outgrowing its navigation. Over the last year we've added content from the Attorney/Client Arbitration Board, Clients' Security Fund, and Lawyer Counseling Program, and have expanded the attorney discipline area. Growth is good, but the downside is that the site is busting at its navigational seams, making it difficult for users to find information and perform the tasks they expect from a Web site.

Improvement is on the way. Thanks to some ingenious information architecture by our consultants, with input from Bar staff about content and development, the new site will have a much cleaner, more compact feel. It may even look like a smaller site at first glance. Don't be fooled. Doing away with clutter doesn't mean doing away with substance, and there's actually more packed into this compendious design.

To augment the recommendations of the information architects who contributed to this endeavor, Bar staff also spent an afternoon soliciting the assistance of members exiting a section event one afternoon. As they were leaving we asked them if they would like to serve as subjects in some user testing we were performing. If you were one of those individuals, thank you. It provided us with valuable information in understanding where the old site missed the mark.

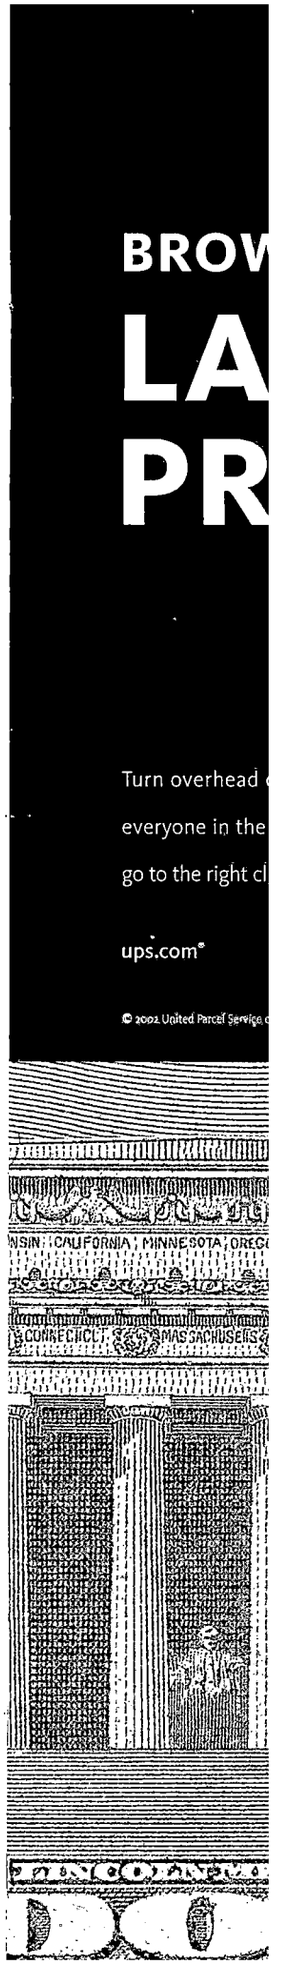
There have also been considerable gains made in what is technically possible on a Web site since the dark ages way back in the penultimate year of the 20th century, and the redesigned site exploits these newer capabilities to make it as user-friendly as current technology permits.

The artwork of the new site was a big hit with Bar staff when first unveiled by the design firm. But as much as the artistry won me over on first impression, I came to appreciate it even more after reading the artist's statement. I'll share an excerpt of that statement with you now, but you'll need to understand that the new site is divided into three main areas for the following to make sense: "Inside the Bar includes a window, playing off the idea that one is actually inside a space. A lion is used in the For Lawyers banner design to symbolize strength and respect. Water is placed in center view in the For the Public banner characteristic of fountains in our public parks." Other imagery throughout the site is of cherry tree blossoms, a Metro station ceiling, marble floor tiles in Union Station, a ceiling detail from the Smithsonian's National Museum of Natural History, and columns in Georgetown.

To keep things interesting, I'll not spoil the mystery and spell out where all that is. You can have fun finding it on your own.

But looks aren't everything, and along with the modernized look and zippy navigational controls will be a whole host of new features Bar members have been requesting. The question most frequently asked of me over the last couple of years is "Can I pay my dues online?" Heretofore I've had to answer no. Now the answer is yes. In the weeks following the launch of the new site, we'll phase in the ability to purchase publications and register online for continuing legal education (CLE) courses, section programs, and other special Bar-sponsored events.

If you've not been taking advantage of the resources the Bar's Web site makes available, may I suggest you use the launch of the new site as the perfect time to join company with the roughly 2,000 people every day who already benefit from what it offers. For example, on the site there are more than 100 forms for Superior Court filings, and every Thursday morning the Court of Appeals releases slip opinions. You can subscribe to mailing lists to receive e-mail alerts of new ethics opinions as soon as they are released or CLE courses that match your practice area. Take advantage of the assistance made available by the Lawyer Practice Assistance Program; take advantage of the anonymity afforded by a Web site to seek counseling. There is so much more available at www.dcbar.org.



We didn't simply tweak our current design. In fact, we made no attempt to salvage any part of it, opting instead to rebuild the Web site from the ground up. In doing so, we tried to play soothsayer and predict where we'd be five years from now, and designed the site such that it allows for graceful scalability. Though we certainly want to get as much mileage as possible out of this redesign, it's never too soon to begin receiving your suggestions on how it could be improved. The e-mail I've received from members over the last couple of years has played a critical role in shaping the site we unveil this fall, so please keep those letters coming.

News and Notes on the D.C. Bar Legal Community

Clinton Questions Supreme Court's Direction

The American Constitution Society for Law and Policy invited a lawyer, a federal judge, and a senator to offer their insights on the direction of the U.S. Supreme Court at a special event held July 23 at Georgetown University Law Center. Joining attorney John Payton of Wilmer, Cutler & Pickering at the rostrum were Judge Robert W. Pratt of the Southern District of Iowa and New York Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Elaborating on her thesis of the activist nature of the Supreme Court under Chief Justice William Rehnquist, Clinton expressed concern over the direction the Court has taken and its adherence to what she described as a philosophy of judicial supremacy.

"At its core," she said, "judicial supremacy holds that the judiciary is not merely the final arbiter but the sole arbiter of constitutional meaning in our democratic form of government. In other words, whatever the Congress and American people believe the Constitution means, the courts and especially the Supreme Court will not and should not hesitate to dismiss it."

According to Clinton, during its first 130 years the Supreme Court struck down approximately 50 acts of Congress; later the Warren court invalidated federal laws in 20 cases over a 16-year span. The pace of invalidating federal laws has accelerated, as the Rehnquist court overturned acts of Congress in no fewer than 32 cases during the last eight terms.

"By any measure," Clinton asserted, "the current court is one of the most activist, if not the most activist Supreme Court, in American history."

She pointed out, "In 11 of the 32 cases where the current court has stuck down a federal law, the Court did so not to protect individual rights but to protect states' rights, in many cases to protect states from the enforcement of civil rights guaranteed by federal law."

Clinton's remarks highlighted two cases of the October 2002 term that she believes will be instructive to watch, given the Court's federalism revival: Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs and Pharmaceutical Research & Manufacturers of America v. Concannon.

The Hibbs case addresses the constitutionality of the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA) and questions whether the legislation violates states' Eleventh Amendment immunity to suits from individuals. Hibbs sued the state of Nevada claiming that he was denied leave due to him under the act. In federal district court Nevada successfully argued it was immune to such suits, although the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the ruling.

Clinton believes the legislative history of the bill establishes that the FMLA was passed to address the established history of gender discrimination in the United States and that the stated purpose of the act was to "promote the goal of equal opportunity for women and men" and thus was not in violation of the Constitution.

The same argument was used by the Bush administration when it argued that the Supreme Court should not grant certiorari. In his brief Solicitor General Theodore Olsen wrote: "The family-care provision at issue here stands on a distinct constitutional footing. It remedies and directly responds to the continuing effects of well-documented, historic gender discrimination in employment and employment policies."

Clinton expressed concern that the Court was reining in Congress's power to enforce the equal protection clause. If the Court were to rule against Hibbs, she said, the decision would exemplify "federalism gone awry."

The Concannon case involves a plan by the state of Maine, Healthy Maine Prescription Plan (Maine Rx), to provide discounted drugs to underinsured individuals who do not qualify for Medicaid.

Individuals who enroll in Maine Rx are eligible for discounted drugs at participating pharmacies. The state reimburses the pharmacy with rebates it has negotiated with the pharmaceutical manufacturer. The state negotiates the rebates by leveraging its buying power as administrator of the Medicaid program; companies that do not negotiate price reductions are not granted preapproval status in the Medicaid program, and patients must get authorization if they are prescribed a drug manufactured by those companies. The drug manufacturers sued the state alleging that the program violates the commerce clause.

REV_00255692

Clinton argued that the current Supreme Court has been usurping congressional power. "The Rehnquist revolution in constitutional law," she said, "has occurred at a time in our nation's history when there is no significant public clamor for a constitutional vision and, worse, the Court has rendered its decisions in terms deliberately designed to exclude Congress and by extension the American people from playing a part in defining what the Constitution requires and permits. The American people are not the true wizards behind the Court's velvet curtain and the Court seems intent on keeping it so."

John Payton, immediate past president of the D.C. Bar, discussed the likely appeal to the Supreme Court of the University of Michigan affirmative action cases, Gratz v. Bollinger and Grutter v. Bollinger. Payton represented the university in lawsuits challenging the admissions policies of the undergraduate and law schools.

The event's sponsor, the American Constitution Society for Law and Policy, is an organization of law students, law professors, attorneys, and judges created as a counterbalance to the Federalist Society.

Master Business License Deadline Extended

The D.C. Department of Consumer and Regulatory Affairs at a press conference on August 7 extended the grace period for businesses to obtain a master business license (MBL) to December 31.

The extension is for businesses located in the District's commercial zones and for those that conduct business within the District but have offices located outside the city. Home-based businesses within residential zones of the District have until February 28 to obtain the MBL.

The D.C. Bar has requested clarification from the District government regarding exactly who and what types of legal business entities must apply for an MBL.

Updated information on the MBL issue is available at www.dcbar.org/license.

Nomination Commission Announces Vacancies on Family Court

The District of Columbia Judicial Nomination Commission seeks candidates for three vacancies on the family court of the D.C. Superior Court. The commission will forward the names of three candidates for each opening to President Bush for selection to serve a 15-year term on the bench.

Membership Dues Reminder: Late Fees Now Assessed

District of Columbia Bar members who had not paid their annual dues by August 15 were sent a final notice by first-class mail levying a $30 late fee and notifying them that if they fail to mail dues and late fees by September 30 they will automatically be suspended for nonpayment of dues.

For more information, contact the D.C. Bar Membership Office at 202-626-3475 or 1-877-333-2227, ext. 475, or membership@dcbar.org.

The District of Columbia Family Court Act of 2001 created the three new positions on the family court. This legislation requires that family court judges have training or expertise in family law and a certified intention to serve a full five-year term on the family court and participate in training.

Interested candidates should submit a completed judicial questionnaire to the commission by the close of business on September 26. Persons who have a questionnaire on file with the commission and wish to be considered should write the chairperson, Patricia M. Worthy, indicating their interest by the September 26 deadline.

The Judicial Nomination Commission is located in the D.C. Superior Court, 515 Fifth Street NW, Room 325, Washington, DC 20001. To request a judicial questionnaire, call 202-879-0478.

Judicial candidates must be U.S. citizens and active members of the D.C. Bar, and for the five-year period immediately preceding nomination by the commission, must have been in active practice of law in the District of Columbia, on the faculty of a law school in the District, or employed as an attorney by the United States or the D.C. government.

Family Court Seeks Attorneys for CCAN Panel

The family court of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia seeks applications from attorneys interested in serving on the family court panel of lawyers for representation of indigent persons.

The Family Court Panels Committee and the presiding and deputy presiding judges of the family court will make recommendations to Chief Judge Rufus G. King III to install four separate panels of attorneys. The panels are for lawyers who will seek compensation from the court; pro bono attorneys do not need to apply to a panel. Individuals may serve on more than one panel.

The four panels are made up of attorneys eligible for appointment in juvenile proceedings for appointment as guardians ad litem, for appointment to represent parties in neglect and termination-of-parental-rights proceedings, and for appointment as special education advocates. Special education advocates are urged to apply even if they intend to seek compensation from the D.C. public school system, so that judges have a list of qualified attorneys from which to make appointments.

Panel information and applications are available from the Counsel for Child Abuse and Neglect (CCAN), D.C. Superior Court, 500 Indiana Avenue NW, Room 4415, Washington, DC 20001; 202-879-1406. Attorneys interested in serving on a family court panel must submit an application by 5 p.m. on October 1.

Lawyers who wish to be appointed to CCAN cases must complete an attorney training session. The next session is scheduled for October 24–25. Further information is available from the CCAN office.

Bar Seeks Nominations for Rosenberg Award

The D.C. Bar seeks nominations for the Beatrice Rosenberg Award for Outstanding Government Service. The award, which will be presented March 28 at the 2003 D.C. Bar Conference, honors a member of the Bar whose career in government exemplifies the highest order of public service.

Nominees should have a long-term government career with outstanding performance. They must also show excellent judgment on their own matters and matters handled by those under their supervision. Other qualities that make a strong candidate include community service and the mentoring of young lawyers. In addition, nominees must be employed by a federal, state, or local government agency.

The award's legendary namesake, who died in 1989, dedicated her 35-year career to government service, performing with distinction at the U.S. Department of Justice and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. She also served as a member of the Board on Professional Responsibility.

This will mark the 14th presentation of the award. The 2002 winner was Luis Eduardo Rumbaut, senior counsel to the D.C. Office of the Corporation Counsel.

Send written nominations by December 2 to Katherine Mazzaferri, Executive Director, D.C. Bar, 1250 H Street NW, Sixth Floor, Washington, DC 20005-5937.

Panel Reviews State of Criminal Justice System

Leading figures in the District of Columbia's local and federal criminal justice system entertained questions and reflected on the state of the justice system at a July 16 luncheon program sponsored by the Bar's Criminal Justice and Individual Rights Section.

Moderated by Gregory L. Poe, assistant federal public defender, the panel comprised Judge Reggie B. Walton, U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia; Judge Noël A. Kramer, presiding judge of the criminal division of the D.C. Superior Court; Roscoe C. Howard Jr., U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia; Michele A. Roberts, of counsel at Shea & Gardner; Ronald Sullivan, director of the Public Defender Service for the District of Columbia; and A. J. Kramer, federal public defender.

Judge Noël Kramer, Roscoe Howard, and Ronald Sullivan were among the panelists discussing the District's criminal justice system at a July 16 luncheon program sponsored by the Bar's Criminal Justice and Individual Rights Section.

Although the discussion of the state of the criminal justice system within the District of Columbia ranged widely, it focused in large part on the effects of antiterrorism legislation on the administration of justice.

Judge Kramer said the interpretation of rights under the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments has changed under the Justice Department's antiterror campaign. She attributed this in part to a lack of understanding of these amendments among the general public, and as a consequence citizens care less about them and are willing to trade degrees of freedom for security.

Judge Walton agreed with the tenor of her comments, but also noted that Americans have relatively short memories. Provided the United States was not subject to a rash of terrorism, he expected the general mood to revert back to what it was before September 11, 2001.

Roscoe Howard acknowledged that the U.S. attorney's office and the Justice Department have taken a more aggressive posture on investigations. He stated that part of the U.S. attorney's office's mission is to find those who are planning harm before they commit the crime, and to do that within the framework of the Bill of Rights. He noted that the office takes its cue from public input received through its community prosecution effort.

One aspect of the community prosecution program, the multiple-defendant drug gang conspiracy prosecutions in federal court, was the subject of debate among the panelists. Howard said that these racketeering prosecutions are admittedly a drain on the court's time and the public defender's office. He added, however, that they are important because they paint a true picture of the crime and the charged individuals to the jury, and they are an effective way of reclaiming neighborhoods from organized criminal activity.

Although some of the panelists criticized this approach for creating excessively long trials and consuming too many resources, they all supported the program for its involvement in the community and for addressing quality-of-life crimes as well as complex homicide cases.

Press Gallery Reviews Supreme Court Term

The D.C. Bar Courts, Lawyers and the Administration of Justice Section offered its annual summer series program "The Supreme Court: The View From the Press Gallery" on July 9, featuring (from left) Stuart Taylor of the National Journal and Newsweek; Tony Mauro of Legal Times and American Lawyer Media; Anne Gearan of the Associated Press; moderator Arthur Spitzer, legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union of the National Capital Area; Joan Biskupic of USA Today; and David Savage of the Los Angeles Times. The journalists gave their views of the Court's decisions during the most recent term and insights on the Court's daily operation.

rewardingly use their newly found free time. They believed there was a substantial untapped capacity for pro bono work among senior lawyers who were retired or about to retire.

In the past, Kapp thought about the possibility of creating a domestic public interest law firm to tap this underutilized group, but more recently his interest had increasingly steered toward international human rights and the rule of law. In his discussion with Essaye, a former general counsel with the Peace Corps, the seeds of the International Senior Lawyers Project (ISLP) were sown. Over subsequent meetings the idea of ISLP began to take form and a working group of interested, qualified senior lawyers was assembled.

Kapp and Essaye set out identifying needs, projects, and lawyers willing to participate. With the help of grants from the Pew Charitable Trusts, the Soros Foundation Network, and several law firms, they have added an executive director and administrator and undertaken a feasibility study and plan.

Through conversations with public agencies and nongovernmental organizations in eastern Europe and South Africa, the study revealed a widespread need for lawyers in all fields of law for specific project tasks. Although the ISLP working group has several international members, the current preponderance of American lawyers, Kapp believes, will help the project promote its goal of fostering the growth of a pro bono and public interest legal culture abroad.

On the basis of planning research, ISLP has adopted four program responsibilities: provide assistance to government agencies, international organizations, and local nongovernmental organizations engaged in efforts to develop democratic institutions, advance the rule of law, strengthen human rights, and promote economic opportunity for disadvantaged populations; assist indigenous legal service providers to increase their capacity and to help train their staff; enhance the skills of local lawyers and paraprofessionals by helping to develop courses, programs, and workshops; and assist in developing an indigenous pro bono capacity.

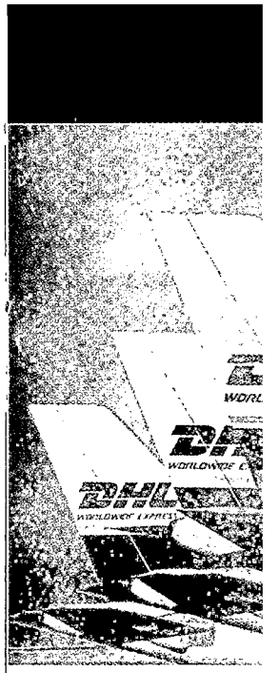
ISLP currently has a database of 150 senior lawyers registered as potential volunteers. ISLP lawyers have completed four projects, including legal infrastructure review and recommendations in the district of Brcko in Yugoslavia and a human rights assessment in Russia, and have 10 projects currently under way or in development.

Attorneys wishing to get involved in ISLP should visit the organization's Web site at www.islp.org.

Oral History Project Captures Circuit Court Legends

Passing through the east entrance of the District of Columbia Circuit's E. Barrett Prettyman United States Courthouse, visitors find themselves standing before an interactive display with several listening stations. Pick up one of the earpieces and Judge Aubrey E. Robinson Jr. recounts discrimination during his career. At another listening station Judge Patricia M. Wald talks about the importance of oral argument and how it can influence a judge's decision.

The recordings are part of the Oral History Project of the Historical Society of the District of Columbia Circuit and will be in the courthouse lobby through the fall.



Begun in 1991, the project collects the stories of judges who have served the courts of the D.C. circuit and of prominent lawyers and courthouse staff who have actively been involved in court matters. The Oral History Project has recorded the experiences and reflections of more than 30 of the District's most recognizable jurists and attorneys, and nearly 30 additional histories are under way.

Under the direction of Stephen J. Pollak and Linda J. Ferren, the project has recruited some 40 attorneys to conduct interviews, with the goal of interviewing every living judge who has sat on the bench. The completed histories are kept in the library of the E. Barrett Prettyman Courthouse, the manuscript reading room of the Library of Congress, and the Historical Society of Washington, D.C.

Thumbing through the volumes, one will find the accounts of such individuals as Robert H. Bork, John H. Pickering, Harold H. Greene, and Charles Horskey. The narratives cover everything from legal philosophy and reflections on important cases to practice tips and humorous moments in the courtroom.

Judge Robinson, who served as chief judge of the District Court from 1982 until 1992, summarized qualities that make a good trial lawyer in his oral history: "First of all, a good trial lawyer knows his or her case. They have developed all the facts. They marshal the evidence to sustain their theory of the case or their theory of the prosecution or defense of a claim. They know the courtroom procedure; basic courtroom procedure—which is the cart and which is the horse—which comes first. A good trial lawyer has also the ability to understand people that he has to deal with in the context of a particular case.

"Second of all, a good trial lawyer ought to know something about the judge before whom the case is being tried.

D.C. Law Students Win Legal Assistance Fellowships

The law firm of Vinson & Elkins funded three fellowships granted by Equal Justice America to D.C. area law students this summer. Equal Justice America (EJA), a nonprofit organization that puts law students to work in legal assistance organizations throughout the United States, granted the fellowships to Christina Wilkes (second from left) of George Washington University, who worked for Ayuda; Corlie McCormick Jr. of Howard University, who worked for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law; and Tatiana Guttierez of Georgetown University, who worked for D.C. Law Students in Court. Dan Ruben (left), EJA executive director, and Mark Laufman (right), a partner at Vinson & Elkins, joined the recipients at a reception held June 27 at the firm.

What are the judge's no-nos, idiosyncrasies, level of patience? What is the judge's judicial temper, in fact, in a courtroom situation? How does it change? What makes it change? How can you eliminate changes that adversely affect you and obviously your client?

"The third thing a good trial lawyer knows is, in a jury case, he has some sense of understanding what makes jurors tick, especially when they are randomly selected from a very diverse population. [He knows] how to be clear; how to be direct without being condescending; how to walk that chalk line between establishing a record in the fashion the trial judge understands so that the application of the legal principles are made more easily, and at the same time, establishing a record that the jury understands. . . . So the good trial lawyer is really a person who understands people and knows how to deal with people in the context of adversarial litigation."

It appears, however, that sometimes even some of the most successful lawyers forgot Robinson's rules for a good trial lawyer—or at least forgot about his sense of humor.

John Pickering, a founding partner of Wilmer, Cutler & Pickering LLP, reminisced about a case tried before Judge Robinson: "Judge Robinson had a great sense of humor, and I saw it displayed beautifully during an argument in which the government was seeking a Taft–Hartley injunction against a coal mine strike that occurred in the Carter administration. The government came to argue for the injunction, and to stress the seriousness of the situation, the argument was begun by the attorney general, Judge Griffin Bell, who really had not had much time to review anything and he was just there, sort of like, I don't mean this in any derogatory sense, the acrobats that warm up the crowd before the main event came on—that was the lawyer from the civil division who was prepared to really answer questions.

"Judge Robinson couldn't resist: He threw a hypothetical at Judge Bell, which had nothing to do with much of anything; it was almost impossible to follow. He obviously had made it up just to have a bit of fun, and Judge Bell took him seriously and tried his best to answer the matter.

"Well, after a long argument, the judge [Robinson] said, 'Let's work out an order between the government, the union, and the coal companies,' and we all went trooping into the jury room. He presided and we really hammered out an acceptable order, in the course of which I had the opportunity in an aside to say, 'Why did you do that?' and he said, 'I was just seeing what the reaction would be.' "

Positions Open on Nominations Committee and NLSP Board

The D.C. Bar Board of Governors desires candidates for appointments this fall to the Committee on Nominations and the board of directors of the Neighborhood Legal Services Program (NLSP).

Under the Bar's bylaws, each year the board must appoint a seven-member Committee on Nominations that nominates candidates for Bar office for the next Bar election. Any active member of the Bar who is not an officer or member of the Board of Governors and who has not served on the Committee on Nominations at any time during the past three years is eligible.

The board is also accepting résumés from D.C. Bar members who are interested in serving on the board of directors of the NLSP. Candidates must be licensed attorneys who are supportive of the Legal Services Corporation Act and have an interest in, and knowledge of, the delivery of quality legal services to the poor. The D.C. Bar Screening Committee is required to attempt to reflect the diversity of the NLSP client population in its recommendations to the Bar's Board of Governors.

Candidates should submit a résumé of not more than two pages, along with a cover letter stating the position for which they wish to be considered, to the Screening Committee, District of Columbia Bar, 1250 H Street NW, Sixth Floor, Washington, DC 20005-5937.

The deadline for submissions is September 27.

Justice Department to Contract With Private Counsel to Collect Debts

The Department of Justice announced that it is seeking proposals from private counsel interested in entering into contracts to collect delinquent federal debts in the District of Columbia.

Sole practitioners and law firms that are awarded contracts will be authorized to sue federal debtors on behalf of the United States in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. These private lawyers and law firms will help the Justice Department collect unsecured federal debts such as defaulted student loans, overpayments to veterans, and defaulted Small Business Administration loans.

Private counsel will be paid on a contingency fee basis and will be expected to

New Bar Members Must Complete Practice Course

New members of the District of Columbia Bar are reminded that they have 12 months from the date of admission to complete the required course on District of Columbia practice offered by the D.C. Bar's Continuing Legal Education Program.

D.C. Bar members who have been inactive, retired, or voluntarily resigned for five years or more are also required to complete the course if they are seeking to switch or be reinstated to active member status. In addition, members who have been suspended for five years or more for nonpayment of dues or late fees are required to take the course to be reinstated.

New members who do not complete the mandatory course requirement within 12 months of admission receive a noncompliance notice and a final 60-day window in which to comply. After that date the Bar automatically suspends individuals who have not attended and forwards their names to the clerks of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals and the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, and to the Office of Bar Counsel.

Suspensions become a permanent part of members' records. To be reinstated one must complete the course and pay a $50 fee.

The course is $160. The next course dates are September 14, October 5, and November 2. Advance registration is encouraged.

Attorneys interested in obtaining a request for proposal from the Department of Justice should visit www.fedbizops.gov and click on "Find Business Opportunity" to search for solicitation number JRJMD-02-0213.

To be eligible to bid on these contracts, lawyers must be licensed to practice law in the District of Columbia and regularly engaged in the private practice of law in the District. They must also be admitted to practice before the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

Attorneys with any questions about this program should contact Tim Spencer at 202-307-1956.

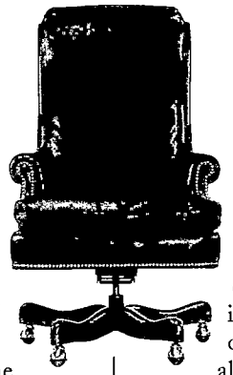
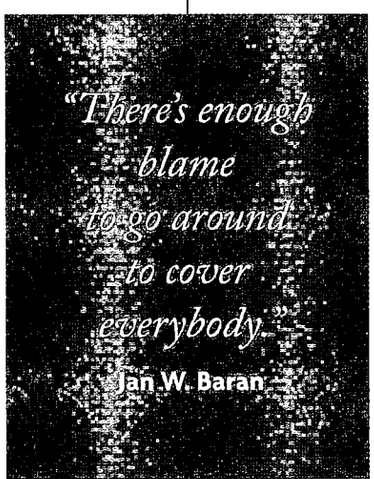
The federal machinery appointing judges to the bench remains cumbersome and contentious, often leaving both political parties unhappy with the results.



REV_00255700



REV_00255701

When it comes to judicial appointments, the Democrats and Republicans rarely speak words of compromise these days despite the ever-increasing delays in appointing judges that have created a "vacancy crisis" on the federal bench.

According to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, as of April 26, 90 federal judgeships were vacant out of a total of 862. Twenty-nine of the vacancies were in the circuit courts, 60 in the district courts, and one in the Court of International Trade. Not all districts and circuits need more judges, but quite a few suffer from serious workload problems.

Unfortunately, partisan tensions over filling the vacancies will not abate anytime soon. Many Washington lawyers well versed in the machinations of the judicial appointment process believe Democrat–Republican relations are as bad as they've been in a long while. "I think we're at the depth of partisan acrimony about the judicial selection and confirmation process," says Ron Weich, a partner at Zuckerman Spaeder LLP and formerly chief counsel to Senator Edward Kennedy on the Judiciary Committee.

Improving the judicial appointment process is a common subject in Washington, especially in the wake of particularly contentious confirmation hearings. The shelves of Washington think tanks are full of studies and commissions authorized by bar groups and the political parties. Eminent lawyers and judges, too, have testified on the Hill repeatedly, offering advice to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. Nevertheless, the federal machinery appointing judges to the bench remains cumbersome and contentious, often leaving both political parties unhappy with the results.

The Washington Lawyer has called upon six lawyers who have worked on appointments to explain why partisan relations are such a mess. These attorneys—three conservatives and three liberals—spoke to the magazine about the slowdown in appointing judges, the sore points in bipartisan politics, and whether candidates' ideologies should be considered during the process. Finally, they proposed commonsense ways to improve filling vacant judgeships.

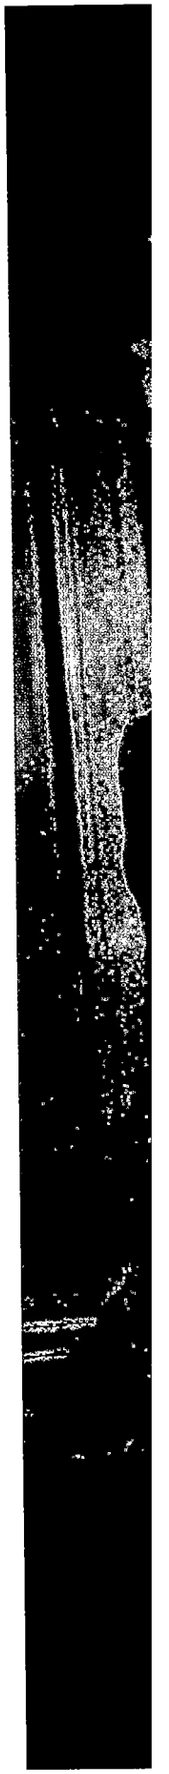
Bureaucratic Slowdown

From the time a federal judgeship becomes available, usually through death or retirement, to the moment a judge is appointed is unavoidably long. The White House and the Department of Justice must sift through scores of candidates—vetting the more serious—for hundreds of judgeships, while liaising with home state senators' offices, gubernatorial staffs, and their party organizations. More often than not the president does not know the final candidate, who has arisen from the primeval ooze of local and state politics.

At the Senate Judiciary Committee, the number of parties pushing favored candidates is so great that the chairman, to avoid a deluge of telephone calls, often announces confirmation hearings without giving much notice. An insufficient number of staffers collect courtesy "blue slips" from home state senators, allowing the confirmation to go forward, and beaver away at piles of paperwork from the FBI and the Department of Justice. With luck the slate of candidates the chairman cobbles together for confirmation hearings will satisfy senators, the White House, and the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, ever conscious of its overworked districts and circuits.

This complicated, deliberative process is particularly slow during split governments wherein one party controls the Senate while the other has the White House. The bipartisan Constitution Project reports that between 1977 and 1998 Senates during unified governments were able to confirm nominees, on average, in only 59 days. However, Senates during split governments took an average of 121 days to confirm successful candidates. Unsuccessful candidates to the federal bench followed the same pattern: 103 days on average for a candidate to fail during a unified government versus 238 days during divided governments.

The year before a presidential election is often especially slow, too. At that time the parties in the Senate will delay confirmations in the hope that they will win both the White House and control of the Senate.



"Bottom line and most definitively, you go into an election, like the presidential one in 2000, and each side thinks they are going to win," says Eleanor Acheson, who was assistant attorney general during the Clinton administration. "It's very tempting to say, 'Well, if we win, we'll get all of our appointments, so why should we compromise now?' "

Even after the election, says Acheson, it can be harder to get up and running than it appears from the outside. "Transition is like molasses," she says. "It's just very hard to get people in place. It takes much longer than you think."

The sad reality is, these cumbersome bureaucracies are becoming even slower at nominating and confirming judges. According to the Constitution Project, of the four presidents from 1977 to 2000, Carter was the fastest at nominating judges, then Reagan, Bush, and finally Clinton, who was the slowest. During the 105th Congress ending in 1998, it took President Clinton 75 more days to nominate a district or circuit court judge than it did President Carter.

The Senate is also slowing down. On average the Senate took 78 days to confirm, deny, or let expire a judicial nomination during President Carter's administration. By the Clinton administration, the Senate took 164 days to act on a nominee.

Now presidents may also have a harder time appointing judges than they did in the past. Ninety-eight percent of President Carter's successful nominations were appointed on his administration's first attempt to fill a district or circuit court vacancy. Although the Constitution Project has not yet finished its study of the last two Clinton years, for a term and a half the Clinton administration only had 73 percent of its successful nominations confirmed the first time. Carter never had to make more than two nominations to fill a vacancy, whereas Clinton had to make up to four.

Tit for Tat

One possible reason for increased delays in judicial appointments is the heightened importance lawmakers and the public place on judicial nominees, which in turn contributes to more political maneuvering. The appointment process was once a lower key affair than it is today. When President Roosevelt nominated Felix Frankfurter for the Supreme Court in 1939, for instance, it was not customary for nominees to testify before the Judiciary Committee. But when Frankfurter's views were misrepresented by other testimony, the White House advised him to appear in person. Frankfurter hesitated at first, fearing he would appear to be lobbying for the position. Frankfurter eventually testified, dispelling innuendoes of communist sympathy and winning his confirmation.

Today it would be remarkable for a Supreme Court nominee not to show up for his or her confirmation hearings fully prepped. During nominations to the Supreme Court and sometimes to circuit courts as well, administrations go into campaign mode, with key staff preparing for the hearings for weeks or even months. Partisan special-interest groups ratchet up their spin machines, too, with dizzying, issue-blurring effects. And during confirmation hearings, constituents follow closely via television and the Internet, immediately swamping the Senate Committee on the Judiciary with advice, opinion, and derision. The pressure on Senate offices is immediate and intense.

"I don't think the system needs to be fixed to a point where there's an automatic rubber stamp to any presidential nominee no matter who that person is."

Marcia D. Greenberger

Some Washington lawyers argue that the increased importance and scrutiny of the judicial appointment process is a result of the progress made in the 20th century. Despite the partisan bickering, the actual ideological gap between the parties, particularly in the Senate, is not as wide as it has been in the past.

"It's not as if we're debating about whether we should become a socialist nation or we should stick with capitalism," says Michael O'Neill, a law professor at George Mason University and former general counsel to the Judiciary Committee. "It's not as if we're debating about whether we should have an independent judiciary or not."

The parties may therefore feel the need to differentiate themselves, knowing all the while that the fighting and finger pointing can be done relatively safely. Moreover, the battles that remain—often over individual rights and social justice issues such as abortion, the death penalty, and women's rights—are focused more on the courts now than in the past because legislatures have not been as responsive. "As people began raising the social justice issues in the courts, in part because they ceased to be able to make progress in the legislatures, everybody on every single side of the issues focused on the courts as a battleground," says Acheson.

Who people think is to blame for the contentious environment often reflects their political persuasion. Ron Weich believes the Republicans shoulder the responsibility for the tensions, maneuvering, and delay in the appointment process today. "My personal view is that the approach of the Republican-controlled Senate during the Clinton administration has poisoned the waters in a manner that makes it difficult for Senate Democrats now to abide by a set of rules or deadlines," he says.

For O'Neill, who worked for Senator Orrin Hatch, much of the partisan tension dates back to the Robert Bork nomination. O'Neill notes that Bork had been a professor at Yale, solicitor general of the United States, a partner at a national law firm, and the author of a seminal text on antitrust law. In short, "He was worthy to wear the robe." Add in the hearings for William Rehnquist, when he was promoted to chief justice, and Clarence Thomas, and the Republicans became bitter, feeling they were "outflanked" and that their candidates were targeted for "narrow ideological reasons." Thus, when the Republicans took control of the Senate during the Clinton years, it was payback time. "You know, what comes around goes around to a certain extent," O'Neill says.

Jan Baran, formerly general counsel to the Republican National Committee and now a partner at Wiley Rein & Fielding LLP, sees a problem with the tit-for-tat attitude that results from both parties feeling aggrieved. "There was, in my view, unwarranted extensive delay during the last half of the Clinton administration, and now we're potentially seeing the beginning of similar delays in the Bush administration and its relationship with the Senate." He did not think the parties should delay the appointment process three years ago, nor does he think they should now.

It may be too early to tell if the Democratic-controlled Senate of today is mired in delay tactics. The past year in the Senate has been a strange and disrupted one. When Senator Jim Jeffords brought the Democrats to power, it took time to restructure the Judiciary Committee and get back to work. September 11 was also a disruptive influence, focusing the Senate's attention on defense and terrorism and slowing all other work. Lastly, the Bush administration's decision to cut the American Bar Association out of the candidate screening process prompted Senator Patrick Leahy, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to use the organization's services, which will further lengthen the confirmation process.

Despite a difficult year, and the apparent gridlock following Charles Pickering's denied confirmation, Marcia Greenberger, copresident of the National Women's Law Center, notes that the Senate confirmed 42 judges before getting around to Pickering. That's more, she says, than in some years that the Republicans controlled the Senate.

That Judge Pickering's nomination was denied does not necessarily indicate that Democrats and Republicans are at loggerheads, says Greenberger. "I don't think there is a system failure if a president felt strongly about somebody, nominated that person, and a majority of the senators on a committee charged with reviewing that nomination disagreed on appropriate grounds."

Judging Qualifications

One of the sorer points of contention between the Democrats and Republicans is the debate over whether or not a nominee's ideology should be openly considered during Senate confirmation hearings. The Constitution does not say that presidents may consider a candidate's ideology, but senators may not. In practice, however, there appears to be a double standard. President Bush can pledge during his campaign to nominate more judges like Justices Scalia and Thomas, but—at least publicly—the Senate is supposed to stick to a candidate's legal qualifications.

To Fred McClure, a former assistant for legislative affairs to President George H. W. Bush and now a shareholder at Winstead Sechrest & Minick P.C., there is nothing wrong with the president considering the ideology of potential candidates. "You would expect a Republican [president] to first of all nominate people who have a history of being Republican in nature," he says. And the same is true for a Democratic president. "You wouldn't expect a Bill Clinton under general circumstances to go get somebody Ronald Reagan put on the Federal District Court bench and elevate them to a higher court."

McClure and other Washington lawyers, however, emphasize that presidents do not choose candidates for the federal bench by grilling them on particular issues. The vetting of candidates' political philosophy only goes so far. "If some individual were to walk in to the White House and say, 'I've made up my mind on the abortion issue and you can count on me,' I'd think that would disqualify the individual from consideration for even nomination," says Jan Baran.

"I think we're at the depth of partisan acrimony about the judicial selection and confirmation process."
Ronald H. Weich

But if the executive branch expressly takes a nominee's political slant into account, why is it taboo for the Senate to consider it during confirmation hearings as well?

During his first hearing last year as chairman of the Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on administrative oversight and the courts, Senator Charles Schumer argued that his fellow lawmakers should expressly consider nominees' ideologies during confirmation hearings. During opening remarks, the senator stated that not taking ideologies publicly into account has led the Senate into an "escalating war of gotcha politics," wherein senators sift through nominees' pasts looking for proxies to deny candidates judgeships based on other grounds.

At a recent Federalist Society conference, Senator Jon Kyl criticized Schumer's hearings. He argued that the president—elected by the "mainstream" of the country—should decide who is ideologically appropriate, and not the senators. "Senator Schumer's constituency is not as broad—shall we just put it that way—as the national constituency," he said.

The fact is, though, senators do consider judicial nominees' ideologies, but avoid appearing to do so during public hearings. Fred McClure believes that "ideology has always played a part in the confirmation process. It's just that it sometimes manifests itself in different ways as the process goes forward."

In part, senators may fear being labeled partisan and reliving the Bork nomination, wherein the Senate delved in-depth into the nominee's judicial philosophy. They may also feel that investigations into ideology may threaten judicial independence. But what side of the debate individual senators line up on—for or against openly considering ideology—may also depend on which party controls the White House. As Michael O'Neill puts it, if it is your "ox [that] is being gored," you are less likely to want ideology to be considered. "If you're the one appointing the judges, you don't necessarily want your judges' ideology being looked at."

O'Neill also thinks Americans are culturally uncomfortable discussing ideology in public. Similar to conversations about class, talking about ideology simply "rubs people the wrong way." Moreover, senators' personal feelings are more liable to become hurt and bruised when they have personally championed candidates who are rejected. "When you tell Senator Lott . . . we're going to reject your buddy Pickering, it becomes personalized," says O'Neill. It's all the more frustrating for senators, he says, when a candidate's ideology, rather than his or her legal qualifications, is the main reason why the nomination fails.

Most of the attorneys the Washington Lawyer interviewed felt that ideology should only matter when the nominee is a rigid ideologue. No one lives in an opinion-free vacuum, they note, and it would be unrealistic to think judicial nominees are any different. Opinions, even strongly held convictions, should not bar someone from the federal bench.

Eleanor Acheson says that when she was at the Department of Justice, her office sought out candidates who would apply the law, regardless of personal belief. "I think the point of inquiry needs to be—regardless of what the person would do if he or she were czar—how is he or she going to be as a judge?" says Acheson.

Marcia Greenberger says that though she may be interested in a candidate's view on abortion, for instance, she is more concerned about the person's view of whether or not the law protects a woman's right to choose. Greenberger notes that Justice Brennan was personally opposed to abortion, but supported Roe v. Wade. "To me," she says, "the issue is much more a justice's approach to the law or a potential judge's approach to the law and the context of the Constitution. One might inform to some degree the other, but they are different inquiries."

Room for Improvement

Jan Baran thinks the acute partisan soreness felt on the Hill today is a result of America's political "equipoise," a situation in which neither party has had the clear upper hand in recent federal elections. Representatives and senators, Baran points out, have won seats by incredibly close margins over the last six to eight years. Moreover, the country has not elected a president with over 50 percent of the vote since 1988, and the presidential election of 2000 was "historically close."

seem to be extremely evenly divided among our society," says Baran. "Perhaps part of that is spilling over in this area [of] judicial appointments and confirmations."

The acrimonious feelings generated during the Clinton years have left Hill staffs, politicians, and Washington lawyers bitter, but neither party has the power to push its judicial candidates through the system unilaterally. The question before the political and legal community is how to surmount these ill feelings given that the parties share power in a divided government and there are many vacancies to be filled.

Baran says that the sides should come to an agreement. "They're going to [have to], on the one hand, atone for the sins of the fathers and, on the other hand, move forward." To Baran compromise is more likely now that Clinton is out of office, but of course, many of the Republican senators who battled against the president remain in office. It may be hard for the Senate-controlling Democrats to be magnanimous.

The crux of the problem is not a lack of good ideas for improving the judicial appointment process—a Constitution Project report included recommendations for change, as have many other studies and commissions authorized by bar groups and the political parties—but a paucity of political will to change. "I continue to believe that the recommendations and the timetables in the Constitution Project report are valid, but to implement those recommendations there needs to be a process for taking account of the distortions that occurred over the previous six years," says Ron Weich.

To assuage some of the bitterness, Baran suggests that some of the Democrats' candidates could be appointed by the Bush administration. It's an idea bandied about by many people in Washington—not surprisingly, the Democrats in particular.

"Ideology has always played a part in the confirmation process. It's just that it sometimes manifests itself in different ways as the process goes forward."

Frederick D. McClure

But Michael O'Neill questions whether or not such a gesture by Bush would actually help the situation, or merely be symbolic. He notes that Bush has already appointed a couple of Clinton nominees without any sign that partisan tensions are easing. He says, too, that the antagonism is not really between the White House and Senate Democrats, but between the parties in the Senate.

As a result, both parties in the Senate need to get past their sense of being aggrieved and work together on concrete ways to regularize the process. Weich proposes that, out of fairness to the president and his nominee, in most instances senators should give candidates a hearing and a full Senate vote.

Having worked on judicial nominations at the Justice Department during the 1990s, Eleanor Acheson also has concrete ideas for improving efficiency. She found that it helps for the Senate Judiciary Committee to be upfront and clear about what it needs from the administration for each candidate. Changing the type of requests every time only slows the process down.

"I have to say, as chairman, Senator Hatch made things very clear," says Acheson. He wanted all of a candidate's unpublished opinions that had anything to do with a long list of hot-button subjects, such as abortion, sentencing, and the death penalty. Although the list was extensive, it helped Acheson's staff to know what kind of information to elicit from potential nominees straightaway.

Acheson also urges the Senate to have at least one hearing a month, in an "absolutely predictable, methodical way," making sure to include one circuit court nominee and three or four district court nominees. Furthermore, she advises a two-track system to speed up the process. The first track would be for nominees unlikely to have problematic confirmations. The second track would include nominee include nominees who will provoke debate. By focusing on the less problematic nominees first, Acheson believes, the Senate could reduce the number of vacancies significantly.

Finally, Acheson thinks the White House and the Senate should consider the needs of each circuit as a whole. Indeed, when she was at the Department of Justice, Acheson spoke with chief judges about the needs of their circuits. During these conversations, she would learn that some circuits might need prosecutors or defense attorneys, whereas others lacked women, minorities, or former state judges. With the needs of a circuit in mind, she says, lawmakers should be prepared to put deals and packages of nominees together. Acheson admits, however, that this is wishful thinking, "highly academic," and unlikely to work in real life because of the number of people pushing for their preferred candidates, rather than thinking of the needs of the circuits.

Having worked for the Judiciary Committee, O'Neill feels that lawmakers should rethink the strenuous vetting process that candidates undergo. Young Senate staffers are often the ones vetting the candidates and, O'Neill thinks, are often unseasoned and overly ideological. They have not yet learned that good people can make mistakes in life.

O'Neill worries that this supercritical process may be keeping great judges from the bench. Especially in the murky areas of drug use and sexual harassment, it would be a shame to lose a good candidate because of something he or she did "11 or 12 years ago," says O'Neill, who clerked for Justice Thomas on the Supreme Court. Ultimately, O'Neill asks, are we getting better people today than we did in the 1920s and '30s when the process wasn't so stringent? "Maybe. Maybe not."

"I'm a great believer in forgiveness. . . . I think all of us have done things that we probably regret in our lives. That's just the nature of being a human being," says O'Neill.

> "It's not as if we're debating about whether we should have an independent judiciary or not."
> Michael E. O'Neill

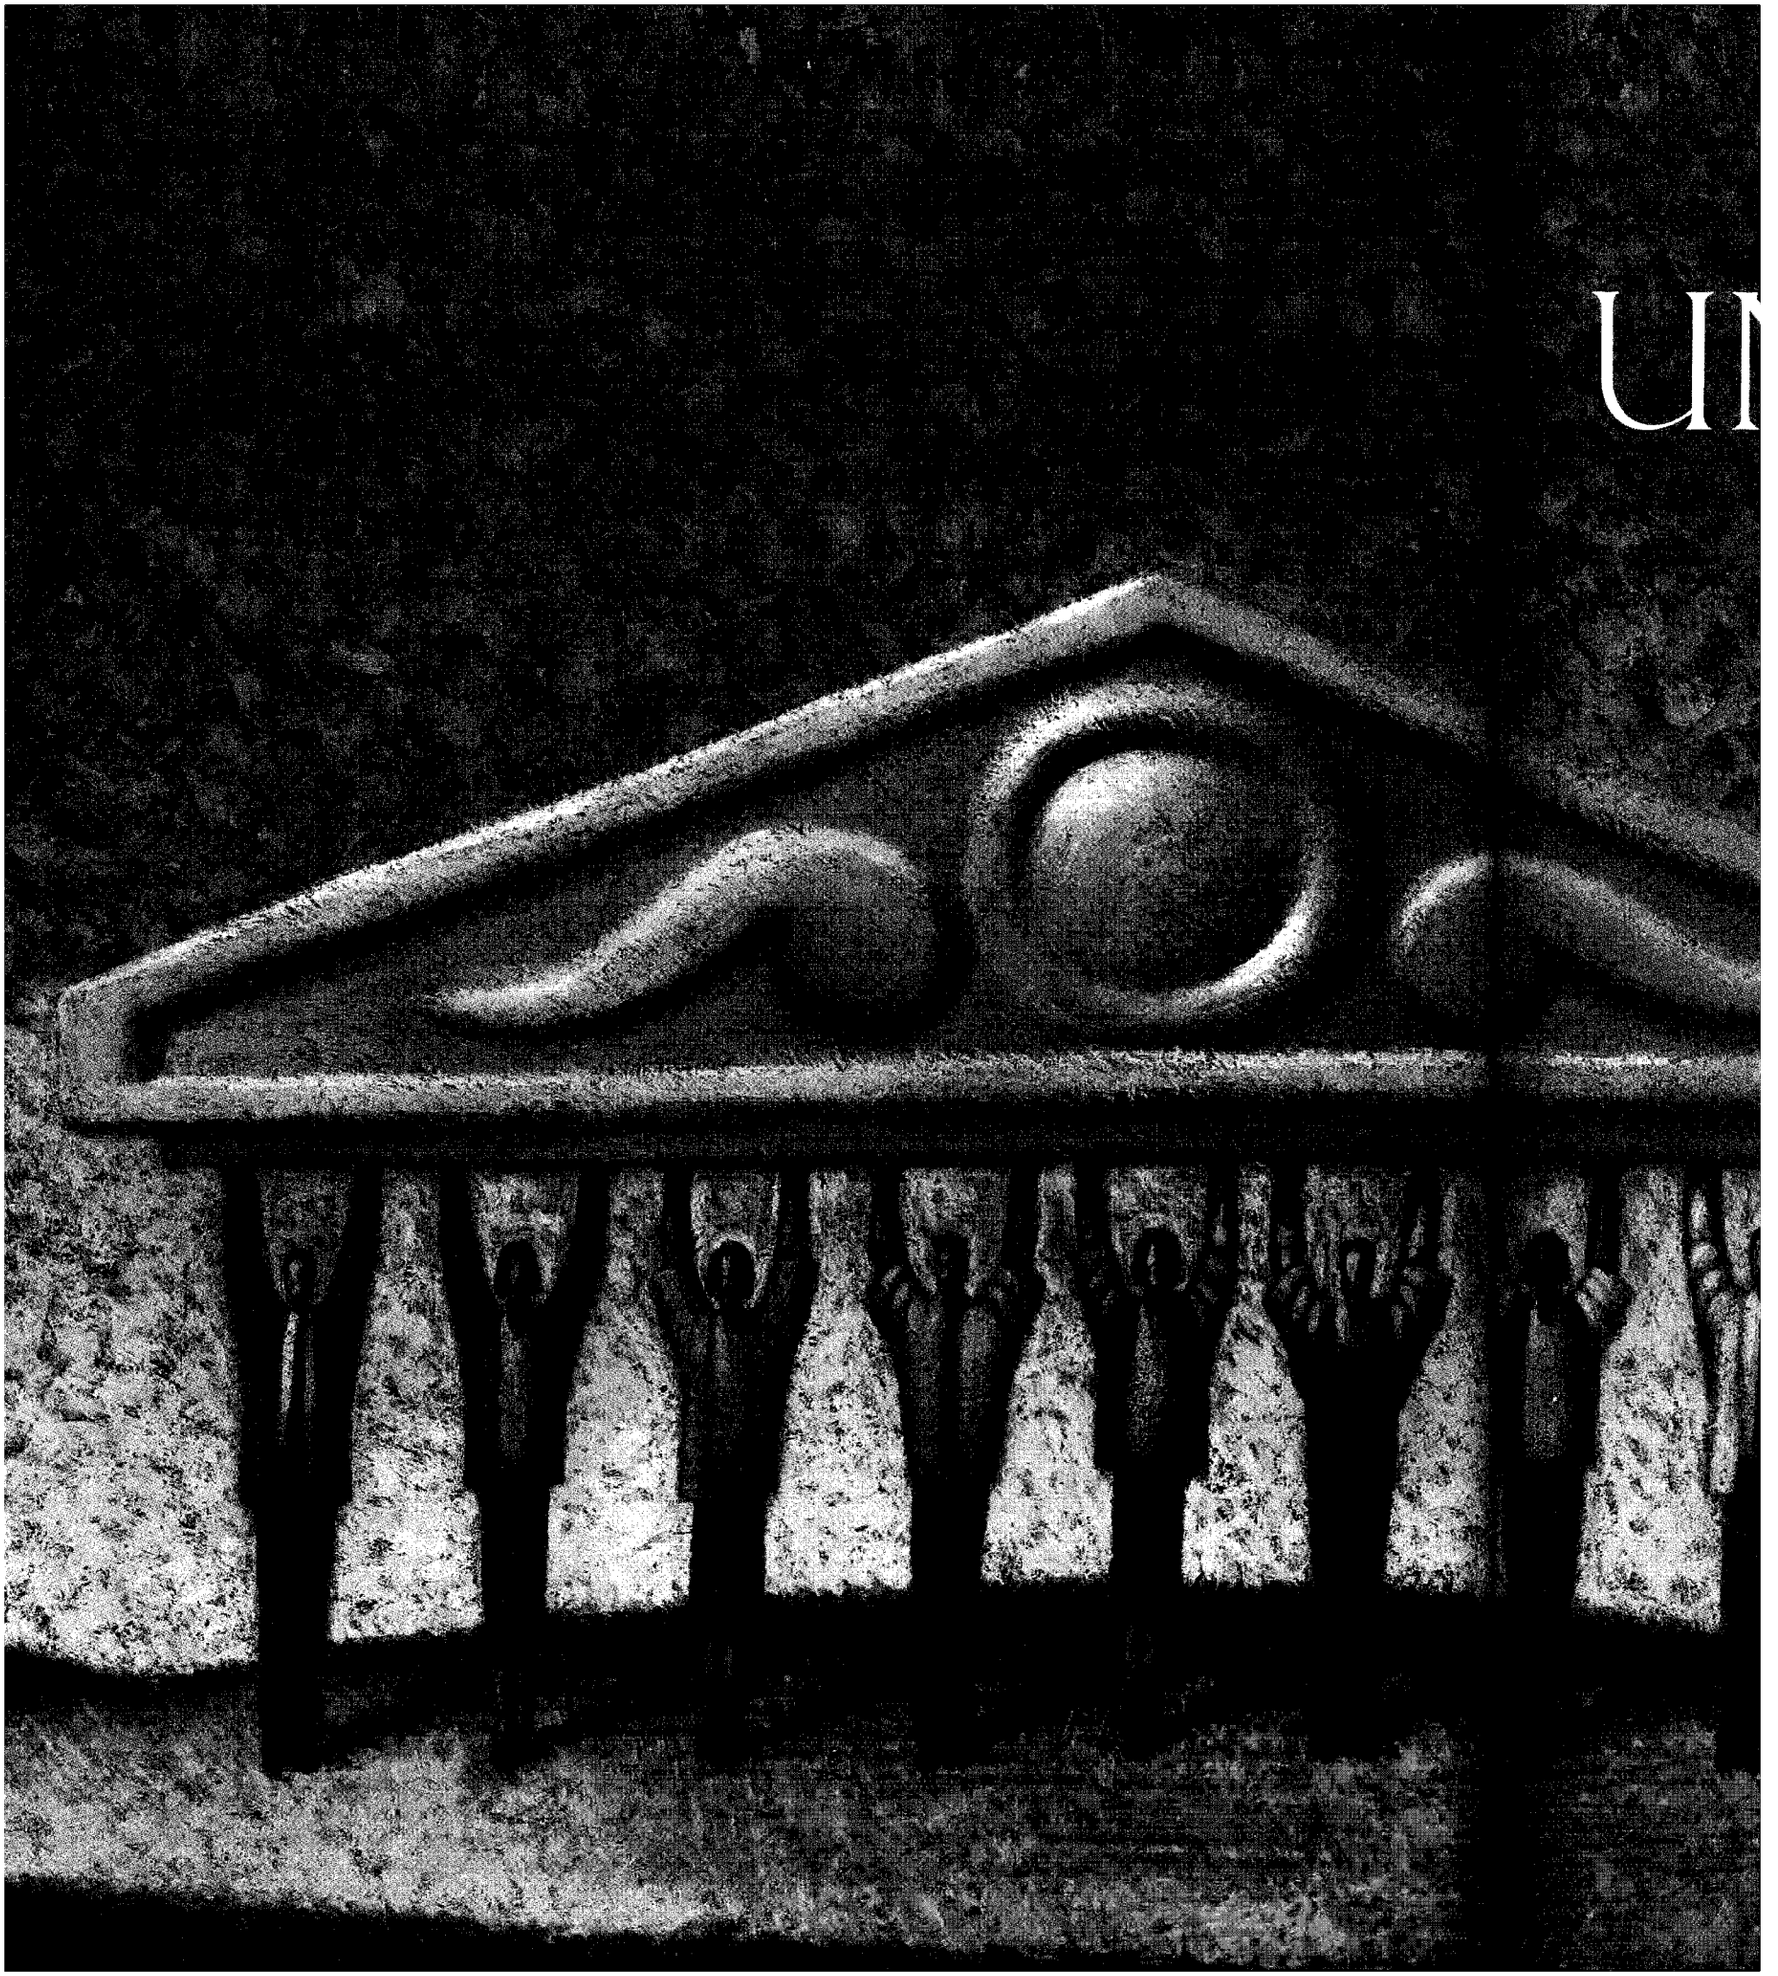
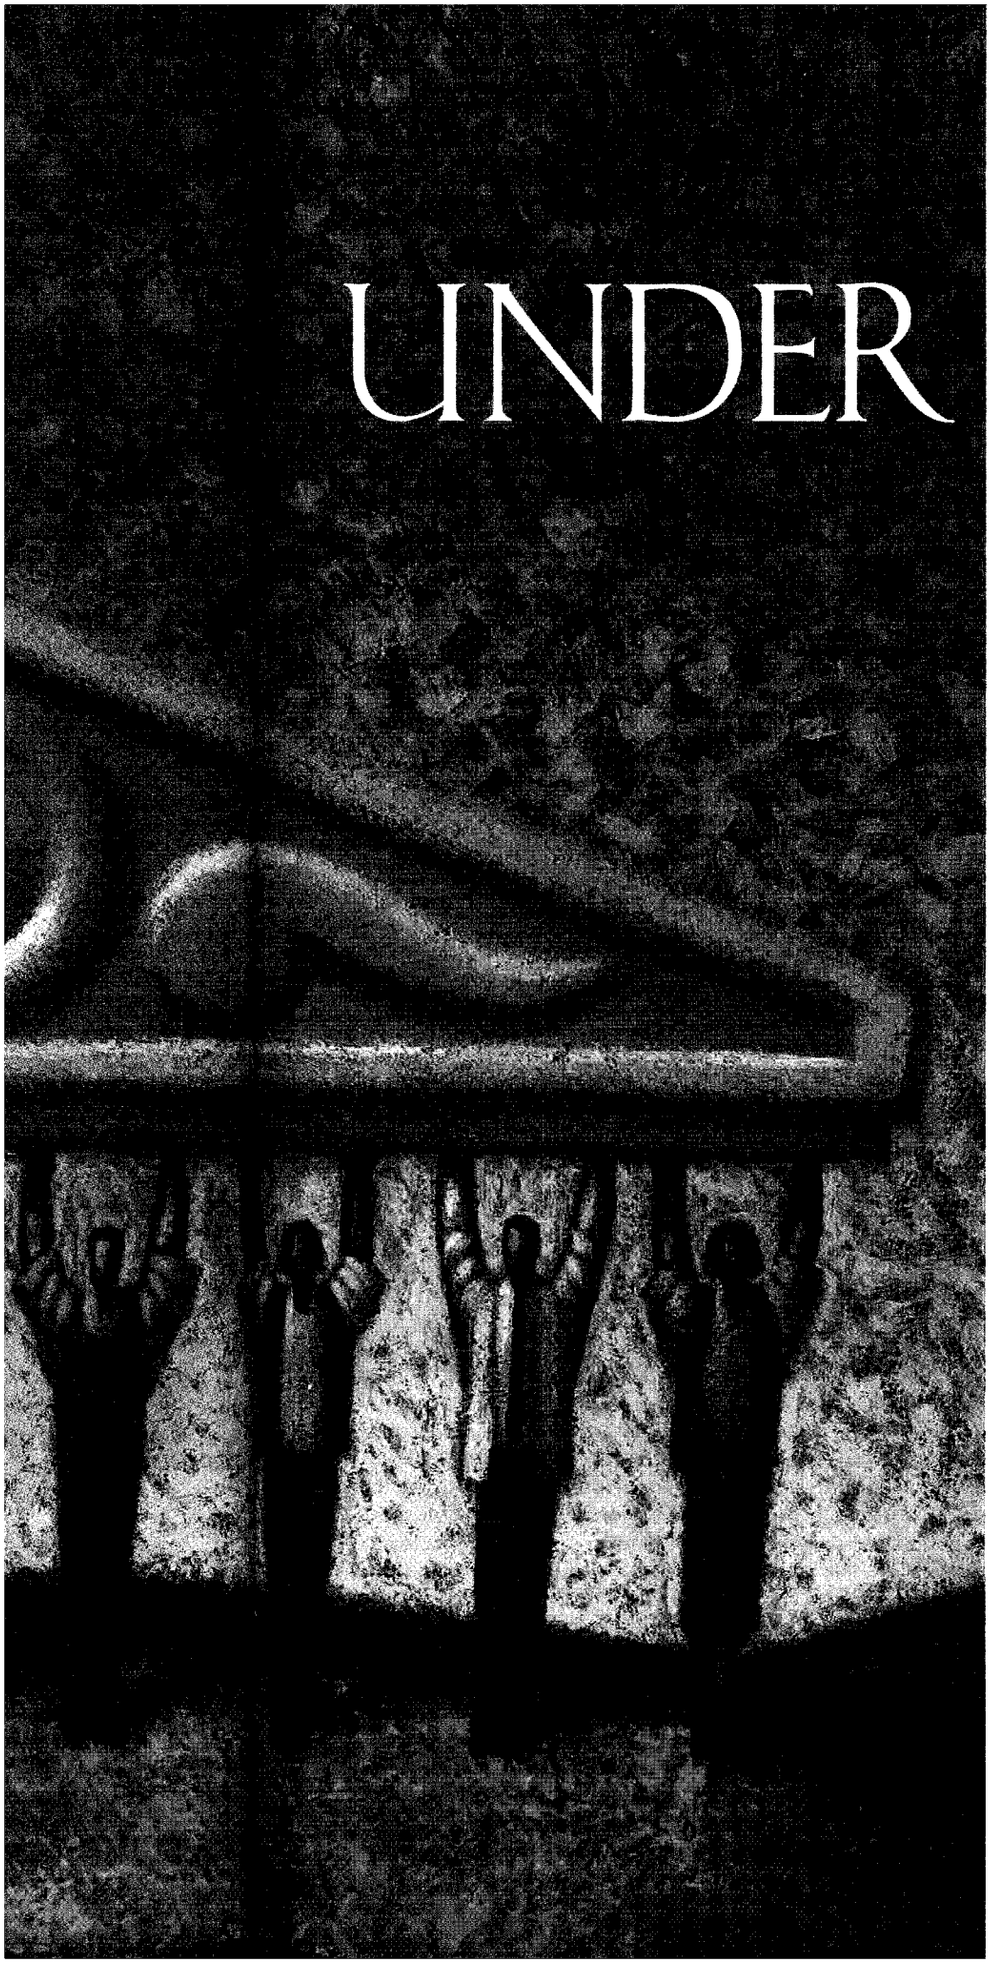
Burying the Hatchet

Unfortunately, the tit-for-tat battles in the divided government of the 1990s show little public sign of détente today. After the failed Pickering confirmation, the Bush administration held meetings with Republican senators and interest groups to prepare for the next set of nominees. "We are going to continue to nominate the same kind of people . . . [who are] well-qualified and in the mainstream," the Washington Post quoted White House counsel Alberto Gonzales saying on April 15. Both parties keenly believe they occupy the political center and neither is in the mood to compromise.



By its nature, especially during a divided government, the confirmation process is a contentious one, and a Senate that both confirms and denies nominees is doing its job. The solution to filling judicial vacancies does not involve a compliant Senate. "I don't think the system needs to be fixed to a point where there's an automatic rubber stamp to any presidential nominee no matter who that person is," says Marcia Greenberger.



In light of the vacancy crisis, though, the administration and the parties in the Senate must work together to appoint as many qualified judges as they can agree upon. Ultimately, the quality of justice for litigants in federal court will suffer if judges' dockets are too full, regardless of which party appointed them.

"There's enough blame to go around to cover everybody," says Jan Baran. The judicial appointment process would improve if the parties would "just bury the hatchet and find some solutions to actually go forward and get qualified people on the bench so that our judiciary can function."

UNDER ONE ROOF

Multidisciplinary Practices

By Charles E. Buffon

The final report of the D.C. Bar Special Committee on Multidisciplinary Practice was approved by the Bar's Board of Governors in June and sent to the D.C. Court of Appeals, where it is currently under review. Committee chair Charles Buffon reports on the work of the committee.

The Board of Governors of the D.C. Bar recently voted to propose to the D.C. Court of Appeals that it adopt a recommendation that single-firm multidisciplinary practice (MDP) be permitted in the District of Columbia. The specific recommendation, as drafted by the Bar's Special Committee on Multidisciplinary Practice, would limit ownership of such firms to professionals and require that prospective firm clients be provided with detailed notice as to the nature of the organization and the possible risks associated with its retention.[1] On condition that such notice was provided and informed client consent obtained, it would eliminate the historic restriction preventing lawyers from sharing their legal fees with other professionals.[2]

This recommendation is part of a deregulatory process of considerable duration and having much broader scope. As some will recall, bar rules in many jurisdictions once prohibited advertising and set minimum fees. The rules of other professions were similarly restrictive. Coincident with a deregulation movement affecting many industries, as well as other professions, and spurred by court decisions based on First Amendment and antitrust principles, many of these restrictions have been swept away or curtailed.[3]

With respect to the sharing of legal fees, the first step was ending the prohibition on fee sharing among lawyers. Although its predecessor, Disciplinary Rule 2-107, only permitted sharing of fees among lawyers not in the same firm in proportion to the work performed, American Bar Association (ABA) Model Rule

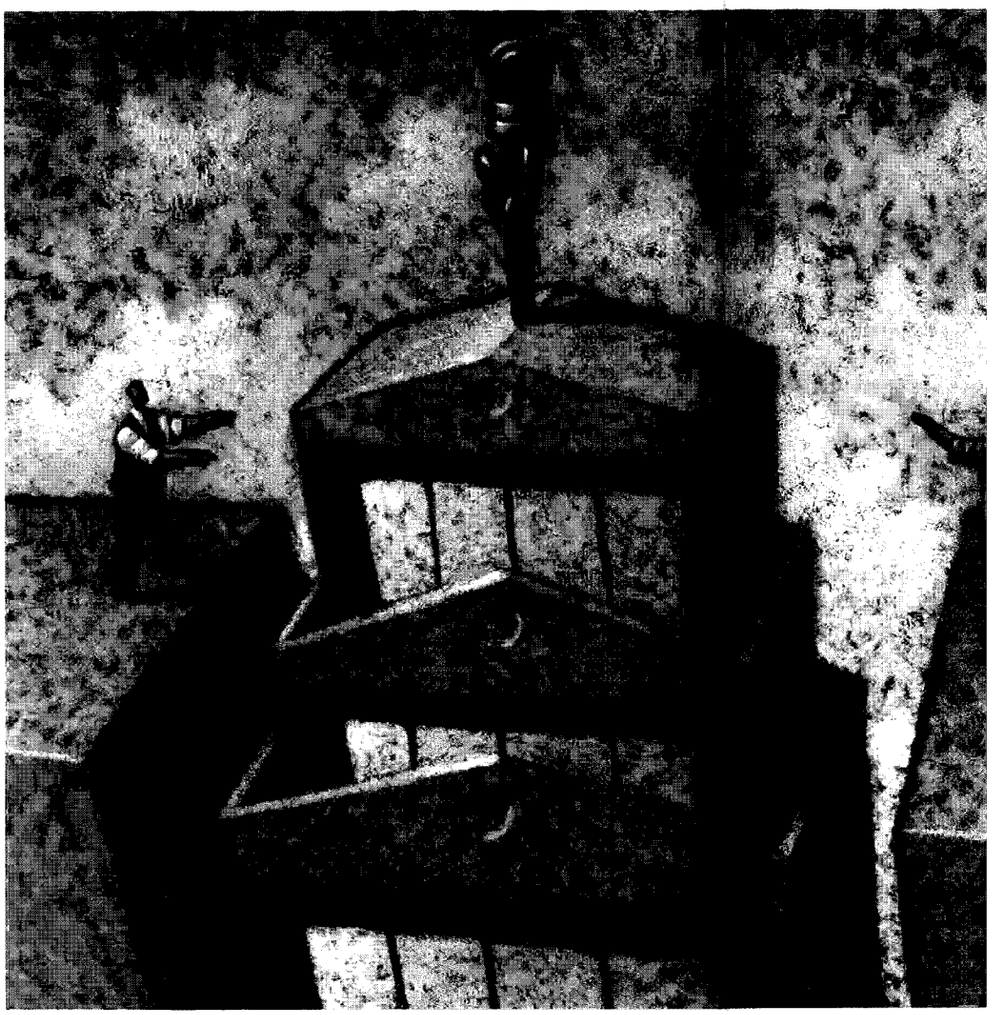
1.5(e), adopted by the ABA House of Delegates in 1983, abandoned that restriction on condition that fully informed client consent was obtained. Once the basic premise that any form of fee sharing should be prohibited was overcome, the debate could then turn to what the limits should be. The client consent procedure embodied in ABA Model Rule 1.5 also represented a shift from regulatory restriction to reliance on informed client consent as a mechanism for protecting consumer interests.

In the process of adopting the Model Rules in the District of Columbia, attention in this jurisdiction soon shifted to why lawyers should not be permitted to share fees and practice with members of other professions, not just their own. In particular, a number of law firms saw a demand for the provision of what came to be called ancillary nonlegal professional services, and others sought the right to include nonlawyers among their partners. One result was modification of Rule 5.4 of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct to permit D.C. law firms to have nonlawyer partners as long as the partnership "has as its sole purpose providing legal services to clients" and the nonlawyer partner "performs professional services which assist the organization in providing legal services to clients." Also, by adding a new comment 25 to Rule 1.7, the District of Columbia was among the first jurisdictions to expressly permit law firms to own and operate separate organizations that provide nonlegal services, marketed and practiced in coordination with the legal services provided by the parent law firm.



In permitting law firms to create and own organizations providing nonlegal professional services, the D.C. Bar and the Court of Appeals endorsed exercise of informed consumer choice in deciding which purveyors of professional services to use. Quite detailed disclosure requirements were adopted in order to assure that choices are well informed, but the decision whether to use related providers of different professional services was left to the prospective users of those services. Rather than prohibit such limited integration of professional services to occur, the Bar and the court chose to regulate the conditions of its use.

The comment to Rule 1.7 permitting law firms to own and control providers of nonlegal services is, however, a one-way street. Lawyers may share in the fees and profits of their nonlegal service affiliates, but nonlawyers employed by those affiliates may not share in the fees and profits of the parent law firms. Nevertheless, this bar's experience with law firm ownership and control of providers of nonlegal services informed the committee's consideration of whether fee sharing should be permitted to go both ways.

Nonlegal service firms owned by several D.C. law firms have been found attractive and useful by at least some consumers of legal and nonlegal services. Of the several ancillary service organizations originally opened, a number still exist. Nonetheless, law firms operating such affiliates have hardly swept the field, and many law firms (and presumably their clients) find no need of them. They are simply one more part of the professional services market.

Most important, despite advance foreboding, there is no evidence that the operation of ancillary nonlegal service organizations has resulted in any diminution in ethical or professional conduct among the law firms having such affiliates. Bar Counsel has not been flooded with complaints from dissatisfied clients, and there is no evidence that parent law firms or their affiliates have abused consumer interests. Law firms and their affiliates have provided the notice to their prospective clients that the Rules of Professional Conduct require, and that notice seems to work.

The affiliation of law firms and organizations providing other services may even have served to spread observance of legal profession norms. In addition to providing the client notice as required by the Rules of Professional Conduct, parent law firms of affiliated nonlegal service organizations have applied the legal profession's conflict rules to the entire practice of both the parent law firms and their ancillary affiliates. Rather than take the risk of treating two types of clients differently, these firms have imported legal practice conflict rules into nonlegal professional practice.

Effectuating these conflict avoidance mechanisms and practices has, in turn, imposed some comparative diseconomies on those ancillary organizations in relation to competitors that are not affiliated with law firms. As a result of these and other factors relating to law firm ownership, some organizations once affiliated with law firms have split off and gone their separate ways, while others have continued to bear the weight of following legal profession conflict rules. The important point is, however, that the rules established by the Bar and the courts as the conditions for permitting law firms to own and operate providers of nonlegal services have been followed despite whatever diseconomies they create.

The MDP committee and the Bar's Board of Governors were also informed by other real-world events. In particular, they were aware that the current ban on the sharing of legal fees has not prevented multidisciplinary practice from occurring; it has just made multidisciplinary practice less efficient and more expensive. Because some demand for the provision of multidisciplinary services does exist, a number of law firms, both here and elsewhere, have created joint marketing and joint practice affiliations with providers of various professional services, including accounting firms, management consulting firms, and financial service providers. By participating in joint promotion and sharing some overhead expenses, these organizations have tried to provide multidisciplinary practice in substance, though not in form. Because under current rules overheads cannot be fully combined and practices cannot be fully integrated in a single organization, multidisciplinary practice in this restricted form is not as effective and cost-efficient as it might be, but it does exist.

"On balance it seems much more likely that the gain in efficiency, expense, and choice the public will receive from permitting multidisciplinary practice will be greater than any diminution in professionalism that may occur."

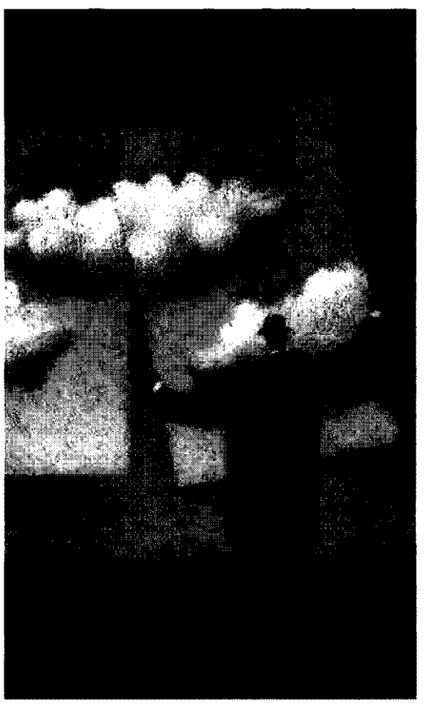
The committee and the board were also quite aware of the argument "If it ain't broke, don't fix it." But in a world in which lawyers are frequently portrayed as money grubbers, who can believe that the present regulatory scheme is perfect? Although the Bar is rightfully proud of the time and effort devoted to providing legal services to the poor, many individuals of modest means and many companies, large and small, find that the legal services they need are inefficiently provided and very costly. Even the amount of time devoted by lawyers to pro bono services to the poor is far from enough, and more and more law firms and individual lawyers choose to contribute money, if at all, rather than contribute their own time and effort.

Multidisciplinary practice is no panacea. Nevertheless, people of varying means planning for retirement are likely to gain some benefit in time saved and cost avoided if lawyers and financial advisers are permitted to provide their services in the same organization. People going through a divorce may benefit from having legal, financial, and counseling services provided by a single source. Someone starting a new business may find it more efficient and affordable to get legal and accounting advice from a single organization created to provide small business services in an efficient and cost-effective manner. That is not to say that all clients will choose to receive integrated professional services in this manner, but removal of barriers to multidisciplinary practice at least make this possible.

Over the two years that the Special Committee on Multidisciplinary Practice studied the subject, its members ultimately came to a consensus that the burden of proof should be placed on those seeking to retain the current restrictive structure. Purchasers of legal services are grown-ups, and if fully informed, they are capable of making rational choices for themselves. Lawyers have been permitted to share fees with other lawyers with the informed consent of their clients, and law firms may own and manage providers of nonlegal services that market to the same clients on condition that those prospective clients have been provided with adequate notice of the risks involved.

Aware of this experience, the committee concluded that if fully informed as to the risks presented, consumers should also be permitted to make their own choices as to whether to obtain legal services from firms that specialize in legal services or from organizations that also offer other professional services. Potential consumers of professional services should not be hampered in making their own choices by rules preventing lawyers from sharing fees with other professionals absent some persuasive evidence that real consumer interests would unavoidably be put in jeopardy if the restriction was eliminated.

After considering the subject for over two years, the committee came to a consensus that the public will be better protected by full disclosure and opportunity for choice than by regulatory prohibition. Past restrictions on competition in the provision of professional services may arguably have benefited the already-established professionals who devised them, but there is no evidence that the public was better served by their existence. On balance it seems much more likely that the gain in efficiency, expense, and choice the public will receive from permitting multidisciplinary practice will be greater than any diminution in professionalism that may occur. It may also benefit younger and less-established lawyers by letting them have greater choice in the settings in which they will have an opportunity to be employed. The law firm employment model suits some, but not necessarily all.



It is obviously unethical to provide incompetent advice, disclose client secrets, conceal conflicts of interest, or cheat a client, and those abuses should be and remain affirmatively prohibited. There is, however, no apparent sense in which it is truly unethical to share fees openly with other professionals serving the same client, especially when doing so may provide better, more efficient, and less costly service to the client. Sharing fees jointly earned is an ethically neutral event, and it should be treated as such.

In order to serve consumer interests adequately and protect against abuse, consumer choice must, of course, be fully informed. For that reason, following the example of the notice and consent required of organizations providing nonlegal services through separate affiliates, the MDP committee's proposed recommendation spells out in considerable detail what disclosures must be made to prospective clients by firms offering multidisciplinary services. Because of these disclosures and the conflict avoidance rules that they would be expected to follow, multidisciplinary practice firms may face some disadvantages in comparison to firms that provide legal or other professional services through separate organizations. Nonetheless, the committee, in crafting its recommendation, wanted to assure that a potential client's choice of professional service provider would be as fully informed as practicably possible.

Having devised these precautionary measures, the committee still questioned whether unavoidable and unacceptable risks to consumer welfare would be created by permitting nonlawyer professionals to have a controlling interest in organizations that provide multiple professional services. To solicit comment on that issue, the committee created alternative versions of a new model rule permitting single-firm multidisciplinary practice, one of which required such firms to be controlled by lawyers and one that did not. The committee then published both versions for comment. Somewhat surprisingly, the version that would have preserved lawyer control received very little support.

In the end, the issue of lawyer control came down to whether permitting legal services to be provided by organizations controlled by professionals other than lawyers would create unacceptable risks that clients would receive incompetent legal advice, have their confidences and secrets disclosed, have to endure undisclosed conflicts, or find themselves represented by lawyers engaged in other forms of misconduct. The committee also considered whether lawyers in organizations controlled by nonlawyers would contribute less to the provision of pro bono legal services and found no evidence that lawyer support for such services would diminish. Though not perfect, the closest analogies available are lawyers practicing in corporate and government settings. In neither case could the committee discern any sacrifice of professionalism or increased damage to consumer welfare attributable to nonlawyer control.

On the basis of that evidence, the committee concluded that it could continue to rely on individual lawyers to meet and exceed the standards of their profession even if a majority of their partners were members of other professions. The committee was not prepared to assume without any supporting evidence that lawyer control is necessary to assure that individual lawyers will continue to fulfill their own personal, professional obligations. The committee did note, however, that the states of New York and New Jersey have made organizations that provide legal services (not just individual lawyers) subject to their legal conduct rules. If there comes to be evidence that organizations (whether law firms or multidisciplinary practice firms) are putting pressure on individual lawyers to slight their professional obligations, the committee's preference would be to follow that lead and make those organizations themselves subject to professional conduct rules rather than presume that only lawyers can properly manage and control a multidisciplinary practice.

Finally, the committee did consider Enron. The Enron situation and others like it make a strong case for separating the preparation of public auditing reports from the provision of other professional services. Organizations that are obligated both to report to the public and to provide confidential advice to clients about which they are reporting are likely to face an inherent conflict. That conflict may not manifest itself when things are going well, but one important purpose of public audits is to spot and warn the public about matters that are not going well.

A single firm providing both legal services and ordinary consulting services would not have the same conflict. In each instance the obligation to provide loyalty and independent judgment would be due the same client, and neither involves an inherent obligation to report to the public. For that reason the committee concluded that the Enron situation has quite a bit to say about the special role, and the required independence from client influence, of public auditors, but it does not bear on the desirability of permitting other professional services to be provided to a single client by a single firm.

In addition, the Enron situation raised an issue of whether the law firms and accounting firms serving Enron had become so financially dependent on that single client that they were not willing or able to provide it with independent professional judgment. If such proves to have been the case, Enron's lawyers may have violated existing ethical precepts requiring the provision of independent judgment. Nonetheless, that would not seem to implicate multidisciplinary practice as such.

None of Enron's law firms provided other professional services, and its accounting firm did not provide legal services. The percentage of total billings represented by Enron was much greater to its law firms than to its accountants. Whether any single firm's dependency on Enron would have been greater or less had these firms been permitted to offer both legal and nonlegal services is impossible to know. The possibility that a law firm or other professional service firm can become so dependent upon a client as to become unable to provide independent advice does not turn on the existence or permissibility of multidisciplinary practice.

The real issue continues to be, who should make the decision whether a given client obtains multiple professional services through one firm or several firms, the bar (through prohibitory rules promulgated by a court) or the client itself? The conclusion reached by the Special Committee on Multidisciplinary Practice and the D.C. Bar's Board of Governors is that such decisions should be made by the people and organizations that use those services, after assuring that they have sufficient information to make their decisions well informed. Neither the committee nor the board believes that adequate justification exists for depriving consumers of professional services of an opportunity to choose to obtain such services from an organization that provides all of the services they need under one roof. Whatever clients decide, the choice should be theirs.

Washington Lawyer

books in the law

Michael E. Tigar is a professor at the Washington College of Law of the American University and an active practitioner. For more than three decades Tigar has been taking on controversial clients and cases. His new book, Fighting Injustice, published by the American Bar Association, is a memoir that combines a probing exploration of some of the key issues the legal profession is facing today.

Recently Tigar sat down with D.C. Bar member Robert Pack to discuss his new book.

A Conversation With Michael E. Tigar

Interview by Robert Pack

THE WASHINGTON LAWYER: What prompted you to write Fighting Injustice?

MICHAEL TIGAR: I had thought about a book like this for a long time. My day job is as a law teacher, at Washington College of Law, where there is an enormous institutional commitment to social justice issues. A lot of students work on cases in which I'm involved, and I thought it was time to write a story that talked about how somebody who was interested in using the law in a constructive way made attempts—some successful, some not so successful—to do that. That's the first part of the book. The second part is organized thematically around certain issues.

Much of your practice has involved not just clients but causes you believe in. Would it be correct to label you as an advocate, as opposed to simply a lawyer?

Right. I never wanted to be a lawyer who sat in an office and drew wills or corporate charters. I decided to go to law school in 1963 because my understanding of a lawyer was someone who went to court and advocated. And there was a particular kind of advocacy that I wanted to do. The civil rights movement was in full swing. The attacks on the left that had begun during the McCarthy era were continuing. There were folks who needed defending. So I wanted to be a lawyer.

I was born and raised in southern California and graduated from the University of California at Berkeley. I was accepted at Boalt Hall, the law school there. I think it was the only law school to which I applied, because it was my state school and it was cheap. The free speech movement began while I was in law school at Berkeley. I wasn't involved in it because I was too busy studying, but there was a ferment in society and in the law that certainly affected me.

"Of all the lawyers in America, Edward Bennett Williams was the one who stood out for practicing the kind of law I wanted to practice."

Do you consider yourself a civil rights lawyer?
Twenty-five years ago I would have said civil rights. Now I think human rights is a better term. Why? Because civil rights to me connotes rights guaranteed by the American Constitution. The concept of human rights is an international concept.

From reading your book, I gather that your introduction to Washington was rather unusual.
Yes, it was. At the end of my second year in law school, Justice William Brennan appointed me his law clerk upon my graduation. However, as a student at Berkeley I had embraced progressive politics. During my third year my nomination began to cause controversy. Finally, in June of 1966 I got a call from Brennan and he was worried about this. There had been a statement on the floor of the House of Representatives by some reactionary congressman. Editorial writers were criticizing my appointment. Chief Justice Earl Warren, a former Republican governor of California, was getting heat, too, and putting pressure on Brennan about the situation.

I flew to Washington, where I'd never been before, and I met Justice Brennan in his chambers. After the pleasantries were over, the first thing he confronted me with was he wanted to know why was I once at a Communist Party training camp in Paterson, New Jersey. (I later found out that this was fed to him by the FBI through the Justice Department and Justice Abe Fortas, who was close to President Johnson.) I was flabbergasted. I told Justice Brennan that I'd never been to Paterson, New Jersey, much less at a Communist Party training camp there.

Brennan said he still wanted me to be his clerk. So I went back to California and packed my wife and infant daughter and our belongings into a VW bus. We drove across country and I made it to Washington with about $10 in my pocket. But when I showed up for work, Justice Brennan told me that to his regret he had decided he had to withdraw the clerkship.

To this day when I hear people say the FBI needs more power, I remember my personal experience. My reaction is, What is it in the FBI's past that makes you think they get it right often enough that they need unrestrained power free from supervision by other branches of government?

So there you were—a wife, a family, no money, no job. What did you do?
Of all the lawyers in America, Edward Bennett Williams was the one who stood out for practicing the kind of law I wanted to practice. So I called him, and he said I could come see him. When I told him what had happened, Williams said Justice Brennan was a close friend of his, and he couldn't believe Brennan would have done that. I gave him the phone number in Brennan's chambers, and told him he was welcome to call the justice. Williams said he really wasn't looking for another lawyer—there were only about 9 or 10 attorneys in his firm then—but he would think about it. My wife and I were staying with friends who lived about six blocks from Williams's office. I walked back there and a few minutes later the phone rang. It was Ed Williams. He said I had a job starting the following Monday.

A Supreme Court clerkship is about the most prestigious honor a recent law school graduate can receive. Would you classify losing out on that opportunity as one of the biggest regrets in your life?
I would not classify it as a regret for one moment. Everybody that I knew knew that I had been appointed clerk to a Supreme Court justice, and I never had to stay up late reading cert petitions. I'm not sure that it could have worked out better. And I did land on my feet. I wound up working for Edward Bennett Williams, who became my mentor and was almost like a father to me. Justice William Douglas offered me a clerkship the following year, but after discussing it with Ed Williams, I turned Douglas down, with thanks, because I was already into my legal career.

Controversy seems to have followed you. In 1970 you were teaching at UCLA Law School and the governor of California, Ronald Reagan, called upon the university's board of regents to fire you.
That's true. I arrived at UCLA in 1969 thinking I would settle down to a life of academic calm. The first thing that happened was that I got involved as a defense lawyer in the famous Chicago 8 conspiracy trial that grew out of the protests at the 1968 Democratic convention. I was jailed by Judge Julius Hoffman in a misunderstanding that quickly got cleared up. Shortly thereafter, Angela Davis arrived at UCLA to teach in the philosophy department, and she asked me to represent her when she refused to sign the university's loyalty oath. A year or so later she was charged in a homicide case. Meantime I volunteered to help Bill Kuntsler defend H. Rap Brown, another black militant. So I had a lot of controversial cases, which made the governor very upset.

Ironically, when I was student body president at Reseda High School, near Los Angeles, in 1957–58, I had invited Ronald Reagan, then a private citizen, to be the speaker at our assembly on patriotism. He came and spoke. I have a picture of him shaking hands with me. I remember I helped Ronald Reagan find a contact lens that he dropped backstage at our high school. I crawled around on my hands and knees with him.

You have represented many controversial clients, including Oklahoma City bombing conspirator Terry Nichols, in addition to the clients previously mentioned. Are there clients you would refuse to represent?
Yes. A lawyer is obligated to take an appointed case, or to represent someone who cannot otherwise find counsel. But in day-to-day practice we have the right, and I would say the duty, to make choices. I would not be willing to represent defendants in a lot of these corporate corruption cases. I am not interested in defending anyone having anything to do with the Enron business. I am so horrified by their conduct that I don't think I would be an effective lawyer for any of those folks.

You know, you hear people talk about how they get nervous walking in certain neighborhoods. Well, I was a professor at the University of Texas Law School in

REV_00255719

Austin from 1987 until 1998 and I've spent a fair amount of time in Houston. If I were walking down the street in Houston and I saw a well-dressed white man, I would cross the street. Otherwise he might steal my pension.

In the time since you first arrived in Washington 36 years ago, how would you say that the practice of law here has changed?

When I came to Washington in 1966 there were then no national law firms here that I was aware of. You didn't see these huge multicity law firms that will do everything for you. Over the years I have had experience working with some of these megafirms. Whatever it is they do well—and I'm sure there are many things they do well—I don't think they do litigation as well as a firm that is organized to be leaner and meaner and more focused on each individual case. That was the way Ed Williams's firm was organized when I joined. I was only the 10th lawyer there.

I think it's harder to persuade these big megafirms to do major pro bono cases. They are often more focused on profitability than on public service. Given the reduction in funding for legal services and defender services, that is a shame.

The other major change is, the only hot spot I knew of to eat lunch at that time was Duke Zeibert's.

What is the biggest challenge the American judicial system is facing today?

Independence. The assertion of article III constitutional authority to restrain the executive branch in its attacks on the Bill of Rights and on the very idea of international human rights. In less than two years of the Bush administration we have seen an unprecedented expansion of executive power, along with rollbacks in self-restraint by the executive branch. This struggle has been going ever since the republic was founded, but it has accelerated the last few years.

What's the most exciting case you've ever had?

For me, the most exciting case is the one that is happening right now. Whichever case that is.

Attorney Robert Pack is the author of Edward Bennett Williams for the Defense.

Investment advice from Financial Engines is now available to ABA Members Retirement Program participants.

We've taken a good thing, and made it better with online investment advice. The only retirement program created specifically for law firms offers personalized online investment planning from Financial Engines. Program participants benefit from detailed allocation and diversification recommendations in addition to assistance with the creation of individual strategies geared towards specific retirement goals.

This further enhances the Program's investment lineup of eight core funds, three structured portfolio services, and an integrated brokerage option. With over $3.5 billion under management, we provide flexible plan services with comprehensive management tools that minimize your administrative time.

financial engines

Your firm is eligible to participate if you or one of your partners or shareholders is a member of the District of Columbia Bar or American Bar Association. And because the Program has no minimum investment requirements it's just as easy for small firms to get started as large.

That's flexible investments and full service, delivered to your firm regardless of its size. And it's now enhanced with online investment advice. The ABA Members Retirement Program does more than ever to help your participants make the green.

ABA MEMBERS RETIREMENT PROGRAM

DCBAR

For a copy of the prospectus with more complete information, including charges and expenses associated with the Program, or to speak with a Plan Consultant, call 1-800-826-8901, visit www.abaretirement.com or write to ABA Members Retirement Program • P.O. How to Get a Confession

There is talk now of using truth serum to get the truth from a terrorist. Does truth serum work? Who knows. There is also talk of using the tried-and-true method of getting confessions—moderately severe torture.

This brings to mind the apocryphal remark of the Calcutta policeman who said rubbing red pepper into the eyes of the poor devil until he confesses is more efficient than looking for witnesses in the noonday sun. Mad dogs and Englishmen and all that.

The law is skeptical of confessions made outside the courtroom. People may confess for reasons known and unknown and be innocent. The temptation to extort confessions is strong. Unless it is resisted it will push out the traditional means of getting the evidence. The balance in our legal system that discourages the use of questionable means is a delicate adjustment. "Take but degree away. Untune that string, and hark! What discord follows."

In the 1940s Fred E. Inbau (1909–1998), of Northwestern University Criminal Law Department, was fascinated by and wrote frequently on the subject of criminal interrogation. His book, Criminal Interrogation and Confessions, urged the police to use any kind of artifice, deception, and trick to get a confession. According to Inbau, anything goes. Inbau was before the Amanda (sic) warning.

There is a story that has been told of a Chicago criminal lawyer who knew Inbau and his techniques and who went Inbau one better.

We shall call the criminal lawyer Fred Bellows. His son, Cliff Bellows, was killed in an elevator accident. Cliff was in an office building elevator with five other passengers. The elevator went out of control and took a free fall from the 10th to the basement floor. The passengers were badly injured and were trapped for six hours before the rescue team hammered and drilled through the elevator top and freed them. Cliff was found dead. It was assumed the cause of death was his severe injuries. However, the autopsy disclosed something strange. Cliff Bellows had a bullet in his heart.

The police learned that Cliff carried a gun because of threats made against his criminal lawyer father. Thereafter the police declared that Cliff's death was a suicide. Cliff was so badly injured he decided, so it was thought, that if he survived life would not be worth living. He must have shot himself with his own gun. The fact that the others in the elevator were unaware of the gunshot was explained by the hammering and banging by the rescue crew.

Cliff's father had trouble with the way the police closed the case as a suicide. Cliff was not the type to commit suicide. Bellows decided to conduct his own investigation.

He learned that one of the persons on the elevator could have known Cliff because they worked for the same company and they may have gotten on at different floors. Bellows discovered evidence that pointed to a particular person on the elevator who may have had a motive to kill Cliff based on disagreements at the brokerage firm where they worked. But the evidence was weak, certainly not strong enough to interest a prosecutor. Bellows needed a confession.

A year after Cliff's death Bellows invited the occupants of the elevator to his home for dinner. The invitation said each would learn something new about the elevator accident.

On the evening in question they all showed up. Dinner was served promptly. After dinner Bellows said to the group that he was skeptical that his son committed suicide. He believes Cliff was killed by his own gun but the gun was used by somebody else who was in the elevator.

"The person who killed my son is now in this room. That person has been served a meal different from the meal served to the others. His meal and his alone contained poison. A poison that takes effect in 10 minutes."

Bellows then said, "He knows who he is. He is free to leave the room right now, and my chauffeur will take him to the hospital in time to save his life. If he doesn't want to leave, he can save himself by eating from the bowl of custard dessert that is now being placed in the center of the table. The dessert contains the antidote to the poison that was in the meal. But he must act quickly."

One of the persons had been drinking too much. He made fun of the whole ceremony. He said it was like an old 1930s movie that he had seen or maybe a Sherlock Holmes story he read. When nobody else took any of the dessert, he scooped out a generous portion and ate it.

Bellows said to him, "Sir, you waited too long. I don't think the antidote will work."

The person who had eaten the dessert looked startled, and then collapsed. In a few minutes he was unconscious.

Bellows said to the group, "Gentlemen, I deceived you. When I said there was poison in the dinner of the person I suspected of murdering my son, I was lying. And when I said that the dessert contained an antidote to the poison, of course that was a lie.

"Then you may ask why this man is stretched out unconscious on the floor. It is because the dessert did have something in it. Not an antidote but a strong soporific. He is sleeping and in time he will wake up.

"I tricked him into giving what in law is called an implied confession. It is a confession implied by the circumstances. My case against him has moved from the speculative to the presumptive.

"I don't want to leave it there. When he gets up you will see a demonstration of the art of cross-examination. Now that I have this implied confession, I will work backwards to get at the motive. That is what interests me. Why did he murder my son?

"While we wait for the subject of our inquiry to wake up, let's have some dessert, some dessert that I will eat with you. How about chocolate cheesecake? I will eat the first slice."

In the Name of National Security

What an extraordinary year! Since September 2001 we have seen (1) terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, (2) an invasion of Afghanistan and ouster of the Taliban regime, (3) an attempt to blow up an airplane with explosive-filled tennis shoes, (4) weapons-grade anthrax in the mail, (5) a temporary shutdown of Congress, (6) a temporary relocation of the United States Supreme Court, (7) random pipe bombs in mailboxes, (8) an alleged plot to detonate a radioactive bomb in the District of Columbia, (9) periodic threats from Osama bin Laden and al Qaeda, and (10) periodic color-coded terrorist activity alerts from the White House.

Extraordinary times tend to generate no less extraordinary assertions of power. Following the Japanese surprise attack on Pearl Harbor in December 1941, we adopted a series of military orders that effectively required the imprisonment of American citizens on the West Coast solely on the basis of their Japanese ancestry.[1] In accordance with authority granted to him by Congress and President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Lieutenant General J. L. DeWitt concluded that the orders were necessary to protect against possible espionage and sabotage if the Japanese invaded the West Coast.

The orders were issued in the first few months after the attack on Pearl Harbor. Americans were outraged and angry. The rapid advances the Japanese had made in the Pacific in the first months of 1942 added fear and uncertainty to the mix. In these conditions it would have taken extraordinary courage for anyone to speak up on behalf of Japanese American citizens on the West Coast. The risk of being condemned as a naive fool or, worse, disloyal would have deterred all but the most courageous. Few spoke up.

By the time the Supreme Court considered Korematsu v. United States, however, the evidence of military necessity looked extremely doubtful.[2] Nonetheless, we were still at war. So the Court was not at all inclined to second-guess the military in this area, and upheld the constitutionality of the exclusion orders.

As in 1942, extraordinary events in the past 12 months have generated extraordinary assertions of power to respond to the threats we face. Yaser Esam Hamdi was captured by military forces in Afghanistan in November and held at Camp X-Ray at the naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, until it was confirmed that he had been born in Louisiana and, perhaps, had not renounced his U.S. citizenship. Then he was transferred to the Norfolk Naval Station brig in Norfolk, Virginia. The government took the position that, as an "enemy combatant" being detained according to the laws and customs of war, Hamdi was not entitled to consult privately with counsel.

On a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, Senior Judge Robert G. Doumar of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia summarily ordered the government to permit Hamdi to meet with a federal public defender in private. On appeal the Justice Department urged the Fourth Circuit to reverse, asserting that an American citizen, labeled an enemy combatant by the military, has no right to counsel or to judicial review of the grounds on which he is being held, whether he is taken into custody in the United States or in the field of battle.[3]

The court of appeals reversed the district court judgment and remanded the case for further consideration, but pointedly declined to embrace the government's "sweeping" argument for dismissal:

> In dismissing, we ourselves would be summarily embracing a sweeping proposition—namely that, with no meaningful judicial review, any American citizen alleged to be an enemy combatant could be detained indefinitely without charges or counsel on the government's say-so. Given the interlocutory nature of this appeal, a remand rather than an outright dismissal is appropriate.[4]

In the context in which the government made the argument—an armed combatant captured in the field of battle, outside the United States, in Afghanistan—the argument against judicial review seems compelling. The so-called Dirty Bomber, Jose Padilla, born in Brooklyn, New York, arrested in Chicago, Illinois, and allegedly involved in a plot to detonate a radioactive bomb in Washington, D.C., also has been labeled an enemy combatant. The proposition that Padilla is not entitled to counsel or judicial review of the basis on which he is being held strikes me as at least doubtful.[5]

Whatever one thinks of the merits of the argument, the audacity of the position the government staked out in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld[6] should remind us that the courts alone are not an adequate defense when confronting claims of military necessity or national security in wartime.[7] Uncritical acceptance of extravagant assertions of power in the name of national security is a threat, however, not just to those who would harm us, but to us and the freedoms so many have died to protect.

Lawyers are not the most significant players, but we know some things about the importance of procedural fairness and testing assertions of fact, even in the face of threats to public safety. As judges, as advocates, and perhaps most important, as citizens of the United States, we need to participate in the debate. Our political leaders must understand that we are not prepared to impose the costs of protecting us solely

Section Holds Candidates Forum

The D.C. Bar District of Columbia Affairs Section will present a candidates forum featuring local political hopefuls and incumbents on September 26 starting at 6 at the University Club of Washington, 1135 16th Street NW.

"The program will inform Bar members about the positions of candidates on issues of vital importance to D.C. residents, as well as businesses, nonprofits, professionals, and trade associations that are active in D.C. at the local and federal level," says moderator C. W. Tayler of Whiteford, Taylor & Preston L.L.P.

According to Tayler, the issues are broad-based and include the District's relations with the federal government, security measures at federal and local levels, maintenance of a business-friendly environment to encourage economic development, and serving the needs of citizens through infrastructure maintenance, equitable taxation policies, and social welfare programs.

Invited guests include winners of the September 10 primary elections for the offices of D.C. congressional delegate to the House of Representatives, mayor, D.C. Council chair, two at-large council seats, and council seats for Wards 1, 3, 5, and 6.

During the forum candidates for ward council seats will introduce themselves and ask questions of other candidates. All other candidates will have a specified time to speak, followed by a question-and-answer session. Tayler anticipates a lively and energetic debate on many hot issues, from taxation and security measures to business licensing and voting rights.

The program is cosponsored by the University Club of Washington.

Learn the Fundamentals of Practicing in the D.C. Court of Appeals

Join an experienced panel of experts on September 23 for "From the Ground Up: Fundamentals of Practice in the D.C. Court of Appeals" from 6 to 9:15 p.m. at the D.C. Bar Conference Center, 1250 H Street NW, B-1 level.

"If you're downstairs in the Moultrie Building in Superior Court," says David Tedhams, staff attorney for the D.C. Court of Appeals, "you never know when you'll be up here [on the sixth floor in the Court of Appeals]."

Joining Tedhams as panelists are D.C. Court of Appeals associate judges John A. Terry and Eric T. Washington, chief deputy clerk Joy Chapper, and Case Management Division senior staff attorney Rosanna Mason.

Tedhams says the course will acquaint attorneys with the court, offer basic information on steering cases through an appeal, and present some of the unique wrinkles and pitfalls in local appellate practice.

Common mistakes, according to Tedhams, include bringing up an order that's not appealable, ignoring the vast amount of motions practice in the appellate court, not adhering to deadlines, incorrectly preparing records and transcripts, and being unaware of counsel's obligations.

"It seems simple," he says, but some attorneys are even "unaware of the standard of review the court applies in different cases."

The course, designed for new and experienced attorneys, will focus on getting to the D.C. Court of Appeals and staying there; identifying an appealable order; staying the proceedings; filing timely notices; writing briefs; and recovering costs and fees.

In addition, the course will cover direct appeals; petitions for review; writs and emergencies; interlocutory appeals; motions practice; time computation; persuasive oral arguments; judgments and opinions; and petitions for rehearing.

The course is sponsored by the D.C. Bar Continuing Legal Education (CLE) Program and cosponsored by the D.C. Bar Courts, Lawyers and the Administration of Justice Section, the Litigation Section, and the Family Law Section.

For more information or to register, contact the CLE Office at 202-626-3488 or visit www.dcbar.org/cle.

Section Series Kick Off Fall Program Lineup

Four D.C. Bar sections are kicking off series this month focusing on timely and relevant issues in a variety of practice areas.

"I urge members to mark their calendars and sign up now for a year of informative programs at significant savings," says sections manager Barbara James.

First, several committees of the Taxation Section will be offering luncheon series, starting with the Pass-Through Entities and Real Estate Committee with its program on September 10. On September 24 the Financial Instruments and Products Committee will commence its program series, followed on September 25 by the Exempt Organizations Committee.

Discounts are available to those who subscribe to any of the luncheon series sponsored by the Taxation Section.

Second, the Labor and Employment Law Section will start its monthly series on September 17 with "Cyberspace and the National Labor Relations Act"

Thomas Knapp, chair of the Labor and Employment Law Section's Labor Relations–Private Sector Committee, is the moderator.

Third, the Solo and Small Firm Practice Committee of the Law Practice Management Section will launch its annual monthly brown bag luncheon series on September 26 with "50 Hot Technology Tips for Solo and Small Firms" from 12 to 1:45 p.m.

Learn how to enhance your law practice during this fast-paced, entertaining program full of practical suggestions, ideas, and tricks to keep you on top of your game. The program will feature Reid Trautz, director of the D.C. Bar Lawyer Practice Assistance Program.

The series will continue on October 23, November 20, December 19, January 23, and February 27.

Planned program topics include choosing a proper business entity for your legal practice, home and office networking, elder law, managing client communications and confidences by e-mail and the Internet, the paperless law office, noncompetition and trade secret requirements, and business plans for small firm and solo practices.

Fourth, the Real Estate, Housing and Land Use Section's Real Property Transactions Committee will host a series of brown bag lunches and light dinners beginning on October 1. The series continues on November 5 and includes the "12th Annual Highlights of Commercial Real Estate" on December 3 from 6 to 9 p.m. at the Westin Embassy Row, 2100 Massachusetts Avenue NW.

All programs, unless specified, will be held at the D.C. Bar Conference Center, 1250 H Street NW, B-1 level.

Practitioners Offer Views on Supreme Court

Capping a fiery term with decisions on the death penalty, drug testing in America's schools, search and seizure, and school vouchers, the Supreme Court justices are gearing up for their return to the bench in October after a summer of rest.

"It's going to be a spectacular term," says Thomas Goldstein, a sole practitioner and experienced Supreme Court practitioner.

Join Goldstein and Michael Dreeben, deputy solicitor general at the U.S. Department of Justice, and Susan Block, professor at the Georgetown University Law Center, on September 9 for "Supreme Court Review and Preview" from 2 to 5:15 p.m. at the D.C. Bar Conference Center.

The course, sponsored by the D.C. Bar Continuing Legal Education Program, will feature an insider's look at the highlights, trends, and statistics of the Court's 2001–2002 term and the issues that will be before the Court in the next term.

"There are a number of hot-button issues on the Court's plate already, plus they are very likely to address affirmative action and campaign finance reform," says Goldstein.

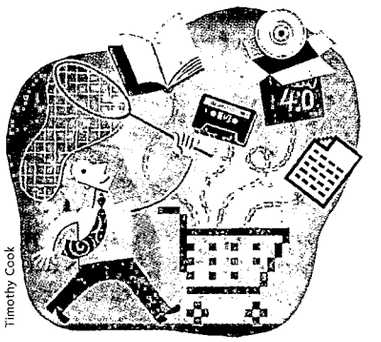
Topics of discussion include the death penalty, First Amendment, and regulatory issues. In addition, the panelists will focus on the areas of federal power and state immunity, preemption, free speech, disability law, arbitration, and immigration.

The course is cosponsored by the judicial division of the Federal Bar Association and the D.C. Bar Litigation Section.

For more information or to register, contact the CLE Office at 202-626-3488 or visit www.dcbar.org/cle.

FCBA Hosts Career Night for Attorneys and Students

The Young Lawyers Committee of the Federal Communications Bar Association (FCBA) will be hosting a career night on September 19 from 6 to 8 p.m. at Hogan & Hartson L.L.P., 555 13th Street NW.



"In light of everything going on in the communications industry," says committee cochair Yaron Dori, "we think it's important for young lawyers to have an opportunity to be guided by those with more experience."

Dori, an associate with Hogan & Hartson, says since the industry is struggling, many law students and young attorneys are having trouble finding a job or the opportunity to network.

"The event," he says, "is intended to provide law students and new attorneys with career advice and an overview of the current employment landscape, as well as a chance to interact with senior members of the bar."

Law students and young attorneys pursuing a career in communications law would benefit from attending the event, Dori says, which will also include a panel

Selecting Federal Judges

The Role of the Executive and Legislative Branches

REV_00255729

Federal judicial selection

The selection and confirmation process has yielded a federal judiciary that has served the country well, and will continue to do so as long as the two political branches exercise some restraint and cooperation.

By Jon O. Newman

I suspect the problems of both presidential selection and Senate inquiry and confirmation are simpler than some people have made them out to be. I don't mean to suggest that there isn't room for legitimate debate about what's appropriate: should the executive branch take into consideration viewpoint ideology or should it simply select people based on their integrity, their knowledge of the law, their experience, and other neutral factors? However, I think that is a somewhat artificial choice.

JON O. NEWMAN is a senior judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.*

It may be that 180 years ago, when a federal judge was primarily deciding technical admiralty, bankruptcy, and common law negotiable instruments cases, the judge's viewpoint was virtually irrelevant. But as long as the courts are on occasion going to confront searing issues as to affirmative action, the scope of the First Amendment, the tension between order and citizen rights in the criminal area, the issues posed by federalism, and the issues posed by separation of powers, it is certainly legitimate for any institution concerned with who federal judges are to cast an eye on general considerations of viewpoint.

When presidents look at such considerations, I think they are doing an entirely legitimate thing. And I don't think there is anything new about it. I know some people say, "Oh, it's gotten worse. The rejection of Judge Bork changed everything." I am not sure it changed everything.

Over the years, Republican presidents have wanted Republican nominees to the bench and Democratic presidents have wanted Democratic nominees. I do not think that was just a matter of rewarding the faithful. I think that was a surrogate for selecting people who had a generally compatible philosophical orientation with the administration that appointed them. I think it has been that way at least throughout the twentieth century, and I think that is perfectly legitimate.

What I object to, frankly, is when administrations, in the course of favoring a general philosophical outlook, mislead the public with labels that I think do a disservice both to administrations and to the judiciary. I think the easy rhetoric that, "I don't want activist judges, I want judges who practice judicial restraint," is oversimplified and misleading.

Two cases illustrate the point for me. There were two referenda on the West Coast, one in California and one in Oregon. The voters of California voted to block all affirmative action steps. The voters of Oregon voted to adopt an assisted-suicide law. A district judge in California issued an injunction blocking the referendum on affirmative action. He was bitterly assailed for being an activist. He was overturning the will of the people.

The judge in Oregon blocked a referendum, and thereby put a temporary stop to an assisted-suicide law against the will of the people of Oregon. Nobody accused him of activism. Apparently, whether you are an activist or not in the area of blocking referendums depends on which way the people voted. It seems to me that labels like "activism" and "restraint" too often are subterfuges for reflecting whether a particular critic likes or does not like a decision.

The same with the easy label, "Are judges following the law, applying the law, or are they making the law?" You hear that a lot. It seems to me that is unfair to the judiciary. It suggests that half the judges are dutifully applying the law and the other half are making the law. It is not what happens. Anybody who follows the day-to-day business of the federal courts knows that.

If we have to decide the technicalities of a 10(b)(5) stock case, the technicalities of an antitrust ruling, copyright law, admiralty, or labor law, we are doing our level best in the trial and appellate courts to figure out what it is the Congress wants. If it is a statute, it is often very hard to know exactly what Congress wants or to follow the teachings of the Supreme Court. We are in the trenches. We are doing our level best to do it. It is just not true that half of us are applying the law faithfully and half of us are making it up.

I am not saying there are not some philosophical differences and that it does not matter to some extent what the life experience of the judge has been, and I think the president is entitled to take that into account. Let me defer for just a moment the question of to what extent and turn briefly to the hearing process.

The hearing process

When a nomination gets to the Senate, the senators have to give some thought to where they are along a continuum of inquiry. At one extreme is the direct confrontation: "Mr. So and So, how would you vote on a particular case?" That is one end of the continuum. At the other end is the most general, "Well, tell us about your experience, have you ever been convicted of a felony?" things of that sort.

My view on the legitimacy of the inquiry is very simple. I would draw the line right at the point where the prospective nominee is asked the specific question, "How would you vote on this case?" The reason I think that is an improper question is it totally undermines the adjudicative function. The judge, no surprise to anybody sitting in this room, is supposed to come to that next case without prejudgment, not necessarily without some views on the topic, but without prejudgment of the specific case.

If the judge has said at a Senate hearing or quietly to an administration before the Senate hearing, "Don't worry, you can count on me to vote this way on this case," that is prejudgment at its grossest form. Indeed, it is such prejudgment the judge probably ought to be recused if the case arises. Other than that question, however, it seems to me senators ought to be able to ask a prospective nominee anything, anything at all—to conduct a wide-ranging, searching inquiry about views.

Now, the fact that they ask does not mean the nominee must answer. A nominee can say, "Senator, I think that question gets too close to probing for how I would vote in a particular case, and I am not going to answer." Then, it seems to me that senator, the senators on the committee, and ultimately the full Senate have to make their judgment as to the senatorial prerogative. If the nominee draws the line too tightly and limits what the senators regard as legitimate inquiry into viewpoint, I think the Senate is entitled to reject that nominee.

However, senators might say—"Well, this nominee has answered a whole series of questions. We have gotten a pretty good look at this person's view on a lot of issues. We have asked about, generally, what does he or she think about the relations between the federal government and the states as an adjudicative matter? What does he or she think judges generally ought to do in the field of judicial remedies for discrimination, what does he or she generally think about the First Amendment—should it be interpreted expansively or narrowly? "The nominee has answered a series of questions, but balked on a few that are too specific." In that event, it seems to me, the Senate has a perfectly legitimate basis to make its assessment and can work its will.

Shading the judiciary

When the Senate finally works its will, the issue is to what extent should senators in their advice and consent capacity endeavor to insist that the judiciary reflect what they want and to what extent should they give the executive branch a considerable amount of deference and only reject those who are beyond some outer limit of acceptability? That is a controversial continuum that people have debated over the years.

REV_00255739

My view on that, again, is very simple. I think the people have elected a president and they have given the executive branch the legitimacy to shade the federal judiciary somewhat in the overall philosophical direction of the executive branch as to adjudicative matters. "Somewhat" is the key word. Particularly when the political branches of the government are divided, as they are now, I think both of those branches would do well to observe a certain degree of restraint as they decide how to fill the federal judiciary.

I do not think it is legitimate for the executive branch of either party to set out to populate the federal judiciary with people who have extreme views 100 percent sympathetic with the views of that branch, whether they are liberal or conservative. I also do not think it is legitimate for a Senate, whether conservative or liberal, to try to work its will in an extreme way such that the judiciary is populated by judges of their persuasion, or at least that they resist all judges who do not measure up to their particular philosophy.

In an era of divided government, the country has sent to the political branches an obvious message: "We are sort of in the middle." Well, if the country is in the middle in a democracy, then on the controversial legal issues of our time the judiciary ought to be in the middle. Indeed, the judiciary generally is in the middle. The judiciary in a democracy is in a real sense a balance wheel of the system. The political forces ebb and flow. Different parties get elected president. Different parties control the Congress. The federal judiciary has life tenure for a very good reason, that it will be a balance wheel and will not lurch violently one way or the other.

So, the executive branch gets to shade the philosophy of the judiciary a little bit by making four or eight years' worth of appointments, and the Senate gets to shade the philosophy of the judiciary a little bit by making it clear what sorts of people they will confirm and what sorts of people they will not confirm. That balance is useful.

Cool the rhetoric

The heated rhetoric that we have seen in recent years by both parties does a disservice to the country. It misleads the country as to what the judicial function is all about. So, my plea to both branches is cool the rhetoric. Take it down a few notches. Consult with each other. Recognize that the federal judiciary is the balance wheel in a democracy, that the executive branch is entitled to shade it somewhat towards the overall philosophy of the executive branch. The legislative branch, particularly in an era of divided government, is entitled to insist that the shading towards the philosophy of the executive branch be moderate and not extreme.

Once those ground rules are understood, it seems to me the process ought to work very smoothly. Now, that may be too much to hope for, politics being what it is. Nevertheless, I think there ought to be a cooling of the rhetoric, a recognition of the sensitivity of what is involved, an obligation to be fair to the American public, not to mislead them as to what the judicial function is about, but on the contrary to help educate them to the important function of the judiciary, giving candid recognition to the fact that it does matter who the judges are.

If it is an illusion to say half of us are making the law and half of us are applying the law, it is also just an illusion to say, "All that matters is did he go to a good law school and is he honest and does he have judicial temperament."

Philosophy matters, viewpoint matters, who we are matters. If it did not, you would not need judges at all. You would have a computer, you would put in the data, and it would spit out an answer.

Coming into balance

But that is not going to happen. Who we are and how we are picked and our backgrounds matter. Each branch is entitled to work its will to some extent. But in my judgment, just as we need to be the balance wheel of the democracy, I think the two branches need to themselves come more into balance, avoid the extremes, so that when the country says, "We are for divided government, we want to be in the middle," there is a recognition that extremism on the judiciary is also inappropriate. I think both branches can do this. I think, frankly, they do it tolerably well, despite the excesses of rhetoric. I think the judiciary for more than 200 years has been well served by the political branches. I think the quality of the federal judiciary, if I could immodestly say so, is quite high.

When we go around the world and talk to judges in other countries, we fully appreciate the high regard in which the American judiciary is held. We are always asked, particularly by emerging countries—and I have been talking with judges in a lot of foreign countries that are developing new judiciaries—"How can we develop a judiciary like yours?"

"Well," I tell them, "It isn't going to happen just by what you put in your constitution. We do it because of our traditions. We do it because of an active press. We do it because of mature political parties that by and large are not extreme. We operate in an environment of tolerance. All of those things contribute to a stable judiciary and a stable democracy. The selection and confirmation process are key ingredients in how stable that process is."

I think we have done very well—and when I say "we," I mean all three branches—over the years. Have we had some flare-ups? Sure. Have we made some mistakes? Sure. But the process has yielded a federal judiciary that I think has served the country well and will continue to do so, although some restraint and some cooperation between the two political branches is required. I think if the public demands that and the press keeps a close eye on things, they can expect the two political branches to cooperate. That is what is needed. I do not think the problem is that difficult. It just takes attention, care, a little subtlety, and avoidance of excesses, and then, I think, we will be well served by the results.

A historical perspective on federal JUDICIAL SELECTION

Although the tension between the executive and legislative branches over judicial selection is not new, today we are at a crossroads in determining how the process will work in the future.

By Elliot E. Slotnick

Federal judicial selection, at least for the lower courts, has been a relatively invisible focal point for public interest until recent years. This has been so despite the fact that judicial selection processes represent that very rare interface in American politics where, as is the case in some largely ceremonial occasions such as a State of the Union Address, all three branches of government come into play at the same time and enter the public stage at the same time.

ELLIOT E. SLOTNICK is a professor of political science and associate dean of the Graduate School at The Ohio State University.*

The contemporary tensions between the executive and legislative branches that we witnessed during the Clinton administration between a Democratic president and a Republican Senate and that we clearly are seeing between a Republican president and what is now a Democratic Senate during the first year and a half of the Bush administration are not completely new phenomena.

Indeed, debate at the Constitution's founding demonstrates that the relative roles of the executive and the legislative branches in this arena were a bone of contention among the framers. The Virginia Plan called for congressional selection of judges, while the New Jersey Plan lodged the power in the executive. Ultimately a compromise was reached, and the new constitutional language for "advice and consent" grew out of the language of the Special Committee on Postponed Matters, the Convention Committee whose workload included some of the most contentious and important matters in our country's founding.

Historically, and for the most part, choosing lower federal court judges, as distinct from Supreme Court justices, has been a relatively routine activity of American presidents. While, clearly, presidents have accentuated patronage historically, they did not necessarily accentuate policy in their appointment behavior. This has been particularly the case when those choices were initially suggested by, or at minimum received a clearance from, the senators from the president's party if there were any from the state in which a vacancy existed.

This clearance would be obtained through two mechanisms: across institutions, through senatorial courtesy exercised by the White House in conferring with the home state senators of the president's party; and within the Senate itself through the Judiciary Committee's blue slip. The blue slip has worked to ensure that home state senators of both parties, whether or not they are of the president's party, have some say when judges are being nominated from their state.

This isn't to say that policy motivations never entered into the president's choices. One can look, for example, to the Roosevelt administration and its efforts to support the New Deal through lower court appointments for some clear-cut evidence of these kinds of considerations. For example, in late 1936, William Denman, who was a Ninth Circuit Roosevelt appointee, wrote bluntly to the president, "The New Deal needs more federal judges."[1] In January 1937, three weeks before the unveiling of the court packing plan by the president, Roosevelt asked his appointment secretary about the potential candidacy of Sidney Mize for a district court judgeship:

"I want more information on this man as to whether he is a liberal or a reactionary. What sort of fellow is he?"[2]

Roosevelt received assurance from his assistant attorney general that he had, "looked carefully into the matter. I am convinced that Mr. Mize is a man of liberal views and would measure up in all respects to the expectations of the president."

Still, however, prior to the Nixon administration, policy considerations and/or ideological ones didn't often take primacy in lower court selection processes, both in the president's nomination behavior and in the Senate's exercise of advice and consent. Timely confirmation of virtually all presidential nominees was, in essence, routine and somewhat pro forma. Obviously, a good deal has changed in recent years, which of course brings us here today. I would like to explore some of those changes.

How it changed

For its part, the Nixon administration recognized the potential that judicial appointments, even those in the lower courts, perhaps especially those in the lower courts, could play in its policy agenda—in this instance, an agenda that stressed "law and order" and "strict construction of the Constitution" to quote the words of the administration.

Perhaps the most historically interesting "smoking gun" of the policy implications of judicial selection can be found in a seven-page memo written by a then young Nixon aide by the name of Tom Charles Huston, a memo that Nixon himself endorsed. Huston wrote, and I quote, "Perhaps the least considered aspect of presidential power is the authority to make appointments to the federal bench, not merely the Supreme Court, but to the district and circuit court benches as well. Through his judicial appointments a president has the opportunity to influence the course of national affairs for a quarter of a century after he leaves office." Huston concluded that if the president "establishes his criteria and establishes machinery for ensuring that those criteria are met, the appointments he makes will be his in fact as well as in theory."[3]

Richard M. Nixon

After this memo was read by H.R. Haldeman and John Ehrlichman, it was sent directly to the president who in turn forwarded it to his Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Richard Kleindeist, who handled judicial nominations. There was a handwritten presidential notation on the memo, "RN agrees. Have this analysis in mind when making judicial nominations."

I think despite this memo it is a bit too easy to point to the Nixon administration as the historical point in time where the most significant changes took place in the nature of federal judicial selection. For one thing, I think the apparatus that was sought by Huston and the policy implications of judicial selection of which he spoke were not fully realized until the centralization of the judicial selection process that took place during the Reagan years in the White House.

For my part—and I think this is where my analysis gets off the track a little from the standard stories of this—I think the modern era of contentious politicized judicial selection politics can be traced to, perhaps surprisingly, the Carter administration. The reasons are many.

Selection under Carter

Framing judicial selection in the Carter administration, the Omnibus Judgeship Act of 1978 created 152 federal judgeships. This was the most ever handed at one time to a sitting president. Thirty-five of these seats were at the appeals court level. This unprecedented expansion of the judiciary did not go unnoticed by interested parties of every political stripe who recognized the policy role that these new judges would play well into the future.

Second, Jimmy Carter took actions that really struck at the heart of "business as usual" in judicial selection by establishing the United States Circuit Judge Nominating Commission. This was a set of 13 panels, one in each judicial circuit, with members appointed by the president who would prepare a confidential report for the president for each vacancy recommending the five persons best qualified to fill the judgeship.

While the identification of appeals court appointments has always been tied more directly to the president than to specific identifiable senators because, of course, judicial circuits cross state boundaries, it remains the case that there have been traditions of state seats on the circuit courts. And historically, overwhelmingly, the majority of replacement appointments for appeals court vacancies have, indeed, gone to judges from the state in which the vacancy arose. So, senators often did have a personal stake in circuit appointments, and to many senators Carter's actions were seen as an unwarranted inroad on senatorial prerogatives of fairly long standing.

Making matters worse, from this kind of conflictual perspective, President Carter attempted to intervene in district court appointments as well—clearly, processes which were even much more closely tied to the choices of home state senators from the president's party. Indeed, he wrote a personal longhand letter to every Democratic senator urging them to establish similar nominating commissions in their home states for the selection of district court judge nominees. It was to this suggestion that Senator Lloyd Bentsen is alleged to have responded, "I am the merit commission for the State of Texas."

Jimmy Carter

Policy motivations

I think in the Carter administration there was a "stirring of the pot" of judicial selection processes that raised critical tensions in the balance between executive and legislative roles, tensions that continue with us today. Further, and I think as important as Carter's reforms and processes were, the president's strong personal interest in judicial selection was tied to some very strong policy motivations and substantive concerns regarding issues of affirmative action and the representativeness of the federal bench along racial and gender lines.

Not until the presidency of Franklin Roosevelt was the first woman appointed to a lifetime position on the federal bench. Harry Truman appointed the first African American to a lifetime appointment. Eisenhower did not name a single woman or black to a lifetime judgeship during his eight years in office. Some increases in judicial diversity occurred during the Kennedy, Johnson, and Nixon years, but they were by no means dramatic.

It was in this context that Carter's concerns about this issue were articulated in two ways, both of which ended up being controversial. First, in an Executive Order addressed to his Circuit Judge Nominating Commission, the president stated that, "Each panel is encouraged to make special efforts to seek out and identify well-qualified women and members of minority groups as potential nominees."

This strong and, frankly, previously unheard of push for meaningful affirmative action in judicial selection and the concern for diversity and representativeness among the president's nominees were not taken to kindly by many senators. Once again, the president wrote to each Democratic senator urging that they recruit women and minorities for the new judgeships and other vacancies. Indeed, sometimes, when names weren't forthcoming, the attorney general would literally send back the names and ask them to reopen the search.

In addition to a call for affirmative action, the president also ordained in another Executive Order that nominating commissions ensure that the candidate, and here was the kicker, "Possesses and has demonstrated a commitment to equal justice under the law." This was seen by many conservative senators as a euphemism for liberal judicial activism. As one senator on the Judiciary Committee told me in an interview at the time, "Fairminded? Equal justice? Maybe I am not picking up on the secret code, but I don't think I like what that means."

Interestingly and ironically, the president's open avowal of a substantive preference in his nominees even created tensions with people we would think were his "nominal friends." For example, Ted Kennedy, who you may recall chaired the Judiciary Committee in those days and was also a potential rival to Carter for the 1980 Democratic presidential nomination, authorized a Judiciary Committee questionnaire in which nominees were asked, "In what specific ways have you demonstrated a commitment to equal justice during your career?" Carter was, in effect, being criticized from the right for his substantive commitment in appointments, while, from the left, his feet were being held to the fire to make sure that his nominees actually met those very commitments.

Importantly, though, I think it should be noted that the Carter reform efforts did bear fruit. When Jimmy Carter took office, six women had been appointed to lifetime federal judgeships in our nation's history—Carter appointed 40 in four years. Similarly, while 33 ethnic minorities—blacks, Hispanics, and Asians—had been appointed prior to the Carter administration in the nation's history, 55 were seated during Jimmy Carter's four-year tenure.

Letting out the genie

Once this genie of avowedly open policy considerations in judicial selection had been let out of the bottle, and once an increase in the White House's political role in judicial selection, as distinct from the Justice Department's role in assessing the credentials of candidates increased, as it did during the Carter years, it would be very difficult to return to old ways.

In the wake of the Carter years, we were met by the two-term presidency of Ronald Reagan in which the policy agenda of the president and centralized White House control of judicial selection was clearly a major facet of the selection processes. Indeed, the Republican platform of 1980 pledged to award judgeships to those sharing conservative values. In the words of the platform:

Bill Clinton

> We pledge the appointment of women and men whose judicial philosophy is consistent with the belief in the decentralization of the federal system and efforts to return decision-making power to state and local elected officials. We will work for the appointment of judges at all levels of the judiciary who respect traditional family values and the sanctity of innocent human life.

More recently, in the Clinton years, we witnessed the added tensions in executive/legislative relationships that divided government can bring about as Clinton's nominees met with unprecedented delay in the Republican-controlled Senate with, again, an unprecedented number of nominees not even being given a Judiciary Committee hearing or a subsequent floor vote.

The Clinton experience, however, presents us with a bit of an ironic twist. First, several articles in the symposium issue of Judicature on judicial selection in the Clinton years (March-April 2001) clearly documented that the president's nominees were all too often treated as if they were ideological zealots, while their behavior on the bench has demonstrated that they were quite moderate, actually the most conservative appointees of any Democratic president sitting on the bench today.

Indeed, I think it is fair to say that many of the Democratic party's natural constituents were somewhat frustrated with the decidedly non-ideological nature of the Clinton appointees and the processes that produced them. Nevertheless, President Clinton experienced unprecedented difficulties in getting his nominees confirmed because of ongoing tensions with the Senate majority about the appropriate balance of power in the appointment process. Again, this is a particular irony, since there is little evidence, unlike in the Reagan years, of the presidents seizing on judicial appointments as a major component of his policy agenda.

President George W. Bush

At a crossroads

So, it is this crisis in lower federal court judicial selection, and I think it is fair to label it a crisis, that brings us here today. We are, I think, at a crossroads in lower federal court judicial selection processes. Here, approximately a year and one half into one very atypical year and one half in the Bush administration, the shoe is now on the other foot—a Republican president and a Democratically controlled Senate. Appointment relationships are still in the process of being resolved, I think, and large questions are still being addressed about what the appropriate and relative roles of the president and the Senate, and in particular its Judiciary Committee, will be in these appointment processes.

It is in the continuing and emerging answers to these questions that I think we will find out whether the Clinton years were simply an anomaly in executive/legislative relations in this critical domain, or whether an era of unprecedented contentiousness and gridlock will be the newly institutionalized model that selection processes will follow. It seems to me that there are two alternative paths that could define the road ahead. One is premised on the lessons that we teach in our very first political science classes or that we learned in our first political science classes—what goes around comes around. The other is something I think we learned from our mothers—two wrongs don't make a right.

Despite a good deal of rhetoric from every political stripe over the past months, I am not sure we know quite yet which path is about to be followed because, at bottom, President Bush's first year and one half in office was so very, very different. There were some predictable givens at the beginning. Thus, for example, the process inherited the legacy of the mistreatment of Clinton's nominees. There was the reality of John Ashcroft, a lightening rod for partisan bickering, heading up the Justice Department. There was the legacy of Bush versus Gore and what some would argue was a tainted electoral victory. Of course, there was at first the specter of an evenly divided Senate.

In a situation that seemed like it could not get any worse for the president, it very clearly did. First, the Democrats took control of the Senate, and all legislative work stopped as the struggle for organizing the body proceeded to center stage. Then the tragedy of 9/11 struck, and judicial selection matters took a back seat at the Judiciary Committee to those dealing with national security and terrorism. The presence of anthrax closed down a Senate office building.

In this context, it seems to me, the actual record of judicial confirmations in President Bush's first year and one half is really somewhat difficult to characterize. For some it has been a glass that is half empty, and for others it is half full. Clearly, there remains much to be said and much to be written about where we are today and where we are heading.

Selecting Federal Judges

The Role and Responsibilities of the Executive Branch

An edited transcript of a discussion at the AJS symposium "Selecting Federal Court of Appeals and District Court Judges" held on May 17, 2002 in Washington, DC.

The participants

Nina Totenberg, Legal Affairs Correspondent, National Public Radio

Panelists

Eleanor D. Acheson, former Assistant Attorney General, Office of Policy Development

Walter Dellinger, former Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel

C. Boyden Gray, Legal Counsel to former President George H. W. Bush

Brett M. Kavanaugh, Associate White House Counsel to President George W. Bush

Alan Charles Raul, Associate Counsel to President Ronald Reagan.

Nina Totenberg: When Nixon was president there was a formula. If there were two Democratic senators from a state, the Democratic senators got a substantial portion of the district court judgeship selections. It was understood that when the president picked his or the senators picked theirs, neither side would veto the other's choice unless it was "personally obnoxious," and that usually meant the person had done something personally, grievously terrible to the other side. The system did not work badly.

Nina Totenberg

My question is, is there any possibility of having politics be the solution instead of the problem again, or are we too far down this road? Is federal judicial selection simply going to be a war like the War of the Roses that only ends when everybody is exhausted?

Walter Dellinger

Walter Dellinger: I think we need a drastic solution because of the downward spiral of delay and destruction and mutual recrimination that has been going on. I have a proposal. The Democratic leadership of the Senate would develop a short list of truly distinguished scholars and practitioners they would like to see considered for appointment to the courts of appeals. Some of those persons would be nominated by the president and added to the list of those the president had already submitted to the Senate; all of the nominees who met proper professional standards would promptly be confirmed.

REV_00255745

By replacing the politics of subtraction with the politics of addition, the federal bench could not only be brought back to full strength, but even invigorated by the inclusion of distinguished men and women from each party. My notion is that, to give a simple example, if you have the D.C. Circuit with two fine nominees and three vacancies, why have a battle over which one is confirmed? Why not add a distinguished Democrat and confirm all three?

The competition would be a race to the top, because you would want your list of nominees to be so impressive that the neutral gatekeepers of our public discourse in the editorial world would say, "What a marvelous list of nominees, this group of truly outstanding practitioners, lawyers, and judges."

Brett M. Kavanaugh

I sometimes worry that there is almost a sport in Washington where defeating a nominee or battling to confirm one seems more fun. It seems to me this would be a way to come together.

Totenberg: Brett, you work at the White House. What do you think of this idea?

Brett Kavanaugh: Well, the Constitution obviously assigns the power of nomination to a single person, the President of the United States, and so it should be up to the president to decide who a particular nominee is in consultation with the Senate. In terms of the race to the top, I think President Bush's nominees at the circuit court level have been a race to the top. I think they are notable for their excellent qualifications.

A year ago, there was a lot of talk about the ABA rating process, and Democratic senators wrote to the president, stating that the ABA was the gold standard for evaluating judicial nominees. Well, a year later, all of the president's circuit nominees who have been rated so far have been rated well-qualified or qualified by the American Bar Association. I think there has been a race to the top with the traditional constitutional process.

But also, it bears emphasis that President Bush, when he announced his first 11 nominees on May 9, 2001, at a time when the Republicans controlled the Senate, nominated Roger Gregory to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals. Gregory had been a recess appointment of President Clinton, a nominee of President Clinton who had not received a hearing.

President Bush, at a time when the Republicans controlled the Senate, reached out and tried to do something that would show he was trying, as he put it in his speech that day, "to rise above the bitterness of the past" and show that he wanted to set a new tone with respect to judicial appointments. Another of the nominees that day was Barrington Parker, a superb nominee for the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, who was appointed by President Clinton to the district court and then nominated to the court of appeals.

A year later, eight of the 11 still have not received hearings, despite their qualifications. Judge Gregory has been confirmed, Judge Parker has been confirmed, and one other, but the eight others who are really notable for their excellence still have not received hearings. President Bush has taken a step that President Clinton and other presidents have not taken, as he put it, "to rise above the bitterness of the past."

Totenberg: There are a significant number of vacancies on the Sixth Circuit. The Democratic senators from Michigan—who have been outraged because their nominees, the Clinton nominees, didn't get a hearing for years—have said that they are going to block at least the Michigan appointments unless there is some accommodation with them.

Senator Leahy offered a deal to the president personally, as I understand it. He said, "You pick either of these two women, you name one of them, whichever one you want to the Sixth Circuit, give the other one a district court appointment, and we will move on them. The logjam will be finished."

The president, as I understand it, looked at his aides and said, "Why can't we do this?" But it has not been done.

If we cannot do deals like that, what hope is there, Boyden Gray, for any sort of movement?

C. Boyden Gray: Well, I am at a disadvantage because I do not know the details of that deal. I suppose that deal, standing by itself, would unlock the logjam, and I would have to ask Brett to think about it. But I do not think that is what is at stake. Senator Schumer has made it very, very clear that he is going to impose a philosophical, ideological screen. He has been very, very candid about it.

What the Senate Judiciary Committee is doing is totally unprecedented. You can play around with the statistics all you want. The fact of the matter remains that over the last three decades or so, every term has produced about 190 confirmed nominations, and that held for Clinton. He got only five less, total, than President Reagan. The number of judges left unconfirmed were significantly less at the end of Clinton's term, and the number of judicial vacancies significantly less than the Democrats imposed on us when we left in 1992.

The last year or so of a presidential term has always been sort of a graveyard as people begin to think, "Well, why don't we just stop things?" The Republicans did this to President Carter, but even then reason prevailed and two judges got through,

What people have done with the numbers now is to try to make it look like there is some new crisis. They take data from the last year of Clinton and compare it to President Bush's first year and a half. That is just apples and oranges. At this rate, President Bush will never get his appellate nominees confirmed.

You can play a game with numbers. President Eisenhower did not appoint any women. But how many did Truman appoint or nominate? How many did FDR? Women were not going to law school in those days. Of course it is contentious these days, but I do not think there is a growing crisis.

Eleanor Acheson: I do not want to get into the numbers thing because I do share the view that numbers can be used to say anything. I want to stick with Walter's thought, Nina's question, and make a minor correction or at least an addition to what Brett said. In the Clinton administration we did try to make arrangements and accommodations with Republican senators. It became a matter of necessity when we reached the point in a number of quarters of the country where we were looking at states and circuits with lots of Republican senators, some of whom absolutely refused to consider any person put forward by President Clinton at the district or circuit court level. We could not even engage them in dialogue.

C. Boyden Gray

One factor missing from Elliot Slotnick's look at the Clinton administration that nobody really can overstate, but it was there, was the real animosity towards the president that permeated certain Republican members of the Senate and certain quarters. There were people who would not even return phone calls from the counsel to the president, but there were others who really understood how important it was for there to be judges in their circuits and on their district courts. As a result we ended up with a number of our people getting through.

One of the things I know that is under discussion—Walter did not mention this as part of his idea but there are people on the Hill and some other groups that are talking about this—is maybe we should look circuit by circuit and educate ourselves and the public about who is on these circuits. How long have they been there? What types of cases tend to come before them? Obviously there are going to be many that are in common all across the country, but parts of the country have very different types of cases. What are the needs of the court?

In my job I heard regularly from chief judges on a very non-ideological basis, from people who were chief judges appointed by Democrats to circuit courts and from judges like Carolyn King in Texas who was appointed by a Republican and is a Republican. They know what their courts need. Her view was, "Gee, the president may be interested to know what I think."

Looking at who is there, looking at what the judges say they need, looking at the types of cases would not be a bad idea. I do not know if that is going to happen at the Senate. I certainly do not think it should happen to slow down the nominees that are there or to an unfair consideration of those nominees, but I think it would be a very useful idea.

The business of accommodation, as Walter suggests and particularly in the context of what Jon Newman was talking about earlier with the divided country and its views about these things and people being so much in the middle, is a very good idea. Whether it can be done politically is quite interesting.

Totenberg: Mr. Raul, my question is a factual one, can a Republican president these days in fact make major accommodations with the Democrats on the question of judges?

Alan Charles Raul: I think the answer, as a factual matter, is yes. As Brett Kavanaugh mentioned, two judges, Roger Gregory and Barrington Parker, were nominated by President Bush as carry-overs from the last administration. Of the circuit judges who have been confirmed, two of them were appointments or nominations of President Clinton.

With regard to the race for the top, if you read what Walter Dellinger has said and perhaps others in this room about President Bush's circuit court nominations, I think you would conclude that the best and the brightest really are being nominated. We are not talking about ideological appointments. We are talking about superquality appointments.

If you think of excellence as an accommodation, then the President has made an accommodation. We are not talking about ideological hacks; we are talking about some of the most outstanding lawyers in America. If that is not what the president is supposed to do, then I think we need to reconsider what the right roles and responsibilities are. When the best lawyers in the country cannot get hearings and cannot get confirmed, there is a problem with the system, but it is not in the White House. Having said that, I think accommodation, consultation, and a cooling of the rhetoric, as Judge Newman suggested this morning, is very appropriate, and not just because the country is evenly divided or maybe in the middle.

Going to Boyden Gray's point about the mainstream, what judges that have been appointed or nominated by this president are not in the mainstream? I think we have to revisit our view of the mainstream. I think this is an area where the media can help in not permitting extremist rhetoric to go unchallenged. The appointments that President Bush has made are very much within the mainstream. I doubt that anything but a very small percentage of the country would be uncomfortable with the kinds of people and the likely judicial decisions of appointments this president has made. I will be controversial and say that I think that is largely true of the immediate past president as well.

The "mainstream" is a fairly elastic concept. That does not necessarily mean the people who I view as in the mainstream are those who always agree with me, but rather judges who are making decisions that are not unreasonable, who are not deciding on the basis of illegitimate principles.

Alan Charles Raul

Let me go back to accommodation/consultation, which I do think should be part of the process. There ought to be some informal consultation. But with respect to Walter's model it does put one in mind of the FEC model, where one judge goes up from the Democratic side, one goes up from the Republican side, and you have very much a Democratic seat and a Republican seat on the Federal Election Commission. With all due respect to the excellent people who are appointed there, it results in a very political process where the voting tends to be based on the principle of where you stand depends on how you got your seat.

Totenberg: But if you do not like the process now, if it is not working now, what are you going to do to make it work better? Just saying "consultation" does not get you anywhere.

Raul: There is another truism besides Professor Slotnick's aphorisms of "What comes around goes around" and "Two wrongs don't make a right." The third in Washington is that "Prerogatives are not easily yielded."

When I was in President Reagan's Counsels Office working on judicial selections some of our fiercest battles were with same-party Republican senators on district judges, where President Reagan sought to institute a very controversial rule. He insisted on receiving three names from Republican senators for district court nominees. We tried to enforce that rigorously. We had some senators who would say, "If President Reagan wants three names, I'll give him three names, "Smith, Smith, and Smith." Ultimately, Judge Smith got appointed.

Dellinger: I have praised some of President Bush's nominees. But let me make it clear that I do not think that group of nominees reflects a cross-section of the best of the practitioners and law professors in the country. And no one would suggest that this is a cross-section without regard to party or ideology, even given the quality. It seems to me that what has happened is that the ambiguous, uncertain standard for senators has put us in the worst possible world. It is because of the uncertain standard that the process turns so sour. I would actually prefer one of the two extreme alternatives. One would be what I think ought to be the role with regard to the president's Executive branch nominees, which is that they all ought to be confirmed, absent some extraordinarily unusual event.

With regard to judges, either adopt that mode, which for lower court judges was historically the standard, or adopt the approach that the Senate has a co-equal role if they have the political mandate of having a majority and they simply ought to say, "I don't agree with this judge's philosophy. I think that was involved in his selection, so I am going to vote no." That would be a workable system without a lot of muss or fuss.

What do we have instead? We have a vague sense in the Senate that you can vote no for corruption or incompetence or views so extreme that they are outside the mainstream. Instead of simply saying "I don't agree with Judge X and his philosophy and I don't want to see him promoted," you have to go all out to show that he is some kind of terrible extremist in order to justify a no vote. That it seems to me is the worst place for the standard to wind up, that you have to justify a no vote.

Totenberg: It has always been that way, Walter. Abe Fortas was opposed for a variety of reasons and eventually forced off the bench because of corrupt conduct, but do not kid yourself about the real reason that he was opposed. He was opposed because of his views.

Dellinger: Always being so does not make it right. In some ways, in the nineteenth century the Senate seemed more free to vote no. One of the things we have to remember when we talk about the recent issues over confirmation, how many nominees do you think were rejected for the Supreme Court in the nineteenth century as compared with the twentieth century? In the twentieth century, one out of 13 nominees was rejected by the Senate for the Supreme Court. In the nineteenth century, it was one out of four. Five of Tyler's six nominees to the Supreme Court were rejected.

Totenberg: We are not talking about the Supreme Court.

Dellinger: I understand. I just want to say that there is a history here of a more active Senate role at that level.

Gray: I want to repeat my belief that this is new. Senator Schumer has been very candid that he wants to assert the right as one member of one committee to determine who goes to the floor. This is unprecedented.

Totenberg: You do not think John Ashcroft did that when he was on the committee?

Gray: I deny that Senator Aschcroft exercised the role of determining who would go to the floor.

Totenberg: You would deny that he blocked hearings for people, that he blocked votes for people, he and Senator Sessions and Senator Kyl to some extent on a fairly significant scale? The irony here to me is that when you talk to people off the record as a reporter, they mainly say that if it were left up to Orrin Hatch and Pat Leahy they could get the majority of these people through with relative ease.

Gray: All I can say is that I believe most of Clinton's appellate judges in the first two years were confirmed. We are at the stage now in the first year and a half of President Bush where he has gotten less than 30 percent confirmed.

Kavanaugh: I think the debate right now is why there needs to be a change in the process. A year ago President Bush, when announcing the first group of nominees, specifically said "I want to move forward" and said "every judicial nominee deserves a prompt hearing, a fair vote no matter who lives in the White House and no matter which party controls the Senate." He was setting out an approach to the judicial nomination and confirmation process that he thought and still thinks and has repeated many times should last no matter who is president; namely, let's get a timely hearing. There is simply no justification, in our view, for eight of the first 11 circuit court nominees to wait a year for a hearing. That is unprecedented.

Totenberg: I have recently looked at these numbers. I think it is disgraceful, but I do not think it is unprecedented.

There is no justification for eight of Bush's first 11 circuit court nominees to wait a year for a hearing.

—Brett Kavanaugh

Kavanaugh: In the first two years of the last three presidents, at least 85 percent of their circuit nominees were confirmed; we are at nine of 30. That is getting back to the numbers. I think, as a matter of process, there should be a timely hearing and a fair vote. As a matter of substance, a president should seek people of excellence, people of distinction, people who have wide bipartisan support in their home communities. I think President Bush's nominees will stand up. We invite more scrutiny of the nominees, of their records, of their support. They will stand up to it because they are superb nominees who have the kind of bipartisan support that shows they will be excellent judges.

Acheson: I want to make sort of a process point, but it goes to some of the things that Brett was just talking about, and that is this issue of scrutiny. I think that President George Bush and his team came out working very hard. It clearly was a priority of the administration. They were certainly ahead of where we were in the Clinton years not because it was not a priority, but I think the discipline was there in the Counsel's Office. Working very hard to get nominees up there is really excellent and to be commended.

The one thing I would not commend is that I think the administration does itself no favor by not seeking absolute full disclosure of every last living thing about a candidate. There have been a few hearings that have suggested that the internal work in that regard has not been good. People have been caught unawares, they have not been as demanding of their nominees as they should, particularly for circuit courts.

Similarly, the Senate, particularly if it has a clue that the administration may not be doing this efficiently, needs to work very, very hard to get the resources that it needs and give itself some reasonable amount of time to look through everything there is about these people. I think that will benefit the process, it will educate the senators, it will educate the public, and it is much fairer than some of the things that we have seen that have bumped through already this year. I think everybody who has really been tested by the people who are nominating them and get nominated under a process that has full scrutiny and lots of information out there should get a hearing.

The one process point should be, I think, that the committee really needs to set itself a time limit and tell the White House, "It is going to be a month for this person, because we know what the record is, and we think we can get through it. Everybody will know it, and then we can have a vote." And it may be six months for this person because they have 15 boxes or 3,500 boxes or whatever it is that need to be reviewed and read.

Another point, I do not believe that what Senator Schumer is doing is different than what happened before, at least in the experience that I had over eight years. Clearly, everything changed from the point of view of the activities of the committee after the elections that brought Senator Ashcroft, Senator Sessions, Senator Kyl, Senator Dwyer, and Senator Abraham to the Judiciary Committee. Senator Thompson was there, but he was not part of that group which was sort of a tag team giving us a lot of trouble and taking turns on candidates. It was very obvious.

I am not sure it was exactly as crisply ideological as Senator Schumer has said he is going to conduct himself. I think a good part of it was simply an obstructive move. There were some people for whom it worked. We ultimately got a lot of people through. I think that should not be done by anybody. I think that the Democrats in the Senate are trying to figure out—and I think they have been way too slow about it—a fair way to consider these people. I think that is what is going on now.

Totenberg: The irony is that in the years when the Republicans controlled the Senate and Mr. Clinton was president there was a very deliberate idea that filling these slots was not really that important. Do not challenge me on this one, because I have kept the tape. I have got the tape of Trent Lott saying, "Why should we confirm more judges? Nobody wants more judges." Now their view is different. My view is it should have always been different. These are very important positions.

But, as you have heard here today, there is an enormous amount of, I think, defensiveness on the part of Republicans and—how should I call it?—calm reasonableness from the Democrats because all they can hope for is accommodation. They do not have any real leverage except blocking people.

My question once again is how do you get out of this box? Walter came up with an idea but let me ask this of the Republicans—don't spew numbers at me again because I can tell you, for example, based on the numbers that the American Judicature Society has compiled, that President Reagan had more than 85 percent of his appeals court nominees confirmed and that President Clinton had someplace in the low 60s, I think. Or, I could tell that in the first year of the Hatch chairmanship the Republicans confirmed eight courts of appeals nominees compared to I think it is now 10 nominees that have been confirmed by the Democrats. These are meaningless, just as meaningless as yours.

Raul: First, we need to remember that there is nothing unpredictable about it. Delay and political controversy with judges is strategic—today and it was before. Not to decide about a judge is to decide, that is to say, to keep that spot vacant so that the president, the incumbent president, does not get to fill it up with nominees reflecting his point of view. It is not just keeping the vacancy, however, but also galvanizing political support.

It is perhaps unrealistic to believe that either party is going to give up the opportunity for its political supporters to make the kind of fund raising and political hay that they can about judges. So, it is in the interest of both sides to cast the nominations as vastly more extreme than they are. But I think out of the seeds of what Walter suggested there may be some way out of the quagmire where the political, strategic, and tactical interests of both sides are so divergent, to come up with a set of principles that would work today and would work in the future because, as Professor Slotnick said, "what comes around goes around."

You have to make people see a political advantage in being more accommodating and pay a political price for being unaccommodating. That Michigan senators can just not let any hearings go through and the Sixth Circuit is half empty ought to seem unacceptable to a lot of people. But if you take what Ms. Acheson said about seeking an agreement on time frames and time lines, a political advantage can be gained by appearing to be, or perhaps in fact, being a statesman.

Leading members of the Judiciary Committee could say that they are going to seek to advance their own political fortunes by being statesmanlike and come up with a set of principles, timing principles, perhaps even informal consultation principles that would be in effect for years and make it a timing issue. Lawyers often try to turn intractable problems into procedural issues because people tend to coalesce more easily around procedures than on substantive principles.

Gray: I disagree slightly with Alan. This is a political thing, and it is probably going to get resolved by a backroom deal where they resolve something in the Sixth Circuit. One of the difficulties we have now is the Senate does hang in the balance, and a lot of game playing is going on I am sure. At least if I were a senator, a Democrat, it is probably what I would be doing.

I do not see President Bush being the first president to say, "Okay, I will let the Senate Judiciary Committee, if held by the party of the other side, have one nomination for every one I make." I just do not see that kind of thing.

Totenberg: Well, he would not be the first, but I agree with you that he probably won't do it.

Dellinger: May I say just a word for politics? There is a positive thing to be said about politics. "Judicial review," as Alexander Bickell once said, "is a variant institution in a country that is basically a majoritarian democracy."

A president is elected by the people of the United States. Judges serve for life. For how long would it have been tenable if judges had been able to select their own successors? It is an appropriate role for politics, which in this country is the way we govern ourselves as a community, to play a role in the selection of the kinds of people that are going to have life tenure. It is an appropriately limited role, because it is the moment of politics before life tenure, which provides independence in terms of deciding cases.

You ought not let, as Judge Newman said, the politics of that moment extend forward in time as you would if you asked for a commitment on cases. Surely in a democracy it is appropriate that there be some role for the political branches in influencing the kind of people who are to serve. I think on that we agree across administrations. My proposal is that we try to turn more to the politics of addition rather than the politics of subtraction. Let that be the arena for debate rather than the politics of elimination and destruction.

Totenberg: Let me just switch this around for a second. Every time a president agrees to something, of course, it becomes a precedent for other senators to want the same thing. For example, the two Democratic senators from California got an agreement to have a screening committee to pick district court nominees that is evenly divided between their screeners and the Republican screeners. The names get sent to the White House without being in any particular order, and neither party has real leverage in these picks.

I suspect that the White House agreed to this and the Democratic senators agreed to this because they were in desperate shape for getting more district court judges in California. But of course other senators then want the same thing, particularly where there are two Democratic senators in a state.

Let me ask you, Eldie, what is a president to do if he knows that every time he makes such an arrangement his feet are going to be held to the fire the next time he wants to exert and keep his presidential appointment prerogatives?

Acheson: Well, the word has been used—politics, politics, politics. Boyden addressed it in one context and Walter just made a case for it. California is California. It is its own unique thing. There are probably people in the White House saying to the president, "Oh, my God, don't do that. It will be the end of the Republic as we know it."

I am sure there are other people in the White House who said, "God, what a brilliant idea. We can turn this around politically and use it. You know, we will be the good guys. We are going to be filling seats in California and nobody can be out there complaining about how we are not nominating the right kinds of people for California."

Eleanor D. Acheson

Maybe we are losing something, but we are also winning something. I think a couple of things are going on. I think this process has become, maybe not more political or politicized, but, as was implicit in Judge Newman's remarks, to the courts are coming the social questions of our time. That happened but in a very different context in the nineteenth century. It was all about economics and railroads and things like that.

Now you have a situation where great social questions of our time are being put to the courts. Today, everybody can know everything about not only who is being nominated, but what they are deciding, thanks to the media. I think that is a very important thing. It has moved from being sort of an outlier to something that people talk about in presidential elections, not just about Supreme Court candidates, but about circuit and district court candidates. The whole thing is freighted with politics at every level.

An operating principle for us, certainly, and I assume it is the same in this administration, is you do not have to do it the same everywhere because there is a different political calculus in other jurisdictions, and you are met with different kinds of situations.

It may be that in the work of Senators Feinstein and Boxer and the White House, everybody should be credited. The arrangements made, and some of the arrangements that future presidents make, will in fact begin to lay a groundwork for doing what should be done. Maybe it will start happening more than not.

Totenberg: Let me conclude this on a desultory note. As somebody who has covered judgeships for about 30-plus years and has always found it fascinating and important and tried to get people interested in it I regret to say that in the end you are preaching to the choir, and that there are relatively few choir members.

I give President Bush a lot of credit for trying to raise the profile on this issue, but I do not hold out much hope for his success. In the end, the people who care about this, care about this. The rest of the folks, it is not that they do not care, it is that they care about other things much more.

POLITICS, PRIVILEGE & POWER

The Senate's role in the appointment of federal judges

The scope of the Senate's role in judicial appointments under the Constitution is unclear, and that role is complicated by fundamental changes in American political and institutional arrangements since the framing.

by Stephen B. Burbank

The Senate's role in the appointment of federal judges is set forth in Article 2, Section 2 of the Constitution:

> [The President] shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint ... Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States.

There are obvious limits to the guidance that this provision can provide when one seeks, in 2002, to determine how the Senate should exercise its constitutional responsibility. Even if we could recover with confidence the original understanding of the framers and ratifiers of the Constitution, the question would remain whether that understanding has any legal or normative force today. No such confidence is warranted; the Senate has the last word on the law, and normative arguments confront the reality of contemporary politics.

The text of Article 2, Section 2 is indeterminate as to the proper role of the Senate in giving "Advice and Consent." Moreover, there was relatively little attention given to the Senate's role during the Constitutional Convention and in the Ratification Debates. There is something there, if not for everyone, then at least for both those who would confine the Senate's role to a consideration of professional qualifications, character (including temperament) and (perhaps) general attitudes about the Constitution and law, on the one hand, and those who argue that the Constitution envisions a broader and deeper inquiry, including consideration of an individual's "ideology," on the other. Part of the problem is that the same individual may well have uttered apparently inconsistent views at different stages in the formation of the Constitution.[1]

During most of the Convention, the appointing power lay either with the Congress as a whole or with the Senate, and attempts to repose the power with the Executive alone were defeated. Indeed, late in the process, the delegates rejected a proposal much like that ultimately adopted. It has been persuasively argued that this reversal was due to a willingness to compromise among delegates from small states once they had won the "Great Compromise," which gave their states equal representation in the Senate.[2]

This history, including the role of the "Great Compromise," casts serious doubt on arguments for a narrow Senate role as a matter of original understanding. For, apart from the Senate's exclusive role in the penultimate draft of the Constitution, state (and regional) interests were in an important sense the politics of the late 18th century, and it is pretty clear that the framers understood that senators would and could appropriately pay attention to such matters in considering appointments.[3] In addition, it was not long after the Constitution came into effect that the Senate rejected a judicial nomination (of John Rutledge in 1795) for reasons that are political even by more modern standards.[4]

Even if we could with confidence recover the original understanding as to the nature of the Senate's role, one could fairly ask whether we should care. This question has two dimensions. The first has to do with the larger question, much disputed by law professors and others, of the value of various interpretive approaches to the Constitution. In seeking to answer that question one must confront fundamental changes in American political and institutional arrangements since the framing, including the development of political parties and changes in conceptions of law and of the judicial function.

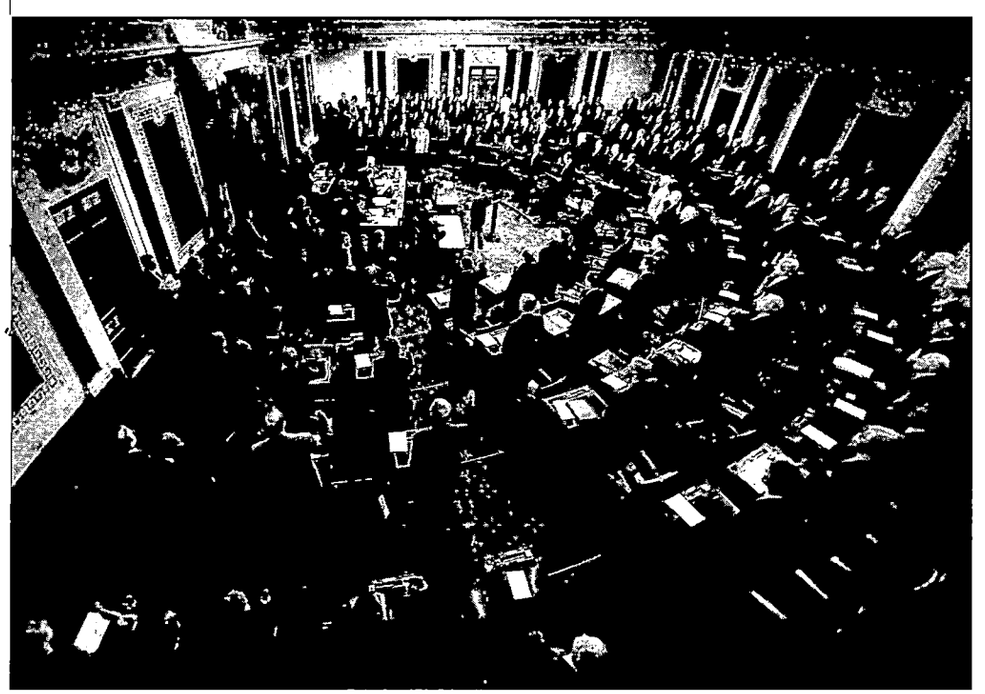
The second dimension has to do with the fact that, as a legal matter, the role of the Senate in the appointment of federal judges is a "political question," insulated from judicial review.[5] That does not mean this question of constitutional interpretation is not properly a matter for sober reflection, including in particular by members of the Senate. Rather, it means that the Senate bears ultimate responsibility for the wise formulation and exercise of the power conferred.

As someone who is not allergic to originalism (as long as it is part of, and does not exhaust, the interpretive repertoire), I have come to believe that it yields the same answer to this question as less historically based approaches. That is because of changes in attitudes towards law and the judicial function, and hence towards the qualifications that suit a person for judicial office, as well as towards courts as instruments of policy. Thus, in seeking to provide the "security" to which reference was made at the time of the framing of the Constitution,[6] a responsible senator should have in mind both current conceptions of the judicial function and the purposes of the president in making a particular nomination.

A short history



Many students of federal judicial appointments divide the history of the Senate's role roughly into three broad periods: the 19th century, 1900-1967, and 1967 to the present. This is an artificial division that is driven by the number of Senate rejections of presidential nominations and by the fact that interest has centered on Supreme Court appointments to the exclusion of the inferior federal courts. According to the story based on this view, the Senate was not shy to reject federal judicial nominees, including for partisan political reasons, in the 19th century, was remarkably restrained during most of the 20th century, and has reassumed an active posture during the last 30 years or so.[7]

There may be historical studies of appointments to the lower federal courts that would enable us to gauge the plausibility of this standard account, but I have not come across them. I am doubtful, however, that, whatever its descriptive power as applied to Supreme Court nominations, the standard account well describes the history of the Senate's role as to appointments to the inferior federal courts.

Thus, it may be, as various commentators have suggested, that changing attitudes towards courts (e.g., the triumph of both judicial review and judicial supremacy), the ascendancy of lawyers in the Senate, and the prevalence of unified government all contributed to the greater acquiescence to Supreme Court nominations during most of the 20th century. A jurisprudential climate that enabled both presidents and courts to mask policy in first principles may have also played a part during the first half of that period.[8]

Yet, when the Senate considers a nomination to the Supreme Court, it is engaged in an act of obvious national importance, attracting substantial public interest, and its members therefore must be careful at least to seem to act responsibly. Appointments to the lower federal courts have not, for most of our history, engaged remotely similar public interest. Nor as a historical matter has the Senate played the same role in considering nominations to those courts. Indeed, apart from changing practices over time (e.g., nominations were not referred to a Senate committee until 1868), it is misleading to talk about a unitary "role" of the Senate in giving advice and consent to federal judicial appointments.[9]

Rather, it appears that the Senate plays and has played quite different roles depending upon the court to which an individual is nominated. With respect to nominations to the federal trial courts, the Senate's role has been dominated by patronage, backed up by the practice of "senatorial courtesy," the so-called "blue slip" system[10] giving a veto power to senators of the president's party from the nominee's state, and during some periods to senators from the other party as well. Not surprisingly given the power thus conferred on individual senators, the process has been stubbornly non-transparent (to the point that the Judiciary Committee follows a practice precisely the opposite of that suggested by the language of the "blue slip").[11]

The recent past

Among the influences cited by students of federal judicial appointments for the greater activism of the Senate in the period since 1967, at least as to Supreme Court nominees, and at least as measured by Senate rejections, are: greater awareness of the impact of judicial decisions on important questions of social policy after the Warren Court; attention to the policy potential of judicial appointments on the part of recent presidents (not a new phenomenon—see FDR—but perhaps a more frequent one); and the greater incidence of divided government. These accounts have also tended to identify an increasing role for the White House (as opposed to the Justice Department) in nominations, which would not be surprising if presidents have been pursuing a policy agenda in making nominations, and which could be expected to arouse greater senatorial interest in those nominations, particularly in a period of divided government.

The Carter presidency is seen by some as ushering in the more active participation by the White House Counsel's Office in nominations (traced to frustration with the pace of affirmative action efforts by the Justice Department).[12] Other changes in process made by President Carter or during his term have affected the Senate's role(s) even more directly, although with varying durability.

It may be the case that President Carter's Circuit Judge Nominating Commission, with its 13 panels chosen largely by the White House (along highly partisan lines), reduced the modest influence that individual senators had enjoyed in appointments to the courts of appeals.[13] But President Reagan abolished the commission, and it has not been revived.[14] Moreover, the Clinton years witnessed horse trading between the White House and senators for courts of appeals appointments,[15] and recent news reports about nominations to the Sixth Circuit suggest more of the same with the political powers reversed.[16]

With Carter's active support, district judge nominating commissions were created in 30 states, thus establishing at the federal level systems akin to that long championed by AJS for the states. As a result, some senators (from the President's party) lost all or part of the power of patronage and "senatorial courtesy" (depending upon whether the names of those recommended went directly to the White House). At the same time, some senators (from the other side of the aisle) gained influence through their participation in creating and naming members of commissions. In that regard, the first such commission was apparently created by Florida's two democratic senators during the presidency of Gerald Ford.[17]

Although both President Reagan (through Attorney General William French Smith) and President Clinton encouraged senators to use nominating commissions or similar screening mechanisms, the extent to which senators did so is not clear.[18] Note again that, when such mechanisms are employed by senators of the president's party and result in the transmission of multiple names to the White House (as Smith recommended), they signal a diminution of senatorial power.

As chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Ted Kennedy instituted a discrete and extensive questionnaire to be completed by nominees and committed resources to the development of independent investigative capacity for the Committee. Both of these changes in Senate practice have endured, and they have obvious implications for the ability of the Senate to play an active role in considering federal judicial nominations.[19]

Senator Kennedy also announced that failure to return a "blue slip" would not automatically kill a nomination, since he would put to Committee vote whether the members wished to proceed.[20] It is not clear how long this change lasted. In truth, with senators unable to agree about

The blue slip should be distinguished from the hold, which evolved "from an accommodation to members who cannot be present for a debate to a blue slip process writ large, in which legislation and nominees can be held up by any senator, for any reason, as long as the leadership decides to honor the hold." what practice was even a few years ago, nothing is clear about "senatorial courtesy" except that its practice has not been transparent.[21]

More generally, perhaps the most striking aspect of the exercise of the Senate's "Advice and Consent" power in connection with nominees to the lower federal courts during the Clinton administration is precisely its lack of transparency. Students of previous periods had concluded that the "blue slip" was rarely used and, when used, was rarely employed for the purpose of killing, as opposed to delaying, a nomination.[22] An apparently unprecedented number of nominees never made it to a Judiciary Committee hearing and/or to the floor during the Clinton presidency, however, with the result that statistics based on those who were the subject of such hearings, or of a vote in the full Senate, are misleading if not meaningless.[23]

Part of the explanation is surely election year politics, which has long been a factor in the pace and rate of confirmation. Some also see in this picture "pay back" for the defeat of the nomination of Robert Bork to the Supreme Court, but that seems the beginning rather than the end of analysis, at least when it is recalled that the subject is nominations to the lower federal courts.

Perhaps those who themselves are committed to the use of the federal judicial appointment process to advance a particular policy (and not simply partisan) agenda believe that others have a similar commitment, whether or not they will admit it. In any event, the result has been, or so it seems, that more and more nominations to the federal bench are now treated as if they were nominations to the Supreme Court,[24] with one major and important difference: senatorial accountability.

The road ahead

History suggests, and the recent experience of the Pickering nomination confirms, that, in a period of divided government and with a president who makes no secret of his intent to use federal judicial appointments to advance a policy agenda, the Senate will play an active role in considering nominations to the lower courts. We would not have needed history to tell us that for such appointments the process was likely to remain largely non-transparent. Again, senators cannot even agree about what the "blue slip" practice of the Judiciary Committee was in the recent past. And few senatorial offices responded to an AJS questionnaire designed to determine, among other things, what if any screening mechanisms they use in connection with district court and court of appeals vacancies.[25] Yet, two developments may have altered the landscape, even if not permanently.

Part of the package of compromises that attended the 2001 Senate reorganization after the Democrats gained control was an agreement "that blue slips would be treated as public information."[26] This in turn should make it harder for a hold outside of the blue slip system to remain anonymous. Perhaps relevant as well are the events of September 11, in the wake of which the President was encouraged not to repeat his father's "mistake" following the Gulf War and, thus, to take full advantage in the domestic sphere of the political capital that has been invested in him as Commander-in-Chief.[27] Whether or not he accepted the advice, and apart from the compromise on blue slips, it might have been more difficult for the loyal opposition to keep the process of considering nominations to the lower federal courts non-transparent. Neither phenomenon need (or is likely to) endure, however, and neither reflects acceptance of the need for accountability by the leadership in the Senate.

AJS has issued an important statement about the appropriate role of ideology in the Senate's "Advice and Consent" function, as follows:

> It is currently a matter of controversy whether the ideology of federal judicial nominees should be taken into account by the Senate in the confirmation process. The American Judicature Society believes the appropriate question is not whether ideology should play a role, but what role it should play. Ideology has always played, and inevitably will play, a role in federal judicial selection.
> Judges are human beings; they necessarily bring to the bench the perspectives obtained from prior life experiences. Presidents take these perspectives and predilections into account when they nominate judges. The Senate necessarily does the same.
> To say that ideology will play a role in the nomination and confirmation process, however, is not to say that it should play the sole, or even a primary role. Nominees who display ideological convictions so strong as to be impervious to contrary evidence, argument or law should not serve on the bench. Judging is not a political process, and the judiciary should not be politicized by the Executive Branch or the Senate. AJS believes judges should be chosen on the basis of established legal credentials, an ability to decide cases based upon their facts and the law, and a demonstrated capacity for open-mindedness, sound judgment, and even-handedness.

I subscribe to this statement, but I am not optimistic that, so long as the process of considering nominations to the lower federal courts remains a bastion of privilege largely shielded from public scrutiny, the public will have adequate information to assess the performance of its elected representatives according to these or any other criteria.

Selecting Federal Judges

The Role and Responsibilities of the Legislative Branch

An edited transcript of a discussion at the AJS symposium "Selecting Federal Court of Appeals and District Court Judges" held on May 17, 2002 in Washington, DC.

The participants

Moderator

Marcia Coyle, Washington Bureau Chief, National Law Journal

Panelists

Victoria Bassetti, Judiciary Committee Counsel to Senator Herb Kohl

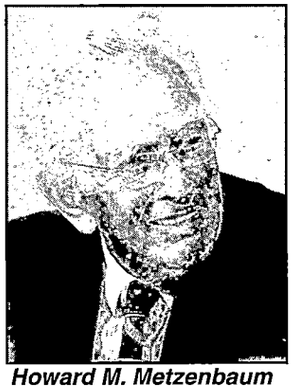
Richard J. Durbin, U.S. Senator (Illinois)

Connie Mack, former U.S. Senator (Florida)

Howard M. Metzenbaum, former U.S. Senator (Ohio)

Michael E. O'Neill, former General Counsel to the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Marcia Coyle: The first panel, consisting of current and former members of the Executive branch involved with judicial nominations, seemed to convey a general sense of pessimism about the confirmation process. Maybe there is a legitimate basis for the pessimism.



Marcia Coyle

I thought we might build on some comments that were made this morning by Judge Newman when he was talking about the process. He said that he did not think the problem was terribly complicated. He seemed to feel that what we need is to just find balance, balance in rhetoric and balance in nominees, particularly in an era of divided government.

What I would like for us to discuss is, how do you achieve that balance? Judge Newman really did not tell us. On the prior panel, Walter Dellinger came up with one suggestion that was intriguing. If you have a circuit, for example, with three vacancies and you have a Republican president, why not have the president pick two candidates and have the Senate, if it is Democratic controlled, suggest a candidate? Balance.

I do not know if that is a good or bad idea, but this is what I would like to discuss. Perhaps what Walter was trying to get at is that there is so much focus on the consent side of the Senate's responsibility that maybe we need a little more focus on the advice side, and what we can do to lift out of the morass we are in.

Howard Metzenbaum: I do not think the present system has worked that badly. In fact, I think it has worked rather well. I think there is a reasonable amount of balance in the courts throughout the country. I am not sure when people talk about substituting some other system what other system they would use. the choice and not make it subject to the consent and approval of the Senate? I think not. Or, would you want the Senate or the House Judiciary Committees to make the determination? I doubt that very much.

One of the things I thought about when I was putting some notes together for this meeting was, why did we give Bork such a tough time while at the same time we let Rehnquist come through and Scalia sail through? Scalia, who is probably now the most dominant factor on the Supreme Court as far as conservatives are concerned, absolutely sailed through without any disagreement. So, you say to yourself, "How did this come about?" I am frank to tell you I do not know how it came about.

There is one factor that has not been taken into account with respect to the confirmation process that I believe would be particularly significant. I think I first came upon this when Justice David Souter was up for confirmation. Frankly, he was a pretty blank piece of paper when he came before us. We did not know much about him at all.

I remember having an interview with him in my office. I thought he was a pretty nice sort of fellow. I said to him, "Tell me the list of charities to which you have contributed in the last 10 years," and he told me. It was broad based and it was good.

In retrospect, I think if I were still a member of the Senate I might use that more often because individuals up for confirmation would not have been thinking about that aspect, that particular indicator, 10 years, 15 years ago. If they gave only to their church or their temple or if they gave only to one group or another, you get an idea of what kind of person he or she is. It would not be an absolute determinant, but I think it gives you a pretty fair idea as to what kind of individual is coming before you for confirmation for the court, and it would give you some idea as to whether that individual is going to have a broad-based appeal, take into account broad-based considerations, when a case is pending before him or her.

Connie Mack

Coyle: Just this week there was a news story out of Florida. The two Democratic U.S. senators wrote a letter to President Bush very upset because they felt the president had ignored a longstanding judicial nominating commission that was set up in Florida, had ignored three choices that were forwarded to him for, I think, district court and U.S. marshal vacancies.

Senator Mack, correct me if I am wrong, but you were very instrumental in the formation of that commission, were you not? That is part of the advice side of your responsibility. What is happening? Is it falling apart on both ends?

Connie Mack: Well, I am not sure that at this point I am qualified to answer why the administration reacted to the three nominees the way that they did. I would say that the commission that is in place now is different—the process was different in establishing it. I would have to know more about actually how this was done.

Coyle: You do not need to respond specifically, only about the concept of the local commission.

Mack: I think that when you mentioned the word "balance" a minute ago and focused not on the consent side, but the advice side, you really hit the nail on the head. Let me take a minute to tell you about the process that I eventually established.

When I was first elected to the Senate in 1988—and by the way I am not an attorney—I eventually decided that I needed some help with the process of selecting individuals who were going to be judges. There is a belief that you have certain rights and prerogatives that come with having won the election. Not much attention is focused on the issue of judges during an election, except what type of judges would you propose. Very, very seldom, if ever, is the question asked about how would you go about selecting judges, which I think is, in fact, a question that ought to be asked.

After I won the election, my brother Dennis, who was a lawyer, said to me, "Well, how are you going to go about selecting candidates for judgeships?" I really hadn't given much thought to it, but I said, "I think that's a prerogative that I have as being a newly elected member of the Senate." Dennis said, "Well, I would like for you to spend a little time talking with Mike Jamison, an attorney in Florida with the Holland & Knight firm, a fellow I went to college with."

I talked with Mike and he started to lay out for me this concept of a commission. Again, frankly my first reaction was that I was giving up some of my authority, some of my power, some of my responsibility, and so I was a little cool. Dennis encouraged me to talk to another fellow by the name of Tom Schultz, an attorney with the University of Florida that I knew. The end result was that it got me to start asking questions of my new colleagues about how they go about it. What I found out is that there is every method under the sun.

On one end of the spectrum is the good old boy network. A vacancy comes open, a call goes back to the state to a few of your close friends and associates. On the other end is a very sophisticated commission process.

After those discussions, and again with the recognition that I am not an attorney, that I really needed to have some outside input, I decided to put together a commission that was geographically balanced. I must admit that most of my interests were to see that there were Republicans on this particular commission, but the conclusion I came to was that what you want to create is a belief that this commission that is going to assist you in making recommendations, in fact, is balanced.

As I was thinking about what we might talk about today, the word "balance" kept coming up. The chairman of my commission, in fact, was a Democrat. There were several Democrats on the commission, one or two former presidents of the Florida Bar Association. What I ended up doing was creating a commission that had the perception of great competence and balance. Now, what helped me to do that was there was credibility to it.

Why did the commission work? I think there are three aspects to it. The process itself has to be good and public, public not in the sense that the interviews of the candidates are public, but that we made a public disclosure. Anyone who wanted to apply could do so.

Those applications were reviewed and narrowed down so that we would not have 50 or 60 or 70 individuals who would have to go through personal interviews. We narrowed it down to maybe 12 or 15. There were individual, personal interviews, extensive discussions with those individuals about their beliefs, their qualifications, and so forth. That was narrowed down to where three names came to me.

At that point, I engaged Senator Robert Graham—actually I should say that he was engaged even before that—letting him know who we thought we might see coming from the commission, an opportunity for him to understand who these individuals were, providing an opportunity to say to me that he had real concerns about a particular individual. He did not have a veto, but clearly had an opportunity to say, "Connie, I think if you go with this particular candidate we are going to have problems in the Senate."

Now, I could make the choice and say, "Okay, we are going to go ahead. We are going to have some problems, and we are going to deal with it on the floor or in committee." I do not remember a time when that occurred, which brings me to the second point.

I think there has to be an effort for members of the Senate, and particularly in this case members from the same state, to build some confidence, some faith, some trust in each other. Bob and I were fortunately able to do that. When he would say to me, "I think we have got a problem with this particular candidate," I did not take it as a political effort to try to stop somebody. I took it as a genuine concern on his part that needed to be addressed.

The third thing is politics itself. Over the years Bob and I became very close friends. We concluded that it was politically in our best interest to find ways to work together, and we believed that one of the ways to do that was with the appointments, or suggestions as to who should be nominated for a federal judgeship.

Coyle: Senator Durbin, what about the advice side? Has that part of the responsibility been shuffled aside? Is it possible to reinvigorate it if it has been, and should we do it?

Richard Durbin: Let me tell you my experience. When I first was elected, Carol Moseley-Braun, the other Democratic senator, and I set out to do this together. And we did it every step of the way. The first vacancy that we had for the district court in the Northern District of Illinois had 30 people apply. It was a very broad range of people who were interested in this opportunity to serve on the federal bench.

Four years later, when a vacancy occurred on the district court, 12 people applied for it. Now why? Why would you have that dramatic downturn in interest in applying for a job with this prestige? I think it reflected the fact that the process for judicial confirmation was invasive and interminable, and that prospective applicants looked at it and said, "It isn't worth the effort."

Let me add a footnote to this. If you think it is tough enough to find white males interested, believe me, when you are looking for women or minorities you have a dual problem. First, they fared very poorly under the Republican-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee.

Many women come into firms, get married, have a baby, leave, come back, do pro bono work, and have a much broader range of practice than many of the men who came before us as applicants. In that broad range of practice, women would occasionally lapse into something that looked "political." They were involved in too much work for legal defense or too much pro bono work. They were blackballed. They were not given a chance in the process. They, frankly, said, "You know, what is the real need to get involved in this and to see this all bogged down?"

Another element, of course, is that good minority attorneys are prime candidates at major law firms and make a lot of money. Senior partners at Chicago law firms came to me and said, "We are looking. If you see any prospective people in your office, minorities and women, we need them in our law firm." So, there is a great attraction for them to stay in the private sector where they are going to be handsomely rewarded compared to the federal side.

After Carol Moseley-Braun lost in the election four years ago, I called Peter Fitzgerald and we set up a process with the Democratic White House. I said, "Here is how it will work. You will get every fourth nominee. I will take the first three, and you get the fourth. I get the next three and you get the next one. Every nominee that I will choose or you will choose is subject to our mutual veto."

This cooperative arrangement, worked. We filled every single vacancy in Illinois. We moved our nominees through very, very quickly. It was similar to what Connie and Senator Graham worked out. We are still using that process. Now the tables have turned, and Senator Fitzgerald has three nominees and then I have one vacancy to fill. I think we can continue to fill vacancies under that approach. I think it is a good way to deal with it.

Let me talk about the current state of affairs very quickly. You will be inundated with statistics from Republicans and Democrats to justify how the other side is unreasonable in this. I will, instead of going to the statistics, tell you that there are several things you should keep in mind. Approximately 80 cases were considered by the U.S. Supreme Court in its last term. Approximately 57,000 cases were considered by circuit courts across America.

If you want to know where the action is when it comes to key decisions that reflect on policy that is being made in Washington, look to the circuit courts. That is where the battle lines have been drawn. Those are the court vacancies that were the hardest to fill in the Clinton administration. Those are the people it was almost impossible to bring forward. I can go through the litany of people who "died" waiting a year, two years, three years, four years and never getting a hearing. Now, because those vacancies are left over from the Clinton administration, some on the Republican side hope to fill all of them as quickly as possible with Bush appointees. You can understand the natural resistance from the Democratic side, where we feel that some of our people were not treated fairly. That is a reality.

Senator Richard Durbin

Second, let me discuss beyond the circuit court aspect of it the standards that are being used. This troubles me as much as anything else. There are personal conduct standards that were applied to Clinton nominees that I think were unfair, and yet they were applied consistently, particularly in the area of drug use. I will not go into chapter and verse. Some nominees whom I consider to have been guilty of "youthful indiscretions," as the phrase goes, were stopped cold in their tracks and told they did not have a chance. There was going to be a hold on their nomination forever. That was a reality.

I can tell you that some of the nominees being sent to us by the Bush White House would not pass the same test. And you wonder why Democrats are standing back and saying, "Wait a minute, this is not fair, people for years were told that the aspiration of their life, to serve on the federal bench, had been stopped because 25 years earlier they had done something stupid. Now we are told, "Fill the vacancies and fill them quickly." You can understand what is boiling beneath the surface here.

How do we get out of this mess? Let me give you a very simple proposal that I hope that some in the White House would consider. Come back to some of the circuit court nominees from the Clinton White House, some of them who, frankly, were indisputably well qualified, people who could have served this country and can still serve this country as circuit court judges. Put them in the mix. Let us make this truly a bipartisan effort to fill the circuit court vacancies. That single effort, I think, would have a dramatic impact on the attitude on Capitol Hill.

What Chairman Leahy has said I think is accurate. If you send us moderate nominees, well skilled in the law and honest people, they are likely to come through the process very quickly. Send us someone who is fraught with controversy, and it is going to take longer. In fact, it may take a lot longer.

We are trying to move this towards the center in terms of the nominees. I think the Clinton White House faced that. They knew with the Hatch Judiciary Committee they had to do that, move toward the center with the nominees, and I hope the Bush White House will acknowledge that same responsibility.

Coyle: I can understand, because it is politics, that you would want to go back to some of the Clinton nominees. Maybe that will solve the problem this year, because of what happened two or three years ago, but how do we keep it from happening again? This is politics and it may happen again.

You say we tell the White House, "Don't send us contentious candidates." This is, again, Jon Newman's comments this morning: "We've got to find this balance not only in rhetoric, but in nominees." What can you do? You do not want to usurp the prerogative of the executive to nominate.

Again, we come back to the advice function here. Should you, should the Senate, have sort of a supernominating commission in which Republicans and Democrats do not nominate, but send a list over to the White House when there are circuit vacancies so that the White House can get a sense of who you are interested in, who you think is qualified before they send somebody back? Would that help? What about something concrete here?

Durbin: I think it is an interesting academic proposal, but it is unlikely to ever happen in the real world of politics. The president expects to have the right to fill vacancies. What I am suggesting is that when you have an election as close as the last one, when you have an experience like the one that we have just gone through, it really argues for the White House to take care to try to find that center stripe.

For example, one of the litmus tests now for many nominees is whether you have been a member of the Federalist Society. I will not get into the Federalist Society. I brought it up in a hearing, and every member of the Federalist Society wrote to me and said, "You are turning into Joe McCarthy by even mentioning the Federalist Society." But let me just say that the fact that somebody belongs or does not belong to the Federalist Society is irrelevant. The fact that they are conservative should be irrelevant. What we are trying to find is people who are reasonable and moderate in their general approach.

I think that there is plenty of room on the Republican side to find those nominees. I bet you found them, Connie, in your experience in Florida. I think we found them in Illinois. I hope that the president will be looking for those people, too. I do not know that there is going to be any superprocess that is going to be established. Imagine, if you will, the law that would have to be signed by the president to take his power away to appoint judges—interesting challenge.

Coyle: I was not thinking so much of taking away the power, but just setting up an advisory group, a body, maybe of senators and outside lawyers. I am not pushing this idea. I am just trying to ask, is there a way to solve that one problem that you have raised, the nominees that are the red flags that come into the Senate? I am not even sure, are they red flags before they get to you? What happens in the process, Mike? Would you have known, before you have actually investigated him, that someone like Pickering is a potential red-flag nominee?

Michael O'Neill: I think it is a little bit difficult. Going back for a moment on whether or not senators should provide a list to the president, Senator Arlen Specter several years ago had an idea that perhaps we should pass legislation that would allow the Senate to be able to recommend to the president a list of possible Supreme Court candidates, to be able to then have the president choose from that list of Supreme Court candidates, in a way regularizing and formalizing the Senate's advice function. In effect, the blue slip itself is a way that the Senate has used to formalize its advice function.

Michael O'Neill

When I was working on nominations for then-Chairman Hatch, I thought that the Clinton administration and the people that I worked with in the Department of Justice did a pretty good job by and large of seeking consultation with senators, both from their own party obviously and from the Republican party, in trying to come to a consensus pick or at least letting them know who they were planning to nominate.

I think it is those sorts of informal mechanisms that cause the White House to recognize that, even though the Constitution vests the president and solely the president with the appointment power, there is that little advice and consent feature that the president has to acknowledge. The fact that President Bush or then President Clinton had to consult with the home state senators, either before or after he would nominate an individual, was simply a reality of the political process.

I agree with Senator Metzenbaum that by and large the process works pretty well. Is it a perfect process? Far from it. I think that the Senate ought to, for example, once someone is nominated, have an obligation to give them a hearing and a vote.

Occasionally a candidate will have to be withdrawn; occasionally red flags do come up in FBI reports. You have got things going on behind the scenes where everybody perhaps agrees that, "Hmm, it may not be in the best interest of the body to allow this person to go forward. We don't necessarily want this person to withdraw, either. We don't want them to personally embarrass themselves."

Everybody agrees silently behind the scenes that this nomination will simply die. That happens on occasion, because sometimes things do not get caught immediately. I do not think (per se) that there are any specific red flags that stopped someone from going forward, unless it was something that came out of, for example, an FBI background check. There were certainly people, as Senator Durbin mentioned, who looked askance at the Federalist Society or who looked askance at membership in the ACLU or the NRA or the various and sundry interest groups that obviously play a role on Capitol Hill. I do not think any of those factors in and of themselves were necessarily disqualifying. I think you also have to look at the strategic background of what happens in the Senate.

I have enormous respect for the Senate. I have enormous respect for the people who serve in the Senate, and the fact that by and large as a collegial body they are able to work things out. The Bork hearings, the Rehnquist hearings, the Thomas hearings really were an anomaly, and they are certainly not the first time in that particular body that you have had problems like that. It is true that during most of the twentieth century there was not as much controversy over nominations to the lower courts, but certainly early in the country's history more nominees were rejected. Is that a bad thing? Is that a good thing? I do not necessarily think so. I think that the Senate does a pretty reasonable job, provided it takes action.

Coyle: Victoria, I was wondering about Senator Durbin's comment that the battle now is joined over the circuit judges. I know circuit judges have always issued, roughly, as many decisions as he noted. But is it also, in the absence of a Supreme Court vacancy for a while now, that there is increased focus on circuit judgeships?

Also, in your position, is there much consultation between, say, the Senate Judiciary Committee, since that is where the action is, and the White House over the course of the nomination, particularly one that may be controversial?

Victoria Bassetti: It seems to me that one of the ways that we achieve balance is when both sides realize that the extremes of imbalance are unbearable. The question is whether we have gotten to the point of it being absolutely unbearable, so unbearable that we really are going to finally have to achieve balance.

What you have heard about from Senator Metzenbaum, Senator Mack, and Senator Durbin is where we do manage to achieve balance, which is largely in the district court area. There, senators have set up commissions that have had extensive negotiations and consultations with the White House, and both sides are willing to realize that they are not going to get everything that they absolutely want and that, "They are going to compromise on a candidate who they can all find as perfectly acceptable."

Where you find more conflict right now is, indeed, over the circuit court nominees, and that is precisely one of the areas where there is the least amount of dialogue between the White House and the senators of the particular states or circuits involved. It would be a nice idea to think that if we get a Supreme Court nominee in the next few years we will manage to vent everything, and then everything will go back to being nice and easy on circuit courts, but I do not think so. I think it is an irreversible ratchet up that we have managed to get on circuit court nominees.

I think, though, that balance is a lot easier to achieve than we think it is. Balance has consistently and persistently been achieved on certain circuit courts when the White House has consulted and dealt with the senators from the state or circuit. It is, to continue the analogy about the unbearability of conflict, sort of a mutual assured destruction situation that we are in. You know that you are in trouble when someone keeps using over and over and over again the word "prerogative" rather than "balance." If you have a lot of people insisting on their prerogatives, and the president has his and the Senate has its, that can lead to mutual assured destruction with regard to circuit court nominees.

There are solutions to it; there have been solutions to it over many years. It is just a question of finding the parties and the patterns that get us to that point. They have been found before, and we can find them again, but it is going to have to be because we have all come to realize that the path of destruction and the path of fighting is unbearable and not productive anymore.

Coyle: Senator Mack, are we at the point where we feel the fighting is unbearable and we should find those alternatives?

Mack: I think we are where we have always been. I really do not think that what is happening now is unusual. In my reading of history, what we are experiencing today are the personalities of people involved in politics. You could change the system to some degree, but all systems can be manipulated. I do not think that too much focus should be on how we get a change in the blue slips or how we set up a separate commission.

The bottom line is, we are experiencing what happens in a free, open, democratic society. Sometimes politicians make some stupid decisions, other times they make some excellent decisions. We are going to always have this conflict and this debate. Frankly, I think that is a strength of our democracy. Again, there are extremes, and it is the extremes that get the focus and that get us all fired up.

Coyle: That brings us back to what Senator Metzenbaum started with—does it not, Senator?—that this system by and large works and this is what it is, for better or for worse.

Metzenbaum: The system works pretty well. Is it perfect? No. Do I have a suggestion for a better system? Definitely not. I would say we ought to stick with it. Sometimes the system has worked in such a way that irritated or aggravated me, and probably sometimes I used the system to irritate or aggravate somebody else, probably more often than not. But that is part of the strength of democracy generally.

Coyle: At the end of Stephen Carter's very thoughtful book on Supreme Court confirmations (The Confirmation Mess: Cleaning Up the Federal Appointments Process), he has a list of recommendations, some of which are his and some of which he gleaned from various studies and commissions. Basically, he finds flaws with all of them. He says that if you really want changes, ultimately it is a change in attitude; it is a change in people who are involved in the system. The process is the way it is and it is, as he says, a "messy process."

Concluding remarks

We may not be able to get politics out of federal judicial selection, but we can insist on selecting judges for whom politics won't be the sole or driving force.

By James L. Huffman

The issue of federal judicial selection has been of particular interest on the West Coast because of the circumstances of the Ninth Circuit. The Ninth Circuit covers an enormous area geographically, all the way from Arizona to Alaska and Hawaii. It is a tremendously overburdened court. Each judge sits on, roughly, 450 panels a year, which means that each judge is responsible on average for 150 dispositions. That caseload has tripled since 1988. It is a circuit which is, from the point of view of conservatives, out of balance because it has 20 Democratic appointees and seven Republican appointees.

It is also a circuit, partly because of geography and partly because of the politics within that geography, that is split in a political sense between what one might describe as the Northwest, in which I think Arizona wants to be included, and California. There is, as most of you know, a pending issue relating to the split of that circuit.

JAMES L. HUFFMAN is Dean and Erskine Wood, Sr. Professor at Lewis and Clark Law School.*

Maybe the last and most significant factor is the frequency with which the Ninth Circuit has been reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court. I think it was three years ago that something like 31 of 32 Ninth Circuit decisions were overturned. The record has not changed too much since then. Does ideology play a role in the selection of judges? Well, I think it clearly does.

One has to conclude from today's discussions that politics is important. There is also, I think, agreement from today's discussions that the process has changed, if perhaps not in becoming more political, certainly in the time that it takes for the process to work its way.

A good friend of mine, Diarmuid O'Scannlain, who sits on the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, told me a few weeks ago that his confirmation process in 1988 from appointment to taking the oath of office was about eight weeks. That may have been a little fast for the time, but I do not think that framework is within the conception of modern humans.

Judge Newman suggested this morning that the activism/restraint labels that are often used in these debates are too simplistic. I would certainly agree with that. I think one person's activism is another person's restraint; it just depends on which side of the political fence you are on. Judge Newman also suggested that we might cool the rhetoric. That seems like a good suggestion to me.

About a month ago, Al Hunt had a piece in the Wall Street Journal that was in effect encouraging the Democrats to continue to resist the Bush appointees on the theory that this is a political business. Hunt's argument was that the Democrats should not succumb to some sense that they have to rise above it all, but that politics was what it was all about and they should continue to proceed as they had. I think the first panel today underscores that.

You might say we should rise above politics, but I am not sure that politics is something that you rise above. I think it is a way that we have chosen to accomplish a lot of things in this country. Suggesting that we need to rise above it suggests that there is something wrong with politics; it is simply a way of deciding public matters.

Walter Dellinger suggested that we either approve everyone on the assumption that the president has ultimate and final authority to make these decisions, or that we take into account ideology and politics, but take a vote and be done with it—bring these people up for hearings and consideration. Our history suggests, and I would think most of the commentary today suggests, that is not the way the system works. The United States Senate is a place of mysterious workings to most of us who have not been participants in it, which gives some people more power than others on some issues and not on other issues. I suspect that will always remain the case. I think that the appeal for making sure everyone gets a hearing is a good appeal, it is the right appeal, but I am not sure it is one most likely to be successful.

Steve Burbank suggests in his talk that the president has caused the concern in the current Congress by making it very explicit that he will appoint people to the courts for political reasons. I certainly agree that the president has made that explicit. He is not the first president, I would suggest, to do so, and I think others have certainly in practice at least made it clear that was what they were intending to do.

I would suggest a variation on Professor Burbank's point and ask whether or not it has to do with more than a simple declaration by the president that he intends to make politics relevant, and suggest that it may also have to do with a recognition by the president and others, including those in the Senate, that, to put it in words that Judge Newman used this morning, it does matter who is on these courts. It does matter. They do have significant influence on issues that are important. Let me suggest the reason why I think it does matter, perhaps more today than it did 30 or 50 years ago.

JAY MALLIN

"[Politics] is a way we have chosen to accomplish a lot of things in this country."

Why it matters

When I started teaching constitutional law in 1973 there was much that I thought I could say something concrete about. There were some clear sets of standards that were laid out in most areas of constitutional law. Today, when I teach constitutional law, I find very, very little on which I can say very much concrete. What has happened, I believe, through that nearly 30-year period is that the United States Supreme Court has created a lot of standards that in turn have to be applied by the lower courts that are really and finally, simply, balancing tests.

When we have strict scrutiny, the balance tips one way; when we have a rational basis, it tips the other way. That approach, levels of scrutiny, was pretty much limited to equal protection law in the early seventies, but occasionally you saw it in due process cases. But now it is everywhere along with balancing being everywhere.

Perhaps the most recent case out of the Supreme Court where balancing is clearly the order of the day is the Tahoe Sierra case, which was a taking of property case involving Lake Tahoe and a moratorium on development. The whole prescription in the opinion written by Justice John Paul Stevens, but endorsing largely earlier opinions by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, is that there is just a whole lot of stuff that has to be weighed. If that is what courts are asked to do, then courts are by definition going to be making something like political judgments. What they think about the relative importance of one value versus another value must come into their decisions. It is the only way to make those decisions.

The framers created what was clearly intended to be a political process, because selection is done by the political institutions of our government. It has become even more political because of the general trends in the development of the law, not just in constitutional law, that require judges to make judgments that some might argue might be better made in the legislative and executive branches.

My conclusion, based on what I have heard today and based on my own experience and many years of thinking about the courts, is that it is an inherently political process, as Al Hunt suggested and Walter Dellinger and others have said today. I think it is one that is exacerbated a bit by, or maybe a lot by, the increased reliance on balancing and judicial pragmatism.

As an aside, I might note that if you want to get a feel for what a strong practitioner of judicial pragmatism has in mind, read Judge Richard Posner's account of Bush v. Gore in which he defends the Court's decision not really on the merits of the legal analysis, which you can agree or disagree about, but on the fact that there was a problem to be solved and it was the pragmatic, and, therefore, right thing for the Court to do, to solve it. That is a very particular view of judging, which I do not think everyone would agree with.

So, politics is in it. There is no escaping that. I suppose the question is whether the politics is going to be well done or badly done. I thought I heard today most people saying, "We are not doing it very well now," and there are certainly ways we can improve upon it. But getting politics out, it seems to me, will not happen. I would, therefore, suggest that AJS' recommendation in its statement on ideology (see page 27) is one that really makes sense. You cannot get ideology out, but you can insist on judges for whom it won't be the sole or driving force.

Ethics and Judges' Evolving Roles Off the Bench: Serving on Governmental Commmissions

by Cynthia Gray, Director,
AJS Center for Judicial Ethics

The impetus for judges to become more involved off-the-bench on issues such as domestic violence, juvenile justice, protection of children, substance abuse, victim services, and anti-crime initiatives creates a tension with the ethical rules designed to ensure impartiality on-the-bench. The American Judicature Society has published Ethics and Judges' Evolving Roles Off the Bench: Serving on Governmental Commissions to examine the limits the code of judicial conduct places on a judge's ability to participate in governmental commissions. The essay analyzes dozens of judicial ethics advisory opinions that address the issue, considers the types of commissions for which judicial involvement is proscribed and the types for which it is permitted, and describes the limits of permitted judicial involvement. To offer guidance that judges, courts, and others can use to determine whether and to what extent a judge may become involved with a particular commission, the essay lists factors that make judicial participation more likely to be appropriate and those that make it less likely to be appropriate.

Should we blame Judge Judy?

The messages TV courtrooms send viewers

A recent study suggests that while syndicated television courtrooms do, indeed, teach the public about the justice system, the content of this curriculum leaves much to be desired.

by Kimberlianne Podlas

In the last decade, syndicated television courtrooms have crowded the television "docket." Despite their popularity, however, their impact on the viewing public's perceptions of the justice system and judges is unclear: Do these television representations educate citizens about simple legal rules and encourage jury service, or, in light of their trademark verbally aggressive, sarcastic judges, do they misrepresent the proper role of "judge" and reduce respect for the justice system?

KIMBERLIANNE PODLAS is an assistant professor in the Department of History and Social Sciences at Bryant College.*

To answer this question, a study of 241 individuals reporting for jury duty was conducted. It investigated the correlation between frequent syndi-court viewing and attitudes about the bench. Findings suggest that syndi-court does, indeed, teach the public about the justice system, but that the content of this curriculum leaves much to be desired.

For instance, frequent viewers tend to believe that judges should be active, ask questions during the proceedings, hold opinions regarding the outcome, and make these opinions known. Furthermore, unlike non-viewers, frequent viewers expressed a desire to uncover clues to a judge's opinion and interpreted judicial silence as indicating belief in one of the litigants.

Although the justice system rests on the creation of and adherence to legal rules and principles, its efficacy depends on collective respect generated from public opinion.[1] Positive opinions reinforce the validity of the justice system, its actors and outcomes, while negative ones undermine its credibility. Such opinions are formed in many ways. Sometimes citizens are influenced by personal experiences as litigants or employees of the court system. Other times information is gained through such means as academic coursework. In most instances, however, citizens do not have intimate contacts with the justice system; thus, media portrayals of courts fill the void.[2]

Both legal scholars and behavioral scientists have asserted that televising trials educates the public by providing a frame of reference for what the court system is, its fairness, and who its arbiters of justice are.[3] Similarly, the Supreme Court,[4] the American Bar Association,[5] and New York's chief judge[6] have all presumed an educative effect on behalf of televised law.

Though televised law has traditionally been confined to news coverage of noteworthy trials and obvious dramatizations, the last decade has marked the era of the syndicated courtroom (syndi-court). "Reality" law programs like "Judge Judy" and "The People's Court"[7] now populate the dial. Although individuals within the legal profession may disregard these "syndi-courts" as aberrational or embarrassing, for many citizens they provide the most accessible court information available.

Indeed, syndi-court is accessible to the average person in a way and to a degree that other televised legal proceedings are not. On any weekday anyone with a television can find at least one syndi-court; cable is not a prerequisite. They are also intellectually accessible: The stories are easily digestible, the conflicts clear, and the resolutions swift. And they follow a remarkably similar format: What one sees on Judge Judy is confirmed by what is seen on Judge Mathis, thus creating a unified body of information.

Ratings demonstrate that syndi-courts are actually seen by a significant portion of the public. One year after her 1996 debut, "Judge Judy" boasted the nation's top syndicated ratings,[8] and continues to enjoy significant popularity.[9] As a result, these shows possess a tremendous potential for impacting public opinion about the justice system.

These attributes make syndi-courts strong vehicles for cultivation and social learning. Cultivation theory considers the relationship between watching television and holding particular beliefs about the world.[10] According to this paradigm, watching a great deal of television will be associated with a tendency to hold beliefs consistent with the primary images and values depicted on screen. The closely related concept of social learning theory posits that viewers will look to the symbols and stories on television, and use these as schemata for their own behavior. In other words, media messages will teach and influence by providing explicit, concrete "models" for behavior, attitudes, and feelings.[11]

With regard to syndi-court, what viewers see on syndi-court will teach them how judges act. The intertwining of social learning and cultivation speaks to the effects that the stable, repetitive, and pervasive images and ideologies presented via televised syndi-court have on the non-litigious majority of the viewing public: Televised courtrooms become a primer through which the viewing public will come to know (or believe they know) how the law and judges operate.

One of the most visible symbols of law is the judge. Not only are judges vested with authority to orchestrate legal proceedings, but empirical evidence suggests that a judge can direct a jury to a verdict, even one the jury feels is unjust.[12] The primary focus in syndi-court is also the judge. Most shows are named after the judge, and the judge monopolizes much of the airtime. Even when litigants speak, the camera pans to the judge to capture his or her reaction.

Yet, many viewers do not understand that syndi-court is not a real court and that television brethren are not acting as (or may not even be) real judges. In fact, "the public regularly submits complaints about Judge Judy and other TV judges" to the California Commission on Judicial Performance. Apparently, many viewers do not "understand that Judge Judy and most of her cohorts are not present members of any judiciary."[13] This confusion is not surprising, as the tag-line of many of these

Editorial

Cameras, the courts, and the public

Allowing public access to court proceedings by means of television and the internet promotes public understanding of, and involvement in, the judicial process.

In the January-February 2002 issue of Judicature, Allan Sobel, AJS's executive vice president and director, noted that "recent surveys reveal that the public's understanding of how the courts work is minimal, that citizens feel hostile toward the courts, and that generally the public's impression of our courts is primarily based on popular culture such as TV, movies, and high-profile but atypical cases." Why is this so, and what can be done?

Americans are woefully uneducated regarding their justice system. Little attention is devoted to the subject in primary and secondary schools. The average person generally has had little direct contact with the system. News reports often focus on high-profile cases, or those that involve scandal or salaciousness. The information is filtered to fit the media's needs and deadlines, and is often inaccurate or just plain wrong because reporters are generally no more knowledgeable about the system than is the public. Unfortunately, all too often the public's conceptions regarding the courts and their work are derived from watching the fictionalized courtroom dramas that today proliferate on TV and at the movies. That this is so is demonstrated by Kimberlianne Podlas' article, "Should we blame Judge Judy? The messages TV courtrooms send viewers," in this issue (see page 38). The unhappy result is diminished respect for our courts, our justice system, and the rule of law.

The power and authority of the judiciary depend on public respect and support. Respect and support for the system cannot reasonably be expected absent public understanding of, and involvement in, the process; and understanding of, and involvement in, the process cannot reasonably be expected without access.

The Founders recognized the importance of access to both the perception and the reality of justice. That is why they included in the Sixth Amendment the guarantee of a "public" trial. Times have changed dramatically since ratification of the Sixth Amendment in 1791. In today's world, where television and the internet occupy such central places in people's lives, the most effective means of affording public access to our judicial system is by permitting cameras in our courtrooms.

Critics maintain that, if cameras are allowed in courtrooms, lawyers and other participants will play to the camera; that witnesses will become nervous, affecting their testimony; and that excessive media exposure will prejudice criminal and civil defendants. They point to such notorious trials as that of O. J. Simpson. However, cameras in courtrooms need not lead to such results. Cameras have been a fixture in Florida courtrooms for 20 years. They have been installed in such a way as to make them inconspicuous, and most people are not even aware of their presence. Florida has not experienced any of the problems that concern the critics, notwithstanding its share of high-profile cases. Moreover, the presence of cameras in the Florida Supreme Court allowed the world to view in real time the proceedings in the 2000 election cases. In Florida, the court system has managed to accommodate both the rights of litigants and the rights of the public to see how the process works. And Florida is not alone. Such unobtrusive technology has been successfully used elsewhere, and is possible everywhere.

Our justice system is very good. However, denying access permits ignorance and fosters distrust, and distrust engenders a lack of respect. By making proceedings available for gavel-to-gavel broadcast on television or over the internet, we can educate the public about what actually goes on in court. We can let them see for themselves that, in fact, cases are routinely decided fairly and impartially, in accordance with the rule of law—that decisions are reached based on the facts and the applicable law, without regard to outside influences. We can also help correct misconceptions formed as the result of watching fictionalized courtroom dramas.

Allowing public access to court proceedings by means of television and the internet can also help to improve the justice system. In a democracy, public institutions thrive when exposed to the sunshine. Such exposure assists the system in identifying and improving deficiencies and, thereby, in becoming even better.

AJS has long advocated the need for public understanding of, and involvement in, the judicial process as a means of ensuring respect and support for our judicial system. Access is indispensable to any effort to improve understanding, and increase involvement. In today's technologically driven society, the best way to make the process more accessible is by gavel-to-gavel broadcast of proceedings on television and over the internet.

shows reminds viewers that they are watching "real people," "real judges," and "real cases." Thus, the line between law and pop-culture blurs.

The study

Despite the intuitive logic that television images of law have some educative effect, neither the overall nor educational impact of televised trials (real or syndicated) on the public's perception of the legal system is known. Thus, this study sought to discover whether those who did and did not regularly watch syndi-court held different opinions regarding judges and their expected behavior.

The study also considered whether prior court-related experience stymied any influence of syndi-court. Prior research suggests that people who lack direct experience with the court system are most influenced by television portrayals,[14] and, therefore likely to use them as substitutions. This might apply to syndi-court viewers: Experienced individuals who have seen a real judge in action and been instructed regarding the role of the judge, burdens of proof, and appropriate behavior of trial participants might be less inclined to exhibit the characteristics of the frequent viewers.

One criticism of many jury studies is that their findings lack practical value and cannot be generalized to actual jurors. Consequently, this study surveyed individuals reporting for jury duty, i.e., 241 juror-respondents from courthouses in Manhattan, the District of Columbia, and Hackensack, New Jersey.

While queuing up to enter the courthouse (and, in some instances, during breaks), individuals called for jury duty were approached, identified as being on jury duty, and asked to complete a questionnaire. Questionnaires were immediately retrieved as jurors completed them, and, in exchange for their participation, jurors were given elite pens and candy bars. All jurors approached returned questionnaires. Questionnaires that were substantially incomplete, and those collected from individuals unable to communicate with the researcher in English, were excluded from analysis.

To discern whether viewing was associated with certain factors contemplated by the questionnaire, the 225 respondents ultimately analyzed were divided into two groups: frequent viewers [FV] or non-viewers [NV]. A "frequent viewer" watched syndi-court between two to three times and more than five times per week. Non-viewers did not watch syndi-courts or did so, at most, once per week. Of the 225 juror responses analyzed, 149 (66 percent) were FV and 76 (34 percent) NV.

Findings

The questions highlighted in this article focused on negative characteristics that may be associated with syndi-court judges and their potential ramifications. Among the questions posed were:

- Should a judge have an opinion about the outcome/verdict in the case?
- Should a judge make her/his opinion about a case clear or obvious to the jury?
- Will you look for clues or try to figure out what the judge's opinion about the case is?
- Should a judge frequently ask questions?
- Should a judge be aggressive with the litigants OR express her/his displeasure with their testimony or behavior?

As reported in Table 1, though it appeared that some respondents of both groups envisioned an "active" bench, frequent viewers anticipated this to a much greater degree. Indeed, frequent viewing was associated with beliefs that judges should have an opinion regarding the verdict (FV =75 percent, NV =49 percent) and make it "clear or obvious" (FV =77 percent, NV =32 percent). The import of this intensifies as frequent viewers also stated they would "look for clues" or "try to figure out" the judge's opinion (FV =75 percent, NV =32 percent).

Frequent viewers also treated judicial silence differently. One question asked whether the judge's silence meant that she favored the plaintiff, favored the defendant, had no opinion, or it would depend on the evidence. Whereas few (13 percent) of non-viewers attributed any significance to silence, a majority of frequent viewers (74 percent) concluded (incorrectly so) that it meant that the judge strongly favored either the plaintiff or defendant.

Differences also emerged regarding the expectation of aggressive and investigatory judicial behavior. Eighty-three percent of frequent viewers (NV=38 percent) believed that judges should ask questions during proceedings and 64 percent (NV=26 percent) believed that a judge should "be aggressive with the litigants or express his/her displeasure with their testimony or behavior."

Finally, there was no evidence that prior court service either mediated the effects of frequent viewing or otherwise explained the differential responses of the frequent and non-viewers. Instead, prior court service was not shown to be positively or negatively associated with any of the variables assessed, such as opinions regarding judicial activity or its meaning. Additionally, as shown in Table 2, prior court experience was also not predictive of whether jurors held a negative or positive view of the bench.

Implications

The study suggests that the TV experiences provided by syndi-court are either substituted for accurate, first-hand court experience or integrated with existing knowledge of the court system. Moreover, there is little check on this stream of information as few competing models (such as regular transmission of complete trials) to syndi-court's representation exist. Rather, five days a week, episodes reinforce the model of the syndi-court judge: a not-so-neutral arbiter who is aggressive, inquisitive, and often sar-

Reducing respect for the bench. The American legal system sets a high bar for the behavior of judges. It envisions a bench that is metered and thoughtful and the pinnacle of propriety. Indeed, this philosophy is reflected in The Model Code of Judicial Conduct. Canon 1 of The Code requires judges, at all times, to conform with the highest behavioral standards "so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved." With regard to the appearance of impropriety, it is applied to judges both on and off the bench, in their professional activities as well as their personal lives.

Canon 2 is concerned with the appearance of justice, and recognizes the connection between the public's observation of judges and their perception of the integrity of the judicial system. It requires judges, at all times, to act in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary: "Public confidence in the judiciary is eroded by irresponsible or improper conduct by judges." Canon 3 provides that a judge shall be patient, dignified, and courteous to litigants, and shall perform duties without bias or prejudice.

Yet, the syndi-court bench seems to operate in opposition to these standards. Syndi-court judges are typically sarcastic, accusatory, and opinionated. When the public is fed the judicial model of syndi-court to the exclusion of accurate judicial representations, it is likely to conclude that these traits are common to real judges. Hence, the syndi-court personality may eclipse or infect the true behavior of judges, reducing respect for the bench and the decisions it must enforce. This diminishes the "brand" of judge—what a judge is supposed to be, supposed to represent—and breeds contempt for the judicial system as a whole.[15]

Moreover, that shows feature judges who continue to or have recently sat on the bench furthers this effect. For example, during the first years of his nationally syndicated television show "Judge Joe Brown" continued to sit in Shelby County, Tennessee. Judge Judy and The People's Court Presiding Justice Gerry Sheindlin both left the bench to pursue television opportunities.

Misinterpreting judicial behaviors and temperament. The law assumes that jurors enter the courtroom as blank slates free of bias. Yet people tend to interpret new information in the light of past experience.[16] The lesson of syndi-court is such a past experience that jurors may bring into the courtroom and apply during trial. Indeed, it sends messages about judge behavior that viewers may later use as interpretive guides in jury service.

Although caselaw establishes that a judge should neither be the focal nor vocal center of attention at trial,[17] syndi-court does not endorse this model of judicial restraint. To the contrary, viewers see precisely the opposite, and, therefore, are taught (as demonstrated by the responses of frequent viewers) that judges should, do, and will disclose opinions regarding the case. This may cause them as jurors to unduly focus on the judge and imbue banal action with profound, yet unintended, meaning. When confronted with uncertainty of whether a doubt qualifies as reasonable or whether evidence quantifies as preponderant, jurors may look for other clues, particularly from a legal expert who has also heard the evidence.

Indeed, the U.S. Supreme Court has recognized that the judge possesses a tremendous potential to influence the jury.[18] Where a jury is given clues to a judge's belief regarding the case or the parties, even a suggestion of opinion might be seized upon by the jury, "throw the scales [of justice] out of balance," and influence the eventual outcome.[19] Seeking to limit this effect, the law cautions that the power of the judge must "be exercised sparingly, without partiality, bias, or hostility. . . ."[20]

Courts have reversed criminal convictions where the running commentary of one judge mimicked that of syndi-court[21] or where the judge engaged in prolonged questioning.[22] Such questioning, even without an inappropriate or obviously disparaging tone, suggests to the jury that the court doubts the credibility of that particular witness, and deprives the accused of her constitutional right to a fair trial.

Furthermore, frequent viewers even believe that silence is meaningful, indicating the court's belief in one of the litigants. This is not surprising for, in syndi-court, activity and commentary is the norm. It appears that the only time the judge is silent (and not mugging disdain) is when the testimony or evidence is beyond reproach. Thus, silence is significant, equaling belief in one of the parties. Unfortunately, this inverts and misinterprets the accurate judicial standard of silence and neutrality.

Altering expectations of the legal system. Syndi-court also becomes an Emanuel for the procedure of trials and litigation of disputes. It creates in viewers expectations regarding legal rules and becomes a barometer against which all other judicial action is evaluated. When real courts fail to conform to these television expectations, the public, or at least frequent viewers, may become disillusioned with the justice system or lose respect for it.

For example, in syndi-court, the stories are easily digestible, the conflicts clear, and the resolutions swift. They promise instant legal gratification that real courts cannot. There are never breaks for in limine motions or hearings on admissibility. Thus, "the public is mystified when they see actual court cases taking so long to be decided. [It] wonders why judges and lawyers seem to encumber the process with so many unnecessary technicalities and criticizes them for it."[23] As judges fail to live up to their television personae, disputes drag on for more than 22 minutes, and decisions are not contemporaneous, confidence in the justice system is eroded.[24]

Syndi-court viewers may also reconceive how the law is supposed to function and what it is supposed to do. Syndi-court's themes of humiliation and moral reproach seep in and distort the public's context for personal and social judgments regarding the law. For instance, the president of the California Judges Association stated that sitting judges are reported to the commission or that some litigants are disappointed when they win the case but the judge has not humiliated their opponent.[25]

Syndi-court also idealizes the culmination of disputes. The payment of monetary awards and settling of grievances is quick and efficient. Winners always get their money and never need to embark on the arduous journey of enforcing settlements. Losers always appear, and never need to be brought to court through service of process or suffer default judgments.

Additionally, significant legal nuances are lost, leading to misunderstandings of burdens, presumptions of guilt, and evidentiary issues. The inherent and often contrived "dramatization" of syndi-court contributes to a lay tendency to embrace absolutes and dichotomies—black or white, right or wrong, guilt or innocence—which retards their ability to comprehend subtle analyses. Viewers may conclude that the justice system obfuscates issues, denies justice, and that judges are complicit in this injustice.

A model for litigant behavior. Finally, with repeated viewing, viewers may begin to model their behavior to comport with what they have witnessed on syndi-court. Hence, Judge Judy tutors viewers to present their cases in a real court, be it the trial, mediation, or small claims level. Litigants might, therefore, alter their behavior when appearing in court, attempting to play out what they have repeatedly seen on TV.[26]

Frequent viewers may also be inclined to represent themselves pro se. After all, though they may not be lawyers, they've seen it all on TV. Syndi-court presents average people litigating their own disputes without the aid of a lawyer, almost half of whom win. Thus, viewers may come to believe that either pro se representation is not very difficult or that pro se representation still ensures a 50 percent likelihood of success. It may also cause viewers to believe that judges will assist them, as this is what occurs on television. Indeed, there is evidence suggesting this interaction between frequent viewing of syndi-court and litigant behavior. This, in turn, might contribute to litigiousness, as one impediment to bringing suit is the expense of retaining a lawyer.

Additionally, by bringing a courtroom into the homes of viewers, it might make the real courtroom seem more accessible, and, therefore, litigation a more viable option. Some citizens who have legitimate legal gripes will forgo assertion of their legal rights because they cannot afford an attorney or, where that complaint is appropriate for the no-lawyers-allowed forum of small claims court, or were afraid to represent themselves. Thus, by demonstrating the nature of disputes appropriate for and litigant preparedness of syndi-court, courtroom-shy litigants may increase their comfort level with the small claims court. Though this might produce a benefit of providing access to some who may have otherwise foregone enforcement of their rights, it might produce litigiousness in others. By showcasing all nature of disputes, however menial, as worthy of court action, syndi-court might promote litigiousness in American society.

Proposals

As with other attempts to connect television imagery with viewer behavior, this study cannot identify causation. The results may prove that frequent viewing of syndi-court teaches or cultivates in viewers a particular view of judges, or merely report that people who already hold such views are frequent viewers of such TV fare. Results may also speak to socio-economic status: a particular group of people may seek out these shows or may be the ones who are at home during the day and early evening to watch them.

Nevertheless, causation aside, the study demonstrates that a significant number of jurors walk into the courthouse with syndi-court experience. Indeed, a majority are frequent viewers. Furthermore, these frequent viewers possess a number of beliefs about judges and the justice system that, in many ways, are contrary to reality. And, regardless of how those beliefs were formed, they may improperly impact the delivery of justice and perceptions of the bench. Accordingly, court administrators, advocates, and judges should implement corrective actions to these potential influences. This is particularly warranted, since there is no evidence that prior court experience, such as jury service or being a witness or litigant, immunizes viewers against the effects of syndi-court.

Correcting the misimpressions borne of syndi-court and displacing them with the appropriate manner and etiquette of the courtroom should begin as soon as potential jurors enter the courthouse. Though all vicinages order jury duty differently, all share one thing: at some point, all prospective jurors sit in a room and wait. This is an opportunity to orient prospective jurors to the correct process and gently address the juxtaposition of syndi-court.

One method is a short (5-7 minute) video played on a constant loop in the juror "waiting room." In addition to explaining the basics of jury service, this information should also include reference to syndi-court, explaining that syndi-court's representation of judges is "dramatized" for effect, and that the judges that jurors will encounter in the courtroom will not and should not act like those on TV. It might also include video snippets of real trials with real judges in action—or, rather, inaction—with a voice over noting the differences. Many courthouses already have juror orientation programs in place; adding syndi-court cautions is relatively simple.

Attorneys might address the imagery of syndi-court through either instructive or investigative voir dire much like voir diring prospective jurors on any pertinent issue in the news, bias, or propensity toward police testimony. Counsel might ask the panel neutral questions pertaining to familiarity with, viewing habits of, and preference of judges on syndi-court. She can then shift to a more instructive tone, posing a series of leading questions designed to impart that syndi-court judges are not real, their behavior is uncommon, that judges typically are not to ask questions, that a judge who is quiet is not a judge who agrees, and even that the procedure or burdens (and testimony) will be different.

In conjunction with a voir dire strategy, counsel should request an instruction regarding syndi-court or an enhanced instruction that the jury is not to look to the court for an opinion regarding the outcome of the case. This will be more or less important depending on the personality of the court or whether it has been particularly quiet or talkative in response to certain aspects of the trial.

Regardless of counsel's actions, a court should also take precautions by instructing the jury. For example, when the slate of prospective jurors is first brought into the courtroom, as well as when the preliminary instructions are delivered to the impaneled jury, the court could simply explain to jurors that what they may have seen on syndi-court is incorrect, that judges are not to speak, that the court truly has no opinion, and that jurors are not to assume, look for clues to, or infer the existence of one. It is important to address these perceptions as soon as possible, otherwise a bias borne of syndi-court might take root that will be difficult to later remedy.

A similar instruction should be repeated in the main charge. Although final charges typically instruct that the judge has no opinion, where frequent viewers imbue the inactive behavior of "no opinion" with meaning, such an instruction remains impotent against the syndi-court effect: where juror preconceptions about the law differ from what judges state in their instructions, jurors are more likely to follow the instructions if the judges explicitly address the preconceptions, explaining how the law differs. Consequently, the naked "no bias, no opinion" instruction will likely be an ineffective remedy in contrast to an explicit instruction referring to syndi-court.

The law has long been fictionalized on television, but recently the reality programming of syndi-court has gained significant popularity. For many citizens, syndi-court is their only connection with the justice system. Thus, its representations of judges and law become unopposed reality. Unfortunately, the reality of syndi-court often diverges from the reality of the justice system, and imparts in frequent viewers beliefs about judicial behavior and demeanor that are illegitimate and even damaging to the system. This study demonstrates that a majority of prospective jurors are "frequent viewers," and thus the potential for damage is significant. Consequently, the justice system should implement strategies to disabuse jurors of misperceptions borne of syndi-court.

Judging by heuristic
Cognitive illusions in judicial decision making

By Chris Guthrie, Jeffrey J. Rachlinski, and Andrew J. Wistrich

Many people rely on mental shortcuts, or heuristics, to make complex decisions, but this sometimes leads to inaccurate inferences, or cognitive illusions. A recent study suggests such cognitive illusions influence judicial decision making.

The institutional legitimacy of the judiciary depends on the quality of the judgments that judges make. Even the most talented and dedicated judges surely make occasional mistakes, but the public expects judges to avoid making systematic errors that favor particular parties or writing opinions that embed these mistakes into the substantive law.

JEFFREY J. RACHLINSKI is a professor at Cornell Law School.

ANDREW J. WISTRICH is a United States Magistrate Judge, United States District Court, Central District of California.

Psychological research on human judgment, however, suggests that this expectation might be unrealistic. This research indicates that people rely on mental shortcuts or "heuristics" to make complex decisions.[1] Reliance on heuristics facilitates good judgment most of the time, but in some circumstances causes people to draw systematically inaccurate inferences—in other words, these heuristics can create cognitive illusions of judgment.

Just as certain patterns of visual stimuli can fool people's eyesight, leading them to see images that are not really present, certain fact patterns can fool people's judgment, leading them to believe things that are not really true. The systematic nature of the errors that these illusions produce can be analogized to the sort of errors that an expert marksman makes if his rifle sight is out of alignment: his shots land in a tight cluster, but away from the bullseye.

Decades of research indicate that cognitive illusions affect the way juries decide cases.[2] But are judges any better? On the one hand, judges are intelligent, experienced, well-trained, and highly motivated decision makers, so it seems reasonable to speculate they might be immune to such illusions. On the other hand, research on judgment and choice suggests that cognitive illusions plague many professionals, including doctors, real-estate appraisers, engineers, accountants, options traders, military leaders, psychologists, and even lawyers.[3] Systematic, controlled studies of judicial decision making are rare,[4] and whether judges are susceptible to these cognitive illusions remains an open empirical question.

To begin to answer this question, we conducted an empirical study to determine whether five common cognitive illusions—anchoring, framing, hindsight bias, inverse fallacy, and egocentric bias—would influence the decision making of a sample of 167 federal magistrate judges. We administered a brief questionnaire to these judges during a general educational conference sponsored by the Federal Judicial Center. We found that each of these cognitive illusions influenced their decision-making processes.

Anchoring

When people make estimates (e.g., the fair market value of a house), they commonly rely on the initial value available to them (e.g., the list price). That initial value tends to "anchor" their final estimates. Reliance on an anchor can be reasonable because an anchor might convey relevant information about the actual value. Even anchors that do not provide any useful information, however, can affect people's numeric estimates.

For example, people asked to estimate the average daytime temperature in downtown San Francisco provided higher estimates when first asked to determine whether the correct answer was greater or less than the absurdly high anchor of 558 degrees Fahrenheit.[5] In litigation, anchors such as statutory damage caps and plaintiffs' attorneys' requests for damages have been shown to influence the size of damage awards even when they convey no information about the extent of the plaintiff's injury.[6]

We tested for the effect of anchoring on the judges in our sample by presenting them with the following description of a serious personal injury suit in which only damages were at issue:

> Suppose that you are presiding over a personal injury lawsuit that is in federal court based on diversity jurisdiction. The defendant is a major company in the package delivery business. The plaintiff was badly injured after being struck by one of the defendant's trucks when its brakes failed at a traffic light. Subsequent investigations revealed that the braking system on the truck was faulty, and that the truck had not been properly maintained by the defendant. The plaintiff was hospitalized for several months, and has been in a wheelchair ever since, unable to use his legs. He had been earning a good living as a free-lance electrician and had built up a steady base of loyal customers. The plaintiff has requested damages for lost wages, hospitalization, and pain and suffering, but has not specified an amount. Both parties have waived their rights to a jury trial.

We asked half of the judges "how much would you award the plaintiff in compensatory damages?" We asked the other half of the judges the same question, but only after we first asked them to rule on a motion filed by the defendant to have the case dismissed for ostensibly failing to meet the jurisdictional minimum in a diversity suit ($75,000). We hypothesized that the $75,000 damage threshold mentioned in the motion would serve as an anchor, even though the motion was frivolous.

Table 1: Anchoring effects: mean and quartile results

Condition	Mean	1st Quartile (25th percentile)	2nd Quartile (median)	3d quartile (75th percentile)
No anchor	$1,249, 000	$500,000	$1,000,000	$1,925,000
Anchor	$882,000	$288,000	$882,000	$1,000,000

Consistent with this hypothesis, we found that first ruling on the motion had a dramatic effect on the judges' damage awards, as shown in Table 1.

Those judges who were asked only to determine the damage award provided an average estimate of $1,249,000, while those judges who first ruled on the motion provided an average estimate of only $882,000. Also, three-quarters of the judges who ruled on the anchor provided damage award estimates that were lower than the median award provided in the no anchor condition. Even though the motion was baseless, it forced the judges to consider whether the case was worth more than $75,000. In estimating the amount of damages to be awarded, the judges in the anchoring condition began with $75,000 and adjusted upward, albeit inadequately from there.

These results are difficult to compare with other anchoring studies because we used a low anchor (most other studies use a high one) and we used a pre-trial motion to introduce the anchor (most studies use a damage request by a plaintiff's lawyer). That said, the results of our anchoring problem—providing a low anchor reduced the award by 29 percent—are similar to the results of the one mock-jury study (by Malouff and Schutte) that also involved the use of a low anchor. Although the percentage reduction in mean awards by the non-judges in that study exceeded the one we found in judges (46 percent versus 29 percent), we found a greater mean reduction in absolute dollars (roughly $77,000 versus $368,000).

These results likely overstate the effect of an anchor on a judge deciding a real case. Our materials were necessarily brief relative to an actual case in which a judge would have access to much more information, probably including conflicting numeric estimates. Although the anchoring effect is real, other factors might alter or diminish its impact in an actual case.

Framing

When people make risky or uncertain decisions—such as deciding whether to settle a case or to proceed to trial—they tend to categorize their decision options as potential gains or losses from the status quo.[7] This categorization, or "framing," of decision options influences judgment concerning the wisdom of incurring risk. People tend to prefer certainty when choosing between options that appear to represent gains and to prefer risk when choosing between options that appear to represent losses. For example, most people believe that a certain gain of $100 is preferable to a 50 percent chance of winning $200 but believe that a 50 percent chance of losing $200 is preferable to a certain $100 loss.

Framing can have a profound impact on the assessment of civil lawsuits because litigation produces a natural frame.[8] In most lawsuits, plaintiffs choose either to accept a settlement payment from the defendant or to gamble that further litigation will produce a larger gain. Most defendants, by contrast, choose either to make a certain settlement payment to the plaintiff or to gamble that further litigation will reduce the amount they must pay. Plaintiffs, in other words, often choose between options that appear to represent gains, while defendants often choose between options that appear to represent losses.[9] Consequently, one might expect there to be more pressure on plaintiffs to accept settlement offers than there is on defendants to make settlement offers. Framing effects might lead ostensibly neutral mediators, including judges, to encourage plaintiffs to accept settlement offers that are much lower than the expected value of the lawsuit.

To determine whether judges' settlement recommendations might be influenced by framing, we presented each of the judges with a hypothetical fact pattern to evaluate:

> Imagine that you are presiding over a case in which a plaintiff has sued a defendant for $200,000 in a copyright action. Both the plaintiff and the defendant are mid-sized publishing companies with annual revenues of about $2.5 million per year. They are represented by competent attorneys who have not tried cases before you in the past. You believe that the case is a simple one, but it presents some tough factual questions. There is no dispute as to the amount at stake, only as to whether the defendant's actions infringed on the plaintiff's copyright. You believe that the plaintiff has a 50 percent chance of recovering the full $200,000 and a 50 percent chance of recovering $0. You expect that should the parties fail to settle, each will spend approximately $50,000 at trial in litigation expenses. Assume that there is no chance that the losing party at trial will have to compensate the winner for these expenses.

We then asked the judges to indicate whether they thought the parties should settle the case. Half of the judges reviewed the case from the plaintiff's perspective: "You have learned that the defendant intends to offer to pay the plaintiff $60,000 to settle the case. Do you believe that the plaintiff should be willing to accept $60,000 to settle the case?" The other half reviewed the case from the defendant's perspective: "You have learned that the plaintiff intends to offer to accept $140,000 to settle the case. Do you believe that the defendant should be willing to pay $140,000 to settle the case?"

Judgments that require people to assess the predictability of past outcomes are pervasive in the law.

In both instances, the judges were confronted with proposed settlement offers that exceeded the expected judgment at trial by $10,000. Nevertheless, the plaintiff seemed to be choosing between gains, while the defendant seemed to be choosing between losses. We hypothesized that the judges evaluating this case from the plaintiff's perspective would be more likely to recommend settlement than those judges looking at it from the defendant's perspective.

The results supported this hypothesis. Among the judges evaluating the case from the plaintiff's (gains) perspective, 39.8 percent indicated that they thought the plaintiff should accept the $60,000 settlement offer, but only 25 percent of the judges evaluating the case from the defendant's (losses) perspective indicated that they thought the defendant should pay the $140,000 settlement payment proposed by plaintiff.

Although the frame of the problem influenced the judge's evaluations, it had less effect on the judges than on laypersons. The judges were 15 percentage points more inclined to say that plaintiff rather than defendant should settle, while other studies in which law students and undergraduates evaluated similar materials have found 14 to 51 percentage-point differences between subjects in the two conditions.[10]

Hindsight bias

Hindsight vision is 20/20. People overestimate their own ability to have predicted the past and believe that others should have been able to predict events better than was possible.[11] Psychologists call this tendency "hindsight bias."

Few judgments in ordinary life require people to assess the predictability of past outcomes, but such judgments are pervasive in the law. For example, determining whether a defendant was negligent requires judges and juries to evaluate the reasonableness of precautions that the defendant took against causing an accident even though they know that these precautions failed to prevent injury. Precautions that seem reasonable to people before the fact can seem negligent after the fact.

To test whether judges are susceptible to the hindsight bias, we presented each of the judges who participated in our study with a hypothetical fact pattern based on an actual case:

In 1991, a state prisoner filed a pro se Section 1983 action in Federal District Court against the Director of the Department of Criminal Justice in his state, asserting, among other things, that the prison had provided him with negligent medical treatment in violation of Section 1983. The district court further found that the plaintiff knew his claims were not actionable because he had made similar claims several years earlier in a case that had been dismissed by the court. Thus, the district court sanctioned the plaintiff pursuant to Rule 11, ordering him to obtain the permission of the Chief Judge in the district before filing any more claims. The plaintiff appealed the district court's decision.

Table 2: Hindsight bias: percentage of judges identifying each outcome as the most likely, by condition.

Outcome provided	% Selecting as most likely outcome
	Affirmed	Remanded	Vacated
Affirmed	81.5	7.4	11.1
Remanded	40.4	38.6	21.1
Vacated	27.8	20.4	51.9

Note: Boldface numbers indicate the percentage of judges identifying the given outcome as the most likely.

We randomly assigned the judges to one of three conditions. Judges in each condition were told that the court of appeals had either: affirmed the sanction; remanded the case to the district court for imposition of a less onerous sanction; or vacated the sanction. We then asked all of the judges: "In light of the facts of the case, as described in the passage above, which of the following possible outcomes of the appeal was most likely to have occurred (assume that the three outcomes below are the only possible ones)?" We hypothesized that the judges would be unable to escape the influence of having been given "knowledge" of the outcome when assessing which outcome was most likely to have occurred.

Consistent with this hypothesis, the outcome significantly influenced judges' assessments. As shown in Table 2, judges informed of a particular outcome were much more likely to have identified that outcome as the most likely to have occurred.

Overall, the sum of the percentage of judges in each of the three conditions who selected the outcome that they were provided as the "most likely to have occurred" was 172 percent, whereas it would have been 100 percent if learning the outcome had had no effect on the judges. Thus, the judges exhibited susceptibility to the hindsight bias.

Prior studies have demonstrated that the hindsight bias affects judges' assessments of negligence and recklessness.[12] Our study suggests that judges are also vulnerable to the bias in procedural contexts, such as judgments regarding: whether Rule 11 sanctions should be imposed (a motion or allegation can seem more frivolous after a judicial ruling denying it); and whether counsel provided ineffective assistance (decisions a lawyer makes in the course of representing a client can seem less competent after an undesirable outcome is obtained).

We estimate that 24 percent of the judges in our study made a different choice because of the hindsight bias (172 percent minus 100 percent divided by 3 conditions). This result is comparable to data from mock-jury studies.[13] It is also comparable to the estimate from a statistical review of studies of the hindsight bias, which indicated that the hindsight bias alters the decisions of 27 percent of decision makers.[14]

Inverse fallacy

When making categorical judgments, people tend to discount the importance of background statistics, such as the general prevalence of a particular category.[15] In one demonstration of this phenomenon, medical doctors were asked to estimate the likelihood that a patient who had tested positive for a certain rare disease actually had that disease.[16] The doctors were told that the test was 90 percent reliable and that the prevalence of the disease in patients such as the one in the example was one in one thousand. Although the actual likelihood is quite small, 80 percent of the doctors indicated that it was more likely than not that the patient had the illness. The doctors found the 90 percent reliability statistic compelling, but discounted the importance of the prevalence of the disease.

Psychologists have labeled the specific decision-making problem identified by the aforementioned study as the "inverse fallacy."[17] The inverse fallacy refers to the tendency to treat the probability of a hypothesis given the evidence (for example, the probability that a defendant was negligent given that a plaintiff was injured) as the same as, or close to, the probability of the evidence given the hypothesis (for example, the probability that the plaintiff would be injured if the defendant were negligent).

The inverse fallacy can affect the evaluation of probabilistic evidence in the courts. For example, DNA evidence in a criminal case can provide the probability that a randomly selected DNA sample would match the DNA sample from the crime scene (and it typically states this as a tiny number). Committing the inverse fallacy would mean inferring that the likelihood that the defendant is innocent is equivalent to the likelihood of a random match. This inference, however, would be incorrect, as the probability that the defendant is innocent also depends on the size of the population that the suspect's DNA was drawn from and the reliability of the DNA test.

To test whether judges in our study would commit the inverse fallacy, we gave them a problem based loosely on the classic English case, Byrne v. Boadle (1863):

> The plaintiff was passing by a warehouse owned by the defendant when he was struck by a barrel, resulting in severe injuries. At the time, the barrel was in the final stages of being hoisted from the ground and loaded into the warehouse. The defendant's employees are not sure how the barrel broke loose and fell, but they agree that either the barrel was negligently secured or the rope was faulty. Government safety inspectors conducted an investigation of the warehouse and determined that in this warehouse: (1) when barrels are negligently secured, there is a 90% chance that they will break loose; (2) when barrels are safely secured, they break loose only 1% of the time; (3) workers negligently secure barrels only 1 in 1,000 times.

We then asked the judges to assess "how likely is it that the barrel that hit the plaintiff fell due to the negligence of one of the workers?" We provided the judges with one of four probability ranges to select: 0-25 percent, 26-50 percent, 51-75 percent, or 76-100 percent.

When presented with a problem like this one, most people commit the inverse fallacy and assume the likelihood that the defendant was negligent is 90 percent, or at least quite high. In fact, however, the actual probability that the defendant was negligent is only 8.3 percent. We hypothesized that most of the judges would commit the inverse fallacy and select the "76-100 percent" range.

The judges did relatively well on this inverse fallacy problem: 40.9 percent selected the right answer by choosing 0-25 percent; 8.8 percent indicated 26-50 percent; 10.1 percent indicated 51-75 percent; and 40.3 percent indicated 76-100 percent. Although more than 40 percent of the judges analyzed this problem correctly, a comparable percentage chose the 76-100 percent range, suggesting that many of the judges committed the inverse fallacy.

To some extent, judges in this study might have been responding to the underlying res ipsa loquitur doctrine that governs cases like the one described in our question. Under the facts as we describe them, the plaintiff makes out a clear case for liability under the doctrine. Because the law dictates that the defendant be liable under these circumstances, the judges might have relied on the doctrine in judging probabilities. This possibility, in fact, highlights one of the more serious difficulties that can arise from judicial reliance on faulty judgments, namely, that legal doctrine might be based on a mistaken inference process. The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur instructs judges to take no account of the base-rate of negligence, thereby cementing the inverse fallacy into important legal precedent.[18]

In any event, the judges in our study were more attentive than other experts to base-rate statistics. As noted above, 20 percent of a group of doctors—as compared to 40 percent of the judges in our study—provided a correct (or nearly correct) answer to a question using nearly identical probabilities.

Egocentric biases

People tend to make judgments about themselves and their abilities that are "egocentric" or "self-serving."[19] People routinely estimate, for example, that they are above average on a variety of desirable characteristics, including health, driving, productivity, and the likelihood that their marriage will succeed. Moreover, people overestimate their contribution to joint activities. Following a conversation, for example, both parties will usually estimate that they spoke more than half the time. Similarly, when married couples are asked to estimate the percentage of household tasks they perform, their estimates typically add up to far more than 100 percent.

Egocentric biases are generally psychologically healthy, but they can have an unfortunate influence on the litigation process. Due to egocentric biases, litigants and their lawyers might overestimate their own abilities, the quality of their advocacy, and the relative merits of their cases. These views, in turn, are likely to undermine settlement efforts, as each side remains too optimistic about its chances of winning at trial.

Like litigants and lawyers, judges might also be inclined to interpret information in self-serving or egocentric ways. Egocentric biases might keep judges from maintaining an awareness of their limitations, which could work to the detriment of litigants appearing in their courtrooms. For example, a federal judge can grant an interlocutory appeal only if she is willing to concede that she has issued a ruling on a matter of law "as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion."[20] Thus, a litigant seeking to persuade a judge to grant an interlocutory appeal must convince her that another judge could easily disagree with her ruling. Egocentric biases may facilitate judicial self-confidence and decisiveness, but they also might induce judges to underestimate the likelihood they will make mistakes when adjudicating and settling cases.

To test whether judges are prone to egocentric biases, we asked those participating in our study to respond to a simple question: "United States magistrate judges are rarely overturned on appeal, but it does occur. If we were to rank all of the magistrate judges currently in this room according to the rate at which their de-

AJS
American Judicature Society
Since 1913

From the executive vice president and director

How fortunate we are

by Allan D. Sobel

Each August some AJS Directors end their service on the Executive Committee so that others may take responsibility for guiding this great organization. This annual turnover causes me to think about how fortunate we are to have so many able people in our ranks. Six hard working individuals, who are devoted to the mission of improving the administration of justice, completed their terms on the committee this year: Lorenzo Arredondo, Stephen Burbank, Judith Chirlin, Richard Dysart, Amy Tirre, and Vincent Trosino.

Judge Arredondo has been a Lake County, Indiana, Circuit Court judge since 1981. He is a nationally recognized author and lecturer on justice system issues. Judge Arredondo joined AJS in 1977, and has served as a Director since 1996 and on the Executive Committee since 1998. Among his many accomplishments, Judge Arredondo received the Sherman Minton Judicial Excellence Award in 1995 and the Indiana State Bar Association Opportunities for Minorities Award in 1997. In 1996, 1997, and 1998, he was invited to the White House by President Clinton to attend a briefing on issues of importance to the Hispanic community.

Professor Burbank is the David Berger Professor for the Administration of Justice at the University of Pennsylvania. He is a nationally known expert on federal practice, international litigation, and judicial independence and accountability. Professor Burbank joined AJS in 1988 and has served as a Director since 1993 and on the Executive Committee since 1996. He has served as Acting Dean of the University of Pennsylvania Law School; Law Clerk to the Chief Justice of the United States; and Law Clerk to Justice Robert Braucher, Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.

Judge Chirlin is a Los Angeles County Superior Court judge. She is a former chair of the National Association of Women Judges Committee on Judicial Selection and vice-chair of the California Judicial Council's Advisory Committee on Gender Bias in the Courts. Chirlin has served on a blue-ribbon commission studying California's women's prisons and was a member of the American Bar Association's Standing Committee on Judicial Selection, Tenure, and Compensation. She is a regular faculty member of the CEELI in Prague, Czech Republic. Judge Chirlin has been a member of AJS for more than 25 years. She served as Chair from 1997 to 1999.

An accomplished actor, Richard Dysart is best known for his role as Leland McKenzie in the TV show L.A. Law. He serves on the board of trustees for Galludet University in Washington, D.C., and is a member of the National Support Committee of the Native American Rights Fund. He is a member of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences and the Academy of Television Arts and Sciences. Mr. Dysart joined AJS in 1988 and has been a Director since 1998 and a member of the Executive Committee since 1999.

Amy Tirre joined AJS as a young lawyer member in 1996, when she also joined the AJS Board and Executive Committee. Ms. Tirre is an attorney at the Jones Vargas firm, where she specializes in bankruptcy and creditors' rights. She began her career and was introduced to AJS as a clerk to Justice Miriam Shearing, current AJS chair and Nevada Supreme Court justice.

Vincent Trosino is president, vice chairman of the board, and chief operating officer of State Farm Insurance Companies. Mr. Trosino became a life member of AJS in 1998, at which time he joined the AJS Board and Executive Committee. In 2000, Mr. Trosino was elected chairman of the Board of Trustees of the American Institute for CPCU, the Insurance Institute of America, and the Insurance Institute for Applied Ethics. He also serves on the executive committee of the Brookings Institution.

Clearly, each of these committed members of our Executive Committee came to AJS as qualified, talented, and dedicated professionals. They attended meetings with enthusiasm, patience, and humor, and offered thoughtful ideas and questions to discussions. The organization owes a great deal to these six AJS members, who went beyond dues payments and occasional meeting attendance. They took days off from work or rescheduled vacation to attend Executive Committee meetings, award functions, and AJS programs. They worked with staff to make things happen for AJS and contributed financially every year. They sat in on innumerable conference calls as members of the nominating, editorial, visibility, and membership committees, among others, and, in so many ways, helped push for the continued success of AJS. For their contributions, I thank these six outgoing members of our Executive Committee, and hope that their efforts will serve as inspiration to those who come after them. ⚖ cisions have been overturned during their careers, [what] would your rate be?" We then asked the judges to place themselves into the quartile corresponding to their respective reversal rates: highest (i.e., >75 percent), second-highest (>50 percent), third-highest (>25 percent), or lowest (lowest 25 percent).

The judges exhibited an egocentric bias. Overall, 56.1 percent of the judges reported that their appeal rate placed them in the lowest quartile; 31.6 percent placed themselves in the second-lowest quartile; 7.7 percent in the second-highest quartile, and 4.5 percent in the highest quartile. In other words, nearly 87.7 percent of the judges believed that at least half of their peers had higher reversal rates on appeal. This pattern of results differs significantly from what one would expect if judges were unbiased. Even assuming that the 56.1 percent of the judges in the lowest quartile had never been overturned on appeal (an unlikely possibility, but one that would make their assessments reasonable), the remaining distribution of judges is skewed significantly towards the lower quartiles.

The magnitude of the egocentric bias exhibited by the judges in this study was similar to that reported in other studies of the bias. Judges in our sample were comparable to automobile drivers (87.5 percent claim to be safer than the average driver), slightly more modest than university faculty (94 percent claim to be better teachers than average), and much more modest than couples about to be married (99 percent claim to be less likely than the average couple to get divorced).[21]

Judges are human

Judges, it seems, are human. They appear to fall prey to the same cognitive illusions that psychologists have identified among lay persons and other professionals. Table 3 summarizes our results and compares them to the results of studies on non-judicial decision makers.

Although the judges in our study were less susceptible to framing effects and the inverse fallacy than other decision makers faced with similar situations, they proved to be just as susceptible as other experts and laypersons to the influence of anchoring effects, the hindsight bias, and the egocentric bias.

Overall, our results indicate that, like the rest of us, judges use heuristics that can produce systematic errors in judgment. Even if judges are free from prejudice against either litigant, fully understand the relevant law, know all of the relevant facts, and can put their personal politics aside, they might still make systematically erroneous decisions because of the way they—like all human beings—think.

Unlike the rest of us, however, judges' judgments can compromise the quality of justice that the courts deliver. In the law review article from which this article was abstracted, we have identified several things that judges can do to minimize the effects of cognitive illusions, including considering multiple perspectives and seeking out decision-making methods or standards that are less likely to be influenced by misleading heuristics.[22] A deeper understanding of how people think, including an appreciation of the power of heuristics, is the first step toward crafting sound solutions.

Process in the federal appellate courts

by Stephen L. Wasby

Inside Appellate Courts: The Impact of Court Organization on Judicial Decision Making in the United States Courts of Appeals, by Jonathan Matthew Cohen. University of Michigan Press. 2002. 231 pages. $55.

In this important, well written book, sociologist and lawyer Jonathan Cohen effectively uses an organizational behavior perspective to provide a comprehensive portrayal of the structure and patterns within which the decisions of the United States courts of appeals are made.

Cohen has done for these courts what Heydebrand and Seron did for the U.S. district courts in Rationalizing Justice (1990). He uses the literature to make sense of the functioning of complex institutions. Recognizing that the judiciary is a large-scale, complex organization, Cohen "seeks to fill in the black box of the court's organizational character" (p. 3). He wants to show how organizational characteristics affect judicial processes, particularly as the courts of appeals deal with substantially increased caseload and growing case complexity. His effective use of social science materials makes his discussion of bureaucratization of the courts theoretically informed without theory overwhelming the presentation. The U.S. courts of appeals are discussed as organizations of the multidivisional form; they are decentralized, with highly autonomous units, but lack a central office with power to coordinate.

Although well presented data charts help identify variations across circuits, Cohen's method is qualitative, based on interviews with judges, secretaries, and law clerks in the District of Columbia, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits; extended observation in each court; and participation while clerking for a Ninth Circuit judge. Much attention is directed toward the Ninth Circuit without undercutting the book's more general applicability. Extended interview quotations help tell the story well, although at times one wishes for shorter quotes and more from the author.

Autonomy and interdependence

Cohen's principal theme throughout is the need for balance between the autonomy of individual chambers and the task interdependence of a multi-judge decision-making process. The public may view the judge as a solo character, but limits on judges' autonomy include not only the basic fact that appellate judges make decisions in groups but also that they are part of groups in their own chambers. Autonomy and interdependence are also balanced through the courts' formal features; their structural dimensions, by which Cohen means intra-chambers and inter-chambers interaction; and institutional/cultural dimensions; also playing a part is the interaction of these features. This interaction and these elements provide resiliency and allow adaptation to change. Cohen feels a "conservative evolutionary approach" (p. 219) is best, although he recognizes that adaptation may also allow courts to evade dealing with problems as they continue to function adequately.

The formal features are rules and procedures, the means by which the judges learn them, and what happens when they fail to follow them. The judges learn from the following elements, taken together: vertical and horizontal stare decisis; standards of review of lower court decisions; legal and personal expertise; briefs and oral argument; central staff and (elbow) law clerks; and opinion assignment and publication. As Cohen observes, "because judges learn the law and facts from multiple sources, the limitation or reduction of one . . . can be overcome by the reliance on other sources." (p. 82).

Examining interactions in judges' chambers and among those chambers, Cohen explores the danger, which he thinks overstated, of overdelegation to clerks and other chambers. Inter-chambers relations take place against a background of geographic span and dispersion, particularly in a large circuit like the Ninth; here Cohen focuses on the primarily written nature of communication, to which the clerk network adds in important ways. His intensive discussion of the use of clerk-prepared bench memoranda, including their use as a within-chambers communication device, and the benefits and costs of sharing them among chambers, is a first-rate addition to our knowledge of these courts. As inter-chambers communication is related to consistency of a court's outcomes, one of the book's small weaknesses is the failure to draw on the literature on inconsistency in large courts of appeals, particularly

Arthur Hellman's work. (A declaration: Cohen makes substantial good use of the reviewer's earlier work on communication among courts of appeals judges, thus extending a longitudinal view of changes in how judges deal with each other.)

The court's organizational culture is a set of informal, institutionalized cultural norms. At times these conflict or point in different directions as they operate to reinforce either autonomy or interdependence. Cohen finds that formal rules trump substantive justice; this helps explain why ideology has limited force in these courts, where, in terms of the political scientists' debate, ideology has less effect than "attitudinalists" might expect.

Visiting judges, which courts of appeals use to deal with increasing caseload, cause a problem for a court's organizational culture. Here, however, Cohen loses his deft touch when he fails to distinguish adequately between district judges, who are from within the circuit and thus have applied circuit precedent, and who, in addition to the help they provide with caseload, are brought to sit with the appeals court to socialize them, and out-of-circuit visitors, most often senior judges who may reappear regularly to the extent the receiving court appreciates their work.

Particularly impressive about this book is the author's ability to note criticisms and concerns, such as tub-thumping claims of appellate court crisis, without getting sucked in by them. He properly treats many claims about consequences of "court bureaucratization," such as reliance on staff and clerks and decreased collegiality, as perceived, rather than actual, effects. More generally, he recognizes the need to learn before making prescriptions, something lost on many "reformers," about whose claims he remains agnostic. In his balanced, objective approach, he plays down and decries alarmist views.

Inside Appellate Courts should be read by all with an interest in the U.S. courts of appeals, even if already somewhat familiar with them. Cohen's book makes an important contribution to the growing study of the topic, but one quite different from the growing number of studies based on the sample of published courts of appeals opinions in the important Court of Appeals Database developed by Donald Songer. Someone with a theoretical perspective who was less immersed in data was needed to provide this broad picture, and it would not be too much to say that this is the book to be read before, and in preparation for, studies of appellate judges' voting behavior. I recommend it most highly.

Examining a unique law

by Marc Mauer

Punishment and Democracy: Three Strikes and You're Out in California, by Franklin E. Zimring, Gordon Hawkins, and Sam Kamin. Oxford University Press, 2001. 244 pages. $30.

Imagine that a visiting judge from England or France were sitting in a California courtroom on sentencing day. A defendant just convicted of stealing $153 worth of videotapes is sentenced to 50 years to life in prison. How exactly might the visiting judge try to comprehend such a punishment in a nation that prides itself on its experiment in democracy?

Such a bizarre outcome was an actual result of what is described as the "largest penal experiment in American history" by longtime collaborators Franklin Zimring and Gordon Hawkins, along with Sam Kamin, in their comprehensive assessment of California's "three strikes and you're out" law. Adopted in 1994 in a political climate that could be characterized as frenzied about crime, the law provides a golden opportunity for analysis in the authors' new volume, Punishment and Democracy. The story they tell is comprised of two elements: an analysis of the law's impact and an assessment of its political origins and implications for the development of sentencing policy.

While half the states and the federal government have adopted some type of "three strikes" policy, the California law is unique in several respects. First, in contrast to most of the other state policies, it does not require three violent crimes before imposing a sentence of 25 years to life. The first two "strikes" need to be violent or serious, including residential burglary, but the third strike can be any of 500 felonies, no matter how minor. Additionally, the title of the law is really a misnomer, since its most significant impact is contained within its "two strike" provision, which doubles the applicable sentence for a second felony with a previously qualifying strike. For a variety of reasons, 90 percent of the offenders sentenced under the law have been subject to its second strike penalties.

In contrast to much of the political rhetoric surrounding discussion of the policy, which has assumed a direct correlation between the law's adoption and a resulting drop in crime in the state, the authors break down their analysis into quantifiable questions. Using impact data from a three-city study (Los Angeles, San Francisco, and San Diego), probably their most significant finding is that only 10 percent of persons arrested for a felony even have a first or second strike qualifying offense. Thus, this places a relatively modest upper limit on the amount of crime that might conceivably be affected by the law.

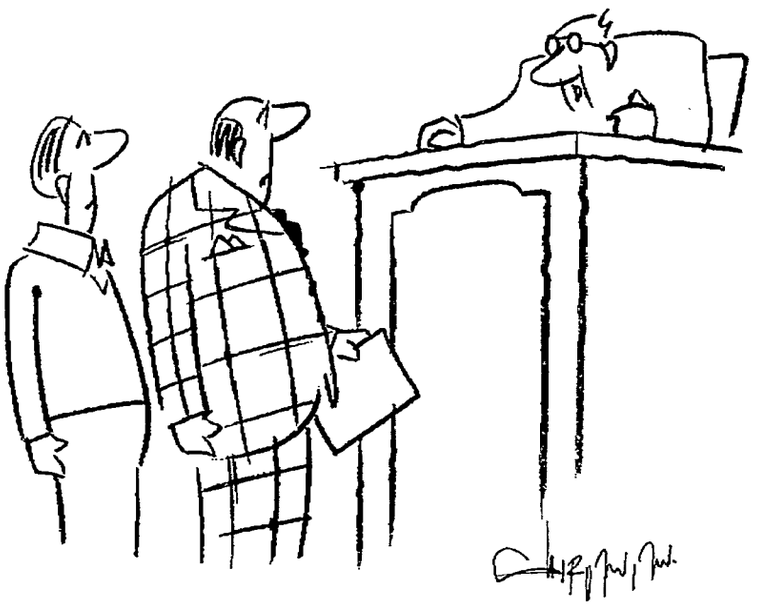
Looking at these data, some skeptics might contend that the law has been successful in deterring those facing second or third-strike penalties, and that this accounts for their low representation among arrestees. But Zimring, Hawkins, and Kamin find that the share of arrests comprised of second- and third-strike eligible arrestees hardly changed following the law's implementation. Thus, as crime declined in California, as it did in the rest of the nation, there was no significant additional deterrent effect observed on the law's target population. This suggests that the various factors that combined to reduce crime nationally—some combination of an improved economy, changes in the drug trade, strategic policing, and increased imprisonment—were most likely responsible for the trends in California as well.

Altered decision making



Of great interest to court practitioners are the findings regarding the ways in which the law has altered decision making and court dynamics. As with any system of mandatory sentencing, discretion has not necessarily been eliminated from the system, but rather transferred from the judge's chambers to the prosecutor's office. Since judges now have relatively little input in a three strikes case, the power of the prosecutor in charging and plea bargaining is magnified. In just the three cities under examination, substantial disparities result in the extent to which eligible cases are charged under the law. In San Francisco, where the incumbent prosecutor is notably unenthusiastic about the law, the proportion of third strike arrests resulting in incarceration actually declined following implementation of the law, due to diversion policies initiated by the prosecutor. In San Diego, by contrast, the average sentence in a third strike case rose to almost eight times that prior to the law's adoption.

Disparities resulting from the use of discretion are inherent in the justice system, of course, and are not entirely objectionable. But the effect of the three strikes law is to magnify the consequences of those decisions to such an extreme as to raise fundamental questions about fairness and justice. For a first offender sentenced to prison for grand theft (and many may not even receive a prison term) the typical sentence is two years, while the same crime treated as a third strike now brings 25 years in prison.

These disparities are further exaggerated due to the law's broad nature. About two-thirds of the second and third strike prosecutions are for non-violent drug and property offenses, hardly the message that was communicated to voters in the 1994 campaign.

The authors also assess the law in terms of broader considerations regarding how criminal justice policy should be developed, presenting the choice essentially as subject to either direct democracy, as evidenced by the three strikes ballot proposal, or one governed by criminal justice professionals. They describe the insulating advantages of independent decision making bodies within the justice system, be they judges, parole officials, or sentencing commissions, and see the adoption of "get tough" policies as in part a result of the "vacuum" of authority created by the absence of such structures in many states.

While their hoped-for reforms would be welcome in many respects,

"Charges against you are dismissed, but your attorney is sentenced to Brooks Brothers for a complete make-over."

REV_00255781

it is questionable whether mere structural changes have been the primary cause, or can be expected to be the solution to, these deep-seated problems. Curiously, the authors make only passing reference to the influence of the Reagan years in enhancing citizen distrust of government. In fact, the seeds of the "get tough" movement can be traced back to the social conflicts of the 1960s and in this respect, punitive attitudes toward criminals have developed in parallel to more restrictive approaches regarding welfare and immigration policy as well. Thus, any efforts to design a more rational sentencing structure (could there be one any less rational than "three strikes?") will have to incorporate not only a consideration of appropriate decision making roles in the justice system, but also an assessment of, or change in, the political climate as well. A tall order, to be sure, but such are the implications of this historic shift.

Zimring, Hawkins, and Kamin have provided a wide-ranging examination of a historic development in the law. In their efforts to be thorough, their discussion of research methodology and rationale is often more detailed than many practitioners will need. But their conclusions about the effectiveness of a law that is unique in "the extremity of its terms and the revolutionary nature of its ambitions" are sobering and need to be considered both by policy makers and the public.

New polls show widespread concern about threats to fair and impartial courts

By Geri Palast

A pair of new opinion polls shows that Americans and their judges are worried about the growing threat to fair and impartial courts—and they want something done. The polls were commissioned by the Justice at Stake Campaign, a new national partnership working to keep politics and special interests out of the courtroom, along with the National Center for State Courts.*

In the past decade, judges and legal observers have expressed concern about the growing pressure on state courts, especially in states where judges are elected. Special interests are investing millions of dollars to elect "their" judges, and the cost of judicial campaigns has been climbing rapidly. Court observers also worry that misleading and partisan attacks on judges' decisions threaten to bring sound-bite politics into the courtrooms. And few Americans vote in judicial elections.

To understand the attitudes of the public better, and gain the insights of judges who see these problems from the front lines, Justice at Stake commissioned a bipartisan team of national pollsters—Greenberg Quinlan Rosner Research and American Viewpoint—to conduct the surveys. About 1,000 voters were surveyed, along with almost 2,500 judges. (Indeed, 61 percent of the judges contacted completed the mail survey—an astounding response rate.)

The results are a wake-up call for anyone concerned about the integrity of America's courts. Voters and judges alike expressed deep concern about what is happening to how judges are selected, and the impact of politics on fair and impartial courts. They're especially worried about the role money and special interests play in judicial campaigns and court rulings, as well as the low levels of public involvement and awareness of judicial elections and the courts. Fearing that the justice system is increasingly divided into two tiers based on money and power, voters and state judges are ready to support reforms that would provide disclosure of special interest activities; increase voter education about judicial candidates and the courts; and improve the tone and conduct of judicial campaigns.

Money and special interests

The role of money and special interest pressure dominates concerns about judicial independence. To begin with, 76 percent of voters, and 26 percent of state judges, believe that campaign contributions made to judges have at least some influence on their decisions. Strong majorities of Democrats and Republicans agree that "individuals or groups who give money to judicial candidates often get favorable treatment."

Judges are keenly aware of the public's cynicism over the role of money in picking impartial judges. "Imagine if major league baseball players could contribute money to help decide which umpire was going to call a particular game," North Carolina Court of Appeals Judge James Wynn likes to say. "If you're up in the stands, and you know the pitcher gave $10,000 to have that particular umpire call his game, how much confidence could you have in the umpire's strike calls?" Likewise, 84 percent of judges express concern about special interest groups buying advertising to influence the outcomes of judicial elections. And 8 in 10 say they are quite concerned about special interests trying to use the courts to shape policy on a range of economic and social issues.

These fears may account for one of the most striking results of the poll: that 62 percent of voters, including nearly 90 percent of African-American voters, agree that "there are two systems of justice in the U.S.—one for the rich and powerful and one for everyone else." More than 80 percent of state judges say that they are concerned about these perceptions of unequal justice.

Ugly campaigns/public apathy

State judges also expressed rising frustration and concern with the changing tenor and direction of judicial elections, as an increasing number of these contests grow "nastier, noisier and costlier," in the words of Georgetown Law Professor Roy Schotland. A majority of state judges (55 percent) say that the tone and conduct of judicial campaigns has gotten worse over the past five years. And 63 percent of judges say they have been publicly criticized by state or national special interest groups, other public officials, or by political parties.

Many judges are unhappy with the pressure they face to raise campaign war chests, especially at the higher level courts. Forty-six percent of state judges report being under pressure to raise money for their campaigns, with almost one-quarter (22 percent) of state supreme court judges saying that they are under a great deal of pressure to raise campaign funds during election years.

An informed public is vital to check the growing influence of money and special interests. Justice at Stake's polling confirmed the public's low participation and lack of information about judicial elections, and sought to help understand these trends.

Lack of information fuels public apathy. Only 13 percent of voters reported having a great deal of information about candidates in judicial elections, and only 22 percent claim to know a great deal about what courts and judges even do in their states. Of course, some voters may not be taking the time to learn about candidates. Others may feel the system of judicial elections leaves them without the information they need to make informed decisions.

Regardless of the cause, the outcome is clear: 90 percent of voters and 87 percent of judges say they are concerned that "because voters have little information about judicial candidates, judges are often selected for reasons other than their qualifications." Without increased efforts to inform the public better about candidates and courts, judicial elections could become even more dominated by special interests.

A call for reform

State judges and the public agree that it's time for change. They broadly support a range of reforms, especially better disclosure requirements, increased public education efforts, and voluntary steps to make judicial elections more civil. Many are ready for comprehensive changes to the system of judicial selection.

Proposals to monitor and disclose the role of money and special interests in judicial campaigns are popular. Ninety-four percent of state judges, and 88 percent of American voters, support a requirement "that all political advertisements in judicial elections clearly state who is paying for the ad." Moreover, nearly 9 in 10 judges and voters believe that "states should require that all judicial candidates disclose the individuals, parties, or organizations who donate money to their campaigns."

Voters and judges also strongly support increased public education efforts. Eighty-six percent of voters and 70 percent of judges support the idea of establishing independent citizen boards "to inform the public about misleading or inaccurate advertising in judicial campaigns." Support tops 90 percent among voters, and 75 percent among judges, for new state efforts to provide voter guides prior to judicial elections.

There is also broad support for voluntary efforts to change the tone and conduct of judicial elections. Ninety-three percent of state judges and 82 percent of voters support a voluntary proposal for judicial candidates "to condemn negative advertising done on their behalf." Ninety-six percent of judges and 88 percent of voters want judicial candidates to "commit to not making misleading or unfair accusations about opponents during elections." And 97 percent of judges believe "judicial candidates should never make promises during elections about how they will rule in cases that may come before them." (Note: Judges were surveyed before the Supreme Court's June decision in Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, which loosens certain restraints on the campaign speech of judicial candidates.)

Americans and state judges at all levels are also open to more comprehensive reforms, including broad support for campaign finance reform proposals for judicial elections. Seventy-eight percent of voters, and 71 percent of state judges, support limiting campaign contributions to judicial candidates. Eighty percent of voters, and 61 percent of judges, support a general proposal to provide public financing of judicial elections. Majorities of Democrats (63 percent) and Republicans (51 percent), and liberals (65 percent) and conservatives (53 percent) strongly favor the general proposal. For voters, spending restrictions in judicial elections is the most popular element of a public financing proposal—67 percent of voters strongly support spending restrictions or limiting spending to amounts provided in public election funds.

Respondents were also asked about judicial selection systems, including merit selection. The basic concept of merit selection and retention is supported by voters and state supreme court justices, but less so by lower level state judges. Seventy percent of voters, and 59 percent of state supreme court justices, support a general merit selection and retention proposal. However, lower level judges are less supportive of merit selection—except in Pennsylvania, which has been considering a proposal to institute merit selection of appellate judges.

State court administrator and chief justice are difficult jobs under the best of circumstances. They require knowledge of courts and human behavior, patience, energy, tolerance of ambiguity, and a willingness to make decisions with less than complete knowledge of the facts, all in a very public setting. Finding common ground on these seven points will not guarantee success. Nothing can do that in this complex an environment. But that common ground will make it much more likely that these two principal actors can function effectively as a team, and that fact alone substantially increases their odds of success.

Report says drug courts effective

A recent statewide study of California's drug courts indicates they are an effective way to improve lives and reduce drug use and criminal offenses. Drug courts were first established in California in 1993 as an alternative to incarceration for drug-abusing offenders. Today, there are 146 drug courts in 50 of the state's 58 counties.

The study found that:

- For participants who successfully completed the drug court program, arrest rates decreased 85 percent during two years after admission, compared to two years prior to entry.
- There was substantial improvement in family functioning for participants who successfully completed the drug court programs; 28 percent retained or regained child custody, 7 percent established visitation with their children, and 8 percent became current in child support payments.
- Ninety-six percent of drug tests were negative for participants during the program and 95 percent of babies born to mothers in the program were born drug free.
- Seventy percent of the participants were employed upon completion of drug court.

The report is available online at: http://www.courtinfo.ca.gov/reference/documents/dc_partnership.pdf.

ADR course online

With the presentation in April of a four-part Web-based course on alternative dispute resolution (ADR), New Mexico became the first state to offer a complete online course for its state judiciary. It was developed by New Mexico's Judicial Education Center. About 20 judges and court personnel involved in ADR programs accessed part or all of the course over the four weeks it was offered.

The course consists of four modules, each including video presentations, links to reference materials and other Web sites, exercises, and discussion groups. The videos include presentations by ADR experts and testimonials by judges who have successfully incorporated ADR in their courts. The first module also offers a demonstration contrasting how three different ADR techniques—mediation, settlement facilitation, and arbitration—are applied to the same hypothetical case.

The modules address four aspects of judicial ADR programs: understanding the various types of ADR; knowing when to apply (and not apply) each technique to various kinds of cases; developing plans for introducing ADR into the courts; and implementing those plans.

New Mexico's Judicial Education Center has been developing Web-based educational programming for several years, but the ADR project is the first full course produced. The JEC website, accessible at http://jec.unm.edu/, already includes text and graphics-based interactive training, the Center's full array of benchbooks, and an interactive trial that challenges the evidentiary procedural skills of the judge.

For further information on the ADR web course, contact Paul Biderman, Director, New Mexico Judicial Education Center, 505-277-8789, biderman@unm.edu.

2002 top 10 court websites

Justice Served (www.justiceserved.com), an alliance of court management and justice experts providing management services, consultation, and training to courts and justice agencies, has announced its top 10 court websites for 2002. The critieria for selection included court functionality—features that make essential information, documents, and/or processes directly available; web functionality—features that make the website accessible and useable; and extras—features that in some way enhance the overall effectiveness of the site. More than 400 sites were examined to determine the winners.

The top 10 are: New York State Unified Court System, http://e.courts.state.ny.us; Court Services, United Kingdom, www.courtservice.gov.uk; Washtenaw County, Michigan, Trial Court, www.co.washtenaw.mi.us/depts/courts/index.htm; Ministry of Law, Singapore, www.minlaw.gov.sg; Delaware, Ohio, Municipal Court, www.municipalcourt.org; Hamilton County, Ohio, Clerk of Courts, www.courtclerk.org; Alaska Court System, www.state.ak.us/courts; Washington State Courts, www.courts.wa.gov; U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York, www.nysb.uscourts.gov; and Federal Court of Australia, www.fedcourt.gov.au.

ASK THE ADR PROFESSIONALS

News You Can Use from the National Arbitration Forum

These responses to current inquiries are prepared by the professional staff of the Forum to assist judges and judicial administrators in taking full advantage of ADR's benefits to the Courts.

Why is it that many businesses and consumers believe that arbitration is a good way to resolve their disputes?

There are a variety of good reasons why businesses and consumers use arbitration:

1) It fosters social justice.
2) It saves everyone time and money.
3) It meets the needs and interests of both businesses and consumers.
4) It is the right thing to do.

How does arbitration foster social justice? Access to civil justice is an essential societal goal. Parties with disputes need access to an affordable system to have their problems resolved. Arbitration is a great way for parties to seek and obtain relief because they can do so quickly, inexpensively and reasonably.

Arbitration allows parties to resolve claims that they cannot afford to litigate. In these cases, parties cannot afford to hire lawyers or do not have access to lawyers, or lawyers decline to litigate cases involving amounts of money significant to consumers, but too small for the lawyers.

Further, arbitration permits parties to easily pursue relief from parties who do business nationally. The arbitration system is a common, nationwide and worldwide system of rules and procedures, and relief can be readily obtained from a defendant wherever the parties reside or do business. Arbitration hearings can be in-person hearings like court trials, or can be a mix of telephone, on-line, or document hearings.

How does arbitration save time and money? Arbitration cases can be quickly administered and scheduled for a final hearing within months of their initiation or longer, if the parties need more time. Arbitration rules of procedure and evidence are flexible and provide parties with due process proceedings. The transaction costs and lost time from work are low in arbitration, and in many consumer/business arbitrations, the business pays the arbitration costs.

How does arbitration meet peoples' needs? People involved in a dispute want a fair resolution of their problem without things becoming worse. A neutral arbitrator who knows the applicable law can take the time at a hearing to allow the parties to tell their stories and decide the case on the merits. Arbitration allows parties, businesses and consumers, to disagree, while not destroying their relationships. A goal of arbitration is for the losing party to say: "I lost and it hurts, but the process was fair and I would do it again."

Why is arbitration the right thing to do? Modern business and consumer transactions require a modern dispute resolution system. Arbitration and mediation provide a prompt, easy to understand, and fair way to resolve all sorts of disputes. And so it is no surprise that businesses, consumers, employees, patients, and other individuals are using these ways to solve conflict. If a dispute cannot be resolved by negotiation or mediation, then arbitration is a simple solution.

Business ethics call for businesses to provide their customers with affordable and accessible ways to complain and resolve disputes, and so fair businesses are using arbitration to meet their ethical obligations. Consumers understand that arbitration is an effective way to get their disputes resolved with businesses. And all agree that arbitration is part of overall customer satisfaction.

Where do the courts fit in? As a practical matter, every arbitrator serves as a "magistrate" to the court. No arbitration award is enforceable, until the court enters an order confirming it.

The Federal Arbitration Act and the arbitration laws of every state empower judges to review arbitration awards when parties seek to enforce or challenge the awards. The United States Supreme Court and many federal and state courts have established standards of fairness for the arbitration process, hearings, and awards. Judges can apply these standards to make sure that due process and legal standards are being met.

Ensuring common ground between state court administrators and chief justices

State court administrators and chief justices must work together closely, and it is important they share, or at least understand and appreciate, the other's values.

By James C. Drennan

The state court administrator (SCA), along with the chief justice, is a critical actor in all state court systems. All courts need an effective presence in the state legislature and all state courts of last resort need administrative support. The increasing pressure for court automation services that are available across the state and across state lines inevitably raises issues that local courts cannot resolve on their own. Unfortunately, state court administrator is not a job conducive to long tenure. Given their necessary role, and an extensive turnover rate, it is important to have a selection process that maximizes the possibility that the court administrator and chief justice will be able to work together effectively.

JAMES C. DRENNAN, a professor of public law and government in the School of Government at the University of North Carolina, is a former state court administrator for North Carolina.*

There is no one process that will work for all states in all situations. The chief justice (or the hiring authority if it is not the chief justice) has to take into account the particular needs and characteristics of the state's situation. But there are areas which, if discussed openly and candidly by the hiring authority and the potential state court administrator, can minimize the likelihood of conflict and the time it takes for each party to understand the other's approach to the job. This article poses seven points for consideration that can serve to make it much more likely that the decision to hire a state court administrator will not lead to any surprises. There are no right answers. They all involve value judgments, but unless the SCA and the chief justice share the same (or at least understand and appreciate the other's) values, their relationship is likely to have serious problems.

• Political pressure. What is the response when a political actor with the power to influence policy that is important to the court wants some action taken that is not consistent with the court system's agenda, but which is within the court's area of authority? The request can come in all kinds of ways—to create judgeships or support positions where they are not needed, to not place a judgeship in a particular place because the wrong person or political party might get the job, to provide special computer support or to expedite the placing of improvements in a place that is not otherwise a priority, to name a few. The list could go on and on, but the issue is always the same. What are the principles that govern dealing with the powerful in the state? What is the price the courts are willing to pay for the principle? As an example, consider the following:

> If the speaker or chair of the appropriations committee requests the SCA to refrain from terminating an employee who violates some rules of the office [or some other similar action], how should the SCA respond? Should he or she do it? Try to reason with the legislator? What if the legislator is not willing to talk about it? What if the legislator threatens retaliation in the legislative process? Similar questions could also be posed about dealings with prominent local court officials.

• Approach to lobbying. What is the role of the SCA's office in lobbying the legislature? Some courts limit their lobbying to budget matters. Others take an active role in advocating for or against specific substantive legislation affecting the courts. Others provide information but generally refrain from taking positions on substantive matters. That is one dimension of the question. The other is one of role definition. On what issues does the SCA do the lobbying and on what issues does the chief justice take an active role?

Some examples:

> A bill is before the legislature to limit punitive damages–the judges are split on the bill but a majority favor the legislation. What position does the court system take? Who speaks for the court?

> A bill is before the legislature to raise court fees to finance a domestic violence computer system. What position does the court system take? Who speaks for the court?

> A bill is before the legislature to require judges to fill out time sheets and make them available to the public on the Internet. What position does the court system take? Who speaks for the court?

> The governor suggests cutting all agencies' budgets, including the courts, by three percent to support an expansion of the state's middle school education initiative. What position does the court system take? Who speaks for the court on that issue?

A merit selection bill is being discussed by the state bar association. The judges affected are split, but a majority supports the bill. What position does the court system take? Who speaks for the court?

Local court officials call key legislators to complain that the court system's budget does not adequately address salaries for support staff. What position does the court system take? Who speaks for the court?

• Personnel decisions. One of the most important things any governmental agency does is to make personnel decisions. That is certainly true for the SCA's office. Every administrator has a philosophy that guides such decisions, although it is often not stated. For the chief justice and state court administrator, it is important to be clear not only about that philosophy, but also about each person's role in the process. It is fairly typical for the SCA to exercise hiring authority in the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC), but since the administrator works for the chief justice (or the supreme court), it is understandable for the chief justice to be interested in the operation of the AOC. How that interest is manifest is important to both. Examples:

The senior deputy administrator position in the AOC becomes open. Should the SCA fill it without consulting the chief justice, after consulting the chief justice about the process, after consulting the chief justice about both the process and the candidates, or by some other process?

What role do each of the parties expect the following to play in making hiring decisions in the AOC?

- Experience in the agency
- Seniority
- Recommendations from influential people
- Involvement in politics, judicial or otherwise
- Political party affiliation
- Whether the person is a "native"
- Diversity issues

An influential political figure is urging the chief justice to ensure the hiring of one of his supporters for a middle level administrative job in the AOC. The person meets the minimum qualifications, but there are other applicants with more experience and some in the agency who appear to be better candidates. What is the position of the court system on how this position should be filled and who communicates that position to the influential political figure?

• Level of communication. It is important for the chief justice and the SCA to communicate about important matters affecting the courts. Each is in many instances a spokesperson for the entire court system and it is not helpful when conflicting messages are communicated. The two should know how often each would like to communicate with the other. Does either expect the communication to be on a regular basis, or as the need arises? What issues are so important that neither should address them publicly without consulting the other? An example:

The mayor of the state's largest city accidentally runs into the chief justice at a political function. The mayor is seeking support from the SCA's office for a local computer system that would affect the courts. How should the chief justice respond? What if the contact is between the mayor and the SCA?

• Delegation and support. The formal relationship between a chief justice and the court administrator is usually pretty clear. The SCA works at the pleasure of the chief justice. Some chief justices are very interested in details of some or all operations. Some are not. Some court administrators feel the need to have a fair amount of autonomy on operational matters. It is important to discuss those feelings to ensure that both parties understand the other. There are usually some matters that a chief justice will want to retain control of, and it is important for a chief justice and SCA to be clear about what they are. For example:

A chief justice runs for election advocating a change in the method of judicial selection, an increase in technology support, and standardization of the method by which court appointed counsel for indigents are paid. Which of those issues would the chief expect the SCA to champion, and which would the chief want to retain control over? Which of those issues would the SCA think are more appropriately left to him or her?

• Attitude about change. Most court systems are involved in change. Typically, given the short tenures of many chief justices and state court administrators, one must be realistic about the changes that can be addressed. But the change process is very difficult and complicated to navigate successfully, particularly for courts in which the implementation of the changes is left to independent, locally accountable court officials. It is important for a chief justice and the SCA to have a common understanding of how far they are willing to go to support changes they believe are essential for the courts. It is also important to have an understanding of the approach that each would take in seeking to bring about a change. An example:

The state's judicial council, the governor, and the legislature want to improve the jury experience for jurors, but local governments and local court officials have primary operational responsibility for the system. What approach to this or other proposed changes would the chief justice expect to take and what approach would he or she expect the SCA to take?

• Handling failure. Court administration is a high risk job, when done right. It requires the balancing of competing interests. It is done in a public setting , in which there are lots of interested parties. There will be mistakes and failures, and some of them will be embarrassing. It is important for both parties to understand how failure will be treated. If it is unduly punished, it will deter risk-taking. If it has no consequences, performance may suffer. Failure provides a powerful learning opportunity, but only if it is not repeated. For example:

The information technology manager pushes for a major investment in a software system for the trial court clerks' offices. After a year and a major investment of funds, it is apparent that the system will not meet the clerks' needs. How do both the chief and the SCA respond?

Selecting federal court of appeals & district court judges

An AJS symposium examining the role and responsibilities of the executive and legislative branches

Selecting federal district and court of appeals judges has become an increasingly contentious process. Both the White House and the Senate have made ideology a major factor in selection and confirmation. Battles over recent nominations, such as that of Judge Charles Pickering, have led to increased hostility and have served to fortify already entrenched positions and to escalate partisan bitterness. The result is unfilled judicial vacancies; in some districts and circuits such vacancies have reached crisis proportions.

On May 17, 2002, the American Judicature Society convened a symposium in Washington, DC to discuss ways to end the impasse and to put ideology in its proper perspective. This issue of Judicature presents an edited version of that symposium.

The program included addresses by federal judge Jon O. Newman ("Federal judicial selection: a judge's view"); political science professor Elliot E. Slotnick ("A historical perspective on federal judicial selection"); law professor Stephen B. Burbank ("Politics, privilege, and power: The Senate's role in the appointment of federal judges"); and concluding remarks by law school dean James Huffman.

In addition, there were two panel discussions. The first, moderated by NPR's Nina Totenberg, examined the role and responsibilities of the executive branch. Participants included former and current White House counsels and Department of Justice officials. The second, moderated by the National Law Journal's Marcia Coyle, looked at the issue from the legislative side. That panel consisted of current and former senators and Judiciary Committee personnel.

Although the symposium resulted in no "solutions," most participants believed the dialogue was productive. Judicature readers are invited to offer their comments, which will be published in a future issue.

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

March 11, 2003

Dear Senator Daschle:

The Senate is debating the nomination of Miguel A. Estrada to be a Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. Miguel Estrada's life is an example of the American Dream. He came to this country from Honduras as a teenager barely speaking English and went on to graduate with honors from Harvard Law School. He has argued 15 cases before the Supreme Court of the United States and served in the United States Department of Justice under Presidents of both political parties. The American Bar Association has given him its highest rating. When appointed, he will be the first Hispanic ever to serve on the D.C. Circuit.

I submitted Mr. Estrada's nomination to the Senate on May 9, 2001. But his nomination has been stalled for partisan reasons for nearly 2 years in which the Senate has not held a vote either to confirm or to reject the nomination.

The Senate has a solemn responsibility to exercise its constitutional advice and consent function and hold up or down votes on judicial nominees within a reasonable time after nomination. Senators who are filibustering a vote on Miguel Estrada are flouting the intention of the United States Constitution and the tradition of the United States Senate. The filibuster is the culmination of an escalating series of back-and-forth tactics that have marred the judicial confirmation process for years, as many judicial nominees have never received up or down Senate votes. And now, a minority of Senators are threatening for the first time to use ideological filibusters as a standard tool to indefinitely block confirmation of well-qualified nominees with strong bipartisan support. This has to end.

The judicial confirmation process is broken, and the consequences for the American people are real. Because of the Senate's failure to hold timely votes, the number of judicial vacancies has been unacceptably high during my Presidency and those of President Bill Clinton and President George H.W. Bush. The Chief Justice has warned that the high number of judicial vacancies, when combined with the ever-increasing caseloads, leads to crowded courts and threatens the administration of justice. When understaffed, the Federal courts cannot act in a timely manner to resolve disputes that affect the lives and liberties of all Americans. The courts cannot decide constitutional cases promptly, which harms people seeking to vindicate and protect their rights, and the courts cannot rule on commercial cases efficiently, which hurts the economy, businesses, and workers. Our system of equal justice under law administered fairly and efficiently is at risk. The American Bar Association in 2002 accurately described the situation as an "emergency."

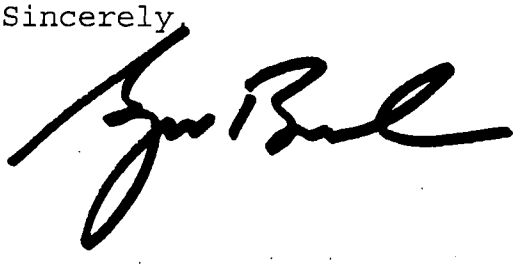
My concern about the state of the judicial confirmation process is not new. In June 2000, I proposed timely votes for all nominees, stating that the confirmation process "does not empower anyone to turn the process into a protracted ordeal of unreasonable delay and unrelenting investigation." In May 2001, when I announced my first judicial nominations, I urged the Senate to rise above the bitterness of the past and again asked that every judicial nominee receive a timely up or down vote. In October 2002, after nearly two additional years in which too many nominees did not receive votes, I proposed a specific, commonsense plan involving all three Branches that, among other steps, would ensure that all judicial nominees receive an up or down Senate vote within 180 days of nomination.

Over the years, many Senators of both political parties have publicly agreed with the principle that every judicial nominee should receive a timely up or down Senate vote. Similarly, the Federal Judiciary, speaking through the Chief Justice in his 2001 Year-End Report, has stated that the Senate should "schedule up or down votes on judicial nominees within a reasonable time after receiving the nomination."



I ask Senators of both parties to come together to end the escalating cycle of blame and bitterness and to restore fairness, predictability, and dignity to the process. I ask that the Senate take action, including adoption of a permanent rule, to ensure timely up or down votes on judicial nominations both now and in the future, no matter who is President or which party controls the Senate. This is the only way to ensure that our Judiciary works and that good people remain willing to be nominated to the Federal bench.

All Senators should have a chance to have their voices heard and their votes counted. All Presidents should have their judicial nominees considered and voted upon in a reasonable time. All nominees should have the certainty of an up or down Senate vote within a reasonable time. All Judges should have the assurance that vacancies on their courts will not persist for years. And all Americans should have the assurance that the Federal courts will remain open and fully staffed to resolve their disputes and protect their rights and liberties.

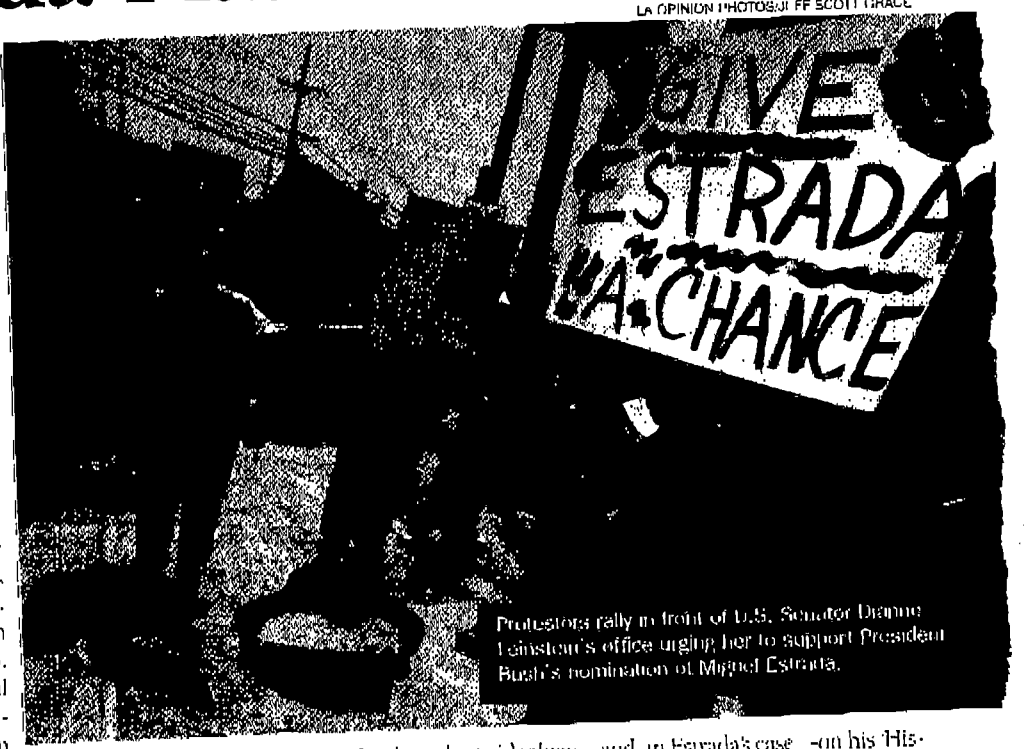
As I stated last October, the current state of affairs in the United States Senate is not merely another round of political wrangling. It is a disturbing failure to meet a responsibility under the Constitution. Our country deserves better, the process can work better, and we can make it better. The Constitution has given us a shared duty, and we must meet that duty together. Thank you for your attention to this important matter.

Sincerely,



The Honorable Thomas A. Daschle
Minority Leader
United States Senate
Washington, D.C. 20510

MY TAKE

The Estrada Fiasco

Protestors rally in front of U.S. Senator Dianne Feinstein's office urging her to support President Bush's nomination of Miguel Estrada.

As of press time, the Senate still had not confirmed President George W. Bush's nomination of Miguel Estrada to the Washington, D.C., District Court—this despite being nominated nearly two years ago with the highest recommendation possible from the American Bar Association and a stellar record of achievement.

A few Latin groups have been fighting doggedly for his approval. –Estrada is a Honduran immigrant and would be the first Hispanic American on the prestigious court, a step-stone to the U.S. Supreme Court– but the Democrats and several other Latin organizations are keen on killing the nomination.

On which grounds is not exactly clear.

To hear representatives of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus and the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund put it, it's because Estrada is not authentically Latin. "Being Hispanic for us means much more than having a surname," explains New Jersey Rep. Bob Menendez, a member of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. "It means having some relationship with the reality of what it is to live in this country as a Hispanic American."

Angelo Falcon, of the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund, agrees. "It's not good enough simply to say that because of someone's genetics or surname that they should be considered Hispanic."

In other words, Falcon and Menendez believe that because Estrada has been nominated by a Republican president and is suspected of having views that are less liberal than their own, his ethnicity is in question.

Using that logic, the members of the League of United Latin American Citizens– the oldest Hispanic civil rights organization in the country –as well as the United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, the Hispanic National Bar Association, the Latino Coalition and the Hispanic Business Roundtable, all of which support Estrada's nomination, aren't truly Hispanic, either.

Naturally, Estrada's supporters see it differently. LULAC calls Estrada "truly one of the rising stars in the Hispanic community and a role model for our youth." Indeed, Estrada, who arrived in the United States at age 17, is the embodiment of what immigrants aspire for their children, having struggled to succeed in a new country, learn a new language, adopt to a different culture and study day and night to achieve his American Dream.

The objections have little to do with Estrada's abilities or qualifications. "Mr Estrada told [the Congressional Hispanic Caucus] that him being Hispanic he sees having absolutely nothing to do with his experience or his role as a federal court judge. That's what he said to us," Menendez says.

He finds that position deeply disturbing, but Hispanic Americans should see Menendez's comment as deeply unsettling.

Does he really believe that Hispanic judges are incapable– indeed shouldn't—make fair, unbiased decisions based solely on the merits of each case and on what the law dictates? Isn't that precisely what judges are supposed to do?

Naturally, this is all about ideology. Some believe, with no evidence whatsoever, that Estrada is stridently conservative and imagine him handing down ideologically driven decisions from the High Court. Marisa Demeo of MALDEF frets that if Estrada is confirmed, "the American Dreams of the majority of Hispanics living in this country will come to an end through his future legal decisions."

Unfortunately, Estrada's Latin opponents don't stop there, though. Falcon, of the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund, belittles Estrada's success, calling it a "Latino Horatio Alger story that's been concocted."

That's a big, red warning flag: If you're Latin, be on alert, agree with Hispanic activists or be prepared to be flogged and have your heritage questioned before the nation.

To hear Falcon and some of the other opponents, judges should decide cases not on the facts and the law but on the basis of their ideology –and, in Estrada's case –on his 'Hispanicity.' Yet such a standard would mean the death of the rule of law.

Indeed, to judge Miguel Estrada by any yardstick other than his professional excellence and his personal integrity truly would be a step backward for all Americans—especially Hispanic Americans.

Let's review the facts: Since graduating from Harvard Law School with honors, Estrada has served as Assistant Solicitor General in the Clinton and Bush administrations, been a federal prosecutor in New York, served as a law clerk to Supreme Court Justice Kennedy, and done pro bono work such as defending a death row inmate before the U.S. Supreme Court.

He has built a reputation as one of the best appellate lawyers in the nation, having argued 15 cases before the Supreme Court—a figure that few lawyers can match, and a particularly impressive feat for someone who immigrated to this country with little English-speaking skills.

Estrada's record is anything but ideological—it's neither right wing nor left-wing. It is, quite simply, outstanding. The man deserves the chance to take his seat as the first Hispanic judge on the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals.

And Hispanic Americans should remember those who have stood in his way.

LEAHY, PATRICK on BLUE SLIPS

Now, any Senator can vote against any judicial nominee. They have that right. But I urge them to stand up on the floor of the Senate, where the public knows who they are and where they are, and either vote for or against people. It is not only disingenuous, but I think it is detrimental to our system of justice, and it is a true distortion of what we pledge to do in upholding the Constitution when some block judges by anonymous holds. And then we find that the reason for doing that is in connection with a fundraising and lobbying campaign in which letters were sent out by some group saying, in effect, that if you send this money, we will block judges and we will arrange for you to meet privately with leading elected officials.

That is wrong. That is wrong, Mr. President. It is unprecedented in the 23 years that I have been in the Senate. Nothing like this has ever been allowed by any of the leaders of the Senatenot by Senator Mansfield, not by Senator Byrd, not by Senator Baker, not by Senator Dole, and not by Senator Mitchell. It should not be allowed now. It is wrong, and it undermines the very credibility of the U.S. Senate, and it demeans the U.S. Senate; but, even more importantly, it is destructive of the independence of the judiciary.

LEAHY, PATRICK on BLUE SLIPS

Every Senator is free to vote for or against a nominee. What I have not appreciated is the mysterious hold over nominations for months at a time. Now that the sources of the hold have come forward, the Senate should proceed to debate and vote.

Those pressing this effort complain about what they see as the failure of the U.S. Senate to block the appointment of judges to the Federal bench. The American people, litigants, prosecutors, and judges have just the opposite complaintthat the perpetuation of judicial vacancies is affecting the administration of justice and rendering our laws empty promises.

In fact, how disturbing, how petty, and how shameful: Trying to disqualify an outstanding Hispanic woman judge by an anonymous hold.

I have far more respect for Senators who, for whatever reason, wish to vote against her. Stand up; vote against her. But to have an anonymous hold--an anonymous hold--in the U.S. Senate with 100 Members representing 260 million Americans, which should be the conscience of the Nation, should not be lurking in our cloakrooms anonymously trying to hold up a nominee. If we want to vote against somebody, vote against them. I respect that. State your reasons. I respect that. But don't hold up a qualified judicial nominee.

I was asked last week by Neil Lewis of the New York Times about this circumstance. He correctly reported my response in a front page story this last Saturday. I am offended by this anonymous effort to oppose her prompt confirmation by stealth tactics. Here is a highly qualified Hispanic woman judge who should have been confirmed to help end the crisis in the Second Circuit more than three months ago.

Acting to fill judicial vacancies is a constitutional duty that the Senate--and all of its member--are obligated to fulfill. In its unprecedented slowdown in the handling of nominees in the 104th and 105th Congresses, the Senate is shirking its duty. The Senate majority's choices as they stall Hispanic, women and minority nominees is wrong and should end.
If Senators are opposed to any judge, bring them up and vote against them. But don't do an anonymous hold, which diminishes the credibility and respect of the whole U.S. Senate.
I have had judicial nominations by both Democrat and Republican Presidents that I intended to oppose. But I fought like mad to make sure they at least got a chance to be on the floor for a vote.
I have stated over and over again on this floor that I would refuse to put an anonymous hold on any judge; that I would object and fight against any filibuster on a judge, whether it is somebody I opposed or supported; that I felt the Senate should do its duty.
If we don't like somebody the President nominates, vote him or her down. But don't hold them in this anonymous unconscionable limbo, because in doing that, the minority of Senators really shame all Senators.

144 Cong. Rec. S 6521, 6/18/98, When There Were 72 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on BLUE SLIPS

I do not deny to any Senator his or her prerogatives as a member of the Senate. I have great respect for this institutions and its traditions. Still, I must say that this use of anonymous holds for extended periods that doom a nomination from ever being considered by the United States Senate is wrong and unfair.
It is against this backdrop that we are asking the Senate to be fair to these judicial nominees and all nominees. I do not want to see votes delayed on any nominee. For the last few years the Senate has allowed one or two or three secret holds to stop judicial nominations from even getting a vote. That is wrong.
Congressional Record – Senate, September 21, 1999

PATRICK LEAHY
Last month a column in The Wall Street Journal discussed this secret basis for the Republican hold against this fine judge. The Journal revealed that this delay was intended to ensure that Sonia Sotomayor was not nominated to the Supreme Court. That was confirmed by a report in The New York Times on June 13.
How disturbing and how shameful. I am offended by this anonymous effort to oppose her prompt confirmation by stealth tactics. Here is a highly-qualified Hispanic woman judge who should have been confirmed to help end the crisis in the Second Circuit more than four months ago.

LEAHY, PATRICK on BLUE SLIPS

This debate is about fairness and the issue that remains is the issue of fairness. For too long, nominees--judicial nominees such as Judge Paez, Ms. Berzon and Justice Ronnie White of Missouri, and executive branch nominees like Bill Lann Lee, have been opposed in anonymity, through secret holds and delaying tactics--not by straight up-or-down votes where Senators can vote for them or vote against them.
I do not deny each Senator his or her prerogative as a Member of this Senate. After 25 years here, I think I have demonstrated--and I certainly know in my heart--I have great respect for this institution and for its traditions, for all the men and women with whom I have served, the hundreds of men and women with whom I have served over the years in both parties. But this use of secret holds for extended periods to doom a nomination from ever being considered by the Senate is wrong, unfair, and beneath us.
The report of Citizens for Independent Courts recommends the Senate should eliminate the practice of allowing individual Members to place holds on a nominee. We ought to consider that.

And yet when this person who is so offensive that we can't bring them to a vote, when after a year or two or three of waiting, they come out for a vote, they get 90 votes or 95 votes out of the 100-member Senate. But I would hope that in the cases of these long-pending nominations, those who have opposed them will show them the courtesy of using this time to discuss with us any concerns they may have and to explain the basis for their anonymous holds and the Senate's refusals to act.

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

Now, I keep bringing this issue up at the Judiciary Committee meeting, and I am told there are no objections to her, but somehow she is never brought forward to be voted on. I keep saying, if Senators want to vote against her, stand up, have the guts to stand up in the bright sunshine and say how they would vote on her, but nobody does, nobody does.

143 Cong. Rec. S 5084, 5/23/97, When There Were 99 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

Now, I say this, Mr. President, make the same argument now as when we have had a Republican President and a Democratically controlled Senate. If there is one area where partisan politics should not be allowed, it is in the area of the Federal judiciary.
A President should be given a great deal of latitude on who he nominates to the Federal court. If we disagree with a nomination, then we can vote against it. But, frankly, Mr. President, not only does it damage the integrity and the independence of the Federal judiciary by just holding judicial nominations hostage where nobody ever even votes on them, but I think it damages the integrity of the U.S. Senate.
If President Clinton sends a nominee to the Senate that any SenatorDemocrat or Republicandoesn't like, vote against him or her. That is your right as a U.S. Senator. But don't say, well, they look like pretty good people, but we can't even allow a vote on their nomination.
And don't say, if you are, for example, in Texas, that it is terrible that drug and illegal immigrant cases are not being heard, what is the court doing? People in Texas should say, what is the U.S. Senate doing? Why aren't they acting? If you are a civil litigant in the sixth circuit or ninth circuit, or a number of others that have emergency vacancies, and you have one of your rights to be protected, what do you do? You say, why aren't those judges hearing these cases? No. Say, why isn't the U.S. Senate confirming people.

While the Republican candidate for President made a fine statement in which he called for votes on judicial nominations within 60 days, he has not prevailed upon the Senate Republican majority to treat nominees fairly now. Instead of 60 days, we see Judge Helene White's nomination to the Sixth Circuit pending more than 1400 days; Elena Kagan, U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, pending 500 days; Judge James Wynn, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, pending more than 440 days; Kathleen McCree Lewis, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, pending more than 400 days; Enrique Moreno, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, pending more than 400 days; Bonnie Campbell, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, pending more than 240 days; Roger Gregory, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, pending more than 115 days; Lynette Norton, U.S. District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania, pending more than 1300 days; Judge Legrome Davis, U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, pending more than 800 days; Patricia Coan, U.S. District Court for the District of Colorado, pending more than 500 days; Dolly Gee, U.S. District Court for the Central District of California, pending more than 500 days; Rhonda Fields, U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, pending more than 350 days; Linda Riegle, U.S. District Court for the District of Nevada, pending more than 180 days; Ricardo Morado, U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Texas, pending more than 165 days. LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

Now, any Senator can vote against any judicial nominee. They have that right. But I urge them to stand up on the floor of the Senate, where the public knows who they are and where they are, and either vote for or against people. It is not only disingenuous, but I think it is detrimental to our system of justice, and it is a true distortion of what we pledge to do in upholding the Constitution when some block judges by anonymous holds. And then we find that the reason for doing that is in connection with a fundraising and lobbying campaign in which letters were sent out by some group saying, in effect, that if you send this money, we will block judges and we will arrange for you to meet privately with leading elected officials.

That is wrong. That is wrong, Mr. President. It is unprecedented in the 23 years that I have been in the Senate. Nothing like this has ever been allowed by any of the leaders of the Senatenot by Senator Mansfield, not by Senator Byrd, not by Senator Baker, not by Senator Dole, and not by Senator Mitchell. It should not be allowed now. It is wrong, and it undermines the very credibility of the U.S. Senate, and it demeans the U.S. Senate; but, even more importantly, it is destructive of the independence of the judiciary.

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

This politicization, Mr. President, has been extended to include the practice of denying nominees an up or down vote on the Senate floor, or even in the Judiciary Committee. If the majority of the Senate opposes a judicial nominee enough to derail a nomination by an up or down vote, then at least the process has been served. Instead, however, the President's nominees are not even receiving that courtesy from this Senate: Some of the individuals whose nominations are pending before the Judiciary Committee or the full Senate have not been allowed a vote on the floor, much less in committee, for close to 2 years. It is especially troubling that of the 14 nominees who have been held up the longest by the Republican majority in the Senate, 12 are women or minorities.

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

In fact, how disturbing, how petty, and how shameful: Trying to disqualify an outstanding Hispanic woman judge by an anonymous hold.

I have far more respect for Senators who, for whatever reason, wish to vote against her. Stand up; vote against her. But to have an anonymous hold--an anonymous hold--in the U.S. Senate with 100 Members representing 260 million Americans, which should be the conscience of the Nation, should not be lurking in our cloakrooms anonymously trying to hold up a nominee. If we want to vote against somebody, vote against them. I respect that. State your reasons. I respect that. But don't hold up a qualified judicial nominee.

I was asked last week by Neil Lewis of the New York Times about this circumstance. He correctly reported my response in a front page story this last Saturday. I am offended by this anonymous effort to oppose her prompt confirmation by stealth tactics. Here is a highly qualified Hispanic woman judge who should have been confirmed to help end the crisis in the Second Circuit more than three months ago.

Acting to fill judicial vacancies is a constitutional duty that the Senate--and all of its member--are obligated to fulfill. In its unprecedented slowdown in the handling of nominees in the 104th and 105th Congresses, the Senate is shirking its duty. The Senate majority's choices as they stall Hispanic, women and minority nominees is wrong and should end.

If Senators are opposed to any judge, bring them up and vote against them. But don't do an anonymous hold, which diminishes the credibility and respect of the whole U.S. Senate.

I have had judicial nominations by both Democrat and Republican Presidents that I intended to oppose. But I fought like mad to make sure they at least got a chance to be on the floor for a vote.

I have stated over and over again on this floor that I would refuse to put an anonymous hold on any judge; that I would object and fight against any filibuster on a judge, whether it is somebody I opposed or supported; that I felt the Senate should do its duty.

If we don't like somebody the President nominates, vote him or her down. But don't hold them in this anonymous unconscionable limbo, because in doing that, the minority of Senators really shame all Senators.

That is good advice. That is what this Senate should do, take up these nominations and vote them up or vote them down. I believe that if the Senate were given an opportunity to have a fair vote on the merits of the nomination of Judge Richard Paez or Timothy Dyk or any of the 21 judicial nominations pending on the Senate Executive Calendar, they would be confirmed. Perhaps that is why we are not being allowed to vote.

The Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court has called the number of judicial vacancies "the most immediate problem we face in the federal judiciary." I have urged those who have been stalling the consideration of the President's judicial nominations to reconsider and work to fulfil our constitutional responsibility. Those who delay or prevent the filling of these vacancies must understand that they are harming the administration of justice. Courts cannot try cases, incarcerate the guilty or resolve civil disputes without judges.

I know that some are still playing a political game of payback for the defeat of the nomination of Judge Bork to the Supreme Court and other Republican judicial nomination over the last decade. I remind the Senate that the Senate voted on the Bork nomination and voted on the nomination of Clarence Thomas and did so in each case in less than 15 weeks. To delay judicial nominations for months and years and to deny them a vote is wrong.

I want to share with you a few of the cases that cry out for a Senate vote: Having been voted out of Committee twice, he has now been forced to wait for more than two years for Senate action. This distinguished African-American at least deserves the respect of this

Senate, and he should be allowed a vote, up or down. Senators can stand up and say they will vote for or against him, but let this man have his vote. Twenty-seven months after being nominated, the nomination remains pending before the Senate. I would certainly like to see Justice White be accorded an up or down vote.

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

Today we are not asking for any Senator's vote for any nomination. Instead, I am asking the Senate recognize that its responsibility is to vote on all the judicial nominations on the calendar. We can vote for them or against them, we can vote them up or vote them down, but after 44 months or 27 months or 20 months, after completing every step in what is a long, tortuous confirmation process, the nominations of Judge Richard Paez, Justice Ronnie White and Marsha Berzon are as entitled to a Senate vote as the nomination of Ted Stewart.

In my statement last week I detailed the path that each of these nominees has traveled to the Senate. All are now available for a vote on confirmation by the Senate. All should be accorded an up or down vote.

I hope we will have a chance to vote on them, not just in committee where I have voted for each one of them, but on the floor of the Senate. That is what the Constitution speaks of in our advise and consent capacity. That is what these good and decent people have a right to expect. That is what our oath of office should compel Members to do--to vote for or against. I do not question the judgment or conscience of any man or woman in this Senate if they vote differently than I do, but vote.

I am not asking anybody how they should or should not vote but allow nominees to have a vote. All the people being nominated are extremely highly qualified lawyers and judges. They have to put their lives on hold and the lives of their family on hold while they wait. They are neither fish nor fowl as a nominee. In private practice, all your partners come in and throw a big party and say it is wonderful, we are so proud of you, could you move out of the corner office because we want to take it now. And you cannot do anything while you wait and wait and wait.

Vote them up, vote them down.

145 Cong. Rec. S 11096, 9/21/99, When There Were 68 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

They have been forced to run some kind of strange in-the-dark gauntlet of Senate confirmations. Those strong enough to work through that secret gauntlet and get reported to the floor are then being dealt the final death blow through a refusal of the Republican leadership to call them up for a vote. They should be called up for a fair vote. They may be defeated--the Republicans are in the majority; there are 55 Republican Senators; they could vote them down. But let them have a fair vote, up or down. Let all Senators have to stand up and vote aye or nay, and be responsible to their constituency to explain why they voted that way. Unfortunately, nominations are being killed through neglect and silence, not defeated by a majority vote.

So I ask, again, for the Senate to fulfill its responsibility to vote on all the judicial nominations on the calendar; vote for them or vote against them. We can vote them up or we can vote them down, but after 44 months or 27 months or 20 months, let us vote.
He has been considered promptly and will be brought up for an up or down vote. There are some on this side of the aisle who oppose him and will vote against him. But every single Democrat, whether they are going to vote against him or for him, should allow him to be voted on and they will. That nomination has been pending 2 months.
I said last week I do not begrudge Ted Stewart a Senate vote. I do not. He is entitled to a vote. He went through the confirmation process. The Senate Judiciary Committee voted him out. It was not a unanimous vote, but he was voted out of the committee, and he is entitled to a vote. If Senators do not want to vote for him, vote against him. If Senators want to vote for him, vote for him. I intend to vote for him. I intend to give the benefit of the doubt both to the President and to the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee who recommended him.
Who is it who is afraid to vote on these nominations? Who is it who is hiding their opposition and obstructing these nominees? Can it be they are such a minority, they know that if it comes to a fair vote, these good men and women will be confirmed?
So rather than to allow a fair vote, they will keep it from coming to a vote. I would bet you that the same people who are holding these nominations back from a vote will go home on the Fourth of July and other holidays and give great speeches about the democracy of this country and how important democracy is and why we have to allow people to vote and express the will of the people--except in the Senate and, apparently, except if you are a minority or a woman.
I have been on the floor of this Senate when we have had Republican Presidents with Republican nominations, saying that they deserve to be brought forward for a vote one way or the other, including a couple instances of nominees I intended to vote against. I still said they deserved a vote. And they got their vote.
What we are currently experiencing is unconscionable and unprecedented, these kinds of delays. I think we hurt the Senate when we do this. We will have Republican Presidents; we will have Democratic Presidents. We will have Republican-controlled Senates; and we will have Democratic-controlled Senates. I have served here twice with the Democrats in control; twice with the Republicans in control. The precedents we establish are important if we are to go into the next century as the kind of body the Senate should be.
Do not let us end this century and this millennium leaving, as guidance for the next century and the next millennium and the next Senate, partisanship that tears at the very fabric, not only of the Senate but of the independence of the Federal judiciary itself. So many judges, judges who are considered conservative, judges who are considered liberal, judges who have had a Republican background or a Democratic background, judges who have been appointed by Republican Presidents, judges who have been appointed by Democratic Presidents, have been united in saying: Stop this. Do not go on with this. Because you are tearing at the very core of our independent judiciary, the most independent judiciary on Earth, a judiciary whose very independence allows us to maintain a balanced country, a country that is the most powerful on Earth, but a country that is also the most free and the most respected democracy. And a main factor guaranteeing that freedom and that democracy is our independent judiciary.

I could not agree more with Chief Justice Rehnquist. We should follow his advice. Let the Republican leadership schedule up-or-down votes on the nominations of Judge Paez and Marsha Berzon so that the Senate can finally act on them. Let us be fair to all. Nominees deserve to be treated with dignity and dispatch, not delayed for 2 and 3 years. We are talking about people going to the Federal judiciary, a third independent branch of Government. They are entitled to dignity and respect. They are not entitled automatically for us to vote aye, but they are entitled to a vote, aye or nay.
They deserve at least that. No nominee gets an automatic "aye" vote, but every nominee ought to be heard and at least voted on one way or the other.

The Founding Fathers certainly intended that the Senate advise as to judicial nominations, i.e., consider, debate and vote up or down. The soon-to-be presidential nominee of the Republican Party has said--and I agree with him--that this is wrong, the Senate ought to vote these people up or down in 60 days. Of course, we could do that. There is a concern that has been expressed--and rightly so--that so many nominees are held without any vote. Nobody votes against them, but nobody gets an opportunity to vote for them; they just sit there. And even though the criticism stings, the fact is that, on average, women and minorities take longer to go through this Senate than white males do. Some women, some minorities have gone through very quickly, but most have taken longer. Some of these people got held up for 2 or 3 or 4 years. When they finally got a vote, they passed overwhelmingly. But for 2 or 3 or 4 years they were humiliated, caused to dangle, have their law practices fall apart, have people question what was going on. Why? Because one or two Senators thought they should be held up. Well, let those one or two Senators vote against them. We are paid to vote yes or no, not maybe. I do not know whether it is because they are women, because they are Hispanic, because they are too liberal, or too conservative, too active, not active enough, that people don't want them to be confirmed. Let them vote against them.

I mention this because Governor Bush and I, while we disagree on some issues, have one very significant issue on which we agree. He gave a speech awhile back and criticized what has happened in the Senate where confirmations are held up not because somebody votes down a nominee but because they cannot ever get a vote. Governor Bush said: You have the nominee. Hold the hearing. Then, within 60 days, vote them up or vote them down. Don't leave them in limbo.

Frankly, that is what we are paid to do in this body. We are paid to vote either yes or no--not vote maybe. When we hold a nominee up by not allowing them a vote and not taking any action one way or the other, we are not only voting "maybe" but we are doing a terrible disservice to the man or woman to whom we do this. They have to put their life on hold. They do not know what is going to happen: Are they going to be confirmed, or not? It is not like when any one of us runs for election; we know that on a certain day the election occurs. We either win or we lose. But we know that on that Tuesday, we are going to know our fate. We won or we lost.
President Clinton, to his credit, has nominated people who have received higher ratings than any President, Democrat or Republican, in 40 years and they still get held up. He said:
These people are highly qualified, which leads to only one conclusion, that the appointments process has been politicized in the hope of getting appointees ultimately to the bench who will be more political. That is wrong. It is a denial of justice.
President Clinton is right. We should move forward with these nominees. Let them have a vote. Don't do this in the dark of the night holding people up.

146 Cong. Rec. S 9671, 10/3/00, When There Were 66 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

I have said on the floor, although we are different parties, I have agreed with Gov. George Bush, who has said that in the Senate a nominee ought to get a vote, up or down, within 60 days. I urge in the time remaining in this session that he, as the head of his party, as their Presidential nominee, call the Republican leader of the Senate and say that all of these women, all of these minorities, in fact, all of the people who have been sitting here for well over 60 days waiting for a vote on their nomination, let them have a vote. Vote for them or vote against them. Bonnie Campbell deserves a vote. My guess is the reason she has not been brought for a vote is they know at least 80 of the 100 Senators would vote for her. It would be impossible to justify a vote against her because of her extraordinary qualifications.
Again, if Governor Bush is serious when he says have a vote within 60 days, pick up the phone, call the Senate majority leader, reach him at the switchboard, 202-224-3121, and ask him to bring her to a vote. It is a very easy thing to do.
Again I say if Governor Bush means it, pick up the phone and call 202-224-3121; ask the Senate switchboard to connect him to the Republican leader and say: You know, I have made it a tenet of my campaign that the Senate should vote on a nomination within 60 days. You can bring every one of these people to the floor for a vote, up or down, today. Let's do so. Who knows. We will find out how the Senate feels about them. Are they for them or are they against them? Right now, instead of voting yes or no, we vote "maybe," by having one or two Senators in the dark of night put holds on these people.

LEAHY, PATRICK on ACTING QUICKLY ON NOMINATIONS

He had a hearing on May 7. The Judiciary Committee reported his confirmation to the full Senate on May 22. This is the way the judicial confirmation process should work. The position had been open only a few months. The Senate was out at the time the vacancy occurred. Shortly after the elections, the President moved quickly with a nominee that had strong bipartisan support for his home State senators. The Judiciary Committee moved very quickly, and the nomination passed out unanimously. We know that there is a major need for a judge there. Alan Gold's nomination is now pending on the Senate calendar, awaiting action on the Senate floor. This process should not become entangled in partisan squabbling.

143 Cong. Rec. S 5653, 6/16/97, When There Were 96 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on ACTING QUICKLY ON NOMINATIONS

As I have said before, it should not take more than 4 months to consider a judicial nominee and the Gold nomination and its treatment should serve as the standard by which we measure the Senate's treatment of other nominees. Although it should represent the normal process, it is the exception this year.

LEAHY, PATRICK on ACTING QUICKLY ON NOMINATIONS

Likewise, I again urge the Republican leadership to proceed to consideration of the four judicial nominees favorably reported by the Judiciary Committee over the last 7 weeks. Yesterday, we succeeded in reporting three additional judicial nominees. I would hope that we could proceed to their confirmations early next week. Confirming those 7 nominations pending on the executive calendar would literally double our production for the first 6 months of this session.

LEAHY, PATRICK on ACTING QUICKLY ON NOMINATIONS

After being on the Senate calendar for a total of 7 months, this nomination has been delayed too long. I believe all would agree that it is time for the full Senate to debate this nomination and vote on it. I have inquired about a time agreement but gotten no response. Now that an opponent has finally come forward to identify himself, I look forward to a prompt debate and a vote on this nomination in accordance with the apparent commitment of the majority leader. I look forward to that debate. I ask again, as I have done repeatedly over the last several months, why not now, why not today, why not this week?

143 Cong. Rec. S 10924, 10/22/97, When There Were 93 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on ACTING QUICKLY ON NOMINATIONS

Nine months should be more than a sufficient time for the Senate to complete its review of these nominees. During the four years of the Bush Administration, only three confirmations took as long as nine months. Last year, 10 of the 36 judges confirmed took nine months or more and many took as long as a year and one-half. So far this year, Judge Ann Aiken, Judge Margaret Morrow, and Judge Hilda Tagle have taken 21 months, 26 months and 31 months respectively. Margaret McKeown's nomination has already been pending for 24 months. Judge Sotomayor's nomination has already been pending for 9 months. Pat Murphy's and Judge McCuskey's nominations have already been pending for 8 months. The average number of days to consider nominees used to be between 50 and 90, it rose last year to over 200 and this year stands at over 300 days from nomination to confirmation. That is too long and does a disservice to our Federal Courts.

144 Cong. Rec. S 2696, 3/27/98, When There Were 82 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on ACTING QUICKLY ON NOMINATIONS

Nominees deserve to be treated with dignity and dispatch -- not delayed for two and three years. We are seeing outstanding nominees nitpicked and delayed to the point that good women and men are being deterred from seeking to serve as federal judges. Nominees practicing law see their work put on hold while they await the outcome of their nominations. Their families cannot plan. All of this despite the fact that, by all objective accounts and studies, the judges that President Clinton has appointed have been a moderate group, rendering moderate decisions, and certainly including far fewer ideologues than were nominated during the Reagan Administration.

Certainly no President has consulted more closely with Senators of the other party on judicial nominations. The Senate should get about the business of voting on the confirmation of the scores of judicial nominations that have been delayed without justification for too long. We must redouble our efforts to work with the President to end the longstanding vacancies that plague the federal courts and disadvantage all Americans. That is our constitutional responsibility.

LEAHY, PATRICK on ACTING QUICKLY ON NOMINATIONS

The bipartisan Task Force on Judicial Selection of Citizens for Independent Courts has recommended that the Senate complete its consideration of judicial nominations within 60 days.

Governor Bush of Texas recently also proposed that presidential nominations be acted upon by the Senate within 60 days.

Of the 34 judicial nominations currently pending, 26 have already been pending for more than 60 days without Senate action. Already this Congress 83 nominees, including 56 eventually confirmed, have had to wait longer than 60 days for Senate action. I urge the Senate to do better.

If I could make a recommendation, I would join an unusual ally in that. Gov. George W. Bush of Texas Presidential nominations should be acted upon by the Senate within 60 days. He said:

The Constitution empowers the President to nominate officers of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate. That is clear-cut, straightforward language. It does not empower anyone to turn the process into a protracted ordeal of unreasonable delay and unrelenting investigation. Yet somewhere along the way, that is what Senate confirmations became --lengthy, partisan, and unpleasant. It has done enough harm, injured too many good people, and it must not happen again.

Governor Bush is right. President Clinton has said virtually the same thing. I have said the same thing. The fact is, if you do not want somebody to be a judge, then vote them down, but do not do this limbo thing where sometimes they wait for years and years. Marsha Berzon waited 2 1/2 years just to get a vote. They were not going to vote on this woman. When she finally came to a vote, she was confirmed overwhelmingly.

146 Cong. Rec. S 7436, 7/21/00, When There Were 59 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on ACTING QUICKLY ON NOMINATIONS

The soon-to-be presidential nominee of the Republican Party has said--and I agree with him--that this is wrong, the Senate ought to vote these people up or down in 60 days. Of course, we could do that. There is a concern that has been expressed--and rightly so--that so many nominees are held without any vote. Nobody votes against them, but nobody gets an opportunity to vote for them; they just sit there. And even though the criticism stings, the fact is that, on average, women and minorities take longer to go through this Senate than white males do. Some women, some minorities have gone through very quickly, but most have taken longer. Some of these people got held up for 2 or 3 or 4 years. When they finally got a vote, they passed overwhelmingly. But for 2 or 3 or 4 years they were humiliated, caused to dangle, have their law practices fall apart, have people question what was going on. Why? Because one or two Senators thought they should be held up. Well, let those one or two Senators vote against them. We are paid to vote yes or no, not maybe. I do not know whether it is because they are women, because they are Hispanic, because they are too liberal, or too conservative, too active, not active enough, that people don't want them to be confirmed. Let them vote against them.

146 Cong. Rec. S 7531, 7/25/00, When There Were 59 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on ACTING QUICKLY ON NOMINATIONS

I mention this because Governor Bush and I, while we disagree on some issues, have one very significant issue on which we agree. He gave a speech awhile back and criticized what has happened in the Senate where confirmations are held up not because somebody votes down a nominee but because they cannot ever get a vote. Governor Bush said: You have the nominee. Hold the hearing. Then, within 60 days, vote them up or vote them down. Don't leave them in limbo.
Frankly, that is what we are paid to do in this body. We are paid to vote either yes or no--not vote maybe. When we hold a nominee up by not allowing them a vote and not taking any action one way or the other, we are not only voting "maybe" but we are doing a terrible disservice to the man or woman to whom we do this. They have to put their life on hold. They do not know what is going to happen: Are they going to be confirmed, or not? It is not like when any one of us runs for election; we know that on a certain day the election occurs. We either win or we lose. But we know that on that Tuesday, we are going to know our fate. We won or we lost.
President Clinton, to his credit, has nominated people who have received higher ratings than any President, Democrat or Republican, in 40 years and they still get held up. He said:
These people are highly qualified, which leads to only one conclusion, that the appointments process has been politicized in the hope of getting appointees ultimately to the bench who will be more political. That is wrong. It is a denial of justice.
President Clinton is right. We should move forward with these nominees. Let them have a vote. Don't do this in the dark of the night holding people up.

146 Cong. Rec. S 9671, 10/3/00, When There Were 66 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on ACTING QUICKLY ON NOMINATIONS

The debate on judicial nominations over the last several years has included too much delay with respect to too many nominations. The most prominent current examples of that treatment are Judge Helene White, Bonnie Campbell, Roger Gregory, and Enrique Moreno. With respect to these nominations, the Senate has for too long refused to do its constitutional duty and vote. Nominees deserve to be treated with dignity and dispatch--not delayed for two or three or four years. The nomination of Judge White has now been pending for over four years, the longest pending nomination without a hearing in Senate history.

146 Cong. Rec. S 9657, 10/3/00, When There Were 66 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on ACTING QUICKLY ON NOMINATIONS

I have said on the floor, although we are different parties, I have agreed with Gov. George Bush, who has said that in the Senate a nominee ought to get a vote, up or down, within 60 days. I urge in the time remaining in this session that he, as the head of his party, as their Presidential nominee, call the Republican leader of the Senate and say that all of these women, all of these minorities, in fact, all of the people who have been sitting here for well over 60 days waiting for a vote on their nomination, let them have a vote. Vote for them or vote against them. Bonnie Campbell deserves a vote. My guess is the reason she has not been brought for a vote is they know at least 80 of the 100 Senators would vote for her. It would be impossible to justify a vote against her because of her extraordinary qualifications.

Again, if Governor Bush is serious when he says have a vote within 60 days, pick up the phone, call the Senate majority leader, reach him at the switchboard, 202-224-3121, and ask him to bring her to a vote. It is a very easy thing to do.

While the Republican candidate for President made a fine statement in which he called for votes on judicial nominations within 60 days, he has not prevailed upon the Senate Republican majority to treat nominees fairly now. Instead of 60 days, we see Judge Helene White's nomination to the Sixth Circuit pending more than 1400 days; Elena Kagan, U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, pending 500 days; Judge James Wynn, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, pending more than 440 days; Kathleen McCree Lewis, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, pending more than 400 days; Enrique Moreno, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, pending more than 400 days; Bonnie Campbell, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, pending more than 240 days; Roger Gregory, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, pending more than 115 days; Lynette Norton, U.S. District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania, pending more than 1300 days; Judge Legrome Davis, U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, pending more than 800 days; Patricia Coan, U.S. District Court for the District of Colorado, pending more than 500 days; Dolly Gee, U.S. District Court for the Central District of California, pending more than 500 days; Rhonda Fields, U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, pending more than 350 days; Linda Riegle, U.S. District Court for the District of Nevada, pending more than 180 days; Ricardo Morado, U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Texas, pending more than 165 days. LEAHY, PATRICK on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

It is getting a little ridiculous. Do people know that we get paid $133,000 a year, and we have not had 1 second of debate on the budget resolution that the Republican leadership of the Senate and the House are supposed to bring before us for a vote? Do they know that we get paid $133,000 a year, but if you want to litigate a case in a Federal court, you probably cannot get before a federal judge because of the vacancies that our inaction is perpetuating?

143 Cong. Rec. S 2299, 3/14/97, When There Were 93 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

We have confirmed less than one judge a month since the start of this session in January. We have almost 100 vacancies in the federal judiciary. Many of them are in critical areas, where huge backlogs are occurring, where courts are saying that we are benefiting criminals because they can't be tried; we can't have speedy trials. Criminals get the benefit of this by not having judges to hear the cases. If you have a civil case, forget about a speedy trial.

143 Cong. Rec. S 5653, 6/16/97, When There Were 96 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

The Chief Judge of the Eleventh Circuit has testified about "crushing workloads." He has noted that federal courts are "no longer able to provide the public with the same standard of excellent service that they did in the past." The Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, William Rehnquist, has called the rising number of Federal judicial vacancies "the most immediate problem we face in the Federal judiciary." He warned at the end of 1996 that "filling judicial vacancies is crucial to the fair and effective administration of justice."

143 Cong. Rec. S 9723, 9/19/97, When There Were 97 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

The American people know that a fair and impartial judiciary is key to maintaining our democracy and our rights. The continuing partisan campaign against qualified and fair judicial nominees has to come to an end. If the judiciary is to retain its ability to protect our rights and freedoms as we move into a new century of American history, if it is to serve as a check on the political branches, it must have the judges and resources necessary to the task. Vacant courtrooms and empty benches cannot hear criminal trials, enforce our environmental protection laws, resolve legal claims or uphold the Constitution against encroachment.

Those who delay or prevent the filling of these vacancies must understand that they are delaying or preventing the administration of justice. We can pass all the crime bills we want, but you cannot try the cases and incarcerate the guilty if you do not have judges. The mounting backlogs of civil and criminal cases in the dozens of emergency districts, in particular, are growing taller by the day.

National Public Radio has been running a series of reports all this week on the judicial crises and quoted the Chief Judge and U.S. attorney from San Diego earlier this week to the effect that criminal matters are being affected.

143 Cong. Rec. S 9957, 9/25/97, When There Were 97 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

The Judiciary Committee has heard testimony from Second Circuit, Ninth Circuit and Eleventh Circuit judges about the adverse impact of vacancies on the ability of the Federal courts to do justice. The effect is seen in extended delay in the hearing and determination of cases and the frustration that litigants are forced to endure. The crushing caseload will force Federal courts to rely more and more on senior judges, visiting judges and court staff.

143 Cong. Rec. S 9957, 9/25/97, When There Were 97 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

Meanwhile, the people served by the District Court for the Central District of California continue to suffer the effects of this. Vacancy cases are not heard, criminal cases are not being tried. This is one of more than 28 vacancies that have persisted for so long that they are classified as "judicial emergency" vacancies by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

143 Cong. Rec. S 10825, 10/9/97, When There Were 93 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

When a U.S. attorney can refer to the lack of courtrooms and Federal judges as a bottleneck in the criminal justice process and the chief judge of a Federal district court can acknowledge that the court is so overwhelmed with criminal cases that it is operating like an assembly line, that cases are not given the attention that they deserve and that you know that you're making a lot of mistakes because of the speed, we have reached a crisis. That is not American justice, that is not the federal justice system on which all of us rely to protect our rights while enforcing the law.

143 Cong. Rec. S 10924, 10/22/97, When There Were 93 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

Worse yet, it is affecting the quality of justice in the United States. The increase in the number of judicial vacancies in combination with the growth in criminal and civil filings has created a huge backlog of federal cases. According to Chief Justice Rehnquist, since 1990, the number of cases filed in courts of appeals has increased by 21 percent and those filed in district courts have grown by 24 percent. There was a five percent increase in the criminal caseload in 1997. This resulted in the largest federal criminal caseload in 60 years.

According to the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, the number of active cases pending for at least three years rose 20 percent from 1995 to 1996. According to the most recent data provided by the Department of Justice, there are more than 16,000 federal cases that are more than three years old.

144 Cong. Rec. S 592, 2/10/98, When There Were 81 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

The mounting backlogs of civil and criminal cases in the dozens of emergency districts, in particular, are growing more critical by the day. This is particularly true in the Central and Southern District Courts of Illinois, where these outstanding nominees will serve once they are confirmed.

I hope there will be a realization by those in this body who have started down this destructive path of attacking the judiciary and stalling the confirmation of qualified nominees to the federal bench that those efforts do not serve the national interest or the American people. I hope that we can once again remove these important matters from partisan and ideological politics.

144 Cong. Rec. S 1986, 3/16/98, When There Were 82 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

The mounting backlogs of civil and criminal cases in the dozens of emergency districts, like the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois, are growing more critical by the day. Indeed, in the Southern District of Illinois, where Pat Murphy will serve when confirmed, Chief Judge Gilbert has reported that his docket has been so burdened with criminal cases that he went a year without trying a civil case.

I have urged those who have been stalling the consideration of the President's judicial nominations to reconsider and to work with us to have the Judiciary Committee and the Senate fulfill its Constitutional responsibility. Those who delay or prevent the filling of these vacancies must understand that they are delaying or preventing the administration of justice. Courts cannot try cases, incarcerate the guilty or resolve civil disputes without judges.

144 Cong. Rec. S 3028, 4/2/98, When There Were 79 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

Law clerks and attorney staff are being used more and more extensively in the determination of cases as backlogs grow. Bureaucratic imperatives seem to be replacing the judicial deliberation needed for the fair administration of justice. These are not the ways to continue the high quality of decision making for which our federal courts are admired or to engender confidence in our justice system.

When the President and the Chief Justice Spoke out, the Senate briefly got about its business of considering judicial nominations last year. Unfortunately, the Senate is back to a pace of confirming a judge a month. That is not acceptable, it does not serve the interests of justice and it does not fulfill our constitutional responsibilities. For the last several years I have been urging the

More than two years ago Chief Justice William Rehnquist warned that "vacancies cannot remain at such high levels indefinitely without eroding the quality of justice that traditionally has been associated with the federal judiciary." The New York Times reported last year how the crushing workload in the federal appellate courts has led to what it calls a "two-tier system" for appeals, skipping oral arguments in more and more cases. Law clerks and attorney staff are being used more and more extensively in the determination of cases as backlogs grow.

Bureaucratic imperatives seem to be replacing the judicial deliberation needed for the fair administration of justice. These are not the ways to continue the high quality of decisionmaking for which our federal courts are admired or to engender confidence in our justice system.

Federal law enforcement relies on judges to hear criminal cases, and individuals and businesses pay taxes to exercise their right to resolve civil disputes in the federal courts. As workloads continue to grow and vacancies are perpetuated, the remaining judges are being overwhelmed and the work of the federal judiciary is suffering.

Our independent federal judiciary sets us apart from virtually all others in the world. Every nation that in this century has moved toward democracy has sent observers to the United States in their efforts to emulate our judiciary. Those fostering this slowdown of the confirmation process and other attacks on the judiciary are risking harm to institutions that protect our personal freedoms and independence.

The Senate should consider the effect of its perpetuation of longstanding judicial vacancies on drug cases. The Criminal Justice Oversight Subcommittee held a hearing this week on the drug smuggling problem in the Caribbean, with particular attention to the activity in Puerto Rico. The Commander of the Coast Guard Atlantic Area testified that his primary counterdrug focus . . . for the upcoming year is on Puerto Rico, where the smuggling infrastructure is well developed, entrenched, and historically successful, with one-quarter of all cocaine destined for the United States . . . being shipped via the 110-mile long island of Puerto Rico.

LEAHY, PATRICK on DC CIRCUIT

Mr. President, I am concerned when I hear attempts to tie Mr. Garland's nomination to the number of judges in the D.C. circuit. Let us remember that Mr. Garland is there to fill the 11th seat on the D.C. circuit, not the 12th seat. Even Judge Silberman, who has argued for abolishing the 12th seat for this court, has testified that "it would be a mistake, a serious mistake, for Congress to reduce down below 11 judges." That is a verbatim quote from Judge Silberman.

But we should also remember that when we just put numbers here, numbers do not tell the whole story. The D.C. circuit's docket is by far the most complex and difficult in the Nation. You can have a dozen routine matters in another circuit and one highly complex issue involving the U.S. Government in the D.C. circuit, brought because it is the D.C. circuit, that one would go on and equal the dozen or more anywhere else.

LEAHY, PATRICK on DON'T APPLY THE "THURMOND RULE"

For the last several years I have been urging the Judiciary Committee and the Senate to proceed to consider and confirm judicial nominees more promptly and without the months of delay that now accompany so many nominations.

There is a myth that judges are not traditionally confirmed in presidential election years. That is not true. Recall that 64 judges were confirmed in 1980, 44 in 1984, 42 in 1988 when a Democratic majority in the Senate confirmed 42 Reagan nominees, and, 66 in 1992 when a Democratic majority in the Senate confirmed 66 Bush nominees. The 17 confirmations in 1996 were an anomaly that should not be repeated. That has led to years of slower and lower confirmations and heavy backlogs in many federal courts.

Those fostering this slowdown of the confirmation process and other attacks on the judiciary are risking harm to institutions that protect our personal freedoms and independence. We must redouble our efforts to work with the President to end the longstanding vacancies that plague the federal courts and disadvantage all Americans. That is our constitutional responsibility.

Capitol Hill Hearing Testimony, 2/22/00, When There Were 79 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on DON'T APPLY THE "THURMOND RULE"

Last year, faced with 100 federal judicial vacancies, the Senate confirmed only 34 new judges. I have challenged this Committee and the full Senate to return to the pace we met in 1998 when we held 13 confirmation hearings and confirmed 65 judges. That approximates the pace in 1992, when a Democratic majority in the Senate acted to confirm 66 judges during President Bush's final year in office.

There is a myth that judges are not traditionally confirmed in presidential election years. That is not true. Recall that 64 judges were confirmed in 1980, 44 in 1984, 42 in 1988 when a Democratic majority in the Senate confirmed Reagan nominees and, as I have noted, 66 in 1992 when a Democratic majority in the Senate confirmed 66 Bush nominees. Our federal judiciary cannot afford another unproductive election year session like 1996 when a Republican majority in the Senate confirmed only 17 judges. These 17 confirmations in 1996 were an anomaly that should not be repeated. Since then we have had years of slower and lower confirmations and heavy backlogs in many federal courts.

LEAHY, PATRICK on DON'T APPLY THE "THURMOND RULE"

I have challenged the Judiciary Committee and the full Senate to return to the pace they met in 1998 when we held 13 confirmation hearings and confirmed 65 judges. That approximates the pace in 1992, when a Democratic majority in the Senate acted to confirm 66 judges during President Bush's final year in office. There is a myth that judges are not traditionally confirmed in presidential election years.

That is not true. Recall that 64 judges were confirmed in 1980, 44 in 1984, 42 in 1988 when a Democratic majority in the Senate confirmed 42 judges nominated by President Reagan and, as I have noted, 66 in 1992 when a Democratic majority in the Senate confirmed 66 judges nominated by President Bush.

LEAHY, PATRICK on DON'T APPLY THE "THURMOND RULE"

Having begun so slowly in the first five months of this year, we have much more to do before the Senate takes its final action on judicial nominees this year. We should be considering 20 to 40 more judges this year. Having begun so slowly, we cannot afford to follow the "Thurmond rule" and stop acting on these nominees at the end of the summer in anticipation of the presidential election. We must use all the time until adjournment to remedy the vacancies that have been perpetuated on the courts to the detriment of the American people and the administration of justice. I urge all Senators to make the federal administration of justice a top priority for the Senate for the rest of this year.

Having begun so slowly in the first half of this year, we have much more to do before the Senate takes its final action on judicial nominees this year. We should be considering 20 to 30 more judges this year, including at least another half dozen for the court of appeals. We cannot afford to follow the "Thurmond Rule" and stop acting on these nominees now in anticipation of the presidential election in November. We must use all the time until adjournment to remedy the vacancies that have been perpetuated on the courts to the detriment of the American people and the administration of justice. That should be a top priority for the Senate for the rest of this year. In the last three months in session in 1992, between July 12 and October 8, 1992, the Senate confirmed 32 judicial nominations. I will work with Chairman Hatch to match that record.

LEAHY, PATRICK on END PARTISANSHIP IN CONFIRMATIONS

This is partisanship of an unprecedented nature. I have spoken twice on this floor today on what happens when we forget the normal traditions of the Senate. Traditionally certainly not in my lifetime no Democratic majority leader or Republican majority leader of the Senate would bring up a resolution for a vote directly attacking the President of the United States directly or indirectly attacking the President of the United States on a day when the President is heading off to a summit with other world leaders, especially with the leader of the other nuclear superpower, Russia. Yet, that tradition, which, as I said, has existed my whole lifetime, was broken today.

The other thing is that no matter which party controls the Senate, no matter what party controls the Presidency, we have always worked together so that the President, having been elected, can, subject to normal advice and consent, can appoint the judges he wants. And that tradition has been broken.

If we are going to go against these basic tenets of bipartisanship, then the Senate will not be the conscience of the Nation that it should be. The Senate will suffer. And if the Senate suffers, the country suffers.

143 Cong. Rec. S 2515, 3/19/97, When There Were 93 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on END PARTISANSHIP IN CONFIRMATIONS

Now I say this, Mr. President, make the same argument now as when we have had a Republican President and a Democratically controlled Senate. If there is one area where partisan politics should not be allowed, it is in the area of the federal judiciary.

143 Cong. Rec. S 5653, 6/16/97, When There Were 96 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on END PARTISANSHIP IN CONFIRMATIONS

They might not be able to speak up, but I will, because this year's continuing attack on the judicial branch, the slowdown in the processing of the scores of good women and men the President has nominated to fill vacancies on the federal courts around the country, and widespread threats of impeachment are all part of a partisan ideological effort to intimidate the judiciary. Judges cannot take the floor of the U.S. Senate and defend themselves. I will.

I have never known a time when the leadership of the Senate would tolerate partisan and ideological politics so diverting this institution from its constitutional esponsibilities with respect to the third constitutionally coequal branch of Government. If Wednesday's reports are accurate, sadly the American people must know that not only is the Senate leadership allowing these efforts, it is condoning them.

LEAHY, PATRICK on FILLING VACANCIES

I urge all Senators, all House Members, all of us who have the responsibility, who have taken the oath to uphold the Constitution, to step back a moment, stop the foolishness of these calls for impeachment, stop the irresponsibility of refusing to fill judicial vacancies, stop the attacks on the President as he moves from his hospital bed to one of the most important summits he will have of his Presidency.

143 Cong. Rec. S 2344, 3/17/97, When There Were 93 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on FILLING VACANCIES

As the Republicans fought amongst themselves, judiciary ranking member Patrick Leahy (D-Vt) watched the bickering with contempt. He noted that there are about 100 judicial vacancies and counting. "Instead of cobbling together even more obstacles, Senators should do the work they are sworn and paid to do and fill these vacancies," said Leahy.

Roll Call, 5/1/97, When There Were 99 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on FILLING VACANCIES

The President's address was an important one. I hope that his call for an end to the intimidation, the delay, the shrill voices of partisanship will be headed. I will continue to do all that I can to defend the integrity and independence of our federal judiciary and to urge the Republican leadership of the Senate to move forward promptly on judicial nominations. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the text of the President's address be printed in the Record at the end of my statement.

143 Cong. Rec. S 10924, 10/22/97, When There Were 93 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on FILLING VACANCIES

While I am encouraged that the Senate is today proceeding with the confirmation of a judicial nominee, there remains no excuse for the Senate's delay with respect to more than 50 other judicial nominations sent by the President. The Senate should be moving more promptly to fill the vacancies plaguing the federal courts. Twenty-three confirmations in a year in which we have witnessed 115 vacancies is not fulfilling the Senate's constitutional responsibility.

I have urged those who have been stalling the consideration of these fine women and men to reconsider and to work with us to have the committee and the Senate fulfill its constitutional responsibility. Those who delay or prevent the filling of these vacancies must understand that they are delaying or preventing the administration of justice. Courts cannot try cases, incarcerate the guilty or resolve civil disputes without judges. The mounting backlogs of civil and criminal cases in the dozens of emergency districts, in particular, are growing more critical by the day.

143 Cong. Rec. S 11960, 11/7/97, When There Were 90 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on FILLING VACANCIES

The first week of this session I challenged the Senate to maintain the pace that it reached last fall when we confirmed 27 judges in the last nine weeks of the session. In the first four weeks of this new session, however, we have acted to confirm only five judges. Judge Young will be the sixth judge confirmed in this our fifth week in session. We are well short of the mark and not measuring up to the pace this very Senate attained last fall. I therefore urge the Majority Leader to take up the nominations of G. Patrick Murphy, Michael P. McCluskey, Edward F. Shea, Jeremy D. Fogel and M. Margaret McKeown without further delay.

144 Cong. Rec. S 1198, 3/2/98, When There Were 82 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on FILLING VACANCIES

There is a need in a growing number of cases, a desperate need, to fill the almost 100 vacancies that continue to plague the federal justice system. The President has spoken to the issue both last September and in his most recent State of the Union. The Chief Justice spoke to the matter again in the 1997 Year End Report. I have spoken until I am blue in the face. The Senate can do a better job to fulfill its constitutional responsibility and to support the third co-equal branch of our government.

144 Cong. Rec. S 1986, 3/16/98, When There Were 82 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on FILLING VACANCIES

I have urged that the Senate at least maintain the pace established at the close of last year when we confirmed 27 judges in nine weeks. It was only with that kind of effort that we were able to improve our productivity. The Senate under Republican control has taken the last three years to match the one-year total confirmed in 1994 when we were on course to close the vacancies gap under Democratic leadership. I have challenged the Senate this year to maintain the pace we achieved over that last nine weeks of the last session. Clearing the Senate calendar and confirming the five nominees currently pending will help in that regard.

Prepared Statement, Senate Judiciary Committee, 3/18/98, When There Were 82 Vacancies

---

LEAHY, PATRICK on FILLING VACANCIES

Senator Hatch is fond of saying that the Senate could do better. I agree with him and hope that we will continue to do better next year. I began this year challenging the Senate to maintain that pace it established in the last nine months of last year. Had we done so, we could have confirmed 90 judges. Instead, the Senate has acted to confirm only 65 of the 91 nominations received for the 115 vacancies the federal judiciary experienced this year.

Meanwhile 50 judicial vacancies remain. This is one of the largest number of vacancies left unfilled at the end of a Congress. In 1983 vacancies numbered only 16. Even after the creation of 85 new judgeships in 1984, the number of vacancies had been reduced to only 33 by the end of the 99th Congress in 1986. At the end of the 100th Congress in 1988, which had a Democratic majority and a Republican President, judicial vacancies numbered only 23. In 1996 the Republican Senate adjourned leaving 64 judicial vacancies. This year the Senate is adjourning leaving 50 judicial vacancies and the number is likely to increase during the recess.

144 Cong. Rec. S 12962, 10/21/98, When There Were 70 Vacancies

---

LEAHY, PATRICK on FILLING VACANCIES

I again urge the Senate to take seriously its responsibilities and help the President fill the longstanding vacancies in the federal courts around the country. Today the score is running against the prompt and fair administration of justice--vacancies 67, nominations 33, confirmations zero.

145 Cong. Rec. S 3670, 4/14/99, When There Were 65 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on FILLING VACANCIES

Law clerks and attorney staff are being used more and more extensively in the determination of cases as backlogs grow. Bureaucratic imperatives seem to be replacing the judicial deliberation needed for the fair administration of justice. These are not the ways to continue the high quality of decision making for which our federal courts are admired or to engender confidence in our justice system.

The Senate should get about the business of voting on the confirmation of the scores of judicial nominations that have been delayed with justification for too long. We must redouble our efforts to work with the President to end the longstanding vacancies that plague the federal courts and disadvantage all Americans. That is our constitutional responsibility.

Prepared Statement, Senate Judiciary Committee, 6/16/99, When There Were 68 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on FILLING VACANCIES

There remain 36 judicial nominations pending in the Judiciary Committee, plus new nominations that the President is sending us every week. I have challenged the Senate to regain the pace it met in 1998 when the Committee held 13 hearings and the Senate confirmed 65 judges. That would still be one less than the number of judges confirmed by a Democratic Senate majority in the last year of the Bush Administration in 1992. Indeed, in the last two years of the Bush Administration, a Democratic Senate majority confirmed 124 judges. It would take an additional 67 confirmations this year for this Senate to equal that total.

Having begun so slowly in the first five months of this year, we have much more to do before the Senate takes its final action on judicial nominees this year. We should be considering 20 to 40 more judges this year. Having begun so slowly, we cannot afford to follow the "Thurmond rule" and stop acting on these nominees at the end of the summer in anticipation of the presidential election. We must use all the time until adjournment to remedy the vacancies that have been perpetuated on the courts to the detriment of the American people and the administration of justice. I urge all Senators to make the federal administration of justice a top priority for the Senate for the rest of this year.

We must redouble our efforts to work with the President to end the longstanding vacancies that plague the federal courts and disadvantage all Americans. That is our constitutional responsibility. It should not be shirked.

Frankly, it is humiliating to the Senate. It is beneath this great body. I have served here for over 25 years. I can't think of any greater honor that could come to me than to have the people of Vermont allow me to serve here. I should put on my tombstone, other than husband and father, that I was a United States Senator.

I have always thought of this Senate as the conscience of the Nation. We are not handling the conscience of this Nation very well. We have a responsibility to uphold the judiciary. If we allow it to be tattered, if we allow it to be shredded, if we allow it to be humiliated, how can a democracy of a quarter of a billion people uphold our laws? How can the country have respect both for the laws and the courts that administer them, if we in the Senate, the most powerful legislative body in this country, don't show that same respect? If we diminish that, it will be an example to be followed by the rest of the people in this country.

There are only 100 of us who have the privilege of serving here at any given time to represent a quarter of a billion Americans. Sometimes we should think more of that responsibility than partisan politics.

LEAHY, PATRICK on JUDICIAL INDEPENDENCE

The distinguished majority leader has a concern with the President on the FEC. I am not going to get in the middle of that issue. Both sides claim they are moving forward with nominees. I have to assume the majority leader of the U.S. Senate has ways of bringing pressure to bear on the President of the United States without having to cripple the Federal judiciary or to do things that might appear, whether intended or not, to diminish the independence of the Federal judiciary.

[. . .]

We have confirmed less than one judge a month since the start of this session in January. We have almost 100 vacancies in the Federal judiciary. Many of them are in critical areas, where huge backlogs are occurring, where courts are saying that we are benefiting criminals because they can't be tried; we can't have speedy trials. Criminals get the benefit of this by not having judges to hear the cases. If you have a civil case, forget about a speedy trial.

[. . .]

Now, I say this, Mr. PresidentI make the same argument now as when we have had a Republican President and a Democratically controlled Senate. If there is one area where partisan politics should not be allowed, it is in the area of the Federal judiciary.

[. . .]

A President should be given a great deal of latitude on who he nominates to the Federal court. If we disagree with a nomination, then we can vote against it. But, frankly, Mr. President, not only does it damage the integrity and the independence of the Federal judiciary by just holding judicial nominations hostage where nobody ever even votes on them, but I think it damages the integrity of the U.S. Senate.

[. . .]

If President Clinton sends a nominee to the Senate that any Senator Democrat or Republican doesn't like, vote against him or her. That is your right as a U.S. Senator. But don't say, well, they look like pretty good people, but we can't even allow a vote on their nomination. And don't say, if you are, for example, in Texas, that it is terrible that drug and illegal immigrant cases are not being heard, what is the court doing? People in Texas should say, what is the U.S. Senate doing? Why aren't they acting? If you are a civil litigant in the Sixth Circuit or Ninth Circuit, or a number of others that have emergency vacancies, and you have one of your rights to be protected, what do you do? You say, why aren't those judges hearing these cases? No. Say, why isn't the U.S. Senate confirming people.

Let us bring them forward. I ask that one of the first we proceed to consider be Margaret Morrow, who seems to be held up only because she is a woman. There is no reason to hold up that judicial nomination. Let it be voted. If people do not want her, vote against her. If they want her, vote for her. But let's have a vote on this.

We are not helping the independence. In fact, we are diminishing the independence of the federal judiciary.

We've had far more vacations, the Senate's taken far more vacations than it has confirmed judges. I mean, this hasn't happened in 200 years. Never have they allowed the Federal judiciary to get in such an abysmal state, when the Chief Justice has to say it is a crisis, when the Chief Justice says: It is hoped that the Administration and Congress will continue to recognize that filling judicial vacancies is crucial to the fair and effective administration of justice." And yet, we have to tell him today that we are not doing it, we are not doing our job.

143 Cong. Rec. S 2299, 3/14/97, When There Were 93 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on JUSTICE DELAYED

So, let us not get too carried away with the debate on what size the court should be. We can have legislation on that. The fact is, we have a judge who is needed, a judge who was nominated, and whose nomination was accepted and voted on by the Senate Judiciary Committee in 1995. It is now 1997. Let us stop the dillydallying. I suppose, as we are not doing anything elsewe do not have any votes on budgets or chemical weapons treaties or any of these other things we can doI suppose we can spend time on this. We ought to just vote this through, because at the rate we are currently going we are falling further and further behind, and more and more vacancies are continuing to mount over longer and longer times, to the detriment of greater numbers of Americans and the national cause of prompt justice.

LEAHY, PATRICK on JUSTICE DELAYED

The current vacancy crisis is having a devastating impact on the administration of justice in courts around the country. Let me note a few examples:

These are real life examples of the harm caused by the irresponsible lack of action by this Senate in considering highly qualified judicial nominations. It is time for the Senate to fulfil its costitutional responsibility to confirm the Federal judges needed for the effective administration of justice.

143 Cong. Rec. S 10924, 10/22/97, When There Were 93 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on JUSTICE DELAYED

Those pressing this effort complain about what they see as "the failure of the U.S. Senate to block" the appointment of judges to the Federal bench. The American people, litigants, prosecutors, and judges, Republicans and Democrats alike, have just the opposite complaintthat the perpetuation of judicial vacancies is affecting the administration of justice and rendering our laws empty promises.

143 Cong. Rec. S 11233, 10/27/97, When There Were 93 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on JUSTICE DELAYED

Those who delay or prevent the filling of these vacancies must understand that they are delaying or preventing the administration of justice, Congress can talk the talk about being tough on crime, but the fact is that courts cannot try cases, incarcerate the guilty or resolve civil disputes without judges. The mounting backlogs of civil and criminal cases in the dozens of judicial emergency vacancies, in particular, are growing more critical by the day. We say we want to promote law and order. But that seems like mere lip service when matched with the Senate's dereliction of duty in filling these vacancies.

Press Release, 12/31/97, When There Were 78 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on JUSTICE DELAYED

The Chief Justice correctly warns that these "vacancies cannot remain at such high levels indefinitely without eroding the quality of justice that traditionally has been associated with the federal judiciary." He is also right when he says that "the Senate should act within a reasonable time to confirm or reject nominees" and that "the Senate is surely under no obligation to confirm any particular nominee, but after a necessary time for inquiry it should vote him up or vote him down." But that was not the case in 1997, with more than 40 judicial nominees relegated to limbo, having never been accorded a Senate vote.

In 1997, some in Congress started down the destructive path of attacking the judiciary and stalling the confirmation of qualified nominees to the federal bench. Some lawmakers in positions of high responsibility have even boasted that they intend to "intimidate" the independent judiciary. As Congress reconvenes in 1998, I hope we will realize that those efforts are a disservice to the American people and to the national interest. Those who delay or prevent the filling of these vacancies must understand that they are delaying or preventing the administration of justice. Congress can talk the talk about being tough on crime, but the fact is that courts cannot try cases, incarcerate the guilty or resolve civil disputes without judges. The mounting backlogs of civil and criminal cases in the dozens of judicial emergency vacancies, in particular, are growing more critical by the day. We say we want to promote law and order. But that seems like mere lip service when matched with the Senate's dereliction of duty in filling these vacancies.

The chief justice eloquently describes the importance of an independent and fully functioning federal judiciary. It is too important to be held hostage by partisan politics.

Statement on Federal Judiciary Report, 1/2/98, When There Were 83 Vacancies

---

LEAHY, PATRICK on JUSTICE DELAYED

We should be doing more to keep it that way, not less. We are finally beginning to consider longstanding judicial nominations to fill the vacancies that plague the federal judiciary and threaten the administration of justice. We need to do more. We should consider without further delay the judiciary's requests for the resources that they need. We should consider S. 678, the Federal Judgeship Act, which I introduced at the request of the Judicial Conference to provide an additional 55 judges where needed around the country. We should act on S. 394, which I sponsored with Senator Hatch to unlink judicial salaries from our own. We should consider and confirm qualified nominees to the 83 vacancies to the federal courts.

144 Cong. Rec. S 787, 2/12/98, When There Were 81 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on JUSTICE DELAYED

Judges delayed means justice denied. Without judges, courts cannot try cases, sentence the guilty, or resolve civil disputes. Partisan and narrow ideological efforts to impose political litmus tests on judicial nominees and to shut down the judiciary must stop.

The Senate's judicial vacancy problem is more than a matter of numbers. The independence and integrity of the federal judiciary are being threatened. The nominations backlog is a function of the targeting of the judicial branch, just as the executive branch was targeted and shut down two years ago. Pressure groups within the right wing of the Republican Party have been formed and money is being raised for the goal of "killing" Clinton judicial nominations. Constitutional amendments to undercut the independence of the judiciary have been introduced. Ideological impeachments have been threatened. A Republican leader in the House speaks openly about seeking to "intimidate" federal judges. The confirmation process is not immune to politics, but a particularly virulent strain has infected the Senate's consideration of judicial nominations over the last few years.

For more than 200 years, a strong and independent federal judiciary has served as the bulwark against overreaching by the political branches of government and been the protector of our constitutional rights and liberties.

Those who have started down this destructive path of attacking the judiciary and stalling the confirmation of qualified nominees to the federal bench need to realize that those tactics harm the national interest. We must remove these important matters from partisan and ideological politics. The American people can easily measure our progress.

The Boston Globe, 3/1/98, When There Were 82 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on JUSTICE DELAYED

I have urged those who have been stalling the consideration of the President's judicial nominations to reconsider and to work with us to have the Judiciary Committee and the Senate fulfil its constitutional responsibility. LEAHY, PATRICK on JUSTICE DELAYED

Those who delay or prevent the filling of these vacancies must understand that they are delaying or preventing the administration of justice. Courts cannot try cases, incarcerate the guilty or resolve civil disputes without judges.

Yesterday the Senate Republican Leader indicated that he regretted confirming too many federal judges. I strongly disagree. I realize that there are no vacancies on the federal bench in Mississippi, but there are numerous, longstanding vacancies in other places, vacancies that are harming the federal administration of justice. The people and businesses in these areas do need additional federal judges. Indeed the Judicial Conference of the United States recommends that in addition to filling the 81 current vacancies, Congress should authorize 55 additional judgeships throughout the country, as set forth in S.678, the Federal Judgeship Act that I introduced last May. There is a clamor for us to fill these vacancies and there is harm by the Senate's delay and failure to do so.

The Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court pointedly declared in his 1997 Year End Report: "Vacancies cannot remain at such high levels indefinitely without eroding the quality of justice that traditionally has been associated with the federal judiciary." Must we wait for the administration of justice to break down before the Senate will take this crisis seriously and act on the 40 judicial nominees pending before us? I hope not.

LEAHY, PATRICK on JUSTICE DELAYED

Must we wait for the administration of justice to disintegrate further before the Senate will take this crisis seriously and act on the judicial nominees pending before us? I hope not.

We are sworn to uphold the Constitution, we are sworn to uphold the laws, and we are paid pretty well to do that. We are failing our oath and we are failing the job the taxpayers of this country pay us to do.

LEAHY, PATRICK on JUSTICE DELAYED

Must we wait for the administration of justice to disintegrate further before the Senate will take this crisis seriously and act on the nominees pending before it? I hope not. As part of my efforts to encourage the Senate to do its job, I am to day introducing the Judicial Emergency Responsibility Act. The purpose of this bill is to supplement the law by which Chief Judge Winter certified the emergency and to require the Senate to do its duty and to act on judicial nominations before it recesse s for significant stretches of time when a circuit court is suffering from a vacancy emergency."

I have urged those who have been stalling the consideration of the President's judicial nominations to reconsider and work to fulfil this constitutional responsibility. Those who delay or prevent the filling of these vacancies must understand that they are delaying or preventing the administration of justice. Courts cannot try cases, incarcerate the guilty or resolve civil disputes without judges.

The Senate has not even kept up with normal attrition over the past two years, let alone taken the type of concerted action needed to end the judicial vacancies crisis. The numerous, longstanding vacancies in some courts are harming the federal administration of justice.

LEAHY, PATRICK on JUSTICE DELAYED

The numerous, longstanding vacancies in many courts are harming the federal administration of justice.

I continue to urge other Senators to join with me in working to consider and vote on judicial nominations without such delays. I note that two of the nominees participating in the hearing today were nominated within the last 10 days. With that type of expeditious treatment for others, we could consider many more of the qualified nominees pending for so long before this Committee.

Litigants are being denied any opportunity to see the judges who are deciding their causes. Law clerks and attorney staff are being used more and more extensively in the determination of cases as backlogs grow. Bureaucratic imperatives seem to be replacing the deliberations needed for the fair administration of justice. These are not the ways to continue the high quality of decision-making for which our federal courts are admired or to engender confidence in our justice system.

What we are seeing is nothing short of an attack on our independent judiciary. Four years ago, the Republican Congressional majority sought leverage by shutting down the executive branch. Since then it has found less political resistance by taking aim at the judicial branch.

This is not a victimless tactic. Federal law enforcement relies on judges to hear criminal cases, and individuals and businesses pay taxes to exercise their right to resolve civil disputes in the federal courts. As workloads continue to grow and vacancies are perpetuated, the remaining judges are being overwhelmed and the work of the federal judiciary is suffering.

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

Now, I keep bringing this issue up at the Judiciary Committee meeting, and I am told there are no objections to her, but somehow she is never brought forward to be voted on. I keep saying, if Senators want to vote against her, stand up, have the guts to stand up in the bright sunshine and say how they would vote on her, but nobody does, nobody does.

143 Cong. Rec. S 5084, 5/23/97, When There Were 99 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

Now, I say this, Mr. President, make the same argument now as when we have had a Republican President and a Democratically controlled Senate. If there is one area where partisan politics should not be allowed, it is in the area of the Federal judiciary.
A President should be given a great deal of latitude on who he nominates to the Federal court. If we disagree with a nomination, then we can vote against it. But, frankly, Mr. President, not only does it damage the integrity and the independence of the Federal judiciary by just holding judicial nominations hostage where nobody ever even votes on them, but I think it damages the integrity of the U.S. Senate.
If President Clinton sends a nominee to the Senate that any SenatorDemocrat or Republicandoesn't like, vote against him or her. That is your right as a U.S. Senator. But don't say, well, they look like pretty good people, but we can't even allow a vote on their nomination.
And don't say, if you are, for example, in Texas, that it is terrible that drug and illegal immigrant cases are not being heard, what is the court doing? People in Texas should say, what is the U.S. Senate doing? Why aren't they acting? If you are a civil litigant in the sixth circuit or ninth circuit, or a number of others that have emergency vacancies, and you have one of your rights to be protected, what do you do? You say, why aren't those judges hearing these cases? No. Say, why isn't the U.S. Senate confirming people.

While the Republican candidate for President made a fine statement in which he called for votes on judicial nominations within 60 days, he has not prevailed upon the Senate Republican majority to treat nominees fairly now. Instead of 60 days, we see Judge Helene White's nomination to the Sixth Circuit pending more than 1400 days; Elena Kagan, U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, pending 500 days; Judge James Wynn, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, pending more than 440 days; Kathleen McCree Lewis, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, pending more than 400 days; Enrique Moreno, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, pending more than 400 days; Bonnie Campbell, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, pending more than 240 days; Roger Gregory, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, pending more than 115 days; Lynette Norton, U.S. District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania, pending more than 1300 days; Judge Legrome Davis, U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, pending more than 800 days; Patricia Coan, U.S. District Court for the District of Colorado, pending more than 500 days; Dolly Gee, U.S. District Court for the Central District of California, pending more than 500 days; Rhonda Fields, U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, pending more than 350 days; Linda Riegle, U.S. District Court for the District of Nevada, pending more than 180 days; Ricardo Morado, U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Texas, pending more than 165 days. LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

Now, any Senator can vote against any judicial nominee. They have that right. But I urge them to stand up on the floor of the Senate, where the public knows who they are and where they are, and either vote for or against people. It is not only disingenuous, but I think it is detrimental to our system of justice, and it is a true distortion of what we pledge to do in upholding the Constitution when some block judges by anonymous holds. And then we find that the reason for doing that is in connection with a fundraising and lobbying campaign in which letters were sent out by some group saying, in effect, that if you send this money, we will block judges and we will arrange for you to meet privately with leading elected officials.

That is wrong. That is wrong, Mr. President. It is unprecedented in the 23 years that I have been in the Senate. Nothing like this has ever been allowed by any of the leaders of the Senatenot by Senator Mansfield, not by Senator Byrd, not by Senator Baker, not by Senator Dole, and not by Senator Mitchell. It should not be allowed now. It is wrong, and it undermines the very credibility of the U.S. Senate, and it demeans the U.S. Senate; but, even more importantly, it is destructive of the independence of the judiciary.

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

This politicization, Mr. President, has been extended to include the practice of denying nominees an up or down vote on the Senate floor, or even in the Judiciary Committee. If the majority of the Senate opposes a judicial nominee enough to derail a nomination by an up or down vote, then at least the process has been served. Instead, however, the President's nominees are not even receiving that courtesy from this Senate: Some of the individuals whose nominations are pending before the Judiciary Committee or the full Senate have not been allowed a vote on the floor, much less in committee, for close to 2 years. It is especially troubling that of the 14 nominees who have been held up the longest by the Republican majority in the Senate, 12 are women or minorities.

In fact, how disturbing, how petty, and how shameful: Trying to disqualify an outstanding Hispanic woman judge by an anonymous hold.

I have far more respect for Senators who, for whatever reason, wish to vote against her. Stand up; vote against her. But to have an anonymous hold--an anonymous hold--in the U.S. Senate with 100 Members representing 260 million Americans, which should be the conscience of the Nation, should not be lurking in our cloakrooms anonymously trying to hold up a nominee. If we want to vote against somebody, vote against them. I respect that. State your reasons. I respect that. But don't hold up a qualified judicial nominee.

I was asked last week by Neil Lewis of the New York Times about this circumstance. He correctly reported my response in a front page story this last Saturday. I am offended by this anonymous effort to oppose her prompt confirmation by stealth tactics. Here is a highly qualified Hispanic woman judge who should have been confirmed to help end the crisis in the Second Circuit more than three months ago.

Acting to fill judicial vacancies is a constitutional duty that the Senate--and all of its member--are obligated to fulfill. In its unprecedented slowdown in the handling of nominees in the 104th and 105th Congresses, the Senate is shirking its duty. The Senate majority's choices as they stall Hispanic, women and minority nominees is wrong and should end.

If Senators are opposed to any judge, bring them up and vote against them. But don't do an anonymous hold, which diminishes the credibility and respect of the whole U.S. Senate.

I have had judicial nominations by both Democrat and Republican Presidents that I intended to oppose. But I fought like mad to make sure they at least got a chance to be on the floor for a vote.

I have stated over and over again on this floor that I would refuse to put an anonymous hold on any judge; that I would object and fight against any filibuster on a judge, whether it is somebody I opposed or supported; that I felt the Senate should do its duty.

If we don't like somebody the President nominates, vote him or her down. But don't hold them in this anonymous unconscionable limbo, because in doing that, the minority of Senators really shame all Senators.

That is good advice. That is what this Senate should do, take up these nominations and vote them up or vote them down. I believe that if the Senate were given an opportunity to have a fair vote on the merits of the nomination of Judge Richard Paez or Timothy Dyk or any of the 21 judicial nominations pending on the Senate Executive Calendar, they would be confirmed. Perhaps that is why we are not being allowed to vote.

The Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court has called the number of judicial vacancies "the most immediate problem we face in the federal judiciary." I have urged those who have been stalling the consideration of the President's judicial nominations to reconsider and work to fulfil our constitutional responsibility. Those who delay or prevent the filling of these vacancies must understand that they are harming the administration of justice. Courts cannot try cases, incarcerate the guilty or resolve civil disputes without judges.

I know that some are still playing a political game of payback for the defeat of the nomination of Judge Bork to the Supreme Court and other Republican judicial nomination over the last decade. I remind the Senate that the Senate voted on the Bork nomination and voted on the nomination of Clarence Thomas and did so in each case in less than 15 weeks. To delay judicial nominations for months and years and to deny them a vote is wrong.

I want to share with you a few of the cases that cry out for a Senate vote: Having been voted out of Committee twice, he has now been forced to wait for more than two years for Senate action. This distinguished African-American at least deserves the respect of this

Senate, and he should be allowed a vote, up or down. Senators can stand up and say they will vote for or against him, but let this man have his vote. Twenty-seven months after being nominated, the nomination remains pending before the Senate. I would certainly like to see Justice White be accorded an up or down vote.

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

Today we are not asking for any Senator's vote for any nomination. Instead, I am asking the Senate recognize that its responsibility is to vote on all the judicial nominations on the calendar. We can vote for them or against them, we can vote them up or vote them down, but after 44 months or 27 months or 20 months, after completing every step in what is a long, tortuous confirmation process, the nominations of Judge Richard Paez, Justice Ronnie White and Marsha Berzon are as entitled to a Senate vote as the nomination of Ted Stewart.

In my statement last week I detailed the path that each of these nominees has traveled to the Senate. All are now available for a vote on confirmation by the Senate. All should be accorded an up or down vote.

I hope we will have a chance to vote on them, not just in committee where I have voted for each one of them, but on the floor of the Senate. That is what the Constitution speaks of in our advise and consent capacity. That is what these good and decent people have a right to expect. That is what our oath of office should compel Members to do--to vote for or against. I do not question the judgment or conscience of any man or woman in this Senate if they vote differently than I do, but vote.

I am not asking anybody how they should or should not vote but allow nominees to have a vote. All the people being nominated are extremely highly qualified lawyers and judges. They have to put their lives on hold and the lives of their family on hold while they wait. They are neither fish nor fowl as a nominee. In private practice, all your partners come in and throw a big party and say it is wonderful, we are so proud of you, could you move out of the corner office because we want to take it now. And you cannot do anything while you wait and wait and wait.

Vote them up, vote them down.

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

They have been forced to run some kind of strange in-the-dark gauntlet of Senate confirmations. Those strong enough to work through that secret gauntlet and get reported to the floor are then being dealt the final death blow through a refusal of the Republican leadership to call them up for a vote. They should be called up for a fair vote. They may be defeated--the Republicans are in the majority; there are 55 Republican Senators; they could vote them down. But let them have a fair vote, up or down. Let all Senators have to stand up and vote aye or nay, and be responsible to their constituency to explain why they voted that way. Unfortunately, nominations are being killed through neglect and silence, not defeated by a majority vote.

So I ask, again, for the Senate to fulfill its responsibility to vote on all the judicial nominations on the calendar; vote for them or vote against them. We can vote them up or we can vote them down, but after 44 months or 27 months or 20 months, let us vote.
He has been considered promptly and will be brought up for an up or down vote. There are some on this side of the aisle who oppose him and will vote against him. But every single Democrat, whether they are going to vote against him or for him, should allow him to be voted on and they will. That nomination has been pending 2 months.
I said last week I do not begrudge Ted Stewart a Senate vote. I do not. He is entitled to a vote. He went through the confirmation process. The Senate Judiciary Committee voted him out. It was not a unanimous vote, but he was voted out of the committee, and he is entitled to a vote. If Senators do not want to vote for him, vote against him. If Senators want to vote for him, vote for him. I intend to vote for him. I intend to give the benefit of the doubt both to the President and to the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee who recommended him.
Who is it who is afraid to vote on these nominations? Who is it who is hiding their opposition and obstructing these nominees? Can it be they are such a minority, they know that if it comes to a fair vote, these good men and women will be confirmed?
So rather than to allow a fair vote, they will keep it from coming to a vote. I would bet you that the same people who are holding these nominations back from a vote will go home on the Fourth of July and other holidays and give great speeches about the democracy of this country and how important democracy is and why we have to allow people to vote and express the will of the people--except in the Senate and, apparently, except if you are a minority or a woman.
I have been on the floor of this Senate when we have had Republican Presidents with Republican nominations, saying that they deserve to be brought forward for a vote one way or the other, including a couple instances of nominees I intended to vote against. I still said they deserved a vote. And they got their vote.
What we are currently experiencing is unconscionable and unprecedented, these kinds of delays. I think we hurt the Senate when we do this. We will have Republican Presidents; we will have Democratic Presidents. We will have Republican-controlled Senates; and we will have Democratic-controlled Senates. I have served here twice with the Democrats in control; twice with the Republicans in control. The precedents we establish are important if we are to go into the next century as the kind of body the Senate should be.
Do not let us end this century and this millennium leaving, as guidance for the next century and the next millennium and the next Senate, partisanship that tears at the very fabric, not only of the Senate but of the independence of the Federal judiciary itself. So many judges, judges who are considered conservative, judges who are considered liberal, judges who have had a Republican background or a Democratic background, judges who have been appointed by Republican Presidents, judges who have been appointed by Democratic Presidents, have been united in saying: Stop this. Do not go on with this. Because you are tearing at the very core of our independent judiciary, the most independent judiciary on Earth, a judiciary whose very independence allows us to maintain a balanced country, a country that is the most powerful on Earth, but a country that is also the most free and the most respected democracy. And a main factor guaranteeing that freedom and that democracy is our independent judiciary.

I could not agree more with Chief Justice Rehnquist. We should follow his advice. Let the Republican leadership schedule up-or-down votes on the nominations of Judge Paez and Marsha Berzon so that the Senate can finally act on them. Let us be fair to all. Nominees deserve to be treated with dignity and dispatch, not delayed for 2 and 3 years. We are talking about people going to the Federal judiciary, a third independent branch of Government. They are entitled to dignity and respect. They are not entitled automatically for us to vote aye, but they are entitled to a vote, aye or nay.
They deserve at least that. No nominee gets an automatic "aye" vote, but every nominee ought to be heard and at least voted on one way or the other.

The fact is I don't care who comes up, we don't like some of these people who were put there before, so if you're an extraordinarily well qualified woman, if you're an extraordinarily well-qualified minority or whatever, we're not going to put you on, that doesn't say much for our commitment to the independence of the Judiciary. Bring these people up, vote them up or vote them down.

SEN. PATRICK LEAHY: Well, a lot of times, we keep trying to get a person to at least have a vote, one way or the other, vote them up, vote them down. And we're told that, well, somebody has a concern so they're holding back. We never know who that mysterious somebody is. And yet when this person who is so offensive that we can't bring them to a vote, when after a year or two or three of waiting, they come out for a vote, they get 90 votes or 95 votes out of the 100-member Senate. But what's happened is that one or two Senators anonymously hold somebody back. I think that's wrong. I think that hurts the integrity of the courts, but it also is not a... it does not reflect well in the Senate or on the democratic process.

SEN. PATRICK LEAHY: Having said all that, I think it is time for those who will put these anonymous holds on to be required to come forward and have the votes, allow the committee to work the way we should. On had started to say something earlier, and I think it was going to say if it was left to the two of us, we could move it much faster. I believe that is so. The soon-to-be presidential nominee of the Republican Party has said--and I agree with him--that this is wrong, the Senate ought to vote these people up or down in 60 days. Of course, we could do that. There is a concern that has been expressed--and rightly so--that so many nominees are held without any vote. Nobody votes against them, but nobody gets an opportunity to vote for them; they just sit there. And even though the criticism stings, the fact is that, on average, women and minorities take longer to go through this Senate than white males do. Some women, some minorities have gone through very quickly, but most have taken longer. Some of these people got held up for 2 or 3 or 4 years. When they finally got a vote, they passed overwhelmingly. But for 2 or 3 or 4 years they were humiliated, caused to dangle, have their law practices fall apart, have people question what was going on. Why? Because one or two Senators thought they should be held up. Well, let those one or two Senators vote against them. We are paid to vote yes or no, not maybe. I do not know whether it is because they are women, because they are Hispanic, because they are too liberal, or too conservative, too active, not active enough, that people don't want them to be confirmed. Let them vote against them.

146 Cong. Rec. S 7531, 7/25/00, When There Were 59 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

I mention this because Governor Bush and I, while we disagree on some issues, have one very significant issue on which we agree. He gave a speech awhile back and criticized what has happened in the Senate where confirmations are held up not because somebody votes down a nominee but because they cannot ever get a vote. Governor Bush said: You have the nominee. Hold the hearing. Then, within 60 days, vote them up or vote them down. Don't leave them in limbo.

Frankly, that is what we are paid to do in this body. We are paid to vote either yes or no--not vote maybe. When we hold a nominee up by not allowing them a vote and not taking any action one way or the other, we are not only voting "maybe" but we are doing a terrible disservice to the man or woman to whom we do this. They have to put their life on hold. They do not know what is going to happen: Are they going to be confirmed, or not? It is not like when any one of us runs for election; we know that on a certain day the election occurs. We either win or we lose. But we know that on that Tuesday, we are going to know our fate. We won or we lost.
President Clinton, to his credit, has nominated people who have received higher ratings than any President, Democrat or Republican, in 40 years and they still get held up. He said:
These people are highly qualified, which leads to only one conclusion, that the appointments process has been politicized in the hope of getting appointees ultimately to the bench who will be more political. That is wrong. It is a denial of justice.
President Clinton is right. We should move forward with these nominees. Let them have a vote. Don't do this in the dark of the night holding people up.

146 Cong. Rec. S 9671, 10/3/00, When There Were 66 Vacancies

I have said on the floor, although we are different parties, I have agreed with Gov. George Bush, who has said that in the Senate a nominee ought to get a vote, up or down, within 60 days. I urge in the time remaining in this session that he, as the head of his party, as their Presidential nominee, call the Republican leader of the Senate and say that all of these women, all of these minorities, in fact, all of the people who have been sitting here for well over 60 days waiting for a vote on their nomination, let them have a vote. Vote for them or vote against them. Bonnie Campbell deserves a vote. My guess is the reason she has not been brought for a vote is they know at least 80 of the 100 Senators would vote for her. It would be impossible to justify a vote against her because of her extraordinary qualifications.
Again, if Governor Bush is serious when he says have a vote within 60 days, pick up the phone, call the Senate majority leader, reach him at the switchboard, 202-224-3121, and ask him to bring her to a vote. It is a very easy thing to do.
Again I say if Governor Bush means it, pick up the phone and call 202-224-3121; ask the Senate switchboard to connect him to the Republican leader and say: You know, I have made it a tenet of my campaign that the Senate should vote on a nomination within 60 days. You can bring every one of these people to the floor for a vote, up or down, today. Let's do so. Who knows. We will find out how the Senate feels about them. Are they for them or are they against them? Right now, instead of voting yes or no, we vote "maybe," by having one or two Senators in the dark of night put holds on these people.

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES ENTITLED TO A HEARING

It is discouraging to once again have to call attention to the fact that some 40 nominees are pending before the Judiciary Committeenominees who have yet to be accorded even a hearing during this Congress.

143 Cong. Rec. S 8504, 7/31/97, When There Were 100 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES ENTITLED TO A HEARING

We are not doing our job. We are not being responsible. We are being dishonest, condescending, and arrogant toward the judiciary. It deserves better and the American people deserve better.

In spite of our efforts last year in the aftermath of strong criticism from the Chief Justice of the United States, the vacancies facing the federal judiciary are, again, approximately 70 and the vacancies gap is not being closed. We have more federal judicial vacancies extending longer and affecting more people. Judicial vacancies now stand at over 8 percent of the federal judiciary. If one considers the additional judges recommended by the Judicial Conference, the vacancies' rate would be over 15 percent.

Nominees deserve to be treated with dignity and dispatch--not delayed for two and three years. We are seeing outstanding nominees nitpicked and delayed to the point that good women and men are being deterred from seeking to serve as federal judges. Nominees practicing law see their work put on hold while they await the outcome of their nominations. Their families cannot plan.

145 Cong. Rec. S 10544, 9/8/99, When There Were 68 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES ENTITLED TO A HEARING

Acting to fill judicial vacancies is a constitutional duty that the Senate--and all of its members--are obligated to fulfill. In its unprecedented slowdown in the handling of nominees since the 104th Congress, the Senate is shirking its duty. That is wrong and should end. The Senate recesses with a sorry record of inaction on judicial nominations.

145 Cong. Rec. S 11014, 9/16/99, When There Were 68 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES ENTITLED TO A HEARING

I have urged the Senate time and time again to fulfill our responsibilities. I wish we would do this, take a couple days less vacation time, work a few afternoons, and confirm the judges that we need around the country.

In fact, I may be doing a disservice to these major-leaguers by comparing them to the Senate. Why? Because these ballplayers are acting professionally and doing what they are paid to do. We are not acting professionally. We are not fulfilling our constitutional responsibilities. We are not doing what we are paid to do. We are refusing to vote yes or no on these judges.

REV_00255849

LEAHY, PATRICK on NOMINEES ENTITLED TO A HEARING

The Constitution empowers the President to nominate officers of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate. That is clear-cut, straightforward language. It does not empower anyone to mm the process into a protracted ordeal of unreasonable delay and unrelenting investigation. Yet somewhere along the way, that is what Senate confirmations became - lengthy, partisan, and unpleasant. That has done enough harm, injured too many good people, and it must not happen again.

He proposed that Presidential nominations be acted upon by the Senate within 60 days. Of the 42 judicial nominations currently pending, 26 have already been pending for more than 60 days without Senate action. Already this Congress, 78 nominees, including 52 eventually confirmed, have had to wait longer than 60 days for Senate action. I urge the Senate to do better.

With 20 vacancies on the federal appellate courts across the country and nearly half of the total judicial emergency vacancies in the federal courts system in our appellate courts, our courts of appeals are being denied the resources that they need, and their ability to administer justice for the American people is being hurt. There continue to be multiple vacancies on the Ninth Circuit. I am likewise concerned that the Fourth, Sixth and District of Columbia Circuits are suffering from multiple vacancies.I continue to urge the Senate to meet our responsibilities to all nominees, including women and minorities, and look forward to action on the nominations of Judge James Wynn, Jr. to the Fourth Circuit, Enrique Moreno to the Fifth Circuit, and Kathleen McCree Lewis to the Sixth Circuit. Working together, the Senate can join with the President to confirm well-qualified, diverse and fair-minded judges to fulfill the needs of the federal courts around the country.

Having begun so slowly in the first five months of this year, we have much more to do before the Senate takes its final action on,judicial nominees this year. We should be considering 20 to 40 more judges this year. Having begun so slowly, we cannot afford to follow the "Thurmond rule" and stop acting on these nominees at the end of the summer in anticipation of the presidential election. We must use all the time until adjournment to remedy the vacancies that have been perpetuated on the courts to the detriment of the American people and the administration of justice. I urge all Senators to make the federal administration of justice a top priority for the Senate for the rest of this year.

LEAHY, PATRICK on ONE "BAD RULING"

Those of us who have tried a lot of cases know that sometimes cases do not turn out the way you want. That is why you have appellate courts. Sometimes judges rule in a way that you just cannot understand. But I am not going to condemn President Reagan's appointees as judges and President Bush's appointees as judges, or President Reagan or President Bush, because of a few aberrations, decisions about which I do not know all the facts and in connection with which I have not reviewed all the evidence. I would not do this and no one else should try, in a political year, to condemn President Clinton, who I must say has appointed some darned good men and women to the judiciary-just as President Bush appointed some darned good men and women to the judiciary, and President Reagan did, and President Carter did, and President Ford did. All of these Presidents have appointed judges on whom I had the opportunity to vote.

LEAHY, PATRICK on ONE "BAD RULING"

It is sad that this effort is premised on the slanted portrayal of decisions, many of which were decided by judges appointed by President Bush. I have spoken before about the dangers of characterizing isolated decisions to stir up anger against the judiciary just so that somebody can get shortterm monetary and political gain. It is not worth the price to try to destroy one of our independent branches of Government and the most independent and effective judiciary in the world.

LEAHY, PATRICK on ONE "BAD RULING"

I have noted before the respect I have for our colleague from Philadelphia and for his experience and judgment both as a prosecutor and as a Senator. Senator Specter has been a steadfast supporter of Judge Massiah-Jackson. He has done the work to evaluate the criticism of her record. He has looked at the trial records and the Philadelphia Bar Association report and compared the criticism to the facts. He knows the circumstances in Philadelphia that form the backdrop for the criticism of this nominee's record from local prosecutors and police. My own review of the cases leads me to the same conclusions that he has drawn: Prosecutors were disappointed in a number of her rulings but she had a basis in the record for the great majority of her orders. She

LEAHY, PATRICK on SENIOR JUDGES

Also at our last executive business session, my friend from Utah, the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said there is and has been no judicial vacancy crisis. That is a bold statement considering there are 67 current vacancies in courts and emergency situations, including the Fifth Circuit. If we pass the bill that has been requested by the nonpartisan judicial conference, we would have another 7 or more judicial vacancies, so we would have over 150 judicial vacancies.

The chairman went on to say that since 363 senior judges are now serving in the federal judiciary the true number of vacancies is "less than zero." While it is true that there are 363 senior judges now serving, it is inaccurate to say that the true number of vacancies is less than zero.

I commend the large number of senior judges for coming in to help out and fill in. Some of them are well into their eighties. But that is not the way it should be. Surely, if we didn't have these senior judges, the courts would collapse under the weight of their own caseloads and the extended and extensive vacancies.

146 Cong. Rec. S 9671, 10/3/00, When There Were 66 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on SENIOR JUDGES

The extraordinary service that has been provided by our corps of senior judges does not mean there are no vacancies. In the federal courts around the country there remain 66 current vacancies and 12 more on the horizon. With the judgeships included in the Hatch-Leahy Federal Judgeship Act of 2000, there would be over 135 vacancies across the country. That is the truer measure of vacancies, many of which have been long-standing judicial emergency vacancies in our southwest border states. The Chief Judges of both the Fifth and Sixth Circuits have had to declare their entire courts in emergencies since there are too many vacancies and too few Circuit judges to handle their workload.

LEAHY, PATRICK on TESTS FOR JUDICIAL FITNESS

We can joke about it, but it is not a joking matter. We have people with their lives on hold. When the President asks some man or woman to take a Federal courtship, their entire practice is put on holdit is kind of a good news/bad news situation. The President calls up and says, "I've got good news for you. I'm going to nominate you for the Federal bench. Now I have bad news for you. I'm going to nominate you for the Federal bench." He or she finds their law practice basically stops on the date of that nomination. They cannot bring on new clients.

Their partners give him or her a big party and say, "Please move out of your office," because they know it is going to take a year or 2 or 3 to get through the confirmation process.

This is partisanship of an unprecedented nature. I have spoken twice on this floor today on what happens when we forget the normal traditions of the Senate. Traditionallycertainly not in my lifetime no Democratic majority leader or Republican majority leader of the Senate would bring up a resolution for a vote directly attacking the President of the United Statesdirectly or indirectly attacking the President of the United Stateson a day when the President is heading off to a summit with other world leaders, especially with the leader of the other nuclear superpower, Russia. Yet, that tradition, which, as I said, has existed my whole lifetime, was broken today.

The other thing is that no matter which party controls the Senate, no matter what party controls the Presidency, we have always worked together so that the President, having been elected, can, subject to normalnormaladvise and consent, can appoint the judges he wants. And that tradition has been broken. If we are going to go against these basic tenets of bipartisanship, then the Senate will not be the conscience of the Nation that it should be. The Senate will suffer. And if the Senate suffers, the country suffers.

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS

"We are approaching a real crisis," Leahy said Thursday. "We must begin to fulfill our responsibilities to the third, co-equal branch of our federal government and quit acting for narrow ideological or partisan purposes."

Chattanooga Free Press, 1/25/97, When There Were 83 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS

Mr. Leahy has signaled in recent Judiciary Committee meetings that he will press for quick confirmation of nominees, saying that the Republicans slowed down the confirmation process last year because a Presidential election was coming and they wanted to preserve any vacancies in case they captured the White House. Last year, for the first time in this century, the Senate did not confirm any judges for the appeals courts, the level just below the Supreme Court, and only 17 district court judges were confirmed, a record Mr. Leahy has said is abysmal.

"We are approaching a real crisis" in terms of the backlog of cases in the courts, he said.

New York Times, 2/9/97, When There Were 90 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS

This is the first hearing of the 105th Congress on nominees to a few of the nearly 100 vacancies that are creating a crisis for the federal judiciary. In the past, this Committee has not had to wait until after the Ides of March for our first confirmation hearing. We have already fallen behind the pace established by Chairman Hatch and Chairman Thurmond in the 104th and 97th Congresses.

The district courts hear federal criminal cases as well as other trials, and we are now risking not having enough judges to hear the cases necessary to put criminals behind bars, where they belong. Having a civil case tried in Federal court is becoming an increasingly expensive and time-consuming process as our overworked Federal judges give priority to criminal matters.

The Senate is not fulfilling its constitutional responsibility, it is interfering with the President's authority to appoint federal judges, and branch for political gain. This is a scandal in the making. It is high time for the Senate to do its duty and consider and confirm judges to the vacancies that have persisted for far too long.

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS

Mr. President, for the past several months I have spoken about the crisis being created by the almost 100 vacancies that are being perpetuated on the federal courts around the country and the failure of the Senate to carry out its constitutional responsibilities to advise and consent to judicial confirmations.

REV_00255855

This district in Texas is only one example of crisis that affects the entire country. We could find similar backlog problems in district courts in California, Florida, and other States that are swamped with rising cases and unfilled judicial vacancies. Yesterday, I met with members of the Federal Judges Association who are very concerned about the growing backlogs and rising caseloads in Federal courts across the Nation.

143 Cong. Rec. S 4580, 5/15/97, When There Were 99 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS

Mr. President, last week I spoke at some length about the crisis being created by our failure to move forward expeditiously to fill longstanding judicial vacancies. This week, we have the opportunity to double our confirmations by taking up and approving the five judicial nominees on the Senate Executive Calendar. As the Senate approaches its fifth extended recess, it have found time to confirm only five federal judges of the 38 nominees the President has sent to us. That is less than one judge per month.

I have spoken often about the crisis being created by the 100 vacancies that are being perpetuated on the federal courts around the country, as has the Chief Justice of the United States. At the rate that we are currently going, more and more vacancies are continuing to mount over longer and longer times to the detriment of greater numbers of Americans and the national cause of prompt justice.

As I have said before, it should not take more than 4 months to consider a judicial nominee and the Gold nomination and its treatment should serve as the standard by which we measure the Senate's treatment of other nominees. Although it should represent the normal process, it is the exception this year.

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS

I have spoken often about the crisis being created by the 103 vacancies that are being perpetuated on the federal courts around the country. At the rate that we are currently going this year, more and more vacancies are continuing to mount over longer and longer times to the detriment of greater numbers of Americans and the national cause of prompt justice. We are not even keeping up with attrition.

In July I received a copy of a letter sent to President Clinton and the Republican leader of the Senate by seven presidents of national legal associations. These presidents note the "looming crisis in the Nation brought on by the extraordinary number of vacant federal judicial positions" and the "injustice of this situation for all of society." They point to " d angerously crowded dockets, pended civil case dockets, burgeoning criminal caseloads, overburdened judges, and chronically undermanned courts" as circumstances that "undermine our democracy and respect for the supremacy of law." I agree with these distinguished leaders that we must without further delay "devote the time and resources necessary to expedite the selection and confirmation process for federal judicial nominees." The President is doing his part, having sent us 61 nominations so far this year with more on the way. The Senate should start doing its part.

143 Cong. Rec. S 8819, 9/4/97, When There Were 97 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS

I have spoken often about the crisis being created by the vacancies that are being perpetuated on the federal courts around the country. At the rate that we are going, we are not keeping up with attrition. When we adjourned last Congress there were 64 vacancies on the federal bench. After the confirmation of 15 judges in 9 months, there has been a net increase of 33 vacancies. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court has called the rising number of vacancies "the most immediate problem we face in the federal judiciary."

143 Cong. Rec. S 9163, 9/11/97, When There Were 97 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS

Mr. President, I think it is regrettable that this week the Senate has failed to consider and confirm judges necessary to fill vacancies that are leading to a crisis in the federal courts. Instead, this is going to be remembered as the week that the Republican leadership in the House and the Republican leadership in the Senate talked openly about seeking to intimidate their word to intimidate the federal judiciary.

143 Cong. Rec. S 9723, 9/19/97, When There Were 97 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS

Those who delay or prevent the filling of these vacancies must understand that they are delaying or preventing the administration of justice. We can pass all the crime bills we want, but you cannot try the cases and incarcerate the guilty if you do not have judges. The mounting backlogs of civil and criminal cases in the dozens of emergency districts, in particular, are growing taller by the day. National Public Radio broadcast a series of reports all lasts week on the judicial crises and quoted the Chief Judge and U.S. Attorney from San Diego earlier this week to the effect that criminal matters are being affected.

I have spoken about the crisis being created by the vacancies that are being perpetuated on the federal courts around the country. At the rate that we are going, we are not keeping up with attrition. When we adjourned last Congress there were 64 vacancies on the federal bench. After the confirmation of 18 judges in nine months, there has been a net increase of 30 vacancies, an increase of almost 50 percent in the number of federal judicial vacancies.

The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court has called the rising number of vacancies "the most immediate problem we face in the federal judiciary." Chairman Hatch has said that we can do better. I agree with them and add that we must do better. I have urged those who have been stalling the consideration of these fine women and men to reconsider their action and work with us to have the Committee and the Senate fulfill its constitutional responsibility.

This weekend the President of the United States devoted his national radio address to the threat being posed to our judicial system by those who are intent on partisan and ideological intimidation of federal judges. I ask that a copy of the President's Radio Address on Judicial Nominations from September 26, 1997, be included in the record.

In light of all of this, I was surprised to read the remarks of the distinguished Chairman of the Judiciary Committee in response to the President of the United States in the Record for September 29. The Senator from Utah referred to myths and distortions, but I do not believe that he could have been referring to the statement by the President. The President spoke the truth. There is a vacancy crisis in the federal judiciary and there is a Republican slowdown of judicial confirmations.

More recently, the Chief Justice termed the rising number of vacancies on the Federal bench "the most immediate problem we face in the federal judiciary." This is hardly a partisan statement but a recognition of the seriousness of the crisis posed by judicial vacancies.

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS

The mounting backlogs of civil and criminal cases in the dozens of emergency districts, in particular, are growing more critical by the day. This is especially true in the Central and Southern District Courts of Illinois, where these outstanding nominees will serve once they are confirmed. Indeed, in the Southern District of Illinois, where Pat Murphy will serve if his nomination is ever voted on by the full Senate, Chief Judge Gilbert has reported that his docket has been so burdened with criminal cases that he went for a year without having a hearing in a civil case. In 1996, 88 percent of the cases filed in all federal trial courts were civil, while 12 percent were criminal. But in the Southern District of Illinois, not one of those civil cases was heard by Chief Judge Gilbert.

I have urged those who have been stalling the consideration of the President's judicial nominations to reconsider and to work with us to have the Judiciary Committee and the Senate fulfill its constitutional responsibility. Those who delay or prevent the filling of these vacancies must understand that they are delaying or preventing the administration of justice. Courts cannot try cases, incarcerate the guilty or resolve civil disputes without judges.

Nine months should be more than a sufficient time for the Senate to complete its review of these nominees. During the four years of the Bush Administration, only three confirmations took as long as nine months. Last year, 10 of the 36 judges confirmed took nine months or more and many took as long as a year and one-half. So far this year, Judge Ann Aiken, Judge Margaret Morrow, and Judge Hilda Tagle have taken 21 months, 26 months and 31 months respectively. Margaret McKeown's nomination has already been pending for 24 months. Judge Sotomayor's nomination has already been pending for 9 months. Pat Murphy's and Judge McCuskey's nominations have already been pending for 8 months. The average number of days to consider nominees used to be between 50 and 90, it rose last year to over 200 and this year stands at over 300 days from nomination to confirmation. That is too long and does a disservice to our Federal Courts.

144 Cong. Rec. S 2696, 3/27/98, When There Were 82 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS

The numerous, longstanding vacancies in some courts are harming the federal administration of justice. The people in these districts and circuits need additional federal judges. Indeed the Judicial Conference of the United States recommends that in addition to filling the current vacancies, the Congress should authorize 53 additional judgeships throughout the country, as set forth in S. 678, the Federal Judgeship Act that I introduced in May 1997. That indicates that the work demands of the federal judiciary justify 133 additional judges. There is a clamor for us to fill these vacancies and there is harm by the Senate's delay and failure to do so.

I hope that the Judiciary Committee and the Senate will proceed to consider and confirm judicial nominees more promptly and without the months of delay that now accompany so many nominations. I hope the Committee will not delay in scheduling the additional hearings we need to hold to consider the fine men and women whom the President has nominated to fill these important positions.

144 Cong. Rec. S 7238, 6/26/98, When There Were 72 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS

In order to understand why a judicial vacancy crisis is plaguing so many federal courts, we need only recall how unproductive the Republican Senate has been over the last three years. More and more of the vacancies are judicial emergencies that have been left vacant for longer periods of time. The President has sent the Senate qualified nominees for 23 of the current judicial emergency vacancies, 15 of those nominations that are still pending as the Senate prepares to adjourn.

144 Cong. Rec. S 12964, 10/21/98, When There Were 70 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS

The Republican-controlled Senate confirmed 65 of U.S. President Bill Clinton's nominees to be federal judges this year, but Democrats still complained about the pace of confirmations. Partisan foot-dragging is putting a further strain on short-staffed federal courtrooms already overloaded with cases, senator patrick leahy, a democrat, said wednesday as the senate confirmed 17 judges shortly before adjourning for the year. Fifty of the government's 834 federal judgeships remain vacant, Leahy said. "In order to understand why a judicial vacancy crisis is plaguing so many federal courts, we need only recall how unproductive the Republican Senate has been over the past three years," he said in a statement. "at each step of the process, judicial nominations are being delayed and stalled." Republicans insist there is no partisan slowdown. "This Congress has taken steps to significantly reduce the federal judicial vacancy rate to its lowest rate in almost a decade," said Senator Orrin Hatch, a Republican and Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. the committee takes the first look at Presidential nominations and votes whether to reject them or to send them to the Senate for a vote. However, Attorney General Janet Reno thanked Leahy and Hatch for speedy work at the close of the Congressional session. "We intend to work very hard to begin the 106th Congress with as many candidates for nomination as possible, so that we can continue to work with the Senate to ensure a full bench," Reno said at her weekly news conference.

Xinhua News Agency, 10/22/98, When There Were 70 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS

The Judicial Conference of the United States has recommended that Congress authorize an additional 69 judgeships, in order for the federal courts to have the judicial resources they need to do the justice. These are in addition to the 67 current vacancies. That means that the federal courts need the equivalent of 136 more judges. I cannot remember a time when the resource needs of the federal courts were so neglected by the Congress.

During the four years that the Republican majority has controlled the Senate, it has barely kept up with attrition when it comes to judicial vacancies. Even with the confirmations achieved last year, the current vacancies number as many as existed at the time the Senate recessed in 1994. The Senate has not made the progress it should have in filling the longstanding vacancies that continue to plague the federal judiciary. The Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court and others continue to speak of the problem of too few judges and too much work. In 1997 the Chief Justice noted: "Vacancies cannot remain at such high levels indefinitely without eroding the quality of justice that traditionally has been associated with the federal judiciary."

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS (APPELLATE COURTS)

Today, the Senate Judiciary Committee has an opportunity to move forward on nominations to two Courts of Appeal that are feeling the devastating effects of the slowdown in judicial confirmations by the Republican Senate over the last three years. Professor William A. Fletcher is himself a victim of these efforts. Just this week a column by Anthony Lewis in the New York Times and an editorial in the Washington Post each focussed on the ordeal that this fine person has had to endure as some play politics with the administration of justice and demagogue the judiciary.

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS (APPELLATE COURTS)

Indeed, earlier this year I proposed a bill that requires the Senate to vote on nominations for Court of Appeals vacancies that created an emergency under federal law. The week after Chief Judge Winter of the Second Circuit certified such an emergency last spring, I introduced the Judicial Emergency Responsibility Act, S. 1906. The purpose of this bill is to supplement the law by which Chief Justice Winter certified the judicial emergency, a judicial emergency that still persists in the Second Circuit, and to require the Senate to do its duty and to act on judicial nominations before it recesses for significant stretches of time. The Senate should not be taking vacations when a Circuit Court is suffering from a vacancy emergency.

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS (APPELLATE COURTS)

Both the Second Circuit and the Ninth Circuit have had to cancel hearings over the past couple of years due to judicial vacancies. The Second Circuit has had to declare a circuit emergency and to proceed with only one circuit judge on their three-judge panels. The New York Times ran a front-page story recently on how the crushing workload in the Federal appellate courts has lead to what the Times called a "two-tier system" for appeals. In testimony and statements over the last few years, I have seen Chief Judge Winter and former Chief Judge Newman of the Second Circuit, Chief Judge Hug and Judge Trott of the Ninth Circuit and Chief Judge Hatchett of the Eleventh Circuit all warn of the problem of too few judges and too much work. I deeply regret that these twin problems have combined to lead to the perception that the federal appellate courts can no longer provide the same attention to individual cases that has marked the federal administration of justice in the past.

appellate courts have had to forgo oral argument in more and more cases. Litigants are being denied any opportunity to see the judges who are deciding their causes. Law clerks and attorney staff are being used more and more extensively in the determination of cases as backlogs grow. As caseloads grow, bureaucratic imperatives seem to be replacing the administration of justice. These are not the ways to engender confidence in our system of justice, acceptance of the judicial process, support for the decisions being rendered or respect for courts. Congress needs to support the judicial branch with the judges and other resources it needs.

145 Cong. Rec. S 3670, 4/14/99, When There Were 65 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS (APPELLATE COURTS)

The vacancies on the courts of appeals around the country are particularly acute. The Ninth Circuit continues to be plagued by multiple vacancies. I am glad to see Mr. Tallman included in this hearing. We should also be making progress on the nominations of Barry Goode, Judge Johnnie B. Rawlinson and James E. Duffy, Jr. Representing the State of Vermont, I am acutely aware that there is no one on the Ninth Circuit from the State of Hawaii. I know that federal law requires that "there be at least one circuit judge in regular active service appointed from the residents of each state in that circuit," 28 U.S.C. 44(c), and would like to see us proceed to confirm each of these outstanding nominees.

The Fifth Circuit continues to labor under a circuit emergency declared last year by its Chief Judge. We should be moving the nominations of Alston Johnson and Enrique Moreno to that Circuit to help it meet its responsibilities.

This week I received a copy of a letter from the Chief Judge of the Sixth Circuit concerning the multiple vacancies plaguing that Circuit. Chief Judge Merritt was disturbed by a report that this Committee would not be moving any nominees for the Sixth Circuit this year. He wrote:

The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals now has four vacancies. Twenty-five percent of the seats on the Sixth Circuit are vacant. The Court is hurting badly and will not be able to keep up with its work load due to the fact that the Senate Judiciary Committee has acted on none of the nominations to our Court. One of the vacancies is five years old and no vote has ever been taken. One is two years old. We have lost many years of judge time because of the vacancies.

By the time the next President is inaugurated, there will be six vacancies on the Court of Appeals. Almost half of the Court will be vacant and will remain so for most of 2001 due to the exigencies of the nomination process. Although the President has nominated candidates, the Senate has refused to take a vote on any of them.

REV_00255863

The Founding Fathers certainly intended that the Senate "advise" as to judicial nomination, i.e., consider, debate and vote up or down. They surely did not intend that the Senate, for partisan or factional reasons, would remain silent and simply refuse to give any advice or consider and vote at all, thereby leaving the courts in limbo, understaffed and unable properly to carry out their responsibilities for years.

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS (APPELLATE COURTS)

The vacancies on the courts of appeals around the country are particularly acute. Vacancies on the courts of appeals are continuing to rob these courts of approximately 12.3 percent of their authorized active strength, as they have for the last several years. The Ninth Circuit continues to be plagued by multiple vacancies. We should be making progress on the nominations of Barry Goode, Judge Johnnie B. Rawlinson and James E. Duffy, Jr., as well as that of Richard Tallman.

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS (APPELLATE COURTS)

The vacancies on the courts of appeals around the country are particularly acute. Vacancies on the courts of appeals are continuing to rob these courts of more than 12 percent of their authorized active strength, as they have for the last several years. The Fourth Circuit, the Fifth Circuit, the Sixth Circuit, the Ninth Circuit, the Tenth Circuit and the District of Columbia Circuit continue to have multiple vacancies.

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS (APPELLATE COURTS)

Especially troubling is the vacancy rate on the courts of appeals, which continues at over 11 percent (20 out of 179) without the creation of any of the additional judgeships that those courts need to handle their increased workloads.

Most troubling is the circuit emergency that had to be declared more than seven months ago by the Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. I recall when the Second Circuit had such an emergency two years ago. Along with the other Senators representing States from the Circuit, I worked hard to fill the five vacancies then plaguing my circuit. The situation in the Fifth Circuit is not one that we should tolerate; it is a situation that I wished we had confronted by expediting consideration of the nominations of Alston Johnson and Enrique Moreno last year. I still hope that the Senate will consider both this year.

With 20 vacancies on the federal appellate courts across the country and nearly half of the total judicial emergency vacancies in the federal courts system in our appellate courts, our courts of appeals are being denied the resources that they need, and their ability to administer justice for the American people is being hurt. There continue to be multiple vacancies on the Ninth Circuit. Three vacancies is too many and perpetuating these four judicial emergency vacancies, as the Senate has in this one circuit, is irresponsible. We should act on these nominations promptly and provide the Ninth Circuit with the judicial resources it needs and to which it is entitled.

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS (APPELLATE COURTS)

The Constitution empowers the president to nominate officers of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate. That is clear-cut, straight-forward language. It does not empower anyone to "mmm" the process into a protracted ordeal of unreasonable delay and unrelenting investigation. Yet somewhere along the way, that is what Senate confirmations became - lengthy, partisan, and unpleasant. That has done enough harm, injured too many good people, and it must not happen again.

REV_00255865

He proposed that presidential nominations be acted upon by the Senate within 60 days. Of the 42 judicial nominations currently pending, 26 have already been pending for more than 60 days without Senate action. Already this Congress 78 nominees, including 52 eventually confirmed, have had to wait longer than 60 days for Senate action. I urge the Senate to do better.

With 20 vacancies on the federal appellate courts across the country and nearly half of the total judicial emergency vacancies in the federal courts system in our appellate courts, our courts of appeals are being denied the resources that they need, and their ability to administer justice for the American people is being hurt. There continue to be multiple vacancies on the Ninth Circuit. I am likewise concerned that the Fourth, Sixth and District of Columbia Circuits are suffering from multiple vacancies.I continue to urge the Senate to meet our responsibilities to all nominees, including women and minorities, and look forward to action on the nominations of Judge James Wynn, Jr. to the Fourth Circuit, Enrique Moreno to the Fifth Circuit, and Kathleen McCree Lewis to the Sixth Circuit. Working together the Senate can join with the President to confirm well-qualified, diverse and fair-minded judges to fulfill the needs of the federal courts around the country.

Having begun so slowly in the first five months of this year, we have much more to do before the Senate takes its final action on,judicial nominees this year. We should be considering 20 to 40 more judges this year. Having begun so slowly, we cannot afford to follow the "Thurmond rule" and stop acting on these nominees at the end of the summer in anticipation of the Presidential election. We must use all the time until adjournment to remedy the vacancies that have been perpetuated on the courts to the detriment of the American people and the administration of justice. I urge all Senators to make the federal administration of justice a top priority for the Senate for the rest of this year.

LEAHY, PATRICK on VACANCY CRISIS (APPELLATE COURTS)

With 21 vacancies on the federal appellate courts across the country, and nearly half of the total judicial emergency vacancies in the federal courts system in our appellate courts, our courts of appeals are being denied the resources that they need. Their ability to administer justice for the American people is being hurt. There continue to be multiple vacancies on the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Ninth, Tenth and District of Columbia Circuits. The vacancy rate for our courts of appeals is more than 11 percent nationwide - and that does not begin to take into account the additional judgeships requested by the Judicial Conference to handle their increased workloads. If we added the 11 additional appellate judges being requested, the vacancy rate would be 16 percent. Still, not a single qualified candidate for one of these vacancies on our federal appellate courts is being heard today. At our first Executive Business Meeting of the year, I noted the opportunity we had to make bipartisan strides toward easing the vacancy crisis in our nation's federal courts. I believed that a confirmation total of 65 by the end of the year was achievable if we made the effort, exhibited the commitment, and did the work that was needed to be done. I urged that we proceed promptly with confirmations of a number of outstanding nominations to the Court of Appeals, including qualified minority and women candidates. Unfortunately, that is not what has happened. Just as there was no appellate court nominee included in the April confirmation hearing, there is no appellate court nominee included today. Indeed, this Committee has not reported a nomination to a Court of Appeals vacancy since April 12, and it has reported only two all year. The Committee has yet to report the nomination of Allen Snyder to the District of Columbia Circuit, although his hearing was eight weeks ago; the nomination of Bonnie Campbell to the Eighth Circuit, although her hearing was six weeks ago; or the nomination of Judge Johnnie Rawlinson, although her hearing was four weeks ago.

We cannot afford to follow the "Thurmond Rule" and stop acting on these nominees now in anticipation of the Presidential election in November. We must use all the time until adjournment to remedy the vacancies that have been perpetuated on the courts to the detriment of the American people and the administration of justice.

LEAHY, PATRICK on X NUMBER OF VACANCIES IS TOO MANY

For purposes of perspective, let us also recall that by August 1992, during the last year of the President Bush's term, a Democratic majority in the Senate had confirmed 53 of the 65 nominees sent to us by a Republican President. That, too, is a far cry from this year's 15 out of 65.

143 Cong. Rec. S 9163, 9/11/97, When There Were 97 Vacancies

LEAHY, PATRICK on X NUMBER OF VACANCIES IS TOO MANY

Mr. President, today there are 82 vacancies among the federal judiciary. We can see another 15 vacancies on the horizon. If we confirm Jeremy Fogel to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California in a vote this evening, then we will have confirmed 11 judges so far this year. That is less than four a month. When you know that you have close to 100 vacancies, 4 a month doesn't cut it. The President spoke to this issue; the Chief Justice spoke to it.

The Senate can do a better job.

Mr. President, I am sorry I was not on the Senate floor to hear Chairman Hatch earlier this afternoon. 142 Cong. Rec. S 12289, 10/3/96, When There Were 62 Vacancies

BIDEN, JOSEPH on DC CIRCUIT

Mr. President, 2 of the 12 seats on the District of Columbia Court of Appeals are currently vacant. Some have argued that the vacancy to which Merrick Garland has been nominated should not be filled because the D.C. circuit is overstaffed. But the reasons Congress gave for approving 12 seats for the D.C. circuit remain compelling today and justify filling this vacancy.

The D.C. circuit needs 12 judges to handle its complex caseload. A large portion of the D.C. circuit caseload consists of complex administrative appeals which generally consume a larger amount of judicial resources than other appellate cases. Therefore, comparison of raw caseload data between the D.C. circuit, with its high percentage of complex administrative cases, and the other circuits is misleading. According to the statistics provided by the Administrative Office of U.S. Courts for the period from September 30, 1995 to September 30, 1996, 1,347 cases were filed in the D.C. circuit, 474 of whichor 35.2 percentwere administrative appeals. In contrast, in the remaining 11 circuits, of the 51,991 cases filed, only 2,827or 5.4 percentwere administrative appeals.

The D.C. circuit has a long time interval between filing a notice of appeal and final disposition. Because the D.C. circuit has this incredibly high percentage of administrative appeals relative to the other circuits and because these types of cases require tremendous amounts of judicial resources, litigants in the D.C. circuit must wait an average of 12 months between the filing of the notice of appeal and final disposition. Only 3 of the 12 circuits have a longer average for this time frame.
The fact that the D.C. circuit has a long time interval between filing and disposition is indicative of the complex cases that the circuit handles. Other circuits have more criminal appeals and gardenvariety diversity cases that often are amenable to summary disposition without oral argument.

The D.C. circuit has fewer pro se appeals than other circuits. In addition to having fewer criminal appeals and diversity cases, the D.C. circuit has a lower percentage of pro se mandamus cases than all other circuits. Chief Judge Edwards has noted that pro se appeals are often frivolous, easily identified as lacking merit, or otherwise amenable to disposition without significant expenditure of judicial resources.

The D.C. circuit has more cases of national importance than other circuits. Not only are complex administrative appeals commonly heard in the D.C. circuit, but as a result of its location at the seat of the Federal Government, the D.C. circuit also hears a disproportionate number of the highprofile cases of national importance that reach the U.S. Courts of Appeals. The D.C. circuit decided in 1996 alone National Treasury Employees Union versus United States of America, a challenge to the constitutionality of the LineItem Veto Act, as well as Perot versus Federal Election Commission, an appeal from a district court's rejection of Ross Perot's attempt to participate in last year's Presidential debates.

The same reasons that supported the creation of a 12 judgeship for the D.C. circuit in 1984 justify its existence now. If reasoned deliberation and study of this circuit leads to the conclusion that a future vacancy should not be filled, then we should address that issue, but not within the context of this nomination. If ad hoc analysis becomes our mode of operation, we will give the appearance of a politicized judiciary.

BIDEN, JOSEPH on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

My reading of the Constitution, though, is the Judiciary Committee is not mentioned in the Constitution. The Judiciary Committee is not mentioned. The Senate is. We only in the Judiciary Committee have the right to give advice to the Senate, but it is the Senate that gives its advice and consent on judicial nominations. . . .

It is totally appropriate for Republicans to reject every single nominee if they want to. That is within their right. But it is not, I will respectfully request, Madam President, appropriate not to have hearings on them, not to bring them to the floor and not to allow a vote, and it is not appropriate to insist that we, the Senators--we, the Senators--get to tell the President who he must nominate if it is not in line with the last 200 years of tradition.

BIDEN, JOSEPH on BLUE SLIPS

The third point my friend raised was the point about consultation. It is true that I do believe, and I have told this President as well, that I think the President -- not the President personally, but the administration -- should consult with Senators when they are nominating a judicial nominee from that Senator's State, for two reasons: One, out of courtesy; and, two, that Senator may have important information relative to that nominee and relative to that nominee's position and reputation within the community that the President should know about.

I also believe that I and the entire committee should consult with the person voicing an objection. That is a reasonable thing. But just as the letter that was read relative to Senator Thurmond's view of how this blue slip thing works, I believe that is all it does. It does not allow for, even on a judicial nominee, for a single Senator to have a veto power. It is taken very seriously.

"A judicial emergency exists on the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals like none other in history," Feinstein said in a prepared statement last week. "It is during this climate that some of my colleagues in the senate are trying to gain support for a proposal to split the circuit. With a wink of the eye, some members seem to be saying: If we split the circuit, we'll confirm some judges."

FEINSTEIN, DIANE on 9TH CIRCUIT

Any delay in processing Ninth Circuit cases is the responsibility, I believe, of the Congress of the United States. The circuit needs more judges. It has asked for them, and the Judicial Conference of the United States has endorsed this request; we should authorize this. The proposed bill to divide the circuit makes the overload matters worse, not better. Senate Bill 956 would divide the present Ninth Circuit into two unequal-sized circuits. It would create two courts, a 19-judge court and a nine-judge court in place of a single 28-judge court. Now that might be okay, but listen to this. Something like 70 percent of the Ninth Circuit cases come from California and Arizona in the southern part of the current Ninth Circuit. But the proposed southern circuit would have far fewer than 70 percent of the judges. The northern sector of the current Ninth Circuit currently has proportionately more judges with disproportionately fewer cases, so it is already skewed.

FEINSTEIN, DIANE on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

I think what we on this side are encountering is the holding up of judges, particularly on the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, for years on end. That must stop. A nominee is entitled to a vote. Vote them up; vote them down. To keep them hanging on--the court has 750 cases waiting for a judge. These judges are necessary. If someone has opposition to a judge, which I believe to be the case in at least one, they should come to the floor and say that.
What this does to a judge's life is, it leaves them in limbo--I should say, a nominee's life--whether they have a place to live, whether they are going to make a move. It is our job to confirm these judges. If we don't like them, we can vote against them. That is the honest thing to do. If there are things in their background, in their abilities that don't pass muster, vote no.

What I am asking for, as a Senator from California, on these three judges, is to just tell us when we might see their nominations before the Senate for a vote up or down. I think there is also an understanding by the White House that will be the case as well.

HARKIN, TOM on FILLING VACANCIES

There are 22 vacancies in our federal appeals courts. With the growing number of vacancies in the federal courts, these positions should be filled with qualified individuals as soon as possible. And so I urge the Republican leadership to take the steps necessary to allow the full Senate to vote up or down on these important nominations.

146 Cong. Rec. S 8339, 9/11/00, When There Were 63 Vacancies

HARKIN, TOM on NOMINEES ENTITLED TO A HEARING

Mr. President, I understand another disturbing event has happened this morning. I am informed that the Senate Judiciary Committee has met this morning and has refused to report out any more judges--refused to do so; just stopped. Again, this flies in the face of what our responsibilities are supposed to be around here. If someone doesn't like a person, or they don't think they are qualified--I should not say "doesn't like"--if they don't think they are qualified to assume a judgeship, let them vote against that person. But that doesn't give them a reason to hold someone up in committee.

I say to the Judiciary Committee: Report her nomination out. If for some reason you think she is unqualified--I cannot imagine why--then you can cast your vote, but at least let's bring the nominee to the floor.

As I said earlier, this is another indication of how the leadership in this Senate is shirking its responsibilities to the people of this country--to put it off, delay, stonewall, don't do anything--when we have a crying need to fill these vacancies.

This is not right. It is not right to treat a person like this. It is not right to block someone who has had their hearing and is widely supported on both sides of the aisle. It might be a different story if there were a lot of controversy about Bonnie Campbell, but there is none. As I said, Senator Grassley, a conservative Republican, is openly supporting her. Republicans in my State have been supportive of her getting on the Eighth Circuit.

This is, I think, a black mark on the operations of the Senate, another indication of how the leadership of this Senate refuses to do the people's business, to let things come out on the floor so we can vote up or down. Bonnie Campbell is being denied her right, I believe, as a citizen of this country to have her nomination acted upon by the full Senate, and it is a bad mark on the Senate.

146 Cong. Rec. S 8881, 9/21/00, When There Were 63 Vacancies

HARKIN, TOM on ACTING QUICKLY ON NOMINATIONS

I hope the Judiciary Committee and the leadership on that side--I say to my friend from Utah--will listen to the words of Texas Governor George Bush. He said he would call for a 60-day deadline for judges--once they are nominated, the Senate will have 60 days to hold a hearing, to report out of committee and vote on the Senate floor. I say to my friends on the Republican side--you are supporting George Bush for President. If he said he would call for a 60-day deadline, I ask my friends on the Republican side: Why don't we act accordingly?

In this Congress, the judicial nominees who have been confirmed had to wait on average 211 days. Governor Bush said they should not wait longer than 60 days. This is not getting better; it is getting worse around here. It is really a shame.

146 Cong. Rec. S 9657, 10/3/00, When There Were 66 Vacancies

HARKIN, TOM on ACTING QUICKLY ON NOMINATIONS

Bonnie Campbell from Iowa is a former attorney general who is now the head of the Violence Against Women office in the Department of Justice, has done a great job. She's got strong bipartisan support. She's supported by Senator Grassley from my state, and me, the Bar Association. I don't know of anyone that is not supporting her for any of these reasons. And yet she's bottled up and will not be reported out, they're not reporting her out to the floor so that we can act on it. I think this is unconscionable.
I'll just close by saying that Governor Bush had the right idea. He said the candidate should get an up or down vote within 60 days of their nomination. The Republican leadership in the Senate should follow that advice.

HARKIN, TOM on NOMINEES DESERVE A FLOOR VOTE

I thought that if the President nominated them, they had a fair hearing, and they were reported out, my only decision was whether or not they were qualified--not whether they were ideologically opposed to me or to how I feel or what I believe. It has been my observation over the last quarter century that oftentimes when judges who have more of a liberal bent get appointed to the court, in many cases they come down on the more conservative side of cases. And I have seen conservative judges appointed to the court come down on the liberal side of cases.

You never really know how this will come out, but you know whether or not people are legitimately qualified to serve on the bench. I am not naive enough not to know that there are always politics involved in how judges are nominated. I understand that. That is the system in which we live. But there comes a point where politics ends and responsibility begins. When you have people who have had a hearing, who are qualified, yet they won't be reported out for a vote on the Senate floor, that is pure politics and that is the height of irresponsibility. The Republican leadership is being totally irresponsible.

KENNEDY, EDWARD on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

In some areas of the country, people have to wait years to have their cases even heard in court. And then they have to wait years more for overburdened judges to find time to issue their decisions. Families, workers, small businesses, women and minorities have traditionally looked to the courts to resolve disputes. The lack of federal judges makes the swift resolution of their cases impossible.

144 Cong. Rec. S 292, 2/3/98, When There Were 81 Vacancies

KENNEDY, EDWARD on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

Justice delayed is justice denied. Thousands of Americans with legitimate grievances cannot get their day in court, because judicial vacancies are not being filled and current federal judges don't have the time to hear their cases. It's hard to crack down on crime when there are not enough judges to enforce the laws that Congress passes.

143 Cong. Rec. S 2515, 3/19/97, When There Were 93 Vacancies

KENNEDY, EDWARD on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

If the federal courts were a business, they would be in bankruptcy. There are over 90 vacancies in judgeships today. In his 1996 annual report, Chief Justice Rehnquist criticized Congress failure last year to create additional federal judgeships and called it a shortcoming. The Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts has requested an additional 20 temporary positions on the courts of appeals and 21 permanent and 12 temporary positions in the district courts to address the heavy backlogs that are piling up.

143 Cong. Rec. S 2515, 3/19/97, When There Were 93 Vacancies

KENNEDY, EDWARD on JUSTICE DELAYED

While Republican leaders play politics with the federal judiciary, countless individuals and businesses across the country are forced to endure needless delays in obtaining the justice they deserve. Justice is being delayed and denied in courtrooms across the country because of the unconscionable tactics of the Senate Republican majority.

KENNEDY, EDWARD on JUSTICE DELAYED

The bottleneck in the Senate is jeopardizing the court system and undermining the quality of justice. Fewer than half of President Clinton's nominees have been confirmed.

We owe it to Americans across the country to give these nominees a vote. If our Republican colleagues don't like them, vote against them. But give them a vote.

KENNEDY, EDWARD on END PARTISANSHIP IN CONFIRMATIONS

Caseloads are backlogged throughout the country. Citizens must wait additional years to resolve disputes, answer constitutional questions, and obtain justice.

The current judicial shutdown, like the government shutdown in 1995, is an unconscionable act of partisan politics It is impairing the effective enforcement of the laws. The real victims are the American people. Justice delayed is justice denied. Thousands of Americans with legitimate grievances cannot get their day in court, because federal judges don't have the time to schedule their cases. The criminal justice system is suffering too. It's hard to crack down on criminal when there are not enough judges to hold trials.

The issue is far more than a numbers game. What we are witnessing today is a direct assault on the President's constitutional power to nominate and appoint judges. Deliberate effort,, are being made in Congress to undermine the judicial independence that is at the heart of the rule of law. Advise and consent in the Senate is becoming abuse and dissent.

KENNEDY, EDWARD on END PARTISANSHIP IN CONFIRMATIONS

It is time to end the excessive partisanship over judicial nominations. I hope very much that our action on Merrick Garland is a sign that the unacceptable log jam is breaking and that the Senate is now returning to its proper role of advise and consent, not partisan obstruction, in the consideration of judicial nominations.

KENNEDY, EDWARD on NOMINEES ENTITLED TO A HEARING

Mr. President, for several months, many of us have been concerned about the Senate's continuing delays in acting on President Clinton's nominees to the federal courts. Since the Senate convened in January, we have confirmed only 17 judges and 43 are still waiting for action. These delays can only be described as an abdication of the Senate's constitutional responsibility to work with the President and ensure the integrity of our federal courts.

The vast majority of these nominees are clearly well-qualified, and would be confirmed by overwhelming votes of approval. It would be an embarrassment for our Republican colleagues to vote against them. It should be even more embarrassing for the Republican majority in the Senate to abdicate their clear constitutional responsibility to do what they were elected to do.

It is true that some Senators have voiced concerns about these nominations. But that should not prevent a roll call vote which gives every Senator the opportunity to vote "yes" or "no." These nominees and their families deserve a decision by the Senate. Parties with cases, waiting to be heard by the federal courts deserve a decision by the Senate. Ms. Berzon, Judge White, and Judge Paez deserve a decision by this Senate.

KENNEDY, EDWARD on DEFERENCE TO THE PRESIDENT'S CHOICES

Over 200 years ago, the Framers of the Constitution created a system of checks and balances to ensure that excessive power is not concentrated in any branch of government. The President was given the authority to nominate federal judges with the advise and consent the Senate [sic]. The clear intent was for the Senate to work with the President, not against him, in this process.

LEVIN, CARL on BURDEN ON CASELOADS

Even more important, it is unfair to the citizens served by the court. There is a large backlog of cases in the Sixth Circuit which is a serious concern for not just Michigan but for all the States that are served by that court. Over one-fourth of the judgeships on the Sixth Circuit are currently vacant, and that is among the highest vacancy rate of any circuit court in the country.

Judge Gilbert Merritt, who recently served as Chief Judge of the Sixth Circuit, wrote in a March 20 letter to Chairman Hatch: The court is "hurting badly and will not be able to keep up with its workload due to the fact that the Senate Judiciary Committee has acted on none of the nominations to our court."

146 Cong. Rec. S 9657, 10/3/00, When There Were 66 Vacancies

LEVIN, CARL on NOMINEES ENTITLED TO A HEARING

To keep these nominees pending for so long without hearings is unfair to the nominees, particularly where there is no known objection and where there is no explanation for the refusal to grant hearings.

LEVIN, CARL on 6TH CIRCUIT

While I am glad that the Senate has finally confirmed these two district court judges, I am deeply concerned about the vacancies in the Sixth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. The length of time that nominees for these positions have remained pending is unfair, both to the nominees, and to the State of Michigan.

The Senate slowdown has a serious impact on the administration of justice. In a March 20, 2000 letter to Senator Hatch, Judge Gilbert Merritt, Chief Judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, notes that these vacancies have hampered the Court's ability to complete the public's business. The Court, in his words, is deteriorating rapidly due to the high number of judicial vacancies.

LEVIN, CARL on ACTING QUICKLY ON NOMINATIONS

Governor Bush has said that no nominee should wait longer than 60 days for a decision in the Senate. He is the nominee of the Republican Party, and we would hope that the leadership of this Senate and the Judiciary Committee, the Republicans who run both the Senate and the committee, would listen -- if not to their consciences, and if not to the judges who sit on these courts, and if not to the litigants who are waiting for justice because of these vacancies year after year -- at least would listen to their own nominee for president, who says 60 days is the longest that anybody should wait for a vote on their confirmation.

MERRITT, GILBERT S., CHIEF JUDGE, SIXTH CIRCUIT on 6TH CIRCUIT

Meanwhile, the U.S. Judicial Conference has declared a "judicial emergency" in the 6th Circuit. Twelve judges are trying to handle the workload of 16. Each active judge is deciding more than 550 cases per year -- "a caseload that is excessive by any standard," Chief Judge Gilbert S. Merrit said.
"Our court should not be treated in this fashion," Merritt wrote. "The public's business should not be treated this way. The litigants in the federal courts should not be treated this way. The remaining judges on a court should not be treated this way."
The court is "rapidly deteriorating," he continued, "understaffed and unable properly to carry out their responsibilities for years."

MERRITT, GILBERT S., CHIEF JUDGE, SIXTH CIRCUIT on 6TH CIRCUIT

U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit
Nashville, TN, March 20, 2000
Re: Vacancies on the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals
Hon. Orrin Hatch
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

Dear Senator Hatch: Several years ago during the period that I was Chairman of the Executive Committee of the United States Judicial Conference, we met from time to time, and you were always concerned that the Senate Judiciary Committee do its duty in filling the vacancies on the various Courts of Appeals. I write now to you to request that the Judiciary Committee bring up for a hearing and a vote nominations to the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals.

I was taken aback to see an alleged statement of Senator Mike DeWine from Ohio that no vote would be taken for a nomination to fill the vacancy currently existing from Ohio. Senator DeWine was quoted as saying that due to partisan considerations there would be no more hearings or votes on vacancies for the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals. I hope that this was not an accurate quote.

The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals now has four vacancies. Twenty-five per cent of the seats on the Sixth Circuit are vacant. The Court is hurting badly and will not be able to keep up with its work load due to the fact that the Senate Judiciary Committee has acted on none of the nominations to our Court. One of the vacancies is five years old and no vote has ever been taken. One is two years old. We have lost many years of judge time because of the vacancies.

By the time the next President is inaugurated, there will be six vacancies on the Court of Appeals. Almost half of the Court will be vacant and will remain so for most of 2001 due to the exigencies of the nomination process. Although the President has nominated candidates, the Senate has refused to take a vote on any of them.
