n139 For earlier discussions of this point, see Danzon, Tort Reform and the Role of Government in Private Insurance Markets, 13 J. LEGAL STUD. 517 (1984); Rea, Nonpecuniary Loss and Breach of Contract, 11 J. LEGAL STUD. 35 (1982).

n140 See M. PETERSON, COMPENSATION OF INJURIES: CIVIL JURY VERDICTS IN COOK COUNTY 21 n.6 (Rand Corp. Report No. R-3011-ICJ, 1984) (reporting views of lawyers and claims adjusters).

n141 Derived from id. at 14 and M. PETERSON & G. PRIEST, supra note 68, at 23.

n142 M. PETERSON, CIVIL JURIES IN THE 1980S: TRENDS IN JURY TRIALS AND VERDICTS IN CALIFORNIA AND COOK COUNTY, ILLINOIS 21 (Rand Corp. Report No. R-3466-ICS 1987).

REV_00263037

The mean verdict over the same period was $ 828,000, for which the disparity between the first-party insurance amount and the tort judgment would be far greater.

n143 VICTOR, COHEN & PHELPS, WORKERS' COMPENSATION AND WORKPLACE SAFETY 15 (Rand Report No. R-2918-ICJ, 1982).

n144 Viscusi, Economic Implications of Liability for Job Accidents, at n.14 (1987) (unpublished manuscript on file with author).

n145 Derived from M. PETERSON, supra note 140, at 14, 19. I am assuming here that the weekly maximum is ineffective and that there is no lump-sum award for permanent disability, assumptions which work in opposite directions.

n146 BLUE CROSS-BLUE SHIELD OF CONNECTICUT, THE COMPREHENSIVE HEALTHCARE PLAN; (1985) (deductibles of $ 400 and $ 1500 are also available); BLUE CROSS-BLUE SHIELD OF CONNECTICUT, SEMI-PRIVATE PLAN BENEFITS (1985).

n147 This assumption is quite rough. Some Blue Cross-Blue Shield Plans have out-of-pocket dollar limitations, although these typically apply only to basic health coverage and non-major medical.

n148 See supra note 146.

n149 There is some confirmation from studies of damage awards that have found the largest increases in medical damage claims in recent years in cases that involve more severe injuries, cases in which this moral hazard component is greatest. M. PETERSON, supra note 140, at 23-27 n150 Cf. J. RAWLS, A THEORY OF JUSTICE (1970).

n151 In addition, even if this percentage increase were uniform for all claims, a selective effect would lead to a resorting of those claims filed, pressed and successfully recovered, which will increase risk pool variance. Litigation costs vary by the size and merits of the claim. There are large fixed costs in the preparation of any tort claim. As a consequence, large claims tend to be overrepresented in any trial or settlement sample. See Priest & Klein, The Selection of Disputes for Litigation, 13 J. LEGAL STUD. 1 (1984). Virtually all discussions of recent increases in the size and frequency of large judgments in litigated cases fail to take this selection effect into account. See, e.g., DOJ REPORT, supra note 24, at 36-40. Stated otherwise, low value tort claims -- those that reduce the average claim in a risk pool (the low-risk) -- are more likely to be culled from the pool, increasing pool variance.

n152 E.g., FEDERAL TRADE COMM'N, WARRANTIES, RULES, CONSUMER FOLLOW-UP STUDY (Draft Final Report 1983).

n153 See also Epstein, supra note 102, at 668.

n154 Manufacturers, of course, cannot possibly have a comparative advantage to insurers in terms of creating risk pools. The purported aggregation advantage of manufacturers must be with respect to the transaction costs of entering into an insurance contract.

n155 Some commentators have alleged that, in particular contexts, particularly automobile casualty insurance, the limits on mandatory insurance may lead some low-income individuals into differentially engaging in high-risk activities because of the relatively greater likelihood that the damage judgment will exceed the person's assets. The best example is a teenage driver. See Keeton & Kwerel, Externalities in Automobile Insurance and the Underinsured Driver Problem, 27 J.L. & ECON. 149 (1984). The magnitude of this effect, as well as its

REV_00263038

premium. [37]

It should be emphasized that these drastic changes in insurance coverage occurred despite any evidence of increases in the underlying riskiness of the products or services affected by the crisis. Indeed, a recent study of underlying levels of risk asserts that injury rates have successively declined over time for almost all injury categories. [38]

To explain the modern crisis fully, a theory must account for all of these phenomena. It must explain not only the increase in insurance premiums, but also the trend toward self-insurance, the restructuring of the insurance contract, and the refusal of insurers to offer coverage in some markets at any premium. Such an explanation must also show why these changes occurred only within commercial casualty insurance lines and not in auto, life or health insurance lines and why these changes occurred despite any evident increase in the underlying accident or injury rate. None of the three existing sets of theories of the crisis does so.

A. Collusion Theories

It is a very common view that the insurance crisis has been caused by explicit price-fixing by commercial casualty insurers. [39] The price-fixing hypothesis, however, is implausible on its face. Obviously, the sudden increase [*1528] in premiums is consistent with price-fixing. Collusion, however, cannot explain why the basic insurance policy has been restructured. Except in very rare circumstances involving forms of localized price discrimination, monopolistic and competitive industries will offer products identical in all characteristics except price. [40] The commercial casualty insurance lines, in fact, are the least likely to support successful collusion because of the highly individualized character of commercial underwriting. In these lines, the extension or exclusion of coverage very frequently is individually tailored for specific firms, which makes pricing agreements among competitors extremely difficult, if not impossible, to police. [41] Finally, the refusal of insurers in several commercial lines to offer coverage at any premium is totally inconsistent with collusion. Since antitrust enforcement began in the 1890's, there have been very few examples of monopolists or conspirators who have rebuffed consumers begging to pay any price for a product, as insurers have rebuffed nurse-midwives and day care operators, among others.

A variant of the price-fixing theory is the claim that the crisis has been concocted by concerted manipulation of insurer financial accounts. According to this explanation, representations of the insurance industry's precarious financial position are gross exaggerations, designed to mislead legislators and the public about the need for tort reform. [42] In recent months, there has been heated debate over the implications of very recent increases in reported insurance industry earnings, [43] a debate which derives from claims of this nature.

The manipulation claim is fueled by the unusual character of insurance company accounting. Insurance company profits are the net of premium plus investment returns less losses (payouts and expenses). Losses, of course, are often paid out years after the receipt of premiums. To calculate a current year profitability against collected premiums, insurers report a figure called incurred losses which consists of the sum of losses [*1529] already paid, unpaid losses where the loss-generating event has occurred, and what are known as "losses incurred but not reported." [44] Losses incurred but not reported (IBNR) are in essence estimates by insurers of claims that will be, but have not yet been, filed against the current policy.

The insurance industry has justified recent large premium increases, and the restrictions introduced in coverage within the past year, by showing an excess of incurred losses over premium and investment returns. But the largest component of these incurred losses has been IBNR, which of course represents estimated rather than actually paid amounts. The applicability to any contexts involving product or service use, is unclear.

REV_00262994

n156 See G. PRIEST, supra note 136, at 21-22.

n157 J. KAHALIK & N. PACE, COSTS AND COMPENSATION PAID IN TORT LITIGATION 71 (Rand Corp. Rep. No. R-3391-ICJ 1986).

n158 More precisely, 29% of tort judgment amounts represent defendants' costs, averaged to all users and consumers; 24% represent plaintiffs' costs, charged differentially to individual claimants. Id.

n159 These considerations do not apply to close corporations or corporations whose basic assets are individual human capital, such as doctors or other professionals.

n160 Main, Corporate Insurance Purchases and Taxes, 50 J. RISK & INS. 197 (1983) (citing FORTUNE, HOW MAJOR CORPORATIONS VIEW PROPERTY/LIABILITY INSURANCE (1973)).

n161 Mayers & Smith, supra note 127, at 285-86.

n162 Id. at 289-93. See generally Main, supra note 160.

n163 There may be a reason for a corporation to increase market insurance, however, if it will cover punitive damages, since insurance premiums are tax deductible, but punitive levies are not.

n164 See Mayers & Smith, supra note 127, at 283-84; see also Mayers & Smith, Contractual Provisions, Organizational Structures and Conflict Control in Insurance Markets, 54 J. BUS. 407 (1981).

n165 See, e.g., R. WINTER, supra note 58; DOJ REPORT, supra note 24.

n166 See supra text accompanying notes 111-13.

n167 See R. WINTER, supra note 58.

n168 See Brown, Product Liability: The Case of an Asset with Random Life, 64 AM. ECON. REV. 149 (1974); Spence, Consumer Misperceptions, Product Failure and Producer Liability, 44 REV. ECON. STUD. 561 (1977).

n169 See, e.g., Jeep Corp. v. Murray, 101 Nev. 640, 708 P.2d 297 (1985).

n170 See, e.g., Leichtamer v. American Motors Co., 67 Ohio St. 2d 456, 424 N.E.2d 568 (1984).

n171 See Henningsen v. Bloomfield Motors, 32 N.J. 358, 161 A.2d 69 (1960) (refusal to enforce disclaimers of liability for personal injury in automobile warranties).

n172 See infra text accompanying notes 216-21.

n173 Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 19. For other discussions of the effects of insurance premium increases on the ski industry, see N.Y. Times, Feb. 15, 1986, at 1, col. 1; Wall St., J., Jan. 21, 1986, at 31, col. 1.

n174 Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 18.

n175 FORTUNE, Mar. 3, 1986, at 20, 23.

REV_00263039

n176 Wall St. J., Jan. 21, 1986, at 31, col. 5.

n177 N.Y. Times, Mar. 26, 1986, at C12, col 4.

n178 See supra text accompanying notes 16-17.

n179 Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 18.

n180 Id. at 18-19; Wall St. J., Jan. 21, 1986, at 31, col. 1.

n181 Brody, When Products Turn into Liabilities, FORTUNE, Mar. 3, 1986, at 20; N.Y. Times, Feb. 1, 1986, at 1, col. 5; Wall St. J., Feb. 3, 1986, at 5, col. 1.

n182 Conf. Bd., supra note 14.

n183 Zuckerman, supra note 31, at 132; see also Danzon, Medical Malpractice: An Overview of the Issues 12 (1987) (unpublished manuscript on file with author) (reporting that 23% of OBG specialists have stopped performing certain high-risk procedures).

n184 Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 18.

n185 The 1983 survey showed that 31.4% of doctors nationwide had increased fees in response to increases in malpractice insurance premiums. Zuckerman, supra note 31, at 132.

n186 New Haven J. Courier, Jan. 29, 1986, at 28, col 3.

n187 See Wall St. J., Jan. 21, 1986, at 31, col. 1.

n188 In contrast, other regulated enterprises can pass along increased insurance costs with commission approval. For example, the Century Cartage Company, a small trucking firm, was allowed by the Georgia Public Service Commission -- which presumably restricts entry into the industry -- to pass along to consumers part of its increases in insurance premiums. Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 16.

n189 Note that when the relatively high-risk providers discontinue the provision of products and services, the effect is the reverse.

n190 N.Y. Times, Mar. 7, 1986, at D1, col. 3, D4, col. 1.

n191 See Mayers & Smith, supra note 127, at 287 (importance of adopting some corporate form beyond simple reserve set-asides to allow deductibility).

n192 Patricia Danzon reports that 40% percent of the physicians and hospitals are now insured through small mutual insurance groups. P. DANZON, supra note 31, at 93. These groups write 50% of total malpractice coverage. Danzon, supra note 183, at 1.

n193 Tillinghast estimated in 1986 that self-insurance composed 47% of the property/casualty market, although the broker Fred S. James & Co. estimated the amount at 25%. Taravella, Alternative Risk Financing Growing in Popularity, BUS. INS., Jan. 26, 1987, at 3, 14. Separately, Mitchell J. Cole of Tillinghast estimates self-insurance contributions will equal 50% of commercial insurance by 1989. Aschkenasy, Self-Insurance Gaining on Commercial Carriers, NAT'L UNDERWRITER, Mar. 9, 1987, at 1, col. 4; see also supra note 34.

REV_00263040

n194 See, e.g., DOJ REPORT, supra note 24.

n195 BUS. INS., July 8, 1985, at 1. In addition, the carrier increased the premium from $ 116,000 to $ 1.2 million for the same amount of coverage.

n196 Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 19.

n197 That low-risk insureds complain about increased deductibles does not mean that they do not benefit from the increase. Low-risk members complain when deductibles are increased, as any consumer complains of an increase in effective price. Low-risk insureds, however, would complain more (or leave the pool entirely) if the premium were raised by the amount necessary to sustain the previously lower deductible. For example, see the report of the decision of Hardee's Food Systems to select a deductible of $ 2 million in conjunction with installing non-skid floors to minimize falls. According to risk manager Susan Werner, Hardee's "just buys insurance against catastrophe . . . . We have a good loss prevention program." BUS. WEEK, supra note 34, at 122.

n198 Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 20. There is every reason that insurers should exclude coverage of such claims, and that their exclusions should be enforceable. Sexual abuse of children is not the form of probabilistic loss for which the insurance function is appropriate. It is unclear, however, whether courts will find these exclusions enforceable in the compelling context of a suit by an abused child against a day-care center with low assets and an insurer with substantial assets where the motivating judicial objective is to maximize insurance coverage. The complete withdrawal of insurers from day-care coverage is strong evidence that judicial efforts to force coverage of uninsurable risks of this nature are short-sighted, reducing the effective insurance levels.

n199 Id. at 19.

n200 Wall St. J., Jan. 21, 1986, at 31.

n201 Toronto Star Field, Feb. 20, 1986, at A7.

n202 Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 17.

n203 See, e.g., the Directors' and Officers' policies offered by the American Home Assurance Company, 1986.

n204 Even "low-risk" cities may have purchased $ 15 million coverage in the past, because such potential losses were within the distribution of expected outcomes -- although far from the mean. Cities for which $ 15 million is close to the mean risk of loss are disadvantaged by the reduction in aggregate coverage.

n205 BUS. INS., July 1, 1985, at 12.

n206 BUS. INS., July 8, 1985, at 30.

n207 Professional errors and omissions coverage is often offered separately.

n208 WYATT CORP., 1985 DIRECTORS AND OFFICERS LIABILITY INSURANCE SURVEY 21-24 (1985).

n209 Id. at 21 (exclusion reported by 40% of survey participants).

n210 Wall St. J., Nov. 20, 1985, at 33, col. 4; see also infra text accompanying notes 213-15.

REV_00263041

n211 In this respect, the retro-date provision serves a similar function as a provision excluding pending or prior litigation.

n212 Keene Corp. v. Insurance Co. of N. Am., 667 F.2d 1034 (D.C. Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 1007 (1982).

n213 The widespread adoption of claims-made policies, so hotly contested in the insurance industry, has not been appreciated for its role in extending insurance availability. See, for example, the discussion in the Wall St. J., Nov. 20, 1985, at 33, col. 4.

n214 These policy terms are described in M. Aickin, Claims Made Wordings: How Appropriate Are They to Liability Problems? (1986) (unpublished paper presented at Seminar on Liability, Insurance and Safety Regulation, The Geneva Association, Apr. 7, 1986). For the most recent formulation, see INSURANCE INFORMATION INSTITUTE, INSURANCE NEWS: ISO BROADENS CGL COVERAGE AND CONSUMER PROTECTIONS; REGULATORS INTEND TO APPROVE PROGRAM (Jan. 14, 1986) (describing ISO and NAIC draft claims-made policies).

n215 Id.

n216 Wall St. J., Jan. 21, 1986, at 1, col. 1.

n217 New York Times, Mar. 8, 1986, at 35, col. 3.

n218 Toronto Star Field, Feb. 20, 1986, at A7.

n219 Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 17.

n220 BUS. INS., July 1, 1985, at 12.

n221 Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 18. For an explanation of why this company would pay for such a policy, see infra note 222.

n222 Apparently, the company chose this form of savings because "customers demand proof of insurance before they will give Specialty any business." Id.

n223 See supra text accompanying notes 201-10.

n224 N.Y. Times, Mar. 8, 1986, at 35, col. 3.

n225 The reduction of aggregate policy limits and the expansion of specific exclusions, of course, are forms of partial withdrawal of coverage. They represent increasingly desperate efforts of insurers to ward off the unraveling of insurance pools as risks generated by increasing legal exposure continue to rise. Where insurers are unable to discover ways to isolate low-risk members, they must withdraw the offer of coverage altogether.

n226 See supra text accompanying notes 176-84.

n227 See supra text accompanying notes 190-93.

n228 Wall St. J., Jan. 21, 1986, at 31, col. 1. Industry groups denied commercial liability insurance have pressed for Congressional enactment of a Risk Rentention Act facilitating the group mutual form. See Gesil, House Ready To Act on Risk Retention Bill, BUS. INS., July 28, 1986, at 1. Dennis Connolly of Johnson & Higgins, an insurance broker actively involved in the formation of risk retention groups, describes those that have successfully formed such groups "the cream of the dregs." Public comment at conference "Solutions to the Insurance Crisis: Exploring the Link Between Tort Reforms and Insurance Regulation," Program in Civil Liability, Yale Law School, February 28, 1987.

REV_00263042

n229 See infra text accompanying notes 237-39.

n230 N.Y. Times, Mar. 31, 1986, at 37, col. 2.

n231 Posner, Trends in Medical Malpractice Insurance, 1970-1985, 49 LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS. 37, 42-44 (1986).

n232 See generally Hansmann, The Organization of Insurance Companies: Mutual Versus Stock, 1 J.L. ECON. & ORG. 125 (1985).

n233 Id. at 148.

n234 Hansmann alludes to this difference. Id.

n235 Victim claimants against a bankrupt firm, of course, do receive some share of full tort law damages. Strictly speaking, the issue is whether this share is greater or less than the amount of first-party coverage the claimants would have purchased.

n236 For example, by first-party insurers deciding to insure only some number of workers exposed to risks of some particular cumulative disease.

n237 See ONTARIO TASK FORCE ON INSURANCE, FINAL REPORT, May 1986, at 370-71.

n238 Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 18.

n239 BUS. INS., Jan. 26, 1987, at 16; see also BUS. INS., July 15, 1985, at 3, for a description of the 191-city Texas Municipal League.

n240 See BUS. INS., supra note 195, at 1.

n241 Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 18.

n242 BUS. INS., July 8, 1985, at 1, 30.

n243 See infra note 261.

n244 Put differently, insurance markets cannot be sustained where there is a substantial range for moral hazard. This is the reason that virtually all policies, including first-party policies, exclude coverage of intentional or reckless acts. See also infra note 249 for a discussion of the insurance difficulties of dramshop liability.

n245 It is possible that insurance might be sold to provide a form of claims adjustment or to capitalize on the variance in time that claims are filed, much like the sale of insurance to MGM after the fire at its MGM Grand Hotel in the early 1980's. For a contrasting interpretation of the ex post insurance of the MGM Grand, see Mayers & Smith, supra note 127, at 285-86.

n246 Workers' compensation may involve long tails of liability (the asbestos workers were workers), but generally limits damages to amounts far less than those available under tort law theories of recovery, incorporates deductibles and coinsurance features, and does not typically employ the tort system for the delivery of benefits. Though nominally paid for by the employer, workers' compensation much more closely resembles first-party than third-party tort law insurance.

REV_00263043

n247 See supra text accompanying notes 232-42.

n248 See generally CUOMO COMM'N, supra note 17, at 35-39 (discussing self-insurance by New York City).

n249 The relatively greater difficulty of insuring small entities may also explain the refusal of some insurers to offer dramshop coverage.

n250 See Enterprise Liability, supra note 28, at 505-19.

n251 The figure 35 million is often mentioned, but represents those who fail to possess insurance for any period throughout the year. It overstates the number denied medical care because of the absence of insurance. See SEN. SUBCOMM. ON THE AGED, supra note 136.

n252 Id.

n253 Of course, because our society prevents collection of some sets of claims (e.g., elimination of imprisonment for debt, bankruptcy protection), there will always be members of the population who are better off uninsured. See also Keeton & Kwerel, supra note 155.

n254 See SEN. SUBCOMM. ON THE AGED, supra note 136.

n255 Id.

n256 These issues are addressed in more detail in Priest, Protecting the Poor through Tort Law, (1987 unpublished manuscript on file with author).

n257 See ALASKA STAT. § 09.17.010(b) (1986) ($ 500,000); Colo. Rev. Stat. § 13-21-102.5(3) (Supp. 1986) ($ 500,000 if clear and convincing evidence, otherwise $ 250,000); Fla. Stat. § 768.80 ($ 450,000). But see Smith v. Department Ins., Fla. Sup. Ct. No. 69,551 (April 23, 1987) (holding cap unconstitutional as violating right to access to courts and right to trial by jury); Hawaii: CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P91,230 (to be codified at HAW. REV. STAT. § 663 (award for pain and suffering in selected tort actions limited to $ 375,000); Kans. Stat. Ann. § 60-3407 (1986) ($ 250,000, medical malpractice, subject to cost of living adjustment); Maine, LD2080, 1986 ($ 250,000, alcohol servers (includes some economic losses)); Md. Ann. Code art. x, § 11-108(B) ($ 350,000); Massachusetts, H.6172 ($ 500,000 except where substantial impairment or disfigurement); Michigan, H.5154 ($ 225,000, medical malpractice (with exceptions)); Minn. Stat. Ann. § 549.23 2 (West Supp. 1986) ($ 400,000 on intangible lossess); Rev. Stat. Mo. § 538.210 (1986) ($ 350,000 medical malpractice); N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 508:4-d (Supp. 1986) ($ 875,000); South Dakota, S.282, 1986 ($ 1,000,000 medical malpractice (all damages)); Utah, S.111, 1986 ($ 250,000 medical malpractice) (also total damage limits on dram shop liability); Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 4.56.250(2) (West Supp. 1987) (multiple of average annual wage times life expectancy); West Virginia, S.714, 1986 ($ 1,000,000 medical malpractice) ($ 500,000, political subdivisions); Wisconsin, Special Session AB8, 1986 ($ 1,000,000). The Supreme Court of Canada has adopted a cap on non-economic losses by judicial decision (indexed, currently equal to roughly $ 215,000 Canadian). Andrews v. Grand & Toy Alberta, Ltd., (1978) 83 D.L.R. (3d) 452; Thornton v. School Dist. No. 47 (1978) 83 D.L.R. (3d) 609.

n258 ALASKA STAT. § 09.17.020 (1986) (no punitive damages unless supported by clear and convincing evidence); COLO. REV. STAT. §§ 13.21-102(1)(a) and -102(4) (Supp. 1986) (not greater than compensatory, one-third to state general fund); FLA. STAT. § 768.73 (1986) (not greater than three times compensatory, 60% to state fund); Hawaii, S.1, 1986; ILL. REV. STAT. ch. 110, para. 2-1207 (allowing trial court to enter remittitur and conditional new trial); IOWA CODE § 668A.1 (requiring jury to answer special interogatories before awarding punitive damages); MINN. STAT. ANN. § 549.191 (West Supp. 1986) (punitive damages may not be sought in original complaint; complaint may be amended to include punitive damages only if court finds prima facie evidence at hearing on motion to amend); Missouri S.742 (outlawed in product liability actions); N.H. REV. STAT. ANN. § 507:16 (Supp. 1986) (no punitive damages to be awarded in any action unless otherwise provided by statute); OKLA. STAT. ANN. tit. 23, § 9 (West 1987) (equal to compensatory damages unless court finds clear and convincing evidence of reckless disregard for rights of another); S.D.: Prod. Liab. Rep. (CCH) P94,385 (1986) (1986 S.D. Laws S.B. 280; only if court finds reasonable basis to believe wilful, wanton or malicious conduct occurred can discovery be had relating to punitive damages).

REV_00263044

n259 COLO. REV. STAT. § 13-21-111.5 (Supp. 1986); FLA. STAT. § 768.81; Hawaii: CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P91,210 (1986) (to be codified at HAW. REV. STAT. § 663) (for noneconomic damages except in specified types of cases); id. P91,433 (1986 Ill. Laws S.B. 1200 (except for medical expenses and when tortfeasors' fault is greater than or equal to 25% of total fault); MO. REV. STAT. § 538.230 (1986); Utah Laws 78-27-38 (Supp. 1986); Wyo. C.C.P. § 1-1-109 (1986); see NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF STATE LEGISLATURES, supra note 25.

n260 E.g., ALASKA STAT. § 09.17.070 (Supp. 1986); CONN. GEN. STAT. § 52-225(b) (Supp. 1987); MINN. STAT. § 548.36 (Supp. 1987); see NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF STATE LEGISLATURES, supra note 25.

n261 E.g., Municipal Liability: GA. STAT. § 36-33-1 (Supp. 1986); LA. STAT. § 9:2798.1 (1985); Dramshops: N.H. STAT. 507-F:1 et. seq. (Supp. 1986); ILL. STAT. 43 P135 § 6.21 (1986); Nonprofits: N.H. STAT. 508-15 (Supp. 1986); LA. STAT. § 9.2792 (1985); see NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF STATE LEGISLATURES, supra note 25.

n262 The Need for Legislative Reform, supra note 64, at 15-43 (discussing erosion of fault-based liability and increasing damage awards).

n263 Note that my example of defamation extends only to measures of damages. In the defamation area, as in other areas of tort law, there has been a substantial expansion of substantive liability on insurance grounds that is very difficult to defend.

n264 See generally Ellis, Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 1, 10 (1982).

n265 For a further explanation of my views on this subject, see G. Priest, Modern Tort Law and Its Reform (unpublished manuscript on file with author, 1987).

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 96 Yale L.J. 1521,AT 1552
View: Full
Date/Time: Monday, September 16, 2002 - 7:13 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

manipulation claim is that insurers have inflated IBNR estimates in order to suggest financial insecurity in the insurance industry and, thus, the need for tort reform. [45]

There is no doubt that IBNR amounts, as estimates, are manipulable. IBNR amounts can never be subjected to definitive evaluation. The manipulation of IBNR, however, can account for only a small set of the phenomena of the insurance crisis. Even if insurers can gain from financial manipulations of this sort, there is no plausible reason why insurers have manipulated IBNR amounts only in commercial casualty lines, rather than in other lines (such as auto or domestic casualty), where payouts might also be reduced by changes in the law. In addition, the alleged manipulation of IBNR would not explain why the insurance contract has been restructured to reduce levels of insurance coverage. Similarly, why have insurers withdrawn from some markets entirely, refusing to offer coverage at any premium? The manipulation theory cannot answer this question.

B. Insurance Cycle Theories

Probably the most prominent explanation of the crisis is the insurance cycle theory. According to this theory, insurance premiums were low during the late 1970's and early 1980's because interest rates and investment returns were high. In recent years, as interest rates have fallen with the decline in inflation, insurers have been forced to increase insurance premiums. [46] The crisis, thus, is no more than a predictable response to exogenous financial movements. It follows that, in the future, as interest rates return to higher levels, insurance premiums will decline and the crisis will pass. A common variant of the insurance cycle theory adds a claim of cutthroat [*1530] competition to the account. According to this version, during the days of high interest rates in the early 1980's, insurers wrote policies promiscuously, taking on any risks to accumulate premiums for investment. Now the industry has learned how myopic the scramble for insurance premiums was. Risks that should have been expected to be poor are only now being discovered to be poor. [47] Premiums must be raised to reflect underlying risks more accurately. [48]

Insurance cycle theories are superficially plausible because, in fact, premium cycles related to financial returns are inevitable. During the period between receipt of policy premiums and payoff of subsequent claims, insurers gain substantial returns from investment income. Competition among insurers forces them to lower premiums as investment gains rise and to raise premiums as investment returns fall. It follows that, to the extent insurers have invested in variable interest obligations, premiums will rise as interest rates decline, and the reverse. It is uncontrovertible that interest rates have declined since the early 1980's.

The insurance cycle theory, however, provides only a very partial explanation of the crisis. First, it seems unlikely that recent alterations in insurer investment portfolios provide a full explanation of the extraordinary premium increases observed during the current crisis. [49] Over the past two years, interest rates have declined only modestly. Moreover, insurers can hedge against interest rate changes by choice of investment portfolio. Common stock and many land investments, for example, have increased in value substantially. [50] Second, the insurance cycle theory does not explain why the current crisis has occurred only in selected commercial casualty lines. Declines in interest rates and investment income affect all insurance premiums. Over the past two years, for example, auto and household premiums have risen modestly (four to nine percent annually), [51] at rates that correspond to the real rate of interest, but that do not remotely resemble rates of increase in commercial casualty premiums. Third, changes in investment returns do not account for the most puzzling feature of the crisis: the refusal of insurers to offer coverage at any premium. The insurance cycle alone may lead to periodic insurance premium [*1531] adjustments, but it does not compel withdrawal from the business of offering insurance altogether.

Some commentators have tried to explain coverage restrictions and the concentration of the crisis in commercial casualty lines, by asserting a constraint on total insurance capacity. If insurers have reached an upper bound to the aggregate coverage they can write, then as insurers face either a larger pool of risks or a smaller addition to surplus from investment returns, they must reduce total coverage either by terminating some current policies, reducing levels of coverage within current policies, or both. An insurance capacity limitation, thus, might explain why insurers restructured contracts to lower coverage levels and why they withdrew from some markets altogether -- in particular, highly risky commercial casualty lines. [52]

REV_00262995

The sources of the alleged insurance capacity constraint, however, are mysterious. Supporters of the theory invoke the behavior of some state insurance commissions, which prohibit insurers from exceeding a premium-to-surplus ratio of 4:1 and often recommend a ratio of 3:1. [53] More generally, commission or not, the 4:1 premium-to-surplus ratio is widely regarded as a "prudent" insurer objective. [54] Other commentators invoke the reinsurance market as a capacity constraint. [55] It is widely known that European reinsurers have drastically reduced underwriting capacity in U.S. markets.

The limited capacity explanation, however, is not generally helpful. First, it is not clear that insurance capacity has been exhausted. The property/casualty premium-to-surplus ratio in December 1984 was 1.85:1, and in December 1985 (the most recent statistic available) was 1.91:1, [56] both figures are far below the "prudent" or commission-mandated ratios of 4:1 and 3:1. [57] Second, even within specific insurance [*1532] lines, the premium-to-surplus ratio can be altered by insurer adjustments to surplus by means of (admittedly manipulable) IBNR entries or, more legitimately, by reinsurance agreements or capital formation. Reinsurance availability has surely declined, but this fact cannot be an explanation of the insurance crisis in the United States. Reinsurance capacity measures the extent to which reinsurers are willing to invest in U.S. markets; the decline in reinsurance capacity, thus, is the problem to be explained. What must be determined is why individual insurers and reinsurers have concluded that they cannot make money in commercial casualty insurance lines, despite the presence of insureds who are pleading for coverage. [58]

C. The Justice Department's Tort Law Theory

In a highly influential report, the United States Department of Justice has attributed the insurance crisis to increases both in tort claim frequency and in the size of damage recoveries in successful tort actions and settlements. The report documents an increase of 758% in federal product liability actions from 1974 to 1985, [59] a doubling of the rate of medical malpractice lawsuits from 1976 to 1981, and an increase of 141% in claims against municipalities from 1979 to 1983. [60] Overall, average damage awards have increased by fifteen percent annually since 1975. [61] The Department claims, in addition, that tort law rules have become more uncertain in recent years, exacerbating the effects of increasing claims and damages. [62] The results of the study led the Department to recommend a wide-ranging set of tort law reforms, including reinstating a fault liability standard, adopting scientific, rather than less stringent legal, causation standards, instituting a cap on non-economic damages, and eliminating joint and several liability, among others. [63] The argument put forth by the Justice Department's report has provided the principal justification for the enactment of diverse state legislation incorporating many of the Department's proposed reforms. [64]

The Justice Department's conclusions have been contested, most vigorously [*1533] in a study by the National Center for State Courts [65] which analyzed changes in state court, rather than federal court, filings. Of course, the very largest proportion of tort actions originate in state, not in federal, courts. The Center claims to find "no evidence to support the . . . existence of a national 'litigation explosion' in state trial courts during the 1981-84 time period." [66] Instead, the Center found a leveling off or even a decrease in litigation volume in the twenty states for which statistics were reported. [67]

Neither the Justice Department's nor the National Center for State Courts' statistics,

REV_00262996

however, is convincing. Although state court statistics provide the better index of tort litigation, the Center's study is misleading because its data are so highly aggregated. The volume of civil complaints and trials is dominated by auto collision, slip and fall, and other kinds of property injury cases, [68] which no one claims are affected by the current insurance crisis. Thus, an aggregate leveling or even decline in tort litigation may conceal substantial litigation increases in the specific areas of commercial activity most seriously affected.

The Justice Department's study, in contrast, does report caselaw trends in fields subjected to substantial premium increases or withdrawals of insurance coverage. Yet the Justice Department's study falls far short of documenting the source of the current crisis. The increase in rates of claims and size of damage awards reported by the Justice Department are far smaller than reported increases in insurance premiums. The report cites a 758% increase in federal product liability filings, but over an eleven year period, 1974-1985. [69] The increase in federal products liability filings from 1984 to 1985 was only about twenty percent. The increase in average damages awarded was about eighty percent, but it followed a drop of nearly twenty-five percent from 1983-1984. [70] Similarly, the number of malpractice actions more than doubled, but over a five-year period; claims against municipalities increased 141% percent, but over a four-year period. [71] No trial or settlement statistics, however, have shown increases that [*1534] even remotely correspond to the increases in insurance premiums at multiples of four, five, ten, fifteen, and more over a period of a few months.

Other commentators have criticized even the attempt to relate past tort payouts to current insurance premiums. Both Michael Trebilcock and Richard Epstein, for example, have argued that current premium levels need not relate in any way to past claims experience. Current premiums, instead, are set with respect to estimates of future claims experience. [72] In this view, insurance premiums represent a form of futures market for expected claims, just as stock prices reflect estimates of future corporate income.

Analytically, this proposition is surely correct. Yet there remains substantial reason to be skeptical as to why insurers, observing rapid (but not extraordinary) increases in claim frequency and damage levels over many years, would suddenly predict future increases at unprecedented levels. Nevertheless, like insurer estimates of IBNR, there is no way definitively to evaluate this kind of insurer calculation. Thus, however accurate the depiction of the relation between current premiums and future claims, the relation is unhelpful. It provides us with no method for determining the source of the crisis.

None of the three theories, then, can adequately explain the current crisis. Sections II through V of this Article set forth a different theory. They attempt to show precisely how changes in tort liability have undermined specific insurance markets, leading to the recent crisis. Section II briefly describes the direction of modern tort law and its economic effects.

II. MODERN TORT LAW AND ITS ECONOMIC EFFECTS

Since the early 1960's, courts have steadily expanded tort liability for injuries suffered in the context of product and service use. These changes in the law result from the acceptance of a coherent and powerful theory that justifies the use of tort law to compensate injured parties, a theory its founders called "enterprise liability." [73] According to the theory, expanded provider liability serves three important functions: to establish incentives for injury prevention; to provide insurance for injuries that cannot be prevented; and to modulate levels of activity by internalizing costs, including injury costs. [74]

[*1535] The second feature of the theory -- the importance of providing insurance for unpreventable losses -- is most crucial for understanding our current insurance crisis. According to enterprise liability theory, expanded legal liability does more than achieve optimal control of accident and activity rates. Expanded tort liability improves social welfare, in addition, because it provides a form of compensation insurance to consumers. A provider, especially a corporate provider, is in a substantially better position than a consumer to obtain insurance for product- or service-related losses, because a provider can either self-insure or can enter one insurance contract covering all consumers -- in comparison to the thousands of insurance contracts the set of consumers would need -- and can easily pass the proportionate insurance premium along in the product or service price. Most importantly, to tie insurance to the sale of the product or service will provide insurance coverage to consumers who might not otherwise obtain first-party coverage, in particular the poor or low-income among the consuming population. [75]

REV_00262997

The insurance rationale was central to the first judicial adoption of enterprise liability theory, by the California Supreme Court in Greenman v. Yuba Power Products, [76] in 1963. The approach was rapidly extended across the various state jurisdictions, first in the products liability field and, later, in other areas of tort law. [77] Briefly, however, enterprise liability theory has justified both restrictions in available legal defenses and expansion of substantive liability standards.

As examples, since the mid-1960's, courts have invoked the insurance rationale to limit the defenses of contributory negligence, [78] assumption of risk, [79] and consumer product misuse; [80] to eliminate defenses related to the [*1536] status of the victim (as in actions brought by licensees and trespassers against property owners); [81] and to restrict the effectiveness of statutes of limitation. [82] At the same time, the theory has supported the affirmative extension of liability through the adoption of standards of strict liability, [83] retrospective liability, [84] and unreasonably dangerous per se, [85] relaxation of causation requirements, [86] and, more generally, through the near-universal acceptance of comparative negligence, which permits a jury to render judgments against defendants even if they are responsible only in some small proportion for a plaintiff's injury. [87]

These legal changes have particularly affected insurers because courts have simultaneously expanded the scope of the insurance contract. Again, under the influence of enterprise liability theory, courts have adopted the maximization of insurance coverage as the principal interpretive objective in insurance contract disputes. [88] Thus, courts have interpreted policy coverage provisions broadly and policy exclusions narrowly to achieve the compensation goal.

As a result of these doctrinal developments, both the range of defendants against whom a plaintiff might collect a judgment and the range of plaintiffs to whom a corporate defendant might ultimately be liable, have expanded. Courts have also expanded the range of losses for which compensation might be sought, chiefly by allowing increased recovery of emotional and other non-economic losses. [89]

[*1537] Understanding the insurance crisis requires that the economic effects of expanded liability be analyzed precisely. Putting aside administrative costs, a legal rule or agency regulation can have two principal economic effects: (1) it can influence investments in loss prevention to affect the accident rate; and (2) it can influence the provision of insurance for losses not prevented. [90] These two effects, prevention and insurance, are the only important economic consequences of any legal or regulatory policy. It is irrelevant which goals a court, a regulatory agency, or society is trying to achieve. It is unimportant if the motivation for a legal policy is some moral imperative, some vague or specific sense of justice, or personal or pecuniary advantage. The only important economic effects that any legal policy can have are effects on levels of investments in prevention of losses and of insurance for losses not prevented.

It is well accepted that the optimal level of accident prevention will be attained if incentives are created for both the provider and consumer to make additional safety investments up to the point at which the marginal costs of such investments equal their marginal benefits. [91]

REV_00262998

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

[Tort Reform Articles] [8]

OA/NARA#: 1646/1514
9597

Box 59

Folder 6

REV_00263046

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 26 J. Legal Stud. 521

*26 J. Legal Stud. 521, **

Copyright (c) 1997 The University of Chicago
The Journal of Legal Studies

June, 1997

26 J. Legal Stud. 521

LENGTH: 27227 words

JOHN M. OLIN PROGRAM IN LAW AND ECONOMICS CONFERENCE ON "TORT REFORM": PROCEDURAL VERSUS SUBSTANTIVE CONTROLS OF MASS TORT CLASS ACTIONS

George L. Priest*

* John M. Olin Professor of Law and Economics, Yale Law School. I am grateful to Edward A. Snyder, Mark A. Peterson, Alan O. Sykes and to participants of this conference for comments on an earlier draft. In the interest of full disclosure, I have occasionally provided testimony or counsel in mass tort class action litigation or related (such as insurance coverage) litigation, sometimes supporting, sometimes opposing certification of a class or approval of a class settlement. In the specific cases discussed in this article, I have participated only in Ahearn v Fibreboard et al, 162 FRD 505 (ED Tex 1995), testifying on insurance coverage, not class certification, issues.

SUMMARY:

... THE single most salient feature of the modern mass tort class action is the extraordinary power that derives from certification of a class alone. ... The central academic and judicial concerns about the modern mass tort class action described in Part I--adequacy of representation, plaintiff autonomy, conflict of interest, and the similarity of class to individual litigation--do not immediately appear related to the substantive goals of tort law described in Part II--efficiency, equity, and finality. ... Section B will explain why the various academic and judicial efforts to make class litigation more closely resemble individual litigation are best understood as efforts to evade the Eisen proscription in order to impose some substantive control over the class action, necessarily through procedural means. ... Section B also argues that procedural reforms focus excessive attention on class certification and settlement, neglecting other features of the administration of class litigation that also depart from the law's substantive ambitions. ... The principal academic approach to class action reform is structural in nature: enhancing adequacy of representation, maximizing class member control over the litigation and class member opportunities to opt out, and resolving conflicts of interest will purportedly cause the outcomes of class settlements to correspond to the substantive goals of the law. ...

ABSTRACT

Class certification in a mass tort case confers extraordinary negotiating power even where the underlying claim is meritless. This power stems from the prospect that claims of a large-numbered class might reach a jury that might render a large aggregate judgment under our vastly looser tort law standards. The power is so extreme that all mass tort claims certified class with identifiable members who have suffered identifiable harms and who appear intent on taking their claims to trial. [44] Over the same period, there has also been substantial judicial attention to two different types of classes: first, a settlement class, a class seeking class certification only after reaching a settlement with defendants; second, a futures class comprising individuals who have suffered no harm to date but who (say, because of exposure to some potentially harm-causing agent) might suffer harm in the future. A class can be defined to include such individuals though the individuals themselves may not be identifiable at the time of certification. Within the past 2 years, two courts in the Third Circuit have refused to certify settlement classes, including a settlement class that included futures claimants. Oppositely, a Fifth Circuit court has recently approved a mandatory futures settlement class: a settlement class comprising solely futures claimants where the class is defined to prohibit opting out by class members. Two of these decisions, at this writing, are awaiting U.S. Supreme Court resolution of their appeal.

REV_00263047

In 1995, a Third Circuit court in the General Motors Fuel Tank Litigation decertified a settlement class on the grounds that the class failed to satisfy the Rule 23(a)(4) adequacy of representation requirement. [45] This opinion established a Third Circuit precedent requiring settlement classes to comply with all of the Rule 23 requirements for a litigation class. More recently, in an extremely prominent opinion, a Third Circuit court has decertified a settlement class that includes futures claimants. The class and [*536] the settlement was the result of many years of effort attempting to devise a nationwide settlement of all outstanding asbestos litigation. [46] The grounds for the court's decertification of the class mirror, not the hostility to class actions of the four opinions discussed above, but rather the values and concerns of the academic literature discussed in Section A. Thus, the Third Circuit court is concerned with the adequacy of class representation in the context of a mixed active/futures class. The court believes that no representative can assuredly be typical of futures claimants whose injuries have not yet occurred. The court is also concerned about the values of plaintiff autonomy. The class settlement in the case limited the annual number of available future opt-out opportunities, limitations which the court finds unduly restrictive given that the stakes of each claim are sufficient to support individual litigation. The court, in addition, sees conflict-of-interest issues as overwhelming: active class members seek immediate payouts; futures members, to maintain the magnitude of the fund at least until their injury is diagnosed. Finally, the court simply finds a settlement futures class so dissimilar to individual litigation as to challenge the court's view of appropriate civil litigation. The court recommends that Congress enact legislation creating a welfare compensation system for asbestos victims in place of the distribution plan before it, although suggesting that Congress maximize individuals' opt-out rights to allow them to maintain individual litigation. [48] Georgine has been appealed to the Supreme Court, whose decision will soon be rendered.

In contrast to these Third Circuit decisions, a Fifth Circuit court has very recently approved certification of a settlement class of a far more controversial nature: the class comprises exclusively futures claimants and is a mandatory class under Rule 23(b)(1)(b) from which opting out is unavailable. [49] This decision, Flanagan v. Ahearn, et al., [50] is also before the U.S. Supreme [*537] Court along with the Third Circuit opinion in Georgine. The settlement class in Ahearn was structured and managed differently than the class in Georgine--differences sufficient to the Fifth Circuit court to justify approval of certification and of the settlement itself. The court simply rejects the Third Circuit's requirement that a settlement class meet all of requirements of a litigation class. Indeed, the court regards the settlement itself as resolving many of the problems of aggregation. The court finds that concerns about adequacy of representation of futures claimants and about conflict of interest between the class and its attorneys are answered with respect to this settlement because, prior to approval of the settlement, the district court had appointed a guardian ad litem to represent the class and to report on the adequacy of the settlement. [51] Finally, the court finds that, since the terms of the settlement provided only a lump-sum amount, rather than a specified distribution plan, potential conflicts of interest among class members are not relevant for the certification decision and can be dealt with later on approval of a plan of distribution.

REV_00263056

These various recent judicial decisions regarding mass tort class actions are disparate over some range, but they incorporate many consistent values. First, there is a consistent preference for individual litigation to class litigation, justified on the grounds that problems of representation, conflict of interest, and inadequate plaintiff autonomy are eliminated or reduced in the individual litigation context. These cases are unanimous in concluding that individual litigation is to be preferred and should be the norm where the stakes of the claims are sufficient to support it. With the exception of the Third Circuit opinions, however, these courts do not apply the values of individual litigation in the same manner as the academic literature. There is a general fear of the negotiating power generated by class certification alone. The courts in various ways deal creatively with the procedural requirements of Rule 23 to cabin this power, for example, by introducing litigation maturity as a determinative criterion. Finally, there are strong differences in result, though not in underlying values, with respect to settlement and futures classes. The Third Circuit courts believe problems of adequacy of representation, conflict of interest, and plaintiff autonomy cannot be resolved in such litigation; a Fifth Circuit court, given some different procedural protections such as appointment of a guardian ad litem, is more sanguine.

C. The Advisory Committee's Reform Proposals

Within months of this writing, the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules released proposed amendments to Rule 23. These amendments have been [*538] interpreted as substantially reducing the availability of the class action device in the context of mass tort litigation. On these grounds, as will be explained, many of the Advisory Committee's proposals have been severely condemned, most prominently by a distinguished group of academics calling itself the Steering Committee to Oppose Proposed Rule 23. The proposed amendments of the Advisory Committee share many of the values of the modern academic concerns of mass tort class actions. First, the amendments seek to control class action problems through procedural means; second, the principal approach toward that control is to introduce requirements for class certification that will ensure that class litigation more closely resemble individual litigation.

The Advisory Committee proposes amending Rule 23(b)(3) in three different ways. It proposes adding as considerations as to whether class litigation is the superior method for resolving the case (1) "the practical ability of class members to pursue claims without class litigation," (2) the "maturity" of the underlying litigation, and (3) whether "the probable relief to individual class members justifies the costs and burdens of class litigation." In addition, the Advisory Committee proposes that Rule 23 specifically provide for the certification of settlement classes without regard to whether the purported class complies with the various predominance and superiority requirements of 23(b)(3). [52] Finally, the committee proposes relaxing the time at which the court must consider the issue of class certification and allowing immediate appellate review of class action certification without satisfaction of the otherwise demanding requirements of mandamus or without district court certification under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b).

The proposed amendments of the Advisory Committee must be seen as conferring greater judicial control over the class action device than achieved under the current Rule 23. The mechanism of control remains procedural in nature. One amendment does require a court to review whether the litigation has reached a certain level of "maturity" prior to certification. The standard of "maturity" is novel. It was initially proposed some years ago by Professor Francis McGovern [53] and has received recent currency in the Rhone-Poulenc blood litigation and in the Castano cigarette litigation cases, discussed above. [54] While a substantive definition might be given to the term, the Advisory Committee in its notes insists that its meaning is [*539] procedural only: litigation becomes mature when highly uncertain facts are resolved or where results in individual litigation become consistent. [55]

REV_00263057

The remainder of the amendments, like much of the academic criticism, seeks to make class litigation more closely resemble individual litigation. Most obviously, one of the amendments would deny certification where individual class members are practically able to pursue their claims without class certification, such as with claims involving large individual stakes. Another amendment would deny certification if the claim is not likely to be brought as individual litigation: where the probable relief to the class fails to justify the costs and expenses of class litigation.

As mentioned, the Advisory Committee's proposals have been roundly criticized by an academic Steering Group. The Steering Group, however, criticizes only the proposal that limits certification of small-stakes class actions and that permits the certification of settlement classes, concerned about the prospect of collusive settlements. The Steering Committee has not opposed the amendment limiting class certification in high-stakes cases, presumably because its members share the Advisory Committee's concern over vindicating plaintiff autonomy.

D. Modern Concerns about the Mass Tort Class Action Summarized

The review, separately, of the academic literature, recent judicial opinions, and the Advisory Committee recommendations shows a remarkable consensus of opinion and value regarding the mass tort class action. First, all of these groups conclude that the mass tort class action in its current state is in need of substantial reform. There are differences in view, however, as to the reforms required. The academic literature contends that in many contexts class members receive inadequate settlements because of problems of conflict of interest. It also argues that individual control over the direction of the litigation is unduly submerged in the class context. In contrast, the view of these recent judicial opinions, perhaps including that of the Advisory Committee, is that the principal concern is the great negotiating power that attends class certification. It seeks to restrain the creation of that power through incorporating higher procedural standards for class certification.

To achieve these different reforms, however, all groups advocate essentially the identical remedy: increase plaintiff autonomy and reform class litigation so that it more closely resembles individual litigation. To the academics, the plaintiff autonomy and individual litigation will limit conflicts of interest. Thus, this literature recommends increasing the definition [10] of subclasses with the appointment of separate counsel to enhance representation, and it recommends, perhaps most importantly, maximizing opt-out opportunities to directly achieve the same ends. The judicial opinions and the Advisory Committee also endorse the individual litigation ideal. They seek, however, to maximize plaintiff autonomy directly, by reducing the number of class actions in favor of individual litigation through decertification in specific cases and by introducing new certification requirements such as the maturity of the action. Consistently, the Advisory Committee proposes immediate appeal of class certification decisions to provide a further review of the appropriateness of class versus individual litigation.

As mentioned above, it is an unusual circumstance to observe groups invoking identical values--increasing plaintiff autonomy and making class litigation resemble individual litigation--reach such different ultimate outcomes. As I shall attempt to explain in the remainder of this article, this curious position results from the purely procedural approach toward class action adopted by academics, the courts, and the Advisory Committee, admittedly, by approach seemingly compelled by the Supreme Court's decision in Eisen. A purely procedural approach to class action reform, however, necessarily ignores the relationship between the class action and the substantive ends of tort law. Many of the current problems that various commentators seek to reform derive from the deviation of class action outcomes and the outcomes commanded by substantive tort goals. Part III shows that, as a consequence, procedural reforms alone--whether those recommended by the academics, by the courts, or by the Advisory Committee--are insufficient to deal with those substantive problems. In order to clarify this point, Part II briefly reviews modern tort law's substantive goals.

REV_00263058

II. THE SUBSTANTIVE OBJECTIVES OF TORT LAW: EFFICIENCY, EQUITY, FINALITY, AND THE ROLE OF THE CLASS ACTION

This part summarily reviews the basic substantive objectives of tort law. There is nothing novel in the discussion, but I believe that a disciplined focus on these objectives is helpful to the evaluation of the modern mass tort class action. Since so much of the modern literature addressing mass tort class actions has proceeded from a procedural approach, there has been little attention to the conformity between class action settlements and the substantive goals of tort law. In many instances, there is a general ambition to ensure positive recoveries for class members and a loose presumption that the larger the recovery, the better. [56] As I shall try to show here, the [*541] substantive ambitions of tort law compel some greater precision between the settlement award to an individual class member and the actual loss that that person suffered.

Courts and commentators, of course, have announced many different objectives of tort law. For purposes of this discussion, I have grouped these various objectives into two general categories: efficiency and equity. The discussion of these general categories is not meant to be comprehensive, though I believe that the description is generally faithful to the efficiency and equity traditions in tort law. While the subject of a substantial literature, it is not necessary here for the reader to choose between these categories or to accept that either one dominates the law of torts. I propose to show in Part III that the modern mass tort class action operates in practice in ways quite contrary to both the efficiency and equity objectives taken seriously.

Finally, I discuss a third objective of the law, which I call "finality." This goal is not separate from either efficiency or equity but is an implicit, yet seldom discussed, feature of both objectives. I believe that the goal of finality of tort litigation deserves separate treatment here because of its particular salience in the context of mass tort class actions. Mass tort class actions are characterized by an extended period of time between filing and settlement as well as, in the case of futures classes, between settlement and actual harm. Since neither the efficiency nor equity traditions in tort law regard participation in litigation as a value in itself, the long periods of time implicated in the context of mass tort class actions suggest the importance of greater attention to the converse value of litigation finality here than in the more familiar context of individual tort litigation.

A. Efficiency in Tort Law

Efficiency is surely the most carefully elaborated objective of tort law, well known, of course, to participants at this conference. In essence, it provides that a defendant is to be held liable in tort only in contexts where the harm to the plaintiff could have been prevented by a cost-effective investment of the defendant. Given liability, the defendant is held responsible for the precise injury costs of the plaintiff: not more, not less. Precision in damage assessment is necessary in order to achieve efficient incentives for defendants to make all cost-effective preventative investments, but only cost-effective preventative investments.

At the same time, incentives for efficient preventative investments must also be established for plaintiffs. Regardless of accident context, plaintiffs must also be led by liability standards to make all cost-effective investments in accident prevention. Wherever plaintiffs have failed to make such [*542] investments, courts must hold defendants not liable, denying plaintiffs compensation for losses that they have suffered in order that efficient incentives are created for plaintiff accident prevention. Here, the court need not engage in damage estimation; plaintiffs bear their own costs entirely, creating exactly the efficient incentive.

REV_00263059

The importance of precision in damages valuation cannot be overstated. To achieve optimal efficiency, if a settlement amount to any plaintiff is too low, defendants will be encouraged to engage in socially excessive accident-causing behavior. Just as important, however, where a settlement amount to any single plaintiff is too high, either given a defendant's compliance with efficient preventions standards or an excessive valuation of a plaintiff's loss, there is an equal loss to societal welfare. An excessively high award to any plaintiff will lead defendants to reduce the value created for society from the activity implicated in the lawsuit.

Precision in damages valuation also affects the value-creating activities of plaintiffs. If a settlement amount is too low relative to the plaintiff's loss, the plaintiff will be led to reduce the level of activity diminishing societal welfare. Conversely, if the settlement amount to the plaintiff is excessively high, the plaintiff may inefficiently reduce its own investment in accident precautions--reducing societal welfare.

In the context of the efficiency objective of tort litigation, the class action serves to aggregate a set of similar, individual actions. [57] That is, there is nothing to distinguish a class action from an accumulated set of individual actions. Class actions may enhance procedural efficiency by achieving some economy of scale in the conduct of the litigation. In addition--a traditional justification for class actions--the aggregation of individual actions into a class may enable litigation to proceed where, in the absence of the scale economy, no individual action could have been maintained--the example of the meritorious, low-stakes case. According to the efficiency rationale, however, the existence of small individual stakes is not a precondition for class aggregation, just as the existence of high individual stakes is not a disqualification for class treatment. Scale economies may be achieved just as readily for low-stakes as for high-stakes cases.

B. Equity in Tort Law

There is far less scholarly consensus regarding the equitable objectives of tort law but, generally speaking, the equitable approach is to view tort litigation as serving to vindicate some right of a plaintiff that has been violated [*543] by some misdeed of a defendant. [58] The consequent compensation paid to the plaintiff serves the goal of corrective justice by correcting the harm caused by the defendant. The litigation serves at once to vindicate the plaintiff's right to compel the defendant to acknowledge its wrongful behavior and to take corrective action, and to provide the corrective remedy in the form of compensation to the plaintiff.

Precision in the measurement of damages is equally important toward achieving societal equity as with achieving societal efficiency. Damages precision is important toward efficiency in creating exactly the efficient accident prevention incentives to maximize societal welfare. In the context of corrective justice, a defendant must pay an amount exactly commensurate to the harm it caused by its misdeed and the plaintiff must receive exactly that amount in compensation for the harm to be accurately corrected. While, with regard to the equity goal, there is something more of a symbolic character to the defendant's payment and to the plaintiff's receipt of compensation than with regard to efficiency, no one could support inadequate equitable correction or, conversely, excessive correction. To achieve optimal corrective justice, damages awards or settlements must be measured accurately.

In the context of the equity objective of tort law, the class action similarly serves principally as a procedural tool for the aggregation of individual claims. Unlike the efficiency goal, achieving cost savings through economies of scale in litigation is not particularly important toward achieving equity, with the principal exception where the stakes of the litigation are too low to justify individual action. In low-stakes cases, the class action is substantially more important with respect to the equity than the efficiency goal since without the class action the affected rights of plaintiffs may never otherwise be vindicated. There is no particular advantage toward achieving equity to aggregate claims into a class where the stakes are sufficiently high to support individual litigation.

REV_00263060

C. Finality in Tort Law

As mentioned above, I believe that there is also a goal of tort law which I will call "finality." By this goal, I mean that, implicit in both the efficiency and equity approaches to tort law, there is an interest in achieving finality [*544] in litigation and proceeding with more normal life. For both the efficiency and equity values in tort law, tortious harm and tort litigation are viewed as departures from normality. According to the efficiency approach, tortious harm and consequent litigation represent social costs. The efficiency objective is to employ litigation to create incentives to reduce harm and to organize procedures to reduce total costs. But according to the efficiency ideal, the larger societal objective is to maximize society's productive activities. Litigation may be helpful toward that end, but the less litigation necessary to establish efficient incentives, the greater social productivity will be. Thus, there is a value to achieving finality in litigation in order to allow both plaintiffs and defendants to return to increasing social productivity.

Somewhat similarly, the equity objective of tort law is achieved when rights are vindicated. Here, too, tortious harm is regarded as an exception to normal existence, perhaps requiring correction, but disfavored in contrast to the normal value-creating activities of life. Tort litigation is only a tool to achieve correction, not an activity valued in itself. Therefore, as with efficiency, there is a social benefit in achieving finality in litigation to allow members of the society to return to their normal value-creating activities.

D. Damages Precision and the Substantive Goals of Tort Law

Precision in the valuation of damages to each plaintiff (including, where appropriate, a finding of no defendant liability) is crucial to the achievement of both the efficiency and equity objectives of tort law. The value of efficiency in societal interactions and the value of achieving correct justice are equally offended if the damages award or settlement amount to any single plaintiff is excessively high or low. In addition, according to both the efficiency and equity values, litigation is no more than a means to achieving these larger objectives and is not valuable itself. Thus, under either value, societal welfare is diminished if litigation itself is extended over a period beyond that necessary either to create efficient incentives or to achieve corrective justice.

As we shall see in the next part, there are strong reasons to believe that outcomes in the modern mass tort class action depart very substantially from either the efficiency or equity ideal. Part III returns to the concerns about the mass tort class action of the academic literature, the courts, and the Advisory Committee to illustrate the disparity.

III. THE FUNCTION OF THE CLASS ACTION AND THE SUBSTANTIVE GOALS OF TORT LAW

The central academic and judicial concerns about the modern mass tort class action described in Part I--adequacy of representation, plaintiff autonomy, [*545] conflict of interest, and the similarity of class to individual litigation--do not immediately appear related to the substantive goals of tort law described in Part II--efficiency, equity, and finality. This part attempts to show that they are closely related. From its origin, the class action under Rule 23 has been carefully cabined as a device of procedure alone, whose structure and operation can be defined strictly without regard to the substantive merits of the underlying claim. As has been discussed, over the succeeding years, the power attending class certification has steadily magnified to the point today where class certification confers extraordinary power, in many instances irrespective of any substantive merit to the underlying claim.

REV_00263061

This part argues that the concerns of the academic literature, the courts, and groups such as the Advisory Committee represent efforts to impose substantive control over the operation of the class action by the use of procedural means, means made necessary by the Supreme Court's constraint on substantive review at the point of class certification. Section A will describe the procedural conception of class certification culminating in the Supreme Court's 1974 decision in Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin. [59] Section B will explain why the various academic and judicial efforts to make class litigation more closely resemble individual litigation are best understood as efforts to evade the Eisen proscription in order to impose some substantive control over the class action, necessarily through procedural means. Part IV will then demonstrate why these efforts, though possibly effective in individual cases, are likely to prove inadequate over the long run and, indeed, in many contexts are perverse. Many features of modern class actions which seem to violate procedural values may serve to better align class action outcomes with the substantive goals of tort law.

A. The Procedural Conception of Rule 23

From its modern origins in the 1966 revisions of the Federal Rules, Rule 23 has been regarded as a procedural device alone, to be implemented without regard to the substantive merits of the dispute. Rule 23, itself, is placed in the section of the Federal Rules denominated "Parties." As suggested by this positioning, certification of a class is treated merely as one of the Rules' means of naming parties, the initial act in the process of filing a claim. Put simply, Rule 23 determines whether the named plaintiff in the case may bring the action on behalf of a class--appropriate if the numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequacy requirements are satisfied--or whether the named plaintiff must bring the action on his or [*546] her own behalf alone. The structure of the Rules provides for such a determination to be made without regard to the claim itself. The substantive merits of the claim will be considered, as in individual litigation, by motion on the pleadings, after discovery, say, by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted. According to this division, the character of the plaintiff as class or as individual has no particular relevance to resolution of the Rule 12 motion. It is consistent, for Rule 23(c)(1) to provide that class certification is to be determined by the court as practicable after the commencement of an action." The issue of class certification be resolved, before anything else in the case goes forth, since the only purpose of class certification decision is to determine the identity of the proper plaintiff.

Various lower court decisions following the 1966 revisions confirmed this conception. While there were a few earlier cases, a Fifth Circuit court's 1971 decision in Miller v. Mackey Int'l., Inc. [60] established the proposition clearly. In an opinion by Judge Wisdom, the court reversed a district court's denial of class certification because the district court might have been influenced in its certification ruling by its view of the substantive merits of the underlying action

> This portion of the [district court's] order indicates to us that in passing on the propriety of the class action the district judge may have considered whether the petition stated a cause of action or whether Miller would succeed on the merits. This was improper. In determining the propriety of a class action, the question is not whether the plaintiff or plaintiffs have stated a cause of action or will prevail on the merits, but rather whether the requirements of Rule 23 are met. . . .
>
> The decision whether there is a proper class does not depend on the existence of a cause of action. [61]

Judge Wisdom's ruling appeared to be importantly confirmed 3 years later in the U.S. Supreme Court's opinion in Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, although, as I shall argue later, the Eisen opinion can be read substantially more narrowly. [62] Eisen, of course, is an opinion of substantial eminence explaining the Supreme Court's approach to the revised Rule 23. The centra... ...s the case relates to notice: whether individual notice is required to all class memb... ...s if so, whether the plaintiff or the defendant must pay the bill. The claim involv... ...tions of securities law and antitrust violations in the context of stock exchange transa... ...e stakes in the [*547] case to the named plaintiff Eisen were stipulated to be no... ...r... ...n $ 70, the cost of individual notice to all members of the class, $ 225,000, althou... ...th... ...sts of partial notice or notice by publication, substantially less. The district court ... ...d i... ...t only limited individual notice was necessary to a subset of class members and c... ...e defendant with paying 90 percent of the notice costs based on the court's judgm... ...wing a preliminary hearing, that the class was more likely than not to prevail on the...

REV_00263062

The S... ...ourt overturned the district court's resolution entirely. The Court held that indivi... ...is mandatory to each class member and that there is no provision in Rule 23 for a l... ...'s eview of the merits of the claim for purposes of shifting notice costs to a defen... ...rding to the Court, "We find nothing in either the language or history of Rule 23 tha... ...ort any authority to conduct a preliminary inquiry into the merits of a suit in ord... ...rmine whether it may be maintained as a class action." [63]

This la... ...n Eisen has been subsequently read as broadly as Judge Wisdom's language in Miller... ...it any evaluation of the merits of a claim at the point of class certification. [64] In my ... ...dern class action developments have been importantly affected by that appro... ...e effects are dangerous. It is surely a curious circumstance in a country comm... ...rule of law to accept the propositions (1) that class certification alone creat... ...gotiating power, (2) that that power leads to actual settlements, sometimes large ... ...ements, and, simultaneously, (3) that this great negotiating power can be creat... ...ar... ...judicial review of a claim on the merits and, in some cases, without any merit... ...m. As I shall try to explain in the next section, the concerns of academics and the co... ...s pr... ...osals for reform, the innovative judicial interpretations of class requir... ...ve the proposals of the Advisory Committee, are best understood as efforts to im... ...s... ...stantive control on the class action phenomenon where direct substantive revie... ...t... ...and only procedural means are available.

B. Vir... ...Iff Autonomy and the Individual Litigation Ideal as Surrogates for Subs...

Part I ... ...how the central concerns of academics and the courts regarding mass tort class ... ...from the values of vindicating [*548] plaintiff autonomy and seeking to ma... ...ion more closely resemble individual litigation. How do the values of plaint... ...nd individual litigation relate to the substantive objectives of tort law? The c... ...portant because there has been no serious effort in the academic literat... ...y none in judicial opinions, to define the normative basis or content of the value... ...tonomy and individual litigation. Vindicating plaintiff autonomy by giving plain... ...ntrol over litigation most often is simply asserted as a value. The asser... ...ed--and I have seen no challenge--perhaps because plaintiff autonomy seem... ...in a vague way personal freedom, a value in our society largely beyond challe... ...ly, I have seen no clearly articulated reason why class litigation ought to be made ... ...individual litigation. The sentiment in favor of such a reform stems perha... ...ve comfort and familiarity with individual litigation or from the vague notio... ...lems observed in class litigation are not as clearly evident in individual litiga...

It is c... ...values of plaintiff autonomy and individual litigation themselves do not follow ... ...ary way from the substantive tort law objectives of efficiency or corre... ...the degree to which legal rules establish efficient incentives for the reduc... ...t-causing behavior is a concern quite different from the degree to which a plain... ...or her litigation. Similarly, the correction of an unjust harm has no clear relatio intiff's control over litigation. A society might adopt entirely different subst ndards of tort law than predominate in our legal system and still value plaintiff auton individual litigation. Put differently, one would measure a society's achie the objectives of creating efficient incentives or redressing unjust harms witho essary reference to the degree of plaintiff litigation control or the similarity of class t al litigation.

REV_00263063

Plainti my, thus, is not an intrinsic value in either the efficiency or corrective justice traditi tiff autonomy does not resemble, say, religious freedom or personal freedom as intr es. Religious freedom is an end valued in itself because of the widespread belief ous activity, in itself, contributes value to life. Similarly, personal freedom is an int e because of the belief in our society that the individual citizen is in the best positi t rmine the values on which to enhance his or her life experience. In contrast, in ne fficiency nor corrective justice traditions is litigation and, thus, individual contr f , considered an activity that in and of itself brings value to life. Indeed, accor h traditions, the richest society is that in which there is the least need for litigat se of a lower level of inefficient or unjust harms. If efficient incentives could be cr unjust harms [*549] redressed without litigation, or without individual contr ation, so much the better.

Inste f autonomy in litigation is an instrumental, rather than an intrinsic, value. It may e believed that, given an accident, individual plaintiff control over the subse n will contribute to the creation of efficient behavioral incentives or the redre of harms. With regard to efficiency, the individual plaintiff-victim, rather than an at ne the representative, will be most interested and best placed to pursue the claim compensation necessary to establish efficient incentives is obtained. [65] Simil gard to corrective justice, the individual plaintiff-victim may well be thought best nderstand the nature of the harm and what remedy is necessary to most comp ss it. In both the efficiency and corrective justice traditions, plaintiff auton y and individual litigation ideals are means, not ends, toward better achievement of the c goals of the law.

It foll the context of the modern mass tort class action, the plaintiff autonomy and i tion ideals are best understood as surrogates for more direct substantive contr action litigation. Again, there are no coherent alternative justifications for the p my and individual litigation values. The advocacy of academics and the court s of plaintiff autonomy and making class litigation resemble individual litiga , can be interpreted--and in an interpretation that justifies support for these forts to create structural conditions for the achievement of the substantive goals c ccording to this interpretation, the promotion by academics and the courts of gr plaintiff control over class litigation may be plausibly based on the unde hat greater plaintiff control will lead class litigation to comply more preci substantive goals of the law. Similarly, the proposals by academics and the court make class litigation resemble individual litigation may be plausibly base rlying belief that a closer resemblance of class to individual litigation will prom ent of the substantive objectives of the law.

This i of the import of these values gains particular credence given the strictly proc s of Rule 23 in concept and in practice following the Supreme Court's ruling in Eise rs to preclude a court from evaluating the substantive merits of a claim prior cation. [66] While motion practice may follow, there is a strong preference unde Rules and in modern jurisprudence toward allowing discovery [*550] to proce olution of a claim on the merits. Virtually all mass tort class actions, howe r to trial or judgment. As a consequence, there is no effective substantive cont ss tort class action phenomenon at any point, except in the most extreme case rts are willing to entertain summary judgment motions on the pleadings, a rare o r e in a tort case and, especially, in a tort case where personal injury is alleged. Acad ts, and groups such as the Advisory Committee, however, observe the multi n which mass tort class action practice departs from the substantive goals of the la ubject to the Eisen mandate, there are no direct means available for courts to exert ve control over mass tort class actions. Structural reforms--giving greater contro idual plaintiffs and making class litigation more closely resemble individual litigat me the only reform mechanisms available.

REV_00263064

1. Aca oncerns about Mass Tort Class Actions as Surrogates for Substantive Controls

As de Part I, the principal academic concerns regarding mass tort class actions relat cy of representation, vindication of plaintiff autonomy, and control of confl e t. Each of these concerns may best be understood as an effort to more close utcomes of class litigation with the substantive objectives of tort law.

a. Ad Class Representation. A central concern of academics about the modern mass tort c in that the named plaintiffs in the case adequately represent the interests of each m the class. One fear is that the litigation will be controlled by the attorneys for th r than by the class members themselves. A second concern is that the name or plaintiffs may have interests that diverge from those of other class mem not fully advocate those different interests. This second concern has led prom mentators such as Coffee to vigorously recommend the definition of subcl with its separate named plaintiff and attorney. [67]

This c t the adequacy of representation is familiar, but its exaggerated character in the context is notable and has never been fully explained. In our democratic socie many occasions that require representation rather than direct citizen partic ike class actions, however, there are very few contexts where there is such a stro ment to secure what might be regarded as "perfect" representation. In the electo , for example, representation, rather than individual [*551] citizen partic omnipresent, yet there is universal acceptance of a much lower standard of repre than that demanded for the class action. There is no thought that every separ within the polity must receive specific and equivalent representation. All seem t our elected representatives provide a form of composite representation: repre terests of the polity on the whole, generally satisfactory to most interests, thou in many instances, ignoring, even disregarding, some specific interests. The s epresentation within a class action, in contrast, are much higher. Accor ominant academic approach, each distinguishable interest within a class (igno minimis) requires adequate representation both by named class member and t counsel.

To m st explanation for this higher standard of representation is to establish a struc actions that enhances the likelihood that the outcomes of class litigation will b ith the substantive objectives of the law. To achieve the substantive goals of th efficiency or corrective justice--it is necessary, first, to determine whet nt is liable and to whom and, second, to award each appropriate plaintiff the c compensation. [68] It is plausible that one means of increasing the likeli sult is to provide each distinct interest group within a class adequate repre by both named plaintiff and attorney. Thus, each interest group is able to pursu til it is found either that the group is ineligible for compensation or is fully comp versely, were some interest group within the class not represented, there woul n to fear that the substantive award to that group would depart from that appr ng to the substantive goals of the law. Securing adequate representation of m ss, therefore, is a procedural means of increasing the likelihood of a subs ct outcome of class litigation.

REV_00263065

as classes appear to settle, rather than litigate to judgment. Recommendations for class action reform have been solely procedural since Rule 23 has been implemented without substantive review of the underlying claim. This article shows that recent reform efforts in fact attempt to impose substantive controls on mass tort class actions through procedural means, efforts that necessarily will remain inadequate. The various problems attending mass tort class actions can only be effectively addressed if courts are given power to substantively review the underlying merits of a claim prior to class certification.

TEXT:

[*521] THE single most salient feature of the modern mass tort class action is the extraordinary power that derives from certification of a class alone. This power stems from the prospect that the tort claims of a large-numbered class might reach a jury that might render a large aggregate judgment. Three legal elements conjoin to create this great power: first, the relatively undemanding procedural requirements for class certification; second, the vastly looser substantive standards of pleading introduced by the Federal Rules increasing the prospect that any claim might reach a jury; and, third, the expansion of standards of tort liability and the restriction of available tort defenses since the 1960s increasing the prospect of an adverse judgment. [1] [*522] Together, the combination of undemanding standards for class certification, loose pleading requirements, and expanded standards of tort liability has transformed the mass tort class action into a massive tool of redistribution.

The power attending the mass tort class action is well known in anecdote and widely acknowledged even by our courts. Very recently, for example, Judge Posner, in an opinion decertifying a mass tort class action, alluded to the irreparable harm to a defendant from the prospect that "one jury, consisting of six persons, . . . will hold the fate of an industry in the palm of its hand." [2] This is not hyperbole, and there are two strong empirical confirmations of the point: commentators unanimously concede that virtually every mass tort class action that has been successfully certified has settled out of court rather than been litigated to judgment. For any subset of cases, uniform settlement and zero litigation is an extraordinary empirical fact, neither predicted by nor consistent with any current economic model of litigation and settlement. [3] It is reflective of the huge uncertainty and, therefore, the risk that attends judgment of a mass tort claim by a lay jury.

The second empirical proof is less easily generalized but is no less graphic. We have recently observed settlements or proposed settlements of mass tort class actions at enormous sums of money where there appears to be no substantive basis for defendant liability. The silicone breast implant litigation is an example, where several defendants are proposing settlement terms involving more than a billion dollars despite predominant scientific evidence indicating no relationship between the implants and the diseases claimed by the plaintiffs. [4]

There has been substantial attention in recent years to the power generated by the mass tort class action and increasing concern about abuses that might attend the exercise of that power. Although some commentators generally approve of modern developments, [5] the dominant academic literature is critical of features of the operation of mass tort class actions that appear to disfavor class plaintiffs as against defendants and class attorneys or disfavor certain subsets of class plaintiffs as against favored others. This literature has sought to remedy these problems by refining the class action as a [*523] procedural mechanism for claim aggregation through recommendations that would enhance the adequacy of class representation, better vindicate plaintiff autonomy, and reduce conflicts of interest between the class and its attorneys or among members of a class. [6] The emphasis of this literature on the values of representation, plaintiff autonomy, and the elimination of conflicts of interest has led to severe criticism of settlement classes (classes certified solely to validate a settlement) as well as of futures classes (classes comprising claimants who have yet to suffer an injury) because they seem to violate directly the representation and autonomy values. To the extent that this literature has focused on the substantive outcomes of mass tort class action settlements, its principal concern is that some settlements for a class as a whole or for

REV_00263048

b. Vind Plaintiff Autonomy. While the vindication of plaintiff autonomy is a broader theme e cademic class action literature, it is invoked as a value to justify the specif c dations of enhancing personal control over the litigation by the named, repre l s member and maximizing opportunities available to individual class mem r of the class. According to these recommendations, it is thought better if an ind s member, rather than a class attorney, is responsible for making all impor s concerning the conduct of the litigation. Increasing opt-out opportunities are ju grounds: first, it is thought appropriate for any individual class member, if diss the [*552] direction of the class litigation or of a class settlement, to be free to is or her action individually. Second, it is thought that both opt outs in fact and th ting out will appropriately discipline the class attorneys (and perhaps even t sentatives) to conduct the class litigation in the best interests of each mem s.

The p onomy value is similarly familiar, and its promotion hardly remarkable. Reco to enhance individual control and to maximize opting-out opportunities, howe us in the context of class actions because they directly contradict the natur nterprise. Most academic commentators strongly support the concept of class believe that it is appropriate to create classes and to bring litigation on behal This support, in part, may be based on the achievement of what economists call ec ale--the reduction of total litigation costs through the aggregation of claim similar value can be expressed in noneconomic terms: implementing the most ns of obtaining justice for a substantial number of citizens. Maximizing contr individual--even a representative individual--bears an uneasy relationship with the c ing the broader interests of a class. Increasing opportunities for opting out o ly inconsistent: each member that opts out reduces the advantage gain on of the class.

The r ons that derive from the plaintiff autonomy value can be plausibly supp e context of class actions, however, if they are recognized as surrogate mea the likelihood that the outcomes of litigation involving classes will corr bstantive goals of the law. Thus, there is reason to prefer some indiv ber, rather than the class attorney, to make decisions regarding the cond ti ion because it might be believed that such an individual will be most infor source and magnitude of the harm and, thus, will make the best deci to pursue liability and damages. Similarly, one might support increasing the c opting out of a class so that, where a class member believes that the class ing in some respect to appropriately pursue the tortfeasor or that the class o low, that individual can pursue the claim on his or her own. Opting out is inc the ambitions of class litigation, but it may be totally consistent with achie tantive goals of the law. Those who opt out reduce the power of the class, but th obtain judgments or settlements more fully reflective of tort law's subst he threat of opting out will lead those managing the litigation to better direc n toward results consistent with what could be obtained from individual litigat ons of substantive tort law. Thus, however internally inconsistent, vindic utonomy in the [*553] context of class actions serves as a procedural mean utcomes--which may include individual, not class, outcomes--with the substa ives of the law.

c. Red icts of Interest. Many reform recommendations within the academic literat d at reducing conflicts of interest. Conflicts of interest among class mem resolved through more segregated representation, discussed above. [69] More s relate to conflicts of interest as between the class and its attorneys. Here, erms that attorneys will settle class litigation on inadequate terms to obtai s from grateful defendants, will settle prematurely in order to obtain fees at an ill encourage class members to opt out in order to obtain higher contingency fees or will settle for inventories of individual clients on terms different than settlements for the class.

REV_00263066

It is easy to condemn conflicts of interest and equally easy to recognize that the grounds for condemnation relate to efforts to achieve the substantive goals of the law. Thus, where attorneys press litigation at insufficient amounts because of defendant attorney fee promises, delay class litigation prematurely to obtain earlier fee payments, class plaintiffs recover settlement amounts less than what are compelled by the substantive goals of the law.

Other examples of conflicts of interest criticized in the academic literature are more difficult to evaluate. For instance, many commentators criticize circumstances in which those opting out of a class recover settlements larger than those of the average members of the class or in which lawyers settle claims of inventories of private clients on terms different than they settle claims of a class. [70] Such criticisms implicitly assume that the claims of all plaintiffs are equally meritorious. If there is equal substantive merit across claims, then any disparity in awards violates the substantive ambitions of the law. If the substantive merit of class members' claims differ, however, then disparate settlement terms for those claims may not reflect conflicts of interest but more faithful adherence to the law's substantive goals. [71]

2. Modern Judicial Approaches to Mass Tort Class Actions as Surrogates for Substantive Control

As described above, within the past 2 years, several federal appellate courts have indicated substantial hostility toward the mass tort class action, [*554] decertifying classes on mandatory Rule 23(b) certification, or appeal of a class settlement. [72] Among the grounds for this hostility is concern over the great pressure to settle that is created by class certification [73] and a preference for individual over class litigation, especially where the stakes of the case are sufficient to support individual suit. [74] Several courts have engrafted a "maturity" criterion onto certification. [75] Other courts have been concerned about settlement classes and future claims, [76] although a Fifth Circuit court has recently approved a mandatory futures settlement class, given the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the class who carefully reviewed and endorsed the terms of settlement. [77] Constrained by Eisen's apparent prohibition of review of the class claim on the merits, each of these courts has framed its objections to certification in procedural terms. It is not difficult, however, to perceive that the substantive basis for this judicial hostility to class certification is the concern that the outcomes of class certification will depart from the substantive objectives of the law.

The fear of pressure created by class certification toward unfair settlement is obviously a substantive, rather than a procedural, concern. Both the Fifth Circuit in Castano and the Seventh Circuit in Rhone-Poulenc openly address the questionable merit of class claims. In Castano the court carefully recites the Supreme Court's admonition in Eisen that the merits of the claim are irrelevant to class certification. [78] But it interprets Rule 23(b)(3)'s superiority requirement to implicate substantive review. According to the court, "this class must be decertified if it independently fails the superiority requirement of rule 23(b)(3). In the context of mass tort class actions, certification dramatically affects the stakes for defendants. Class certification magnifies and strengthens the number of unmeritorious claims. Agent Orange, 996 F.2d at 165-66. Aggregation of claims also makes it more likely that a defendant will be found liable and results in significantly higher damage awards." [80] Similarly, the Seventh Circuit in Rhone-Poulenc explains, "A notable feature of this case, and one that has not been remarked [*555] on or encountered, so far as we are aware, in previous cases, is the demonstrated great likelihood that the plaintiffs' claims, despite their human appeal, have no merit." [81]

These decisions are obviously based on the substantive merit of the claim, not on compl · · prospective class with the procedural requirements of Rule 23. In both Castar · · -Poulenc, following these substantive criticisms of the class claims, the respec · · ntroduce a new element of Rule 23(b)(3)'s superiority evaluation: the relati · 'r · · of the claim. The concept of claim "maturity" might be given a purely proce · a · · ctation. Beneath the surface, however, it is apparent that the maturity criter · i · · or refusing class certification where the substantive merit of the claim is low.

REV_00263067

The F · · · Castano sets forth a purely procedural definition of the maturity requir · · · ior record of trials from which the district court can draw the information neces · · · the predominance and superiority analysis required by Rule 23." [82] It was straig · · · he court to find the claim by the class in Castano immature since no single · · · g such a legal claim had ever proceeded to trial. [83] The implicit subs · · · the maturity requirement, however, is evident in its treatment by the Sever · · · hone-Poulenc. [84] The Seventh Circuit similarly found the class claim there to ha · · · ach a "consensus or maturing of judgment." [85] Unlike Castano, in Rhone-Poule · · · been 13 previous individual trials of the claim. Notable to the Seventh Circu · · · s of claim maturity was that defendants had prevailed in 12 of the 13 trials.

It is d · · · ore that the Seventh Circuit is employing the maturity standard as a surro · · · ntive review of the class claim on the merits. The court characterizes the 13 pr · · · the claim as a small sample. [87] But, purportedly, the issue before the court · · · l analysis of claim maturity is not the representativeness of outcomes base · · · e--a substantive concern--but rather whether there has been sufficient previ · · · litigating the claim to perceive whether class [*556] litigation is mana · · · er common rather than individual issues prevail, whether subclasses must be d · · · like. [88] The court finds the claim in Rhone-Poulenc to be immature with · · · of whether the litigation experience of the previous 13 trials established or re · · · ageability of the claim as a class action. Instead, the class claim was found "imm · · · e the court feared that certification would lead to settlement and the court rega · · · s without substantive merit.

Final · · · · ns expressed in the recent appellate opinions may also be seen to impli · · · e, rather than purely procedural, values. Several courts have referred to the a · · · fs to bring individual litigation as grounds for decertifying a class, [89] sugg · · · laintiff autonomy value, discussed above. Similarly, those courts that have deni · · · to settlement classes and futures classes have invoked concerns about the a · · · presentation and conflicts of interest which, at heart, derive from fear that the c · · · h settlements depart from the law's substantive goals. [90] In this respect, it is · · · one appellate court that has approved a mandatory futures-only sett' · · · he Fifth Circuit in Ahearn [91] --reached that judgment precisely because the lowe · · · pointed a guardian ad litem to represent the absent class. The court appr · · · ment because the guardian had conducted a thorough review and found the s · · · substantively in the best interests of the class. [92]

3. Th · · · mmittee's Proposed Amendments as Surrogates for Substantive Control

Final · · · ed amendments of the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules echo many of the t · · · d above. The committee has proposed denying certification both where the s · · · cient to support individual litigation and where stakes are so low that the cost · · · ceed any available benefits. The committee's amendments would formal · · · on maturity as a criterion for certification under Rule 23(b)(3), would allow · · · ny consideration of class certification, and would subject the district court' · · · decision to discretionary appellate review.

REV_00263068

[*557] T... visory Committee, of course, is constrained to formulate its amendments in proced... a... more strictly than academics and even the appellate courts; its task was to propos... a... nts to a specific rule of procedure. In essence, however, the committee's variou... r... amendments reflect an ambition of reducing the circumstances in which classe... i... tified. [93] This ambition is necessarily substantive in nature. The amend... n... osed by the Advisory Committee do not derive from a different conception of aggr... r do they implicate different means of conducting class litigation. Instead, they di... a... litigation, most plausibly (though unexpressed) because of a concern about e... c... ettlement pressure with respect to unmeritorious cases. Thus, the amendr... e... d deny class certification both where the stakes of individual claims are high ar... t, ...ly, where the stakes of individual claims are very low.

The Ad... ...mittee proposes, in addition, formalization of the litigation maturity criteri... ...s to the amendments define litigation maturity, however, somewhat differ... y... the appellate decisions described above. According to the Advisory Comm... ...ion becomes mature when "the results of individual litigation begin to conve... ...s adjudication may continue to be inappropriate, however, if individual litigati... ...to yield inconsistent results." [94] Defining litigation maturity in terms of consist... ...ult is interesting, but it cannot be seriously imagined that courts would implem... n... criterion in solely a procedural manner, without regard to the substantive merits ... That is, imagine litigation for which class certification has been proposed in whi... ...s underlying individual litigation has satisfied the Advisory Committee's matur... ...n achieving consistency of result, but the result has been consistently agair... ...of the plaintiffs and in favor of the defendant. This, of course, is the circu... ...ced the Seventh Circuit court in Rhone-Poulenc, where defendants had preva... ...he previous 13 trials. Consistency in favor of the defendant would satisfy the m... ...ment as defined by the Advisory Committee, but it would hardly consti... ...ing reason for class certification. Indeed, the Seventh Circuit court in Rhone... ...idering this precise situation, defined litigation "maturity" exactly oppos... ...of 13 verdicts for the defendant reflected the claim's immaturity. [95]

The f... ...s of the Advisory Committee also reflect substantive concerns about class actio... ...he committee proposed to amend [*558] Rule 23(c)(1) to provide for distri... ...ideration of class certification no longer "as soon as practicable after comm... ...an action" but "when practicable." The committee also recommends adop... ...ionary appellate review of a district court's class certification decision. Thes... ...are procedural in the sense that they affect the timing and nature of certif... ...but their effect, as above, can only be to reduce the likelihood of class certif... ...e explained earlier how certification "as soon as practicable" reinforces the pure... ...focus of Rule 23: certification means no more than determining the name of th... ...laying certification according to the Advisory Committee's proposed amer... ...ly serve to enhance a district court's substantive understanding of the case... ...viding for discretionary appellate review of a district court's class certi... ...n (as opposed to extraordinary review through mandamus or district court certi... ...issue under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b)) will enhance the authority of appellate cou... ...ether the district court has properly applied the procedural requirements for ... ...n, but it will also enhance appellate authority to determine--as in the rece... ...isions discussed above--whether the underlying claim of the purported class ...ave merit.

C. S...

This ...pted to demonstrate that the various concerns about the mass tort class acti... ...appellate courts, and the Advisory Committee are at heart substantive, not ... ...erns. R...commendations to enhance the adequacy of representation, vind... ...autonomy, and reduce conflicts of interest are best understood as efforts to more ... employ the class action to achieve the substantive goals of the law. Simil ... nt decertification decisions of various appellate courts are best understood as re... as to the substantive merits of the respective underlying claims. Finally, the p... ...nments of the Advisory Committee, while necessarily procedural in appe... ...ce the likelihood of class certification and enhance the ability of district and appe... ...evaluate the substance of a claim prior to class certification.

REV_00263069

The ... ...ticisms, decertification decisions, and Advisory Committee proposals, thus, are s... ...reflects serious concern that the outcomes of mass tort class action litiga... ...art from the substantive ambitions of the law. They are also similar in that each ... ...ddress those substantive concerns through procedural means. Next, Part IV wi... ...his procedural approach to class action reform is inadequate. [*559] Proce... ...may help align class action outcomes with substantive law in some conte... ...es in a general way, on the whole. In many other contexts, however, the proce... ...h to reform confuses substantive ends. A solely procedural approach misd... ...n from more direct methods of controlling class actions to better achieve the la... ...ive ambitions.

IV. T... ...S OF THE PROCEDURAL APPROACH

The ... ...argued that academic efforts to reform the mass tort class action by furth... ...edural values of adequacy of representation, vindicating plaintiff auto... ...olving conflicts of interest serve as surrogate means for conforming the outc... ...ttlements to the substantive goals of the law. It argued that efforts of vari... ...urts and the Advisory Committee to transform class litigation to resemble indi... ...serve a similar purpose.

This p... ...ain what I regard to be the grave limitations of this procedural approach to refor... ...ort class action. There are two central substantive problems of mass tort class ... ...e first has been the principal focus of academic reform proposals: to assure that c... ...s with meritorious claims receive sufficient settlement awards. The second has b... ...al focus of the recent appellate court decisions and, perhaps, of the Advi... ...'s proposals: to prevent aggregation into a class of claims that lack subst... ...This part argues that procedural values alone cannot adequately deal with e... ...substantive problems.

Sectio... ...by the values of representativeness, plaintiff autonomy and resolving confli... ...st are generally inadequate as substantive surrogates. It shows that these value... ...the evaluation of the substantive merit of the litigation and generate reco... ...hat sometimes thwart rather than promote substantive goals. Section B expl... ...deal of transforming the class action to resemble individual litigation defe... ...virtues of litigation on behalf of a class and paralyzes analysis of new forms ... ...that may be of substantial social value, such as settlement and futures classe... ...lso argues that procedural reforms focus excessive attention on class certif... ...tlement, neglecting other features of the administration of class litigation that a... ...m the law's substantive ambitions.

[*5... ...Failings of the Representativeness, Autonomy, and Conflict-of-Interest Norm... ...s for Substantive Controls

The p... ...mic approach to class action reform is structural in nature: enhancing adeq... ...ntation, maximizing class member control over the litigation and class me... ...ns to opt out, and resolving conflicts of interest will purportedly cause the outc... ...ttlements to correspond to the substantive goals of the law. Plaintiffs fully ... ...he various interests within a class will direct the litigation to achieve the goa... ...hey do not, class members can opt out or threaten to opt out in order to change h ...on of the litigation.

REV_00263070

Regre b' ...ope that representative plaintiffs will make decisions about the course of class ... t correspond to the goals of tort law is, in most cases, hopelessly unrea ... action litigation is uniformly contingency-fee litigation. Few plaintiffs in contin ... litigation--whether the suit is brought individually or on behalf of a class-- exert ... stantive litigation control. As might be expected in a market economy that prote ... rights, contingency-fee litigation is controlled by the party that actually pays t ... st often, the attorneys for the class.

Lack o ... ol ... ontrol, of course, is exacerbated in the context of a class action. The power that a ... n ... certification derives from numbers. Given some magnitude of each indiv ... l ... he larger the class, the greater the negotiating power that follows from class ... As a consequence, there are strong incentives facing both the attorneys for th ... ss representatives to expand the definition of the class as much as poss ... class expands to include more diverse interests, however, the substantive under ... ir ... epresentative plaintiffs as to the nature of class claims and the relat ... F ... g those claims diminishes. Representative class members, necessarily, beco ... in ... ly dependent on class attorneys to understand the claims and how best to pursu ... h ...

Coffe ... v ... support for enhanced definition of subclasses with separate representatives and, ... ate counsel addresses this problem in part. [98] But the problem is endemic to r ... tions and cannot ever be fully solved. Especially in the context of tort clai ... ce of class members alleged to be victims will differ. Surely, Coffee is corr ... tutes an affirmative reform to create subclasses and to appoint repr ... t ... lass members who would otherwise be ignored. As the number of repr ... t ... members increases, however, problems of aggregation of the repr ... separate views increase. These problems, [*561] too, lead the group as a whol ... i ... gly rely on class attorneys to determine the course of the litigation.

The ... representation value has been principally endorsed by academics as a mec ... re that class members with meritorious claims receive sufficient sett ... [99] There is an inherent limitation, however, to the extent to which a proc ... ch as representation can advance substantive goals. In our democratic soci ... tion norms are egalitarian: one person, one vote. Substantive tort law norm ... have no egalitarian base. Tort victims are to receive damages awards or sett ... ng to the strength of their case and the seriousness of their wrongful injur ... review of relative class claims on the merits, accounting for substantive diffe ... e ... class member claims becomes difficult. The allocation of control over the litig ... -- ... ss definition to determination of the settlement distribution plan--will nece ... cted by the egalitarian expectations that follow from equal representation, rath ... nd completely by the norms of substantive tort law. Increasing the defi ... ses or invoking the procedural value of adequacy of representation can ... substantive problem.

The ... representation norm operates even more problematically with respect to the ... tive problem of class action litigation: the inclusion of unmeritorious clair ... ss. As mentioned above, there are powerful incentives for both class atto ... s ... sentative plaintiffs to expand the class definition as much as possible in orde ... r ... he class's negotiating power in settlement. Where the class is expanded to inclu ... ... our claims, enhancing adequacy of representation becomes a value cour ... substantive tort law goals. At the extreme, it provides for a repr ... ... in the control of the litigation to plaintiffs who should otherwise be excl ... s class. Yet even with respect to claims that have some, though less, merit, the e ... ... s of democratic representation elevates the influence of the unme... ...ri... ...--especially if they are in large number--beyond that consistent with the subs... ...ls of tort law.

REV_00263071

Refor... ...s actions by reducing conflicts of interest is also inadequate as a means of distin... ...between class claims that lack and that possess merit. As described earlier, many ... ...commentators have criticized on grounds of conflict of interest the practice of attor... ...ng cases for inventories of private clients on terms different than they settle for t... ...a... On similar grounds, they have criticized attorneys entering [*562] sepa... ...different fee arrangements with opt outs or other private clients than with class mem... s.

If the ... ...of all class members possess exactly equal merit, then settlement and fee pract... ...s n... ...ire represent clear conflicts and are worthy of condemnation. If the meri... ...cl...ms differ, however, as is generally true in the case of mass torts, then settle... ...different terms or at different fees may well be justified according to the subst... ...iv... ...ions of the law. Where the claims of some plaintiffs are strong, the ambi... ...s... ...w may be better achieved if the attorneys settle these claims with defer... ...t... ...r... ...tor amounts, perhaps receiving higher fees, [102] than if these plaintiffs are force... ...a... ...ut l...wer average awards as members of a class. Here, what appears to be a confi... ...f... ...rest, roundly condemned by academics, represents in fact the better achie... ...ne... ...of tort law's goals.

The r... ...e... ...us problem in such contexts, however, is whether the amounts awarded to the claim... ...a... ...air in the cla...s are excessive given substantive law. Where the meritorious cases ... ...v... ...le... ...se...arately, the claims that remain in the class may represent no more than ... ...er, ...within some thin legal category to the meritorious claims, but without subst... ...ia... ...the conflict-of-interest norm does not provide a basis for determining the under... ...ng... ...a claim and, thus, is an inadequate surrogate for direct substantive review.

Finally, ...cedural value of maximizing plaintiff autonomy provides only a partial contri... ...va...d achieving substantive tort goals. The plaintiff-autonomy value is invoked most ... ...with respect to reforms that would maximize opt-out opportunities for class memb... ...rs... ...n, it is commonly believed that actual opt outs or the threat of opt outs will provid... ...e... ...of discipline to the conduct of class litigation.

As des... ...ib... ...d, opting out of a class may be the best means for a tort victim with a meritor... ...ob... ...tain an appropriate settlement. While in virtually all large class actio... ...s... ...like some class members who opt out on grounds of principle--they dislike litigat... ...re... ...move the cause of action in the case--most of those who opt out do so for reaso... ...s... ...with the goals of tort law: because they believe that they can obtain a better ... ...h an indiv...dual settlement or through litigation.

Where ... ...numbers have opted out, however, the class settlement remains in effect for tho... ...who hav... the weakest cases or even nonexistent cases. Defendants, of cours... ...e... ...s of this problem and [*563] often introduce what are called "walk-away ... ...s... ...lass settlements. These provisions allow the defendants to unilaterally can...el ... ...s... ...ttlement if some number or some percentage of class members opt out. But "... ..." provisions themselves are problematic and introduce new and difficult tactic... ...s for defendants. Class members are given the opportunity to opt out after they ... ...full notice of the claims in the litigation, including a description of the stre... ...th... ...s... ...s of the claims and, in some circumstances such as a settlement notice, ...the amount the defendant is willing to pay to settle the aggregate claims. In... ...se... ...ttlement notice will often exaggerate the merits of the litigation in order to con... ...inc... ...ce to approve the settlement. Prior to the settlement notice, however, the individ...al ... ...may have only had a vague understanding--if any at all--of the nature of the litigatio d of its prospects. Yet, when a defendant invokes a "walk-away" provision, it does not r e members of a class to the status quo prior to the settlement. Instead, the defendant faces a certified class which has been informed--perhaps overinformed--of the merits of the igation and surely informed that the defendant values settlement on positive terms. Thi nomenon often leads defendants to renounce their "walk-away" right, even where there e been substantial numbers of opt outs. The class that remains--and with which the m t has been reached--may have little relation to the objectives of tort law if the plain ts members are substantively weak or nonexistent. In these circumstances, the plaintif ony norm provides no help toward the problem of unmeritorious claims.

REV_00263072

Finally, ma zing opt-out opportunities generates other substantive problems in class action adm ration beyond leaving chiefly unmeritorious claims within a class. A broad availa ility e opt-out opportunity relaxes the vigilance of the court with regard to the conduct of tion. This problem provides further reasons for class action outcomes to depar fro substantive objectives of the law.

The creati free and open opt-out rights allows a court to believe that the conduct of the class tic be adequately monitored by class members themselves. The court need only give atten appropriate notice to members of the class in order to inform their opt-out decisions. given the possession of a right to opt out, if any class member becomes dissatisfie the litigation, he or she can register that dissatisfaction by exercising the right. his a s a court to resume its normal position in litigation as an umpire resolving disput d is brought to its attention through the adversarial process, rather than as a careful m f class attorneys' activities in contexts in which representative class mem rs ot sufficiently informed to fulfill an adversarial role. This relaxed approach of cou s owe class attorneys to pursue aims in class administration (often [*564] politic l a unrelated to the substantive goals of the litigation. Obviously, the lower the leve ju vigil e, the less the class litigation will adhere to the substantive objectives of t av hen efficiency or equity. The litigation, instead, will be controlled by class attorneys e ma agement of the class may have little to do with the substantive goals of tort la . A the plaintiff-autonomy value does not directly address these problems.

B. The Fail of the Individual Litigation Ideal as a Surrogate for Substantive Control

Many com rts and courts have criticized mass tort class actions based on ways that they depa n an image of individual litigation. Some believe that many of the problems of mass tort actions could be resolved if the class action were transformed to resemble individual tion, such as by enhancing plaintiff autonomy and deputing representatives to make dec as if they were individual litigants. [105] Others believe that mass tort class actions sh e transformed into individual litigation literally: by maximizing opt-out rights and prefe ndividual to class litigation where the stakes of individual claims are high. [106] In still oth es, courts have decertified unusual classes--such as the settlement class including s claimants in Georgine--because the nature of the class and the settlement seemed t t so substantially from the individual litigation ideal. [107]

It is alway problematic to compare an existing phenomenon to an ideal, and no less true in the case s to class actions. The ideal of individual litigation--controlled by a fully informed , lawyer in low, making no litigation investment not worth the expected benefit--is ly unrealistic in most mass tort contexts. As mentioned earlier, mass tort class litiga s fairly compared only to other high-risk contingency-fee litigation where the plaintiff s ttle more than as an instrument of the attorney pursuing the claim. In such a context, t seriously t ideal norms of individual plaintiff autonomy and control causes a reviewir t to misunderstand the essence of the issues before it.

Pursuit of individual litigation ideal forfeits the benefits available from class treatment of legal issu e an important affirmative role [*565] for the class action in both the efficiency a corrective justice traditions of tort law. Class actions can substantially reduce the costs o ation by exploiting economies of scale. Class actions can serve as the most effective r of achieving justice for a substantial group of citizens. The individual litigation i ciple's these benefits. Maximizing opt outs, for example, increases litigation costs and well lead class outcomes to further depart from the substantive ambitions of the law. M izing opt-out opportunities, as discussed, can be justified instrumentally as an indirect te que for imposing some form of discipline toward the direction of the litigation. Of course, e are serious questions as to how effective this indirect means can be, given class mem general lack of information about the litigation. It has become necessary to rely for su tive direction of class litigation on such an indirect mechanism as the opt out, admittedly questionable effect, because of the purely procedural constraint of class certificatio ow. The benefits of class aggregation could be better achieved if courts were to subject ntain to direct substantive review on the merits prior to certification.

REV_00263073

Similarly, commentators and courts have invoked the individual litigation ideal in the context of treatment of claims involving high stakes. Various courts have decertified classes in because the claims are of sufficient dollar magnitude to support individual litigation. courts have expressed disfavor of class certification of any claim involving personal i on a similar ground. [109] The Advisory Committee has proposed amending Rule 23 to mak ability to pursue individual litigation an explicit factor under Rule 23(b)(3) superiorit is. [110]

This appr o, simply forsakes all benefits to be achieved from class aggregation. There is no prin case for refusing class certification to large stakes claims. There is no analytical for concluding that the aggregation of large stakes claims cannot achieve economie le; indeed as a first approximation, just the opposite: in individual cases, litigation e ure are higher, the greater the stakes in the case. Thus, there exists a greater ra vailable economies from aggregation in highstakes than in low-stakes cases. Sin here is no analytical reason to believe that class aggregation will not prove to be the effective means of achieving corrective justice for groups of aggrieved citizens, e h has suffered a more serious as opposed to a less serious loss. The explanat s of the Advisory Committee give no principled justification for such an amendm rsoever and simply conclude that wherever [*566] it is possible to segregat tha might be brought individually from treatment in a class, it is appropri s sc [111]

Instead, t for refusing class status to large stakes claims is prudential. Various appellate nd, apparently, the Advisory Committee fear that class certification is being employed e essentially unmeritorious claims which, in turn, extort large--and unmerite offers from defendants who might otherwise be found free of liability. [112] If this t, then it is obviously more serious where the stakes of each individual claim are th hav w.

But the p ure goes too far. The proposition that large-stakes claims are never deserving a aggregation because of the fear of unmerited settlements can only be maintaine gh, where courts refuse to evaluate the merits of claims prior to class certificatio urts in contrast, were to engage in direct substantive review of class claims prior to c on e extortion problem would disappear, and the benefits from the aggregati ih akes claims could be achieved.

Finally, t dual litigation ideal has paralyzed courts in their evaluation of the most controve o mass tort classes: settlement classes, futures classes, and mandato ne futures classes. As described earlier, two Third Circuit courts have recently d settlement classes, ruling that such classes can only be certified if they comply w the requirements for certification of a litigation class. [113] There are two importan tio to this holding: first, that the fact of settlement will not affect the court's m... ability analysis; second, that futures classes will probably not ever be certified since the de... of futures class members and the nature of the harm they might suffer exist only r... ry and, thus, do not confer standing under the law of many states. These rulings fo... s from a preference for individual litigation than from a conclusion that settlemer... and futures class litigation depart so substantially from "normal" individual litigation ... ey cannot be maintained. [114]

REV_00263074

These Th... cuit opinions are well crafted and thoroughly reasoned--in both cases by Judge Be... jurist of the highest intelligence and ability. I respectfully believe, however, that the a... h of these opinions, informed as it is by the individual litigation ideal, places limits on ... s action device compelled only because of the current inability of courts to [*567] ... in a thorough substantive review of the merits of a claim prior to class certific...

The ba... ntive question in evaluating any request to certify a settlement class is whethe... ns of the settlement are fair. The fairness evaluation must extend not only to the aggr... rms of the settlement but also to the terms of distribution of the settlement amoun... members of the class. According to the substantive goals of tort law, it is import... ss members with deserving claims receive their appropriate shares of the settlem... class members with weaker claims receive commensurately lower shares, and th... mbers with unmeritorious claims be excluded from the class definition. [115] Many ... ni... cribe even the conception of settlement classes because of concerns that such s... ... wil... frequently be collusive and that conflict-of-interest concerns will be great. ... e Georgine court refused class certification, in part, on these grounds. [117] At heart, ... ve ... these issues ... are substantive issues. They can only be addressed properly with s... ti..., not ... ural, review.

The p... procedural approach to class certification imposes a serious structural challenge in the co... of ... lement classes. Where a settlement class has been proposed, the first issue ... th... court is co...ification of the class; the court reaches the substantive fairness of the ... m... on' after certification. Again, many courts recognize that certification alone of a c... n ... the unfair negotiating power in many litigation contexts. Where, however, a court ... rti... ss, ... t then disapproved the terms of the settlement, the court has created ... un... negotiating power without giving the defendant the benefit of the settle... Th... problem ... specially acute where the grounds for disapproval of the settle... are ... t that th... ggregate settlement amount is insufficient but rather that the terms o... s... lem... t d... bution as among class members fails the substantive fairness stand... gu... y, ... is concern was the underlying basis for the Third Circuit decisions decer... cl... ... that neral Motors Fuel Tank Litigation and in Georgine. [118] It is best addre... ho... ... direct substantive, not indirect procedural, review of class certif... .

The T... Circui... ossibility o... settlement and futures classes, in my [*568] view, derives more ... ly ... the limitations of the purely procedural approach to class action review. That ... ca... coherently defined and that a settlement has been reached must affect the m... ab... of the action--which is to say, the prospect that the settlement might succe... ac... ve ... s... stantive goals of the law. Manageability, however, obviously does not e... n t... ... settlement is substantively fair as among respective members of the class.

Simila... wo... ... difficult to argue that no settlement could ever be defined for a futures class ... hi... ... substantive goals of tort law. The Third Circuit in Georgine, recoiling ag... in... ma... ... features of the settlement class in that case, [119] concluded that a gl... al ... tion ... mbos... s litigation problem was beyond the control of our civil litigation sy... re... ... ional attention, perhaps in the form of a compensation plan. [120] Th... ..., t... ... m the excessive constraints of a purely procedural approach to some subset of class members have been too low either in absolute terms or in relation to settlements to more-favored class members or to individuals opting out of the class. [7]

REV_00263075

At the same time, several appellate courts have indicated increasing concern of an opposite direction: that certification of a mass tort class action confers negotiating power unfair to defendants. Within recent years, courts in four federal appellate circuits have decertified significant mass tort class actions. [8] Each decision was based on the failure of the proposed class to satisfy one or another of the procedural requirements for certification under Rule 23, though openly in some [9] and lurking beneath the surface in the others is the fear that certification alone will be determinative of the dispute and unfairly determinative if the underlying substantive merit of the claim is low. Issues relating to settlement classes or to futures classes have received mixed reception in the courts. The Third Circuit has prominently staked a position opposing certification of both settlement classes and futures classes. [10] The Fifth Circuit, in contrast, though with somewhat different procedural safeguards, has recently approved a settlement involving a solely futures class. [11] At this writing, the U.S. Supreme Court is set to address the issues of settlement and futures classes in appeals of these two decisions.

Finally, within recent months, the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules [*524] has proposed important amendments to F.R.C.P. Rule 23 that in some respects meld the academic and judicial concerns. [12] In general, the proposed amendments seem to constrict substantially the availability of the class action device in the context of mass tort litigation. Thus, they disfavor certification of classes where the stakes are sufficient for claimants to support individual litigation and also disfavor some forms of low-stakes litigation where litigation costs are likely to exceed expected benefits. They introduce a new criterion of "maturity" for the determination under Rule 23(b)(3) of whether class litigation is superior to individual litigation. The committee also proposes an amendment that would explicitly approve certification of classes that have reached a settlement on grounds that certification prior to settlement would be unfair to defendants. Yet, however seemingly constrictive the proposed amendments, they are defended by the same values motivating the academic critics, in particular, the vindication of plaintiff autonomy. Thus, they presume that high-stakes cases are better brought individually, rather than as class litigation, so that the individual plaintiff will have maximum control and, conversely, that low-stakes litigation may be better if never brought because individuals would not do so where costs exceed benefits.

The Advisory Committee's proposed amendments have generated criticism, perhaps most prominently by a collection of well-known academics from leading schools calling itself the Steering Committee to Oppose Proposed Rule 23. [13] This group's concerns, however, extend only to the amendment's disfavor of small-stakes class actions and approval of what the Steering Committee views as potentially collusive settlement classes. The Steering Committee seems silently to approve the Advisory Committee's proposal with regard to high-stakes litigation, apparently sharing the value of promoting plaintiff autonomy.

As might be evident from the preceding discussion, there is a curious disjunction among these various approaches to the mass tort class action. The dominant academic literature, the Steering Committee, and some courts generally approve of class aggregation in the mass tort context, though insisting on a wide range of specific reforms to control what are regarded as abuses. They regard settlement and futures classes as so susceptible to abuse as to merit rejection in virtually all cases. In contrast, the four circuit courts and the Advisory Committee seem hostile to the mass tort class action in general, though the Advisory Committee endorses settlement classes [*525] as other courts endorse futures classes. What is curious is that each of these different groups invokes identical values to reach dramatically contrasting positions. The single value underlying each of these various conclusions is that the mass tort class action should be made to resemble individual litigation. The academic literature and the Steering Committee advance the values of representation, control of conflicts of interest and, most important, vindicating plaintiff

REV_00263049

the iss

Viewe an iss proce ure, the settlement plan in Georgine more closely resembles a legisl om n p l than a judgment in a tort case. [121] But viewed from a concern abcut an' goals the resolution of asbestos claims is inescapably a judicial, rather than a at avor The modern asbestos litigation phenomenon was created by the courts hr on o liability against asbestos manufacturers and their insurers on the a t dify the goals of tort law. Asbestos litigation can be expected to contin g i futu because, again, the courts have further expanded liability on behalf rsc direc y exposed to the product to further advance substantive legal goals.

The pr el c roblem with respect to asbestos litigation, however, is not temporal, but fi . t nd remain from asbestos manufacturers and insurers to compensate these v The l ted fund problem derives in a different way from the courts: in partic or il of courts to limit multiple punitive damages recoveries from individ g th ften the availability of funds to compensate future victims. The future er in Georgine and the mandatory futures settlement class in Ahearn repres di th cal with these problems.

The m pc ues in settlement futures class litigation, however, are not procedural, but su iv e se lements substantively fair in [*569] aggregate amount? Do they a e t r an g members of the class in a way that complies with the su st st b law? Th e are uniquely judicial, not legislative, issues. The st d b t legal, not electoral. According to both efficiency and corre st rde the compensation to be distributed to the victims is to come from t e ert sers themselves, not from the general tax base or from specific taxab it s x on future chemical sales to support Superfund cleanups. As a cons ce our rom of justice, these substantive issues should be resolved by our co ic leg ures. The controversy that surrounds settlement and futures classe d m excessively narrow procedural approach to the issue of class adjud .

Final nd n idea' and the procedural approach constrict judicial attention to v h ass li tion that have important substantive effects. Rule 23 pr c has rtifica in and notice. Rule 23, of course, confers general ec it th to manage an action, but once certification requirements are m t a c scrutiny is often relaxed.

There ry stantive issues in all class litigation, however, relating to the specif a where here is a settlement, to the design of a distribution plan that a le so proce ural approach. In individual litigation, the definition of the p in ant; the distribution of the settlement or judgment is generally ei he ht relevant to the court. In class litigation, in contrast, class d d distribution have important substantive dimensions, d r y urely p dural approach.

Th s th class definitions will include individuals who do not merit re ov y stantive legal standard. Prior to class certification, plaintiffs' at orr e ansive class definition possible in order to maximize their ba a ficatio , if settlement is expected, defendants will seek to ex l in order to maximize the preclusive effect of the settlement. Class a en the size of the class is a relevant factor in the d thorne fees. Indeed, class attorneys are most likely to a lass m ividuals who have the weakest substantive cases, ur n. Each of these reasons suggests that the class definition will gene[illegible] o[illegible] [illegible]p[illegible]nsive in relation to any substantive theory of liability or to the subs[illegible] ob[illegible]/es of th[illegible] law.

REV_00263076

Once [illegible]ttlc[illegible] agreement has been reached, there are strong political incentives to inclu[illegible] as[illegible]'ers in the distribution of the settlement fund. The adequacy-of-repre[illegible]on[illegible] suggests that a class resembles [*570] a democratic unit, pressing towa[illegible]ga[illegible] distribution. Indeed, it is the unusual class in which some class member reca[illegible]i[illegible] y providing positive recoveries to all class members, a settlement distri[illegible]al[illegible] by definition, will depart from the substantive objectives of the law.

Inde[illegible]e di[illegible]e between settlement shares and substantive tort standards are often extr[illegible]vi[illegible] themselves of the defendant, class attorneys' chief remaining problems deriv[illegible]cl[illegible]e[illegible]ber objectors. There are strong incentives to anticipate objections and to pr[illegible]h[illegible] relatively generous provisions in the distribution plan.

This [illegible]c[illegible] use, once settlement is expected and the settlement amount de[illegible] generously adversarial character to class litigation. The only true su[illegible] s are members of the class themselves or, at least, those with rel[illegible]h[illegible] lower merit claims under the law who, substantively, are deserving of diffe[illegible]Ju[illegible] ares. In the absence of true controversy, for the court to maintain its rol[illegible] empire alone would disregard substantive values.

V. C[illegible]C[illegible]AN COU[illegible]TS REVIEW CLASS CLAIMS ON THE MERITS PRIOR TO CER[illegible]C[illegible]

The [illegible] argued that the procedural approach to controlling mass tort class ac[illegible]d[illegible] in se[illegible] respe[illegible], the point should be obvious. If one accepts that ce[illegible]f[illegible] lon[illegible] eater substantial negotiating power and accepts that that neg[illegible]e c[illegible]ated even in contexts where there is little or no substantive mer[illegible]el[illegible] it should be obvious that our legal system should provide for sub[illegible] he merits of class claims prior to certification.

Revi[illegible] prior to certification, however, is alien to our system. As is well known, the c[illegible] did not consider its role in the mass tort context [123] or surely imagine the r[illegible] that class certification would ultimately confer. They crafted Rule 23 viewi[illegible] a class as a procedural device alone. The subsequent academic co[illegible] trial treatment of the class action have accepted this procedural cast. Ac[illegible] tended to impose some substantive control on the mass tort class action, but[illegible] chosen--invoking the values of adequacy of representation, vi[illegible] [*571] autonomy, and control of conflicts of interest--are inadequate to [illegible] in my view, regrettably--has led appellate courts and groups such[illegible] to impose increasing constraints on the class action mec[illegible] certification decisions and through proposed amendments that would su[illegible] class action availability.

To m[illegible] confronting the policy arguments in favor of substantive review of class cla[illegible] for[illegible] there remains an important obstacle to their adoption: the Su[illegible]urt[illegible] decision in Eisen, discussed above. [124] In an ideal world, Rule 23 m[illegible]en[illegible] overrule Eisen. Before taking that step, however, it is worthwhile re[illegible]ser[illegible] the nature of its proscription. In my view, Eisen can be read to al[illegible]ul[illegible]ra[illegible] of substantive claim review prior to class certification.

Rec[illegible]he[illegible] in Eisen related to notice. The district court had determined that noti[illegible]ot[illegible] to class members, but only to a limited set. The court had also rule[illegible]e[illegible] was to be responsible for paying 90 percent of the costs of notice. This[illegible]ng[illegible] the court's finding, after holding a preliminary hearing, that the pla ...s w... ...e lik... than not to prevail on the merits.

REV_00263077

The ...e C... reject... the district court's conclusion. The Court ruled that Rule 23 mar ...div... ...n tic... each class member. More important, the Court stated that ther ...prov... ...n Ru... 23 for a lower court's review of the merits of the claim for purp ...shif... notice ...sts to a defendant. Allow me to quote more fully from the Co... ...issi... ...is p...nt than discussed above. The Court states,

We ...thing ...ner t... language or history of Rule 23 that gives a court any authority to ... a pr... ...y in...dry into the merits of a suit in order to determine whether it may be ... ...ed ...s a ...on. Indeed, such a procedure contravenes the Rule by allowing a re... ...ve ...f to s...ure the benefits of a class action without first satisfying the requ... ...s f... ...y is th...reby a...wed to obtain a determination on the merits of the clai... ...ce ...a... the class without any assurance that a class action may be ma... [12]

As ...d, ...language in Eisen has been subsequently read to prohibit any evaluation of ... s o... ...t th... point of class certification, [126] a proposition similar to Judge Wi... ...lin... ...v... ...ckey, [*572] Int'l, Inc. [127] A more narrow reading of Eisen, ho... ...ma... ...sibl... ...t is evident from the Court's treatment that the Court's concern ab... ...c... ...erits... a claim at class certification is related to the district court's use of ... ...w... ...notic... ...osts to the defendant. Note that, immediately after the first se... ...ste... ...a co...ding that nothing in the language or history of Rule 23 confers au... ...s... ...e r... ...w, the Court justifies this approach by referring to "benefits" to th... ...fro... ...ning... ...t review. These words remain mysterious to the modern eye, an... ...el... ...t co...tent with a broad and neutral procedural conclusion similar to th... ...e V... ...n.

Ac... ...o th... ...rev...w on the merits would allow a representative plaintiff "to secure the ... of ...act... ...without first satisfying the requirements for it." It is not at all cle... ...ne ..." a... ...o wh...h the Court is referring. Most probably, the Court is re... ...he ...the ...ts of ...ce to the defendant, as approved by the district court be... ...l c... ...ovi...ding that the plaintiff was more likely than not to prevail. Poss... ...ve ...Co... ...is con...rred that a finding that the plaintiff is likely to prevail wi... ...t... ...e di...t cou...'s ruling on class certification. Either of these in... ...ns... ...er, c...arts substantially from Judge Wisdom's more comprehensive pr... ...'ur... ...dom... ...rohib...ion in Miller is procedural in nature: no review on the mer... ...he ...wh...ther th...review shows (1) no merit to the claim, or (2) sub... ...ne... ...cla... [128] The Supreme Court in Eisen seems concerned only about th... ...f l... ...ssibl...ties. S...ch a finding by the lower court following a certification he... ...th... ...hant...t the pl...ntiff, is more likely to prevail or that the plaintiff's cla... ...th... ...not ...vide... ...ognizable benefit to the plaintiff. According to this rea... ...n ...sur... not a...rizing substantive review prior to certification, does no... ...di... ...rt r...ew to determine whether there is sufficient merit to even er... ...t... ...op...ed cla...s complies with the various requirements of Rule 23.

Th... ...la... ...h not ...e speculation. This reading of Eisen allows a court to control at th... ...o... ...f le... ...one of ...e two substantive concerns relating to class actions. As ...a... ...s...tant...c...cern--most important to the academic commentary--is ...th... ...ers...s ru...v... the fullest possible amount in class settlements. The se... ...o... ...ubst...ve c...n--most important to the appellate courts and, pe... ...A... ...r Com...tee--is that claims without merit [*573] not be certified for clas... ...en... ...stra...he unf...l negotiating power that derives from certification. Ar... ...s ...has ...plai...the decertification decisions of the Seventh Circuit in Rh... ...a... ...e F...h Ci...t in Castano. According to the reading suggested above, Eis... ...t... ...pre...e this second, negative review: the determination that if the und sub e claim is without merit, class certification should be denied.

REV_00263078

Wh en read in this manner or not, or whether further amendment of Rule 23 or r ral of isen is compelled, this article has argued that courts must extend bey ed review of class certification as well as of all remaining features of class adv on. Most important problem relating to modern mass tort class actions is alig s a utcomes with the substantive goals of tort law.

FO S:

n1 ene George L. Priest, The Invention of Enterprise Liability: A Critical History of ect dations of Modern Tort Law, 14 J Legal Stud 461 (1985).

n2 Mat hone-Poulenc Rorer Inc, et al, 51 F3d 1293, 1300 (7th Cir 1995). For a sim me Valentino v Carter-Wallace, Inc, 97 F3d 1227, 1232 (9th Cir 1996).

n3 r ex d, George L. Priest and Benjamin Klein, The Selection of Disputes for Litig 3 J Stud 1 (1984).

n4 arcia ell, Science on Trial (1996).

n5 M. S Mass Torts: An Institutional Evolutionist Perspective, 80 Cornell L Rev 94).

n6 r e . Symposium: Mass Tortes: Serving Up Just Desserts, 80 Cornell L Rev 81 :

n7 pa , John C. Coffee, Jr., Class Wars: The Dilemma of the Mass Tort Class Act olu 1 (199).

n8 Pol (cited in note 2); In re American Medical Systems, Inc, 75 F3d 1069 (6th Cir as mer n To Co, 84 F3d 734 (5th Cir 1996); Valentino (cited in nc n9 e ca d in note 2.

n10 Ge tors Corp Pick-Up Truck Fuel Tank Prods Liability Litigation, 55 F3d 76 19 rgin Ant on Prods, Inc, 83 F3d 610 (3d Cir 1996).

n11 Asb Litigation (Ahearn), 90 F3d 963 (5th Cir 1996).

n12 xt roposed amendments (Proposed Changes to Federal Rule of Civil Pro 3 a sory ommittee Notes) appears at 24 Prod Safety & Liab Rptr 606 (Bu lat airs 96), hereafter cited as Advisory Committee Notes.

n13 ng tee to Oppose Proposed Rule 23, Letter to the Standing Committee on Ru cti rocedure (Administrative Office of the US Courts, June 1, 1996).

n14 v C Jac elin, 7 U.S. 156 (1974).

n15 or , the Cornell Symposium (cited in note 6).

n16 (cit ote .

n17 1422 .

n18 Cra mph izes his point. See Roger C. Cramton, Individualized Justice,

REV_00263079

Mas... and "...": An Introduction, 80 Cornell L Rev 811 (1995). See ... (...).

...25; ... generally, Susan P. Koniak, Feasting While the Widow Weeps: Georgine v ..., 80 ... 1045 (1995).

...on, at ... (cited in note 13).

...Richard ... Marcus, They Can't Do That, Can They? Tort Reform Via Rule 23, 80 Cor... v 85... 5); ... Fiss, ... 1350 (cited in note 7); Schuck, at 964 (cited in note 5).

...n pa... ... M... s (... note 21).

...offee ... in n... 7). ... also the Seventh Circuit's discussion of this point as ad... oun... ...Rhone-Poulenc (cited in note 2).

...or ex... ..., the ... settlement ... agreement in the Georgine futures class (cited in note 10 ...mita... ...ro... ...d ... the grounds on which the Third Circuit rejected the Ge... ...lem...

...s (ci... note ...); Schuck, at 964 (cited in note 5); Coffee, at 1373 (cited in no...

...equa... ...repr... ...issue, discussed above, relates to conflicts of interest ar... me... ...t to be dealt with--though not perfectly resolved-- thro... crea... ...sc... ...to s... ...ses representing the different interests. See Coffee, at ... ...d in ... ...).

...350 ... ... (cited in note 19).

..., at 37... ...n not... 7).

...419 For ... mor... gener... discussion of problems relating to attorneys' fees in cl... ..., s... J... Th... ... E. Curtis, and Deborah Hensler, *Individuals within th...: ...pr... ...*71 NYU L Rev 296 (1996).

...(cited in ... ...).

...313 Ge... ... ...ited in note 19).

..., at 31... (cite... ...note ...); Koniak (cited in note 19).

...on (...ed in no... 19).

...Po... enc... (... ...).

...390.

...

...30...

...30... 30...

...en... edi... (... ...ms ...ed in note 8).

REV_00263080

[illegible]n40 [illegible]ntino (cited in note 2).

[illegible]n4[illegible] [illegible]are 97 F3d at 1232-33 with 1233-34.

[illegible]n42 [illegible]no, at 746 (cited in note 8).

[illegible]n43 747.

[illegible]n44 [illegible]urse, as mentioned earlier, all classes certified in a mass tort context appear to have [illegible]d their claims prior to judgment.

[illegible]n4[illegible] [illegible]al Motors Fuel Tank Litigation (cited in note 10). This excellent and com[illegible]ive c[illegible]inion rejects approval of the settlement on grounds of conflict of inte[illegible], sim[illegible]ar, [illegible] the attorney fee award negotiated by counsel without court revie[illegible]

[illegible]n46 [illegible]rgine (cited in note 10). The class settlement represented the outcome of the con[illegible]n of all outstanding federal asbestos cases by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litig[illegible]d th[illegible]r[illegible]ur[illegible] to Judge Charles R. Weiner. The history of this extraordinary effo[illegible]olve the asbe[illegible] litig[illegible]n appears in the Georgine opinion at 618-19. Also see Cof[illegible] 393-[illegible]0 ([illegible]ted in note 7).

[illegible]n[illegible] [illegible]ourt [illegible]so [illegible]ed, as is typical in decisions decertifying classes, that there was no [illegible]lity [illegible] a [illegible] regard to asbestos personal injury claims--an always ava[illegible]nclus[illegible]n, but [illegible]y to[illegible]us given universal recovery by claimants against asbe[illegible]anufa[illegible]turers.

[illegible]n4[illegible] [illegible]n argument that welfare-like distribution plan in a mass tort exposure case is the [illegible]propriate me[illegible]s[illegible] achieving both justice and deterrence, see David R[illegible] Ind[illegible] a[illegible] llectivizing Risk-Based Claims in Mass-Exposure Cases, 71 [illegible]v 2[illegible]0 ([illegible]5)

[illegible]n[illegible] [illegible]wer[illegible] [illegible]d the mandatory class including futures claimants because the de[illegible]os[illegible] [illegible] against which all claimants might recover.

[illegible]n5[illegible] [illegible]ote 1[illegible] above.

[illegible]n[illegible] [illegible]v Fibreboard [illegible]al, 162 FRD 505 (ED Tex 1995).

[illegible]n[illegible] [illegible]men[illegible] [illegible]ively overrule the Third Circuit decisions, discussed ab[illegible]ng c[illegible]tific[illegible] [illegible]nent classes to contexts in which the class would be cert[illegible]tig[illegible]n. See [illegible] Motors Fuel Tank Litigation (cited in note 10); Georgine (cited in [illegible] [illegible]n[illegible] [illegible]ene[illegible], [illegible] (cited in note 19). For a more precise advocacy of larger re[illegible]ce [illegible] [illegible]d in note 7).

[illegible]n5[illegible] [illegible]s E.[illegible] [illegible]ver[illegible]ng Mature Mass Tort Litigation, 69 BU L Rev 659 (1989).

[illegible]n[illegible] [illegible]otes [illegible] & [illegible]y.

[illegible]n[illegible] [illegible]ry [illegible], at lines 135-52 (cited in note 12).

[illegible]n[illegible] [illegible]th W[illegible]h, [illegible] Actions: Efficiency, Compensation, Deterrence, and Conflict of In[illegible] Lec[illegible] [illegible]7 [illegible]

REV_00263081

...r ...cript... ...this ...rrective justice approach to tort law at this level of generality is all ...ces... y... ...bviously, there are many different corrective justice ap...cha... ...ce... ...atly the rights of plaintiffs to be vindicated and the mi... def... ...rrection. See, for example, George P. Fletcher, Fairness an... To... ...e... ...a... Rev 537 (1972); Richard A. Epstein, A Theory of Strict Liat... Leg... ....

...te...

...v M... ...In... c, ... F2d 424 (5th Cir 1971).

27 ...ehan v Rosenstiel, 424 F2d 161, 169 (3d Cir 1970)).

...xt a... ...

...at... ...e 14).

...arl... ...hur R. Miller, and Mary Kay Kane, 7B Federal Practice and Pro... 17... ...). Note that, shortly following the passage quoted above, the C... ...je... ...m's broad language in Miller. Eisen at 178 (cited in note 14) te... ...a more limited interpretation of Eisen.

...imi... ... Posner, Economic Analysis of Law 191 (4th ed 1992).

...nor... ...on of Eisen (cited in note 14), however, see text at notes 12... .

...(ci... .

...at... ...ble standard of appropriate individual reward in the con... ...ch... ...'s acceptable a much lower standard of rep... n.

...xt s... ...-33.

...xt s... ...-28.

...ue... ...in the text around notes 101-3.

...s... ...nd 10 above.

...Pc... ...); Castano (cited in note 8).

...-Pc... ...); American Medical Systems (cited in note 8).

...-Pc... ...); Castano (cited in note 8).

...ion (cited in note 10); Georgine (cited in note 10).

...(...).

..., ...te 8).

...c... ...to other available methods for the fair and efficient adj... of... ... 739.

REV_00263082

n8 46.

n9 Po ...c at 1... (cit... in note 2).

n8 ... a ... 15 (... n note ...).

n8 46 ... e ... rly ... laim in Castano was that cigarette companies had wro... ea... ic...tio... ddi...

n8 ...sta... ...ourt rel... h... ly on the maturity analysis in Rhone-Poulenc, extensively citi... ...er... Circuit ... ior... at 748.

n8 ... Po... ...c at 1... (cit... in note 2).

n8 ...39...

n8 Po ...t at 1... (ci... in note 2).

n8 ...e C...tano o... ... dis... ssion of these issues at 748-51 (cited in note 8).

n8 ...an... ...dical S... ...ma ... ed in note 8); Castano (cited in note 8); Rhone-Poulenc (cit... 2).

n9 ... d... ssion o... ...ese i... ues in the text at notes 34-41.

n9 ... (... d in no... ...).

n9 ...82 ...

n9 ...is ... the p... ...ed ...endments are so vigorously criticized by groups such as the ...Co... ...tee (... ...in... ...13).

n9 ...y ... ...mitte... ...tes... ...lines 227-30 (cited in note 12).

n9 Po ...c, pt 1 ...-139... (cited in note 2).

n9... ...F... Circuit ...expr... statement of this point in Castano, cited in text at note 80.

n9... ...of... ...on ...ugg... ...ns a... ...ddressed in text at notes 121-22.

n9... (ci... in note ...).

n9... ...t ... ...ote 15 ...).

n1... ...y ... note... ...30.

n1...

n1... ...f ... if more ...form... skill is required to establish the claim; lower fees if the cla... ... ...ta... lish...

n1... ...w... notes 2... ...2.

n1... ...is... ...litical i... ...atives facing class attorneys that follow from treating the class

REV_00263083

as a ... dy; see ... at note 122.

[n1' ... x. ... note s ... 1.

[n1 ...

[n1 ... in ... 617, 6 ... -35 (cited in note 10).

[n1 ... nc. at ... 0 (cited in note 2).

[n1' ... 633 (... d in note 10).

[n1' ... ... ob s (cited in note 12).

[n1 ... in ... 24- 4.

[n1 ... ... (cit ... n note 2); Castano (cited in note 8).

[n1 ... Fu ... ion (cited in note 10); Georgine (cited in note 10).

[n1 ... 's ex ... s explanation of this point in Georgine, at 617, 634-35 (cited in note ...

[n1 ... os ... f c ... ulting t ... standard are discussed in text at note 122.

[n1 ... 'ci ... d i ... ote 10).

[n1 ... , 6 ... -3 ... cite ... in ... te 10).

[n1 ... Motors ... Liligation, at 800-801 (cited in note 10) (discussing ina ... individual versus fleet purchasers); Georgine, at 63 ...) ... failure to include medical monitoring of futures me ...

[n1 ... ly d ... Supr ... Court, at least in the oral argument on appeal. For a des ... n, ... the Heat, 19 Am Law 84-85 (April 1997).

[n1 ... 6 ... ... e 10).

[n1 ... erg (cite ...) for explicit recognition of this proposition with res ...

[n1 ... The ... in Georgine was suspicious of the settlement plan because it p ... s ...), ... class members who contracted specific diseases, lea ... me ... o r ... no awards whatsoever. Georgine, at 630-31 (cited in no ...

[n1 ... , Fu ... Litigation," 54 L & Contemp Prob 5 (1991).

[n1 ... in note ... ... d at text surrounding notes 62-64.

[n1 ... .

[n1 ... t al ... 35 at 1 ... -26 (cited in note 64).

[n1 ... abov ...

REV_00263084

...n1 ... assar... ...ited in text at note 61.

S... ...EF?
C... ...ud. 5...

Dat... ... ...2 ... PM EDT

... LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyri... ...2 Le...xis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

autonomy in the class action context because those are the features most characteristic of litigation in an individual context. They oppose settlement and futures classes because they believe that such classes depart irretrievably from the individual litigation model.

Though to an opposite result, the four Circuit Courts and the Advisory Committee promote exactly the same values, however more directly. By decertifying classes and introducing new requirements that reduce the likelihood of class certification, the courts and the Advisory Committee are effectively forcing claimants to pursue their litigation in individual, rather than class, form. The Advisory Committee's endorsement of settlement classes is simply inconsistent and not fully explained.

Obviously, values such as promoting plaintiff autonomy or making class litigation resemble individual litigation could not serve as the basis for such radically different approaches to the mass tort class action if their content and normative force were clear and well defined. As I shall explain in more detail, the value of promoting plaintiff autonomy, while certainly unobjectionable on its face, has never received adequate moral definition or justification. Its extraordinary pliability derives from the fact that, in the class action as in other contingency fee litigation contexts, the notion of plaintiff autonomy or plaintiff control over the litigation is largely meaningless. Similarly, there has been little effort to explain why class litigation should be made to resemble individual litigation beyond the fact that individual litigation is regarded as the norm and class litigation, the exception. The individual litigation ideal, thus, appears to be little more than preference for the known and accepted status quo.

This article argues that the unusual disjunction between value and recommendation derives from the failings of a solely procedural understanding of Rule 23 class actions in the mass tort context and the disregard of the relationship between the mass tort class action and the substantive objectives of tort law. Following the U.S. Supreme Court's important decision in Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, [14] it has been believed improper to evaluate the substantive merits of a claim in considering whether a case may proceed as a class action. The absence of substantive review prior to certification (along with the liberalized pleading standards of the Federal Rules and the expansion [*526] of tort liability standards, referred to above) has meant that class certification alone confers negotiating leverage sufficient to force a significant settlement regardless of the merit of the case. As I shall attempt to demonstrate in more detail below, the power generated by class certification generates outcomes that depart very substantially from the substantive ambitions of tort law. Regrettably, the largely procedural focus of the modern literature as well as of reform efforts of groups like the Advisory Committee seem to presuppose a congruity between class litigation and the substantive objectives of the law. As an unintended consequence, much of what the current academic literature criticizes as indicating conflict of interest or as a violation of plaintiff autonomy in fact represents efforts that may more closely align recoveries from class action litigation with substantive legal aims. The criticism of settlement and futures classes, in particular, ignores these substantive ends.

This article discusses the relationship between the modern mass tort class action and the substantive objectives of tort law. Part I reviews current criticisms of mass tort class actions and the most prominent proposed reforms. Part II addresses briefly the basic substantive aims of tort law and the role of class actions toward achieving those aims. Part III addresses directly the relationship between the class action and the substantive goals of tort law. Part III shows that the various concerns of the modern academic literature--representation, plaintiff autonomy, conflict of interest--as well as the decertification efforts by the courts and the tightening of certification standards by the Advisory Committee are best understood as devices for exerting substantive control over class actions through procedural means. Part IV, however, explains why advancing procedural values alone to obtain substantive control remains unsuccessful. It demonstrates that many practices associated with modern tort class actions heavily criticized in the modern literature as violating procedural values in fact serve to more completely achieve the substantive goals of tort law. It follows from this point that these procedural values are inadequate in themselves to exert appropriate substantive control over the modern class action. Finally, Part V addresses how courts and commentators, including the Advisory Committee, can abandon the accepted Eisen approach and focus their attention more directly on the relationship between the class action and the substantive goals of the law. This focus must extend beyond class certification to issues today largely ignored in the literature, including the definition of the class and the design of the class settlement plan.

REV_00263050

I. MODERN CONCERNS ABOUT THE MASS TORT CLASS ACTION

This part examines in more detail the most prominent modern discussions of mass tort class actions. Although this sorting is admittedly inexact [*527] and though there are differences within each group, I will distinguish three separate approaches to mass tort class action reform: the first approach, deriving from the dominant academic literature, is generally supportive of the class action mechanism and is principally concerned about particular abuses that lead, in its view, to inadequate settlements for class members in some cases versus attorneys for the class and, in other cases, versus favored class members or individuals opting out of the class. This approach, as a general matter, opposes settlement and futures classes which, it is believed, systematically result in inadequate class settlements. The second approach is represented by an important set of recent judicial decisions. As mentioned, courts in four separate federal circuits have decertified classes, evidencing general hostility to the class action mechanism in the mass tort context. In addition, two other circuit courts have recently ruled on the availability of settlement futures classes--one decertifying the class, the other approving the class settlement. Finally, the third approach, not entirely separate from the preceding two, is represented by the proposals to amend Rule 23 of the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules whose recommendations bear some of the spirit of hostility to mass tort class actions, although they also--inconsistently--lend official approval to settlement classes.

This Part attempts to show that, however different these three approaches, they are alike in two respects: first, they all appear to derive from an effort to promote the value of plaintiff autonomy in litigation, believed submerged in the class context. Second, for reasons never fully explained, they all seek to make class litigation more closely resemble individual litigation through procedural means. This Part explains these views. Parts III and IV will show why I believe they are inadequate.

A. Academic Criticism of Mass Tort Class Actions

The primary academic concerns about the modern mass tort class action relate to issues of (1) the adequacy of class representation; (2) the vindication of plaintiff autonomy; and (3) conflicts of interest as between attorneys and the class or among class members. It is the basic view of this literature that problems of representation, conflict of interest and, obviously, plaintiff autonomy are largely solved in the individual litigation context. As a consequence, to the extent that class litigation can be made to resemble individual litigation, the problems of class litigation are reduced.

1. Adequacy of Class Representation

The concern over the adequacy of class representation relates to whether the named class plaintiffs will fully and completely make decisions with regard to the litigation similar to those that would be made if the entire class [*528] were polled on the question. Current conceptions view a litigation class as a democratic unit, though operating without regular democratic processes, such as voting. Instead, in the place of voting, the named class plaintiffs are chosen to be representative of the various interests of the class and deputed to act on behalf of the class with respect to decisions relating to the conduct of the litigation.

REV_00263051

Many commentators are concerned that the actual operation of class litigation departs substantially from this representative ideal. For example, many criticize the seeming fact that, most often, class litigation appears to be controlled nearly entirely by the attorneys for the class, with little substantive decision making by class representatives. [15] Similarly, many commentators have addressed the problem of achieving what might be called "comprehensive" representation: to the extent that interests or characteristics of class members differ, no single representative and, perhaps, no small subset of class members as representatives can adequately represent each member of the class. John Coffee, in particular, has vigorously advocated increasing the definition of subclasses--that is, units within the class comprising groups with different interests or concerns. [16] Each subclass would have its own representative members and, if necessary, its own attorney. [17]

The problem of class representation has been seen to be especially severe in the context of futures classes: classes of individuals who have yet to suffer a harm. While it is not difficult to select representatives from among a futures class, there is a serious question as to whether the class member selected will adequately represent the class given that, having not yet suffered harm, the representative has little interest in or concern about the dispute. [18] Some commentators have thought this problem to be essentially unresolvable and, thus, to provide strong support for opposing the creation of futures classes. [19]

2. Vindicating Plaintiff Autonomy

The plaintiff autonomy value seeks to give each class member as much individual control over his or her participation in the class litigation as possible. Roger Cramton, for example, views as the principal problem of class [*529] litigation what he calls the "tension between individual justice (party autonomy in an adversary system) and collective justice." [20] The plaintiff autonomy value is related to the adequacy of class representation. The representation question seeks to replicate through representative decisions the decisions individual class members would make if they were conducting the litigation themselves. Vindicating plaintiff autonomy, going further, calls for the adoption of procedures that would allow individual class members to take personal control over their role in the litigation.

Most basically, commentators concerned about plaintiff autonomy seek to maximize the availability of opt-out opportunities for class members. [21] According to this view, concerns of any nature about class litigation are diminished as long as class members are fully informed about the opportunity to opt out of the class in order to bring individual litigation and are freely able to exercise their opt-out rights. Maximizing opt-out opportunities, in fact, trumps concerns about inadequate representation, discussed above, or conflict of interest, discussed below. Thus, if the class is inadequately represented either by the representative plaintiffs or by class attorneys, individuals opting out of the class escape these harms and preserve their opportunity to litigate separately.

These concerns about plaintiff autonomy and the importance of the opportunity to opt out of a class have led many commentators to be severely critical of mandatory class actions under Rule 23(b)(1) and (2). [22] By definition, mandatory class actions from which opting out is prohibited violate the plaintiff autonomy norm. Similarly, many commentators are skeptical of any virtues of class treatment where the stakes in the litigation are sufficient to support individual litigation. [23] Where individual litigation is economically feasible, plaintiff autonomy can be best achieved by avoiding certification of a class altogether to allow plaintiffs to fully control their individual litigation.

Concerns about plaintiff autonomy have also fueled criticism of futures classes. The resolution of litigation involving futures plaintiffs is difficult if substantial subsequent opt-out opportunities exist because, with the availability of subsequent and unregulated opting out, it is not clear what dispute has been resolved. At the limit, if all but a single futures class member subsequently [*530] opt out of the settlement, the defendant has achieved nothing by settling with the class. This problem has been addressed in some futures class settlements by the imposition of opt-out limitations. [24] These limitations have been defined, in some cases, in terms of numbers of subsequent opt outs and, in others, in terms of timing, limiting the number of available opt outs over subsequent periods of time. As might be expected, limitations such as these on the opt-out opportunities of class members have been roundly condemned. [25]

REV_00263052

3. Conflicts of Interest

Perhaps the most serious grounds of academic criticism of the modern mass tort class action relate to conflicts of interest as between class attorneys and the class itself or among class attorneys. [26] The most basic concern is the fear that class attorneys will settle a case at an inadequate settlement amount in order to obtain attorneys' fees. There are different mechanisms for such settlements to occur. In some cases, settlement agreements with defendants incorporate an allocation of the settlement fund as between the amount to be paid out to class members and the amount to be paid to the attorneys as fees. Many charge that tort defendants can obtain lower overall settlement amounts in their negotiations with class attorneys if the defendants agree to larger class attorney fee allocations. [27] In other contexts, class attorneys are believed to settle cases prematurely in order to more rapidly obtain an agreed-on contingency. [28] In still other contexts, where courts limit attorney fees or the fee award is otherwise expected to be constrained, class attorneys are believed to encourage class members to opt out of the class in order for the attorney to separately negotiate a contingency fee more favorable with the individual than with the class. [29]

Some commentators view the conflict-of-interest problem as defining the [*531] essence of class litigation. Coffee, for example, in his excellent discussion of current class action issues, regards the nature of mass tort class litigation as shifting markedly in recent years dominated by issues of conflict of interest. According to Coffee, in the early years of mass tort class litigation, plaintiff attorneys dominated direction and outcome, gaining from the judicial expansion of tort liability an advantage unexpected by defendants. Coffee believes, however, that, in more recent years, defendants have gained control of mass tort class litigation through aggressively seeking collusive agreements with plaintiffs' counsel. [30]

These concerns lead Coffee and many other prominent commentators to regard the reduction of conflict-of-interest problems as the central necessary reform of the mass tort class action phenomenon. As indicated earlier, virtually all class actions settle rather than proceed to final adjudication. Coffee proposes as the normative defining rule for class action settlement that no class member ought to receive in settlement an amount less than he or she would have received if they had individually litigated the action to judgment. [31] Coffee and many others, thus, are highly critical of class attorneys who maintain an inventory of plaintiffs separate from the class for whom they obtain settlements on substantially more favorable terms than those they achieve for the class. [32]

Finally, concerns about conflict of interest have led many commentators to be especially suspicious of settlement classes: claimants certified as a class by a court after a settlement with the defendant has been achieved. Principally, these commentators are concerned that the defendant has chosen the attorneys with whom to settle who, because of achieving the settlement on terms attractive to the defendant, become appointed as attorneys for the class. [33]

4. The Academic Concerns Summarized

As described above, the principal modern academic concerns about mass tort class actions are entirely procedural in nature. Reforming the adequacy of class representation, providing more individual control--vindicating plaintiff autonomy--through maximizing opt-out opportunities, and more closely aligning the interests of the class and its attorneys or interests among the class relate to the conduct of the litigation rather than to its substance. [*532] Put differently, these concerns presuppose that class litigation is otherwise consonant with the substantive goals of tort law.

REV_00263053

Several of these concerns, of course, implicate substantive ends. Thus, John Coffee's criticism of collusive class action settlements assumes that these settlements afford lower recoveries to class members than are appropriate. Thus, he recommends that no individual class member receive in a class settlement less than the individual would receive if he or she were to individually litigate the case to judgment. Similar concerns address lawyers who settle private inventories of cases at average amounts greater than the same lawyers settle on behalf of the class they represent. Nevertheless, the approach toward resolution of these concerns remains procedural: enhancing representation, maximizing opt-out opportunities, managing the settlement process to reduce conflicts of interest.

Finally, as noted earlier, the procedural approach toward controlling mass tort class actions reflected in the modern academic literature is to make the class action more closely resemble individual litigation. Enhancing representation of class members means ensuring that class representatives make decisions that correspond more closely to the decisions the individual class member would make himself or herself in individual litigation. Reducing conflicts of interest means aligning the interests of attorneys with those of members of the class or among members of the class so that the litigation more closely resembles individual litigation. In most individual litigation, of course, there is no intraclient conflict, and the control afforded the plaintiff over the attorney reduces the attorney's ability to behave opportunistically at conflict with the client. Most important, maximizing opt-out opportunities achieves the individual litigation goal directly: class members who opt out convert themselves from class to individual litigants. Even without exercise, the opt-out opportunity serves to discipline class attorneys to reduce the differences between class and individual litigation in order to reduce the attraction of opting out.

B. Recent Judicial Approaches to the Mass Tort Class Action

Within the past 2 years, the most important development within the federal judiciary with respect to mass tort litigation has been the increasing willingness of circuit courts to reverse district court certification of classes under Rule 23. These circuit court opinions are remarkable since district court class certification decisions are not directly appealable and, thus, are only available for review either on certification by the district court under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), more drastically on mandamus, or on review of ultimate district court approval of a class settlement. Over this recent period, courts in the Seventh, Sixth, Ninth, and Fifth Circuits have decertified active [*533] classes, two separate courts in the Third Circuit have decertified settlement classes including a settlement futures class, although a court in the Fifth Circuit has recently approved a mandatory settlement class consisting solely of futures claimants.

There are several consistent themes running through these opinions. First, several courts appear acutely aware of the great negotiating power and pressure toward settlement generated by certification of a class alone. Each court struggles with the certification standards of Rule 23 to constrain that power, in particular, by giving exaggerated emphasis to the predominance of law and fact criteria of Rule 23(b)(3). Second, given the limitations of the purely procedural focus of Rule 23, various courts have engrafted a new criterion for class certification: the "maturity" of the litigation, a requirement that does not appear in Rule 23 (though would by an amendment proposed by the Advisory Committee) and, moreover, that is neither clearly defined nor consistently applied. Finally, to the Third Circuit, settlement and futures classes appear simply too novel--they depart too drastically from more normal litigation--to be entertained, though the Fifth Circuit has determined that procedural protections can be devised to justify them.

REV_00263054

The new direction of the federal appellate courts toward mass tort class actions has perhaps been led by the 1995 opinion of the Seventh Circuit in Rhone-Poulenc, [34] decertifying a national class comprising 2,000 to 120,000 hemophiliacs who sought to sue blood companies for distributing blood tainted with the HIV virus. More openly than in any other opinion, the court is concerned about the unfair pressure toward settlement that follows from class certification. The court applies the extraordinary remedy of mandamus to decertify the class because certification might force the defendants "to stake their companies on the outcome of a single jury trial, or be forced by the fear of the risk of bankruptcy to settle even if they have no legal liability." [35] According to the court, the litigation in this case would be better brought individually: the stakes of each individual claim are sufficiently high to support such litigation. In addition, the accumulated decisions of multiple juries, rather than a single verdict in a class action, are more likely to represent the substantively correct verdict with regard to the behavior of the defendants against members of the class. The court notes that, at the time of the lower court's certification, 13 individual cases had been tried, in 12 of which defendant verdicts were returned. The court views 13 trials to constitute a small sample [36] and concludes that the action has not reached [*534] a level of "consensus or maturing of judgment" [37] that will follow from further litigation. Finally, invoking the explicit requirements of Rule 23, the court concludes that the lower court has not shown convincingly that class litigation is superior. The potentially disparate laws of 50 states were not adequately considered. Nor did the lower court identify clearly the issues appropriately resolved in the class context. [38]

In the succeeding year, the Seventh Circuit's approach in Rhone-Poulenc was echoed in varying degrees in opinions decertifying classes in the Sixth, Ninth, and Fifth Circuits, respectively. In In re American Medical Systems, Inc., a Sixth Circuit court decertified a 15,000-120,000 person class suing manufacturers of allegedly defective penile implants. Decertification is appropriate, according to the court, because the litigation can be supported individually. In addition, the district court had not adequately determined that the laws of the 50 states were sufficiently common with respect to the issues in the case. [39] Shortly after, in Valentino v. Carter-Wallace, Inc., a Ninth Circuit court decertified a class suing a manufacturer of an epilepsy drug. Interestingly, the Ninth Circuit court expressly rejects the Seventh Circuit's concerns about negotiating power and pressure toward settlement in favor of the Sixth Circuit's approach in American Medical Systems, concluding that individual issues predominate over class issues given the claims in the case. [40] The rejection of the Seventh Circuit's approach is interesting, however, because the court in Valentino gives much greater attention to an explanation of the Seventh Circuit's concerns about pressure toward settlement and placing the fate of an industry in the hands of a single jury than it does to its conclusion that certification is inappropriate on grounds of lack of predominance. [41]

Finally, and most recently, a Fifth Circuit court in Castano v. American Tobacco Co. decertified a national class action against cigarette companies by a class of individuals purportedly addicted to nicotine, a class the court describes as the largest class ever entertained in the federal courts. The court, first, finds that differences in state law and differences among claimants in terms of the circumstances of their addiction compel decertification under Rule 23's predominance requirement. The court, however, proceeds to discuss the negotiating power issues, extensively and approvingly citing the Seventh Circuit's opinion in Rhone-Poulenc. The court is sensitive to [*535] the reality that "class certification magnifies and strengthens the number of unmeritorious claims." [42] Yet the court acknowledges the Supreme Court's ruling in Eisen that the substantive merits of a dispute are not appropriately considered in a class certification decision. Following the Seventh Circuit, the court finds the action here "immature," failing Rule 23(b)(3)'s superiority requirement. According to the Court, "a mass tort cannot be properly certified without a prior track record of trial from which the district court can draw the information necessary to make the predominance and superiority requirements required by Rule 23." [43]

Each of the four decisions discussed above decertified what I will call an "active" class: a

REV_00263055

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: niemeyer and "mass torts working group" (Edit Search)

↶Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*148 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1859, **

Copyright (c) 2000 The Trustees of The University of Pennsylvania University of Pennsylvania

June, 2000

148 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1859

LENGTH: 2605 words

SYMPOSIUM MASS TORTS: INTRODUCTION

Anthony J. Scirica+

+ United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. Judge Scirica also served as Chair of the Judicial Conference's Mass Torts Working Group.

TEXT:
[*1859]

Arguably the most vexing issue in modern civil litigation is the problem of personal injury mass torts - the accumulation of thousands (even millions) of claims through class actions or through aggregation in grouping individual lawsuits. Especially problematic are personal injury suits that are truly national in scope, implicating primarily state law, involving unresolved issues of causation and the possibility of latent injury. In many cases, these claims compete for a limited fund or insufficient assets and may threaten the financial stability of the defendants. Multiple individual filings threaten prompt adjudication of legitimate claims. Unreasonable delay, limited funds, and disparate verdicts on liability and damages raise serious questions of fairness. But aggregation has its price. It threatens individual consideration of cases and undermines the traditional lawyer/client relationship. Which prompts the question - how much aggregation, at what point in the litigation, and for what purpose?

In November 1999, the University of Pennsylvania Law School sponsored a Mass Torts Symposium to discuss these and other issues. The Symposium drew on and continued the work of the Judicial Conference's Mass Torts Working Group. [1] Symposium participants - including federal and state judges, litigators and corporate general counsel, academicians, and public interest lawyers - deliberated on federal/state issues, the problems of claims that may be made in the future, certification, settlement and closure of national mass tort actions, the unique problems of bankruptcy, and the costs and benefits of mass tort litigation.

[*1860] Not all mass claims are problematic. Since the 1966 revision of Rule 23, the federal legal system has, to a greater or lesser degree, satisfactorily accommodated class actions in antitrust, securities, consumer fraud, and employment discrimination. The adoption of the Multidistrict Litigation ("MDL") statute [2] and the discerning and resourceful actions of the MDL panel and transferee judges have permitted the fair and expeditious resolution of many mass claims.

REV_00263086

When over time serious mass claim problems were perceived, Congress and the Supreme Court Rules Committees responded with changes in substantive and procedural law. [3] In securities fraud, for example, Congress responded to perceived abuses of strike suits in private securities actions by amending both substantive and procedural law. The principal procedural changes raised the bar in bringing suit and gave parties with the highest stakes an opportunity to control the outcome of the litigation. [4] The principal substantive change provided a safe harbor for forward-looking statements. [5]

Similarly, the Judicial Conference Rules Committees responded to the risk of improvident and largely unreviewable class certification decisions by amending Rule 23. Granting or denying class certification is the defining moment in many class actions, for it may sound the death knell of the litigation or create irresistible pressure to settle. Accordingly, Rule 23 was amended to provide for an interlocutory appeal by permission of the court of appeals. [6] In addition, the amendment will facilitate development of the law on class certification. [7]

[*1861] Personal injury mass torts, however, are another matter. [8] They have proved less amenable to similar substantive and procedural solutions. In some mass torts - like asbestos - delay and extraordinary transactions costs (approaching two-thirds of recovered damages) [9] diminish the value of legitimate claims. Ten years ago, Judge Robert Parker pointedly described one impact of the massive asbestos litigation: "Four hundred and forty-eight members of the class have died waiting for their cases to be heard." [10] Judge Parker also noted that even if the court then could have closed thirty cases a month, it still would have taken six and a half years to try the cases in that 3000-member class action, during which time 5000 more cases would have been filed. [11] A decade later, asbestos litigation problems persist. [12] In another mass tort case - breast implants - defendants have paid billions of dollars for claims not as yet supported by verifiable scientific evidence. [13]

Two years ago, the Judicial Conference Working Group on Mass Torts, under the guidance of the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules, commenced its inquiry. The Working Group considered concepts central to the mass tort issue: maturity and elasticity, centralization versus devolution, and the incentives and disincentives in bringing suit. The Working Group also delved into many of the finer points of [*1862] mass tort litigation: the race to the courthouse for limited assets; the allocation of limited funds; the allocation of settlements by lawyers; unreasonably high transaction costs, including attorney's fees; collusive settlements; reverse auctions; forum shopping for trial or settlement; overlapping and competing class actions; "home cooking" in certain state courts and counties; fraudulent joinder to defeat diversity; choice of law issues; multiple punitive damages; resolving causation where the science is unclear; and the unique problems with futures claimants - asymptomatic plaintiffs in unlimited numbers, the difficulty in estimating damages in futures claims, and statute of limitations problems with the exposure-only plaintiff. The Working Group also was informed about duplicative and wasteful discovery; premature aggregation; the advisability of individual verdicts to ascertain liability and the range of damages; the need for closure of a mature tort; collateral litigation over insurance coverage; back door opt-outs; the "full faith and credit" significance and other consequences of overlapping class actions; efficiency and aggregation as compared with congestion and individual consideration; and the need for cooperation between federal and state courts. [14]

Throughout its study, the Working Group encountered ways attorney conduct appeared to shape the incentives in bringing suit, the course of litigation, and settlement. The identified issues included selection of counsel; the first-filed rule; solicitation of plaintiffs; the basis for determining attorney's fees; [15] the fiduciary responsibility of counsel; conflicts of interest; ethical considerations; charging contingent fees after settling cases on administrative grid-like schedules; "scorched earth" and "stonewalling" tactics by defense counsel; and "piling-on" strategies by plaintiffs' counsel with marginal claims. Underlying the inquiry into the impact of attorney conduct is an unresolved question: the concept of the "private attorney general," and the extent to which private attorneys should be able to vindicate the claims of persons with whom they have no direct relationship. Correspondingly, this concern raises the issue of the proper role of the federal and state attorneys general in litigating these broad-scale claims.

REV_00263087

[*1863] The Mass Torts Working Group issued its Report in 1999. [16] Recognizing that the essential components for change were legislation, procedural rules, case management, and judicial education, the Working Group identified the principal problems in mass torts, proposed different models for resolution, recommended further study, and prepared the ground for further action. This Symposium builds on those efforts.

Congress is also involved in mass tort issues. [17] Both the House and Senate Judiciary Committees have held hearings on class actions. And in both houses, bills have been introduced to address class actions in general [18] and to resolve the outstanding asbestos cases. [19] After passing the federal Y2K Act, [20] Congress is actively considering class action removal legislation based on minimal diversity. [21] Another pending bill, in response to the Supreme Court's decision in Lexecon Inc. v. Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach, [22] would permit MDL transferee judges to try transferred cases. [23]

As we work to identify and resolve these problems of mass torts, we should keep in mind that all of these concerns implicate competing [*1864] principles and cross many lines: most significantly, the distinction between substantive and procedural law, and the principles of federalism - the proper allocation of jurisdiction between state and federal courts. In mass torts, the line between substance and procedure can be blurred. We know that procedure influences outcome. Few would deny that the aggregation of claims has a profound effect on the substantive rights of the parties - both aggregation under Rule 23 and aggregation in grouping individual claims.

One way to look at the problem is to ask how receptive the federal courts should be to nationwide causes of action that largely involve state law, and if so, should their jurisdiction extend through the entire proceeding, including trial? Or, to put it another way, should tort actions national in scope be handled in state court, and if so, for what purposes? From a policy standpoint, it can be argued that national (interstate) class actions are the paradigm for federal diversity jurisdiction because in a constitutional sense, they implicate interstate commerce and foreclose any state bias. Arguably, a legal system that permits robust litigation of mass tort claims should also provide ways to fairly and efficiently resolve those claims. Nationwide class actions appear to promote at least one aspect of fairness - similarly situated claimants receive similar treatment. [24]

Conversely, if state bias can be eliminated and a way can be found to preserve defendants' assets from multiple compensatory and punitive damage awards that will deplete the funds available for all claimants, [25] then state courts - which greatly outnumber federal courts - may be the more suitable fora for trials and to ascertain liability and range of damages. Furthermore, state and federal court cooperation and coordination may be able to mitigate problems of discovery duplication and overlapping class actions.

The excellent Symposium papers and the proposed models address the key issues, and are crucial to the debate. As we continue, we must keep in mind the aim of our inquiry: a just process in which a person with a legitimate claim (where liability can be proven) is able to get appropriate relief without undue delay and without undue costs. The papers presented at the Mass Torts Symposium, and the [*1865] ensuing discussion by the Symposium participants, move us closer to the goal.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. As discussed infra at text accompanying notes 13-16, the Mass Torts Working Group was commissioned in 1998 to identify the most serious issues of the mass torts phenomenon, analyze the most promising solutions, and report back in one year. Spearheaded by the United States Judicial Conference's Advisory Committee on Civil Rules and its chair, Judge Paul Niemeyer, the Group also comprised select members of the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation, and the Judicial Conference Committees on Bankruptcy, Court Administration and Management, Federal-State Jurisdiction, and Magistrate Judges. It received invaluable assistance from the Federal Judicial Center and from many committee staff and academicians, including Professors Edward Cooper, Geoffrey Hazard, and Francis McGovern.

REV_00263088

n2. 28 U.S.C. 1407 (1994).

n3. Of course, the MDL statute was a congressional and judicial response to mass claims.

n4. See Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995, Pub. L. No. 104-67, 109 Stat. 743, 743-49, (codified at 15 U.S.C. 78u-4(b) (Supp. II 1996)). The congressional amendments in procedure represented a departure from the uniform and transsubstantive nature of the federal rules and constituted a deviation from the procedures set forth in the Rules Enabling Act. 23 U.S.C. 2071-2077 (1994).

n5. See Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995, Pub. L. No. 104-67, 102, 109 Stat. 737, 749-56 (codified at 15 U.S.C. 77z-2, 78u-5 (Supp. II 1996)).

n6. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(f).

n7. Of course, class certification is not the only procedural issue implicated by mass claims. The Rules Committees continue to study other facets of Rule 23, including the advisability of settlement-only classes after Amchem Products, Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591 (1997), and Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp., 527 U.S. 815, 119 S. Ct. 2295 (1999); strengthening the requirements for notice; appointment of class counsel; class counsel's fiduciary responsibilities; and setting standards for judicial approval of settlements and attorney fee awards.

n8. For example, unlike many class action claims, these torts often involve individual claims for substantial damages; accordingly, these claims feasibly may be pursued as stand-alone cases.

n9. See James S. Kakalik et al., Costs of Asbestos Litigation (1983). Although the study reporting on these figures is somewhat dated, the trend appears to continue. See, e.g., Amchem, 521 U.S. at 598 (noting that costs exceed recoveries by two to one).

REV_00263089

n10. Cimino v. Raymark Indus., Inc., 751 F. Supp. 649, 651 (E.D. Tex. 1990), rev'd, 151 F.3d 297 (5th Cir. 1998).

n11. See id. at 651-52.

n12. For example, asbestos cases continue to swamp courts. In the past five years, nearly 40,000 new asbestos cases were filed in federal courts alone. See Administrative Office of the Courts Statistics, U.S. District Courts Civil Cases Commenced by Nature of Suit, (Table C-2A) (Feb. 2000) <http://www.uscourts.gov/judbus1999/c02asep99.pdf>. And plaintiffs are suing a broader range of defendants, from hospitals that installed asbestos ceiling tiles to "banks that financed asbestos-contaminated properties." Susan Warren, Asbestos Suits Target Makers of Wine, Cars, Soups, Soaps, Wall St. J., Apr. 12, 2000, at B1. Although precise numbers are unavailable, significant numbers of asbestos cases have been and continue to be filed in state courts.

n13. See, e.g., Marcia Angell, Science on Trial: The Clash of Medical Evidence and the Law in the Breast Cancer Case (1996) (concluding that breast implants do not substantially increase the risk of breast cancer); Hans Berkel et al., Breast Augmentation: A Risk Factor for Breast Cancer?, 326 New Eng. J. Med. 1649 (1992) (same); Heather Bryant & Penny Brashen, Breast Implants and Breast Cancer - Reanalysis of a Linkage Study, 332 New Eng. J. Med. 1535 (1995) (same).

n14. See generally Advisory Comm. on Civil Rules & Working Group on Mass Torts, Report on Mass Tort Litigation (Feb. 15, 1999) [hereinafter Report on Mass Tort Litigation]. See also Thomas E. Willging, Mass Torts Problems & Proposals, in Report on Mass Tort Litigation, supra, app. C.

n15. Some have asked whether it is possible to construct a procedure to provide both an incentive and a reasonable return, other than percentage of common fund or lodestar.

n16. Report on Mass Tort Litigation, supra note 14.

n17. In 1991, the Judicial Conference proposed that Congress consider a national legislative scheme to streamline asbestos case resolution. See Amchem, 521 U.S. at 598-99 (citing Report of the Proceedings of the Judicial Conference of the United States 33 (Mar. 12, 1991)). This proposal was based on the recommendation of the Conference's Ad Hoc Committee on Asbestos Litigation, appointed by Chief Justice Rehnquist. See id. Notably, in its most recent class action decisions, the Supreme Court specifically urged Congress to deal with the "elephantine mass of asbestos cases." Id. (citing recommendation by Judicial Conference Ad Hoc Committee on Asbestos Litigation for federal legislation creating a national asbestos dispute resolution scheme); see also Ortiz, 119 S. Ct. at 2302-03 n.1 (1999) (reiterating the call for national legislation and noting Congress's failure to respond).

REV_00263090

n18. See, e.g., Class Action Fairness Act of 1999, S. 353, 106th Cong. (1999) (requiring, for example, plain-language notices to class members and advance notice of settlements to state and federal attorneys general).

n19. See Fairness in Asbestos Compensation Act of 1999, H.R. 1283, 106th Cong. (1999) (establishing an Office of Asbestos Compensation to determine if an asbestos claimant is entitled to compensation, and if so, how much); S. 758, 106th Cong. (1999) (paralleling H.R. 1283).

n20. Y2K Act, Pub. L. No. 106-37, 113 Stat. 185 (1999). The Act provides that a Y2K class action may be tried in federal court if the amount in controversy exceeds $ 10 million, and the plaintiff class consists of at least 100 members.

n21. See Interstate Class Action Jurisdiction Act of 1999, H.R. 1875, 106th Cong. (1999) (passed by U.S. House of Representatives, Sept. 23, 1999).

n22. 523 U.S. 26 (1998).

n23. See Multidistrict, Multiparty, Multiforum Trial Jurisdiction Act of 1999, H.R. 2112, 106th Cong. 2 (1999). The same bill also provides for removal of mass torts arising from single situs accidents. See id. 3.

n24. It is usually helpful to compare alternative approaches. In certain cases, the prospect of high costs, long delays, and limited assets for recovery may negate any realistic alternative to class actions.

n25. These goals also may be accomplished in a bankruptcy proceeding, which brings before the bankruptcy court all of the debtor's assets and all claims against those assets, then seeks to treat equally all similarly situated claimants.

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: niemeyer and "mass torts working group" (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Monday, September 16, 2002 - 7:08 PM EDT

REV_00263091

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "deliberate disregard" and "intentional disregard" and malice and "punitive damages" (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*37 Vand. L. Rev. 1117, **

Copyright © Vanderbilt University 1984.

Vanderbilt Law Review

OCTOBER, 1984

37 Vand. L. Rev. 1117

LENGTH: 36754 words

ARTICLE: Punitive Damages: A Relic That Has Outlived Its Origins

James B. Sales * and Kenneth B. Cole, Jr. **

* Partner, Fulbright & Jaworski, Houston, Texas, LL.B. 1960, University of Texas.

 Associate, Fulbright & Jaworski, Houston, Texas. J.D. 1984, Vanderbilt University.

SUMMARY:
... The doctrine of punitive damages truly is an ancient legal concept that inexplicably has evaded commitment to the archives of history. ... Whatever justification may be advanced to support the punitive damage concept, however, most commentators today acknowledge that the modern bases undergirding the theory in the United States are punishment and deterrence. ... Numerous jurisdictions, however, refuse to permit punitive damage claims against the estates of deceased wrongdoers because the punishment and deterrence rationales no longer are viable once the wrongdoer is deceased. ... Permitting a punitive award in the case of a deceased defendant truly exposes the fallacy of the punitive damage doctrine. ... These jurisdictions ostensibly ignore the very policy that undergirds the punitive damage concept -- punishment and deterrence against future wrongdoing -- and permit the wrongdoer to insure against liability for such awards. ... A particularly egregious aspect of the punitive damage doctrine as punishment is its application within the vicarious liability field. ... The applicability of liability insurance to cover punitive damage awards totally vitiates the punishment and deterrence rationales. ... The historical justifications for the doctrine, however, have long since become obsolete, particularly with the current unfettered expansion of the compensatory damage system. ... Abolishing the punitive damage doctrine would leave unaffected the civil tort system that continues to compensate plaintiffs for every conceivable injury. ...

TEXT:

[*1118] I. INTRODUCTION

The doctrine of punitive damages truly is an ancient legal concept that inexplicably has evaded commitment to the archives of history. Irrespective of the questionable validity of the

Perhaps the two factors that most significantly affect the amount of punitive damages awarded are the ratio rule and evidence of the defendant's financial condition. The ratio rule is a mechanism that allows an appellate court either to overturn a punitive damage award or to order remittitur if the court concludes that a reasonable relation does not exist between the compensatory and punitive damages awarded the plaintiff. [129] Most jurisdictions mandate that punitive awards bear a "reasonable relationship" to the amount of compensatory damages, [130] but no court ever has established [*1146] a fixed or precise ratio. [131] The rule, consequently, is anything but precise, and as one commentator has noted, its singular value is to serve as a "rough device to allow a court to pare down an excessive award of punitive damages." [132] In an effort to instill some element of certainty into the ration rule, some courts have suggested that fact finders may consider certain factors in determining the issue of excessiveness of punitive awards: (1) the nature of the wrong; (2) the character of the conduct at issue; (3) the degree of the wrongdoer's culpability; (4) the situation and sensibilities of the concerned parties; and (5) the extent to which the conduct offends the public sense of justice and propriety. [133] Despite [*1147] these efforts, one scholar critically noted that "[t]his test is probably more often a rationalization of results than a means of obtaining them. The proper ratio between actual damages is placed at a figure which supports the judge's view of the verdict. . . ." [134] Another commentator has argured for more effective appellate review by asserting that "it is becoming increasingly clear that it is preferable for the court to have the simple right to set aside an award as excessive." [135] To permit punitive damages in the absence of a severely limiting ratio of punitive to actual damages simply invites disaster.

Many jurisdictions authorize the fact finder to consider the defendant's wealth in assessing punitive damages. [136] In these jurisdictions, the wealthier the defendant, the larger the permissible assessment of a punitory award. [137] The rule is premised on the rationale that the function of deterrence will not be served if the defendant can absorb the penalty with little or no discomfort because of existent wealth. [138] One court has sought to justify evidence of a defendant's financial wealth by stating that "what would be 'smart money' to a poor man would not be, and would not serve as a deterrent, to a rich man." [139]

Several significant problems arise when courts allow juries to [*1148] consider the defendant's wealth. First, ill informed juries generally overreact to the emotion provoking nature of evidence of a defendant's wealth. One commentator observed that:

It is a good guess that rich men do not fare well before juries, and the more emphasis placed on their riches, the less well they fare. Such evidence may do more harm than good; jurymen may be more interested in divesting vested interests than in attempting to fix penalties which will make for effective working of the admonitory function. [140]

Second, evidence of the defendant's wealth undoubtedly influences juries to award punitive damages in excess of any rational amount. [141] As an unintended consequence, financially poor codefendants are prejudiced unfairly if they are jointly and severally liable for a punitive damages award that the jury has inflated because of the other defendant's wealth. [142] Fortunately, not all jurisdictions adhere to this rationale. [143] Permitting the fact finder to consider evidence of a wrongdoer's wealth is really nothing more than a camouflaged mechanism designed to encourage large punitive assessments. In essence, it is a procedural device that promotes the redistribution of wealth in society.

D. Additional Patchwork Applications of the Punitive Damage Concept Among the Various Jurisdictions

Some jurisdictions have imposed certain limitations on the punitive damage doctrine that regrettably often serve to further muddy the water for practitioners and jurors. Some states, under a strict products liability theory, disallow punitive damages for property damage because the interests concerned in actions for property damage do not warrant the extension of this controversial doctrine. [144] Courts do not universally prohibit punitive awards for property damage, however, and such awards have occurred in aggravated circumstances of trespass, conversion, infringement of common law copyright, nuisance, and seizure of property by a secured party. [145]

REV_00263102

Many jurisdictions restrict punitive damages by refusing to [*1149] permit such awards for breach of contract. [146] As might be expected, however, other jurisdictions authorize punitive awards for mere contract breaches. [147] In addition, even jurisdictions that generally exclude punitive awards for breaches of contract have formulated exceptions to the general rule. For example, an intentional breach of contract to marry [148] and a breach of contract by carriers or public servants [149] constitute exceptions in some jurisdictions. The basis of these punitive awards, however, usually lies not in the contractural breach itself, but in some tortious element of the defendant's conduct to which the fact finder links the award. [150]

Another area of nonuniform application is the applicability of punitive damages in wrongful death and survival actions. A significant number of jurisdictions prohibit punitive damages in wrongful death actions because these statutory causes of action specifically serve a compensatory purpose. [151] The Seventh Circuit recently dismissed [*1150] the punitive damages claims in wrongful death actions in several states that arose from a catastrophic airplane crash. [152] The court concluded that it should resolve the conflict of laws questions in the case in favor of federal regulation of airline tort liability, which prohibits punitive damages, because of the interests of passengers, airline corporations, airplane manufacturers, and state and federal governments. [153] Other jurisdictions, nonetheless, hold that punitive damages are appropriate in wrongful death actions. [154]

Contrary to the prohibition of punitive damages in wrongful death actions, many jurisdictions authorize the recovery of punitive damages in survival actions. [155] Numerous jurisdictions, however, refuse to permit punitive damage claims against the estates of deceased wrongdoers [156] because the punishment and deterrence rationales no longer are viable once the wrongdoer is deceased. [157] [*1151] Florida, Illinois, West Virginia, and Texas, however, have adopted a contrary rule. [158] Permitting a punitive award in the case of a deceased defendant truly exposes the fallacy of the punitive damage doctrine.

A particularly controversial area of punitive damage is successor liability. Under the successor liability theory, "a corporation acquiring all or substantially all of another corporation's assets, may 'inherit' the tort liability of the selling corporation." [159] Some courts have prohibited recovery of punitive damages from successor corporations. [160] Other courts, concerned with the ease with which succeeding legal entities can merge or consolidate, have authorized the imposition of punitive damages against successor corporations. [161] [*1152] The courts authorizing recovery of punitive awards against successor entities appear to be result oriented. These courts seemingly are concerned with providing a "deep pocket" for the plaintiff, whatever the successor corporation's relationship to its predecessor. Obviously, the successor corporation neither designed, manufactured, nor sold the product that caused the injury. Consequently, neither punishment nor deterrence are served by the imposition of punitive damages for a predecessor's defective product -- unless retribution against innocent parties is contemplated under the punitive damage doctrine.

Some jurisdictions authorize punitive damages in loss of consortium actions. [162] These courts predicate their decisions on the compensatory, rather than the punitive, purpose of the actions. Other jurisdictions reject recovery of punitive damages for loss of [*1153] consortium. [163] Understandably, permitting a punitory award in this context is difficult to justify under any of the rationale espoused by jurisdictions that recognize punitive awards.

Another patchwork application plaguing the punitive damage concept is the applicability of insurance coverage to such awards. Assuming that punitive awards are intended as punishment and deterrence, it is an insupportable contradiction to permit the wrongdoer to insure against wrongful acts that merit punitory deterrence. A majority of jurisdictions conclude that public policy forecloses the application of insurance coverage for punitive awards. [164] Essentially, these decisions conclude that permitting the wrongdoer to shift the financial burden would detract from the deterrent effect of the punitive award. Moreover, extending insurance coverage would, in effect, transfer the burden of the punitive award to the innocent consuming public through increased premium payments. Other jurisdictions hold that insurance coverage is a matter of private contract between the insurance company and the insured and, therefore, requires no public policy considerations. [165] These jurisdictions ostensibly ignore the very policy that undergirds the punitive damage concept -- punishment and deterrence against future wrongdoing -- and permit the wrongdoer to insure against liability for such awards. The result, of course, is to permit a windfall to the plaintiff at the expense of innocent consumers who must pay increased premium rates for their insurance policies. The dichotomy in attitude among the various jurisdictions regarding the public policy of sanctioning insurance coverage [*1154] against punitive damage awards lends further credence to the conclusion that the punitive damage concept represents an archaic doctrine that serves no useful public policy, but which continues only to enhance the largesse dispensed to the plaintiff.

REV_00263103

The flawed nature of the punitive damage doctrine is clearly evident in the total absence of any uniformity of application. The legal rationale formulated to justify the concept is fraught with contradictions and is totally unpredictable in its effect. The anachronistic nature of the doctrine bespeaks the imperative need to relegate the doctrine to its rightful place in the archives of history. Most importantly, not only does the punitive damage doctrine not achieve the ordained objectives of punishment and deterrence, but rather, it presents an unfettered destructive force that erodes the economic stability of society. Surely, a doctrine possessing such questionable credentials and engendering such disquieting consequences should sound its own death knell.

V. RATIONALE FOR ABOLISHING PUNITIVE DAMAGES

A. The Adverse Economic Results of Punitive Damages

Because juries possess essentially limitless discretion in awarding punitive damages, [166] the amount of punitive damages awarded in recent years, as if feeding upon itself, has escalated to astronomical figures that boggle the mind. [167] Judge Friendly forecast this problem: "The legal difficulties engendered by claims for punitive damages on the part of hundreds of plaintiffs are staggering. . . . We have the gravest difficulty in perceiving how claims for punitive damages in such a multiplicity of actions throughout the [*1155] nation can be so administered as to avoid overkill." [168] Several commentators have expressed concern over the possible severe economic effects precipitated by huge punitive damage awards. [169] Although some commentators and courts have indicated that punitive damages have not yet produced the prophesied doom, [170] one recent scholarly article has cited the severe economic consequences of asbestos litigation that forced several formerly large and viable companies into the bankruptcy courts. [171] Fear of bankruptcy earlier this year prompted the Fifth Circuit to declare a universal abolition of punitive awards in industry-wide asbestosis litigation within its jurisdiction. [172] Although the Fifth Circuit did not extend its moratorium on exemplary damages beyond the realm of asbestos related litigation, the court's decision represents a gargantuan step toward the intelligent and overdue recognition of the inappropriateness and inherent destructiveness of the punitive damage concept in the modern tort reparations system.

Even Professor Owen, who formerly supported the award of punitive damages with few limitations, [173] has recently come to recognize the folly of continued and unbridled awards of exemplary damages. Professor Owen recently foreshadowed the Fifth Circuit's opinion in

REV_00263104

Jackson when he observed that "[1]arge assessments of punitive damages may not yet be a major threat to the continued viability of most manufacturing concerns, but the increasing number and size of such awards may fairly raise concern for the future [*1156] stability of American industry." [174] Professor Owen also has noted with alarm that courts increasingly have abdicated their traditional responsibility to control highly questionable punitive awards. [175] He has suggested several possibilities for establishing upper limits for future punitive damage awards. [176]

A byproduct of the continued success that plaintiffs have experienced in obtaining large punitive damage awards is the now universal practice of plaintiffs alleging and demanding punitive damages in an effort to increase the ultimate recovery from juries, [177] and to compel defendants to settle meritless cases because of the fear that a jury will return an outrageous punitive damage award. [178] Because of the discretionary nature of jury verdicts, a "verdict will not be disturbed as excessive unless it is so clearly so as to indicate that it was the result of passion, prejudice, partiality, or corruption; or that it was manifestly the result of disregard of the evidence or applicable rules of law." [179] Although some courts have overturned large punitive awards that shock the judicial conscience or are manifestly unjust, [180] the simple fact is that most huge punitive awards are affirmed. [181] This trend is creating a significant [*1157] threat to the stability of our economy. It is now time for courts and legislatures to reconsider the propriety of the punitive damages concept before it creates even more havoc and places our economy at risk. The punitive damage concept, if it ever possessed legitimacy in the civil tort system, surely is an anachronism whose time for service long since has passed and whose insatiable appetite no longer can be afforded.

The current availability of the punitive damage doctrine imposes excessively oppressive and burdensome discovery on defendants. Adhering to the philosophy of liberal discovery, courts ostensibly have concluded that the mere claim for punitive damages entitles the plaintiff to demand the production of interminable reams of documentary and other information potentially related to the issue of punitive damages. [182] For example, an increasing number of products liability plaintiffs incorporate an allegation for punitive damages, and concomitantly, the breadth and scope of court ordered discovery has expanded with this additional claim. Rampant abuse in the discovery process is economically ruinous to defendants, disruptive of the orderly administration of justice, and an unsightly blemish on the tort reparations system. Predictably the public perceives the unfettered discovery process as an unacceptable misuse of the legal system. Consequently, the defendant must choose between the Scylla of economically devastating discovery costs that can transform a favorable verdict into a pyrhhic economic victory and the Charybdis of outrageous and unwarranted [*1158] monetary settlements. [183]

B. Punishment and Deterrence Are Not Viable Theories for the Imposition of Punitive Damages

The purpose of the civil law historically has been to provide a remedy to compensate individuals injured by the wrongful conduct of others. [184] Even disinterested commentators such as Dean Prosser have noted the dichotomy of authorizing punishment under the aegis of the civil law, [185] and one court perceptively has observed:

It is difficult on principle to understand why, when the sufferer by a tort has been fully compensated for his suffering, he should recover anything more. And it is equally difficult to understand why, if the tortfeasor is to be punished by exemplary damages, they should go to the compensated sufferer, and not to the public in whose behalf he is punished. [186]

[*1159] Another court, ever more emphatically, queried:

How could the idea of punishment be deliberately and designedly installed as a doctrine of civil remedies" Is not punishment out of place, irregular, anomalous, exceptional, unjust, unscientific, not to say absured and ridiculous, when classed among civil remedies? What kind of a civil remedy for the plaintiff is the punishment of the defendant? [187]

REV_00263105

As one commentator has observed, juries possessing neither expertise in deciding what constitutes just punishment nor skill in determining who should be punished are inflicting large punitive damage awards even though society has not deemed it appropriate to declare the offending conduct criminal. [188] Parties to civil litigation are subject to quasi-criminal fines, and courts are enforcing these penalties without the safeguards afforded even society's worst criminals. [189]

A particularly egregious aspect of the punitive damage doctrine as punishment is its application within the vicarious liability field. [190] Not only are courts inappropriately using punishment in a civil context, but by imposing on employers and principals liability for the punitive damages otherwise assessable against their employees and agents, the courts have diverted punishment from the wrongdoers to innocent parties. [191] One commentator has noted [*1160] critically that "it is beyond reason to fathom why an innocent employer should be held liable for more than compensation of the plaintiff's injuries." [192] Punishment and deterrence of the innocent does not comport with a system dedicated to the administration of justice.

Courts have long used the "deep pocket" rationale to justify the vicarious liability of employers and principals for compensatory damages. [193] although this theory arguably possesses merit for compensatory damages, its use tp extend punishment against employers and principals is insupportable under the guise of any theory or rationale. [194] For example, even though punitive damages against individual wrongdoers may be awarded in a section 1983 action, [195] neither the municipal nor the local government can be held vicariously liable for its employees' wanton and malicious conduct. [196] Irrespective of the care that employers exercise, they possess no means to identify and prevent each and every employee from engaging in antisocial acts. [197] Therefore, employers should not suffer punishment for conduct that they cannot prevent.

When an employer has attempted to screen employees during the hiring process, in an effort to hire the best available workers for business reasons, the imposition of punitive damages for a "hiring mistake" lacks any deterrent effect. [198] One expert has criticized [*1161] the "make-weight argument" that punitive awards will result in better hiring practices and asserts that the "absurdity" of this rationale should be "apparent to anyone who has ever been in the position of offering employment -- there simply is no way to gauge whether a potential employee will become violent when irritated, just as there is no method of determing with certainty whether he will be a good worker." [199] Another commentator also has observed, while discussing the lack of meaningful standards or limits on the amounts of punitive damages which a jury awards, that "[f]rom a deterrence standpoint, it confounds understanding to permit such vast uncertainty as to the level of the expected penalty." [200] Another scholar has asserted that high compensatory damages will have a sufficient deterrent effect, anyway; and if they do not, then the plaintiff can seek injunctive relief, the violation of which will subject the defendant to contempt proceedings and fines or jail. [201]

In addition, imposing vicarious liability for punitive damages creates the anomalous situation that the consumers or taxpayers in a community, who are the intended beneficiaries of the punishment administered to the wrongdoer, actually absorb the consequences [*1162] of the punishment. Ultimately, it is the innocent consumer and taxpayer who bears the burden of paying for the punitive award imposed upon a vicariously liable employer, corporate entity, or governmental body. [202] "The fact of the matter is that the liberal rules governing vicarious liability for punitive damages allow the wrong person or entity to be punished." [203] If an employer's hiring practices are so outrageous that society should punish them, the most appropriate forum is the criminal justice system, which metes out punishment according to predetermined rules and only against the party guilty of wrongdoing.

REV_00263106

Not only is the punishment rationale of punitive damages decidedly inappropriate in a civil law context and the effect of the deterrence rationale minimal at best and unlikely at worst, but any redeeming value these rationales might have dwindles in the face of the ratio rule and the application of liability insurance. The ratio rule generally mandates a reasonable relationship between the amount of compensatory and punitive damages. [204] A majority of jurisdictions currently rejects any precise ratio rule. [205] Commentators have criticized the current approach to the ratio rule because the judicial refusal to establish a predetermined ratio creates uncertainty in assessing quasi-criminal fines; [206] and when courts apply a ratio, whether on an ad hoc basis or subject to some generalized ratio guidelines, [207] the concept of gearing the size of the [*1163] punitive award to the compensatory award simply does not mesh with the punishment rationale of punitive damages. [208] The applicability of liability insurance to cover punitive damage awards totally vitiates the punishment and deterrence rationales. A majority of jurisdictions has judicially declared that punitive damages are insurable. [209] The courts that refuse to allow insurance coverage on public policy grounds recognize that insurance negates the objectives purportedly served by punitive damages. [210] The allowance of insurance reduces the punishment of the wrongdoer while simultaneously imposing the effects of the punishment on all other policy holders through the vehicle of increased premiums. Permitting punitive damage insurance likewise conflicts with the deterrence objective by reducing the incentive to avoid loss-creating conduct. [211] This incongrous situation recently prompted one court to acknowledge that the punitive damage doctrine, as applied today, does not deter tortfeasors and, because of the unpredictable manner in which fact finders impose damages to punish, insurance should be permitted to provide coverage against exemplary damages. [212] More importantly, however, liability insurance for exemplary damages makes necessary the assessment of larger awards to achieve punishment and deterrence, which in turn causes insurance [*1164] costs and coverages to rise, which will, in turn, necessitate even larger punitive awards. [213] This circularity epitomizes the illogical nature of punitive awards.

Neither the punishment nor the deterrence rationale is appropriate in a civil law context. The entire concept of punitive damages today in civil actions is a wrong idea at the wrong time. [214]

C. Compensation Is Not a Viable Theory for the Imposition of Punitive Damages

The usual rationale for punitive damages is punishment and deterrence. [215] A few jurisdictions, however, continue to view punitive damages as a form of compensatory award for intangible injuries. [216] Irrespective of the viability of this rationale in earlier times, [217] the concept simply no longer is relevant. Compensatory awards currently provide recovery of all costs for physical injuries, disfigurement, physical impairment, loss of earnings and earning capacity, past and future medical expenses, past and future pain and suffering, past and future mental anguish, loss of society and companionship, and every conceivable intangible and imagined injury such as emotional distress [218] and insult. [219] Additionally, third parties such as spouses, children, and parents increasingly can recover compensatory awards for the intangible harms of loss of consortium, loss of parentage, loss of society, and loss of companionship. [220] [*1165] Undoubtedly, the most eloquent condemnation of punitive damages as a form of compensation is etched in an early Washington case:

There is nothing stinted in the rule of compensation. The party is fully compensated for all the injury done his person or his property, and for all losses which he may sustain by reason of the injury, in addition to recompense for physical pain, if any has been inflicted. But it does not stop here; it enters into the domain of feeling, tenderly inquires into his mental sufferings, and pays him for any anguish of mind that he may have experienced. Indignities received, insults borne, sense of shame or humiliation endured, lacerations of feelings, disfiguration, loss of reputation or social position, loss of honor, impairment of credit and every actual loss, and some which frequently border on the imaginary, are paid for under the rule of compensatory damages. The plaintiff is made entirely whole. The bond has been paid in full. Surely the public can have no interest in exacting the pound of flesh. [221]

REV_00263107

Considering the expanded and virtually unlimited access to compensatory damages, punitive damages simply provide a windfall to the plaintiff, penalize the innocent consumers or society, and unnecessarily sap the vitality of the economy upon which society is totally dependent. [222]

The punitive damage doctrine theoretically is unsound, legally insupportable, economically unnecessary for plaintiffs, and economically disastrous for both defendants and innocent consumers. Therefore, it is time, and in fact, the hour grows late, for the legislatures and courts to dismantle this potentially destructive doctrine of another era. Neither right nor justice, neither fairness nor equity, and neither the vitality of the tort reparations system nor economic considerations warrant the survival of this outdated doctrine.

[*1166] VI. THE ALTERNATIVE IN THE ABSENCE OF TOTAL ABROGATION OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES

One commentator observed that the issue of punitive damages in the past "merited scant attention" because such awards were "rarely assessed and likely to be small in amount." [223] Unfortunately, the tort reparations situation today has changed drastically, and the antiquated concept of punitive damages as applied in the 1980s poses serious, if not potentially fatal, consequences. If a complete abrogation of the punitive damage doctrine is not an achievable objective, then a series of coordinated and precisely defined limitations is imperative to forestall the economically and doctrinally debilitating effects of this concept.

First, it is necessary to formulate certain standards of conduct and proof by which the fact finder determines punitive damage liability. Realistic and meaningful standards presently are nonexistent, and confusing jury instructions only serve to further the confusion of juries. [224] Either the courts or the legislatures should authorize the recovery of punitive damages only upon a stringent showing that a defendant acted with deliberate intent, ill motive, or maliciousness. [225]

Second, the courts should require a significantly higher standard of proof than the less exacting "preponderance of the evidence" burden. The degree of proof required should be elevated to [*1167] a "clear and convincing" standard [226] or a "beyond a reasonable doubt" burden. [227] The Second Circuit, based upon its assertion that conduct which would "give rise to punitive damages must be close to criminality," recently stated that the plaintiff must clearly establish this degree of behavior by the defendant. [228] Because the punitive damages concept represents an anomalous perversion of a criminal law concept grafted to the civil law, and considering the weaknesses inherent in the rationale underlying the punitive damage doctrine in today's society, the wisest course strongly suggests the adoption of the more stringent "beyond a reasonable doubt" burden of proof.

Third, it is necessary to reallocate judicial power so that judges, rather than unknowledgeable juries, decide if punitive damages are merited, and if so, in what amount. [229] Judges, equipped by experience and familiarity with legal concepts, are [*1168] better able than inexperienced juries to distinguish behavior that justifies punishment, [230] and hopefully would be able to avoid the bias and naivete that jurors express through inflated punitive awards. Many judges currently support such a realignment of duties. [231] If responsible jurisprudence mandates punishment through civil law remedies, it is only logical to utilize the knowledge of judicial officers to achieve fair and rationale results. Punitive damages awards have become too large, too destructive, and too far removed from economic reality to allow biased and rhetorically enraged juries to continue on their present course. [232]

REV_00263108

Fourth, specific limits should be established for punitive damages awards. [233] Such limitations would curtail the current destructive abuses of the doctrine and would eliminate the current inordinate number of outrageous awards. Professor Owen has suggested a limitation of either twice the amount of compensatory damages or the the plaintiff's costs plus $ 10,000. [234] A well-known example of a legislatively imposed limit on punishment oriented damages is the treble damage provision in the Clayton Act that allows actual damages plus twice their value as punitive damages for violations [*1169] of the antitrust laws. [235] Whether legislatures validate a dollar for dollar ratio or a single established amount, an equitable and workable upper limit is essential to control the undisciplined punitive damages doctrine. A dollar for dollar ratio presents the arguable advantage of flexibility that automatically would fluctuate both upward and downward, depending upon the amount of compensatory damages. A ratio limit also presents the danger, however, that juries artificially will inflate compensatory awards to increase the possible punitive amount. The logical solution, therefore, is to view the dollar for dollar ratio as an upper limit, subject to judicial reduction. [236] Unlike the Clayton Act treble damage provisions, judges would retain the authority to exercise discretion in reducing punitive awards below the statutorily allowed upper limit.

Fifth, the application of the punitive damage doctrine must be modified significantly in the strict tort liability context of product litigation. The legislature should declare that punitive damages may be awarded only once. If a plaintiff establishes that he suffered injury because a defendant supplied a product containing a design or marketing defect, then the plaintiff should receive total compensation for the injury. When hundreds or even thousands of plaintiffs prosecute claims for injuries that emanate from a single design or marketing defect that exists in a single line of a product, however, the product supplier should not endure multiple punishments for a single design defect. The product supplier is deemed liable simply because of the condition of the product -- a single design defect in a particular product. If the civil law is to embrace the added function of punishing product suppliers, then a single [*1170] award for a single design deficiency is sufficient. To borrow a phrase from Justice Holmes, "even a dog distinguishes between being stumbled over and being kicked," [237] and, as many asbestos manufacturers well know, [238] the punitive damage doctrine has assumed the form of strategically placed and excessively destructive kicks.

Sixth, any exemplary damages permitted and recovered should be payable to the state treasuries just like any other penal fines. [239] Plaintiffs currently receive compensation for every conceivable element of injury, [240] and punitive damage awards should not constitute a windfall for the plaintiff. Judicial transfer of punitive damage awards to the state would prevent unnecessary and inequitable windfalls to plaintiffs, would provide state funds that could be used for public purposes, and would be consistent with all other penal fines which are required to be paid to state treasuries. [241]

Seventh, if the punitive damage concept continues to survive its archaic origins, courts should declare that insurance coverage contravenes public policy. Punitive damage awards penalize innocent purchasers of insurance who suffer increased premiums each time a court concludes that liability insurance provides coverage [*1171] for such penalties. [242] Increased premiums do not punish the wrongdoer; they punish all innocent purchasers of insurance.

Last, and undoubtedly most important, the appellate courts must initiate a more aggressive and standardized attitude in reviewing exemplary awards. Currently, appellate courts overturn a punitive damage verdict as excessive only if it is the result of passion, prejudice, partiality, corruption, or is manifestly unjust. [243] Professor Owen recently recognized this problem and suggested that appellate courts should scrutinize carefully the trial record "for improper evidence, for argument that might have inflamed the jury, and for the sufficiency of the evidence as a whole." [244] Appellate courts too long have summarily characterized the amount of punitive damage awards as a fact issue for jury determination. This attitude is an abdication of appellate review responsibility and the results of such an abdication cannot be justified and should not continue.

REV_00263109

VII. CONCLUSION

Punitive damages may have served a valuable function in the scheme of ancient law. The historical justifications for the doctrine, however, have long since become obsolete, particularly with the current unfettered expansion of the compensatory damage system. Because the punitive damage doctrine is monstrously archaic and because of the distorted and arbitrary fashion in which it currently operates, the harm it causes is significantly greater than any good it produces. In today's society, punitive damages merely create a windfall for plaintiffs without serving either as a punishment or a deterrence. The doctrine should be abolished because it is a doctrine of a bygone age of the law. [245] Abolishing the punitive damage doctrine would leave unaffected the civil tort system that [*1172] continues to compensate plaintiffs for every conceivable injury. Furthermore, if punishment or deterrence is necessary, legislatures should enact appropriate criminal statutes with the protections that normally accompany the imposition of penal fines.

If abolition of this outdated doctrine is not accomplished, then both logic and necessity require the imposition of severe restrictions to restrain the doctrine's ill-advised and economically devastating effects. The law continually must change and adapt to fulfill its noble purpose of insuring the fair and responsible administration of justice. This noble legal purpose is threatened by the onslaught of economically destructive punitive awards. Unless farsighted and aggressive judicial and legislative action is initiated, the punitive damages doctrine will continue to wreak a form of devastation never contemplated or intended in the evolution of the tort reparations system.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. K. REDDEN, PUNITIVE DAMAGES § 2.2(A)(1) (1980).

n2. See, e.g., id.; G. DRIVER & J. MILES, THE BABYLONIAN LAWS 500-01 (1952); Sales, The Emergence of Punitive Damages in Product Liability Actions: A Further Assault on the Citadel, 14 ST. MARY'S L.J. 351, 351 n.1 (1983); Special Project, An Analysis of the Legal, Social, and Political Issues Raised by Asbestos Litigation, 36 VAND. L. REV. 573, 691 (1983).

n3. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(A)(1).

n4. See, e.g., Exodus 22:1 (King James) ("If a man shall steal an ox, or a sheep, and kill it, or sell it, he shall restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep."); Exodus 22.9 (King James) ("For all manner of trespass, whether it be for ox, for ass, for sheep, for raiment, or for any manner of lost thing, which another challengeth to be his, the cause of both parties shall come before the judges; and whom the judges shall condemn, he shall pay double unto his neighbour."). Mosaic law also provided for recovery of multiple damages for adultery and usury. See K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(A)(1).

n5. See, Sales, supra note 2, at 353 (Roman civil law recognized punitive damages) (citing Walther & Plein, Punitive Damages: A Critical Analysis: Kirk v. Combs, 49 MARQ. L. REV. 369, 369 (1965)); see also W. BUCKLAND & A. McNAIR, ROMAN LAW AND COMMON LAW 344-45 (2d ed. 1952) (asserting that the basis of Roman civil law was punitive in nature); K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(A)(1) (Roman law provided for multiple damage awards for injurious acts characterized by wanton willfulness or conscious deliberation);

n6. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(A)(2).

n7. 95 Eng. Rep. 768 (C.P. 1763).

REV_00263110

n8. Id. at 769. The plaintiff in Huckle sued the King's officers for illegal searches and seizures, assault, and false imprisonment under a "nameless warrant," and the court upheld an award of 300 pounds for "exemplary damages" even though actual damages were only 20 pounds. Id. In the related case of Wilkes v. Wood, 98 Eng. Rep. 489 (C.P. 1763), Lord Chief Justice Pratt stated that:

[A] jury have it in their power to give damages for more than the injury received. Damages are designed not only as a satisfaction to the injured person, but likewise as a punishment to the guilty, to deter from any such proceeding for the future, and as a proof of the detestation of the jury to the action itself.

Id. at 498-99.

n9. See generally J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, PUNITIVE DAMAGES LAW AND PRACTICE § 1.02 (1984); Cooter, Economic Analysis of Punitive Damages, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 79, 90 (1982); Duffy, Punitive Damages: A Doctrine Which Should Be Abolished, reprinted in DEFENSE RESEARCH INSTITUTE: THE CASE AGAINST PUNITIVE DAMAGES (D. Hirsch & J. Pouros eds. 1969); Owen, Civil Punishment and the Public Good, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 103, 108 (1982); Sales, supra note 2, at 353-55.

n10. Duffy, supra note 9, at 4; Ellis, Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 1, 12-13 (1982); Sales, supra note 2, at 353-54. A number of early cases in which defendants attempted to persuade courts to overturn arguably excessive jury verdicts furnished support for adoption of the punitive damage concept. See Ash v. Ash, 90 Eng. Rep. 526 (K.B. 1701) (court set aside a daughter's 2000 pound judgment against her mother because the "jury were very shy of giving a reason of their verdict"); Wood v. Gunston, 82 Eng. Rep. 867 (Banc. Sup. 1655) (the "Supreme Bench," which had replaced the King's Bench during the Interregnum, agreed that the court could overturn an excessive jury verdict in a slander suit and ordered a new trial); Hawkins v. Sciet, 81 Eng. Rep. 1099 (K.B. 1622) (first case to implicitly recognize the courts' power to set aside jury verdicts, although court allowed instant verdict to stand); see also Ellis, supra, at 12-15. Contra, Townsend v. Hughes, 86 Eng. Rep. 994 (C.P. 1649) (court held that it could not interfere with the jury's power to determine damage awards and sustained plaintiff's judgment of 4000 pounds).

n11. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(A)(2).

n12. Appellate courts in medieval England generally could not review a jury award of damages. Instead, a litigant oppressed by an allegedly excessive award of damages could pursue his grievance directly against the jury by means of a writ of attaint. If the court determined the damages excessive pursuant to its writ, the jury members were punishable under its provisions. Sales, supra note 2, at 354. Such punishment could be so severe that the jurors should "'become forever infamous; should forfeit their goods and the profits of their land; should themselves be imprisoned, and their wives and children thrown out of doors; should have their houses razed, their trees extirpated, and their meadows ploughed . . .'" K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(A)(2) (quoting 3 BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND 402 (1836)).

n13. 45 Vt. 275 (1873).

n14. Id. at 286.

n15. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(A)(2).

n16. See Note, Exemplary Damages in the Law of Torts, 70 HARV. L. REV. 517, 530-33 (1957). Professor Ellis indicates that appellate courts today are more willing to use remittitur doctrine at early common law, the simple fact remains that none of the historical justifications supports the punitive damage theory in today's tort reparations system. The quest to bestow increasing compensation no longer can justify punitive damage awards because actual damages currently recoverable compensate plaintiffs more than adequately for every conceivable element of physical, emotional, or imagined injury. The desire to inflict punishment, likewise, represents an insupportable basis for awarding quasi-criminal fines in a civil context, and is inconsistent with ancient and modern jurisprudence because the civil law historically has been premised upon the concept of compensation and not penal retribution. Deterrence is an equally unsound basis upon which to establish a civil remedy. Unfortunately, theoretical arguments mask the archaic and destructive nature of the punitive damages doctrine. Considering that an award of punitive damages is actually counterproductive to the bases which originally provided credibility for its existence, the severe economic impact of mind boggling and unprecedented recent awards of punitive damages, and the potential for even more catastrophic economic consequences in the future, it is time to relegate this doctrine to its rightful niche in the annals of law.

REV_00263111

Part II of this Article traces the evolution of the punitive damage theory, including ancient origins and current status. Part III explores the various justifications theorized in support of the doctrine's present viability. Part IV analyzes the patchwork applications and conflicting standards that measure conduct warranting an award of puntive damages, the treatment of vicariously liable corporate defendants, and other factors that affect the doctrine. This part emphasizes that punitive damages are awarded on the basis of highly questionable rationale and in an absurdly confusing [*1119] and noticeably destructive manner. Part V argues for the complete abolition of the punitive damage concept: ratio potest allegari deficiente lege. In the absence of complete abolition of punitive damages, part VI asserts the urgent need for immediate stringent limitations on a doctrine that currently operates as an undisciplined and unfettered juggernaut of destruction in the civil tort system. Responsible jurisprudence, however, argues forcefully in favor of relegating this legal dinosaur to an era that long since has passed.

II. THE EVOLUTION OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES

A. Ancient Origins and Early Common Law

The precursor of modern puntive damages was the statutory remedy of multiple awards, a practice that, like punitive damages, provided for awards in excess of actual harm. [1] One of the earliest systems of law to utilize civil punitive damages was the Code of Hammurabi in 2000 B.C. [2] Punitory forms of damages also appeared in the Hittite law in 1400 B.C. and in the Hindu Code of Manu in 200 B.C. [3] Even the Bible contains several examples of multiple damage remedies that Mosaic law provided for offenses such as stealing. [4] Commentators disagree over whether Roman civil law ever actually recognized the concept of punitive damages. [5] English courts before the eighteenth century, however, upheld jury verdicts that exceeded the plaintiff's actual physical harm, [6] and an [*1120] English court initially employed the term "exemplary damages" in 1763 in Huckle v. Money [7] to recognize that a jury legitimately could return a verdict for excessive monetary awards. [8]

Courts and commentators have proferred a variety of historical justifications for the development of punitive damages. [9] One theory postulates that courts used the concept of punitive damages to justify otherwise excessive jury verdicts. [10] Early English common-law juries consisted of local townspeople who knew more about the facts of cases than did the judges, and under the reign of Henry II the knights who acted as jurors also provided the only testimony at the trial. [11] Primitive English courts, therefore, only reluctantly interfered with the ostensibly knowledgeable decisions reached by English juries, [12] and the concept that damages possessed [*1121] a proper, albeit punitive quality, simply served to justify these purportedly excessive jury awards.

REV_00263094

to reduce excessive punitive damage awards. Iowa may be the only state that does not allow remittitur of such verdicts. The availability of remittitur in other states does not lead to any more certainty or consistency in punitive damage theory, however; increased availability just makes it more probable that state courts will refuse to uphold extremely large awards. Ellis, supra note 10, at 55 (citing K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 10.5).

n17. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 1.02 4; K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(C); Duffy, supra note 9, at 5; Sales, supra note 2, at 354.

n18. Sales, supra note 2, at 354 (citing Stuart v. Western Union Tel. Co., 66 Tex. 580, 18 S.W. 351 (1885)). The Texas Supreme Court in Stuart allowed recovery for mental anguish when the defendant failed to deliver a death message. The court stated that "the whole doctrine of punitory or exemplary damages has its foundation in a failure to recognize as elements upon which compensation may be given, many things which ought to be classed as injuries entitling the injured person to compensation." Stuart, 66 Tex. at 586, 18 S.W. at 353.

n19. 53 N.H. 342 (1873).

n20. See supra note 7 and accompanying text.

n21. Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. at 364.

n22. 128 Eng. Rep. 761 (C.P. 1814).

n23. Id.

n24. Id.

n25. 95 Eng. Rep. 909 (C.P. 1769).

n26. Id. at 910.

n27. See K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 7.5(D). "The availability of actual damages in tort for mental anguish, wounded feelings, indignity and embarrassment have made the awarding of exemplary damages on such bases redundant." Id. § 2.3(A).

n28. Id. § 7.5(D); Coccia & Morrissey, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Cases Should Not Be Allowed, 22 TRIAL LAW. GUIDE 46, 64-65 (1978); see infra notes 153-66 and accompanying text.

n29. 53 N.H. 342 (1873).

n30. Id. at 382.

n31. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(E) (citing Freifield, The Rationale of Punitive Damages, 1 OHIO ST. L.J. 5, 9 (1935)); Sales, supra note 2, at 355.

n32. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(E); Sales, supra note 2, at 355.

n33. Special Project, supra note 2, at 694.

n34. See Duffy, supra note 8, at 5; supra note 27 and accompanying text.

n35. Defense Research Institute: The Case Against Punitive Damages, 6-7 (D. Hirsch & J. Pouros eds. 1969); K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 7.5(B). Dean Prosser stated:

REV_00263112

A crime is an offense against the public at large, for which the state, as the representative of the public, will bring proceedings in the form of a criminal prosecution. The purpose of such a proceeding is to protect and vindicate the interests of the public as a whole, by punishing the offender or eliminating him from society, either permanently or for a limited time, by reforming him or teaching him not to repeat the offense, and by deterring others from imitating him. . . .

The civil action for tort, on the other hand, is commenced and maintained by the injured person himself, and its purpose is to compensate him for the damage he has suffered, at the expense of the wrongdoer.

W. PROSSER, HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF TORTS § 2, at 7 (4th ed. 1971) (footnote omitted). Professors Lafave and Scott have observed:

Criminal law and the law of torts . . . are related branches of the law; yet in a sense they are two quite different matters. The aim of the criminal law . . . is to protect the public against harm, by punishing harmful results of conduct or at least situations . . . which are likely to result in harm if allowed to proceed further. The function of tort law is to compensate someone who is injured for the harm he has suffered.

W. LAFAVE & A. SCOTT, HANDBOOK ON CRIMINAL LAW § 3, at 11 (1972).

n36. 1 N.J.L. 77 (1791).

n37. Id. at 77 (emphasis in original).

n38. Id. at 78.

n39. See K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.3(B).

n40. Id. § 2.3(A); Ellis, supra note 10, at 11-12; Sales, supra note 2, at 355. Some disagreement, however, exists over whether the modern justification for punitive damages in England is compensation or punishment and deterrence. Compare Duffy, supra note 9, at 5 (citing Walther & Plein, Punitive Damages: A Critical Analysis: Kirk v. Combs, 49 MARQ. L. REV. 369, 371 (1965)) (theory that punitive damages are "compensation" for incompensable injuries has remained the modern English justification) with J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 1.03, at 7 (citing Rookes v. Barnard, [1964] 1 All E.R. 367, 407) (despite early confusion, current purpose of punitive damages in English law is "to punish and deter").

n41. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 4.01-.1.6; Sales, supra note 2, at 363.

n42. See J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, at table 4.1 (46 states and the District of Columbia allow punitive damages at common law); Duffy, supra note 9, at 6.

n43. Louisiana, Massachusetts, Nebraska, and Washington constitute this minority. See, e.g., McCoy v. Arkansas Natural Gas Co., 175 La. 487, 143 So. 383 (1932); City of Lowell v. Massachusetts Bonding & Ins. Co., 313 Mass. 257, 47 N.E.2d 265 (1943); Abel v. Conover, 170 Neb. 926, 104 N.W.2d 684 (1960); Kammerer v. Western Gear Corp., 96 Wash. 2d 416, 635 P.2d 708 (1981).

n44. These jurisdictions are Louisiana and Massachusetts. No authority exists in Louisiana law for imposing punitive damages in any case "unless it be for some particular wrong for which a statute expressly authorizes the imposition of some such penalty." McCoy v. Arkansas Natural Gas Co., 175 La. at 497, 143 So. at 386; see Killebrew v. Abbott Laboratories, 359 So. 2d 1275 (La. 1978). Massachusetts similarly disallows punitive damages in the absence of specific statutory authorization. City of Lowell v. Massachusetts Bonding & Ins. Co., 313 Mass. at 269-70, 47 N.E.2d at 272; see Caperci v. Huntoon, 397 F.2d 799, 801 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 940 (1968). Statutorily allowed punitive damages in Massachusetts include situations in which the defendant is guilty of unfair or deceptive insurance trade practices, MASS. GEN. LAWS ANN. ch. 176D, § 7 (West Supp. 1983-1984)(up to 25% of underlying claim), and illegal willful dissemination of the criminal record of an offender, MASS. GEN. LAWS. ANN. ch. 6, § 177 (West 1976) (minimum $ 100 to maximum $ 1000); see Barr v. Interbay Citizens Bank, 96 Wash. 2d. 409, 635 P.2d 441 (1981) (punitive damages allowed only under express statutory authorization).

REV_00263113

n45. These jurisdictions include Indiana, Nebraska, and Washington. See, e.g., Glissman v. Rutt, 175 Ind. App. 493, 494, 372 N.E.2d 1188, 1189 (1978) (criminal prosecution bars imposition of punitive damages); Abel v. Conover, 170 Neb. 926, 929, 104 N.W.2d 684, 688 (1960) (court stated unequivocally that "punitive, vindictive, or exemplary damages will not be allowed, and that the measure of recovery in all civil cases is compensation for the injury sustained"); Spokane Truck & Dray Co. v. Hoefer, 2 Wash. 45, 53, 25 P. 1072, 1074 (1891) (Washington will allow only compensatory damages because they now cover all possible injuries and to allow punitive damages in addition would be akin to "exacting the pound of flesh"); accord Kammerer v. Western Gear Corp., 96 Wash. 2d 416, 635 P.2d 708 (1981); Barr v. Interbay Citizens Bank, 96 Wash. 2d. 409, 635 P.2d 441 (1981).

n46. These states are Connecticut, Georgia, Michigan, and New Hampshire. See, e.g., Collens v. New Canaan Water Co., 155 Conn. 477, 488-89, 234 A.2d 825, 831-32 (1967) (punitive damages actually have a compensatory nature and may not exceed the amount of plaintiff's expenses of litigation, less taxable costs); Westview Cemetery, Inc. v. Blanchard, 234 Ga. 540, 543-46, 216 S.E.2d 776, 778-81 (1975) (recovery under § 105-2003 for injury "to the peace, happiness, or feelings of the plaintiff" may include punitive damages and, therefore, precludes the recovery of punitive damages under § 105-2002); Wise v. Daniel, 221 Mich. 229, 233-34, 190 N.W. 746, 747 (1922) (factfinder may not award exemplary damages as a separate amount for example or punishment, although compensatory damages may be increased); Vratsenes v. New Hampshire Auto, Inc., 112 N.H. 71, 73, 289 A.2d 66, 68 (1972) (punitive award not allowable, but compensatory damages may be increased to compensate plaintiff in cases of wanton, malicious, or oppressive conduct).

n47. See supra note 40 and accompanying text. The states that recognize punishment and deterrence as the rationales for punitive damages obviously do not include the four states that employ the punitive nomenclature in designating essentially compensatory awards. See supra note 46 and accompanying text.

n48. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 4.14 & n.1 (citing cases and statutes from 36 states and the District of Columbia).

n49. Ellis, supra note 10, at 3. Professor Ellis offered as possible justifications: (1) punishment of the defendant; (2) specific deterrence of the defendant; (3) general deterrence of others from acting in a similar manner; (4) preservation of the peace; (5) inducement of private law enforcement; (6) compensation of victims for otherwise uncompensable losses; and (7) payment of plaintiffs' attorneys' fees. Id.

n50. Id. at 3 n.10 (quoting T. BATY, VICARIOUS LIABILITY 148 (1916)).

n51. Ellis, supra note 10, at 11.

n52. See, e.g., Moran v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 691 F.2d 811, 815 (6th Cir. 1982) (failure to warn would support punitive award if such failure manifested a flagrant indifference to the risk of harm); Neal v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 21 Cal. 3d 910, 928 n.13, 582 P.2d 980, 990 n.13, 148 Cal. Rptr. 389, 399 n.13 (1978) ("purpose of punitive damage is to punish wrongdoers and thereby deter commission of wrongful acts"); Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727, 741 (Minn.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 921 (1980) (court allowed punitive damages, even though manufacturer had ceased production of dangerous product, for purpose of deterring future misconduct and "to punish past misconduct"); Leimgruber v. Claridge Assocs., 73 N.J. 450, 454, 375 A.2d 652, 654 (1977) (theory of punitive damages is to punish the defendant for aggravated misconduct and deter such conduct in the future); Sandler v. Lawn-A-Mat Chem. & Equip. Corp., 141 N.J. Super. 436, 448, 358 A.2d 805, 811 (1976) (punitive damages are intended to punish the tortfeasor and prevent him from repeating such misconduct).

REV_00263114

n53. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 5.39.

n54. See infra notes 101-07 & 188-201 and accompanying text.

n55. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 4.14.

n56. Id.

n57. See, e.g., Pringle Tax Serv., Inc. v. Knoblauch, 282 N.W.2d 151, 154 (Iowa 1979); Standard Life Ins. Co. v. Veal, 354 So. 2d 239, 247 (Miss. 1977); Newton V. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 291 N.C. 105, 114, 229 S.E.2d 297, 302 (1976); Detling v. Chockley, 70 Ohio St. 2d 134, 136, 436 N.E.2d 208, 209 (1982); City Nat'l. Bank v. Haynes, 614 S.W.2d 605, 609 (Tex. 1981); FBC Stores, Inc., v. Duncan, 214 Va. 246, 251, 198 S.E.2d 595, 599 (1973); Spencer v. Steinbrecher, 152 W. Va. 490, 500, 164, S.E.2d 710, 717 (1968). North Carolina consistently has allowed punitive damages solely on the basis of its policy to punish intentional wrongdoing and to deter others from similar behavior. See, e.g., Newton v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 291 N.C. 105 at 114, 229 S.E.2d 297, 302 (1976).

n58. See, e.g., Kerr v. First Commodity Corp. of Boston, 735 F.2d 281, 289 (5th Cir. 1984) (applying Missouri law); Ray Dodge, Inc. v. Moore, 251 Ark. 1036, 1044, 479 S.W.2d 518, 523 (1972); Frick v. Abell, 198 Colo. 508, 511, 602 P.2d 852, 853 (Colo. 1979); Gent v. Collinsville Volkswagen, Inc., 116 Ill. App. 3d 496, , 451 N.E.2d 1385, 1391 (1983); Taylor v. Wachter, 227 Kan. 221, 224, 607 P.2d 1094, 1098 (1980); Bisset v. Goss, 481 S.W.2d 71, 74 (Ky. 1972); Wedeman v. City Chevrolet Co., 278 Md. 524, 531, 366 A.2d 7, 12 (1976); Miller v. Watkins, 653 P.2d 126, 133 (Mont. 1982); Fahrenberg v. Tengel, 96 Wis. 2d 211, 222, 291 N.W.2d 516 (1980).

n59. See, e.g., Acheson v. Shafter, 107 Ariz. 576, 578, 490 P.2d 832, 834 (1971) (punitive damages are meant to punish the wrongdoer and to act as a deterrent to further wrongdoing); Sandler v. Lawn-A-Mat Chem. & Equip. Co., 141 N.J. Super. 436, 448, 358 A.2d 805, 811 (1976) (punitive damages "are intended to punish the tortfeasor and prevent him from repeating such conduct").

n60. See, e.g., Jensen v. Peterson, 264 N.W.2d 139, 144 (Minn. 1978) (punitive damages deter particularly egregious conduct, but court does not indicate by whom); Kirchbaum v. Lowrey, 165 Minn. 233, 236, 206 N.W. 171, 173 (1925) (punitive damages deter willful, wanton, or malicious wrongs, but court does not specify by whom).

n61. See Malcom v. Little, 295 A.2d 711, 714 (Del. 1972); Riegel v. Aastad, 272 A.2d 715, 718 (Del. 1970).

n62. Malcom v. Little, 295 A.2d at 714 (Del. 1972); Riegel v. Aastad, 272 A.2d at 718 (Del. 1970).

REV_00263115

n63. See Hofer v. Lavender, No. C-2552 (Tex. July 11, 1984) (either deterrence or punishment, or both are now recognized as valid). Compare Wussow v. Commercial Mechanisms, Inc., 97 Wis. 2d 136, 155-56, 293 N.W.2d 897, 907 (1980) (punishment of past conduct is a sufficient basis for assessing punitive damages, even though they can also serve to deter future outrageous conduct) with John Mohr & Sons v. Jahnke, 55 Wis. 2d 402, 411, 198 N.W.2d 363, 368 (1972) (punitive damages act to punish and deter).

n64. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 4.15 at 17.

n65. Maine, Oregon, and Utah are among those states that specifically state that deterrence is the only proper basis of punitive damages. See, e.g., Foss v. Maine Turnpike Auth., 309 A.2d 339, 345 (Me. 1973) (deterrence is the proper justification for exemplary damages); Lewis v. Devils Lake Rock Crushing Co., 274 Or. 293, 300, 545 P.2d 1374, 1378 (1976)(deterrence is only proper basis for imposing punitive damages); Nash v. Craigco, Inc., 585 P.2d 775, 778 (Utah 1978)(punitive damages teach the defendant not to repeat and warn others not to participate in such conduct).

n66. Jolley v. Puregro Co., 94 Idaho 702, 708-09, 496 P.2d 939, 945-46 (1972).

n67. See supra notes 56-60 and accompanying text. At least one jurisdiction, California, has suggested that punitive damages may be levied against a product supplier to deter the entire industry of which the defendant is a member. See Schleininger v. Questor Corp., 200 Cal. Rptr. 634 (1984). The extra penalty of monetary awards based on alleged wanton and reckless conduct by all members of an industry is an unwarranted extension of an already flawed concept.

n68. See J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 4.15, at 18.

n69. Hofer v. Lavender No. C-2552 (Tex. July 11, 1984).

n70. In a strongly worded dissent Justice Spears noted that [t]he punitive and deterrant aims of exemplary damages are not separable. The general deterrent effect of an award can not be considered in isolation, because to a large extent general deterrence depends on punishment. Specifically, members of the public are deterred from similar misconduct because they witnessed the wrongdoers conduct. . . .

Id.

n71. See Collens v. New Canaan Water Co., 155 Conn. 477, 234 A.2d 825 (1967); Westview Cemetery, Inc. v. Blanchard, 234 Ga. 540, 216 S.E.2d 776 (1975); McLaren v. Zeilinger, 103 Mich. App. 22, 302 N.W.2d 583 (1981); Perry v. Melton, 299 S.E.2d 8 (W. Va. 1982). But, as noted in Ratner v. Sioux Natural Gas Corp., 719 F.2d 801, 804 (5th Cir. 1983), "[t]he award of punitive damages is unconcerned with compensation; it is intended to punish the wrongdoer and deter the commission of similar offenses in the future."

n72. Sales, supra note 2, at 354; see Hink v. Sherman, 164 Mich. 352, 357, 129 N.W. 732, 734 (1911); Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. 342, 380 (1873).

n73. See Stuart v. Western Union Tel. Co., 66 Tex. 530, 18 S.W. 351 (1885).

n74. Duffy, supra note 9, at 11; see also Reinah Dev. Corp. v. Kaaterskill Hotel, 86 A.D.2d 50, 448 N.Y.S.2d 686 (1982), rev'd on other grounds, 465 N.Y.2d 482, 452 N.E.2d 1238 (1983).

n75. See supra notes 17-29 and accompanying text.

REV_00263116

n76. See infra notes 213-20 and accompanying text.

n77. See generally J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 5.01, at 2; Sales, supra note 2, at 364-65; Special Project, supra note 2, at 695.

n78. As an example, Dean Prosser has noted:

Something more than the mere commission of a tort is always required for punitive damages. There must be circumstances of aggravation or outrage, such as spite or "malice," or a fraudulent or evil motive on the part of the defendant, or such a conscious and deliberate disregard of the interests of others that his conduct may be called willful or wanton. Lacking this element, there is general agreement that mere negligence is not enough, even though it is so extreme in degree as to be characterized as "gross," an unhappy term of ill-defined content, which occasionally, in a few jurisdictions, has been stretched to include the element of conscious indifference to consequences, and so to justify punitive damages. Still less, of course, can such damages be charged against one who acts under an innocent mistake in engaging in conduct that nevertheless constitutes a tort.

W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 9-10. Similarly, Professor McCormick has suggested:

Since these damages are assessed for punishment and not for reparation, a positive element of conscious wrongdoing is always required. It must be shown either that the defendant was actuated by ill will, malice, or evil motive (which may appear by direct evidence of such motive, or from the inherent character of the tort itself, or from the oppressive character of his conduct, sometimes called "circumstances" of aggravation"), or by fraudulent purposes, or that he was so wanton and reckless, as to evince a conscious disregard of the rights of others. "Gross negligence" is a somewhat ambiguous expression. In the sense of extreme carelessness merely, it would probably not suffice, but only when it goes further and amounts to conscious indifference to harmful consequences.

McCORMICK, HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF DAMAGES § 79, at 280-82 (1935). For the sake of simplicity, this Article adopts the broad terms of "intentional," "reckless," and "negligent" to describe and refer to the standards of conduct that govern the imposition of punitive damages. "Intentional" refers to that conduct which is characterized by willfulness or malice, whether express, implied in fact, or implied in law. "Reckless" refers to that conduct which, although not intentional, is marked by various degrees of indifference or wantonness. "Negligent" includes that nebulous area of careless action which courts generally have viewed as insufficient for the imposition of punitive damages. The circular and overlapping characteristics of these three categories reflect the ambiguity and lack of definition inherent in the punitive damage environment. See Ellis, supra note 9, at 34-37, for another attempt to deal with this confusion.

n79. See generally J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 5.02. (The authors give numerous examples of the imposition of punitive damages for the intentional tort of assault and battery.) Some state legislatures have dictated that punitive damages are permissible for intentional or quasi-intentional conduct. See, e.g., MINN. STAT. ANN. § 549.20(1) (1984) (requiring "clear and convincing evidence that the acts of the defendant show a willful indifference to the rights or safety or others"); MONT. CODE ANN. § 27-1-221 (1983) (where the defendant has been "guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed"); NEV. REV. STAT. § 42.010(1)(1981) (where the defendant has "been guilty of oppression, fraud or malice, express or implied"); N.D. CENT. CODE § 32-03-07 (Supp. 1983) ("when the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed"); OKLA. STAT. ANN. tit. 23, § 9 (1955) ("where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud or malice, actual or presumed"); S.D. CODIFIED LAWS ANN. § 21-3-2 (1979) ("where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed"). One state legislature has mandated a reckless standard for awarding punitive damages. See COLO.

REV_00263117

REV. STAT. § 13-21-102 (1973) ("the injury complained of is attended by circumstances of fraud, malice or insult, or a wanton and reckless disregard of the injured party's rights and feelings").

n80. See Ellis, supra note 10, at 21-22 (when a defendant purposefully injures someone, then characterization of that action as the commission of a wrongful act with a culpable mental state that deserves punishment is relatively easy). The principal problems in justifying punitive damages from a just desserts standpoint arise when the defendant's conduct may not be characterized as purposeful harm. Much of the disagreement among the jurisdictions centers on expanding the punitive damage concept to embrace merely reckless conduct. Id.; see also Addair v. Huffman, 195 S.E.2d 739, 744 (W. Va. 1973) (intentional disregard of a law that protects the public from a particular abuse, thereby resulting in injury, gives rise to the imposition of punitive damages).

n81. Sherman v. McDermott, 114 R.I. 107, 109, 329 A.2d 195, 196 (1974)(quoting Adams v. Lorraine Mfg. Co., 29 R.I. 333, 338, 71 A. 180, 182 (1908)).

n82. Sandler v. Lawn-A-Mat Chem. & Equip. Corp., 141 N.J. Super. 437, 448, 358 A.2d 805, 811 (1976)(quoting La Bruno v. Lawrence, 64 N.J. Super. 570, 575, 166 A.2d 822, 824 (1960), cert. denied, 34 N.J. 323, 168 A.2d 694 (1961); see Kocse v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., 152 N.J. Super. 371, 375-76, 377 A.2d 1234, 1236 (1977). Idaho applies a similar standard. See Cheney v. Palos Verdes Inv. Corp., 104 Idaho 897, 905, 665 P.2d 661, 669 (1983); Linscott v. Ranier Nat'l Life Ins. Co., 100 Idaho 854, 858, 606 P.2d 958, 962 (1980) (punitive damages are appropriate if defendant's act is an "extreme deviation from reasonable standards of conduct" and if defendant acted "with an understanding of or a disregard for its likely consequences"). Texas also arguably falls within this category. In Ogle v. Craig, 464 S.W. 2d 95 (Tex. 1971), the Texas Supreme Court stated that the "act complained of not only must be unlawful but also must partake of a wanton and malicious nature, or, as sometimes stated, somewhat of a criminal or wanton nature." Id. at 97 (quoting Dennis v. Dial Fin. & Thrift Co., 401 S.W.2d 803, 805 (Tex. 1966)). Texas, however, also allows recovery of punitive damages for grossly negligent conduct. See Schwartz v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 669 F.2d 1091, 1093 (5th Cir. 1982); Burk Royalty Co. v. Walls, 616 S.W.2d 911, 920 (Tex. 1981); Houston Lighting & Power Co. v. Sue, 644 S.W.2d 835, 839 (Tex. Civ. App. 1982).

n83. Silberg v. California Life Ins. Co., 11 Cal. 3d 452, 462, 521 P.2d 1103, 1110, 113 Cal. Rptr. 711, 718 (1974); see Colonial Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Superior Court, 31 Cal. 3d 785, 792, 647 P.2d 86, 90, 183 Cal. Rptr. 810, 814 (1982).

n84. Shortle v. Central Vt. Pub. Serv. Corp., 137 Vt. 32, 33, 399 A.2d 517, 518 (1979). Other jurisdictions follow similar standards. See Freeman v. Anderson, 279 Ark. 282, 286-87, 651 S.W.2d 450, 452 (1983); Dalrymple v. Fields, 276 Ark. 185, 188, 633 S.W.2d 362, 363 (1982) (must be shown that "in the absence of proof of malice or willfulness there was a wanton and conscious disregard for the rights and safety of others"); Satterfield v. Rebsamen Ford, Inc., 253 Ark. 181, 185, 485 S.W.2d 192, 195 (1972) ("when the defendant acts with malice, . . . or with willfulness, wantonness, or conscious indifference to consequences from which malice may be inferred") (citations omitted); Sere v. Group Hospitalization, Inc., 443 A.2d 33, 37 (D.C. 1982) ("defendant's tortious conduct must have been outrageous, characterized by malice, wantonness, gross fraud, recklessness, or willful disregard of the plaintiff's rights"); Riggs Nat'l Bank v. Price, 359 A.2d 25, 28 (D.C. 1976) ("for outrageous conduct such as maliciousness, wantonness, gross fraud, recklessness and willful disregard of another's rights"); Toyota Motor Co. v. Moll, 438 So. 2d 192 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1983) ("for actions or inactions amounting to willfulness, wantonness, maliciousness, recklessness, oppression, or outrageous conduct"); Kelsay v. Motorola, Inc., 74 III. 2d 172, 186, 384 N.E.2d 353, 359 (1978) ("committed with fraud, actual malice, deliberate violence or oppression, or when the defendant acts willfully, or with such gross negligence as to indicate a wanton disregard of the rights of others"); Gent v. Collinsville Volkswagen, Inc., 116 III. App. 3d 496, 451 N.E.2d 1385 (1983); General Motors Corp. v. Piskor, 277 Md. 165, 175, 352 A.2d 810, 817 (1976) ("only when there is an element of fraud, malice, evil intent or oppression which enters into and forms a part of the wrongful act"); Nelson v. Jacobsen, 669 P.2d 1207, 1219 (Utah 1983) (requiring a higher standard of proof than "willful and malicious" for punitive awards in an alienation of affections case); Kesler v. Rogers, 542 P.2d 354, 359 (Utah 1974) ("for particularly grievous injury caused by conduct which is not only wrongful, but which is willful and malicious so that it seems to one's sense of justice that mere recompense for actual loss is inadequate").

REV_00263118

n85. Jones v. Hospital for Joint Diseases and Medical Center, 96 A.D.2d 498, 499, 465 N.Y.S.2d 517, 517 (1982); see Le Mistral, Inc. v. Columbia Broadcasting Sys., 61 A.D.2d 491, 494, 402 N.Y.S.2d 815, 817 (1978) ("based upon tortious acts which involve ingredients of malice, fraud, oppression, insult, wanton or reckless disregard of the plaintiff's rights, or other circumstances of aggravation"). For other weak standard formulations, see Alyeska Pipeline Serv. Co. v. O'Kelley, 645 P.2d 767, 774 (Alaska 1982) ("characterized as outrageous, such as acts done with malice or bad motives or reckless indifference to the interests of another") (quoting Bridges v. Alaska Hous. Auth., 375 P.2d 696, 702 (Alaska 1962)); Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 46 (Alaska 1979); Malcolm v. Little, 295 A.2d 711, 714 (Del. 1972) ("when [the defendant's] wrongful act was committed willfully or wantonly") (quoting Riegel v. Aastad, 272 A.2d 715, 718 (Del. 1970)); Meyer v. Nottger, 241 N.W.2d 911, 922 (Iowa 1976) ("where defendant acts maliciously . . . where the nature of the illegal act is such as to negative any inference of feeling toward the person injured") (quoting Amos v. Prom, 115 F. Supp. 127, 136-37 (N.D. Iowa 1953)); McKinnon v. Tibbetts, 440 A.2d 1028, 1031 (Me. 1982) ("malicious, gross or wanton"); Foss v. Main Turnpike Auth., 309 A.2d 339, 345 (Me. 1973) ("the conduct of the defendant is found to be deliberate, malicious or grossly negligent"); Addair v. Huffman, 156 W. Va. 592, 599, 195 S.E.2d 739, 743 (1973) ("where there is an intentional wrong, or where there are circumstances which warrant an inference of malice, willfulness, or wanton disregard of the rights of others"); Petsch v. Florom, 538 P.2d 1011, 1013 (Wyo. 1975) ("the act of the defendant was committed maliciously, willfully or wantonly").

n86. Ex parte Smith, 412 So. 2d 1222, 1223 (Ala. 1982); see Ford Motor Credit Co. v. Washington, 420 So. 2d 14 (Ala. 1982); Ex parte Lewis, 416 So. 2d 410 (Ala. 1982).

n87. Cooter, supra note 9, at 80. Professor Cooter suggests that because most potential wrongdoers find it economically cheaper to comply with the law, noncompliance is usually unintentional. If the wrongdoer's actions are unintentional, then punitive damages are unnecessary for deterrence and underserved for punishment. Professor Cooter, however, also argues that some individuals intentionally cause harm, and that courts should impose punitive damages against these purposeful wrongdoers to offset either their illicit pleasure in noncompliance or the exceptional cost of compliance that instigates their noncompliance. Id. at 79-80. If, however, such deterrent or punitory measures are still necessary in light of the present expanded compensatory damage remedy, those effects should be achieved through the criminal processes, or at a minimum, restructured to preclude a windfall to an already fully compensated plaintiff.

n88. See Owen, Punitive Damages in Product Liability Litigation, 74 MICH. L. REV. 1258 (1976).

n89. Owen, supra note 9, at 106-07. Professor Owen asserts that the assessment of punitive damages in "deliberate" situations -- those concerning conduct intended to cause harm for no good reason -- "generally would be regarded as appropriate without much argument about either fairness or efficiency." Accordingly, punitive damages properly would lie in "evaluative" situations -- those in which the defendant evaluates the circumstances and decides that he will benefit enough from the act to justify its occurrence -- but only if the defendant's choice is wrong (immoral) and the defendant knows or recklessly fails to discover its wrongfulness before acting. Professor Owen, however, now draws the line at "inadvertent" acts -- those that show no real thought by the defendant concerning the wrongfulness or implications of the act -- because a failure to think usually does not call for punishment. Id. This shift is understandable because an objective view of the courts' indiscriminate use of punitive damages would dampen the enthusiasm of even the doctrine's most ardent supporters.

REV_00263119

n90. Sandler v. Lawn-A-Mat Chem. & Equip. Co., 141 N.J. Super. 437, 448, 358 A.2d 805, 811 (1976). The court also refers to conduct that evinces a "wanton and willful disregard of the rights of another." Id. Actual malice, likewise, reflects the Iowa and Maryland standards. See Feeney v. Scott County, 290 N.W.2d 885, 892 (Iowa 1980); see also West Des Moines State Bank v. Hawkeye Bancorp., 722 F.2d 411, 414 (8th Cir. 1983); Savol v. BL Ltd., 710 F.2d 1027, 1033 (4th Cir. 1983). South Carolina and Virginia also use similar formulations. See King v. Allstate Ins. Co., 272 S.C. 259, 263, 251 S.E.2d 194, 196 (1979)("must be malice, ill will, a conscious indifference to the rights of others, or a reckless disregard thereof")(quoting Cox v. Coleman, 189 S.C. 218, 221, 200 S.E. 762, 764 (1939)); Peacock Buick, Inc. v. Durkin, 221 Va. 1133, 1136-37, 277 S.E.2d 225, 227 (1981)(actual malice or malice in fact); Jordan v. Sauve, 219 Va. 448, 452, 247 S.E.2d 739, 741 (1978)("only where there is misconduct or actual malice").

n91. Anderson v. Continental Ins. Co., 85 Wis. 2d 675, 697, 271 N.W.2d 368, 379 (1978); see Franklin Music Co. v. American Broadcasting Co., 616 F.2d 528, 542 (3d Cir. 1979) (Pennsylvania law requires bad motive or reckless indifference); Amish v. Walnut Creek Dev., Inc., 631 S.W.2d 866, 876 (Mo. App. 1982)(bad motive or evil intent).

n92. Under Missouri law, legal malice and not actual malice governs an award for punitive damages. Armstrong v. Republic Realty Mortgage Corp., 631 F.2d 1344, 1352 (8th Cir. 1980)(applying Missouri law); Pollock v. Brown, 569 S.W.2d 724, 732 (Mo. 1978). As noted by the court in Crues v. KFC Corp., 729 F.2d 1145, 1153 (8th Cir. 1984)(citing Beggs v. Universal C.I.T. Credit Corp., 409 S.W.2d 719 (Mo. 1966)), legal malice is defined to mean "whether the defendant did a wrongful act intentionally and without just cause or excuse . . . [meaning] that defendant not only intended to do the act which is ascertained to be wrongful but that he knew it was wrongful when he did it." Accord Pollock v. Brown, 569 S.W.2d at 724.

n93. Gulf Atl. Life Ins. Co. v. Barnes, 405 So. 2d 916 (Ala. 1981); Randall v. Ganz, 96 Idaho 785, 787, 537 P.2d 65, 67 (1975); Petsch v. Florom, 538 P.2d 1011, 1013 (Wyo. 1975).

n94. Burk Royalty Co., v. Walls, 616 S.W.2d 911, 920 (Tex. 1981); Jeffers v. Nysse, 98 Wis. 2d 543, 297 N.W.2d 495 (1980).

n95. Silberg v. California Life Ins. Co., 11 cal. 3d 452, 462, 521 P.2d 1103, 1110, 113 Cal. Rptr. 711, 718 (1974); Shortle v. Central Vt. Pub. Serv. Corp., 137 Vt. 32, 33, 399 A.2d 517, 518 (1974); see Newton v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 291 N.C. 105, 112, 229 S.E.2d 297, 301 (1976)("'fraud, malice, such a degree of negligence as indicates a reckless indifference to consequences, oppression, insult, rudeness, caprice, willfullness'")(quoting Baker v. Winslow, 184 N.C. 1, 113 S.E. 570 (1922)); Henry v. Deen, 61 N.C. App. 189, 195, 300 S.E.2d 707, 711 (1983)("based on aggravated, intentional, wanton or grossly negligent conduct"), rev'd on other grounds, 310 N.C. 75, 310 S.E.2d 327 (1984); Rubeck v. Huffman, 54 Ohio St. 2d 20, 23, 374 N.E.2d 411, 413 (1978)("caused by intentional, reckless, wanton, willful and gross acts or by malice inferred from conduct and surrounding circumstances").

n96. McClellan v. Highland Sales & Inv. Co., 484 S.W.2d 239, 242 (Mo. 1972). Under this approach, some element of wantonness or bad motive must exist. Id.; see also Kline v.

REV_00263120

Multi-Media Cablevision, Inc., 233 Kan. 188, 666 P.2d 711 (1983); Loucks v. Albuquerque Nat'l Bank, 76 N.M. 735, 747, 418 P.2d 191, 199 (1966)("only when the conduct of the wrongdoer may be said to be maliciously intentional, fraudulent, oppressive, or committed recklessly or with a wanton disregard of the plaintiffs's rights").

n97. Salt River Valley Water Users' Ass'n. v. Giglio, 113 Ariz. 190, 202, 549 P.2d 162, 174 (1976). The court, however, did not impose punitive damages because of plaintiffs' failure to demonstrate the requisite degree of wanton or reckless disregard. Id. at 203, 549 P.2d at 175; see Nienstedt v. Wetzel, 133 Ariz. 348, 357, 651 P.2d 876, 885 (1982)("where the conduct of the wrongdoer is wanton, reckless or shows spite or ill will"); Currie v. Dooley, 132 Ariz. 584, 589, 647 P.2d 1182, 1187 (1982) (where the defendant's conduct "is wanton, reckless or shows spite or ill will").

n98. Richardson v. Gibalski, 625 S.W.2d 715, 717 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1979)(quoting Inland Container Corp. v. March, 529 S.W.2d 43, 45 (Tenn. 1975)). A similar amalgamated standard prevails in Montana. In the recent case of Kuiper v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 673 P.2d 1208 (Montana 1983), relying on Graham v. Clarks Fork Nat'l Bank, 631 P.2d 718 (Montana 1981), the court defined the wrongful act as "characterized by some such circumstances of aggravation, as willfulness, wantonness, malice, oppression, brutality, insult, recklessness, gross negligence, or gross fraud on the part of the defendant." 673 P.2d at 1213-14.

n99. See supra note 78, for Dean Prosser's and Professor McCormick's standards for justifying the imposition of punitive damages. Some commentators have elected to divide antisocial conduct into two categories: (1) that conduct which indicates that the defendant desired to cause the harm that the plaintiff sustained, or at least believed that the harm was substantially certain to follow from the conduct; and (2) situations in which the defendant knew, or should have had reason to know, not only that his conduct created an unreasonable risk of harm, but also that a strong probability -- although not a substantial certainty -- existed that the harm would result but, nevertheless, he proceeded with his conduct in reckless or conscious disregard of the consequences. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 5.01 at 8-9. These categories, however, appear to be the equivalent of the intentional and reckless or wanton categories. This characterization provides little illumination and even less meaningful guidance in applying the standard. This strained effort to characterize conduct warranting punitive damages merely dramatizes the total unsuitability of the punitive damage concept in the arena of civil torts reparations.

Unquestionably, there exists an inherent and unintelligible confusion in this area of the law. One commentator defined the recklessness category as conduct that does not suggest that the actor desired to hurt anyone and in which the actor's means of achieving his objective, rather than the objective itself, is scrutinized. This commentator emphasized the subtle differences in connotation of such terms as "conscious indifference,"" reckless disregard," "recklessness," and "wantonness." See Ellis, supra note 10, at 35.

Other commentators simply have labeled the basic types of conduct that warrant the imposition of punitive damages and have failed to analyze the standards by which such labeled conduct can be judged. See, e.g., Duffy, supra note 9, at 7 (majority of jurisdictions allow punitive damages if the defendant's actions were wanton, malicious, or oppressive) (citing Great Atl. & Pac. Tea Co., v. Smith, 218 Ky. 583, 136 S.W.2d 759 (1940) and 22 AM. JUR. 2D Damages § 236 (1965)); Special Project, supra note 2, at 695 (most states require that the defendant act with gross negligence, willfulness, or wantonness).

n100. As one commentator has observed, jury instructions on the standards for assessing punitive damages are unilluminating and, although judges usually tell the jurors that they can award punitive damages if the defendant acted with maliciousness, willfulness, wantonness, or in reckless disregard of the plaintiff's rights, most courts provide little if any meaningful guidelines. Ellis, supra note 10, at 38. A dramatic example of judicial ratification

REV_00263121

This attitude first may have manifested itself in American legal jurisprudence in Earl v. Tupper, [13] an early Vermont case in which the court announced that it would not grant a new trial for reason of excessive damage awards if the defendant's malice, oppression, or gross fraud contributed to the plaintiff's injury. [14] As the jury system continued its evolution and juries began to base their verdicts on the testimony of others, however, courts began exercising more control over the monetary amount of jury awards. [15] Consequently, jury determinations alone as justification for tolerating punitive damages as an integral element of the remedy in a tort reparations system began losing much, if not all, of their significance. [16]

Another theory espoused to justify the use of punitive damages views punitory damages as compensation for plaintiffs' ethereal injuries such as hurt feelings, humiliation, wounded dignity, mental anguish, and embarrassment, which the courts during the formative stages of the common law were reluctant to recognize as compensable injuries. [17] Punitive damages, therefore, performed the task of compensating plaintiffs for elements of personal harm that otherwise were unrecoverable. [18] In the early New Hampshire case [*1122] of Fay v. Parker, [19] the court discussed Huckle v. Money [20] and stated that the English decision "said no more, in substance, than that for the outrage and indignity heaped upon the plaintiff by the insolence, oppression, and tyranny of the defendant, a jury might give the plaintiff liberal damages." [21] Likewise, other early English courts allowed intangible injuries to serve as the basis for punitive damages awards. In Merest v. Harvey, [22] plaintiff instituted a trespass action because defendant intruded on plaintiff's land, fired several times at game, and used extremely intemperate language. The appellate court upheld a jury verdict of 500 pounds and queried,

[I]n a case where a man disregards every principle which actuates the conduct of a gentleman, what is to restrain him except damages? To be sure, one can hardly conceive worse conduct than this. What would be said to a person in a low situation in life, who should behave himself in this manner? [23]

The English court then refused to establish a principle that juries justifiably could award only "the absolute pecuniary damage that the plaintiff may sustain." [24] Similarly, the court in Tullidge v. Wade [25] emphasized offensive behavior while discussing guidelines for awarding damages. The Tullidge court stated, "In actions [involving seduction] . . . the circumstances of time and place, when and where the insult is given, require different damages; as it is a greater insult to be beaten upon the Royal Exchange than in a private room." [26]

The ambit of compensatory damages has expanded rapidly over recent years to include an entire spectrum of actual and ethereal injuries, including mental anguish, physical pain, loss of society, loss of consortium, emotional trauma, and other metaphysical injuries. [27] The legal rationale that punitive damages serve a compensatory function, therefore, has ceased to exist. Critics argue that the lack of a viable compensatory rationale makes punitive damages an anachronism that is no longer necessary or justifiable. [28] [*1123] As the court forcefully stated in Fay v. Parker, [29] the idea of punitive damages "is wrong, . . . is a monstrous heresy," and "is an unsightly and unhealthy excrescence, deforming the symmetry and body of the law." [30] At a minimum, and contrary to the philosophical theorem of civil tort reparations, this doctrine reflects a discomforting antibusiness bias.

A final justification urged in support of the punitive damage concept is that quasi-criminal fines satisfy a void allegedly created by the inequitable chasm between severe criminal penalties for wrongs concerning property losses and, in too many instances, lesser criminal penalties for more severe invasions of personal rights. [31] Civil courts, therefore, allegedly can utilize punitive damages to punish more severely the egregious torts that cause personal harm, [32] and a number of courts have expressed the rationale that citizens are more likely to institute suits to protect their rights and enforce the civil law if punitive damages provide an economic incentive to litigate. [33] Once again, however, because the concept of

REV_00263095

of the application of punitive damages despite judicial acknowledgement of the complete lack of any guiding standards for the jury is found in a recent Montana case. See First Bank (N.A.) - Billings v. TransAmerica Ins. Co., 679 P.2d 1217, 1222 (Mont. 1984).

n101. W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 10; Ellis, supra note 10, at 36.

n102. W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 10; Ellis, supra note 10, at 36-37 (but the definition of gross negligence is unclear); see Maxey v. Freightliner Corp., 665 F.2d 1367 (5th Cir. 1982) (en banc); Ex parte Smith, 412 So. 2d 1222, 1223 (Ala. 1982); Stinson v. Feminist Women's Health Center, Inc., 416 So. 2d 1183, 1185 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1982); Kelsay v. Motorola, Inc., 74 III. 2d 172, 186, 384, N.E.2d 353, 359 (1978); Hibschman Pontiac, Inc. v. Batchelor, 266 Ind. 310, 314, 362 N.E.2d 845, 847 (1977); Sebastian v. Wood, 246 Iowa 94, 66 N.W.2d 841 (1954); Newton v. Hornblower, Inc., 224 Kan. 506, 524-25, 582 P.2d 1136, 1150 (1978); Foss v. Maine Turnpike Auth., 309 A.2d 339, 345 (Me. 1973); Seals v. St. Regis Paper Co., 236 So. 2d 388, 392 (Miss. 1970); Burk Royalty Co. v. Walls, 616 S.W.2d 911 (Tex. 1981); Texas Pac. Coal & Oil Co. v. Robertson, 125 Tex. 4, 79 S.W.2d 830 (1935).

n103. See Wolf v. Nordstrom, Inc., 291 Ore. 828, 637 P.2d 1280 (1981); Chamberlain v. Jim Fisher Motors, Inc., 282 Ore. 229, 578 P.2d 1225 (1978).

n104. W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 12. The imposition of punitive damages based on a theory of vicarious liability is probably the most controversial use of the doctrine. Id. The incongruous nature of vicarious punitive damages clearly is highlighted in the case of Martin v. Johns-Manville Corp., 469 A.2d 655 (Pa. Super. 1983), in which the court held that punitive damages are recoverable against a successor corporation for the vicarious liability of its predecessor even though the successor corporation was not responsible for the alleged defective product marketed by its predecessor.

n105. The Restatement (Second) of Torts contains this formulation of the complicity rule;

Punitive damages can properly by awarded against a master or other principal because of an act by an agent if, but only if, (a) the principal authorized the doing and the manner of the act, or (b) the agent was unfit and the principal was reckless in employing him, or (c) the agent was employed in a managerial capacity and was acting in the scope of employment, or (d) the principal or a managerial agent of the principal ratified or approved the act.

RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 909 (1979). The Restatement (Second) of Agency adopts this rule verbatim. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 217C (1958). This rule represents the conservative view, and a number of jurisdictions either have adopted it expressly, adopted it without mentioning it, or adopted parts of it. See, e.g., Martin v. Texaco, Inc., 726 F.2d. 207 (5th Cir. 1984) (applying Texas law); Briner v. Hystop, 337 N.W.2d 858 (Iowa 1983). Dean Prosser has suggested that the majority of the jurisdictions have adopted the more liberal respondeat superior rule. W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 12. It has been observed, however, that Dean Prosser cites an equal number of authorities for the respondeat superior and complicity rules. Ellis, supra note 10, at 63 n.266. Professor Ellis has asserted that half of the states follow each rule. Id. at 63. Professor Ellis does recognize that "Prosser's misleading statement may be on its way to becoming a self-fulfilling prophecy." Id. at 63 n.266.

n106. The drafters of the Restatement (Second) of Torts justify this liability because it "serves as a deterrent to the employment of unfit persons for important positions." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 909(c) comment b, at 468 (1979). The Restatement provides no clear definition of who constitutes a managerial agent. Jurisdictions that have adopted the complicity rule include the District of Columbia, Texas, New York, California, and Kansas. See Jordan v. Medley, 711 F.2d 211 (D.C. App. 1983) (landlord's passive participation while his son brandished a gun at tenants could constitute ratification of the employee's acts); Egan v. Mutual of Omaha Ins. Co., 63 Cal. App. 3d 659, 133 Cal. Rptr. 899 (1976)(claims adjuster held to be managerial agent despite title of his position); Kline v. Multi-Media Cablevision, Inc., 233 Kan. 988, 666 P.2d 711 (1983)(punitive damages not allowed for mere employee gross negligence in removing a manhole cover and then failing to erect a protective barrier); Gill v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 284 A.D. 36, 129 N.Y.S.2d 288 (1954)(head of "protective department" of defendant held to be managerial agent of defendant in action for false imprisonment); Fisher v. Carrousel Motor Hotel, Inc., 424 S.W.2d 627 (Tex. 1967)(punitive damages allowed when parties stipulated that offender was the "manager" of the club).

REV_00263122

n107. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 909(a)(1979).

n108. See id. § 909(d).

n109. See id. § 909(b).

n110. See, e.g., Maxey v. Freightliner Corp., 665 F.2d 1367 (5th Cir. 1982)(jury awarded $ 150,000 compensatory and $ 10,000,000 punitive damages); Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38 (Alaska 1979), on rehearing, 615 P.2d 621 (Alaska 1980)(a jury awarded in excess of $ 2,000,000 in punitive damages under strict tort liability cause of action involving defective gun); Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348 (1981) (jury awarded $ 125,000,000 in punitive damages, which Court of Appeals reduced to $ 3,000,000, in Pinto rear-end case); Leichtamer v. American Motors Corp., 67 Ohio St. 2d 456, 424 N.E.2d 568 (1981)(court allowed actual and punitive damages against manufacturer in jeep roll-over case); Rawlings Sporting Goods Co. v. Daniels, 619 S.W.2d 435 (Tex. Civ. App. 1981) (affirming imposition of $ 750,000 in punitive damages).

n111. 726 F.2d 657 (10th Cir. 1984).

n112. The court acknowledged that Oklahoma courts would refuse to hold a manufacturer liable if an unforeseeable subsequent modification caused the plaintiff's injuries. Id. at 659 (citing Texas Metal Fabricating Co. v. Northern Gas Prods. Corp., 404 F.2d 921 (10th Cir. 1968)). The court, however, chose to ignore factual evidence that the brakes could have averted the accident, and that the plaintiff's injuries resulted from his fingers being caught between the exposed belt and its pulley rather than from the mower blades. Saupitty, 726 F.2d at 660-61 (Seth, C.J., dissenting). Instead, the majority stated that "construing all of the evidence and the inferences therefrom in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, we cannot conclude that the removal of either the mower's brakes or its belt guard constituted a superseding, intervening cause of plaintiff's injury as a matter of law." Id. at 659-60.

n113. Saupitty, 726 F.2d at 660 (Seth, C.J., dissenting).

n114. Id. at 661 (Seth, C.J., dissenting).

n115. Piper Aircraft Corp. v. Coulter, 426 So. 2d 1108, 1109 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1983); Phipps v. General Motors Corp., 278 Md. 337, 343, 363 A.2d 955, 958 (1976); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 265-66, 294 N.W.2d 437, 441 (1980).

n116. See Sales, supra note 2, at 380, 389-90. Several courts have rejected the application of punitive damages in strict tort liability actions. Gold v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 553 F. Supp. 482 (D.N.J. 1982); Butcher v. Robertshaw Controls Co., 550 F. Supp. 692 (D. Md. 1981); Walbrun v. Berkel, Inc., 433 F. Supp. 384 (E.D. Wis. 1976).

n117. The defendant unsuccessfully argued this in Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 288, 294 N.W.2d 437, 453. Another argument against punitive damages in this area holds that manufacturers do not demonstrate the requisite degree of malice or quasi-criminal intent. See, e.g., Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348 (1981); Leichtamer v. American Motors Co., 67 Ohio St. 2d 456, 424 N.E.2d 568 (1981).

REV_00263123

n118. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 118-19 (discussing excessive awards that cripple a corporate defendant); Special Project, supra note 2, at 806-45 (discussing recent bankruptcies). This possibility and other compelling concerns are delineated clearly by the dissent of Justice Rovira in Palmer v. A. H. Robins Co., 684 P.2d 187 (Colo. 1984). The Palmer majority rather glibly glosses over the significant issues that present philosophical impediments to the imposition of punitive damages in product liability actions. Id. at 228 (Rovira, J., dissenting).

n119. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 714.

n120. See Acosta v. Honda Motor Co., 717 F.2d 828 (3d Cir. 1983); Moran v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 691 F.2d 811 (6th Cir. 1982); Campus Sweater & Sportswear v. M.B. Kahn Constr., 515 F. Supp. 64 (D.S.C. 1979), aff'd, 644 F.2d 877 (4th Cir. 1981); Sturm, Ryer & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38 (Alaska 1979), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981); Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348 (1981); Cloroben Chem. Corp. v. Comegys, 464 A.2d 887 (Del. Super. Ct. 1983); Piper Aircraft Corp. v. Coulter, 426 So. 2d 1108 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1983); Froud v. Celotex Corp., 107 Ill. App. 3d 654, 437 N.E.2d 910 (1982) rev'd on other grounds, 98 Ill. 2d 1324, 456 N.E.2d 131 (1983); Grye v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727 (Minn. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 921 (1980); Rinker v. Ford Motor Co., 567 S.W.2d 655 (Mo. Ct. App. 1978); Leichtamer v. American Motorist Corp., 67 Ohio St. 2d 456, 424 N.E.2d 568 (1981); Thiry v. Armstrong World Indus., 661 P.2d 515 (Okla. 1983); Rawlings Sporting Goods Co. v Daniels, 619 S.W.2d 435 (Tex. Civ. App. 1981); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 294 N.W.2d 437 (1980); Some courts have acknowledged the obvious -- that punitive damages are incompatable with the theory of strict tort liability. Gold v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 553 F. Supp. 482 (D. N.J. 1982); Butcher v. Robershaw Controls Co., 550 F. Supp. 692, 705 (D. Md. 1981).

n121. Some courts eschew this concern based on the absence of confirmed empirical data and conclude, therefore, that the potential for serious harm is of no moment. See Acosta v. Honda Motor Co., 717 F.2d 828 (3d Cir. 1983). The court did note, however, that "[i]t is, of course, possible that a sufficiently egregious error as to one product could result in the demise of its manufacturer." Id. at 838. In Moran v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 691 F.2d 811, 817 (6th Cir. 1982), the court simply suggested that if punitive damages pose a real threat, then the federal or state legislature should provide the relief. In Campus Sweater & Sportwear Co. v. M. B. Kahn Constr. Co., 515 F. Supp. 64, 107 (D.S.C. 1979), aff'd, 644 F.2d 877 (4th Cir. 1981), the threat of multiple punitive awards purportedly "forces a prudent manufacturer intent on maximizing profits to hesitate before marketing a known defective or an untested product." Most recently, in Fischer v. Johns-Manville Corp., 193 N.J. Super. 113, 472 A.2d 577, (1984), the court failed the business community of this country and strongly endorsed the precept that "it is only the threat of punitive damages which ultimately can induce these entrepreneurs and others to act with a reasonable modicum of responsibility." Id. at 125, 472 A.2d at 584 (emphasis added). These attitudes strongly suggest the urgent necessity for the more thoughtful, rational, and dispassionate legislative process to address this significant and continually escalating problem in the tort reparation system. See Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 47 (Alaska 1979); Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727, 741 (Minn.) cert. denied, 449 U.S. 921 (1980); State ex rel. Young v. Crookham, 290 Or. 61, 618 P.2d 1268 (1980); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 285-86, 294 N.W.2d 437, 451 (1980). Unfortunately, punitive damages also are awarded for conduct less egregious than marketing a known defective product. See, e.g., Worderson v. Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp., 681 P.2d 1038 (Kan. 1984); Willis v. Floyd Brace Co. [1983-n122. For example in Acosta v. Honda Motor Co., 717 F.2d 828, 838 (3d Cir. 1983), the Third Circuit observed that, "[i]t is, of course, possible that 'a sufficiently egregious error as to one product' could result in the demise of its manufacturer, but such a result is not inevitable." In a supporting footnote, the court further observed, "[N]or is such a result necessarily untenable." More recently, in Martin v. Johns-Manville Corp., 469 A.2d 655, 665 (Pa. Super. 1983), appeal filed, Apr. 2, 1984, the court, in an equally off-handed manner, commented that, "if the defendant's conduct was so reckless and injured so many people, that the effect of the damages awarded against it is bankruptcy, we are hard pressed to understand why that defendant should not be required to live with the consequences of its actions." A similar view has been expressed by the Oregon court in State ex. rel. Young v. Crookham, 290 Or. 61, 618 P.2d 1268 (1980). In Fischer v. Johns-Manville Corp., 193 N.J. Super. 113, 472 A.2d 5778 (1984), the state court echoed, in less than moderate tones, the importance of exacting a pound of flesh from reckless defendants in its statement demanding "the ultimate protection which punitive damages afford." Id. at 127, 472 A.2d at 585. The courts likewise have rejected application of the double jeopardy principle to foreclose repeated punitive damage awards for identical product design defects. See Hansen v. Johns-Manville Corp., 734 F.2d 1036 (5th Cir. 1984).

REV_00263124

1984 Transfer Binder] PROD. LIAB. REP. (CCH) P9862 (S.C. Nov. 14, 1983).

n123. 727 F.2d 506 (5th Cir. 1984) (rehearing en banc granted).

n124. Id. at 525.

n125. Id. at 528 (citing Acosta v. Honda Motor Co., 717 F.2d at 838, n.15).

n126. Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 727 F.2d 506, 526 (5th Cir.) reh'g en banc granted, F.2d (5th Cir. 1984). The court stated:

We do not reach the issue whether Mississippi would find punitive damages inherently incompatible with the theory of strict liability in all cases. Our holding today is limited to the extraordinary circumstances of this litigation, where the allowance of punitive damages carries the manifest portent of undoing the strict liability remedy for present and prospective claimants and where the purposes of punitive damages are otherwise served.

We cannot predict, of course, whether other jurisdictions would subscribe to our approach in this litigation. From that perspective, our efforts to preserve the viability of strict liability compensation may be infected with an element of futility. The alternative, however, appears to be no solution at all, but mere resignation to defeat of the purposes of both strict liability and punitive damages. A fully satisfactory solution would require properly crafted federal legislation. Since that has not come to pass, we must proceed with fundamental justice as our guide.

The disallowance of punitive damages in this situation expresses this court's central concern for the continued viability of the strict liability cause of action for present and future claimants. Where strict liability for compensatory damages imposes adequate punishment as it does in this type of case, we decline to cleave to a judge-made remedy of punitive damages that would both fail in its own purpose and obstruct the broader objectives of the underlying cause of action which the plaintiff has cohosen to pursue.

Id. at 529-30.

n127. See, e.g., Williams v. Carr, 263 Ark. 326, 565 S.W.2d 400 (1978); American Motorcycle Inst., Inc. v. Mitchell, 380 So. 2d 452 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1980); Pringle Tax Servs., Inc. v. Knoblauch, 282 N.W.2d 151 (Iowa 1979); Traylor v. Wachter, 227 Kan. 221, 607 P.2d 1094 (1980); Robison v. Katz, 94 N.M. 314, 610 P.2d 201 (1980); Fort Worth

REV_00263125

Elevators Co. v. Russell, 123 Tex. 128, 70 S.W.2d 397 (1934); Cates v. Barb, 650 P.2d 1159 (Wyo. 1982).

n128. W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 13-14; see, e.g., Nelson v. Hartman, 648 P.2d 1176, 1178 (Mont. 1982) (no error in failing to admit defendant's driving record for punitive damages purposes because no punitive damages can exist without actual liability entitling the plaintiff to actual damages); Fort Worth Elevators Co. v. Russell, 123 Tex. 128, 149-50, 70 S.W.2d 397, 409 (1934) (proof of actual damage prerequisite to punitive award); see generally Duffy, supra note 9, at 8; Ellis, supra note 10, at 54 (citing COMMITTEE ON STANDARD JURY INSTRUCTIONS, CIVIL, OF THE SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL § 14.71 (Supp. 1981)); Sales, supra note 2, at 365; Note, 70 HARV. L. REV. 517, 528-29 (1957).

n129. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 63.

n130. Ellis, supra note 10, at 58 (citing D. DOBBS, HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF REMEDIES § 3.9, at 210-11 (1973) and W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 14)); Sales, supra note 2, at 366; Special Project, supra note 2, at 696. Some states, however, require no rlationship whatever between punitive and compensatory awards. See, e.g., Pinckard v. Dunnavant, 206 So. 2d 340, 344 (Ala. 1968) (exemplary award need not be mathematically related to compensatory award); Ray Dodge, Inc. v. Moore, 251 Ark. 1036, 1046, 479 S.W.2d 518, 524 (1972) (factors other than ratio of punitive damages and actual damages to be considered); Lassitter v. International Union of Operating Eng'rs, 349 So. 2d 622, 626 (Fla. 1976) (punitive damages not required to be proportionate to compensatory damages); Southwestern Inv. Co. v. Neeley, 452 S.W.2d 705 (Tex. 1970) (punitive damages need only be reasonably proportional to actual damages); see generally Leimgruber v. Claridge Assocs., 73 N.J. 450, 457-59, 375 A.2d 652, 656-57 (1977) (discussing split among jurisdictions regarding "ratio" rule). Some courts have stated that an award which is extremely disproportional indicates that the jury acted with passion or prejudice. Dearmore v. Gold, 400 F.2d 887, 888 (5th Cir. 1968) (a ratio of 11 to 1 was too disproportional); Alley v. Gubser Dev. Co., 569 F. Supp. 36, 40 (D. Colo. 1983) (a ratio of 17 to 1 was too disproportional). In contrast, in Moore v. American United Life Ins. Co., 150 Cal. App. 3d 610, 636, 197 Cal. Rptr. 878, 894-95 (1984), a ratio of 83 to 1 was approved (citing Wetherbee v. United Ins. Co. of Am., 18 Cal. App. 3d 266, 95 Cal. Rptr. 678 (1971) (approving a punitive award ratio of 200 to 1)); accord Kerr v. Fruit Commodity Corp. of Boston, 735 F.2d 281 (8th Cir. 1984) (citing Price v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 530 S.W.2d 249 (Mo. App. 1975) (that Missouri has approved a 40 to 1 ratio)); robison v. Lescrenier, 721 F.2d 1101, 1113 (7th Cir. 1983) (applying Wisconsin law); Palmer v. A. H. Robins Co., No. 81SA149 (Colo. June 4, 1984) (en banc) (approving a ratio of 10.3 to 1 when the basic compensatory damage award was $ 600,000, resulting in a punitive damage award of $ 6,200,000).

n131. Wetherbee v. United Ins. Co. of Am., 18 Cal. App. 3d 266, 95 Cal. Rptr. 678 (1971); K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 63-64 (citing Malcolm v. Little, 295 A.2d 711 (Del. 1972)). The imprecise nature of the rule is exemplified by the charge of the trial court that was approved on appeal by the Fifth Circuit in Martin v. Texaco, Inc., 726 F.2d 207 (5th cir. 1984). The trial court, in instructing the jury on the standard for measuring punitive awards under Texas law, stated:

The appropriate ratio will vary from case to case, depending on such factors as the character of the wrongful conduct, the extent to which the defendant is involved in the conduct and the extent to which that conduct offends a public sense of justice and propriety. A very recent court decision, last week as a matter of fact, listed five relevant factors for reviewing a jury's award of punitive damages, as follows: (1) The nature of the wrong; (2) The character of the conduct involved; (3) The degree of culpability of the wrongdoer; (4) The situation and sensibility of the parties; (5) The extent to which defendant's conduct offends a public sense of justice and propriety. Clearly, ladies and gentlemen, this is not an exact science, but is a concept that is very well dealt with by a jury. Now, for your further guidance, I have a few additional instructions. If you find liability in this case, then the decision is solely yours; consider the five guidelines that I gave you and find exemplary damages that you find appropriate in this case.

REV_00263126

Id. at 213-14.

n132. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 64.

n133. See Maxey v. Freightliner Corp., 665 F.2d 1367, 1377-78 (5th Cir. 1982) (Fifth Circuit adopted the factors set forth in Alamo Nat'l Bank v. Kraus 616 S.W.2d 908 (Tex. 1981), but found that the defendant's behavior did not justify an award of $ 10,000,000 in punitive damages based on a compensatory award of $ 150,000); Alamo, 616 S.W.2d at 910 (court held that appellate court's review of these factors was not an erroneous standard, and allowed $ 500,000 in punitive damages and $ 12,900 in compensatory damages to stand); see also Leimgruber v. Claridge Assocs., 73 N.J. 450, 456-61, 375 A.2d 652, 655-58 (1977) (court upheld award of $ 16,500 in punitive and $ 1700 in compensatory damages because the awards did not "give rise to the inference of mistake, passion, prejudice, or partiality," "shock the conscience," or "result in a manifest denial of justice"). The Leimgruber court alluded to the following factors: (1) the nature of wrongdoing; (2) the extent of harm; (3) the intent of party committing the act; (4) the wealth of the perpetrator; and (5) any mitigating circumstance that may reduce damages. Id. at 456, 375 A.2d at 656-57. The court in Alley v. Gubser Dev. Co., 569 F. Supp. 36, 40 (D. Colo. 1983), articulated a similar standard of analysis. Another variant of this approach is reflected in Cates v. Eddy, 669 P.2d 912, 921 (Wyo. 1983). California predicates an award for punitive damages on a combination of three factors: the nature of defendant's acts; the amount of compensatory damages awarded; and the wealth of the defendant. See Professional Seminar Consultants v. Sino Am. Tech. Exch. Council, 727 F.2d 1470, 1473 (9th Cir. 1984) (applying California law); Neal v. Farmer's Ins. Exch., 21 Cal. 3d 910, 582 P.2d 980, 148 Cal. Rptr. 389 (1978); see also Comment, Punitive Damages and the Reasonable Relation Rule: A Study in Frustration of Purpose, 9 PAC. L.J. 823 (1978).

n134. Morris, Punitive Damages in Tort Cases, 44 HARV. L. REV. 1173, 1180 (1931).

n135. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 43.

n136. See K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 61; Ellis, supra note 10, at 54; Special Project, supra note 2, at 695-96. Three states, Alabama, Kentucky, and Texas, do not allow consideration of the defendant's wealth. Special Project, supra note 2, at 696 n.753; see also RESTATMMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 908 (1979) (trier of fact may consider defendant's wealth in assessing punitive awards).

n137. Ellis, supra note 10, at 61.

n138. Neal v. Farmers Ins. Exch. 21 Cal. 3d 910, 929, 582 P.2d 980, 991, 148 Cal. Rptr. 389, 400 (1978) (award of $ 740,000 in punitive damages proper when it amounts to less than a week's worth of defendant's net income); Moore v. American United Life Ins. Co., 150 Cal. App. 3d 610, , 197 Cal. Rptr. 878, 899 (1984) (amount equal to 3.4 weeks of company's net annual income is appropriate).

n139. Hall v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 252 N.W.2d 421, 424 (Iowa 1977).

n140. Morris, supra note 133, at 1191.

n141. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 61-62.

REV_00263127

n142. Id. at 62.

n143. See, e.g., Texas Pub. Utils. Corp. v. Edwards, 99 S.W.2d 420, 427 (Tex. Civ. App. 1936) (improper for plaintiff's counsel to argue to jury that it should assess large punitive damages because defendant could afford to pay them).

n144. See, e.g., Eisert v. Greenberg Roofing & Sheet Metal Co., 314 N.W.2d 226, 228-29 (Minn. 1982).

n145. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 101-09.

n146. The Restatement of Contracts provides that, "Punitive damages are not recoverable for breach of contract." RESTATEMENT OF CONTRACTS § 342 (1932); see Note, supra note 16, at 531. The author emphasizes, however, that courts will allow punitive damages in many modern torts that are closely related to breach of contract, such as inducing another to breach a contract and wrongful termination of services by a public utility. Id.; see Royal Typewriter Co. v. Xerographic Supplies Corp., 719 F.2d 1092, 1106 (11th Cir. 1983) (Florida does not allow punitive damages awards for breach of warranty claims under the Uniform Commercial Code); Saval v. BL Ltd., 710 F.2d 1027, 1033 (4th Cir. 1983) (Maryland does not permit punitive damages for contract breaches absent malice); Superior Trucks, Inc. v. Allen, 664 S.W.2d 136 (Tex. Ct. App. 1983) (exemplary damages not allowed for breach of warranty); Ryan Mortgage Investors v. Fleming-Wood, 650 S.W.2d 928, 937 (Tex. Ct. App. 1983) (exemplary damages not permitted for breach of contract).

n147. See, e.g., Canada Dry Corp. v. Nehi Beverage Co., 723 F.2d 512, 524 (7th Cir. 1983) (applying Indiana law); Henderson v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 620 F.2d 530 (5th Cir. 1980) (applying Mississippi law), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1034 (1980); Robison v. Katz, 94 N.M. 314, 610 P.2d 201 (1980).

n148. See, e.g., Smith v. Hawkins, 120 Kan. 518, 243 P. 1018 (1926); Baumle v. Verde, 33 Okla. 243, 124 P. 1083 (1912); see also K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 41.

n149. See, e.g., Birmingham Water Works Co. v. Keiley, 2 Ala. App. 629, 56 So. 838 (1911); Kohler v. Kansas Power & Light Co., 192 Kan. 226, 387 P.2d 149 (1963); Southwestern Gas & Elce. Co. v. Stanley, 45 S.W.2d 671 (Tex. Civ. App. 1931), aff'd, 123 Tex. 157, 70 S.W.2d 413 (1934); see also K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 41.

n150. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 41; see Sullivan, Punitive Damages in the Law of Contract: The Reality and the Illusion of Legal Change, 61 MINN. L. REV. 207 (1977). For a discussion of the allowance of punitive damages for tortious breach of contractual duties when a fidiciary duty exists, when an independent tort accompanies the breach of contract, when the defendant's conduct is also fraudulent, and when the defendant failed to deal fairly and in good faith, see K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 52-53.

n151. Comment, Disallowing Punitive Damages for Wrongful Death While Allowing Them for Personal Injury and Property Damage Held To Be a Denial of Equal Protection, 8 CUM. L. REV. 567, 574-76 (1977). The author indicates that only 18 states allow recovery of punitive damages in wrongful death actions. Id. at 574-75. Alabama occupies the unique position of allowing only punitive damages in wrongful death actions. Eich v. Town of Gulf Shores, 293 Ala. 95, 300 So. 2d 354 (1974); see also Rosenfeld v. Isaacs, 79 A.D.2d 630, 631, 433 N.Y.S.2d 623, 624 (1980).

n152. In re Air Crash Disaster Near Chicago, 644 F.2d 594 (7th Cir. cert. denied, 454 U.S. 878 (1981).

REV_00263128

n153. Id. at 632-33; accord, In re Paris Air Crash, 622 F.2d 1315 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 976 (1980); Eisert v. Greenberg Roofing & Sheet Metal Co., 314 N.W.2d 226 (Minn. 1982).

n154. See Boies v. Cole, 99 Ariz. 198, 407 P.2d 917 (1965); Gavica v. Hanson, 101 Idaho 58, 608 P.2d 861 (1980); Heil Co. v. Grant, 534 S.W.2d 916, 926 (Tex. Civ. App. 1976); Behrens v. Raleigh Hills Hosp. Inc., 675 P.2d 1179 (Utah 1983).

n155. See, e.g., Tarasoff v. Regents of the University of California, 17 Cal. 3d 425, 45 551 P.2d 334, 353, 131 Cal. Rptr. 14, 33, (1976) (allowance of punitive damages in tort actions generally is applicable only to survival actions and not to wrongful death actions); ILL. REV. STAT. ch. 111 2/3, § 77 (1966 & Supp. 1984-1985) (permits punitive damages in survival actions under the express provisions of the Public Utilities Act).

n156. See, e.g., Barnes v. Smith, 305 F.2d 226 (10th Cir. 1962); Sullivan v. Associated Billposters and Distribs. of United States and Canada, 6 F.2d 1000 (2nd Cir. 1925); Sanchez v. Marguez, 457 F. Supp. 359 (D. Colo. 1978) (statutory prohibition); Paul v. Milburn, 275 F. Supp. 105 (W.D. Tenn. 1967); Ford Motor Credit Co. v. Hill, 245 F. Supp. 796 (W.D. Mo. 1965); Amos v. Prom, 115 F. Supp. 127 (N.D. Iowa 1953); Holm Timber Indus. v. Plywood corp. of Am., 242 Cal. App. 2d 492, 51 Cal. Rptr. 597 (1966); Simone v. McKee, 142 Cal. App. 2d 307, 298 P.2d 667 (1956); Rowen v. LeMars Mut. Ins. Co., 282 N.W.2d 639 (Iowa 1979); Wolder v. Rahm, 249 N.W.2d 630 (Iowa 1977); Stevenson v. Stoufer, 237 Iowa 513, 21 N.W.2d 287 (1946); Thompson v. Estate of Petroff, 319 N.W.2d 400 (Minn. 1982); Mervis v. Wolverton, 211 So. 2d 847 (Miss. 1968) (statutory prohibition); Summa Corp. v. Greenspun, 96 Nev. 247, 607 P.2d 569 (1980) modified, 98 Nev. Adv. Ops. 157, 655 P.2d 513 (1982); Allen v. Anderson, 93 Nev. 204, 562 P.2d 487 (1977); Gordon v. Nathan, 43 A.D.2d 917, 352 N.Y.S.2d 464 (1974) (statutory prohibition); Thorpe v. Wilson, 58 N.C. App. 292, 293 S.E.2d 675 (1982); McAdams v. Blue, 3 N.C. App. 169, 164 S.E.2d 490 (1968); Morriss v. Barton, 200 Okla. 4, 190 P.2d 451 (1947); Pearson v. Galvin, 253 Or. 331, 454 P.2d 638 (1969); Ashcraft v. Saunders, 251 Or. 139, 444 P.2d 924 (1968); Hayes v. Gill, 216 Tenn. 39, 390 S.W.2d 213 (1965); Dalton v. Johnson, 204 Va. 102, 129 S.E.2d 647 (1963).

n157. Allen v. Anderson, 562 P.2d at 489-90. The Restatement (Second) of Torts also adopts this view:

Under statutes providing for the survival or revival of tort actions, the damages for a tort not involving death for which the tortfeasor is responsible are not affected by the death of either party before or during trial, except that . . . the death of the tortfeasor terminates liability for punitive damages.

RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 926(b)(1979).

n158. Johnson v. Rinesmith, 238 So.2d 659 (Fla. App. 1969); National Bank of Bloomington v. Norfolk & Western Railway Co., 73 Ill. App. 2d 160, 383 N.E.2d 919 (1978); Perry v. Melton, 299 S.E.2d 8 (W. Va. 1982); Hofer v. Lavender, No. C-2552 (Tex. July 11, 1984).

n159. Special Project, supra note 2, at 830. Traditionally, the mere sale of a corporation does not impose liability on the successor for the tort liabilities of the predecessor. See Travis v. Harris Corp., 565 F.2d 443 (7th Cir. 1977); Knapp v. North Am. Rockwell Corp., 506 F.2d 361 (3d Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 965 (1975); Cyr. v. B. Offen & Co., 501 F.2d 1145 (1st Cir. 1974); Shane v. Hobam, Inc., 332 F. Supp. 526 (E.D. Pa. 1971); Kloberdanz v. Joy Mfg. Co., 288 F. Supp. 817 (D. Colo. 1968). There are four generally recognized exceptions in which liability may be imposed on the successor: contractual assumption of the tort liabilities of the predecessor; a transaction that is tantamount to a merger of the predecessor with the successor corporation; the operation of the predecessor as a mere continuation of itself through the successor corporation; and the fraudulent transfer of assets in an effort by the predecessor to escape liability. See Leannais v. Cincinnati, Inc., 565 F.2d 437 (7th Cir. 1977); R. G. Enstrom Corp. v. Interceptor Corp., 555 F.2d 277, 278 (10th Cir. 1977); Knapp v. North Am. Rockwell, 506 F.2d 361 (3d Cir.) cert. denied, 421 U.S. 965 (1974); Bonee v. L & M Const. Co., 518 F. Supp. 375 (M.D. Tenn. 1981); Menacho v. Adamson United Co., 420 F. Supp. 128 (D. N.J. 1976); Hernandez v. Johnson Press Corp., 70 Ill. App. 3d 664, 388 N.E.2d 778 (1979). Recently, some jurisdictions have rejected the general rule that precluded successor liability in favor of "product line" liability based on the socioeconomic policy of risk distribution. See Amader v. Johns-Manville Corp., 541 F. Supp. 1384 (E.D. Pa. 1982); Ray v. Alad Corp., 19 Cal. 3d 22, 560 P.2d 3 (1977); Ramirez v. Amsted Indus., Inc., 86 N.J. 332, 431 A.2d 811 (1981). More recent decisions have categorically rejected the product line concept of liability. Weaver v. Nash Int'l, Inc., 562 F. Supp. 860 (S.D. Iowa 1983); Cowan v. Harris Corp., PROD. LIAB. PEP. (CCH) P9667 (D. Kan. Dec. 7, 1982); Gonzalez v. Rock Wool Eng'g & Equip. Co., 117 Ill. App. 3d 435, 453 N.E.2d 762 (1983); Fenton Area Public Schools v. Sorensen-Gross Constr. Co., 124 Mich. App. 631, 335 N.W.2d 221 (1983). Punitive damages could not be imposed on a successor corporation under the standard that requires the vicariously liable entity to have authorized its employees or agents to engage in the intentional, wanton, or willful conduct at the time of the product's design and marketing. See supra notes 105-09 and accompanying text.

REV_00263129

n160. Special Project, supra note 2, at 832-33.

n161. See, e.g., Neal v. Carey Canadian Mines, Ltd., 548 F. Supp. 357, 391 (E.D. Pa. 1982) (successor corporation liable for punitive damages arising from tort that predecessor corporation committed because "successor is essentially identical to that of the predecessor corporation"). Recently, in Martin v. Johns-Manville Corp., 469 A.2d 655 (Pa. Super. 1983), appeal filed, Apr. 2, 1984, the Pennsylvania Superior Court authorized the award of punitive damages from a successor corporation as the result of the plaintiffs sustaining bronchogenic carcinoma from exposure to asbestos supplied by defendant's predecessor corporation. Relying on Campus Sweater & Sportwear Co. v. M.B. Kahn Constr. Co., 515 F. Supp. 64, 107 (D.S.C. 1979), aff'd, 644 F.2d 877 (4th Cir. 1981), Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 47 (Alaska 1979) cert. denied 454 U.S. 894 (1981) and Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp. 297 N.W.2d 727, 741 (Minn. 1979), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 921 (1980), the Martin court held that punitive damages constituted a deterrent against manufacturers maximizing profits by marketing defective products. The court also addressed the issue of imposing punitive damages on a successor corporation not responsible for manufacturing and marketing the defective product. The court declared:

We believe, however, that in some circumstances a successor should be held accountable for the recklessness of its predecessor. This will be so when the goals that underlie the imposition of punitive damages -- punishment and deterrence -- will be advanced. . . . The fact that the successor does not continue the product line recklessly marketed by the predecessor, or cures the defect, will not necessarily preclude punitive damages. . . . We therefore hold that punitive damages are recoverable against a successor corporation when the plaintiff has shown such a degree of identity of the successor with its predecessor as to justify the conclusion that those responsible for the reckless conduct of the predecessor will be punished, and the successor will be deterred from similar conduct.

469 A.2d at 667. The extension of punitive damages to an innocent successor corporate entity demonstrates the blind commitment of courts to this archaic doctrine and a certain naivete as to the economic effects of the imposition of punitive damages.

n162. See, e.g., Sheats v. Bowen, 318 F. Supp. 640 (D.C. Del. 1970); Kohl v. Graham, 202 F. Supp 895 (D.C. Colo. 1962); Atlanta Life Ins. Co. v. Stanley, 276 Ala. 642, 165 So.2d 731, 738 (1964) (when husband can prove loss of society because of wife's injuries, "the assessment of reasonable compensation therefore must necessarily be left to the sound dicretion of the jury") (emphasis added).

REV_00263130

n163. See, e.g., Fireman's Fund Am. Ins. Co. v. Coleman, 394 So. 2d 334, 341 (Ala. 1980) (only damages for loss of services allowed in derivative actions by spouses); Moran v. Stephens, 265 So. 2d 379, 380 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1972) (husband cannot recover punitive damages in derivative action to his wife's action for dog attack injuries); Hammond v. North Am. Asbestosis Corp., 105 Ill. App. 3d 1033, 435 N.E.2d 540 (1982), aff'd, 454 N.E.2d 210 (Ill. 1983); Hughey v. Ausborn, 249 S.C. 470, 154 S.E.2d 839, 842 (1967) (the intentional wrong is not committed against the spouse).

n164. Dorsey v. Continental casualty Co., 730 F.2d 675 (1984); Northwestern Nat'l Co. v. McNulty, 307 F.2d 432 (5th Cir. 1962); City of Products Corp. v. Globe Indem. Co., 88 Cal. App. 3d 31, 151 Cal. Rptr. 494 (1979); Hartford Accident & Indem. Co. v. United States Concrete Pipe Co., 369 So. 2d 451 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1979); Brown v. Western Casualty & Sur. Co., 484 P.2d 1252 (Colo. App. 1971); Guaranty Abstract and Title Co. v. Interstate Fire and Casualty Co., 228 Kan. 532, 618 P.2d 1195 (1980).

n165. See Price v. Hartford Accident & Indemnity Co., 108 Ariz. 485, 502 P.2d 522 (1972); City of Cedar Rapids v. Northwestern Nat'l Ins. Co., 304 N.W.2d 22, (Iowa 1981); First Nat'l Bank of St. Mary's v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 283 Md. 228, 389 A.2d 359 (1978); Anthony v. Frith, 394 So. 2d 867 (Miss. 1981); Harrell v. Travelers Indem. Co., 279 Or. 199, 567 P.2d 1013 (1977); Lazenby v. Universal Underwriters Ins. Co., 214 Tenn. 639, 383 S.W.2d 1 (1964); Hensley v. Erie Ins. Co., 283 S.E.2d 227 (W. Va. 1981).

n166. Duffy, supra note 9, at 8; Ellis, supra note 10, at 20; Special Project, supra note 2, at 695.

n167. See, e.g., Maxey v. Freightliner Corp., 665 F.2d 1367, 1369 (5th Cir. 1982) aff'd, 722 F.2d 1238, 1242 (5th Cir. 1984) (court found evidence inadequate to support jury verdict of $ 10,000,000 in punitive damages, but on appeal following remand affirmed the trial court's remittitur of the award to $ 450,000); Dorsey v. Honda Motor Co., 655 F.2d 650, 654-58 (5th Cir. 1981) ($ 5,000,000 verdict upheld), modified, 670 F.2d 21, cert. denied, 459 U.S. 880 (1982); Airco, Inc. v. Simmons First Nat'l Bank, 276 Ark. 486, 492, 638 S.W.2d 660, 663 (1982) (upholding award of $ 3,000,000 as vindictive damages); Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 821-24, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348, 389-91 (1981) (affirming trial court decision to reduce $ 125,000,000 jury verdict to $ 3,500,000); Palmer v. A.H. Robins Co., No. 81SA149 (Colo. June 4, 1984) (en banc) (approving $ 6,200,000 in punitive damages compared to an award of $ 600,000 in compensatory damages); Toyota Motor Co. v. Moll, 438 So. 2d 192 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1983) (approving $ 3,000,000 punitive damages award); Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727, 741 (Minn. 1980) (affirming punitive damages in amount of $ 1,000,000) cert. denied, 449 U.S. 921 (1980).

n168. Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 839 (2d Cir. 1967). Another jurist noted that the destructive economic effects of punitive damages awards will impact "upon business and professional persons, firms and corporations, as well as upon ordinary persons when engaged in a wide variety of activities." Harrell v. Travelers Indem. Co., 279 Or. 199, 209-10, 567 P.2d 1013, 1018 (1977). As an example, see Ratner v. Sioux Natural Gas Corp., 719 F.2d 801, 805 (5th cir. 1983), acknowledging that allowance of an award of punitive damages against a bankrupt corporation would deprive legitimate creditors of any recovery and "would be overkill."

n169. Ellis, supra note 10, at 33-63; Owen, supra note 9, at 119-21; Sales, supra note 2, at 380-81.

n170. See Sales, supra note 2, at 380. The Court in Moore v. Remington Arms Co., 100 Ill. App. 3d 1102, 1111, 427 N.E.2d 608, 616-17 (1981), however, noted: "The tide has since compensatory damages currently embraces every conceivable element of tangible and intangible injury, [34] essentially unlimited compensatory damages serve as a more than adequate economic incentive for initiating civil litigation. By purpose and definition, the civil law historically has evolved to compensate and not to punish, [35] and in today's tort reparations system, compensatory damages [*1124] more than adequately fulfill this mission of total and complete reparations. This last justification for the punitive damage concept within the tort reparations system, therefore, not only is suspect, but more importantly, is inherently flawed.

REV_00263131

B. Status of Punitive Damages Today

The first American enunciation of the theory of punitive damages occurred in 1791 when a New Jersey court charged the jury in Coryell v. Colbaugh [36] that "they were not to estimate the damages by any particular proof of suffering or actual loss" but, instead, should "give damages for example's sake, to prevent such offenses in future." [37] The Coryell court also stated that the damages should be "such a sum as would mark their disapprobation, and be an example to others." [38] Despite this clear characterization of the purpose of the punitive damages as deterrence, some historical confusion existed concerning the ultimate reasoning that lay at the root of punitive awards. [39] Whatever justification may be advanced to support the punitive damage concept, however, most commentators today acknowledge that the modern bases undergirding the theory in the United States are punishment and deterrence. [40] The status of the punitive damage doctrine in today's tort environment, however, remains remarkably unsettled. Jurisdictions disagree over the applicability of punitive damages in civil actions, and even those states embracing the punitive damages concept differ as to application. [41]

The majority of jurisdictions endorse punitive damages as a [*1125] component of the common law. [42] A minority of jurisdictions, nevertheless, prohibit the recovery of punitive damages under the common law. [43] Two of these jurisdictions allow punitive damages only in the narrow context of statutorily authorized situations. [44] At least three jurisdictions either totally or partially proscribe the use of punitive damages in all civil cases. [45] Additionally, four jurisdictions, despite judicial declarations that punitive damages constitute an integral part of the common law, so severely limit the scope and application of the doctrine that, in essence, punitive damages have been reduced to nothing more than compensatory damages. [46]

[*1126] III. BASIS FOR APPLYING THE PUNITIVE DAMAGE DOCTRINE

The generally accepted bases for punitive damages in those jurisdictions that have adopted the concept are punishment and deterrence. [47] Some jurisdictions adopt only one or the other of these rationales, while others adopt the dual rationales. Some jurisdictions still view punitive damages as an additional award to allowable compensatory sums -- to compensate for perceived gaps in reparations, as was practiced during the colonial era.

A. Punishment and Deterrence

The great majority of jurisdictions that currently authorize the recovery of noncompensatory, punitive damages adopt the dual rationales of punishment and deterrence as justification for their position. [48] One commentator offered seven legal theories in support of the punitive damage concept. [49] He acknowledged, however, that any legal doctrine that is predicated on such a disparate variety of grounds "may reasonably be suspected of resting on no very firm basis in policy." [50] Consequently, he reduced these seven rationale to two fundamental tenets: wrong-doers deserve punishment beyond that which compensatory damages provide, and the judicial system needs punitive damages to deter socially harmful, loss creating conduct by defendants. [51] A number of recent cases echo these incantations to justify the use of punitive measures. [52] turned; judgments for punitive damages are now routinely entered across the nation, and staggering sums have been awarded."

REV_00263096

n171. Special Project, supra note 2, at 806-45. Manville Corp., Unarco, and Amatex Corp. have declared bankruptcy under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978 because of litigation expenses, and compensatory and punitive damage awards related to asbestos cases. Id. at 808.

n172. See Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 727 F.2d 506 (5th Cir.), reh'g en banc granted, F.2d (5th Cir. 1984) (discussed supra notes 123-26 and accompanying text).

n173. Owen, supra note 88, at 1257.

n174. Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, 49 U. CHI. L. REV. 1, 6 (1981); see Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 841 (1967) (the impracticality of imposing an effective ceiling on punitive awards in hundreds of cases against a single manufacturer, when added to large compensatory damages, could lead to catastrophic awards).

n175. Owen, supra note 174, at 57.

n176. Owen, supra note 9, at 119 (suggesting upper limit of greater of (1) double the compensatory damages, or (2) litigation costs plus $ 10,000); Owen, supra note 174, at 48 (suggesting possible upper limit on punitive damages of $ 1,000,00 per plaintiff).

n177. Duffy, supra note 9, at 11 (trial tactics now are geared to exploit the punitive damages doctrine).

n178. Special Project, supra note 2, at 840 (five asbestos manufacturers formed an alliance to reduce the risk of any defendant "settling out" on the others).

n179. Riegel v. Aastad, 272 A.2d 715, 717-18 (Del. 1970). One reason that appellate courts find it difficult to overturn punitive damage awards is because the standards of review by which courts evaluate the excessiveness of these awards are extremely unclear. See, e.g., Professional Seminar Consultants v. Sino Am. Technology Exch. Council, Inc., 727 F.2d 1470, 1473 (9th Cir. 1984). The Ninth Circuit recognized in Professional Seminar Consultants that the standard of review for punitive damages in California is unclear. Compare Cher v. Forum Int'l, Ltd., 692 F.2d 634, 640 (9th Cir. 1982) (clearly erroneous standard), cert. denied 103 S. Ct. 3089 (1983) with Hasson v. Ford Motor Co., 32 Cal. 3d 388, 650 P.2d 1171, 185 Cal. Rptr. 654 (1982) (substantial evidence standad), cert. dismissed, 103 S. Ct. 1167 (1983). Judicial failure within a particular jurisdiction to provide even a consistent standard of review to prevent punitive damages from getting completely out of hand is disconcerting.

n180. Riegel v. Aastad, 272 A.2d at 718.

n181. See, e.g., Dorsey v. Honda Motor Co., 655 F.2d 650, 657 (5th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 1778 modified, 670 F.2d 21 (5th Cir. 1982) (actual damages of $ 750,000 and punitive damages of $ 5,000,000 affirmed); Airco, Inc. v. Simmons First Nat'l Bank, 276 Ark. 486, 638 S.W.2d 660 (1982) (actual damages of $ 1,070,000 and punitive damages of $ 3,000,000 affirmed); Vossler v. Richards Mfg. Co., 143 Cal. App. 3d 952, 192 Cal. Rptr. 219 (1983) (actual damages of $ 25,000 and punitive damages of $ 500,000 affirmed); Palmer v. A.H. Robins Co., No. 81SA149 (Colo. June 4, 1984 (en banc) (actual damages of $ 600,000 and punitive damages of $ 6,200,000 approved as reasonable); Ford Motor Co. v. Nowak, 638 S.W.2d 582, 585 (Tex. Ct. App. 1982) (actual damages of $ 400,000 and punitive damages of $ 4,000,000 affirmed).

n182. For example, in Jampole v. Touchy, 673 S.W.2d 569 (Tex. 1984), the Texas Supreme Court authorized virtually unlimited discovery and noted, "The documents showing GMC's knowledge of alternative designs are relevant to show conscious indifference in support of Jampole's claim of gross negligence." Id. at 573. Similarly, in General Motors Corporation v. Lawrence, 651 S.W.2d 732 (Tex. 1983), Justice Ray, in a concurring opinion relating to a discovery order, commented: "The scope of discovery in product defect cases may be permissibly wider, especially when the plaintiff is alleging grounds for the award of exemplary damages." Id. at 734. Similarly, the inclination to expand discovery for punitive allegations is reflected in other jurisdictions. See, e.g., Vollert v. Summa Corp., 389 F. Supp. 1348 (D.C. Hawaii 1975); Hughes v. Graves, 47 F.R.D 52 (W.D. Mo. 1969); Coy v. Superior Court of Contra Costa County, 23 Cal. Rptr. 393, 373 P.2d 457 (1962); Kuiper v. District Court of Eighth Judicial District, 632 P.2d 694, 702 (Mont. 1981).

n183. An example of the public's concern with the effect of unwarranted settlements is reflected in an editorial appearing in the Houston Post, September 3, 1984. Commenting on a lawsuit that was tried in the District Court in San Antonio, Texas and then settled with General Motors, the editorial stated:

A lawsuit settled out of court last week in San Antonio is an example of how far downhill our legal system has tumbled.

The passenger in a Pontiac TransAm sued General Motors for $ 50,000,000 after he was seriously injured in an accident. Testimony indicated the driver was drunk and traveling at 90 miles per hour.

But instead of suing the driver, the injured passenger sued GM, alleging the auto maker's advertising of the TransAm made the driver believe it was a stunt vehicle that could perform beyond the limits of a normal production car.

To any reasonable person, three errors are obvious in the story. First, the wrong party was sued. The driver was at fault, not General Motors. It seems no one these days is willing to take responsibility for his own actions. It's always someone else's fault. However, it doesn't take too much imagination to figure out why GM was sued instead of the driver: GM is richer.

Second, GM should not have settled. This is perhaps more understandable; GM wanted to avoid a long trial and the publicity.

Third, and the most obvious of all, the court should have thrown the lawsuit out at the first hearing. Judges and prosecutors repeatedly tell us dockets are overcrowded, but it is hard to empathize when frivolous lawsuits like this one are allowed to proceed." Houston Post, Sept. 3, 1984, at 13, col. 1.

n184. See Western Union Tel. Co. v. Guard, 283 Ky. 187, 197, 139 S.W.2d 722, 727 (1940); see also W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 7.

n185. Dean Prosser referred to punitive damages as an "anomalous respect" in which "the ideas underlying the criminal law have invaded the field of torts." W. PROSSER, supra note 35, § 2, at 9.

n186. Bass v. Chicago & N.W. Ry., 42 Wis. 654, 672 (1877). Interestingly enough, the Bass opinion went on to accept the theory of punitive damages because of stare decisis. Wisconisn recently continued this inexplicable adherence to an outdated doctrine in Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 279-80, 294 N.W.2d 437, 448 (1980):

REV_00263133

Although controversy continues to surround the doctrine of punitive damages in the twentieth century, and although some have questioned whether tort law -- which is designed to compensate an injured plaintiff -- should also serve the function of the criminal law, i.e., to punish a defendant for the purpose of deterring him and others from further offenses, this court has consistently and frequently said that punishment and deterrence are important considerations in the law of torts in Wisconsin.

n187. Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. 342, 382 (1873). Unlike Wisconsin, see supra note 186 and accompanying text, New Hampshire followed its instincts and limited punitive damages to a compensatory nature.

n188. Duffy, supra note 9, at 10.

n189. For example, juries have unlimited discretion in determining the amounts of punitive awards, whereas criminal fines must be fixed, and the burden of proof of civil punitive damage liability is established by a preponderance of the evidence and not evidence beyond a reasonable doubt. Likewise, civil defendants do not receive the protection against double jeopardy and, therefore, are subject to civil punitive damages and criminal fines for the same act. Similarly, civil defendants are subject to punitive awards on behalf of innumerable plaintiffs, thereby making any upper limit of liability nonexistent. Also, most crimes require a guilty intent. Finally, civil defendants subject to exemplary damages do not enjoy the protection against self-incrimination. See W. PROSSER, supra note 35, § 2, at 11; Duffy, supra note 9, at 9; Sales, supra note 2, at 363-64; see also Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 839 (punitive damages could amount to tens of millions of dollars while the maximum criminal penalty would be three years imprisonment and a $ 10,000 fine for each of 12 violations).

n190. See K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 630 ("The imposition of punitive damages is particularly offensive in the field of vicarious liability . . .").

n191. One scholar has stated:

If the purpose of awarding punitive damages is to compensate, the normal public policy reason for imposing vicarious liability would appear applicable. But if the purpose of punitive damages is to deter, as it is in the vast majority of jurisdictions today, the penalty is certainly of questionable effectiveness and justice if not imposed on the employee. The inequity is especially acute in the case of corporations where innocent stockholders ultimately bear the punitive burden.

K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 35.

n192. Id. at 631.

n193. The "deep pocket" theory rests upon "the desire to insure that victims of tortious injury can reach a defendant with sufficient wealth to provide adequate compensation." Ellis, supra note 10, at 64. Employers generally are better able to meet this compensatory burden. Id. at 64-65.

n194. See Duffy, supra note 9, at 12-13. The concerns of the "deep pocket" rationale for uncompensated plaintiffs obviously do not apply to punitive damages, which theoretically perform direct punitive and deterrent functions. Ellis, supra note 10, at 65.

n195. 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (1982); see Smith v. Wade, 103 S. Ct. 1625 (1983) (defendant's conduct must be motivated by evil motive or intent).

n196. See City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247 (1981) (municipality may be held vicariously liable for acts of its employees).

REV_00263134

n197. Duffy, supra note 9, at 12-13.

n198. Id. Many courts accept deterrence as one of the bases for punitive damages. See supra notes 47-60 & 64-70 and accompanying text. Deterrence can be specific -- of the individual defendant -- or general -- of other possible defendants. The strongest deterrence argument for punitive damages is specific deterrence. Some doubt exists as to whether exemplary awards accomplish this specific goal, and no empirical studies exist. Duffy, supra note 9, at 10-11. This uncertainty is especially strong when the individual defendant to be deterred is a corporate entity. The imposition of a punitive award cannot deter an employer if the employee's act is intentional. Conversely, the employee will not be deterred when the employer is made to pay a punitive award. Ellis, supra note 10, at 68-69. Moreover, the best selection and supervision methods available do not, and cannot, prevent occasional impulsive behavior by employees, and the larger the employer the less any possible deterrent effect because the large employer simply lacks that degree of total control and supervision of employees. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 2.08, at 19-21.

The general deterrent effect of punitive damages, likewise, is highly doubtful. Several noted authors term it "highly unlikely" that the civil law imposition of punitive damages will achieve the same goal of deterrence associated with the criminal law because: most people do not know what punitive damages are; those people who generally know what punitive damages are, do not know enough to appreciate the intended deterrent effect; and even sophisticated members of the public are compelled to make "judgment calls" regarding the type of conduct that will be subject to punitive damages. Id. § 2.09, at 23-24; see K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 116 ("there is really nothing for which the employer can be punished, and . . . punitive liability is unlikely to encourage employers to use more care in screening or training their employees").

n199. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 631.

n200. Schwartz, Deterrence and Punishment in the Common Law of Punitive Damages: A Comment, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 133, 141 (1982) (discussing the decision in Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 174 Cal. Rptr, 348 (1981), in which the appellate court affirmed the trial judge's reduction of punitive award from $ 125,000,000 to $ 3,500,000, but implied that it would have affirmed the trial court's acceptance of the $ 125,000,000 award or a reduction to $ 1,000,000).

n201. Duffy, supra note 9, at 10; see Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d at 841 (compensatory awards have punitive elements, which would be more pronounced if punitive damages were eliminated).

n202. Realistically, employees of an employer or corporate entity seldom, if ever, indemnify the vicariously liable employer. Consequently, the ultimate "punishment" administered by the punitive damage doctrine is assessed in the form of higher insurance premiums, higher prices for services, and higher product costs that are spread across the entire section of innocent consumers or taxpayers. Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d at 841. Likewise, creditors, sellers, suppliers, and distributors ultimately may pay the cost of the punishment meted out by the punitive damage doctrine without ever having committed a wrongful act. Ellis, supra note 10, at 66; see K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 116 (losses will fall not on the employer, but on the public through price increases, or on innocent shareholders who never receive any benefit from the torts of corporate employees).

n203. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 2.04, at 12.

n204. See supra notes 127-35 and accompanying text.

REV_00263135

n205. See supra note 131 and accompanying text.

n206. Duffy, supra note 9, at 8; Sales, supra note 2, at 367 & n.82.

n207. As noted by the court in Leimgruber v. Claridge Assoc., 73 N.J. 450, 375 A.2d 652, 656 (1977):

The major difficulty in establishing the amount of the punitive damage recovery is the absence of any defeinitive [sic] standard or criterion to guide the trier of fact in determining the proper amount.

One major objection to the "ratio" rule is that it collides with the rationale for imposing punitive damages which are awarded, as noted, on a theory of punishment and deterrence. . . .

n208. If courts intend punitive damages to punish the defendant, then the wrongdoer's conduct constitutes a more important consideration than the amount of damage the plaintiff suffers, although compensatory damages represent the basis against which the punitive damages are compared. Leimgruber v. Claridge Assoc., 73 N.J. 450, 375 A.2d, 656 (1977); see generally Ellis, supra note 10, at 58-59. Professor Ellis asserts that, although one can form arguments that will theoretically justify the ratio rule, in reality "it invites juries to engage in wealth redistribution and exacerbates the perverse incentives already created by uncertain standards of punitive damage liability and the lack of functional criteria for the magnitude of assessments." Id. at 62-63.

n209. These courts adopt the position of Lazenby v. Universal Underwriters Ins. Co., 214 Tenn. 639, 383 S.W.2d 1 (1964) (public policy not violated by allowance of insurance coverage for punitive damages). Almost all courts allow insurance coverage for vicarious punitive damage liability. Ellis, supra note 10, at 71 (citing Dayton Hudson Corp. v. American Mut. Liab. Ins. Co., 621 P.2d 1155, 1160 (Okla. 1980)); Morrissey, Punitive Damages -- Insurability, 25 TRIAL LAW. GUIDE 257 (1981); Owen, supra note 88, at 1313 n.276 (1976).

n210. See. Ellis, supra note 10, at 71 (citing Northwestern Nat'l Casualty Co. v. McNulty, 307 F.2d 432, 441-42 (5th Cir. 1962)). Recently, in United States Concrete Pipe Co. v. Bould, 437 So. 2d 1061 (Fla. 1983), the Florida Supreme Court determined that insurance coverage would apply to punitive damage liability of an entity deemed vicariously liable, but would not apply to the individual responsible for the egregious conduct.

n211. Ellis, supra note 10, at 74.

n212. First Bank v. Transamerica Ins. Co., F. Supp. (D.Mont. 1984) (implicit in the court's analysis is recognition of the fact that punitive damages serve as nothing more than windfalls for plaintiffs).

n213. Ellis, supra note 10, at 75-76. The Second Circuit has noted another dilemma that liability insurance raises. If courts allow liability insurance for punitive damages, then the cost of providing arguably needless deterrence rests on the consuming public. If courts do not allow such insurance, then a sufficient egregious mistake can destroy a business, thereby punishing innocent stockholders. Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d at 841.

n214. Even the ancient concept of satisfying the public's desire for revenge is outdated. As one author tersely observed, "vengeance is a questionable objective for a civilized legal system." Note, The Assessment of Punitive Damages Against an Entrepreneur for the Malicious Torts of His Employees, 70 YALE L.J. 1296, 1298 (1961). Society has long since progressed beyond the primitive concept of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.

REV_00263136

n215. See supra notes 48-60 and accompanying text.

n216. See supra notes 71-76 and accompanying text.

n217. See supra notes 17-30 and accompanying text.

n218. Dillon v. Legg, 68 Cal. 2d 728, 730-31, 441 P.2d 912, 914, 69 Cal. Rptr. 72, 74 (1968) (en banc); Portee v. Jaffee, 417 A.2d 521 (N.J. 1980); W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 12.

n219. Ellis, supra note 10, at 16-17. Professor Ellis cites the interesting case of Forde v. Skinner, 172 Eng. Rep. 687 (Horsham Assizes 1830), in which the court held that cutting off the hair of female paupers in a poor house, if done "with the malicious intent imputed [by the evidence] of 'taking down their pride,' . . . that will be an aggravation and ought to increase the damages." Ellis, supra note 10, at 17.

n220. Ellis, supra note 10, at 28; see Sanchez v. Schindler, 651 S.W.2d 249 (Tex. 1983) (Texas Supreme Court rejected over 100 years of judicial interpretation of the Wrongful Death Act to redefine pecuniary loss to permit recovery of loss of society and mental anguish). Even recovery for emotional upset in the absence of any physical injury is now recoverable. See, e.g., Betancourt v. J. C. Penny Co., 554 F.2d 1206 (1st Cir. 1977).

n221. Spokane Truck & Dray Co. v. Hoefer, 2 Wash. 45, 25 P. 1072 (1891).

n222. Some commentators argue that "common sense makes it difficult to disbelieve that the possibility of a hefty punitive jury verdict would not deter a rational and reputable manufacturer." See J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 6.07, at 24. But see Ellis, supra note 10, at 3 n.9 ("The burden of persuasion lies with the proponents of imposing punitive damages; if the question of whether imposing punitive damages promotes valid objectives cannot be persuasively answered in the affirmative, the damages are not justifiable and should not be imposed"). The vague and meaningless nature of the "reckless and wanton" standard as a basis for imposing punitive damages is exemplified in International Armament Corp. v. King, 674 S.W.2d 431 (Tex. Civ. App. 1984).

n223. Ellis, supra note 10, at 2.

n224. See supra notes 77-103 and accompanying text. Professor Ellis asserts that the vagueness of standards for determining liability and the wide discretion of juries in determining amounts of punitive damages extends "liability far beyond that justified by fairness." Ellis, supra note 10, at 76.

n225. One authority has stressed that substituting the terms "outrageous" or "flagrant" for the current vague terms would be useless because these words are just as elastic as those now in use. Ellis, supra note 10, at 51. The courts must realize the importance of strictly construing even "deliberate intent," "ill motive," and "maliciousness" standards. See Cooter, supra note 8, at 80 (proposing that courts should allow punitive damages only for intentional faults, which would include only gross or repeated conduct).

A bill currently before the United States Senate would limit the imposition of punitive damages in product liability cases to situations in which the defendant manufacturer or product seller acted with "reckless disregard . . . for the safety of product users, consumers, or persons who might be harmed by the product." S. 44, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 12(a)(2) (1984). The Senate bill further defines "reckless disregard" as "conscious, flagrant indifference to the safety of those persons who might be harmed by a product and an extreme departure from accepted practice." Id. § 12(j) (emphasis added). A similar bill before the United States House of Representatives deletes the word "conscious" and would require only that the defendant act "with a flagrant indifference to consumer safety . . . and an extreme departure from accepted practice." H.R. 5214, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 11(b) (1984) (emphasis added).

REV_00263137

n226. Professor Owen recently recommended that courts institute a "clear and convincing" evidentiary test. He recognized that such a test might sacrifice a degree of efficiency in favor of some fairness, but fairness over efficiency and the concept that close cases should be resolved in favor of the accused are exactly what the American legal system should epitomize. See Owen, supra note 9, at 118-19 (ratio of additional innocent parties who get punished to the number of additional guilty parties who get punished by an expansion of the rule of punitive damages may be unfairly high). In Gavica v. Hanson, 101 Idaho 58, 608 P.2d 861, 864 (1980), the court suggested that punitive damages generally are not favored and should be awarded only upon clear evidence. Similarly, in Town of Jackson v. Shaw, 569 P.2d 1246, 1252 (Wyo. 1977), the court observed that "[p]unitive damages are not a favorite of the law, are to be allowed only with caution within narrow limits and have been the subject of much controversy." And, in Gent v. Collinsville Volkswagen, Inc., 116 Ill. App. 3d 496, 451 N.E.2d 1385, 1391 (1983), the court acknowledged that "[b]ecause of the penal nature of such damages, . . . the law disfavors them. . . ." See Acosta v. Honda Motor Co. v. Moll, 717 F.2d 828, 839 (3d Cir. 1983) (en banc) (need to prove "outrageous" conduct by clear and convincing proof); Travelers Indem. Co. v. Armstrong, 442 N.E.2d 349, 360 (Ind. 1982) (the court announced a change to "clear and convincing evidence") S. 44, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 12(a)(2) (1984) (requiring "clear and convincing" proof); K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 124-25 (advocating that courts increase the burden of proof to a "clear and convincing" standard); see also Note, Criminal Safeguards and the Punitive Damages Defendant, 34 U. CHI. L. REV. 408 (1967).

n227. See Schwartz, supra note 200, at 144 (the American legal tradition indicates that incriminating facts must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt before punishment can be inflicted, but under the punitive damage doctrine the civil law awards millions of dollars based on a preponderance of the evidence standard).

n228. Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d at 843. The Second Circuit required only that the plaintiff clearly establish the defendant's recklessness. The term "reckless" lends itself to much confusion and arbitrariness, and therefore, courts should employ the more stringent standards of deliberate intent or maliciousness.

n229. See H.R. 5214, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 11(b), (c) (1984) (proposing that the court, rather than the jury, decide punitive damage liability and amount). But see S. 44, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 12(b), (c) (1984) (proposing that court decide the amount of punitive damages, but allowing jury initially to determine if defendant is liable for them).

n230. See Mallor & Roberts, Punitive Damages: Toward a Principled Approach, 31 HASTINGS L.J. 639, 670 (1980) (suggesting that "the very power of the remedy demands that judges exercise close control over the imposition and assessment of punitive damages"); Owen, supra note 9, at 120 (recommending reallocation of judicial power because of the experience of judges and because judges have less rigid preconceptions that might bias decisions); see also Torres v. North Am. Van Lines, Inc., 135 Ariz. 35, 658 P.2d 835, 841 (1983) (discussion of the role of experienced trial judge controlling punitive damages award).

n231. See Schwartz, supra note 200, at 146-47 (a questionnaire that the California Legislature's Joint Committee on Tort Liability submitted to California's Superior Court judges indicated that 56% of those judges who responded favored vesting in the trial court the authority to determine both when to award punitive damages and in what amount); see also Mallor & Roberts, supra note 230, at 664 (endorsing judicial determination of the appropriateness of punitive awards).

REV_00263138

n232. The jury in Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348 (1981), rendered a punitive damage award of $ 125,000,000 for a single claim. More recently in Durgill v. Ford Motor Co., C.A. 79-3203A-28th Dist. Ct. of Nueces Co., Texas (1983), the jury rendered a verdict of $ 6,800,000 in actual damages and $ 100,000,000 in punitive damages for a single claim.

n233. See H.R. 5214, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 11(d) (1984) (limiting punitive awards to twice the amount of actual damages, and never allowing punitive damages to exceed $ 1,000,000 for any one claimant). The House bill also would permit the court to consider any prior punitive damage awards levied against the defendant. Id. § 11(e). A mathematical formula, as H.R. 5214 proposes, in the hands of an experienced trial judge might lead to equitable results. One commentator, however, has suggested that allowing a jury to consider prior punitive awards in an effort to minimize any current exemplary damages could backfire and cause a jury to fine a defendant even more harshly. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 122-23.

n234. See supra note 176.

n235. The Clayton Act provides in pertinent part:

Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover three-fold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

15 U.S.C. § 15(a) (1982) (emphasis added). Professor Redden provides an excellent discussion of federal statutes that expressly provide for punitive damages, federal statutes that expressly preclude punitive awards, and federal statutes that are unclear on this issue. See K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 558-93.

n236. Judge Friendly favored the power of judicial reduction of punitive awards when writing the opinion in Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832 (2d Cir. 1967):

There is more to be said for drastic judicial control of the amount of punitive awards so as to keep the prospective total within some manageable bounds. This would require, for example, a reduction of the instant $ 100,000 award to something in the $ 5,000-$ 10,000 range, still leaving defendant exposed to several million dollars of exemplary damages.

Id. at 840.

n237. O.W. HOLMES, THE COMMON LAW 3 (1881). As stated in In re Nothern District of California "Dalcon Shield" IUD Products Liability Litigation, 526 F. Supp. 887, 899 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated on other grounds, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983), the purpose of punitive damages awards is "to sting, not kill, a defendant." But see, Acosta v. Honda Motor Co., 717 F.2d 828, 838 n.15 (3d Cir. 1983) (en banc), in which the court suggested punishment to destruction may constitute acceptable policy, or as the court more succinctly noted, "[n]or is such a result necessarily untenable").

n238. As noted by the court in Town of Jackson v. Shaw, 569 P.2d 1246, 1253 (Wyo. 1977), "The punitive allowance should be in an amount that would promote the public interest without financially annihilating the defendants." See Martin v. Johns-Manville Corp., 469 A.2d 655 (Pa. Super. 1983), which authorized punitive damages from a successor corporation for allegedly defective asbestos products supplied by a predecessor corporation. The punished legal entity neither designed, manufactured, nor sold the alleged defective product causing plaintiff's injury. In Morris v. Parke, Davis & Co., 573 F. Supp. 1324 (D.Cal. 1983), the court carried the punitive damage doctrine to its illogical extreme. The court approved the imposition of punitive damages on a defendant in a case in which strict tort liability was initially predicated on the market share theory because the plaintiffs could not establish that the defendant was the manufacturer or the seller of the injury causing product.

REV_00263139

n239. See S. 44, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 12(e), (f)(1) (1984) (suggesting that the amount of punitive damages that a plaintiff can receive should not exceed the amount of compensatory damages awarded, with any remaining punitive damages going to a court-determined "public purpose"). The logic of this suggestion was recognized as early as 1877 by a court that, unfortunately, refused to follows its own instincts. See supra note 186 and accompanying text.

n240. See supra notes 215-20 and accompanying text.

n241. See Duffy, supra note 9, at 9.

n242. See supra notes 209-13 and accompanying text.

n243. See, e.g., Dempsey v. Auto Owners Ins. Co., 717 F.2d 556, 562 (11th Cir. 1983); White v. Conoco, Inc., 710 F.2d 1442, 1448 (10th Cir. 1983); Moore v. American United Life Ins. Co., 150 Cal. App. 3d 610, , 197 Cal. Rptr. 878, 897 (1984); Riegel v. Aastad, 272 A.2d 715, 717-18 (Del. 1970); Leimgruber v. Claridge Assoc., 73 N.J. 450, 375 A.2d 652, 656 (1977).

n244. Owen, supra note 174, at 57-58; see Warren v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 693 F.2d 1373, 1380 (11th Cir. 1982) (maximum limit is exceeded if award is "neither just nor proper").

n245. As the Fifth Circuit stated about an unrelated abusable relic, legal doctrines that invite appeals and confuse judges, juries, and attorneys ought to be given a "quick and not too decent a burial." United States v. Bailey, 468 F.2d 652, 668-69 (5th Cir. 1972), aff'd en banc, 480 F.2d 518 (5th Cir. 1973).

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "deliberate disregard" and "intentional disregard" and malice and "punitive damages" (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, October 11, 2002 - 2:19 AM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00263140

[*1127] Courts generally are quick to assert that they fully control the extent of punishment meted out by punitive damages. [53] An exception to this rule, and one that has created much controversy because of the absence of any responsible theoretical foundations coupled with its fundamental inequities, [54] is the award of punitive damages based on vicarious liability. [55]

Courts are less than clear in defining and identifying the entities sought to be deterred by the effects of punitive damages. [56] For example, Iowa, Mississippi, North Carolina, Ohio, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia intend to deter persons other than the defendant from committing acts similar to those that prompted the punitive damage award. [57] Other jurisdictions that have adopted punitive damages observe that it is their policy to deter both the defendant and other potential wrongdoers. [58] Arizona and New Jersey, however, hold that the deterrent effect of punitive damages should be directed only at the particular tortfeasor before the court, [59] while Minnesota is unclear concerning whom it intends to [*1128] deter with punitive damages. [60]

B. Punishment Only

Delaware is the only state that has adopted punishment as the sole purpose for the imposition of punitive damages. [61] The Delaware Supreme Court has stated that it will allow punitive damages only as punishment to the tortfeasor for willfully and wantonly committed wrongful acts. [62] Wisconsin, similarly, recognizes the punishment rationale as a sufficient, if not sole, basis for imposing punitive damages. [63]

C. Deterrence Only

Deterrence represents the singular basis for authorizing punitive damages in Alaska, Georgia, Idaho, Maine, Oregon, Rhode Island, and Utah. [64] Many of these jurisdictions, however, do not specifically hold deterrence as the sole rationale for awarding punitive damages, but merely imply this basis. [65] The Idaho Supreme Court, in discussing the policy of deterrence, observed:

We prefer to accentuate those cases which define the purpose of exemplary damages as a deterrent to the defendant and others from engaging in similar conduct in the future. We concede that any exemplary damages assessed against a defendant will appear to him to be punishment. However, we feel [*1129] that the courts in these civil cases should be motivated primarily by a purpose of deterrence and not by a purpose of punishment. In other words, the assessment of exemplary damages should be prompted by the court's or jury's desire to assure, to the extent possible via the imposition of a monetary penalty, that similar conduct does not occur in the future. Punishment, per se, should be left to the criminal law. [66]

Also, as in those jurisdictions that recognize both punishment and deterrence as the rationales for punitive damages, [67] the jurisdictions that recognize only a deterrence rationale fail to clarify the entities sought to be deterred by the award of punitive damages. [68] This lack of uniformity in policy and application reflects the inherent weakness in a doctrine that, rather than advancing the best interests of society, actually threatens society's economic underpinnings.

Texas recently has announced that either deterrence or punishment, separately and independently, constitute an appropriate rationale for the assessment of punitive damages. [69] Therefore, the plaintiff may elect to seek punitive damages based on only the deterrence rationale, on only the punishment rationale, or both. [70] This judicial aberration reflects not only the lack of legal soundness of the doctrine, but also demonstrates the court's acceptance of the notion that punitive damages can serve as a windfall for plaintiffs.

REV_00263097

D. Award of Additional Damages

Several jurisdictions view punitive damages as mere monetary awards that complement compensatory damages. [71] Punitive damages, [*1130] in these jurisdictions, serve to provide remuneration for intangible injuries such as hurt feelings, loss of companionship, wounded dignity, grief, embarrassment, [72] mental anguish, [73] or litigation expenses. [74] These jurisdictions predicate their philosophy on the outdated theorem that such injuries were not compensable under early common law. [75] Common sense and the current availability of expanded, if not unlimited, compensatory damages in all tort actions expose the fallacy of this rationale. [76]

IV. APPLICATION OF THE PUNITIVE DAMAGE DOCTRINE IN TODAY'S CONTEXT

A. Standards of Conduct That Warrant Punitive Damages

The ratio decidendi that courts employ when imposing punitive damages vary in almost indecipherable, yet extremely important, degress. The disparate innuendos and connotations that accompany the legal bases articulated to support punitive damage liability precipitate subtle shifts in jury interpretations, in understandings of the law, and in burdens of proof. For this reason, the jurisdiction in which a plaintiff institutes suit profoundly affects the outcome of his case. Generally, most jurisdictions focus on the defendant's conduct, rather than the nature or extent of the harm sustained by the plaintiff. [77] This restricted approach lends itself to anything but consistency. Although a broad standard is necessarily imprecise, most commentators acknowledge that the imposition of punitive damages requires more than a mere tortious act -- the defendant's conduct must be aggravated or outrageous, or characterized by some positive element of conscious wrongdoing. [78]

[*1131] 1. Standard of Intentional Conduct

Those jurisdictions and commentators who recognize the validity of the punitive damage doctrine envision recovery when the defendant's actions eithe are or are deemed to be intentional. [79] Most of these courts and commentators adopt this proposition [*1132] without hesitation and endeavor to expand the punitive damage concept to situations that concern more imprecise conduct. [80] It is in this area of marginally intentional conduct that the judicial standards for imposing punitive damages first become muddled and legally irrational. Some states, therefore, have espoused very strong standards of appellate review. In Rhode Island the courts will approve punitive awards only "upon evidence of such willfulness, recklessness or wickedness, on the part of the party at fault, as amounted to criminality." [81] New Jersey, similarly, requires the plaintiff to prove "actual malice, which is nothing more or less than intentional wrongdoing -- an evil-minded act . . . or an act accompanied by a wanton and willful disregard of the rights of another." [82] Other jurisdictions have couched the standard in slightly different, yet equally strong, language. California requires that "the defendant must be guilty of oppression, fraud or malice. . . . He must act with the intention to vex, injure or annoy, or with a conscious disregard of the plaintiff's rights." [83] In Vermont the plaintiff must show "that there was actual malice . . . conduct [*1133] manifesting personal ill will or carried out under circumstances evidencing insult or oppression, or even by conduct showing a reckless or wanton disregard of one's rights." [84] Other states employ weaker characterizations of the intentional conduct standard. New York requires that "the wrong [be] aggravated by evil or a wrongful motive or that there [be] willful and intentional misdoing, or a reckless indifference equivalent thereto." [85] Alabama possesses one [*1134] of the weaker intentional conduct standards in that the courts only require "some circumstances of aggravation, such as willfulness, wantonness, maliciousness, gross negligence or recklessness, oppression, outrageous conduct, indignity and contumely, insult, or fraud or gross fraud." [86]

REV_00263098

The standards of intentional conduct sufficient to warrant punitive awards vary in degrees, both from each other and from the reckless and negligent standards that many jurisdictions apply. Significantly, one legal scholar has proposed that courts should limit punitive damages to cases concerning intentional faults. [87] Another well-known scholar, who formerly enthusiastically supported a rather unrestricted approach to punitive damages, [88] after viewing the results of an unfettered application of punitive damages over a mere seven year period, now recognizes the importance of limiting punitive damages to intentional and quasi-intentional situations. [89]

[*1135] 2. Standard of Reckless Conduct

The broad area of reckless or wanton conduct is an ill-defined, often fluctuating category. The courts ostensibly have articulated a clearly defined and legally meaningful standard to evaluate potential liability for punitive damages. Any analysis of the cases, however, reveals an unintelligible, linguistic exercise in legalese, the significance of which doubtlessly is lost upon many legal scholars and, more importantly, most jurors. Generally, the cases delineate a continuum of antisocial conduct. The upper, aggravated end of this continuum approaches intentional conduct, and therefore, courts are more likely to authorize the imposition of punitive damages for this type of conduct. The lower, more passive end of the continuum consists of conduct that is simply improper or ill-conceived, but is not of such egregious quality that it warrants punitory measures. Between these two extremes is conduct that varies in often imperceptible, but extremely important degrees for the application of the punitive damage concept.

A review of the cases employing "the reckless or wanton" standard discloses a disturbing overlap between this standard and the intentional conduct standard. The distinctions between the two standards often are too imperceptible to allow absolute categorization. Some courts proclaim that the standard for the imposition of punitive damages is "actual malice, which is nothing more or less than intentional wrongdoing -- an evil-minded act" [90] , or "an evil intent deserving of punishment or of something in the nature of special ill will." [91] Some courts repudiate the necessity of demonstrating actual malice in favor or a standard of "legal malice," which [*1136] appears to differ little from intentional conduct. [92] Others refer to "conscious disregard of [the plaintiff's] rights" and award punitive damages when the evidence demonstrates that the defendant acted willfull and maliciously. [93] Other courts denominate reckless or wanton conduct as "gross negligence" which then is defined as an "entire want of care" that raises an inference of "conscious indifference" to the rights of others. [94] Still other jurisdictions judge the defendant's conduct against a standard of reckless or wanton conduct, oppression, fraud, or malice under which the wrongdoer must act with the intent to vex, injure or annoy, [95] or act out of a maliciousness or recklessness that evidences an utter disregard of the consequences. [96] At least one court has judicially formulated a standard of reckless, wanton, or oppressive conduct that requires spite, ill will, or reckless indifference by the defendant. [97] Tennessee has [*1137] attempted to amalgamate all of the various characterizations of the reckless standard into one sentence. Tennessee courts will allow punitive damages in cases involving fraud, malice, gross negligence or oppression, . . .or where a wrongful act is done with a bad motive or so recklessly as to imply a disregard of social obligation, . . . or where there is such willful misconduct or entire want of care as to raise a presumption of conscious indifference to consequences. [98]

The standards for measuring reckless or wanton conduct are confusing and devoid of any effective definition. Scholars universally have acknowledged the absence of any meaningful characterization. [99] Jurors motivated by the noble desire to render a fair verdict simply cannot fathom the intricacies in meaning and subtle connotations that characterize the different standards for measuring [*1138] reckless or wanton conduct. [100] Because of the absence of any understandable standards of measurement and the inevitably inconsistent interpretations by juries, every defendant increasingly is subject to the vagaries of individual jurisdictions and an uninformed jury.

REV_00263099

3. Standard of Negligent Conduct

Most courts refuse to impose punitive damages for "negligent" conduct. [101] Some states purport, however, to recognize a distinction between mere negligence and gross negligence, and they invariably authorize punitive damages only for the latter. [102] At least one court had held that gross negligence, in and of itself, is not sufficient to support an award of punitive damages. [103]

B. The Corporate Defendant and Punitive Damages

The doctrine of vicarious liability provides a further avenue for courts to impose punitive damages on parties other than the actual wrongdoer. [104] A large number of jurisdictions adhere to the respondeat superior rule that an employer is subject to punitive [*1139] damages when an employee, while operating within the scope of his employment, commits tortious acts that further the employer's interests. The imposition of punitive damages vicariously on another is incongruous with the objective of deterrence. Punishing the employer or corporation for the acts of the servant simply metes out punishment based not on opprobrious conduct but on the mere legal relationship between the offending individual and his employer. A number of other jurisdictions, however, adopt the more conservative "complicity rule." [105] The complicity rule limits the imposition of vicarious liability for punitive damages to situations in which a managerial agent of the employer either commits the egregious act, [106] specifically authorizes the act, [107] or ratifies the [*1140] act [108] or when an unfit employee recklessly hired by the employer commits the act. [109] At least under the complicity rule, the employer or corporation has undertaken an affirmative, conscious act in hiring an unfit employee or authorizing the egregious act of the employee.

Courts also impose punitive damages on corporations under the recently formulated concept of strict tort liability. [110] A recent opinion by the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit demonstrates the extent to which courts have expanded the award of punitive damages in strict liability situations. In Saupitty v. Yazoo Manufacturing Co. [111] the court affirmed awards of $ 560,000 in compensatory damages and $ 440,000 in punitive damages when the plaintiff's left hand and arm were injured by a riding lawnmower the defendant had manufactured. The court sanctioned the punitive award even though the plaintiff substantially had altered the product by removing both the belt guard and the brakes of the mower. [112] A vigorous dissent asserted that under applicable strict tort liability doctrine either of these material alterations to the mower should have constituted grounds for a directed verdict for the defendant. [113] The dissent also emphasized that even if the court elected to impose strict liability under such meager evidence, no evidence existed in the record to justify an award of [*1141] punitive damages. [114]

The imposition of punitive damages in the strict liability context also has been assailed on the grounds that punitive damages traditionally are awarded in tort actions in which the compensatory damages are premised on conduct, while compensatory damages in strict tort liability actions are based solely on the condition of the product. [115] Strict tort liability rests entirely on the socioeconomic policy of risk distribution. Following this rationale, the product supplier is essentially blameless. Liability is visited upon the product supplier on the theoretical basis that the supplier is the entity best able to absorb the loss suffered by a product user simply by distributing the added cost to the marketing public and by purchasing additional insurance. Consequently, courts in strict liability cases award compensatory damages because of the condition of the product, not the conduct of the product supplier. Punitive damages in a strict tort liability context, therefore, would seem to be plainly illogical because neither punishment nor deterrence of conduct is at issue. [116]

REV_00263100

An equally compelling argument against punitive damages in a strict liability context is that such awards in product liability cases produce economically and socially undesirable results. [117] The gravest danger in products liability is that an aggregate of punitive awards can bankrupt or financially cripple a business. [118] One commentator has observed that the recent trend toward more substantial punitive damage verdicts has reached the point at which the [*1142] question must be posed whether the goal of punitive damages is "punishment of the defendant or actually his annihilation." [119] Courts, however, increasingly ignore or only superficially address these arguments in their affirmation of punitive damage awards against manufacturers in a strict tort liability context. [120] The situation in strict tort liability is exacerbated by the fact that liability may be predicated on an alleged defective design or a defective warning on the product. Products are marketed in certain design lines and literally millions of identically designed or marketed products may exist. If punitive damages may be awarded repeatedly for the same design or marketing deficiency, then indeed, the punitive damage doctrine may be utilized to punish a product supplier to the point of economic destruction. [121] Several recent decisions, [*1143] unmindful of the concern for the continued economic viability of product suppliers, have acknowledged that the bankruptcy or other form of annihilation of a product supplier by the repeated imposition of punitive damage awards could be justified and judicially sanctioned. [122]

The Fifth Circuit recently recognized the serious problem of supplier annihilation in Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp. [123] and elected to reject the punitive damages concept in the area of industry-wide asbestos related litigation. The Fifth Circuit recognized that economic loss distribution represented the primary objective of strict tort liability [124] and noted that one court had suggested that "the demise of the manufacturer in such circumstances is not a 'necessarily untenable' result." [125] The Fifth Circuit, however, refused to accept this draconian result and stated that "[a]t the point where awards of punitive damages destroy the viability of the enterprises necessary to accomplish loss distribution, the remedy of punitive damages becomes incompatible with the strict liability cause of action." [126] The court's major rationale was the [*1144] continued financial viability of manufacturers, which would insure compensation for the projected future thousands of asbestosis claimants. The judges expressed a reluctance to provide a windfall to the current plaintiffs at the expense of future claimants who conceivably would be foreclosed from recovering even compensatory damages if repeated punitive awards continue to bankrupt manufacturers. Of course, the court did consider, in rejecting the punitive damages award, that the continued viability of product suppliers is the very essence of society's continued economic existence.

The Fifth Circuit's decision in Jackson is an implicit recognition of a problem that must concern the courts: should the judiciary determine whether businesses which constitute the underpinning of this society's economy continue to exist and remain viable as the producer of products necessary to service society and as the employer of the millions of individuals composing society? The avowed purpose of the punitive damage doctrine never has been and never should be the economic destruction of business entities. If such decisions should be imposed, they should emanate from a duly elected and representative legislative body. The destruction of businesses, the loss of thousands of jobs, the repeated trauma to the American economy, and the significantly increased product costs to consumers should not be the objective of any system. The current antibusiness attitude reflected in the multitude of recent decisions is troubling. Such judicially mandated, economically adverse consequences exceed society's tolerance of judicial activism, and punitive sentences of death for corporations should no longer [*1145] be permitted under the guise of a civil tort compensation system.

C. Other Factors Affecting Punitive Damage Awards

Most jurisdictions adhere to the rule that actual or compensatory damages are a prerequisite to an award of punitive damages. [127] The amount of actual or compensatory damages required are not specifically defined and, generally, nominal actual damages suffice. [128]

REV_00263101

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 461 U.S. 30,AT 40

*461 U.S. 30, *; 103 S. Ct. 1625, **;*
75 L. Ed. 2d 632, ; 1983 U.S. LEXIS 24

SMITH v. WADE

No. 81-1196

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

461 U.S. 30; 103 S. Ct. 1625; 75 L. Ed. 2d 632; 1983 U.S. LEXIS 24; 51 U.S.L.W. 4407

November 10, 1982, Argued April 20, 1983, Decided

PRIOR HISTORY:

CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

DISPOSITION: 663 F.2d 778, affirmed.

CASE SUMMARY

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: Defendant guard sought and was granted certiorari to the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit to decide whether the court applied the correct legal standard in instructing the jury that it might award punitive damages to plaintiff inmate under 42 U.S.C.S. § 1983.

OVERVIEW: Plaintiff sued guard for violation of his constitutional rights under the Eighth Amendment. Inmate contended that guard knew or should have known that an assault against him was likely when he placed another inmate in his cell who was known for fighting. The jury awarded compensatory and punitive damages. The Court held that punitive damages were available in a proper § 1983 case. Guard argued it was not a proper case for punitive damages and that the jury instructions failed to require a finding of actual malicious intent. The court held that malicious intent was not required. Inmate in a § 1983 case did not have a more restricted remedy than a person asserting an ordinary tort cause of action and could be awarded punitive damages for recklessness or serious indifference to or disregard to inmate's rights. Guard contended the trial court erred in not requiring a higher standard for punitive damages than for compensatory damages. The Court found no error. Punitive damages were discretionary with the jury, whereas compensatory damages were not. The same threshold applied, even when the underlying standard was one of recklessness.

OUTCOME: The Court affirmed the decision because the jury instructions were in accord with the standard that punitive damages could be awarded for reckless indifference to inmate's federally protected rights.

CORE TERMS: punitive damages, recklessness, malice, motive, indifference, evil, common-law, exemplary damages, punitive, reckless, malicious, wanton, injure, gross negligence, common law, deterrence, willful, compensatory damages, actual malice, malicious intent, immunity, callous, intent to injure, wantonness, threshold, redress, reckless indifference, prevailing, plainly, wantonly

REV_00263141

32-33 (1858). More commonly in the punitive damages context, the term meant something in between fictional malice and actual injurious intent -- "that form of malice . . . where, without 'deliberate mind' or 'formed design,' the offender has been so grossly and recklessly negligent, so wantonly indifferent to another's rights, that he should be required to pay damages in excess of mere compensation as a punishment and example." Press Pub. Co. v. McDonald, 63 F. 238, 246 (CA2 1894). Accord, e. g., Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Quigley, 21 How. 202, 214 (1859); South & N. A. R. Co. v. McLendon, 63 Ala. 266, 273-275 (1879); Yerian v. Linkletter, 80 Cal. 135, 138, 22 P. 70, 71 (1889) (Paterson, J., concurring); Cameron v. Bryan, 89 Iowa 214, 219, 56 N. W. 434 (1893); Lynd v. Picket, 7 Minn., at 200-202.

There was considerably less ambiguity or confusion concerning the meaning of "wantonness" in tort law:

"Wanton means reckless -- without regard to the rights of others. . . . Wantonly means causelessly, without restraint, and in reckless disregard of the rights of others. Wantonness is defined as a licentious act of one man towards the person of another, without regard to his rights; it has also been defined as the conscious failure by one charged with a duty to exercise due care and diligence to prevent an injury after the discovery of the peril, or under circumstances where he is charged with a knowledge of such peril, and being conscious of the inevitable or probable results of such failure." 30 American and English Encyclopedia of Law 2-4 (2d ed. 1905) (footnotes omitted).

The last sentence of that definition could have been written with this case in mind. See also, e. g., 40 Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure 292-295 (1912). The word was used with the same meaning in the punitive damages context. See, e. g., Texarkana Gas & Electric Light Co. v. Orr, 59 Ark. 215, 224, 27 S. W. 66, 68 (1894); Welch v. Durand, 36 Conn. 182, 184-185 (1869); Southern Kansas R. Co. v. Rice, 38 Kan. 398, 403-404, 16 P. 817, 820 (1888).

Finally, "willfulness" did not mean intent to cause injury, but only voluntary action:

"Wilful . . . generally, as used in courts of law, implies nothing blamable, but merely that the person of whose action or default the expression is used is a free agent, and that what has been done arises from the spontaneous action of his will. It amounts to nothing more than this: that he knows what he is doing, and intends to do what he is doing, and is a free agent. And wilfully does not imply that an act done in that spirit was necessarily a malicious act. . . ." 30 American and English Encyclopedia of Law 529-530 (2d ed. 1905) (footnote omitted).

"Wilful neglect or negligence has been defined as that degree of neglect arising where there is a reckless indifference to the safety of human life, or an intentional failure to perform a manifest duty to the public, in the performance of which the public and the party injured had an interest." Id., at 535 (footnote omitted).

See also, e. g., 40 Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure 944-947 (1912). Again, the punitive damages cases bear this reading out. Cameron, supra, at 219, 56 N. W., at 434; Goetz, supra, at 32-33; Chiles v. Drake, 59 Ky., at 152-155; Peoria Bridge Assn. v. Loomis, 20 Ill. 235, 251 (1858).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

This Court so stated on several occasions, before and shortly after 1871. In Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Quigley, 21 How. 202 (1859), a diversity libel suit, the Court held erroneous an instruction that authorized the jury to return a punitive award but gave the jury virtually no substantive guidance as to the proper threshold. We described the standard thus:

REV_00263150

"Whenever the injury complained of has been inflicted maliciously or wantonly, and with circumstances of contumely or indignity, the jury are not limited to the ascertainment of a simple compensation for the wrong committed against the aggrieved person. But the malice spoken of in this rule is not merely the doing of an unlawful or injurious act. The word implies that the act complained of was conceived in the spirit of mischief, or of criminal indifference to civil obligations." Id., at 214 (emphasis added). n9

[*42] [*643] [1633] The Court further explained the standard for punitive damages in Milwaukee & St. Paul R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U.S. 489 (1876), a diversity railroad collision case:

"Redress commensurate to such [personal] injuries should be afforded. In ascertaining its extent, the jury may consider all the facts which relate to the wrongful act of the defendant, and its consequences to the plaintiff; but they are not at liberty to go farther, unless it was done wilfully, or was the result of that reckless indifference to the rights of others which is equivalent to an intentional violation of them. In that case, the jury are authorized, for the sake of public example, to give such additional damages as the circumstances require. The tort is aggravated by the evil motive, and on this rests the rule of exemplary damages." Id., at 493.

". . . To [assess punitive damages], there must have been some wilful misconduct, or that entire want of care [*43] which would raise the presumption of a conscious indifference to consequences." Id., at 495 (emphasis added).

The Court therefore held erroneous a jury instruction allowing a punitive award on "gross negligence'; it concluded that the latter term was too vague, and too likely to be confused with mere ordinary negligence, to provide a fair standard. It remanded for a new trial. n10

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n9 JUSTICE REHNQUIST's dissent reads this statement as a requirement of actual intent, post, at 68-69. This misreading depends in part on the faulty assumption, see n. 8, supra, that "malice" always meant intent to injure (post, at 68) -- a reading particularly inappropriate in light of the Court's express definition of malice as including "criminal indifference." As for the latter point, JUSTICE REHNQUIST reasons that the term "criminal indifference" must include an element of actual malicious intent. This surprising interpretation of the word "indifference" rests on the unstated and demonstrably false premise that intent to cause injury was always an element of crime. Not only were there crimes of recklessness or negligence (such as reckless homicide), but even crimes of intent commonly required only intent to do the criminal act (and, in some cases, knowledge that the injury would likely follow), rather than actual ill will or purpose to inflict an injury. See, e. g., 1 J. Bishop, Commentaries on Criminal Law §§ 313-322 (5th ed. 1872); J. May, Law of Crimes §§ 30, 31, 232, 233 (2d ed. J. Beale, 1893); see also, e. g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 (Tent. Draft No. 4, 1955). The case law clearly illustrates that "criminal" did not mean "with injurious intent" in the punitive damages context. E. g., Hopkins v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co., 36 N. H. 9, 18-19 (1857), overruled on other grounds, Fay v. Parker, 53 N. H. 342 (1872); Brooke v. Clark, 57 Tex. 105, 112-114 (1880); Meibus v. Dodge, 38 Wis. 300, 310-311 (1875).

JUSTICE REHNQUIST also cites Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. 363, 371 (1852), in support of an actual-intent requirement. Post, at 70. The language used in that case ("wanton and malicious, or gross and outrageous") was precisely the precedent that the Philadelphia Court was exegeting in the passage quoted in text, when it held that "malice" includes "criminal indifference." Moreover, the Day case did not present any issue of punitive damages; the Court discussed them merely as a sidelight to the costs-and-fees issue presented.

REV_00263151

n10 As with Philadelphia, n. 9, supra, JUSTICE REHNQUIST's dissent reads this case as imposing a requirement of actual malicious intent, on the assumption that when the Court said "indifference to consequences" it really meant "intent to cause consequences," and when it said "recklessness" it really meant "bad motive or intent to injure." Post, at 70-73. This textual alchemy is untenable. For one thing, JUSTICE REHNQUIST's analysis of the case reflects the confusion in his dissent of motive with consciousness, see n. 6, supra; post, at 71-72, n. 7. Moreover, the Milwaukee Court did not say, or come close to saying, that recklessness is identical to intent, or that it is material only as evidence of intent; rather, it said that recklessness is "equivalent" to intent, meaning that the two are equally culpable and deserving of punishment and deterrence. 91 U.S., at 493. This also explains the Court's reference, two sentences later, to "evil motive," ibid. JUSTICE REHNQUIST's great reliance on this sentence confuses the standard for punitive damages with the rationale for them. Plainly, read in context, what the Court meant is that punitive damages are justified by the moral culpability of evil intent, or by the "equivalent" culpability of "reckless indifference to the rights of others." See also Cowen v. Winters, 96 F. 929, 934-935 (CA6 1899); Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Hill, 90 Ala. 71, 80, 8 So. 90, 93 (1890); Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Whitfield, 44 Miss. 466, 494-495 (1870); Thirkfield v. Mountain View Cemetery Assn., 12 Utah 76, 82, 41 P. 564, 565 (1895). The contrary reading adopted by JUSTICE REHNQUIST's dissent is flatly inconsistent with the Court's reiteration of the rule, 91 U.S., at 495 (emphasis added): "that entire want of care which would raise the presumption of a conscious indifference to consequences." Try as he might, JUSTICE REHNQUIST cannot transform indifference, conscious or otherwise, into intent.

JUSTICE REHNQUIST also relies on a four-sentence capsulization by the Reporter of Decisions of our unreported decision in Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Eyser, 91 U.S. 495, decided the same day. While the Reporter's summary does speak of the absence of "intentional wrong," id., at 496, the factual context suggests that the basis of decision was the jury instruction that ordinary negligence would warrant punitive damages, combined with the fact that the defendant had taken some affirmative (though insufficient) steps to avoid injury to passersby. Thus, in context, the reference to "intentional wrong" is entirely consistent with the Milwaukee decision's test of "conscious indifference"; the defendant in Western Union was not indifferent to injury, but instead plainly intended to avoid injury.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*44] [*644] [1634] Ten years later, the Court in dictum suggested that perhaps even gross negligence would suffice after all, at least in some cases:

"For injuries resulting from a neglect of duties, in the discharge of which the public is interested, juries are also permitted to assess exemplary damages. These may be perhaps considered as falling under the head of cases of gross negligence, for any neglect of duties imposed for the protection of life or property is culpable, and deserves punishment." Missouri Pacific R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U.S. 512, 521 (1885).

See also Minneapolis & St. Louis R. Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U.S. 26, 34 (1889) ("culpable negligence"). n11

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n11 In two other cases the Court reaffirmed the Philadelphia "criminal indifference" standard and the Milwaukee "reckless indifference" standard. Barry v. Edmunds, 116 U.S., at 563; Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Harris, 122 U.S. 597, 609-610 (1887).

REV_00263152

JUSTICE REHNQUIST's dissent relies on two later decisions of this Court, neither of which supports it. Post, at 74-75. In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U.S. 101 (1893), the issue was whether a corporation could be liable in punitive damages for the tort of its employee. The Court, reasoning largely from general principles of respondeat superior, held that such vicarious liability could exist only when the employer had authorized or ratified the tort. In so doing, however, it expressly reaffirmed as "well settled" the general standard announced in the Philadelphia case, including liability for "criminal indifference." 147 U.S., at 107. JUSTICE REHNQUIST cites a passage quoting from one state case suggesting an intent requirement, post, at 74, but he omits to mention the court's extensive quotations from Philadelphia and Milwaukee, 147 U.S., at 112-113, and its express approval of and quotation from other state cases stating unequivocally that an employer can be liable for its own recklessness in hiring unfit employees, id., at 114-116. See also n. 9, supra. In Scott v. Donald, 165 U.S., at 71-90, the issue was whether there was a sufficient amount in controversy. The Court held that allegations of "intentional, malicious and repeated interference" with federally protected rights, id., at 89, were enough, if proved, to warrant punitive damages. The Court undertook no statement of a general standard for punitive damages beyond noting the unsurprising principle that such damages are awardable on proof of actual evil motive, id., at 86. Under the allegations, of course, no question of liability for less culpable conduct was presented.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*45] The large majority of state and lower federal courts were in agreement that punitive damages awards did not require a showing of actual malicious intent; they permitted punitive awards on variously stated standards of negligence, recklessness, or other culpable conduct short of actual malicious intent. n12

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n12 In the often-cited case of Welch v. Durand, 36 Conn. 182 (1869), for example, the court held that punitive damages were proper where the defendant's pistol bullet, fired at a target, ricocheted and hit the plaintiff:

"In what cases then may smart money be awarded in addition to the damages? The proper answer to this question . . . seems to be, in actions of tort founded on the malicious or wanton misconduct or culpable neglect of the defendant. . . .

"In this case the defendant was guilty of wanton misconduct and culpable neglect. . . . It is an immaterial fact that the injury was unintentional, and that the ball glanced from the intended direction. . . . [If] the act is done where there are objects from which the balls may glance and endanger others, the act is wanton, reckless, without due care, and grossly negligent." Id., at 185.

In Frink & Co. v. Coe, 4 Greene 555 (Iowa 1854), punitive damages were awarded against a stage company for employing a known drunkard as a driver, the court saying:

"In a case of gross negligence on the part of a stage proprietor, such as the employment of a known drunken driver, and where a passenger has been injured in consequence of such negligence, we think exemplary damages should be entertained.

. . . .

"If a stage proprietor or carrier is guilty of gross negligence, it amounts to that kind of gross misconduct which will justify a jury in giving exemplary damages, even where an 'intent or design' to do the injury does not appear." Id., at 559 (emphasis in original).

REV_00263153

Maysville & Lexington R. Co. v. Herrick, 76 Ky. 122 (1877), held that the trial court correctly refused to instruct the jury that "willful or intentional wrong" was required to award punitive damages in a railroad accident case, remarking:

"The absence of slight care in the management of a railroad train, or in keeping a railroad track in repair, is gross negligence; and to enable a passenger to recover punitive damages, in a case like this, it is not necessary to show the absence of all care, or 'reckless indifference to the safety of . . . passengers,' or 'intentional misconduct' on the part of the agents and officers of the company." Id., at 127 (ellipsis in original).

Accord, e. g., Cowen v. Winters, 96 F., at 934-935; Press Pub. Co. v. McDonald, 63 F., at 245-247; Morning Journal Assn. v. Rutherford, 51 F. 513, 514-515 (CA2 1892); Fotheringham v. Adams Express Co., 36 F. 252, 253-254 (CC ED Mo. 1888); United States v. Taylor, 35 F. 484, 488 (CC SD Ala. 1888); Malloy v. Bennett, 15 F. 371, 373-374 (CC SDNY 1883); Berry v. Fletcher, 3 F. Cas. 286, 288 (No. 1,357) (CC Mo. 1870); Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Arnold, 80 Ala. 600, 608, 2 So. 337, 342 (1886); Texarkana Gas & Electric Light Co. v. Orr, 59 Ark., at 224, 27 S. W., at 68; Dorsey v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 553, 555-556 (1860); Florida Railway & Navigation Co. v. Webster, 25 Fla. 394, 419-420, 5 So. 714, 719 (1889); Jacobus v. Congregation of Children of Israel, 107 Ga. 518, 521, 33 S. E. 853, 855 (1899); Drohn v. Brewer, 77 Ill. 280, 282-283 (1875); Citizens' St. R. Co. v. Willoeby, 134 Ind. 563, 569-570, 33 N. E. 627, 629 (1893); Sawyer v. Sauer, 10 Kan. 466, 470 (1872); Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 57 Me. 202, 218 (1869); Lynd v. Picket, 7 Minn., at 200-202; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Whitfield, 44 Miss., at 494-495, 500; Buckley v. Knapp, 48 Mo. 152, 161-162 (1871); Caldwell v. New Jersey Steamboat Co., 47 N. Y. 282, 296 (1872); Sullivan v. Oregon Railway & Navigation Co., 12 Ore. 392, 404-406, 7 P. 508, 517 (1885) (dictum); Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Rosenzweig, 113 Pa. 519, 543-544, 6 A. 545, 552-553 (1886); Hart v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co., 33 S. C. 427, 435-436, 12 S. E. 9, 10 (1890); Haley v. Mobile & O. R. Co., 66 Tenn. 239, 242-243 (1874); Brooke v. Clark, 57 Tex., at 112-114; Thirkfield v. Mountain View Cemetery Assn., 12 Utah, at 82, 41 P., at 564-565; Earl v. Tupper, 45 Vt. 275, 286-287 (1873) (dictum); Borland v. Barrett, 76 Va. 128, 132-134 (1882); Pickett v. Crook, 20 Wis. 358, 359 (1866); Union Pacific R. Co. v. Hause, 1 Wyo. 27, 35 (1871).

JUSTICE REHNQUIST's assertion that a "solid majority of jurisdictions" required actual malicious intent, post, at 84, is simply untrue. In fact, there were fairly few jurisdictions that imposed such a requirement, and fewer yet that adhered to it consistently. JUSTICE REHNQUIST's attempt to establish this proposition with case citations, post, at 78-84, n. 12, does not offer him substantial support. Because the point is not of controlling significance, see n. 2, supra, we will not tarry here to analyze his citations case-by-case or State-by-State, but will only summarize the main themes.

Several of JUSTICE REHNQUIST's cases actually offer unequivocal support for the rule that punitive damages are available on a showing of negligence, recklessness, disregard for or indifference to the rights of others, and various other standards short of actual ill will or injurious intent. In this same vein, JUSTICE REHNQUIST continues to try to equate consciousness or knowledge with actual ill will or intent to injure, see n. 6, supra.

Other cases do not clearly support either JUSTICE REHNQUIST's view or ours. Some of these contain contradictory language in their formulations, indicating that the present distinction perhaps did not occur to the writers. Others support JUSTICE REHNQUIST's rule only if one makes the questionable assumption, see nn. 8, 9, supra, that terms like "malice," "wantonness," and "criminal" always meant actual intent to injure. Still others simply ruled on collateral questions (such as the admissibility of evidence of bad motive or of good faith) without purporting to state any general standard for punitive damages. Some were apparently limited to particular classes of torts. A comparison of this class of cases with those cited supra, this note, reveals that in many instances other decisions of the same courts clear up any ambiguity in favor of a recklessness or negligence standard.

REV_00263154

A third class of cases are those in which the courts simply affirmed awards of punitive damages based on evidence of, or jury instructions requiring, actual malicious intent, without discussing whether a lesser showing might also be adequate. Often the cases in this category involved assault and battery or similar torts, where the facts presented little problem of negligence or recklessness. See also n. 11, supra. As with the previous category, many of the same courts spoke more directly in other cases, making it clear that injurious intent was not required.

Finally, even of those comparatively few cases that do seem to support JUSTICE REHNQUIST's view, many are of debatable authority. In nearly every State there was at least some late 19th-century authority supporting awards on less than ill will or intent to injure. Admittedly, in a few States this was the less accepted view, but in a substantial majority of jurisdictions the prevailing rule (as evidenced by the cases cited supra, this note, and numerous other cases not listed here) was that no such actual malicious intent was required.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*46] [*646] [1635]

[*HR4] [4]
The same rule applies today. The Restatement (Second) of Torts (1979), for example, states: "Punitive damages may be awarded for conduct that is outrageous, because [1636] of the defendant's [*47] evil motive or his reckless indifference to the rights of others." § 908 (2) (emphasis added); see also id., Comment b. Most cases under state common law, although varying in [*48] their precise terminology, have adopted more or less the same rule, recognizing that punitive damages in tort cases may be awarded not only for actual intent to injure or evil motive, but also for recklessness, serious indifference to or disregard for the rights of others, or even gross negligence. n13

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n13 Loch Ridge Construction Corp. v. Barra, 291 Ala. 312, 280 So. 2d 745 (1973); Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P. 2d 38 (Alaska 1979), modified on other grounds, 615 P. 2d 621 (1980), and 627 P. 2d 204 (1981); Huggins v. Deinhard, 127 Ariz. 358, 621 P. 2d 45 (App. 1980); White v. Brock, 41 Colo. App. 156, 584 P. 2d 1224 (1978); Collens v. New Canaan Water Co., 155 Conn. 477, 234 A. 2d 825 (1967); Sheats v. Bowen, 318 F.Supp. 640 (Del. 1970) (Delaware law); Spar v. Obwoya, 369 A. 2d 173 (D. C. 1977); Adams v. Whitfield, 290 So. 2d 49 (Fla. 1974); Randall v. Ganz, 96 Idaho 785, 537 P. 2d 65 (1975); Pendowski v. Patent Scaffolding Co., 89 Ill. App. 3d 484, 411 N. E. 2d 910 (1980), appeal denied (Ill. 1981); Meyer v. Nottger, 241 N. W. 2d 911 (Iowa 1976); Ford v. Guarantee Abstract & Title Co., 220 Kan. 244, 553 P. 2d 254 (1976); Pettengill v. Turo, 159 Me. 350, 193 A. 2d 367 (1963); American Laundry Machine Industries v. Horan, 45 Md. App. 97, 412 A. 2d 407 (1980); Bailey v. Graves, 411 Mich. 510, 309 N. W. 2d 166 (1981); Huebsch v. Larson, 291 Minn. 361, 191 N. W. 2d 433 (1971); Mississippi Power Co. v. Jones, 369 So. 2d 1381 (Miss. 1979); Stenson v. Laclede Gas Co., 553 S. W. 2d 309 (Mo. App. 1977); Butcher v. Petranek, 181 Mont. 358, 593 P. 2d 743 (1979); Berg v. Reaction Motors Division, 37 N. J. 396, 181 A. 2d 487 (1962); Robison v. Katz, 94 N. M. 314, 610 P. 2d 201 (App.), cert. denied, 94 N. M. 675, 615 P. 2d 992 (1980); Soucy v. Greyhound Corp., 27 App. Div. 2d 112, 276 N. Y. S. 2d 173 (1967); Newton v. Standard Fire Insurance Co., 291 N. C. 105, 229 S. E. 2d 297 (1976); Dahlen v. Landis, 314 N. W. 2d 63 (N. D. 1981); Leichtamer v. American Motors Corp., 67 Ohio St. 2d 456, 424 N. E. 2d 568 (1981); Smith v. Johnston, 591 P. 2d 1260 (Okla. 1978); Focht v. Rabada, 217 Pa. Super. 35, 268 A. 2d 157 (1970); Sherman v. McDermott, 114 R. I. 107, 329 A. 2d 195 (1974); King v. Allstate Insurance Co., 272 S. C. 259, 251 S. E. 2d 194 (1979); Hannahs v. Noah, 83 S. D. 296, 158 N. W. 2d 678 (1968); Inland Container Corp. v.

REV_00263155

March, 529 S. W. 2d 43 (Tenn. 1975); Shortle v. Central Vermont Public Service Corp., 137 Vt. 32, 399 A. 2d 517 (1979); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 294 N. W. 2d 437 (1980).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*HR1C] [1C]
[*HR5] [5]
The remaining question is whether the policies and purposes of § 1983 itself require a departure from the rules of tort common law. As a general matter, we discern no reason why a person whose federally guaranteed rights have [*49] been violated should be granted a more restrictive remedy than a person asserting an ordinary tort cause of action. Smith offers us no persuasive reason to the contrary.

Smith's argument, which he offers in several forms, is that an actual-intent [647] standard is preferable to a recklessness standard because it is less vague. He points out that punitive damages, by their very nature, are not awarded to compensate the injured party. See Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 266-267 (1981); Electrical Workers v. Foust, 442 U.S. 42, 48 (1979); Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 349-350 (1974). He concedes, of course, that deterrence of future egregious conduct is a primary purpose of both § 1983, see Newport, supra, at 268; Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 622, 651 (1980); Robertson v. Wegmann, 436 U.S. 584, 591 (1978), and of punitive damages, see Newport, supra, at 268; Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908(1) (1979). But deterrence, he contends, cannot be achieved unless the standard of conduct sought to be deterred is stated with sufficient clarity to enable potential defendants to conform to the law and to avoid the proposed sanction. Recklessness or callous indifference, he argues, is too uncertain a standard to achieve deterrence rationally and fairly. A prison guard, for example, can be expected to know whether he is acting with actual ill will or intent to injure, but not whether he is being reckless or callously indifferent.

[1637] Smith's argument, if valid, would apply to ordinary tort cases as easily as to § 1983 suits; hence, it hardly presents an argument for adopting a different rule under § 1983. In any event, the argument is unpersuasive. While, arguendo, an intent standard may be easier to understand and apply to particular situations than a recklessness standard, we are not persuaded that a recklessness standard is too vague to be fair or useful. In the Milwaukee case, 91 U.S. 489 (1876), we adopted a recklessness standard rather than a gross negligence standard precisely because recklessness would better serve the need for adequate clarity and fair application. Almost [*50] a century later, in the First Amendment context, we held that punitive damages cannot be assessed for defamation in the absence of proof of "knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for the truth." Gertz, 418 U.S., at 349. Our concern in Gertz was that the threat of punitive damages, if not limited to especially egregious cases, might "inhibit the vigorous exercise of First Amendment freedoms," ibid. -- a concern at least as pressing as any urged by Smith in this case. Yet we did not find it necessary to impose an actual-intent standard there. Just as Smith has not shown why § 1983 should give higher protection from punitive damages than ordinary tort law, he has not explained why it gives higher protection than we have demanded under the First Amendment.

[*HR6] [6]
More fundamentally, Smith's argument for certainty in the interest of deterrence overlooks the distinction between a standard for punitive damages and a standard of liability in the first instance. Smith seems to assume that prison guards and other state officials look mainly to the standard for punitive damages in shaping their conduct. We question the premise; we assume, and hope, that most officials are guided primarily by the underlying standards [648] of federal substantive law -- both out of devotion to duty, and in the interest of avoiding liability for compensatory damages. At any rate, the conscientious officer who desires clear guidance on how to do his job and avoid lawsuits can and should look to the standard for actionability in the first instance. The need for exceptional clarity in the standard for punitive damages arises only if one assumes that there are substantial numbers of officers who will not be deterred by compensatory damages; only such officers will seek to guide their conduct by the punitive damages standard. The presence of such officers constitutes a powerful argument against raising the threshold for punitive damages.

REV_00263156

[*HR1D] [1D]
In this case, the jury was instructed to apply a high standard of constitutional right ("physical abuse of such base, inhumane and barbaric proportions as to shock the sensibilities"). It was also instructed, under the principle of [*51] qualified immunity, that Smith could not be held liable at all unless he was guilty of "a callous indifference or a thoughtless disregard for the consequences of [his] act or failure to act," or of "a flagrant or remarkably bad failure to protect" Wade. These instructions are not challenged in this Court, nor were they challenged on grounds of vagueness in the lower courts. Smith's contention that this recklessness standard is too vague to provide clear guidance and reasonable deterrence might more properly be reserved for a challenge seeking different standards of liability in the first instance. As for punitive damages, however, in the absence of any persuasive argument to the contrary based on the policies of § 1983, we are content to adopt the policy judgment of the common law -- that reckless or callous disregard for the plaintiff's rights, as well as intentional violations of federal law, should be sufficient to trigger a jury's consideration of the appropriateness of punitive damages. See Adickes v. S. H. Kress & Co., 398 U.S. 144, 233 (1970) (BRENNAN, J., concurring and dissenting).

IV

[*HR7] [7]
Smith contends that even if § 1983 does not ordinarily require a showing of actual [1638] malicious intent for an award of punitive damages, such a showing should be required in this case. He argues that the deterrent and punitive purposes of punitive damages are served only if the threshold for punitive damages is higher in every case than the underlying standard for liability in the first instance. In this case, while the District Judge did not use the same precise terms to explain the standards of liability for compensatory and punitive damages, the parties agree that there is no substantial difference between the showings required by the two instructions; both apply a standard of reckless or callous indifference to Wade's rights. Hence, Smith argues, the District Judge erred in not requiring a higher standard for punitive damages, namely, actual malicious intent.

This argument incorrectly assumes that, simply because the instructions specified the same threshold of liability for [*52] punitive and compensatory damages, the two forms of damages were equally available to the plaintiff. The argument overlooks a key feature of punitive damages -- that they are never awarded [649] as of right, no matter how egregious the defendant's conduct. "If the plaintiff proves sufficiently serious misconduct on the defendant's part, the question whether to award punitive damages is left to the jury, which may or may not make such an award." D. Dobbs, Law of Remedies 204 (1973) (footnote omitted). n14 Compensatory damages, by contrast, are mandatory; once liability is found, the jury is required to award compensatory damages in an amount appropriate to compensate the plaintiff for his loss. n15 Hence, it is not entirely accurate to say that punitive and compensatory damages were awarded in this case on the same standard. To make its punitive award, the jury was required to find not only that Smith's conduct met the recklessness threshold (a question of ultimate fact), but also that his conduct merited a punitive award of $ 5,000 in addition to the compensatory award (a discretionary moral judgment).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00263157

n14 See also, e. g., Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908, Comment d (1979); J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, Punitive Damages Law and Practice § 5.38 (1981); C. McCormick, Law of Damages 296 (1935); W. Prosser, Law of Torts 13 (4th ed. 1971); K. Redden, Punitive Damages § 3.4 (A) (1980); Chuy v. Philadelphia Eagles Football Club, 595 F.2d 1265, 1277-1278, n. 15 (CA3 1979) (en banc).

n15 The instructions in this case recognized this difference in treatment. The jury was instructed:

"If you find the issues in favor of the plaintiff, then you must award the plaintiff such sum as you believe will fairly and justly compensate the plaintiff for any damages you believe he sustained as a direct result of the conduct of the defendants . . . .

"In addition to actual damages, the law permits the jury, under certain circumstances, to award the injured person punitive and exemplary damages . . . .

"If you find the issues in favor of the plaintiff, and if the conduct of one or more of the defendants is shown to be a reckless or callous disregard of, or indifference to, the rights or safety of others, then you may assess punitive or exemplary damages in addition to any award of actual damages." Tr. 642-643 (emphasis added).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*53] Moreover, the rules of ordinary tort law are once more against Smith's argument. There has never been any general common-law rule that the threshold for punitive damages must always be higher than that for compensatory liability. On the contrary, both the First and Second Restatements of Torts have pointed out that "in torts like malicious prosecution that require a particular antisocial state of mind, the improper motive of the tortfeasor is both a necessary element in the cause of action and a reason for awarding punitive damages." n16 Accordingly, in situations where the standard for compensatory liability is as high as or higher than the usual threshold for punitive damages, most [1639] courts will permit awards of punitive damages without requiring any extra showing. Several courts have so held expressly. n17 [650] Many other courts, not directly addressing the congruence of compensatory and punitive thresholds, have held that punitive damages are available on the same showing of fault as is required by the underlying tort in, for example, intentional infliction of emotional distress, n18 defamation of a public official [*54] or public figure, n19 and defamation covered by a common-law qualified immunity. n20

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n16 Restatement of Torts § 908, Comment c (1939); Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908, Comment c (1979).

Although there is general agreement with the broad principle of § 908, Comment c, there is authority suggesting that the tort of malicious prosecution may have been a poorly chosen illustration of it. See, e. g., Adams v. Whitfield, 290 So. 2d 49 (Fla. 1974); Jordan v. Sauve, 219 Va. 448, 247 S. E. 2d 739 (1978).

n17 Huggins v. Deinhard, 127 Ariz., at 359-360, 621 P. 2d, at 46-47; Fletcher v. Western National Life Insurance Co., 10 Cal. App. 3d 376, 404, 89 Cal. Rptr. 78, 95 (1970); Sere v. Group Hospitalization, Inc., 443 A. 2d 33, 37-38 (D. C. 1982); Meyer v. Nottger, 241 N. W. 2d, at 922; Newton v. Standard Fire Insurance Co., 291 N. C., at 112, 229 S. E. 2d, at 301-302 (dictum); Hall v. May Department Stores Co., 292 Ore. 131, 144-145, 637 P. 2d 126, 134-135 (1981); Chuy v. Philadelphia Eagles Football Club, supra, at 1276-1278 (CA3 1979) (en banc) (Pennsylvania law); Johnson v. Woman's Hospital, 527 S. W. 2d 133, 141-142 (Tenn. App.), cert. denied (Tenn. 1975).

REV_00263158

n18 See, e. g., Fletcher v. Western National Life Insurance Co., supra; Sere v. Group Hospitalization, Inc., supra; Cape Publications, Inc. v. Bridges, 387 So. 2d 436 (Fla. App. 1980); Meyer v. Nottger, supra; Hall v. May Department Stores Co., supra; Chuy v. Philadelphia Eagles Football Club, supra (en banc) (Pennsylvania law). See also Johnson v. Woman's Hospital, supra (tort of outrageous conduct). Contra, Knierim v. Izzo, 22 Ill. 2d 73, 174 N. E. 2d 157 (1961).

n19 See, e. g., Davis v. Schuchat, 166 U. S. App. D. C. 351, 510 F.2d 731 (1975) (District of Columbia law); Fopay v. Noveroske, 31 Ill. App. 3d 182, 334 N. E. 2d 79 (1975); Goldwater v. Ginzburg, 414 F.2d 324 (CA2 1969) (New York law); Sprouse v. Clay Communication, Inc., 158 W. Va. 427, 211 S. E. 2d 674 (1975) (dictum). See also Cape Publications, Inc. v. Bridges, supra (false light).

In citing the cases in this footnote and in n. 20, infra, we intimate no view on any First Amendment issues they may raise.

n20 E. g., Pirre v. Printing Developments, Inc., 468 F.Supp. 1028 (SDNY) (Connecticut and New York law), affirmance order, 614 F.2d 1290 (CA2 1979); Weenig v. Wood, 169 Ind. App. 413, 349 N. E. 2d 235 (1976); Stuempges v. Parke, Davis & Co., 297 N. W. 2d 252 (Minn. 1980); Snodgrass v. Headco Industries, Inc., 640 S. W. 2d 147 (Mo. App. 1982); Miller v. Lear Siegler, Inc., 525 F.Supp. 46 (Kan. 1981) (Oklahoma law). See also n. 19, supra.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

This common-law rule makes sense in terms of the purposes of punitive damages. Punitive damages are awarded in the jury's discretion "to punish [the defendant] for his outrageous conduct and to deter him and others like him from similar conduct in the future." Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908(1) (1979). The focus is on the character of the tortfeasor's conduct -- whether it is of the sort that calls for deterrence and punishment over and above that provided by compensatory awards. If it is of such a character, then it is appropriate to allow a jury to assess punitive damages; and that assessment does not become less appropriate simply because the plaintiff in the case faces a more demanding standard of actionability. To put it differently, society has an interest in deterring and punishing all intentional or reckless invasions of the rights of others, even though it sometimes [*55] chooses not to impose any liability for lesser degrees of fault. n21

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n21 "Moreover, after Carey punitive damages may be the only significant remedy available in some § 1983 actions where constitutional rights are maliciously violated but the victim cannot prove compensable injury." Carlson, 446 U.S., at 22, n. 9.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

As with his first argument, Smith gives us no good reason to depart from the common-law rule in the context of § 1983. He argues that too low a standard of exposure to punitive damages in cases such as this threatens to undermine the policies of his qualified immunity as a prison guard. The same reasoning would apply with at least as much force to, for example, the First Amendment and common-law immunities involved in the defamation cases described above. In any case, Smith overstates the extent of his immunity. Smith is protected from liability [651] for mere negligence because of the need to protect his use of discretion in his day-to-day decisions in the running of a correctional facility. See generally Procunier v. Navarette, 434 U.S. 555 (1978); Wood v. Strickland, 420 U.S. 308 (1975). But the immunity on which [1640] Smith relies is coextensive with the interest it protects. n22 The very fact that the privilege is qualified reflects a recognition that there is

REV_00263159

CORE CONCEPTS - ◆ Hide Concepts

Constitutional Law > Civil Rights Enforcement > Civil Rights Act of 1871
See 42 U.S.C.S. § 1983.

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation
Constitutional Law > Civil Rights Enforcement > Civil Rights Act of 1871
In a case under 42 U.S.C.S. § 1983, in the absence of more specific guidance, the Court looks first to the common law of torts (both modern and as of date of enactment), with such modification or adaptation as might be necessary to carry out the purpose and policy of the statute.

Constitutional Law > Civil Rights Enforcement > Civil Rights Act of 1871
Punitive damages are available in a "proper" 42 U.S.C.S. § 1983 action.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages
Punitive damages may be awarded for conduct that is outrageous, because of the defendant's evil motive or his reckless indifference to the rights of others. Punitive damages in tort cases may be awarded not only for actual intent to injure or evil motive, but also for recklessness, serious indifference to or disregard for the rights of others, or even gross negligence.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages
Constitutional Law > Civil Rights Enforcement > Civil Rights Act of 1871
As a general matter, the Court discerns no reason why a person whose federally guaranteed rights have been violated should be granted a more restrictive remedy than a person asserting an ordinary tort cause of action.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages
Constitutional Law > Civil Rights Enforcement > Civil Rights Act of 1871
Punitive damages, by their very nature, are not awarded to compensate the injured party. Deterrence of future egregious conduct is a primary purpose of both 42 U.S.C.S. § 1983 and of punitive damages.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages
Constitutional Law > Civil Rights Enforcement > Civil Rights Act of 1871
The Court adopts the policy judgment of the common law -- that reckless or callous disregard for the plaintiff's rights, as well as intentional violations of federal law, should be sufficient to trigger a jury's consideration of the appropriateness of punitive damages.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages
A key feature of punitive damages is that they are never awarded as of right, no matter how egregious the defendant's conduct. If the plaintiff proves sufficiently serious misconduct on the defendant's part, the question whether to award punitive damages is left to the jury, which may or may not make such an award. Compensatory damages, by contrast, are mandatory; once liability is found, the jury is required to award compensatory damages in an amount appropriate to compensate the plaintiff for his loss.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages
In situations where the standard for compensatory liability is as high as or higher than the usual threshold for punitive damages, most courts permit awards of punitive

REV_00263142

no societal interest in protecting those uses of a prison guard's discretion that amount to reckless or callous indifference to the rights and safety of the prisoners in his charge. Once the protected sphere of privilege is exceeded, we see no reason why state officers should not be liable for their reckless misconduct on the same basis as private tortfeasors. n23

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n22 As we noted supra, at 33-34, Smith does not challenge the instruction on qualified immunity. We therefore assume for purposes of this case that the instruction was correct. See generally, e. g., Procunier v. Navarette, 434 U.S. 555 (1978).

n23 We reject JUSTICE REHNQUIST's argument, post, at 92, that it somehow makes a difference that this suit was brought in federal court -- as though it were inappropriate or unseemly that federal courts dare to enforce federal rights vigorously. Indeed, one wonders whether JUSTICE REHNQUIST would complain as loudly if this § 1983 suit had been brought in state court, as it could have been. Although JUSTICE REHNQUIST casts his argument as an attack on meddling by federal courts, the true thrust of his complaint seems to be against federal law -- i. e., the Civil Rights Act of 1871. We have explained at length why we think that the policies of that statute call for our holding today.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*56] V

[*HR1E] [1E]
We hold that a jury may be permitted to assess punitive damages in an action under § 1983 when the defendant's conduct is shown to be motivated by evil motive or intent, or when it involves reckless or callous indifference to the federally protected rights of others. We further hold that this threshold applies even when the underlying standard of liability for compensatory damages is one of recklessness. Because the jury instructions in this case are in accord with this rule, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is Affirmed.

DISSENTBY: REHNQUIST; O'CONNOR

DISSENT: JUSTICE REHNQUIST, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE and JUSTICE POWELL join, dissenting.

This case requires us to determine what degree of culpability on the part of a defendant in an action under 42 U. S. C. § 1983 (1976 ed., Supp. V) will permit an award of punitive damages. The District Court instructed the jury that it could award punitive damages in favor of the plaintiff if it concluded that the defendant's conduct constituted "reckless or callous disregard of, or indifference to, the rights or safety of others." In my view, a forthright inquiry into the intent of the 42d Congress and a balanced consideration of the public policies at issue compel the conclusion that the proper standard for an award of punitive damages under § 1983 requires at least some degree of bad faith or improper motive on the part of the defendant.

[*57] The Court rejects a "wrongful intent" standard, instead requiring a [652] plaintiff to show merely "reckless . . . indifference to the federally protected rights of others." The following justifications are offered by the Court for this result: first, the rule in "[most] cases [decided in the last 15 years] under state common law" is "more or less" equivalent to a recklessness standard; second, the Court asserts that a similar rule "[prevailed] at the time when § 1983 was enacted"; and finally, there is an "absence of any persuasive argument" for not applying existing state tort rules to the federal statutory remedies available against state and local officials under § 1983. In my opinion none of these justifications, taken singly or together, supports the Court's result. First, the decisions of state courts in the last decade or so are all but irrelevant in determining the intent of the 42d Congress, and thus, the meaning of § 1983. Second, the Court's characterization of the common-law rules prevailing when § 1983 was enacted is both oversimplified and misleading; in fact, the majority rule in 1871 seems to have been that some sort of "evil intent" -- and not mere recklessness -- was necessary to justify an award of punitive damages. Third, the Court's inability to distinguish a state court's award of punitive [1641] damages against a state officer from a federal court's analogous action under §§ 1983 and 1988 precludes it from adequately assessing the public policies implicated by its decision. Finally, the Court fails utterly to grapple with the cogent and persuasive criticisms that have been offered of punitive damages generally.

REV_00263160

I

Before examining these points, however, it is useful to consider briefly the purposes of punitive damages. A fundamental premise of our legal system is the notion that damages are awarded to compensate the victim -- to redress the injuries that he or she actually has suffered. D. Dobbs, Law of Remedies § 3.1 (1973); C. McCormick, Law of Damages [*58] 1 (1935). In sharp contrast to this principle, the doctrine of punitive damages permits the award of "damages" beyond even the most generous and expansive conception of actual injury to the plaintiff. This anomaly is rationalized principally on three grounds. First, punitive damages "are assessed for the avowed purpose of visiting a punishment upon the defendant." Id., at 275 (emphasis added); Dobbs, supra, § 3.9, at 205; K. Redden, Punitive Damages § 2.1 (1980); Electrical Workers v. Foust, 442 U.S. 42, 48 (1979). Second, the doctrine is rationalized on the ground that it deters persons from violating the rights of others. Ibid. Third, punitive damages are justified as a "bounty" that encourages private lawsuits seeking to assert legal rights. Ibid.

Despite these attempted justifications, the doctrine of punitive damages has been vigorously criticized throughout the Nation's history. Countless cases remark that such damages have never been "a favorite of the law." n1 The year after § 1983 [653] was enacted, the New Hampshire Supreme Court declared: "The idea of [punitive damages] is wrong. It is a monstrous heresy. It is an unsightly and unhealthy excrescence, deforming the symmetry of the body of the law." Fay v. Parker, 53 N. H. 342, 382 (1872). n2 Such remarks reflect a number of deeply held reservations regarding punitive damages, which can only be briefly summarized here.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 See, e. g., Williams v. Bone, 74 Idaho 185, 189, 259 P. 2d 810, 812 (1953); Jolley v. Puregro Co., 94 Idaho 702, 709, 496 P. 2d 939, 946 (1972); Cays v. McDaniel, 204 Ore. 449, 283 P. 2d 658 (1955); First National Bank of Des Plaines v. Amco Engineering Co., 32 Ill App. 3d 451, 455, 335 N. E. 2d 591, 594 (1975). See also the numerous cases cited at 25 C. J. S., Damages § 117(1), p. 1114, n. 18.5 (1966).

n2 See also Spokane Truck & Dray Co. v. Hoefer, 2 Wash. 45, 56, 25 P. 1072, 1075 (1891) ("we believe that the doctrine of punitive damages is unsound in principle, and unfair and dangerous in practice . . ."); Roose v. Perkins, 9 Neb. 304, 315 (1879).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*59] Punitive damages are generally seen as a windfall to plaintiffs, who are entitled to receive full compensation for their injuries -- but no more. Even assuming that a punitive "fine" should be imposed after a civil trial, the penalty should go to the State, not to the plaintiff -- who by hypothesis is fully compensated. Moreover, although punitive damages are "quasi-criminal," Huber v. Teuber, 10 D. C. 484, 490 (1877), their imposition is unaccompanied by the types of safeguards present in criminal proceedings. This absence of safeguards is exacerbated by the fact that punitive damages are frequently based upon the caprice and prejudice of jurors. Walther & Plein, Punitive Damages: A Critical Analysis, 49 Marq. L. Rev. 369 (1965). We observed in Electrical Workers v. Foust, supra, at 50-51, n. 14, that "punitive damages may be employed to punish unpopular defendants," and noted elsewhere that "juries assess punitive damages in wholly unpredictable amounts bearing no necessary relation to the actual harm caused." Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 350 (1974). Finally, the alleged deterrence achieved by punitive damages awards is likely outweighed by the costs -- such as the encouragement of unnecessary litigation and the [1642] chilling of desirable conduct -- flowing from the rule, at least when the standards on which the awards are based are ill-defined. Long, Punitive Damages: An Unsettled Doctrine, 25 Drake L. Rev. 870 (1976).

REV_00263161

Because of these considerations, a significant number of American jurisdictions refuse to condone punitive damages awards. See, e. g., Killibrew v. Abbott Laboratories, 359 So. 2d 1275 (La. 1978); Burt v. Advertiser Newspaper Co., 154 Mass. 238, 28 N. E. 1 (1891) (Holmes, J.); Miller v. Kingsley, 194 Neb. 123, 124, 230 N. W. 2d 472, 474 (1975); Vratsenes v. New Hampshire Auto, Inc., 112 N. H. 71, 73, 289 A. 2d 66, 68 (1972); Pereira v. International Basic Economy Corp., 95 P. R. R. 28 (1967); Maki v. Aluminum Building Products, 73 Wash. 2d 23, 25, 436 P. 2d 186, 187 [*60] (1968). See also Murphy v. Hobbs, 7 Colo. 541, 5 P. 119 (1884) (no punitive damages at common law). Other jurisdictions limit the amount of punitive damages that may be awarded, for example, to the plaintiff's attorney's fees, see Triangle Sheet Metal Works, Inc. v. Silver, 154 Conn. 116, 222 A. 2d 220 (1966), or otherwise, Riggs v. Fremont Insurance Co., 85 Mich. App. 203, 270 N. W. 2d 654 (1978).

Nonetheless, a number of States do permit juries to award punitive damages in certain circumstances. Historically, however, there has been little uniformity among the standards applied in these States for determining on what basis a jury might award punitive damages. See, [654] e. g., Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 Mich. L. Rev. 1257, 1283, and n. 135 (1976); Ellis, Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1, 52-53 (1982) ("the law of punitive damages is characterized by a high degree of uncertainty that stems from the use of a multiplicity of vague, overlapping terms"); Duckett v. Pool, 34 S. C. 311, 325, 13 S. E. 542, 547 (1891); Lynd v. Picket, 7 Minn. 184, 200 (1862).

One fundamental distinction is essential to an understanding of the differences among the various standards for punitive damages. Many jurisdictions have required some sort of wrongful motive, actual intention to inflict harm or intentional doing of an act known to be unlawful -- "express malice," "actual malice," "bad faith," "wilful wrong" or "ill will." n3 [*61] Other [1644] States, however, have [655] permitted punitive damages awards merely upon a showing of very careless or negligent conduct by the defendant -- "gross negligence," "recklessness," [*62] [656] or "extreme carelessness." n4 In sharp contrast to the first set of terms noted above, which connote a requirement of actual ill will towards the plaintiff, these latter phrases import only a degree of negligence. This distinction between [*63] acts that are intentionally harmful and those that are very negligent, or unreasonable, involves a basic difference of kind, not just a variation of degree. W. Prosser, Law of Torts § 34, p. 185 (4th ed. 1971); Restatement (Second) of [*64] Torts § 500, Comment f (1965). The former typically demands inquiry into the actor's subjective motive and purpose, while the latter ordinarily requires only an objective determination of the relative risks and advantages accruing to society from particular behavior. See id., § 282.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n3 See the cases cited in n. 12, infra. Decisions handed down at the time the 42d Congress deliberated leave little question that when a court required a showing of malice in order to recover punitive damages, an inquiry into the actual mental state of the defendant -- his motives, intentions, knowledge, or design -- was required. The Court reasons that, when used in connection with punitive damages, "malice" really meant something akin to recklessness. The cases simply do not support the claim. The term "malice" often was prefaced with the qualifiers "actual" or "express." See, e. g., Barlow v. Lowder, 35 Ark. 492, 496 (1880); Barnett v. Reed, 51 Pa. 190, 191 (1865); Boardman v. Goldsmith, 48 Vt. 403, 407, 411 (1875); Ogg v. Murdock, 25 W. Va. 139, 146-147 (1884). When it was not, the context in which it was used virtually always makes it completely clear that an inquiry into the actual intentions and motives of the defendant was required before punitive damages could be awarded. See, e. g., Brewer v. Watson, 65 Ala. 88, 96-97 (1880); Kelly v. McDonald, 39 Ark. 387, 393 (1882); Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 163-164, 116 P. 530, 539-540 (1911) ("malice of evil motive"); Huber v. Teuber, 10 D. C. 484, 489-491 (1871); Jeffersonville R. Co. v. Rogers, 38 Ind. 116, 124-125 (1871); Curl v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 63 Iowa 417, 428-429, 19 N. W. 308 (1884); Lynd v. Picket, 7 Minn. 184 (1862); Carli v. Union Depot, Street R. & T. Co., 32 Minn. 101, 104, 20 N. W. 89, 90 (1884); Winter v. Peterson, 24 N. J. L. 524, 529 (1854); Haines v. Schultz, 50 N. J. L. 481, 484-485, 14 A. 488, 489 (1888); Causee v. Anders, 20 N. C. 246, 248 (1839); Windham v. Rhame, 11 S. C. L. 283 (1858). And, even standing alone, the term generally was understood to require inquiry into the defendant's mental state: "In malicious injuries, the injurer foresees the specific evil result and wills it either explicitly or implicitly; in negligent injuries he may foresee a probable danger and may rashly risk the consequences, without being chargeable with a malicious intent." F. Wharton, Law of Negligence § 15 (1874).

REV_00263162

Of course, there was a "technical," 19 American and English Encyclopedia of Law 623 (2 ed. 1901), definition of the term that had little to do with actual ill will, but which permitted such a mental state to be presumed from the mere occurrence of an injury. This virtually never was the basis for an award of punitive damages: if it had been, such damages would have been available in every tort action, which never was the rule in any jurisdiction. The Court does not seriously argue otherwise.

Moreover, malice was often the standard employed in jury instructions. E. g., Hays v. Anderson, 57 Ala. 374 (1876); Coleman & Newsome v. Ryan, 58 Ga. 132, 134 (1877); Jeffersonville R. Co. v. Rogers, supra; Lynd v. Picket, supra; Morely v. Dunbar, 24 Wis. 183 (1869). There is not the slightest question that a jury of lay persons would have understood the phrase as requiring actual ill will, desire to injure, or other improper motive on the part of the defendant. "Malice" was defined by a dictionary published at the approximate time § 1983 was enacted as "extreme enmity of heart; a disposition to injure others unjustly for personal gratification or from a spirit of revenge; spite; deliberate mischief." Stormonth's English Dictionary 584 (1885). See also Webster's Dictionary 804 (1869); Worcester's Dictionary 873 (1860); 2 Abbott's Law Dictionary 72 (1879) ("a malignant design of evil . . . is the idea attached to the word in popular use"). In short, the available authorities demonstrate that for purposes of punitive damages at the time of the 42d Congress, "malice" imported an actual ill will, intent, or improper motive requirement.

In a few cases decided roughly contemporaneously with the enactment of § 1983, the terms "wanton" and "willful" were used, together with other phrases, to define the proper standard for an award of punitive damages. The Court finds little "ambiguity or confusion" surrounding these terms, and concludes that they clearly indicate a "recklessness" standard. The cases and commentators disagree. As one treatise flatly states: "[The] term 'wanton' has no peculiar legal signification. It has various meanings, depending on the connection in which it is used." 40 Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure 292-293 (1912). The "connection in which ['wanton'] is used," ibid., in punitive damages cases virtually always reveals that the word was merely an alternative phrasing of the evil motive requirement. See, e. g., Pike v. Dilling, 48 Me. 539 (1861); Wilkinson v. Drew, 75 Me. 360, 363 (1883); Devine v. Rand, 38 Vt. 621 (1866); Boutwell v. Marr, 71 Vt. 1, 11, 42 A. 607, 610 (1899). In the few cases where context does not make clear what was meant by "wanton," several considerations suggest that it was likely that an inquiry into the motives and intentions of the defendant was intended. As a general proposition, when used in criminal contexts, wanton meant that "the act done is of a wilful, wicked purpose." 30 American and English Encyclopedia of Law 3 (2d ed. 1905). In deciding whether to impose the "quasi-criminal" punishment of punitive damages, this meaning likely would have been that intended by courts using the phrase.

REV_00263163

Moreover, as used in a jury instruction -- as occasionally was the case, see, e. g., Jeffersonville R. Co. v. Rogers, supra, at 124-125; Pike v. Dilling, supra -- the term would have been understood by laymen to require some sort of evil or dissolute intention. See Stormonth's English Dictionary 1146 (1885); Webster's Dictionary 1490 (1869); Worcester's Dictionary 1645 (1860). "Wantonly" most frequently was defined as "lewdly" which in turn was regarded as synonymous with "wickedly." Webster's Dictionary 768 (1869); Worcester's Dictionary 834 (1860). The Court's claim that decisions predicating punitive damages on wantonness reflected a recklessness standard is unfounded. The word had no fixed meaning, and decisions using it must be examined individually; to the extent the phrase did have a common meaning, it was, particularly in the context of punitive sanctions, one implying some sort of bad intent.

Likewise, the Court's conclusion regarding the meaning of decisions using the phrase "willful" is unduly simplified. Like "wanton," the phrase had no fixed meaning, 29 American and English Encyclopedia of Law 114-117 (1895); for the meaning intended in a particular context, reference must be had to the decisions at issue, see n. 12, infra. If one must generalize, criminal law again is useful, given the "quasi-criminal" character of punitive damages: "the word, as ordinarily used, means not merely voluntarily, but with bad purpose," 29 American and English Encyclopedia of Law 114 (1895). Even more important, however, is the fact that "willful" seldom, if ever, was an independent standard; rather, "willful injury" or "willfully illegal conduct" were the typical contexts in which the phrase appeared. As to these, even apart from the surrounding language of the punitive damages decisions, it was clear that "[to] constitute wilful injury there must be design, purpose, intent to do wrong and inflict the injury." 30 American and English Encyclopedia of Law 536 (2d ed. 1905). And, of course, a "willful trespass" or other misdeed meant an intentionally wrongful act. Id., at 525-529. Thus, in jurisdictions using the term "willfully," the question generally was whether the defendant knowingly and intentionally harmed the plaintiff, or, alternatively, intentionally committed an act he knew to be tortious or unlawful. In both these cases, inquiry into the wrongful motive of the defendant plainly was demanded; of course, recklessness does not satisfy this requirement.

The Court's discussion of the term "willful negligence" is of little relevance to the common-law standard for punitive damages. The phrase seldom was used, particularly in the punitive damages context, and when it was, it justifiably encountered vigorous criticism. As one court remarked, the phrase "willful neglect" made as much sense as "guilty innocence." Kelly v. Malott, 135 F. 74 (CA7 1905). Faced with what appeared to be a self-contradictory term, the likely reaction of juries, courts, and Members of the 42d Congress would have been to focus on the unequivocal intent and malice requirements common at the time. In short, whatever general statements may have been made in some treatises regarding "wanton" and "willful," in determining the meaning of the terms in this context, a more careful inquiry is demanded. As the foregoing discussion and the cases discussed infra demonstrate, that inquiry makes it clear that the Court's recklessness standard was seldom used at the time of the enactment of § 1983.

n4 "Recklessness" generally was defined as "heedlessness" or "negligence," while synonyms included "careless." Stormonth's English Dictionary 832 (1885). In strict legal terms, recklessness is conduct somewhat more dangerous -- and therefore unreasonable -- than merely negligent conduct, see Restatement (Second) of Torts § 500 (1965); despite this distinction, it is plain that recklessness is different from intentionally harmful conduct not just in this type of degree, but in kind, ibid., Comment f.

REV_00263164

Undoubtedly, the recklessness or objective unreasonableness of particular conduct will be evidence of the intent of the actor, see n. 8, infra. This point has been recognized by commentators on the subject. In 1 J. Sutherland, Law of Damages (1882), for example, the author states the general rule that "[there] is . . . a marked difference legally, as there is practically, between a tort committed with and without malice; between a wrong done in the assertion of a supposed right, and one wantonly committed. . . ." Id., at 716. The author, however, also observed that "such recklessness or negligence as evinces malice or conscious disregard of the rights of others," will support a punitive damages award. Id., at 724 (emphasis added). It is a far different thing to say, as Sutherland does, that the defendant's recklessness is relevant to ascertaining ill will than it is to say, as the Court does, that this lack of care itself justifies punitive damages.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The importance of this distinction is reflected in what one court, speaking not many years before the time § 1983 was enacted, said:

"[In] morals, and the eye of the law, there is a vast difference between the criminality of a person acting mistakenly from a worthy motive, and one committing the same act from a wanton and malignant spirit, and with a corrupt and wicked design." Simpson v. McCaffrey, 13 Ohio 508, 522 (1844).

The Ohio court, applying this distinction, held that punitive damages could only be awarded where some "evil motive" [*65] was involved. Ibid. Oliver Wendell Holmes identified precisely the same distinction between intentionally injurious conduct and careless conduct:

"Vengeance imports a feeling of blame, and an opinion, however distorted by passion, that a wrong has been done. [Even] a dog distinguishes between being stumbled over and being kicked." O. Holmes, The Common Law 3 (1881). n5 [*657] It is illuminating to examine the Court's reasoning with this distinction in mind.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n5 The same point was made in Wise v. Daniel, 221 Mich. 229, 233, 190 N. W. 746, 747 (1922), where the court wrote:

"If a cow kicks a man in the face, the consequent physical hurt may equal that from a kick in the face with a hob-nailed boot, but the 'cussedness' of the cow raises no sense of outrage, while the malicious motive back of the boot kick adds materially to the victim's sense of outrage. If a man employs spite and venom in administering a physical hurt, he must not expect his maliciousness to escape consideration when he is cast to make compensation for his wrong."

See also Inman v. Ball, 65 Iowa 543, 546, 22 N. W. 666, 668 (1885) ("To warrant a jury in inflicting damages by way of punishment, it should appear that the act complained of was a willful or malicious wrong. . . . This is a very different state of mind and purpose from that of a person who has no more than good reason to believe his act is wrongful").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00263165

[1645] II

At bottom, this case requires the Court to decide when a particular remedy is available under § 1983. Until today, ante, at 34-35, n. 2, the Court has adhered, with some fidelity, to the scarcely controversial principle that its proper role in interpreting § 1983 is determining what the 42d Congress intended. That § 1983 is to be interpreted according to this basic principle of statutory construction, 2A C. Sands, Sutherland on Statutory Construction § 45.05 (4th ed. 1972), is clearly demonstrated by our many decisions relying upon the plain language of the section. See, e. g., Parratt v. Taylor, 451 U.S. 527, 534 (1981); Maine v. Thiboutot, 448 U.S. 1, 4 (1980); Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 622, 635 (1980). The Court's opinion purports to pursue an inquiry [*66] into legislative intent, yet relies heavily upon state-court decisions decided well after the 42d Congress adjourned, see ante, at 48, n. 13. I find these cases unilluminating, at least in part because I am unprepared to attribute to the 42d Congress the truly extraordinary foresight that the Court seems to think it had. The reason our earlier decisions interpreting § 1983 have relied upon common-law decisions is simple: Members of the 42d Congress were lawyers, familiar with the law of their time. In resolving ambiguities in the enactments of that Congress, as with other Congresses, it is useful to consider the legal principles and rules that shaped the thinking of its Members. The decisions of state courts decided well after 1871, while of some academic interest, are largely irrelevant to what Members of the 42d Congress intended by way of a standard for punitive damages.

In an apparent attempt to justify its novel approach to discerning the intent of a body that deliberated more than a century ago, the Court makes passing reference to our decisions relating to common-law immunities under § 1983. These decisions provide no support for the Court's analysis, since they all plainly evidence an attempt to discern the intent of the 42d Congress, albeit indirectly, by reference to the common-law principles known to Members of that body. In Tenney v. Brandhove, 341 U.S. 367 (1951), one of our earliest immunity decisions, we phrased the question whether legislators were immune from actions under § 1983 as follows:

"Did Congress by the general language of its 1871 statute mean to overturn the tradition of legislative freedom achieved in England by Civil War and carefully preserved in the formation of State and National Governments here? Did it mean to subject legislators to civil liability for acts done within the sphere of legislative activity?" Id., at 376.

More recently, in Newport v. Fact [658] Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 258 (1981), we said:

[*67] "It is by now well settled that the tort liability created by § 1983 cannot be understood in a historical vacuum. . . . One important assumption underlying the Court's decisions in this area is that members of the 42d Congress were familiar with common-law principles, including defenses previously recognized in ordinary tort litigation, and that they likely intended these common-law principles to obtain, absent specific provisions to the contrary."

Likewise, our other decisions with respect to common-law immunities under § 1983 clearly reveal that our consideration of state common-law rules is only a device to facilitate determination of congressional intent. n6 Decisions from the [*68] 1970's, relied on [1646] by the Court, are almost completely irrelevant to this inquiry into legislative intent.

REV_00263166

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n6 See also Briscoe v. LaHue, 460 U.S. 325, 337, 345 (1983) ("[No] evidence that Congress intended to abrogate the traditional common-law witness immunity in § 1983 actions," and "[in] 1871, common-law immunity for witnesses was well settled"); Imbler v. Pachtman, 424 U.S. 409, 417-418 (1976) ("Tenney squarely presented the issue of whether the Reconstruction Congress had intended to restrict the availability in § 1983 suits of those immunities which historically, and for reasons of public policy, had been accorded to various categories of officials"); Procunier v. Navarette, 434 U.S. 555, 561 (1978) ("Although the Court has recognized that in enacting § 1983 Congress must have intended to expose state officials to damages liability in some circumstances, the section has been consistently construed as not intending wholesale revocation of the common-law immunity afforded government officials"); Carey v. Piphus, 435 U.S. 247, 255 (1978) ("The Members of the Congress that enacted § 1983 did not address directly the question of damages, but the principle that damages are designed to compensate persons for injuries caused by the deprivation of rights hardly could have been foreign to many lawyers in Congress in 1871"); Wood v. Strickland, 420 U.S. 308, 316-318 (1975) (relying upon common-law tradition).

Our decision in Pierson v. Ray, 386 U.S. 547, 553-554 (1967), was based squarely on an attempt to determine what the 42d Congress intended in enacting § 1983. Chief Justice Warren wrote: "Few doctrines were more solidly established at common law than the immunity of judges from liability for damages for acts committed within their judicial jurisdiction, as this Court recognized when it adopted the doctrine, in Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Wall. 335 (1872)." Similarly, our decision in Imbler v. Pachtman, supra, at 421, was "predicated upon a considered inquiry into the immunity historically accorded the relevant official at common law and the interests behind it" (emphasis added).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

III

The Court also purports to rely on decisions, handed down in the second half of the last century by this Court, in drawing up its rule that mere recklessness will support an award of punitive damages. In fact, these decisions unambiguously support an actual-malice standard. The Court rests primarily on Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Quigley, 21 How. 202 (1859), a diversity tort action against a railroad. There, we initially observed that in "certain actions of tort," punitive damages might be awarded, and then described those actions as "[whenever] the injury complained of has been inflicted maliciously or wantonly, and with circumstances of contumely or indignity." Id., at 214. As discussed previously, n. 3, supra, it was relatively clear at the time that "malice" required a [659] showing of actual ill will or intent to injure. Perhaps foreseeing future efforts to expand the rule, however, we hastened to specify the type of malice that would warrant punitive damages: "the malice spoken of in this rule is not merely the doing of an unlawful or injurious act. The word implies that the act complained of was conceived in the spirit of mischief, or of criminal indifference to civil obligations." 21 How., at 214 (emphasis added). It would have been difficult to have more clearly expressed the "actual malice" standard. We explicitly rejected an "implied malice" formulation, and then mandated inquiry into the "spirit" in which a defendant's act was "conceived."

The Court does not address the requirement, explicitly set forth in Quigley, that punitive damages depend on the spirit in which an act was conceived. Instead, focusing only on the words "criminal indifference," ante, at 41-42, n. 9, the Court [*69] suggests that the use of this phrase indicates that Quigley established no requirement of wrongful intent. This is unlikely. An authority on criminal law in the 1870's wrote:

REV_00263167

"In no one thing does criminal jurisprudence differ more from civil more than in its different doctrine concerning the intent. The law, seeking justice between man and man, frequently holds one to the civil consequences of his act, though he neither intended the act, nor suffered himself to be influenced by an evil mind, producing it unintended. . . . But the different nature of the criminal law admits of no such distinction; for crime proceeds only from a criminal mind . . . .

. . . .

". . . There is only one criterion by which the guilt of men is to be tested. It is whether the mind is criminal. . . . It is [1647] therefore a principle of our legal system, as probably it is of every other, that the essence of an offense is the wrongful intent, without which it cannot exist." 1 J. Bishop, Criminal Law §§ 286-287 (5th ed. 1872).

Of course, as the Court notes, there are crimes based on reckless or negligent conduct; it reasons from this that the "criminality" requirement in Quigley is not confined to cases where persons act with wrongful intent. Yet the requirement of "criminal" spirit is far more sensibly interpreted, not as incorporating every possible twist and turn of criminal law, but as reflecting "a principle of our legal system . . . that the essence of an offence is the wrongful intent." 1 Bishop, supra, § 287. Indeed, the Court's argument proves far too much: if we are to assume that the reference to "criminal indifference" in Quigley was meant, as the Court argues, to incorporate every possible mental state that justifies the imposition of criminal sanctions, then punitive damages would be available for simple negligence. Plainly our decision in Quigley does not stand for this remarkable proposition.

[*70] Even assuming some ambiguity in our decision in Quigley, however, the careful discussion of punitive damages in Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. 363, 371 (1852), dispels any doubts. While the Court dismisses this treatment as "merely . . . a sidelight," ante, at 42, n. 9, in Quigley we evidently thought otherwise: in addition to citing and relying explicitly [660] on Day, see 21 How., at 213-214, we also drew our punitive damages standard from that case. Ibid. Day made it perfectly clear that punitive damages cannot be awarded absent actual evil motive. It reasoned that punitive damages are predicated on the "malice, wantonness, oppression, or outrage of the defendant's conduct," and stated the following standard:

"In actions of trespass, where the injury has been wanton and malicious, or gross and outrageous, courts permit juries to add to the measured compensation of the plaintiff which he would have been entitled to recover, had the injury been inflicted without design or intention, something further by way of punishment or example." 13 How., at 371 (emphasis added).

Elsewhere in Day we explained that punitive damages are awarded because of "moral turpitude or atrocity." Ibid. It is obvious from these references that we understood the terms "malice" and "wantonness" as requiring that a defendant have acted with evil purposes or intent to do injury. It was with this understanding of the phrases in question that the Quigley Court framed its rule, and with this background, any fair reading of that decision could not avoid the conclusion that the Court intended to create an actual-malice requirement.

Our decisions following 1871 indicate yet more clearly that we adhered to an actual-malice or intent-to-injure requirement in punitive damages actions. In Milwaukee & St. Paul R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U.S. 489 (1876), a verdict against a railroad in a diversity action was reversed because the jury was erroneously charged that it might award punitive damages on [*71]

REV_00263168

a finding of "gross negligence." The Arms Court first expressed reservations regarding the entire doctrine of punitive damages, remarking that since "the question of intention is always material in an action of tort" in fixing compensatory damages, permitting punitive damages based on the same element posed the threat of double recovery. Nonetheless, acknowledging that the remedy had been approved in Day and Quigley, the Court concluded that the rule set forth in those decisions should be followed. After quoting the passage in Quigley, discussed above, rejecting an implied-malice and adopting an actual-intent-to-injure standard, the Court said:

"[The rule permitting punitive damages is] applicable to suits for personal injuries received through the negligence of others. Redress commensurate to such injuries should be afforded. In ascertaining its extent, the jury may consider [1648] all the facts which relate to the wrongful act of the defendant, and its consequences to the plaintiff; but they are not at liberty to go farther, unless it was done wilfully, or was the result of that reckless indifference to the rights of others which is equivalent to an intentional violation of them. . . . The tort is aggravated by the evil motive, and on this rests the rule of exemplary damages." 91 U.S., at 493 (emphasis added).

Read in context, this language strongly suggests that an actual-malice standard was intended. The rule of exemplary damages "rests" on a defendant's "evil motive," and, while [661] "reckless indifference" may justify some awards of punitive damages, it may do so only in "that" class of "reckless indifference . . . which is equivalent to an intentional violation" of the plaintiff's rights. Ibid. (emphasis added).

This interpretation of the opinion in Arms is the only reading that can be squared with the holding of that case. n7 The [*72] Court held that it was error to give an instruction that "gross negligence" would support a finding of punitive damages. This instruction was condemned because "gross negligence" is "a relative term," and "a word of description, and not of definition." Id., at 495. The Court regarded "gross negligence" as too imprecise and ill-defined a standard to support the extraordinary remedy of punitive damages. Given this, it is more than a little peculiar to read the Arms opinion as supporting the recklessness standard embraced by the Court.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n7 Elsewhere in the Arms opinion, the Court stated that an award of punitive damages is available only where there was "some wilful misconduct, or that entire want of care which would raise the presumption of a conscious indifference to consequences." 91 U.S., at 495 (emphasis added). The Court notes the problems in transforming "indifference . . . into intent," ante, at 43-44, n. 10, without confronting the equally difficult task of transforming "[consciousness]" into inadvertence. Plainly, the question whether a defendant was "conscious" of a certain fact demands inquiry into his subjective mental state, not merely an objective determination of the reasonableness of his conduct. As others have observed: "When willfullness enters, negligence steps out. The former is characterized by advertence, and the latter by inadvertence." Christy v. Butcher, 153 Mo. App. 397, 401, 134 S. W. 1058, 1059 (1911). Yet, on reflection, the Arms formulation need not be regarded as self-contradictory: reckless and negligent conduct may be considered, and are highly probative, in determining whether to award punitive damages. They serve, however, as evidence of "willful misconduct," "evil motive," or a conscious choice to impose known injury on another, not as the standard for liability itself.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

A leading authority on the law of torts has written that there "is often no clear distinction at damages without requiring any extra showing.

REV_00263169

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

Punitive damages are awarded in the jury's discretion to punish the defendant for his outrageous conduct and to deter him and others like him from similar conduct in the future. The focus is on the character of the tortfeasor's conduct -- whether it is of the sort that calls for deterrence and punishment over and above that provided by compensatory awards.

Constitutional Law > Civil Rights Enforcement > Civil Rights Act of 1871

The Court holds that a jury may be permitted to assess punitive damages in an action under 42 U.S.C.S. § 1983 when the defendant's conduct is shown to be motivated by evil motive or intent, or when it involves reckless or callous indifference to the federally protected rights of others. It further holds that this threshold applies even when the underlying standard of liability for compensatory damages is one of recklessness.

◆ Show Lawyers' Edition Display

SYLLABUS: Respondent, while an inmate in a Missouri reformatory for youthful first offenders, was harassed, beaten, and sexually assaulted by his cellmates. He brought suit under 42 U. S. C. § 1983 in Federal District Court against petitioner, a guard at the reformatory, and others, alleging that his Eighth Amendment rights had been violated. Because of petitioner's qualified immunity, as a prison guard, from § 1983 liability, the trial judge instructed the jury that respondent could recover only if petitioner was guilty of "gross negligence" or "egregious failure to protect" respondent. The judge also charged the jury that it could award punitive damages in addition to actual damages if petitioner's conduct was shown to be "a reckless or callous disregard of, or indifference to, the rights or safety of others." The District Court entered judgment on a verdict finding petitioner liable and awarding both compensatory and punitive damages. The Court of Appeals affirmed.

Held:

1. Punitive damages are available in a proper case under § 1983. While there is little in the legislative history of § 1 of the Civil Rights Act of 1871 (from which § 1983 is derived) concerning the damages recoverable for the tort liability created by the statute, the availability of punitive damages was accepted as settled law by nearly all state and federal courts at the time of enactment. Moreover, this Court has rested decisions on related issues on the premise that punitive damages are available under § 1983. Pp. 34-38.

2. A jury may be permitted to assess punitive damages in a § 1983 action when the defendant's conduct involves reckless or callous indifference to the plaintiff's federally protected rights, as well as when it is motivated by evil motive or intent. The common law, both in 1871 and now, allows recovery of punitive damages in tort cases not only for actual malicious intent, but also for reckless indifference to the rights of others. Neither the policies nor the purposes of § 1983 require a departure from the common-law rule. Petitioner's contention that an actual-intent standard is preferable to a recklessness standard because it is less vague, and would more readily serve the purpose of deterrence of future egregious conduct, is unpersuasive. Cf. Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323. Pp. 38-51.

3. The threshold standard for allowing punitive damages for reckless or callous indifference applies even in a case, such as here, where the underlying standard of liability for compensatory damages is also one of recklessness. There is no merit to petitioner's contention that actual malicious intent should be the standard for punitive damages because all between ['recklessness'] and 'gross' negligence, and the two have tended to merge and take on the same meaning, of an aggravated form of negligence . . . ." W. Prosser, Law of Torts § 34, p. 185 (4th ed. 1971); see also n. 3, supra. Given the virtual identity of the two standards, a Court that held that "gross negligence" was too imprecise a standard to warrant a punitive damages award would not likely have intended its dicta to be read as adopting "recklessness" as an alternative standard. In contrast, a standard of culpability demanding inquiry into the wrongful mental state of the defendant -- "evil motive," [*73] "conceived in the spirit of mischief, or of criminal indifference," or "design or intention" to do injury -- is different in kind, not just degree, from the "very careless" standard explicitly rejected by the Arms Court. This standard is a significant step away from the "relative" and ill-defined terms of "description" that the Court thought so unsatisfactory; it seems obvious that the Arms Court meant to take just such a step.

REV_00263143

Moreover, the meaning of the Arms decision was made abundantly clear in a case decided the same day Arms was handed down. In Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Eyser, 91 U.S. 495 (1876), the Court reversed a decision of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Colorado holding that on "no view of the evidence was the [1649] court below justified in instructing the jury that exemplary damages could be recovered." [662] The Reporter of Decisions explained: "The [defendant's] omission to . . . give some other proper warning . . . was an act of negligence, entitling the plaintiff to compensatory damages. But there was nothing to authorize the jury to consider the omission as wilful: on the contrary, the evidence rebuts every presumption that there was any intentional wrong." Id., at 496 (emphasis added). n8 The defendant in the case, who left electrical wires strung several feet above the ground across a city street in Denver without any real warning, may well have been reckless; certainly, as in fact occurred, a jury could have reached this conclusion. But this was irrelevant: in order to recover punitive damages an "intentional wrong" is what was needed.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n8 This Court's understanding of the term "willfully" was clearly stated in Felton v. United States, 96 U.S. 699, 702 (1878), where, in an action to recover a $ 1,000 penalty from a distiller, the Court said: "Doing or omitting to do a thing knowingly and wilfully, implies not only a knowledge of the thing, but a determination with a bad intent . . . ." Likewise, it quoted with approval from a Massachusetts decision stating that "wilfully" ordinarily means "not merely 'voluntarily,' but with a bad purpose." Ibid. See also n. 3, supra.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*74] Perhaps, by minute dissection of stray clauses in a few of the foregoing decisions, combined with a studied refusal to confront the plain intent underlying phrases like "evil motive," "design and intention," and "intentional wrong," one could discern some shadowy rule of liability resting on recklessness. Ante, at 39-48. Ninety years ago, however, the Court, after an exhaustive analysis of the foregoing decisions, explicitly and unambiguously reached precisely the opposite conclusion. In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U.S. 101 (1893), the Court considered whether punitive damages were properly awarded against a railroad in a diversity action. The Court noted that the law on the subject was "well-settled," id., at 107, and paraphrased the Quigley standard: The jury may award punitive damages "if the defendant has acted wantonly, or oppressively, or with such malice as implies a spirit of mischief or criminal indifference to civil obligations." 147 U.S., at 107. Then, as it had in Day and Arms, the Court explained this formulation, observing that a "guilty intention on the part of the defendant is required in order to charge him with exemplary or punitive damages." 147 U.S., at 107 (emphases added). In addition, the Court quoted, with plain approval, the following statements of the New Jersey Supreme Court in Haines v. Schultz, 50 N. J. L. 481, 484, 14 A. 488, 489 (1888): "The right to award [punitive damages] rests primarily upon the single ground -- wrongful motive. . . . It is the wrongful personal intention to injure that calls forth the penalty. To this wrongful intent knowledge is an essential prerequisite." 147 U.S., at

REV_00263170

110. The Court went on to note that "criminal intent [is] necessary to warrant the imposition of [punitive] damages," id., at 111, and elsewhere wrote that "wanton, malicious or oppressive intent" and "unlawful and criminal intent," were required for the award of such damages. Ibid.; id., at 114. Prentice simply leaves no question that actual wrongful intent, not just recklessness, was required for a [*75] recovery of punitive damages, and, in addition, [663] that this was what "well-settled" law always had required. n9

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n9 The Court does not attempt to explain the unequivocal and repeated statements in Prentice regarding the necessity of showing "guilty intention." It relies instead on the Court's quotation from a state case that observed in passing that punitive damages have been assessed on "evidence of such willfullness, recklessness or wickedness . . . as amounted to criminality." 147 U.S., at 115. Not only is this statement at best ambiguous, but the Court mentioned the state case only in its discussion of principles of respondeat superior, not in its earlier discussion of the standard for punitive damages.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[1650] And, once again, in Scott v. Donald, 165 U.S. 58, 86 (1897), we made it completely clear that actual malice was a prerequisite to a recovery of punitive damages. In Scott, we held that a complaint alleging a constitutional tort stated facts sufficient to support a claim for punitive damages. In so holding we carefully analyzed our prior decisions respecting punitive damages beginning with Day and continuing through Prentice. We repeated and applied the "well-settled" rule contained in those cases: "Damages have been defined to be the compensation which the law will award for an injury done, and are said to be exemplary and allowable in excess of the actual loss, where a tort is aggravated by evil motive, actual malice, deliberate violence or oppression." 165 U.S., at 86 (emphasis added). The point could not be clearer. The Court today fashions a federal standard for punitive damages, see 42 U. S. C. § 1988 (1976 ed., Supp. V), yet steadfastly refuses to follow those of our decisions speaking to that point. If it did, it would adopt a standard requiring "evil motive, actual malice, deliberate violence or oppression." Ibid.

In addition, the decisions rendered by state courts in the years preceding and immediately following the enactment of § 1983 attest to the fact that a solid majority of jurisdictions took the view that the standard for an award of punitive damages [*76] included a requirement of ill will. n10 To be sure, a few jurisdictions [664] followed a broader standard; a careful review of the decisions at the time uncovers a number of decisions [*77] [1651] that contain some reference to "recklessness." And equally clearly, in more recent years many courts have adopted a standard including "recklessness" as the minimal degree of culpability warranting punitive damages. n11

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n10 Legal treatises in use in the 1870's do not support the majority's assertion that punitive damages could be awarded on a showing of gross negligence, recklessness, or serious indifference to the rights of others. Instead, they support the rather unsurprising proposition that among the courts of the several States in the late 1870's, several views regarding punitive damages had evolved. Addison's Treatise on the Law of Torts says "in all cases of malicious injuries and trespasses accompanied by personal insult, or oppressive and cruel conduct, juries are told to give what are called exemplary damages." 2 C. Addison, Law of Torts 645 (1876) (emphasis added). The treatise continues: "Wherever the wrong or injury is of a grievous nature, done with a high hand, or is accompanied with deliberate intention to injure, or with words of contumely and abuse, and by circumstances of aggravation, the jury" may award punitive damages. Ibid. In a footnote Addison indicates that "malice" has been interpreted in several ways, including "an intention to set at defiance the legal rights of others," "wantonness or a willful disregard of the rights of others," "such a wanton character that it might properly be said to be willful," and "a disregard for the rights of others." Id., at 646-647, n. 1. Plainly, as discussed in greater detail below, different States applied different rules, and that is all the treatise writer purported to say.

REV_00263171

A similar pattern is followed in other hornbooks popular at the time. The authors make reference to some decisions articulating an actual-ill-will standard, while citing as well to decisions accepting a recklessness rule. Compare J. Deering, Law of Negligence § 415, text accompanying n. 1 (1886), with id., at text accompanying n. 7; G. Field, Law of Damages § 78 (1876) ("The rule we have furnished not only requires that the act done should be injurious, and that actual loss be sustained thereby to the plaintiff, but also that it be willfully injurious. The animus of the wrongdoer is an important question to be considered in such cases, as it is in criminal cases. The wrong must be intended, and the result of a spirit of mischief, wantonness, or of criminal indifference to civil obligations, or the rights of others, from which malice may well be inferred"), with id., § 84, at 91, n. 4 (gross negligence applied in an Iowa case); F. Hilliard, Law of Remedies for Torts 598-599 (2d ed. 1873) (detailing different standards prevailing); 2 S. Thompson, Law of Negligence 1264-1265 (1880) (noting conflicting views regarding intent requirement).

Moreover, Professor Greenleaf, one of the most respected legal commentators of his time, entirely denied the existence of any doctrine of punitive damages. 2 S. Greenleaf, Law of Evidence § 253 (15th ed. 1892). While his view has prevailed in a substantial minority of American jurisdictions, see supra, in many States it concededly has not been followed. Its importance for our purposes, however, lies in the fact that it was the considered judgment of a respected scholar, published and available at the time § 1983 was enacted. Likewise, in 1 J. Sutherland, Law of Damages (1882), the author notes that "bad motive" is necessary for an award of punitive damages, while permitting such a motive to be inferred from proof of negligent or reckless conduct. Id., at 716, 724. Similarly, Judge Mayne's Treatise on Damages, indicated that the applicable standard for an award of punitive damages required some sort of improper motive. J. Mayne, Law of Damages 41 (1856).

n11 See the cases cited by the Court, ante, at 48, n. 13. In this regard, it is useful to consider a position commonly held in 1871, and not infrequently followed today. A number of States adhered to the requirement that actual ill will towards a victim was the standard for punitive damages, but permitted jurors to infer this mental state from the character of the tortfeasor's conduct. E. g., Malone v. Murphy, 2 Kan. 250, 263 (1864) (jury "may infer malice from want of probable cause, but they are not bound so to infer it"); Lyon v. Hancock, 35 Cal. 372, 376 (1868) ("Malice . . . is generally to be inferred from facts and circumstances"); Farwell v. Warren, 51 Ill. 467, 472 (1869) ("actuated by malice" which may be inferred from "wanton, willful or reckless disregard"); Addair v. Huffman, 156 W. Va. 592, 195 S. E. 2d 739 (1973); Columbus Finance, Inc. v. Howard, 42 Ohio St. 2d 178, 327 N. E. 2d 654 (1975). As one lower court described it, "fraud, oppression or malice" are necessary to recover punitive damages, but these elements "may be inferred from acts constituting such gross negligence as to warrant the inference of or be deemed equivalent to an evil intent." Schuman v. Chatman, 184 Okla. 224, 227, 86 P. 2d 615, 618 (1938). It is important to appreciate, however, that there is a fundamental distinction between the standard for punitive damages and the evidence the jury may rely upon in meeting that standard. To say that reckless behavior may, with other evidence, permit the jury to infer a particular mental state, is not to say, as the Court does, that reckless behavior alone satisfies the punitive damages claimant's standard of proof.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Most clear of all, however, is the fact that at about the time § 1983 was enacted a considerable number of the 37 States [*78] then belonging to the Union required some showing of wrongful intent before punitive damages could be awarded. n12 As the cases [*668] [1654] set out in the margin reveal, it is but a statement [*79] of the obvious that "evil motive" was the general standard for punitive damages in many States at the time of the 42d Congress.

REV_00263172

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n12 See, e. g., Roberts v. Heim, 27 Ala. 678, 683 (1855) ("the law allows [punitive damages] whenever the trespass is committed in a rude, aggravating, or insulting manner, as malice may be inferred from these circumstances"); Brewer v. Watson, 65 Ala., at 96-97 ("it is clear . . . that where [a public] officer acts in good faith, he is not liable to exemplary damages"; "there can clearly be no recovery of exemplary . . . damages, without proof of" acts committed "maliciously, and with intent to injure"); Hays v. Anderson, 57 Ala., at 378; Barlow v. Lowder, 35 Ark., at 496 (instruction that "exemplary damages [are] allowed as a punishment for torts committed with fraud, actual malice, or deliberate violence or oppression" held a "textbook principle"); Kelly v. McDonald, 39 Ark., at 393 ("Exemplary damages ought not to be given, unless in cases of intentional violation of another's right, or when a proper act is done with an excess of force or violence, or with a malicious intent to injure another in his person or property"); Ward v. Blackwood, 41 Ark. 295, 299-301 (1883) (emphasis added) (punitive damages denied because "there was no evidence of previous malice, nor of deliberate cruelty, only of hot blood and a certain recklessness"; charge requiring "a wanton and willful manner, and under circumstance of outrage, cruelty and oppression, or with malice" approved); Dorsey v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 553, 558 (1860) (holding that absence of "bad faith," "wanton or malicious motives," or "willfully unjust or oppressive" conduct barred punitive damages; reference in dicta to "reckless disregard" not applied); Nightingale v. Scannell, 18 Cal. 315, 325 (1861); Lyon v. Hancock, supra; Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal., at 163-164, 116 P., at 539-540 ("malice of evil motive" necessary to recover punitive damages in California); Doroszka v. Lavine, 111 Conn. 575, 150 A. 692 (1930) (reviewing cases limiting punitive damages to amount of attorney's fees); Dibble v. Morris, 26 Conn. 416, 426-427 (1857) ("settled" that jury can award "vindictive [damages] in proportion to the degree of malice or wantonness evinced by the defendant"); Welch v. Durand, 36 Conn. 182 (1869) (special rule for ultrahazardous activities); Dalton v. Beers, 38 Conn. 529 (1871); Huber v. Teuber, 10 D. C., at 489-491 (punitive damages "are sometimes allowable . . . as punishment of a quasi-criminal character for the wantonness and malice which inspired the wrong of the defendant"; "malignant motives" and "improper motive" required); Yahoola River Mining Co. v. Irby, 40 Ga. 479, 482 (1869) ("bona fide belief" by defendant that he was acting lawfully bars punitive damages); Green v. Southern Express Co., 41 Ga. 515 (1871) (jury charge requiring "a desire to injure the accused" approved); Coleman & Newsome v. Ryan, 58 Ga., at 134, 135 (instruction that jury might award "vindictive damages, if they believed that the conduct of [the defendant] was malicious, and for the purpose of breaking up plaintiff's business"); Jeffersonville R. Co. v. Rogers, 38 Ind., at 124-125 (charge requiring "the spirit of oppressive malice or wantonness" approved); Moore v. Crose, 43 Ind. 30, 34-35 (1873) (punitive damages award reversed since "[there] [were] no elements of malice, insult, or deliberate oppression in the case . . . [and] appellant was acting under the belief that he had a valid right"); Thomas v. Isett, 1 Greene 470, 475 (Iowa 1848) ("wanton, rude, and aggravating manner, indicating malice or a desire to injure," needed for punitive damages); Frink & Co. v. Coe, 4 Greene 555, 559 (Iowa 1854) (special rule for common carriers); Brown v. Allen, 35 Iowa 306, 311 (1872) (instruction that malice-in-law would support punitive damages reversed; "This was clearly erroneous. It is an abrogation of the distinction between a simple trespass and its consequences, and a malicious one justifying exemplary damages. A simple trespass, because unlawful, might be, under the instruction, visited with punitive damages, however honestly the defendants may have believed they had the lawful right to take possession of the property in question"); Fuller v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 31 Iowa 187, 204 (1871); Curl v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 63 Iowa, at 428-429, 19 N. W. 308 (instruction permitting punitive damages if defendant "willfully used unnecessary force" held improper: "This instruction is erroneous in that it does not make the recovery of exemplary damages dependent upon malice of the wrong doer. It holds that the willful use of unnecessary force is a ground for allowing exemplary damages. An act willfully done may not be accompanied by malice, that is, a spirit of enmity, malevolence or ill will, with a desire to harm and a disposition to injure"); Inman v. Ball, 65 Iowa, at 465, 22 N. W., at 668 (Rothrock, J.) ("To warrant a jury in inflicting damages by way of punishment, it should appear that the act complained of was a willful or malicious wrong. There must be a purpose or intent to harass, oppress, or injure another. This is a very different state of mind and purpose from that of a person who has no more than good reason to believe his act is wrongful"); Wentworth v. Blackman, 71 Iowa 255, 256-257, 32 N. W. 311, 311-312 (1887) (Rothrock, J.) (reversing award of punitive damages; "malicious act," which demands inquiry into defendant's "motives," required); Cameron v. Bryan, 89 Iowa 214, 56 N. W. 434 (1893) (Rothrock, J.) ("willful and malicious" conduct necessary); Stinson v. Buisson, 17 La. 567, 572 (1841) ("redress in damages should . . . be proportioned to the injury sustained, unless it be where they are given as an example to deter others from similar conduct in future, and really for the purpose of punishing men for their bad motives and intentions"); Biggs v. D'Aquin Bros., 13 La. Ann. 21, 22 (1858) (no punitive damages awardable against party acting in "good faith"); Wilkinson v. Drew, 75 Me., at 363 (while punitive damages are recoverable "in case as well as trespass," to recover them jury must find "that the act or omission of the defendant was willful and wanton," with "wantonly" explicitly defined as "indicating wicked intent"); Pike v. Dilling, 48 Me., at 543 (court approves instruction that punitive damages are awardable if defendant acted "wantonly," quoting statement requiring that defendant acted "'under the influence of actual malice, or with the intention to injure the plaintiff'"); Schindel v. Schindel, 12 Md. 108, 122-123 (1858) ("The man who, from bad and malicious intentions, commits a trespass, ought, in justice, to be dealt with more harshly than one who acts from no vicious feelings, but ignorantly"); Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. Blocher, 27 Md. 277, 287 (1867); Zimmerman v. Helser, 32 Md. 274, 278 (1869) (no punitive damages unless the defendant acts by "mere pretence for the purpose of perpetrating a wrong"); Friend v. Hamill, 34 Md. 298, 304-307, 314 (1870) ("malice, ill-will or corruption" necessary for punitive damages); Ellis v. Brockton Publishing Co., 198 Mass. 538, 542, 84 N. E. 1018, 1019 (1908) (punitive damages have not been and are not recoverable); Hyatt v. Adams, 16 Mich. 180, 198-199 (1867) (refusal to charge that "if from the evidence no evil motive be imputed to the defendant, then the rule of compensation is fixed by law, and . . . exemplary damages are not allowable," reversed); Goetz v. Ambs, 27 Mo. 28, 32-33 (1858) ("[Intention] . . . only becomes material in considering the question of exemplary damages. If the injury is not intentional, but results simply from a want of proper care, nothing more should be recovered than will compensate for the actual damage. . . . [But if] wilfulness -- a wrongful act, done intentionally . . ." exists, punitive damages are available); McKeon v. Citizens' R. Co., 42 Mo. 79, 87 (1867) (neither recklessness nor gross negligence supports punitive damages, which "can be given, if ever in a civil case, only in cases where the injury is intentionally, willfully, and maliciously done"); Lynd v. Picket, 7 Minn., at 201 (instruction that if defendants, knowing plaintiff's property "to be exempt, wilfully and maliciously attached [it with] the purpose of harassing and oppressing" him, then punitive damages are awardable explicitly approved as indicating "the facts necessary to be proved in order to justify [the jury] in giving exemplary damages"; "malice" includes acts defendant "[knows]" are "wrong and unlawful"); Carli v. Union Depot, Street R. & T. Co., 32 Minn., at 104, 20 N. W., at 90 (punitive damages "properly awarded only where the trespass appears to have been wanton, willful, or malicious, -- a conscious violation of the [plaintiff's] rights"); Whitfield v. Whitfield, 40 Miss. 352, 366-367 (1866) (punitive damages require "malice, fraud, oppression, or wilful wrong"; no punitive damages if defendant "acts in good faith, and with no intent injuriously to affect plaintiff's rights"); Memphis & Charleston R. Co. v. Whitfield, 44 Miss. 466, 488 (1870) (actual-intent rule "modified somewhat in . . . application, particularly to passenger carriers by steam"); Fay v. Parker, 53 N. H. 342 (1872) (no prior decision adopts rule of punitive damages; doctrine rejected entirely); Winter v. Peterson, 24 N. J. L., at 529 (if official acted "not only . . . without authority, but maliciously, he was liable to exemplary damages"; "maliciously" means "from improper motives"); Haines v. Schultz, 50 N. J. L. 481, 484-485, 14 A. 488-489 (1888) (punitive damages "[rest] primarily on a single ground -- wrongful motive. . . . [It] is the wrongful personal intention to injure that calls forth the penalty"; "punitive damages [rest] upon a wrongful motive of the defendant"); King v. Patterson, 49 N. J. L. 417, 419-420, 9 A. 705, 706 (1887) (while "malice" may not always mean actual ill will, when awarding punitive damages "malicious motive was required"); Causee v. Anders, 20 N. C., at 248 (punitive damages proper where defendant was "actuated by malice and a total disregard of the laws"); Louder v. Hinson, 49 N. C. 369, 371 (1857) (charge requiring desire "to wreak their vengeance" on the plaintiffs and "harass and insult them" approved); Roberts v. Mason, 10 Ohio St. 277, 279-280 (1859); Simpson v. McCaffrey, 13 Ohio 508, 522 (1884) (punitive damages available "for the wicked, corrupt, and malignant motive and design, which prompted [the guilty party] to the wrongful act"); Rayner v. Kinney, 14 Ohio St. 283, 287 (1863) (exemplary damages are "a punishment which should only attach to a wrongful intention. [Where] no wrongful intention is found, there is no just ground for the punishment of the defendant"); Barnett v. Reed, 51 Pa., at 191, 196 (instruction that, absent "actual malice or design to injure, the rule is compensatory damages; but where actual malice exists, a formed design to injure and oppress, the jury may give vindictive damages," termed "unexceptionable"); M'Cabe v. Morehead, 1 Watts & Serg. 513, 516 (Pa. 1841); Herdic v. Young, 55 Pa. 176, 177 (1867); McDevitt v. Vial, 7 Sadler 585, 590, 11 A. 645, 648-649 (Pa. 1887) (charge requiring "a high handed spirit, and a disposition to oppress and do wrong" approved); Herreshoff v. Tripp, 15 R. I. 92, 94, 23 A. 104, 105 (1885) (punitive damages "only when the defendant has acted maliciously or in bad faith"); Windham v. Rhame, 11 S. C. L., at 285-287 (where evidence "[shows] a malicious motive . . . damages may be awarded not only to recompense the plaintiff but to punish the defendant"; jury must "ascertain if the act be the result of accident or negligence, or of deliberate and evil purpose," and in latter instance, where injury results from "malfeasance," "an amount beyond the pecuniary loss should be given, by way of punishment"; "motive," "malicious purpose," and "intention" dispositive; statement that punitive damages require showing that defendant "malevolently with a view to harass, vex and insult the plaintiff" quoted with approval); Cole v. Tucker, 6 Tex. 266, 268 (1851) (punitive damages if "fraud, malice, or wilful wrong" or "a desire to injure" exist); Neill v. Newton, 24 Tex. 202, 204 (1859) (failure to allege "aggravated circumstances of misrepresentation and deception" bars punitive damages); Bradshaw v. Buchanan, 50 Tex. 492, 494 (1878) (punitive damages award reversed because "there is no evidence tending to show that appellants were actuated by malice . . . or that they [acted] wantonly, or with the intent to vex, harass, injure, or oppress him. On the contrary, the evidence strongly tends to show that they were actuated by no such motive"); Parsons v. Harper, 57 Va. 64, 78 (1860) (dictum; if an "act were done without malice, the party might not be liable to exemplary and vindictive damages"); Virginia Railway & Power Co. v. House, 148 Va. 879, 886, 193 S. E. 480, 482 (1927) ("well settled" law requires reversing punitive damages award because there was no evidence of "any malicious or willful wrong"); Borland v. Barrett, 76 Va. 128 (1882) (punitive damages no different from compensatory damages in Virginia); Devine v. Rand, 38 Vt., at 626 (emphasis added) (Since punitive damages "[depend] entirely upon the character and purpose of the defendant's acts, the usual evidence must be admissible to ascertain the disposition and intention which prompted them"; punitive damages depend on "wickedness and wilfullness"); Lombard v. Batchelder, 58 Vt. 558, 559-560, 5 A. 511, 512 (1886) ("malicious," "improper," and "evil" motive necessary); Boutwell v. Marr, 71 Vt., at 11, 42 A., at 610 ("wanton desire to injure"); Earl v. Tupper, 45 Vt. 275, 287-288 (1873) (after discussing rule in some States, court holds that punitive damages are "to be governed wholly by the malice or wantonness of the defendant"); Hoadley v. Watson, 45 Vt. 289, 292 (1873) (punitive damages available "on account of the bad spirit and wrong intention of the defendant"); Boardman v. Goldsmith, 48 Vt., at 407, 411 (instruction requiring that defendant "acted with express malice, intending to injure or disgrace the plaintiff" approved); Ogg v. Murdock, 25 W. Va., at 146-147 (approves, as "correct rule," statement "when . . . there is no actual malice or design to injure, the rule is to allow compensatory damages; but when actual malice exists, a formed design to injure and oppress, the jury may give vindictive damages"; holds "there being no proof of an intent to injure and oppress the plaintiff, the jury were not authorized to find that the defendant was actuated by malice and consequently they were not justified in giving vindictive damages"); McWilliams v. Bragg, 3 Wis. 424, 431 (1854) ("where . . . injury is inflicted under circumstances of aggravation, insult or cruelty, with vindictiveness and malice" punitive damages available); Barnes v. Martin, 15 Wis. *240, *245 (1862) (punitive damages not awardable "unless the jury should find that the acts [of the defendant] were without apparent cause, and proceeded from wanton or malicious motives"); Morely v. Dunbar, 24 Wis. 183, 186-187 (1869) (charge requiring "aggravation, insult, or cruelty, with vindictiveness or malice" approved; "malice" and "motive" are basis for punitive damages); Hooker v. Newton, 24 Wis. 292, 293 (1869) (approving charge requiring malice and intent to injure); Hamlin v. Spaulding, 27 Wis. 360, 364 (1870) (defendant must act "in bad faith, and, if not with actual malice, at least for the purpose of serving some ulterior object outside of the administration of criminal justice"); Pickett v. Crook, 20 Wis. 358 (1866) (not followed outside context of failure to control vicious animals); Topolewski v. Plankinton Packing Co., 143 Wis. 52, 70, 126 N. W. 554, 560 (1910) ("the court has uniformly held that punitory damages are not allowable at all without the element of malice[;] the defendant [must have] acted with bad intent of some sort").

REV_00263173

REV_00263174

REV_00263175

The Court's treatment of law prevailing in 1871 relies principally upon state-court decisions from the 1880's and 1890's. These cases are admittedly somewhat more relevant to what the 42d Congress intended than the 20th-century cases cited by the Court; particularly if they explain prior decisions, these cases may reflect a well-settled understanding in a particular jurisdiction of the law regarding punitive damages. Yet, decisions handed down well after 1871 are considerably less probative of legislative intent than decisions rendered before or shortly subsequent to the enactment of § 1983: it requires no detailed discussion to demonstrate that a Member of the 42d Congress would have been more influenced by a decision from 1870 than by one from the 1890's. Accordingly, the bulk of the cases cited by the Court must be ignored; they simply illustrate the historical shift in legal doctrine, pointed out in text, from an actual-intent standard to a recklessness standard. If the Court is serious in its attention to 19th-century law, analysis must focus on the common law as it stood at the time of the 42d Congress. Here, notwithstanding the Court's numerous attempts to explain why decisions do not mean what they plainly say, it remains clear that in a majority of jurisdictions actual malice was required in order to recover punitive damages.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*80] In short, a careful examination of the decisions available to the Members of the 42d Congress reveals a portrait different in important respects from that painted by the Court. While [*81] a few jurisdictions may have adopted a more lenient, if less precise, standard of recklessness, the majority's claim that the prevailing standard in 1871 was one of recklessness simply [*82] cannot be sustained. The decisions of this Court, which were likely well known to federal legislators, supported an animus requirement. As we said in Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. 363 [*83] (1852), and Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Quigley, 21 How. 202 (1859), a "spirit of mischief" was necessary for an award of punitive damages. Among the States, [*84] there were many approaches to the imposition of punitive damages, with a variety of standards prevailing throughout the Nation. Nonetheless, a solid majority of jurisdictions followed the rule that punitive damages require some element of "evil motive," "wickedness," or "formed design to injure and oppress." Thus, if we are to adhere to the principle, consistently followed in our previous decisions, that the Members of the 42d Congress intended § 1983 to reflect existing common-law rules, it is very likely that wrongful animus was a prerequisite for an award of punitive damages.

IV

Even apart from this historical background, I am persuaded by a variety of additional factors that the 42d Congress intended a "wrongful intent" requirement. As mentioned above, punitive damages are not, and never have been, a favored remedy. In determining whether Congress, not bound by stare decisis, n13 would have embraced this often-condemned doctrine, it is worth considering the judgment of one of the most respected commentators in the field regarding the desirability of a legislatively enacted punitive damages remedy: "It is probable that, in the framing of a model code of damages to-day for use in a country unhampered by [*85] legal tradition, the doctrine of exemplary damages would find no place." C. McCormick, Law of Damages 276 (1935).

REV_00263176

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n13 In 1864 the Kansas Supreme Court, although bound by prior precedent, agreed with Professor Greenleaf's condemnation of punitive damages, see n. 10, supra, and said "were the question an open one, we should be inclined to [compensation only]." Malone v. Murphy, 2 Kan., at 261. See also Sullivan v. Oregon Railway & Navigation Co., 12 Ore. 392, 7 P. 508 (1885).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In deciding whether Congress heeded such advice, it is useful to consider the language of § 1983 itself -- which should, of course, be the starting point for any inquiry into legislative intent. Section 1983 provides:

[1655] "Every person who, under color [669] of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State . . . subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress" (emphasis added).

Plainly, the statutory language itself provides absolutely no support for the cause of action for punitive damages that the Court reads into the provision. Indeed, it merely creates "[liability] to the party injured . . . for redress." "Redress" means "[reparation] of, satisfaction or compensation for, a wrong sustained or the loss resulting from this." 8 Oxford English Dictionary 310 (1933). And, as the Court concedes, punitive damages are not "reparation" or "compensation"; their very purpose is to punish, not to compensate. If Congress meant to create a right to recover punitive damages, then it chose singularly inappropriate words: both the reference to injured parties and to redress suggests compensation, and not punishment.

Other statutes roughly contemporaneous with § 1983 illustrate that if Congress wanted to subject persons to a punitive damages remedy, it did so explicitly. For example, in § 59, 16 Stat. 207, Congress created express punitive damages remedies for various types of commercial misconduct. Likewise, the False Claims Act, § 5, 12 Stat. 698, provided a civil remedy of double damages and a $ 2,000 civil forfeiture penalty for certain misstatements to the Government. As one [*86] Court of Appeals has remarked: "Where Congress has intended [to create a right to punitive damages] it has found no difficulty in using language appropriate to that end." United Mine Workers v. Patton, 211 F.2d 742, 749 (CA4 1954). And yet, in § 1983 one searches in vain for some hint of such a remedy. n14

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n14 I agree with the Court's conclusion that the Act of May 31, 1870, § 2, 16 Stat. 140, is "revealing." That statute, like § 1983, was a Reconstruction civil rights statute. It created a private cause of action for persons suffering from racial discrimination in voting registration, and explicitly allowed recovery of a $ 500 civil penalty by the person aggrieved. Similar provision for recovery of punitive damages is conspicuously absent from § 1983. Likewise, the Act clearly conditions the award of damages on a knowing violation of the civil rights laws. It is difficult to see what comfort the Court derives from the section. It merely demonstrates that when Congress wished to impose punitive damages on a party, it did so explicitly, and, even then, required more than recklessness.

REV_00263177

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In the light of the foregoing indications, it is accurate to say that the foundation upon which the right to punitive damages under § 1983 rests is precarious, at the best. Given the extraordinary diffidence and obliqueness with which the right was granted -- if it was -- it seems more than a little unusual to read that grant as incorporating the most expansive of the available views as to the standard for punitive damages. Given the legislative ambiguity, the sensible approach to the problem would be an honest recognition that, if we are to infer a right to punitive damages, it should be a restrained one, reflecting the Legislature's approach in creating the right. And surely, the right ought to be limited by the view of punitive damages that the Members of the 42d Congress [670] would have had -- not by what some state courts have done a century later.

An intent requirement, unlike a recklessness standard, is logically consistent with the underlying justification for punitive damages. It is a fundamental principle of American law that penal consequences generally ought to be imposed only where there has been some sort of wrongful animus creating [*87] the type of culpability warranting this treatment. As we said in Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246, 250-251 (1952): "A relation between some mental element and punishment for a harmful act is almost as instinctive as the child's familiar [1656] exculpatory 'But I didn't mean to.'" This principle "is as universal and persistent in mature systems of law as belief in freedom of the human will and a consequent ability and duty of the normal individual to choose between good and evil." Id., at 250. Indeed, as indicated previously, 19th-century decisions consistently justified the imposition of a quasi-criminal "fine" by reference to the "wickedness" or "evil" conduct of the defendant, just as Oliver Wendell Holmes drew a sharp distinction between accidentally and intentionally kicking an animal. Given that punitive damages are meant to punish, it is difficult to believe that Congress would have departed from the "instinctive," "universal and persistent" linkage in our law between punishment and wrongful intent.

V

Finally, even if the evidence of congressional intent were less clearcut, I would be persuaded to resolve any ambiguity in favor of an actual-malice standard. It scarcely needs repeating that punitive damages are not a "favorite of the law," see supra, at 58, owing to the numerous persuasive criticisms that have been leveled against the doctrine. The majority reasons that these arguments apply to all awards of punitive damages, not just to those under § 1983; while this is of course correct, it does little to reduce the strength of the arguments, and, if they are persuasive, we should not blindly follow the mistakes other courts have made.

Much of what has been said above regarding the failings of a punitive damages remedy is equally appropriate here. It is anomalous, and counter to deep-rooted legal principles and common-sense notions, to punish persons who meant no harm, and to award a windfall, in the form of punitive damages, to someone who already has been fully compensated. [*88] These peculiarities ought to be carefully limited -- not expanded to every case where a jury may think a defendant was too careless, particularly where a vaguely defined, elastic standard like "reckless indifference" gives free reign to the biases and prejudices of juries. In short, there are persuasive reasons not to create a new punitive damages remedy unless it is clear that Congress so intended.

This argument is particularly powerful in a case like this, where the uncertainty resulting from largely random awards of punitive damages will have serious effects upon the performance by state and local officers [671] of their official duties. n15 One of the principal themes of our immunity decisions is that the threat of liability must not deter an official's "willingness to execute his office with the decisiveness and the judgment required by the public good." Scheuer v. Rhodes, 416 U.S. 232, 240 (1974). To avoid stifling the types of initiative and decisiveness necessary for the "government to govern," Dalehite v. United States, 346 U.S. 15, 57 (1953) (Jackson, J., dissenting), we have held that officials will be liable for compensatory damages only for certain types of conduct. Precisely the same reasoning applies to liability for punitive damages. Because punitive damages generally are not subject to any relation to actual harm suffered, and because the recklessness standard is so imprecise, the remedy poses an even greater threat to the ability of officials to take decisive, efficient action. After the Court's decision, governmental officials will be subjected to the possibility of damages awards unlimited by any harm they may have caused or the fact they acted with unquestioned good faith: when swift action is demanded, their thoughts likely will be on personal financial consequences that may result from their conduct -- but whose limits they cannot predict -- and not upon their [*89] official duties. It would have been difficult for the Court to [1657] have fashioned a more effective Damoclean sword than the open-ended, standardless, and unpredictable liability it creates today. n16

REV_00263178

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n15 This is not a new concern, see, e. g., Brewer v. Watson, 65 Ala., at 96-97 (absent an actual-malice standard for punitive damages "few men, fit for such positions, could be induced to accept public trusts of this character").

n16 The Court relies all but exclusively on the notion that a recklessness standard for punitive damages is necessary to deter unconstitutional conduct by state officials. The issue is a little more complicated. The deterrence the Court pursues necessarily is accompanied by costs: as our decisions regarding common-law immunities explicitly recognize, see cases cited in n. 6, supra, the imposition of personal liability on officials gravely threatens their initiative and judgment, and scarcely serves to make public positions attractive to competent, responsible persons. While constitutional rights are high on our scale of values, so is an effective performance of the countless basic functions that modern governments increasingly have come to perform. In fashioning a punitive damages standard we should seek to achieve that level of deterrence that is most worth the costs it imposes.

The Court, however, simply ignores the potential costs of the standard it embraces. This single-minded desire to deter unconstitutional official actions would not logically stop at recklessness; awarding punitive damages on the basis of mere negligence, or on a strict liability basis, might result, in the short term, in even less unconstitutional conduct. Yet, just as with the Court's recklessness standard, this deterrence would come at too costly a price. The Court is unable to give any reason, related to achieving deterrence at a cost sensibly related to benefits obtained, for its choice of a recklessness standard. It offers no response to the obvious distinctions between the standard for punitive damages in state-law tort actions and that in § 1983 actions, where § 1988 provides attorney's fees and where issues of federalism are involved. It does not even attempt to discuss the plainly relevant question whether insurance may be obtained against punitive damages awards.

While fully recognizing that the issue is a complex one, in my judgment the dangers that accompany the vague recklessness standard adopted by the Court far outweigh the deterrence achieved thereby. Recklessness too easily shades into negligence, particularly when the defendant is an unpopular official -- whether because of his official actions, or for more invidious reasons. Punitive damages are not bound by a measure of actual damages, so when a jury does act improperly, the harm it may occasion can be great. These threats occur in an area -- the provision of governmental services -- where it is important to have efficient, competent public servants. I fear that the Court's decision poorly serves this goal, and that in the deterrent purposes of such damages would be served only if the threshold for those damages is higher in every case than the underlying standard for liability in the first instance. The common-law rule is otherwise, and there is no reason to depart from the common-law rule in the context of § 1983. Pp. 51-55.

REV_00263179

COUNSEL: Robert Presson argued the cause for petitioner. With him on the brief were John Ashcroft, Attorney General of Missouri, and Paul Robert Otto, Assistant Attorney General.

Bradley H. Lockenvitz argued the cause and filed a brief for respondent.

JUDGES: BRENNAN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which WHITE, MARSHALL, BLACKMUN, and STEVENS, JJ., joined. REHNQUIST, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which BURGER, C. J., and POWELL, J., joined, post, p. 56. O'CONNOR, J., filed a dissenting opinion, post, p. 92.

OPINIONBY: BRENNAN

OPINION: [*31] [*636] [1627] JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

[*HR1A] [1A]
We granted certiorari in this case, 456 U.S. 924 (1982), to decide whether the District Court for the Western District of Missouri applied the correct legal standard in instructing the jury that it might award punitive damages under 42 U. S. C. § 1983 (1976 ed., Supp. V). n1 The Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit sustained the award of punitive damages. Wade v. Haynes, 663 F.2d 778 (1981). We affirm.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 ↑Rev. Stat. § 1979, amended, 93 Stat. 1284. Section 1983 reads in relevant part:

"Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*32] I

The petitioner, William H. Smith, is a guard at Algoa Reformatory, a unit of the Missouri Division of Corrections for youthful first offenders. The respondent, Daniel R. Wade, was assigned to Algoa as an inmate in 1976. In the summer of 1976 Wade voluntarily checked into Algoa's protective custody unit. Because of disciplinary violations during his stay in protective custody, Wade was given a short term in punitive segregation and then transferred to administrative segregation. On the evening of Wade's first day in administrative segregation, he was placed in a cell with another inmate. Later, when Smith came on duty in Wade's dormitory, he placed a third inmate in Wade's cell. According to Wade's testimony, his cellmates harassed, beat, and sexually assaulted him.

Wade brought suit under 42 U. S. C. § 1983 against Smith and four other guards and correctional officials, alleging that his Eighth Amendment rights had [1628] been violated. At trial his evidence showed that he had placed himself in protective custody because of prior incidents of violence against him by other inmates. The third prisoner whom the end, official conduct will be less useful to our citizens, not better.

REV_00263144

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*672] Moreover, notwithstanding the Court's inability to discern them, there are important distinctions between a right to [*90] damages under § 1983 and a similar right under state tort law. A leading rationale seized upon by proponents of punitive damages to justify the doctrine is that "the award is . . . a covert response to the legal system's overt refusal to provide financing for litigation." D. Dobbs, Law of Remedies 221 (1973); K. Redden, Punitive Damages § 2.4(C) (1980). Yet, 42 U. S. C. § 1988 (1976 ed., Supp. V) provides not just a "covert response" to plaintiffs' litigation expenses but an explicit provision for an award to the prevailing party in a § 1983 action of "a reasonable attorney's fee as part of the costs." By permitting punitive damages as well as attorney's fees, § 1983 plaintiffs, unlike state tort law plaintiffs, get not just one windfall but two -- one for them, and one for their lawyer. This difference between the incentives that are present in state tort actions, and those in § 1983 actions, makes the Court's reliance upon the standard for punitive damages in the former entirely inapposite: in fashioning a new financial lure to litigate under § 1983 the Court does not act in a vacuum, but, by adding to existing incentives, creates an imbalance of inducements to litigate that may have serious consequences. n17 n17 In this respect, Congress' attitude towards punitive damages as revealed by its treatment of the subject in the Civil Rights Act of 1968 is highly illuminating. There, in marked contrast to § 1983, Congress explicitly included a right to punitive damages; notably, however, that right was limited to recoveries of $ 1,000. 42 U. S. C. § 3612(c). While Congress may have thought punitive damages appropriate in some cases, it recognized the dangers that such a remedy creates -- unfairness to defendants, stifling of initiative of state officials, comity concerns, and, perhaps most alarmingly, an open-ended incentive to litigate in a field where other such incentives already exist. See, e. g., 42 U. S. C. § 1988 (1976 ed., Supp. V).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Petitioner did not argue, and the Court properly does not decide, whether the $ 1,000 limit in 42 U. S. C. § 3612(c), also should apply in actions under § 1983. It seems likely that it would. While the Court does not say so, its opinion seems to derive its punitive damages remedy from "the laws of the United States," concluding sub silentio that they "are suitable to carry [§ 1983] into effect." 42 U. S. C. § 1988 (1976 ed., Supp. V). (This follows from the Court's apparent view that, for example, in one of the several States where punitive damages are not available, a § 1983 plaintiff could recover such damages, thus indicating that it is not "the common law . . . of the State wherein the court having jurisdiction of such civil or criminal cause is held," § 1988, that the Court is applying.) If, therefore, we are to apply a punitive damages remedy "in conformity with the laws of the United States," then the most relevant law is 42 U. S. C. § 3612(c), limiting punitive damages in certain civil rights actions to $ 1,000.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*91] [1658] The staggering effect of § 1983 claims upon the work load of the federal courts has been decried time and again. The torrent of frivolous claims under that section threatens to incapacitate the judicial system's resolution of claims where true injustice is involved; those claims which truly warrant redress are in a very real danger of being lost in a sea of meritless suits. Yet, apparently oblivious to this, the Court today reads into the silent, inhospitable terms of § 1983 a remedy that is designed to serve as a "bounty" to encourage private litigation. Dobbs, supra, at 221. In a time when the courts are flooded with suits that do not raise colorable claims, in large [673] part because of the existing incentives for litigation under § 1983, it is regrettable that the Court should take upon itself, in apparent disregard for the likely intent of the 42d Congress, the legislative task of encouraging yet more litigation. n18 There is a limit to what the federal judicial system can bear.

REV_00263180

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n18 The case is materially different from our decision in Patsy v. Board of Regents, 457 U.S. 496 (1982), where our previous decisions strongly suggested that exhaustion of state administrative remedies is not required under § 1983. Here, our previous statements as to the standard for a recovery of punitive damages are inconsistent with the Court's formulation. In Carey v. Piphus, 435 U.S., at 257, n. 11, we implied that the absence of "malicious intention" would preclude an award of punitive damages. And, as discussed above, the standard for punitive damages recoveries in constitutional tort actions was that the case involve "a tort . . . aggravated by evil motive, actual malice, deliberate violence or oppression." Scott v. Donald, 165 U.S. 58, 86 (1897).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*92] Finally, by unquestioningly transferring the standard of punitive damages in state tort actions to federal § 1983 actions, the Court utterly fails to recognize the fundamental difference that exists between an award of punitive damages by a federal court, acting under § 1983, and a similar award by a state court acting under prevailing local laws. While state courts may choose to adopt such measures as they deem appropriate to punish officers of the jurisdiction in which they sit, the standards they choose to adopt can scarcely be taken as evidence of what it is appropriate for a federal court to do. See Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651, 677, n. 19 (1974). When federal courts enforce punitive damages awards against local officials they intrude into sensitive areas of sovereignty of coordinate branches of our Nation, thus implicating the most basic values of our system of federalism. Moreover, by yet further distorting the incentives that exist for litigating claims against local officials in federal court, as opposed to state courts, the Court's decision makes it even more difficult for state courts to attempt to conform the conduct of state officials to the Constitution.

I dissent.

JUSTICE O'CONNOR, dissenting.

Although I agree with the result reached in JUSTICE REHNQUIST's dissent, I write separately because I cannot agree with the approach taken by either the Court or JUSTICE REHNQUIST. Both opinions engage in exhaustive, but ultimately unilluminating, exegesis of the common law of the availability of punitive damages in 1871. Although both the Court and JUSTICE REHNQUIST display admirable skills in legal research and analysis of great numbers of musty cases, the results do not significantly further the goal of the inquiry: to establish the intent of the 42d Congress. In interpreting § 1983, we have [1659] often looked to the common law as it existed in 1871, in the belief that, when Congress was silent on a point, it intended to adopt the principles of the common law with which it was familiar. See, e. g., Newport v. Fact Concerts, [*93] Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 258 (1981); Carey v. Piphus, 435 U.S. 247, 255 (1978). This approach makes sense when there was a generally prevailing rule of common law, for [674] then it is reasonable to assume that Congressmen were familiar with that rule and imagined that it would cover the cause of action that they were creating. But when a significant split in authority existed, it strains credulity to argue that Congress simply assumed that one view rather than the other would govern. Particularly in a case like this one, in which those interpreting the common law of 1871 must resort to dictionaries in an attempt to translate the language of the late 19th century into terms that judges of the late 20th century can understand, see ante, at 39-41, n. 8; 61-64, nn. 3, 4, and in an area in which the courts of the earlier period frequently used inexact and contradictory language, see ante, at 45-47, n. 12, we cannot safely infer anything about congressional intent from the divided contemporaneous judicial opinions. The battle of the string citations can have no winner.

REV_00263181

Once it is established that the common law of 1871 provides us with no real guidance on this question, we should turn to the policies underlying § 1983 to determine which rule best accords with those policies. In Fact Concerts, we identified the purposes of § 1983 as pre-eminently to compensate victims of constitutional violations and to deter further violations. 453 U.S., at 268. See also Robertson v. Wegmann, 436 U.S. 584, 590-591 (1978); Carey v. Piphus, supra, at 254-257, and n. 9. The conceded availability of compensatory damages, particularly when coupled with the availability of attorney's fees under § 1988, completely fulfills the goal of compensation, leaving only deterrence to be served by awards of punitive damages. We must then confront the close question whether a standard permitting an award of unlimited punitive damages on the basis of recklessness will chill public officials in the performance of their duties more than it will deter violations of the Constitution, and whether the availability of punitive damages for reckless violations of the Constitution in addition to attorney's fees will create an [*94] incentive to bring an ever-increasing flood of § 1983 claims, threatening the ability of the federal courts to handle those that are meritorious. Although I cannot concur in JUSTICE REHNQUIST's wholesale condemnation of awards of punitive damages in any context or with the suggestion that punitive damages should not be available even for intentional or malicious violations of constitutional rights, I do agree with the discussion in Part V of his opinion of the special problems of permitting awards of punitive damages for the recklessness of public officials. Since awards of compensatory damages and attorney's fees already provide significant deterrence, I am persuaded that the policies counseling against awarding punitive damages for the recklessness of public officials outweigh the desirability of any incremental deterrent effect that such awards may have. Consequently, I dissent.

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 461 U.S. 30,AT 40
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, October 11, 2002 - 2:14 AM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00263182

Smith added to the cell had been placed in administrative segregation for fighting. Smith had made no effort to find out whether another cell was available; in fact there was another cell in the same dormitory with only one occupant. Further, only a few weeks earlier, another inmate had been beaten to death in the same dormitory during the same shift, while Smith had been on duty. Wade asserted that Smith and the other defendants knew or should have known that an assault against him was likely under the circumstances.

During trial, the District Judge entered a directed verdict for two of the defendants. He instructed the [637] jury that Wade could make out an Eighth Amendment violation only by showing "physical abuse of such base, inhumane and barbaric proportions as to shock the sensibilities." Tr. 639. Further, because of Smith's qualified immunity as a prison [*33] guard, see Procunier v. Navarette, 434 U.S. 555 (1978), the judge instructed the jury that Wade could recover only if the defendants were guilty of "gross negligence" (defined as "a callous indifference or a thoughtless disregard for the consequences of one's act or failure to act") or "[egregious] failure to protect" (defined as "a flagrant or remarkably bad failure to protect") Wade. Tr. 641-642. He reiterated that Wade could not recover on a showing of simple negligence. Id., at 644.

The District Judge also charged the jury that it could award punitive damages on a proper showing:

"In addition to actual damages, the law permits the jury, under certain circumstances, to award the injured person punitive and exemplary damages, in order to punish the wrongdoer for some extraordinary misconduct, and to serve as an example or warning to others not to engage in such conduct.

"If you find the issues in favor of the plaintiff, and if the conduct of one or more of the defendants is shown to be a reckless or callous disregard of, or indifference to, the rights or safety of others, then you may assess punitive or exemplary damages in addition to any award of actual damages.

". . . The amount of punitive or exemplary damages assessed against any defendant may be such sum as you believe will serve to punish that defendant and to deter him and others from like conduct." Id., at 643 (emphasis added).

The jury returned verdicts for two of the three remaining defendants. It found Smith liable, however, and awarded $ 25,000 in compensatory damages and $ 5,000 in punitive damages. The District Court entered judgment on the verdict, and the Court of Appeals affirmed. Wade v. Haynes, 663 F.2d 778 (1981).

In this Court, Smith attacks only the award of punitive damages. He does not challenge the correctness of the instructions [*34] on liability or qualified immunity, nor does he question the adequacy of the evidence to support the verdict of liability for compensatory damages.

II

[*HR2] [2]
Section 1983 is derived from § 1 of the Civil Rights Act of 1871, 17 Stat. 13. It was intended to create "a species of tort liability" in favor of persons deprived of federally secured rights. Carey v. Piphus, 435 U.S. 247, 253 (1978); Imbler v. Pachtman, 424 U.S. 409, 417 (1976). We noted in Carey that there was little in the section's legislative history concerning the damages recoverable for this tort liability, 435 U.S., at 255. In the absence of more specific guidance, we looked first to the common law of torts (both modern and as of 1871), with such modification or adaptation as might be necessary to carry out the purpose and policy of the statute. Id., at 253-264. We have done the same in other contexts [1629] arising under § 1983, [638] especially the recurring problem of common-law immunities. n2

REV_00263145

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n2 Briscoe v. LaHue, 460 U.S. 325 (1983); Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247 (1981); Procunier v. Navarette, 434 U.S. 555 (1978); Imbler v. Pachtman, 424 U.S. 409 (1976); Wood v. Strickland, 420 U.S. 308 (1975); Scheuer v. Rhodes, 416 U.S. 232 (1974); Pierson v. Ray, 386 U.S. 547 (1967); Tenney v. Brandhove, 341 U.S. 367 (1951).

JUSTICE REHNQUIST's dissent faults us for referring to modern tort decisions in construing § 1983. Its argument rests on the unstated and unsupported premise that Congress necessarily intended to freeze into permanent law whatever principles were current in 1871, rather than to incorporate applicable general legal principles as they evolve. Post, at 65-68; see also post, at 92-93 (O'CONNOR, J., dissenting). The dissents are correct, of course, that when the language of the section and its legislative history provide no clear answer, we have found useful guidance in the law prevailing at the time when § 1983 was enacted; but it does not follow that that law is absolutely controlling, or that current law is irrelevant. On the contrary, if the prevailing view on some point of general tort law had changed substantially in the intervening century (which is not the case here), we might be highly reluctant to assume that Congress intended to perpetuate a now-obsolete doctrine. See Carey v. Piphus, 435 U.S. 247, 257-258 (1978) ("[Over] the centuries the common law of torts has developed a set of rules to implement the principle that a person should be compensated fairly for injuries caused by the violation of his legal rights. These rules, defining the elements of damages and the prerequisites for their recovery, provide the appropriate starting point for the inquiry under § 1983 as well") (footnote omitted); Adickes v. S. H. Kress & Co., 398 U.S. 144, 231-232 (1970) (BRENNAN, J., concurring and dissenting); Pierson, supra, at 555 (citing modern authority for "the prevailing view in this country"); Wood, supra, at 318-319, and n. 9; Tenney, supra, at 375, and n. 5. Indeed, in Imbler we recognized a common-law immunity that first came into existence 25 years after § 1983 was enacted, 424 U.S., at 421-422. Under the dissents' view, Imbler was wrongly decided.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*35]

[*HR3] [3]
Smith correctly concedes that "punitive damages are available in a 'proper' § 1983 action . . ." Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14, 22 (1980); Brief for Petitioner 8. Although there was debate about the theoretical correctness of the punitive damages doctrine in the latter part of the last century, the doctrine was accepted as settled law by nearly all state and federal courts, including this Court. n3 It was likewise generally established that individual public officers were liable for punitive damages for their misconduct on the same basis as other individual defendants. n4 See also Scott v. Donald, 165 U.S. 58, 77-89 (1897) (punitive damages for constitutional tort). Further, although the precise [639] issue of the availability of punitive damages under § 1983 has never come squarely [*36] before us, we have had occasion more than once to make clear our view that they are available; indeed, we have rested decisions on related questions on the premise of such availability. n5

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n3 See, e. g., the cases cited in nn. 8 and 12, infra; Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. 363 (1852); Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Quigley, 21 How. 202 (1859); Milwaukee & St. Paul R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U.S. 489 (1876); Missouri Pacific R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U.S. 512 (1885); Barry v. Edmunds, 116 U.S. 550 (1886); Minneapolis & St. Louis R. Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U.S. 26

REV_00263146

(1889); Scott v. Donald, 165 U.S. 58 (1897).

n4 E. g., Nightingale v. Scannell, 18 Cal. 315, 324-326 (1861); Friend v. Hamill, 34 Md. 298, 314 (1871); Lynd v. Picket, 7 Minn. 184, 200-202 (1862); Parker v. Shackelford, 61 Mo. 68, 72 (1875); Rodgers v. Ferguson, 36 Tex. 544 (1871); see, e. g., Stinson v. Buisson, 17 La. 567, 572-573 (1841); Nagle v. Mullison, 34 Pa. 48 (1859); Von Storch v. Winslow, 13 R. I. 23, 24-25 (1880). Cf. Brewer v. Watson, 71 Ala. 299, 307 (1882). See also, e. g., Lane v. Yamamoto, 2 Haw. App. 176, 628 P. 2d 634 (1981); Wilson v. Eagan, 297 N. W. 2d 146, 148-150 (Minn. 1980).

n5 In Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., supra, for example, we held that a municipality (as opposed to an individual defendant) is immune from liability for punitive damages under § 1983. A significant part of our reasoning was that deterrence of constitutional violations would be adequately accomplished by allowing punitive damages awards directly against the responsible individuals:

"Moreover, there is available a more effective means of deterrence. By allowing juries and courts to assess punitive damages in appropriate circumstances against the offending official, based on his personal financial resources, the statute [§ 1983] directly advances the public's interest in preventing repeated constitutional deprivations. In our view, this provides sufficient protection against the prospect that a public official may commit recurrent constitutional violations by reason of his office." Id., at 269-270 (footnote omitted).

Similarly, in Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14 (1980), we stated that punitive damages would be available in an action against federal officials directly under the Eighth Amendment, partly on the reasoning that since such damages are available under § 1983, it would be anomalous to allow punitive awards against state officers but not federal ones. Id., at 22, and n. 9. See also Adickes v. S. H. Kress & Co., supra, at 233 (BRENNAN, J., concurring and dissenting); Carey v. Piphus, supra, at 257, n. 11; Johnson v. Railway Express Agency, Inc., 421 U.S. 454, 460 (1975) (punitive damages available under 42 U. S. C. § 1981).

JUSTICE REHNQUIST's dissent, without squarely denying that punitive damages are available under § 1983, does its best to cast doubt on the proposition. It argues that the phrase "for redress" at the end of the section means that Congress intended to limit recovery to compensatory damages. Post, at 85; see n. 1, supra. This novel construction is strained; a more plausible reading of the statute is that the phrase "or other proper proceeding for redress" is simply an expansive alternative to the preceding phrases "action at law" and "suit in equity," intended to avoid any unwanted technical limitations that might lurk in the other phrases.

Next JUSTICE REHNQUIST points to two other statutes enacted in 1863 and 1870 that provided expressly for punitive remedies. Post, at 85-86. Neither of these statutes enacted a punitive damages remedy as such, although they did create other forms of punitive civil remedies. The Act of March 2, 1863, § 3, 12 Stat. 698, created a civil fine for fraudulent military claims, apparently intended to stimulate suit by private attorneys general. The Act of July 8, 1870, § 59, 16 Stat. 207, was the treble damages provision of the revised patent code. These statutes do not support JUSTICE REHNQUIST's speculation that Congress acted expressly when it intended to approve punitive damages, since both statutes created new remedies not available at common law; moreover, they undercut his argument that Congress was hostile to punitive civil remedies in favor of private parties.

Finally, JUSTICE REHNQUIST argues that Congress would not likely have approved "this often-condemned doctrine" in the 1871 Civil Rights Act. Post, at 84. This speculation is remarkable, to say the least, given that Congress did approve a punitive civil remedy in an 1870 Civil Rights Act. Act of May 31, 1870, § 2, 16 Stat. 140 (creating private cause of action for fixed penalty on behalf of persons suffering racial discrimination in voting registration).

REV_00263147

Cf. 1889 Colo. Sess. Laws 64 (enacting punitive damages statute, including awards for "wanton and reckless disregard," five years after state court held against doctrine). At any rate, the punitive damages debate, though lively, was by no means one-sided. See, e. g., Missouri Pacific R. Co. v. Humes, supra, at 521-523; Linsley v. Bushnell, 15 Conn. 225, 235-237 (1842); Frink & Co. v. Coe, 4 Greene 555, 559-560 (Iowa 1854); Chiles v. Drake, 59 Ky. 146, 152-153 (1859); Lynd v. Picket, supra, at 200-201; Taylor v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 48 N. H. 304, 320 (1869), overruled, Fay v. Parker, 53 N. H. 342 (1872); Mayer v. Frobe, 40 W. Va. 246, 22 S. E. 58 (1895); Cosgriff Brothers v. Miller, 10 Wyo. 190, 236-237, 68 P. 206, 216-217 (1902). See also Tillotson v. Cheetham, 3 Johns. 56, 63-64 (N. Y. 1808) (Kent, C. J.).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*37] [*640] [1630] Smith argues, nonetheless, that this was not a "proper" case in which to award punitive damages. More particularly, he attacks the instruction that punitive damages could be awarded on a finding of reckless or callous disregard of or indifference to Wade's rights or safety. Instead, he contends that the proper test is one of actual malicious intent -- "ill will, spite, or intent to injure." n6 Brief for Petitioner 9. [*38] [1631] He offers two arguments for this position: first, that actual intent is the proper standard for punitive damages in all cases under § 1983; and second, that even if intent is not always required, it should be required here because the threshold for punitive damages should always be higher than that for liability in the first instance. We address these in turn.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n6 Smith uses the term "actual malice" to refer to the standard he would apply. While the term may be an appropriate one, we prefer not to use it, simply to avoid the confusion and ambiguity that surrounds the word "malice." See n. 8, infra. Indeed, as Smith recognizes, this Court has used the very term "actual malice" in the defamation context to refer to a recklessness standard. Brief for Petitioner 8-9; see Cantrell v. Forest City Publishing Co., 419 U.S. 245, 251-252 (1974); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 280 (1964).

We note in passing that it appears quite uncertain whether even JUSTICE REHNQUIST's dissent ultimately agrees with Smith's view that "ill will, spite, or intent to injure" should be required to allow punitive damages awards. JUSTICE REHNQUIST consistently confuses, and attempts to blend together, the quite distinct concepts of intent to cause injury, on one hand, and subjective consciousness of risk of injury (or of unlawfulness) on the other. For instance, his dissent purports to base its analysis on the "fundamental distinction" between "wrongful motive, actual intention to inflict harm or intentional doing of an act known to be unlawful," versus "very careless or negligent conduct," post, at 60-61 (emphasis added). Yet in the same paragraph, the dissent inaccurately recharacterizes the first element of this distinction as "acts that are intentionally harmful," requiring "inquiry into the actor's subjective motive and purpose." Post, at 63-64. Consciousness of consequences or of wrongdoing, of course, does not require injurious intent or motive; it is equally consistent with indifference toward or disregard for consequences. This confusion of standards continues throughout the opinion. JUSTICE REHNQUIST's dissent frequently uses such phrases as "intent to injure" or "evil motive"; yet at several points it refers more broadly to "subjective mental state" or like phrases, and expressly includes consciousness (as opposed to intent) in its reasoning. Post, at 63, n. 3, 71-72, n. 7, 72-73. More telling, perhaps, is its citation of cases and treatises, which frequently and consistently includes authority supporting (at most) a consciousness requirement rather than the "actual intent" standard for which the opinion purports to argue elsewhere. See, e. g., post, at 76-77, n. 10, 78-84, n. 12.

If JUSTICE REHNQUIST does indeed mean to propose a standard reaching subjective consciousness as well as actual injurious intent, one wonders why the instructions given in this case, supra, at 33, do not meet his standard. It is hard to see how Smith could have disregarded or been indifferent to the danger to Wade unless he was subjectively conscious of that danger. If JUSTICE REHNQUIST stands by his "fundamental distinction" and his use of authority, then, he has no apparent reason to dissent from our judgment.

REV_00263148

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

III

[*HR1B] [1B]
Smith does not argue that the common law, either in 1871 or now, required or requires a showing of actual malicious intent [*39] for recovery of punitive damages. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 5-6, 9. n7

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n7 Indeed, the District Judge's instruction on punitive damages in this case was drawn with only slight alteration from a standard jury instruction manual under Missouri state law. See Tr. 576-577; Tr. of Oral Arg. 9, 42-43.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Perhaps not surprisingly, there was significant variation (both terminological [641] and substantive) among American jurisdictions in the latter 19th century on the precise standard to be applied in awarding punitive damages -- variation that was exacerbated by the ambiguity and slipperiness of such common terms as "malice" and "gross negligence." n8 Most of the [*40] confusion, however, [1632] seems to have been over the [642] degree of negligence, recklessness, carelessness, or culpable indifference that should be required -- not over whether actual intent [*41] was essential. On the contrary, the rule in a large majority of jurisdictions was that punitive damages (also called exemplary damages, vindictive damages, or smart money) could be awarded without a showing of actual ill will, spite, or intent to injure.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n8 This terminological difficulty seems to be responsible in some degree for the dissent's error in asserting that intent was the majority rule in 1871, post, at 68-84. In particular, the dissent argues that "malice," "wantonness," and "willfulness" denoted actual ill will or intent to cause injury. See nn. 10, 12, infra; post, at 60-64, n. 3, 73, n. 8, 76-77, n. 10, 78-84, n. 12. See also n. 6, supra (dissent's confusion of knowledge with intent); n. 9, infra (concerning "criminal indifference"). With regard to "malice," the assumption is dubious at best; with regard to "wantonness" and "willfulness," it is just plain wrong.

"Malice," as used by courts and lawyers in the last century, was a hopelessly versatile and ambiguous term, carrying a broad spectrum of meanings. See generally, e. g., 2 J. Sutherland, Law of Damages § 394 (3d ed. J. Berryman, 1903); 25 Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure 1666-1669 (1907). As the dissent correctly states, post, at 60-64, n. 3, in some instances (especially when it was modified by terms such as "actual" or "express," or in criminal law, where terms were generally more strictly construed than in civil law), it meant what the dissent says it meant -- actual ill will, spite, or intent to injure. On the other extreme, in tort law, it was often used without modification to mean what was sometimes called "implied malice" -- a purely fictional malice that was conclusively presumed to exist whenever a tort resulted from a voluntary act, even if no harm was intended. The term was sometimes, though not often, used in this fictional sense as a ground for punitive damages. E. g., Childers v. San Jose Mercury Printing & Publishing Co., 105 Cal. 284, 289, 38 P. 903, 904-905 (1894). In other cases it was explained to mean an intent to do the act that caused the injury, as opposed to intent to cause the injury itself. E. g., Goetz v. Ambs, 27 Mo. 28,

REV_00263149

Intentional Disregard

Source: Legal > Federal Legal - U.S. > Federal Cases Within 2 Years, Combined Courts ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /15 (intentional /2 disregard) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*202 F. Supp. 2d 869, *; 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10007, **

NOREEN BOOMSMA, as personal representative of the Estates of THOMAS G. BOOMSMA, deceased, and CHELSEA BOOMSMA, deceased; JUNE CAPLINGER, as personal representative of the Estate of SHARON L. BOOMSMA, deceased; and THOMAS J. PARINS, as Special Administrator of the Estate of JAMES A. SPENCER, deceased, Plaintiffs, -vs- STAR TRANSPORT, INC. and CHARLES I. BENNETT, Defendants & Third-Party Plaintiffs, -vs- STEPHANIE HANSEN, FAIRWATER GARAGE, INC., and AUTO OWNERS INSURANCE COMPANY, Third-Party Defendants.

Case Nos. 99-C-895 & 99-C-896 (consolidated)

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF WISCONSIN

202 F. Supp. 2d 869; 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10007

May 14, 2002, Decided
May 14, 2002, Filed

DISPOSITION: [1] Motions ruled upon.

CASE SUMMARY

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: Plaintiffs, representatives of decedents, sued defendants, a transportation company and a driver, alleging wrongful death damages claims. Plaintiffs moved for relief under Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b) asserting that Illinois law applied to the wrongful death claims against defendants, or in the event Wisconsin law applies, plaintiffs moved for the court to certify an interlocutory appeal of the choice of law issue pursuant to 28 U.S.C.S. § 1292(b).

OVERVIEW: The driver's semi-trailer truck hit a car and school bus from behind causing a tragic accident that claimed the lives of five Wisconsin residents in Wisconsin. The driver was domiciled in Illinois and the company was a citizen of Illinois. Defendants asserted contributory negligence claims against Wisconsin residents. A district court judge previously dismissed the claims brought under Illinois law. Plaintiffs moved for relief from the order arguing that Illinois law applied to the wrongful death claims. The court found that there was insufficient evidence of injury-causing conduct occurring in Illinois to warrant the assumption that Illinois law governed plaintiffs' wrongful death damages claims. Even if some negligent conduct did occur in Illinois, for choice-of-law purposes such conduct neither outweighs the acts or omissions in Wisconsin nor overwhelms the presumption that the state where the injury took place had the most significant relationship. Plaintiffs failed to overcome the presumption that favored the law of the place where the injury occurred, or to show exceptional circumstances warranting relief from the earlier court rulings.

OUTCOME: Plaintiffs' motion for relief and request for certification of interlocutory appeal was denied.

CORE TERMS: punitive damages, third-party, wrongful death, choice-of-law, motion in not the least of which is that these experts are now attempting to contradict their prior sworn testimony on the question of whether injury-causing conduct occurred in Illinois. n5 The about-face of Mitler, the plaintiffs' sleep expert, is particularly flagrant. During his deposition, the following exchange took place:

REV_00263183

> Q: Do you agree that [Bennett] may [17] have been fully alert when he left Morton, Illinois and not fatigued, and then by the time he drove from Morton, Illinois to Keystone and then Keystone back to Morton, Illinois and then Morton Illinois to the location where the accident took place in Rosendale, Wisconsin, that he might have developed some level of fatigueness [sic]?
>
> A: Yes, that's possible.
>
> Q: All right.
>
> A: It's very possible. It's likely.

Deposition of Mark Mitler ("Mitler Dep."), p. 89 (emphasis added). In his affidavit, Mitler now opines that Bennett "was suffering [*877] from sleep deprivation and fatigue when he departed from Star in Illinois on September 23, 1996." Affidavit of Mark Mitler ("Mitler Aff."), P 15 (emphasis added). The basis for this new opinion is not clear. n6 It is obvious that the plaintiffs are attempting to "repair" their experts' deposition testimony by coming forward with affidavits more in line with their choice-of-law arguments. n7 This is improper. As a general rule, "the law of this circuit does not permit a party to create an issue of fact by submitting an affidavit whose conclusions contradict prior deposition or other sworn testimony." EEOC v. Yellow Freight System, Inc., 253 F.3d 943, 952 (7th Cir. 2001) [18] (en banc); see also Cleveland v. Policy Management Systems Corp., 526 U.S. 795, 806, 143 L. Ed. 2d 966, 119 S. Ct. 1597 (1999). Accordingly, the Court grants the defendants' motion to strike the affidavits of Mitler and Baker [286-1]. The Court also concludes that there is insufficient evidence of injury-causing conduct occurring in Illinois to warrant the assumption that Illinois law should govern the plaintiffs' wrongful death damages claims. Even if some negligent conduct did occur in Illinois, the Court agrees with the defendants that for choice-of-law purposes such conduct "neither outweighs the acts or omissions in Wisconsin nor overwhelms the presumption that the State where the injury takes place has the most significant relationship."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n5 These affidavits were also made after the time to file written export reports, after the close of discovery, and after the time to submit contested and uncontested facts. See Reply to Plaintiffs' Response to Defendants' Motion for Partial Summary Judgment, pp. 1-3. Indeed, to some extent the affidavits appear to have been used in lieu of the process provided in L.R. 6.05(b)(1) (the predecessor to Civ. L.R. 56.2). Id. [19]

n6 Bennett left Morton, Illinois around 12:15 or 12:30 AM on September 23, 1996. The accident in Wisconsin did not occur until roughly seven hours later. Thus, as Mitler originally conceded, it seems more likely that fatigue developed (if at all) sometime after Bennett crossed into Wisconsin.

n7 Baker's affidavit and his deposition testimony are also in conflict. See Affidavit of Forrest Baker ("Baker Aff."), P 62; Deposition of Forrest Baker ("Baker Dep."), pp. 274-275.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00263192

3. Where Are The Relationships Of The Parties Centered?

The Court attaches comparatively little importance to this factor because, as the plaintiffs correctly note, "there was no [pre-injury] relationship between the decedents and Star and Bennett." See RESTATEMENT § 145, cmt. subsection (2))("W*hen* there is a relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant and when the injury was caused by an act done in the course of the relationship, the place where the relationship is centered is another contact to be considered.").

4. The Domiciles Of The Parties

The decedents in this action [20] were all domiciled in Wisconsin at the time of the accident. The plaintiffs, however, argue that only the defendants' domiciles are relevant to the issue of whether to limit damages for wrongful death. This argument finds support in Mitchell v. United Asbestos, 100 Ill. App. 3d 485, 426 N.E.2d 350, 358-59, 55 Ill. Dec. 375 (Ill.App. 1981). In Mitchell, the court noted that the purpose of a damages cap was "to protect resident defendants from excessive financial burdens." Id. (emphasis added). The domicile of the plaintiffs (who resided in the state with the cap) bore "no relationship" to this purpose. Id. Accordingly, the Mitchell court found that the residency of the defendants was the "only significant contact" with respect to the damages limitation issue. Id. Similarly, since defendants were domiciled in Illinois at the time of the accident, the plaintiffs argue that Star and Bennett should not enjoy the protection of Wisconsin's cap on wrongful death damages. Also, the plaintiffs argue that the Court must consider Illinois' interest in deterring tortious conduct by its own domiciliaries. 426 N.E.2d at 359; see also [21] [*878] RESTATEMENT § 6 (c) (courts should consider "the relevant policies of other interested states and the relative interests of those states in the determination of the particular issue.").

The Seventh Circuit has observed that "critical to conflicts analysis is the notion that we must examine the choice-of-law rules not with regard to the various states' interests in general, but precisely, with regard to each state, s interest in the specific question [before the court]." Air Crash, 644 F.2d at 611 (emphasis added). The plaintiffs' arguments are consistent with this approach. Admittedly, Wisconsin does not have an interest in limiting damage awards against out-of-state defendants. However, the fact remains that the third-party defendants are all domiciled in Wisconsin and have a strong (perhaps even a constitutionally-protected) n8 interest in the application of Wisconsin law. "Depecage" notwithstanding, the claims and third-party claims in this action are, as the defendants note, "inextricably intertwined." Applying Illinois law to the underlying claims and Wisconsin law to the third-party claims would be both unworkable and unfair. As the third-party defendants observe in [22] their brief, "it would seem almost impossible to concomitantly protect [the third party defendants'] domiciliary rights and allow plaintiff[s] to collect Illinois-type damages," since "the percentage of causal negligence eventually attributed to the third-party defendants will be measured in dollars." For example, if the plaintiffs recover one million dollars worth of "Illinois-type damages," and the third-party defendants are adjudged 50% at fault, the third-party defendants are on the hook for half a million dollars, instead of the $ 75,000 maximum permitted under Wisconsin law. This would be manifestly unfair to the third-party defendants, all Wisconsin domiciliaries, who have a justified expectation of limited liability. On the other hand, if the third-party defendants are afforded the protection of Wisconsin law and their liability is limited to $ 75,000, is it fair to subject the defendants, who are only 50% at fault under this hypothetical, to a judgment of $ 925,000? The plaintiffs have left these difficult questions unanswered. Therefore, although there would be persuasive arguments in favor of Illinois law if this case did not involve third-party claims against Wisconsin [23] domiciliaries, the Court agrees with Judge Reynolds that the third-party claims cannot be ignored. In light of the presence of the third-party defendants, the "domiciles of the parties" factor favors the application of Wisconsin law.

REV_00263193

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n8 An existing cause of action is regarded in Wisconsin as a vested right protected by the due process guarantee. Hunter v. School District, 90 Wis. 2d 523, 280 N.W.2d 313 (Wis. App. 1979), aff'd, 97 Wis. 2d 435, 293 N.W.2d 515 (Wis. 1980). The third-party defendants argue persuasively that "although [they] are the object, not the subject, of a claim, there is no reason to treat any differently [their] vested right to [the] protection afforded by the Wisconsin statutory cap."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

5. Conclusions

With respect to the plaintiffs' wrongful death damages claims, two of the three relevant RESTATEMENT factors favor Wisconsin as the state with the most significant relationship to the occurrence and the parties. The third relevant factor -- "domiciles [24] of the parties" -- presents a closer question, but the Court resolves this question in favor of Wisconsin law for the reasons discussed above. n9 The plaintiffs have failed to overcome the presumption [*879] that favors the law of the place where the injury occurred. Likewise, for purposes of Rule 60, they have failed to show "exceptional circumstances" warranting relief from the Court's earlier choice-of-law rulings. Williams, 890 F.2d at 995.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n9 Even if this were the only relevant factor, as plaintiffs argue, the Court could not disregard the third-party claims against Wisconsin domiciliaries. As explained above, these claims are inextricably intertwined with the underlying claims against Bennett and Star.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

One last point, touched upon briefly by the defendants, is that the plaintiffs had no "justified expectation" that Illinois' law would apply to their claims. RESTATEMENT § 6(2)(d). Indeed, application of Illinois law to the plaintiffs' wrongful death damages claims would endorse a kind of lottery [25] system for Wisconsin plaintiffs who are injured in Wisconsin. The "winners" of the lottery would be those injured by tortfeasors from other states that do not cap wrongful death damages. The "losers" would be those injured by fellow Wisconsin-ites, against whom recovery is limited. Such a system would undermine certainty, predictability and uniformity of result. Id., § 6(f).

C. Certification Of An Interlocutory Appeal Under Section 1292(b)

In considering the plaintiffs' request for interlocutory review, the Court is mindful that the law disfavors "piecemeal appellate review of trial court decisions which do not terminate the litigation." United States v. Hollywood Motor Car Co., 458 U.S. 263, 265, 73 L. Ed. 2d 754, 102 S. Ct. 3081 (1982). Interlocutory appeal under Section 1292(b) is "used sparingly, in exceptional cases." 16 FEDERAL PRACTICE & PROCEDURE § 3929, at 365; see also Baranski v. Serhant, 602 F. Supp. 33, 36 (N.D. Ill. 1985). To demonstrate that interlocutory review under Section 1292(b) is appropriate, the movant must show that the district court's ruling involves "a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial [26] ground for difference of opinion and that an immediate appeal from the order may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation." 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). n10

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n10 A question of law may be "controlling" if its resolution "is quite likely to affect the further course of the litigation, even if not certain to do so." Sokaogon Gaming Enterprise Corp. v.

REV_00263194

Tushie-Montgomery Associates, Inc., 86 F.3d 656, 659 (7th Cir. 1996).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

With respect to the choice-of-law issue, the plaintiffs have failed to address the specific statutory criteria for certification. However, they do appeal to judicial efficiency by arguing that this case "should only be tried once and with the proper substantive laws." Implicit in Section 1292(b) is a directive to consider the "probable gains and losses of immediate appeal." FEDERAL PRACTICE & PROCEDURE § 3929, at 416. The advantages of immediate appeal increase with a number of factors, including the "length of the district court proceedings saved [27] by reversal of an erroneous ruling." Id. On the other hand, if the trial of the case can be had in a few days, "the possibility of saving relatively small amounts of trial court time is not thought sufficient to justify immediate appeal." Id. at 434; see also Cardwell v. C&O Railway Co., 504 F.2d 444, 446 (6th Cir. 1974) (Section 1292(b) "was not intended to authorize interlocutory appeals in ordinary suits for personal injuries or wrongful death that can be tried and disposed of on their merits in a few days."). Today's ruling disallowing evidence or argument in support of the plaintiffs' punitive damages claim n11 will significantly shorten the length of this trial, originally scheduled to last three weeks. Also, the defendants have stipulated that if Wisconsin law applies "the pecuniary loss for Sharon Boomsma, Thomas Boomsma and James Spencer is the statutory limit and accordingly evidence regarding the relationship along with monies, goods and services lost [*880] becomes unnecessary." Star & Bennett's Pre-Trial Report, p. 34. n12 In short, since it appears the trial will last a matter of days (not weeks), the only proferred rationale for certification of an [28] immediate appeal (saving trial time) is no longer very compelling.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n11 See infra, Part III.

n12 See infra, Part IV-H.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Lastly, given the posture of this case, an immediate appeal will not "materially advance the ultimate termination of this litigation." Discovery has been concluded. Motions in limine have been filed. The case is ready for trial. If the choice-of-law issue were certified for interlocutory appeal, and a stay granted under Section 1292(b), trial would be postponed for an indefinite period. In short, certification under Section 1292(b) would only postpone the ultimate termination of this litigation, which has already been significantly delayed by the transfer of the case from Judge Reynolds to the undersigned District Judge. "'[Avoiding] delay is a particularly strong ground for denying appeal if certification is sought from a ruling made shortly before trial.'" Kapossy v. McGraw-Hill, Inc., 942 F. Supp. 996, 1004 (D.N.J. 1996) (quoting Baranski, supra); see also [29] Singh v. Daimler-Benz, AG, 800 F. Supp. 260, 263 (E.D. Pa. 1992), aff'd, 9 F.3d 303 (3rd Cir. 1993); Edwards v. Nat'l Audubon Society, Inc., 411 F. Supp. 744 (S.D.N.Y. 1976).

For all of these reasons, the Court declines to certify an immediate appeal under Section 1292(b).

III. PUNITIVE DAMAGES

A. Punitive Damages In Wisconsin

Before the question of punitive damages can be submitted to a jury, the court must determine, as a matter of law, that there is sufficient evidence to support an award of punitive damages. Sharp v. Case Corp., 227 Wis. 2d 1, 595 N.W.2d 380, 389 (Wis. 1999). As a consequence of the enactment in 1995 of Wis. Stat. § 895.85, Wisconsin is now "among the states having the most stringent punitive damage conduct requirements." R. Blatt et al., PUNITIVE DAMAGES 326-27 (2001 Supp.). Prior to the passage of this statute, the common law standard governing awards of punitive damages permitted such awards on the basis of "reckless indifference to or disregard of the rights of others on the part of the wrongdoer." Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 294 N.W.2d 437, 442 (1980) [30] (citations omitted). This standard did not require proof of "an intentional desire to injure, vex or annoy, or proof of malice, in order to sustain an award for punitive damages." Id. By contrast Section 895.85 now provides that a plaintiff "may receive punitive damages if evidence is submitted showing that the defendant acted maliciously toward the plaintiff or in an intentional disregard of the rights of the plaintiff." Wis. Stat. § 895.85(3) (emphasis added). The intent of the legislature to heighten the standard for recovery of punitive damages could not be clearer. The change in the law was opposed by my colleague, Judge Lynn Adelman, when he served in the Wisconsin Senate. In a 1999 opinion, however, Judge Adelman acknowledged that the legislature's intent in passing the law had been "to make it more difficult for a plaintiff to recover punitive damages" by adopting a standard "more narrow than the case law standard which allowed punitive damages for conduct which showed a reckless indifference to or disregard of the rights of others on the part of the wrongdoer." Unified Catholic Schools v. Universal Credit Card Services Corp., 34 F. Supp.2d 714, 718 (E.D. Wis. 1999). [31] It is clear from the text of the statute that Section 895.85 marks a significant departure from the common law standard. The [*881] defendants' extensive citations to the legislative history underscore this point. n13

REV_00263195

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n13 The Court does not agree with the plaintiffs that Star and Bennett have "misstated the law regarding the quantum of evidence required to secure an instruction for punitive damages." If anything, the plaintiffs mis-state the law when they imply that Jones v. Secura Ins. Co., 2002 WI 11, 638 N.W.2d 575, 249 Wis. 2d 623 (2002) has liberalized the standard for recovery of punitive damages under Section 895.85. The decision in Secura contains a fleeting quotation of the pre-1995 common law standard. However, the new standard under Section 895.85 was not directly at issue in Secura and indeed was not even quoted in that decision except in a footnote. Likewise, it is misleading for the plaintiffs to quote a portion of the Unified Catholic Schools decision out of context for the proposition that "all that is required to be shown [to recover punitive damages] is . . . 'bad intent deserving of punishment.'"

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [32]

B. Applying Section 895.85

In Wisconsin, the malicious or intentional conduct necessary to recover punitive damages must be proved by clear and convincing evidence. PUNITIVE DAMAGES at 327 (citing Wangen, supra). Wisconsin Jury Instruction 1707.1 provides some guidance concerning how to apply the stringent standard adopted in Section 895.85. The first part of the instruction re-states the statutory language. The second part provides:

> A person's acts are malicious when they are the result of hatred, ill will, a desire for revenge, or inflicted under circumstances where insult or injury is intended. A person acts in intentional disregard of the rights of the plaintiff if the person acts with a purpose to disregard the plaintiff's rights, or is aware that his or her acts are practically certain to result in the plaintiff's rights being disregarded.

REV_00263196

Wis JI-Civil 1701.7.

The plaintiffs do not allege that either Star or Bennett acted maliciously or with a purpose to injure the decedents. Thus, if there is an argument to be made for punitive damages, it must be that the defendants acted with intentional disregard [33] for the rights of the plaintiffs in the sense of being aware that their acts were practically certain to result in the plaintiffs' rights being disregarded. As the jury instruction makes clear, "this state of mind has three characteristics that distinguish it from recklessness: (1) a subjective *awareness on the part of the defendant (2) that his conduct is practically certain to result in (3) the plaintiff's rights being disregarded. A jury may not consider whether the defendant "ought to have been aware" of the potential for a certain outcome. Instead, the focus must be on his actual awareness. Secondly, for an outcome to be "practically certain," it must be more than "reasonably probable" or "likely," it must approach being inevitable. For example, it is "practically certain" that shouting "Fire!" in a crowded theater will cause panic. It is not practically certain (though it is very likely) that the New York Yankees will go to the World Series again this year. Lastly, the thing which must be practically certain is not harm in the abstract, or even harm to a certain class of people (e.g., other drivers on the road), but harm to the plaintiff. [34] Hanaway v. Bach, No. 98-CV-233 (Wal. Co. Cir. Ct.) Nov. 5, 1999, at 15-17.

The plaintiffs have failed to come forward with evidence -- much less clear and convincing evidence -- that Star and/or Bennett acted with intentional disregard for the rights of the Boomsmas and James Spencer. Even if the Court accepts as true the testimony of the plaintiffs' experts that Star was so profit-hungry that it permitted or encouraged Bennett to violate federal hours-of-service regulations and/or drive in a fatigued condition, n14 Star's "active [*882] involvement in creating and sustaining such illegality" would amount at most to reckless disregard for the safety of other drivers. Such conduct would support an award of punitive damages under the pre-1995 common law standard. Wangen, supra. It does not, however, constitute maliciousness or intentional disregard for the plaintiffs' rights. Accordingly, the defendants' motion in limine [260-1] is granted and the plaintiffs are barred from introducing evidence of the defendants' wealth or value. Likewise, in presenting their case for negligence, the plaintiffs must not argue, remark or suggest that the defendants' conduct was wilful, [35] intentional, or malicious.

IV. MOTIONS IN LIMINE

A. Plaintiff's Motion In Limine # 1 [251-1]

The plaintiffs' first motion in limine seeks to exclude evidence of Bennett's acquittal on criminal charges arising from the accident. The plaintiffs argue that such evidence is inadmissible hearsay, that it is irrelevant (because of the differing standards of proof in criminal and civil proceedings), and that its potential prejudice outweighs any probative value it may have. The third-party defendants join in the motion, relying upon United States v. De La Rosa, 171 F.3d 215 (5th Cir. 1999); United States v. Jones, 808 F.2d 561 (7th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 481 U.S. 1006 (1987); and United States v. Lahey, 55 F.3d 1289 (7th Cir. 1995). Star and Bennett agree that evidence of the acquittal should be precluded. In addition, they argue that the Court's ruling, in limine, should extend "to preclude any party from making reference to the fact that Bennett was criminally prosecuted at all." The Court agrees that the broader order sought by the defendants is appropriate. To the extent it is necessary [36] to introduce witnesses, exhibits, or trial transcripts from the criminal proceedings, the parties and their counsel must reference that evidence as being from "prior court proceedings." In the event that improper reference is made to the criminal prosecution, the Court will consider a defense motion to admit evidence of Bennett's acquittal or structure other appropriate relief.

REV_00263197

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n14 In light of the discussion, supra, concerning injury-causing conduct that allegedly occurred in Illinois, the Court has its doubts.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

B. Plaintiff's Motion In Limine # 2 [252-1]

Plaintiffs' second motion in limine seeks to preclude any reference to the fact that Charles Bennett's wife, Elizabeth Bennett, may have "lost a child to death." Such evidence, according to the plaintiffs, would be irrelevant and intended purely "to gain sympathy with the jury." The motion, being unopposed, is granted.

C. Plaintiff's Motion In Limine # 3 [253-1]

Plaintiffs' third motion in limine seeks to exclude from evidence "any [37] and all evidence, argument, and/or reference to" a letter that Noreen Boomsma sent to the editor of the Fond du Lac Reporter concerning "the criminal trial and/or fog conditions." This motion, being unopposed, is granted.

D. Plaintiff's Motion In Limine # 4 [254-1]

Plaintiffs' fourth motion in limine seeks to exclude "any and all evidence, argument, and/or reference to" the fact that Frank Bartzen "had an opinion that James Spencer died prior to his arrival at the scene." The defendants and third-party defendants agree that Bartzen, a "first responder" at the scene of the accident, should be precluded from offering an opinion on this question (because he is not qualified to do so), but maintain that he should be allowed to testify concerning his [*883] factual observations and his own actions at the scene. This proposed compromise is consistent with the Court's approach to the testimony of another non-expert who was on the scene shortly after the accident, Susan Casper. Accordingly, the motion is granted in part and denied in part. No opinion testimony may be elicited from Bartzen on the question of whether Spencer died prior to his arrival on the scene.

E. Forrest Baker [38] [256-1 and 258-1])

Before the Court are two separate defense motions aimed at the expert witness testimony of Baker. These motions are untimely under the briefing schedule established by Judge Reynolds. The defendants are, of course, free to cross-examine Baker vigorously concerning his opinions and whether or not they are "speculative" during the trial of this action. These in limine motions, however, are denied.

F. "Non-Disclosed Experts" ([255-1] and [259-1])

The defendants seek to exclude the testimony of various "hybrid witnesses" whom the plaintiffs allegedly failed to disclose under Rule 26. The defendants earlier attempted to bar the testimony of Casper using the same rationale, but the Court determined that the version of Civ. L.R. 26.1 in effect during 1999-2000 did not require disclosure of hybrid witnesses. The same reasoning compels the Court to deny the defendants' motion[s] to bar non-disclosed experts.

G. Star's Motion To Bar Presentation Of Evidence Concerning Whether Star/Bennett Have Insurance Coverage For Punitive Damages [261-1]

In light of the Court's decision not to admit any evidence or argument pertaining to punitive damages (see [39] discussion supra), defendants' motion to bar evidence of insurance coverage for punitive damages is granted. The plaintiffs, in any event, concede that such evidence is inadmissible.

REV_00263198

H. Star/Bennett's Motion In Limine To Preclude Testimony From Decedents' Family Members Or Other Evidence Concerning "Loss Of Society & Companionship" Damages [262-1]

As noted above in connection with the likely length of the trial, the defendants have stipulated that the damages sustained by the plaintiffs who are legally entitled to recover damages for loss of society and companionship is the statutory maximum of $ 150,000. Accordingly, testimony or other evidence concerning such damages would serve no purpose other than to prejudice the defendants. The presentation of such evidence would also consume valuable time, which could be better devoted to issues that are actually in dispute. As the defendants correctly note, the stipulation means that "there is simply nothing for the jury to decide" with respect to this aspect of the case. In opposing this motion in limine, the plaintiffs reprise their arguments about the "unconscionable inequity" of applying Wisconsin law in this case. These [40] arguments are in vain, however, because the Court has determined that Wisconsin law will apply. The motion is granted.

I. Star/Bennett's Motion To Preclude Evidence Of Bennett's Criminal Records [264-1]

Fourteen years ago, Bennett was convicted of multiple counts of sexually assaulting a minor. He served prison time. The defendants are understandably eager to keep this information from the jury. The Court agrees that the convictions are completely irrelevant to the issues in this case and potentially extremely [*884] prejudicial. The plaintiffs concede that the convictions are inadmissible under Rule 404 (character evidence), but argue that they may be admissible under Rule 609 for the purpose of impeaching Bennett's credibility should he testify. The Court will under Rule 609 exclude the prior felony evidence because fourteen years have passed since Bennett's conviction. Even if ten years have not passed since Bennett's release from the confinement imposed for the offense, the evidence is properly excluded under Rule 403.

J. Star/Bennett's Motion To Bar Evidence of Chelsea's State Of Mind Prior To Death [263-1]

The defendants, joined by the third-party defendants, ask [41] the Court to "bar the plaintiffs from offering inferences or argument . . . concerning Chelsea Boomsma's state of mind prior to her death for purposes of a claim for mental suffering or mental anguish." The defendants acknowledge that Chelsea may have experienced physical pain in the interval between the accident and her death several hours later. However, the defendants maintain there is no evidence that Chelsea experienced mental suffering caused either by an awareness of her own injuries or because she knew about the demise of her family members. Thus, according to the defendants, it would be speculative and prejudicial to allow "inferences or argument" concerning Chelsea's state of mind. The defendants' argument is belied by the deposition testimony of Randall Campshure, another "first responder" at the accident scene. Mr. Campshure unequivocally testified that he heard a girl's voice coming from the wreckage of the Boomsma vehicle, saying "Help us, help us; get us out of here." Deposition of Randall Campshure ("Campshure Dep."), p. 23. Because there appears to be a factual basis for the plaintiffs' intended "argument" and "inference" concerning mental suffering endured by Chelsea, [42] the defendants' motion is denied.

K. Star/Bennett's Motion To Bar Evidence Relating To Post-Accident Log Modifications [257-1]

The defendants seek to bar evidence that Star prompted Bennett to modify his driver's logs subsequent to the accident. The defendants argue that post-accident conduct lacks relevance and that, in any event, its probative value is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the defendants. According to the defendants, "what Bennett's pre-accident activities were and whether those activities are properly construed as 'on duty' or 'off duty' under Federal regulations can be placed before the jury without reference to the fact that Star met with Bennett after the accident and worked with him to amend the logs to comport with what Star felt was the appropriate interpretation of how to record that time." The plaintiffs argue that Star coerced Bennett into amending his logs and that such evidence is "highly probative of Star's business practices, and both defendants' proclivity for violating the law whenever they feel like it." Indeed, according to the plaintiffs, this evidence goes to the heart of their case, which is that "Star is a [43] rogue firm that systematically violates federal laws enacted for safety simply to increase its revenues."

REV_00263199

The Court disagrees with the defendants concerning the relevance of the disputed evidence. Although the parties' briefing fails to illuminate the point, it appears that the log modifications in question, though they were made (or discussed) after the accident, pertained to pre-accident entries. Evidence of the post-accident modifications could therefore be relevant if the modifications reflect a lack of care on the part of the defendants. See Fed. R. Evid. [*885] 401. As for prejudice, not every fact that is potentially embarrassing or difficult to explain should be excluded on prejudice grounds. The best way of dealing with this evidence is not to exclude it altogether but to allow. the defendants to present the jury with their own explanation concerning the modifications. The motion is denied.

L. Star/Bennett's Motion To Bar Accident Photos [265-1]

The defendants seek to bar the introduction of accident' scene photos, especially any that "graphically depict[] the decedents within the wreckage following the accident." The defendants propose that the Court only allow [44] photographs taken after the decedents' bodies were removed from the wreckage. The Court is inclined to agree that "bodily photos" would be unfairly prejudicial, especially since several of the decedents were children. On the other hand, plaintiffs and third-party defendants suggest (without much elaboration) that at least some of these photos may be relevant to issues of liability. Lacking the benefit of in camera inspection, the Court is unable to assess these arguments under Rule 403. Accordingly, unless the parties are able to reach agreement amongst themselves, the defendants shall submit to the Court, ten days before the trial of this action, all photographs they seek to exclude. The Court will issue a ruling prior to the start of trial. The motion is held in abeyance.

NOW, THEREFORE, BASED ON THE FOREGOING, IT IS HEREBY ORDERED THAT:

1. Plaintiffs' "Motion For Relief From Order" [276-1] is DENIED; and

2. Star and Bennett's "Motion In Limine On Punitive Damages Claims" [260-1] is GRANTED; and

3. Plaintiffs' motion in limine No. 1 seeking to bar evidence of Bennett's acquittal [251-1] is GRANTED; and

4. Plaintiff's motion in limine No. 2 seeking to bar evidence [45] that Elizabeth Bennett "lost a child to death" [252-1] is GRANTED; and

5. Plaintiff's motion in limine - No. 3 [253-1] is GRANTED; and

6. Plaintiff's motion in limine - No. 4 [254-1] is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part; and

REV_00263200

7. Defendants' motion to bar non-disclosed experts [255-1] is DENIED; and

8. Defendants' motion to bar non-disclosed expert opinions [259-1] is DENIED; and

9. Defendants' motion to bar the remarks of Forrest Baker that Star destroyed records [256-1] is DENIED; and

10. Defendants' motion to preclude evidence relating to post-accident log modifications [257-1] is DENIED; and

11. Defendants' motion to bar certain opinions of Forrest Baker [258-1] is DENIED; and

12. Defendants' motion to bar evidence of insurance coverage of punitive damages [261-1] is GRANTED; and

13. Defendants' motion to exclude evidence concerning loss of society and companionship [262-1] is GRANTED; and

14. Defendants' motion to bar evidence concerning Chelsea Boomsma's state of mind prior to death [263-1] is DENIED; and

15. Defendants' motion to preclude evidence of Bennett's criminal record [264-1] is GRANTED; and

16. Defendants' motion to exclude photographs [46] of decedents' injuries [265-1] is held in abeyance; and

17. Defendants' motion to strike the affidavits of Mark Mitler and Forrest Baker [286-1] is GRANTED; and [*886]

18. The Court will conduct a conference call on May 24, 2002 at 10:00 AM (central time).

Dated at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, this 14th day of May, 2002.

SO ORDERED,

HON. RUDOLPH T. RANDA

U.S. District Judge

Source: Legal > Federal Legal - U.S. > Federal Cases Within 2 Years, Combined Courts ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /15 (intentional /2 disregard) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, October 11, 2002 - 12:45 AM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00263201

limine, significant relationship, log, decedents', immediate appeal, occurrence, practically, driver, choice of law, limine, depecage, injury-causing, certification, scene, intentional disregard, domiciliary, cap, modifications, domicile, regulations, deposition, domiciled, interlocutory appeal, common law, local law, interlocutory

CORE CONCEPTS - ◆ Hide Concepts

Civil Procedure > Relief From Judgment > Mistake & Excusable Neglect

Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b) provides a district court with the discretion to afford relief from a judgment or order under certain specified circumstances. The residual provision in Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b)(6) authorizes relief for any other reason justifying relief from the operation of the judgment. Relief is available pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b)(6) only in exceptional circumstances.

Civil Procedure > State & Federal Interrelationships > Choice of Law

Torts > Wrongful Death & Survival

Illinois courts apply the most significant relationship test to determine the applicable law in wrongful death actions. Two sets of criteria are provided for determining which state has the most significant relationship to the occurrence and the parties. The first set of criteria includes general factors such as the needs of the interstate system; relevant policies of the forum and other interested states; protection of justified expectations; the basic policies underlying the particular field of law; certainty, predictability, and uniformity of result; and ease in the determination and application of the law to be applied. The second and more specific set of criteria provides a list of contacts that should be taken into account by a district court. These are: (1) the place where the injury occurred; (2) the place where the conduct causing the injury occurred; (3) the domicil, residence, nationality, place of incorporation and place of business of the parties; and (4) the place where the relationship, if any, between the parties is centered. These factors are to be evaluated according to their relative importance with respect to the particular issue.

Civil Procedure > State & Federal Interrelationships > Choice of Law

Torts > Wrongful Death & Survival

In the context of a choice of law issue in a wrongful death claim, although Illinois no longer follows the simpler rule of lex loci delicti, the place where the injury occurred remains the single most important factor in applying the most significant relationship test. In the absence of unusual circumstances, the highest scorer on the most significant relationship test is the place where the tort occurred. Most often this is expressed in the form of a presumption that favors the law of the place where the injury occurred. Illinois' choice of law rules give presumptive importance to the place of injury. The local law of a state where the injury occurred should determine the rights and liabilities of the parties, unless Illinois has a more significant relationship with the occurrence and with the parties.

Civil Procedure > State & Federal Interrelationships > Choice of Law

Torts > Wrongful Death & Survival

In an action for wrongful death, the local law of the state where the injury occurred determines the rights and liabilities of the parties unless, with respect to the particular issue, some other state has a more significant relationship to the occurrence and the parties, in which event the local law of the other state will be applied.The law selected determines the measure of damages in an action for wrongful death.

Civil Procedure > State & Federal Interrelationships > Choice of Law

Torts > Wrongful Death & Survival

REV_00263184

In the context of a wrongful death claim, it will be a relatively rare situation in which a state other than that where the injury occurs has the most significant relationship to the occurrence and the parties. The presumption furthers the choice-of-law values of certainty, predictability and uniformity of result and, since the state where the injury occurred will usually be readily ascertainable, of ease in the determination and application of the applicable law.

Civil Procedure > State & Federal Interrelationships > Choice of Law

Depecage refers to the process of determining choice of law on an issue-by-issue basis (versus a blanket approach).

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > Supplemental Pleadings

A party is not permitted to create an issue of fact by submitting an affidavit whose conclusions contradict prior deposition or other sworn testimony.

Torts > Wrongful Death & Survival

Only the defendants' domiciles are relevant to the issue of whether to limit damages for wrongful death. The purpose of a damages cap is to protect resident defendants from excessive financial burdens. The domicile of the plaintiffs (who reside in a state with a cap) bears no relationship to this purpose. Accordingly, the residency of the defendants is the only significant contact with respect to the damages limitation issue.

Civil Procedure > State & Federal Interrelationships > Choice of Law

Critical to conflicts of law analysis is the notion that a district court must examine the choice-of-law rules not with regard to the various states' interests in general, but precisely, with regard to each states, interest in the specific question before the court.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Appellate Jurisdiction > Interlocutory Orders

In considering a plaintiff's request for interlocutory review, a district court is mindful that the law disfavors piecemeal appellate review of trial court decisions which do not terminate the litigation. Interlocutory appeal under 28 U.S.C.S. § 1292(b) is used sparingly, in exceptional cases. To demonstrate that interlocutory review under § 1292 (b) is appropriate, a movant must show that the district court's ruling involves a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion and that an immediate appeal from the order may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Appellate Jurisdiction > Interlocutory Orders

Implicit in 28 U.S.C.S. § 1292(b) is a directive to consider the probable gains and losses of immediate appeal. The advantages of immediate appeal increase with a number of factors, including the length of the district court proceedings saved by reversal of an erroneous ruling. On the other hand, if the trial of a case can be had in a few days, the possibility of saving relatively small amounts of trial court time is not thought sufficient to justify immediate appeal.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Appellate Jurisdiction > Interlocutory Orders

Avoiding delay is a particularly strong ground for denying an interlocutory appeal if certification is sought from a ruling made shortly before trial.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

Before the question of punitive damages can be submitted to a jury, a district court must determine, as a matter of law, that there is sufficient evidence to support an award of punitive damages. As a consequence of Wis. Stat. § 895.85 (1995), Wisconsin is now among the states having the most stringent punitive damage conduct requirements. Wis. Stat. § 895.85 (1995) provides that a plaintiff may receive punitive damages if evidence is submitted showing that the defendant acted maliciously toward the plaintiff or in an intentional disregard of the rights of the plaintiff. Wis. Stat. § 895.85(3). The legislature's intent in passing the law had been to make it more difficult for a plaintiff to recover punitive damages by adopting a standard more narrow than the case law standard which allowed punitive damages for conduct which showed a reckless indifference to or disregard of the rights of others on the part of the wrongdoer.

REV_00263185

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

In Wisconsin, the malicious or intentional conduct necessary to recover punitive damages must be proved by clear and convincing evidence. Wis. Stat. § 895.85 (1995). A person's acts are malicious when they are the result of hatred, ill will, a desire for revenge, or inflicted under circumstances where insult or injury is intended. A person acts in intentional disregard of the rights of the plaintiff if the person acts with a purpose to disregard the plaintiff's rights, or is aware that his or her acts are practically certain to result in the plaintiff's rights being disregarded.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

In the context of the intentional disregard necessary for a punitive damages award, the state of mind has three characteristics that distinguish it from recklessness: (1) a subjective awareness on the part of a defendant (2) that his conduct is practically certain to result in (3) a plaintiff's rights being disregarded. A jury may not consider whether the defendant ought to have been aware of the potential for a certain outcome. Instead, the focus must be on his actual awareness. Secondly, for an outcome to be practically certain, it must be more than reasonably probable or likely, it must approach being inevitable. Lastly, the thing which must be practically certain is not harm in the abstract, or even harm to a certain class of people (e.g., other drivers on the road), but harm to the plaintiff.

Evidence > Relevance > Relevant Evidence

Evidence of post-accident modifications can be relevant if the modifications reflect a lack of care on the part of the defendants. Fed. R. Evid. 401.

COUNSEL: For PLAINTIFF(S): Edmund J. Scanlan, Scanlan Law Office, Chicago, IL.

For DEFENDANT(S): Paul J. Pytlik, Hills Legal Group, Waukesha, WI.

For DEFENDANT(S): Elliott R. Schiff, Jill B. Lewis, Schiff Gorman & Krkljes, Chicago, IL.

JUDGES: HON. RUDOLPH T. RANDA, U.S. District Judge.

OPINIONBY: RUDOLPH T. RANDA

OPINION: [*871]

DECISION AND ORDER

These actions come before the Court on a Rule 60(b) motion by the plaintiffs for relief from the Court's Orders of June 26, 2001 and March 7, 2002 as they relate to "choice of law." Specifically, the plaintiffs assert that Illinois law applies to their wrongful death damages claims against defendants Star Transport, Inc. ("Star") and Charles I. Bennett ("Bennett"). In the event the Court decides that Wisconsin law applies, the plaintiffs ask the Court to certify an interlocutory appeal of the choice-of-law issue pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). Also before the Court are a number of motions in limine, including a motion by Star and Bennett that would bar evidence or argument in support of the plaintiffs' claim for punitive damages. [2]

REV_00263186

For the reasons set forth below, the Court denies both the plaintiffs' motion for relief and their request for certification of an interlocutory appeal. In addition, the Court finds that there is insufficient evidence of malicious or intentional conduct on the part of either Star or Bennett to submit the question of punitive damages to a jury under Wis. Stat. § 895.85(3). The [*872] remaining motions in limine are addressed in Part IV of this opinion.

BACKGROUND

These actions arise from a tragic accident that occurred near Fond du Lac, Wisconsin in the Fall of 1996, claiming the lives of five Wisconsin residents: Thomas G. and Sharon Boomsma, their children, Chelsea and Owen (collectively "Boomsmas"), and a young man named James Spencer ("Spencer"). At approximately 7:15 AM on September 23, 1996, a semi-trailer truck hit the Boomsmas' car and a school bus from behind. The Boomsmas and their children were killed, along with Spencer, who was a passenger in the rear of the school bus. Defendant Bennett, the driver of the semi-trailer truck, was employed at the time of the accident by defendant Star. As discussed below, Bennett was domiciled in Illinois at the time of the accident and [3] Star was a citizen of Illinois. Bennett was hauling a load of steel from Morton, Illinois to Hortonville, Wisconsin at the time of the collision.

Star and Bennett have asserted contributory negligence claims against the operator of the school bus, Stephanie Hansen ("Hansen"), the school bus owner, Fairwater Garage, Inc. ("Fairwater"), and Fairwater's liability carrier, Auto Owners Insurance Company ("Auto Owners"). These parties were all domiciled in Wisconsin at the time of the accident. On November 18, 1999, the claims against Hansen, et al. ("third-party claims") were consolidated with the action brought by the representatives of the Boomsma and Spencer estates.

On June 14, 2001, Judge Reynolds addressed Star and Bennett's motion for partial summary judgment, which sought the dismissal of the plaintiffs' claims for wrongful death damages under Illinois law. Judge Reynolds analyzed the relevant choice-of-law factors at length and concluded that "it appears that Wisconsin has a more substantial relationship to this action than Illinois." However, Judge Reynolds believed that the record was insufficiently developed to permit a determination with respect to one of the factors: where [4] the injury-causing conduct occurred. Accordingly, he decided to hold the defendants' motion for partial summary judgment in abeyance and make a determination concerning choice of law "after all the evidence has been presented at trial."

A pre-trial/settlement conference with the parties in June of last year persuaded Judge Reynolds that there was no reason to postpone a decision respecting choice of law. Therefore, on June 26, 2001, Judge Reynolds granted the defendants' motion for partial summary judgment and dismissed all claims brought under Illinois law.

The consolidated actions were assigned to this branch of the Court on June 26, 2001. The Court decided various issues relating to the admissibility of expert witness testimony on March 7, 2002. In addition, the Court's March 7, 2002 opinion addressed the scope of Noreen Boomsma's claims. Analyzing Wis. Stat. § 895.04, the Court concluded that Noreen Boomsma (Chelsea and Owen's grandmother), lacked standing to pursue a claim for loss of society and companionship with respect to either grandchild and that her claim on behalf of Chelsea's estate would be limited to a claim for conscious pain and suffering. This aspect of the Court's [5] March 7, 2002 opinion rested on the assumption that Judge Reynolds had correctly decided the choice-of-law issue.

REV_00263187

In response to the Court's March 7 decision, the plaintiffs filed the instant motion for relief under Rule 60 [276-1]. The plaintiffs argue that Illinois law should govern their wrongful death damages claims against Star and Bennett and that [*873] accordingly both Judge Reynolds' June 26, 2001 decision and the portion of the Court's March 7 order limiting Noreen Boomsma's claims should be vacated. The Court ordered briefing on the plaintiffs' motion, over the objection of Star and Bennett that the Rule 60 motion was untimely.

Additional facts and procedural history will be discussed as necessary below.

DISCUSSION

I. MOTIONS UNDER F.R.C.P. 60(b)

Rule 60(b) provides a district court with the discretion to afford relief from a judgment or order under certain specified circumstances. Talano v. Northwestern Medical Faculty Foundation, Inc., 273 F.3d 757, 762 (7th Cir. 2001). The plaintiffs' motion rests upon the residual provision in Rule 60(b)(6) that authorizes relief for "any other reason justifying relief from the operation of the judgment. [6] " Relief is available pursuant to 60(b)(6) only in "exceptional circumstances." Williams v. Hatcher, 890 F.2d 993, 995 (7th Cir.1989) (quotation omitted); see also 11 Charles A. Wright, et al., FEDERAL PRACTICE & PROCEDURE §§ 2864, at 357-76 (2d ed.1995).

II. CHOICE OF LAW

A. General Principles

1. The "Most Significant Relationship" Test

Illinois courts n1 apply the "most significant relationship" test of the RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONFLICTS OF LAWS to determine the applicable law in wrongful death actions. In re Air Crash Near Chicago, 644 F.2d 594, 611 (7th Cir.), cert denied, 454 U.S. 878 (1981); see also Ingersoll v. Klein, 46 Ill. 2d 42, 262 N.E.2d 593, 596 (Ill. 1970). The RESTATEMENT provides two sets of criteria for determining which state has the most significant relationship to the occurrence and the parties. Air Crash, 644 F.2d at 611. The first set of criteria "includes general factors such as the needs of the interstate system; relevant policies of the forum and other interested states; protection of justified expectations; the basic policies underlying the [7] particular field of law; certainty, predictability, and uniformity of result; and ease in the determination and application of the law to be applied." Id. (citing RESTATEMENT § 6). The second and more specific set of criteria, found in Section 145 of the RESTATEMENT, provides a list of "contacts" that should be taken into account by the court. These are:

> (a) the place where the injury occurred;
>
> (b) the place where the conduct causing the injury occurred;
>
> (c) the domicil, residence, nationality, place of incorporation and place of business of the parties; and
>
> (d) the place where the relationship, if any, between the parties is centered.

RESTATEMENT § 145. These factors "are to be evaluated according to their relative importance with respect to the particular issue." Id.

REV_00263188

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 The defendants and third-party defendants each note that there are arguments to be made in favor of applying Wisconsin's choice-of-law rules. However, especially since Illinois and Wisconsin choice-of-law judicial decisions "seem roughly in accord" (as the third-party defendants note), the Court sees no reason to re-visit this aspect of Judge Reynolds' decision concerning choice of law.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [8]

Although Illinois no longer follows the simpler rule of lex loci delicti, the place where the injury occurred remains the single most important factor in applying the "most significant relationship" test. "In the absence of unusual circumstances, the highest scorer on the 'most significant relationship' test is -- the place where the tort [*874] occurred." Spinozzi v. ITT Sheraton, 174 F.3d 842, 844 (7th Cir. 1999). Most often this is expressed in the form of a presumption that favors the law of the place where the injury occurred. See Air Crash, 644 F.2d at 616 (Illinois' choice-of-law rules give "presumptive importance to the place of injury."). In the Ingersoll case, for example, the Illinois Supreme Court stated that "the local law of the State where the injury occurred should determine the rights and liabilities of the parties, unless Illinois has a more significant relationship with the occurrence and with the parties . . . ." 262 N.E.2d at 595 (emphasis added). Similarly, Sections 175 and 178 of the RESTATEMENT provide:

§ 175. RIGHT OF ACTION FOR DEATH

> In an action for wrongful death, the local law of the state where [9] the injury occurred determines the rights and liabilities of the parties unless, with respect to the particular issue, some other state has a more significant relationship . . . to the occurrence and the parties, in which event the local law of the other state will be applied.

§ 178. DAMAGES

> The law selected by application of the rule of § 175 determines the measure of damages in an action for wrongful death.

RESTATEMENT, §§ 175 & 178. The commentary accompanying Section 175 suggests that it will be a "relatively rare situation" in which a "state other than that where the injury occurred" has the most significant relationship to the occurrence and the parties. Id. (cmt. (d), emphasis added). The commentary also explains that the presumption embodied in Section 175 "furthers the choice-of-law values of certainty, predictability and uniformity of result and, since the state where the injury occurred will usually be readily ascertainable, of ease in the determination and application of the applicable law." Id.

2. "Depecage"

As noted in the Court's April 10, 2002 order, "depecage" is a French word for "dismemberment." BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY 448 [10] (7th ed. 1999). In this context, depecage refers to the process of determining choice of law on an issue-by-issue basis (versus a "blanket approach"). As the Seventh Circuit noted in Ruiz v. Blentech Corp., 89 F.3d 320 (7th Cir. 1996), cert denied, 519 U.S. 1077, 136 L. Ed. 2d 677, 117 S. Ct. 737

REV_00263189

(1997), depecage is the approach embodied in the RESTATEMENT. The plaintiffs urge the Court to apply the concept of depecage and rule that (1) Illinois law will govern their wrongful death damages claims against defendants Star and Bennett; and (2) Wisconsin law will govern their punitive damages claims. n2 Depecage permits, but does not necessarily require, the application of different local law to different issues within a case. Thus, it is possible to analyze the wrongful death damages issue separately (as Judge Reynolds failed to do) and nevertheless agree with Judge Reynolds that on all issues Wisconsin has the most significant relationship to the occurrence and the parties.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n2 The parties agree that Wisconsin law should govern the plaintiffs' claim for punitive damages and likewise the third-party claims against Hansen, Fairwater and Auto Owners. Accordingly, the Court will focus on which state's law should apply to the plaintiffs' wrongful death damages claims.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [11]

B. Wrongful Death Damages Claims Against Star & Bennett

The Court begins by identifying the conflict of laws. The version of the Wisconsin Wrongful Death Act that was in effect at the time of the accident limits non-economic damages to $ 150,000 per person. Wis. Stat. § 895.04(4) (1995-1996); see also [*875] Neiman v. American Nat'l Prop. & Cas. Co., 2000 WI 83, 613 N.W.2d 160, 164, 236 Wis. 2d 411 (2000). Illinois law contains no such limitation. n3 The plaintiffs have therefore shown an understandable persistence in seeking to avoid the application of Wisconsin law with respect to wrongful death damages. The Court will now turn to the relevant RESTATEMENT factors to determine, with respect to this issue, which state has the most significant relationship to the occurrence and the parties.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n3 In addition, the plaintiffs argue that there is a "more subtle" conflict between Wisconsin law and the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Act, 49 U.S.C. § 30101, et seq. The Court does not find this alleged conflict significant for purposes of determining whether to apply Wisconsin or Illinois law. See Decision and Order of June 14, 2001, p. 12 n. 6.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [12]

1. Where Did The Injury Occur?

It is undisputed that the accident giving rise to this lawsuit occurred in the State of Wisconsin. Although the Seventh Circuit has recently emphasized the pre-eminent importance of the place of the injury, Spinozzi, 174 F.3d at 844 (except in "unusual circumstances"), the plaintiffs urge the Court to disregard this factor altogether, citing Air Crash, 644 F.2d at 615. As its name suggests, this case arose from the crash of a Los Angeles-bound DC-10 aircraft shortly after take-off from O'Hare International Airport in Illinois. In that particular factual context, the Seventh Circuit believed that the place of injury was "fortuitous" and therefore not to be assigned as much importance as other factors under the "most significant relationship" test. Id. The instant case is clearly distinguishable. An airplane flies high above the earth. When it crashes, the place where it actually comes to rest depends on the speed of the craft, its trajectory, the nature and timing of the accident, prevailing winds, and so on. In the case relied upon by the plaintiffs, because the airplane was supposed to fly from Chicago [13] to L.A., the Court observed that "had the DC-10's engine fallen off later, the injury might have occurred in one of any number of states." Id. There was, in other words, an element of fortuity, or chance, in the fact that the plane crashed in Illinois as opposed to some other state along the route. The same cannot be said of the accident in this case. Bennett was driving an earth-bound vehicle along a foggy patch of road near Fond du Lac, Wisconsin. He was headed for a destination in Wisconsin and was nowhere near any of the state's borders when the accident took place. It is not alleged that some latent defect existed in the truck, which might have caused an accident in any one of several states. In short, this case is distinguishable from Air Crash. There are no "unusual circumstances" that render the place of the accident fortuitous and thus insignificant for choice-of-law purposes. As far as the Court is concerned, therefore, the place of the accident remains the "highest scorer" on the most significant relationship test. Spinozzi, 174 F.3d at 844.

REV_00263190

2. Where Did The Injury-Causing Conduct Occur?

Although the accident occurred in Wisconsin, allegedly [14] as a consequence of Bennett's negligence in "failing to adjust the speed of [his] motor vehicle to the weather and visibility conditions that existed at the time of the collision,"Amended Complaint, P 12, the plaintiffs also assert that negligent conduct occurring in Illinois was a "substantial factor" in causing the decedents' injuries. Specifically, they maintain that Star "directed," "permitted" and/or "urged" Bennett to operate his semi-trailer on September 23, 1996 in violation of federally-mandated hours-of-service regulations and/or in a fatigued condition. Id. [*876]

The facts adduced by the defendants show that: (1) Star customarily determined whether a driver had been on duty in excess of 70 hours in an 8-day period by auditing logs submitted by the driver, n4 (2) Star took disciplinary action with respect to the hours-of-service violations that it did know about (i.e., those occurring during August of 1996, Bennett's first month on the job), and (3) Bennett submitted his log for the week of September 14 - September 22 on Saturday, September 21, 1996. The significance of the last fact (3) is that no one was on duty over the weekend to audit Bennett's logs. In other [15] words, Bennett departed on his fateful trip to Wisconsin before any auditing of the logs could take place. Thus, Star could not have directed, permitted or urged Bennett to drive in violation of the regulations. Similarly, the defendants note a dearth of evidence that anyone at Star observed Bennett in a fatigued condition when he left Morton, Illinois very early on the morning of the 23rd.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n4 Plaintiffs, citing the deposition testimony of defense expert Carmen W. Daecher ("Daecher"), argue that Star should have monitored hours-of-service on the basis of daily e-mails submitted by Bennett that included his hours of service. However, Daecher's testimony suggests that this would have been an imperfect means, at best, of calculating whether a driver was in violation of federal regulations. Deposition of Carmen W. Daecher ("Daecher Dep."), pp. 278-279.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Since the choice-of-law question originally came before Judge Reynolds on a motion for summary judgment, and since the plaintiffs are the proponents of Illinois law, [16] it is their burden to come forward with evidence creating a genuine factual issue as to whether injury-causing conduct occurred in Illinois. The plaintiffs claim to have met this burden by placing in the record "numerous evidentiary materials indicating that Star dispatched Bennett from Illinois when he was over the federally mandated hours of service including the date of this crash, and that this led to fatigue that caused the crash." In reality, the plaintiffs' argument does not rest on "numerous evidentiary materials" but on the testimony of three experts: Thomas Corsi ("Corsi"), Mark Mitler ("Mitler"), and Forrest Baker ("Baker"). Corsi's testimony has been disallowed by the Court because his opinions lack the rigor required under Daubert. The affidavits of Mitler and Baker are problematic for a number of reasons,

REV_00263191

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 30 San Diego L. Rev. 263

*30 San Diego L. Rev. 263, **

Copyright (c) 1993 San Diego Law Review Association
San Diego Law Review

Spring, 1993

30 San Diego L. Rev. 263

LENGTH: 10753 words

The American Law Institute's Reporters' Study on Enterprise Responsibility for Personal Injury: A Timely Call for Punitive Damages Reform

VICTOR E. SCHWARTZ * MARK A. BEHRENS **

* Victor Schwartz is a senior partner at the law firm of Crowell & Moring, Washington, D.C., where he co-chairs the firm's Torts and Insurance Practice Group. He is coauthor of the most widely used torts casebook in the United States, WILLIAM PROSSER, JOHN WADE, & VICTOR SCHWARTZ, CASES AND MATERIALS ON TORTS. Mr. Schwartz, a former law professor and dean, chaired the federal government's Interagency Taskforce on Product Liability and authored the Uniform Product Liability Act (UPLA). He has filed principal amicus briefs in recent Supreme Court cases considering whether punitive damages are constitutional. In a recent case holding West Virginia's punitive damages laws unconstitutional, Justice Richard Neely called Mr. Schwartz "perhaps America's foremost authority on tort matters." See Garnes v. Fleming Landfill, Inc., 413 S.E.2d 897, 906 (W. Va. 1991).

 Mark Behrens is an associate at the law firm of Crowell & Moring, Washington, D.C., where he specializes in the firm's Torts and Insurance Practice Group. Mr. Behrens graduated from Vanderbilt University law school. At Vanderbilt, he served as Associate Articles Editor of the Vanderbilt Law Review and received an American Jurisprudence Award for achievement in tort law. He received a bachelor's degree in economics from the University of Wisconsin-Madison.

SUMMARY:
... " The United States Supreme Court noted that this approach "insures that punitive damage awards are not grossly out of proportion to the severity of the offense and have some understandable relationship to compensatory damages." ... The federal court would also have the power to decide which state's substantive law to apply and would produce a single punitive damage award against the defendant for all members of the class. ... A special committee of the American Bar Association that studied punitive damages proposed that Congress establish a process for creating a national class action for multiple punitive damage claims arising out of conduct that results in similar injuries. ...

TEXT:

INTRODUCTION

In 1986, the American Law Institute (ALI) commissioned a study in response to the crisis confronting the United States tort litigation/liability insurance system. The project took more than five and one-half years and was authored by prominent professors from the nation's leading law schools. Advisers from academia as well as members of both the judiciary and n12 Id. In reviewing a case heard by the Alabama state courts, the United States Supreme Court stressed that the Alabama jury instructions at issue "enlightened the jury" on the "nature and purpose" of punitive damages. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 111 S. Ct. 1032, 1044 (1991). These instructions could be easily drafted into statutory form enabling a legislature to provide clear and unequivocal guidelines for the jury to determine whether punitive damages should be awarded.

REV_00263202

n13 Tuttle v. Raymond, 494 A.2d 1353, 1360-61 (Me. 1985). See, e.g., OwensIllinois v. Zenobia, 601 A.2d 633, 651 (Md. 1992); Rawlings v. Apodaca, 726 P.2d 565, 577 (Ariz. 1986); Freeman v. Andersen, 651 S.W.2d 450, 452 (Ark. 1983); Jardel v. Hughes, 523 A.2d 518, 527 (Del. 1987); Preston v. Murty, 512 N.E.2d 1174, 1175 (Ohio 1987); Lee v. Bank of America, 218 Cal. App. 3d 914, 920, 267 Cal. Rptr. 387, 390 (1990). See also David G. Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 MICH. L. REV. 1257, 1283 n.135 (1976) (" A ny definition of the punishable conduct, such as . . . "reckless' . . . disregard of the public safety will necessarily be quite vague."). See PETER W. HUBER, LIABILITY: THE LEGAL REVOLUTION AND ITS CONSE- QUENCES 128 (1988).

n14 See David G. Owen, The Moral Foundation of Punitive Damages, 40 ALA. L. REV. 705, 729 (1989); E. Donald Elliot, Why Punitive Damages Don't Deter Corporate Misconduct Effectively, 40 ALA. L. REV. 1053, 1057-60, 1065 (1989); 2 LINDA L. SCHLUETER & KENNETH R. REDDEN, PUNITIVE DAMAGES 418-19 (2d ed. 1989).

n15 An example of purely "intentional" wrongdoing would be an individual purposely firing a handgun at a specific person. In contrast, an example of "conscious" wrongdoing would be an individual purposely firing a handgun into a crowd of people.

n16 The American College of Trial Lawyers recommends that " t he appropriate minimum standard for culpability for punitive awards . . . requires a conscious indifference to the safety of others." ACTL REPORT, supra note 2, at 10. The American Bar Association recommends a standard of "conscious or deliberate disregard with respect to the plaintiff." ABA REPORT, supra note 2, at 18. See also W. PAGE KEETON ET AL., PROSSER AND KEETON ON THE LAW OF TORTS, 2 at 9-10 (5th ed. 1984) (punitive damages require circumstances of outrage, such as a "conscious and deliberate disregard of the interests of others").

n17 111 S. Ct. 1032 (1991). See generally Victor E. Schwartz & Mark A. Behrens, Punitive Damages Reform- -State Legislatures Can and Should Meet the Challenge Issued by the Supreme Court of the United States in Haslip, 42 AM. U. L. REV. 1365 (1993).

n18 See Haslip, 111 S. Ct. at 1046.

n19 See KEETON ET AL., supra note 16, at 9. See also Haslip, 111 S. Ct. at 1047- 50 (Scalia, J., concurring); James B. Sales, The Emergence of Punitive Damages in Product Liability Actions: A Further Assault on the Citadel, 14 ST. MARY'S L.J. 351, 351 (1983); Victor E. Schwartz & Liberty Magarian, Challenging the Constitutionality of Punitive Damages: Putting Rules of Reason on an Unbounded Legal Remedy, 28 AM. BUS. L.J. 485, 485 (1990); Samuel Freifield, The Rationale of Punitive Damages, 1 OHIO ST. L.J. 5, 7 (1935); and David L. Walther & Thomas A. Plein, Punitive Damages: A Critical Analysis: Kink v. Combs, 49 MARQ. L. REV. 369, 371 (1965).

n20 The "collateral source rule" prohibits a defendant from reducing damages based on benefits received by a plaintiff from outside, or collateral, sources such as insurance companies. See generally John G. Fleming, The Collateral Source Rule and Loss Allocation in Tort Law, 54 CAL. L. REV. 1478 (1986).

n21 See Note, Exemplary Damages in the Law of Torts, 70 HARV. L. REV. 517 (1957): "If an act is particularly wrongful, society imposes criminal sanctions in order to deter the wrongdoer and others from repeating the offense. But while some faults, such as ordinary negligence, should be discouraged, they do not warrant the stigma and severity of criminal punishment. Such deterrence is effected in tort law by shifting the loss: the defendant is forced to repair the harm done to the plaintiff." Id. at 523 (emphasis added).

REV_00263211

n22 ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 249.

n23 Id. at 248.

n24 See ABA REPORT, supra note 2, at 19; ACTL REPORT, supra note 2, at 15; Uniform Product Liability Act, 44 Fed. Reg. 62714, 62748 (1979). See also Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Punitive Damages, Due Process, and the Jury, 40 ALA. L. REV. 975, 994-95 (1989); Malcolm E. Wheeler, The Constitutional Case for Reforming Punitive Damages Procedures, 69 VA. L. REV. 269, 298 (1983); David G. Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, 49 U. CHI. L. REV. 1, 58-59 (1982).

n25 Haslip, 111 S. Ct. at 1046 n.11. One state, Colorado, requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt to support a punitive damages award. See COLO. REV. STAT. 13-25- 127 (2) (1989).

n26 See ALA. CODE 6-11-20 (Supp. 1992); ALASKA Stat. 09.17.020 (Supp. 1992); CAL. CIV. CODE 3294(a) (West Supp. 1992); GA. CODE ANN. 51-12-5.1 (Michie Supp. 1992); IND. CODE ANN. 34-4-34-2 (Burns 1986); IOWA CODE ANN. 668A.1 (West 1987); KAN. STAT. ANN. 60-3701(c) (1991); KY. REV. STAT. ANN. 411.184(2) (Michie/Bobbs-Merril 1991); MINN. STAT. ANN. 549.20 (West 1992); MISS. H.B. 1270 2(1)(a) (signed by governor Feb. 18, 1993); MONT. CODE ANN. 27- 1-221 (5) (1991); NEV. REV. STAT. ANN. 42.005(1) (Michie 1991); N.D. CENT. CODE 32-03.2-11 (signed by governor Mar. 31, 1993); OHIO REV. CODE ANN. 2307.80(A) (Anderson 1991); OKLA. STAT. ANN. tit. 23, 9 (West 1992); OR. REV. STAT. 30.925 (1991); S.C. CODE ANN. 15-33-135 (Law. Co-op., Supp. 1992); S.D. CODIFIED LAWS ANN. 21-1-4.1 (1987); UTAH CODE ANN. 78-18-1 (1992). Colorado requires proof of punitive damages liability "beyond a reasonable doubt." COLO. REV. STAT. 13-25- 127(2) (1987).

n27 See Travelers Indem. Co. v. Armstrong, 442 N.E.2d 349 (Ind. 1982); Linthicum v. Nationwide Life Ins. Co., 723 P.2d 675 (Ariz. 1986); Masaki v. General Motors Corp., 780 P.2d 566 (Haw. 1989); Tuttel v. Raymond, 494 A.2d 1353 (Me. 1985); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 294 N.W.2d 437 (Wis. 1980); Owens-Illinois v. Zenobia, 601 A.2d 633 (Md. 1992); Hodges v. S.C. Toof and Co., 833 S.W.2d 896, 901 (Tenn. 1992).

n28 See Haslip, 111 S. Ct. at 1064 (O'Connor, J., dissenting). Justice O'Connor argues that a clear and convincing evidence standard should be required of states because it would "signal to the jury that it should have a high level of confidence in its factual findings before imposing punitive damages." Id.

n29 Id. (a clear and convincing evidence standard would "permit closer scrutiny of the evidence by trial judges and reviewing courts").

n30 See id. (clear and convincing evidence standard would "constrain jury discretion"); See also Zenobia, 601 A.2d at 657; Masaki, 780 P.2d at 575. In Masaki, the Supreme Court of Hawaii held:

P unitive damages are a form of punishment and can stigmatize the defendant in much the same way as a criminal conviction. It is because of the penal character of punitive damages that a standard of proof more akin to that required in criminal trials is appropriate, rather than the preponderance of the evidence standard generally employed in trials of civil actions . . . . A more stringent standard of proof will assure that punitive damages are properly awarded.

REV_00263212

780 P.2d at 575.

n31 See ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 252-53.

n32 See id. at 253 ("we shall call for more searching reform of the criteria governing the size of punitive awards").

n33 See 1 JAMES D. GHIARDI & JOHN M. KIRCHER, PUNITIVE DAMAGES LAW AND PRACTICE 5.36 & Table 5-3 (1985 & Supp. 1989); Kenneth S. Abraham & John C. Jeffries, Punitive Damages and the Rule of Law: The Role of Defendant's Wealth, 18 J. LEGAL STUD. 415, 415 n.1 (1989); Dan B. Dobbs, Ending Punishment in "Punitive" Damages: Deterrence Measured Remedies, 40 ALA. L. REV. 831, 870 n.96 (1989).

n34 ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 254-55.

n35 See id. See also Dobbs, supra note 33, at 870-85.

n36 ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 254.

n37 Id. at 254-55.

n38 Id. at 255. See also PETER W. HUBER, LIABILITY: THE LEGAL REVOLUTION AND ITS CONSEQUENCES 118 (1988) ("When assessed against a corporation, for example, punitive damages are paid by stockholders, not by the responsible executives, and often not even by the stockholders who owned the company when the original mistakes were made.").

n39 See Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 111 S. Ct. 1032, 1045 (1991) (" T he factfinder must be guided by more than the defendant's net worth. Alabama plaintiffs do not enjoy a windfall because they have the good fortune to have a defendant with a deep pocket."). Alabama allows the defendant's wealth to be considered on appellate review, but during trial the jury is precluded from considering the wealth of the defendant. The Haslip opinion suggests that the jury's focus in determining punitive damages should be on the defendant's active wrongdoing, not on his wealth. In finding that Alabama's procedure met due process standards, the Supreme Court in Haslip relied on the Alabama trial court's decision to not allow the jury to consider the defendant's wealth.

n40 Bifurcation requires the same jury, usually at the defendant's request, to determine subsequent to deciding liability for compensatory damages whether liability for punitive damages exists and, if liability does exist, the amount of punitive damages.

n41 See ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 255 n.41.

n42 See ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 264. A jury that is informed about a firm's substantial profits from the product at issue in the case could be improperly influenced to issue a favorable plaintiff's verdict even though the case is weak for finding liability.

n43 See ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 255 n.41. See also Ellis, supra note 24, at 1003-07.

n44 See ABA REPORT, supra note 2, at 19.

n45 See ACTL REPORT, supra note 2, at 18-19. In the first common law decision on this point by a state supreme court, the Tennessee Supreme Court recently held that defendants may move for bifurcation in punitive damages cases. Hodges v. S.C. Toof & Co., 833 S.W.2d 896 (Tenn. 1992). The Tennessee holding follows changes made in several other states through court rules and legislation. See ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 95, 101.

REV_00263213

n46 See ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 256. This reform has been supported by commentators as well. See Griffin B. Bell & Perry E. Pearce, Punitive Damages and the Tort System, 22 U. RICH. L. REV. 1 (1987); David G. Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 MICH. L. REV. 1257 (1976); Malcolm E. Wheeler, The Constitutional Case for Reforming Punitive Damages Procedures, 69 VA. L. REV. 269 (1983).

n47 ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 256. See also Ellis, supra note 20, at 1003-07.

n48 See JUSTICE REFORM, supra note 2.

n49 See Council on California Competitiveness Report, California's Jobs And Future, 90 (April 23, 1992) (Peter V. Ueberroth, Chairman).

n50 For federal statutes requiring judicial assessment of punitive damages, see Petroleum Marketing Practices Act, 105(d)(2), 15 U.S.C. 2805(d)(2) (1988), and Fair Credit Reporting Act, 616, 15 U.S.C. 1681n(2) (1988). For federal statutes requiring judges to determine the amount of any damages, see Equal Credit Opportunity Act, 706, 15 U.S.C. 1691e(b) (1988); Patent Act, July 19, 1952, ch. 950, 35 U.S.C. 284 (1988); and Fair Housing Act, Title VIII, 812, Civil Rights Act of 1968, 42 U.S.C. 3612(c) (1988).

n51 See CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. 52-240b (West Supp. 1990) (product liability actions).

n52 See KAN. STAT. ANN. 60-3702 (1989).

n53 See OHIO REV. CODE ANN. 2307.80(B) (Baldwin 1990).

n54 See Spaziano v. Florida, 468 U.S. 447 (1984); Clemons v. Mississippi, 494 U.S. 738 (1990); Hildwin v. Florida, 490 U.S. 638 (1989); Cabana v. Bullock, 474 U.S. 376 (1986).

n55 See cases cited supra note 54. Note especially the Court's reasoning in Spaziano: "The Sixth Amendment never has been thought to guarantee a right to a jury determination of appropriate punishment to be imposed on an individual . . . ." 468 U.S. at 459.

n56 Several federal courts of appeals, including most recently the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, have held that the Seventh Amendment does not prohibit judicial assessment of punitive damages at the trial or appellate level. See Shamblin's Ready-Mix v. Eaton Corp., 873 F.2d 736 (4th Cir. 1989); Thomson v. Kerr-McGee Refining Corp., 660 F.2d 1380 (10th Cir. 1981); Swofford v. B & W, Inc., 336 F.2d 406 (5th Cir. 1964). The United States Supreme Court has approved of judicial assessment of discretionary damages that serve a punitive purpose in civil penalty cases. See Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412 (1987). The Court has also implicitly upheld the practice in patent cases. See Curtis v. Loether, 415 U.S. 189, 196 n.12 (1974). See generally Alan H. Scheiner, Note, Judicial Assessment of Punitive Damages, the Seventh Amendment, and the Politics of Jury Power, 91 COLUM. L. REV. 142 (1991).

n57 The Reporters Study does not recommend a specific ratio of punitive to compensatory damages that states should adopt. See ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 259 ("Our concern in this Report is to endorse the substantive principle of the ratio of punitive to compensatory damages, not to commit ourselves to specific judgments about each of the issues in the operative formula.").

n58 Id.

REV_00263214

n59 Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 111 S.Ct. 1032, 1046 (1991).

n60 See id. at 1043. The Court has provided states with an opportunity to meet this challenge in recent cases, vacating at least twelve decisions "in light of Haslip." See Fleming Landfill, Inc. v. Garnes, 111 S. Ct. 2882 (1991); Transamerica Occidental Life Ins. Co. v. Koire, 111 S. Ct. 2253 (1991); Southern Life & Health Ins. Co. v. Turner, 111 S. Ct. 1678 (1991); AMCA Int'l Fin. Co. v. Hilgedick, 111 S. Ct. 1614 (1991); Intercontinental Life Ins. Co. v. Lindblom, 111 S. Ct. 1575 (1991); Clayton Brokerage Co. v. Jordan, 111 S. Ct. 1298 (1991); Reserve Life Ins. Co. v. Eichenseer, 111 S. Ct. 1298 (1991); Hospital Auth. of Gwinnett County v. Jones, 111 S. Ct. 1298 (1991); Church of Scientology of Calif. v. Wollersheim, 111 S. Ct. 1298 (1991); International Soc. for Krishna Consciousness of Calif. v. George, 111 S. Ct. 1299 (1991); Pacific Lighting Co. v. MGW, Inc., 111 S. Ct. 1299 (1991); Portec, Inc. v. The Post Office, 111 S. Ct. 1299 (1991).

n61 See N.D. CENT. CODE 32-03.2-11(1)-(5) (signed by governor Mar. 31, 1993).

n62 413 S.E.2d 897, 908 (W. Va. 1991). In Garnes, the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia found an award of $ 105,000 punitive damages with nominal compensatory damages to be unconstitutional. Id. at 910.

n63 596 A.2d 687, 710, (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 1991), cert. denied, 605 A.2d 137 (Md. 1992).

n64 Id. at 720, 596 A.2d at 711.

n65 See ACTL REPORT, supra note 2, at 15. Some states have already adopted similar limitations. See, e.g., NEV. REV. STAT. 42.005 (1991) (limiting punitive damages awards to $ 300,000 in cases where compensatory damages are less than $ 100,000 and to three times the amount of compensatory damages in cases of $ 100,000 or more); TEX. CIV. PRAC. & REM. CODE ANN. 41.007 (West Supp. 1992) (confining punitive damages to four times actual damages, or $ 200,000, whichever is greater); N.D. CENT. CODE 32-03.2-11(4) (signed by governor Mar. 31, 1993) (limiting punitive damages to twice compensatory damages, or $ 250,000, whichever is greater); Cf. CONN. GEN. STAT. 52-240a (West Supp. 1990) (punitive award may not exceed twice the compensatory damages).

n66 The American Bar Association has proposed a three-to-one ratio of punitive to compensatory damages. See ABA REPORT, supra note 2, at 62. Cf. FLA. STAT. ANN. 768.73 (1)(b) (West Supp. 1992) (punitive damages capped at three times compensatory damages unless "clear and convincing evidence" is presented by the plaintiff to show that a higher award is not excessive). In a model punitive damages statute, President Bush's Council on Competitiveness limited punitive damages to the amount of compensatory awards. See PRESIDENT'S COUNCIL ON COMPETITIVENESS REPORT, MODEL PUNITIVE DAMAGES ACT (1991). See also COLO. REV. STAT. 13-21-102(1)(a)(1987) (punitive award may not exceed compensatory damages). Cf. OKLA. STAT. tit. 23, 9 (1987) (punitive damages capped at compensatory damages awarded unless plaintiff establishes case by clear and convincing evidence).

n67 Sometimes this flexibility is needed. For example, if a person throws acid at another, but only damages his clothing which is worth $ 250, it seems inappropriate to limit punitive damages awards to $ 1,000. In such a case it may be appropriate to invoke damages up to $ 250,000.

n68 ACTL REPORT, supra note 2, at 15.

n69 ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 256.

REV_00263215

n70 Id.

n71 See ABA REPORT, supra note 2, at 63-64 (listing seventeen possible factors that courts should consider in reviewing jury awarded damages).

n72 The Alabama Supreme Court set forth specific factors for the trial court to consider and required trial courts to note in the record their reasons for sustaining a jury verdict or setting it aside. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 111 S. Ct. 1032, 1044 (1991).

n73 Id. at 1045. In a key footnote, the Court contrasted Alabama's detailed appellate guidelines with the punitive damages schemes of two other states about which "Justices expressed concern" in previous cases. See Haslip, 111 S. Ct. at 1045 n.10 ("In those respective schemes, an amount awarded would be set aside or modified only if it was "manifestly and grossly excessive,' or would be considered excessive when "it evinces passion, bias and prejudice on the part of the jury so as to shock the conscience.' ") (citations omitted). The Court's footnote suggests that states with open-ended appellate review schemes may be vulnerable to constitutional attack on the ground that their review of punitive damage awards is vague and arbitrary, and therefore violates due process. Indeed, since Haslip, several courts have set aside state punitive damages review standards analogous to those questioned in Haslip. See Mattison v. Dallas Carrier Corp., 947 F.2d 95 (4th Cir. 1991) (setting aside South Carolina punitive damages scheme); Gamble v. Stevenson, 406 S.E.2d 350 (S.C. 1991) (same); Johnson v. Hugo's Skateaway, 949 F.2d 1338 (4th Cir. 1991) (setting aside Virginia punitive damages procedure); Garnes v. Fleming Landfill, Inc., 413 S.E.2d 897 (W. Va. 1991) (West Virginia law; same); Alexander & Alexander, Inc. v. B. Dixon Evander & Assocs., Inc., 596 A.2d 687 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 1991), cert. denied, 605 A.2d 137 (Md. 1992) (Maryland law; same).

n74 Haslip, 111 S. Ct. at 1045.

n75 ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 95.

n76 Id. at 101.

n77 The Study recommends the following four guidelines:

1. The regulation must have been promulgated by a specialized administrative agency with the statutory responsibility to monitor risk-creating activities in that domain and to establish and revise regularly specific standards governing enterprise behavior;

2. The agency must have addressed the specific risk at issue in the case at hand, and must have made an explicit judgment about what type of legal conditions are appropriate;

3. The enterprise in question must have complied with all the relevant standards prescribed by the agency; and

4. The defendant must have disclosed to the regulatory agency any material in its possession (or of which it had good reason to be aware) concerning either the hazards posed by the defendant's activities or the available means of controlling the related risks.

Id. at 110.

n78 A recent study by the prestigious Brookings Institution points out the strong need for the adoption of a compliance with regulatory standards defense, particularly with regard to the pharmaceutical industry. See PETER HUBER & ROBERT LITAN, THE LIABILITY MAZE: THE IMPACT OF LIABILITY LAW ON SAFETY AND INNOVATION (1991). See also PETER HUBER, LIABILITY: THE LEGAL REVOLUTION AND ITS CONSEQUENCES (1988).

REV_00263216

n79 Note that in all of the controversial product liability medical device and drug litigation, plaintiffs allege that the manufacturer wrongfully withheld material information from the FDA. See, e.g., Lee v. Baxter Healthcare Corp., 721 F. Supp. 89 (D. Md. 1989); Bravman v. Baxter Healthcare Corp., 984 F.2d 71 (2nd Cir. 1993).

n80 See ARIZ. REV. STAT. ANN. 12-701 (1992); N.J. STAT. ANN. 2A:58C-5(c) (West 1987); OHIO REV. CODE ANN. 2307.80 (Anderson 1991); OR. REV. STAT. 30.927 (1991); UTAH CODE ANN. 78-18-12 (1992). Recently, the First and Fifth Circuit Courts of Appeals recognized the strong public policy for the "compliance with FDA standards" defense. Both circuits shielded a medical device manufacturer from any liability for damages because the medical devices had been approved by the FDA before the manufacturer marketed the device. See King v. Collagen Corp., 983 F.2d 1130 (1st Cir. 1993); Stamps v. Collagen Corp., 984 F.2d 1416 (5th Cir. 1993).

n81 See Victor E. Schwartz & Liberty Magarian, Multiple Punitive Damage Awards in Mass Disaster and Product Liability Litigation: An Assault on Due Process, 8 ADELPHIA L.J. 101 (1992); Dennis N. Jones et al., Multiple Punitive Damages Awards for a Single Course of Wrongful Conduct: The Need for a National Policy to Protect Due Process, 43 ALA. L. REV. 1 (1991); John C. Jeffries, Jr., A Comment on the Constitutionality of Punitive Damages, 72 VA. L. REV. 139, 147 (1986).

n82 See Lester Brickman, The Asbestos Litigation Crisis: Is There a Need for an Administrative Alternative?, 13 CARDOZO L. REV. 1819, 1866-67 (1992); R. Barclay Surrick, Punitive Damages and Asbestos Litigation in Pennsylvania: Punishment or Annihilation?, 87 DICK. L. REV. 265 (1983).

n83 See ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 261 n.50. See also Roginsky v. RichardsonMerrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 382 (2d Cir. 1967) (criticizing application of punitive damages in mass marketed product litigation); Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 727 F.2d 506 (5th Cir. 1984) (same).

n84 ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 260.

n85 Id. at 412-19.

n86 Id. at 419-21.

n87 See ABA REPORT, supra note 2, at 78-81. Upon motion by a defendant and a finding by a court that "there is a reasonable possibility that adequate compensatory damages will not be available if punitive damages are not brought under control," there would be a single mass trial in federal court on the punitive damages issue. Id. at 79. The results of that trial would be binding on all class members. Id. at 81.

n88 See ACTL REPORT, supra note 2, at 20-26.

n89 The principal advantage of these proposals is that they would apportion punitive damages awards to all claimants. Policymakers considering a solution to the mass tort problem, however, should not embrace these approaches they contain the false assumption that punitive damages serve as a "bonus" to compensatory damages, rather than as a tool for punishment and deterrence.

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 30 San Diego L. Rev. 263
View: Full

Date/Time: Tuesday, October 1, 2002 - 9:17 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

the practicing bar also made contributions. The resulting report, entitled Enterprise Responsibility [*264] for Personal Injury (Reporters' Study or Study), [1] focused on a wide array of substantive and procedural issues in the law of torts. The Reporters' Study was not subjected to the formal American Law Institute approval process. Instead, the Study was made available by the ALI for the bench, bar, and state legislators to use as a resource to develop personal injury law.

The Reporters' recommendations on one topic, namely, punitive damages, are particularly appropriate and timely. In response to perceived abuses and unfairness in punitive damages awards, "more and more voices are calling for major overhauls of this area of the law." [2] Even the United States Supreme Court has expressed concern in recent years that punitive damages awards have "run wild." [3]

Part I of this article will briefly discuss the Study's analysis of the need for punitive damages reform. Part II will discuss the Study's recommendations concerning reform of the standard by which punitive damages should be awarded. Part III will discuss the Study's recommendations to set reasonable limits on the size of punitive damages awards. Part IV will discuss the Study's recommendation of a shield against tort damages, particularly punitive damages, for products that comply with federal regulatory standards. Part V will discuss the Reporters' proposal to deal with the special problem of multiple, or repetitive, punitive damages awards. [*265]

I. THE NEED FOR REFORM

After examining empirical evidence, the Reporters found that the present system for awarding punitive damages has become more like a state lottery than a system of justice. [4] Little guidance is given to juries, courts, and litigation parties as to how to decide whether and when punitive damages should be awarded. Once a decision is made to award punitive damages, juries again are not given substantive guidance for deriving an appropriate amount to award.

Vagueness and uncertainty in punitive damages law undermines confidence in the civil justice system and has a substantial and detrimental impact on American industry. For instance, the specter of spiraling liability has sometimes discouraged manufacturers from developing and marketing new and useful products. [5] Similar concerns have also led to the withdrawal of some products from the market. [6] The climate of uncertainty puts American business at a sizable disadvantage in its attempt to compete with foreign enterprise. [7] This is [*266] particularly true in the area of innovation where the United States has traditionally been a leader. [8] Because foreign manufacturers can innovate and develop products in a more "friendly" environment, they receive a competitive advantage over their American counterparts. [9]

To confront these problems, the Reporters' Study recommends several specific reforms that judges and state legislators can incorporate into existing state procedures for the award of punitive damages.

II. STANDARDS FOR REFORM

The ALI Reporters, as discussed above, found serious flaws in the present system for awarding punitive damages. In response, the Study provides several recommendations to make clear the legal conditions in which punitive damages may be awarded. First, a standard is established by which the trier of fact can evaluate whether an enterprise defendant should be liable for punitive damages. Second, the Study recommends a burden of proof standard that a plaintiff must meet to show that a defendant's conduct warrants the imposition of punitive damages.

REV_00263203

A. Proscribed Conduct

The Reporters' Study recommends a standard of "reckless disregard for the safety of others" as the appropriate standard for liability for punitive damages in enterprise cases. [10] "Reckless disregard," the Study explains, "should involve both conscious advertence to the risks in question . . . and gross deviation from the appropriate standard of care." [11] The Study also cautions that juries must be "explicitly instructed" that manufacturers must engage in risk-utility balancing. Additionally, juries must be told that their belief that the defendant negligently struck the incorrect balance is insufficient to subject the defendant to punitive, as opposed to compensatory, damages. [12] [*267]

The "reckless disregard" standard recommended by the Reporters would not significantly increase the predictability of punitive damages liability. Courts and scholars have recognized that "recklessness" and "gross negligence" standards provide little guidance to jurors because they cover "too broad and too vague an area of behavior. . . ." [13] Individuals and companies, therefore, are unable to identify and avoid behavior that will trigger a punitive damages award. The result is that the deterrent effect of punitive damages is undermined. [14]

A similar, but more precise standard, would require a plaintiff to show that the defendant acted with "conscious, intentional indifference to safety" as a predicate to punitive damages liability. [15] Practitioners who advocate punitive damages reform recommend precisely this standard. [16] The United States Supreme Court supported this [*268] standard in Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip. [17] The Court emphasized that " t he trial court specifically found the conduct in question "evidenced intentional, malicious, gross, or oppressive fraud.' " [18] Importantly, a "conscious, intentional" standard would establish the type of clear and strong trigger that juries and defendants need to promote deterrence and make punitive damages liability consistent.

Sound public policy also suggests that punitive damages be reserved for cases of conscious, intentional wrongdoing. One must remember that in their origins, and at the time the Framers ratified the Constitution, punitive damages were reserved solely for intentional torts, such as battery, assault, trespass, and false imprisonment. [19] Punitive damages should not be awarded for less than this type of egregious conduct. The compensatory tort system with its ample awards, especially for pain and suffering, has developed mechanisms such as the collateral source rule [20] to deter wrongful conduct that falls short of conscious wrongdoing. [21]

B. Burden of Proof

The Reporters' Study recommends a "clear and convincing evidence" burden of proof standard to be applied in determining whether punitive damages are warranted in civil tort cases. [22] According to the Reporters, this burden of proof standard is proposed [*269] because it will "signal clearly to juries that there is something special about a punitive award, and also give s judges somewhat greater leverage in controlling the parties' allegations about, and the jury's assessments of, such evidence before and during as well as after the trial." [23]

The clear and convincing evidence standard is the accepted trend in the law of punitive damages. Each of the principal groups that have analyzed the product liability system since 1979 has recommended the clear and convincing evidence requirement. [24] The American Bar Association recommended this standard in 1986 and the American College of Trial Lawyers, an association of plaintiff and defense attorneys who have substantial experience in litigation, followed with their recommendation in 1989. Further, the United States Supreme Court in Haslip noted: "There is much to be said in favor of a State's requiring, as many do, . . . a standard of "clear and convincing evidence' or, even, "beyond a reasonable doubt,' . . . as in the criminal context." [25] Approximately half of the states have undertaken this initiative either by legislative action [26] or judicial decision. [27] [*270]

REV_00263204

Public policy makes clear that legislatures and courts should adopt this middle burden of proof standard. First, the clear and convincing standard signals to juries that they should be more certain of their decision when they invoke punishment, as contrasted with awarding compensatory damages. [28] Second, trial courts are alerted that some cases may not be appropriate for hearing by a jury. [29] Finally, the standard gives appellate courts power to carefully review decisions, making sure that punitive damages are properly awarded. [30]

III. THE SIZE OF PUNITIVE AWARDS

The recommendations made by the Reporters' Study, as described in the previous section, would rationalize and modestly tighten the standards for punitive damages liability in approximately one-half of the states. The Reporters were also concerned, however, about the size of punitive damages awards [31] and believed that some guidelines should be adopted to control excessiveness in all of the states. [32] In response, the Study recommends several reforms governing the size of punitive awards.

The Reporters' recommendations can be packaged into three categories: (1) recommendations that seek to limit prejudicial evidence from and provide structure to trials involving punitive damages; (2) recommendations to change the method by which punitive damages awards are generally assessed; and (3) recommendations that seek to establish meaningful procedures for review of punitive damages awards. [*271]

A. Recommendations as to Admissible Evidence and Trial Structure

The Reporters were concerned about current trial practice in many states that allows evidence of a defendant's wealth to be paraded before a jury. This procedure prejudices defendants because it improperly allows the jury to focus on the defendant's wealth, rather than the allegedly wrongful conduct. The Reporters were also concerned about the structure of many punitive damages trials. Current trial practice in many states allows jurors to hear issues relevant only to the determination of punitive damages while assessing a defendant's liability for compensatory damages. To respond to these concerns, the Study makes a couple of recommendations.

1. The Defendant's Wealth

The Study recommends that, counter to popular practice, [33] evidence of a defendant's total wealth should "no longer be admissible in assessing punitive damages." [34] The Study would, however, allow reference to the profits earned by the defendant from the alleged tortious activity at issue.

The Reporters offer several reasons why evidence of a defendant's total assets is "irrelevant" in claims arising out of enterprise injuries. [35] First, corporate wealth is typically spread among various corporate subsidiaries. Thus "it is often only an accident of the corporate structure that places this wealth in the hands of the particular defendant entity." [36] Second, evidence of a defendant's wealth may unduly prejudice large corporate defendants, "which incur proportionately more instances of wrongdoing simply because of their greater volume of business." [37] Third, imposing a burden of punitive damages on a corporation punishes persons who often are not guilty or wealthy, such as corporate employees, small shareholders, and people who buy the company's products and may have to pay more for them. [38] [*272]

The Reporters' recommendation to exclude evidence of a defendant's total wealth represents sound public policy. When a jury is allowed to focus on a defendant's wealth, the jury is free to disregard what is really at issue in the case: whether and to what extent the defendant's conduct was wrongful. [39]

REV_00263205

2. Bifurcation of Punitive Damages Trials

Courts and legislatures that adopt the Reporters' Study's recommendation to allow reference to the profits earned by the defendant from the particular alleged tortious activity should also permit the defendant to bifurcate the trial. [40] The use of a bifurcated trial procedure is recommended by the Reporters' Study. [41] Bifurcation is equitable because it prevents the jury from hearing highly prejudicial evidence of profits when determining basic liability. Information regarding profits is relevant only to determining the amount of punitive damages to be awarded. [42] Bifurcation also allows the jury to easily separate the burden of proof that is required for compensatory damages awards (i.e., proof by a preponderance of the evidence) from that which the Reporters recommend for the award of punitive damages (i.e., proof by clear and convincing evidence). [43] The American Bar Association [44] and the American College of Trial Lawyers have endorsed this reform. [45] [*273]

B. Recommendations About the Assessment of Punitive Damages Awards

Another concern among the Reporters was that in almost all states punitive damages are assessed by a jury verdict. According to the Study, juries are often without adequate guidance as to how large a punitive damages award is appropriate. In response to this problem, the Study recommends that courts assess punitive damages based on some ratio of the amount of compensatory damages previously awarded by the jury.

1. Assessment by the Court

The Study strongly recommends placing the responsibility for assessing the amount of punitive awards on judges rather than juries. [46] This reform, the Study explains, "is, after all, the standard followed in all other explicitly penal (as opposed to remedial) legal regimes." [47]

The Council on Competitiveness [48] under President Bush and the Council on California Competitiveness [49] have recommended this reform. It is currently the law in some federal statutory causes of action, [50] as well as the states of Connecticut, [51] Kansas [52] and Ohio. [53] [*274]

Some critics have challenged judicial assessment of punitive damages as a violation of a defendant's right to jury trial under the Seventh Amendment to the United States Constitution. This criticism is unlikely to hold up if asserted in court. In the past, defendants in criminal cases have challenged judges' activity in sentencing as a violation of their Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial. [54] The Supreme Court, however, has held that no violation exists because sentencing is not a determination of guilt or innocence. [55] Rather, sentencing involves consideration of many factors, including evidence that might be inadmissible under the formal rules of evidence. Moreover, a criminal defendant's Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury is given a broader scope than a civil defendant or plaintiff's right under the Seventh Amendment. Thus, we believe that the recommendation is constitutional under the Seventh Amendment. [56] We also believe that the Reporters' recommendation that courts set the amount of punitive damages awards has a basis in sound public policy because judges are particularly suited to evaluate such material in a dispassionate manner.

2. Ratio of Punitive to Compensatory Damages

The Reporters' Study also recommends that punitive damages awards be limited to some ratio of compensatory damages. [57] Furthermore, the Study suggests that an alternative monetary ceiling ("perhaps $ 25,000") should be permitted for cases "in which the plaintiff's harms were minimal, even though the defendant's behavior [*275] was egregious." [58]

The Reporters' Study's recommendation on this issue comports with recent commentary from the courts. In Haslip, the United States Supreme Court found a four-to-one ratio of punitive to compensatory damages to be "close to the line" of being unconstitutional. [59] The Supreme Court has made clear that this is an area where states can do the most good in providing a reasonable and rational safeguard against punitive damages awards that "run wild." [60]

Indeed, at least one state legislature [61] and two state courts since Haslip, including one state supreme court and one mid-level state appellate court, have met the Supreme Court's challenge and focused their actions on the important relationship between punitive and compensatory damages. In Garnes v. Fleming Landfill, Inc., the Supreme Court of West Virginia stated: "Punitive damages should bear a reasonable relationship to the potential of harm caused by the defendant's action and that generally means that punitive damages must bear a reasonable relationship to actual damages. . . ." [62] The Maryland Court of Special Appeals, in Alexander & Alexander, Inc. v. B. Dixon Evander & Associates, recently applied Haslip to invalidate a punitive damages award. According to the court, the award [*276] was "all out of proportion to both the harm caused and the perniciousness of the conduct." [63] The court found that the punitive damages award "surely crosse d th e line" set forth in Haslip. [64]

Similar to the Reporters' recommendation, but more detailed, the American College of Trial Lawyers (ACTL) has recommended that punitive damages should be limited to twice the amount of compensatory damages awarded, or $ 250,000, whichever is greater. [65] The ACTL's recommendation is perhaps the best approach of the many proposals advanced to place reasonable limits on punitive damages awards. [66] The ACTL's flexible approach keeps the law from being an absolute prisoner of ratios and allows courts to do justice in the unusual case in which a defendant's conduct was egregious, but resulted in little actual harm. [67]

Note that when states act on the Reporters' Study and the ACTL's recommendations, the statute must provide: (1) that the jury should not be informed of the limit; and (2) if a jury's award for punitive damages exceeds the limit, the award will be reduced by the judge. [68] The reason for these two provisions is that informing the jury of the dollar limit may lead jurors to perceive that the ratio, or the specific figure, is a guideline for assessing punitive damages. In practical terms, the limit could become a floor for punitive damages, rather than a ceiling. [*277]

A. Strict Post-Trial Review Procedures

The Reporters' Study additionally recommends establishing detailed post-trial standards for judicial review of punitive damages awards. [69] According to the Reporters, "Such a list would give lawyers and juries somewhat clearer guidance at trial, and it would also strengthen the hand of judges in reviewing trial verdicts . . . ." [70] This approach has already been endorsed by the American Bar Association. [71]

States that establish guidelines for post-trial review should consider the approach adopted by Alabama and approved by the United States Supreme Court in Haslip. The Alabama Supreme Court had in place post-trial procedures for scrutinizing and, where necessary, overturning punitive awards. [72] As an additional check, the Alabama Supreme Court provided a meaningful standard for appellate review by undertaking both a comparative and substantive analysis to "insure that the punitive award does not "exceed the amount that will accomplish society's goals of punishment and deterrence.' " [73] The United States Supreme Court noted that this approach "insures that punitive damage awards are not grossly out of proportion to the severity of the offense and have some understandable relationship to [*278] compensatory damages." [74]

IV. COMPLIANCE WITH REGULATORY STANDARDS DEFENSE

REV_00263207

As described in Part I of this article, punitive damages have caused a stifling effect on the development and marketing of some new and useful products. Products have been taken off the market, for example, because of the fear of punitive damages liability. The Reporters' Study responds to these concerns by recommending that states create a shield against tort damages, particularly punitive damages. The shield would be appropriate in cases where the harmcausing aspect of a product complied with the requirements of a federal administrative regulation.

The Reporters endorsed this concept in no uncertain terms:

We believe that the risk of overdeterrence of socially valuable activities through the imposition of tort liability on regulated products and activities merits more widespread recognition of a regulatory compliance defense . . . . [75] The strongest case for a regulatory compliance defense arises when punitive damages are sought. If a defendant has fully complied with a regulatory requirement and fully disclosed all material information relating to risk and its control, it is hard to justify the jury's freedom to award punitive damages. [76]

In this regard, the Study sets out four guidelines for courts and legislatures to follow to develop a compliance with regulatory standards defense. [77]

The public policy reason for this type of rule is clear: society wants to encourage companies to invest and develop new and useful products, especially in the area of medicine. [78] The Study's recommendation would provide a strong incentive for the innovation of [*279] pharmaceuticals and medical devices. At the same time, the recommendation calls for punishing manufacturers who withhold material information from a federal government agency, such as the Federal Food and Drug Administration. This approach would separate good manufacturing practices from the bad the dolphin from the tuna. [79] Indeed, at least five states have enacted a defense against punitive damages liability for drugs and medical devices approved by the FDA. [80]

V. MULTIPLE PUNITIVE AWARDS

The last major issue studied by the Reporters was multiple, or repetitive, punitive damages awards. Mass torts pose a special problem in the law of punitive damages. [81] Substantial punitive awards in cases brought in mass enterprise injuries may strip a corporate defendant of its insurance coverage and assets. [82] Such awards endanger the ability of later claimants to receive compensation for their injuries. [83] In response, the Reporters' Study recommends federal action to "authorize mandatory class actions for multiple punitive [*280] damages arising out of large-scale mass torts." [84] The Study offers two approaches. First, in mass disaster types of cases, such as airplane crashes, all claims could be consolidated in a federal court. That court would have power to compel joinder by issuing injunctions against any related suits in any state or federal court. The federal court would also have the power to decide which state's substantive law to apply and would produce a single punitive damage award against the defendant for all members of the class. [85] Second, in cases involving mass exposure that occurs over years or decades, such as in asbestos product liability cases, there would be greater judicial discretion whether to consolidate such cases. The court's principal focus would be on whether the number or cost of separate actions threatens to deplete the defendant's assets. [86]

Other principal groups supporting tort law reform are calling for similar federal action. A special committee of the American Bar Association that studied punitive damages proposed that Congress establish a process for creating a national class action for multiple punitive damage claims arising out of conduct that results in similar injuries. [87] The American College of Trial Lawyers concluded that the preferred approach would be a multi-district or national class action requiring all litigants to appear in the same forum, with no option to opt out. [88]

The difficulty with the Reporters' Study's, American Bar Association's, and American College of Trial Lawyers' proposals is that they require burdensome and complicated procedural reforms, and impose new or national choice-of-law rules. The proposals also fail to deal with situations involving lower numbers, but potentially devastating punitive damages claims (i.e., less than one hundred claims). Most importantly, many situations exist in which common facts are insufficient to justify a class. This is particularly true when product liability actions do not involve a single incident mass tort (i.e., a plane crash or hotel fire). [89] [*281]

A better solution would focus on the social goals of punitive damages--punishment and deterrence. This solution could establish a presumption that the first award of punitive damages imposed against the defendant, for harm arising out of a single act or course of conduct, is sufficient to punish the defendant and to deter others from similar wrongful conduct in the future. Subsequent claimants would be allowed, however, to overcome this presumption and pursue additional punitive damages, but only by presenting new and substantial evidence of previously undiscovered conscious and deliberate misconduct by the defendant. In this way, defendants and claimants will be guarded against the counter-productive effects of repetitive overpunishment. At the same time, society preserves a way to augment punishment if it is discovered that the original punishment was based on inadequate information. This process could be most easily established by federal law, but could also be carried out by the courts themselves through the principle of comity.

VI. CONCLUSION

The ALI Reporters' Study offers several recommendations to increase the consistency and predictability of punitive damages awards. Generally, the recommendations are fair and reasonable. Many of the Study's recommendations comport with the letter and spirit of the United States Supreme Court decision in Haslip, [90] and many are supported by the other principal groups advocating punitive damages reform, including the American Bar Association and the American College of Trial Lawyers. While we do not agree with all of the Study's recommendations, we do believe they should be given close attention by both legislators and the courts.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 See 2 AMERICAN LAW INST., REPORTERS' STUDY ON ENTERPRISE RESPONSIBIL- ITY FOR PERSONAL INJURY: APPROACHES TO LEGAL AND INSTITUTIONAL CHANGE (1991) hereinafter ALI STUDY .

n2 Id. at 232. There have been two major systemic reanalyses of punitive damages in the past several years. See ABA SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PUNITIVE DAMAGES, PUNI- TIVE DAMAGES: A CONSTRUCTIVE EXAMINATION (1986) hereinafter ABA REPORT ; AMERICAN COLLEGE OF TRIAL LAWYERS, REPORT ON PUNITIVE DAMAGES OF THE COM- MITTEE ON SPECIAL PROBLEMS IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE (Mar. 3, 1989) hereinafter ACTL REPORT . The Council on Competitiveness under President Bush also recently made punitive damages reform a primary goal on its agenda. See PRESIDENT'S COUNCIL ON COMPETITIVENESS, AGENDA FOR CIVIL JUSTICE REFORM IN AMERICA (1991) hereinafter JUSTICE REFORM .

n3 See Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 111 S. Ct. 1032, 1043 (1991). See also Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 280-82 (1989) (Brennan and Marshall, J.J., concurring) (O'Connor and Stevens, J.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); Bankers Life & Casualty Co. v. Crenshaw, 486 U.S. 71, 87 (1988) (O'Connor and Scalia, J.J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment); City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 270-71 (1981) (Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens, J.J., dissenting). See generally Victor E. Schwartz & Mark A. Behrens, Haslip May Alter Tort-Claim Strategies, THE NAT'L L.J., Feb. 17, 1992, at 23. As this article went to press, the Court in TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 419 S.E.2d 870 (W.Va.), cert. granted, 113 S. Ct. 594 (1992), agreed to hear arguments in another case about the constitutionality of punitive damages. Exactly what the Court will do is, of course, mere speculation, but the decision to hear the case is evidence of the Justices' continuing concern about the frequency of excessive punitive damages awards.

REV_00263209

n4 According to the Study:

The pattern depicted by the empirical research appears to be that enterprises are subject to an occasional risk of what may turn out to be a very large punitive award: an award that may be multiplied if a single business decision about, say, a product design or warning leads to numerous successful tort claims, each with its own punitive component.

ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 235.

n5 See PETER HUBER & ROBERT LITAN, THE LIABILITY MAZE: THE IMPACT OF LIABILITY LAW ON SAFETY AND INNOVATION, 7 (1991) (reporting on American Medical Association study finding that " i nnovative new products are not being developed or are being withheld from the market because of liability concerns or inability to obtain adequate insurance"). See also WALTER OLSON, THE LITIGATION EXPLOSION (1991); PETER HUBER, LIABILITY: THE LEGAL REVOLUTION AND ITS CONSEQUENCES (1988); Victor E. Schwartz & Liberty Mahshigian, Issues in Tort Reform: National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act of 1986: An Ad Hoc Remedy or a Window for the Future?, 48 OHIO ST. L.J. 387 (1987); Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 282 (1989) ("The threat of such enormous awards has a detrimental effect on the research and development of new products.") (O'Connor, J., and Scalia, J., concurring).

n6 See Brown v. Superior Ct., 44 Cal. 3d 1049, 1064, 751 P.2d 470, 479 (1988) (discussing withdrawal of Bendectin from the market after the price increased by more than 300 percent and the withdrawal of all but two manufacturers of diphtheria-tetanuspertussis vaccine when the price increased a hundredfold from eleven cents per dose to $ 11.40 per dose).

n7 See S. REP. NO. 215, 102d Cong., 1st Sess. 9 (1991) ("American manufacturers and product sellers generally pay product liability insurance rates that are 20 to 50 times higher than those of foreign competitors. This disparity is attributable in large part to the uncertainties and costs of the American tort litigation system."); H.R. REP. NO. 748, 100th Cong., 2d Sess., pt. 1, at 24 (1988) ("Without having to absorb the costs of product liability exposure for most of their sales, foreign corporations have an obvious price advantage. In Japan and Europe, product liability laws are more stable, litigation less frequent, and large damage awards uncommon.").

n8 See Man C. Maloo & Benjamin A. Neil, Products Liability Exposure: The Sacrifice of American Innovation, 13 J. PROD. LIAB. 361 (1991).

n9 In Japan and Europe contingency fees are prohibited and judges, not juries, decide the amount of verdicts. Our competitors also have the advantage of a predictable law. The United States patchwork of product liability laws stands in stark contrast to the uniform approach taken by the European Community. See generally FIRST ANNUAL RE- PORT OF THE U.S.-JAPAN WORKING GROUP ON THE STRUCTURAL IMPEDIMENTS INITIA- TIVE (MAY 22, 1991) (comments of the Japanese delegation); Alfred W. Cortese, Jr. & Kathleen L. Blaner, The Anti-Competitive Impact of U.S. Product Liability Laws: Are Foreign Businesses Beating Us at Our Own Game?, 9 J.L. & COM. 167 (1989).

n10 ALI STUDY, supra note 1, at 248.

n11 Id.

REV_00263210

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined (i)
Terms: "punitive damages" /5 reform and caps and date(aft 1997) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*65 Brooklyn L. Rev. 1003, **

Copyright (c) 1999 Brooklyn Law School Brooklyn Law Review

Winter, 1999

65 Brooklyn L. Rev. 1003

LENGTH: 12166 words

ARTICLE: REINING IN PUNITIVE DAMAGES "RUN WILD": PROPOSALS FOR REFORM BY COURTS AND LEGISLATURES*

* (c) 1999 Victor E. Schwartz, Mark A. Behrens, and Joseph P. Mastrosimone. All Rights Reserved.

Victor E. Schwartz+ and Mark A. Behrens++ and Joseph P. Mastrosimone+++

+ Victor E. Schwartz is a senior partner in the law firm of Crowell & Moring LLP in Washington, D.C. Mr. Schwartz is co-author of the most widely used torts casebook in the United States, Prosser, Wade and Schwartz's Cases and Materials on Torts (10th ed. 2000), and author of Comparative Negligence (3d ed. 1994 & Supp. 1999). He served on the Advisory Committee of the American Law Institute's Restatement of the Law of Torts: Products Liability project and has been appointed to the Advisory Committees of the Restatement of the Law of Torts: Apportionment of Liability and General Principles projects. Mr. Schwartz obtained his B.A. summa cum laude from Boston University in 1962 and his J.D. magna cum laude from Columbia University in 1965.

++ Mark A. Behrens is a partner in the law firm of Crowell & Moring LLP in Washington, D.C, and Adjunct Professorial Lecturer in Law at The American University, Washington College of Law. He received his B.A. in Economics from the University of WisconsinMadison in 1987 and his J.D. from Vanderbilt University in 1990, where he served as Associate Articles Editor of the Vanderbilt Law Review.

+++ Joseph P. Mastrosimone is an associate in the law firm of Crowell & Moring LLP in Washington, D.C. He received his B.A. in Political Science from the University of Rochester in 1995 and his J.D. from The George Washington University Law School in 1998, where he served as Notes Editor of the George Washington Law Review.

SUMMARY:
... [1] The Court has provided some general controls, holding that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment imposes both substantive limits on the size of punitive damages awards [2] and procedural limits on when and how punitive damages may be awarded. ... [7] Courts and commentators alike have emphasized the "potentially devastating" ramifications of a punitive damages award on a civil defendant's character, reputation, business, and good will. ... The unpredictability of a prospective punitive damage award contributes significantly did not constitute an unfair trade practice.

REV_00263219

The Alabama jury awarded Dr. Gore $ 4,000 as compensatory damages for the difference in the value of the car he "bargained for" and the car he received. [96] The jury also awarded $ 4 million in punitive damages, which the jury apparently calculated by multiplying Dr. Gore's damage estimate ($ 4,000) by 1,000, the number of cars BMW allegedly sold throughout the country under its nondisclosure policy. [97]

On appeal to the Alabama Supreme Court, BMW contended, among other things, that its out-of-state conduct was permissible under the disclosure statutes of other states and, therefore, could not serve to augment a punitive damages [*1025] award. The Alabama Supreme Court agreed, holding that the jury should not have been permitted to consider sales by BMW outside of Alabama. [98] Having found the verdict tainted, the court reduced the punitive damages award to $ 2 million, believing that this amount was "a constitutionally reasonable" punishment for BMW's conduct in Alabama. [99]

Ultimately, the United States Supreme Court decided that the $ 2 million award still left a punishment that exceeded Alabama's legitimate interests in protecting the rights of its citizens and was, therefore, unconstitutionally excessive. [100]

Before tackling the "excessiveness" issue, however, the Court commented at length on constitutional principles that are involved when a state attempts to punish out-of-state conduct, observing that the Constitution has a "special concern both with the maintenance of a national economic union unfettered by stateimposed limitations on interstate commerce and with the autonomy of the individual States within their respective spheres." [101] The Court outlined the following three basic principles.

Interstate Commerce: The Court noted that a defendant's participation in the "national economy implicates the federal interest in preventing individual States from imposing undue burdens on interstate commerce." [102] Congress is permitted to make nationwide rules involving interstate commerce, but "it is clear that no single State can do so, or even impose its policy choice on neighboring States." [103]

State Sovereignty and Comity: Next, the Court noted that "one State's power to impose burdens on interstate commerce is not only subordinate to the federal power over interstate commerce, but is also constrained by the need to respect the interests of other States." [104] The Court made the critical admonition that: "Principles of state sovereignty and comity demand that a State may not impose economic sanctions on [*1026]

violators of its laws with the intent of changing the tortfeasors' lawful conduct in other States." [105]

Due Process: Finally, the Court suggested that punishing a defendant for lawful extraterritorial conduct would violate due process. The Court stated:

Alabama may insist that BMW adhere to a particular disclosure policy in that State. Alabama does not have the power, however, to punish BMW for conduct that was lawful where it occurred and that had no impact on Alabama or its residents. Nor may Alabama impose sanctions on BMW in order to deter conduct that is lawful in other jurisdictions. [106]

Applying these fundamental principles, the Court approvingly concluded that the Alabama Supreme Court "properly eschewed reliance on BMW's out-of-state conduct and based its remitted award solely on conduct that occurred within Alabama." [107]

REV_00263228

Although BMW involved conduct (i.e., failure to disclose minor refinishing) that was permissible outside Alabama under the disclosure statutes of other states, the Supreme Court was careful to explain that its holding was not limited to instances of state legislation, but applied broadly to any form in which state power is exercised-specifically including state court decisions. The Court said: "State power may be exercised as much by a jury's application of a state rule of law in a civil lawsuit as by a statute." [108] Elsewhere in the opinion, the [*1027] Court again emphasized that "the economic penalties that a State . . . inflicts on those who transgress its laws, whether the penalties take the form of legislatively authorized fines or judicially imposed punitive damages, must be supported by the State's interest in protecting its own consumers and its own economy." [109]

Indeed, as a tort policy matter, a state court judgment that a defendant's conduct is not tortious provides a signal that the defendant's conduct does not justify the imposition of punitive damages in that state. Such a finding should be given equal (and perhaps greater) legal weight than a statutory "safe harbor," such as the disclosure laws at issue in BMW. The reason is that, in most jurisdictions, conduct comporting with a legislative or regulatory standard may still be found tortious by a jury asked to determine whether the defendant met applicable standards of care. [110] On the other hand, a finding of "no liability" in a tort action suggests strongly that, in that jurisdiction, the defendant's conduct was lawful. BMW says that it is unconstitutional for a jury in a forum state to consider lawful conduct in other states when deciding punitive damages issues. [111]

Precluding evidence of the defendant's out-of-state activity would prevent such due process violations. It also would prevent the possibility of due process violations that could arise if the forum state were examining conduct that occurred in jurisdictions that had not yet determined for themselves whether the defendant's conduct should subject it to liability. Tort law varies widely between states and one state cannot assume what the legislature or citizens (jurors) of other states may decide. [112] In that regard, if the forum state's court "guessed [*1028] wrong" and concluded that another state ("State X") would find the defendant's conduct to be unlawful, but State X later decides either through legislation or judicial decision that the conduct is lawful, the forum state's ruling would be violative of the principles set forth in BMW. [113]

Finally, it is important to note that precluding evidence of a defendant's conduct outside the forum state would not result in culpable defendants "escaping" appropriate punishment because those other states would be free to impose punishment on behalf of their own citizens if it was determined that the defendant's conduct should subject it to liability.

G. Compliance with FDA Pre-Market Approval Standards Defense

Punitive damages should not be permitted in cases alleging harms caused by FDA pre-market approved pharmaceuticals, vaccines, or medical devices, unless the approval was obtained through fraud or bribery. The public policy reason for this type of rule is that society should encourage companies to invest in and develop new and useful life-prolonging and life-saving products. This reform, which is already law in several states, [114] received strong support in a compre [*1029] hensive study of the civil justice system by the American Law Institute. The study's authors concluded:

We believe that the risk of overdeterrence of socially valuable activities through the imposition of tort liability on regulated products and activities merits more widespread recognition of a regulatory compliance defense.

. . . .

The strongest case for a regulatory compliance defense arises when punitive damages are sought. If a defendant has fully complied with a regulatory requirement and fully disclosed all material information relating to risk and its control, it is hard to justify the jury's freedom to award punitive damages. [115]

REV_00263229

If implemented, a compliance with FDA pre-market approval standards defense against punitive damages would provide a strong incentive for the innovation of products that may otherwise be withheld because of concerns about uncertain and arbitrary liability. At the same time, such a defense could punish manufacturers who intentionally withhold material information from the FDA by subjecting such manufacturers to punitive damages liability.

H. Limiting Multiple Punitive Damages Awards

The reforms that have been discussed in this Article could be accomplished at the state or federal level; many could be (and have been) accomplished by judicial decision. Because of the limits on the ability of individual states to control conduct in other states, however, and the United States Supreme Court's past unwillingness to clarify due process limits on multiple punitive damages awards, Congress should enact legislation making clear that defendants are not to be punished ad infinitum for a single act or course of conduct. [*1030]

1. Problems Caused by Multiple Punitive Damages

As a result of the expansion of punitive damages beyond the traditional intentional torts, courts in the 1970s began to apply punitive damages more than once against the same defendant, for example, in the developing field of products liability. As a result, defendants began to be punished over and over again for what was essentially a single act or course of conduct. [116]

Multiple punitive damages awards present significant problems for plaintiffs and defendants. For instance, multiple "windfall" recoveries of punitive damages can deplete a defendant's limited resources, endangering the ability of future claimants to recover even basic out-of-pocket expenses and damages for their pain and suffering. [117]

Moreover, excessive imposition of awards may drive a company out of business. [118] When this occurs, the devastating "ripple" effect can extend far beyond the defendant company to injured persons who are thereafter unable to recover compensation for their injuries. There are concomitant losses suffered by the company's employees, who may lose their jobs, as well as by those other businesses that rely on the company or its employees for income. Economic harm to the company also affects shareholders, such as pension funds and ordinary citizens, and other investors who face the loss of their savings.

The detrimental impact of multiple punitive damages exists even in cases which are settled, rather than tried. A federal appellate judge astutely recognized this problem when he wrote: [*1031]

The potential for punitive awards is a weighty factor in settlement negotiations and inevitably results in a larger settlement agreement than would ordinarily be obtained. To the extent that this premium exceeds what would otherwise be a fair and reasonable settlement for compensatory damages, assets that could be available for satisfaction of future compensatory claims are dissipated. [119]

Multiple imposition of punitive damages also poses a significant obstacle to global settlement negotiations in repetitive litigation and blocks the ability of claimants to recover quickly for their injuries or the loss of loved ones. As one federal district judge wrote: "Barring successive punitive damages awards against a defendant for the same conduct would remove the major obstacle to settlement of mass tort litigation and open the way for the prompt resolution of the damage claims of many thousands of injured plaintiffs." [120]

REV_00263230

Furthermore, federal and state courts have expressed strong concerns that multiple punitive damages awards may violate constitutionally protected due process rights. [121] Com [*1032] mentators in the field have expressed the same concerns. [122]

Lastly, multiple punitive damages awards undermine the integrity of the justice system by transforming it into a lottery where a few people collect arbitrary "wins" at the expense of everyone else-the company, its employees, its shareholders, and ordinary consumers. With the exception of those lawyers who reap windfalls from repetitive punitive damages, nobody can seriously argue that repeatedly punishing anyone for a single act makes sense or benefits society.

2. Uniform, National Legislative Action Is Needed

"Unquestionably, a national solution is needed" to the problem of multiple punitive damages awards. [123] The individual states are powerless to provide a comprehensive remedy because one state cannot dictate judicial or legislative policies to another state. [124] Thus, even though a state may act to con [*1033] trol the problems of multiple punitive damages awards within its borders, it cannot control the imposition of punitive damages awards in other jurisdictions. [125]

The clearest evidence of this weakness was described in an opinion written by former United States District Judge H. Lee Sarokin. In Juzwin v. Amtorg Trading Corp., [126] involving claims against an asbestos manufacturer, Judge Sarokin vacated an earlier order striking plaintiffs' punitive damages claims on the ground that multiple imposition of punitive damages imposed without guidelines violated due process, in part, because he believed that he was powerless to limit other courts from imposing punitive damages awards against the same defendant. [127]

Unfortunately, the United States Supreme Court has proven unwilling to solve the problem of multiple punitive damages and appears unlikely to do so at any time soon. [128] Indeed, the [*1034] Florida Supreme Court has asserted that "any realistic solution to the problems caused by [multiple punitive damages awards] in the United States . . . can only be effected by federal legislation." [129]

Congressional action is needed to "disallow[] the repeated sanction of punitive damages against the same defendant for one act." [130] This would "protect[] the due process rights of corporate defendants as well as the rights of injured plaintiffs to be compensated, rather than see money which is rightfully theirs be distributed as a windfall." [131]

Conclusion

Larger and larger punitive damages verdicts are being rendered based on weak burdens of proof, irrelevant and even prejudicial evidence, and often multiple times against the same defendant for the same activity. This has led the United States Supreme Court to express serious concern that punitive damages awards in this country have "run wild." [132]

The civil justice system should not be a "litigation lottery" characterized by excessiveness and arbitrariness. Punitive damages reform is needed to restore balance, fairness, and predictability to the law. We recommend a number of reforms. While all of these could be achieved through legislation, many could be accomplished by courts through the development of the common law; only one would require federal action. Specifically, we recommend:

REV_00263231

(1) Establishing a liability "trigger" that reflects the intentional tort origins and quasi-criminal nature of punitive dam [*1035] ages awards-"clear and convincing evidence" of "actual malice."

(2) Requiring proportionality in punitive damages so that the punishment fits the offense.

(3) Permitting a defendant to request "bifurcation" of a punitive damages trial so that the proceedings on punitive damages would be separate from and subsequent to the proceedings on compensatory damages. The same jury would hear both phases of the case. This would prevent evidence that is highly prejudicial and relevant only to the issue of punishment from being heard by jurors and improperly considered when they are determining basic liability.

(4) Precluding plaintiffs from introducing prejudicial net worth evidence.

(5) Precluding evidence of a defendant's out-of-state conduct to award and calculate punitive damages.

(6) Encouraging the development and marketing of lifesaving and life-enhancing pharmaceuticals, vaccines, and medical devices by creating a defense to punitive damages based on compliance with FDA pre-market approval standards, except in cases where the approval was obtained through fraud or bribery.

(7) Federal legislation to address the special problem of multiple punitive damages awards; this would protect against unfair overkill, guard against possible due process violations, and help preserve the ability of future claimants to recover basic out-ofpocket expenses and damages for their pain and suffering.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 18 (1991).

n2 See BMW of North Am., Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 585-86 (1996); see also TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 458 (1993); Pacific Mutual, 499 U.S. at 23-24; cf. Pulla v. Amoco Oil Co., 72 F.3d 648, 661 (8th Cir. 1995) (opinion by retired Supreme Court Justice Byron White) (striking down punitive damages award as "excessive, unreasonable and violative of due process").

n3 See Honda Motor Co., Ltd. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415 (1994).

n4 See Punitive Damages Tort Reform: Hearing Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 104th Cong. (Apr. 4, 1995) (testimony of Theodore Olson, former Assistant United States Attorney for the Office of Legal Counsel); Special Report, The Top Ten Verdicts of 1999, Law. Wkly. USA, Jan. 10, 2000, at 2000 LWUSA 25.

n5 Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 297 (1989) (O'Connor, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (quoting Banker's Life & Casualty Co. v. Crenshaw, 486 U.S. 71, 87 (1988) (O'Connor, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment)). All jurisdictions, except Louisiana, Nebraska, Massachusetts, Michigan and Washington state, permit the award of punitive damages. Michigan permits "exemplary" damages as compensation for mental suffering consisting of a sense of insult, indignity, humiliation, or injury to feelings, but does not permit punitive damages for purposes of punishment. See Product Liability Desk Reference-A Fifty State Compendium (Morton Daller ed., 2000).

REV_00263232

n6 City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 270 (1981) (Brennan, J., dissenting).

n7 Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 426 (1979).

n8 Browning-Ferris, 492 U.S. at 281 (Brennan and Marshall, J.J., concurring); see also International Bhd. of Elec. Workers v. Foust, 442 U.S. 42, 50 (1979) ("The impact of [a punitive damages award] is unpredictable and potentially substantial."); Comment, Criminal Safeguards and the Punitive Damages Defendant, 34 U. Chi. L. Rev. 408, 417 (1967) (Punitive damages awards have "'momentous and serious' . . . consequences" for civil defendants.) (citation omitted).

n9 See generally Victor E. Schwartz & Mark A. Behrens, Punitive Damages Reform-State Legislatures Can and Should Meet the Challenge Issued by the Supreme Court of the United States in Haslip, 42 Am. U. L. Rev. 1365 (1993).

n10 See James B. Sales & Kenneth B. Cole, Jr., Punitive Damages: A Relic That Has Outlived Its Origins, 37 Vand. L. Rev. 1117 (1984); see also Beardmore v. Carrington, 95 Eng. Rep. 790 (C.P. 1764) (illegal search and seizure); Bruce v. Rawlins, 95 Eng. Rep. 934 (C.P. 1770) (same); Sharpe v. Brice, 96 Eng. Rep. 557 (C.P. 1774) (same).

n11 95 Eng. Rep. 768 (C.P. 1763).

n12 98 Eng. Rep. 489 (C.P. 1763).

n13 Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. Cal. Rev. 1, 14 (1982). In Wilkes, Lord Chief Justice Pratt announced: "A jury shall have it in their power to give damages for more than the injury received . . . as a punishment to the guilty, to deter from any such proceeding for the future, and as a proof of the detestation of the jury to the action itself." Wilkes, 98 Eng. Rep. at 498-99; see also Calvin R. Massey, The Excessive Fines Clause and Punitive Damages: Some Lessons From History, 40 Vand. L. Rev. 1233 (1987).

n14 See, e.g., Grey v. Grant, 95 Eng. Rep. 794 (C.P. 1764); Benson v. Frederick, 97 Eng. Rep. 1130 (K.B. 1766).

n15 See, e.g., Hewlett v. Cruchley, 128 Eng. Rep. 696 (C.P. 1813); Leith v. Pope, 96 Eng. Rep. 777 (C.P. 1779).

n16 See, e.g., Fabrigas v. Mostyn, 96 Eng. Rep. 549 (C.P. 1774).

n17 See, e.g., Merest v. Harvey, 128 Eng. Rep. 761 (C.P. 1814); Sears v. Lyons, 171 Eng. Rep. 658 (K.B. 1818). Punitive damages also were allowed for seduction. See, e.g., Tullidge v. Wade, 95 Eng. Rep. 909 (C.P. 1769). In addition, for a period, English courts permitted an award of punitive damages for criminal conversation (i.e., adultery). See Duberly v. Gunning, 100 Eng. Rep. 1226 (K.B. 1792).

n18 James B. Sales, The Emergence of Punitive Damages in Product Liability Actions: A Further Assault on The Citadel, 14 St. Mary's L.J. 351, 355 (1983).

n19 The use of "private attorneys general" to sanction antisocial conduct unregulated by the criminal law reached America in 1784. See Genay v. Norris, 1 S.C. 6 (1784); see also David G. Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 Mich. L. Rev. 1257, 1263, 1287-88 (1976).

n20 See, e.g., Ward v. Blackwood, 41 Ark. 295 (1883); Lyon v. Hancock, 35 Cal. 372

REV_00263233

(1868); Corwin v. Walton, 18 Mo. 71 (1853); Trogden v. Terry, 172 N.C. 540 (1916); Porter v. Seiler, 23 Pa. 424 (1854).

n21 See, e.g., Sheik v. Hobson, 64 Iowa 146 (1884); Louisville & Nashville R.R. Co. v. Ballard, 85 Ky. 307 (1887); Vanch v. Hall, 3 N.J.L. 814 (Sup. Ct. 1811).

n22 See, e.g., Brown v. McBride, 24 Misc. 235, 52 N.Y.S. 620 (Sup. Ct. Queens County 1898).

n23 See, e.g., Lake Shore & Mich. S. Ry. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U.S. 101 (1893); Green v. Southern Express Co., 41 Ga. 515 (1871); Schlencker v. Risley, 4 Ill. 483 (1842); Taber v. Hutson, 5 Ind. 322 (1854); Jackson v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 51 S.E. 1015 (N.C. 1905); Parsons v. Harper, 57 Va. 64 (1860); Hamlin v. Spaulding, 27 Wis. 360 (1870).

n24 See, e.g., Dorsey v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 553 (1860); Treat v. Barber, 7 Conn. 274 (1828); Singer Mfg. Co. v. Holdfodt, 86 Ill. 455 (1877); Taylor v. Giger, 3 Ky. 586 (1808); Schindel v. Schindel, 12 Md. 108 (1858); Huling v. Henderson, 161 Pa. 553 (1894); Bradshaw v. Buchanan, 50 Tex. 492 (1878).

n25 See, e.g., Yazoo & Miss. Valley R.R. Co. v. Sanders, 87 Miss. 607 (1905); Schumacher v. Shawhan Distillery Co., 178 Mo. App. 361 (1914).

n26 See, e.g., Linsley v. Bushnell, 15 Conn. 225 (1842); Whipple v. Walpole, 10 N.H. 130 (1839); Pickett v. Crook, 20 Wis. 358 (1866). As in England, punitive damages were also awarded in cases involving seduction. See, e.g., Reutkemeier v. Nolte, 179 Iowa 342 (1917); Coryell v. Colbaugh, 1 N.J. 77 (1791).

n27 Ellis, supra note 13, at 2.

n28 See, e.g., Southern Kan. Ry. v. Rice, 38 Kan. 398 (1888) ($ 35 costs and fees, $ 10 injury to feelings, $ 71.75 punitive); Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. 342 (1872) ($ 150 actual, $ 331.67 exemplary); Woodman v. Nottingham, 49 N.H. 387 (1870) ($ 578 actual, $ 100 exemplary); Taylor v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 48 N.H. 304 (1869) ($ 500 actual damages, $ 858.50 exemplary).

n29 In 1967, a California court of appeals held for the first time that punitive damages were recoverable in a strict products liability action. See Toole v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689 (Cal. Ct. App. 1967).

n30 "Mass tort" litigation began in the late 1960s with cases involving the sale of the anti-cholesterol drug MER/29. See Paul D. Rheingold, The MER/29 Story-An Instance of Successful Mass Disaster Litigation, 56 Cal. L. Rev. 116 (1968); Roginsky v. RichardsonMerrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832 (2d Cir. 1967). See generally Richard A. Seltzer, Punitive Damages In Mass Tort Litigation: Addressing The Problems of Fairness, Efficiency And Control, 52 Fordham L. Rev. 37 (1983).

n31 See Victor E. Schwartz et al., Multiple Imposition Of Punitive Damages: The Case For Reform, Critical Legal Issues: Working Paper Series (Wash. Legal Found. Mar. 1995).

n32 See, e.g., Utah Code Ann. § 78-18-1(1)(a) (West 1992) (malice or fraud or reckless indifference toward, and a disregard of, the rights of others).

n33 See e.g., Wisker v. Hart, 766 P.2d 168 (Kan. 1988) ("gross negligence").

n34 See Gillham v. Admiral Corp., 523 F.2d 102 (6th Cir. 1975) ($ 125,000 compensatory damages, $ 50,000 attorneys' fees, $ 100,000 punitive damages); Toole v. Richardson-

REV_00263234

Merrell, Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689 (Cal. Ct. App. 1967) ($ 175,000 compensatory, $ 250,000 punitive damages); Moore v. Jewel Tea Co., 253 N.E.2d 636 (Ill. App. 1969) ($ 920,000 compensatory damages, $ 10,000 punitive damages), aff'd, 263 N.E.2d 103 (Ill. 1970).

n35 George L. Priest, Punitive Damages and Enterprise Liability, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 123, 123 (1982).

n36 John Calvin Jeffries, Jr., A Comment on The Constitutionality of Punitive Damages, 72 Va. L. Rev. 139, 142 (1986); see also Peter W. Huber, The Legal Revolution and its Consequences (1988); Walter K. Olson, The Litigation Explosion (1991).

n37 Malcolm Wheeler, A Proposal for Further Common Law Development of the Use of Punitive Damages in Modern Products Liability Litigation, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 919 (1989).

n38 512 U.S. 415 (1994).

n39 Id. at 432. Honda Motor involved an all terrain vehicle that flipped over when an inebriated plaintiff tried to drive it up a hill. See id. at 418. The Court struck down a punitive damages award on the ground that Oregon law violated due process because it did not provide an opportunity for meaningful appellate review of the size of punitive damages awards. See id. at 432. One year earlier, in TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443 (1993), Justice O'Connor observed:

Corporations are mere abstractions and, as such, are unlikely to be viewed with much sympathy. Moreover, they often represent a large accumulation of productive resources: jurors naturally think little of taking an otherwise large sum of money out of what appears to be an enormously larger pool of wealth. Finally, juries may feel privileged to correct perceived social ills stemming from unequal wealth distribution by transferring money from "wealthy" corporations to comparatively needier plaintiffs.

Id. at 491 (O'Connor, J., dissenting) (citation omitted).

n40 See generally Bruce N. Kuhlik & Richard F. Kingham, The Adverse Effects of Standardless Punitive Damage Awards on Pharmaceutical Development and Availability, 45 Food Drug Cosm. L.J. 693, 693 (1990) ("There is a growing body of evidence that the threat of punitive damages deters the development and marketing of beneficial products.").

n41 See, e.g., Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharm., Inc., 43 F.3d 1311 (9th Cir. 1995); Turpin v. Merrell Dow Pharm., Inc., 736 F. Supp. 737 (E.D. Ky. 1990), aff'd, 959 F.2d 1349 (6th Cir. 1992).

n42 See, e.g., Ealy v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 897 F.2d 1159 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (overturning $ 75 million punitive damages award).

n43 See S. Rep. No. 105-32, at 41-42 (1997) (Senate Commerce Committee Report on Product Liability Reform Act of 1997).

n44 See Michael Rustad, Demystifying Punitive Damages in Products Liability Cases: A Survey of a Quarter Century of Trial Verdicts (Roscoe Pound Found. 1991).

n45 Professor Rustad said in his report: "The actual number of punitive damages awards in product liability litigation is unknown and possibly unknowable because no comprehensive recording system exists." Id. at 2 (emphasis added).

n46 See Brian J. Ostrom & Neal B. Kauder, Examining the Work of State Courts, 1993: A National Perspective from the Court Statistics Project 24 (State Justice Inst. 1993).

REV_00263235

n47 See Stephen Daniels & Joanne Martin, Myth and Reality in Punitive Damages, 75 Minn. L. Rev. 1, 28 (1990) (noting that "jury verdicts in the minority of matters actually adjudicated play an important role in determining the worth, or settlement value, or civil matters filed but not tried").

n48 George L. Priest, Punitive Damages Reform: The Case of Alabama, 56 La. L. Rev. 825, 830 (1996).

n49 Steven Hayward, The Role of Punitive Damages in Civil Litigation: New Evidence from Lawsuit Filings 8 (Pacific Research Inst. Public Pol'y Feb. 1996).

n50 Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 18 (1991).

n51 Actual malice is required in Maryland and the District of Columbia. See Owens-Illinois v. Zenobia, 601 A.2d 633 (Md. 1992), Jonathan Woodner, Co. v. Breeden, 665 A.2d 929 (D.C. 1995).

n52 See Malcolm E. Wheeler, The Constitutional Case for Reforming Punitive Damage Procedures, 69 Va. L. Rev. 269, 298 (1983).

n53 See Ala. Code § 6-11-20 (1993); Alaska Stat. § 09.17.020 (1998); Cal. Civ. Code § 3294(a) (West 1997); Fla. Stat. Ann. § 768.73 (West 1997); Ga. Code Ann. § 51-12-5.1 (1999); Iowa Code Ann. § 668A.1 (1998); Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-3701(c) (1998); Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 411.184(2) (Michie/Bobbs-Merrill 1998); Minn. Stat. Ann. § 549.20 (West Supp. 1998); Miss. Code Ann. § 11-1-65(1)(a) (Supp. 1998); Mont. Code Ann. § 27-1-221(5) (1998); N.J. Stat. Ann. § 2A:15-5.12 (1999); Nev. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 42-005(1) (1998); N.C. Gen. Stat. 10-15(b) (1999); N.D. Cent. Code § 32-03.2-11 (Supp. 1999); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2307.80(A) (Anderson 1999); Okla. Stat. Ann. tit. 23, § 9.1 (West Supp. 1998); Or. Rev. Stat. § 18.537 (1997); S.C. Code Ann. § 15-33-135 (Law. Co-op. Supp. 1998); S.D. Codified Laws Ann. § 21-1-4.1 (1999); Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 41.003 (1999); Utah Code Ann. § 78-18-1 (1999); Linthicum v. Nationwide Life Ins. Co., 723 P.2d 675 (Ariz. 1986); Jonathan Woodner Co. v. Breeden, 665 A.2d 929 (D.C. App. 1995); Masaki v. General Motors Corp., 780 P.2d 566 (Haw. 1989); Travelers Indem. Co. v. Armstrong, 442 N.E.2d 349 (Ind. 1982); Tuttel v. Raymond, 494 A.2d 1353 (Me. 1985); Owens-Illinois v. Zenobia, 601 A.2d 633 (Md. 1992); Rodriguez v. Suzuki Motor Corp., 936 S.W.2d 104 (Mo. 1996); Hodges v. S.C. Toof & Co., 833 S.W.2d 896 (Tenn. 1992); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 294 N.W.2d 437 (Wis. 1980). One state, Colorado, requires proof "beyond a reasonable doubt" in punitive damages cases. See Colo. Rev. Stat. § 13-25-127(2) (1987).

n54 See Punitive Damages: A Constructive Examination, 1986 A.B.A. Sec. Litig. Special Comm. on Punitive Damages 19 [hereinafter ABA Report]; Report on Punitive Damages of the Comm. on Special Problems in the Administration of Justice, Am. College of Trial Law. 15-16 (1989) [hereinafter ACTL Report]; Uniform Law Commissioners' Model Punitive Damages Act § 5 (approved July 18, 1996) [hereinafter Model Punitive Damages Act]; see also 2 Enterprise Responsibility for Personal Injury-Reporters' Study 248-49 (1991) [hereinafter ALI Reporters' Study].

n55 See Pacific Mutual, 499 U.S. at 23 n.11 (stating that "there is much to be said in favor of a State's requiring, as many do, . . . a standard of 'clear and convincing evidence'"). Congress has responded to the Court's observation by requiring plaintiffs to prove "clear and convincing evidence" of punitive damages liability before punitive damages can be imposed against volunteers of nonprofit organizations. See Volunteer Protection Act of 1997, Pub. L. No. 105-19, 111 Stat. 218.

n56 See Lane v. Hughes Aircraft Co., 993 P.2d 388 (Cal. 2000) (Brown, J., concurring).

REV_00263236

n57 See Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277, 284 (1983) ("The principle that a punishment should be proportionate to the crime is deeply rooted and frequently repeated in common-law jurisprudence."); Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 366-67 (1910) (It is "a precept of the fundamental law" as well as "a precept of justice that punishment for crime should be graduated and proportioned to the offense.").

n58 Some examples of federal criminal fines, even for particularly egregious crimes, do not exceed $ 250,000 and include: (1) tampering with consumer products ($ 250,000, if death results); (2) assault on the President ($ 30,000); (3) bank robbery ($ 75,000); (4) sexual exploitation of children ($ 100,000); and (5) treason ($ 10,000). See Federal Sentencing Guidelines § § 2N1.1, 5E1.2, 2A6.1, 2B3.1, 2G2.1, 2M1.1 (Phylis Skloot Bamberger & David J. Gottlieb eds., 3d ed. Supp. 1999).

n59 Lewis Powell, The "Bizarre" Results of Punitive Damages, Wall St. J., Mar. 8, 1995, at A21.

n60 See Ala. Code § 6-11-21 (1993); Alaska Stat. § 9.17.020(f)-(h) (1998); Colo. Rev. Stat. § 13-21-102(1)(a)(1998); Conn. Gen. Stat. § 52240b (1999); Fla. Stat. Ann. § 768.73 (1)(b) (West 1997); Ind. Code Ann. § 34-51-3-4 (1999); Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-3701 (1998); N.J. Stat. Ann. § 2A:15-5.14 (West 1999); N.C. Gen. Stat. § 1D-25 (1999); N.D. Cent. Code § 32.03.2-11(4) (1999); 23 Okl. St. § 9.1 (1998); Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 41.008 (West 1999); Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-38.1 (1999).

n61 See generally ACTL Report, supra note 54, at 15 (proposing that punitive damages be awarded up to two times a plaintiff's compensatory damages or $ 250,000, whichever is greater); ABA Report, supra note 54, at 64-66 (recommending that punitive damages awards in excess of three-to-one ratio to compensatory damages be considered presumptively "excessive"); ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 258-59 (endorsing concept of ratio coupled with alternative monetary ceiling).

n62 At the federal level, Congress included a cap on punitive damages for individuals and small businesses in the Year 2000 Readiness and Responsibility Act, Pub. L. 106-37, 113 Stat. 135 [hereinafter Y2K Act]. The Y2K Act established procedures and legal standards for lawsuits stemming from Year 2000 date-related computer failures. A bill to cap punitive damages for individuals and small businesses in all civil actions was reported out of the House Judiciary Committee in February of 2000 by voice vote. See H.R. Rep. No. 106-494 (2000). The House passed the bill on February 16, 2000.

n63 Thomas Jefferson, A Bill for Proportioning Crimes and Punishment in Cases Heretofore Capital (1779), in Papers of Thomas Jefferson 2:492, 493 (Julian P. Boyd ed., 1950).

n64 For example, in a 1999 products liability case arising out of an automobile accident involving a drunk driver, a California court left untouched a jury award of $ 107 million in compensatory damages; the court approved punitive damages in the case totaling $ 1.09 billion. See Frederic M. Biddle, GM Verdict Cut $ 3.8 Billion in Suit Over Explosion, Wall St. J., Aug. 27, 1999, at B5. In a 1996 case, an Alabama jury awarded $ 50 million in compensatory damages and $ 100 million in punitive damages. The automobile's manufacturer argued that the plaintiff had been intoxicated and lost control of his car after falling asleep at the wheel. See Hardy v. General Motors Corp., CV-93-56 (Ala. Cir. Ct. Lowndes County verdict June 3, 1996).

n65 See Edward Felsenthal, Punitive Awards Are Called Modest, Rare, Wall St. J., June 17, 1996, at B4.

n66 See W. Kip Viscusi, The Social Costs of Punitive Damages Against Corporations In to the uncertainty (and therefore the risk) of a court trial outcome. ... [62] This recommendation reflects the practical reality that a punitive damages award exceeding $ 250,000 would bankrupt most individuals and small businesses. ... [98] Having found the verdict tainted, the court reduced the punitive damages award to $ 2 million, believing that this amount was "a constitutionally reasonable" punishment for BMW's conduct in Alabama. ...

REV_00263237

TEXT: [*1003]

Introduction

The United States Supreme Court has expressed serious concern in recent years that punitive damages awards in this country have "run wild," jeopardizing fundamental constitutional rights. [1] The Court has provided some general controls, holding that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment imposes both substantive limits on the size of punitive damages awards [2] and procedural limits on when and how [*1004] punitive damages may be awarded. [3] Yet, excessive punitive damages awards continue to be a major problem in many states. [4] Reform is urgently needed to restore balance, fairness, and predictability to the law. Jackpot justice should not be permitted to replace fairness and rationality in punitive damages law.

Punitive damages are not normal civil or tort law damages. They are not awarded to compensate for a harm; that purpose is accomplished by compensatory damages, which provide compensation for both economic losses (e.g., lost wages, medical expenses, and substitute domestic services) and noneconomic losses (e.g., "pain and suffering"). Punitive damages are awarded "to further the aims of the criminal law: 'to punish reprehensible conduct and to deter its future occurrence.'" [5] They provide a "windfall recovery" for plaintiffs. [6]

Punitive damages, like many forms of punishment, are by their nature, designed to "engender adverse social consequences," including in many instances, debilitating stigma. [7] Courts and commentators alike have emphasized the "potentially devastating" ramifications of a punitive damages award on a civil defendant's character, reputation, business, and good will. [8] The problems created by this stigma are amplified by [*1005] the way the media reports on punitive damages awards. While a large initial punitive damages verdict may frequently make front page national news, an appellate decision reducing or reversing the award several years later usually gets little coverage, if it is reported at all. The truth often fails to catch up with the perception created about the defendant.

This Article traces the history of punitive damages awards from their early limited inception to the modern expansive trend. It will then describe the problems of runaway and unpredictable awards. Finally, the article will provide background and support for a number of needed reforms to our nation's punitive damages jurisprudence. Nearly all of these reforms could be accomplished both by courts through the development of the common law and by legislatures; a few would require legislation; one calls for congressional action. [9]

By way of summary, we propose establishing a "trigger," or standard, for punitive damages liability that reflects the intentional tort roots of punitive damages awards. We believe that punitive damages should only be awarded if there is "clear and convincing evidence" that the defendant acted with "actual malice" toward the claimant. We also propose limits on punitive damages awards so that the punishment fits the offense. This would help prevent due process violations and promote settlements.

We also call for a number of procedural and evidentiary changes in punitive damages law to safeguard fundamental due process rights. We believe that, at a defendant's request, a trial

REV_00263220

Environmental and Safety Torts, 87 Geo. L.J. 285, 294 (1998).

n67 See Troy L. Cady, Disadvantaging the Disadvantaged: The Discriminatory Effect of Punitive Damage Caps, 25 Hofstra L. Rev. 1005 (1997).

n68 See U.S. Small Bus. Admin. (visited Mar. 7, 2000) <http://www.sba.gov/womeninbusiness>.

n69 See U.S. Small Bus. Admin., Minorities in Business iii (Office of Advocacy 1999).

n70 See id.

n71 See Hodges v. S.C. Toof & Co., 833 S.W.2d 896 (Tenn. 1992); Transportation Ins. Co. v. Moriel, 879 S.W.2d 10 (Tex. 1994).

n72 See, e.g., Cal. Civ. Code § 3295(d) (West Supp. 1999); Minn. Stat. Ann. § 549.20 (West Supp. 1999); Miss Code Ann. § 11-1-65(1)(a) (Supp. 1999).

n73 See ABA Report, supra note 54, at 19; ACTL Report, supra note 54, at 18-19; Model Punitive Damages Act, supra note 54, § 11; ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 255 n.41.

n74 Strickland v. Owens Corning, 142 F.3d 353, 359 (6th Cir. 1998) (citations omitted). As one leading commentator noted:

Juries have a natural sympathy for injured persons and not infrequently a corresponding hostility to "big business." The notion that juror consideration of the multimillion, often multibillion, dollar figures on a corporate balance sheet would operate to protect such defendants against excessive liability is, in context, almost laughable.

John Calvin Jeffries, Jr., A Comment on the Constitutionality of Punitive Damages, 72 Va. L. Rev. 139, 146-47 (1986) (citations omitted).

n75 Defendants, however, should be able to introduce net worth evidence to mitigate damages. When introduced for this purpose, net worth evidence is not likely to produce a verdict based on bias or prejudice.

n76 499 U.S. 1 (1991).

n77 Id. at 22.

n78 Id.

n79 509 U.S. 443 (1993).

n80 Id. at 464. The Court did not rule on this potential due process violation because TXO had not preserved the issue for appeal. See id.

n81 517 U.S. 559 (1996).

n82 Id. at 574. In BMW, the United States Supreme Court established three guideposts to determine when a punitive award is excessive and violates due process. See infra Part III.F. Significantly, the Court did not even discuss wealth as a factor in developing its guideposts. That fact has led Judge Easterbrook to conclude that such evidence is irrelevant and inadmissible. See Pivot Point Int'l v. Charlene Prods., Inc., 932 F. Supp. 220 (N.D. Ill. 1996) (Easterbrook, J., sitting by designation).

REV_00263238

n83 BMW, 517 U.S. at 585; see also Landgraf v. USI Film Prods., 511 U.S. 244, 265 (1994) ("Elementary considerations of fairness dictate that individuals should have an opportunity to know what the law is and to conform their conduct accordingly . . . .").

n84 Dissenting in TXO, Justice O'Connor stated:

Corporations are mere abstractions and, as such, are unlikely to be viewed with much sympathy. Moreover, they often represent a large accumulation of productive resources; jurors naturally think little of taking an otherwise large sum of money out of what appears to be an enormously larger pool of wealth. Finally, juries may feel privileged to correct perceived social ills stemming from unequal wealth distribution by transferring money from "wealthy" corporations to comparatively needier plaintiffs.

TXO, 509 U.S. at 491 (O'Connor, J., dissenting). Justice O'Connor dissented because she believed that TXO had preserved the "wealth issue" for appeal. She would have overturned the punitive damages award on the ground that the jury was "unduly influenced by the fact that TXO was a very large, out-of-state corporation." Id. at 489; see also Dick Thornburgh, No End in Sight as Punitive Damages Go Up, Up, Up, Wall St. J., Mar. 13, 2000, at A47.

n85 ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 254-55 (stating that "in determining the size of the award that is sufficient for deterrence, what is relevant is not the defendant's overall wealth, but rather the profit it realized from the particular tortious activity in question . . . . Use of evidence of the defendant's wealth in calculating punitive damages against organizational defendants therefore cannot be justified even by the rationale of economic deterrence, let alone of retributive punishment.") (second emphasis added); see also Victor Schwartz & Mark Behrens, The American Law Institute's Reporters' Study On Enterprise Responsibility For Personal Injury: A Timely Call For Punitive Damages Reform, 30 San Diego L. Rev. 263, 271-72 (1993) ("The Reporters' recommendation to exclude evidence of a defendant's total wealth represents sound public policy. When a jury is allowed to focus on a defendant's wealth, the jury is free to disregard what is really at issue in the case: whether and to what extent the defendant's conduct was wrongful.").

n86 Zazu Designs v. L'Oreal, S.A., 979 F.2d 499, 508 (7th Cir. 1992) (Easterbrook, J.).

n87 See ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 255 n.40. The ALI Reporters also pointed to another reason that a defendant's assets are irrelevant to the issue of punitive damages:

The actual burden of imposing a higher legal penalty on account of size cannot be borne by the formal corporate entity and will rarely be borne by the officials actually responsible; instead, the burden ultimately falls on the shareholder, customer, or worker constituencies of the firm, who often are not especially wealthy.

ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 255.

n88 See Kemezy v. Peters, 79 F.3d 33, 35 (7th Cir. 1996) (Posner, J.) (The idea that a larger punishment is needed to deter a rich person than a person of modest means "does not apply to institutions as distinct from natural persons."). As Judge Easterbrook has explained:

Corporations . . . are not wealthy in the sense that persons are. Corporations are abstractions; investors own the net worth of the business. These investors pay any punitive awards (the value of their shares decreases), and they may be of average wealth. Pension trusts and mutual funds, aggregating the investments of millions of average persons, own the bulk of many large corporations. Seeing the corporation as wealthy is an illusion, which like other mirages frequently leads people astray.

REV_00263239

Zazu Designs, 979 F.2d at 508.

n89 Kenneth S. Abraham & John Calvin Jeffries, Jr., Punitive Damages and the Rule of Law: The Role of Defendant's Wealth, 18 J. Legal. Stud. 415, 417 (1989) (emphasis added).

n90 517 U.S. 559 (1996).

n91 Id. at 585.

n92 Id. at 563.

n93 Id. at 565.

n94 See id. at 563-64.

n95 See BMW, 517 U.S. at 565.

n96 Id.

n97 See id. at 567.

n98 See id.

n99 Id.

n100 See BMW, 517 U.S. at 585-86.

n101 Id. at 571-72 (quoting Healy v. Beer Inst., 491 U.S. 324, 335-36 (1989)).

n102 Id. at 585.

n103 Id. at 571.

n104 Id. (citation omitted).

n105 BMW, 517 U.S. at 572; see also Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809, 824 (1975) ("A State does not acquire power or supervision over the internal affairs of another State merely because the welfare and health of its own citizens may be affected when they travel to that State."); New York Life Ins. Co. v. Head, 234 U.S. 149, 161 (1914) ("It would be impossible to permit the statutes of Missouri to operate beyond the jurisdiction of that State . . . without throwing down the constitutional barriers by which all the States are restricted within the orbits of their lawful authority and upon the preservation of which the Government under the Constitution depends. This is so obviously the necessary result of the Constitution that it has rarely been called into question and hence authorities directly dealing with it do not abound."); Bonaparte v. Tax Court, 104 U.S. 592, 594 (1881) ("No State can legislate except with reference to its own jurisdiction . . . . Each State is independent of all the others in this particular.").

n106 BMW, 517 U.S. at 572-73; see also Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 363 (1978) ("To punish a person because he has done what the law plainly allows him to do is a due process violation of the most basic sort.").

n107 BMW, 517 U.S. at 573-74.

n108 Id. at 572 n.17; see also Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 U.S. 504, 521 (1992) (holding that state regulation for preemption purposes can be as effectively exerted through an award of tort damages as through state administrative or legislative lawmaking processes); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 265 (1964) ("The test is not the form in which state power has been applied but, whatever the form, whether such power has in fact been exercised."); San Diego Bldg. Trades Council v. Garmon, 359 U.S. 236, 247 (1959) ("Regulation can be as effectively exerted through an award of damages as through some form of preventative relief.").

REV_00263240

n109 BMW, 517 U.S. at 572.

n110 See generally Restatement (Third) Of The Law Of Torts: Products Liability § 4(b) (1998) (evidence of product's compliance with safety statutes or regulations "does not preclude as a matter of law a finding of product defect").

n111 See BMW, 517 U.S. at 572.

n112 See In re American Med. Sys., Inc., 75 F.3d 1069, 1085 (6th Cir. 1996) (decertifying class action, in part, because the trial court judge failed to consider how negligence law differed from jurisdiction to jurisdiction); Castano v. American Tobacco Co., 84 F.3d 734, 741 (5th Cir. 1996) (multistate class action decertified, because trial court failed to consider how variations in state law would affect federal rule requirements regarding class actions); In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc., 51 F.3d 1293, 1300 (7th Cir. 1995) (Posner, J.) (comparing differing state pattern instructions on negligence and differing formulations on the meaning of negligence).

n113 See Margaret Meriwether Cordray, The Limits of State Sovereignty and the Issue of Multiple Punitive Damages Awards, 78 Or. L. Rev. 275, 309 (1999) ("Constitutional principles of sovereignty and federalism thus forbid a state from imposing punitive damages based on the defendant's out-of-state conduct, regardless of whether the defendant's conduct was lawful or unlawful where it occurred. To allow an individual state to impose punitive damages based on conduct, lawful or unlawful, having no significant contacts with that state would indeed, 'throw down the constitutional barriers by which all the States are restricted within the orbits of their lawful authority and upon the preservation of which the Government under the Constitution depends.'" (quoting New York Life Ins. Co. v. Head, 234 U.S. 149, 161 (1914)).

n114 See Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 12-701 (West 1999); Mich. Stat. Ann. § 600.2946(5) (1999); N.J. Stat. Ann. § 2A:58C-5(c) (West 1999); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2307.801(c) (West 1999); Or. Rev. Stat. § 30.927(1) (1998); Utah Code Ann. § 78-18-2 (1999); see also Colo. Rev. Stat. § 1321-403(1)(b) (1999) (rebuttable presumption that product was not defective if it complied with federal or state standards); N.D. Cent. Code § 28-01.402 (1)(a) (1999) (same).

n115 ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 95, 101.

n116 See Victor E. Schwartz & Liberty Magarian, Multiple Punitive Damage Awards in Mass Disaster and Product Liability Litigation: An Assault on Due Process, 8 Adelphia L.J. 101 (1992).

n117 See Edwards v. Armstrong World Indus., Inc., 911 F.2d 1151, 1155 (5th Cir. 1990) ("If no change occurs in our tort or constitutional law, the time will arrive when [a defendant's] liability for punitive damages imperils its ability to pay compensatory claims . . . ."); Bishop v. General Motors Corp., 925 F. Supp. 294, 298 (D.N.J. 1996) ("Indeed, one of the many cogent criticisms of punitive damages is that multiple punitive damage liability can both bankrupt a defendant and preclude recovery for tardy plaintiffs.").

n118 See generally Froud v. Celotex Corp., 437 N.E.2d 910, 914 (Ill. 1982) (Sullivan, J., concurring) ("It cannot be denied that the spectre of the destruction of companies, and even individuals, as a result of punitive damage awards is a threatening, present reality.").

REV_00263241

n119 Dunn v. Hovic, 1 F.3d 1371, 1398 (3d Cir. 1993) (Weis, J., dissenting), modified in part, 13 F.3d 58 (3d Cir. 1993).

n120 William Schwartzer, Punishment Ad Absurdum, 11 Cal. Law. 116 (Oct. 1991).

n121 See Racich v. Celotex Corp., 887 F.2d 393, 398 (2d Cir. 1989) ("We agree that the multiple imposition of punitive damages for the same course of conduct may raise serious constitutional concerns, in the absence of any limiting principle."); Juzwin v. Amtorg Trading Corp., 705 F. Supp. 1053, 1064 (D.N.J. 1989) ("The court holds that due process places a limit on the number of times and the extent to which a defendant may be subjected to punishment for a single course of conduct. Regardless of whether a sanction is labelled 'civil' or 'criminal' in nature, it cannot be tolerated under the requirements of due process if it amounts to unrestricted punishment."), vacated, 718 F. Supp. 1233 (D.N.J. 1989), rev'd on other grounds sub nom., Juzwin v. Asbestos Corp., 900 F.2d 686 (3d Cir. 1990); In re Northern Dist. of Calif. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prod. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 899 (N.D. Cal. 1981) ("A defendant has a due process right to be protected against unlimited multiple punishment for the same act."), vacated and remanded on other grounds, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982); see also King v. Armstrong World Indus., Inc., 906 F.2d 1022, 1031 (5th Cir. 1990) ("It must be said that a strong arguable basis exists for applying the due process clause . . . to a jury's award of punitive damages in a mass tort context."), reh'g denied, 914 F.2d 251 (5th Cir. 1990); In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175, 1188 (8th Cir. 1982) (Heaney, J., dissenting) (Unlimited punishment for one course of conduct "would violate the sense of 'fundamental fairness' that is essential to constitutional due process."); Morse v. Southern Union Co., 38 F. Supp. 2d 1120, 1126 n.12 (W.D. Mo. 1998) ("While the Missouri courts seem not to have considered whether the likelihood of multiple claims should limit punitive damages recovery, I believe such a factor may be required by Due Process."); McBride v. General Motors Corp., 737 F. Supp. 1563, 1570 (M.D. Ga. 1990) ("Due process may place a limit on the number of times and the extent to which a defendant may be subjected to punishment for a single course of conduct."); Magallanes v. Superior Ct., 167 Cal. App. 3d 878, 888, (Cal. Ct. App. 1985) ("It is also fair to ask whether a defendant who has been punished with punitive damages when the case is first tried should be punished again when the second, or the tenth, or the hundredth case is tried.").

n122 See Dan D. Dobbs, Law of Remedies § 3.11(8) (2d ed. 1993) ("If the first verdict for punitive damages . . . represents the appropriate level of punishment, it may be seriously unfair to inflict additional punishment in all subsequent cases. Besides the unfairness, such awards may destroy a valuable business and may exhaust its assets so that later victims of the same tort collect nothing at all."); John Calvin Jeffries, Jr., A Comment on the Constitutionality of Punitive Damages, 72 Va. L. Rev. 139 (1986); Dennis Jones et al., Multiple Punitive Damages Awards For A Single Course of Wrongful Conduct: The Need For A National Policy To Protect Due Process, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 1 (1991).

n123 Dunn v. Hovic, 1 F.3d 1371, 1399 (3d Cir. 1993) (Weis, J., dissenting); see also Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 781 F.2d 394, 415 (5th Cir. 1986) (en banc) (Clark, C.J., dissenting) ("The court is frustrated by the lack of congressional action [to solve the multiple punitive damages problem]. Clearly the powers of Congress to tax and regulate give that forum the interstate reach and flexibility needed to allocate the relatively scarce resources that must be available to present and future claimants to achieve the greatest good for society.").

n124 This problem was described by the ALI:

Single-state action . . . is an ineffectual response to the problem, because one state cannot control what happens in other jurisdictions. In fact, the state that acts alone may simply provide some relief to out-of-state manufacturers at the expense of its own citizen-victims, a situation that hardly provides much law reform incentive for state legislators.

REV_00263242

ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 261. Recognizing that a uniform remedy can only be achieved at the federal level, the ALI Reporters' Study recommended Congressional action. See ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 261.

n125 Florida does not permit punitive damages to be awarded more than once for the same act or course of conduct unless the court determines by clear and convincing evidence that the amount of punitive damages previously awarded was insufficient to punish the defendant. In that situation, the court may permit a jury to consider an award of subsequent punitive damages. Any subsequent awards must be reduced by the amount of any earlier punitive damages awards. See Fla. Stat. Ann. § 768.73(2) (West 1997). Missouri passed a statute, applicable in most tort actions, that allows a defendant to file a post-trial motion requesting a credit for prior awards arising out of the same conduct. See Mo. Ann. Stat. § 510.263.4 (1999). A Georgia statute limiting punitive damages in product liability cases to a single award, see Ga. Code Ann. § 51-125.1(e) (1999), was declared unconstitutional. See McBride v. General Motors Corp., 737 F. Supp. 1563 (M.D. Ga. 1990).

n126 718 F. Supp. 1233 (D.N.J. 1989), rev'd on other grounds sub nom., Juzwin v. Asbestos Corp., 900 F.2d 686 (3d Cir. 1990).

n127 See id. at 1235 ("This court does not have the power or the authority to prohibit subsequent awards in other courts, notwithstanding its opinion that such subsequent awards violate the due process rights of the defendants . . . . Until there is uniformity either through Supreme Court decision or national legislation, this court is powerless to fashion a remedy which will protect the due process rights of this defendant or other defendants similarly situated."); see also Davis v. Celotex Corp., 420 S.E.2d 557, 566 (W. Va. 1992) (noting that, because punitive damages can be awarded "nationwide, it is doubtful that one state's ruling would necessarily bind other jurisdictions"); Fischer v. Johns-Manville Corp., 512 A.2d 466, 480 (N.J. 1986) ("At the state court level we are powerless to implement solutions to the nationwide problems created by [multiple punitive damages awards]."). See generally David Lafferty, Note, Juzwin v. Amtorg Trading Corp.: Multiple Assessments of Punitive Damages In Toxic Tort Litigation, 8 Pace Envtl. L. Rev. 647, 665 (1991) (concluding that the problem of multiple punitive damages awards "cries out for congressional action").

n128 See generally TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 472 (1993) (Scalia and Thomas, J.J., concurring in the judgment) (indicating a belief that "any perceived 'unfairness' in the common-law punitive damages regime" should be fixed by legislatures).

n129 W.R. Grace & Co.-Conn. v. Waters, 638 So. 2d 502, 505 (Fla. 1994); see also Spaur v. Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., 510 N.W.2d 854, 865-66 (Iowa 1994) ("We do not disagree that the problem of successive punitive damages awards in mass tort cases arising from the same conduct is a serious one . . . . We believe neither our action nor legislative action in Iowa will curb the problem of multiple punitive damage awards in mass tort litigation.").

n130 140 Cong. Rec. S14835-6 (daily ed. Oct. 7, 1994) (statement of Sen. Danforth).

n131 Id.

n132 Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 18 (1991).

REV_00263243

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /5 reform and caps and date(aft 1997) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Thursday, September 12, 2002 - 8:14 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

involving a punitive damages claim should be "bifurcated" so that the proceedings on punitive damages are separate from and subsequent to the proceedings on compensatory damages before the same jury. This would prevent evidence that is highly prejudicial and relevant only to the issue of punishment from being heard by the jurors and improperly considered when they are determining basic liability. We also suggest that [*1006] evidence of a defendant's net worth should be excluded from consideration at trial. Further, we explain that evidence of a defendant's out-of-state activity should not be considered when determining an award of punitive damages.

Next, to encourage the innovation and distribution of lifesaving and life-enhancing products that are socially beneficial to society, we recommend that punitive damages should not be permitted in cases alleging harms caused by FDA pre-market approved pharmaceuticals, vaccines, or medical devices, unless the approval was obtained through fraud or bribery.

Finally, we argue for federal legislation to address the special problem of multiple punitive damages awards for a single act or course of conduct. Repetitive punishment is not only unfair overkill, but it can strip a company of assets and endanger the ability of future claimants to recover even basic out-of-pocket expenses and damages for their pain and suffering.

I. Background: The Development of Punitive Damages Law

A. The First 200 Years

Punitive, or exemplary, damages first received explicit recognition by the English common law in 1763 in two cases involving illegal searches and seizures by officers of the Crown. [10] In Huckle v. Money, [11] the first case to use the term "exemplary damages," and its companion case, Wilkes v. Wood, [12] English courts for the first time expressed that "the punitive and deterrent purposes of damage awards could be separated from their compensatory function." [13] [*1007]

Huckle and Wilkes were followed by cases approving punitive damages awards in a narrow category of torts involving conscious and intentional harm inflicted by one person on another. These "intentional torts" included assault and battery, [14] malicious prosecution, [15] false imprisonment, [16] and trespass. [17] Punitive damages were allowed in these cases as an auxiliary, or "helper," to the criminal law system, which in eighteenth century England "punished more severely for infractions involving property damage than for invasions of personal rights." [18]

As in England, punitive damages in colonial America (and through the nineteenth and well into the twentieth centuries) were available only in a comparatively small class of torts-"the traditional intentional torts." [19] These included: assault and battery, [20] libel and slander, [21] malicious prosecution, [22] false imprisonment, [23] and intentional interferences with property [*1008] such as trespass and conversion, malicious attachment, or destruction of property, [24] private nuisance, [25] and similar wrongful conduct. [26] In general, punitive damages "merited scant attention," because they "were rarely assessed and likely to be small in amount." [27] Typically, punitive damages awards only slightly exceeded compensatory damages awards, if at all. [28]

B. The Modern Era

Beginning in the late 1960s, American courts began to depart radically from the historical "intentional tort" moorings of punitive damages. [29] The advent of "mass tort" litigation resulted in an increase of punitive damages claims against manufacturers, [30] including the possibility of repeated imposition of punitive damages for an alleged risk in a single product line or a single decision. [31] [*1009]

REV_00263221

"Reckless disregard" became a popular standard for punitive damages liability. [32] A number of states utilize a triple "trigger"-punitive damages can be awarded if the defendant engaged in either willful, wanton, or gross misconduct. The triple trigger approach gives plaintiffs three separate paths to obtain punitive damages. In some states, "gross negligence" can support a punitive damages award. [33]

Changes in punitive damages law and practice also impacted both the frequency and size of punitive damages awards. For example, until 1976, there were only three reported appellate court decisions upholding awards of punitive damages in product liability cases, and the punitive damages award in each case was modest in proportion to the compensatory damages awarded. [34] Then, in the late 1970s and 1980s, the size of punitive damages awards "increased dramatically" [35] and "unprecedented numbers of punitive awards in product liability and other mass tort situations began to surface." [36] "Today," as one respected commentator in the field has noted, "hardly a month goes by without a multi-million dollar punitive damages verdict in a product liability case." [37]

This phenomenon is fueled in part by evidentiary rules that permit a contingency fee plaintiff's lawyer to tell the jury not only about the profit the defendant made on a product, but also the general wealth of the corporation as a whole. Plaintiffs' lawyers argue to juries that large, wealthy corporations will "get the message" only if punitive damages are sub [*1010] stantial. As the United States Supreme Court noted in Honda Motor Co., Ltd. v. Oberg, [38] a products liability punitive damages case, "The presentation of evidence of a defendant's net worth creates the potential that juries will use their verdicts to express biases against big businesses, particularly those without strong local presences." [39]

II. Punitive Damages Reform Is Needed

A. The Problem with Runaway Punitive Damages

Reform is needed to address the chilling effect that the threat of runaway punitive damages can have on job-creators and the general public, who are denied socially beneficial products. Reform also would help prevent due process violations.

The chilling effect of punitive damages is illustrated by the litigation involving the drug Bendectin, an anti-nausea morning sickness drug once marketed by Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc. [40] Although the drug had been and still is approved by the Food and Drug Administration and is widely acclaimed by health care professionals worldwide, Merrell Dow withdrew Bendectin from the market in 1983, in part [*1011] from concerns about punitive damages liability. Merrell Dow has never lost a final judgment in any Bendectin case in the twenty-year history of the litigation; trial judges often dismiss these cases prior to trial. [41] The lack of any meaningful standards, however, has resulted in some substantial punitive damages verdicts, which eventually have been overturned by trial courts or on appeal. [42]

The sheer unpredictability of the current system has also resulted in overdeterrence. A Conference Board Study of corporate executives found that fear of liability suits had prompted thirtysix percent of the firms to discontinue a product and thirty percent to decide against introducing a new product. [43]

B. "Data Wars" and the In Terrorem Effect of Punitive Damages

Opponents of punitive damages reform have argued that changes in the law are not needed, because headline-grabbing awards are often reduced on appeal. For example, one study funded by plaintiffs' lawyers has suggested that there were only 355 punitive damages awards in products liability cases from 1965 to 1990. [44] While the author of this study has conceded that this number was only a "guesstimate," [45] the study also overlooked the practical reality that actual punitive awards represent just the tip of the iceberg in regard to their impact. They are dwarfed by the amounts paid out in settlements due to the in terrorem effect of punitive damages.

REV_00263222

On average, over ninety percent of cases are settled out of court or otherwise disposed of without trial. [46] In many of [*1012] these cases, the threat of punitive damages may be abused as a "wild card" to force higher settlements. [47] As Yale law professor George Priest has observed:

The availability of unlimited punitive damages affects the 95% to 98% of cases that settle out of court prior to trial. It is obvious and indisputable that a punitive damages claim increases the magnitude of the ultimate settlement and, indeed, affects the entire settlement process, increasing the likelihood of litigation. [48]

Professor Priest's observation is supported by the findings of a 1996 Pacific Research Institute for Public Policy study, which concluded:

1. The unpredictability of a prospective punitive damage award contributes significantly to the uncertainty (and therefore the risk) of a court trial outcome.

2. Both the uncertainty posed by the prospect of unlimited punitive damages, combined with the relative probability of a punitive damage award if a case goes to jury trial, provide litigants who demand punitive damages with potent leverage against risk-averse defendants, and tip the balance in settlement bargains in favor of litigants with weak or frivolous cases. [49]

III. Proposals For Punitive Damages Reform

In order to address the United States Supreme Court's concern that punitive damages awards in this country have "run wild," [50] clear, rational rules are needed to protect fundamental constitutional rights, remove barriers to interstate commerce, and promote economic growth and innovation, while at the same time providing incentives for responsible business practices. Below, we discuss a number of proposals that find strong support in both the law and sound public policy. [*1013]

A. Actual Malice "Trigger"

Punitive damages should only be awarded if the defendant's conduct exhibited actual malice. This "trigger" reflects the roots of punitive damages law. At the time the Founding Fathers ratified the Constitution and until relatively recent times, punitive damages were reserved for clearly intentional torts such as assault, battery, trespass, and false imprisonment. While the actual malice standard is more conservative than the current law in most states, [51] we believe it is preferable to other standards, such as the "triple trigger" approach, because it would help separate conduct that is particularly reprehensible and worthy of punishment from that which is not.

B. "Clear and Convincing Evidence" Burden of Proof

A claimant should be required to establish proof of punitive damages liability by "clear and convincing evidence." The "clear and convincing evidence" burden of proof standard reflects the quasi-criminal nature of punitive damages; it takes a middle ground between the burden of proof standard ordinarily used in civil cases (i.e., proof by a "preponderance of the evidence") and the criminal law standard (i.e., proof "beyond a reasonable doubt"). [52] The standard is now law in twenty-nine states and the District of Columbia, [53] and has been recom [*1014] mended by each of the principal academic groups to analyze the law of punitive damages over the past decade, including the American Bar Association, the American College of Trial Lawyers, and the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws. [54] The United States Supreme Court has specifically endorsed the "clear and convincing evidence" burden of proof standard in punitive damages cases. [55]

REV_00263223

C. Proportionality: Making the Punishment Fit the "Offense"

1. A Proposal for Reform

Reasonable parameters should be put on punitive damages awards to make the punishment fit the offense. [56] Proportionality has been an important part of the United States Supreme Court's consideration of the validity of criminal punishment. [57] Even very serious crimes such as larceny, robbery, and arson [*1015] have sentences defined by a statutory maximum. [58] As former Supreme Court Justice Lewis Powell wrote: "It is long past time to bring the law of punitive damages into conformity with our notions of just punishment." [59]

A number of states have enacted statutes to address excessiveness in punitive damages awards. [60] We support permitting punitive damages awards against larger businesses up to two times the amount awarded to the claimant for economic and noneconomic losses, or $ 250,000, whichever is greater. [61] This flexible approach accomplishes punishment and deterrence in the unusual situation where there is serious misconduct and relatively minor actual damages. We also support limiting the maximum single punishment against an individual or small business to two times the amount awarded to the claimant for economic and noneconomic losses, or $ 250,000, whichever is less (i.e., $ 250,000 would be the maximum). [62] [*1016] This recommendation reflects the practical reality that a punitive damages award exceeding $ 250,000 would bankrupt most individuals and small businesses.

2. Arguments Challenging Proportionality Are Unsupported

It has been argued that proportionality may result in inadequate deterrence. As Thomas Jefferson noted, however, "if the punishment were only proportional to the injury, men would feel that their inclination as well as their duty to see the laws observed." [63] Indeed, federal antitrust laws have worked well for decades with punishment set in proportion to actual losses.

Furthermore, it should be remembered that there is no limit on the number of times a business can be punished and that when a business engages in wrongful conduct it does not know how many people will be hurt and how much harm might occur. There is simply no way for a company to predetermine the actual damages of all persons who may be injured by its conduct. One also must remember that compensatory damages themselves can run very high, so they can definitely have a deterrent effect on wrongful behavior as well. [64]

The argument that proportionality may somehow result in inadequate deterrence has been rebutted by empirical fact. A study by two Cornell University Law School professors and the National Center for State Courts found that awards in product liability punitive damages cases, after all appeals were exhausted, have almost always been within two times compensatory damages. [65] [*1017]

We have been asked, in light of this report, why a so-called "cap" on punitive damages is needed. The answer is that the present system is time consuming and wasteful. It may take months or years until the final "appeal" is determined. It is our judgment that having a firm outer limit on punitive damages will reduce appeals and legal costs without sacrificing deterrence. This should benefit both plaintiffs and defendants.

REV_00263224

In addition, it has been argued that totally unlimited punitive damages are needed to police corporate wrongdoing. This assertion is not supported by fact. There is no credible evidence that the behavior of businesses is less safe in either those states that have set limits on punitive damages or in the states that do not permit punitive damages at all. [66] Furthermore, plaintiffs in these states have no more difficulty obtaining legal representation than in those states where the "sky is the limit."

Finally, it has been suggested that a proportionality requirement for punitive damages could be unfair to women and other minority groups that tend to recover less in compensatory damages than other groups, because it may reduce the amount such individuals could recover in punitive damages. [67] First, this argument totally misapprehends the basic premise that punitive damages have absolutely nothing to do with compensating an individual for a loss; they are purely a "windfall" to the claimant.

Second, the argument ignores the needs of women and minority groups in business, particularly small businesses, who face threats to their enterprises as a result of unlimited punitive damages. The U.S. Small Business Administration's Office of Women's Business Ownership has reported that there are 8 million women-owned businesses in the United States. [68] In addition, the U.S. Small Business Administration's Office of Advocacy has reported that, by 1997, there were an estimated 3.25 million minority-owned businesses in the United States, [*1018] generating $ 495 billion in revenues, and employing nearly 4 million workers. [69] From 1987 to 1997, the number of minority-owned businesses increased 168%, while revenues grew twice as fast-343%. [70] Punitive damages reform would benefit these businesses greatly.

D. Bifurcation

At a defendant's request, a trial involving a punitive damages claim should be divided so that the proceedings on punitive damages are separate from and subsequent to the proceedings on compensatory damages. Judicial economy would be achieved by having the same jury determine both compensatory damages and punitive damages issues.

Bifurcated trials are equitable, because they prevent evidence that is highly prejudicial and relevant only to the issue of punishment from being heard by jurors and improperly considered when they are determining basic liability. For example, plaintiffs' lawyers like to introduce evidence of a company's net worth. Although a jury is often instructed to ignore such evidence unless it decides to punish the defendant, it is difficult, as a practical matter, for jurors to do so. The net result may be that jurors overlook key issues regarding whether a defendant is liable for compensatory damages; they may make an award simply because they believe that the defendant "can afford it." Bifurcation would help prevent that unfair result because evidence of the defendant's net worth would be inadmissible in the first part (i.e., compensatory damages phase) of the case.

Bifurcation also helps jurors "compartmentalize" a trial, allowing them to more easily separate the burden of proof that is required for compensatory damage awards (i.e., proof by a preponderance of the evidence) from a higher burden of proof for punitive damages (i.e., proof by clear and convincing evidence).

Recognizing the benefit of bifurcation, some courts have adopted the procedure as a matter of common law reform. [71] [*1019] Other states have made changes through court rules or legislation. [72] Bifurcation of punitive damages trials is supported by the American Bar Association, the American College of Trial Lawyers, and the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, among other well-known organizations. [73]

REV_00263225

E. Excluding Evidence of a Defendant's Net Worth by Plaintiffs

Evidence of a defendant's net worth can lead to a punitive damages award based on bias, prejudice, or passion. Introduction of such evidence by plaintiffs is, at bottom, "an improper 'appeal to class prejudice and pandering to the perception that corporations wield disparate power,'" generally made for no reason "'other than to prejudice . . . the jury's sworn duty to reach a fair, honest and just verdict.'" [74] To reduce the possibility that quasi-criminal punishment could be meted out for improper purposes, plaintiffs should be precluded from making such "deep pockets" arguments. [75]

1. The United States Supreme Court Speaks and Leading Academics Agree

The United States Supreme Court has indicated that overreliance upon a corporate defendant's financial condition may violate due process. For example, one of the reasons the [*1020] Court gave for upholding Alabama's punitive damages scheme in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip [76] was the fact that Alabama does not permit introduction of the defendant's financial condition, and its juries therefore "must be guided by more than the defendant's net worth." [77] The Court stated: "Alabama plaintiffs do not enjoy a windfall because they have the good fortune to have a defendant with a deep pocket." [78]

Subsequently, the Court said in TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp. [79] that "the emphasis on the wealth of the wrongdoer increased the risk that the [punitive damages] award may have been influenced by prejudice against large corporations, a risk that is of special concern when the defendant is a nonresident." [80] Most recently, in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore [81] the Court expressed its strongest reservations about the use of wealth evidence in punitive damages cases. The Court stated that "elementary notions of fairness enshrined in our constitutional jurisprudence dictate that a person receive fair notice not only of the conduct that will subject him to punishment but also of the severity of the penalty that a State may impose." [82]

The defendant's right to notice would be a "phantom" right if a punitive damages award could be based on a defendant's net worth at the time of trial. Indeed, in BMW, the Supreme Court was careful to emphasize that "the fact that BMW is a large corporation rather than an impecunious individual does not diminish its entitlement to fair notice of the demands that the several States impose on the conduct of its business." [83] [*1021]

The risk of a punitive damages award reflecting jury bias is particularly great where the defendant is a large corporation. [84] For precisely this reason, a report prepared by tort scholars for the prestigious American Law Institute recommended that evidence of a corporation's net worth should "no longer be admissible in assessing punitive damages." [85] After all, as one respected federal appellate judge has noted, "having a large net worth [is not] the wrong to be deterred!" [86]

Furthermore, consideration of a corporate defendant's net wealth can lead to arbitrary awards. Corporations can incur proportionately more instances of punishment simply because of their greater volume of business. For example, in a given period there might be fifty punitive damages awards against a larger company and only five against a smaller company. If each punitive damages assessment is one percent of the [*1022] defendant's assets, the large company will have lost half its assets after this period. The smaller company, which behaved in exactly the same way, would still have ninety-five percent of its assets. [87]

2. Arguments for Net Worth Evidence Admissibility Are Ill-Considered

Plaintiffs generally argue that evidence of a defendant's overall financial condition is rationally related to the goals of punishment and deterrence, on the theory that the wealthier the defendant, the higher the financial penalty must be in order to give a culpable defendant both the punishment it deserves and the economic incentive not to repeat its wrongdoing.

REV_00263226

While this may be true in the case of individual defendants acting personally out of malicious or spiteful motives-i.e., it may take a larger punishment to deter a millionaire from punching someone in the nose than to deter a person of modest means-it has no applicability to corporate behavior, which is almost invariably motivated by economics. [88] As two noted scholars on punitive damages awards have explained: [*1023]

Deterrence theory is based on the (usually and to one or another extent plausible) assumption that actors weigh the expected costs and benefits of their future actions. Specifically, a potentially liable defendant will compare the benefits it will derive from an action that risks tort liability against the discounted present expected value of the liability that will be imposed if the risk occurs. Whether a defendant is wealthy or poor, this cost-benefit calculation is the same. If, as is likely, a wealthy defendant derives no greater benefit from a given action than a poor defendant, then both will be equally deterred (or equally undeterred) by the threat of tort liability. A defendant's existing assets do not increase the expected value of a given future action. Therefore they do not require any adjustment in the level of sanction needed to offset that expected value. The defendant's wealth or lack of it is thus irrelevant to the deterrence of socially undesirable conduct. [89]

F. Excluding Evidence of Extraterritorial Conduct

Evidence of a defendant's out-of-state activity to award and calculate punitive damages can violate constitutional principals of interstate commerce, state sovereignty, comity, and due process. Plaintiffs should be precluded from admitting such evidence.

This issue was a principal focus of the Supreme Court's opinion in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore. [90] In BMW, the Court indicated that the Commerce and Due Process Clauses of the United States Constitution prohibit state courts from using the punitive damages mechanism as a means of regulating conduct in other states. In a crucial sentence, the Court said: "While each State has ample power to protect its own consumers, none may use the punitive damages deterrent as a means of imposing its regulatory policies on the entire Nation." [91]

Months after purchasing a new BMW sedan from an Alabama dealer, and without noticing any flaws in its appearance, Dr. Gore took his vehicle to a "detailer"-someone who would thoroughly clean the car inside and out to make it look "snazz [*1024] ier than it normally would appear." [92] The detailer noted that portions of Dr. Gore's car had been repainted and brought this to the doctor's attention. Dr. Gore sued the American distributor of BMW automobiles seeking both compensatory and punitive damages on the theory that BMW's failure to disclose the repainting constituted "gross, oppressive or malicious" fraud under Alabama law. [93]

At trial, BMW acknowledged that it had a national policy of repairing cars that were damaged in the course of manufacture or during shipment. If the cost of a repair exceeded 3% of the car's suggested retail price, it was placed in company service for a period of time and then sold as used. If the repair was less than 3% of the purchase price, however, BMW sold the car as "new" without advising the dealer or the customer that any repairs had been made. [94]

Because the cost of repainting Dr. Gore's car was only about 1.5% of the car's suggested retail price, BMW did not disclose its repair to the Alabama dealer or to Dr. Gore. BMW's nondisclosure policy was consistent with the statutory laws of approximately twenty-five states which define disclosure obligations of automobile manufacturers, distributors, and retailers. [95] Under these state laws, BMW's failure to disclose minor refinishing was lawful and

REV_00263227

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: ("punitive damages" /15 standard) and ("punitive damages" /10 "public safety") (Edit Search)

↶Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*46 Am. U.L. Rev. 1573, **

Copyright (c) 1997 The American University Law Review
The American University

June, 1997

46 Am. U.L. Rev. 1573

LENGTH: 42249 words

ARTICLE: RECALIBRATING THE SCALES OF JUSTICE THROUGH NATIONAL PUNITIVE DAMAGE REFORM

Kimberly A. Pace *

* Assistant Professor of Law, Chicago-Kent College of Law; Former judicial clerk to the Honorable Glenn L. Archer, Jr., Chief Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit; J.D., Georgetown University Law Center; M.S., Massachusetts Institute of Technology; B.S.E.E., Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The author wishes to thank Katherine A. Kelly for her insightful comments on this Article.

SUMMARY:
... As little as 30 years ago, punitive damages awards were "rarely assessed" and usually "small in amount." ... There is no uniform method to the courts' punitive damage award reductions; often there is no explanation as to why the verdict is excessive or why the remitted amount was chosen as the appropriate punishment. ... C. The Fourteenth Amendment - Can a Punitive Damage Award Violate Due Process? ... BMW appealed to the Supreme Court, claiming that the punitive damage award was unconstitutional because it was grossly excessive and because it constituted extraterritorial punishment. ... How does criminal incarceration translate into monetary sanctions? If a defendant could be sentenced to five years in jail and $ 100,000, should the punitive damage award be limited to the $ 100,000? Commentators have observed the difficulty associated with comparing criminal penalties to civil punishment. ... Because the punitive damage award should be based in part on the amount of injury the defendant has caused and this information may not be known fully at the time of the assessment of the first punitive award, a "first comer" rule may not punish the defendant adequately for her misconduct. ... Federal tort reform will benefit both the consumer and the manufacturer with consumers knowing their rights and manufacturers knowing their responsibilities. ...

TEXT:
[*1573] [*1574]

Introduction

We need not, and indeed we cannot, draw a mathematical bright line between the constitutionally acceptable and the constitutionally unacceptable that would fit in every case. We can say, however, that general concerns of reasonableness and adequate guidance from the court when the case is tried to a jury properly enter into the constitutional calculus. [105] [*1598]

In Haslip, Lemmie L. Ruffin, an agent for Pacific Mutual, made a proposal to supply health and life insurance for the employees of Roosevelt City, Alabama. [106] The city approved the proposal and began issuing payments, which were effected through deductions from its employees' paychecks, to Ruffin. [107] Instead of remitting these payments to Union Fidelity, the health insurance company, Ruffin misappropriated the money. [108] When the insurance company did not receive the payments, it sent notices to Ruffin that it was discontinuing health coverage to the city. [109]

In 1982, Cleopatra Haslip, a city employee, was hospitalized and the insurance company refused to cover the expenses. [110] Haslip, along with other injured city employees, sued Ruffin and Pacific Mutual for intentional fraud, alleging that Ruffin stole their insurance premiums and allowed their policies to lapse. [111] The jury agreed, awarding Haslip compensatory and punitive damages in the amount of $ 1,040,000. [112] On appeal, the Alabama Supreme Court rejected Pacific Mutual's claim that the punitive damage award was a product of inadequate judicial review and a violation of due process and upheld the punitive damage award. [113] The Supreme Court subsequently affirmed the state court's holding on appeal, again finding that the requirements of due process had been met. [114] The Court held that in order to determine "whether a punitive award is reasonably related to the goals of deterrence and retribution," a court should consider: [*1599]

(a) whether there is a reasonable relationship between the punitive damages award and the harm likely to result from the defendant's conduct as well as the harm that actually has occurred; (b) the degree of reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct, the duration of that conduct, the defendant's awareness, any concealment, and the existence and frequency of similar past conduct; (c) the profitability to the defendant of the wrongful conduct and the desirability of removing that profit and of having the defendant also sustain a loss; (d) the "financial position" of the defendant; (e) all the costs of litigation; (f) the imposition of criminal sanctions on the defendant for its conduct, these to be taken in mitigation; and (g) the existence of other civil awards against the defendant for the same conduct, these also to be taken in mitigation. [115]

After Haslip, courts were left to determine whether the punitive damage award was reasonable using the preceding "totality of the circumstances" test.

2.

TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp.

In an effort to decide whether the punitive damage award in TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp. [116] was reasonable, the Supreme Court of West Virginia engaged in a comparative analysis of all post-Haslip court decisions searching for a pattern of what courts find reasonable. The court placed the cases into three categories: (1) "really stupid defendants;" [117] (2) "really mean defendants;" [118] and, (3) "really stupid defendants who could have caused a great deal of harm by their actions but who actually caused minimal harm." [119] The West Virginia court held that TXO fell within the "really mean" category. [120] [*1600]

REV_00263254

In this case, punitive damages were awarded to punish TXO for its unscrupulous business dealings. TXO wanted oil and gas rights to a 1000-acre tract in West Virginia in which Alliance held a leasehold interest. [121] After trying to purchase Alliance's rights without success, TXO made Alliance a "phenomenal" offer on the condition that the offer would be reduced if less than full oil and gas mineral and leasehold rights were conveyed. [122] TXO, looking for a way to reduce its payments to Alliance, located a grant of some mineral rights to a third party, Mr. Signaigo. [123] As Mr. Signaigo explained to TXO, however, the grant concerned only coal rights and, therefore, did not involve Alliance's oil and gas rights. [124] TXO tried to force Mr. Signaigo to lie in an affidavit by claiming that the oil and gas rights may have been included in the grant, but Mr. Signaigo refused. [125] TXO, fully informed that the grant did not affect oil and gas rights, then bought the grant and threatened Alliance with it, trying to force Alliance to accept reduced royalties. [126] When Alliance refused to comply, TXO brought suit and Alliance counterclaimed. [127]

At trial, Alliance demonstrated that TXO acted in bad faith because it knew that it had no claim against Alliance for the oil and gas rights. [128] Alliance also offered evidence that TXO was a large company; that the revenues from the oil and gas rights at issue were substantial; and that TXO "had engaged in similar nefarious activities in its business dealings in other parts of the country." [129] The jury found TXO at fault and awarded Alliance its actual damages totaling $ 19,000, the costs of defending the TXO action, and $ 10 million in punitive damages. [130] The Supreme Court of West Virginia upheld the award, stating: [*1601]

The type of fraudulent action intentionally undertaken by TXO in this case could potentially cause millions of dollars in damages to other victims. As for the reprehensibility of TXO's conduct, we can say no more than we have already said, and we believe the jury's verdict says more than we could say in an opinion twice this length. Just as important, an award of this magnitude is necessary to discourage TXO from continuing its pattern and practice of fraud, trickery and deceit. [131]

The United States Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's decision, holding that the $ 10 million punitive damage award, which was 526 times the actual damages, was not "grossly excessive" and thus did not violate due process. [132] As in Haslip, the Court refused to adopt a bright line test, instead focusing on the "reasonableness" of the punitive damages to determine whether the award was grossly excessive. [133] The Court rejected TXO's argument that the award was unreasonable, [134] adding that it was appropriate to consider the harm that could have occurred as a result of the defendant's conduct when assessing the reasonableness of a punitive damage award. [135]

By rejecting the notion that due process requires a particular ratio between punitive and compensatory damages, the Supreme Court in Haslip and TXO left lower courts without concrete guidance as to what constitutes an unreasonable award. To this point, the Court endorsed a variety of factors used by state courts to assess and review punitive damage awards, without articulating any sort of hierarchy among them. Moreover, the court made clear that no single factor is dispositive no matter how seemingly outrageous. [136] The Court held that a "grossly excessive" award would violate due process, but left the [*1602]

REV_00263255

courts to determine on a case-by-case basis whether a particular punitive award was grossly excessive. [137]

3.

Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg

Not every punitive damage case has resulted in victory for the plaintiff. In Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg, [138] for example, the Supreme Court struck down an amendment to a state constitution that prohibited judicial review of punitive awards as violative of due process. [139] In Honda, Oberg brought a product liability suit against Honda, who manufactured and sold three-wheeled all-terrain vehicles that had a propensity to overturn - a fact that Honda knew or should have known. [140] When Oberg's vehicle overturned, he suffered severe and permanent injuries. [141] The jury awarded Oberg $ 919,000 in compensatory damages, which was reduced to $ 735,000 because the jury found that the plaintiff's negligence contributed to the accident, and $ 5 million in punitive damages. [142] Honda appealed, arguing that the punitive award violated the Due Process Clause because it was excessive and because Oregon courts lacked the authority to review and correct excessive jury awards. [143] The Supreme Court held that the amendment to the Oregon Constitution, which prohibited post-verdict judicial review of the amount of a jury award unless there was no evidence to support the award, violated procedural due process. [144]

Even though the Court reversed the punitive award on constitutional grounds, Honda has had little impact on punitive damage cases because of the narrow holding and the unusual facts, in that Oregon was the only state that barred post-verdict judicial review of punitive damage awards. [145] [*1603]

4.

BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore

The most recent due process challenge to a punitive damage award was brought in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore. [146] In BMW, the jury awarded the plaintiff $ 4000 in compensatory damages and $ 4 million in punitive damages because BMW failed to inform the plaintiff that the "new" car they sold him had been partially refinished. [147] On appeal, the state supreme court reduced the punitive damage award to $ 2 million. [148] BMW appealed to the Supreme Court, claiming that the punitive damage award was unconstitutional because it was grossly excessive and because it constituted extraterritorial punishment. [149]

In a 5-4 decision, the Supreme Court held that the $ 2 million punitive damage award was so grossly excessive that it "transcended the constitutional limit." [150] Justice Stevens, writing for the five-member majority, articulated three "guideposts" which the Court considered in its due process calculus: (1) the degree of repre-hensibility of the conduct; (2) the disparity between the harm suffered by Gore and the punitive damage award; and, (3) the difference between this remedy and the civil (and criminal) penalties authorized or imposed in comparable cases. [151] [*1604]

Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, dissented on federalism grounds. [152] Justice Scalia, although agreeing that punitive damage reform may be needed, believed that it was not the role of the Court to impose its subjective assessment of reasonableness on the states. [153] The Court's decision, according to Justice Scalia, "was really no more than a disagreement with the community's sense of indignation or outrage expressed in the punitive award of the Alabama jury." [154] Justice Scalia did not believe that such an action was authorized by the Due Process Clause's procedural guarantees. [155] Finally, Justice Scalia criticized the lack of guidance the decision gave to the states:

REV_00263256

In truth, the "guideposts" mark a road to nowhere; they provide no real guidance at all. As to "degree of reprehensibility" of the defendant's conduct, we learn that ""nonviolent crimes are less serious than crimes marked by violence or the threat of violence,'" and that ""trickery and deceit'" are "more reprehensible than negligence." As to the ratio of punitive to compensatory damages, we are told that a ""general concern of reasonableness ... enters into the constitutional calculus,'" - though even "a breathtaking 500 to 1" will not necessarily do anything more than ""raise a suspicious judicial eyebrow.'" And as to legislative sanctions provided for comparable misconduct, they should be accorded ""substantial deference.'" One expects the Court to conclude: "To thine own self be true."

These criss-crossing platitudes yield no real answers in no real cases. [156]

The legal effect of the "guideposts" articulated by the Court establishes federal standards governing what traditionally has been the exclusive province of the states. [157] In actuality, however, the Supreme Court's "guideposts" offer little real guidance. [158] The Court did not say that the articulated guideposts were the only factors for consideration, leaving courts free to employ other factors when [*1605] assessing the constitutionality of damage awards. [159] Moreover, the vagueness of the guideposts lends further credence to the notion that federal tort reform, where Congress can delineate the precise penalties for selected improper behavior, is necessary. [160]

Although the first two guideposts, the reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct and the relationship between the actual harm and the punitive damages, long have been part of the punitive damage assessment process in most states, the third guidepost, which requires a comparison with statutory penalties, is relatively new. [161] Requiring that a punitive award bear some resemblance to statutory penalties for similar conduct raises some concern because statutory penalties often are outdated and obsolete. [162] Statutory penalties, once fixed, rarely are adjusted for inflation. In fact, punitive damages are generally most beneficial in areas where regulation is unable to police or to keep abreast with advancement. [163] The Supreme Court in BMW, however, apparently believed there should be some degree of deference to legislative judgments concerning sanctions for particular conduct.

The fact that criminal sanctions accompany potential civil sanctions presents another impediment to a comparison of the statutorily prescribed civil sanctions with punitive damage awards. [164] How do [*1606] criminal penalties for proscribed conduct factor into the civil penalty comparison? Certainly, if criminal penalties exist for similar conduct, the punitive award need not resemble the available civil penalty. How does criminal incarceration translate into monetary sanctions? If a defendant could be sentenced to five years in jail and $ 100,000, should the punitive damage award be limited to the $ 100,000? Commentators have observed the difficulty associated with comparing criminal penalties to civil punishment. [165]

The BMW decision has spurred a great deal of debate over whether federal tort reform is necessary now that the Court has struck down a grossly excessive award. [166] This Article argues that although BMW is a milestone in the war against excessive damage awards, it will have little actual impact in the trenches. District and appellate courts may scrutinize awards more closely, but BMW is sufficiently amorphous to provide no real guidance. [167] In fact, after the Supreme Court rendered its decision in BMW, some expected the Court to remand the pending sixteen cases for application of the guideposts. [168] The Court only remanded a few cases for further consideration in light of BMW, however, and denied certiorari in the rest, thereby leaving the lower court rulings in effect. [169] The denial of certiorari lends further credibility to the argument that BMW did not change anything operationally, and that federal tort reform is as necessary now as it was before the BMW decision was rendered. [170]

REV_00263257

The Supreme Court simply is incapable of policing every excessive punitive award, and because every state has its own standards and regulations, there is very little predictability in the law. [171] The Supreme Court, which can do no more than overturn those awards that constitute blatant violations of the Constitution, is not the appropriate vehicle for tort reform. Reform must come from the [*1607] legislature, which is uniquely suited to balance the interests involved and to weigh the benefits of the punitive damages system against its abuse. [172]

5. Undecided due process challenges - multiple punitive damage awards

With the exception of the due process questions raised and answered by the Supreme Court in BMW, the Court has left a number of due process concerns unresolved. One such issue is whether multiple punitive damage awards against a single defendant for the same act or course of conduct violates due process. The threat of multiple punitive damage awards against a single defendant arises most frequently in the context of mass torts evident with products such as asbestos, [173] Agent Orange, [174] the Ford Pinto, [175] and the Dalkon Shield. [176]

Imposition of multiple punitive damage awards for the same act poses a number of serious problems. If early plaintiffs are awarded large punitive damage amounts, they could render the defendant bankrupt and unable to adequately compensate later plaintiffs for actual damages. [177] In addition, multiple punitive awards discourage the development of new and potentially valuable products. [178] The [*1608] possibility of multiple awards also impedes settlements and forces higher settlements than the defendant should pay, because each plaintiff has an incentive to wait for the windfall generated by a punitive award.

The Third Circuit recently addressed the constitutionality of multiple punitive awards in Dunn v. Hovic. [179] In Dunn, the plaintiff was injured by asbestos products manufactured by the defendant, Owens-Corning Fiberglass Corporation ("OCF"). [180] The district court awarded the plaintiff $ 500,000 in compensatory damages and $ 2 million in punitive damages. [181]

On appeal to the Third Circuit, OCF argued that repeated imposition of punitive damages for the same act was an arbitrary deprivation of property without due process and violated the Fourteenth Amendment. [182] Although the appeals court rejected OCF's due process argument, [183] it held that corporate defendants may introduce evidence of past punitive awards imposed on them for the jury to consider when assessing the amount of punitive damages that should be awarded in the present case. [184] The Third Circuit, like many other courts, expressed the need for legislation to address the national issue of multiple punitive damage awards. [185]

Considering the inappropriateness of repetitive punitive damage awards, Professor Gary T. Schwartz has argued that the Due Process Clause should incorporate the prohibition against double jeopardy of [*1609] the Fifth Amendment, like it does the prohibition against excessive fines from the Eighth Amendment; therefore, multiple punitive awards could be a violation of due process. [186] As another commentator stated, "At some point, justifiable punishment ends and overkill begins." [187] There should be safeguards implemented to prevent such repeated punishment.

Whether the aggregate of all punitive awards against a single defendant for a single act would be grossly disproportionate to the misconduct and thereby violate due process is an appropriate matter for federal legislators. As the following discussion explains, neither the judiciary nor the state legislatures are capable of effectively regulating against the imposition of multiple punitive awards.

REV_00263258

Despite their concern about a defendant's due process rights, courts thus far have been unwilling to articulate a "one bite" or a "first comer" rule, citing both their inability to prevent other jurisdictions from awarding punitive damages and their concern about whether the first jury is capable of granting a single award to account fully for the defendant's misconduct. [188] Because the punitive damage award should be based in part on the amount of injury the defendant has caused and this information may not be known fully at the time of the assessment of the first punitive award, a "first comer" [*1610] rule may not punish the defendant adequately for her misconduct. [189] The first award may be low because the extent of actual damages to all injured parties may not be known at the time of the first case to consider punitive awards. [190] Moreover, if new evidence of wrongdoing on the part of the defendant is discovered after the first punitive award, it would be inappropriate not to permit the imposition of more than one award. [191] Courts repeatedly have urged a national legislative solution to the punitive damage problems because no single court has the power to prohibit subsequent awards in other courts. [192]

Similarly, individual state legislatures cannot prevent the imposition of multiple punitive awards for a single act because a state's power to regulate conduct stops at its borders. [193] For example, Georgia's tort law permits only one punitive award for any act regardless of the [*1611] number of separate causes of action that might arise from that act. [194] Although this may aid corporations being sued in Georgia, it has no bearing on actions brought in other states. [195] Plaintiffs could avoid the Georgia statute simply by bringing their action elsewhere.

D. The Seventh Amendment - Does Judicial Review of Jury Verdicts For Excessiveness Violate the Re-Examination Clause?

In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law. [196]

The most recent constitutional challenge to a jury's verdict on damages, Gasperini v. Center for Humanities, Inc., [197] did not, like most of the recent decisions, address such issues as when an award is excessive or which factors should be used in making this determination. Instead, Gasperini pertained to the constitutionality of appellate review of the excessiveness of damage awards. [198]

The Gasperini appeal stemmed from a jury award of $ 450,000 in damages to a photographer when the Center for Humanities, a company that produces educational videos, lost 300 slide transparencies after producing his video. [199] The Second Circuit found the damage award excessive and ordered the photographer to accept a remitted award of $ 100,000 or suffer through a new trial on damages. [200]

On appeal to the Supreme Court, Gasperini contended that the appellate court's remittitur was a violation of his Seventh Amendment rights. [201] The Supreme Court held that, as long as the standard of review was "abuse of discretion," appellate review of the district court's [*1612] findings regarding excessive damages was reconcilable with the Seventh Amendment. [202]

The Court also considered whether federal courts in diversity cases should use a federal standard, [203] which is extremely deferential to jury verdicts, or a state standard, [204] which is less deferential to jury verdicts, to determine whether a jury award is excessive. [205] The Court held that New York's standard used to check excessive damages should be applied by the federal court to avoid state and federal courts in the same jurisdiction reaching different conclusions on the same issues. [206] Thus, the district court was charged with determining whether the jury's verdict "materially deviated" from reasonable compensation, and the appellate court reviews the district court's application of this test for an abuse of discretion. [207]

REV_00263259

Unlike the substantive due process cases, Gasperini involved an issue that certainly was within the province of the judiciary and has been resolved with relative ease, clarity, and precision. Substantive due process, on the other hand, lacks clarity and precision because it requires the Court to analyze excessiveness on a case-by-case basis. The judiciary is ill-equipped to address problems requiring it to assess a community's sense of outrage or social conscience. [*1613]

V. Federal Tort Reform Legislation

The public's perception that punitive damages are "running wild" and "skyrocketing" has given rise to a call for national tort reform. Federal tort reform supporters claim that the interstate nature of product sales, as well as the inability of states to regulate conduct outside their boundaries, makes federal legislation appropriate and necessary. [208] The goal of the recently proposed national tort reform legislation is to protect corporate manufacturers from excessive punitive damage awards. [209] Proponents of national tort reform claim that punitive damages have the potential to cripple U.S. industry and thereby inhibit their competitiveness in the global market. [210]

A. The Common Sense Product Liability Legal Reform Act

Federal tort reform legislation has been considered by Congress in every year since 1982. [211] Recently, House Bill 956, labeled "The Common Sense Product Liability Legal Reform Act of 1996," passed both Houses of Congress. [212] House Bill 956, which would have applied to all product liability actions, [213] would have reformed tort [*1614] law radically by preempting state law in what traditionally has been an area of state regulation. [214] It recommended raising the burden of proof to "clear and convincing evidence" [215] and articulated a single standard for awarding punitive damages: the defendant's conduct would have to exhibit "a conscious, flagrant indifference to the rights or safety of others." [216] The bill also placed a cap on punitive damage awards [217] and would have permitted either party to bifurcate the trial of punitive damages from liability and compensatory damages. [218] President Clinton, however, vetoed H.R. 956 on May 2, 1996. [219] [*1615]

B. Why Do We Need Federal Tort Reform?

Federal tort reform is necessary to safeguard against undeserved and excessive awards and to protect the defendant, the public, and the integrity of the judicial process. [220] Reform is necessary to combat the vagueness in determinations of liability and assessments of amounts of punishment. [221] Such vagueness leaves juries without guidance, inviting them to make improper awards based on their personal biases and prejudices. [222] Moreover, not only are each state's liability and damage assessment standards vague, they are all different - resulting in 49 different laws for a manufacturer to adhere to. The application of the patchwork of state laws and vague standards which make up the punitive damage system has been erratic at best. This uncertainty has been unfair both to consumers who never can be certain of their rights and to manufacturers who never can be sure of their responsibilities.

REV_00263260

223

A single, uniform law of punitive damages would reduce the number of punitive damage claims being brought and reduce transaction costs. If both plaintiffs and manufacturers can recognize legitimate claims against a manufacturer, the number of frivolous suits brought will be reduced and settlement will be encouraged. Predictability and uniformity of result are of particular importance in [*1616] areas where the parties are likely to give advance thought to the legal consequences of their actions. [224] Without certainty and predictability, the efficacy of punitive damage awards will be undermined substantially. [225]

Moreover, the integrity of the judicial system is threatened when there is unpredictability in the law and its application. [226] Instability in the law and its application breeds discontent and disrespect for the law which, in turn, erodes public confidence in the legal process. [227]

In addition, the current patchwork of state laws increases forum shopping. [228] Because manufacturers generally sell their products across state lines, [229] suits could be brought in many states. Informed plaintiffs simply bring suits in states that have more consumer-friendly laws. National legislation would solve this problem by creating a single standard of liability.

By clarifying the muddled state laws, federal tort reform would provide more certainty and predictability. The goals of punitive damages - punishment and deterrence - would be furthered if the law were made more exact, definite, and predictable. Manufacturers would be able to predict, by reference to pre-existing situations which had been resolved, what conduct is prohibited. The implementation [*1617] of federal legislation ultimately would provide manufacturers with more notice as to both the prohibited conduct and the severity of the punishment. [230] Through repeated application, the federal standard would become increasingly definite and would clarify the conduct that is prohibited, thereby reducing the need for litigation.

Federal tort reform would also establish, on a national level, the safeguards necessary to ensure against abuse of the punitive damages sanction. The quasi-criminal nature of the punitive damages doctrine demands safeguards that are not normally associated with damages awarded in the civil context. [231] The criminal law has built-in protections to prevent excessive punishment in a single proceeding (the Excessive Fines Clause) [232] or multiple punishments assessed in different proceedings for the same act (the Double Jeopardy Clause). [233] Federal tort reform could create the appropriate safeguards to identify and address the problems that plague the punitive damages doctrine.

C. Federal Tort Reform Proposal

1. The burden of proof - clear and convincing evidence

As proposed in the federal bill and the Model Act, the burden of proof necessary to prove entitlement to punitive damage awards should be "clear and convincing" evidence. [234] Because punitive damages are "quasi criminal," [235] standing somewhere between tort and criminal law, it seems appropriate to apply an intermediate evidentiary burden of proof. The purpose of tort law is to compensate victims (restitutionary), [236] using a "preponderance of the evidence" burden of proof, which means that the plaintiff need prove only that it is more likely than not that the defendant committed the [*1618] alleged act. The purpose of criminal law is to punish and deter (retributive), using a "beyond a reasonable doubt" burden of proof, which means that the prosecutor must prove that there is no reasonable question that the defendant committed the act. [237] Like criminal sanctions, punitive damages are awarded to victims to punish and deter misconduct; but like tort awards, they are awarded in a civil suit to the plaintiff. It makes sense, therefore, that the burden of proof for punitive damages lie somewhere in between the burden for criminal sanctions and the burden for tort awards.

REV_00263261

The "clear and convincing" evidence standard, which is a lighter burden than "beyond a reasonable doubt" but heavier than proving by a preponderance of the evidence, falls within this intermediate ground. Clear and convincing evidence is "that measure or degree of proof that will produce in the mind of the trier of fact a firm belief or conviction as to the truth of the allegations sought to be established." [238] The clear and convincing evidence burden of proof should be adopted as a safeguard for the defendant's rights in recognition of the criminal component of the penalty and to offset potential bias in favor of the plaintiff and against the corporate manufacturer.

2. The liability standard - "a conscious, flagrant indifference to the rights or safety of others" [239]

Under the current rubric of punitive damages, every state has a different way of characterizing and defining what form of conduct gives rise to the imposition of punitive damage awards. [240] Pursuant to the various state tort reform statutes, punitive damages can be awarded when the defendant's conduct was grossly negligent, intentional, willful, wanton, malicious, reckless, outrageous or when the defendant exhibited a flagrant disregard for others. [241] Most [*1619] states, however, offer no definition of these vague terms. [242] Having so many different standards for defining prohibited conduct makes it much more difficult for corporations who do business in many states to determine the character and nature of the prohibited conduct.

Although commentators may bicker over which standard should define the nature of the conduct that gives rise to punitive damage awards, no one can dispute the value of having a single national definition for this conduct. The proposed federal standard in the most recent bill described actions deserving punitive damage awards as those that are "carried out by the defendant with a conscious, flagrant indifference to the safety of others." [243] The passage of a federal bill to regulate the imposition of punitive damage awards nationally would provide a single uniform definition. Certainly, a uniform standard would provide more reliability and predictability than the current menagerie of standards promulgated, yet undefined, by the many states. Moreover, through its application, the single standard would become increasingly definite over time, making the class of prohibited conduct increasingly clear and reducing the need for litigation. [244]

A "flagrant indifference" standard would require a degree of intentional action not present in some current state statutes that allow punitive damages for simple or gross negligence. Intent should be a necessary element in order to justify punitive damages. [245] The [*1620] criminal component of punitive damages mandates that a defendant act intentionally before this form of punishment may be imposed upon him. Otherwise, the justifications for imposing punitive damages, punishment and deterrence, break down. That a defendant should not be punished for unintentional conduct seems obvious. Such a defendant is not deserving of punishment because only blameworthy conduct should be subject to punishment. In addition, the effectiveness of deterrence decreases when defendants are punished for unintentional conduct, because such conduct is more difficult for individuals to identify and control. [246]

3. Bifurcation of punitive damage issues

The proposed federal bill, if enacted, would have allowed either party to bifurcate the trial of punitive damages from the other issues in the case. [247] The primary reason for bifurcation is to prevent jury bias and prejudice. [248] For example, although defendant's wealth must be considered when determining punitive damages, [249] some concern exists that juries might improperly consider such evidence when assessing plaintiffs' compensatory damages. To avoid this impropriety, bifurcation should be permitted. [250] It must be acknowledged, however, that bifurcation would lead to more costly and time consuming trials, which in turn would be detrimental to the injured victim.

REV_00263262

4. Capping punitive damage awards

Recently proposed federal legislation would cap punitive damage awards in products liability cases at twice the economic [251] and [*1621] noneconomic loss, [252] or $ 250,000, whichever is greater. [253] Whether to place an arbitrary cap on the amount of punitive damages that can be awarded or to limit them to a multiple of the actual damages suffered is perhaps the most controversial of all tort reform issues.

a. Even if punitive damages cost consumers good products, they should not be limited

Cap supporters argue that the cap provides necessary relief for corporations who currently are subject to unbridled jury discretion in awarding punitive damages. [254] They also argue that the threat of excessively large punitive damage awards discourages companies from marketing new products, thereby depriving the public of beneficial products and rendering American businesses unable to compete in a global market. [255] The conference report on the recently proposed federal legislation stated:

American manufacturers must contend with the uncertainty created by 51 different product liability jurisdictions in their own domestic market. The result is a de facto "liability tax" which chills interstate commerce and deprives consumers of product choices available to [*1622] consumers in other nations throughout the world. Unfortunately, instead of encouraging the development of safer products, the present system often forces manufacturers to increase product prices or withdraw products from the market altogether. [256]

Cap supporters argue that because of fear of unquantifiable liability exposure, the cautious manufacturers would be over-deterred and unwilling to invest in research and development for potentially valuable products. [257] The threat of large punitive damage awards can discourage the use of safe products, taking choices and valuable products away from consumers. For example, decades after the Dalkon Shield disaster, many doctors still refuse to prescribe new, safe, reliable IUDs for women, [258] despite the fact that experts find the IUD to be a low risk, dependable form of birth control. [259] Doctors are not alone. Apparently, even manufacturers are not interested in marketing the product in the United States because of the threat of excessive punitive awards. [260]

Cap supporters also argue that limiting punitive damages would be beneficial because it would put the defendant on notice regarding his potential liability for inappropriate conduct. The Supreme Court in BMW noted the importance of "fair notice" as to both the type of conduct that will give rise to punitive awards and the severity of the potential punishment that will be imposed. [261]

Capping punitive damages, however, is a double-edged sword, the costs of which far outweigh the benefits. Even if all of the arguments put forth by supporters of a cap are true, [262] those arguments still are [*1623] insufficient to justify a superficial, arbitrary limit on punitive awards. Punitive damage awards operate to deter the conduct society wishes to abolish. [263] A punitive award, therefore, must be high enough to achieve this goal. Limiting punitive damage awards would undermine the deterrent value of the threat of such awards.

The essential purpose of punitive damages would be thwarted if we required that they

REV_00263263

As little as 30 years ago, punitive damages awards were "rarely assessed" and usually "small in amount." Recently, however, the frequency and size of such awards have been skyrocketing. One commentator has observed that "hardly a month goes by without a multimillion-dollar punitive damages verdict in a product liability case." And it appears that the upward trajectory continues unabated. The increased frequency and size of punitive awards, however, has not been matched by a corresponding expansion of procedural protections or predictability. On the contrary, although some courts have made genuine efforts at reform, many courts continue to provide jurors with skeletal guidance that permits the traditional guarantor of fairness - the jury itself - to be converted into a source of caprice and bias. [1]

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor [*1575]

Unfortunately, some manufacturers put corporate profit before public safety. The threat of punitive damage sanctions, however, serves to deter corporations from knowingly marketing unsafe products and from trading public safety for corporate profits. Punitive damage awards are a necessary restraint on the abuse of corporate power, curbing the often anti-social practices of the economic elite. As noted by Senator Ernest Hollings (D-S.C.), the imposition of punitive damage awards in product liability cases has increased the safety in the everyday lives of American consumers noticeably:

We could spend an afternoon pointing out the good that product liability has done. We do not get blown up by that Pinto gas tank. Cars all have antilock brakes. That elevator is checked. The steps are marked. Little children do not burn up in flammable pajamas. The women of America are not threatened with Dalkon Shields. [2]

An increase in the magnitude and frequency of punitive damage awards, however, necessitates a reconsideration of the doctrine and precipitates the need for safeguards to protect the tort system from abuse. Punitive damage reform must be enacted, and must address the many criticisms of the current doctrine: that punitive damages cause unnecessary litigation; are unjustified and excessive; far exceed statutory penalties for similar conduct; subject defendants to multiple punishments for the same conduct; overcompensate plaintiffs; are detrimental to society because they handicap the competitiveness of American businesses; are responsible for rising insurance costs; and are unconstitutional on a variety of grounds. [3] Perhaps most troubling, however, is the fact that although punitive damages are quasi-criminal in nature, [4] they are imposed in the course of civil litigation without many of the procedural safeguards that accompany criminal penalties. [5] [*1576]

The rise in punitive damage awards and the need to implement safeguards have not gone unnoticed by state legislatures, the judiciary, and various other entities. Forty-six states have passed tort reform legislation; [6] there is a new Restatement of Torts; [7] the Supreme Court has rejected a punitive damage award as unconstitutionally excessive; [8] and the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws recently approved a Model Punitive Damages Act. [9]

Despite these efforts, punitive awards of enormous magnitude still are being exacted from unsuspecting corporate defendants for differing standards of misconduct. The problem with state tort reform is that actions that might warrant the imposition of punitive damages in one state might not warrant them in another. The current patchwork of state tort laws is ineffective against unjustified, excessive awards and undermines the efficacy of the punitive damage doctrine.

REV_00263246

conform to any mathematical equation. In Rideout's-Brown Service, Inc. v. Holloway, [the district court] said that for punitive damages to be effective the amount of damages "ought to be large enough to hurt. It ought to sting in order to deter, that is its purpose." [264]

Although the threat of punitive awards may discourage manufacturers from developing some products, more importantly, it keeps many dangerous products off the market. Economic efficiency, not economic perfection, is all that is required by our tort system. [265]

Tort law's goal of promoting efficient resource allocation also supports not capping punitive damage awards. [266] Because a business is an economically-rational, profit-seeking entity, it will evaluate the costs and benefits of undertaking any activity, manufacturing decision, or design choice. [267] If a company believes that the benefits of a particular action outweigh the costs, it will undertake that action. [268] [*1624]

Tort law's deterrent effect is based on utilitarian values; more specifically, punitive damages liability deters socially unacceptable behavior by increasing the cost of such behavior so that it no longer is economically rational to act in that manner. [269] Punitive damages awarded in tort cases have the effect of regulating social conduct by punishing and deterring conduct that society deems unacceptable. In order to achieve these goals, the threat of punitive damages must be greater than the benefit achieved by the misconduct. Because corporations are the only parties with perfect information on this equation, deterrence will be effective only if the threat of large punitive damages continues to loom over those willing to place corporate profit ahead of human safety. [270]

If punitive damages are capped, they would cease to be an effective deterrent. Capped damages would enable defendants to calculate their maximum exposure and thereby permit an economic analysis similar to the one conducted by Ford in the Pinto case. [271] In the [*1625] end, capped damages effectively would lower safety standards. As Representative John Conyers (D-Mich.) noted:

The cap of $ 250,000 on punitive damages is tragic. No Fortune 500 company, or some not even Fortune 500, will be deterred from placing dangerous products on the market because of a quarter of a million dollar threat of punitive damages. It will be factored into the pricing. [272]

For example, suppose Compact Cars wants to manufacture a new 1997 model Pinto. Compact's design engineers approach management with a design choice: should they include rubber bladders around the gas tank to reduce explosions when there are rear-end collisions, or should they forgo the bladder in order to reduce costs? Compact's preliminary tests show that upon rear impact at thirty miles per hour, the gas tank has a four percent chance of exploding. Management retains an economist to conduct a cost/benefit analysis on the rubber bladder. The economist finds that it will cost Compact $ 50 per car to include the rubber bladder. Compact plans to sell five million Pintos. So, the cost of including the bladder is $ 250 million.

The Compact economist then turns to the cost savings, or benefit, of excluding the bladder. He estimates that Compact will be sued for 100 burn deaths and 200 serious burn injuries as a result of gas tank explosions. [273] He estimates the compensatory damages for each human life at $ 250,000 and each human injury at $ 100,000. The damages Compact will sustain, therefore, are $ 45 million.

REV_00263264

If the new federal tort reform bill [274] including a cap on punitive damages had passed, the economist would calculate the cost associated with the punitive damages. [275] If every death resulted in the maximum punitive damage award under the new statute, Compact would owe $ 50 million [276] and if every injured plaintiff also received the maximum punitive damage award, Compact would owe an [*1626] additional $ 50 million. [277] Thus, Compact's total potential punitive damages liability would be $ 100 million.

The economist would determine that while the cost of including the bladder would be $ 250 million, it would cost Compact only an estimated $ 145 million in damages if they chose to exclude the bladder. Compact's management, being economically rational business people, would decide that the costs of excluding the bladder exceed its benefits, and would direct the engineers not to include the bladder in the new Pinto.

This example, while admittedly rudimentary in its economic analysis, demonstrates how companies could factor punitive damages into the cost-benefit analysis of any given design choice. If corporations can do this, they will continue to put corporate profit ahead of human safety and the goals of our punitive damage system will be eviscerated.

Unless punitive damages are greater than the full economic profit of the misconduct, corporations will not be deterred; no economic incentive to avoid socially reprehensible conduct will be created. [278] If the total potential cost in damages is less than the benefit of profit or expenditures saved, then manufacturers will continue to engage in unsafe practices. [279] Further, because corporations control all of the information regarding design choices and manufacturing decisions, it is virtually impossible to determine properly the amount of economic benefit the defendant might reap from the corporation's misconduct. [280]

Moreover, simply capturing the defendant's profits, the exact amount defendant benefitted, is not enough to function as a deterrent even if it were possible to determine accurately the amount. Because not all defendants are caught and brought to justice, many defendants would undertake the misconduct with the hope that they would not get caught. If corporations stand to lose [*1627] exactly the amount that they would gain from the conduct, and there is a chance that they will not get caught, corporations will favor misconduct. To deter effectively, the potential loss must exceed the potential gain. The rationales that justify punitive damage awards, punishment and deterrence, are effective precisely because of the unpredictability of the size of such awards. Therefore, one of the biggest complaints of tort reform advocates, that the size of punitive damage awards is unpredictable, [281] is precisely what makes them an effective deterrent.

Capping punitive awards at a multiple of compensatory damages would eviscerate the punitive and deterrence goals underlying punitive damage awards. Professors Michael Rustad and Thomas Koenig argue that:

Lopsided ratios between punitive and compensatory damages awards are often necessary for the punishment and deterrence of powerful corporations. The remedy's effectiveness in doing so stems from its unpredictability. Capping punitive damages would undermine the deterrent effect of the remedy by making it possible for corporations to calculate their maximum exposure and therefore make a profit-based determination as to whether "really mean behavior" is good business practice. [282]

Another problem inherent in making punitive damages a multiple of compensatory damages arises when the manufacturer could have caused an enormous amount of harm but fortuitously escaped with minimal actual damage. In cases where the actual damages are low, the jury will be unable to take into account the nature of the misconduct or the potential harm that could have resulted from the defendant's actions. [283] Punitive damages should be based, at least in part, on the outrageousness of the defendant's conduct, not solely on the severity of the actual harm caused.

REV_00263265

Limiting potential punitive damage liability would put ethical corporations, ones which spend funds testing a product's safety prior to marketing, at a competitive disadvantage. Ethical corporations would be forced to charge a higher price for their products because of the added expenses of testing. [*1628]

Punitive damages are consistent with the self-interest of the business community in terms of long-run competitiveness. The remedy keeps the ethical corporation from being at a competitive disadvantage. Restricting this remedy tempts corporations to put profits before public safety. In the long run, the American emphasis on safety, backed by punitive damages against those corporations which violate this important American value, will produce the top quality products needed to compete in the international marketplace. [284]

Therefore, even if punitive damage awards do hamper the development of some new products and do threaten American competitiveness, they should not be capped. Capping punitive damages would weaken their value as a deterrent by permitting manufacturers to calculate the potential loss associated with manufacturing dangerous products, and then determine whether such socially reprehensible conduct is good business. Moreover, the egregiousness of the defendant's conduct and the potential harm it could have caused no longer would factor into the punishment. And finally, corporations that do test their products and make design choices that weigh human impact more heavily than corporate profit would be at a competitive disadvantage. Capping punitive damages would encourage the misconduct society seeks to prevent, resulting in a cure that would be worse than the disease.

b. Even if punitive damages cost consumers money in the form of higher prices, they should not be limited

Proponents of limiting a defendant's liability for intentional misconduct also argue that large punitive damage awards actually harm consumers, employees, and shareholders of the corporation, because the corporation ultimately must pass these expenses on to them. [285] When a corporation is forced to pay punitive damages, it raises corporate operating expenses. [286] Corporations, then, cover these increased costs by raising prices and forcing the consumer to bear the burden assessed for corporate misconduct. [287] Such price [*1629] raising often is referred to as a "tort tax" or a "hidden tax." [288] Thus, instead of defendants bearing tort award costs directly, consumers actually would subsidize tort damages awarded to victims. [289]

In a competitive market, however, it is unlikely that a manufacturer could pass all of these costs on to its consumers and still maintain its competitive market position. [290] In a purely captive consumer situation, corporations would be able to pass off any expense incurred by raising prices. [291] In a competitive market, however, a corporation could not raise its prices too high or consumers would switch to a competitor's product. [292] Even when there is no competitive market and the corporation has a monopoly over a product or service, [293] at some point the utility derived from the product or service would be outweighed by the cost.

REV_00263266

Simply put, if a corporation raises the price too high, the consumer will stop buying the product. Corporations, therefore, will try to avoid incurring punitive damage judgments because they often cannot pass off all the costs on consumers. In this way, punitive damage payments allow society to regulate corporate conduct.

The "pass-through" economic argument - that consumers, not the corporation, bear the extra burden associated with punitive damages in the form of higher prices - does not support capping punitive [*1630] damage awards. If a choice must be made between the public in general and the specific consumers of a product made by a manufacturer who exhibits a flagrant indifference to human safety, the burden should fall upon the latter. [294] The consumer has a choice, unlike the unsuspecting victim, or society in general. The consumer can avoid sharing in the cost of the corporation's misconduct simply by refusing to buy the corporation's product. Those who would have benefitted from the corporate wrongdoing, including consumers, shareholders, and employees, should bear the burden of the costs associated with that conduct. [295]

c. Limiting punitive damages to a multiple of economic and noneconomic loss discriminates against women and minorities

In addition, the proposed cap on punitive damages discriminates against woman and minorities. Because human life usually is valued in terms of economic loss, which often translates into earning potential, [296] disparate awards are granted to victims of different genders, even though they suffer the same injuries. [297] For example, two individuals, a man and a woman, suffer exactly the same injury rendering both unable to work. The man is an engineer. His economic damages would include his lost wages, say $ 200,000, and his potential punitive damage award would be a multiple of these same [*1631] lost wages. Under the proposed federal bill, his punitive damages award would be two times $ 200,000, or $ 400,000. The woman is a homemaker and has suffered little economic loss, so the compensation she receives for the same injury would be substantially less as would any possible punitive award she may receive, capped at $ 250,000. As this example demonstrates, capping punitive damages in product liability cases will have a disproportionately negative impact on women. [298]

The same rationale applies to minorities. "Women and minorities' wages are between three-quarter and one-half of the salaries of average white men ... [with] white women earning only 69 cents, African-American women earned only 62 cents, and Hispanic women earned only 54 cents for every dollar earned by white men." [299] Like women, minorities generally occupy lower-paying jobs and therefore have less economic loss. [300]

This disparity results in unequal punishment of similarly situated wrongdoers. Corporations who manufacture products marketed exclusively or predominantly toward women and minorities would not be punished as severely as corporations who manufacture products marketed toward men, where there is generally higher economic loss and therefore the potential for higher punitive damages. Not only would women and minorities not receive as large a punitive damage award when they are injured, but they would have to contend with more unsafe products. This system of economic valuation is the functional equivalent of a directive that companies will not be punished as severely if they hurt a woman or minority as they will be if they hurt a Caucasian man. Therefore, manufacturers of products targeting women and minorities would take fewer safety precautions and would engage in more risky behavior because they have less to lose. This directive is magnified by the fact that women and minorities have less access to the legal system and are less likely to [*1632] bring suit. [301] Moreover, in light of the lower compensatory damages and accordingly lower punitive damages, women and minorities would be less likely to find counsel willing to take their case. Therefore, capping punitive damages as some multiple of economic loss has a discriminatory impact on women and minorities.

REV_00263267

d. The Model Act proposes a better solution

The unbridled discretion of juries to award any punishment amount they see fit without any guidance is an unnecessary evil. For the reasons discussed above, however, capping punitive damages also is too extreme. [302] The Model Act proposes a better alternative. Instead of imposing an arbitrary cap on punitive awards, the Model Act requires the jury to consider several factors to determine what constitutes a "fair and reasonable amount of punitive damages," including:

(1) the nature of defendant's wrongful conduct and its effect on the claimant and others;

(2) the amount of compensatory damages;

(3) any profit or gain, obtained by the defendant through the wrongful conduct, in excess of that likely to be divested by this or other actions against the defendant for compensatory damages or restitution;

(4) the defendant's present and future financial condition and the effect of an award on each condition;

(5) any fines, penalties, damages, or restitution paid or to be paid by the defendant arising from the wrongful conduct;

(6) any adverse effect of the award on innocent persons;

(7) any remedial measures taken or not taken by the defendant since the wrongful conduct;

(8) compliance or noncompliance with any applicable standard promulgated by a governmental or other generally recognized agency or organization whose function it is to establish standards; and

(9) any other aggravating or mitigating factors relevant to the amount of the award. [303]

The factors offered in the Model Act track those endorsed by the Supreme Court in Haslip, TXO, and BMW. [304] Requiring the jury to [*1633] consider certain well-defined factors in determining the amount of punitive damages awarded would result in easier and more limited review by both the district and appellate courts. Such guidance regarding the criteria for assessing the amount of awards would add greater certainty to the award process and would reduce the instances of excessive awards, without sacrificing the goals behind the imposition of such awards: punishment and deterrence. In those instances when excessive awards are proffered, judicial remittitur or reversal would be made easier by consideration of the mandated factors.

If the burden of proof is raised and the liability standard is changed to require a degree of intent, as proposed in this Article, then punitive damage awards would be available only when the plaintiff proves by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant acted with conscious indifference towards the plaintiff's safety. Why should the potential liability of an individual who acts intentionally to harm society be limited? Senator Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) once said: "Punitive damages reform is not about shielding wrongdoers from liability, ... Safeguards are needed to protect against abuse in the award of punitive damages." [305] If punitive damages were capped for those corporations who are proven, by clear and convincing evidence, to have acted intentionally to harm society with no regard for anything but corporate profits, wrongdoers would be shielded from liability. Raising the evidentiary burden and liability standards are the only necessary safeguards. Moreover, judicial review and the tool of remittitur still will be available.

REV_00263268

The better route is the one proposed in the Model Act, where the legislature dictates the factors that a jury must consider when assessing a punitive damage award and requires detailed findings justifying the award. The Model Act, unlike the vetoed federal bill, also addresses the problem posed by multiple punitive damages awards that are unfairly duplicative. [306]

It provides: "If the court determines that an award of punitive damages in the pending case is unfairly duplicative, it shall reduce the award accordingly." [307] It requires that courts consider the following:

The bases of liability for the punitive damages awarded, the purposes for which the awards were made, how the awards were determined or calculated, whether the defendant has already [*1634] disgorged any unwarranted economic gain for which it was held liable under Section 6(b), and any other evidence offered by the parties relevant to the issue of whether the petitioner is being subjected to unfair duplicative awards of punitive damages. [308]

Federal legislation should incorporate this concept from the Model Act rather than a "first comer" rule, and should regulate the imposition of multiple punitive damage awards for the same conduct. Proponents of national tort reform designed to curb the imposition of multiple damage awards have advocated a "first comer" rule accompanied by a limited number of exceptions. [309] For example, if the plaintiff in a later suit is able to offer new evidence not present at the first trial, or if the judge determines that the amount of punitive damages awarded in the first case was insufficient to punish or deter the defendant, a second award may be justified. Federal legislation either should incorporate the consideration of past punitive damage awards into the assessment process or should allow the defendant, on post-verdict motion, to bring to the court's attention other punitive awards paid, so that the court can reduce the jury verdict accordingly. [310]

If corporate manufacturers still need saving from profit-threatening punitive damage awards, the legislature could then revisit the cap issue. [311] At present, why destroy the goals of punitive awards, rendering them ineffective for their anticipated purpose, by capping them? [312] [*1635]

5. Regulatory compliance as a bar to punitive damages

A regulatory compliance defense has appeared in many of the recent congressional bills on tort reform as well as in a number of state tort reform measures. [313] This defense provides that compliance with existing regulations either presumptively or conclusively, depending upon the legislation, immunizes the defendant from the imposition of punitive damages. In effect, this means that the federal regulatory standards become the tort standards as well. The arguments in favor of such a defense are agency expertise, predictability, and reduction in the scope of liability. The agencies that promulgate regulations are experts in their field and they know, better than judges or juries, what standards of safety are reasonable in a particular industry. [314] The agency has obtained the necessary data to make risk comparisons and to set properly a safe standard that protects the public. [315] The judiciary, therefore, should defer to agency expertise. [316] A regulatory compliance defense would mandate such deference.

REV_00263269

Moreover, such a defense would help to control what many characterize as escalating and unjustified punitive damage awards by reducing the scope of liability and by giving defendants more notice as to the prohibited conduct. Finally, penalizing defendants by awarding punitive damages when the defendant has complied with existing federal regulations can be viewed as fundamentally unfair and inefficient.

There are problems, however, which plague the regulatory compliance defense. One significant problem is that agency regulations often are vague, inadequate, outdated, and obsolete. [317] [*1636] Regulations generally set minimal, not optimal safety standards, which is a concern voiced by many courts and noted in the American Law Institute's Restatement (Third) of Torts which rejects a regulatory compliance defense. [318] Pursuant to the Restatement, non-compliance with federal regulations renders a product defective. [319] Compliance, on the other hand, is mere evidence of non-defectiveness and does not preclude a finding that the product is defective. [320]

Agencies lack the resources and the ability to keep pace with technological advancement. Moreover, delays inherent in the regulatory process make it impossible to keep regulations up-to-date, especially in this high-tech era when science is changing so quickly. [321] In addition, government prosecution for violations of agency regulations occur infrequently. [322] The government simply does not have the resources to police corporate misconduct. [*1637]

In addition to inadequate and antiquated regulations, there is also the threat of agency capture. [323] ""Agency capture' refers to domination of an agency by the entities that the agency was created to control." [324] Because agencies depend upon industry for data and expertise when they promulgate regulations, agency choices predictably reflect industry perspectives. [325] Moreover, because many agency staff members have worked in the regulated industry, they share the industry's perspective or expect to work for some regulated entity in the future, and thus hesitate to criticize industry proposals. [326] Moreover, industry has vast resources to devote to agency lobbying, compared to public interest groups. Corporations have all the information and the resources.

For these reasons, although evidence of regulatory compliance might be relevant in a determination of whether to award punitive damages, it should not be conclusively or presumptively determinative. [327] Although regulatory compliance should not be a defense to claims of misconduct, federal legislation could include regulatory compliance among the factors to be considered in assessing punitive damages, as the Model Act proposes. [328]

Conclusion

Punitive damage awards can be an effective legal tool for controlling corporate misconduct. However, the increase in the magnitude and frequency of such awards warrants closer scrutiny of the doctrine and the introduction of safeguards to protect American industry from abusive penalties. When punitive damage sanctions are awarded in excessive amounts or are imposed erratically against undeserving defendants, the tort system as a whole is undermined. Federal tort [*1638] reform legislation is the most appropriate vehicle for achieving the optimum balance in the application of the punitive damage doctrine.

Despite the BMW decision, the Supreme Court has provided little actual guidance regarding the imposition of punitive damage awards. Similarly, state courts and legislatures, although trying to assist in preventing what they have observed as manifest injustice in the imposition of these awards, have been equally ineffective in curbing abuse of the punitive damages system, largely because their power to regulate stops at their geographic borders. Legislative, not judicial, action is needed, and to be effective the legislation must be national.

REV_00263270

In an effort to reflect the quasi-criminal nature of punitive damage sanctions, federal tort reform should raise the burden of proof and create a uniform liability standard predicated on the defendant's intent. Bifurcation of trials also should be adopted to insure against jury irrationality and bias. Most importantly, federal reform should articulate a uniform set of factors for mandatory consideration in calculating punitive damage awards. Such reforms would effectuate the necessary safeguards against abuse of the punitive penalties while simultaneously ensuring that intentional misconduct does not go unpunished. While safeguards are needed to protect against abuse in the award of punitive damages, reform should not shield wrongdoers who have been found, by clear and convincing evidence, to have intentionally sacrificed public safety for corporate profits. Reforms that would cap punitive damages by limiting them to a multiple of the economic and noneconomic loss or to some arbitrary amount should be avoided because they will undermine the efficacy of the punitive damage system. Capping punitive damages would shield wrongdoers, and thereby encourage misconduct, with women and minorities suffering most.

Federal reform is the only solution to the national crisis in the tort system. Only through national reform can the uniformity and the certainty necessary to yield predictable results be achieved. Federal tort reform will benefit both the consumer and the manufacturer with consumers knowing their rights and manufacturers knowing their responsibilities. This will reduce litigation, increase settlement, and foster respect for, and compliance with, the law.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 500-01 (1993) (O'Connor, J., dissenting) (internal citations omitted).

n2. 142 Cong. Rec. S2344 (daily ed. Mar. 20, 1996) (statement of Sen. Hollings).

n3. See, e.g., John L. Meredith & Brian P. Casey, Taking Cover: Preserving Error When Hit with a Claim for Punitive Damages, 47 Baylor L. Rev. 923, 938 (1995) (noting that prejudicial awards that evidence no concern for deterrence or retribution are unconstitutional regardless of size of award (citing TXO Prod. Corp., 509 U.S. at 467 (Kennedy, J., concurring))); Developments in the Law - Jury Determination of Punitive Damages, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 1513, 1514-15 (1997) (listing potential harms resulting from excessive and indiscriminate punitive damage awards, including "deterrence of socially desirable activities [and] removal of useful products from the market").

n4. See infra notes 26-31 and accompanying text (noting that punitive damages stand somewhere between tort law, whose purpose is restitutionary, and criminal law, whose purpose is retributive).

n5. See Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30, 59 (1983) (recognizing that although punitive awards are quasi-criminal in nature, defendants cannot take advantage of safeguards associated with criminal proceedings).

n6. See Kimberly A. Pace, The Tax Deductibility of Punitive Damage Payments: Who Should Ultimately Bear the Burden for Corporate Misconduct?, 47 Ala. L. Rev. 825, 843 (1996) (stating that 46 states have enacted tort reform legislation curbing punitive awards in response to increased frequency and size of such awards in recent years).

n7. See Restatement (Third) of Torts: Products Liability (Proposed Final Draft 1997).

REV_00263271

n8. See BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996).

n9. See Model Punitive Damages Act (1996) [hereinafter Model Act]. The Model Act was passed by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws on July 18, 1996, to "tighten up" state procedures with respect to punitive damages. See Marcia Coyle, Model Act Would Tighten Punitives, Nat'l L.J., Aug. 5, 1996, at A12. The commissioners hope that the Model Act will be adopted by the states. See id. It is doubtful, however, that the states will abandon the effort expended in passing legislation that reflects their views on the appropriate means of tort reform in favor of the Model Act.

n10. See infra notes 70-207 and accompanying text (analyzing Supreme Court review of damages under Fifth, Seventh, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments).

n11. See Jim Fieweger, Note, The Need for Reform of Punitive Damages in Mass Tort Litigation: Juzwin v. Amtorg Trading Corp., 39 DePaul L. Rev. 775, 794-800, 823 (1990) (illustrating judicial system's inability to adapt to mass tort litigation).

n12. See id. at 823 ("As a result of the state based nature of punitive claims, federal and state courts are powerless to individually remedy the shortcomings in mass tort punitive damages procedures. Congress, therefore, must step in to cure the ills of mass tort litigation."); Jonathan Hadley Koenig, Note, Punitive Damage "Overkill" After TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources: The Need for a Congressional Solution, 36 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 751, 768-69 (1995) (stressing need for legislative solution to punitive damage abuses).

n13. See 142 Cong. Rec. S2560 (daily ed. Mar. 21, 1996) (statement of Sen. Rockefeller).

n14. Although it is true that punitive damages traditionally have been a matter of state regulation, Congress alone has the power to protect interstate commerce. See U.S. Const. art. I, 8, cl. 3. States have been effective in regulating punitive damages within their borders, but they are incapable of doing so on a national level. See Janet V. Hallahan, Social Interests Versus Plaintiffs' Rights: The Constitutional Battle over Statutory Limitations on Punitive Damages, 26 Loy. U. Chi. L.J. 405, 406-07 (1995) (explaining that courts have upheld state laws restricting punitive damage awards).

n15. See Healy v. Beer Inst., 491 U.S. 324, 336 (1989) (indicating that Commerce Clause prohibits states from regulating commerce wholly outside its borders even if such commerce affects conditions within state).

n16. See Fieweger, supra note 11, at 823 (stating that congressional solution to excessive punitive awards is needed to address problem on national scale).

n17. See Day v. Woodworth, 54 U.S. 363, 371 (1851) (recognizing propriety of awarding punitive damages).

n18. See Wilkes v. Wood, 98 Eng. Rep. 489, 498-99 (K.B. 1763) ("[Punitive d]amages are designed not only as a satisfaction to the injured person, but likewise as a punishment to the guilty, to deter from any such proceeding for the future, and as a proof of the detestation of the jury to the action itself."); see also Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 274 (1989) (tracing roots of punitive damages to thirteenth century England). For a detailed history of punitive damages, see Michael Rustad & Thomas Koenig, Historical Continuity of Punitive Damage Awards: Reforming the Tort Reformers, 42 Am. U. L. Rev. 1269, 1284-1304 (1993).

n19. See Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 8 n.4 (1991) (comparing Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. 342, 382 (1872), with Luther v. Shaw, 147 N.W. 18, 20 (Wis. 1914)). The Court in Fay indicated, "The idea is wrong. It is a monstrous heresy. It is an unsightly and an unhealthy excrescence, deforming the symmetry of the body of law." Fay, 53 N.H. at 382. In comparison, the court in Luther saw punitive awards as a positive influence on society.

REV_00263272

The law giving exemplary damages is an outgrowth of the English love of liberty regulated by law. It tends to elevate the jury as a responsible instrument of government, discourages private reprisals, restrains the strong, influential, and unscrupulous, vindicates the right of the weak, and encourages recourse to, and confidence in, the courts of law by those wronged or oppressed by acts or practices not cognizable, in or not sufficiently punished, by the criminal law.

Luther, 147 N.W. at 20.

n20. Compensatory damages are awarded to compensate injured plaintiffs, to restore them to the position they would have been in if the injury never had occurred. See Restatement (Second) of Torts 908(1) (1995) [hereinafter Restatement]. Compensatory damages reimburse the injured person for medical expenses, lost wages, lost earning capacity, and pain and suffering. See id. Punitive damages are not intended to compensate the individual plaintiff. See, e.g., Enstan Group, Inc. v. Grassgreen, 812 F. Supp. 1562, 1583 n.14 (M.D. Ala. 1993); Freeman v. World Airways, Inc., 596 F. Supp. 841, 846 (D. Ma. 1984); Morris v. Parke, Davis & Co., 573 F. Supp. 1324, 1326 (C.D. Cal. 1983).

n21. Restatement, supra note 20, 908(1); see also Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 350 (1974) (noting that punitive damages "are not compensation for injury ... [but] are private fines levied by civil juries to punish reprehensible conduct and to deter its future occurrence"); William B. Hale, Handbook on the Law of Torts 234 (1896) (stating that punitive damages are awarded because of "the grossness of the wrong done, rather than as a measure of compensation").

n22. See Angela P. Harris, Rereading Punitive Damages: Beyond the Public/Private Distinction, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 1079, 1097-98 (arguing that conventional notion of tort law as a private right concerned only with compensation, and criminal law as a public right concerned with punishment, is inaccurate).

n23. See F. Warren Jacoby, The Relationship of Punitive Damages and Compensatory Damages in Tort Actions, 75 Dick. L. Rev. 585, 587 (1970) ("Punitive damages are not intended to remunerate the injured party for the damages he may have sustained. They are not to compensate; they are the penalty the law inflicts for gross, wanton, and culpable negligence, and are allowed as a warning or as an example to defendants or others."); see also Allen v. R & H Oil & Gas Co., 63 F.3d 1326, 1333 (5th Cir. 1995) ("Punitive damages ... are fundamentally collective; their purpose is to protect society by punishing and deterring wrongdoing.").

n24. See Douglas L. Carden, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Cases, 16 Santa Clara L. Rev. 895, 922 (1976) (stating that compensatory damages alone may not deter wrongful conduct); see also The Product Liability Fairness Act: Hearings on S. 565 Before the Subcomm. on Consumer Affairs, Foreign Commerce, and Tourism of the Senate Comm. on Commerce, Science, and Transp., 104th Cong. 234-36 (1995) [hereinafter Product Liability Fairness Hearing] (statement of Jonathan Massey, attorney, Washington, D.C.) (stating that compensatory damages alone are not enough of a deterrent to keep dangerous products off the market - punitive damages are necessary); Punitive Damage Tort Reform, 1995: Hearings on S. 671 & S. 672 Before the Senate Judiciary Comm., 104th Cong. 79 (1995) [hereinafter Punitive Damages Hearing] (statement of Robert Creamer, Executive Director,

REV_00263273

To date, the Supreme Court has considered whether punitive damage awards violate the Fifth, Seventh, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. [10] Despite visiting the issue numerous times, the Court has given little practical guidance regarding the propriety of punitive damage awards. Notwithstanding the creation of substantive due process, the Court is not the appropriate vehicle for weighing the costs and benefits of the tort system or for instituting the type of reform that is necessary to curb abuse of the punitive damage doctrine. [11] This is a legislative and not a judicial function. [12] [*1577] Should the Supreme Court supplant the jury's assessment of reasonableness and sense of community outrage with its own?

The punitive damages problem is a national problem that has an enormous impact on interstate commerce, considering that seventy percent of all products manufactured in the United States cross state lines before they are sold. [13] Consequently, this national problem requires a national solution. [14] No individual state legislature or court has the ability to regulate beyond its geographic borders. [15] The Supreme Court is not an efficient means for regulating excessive punitive damages - nor is it the appropriate branch of government to impose such standards. [16] As demonstrated in this Article, national application of federal tort reform legislation is most capable of regulating the imposition of punitive damage awards and eviscerating the problems associated with these sanctions. The certainty and predictability concomitant with federal legislation is necessary to promote consistency, fairness, equality, predictability, and efficiency.

Part I of this Article describes the history, nature, and purpose of punitive damages as well as the assessment process for these awards. Part II details the current state of punitive damage awards and the need for reform. Part III considers the measures states have taken to regulate punitive damages within their borders. Part IV analyzes the Supreme Court decisions that have set the constitutional parameters of punitive damage awards. Part IV explores some of the undecided contemporary issues that plague the tort system, noting that the Supreme Court decisions in this area have not obviated the need for federal reform.

Finally, in Part V, this Article addresses the merits of federal tort reform legislation, concluding that federal tort reform, which would regulate the punitive damage system on a national level, is necessary to further the goals underlying punitive damage awards. Part V examines the various tort reform issues that have been proposed, [*1578] including the issues of increasing the burden of proof and the liability standard to obtain punitive awards, bifurcating the trial of punitive damages from other issues in the case, capping punitive damage awards, and implementing a regulatory compliance defense.

Part V proposes enacting federal legislation to increase the burden of proof and liability standard in recognition of the quasi-criminal nature of punitive damages. Such reform will safeguard against undeserved punitive damage awards and infuse the system with the certainty and predictability necessary to discourage misconduct and reduce litigation. It also proposes bifurcation of trials to limit juror bias, and the articulation of factors for mandatory consideration in assessing the amount of punitive awards. It rejects capping punitive damage awards because it undermines the goals of the punitive damage doctrine and has a discriminatory impact on women and minorities.

Part V also considers the regulatory compliance defense, recognizing that although such a defense should be a factor considered in the assessment of punitive damage awards, using it as a conclusive defense would be extremely dangerous. Part V concludes by finding that the best solution is to have the regulatory and judicial systems working in tandem to police corporate behavior.

REV_00263247

Illinois Public Action). Mr. Creamer indicated that compensatory damages alone do not provide enough protection to consumers:

In the Ford Pinto case, an economic calculation was made that 180 violent deaths and 180 additional serious injuries would cost the company less than the $ 11 per car necessary to prevent them. It is only the possibility that a jury might award substantial punitive damages of unknown size that prevents this kind of death calculus from being done by corporations every day.

Id.

n25. See Eichenseer v. Reserve Life Ins. Co., 934 F.2d 1377, 1383-84 (5th Cir. 1991) (upholding size of punitive damage award because of its deterrent effect on manufacturer); Lynda G. Wilson, Note, Corporate Successor Liability for Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 40 S.C. L. Rev. 509, 513-14 (1989) (stating that punitive damages help in deterring misconduct and prove to be useful tool in preventing manufacturers' wrongful acts).

n26. See Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 54 (1991) (O'Connor, J., dissenting) (describing punitive damages as "quasi-criminal punishment"); Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 275 (1989) ("Punitive damages advance the interests of punishment and deterrence, which are also among the interests advanced by the criminal law ...."); Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30, 59 (1983) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting) (explaining that punitive damage awards are "quasi-criminal"); see also David G. Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 Mich. L. Rev. 1258, 1260 (1976) (detailing purpose of punitive damages in products liability litigation); Richard A. Seltzer, Punitive Damages in Mass Tort Litigation: Addressing the Problem of Fairness, Efficiency and Control, 52 Fordham L. Rev. 37, 43 (1983) (addressing quasi-criminal nature of punitive sanctions).

n27. Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1, 2 (1982).

n28. See Restatement, supra note 20, 908 cmt. a (stating that purpose of punitive damages is same as purpose of criminal fines); see also David G. Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, 49 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1, 8 (1982) ("The purpose of such damages is punishment and deterrence, rather than compensation ...."); Seltzer, supra note 26, at 43 (explaining that purpose of punitive damages is to punish offenders).

n29. Landgraf v. USI Film Prod., 511 U.S. 244, 281 (1994); see also Haslip, 499 U.S. at 19 (noting that punitive damages serve same purposes as criminal punishment - "retribution and deterrence"); Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., 403 U.S. 29, 82 (1971) (stating that punitive damages "serve the same function as criminal penalties and are in effect private fines").

n30. See Haslip, 499 U.S. at 19 (finding that most states impose punitive damages "for purposes of retribution and deterrence"); Day v. Woodworth, 54 U.S. 363, 371 (1851) (explaining that juries often awarded additional compensation to plaintiffs in cases where defendants' acts were seen as wanton or malicious); Allen v. R & H Oil & Gas Co., 63 F.3d 1326, 1332-33 (5th Cir. 1995) (stating that punitive damages punish wrongdoers for their intentional or malicious acts and are used to deter similar future conduct); Acosta v. Honda Motor Co., 717 F.2d 828, 836-37 (3d Cir. 1983) (providing arguments for and against using punitive damages to serve goals of punishment and deterrence); Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727, 735-36 (Minn. 1980) ("The punitive damages remedy serves to punish a ... manufacturer for and deter that manufacturer from willfully, wantonly, or maliciously marketing a [product] which is unreasonably dangerous ...."); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 294 N.W.2d 437, 458-59 (Wis. 1980) (indicating that jury awards should not be more than necessary to serve purposes of punitive damages - punishment and deterrence); see also Model Act, supra note 9, 1 at 3 (noting that ""punitive damages' means an award of money made to a claimant solely to punish or deter"); Richard C. Ausness, Retribution and Deterrence: The Role of Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 Ky. L.J. 1, 39, 70-71 (1986) (explaining economic model of punitive damages for purpose of deterrence); Robert D. Cooter, Punitive Damages for Deterrence: When and How Much?, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 1143, 1146 (1989) (indicating that punishment and deterrence are goals of punitive damages); Ellis, supra note 27, at 8-9 (describing objective of punitive damage awards); Jacoby, supra note 23, at 587-88; Owen, supra note 28, at 8-9.

REV_00263274

n31. But see Robert D. Cooter, Economic Analysis of Punitive Damages, 56 So. Cal. L. Rev. 79, 90 (1982) (suggesting that courts may have additional motives for awarding punitive damages including rewarding plaintiffs who otherwise would not have sued and compensating victims fully); Ellis, supra note 27, at 3 (listing several purposes for imposing punitive damages including preserving the peace, inducing private law enforcement, compensating victims for otherwise uncompensated losses, and paying plaintiffs' attorney fees); David G. Owen, A Punitive Damage Overview: Functions, Problems and Reform, 39 Vill. L. Rev. 363, 374 (1994) (articulating five functions of punitive damage awards: education, retribution, deterrence, compensation, and law enforcement); see also Campus Sweater & Sportswear Co. v. M.B. Kahn Constr. Co., 515 F. Supp. 64, 105 (D.S.C. 1979) (holding that punitive damages deter manufacturers from misconduct, encourage production of safer products, and serve as "private revenge which is carried out in the courts rather than through duels or in back alleys"), aff'd, 644 F.2d 877 (4th Cir. 1981). This Article addresses only true punitive damage awards, not compensatory damages masked as punitive.

n32. Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3701(b) (1994); see also Miss. Code Ann. 11-1-65(e) (Supp. 1996). The Mississippi Code also mandates that courts consider a variety of factors in assessing damages:

In all cases involving an award of punitive damages, the fact-finder, in determining the amount of punitive damages, shall consider, to the extent relevant, the following: the defendant's financial condition and net worth; the nature and reprehensibility of the defendant's wrongdoing, for example, the impact of defendant's conduct on the plaintiff, or the relationship of the defendant to the plaintiff; the defendant's awareness of the amount of harm being caused and the defendant's motivation in causing such harm; the duration of the defendant's misconduct and whether the defendant attempted to conceal such misconduct; and any other circumstances shown by the evidence that bear on determining a proper amount of punitive damages.

Id.

n33. See Coffey v. Fayette Tubular Prods., 929 S.W.2d 326 (Tenn. 1996). The court in Coffey enumerated the factors for consideration in assessing a punitive damage award:

REV_00263275

In Hodges we set forth a list of factors to guide the discretion of the fact finder in assessing the amount of punitive damages. We instructed the fact finder to consider:

(1) The defendant's financial affairs, financial condition, and net worth;

(2) The nature and reprehensibility of the defendant's wrongdoing, for example

(A) The impact of defendant's conduct on the plaintiff, or

(B) The relationship of defendant to plaintiff;

(3) The defendant's awareness of the amount of harm being caused and defendant's motivation in causing the harm;

(4) The duration of defendant's misconduct and whether defendant attempted to conceal the conduct;

(5) The expense plaintiff has borne in the attempt to recover the losses;

(6) Whether defendant profited from the activity, and if defendant did profit, whether the punitive award should be in excess of the profit in order to deter similar future behavior;

(7) Whether, and the extent to which, defendant has been subjected to previous punitive damage awards based upon the same wrongful act;

(8) Whether, once the misconduct became known to the defendant, defendant took remedial action or attempted to make amends by offering a prompt and fair settlement for actual harm caused;

(9) Any other circumstances shown by the evidence that bear on determining the proper amount of the punitive award.

Id. at 328 (citing Hodges v. S.C. Toof & Co., 833 S.W.2d 896, 901-02 (Tenn. 1992)); see also Jonathan Woodner Co. v. Breeden, 665 A.2d 929, 941 n.19 (D.C. 1995) (explaining factors drawn from common law used in determining punitive awards); Schaffer v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 552 N.W.2d 801, 807 n.3 (S.D. 1996) (setting forth factors jury may consider when awarding punitive damages); Management Computer Servs., Inc. v. Hawkins, Ash, Baptie & Co., 539 N.W.2d 111, 122 (Wis. Ct. App. 1995) (noting that Wisconsin "case law establishes the factors to be considered in determining the proper amount to be awarded as punitive damages").

n34. See Restatement, supra note 20, 908(2) & cmts. b-e.

n35. See Owen, supra note 28, at 9 (noting that juries consider the seriousness of defendant's misconduct when assessing punitive damages).

n36. See TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 460 (1993) (noting that in calculating punitive damages, jury may consider potential harm that might have resulted from defendant's bad acts as well as harm that actually occurred, but requiring reasonable relationship between harm and punitive damage award (citing Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 21 (1991))); Garnes v. Fleming Landfill, Inc., 413 S.E.2d 897, 909 (W. Va. 1991) ("As a matter of fundamental fairness, punitive damages should bear a reasonable relationship to compensatory damages."); see also Acosta v. Honda Motor Co., 717 F.2d 828, 839 (3d Cir. 1983) (recognizing that size of compensatory damage award should be considered when assessing punitive award); Tudor Assocs. Ltd., II v. AJ & AJ Servicing, Inc., 843 F. Supp. 68, 79 (E.D.N.C. 1993) (requiring punitive damage awards to "bear a rational relationship to the sum reasonably needed to punish the defendant for his conduct"); Owen, supra note 28, at 9 (explaining that some states mandate that punitive awards "bear a reasonable relationship" to compensatory award). But see Jacoby, supra note 23, at 603-04 (arguing that there is no logical basis for requiring punitive damages to be related to compensatory). The Supreme Court made clear in TXO, however, that the ratio of punitive damages to actual damages, although a factor to be considered, is not dispositive. See TXO, 509 U.S. at 462.

REV_00263276

n37. See, e.g., Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 21-22 (1991) (stating that in assessing punitive damages, jury should consider "financial position" of defendant); Boyle v. Lorimar Productions, Inc., 13 F.3d 1357, 1359-60 (9th Cir. 1994) (noting that California's jury instructions require juries to consider defendant's financial condition in determining whether award is sufficient to punish and deter); Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 485 F. Supp. 566, 603 (W.D. Okla. 1979) (instructing jury that consideration of defendant's wealth when assessing punitive damages is "consistent with the general purpose of such an award in deterring the defendant ... from committing similar acts in the future, and for punishment of the defendant for such acts"), aff'd, 637 F.2d 743 (10th Cir. 1980).

n38. See Kenneth S. Abraham & John C. Jeffries, Jr., Punitive Damages and the Rule of Law: The Role of Defendant's Wealth, 19 J. Legal Stud. 415, 416-20 (1989) (arguing that considering defendant's wealth when assessing a punitive award encourages punishment based solely on defendant's status, is incompatible with purposes of tort law and compensation, and does not deter socially undesirable conduct). Such criticism ignores the fact that punitive damages are not based merely in tort law, but actually stand between tort and criminal law; therefore, the fact that considerations of wealth make them incompatible with the traditional notions of tort compensation offers no support for excluding this information from the punitive damage assessment process.

n39. See TXO, 509 U.S. at 464 n.29 (noting that for punitive damages to be effective, courts must take into account all relevant factors, including defendant's financial position); cf. Theodore Eisenberg et al., The Predictability of Punitive Damages, 26 J. Legal Stud. 623, 628-29 (1997) (arguing that amount of punitive damages should reflect defendant's financial position).

n40. The jury instruction given in TXO read in relevant part:

> The object of [punitive damages] is to deter [product manufacturers] from committing like offenses in the future. Therefore the law recognizes that to in fact deter such conduct may require a larger fine upon one of large means than it would upon one of ordinary means under the same or similar circumstances.

TXO, 509 U.S. at 464 n.29.

n41. See TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 419 S.E.2d 880, 889 (W. Va. 1992) ("An award that might be unreasonable if awarded against Jeff's Neighborhood Hot Dog Stand could be quite reasonable if awarded for the same conduct against McDonald's."), aff'd, 509 U.S. 443 (1993).

n42. See Haslip, 499 U.S. at 21-22 (noting that in assessing punitive damages, jury should consider "financial position" of defendant); Allen v. R & H Oil & Gas Co., 63 F.3d 1326, 1333

REV_00263277

(5th Cir. 1995) (indicating that because the purpose of punitive damages is to deter wrongdoing, damage awards are tailored to defendant's wealth); Acosta v. Honda Motor Co., 717 F.2d 828, 839 (3d Cir. 1983) ("This court has previously recognized that ... the wealth of the defendant ... should be taken into account in assessing punitive damages."); Caron v. Caron, 577 A.2d 1178, 1180 (Me. 1990) (noting that damages must have some relationship to defendant's financial status in order to act as deterrent); Braley v. Berkshire Mut. Ins. Co., 440 A.2d 359, 363 (Me. 1982) (stating that punitive damage awards "must ... bear some relationship to the actual wealth of the defendant"); Whittington v. Whittington, 535 So. 2d 573, 584 (Miss. 1988) (considering financial worth of defendant in computing punitive damages); Bundy v. Century Equip. Co., 692 P.2d 754, 759 (Utah 1984) (finding that, in absence of evidence regarding defendant's net worth, an award of punitive damages cannot be sustained); see also Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3701 (1994) (stating that court must consider financial condition of defendant in assessing punitive damage award); Miss. Code Ann. 11-1-65(e) (Supp. 1996) (noting that fact-finder must consider "defendant's financial condition and net worth" in determining amount of punitive damages to award); Restatement, supra note 20, 908(2) & cmts. b-e.

n43. See Haslip, 499 U.S. at 22.

While punitive damages in Alabama may embrace such factors as the heinousness of the civil wrong, its effect upon the victim, the likelihood of its recurrence, and the extent of the defendant's wrongful gain, the factfinder must be guided by more than the defendant's net worth. Alabama plaintiffs do not enjoy a windfall because they have the good fortune to have a defendant with a deep pocket.

Id.

n44. See Owen, supra note 28, at 9. But see Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. 52-240b (West 1991) (noting that judge shall determine amount of punitive damages to be awarded in products liability cases); Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3701 (1994) (allowing jury to decide if punitive damages are appropriate, but shifting determination of amount from jury to judge); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2307.80 (Anderson 1995) (mandating that court determine amount of damages); Owen, supra note 26, at 1320-22 (advocating that judges, not juries, should determine amount of punitive damage awards); Lisa M. Sharkey, Comment, Judge or Jury: Who Should Assess Punitive Damages, 64 U. Cin. L. Rev. 1089 (1996) (arguing that judges, not juries, should decide amount of punitive damage awards).

n45. See, e.g., Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 174 Cal. Rptr. 348 (Cal. Ct. App. 1981) (upholding trial court's remittitur to $ 3.5 million of a jury award of $ 125 million in punitive damages); 735 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 5/2-1207 (West 1992) (noting that trial court has discretion to enter remittitur if punitive damage award is excessive). In fact, in Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415 (1994), the Supreme Court held that an amendment to a state constitution that prohibited judicial review of punitive damage awards was a violation of due process. See id. at 432.

n46. See 735 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 5/2-1115.05(c) (West Supp. 1996); see also Minn. Stat. Ann. 549.20 (West Supp. 1996) (permitting separate proceeding to determine punitive damages); N.C. Gen. Stat. 1D-30 (1995) (allowing defendant to request that liability for compensatory and punitive damages be tried separately).

n47. See, e.g., Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3701 (1994); Mont. Code Ann. 27-1-221(7)(a) (1991).

REV_00263278

n48. See Mont. Code Ann. 27-1-221(7)(a) (1995) (stating that evidence of defendant's financial condition is not admissible until fact finder determines, in a separate proceeding, amount of punitive damage award, at which point defendant's financial condition must be considered); see also Utah Code Ann. 78-18-1(2) (1996) (noting that evidence of defendant's wealth is admissible only after finding liability for punitive damages); Oberg, 512 U.S. at 432 ("The presentation of evidence of a defendant's net worth creates the potential that juries will use their verdicts to express biases against big businesses, particularly those without strong local presences.").

n49. See Oberg, 512 U.S. at 432 (recognizing jury bias against large out-of-state firms); see also Glennon v. Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc., 83 F.3d 132, 138 (6th Cir. 1996) (deciding that review of arbitrators' punitive awards is unwarranted "because arbitrators do not share juries' bias against big business defendants").

n50. See, e.g., Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 54-55 (1991) (O'Connor, J., dissenting) ("Over the last 20 years, the Court has repeatedly criticized common-law punitive damages procedures on the ground that they invite discriminatory and otherwise illegitimate awards." (citing Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 350 (1974))); id. at 39 (Scalia, J., concurring) ("Punitive damages assessed under common-law procedures are far from a fossil, or even an endangered species. They are (regrettably to many) vigorously alive. To effect their elimination may well be wise, but is not the role of the Due Process Clause."); Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 282 (1989) (O'Connor, J., and Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Awards of punitive damages are skyrocketing. As recently as a decade ago, the largest award of punitive damages affirmed by an appellate court in a products liability case was $ 250,000. Since then, awards more than 30 times as high have been sustained on appeal.") (internal citations omitted); see also Product Liability Fairness Hearing, supra note 24, at 432 (statement of Theodore B. Olson, Esq., Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher LLP) (stating that "punitive damage awards are exploding out of control"). But see Michael Rustad, In Defense of Punitive Damages in Products Liability: Testing Tort Anecdotes with Empirical Data, 78 Iowa L. Rev. 1, 57-58 (1992) (finding that from 1965 to 1990, there were only 355 punitive damage awards in products liability cases and more than half of these punitive damage awards were reduced in settlement or were reduced by appellate courts).

n51. 499 U.S. 1 (1991).

n52. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 61-62 (1991) (O'Connor, J., dissenting) (internal citations omitted).

n53. Petition for Writ of Certiorari at 26, BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996) (No. 94-896).

n54. For example, in the well-publicized McDonald's case in which a customer spilled coffee into her lap, the jury's award of $ 2.7 million in punitive damages was reduced by the judge to $ 640,000. See Liebeck v. McDonald's Restaurants, Inc., No. CV-93-02419, 1995 WL 360309, at *1 (D.N.M. Aug. 18, 1994); Benjamin Weiser, Tort Reform's Promise, Peril; Legislation Could Mean Tight Limits on Liability, Wash. Post, Sept. 14, 1995, at A1 (stating that $ 2.7 million award later was reduced by judge to $ 640,000). The $ 70 million verdict against a director of Amerco was reduced to $ 7 million. See In re Shoen, 193 B.R. 302, 305 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 1996) (reducing jury damages award in remittitur proceeding based on jury finding that defendants reduced plaintiff's stock value in contested corporation by $ 1.4 billion). The $ 58 million verdict against Maryland Casualty for breach of contract and bad faith also was reversed as excessive. See Dempsey v. Maryland Cas. Co., BC-033631 (Super. Ct. Los Angeles Co., Oct. 27, 1994) (invalidating $ 61 million jury award based on Maryland Casualty's breach of contract and bad faith in refusing to pay fire insurance claim); Verdicts Reversed by Judges, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 6, 1995, at C14 (listing Dempsey as one of 11 of 1994's largest damage award reversals). In the Mercury Finance case, the judge found the $ 50 million award excessive and offered the plaintiff a choice between a new trial or a remitted award of $ 2 million. See Johnson v. Mercury Fin. Co. of Ala., No. CV-93-072 (Cir. Ct. Barbour Co. Ala., Jan. 27, 1995) (reducing award through undisclosed settlement when trial court deemed $ 90,000 compensatory and $ 50 million punitive awards excessive based on used car sale in which $ 1000 was added to $ 2700 automobile purchase price to cover financing acquisition fee); Alvin C. Harrell, Disclosure of "Acquisition Fees" in Assignments of Consumer Chattel, 49 Consumer Fin. L.Q. Rep. 145, 147-48 (1995) (describing political climate in Barbour County, Alabama, including historical ties between plaintiff's attorney, 6000 member jury pool, and judge presiding over case which led to excessive award in "aberrational" decision of otherwise "well-settled" legal principle in consumer chattel paper transfer). The parties reportedly settled rather than seek a new trial. See id. at 148. The $ 6.9 million punitive damage award against Baker & McKenzie for sexual harassment subsequently was reduced by the judge to $ 3.5 million. See Weeks v. Baker & McKenzie, 66 Fair Empl. Prac. Cas. (BNA) 581, 584-85 (Cal. Super. Ct. Nov. 28, 1994) (finding 138:1 ratio of punitive to compensatory award excessive where law firm defendant took corrective action before trial by forcing offending partner to leave firm and reducing award from $ 6.9 million to $ 3.5 million). The judge reversed the $ 80 million verdict against Hughes for racial discrimination, finding the award excessive and "grossly disproportionate." Lane v. Hughes Aircraft Co. Inc., BC-075519 (Super. Ct., Los Angeles Co., Oct. 19, 1994) (finding that prejudicial evidence was admitted improperly and that plaintiff's counsel improperly used inflammatory language in arguments to jury); Verdicts Reversed by Judges, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 6, 1995, at C14 (citing Hughes Aircraft as one of 11 of 1994's largest damage award reversals). The $ 109 million judgment against Blockbuster for "maliciously defrauding one of its investors" was settled. See Owen McDonald, Out-of-Court Settlement Reached in Blockbuster Investor Suit, Jan. 7, 1996, available in 1996 WL 8351823. The $ 5 million judgment against Hilton Hotel for negligence and for maliciously and oppressively denying the plaintiff her right to safety subsequently was reduced by the judge to $ 3.9 million. See Coughlin v. Hilton Hotels Corp., 879 F. Supp. 1047, 1053 (D. Nev. 1995) (reducing compensation contribution and punitive treble damage amounts by $ 400,000 previously paid by separate defendant); Robin Abcarian, Balancing Safety and the Bottom Line in Nevada, L.A. Times, June 7, 1995, at 1 (reporting Nevada state legislative efforts to reduce hotel liability for safety and security related negligence involving hotel guests).

REV_00263279

n55. See Weiser, supra note 54, at A1 (outlining proposed tort reform legislation). In his exhaustive 1992 study of punitive damages, Professor Michael Rustad found that half of all punitive awards are appealed and half of those appealed are reversed or reduced. See Rustad, supra note 50, at 57-58. Yet even this study does not reflect accurately how many awards would have been reduced by the court because many plaintiffs settle for less than the amount rewarded before the court has the opportunity to reduce. See id.

n56. See Darryl K. Brown, Structure and Relationship in the Jurisprudence of Juries: Comparing the Capital Sentencing and Punitive Damages Doctrine, 47 Hastings L.J. 1255, 1301 (1996) (arguing that courts have regulated the imposition of punitive damages by focusing "jury deliberation on factors deemed relevant by the legislature and minimizing consideration of irrelevant factors").

n57. See Product Liability Fairness Hearing, supra note 24, at 432 (statement of Theodore B. Olson, Esq., Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher LLP) ("The frequency and magnitude of punitive damage awards are exploding out of control when measured either by jury verdicts or by amounts affirmed on appeal ....").

n58. See id.

n59. See Carrie Menkel-Meadow, Whose Dispute Is It Anyway?: A Philisophical and Democratic Defense of Settlement (In Some Cases), 83 Geo. L.J. 2663, 2680-81 (1995)

REV_00263280

(describing effect of jury verdicts and settlement process on future litigation).

n60. See Punitive Damages Hearing, supra note 24, at 85-94 (statement of George L. Priest, Professor of Law and Economics, Yale Law School). According to one study, there has been a dramatic increase in punitive damage claims filed in tort cases. See id. at 87.

n61. See Pace, supra note 6, at 841.

n62. See Malcolm E. Wheeler, A Proposal for Further Common Law Development of the Use of Punitive Damages in Modern Product Liability Litigation, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 919, 919 (1989) ("The last two decades have witnessed dramatic growth in both the frequency and size of punitive damages awards in product liability litigation.... Today, hardly a month goes by without a multimillion-dollar punitive damages verdict in a product liability case."); see also James B. Sales, The Emergence of Punitive Damages in Product Liability Actions: A Further Assault on the Citadel, 14 St. Mary's L.J. 351, 391-92 (1983) (noting that product suppliers are threatened by number and size of punitive damages awards facing manufacturing industry). But see Stephen Daniels & Joanne Martin, Myth and Reality in Punitive Damages, 75 Minn. L. Rev. 1, 35-62 (1990) (presenting empirical evidence to contradict claims regarding size and frequency of punitive damages awards); Rustad, supra note 50, at 23 ("Every empirical study of punitive damages awards concludes that there is simply no evidence that punitive damages are routinely awarded.").

n63. See, e.g., Ga. Code Ann. 51-12-5.1(c) (1993 & Supp. 1996) ("Punitive damages shall be awarded not as compensation to a plaintiff but solely to punish, penalize, or deter a defendant ...."); Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.184(1)(f) (Banks-Baldwin 1995) (""Punitive damages' includes exemplary damages and means damages, other than compensatory and nominal damages, awarded against a person to punish and to discourage him and others from similar conduct in the future ....").

n64. See, e.g., Ala. Code 6-11-20(a) (Supp. 1992); Cal. Civ. Code 3294(a) (West Supp. 1992); Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. 52-240(b) (West 1997); Ga. Code Ann. 51-12-5.1(d), (e) (1993 & Supp. 1996); 735 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 5/22107 (West Supp. 1996); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2307.801(A) (Banks-Baldwin 1994); Or. Rev. Stat. 30.925(1) (1995).

n65. See, e.g., Ala. Code 6-11-20(a); Alaska Stat. 09.17.020 (Michie Supp. 1996); Cal. Civ. Code 3294(a); Ga. Code Ann. 51-12-5.1(b); Idaho Code 6-1604(1) (1992); 735 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 5/21115.05(b); Ind. Code Ann. 34-4-34-2 (West Supp. 1996); Iowa Code Ann. 668A.1 (West 1992); Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3701(c) (1995); Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.184; Minn. Stat. Ann. 549.20(a) (West 1996); Miss. Code Ann. 11-1-65(1)(a) (1995); Mont. Code Ann. 27-1-221(5) (1991); Nev. Rev. Stat. Ann. 42.005 (Michie 1995); N.J. Stat. Ann. 2A:15-5.12 (West Supp. 1996); N.C. Gen. Stat. 1D-15(b) (1995); N.D. Cent. Code 32-03.2-11 (Supp. 1995); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2307.80 (products liability cases); id. 2315.21(c)(3) (all other tort actions); Okla. Stat. Ann. tit. 23, 9(A) (West 1987); Or. Rev. Stat. 18.537; S.C. Code Ann. 15-33-135 (Law. Co-op. 1993); S.D. Codified Laws 60-3701(c) (Michie 1993); Utah Code Ann. 78-18-1(a) (1992). The state of Colorado raised the burden of proof to "beyond a reasonable doubt" before punitive damages can be imposed. See Colo. Rev. Stat. Ann. 13-25-127(2) (West 1989). The state of Maryland requires proof of actual malice. See Md. Code Ann., Cts. & Jud. Proc. 3-504(b) (1995); see also Owens-Illinois, Inc. v. Zenobia, 601 A.2d 633, 653 (Md. 1992) (holding that proof of actual malice is required to award punitive damages).

n66. See, e.g., Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2307.801(B); Or. Rev. Stat. 30.925(2); Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. 41.011(a), 41.012 (West 1997).

n67. See supra note 65 and accompanying text.

REV_00263281

n68. See, e.g., Colo. Rev. Stat. Ann. 13-21-102 (West Supp. 1996) (stating that punitive damage awards cannot exceed compensatory damages); Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. 52-240(b); Fla. Stat. Ann. 768.73(1) (West 1992 & Supp. 1993) (limiting punitive damages to three times compensatory damages unless plaintiff proves by clear and convincing evidence that higher award is not excessive); 735 Ill. Comp. Stat. 5/2-1115.05(a) (limiting punitive damages to three times economic damages); Ind. Code Ann. 34-4-34-4; Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3701; Mont. Code Ann. 27-1-221; Nev. Rev. Stat. Ann. 42.005 (imposing $ 300,000 cap on punitive damages when actual damages are less than $ 100,000); N.J. Stat. Ann. 2A:15-5.14 (b) (limiting punitive damages to five times compensatory damages or $ 350,000, whichever is greater); N.C. Gen. Stat. 1D-25(b) (capping punitive damages at greater of three times compensatory damages or $ 250,000); N.D. Cent. Code 32-03.2-11(4) (stating that punitive damages cannot exceed two times compensatory damages or $ 250,000, whichever is greater); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2307.80; Okla. Stat. Ann. tit. 23, 9; Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. 41.007 (capping punitive damages at greater of $ 200,000 or four times compensatory damages); Va. Code Ann. 8.01-38.1 (Michie 1992) (capping all punitive damages at $ 350,000). But see Ga. Code Ann. 51-12-5.1(e)(1) ("In a tort case in which the cause of action arises from product liability, there shall be no limitation regarding the amount which may be awarded as punitive damages.") (emphasis added). Georgia does, however, offer defendants some protection in that only one punitive award can be recovered for any act regardless of the number of separate causes of action that might arise from that act. See id. 51-12-5.1(e)(1). Although this may aid corporations being sued in Georgia, it has no bearing on actions brought in other states, because Georgia's power to legislate stops at its borders. See supra notes 14-15 and accompanying text (discussing national scope of tort award problems).

n69. See, e.g., 735 Ill. Comp. Stat. 5/2-2107 (stating that if defendant's conduct "was approved by or was in compliance with standards set forth in an applicable federal or state statute or in a regulation" then no punitive damages may be awarded); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2307.80 (compliance with FDA regulations bars punitive damage awards); 1987 Tex. Gen. Laws 81.008 (same). But see Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727, 735-36 (Minn. 1980) (holding that compliance with minimal federal standards of product flammability testing in children's clothing materials does not preclude award of punitive damages).

n70. See, e.g., BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1604 (1996) (due process challenge); Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415, 418 (1994) (procedural due process challenge); TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 446 (1993) (procedural and substantive due process challenge); Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 7 (1990) (procedural due process challenge); Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 276-77 (1989) (due process and excessive fines challenge); Paul M. Sykes, Note, Marking a Road to Nowhere? Supreme Court Sets Punitive Damages Guideposts in BMW v. Gore, 75 N.C. L. Rev. 1084, 1086 n.9 (1997) (listing recent Supreme Court decisions involving constitutional challenges to punitive damages awards).

n71. See U.S. Const. amend. V ("Nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb...."); U.S. Const. amend. VII ("In Suits at common law ... no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law."); U.S. Const. amend. VIII ("Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed...."); U.S. Const. amend. XIV, 1 ("Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law....").

n72. See, e.g., Haslip, 499 U.S. at 41 (Kennedy, J., concurring) (urging legislators to consider measures that address size and unpredictability of punitive damages awards).

n73. 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996).

REV_00263282

n74. See BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1602-03 (1996) ("As in Haslip, [499 U.S. 1 (1991),] we are not prepared to draw a bright line marking the constitutionally acceptable punitive damages award. Unlike that case, however, we are fully convinced that the grossly excessive award imposed in this case transcends the constitutional limit."). At least a majority of the Court held that the award was unconstitutionally excessive. Unfortunately, the Justices are no more uniform in their views regarding the regulation of punitive damage awards than the 50 states. See Timothy S. Lykowski, Tightening the Constitutional Noose Around Punitive Damages Challenges: TXO, What It Means, and Suggestions That Address Remaining Concerns, 68 S. Cal. L. Rev. 203, 228-38 (1994) (providing comparative analysis of various Supreme Court Justices' approaches to punitive damages awards including Justice Scalia's "traditional approach," Justice Stevens' "reasonableness" approach, Justice Kennedy's "comparative" approach, and Justice O'Connor's "most limiting" approach).

n75. U.S. Const. amend. V.

n76. 490 U.S. 435 (1989).

n77. United States v. Halper, 490 U.S. 435, 446 (1989).

n78. See id. at 437-38.

n79. See id. at 448-49. The Court held that if the civil payment had been remedial, as opposed to punitive, it would have been constitutional. See id.

n80. Id. at 451.

n81. See infra notes 90-96 and accompanying text (considering Double Jeopardy Clause implications of splitting plaintiffs' damage awards in light of growing state efforts to recoup portions of punitive damage awards into state treasuries and victims' compensation funds); see also Clay R. Stevens, Comment, Split-Recovery: A Constitutional Answer to the Punitive Damages Dilemma, 21 Pepp. L. Rev. 857, 885 (1994) (arguing that Court in Halper implicitly suggested that split recovery of punitive damages implicates Double Jeopardy Clause).

n82. See Stevens, supra note 81, at 884.

n83. U.S. Const. amend. VIII.

n84. 492 U.S. 257 (1989).

n85. See Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 260 (1989). Until 1980, Browning-Ferris was the sole provider of roll-off waste collection service (large scale trash removal) in Burlington, Vermont. See id. That year, a former Browning-Ferris local manager entered the market himself, creating a company named Kelco. See id. Kelco had 40% of the roll-off waste market within one year and 43% within two years. See id. When Browning-Ferris was unable to buy out its only competition, the company reacted by trying to drive Kelco out of business by cutting its price by 40% for all new business. See id. Browning-Ferris' regional vice-president ordered the Burlington office to "put [Kelco] out of business. Do whatever it takes. Squish him like a bug." Id. A salesman in the Burlington office was told to put Kelco out of business, being instructed that if "it means give the stuff away, give it away." Id. at 260-61. Kelco brought suit against Browning-Ferris alleging that Browning-Ferris' illegal pricing strategy violated section 2 of the Sherman Act. See id. at 261. A Vermont jury found that Browning-Ferris tried to monopolize the roll-off waste disposal market by interfering with Kelco's contractual relations and awarded Kelco $ 51,000 in compensatory damages (later trebled) and $ 6 million in punitive damages. See id. at 260-

REV_00263283

I. Punitive Damages

A. The Nature and Purpose of Punitive Damages

Punitive damages long have been a part of American common law, [17] as they were a part of the preceding English common law. [18] The debate regarding the legitimacy of the punitive damages doctrine has been raging since the doctrine's inception. [19] Punitive damages, [*1579] unlike compensatory damages, [20] are "awarded against a [manufacturer] to punish [it] for outrageous conduct and to deter [it] and others like [it] from similar conduct in the future." [21] Although the general nature of tort law is a "private right," punitive damages are a "public remedy" for a "public wrong." [22] In this way, punitive damages are state-imposed penalties for anti-social conduct, protecting society by imposing penalties on manufacturers for their conscious, flagrant indifference to human safety. [23] Because compensatory damages alone would be insufficient, [24] punitive damages are needed to [*1580] punish guilty wrongdoers and to deter the future misconduct of manufacturers. [25] Punitive damages are intended as both a specific deterrent, so that the offending defendant will not repeat her misconduct, as well as a general deterrent, so that others will be dissuaded from engaging in similar misconduct.

Punitive damage awards are quasi-criminal sanctions imposed on the wrongdoer to punish misconduct and to deter similar offensive conduct by the defendant and other potential wrongdoers. [26] "The concept of punitive damages lies in the borderland that both bridges and separates criminal law and torts." [27] These awards are not really damages at all; they serve the same purpose as fines and penalties. [28] "The very labels given "punitive' or "exemplary' damages, as well as the rationales that support them, demonstrate that they share key characteristics of criminal sanctions." [29] Punitive damages are civil payments imposed to punish or deter [30] socially reprehensible [*1581] conduct that places public safety in jeopardy. [31]

B. Arriving at a Proper Punitive Damage Award

Two issues have been the subject of much debate in assessing a punitive damage award: (1) the factors that the decision-maker should take into account when determining the amount of punitive damages to award; and (2) whether the judge or jury should determine the amount of the award and at what point in the proceeding it should be determined.

1. Factors to be considered in determining the amount of punitive damages to award

Many factors can be taken into account when assessing a punitive damage award. Some states have legislated the factors that should be considered by the fact-finder when determining the amount of punitive damages. In Kansas, for example, where the judge, not the jury, determines the amount of punitive damages to award, the court may consider:

(1) The likelihood at the time of the alleged misconduct that serious harm would arise from the defendant's misconduct;

(2) the degree of the defendant's awareness of that likelihood;

(3) the profitability of the defendant's misconduct; [*1582]

REV_00263248

61.

n86. See id. at 260. The court found this interpretation consistent with the intent of the Framers, which was to place limits on the powers of the new government. See id. at 266.

n87. Id. at 264 (emphasis added).

n88. See Stephen R. McAllister, A Pragmatic Approach to the Eighth Amendment and Punitive Damages, 43 U. Kan. L. Rev. 761, 780-87 (1995) (arguing that Excessive Fines Clause should apply where states require that a percentage of a punitive damage award be paid into the state treasury or to a state-sponsored fund).

n89. See Browning-Ferris, 492 U.S. at 276 n.21 ("We leave [this] question open for purposes of the Eighth Amendment's Excessive Fines Clause.").

n90. See, e.g., Colo. Rev. Stat. Ann. 13-21-102(4) (repealed 1995) (one-third of all punitive damage awards must be paid into state treasury); Fla. Stat. Ann. 768.73(2)-(4) (West Supp. 1992) (thirty-five percent of punitive damage awards must be paid into state funds); Ga. Code Ann. 51-12-5.1(e)(2) (1993 & Supp. 1997) (seventy-five percent of all punitive damage awards are paid into state treasury); 735 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 5/2-1207 (West Supp. 1996) (statute allows trial court to apportion punitive damage award between plaintiff, his attorney, and State's Department of Rehabilitation at its discretion); Iowa Code Ann. 668A.1(1)-(2) (West 1987) (statute requires that seventy-five percent of punitive damage award be paid into civil fund); Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3402(e) (1994) (fifty percent of all punitive damage awards in medical malpractice cases must be paid into state treasury); Mo. Ann. Stat. 537.675.2 (West Supp. 1992) (fifty percent of punitive damage award paid to the Tort Victims Compensation Fund); N.Y. C.P.L.R. 8701 (McKinney Supp. 1995) (statute requires that 20% of punitive damage awards be paid to state); Or. Rev. St. 18.540 (1994) (after plaintiff's attorney fees have been paid, 50% of remaining punitive damage award will go to state's Criminal Injuries Compensation Fund); Utah Code Ann. 78-18-1(3) (1992) (after plaintiff's attorney fees and court costs have been paid, 50% of punitive damage award in excess of $ 20,000 will go to state's General Fund). In a 1992 amendment, the state of Florida reduced its portion of the punitive damage award from 60% to 35% to prevent the state's take from discouraging lawyers who work on a contingency basis from pursuing cases where the recovery would almost exclusively be punitive damages (a case with low compensatory damages - such as an injured homemaker without lost wages). See Fla. Stat. Ann. 768.73(2)(b) (West Supp. 1992).

n91. See supra note 90 and accompanying text.

n92. See, e.g., E. Jeffrey Grube, Note, Punitive Damages: A Misplaced Remedy, 66 S. Cal. L. Rev. 839, 845-55 (1993) (arguing that windfalls from punitive damage awards could go directly to states without undermining deterrent rationale); Leo M. Stepanian II, Comment, The Feasibility of Full State Extraction of Punitive Damage Awards, 32 Duq. L. Rev. 301, 327-28 (1994) (arguing in favor of awarding punitive damages directly to the state instead of the plaintiff). But see James D. Ghiardi, Punitive Damages: State Extraction Practice Is Subject to Eighth Amendment Limitations, 26 Tort & Ins. L.J. 119, 130-31 (1990) (maintaining that awarding punitive damages to state brings these awards within purview of Eighth Amendment's Excessive Fines Clause, which may result in them being held unconstitutional).

n93. The plaintiff already has received full compensation for her injuries through compensatory damages. Allowing the plaintiff to keep a punitive damage award, therefore, provides the plaintiff with a windfall. See Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 841 (2d Cir. 1967) (denying punitive damage award when evidence was insufficient to meet New York recklessness requirement and citing increased government regulation, criminal penalties, and compensatory awards as sufficient deterance measures); Molenaar v. United n94. See Harris, supra note 22, at 1102 (stating that punitive damages are concerned with injuries to community). Commentators also have argued that if the state were awarded all punitive damage awards, it would increase the number of times parties settled and thereby reduce litigation of these types of cases. See Stepanian, supra note 92, at 325-27. Full state extraction enhances the incentive to settle because plaintiffs likely would settle for any amount greater than their compensatory damages. This result is based on the premise that plaintiffs would be able to keep the money in excess of compensatory damages, whereas that excess amount would go to the state if the case went to trial. See id.

REV_00263284

Cattle Co., 553 N.W.2d 424, 427 (Minn. App. 1996) ("State legislatures have imposed other reforms, such as avoiding a windfall by requiring the punitive damages to be paid to the state rather than a litigant."); see also Note, An Economic Analysis of Plaintiff's Windfall from Punitive Damage Litigation, 105 Harv. L. Rev. 1900, 1907-08 (1992) (arguing that punitive damage awards create plaintiff windfalls leading to inefficient economic results and proposing legislative response requiring payment to state fund). But see Stevens, supra note 81, at 908 n.77 ("The plaintiff is not completely undeserving because she must expend time, effort, and money as the catalyst who brings the defendant to justice for the sake of society.").

n95. See McBride v. General Motors Corp., 737 F. Supp. 1563, 1569-70, 1578 (M.D. Ga. 1990) (finding that state statute allocating 75% of all products liability punitive damage awards to state was a violation of Excessive Fines Clause and was a violation of due process and equal protection because it applied only to product liability suits); Kirk v. Denver Publ'g Co., 818 P.2d 262, 272 (Co. 1992) (holding that state statute that required one third of punitive damage award to be paid to public treasury was unconstitutional taking under both United States and Colorado Constitutions because punitive damage judgment is private property right); Gordon v. State, 585 So. 2d 1033, 1035-38 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1991), aff'd, 608 So. 2d 800 (Fla. 1992) (finding Florida provision apportioning punitive damage awards between plaintiff and state constitutional because a plaintiff does not have a cognizable right to recover punitive damages); see also Burke v. Deere & Co., 780 F. Supp. 1225, 1242 (S.D. Iowa 1991) (holding that state statute that requires portion of punitive award to be paid to civil reparations fund administered by courts does not provide state with any interest in award and, therefore, does not implicate Eighth Amendment concerns), rev'd, 6 F.3d 497 (8th Cir. 1993); Fuller v. Preferred Risk Life Ins. Co., 577 So. 2d 878, 887 (Ala. 1991) (Shores, J., concurring) (suggesting that court has inherent power to apportion punitive damages between plaintiff and state general fund or "some special fund that serves a public purpose or advances the cause of justice"); Shepard Components, Inc. v. Brice Petrides-Donohoe & Assocs., Inc., 473 N.W.2d 612, 619 (Iowa 1991) (requiring 75% of punitive damage award to be paid to state does not violate due process or equal protection because plaintiffs do not have vested property rights in punitive damage awards).

n96. See Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp. v. Dudley, 667 So. 2d 783, 783 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App.) (per curiam), cert. denied, 116 S. Ct. 2498 (1996) (affirming without comment trial court verdict awarding $ 4.06 million in compensatory damages, $ 8.25 million in punitive damages, and $ 3320 in plaintiff's costs in asbestos personal injury action).

n97. See BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1591-92 (1996) (providing three "guideposts" used to indicate the excessiveness of a punitive damage award: (1) the degree of reprehensibility of defendant's conduct; (2) the ratio between plaintiff's compensatory damages and the punitive damage award; and (3) the difference between the award and the civil or criminal sanctions that could be imposed for comparable misconduct). The "guideposts" articulated in BMW look surprisingly similar to the considerations Justice O'Connor proposed in her dissent in Browning-Ferris. Justice O'Connor stated:

First, the reviewing court must accord "substantial deference" to legislative judgments concerning appropriate sanctions for the conduct at issue. Second, the court should examine the gravity of the defendant's conduct and the harshness of the award of punitive damages. Third, because punitive damages are penal in nature, the court should compare the civil and criminal penalties imposed in the same jurisdiction for different types of conduct, and the civil and criminal penalties imposed by different jurisdictions for the same or similar conduct.

REV_00263285

Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 301 (1989) (O'Connor, J., dissenting).

n98. Browning-Ferris, 492 U.S. at 279.

n99. See BMW, 116 S. Ct. at 1595 ("Only when an award can fairly be categorized as "grossly excessive' ... does it enter the zone of arbitrariness that violates the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.").

n100. In addition to its analysis under the Eighth Amendment, Browning-Ferris is significant for its foreshadowing of substantive due process review of punitive damage awards. Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, issued a concurring opinion expressing his belief that the Due Process Clause imposes both procedural and substantive limitations on punitive awards. See Browning-Ferris, 492 U.S. at 280-81 (Brennan, J., concurring). Justice Brennan actually suggested the "grossly excessive" test, which subsequently was endorsed by the Court. See id. at 281 (Brennan, J., concurring). Justice O'Connor, joined by Justice Stevens, dissented on the Excessive Fines Clause issue and agreed with Justice Brennan regarding the substantive limitations imposed by the Due Process Clause. See id. at 283 (O'Connor, J., dissenting).

n101. U.S. Const. amend XIV, 1.

n102. See infra note 186 and accompanying text.

n103. 499 U.S. 1 (1991).

n104. See Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 18 (1991) ("We cannot say that the common-law method for assessing punitive damages is so inherently unfair as to deny due process and be per se unconstitutional.").

n105. Id.

n106. See id. at 4.

n107. See id. at 5. An arrangement was made for Union Fidelity to send its billings for the city's health insurance premiums to Ruffin at one of Pacific Mutual's branch offices. See id. Once recieved, Ruffin was responsible for remitting the payments to Union Fidelity. See id.

n108. See id.

n109. See id. The cancellation notices never were forwarded to the city. See id.

n110. See id. The insurance company refused to extend coverage to Haslip and, as a result of her inability to pay, her doctors placed the account with a collection agency, adversely affecting Haslip's credit. See id.

n111. See id. Ruffin was sued individually and as a proprietorship, and Pacific Mutual was sued under a theory of respondeat superior. See id.

REV_00263286

n112. See id. at 6-7. The jury was instructed that if it found the defendants liable for fraud, it could award punitive damages to the plaintiff. See id. at 6. The jury also was directed to take into consideration "the character and the degree of the wrong as shown by the evidence and necessity of preventing similar harm" when fixing the amount. Id. at 6 n.1.

n113. See Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 553 So. 2d 537 (Ala. 1989), aff'd, 499 U.S. 1 (1991). The Alabama Supreme Court determined that the trial judge appropriately had reviewed the punitive damages awarded by the jury, held a hearing, and set forth on the record the reasons why he felt the law did not authorize a remittur. See id. at 543.

n114. See Haslip, 499 U.S. at 21, 23-24. "This appellate review makes certain that the punitive damages are reasonable in their amount and rational in light of their purpose to punish what has occurred and deter its repetition." Id. at 21.

n115. Id. at 21-22. The Supreme Court reiterated the criteria set forth by the Alabama Supreme Court in Hammond v. City of Godsen, 493 So. 2d 1374, 1379 (Ala. 1986), for determining whether a punitive award is excessive or inadequate. See Haslip, 499 U.S. at 20.

n116. 419 S.E.2d 870 (W. Va. 1992), aff'd, 509 U.S. 443 (1993).

n117. See TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 419 S.E.2d 870, 888 (W. Va. 1992), aff'd, 509 U.S. 443 (1993). According to the court, "really stupid defendants" are those who have harmed victims unintentionally as a result of extreme carelessness. See id. The court held that in those "really stupid" cases, punitive damages generally should be limited to five times the compensatory damages. See id. at 889.

n118. See id. at 889. "Really mean defendants" are those who have committed intentional acts that they knew were harmful. See id. The court held that in these cases, punitive damages that are 500 times compensatory damages are not per se unreasonable. See id.

n119. See id. at 887-88. The court held that when actual compensatory damages are minimal and the potential for harm from defendant's stupidity was great, a punitive award exceeding five times the compensatory award may be justified. See id. at 889.

n120. See id. Because the type of fraudulent action intentionally undertaken by the defendant could have caused millions of dollars in damages to other victims, the court found the defendant within the "really mean" category and, consequently, subject to substantial punitive damages. See id.

n121. See TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 447-49 (1993).

n122. See id. at 447 (quoting TXO, 419 S.E.2d at 875). TXO would pay Alliance $ 20 per acre in cash, 22% of the oil and gas revenues in royalties, and all of the development costs as part of the "phenomenal" offer. See id.

n123. See id. at 448.

n124. See id.

n125. See id. at 449.

n126. See id.

n127. See id. at 449-50.

REV_00263287

n128. See id. at 450.

n129. See id. at 450-51. Alliance introduced evidence that TXO had been caught in four similar instances of fraud and misrepresentation preceding the activities in this case. See TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 419 S.E.2d 870, 881-83 (W. Va. 1992), aff'd, 509 U.S. 443 (1993); see also Sandra L. Nunn, The Due Process Ramifications of Punitive Damages, 63 U. Cin. L. Rev. 1029, 1032 n.22 (1995) (discussing videotaped depositions of four attorneys concerning matters in which TXO and each of its clients were involved).

n130. See TXO, 509 U.S. at 451.

n131. TXO, 419 S.E.2d at 889-90. In deciding whether the $ 10 million punitive damage award in this case met the "reasonable relationship" test under West Virginia law, the court considered three factors: "(1) the potential harm that TXO's actions could have caused; (2) the maliciousness of TXO's actions; and, (3) the penalty necessary to discourage TXO from undertaking such endeavors in the future." Id. at 889.

n132. See TXO, 509 U.S. at 462.

n133. See id. at 458.

n134. See id. at 462. The Supreme Court held that "the disparity between the punitive award and the potential harm does not, in our view, "jar one's constitutional sensibilities.'" Id. (quoting Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 18 (1991)). The Court held that the "dramatic disparity" is not dispositive in light of the potential harm to which Alliance was subject, TXO's bad faith, TXO's wealth, and the fact that TXO had a long standing pattern of fraud, trickery, and deceit. See id.

n135. See id. at 460. The Supreme Court noted that the "shocking disparity" stressed by TXO dissipates when one considers the possible loss of royalties payments to Alliance had TXO succeeded in its wrongful plan. See id. at 462.

n136. A "dramatic disparity" between actual damages and punitive damages (even one 526 times the actual damages) is not determinative of excessiveness in light of other factors involved in the case. See id. at 459-62.

n137. See Nunn, supra note 129, at 1085 (recognizing that because the Supreme Court's line of constitutional impropriety moves on a case-by-case basis, "exactly what will cause a punitive damages award to cross this moving line in a given case remains unanswered").

n138. 512 U.S. 415 (1994).

n139. See Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415, 435 (1994).

n140. See id. at 418.

n141. See id.

n142. See id.

n143. See id.

n144. See id. at 430-32. Although Oregon provides pre-verdict safeguards against arbitrary awards, the safeguards do not protect the defendant adequately from the possibility that juries may disregard specific instructions and may impose excessive punitive damages. See

REV_00263288

id. at 429.

n145. See id. at 426.

n146. 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996).

n147. See BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1593-94 (1996). Apparently, Gore requested that the jury award punitive damages in the amount of $ 4000 for each of the approximately 1000 partially refinished cars that BMW sold as new during a ten-year period, even though many of these sales took place outside the state and in states where it was not illegal to withhold this information from the customer. See Brief for Petitioner at 7, BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996) (No. 94-896), available in 1995 WL 126508.

n148. See BMW, 116 S. Ct. at 1595. The Alabama Supreme Court found that the jury improperly included sales outside the state in computing the amount of punitive damages. See id. The court held that the state could not punish BMW for acts that occurred outside state borders. See id. The court determined that a $ 2 million punitive damage award would be "constitutionally reasonable" under the circumstances. See id.

n149. See id. at 1592-93.

n150. See id. at 1604. The Court held: "Only when an award can fairly be categorized as "grossly excessive' in relation to [the state's legitimate interests in punishment and deterrence] does it enter the zone of arbitrariness that violates the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment." Id. at 1595.

n151. See id. at 1598-99. In his concurrence, Justice Breyer, articulated seven factors that appellate courts should use to determine whether a punitive damage award is grossly excessive: (1) the award must bear a "reasonable relationship" to the harm that is likely to occur from defendant's conduct as well as the harm that actually has occurred; (2) the "degree of reprehensibility" of defendant's conduct; (3) the award must "remove the profit" of the illegal activity; (4) the financial condition of the defendant; (5) the costs of the litigation and the state's desire to encourage plaintiffs to bring wrongdoers to trial; (6) whether criminal sanctions have been imposed; and (7) whether other civil actions have been filed against this defendant for the same conduct. See id. at 1606-07 (Breyer, J., concurring) (citing Green Oil Co. v. Hornsby, 539 So. 2d 218, 223-24 (Ala. 1989)).

n152. See id. at 1610 (Scalia, J., dissenting). Justice Scalia stated, "Since the Constitution does not make that concern any of our business, the Court's activities in this area are an unjustified incursion into the province of state governments." See id. (Scalia, J., dissenting). Justice Ginsburg, joined by the Chief Justice, also dissented on federalism grounds with Justice Ginsburg arguing that the Court was encroaching on decisions more appropriately left to the states. See id. at 1614 (Ginsburg, J., dissenting).

n153. See id. at 1610-11 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

n154. Id. at 1611 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

n155. See id. at 1611-12 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

n156. See id. at 1612 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (internal citations omitted).

n157. See id. at 1613 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

n158. See supra note 156 and accompanying text.

REV_00263289

n159. See BMW, 116 S. Ct. at 1613 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (noting that loophole in guideposts will cause state courts to uphold large awards for the protection of consumers).

n160. See infra note 163 and accompanying text (explaining why current system does not work).

n161. See Marcia Coyle, Punies Decision Gives Business Potent Ammo, Nat'l L.J., June 3, 1996, at A11.

n162. See infra notes 317-21 and accompanying text (explaining that statutory and regulatory penalties offer only minimum standards and are often outdated because of rapidly changing technology).

n163. See Teresa Moran Schwartz, Prescription Products and the Proposed Restatement (Third), 61 Tenn. L. Rev. 1357, 1385 (1994) [hereinafter Schwartz, Prescription Products] (declaring that tort system takes over when regulation fails). Regulation often is inadequate to police corporate wrongdoing because: (1) regulatory agencies are understaffed and underfunded; (2) the regulations are outdated; (3) there is generally a "lag time" between technological advances and regulations to cover those advances; and (4) regulatory violations often are difficult to police. The tort system in general and punitive damage awards in particular play a vital role in policing corporate wrongdoing when the agencies and regulations fall short. See generally Teresa Moran Schwartz, The Impact of the New Products Liability Restatement on Prescription Products, 50 Food & Drug L.J. 399, 405-06 (1995) [hereinafter Schwartz, Impact of the New Restatement] (describing lack of clarity in current FDA regulations); Schwartz, Prescription Products, supra, at 1385-87 (explaining how regulations and tort system can work together to deter unsafe practices); Teresa Moran Schwartz, Punitive Damages and Regulated Products, 42 Am. U. L. Rev. 1335, 1343-44 (1993) [hereinafter Schwartz, Punitive Damages] (detailing judicial treatment of regulations and listing concerns about process); Teresa Moran Schwartz, The Role of Federal Safety Regulations in Products Liability Actions, 41 Vand. L. Rev. 1121, 1146-52 (1988) [hereinafter Schwartz, Products Liability] (articulating reasons why federal regulatory standards do not work).

n164. See Lykowski, supra note 74, at 247 (citing factors that limit usefulness of comparison with criminal penalties).

n165. See id. (recognizing that tools such as maximum fine levels and imposition of fines per incident give judges "infinite flexibity" when determining damage award).

n166. See Peter A. Antonucci, BMW v. Gore: What Signal Is the Supreme Court Really Sending on Punitive Damages?, Nov. 22, 1996, available in 1996 WL 672396 (calling BMW and subsequent cases "the vehicles that will drive the next chapter in the nation's battle to reform the tort system").

n167. See supra note 156 and accompanying text (describing why Supreme Court's guideposts articulated in BMW are not helpful).

n168. See Marcia Coyle, Court Disposes of Punitives Lawsuits, Nat'l L.J., June 10, 1996, at A12 (speculating that cases with excessive awards would be remanded for application of guideposts).

n169. The Court remanded Ford Motor Co. v. Sperau, 116 S. Ct. 1843 (1996), Combustion Eng'g, Inc. v. Johansen, 116 S. Ct. 1843 (1996), and Apache Corp. v. Moore, 116 S. Ct. 1843 (1996).

REV_00263290

n170. See Mark I. Levy, High Court Takes Care of Business, Nat'l L.J., July 29, 1996, at C8 (suggesting that denial of review of cases means Justices see limits of decision).

n171. See S. Rep. No. 104-69, at 5-6 (1995) (calling current product liability litigation system "a lottery").

n172. See id. at 14 (stating that only federal legislation can create uniformity necessary in liability system).

n173. See Moran v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 691 F.2d 811, 816 (6th Cir. 1982) (awarding punitive damages to insulation installer for disease suffered due to asbestos).

n174. See In re Agent Orange Prod. Liab. Litig., 506 F. Supp. 762, 773-74 (E.D.N.Y. 1980) (barring chemical companies that produced Agent Orange from seeking contribution or indemnification from federal government).

n175. See Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 820 (1981) (awarding damages to individuals severely burned in Ford Pinto).

n176. See In re Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated and remanded on other grounds sub nom. Abed v. A.H. Robins Co., 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982).

n177. See Note, Class Actions for Punitive Damages, 81 Mich. L. Rev. 1787, 1791 (1983) (viewing multiple punitive damage awards as harmful because defendants' assets may be exhausted prematurely). Judge William W. Schwarzer explained to Congress how this problem may exist presently in asbestos litigation:

There are now some 100,000 asbestos cases pending in federal and state courts, and it is expected that over the next ten years an equal number will be filed. Considering that nearly every one of these cases includes a prayer for punitive damages, should such damages be awarded in many of these cases, the aggregate amount would be far in excess of what the defendants would be able to pay. Even without considering punitive damages, the compensation claims alone currently exceed the aggregate assets of the asbestos industry.

Asbestos Litigation Crisis in Federal and State Courts: Hearings Before the Subcomm. on Intellectual Property and Judicial Admin. of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 102d Cong. 137 (1992) (statement of Judge William W. Schwartzer, Director, Federal Judicial Center) (footnote omitted).

n178. See Judith Camile Glasscock, Comment, Emptying the Deep Pocket in Mass Tort Litigation, 18 St. Mary's L.J. 977, 993 (1987) (listing discontinuation of beneficial products as possible outcome of multiple punitive awards).

n179. 1 F.3d 1371 (3d Cir. 1993).

n180. See Dunn v. Owens-Corning Fiberglass, 774 F. Supp. 929, 933-34 (D.V.I. 1991).

n181. See Dunn v. Hovic, 1 F.3d 1371, 1373 (3d Cir. 1993). The Third Circuit remitted the punitive award to $ 1 million. See id.

n182. See id. at 1374.

REV_00263291

n183. See id. at 1389 (ruling that evidence produced by defendant fell short of due process violation).

n184. See id. at 1391 (suggesting that "punitive damages overkill" can be solved by scrutinizing past awards paid and ability of defendant to pay future awards). The defendant, however, may not always want to admit evidence concerning other punitive awards that have been imposed. On the one hand, evidence of prior awards of punitive damages could persuade the jury that the defendant already has received sufficient punishment for his act and that no further deterrence is necessary. See John A. Albers, Note & Comment, State of Confusion: Substantive and Procedural Due Process with Regard to Punitive Damages After TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 26 U. Tol. L. Rev. 159, 201 (1994) (acknowledging that previous punitive damage award payouts may promote sympathy for defendants). On the other hand, such evidence could infuriate the jury, demonstrating to them just how egregious others perceive the defendant's acts to be. See Dennis N. Jones, Multiple Punitive Damage Awards for a Single Course of Wrongful Conduct: The Need for a National Policy to Protect Due Process, 43 Ala. L. Rev. 1, 29-30 (1991) (noting that jury might decide to award similarly high damages).

n185. See Dunn, 1 F.3d at 1386 ("No single court can fashion an effective response to the national problem flowing from mass exposure to asbestos products."); see also Fischer v. Johns-Manville Corp., 512 A.2d 466, 480 (N.J. 1986) (admitting that courts are powerless in this area); Davis v. Celotex Corp., 420 S.E.2d 557, 565-66 (W. Va. 1992) (discussing unfairness in allowing courts to determine punitive damages).

n186. See Gary T. Schwartz, Mass Torts and Punitive Damages: A Comment, 39 Vill. L. Rev. 415, 422-23 (1994). Professor Schwartz argued:

This inappropriateness is seen as rooted in our legal system's norm against double jeopardy - let alone multiple jeopardy.... United States v. Halper seemingly indicates that the Double Jeopardy Clause does not pertain to private suits seeking punitive damages. Yet, whatever the limitations of the Excessive Fines Clause, when a punitive damage award becomes sufficiently excessive, it violates the substantive norms included in the Due Process Clause. (This point was raised by the Court as a possibility in Browning-Ferris, and was confirmed by the Supreme Court's later opinions in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance v. Haslip and TXO.) Similarly, the core of the prohibition against double jeopardy is probably included in the Due Process guarantee.

Id. (footnotes omitted).

n187. See Seltzer, supra note 26, at 55.

n188. See Juzwin v. Amtorg Trading Corp., 718 F. Supp. 1233, 1235 (D.N.J. 1989) (citing diversity of treatment by courts as reason not to have one-award rule), rev'd sub nom. Juzwin v. Asbestos Corp., 900 F.2d 686 (3d Cir. 1990). The Court pointed out:

This court does not have the power or the authority to prohibit subsequent awards in other courts, notwithstanding its opinion that such subsequent awards violate the due process rights of the defendants against whom such verdicts are entered. Until there is uniformity either through Supreme Court decision or national legislation, this court is powerless to fashion a remedy which will protect the due process rights of this defendant or other defendants similarly situated.

REV_00263292

Id. Congress once considered enacting a national "first comer" statute, but ultimately rejected this legislation because the first punitive award assessed against a defendant may not punish it sufficiently for its misconduct. See S. 44, 98th Cong. 12f (1984).

n189. See Juzwin, 718 F. Supp. at 1235 (realizing that jury instructions stating that punitive award must relate to actual harm suffered directly conflicted with "first-comer" statute that accounts for all of defendant's misconduct). Although it seems unfair that the first plaintiff gets the entire punitive damage award, the first plaintiff has the heaviest burden in bringing suit. Once the first plaintiff blazes a trail, it will be easier for others to follow. A punitive damage award is not a reward or compensation; it is not earned by the plaintiff. Rather, it is a punitive sanction against the defendant for misconduct.

n190. See id. (recognizing impossiblity of ensuring that one award covers all of defendant's misconduct).

n191. See Victor E. Schwartz & Mark A. Behrens, The American Law Institute's Reporters' Study on Enterprise Responsibility for Personal Injury: A Timely Call for Punitive Damages Reform, 30 San Diego L. Rev. 263, 281 (1993) (advocating proposal in which subsequent claimants could seek punitive damages only by presenting new evidence of defendants' "conscious and deliberate misconduct"); see also Punitive Damages Hearing, supra note 24, at 100 (testimony of Victor E. Schwartz, Esq., General Counsel, American Tort Reform Association) (agreeing with Senator Hatch's proposed solution to problem of multiple damage awards). Such evidence could include the fact that the defendant destroyed or hid damning evidence in the first trial. See id. at 102 (allowing further punishment of defendant in such instances).

n192. See, e.g., TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 472 (1993) (Scalia, J., concurring) (stating that punitive damage reform should be undertaken by "the proper institutions of our society," legislatures, not courts); Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 39 (1991) (Scalia, J., concurring) (noting that state and federal legislatures should work to restrict punitive damages); Dunn v. Hovic, 1 F.3d 1371, 1399 (3d Cir. 1993) (Weis, J., dissenting) ("Unquestionably, a national solution is needed."); Cantrell v. GAF Corp., 999 F.2d 1007, 1017 (6th Cir. 1993) (noting that relief from multiple punitive awards should be sought from legislature, not courts); Glasscock v. Armstrong Cork Co., 946 F.2d 1085, 1096-97 (5th Cir. 1991) (realizing problems in law as it stands); Edwards v. Armstrong World Indus., Inc., 911 F.2d 1151, 1155 (5th Cir. 1990) ("If no change occurs in our tort or constitutional law, the time will arrive when [a defendant's] liability for punitive damages imperils its ability to pay compensatory claims and its corporate existence."), rev'd sub nom. Celotex Corp. v. Edwards, 514 U.S. 300 (1995); Juzwin, 718 F. Supp. at 1235 (urging national legislation or Supreme Court decision to promote uniformity and protect due process rights); W.R. Grace & Co. v. Waters, 638 So. 2d 502, 505 (Fla. 1994) (noting that the only "realistic solution" to imposition of multiple punitive awards is "federal legislation").

n193. See John Calvin Jeffries, Jr., A Comment on the Constitutionality of Punitive Damage Awards, 72 Va. L. Rev. 139, 147 (1986) (explaining that repetitive nature of damages cannot be stopped unless national solution is attempted).

n194. See Ga. Code Ann. 51-12-5.1(e)(1) (Supp. 1996); see also Mo. Ann. Stat. 510.263 (4) (West Supp. 1997) (crediting defendant with prior punitive damage payments).

n195. See U.S. Const. art. I, 8 ("The Congress shall have Power ... To regulate Commerce

REV_00263293

(4) the duration of the misconduct and any intentional concealment of it;

(5) the attitude and conduct of the defendant upon discovery of the misconduct;

(6) the financial condition of the defendant; and,

(7) the total deterrent effect of other damages and punishment imposed upon the defendant as a result of the misconduct, including but not limited to, compensatory, exemplary and punitive damage awards to persons in situations similar to those of the claimant and the severity of the criminal penalties to which the defendant has been or may be subjected. [32]

In other states, the courts have fashioned the factors for consideration. [33] [*1583]

The many factors that legislators and judges have created can be reduced to three basic considerations: (1) the character of the defendant's act; (2) the nature and extent of the plaintiff's injuries; and (3) the defendant's wealth. [34] A jury considers the character of the defendant's act so that the punishment will bear some relationship to the wrong committed. [35] The jury is told to take into account the nature and extent of the plaintiff's injuries so that the punitive damages awarded will have a rational relationship to the injury caused. [36] The jury also is instructed to consider the financial position of the defendant so that the punitive damage award actually will punish and deter the defendant. [37] This third factor has been the subject of considerable criticism. [38] The rationale behind consideration of the defendant's financial position is that the [*1584] deterrent benefit of punitive awards will be unrealized if the award does not cause the defendant to suffer. [39] Wealthy defendants, therefore, might have to pay more than poor defendants for committing the exact same offense. [40] In theory, the defendant's wealth should be irrelevant because society is equally harmed when a poor defendant acts with flagrant indifference as it is when a rich one behaves indifferently. Despite the characterization of the wrong as a public wrong, the goals of punitive awards - punishment and deterrence - will not be effectuated equally when the penalty impacts defendants differently because of their financial status. The fact-finder must consider the defendant's wealth so that the damage award will have an equally punitive effect on all wrongdoers, because it takes more to punish a wealthy defendant than it does to punish a poor one. A multi-billion dollar corporation, like Exxon, for example, would not be punished or deterred by a $ 100,000 punitive damage award, but the same award could cripple a small business owner, like Joe's Gas Station. [41] To punish and deter manufacturers effectively and equitably, therefore, the financial status of the defendant should be a factor in determining the amount of punitive damages to award. [42] The defendant's wealth alone, however, should not justify [*1585] imposition of a disproportionately large punitive damage award. [43]

2. Who decides how much to award and when

Most states allow juries to determine the amount of punitive damage awards. [44] Judges, however, retain the power to remit or reverse the award if they believe that it reflects a prejudice or passion on the part of the jury. [45]

With regard to when punitive damages are determined, many states permit some form of bifurcation of the punitive damage issues. Illinois permits all issues related to punitive damages to be tried separately but by the same fact-finder at the defendant's request. [46] Other states, like Kansas and Montana, allow the jury in the first proceeding to determine whether to award punitive damages and then require a separate, second proceeding to determine the amount of such an award. [47] Some states have determined that evidence of the defendant's wealth should not be admitted until the separate proceeding on the amount of punitive damages, because such evidence tends to prejudice the jury. [48] Jurors tend to be biased [*1586] against large, wealthy corporations, particularly when the corporation does with foreign Nations, and among the several States...."); see also Punitive Damages Hearing, supra note 24, at 100 (testimony of Victor E. Schwartz, Esq., General Counsel, American Tort Reform Association) (noting that Congress should respond to the request by "federal and state judges, as well as state legislators," for multiple punitive damages fairness legislation).

REV_00263249

n196. U.S. Const. amend. VII.

n197. 116 S. Ct. 2211 (1996).

n198. See Gasperini v. Center for Humanities, Inc., 116 S. Ct. 2211, 2215 (1996).

n199. See Gasperini v. Center for Humanities, Inc., 66 F.3d 427, 428 (2d Cir.) (awarding $ 1500 for each lost slide), vacated, 116 S. Ct. 2211 (1996).

n200. See id. at 431.

n201. Gasperini, 116 S. Ct. at 2215 (questioning whether New York's practice of appellate review of jury awards is compatible with Seventh Amendment right to trial by jury).

n202. See id. at 2222-24. Gasperini was a major victory for the business community. Had the Court held that appellate review was not constitutional, there would be virtually no check on unbridled power of juries to award unjustified amounts of punitive damages. In 1992, an exhaustive punitive damage study of the 355 punitive damage awards in product liability cases over the 25 years preceding 1992 found that more than half of all punitive awards were appealed, and that more than half of those appealed were reversed or reduced. See Rustad, supra note 50, at 57. Absent the check of judicial review/remittitur, all of the awards determined to be unreasonable and excessive would have stood.

n203. See Gasperini, 116 S. Ct. at 2217-18 (citing "shock the conscience" as federal standard).

n204. See id. (citing "deviates materially" as N.Y. state standard). In its 1986 effort to reform tort law, New York codified a standard of judicial review on the size of jury verdicts. See N.Y. C.P.L.R. 5501(c) (McKinney 1995). According to the New York legislature, the federal "shock the conscience" test was an insufficient check on damages awards. Therefore, New York enacted a standard that would invite more careful appellate scrutiny of damage awards: "the appellate division shall determine that an award is excessive or inadequate if it deviates materially from what would be reasonable compensation." Id.

n205. See Gasperini, 116 S. Ct. at 2219-24 (examining Erie doctrine and ruling that Seventh Amendment does not preclude federal courts from using "deviates materially" standard).

n206. See id. at 2220-21 (acknowledging that the "twin aims" of the Erie doctrine, "discouragement of forum-shopping and avoidance of inequitable administration of the laws," forces such a decision (quoting Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 468 (1965))). Although the state law was procedural, the state's objective in enacting the law was substantive. See id. at 2220. If the federal courts continued to apply the federal standard to cases arising out of New York law, there would be a substantial difference in the outcome of the cases, thereby implicating the twin aims of Erie. See id.

n207. See id. at 2220-21 (stating that "abuse of discretion" is standard currently used by federal circuits when faced with assertion of inadequacy or excessiveness).

n208. See Robert Bork & Theodore Olson, Commentary, Trial Lawyers and Other Closet Federalists, Wash. Times, Mar. 9, 1995, at A21 (explaining that "litigation explosion disregards state lines"). Congressional power to regulate punitive damage awards in products liability cases comes from the Commerce Clause. See U.S. Const. art. I, 8 ("The Congress shall have the Power ... To regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States....").

REV_00263294

n209. See S. Rep. No. 104-69, at 1-2 (1995) (charging current liability system with stifling innovation and with keeping beneficial products off market).

n210. See id. at 2 (explaining that American companies are hampered by liability system when competing in global market). Research and development in American industry are being halted or discouraged by the threat of excessive punitive damage awards, thereby making American businesses less competitive in the international market. Consequently, the punitive damages problem is a direct threat to the economic stability of corporate America. See id. at 10-11; see also 141 Cong. Rec. S6398 (daily ed. May 10, 1995) (statement of Sen. Glenn) (advocating that legislation is needed to reform system). But see Product Liability Fairness Hearing, supra note 24, at 505 (statement of Stephen Daniels, Ph.D., American Bar Foundation) (challenging notion that punitive damages are source of problem). Proponents also claim that ultimately, consumers are paying for excessive punitive damage awards as companies will pass the burden onto the consumer in the form of higher prices for their goods and services. See 141 Cong. Rec. S6397 (daily ed. May 10, 1995) (statement of Sen. Domenici) (noting that Americans no longer can afford to pay tort tax).

n211. See S. Rep. No. 104-69, at 14-17 (1995) (providing history of tort reform legislation in Congress).

n212. See H.R. 956, 104th Cong. (1996); see also Otto G. Obermaier & Lee Dranikoff, Congressional Legislation Seeks Litigation Reform, N.Y. L.J., Oct. 23, 1995, at S1 (listing different pieces of legislation recently passed by Congress).

n213. See H.R. 956 2(b) (setting forth purposes of Act). If tort reform is as urgent as proponents claim, then it should be applicable to all cases in which punitive damages can be assessed. In 1996, product liability actions represented only 10% of all federal civil cases filed. See Annual Report of the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, Table C-2A, at 138 (1996). Limiting these reforms to product liability actions thus would not have the widespread impact some might expect.

n214. See H.R. 956, 102. The federal bill would not have preempted more restrictive state laws. See id. 108(b)(3)(D). The federal bill would have set only the minimum standards for reforming punitive damage awards. If the state law were more restrictive of punitive awards - for instance, if a state had a higher burden of proof, like Colorado where the burden is beyond a reasonable doubt, or if it had a lower cap, like Virginia where all punitive damage awards are capped at $ 350,000 - then the more restrictive state law would have continued to prevail in that jurisdiction. There was no logical reason supporting such a one-sided application of law. Certainly, the federal legislature was not doing this to preserve state sovereignty, because the bill would have preempted all those states which had less restrictive laws. Moreover, such a provision would have undermined the uniformity and predictability that would have been created by enacting a national law. A federal law would be most beneficial if it preempts all state laws, both those that are more restrictive and those that are more lenient. If the federal legislature insisted upon this one-sided preemption, however, it should have limited the law to cut-and-dry issues such as the amount of the cap, as opposed to issues involving more discretion and potential ambiguity such as the liability standard.

n215. See id. 108(a) (awarding punitive damages only if there is "clear and convincing" evidence of defendant's misconduct).

n216. Id.

REV_00263295

n217. See id. 108(b) (placing cap on punitive damage awards of two times economic and noneconomic loss or $ 250,000, whichever is greater).

n218. See id. 108(c) (permitting either party to request a separate proceeding, to be held after the determination of the amount of compensatory damages, on whether to award punitive damages and the amount of the award).

n219. See Veto Message from the President, 142 Cong. Rec. H4425 (daily ed. May 6, 1996). Many claim that Clinton is controlled by the American trial lawyers who do not want to limit runaway juries because it would reduce their earnings. See John F. Harris, Clinton Vetoes Products Liability Measure; Move Triggers Barrage of Accusations Between White House and Hill Republicans, Wash. Post, May 3, 1996, at A14 (quoting Bob Dole as saying, "It is the trial lawyers who are calling the shots at the White House."); see also John E. Yang, House Fails to Override Liability Veto, Wash. Post, May 10, 1996, at A23 (charging President Clinton with putting interests of trial lawyers before other Americans). Some also claim that the Republicans were not pushing tort reform very hard because it was an important GOP fund-raising tool, and in an election year, they wanted the manufacturers' lobby to keep funneling money their way. See T.R. Goldman, Tort Reform: What Happened, What's Next, Legal Times, July 8, 1996, at 1 (quoting GOP House staffer as saying, "If federal tort reform efforts had concluded in 1995 the influence of trial lawyer money on the Democratic presidential campaign would have been seriously eroded, and with it, a lucrative GOP fund-raising tool as well.").

n220. The use of, and demand for, excessive awards as a social reform tool has become too wide-spread. Multimillion dollar punitive awards have become the rule rather than the exception and as such, area threat to the viability of the manufacturing community and the stability of American industry.

n221. See Ellis, supra note 27, at 34-53 (arguing that vague punitive damage standards and broad jury discretion is unfair and inefficient).

n222. See id. at 56 (stating that uncertain criteria for arriving at punitive amounts invariably will lead to unpredictability and disparate awards); Owen, supra note 31, at 384 (noting that standards for determining defendant's liability and assessing punitive damages are too vague).

n223. The current punitive damage system leaves manufacturers without any definite notion of what conduct is prohibited and what punishment will be imposed. See Nadine E. Roddy, Punitive Damages in Strict Products Liability Litigation, 23 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 333, 347 (1981) (noting that manufacturers often contend that standards for punitive damages do not give proper notice). Without a clear idea of what conduct is prohibited, manufacturers cannot alter their behavior in order to be law abiding. As one commentator noted:

People cannot obey the law unless they know it; they cannot know the law unless they know which law to learn. If I am to know the law that governs an act or transaction, I must be able to identify, before I act, the one state empowered to govern. It is no answer to say that I can usually comply with the more restrictive rule, because that eliminates the political authority of the more permissive state. Nor is it an answer to say that I do not need to know rules of compensation, loss allocation, and the like. I believe that one should generally obey the applicable law even if the sanctions for violation are light, but this view is not universally shared. If we give even a little credence to the insights of law and economics, my need to know the law extends to rules that specify the consequences of compliance and violation.

REV_00263296

Douglas Laycock, Equal Citizens of Equal and Territorial States: The Constitutional Foundations of Choice of Law, 92 Colum. L. Rev. 249, 319 (1992) (footnotes omitted).

n224. See In re A.H. Robins Co., 880 F.2d 709, 730 n.29 (4th Cir. 1989).

Two goals of tort law should be predictability and uniformity. As a practical matter, until the legality of a particular course of conduct has been adjudicated, potential defendants are guided only by a general standard ... and by analogous cases decided under that standard. What may appear to be inconsistent adjudications in similar situations can generally be rationalized because of differences in the facts. But if various fact finders reach inconsistent conclusions about the same set of facts, the defendant (and others in similar circumstances) is left without any guidance concerning the legality of its conduct, which may serve important legitimate aims.

Id.

n225. See Robert D. Cooter, Punitive Damages for Deterrence: When and How Much?, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 1143, 1145 (1989) (mentioning that uncertain punitive damages are neither fair nor efficient).

n226. Martin A. Kloter, Reappraising the Jury's Role as a Finder of Fact, 20 Ga. L. Rev. 123, 127 (1985) (discussing idea that unpredictability impairs judicial process).

n227. See Friedrich August von Hayek, The Road to Serfdom 78 (1944) ("One could write a history of the decline of the Rule of Law ... in terms of the progressive introduction of these vague formulas into legislation and jurisdiction, and of the increasing arbitrariness and uncertainty of, and the consequent disrespect for, the law and the judicature."); see also Jason Scott Johnston, Uncertainty, Chaos, and the Torts Process: An Economic Analysis of Legal Form, 76 Cornell L. Rev. 341, 341 (1991) (noting that certainty is central concern of modern jurisprudence); Nancy Levit, Ethereal Torts, 61 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 136, 136-37 (1992) (stating that law involves search for order and predictability); Roscoe Pound, Justice According to Law, 13 Colum. L. Rev. 696, 705 (1913) (arguing that society administers justice according to law by fixing standards that individuals may determine prior to controversy, thereby providing reasonable assurance that all individuals receive similar treatment).

n228. See Note, Forum Shopping Reconsidered, 103 Harv. L. Rev. 1677, 1689 (1990) (stating that forum shopping is caused by disparate results among various state systems).

n229. Seventy percent of all products manufactured are sold in other states. See 142 Cong. Rec. S2560 (daily ed. Mar. 21, 1996) (statement of Sen. Rockefeller).

n230. The notions of fairness and justice require that individuals have notice as to what constitutes socially reprehensible conduct and as to the punishment for non-compliance. See BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1598-99 (1996) (explaining that fairness under Constitution requires notice of possible punishment).

n231. See supra notes 26-31 and accompanying text (discussing why punitive damages may be described as "quasi-criminal"); Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30, 59 (1983) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting) (discussing special legal categorization for punitive damages).

REV_00263297

n232. See discussion supra Part IV.B.

n233. See discussion supra Part IV.A.

n234. See H.R. 956, 104th Cong. 108(a) (1996); Model Act, supra note 9, 5(2).

n235. See supra notes 26-31 and accompanying text; see also Kenneth Mann, Punitive Civil Sanctions: The Middleground Between Criminal and Civil Law, 101 Yale L.J. 1795, 1810-13 (1992) (analyzing distinctions between criminal and civil penalties).

n236. But see Steven D. Smith, The Critics and the "Crisis": A Reassessment of Current Conceptions of Tort Law, 72 Cornell L. Rev. 765, 766 (1987) (rejecting restitutionary aspect of tort law, instead proposing dispute resolution as essential function of tort law).

n237. See In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 363-64 (1970).

n238. H.R. 956, 101(4).

n239. Id. 108(a) (emphasis added).

n240. See infra notes 241-42 (providing examples of differing approaches to punitive damages).

n241. Alabama's statute, for example, permits punitive damages "in a tort action where it is proven by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant consciously or deliberately engaged in oppression, fraud, wantonness, or malice with regard to the plaintiff." Ala. Code 6-11-20(a) (1993 & Supp. 1996). Florida's statute permits punitive damages for "willful, wanton, or gross misconduct." Fla. Stat. Ann. 768.73(1)(a) (West 1994 & Supp. 1995). Georgia allows punitive damages when "defendant's actions showed willful misconduct, malice, fraud, wantonness, oppression, or that entire want of care which would raise the presumption of conscious indifference to consequences." Ga. Code Ann. 51-12-5.1(b) (1982 & Supp. 1997). Illinois allows for punitive damage awards only when the "defendant's conduct was with evil motive or with reckless and outrageous indifference to a highly unreasonable risk of harm and with a conscious indifference to the rights and safety of others." Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann 5/2-1115.05(b) (West 1993). Mississippi permits the imposition of punitive damages for a wide range of conduct; the plaintiff must prove "that the defendant against whom punitive damages are sought acted with actual malice, gross negligence which evidences a willful, wanton or reckless disregard for the safety of others, or committed actual fraud." Miss. Code Ann. 11-1-65(1)(a) (Supp. 1996). Perhaps the broadest of all states' tort reform laws, Mississippi's statute allows punitive damages upon proof of anything from "actual malice," which implies a high degree of intentionality, to "gross negligence," which merely can be a reckless disregard of others. See id.

n242. Vagueness in the standard for awarding punitive damages is particularly destructive because these damages, standing somewhere between criminal and tort law, publicly condemn a defendant's actions as socially reprehensible. See David G. Owen, The Moral Foundations of Punitive Damages, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 705, 727-28 (1989) (noting that vague standard is harmful because damages often lead to public stigma and society should be certain such condemnation is appropriate).

n243. H.R. 956, 108(a). This also is the standard adopted by the Model Act recently approved by the uniform law commissioners. See Model Act, supra note 9, 5(2) (noting that "defendant acted with a malicious or fraudulent intent to cause the injury or a conscious and flagrant disregard for the rights or interests of others in causing the injury"). The single federal standard, however, is preferable to the Model Act standard which seems to articulate a number of different kinds of conduct that will give rise to punitive damages.

REV_00263298

n244. But see E. Donald Elliot, Why Punitive Damages Don't Deter Corporate Misconduct Effectively, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 1053, 1057-58 (1989) (arguing that "conscious indifference" standard is too vague).

n245. See Ellis, supra note 27, at 22-23 (arguing that even if standards for assessing punitive damages were consistent, any movement away from "purposeful harm" standard would be problematic).

n246. See Gregory J. Sexto, Corporate Insurability of Punitive Damages Arising from Employee Acts, 11 J. Corp. L. 99, 113 (1985) (observing that it is more difficult to deter unintentional conduct than intentional conduct).

n247. See H.R. 956, 108(c) (stating that bifurcation is permissible).

n248. See John T. Simpson, Jr., Discovery of Net Worth in Bifurcated Punitive Damages Cases: A Suggested Approach After Transportation Insurance Co. v. Moriel, 37 S. Tex. L. Rev. 193, 228 (1996) (asserting jury prejudice is negated because defendant's net worth is not admissible until jury finds defendant liable for punitive damages).

n249. See TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 419 S.E.2d 880, 889 (W. Va. 1992) (discussing role wealth should play in computing appropriate punitive award), aff'd, 509 U.S. 443 (1993).

n250. See Malcolm E. Wheeler, The Constitutional Case for Reforming Punitive Damages Procedures, 69 Va. L. Rev. 269, 272 (1983) (noting that bifurcation may be necessary to ensure due process protections). But see Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 17 (1991) (holding that common law method of determining punitive damages is not "so inherently unfair as to deny due process and be per se unconstitutional").

n251. See H.R. 956, 108(8). Economic losses are those actual out-of-pocket expenses suffered by the injured party such as medical bills and lost wages. See id.

n252. See id. 101(12). Noneconomic loss is pain and suffering or non-pecuniary damages. See id.

n253. See id. 108(b). The bill, however, contains an additur provision that permits a judge to raise a punitive damage award if the court determines that the statutory cap "would result in an award of punitive damages that is insufficient to punish the egregious conduct of the defendant against whom the punitive damages are to be awarded or to deter such conduct in the future." Id. 108(b)(3)(A). Although this provision attempts to placate those who oppose capping punitive damage awards, its constitutionality is suspect under existing precedent. See Dimick v. Schiedt, 293 U.S. 474, 495 (1935) (finding that additur could not be utilized by federal courts because procedure violates Seventh Amendment); see also Irene Deaville Sann, Remittiturs (and Additurs) in the Federal Courts: An Evaluation with Suggested Alternatives, 38 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 157, 163-64 (1987) (stating that federal courts may not add to jury awards because of possible Seventh Amendment violation). But see Gasperini v. Center for Humanities, Inc., 116 S. Ct. 2211, 2222 n.16 (1996) (hinting that federal additur soon may be held constitutional by Supreme Court, because four Justices in Dimick conceded that nothing in Seventh Amendment precludes federal court from forcing additur (citing Dimick, 293 U.S. at 495)).

There is no logical reason for the different constitutional treatment of additur and remittitur, and at least two states currently authorize judicial additur of punitive damage awards. See Mo. Ann. Stat. 510.263(6) (West Supp. 1997) ("The doctrines of remittitur and additur ...

REV_00263299

shall apply to punitive damage awards."); Tenn. Code Ann. 20-10-101(a)(10) (Supp. 1996) ("The trial judge may suggest an additur in such amount or amounts as the trial judge deems proper.").

n254. See Amelia J. Toy, Comment, Statutory Punitive Damage Caps and the Profit Motive: An Economic Perspective, 40 Emory L.J. 303, 323 (1991) (outlining argument of cap supporters and stating that corporations could be driven to bankruptcy unless statutory caps are imposed).

n255. It is hard to follow the argument that American competitiveness in the global marketplace is hampered by punitive awards. Foreign manufacturers that do business in the United States are subject to the same conditions as American manufacturers. Moreover, it seems that manufacturing better, safer products will improve American competitiveness far more than limiting punitive damage awards will.

n256. Conference Report on H.R. 956, Common Sense Product Liability Reform of 1996, 142 Cong. Rec. H3190 (daily ed. Mar. 29, 1996) (statement of Rep. Bliley).

n257. See Ausness, supra note 30, at 85-86 (stating that potential exposure to liability leads to significant social costs); Ellis, supra note 27, at 47 (noting that uncertainty as to amount of punitive damages causes considerable losses to society).

n258. See Patricia Cohen, The IUD: Birth-Control Device that the United States Market Won't Bear, Wash. Post, Aug. 6, 1996, at A1, A10 (observing that doctors in United States are reluctant to prescribe IUD devices even though they are freely prescribed and widely used in European markets).

n259. See id. (pointing out that some experts on women's health belive that IUD is excellent option for many women).

n260. See id. (stating that many manufacturers believe that introducing device to U.S. market is not worth potential exposure to liability).

n261. See BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1598-99 (1996) (discussing how common notions of fairness mandate that people receive fair notice of punishment they may face).

n262. See Rustad, supra note 50, at 83 (proposing that punitive damages do not harm American corporations any more than foreign corporations because both are subject to U.S. law); Product Liability Standards: Hearings on H.R. 1910 Before the Subcomm. on Commerce, Consumer Protection, and Competitiveness of the House Comm. on Energy and Commerce, 103d Cong. 329, 332 (1994) (statement of Andrew F. Popper, Professor of Law and Deputy Dean, Washington College of Law) (arguing that there is no tort crisis sufficient to justify congressional intervention). There does not seem to be sufficient objective evidence to conclude that American businesses are harmed as badly as cap supporters claim or that consumers are deprived of a large number of products by over-deterrence. Although it is beyond the scope of this Article, a great deal of empirical evidence is needed to support these claims. Without sufficient objective evidence, it is impossible to draw a conclusion either way. This Article, therefore, presumes that consumers lose out on some products when American businesses are hampered by large punitive damage awards.

n263. See Wilson, supra note 25, at 513-14 (indicating that punitive damages assist in deterring misconduct).

n264. See Associates Fin. Servs. Co. of Ala. v. Barbour, 592 So. 2d 191, 199 (Ala. 1991) (reciting reasoning of earlier case in which court found that only substantial monetary fines will ensure that purpose of punitive damages is carried out (quoting Rideout's-Brown Serv., Inc. v. Holloway, 397 So. 2d 125, 127 (Ala. 1981))) (citation omitted).

REV_00263300

n265. Although it may be true that the punitive damage system occasionally deprives the public of valuable products, it also protects the public from exposure to dangerous products. No remedy is perfect.

n266. See William M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, The Economic Structure of Tort Law 4-5 (1987) (discussing early thinking on tort law and positive economic theory). Judge Learned Hand articulated his famous negligence formula, B < PL, in United States v. Carroll Towing Co., 159 F.2d 169, 173 (2d Cir. 1947). According to Judge Hand, harmful activity should be deterred when the cost of that harm (L) multiplied by its probability (P) is greater than the cost of preventing the harm (B). Thus, if B < P there is no harmful activity. See id.; see also Richard A. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law 163-68 (1992) (explaining Judge Hand's formula for determining negligence liability).

n267. See Jerry J. Phillips, A Comment on Proposal for Determining Amounts of Punitive Awards, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 1117, 1118 (1989) (noting that cost-benefit analysis often is utilized when considering which activities and designs to avoid).

n268. See id. (stating that company will take action only if cost of such action is less than its potential benefits).

n269. See Landes & Posner, supra note 266, at 4-5 (discussing view that tort liability discourages behavior that is unjustified by utilitarian standards).

n270. Commentators have argued that punitive damages are inappropriate when the manufacturer weighed the costs and benefits of a particular activity and undertook the activity because the cost was less than the benefit. See Wheeler, supra note 62, at 953 (arguing that juries should be instructed to consider cost-benefit analysis in assessing liability). Such an argument presupposes that socially desirable conduct turns on a pure economic analysis of available options. This premise overlooks the fact that punitive damages are awarded to punish a manufacturer for socially reprehensible conduct. They are a form of regulation. Punitive damages are not awarded simply for economic inefficiency, because a corporation took an action even though costs exceed benefits; they are also awarded when potential societal costs exceed potential societal benefits. Societal costs and benefits cannot be measured purely in monetary terms. For example, under an economic efficiency analysis of the costs and benefits of excluding the rubber bladder from vehicle design, Ford properly concluded that it would be more economically efficient to exclude the bladder. See Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 174 Cal. Rptr. 348, 361 (1981). Despite the correctness of the economic analysis, few dispute the appropriateness of imposing damages for such conduct.

n271. See Grimshaw, 174 Cal. Rptr. at 361 (discussing design changes that were examined by Ford but rejected due to their additional expense). The plaintiffs were passengers in a Ford Pinto when it was rear-ended and burst into flames. See id. at 359. Plaintiff Gray died and Plaintiff Grimshaw suffered severe burns to his entire body. See id. The court found that Ford knew of the design defect in the Pinto and knew that the gas tank would explode in rear-end collisions even at low speeds. See id. at 361-62. Ford had conducted several crash tests that demonstrated the Pinto's susceptibility to fire. See id. at 385. Despite this knowledge, Ford chose not to correct the design problem after conducting a risk/benefit analysis. See id. at 361. Ford discovered that it would cost $ 11 per vehicle to install rubber bladders in 11 million Pintos and 1.5 million trucks, totaling $ 137 million; and it estimated that it would cost only $ 49.5 million if instead they paid the compensatory damages of the 360 people they anticipated would die or be injured in fires resulting from this design flaw. See Owen, supra note 28, at 56 n.264 (reproducing Grush-Saunby Report that Ford had prepared on costs and benefits of correcting Pinto's defective gas tank). Ford performed a straight forward cost-benefit analysis and chose the least expensive alternative. See Grimshaw, 174 Cal. Rptr. at 361. Grimshaw was awarded $ 2,516,000 in compensatory damages and $ 125 million in punitive damages, which the trial court reduced to $ 3.5 million. See id. at 358.

REV_00263301

n272. Conference Report on H.R. 956, Common Sense Product Liability Reform Act of 1996, 142 Cong. Rec. H3188 (daily ed. Mar. 29, 1996) (statement of Rep. Conyers, Jr.).

n273. Of course, the actual number of injuries will be much higher than those who actually sue Compact. Many injured individuals will not sue at all; some will collect from their insurance company or from the insurance company of the driver who rear-ended them. Only those plaintiffs or their attorneys who realize that there may have been a design defect in the car will bring suit against Compact.

n274. H.R. 956, 104th Cong. (1996).

n275. Although it is true that the federal bill did allow for additur in certain circumstances and, therefore, did not have an absolute cap, Congress' clearly expressed intent is that judges should do so only in the rarest of cases. See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 104-481, at 31 (1996).

n276. The statute provided for $ 250,000 or two times compensatory damages, whichever is greater. See H.R. 956, 108(b). In the case of the 100 burn deaths, where compensatory damages are estimated at $ 250,000, punitive damages would be two times the compensatory damages or $ 50 million.

n277. In the case of the 200 injured plaintiffs, $ 250,000 is more than two times their compensatory damages, which are only $ 100,000 in this example. Thus, each injured plaintiff would receive $ 250,000 for a total of $ 50 million.

n278. Of course, there is the loss of public confidence in the corporation and litigation expenses that add to the "expense" of committing socially reprehensible actions. In fact, one commentator has recommended that punitive damage awards and the reasons for the punishment be highly publicized to effectuate a more powerful social sanction. See Andrea A. Curcio, Painful Publicity - An Alternate Punitive Damages Sanction, 45 DePaul L. Rev. 341, 372 (1996) (arguing that publicizing corporate misconduct and resulting penalties on the Internet will best effectuate intended punishment and deterrence).

n279. See generally Rustad & Koening, supra note 18, at 1316 (discussing Gearhart v. Uniden Corp. of Am., 781 F.2d 147 (8th Cir. 1986), in which defendant accepted liability for known defendant as "a mere cost of doing business").

n280. See id. at 1312.

n281. See Elliott, supra note 244, at 1057 (claiming that unpredictability is the "central failing" of punitive damages).

n282. Rustad & Koenig, supra note 18, at 1277.

n283. Presumably, the additur provisions of the federal bill would have permitted higher awards in such cases at the judge's discretion. See H.R. 956, 104th Cong. 108(b)(3)(A) (1996). Congress' intention, however, was that "occasions for additional awards will be very limited indeed." H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 104-481, at 31 (1996).

n284. Michael Rustad & Thomas Koenig, Punitive Damages in Products Liability: A Research Report, 3 Prod. Liab. L.J. 85, 94 (1992).

REV_00263302

n285. See Product Liability Fairness Hearing, supra note 24, at 89 (testimony of William Fry, Executive Director, HALT, an organization of Americans for Legal Reform) (noting that punitive damages, or fear of them, are passed on "to consumers in the form of higher prices or products not getting to the market").

n286. See 141 Cong. Rec. S5884 (daily ed. May 1, 1995) (statement of Sen. Hatch) (discussing need for U.S. manufacturers to add costs of punitive damages into price of products thus affecting U.S. consumers and competitiveness of U.S. corporations in global marketplace).

n287. Proponents for national tort reform contend that punitive damage awards need regulation because consumers, especially the low income purchasers, ultimately bear the costs of punitive damage payments. See id. at S5882 (statement of Sen. Hatch) ("The effect of the greater frequency and magnitude of punitive damages recoveries of modern times has been to increase the price level for all products and services provided in the U.S. economy."); see also id. at S5801 (daily ed. Apr. 27, 1995) (statement of Sen. Snowe) (claiming that consumers must pay higher prices due to runaway awards). One problem with this theory, however, is that it assumes that the consumer is a captive and would continue to buy the corporation's product or service regardless of the increases in price. One cannot ignore the argument that in a competitive market, a corporation would not be able to raise its prices too high or consumers simply would switch to a competitor's product. See generally George J. Stigler, The Theory of Price 21-44 (1966) (delineating factors affecting consumer demand including price fluctuations).

n288. See 141 Cong Rec. S5950 (daily ed. May 2, 1995) (statement of Sen. Kyl) (musing that "these outrageous punitive damages create a tort tax paid by consumers in the form of higher prices, higher insurance premiums, and reduced market choice and quality"); Richard J. Mahoney, Punishment Without End, Wash. Post, June 15, 1995, at A21 ("The real damage caused by multiple punitive damage awards is that the American public has been hit with a "hidden litigation tax.'").

n289. Furthermore, if corporations are permitted to insure against punitive damage awards as some states allow, a manufacturer with insurance would pass the costs of premiums on to consumers and the insurance company would spread the loss associated with the punitive damage payment among its customers in the form of higher premiums.

n290. See generally Stigler, supra note 287, at 87 (describing type of competitive market in which sellers outnumber buyers).

n291. See generally id. (describing type of competitive market in which buyers outnumber sellers).

n292. See generally id. at 21-44 (discussing factors affecting consumer demand including responses to price increases).

n293. Such a situation could arise if a corporation had a patent on one of its product and chose not to license it to others.

n294. This is true, even if, as proponents of tort reform argue, punitive damage payments are skyrocketing in magnitude. It should not be forgotten that punitive damage awards undergo judicial review to determine their reasonableness. See supra notes 45, 55 and accompanying text (discussing settlement agreements and reductions in awards by appeals courts).

n295. As one commentator noted:

REV_00263303

not have strong ties to the state. [49]

II. The Current State of Punitive Damages

Courts and commentators have found that punitive damage awards are increasing at an alarming pace. [50] Dissenting in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip, [51] Justice O'Connor noted:

Recent years ... have witnessed an explosion in the frequency and size of punitive damages awards. A recent study by the RAND Corporation found that punitive damages were assessed against one of every ten defendants who were found liable for compensatory damages in California. The amounts can be staggering. Within nine months of our decision in Browning-Ferris, there were no fewer than six punitive damages awards of more than $ 20 million. Medians as well as averages are skyrocketing, meaning that even routine awards are growing in size. The amounts "seem to be limited only by the ability of lawyers to string zeros together in drafting a complaint." [52] [*1587]

Nowhere is the proof of out-of-control awards more evident than in the staggering jury verdicts themselves and in the trial or appellate court treatment of such verdicts on review:

In August, September, and October 1994, for example, juries imposed punitive exactions of $ 5 billion against Exxon; $ 109 million against Blockbuster Entertainment Corp.; $ 80 million against Hughes Aircraft; $ 70 million against a director of Amerco, the corporate parent of U-Haul; $ 65 million against Southern California Physicians Insurance Exchange; $ 58 million against Maryland Casualty Co.; $ 57.5 million against Key Pharmaceutical; $ 50 million against Mercury Finance; $ 31 million against Chevron U.S.A.; $ 15 million against Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc.; $ 8 million against Schering-Plough Corp.; $ 7 million against Nash Finch Co.; $ 6.9 million against the law firm Baker & McKenzie; $ 6.6 million against Farmers Insurance Co.; $ 6.5 million against Wal-Mart; $ 5 million against the Hilton Hotel Corporation; and $ 2.7 million against McDonald's. [53]

Most of these jury awards subsequently were reduced by trial or appellate judges and other cases were settled for less than the amount awarded. [54] In fact, thirty of the seventy-two jury verdicts in 1994 for [*1588] $ 10 million or more were reduced or set aside. [55] Two truths can be deduced from this fact: (1) juries are awarding unjustified and excessive punitive damages with increasing frequency; and (2) the check of judicial review is functioning in some cases as an effective safeguard against the unbridled discretion of juries. [56]

Judicial remittitur is not enough, however. Even with that mechanism, the amounts affirmed by appellate courts are rising exponentially along with jury verdicts. [57] Moreover, appellate courts are not guided by any "perceptible formula" in remitting awards. [58] There is no uniform method to the courts' punitive damage award reductions; often there is no explanation as to why the verdict is excessive or why the remitted amount was chosen as the appropriate punishment. Judicial review of punitive awards, like the jury verdicts themselves, is guided only by the general rule that the award not be excessive. Finally, because the fear of excessive jury verdicts drive settlements, [59] the fact that judicial remittitur permits after-the-fact correction of unconstitutional awards does not provide a valid [*1589] solution.

REV_00263250

Loss spreading is a separate justification for imposing a full measure of damages on business firms that cause the harm. Firms can spread the losses broadly among individuals who benefit from the harm-causing activity. Depending on the economics of the situation, losses are spread either among consumers through increased prices or among owners by virtue of lower profits. Either way, someone who derives a substantial direct benefit from the injury-producing product or activity bears the cost.

Charles R. Temper, Compensation for Harm from Charitable Activity, 76 Cornell L. Rev. 401, 430-31 (1991) (footnote omitted).

n296. See Thomas Koenig & Michael Rustad, His and Her Tort Reform: Gender Injustice in Disguise, 70 Wash. L. Rev. 1, 78-79 (1995) (explaining that women generally receive smaller economic awards for similar injuries because women generally have lower earnings and spend fewer years in workforce).

n297. See Punitive Damages Hearing, supra note 24, at 80 (statement of Robert Creamer, Executive Director, Illinois Public Action).

This proposal would have the result of basing punishment meted out to a wrongdoer on the income of the victim. It would punish those who injure wealthy executives more than those who injure women who are homemakers. It would punish those who injure sports stars more than those who injure children. The proposal is particularly discriminatory against women, who generally suffer less economic loss from injury than men since they typically earn less income.

Id. (statement of Robert Creamer, Executive Director, Illinois Public Action).

n298. See Koenig & Rustad, supra note 296, at 87.

When damages awards are based primarily on out-of-pocket costs and loss of earnings, women are placed at a significant disadvantage. Without the prospect of non-economic and punitive damages, many grievously injured women will be unable to convince an attorney to take their case. The proposed limitations on punitive damages are gender injustice in disguise.

Id.

n299. 138 Cong. Rec. S6521 (daily ed. May 12, 1992) (statement of Sen. Cranston).

n300. See Kathleen Morris, Through the Looking Glass: Recent Developments in Affirmative Action, 11 Berkeley Women's L.J. 182, 188 (1996) (charging that "minorities and women tend to be "ghettoized' into lower-paying, lower-skilled jobs").

REV_00263304

n301. See Jenny Rivera, The Violence Against Women Act and the Construction of Multiple Consciousness in the Civil Rights and Feminist Movements, 4 J.L. & Pol'y 463, 498 (1996) (finding access to the legal system a significant obstacle for minority women).

n302. See supra notes 23-31 and accompanying text.

n303. Model Act, supra note 9, 7.

n304. See BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1598-1602 (1996); TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 468 n.28 (1993); Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 21-22 (1991).

n305. Punitive Damages Hearing, supra note 24, at 1 (statement of Sen. Hatch).

n306. See Model Act, supra note 9, 10(a).

n307. Model Act, supra note 9, 10(a). The Model Act also requires that the reviewing court make and enter its findings and the basis for its decision. See id. 10(c).

n308. Id. 10.

n309. See Punitive Damages Hearing, supra note 24, at 105 (testimony of Victor E. Schwartz, Esq., General Counsel, American Tort Reform Association) (calling on Congress to remedy unfairness caused by imposition of multiple punitive damage awards).

n310. See id. 10.

n311. On a purely practical note, Congress would be more likely to pass tort reform legislation if the controversial cap were omitted. As Congress has tried to pass such reform every year since 1982, it would seem preferable to pass some reform - like the elevated burden of proof and uniform standard requiring intentional conduct - rather than no reform. Given President Clinton's re-election, perhaps it is time that Congress consider a more limited reform for the time being.

n312. The effectiveness of punitive damage awards already are undermined by permitting their insurability and the tax deductibility. See Pace, supra note 6, at 828 (insisting that tax deductibility of punitive damages frustrates deterrence and punishment goals of product liability laws). Permitting corporations to insure against their own intentional misconduct or to deduct the payment of these fines from their taxes costs the public twice, first when it is subjected to unsafe products and second when it must bear the burden of the corporation's intentional misconduct through higher taxes and insurance premiums. See id. Ideally, federal reform would address both of these concerns by prohibiting their insurability and removing the tax incentive, that is, deductibility, for the misconduct. See id.

n313. See supra note 68 and accompanying text (listing state statutes that include regulatory compliance defense). The most recent federal tort reform attempt, H.R. 956, originally contained a regulatory compliance defense for companies that act in compliance with FDA regulations. See H.R. 956, 104th Cong. 7 (1996); see also Victor E. Schwartz & Mark A. Behrens, Punitive Damages Reform - State Legislatures Can and Should Meet the Challenge Issued by the Supreme Court of the United States in Haslip, 42 Am. U. L. Rev. 1365, 1383 (1993) (arguing in favor of regulatory compliance defense against punitive damages).

n314. See Peter Huber, Safety and the Second Best: The Hazards of Public Risk Management in the Courts, 85 Colum. L. Rev. 277, 333-35 (1985) (asserting that courts should defer to expert opinions of agencies); see also James A. Henderson, Jr., Judicial n315. See Huber, supra note 314, at 335 (indicating that licensing agencies such as Nuclear Regulatory Commision compare public risks among industry competitors).

REV_00263305

Review of Manufacturers' Conscious Design Choices: The Limits of Adjudication, 73 Colum. L. Rev. 1531, 1555-56 (1973) (challenging suitability of courts to implement tort reform).

n316. See id. (expressing view that courts are not qualified to second-guess agencies).

n317. See Don Phillips, As Upstart Valujet Grew, So Did FAA's Anxieties, Wash. Post, June 10, 1996, at A1, A12 ("I've been concerned for some time that the airline picture is changing faster that our methods of checking up on the changing picture." (quoting John L. McLucas, a former FAA administrator)).

n318. See Restatement (Third) of Torts, supra note 7, 7 & cmt. e (adopting common law approach that regulatory standards set minimal not optimal standards and therefore, rejecting per se regulatory compliance defense); see also Plummer v. Lederle Labs., 819 F.2d 349, 356 (2d Cir. 1987) (concluding that compliance with federal consumer notification regulations precludes application of strict liability but may be used to establish negligence); Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 769 F.2d 1451, 1458 (10th Cir. 1985) (upholding on remand punitive damages award despite defendant's compliance with federal nuclear safety regulations); Toner v. Lederle Labs., 732 P.2d 297, 311 n.12 (Idaho 1987) (arguing that FDA certification should constitute non-negligence per se); Gonzales v. Surgidev Corp., 899 P.2d 576, 590-91 (N.M. 1995) (stating that compliance with regulations will not preclude award of punitive damages); Mulhern v. Outboard Marine Corp., 432 N.W.2d 130, 135 (Wis. Ct. App. 1988) ("Compliance with the federal regulation would not have preempted the state strict liability action because the Act and the regulation are only minimum safety standards which do not provide private tort remedies."). But see Grundberg v. Upjohn Co., 813 P.2d 89 (Utah 1991) (giving judicial deference to regulatory compliance); Stone Man, Inc. v. Green, 435 S.E.2d 205, 206 (Ga. 1993) (stating that punitive damages generally are not available when defendant has complied with applicable regulations governing conduct at issue); McDaniel v. McNeil Lab. Inc., 241 N.W.2d 822, 828 (Neb. 1976) (refusing to submit to strict liability theory in case where defendant adhered to FDA regulations).

n319. See Restatement (Third) of Torts, supra note 7, 7(a).

n320. See id. 7(b).

n321. See Schwartz, Products Liability, supra note 163, at 1152 (finding that in cases where punitive damage are awarded regulatory agencies generally have failed to protect public adequately); see also Rustad, supra note 50, at 73 ("The government is a slow starter and a slow finisher in uncovering corporate misconduct in product liability cases.").

n322. See Rustad, supra note 50, at 73-75 (speculating that government reluctance to investigate and prosecute product liability cases is due to expense and expertise required). Professor Rustad found 355 punitive damage awards in products liability actions from 1965 to 1990. See id. at 30; see also Rustad & Koenig, supra note 284, at 89 (stating that punitive damage awards are rare, although actual number of awards is unknown because no national reporting system exists). Examining each of these cases, Professor Rustad found that government regulators were ineffective at uncovering corporate misconduct.

Despite these serious threats to the public safety, corporate defendants rarely received official sanctions. Only one defendant [of 355] in our sample was criminally sanctioned for its failure to protect the consuming public. A total of only eleven defendants received some form of civil penalty from a local, state, or federal agency.

REV_00263306

Rustad, supra note 50, at 73.

n323. See Schwartz, Products Liability, supra note 163, at 1147 (discussing extent of influence enjoyed by business on agencies because agencies rely on industry-generated data in developing regulations).

n324. John F. Manning, Constitutional Structure and Judicial Deference to Agency Interpretations of Agency Rules, 96 Colum. L. Rev. 612, 677 n.308 (1996); see also Richard J. Pierce, Jr., The Role of the Judiciary in Implementing an Agency Theory of Government, 64 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1239, 1280-81 (1989) (describing how members of industry and agency policy-makers control decision-making process); Mark Seidenfeld, A Civic Republican Justification for the Bureaucratic State, 105 Harv. L. Rev. 1511, 1565-66 (1992) (suggesting that top level of agency policy-makers, because they are fewer in number, are easier to influence than the hundreds of legislators needed to pass new laws).

n325. See Schwartz, Products Liability, supra note 163, at 1147.

n326. See Seidenfeld, supra note 324, at 1565.

n327. See Schwartz, Punitive Damages, supra note 163, at 1363 (arguing against regulatory compliance defenses); see also Schwartz, Products Liability, supra note 163, at 1147 (voicing concerns that industry has too much influence on regulatory process as compared to the relatively weak influence of public interest groups).

n328. See Model Act, supra note 9, 7.

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined (i)
Terms: ("punitive damages" /15 standard) and ("punitive damages" /10 "public safety") (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Thursday, October 10, 2002 - 6:56 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

Safeguards should be implemented to prevent the abuse earlier in the trial process, thereby saving the parties and the courts time and money. Moreover, if the rise in the magnitude and frequency of punitive damage awards is unjustified, then inappropriate punitive damage judgments are being awarded, unfairly subjecting defendants to the social stigma of being branded a wrongdoer and forcing defendants to spend time and money defending against undeserved penalties. [60]

III. State Tort Reform Legislation

As a result of the increase in frequency and magnitude of punitive damage awards in the last ten years, state legislatures have been actively passing tort reform legislation. Forty-six states either have prohibited punitive damages or have enacted legislation aimed at reducing their frequency and size. [61]

Due to the perceived increase in awards of punitive damages in products liability litigation, [62] states have started to regulate punitive damages more heavily to ensure that they are administered fairly. Most state statutes prescribe the purposes behind punitive damages, [63] the conditions on which punitive damages may be awarded, [64] the burden of proving liability for such an award, [65] and the factors that [*1590] the jury may consider in assessing the award. [66] Some states have raised the burden of proof necessary to obtain a punitive damage award from "a preponderance of the evidence" to "clear and convincing evidence." [67] Other states have placed a ceiling on the amount of the punitive damage award, [68] and some have barred punitive damages if the wrongdoer had complied with existing government regulations. [69] [*1591]

By limiting and regulating the award of punitive damages, states are sanctioning their imposition. Such regulation makes punitive dam-ages look more like fines and penalties imposed by the state to punish intolerable conduct than like damage awards. As the states have recognized, procedural safeguards are needed to protect defendants from the wrongful imposition of these quasi-criminal sanctions and to protect the integrity of the legal system.

IV. Judicial Reform of Punitive Damages

As the frequency and magnitude of punitive damages have grown, so have the challenges to their constitutionality. [70] The Supreme Court has considered whether punitive damage awards violate the Fifth, Seventh, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. [71] Until re-cently, the Court merely has criticized runaway jury verdicts in punitive damage cases and stressed the need for legislative reform to curtail these abuses. [72] In its recent decision, BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, [73] the Court expressed its willingness to use judicial discretion to strike down awards that are deemed excessive. [74] Many questions surround the Supreme Court's scrutiny of the constitution- [*1592] ality of punitive damages and, in particular, whether there is any legitimate constitutional basis for overturning such jury awards. The following analysis of Supreme Court cases that have considered the constitutionality of punitive damage awards reveals that the Supreme Court has not yet spoken on many contemporary issues. A survey of these cases further raises the questions of whether the Supreme Court's reform of punitive damages has helped to clarify the law at all, and whether these decisions have highlighted the need for federal legislation to regulate such damages.

A. The Fifth Amendment - Double Jeopardy Clause

Nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb .... [75]

REV_00263251

In United States v. Halper, [76] the Supreme Court held that the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment limits the amount the government can recover (for punishment) in a civil action after the defendant already has been criminally punished. [77] In Halper, the defendant was convicted of violating sixty-five counts of the criminal false claims statute, was sentenced to two years imprisonment, and then was assessed a $ 5000 fine when the government brought a subsequent civil suit. [78] The Supreme Court held that the civil penalty was unconstitutional under the Double Jeopardy Clause because it amounted to two separate punishments for the same offense. [79]

The Court further stated, however, that "nothing in today's opinion precludes a private party from filing a civil suit seeking damages for conduct that previously was the subject of criminal prosecution and punishment. The protections of the Double Jeopardy Clause are not triggered by litigation between private parties." [80] Despite this state-ment, when a portion of the punitive damage award is paid to the state, the Double Jeopardy Clause, like the Excessive Fines Clause, could be implicated. [81] Although being punished twice in the civil [*1593] justice system may not be unconstitutional under the Fifth Amendment, the constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy generally supports the argument that repetitive punishment is fundamentally unfair. [82]

B. The Eighth Amendment - Are Punitive Damage Awards Excessive Fines?

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted. [83]

Punitive damages awards also have been attacked on Eighth Amendment grounds because they can allegedly constitute excessive fines. The Supreme Court, in Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., [84] rejected a claim that a $ 6 million punitive damage award was unconstitutional under the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment. [85] The Court held that the Excessive Fines Clause does not apply to awards in litigation between private parties. [86] The Court explained that the excessive fines clause "does not constrain an award of money damages in a civil suit when the government neither has prosecuted the action nor has any right to receive a share of the damages awarded." [87]

This language implies that a punitive damage award, if apportioned between the plaintiff and the state, could raise constitutional concerns under the Eighth Amendment. [88] In Browning-Ferris, the Court [*1594] explicitly left open the question of whether a suit brought by a private party in the name of the United States, in which the government would share in any damage award, violates the Eighth Amendment. [89]

This issue has become increasingly important since a number of states have passed legislation that apportion punitive damages between the plaintiff and the state. [90] In these states, a portion of the punitive damage award must be paid either directly to the state's treasury or into a state-sanctioned fund. [91] Commentators long have argued that punitive damages should be paid to the state or to a public fund, or apportioned between the state and the plaintiff. [92] Two reasons exist for awarding the state a portion of any punitive award: (1) punitive damages are a windfall for the plaintiff; [93] and [*1595] (2) punitive damages are awarded to punish the defendant for a public wrong, an offense against societal welfare. [94] A few lower courts have considered the propriety of state apportionment laws, [95] but the

REV_00263252

Supreme Court has yet to consider the issue.

What will the Supreme Court do with a case in which the punitive award is apportioned between the state and the plaintiff? In light of the wide-spread proliferation of state tort reform efforts to regulate the procedures for imposing, assessing, and apportioning punitive damages, punitive damages awarded in lawsuits between private parties have become sufficiently governmental in character to invoke Eighth Amendment scrutiny - if not for the entire award, at least for the portion being paid to the state. Thus far, however, the Supreme Court has rejected one opportunity (by denying certiorari) to determine whether a state's sharing of a punitive damage [*1596] award - apportioned pursuant to a state statute - invokes Eighth Amendment scrutiny. [96]

Applying the Excessive Fines Clause to punitive damage awards raises another question: What constitutes an excessive fine? Because the Eighth Amendment prohibits only excessive fines, not all fines, the Supreme Court would have to determine whether the portion of a particular punitive award paid to the state is excessive. Such a finding probably would require the Court to articulate "guideposts" for determining what is excessive under the Eighth Amendment.

Will the Supreme Court apply the same "guideposts" to determine excessiveness under the Eighth Amendment that it articulated in BMW, [97] or will it craft even more factors for judges to consider? In the past, the Court has refused to create a substantive federal excessiveness standard, holding that "although petitioners and their amici would like us to craft some common-law standard of excessiveness that relies on notions of proportionality between punitive and compensatory damages, or makes reference to statutory penalties for similar conduct, these are matters of state, not federal, common law." [98]

In light of the recent decision in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, where the Court expressed its willingness to overturn excessive awards on a due process basis, [99] the Excessive Fines Clause now seems [*1597] unnecessary in the analysis of punitive damage awards. [100] If the total amount of the punitive damage award is not excessive under the Due Process Clause, then a state's smaller share of that amount logically cannot be excessive.

C. The Fourteenth Amendment - Can a Punitive Damage Award Violate Due Process?

Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.... [101]

The Supreme Court has held that although the Double Jeopardy and Excessive Fines Clauses do not apply to punitive damage awards paid to private litigants, the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment does. [102]

1.

Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip

In Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip, [103] the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the punitive damage award against a challenge that the award violated due process. [104] The Court explains:

REV_00263253

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined (i)
Terms: "common sense product" and veto and "punitive damages" and conscious (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*55 Md. L. Rev. 1363, **

Copyright (c) 1996 Maryland Law Review, Inc.
University of Maryland School of Law

1996

55 Md. L. Rev. 1363

LENGTH: 11476 words

ARTICLE: THE ROAD TO FEDERAL PRODUCT LIABILITY REFORM

Victor E. Schwartz *, Mark A. Behrens **

* Senior Partner, Crowell & Moring, Washington, D.C.; B.A., Boston University; J.D., Columbia University. Mr. Schwartz is the drafter of the Model Uniform Product Liability Act and recently has been appointed to the Advisory Committees of the American Law Institute's Restatement of the Law of Torts: Products Liability and Restatement of the Law of Torts: Apportionment of Liability projects. He is co-author of John Wade et al., Prosser, Wade and Schwartz's Cases and Materials on Torts (9th ed. 1994) and author of Victor E. Schwartz, Comparative Negligence (3d ed. 1994). Mr. Schwartz is counsel to the Product Liability Coordinating Committee, the principal coalition of the business community on federal product liability reform, with over 800,000 members nationwide.

 Senior Associate, Crowell & Moring, Washington, D.C.; B.A., University of Wisconsin-Madison; J.D., Vanderbilt University. Mr. Behrens is co-counsel to the Product Liability Coordinating Committee.

SUMMARY:
... In late 1981, a major effort to enact federal legislation began under the leadership of former Wisconsin Republican Senator Robert Kasten. ... A final version of the model law, known as the Model Uniform Product Liability Act, has been the basis for legislation in about nine states. ... Proponents of reform, however, do not advocate a complete federal "takeover" of product liability law. ... In about eleven states, conduct such as abusing alcohol or drugs does not preclude a person from recovering in a product liability action, even if the drug or alcohol usage was a substantial cause of the harm. ... Some opponents of punitive damage reform have obscured a very basic fact: punitive damages are punishment. ... Bifurcation also helps jurors "compartmentalize" a trial, allowing them to more easily separate the burden of proof that is required for compensatory damage awards (proof by a preponderance of the evidence) from a higher burden of proof (proof by clear and convincing evidence) for punitive damages. ... In these states, if an employee has a successful product liability claim against a manufacturer or product seller, his employer can recover the amount of workers' compensation benefits paid to the employee from the product liability damage award, even if the employer is responsible for the injury. ...

TEXT:
[*1363]

House Bill 956 would have reversed this effect and modified state law in a very positive way by placing a private incentive on employers to keep their workplaces safe. [129] In sum, if an employer was at fault in causing a workplace injury, it would bear the costs of workers' compensation.

III. Biomaterials Access Assurance

Each year millions of citizens depend on the availability of implantable medical devices, such as pacemakers, heart valves, artificial blood vessels, and hip and knee joints. The availability of these devices is critically threatened, however, because suppliers have ceased supplying raw materials and component parts to medical implant manufacturers. A 1994 study by Aronoff Associates concluded that there are significant numbers of raw materials that are "at risk" of shortages in the immediate future. [130] Suppliers have found that the cost of responding to litigation related to medical implants far exceeds potential sales revenues, even though courts are not finding suppliers liable. [131]

House Bill 956 would have helped prevent a public health crisis by limiting the liability of biomaterials suppliers to instances of genuine fault. It would have also established a procedure to ensure that [*1383] suppliers could avoid litigation without incurring heavy legal costs. The provision did not in any way diminish the existing liability of implantable medical device manufacturers. [132] The provision was the subject of hearings and enjoyed strong bipartisan support. [133]

Conclusion

The current product liability system in the United States is an example of what is wrong, not right, with our legal system. We need reasonable rules that will separate the bad from the good. We need a system that has predictability - that will encourage appropriate conduct. The "real" consumers of America, those who purchase and use products on a daily basis, will benefit by getting the products that they need and by no longer having to pay unfair and unreasonable "product liability taxes." Jobs will be created. Federal product liability legislation can provide these results, while preserving a legal system that will target dangerous and defective products.

After a decade and a half of debate and learning about the subject, federal product liability legislation does carefully balance and meet these goals.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. See S. Rep. No. 69, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. 15 (1995).

n2. See id. at 17.

n3. See id.

n4. See Common Sense Legal Reform Act of 1995, H.R. 10, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995).

n5. See Common Sense Product Liability Reform Act, H.R. 917, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995).

n6. See H.R. Rep. No. 64, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. 7 (1995); H.R. Rep. No. 63, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. 12 (1995).

n7. See Common Sense Product Liability and Legal Reform Act of 1995, H.R. 956, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995).

REV_00263317

n8. See 141 Cong. Rec. H3027 (daily ed. Mar. 10, 1995).

n9. See Product Liability Fairness Act of 1995, S. 565, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995).

n10. See S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 14.

n11. See id. at 15.

n12. See 141 Cong. Rec. S6407 (daily ed. May 10, 1995).

n13. See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, 104th Cong., 2d Sess. (1996).

n14. Id.

n15. See 142 Cong. Rec. S2590 (daily ed. Mar. 21, 1996).

n16. See 142 Cong. Rec. H3204 (daily ed. Mar. 29, 1996).

n17. See Sending a Message on Product Liability, Wash. Post, May 1, 1996, at A6.

n18. See John F. Harris, Clinton Vetoes Product Liability Measure, Wash. Post, May 3, 1996, at A14; Neil A. Lewis, President Vetoes Limits on Liability, N.Y. Times, May 3, 1996, at A1; Warren P. Strobel, Clinton Uses Human Props to Put a Spin on Liability Veto, Wash. Times, May 3, 1996, at A5; The Lawyers' Veto, Wall St. J., May 3, 1996, at A12. In order to preserve a record vote on the issue, the House attempted a veto override on May 9, 1996; it fell 23 votes short of passage.

n19. H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13.

n20. Interagency Task Force on Product Liability, U.S. Dep't of Commerce, Final Report V-19 to V-21 (1976).

n21. Id.

n22. Product Liability Risk Retention Act of 1981, Pub. L. No. 97-45, 95 Stat. 949 (codified as amended at 15 U.S.C. 3901-3904 (1994)).

n23. 15 U.S.C. 3901-3906 (1994).

n24. See id.

n25. See S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 26.

n26. See 43 Fed. Reg. 14,612 (1978).

n27. See Model Uniform Product Liability Act, 44 Fed. Reg. 62,714 (1979).

n28. Ill. Ann. Stat. ch. 735, para. 5/2-622, -623, -1107.1, -1115.05, -1115.1, -1115.2, -1116, -1205.1, -2104, -2105, -2106, -2106.5, -2108, -2109, 5/13-213 (Smith-Hurd 1996).

n29. Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. 33.001 (West 1996).

n30. Ind. Code Ann. 33-1-1.5-1, -4, -9, -10, 34-4-34-4, -5, -6 (West 1996).

n31. N.D. Cent. Code 28-01.3-07 to -09, .4-01 to -04 (1995).

REV_00263318

n32. N.J. Stat. Ann. 2A:15-5.2, .3, .9 (West 1996).

n33. Or. Rev. Stat. 18.537 (1995).

n34. Wis. Stat. Ann. 895.85 (West 1996).

n35. See S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 26.

n36. See H.R. Rep. No. 63, supra note 6, at 27; H.R. Rep. No. 64, supra note 6, at 40-41; S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 64-66.

n37. In two separate opinions, the West Virginia Court of Appeals reflected on this issue. In Garnes v. Fleming Landfill, Inc., 413 S.E.2d 897 (W. Va. 1991), the court stated:

State courts have adopted standards that are, for the most part, not predictable, not consistent and not uniform. Such fuzzy standards inevitably are most likely to be applied arbitrarily against out-of-state defendants. Moreover, this is a problem that state courts are by themselves incapable of correcting regardless of surpassing integrity and boundless goodwill. State courts cannot weigh the appropriate trade-offs in cases concerning the national economy and national welfare when these trade-offs involve benefits that accrue outside the jurisdiction of the forum and detriments that accrue inside the jurisdiction of the forum.

Id. at 905. Earlier, in Blankenship v. General Motors Corp., 406 S.E.2d 781 (W. Va. 1991), the court opined:

Indeed, in some world other than the one in which we live, where this Court were called upon to make national policy, we might very well take a meat ax to some current product liability rules. Therefore, we do not claim that our adoption of rules liberal to plaintiffs comports, necessarily, with some Platonic ideal of perfect justice. Rather, for a tiny state incapable of controlling the direction of national law in terms of appropriate trade-offs among employment, research, development, and compensation for the injured users of products, the adoption of rules liberal to plaintiffs is simple self-defense.

Id. at 786.

n38. See S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 13. As Governor of Arkansas, President Clinton twice sat on NGA committees that drafted and unanimously approved resolutions calling for federal product liability reform. See Trial Lawyers' Triumph, Wash. Post, Mar. 19, 1996, at A16.

n39. See S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 13.

n40. Id. at 13-14.

n41. Id. at 14.

n42. See id.

REV_00263319

n43. See Hearings on H.R. 1910 Before the Subcomm. on Commerce, Consumer Protection, and Competitiveness of the House Comm. on Energy and Commerce, 103d Cong., 2d Sess. 451 (1994) (statement of James S. Oliphant, President, Defense Research Institute).

n44. See id.

n45. See Directive on the Approximation of the Laws, Regulations and Administrative Provisions of the Member States Concerning Liability for Defective Products, 28 O.J. Eur. Comm. 29 (No. L210) (1985).

n46. See Minpo (Civil Code), Law No. 85 of 1994. See generally Mark A. Behrens & Daniel H. Raddock, Japan's New Product Liability Law: The Citadel of Strict Liability Falls, but Access to Recovery Is Limited by Formidable Barriers, 16 U. Pa. J. Int'l Bus. L. 669 (1996).

n47. See Common Sense Product Liability Reform Act: Hearings on H.R. 10 Before the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. 53 (1995) (testimony of Larry S. Stewart, President, Ass'n of Trial Lawyers of America); Common Sense Product Liability Reform Act: Hearings on H.R. 10 Before the Subcomm. on Commerce, Trade, and Hazardous Materials of the House Comm. on Commerce, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. 25 (1995) (testimony of Larry S. Stewart, President, Ass'n of Trial Lawyers of America); Common Sense Product Liability Reform Act: Hearings Before the Subcomm. on Consumer Affairs, Foreign Commerce, and Tourism of the Senate Comm. on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995) (testimony of Larry S. Stewart, President, Ass'n of Trial Lawyers of America).

n48. Congress gave the District of Columbia its own judicial system by enacting the District of Columbia Court Reform and Criminal Procedure Act of 1970, Pub. L. 91-358, 84 Stat. 570 (codified in scattered sections of 28 U.S.C.).

n49. See S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 25 (discussing the effective date of Senate Bill 565).

n50. See, e.g., Simmons v. Monarch Mach. Tool Co., 596 N.E.2d 318, 320 n.3 (Mass. 1992) (imposing "super-strict" liability).

n51. S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 27. The report cites the following examples: the United States Grain Standards Act in 1916, 7 U.S.C. 71-87, 111, 113, 241-73, 2209 (1994) (establishing uniform national standards for grain); the United States Cotton Standards Act in 1923, 7 U.S.C. 51-65 (1994) (requiring uniform classifications for judging quality or value of cotton); the Tobacco Inspection Act in 1935, 7 U.S.C. 511-511r (1994) (requiring compliance with uniform national classifications); the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act in 1938, 21 U.S.C. 301-395 (1994) (establishing standards for safety and labeling of drugs); the Consumer Product Safety Act in 1972, 15 U.S.C. 2051-2084 (1994) (setting uniform safety standards for consumer products); and the General Aircraft Revitalization Act of 1994, 49 U.S.C. 40101 (Supp. 1995) (establishing an 18-year national statute of repose for general aviation aircraft). S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 27 nn.99-100.

n52. S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 31; see W. Page Keeton et al., Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts 705 (5th ed. 1984).

n53. S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 31.

n54. Id.; see Kelly v. Htansom Bros., Inc. 331 A.2d 737, 740 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1974).

n55. S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 31.

REV_00263320

n56. Id.

n57. Id.

n58. Id.; see Colo. Rev. Stat. 13-21-402 (1987); Del. Code Ann. tit. 18, 7001 (1989); Ga. Code Ann. 51-1-11.1 (Supp. 1995); Idaho Code 6-1407 (1990); Ill. Ann. Stat. ch. 735, para. 5/2-621 (Smith-Hurd 1992) (formerly Ill. Rev. Stat. ch. 110, para. 2-621 (1989)); Iowa Code 613.18 (Supp. 1995); Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3306 (1994); Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.340 (Michie/Bobbs-Merrill 1992); La. Rev. Stat. Ann. 2800.53 (West 1991); Md. Code Ann., Cts. & Jud. Proc. 5-311 (1982); Minn. Stat. Ann. 544.41 (West 1988); Mo. Rev. Stat. 537.762 (1988); Neb. Rev. Stat. 25-21,181 (1995); N.J. Stat. Ann. 2A:58C-9 (West 1995); N.C. Gen. Stat. 99B-2 (1995); N.D. Cent. Code 28-01.3-04 (Supp. 1995); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2307.78 (Anderson 1991); S.D. Codified Laws Ann. 20-9-9 (1995); Tenn. Code Ann. 29-28-106 (Supp. 1995); Wash. Rev. Code Ann. 7.72.040 (West 1992).

n59. See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, at 6-7.

n60. Id. at 7.

n61. S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 33 n.116.

n62. See Cal. Veh. Code 17150-51 (West 1971); Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. 14-154a (West 1987); D.C. Code Ann. 40-408 (1990); Fla. Stat. Ann. 324.021(9)(b) (Supp. 1994) (exempts leased vehicles); Idaho Code 49-2417 (1994); Iowa Code 321.493 (1985); Me. Rev. Stat. Ann. tit. 29-A, 1652-1653 (West Supp. 1995); Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. 257.401 (West Supp. 1995); Minn. Stat. 170.54 (1986); N.Y. Veh. & Traf. Law 388 (McKinney 1986); R.I. Gen. Laws 31-33-6, 31-33-7 (1995).

n63. S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 33.

n64. See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, 103(c), at 7-8.

n65. S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 33.

n66. Id.; see H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, at 8.

n67. S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 33; see Wash. Rev. Code 5.40.060 (West 1995).

n68. S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 33.

n69. Id. The majority of states have laws that do not permit recovery in this situation. Id. at 33 n.17. Five states, Alabama, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia, and the District of Columbia, continue to recognize contributory negligence as an absolute defense. Id. Thirty-two states have adopted some form of modified comparative fault standard: Arkansas, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Hawaii, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Texas, Tennessee, Utah, Vermont, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming. Id.

n70. H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, 105(a), at 8.

n71. See Victor E. Schwartz, Comparative Negligence app. b (3d ed. 1994).

n72. See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, 105(a), at 8.

REV_00263321

n73. See id. 106(a), at 9.

n74. Id.

n75. See H.R. Rep. No. 63, supra note 6, at 10-11; S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 43.

n76. See H.R. Rep. No. 63, supra note 1, at 11; S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 44.

n77. Statutes of repose exist in the following states: Ark. Code Ann. 16-116-105(c) (Michie 1987) ("anticipated life" of product); Colo. Rev. Stat. 13-21-403 (1987) (10 years); Conn. Gen. Stat. 52-577a (1991 & Supp. 1995) (10 years); Ga. Code Ann. 51-1-11(b)(2) (1982 & Supp. 1995) (10 years); Idaho Code 6-1403(2) (1990) ("useful safe life" of product); Ill. Ann. Stat. ch. 735, para. 5/13-213(b) (Smith-Hurd 1992) (12 years from date of first sale, or 10 years from date of sale to first user, whichever is shorter); Ind. Code Ann. 33-1-1.5-5(b) (West 1996) (10 years); Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3303 (1994) ("useful safe life" of product); Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.310(1) (Michie/Bobbs-Merrill 1992) (presumption that product is not defective if harm occurred five years after sale to first consumer or eight years after manufacture); Mich. Stat. Ann. 27A.5805 (Callaghan 1986 & Supp. 1995) (if product in use for 10 years, plaintiff must prove prima facie case without benefit of any presumption); Minn. Stat. Ann. 604.03 (West 1988) ("useful life" of product); Neb. Rev. Stat. 25-224 (1995) (10 years); N.D. Cent. Code 28-01.3-08(1) (Supp. 1995) (10 years); Or. Rev. Stat. 30.905(1) (1995) (10 years); Tenn. Code Ann. 29-28-103(a) (1988 & Supp. 1995) (10 years); Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. 16.012 (West Supp. 1995) (15 years); Wash. Rev. Code Ann. 7.72.060(1) (West 1992) ("useful safe life" of product).

n78. General Aircraft Revitalization Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103-298, 3, 108 Stat. 1552 (codified at 49 U.S.C. 40101 (West Supp. 1995)). This law has resulted in production of safer aircraft and the creation of thousands of new jobs, and has not been perceived as unfair or challenged in the courts. See Geoffrey A. Campbell, Study: Business Booms After Tort Reform Enacted, A.B.A. J., Jan. 1996, at 28 ("The light aircraft industry is taking off as reduced liability encourages technological innovation.").

n79. See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, 106(b), at 9.

n80. See Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. 16.012 (West Supp. 1995).

n81. H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, 106(b), at 9.

n82. Id. 107, at 9-10.

n83. Id.

n84. Id.

n85. Id.

n86. William Fry, Executive Director of HALT, a nonprofit legal reform organization supported by 70,000 individual members nationwide, testified before the Consumer Affairs, Foreign Commerce, and Tourism Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation that ADR mechanisms are "a way to lower costs, simplify procedures and achieve fairness through avoidance of technical rules of law." S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 29. He said that HALT supports the use of ADR mechanisms to allow consumers to handle their own legal affairs. See id.

n87. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 18 (1991); see also Honda Motor Corp. v. Oberg, 114 S. Ct. 2331, 2340 (1994) (stating that punitive damages "pose an acute danger of arbitrary deprivation of property," raising serious due process concerns).

REV_00263322

n88. BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1604 (1996); see also TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 458 (1993); Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 499 U.S. at 23-24; Oberg, 114 S. Ct. at 2335; see also Browning-Ferris Indus., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 276 (1989) ("Due process imposes some limits on jury awards of punitive damages, and it is not disputed that a jury award may not be upheld if it was the product of bias or passion, or if it was reached in proceedings lacking the basic elements of fundamental fairness"). In Browning-Ferris, the Court did not squarely address the issue of whether the Due Process Clause places outer limits on the size of punitive damages because the issue had not been preserved for appeal. Id. at 276-77; cf. Pulla v. Amoco Oil Co., 72 F.3d 648, 661 (8th Cir. 1995) (opinion by retired Supreme Court Justice Byron White) (striking down punitive damages award as "excessive, unreasonable and violative of due process").

n89. In Oberg, 114 S. Ct. at 2341, a case involving an all-terrain vehicle that flipped over when an inebriated plaintiff tried to drive it up a hill, the Court struck down a punitive damages award on the ground that Oregon law violated due process, because it did not provide an opportunity for meaningful appellate review of the size of punitive damages awards. Id.

n90. Dan B. Dobbs, Handbook on the Law of Remedies 3.9, at 204 (1973).

n91. Id. 3.9, at 204-05.

n92. Id. 3.1, at 135-38.

n93. Id. 3.9, at 219-20.

n94. For example, a 1992 Science magazine article reported that at least two companies have delayed AIDS vaccine research and another company abandoned one promising approach as a result of liability concerns. Jon Cohen, Is Liability Slowing AIDS Vaccines?, Science, Apr. 10, 1992, at 168-69.

n95. See S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 36.

n96. H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, 103, at 6-8.

n97. Id. 108(a), at 10 (imposing a "clear and convincing evidence" standard).

n98. Id. 108(b), at 10 (setting out limits on punitive damage awards).

n99. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 17 (1991).

n100. Id. 108(a), at 10.

n101. See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, 108(a), at 10-11.

n102. Ala. Code 6-11-20 (1993); Alaska Stat. 09-17-020 (1994); Cal. Civ. Code 3294(a) (West 1970 & Supp. 1996); Ga. Code Ann. 51.12-5.1(b) (Supp. 1995); Iowa Code Ann. 668A.1 (West 1987); Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3701(c) (1994); Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.184(2) (Michie/Bobbs-Merrill 1991); Minn. Stat. Ann. 549.20 (West 1988 & Supp. 1995); Miss. Code Ann. 11-1-65(1)(a) (Supp. 1995); Mont. Code Ann. 27-1-221(5) (1995); Nev. Rev. Stat. Ann. 42-005(1) (Michie Supp. 1995); N.J. Stat. Ann. 2A:15-5.12 (West 1995); N.C. Gen. Stat. 1D-15(b) (1995); N.D. Cent. Code 32-03.2-11 (Supp. 1995); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2307.80(A) (Anderson 1991); Okla. Stat. Ann. tit. 23, 9.1 (West Supp. 1995); Or. Rev. Stat.

REV_00263323

18.537 (1995); S.C. Code Ann. 15-33-135 (Law. Co-op. Supp. 1994); S.D. Codified Laws Ann. 21-1-4.1 (1987); Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. 41.003 (West 1995); Utah Code Ann. 78-18-1 (1992); Linthicum v. Nationwide Life Ins. Co., 723 P.2d 675, 681 (Ariz. 1986); Jonathan Woodner Co. v. Breeden, 665 A.2d 929, 937 (D.C. Cir. 1995); Masaki v. General Motors Corp., 780 P.2d 566, 575 (Haw. 1989); Travelers Indem. Co. v. Armstrong, 442 N.E.2d 349, 362-63 (Ind. 1982); Tuttel v. Raymond, 494 A.2d 1353, 1363 (Me. 1985); Owens-Illinois v. Zenobia, 601 A.2d 633, 657 (Md. 1992); Hodges v. S.C. Toof & Co., 833 S.W.2d 896, 901 (Tenn. 1992); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 294 N.W.2d 437, 458 (Wis. 1980). One state, Colorado, requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt in punitive damages cases. Colo. Rev. Stat. 13-25-127(2) (1987).

n103. See American Bar Ass'n, Special Comm. on Punitive Damages of the Am. Bar Ass'n Section on Litigation, Punitive Damages: A Constructive Examination 19 (Am. Bar Ass'n 1986) [hereinafter ABA Report]; American College of Trial Lawyers Rep. on Punitive Damages of the Comm. on Special Problems in the Administration of Justice 15-16 (1989) [hereinafter ACTL Report]; 2 Enterprise Responsibility for Personal Injury - Reporters' Study 248-49 (Am. Law Inst. 1991) [hereinafter ALI Reporters' Study]; National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, Uniform Law Commissioners' Model Punitive Damages Act 5 (approved by uniform law commissioners on July 18, 1996) [hereinafter Uniform Law Commissioners' Model Punitive Damages Act]. See generally Victor E. Schwartz & Mark A. Behrens, The American Law Institute's Reporters' Study on Enterprise Responsibility for Personal Injury: A Timely Call for Punitive Damages Reform, 30 San Diego L. Rev. 263 (1993).

n104. See Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 23 n.11 (1991) (stating that "there is much to be said in favor of a State's requiring, as many do,... a standard of "clear and convincing evidence'"). Ultimately, the Court rejected this higher level of proof in cases that meet constitutional scrutiny in favor of a lesser standard "buttressed ... by the procedural and substantive protections." Id.

n105. See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, 108(b), at 10.

n106. See id.

n107. Id.

n108. Id. 108(a), at 10.

n109. See ABA Report, supra note 103, at 64-66 (recommending that punitive damage awards in excess of three-to-one ratio to compensatory damages be considered presumptively "excessive"); ACTL Report, supra note 103, at 15 (proposing that punitive damages be awarded up to twice compensatory damages or $ 250,000, whichever is greater); ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 103, at 258-59 (endorsing concept of ratio coupled with alternative monetary ceiling).

n110. Ill. Ann. Stat., ch. 735, para. 5/2-1115.05 (Smith-Hurd 1995) (punitive damages limited to three times amount of claimant's economic damages); Ind. Code Ann. 34-4-34-5 (1995) (punitive damages limited to the greater of three times actual damages or $ 50,000); N.J. Stat. Ann. 2A:15-5.14 (West 1995) (punitive damages limited to five times amount of claimant's compensatory damages or $ 350,000, whichever is greater); N.C. Gen. Stat. 1D-25 (1995) (punitive damages limited to three times amount of claimant's compensatory damages or $ 250,000, whichever is greater); Okla. S.B. 263 (exemplary damages may not exceed the greatest of $ 500,000, twice the amount of actual damages awarded, or the increased financial benefit derived by defendant or insurer as a direct result of the injurious conduct); Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. 41.008 (West 1995) (limits punitive damages awards to $ 200,000 or two times economic damages plus an amount equal to any noneconomic damages up to $ 750,000). Other states have also capped punitive damage awards. See, e.g., Colo. Rev. Stat. 13-21-102(1)(a) (1995) (punitive award may not exceed compensatory damages); Conn. Gen. Stat. 52-204b (West Supp. 1992) (punitive award permitted up to twice the compensatory damages); Fla. Stat. Ann. 768.73(1)(a) (West Supp. 1992) (punitive damages may be awarded up to three times compensatory damages unless "clear and convincing evidence" is presented by the plaintiff to show that a higher award is not excessive); Nev. Rev. Stat. 42.005 (1991) (punitive damages awards permitted up to $ 300,000 in cases in which compensatory damages are less than $ 100,000 and to three times the amount of compensatory damages in cases of $ 100,000 or more); N.D. Cent. Code 32.03.2-11(4) (1995) (permitting punitive damages up to twice compensatory damages, or $ 250,000, whichever is greater); Va. Code Ann. 8.01-38.1 (Michie 1994) (punitive damages permitted up to a maximum of $ 350,000).

REV_00263324

n111. See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, 108(b)(3)(D), at 11. See generally Victor E. Schwartz & Mark A. Behrens, Federal Product Liability Reform Legislation Is Consistent with Virginia Law and Should Be Strongly Supported, 4 Geo. Mason U. L. Rev. 279 (1996) (discussing the burden of proof required to establish liability and the liability standard for recovery of punitive damages under H.B. 956).

n112. See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, 108(c), at 11-12.

n113. See Transportation Ins. Co. v. Moriel, 879 S.W.2d 10, 30 (Tex. 1994) (adopting "the requirement of bifurcated trials in punitive damages cases"); Hodges v. S.C. Toof & Co., 833 S.W.2d 896 (Tenn. 1992) (holding that "where punitive damages are sought, the court, upon motion of defendant, shall bifurcate the trial").

n114. See, e.g., Cal. Civ. Code 3295(d) (West Supp. 1995); Minn. Stat. Ann. 549.20 (West Supp. 1995); Miss. Code Ann. 11-1-65(1)(a) (Supp. 1995).

n115. See ABA Report, supra note 103, at 19; ACTL Report, supra note 103, at 18-19; ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 103, at 255 n.41; Uniform Law Commissioners' Model Punitive Damages Act, supra note 103, 11.

n116. See Coney v. J.L.G. Indus., Inc., 454 N.E.2d 197, 204 (Ill. 1983) (defining joint and several liability).

n117. S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 45. See generally Senator Larry Pressler & Kevin V. Schieffer, Joint and Several Liability: A Case for Reform, 65 Denv. U. L. Rev. 651 (1988) (discussing doctrine of joint and several liability and offering possible reforms).

n118. Id.

n119. Id. at 46.

n120. See Schwartz, supra note 71, app. b.

n121. See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, 110(a), (b)(1), at 12.

n122. The legislation provided that responsibility for a claimant's harm would be apportioned in reference to all persons responsible for the plaintiff's injury, whether or not such person was a party to the action. See id. 110(b)(2), at 12. This position is sound public policy and reflects the trend in the tort law of the states. See, e.g., DaFonte v. Up-Right, Inc., 828 P.2d 140, 145 (Cal. 1992) (stating that no defendant shall have joint liability for noneconomic damages); Fabre v. Marin, 623 So. 2d 1182, 1185-86 (Fla. 1993) (stating that "for purposes of non-economic damages a plaintiff should take each defendant as he or she finds them").

REV_00263325

n123. Cal. Civ. Code Ann. 1431.2 (West Supp. 1996).

n124. Neb. Rev. Stat. 25-21,185.10 (1995).

n125. S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 49.

n126. Id. The employer assumes the employee's rights against the manufacturer by subrogation.

n127. See id.

n128. See Arthur Larson, Workmen's Compensation for Occupational Injuries and Death 76.36 (desk ed. 1991) (discussing the California approach that deducts compensation from an employer's third-party recovery).

n129. See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, at 12-14.

n130. See Aronoff Assocs., Market Study: Biomaterials Supply for Permanent Medical Implants (Mar. 1994).

n131. See generally Edward M. Mansfield, Reflections on Current Limits on Component and Raw Materials Supplier Liability and the Proposed Third Restatement, 84 Ky. L.J. 221, 235-37 (1995-96).

n132. See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 481, supra note 13, 201-206, at 14-23.

n133. No minority position was taken in regard to this provision of the Senate bill. See S. Rep. No. 69, supra note 1, at 51-52, 56-80.

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "common sense product" and veto and "punitive damages" and conscious (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, October 11, 2002 - 2:26 AM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00263326

Introduction

The road toward the enactment of federal product liability reform legislation has been a long one. The effort can be traced back to an Interagency Task Force that began under President Ford in 1976 and concluded under President Carter in 1980. In late 1981, a major effort to enact federal legislation began under the leadership of former Wisconsin Republican Senator Robert Kasten. [1]

For the last two Congresses, bipartisan product liability reform has been an achievable goal in the United States Senate. Yet, in both September 1992 and June 1994, a minority of members, many of whom held key Senate leadership positions, filibustered the product liability bill when supporters tried to bring it to the Floor. [2] Both times, proponents fell just short of the sixty votes needed to overcome the filibuster. [3]

In the 104th Congress, the effort to enact liability reform legislation originated in the House of Representatives with a quick and successful start. The success of the measure was due in large part to the prominence of legal reform in the House Republican "Contract with America." House Judiciary Committee Chairman Henry Hyde introduced a bill on the opening day of the 104th Congress, January 4, [*1364] 1995. [4] Michael Oxley, Chairman of the Subcommittee on Commerce, Trade, and Hazardous Materials of the House Commerce Committee introduced a bill on February 13, 1995. [5] Their committees held hearings in February, [6] and the bills were subsequently combined and reintroduced as House Bill 956, the "Common Sense Product Liability and Legal Reform Act of 1995." [7] The House effort culminated on March 10, 1995, with the approval of House Bill 956 by a vote of 265 to 161. [8]

Several days later, on March 15, 1995, bipartisan legislation was introduced by West Virginia Democratic Senator John D. Rockefeller IV, Republican Senator Slade Gorton of Washington, and others. [9] The Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation's Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs, Foreign Commerce, and Tourism held hearings in April, [10] and quickly reported out a bill. [11] On May 10, 1995, the Senate approved House Bill 956, as amended by Senate Bill 565, the "Product Liability Fairness Act of 1995," by a vote of sixty-one to thirty-seven. [12]

On March 14, 1996, members appointed by the House and Senate leadership agreed upon a conference report that resolved differences between the House and Senate bills. [13] The Senate passed the conference report on House Bill 956, renamed the "Common Sense Product Liability and Legal Reform Act of 1996," [14] on March 21, 1996, by a vote of fifty-nine to forty. [15] The House passed it on March 29, 1996, by a vote of 259 to 158. [16] The conference report was sent to President Clinton on April 30, 1996, after a ceremony at the United States Capitol that included brief statements in support of the report by then Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole and House Speaker Newt [*1365] Gingrich. [17] President Clinton vetoed the conference report on May 2, 1996, marking the fifteenth veto of his presidency. [18]

This Article will briefly describe the history of the federal product liability effort. The Article then focuses on the 1995-96 legislation, and in particular the conference report on House Bill 956. [19] The Article will show that the proposed federal product liability law would provide fair and balanced common-sense rules that draw upon strong mainstream academic support and are consistent with the laws of many states. Furthermore, the Article will describe ways in which the proposed legislation would benefit consumers and businesses, create jobs, improve product safety, encourage innovation, and stimulate economic growth. The Article concludes that federal liability reform should be strongly supported.

REV_00263309

I. Historical Background

A. The Federal Interagency Task Force on Product Liability

Under Presidents Ford and Carter, a Federal Interagency Task Force on Product Liability studied the problems of liability laws intensely. The Task Force made two principal recommendations. First, to achieve the goal of enabling small businesses to have a better and fairer opportunity in the liability insurance market, the Task Force recommended that federal legislation be enacted that would allow businesses to form self-insurance pools. [20] This would require preemption of certain state insurance regulation. [21] The resulting legislation, the Product Liability Risk Retention Act, became law in 1981. [22] It was extended to all liability coverage (with the exception of workers' compensation) in 1986. [23] The legislation helped to ensure not only competitive markets, but also that any savings from the stabilization of the tort system would flow to insureds, not to insurance companies. [24]
[*1366]

Second, the Task Force found that uncertainties in the current product liability system create unnecessary legal costs, impede interstate commerce, and stifle innovation, among other problems. [25] In 1978, the Task Force, after conducting an eighteen-month study, issued a report that recommended the drafting of a model uniform product liability law for use by the states. The report intimated that reforms of the system would be enacted at the federal level if the states did not enact the model law. [26]

B. The Model Uniform Product Liability Act

A final version of the model law, known as the Model Uniform Product Liability Act, [27] has been the basis for legislation in about nine states. Unfortunately, the Uniform Act has not been applied uniformly. Instead, state legislatures have adopted provisions of the law in a piecemeal fashion. This trend continued into 1995 with the enactment of various liability reform laws in Illinois, [28] Texas, [29] Indiana, [30] North Dakota, [31] New Jersey, [32] Oregon, [33] and Wisconsin, [34] among other states.

C. Problems with a State-by-State Approach

One inherent problem with state product liability legislation, apart from rules that differ from state to state, is that a state cannot regulate product liability problems outside its borders. On average, over seventy percent of the goods that are manufactured in a particular state are shipped and sold out of that state. [35] For this reason, state tort reform legislation, while useful, often has less than a thirty percent "effectiveness" standard for that state's businesses. On the other hand, all of a state's citizens who sue in the state are governed by the state's product liability law. Thus, while enactment of product liability legislation in individual states can be helpful, product liability is a matter of interstate commerce.
[*1367]

The Conference of State Supreme Court Justices, the National Conference of State Legislators, and other credible sources believe that the formulation of product liability law should be left solely to the states. [36] On the other hand, some state courts, despite their sensitivity to states' rights, believe that a federal product liability law is appropriate. These courts have recognized that federal liability legislation is the only mechanism to ensure that fair and uniform law will be applied evenly throughout the United States. [37]

Furthermore, since 1986, the National Governors' Association (NGA) has supported a federal product liability law. [38] On January 31, 1995, for the third time, the NGA adopted a resolution calling for Congress to enact a uniform federal product liability law. [39] The NGA's most recent resolution reads in pertinent part:

REV_00263310

The National Governors' Association recognizes that the current patchwork of U.S. product liability laws is too costly, time-consuming, unpredictable, and counter productive, resulting in severely adverse effects on American consumers, workers, competitiveness, innovation and commerce. [*1368]

Clearly, a national product liability code would greatly enhance the effectiveness of interstate commerce. The Governors urge Congress to adopt a federal uniform product liability code. [40]

Moreover, the strongly states' rights-oriented American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC), the nation's largest bipartisan coalition of state legislators with over 2400 members nationwide, supports the enactment of federal product liability legislation. [41] ALEC has several times called on Congress to enact a federal product liability law. [42]

In February 1992 the Defense Research Institute (DRI), the principal national organization of defense attorneys, reversed its long-standing opposition and now supports federal product liability reform legislation. [43] The DRI previously supported reform on a state-by-state basis. [44]

Interestingly, the Europeans began an effort to enact uniform product liability law a year or two after the U.S. Congress first looked at the subject in late 1981. In July 1985 the Council of the European Community adopted a uniform product liability directive that is now the law in thirteen European countries. [45] Amazingly, it has been easier for these diverse European countries to cede their sovereignty in this area than it has been for the U.S. Congress to agree on a uniform law for the United States. In addition to Europe's adoption of a uniform code, Japan has enacted its first product liability law, which became effective on July 1, 1995. [46]

D. Legislatures Versus Courts

Some consumer advocacy groups and plaintiffs' lawyers have argued that neither Congress nor state legislatures have any business in reforming liability laws. They contend that the subject should be left to the courts. Most recently, for example, President of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America (ATLA) Larry Stewart suggested to both [*1369] the House and Senate Commerce Committees that product liability law should be left to the courts on a case-by-case basis. [47]

Proponents of reform, however, do not advocate a complete federal "takeover" of product liability law. But in a few core areas, Congress is better suited to formulate sound national policy than courts operating in fifty-one different jurisdictions. [48] Proponents of a uniform federal product liability law believe that when courts formulate law, in general, they only have the opportunity to hear from two attorneys who are focused on the interests of their clients. In contrast, Congress has had the opportunity of hearing, as the records clearly show, from a broad spectrum of interests. Congress can formulate rules with the nation's interests in mind. Moreover, Congress has been developing product liability rules for over a decade and a half. The rules, of course, will only apply to cases filed after the date of enactment of the law. [49]

Arguably, Congress has acted more deliberately than some courts have. For over two hundred years, tort law had developed very slowly in the courts, without abrupt change. In current times, however, abrupt changes are occurring more frequently. [50] In addition, when courts make law, their rules are formulated only after a case has been decided by a jury. If the same "common-law" system were used to determine speeds on highways, for example, the signs would be turned backward and the speed limit subject to change daily - rules regarding wrongdoing would be made only after a person was given a speeding ticket. [*1370]

REV_00263311

II. Principal Provisions of Liability Reform Legislation in the 104th Congress

Congress has long exercised its authority in matters of interstate commerce by enacting federal solutions to national problems. [51] The liability reform legislation considered by the 104th Congress was consistent with this traditional area of activity.

A. Fair Rules for Product Seller, Lessor, and Renter Liability

Product sellers in about thirty states that wholesale or sell a product are potentially liable for defects that they are neither aware of nor able to discover. [52] They are often drawn in as defendants in product liability cases. Product sellers, however, rarely pay the judgment. In more than ninety-five percent of the cases, the manufacturer bears responsibility for the harm. [53] The seller gets contribution or indemnification from the manufacturer, and the manufacturer ultimately pays the damages. [54]

This approach generates substantial, unnecessary legal costs. [55] As a consequence, the expense incurred by small businesses is passed on to consumers in the form of higher prices. [56] A more efficient alternative is for the claimant to sue the manufacturer directly and to sue the product seller only if it was directly at fault. [57] Approximately twenty states already have changed their laws and now hold product sellers, such as wholesalers and retailers, liable in tort only if they were negli- [*1371] gent (for example, misassembled the product or failed to convey appropriate warnings to customers). [58]

House Bill 956 would have held product sellers liable only for their own negligence or for a product's failure to conform to an express warranty made by the product seller. [59] A product seller, however, would have been held liable for the manufacturer's errors if the manufacturer could not be brought into court in any state where the action could have been brought or if the court determined that the manufacturer lacked funds to pay the judgment. [60] Thus, the provision would have ensured that an injured person could always sue either the manufacturer or the product seller.

The legislation also provided relief for companies that rent or lease products. [61] These companies are subject in ten states and the District of Columbia to liability for the tortious acts of their lessees and renters, even if the rental company is not negligent and there is no defect in the product. [62] In these minority of states, a rental company is held vicariously liable for the negligence of its customers simply because the company owns the product and has given permission for its use. [63]

House Bill 956 provided that companies that rent or lease products would be subject to liability in a product liability action for their own negligence, but not the negligence of those beyond their control. [64] [*1372]

B. Barring Claims Due to a Person's Use of Illegal Drugs or Drunkenness

In about eleven states, conduct such as abusing alcohol or drugs does not preclude a person from recovering in a product liability action, even if the drug or alcohol usage was a substantial cause of the harm. [65] For many years, product liability proposals in Congress have sought to change this law. For example, House Bill 956 provided that if the principal cause of an accident is the claimant's intoxification, he would not be able to recover. [66] The provision was based on a statute enacted in the State of Washington. [67]

REV_00263312

The alcohol/drug defense represents good public policy. [68] It lets people know that if the effects of drugs or alcohol are the principal cause of an accident, they will not recover through the product liability system. [69] The alcohol/drug defense also relieves law-abiding citizens from the burden of subsidizing others' irresponsible conduct through higher consumer prices.

C. Limiting Recovery for Those Who Misuse or Alter Products

Under the current product liability system, in some instances, defendants are required to pay for harms caused by claimants who grossly misuse products then turn to the "deep pocket" for compensation when they are injured. As a result, manufacturers and responsible consumers are unfairly punished. This system reflects bad policy, and clearly deviates from traditional notions of fairness and individual responsibility.

House Bill 956 placed responsibility for the reasonable use of products where it is most effective - on the person using the product. [70] Following the law in the majority of states, [71] House Bill 956 provided that a claimant's damage award would be reduced by the amount attributable to misuse or alteration of a product if the defend- [*1373] ant could show that the misuse or alteration was in violation of adequate warnings or instructions, or involved a risk of harm that should have been known by an ordinary user of the product. [72]

D. Uniform Time Limits on Liability

1. Pro-Plaintiff "Discovery Rule" Statute of Limitations. - House Bill 956 would have established a two-year statute of limitations for product liability actions that would begin to run when the claimant discovered or, in the exercise of reasonable care, should have discovered both the harm that is the subject of the action and its cause. [73] This provision would have opened courthouse doors to many whose right to sue would no longer depend on which state statute happened to apply to their claim.

House Bill 956 also would have alleviated the frequent hardship to the families who have lost a loved one caused by the statute of limitation periods in state wrongful death statutes. Unlike the prevailing rule in most state wrongful death statutes, which bars claims after a certain number of years following the date of the family member's death, the bill would have preserved these claims for the "discovery" period, that is, until two years after a surviving relative discovered, or in the exercise of reasonable diligence could have discovered, the cause of his loved one's death. [74]

2. Statute of Repose. - For over a decade and a half, scores of small business owners have testified about the effect of liability for very old machine tools and durable goods. The products have been used safely for a substantial period of time and manufacturers are willing to stand behind warranties they make about how long a product will last. Nevertheless, as a result of liability from stale claims, some of these companies are, by no fault of their own, falling behind competitively because they are disadvantaged by liability rules that create an artificial preference for newer, mostly foreign, industries. [75]

Principal competitors of the United States have enacted legislation recognizing that, at some point, an outer time limit on litigation is reasonable and necessary. The new "pro-consumer" Japanese product liability law and the European Community Product Liability Directive have a repose period of ten years that covers all products. [76] In the [*1374] United States, a growing number of states (approximately seventeen) have enacted statutes of repose ranging from eight years to a maximum of fifteen years, with the typical repose period between ten and twelve years. [77] Recently, Congress enacted the General Aircraft

REV_00263313

Revitalization Act of 1994, which created a federal eighteen-year statute of repose for general aviation aircraft. [78]

House Bill 956, which was not preemptive of state statutes, elected a fifteen-year statute of repose. [79] This is fifty percent longer than the Japanese law and the European Directive, and equal in length to the longest state statute of repose, which is currently the law in the State of Texas. [80] The provision was limited to durable goods and did not apply in cases involving a "toxic harm." [81]

E. Alternative Dispute Resolution

The legal system is inaccessible to many product liability claimants because of its complexity and expense. The alternative dispute resolution (ADR) procedure provision in House Bill 956 [82] would have increased access to the legal system and sped resolution of legal disputes so that money would be distributed to claimants more quickly. [*1375]

House Bill 956 allowed either party to a dispute to offer to proceed pursuant to any voluntary and nonbinding ADR procedures established in the law of the state where the action is brought or under the rules of the court in which the action is maintained. [83] The legislation would have required the offer to be made within sixty days after service of the initial complaint or the applicable deadline for a responsive pleading, whichever is later. [84] There would have been no penalty on a party who refuses to proceed to ADR. [85]

The ADR provision would have been especially beneficial for persons with smaller claims, because they frequently are unable to afford or obtain lawyers to represent them in expensive courtroom litigation. Such plaintiffs more easily can secure attorneys to represent them in ADR proceedings, which are free of cumbersome rules of procedure and evidence and do not require the use of expensive expert witnesses. [86]

F. Punitive Damages - Clear and Basic Rules for Quasi-Criminal Punishment

1. In General. - The U.S. Supreme Court has observed that punitive damages have "run wild" in the United States, jeopardizing fundamental constitutional rights. [87] The Court has held that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment imposes a substantive limit on the size of punitive damages awards. [88] It has also held that [*1376] the Constitution provides procedural limits on when and how punitive damages may be awarded. [89]

Some opponents of punitive damage reform have obscured a very basic fact: punitive damages are punishment. [90] Punitive damages developed out of English law to serve as a "helper" to the criminal law, and the focus was, and should be on, conduct that was of such a publicly egregious nature that it should be subject to criminal punishment. [91] They are not intended to compensate people for something they have lost; that purpose is accomplished by compensatory damages. [92] Nevertheless, unlike the criminal law system, in many states there are virtually no standards for when punitive damages may be awarded and no clear guidelines as to their amount - good behavior is swept in with the bad. [93]

The unpredictable nature of the current system has resulted in overdeterrence and has inhibited product innovation. [94] A Conference Board study of corporate executives reported that fear of liability suits prompted thirty-six percent of the firms studied to discontinue a product and thirty percent to withhold a new product. [95] Clearly, rational rules are needed to promote innovation and responsible manufacturing practices, while at the same time providing assurances that wrongdoers will be justly punished and deterred from future misconduct.

House Bill 956 incorporated the basic elements of any criminal law. First, it defined the "crime," or the offense that deserves punishment. [96] Second, it provided for clear standards of proof so that judges and juries can appreciate that they are imposing punishment for reprehensible conduct, and not merely negligence. [97] Finally, and [*1377] most importantly, it defined the potential judgment or "sentence." [98] At present, punitive damages law fails these requirements, as evidenced by the Supreme Court's concern about punitive damages that "run wild." [99]

REV_00263314

2. Defining When Punitive Damages May Be Awarded. - Under House Bill 956, punitive damages would have been awarded only if the plaintiff proved by "clear and convincing evidence" that the defendant violated the standard of "conscious, flagrant indifference to the rights or safety of others." [100] The "clear and convincing evidence" burden of proof standard represents a "middle ground" between the burden of proof standard ordinarily used in civil cases ("preponderance of the evidence"), and the criminal law standard ("beyond a reasonable doubt"). [101] It reflects the quasi-criminal nature of punitive damages. The standard is now law by statute or decision in twenty-eight states and the District of Columbia, [102] and has been recommended by each of the principal academic groups to analyze the law of punitive damages since 1979, including the American Bar Association, the American College of Trial Lawyers, and the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws. [103] The Supreme [*1378] Court has recognized the merits of the "clear and convincing evidence" burden of proof standard in punitive damages cases. [104]

3. Making the Punishment Proportional to the Harm. - Perhaps most importantly, House Bill 956 put reasonable parameters on the amount of punitive damages awarded to help assure that punishment is proportional to harm. It permitted punitive damages to be awarded against larger businesses up to the greater of two times a plaintiff's compensatory damages (economic and noneconomic loss), or $ 250,000. [105] It also recognized that smaller businesses and organizations, as well as individuals, need special protection from excessive punitive damages. The legislation thus set forth the maximum amount of punitive damages recoverable against an individual or small business as the lesser of two times the amount awarded to the claimant for economic and noneconomic losses, or $ 250,000. [106] Judges would have been permitted to augment the punitive damages award against a larger business up to the amount of the jury verdict by finding the "proportionate" award "insufficient to punish the egregious conduct of the defendant." [107] This provision was a limited measure intended to be applied only in cases when the defendant's misconduct was extraordinarily harmful and far exceeded "conscious, flagrant indifference to the safety of others." [108]

The proportionality requirements in House Bill 956, as in the criminal law, would have helped ensure that the punishment is proportional to the harm. "Mainstream" academic groups, including the American Bar Association and the American College of Trial Lawyers, have recommended that punitive damages be awarded in proportion [*1379] to actual damages. [109] Furthermore, approximately one-quarter of the states have enacted legislation to address the problem of excessive punitive damages, most recently including Illinois, Indiana, New Jersey, North Carolina, Oklahoma, and Texas. [110] House Bill 956 did not preempt more restrictive state laws limiting punitive damages. [111]

4. Bifurcation. - House Bill 956 also would have made a procedural reform called "bifurcation," which a number of states have enacted. [112] At either party's request, the trial may be divided so that the proceedings on punitive damages would be separate from and subsequent to the proceedings on compensatory damages. Judicial economy is achieved by having the same jury determine both compensatory damages and punitive damages issues. [*1380]

Bifurcated trials are equitable, because they prevent evidence that is highly prejudicial and relevant only to the issue of punishment from being heard by jurors and improperly considered when they are determining basic liability (for example, the net worth of a company or the wealth of a defendant). Bifurcation also helps jurors "compartmentalize" a trial, allowing them to more easily separate the burden of proof that is required for compensatory damage awards (proof by a preponderance of the evidence) from a higher burden of proof (proof by clear and convincing evidence) for punitive damages.

REV_00263315

Recognizing these benefits, some courts have recently required bifurcation as a matter of common-law reform. [113] Other states have made similar changes through court rules or legislation. [114] This reform is supported by the American Law Institute's Reporters' Study, the American Bar Association, the American College of Trial Lawyers, and the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws. [115]

G. Balanced Rules for Joint Liability

The rule of joint liability, commonly called joint and several liability, provides that when two or more persons engage in conduct that might subject them to individual liability and their conduct produces a single, indivisible injury, each defendant will be liable for the total amount of damages. [116] The Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation observed that the system is "unfair and [it] blunts incentives for safety, because it allows negligent actors to under-insure and puts full responsibility on those who may have been only marginally at fault." [117] Thus, a jury's specific finding that a defendant is minimally at fault is overridden and the minor player in the lawsuit bears an unfair and costly burden. [118] [*1381]

Joint and several liability is extremely harmful to society. For example, it has caused suppliers of raw materials and component parts to refuse to supply manufacturers of medical devices. As a result, patients who need medical devices suffer. It has also caused manufacturers of protective sporting goods equipment, such as safety helmets, to withdraw products from the market or to be chilled from introducing new products. [119] Recognizing the need for reform of this unfair doctrine, at least thirty-three states have abolished or modified the principle of joint and several liability. [120]

House Bill 956 adopted a balanced approach between those who call for the abolition of joint liability and those who wish to leave it unchecked. The legislation eliminated joint liability for "noneconomic damages" (such as damages for pain and suffering or emotional distress), while permitting the states to retain full joint liability with respect to economic losses (for example, lost wages, medical expenses, and substitute domestic services). [121] This means that the legislation would have held each defendant liable for noneconomic damages in an amount proportional to its percentage of fault for the harm. [122] This "fair share" rule was based on a joint liability reform enacted in California through a ballot initiative approved by the majority of voters in 1986. [123] The same approach was enacted by the Nebraska legislature in 1991. [124]

H. Creating Incentives for a Safe Workplace

Workers' compensation statutes have essentially two purposes: to provide an employee injured in the course of employment with a quick and inexpensive way to recover for his injury, and to maximize the incentive for employers to maintain a safe workplace. [125] In most states, however, the incentive for employers to ensure workplace safety has been substantially undermined. In these states, if an employee [*1382] has a successful product liability claim against a manufacturer or product seller, his employer can recover the amount of workers' compensation benefits paid to the employee from the product liability damage award, even if the employer is responsible for the injury. [126] If the employee obtains product liability damages against the manufacturer, the employer takes back the amount of workers' compensation it paid to the employee. [127] This result occurs even when the employer's negligence has been a principal cause of the accident. Workers' compensation experts have vehemently criticized this rule, because it has "set[ ] ... off a flood of confusion and litigation." [128]

REV_00263316

House Rpt.104-064p1 - COMMON SENSE LEGAL STANDARDS REFORM ACT OF 1995

TITLE II--PUNITIVE DAMAGES REFORM

SEC. 201. PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

(a) GENERAL RULE- Punitive damages may, to the extent permitted by applicable State law, be awarded in any civil action for harm in any Federal or State court against a defendant if the claimant establishes by clear and convincing evidence that the harm suffered was result of conduct--

(1) specifically intended to cause harm, or

(2) conduct manifesting a conscious, flagrant indifference to the rights of others.

(b) PROPORTIONAL AWARDS- The amount of punitive damages that may be awarded to a claimant in any civil action subject to this title shall not exceed 3 times the amount of damages awarded to the claimant for the economic loss on which the claimant's action is based, or $250,000, whichever is greater. The requirements of this subsection shall be applied by the court and shall not be disclosed to the jury.

(c) APPLICABILITY AND PREEMPTION- Except as provided in section 301, this title shall apply to any civil action brought in any Federal or State court on any theory where punitive damages are sought. This title does not create a cause of action for punitive damages in any jurisdiction that does not authorize such actions.

(d) BIFURCATION AT EITHER PARTY'S REQUEST- At the request of either party, the trier of fact shall consider in a separate proceeding whether punitive damages are to be awarded and the amount of such award. If a separate proceeding is requested, evidence relevant only to the claim of punitive damages, as determined by applicable State law, shall be inadmissible in any proceeding to determine whether compensatory damages are to be awarded.

SEC. 202. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this title:

(1) The term `claimant' means any person who brings a civil action and any person on whose behalf such an action is brought; if such action is brought through or on behalf of an estate, the term includes the claimant's decedent and if such action is brought through or on behalf of a minor or incompetent, the term includes the claimant's legal guardian.

REV_00263327

(2) The term `clear and convincing evidence' is that measure or degree of proof that will produce in the mind of the trier of fact a firm belief or conviction as to the truth of the allegations sought to be established. The level of proof required to satisfy such standard is more than that required under preponderance of the evidence, but less than that required for proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

(3) The term `economic loss' means any pecuniary loss resulting from harm (including the loss of earnings, medical expense loss, replacement services loss, loss due to death, burial costs, and loss of business or employment opportunities), to the extent recovery for such loss is allowed under applicable State law.

(4) The term `harm' means any legally cognizable wrong or injury for which punitive damages may be imposed.

(5) The term `punitive damages' means damages awarded against any person or entity to punish or deter such person or entity, or others, from engaging in similar behavior in the future.

(6) The term `State' means any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, the Northern Mariana Islands, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, and any other territory or possession of the United States, or any political subdivision of any of the foregoing.

TITLE III--EFFECT ON OTHER LAW; EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 301. EFFECT ON OTHER LAW.

Nothing in title I or II shall be construed to--

(1) waive or affect any defense of sovereign immunity asserted by any State under any law;

(2) supersede any Federal law;

(3) waive or affect any defense of sovereign immunity asserted by the United States;

(4) affect the applicability of any provision of chapter 97 of title 28, United States Code;

(5) preempt State choice-of-law rules with respect to claims brought by a foreign nation or a citizen of a foreign nation;

(6) affect the right of any court to transfer venue or to apply the law of a foreign nation or to dismiss a claim of a foreign nation or of a citizen of a foreign nation on the ground of inconvenient forum; or

(7) supersede any Federal law that prescribes a specific regimen for punitive damages.

REV_00263328

THIS SEARCH	THIS DOCUMENT	GOTO
Next Doc	Forward	New Search
Prev Doc	Back	Home Page
Doc List	Highlight Search Words	Help
	Doc Contents

REV_00263329

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: punitive damages and mogin and judge (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*36 U.S.F.L. Rev. 411, **

Copyright (c) 2002 University of San Francisco School of Law University of San Francisco of Law

Winter, 2002

36 U.S.F.L. Rev. 411

LENGTH: 29931 words

ARTICLE: Has the Supreme Court Sounded the Death Knell for Jury Assessed Punitive Damages? A Critical Re-Examination of the American Jury

By Lisa Litwiller*

* Assistant Professor of Law, Chapman University School of Law. The author wishes to thank Professor Katherine B. Darmer for her helpful comments, and Brian L. Williams and Michael S. Vasin for their able research assistance.

SUMMARY:
... To the extent that modern juries function solely as fact finders, the assessment of a punitive damage award, at least as to the amount, is outside the purview of the jury. ... Many of the early Colonial Charters incorporated the right to jury trial. ... The defendant requested a jury trial, but the district court denied the request. ... The Court in BMW was not so shy, and although the Court divided by a five to four margin, BMW became the first case that "invalidated a state court punitive damage assessment solely because of its excessive amount. ... Applying these factors to BMW's conduct, the Court concluded that the punitive damage component of the verdict violated BMW's substantive due process right to be free from excessive punitive damage awards, and remanded the case to the Alabama Supreme Court for further proceedings. ... In an unpublished opinion, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the punitive damage award and determined that the district court had found that it was "proportional and fair" and that the size of the award "did not violate Cooper's due process rights. ... In order to avoid this problem, the Court concluded that a punitive damage award was not a "fact" because of the nature of the punitive award itself. ... First, punitive damage awards are not a "fact." ...

TEXT:
[*411]

LAST TERM, the United States Supreme Court drastically altered the balance of power between judge and jury, and the legal community barely noticed. Although Cooper Industries, Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc. [1] is remarkable for what it does overtly - it changes the standard of review in punitive damages cases from an abuse of discretion review to de novo review; it is even more remarkable for what it does covertly - it arguably takes the right to assess punitive damages in the first instance entirely out of the hands of the jury.

According to the Court, "unlike the measure of actual damages suffered, which presents a

REV_00263330

courts permit juries to add to the measured compensation of the plaintiff which he would have been entitled to recover, had the injury been inflicted without design or intention, something farther by way of punishment or example, which has sometimes been called 'smart money'; This has been always left to the discretion of the jury, as the degree of punishment to be thus inflicted must depend on the peculiar circumstances of each case. [108]

Thus, despite the Court's recognition that punitive damages were controversial, it concluded that the practice of awarding them was so deeply ingrained in the common law, it would violate principles of stare decisis to strike them down. Day is interesting, moreover, in that it purports to hold that punitive damage awards must always be left to the discretion of the jury. In the next Part, this Article explores the degree to which the Court has moved away from that position.

II. The Relative Power of the Judge and Jury in Awarding Damages

A. The Early Common Law

Throughout the history of using juries in civil trials, there have been questions about what is within the province of the jury and what is not. For example, there was much debate about what constituted an action in equity, which did not carry the right to a jury trial, and one at law, which did. This debate was particularly acrimonious prior to the merger that occurred with the adoption of the Federal Rules in 1938. Even after the merger, the debate continues. [109] In colonial America, juries were sometimes given the ability to decide matters of law as well as fact. [110] There are even documented cases of a judge [*431] instructing a jury to "redeliberate" and return a different verdict. [111] A particularly knotty problem, however, has been the extent to which a judge has the right to interfere with the amount awarded by juries, particularly where the award is punitive as opposed to compensatory.

Historically, judicial interference with jury awards and determinations has a substantial pedigree. For example, in 1655, the Upper Bench ordered a new trial in Wood v. Gunston, [112] a defamation case in which the plaintiff had been branded a "traitor." The jury awarded him £ 1500. A motion was made to set aside the verdict and grant a [*432] new trial. The Upper Bench granted the motion, stating "it is frequent in our books for the Court to take notice of miscarriages of juries, and to grant new tryals upon them ... ." [113] Likewise, in Ash v. Ash, [114] a daughter sued her mother for assault, battery, and false imprisonment. The plaintiff was confined for approximately two to three hours, and the jury awarded £ 2000. Chief Justice Holt overturned the award and granted a new trial, explaining that the jury thought it had "an absolute despotick power," but that he, the judge, "did rectify that mistake, for the jury are to try causes with the assistance of the Judges, and ought to give reasons when required." [115]

Nearly one hundred years later, the King's Bench reaffirmed Ash in Sharpe v. Brice. [116] In an action for trespass against a customs official, the plaintiff recovered £ 500 in damages, which the trial judge found to be "very excessive," and a new trial was ordered. The plaintiff argued that a new trial could not be granted in tort, as opposed to contract, actions because of excessive damages. The reasoning was that in tort actions the jury has discretion to award the appropriate amount and that, unlike contract actions, the amount of damages was not fixed. The court disagreed: "It has never been laid down, that the Court will not grant a new trial for excessive damages in any cases of tort. It was held so long ago ... that the jury have not a despotic power in such actions." [117] Rather, a new trial could be had in tort actions where "the damages [are] excessive and outrageous ... ." [118]

REV_00263339

Courts in the newly formed United States were more cautious about reducing jury awards, particularly where the awards were characterized as compensatory rather than punitive. [119] In Tillotson v. Cheetham [120] the plaintiff was the Secretary of State of New York. The defendant published a newspaper called the Republican Watch Tower, in which he accused the plaintiff of accepting bribes and behaving [*433] in a generally corrupt manner. The jury awarded $ 1,400 in damages, at which time the defendant moved for a new trial on the basis of excessive damages. The court refused, stating that it could not interfere on account of the damages. A case must be very gross, and the recovery enormous to justify our interposition on a mere question of damages, in an action of slander. We have no standard by which we can measure the just amount and ascertain the excess. It is a matter resting in the sound discretion of a jury. [121]

Similarly, Coleman v. Southwick [122] is another defamation case in which the jury awarded $ 5,000. There, the court said, the question of damages was within the proper and peculiar province of the jury. It rested in their sound discretion, under all the circumstances of the case, and unless the damages are so outrageous as to strike every one with the enormity and injustice of them, and so as to induce the court to believe that the jury must have acted from prejudice, partiality or corruption, we cannot, consistently with the precedents interfere with the verdict. [123]

The court went on to state, the damages, therefore, must be so excessive as to strike mankind, at first blush, as being beyond all measure unreasonable and outrageous, and such as manifestly show the jury to have been actuated by passion, partiality, prejudice, or corruption. In short, the damages must be flagrantly outrageous and extravagant, or the court cannot undertake to draw the line, for they have no standard by which to ascertain the excess. [124]

Justice Spencer dissented, stating that he would "not enter upon the question of excessiveness of damages, and desire to be understood, as neither denying or supporting the doctrine advanced by a majority of the court upon that point ... ." [125]

[*434] One commentator theorizes that juridical reluctance to disturb jury awards, particularly awards arising out of slander or defamation, is as much a function of societal concerns as it is of judicial restraint.

Early nineteenth-century reporters reveal a world in which dignitary concerns - honor and a good name - were far more prized than today. The torts that vindicated those concerns - slander, libel, trivial battery, criminal conversation - were much more frequently brought and were treated with great seriousness by the courts. Judges in these cases were very reluctant to interfere with damages. In case after case, courts admitted that damages were very large, larger than the court might like, but were within the jury's discretion both because they were difficult to measure and because some public policy might be served by large damages. [126]

The Supreme Court continued to remain solicitous of the jury's right to assess damages. In Parsons v. Bedford, [127] Justice Story observed that the trial by jury is justly dear to the American people. It has always been an object of deep interest and solicitude, and every encroachment upon it has been watched with great jealousy ... . One of the strongest objections originally taken against the constitution of the United States, was the want of an express provision securing the right of trial by jury in civil cases. As soon as the constitution was adopted, this right was secured by the Seventh Amendment of the constitution proposed by congress; and which received an assent of the people so general, as to establish its importance as a fundamental guarantee of the rights and liberties of the people. [128]

Nonetheless, incursions began to be made. The earliest instance of an American court granting a new trial on the basis of excessive damages appears to have been Kuhn v. North. [129] That case was an action for trespass in which a sheriff was made to levy on the plaintiff's property pursuant to a faulty warrant. When the jury returned a verdict for $ 950, the court stated that it could not account for these heavy damages, except on the ground of some misconception of the jury, perhaps arising from something said in the charge, and because, though I have cautioned them against intemperate damages, the jury might have conceived, from a remark [*435] by me often made, that of damages they were the sole and exclusive judges. [130]

The court continued as follows:

And if there were any principle of law, denying the power of the court to grant a new trial on account of excessive damages, in any action of tort, I would not do it in this; but there is no such principle. If there were, it would be time to change it; such an arbitrary power, vested in any body of men, judges or jurors, would be intolerable. [131]

Blunt v. Little [132] was the first case to authorize the use of remittitur. [133] The action was for malicious prosecution and the jury returned a verdict for $ 2,000. Justice Story began by stating that "the court may grant a new trial for excessive damages," but only when "it should clearly appear that the jury have committed a gross error, or have acted from improper motives, or have given damages excessive in relation to the person or the injury, [then] it is as much the duty of the court to interfere, to prevent the wrong ... ." [134] He concluded by stating that "the cause should be submitted to another jury, unless the plaintiff is willing to remit $ 500 of his damages." [135]

REV_00263341

More than sixty years later, the Supreme Court finally blessed the use of remittitur in Northern Pacific Railroad Co. v. Herbert. [136] There, the defendant argued that remittitur was improper because it invaded the province of the jury. The Court responded that the exaction, as a condition of refusing a new trial, that the plaintiff should remit a portion of the amount awarded by the verdict was a matter within the discretion of the court. [The trial court] held that the amount found was excessive, but that no error had been committed on the trial. In requiring the remission of what was deemed excessive it did nothing more than require the relinquishment of so much of the damages as, in its opinion, the jury had improperly awarded. The corrected verdict could, therefore, be properly allowed to stand. [137]

The practice of remittitur came under constitutional attack in Arkansas Valley Land & Cattle Co. v. Mann. [138] In particular, the defendant [*436] argued that remittitur deprived him of his Seventh Amendment right to jury trial. In response, the Court held that to make the decision of the motion for a new trial depend upon a remission of part of the verdict is, in effect, a re-examination by the court, in a mode not known at the common law, of facts tried by the jury and therefore was a violation of the Seventh Amendment of the constitution. [139]

The Court further explained:

The practice which this court approved in Railroad Co. v. Herbert is sustained by sound reason, and does not, in any just sense, impair the constitutional right of trial by jury. It cannot be disputed that the court is within the limits of its authority when it sets aside the verdict of the jury, and grants a new trial, where the damages are palpably or outrageously excessive. But, in considering whether a new trial should be granted upon that ground, the court necessarily determines, in its own mind, whether a verdict for a given amount would be liable to the objection that it was excessive. The authority of the court to determine whether the damages are excessive implies authority to determine when they are not of that character. To indicate, before passing upon the motion for a new trial, its opinion that the damages are excessive, and to require a plaintiff to submit to a new trial, unless, by remitting a part of the verdict, he removes that objection, certainly does not deprive the defendant of any right, or give him any cause for complaint. Notwithstanding such remission, it is still open to him to show, in the court which tried the case, that the plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict in any sum, and to insist, either in that court or in the appellate court, that such errors of law were committed as entitled him to have a new trial of the whole case. [140]

Judges were not given a totally free reign with respect to remittitur, however. In Kennon v. Gilmer, [141] the jury returned a verdict for actual damages in the amount of $ 20,000 and medical expenses of $ 750. The defendant appealed and the Supreme Court of Montana reduced the award by half. The United States Supreme Court held that this procedure violated the Seventh Amendment. It held that the proper procedure was remittitur or new trial, but that the reviewing court could not simply substitute its own interpretation of the proper amount of the award. [142]

REV_00263342

Toward the end of the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court examined the role of the judge and jury in awarding damages, and came down squarely on the side of the jury. In Barry v. Edmunds, [143] the [*437] plaintiff attempted to satisfy a lien against property arising out of unpaid back taxes. He attempted to pay, in part, with coupons issued by the State of Virginia. The tax collector refused the tender and levied on the plaintiff's property by forcibly removing a horse, which the plaintiff claimed was worth more than twice what he owed. Prior to the levy, the Court had held that payment in the form of the state's tax receivable coupons was sufficient to extinguish the debt, but Virginia's legislature then enacted a statute ordering the tax collector to levy against the property of a tax payer who attempted to use the coupons.

Eventually the defendant, in his role as tax collector, advertised throughout the county that the plaintiff was a delinquent taxpayer, and that his property would be sold at public auction to satisfy the debt, which was viewed by the plaintiff as defamation. He brought suit in federal court, which declined jurisdiction because the damages could not, in the judge's view, exceed the statutory minimum of $ 500. In reversing, the Court held that the jury had broad discretion to impose "exemplary, punitive, or vindictive damages." [144] The Court then made the following, rather sweeping, pronouncement:

For nothing is better settled than that, in such cases as the present, and other actions for torts where no precise rule of law fixes the recoverable damages, it is the peculiar function of the jury to determine the amount by their verdict ... . [A] verdict will not be set aside in a case of tort for excessive damages "unless the court can clearly see that the jury have committed some very gross and palpable error, or have acted under some improper bias, influence, or prejudice, or have totally mistaken the rules of law by which the damages are to be regulated," that is, "unless the verdict is so excessive or outrageous," with reference to all the circumstances of the case, "as to demonstrate that the jury have acted against the rules of law, or have suffered their passions, their prejudices, or their perverse disregard of justice to mislead them." In no case is it permissible for the court to substitute itself for the jury, and compel a compliance on the part of the latter with its own view of the facts in evidence, as the standard and measure of that justice, which the jury itself is the appointed constitutional tribunal to award. [145]

B. Twentieth Century Cases

Notwithstanding the broad language of Edmunds, during the course of the twentieth century, the Supreme Court continued to make incursions into the jury's historically powerful role in American [*438] jurisprudence. This move was precipitated by a fundamental shift in the way the Court viewed the method by which it would determine what questions would be left to a jury. From the adoption of the Seventh Amendment, the Court typically used a historical test. In United States v. Wonson, [146] Justice Story, while riding circuit, [147] heard an action for a debt incurred by the defendant pursuant to the Embargo Supplementary Act in which the jury returned a defense verdict, and the United States appealed.

Interpreting the Seventh Amendment, Justice Story stated that the reference to "common law" refers to English common law: "Beyond all question, the common law here alluded to is not the common law of any individual state (for it probably differs in all), but is the common law of England, the grand reservoir of all our jurisprudence." [148] He elaborated, contending that, "according to the rules of the common law the facts once tried by a jury are never re-examined, unless a new trial is granted in the discretion of the court, before which the suit is depending, for good cause shown ... ." [149]

REV_00263343

Nonetheless, the Court began to use procedural devices to take verdicts from juries and began to take a functional, as opposed to historical, view of the role of the jury. For example, at issue in Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland v. United States [150] was a rule of civil procedure that was a precursor to a summary judgment proceeding. The rule allowed plaintiffs in contract actions to submit affidavits establishing the existence of the contract, and the failure to pay. If the defendant could submit a counter-affidavit showing valid grounds of defense, then the case went to the jury; if not, judgment for the liquidated amount was entered for the plaintiff. Here, the defendant failed to submit a sufficient affidavit and the trial court entered judgment.

[*439] On appeal, the plaintiff argued both that the rule exceeded the power of the court to promulgate it and that it violated the Seventh Amendment. The Court disagreed:

If it were true that the rule deprived the plaintiff in error of the right of trial by jury, we should pronounce it void without reference to cases. But it does not do so. It prescribes the means of making an issue. The issue made as prescribed, the right of trial by jury accrues. The purpose of the rule is to preserve the court from frivolous defenses, and to defeat attempts to use formal pleading as means to delay the recovery of just demands. [151]

Courts were still not permitted, however, to totally substitute their judgment for that of the jury. Slocum v. New York Life Insurance Co. [152] was an action to recover benefits under a life insurance policy. The evidence clearly established that the policy had lapsed for non-payment of premiums. At trial, the defendant moved for a directed verdict and, after the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Both motions were denied. The defendant appealed to the circuit court which reversed the plaintiff's verdict and entered judgment for the defendant pursuant to an applicable state statute. The plaintiff then appealed to the United States Supreme Court alleging that the procedure violated the Seventh Amendment, and the Court agreed.

The Court stated, while on the trial in the circuit court, the jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff, the Circuit Court of Appeals on an examination of the evidence concluded that it was not sufficient to sustain the verdict, and on that ground directed a judgment for the defendant. In other words, the Circuit Court of Appeals directed a judgment for one party when the verdict was for the other, and did this on the theory, not that the judgment was required by the state of the pleadings, but that it was warranted by the evidence. It will be perceived, therefore, that the court, although practically setting the verdict aside, did not order a new trial, but assumed to pass finally upon the issues of fact presented by the pleadings and to direct a judgment accordingly. If this was an infraction of the Seventh Amendment, it matters not that it was in conformity with the state statute, or with the practice thereunder in the courts of the State, for neither the statute nor the practice could be followed in opposition to the Amendment, which, although not applicable to proceedings in the courts of the several States, is controlling in the Federal courts. [153]

REV_00263344

[*440]

The Court here appears to have returned to the historical test that was beginning to be challenged by the more functional approach. This is evidenced by the fact that the Court undertook a lengthy examination of the procedure available at "common law" for non-suit. It stated that its decisions regarding the right to jury trial established that the jurisprudence affords no justification whatever for overruling or departing from the repeated decisions of this court, reaching back to the beginning of the last century, wherein it uniformly has been held (a) that we must look to the common law for a definition of the nature and extent of the right of trial by jury which the Constitution declares "shall be preserved;" (b) that the right so preserved is the right to have the issues of fact presented by the pleadings tried by a jury of twelve, under the direction and superintendence of the court; (c) that the rendition of a verdict is of the substance of the right, because to dispense with a verdict is to eliminate the jury, which is no less a part of the tribunal charged with the trial than is the court; and (d) that when the issues have been so tried and a verdict rendered they cannot be re-examined otherwise than on a new trial granted by the court in which the first trial was had, or ordered by the appellate court for some error of law affecting the verdict. [154]

However, subsequent cases were beginning to once again move away from the historical approach. In Gasoline Products Co. v. Champlain Refining Co., [155] the Court determined that a remand on the issue of damages alone would not violate the Seventh Amendment. The Court stated that we are not now concerned with the form of the ancient rule. It is the Constitution which we are to interpret; and the Constitution is concerned, not with form, but with substance. All of vital significance in trial by jury is that issues of fact be submitted for determination with such instructions and guidance by the court as will afford opportunity for that consideration by the jury which was secured by the rules governing trials at common law. Beyond this, the Seventh Amendment does not exact the retention of old forms of procedure. It does not prohibit the introduction of new methods for ascertaining what facts are in issue, or require that an issue once correctly determined, in accordance with the constitutional command, be tried a second time, even though justice demands that another distinct issue, because erroneously determined, must again be passed on by a jury... . Here we hold that where the requirement of a jury trial has been satisfied by a verdict according to law upon one issue of fact, that requirement does not compel a [*441] new trial of that issue even though another and separable issue must be tried again. [156]

Then came the oddity that is Dimick v. Schiedt. [157] There, the plaintiff sought damages for injuries arising out of an automobile accident. The jury returned a verdict for $ 500 and the plaintiff moved for a new trial alleging, among other things, that the damages were inadequate. The trial court ordered a new trial unless the defendant would consent to an increase of the damages to $ 1,500. The defendant consented, and plaintiff's motion for new trial was denied. The defendant then appealed, and the circuit court reversed, holding that additur [158] violated the Seventh Amendment. A sharply divided Supreme Court affirmed the court of appeals. The Court began by stating that "in order to ascertain the scope and meaning of the Seventh Amendment, resort must be had to the appropriate rules of the common law established at the time of the adoption of that constitutional provision in 1791." [159] Once again, the Court appeared to be retreating back to the historical approach.

REV_00263345

The plaintiff argued that if remittitur was constitutional, as held in Blunt v. Little and its progeny, so too must additur be constitutional. Once again, the Court disagreed.

In the light reflected by the foregoing review of the English decisions and commentators, it, therefore, may be that if the question of remittitur were now before us for the first time, it would be decided otherwise. But, first announced by Mr. Justice Story in 1822, the doctrine has been accepted as the law for more than a hundred years and uniformly applied in the federal courts during that time. And, as it finds some support in the practice of the English courts prior to the adoption of the Constitution, we may assume that in a case involving a remittitur, which this case does not, the doctrine would not be reconsidered or disturbed at this late day. [160]

Noting that "maintenance of the jury as a fact-finding body is of such importance and occupies so firm a place in our history and jurisprudence that any seeming curtailment of the right to a jury trial should be scrutinized with the utmost care[,]" [161] the Court declared [*442] that it would not permit a "doubtful precedent [to be] extended by mere analogy to a different case if the result will be to weaken or subvert what it conceives to be a principle of the fundamental law of the land." [162]

In any event, the Court also found a constitutional distinction in the principles of remittitur and additur.

Where the verdict is excessive, the practice of substituting a remission of the excess for a new trial is not without plausible support in the view that what remains is included in the verdict along with the unlawful excess - in that sense that it has been found by the jury - and that the remittitur has the effect of merely lopping off an excrescence. But, where the verdict is too small, an increase by the court is a bald addition of something which in no sense can be said to be included in the verdict. [163]

To hold otherwise, concluded the Court, "is obviously to compel the plaintiff to forego his constitutional right to the verdict of a jury and accept 'an assessment partly made by a jury which has acted improperly, and partly by a tribunal which has no power to assess.'" [164]

Vacillating yet again, the Court returned to the functional approach in Galloway v. United States, [165] a case in which the Court authorized the use of the directed verdict, its rhetoric in Slocum notwithstanding. The plaintiff sought benefits under a military insurance policy, claiming total and permanent disability. The trial court directed a verdict for the defendant on the grounds that there was [*443] insufficient evidence of "total and permanent" disability because, although the plaintiff presented evidence of insanity beginning in 1919 and ending in 1941, there were gaps during which he did not meet his burden of showing "continuous" insanity. [166]

After examining the evidence, the Court concurred with this conclusion, but then embarked on a lengthy exposition of its method of interpreting the Seventh Amendment, which was decidedly functional in its approach:

REV_00263346

The Amendment did not bind the federal courts to the exact procedural incidents or details of jury trial according to the common law in 1791, any more than it tied them to the common-law system of pleading or the specific rules of evidence then prevailing. Nor were "the rules of the common law" then prevalent, including those relating to the procedure by which the judge regulated the jury's role on questions of fact, crystallized in a fixed and immutable system. On the contrary, they were constantly changing and developing during the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. In 1791 this process already had resulted in widely divergent common-law rules on procedural matters among the states, and between them and England. And none of the contemporaneous rules regarding judicial control of the evidence going to juries or its sufficiency to support a verdict had reached any precise, much less final, form. In addition, the passage of time has obscured much of the procedure which then may have had more or less definite form, even for historical purposes. [167]

Ultimately, the Court summed up its approach by stating that "the Amendment was designed to preserve the basic institution of jury trial in only its most fundamental elements, not the great mass of procedural forms and details, varying even then so widely among common-law jurisdictions." [168] The Court's approach led Justice Black to lament, in dissent, that "today's decision marks a continuation of the gradual process of judicial erosion which in one hundred fifty years has slowly worn away a major portion of the essential guarantee of the Seventh Amendment." [169]

[*444]

C. Judicial Involvement in Assessing Penalties

The preceding section has demonstrated that over the course of time, the Court has been increasingly willing to curtail some of the jury's power through procedural devices and the like. In a separate line of cases, the Court has considered the specific topic at hand - whether judges, rather than juries, are the appropriate persons to assess civil statutory penalties and punitive damages. As a starting point, recall that the Court in Day v. Woodworth [170] stated that punitive damage assessments have "always [been] left to the discretion of the jury, as the degree of punishment to be thus inflicted must depend on the peculiar circumstances of each case." [171]

However, where statutory civil penalties are concerned, the courts have been less solicitous. Swofford v. B&W, Inc. [172] is illustrative. Swofford was a patent infringement case in which the plaintiffs contended that they were entitled to have a jury assess the amount of punitive damages. However, the patent statute at issue explicitly authorized the judge to assess damages in the absence of a jury. [173] In interpreting the statute, the Fifth Circuit observed that it had found "no authority for the proposition that the parties enjoyed a constitutional right to jury trial on the award and amount of exemplary damages." [174] The court then concluded that we do not agree that a reading of these cases leads to the conclusion that exemplary damages and attorneys' fees are jury questions as of right. The reason is that exemplary damages and attorneys' fees are not money claims triable by jury, although they are awarded in a "legal" action. [175]

REV_00263347

Likewise, in Tull v. United States, [176] the government brought suit against a developer for dumping fill on wetlands in violation of the [*445] Clean Water Act. A provision of the act authorizes relief in the form of permanent or temporary injunctions and provides that violators of the Act "shall be subject to a civil penalty not to exceed $ 10,000 per day." [177] As a consequence of this provision, the government sought over $ 22 million in civil penalties. The defendant requested a jury trial, but the district court denied the request. The court, after a bench trial, concluded that the defendant was guilty of illegal dumping and fashioned a remedy that had both legal and equitable components. The total amount of civil penalties assessed by the district court was $ 325,000.

The Fourth Circuit affirmed over a dissent and the Supreme Court granted certiorari to resolve a split among the circuit courts. The Court first characterized the civil penalties as being of a "punitive nature" [178] and held that although the petitioners had the right to jury trial to determine liability, a judge was the appropriate person to fix the amount. The Court started with the legislative history of the Clean Water Act and noted that "the legislative history ... [shows] that Congress intended that trial judges perform the highly discretionary calculations necessary to award civil penalties after liability is found. We must decide therefore whether Congress can, consistent with the Seventh Amendment, authorize judges to assess civil penalties." [179]

Resorting once again to the functionality test, the Court observed that "the Seventh Amendment is silent on the question whether a jury must determine the remedy in a trial in which it must determine liability." [180] The Court concluded that the issue turned on "whether the jury must shoulder this responsibility as necessary to preserve the 'substance of the common-law right of trial by jury,'" [181] and concluded that a jury is not necessary for that purpose. The Court stated, "nothing in the Amendment's language suggests that the right to a jury trial extends to the remedy phase of a civil trial. Instead, the language defines the kind of cases for which jury trial is preserved, namely suits at common law." [182] While conceding that there is "almost no direct evidence concerning the intention of the framers of the Seventh Amendment itself," the Court asserted that "we have [*446] been presented with no evidence that the Framers meant to extend the right to a jury to the remedy phase of a civil trial." [183]

The Court also rested its decision on the rationale that Congress has authority to set limits on civil penalties.

Since Congress itself may fix the civil penalties, it may delegate that determination to trial judges. In this case, highly discretionary calculations that take into account multiple factors are necessary in order to set civil penalties under the Clean Water Act. These are the kinds of calculations traditionally performed by judges. [184]

Relying on Tull, the Fourth Circuit held that judges may substitute their judgment for the jury's on the amount of damages assessed. [185] In Shamblin's Ready Mix v. Eaton Corp., a jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and awarded $ 600,000 in punitive damages. The court of appeals reversed and remanded for a new trial, holding that the damages were excessive. The second jury awarded $ 650,000 in punitive damages and the defendant again appealed on the ground that the punitive awards were excessive. On the second appeal, the defendants urged the court of appeals to "determine the amount of punitive damages rather than remand for yet a third trial." [186] The plaintiffs, however, maintained that the Seventh Amendment required a remand so a third jury could determine the question of historical or predictive fact, the level of punitive damages is not really a 'fact' 'tried' by the jury." [2] If one takes this statement at face value, litigants no longer have a right to have a jury determine the amount of punitive damages. To the extent that modern juries function solely as fact finders, [3] the assessment of a punitive damage award, at least as to the amount, is outside the purview of the jury. Irrespective of whether, from a normative standpoint, [4] this is a desirable state of events, it is now the law of the land in federal courts. [5]

REV_00263348

[*412] This Article undertakes to trace the historical events that led both to the rise of the jury and the case law which has, over time, eroded the jury's power, culminating with the Supreme Court's decision in Cooper. This Article likewise examines the constitutional tension between the Seventh and Fourteenth Amendments that has been the focus of the Court's punitive damages jurisprudence in recent years, and proposes a framework which best utilizes the populist voice of the jury and the technical expertise of the judge, thereby maximizing the institutional strengths of each.

Accordingly, Part I focuses on the historical development of punitive damages and the jury's function in awarding them. Particular attention is paid to the origins of the jury, the adoption of the Seventh Amendment and the historical pedigree of punitive damages award. Part II examines the division of power between the judge and jury in awarding punitive damages and surveys the Supreme Court's incursions in recent years into the role of the jury. Interestingly, during this period the Court shifted from a traditional, historical analysis in which the jury's power was paramount, to a functional approach which focused on the "fundamental" characteristics of the jury. This, in turn, led to increasing judicial control over jury verdicts in general, and punitive damages awards in particular. Part III examines the constitutionality of punitive damages awards subjected to due process attacks, both from a procedural and a substantive standpoint. Part IV is an analysis of the Court's decision in Cooper, including a critical examination of the rationale of the case. Finally, Part V suggests a framework for federal district courts to employ when a plaintiff requests punitive damages in a civil case.

I. Historical Perspective

A. The Rise of the Jury

Although the origins of the first use of juries is a topic of considerable scholarly debate, [6] it appears that the first juries to perform fact finding and adjudicatory functions were created in England by Henry II, who came to the throne in 1154. [7] Henry II implemented the jury system through a series of statutory enactments that provided a remedy [*413] for dispossessed free-holders. [8] These enactments became known collectively as the assize of novel disseisin, and permitted claimants to submit their cause to a jury composed of persons with actual knowledge of the case. [9] That jurors were required to have actual knowledge of the facts of the case suggests that juries functioned as witnesses as much as fact finding bodies. [10]

The jury's dual role as fact finder and witness, however, appears to have died out by the mid-seventeenth century when it became "a punishable offense to contact or inform jurors of any facts or law relating to an impending trial." [11] By this point in history, the civil jury trial had taken on the more familiar format of jurors weighing evidence based solely upon in-court testimony. [12]

Whatever the jury's origins or original functions, it was so firmly ingrained in England's common law that the right to jury trial was given constitutional proportions when King John signed the Magna Carta on June 15, 1215. The Magna Carta provided:

REV_00263331

appropriate amount to award in punitive damages. The court stated that the issue was whether the Seventh Amendment "requires that the amount of punitive damages be determined by a jury." [187]

The court began its analysis by noting that its sister circuits had "reduced the amount of punitive damages without remanding for a new trial." [188] Although the court acknowledged that in Kennon v. Gilmore [189] the Supreme Court had held that the Seventh Amendment [*447] precludes a judge from substituting his or her judgment for the jury's with respect to compensatory damages, it held that punitive damages were fundamentally different from compensatory damages, and, therefore, Kennon did not apply. [190]

The purpose of compensatory damages is to make the plaintiff whole by vindicating a private wrong. Assessing the extent of harm is appropriately within the province of the jury in its capacity of fact finder. In contrast, punitive damages serve a public purpose. Punitive damages "are not compensation for an injury. Instead they are private fines levied by civil juries to punish reprehensible conduct and to deter its future occurrence." [191]

Further, the court held that, consistent with the Supreme Court's halting trend toward the functional test, "the measure of damages in a cause of action for a tort is not a fundamental element of a trial. The proper measure is a function of law not of facts found by a jury." [192] Finally, relying on Tull, the court stated that "there is no principled distinction between civil penalties and the modern concept of punitive damages. Both serve the same purposes to deter and punish proscribed conduct." [193] Thus, the court held that "the Seventh Amendment does not require that the amount of punitive damages be assessed by a jury." [194]

Shamblin's Ready Mix, however, turned out to have a short shelf life. Just two years later, the Fourth Circuit reversed itself and overruled Shamblin's Ready Mix in Defender Industries, Inc. v. Northwestern Mutual Life Co. [195] The court began by distinguishing Tull, the case upon which the previous panel had relied. The court noted that the Shamblin's Ready Mix court had "reasoned that punitive damages are similar to civil penalties and, therefore, a determination of the appropriate amount is not a fundamental element of a jury trial." [196] The Shamblin's Ready Mix court did concede that Tull contained "some rather broad language," but distinguished Tull on the ground that the Court was there deciding the issue of whether determining the amount of a civil penalty could be delegated to the trial judge without the necessity of a jury determination. Ultimately, the Shamblin's Ready Mix panel concluded that "the Tull decision cannot stand for the [*448] proposition that a plaintiff bringing a state common-law cause of action does not have a right to a jury determination of the amount of punitive damages." [197]

Relying on Kennon v. Gilmore, which the Shamblin's Ready Mix court had been careful to distinguish, the Defender Industries court concluded that, as Kennon made clear, the Seventh Amendment "guarantees a [right to a] jury determination of the amount of tort damages." [198] The Defender Industries court made no attempt to address the distinction made in Shamblin's Ready Mix between compensatory and punitive damages, but instead relied on two Supreme Court cases decided after Shamblin's: Browning-Ferris Industries of Vermont, Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc. [199] and Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip. [200] These decisions, according to the Defender Industries court, "emphasize the fundamental character of a jury assessment of the amount of punitive damages." [201] In overruling Shamblin's Ready Mix, the court stated "an assessment by a jury of the amount of punitive damages is an inherent and fundamental element of the common-law right to trial by jury." [202] Accordingly, the court held that the Seventh Amendment guarantees a litigant the right to a jury determination of the amount to be awarded as punitive damages. [203]

REV_00263349

D. State Legislative Involvement in Assessing Penalties

There have also been legislative attempts to mandate judicial assessment. For example, in 1987 Ohio lawmakers enacted legislation which provided that "in a tort action, whether the trier of fact is a jury or the court, if the trier of fact determines that any defendant is liable for punitive or exemplary damages, the amount of those damages shall be determined by the court." [204] A few years later, however, in Zoppo v. Homestead Insurance Co., [205] the Ohio Supreme Court, determined that the legislation violated the Ohio Constitution. [206] The [*449] court stated that the right to jury trial "cannot be invaded or violated by either legislative act or judicial order or decree." [207] The court found that because the right to jury assessment of punitive damages "stems from the common law and is encompassed within the right to trial by jury," [208] any attempt to remove damage assessment from the jury violated the Constitution.

The Ohio legislature, however, was convinced that tort reform in general, and judicial oversight of punitive damages assessment in particular, was necessary. As a result, in 1999, it enacted a sweeping tort reform bill that affected eighteen different titles, thirty-eight chapters, and over one hundred different sections of the Revised Code. [209] Although the bill, as enacted, was found unconstitutional for a variety of reasons, [210] the court paid particular attention to the amended version of the code section found problematic by the Zoppo court. The amended version removed the requirement that punitive damages be judicially assessed, but provided that punitive damages should be capped. In holding that this part of the overall tort reform was unconstitutional, the court stated that "a statute that allows the jury to determine the amount of punitive damages to be awarded but denies the litigant the benefit of that determination stands on no better constitutional footing than one that precludes the jury from making the determination in the first instance." [211]

The Kansas Supreme Court reached the opposite conclusion. At issue was a statute which provided that, to the extent that the case was one in which punitive damages were recoverable, the jury's role was to decide whether to award them in the first instance. If the jury voted to award punitive damages, then the amount was to have been determined by the judge in a separate hearing outside the presence of the jury. [212] After conducting a survey of common law practice, the court [*450] concluded that punitive damages, unlike compensatory damages, did not give rise to a factual question and that punitive damages were not considered a remedy at common law, but were rather merely "incident" to a cause of action. [213] While conceding that juries had historically assessed punitive damages, [214] the court further concluded that a claim for punitive damages was not a right at common law. [215]

Having concluded that plaintiffs do not have a common law "right" to punitive damages, the court reasoned that the legislature could constitutionally abolish punitive damages altogether. This conclusion led the court to reason that if the legislature had the power to abolish punitive damages, it also had the power to do something less drastic, including requiring judicial assessment of punitive damages. [216] Accordingly, the court held the Kansas legislation was constitutional under both the United States Constitution and the Kansas Constitution. [217]

III. The Due Process Attacks

In addition to the litigation surrounding the respective roles of the judge and jury in assessing punitive damages, the concept of awarding punitive damages itself has come under substantial constitutional attack on due process grounds in recent years. In Pacific Mutual [*451] Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip, [218] the Supreme Court first addressed the constitutional limits on punitive damages awards. In Haslip, the plaintiffs, Cleopatra Haslip and several coworkers, brought suit against Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company and one of its agents. The plaintiffs alleged that the agent had embezzled premiums that were to have been forwarded to the company, causing their insurance policies to lapse. When Haslip was hospitalized, the company refused to honor her policy and she was forced to pay the hospital and physician's bills herself. When she was unable to do so, her account was forwarded to a collection agency, adversely affecting her credit rating.

REV_00263350

In charging the jury on punitive damages, the trial court instructed the jury that imposition of punitive damages was discretionary and entirely within the purview of the jury. The trial court further instructed the jury that should they choose to award such damages, they must consider "the character and the degree of the wrong as shown by the evidence and necessity of preventing similar wrong." [219] The jury returned a general verdict in the plaintiffs' favor in the amount of $ 1,040,000 which included punitive damages in the amount of $ 840,000. The defendant appealed to the Alabama Supreme Court, which affirmed the award. [220]

In the United States Supreme Court, the defendant argued that the common law procedure used in Alabama, which gave juries unlimited [*452] discretion in determining the amount awarded, as evidenced by the jury instructions, violated its right to due process under the Fourteenth Amendment. By a seven to one margin, [221] the Court upheld the award, but for differing analytical reasons. The majority concluded that the award was valid first because juries had unbounded discretion over punitive damages awards at the time that the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted. Having made that determination, the second prong of the analysis concluded that the award should be upheld because Alabama's procedures were not entirely irrational. [222]

With respect to the first prong, the court recalled its prior precedent that recognized juries as the arbiters of punitive damages awards.

Under the traditional common-law approach, the amount of the punitive award is initially determined by a jury instructed to consider the gravity of the wrong and the need to deter similar wrongful conduct. The jury's determination is then reviewed by trial and appellate courts to ensure that it is reasonable. [223]

In light of this long historical practice, the Court declared that it could not conclude that the process was "so inherently unfair as to deny due process and be per se unconstitutional." [224] However, the Court expressed its concern over jury verdicts that "ran wild" and allowed that "unlimited [jury] discretion ... in the fixing of punitive damages may invite extreme results that jar one's constitutional sensibilities." [225] The Court refused to adopt a "mathematical bright line" regarding punitive damages awards, but stated that "general concerns of reasonableness" properly entered into the "constitutional calculus." [226]

With these general guidelines in mind, the Court examined Alabama's procedures and determined that the Haslip jury's discretion had been restrained in a reasonable fashion. It found that the jury instructions simultaneously advanced a legitimate state interest while protecting the defendant's right to "rational decision making." [227] The Court found that Alabama's procedures were constitutionally permissible not only because the jury instructions constrained the jury's discretion, but also because jury awards were subject to a further constitutional check in the appellate courts. The Court cited with approval [*453] the post trial procedures mandated by the Alabama Supreme Court in Hammond v. City of Gadsden [228] and noted that the Alabama Supreme Court undertook a comparative analysis to "ensure that the award does 'not exceed an amount that will accomplish society's goals of punishment and deterrence.'" [229] Although the Court expressed some concern that the amount awarded exceeded "200 times the out of pocket expenses" of the plaintiff, it nonetheless ultimately concluded that the defendant "had the benefit of the full panoply of Alabama's procedural protections" and the award was therefore constitutional. [230]

REV_00263351

Lastly, the Court announced a series of factors to be taken into consideration in reviewing a punitive damages award:

(a) whether there is a reasonable relationship between the punitive damage award and the harm likely to result from the defendant's conduct ... ; (b) the degree of reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct, the duration of that conduct, the defendant's awareness, any concealment, and the existence and frequency of similar past conduct; (c) the profitability to the defendant of the wrongful conduct and the desirability of removing that profit and of having the defendant also sustain a loss; (d) the "financial position" of the defendant; (e) all the costs of litigation; (f) the imposition of criminal sanctions on the defendant for its conduct, these to be taken in mitigation; and (g) the existence of other civil awards against the defendant for the same conduct ... . [231]

The Court walked a fine line in its due process analysis. Although the majority's holding was grounded on procedural due process, its reference to "fundamental fairness" and "general reasonableness" left open the possibility that an award could be challenged on substantive, as opposed to procedural, due process grounds. This was not lost on Justice Scalia, who concurred in the judgment, but would have limited the constitutional review to whether certain procedural safeguards were in place. [232]

The sole dissenter was Justice O'Connor, who concluded that the jury instructions did not limit the jury's discretion, but rather required a jury to make only two decisions: "(1) whether or not to impose punitive [*454] damages against the defendant, and (2) if so, in what amount." [233] She stressed that the instructions informed the jury that "imposition of punitive damages is entirely discretionary with the jury." [234] In Justice O'Connor's view the instructions were impermissibly "vague" in that they "suggest[ ] no criteria on which to base the exercise of that discretion" and that the instructions, therefore, "as much permits a determination based upon ... the color of the defendant's skin as upon a reasoned analysis of the offensive conduct." [235] Accordingly, Justice O'Connor would have stricken the Alabama common law punitive damage scheme as void for vagueness.

The next case of constitutional proportions heard by the Court was TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., [236] a case which made "explicit what was implicit in Haslip" [237] - a substantive due process right to be free from "grossly excessive" punitive damages awards. [238] In this case, TXO brought suit to quiet title as to oil and gas development, and Alliance brought a counterclaim for slander of title. The jury awarded Alliance $ 19,000 in actual damages and $ 10 million in punitive damages. A sharply divided Court upheld the award. [239] Justice Stevens, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Blackmun, wrote the plurality opinion, holding that the proper inquiry is "whether there is a reasonable relationship between the punitive damages award and the harm likely to result from the defendant's conduct as well as the harm that actually has occurred." [240]

The Court observed that had TXO been successful in its scheme, it would have enjoyed a massive reduction in its royalty obligations to Alliance, and therefore, the punitive award, though disproportionate to the compensatory award, was warranted. [241] Moreover, because TXO's behavior constituted a substantial threat to other third parties, the "dramatic disparity" between the amounts did not render the award so "grossly excessive" as to violate due process. [242] And although this analysis clearly speaks to substantive, rather than procedural concerns, Justice Stevens felt compelled to write:

REV_00263352

[*455]

We do not suggest that a defendant has a substantive due process right to a correct determination of the "reasonableness" of a punitive damages award ... . State law generally imposes a requirement that punitive damages be "reasonable." A violation of a state law "reasonableness" requirement would not, however, necessarily establish that the award is so "grossly excessive" as to violate the Federal Constitution. [243]

This analysis, of course, begs the question and may even be disingenuous. [244] After all, the substantive due process analysis had its genesis in Haslip in which the Court referred to "general reasonableness" and "fundamental fairness." [245]

In his concurrence, Justice Scalia reiterated that, in his view, substantive due process should not be employed to scrutinize the size of the award. Rather, his view, first stated in Haslip, is that the due process right associated with punitive damages awards refers to a procedural rather than a substantive due process right. Further, he sees little distinction between the "reasonableness" requirement applicable in many states and the "grossly excessive" constitutional standard:

To say (as I do) that "procedural due process" requires judicial review of punitive damages awards for reasonableness is not to say that there is a federal constitutional right to a substantively correct "reasonableness" determination - which is, in my view, what the plurality tries to assure today ... . Judicial assessment of [the] reasonableness [of punitive damages awards] is a federal right, but a correct assessment of their reasonableness is not. [246]

Thus, Justice Scalia contends that reviewing courts should never take into account the amount of the award; the only inquiry should be whether the process was fair.

[*456] In a lengthy dissenting opinion, Justice O'Connor takes the opposite position, contending that "the frequency and size of [punitive] awards have been skyrocketing," [247] thereby implying that some mechanism must be used to reign them in. Her principle concern, as it was in Haslip, is that juries are given insufficient or incomprehensibly vague instructions which establish no articulable standard for juries to follow when awarding damages. She contends that the mechanisms for imposing punitive damages "is rapidly becoming an arbitrary and oppressive system" [248] which resulted in the "monstrous award" [249] imposed upon TXO. In Justice O'Connor's view, where juries receive only "vague and amorphous guidance" [250] with respect to punitive damages, the risk that they will return a verdict based upon "prejudice, bias and caprice remains a real one ... ." [251] She reiterates that "influences such as caprice, passion, bias, and prejudice are antithetical to the rule of law. If there is a fixture of due process, it is that a verdict based on such influences cannot stand." [252] Finally, Justice O'Connor was concerned that there was little meaningful appellate review of the jury's award, and took particular issue with the West Virginia Supreme Court's treatment of the case. [253]

The issue of appellate review was again raised in Honda Motor Co., Ltd. v. Oberg. [254] In that case, the plaintiff was riding an all-terrain vehicle, manufactured and sold by defendant, when the vehicle overturned and injured the plaintiff. The jury found for the plaintiff, and awarded compensatory damages in the amount of $ 919,390.39 and punitive damages in the amount of $ 5,000,000. [255] The defendant appealed to the Oregon Court of Appeals, arguing that the punitive award violated its due process rights because the award was grossly excessive, and was the product of standardless jury discretion. The defendant also contended that the Oregon statutory scheme effectively precluded appellate review of punitive awards "unless the court can [*457] affirmatively say there is no evidence to support the verdict." [256] After the defendant failed to prevail in the Oregon courts of appeal, the United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider whether Oregon's limited judicial review of punitive damages awards was consistent with due process. [257]

REV_00263353

The Court began by recognizing that its "recent cases have ... imposed a substantive limit on the size of punitive damages awards," but concluded that the case before the Court did not concern the standard that should be used to identify unconstitutionally excessive awards. [258] Instead, the Court was focused on the procedural safeguards, which, in the Court's view, were necessary to ensure that punitive damages were not imposed arbitrarily in violation of the defendant's procedural due process rights. In particular, the Court undertook review to determine whether it was procedurally infirm to completely abrogate the right to appellate review of a punitive damages award. [259]

In answering that question, the Court looked first to whether the procedure in question deviated from that established at common law, [260] and concluded that "judicial review of the size of punitive damages awards has been a safeguard against excessive verdicts for as long as punitive damages have been awarded." [261] Citing to its decisions in Haslip and TXO, the Court stated that where an award was subjected to meaningful and adequate review by the trial court and subsequent appellate review, it should be given a "strong presumption of validity." [262] The negative inference, of course, is that in the absence of such procedural protections, the verdicts will be suspect.

The Court then undertook a comprehensive review of the common law cases, beginning with Huckle v. Money, [263] in which the court did not grant a new trial but recognized its ability to do so, and ending with an observation that in "the federal courts and in every State, except Oregon, judges review the size of damages awards." [264] Accordingly, the Court concluded that Oregon's procedure did not follow common law procedures because Oregon courts were permitted to [*458] review awards in only a few narrow instances, [265] and were expressly forbidden by the Oregon Supreme Court's interpretation of Oregon's constitutional provisions to order a new trial based solely on the ground that the award is excessive. [266]

Having determined that the Oregon procedures deviate from the common law norm, the Court then scrutinized the "constitutional implications of [the State's] deviation from established common law procedures." [267] The Court concluded that the "implications" were fatal to Oregon's constitutional scheme:

While Oregon's judicial review ensures that punitive damages are not awarded against defendants entirely innocent of conduct warranting exemplary damages, Oregon, unlike the common law, provides no assurance that those whose conduct is sanctionable by punitive damages are not subjected to punitive damages of arbitrary amounts. What we are concerned with is the possibility that a culpable defendant may be unjustly punished; evidence of culpability warranting some punishment is not a substitute for evidence providing at least a rational basis for the particular deprivation of property imposed by the State to deter future wrongdoing. [268]

Harkening back to its Haslip/TXO "presumption of validity," the Court went on to elaborate that "Oregon's abrogation of a well-established common-law protection against arbitrary deprivations of property raises a presumption that its procedures violate the Due Process Clause. As this Court has stated from its first due process cases, traditional practice provides a touchstone for constitutional analysis." [269] The Court concluded:

REV_00263354

Punitive damages pose an acute danger of arbitrary deprivation of property. Jury instructions typically leave the jury with wide discretion in choosing amounts, and the presentation of evidence of a defendant's net worth creates the potential that juries will use their verdicts to express biases against big businesses, particularly those without strong local presences. Judicial review of the amount awarded was one of the few procedural safeguards which the common law provided against that danger. Oregon has removed that safeguard without providing any substitute procedure and without any indication that the danger of arbitrary awards has in any way subsided over time. For these reasons, we hold that Oregon's denial [*459] of judicial review of the size of punitive damages awards violates the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. [270]

Against the backdrop of Haslip, TXO, and Oberg came the Court's landmark decision in BMW of North America v. Gore. [271] Although some commentators suggest that BMW "marks the official recognition of a whole new area of constitutional analysis, the substantive due process right to be free from unreasonably large punitive damages awards," [272] that ground was already broken by TXO. [273] In TXO, the Court at least implied that there was a substantive component to the due process analysis in punitive damages awards review, but simply found that the award at issue there did not violate that standard. The Court in BMW was not so shy, and although the Court divided by a five to four margin, BMW became the first case that "invalidated a state court punitive damage assessment solely because of its excessive amount." [274]

At issue in BMW was Ira Gore's assertion that he had been defrauded by BMW's practice of retouching the paint of new cars damaged in transit and sold as new. BMW acknowledged that it had adopted a "nationwide policy" of repairing any damage that did not exceed three percent of the price of the vehicle and then delivering it as new, without informing either the dealer or the customer that the repairs had been made. [275] Bringing suit in an Alabama state court, Gore prayed for $ 500,000 in compensatory and punitive damages. [276]

At trial, the parties argued about the scope of the injury upon which damages should be calculated. Gore argued that any punitive damages award should be computed based upon all cars sold nationwide because of BMW's "national policy." BMW, raising Federalism [*460] principles, argued that the case must be confined to cars sold in Alabama because Alabama had no interest in deterring conduct in other states. Ultimately, the trial judge admitted evidence of nationwide car sales over BMW's objection. The jury returned a verdict in favor of Gore, awarding him $ 4,000 in compensatory and $ 4 million in punitive damages. [277]

BMW then filed a post trial motion to set aside the punitive damages award as excessive, which the trial court denied. [278] The Alabama Supreme Court likewise rejected BMW's claim that the award "exceeded the constitutionally permissible amount," [279] but ordered a remittitur to $ 2 million, finding that the trial court improperly relied on sales in other jurisdictions. [280]

In holding the remitted amount to be constitutionally excessive, the United States Supreme Court first endorsed BMW's position that any award in Alabama could not take into account conduct in other jurisdictions: "We think it follows from ... principles of state sovereignty and comity that a State may not impose economic sanctions on violators of its laws with the intent of changing the tortfeasors' lawful conduct in other States." [281]

REV_00263355

The Court then announced a three-prong test to be applied by reviewing courts in determining whether a punitive award is in excess of the constitutionally permissible limit: (1) the "degree of reprehensibility" of the defendant's action; (2) the "disparity between the harm or potential harm" suffered by the plaintiff and the punitive damages award; and (3) the difference between the penalty imposed in the case under review as compared to penalties imposed in other similar cases. [282] Applying these factors to BMW's conduct, the Court concluded that the punitive damage component of the verdict violated BMW's substantive due process right to be free from excessive punitive [*461] damage awards, and remanded the case to the Alabama Supreme Court for further proceedings. [283]

Justice Breyer, joined by Justice O'Connor and Justice Souter, concurred in the result, finding that the award was procedurally, as opposed to substantively, infirm. After first recognizing that the awards were the product of "fair procedures," and therefore will be "entitled to a strong presumption of validity," Justice Breyer went on to explain that, in his view, although the procedures here were not manifestly unfair, they were the product of an unconstrained jury given virtually unlimited discretion. [284] Although he based his concurrence on procedural grounds, he was willing to concede that substantive due process concerns had been raised. In determining that the award in BMW must be reversed, he stated, "the award in this case was both (a) the product of a system of standards that did not significantly constrain a court's, and hence a jury's, discretion in making that [*462] award; and (b) grossly excessive in light of the State's legitimate punitive damages objectives." [285]

Justice Scalia, who had concurred in the judgments in Haslip and TXO because the awards were not reduced and concurred in Oberg because that case involved procedural, rather than substantive, due process, dissented in BMW. Joined by Justice Thomas, Justice Scalia reiterated his position from the concurrences of the prior three cases:

I do not regard the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause as a secret repository of substantive guarantees against "unfairness" - neither the unfairness of an excessive civil compensatory award, nor the unfairness of an "unreasonable" punitive award. What the Fourteenth Amendment's procedural guarantee assures is an opportunity to contest the reasonableness of a damages judgment in state court; but there is no federal guarantee a damages award actually be reasonable. [286]

In Justice Scalia's view, the BMW case was significant in that it revived a "substantive due process right" to be free from the imposition of a "grossly excessive" award, a concept which previously had been "moribund" for a century. [287] He found this revival of the substantive right troubling because, in his view, it vests the lower courts, and ultimately, the Supreme Court, with the authority to decide that which is not of constitutional proportions, but rather a function of the lower court's determination of the "reasonableness" of the award. He pointed out that although the earlier cases of Haslip, TXO, and Oberg had, at least implicitly, recognized the substantive prong of the Court's due process review of punitive awards, none of those cases went as far as "declaring a punitive award unconstitutional simply because it was 'too big.'" [288] Justice Scalia concluded that the BMW decision, though dressed up as a legal opinion, is really no more than a disagreement with the community's sense of indignation or outrage.... It reflects not merely, as the concurrence candidly acknowledges, "a judgment about a matter of degree," but a judgment about the appropriate degree of indignation or outrage, which is hardly an analytical determination. [289]

REV_00263356

Finally, Justice Ginsberg, joined by the Chief Justice, likewise dissented, primarily on principles of Federalism. "The Court, I am convinced, unnecessarily and unwisely ventures into territory traditionally [*463] within the States' domain, and does so in the face of reform measures recently adopted or currently under consideration in legislative arenas." [290] Justice Ginsberg also viewed the procedures in place under the Alabama common law scheme as a sufficient restraint on the jury's discretion, and so would have left the award untouched. [291]

Thus, the opinion of the majority, which relied on the "grossly excessive" standard, rested squarely on substantive due process grounds, while the three concurring justices relied more heavily on procedural due process, but acknowledged the substantive element. The four dissenting justices would not incorporate a substantive analysis to reviewing a punitive damages award, but would only reverse for a violation of procedural due process.

IV. Cooper Industries, Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc.

At issue in Cooper Industries, Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc. [292] was the proper standard of review when an appellate court was called upon to determine the constitutionality of a particular punitive award. By the time Cooper was argued in February 2001, the general state of the law was that punitive damages awards had a long historical pedigree in both English and American common law and were therefore, generally speaking, constitutional. [293] Moreover, under the Seventh Amendment, punitive damages awards were to be awarded by juries, not judges, though judges had oversight power through traditional common law mechanisms, such as a motion for a new trial, directed verdict, judgment notwithstanding the verdict, and remittitur. [294]

However, punitive damages awards could become unconstitutional to the extent the awards were a product of insufficient process, which, in turn resulted in arbitrary awards that reflected the unconstrained discretion of the jury. These awards were unconstitutional because they were thought to violate the procedural prong of the due process guarantee. [295] Likewise, awards violated the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments in a substantive sense when the awards were "grossly excessive." Awards were grossly excessive when they were out [*464] of proportion to the reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct, there was a great disparity between the harm suffered by the plaintiff and the amount of the award was completely out of step with other awards made in comparable cases. [296]

However, there was substantial uncertainty about what standard to use when reviewing such an award. Typically, any fact found by a jury is subject only to an abuse of discretion review. Thus, to the extent that punitive awards are set by juries, the amount of the award was subject only to appellate reversal if the trial court had abused its discretion in entering the judgment. [297] This, however, created tension between the Seventh Amendment on the one hand, and the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments on the other. Assuming that each of the Amendments are of equal dignity (as one must), reviewing courts were given the daunting task of attempting to balance them. This balancing was done by the Supreme Court, somewhat painfully, in Gasperini v. Center for Humanities, Inc. [298] Although the award in Gasperini was compensatory, when the Court held that jury awards could be reviewed by a federal appellate body for an abuse of discretion, many believed that the Court would come to the same conclusion with respect to punitive awards.

We were wrong.

Leatherman Tool Group sued a competing tool manufacturer for trade-dress infringement, unfair competition, and false advertising when Cooper Industries, Inc. used Leatherman's advertising materials to promote Cooper's product. [299] The jury returned a verdict in favor of Leatherman, which included a $ 50,000 compensatory award and a $ 4.5 million punitive award. Cooper made post trial motions to have the awards declared "grossly excessive" and therefore unconstitutional under BMW. The trial court denied the motion and Cooper appealed.

REV_00263357

In an unpublished opinion, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the punitive damage award and determined that the district court had found that it was "proportional and fair" and that the size of the award "did not violate Cooper's due process rights." [300] The Ninth Circuit then [*465] determined that "the district court did not abuse its discretion in declining to reduce the amount of the punitive damages." [301] The Supreme Court granted certiorari to determine "whether the Court of Appeals reviewed the constitutionality of the punitive damages award under the correct standard and also whether the award violated the criteria" articulated in BMW. [302] The Court concluded that the constitutional issues raised in connection with the awarding of punitive damages merited de novo review. [303]

The Court started with the proposition that "if no constitutional issue is raised, the role of the appellate court, at least in the federal system, is merely to review the trial court's 'determination under an abuse-of-discretion standard.'" [304] Because issues of constitutional proportions are raised when punitive damages are awarded, however, this observation did not end the inquiry. The problem, of course, is that when a fact found by a jury is reviewed for anything other than abuse of discretion, it violates the Seventh Amendment prohibition on re-examination of the facts found by a jury. [305]

In order to avoid this problem, the Court concluded that a punitive damage award was not a "fact" because of the nature of the punitive award itself. First, the Court made distinctions between the nature of compensatory and punitive damages:

Although compensatory damages and punitive damages are typically awarded at the same time by the same decisionmaker, they serve distinct purposes. The former are intended to redress the concrete loss that the plaintiff has suffered by reason of the defendant's wrongful conduct. The latter, which have been described as "quasi-criminal," operate as "private fines" intended to punish the defendant and to deter future wrongdoing. A jury's assessment of the extent of a plaintiff's injury is essentially a factual determination, whereas its imposition of punitive damages is an expression of its moral condemnation. [306]

Thus,

unlike the measure of actual damages suffered, which presents a question of historical or predictive fact, the level of punitive damages is not really a "fact" "tried" by the jury. Because the jury's [*466] award of punitive damages does not constitute a finding of 'fact,' appellate review of the District Court's determination that an award is consistent with due process does not implicate ... Seventh Amendment concerns raised ... . [307]

The Court acknowledged Barry v. Edmunds, [308] in which it had held that "it is the peculiar function of the jury to set the amount of punitive damages[,]" and Day v. Woodworth, [309] which held that punitive damages should be "left to the discretion of the jury." The Court

REV_00263358

No Freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or be disseised of his Freehold, or Liberties, or free Customs, or be outlawed, or exiled, or any otherwise destroyed; nor will we pass upon him, nor condemn him, but by lawful Judgment of his Peers, or by the Law of the Land. We will sell to no man, we will not deny or defer to any man either Justice or Right. [13]

In ensuing years, English monarchs have "reaffirmed the Magna Charta [sic] thirty-eight times." [14]

In 1285, the nisi prius system of adjudication was established in England. [15] Under this system, circuit judges of assize traveled to counties to hear cases, even where the cases were filed in the common law [*414] courts located in London. [16] What remains unclear, however, is the nature of the proceeding in the Westminster Court after a verdict had been rendered by a nisi prius judge. [17] Some commentators believe the Westminster Court acted as an appellate body which re-examined facts, while others believe the entire cause was retried by the Westminster Court. [18]

By the mid seventeenth century, as the American colonies were being founded, "trial by jury [had] emerged as the principle defense of English liberties." [19] Professors Dawson and Landsman posit that the role of the jury had a profound impact upon English society. They contend that "relying on the jury and other lay decisionmakers such as justices of the peace had the unanticipated effect of training 'English society, through its local leadership, in the skills and the practice of self-government.'" [20] This experience would give the English citizenry - and the American colonists - the will to fight for what they perceived as their unadulterated right to trial by jury.

The original colonists did, in fact, bring trial by jury with them to the new world. Many of the early Colonial Charters incorporated the right to jury trial. For example, as early as 1606, the Charter to the [*415] Virginia Company provided for trial by jury. [21] By 1624, all civil and criminal cases were tried by jury in Virginia. [22] The Massachusetts Bay Colony introduced the right to trial by jury in 1628 and codified that right in 1641. [23] The Colony of West New Jersey provided for jury trial in 1677 as did Pennsylvania in 1682. [24] By 1727, eight of the original thirteen colonies had explicitly incorporated the right to a jury trial. [25] Ultimately, all thirteen colonies provided for the right to jury trial either expressly or through the common law. [26]

Against this backdrop, King George III was attempting to expand the jurisdiction of the admiralty and vice-admiralty courts in the colonies, which sat in equity without a jury. [27] This troubled the early colonists. [28] Ultimately, it became an extremely contentious issue in the years preceding the outbreak of hostilities between England and the colonies. [29] Some have argued that the threat of the abolition of trial by jury was one of the principal causes of the American Revolution. [30] In any event, after the outbreak of hostilities between the colonies and England, each of the thirteen states formally adopted the civil jury trial. [31]

[*416]

B. The Constitutional Convention and the Seventh Amendment

Whatever role the jury trial played in the instigation of the war, surprisingly little attention was paid to the issue by the delegates to the First Constitutional Convention, [32] despite the fact that the fifth resolve [33] stated, "the respective colonies are entitled to the common law of England, and more especially, to the great and inestimable privilege of being tried by their peers of the vicinage, according to the course of that law." [34] The federal convention was held in two sessions. The first session began on May 25, 1787, and ended on July 26, 1787.

REV_00263332

distinguished these cases in a rather circular manner, by simply stating that the two cases "do not, however, indicate that the amount of punitive damages imposed by the jury is itself a 'fact' within the meaning of the Seventh Amendment's Reexamination Clause." [310]

In a somewhat more satisfying analysis, the Court then distinguished the cases on historical grounds: "In any event, punitive damages have evolved somewhat since the time of respondent's sources. Until well into the century, punitive damages frequently operated to compensate for intangible injuries, compensation which was not otherwise available under the narrow conception of compensatory damages prevalent at the time." [311] In other words, the Court said that to the extent punitive damages have historically been awarded by juries, the historical context has changed and the reasons for allowing juries to award punitive damages no longer exist. [312]

Justice Ginsberg, the lone dissenter, was persuaded by neither analysis. She began by repeating the Court's holding that a jury's award of punitive damages does not constitute a finding of fact subject to the Seventh Amendment - a proposition with which she largely agrees. However, she was concerned that because "a jury's verdict on punitive damages is fundamentally dependent on determinations we characterize as factfindings," she concluded that punitive damages are more appropriately characterized as other non-economic injuries, such as pain and suffering. [313]

One million dollars' worth of pain and suffering does not exist as a "fact" in the world any more or less than one million dollars' worth [*467] of moral outrage. Both derive their meaning from a set of underlying facts as determined by a jury. If one exercise in quantification is properly regarded as factfinding, it seems to me the other should be so regarded as well. [314]

However, Justice Ginsberg's observations to the contrary, neither de novo review of the amount of a punitive damages award nor jury involvement as the arbiter of community outrage need be sacrificed on the altar of Cooper Industries.

V. A Modest Proposal

Commentators have long debated whether the jury or the judge should determine the amount of a punitive damage award, and credible arguments have been made on both sides. Proponents of jury assessment argue that historically, the right to jury trial was of tremendous importance to the framers. [315] This was so because the framers believed that individual participation in the democratic process could be accomplished only through the check juries placed on both the legislative branches, through jury nullification, [316] and the judicial branch, whom, it was feared, would become tyrannical, a critique which continues to exist today. [317] Moreover, there were, and are, concerns that federal judges, who have life tenure, could behave erratically in assessing punitive damages. [318]

[*468] Another theme in favor of jury assessment is that the jury is an institutional member of the "body politic." When serving on a jury, citizens are engaged in the direct exercise of democracy, as opposed to the representative form found in the legislative body, and serve as the "conscience of the community." [319] This theme is echoed by those who view the jury as a barometer of "moral outrage" when assessing punitive damages. [320] Some commentators have gone so far as to say that judicially imposed punitive damages are both "elitist" and "unconstitutional." [321]

On the other hand, there are persuasive reasons why the judge, not the jury, should assess punitive damages. The most frequently cited reason is that juries have "run wild," [322] awarding "monstrous" [323] damages that have been "skyrocketing" [324] out of control, [325] thus prompting widespread state tort reform, with varying degrees of success. [326] The theory is that judges are less likely to be swayed by bias, prejudice, or caprice. [327] A related argument is that judges have much more experience in meting out punishment because of their experience [*469] in sentencing criminals and imposing civil fines and penalties. [328] As a result, it is argued, judicially assessed punitive awards would result in greater consistency in the amounts awarded, resulting in desirable economic efficiencies. [329]

REV_00263359

It is likewise argued that judges are better able to assess awards that would achieve one of the primary goals of punitive damages - deterrence.

Juries believe that such awards express the community's outrage at certain forms of behavior, and judges' instructions encourage juries to think in precisely these terms. In fact, empirical evidence ... suggests that juries are not attempting to promote optimal deterrence but instead to punish wrongdoing with, at most, a signal designed to ensure that certain misconduct will not happen again. [330]

Lastly, there are those who argue that juries should never assess penalties because remedies simply do not come within the Seventh Amendment guarantee. [331] Professor Murphy cites three arguments [*470] that have been advanced to permit judicially reduced punitive damages without the need for a new trial. [332] First, punitive damage awards are not a "fact." Second, the question of an award's excessiveness is a "matter of law." Finally, reduction to the constitutional maximum is not a remittitur. [333]

The Supreme Court in Cooper held that the first argument is conclusive, and the Court's holding bears repeating here: "Unlike the measure of actual damages suffered, which presents a question of fact, the level of punitive damages is not really a 'fact' 'tried' by the jury." [334] If the amount is not a "fact," it is never within the province of the jury because the jury's sole function in a civil trial is to act as a fact finder. Therefore, the question is not whether the jury should assess punitive damages, but whether they are constitutionally permitted to do so. In the wake of Cooper, the answer to the latter question may be in the negative.

Thus, this Article proposes that federal courts can, and should, modify the manner in which punitive damages are assessed. First, the jury must find facts that justify the imposition of the award. The jury should then rank the culpability of the conduct into one of three categories: 1) grossly negligent; 2) recklessly indifferent; or 3) maliciously or fraudulently oppressive. Finally, the jury should determine the wealth of the defendant. [335] Once the jury has performed these functions, the judge should then determine the amount necessary to effectuate the goal of punitive damages, which is to punish the defendant and deter similar misconduct. The use of such a scheme would solve the problem of unbounded jury discretion that has raised procedural due process concerns and would likewise curb or curtail "grossly excessive" awards that raise substantive due process issues.

This proposal has the salutary effect of eradicating the Gasperini problem, at least where punitive damages are concerned. Because the jury would not make an initial determination of the punitive damages, the re-examination clause would not be implicated. The facts found [*471] by the jury to support the punitive award would continue to be reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard, which, as Justice Ginsberg pointed out in Gasperini, involves not so much a review of the facts, but rather of the trial court's use of its discretion, which is a matter of law. The actual amount awarded, on the other hand, would be subject to a de novo review to determine whether the judicially awarded amount exceeded constitutional parameters. [336]

REV_00263360

This proposal also has the advantage of exploiting the institutional strengths of both the jury and the judge. The jury has the advantage of being the voice of the community expressing the moral outrage of the public. It likewise allows the jury to continue to be the arbiter of the degree of the punishment, if not the actual dollar amount. Finally, it permits the judge to use his or her considerable experience and expertise in assessing penalties and imposing punishment. Further, because the judge has experience superior to the jury's the predictability and consistency of awards will improve. The result would be a form of "technocratic populism," [337] which allows the jury to be the arbiter of the normative judgments, but employs the expertise of the bench in translating those judgments to actual awards.

Conclusion

Punitive damages have long been a thorn in our collective judicial side. The problem has generated a great deal of judicial and scholarly ink and has prompted numerous empirical studies to define the problem which, in turn, has resulted in tort reform that has largely failed. This Article proposes a shift in the way in which punitive damages are assessed that needs no tort reform legislation; the law is already on the books. With a single swipe of its judicial pen, the Supreme Court has decreed that punitive damages are not a fact to be found by the jury. Therefore, it should be - perhaps must be - judges, rather than juries, that assess the amount to be awarded with guidance from the jury on the degree of culpability and concomitant moral outrage.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. 121 S. Ct. 1678 (2001).

n2. Id. at 1686 (internal citations omitted).

n3. See, e.g., Wright v. West, 505 U.S. 277, 296 (1992) (jury is trier of fact); Harding v. U.S., 335 F.2d 515, 517 (9th Cir. 1964) ("Jury [is] sole trier of fact."). This was not always the case, however. At early common law, juries sometimes acted as triers of law as well as fact. See infra Part I.

n4. See infra Part II.

n5. Because the Seventh Amendment has not been incorporated and made applicable to the several states by the Fourteenth Amendment, a state could theoretically abolish all jury trials by appropriate legislation. See Curtis v. Loether, 415 U.S. 189, 192 n.6 (1974) ("The Court has not held that the right to jury trial in civil cases is an element of due process applicable to state courts through the Fourteenth Amendment.").

REV_00263361

n6. See, e.g., Stephan Landsman, The Civil Jury in America: Scenes from an Unappreciated History, 44 Hastings L.J. 579, 582 (1993) (articulating competing theories regarding the jury's origins).

n7. See Sir Patrick Devlin, Trial By Jury 7 (1956).

n8. See 1 Sir Frederick Pollock & Frederic W. Maitland, The History Of English Law Before The Time Of Edward I 74 (2d ed. 1959).

n9. See Landsman, supra note 6, at 582.

n10. See William Forsyth, History Of Trial By Jury 105 (Burt Franklin ed., Lenox Hill Pub. & Dist. Co. 1971) (1878).

n11. Landsman, supra note 6, at 586 (citing Lloyd E. Moore, The Jury 70 (1973)).

n12. See id. at 587.

n13. Magna Carta (1215) (Eng.) art. 29. Modern historians no longer accept the theory that the right to jury trials originated with the Magna Carta, although the framers of the Constitution apparently thought this was the case. See e.g., F. Heller, The Sixth Amendment To The Constitution 15 (1951); Pollock & Maitland, supra note 8, at 173 n.3.

n14. Richard S. Arnold, Trial by Jury: The Constitutional Right to a Jury of Twelve in Civil Trials, 22 Hofstra L. Rev. 1, 13 (1993).

n15. See James C. Lopez, Comment, Appellate Control of Excessive Jury Verdicts Since Gasperini v. Center for Humanities: From Nisi Prius Courts to "Gasperini Hearings," 66 U. Cinn. L. Rev. 1323 (1998).

n16. See William Wirt Blume, Review of Facts in Jury Cases - The Seventh Amendment, 20 J. Am. Judicature Soc'y 130, 131 (1936).

n17. See id.

REV_00263362

n18. Commentators arguing that the Westminster Court acted as an appellate court considering the evidence anew include William Wirt Blume, Blume, supra note 16; Barbara Lerner, Comment, Remittitur Review: Constitutionality and Efficiency in Liquidated and Unliquidated Damages Cases, 43 U. Chi. L. Rev. 376, 382-83 (1976); E.W. Hinton, Note, Power of Federal Appellate Court to Review Ruling on Motion for New Trial, 1 U. Chi. L. Rev. 111, 113 (1933); Comment, Federal Appellate Review of Excessive or Inadequate Damage Awards, 28 Fordham L. Rev. 500, 502-04 (1959); William Renwick Riddell, New Trial at the Common Law, 26 Yale L.J. 49, 52-57 (1916); Comment, Federal Practice-Appeal and Error-Review of Denial of Motion for New Trial, 32 Mich. L. Rev. 387, 388 & n.5 (1933); Note, Appealability of Rulings on Motion for New Trial in the Federal Courts, 98 U. Pa. L. Rev. 575, 579 (1950); Jerry LeMond, Comment, Federal Review of Excessive Verdicts, 30 Tex. L. Rev. 242, 243-44 (1951). Expressions of the opposite view include Gasperini v. Center for Humanities, 518 U.S. 415, 454-56 (1996) (Scalia, J., dissenting); and Frank Warran Hackett, Has a Trial Judge of a United States Court the Right to Direct a Verdict, 24 Yale L.J. 127, 142 (1914). The question becomes an important one for Seventh Amendment purposes because it is generally assumed that the "common law" referred to in the amendment is the law of England as it existed in 1791 when the Bill of Rights was adopted. See U.S. v. Wonson, 28 F. Cas. 745, 750 (1812) ("Beyond all question, the common law here alluded to is not the common law of any individual State (for it probably differs in all), but it is the common law of England, the grand reservoir of all our jurisprudence.").

n19. Landsman, supra note 6, at 590.

n20. Id. at 588, citing John P. Dawson, A History Of Law Judges 118-20 (1960).

n21. See Harold M. Hyman & Catherine M. Tarrant, Aspects Of American Trial Jury History, in The Jury System in America: A Critical Overview 23, 24 (Rita James Simon ed., 1975).

n22. See Landsman, supra note 6, at 592.

n23. See id.

n24. See id.

n25. See 1 J. Kendall Few, In Defense of Trial By Jury 36 (1993).

n26. See Landsman, supra note 6, at 592.

REV_00263363

↑n27. See Charles W. Wolfram, The Constitutional History of the Seventh Amendment, 57 Minn. L. Rev. 639, 654 n.47 (1973).

↑n28. In a letter dated June 6, 1766, George Mason wrote to the Committee of Merchants in London asserting that the vice-admiralty courts' expanding jurisdiction was a threat to the continuing right to a jury trial and explicitly recognizing this as a point of dispute. See 1 The Papers of George Mason 65, 67 (R. Rutland ed. 1970).

↑n29. See id.

↑n30. There is some documentary support for this proposition. See, e.g., the comments of James M'Dowall of North Carolina reprinted in 3 The Debates In The Several State Conventions On The Adoption Of The Federal Constitution 143 (J. Elliot ed. 1891) [hereinafter Elliot's Debates] ("What made the people revolt from Great Britain? The trial by jury, that great safeguard of liberty, was taken away, and a stamp duty placed upon them.").

↑n31. See, e.g., Ga. Const. of 1777 art. LXI, in 2 The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws 785 (F. Thorpe ed. 1909); Md. Const. of 1776 art. III, in 2 The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws 785 (F. Thorpe ed. 1909) at 1686; Mass. Const. of 1780 art. XV, in 3 The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws 785 (F. Thorpe ed. 1909) at 1891-92; N.H. Const. of 1784 art XX, in 4 The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws 785 (F. Thorpe ed. 1909) at 2456; N.J. Const. of 1776 art. XXII, in 5 The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws 785 (F. Thorpe ed. 1909) at 2598; N.Y. Const. of 1777 art. XLI, in 5 The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws 785 (F. Thorpe ed. 1909) at 2637; I N.C. Const. of 1776, Declaration of Rights, art XI, in 5 The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws 785 (F. Thorpe ed. 1909) at 3083; I S.C. Const. of 1778 art. XLI, in 6 The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws 785 (F. Thorpe ed. 1909) at 3257; Va. Const. of 1776, Bill of Rights, 11, in 7 The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws 785 (F. Thorpe ed. 1909) at 3814.

↑n32. Edith Guild Henderson, The Background of the Seventh Amendment, 80 Harv. L. Rev. 289, 291 (1966) ("We have almost no direct evidence concerning the intention of the framers of the Seventh Amendment itself."); Wolfram, supra note 27, at 657 ("There is no surviving record of any discussion of civil jury trial even thought there had been some discussion of the federal judiciary in prior meetings.").

↑n33. During the latter portion of the 1770s, American colonists held several congresses protesting the enforcement of a series of laws collectively known as the Intolerable Acts. During the course of these congresses, the colonists introduced resolutions cataloguing fundamental freedoms that the colonists believed to be essential to ordered liberty, and which they believed were being infringed by authoritarian British Rule. The Fifth Resolve was one in a series of resolutions introduced at the First Continental Congress held in 1784. See, e.g., Landsman, supra note 6, at 596.

REV_00263364

↑n34. Declaration And Resolves Of The First Continental Congress, 1774, Res. 5, reprinted in Sources Of Our Liberties 151 (Richard L. Perry & John C. Cooper eds., 1952).

↑n35. See Henderson, supra note 32, at 293.

↑n36. See Wolfram, supra note 27, at 657.

↑n37. The proposed language was "That Trials for Criminal Offences be in the State where the Offence was committed by jury." The printed copy that was prepared by the Committee on Detail contained an exception for cases of impeachment. See 2 Records Of The Federal Convention OF 1787 (M. Farrand ed. 1911) at 137-50 [hereinafter Farrand Records].

↑n38. See Henderson, supra note 32, at 294.

↑n39. See Wolfram, supra note 27, at 658.

↑n40. See id.

↑n41. See J. Madison, Debates in the Federal Convention, in 2 Farrand Records, supra note 37, at 587-88. It should be noted, however, that Professor Wolfram allows for the possibility that the issue was first raised by "the troublesome twenty-nine year old delegate from South Carolina, Charles Pickney." Wolfram, supra note 27, at 658 n.56.

↑n42. See J. Madison, Debates in the Federal Convention, in 2 Farrand Records, supra note 37, at 587-88. (The following discussion ensued:

Mr. Gorham. It is not possible to discriminate equity cases from those in which juries are proper. The Representatives of the people may be safely trusted in this matter. Mr. Gerry urged the necessity of Juries to guard [against] corrupt Judges. He proposed that the Committee last appointed should be directed to provide a clause for securing the trial by Juries. Col. Mason perceived the difficulty mentioned by Mr. Gorham. The jury cases cannot be specified. A general principle laid down on this and some other points would be sufficient. He wished the plan had been prefaced with a Bill of Rights, & would second a Motion if made for the purpose - It would give great quiet to the people; and with the aid of the State declarations, a bill might be prepared in a few hours. Mr. Gerry concurred in the idea and moved for a Committee to prepare a Bill of Rights. Col. Mason 2ded the motion. Mr. Sherman was for securing the rights of the people where requisite. The State Declarations of Rights are not repealed by this constitution; and being in force are sufficient - there are many cases where juries are proper which cannot be discriminated. The Legislature may be safely trusted. Col. Mason: The laws of the U.S. are to be paramount to State Bills of Rights.).

REV_00263365

n43. P. Ford, Pamphlets on the Constitution, reprinted in 3 Farrand Records, supra note 37, at 101.

n44. J. Madison Debates in the Federal Convention, reprinted in 2 Farrand Records, supra note 37, at 628.

n45. J. Madison, Debates in the Federal Convention, in 2 Farrand Records, supra note 37, at 628. See also Remarks of James Iredell in the North Carolina Ratifying Convention (July 29, 1788), reprinted in 4 Elliot's Debates, supra note 30, at 165-66 (diversity of state practice too great to overcome); The Federalist No. 83 (Alexander Hamilton) (Isaac Kramnick ed. 1788) at 467-68 (stating:

It appears that there is a material diversity as well in the modification as in the extent of the institution of trial by jury in civil cases, in the several States; and from this fact these obvious reflections flow: first, that no general rule could have been fixed upon by the convention which would have corresponded with the circumstances of all the States; and secondly, that more or at least as much might been hazarded by taking the system of any one State for a standard, as by omitting a provision altogether and leaving the matter, as it has been left, to legislative regulation.);

Remarks of James Wilson in the Pennsylvania Ratifying Convention (Dec. 7, 1787), reprinted in 2 Elliot's Debates, supra note 30, at 488-89 ("no particular mode of trial by jury could be discovered that would suit them all").

n46. See U.S. Const. art. III.

n47. Wolfram, supra note 27, at 567.

REV_00263366

n48. See Landsman, supra note 6, at 597. Professor Landsman, in support of this proposition, points to the series of events that became known as the Shay's Rebellion. The Shay's Rebellion occurred when colonies began manipulating currencies to aid debtors and censured judges for deciding cases in creditor's favor. Professor Wolfram explains that in the aftermath of the war, the paper currency which had been printed by the Colonies became largely worthless. When creditors refused to accept it and brought suit on the debt, sympathetic jurors, many of whom were themselves debtors, were reluctant to apply the law and discharge the debt in contravention of the law. Professor Wolfram concludes that "the refusal of jurors to award damages on [creditor's] claims was precisely the reason why its guarantee was sought." Wolfram, supra note 27, at 681.

n49. See, e.g., Henderson, supra note 32, at 293 (observing, it seems likely that the true reason for omitting a ... provision for civil juries was at least in part that the convention members simply wanted to go home. They had worked hard through a hot, steamy Philadelphia summer on the more difficult and more central problems of representation in Congress and choice of a national executive, and they had had enough.).

n50. Landsman, supra note 6, at 598.

n51. See Forrest Mcdonal, Nous Ordo Seclorum 41 (1985).

n52. See id. at 290-91.

n53. See Henderson, supra note 32. Professor Wolfram suggests that one of the earliest successes of the "Federalists," the party that eventually won the battle over the adoption of the Constitution was to foist upon their opponents the appellation "Anti-federalists." The connotations of opposition to a system of state-national governments and of sheer obstructionism were well appreciated by the "Anti-federalists' who vigorously argued that the name was better deserved by the supporters of the Constitution, who in fact should not be regarded as "Federalists," but rather as "consolidationists" or '"nationalists."

Wolfram, supra note 27, at 667 n.77.

n54. James Wilson, a delegate at the Pennsylvania ratifying convention, posed the following hypothetical: "The plaintiff comes from another state; he comes a stranger, unknown as to his character or mode of life, while the other party is in the midst of his friends, or perhaps his dependants. Would a trial by jury, in such a case, insure justice to the stranger?" Remarks of James Wilson in the Pennsylvania Ratifying Convention (Dec. 11, 1787), reprinted in 2 Elliot's Debates, supra note 30, at 517. Likewise, another delegate made the following remarks:

REV_00263367

A suit is depending between a citizen of Carolina and Georgia, and it becomes necessary to try it in Georgia. What is the consequence? Why, the citizen of this state must rest his cause upon the jury of his opponent's vicinage, where, unknown and unrelated, he stands a very poor chance for justice against one whose neighbors, whose friends and relations compose the greater part of his judges. It is in this case, and only in cases of a similar nature with this, that the right of trial by jury is not established; and judging from myself, it is in this instance only that every man would wish to resign it, not to a jury with whom he is unacquainted, but to an impartial and responsible individual.

Remarks of Robert Barnwell in the South Carolina Convention (Jan. 17, 1788), reprinted in 4 Elliot's Debates, supra note 30, at 295.

n55. See 3 Elliot's Debates, supra note 30, at 68.

n56. See J. Madison, Debates in the Federal Convention, in 2 Farrand Records, supra note 37, at 587-88. See the remarks of Colonel Mason in 2 Farrand Records, supra note 42, at 587-88. (stating: "The jury cases cannot be specified.").

n57. See J. Madison, Debates in the Federal Convention, in 2 Farrand Records, supra note 37 at 587. See also the remarks of Mr. Sherman, in 2 Farrand Records, supra note 37, at 587-88 (stating: "The Legislature may be safely trusted.").

n58. See Wolfram, supra note 27, at 665-67 and sources cited therein.

n59. The Federalist No. 83, supra note 45, at 461.

n60. Id. at 464.

n61. Id.

n62. Landsman, supra note 6, at 598.

REV_00263368

The second session began on August 6 and continued until September 17, 1787. [35] During the adjournment, a Committee on Detail prepared a first draft of the Constitution, which was presented to the delegates when the convention reconvened on August 6. [36] This draft contained a guarantee of a jury trial in criminal cases, but made no mention of a jury hearing civil cases. [37] On August 27 and 28, the Convention, [*417] in full session, discussed the judiciary articles, but no mention was made of the right to jury trial in civil cases. [38]

Once the Committee on Detail had finalized the structural elements of the document, a Committee on Style and Arrangement was appointed to develop its final, printed format. [39] That committee filed its final report on September 12 - five days before the Convention was to adjourn. [40] Only at this late date was the issue of a civil jury guarantee raised by Hugh Williamson, a North Carolina delegate. [41] When Williamson objected to the lack of a civil jury guarantee, the other delegates pointed out that including such a provision would be fraught with insurmountable drafting difficulties because the jury trial procedures varied too greatly among the several states and because it would be too difficult to distinguish between cases sounding in law and those sounding in equity. [42] James Wilson, one of the members of the Committee on Detail stated:

When, therefore, this subject was in discussion, we were involved in difficulties, which pressed on all sides, and no precedent could be discovered to direct our course. The cases open to a jury, differed in different states; it was therefore impracticable, on that ground, to have made a general rule. [43]

[*418]

On September 15, Delegates Pickney and Gerry moved to add the following language to article III: "And a trial by jury shall be preserved as usual in civil cases." [44] James Madison recorded the ensuing discussion:

Mr. Gorham. The constitution of Juries is different in different States and the trial itself is usual in different cases in different States, Mr. King urged the same objections.

Genl. Pinckney. He thought such a clause in the Constitution would be pregnant with embarrassments. [45]

In the end, the motion was defeated and the finalized document contained no civil jury guarantee. [46] Professor Wolfram contends that this omission was nearly a "fatal blunder" and observes that:

[the] general history of the background and adoption of the Bill of Rights usually brings to mind images of great constitutional debates over the freedoms of speech and press, the non-establishment of religion, the protections of due process, safeguards for those accused of crime and the like. It is, therefore, somewhat incongruous to a [twenty-first] century reader to learn that the entire issue of the absence of a bill of rights was precipitated at the Philadelphia Convention by an objection that the document under consideration lacked a specific guarantee of jury trial in civil cases. [47]

REV_00263333

n63. Id. at 599. See also Wolfram, supra note 27, at 662-66. (The lack of a provision for a jury trial became one of the chief sources of attack on the Constitution in the debates over its adoption in 1788 and led to the proposal and ratification of the Seventh Amendment 1789.); Herbert J. Storing, What the Anti-Federalists Were For 64 (1981) ("The most important [of the Anti-Federalists' demands], and the most widely uttered objections against the Constitution [were] that it did not provide for (and therefore effectively abolished) trial by jury in civil cases."); Ann Woolhandler & Michael G. Collins, The Article III Jury, 87 Va. L. Rev. 587 n.23 (2001) (concluding:

The framers were concerned that Article III effectively removed the jury from a civil trial, and were even concerned that since the Supreme Court had appellate review as to both "law and fact," even if juries were retained nominally, their verdicts could, in effect, be "vetoed" by the Court's different finding of fact.)

See also Remarks of Patrick Henry in the Virginia Ratifying Convention (June 20, 1788), reprinted in 3 Elliot's Debates, supra note 30, at 544 (noting that the provision for appellate jurisdiction "will, in its operation, destroy the trial by jury"); Letters of Centinel, No. 1 (Oct. 5, 1787), reprinted in 2 The Complete Anti-Federalist 143 (Herbert J. Storing ed., 1981) (stating that the "trial by jury in civil cases is taken away" given the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction); Essays of Cincinnatus, No. 2, (noting that jury trial was taken away both because of Article III's reference to appellate jurisdiction and its silence on original trials); Essay of a Democratic Federalist (Oct. 17, 1787), reprinted in 3 The Complete Anti-Federalist, at 59-60 (commenting on "the entire abolition of the trial by jury in civil cases," given the federal appellate power over law and fact); see also Michael G. Collins, Article III Cases, State Court Duties, and the Madisonian Compromise, 1995 Wis. L. Rev. 39, 108-10 & nn.193-95 (noting that the primary basis for the Anti-Federalists' claim that Article III destroyed jury trials was grounded in the fear of federal appellate review of jury fact finding).

n64. See, e.g., Remarks of Mr. Bloodworth in the North Carolina Ratifying Convention (July 28, 1788), reprinted in 4 Elliot's Debates, supra note 30 (querying whether "the trial by jury is not cut off"); Luther Martin, Genuine Information (Nov. 29, 1787), reprinted in 3 Farrand Records, supra note 37, at 221 (the absence of the right to jury, together with Supreme Court review of both law and fact, "absolutely takes away: trial by jury"); Essays of Cincinnatus, No. 2 (Nov. 8, 1787), reprinted in 6 The Complete Anti-Federalist, supra note 63, at 10-13 (observing that "the trial by jury does seem to be taken away in civil cases"); Wat Tyler, Proclamation (Oct. 24, 1787), reprinted in The Complete Bill of Rights 558 ("trial by jury is abolished in all civil cases"); Essay by Timoleon (Nov. 1, 1787), reprinted in The Complete Bill of Rights 559 (express guarantee to jury trial in criminal cases, combined with silence with respect to civil trials, implies no jury in civil trials).

n65. See, e.g., Essays by a Farmer, No. 4, Maryland Gazette, Mar. 21, 1788, reprinted in 5 The Complete Anti-Federalist, supra note 63, at 38 (Herbert J. Storing ed., 1981) ("The trial by jury is - the democratic branch of the judiciary power - more necessary than representatives in the legislature ... .") (emphasis omitted); Letter from Thomas Jefferson to

REV_00263369

Abbe Arnoux (July 19, 1789), reprinted in The Complete Bill of Rights 596 (Neil H. Cogan ed., 1997) (stating that citizen participation in the judicial branch was more important than participation in the judicial branch).

n66. 3 Elliot's Debates, supra note 30, at 544. Patrick Henry spoke passionately about the right to jury trial:

(a) one of the "rights dear to human nature," (b) "trial by jury is the best appendage of freedom," (c) a "sacred right" (d) "that invaluable blessing," and (e) "that trial by jury which our ancestors secured their lives and property with," "that noble palladium" "that excellent mode of trial," "the transcendent excellency of this trial, its essentiality to the preservation of liberty, and the extreme danger of substituting any other mode."

Wolfram, supra note 27, at 670 n.85.

n67. Debates And Proceedings In The Convention Of The Commonwealth Of Massachusetts 80 (1856).

n68. Id.

n69. 3 Elliot's Debates, supra note 30, at 658.

n70. See Ann Woolhandler & Michael G. Collins, The Article III Jury, 87 Va. L. Rev. 587, 594 (2001).

n71. See infra Part III.

n72. The Federalist No. 83. (Alexander Hamilton) (Issac Kramnick), paraphrasing Patrick Henry's remarks reprinted in 3 Elliot's Debates, supra note 30, at 544.

n73. Interestingly, at the time the Seventh Amendment was adopted, the jury was able to pass on both law and fact. In Georgia v. Brailsford, Chief Justice John Jay instructed the jury:

REV_00263370

It may not be amiss, here, Gentlemen, to remind you of the good old rule, that on questions of fact, it is the province of the jury, on questions of law, it is the province of the court to decide. But it must be observed that by the same law, which recognizes this reasonable distribution of jurisdiction, you have nevertheless a right to take upon yourselves to judge of both, and to determine the law as well as the fact in controversy ... . Both objects are lawfully, within your power of decision.

Georgia v. Brailsford, 3 U.S. (1 Dall.) 1, 4 (1794). Brailsford has never been explicitly overruled.

n74. The purpose of punitive damages is "to punish what has occurred and to deter ... repetition" of the misconduct. Pac. Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 20-21 (1991).

n75. See Michael Rustad & Thomas Koenig, The Historical Continuity of Punitive Damages Awards: Reforming the Tort Reformers, 42 Am. U. L. Rev. 1269, 1285 (1993) (citing Exodus 22:4 (theft carries a penalty of double restitution); Luke 19:8 (quadruple restitution for fraud or theft)).

n76. See Rustad & Koenig, supra note 75, at 1285, citing 1 Linda L. Schlueter & Kenneth R. Redden, Punitive Damages 3 (2d ed. 1989).

n77. See Rustad & Koenig, supra note 75, at 1285. In an amusing aside, Professors Rustad and Koenig relate the following anecdote:

The laws of the XII Tables declared that whoever should do a personal injury to another should pay twenty-five asses, a considerable sum at the time. At a later time, however, when money abounded, this penalty became so insignificant that one Lucius Veratius used to amuse himself by striking those whom he met in the streets in the face, and then tendering them the legal amends, from a wallet which a slave carried after him for the purpose.

Id. (citing Vindictive Damages, 4 AM. L.J. 61, 75 (1852)).

n78. See generally H. Jolowicz, The Assessment of Penalties in Primitive Law, Cambridge Legal Essays (1926).

n79. See Plato, Protagoras 324b; Plato, Laws 9.85b & 9.934a.

REV_00263371

n80. See e.g., Barry Nicholas, An Introduction To Roman Law 215-25 (1997); Linda L. Schlueter & Kenneth R. Redden, 1 Punitive Damages 3 (2d ed. 1989); James B. Sales & Kenneth B. Cole, Jr., Punitive Damages: A Relic Tthat Has Outlived Its Origins, 37 Vand. L. Rev. 1117 (1984).

n81. For example, the Statute of Gloucester provided for treble damages for waste. Statute of Gloucester (1278), 6 Edw. I, c. 5.

n82. 98 Eng. Rep. 489 (K.B. 1763).

n83. 95 Eng. Rep. 768 (K.B. 1763).

n84. See Wilkes, 98 Eng. Rep. at 489.

n85. Id. at 498-99.

n86. Landsman, supra note 6, at 591.

n87. See Huckle, 95 Eng. Rep. at 768.

n88. Id. at 768-69. A.S. Turberville, a noted British historian, characterized the climate that led to the first award of punitive damages as follows:

It was during the Bute administration in 1762 that John Wilkes, assisted by the satirical poet Charles Churchill, started his scurrilous newspaper The North Briton, which first became famous for the violence of its attacks upon the favourite and all his compatriots. In May 1763 a new ministry came into office, its outstanding member being George Grenville. At the prorogation of Parliament the King had made the customary speech from the throne. In No. 45 of his paper, published on 23rd April, Wilkes had severely criticized the passages in the speech relating to the Peace of Paris and especially a reference to what the King of Prussia had gained from the treaty. Wilkes bluntly declared that the King had given "the sanction of his sacred name to the most odious measures and to the most unjustifiable public declarations from a throne ever renowned for truth, honour, and unsullied virtue." Speeches from the throne in Parliament are always regarded as the declarations of the ministers; but it was characteristic of George III to regard this criticism as an accusation of falsehood and as being therefore a gross personal libel. He insisted on the prosecution of the author, and the new ministers were nothing loathe to acquiesce. As the article was anonymous the

REV_00263372

Government issued a "general warrant, mentioning no specific names for the apprehension of 'the authors, printers, and publishers' of the North Briton," and under this warrant Wilkes was arrested, together with forty-eight other persons, who were suspected, some of them quite wrongly, to have been concerned in the issuing of No. 45. Wilkes stigmatized the general warrant as illegal and "a ridiculous warrant against the whole English people."

A.S. Turberville, English Men And Manners In The 18th Century 44-46 (2d ed. 1957). The Chief Justice in Wilkes opined that the Government's practices, "which had been produced since the Revolution, are no justification of a practice in itself illegal, and contrary to the fundamental principles of the constitution." Wilkes, 98 Eng. Rep. at 499.

n89. See Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group., Inc., 121 S. Ct. 1678, 1683 (2001) (Compensatory damages redress the concrete loss that a plaintiff has suffered by reason of the defendant's wrongful conduct, but punitive damages are private fines intended to punish the defendant and deter future wrongdoing.).

n90. 1 N.J.L. 90 (1791).

n91. Id. at 91.

n92. Id.

n93. 1 S.C.L. (1 Bay) 6 (1784).

n94. Id.

n95. See, e.g., Colleen P. Murphy, Judicial Assessment of Legal Remedies, 94 Nw. U. L. Rev. 153, 178 (1999); Wolfram, supra note 27 at 681.

n96. Rustad & Koenig, supra note 75, at n.96 (quoting 1 Theodore Sedgwick, A Treatise On The Measure Of Damages 347 at 687).

n97. Id. at n.153 (quoting Sedgwick, supra note 96, at 39).

REV_00263373

n98. See 2 Simon Greenleaf, A Treatise On The Law Of Evidence 240 n.2 (16th ed. 1899) (contending that punitive damages remedy is inconsistent with the purpose of tort law).

n99. Rustad & Koenig, supra note 75, at n.137 (quoting Letter from G.K., Correspondent, to the Editor, Central Law Journal, reprinted in 6 Cent. L.J., 74, 74 (1878) [hereinafter Letter to the Editor] (citing Chief Justice Ryan's opinion in Bass v. Chicago & N.W. Ry. Co., 42 Wis. 654, 672 (1877)).

n100. Id.

n101. 2 Simon Greenleaf, A Treatise On the Law of Evidence 253 at 294 n.2 (William Draper Lewis ed. 1897).

n102. Id.

n103. Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. 342, 383 (1872).

n104. 54 U.S. 363 (1851).

n105. Most commentators, including the Court itself, recognize this as the first case in which the Court sanctioned punitive damage awards. But see Malcolm E. Wheeler, The Constitutional Case for Reforming Punitive Damages Procedures, 69 Va. L. Rev. 269, 273-74 n.15 (1983). Professor Wheeler writes as follows:

Some confusion exists as to when the Supreme Court first considered the constitutionality of punitive damages awards to private plaintiffs. Justice Harlan, speaking for the plurality in Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 159 (1967), and the authors of two law review notes, Note, In Defense of Punitive Damages [55 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 303 (1980)], at 331 & n.151; Note, The Imposition of Punishment by Civil Courts: A Reappraisal of Punitive Damages, 41 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1158, 1177-78 (1966), have suggested that the Court upheld the constitutionality of such awards in Day v. Woodworth, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 363 (1851). Punitive damages, however, were not at issue in that case. The petitioner, who had been the plaintiff and prevailing party in the trial court, challenged the judgment on the ground that the jury had improperly refused to award him his costs of suit. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that costs could be awarded only if authorized by the appropriate legislative body and that no such authorization had been shown. In dictum the Court distinguished an award of costs from an award of punitive damages. Id. at 371. In several later cases the Court expressed an erroneous belief that Day had sanctioned punitive damages. See Scott v. Donald, 165 U.S. 58, 87-89 (1897); Milwaukee & St. P. Ry. v. Arms, 91 U.S. 489, 492-93 (1875); Philadelphia, W. & B.R.R. v. Quigley, 62 U.S. (21 How.) 202, 213-14 (1858).

REV_00263374

↑n106. Day, 54 U.S. at 371.

↑n107. Id.

↑n108. Id.

↑n109. See, e.g., Dairy Queen Inc. v. Wood, 369 U.S. 469 (1962); Beacon Theatres, Inc. v. Westover, 359 U.S. 500 (1959).

↑n110. It is odd that the early American juries were given law as well as fact finding tasks. It was likely an effort to thwart what were perceived as unjust laws foisted upon the colonies by England. Certainly, the English common law did not permit juries to find law as well as fact; a doctrine that was strongly reiterated by Lord Hardwicke shortly before hostilities broke out between the Colonies and the Crown. In The King v. Poole, Cas. T. Hard, 95 Eng. Rep. 15 (K.B. 1774), the question was whether Mr. Poole had been validly elected as the mayor of Liverpool, and the jury returned a verdict that he had not been, contrary to the Nisi Prius Judge's instructions on the law of elections. Lord Hardwicke began by stating that "the general rule is, that if the Judge of Nisi Prius directs the jury on the point of law, and they think it fit obstinately to find a verdict contrary to his direction, that is a sufficient ground for granting a new trial." Id. at 17. Lord Hardwicke then qualified the general rule stating that when the judge instructs the jury incorrectly, and the verdict is in line with what the law actually is, rather than the instructions given, a new trial would not be granted. This pronouncement, however, comes dangerously close to the notion that juries, rather than judges, are the arbiters of law, as well as fact. Lest the court be misunderstood, Lord Hardwicke declared,

The thing that governs greatly in this determination is, that the point of law is not to be determined by juries; juries have a power by law to determine matters of fact only: and it is of the greatest consequence to the law of England and to the subject, that these powers of the Judge and jury are kept distinct; that the Judge determines the law, and the jury the fact; and if ever they come to be confounded, it will prove the confusion and destruction of the law of England.

Id. at 16.

↑n111. One of the earliest recorded instances in the American Colonies of a judge influencing a jury verdict occurred during the Salem Witch Trials. One of the accused,

REV_00263375

Rebecka Nurse, was originally found not guilty by the jury, yet she was nonetheless hanged as a witch. When questioned about it, one of the members of her jury testified as follows:

I Thomas Fisk, the Subscriber hereof, being one of them that were of the Jury of the last week at Salem-Court, upon the Tryal of Rebecka Nurse, etc., being desired by some of the Relations why the Jury brought her in Guilty, after her Verdict not Guilty; I do hereby give my reasons to be as follows, viz. When the Verdict not Guilty was, the honoured Court was pleased to object against it, saying to them [the jury], that they think they let slip the words, which the Prisoner at the Bar spake against her self which were spoken in reply to Goodwife Hobbs and her Daughter, who had been faulty in setting their hands to the Devils Book, as they have confessed formerly; the words were "what, do these persons give in Evidence against me now, they used to come against us." After the honoured Court had manifested their dissatisfaction of the Verdict, several of the Jury declared themselves desirous to go out again, and thereupon the honoured Court gave leave; but when we came to consider the Case, I could not tell how to take her words, as evidence against her, till she had a further opportunity to put her Sense upon them, if she would take it; and then going into Court, I mentioned the aforesaid, which by one of the Court were affirmed to have been spoken by her, she being then at the Bar, but made no reply, nor interpretation of them; whereupon those words were to me principal Evidence against her.

Statement of Thomas Fisk, Juror, July 4, 1692, in The Salem Witchcraft Papers (Paul Boyer & Stephen Nissenbaum eds. 1977).

n112. Style 466 (Upper Bench 1655).

n113. Id.

n114. 90 Eng. Rep. 526 (K.B. 1697).

n115. Id.

n116. 96 Eng. Rep. 557 (C.P. 1774).

n117. Id. at 557.

n118. Id. at 557. Interestingly, the court noted that the plaintiff had offered to set off a £ 300 award the defendant had against the plaintiff, thereby lowering the amount to be paid to Sharpe by the customs official to £ 200. When the official refused, the court stated that "this shows a want of candour on [the customs official's] side, and he is therefore entitled to no assistance." Id.

REV_00263376

n119. As the Court noted in Honda v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415, 434 n.12 (1994), "Judicial deference to jury verdicts may have been stronger in 18th-century America than in England, and judges' power to order new trials for excessive damages more contested."

n120. 2 Johns. 63 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1806).

n121. Id. at 73.

n122. 9 Johns. 45 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1812).

n123. Id. at 50-51.

n124. Id. at 51.

n125. Id. Numerous cases from the early nineteenth century repeated this theme. See, e.g., M'Connell v. Hampton, 12 Johns. 234, 236 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1815), in which an action for assault and false imprisonment arising from a military officer's court martial of a civilian for treason. In granting a new trial for excessive damages, the court repeated the familiar formula:

To justify the court in setting aside a verdict, the damages ought to appear outrageous, or manifestly to exceed the injury, and such that all mankind would, at once, pronounce unreasonable, and so as to induce the court to believe that the jury must have acted from prejudice or partiality, or were influenced by some improper considerations. It is not necessary that the court should believe that the jury acted corruptly. Their feelings might be so excited, or their passions so inflamed, as to mislead their judgments, and induce them to give a verdict, which their own sober reflection would not approve.

Id. at 236.

n126. Renee B. Lettow, New Trial for Verdict Against the Law: Judge-Jury Relations in Early Nineteenth Century America, 71 Notre Dame L. Rev. 505, 548 (1996).

REV_00263377

n127. 28 U.S. 433 (1830).

n128. Id. at 446.

n129. 10 Serg. & Rawle 399 (Pa. 1823). One case, Bourke v. Bulow, 1 S.C.L. 49 (S.C. Com. Pl. 1787) states that "there are many cases in the books, for new trials on account of excessive damages, where they have been granted ... ." However, it is almost certain that the court there was referring to English jurisprudence.

n130. Khun, 10 Serg. & Rawle at 408.

n131. Id. at 409.

n132. 3 F. Cas. 760 (C.C.D. Mass. 1822).

n133. Remittitur is a procedural device which allows the court to order the plaintiff to remit a portion of the award or to face a new trial. See, e.g., Fed. R. Civ. P. 59.

n134. Id. at 761-62.

n135. Id. at 762.

n136. 116 U.S. 642 (1886).

n137. Id. at 646-47.

n138. 130 U.S. 69 (1889).

n139. Id. at 72-73.

REV_00263378

Although the variance in jury procedures among the colonies may have posed drafting problems - which was the ostensible reason for omission of the right to jury trial in civil cases - other forces may have been at work. Scholars have theorized that the drafters, made up primarily of wealthy nationalists, may have seen civil juries as being [*419] prone to engaging in jury nullification in favor of their debtor peers at the expense of the wealthy, creditor class. [48] Other scholars conclude that the failure to include a Bill of Rights to the original document was simply a function of the exhaustion of the delegates. [49] Whatever the reason for the omission of the right to a civil jury, it "signaled a profound shift in the way an exceedingly powerful segment of society had come to view the institution." [50]

Commentators identify two possible reasons for the declining importance of the civil jury, at least in the minds of the framers. First, prior to the revolution, colonial juries were thought to counterbalance the power of English judges seeking to enforce laws enacted by Parliament that were thought to be harsh or unfair. Since colonial legislatures were by then enacting the applicable laws, this was no longer seen as a threat. [51] Second, jury decisions were likely to be less predictable than judge-made decisions and were more likely to protect the emerging nation's fragile financial condition. [52]

The omission of the right to jury trial in civil cases became a lightening rod during the ratification debates that followed. The national discourse was being led by two sharply divided groups. On one side of the debate were the Federalists who were proponents of the Constitution as it had emerged from the Constitutional Convention. On the other were the Anti-Federalists who opposed its adoption, in part, because of the lack of a civil jury guarantee. [53] Many of the Federalists [*420] were concerned that inclusion of the right to a jury in a federal court could lead to jury bias in diversity cases, and opposed it on that basis. [54] Other Federalists argued that the right to a jury in civil cases need not be constitutionally guaranteed because the state constitutions preserved the right to jury trial, and would control in federal courts. [55] This, however, reflected a spurious understanding of the interaction between federal and state courts and the Supremacy Clause. The third argument centered on the relative difficulty of distinguishing which cases were at law, and therefore required a jury, and those that sounded in equity and did not. [56] The fourth argument was simply to leave the matter to Congress, which the Anti-Federalists countered by pointing out that the Constitution was meant to protect citizens from corrupt federal governmental interference. The Federalists' weak reply was, essentially, that only good men would be elected to Congress, and, therefore, there was no need to worry. [57] The final argument was [*421] that jury trial practices varied among the several states to such a degree that any attempt at uniformity was futile. [58]

In one of the Federalist Papers, Alexander Hamilton took a different tack. First, he observed that "the objection to the plan of the convention, which has met with most success in [New York] and perhaps in several of the other States, is that relative to the want of a constitutional provision for the trial by jury in civil cases." [59] Hamilton characterized the dispute as follows:

The friends and adversaries of the plan of the convention, if they agree in nothing else, concur at least in the value they set upon the trial by jury; or if there is any difference between them it consists in this: the former regard it as a valuable safeguard to liberty; the latter represent it as the very palladium of free government. [60]

His thesis was that the omission of the express right to jury trial did not amount to the abolition of the institution; states were free to order jury trials as they saw fit, and,

REV_00263334

↑n140. Id. at 74-75.

↑n141. 131 U.S. 22 (1889).

↑n142. See id. at 29-30.

↑n143. 116 U.S. 550 (1886).

↑n144. Id. at 562.

↑n145. Id. at 565 (internal citations omitted).

↑n146. 28 F. Cas. 745 (C.C. Mass. 1812).

↑n147. The concept of "circuit riding" traces its origins back to the Judiciary Act of 1789. Under the Act, which was motivated by Federalism principles, each Justice was required to "ride circuit" in addition to acting as a United States Supreme Court Justice. At the time, Circuit courts were composed of one district court judge and two Supreme Court Justices, known as "Circuit Justices." The Circuit Justices were required to preside over matters located within each district in their Circuit twice a year. Although circuit riding was very unpopular amongst the Justices, the technical requirement remained a part of the judiciary system until 1891. See, e.g., Eric J. Gribbin, Note, California Split: A Plan to Divide the Ninth Circuit, 47 Duke L. J. 351 (1997).

↑n148. Wonson, 28 F. Cas. at 750.

↑n149. Id.

↑n150. 187 U.S. 315 (1902).

↑n151. Id. at 320.

REV_00263379

n152. 228 U.S. 364 (1913).

n153. Id. at 376-77.

n154. Id. at 397.

n155. 283 U.S. 494 (1931).

n156. Id. at 498-99.

n157. 293 U.S. 474 (1935).

n158. Additur is the conceptual inverse of remittitur. Theoretically, argued the plaintiff in Dimick, if a defendant who is subjected to excessive damages can be granted a new trial unless the plaintiff agrees to submit to a lower award, so too should a plaintiff be accorded a similar power. Thus, if the damages awarded are inadequate, the plaintiff should have the power to force a new trial unless the defendant agrees to enlarge the award. See id.

n159. Id. at 476.

n160. Id. at 484-85.

n161. Id. at 486.

n162. Id. at 485.

n163. Id. at 486.

n164. Id. at 487. In this 5-4 decision, Justice Stone argued in his dissenting opinion that the Court was better served by its prior use of the functional approach and catalogued the procedural devices upheld by the Court that were not available at common law.

REV_00263380

Thus this Court has held that a federal court, without the consent of the parties, may constitutionally appoint auditors to hear testimony, examine books and accounts, and frame and report upon issues of fact, as an aid to the jury in arriving at its verdict; it may require both a general and a special verdict and set aside the general verdict for the plaintiff and direct a verdict for the defendant on the basis of the facts specially found; and it may accept so much of the verdict as declares that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and set aside so much of it as fixes the amount of the damages, and order a new trial of that issue alone. Yet none of these procedures was known to the common law. In fact, the very practice, so firmly imbedded in federal procedure, of making a motion for a new trial directly to the trial judge, instead of to the court en banc, was never adopted by the common law. But this Court has found in the Seventh Amendment no bar to the adoption by the federal courts of these novel methods of dealing with the verdict of a jury, for they left unimpaired the function of the jury to decide issues of fact, which it had exercised before the adoption of the amendment.

Id. at 491-92 (Stone, J., dissenting) (internal citations omitted).

n165. 319 U.S. 372 (1943).

n166. Id. at 387-88.

n167. Id. at 390-92 (internal citations omitted).

n168. Id. at 392.

n169. Id. at 397 (Black, J., dissenting). The use of the functional approach led to the Court's approval of the reduction of the number of jurors constitutionally required in both criminal, and civil cases. See, e.g., Colgrave v. Battin, 413 U.S. 149 (1973); Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970). In another series of cases interpreting the Seventh Amendment tangentially related to the subject matter of this article, but ultimately beyond its scope, is that series of cases which examine in what instance litigants are entitled to a jury in the first instance. In Ross v. Bernhard, 396 U.S. 531 (1970), for example, the Court held that plaintiffs in a shareholders derivative suit were entitled to a jury. The Court established a three part test to determine when one is entitled to a jury. First, the Court will use an historical test, and look to whether the common law would have provided a jury. Second, the Court will look to the nature of the remedy sought, and in particular whether it is primarily equitable or legal in character. Finally, the Court will examine the relative abilities and limitations of the jury. This last point is relevant to the division of labor between judge and jury in assessing punitive damages, and is discussed further later in this Article.

REV_00263381

n170. 54 U.S. 363 (1851).

n171. Id. at 371; see also Barry v. Edmunds, 116 U.S. 550, 565 (1886) ("For nothing is better settled than that, in such cases as the present, and other actions for torts where no precise rule of law fixes the recoverable damages, it is the peculiar function of the jury to determine the amount by their verdict.").

n172. 336 F.2d 406 (5th Cir. 1964).

n173. See 35 U.S.C. 284 (1994). The statute states that "the court may increase the damages up to three times the amount found or assessed."

n174. Swofford, 336 F.2d at 412.

n175. Id. at 413.

n176. 481 U.S. 412 (1987).

n177. Id. at 414.

n178. Id. at 423.

n179. Id. at 425 (internal citations omitted).

n180. Id. at 425-26.

n181. Id. at 426.

n182. Id. at 426 n.9.

REV_00263382

n183. Id.

n184. Id. This statement could have significant implications with respect to punitive damages as well. It is well settled that states have the right to regulate punitive damages awards, as does Congress. If the reasoning in Tull is extended, it strengthens the argument that judges, rather than juries, should set punitive damage awards. See discussion infra Part V.

n185. See Shamblin's Ready Mix, Inc. v. Eaton Corp., 873 F.2d 736 (4th Cir. 1989).

n186. Id. at 739-40.

n187. Id. at 740.

n188. Id. The court cites to the following cases: Rowlett v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 832 F.2d 194, 207 (1st Cir. 1987) (verdict for $ 3,000,000 reduced to $ 300,000); Bell v. City of Milwaukee, 746 F.2d 1205, 1267, 1279 (7th Cir. 1984) (verdict for $ 350,000 reduced to $ 50,000); Guzman v. W. State Bank, 540 F.2d 948, 954 (8th Cir. 1976) (verdict for $ 25,000 reduced to $ 10,000); Shimman v. Frank, 625 F.2d 80, 102, 104 (6th Cir. 1980) (judgment for $ 75,000 reduced to $ 20,000). The court goes on to recognize that none of these decisions discussed the Seventh Amendment. Shamblin's Ready Mix, 873 F.2d at 740-41.

n189. 131 U.S. 22 (1889).

n190. See id. at 28-30.

n191. Shamblin's Ready Mix, 873 F.2d at 741 (quoting Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 350 (1974)).

n192. Id. at 742.

n193. Id.

REV_00263383

n194. Id.

n195. 938 F.2d 502 (4th Cir. 1991).

n196. Id. at 506.

n197. Id.

n198. Id.

n199. 492 U.S. 257 (1989) (concerning an attack on punitive damages based upon the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on excessive fines).

n200. 499 U.S. 1 (1991). Haslip is discussed at length below.

n201. Defender Ind., 938 F.2d at 506.

n202. Id. at 507.

n203. See id. at 507.

n204. Zoppo v. Homestead Ins. Co., 644 N.E.2d 397, 401 (Ohio 1994), citing Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2315.21(C)(2) (West 1987), which has since been amended.

n205. 644 N.E.2d 397 (Ohio 1994).

n206. The Ohio Constitution provides that "the right of trial by jury shall be inviolate, except that, in civil cases, laws may be passed to authorize the rendering of a verdict by the concurrence of not less than three-fourths of the jury." Ohio Const. art. I, 5. Recall that the Seventh Amendment of the United States Constitution has does not apply to individual states. See supra note 5.

REV_00263384

n207. Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 401.

n208. Id.

n209. H.B. 350 (Ohio 1996) (which contained an amended version of section 2315.21).

n210. H.B. 350 was found unconstitutional as whole because it "usurped judicial power in violation of the Ohio Constitution's separation of powers." State ex. rel. Ohio Acad. of Trial Lawyers v. Sheward, 715 N.E.2d 1062, 1097 (Ohio 1999).

n211. Sheward, 715 N.E.2d at 1091. In 2001, the Ohio legislature enacted S.B. 108 which contained yet another version of 2315.21, which went into effect in July 2001. Section (C)(1) provides, "In a tort action, the trier of fact shall determine the liability of any defendant for punitive or exemplary damages and the amount of those damages." Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2315.21(C)(1).

n212. See Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3701(a) (West 1995).

n213. See Smith v. Printup, 866 P.2d 985 (Kan. 1993).

n214. See discussion supra Part I.

n215. See id. at 997-98.

n216. See id.

n217. See id. at 998. The plaintiffs were arguing that the statute violated the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution, rather than the Seventh, which is not incorporated to the states. The plaintiffs were also arguing that the statutory scheme violated the right to jury trial in the Kansas Constitution, which is similar to the Ohio Constitution, and provides "the right of trial by jury shall be inviolate." Kan. Const. 5 . One other state, Connecticut, provides for judicial assessment of punitive damages awards in product liability cases only: "If the trier of fact determines that punitive damages should be awarded, the court shall determine the amount of such damages not to exceed an amount equal to twice the damages awarded to the plaintiff." Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. 52-240b (West 2001). To date, it appears that the statute has not been challenged on jury trial right grounds. The United States Circuit Courts of Appeals that have addressed the issue have found similar legislation unconstitutional. See, e.g., Defender Indus., Inc. v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 938 F.2d 502 (4th Cir. 1991), discussed above; O'Gilivie v. Int'l Playtex, Inc. 821 F.2d 1438 (10th Cir. 1987); McKinnon v. Berwyn, 750 F.2d 1383 (7th Cir. 1984). However, a number of other Circuits have reduced awards without remanding for a new trial. See, e.g., Rowlet v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 832 F.2d 194 (1st Cir. 1987); Bell v. City of Milwaukee, 746 F.2d 1205 (7th Cir. 1984); and Guzman v. W. State Bank, 540 F.2d 948 (8th Cir. 1976), which suggests that those Circuits do not believe judicial assessment is unconstitutional.

REV_00263385

↑n218. 499 U.S. 1 (1991). As the Haslip court noted, "the constitutional status of punitive damages ... is not an issue that is new to this Court ... . Challenges had been raised before; ... [but] they have been rejected or deferred." Id. at 12.

↑n219. Id. at 6 n.1. (The charge to the jury in full was as follows:

Now, if you find that fraud was perpetrated then in addition to compensatory damages you may in your discretion, when I use the word discretion, I say you don't have to even find a fraud, you wouldn't have to, but you may, the law says you may award an amount of money known as punitive damages. This amount of money is awarded to the plaintiff but it is not to compensate the plaintiff for any injury. It is to punish the defendant. Punitive means to punish or it is also called exemplary damages, which means to make an example. So, if you feel or not feel, but if you are reasonably satisfied from the evidence that the plaintiff, whatever plaintiff you are talking about, has had a fraud perpetrated upon them and as a direct result they were injured and in addition to compensatory damages you may in your discretion award punitive damages. Now, the purpose of awarding punitive or exemplary damages is to allow money recovery to the plaintiffs, it does to the plaintiff, by way of punishment to the defendant and for the added purpose of protecting the public by detering [sic] the defendant and others from doing such wrong in the future. Imposition of punitive damages is entirely discretionary with the jury, that means you don't have to award it unless this jury feels that you should do so. Should you award punitive damages, in fixing the amount, you must take into consideration the character and the degree of the wrong as shown by the evidence and necessity of preventing similar wrong.)

↑n220. See id. at 7.

↑n221. Justice Souter did not participate in the decision.

↑n222. See Haslip, 499 U.S. at 2.

REV_00263386

n223. Id. at 15.

n224. Id. at 17.

n225. Id. at 18.

n226. Id.

n227. Id. at 20.

n228. 493 So. 2d 1374 (Ala. 1986). The Hammond factors include the "culpability of the defendant's conduct," the "desirability of discouraging others from similar conduct[,]" the "impact upon the parties," and "other factors, such as the impact on innocent third parties." Haslip, 499 U.S. at 20 (citing Hammond, 493 So. 2d at 1379).

n229. Haslip, 499 U.S. at 21.

n230. Id. at 23-24.

n231. Id. at 21-22.

n232. See id. at 24-25 (Scalia, J., concurring).

n233. Id. at 44.

n234. Id. at 44 (O'Connor, J., dissenting).

n235. Id. at 44-45.

n236. 509 U.S. 443 (1993).

REV_00263387

n237. Id. at 470 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

n238. TXO Prod. Corp., 509 U.S. at 458.

n239. Id. at 443.

n240. Id. at 460 (quoting Haslip, 499 U.S. at 21).

n241. See id. at 462.

n242. Id.

n243. Id. at 458 n.24.

n244. Writing separately, Justice Kennedy took issue with precisely this portion of the plurality opinion:

To ask whether a particular award of punitive damages is grossly excessive begs the question: excessive in relation to what? The answer excessive in relation to the conduct of the tortfeasor may be correct, but it is unhelpful, for we are still bereft of any standard by which to compare the punishment to the malefaction that gave rise to it. A reviewing court employing this formulation comes close to relying upon nothing more than its own subjective reaction to a particular punitive damages award in deciding whether the award violates the Constitution. This type of review, far from imposing meaningful, law-like restraints on jury excess, could become as fickle as the process it is designed to superintend. Furthermore, it might give the illusion of judicial certainty where none in fact exists, and, in so doing, discourage legislative intervention that might prevent unjust punitive awards.

Id. at 466-67.

n245. Haslip, 499 U.S. at 18.

REV_00263388

therefore, the Anti-Federalists were making much ado about nothing. He concluded that there is no "inseparable connexion between the existence of liberty and the trial by jury in civil cases" [61] and "the jury's role could be safely reduced in democratic post-revolutionary America." [62]

The Anti-Federalists reacted violently to this rhetoric. So strong was the opposition that the Anti-Federalists "treated the absence of a civil jury guarantee as warranting the rejection of the Constitution in its entirety." [63] Their first objection was that, Hamilton's remarks notwithstanding, [*422] the structure of the Constitution did, in fact, take away the right to jury trial. [64] Their second objection was that the jury right to trial was too important to concepts of individual liberty and was necessary to ensure the freedom of the nascent Republic. [65] Patrick Henry was particularly eloquent:

To hear gentlemen of such penetration make use of such arguments to persuade us to part with that trial by jury, is very astonishing. We are told that we are to part with that trial by jury which our ancestors secured their lives and property with, and we are to build castles in the air, and substitute visionary modes of decision for that noble palladium. I hope we shall never be induced, by such arguments, to part with that excellent mode of trial. No appeal can now be made as to fact in common-law suits. The unanimous verdict of twelve impartial men cannot be reversed. [66]

[*423]

The Anti-Federalists were largely successful in convincing the citizenry that the newly created Constitution abolished the right to a jury trial in civil cases. As a result, in both Massachusetts and New Hampshire, in order to obtain a majority in the respective conventions necessary to ratify the Constitution, the Federalist constituent had to agree to certain "conciliatory propositions." [67] The proposed language was as follows: "In civil actions between citizens of different States, every issue of fact arising in actions at common law, shall be tried by a jury, if the parties, or either of them, request it." [68]

Virginia, New York, and Rhode Island recommended similar amendments. Virginia's proposed language was particularly sweeping. It read "that, in controversies respecting property, and in suits between man and man, the ancient trial by jury is one of the greatest securities to the rights of the people and [should] remain sacred and inviolable." [69] In the end, it was Anti-Federalist agitation that resulted in the adoption of the Seventh Amendment, among others, because the Anti-Federalists refused to ratify the constitution without assurances that the amendments would be forthcoming. [70] To the extent, then, that the historical perspective remains relevant in constitutional analysis of the relative powers of the judge and the jury where punitive damages are concerned, [71] the view of the Anti-Federalists that the right to jury trial constituted "the very palladium of free government" [72] suggests that if punitive damages were awarded at common law by the jury, we do violence to the Seventh Amendment to take such awards from them. [73]

[*424] However, the inquiry cannot end there. Part II demonstrates that the constitutional question no longer turns upon what procedures were historically available at common law. Rather, the court will inquire whether the particular function is "fundamental" to the role of the jury. It is this question to which one must ultimately turn to analyze the validity of the Court's action in Cooper. Nonetheless, because the historical test preceded the functional test, it is necessary to examine the historical pedigree of punitive damages. [74]

C. The Early Punitive Damages Cases

The concept of punitive damages is rooted in ancient times. For example, the Bible, [75] the n246. TXO, 509 U.S. at 471 (Scalia, J., concurring).

REV_00263335

n247. Id. at 500 (O'Connor, J., dissenting).

n248. Id. at 473 (O'Connor, J., dissenting).

n249. Id.

n250. Id. at 474.

n251. Id.

n252. Id. at 475-76.

n253. See id. at 497. Justice O'Connor was rightly disturbed by the West Virginia court's reference to categorizing the defendant as "really stupid" or "really mean" and allowing greater damages for the latter category: "Reference to categories like 'really stupid' or 'really mean' are a caricature of the difficult task of determining whether an award may be upheld consistent with due process." Id. at 498.

n254. 512 U.S. 415 (1994).

n255. See id. at 418.

n256. Id. (citing Or. Const. art. VII (amend.), 3.).

n257. See id.

n258. Id. at 420.

REV_00263389

↑n259. See id.

↑n260. See id. at 421.

↑n261. Id.

↑n262. Id. at 421.

↑n263. 95 Eng. Rep. 768 (K.B. 1763).

↑n264. Oberg, 512 U.S. at 426.

↑n265. For example, prior to Oberg, an Oregon court could only order a new trial where the jury was improperly instructed, there was error during trial or there was no evidence to support the punitive award. See id.

↑n266. See id. at 428.

↑n267. Id. at 421.

↑n268. Id. at 429.

↑n269. Id. at 430.

↑n270. Id. at 432.

↑n271. 517 U.S. 559 (1996).

↑n272. Glen R. Whitehead, BMW of North America v. Gore: Is the Supreme Court Initiating

REV_00263390

Judicial Tort Reform?, 16 QLR 533, 533 (1997).

n273. Colleen P. Murphy, Judgment as a Matter of Law on Punitive Damages, 75 Tul. L. Rev. 459, 479 n.53 (2000) (stating:

At least a few members of the Supreme Court have explicitly recognized a distinction between common law review for reasonableness and review as to whether an award violates the due process clause. As a plurality of the Court noted in a decision a few years before BMW: "A violation of a state law reasonableness requirement would not ... necessarily establish that the award is so grossly excessive as to violate the Federal Constitution." The Supreme Court, however, has confused matters by describing review under due process in terms of "reasonableness." "[A] general concern[ ] of reasonableness ... properly enters into the constitutional calculus." (citations omitted)).

n274. Whitehead, supra note 272, at 559.

n275. See BMW, 517 U.S. at 563-64.

n276. See id. at 563.

n277. See id. at 565.

n278. See id.

n279. Id. at 566.

n280. See id. at 567. Rather than using a multiplier of the compensatory award, as the trial court had done, the Alabama Supreme Court relied on "comparative analysis" of awards in Alabama and other jurisdictions. See id.

n281. Id. at 572. Other states' consumer protection laws expressly permitted automobile manufacturers to repair damage not exceeding three percent without disclosing that fact to the dealer or the ultimate end user. Thus, BMW's conduct was lawful in other jurisdictions. See id. at 569-71.

REV_00263391

n282. See id. at 575. This is a distillation of the factors first articulated in Haslip. See supra note 218 and accompanying text.

n283. See id. at 586. On remand, BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 701 So. 2d 507 (Ala. 1997), the Alabama Supreme Court characterized the Supreme Court's decision as follows:

The United States Supreme Court announced, for the first time and by a 5-4 vote, that a punitive damages award, even one that is the product of a fair trial, may be so large as to violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution. The Supreme Court determined that, under the Due Process Clause, a defendant has the right to fair notice not only of the conduct that may subject him to punishment, but also of the severity of the penalty that a state may impose for such conduct. BMW, 517 U.S. at [513], 116 S. Ct. at 1598. The Supreme Court recognized that a state may impose punitive damages to further its legitimate interest in punishing misconduct and deterring a repetition of that conduct. 517 U.S. at [568], 116 S. Ct. at 1595. To that end, a state has flexibility in determining the level of punitive damages the state will allow in different classes of cases. Id. The Supreme Court held that an award of punitive damages enters "the zone of arbitrariness that violates the Due Process Clause only when that award can be fairly categorized as 'grossly excessive'" in relation to those legitimate interests. Id. The Supreme Court then set out the following three "guideposts" by which a reviewing court could determine whether a punitive damages award is constitutionally excessive: (1) the degree of reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct; (2) the ratio between the plaintiff's award of compensatory damages and the amount of the punitive damages; and (3) the difference between the punitive damages award and the civil or criminal sanctions that could be imposed for comparable misconduct.

701 So. 2d at 509.

Ultimately, the Alabama Supreme Court held that the plaintiff must accept a remitted award to $ 50,000, which Gore did. On September 10, 1997, the Supreme Court entered a "certificate of judgment of affirmance" noting that Gore did file an acceptance of remittitur of punitive damages to the amount of $ 50,000. Id. at 509. The certificate ordered "that the judgment of the circuit court for punitive damages is reduced to the sum of $ 50,000 and as thus reduced, the judgment of the circuit court is hereby affirmed, with interest and costs." Id. at 515.

n284. See id. at 587 (Breyer, J., concurring).

n285. Id. at 595.

n286. Id. at 598-99. (Scalia, J., dissenting).

REV_00263392

n287. Id.

n288. Id. at 600.

n289. Id. at 599-600.

n290. Id. at 607 (Ginsberg, J., dissenting).

n291. See id.

n292. 121 S. Ct. 1678 (2001).

n293. See supra Part II.C.

n294. See supra Part III. Of course, each of these mechanisms were later codified in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and judgment notwithstanding the verdict became a judgment as a matter of law. See Fed. Rule. Civ. P. 50.

n295. See Pac. Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 18 (1991); Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415, 430 (1994).

n296. See BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 576 (1996).

n297. See, e.g., Gasperini v. Ctr. for Humanities, Inc., 518 U.S. 415 (1996).

n298. Id. Gasperini involved application of the Erie Doctrine to a New York statutory scheme which required New York appellate courts apply a more stringent standard of review than that contemplated by the Federal scheme, and which implicated the Seventh Amendment.

REV_00263393

n299. See Cooper Indus., Inc., 121 S. Ct. at 1680-81.

n300. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc. v. Cooper Indus., Inc., Nos. 98-35147 & 98-35415, 1999 U.S. App. LEXIS 33657, at 3-4 (9th Cir. Dec. 17, 1999).

n301. Id. at 5.

n302. See Cooper Indus., 121 S. Ct. at 1682.

n303. See id. at 1683.

n304. Id. at 1684.

n305. "In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried to a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law." U.S. Const. amend. VII.

n306. Cooper Indus., 121 S. Ct. at 1683.

n307. Id. at 1686.

n308. 116 U.S. 550, 565 (1886).

n309. 13 U.S. (1 How.) 363, 371 (1852).

n310. 121 S. Ct. at 1686 n.11. The Reexamination Clause is contained within the Seventh Amendment, and provides, "no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise reexamined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law." U.S. Const. amend. VII.

n311. Cooper Indus., 121 S. Ct. at 1686 n.11.

REV_00263394

n312. See id.

n313. Id. at 1691. (Ginsberg, J., dissenting).

n314. Id.

n315. See supra Part II.B.

n316. Three years after the Seventh Amendment was adopted, the jury was instructed that they had the right "to determine the law as well as the fact in controversy." Georgia v. Brailsford, 3 U.S. (1 Dall.) 1, 4 (1794).

n317. See, e.g., Darryl K. Brown, Structure And Relationship In The Jurisprudence Of Juries: Comparing The Capital Sentencing And Punitive Damages Doctrines, 47 Hastings L.J. 1255 (1996). The author points out that in terms of legal process theory, a critique that can be fairly leveled at judges, is that, they may bring personal bias to the bench and to the extent that most federal judges are highly educated and come from relatively privileged backgrounds, there may be an inclination on the part of the judges to side with wealthy business interests and to refuse to grant appropriate punitive damages awards, i.e., awards that are not sufficiently large enough to deter and punish a wealthy corporate defendant.

n318. See Margaret M. Koesel, Invading the Province of the Jury: Section 2315.21(c) and Judicial Determination of the Amount of Punitive Damages, 15 Ohio N.U. L. Rev. 55 (1988) (stating:

The inability to easily remove judges from the bench gives rise to the fear that an "eccentric" will remain on the bench once appointed. And because trial judges sit alone, the possibility that any one person's judgment will be idiosyncratic and not countered by others adds to the fear of an individual judge's eccentricity. That is confirmed when citizens and trial lawyers experience "judge-shopping." Trial attorneys certainly realize, as do many citizens who have had some involvement in court processes, that outcomes can vary substantially according to the judge who presides over a case. The considerable power concentrated in a single individual gives rise to fear of "arbitrary action." In a legislature, jury, or even multi-member appellate court, the fear of one eccentric participant is substantially diminished.).

REV_00263395

n319. Henderson By & Through Hartsfield v. Alabama Power Co., 627 So. 2d 878, 893 (Ala. 1993).

n320. See, e.g., BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 600 (1997) (Scalia, J., dissenting).

n321. See, e.g., Koesel, supra note 318, at 58, citing Fisher, "Tort Reform" Is An Attack of Ohio Citizens, Plain Dealer, Aug. 20, 1987, at 13B (for the "elitist" remark; and S. DARLING, OHIO CIVIL JUSTICE REFORM ACT, at v (1987) for the "unconstitutional" remark).

n322. Pac. Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 18 (1991).

n323. TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Res. Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 473 (1993); see also Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. 342, 382 (1872) (punitive damages are, in general, "monstrous heresy").

n324. TXO, 509 U.S. at 500 (O'Connor, J., dissenting).

n325. The empirical data are conflicting, however. See, e.g., Thomas M. Selsheimer and Steven H. Stodgill, Due Precess and Punitive Damages: Providing Meaningful Guidance to the Jury, 47 S.M.U. L. Rev. 329 (1994) ("Anecdotal evidence of skyrocketing awards is plentiful; hard empirical data is not ... . Part of the problem is, of course, a statistical one burdened by the adage that one can prove anything with statistics."); Michael L. Rustad, Unraveling Punitive Damages: Current Data and Further Inquiry, 1998 Wis. L. Rev. 15 (1998) (citing nine punitive damages studies that show punitive damage awards are rare, and that increases in punitive damages are limited to only a few jurisdictions).

n326. For a comprehensive review of state tort reform, see Richard L. Blatt et al., Punitive Damages: A State-by-State Guide to Law and Practice (1999 & Supp. 2001).

n327. See, e.g., Paul Mogin, Why Judges, Not Juries, Should Set Punitive Damages, 65 U. Chi. L. Rev. 179 (1998) (judges "are more likely to be able to base the severity of the penalty on a rational assessment of the facts, rather than an emotional reaction to the defendant's misconduct").

n328. See Mogin, supra note 327 ("Because of their responsibility for sentencing in criminal cases and for imposing civil statutory penalties, judges ordinarily have much more experience than jurors in determining punishments and far more familiarity with the sanctions imposed for various types of misconduct."). Professor Mogin points out that in the criminal justice system, we almost universally allocate to the jury the responsibility of finding guilt, but then charge the court with determining the penalty:

REV_00263396

In criminal cases (other than capital cases) sentences are determined by judges in both federal court and the courts of all but eight states. By statute, defendants in six states have a right, in cases triable to a jury, to have a jury fix their punishment, within the limits established by statute. Ark. Code Ann. 5-4-103 (Michie 1993) (granting this right only for crimes of rape and statutory rape); 57 Okla. Stat. Ann 353 (West 1991); Tex. Crim. P. Code Ann. 532.055(2) (Baldwin 1990 & Supp. 1997). In Tennessee, defendants have such a right in misdemeanor cases. Tenn. Code Ann. 40-20-104 (Michie 1990). In Missouri, a trial judge can impose a sentence less than or equal to the sentence chosen by the jury.

Id. at n.3.

n329. See, e.g., Cass R. Sunstein et al., Assessing Punitive Damages (With Notes on Cognition and Valuation in the Law), 107 Yale L.J. 2071, 2077 (1998) (stating:

From the standpoint of economic efficiency, unpredictable awards need not be troublesome; perhaps individual awards cannot be calculated in advance, but if people can calculate the expected value of the relevant risks, there should be no efficiency loss. If awards are unpredictable, however, resources are likely to be wasted on that calculation, and as a practical matter, a risk of extremely high awards is likely to produce excessive caution in risk-averse managers and companies. Hence unpredictable awards create both unfairness and (on reasonable assumptions) inefficiency, in a way that may overdeter desirable activity.).

See also Developments in the Law - The Paths of Civil Litigation, 113 Harv. L. Rev. 1752, 1802-03 (2000) (recommending that judges, not juries, determine punitive damages awards in order to "promote predictability and rationality").

n330. Sunstein et al., supra note 329, at 2085.

n331. See, e.g., Colleen P. Murphy, Judicial Assessment of Legal Remedies, 94 Nw. U. L. Rev. 153, 172 (1999) ("The assessment of highly discretionary, multifactored remedies such as civil penalties, statutory damages, and punitive damages should not be considered to fall within the scope of the Seventh Amendment.").

n332. This is a concept not far removed from allowing judicial assessment at the outset.

REV_00263397

n333. See Murphy, supra note 331, at 202.

n334. Cooper Indus., 121 S. Ct. at 1686.

n335. There has been controversy over whether the defendant's wealth should be relevant. See, e.g., David G. Owen, A Punitive Damages Overview: Functions, Problems and Reform, 39 Vill. L. Rev. 363 (1994). However, this Article takes the position that the wealth of the defendant is highly relevant. A punitive award against a middle-income individual of, say, $ 25,000, might have tremendous punitive and deterrent value. The same award levied against a large, wealthy corporation would have a de minimis effect.

n336. This aspect of the Cooper case is discussed more fully in Lisa Litwiller, Re-Examining Gasparini: Damages Assessments and Standards of Review, forthcoming in volume 28, Ohio N.U. L. Rev.

n337. Sunstein et al., supra note 329, at 2079.

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: punitive damages and mogin and judge (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 8, 2002 - 12:31 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

Babylonian Hammurabi Code, [76] and the Hindu Code of Manu [77] all contain provisions for exemplary damages, or an ancient species of them. Punitive damages were part of the law of the Hittites [78] and the ancient Greeks. [79] Scholars are in general agreement that multiple damages remedies were part of Roman Civil Law. [80] Similar approaches are found at early common law, with multiple damages statutes dating back as far as 1278. [81] However, the earliest [*425] reported cases of exemplary or punitive damages in the English common law were Wilkes v. Wood [82] and its companion case, Huckle v. Money. [83] In Wilkes, the plaintiff was engaged in the publication of several radical broadsheets in which he accused George III of lying about the status of peace negotiations with France. He was arrested and charged with seditious libel but was acquitted because his statements were protected by the parliamentary privilege. After his acquittal, he promptly sued a number of officials and was awarded £ 1000. [84] In affirming the award, Lord Chief Justice Pratt stated that juries are entitled to give damages for more than the injury received. Damages are designed not only as a satisfaction to the injured person, but likewise as a punishment to the guilty, to deter from any such proceeding for the future, and as a proof of the detestation of the jury to the action itself. [85]

This inclusion of a punitive component within the damages award "is generally agreed to have been the first occasion on which an avowedly punitive award was permitted." [86]

In Huckle, a companion case based upon substantially similar facts as the Wilkes case, the publisher's employee sued for false imprisonment, trespass, and assault. [87] The Chief Justice stated:

The personal injury done to him was very small, so that if the jury had been confined by their oath to consider the mere personal injury only, perhaps 20 [pounds] damages would have been thought damages sufficient; but the small injury done to the plaintiff, or the inconsiderableness of his station and rank in life did not appear to the jury in that striking light ... . I think they have done right in giving exemplary damages. To enter a man's house by virtue of a nameless warrant, in order to procure evidence, is worse than the Spanish Inquisition; a law under which no Englishman would wish to live an hour; it was a most daring public attack made upon the liberty of the subject. [88]

[*426]

It was this case that introduced the term "exemplary damages," the forerunner to the modern concept of punitive damages meant to punish or deter the tortfeasor rather than compensate the victim. [89]

The first case of punitive damages awarded in the United States appears to have been Coryell v. Colbaugh. [90] There, the plaintiff sued for breach of a promise to marry and seduction. Her father had already sued the defendant and been awarded approximately £ 75. The defendant objected to the second trial, asserting that Ms. Coryell's claim was precluded by the prior suit. The court disagreed, and allowed the jury to be charged, stating, "the injury complained of was of the most atrocious and dishonorable nature, and called for exemplary damages." [91] The judge told the jury "not to estimate the damages by any particular proof of suffering or actual loss; but to give damages for example's sake, to prevent such offences in future; and also to allow liberal damages for the breach ... ." [92] The court also stated that the wealth of the defendant was irrelevant despite the defendant's attempts to mitigate damages by demonstrating that he was poor.

REV_00263336

In Genay v. Norris, [93] the plaintiff was apparently newly arrived in the United States when the defendant and some of his cronies decided [*427] to engage him in a prank. Apparently all the parties were quite intoxicated and it was not difficult to contrive a sham "duel," with unloaded pistols. At the conclusion of the "duel" the defendant proposed that they should reconcile their dispute over a drink. Unbeknownst to Mr. Genay, Dr. Norris put cantharides (more commonly known as Spanish Fly) into the plaintiff's drink, which caused the former to become quite ill. In charging the jury, the court stated:

Notwithstanding it was called a frolic, yet the proceedings appeared to be the result of a combination, which wrought a very serious injury to the plaintiff, and such a one as entitled him to very exemplary damages, especially from a professional character, who could not plead ignorance of the operation, and powerful effects of this medicine. [94]

The jury awarded £ 400 in damages.

Commentators have argued that the rise of punitive damages in England and the United States may be attributed to juries assessing damages they felt were warranted, but where there was no significant injury or the injury was not easily quantifiable. [95] Scholars sometimes attribute the rise of exemplary or vindictive damages as the product of juries departing significantly from simple compensation.

In actions of tort, when gross fraud, wantonness, malice, or oppression appears, the jury [is] not bound to adhere to the strict line of compensation, but may, by a severer verdict, at once impose a punishment on the defendant, and hold him [or her] up as an example to the community. It might be said, indeed, that the malicious character of the defendant's intent does, in fact, increase the injury, and the doctrine of exemplary damages might thus be reconciled with the strict notion of compensation ... . The idea of compensation is abandoned and that of punishment introduced. [96]

The primary proponent of punitive damages in the nineteenth century was Theodore Sedgwick. In Sedgwick's view, where there is fraud, malice, gross negligence, or oppression, the law ... adopts a wholly different rule ... . It permits the jury to give what it terms punitory, or exemplary damages; in other words, blends together the interest of society and of the aggrieved individual, and gives damages not only to recompense the sufferer, but to punish the offender. [97]

[*428]

The concept of punitive damages was not without opposition, however. Those opposing punitive damages awards argued that the concept was foreign to, and logically inconsistent with, the purpose of compensatory tort law, which is to put the victim in as good a position as he or she would have been but for the conduct of the tortfeasor. [98] Nineteenth century commentators went further and questioned the normative fairness of the remedy to society as a whole. For example, in a letter to the editor of an 1878 edition of The Central Law Journal, one writer stated: "It is difficult, in principle, to understand why, ... if the tortfeasor is to be punished by exemplary damages, they should go to the compensated sufferer, and not to the public in whose behalf he is punished." [99] The writer elaborated as follows:

REV_00263337

The doctrine of allowing punitive damages rests, at least at the present time, on an unsound foundation. Eminent legal writers have long ago pronounced against it, and have contended that the rule is against the self-evidence and undisputable truth which has become a legal maxim, that a plaintiff ought to recover no more damages than he has actually sustained. [100]

The most influential opponent of punitive damages was Professor Simon Greenleaf. His primary thesis was that there are two types of laws that have developed over time. One body of law, primarily the constitutional and criminal laws, are "public" laws. [101] On the other hand, a second body of law, such as contract and tort, are "private." [102] To permit the public function of punishment and deterrence to enter the private law arena was to improperly mix the two functions. Professor Sedgwick's view that punitive damages were necessary to redress certain types of "private" transgressions ultimately prevailed, but Professor Greenleaf was successful with at least one judge who wrote that punitive damages awards are "monstrous heresy[,] ... an unsightly and unhealthy excresence, deforming the symmetry of the body of law." [103]

[*429] In any event, by the time the United States Supreme Court heard the case of Day v. Woodworth [104] in 1851, punitive damages awards were so common that the Court placed its official imprimatur on the practice over a due process objection. [105] In Day, the plaintiff sued the defendants for trespass after the defendants tore down a part of a dam owned by the plaintiff. At issue was whether the defendants were justified in partially destroying the dam because it interfered with dams upstream owned by the defendants' employer, and, if not, what damages the plaintiff was entitled to. Although the case was not precisely about punitive damages, the Court gave a lengthy discourse on the subject, focusing on common and statutory law pedigree of punitive damages awards.

The Court began by acknowledging that there was a great deal of controversy about punitive damages in the legal community in general and in the legal academy in particular. However, the Court likewise acknowledged that punitive damages had been part of the common law scheme for so long that their validity as a vehicle for punishment and deterrence "will not admit of argument." [106] The Court also highlighted the fact that historically, many torts recognized today were not common law causes of action and that juries often over-compensated plaintiffs in order to redress dignitary harms. The Court stated, in many civil actions ... the wrong done to the plaintiff is incapable of being measured by a money standard; and the damages assessed depend on the circumstances, showing the degree of moral turpitude or atrocity of the defendant's conduct, and may properly be termed exemplary or vindictive rather than compensatory. [107]

[*430]

The Court went on to note that

REV_00263338

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 87 Geo. L.J. 381,AT 384

87 Geo. L.J. 381

Copyright (c) 1998 Georgetown Law Journal
Georgetown Law Journal

November, 1998

87 Geo. L.J. 381

LENGTH: 10203 words

SYMPOSIUM: Reply: Why There is No Defense of Punitive Damages

W. KIP VISCUSI *

* John F. Cogan, Jr. Professor of Law and Economics, Harvard Law School. My research was supported by the Harvard University Olin Center for Law, Economics, and Business, the Sheldon Seevak Research Fund, and a grant from the EXXON Corporation.

TEXT:

My analysis of punitive damages in environmental and products liability cases concludes that these awards impose substantial costs on society, and that abolishing punitive damages would improve social welfare. The two commentaries on my proposal are written by prominent proponents of punitive damages. Professor Luban has been a leading advocate of punitive damages as a form of punishment, [1] and Professor Eisenberg has promoted the view that punitive damages are both small and predictable. [2] Not surprisingly, each of them is critical of my proposal, but as I will indicate below, neither provides any evidence that punitive damages play a constructive role in society. Without such a beneficial function, the costs of these awards cannot be justified.

I. DO PUNITIVE DAMAGES HAVE A DETERRENT EFFECT?

The linchpin of any law and economics argument in favor of punitive damages is that these awards alter incentives. For the corporate decisions involving environmental and safety torts which were the focus of my paper, fostering safer decisions is essential if punitive damages are to play a constructive role. I set out to evaluate the effect of punitive damages by examining the risk performance in the four states that do not permit punitive damages as compared with the other states that do. This analysis considers an extremely wide range of risk measures -- toxic chemical accidents, toxic chemical accidents causing injury or death, toxic chemical discharges, surface water discharges, total toxic releases, medical misadventure mortality rates, total accidental mortality rates, and a variety of liability insurance premium measures.

This detailed effort to detect a deterrent effect yielded no evidence of any safety incentive role. This lack of evidence is consistent with the proposition that punitive damages are random. Of course, from a statistical standpoint it is not possible to prove a negative -- that punitive damages have zero effect. The most I can do is conclude, based on the data I have analyzed, that we cannot reject the hypothesis that punitive damages have zero effect. Notwithstanding the length of their critiques, neither Professor Luban nor Professor Eisenberg presents any empirical evidence indicating that punitive damages have a deterrent effect. The most these authors can do is offer some conjectures about why my data analysis may damages, if in fact they have a deterrence role. Ultimately, Professor Eisenberg blames the absence of any punitive damages effects not on statistical niceties, but on the relatively powerful role of regulatory policy (for environmental risks) and the relatively small role of punitive damages (for products liability and medical malpractice). Abolishing punitive damages will not sacrifice deterrence.

REV_00263399

Table 2

Insurance Performance Differences between States with and without Punitive Damages

	Premiums ($ 1,000)	Population (1,000)
TOTAL INSURANCE
States without punitive damages:
Louisiana	$ 4,520,578	4,338
Michigan	$ 9,870,463	9,538
Nebraska	$ 1,738,960	1,639
New Hampshire	$ 1,198,307	1,148
Washington	$ 4,745,126	5,447
Five state totals	$ 22,073,434	22,111
States with punitive damages:
Other 45 states and DC	$ 241,086,656	240,778
States with insurable punitives	$ 65,288,517	71,043
States with uninsutable punitives	$ 150,312,113	144,949
States with uncertain insurance rul	$ 31,150,917	30,273
MEDICAL MALPRACTICE
States without punitive damages:
Louisiana	$ 70,675	4,338
Michigan	$ 193,836	9,538
Nebraska	$ 21,783	1,639
New Hampshire	$ 20,696	1,148
Washington	$ 97,863	5,447
Five state totals	$ 404,853	22,111
States with punitive damages
Other 45 states and DC	$ 5,567,016	240,778
States with insurable punitives	$ 1,420,860	71,043
States with uninsurable punitives	$ 3,768,674	144,949
States with uncertain insurance rul	$ 575,187	30,273
PRODUCT LIABILITY
States without punitive damages:
Louisiana	$ 26,442	4,338
Michigan	$ 74,587	9,538
Nebraska	$ 14,351	1,639
New Hampshire	$ 8.336	1,148
Washington	$ 38,312	5,447
Five state totals	$ 162,028	22,111

REV_00263408

States with punitive damages:
Other 45 states and DC	$ 1,998,224	240,778
States with insurable punitives	$ 481,672	71,043
States with uninsurable punitives	$ 1,295,844	144,949
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	$ 255,807	30,273
OTHER LIABILITY
States without punitive damages:
Louisiana	$ 370,069	4,338
Michigan	$ 760,467	9,538
Nebraska	$ 141,883	1,639
New Hampshire	$ 88,891	1,148
Washington	$ 369,689	5,447
Five state totals	$ 1,730,999	22,111
States with punitive damages:
Other 45 states and DC	$ 20,219,759	240,778
States with insurable punitives	$ 4,759,881	71,043
States with uninsurable punitives	$ 13,335,308	144,949
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	$ 2,603,478	30,273

TOTAL INSURANCE

	Premiums/Population	t-statistic
States without punitive damages:
Louisiana	$ 1.042
Michigan	$ 1.035
Nebraska	$ 1.061
New Hampshire	$ 1.044
Washington	$ 871
Five state totals	$ 998
States with punitive damages:
Other 45 states and DC	$ 1.001	0.03
States with insurable punitives	$ 919	1.32
States with uninsutable punitives	$ 1.037	0.53
States with uncertain insurance rul	$ 1.029	0.37
MEDICAL MALPRACTICE
States without punitive damages:
Louisiana	$ 16
Michigan	$ 20
Nebraska	$ 13
New Hampshire	$ 18
Washington	$ 18
Five state totals	$ 18
States with punitive damages
Other 45 states and DC	$ 23	1.00

REV_00263409

States with insurable punitives	$ 20		0.39
States with uninsurable punitives	$ 26		1.29
States with uncertain insurance rul	$ 19		0.35
PRODUCT LIABILITY
States without punitive damages:
Louisiana		$ 6.10
Michigan		$ 7.82
Nebraska		$ 8.76
New Hampshire		$ 7.26
Washington		$ 7.03
Five state totals		$ 7.33
States with punitive damages:
Other 45 states and DC	$ 8.30		0.93
States with insurable punitives	$ 6.78		0.69
States with uninsurable punitives	$ 8.94		1.51
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	$ 8.45		1.13
OTHER LIABILITY
States without punitive damages:
Louisiana		$ 85
Michigan		$ 80
Nebraska		$ 87
New Hampshire		$ 77
Washington		$ 68
Five state totals		$ 78
States with punitive damages:
Other 45 states and DC	$ 84		0.63
States with insurable punitives	$ 67		1.06
States with uninsurable punitives	$ 92		1.23
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	$ 86		0.82

Note: The t-statistic tests the weighted means for the five states which do not award punitive damages against the weighted mean for the states in the category described.

Source: The Fact Book 1997: Property/Casualty Insurance Facts

VIII. WHERE DO WE STAND?

Punitive damages inflict substantial random penalties on firms but offer no constructive deterrence benefits to justify there costs. My article provides a comprehensive assessment of risk measures, none of which indicates that states without punitive damages fared worse. No deterrence effects could be detected. Neither Professor Luban nor Professor Eisenberg provides any empirical evidence whatsoever that supports the deterrence hypothesis. Indeed, Professor Eisenberg correctly observes that, compared to regulatory and other incentives, punitive damages should not be expected to have much of a deterrent effect.

REV_00263410

The closest either author came to finding a deterrence link was in their discussion of the predictability of punitive damages based on the earlier Eisenberg et al. study. However, that article in fact provides strong support for the randomness hypothesis. To the extent that other variables explain a small amount of the variation in punitive damages awards, they capture information that is not available at the time of the safety decision (for example, the size of the compensatory damages award), or involve broad case class measures that provide no basis whatsoever for enabling a firm to determine which choices within a case class are likely to lead to a punitive damages sanction.

Because punitive damages impose costs with no tangible benefits, any defense ultimately must rest on the intangible. Professor Luban cites the role of retribution, but this function is not appropriate for penalizing institutions and will impose costs primarily on innocent consumers, shareholders, and employees. Ultimately, retribution makes sense only if it will make our lives safer, which is to say that there must be some deterrence effect. Even retribution advocates hope that such penalties will "send a message," but if sending this message does not foster safer decisions, what constructive function is achieved? All that is left is vengeance, and that is not a constructive function for our legal system. [52] Abolishing punitive damages for environmental and safety torts would impose no tangible losses. Whatever intangible effects exist must surely be outweighed by the increased confidence we would have in a legal system that no longer imposed punitive damages in a random and capricious manner.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 See Marc Galanter & David Luban, Poetic Justice: Punitive Damages and Legal Pluralism, 42 AM. U. L. REV. 1393 (1993).

n2 See Theodore Eisenberg et al., The Predictability of Punitive Damages, 26 J. LEGAL STUD. 623 (1997).

n3 See David Luban, A Flawed Case Against Punitive Damages, 87 GEO. L.J. 359 (1998).

n4 The principal empirical measure is the expected replacement rate for worker earnings, which should have no effect if differences in replacement rates across states do not matter. See MICHAEL J. MOORE & W. KIP VISCUSI, COMPENSATION MECHANISMS FOR JOB RISKS: WAGES, WORKERS' COMPENSATION, AND PRODUCT LIABILITY 76 (1990); W. KIP VISCUSI, REFORMING PRODUCTS LIABILITY 178 (1991) [hereinafter VISCUSI, REFORMING PRODUCTS LIABILITY].

n5 See Wesley A. Magat & W. Kip Viscusi, Effectiveness of EPA's Regulatory Enforcement: The Case of Industrial Effluent Standards, 33 J.L. & ECON. 331-60 (1990).

n6 See Luban, supra note 3, at 359.

n7 Id. at 378.

n8 Id.

n9 See A. Mitchell Polinsky & Steven Shavell, Punitive Damages: An Economic Analysis, III HARV. L. REV. 869, 950-51 (1998).

n10 See Luban, supra note 3, at 366-67.

n11 See VISCUSI, REFORMING PRODUCTS LIABILITY, supra note 4, at 6-11.

REV_00263411

n12 See id. at 26-28.

n13 See Luban, supra note 3, at 366-67.

n14 See Eisenberg et al., supra note 2, at 648 tbl.5.

n15 See id. at 632-35.

n16 See id. at 634.

n17 See id. at 642-43.

n18 See id. at 644-45. The pseudo-r-squared for the clustered model, which is the preferred statistical model with multiple trials from the same county, was 0.124.

n19 See Luban, supra note 3, at 361.

n20 See Eisenberg et al., supra note 2, at 648.

n21 See id.

n22 See A. Mitchell Polinsky, Are Punitive Damages Really Insignificant, Predictable, and Rational? A Comment on Eisenberg et al., 26 J. LEGAL STUD. 663, 672 (1997) (emphasis added).

n23 See Luban, supra note 3, at 370.

n24 For a broad review of the range of such biases, see generally W. KIP VISCUSI, RATIONAL RISK POLICY (1998).

n25 See W. Kip Viscusi. How Do Judges Think About Risk? 4-9 (Apr. 28, 1998) (unpublished manuscript, on file with author).

n26 See id. at 23-24.

n27 See id. at 12-16.

n28 See Reid Hastie & W. Kip Viscusi, What Juries Can't Do Well: The Jury as a Risk Manager, 40 ARIZ. L. REV. (forthcoming Fall 1998).

n29 See Daniel Kahneman et al., Shared Outrage and Erratic Awards: The Psychology of Punitive Damages, 16 J. RISK & UNCERTAINTY 49 (1998); Cass Sunstein at al., Assessing Punitive Damages (with Notes on Cognition and the Valuation in Law), 107 YALE L.J. 2071, 2100 (1998).

n30 See Luban, supra note 3, at 370.

n31 See id.

n32 See Reid Hastie et al., A Study of Juror and Jury Judgments in Civil Cases: Deciding Liability for Punitive Damages, 22 L. & HUM. BEHAV. 287 (1998).

n33 The Hans and Lofquist study cited by Luban, supra note 3, at 370 n.54, does not say that jurors' primary bias is antiplaintiff, only that "jurors focused most on the plaintiffs" -- whatever that means. Because such studies were interview studies of individual jurors after they were members of a jury, rather than experimental studies that manipulated the group aspect of the decision, their relevance to Luban's claims is unclear. See Valerie P. Hans & William S. Lofquist, Jurors' Judgments of Business Liability in Tort Cases: Implications for the Litigation Explosion Debate, 26 L. & SOC'Y REV. 85, 94 (1992).

REV_00263412

n34 Luban, supra note 3, at 368 n.34.

n35 Id. at 371.

n36 Id.

n37 See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 9, at 950-52.

n38 See Luban, supra note 3, at 376.

n39 See VISCUSI, REFORMING PRODUCTS LIABILITY, supra note 4, at 119-21.

n40 See W. Kip Viscusi & James T. Hamilton, Are Risk Regulators Rational? Evidence from Hazardous Waste Cleanups, AM. ECON. REV. (forthcoming 1999).

n41 See id.

n42 See W. KIP VISCUSI, RISK BY CHOICE: REGULATING HEALTH AND SAFETY IN THE WORKPLACE 16-19 (1983).

n43 See W. KIP VISCUSI, FATAL TRADEOFFS: PUBLIC AND PRIVATE RESPONSIBILITIES FOR RISK 65 (1992).

n44 Theodore Eisenberg, Measuring the Deterrent Effect of Punitive Damages, 87 GEO. L.J. 347 (1998).

n45 Id. at 350.

n46 Some issues he raises do not have merit, such as his suggestion that I use either negative binomial or Poisson regressions. See id. at 350 n.21. These methods are preferable only when the number of event counts in a state is low. Mine is large.

n47 Eisenberg discusses the power of the test issue at length. See id. at 349.

n48 See id. at 353.

n49 See Eisenberg et al., supra note 2, at 644-45, 648.

n50 See Eisenberg, supra note 44, at 349.

n51 See RICHARD BLATT ET AL., PUNITIVE DAMAGES: A STATE BY STATE GUIDE TO LAW AND PRACTICE tbl.8-1 (1991). More recently, New Hampshire permitted punitive damages under narrowly defined statutory circumstances. See id. at 111 (Supp. 1993).

n52 In the first edition of Law and Literature: A Misunderstood Relation, Judge Richard A. Posner observes: "Vengeance, however, is an extremely clumsy method of maintaining order (hence its frequent, but exaggerated association with radical disorder and unending strife). . . ." RICHARD A. POSNER, LAW AND LITERATURE: A MISUNDERSTOOD RELATION 29 (1st ed. 1988). In the second edition of the book, Posner reiterates this theme:

> The threat of retribution is not an adequate deterrent in situations where an aggressor is unlikely to be punished every time, so that punishment does not > equal crime when all his punishments and all his crimes are summed. And a commitment to limited retaliation, or to accepting money or goods in settlement of any wrong, is hard to stick by in the highly emotional circumstances in which revenge is provoked and administered. So vengeance falls out of favor, not only in ethics but in law. . .

REV_00263413

RICHARD A. POSNER, LAW AND LITERATURE: REVISED AND ENLARGED EDITION 57 (2d ed. 1998).

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 87 Geo. L.J. 381,AT 384
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, October 2, 2002 - 11:55 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

not be conclusive. However, no statistical test can ever prove conclusively that there is a zero effect; statistical tests can only find that there is no statistically significant basis for rejecting the hypothesis that there is no effect in the data analyzed. That is the nature of statistical hypothesis testing. If in fact there is any deterrent role for punitive damages, why do Luban and Eisenberg fail to cite any empirical evidence whatsoever to support this hypothesis?

Professor Luban's principal concern is whether the nonpunitive states benefit from the deterrent effect of punitive damages on other states. [3] For precisely the concern that he raises, I omitted nationally marketed products such as motor vehicles from my analysis, even though the analysis of these data yielded results that were consistent with my findings for the other risk measures. The risk categories I analyzed, such as medical malpractice misadventures and toxic chemical spills, are quite local in character and thus should be most responsive to the incentives imposed in that jurisdiction. If some national firms are involved and if they do not vary their safety practices by locale, as Luban hypothesizes, then the deterrent effect on these firms will be muted -- but not eliminated. The deterrent effect of punitive damages will then be governed by the weighted average effect of punitive damages across all states in which the firm or doctor operates, which will be reduced by the extent of the firm's or doctor's operations in the non-punitive damages states.

Luban's hypothesis that safety decisions do not vary across different states is inconsistent with empirical evidence of other risk policies that vary across states. If Luban was correct, state differences in workers' compensation regimes likewise would not affect job safety, but in fact interstate policy differences have dramatic effects on safety, reducing job fatality rates by one-third. [4] Similarly, water pollution discharges are extremely responsive to state and local differences in EPA enforcement activities. [5] The risk categories I analyzed for punitive damages are not idiosyncratic and should be responsive to state differences in economic incentives, just as has been the case for risk policy effects documented in the literature. The strong evidence supporting the incentive effects of regulatory policies highlights the relative advantage of using regulation rather than punitive damages to promote safety.

II. IS RETRIBUTION A LEGITIMATE OBJECTIVE?

Even in the absence of an incentive effect, all may not be lost, as Professor Luban suggests that punishment for bad conduct is a legitimate role for punitive damages, hence the term "punitive." [6] Careful scrutiny of the arguments in favor of a retributive role reveals that in fact their underlying concern is really the deterrence value of punitive awards, but the author has not recognized it as such. Punitive damages, in Luban's view, will "send a message." [7] But we should only be concerned about doing so if such messages will foster safer behavior. Luban seems more concerned with such deterrence effects, which he calls "forward-looking," than with retribution, which he labels "backward-looking." [8]

From an economic standpoint, whether legal philosophers are looking backward, forward, or not looking at all, is inconsequential. If punitive damages are levied in a manner that is not random and capricious, economic actors will look forward and anticipate these costs, producing a deterrent effect. A major theme of my article is that when firms look forward, the prospect of punitive damages is so uncertain that there is no deterrent effect. Moreover, there is no need to augment the safety incentives provided by the market, government regulation, and compensatory damages.

Courts essentially are trying to send a message that will change behavior so that the defendant does not injure again. Any such message-sending and concern with safety behavior is what economists mean by deterrence. Once concern about incentives enters any discussion of retribution, such concerns should be recognized really as notions of deterrence.

Is there nevertheless a benefit from punishing wrongdoers apart from the deterrence rationale? Corporate entities are not children or criminals who need to be punished. They are institutions. Punitive damages inflict harm on current shareholders, customers, and employees. None of these individuals may have even been involved in the original safety decision. For long-term risks, such as asbestos, the economic players today are quite different from those who made the risk decisions decades ago at the time of exposure. Even for contemporaneous risks, it is not easy to locate the responsible employee for a large institution's actions. [9] Even if the responsible employee is identified, that individual will not suffer the full effects of the punitive damages award. The employee can simply quit his job, thus limiting the institution's ability to sanction him. The result is that innocent people who are not responsible for the risk decision nonetheless will suffer the economic sanction.

REV_00263400

Misdirected penalties do not promote justice or penalize wrongdoers. Ultimately, any legitimate defense of punitive damages requires that they have some constructive role in making our lives safer. Such an objective is called deterrence.

III. ARE THERE OTHER RATIONALES FOR PUNITIVE DAMAGES?

Punitive damages also affect the character of the litigation process. Professor Luban believes it is desirable that punitive damages reduce "hardball bargaining by defendants" and offer a bounty to plaintiffs' lawyers. [10] The desirability of these effects is doubtful, and punitive damages are not well suited to these tasks.

Luban's hypothesized recalcitrant bargaining by defendants suggests an assumed inequity in which the defendants have the bargaining leverage. However, the major wave of tort liability reforms in the 1980s was in large part an effort to restrain the rising power of plaintiffs in the wake of the massive rise in tort liability. [11] Depicting plaintiffs as without economic influence is inconsistent with the tripling in liability costs in the mid-1980s. [12]

Increasing punitive damages to foster out-of-court settlements will promote such settlements insofar as punitive damages raise the expected loss to the firm more than the expected benefit of litigation to the plaintiff, due to both plaintiff risk aversion and the pattern-setting implications of a punitive award. Inflicting massive but uncertain economic harms on defendants to promote settlements is no more justifiable than inflicting similar random harms on plaintiffs, which would also promote settlements. The litigation process and out-of-court bargaining has a legitimate role to play in our legal system. Luban would short-circuit these efforts by penalizing one party indiscriminately simply to bring them to their knees in the settlement process.

Punitive damages also may serve as a reward for plaintiffs' lawyers, benefiting Luban's "bounty hunter." [13] Luban apparently believes there is not enough litigation in our society and that punitive damages bounties are needed to induce more lawsuits. However, even if one wanted to increase litigation, punitive damages are not well suited to the task: These bounties are restricted only to cases in which punitive damages are awarded. Punitive damages cases also tend to have large compensatory damages awards [14] so that the additional financial incentive is not needed. It is the small stakes cases that most lack the incentive for litigation. Legal reforms such as additional payments for legal fees could address such a problem, if in fact it is believed to be important. Punitive damages simply give an added windfall to lawyers in cases in which the rewards already tend to be great.

IV. ARE PUNITIVE DAMAGES PREDICTABLE?

If punitive damages are to deter, and thus promote safety, potential injurers must be able to anticipate that they will incur additional expected liability costs if they adopt riskier safety or environmental policies. If punitive damages are random and simply a wild card encountered by unlucky defendants, then there will be no deterrent effect. Luban and Eisenberg both cite statistical evidence reported in a study by Eisenberg et al. [15] as indicating that punitive damages are predictable. For predictability to matter, a corporation or other potential injurer must be able to anticipate the expected penalty at the time of the risky decision.

REV_00263401

Does the evidence in the study by Eisenberg et al. show that punitive damages are predictable in the contexts that were the focus of my paper? Their sample consisted of just under 3000 trials from 75 counties. However, about one-third of the cases were routine automobile tort cases, and only approximately 17% were in the volatile areas of products liability, medical malpractice, and toxic substance liability that were of concern in my paper. [16] Various summary statistics from the Eisenberg et al. paper, such as punitive damage frequency or level, consequently do not directly pertain to the case mix in my study.

The first predictability issue is whether punitive damages will be awarded. Punitive damages awards seem to vary wildly in their sample, with the percentage of plaintiffs' victories with punitive damages awards ranging from 0% to 27% by county. [17] Whether jurisdictions are randomly variable or whether the variability continues across jurisdictions is unclear. The Eisenberg et al. statistical model explains only 12% of the variation in the probability of a punitive damages award. [18] Even that estimate overstates how much liability corporations can anticipate, because one of the explanatory variables was the value of the compensatory award, which is not known ex ante. The most influential variables were indicators of broad case categories, such as intentional tort or contract fraud. Knowing the broad category of case, however, still leaves the lion's share of the variation unexplained, and more importantly does not tell a firm which of its risk decisions within a case category, such as products liability, will lead to punitive damages. This distinction is critical. Indeed, there are no variables in the Eisenberg et al. model that permit firms to estimate different probabilities of a punitive damages award for different risk decisions. There will be no deterrent effect unless firms can predict such differences.

The second issue considered by Eisenberg et al. is the level of punitive damages. Professor Luban seems impressed with the precision of the Eisenberg et al. analysis of punitive damages award levels. According to Luban: "The punitive award equals the compensatory award to the .782 power and multiplied by 8.117. You cannot get much better predictability than that." [19] Such statements are statistically meaningless. This relationship gives us an illusory sense of mathematical precision. Obtaining such a statistical estimate tells us nothing whatsoever about the predictability of the relationship or the variation of the actual award around the predicted amount.

A close look at their analysis of award levels reveals that it offers virtually no predictive guidance to firms. The Eisenberg et al. analysis of damages award levels is conditional on a nonzero punitive damages award. Whether there will be a punitive damages award is itself largely unknowable to the firm making a safety decision. If firms are bad at making such predictions, their analysis of the level of the award will also be flawed. Moreover, the actual ability to predict the amount of punitive awards even conditional on there being an award is much less than the explanatory power of the regression explaining 46-47% of the variation would suggest. [20] The focus of the analysis is on the logarithm of punitive damages, which is the dependent variable to be explained. Taking logs of award amounts compresses the extent of the variation in what is of actual concern to defendants, which is the level of punitive damages, not its log. A punitive damages award of $ 1,000,000 is 1000 times worse than an award of $ 1000 -- but in logs, getting hit with the million dollar award looks only twice as bad (that is, a log value of six versus three). Their log transformation consequently shrinks much of the extreme variation in the size of punitive damages awards.

Given this mathematical transformation, what variables do Eisenberg et al. then give us to "predict" punitive damages, conditional on a punitive award? The two most influential variables are the value of compensatory damages and whether the compensatory award is zero. Neither of these trial outcome values are known to the corporation at the time of the risky decision, so one needs a model to predict these levels as well before their values can be used to predict punitive awards. Although Eisenberg et al. present no such model, any such estimates undoubtedly would involve substantial error.

REV_00263402

What then is left in the predictive equation for the punitive damages level? The only variables that are statistically significant are whether the suit is (1) individual versus business, (2) involves toxic substances, or (3) is some "other tort." [21] Once again, however, within a class of decisions, such as those affecting environmental risks, there is no variable that can assist the firm in distinguishing which decisions will lead to large punitive damages awards and which will not. Thus there will be no deterrent effect.

My pessimistic conclusion regarding the value of the Eisenberg et al. analysis is not unique. As Professor A. Mitchell Polinsky observed: "The point I want to make here is that, notwithstanding their claims, their results are consistent with the possibility that in each jurisdiction and case category jury decisions to award punitive damages are random." [22] Indeed, the title of the Eisenberg et al. article -- The Predictability of Punitive Damages -- is a misnomer. Their article gives corporate decision makers no basis for predicting the punitive awards arising from different safety choices.

V. DO COGNITIVE BIASES IMPEDE THE RATIONALITY OF COURT DECISIONS?

A principal theme of my article is that cognitive biases in thinking about risk will impede the jury's ability to make rational judgments. Indeed, because these biases often lead to exaggerated responses to risk, the result will be a bias against corporate defendants and an excessive tendency to award punitive damages. In discussing diverse evidence from the literature, I generalized based on a large body of research for a wide variety of risk situations, many of which involved experimental results. This approach is consistent with usual scientific methods in this field of study.

Professor Luban fears, without any substantive basis, that such extrapolations are "larded with uncertainty and heavily context-sensitive." [23] But the opposite is the case, as I am unaware of any evidence that has ever indicated that the risk perception or decision biases I cited are limited to specific experimental contexts. [24]

Indeed, my studies specifically suggest that judicial actors may be quite vulnerable to these same kinds of influences. Let us consider three principal biases. First, do judicial actors have an exaggerated response to small risks? In a survey of almost one hundred judges, I found that judges overestimated small risks and underestimated large risks, thus exhibiting the same pattern as the population at large. [25] Second, is there an exaggerated response to ambiguous risks, such as those posed by new products? The judges in my sample preferred old products with known risks to safer new products for which the risk levels were less well established. [26] Third, when the stakes tended to become extremely large, judges failed in their ability to correctly apply legal rules, as they tended to award punitive damages even in cases where the firm passed traditional economics negligence tests. [27] Judges had great difficulty with low probability-high loss events, as do people more generally.

Judges did, however, perform better than jurors with respect to hindsight bias, where Reid Hastie and I found that jurors were much more prone to be victims of hindsight bias. [28] Judicial review, such as that which has led to the frequent overturning or reduction of punitive awards, can restrain some of these jury excesses.

A basic difficulty is that juries cannot think sensibly about punitive damages awards when attempting to set the level of such penalties. The mock jury analysis by Kahneman, Sunstein, and Schkade found that juries had a reasonable sense of the gravity of an offense but were unable to link it to a dollar punitive award in a sensible manner. [29]

Professor Luban seeks refuge in the hope that group decisions by juries will be better than individual decisions, [30] and he hypothesizes that there is an antiplaintiff bias that may be offsetting. [31] The jury study by Hastie, Schkade, and Payne [32] demonstrates, however, that each of these conjectures is false. Their study found that individual juror liability judgments are antidefendant initially and that in three of four cases group deliberation shifted the verdicts further in the antidefendant direction. [33] Indeed, even Professor Luban concedes that juries may not always make unbiased liability judgments: "Of course I do not mean that jurors invariably respect this doctrinal point. Irresponsible juries may elect to pick the deep pockets of a blameless corporation -- which I take to be one of Viscusi's main worries." [34] The attractiveness to juries of raiding deep corporate pockets is one of the most fundamental truths in the tort area.

REV_00263403

Professor Luban also expresses concern with cognitive biases of corporate decision makers. Whereas the biases I cite tended to produce excessive safety, he suggests two other biases that could cut the other way. People may look at risk with a "rose-colored lens," underestimating its magnitude. [35] Even if such an effect exists -- though I have never seen such an effect documented for health, safety, or environmental risks in any context -- it would have to exceed the effect of total overreactions to risk in order to lead to excessive risk levels.

Luban also hypothesizes that risk managers could be subject to "precommitment bias," [36] whereby decisionmakers become locked into decisions that they otherwise would like to reverse as more information is learned. However, Luban never demonstrates that people will be systematically precommitted to excessively risky choices. In addition, punitive damages are not well suited to disciplining rogue managers who make bad decisions. [37]

Luban's concerns along these lines are intended to show that corporations may make bad safety decisions. This observation misses the main thrust of my argument. I never claimed that corporations could never make mistakes in choosing the level of the risk. Mistakes are made. There will be some situations in which firms will choose a risk level that is above the socially optimal level. However, the most effective way to discipline such erroneous decisions is through market forces, government regulation, and compensatory damages -- not punitive damages.

VI. WILL OTHER SOCIAL INSTITUTIONS PROVIDE ADEQUATE INCENTIVES?

In the absence of punitive damages, enterprises making unsafe choices risk (1) lower profits due to consumer, worker, and public reactions, (2) regulatory sanctions, if safety standards are violated, and (3) compensatory damages awards. Professor Luban's primary doubts relate to the efficacy of regulatory sanctions and whether there is a pro-corporate bias. [38] The opposite bias is in fact the case. For a broad range of regulatory activities, the level of the health and safety mandated by government regulations is too safe, as compared to the economically efficient level. [39] Politics may intrude, as may cognitive biases, but studies of these effects suggests that they lead to excessive regulatory stringency. [40] Indeed, the result for the highly politically sensitive toxic waste cleanup effort is that firms spend billions of dollars per expected cancer case prevented by these efforts. [41]

Nevertheless, Professor Luban worries about problems of underenforcement, such as OSHA's limited inspection resources, which I have documented as well. [42] OSHA is not, however, the only institutional player. Each expected job fatality costs the firm $ 3-$ 7 million in higher wages per year in terms of compensating differentials for risk, and each additional lost workday injury has a wage cost of $ 50,000 per injury. [43] Workers' compensation also creates powerful incentives for safety, so that the total financial incentives from both the market and workers' compensation is on the order of $ 100 billion annually for job safety alone. One need not rely solely on government regulation to foster job safety.

Professor Eisenberg's concerns are the opposite of those of Professor Luban. He believes that regulatory efforts may be so powerful that they swamp the effect of punitive damages. After providing an extremely detailed review of the sanctions imposed by environmental statutes, he concludes: "The system of federal environmental laws does not leave much room for added deterrence in the areas so central to Viscusi's study." [44] Exactly. There is no additional constructive role for punitive damages with respect to environmental torts because government regulations are so comprehensive and stringent. Let us now move on to products liability and medical malpractice. I also believe that the role of other social institutions is so dominant that punitive damages are not needed in these domains either. In cases of products liability and medical malpractice, there is no evidence of a deterrent effect, because in Professor Eisenberg's view "the problem is instead that punitive damages have not been shown to play a major role in either area." [45] Manufacturers of breast implants, asbestos, and the Ford Pinto no doubt might suggest that punitive damages can, in fact, be consequential. However, even if Eisenberg is right that punitive damages really are too infrequent to have a deterrent role for such cases, they will not be missed. The world will not be a less safe place if we eliminate punitive damages. However, enterprises will be spared the risk of the low probability/high stakes penalty that is inflicted with such randomness that it fails to have any desirable incentive effects.

REV_00263404

VII. ARE THERE OUTSTANDING STATISTICAL CONCERNS?

Professor Eisenberg raises several technical issues that should be addressed as well. [46] He asks if the sample size of fifty states is large enough to be conclusive. [47] More and better data are always desirable, but there is more information in these observations than Eisenberg suggests. In the case of toxic chemical spills, for example, I do not use information on whether one representative firm from each state had a toxic chemical spill on a given day. That would be fifty observations. Rather, I have information on toxic chemical spills of all firms in the state across several years, which are averaged to form the risk variable. The empirical analysis has two potential sources of error. The first source of error is the state-specific random error. This error is reduced by having multiple observation across firms and time. Indeed, in every case my analysis included comprehensive information from across the entire state, and the toxic release data included multi-year data as well. The second source of error arises from the particular cross section of states, where the extent to which I can reduce this error is in fact limited by my fifty state observations.

Professor Eisenberg also expresses concern that other variables, such as those reflecting subtleties in the state's liability regime, should be included in the analysis. [48] Such omitted variables create potential biases only if they are correlated in significant ways with the punitive damages measures. If, for example, all states with punitive damages had damages caps, these measures would limit the extent of the average influence of punitive damages in these states, but it would not alter the direction of the effects. States with punitive damages still should be safer if they have a deterrent effect -- just not quite as safe as would be the case if there were no caps. Moreover, my estimates reflect the difference between the accident rates in the nonpunitive states and the average accident rates in states with punitive damages. I am not estimating what the effect would be if there were no punitive damages caps in the punitive damages states, but this is not the world in which we live.

It is noteworthy that my statistical analysis not only included a punitive damages regime measure but also a detailed set of variables pertaining to the insurance status of punitive damages. In contrast, the punitive damages study by Eisenberg et al. did not include any punitive damages variables or legal regime variables, though some of their analyses did include local indicator variables. [49]

Professor Eisenberg also hypothesizes that the mix of states that I designate as no-punitive-damages states may matter. He suggests that recognizing exemplary damages may be consequential, and notes that the fact that Louisiana does not permit punitive damages for products liability and medical malpractice might alter my results. [50] My classification of the punitive versus nonpunitive states followed published guidelines, but the distinctions are admittedly complex as states do differ in the character of their punitive damages regimes. [51] Four states do not permit punitive damages, but of the remainder that do, the conduct required to support punitive damages varies. For example, two states (Louisiana and Massachusetts) have punitive damages requirements that vary with statutory authorization of punitive damages awards, fourteen states require proof of malice, and eight states require proof of gross negligence. My empirical estimates in effect calculate the average effect of the punitive damages across the mix of punitive damages requirements currently in place.

REV_00263405

Eisenberg's Louisiana hypothesis is easy to test and is not borne out by the data. Tables 1 and 2 add Louisiana to the group of nonpunitive damages states for the analyses of the lines that might be affected by the absence of punitive damages for medical malpractice and products liability. The results parallel the earlier findings excluding Louisiana and do not indicate any deterrent effect. The five states that do not recognize punitive damages for medical malpractice are no riskier than the forty-five states that do. The only significant influences are the mixed effects of higher risk levels in states with insurable punitive damages and lower risk levels in states with uncertain insurance status for punitive damages. The insurance results in Table 2 reveal no significant differences due to punitive damages on total insurance, medical malpractice insurance, products liability insurance, or other insurance. The empirical results for punitive damages are quite robust.

Table 1

Accidental Death Rates in States with and without Punitive Damages

MEDICAL MISADVENTURE DEATHS

	Deaths	Population (1,000s)
States without punitive damages:
Louisiana	50	4,338
Michigan	82	9,537
Nebraska	20	1,639
New Hampshire	14	1,148
Washington	42	5,448
Five state totals	208	22,111
States with punitive damages:
Other 45 states and DC	2,409	240,778
States with insurable punitives	892	71,043
States with uninsurable punitives	1,367	144,949
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	213	30,273
TOTAL DEATHS
States without punitive damages:
Louisiana	1,829	4,338
Michigan	2,906	9,538
Nebraska	591	1,639
New Hampshire	288	1,148
Washington	1,722	5,448
Five state totals	7,336	22,111
States with punitive damages:
Other 45 states and DC	84,102	240,778

REV_00263406

States with insurable punitives	29,857	71,043
States with uninsurable punitives	46,813	144,949
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	9,548	30,273

MEDICAL MISADVENTURE DEATHS

	Deaths/Population (100,000s)	t-statistic
States without punitive damages:
Louisiana	1.153
Michigan	0.860
Nebraska	1.220
New Hampshire	1.220
Washington	0.771
Five state totals	0.941
States with punitive damages:
Other 45 states and DC	1.000	0.33
States with insurable punitives	1.256	1.78 *
States with uninsurable punitives	0.943	0.01
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	0.704	2.53 **
TOTAL DEATHS
States without punitive damages:
Louisiana	42.162
Michigan	30.468
Nebraska	36.059
New Hampshire	25.087
Washington	31.608
Five state totals	33.178
States with punitive damages:
Other 45 states and DC	34.929	0.51
States with insurable punitives	42.027	2.46 **
States with uninsurable punitives	32.296	0.35
States with uncertain insurance rules regarding punitives	31.540	0.66

Note: The t-statistic tests the weighted mean death rate for the five states which do not award punitive damages against the weighted mean for the states in the category described.

Source: National Safety Council. Accident Facts, 1997 edition.

What then are we to make of Professor Eisenberg's statistical quibbles? Eisenberg has sought refuge in complexity. We could always use more data and more refined variables. However, the simple fact is that there is no evidence that the no-punitive-damages states perform worse than the punitive damages states. Indeed, Eisenberg does not even attempt to offer such evidence. My result was not restricted to one risk measure; on the contrary, I analyzed a wide range of very comprehensive tables of risks that should be affected by punitive

REV_00263407

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 72 Va. L. Rev. 139,AT 141

*72 Va. L. Rev. 139, **

Copyright © 1986 Virginia Law Review Association.

Virginia Law Review

FEBRUARY, 1986

72 Va. L. Rev. 139

LENGTH: 10035 words

COMMENTARY: A COMMENT ON THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

John Calvin Jeffries, Jr. *

* Professor of Law, University of Virginia. This comment grew out of work for a law firm and was, therefore, in origin not disinterested. Nevertheless, the decision to accord these views wider circulation was entirely my own, and they are offered here without reference to any pending litigation.

Thanks go to Kenneth S. Abraham and Daniel R. Ortiz, who read and criticized an earlier draft. Special thanks to Geoff Mearns, Susan Ressel, and Tom Stallings, each of whom individually and in collaboration with one another played an important role in preparing this paper for publication.

SUMMARY:
... One prominent aspect of this crisis is the problem of punitive damages. ... Specifically, I suggest that repetitive punitive awards for a single course of conduct may amount to an unconstitutionally excessive fine in violation of the eighth amendment and of the more general requirement of due process of law. ... Equally unavailing is the naive suggestion that excessive multiple liability can be avoided by instructing the jury to consider the defendant's wealth in fixing an appropriate punitive award. ... Neither history nor logic limits the requirement of proportionality to the criminal law; it includes as well a prohibition of excessive punishment by means of civil fine or penalty. Whether that prohibition lies in the eighth amendment ban on "excessive fines" or in the "fundamental fairness" required by due process of law ultimately does not matter. ...

TEXT:
[*139] AS everyone who reads the newspapers must know, the American civil liability system is approaching a crisis. One prominent aspect of this crisis is the problem of punitive damages. In my view, punitive damages are out of control. Certainly recent awards are unprecedented in both incidence and amount. Moreover, the explosion in punitive judgments has not been accompanied by a reform of the terms of their imposition. Punitive damages may be inflicted without adequate procedural safeguards, in the absence of meaningful substantive standards, and in virtually unlimited amounts. Nowhere is the danger more complete than in products liability and other mass tort cases, where punitive damages may n1 For an especially sustained and thoughtful analysis of this issue, see Wheeler, The Constitutional Case for Reforming Punitive Damages Procedures, 69 Va. L. Rev. 269 (1983); see also Comment, Criminal Safeguards and the Punitive Damages Defendant, 34 U. Chi. L. Rev. 408 (1967).

REV_00263415

n2 See generally Meyers & Barrus, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Cases: A Survey, 51 Ins. Couns. J. 212 (1984) (providing an encyclopedic description of the standards for awarding punitive damages in products liability cases).

n3 See, e.g., Childres, Remedies, 1965 Ann. Surv. Am. L. 289-93 (1966); Note, The Imposition of Punishment by Civil Courts: A Reappraisal of Punitive Damages, 41 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1158, 1178-80 (1966).

n4 See Morris, Punitive Damages in Tort Cases, 44 Harv. L. Rev. 1173 (1931).

n5 See, e.g., Szuch & Shelley, Time to Eliminate Punitive Damages?, Nat'l L.J., Fed. 28, 1983, at 13, 36.

n6 See, e.g., M. Peterson, Punitive Damages: Preliminary Empirical Findings 11 (1985), which reports that the average punitive award in Cook County, Illinois increased from $ 4,000 during 1960-1964 to $ 489,000 during 1980-1984. Peterson's data show that, although most punitive awards remained modest, business defendants were increasingly subject to the risk of extraordinarily high punitive awards -- enough to create a more than one hundred-fold increase in the overall average.

n7 378 F.2d 832 (2d Cir. 1967).

n8 Id. at 839.

n9 Id.

n10 Id. at 839-40.

n11 Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 Mich. L. Rev. 1258, 1261 & n.12 (1976).

n12 Full citation to these cases, as well as a thoughtful investigation of possible solutions to the problems they pose, may be found in Seltzer, Punitive Damages in Mass Tort Litigation: Addressing the Problems of Fairness, Efficiency, and Control, 52 Fordham L. Rev. 37 (1983).

n13 Id. at 40.

n14 L. Frumer & M. Friedman, Products Liability (1984), for example, is a comprehensive treatise on products liability, published in hard-cover binders to allow frequent supplementation and change. It was first published in 1960 and went through 21 copyrights in the years through 1984. A chapter on punitive damages in products liability cases was first added in 1980. It ran 11 pages and reported only 30 cases. The corresponding chapter in the 1984 edition and accompanying supplement entry run 102 pages and cite cases too numerous to count. See 3 id., ch. 10A.

The same lesson may be drawn from K. Redden, Punitive Damages (1980), a comprehensive treatise on the subject of punitive damages. As originally published, it contained a five-page section on "Products Liability." See id. § 4.2(A)(2). The pocket part issued five years later supplements the original section with an additional 21 pages on "Products Liability: In General" and adds an entirely new discussion of punitive damages in the context of "Mass Products Liability." See id. § 4.2(A)(2)(a)-(b) (K. Redden & L. Schlueter eds. Supp. 1985).

REV_00263424

n15 K. Redden, supra note 14, cites more than 40 recent books and articles on this subject, and more are published every month.

n16 The Hon. Spencer Williams, Mass Tort Class Actions: Going, Going, Gone?, 98 F.R.D. 323, 324 (1983).

n17 Owen, supra note 11, at 1261.

n18 See Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, 49 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1 (1982).

n19 Id. at 2 n.9.

n20 Id. at 59.

n21 Toyota Motor Co. v. Moll, 438 So. 2d 192 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1983) ($ 3 million punitive judgment for fuel system design defects affirmed); Wolmer v. Chrysler Corp. 474 So. 2d 834 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1985) ($ 3 million punitive award for fuel system defect reinstated); Ford Motor Co. v. Nowak, 638 S.W.2d 582 (Tex. Civ. App. 1982) ($ 4 million punitive judgment for transmission design defect affirmed), writ ref. n.r.e. (1983).

n22 Palmer v. A.H. Robins Co., 684 P.2d 187 (Colo. 1984) ($ 6.2 million punitive judgment affirmed).

n23 See, e.g., Cathey v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 776 F.2d 1565 (6th Cir. 1985) ($ 1.5 million punitive award affirmed in an asbestos case); Dorsey v. Honda Motor Co. 655 F.2d 650 (5th Cir. 1981) ($ 5 million punitive award for automobile design defect affirmed), modified on other grounds, 670 F.2d 21 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 880 (1982); Maxey v. Freightliner Corp., 450 F. Supp. 955 (N.D. Tex. 1978) ($ 10 million punitive award for truck design defect set aside), aff'd, 665 F.2d 1367 (5th Cir. 1982); Hansen v. Johns-Manville Corp., No. G-79-124 (S.D. Tex May 12, 1982) ($ 1 million punitive judgment entered in asbestos case), modified, 734 F.2d 1036 (5th Cir. 1984) (reduced to $ 300,000); Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38 (Alaska 1979) ($ 2.9 million punitive award for pistol design defect affirmed), modified on reh'g, 615 P.2d 621 (Alaska 1980) (reduced to $ 500,000), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981); Chastain v. Lynndale Int'l, No. CIV-80-23 (Cleburne Cty. Cir. Ct., Ark. 1981) ($ 3 million punitive judgment); Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348 (1981) ($ 125 million punitive award for automobile design reduced to $ 3.5 million); Palmer v. A.H. Robins Co., 684 P.2d 187 (Colo. 1984) ($ 6.2 million punitive award in IUD case affirmed); Wolmer v. Chrysler Corp. 474 So. 2d 834 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1985) ($ 3 million punitive award for automobile design defect reinstated); Toyota Motor Co. v. Moll, 438 So. 2d 192 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1983) ($ 3 million punitive award for automobile design defect affirmed); Stambaugh v. International Harvester Co., 102 Ill. 2d 250, 464 N.E.2d 1011 (1984) ($ 15 million punitive award for tractor design defect dismissed for improper venue); Johnson v. Lederle Laboratories, No. 81-C-2470 (Sedgewick Cty. Dist. Ct., Kan. 1984) ($ 8 million punitive award entered in polio vaccine case); Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727 (Minn.) ($ 1 punitive award for flammable pajama affirmed), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 921 (1980); Leichtamer v. American Motors Corp., 67 Ohio St. 2d 456 424 N.E.2d 568 (1981) ($ 1.1 million punitive judgment for automobile design defect entered); Ford Motor Co. v. Nowak, 638 S.W.2d 582 (Tex. Civ. App. 1982) ($ 4 million punitive award for automobile design defect affirmed), writ ref. n.r.e. (1983); see also Walsh, Filing of Punitive Damage Claims in Focus of Increasing Controversy, Wall St. J., Nov. 12, 1984, at 27, col. 4 (reporting $ 100 million punitive award against Ford Motor Co. in recent case).

n24 Tarnoff, Leap in Punitive Damages Cited, Bus. Ins., Dec. 2, 1985, at 58.

REV_00263425

n25 Id.

n26 See Wall St. J., Dec. 11, 1985, at 3, col. 3.

n27 See Szuch & Shelley, supra note 5, at 13 ("The classic example of mass tort litigation is the nationwide asbestos litigation. To date, more than 10,000 actions have been filed in virtually every jurisdiction. In almost all of these cases, plaintiffs seek punitive damages . . .").

n28 Owen, supra note 18, at 6.

n29 See, e.g., L. Frumer & M. Friedman, supra note 14, at 46-47 (discussing but not endorsing this suggestion).

n30 See Owen, supra note 18, at 20 (including an informed and sensitive discussion of the problems of "juror limitations and attitudes" in this context).

n31 U.S. Const. amend. VIII.

n32 Id. amend. XIV, § 1.

n33 Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660, 667 (1962).

n34 Id. at 666-67; id. at 675 (Douglas, J., concurring).

n35 See, e.g., Schilb v. Kuebel, 404 U.S. 357, 365 (1971).

n36 See Whitney Stores v. Summerford, 280 F. Supp. 406, 411 (D.S.C.) (three-judge court), aff'd mem., 393 U.S. 9 (1968); J. Nowak, R. Rotunda & J. Young, Constitutional Law 413 (2d ed. 1983).

n37 My colleague Ken Abraham auggests that this conclusion is not so obvious as I have made it seem. He notes the long-standing formal distinction that the eighth amendment may guard only against governmental abuses that cannot readily be identified in a private tort action. In my view, this intuition is plausible precisely because private tort actions ordinarily seek compensation rather than punishment. I would suppose that no award of compensatory damages, at least if adequately grounded in the evidence, could ever be considered unconstitutionally excessive. Where, however, the private tort plaintiff seeks to exact a penalty, the determination of whether that penalty is excessive should not depend on who gets the money. If, for example, a government were alleged to have authorized unconstitutionally excessive punishment by means of a civil fine, it surely would be no defense that the money went to a good cause. By the same token, it seems to me irrelevant that unconstitutionally excessive punishment imposed by means of punitive damages goes to the benefit of a private plaintiff.

n38 See Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651, 664-68 (1977).

n39 Id. at 669 n.37.

n40 U.S. Const. amend. V (emphasis added).

n41 Id. amend. VI (emphasis added).

n42 Seltzer, supra note 12, at 43.

REV_00263426

n43 See, e.g., Doroszka v. Lavine, 111 Conn. 575, 150 A. 692 (1930); Owen, Civil Punishment and the Public Good, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 103 (1982). This is very distinctly a minority view. Today, only three states assign any compensatory function to punitive damages, and in only one is it identified as the primary goal. See K. Redden, supra note 14, § 2.3(A), at 32 n.38.

n44 See K. Redden, supra note 14, § 2.2(B)-(C), at 28-29. This development is described in some detail in Note, supra note 3, at 1160-61.

n45 See R. Epstein, Modern Products Liability Law 176-84 (1980). Epstein analyzes the possible rationales for punitive damages and concludes that punitive damages are most appropriate "as a kind of substitute punishment for conduct which is, or should be, punishable under the criminal law but which may well escape detection and punishment by the public authorities." Id. at 177. Epstein examines and rejects the notion that punitive damages actually serve a compensatory purpose. Id. at 177-78.

n46 372 U.S. 144 (1963).

n47 Id. at 168-69 (footnotes omitted).

n48 See K. Redden, supra note 14, § 2.3(A), at 31 ("it has been well-settled doctrine in this country for over a century that exemplary damages are non-compensatory in character").

n49 Cf. Ex parte Lange, 85 U.S. (18 Wall.) 163, 168-69 ("In civil cases . . . no man shall be twice vexed for one and the same cause. . . [In criminal cases n]o one can be twice punished for the same crime . . .").

n50 See, e.g., In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970) (requiring proof beyond a reasonable doubt as the constitutional standard for criminal conviction, despite the absence of any provision specifically addressed to that question).

n51 See, e.g., Shaffer v. Heitner, 433 U.S. 186 (1977) (finding constitutional inadequacy in traditional quasi-in-rem jurisdiction).

n52 Lassiter v. Department of Social Servs., 452 U.S. 18, 25 (1981).

n53 Connally v. General Constr. Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391 (1926).

n54 International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 320 (1945).

n55 Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165, 173 (1952).

n56 Among the several articulations of this principle, one of the most instructive comes from Lassiter v. Department of Social Servs., 452 U.S. 18 (1981). There the Court summarized the command of due process and outlined the analysis to be followed in determining its application to a particular context:

For all its consequence, "due process" has never been, and perhaps can never be, precisely defined. "[U]nlike some legal rules," this Court has said, due process "is not a technical conception with a fixed content unrelated to time, place and circumstances." Rather, the phrase expresses the requirement of "fundamental fairness," a requirement whose meaning can be as opaque as its importance is lofty. Applying the Due Process Clause is therefore an uncertain enterprise which must discover what "fundamental fairness" consists of in a particular situation by first considering any relevant precedents and then by assessing the several interests that are at stake.
Id. at 24-25 (citation omitted).

REV_00263427

n57 55 Wis. 2d 402, 198 N.W.2d 363 (1972).

n58 Id. at 409, 198 N.W.2d at 367; see also id. at 412, 198 N.W.2d at 368 ("Two penalties on the same or different theories for the same act violates basic fairness and thus due process of law."); Hometowne Builders v. Atlantic Nat'l Bank, 477 F. Supp. 717, 720 (E.D. Va. 1977) ("combination of treble damages and punitive damages is necessarily duplicative").

Note that John Mohr & Sons illustrates the eminently sensible action that a state court can take when the matter is entirely within its control. The problem of multiple recovery arose in that case only because there was a state statute authorizing treble damages. The Wisconsin Supreme Court was able, therefore, to solve this problem on a local basis, and it did so. The problem of repetitive punitive awards in the multistate mass tort situation, by contrast, although presenting unfairness incomparably more severe than anything involved in John Mohr & Sons, is not capable of local resolution.

n59 See, e.g., Ellis, Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1, 6-7 (1982) (deriving the necessity for a limit on aggregate awards from general theories of punishment); Owen, supra note 18, at 44-59 (recognizing "the threat of over-punishment from multiple awards for a single product mistake" and exploring mechanisms for asserting greater judicial control); Seltzer, supra note 12, at 61 (endorsing class action device as a means of implementing such a limitation). Indeed, even the commentators, increasingly in the minority, who endorse the general utility and fairness of punitive damages, concede the need for some reform to limit multiple recoveries for a single course of conduct. See, e.g., Riley, Punitive Damages: The Doctrine of Just Enrichment, 27 Drake L. Rev. 195, 252 (1977-78).

n60 W. McKechnie, Magna Carta: A Commentary on the Great Charter of King John 285 (2d rev. ed. 1914).

n61 See 3 W. Blackstone, Commentaries *376.

n62 Black's Law Dictionary (4th ed. 1951) defines the term as "[a] pecuniary penalty, in the nature of a fine, imposed upon a person for some fault or misconduct, he being 'in mercy' for his offense." Id. at 107.

n63 For a general history, see 2 F. Pollock & F. Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I, at 510-14 (1895).

n64 Id. at 524.

n65 The amercement is sometimes loosely described as a criminal sanction. In an anachronistic sense, that is true, for many of the wrongs for which amercements were assessed would today be recognized as crimes. It is equally true, however, that amercements were assessed for misconduct that today would be treated as civil in nature. And then, as now, the two regimes substantially overlapped. See id. at 516, 520-21; 2 W. Holdsworth, A History of English Law 357-69, 449-57 (1923); 3 id. at 276-78.

Whatever retrospective characterization one might choose, at the time amercements were not distinctly criminal in nature. This is made abundantly clear by Blackstone, who asserted that "[t]he reasonableness of fines in criminal cases has also been usually regulated by the determination of magna carta, concerning amercements for misbehaviour in matters of civil right." 4 W. Blackstone, Commentaries *372. In this statement, Blackstone consciously distinguished between civil and criminal and correctly identified amercements as a form of civil punishment.

REV_00263428

n66 See Pleas of the Crown for the County of Gloucester, 1221 at xxxiv (F. Maitland ed., 1884).

n67 W. McKechnie, supra note 60, at 285.

n68 See Tait, Studies in Magna Carta: Waynagium and Contenementum, 27 Eur. Hist. Rev. 720, 724-27 (1927). Tait translates chapter 20 as saying that a freeman shall be amerced "saving always his position; and a merchant in the same way, saving his trade; and a villein shall be amerced in the same way, saving his tillage." Id. at 727.

n69 4 W. Blackstone, Commentaries *372.

n70 W. McKechnie, supra note 60, at 288-89.

n71 Specifically, Chapter 21 provides that "[e]arls and barons shall not be amerced except through their peers, and only in accordance with the degree of the offence." Id. at 295. Chapter 22 adds that "[a] clerk shall not be amerced in respect of his lay holding except after the manner of the others aforesaid; further, he shall not be amerced in accordance with the extent of his ecclesiastical benefice." Id. at 298.

n72 See A. Howard, The Road from Runnymede: Magna Carta and Constitutionalism in America (1968).

n73 Robertson v. Baldwin, 165 U.S. 275, 281 (1897).

n74 E. Coke, Second Institute 50 (3d ed. 1669).

n75 See, e.g., Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co., 59 U.S. (18 How.) 272, 276 (1856) (recognizing that "[t]he words, 'due process of law,' were undoubtedly intended to convey the same meaning as the words, 'by the law of the land,' in Magna Charta" and examining particular provisions of Magna Carta at some length); Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U.S. 78, 100-01 (1908) (extending the same observation to the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment).

n76 463 U.S. 277 (1983).

n77 Id. at 285 n.10.

n78 Id. at 286.

n79 Id. at 285.

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 72 Va. L. Rev. 139,AT 141
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, October 2, 2002 - 11:48 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00263430

be repetitively invoked against a single course of conduct in unfair and potentially ruinous aggregation.

Not surprisingly, this situation has become a focus of constitutional debate. The main line of attack asserts the inadequacy of procedural protections against unjustified or erroneous punitive awards. This argument starts from the premise that the law of punitive damages should conform, so far as possible, to the law of criminal punishment. Because punitive damages procedures actually fall far short of this model, they may well be thought constitutionally infirm. This argument has been explored in a growing body of academic commentary. [1]

[*140] A second line of attack focuses on the substantive criteria for punitive liability. Under traditional doctrine, the standards are merely epithetical -- for example, that the defendant acted "maliciously" or "wilfully or wantonly" or with "flagrant indifference" to the rights of others. [2] Imposition of criminal liability on such a basis would be void for vagueness, and one is left to wonder why the same defects of lack of notice and arbitrariness of result are not also fatal for punishment in another form. This too has been suggested in the literature. [3]

The point of this comment is to suggest a third reason for doubting the constitutionality of punitive damages. Repectitive and unrestrained punitive liability for a single course of conduct threatens aggregate punishment that is, by any sensible standard, excessive and unfair. In my view, this result is not merely unfortunate; it is arguably unconstitutional. Specifically, I suggest that repetitive punitive awards for a single course of conduct may amount to an unconstitutionally excessive fine in violation of the eighth amendment and of the more general requirement of due process of law. The balance of this comment explores that idea. I hope to show that punitive damages in mass tort litigation are far more vulnerable to constitutional attack than has commonly been supposed and thus to encourage closer judicial scrutiny of current practice.

I

At the outset, one might ask whether it is not too late in the day to suggest the unconstitutionality of punitive damages. After all, punitive damages have been around for a long time. [4] Whatever academics may say against them, punitive damages at least have the warrant of past practice, and that in itself suggests constitutional permissibility. In fact, however, the application of traditional punitive damages doctrine to modern mass tort litigation has produced a situation altogether different from past experience. The problem addressed here is therefore surprisingly new.

[*141] The destructive synergism between traditional punitive damages doctrine and modern mass tort litigation was first perceived in 1967. Before that time, the typical punitive damages claim arose from an isolated incident involving only two parties. The usual allegation was that defendant's tortious conduct had been motivated by a malicious or spiteful desire to injure the plaintiff. [5] The jury had only to assess the particular transaction before it and to determine on that basis whether the defendant's conduct warranted a punitive award. The narrow factual boundaries of these disputes seem also to have suggested natural limits on the size of awards. In any event, most punitive judgments were, by today's standards, almost trivial in amount. [6] Although not constrained by the same procedural requirements as other forms of punishment, punitive damages at least were based on a manageable jury inquiry. In such circumstances, and despite the grave questions raised by the absence of procedural safeguards and the lack of adequate standards, it was possible to view punitive damages as minimally consistent with fundamental fairness.

By 1967 suits involving "MER/29," an anti-cholestrol drug with disastrous side effects, began to reveal the dangers of traditional punitive damages doctrine as applied to modern mass tort situations, especially those involving product liability. The Second Circuit identified and canvassed those dangers in Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc. [7] Judge Henry Friendly focused on the special difficulties of allowing punitive damages in mass tort cases. Judge Friendly foresaw that repetitive punitive awards for a single course of conduct could subject a defendant to liability of staggering magnitude. The cumulation of such punishment might far exceed the maximum penalties authorized by the criminal law -- indeed might exceed any level of sanction that could rationally be thought necessary to serve any legitimate purpose. No mechanism existed for effective [*142] control of aggregate awards nor for meaningful guidance of jury decisionmaking. The Roginsky trial judge had done all he could by instructing the jury that it might "consider the potentially wide effect of the actions of the corporation and, on the other hand, the potential number of actions similar to this one to which that wide effect may render the defendant subject." [8] But, as Judge Friendly noted, "it is hard to see what even the most intelligent jury would do with this, being inherently unable to know what punitive damages, if any, other juries in other states may award other plaintiffs in actions yet untried." [9] There was no rule that the first award would exhaust punitive liability, nor did it seem "either fair or practicable to limit punitive recoveries to an indeterminate number of first-comers, leaving it to some unascertained court to cry, 'Hold, enough,' in the hope that others would follow." [10] In short, the Second Circuit saw in repetitive punitive awards for marketing a single defective product a system careening out of control, and it reversed the $ 100,000 punitive award made in that case.

REV_00263416

In the years immediately following Roginsky, Judge Friendly's fears may have seemed overwrought. In 1976 a leading authority wrote that "Roginsky appeared . . . to have laid the matter to rest" and could find only three subsequent cases in which punitive awards for defective products had been upheld on appeal. [11] The calm, however, did not last. In the mid-1970's, unprecedented numbers of punitive awards in product liability and other mass tort situations began to surface. Many of these awards were also unprecedented in amount. And these trends continued and accelerated into the 1980's.

Today, Judge Friendly's fears have become reality. Thousands of punitive damages claims have been filed against manufacturers of mass-marketed products. These include suits arising from the sale of asbestos, formaldehyde, DES, Agent Orange, automobiles, tampons, and the Dalkon Shield. [12] Typically, the manufacturers of [*143] these products have faced not only massive (and presumably justified) compensatory liability but also repetitive and unrestrained punitive awards, sometimes in hundreds of different actions. Similar problems have arisen in other mass tort situations, for example, the collapse of the skywalks in the Kansas City Hyatt Regency. [13]

The sudden upsurge of punitive damages claims can be traced in the secondary literature. Treatises that attempt encyclopedic coverage of these subjects have struggled to keep up with the explosion of litigation in this field. [14] Not surprisingly, the developing crisis has promoted a flood of secondary comment. [15] The nation's trial judges have also been quick to sound the alarm. One knowledgeable trial judge was moved by first-hand experience with punitive claims in modern products liability cases to make a dire prediction:

Recently, and unprecedented in history, state and federal trial judges are being inundated with mass filings of lawsuits by individual plaintiffs, each seeking compensation and a share of large punitive damage awards, based on a single catastrophe or the mass production and sale by one defendant of a defective product. . . [I]t is not an overly pessimistic prediction that, absent some legislative or judicial solution, our attempt to try these virtually identical lawsuits, one-by-one, will bankrupt both the state and federal court systems. [16]

[*144] Also notable is the intellectual migration of a leading authority in this field, Professor David Owen. In 1976 Professor Owen published an important article in which he endorsed awards of punitive damages in products liability cases. He concluded "that punitive damages may be usefully employed in products liability litigation to punish and to deter the marketing of defective products in flagrant disregard of the public safety." [17] Barely six years later, he reconsidered. [18] At the time of the first article, Owen reported, the largest product liability punitive award ever upheld on appeal was $ 250,000. By the time of the later work, the California courts had affirmed on appeal a punitive award of $ 3.5 million, reduced from an original jury assessment of $ 125 million; the Fifth Circuit had just reinstated a $ 5 million punitive award against Honda Motor Co.; and a canvass of recent trial court decisions revealed several more multimillion dollar awards in the works. [19] These cases led Owen to a reassement:

REV_00263417

My conclusion in 1976 was that punitive damages awards should be permitted in appropriate products liability cases. After the judicial experience of the ensuing years, I remain convinced of the need to retain this tool of legal control over corporate abuses. . .

Yet the experience of the past several years has raised questions whether the punitive damages doctrine is being abused in products cases, whether some manufacturers are being punished who should not be, and whether penalties, though appropriately assessed, are sometimes unfairly large. [20]

More recent cases show that Owen's concern for "unfairly large" punitive awards was, in fact, understated. Several more multimillion dollar judgments against automobile manufacturers [21] and an even larger Dalkon Shield award [22] have been affirmed on appeal. [*145] Trial court judgments in amounts of $ 1 million or larger have become almost commonplace. [23] Insurance sources report that in the years 1983 to 1985, California courts entered thirty-eight punitive awards in excess of $ 1 million. [24] In fact, in the first half of 1985 five California juries entered punitive awards totalling $ 242 million. [25] Of course, even this sum is dwarfed by the $ 3 billion (yes, billion) punitive assessment in the Texaco-Pennzoil litigation. [26] Some of these judgments may be reduced on appeal, but others will not. For most cases, the likelihood is a very large settlement.

Even more disturbing, judgments of this magnitude represent only a small fraction of the total exposure to punitive liability. Most of these awards were for defective product design or manufacture. Every person injured thereby may make an independent claim for punitive damages. The prospect, therefore, is not merely [*146] that very large punitive awards may be made in isolated cases, but that they may be repetitively imposed for a single course of conduct. [27] In this way, the defendant may be punished ten or twenty or a hundred times over, in cumulations so extravagant and destructive as to defy any rational justification and to threaten the civil noted, these developments "may fairly raise concern for the future stability of American industry." [28]

Finally, it should be noted that a state-law solution to this problem is not feasible. The court that denies an additional award on the ground that the defendant has been sufficiently punished by previous judgments has no guarantee that other courts will follow suit. Courts in the same jurisdiction perhaps may be made to agree, but courts elsewhere would remain free to contradict that judgment. In reality, therefore, the most that an individual state can do is to adopt a self-denying ordinance that would succeed only in disadvantaging its own citizens relative to claimants in less responsible jurisdictions. The likelihood would be just the opposite -- that a kind of competition will develop to show that Texas plaintiffs (and their lawyers) are just as entitled to riches as their California counterparts.

Equally unavailing is the naive suggestion that excessive multiple liability can be avoided by instructing the jury to consider the defendant's wealth in fixing an appropriate punitive award. Theoretically, later juries should moderate their awards by taking into account compensatory and punitive awards imposed in earlier litigation. [29] Yet, this supposed protection for the defendant would obviously "backfire" if, as seems inevitable, the jury takes a history of prior awards as evidence of liability in the instant case. Moreover, juries have a natural sympathy for injured persons and not infrequently a corresponding hostility to "big business." The notion that juror consideration of the multimillion, often multibillion, dollar figures on a corporate balance sheet would operate to protect [*147] such defendants against excessive liability is, in context, almost laughable. [30]

The unfortunate truth is that the evil of repetitive and unconstrained punitive damages cannot be forestalled on such an ad hoc basis, by either court or jury. A realistic solution to this problem come from the United States Congress or from a recognition by the federal courts of a constitutional limitation on punitive damages, a limit that state courts would then be obliged to respect. My suggestion here is that the case for a federal constitutional restraint on punitive damages is far stronger than has commonly been perceived.

II

Two provisions of the Constitution speak to the problem of repetitive punitive awards in mass tort litigation. The eighth amendment provides that "[e]xcessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted." [31] Additionally, the fourteenth amendment forbids any state to "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." [32] The command of due process has long been understood to incorporate a requirement of "fundamental fairness" in the administration of law -- even for large corporations. In my view, neither of these guarantees can comfortably be construed to permit ultimited multiple impositions of punitive liability for a single course of conduct.

A

The eighth amendment to the Constitution of the United States forbids excessive bail, excessive fines, and cruel and unusual punishment. The three are obviously related. In fact, because the guarantee against cruel and unusual punishment has been construed to forbid punishment that is excessive but not otherwise unusual, [33] the last clause has tended to subsume the first two. Nevertheless, [*148] the amendment's text does explicitly record that the constitutional prohibition reaches "excessive fines," as well as unjustified incarceration.

Moreover, there is no apparent reason to doubt that the prohibition against excessive fines applies to the states. The Supreme Court has so held with respect to cruel and unusual punishment [34] and has assumed the same result for excessive bail. [35] Because the disapproval of excessive fines is logically intertwined with the other two provisions of the eighth amendment, its applicability to the states seems clear. [36]

That punitive damages are functionally fines also seems clear. They inflict monetary penalties on the basis of particularized assessments of fault. The fact that the penalties are paid to private plaintiffs rather than to the government itself does not matter, for the eighth amendment was plainly designed to forbid excessive punishment, not government self-enrichment. [37]

More problematic is the question whether the eighth amendment applies to civil or quasi-criminal fines, as well as to distinctively criminal punishments. The Supreme Court has noted that past applications of the eighth amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment involve criminal sanctions and has suggested that the amendment might be limited to that context. [38] The Court, however, has recognized that certain punishments should be treated as criminal for purposes of the eighth amendment, even [*149] though they are not explicitly so labeled. [39] Thus, at least in some circumstances, the applicability of the eighth amendment turns on a functional analysis rather than mere formalism. This is entirely sound, for it is clear that a nominally civil fine may be every bit as "excessive" as a criminal one and should be equally objectionable.

This conclusion is reinforced by the significant textual differences between the eighth amendment anf those Bill of Rights guarantees specifically limited to the criminal context. The fifth amendment, for example, provides that no person shall be held to answer "for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime" without indictment by grand jury, and that no person shall "for the same offence . . . be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." [40] Similarly, the sixth amendment explicitly details rights available "[i]n all criminal prosecutions." [41] In contrast, the eighth amendment speaks to the severity of punishment rather than to its characterization. Although criminal punishments are admittedly more likely than civil sanctions to be unconstitutionally excessive under the eighth amendment, this is only a factual generalization, not a limitation of principle.

REV_00263419

The critical fact, therefore, is that punitive damages are, as the name implies, a form of punishment. One authority noted that "[t]hese awards are not really damages at all. Rather, they are quasi-criminal sanctions imposed to punish defendants and to deter repetition of the offensive conduct by the defendant and other potential wrongdoers." [42] Although this conclusion seems obvious, some authorities and a few courts identify compensation for otherwise uncompensated losses as a purpose of punitive damages. [43] In large measure, this is mere anachronism. It survives from the days when pain and suffering, mental anguish, and other intangible harms were not permissible elements of an ordinary compensatory [*150] award. [44] Today, of course, such restrictions no longer apply, and there is no good reason to believe that modern punitive damages awards correct any systematic inadequacy in ordinary compensatory remedies. [45] This is not to say that compensatory damages are always and everywhere sufficient to that purpose or that the goal of compensation is necessarily irrelevant to the law of punitive damages. The point is rather that compensation is, at best, a secondary concern in assessing punitive awards. That compensation may in some jurisdictions play a subsidiary role does not detract from the fact that retribution and deterrence are the main objectives. Punitive damages are therefore correctly treated as a form of punishment.

This conclusion is buttressed by reference to the Supreme Court's announced criteria for determining whether a sanction is punitive in nature. In Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, [46] the Court listed seven factors relevant to that inquiry:

[w]hether the sanction involves an afirmative disability or restraint, whether it has historically been regarded as punishment, whether it comes into play only on a finding of scienter, whether its operation will promote the traditional aims of punishment -- retribution and deterrence, whether the behavior to which it applies is already a crime, whether an alternative purpose to which it may rationally be connected is assignable for it, and whether it appears excessive in relation to the alternative purpose assigned. [47]

With the possible exception of the first, each of these factors supports the characterization of punitive damages as punitive. Indeed, the common designation of "punitive" or "exemplary" damages implies that such awards have historically been regarded as punishment, at least in this country. [48] Like most forms of punishment, [*151] punitive damages require a finding of scienter -- typically, that the defendant acted maliciously or with callous disregard for the rights of others. Obviously, punitive damages further the traditional aims of punishment, namely retribution and deterrence, and are usually supported on precisely such grounds. The behavior sanctioned by punitive liability is usually also subject to criminal prosecution, at least where it is performed with the requisite culpability. Finally, no alternative purpose can rationally be thought to account for current practice in awarding punitive damages, largely because of the great disparity between the size of the awards entered and any nonpunitive purpose they might be imagined to serve.

Taken together, the Mendoza-Martinez factors confirm that punitive damages are in fact, as well as in name, a quasi-criminal form of punishment. They are functionally equivalent to the "fines" addressed by the eighth amendment and should be subject to constitutional scrutiny on that basis.

REV_00263420

It remains, therefore, only to determine when a punitive award, or aggregation of awards, should be deemed "excessive," and hence unconstitutional. One plausible position would be that a punishment is presumptively excessive if duplicative. [49] Even if this strict limitation were rejected, it should still be clear that punishment is excessive if gratuitous -- that is, if it is imposed in amounts so extravagant as to have no rational relation to the legitimate goals of retribution and deterrence. Such an inquiry is hardly self-executing, but absent a stricter rule, courts should be instructed that some such inquiry is constitutionally required.

B

Although the eighth amendment prohibition of "excessive fines" seems directly applicable to punitive damages, that conclusion is not essential to this argument. That protection is in any event subsumed in the more general requirement of due process of law. As the Supreme Court has repeatedly made clear, the content of due process is not limited to the specific provisions of the Bill of [*152] Rights. [50] Nor is due process confined to criminal prosecutions; it applies to any legal proceeding or regime by which any person may be deprived of "life, liberty, or property." [51] Due process requires, in whatever context, that legal procedures be consistent with "fundamental fairness"; [52] that they be consonant with "ordinary notions of fair play and the settled rules of law"; [53] that they accord with "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice"; [54] and that they not offend "the community's sense of fair play and decency." [55] However phrased, the message is clear; due process mandates at all times, in all circumstances, and for all defendants, "fundamental fairness" at the hands of the law. [56]

In discovering what "fundamental fairness" requires in the context of punitive damages, one might begin with the precedents. Strictly speaking, there are very few. One reason is that the infliction of repetitive and debilitating punitive awards for a single course of conduct is such a recent phenomenon. Until the last half decade, few courts would have anticipated, much less attempted to solve, the problem of runaway punitive damages in products liability cases. Equally important, these cases are brought under state law. Because the problem arises not from any single judgment, but from the repetitive and cumulative litigation of punitive claims, no [*153] state has either the incentive or the opportunity to take corrective action. All a state court can do is to instruct the jury properly in the case before it, and the current crisis testifies to the inadequacy of that remedy.

Nevertheless, the few courts that have considered the matter agree that the requirement of fundamental fairness does limit multiple punitive recoveries for a single course of conduct. Perhaps the strictest limitation comes from John Mohr & Sons v. Jahnke, [57] in which the Wisconsin Supreme Court disallowed a very modest punitive award ($ 500) because the claimant had already recovered treble damages, as authorized by state law. The court said that "to allow treble damages and punitive damages would amount to double recovery of a penalty and thus violate the basis fairness of a judicial proceeding required by the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution." [58] The same basic proposition has been strongly supported by academic lawyers, virtually all of whom agree that some limit on aggregate punitive recovery is needed in mass tort situations. [59]

That few courts have had occasion to consider this issue in its modern context does not mean, however, that recognition of a federal constitutional restraint on aggregate punitive liability lacks [*154] precedential support. Quite the opposite is true. Limiting aggregate punitive awards is a straightforward application of an ancient and settled principle of Anglo-American justice. That principle condemns excessive monetary penalties, whether civil or criminal. More specifically, it requires, at a minimum, that monetary penalties be limited in amount so as not to threaten the defendant's economic viability.

REV_00263421

The story begins in the early days of English justice, before crime and tort were clearly distinct. At a very early date, the tribal blood feud was superseded by money payments in lieu of vengeance. At first such payments were merely customary, but later they became mandatory. These sums included elements that today would be characterized as compensatory and others that would be regarded as punitive. Appropriately, they were owed not only to the victim or his family but also to the king or lord. As the feudal structure grew more complex, the multiplicity of such charges became more onerous, until finally it became "practically impossible" for an offender to "buy back the peace once it had been broken." [60]

At this point the king stepped in with an offer of protection. A wrongdoer could surrender himself and his goods to the king, who would restore him to the protection of the law on payment of a fine. Because all of his goods were technically delivered to the king, the offender was said to be "a mercie" or "at the king's mercy" with respect to their disposition. [61] The fine ultimately imposed thus came to be known as an "amercement," [62] and in early Norman England it was the usual penalty for a very broad range of delicts and offenses. Indeed, even after "felony" had come to be separately defined and distinctively punished, amercements continued to be the penalty imposed for the residual category of lesser offenses. [63]

Unlike the early payments used to forestall blood feuds, amercements were not levied according to any fixed schedule but arbitrarily [*155] according to the degree that the king or his officers chose to relax the forfeiture of all the offender's goods. [64] Thus, the amercement functioned as an ad hoc fine, levied in potentially unlimited amounts as a form of civil punishment for a very wide range of delicts and offenses. [65]

Not surprisingly, this unlimited punitive authority proved easily susceptible to abuse. In Magna Carta, therefore, when the polity of the nation rose up to restrain monarchial power and curb executive abuse, amercements were a subject of great concern. Although some provisions of that great document merely vindicate the parochial interests of the baronial class, others have stood through time as early expressions of fundamental principles of liberty and justice. [66] Into the latter category fall the three separate chapters of Magna Carta devoted to the limitation of amercements. In the first of these, Chapter 20 of the Great Charter, the king was made to concede that:

A freeman shall not be amerced for a slight offense, except in accordance with the degree of the offense; and for a grave offense he shall be amerced in accordance with the gravity of the offense, yet saving always his 'contenement'; and a merchant in the same way, saving his 'merchandise'; and a villein shall be amerced in the same way, saving his 'wainage' -- if they have fallen into our mercy; and none of the aforesaid amercements shall be imposed except by the oath of honest men of the neighbourhood. [67]

The three specialized words refer to the necessities of economic [*156] livelihood of a person in the identified station in life -- not bare survival, but continued economic viability in a particular position. [68] Thus, as Blackstone summarized, to the landowner is saved "his contenement, or land; to the trader his merchandize; and to the countryman his wainage, or team and instruments of husbandry." [69] As McKechnie elaborated, the "merchandise" to which the merchant was in all events entitled could mean either "the stock-in-trade without which the pursuit of his calling would be impossible" or, more broadly, "his business itself, his position as a merchant[;] . . . in either view the Charter saves to him his means of earning a living." [70] The same general principle is applied to nobles and clerks in the next two chapters. [71]

From these three provisions of Magna Carta, two related protections emerge. First, there is a requirement of reasonableness, of proportionality, of sensible relation between punishment and offense. Second, the penalty inflicted should not, in any event, destroy the offender's means of making a living in his particular trade or calling. Magna Carta guaranteed not just bare survival, but continued productive economic viability.

REV_00263422

Although this discussion may seem a bit arcane, in fact these principles have direct contemporary application. The Constitution as originally submitted to the states was roundly criticized for failing to include a declaration of rights. Magna Carta and the English Bill of Rights were invoked as models of what was required, and a tacit understanding was reached that some such provisions would be added by way of amendment. [72] In his first inaugural, President Washington called for a bill of rights, and the first Congress responded by submitting proposals to the states. These were based [*157] in part on proposals drafted by a committee of the Virginia ratifying convention, which had sought to carry forward protections of Magna Carta and the English Bill of Rights. As the Supreme Court has stated, "[t]he law is perfectly well settled that the first ten amendments to the Constitution, commonly known as the Bill of Rights, were not intended to lay down any novel principle of government, but simply to embody certain guaranties and immunities which we had inherited from our English ancestors." [73]

The vehicle was the due process clause of the fifth amendment. Coke had recognized that "due process of law" and Magna Carta's guarantee of the "law of the land" meant the same thing. [74] The Framers, therefore, in requiring "due process of law," and their successors in extending that guarantee to the states, meant to adopt as components of American constitutionalism the fundamental liberties and protections secured by Magna Carta.

This correspondence has been repeatedly and explicitly noted by the Supreme Court. [75] Indeed, only recently the Court had occasion to invoke Magna Carta in a context directly relevant to the topic at hand. In Solem v. Helm, [76] the Court held that a life sentence without possibility of parole for a seventh nonviolent felony violated the eighth amendment guarantee against cruel and unusual punishment. The Court traced the lineage of that provision back through the Virginia Declaration of Right to the English Bill of Rights and Magna Carta. [77] The Court made unmistakably plain that the eighth amendment incorporated the English principle of proportionality, "including the right to be free from excessive punishments." [78] In the course of that argument, the Court cited and specifically relied on a case in which disproportionate punishment [*158] resulted from an excessive fine rather than from a sentence of incarceration. [79]

Although the Solem Court dealt with criminal sanctions and thus had no need to go beyond the conventional application of the eighth amendment to penalties of that sort, nothing in the opinion or analysis would support such a limitation. Indeed, as has been noted, the modern principle of proportionality derives directly from the Magna Carta provisions on amercements. Neither history nor logic limits the requirement of proportionality to the criminal law; it includes as well a prohibition of excessive punishment by means of civil fine or penalty. Whether that prohibition lies in the eighth amendment ban on "excessive fines" or in the "fundamental fairness" required by due process of law ultimately does not matter. The crucial point is that a historically informed assessment of these guarantees demonstrates the existence in principle of a constitutional restraint on the severity of civil sanctions.

III

I do not claim that the unconstitutionality of punitive damages follows inexorably from what has been said. The aim of this comment has been merely to open the debate. Further analysis may be required to determine at what point such penalties become "excessive" under the eighth amendment or, on a balancing of all the interests, violative of "fundamental fairness" under the due process clause. Under either formulation, there is room for discussion. My purpose is to establish both the need for, and the legitimacy of, an inquiry of this kind.

FOOTNOTES:

REV_00263423

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 517 us 564

*517 U.S. 559, *; 116 S. Ct. 1589, **;*
134 L. Ed. 2d 809, ; 1996 U.S. LEXIS 3390

BMW OF NORTH AMERICA, INC., PETITIONER v. IRA GORE, JR.

No. 94-896.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

517 U.S. 559; 116 S. Ct. 1589; 134 L. Ed. 2d 809; 1996 U.S. LEXIS 3390; 64 U.S.L.W. 4335; 96 Cal. Daily Op. Service 3490; 96 Daily Journal DAR 5747; 9 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 585

October 11, 1995, Argued
May 20, 1996, Decided

PRIOR HISTORY: ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE SUPREME COURT OF ALABAMA.

DISPOSITION: 646 So.2d 619, reversed and remanded.

CASE SUMMARY

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: Petitioner automobile distributor appealed a decision of the Supreme Court of Alabama which affirmed a finding in favor of respondent auto owner on petitioner's post-trial motion to set aside a punitive damages award in an action alleging suppression of a material fact.

OVERVIEW: Respondent discovered that his new car had been repainted. He brought suit against petitioner distributor alleging that its failure to disclose the repair constituted suppression of a material fact. Evidence was introduced at trial that petitioner had a policy of nondisclosure where pre-delivery repairs amounted to less than 3 percent of the retail price of the car. The jury awarded actual damages of $ 4,000 and punitive damages of $ 4,000,000. Petitioner's motion to set aside the punitive damages award was denied by both the trial court and the appellate court. However, the appellate court reduced the award to $ 2,000,000 because it was inaccurately calculated. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari. It reversed and remanded the case. It held that petitioner's conduct was not particularly reprehensible because it only caused minor economic harm and the 500 to 1 ratio of punitive damages to compensatory damages was not reasonable.

OUTCOME: Denial of motion to set aside the punitive damages award was reversed where the Court held that petitioner distributor's conduct was not particularly reprehensible because it only caused minor economic harm and a 500 to 1 ratio of punitive damages to compensatory damages was not reasonable.

CORE TERMS: punitive damages, repair, disclosure, punitive damages award, excessive, compensatory damages, nondisclosure, cap, reprehensible, punitive award, out-of-state, grossly, repainted, dealer, retail price, ratio, lawful, nationwide, misconduct, costing, excessiveness, punitive, consumers, allocate, guideposts, manufacturer, reasonable relationship, reprehensibility, distributor, purchaser

CORE CONCEPTS - ♦ Hide Concepts

REV_00263431

n11 Other than Yates v. BMW of North America, Inc., 642 So. 2d 937 (Ala. 1993), in which no punitive damages were awarded, the Alabama Supreme Court cited no such cases. In another portion of its opinion, 646 So. 2d at 629, the court did cite five Alabama cases, none of which involved either a dispute arising out of the purchase of an automobile or an award of punitive damages. G. M. Mosley Contractors, Inc. v. Phillips, 487 So. 2d 876, 879 (Ala. 1986); Hollis v. Wyrosdick, 508 So. 2d 704 (Ala. 1987); Campbell v. Burns, 512 So. 2d 1341, 1343 (Ala. 1987); Ashbee v. Brock, 510 So. 2d 214 (Ala. 1987); and Jawad v. Granade, 497 So. 2d 471 (Ala. 1986). All of these cases support the proposition that appellate courts in Alabama presume that jury verdicts are correct. In light of the Alabama Supreme Court's conclusion that (1) the jury had computed its award by multiplying $ 4,000 by the number of refinished vehicles sold in the United States and (2) that the award should have been based on Alabama conduct, respect for the error-free portion of the jury verdict would seem to produce an award of $ 56,000 ($ 4,000 multiplied by 14, the number of repainted vehicles sold in Alabama).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*568] Because we believed that a review of this case would help to illuminate "the character of the standard that will identify unconstitutionally excessive awards" of punitive damages, see Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415, 420, 129 L. Ed. 2d 336, 114 S. Ct. 2331 (1994), we granted certiorari, 513 U.S. 1125 (1995).

II

[*HR3] [3]
Punitive damages may properly be imposed to further a State's legitimate interests in punishing unlawful conduct and deterring its repetition. Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 350, 41 L. Ed. 2d 789, 94 S. Ct. 2997 (1974); Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 266-267, 69 L. Ed. 2d 616, 101 S. Ct. 2748 (1981); Haslip, 499 U.S. at 22. In our federal system, States necessarily have considerable flexibility in determining the level of punitive damages that they will allow in different classes of cases and in any particular case. Most States that authorize exemplary damages afford the jury similar latitude, requiring only that the damages awarded be reasonably necessary to vindicate the State's legitimate interests in punishment and deterrence. See TXO, 509 U.S. at 456; Haslip, 499 U.S. at 21, 22. Only when an award can fairly be categorized as "grossly excessive" in relation to these interests does it enter the zone of arbitrariness that violates the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Cf. TXO, 509 U.S. at 456. For that reason, the federal excessiveness inquiry appropriately begins with an identification of the state interests that a punitive award is designed to serve. We therefore focus our attention first on the scope of Alabama's legitimate interests in punishing BMW and deterring it from future misconduct.

[*HR4] [4]
No one doubts that a State may protect its citizens by prohibiting deceptive trade practices and by requiring automobile [*569] distributors to disclose presale repairs that affect the [1596] value of a new car. But the States need not, and in fact do not, provide such protection in a uniform manner. Some States rely on the judicial process to formulate and enforce an appropriate disclosure requirement by applying principles of contract and tort law. n12 Other States have enacted [823] various forms of legislation that define the disclosure obligations of automobile manufacturers, distributors, and dealers. n13 [*570] The result is a patchwork of rules representing the diverse policy judgments of lawmakers in 50 States.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n12 See, e. g., Rivers v. BMW of North America, Inc., 214 Ga. App. 880, 449 S.E.2d 337 (1994) (nondisclosure of presale paint repairs that occurred before state disclosure statute enacted); Wedmore v. Jordan Motors, Inc., 589 N.E.2d 1180 (Ind. App. 1992) (same).

REV_00263440

n13 Four States require disclosure of vehicle repairs costing more than 3 percent of suggested retail price. Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 28-1304.03 (1989); N. C. Gen. Stat. § 20-305.1(d)(5a) (1995); S. C. Code § 56-32-20 (Supp. 1995); Va. Code Ann. § 46.2-1571(D) (Supp. 1995). An additional three States mandate disclosure when the cost of repairs exceeds 3 percent or $ 500, whichever is greater. Ala. Code § 8-19-5(22)(c) (1993); Cal. Veh. Code Ann. §§ 9990-9991 (West Supp. 1996); Okla. Stat., Tit. 47, § 1112.1 (1991). Indiana imposes a 4 percent disclosure threshold. Ind. Code §§ 9-23-4-4, 9-23-4-5 (1993). Minnesota requires disclosure of repairs costing more than 4 percent of suggested retail price or $ 500, whichever is greater. Minn. Stat. § 325F.664 (1994). New York requires disclosure when the cost of repairs exceeds 5 percent of suggested retail price. N. Y. Gen. Bus. Law §§ 396-p(5)(a), (d) (McKinney Supp. 1996). Vermont imposes a 5 percent disclosure threshold for the first $ 10,000 in repair costs and 2 percent thereafter. Vt. Stat. Ann., Tit. 9, § 4087 (d) (1993). Eleven States mandate disclosure only of damage costing more than 6 percent of retail value to repair. Ark. Code Ann. § 23-112-705 (1992); Idaho Code § 49-1624 (1994); Ill. Comp. Stat., ch. 815, § 710/5 (1994); Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 190.0491(5) (Baldwin 1988); La. Rev. Stat. Ann § 32:1260 (West Supp. 1995); Miss. Motor Vehicle Comm'n, Regulation No. 1 (1992); N. H. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 357-C:5(III)(d) (1995); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 4517.61 (1994); R. I. Gen. Laws §§ 31-5.1-18(d), (f) (1995); Wis. Stat. § 218.01(2d) (a) (1994); Wyo. Stat. § 31-16-115 (1994). Two States require disclosure of repairs costing $ 3,000 or more. See Iowa Code Ann. § 321.69 (Supp. 1996); N. D. Admin. Code § 37-09-01-01 (1992). Georgia mandates disclosure of paint damage that costs more than $ 500 to repair. Ga. Code Ann. §§ 40-1-5(b)-(e) (1994) (enacted after respondent purchased his car). Florida requires dealers to disclose paint repair costing more than $ 100 of which they have actual knowledge. Fla. Stat. § 320.27(9)(n) (1992). Oregon requires manufacturers to disclose all "postmanufacturing" damage and repairs. It is unclear whether this mandate would apply to repairs such as those at issue here. Ore. Rev. Stat. § 650.155 (1991).

Many, but not all, of the statutes exclude from the computation of repair cost the value of certain components -- typically items such as glass, tires, wheels and bumpers -- when they are replaced with identical manufacturer's original equipment. E. g., Cal. Veh. Code Ann. §§ 9990-9991 (West Supp. 1996); Ga. Code Ann. §§ 40-1-5(b)-(e) (1994); Ill. Comp. Stat., ch. 815, § 710/5 (1994); Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 190.0491(5) (Baldwin 1988); Okla. Stat., Tit. 47, § 1112.1 (1991); Va. Code Ann. § 46.2-1571(D) (Supp. 1995); Vt. Stat. Ann., Tit. 9, § 4087 (d) (1993).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

That diversity demonstrates that reasonable people may disagree about the value of a full disclosure requirement. Some legislatures may conclude that affirmative disclosure requirements are unnecessary because the self-interest of those involved in the automobile trade in developing and maintaining the goodwill of their customers will motivate them to make voluntary disclosures or to refrain from selling cars that do not comply with self-imposed standards. Those legislatures that do adopt affirmative disclosure obligations may take into account the cost of government regulation, choosing to draw a line exempting minor repairs from such a requirement. In formulating a disclosure standard, States may also consider other goals, such as providing a "safe harbor" for automobile manufacturers, distributors, and dealers against lawsuits over minor repairs. n14

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n14 Also, a state legislature might plausibly conclude that the administrative costs associated with full disclosure would have the effect of raising car prices to the State's residents.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00263441

[*HR5] [5]
[*HR6] [6]
We may assume, arguendo, that it would be wise for every State to adopt Dr. Gore's preferred rule, requiring full disclosure of every presale repair to a car, no matter how trivial and regardless of its actual impact on the value of the car. [*571] But while we do not doubt that Congress has ample authority to enact [824] such a policy for the entire Nation, n15 it [1597] is clear that no single State could do so, or even impose its own policy choice on neighboring States. See Bonaparte v. Tax Court, 104 U.S. 592, 594, 26 L. Ed. 845 (1881) ("No State can legislate except with reference to its own jurisdiction. . . . Each State is independent of all the others in this particular"). n16 Similarly, one State's power to impose burdens on the interstate market for automobiles is not only subordinate to the federal power over interstate commerce, Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1, 9 Wheat. 1, 194-196, 6 L. Ed. 23 (1824), but is also constrained by the need to respect the interests of other States, see, e. g., Healy v. Beer Institute , 491 U.S. 324, 335-336, 105 L. Ed. 2d 275, 109 S. Ct. 2491 (1989) (the Constitution has a "special concern both with the maintenance of a national economic union unfettered by state-imposed limitations on [*572] interstate commerce and with the autonomy of the individual States within their respective spheres" (footnote omitted)); Edgar v. MITE Corp., 457 U.S. 624, 643, 73 L. Ed. 2d 269, 102 S. Ct. 2629 (1982).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n15 Federal disclosure requirements are, of course, a familiar part of our law. See, e. g., the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, as added by the Nutrition Labeling and Education Act of 1990, 104 Stat. 2353, 21 U.S.C. § 343; the Truth In Lending Act, 82 Stat. 148, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 1604; the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 892, 894, as amended, 15 U.S.C. §§ 78l-78m; Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act, 79 Stat. 283, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 1333; Alcoholic Beverage Labeling Act of 1988, 102 Stat. 4519, 27 U.S.C. § 215.

n16 See also Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809, 824, 44 L. Ed. 2d 600, 95 S. Ct. 2222 (1975) ("A State does not acquire power or supervision over the internal affairs of another State merely because the welfare and health of its own citizens may be affected when they travel to that State"); New York Life Ins. Co. v. Head, 234 U.S. 149, 161, 58 L. Ed. 1259, 34 S. Ct. 879 (1914) ("It would be impossible to permit the statutes of Missouri to operate beyond the jurisdiction of that State . . . without throwing down the constitutional barriers by which all the States are restricted within the orbits of their lawful authority and upon the preservation of which the Government under the Constitution depends. This is so obviously the necessary result of the Constitution that it has rarely been called in question and hence authorities directly dealing with it do not abound"); Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U.S. 657, 669, 36 L. Ed. 1123, 13 S. Ct. 224 (1892) ("Laws have no force of themselves beyond the jurisdiction of the State which enacts them, and can have extra-territorial effect only by the comity of other States").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*HR7] [7]
[*HR8A] [8A]
[*HR9] [9]
[*HR10A] [10A]
We think it follows from these principles of state sovereignty and comity that a State may not impose economic sanctions on violators of its laws with the intent of changing the tortfeasors' lawful conduct in other States. n17 Before this Court Dr. Gore argued that the large punitive damages award was necessary to induce BMW to change the nationwide policy that it adopted in 1983. n18 But by attempting to alter BMW's nationwide policy, Alabama would be infringing on the policy [825] choices of other States. To avoid such encroachment, the economic penalties that a State such as Alabama inflicts on those who transgress its laws, whether the penalties take the form of legislatively authorized fines or judicially imposed punitive damages, must be supported by the State's interest in protecting its own consumers and its own economy. Alabama may insist that BMW adhere to a particular disclosure policy in that State. Alabama does not [*573] have the power, however, to punish BMW for conduct that was lawful where it occurred and that had no impact on Alabama or its residents. n19 [1598] Nor may Alabama impose sanctions on BMW in order to deter conduct that is lawful in other jurisdictions.

REV_00263442

[*HR8B] [8B]
[*HR10B] [10B]

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n17 State power may be exercised as much by a jury's application of a state rule of law in a civil lawsuit as by a statute. See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 265, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686, 84 S. Ct. 710 (1964) ("The test is not the form in which state power has been applied but, whatever the form, whether such power has in fact been exercised"); San Diego Building Trades Council v. Garmon, 359 U.S. 236, 247, 3 L. Ed. 2d 775, 79 S. Ct. 773 (1959) ("Regulation can be as effectively exerted through an award of damages as through some form of preventive relief").

n18 Brief for Respondent 11-12, 23, 27-28; Tr. of Oral Arg. 50-54. Dr. Gore's interest in altering the nationwide policy stems from his concern that BMW would not (or could not) discontinue the policy in Alabama alone. Brief for Respondent 11. "If Alabama were limited to imposing punitive damages based only on BMW's gain from fraudulent sales in Alabama, the resulting award would have no prospect of protecting Alabama consumers from fraud, as it would provide no incentive for BMW to alter the unitary, national policy of nondisclosure which yielded BMW millions of dollars in profits." Id., at 23. The record discloses no basis for Dr. Gore's contention that BMW could not comply with Alabama's law without changing its nationwide policy. n19 See Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 363, 54 L. Ed. 2d 604, 98 S. Ct. 663 (1978) ("To punish a person because he has done what the law plainly allows him to do is a due process violation of the most basic sort"). Our cases concerning recidivist statutes are not to the contrary. Habitual offender statutes permit the sentencing court to enhance a defendant's punishment for a crime in light of prior convictions, including convictions in foreign jurisdictions. See e. g., Ala. Code § 13A-5-9 (1994); Cal. Penal Code Ann. §§ 667.5(f), 668 (West Supp. 1996); Ill. Comp. Stat., ch. 720, § 5/33B-1 (1994); N. Y. Penal Law §§ 70.04, 70.06, 70.08, 70.10 (McKinney 1987 and Supp. 1996); Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 12.42 (1994 and Supp. 1995-1996). A sentencing judge may even consider past criminal behavior which did not result in a conviction and lawful conduct that bears on the defendant's character and prospects for rehabilitation. Williams v. New York, 337 U.S. 241, 93 L. Ed. 1337, 69 S. Ct. 1079 (1949). But we have never held that a sentencing court could properly punish lawful conduct. This distinction is precisely the one we draw here. See n. 21, infra.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*HR11A] [11A]
[*HR12A] [12A]
In this case, we accept the Alabama Supreme Court's interpretation of the jury verdict as reflecting a computation of the amount of punitive damages "based in large part on conduct that happened in other jurisdictions." 646 So. 2d at 627. As the Alabama Supreme Court noted, neither the jury nor the trial court was presented with evidence that any of BMW's out-of-state conduct was unlawful. "The only testimony touching the issue showed that approximately 60% of the vehicles that were refinished were sold in states where failure to disclose the repair was not an unfair trade practice." Id., at 627, n. 6. n20 The Alabama Supreme Court therefore properly eschewed reliance on BMW's out-of-state conduct, id., at 628, and based its remitted award solely on [*574] conduct that occurred within Alabama. n21 The award must be analyzed in the light of the same conduct, with consideration given only to the interests of Alabama consumers, rather than those of the entire Nation. When the scope of the interest in punishment and deterrence that an Alabama court may appropriately consider is properly limited, it is apparent -- for [826] reasons that we shall now address -- that this award is grossly excessive.

REV_00263443

[*HR11B] [11B]
[*HR12B] [12B]

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n20 Given that the verdict was based in part on out-of-state conduct that was lawful where it occurred, we need not consider whether one State may properly attempt to change a tortfeasor's unlawful conduct in another State. n21 Of course, the fact that the Alabama Supreme Court correctly concluded that it was error for the jury to use the number of sales in other States as a multiplier in computing the amount of its punitive sanction does not mean that evidence describing out-of-state transactions is irrelevant in a case of this kind. To the contrary, as we stated in TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 462, n. 28, 125 L. Ed. 2d 366, 113 S. Ct. 2711 (1993), such evidence may be relevant to the determination of the degree of reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

III

[*HR1B] [1B]
[*HR13] [13]
[*HR14A] [14A]
Elementary notions of fairness enshrined in our constitutional jurisprudence dictate that a person receive fair notice not only of the conduct that will subject him to punishment, but also of the severity of the penalty that a State may impose. n22 Three guideposts, each of which indicates that BMW did not receive adequate notice of the magnitude of the sanction that Alabama might impose for adhering to the nondisclosure policy adopted in 1983, lead us to the conclusion that [*575] the $ 2 million award against BMW is grossly excessive: the degree of reprehensibility of the nondisclosure; the disparity between the harm or potential harm suffered by Dr. Gore and his punitive damages award; and the difference between this remedy and the civil penalties authorized [1599] or imposed in comparable cases. We discuss these considerations in turn.

[*HR14B] [14B]

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n22 See Miller v. Florida, 482 U.S. 423, 96 L. Ed. 2d 351, 107 S. Ct. 2446 (1987) (Ex Post Facto Clause violated by retroactive imposition of revised sentencing guidelines that provided longer sentence for defendant's crime); Bouie v. City of Columbia, 378 U.S. 347, 12 L. Ed. 2d 894, 84 S. Ct. 1697 (1964) (retroactive application of new construction of statute violated due process); id., at 350-355 (citing cases); Lankford v. Idaho, 500 U.S. 110, 114 L. Ed. 2d 173, 111 S. Ct. 1723 (1991) (due process violated because defendant and his counsel did not have adequate notice that judge might impose death sentence). The strict constitutional safeguards afforded to criminal defendants are not applicable to civil cases, but the basic protection against "judgments without notice" afforded by the Due Process Clause, Shaffer v. Heitner, 433 U.S. 186, 217, 53 L. Ed. 2d 683, 97 S. Ct. 2569 (1977) (STEVENS, J., concurring in judgment), is implicated by civil penalties.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Degree of Reprehensibility

[*HR15] [15]
[*HR16] [16]
[*HR17] [17]
Perhaps the most important indicium of the reasonableness of a punitive damages award is the degree of reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct. n23 As the Court stated nearly 150 years ago, exemplary damages imposed on a defendant should reflect "the enormity of his offense." Day v. Woodworth, 54 U.S. 363, 13 HOW 363, 371, 14 L. Ed. 181 (1852). See also St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Williams, 251 U.S. 63, 66-67, 64 L. Ed. 139, 40 S. Ct. 71 (1919) (punitive award may not be "wholly disproportioned to the offense"); Browning-Ferris Industries of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 301, 106 L. Ed. 2d 219, 109 S. Ct. 2909 (1989) (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (reviewing court "should examine the gravity of the defendant's conduct and the harshness of the award of punitive damages"). n24 This principle reflects the accepted view that some wrongs are more blameworthy than others. Thus, we have said that [*576] "nonviolent crimes are less serious than crimes marked by violence or the [827] threat of violence." Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277, 292-293, 77 L. Ed. 2d 637, 103 S. Ct. 3001 (1983). Similarly, "trickery and deceit," TXO, 509 U.S. at 462, are more reprehensible than negligence. In TXO, both the West Virginia Supreme Court and the Justices of this Court placed special emphasis on the principle that punitive damages may not be "grossly out of proportion to the severity of the offense." n25 Id., at 453, 462. Indeed, for JUSTICE KENNEDY, the defendant's intentional malice was the decisive element in a "close and difficult" case. Id., at 468. n26

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n23 "The flagrancy of the misconduct is thought to be the primary consideration in determining the amount of punitive damages." Owen, A Punitive Damages Overview: Functions, Problems and Reform, 39 Vill. L. Rev. 363, 387 (1994).

N24 The principle that punishment should fit the crime "is deeply rooted and frequently repeated in common-law jurisprudence." Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277, 284, 77 L. Ed. 2d 637, 103 S. Ct. 3001 (1983). See Burkett v. Lanata, 15 La. Ann. 337, 339 (1860) (punitive damages should be "commensurate to the nature of the offence"); Blanchard v. Morris, 15 Ill. 35, 36 (1853) ("We cannot say [the exemplary damages] are excessive under the circumstances; for the proofs show that threats, violence, and imprisonment, were accompanied by mental fear, torture, and agony of mind"); Louisville & Northern R. Co. v. Brown, 127 Ky. 732, 749, 106 S.W. 795, 799 (1908) ("We are not aware of any case in which the court has sustained a verdict as large as this one unless the injuries were permanent").

n25 Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 22, 113 L. Ed. 2d 1, 111 S. Ct. 1032 (1991).

n26 The dissenters also recognized that "TXO's conduct was clearly wrongful, calculated, and improper . . . ." TXO, 509 U.S. at 482 (opinion of O'CONNOR, J.).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*HR1C] [1C]
[*HR18] [18]
In this case, none of the aggravating factors associated with particularly reprehensible conduct is present. The harm BMW inflicted on Dr. Gore was purely economic in nature. The presale refinishing of the car had no effect on its performance or safety features, or even its appearance for at least nine months after his purchase. BMW's conduct evinced no indifference to or reckless disregard for the health and safety of others. To be sure, infliction of economic injury, especially when done intentionally through affirmative acts of misconduct, id., at 453, or when the target is financially vulnerable, can warrant a substantial penalty. But this observation does not convert all acts that cause economic harm into torts that are sufficiently reprehensible to justify a significant sanction in addition to compensatory damages.

REV_00263445

[*HR19] [19]
Dr. Gore contends that BMW's conduct was particularly reprehensible because nondisclosure of the repairs to his car formed part of a nationwide pattern of tortious conduct. Certainly, evidence that a defendant has repeatedly engaged in prohibited conduct while knowing or suspecting that it was unlawful would provide relevant support for an argument [*577] that strong medicine is required to cure the defendant's disrespect for the law. See id., at 462, n. 28. Our holdings that a recidivist may be punished more severely than a first offender recognize that repeated misconduct is more [1600] reprehensible than an individual instance of malfeasance. See Gryger v. Burke, 334 U.S. 728, 732, 92 L. Ed. 1683, 68 S. Ct. 1256 (1948).

In support of his thesis, Dr. Gore advances two arguments. First, he asserts that the state disclosure statutes supplement, rather than supplant, existing remedies for breach of contract and common-law fraud. Thus, according to Dr. Gore, the statutes may not properly be viewed as immunizing from liability the nondisclosure of repairs costing less than the applicable statutory threshold. Brief for Respondent 18-19. Second, Dr. Gore maintains that BMW should have anticipated that its failure to disclose similar repair work could expose it to liability for fraud. Id., at 4-5.

[*HR1D] [1D]
[*HR20] [20]
We recognize, of course, that only state courts may authoritatively construe state statutes. As far as we are aware, at the time this action was commenced no state court had explicitly addressed whether its State's disclosure statute provides a safe harbor for nondisclosure of presumptively [828] minor repairs or should be construed instead as supplementing common-law duties. n27 A review of the text of the statutes, [*578] however, persuades us that in the absence of a state-court determination to the contrary, a corporate executive could reasonably interpret the disclosure requirements as establishing safe harbors. In California, for example, the disclosure statute defines "material" damage to a motor vehicle as damage requiring repairs costing in excess of 3 percent of the suggested retail price or $ 500, whichever is greater. Cal. Veh. Code Ann. § 9990 (West Supp. 1996). The Illinois statute states that in cases in which disclosure is not required, "nondisclosure does not constitute a misrepresentation or omission of fact." Ill. Comp. Stat., ch. 815, § 710/5 (1994). n28 Perhaps the statutes may also be interpreted in another way. We simply emphasize that the record contains no evidence that BMW's decision to follow a disclosure policy that coincided with the strictest extant state statute was sufficiently reprehensible to justify a $ 2 million award of punitive damages.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n27 In Jeter v. M & M Dodge, Inc., 634 So. 2d 1383 (La. App. 1994), a Louisiana court of appeals suggested that the Louisiana disclosure statute functions as a safe harbor. Finding that the cost of repairing presale damage to the plaintiff's car exceeded the statutory disclosure threshold, the court held that the disclosure statute did not provide a defense to the action. Id., at 1384.

REV_00263446

During the pendency of this litigation, Alabama enacted a disclosure statute which defines "material" damage to a new car as damage requiring repairs costing in excess of 3 percent of suggested retail price or $ 500, whichever is greater. Ala. Code § 8-19-5(22) (1993). After its decision in this case, the Alabama Supreme Court stated in dicta that the remedies available under this section of its Deceptive Trade Practices Act did not displace or alter pre-existing remedies available under either the common law or other statutes. Hines v. Riverside Chevrolet-Olds, Inc., 655 So. 2d 909, 917, n. 2 (1994). It refused, however, to "recognize, or impose on automobile manufacturers, a general duty to disclose every repair of damage, however slight, incurred during the manufacturing process." Id., at 921. Instead, it held that whether a defendant has a duty to disclose is a question of fact "for the jury to determine." Id., at 918. In reaching that conclusion it overruled two earlier decisions that seemed to indicate that as a matter of law there was no disclosure obligation in cases comparable to this one. Id., at 920 (overruling Century 21-Reeves Realty, Inc. v. McConnell Cadillac, Inc., 626 So. 2d 1273 (Ala. 1993), and Cobb v. Southeast Toyota Distributors, Inc., 569 So. 2d 395 (Ala. 1990)).

n28 See also Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 28-1304.03 (1989) ("If disclosure is not required under this section, a purchaser may not revoke or rescind a sales contract due solely to the fact that the new motor vehicle was damaged and repaired prior to completion of the sale"); Ind. Code § 9-23-4-5 (1993) (providing that "repaired damage to a customer-ordered new motor vehicle not exceeding four percent (4%) of the manufacturer's suggested retail price does not need to be disclosed at the time of sale"); N. C. Gen. Stat. § 20-305.1(e) (1993) (requiring disclosure of repairs costing more than 5 percent of suggested retail price and prohibiting revocation or rescission of sales contract on the basis of less costly repairs); Okla. Stat., Tit. 47, § 1112.1 (1991) (defining "material" damage to a car as damage requiring repairs costing in excess of 3 percent of suggested retail price or $ 500, whichever is greater).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*579]

[*HR1E] [1E]
[*HR21] [21]
Dr. Gore's second argument for treating BMW as a recidivist is that the company should have anticipated that its actions would be considered fraudulent in some, if not all, jurisdictions. This contention overlooks the fact that actionable fraud requires a material [1601] misrepresentation or omission. n29 This qualifier invites line-drawing of just the sort engaged in by States with disclosure statutes and by BMW. We do not think it can be disputed that there may exist minor imperfections in the finish of a new car that can be repaired (or indeed, left unrepaired) [829] without materially affecting the car's value. n30 There is no evidence that BMW acted in bad faith when it sought to establish the appropriate line between presumptively minor damage and damage requiring disclosure to purchasers. For this purpose, BMW could reasonably rely on state disclosure statutes for guidance. In this regard, it is also significant that there is no evidence that BMW persisted in a course of conduct after it had been adjudged unlawful on even one occasion, let alone repeated occasions. n31

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n29 Restatement (Second) of Torts § 538 (1977); W. Keeton, D. Dobbs, R. Keeton, & D. Owen, Prosser and Keeton on Law of Torts § 108 (5th ed. 1984).

n30 The Alabama Supreme Court has held that a car may be considered "new" as a matter of law even if its finish contains minor cosmetic flaws. Wilburn v. Larry Savage Chevrolet, Inc., 477 So. 2d 384 (1985). We note also that at trial respondent only introduced evidence of undisclosed paint damage to new cars repaired at a cost of $ 300 or more. This decision suggests that respondent believed that the jury might consider some repairs too de minimis to warrant disclosure.

REV_00263447

n31 Before the verdict in this case, BMW had changed its policy with respect to Alabama and two other States. Five days after the jury award, BMW altered its nationwide policy to one of full disclosure.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*HR1F] [1F]
Finally, the record in this case discloses no deliberate false statements, acts of affirmative misconduct, or concealment of evidence of improper motive, such as were present in Haslip and TXO. Haslip, 499 U.S. at 5; TXO, 509 U.S. at 453. We accept, of course, the jury's finding that BMW suppressed [*580] a material fact which Alabama law obligated it to communicate to prospective purchasers of repainted cars in that State. But the omission of a material fact may be less reprehensible than a deliberate false statement, particularly when there is a good-faith basis for believing that no duty to disclose exists.

[*HR22] [22]
That conduct is sufficiently reprehensible to give rise to tort liability, and even a modest award of exemplary damages does not establish the high degree of culpability that warrants a substantial punitive damages award. Because this case exhibits none of the circumstances ordinarily associated with egregiously improper conduct, we are persuaded that BMW's conduct was not sufficiently reprehensible to warrant imposition of a $ 2 million exemplary damages award.

Ratio

The second and perhaps most commonly cited indicium of an unreasonable or excessive punitive damages award is its ratio to the actual harm inflicted on the plaintiff. See TXO, 509 U.S. at 459; Haslip, 499 U.S. at 23. The principle that exemplary damages must bear a "reasonable relationship" to compensatory damages has a long pedigree. n32 Scholars have identified a number of early English statutes authorizing the [*581] award of multiple [830] damages for particular wrongs. Some 65 different enactments during the period between 1275 and 1753 provided for double, treble, or quadruple damages. n33 Our [1602] decisions in both Haslip and TXO endorsed the proposition that a comparison between the compensatory award and the punitive award is significant.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n32 See, e. g., Grant v. McDonogh, 7 La. Ann. 447, 448 (1852) ("Exemplary damages allowed should bear some proportion to the real damage sustained"); Saunders v. Mullen, 66 Iowa 728, 729, 24 N.W. 529 (1885) ("When the actual damages are so small, the amount allowed as exemplary damages should not be so large"); Flannery v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co., 15 D. C. 111, 125 (1885) (when punitive damages award "is out of all proportion to the injuries received, we feel it our duty to interfere"); Houston & Texas Central R. Co. v. Nichols, 9 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 361, 365 (Tex. 1882) ("Exemplary damages, when allowed, should bear proportion to the actual damages sustained"); McCarthy v. Niskern, 22 Minn. 90, 91-92 (1875) (punitive damages "enormously in excess of what may justly be regarded as compensation" for the injury must be set aside "to prevent injustice").

n33 Owen, supra n. 23, at 368, and n. 23. One English statute, for example, provides that officers arresting persons out of their jurisdiction shall pay double damages. 3 Edw., I., ch. 35. Another directs that in an action for forcible entry or detainer, the plaintiff shall recover treble damages. 8 Hen. VI, ch. 9, § 6.

REV_00263448

Present-day federal law allows or mandates imposition of multiple damages for a wide assortment of offenses, including violations of the antitrust laws, see § 4 of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 731, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 15, and the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, see 18 U.S.C. § 1964, and certain breaches of the trademark laws, see § 35 of the Trademark Act of 1946, 60 Stat. 439, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 1117, and the patent laws, see 66 Stat. 813, 35 U.S.C. § 284.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In Haslip we concluded that even though a punitive damages award of "more than 4 times the amount of compensatory damages" might be "close to the line," it did not "cross the line into the area of constitutional impropriety." 499 U.S. at 23-24. TXO, following dicta in Haslip, refined this analysis by confirming that the proper inquiry is "'whether there is a reasonable relationship between the punitive damages award and the harm likely to result from the defendant's conduct as well as the harm that actually has occurred.'" TXO, 509 U.S. at 460 (emphasis in original), quoting Haslip, 499 U.S. at 21. Thus, in upholding the $ 10 million award in TXO, we relied on the difference between that figure and the harm to the victim that would have ensued if the tortious plan had succeeded. That difference suggested that the relevant ratio was not more than 10 to 1. n34

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n34 "While petitioner stresses the shocking disparity between the punitive award and the compensatory award, that shock dissipates when one considers the potential loss to respondents, in terms of reduced or eliminated royalties payments, had petitioner succeeded in its illicit scheme. Thus, even if the actual value of the 'potential harm' to respondents is not between $ 5 million and $ 8.3 million, but is closer to $ 4 million, or $ 2 million, or even $ 1 million, the disparity between the punitive award and the potential harm does not, in our view, 'jar one's constitutional sensibilities.'" TXO, 509 U.S. at 462, quoting Haslip, 499 U.S. at 18.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*582]

[*HR1G] [1G]
The $ 2 million in punitive damages awarded to Dr. Gore by the Alabama Supreme Court is 500 times the amount of his actual harm as determined by the jury. n35 Moreover, there is no suggestion that Dr. Gore or any other BMW purchaser was threatened with any additional potential harm by BMW's nondisclosure policy. The disparity in this case is thus dramatically greater than those considered in Haslip and TXO. n36

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n35 Even assuming each repainted BMW suffers a diminution in value of approximately $ 4,000, the award is 35 times greater than the total damages of all 14 Alabama consumers who purchased repainted BMW's.

n36 The ratio here is also dramatically greater than any award that would be permissible under the statutes and proposed statutes summarized in the appendix to JUSTICE GINSBURG's dissenting opinion. Post, at 615-616.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*HR23] [23]

REV_00263449

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages
Constitutional Law > Substantive Due Process > Scope of Protection
The Due Process Clause, U.S. Const. amend. XIV, prohibits a state from imposing a "grossly excessive" punishment on a tortfeasor.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages
Constitutional Law > Substantive Due Process > Scope of Protection
Punitive damages may properly be imposed to further a state's legitimate interests in punishing unlawful conduct and deterring its repetition. In the federal system, states necessarily have considerable flexibility in determining the level of punitive damages that they will allow in different classes of cases and in any particular case. Most states that authorize exemplary damages afford the jury similar latitude, requiring only that the damages awarded be reasonably necessary to vindicate the state's legitimate interests in punishment and deterrence. Only when an award can fairly be categorized as "grossly excessive" in relation to these interests does it enter the zone of arbitrariness that violates the Due Process Clause, U.S. Const. amend. XIV. For that reason, the federal excessiveness inquiry appropriately begins with an identification of the state interests that a punitive award is designed to serve.

Constitutional Law > Relations Among Governments
No state can legislate except with reference to its own jurisdiction. Each state is independent of all the others in this particular.

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > Commerce Clause
A state may not impose economic sanctions on violators of its laws with the intent of changing the tortfeasors' lawful conduct in other states.

Constitutional Law > Relations Among Governments
State power may be exercised as much by a jury's application of a state rule of law in a civil lawsuit as by a statute. The test is not the form in which state power has been applied but, whatever the form, whether such power has in fact been exercised. Regulation can be as effectively exerted through an award of damages as through some form of preventive relief.

Constitutional Law > Substantive Due Process > Scope of Protection
To punish a person because he has done what the law plainly allows him to do is a due process violation of the most basic sort.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages
In determining punitive damages, evidence describing out-of-state transactions may be relevant to the determination of the degree of reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct.

Constitutional Law > Substantive Due Process > Scope of Protection
Elementary notions of fairness enshrined in constitutional jurisprudence dictate that a person receive fair notice not only of the conduct that will subject him to punishment, but also of the severity of the penalty that a state may impose.

Constitutional Law > Procedural Due Process > Scope of Protection
The strict constitutional safeguards afforded to criminal defendants are not applicable to civil cases, but the basic protection against judgments without notice afforded by the Due Process Clause, U.S. Const. amend. V, is implicated by civil penalties.

REV_00263432

Of course, "we have consistently rejected the notion that the constitutional line is marked by a simple mathematical formula, even one that compares actual and potential [831] damages to the punitive award. TXO, 509 U.S. at 458. n37 Indeed, low awards of compensatory damages may properly support a higher ratio than high compensatory awards, if, for example, a particularly egregious act has resulted in only a small amount of economic damages. A higher ratio may also be justified in cases in which the injury is hard to detect or the monetary value of noneconomic harm might have been difficult to determine. It is appropriate, therefore, to reiterate our rejection of a categorical approach. Once again, "we return to what we said . . . in Haslip: 'We need not, and [*583] indeed we cannot, draw a mathematical bright line between the constitutionally acceptable and the constitutionally unacceptable that would fit every case. We can say, however, that [a] general concer[n] of reasonableness . . . properly enter[s] into the constitutional calculus.'" Id., at 458 (quoting Haslip, 499 U.S. at [1603] 18). In most cases, the ratio will be within a constitutionally acceptable range, and remittitur will not be justified on this basis. When the ratio is a breathtaking 500 to 1, however, the award must surely "raise a suspicious judicial eyebrow." TXO, 509 U.S. at 481 (O'CONNOR, J., dissenting).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n37 Conceivably the Alabama Supreme Court's selection of a 500-to-1 ratio was an application of JUSTICE SCALIA's identification of one possible reading of the plurality opinion in TXO: Any future due process challenge to a punitive damages award could be disposed of with the simple observation that "this is no worse than TXO." 509 U.S. at 472 (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment). As we explain in the text, this award is significantly worse than the award in TXO.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Sanctions for Comparable Misconduct

[*HR1H] [1H]
[*HR24] [24]
Comparing the punitive damages award and the civil or criminal penalties that could be imposed for comparable misconduct provides a third indicium of excessiveness. As JUSTICE O'CONNOR has correctly observed, "a reviewing court engaged in determining whether an award of punitive damages is excessive should "accord 'substantial deference' to legislative judgments concerning appropriate sanctions for the conduct at issue." Browning-Ferris Industries of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. at 301 (opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part). In Haslip, 499 U.S. at 23, the Court noted that although the exemplary award was "much in excess of the fine that could be imposed," imprisonment was also authorized in the criminal context. n38 In this [*584] case the $ 2 million economic sanction imposed on BMW is substantially greater than the statutory fines available in Alabama and elsewhere for similar malfeasance.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n38 Although the Court did not address the size of the punitive damages award in Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 464 U.S. 238, 78 L. Ed. 2d 443, 104 S. Ct. 615 (1984), the dissenters commented on its excessive character, noting that the "$ 10 million [punitive damages award] that the jury imposed is 100 times greater than the maximum fine that may be imposed . . . for a single violation of federal standards" and "more than 10 times greater than the largest single fine that the Commission has ever imposed." Id., at 263 (BLACKMUN, J., dissenting). In New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686, 84 S. Ct. 710 (1964), the Court observed that the punitive award for libel was "one thousand times greater than the maximum fine provided by the Alabama criminal statute," and concluded that the "fear of damage awards under a rule such as that invoked by the Alabama courts here may be markedly more inhibiting than the fear of prosecution under a criminal statute." Id., at 277.

REV_00263450

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [832]

The maximum civil penalty authorized by the Alabama Legislature for a violation of its Deceptive Trade Practices Act is $ 2,000; n39 other States authorize more severe sanctions, with the maxima ranging from $ 5,000 to $ 10,000. n40 Significantly, some statutes draw a distinction between first offenders and recidivists; thus, in New York the penalty is $ 50 for a first offense and $ 250 for subsequent offenses. None of these statutes would provide an out-of-state distributor with fair notice that the first violation -- or, indeed the first 14 violations -- of its provisions might subject an offender to a multimillion dollar penalty. Moreover, at the time BMW's policy was first challenged, there does not appear to have been any judicial decision in Alabama or elsewhere indicating that application of that policy might give rise to such severe punishment.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n39 Ala. Code § 8-19-11(b) (1993).

n40 See, e. g., Ark. Code Ann. § 23-112-309(b) (1992) (up to $ 5,000 for violation of state Motor Vehicle Commission Act that would allow suspension of dealer's license; up to $ 10,000 for violation of Act that would allow revocation of dealer's license); Fla. Stat. § 320.27(12) (1992) (up to $ 1,000); Ga. Code Ann. §§ 40-1-5(g), 10-1-397(a) (1994 and Supp. 1996) (up to $ 2,000 administratively; up to $ 5,000 in superior court); Ind. Code § 9-23-6-4 (1993) ($ 50 to $ 1,000); N. H. Rev. Stat. Ann. §§ 357-C:15, 651:2 (1995 and Supp. 1995) (corporate fine of up to $ 20,000); N. Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 396-p(6) (McKinney Supp. 1995) ($ 50 for first offense; $ 250 for subsequent offenses).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*HR1I] [1I]
The sanction imposed in this case cannot be justified on the ground that it was necessary to deter future misconduct without considering whether less drastic remedies could be expected to achieve that goal. The fact that a multimillion dollar penalty prompted a change in policy sheds no light on the question whether a lesser deterrent would have adequately protected the interests of Alabama consumers. In [*585] the absence of a history of noncompliance with known statutory requirements, there is no basis for assuming that a more modest sanction would not have been sufficient to motivate full compliance with the disclosure requirement imposed [1604] by the Alabama Supreme Court in this case.

IV

[*HR1J] [1J]
We assume, as the juries in this case and in the Yates case found, that the undisclosed damage to the new BMW's affected their actual value. Notwithstanding the evidence adduced by BMW in an effort to prove that the repainted cars conformed to the same quality standards as its other cars, we also assume that it knew, or should have known, that as time passed the repainted cars would lose their attractive appearance more rapidly than other BMW's. Moreover, we of course accept the Alabama courts' view that the state interest in protecting its citizens from deceptive trade practices justifies a sanction in addition to the recovery of compensatory damages. We cannot, however, accept the conclusion of the Alabama Supreme Court that BMW's conduct was sufficiently egregious to justify a punitive sanction that is tantamount to a severe criminal penalty.

[*HR1K] [1K]

REV_00263451

[*HR25] [25]
[*HR26] [26]
The fact that BMW is a large corporation rather than an impecunious individual does not diminish its entitlement to fair notice of the demands that the several States impose on the conduct of its business. Indeed, its status as an active participant in the national economy implicates the federal interest in preventing individual States from imposing undue burdens on interstate commerce. While each State [833] has ample power to protect its own consumers, none may use the punitive damages deterrent as a means of imposing its regulatory policies on the entire Nation.

[*HR27A] [27A]
[*HR28] [28]
As in Haslip, we are not prepared to draw a bright line marking the limits of a constitutionally acceptable punitive damages award. Unlike that case, however, we are fully convinced that the grossly excessive award imposed in this [*586] case transcends the constitutional limit. n41 Whether the appropriate remedy requires a new trial or merely an independent determination by the Alabama Supreme Court of the award necessary to vindicate the economic interests of Alabama consumers is a matter that should be addressed by the state court in the first instance.

[*HR27B] [27B]

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n41 JUSTICE GINSBURG expresses concern that we are "the only federal court policing" this limit. Post, at 613. The small number of punitive damages questions that we have reviewed in recent years, together with the fact that this is the first case in decades in which we have found that a punitive damages award exceeds the constitutional limit, indicates that this concern is at best premature. In any event, this consideration surely does not justify an abdication of our responsibility to enforce constitutional protections in an extraordinary case such as this one.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

CONCURBY: BREYER

CONCUR: JUSTICE BREYER, with whom JUSTICE O'CONNOR and JUSTICE SOUTER join, concurring.

The Alabama state courts have assessed the defendant $ 2 million in "punitive damages" for having knowingly failed to tell a BMW automobile buyer that, at a cost of $ 600, it had repainted portions of his new $ 40,000 car, thereby lowering its potential resale value by about 10%. The Court's opinion, which I join, explains why we have concluded that this award, in this case, was "grossly excessive" in relation to legitimate punitive damages objectives, and hence an arbitrary deprivation of life, liberty, or property in violation of the Due Process Clause. See TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 453, 454, 125 L. Ed. 2d 366, 113 S. Ct. 2711 (1993) (A "grossly excessive" punitive award amounts to an "arbitrary deprivation of property without due process of law") (plurality opinion). Members of this Court have generally thought, however, that if "fair procedures were followed, a judgment that is a product of that process is entitled to a strong presumption [*587] of validity." Id., at 457. See also Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 40-42, 113 L. Ed. 2d 1, 111 S. Ct. 1032 (1991) (KENNEDY, J., concurring in judgment). And the Court also has found that punitive damages procedures very similar to those followed here were not, by themselves, fundamentally unfair. Id., at 15-24. Thus, I believe it important to explain why this presumption of validity is overcome in this instance.

REV_00263452

[1605] The reason flows from the Court's emphasis in Haslip upon the constitutional importance of legal standards that provide "reasonable constraints" within which "discretion is exercised," that assure "meaningful and adequate review by the trial court whenever a jury has fixed the punitive damages," and permit "appellate [834] review [that] makes certain that the punitive damages are reasonable in their amount and rational in light of their purpose to punish what has occurred and to deter its repetition." Id., at 20-21. See also id., at 18 ("Unlimited jury discretion -- or unlimited judicial discretion for that matter -- in the fixing of punitive damages may invite extreme results that jar one's constitutional sensibilities").

This constitutional concern, itself harkening back to the Magna Carta, arises out of the basic unfairness of depriving citizens of life, liberty, or property, through the application, not of law and legal processes, but of arbitrary coercion. Daniels v. Williams, 474 U.S. 327, 331, 88 L. Ed. 2d 662, 106 S. Ct. 662 (1986); Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U.S. 114, 123, 32 L. Ed. 623, 9 S. Ct. 231 (1889). Requiring the application of law, rather than a decisionmaker's caprice, does more than simply provide citizens notice of what actions may subject them to punishment; it also helps to assure the uniform general treatment of similarly situated persons that is the essence of law itself. See Railway Express Agency, Inc. v. New York, 336 U.S. 106, 112, 93 L. Ed. 533, 69 S. Ct. 463 (1949) (Jackson, J., concurring) ("There is no more effective practical guaranty against arbitrary and unreasonable government than to require that the principles of law which officials would impose upon a minority must be imposed generally").

[*588] Legal standards need not be precise in order to satisfy this constitutional concern. See Haslip, supra, at 20 (comparing punitive damages standards to such legal standards as "reasonable care," "due diligence," and "best interests of the child") (internal quotation marks omitted). But they must offer some kind of constraint upon a jury or court's discretion, and thus protection against purely arbitrary behavior. The standards the Alabama courts applied here are vague and open ended to the point where they risk arbitrary results. In my view, although the vagueness of those standards does not, by itself, violate due process, see Haslip, supra, it does invite the kind of scrutiny the Court has given the particular verdict before us. See id., at 18 ("Concerns of . . . adequate guidance from the court when the case is tried to a jury properly enter into the constitutional calculus"); TXO, supra, at 475 ("It cannot be denied that the lack of clear guidance heightens the risk that arbitrariness, passion, or bias will replace dispassionate deliberation as the basis for the jury's verdict") (O'CONNOR, J., dissenting). This is because the standards, as the Alabama Supreme Court authoritatively interpreted them here, provided no significant constraints or protection against arbitrary results.

First, the Alabama statute that permits punitive damages does not itself contain a standard that readily distinguishes between conduct warranting very small, and conduct warranting very large, punitive damages awards. That statute permits punitive damages in cases of "oppression, fraud, wantonness, or malice." Ala. Code § 6-11-20(a) (1993). But the statute goes on to define those terms broadly, to encompass far more than the egregious conduct that those terms, at first reading, might seem to imply. An intentional misrepresentation, made through a statement or [835] silence, can easily amount to "fraud" sufficient to warrant punitive damages. See § 6-11-20(b)(1) ("Fraud" includes "intentional . . . concealment of a material fact the concealing party had a [*589] duty to disclose, which was gross, oppressive, or malicious and committed with the intention . . . of thereby depriving a person or entity of property") (emphasis added); § 6-11-20(b)(2) ("Malice" includes any "wrongful act without just cause or excuse . . . with an intent to injure the . . . property of another") (emphasis added); § 6-11-20(b)(5) ("Oppression" includes "subjecting a person to . . . unjust hardship in conscious disregard of that person's rights"). The statute thereby authorizes punitive damages for the most [1606] serious kinds of misrepresentations, say, tricking the elderly out of their life savings, for much less serious conduct, such as the failure to disclose repainting a car, at issue here, and for a vast range of conduct in between.

REV_00263453

Second, the Alabama courts, in this case, have applied the "factors" intended to constrain punitive damages awards in a way that belies that purpose. Green Oil Co. v. Hornsby, 539 So. 2d 218 (Ala. 1989), sets forth seven factors that appellate courts use to determine whether or not a jury award was "grossly excessive" and which, in principle, might make up for the lack of significant constraint in the statute. But, as the Alabama courts have authoritatively interpreted them, and as their application in this case illustrates, they impose little actual constraint.

(a) Green Oil requires that a punitive damages award "bear a reasonable relationship to the harm that is likely to occur from the defendant's conduct as well as to the harm that actually has occurred." Id., at 223. But this standard does little to guide a determination of what counts as a "reasonable" relationship, as this case illustrates. The record evidence of past, present, or likely future harm consists of (a) $ 4,000 of harm to Dr. Gore's BMW; (b) 13 other similar Alabama instances; and (c) references to about 1,000 similar instances in other States. The Alabama Supreme Court, disregarding BMW's failure to make relevant objection to the out-of-state instances at trial (as was the court's right), held that the last mentioned, out-of-state instances did not [*590] count as relevant harm. It went on to find "a reasonable relationship" between the harm and the $ 2 million punitive damages award without "considering those acts that occurred in other jurisdictions." 646 So. 2d 619, 628 (1995) (emphasis added). For reasons explored by the majority in greater depth, see ante, at 574-586, the relationship between this award and the underlying conduct seems well beyond the bounds of the "reasonable." To find a "reasonable relationship" between purely economic harm totaling $ 56,000, without significant evidence of future repetition, and a punitive award of $ 2 million is to empty the "reasonable relationship" test of meaningful content. As thus construed, it does not set forth a legal standard that could have significantly constrained the discretion of Alabama factfinders.

(b) Green Oil's second factor is the "degree of reprehensibility" of the defendant's conduct. Green Oil, supra, at 223. Like the "reasonable relationship" test, this factor provides little guidance on how to relate culpability to the size of an award. The Alabama court, in considering this factor, found "reprehensible" that BMW [836] followed a conscious policy of not disclosing repairs to new cars when the cost of repairs amounted to less than 3% of the car's value. Of course, any conscious policy of not disclosing a repair -- where one knows the nondisclosure might cost the customer resale value -- is "reprehensible" to some degree. But, for the reasons discussed by the majority, ante, at 575-580, I do not see how the Alabama courts could find conduct that (they assumed) caused $ 56,000 of relevant economic harm especially or unusually reprehensible enough to warrant $ 2 million in punitive damages, or a significant portion of that award. To find to the contrary, as the Alabama courts did, is not simply unreasonable; it is to make "reprehensibility" a concept without constraining force, i. e., to deprive the concept of its constraining power to protect against serious and capricious deprivations.

[*591] (c) Green Oil's third factor requires "punitive damages" to "remove the profit" of the illegal activity and "be in excess of the profit, so that the defendant recognizes a loss." Green Oil, 539 So. 2d at 223. This factor has the ability to limit awards to a fixed, rational amount. But as applied, that concept's potential was not realized, for the court did not limit the award to anywhere near the $ 56,000 in profits evidenced in the record. Given the record's description of the conduct and its prevalence, this factor could not justify much of the $ 2 million award.

REV_00263454

(d) Green Oil's fourth factor is the "financial position" of the defendant. Ibid. Since a fixed dollar award will punish a poor person more than a wealthy one, one can understand the relevance of this factor to the State's [1607] interest in retribution (though not necessarily to its interest in deterrence, given the more distant relation between a defendant's wealth and its responses to economic incentives). See TXO, 509 U.S. at 462, and n. 28 (plurality opinion); id., at 469 (KENNEDY, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment); Haslip, 499 U.S. at 21-22; Browning-Ferris Industries of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 300, 106 L. Ed. 2d 219, 109 S. Ct. 2909 (1989) (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). This factor, however, is not necessarily intended to act as a significant constraint on punitive awards. Rather, it provides an open-ended basis for inflating awards when the defendant is wealthy, as this case may illustrate. That does not make its use unlawful or inappropriate; it simply means that this factor cannot make up for the failure of other factors, such as "reprehensibility," to constrain significantly an award that purports to punish a defendant's conduct.

(e) Green Oil's fifth factor is the "costs of litigation" and the State's desire "to encourage plaintiffs to bring wrongdoers to trial." 539 So. 2d at 223. This standard provides meaningful constraint to the extent that the enhancement it authorized is linked to a fixed, ascertainable amount approximating actual costs, even when defined generously to reflect [*592] the contingent nature of plaintiffs' victories. But as this case shows, the factor cannot operate as a constraint when an award much in excess of costs is approved for other reasons. An additional aspect of the standard -- the need to "encourage plaintiffs to bring wrongdoers to trial" -- is a factor that does not constrain, [837] but enhances, discretionary power -- especially when unsupported by evidence of a special need to encourage litigation (which the Alabama courts here did not mention).

(f) Green Oil's sixth factor is whether or not "criminal sanctions have been imposed on the defendant for his conduct." Ibid. This factor did not apply here.

(g) Green Oil's seventh factor requires that "other civil actions" filed "against the same defendant, based on the same conduct," be considered in mitigation. Id., at 224. That factor did not apply here.

Thus, the first, second, and third Green Oil factors, in principle, might sometimes act as constraints on arbitrary behavior. But as the Alabama courts interpreted those standards in this case, even taking those three factors together, they could not have significantly constrained the court system's ability to impose "grossly excessive" awards.

Third, the state courts neither referred to, nor made any effort to find, nor enunciated any other standard that either directly, or indirectly as background, might have supplied the constraining legal force that the statute and Green Oil standards (as interpreted here) lack. Dr. Gore did argue to the jury an economic theory based on the need to offset the totality of the harm that the defendant's conduct caused. Some theory of that general kind might have provided a significant constraint on arbitrary awards (at least where confined to the relevant harm-causing conduct, see ante, at 570-574). Some economists, for example, have argued for a standard that would deter illegal activity causing solely economic harm through the use of punitive damages awards that, as a whole, would take from a wrongdoer the total cost of the [*593] harm caused. See, e. g., S. Shavell, Economic Analysis of Accident Law 162 (1987) ("If liability equals losses caused multiplied by . . . the inverse of the probability of suit, injurers will act optimally under liability rules despite the chance that they will escape suit"); Cooter, Punitive Damages for Deterrence: When and How Much, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 1143, 1146-1148 (1989). My understanding of the intuitive essence of some of those theories, which I put in crude form (leaving out various qualifications), is that they could permit juries to calculate punitive damages by making a rough estimate of global harm, dividing that estimate by a similarly rough estimate of the number of successful lawsuits that would likely be brought, and adding generous attorney's fees and other costs. Smaller damages would not sufficiently discourage firms from engaging in the harmful conduct, while larger damages would "over-deter" by leading potential defendants [1608] to spend more to prevent the activity that causes the economic harm, say, through employee training, than the cost of the harm itself. See Galligan, Augmented Awards: The Efficient Evolution of Punitive Damages, 51 La. L. Rev. 3, 17-20, 28-30 (1990). Larger damages might also "double count" by including in the punitive damages award some of the compensatory, or punitive, damages that subsequent plaintiffs would also recover.

REV_00263455

The record before us, however, contains nothing suggesting that the Alabama Supreme Court, when determining the allowable award, applied any "economic" theory that might explain the $ 2 million recovery. [838] Cf. Browning-Ferris, supra, at 300 (noting that the Constitution "does not incorporate the views of the Law and Economics School," nor does it "'require the States to subscribe to any particular economic theory'") (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (quoting CTS Corp. v. Dynamics Corp. of America, 481 U.S. 69, 92, 95 L. Ed. 2d 67, 107 S. Ct. 1637 (1987)). And courts properly tend to judge the rationality of judicial actions in terms of the reasons that were given, and the facts that were before the court, cf. TXO, [*594] supra, at 468 (KENNEDY, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment), not those that might have been given on the basis of some conceivable set of facts (unlike the rationality of economic statutes enacted by legislatures subject to the public's control through the ballot box, see, e. g., FCC v. Beach Communications, Inc., 508 U.S. 307, 315, 124 L. Ed. 2d 211, 113 S. Ct. 2096 (1993)). Therefore, reference to a constraining "economic" theory, which might have counseled more deferential review by this Court, is lacking in this case.

Fourth, I cannot find any community understanding or historic practice that this award might exemplify and which, therefore, would provide background standards constraining arbitrary behavior and excessive awards. A punitive damages award of $ 2 million for intentional misrepresentation causing $ 56,000 of harm is extraordinary by historical standards, and, as far as I am aware, finds no analogue until relatively recent times. Amici for Dr. Gore attempt to show that this is not true, pointing to various historical cases which, according to their calculations, represented roughly equivalent punitive awards for similarly culpable conduct. See Brief for James D. A. Boyle et al. as Amici Curiae 4-5 (hereinafter Legal Historians' Brief). Among others, they cite Wilkes v. Wood, Lofft 1, 98 Eng. Rep. 489 (C. P. 1763) (# 1,000 said to be equivalent of $ 1.5 million, for warrantless search of papers); Huckle v. Money, 2 Wills. 205, 95 Eng. Rep. 768 (K. B. 1763) (# 300, said to be $ 450,000, for 6-hour false imprisonment); Hewlett v. Cruchley, 5 Taunt. 277, 128 Eng. Rep. 696 (C. P. 1813) (# 2,000, said to be $ 680,000, for malicious prosecution); Merest v. Harvey, 5 Taunt. 442, 128 Eng. Rep. 761 (C. P. 1814) (# 500, said to be $ 165,000, for poaching). But amici apparently base their conversions on a mathematical assumption, namely, that inflation has progressed at a constant 3% rate of inflation. See Legal Historians' Brief 4. In fact, consistent, cumulative inflation is a modern phenomenon. See McCusker, How Much Is That in Real Money? A Historical Price Index for Use as a Deflator [*595] of Money Values in the Economy of the United States, 101 Proceedings of American Antiquarian Society 297, 310, 323-332 (1992). Estimates based on historical rates of valuation, while highly approximate, suggest that the ancient extraordinary awards are small compared to the $ 2 million here at issue, or other modern punitive damages figures. See Appendix to this opinion, infra, at 597-598 (suggesting that the modern equivalent of the awards in the above cases is something like $ 150,000, $ 45,000, $ 100,000, and $ 25,000, respectively). And, as the majority opinion makes clear, the record contains nothing to suggest that the extraordinary size of the award in this case is explained by the extraordinary wrongfulness of the defendant's behavior, measured [839] by historical or community standards, rather than arbitrariness or caprice.

Fifth, there are no other legislative enactments here that classify awards and impose quantitative limits that would significantly cabin the fairly unbounded discretion created by the absence of constraining legal standards. Cf., e. g., Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code

REV_00263456

[1609] Ann. § 41.008 (Supp. 1996) (punitive damages generally limited to greater of double damages, or $ 200,000, except cap does not apply to suits arising from certain serious criminal acts enumerated in the statute); Conn. Gen. Stat. § 52-240b (1995) (punitive damages may not exceed double compensatory damages in product liability cases); Fla. Stat. § 768.73(1) (Supp. 1993) (punitive damages in certain actions limited to treble compensatory damages); Ga. Code Ann. § 51-12-5.1(g) (Supp. 1995) ($ 250,000 cap in certain actions).

The upshot is that the rules that purport to channel discretion in this kind of case, here did not do so in fact. That means that the award in this case was both (a) the product of a system of standards that did not significantly constrain a court's, and hence a jury's, discretion in making that award; and (b) grossly excessive in light of the State's legitimate punitive damages objectives.

[*596] The first of these reasons has special importance where courts review a jury-determined punitive damages award. That is because one cannot expect to direct jurors like legislators through the ballot box; nor can one expect those jurors to interpret law like judges, who work within a discipline and hierarchical organization that normally promotes roughly uniform interpretation and application of the law. Yet here Alabama expects jurors to act, at least a little, like legislators or judges, for it permits them, to a certain extent, to create public policy and to apply that policy, not to compensate a victim, but to achieve a policy-related objective outside the confines of the particular case.

To the extent that neither clear legal principles nor fairly obvious historical or community-based standards (defining, say, especially egregious behavior) significantly constrain punitive damages awards, is there not a substantial risk of outcomes so arbitrary that they become difficult to square with the Constitution's assurance, to every citizen, of the law's protection? The standards here, as authoritatively interpreted, in my view, make this threat real and not theoretical. And, in these unusual circumstances, where legal standards offer virtually no constraint, I believe that this lack of constraining standards warrants this Court's detailed examination of the award.

The second reason -- the severe disproportionality between the award and the legitimate punitive damages objectives -- reflects a judgment about a matter of degree. I recognize that it is often difficult to determine just when a punitive award exceeds an amount reasonably related to a State's legitimate interests, or when that excess is so great as to amount to a matter of constitutional concern. Yet whatever the difficulties of drawing a precise line, once we examine the award in this case, it is not difficult to say that this award lies on the line's far side. The severe lack of proportionality between the size of the award and the underlying punitive damages objectives shows that the award falls into the category [*597] of "gross excessiveness" set forth in this Court's prior cases. [840]

These two reasons taken together overcome what would otherwise amount to a "strong presumption of validity." TXO, 509 U.S. at 457. And, for those two reasons, I conclude that the award in this unusual case violates the basic guarantee of nonarbitrary governmental behavior that the Due Process Clause provides.

APPENDIX TO OPINION OF BREYER, J.

Although I recognize that all estimates of historic rates of inflation are subject to dispute, including, I assume, the sources below, those sources suggest that the value of the 18th and 19th century judgments cited by amici is much less than the figures amici arrived at under their presumption of a constant 3% rate of inflation.

In 1763, # 1 (Eng.) was worth # 1.73 Pennsylvania currency. See U.S. Bureau of the Census, Historical Statistics of the United States: Colonial Times to 1970, Series Z -- 585, p.

REV_00263457

1198 (Bicentennial ed. 1975). For the period 1766-1772, # 1 (Penn.) was worth $ 45.99 (U.S. 1991). See McCusker, How Much Is That in Real Money? A Historical Price Index for Use as a Deflator of Money Values in the Economy of the United States, 101 American Antiquarian Society 297, 333 [1610] (1992). Thus, # 1 (Eng. 1763) is worth about $ 79.56 (U.S. 1991). Accounting for the 12% inflation of the U.S. dollar between 1991 and 1995 (when amici filed their brief), see Economic Indicators, 104th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 23 (Feb. 1996), # 1 (Eng. 1763) is worth about $ 89.11 (U.S. 1995).

Calculated another way, # 1 (Eng. 1763) is worth about # 72.84 (Eng. 1991). See McCusker, supra, at 312, 342, 350. And # 1 (Eng. 1991) is worth $ 1.77 (U.S. 1991). See 78 Fed. Reserve Bulletin A68 (Feb. 1992). Thus, # 1 (Eng. 1763) amounts to about $ 128.93 (U.S. 1991). Again, accounting for inflation between 1991 and 1995, this amounts to about $ 144.40 (U.S. 1995).

[*598] Thus, the above sources suggest that the # 1,000 award in Wilkes in 1763 roughly amounts to between $ 89,110 and $ 144,440 today, not $ 1.5 million. And the # 300 award in Huckle that same year would seem to be worth between $ 26,733 and $ 43,320 today, not $ 450,000.

For the period of the Hewlett and Merest decisions, # 1 (Eng. 1813) is worth about # 25.3 (Eng. 1991). See McCusker, supra, at 344, 350. Using the 1991 exchange rate, # 1 (Eng. 1813) is worth about $ 44.78 (U.S. 1991). Accounting for inflation between 1991 and 1995, this amounts to about $ 50.16 (U.S. 1995).

Thus, the # 2,000 and # 500 awards in Hewlett and Merest would seem to be closer to $ 100,320 and $ 25,080, respectively, than to amici's estimates of $ 680,000 and $ 165,000.

DISSENTBY: SCALIA; GINSBURG

DISSENT: JUSTICE SCALIA, with whom JUSTICE THOMAS joins, dissenting.

Today we see the latest manifestation of this Court's recent and increasingly insistent "concern about punitive damages that 'run wild.'" Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 18, 113 L. Ed. 2d 1, 111 S. Ct. 1032 (1991). Since the Constitution does not make that concern any of our business, the Court's activities in this area are an unjustified incursion into the province of state governments.

In earlier cases that were the prelude [841] to this decision, I set forth my view that a state trial procedure that commits the decision whether to impose punitive damages, and the amount, to the discretion of the jury, subject to some judicial review for "reasonableness," furnishes a defendant with all the process that is "due." See TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 470, 125 L. Ed. 2d 366, 113 S. Ct. 2711 (1993) (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment); Haslip, supra, at 25-28 (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment); cf. Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415, 435-436, 129 L. Ed. 2d 336, 114 S. Ct. 2331 (1994) (SCALIA, J., concurring). I do not regard the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause as a secret repository of substantive guarantees against [*599] "unfairness" -- neither the unfairness of an excessive civil compensatory award, nor the unfairness of an "unreasonable" punitive award. What the Fourteenth Amendment's procedural guarantee assures is an opportunity to contest the reasonableness of a damages judgment in state court; but there is no federal guarantee a damages award actually be reasonable. See TXO, supra, at 471 (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment).

This view, which adheres to the text of the Due Process Clause, has not prevailed in our punitive damages cases. See TXO, 509 U.S. at 453-462 (plurality opinion); id., at 478-481 (O'CONNOR, J., dissenting); Haslip, supra, at 18. When, however, a constitutional doctrine adopted by the Court is not only mistaken but also insusceptible of principled application, I do not feel bound to give it stare decisis effect -- indeed, I do not feel justified in doing so. See, e. g., Witte v. United States, 515 U.S. 389, 406, 132 L. Ed. 2d 351, 115 S. Ct. 2199 (1995) (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment); Walton v. Arizona, 497 U.S. 639, 673, 111 L. Ed. 2d 511, 110 S. Ct. 3047 (1990) (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part). Our punitive damages jurisprudence compels such a response. The Constitution provides no warrant for federalizing yet another aspect of our Nation's legal culture (no matter [1611] how much in need of correction it may be), and the application of the Court's new rule of constitutional law is constrained by no principle other than the Justices' subjective assessment of the "reasonableness" of the award in relation to the conduct for which it was assessed.

REV_00263458

Because today's judgment represents the first instance of this Court's invalidation of a state-court punitive assessment as simply unreasonably large, I think it a proper occasion to discuss these points at some length.

I

The most significant aspects of today's decision -- the identification of a "substantive due process" right against a "grossly excessive" award, and the concomitant assumption [*600] of ultimate authority to decide anew a matter of "reasonableness" resolved in lower court proceedings -- are of course not new. Haslip and TXO revived the notion, moribund since its appearance in the first years of this century, that the measure of civil punishment poses a question of constitutional dimension to be answered by this Court. Neither of those cases, however, nor any of the precedents upon which they relied, actually took the step of declaring a [842] punitive award unconstitutional simply because it was "too big."

At the time of adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, it was well understood that punitive damages represent the assessment by the jury, as the voice of the community, of the measure of punishment the defendant deserved. See, e. g., Barry v. Edmunds, 116 U.S. 550, 565, 29 L. Ed. 729, 6 S. Ct. 501 (1886); Missouri Pacific R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U.S. 512, 521, 29 L. Ed. 463, 6 S. Ct. 110 (1885); Day v. Woodworth, 54 U.S. 363, 13 HOW 363, 371, 14 L. Ed. 181 (1852). See generally Haslip, supra, at 25-27 (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment). Today's decision, though dressed up as a legal opinion, is really no more than a disagreement with the community's sense of indignation or outrage expressed in the punitive award of the Alabama jury, as reduced by the State Supreme Court. It reflects not merely, as the concurrence candidly acknowledges, "a judgment about a matter of degree," ante, at 596; but a judgment about the appropriate degree of indignation or outrage, which is hardly an analytical determination.

There is no precedential warrant for giving our judgment priority over the judgment of state courts and juries on this matter. The only support for the Court's position is to be found in a handful of errant federal cases, bunched within a few years of one other, which invented the notion that an unfairly severe civil sanction amounts to a violation of constitutional liberties. These were the decisions upon which the TXO plurality relied in pronouncing that the Due Process Clause "imposes substantive limits 'beyond which penalties may not go,'" 509 U.S. at 454 (quoting Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Seegers, 207 U.S. 73, 78, 52 L. Ed. 108, 28 S. Ct. 28 (1907)); see also 509 U.S., [*601] at 478-481 (O'CONNOR, J., dissenting); Haslip, supra, at 18. Although they are our precedents, they are themselves too shallowly rooted to justify the Court's recent undertaking. The only case relied upon in which the Court actually invalidated a civil sanction does not even support constitutional review for excessiveness, since it really concerned the validity, as a matter of procedural due process, of state legislation that imposed a significant penalty on a common carrier which lacked the means of determining the legality of its actions before the penalty was imposed. See Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Co. v. Danaher, 238 U.S. 482, 489-491, 59 L. Ed. 1419, 35 S. Ct. 886 (1915). The amount of the penalty was not a subject of independent scrutiny. As for the remaining cases, while the opinions do consider arguments that statutory penalties can, by

REV_00263459

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

Perhaps the most important indicium of the reasonableness of a punitive damages award is the degree of reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct. Exemplary damages imposed on a defendant should reflect the enormity of his offense. Punitive awards may not be wholly disproportioned to the offense.

Torts > Business & Employment Torts > Deceit & Fraud

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

Some wrongs are more blameworthy than others. Nonviolent crimes are less serious than crimes marked by violence or the threat of violence. Similarly, trickery and deceit are more reprehensible than negligence.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

Infliction of economic injury, especially when done intentionally through affirmative acts of misconduct or when the target is financially vulnerable, can warrant a substantial penalty. But this observation does not convert all acts that cause economic harm into torts that are sufficiently reprehensible to justify a significant sanction in addition to compensatory damages.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

Evidence that a defendant has repeatedly engaged in prohibited conduct while knowing or suspecting that it was unlawful would provide relevant support for an argument that strong medicine is required to cure the defendant's disrespect for the law.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive Acts & Practices

The Alabama Supreme Court has held that a car may be considered "new" as a matter of law even if its finish contains minor cosmetic flaws.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

Perhaps the most commonly cited indicium of an unreasonable or excessive punitive damages award is its ratio to the actual harm inflicted on the plaintiff. The principle that exemplary damages must bear a "reasonable relationship" to compensatory damages has a long pedigree.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

The proper inquiry in determining if a punitive damage award is excessive is whether there is a reasonable relationship between the punitive damages award and the harm likely to result from the defendant's conduct as well as the harm that actually has occurred.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

Courts have consistently rejected the notion that the constitutional line determining excess in an award of punitive damages is marked by a simple mathematical formula, even one that compares actual and potential damages to the punitive award. Indeed, low awards of compensatory damages may properly support a higher ratio than high compensatory awards, if, for example, a particularly egregious act has resulted in only a small amount of economic damages. A higher ratio may also be justified in cases in which the injury is hard to detect or the monetary value of noneconomic harm might have been difficult to determine.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

A reviewing court engaged in determining whether an award of punitive damages is excessive should accord substantial deference to legislative judgments concerning appropriate sanctions for the conduct at issue.

REV_00263433

reason of their excessiveness, violate due process, not a single one of these judgments invalidates a damages award. See Seaboard, supra, at 78-79; Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas (No. 1), 212 U.S. 86, 111-112, 53 L. Ed. 417, 29 S. Ct. 220 (1909); Standard Oil Co. of Ind. v. Missouri, 224 U.S. 270, 286, 290, 56 L. Ed. 760, 32 S. Ct. 406 (1912); St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Williams, 251 U.S. 63, 66-67, [1612] 64 L. Ed. 139, 40 S. Ct. 71 (1919).

More importantly, this latter group of cases -- which again are the sole precedential foundation put forward for the rule of constitutional law espoused by today's Court -- simply fabricated the "substantive due process" right at issue. Seaboard assigned no precedent to its bald assertion [843] that the Constitution imposes "limits beyond which penalties may not go," 207 U.S. at 78. Waters-Pierce cited only Coffey v. County of Harlan, 204 U.S. 659, 51 L. Ed. 666, 27 S. Ct. 305 (1907), a case which inquired into the constitutionality of state procedure, id., at 662-663. Standard Oil simply cited Waters-Pierce, and St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. offered in addition to these cases only Collins v. Johnston, 237 U.S. 502, 59 L. Ed. 1071, 35 S. Ct. 649 (1915), which said nothing to support the notion of a "substantive due process" right against excessive civil penalties, but to the contrary asserted that the prescribing and imposing of criminal punishment were "functions peculiarly belonging to the several States," [*602] id., at 509-510. Thus, the only authority for the Court's position is simply not authoritative. These cases fall far short of what is needed to supplant this country's longstanding practice regarding exemplary awards, see, e. g., Haslip, 499 U.S. at 15-18; id., at 25-28 (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment).

II

One might understand the Court's eagerness to enter this field, rather than leave it with the state legislatures, if it had something useful to say. In fact, however, its opinion provides virtually no guidance to legislatures, and to state and federal courts, as to what a "constitutionally proper" level of punitive damages might be.

We are instructed at the outset of Part II of the Court's opinion -- the beginning of its substantive analysis -- that "the federal excessiveness inquiry . . . begins with an identification of the state interests that a punitive award is designed to serve." Ante, at 568. On first reading this, one is faced with the prospect that federal punitive damages law (the new field created by today's decision) will be beset by the sort of "interest analysis" that has laid waste the formerly comprehensible field of conflict of laws. The thought that each assessment of punitive damages, as to each offense, must be examined to determine the precise "state interests" pursued, is most unsettling. Moreover, if those "interests" are the most fundamental determinant of an award, one would think that due process would require the assessing jury to be instructed about them.

It appears, however (and I certainly hope), that all this is a false alarm. As Part II of the Court's opinion unfolds, it turns out to be directed, not to the question "How much punishment is too much?" but rather to the question "Which acts can be punished?" "Alabama does not have the power," the Court says, "to punish BMW for conduct that was lawful where it occurred and that had no impact on Alabama or its residents." Ante, at 572-573. That may be true, though [*603] only in the narrow sense that a person cannot be held liable to be punished on the basis of a lawful act. But if a person has been held subject to punishment because he committed an *un*lawful act, the degree of his punishment assuredly can be increased on the basis of any other conduct of his that displays his wickedness, unlawful or not. Criminal sentences can be computed, we have said, on the basis of "information concerning every aspect of a defendant's life," Williams v. New York, [844] 337 U.S. 241, 250-252, 93 L. Ed. 1337, 69 S. Ct. 1079 (1949). The Court at one point seems to acknowledge this, observing that, although a sentencing court "[cannot] properly punish lawful conduct," it may in assessing the penalty "consider . . . lawful conduct that bears on the defendant's character." Ante, at 573, n. 19. That concession is quite incompatible, however, with the later assertion that, since "neither the jury nor the trial court was presented with evidence that any of BMW's out-of-state conduct was unlawful," the Alabama Supreme Court "therefore properly eschewed reliance on BMW's out-of-state conduct, . . . and based its remitted award solely on conduct that occurred within Alabama." Ante, at 573-574. Why could the Supreme Court of Alabama not consider lawful (but disreputable) conduct, both inside [1613] and outside Alabama, for the purpose of assessing just how bad an actor BMW was?

REV_00263460

The Court follows up its statement that "Alabama does not have the power . . . to punish BMW for conduct that was lawful where it occurred" with the statement: "Nor may Alabama impose sanctions on BMW in order to deter conduct that is lawful in other jurisdictions." Ante, at 572-573. The Court provides us no citation of authority to support this proposition -- other than the barely analogous cases cited earlier in the opinion, see ante, at 571-572 -- and I know of none.

These significant issues pronounced upon by the Court are not remotely presented for resolution in the present case. There is no basis for believing that Alabama has sought to control conduct elsewhere. The statutes at issue merely [*604] permit civil juries to treat conduct such as petitioner's as fraud, and authorize an award of appropriate punitive damages in the event the fraud is found to be "gross, oppressive, or malicious," Ala. Code § 6-11-20(b)(1) (1993). To be sure, respondent did invite the jury to consider out-of-state conduct in its calculation of damages, but any increase in the jury's initial award based on that consideration is not a component of the remitted judgment before us. As the Court several times recognizes, in computing the amount of the remitted award the Alabama Supreme Court -- whether it was constitutionally required to or not -- "expressly disclaimed any reliance on acts that occurred in other jurisdictions." Ante, at 567 (internal quotation marks omitted); see also ante, at 573-574. * Thus, the only question presented by this case is whether that award, limited to petitioner's Alabama conduct and viewed in light of the factors identified as properly informing the inquiry, is excessive. The Court's sweeping (and largely unsupported) statements regarding the relationship of punitive awards [845] to lawful or unlawful out-of-state conduct are the purest dicta.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

* The Alabama Supreme Court said:

"We must conclude that the award of punitive damages was based in large part on conduct that happened in other jurisdictions . . . . Although evidence of similar acts in other jurisdictions is admissible as to the issue of 'pattern and practice' of such acts, . . . this jury could not use the number of similar acts that a defendant has committed in other jurisdictions as a multiplier when determining the dollar amount of a punitive damages award. Such evidence may not be considered in setting the size of the civil penalty, because neither the jury nor the trial court had evidence before it showing in which states the conduct was wrongful." 646 So. 2d 619, 627 (1994).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

III

In Part III of its opinion, the Court identifies "three guideposts" that lead it to the conclusion that the award in this case is excessive: degree of reprehensibility, ratio between punitive award and plaintiff's actual harm, and legislative [*605] sanctions provided for comparable misconduct. Ante, at 574-585. The legal significance of these "guideposts" is nowhere explored, but their necessary effect is to establish federal standards governing the hitherto exclusively state law of damages. Apparently (though it is by no means clear) all three federal "guideposts" can be overridden if "necessary to deter future misconduct," ante, at 584 -- a loophole that will encourage state reviewing courts to uphold awards as necessary for the "adequat[e] protect[ion]" of state consumers, ibid. By effectively requiring state reviewing courts to concoct rationalizations -- whether within the "guideposts" or through the loophole -- to justify the intuitive punitive reactions of state juries, the Court accords neither category of institution the respect it deserves.

REV_00263461

Of course it will not be easy for the States to comply with this new federal law of damages, no matter how willing they are to do so. In truth, the "guideposts" mark a road to nowhere; they provide no real guidance at all. As to "degree of reprehensibility" of the defendant's conduct, we learn that "'nonviolent crimes are less serious than crimes marked by violence or the threat of violence,'" ante, at 576 (quoting Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277, 292-293, 77 L. Ed. 2d 637, 103 S. Ct. 3001 (1983)), and that "'trickery and deceit'" are "more reprehensible than negligence," ante, at 576. As to the ratio of punitive to compensatory damages, we are told that a "'general concer[n] of reasonableness . . . enter[s] into the constitutional [1614] calculus,'" ante, at 583 (quoting TXO, 509 U.S. at 458) -- though even "a breathtaking 500 to 1" will not necessarily do anything more than "'raise a suspicious judicial eyebrow,'" ante, at 583 (quoting TXO, supra, at 481 (O'CONNOR, J., dissenting), an opinion which, when confronted with that "breathtaking" ratio, approved it). And as to legislative sanctions provided for comparable misconduct, they should be accorded "'substantial deference,'" ante, at 583 (quoting Browning-Ferris Industries of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 301, 106 L. Ed. 2d 219, 109 S. Ct. 2909 (1989) (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in part and dissenting [*606] in part)). One expects the Court to conclude: "To thine own self be true."

These criss-crossing platitudes yield no real answers in no real cases. And it must be noted that the Court nowhere says that these three "guideposts" are the only guideposts; indeed, it makes very clear that they are not -- explaining away the earlier opinions that do not really follow these "guideposts" on the basis of additional factors, thereby "reiterating our rejection of a categorical approach." Ante, at 582. In other words, even these utter platitudes, if they should ever happen to produce an answer, may be overridden by other unnamed considerations. The Court has constructed a framework that does not [846] genuinely constrain, that does not inform state legislatures and lower courts -- that does nothing at all except confer an artificial air of doctrinal analysis upon its essentially ad hoc determination that this particular award of punitive damages was not "fair."

The Court distinguishes today's result from Haslip and TXO partly on the ground that "the record in this case discloses no deliberate false statements, acts of affirmative misconduct, or concealment of evidence of improper motive, such as were present in Haslip and TXO." Ante, at 579. This seemingly rejects the findings necessarily made by the jury -- that petitioner had committed a fraud that was "gross, oppressive, or malicious," Ala. Code § 6-11-20(b)(1) (1993). Perhaps that rejection is intentional; the Court does not say.

The relationship between judicial application of the new "guideposts" and jury findings poses a real problem for the Court, since as a matter of logic there is no more justification for ignoring the jury's determination as to how reprehensible petitioner's conduct was (i. e., how much it deserves to be punished), than there is for ignoring its determination that it was reprehensible at all (i. e., that the wrong was willful and punitive damages are therefore recoverable). That the issue has been framed in terms of a constitutional right against unreasonably excessive awards should not obscure [*607] the fact that the logical and necessary consequence of the Court's approach is the recognition of a constitutional right against unreasonably imposed awards as well. The elevation of "fairness" in punishment to a principle of "substantive due process" means that every punitive award unreasonably imposed is unconstitutional; such an award is by definition excessive, since it attaches a penalty to conduct undeserving of punishment. Indeed, if the Court is correct, it must be that every claim that a state jury's award of compensatory damages is "unreasonable" (because not supported by the evidence) amounts to an assertion of constitutional injury. See TXO, supra, at 471 (SCALIA, J. concurring in judgment). And the same would be true for determinations of liability. By today's logic, every dispute as to evidentiary sufficiency in a state civil suit poses a question of constitutional moment, subject to review in this Court. That is a stupefying proposition.

REV_00263462

For the foregoing reasons, I respectfully dissent.

JUSTICE GINSBURG, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE joins, dissenting.

The Court, I am convinced, unnecessarily and unwisely ventures into territory traditionally within the States' domain, and does so in the face of reform measures recently adopted or currently under consideration in legislative arenas. The Alabama Supreme Court, in this case, endeavored to follow this Court's prior instructions; and, more recently, Alabama's highest court has installed further [1615] controls on awards of punitive damages (see infra, at 613-614, n. 6). I would therefore leave the state court's judgment undisturbed, and resist unnecessary intrusion into an area dominantly of state concern.

I

The respect due the Alabama Supreme Court requires that we strip [847] from this case a false issue: No impermissible "extraterritoriality" infects the judgment before us; the excessiveness [*608] of the award is the sole issue genuinely presented. The Court ultimately so recognizes, see ante, at 573-574, but further clarification is in order.

Dr. Gore's experience was not unprecedented among customers who bought BMW vehicles sold as flawless and brand-new. In addition to his own encounter, Gore showed, through paint repair orders introduced at trial, that on 983 other occasions since 1983, BMW had shipped new vehicles to dealers without disclosing paint repairs costing at least $ 300, Tr. 585-586; at least 14 of the repainted vehicles, the evidence also showed, were sold as new and undamaged to consumers in Alabama. 646 So. 2d 619, 623 (Ala. 1994). Sales nationwide, Alabama's Supreme Court said, were admissible "as to the issue of a 'pattern and practice' of such acts." Id., at 627. There was "no error," the court reiterated, "in the admission of the evidence that showed how pervasive the nondisclosure policy was and the intent behind BMW NA's adoption of it." Id., at 628. That determination comports with this Court's expositions. See TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 462, 125 L. Ed. 2d 366, 113 S. Ct. 2711, and n. 28 (1993) (characterizing as "well-settled" the admissibility of "evidence of [defendant's] alleged wrongdoing in other parts of the country" and of defendant's "wealth"); see also Brief for Petitioner 22 (recognizing that similar acts, out-of-state, traditionally have been considered relevant "for the limited purpose of determining that the conduct before the court was reprehensible because it was part of a pattern rather than an isolated incident").

Alabama's highest court next declared that the > "jury could not use the number of similar acts that a defendant has committed in other jurisdictions as a multiplier when determining the dollar amount of a punitive damages award. Such evidence may not be considered in setting the size of the civil penalty, because neither the jury nor the trial court had evidence before it showing in which states the conduct was wrongful." [*609] 646 So. 2d at 627 (emphasis in original) (footnote omitted).

Because the Alabama Supreme Court provided this clear statement of the State's law, the multiplier problem encountered in Gore's case is not likely to occur again. Now, as a matter of Alabama law, it is plainly impermissible to assess punitive damages by multiplication based on out-of-state events not shown to be unlawful. See, e. g., Independent Life and Accident Ins. Co. v. Harrington, 658 So. 2d 892, 902-903 (Ala. 1994) (under BMW v. Gore, trial court erred in relying on defendant insurance company's out-of-state insurance policies in determining harm caused by defendant's unlawful actions).

REV_00263463

No Alabama authority, it bears emphasis -- no statute, judicial decision, or trial judge instruction -- ever countenanced the jury's multiplication of the $ 4,000 diminution in value estimated for each refinished car by the number of such cars (approximately 1,000) shown to have been sold nationwide. The sole prompt to the jury to use nationwide sales as a multiplier came from Gore's lawyer during summation. App. 31, Tr. 812-813. Notably, counsel [848] for BMW failed to object to Gore's multiplication suggestion, even though BMW's counsel interrupted to make unrelated objections four other times during Gore's closing statement. Tr. 810-811, 854-855, 858, 870-871. Nor did BMW's counsel request a charge instructing the jury not to consider out-of-state sales in calculating the punitive damages award. See Record 513-529 (listing all charges requested by counsel).

Following the verdict, BMW's counsel challenged the admission of the paint repair orders, but not, alternately, the jury's apparent use of the orders in a multiplication exercise. Curiously, during postverdict argument, BMW's counsel urged that if the [1616] repair orders were indeed admissible, then Gore would have a "full right" to suggest a multiplier-based disgorgement. Tr. 932.

[*610] In brief, Gore's case is idiosyncratic. The jury's improper multiplication, tardily featured by petitioner, is unlikely to recur in Alabama and does not call for error correction by this Court.

Because the jury apparently (and erroneously) had used acts in other States as a multiplier to arrive at a $ 4 million sum for punitive damages, the Alabama Supreme Court itself determined "'the maximum amount that a properly functioning jury could have awarded.'" 646 So. 2d at 630 (Houston, J., concurring specially) (quoting Big B, Inc. v. Cottingham, 634 So. 2d 999, 1006 (Ala. 1993)). The per curiam opinion emphasized that in arriving at $ 2 million as "the amount of punitive damages to be awarded in this case, [the court did] not consider those acts that occurred in other jurisdictions." 646 So. 2d at 628 (emphasis in original). As this Court recognizes, the Alabama high court "properly eschewed reliance on BMW's out-of-state conduct and based its remitted award solely on conduct that occurred within Alabama." Ante, at 573-574 (citation omitted). In sum, the Alabama Supreme Court left standing the jury's decision that the facts warranted an award of punitive damages -- a determination not contested in this Court -- and the state court concluded that, considering only acts in Alabama, $ 2 million was "a constitutionally reasonable punitive damages award." 646 So. 2d at 629.

II

A

Alabama's Supreme Court reports that it "thoroughly and painstakingly" reviewed the jury's award, ibid., according to principles set out in its own pathmarking decisions and in this Court's opinions in TXO and Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 21, 113 L. Ed. 2d 1, 111 S. Ct. 1032 (1991). 646 So. 2d at 621. The Alabama court said it gave weight to several factors, including BMW's deliberate ("reprehensible") presentation of refinished cars as new and undamaged, without disclosing that the value of those cars had been reduced by an estimated [*611] 10%, n1 the financial position of the defendant, and the costs of litigation. Id., at 625-626. These standards, we previously held, "impos[e] a sufficiently definite and meaningful constraint on the discretion of Alabama factfinders in awarding punitive damages." Haslip, [849] 499 U.S. at 22; see also TXO, 509 U.S. at 462, n. 28. Alabama's highest court could have displayed its labor pains more visibly, n2 but its judgment is nonetheless entitled to a presumption of legitimacy. See Rowan v. Runnels, 46 U.S. 134, 5 HOW 134, 139, 12 L. Ed. 85 (1847) ("This court will always feel itself bound to respect the decisions of the State courts, and from the time they are made will regard them as conclusive in all cases upon the construction of their own constitution and laws.").

REV_00263464

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n1 According to trial testimony, in late May 1992, BMW began redirecting refinished cars out of Alabama and two other States. Tr. 964. The jury returned its verdict in favor of Gore on June 12, 1992. Five days later, BMW changed its national policy to one of full disclosure. Id., at 1026.

n2 See, e. g., Brief for Law and Economics Scholars et al. as Amici Curiae 6-28 (economic analysis demonstrates that Alabama Supreme Court's judgment was not unreasonable); W. Landes & R. Posner, Economic Structure of Tort Law 160-163 (1987) (economic model for assessing propriety of punitive damages in certain tort cases).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

We accept, of course, that Alabama's Supreme Court applied the State's own law correctly. Under that law, the State's objectives -- "punishment and deterrence" -- guide punitive damages awards. See Birmingham v. Benson, 631 So. 2d 902, 904 (Ala. 1994). Nor should we be quick to find a constitutional infirmity when the highest state court endeavored a corrective for one counsel's slip and the other's oversight -- counsel for plaintiff's excess in summation, unobjected to by counsel for defendant, see supra, at 609 -- and when the state court did so intending to follow the process approved in our Haslip and TXO decisions.

B

The Court finds Alabama's $ 2 million award not simply excessive, but grossly so, and therefore unconstitutional. [*612] The decision [1617] leads us further into territory traditionally within the States' domain, n3 and commits the Court, now and again, to correct "misapplication of a properly stated rule of law." But cf. this Court's Rule 10 ("A petition for a writ of certiorari is rarely granted when the asserted error consists of erroneous factual findings or the misapplication of a properly stated rule of law."). n4 The Court is not well equipped [*613] for this mission. Tellingly, the Court repeats that it brings to the task no "mathematical [850] formula," ante, at 582, no "categorical approach," ibid., no "bright line," ante, at 585. It has only a vague concept of substantive due process, a "raised eyebrow" test, see ante, at 583, as its ultimate guide. n5

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n3 See ante, at 568 ("In our federal system, States necessarily have considerable flexibility in determining the level of punitive damages that they will allow in different classes of cases and in any particular case."); Browning-Ferris Industries of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 278, 106 L. Ed. 2d 219, 109 S. Ct. 2909 (1989) (In any "lawsuit where state law provides the basis of decision, the propriety of an award of punitive damages for the conduct in question, and the factors the jury may consider in determining their amount, are questions of state law."); Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 464 U.S. 238, 255, 78 L. Ed. 2d 443, 104 S. Ct. 615 (1984) ("Punitive damages have long been a part of traditional state tort law.").

n4 Petitioner invites the Court to address the question of multiple punitive damages awards stemming from the same alleged misconduct. The Court does not take up the invitation, and rightly so, in my judgment, for this case does not present the issue. For three reasons, the question of multiple awards is hypothetical, not real, in Gore's case. First, the punitive damages award in favor of Gore is the only such award yet entered against BMW on account of its nondisclosure policy.

REV_00263465

Second, BMW did not raise the issue of multiple punitives below. Indeed, in its reply brief before the Alabama Supreme Court, BMW stated: "Gore confuses our point about fairness among plaintiffs. He treats this point as a premature 'multiple punitive damages' argument. But, contrary to Gore's contention, we are not asking this Court to hold, as a matter of law, that a 'constitutional violation occurs when a defendant is subjected to punitive damages in two separate cases.'" Reply Brief for Appellant in Nos. 1920324, 1920325 (Ala. Sup. Ct.), p. 48 (internal citations omitted).

Third, if BMW had already suffered a punitive damages judgment in connection with its nondisclosure policy, Alabama's highest court presumably would have taken that fact into consideration. In reviewing punitive damages awards attacked as excessive, the Alabama Supreme Court considers whether "there have been other civil actions against the same defendant, based on the same conduct." 646 So. 2d 619, 624 (1994) (quoting Green Oil Co. v. Hornsby, 539 So. 2d 218, 224 (Ala. 1989)). If so, "this should be taken into account in mitigation of the punitive damages award." 646 So. 2d at 624. The Alabama court accordingly observed that Gore's counsel had filed 24 other actions against BMW in Alabama and Georgia, but that no other punitive damages award had so far resulted. Id., at 626.

n5 Justice Breyer's concurring opinion offers nothing more solid. Under Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 113 L. Ed. 2d 1, 111 S. Ct. 1032 (1991), he acknowledges, Alabama's standards for punitive damages, standing alone, do not violate due process. Ante, at 588. But they "invit[e] the kind of scrutiny the Court has given the particular verdict before us." Ibid. Pursuing that invitation, Justice Breyer concludes that, matching the particular facts of this case to Alabama's "legitimate punitive damages objectives," ante, at 596, the award was "'gross[ly] excessiv[e],'" ante, at 597. The exercise is engaging, but ultimately tells us only this: too big will be judged unfair. What is the Court's measure of too big? Not a cap of the kind a legislature could order, or a mathematical test this Court can divine and impose. Too big is, in the end, the amount at which five Members of the Court bridle.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In contrast to habeas corpus review under 28 U.S.C. § 2254, the Court will work at this business alone. It will not be aided by the federal district courts and courts of appeals. It will be the only federal court policing the area. The Court's readiness to superintend state-court punitive damages awards is all the more puzzling in view of the Court's longstanding reluctance to countenance review, even by courts of appeals, of the size of verdicts returned by juries in federal district court proceedings. See generally 11 C. Wright, A. Miller, & M. Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2820 (2d ed. 1995). And the reexamination prominent in state courts n6 and in legislative arenas, see Appendix, [*614] [1618] infra this page, serves to underscore why the Court's enterprise is undue.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n6 See, e. g., Distinctive Printing and Packaging Co. v. Cox, 232 Neb. 846, 857, 443 N.W.2d 566, 574 (1989) (per curiam) ("Punitive, vindictive, or exemplary damages contravene Neb. Const. art. VII, § 5, and thus are not allowed in this jurisdiction."); Santana v. Registrars of Voters of Worcester, 398 Mass. 862, 502 N.E.2d 132 (1986) (punitive damages are not permitted, unless expressly authorized by statute); Fisher Properties, Inc. v. Arden-Mayfair, Inc., 106 Wash. 2d 826, 852, 726 P.2d 8, 23 (1986) (en banc) (same).

In Life Ins. Co. of Georgia v. Johnson, No. 1940357 (Nov. 17, 1995), the Alabama Supreme Court revised the State's regime for assessments of punitive damages. Henceforth, trials will

REV_00263466

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

The fact that a defendant is a large corporation rather than an impecunious individual does not diminish its entitlement to fair notice of the demands that the several states impose on the conduct of its business. Indeed, its status as an active participant in the national economy implicates the federal interest in preventing individual states from imposing undue burdens on interstate commerce. While each state has ample power to protect its own consumers, none may use the punitive damages deterrent as a means of imposing its regulatory policies on the entire nation.

◆ Show Lawyers' Edition Display

SYLLABUS: After respondent Gore purchased a new BMW automobile from an authorized Alabama dealer, he discovered that the car had been repainted. He brought this suit for compensatory and punitive damages against petitioner, the American distributor of BMW's, alleging, inter alia, that the failure to disclose the repainting constituted fraud under Alabama law. At trial, BMW acknowledged that it followed a nationwide policy of not advising its dealers, and hence their customers, of predelivery damage to new cars when the cost of repair did not exceed 3 percent of the car's suggested retail price. Gore's vehicle fell into that category. The jury returned a verdict finding BMW liable for compensatory damages of $ 4,000, and assessing $ 4 million in punitive damages. The trial judge denied BMW's post-trial motion to set aside the punitive damages award, holding, among other things, that the award was not "grossly excessive" and thus did not violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. See, e. g., TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 454, 125 L. Ed. 2d 366, 113 S. Ct. 2711. The Alabama Supreme Court agreed, but reduced the award to $ 2 million on the ground that, in computing the amount, the jury had improperly multiplied Gore's compensatory damages by the number of similar sales in all States, not just those in Alabama.
Held: The $ 2 million punitive damages award is grossly excessive and therefore exceeds the constitutional limit. Pp. 568-586.

(a) Because such an award violates due process only when it can fairly be categorized as "grossly excessive" in relation to the State's legitimate interests in punishing unlawful conduct and deterring its repetition, cf. TXO, 509 U.S. at 456, the federal excessiveness inquiry appropriately begins with an identification of the state interests that such an award is designed to serve. Principles of state sovereignty and comity forbid a State to enact policies for the entire Nation, or to impose its own policy choice on neighboring States. See e. g., Healy v. Beer Institute, 491 U.S. 324, 335-336, 105 L. Ed. 2d 275, 109 S. Ct. 2491. Accordingly, the economic penalties that a State inflicts on those who transgress its laws, whether the penalties are legislatively authorized fines or judicially imposed punitive damages, must be supported by the State's interest in protecting its own consumers and economy, rather than those of other States or the entire Nation. Gore's award must therefore be analyzed in the light of conduct that occurred solely within Alabama, with consideration being given only to the interests of Alabama consumers. Pp. 568-574.

(b) Elementary notions of fairness enshrined in this Court's constitutional jurisprudence dictate that a person receive fair notice not only of the conduct that will subject him to punishment but also of the severity of the penalty that a State may impose. Three guideposts, each of which indicates that BMW did not receive adequate notice of the magnitude of the sanction that Alabama might impose, lead to the conclusion that the $ 2 million award is grossly excessive. Pp. 574-575.

(c) None of the aggravating factors associated with the first (and perhaps most important) indicium of a punitive damages award's excessiveness -- the degree of reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct, see e. g., Day v. Woodworth, 54 U.S. 363, 13 HOW 363, 371, 14 L. Ed.

REV_00263434

181 -- is present here. The harm BMW inflicted on Gore was purely economic; the presale repainting had no effect on the car's performance, safety features, or appearance; and BMW's conduct evinced no indifference to or reckless disregard for the health and safety of others. Gore's contention that BMW's nondisclosure was particularly reprehensible because it formed part of a nationwide pattern of tortious conduct is rejected, because a corporate executive could reasonably have interpreted the relevant state statutes as establishing safe harbors for nondisclosure of presumptively minor repairs, and because there is no evidence either that BMW acted in bad faith when it sought to establish the appropriate line between minor damage and damage requiring disclosure to purchasers, or that it persisted in its course of conduct after it had been adjudged unlawful. Finally, there is no evidence that BMW engaged in deliberate false statements, acts of affirmative misconduct, or concealment of evidence of improper motive. Pp. 575-580.

(d) The second (and perhaps most commonly cited) indicium of excessiveness -- the ratio between the plaintiff's compensatory damages and the amount of the punitive damages, see e. g., TXO, 509 U.S. at 459 -- also weighs against Gore, because his $ 2 million award is 500 times the amount of his actual harm as determined by the jury, and there is no suggestion that he or any other BMW purchaser was threatened with any additional potential harm by BMW's nondisclosure policy. Although it is not possible to draw a mathematical bright line between the constitutionally acceptable and the constitutionally unacceptable that would fit every case, see, e. g., id., at 458, the ratio here is clearly outside the acceptable range. Pp. 580-583.

(e) Gore's punitive damages award is not saved by the third relevant indicium of excessiveness -- the difference between it and the civil or criminal sanctions that could be imposed for comparable misconduct, see, e. g., Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 23, 113 L. Ed. 2d 1, 111 S. Ct. 1032 -- because $ 2 million is substantially greater than Alabama's applicable $ 2,000 fine and the penalties imposed in other States for similar malfeasance, and because none of the pertinent statutes or interpretive decisions would have put an out-of-state distributor on notice that it might be subject to a multimillion dollar sanction. Moreover, in the absence of a BMW history of noncompliance with known statutory requirements, there is no basis for assuming that a more modest sanction would not have been sufficient. Pp. 583-585.

(f) Thus, BMW's conduct was not sufficiently egregious to justify the severe punitive sanction imposed against it. Whether the appropriate remedy requires a new trial or merely an independent determination by the Alabama Supreme Court of the award necessary to vindicate Alabama consumers' economic interests is a matter for that court to address in the first instance. Pp. 585-586.

COUNSEL: Andrew L. Frey argued the cause for petitioner. With him on the briefs were Kenneth S. Geller, Evan M. Tager, Michael C. Quillen, Dennis J. Helfman, and David Cordero.

Michael H. Gottesman argued the cause for respondent. With him on the brief were Jonathan S. Massey, Andrew W. Bolt II, John W. Haley, Bruce J. McKee, Kenneth J. Chesebro, and Stephen K. Wollstein. *

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

* Briefs of amici curiae urging reversal were filed for the American Automobile Manufacturers Association et al. by Kenneth W. Starr, Paul T. Cappuccio, Christopher Landau, Richard A. Cordray, and Phillip D. Brady; for the American Council of Life Insurance et al. by Patricia A. Dunn, Stephen J. Goodman, Phillip E. Stano, and Theresa L. Sorota; for the American Tort Reform Association et al. by Victor E. Schwartz, Scott L. Winkelman, Sherman Joyce, and Fred J. Hiestand; for the Business Council of Alabama by Forrest S. Latta; for the Center for Claims Resolution by John D. Aldock and Frederick C. Schafrick; for the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America by Timothy B. Dyk, Stephen A. Bokat, and Robin S. Conrad; for the Farmers Insurance Exchange et al. by Irving H. Greines, Robin Meadow, Barbara W. Ravitz, and Robert A. Olson; for the Life Insurance Company of Georgia et al. by Theodore B. Olson, Larry L. Simms, Theodore J. Boutrous, Jr., John K. Bush, Theodore J. Fischkin, and Marcus Bergh; for the National Association of Manufacturers by Carter G. Phillips and Jan Amundson; for the New England Council et al. by Stephen S. Ostrach; for Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corporation by Charles Fried, Michael W. Schwartz, and Karen I. Ward; for Owens-Illinois, Inc., by Griffin B. Bell and David L. Gray; for Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America by Andrew T. Berry; for the Product Liability Advisory Council, Inc., et al. by Malcolm E. Wheeler; for the TIG Insurance Company by Ellis J. Horvitz, Barry R. Levy, Frederic D. Cohen, and Mitchell C. Tilner; and for the Washington Legal Foundation et al. by Arvin Maskin, Steven Alan Reiss, Katherine Oberlies, Daniel J. Popeol, and Paul D. Kamenar.

REV_00263435

Briefs of amici curiae urging affirmance were filed for the Alabama Trial Lawyers Association by Russell J. Drake; for the Association of Trial Lawyers of America by Jeffrey Robert White, Cheryl Flax-Davidson, and Larry S. Stewart; and for the National Association of Securities and Commercial Law Attorneys by Kevin P. Roddy, James P. Solimano, Steve W. Berman, and Jonathan W. Cuneo.

Briefs of amici curiae were filed for CBS, Inc., et al. by P. Cameron DeVore, Marshall J. Nelson, Douglas P. Jacobs, Jonathan E. Thackeray, John C. Fontaine, Cristina L. Mendoza, William A. Niese, Karlene Goller, Susan Weiner, Richard M. Schmidt, Jr., R. Bruce Rich, Slade R. Metcalf, Jane E. Kirtley, Bruce W. Sanford, and Henry S. Hoberman; for Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, P. C., by Leslie A. Brueckner and Arthur H. Bryant; for Richard L. Blatt et al. by Mr. Blatt, pro se, and Robert W. Hammesfahr, pro se; for James D. A. Boyle et al. by Arthur F. McEvoy III, pro se; and for Kenneth G. Dau-Schmidt et al. by Mark M. Hager, pro se.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

JUDGES: STEVENS, J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which O'CONNOR, KENNEDY, SOUTER, and BREYER, JJ., joined. BREYER, J., filed a concurring opinion, in which O'CONNOR and SOUTER, JJ., joined, post, p. 586. SCALIA, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which THOMAS, J., joined, post, p. 598. GINSBURG, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which REHNQUIST, C. J., joined, post, p. 607.

OPINIONBY: STEVENS

OPINION: [*818]

[*562] [1592] JUSTICE STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

[*HR1A] [1A]
[*HR2] [2]
The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits a State from imposing a "'grossly excessive'" punishment on a tortfeasor. TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance [819] Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 454, 125 L. Ed. 2d 366, 113 S. Ct. 2711 (1993) (and cases cited). The wrongdoing involved in this case was the decision by a national distributor of automobiles not to advise its dealers, and hence their customers, of predelivery [1593] damage to new cars when the cost of repair amounted to less than 3 percent of the car's suggested retail price. The question presented [*563] is whether a $ 2 million punitive damages award to the purchaser of one of these cars exceeds the constitutional limit.

I

REV_00263436

In January 1990, Dr. Ira Gore, Jr. (respondent), purchased a black BMW sports sedan for $ 40,750.88 from an authorized BMW dealer in Birmingham, Alabama. After driving the car for approximately nine months, and without noticing any flaws in its appearance, Dr. Gore took the car to "Slick Finish," an independent detailer, to make it look "'snazzier than it normally would appear.'" 646 So. 2d 619, 621 (Ala. 1994). Mr. Slick, the proprietor, detected evidence that the car had been repainted. n1 Convinced that he had been cheated, Dr. Gore brought suit against petitioner BMW of North America (BMW), the American distributor of BMW automobiles. n2 Dr. Gore alleged, inter alia, that the failure to disclose that the car had been repainted constituted suppression of a material fact. n3 The complaint prayed for $ 500,000 in compensatory and punitive damages, and costs.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 The top, hood, trunk, and quarter panels of Dr. Gore's car were repainted at BMW's vehicle preparation center in Brunswick, Georgia. The parties presumed that the damage was caused by exposure to acid rain during transit between the manufacturing plant in Germany and the preparation center.

n2 Dr. Gore also named the German manufacturer and the Birmingham dealership as defendants.

n3 Alabama codified its common-law cause of action for fraud in a 1907 statute that is still in effect. Hackmeyer v. Hackmeyer, 268 Ala. 329, 333, 106 So. 2d 245, 249 (1958). The statute provides: "Suppression of a material fact which the party is under an obligation to communicate constitutes fraud. The obligation to communicate may arise from the confidential relations of the parties or from the particular circumstances of the case." Ala. Code § 6-5-102 (1993); see Ala. Code § 4299 (1907).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

At trial, BMW acknowledged that it had adopted a nationwide policy in 1983 concerning cars that were damaged in the course of manufacture or transportation. If the cost of repairing the damage exceeded 3 percent of the car's suggested [*564] retail price, the car was placed in company service for a period of time and then sold as used. If the repair cost did not exceed 3 percent of the suggested retail price, however, the car was sold as new without advising the dealer that any repairs had been made. Because the $ 601.37 cost of repainting Dr. Gore's car was only about 1.5 percent of its suggested retail price, BMW did not disclose the damage or repair to the Birmingham dealer.

Dr. Gore asserted that his repainted car was worth less than a car that had not been refinished. To prove his actual damages of $ 4,000, he relied on the testimony of a former BMW dealer, who estimated that the value of a repainted BMW was approximately 10 percent less than the value of a new car that had [820] not been damaged and repaired. n4 To support his claim for punitive damages, Dr. Gore introduced evidence that since 1983 BMW had sold 983 refinished cars as new, including 14 in Alabama, without disclosing that the cars had been repainted before sale at a cost of more than $ 300 per vehicle. n5 Using the actual damage estimate of $ 4,000 per vehicle, Dr. Gore argued that a punitive award of $ 4 million would provide an appropriate penalty for selling approximately 1,000 cars for more than they were worth.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n4 The dealer who testified to the reduction in value is the former owner of the Birmingham dealership sued in this action. He sold the dealership approximately one year before the trial.

REV_00263437

n5 Dr. Gore did not explain the significance of the $ 300 cutoff.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In defense of its disclosure policy, BMW argued that it was under no obligation to disclose repairs of minor damage to new cars and that Dr. Gore's car was as good as a car with the original factory finish. It disputed Dr. Gore's assertion that the value of the car was impaired by the repainting and argued that this good-faith belief made a punitive award inappropriate. BMW also maintained that transactions in jurisdictions other than Alabama had no relevance to Dr. Gore's claim.

[*565] The jury returned a verdict finding BMW liable for compensatory damages of [1594] $ 4,000. In addition, the jury assessed $ 4 million in punitive damages, based on a determination that the nondisclosure policy constituted "gross, oppressive or malicious" fraud. n6 See Ala. Code §§ 6-11-20, 6-11-21 (1993).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n6 The jury also found the Birmingham dealership liable for Dr. Gore's compensatory damages and the German manufacturer liable for both the compensatory and punitive damages. The dealership did not appeal the judgment against it. The Alabama Supreme Court held that the trial court did not have jurisdiction over the German manufacturer and therefore reversed the judgment against that defendant.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

BMW filed a post-trial motion to set aside the punitive damages award. The company introduced evidence to establish that its nondisclosure policy was consistent with the laws of roughly 25 States defining the disclosure obligations of automobile manufacturers, distributors, and dealers. The most stringent of these statutes required disclosure of repairs costing more than 3 percent of the suggested retail price; none mandated disclosure of less costly repairs. n7 Relying on these statutes, BMW contended that its conduct was lawful in these States and therefore could not provide the basis for an award of punitive damages.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n7 BMW acknowledged that a Georgia statute enacted after Dr. Gore purchased his car would require disclosure of similar repairs to a car before it was sold in Georgia. Ga. Code Ann. §§ 40-1-5(b)-(e) (1994).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

BMW also drew the court's attention to the fact that its nondisclosure policy had never been adjudged unlawful before this action was filed. Just months before Dr. Gore's case went to trial, the jury in a similar lawsuit filed by another Alabama BMW purchaser found that BMW's failure to disclose paint repair constituted fraud. Yates v. BMW of North America, Inc., 642 So. 2d 937 (Ala. 1993). n8 Before the [*566] judgment in this case, BMW changed its policy by taking steps to avoid the sale of any [821] refinished vehicles in Alabama and two other States. When the $ 4 million verdict was returned in this case, BMW promptly instituted a nationwide policy of full disclosure of all repairs, no matter how minor.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n8 While awarding a comparable amount of compensatory damages, the Yates jury awarded no punitive damages at all. In Yates, the plaintiff also relied on the 1983 nondisclosure policy, but instead of offering evidence of 983 repairs costing more than $ 300 each, he introduced a bulk exhibit containing 5,856 repair bills to show that petitioner had sold over 5,800 new BMW vehicles without disclosing that they had been repaired.

REV_00263438

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In response to BMW's arguments, Dr. Gore asserted that the policy change demonstrated the efficacy of the punitive damages award. He noted that while no jury had held the policy unlawful, BMW had received a number of customer complaints relating to undisclosed repairs and had settled some lawsuits. n9 Finally, he maintained that the disclosure statutes of other States were irrelevant because BMW had failed to offer any evidence that the disclosure statutes supplanted, rather than supplemented, existing causes of action for common-law fraud.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n9 Prior to the lawsuits filed by Dr. Yates and Dr. Gore, BMW and various BMW dealers had been sued 14 times concerning presale paint or damage repair. According to the testimony of BMW's in-house counsel at the postjudgment hearing on damages, only one of the suits concerned a car repainted by BMW.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The trial judge denied BMW's post-trial motion, holding, inter alia, that the award was not excessive. On appeal, the Alabama Supreme Court also rejected BMW's claim that the award exceeded the constitutionally permissible amount. 646 So. 2d 619 (1994). The court's excessiveness inquiry applied the factors articulated in Green Oil Co. v. Hornsby, 539 So. 2d 218, 223-224 (Ala. 1989), and approved in Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 21-22, 113 L. Ed. 2d 1, 111 S. Ct. 1032 (1991). 646 So. 2d at 624-625. Based on its analysis, the court concluded that BMW's conduct was "reprehensible"; the nondisclosure was profitable for the company; the judgment "would not have a substantial impact upon [BMW's] financial position"; the litigation had been expensive; no criminal sanctions had been imposed on BMW for the same conduct; the award of no punitive [*567] damages in Yates reflected "the inherent uncertainty of the trial process"; and the punitive award bore a "reasonable relationship" to "the harm that [1595] was likely to occur from [BMW's] conduct as well as . . . the harm that actually occurred." 646 So. 2d at 625-627.

The Alabama Supreme Court did, however, rule in BMW's favor on one critical point: The court found that the jury improperly computed the amount of punitive damages by multiplying Dr. Gore's compensatory damages by the number of similar sales in other jurisdictions. Id., at 627. Having found the verdict tainted, the court held that "a constitutionally reasonable punitive damages award in this case is $ 2,000,000," id., at 629, and therefore ordered a remittitur in that amount. n10 The court's discussion of the amount of its remitted award expressly disclaimed any reliance on "acts that occurred in other jurisdictions"; instead, the court explained that it had used a "comparative analysis" that considered Alabama cases, "along with cases from other jurisdictions, involving the sale of an automobile where the seller misrepresented the condition of the vehicle [822] and the jury awarded punitive damages to the purchaser." n11 Id., at 628.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n10 The Alabama Supreme Court did not indicate whether the $ 2 million figure represented the court's independent assessment of the appropriate level of punitive damages, or its determination of the maximum amount that the jury could have awarded consistent with the Due Process Clause.

REV_00263439

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 601 a.2d 633

*325 Md. 420, *; 601 A.2d 633, **;*
1992 Md. LEXIS 21, ; CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P13,060

OWENS-ILLINOIS, INC. et al. v. William ZENOBIA, Sr. et al.

No. 66, September Term, 1991

Court of Appeals of Maryland

325 Md. 420; 601 A.2d 633; 1992 Md. LEXIS 21; CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P13,060

February 14, 1992, Filed

SUBSEQUENT HISTORY: [*1]

Reconsideration Denied March 11, 1992. *

* The addendum to this opinion denying Motion for Reconsideration can be found at 325 Md. 665 and 602 A.2d 1182.

PRIOR HISTORY: Certiorari to Court of Special Appeals (Circuit Court for Baltimore City). Mabel H. Hubbard, JUDGE DISPOSITION: JUDGMENT OF THE COURT OF SPECIAL APPEALS VACATED, AND CASES REMANDED TO THE COURT OF SPECIAL APPEALS WITH DIRECTIONS TO VACATE THE JUDGMENTS OF THE CIRCUIT COURT FOR BALTIMORE CITY AND REMAND THE CASES TO THE CIRCUIT COURT FOR BALTIMORE CITY FOR FURTHER PROCEEDINGS NOT INCONSISTENT WITH THIS OPINION. PLAINTIFFS TO PAY ONE-THIRD OF THE COSTS IN THIS COURT AND IN THE COURT OF SPECIAL APPEALS AND DEFENDANTS OWENS-ILLINOIS, INC., MCIC, INC., ANCHOR PACKING CO. AND PORTER HAYDEN COMPANY, TO PAY TWO-THIRDS OF THE COSTS IN THIS COURT AND IN THE COURT OF SPECIAL APPEALS.

CASE SUMMARY

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: Defendants, a manufacturer and two suppliers/installers of asbestos containing products, sought review of a judgment of the Court of Special Appeals (Maryland) that affirmed the circuit court's judgment awarding compensatory damages against all defendants, and also affirmed the award of punitive damages against defendant manufacturer, in plaintiffs' strict liability action seeking damages for injuries resulting from exposure to asbestos.

OVERVIEW: Defendants, a manufacturer and two suppliers/installers of asbestos containing products, challenged judgments entered in the circuit court awarding compensatory and punitive damages to plaintiffs in plaintiffs' strict liability action alleging that they were injured by exposure to asbestos. The court vacated the judgment of the Court of Special Appeals, which affirmed the compensatory damage awards as to all defendants and the punitive damage award against defendant manufacturer, and remanded for further proceedings. The court ruled, among other things, that the jury was not properly instructed with respect to the standard for awarding punitive damages against defendant manufacturer. Overruling prior case law, the court held that punitive damages could be awarded only on a showing by clear and convincing evidence that defendant was guilty of "actual malice," and that in a strict liability action, proof was because they pertain to what other companies knew about asbestos, are not proper "state of the art" evidence. In order to resolve these arguments, it is necessary to discuss briefly why any element of knowledge is relevant in this strict liability case.

REV_00263467

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n4 The defendants Anchor Packing Co., MCIC, Inc., Porter Hayden Company and Owens-Illinois object to the admission of the deposition testimony of Dr. Mancuso. The defendant Owens-Illinois also objects to the admission of the deposition testimony of Mr. John Humphrey, Mr. Louis Pechstein and Dr. Kenneth Smith.

Dr. Mancuso is a medical doctor who served as an industrial hygiene consultant to the Philip Carey Co. (predecessor to Celotex Corp.) in 1962 and 1963. Mr. John Humphrey was President of the Philip Carey Co. from 1948 to 1967. Mr. Louis Pechstein was in charge of corporate records, claims and studies for the Philip Carey Co. from 1955 to 1979. Dr. Kenneth Smith was the medical director for Johns-Manville Corp. from 1944 to 1966.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [11]

A.

Section 402A of the Restatement (Second) of Torts, adopted by this Court in [639] Phipps v. General Motors Corp., 278 Md. 337, 344, 363 A.2d 955, 958 (1976), requires that, in order to recover under a theory of strict liability, a plaintiff must show:

> "(1) [that] the product was in a defective condition at the time it left the possession or control of the seller,
> (2) that it was unreasonably dangerous to the user or consumer, > (3) that the defect was a cause of the injuries, and
> (4) that the product was expected to and did reach the consumer without substantial change in its condition."

Thus, on its face, § 402A subjects a seller of a defective product to strict liability without regard to the knowledge of the defect and "even though [the seller] has exercised all possible care in the preparation and sale of the product." Restatement (Second) of Torts § 402A, Comment a (1965).

[*433] When a product is alleged to be defective because of a failure to give an adequate warning, however, many courts have relied on Comment j of § 402A. Comment j explains that "the seller is required to give warning against [the danger], if he has knowledge, or by the [12] application of reasonable, developed human skill and foresight should have knowledge, of the . . . danger." The comment goes on to distinguish a product containing an adequate warning from a defective product, stating: "a product bearing such a warning, which is safe for use if it is followed, is not in defective condition, nor is it unreasonably dangerous." n5 n5 Those jurisdiction which hold that evidence of knowledge of dangerous quality is relevant in a failure to warn case, do not regard lack of knowledge as a factor in a strict liability design defect case. See C. Marvel, Annotation, Strict Products Liability: Liability for Failure to Warn as Dependent on Defendant's Knowledge of Danger, 33 A.L.R. 4th 368, 378 n. 14 (1984).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00263476

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Several courts have acknowledged that the language in Comment j appears to contradict or create an exception to the basic rule set out in § 402A. See, e.g., Woodill v. Parke Davis & Co., 79 Ill.2d 26, 37, 37 Ill.Dec. 304, 310, 402 N.E.2d 194, 200 (1980); [13] Little v. PPG Industries, Inc., 19 Wash. App. 812, 821-822, 579 P.2d 940, 946-947 (1978), modified on other grounds, 92 Wash.2d 118, 594 P.2d 911 (1979). Nevertheless, the majority of courts which have considered a failure to warn case in the context of strict liability have either expressly or implicitly held that "a manufacturer of a product, which is defective only because of the lack of an adequate warning, is not liable when the failure to warn resulted from an absence of knowledge of the dangerous quality of that product.

Moreover, the courts reason, the presence of the required knowledge can be established by evidence that the dangerous quality of the product should have been known by a manufacturer because it was known in the scientific or expert community. As Judge John Minor Wisdom stated for the court in another case involving a claimed injury from asbestos, Borel v. Fibreboard Paper Products Corporation, [*434] 493 F.2d 1076, 1089 (5th Cir.1973), cert. denied,

> 419 U.S. 869, 95 S.Ct. 127, 42 L.Ed.2d 107 (1974),
> "in cases such as the instant [14] case, the manufacturer is held to the knowledge and skill of an expert. This is relevant in determining (1) whether the manufacturer knew or should have known the danger . . . . The manufacturer's status as expert means that at a minimum he must keep abreast of scientific knowledge, discoveries, and advances and is presumed to know what is imparted thereby."

The same point was made by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in > Lohrmann v. Pittsburgh Corning Corp., 782 F.2d 1156, 1164 (4th Cir.1986):

> "Industry standards and state of the art are not synonymous. State of the art includes all of the available knowledge on a subject at a given time, and this includes scientific, medical, engineering, and any other knowledge that may be available. State of the art includes the element of time: What is known and when was this knowledge available."

See, e.g., Hardy v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 681 F.2d 334, 344 (5th Cir.1982); Gordon v. Niagara Mach. & Tool Works, 574 F.2d 1182, 1190 (5th Cir.1978); [640] Shell Oil Co. v. Gutierrez, 119 Ariz. 426, 434, 581 P.2d 271, 279 (1978); [15] Oakes v. Geigy Agricultural Chemicals, 272 Cal.App. 2d 645, 651, 77 Cal.Rptr. 709, 713 (3d Dist.1969); Woodill v. Parke Davis & Co., supra, 79 Ill.2d at 37, 37 Ill.Dec. at 308, 402 N.E.2d at 198; Smith v. E.R. Squibb & Sons, Inc., 405 Mich. 79, 90, 273 N.W.2d 476, 480 (1979); McKee v. Moore, 648 P.2d 21 (Okla.1982); Cochran v. Brooke, 243 Or. 89, 94-96, 409 P.2d 904, 906-907 (1966). See also C. Marvel, Annotation, Strict Products Liability: Liability for Failure to Warn as Dependent on Defendant's Knowledge of Danger, 33 A.L.R.4th 368 (1984), and cases cited therein. n6 [*435] As previously indicated, this evidence concerning the presence or absence of knowledge in the expert community is called "state of the art" evidence.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n6 For two competing views on the desirability of allowing a knowledge component in a strict liability case, see W. Murray, Jr., Requiring Omniscience: The Duty to Warn of Scientifically

REV_00263477

Undiscoverable Product Defects, 71 Geo.L.J. 1635, 1638 n. 21 (1983); J. Martineau, The Duty to Warn Under Strict Products Liability as Limited by the Knowledge Requirement: A Regretful Retention of Negligence Concepts, 26 St. Louis U.L.J. 125 (1981).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [16]

Consequently, in a failure to warn case governed by the Restatement § 402A and Comment j, negligence concepts to some extent have been grafted onto strict liability. In such cases, a majority of courts hold that an element of knowledge or "state of the art" evidence is directly pertinent to a cause of action under § 402A of the Restatement (Second) of Torts, and liability is no longer entirely "strict." n7 n7 Professors Henderson and Twerski argue that the difference between strict liability and negligence in a failure to warn case is entirely semantic and unnecessarily confusing. They suggest that since courts apply negligence concepts in all failure to warn cases, all such cases sound in negligence. J. Henderson and A. Twerski, Doctrinal Collapse in Products Liability: The Empty Shell of Failure to Warn, 65 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 265 (1990).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

We note that despite the overlap of negligence principles in a strict liability failure to warn case, strict liability differs from a negligence cause of action in that contributory negligence is not a defense to a strict liability claim. Ellsworth v. Sherne Lingerie, Inc., 303 Md. 581, 597-598, 495 A.2d 348, 356-357 (1985). In addition, in light of the other comments to § 402A of the Restatement (Second) of Torts, which apply in defective design, defective construction, and failure to warn cases, there are some differences between a negligent failure to warn case and a failure to warn based upon § 402A and Comment j.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [17]

On the other hand, a few courts have held that neither the defendant's actual knowledge nor evidence of scientific knowledge about the dangerous characteristics of the product is relevant in a strict liability failure to warn case. Elmore v. Owens-Illinois, Inc., 673 S.W.2d 434, 436-439 (Mo.1984); Beshada v. Johns-Manville Products Corp., 90 N.J. 191, 202-208, 447 A.2d 539, 545-549 (1982); Kisor v. Johns-Manville Corp., 783 F.2d 1337, 1340-1342 (9th Cir. 1986) (applying Washington law).

Before the trial in the present cases the plaintiffs asserted that evidence of knowledge should not be relevant with [*436] regard to their strict liability claims. The defendants, however, argued that the plaintiffs were required to produce "state of the art" evidence as part of their case. The trial judge, apparently relying on a prior ruling in another case by Judge Levin for the Circuit Court for Baltimore City, agreed with the defendants and required that the plaintiffs introduce "state of the art" evidence. Consequently, at trial the plaintiffs introduced evidence designed to show the requisite knowledge or "state [18] of the art." Moreover, neither side in the Court of Special Appeals or before this Court challenged the trial court's ruling that a knowledge component or "state of the art" is pertinent in a strict liability failure to warn case.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, applying Maryland law, has held that in a strict liability failure to warn case, "state of the art" is relevant with regard to the defendant's liability. See Lohrmann v. Pittsburgh Corning Corp., supra, 782 F.2d at 1164 ("in Maryland, state of the art can be considered in a strict liability tort case where the claimed defect is a failure to warn"). The federal Court of Appeals reasoned that in Phipps v. General Motors Corp., supra, [641] this Court "adopted strict liability in tort as expressed in § 402A of the Restatement (Second) of Torts," that Comment j is part of § 402A, and that

REV_00263478

> "[t]he language of Comment (j) is state-of-the-art language because it requires the seller to give a warning if he has knowledge, 'or by the application of reasonable, developed human skill and foresight should have knowledge' of the danger."

Lohrmann v. Pittsburgh Corning Corp., supra, 782 F.2d at 1164-1165. [19]

While this Court has not previously dealt with this issue, we agree that our adoption of § 402A in the Phipps case included Comment j and the knowledge component provided for in Comment j. The Phipps opinion expressly indicated that our adoption of § 402A included the official comments

> (278 Md. at 346, 363 A.2d at 959-960):
> [*437] "Under § 402A, various defenses are still available to the seller in an action based on strict liability in tort. These defenses are set forth and explained in the official comments following § 402A."

Moreover, in Phipps we discussed with approval several of the official comments, including Comment j. Ibid. In addition, as pointed out by the court in Lohrmann, 782 F.2d at 1164, the Phipps opinion went on to state that "[d]espite the use of the term 'strict liability' the seller is not an insurer, as absolute liability is not imposed on the seller for any injury resulting from the use of his product." 278 Md. at 351-352, 363 A.2d at 963. See also Miles Laboratories v. Doe, 315 Md. 704, 724, 556 A.2d 1107, 1117 (1989) [20] ("[o]ur adoption of § 402A in Phipps . . . implicitly adopted the substance of Comment k"); Ellsworth v. Sherne Lingerie, Inc., 303 Md. 581, 591-592, 495 A.2d 348, 353 (1985) (to the same effect with respect to Comment g of § 402A).

We hold that Comment j of § 402A is applicable to a strict liability cause of action where the alleged defect is a failure to give adequate warnings. Therefore, the seller is not strictly liable for failure to warn unless the seller has "knowledge, or by the application of reasonable, developed human skill and foresight should have knowledge, of the presence of the . . . danger." Restatement (Second) of Torts § 402A, Comment j. Moreover, we agree with the numerous cases holding that, for purposes of the "should have knowledge" component of comment j, a manufacturer of a product is held to the knowledge of an expert in the field. See Babylon v. Scruton, 215 Md. 299, 304, 138 A.2d 375, 378 (1958), quoting 2 Harper & James, The Law of Torts § 28.4 (negligence case pointing out that "'a person who undertakes such manufacturing will be held to the skill of an expert in that business [21] and to an expert's knowledge of the arts, materials, and processes. Thus he must keep reasonably abreast of scientific knowledge and discoveries [*438] touching his product . . .'"). n8

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n8 It is not entirely clear whether the knowledge or state of the art component in a strict liability failure to warn case is an element to be proven by the plaintiff or is an affirmative defense. Cf. Ellsworth v. Sherne Lingerie, Inc., supra, 303 Md. at 592-596, 495 A.2d at 353-356 (discussing whether "misuse" of a product is a part of the plaintiff's case or an affirmative defense).

Prosser and Keeton take the position that a plaintiff who seeks to recover in a strict liability failure to warn case must show that the defendant knew or should have known of the hazard about which he failed to warn. Prosser and Keeton, Torts § 99, at 697 (5th ed. 1984). See also M. Madden, Products Liability § 10.3, at 377-378 (2d ed. 1988). On the other hand, an American Law Reports Annotation collecting cases concerning strict liability for failure to warn seems to assert that the absence of knowledge of the danger is an affirmative defense which must be proven by the defendant. C. Marvel, Annotation, Strict Products Liability: Liability For Failure to Warn as Dependent on Defendant's Knowledge of Danger, supra, 33 A.L.R. 4th 368, and cases cited therein. Many cases also refer to the knowledge component in a strict liability failure to warn case as a "defense."

REV_00263479

It is not necessary for us to decide in this case whether the knowledge component is an element of the plaintiff's case or an affirmative defense because neither the plaintiffs nor the defendants have raised any issue in this regard. Nevertheless, we agree with those authorities, and with the Circuit Court for Baltimore City, that the knowledge or state of the art component is an element to be proven by the plaintiff. In a strict liability failure to warn case, the alleged defect is the failure of the seller to give an adequate warning. The seller, however, need not give any warning if the requisite state of the art or knowledge does not require it. Thus, where a product lacks a warning because of insufficient knowledge on the part of the manufacturer or in the scientific field involved, the product is not defective. As defectiveness is an element to be proven by the plaintiff, the knowledge or state of the art component is not an affirmative defense. See Ellsworth v. Sherne Lingerie, Inc., supra, 303 Md. at 597, 495 A.2d at 356.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [642] [22]

B.

As previously stated, the defendants argue that the deposition evidence was inadmissible because (1) they were not present at the depositions and did not have the opportunity to cross examine the deponents, and (2) this deposition evidence, pertaining to what other asbestos manufacturers knew about the dangers of asbestos, is not proper "state of the art" evidence. We shall first address the requirements of Maryland Rule 2-419 and the former testimony exception [*439] to the hearsay rule, and then discuss the admissibility of the depositions on relevance grounds.

1.

The defendants argue that the deposition testimony should not have been admitted because they were not present at the depositions and did not have an opportunity to cross examine the witnesses. The defendant suppliers/installers Anchor Packing Co., Porter Hayden and MCIC, Inc., were not present at the deposition of Dr. Mancuso, nor were any other non-manufacturing suppliers/installers of asbestos. Several manufacturers, however, were present at this deposition, including Owens-Illinois. Similarly, although Owens-Illinois was not present, several defendant manufacturers attended the depositions of Dr. Smith, Mr. [23] Pechstein and Mr. Humphrey.

Depositions meeting the requirements of Maryland Rule 2-419 may be admissible under the former testimony exception to the rule against hearsay. n9 In Huffington v. State, 304 Md. 559, 569-574, 500 A.2d 272, 277-279 (majority opinion), 304 Md. at 597, 500 A.2d at 291 (dissenting opinion) (1985), cert. denied, 478 U.S. 1023, 106 S.Ct. 3315, 92 L.Ed.2d 745 (1986), we endorsed the substance of Federal Rule of Evidence 804(b)(1) as the test for the admissibility [*440] of former testimony. n10 See also Grandison v. State, 305 Md. 685, 734-735, 506 A.2d 580, 609-610, cert. denied, 479 U.S. 873, 107 S.Ct. 38, 93 L.Ed.2d 174 (1986).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n9 Maryland Rule 2-419(a)(3)(C) provides that deposition testimony may be used when the deponent is unavailable. Rule 2-419(c) further provides:

REV_00263480

> "Deposition Taken in Another Action. -- A deposition lawfully taken in another action may be used like any other deposition if the other action was brought in any court of this State, of any other state, or of the United States, involved the same subject matter, and was brought between the same parties or their representatives or predecessors in interest."

Although Rule 2-419(c) applies only when the deponent is unavailable, the Court of Special Appeals held that because the defendants did not object to the depositions on this ground, they had waived the objection. No party has challenged before us this ruling by the Court of Special Appeals. [24]

n10 Federal Rule of Evidence 804(b)(1) provides:

> "Former Testimony. Testimony given as a witness at another hearing of the same or a different proceeding, or in a deposition taken in compliance with law in the course of the same or another proceeding, if the party against whom the testimony is now offered, or, in a civil action or proceeding, a predecessor in interest, had an opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony by direct, cross, or redirect examination."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit in Clay v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 722 F.2d 1289, 1295 (6th Cir.1983), cert. denied, 467 U.S. 1253, 104 S.Ct. 3537, 82 L.Ed.2d 842 (1984), quoting Weinstein & Berger, Evidence § 804(b)(1)[04], at 804-67 (1969), noted that "'cases decided since the enactment of 804(b)(1) for the most part indicate a reluctance to interpret "predecessor in interest" in its old, narrow, and substantive law sense, of privity.'" Accordingly, the court explained the former testimony hearsay exception contained in 804(b)(1) [25] as follows (Ibid., quoting Lloyd v. American Export Lines, Inc., 580 F.2d 1179, 1187 (3d Cir.), [643] cert. denied, > 439 U.S. 969, 99 S.Ct. 461, 58 L.Ed.2d 428 (1978)):

> "'if it appears that in the former suit a party having a like motive to cross-examine about the same matters as the present party would have, was accorded an adequate opportunity for such examination, the testimony may be received against the present party.' Under these circumstances, the previous party having like motive to develop the testimony about the same material facts is, in the final analysis, a predecessor in interest to the present party."

Thus, a "predecessor in interest" for the purposes of this rule is interpreted to include any party with a similar motive to develop the testimony. Privity between the two parties is no longer required. Deposition testimony is admissible if some other party, present at the deposition, had [*441] the same opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony as the party against whom the deposition is offered. Clay v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., supra, 722 F.2d at 1294-1295; Hendrix v. Raybestos-Manhattan, Inc., 776 F.2d 1492, 1505 (11th Cir.1985); [26] Dartez v. Fibreboard Corp., 765 F.2d 456, 462-463 (5th Cir.1985). As we have expressly adopted the substance of Federal Rule of Evidence 804(b)(1), we agree that "[m]otive to develop the testimony, [rather than privity between the parties], is the key factor" in assessing whether the parties present at the deposition are predecessors in interest for purposes of Maryland Rule 2-419(c). J. Murphy, Maryland Evidence Handbook § 802(D), at 259 (1989).

REV_00263481

In deciding whether the deposition testimony was properly admitted in these cases, we shall first address the principal argument of the defendant suppliers/installers as to why the deposition of Dr. Mancuso was improperly admitted against them. They argue that their interests were not adequately protected by the presence of the manufacturers at the Dr. Mancuso deposition because manufacturers of asbestos would not have the same motive to develop certain testimony as a supplier/installer would. Therefore, the argument continues, the manufacturers were not the predecessors in interest of suppliers/installers. In fact, the suppliers/installers argue, their interests conflict with the interests of the manufacturers [27] in this litigation.

The depositions were admitted for the limited purpose of proving "state of the art." As earlier explained, state of the art evidence is directly relevant to whether a product was defective when it was sold by a manufacturer. In a strict liability action, if a product is defective when it was sold by a manufacturer because it lacked a warning of its dangerous characteristics, although it should have had such a warning in light of the state of the art, and if the defective and dangerous product reaches the user plaintiff without substantial change, middlemen or intermediate sellers of the defective product are strictly liable to the plaintiff user just as the manufacturer is liable to the plaintiff. [*442] Restatement (Second) of Torts § 402A, Comment f; Eaton Corp. v. Wright, 281 Md. 80, 88-90, 375 A.2d 1122, 1126-1127 (1977). This principle, at least at the present stage of the law's development, is fully applicable in a strict liability failure to warn case. Prosser and Keeton explain as follows (Prosser and Keeton, Torts § 99, at 697 (5th ed. 1984), emphasis added):

> "It is commonly said that a product can be defective [28] in the kind of way that makes it unreasonably dangerous by failing to warn or failing adequately to warn about a risk or hazard related to the way a product is designed. But notwithstanding what a few courts have said, a claimant who seeks recovery on this basis must, according to the generally accepted view, prove that the manufacturer-designer was negligent. There will be no liability without a showing that the defendant designer knew or should have known in the exercise of ordinary care of the risk or hazard about which he failed to warn. . . .
>
> "There is one aspect of this so-called strict liability in addition to the matter of defenses and limitations on liability that distinguish it from negligence liability. When a manufacturer or assembler [644] markets without adequate warnings, a reseller is subject to liability without negligence in reselling the product without adequate warning. Thus, all those in the marketing chain subsequent to a sale by the manufacturer are liable without negligence for the negligence of the manufacturer in failing to warn or adequately to warn."

See also Nissen Corp. v. Miller, 323 Md. 613, 624, 594 A.2d 564, 569 (1991) [29] ("It is clear that Maryland espoused the doctrine of strict liability in tort in order to relieve plaintiffs of the burden of proving specific acts of negligence . . . where plaintiffs can prove a product is defective and unreasonably dangerous when placed in the stream of commerce") (emphasis added). Consequently, with respect to the strict liability claim of a plaintiff, intermediate sellers such as the suppliers/installers in the present case have the same interest as the manufacturers in attempting to show [*443] that the state of the art did not require a warning and that, therefore, the product was not defective under the principles of § 402A, Comment j, of the Restatement (Second) of Torts. n11 n11 The supplier/installers in the present case disagree that, with respect to the strict liability claims of the plaintiffs, the suppliers/installers and the manufacturers have the same interests concerning a deposition on state of the art. The supplier/installers argue that, whereas a manufacturer may be strictly liable to the plaintiffs if the product failed to contain warnings which were dictated by the state of the art, an intermediate supplier of the same product is not strictly liable to the plaintiffs unless he knew or, based on information actually given to him, should have known that a warning was required. While there might be merit in this argument if the plaintiffs' cause of action were based on negligence, as pointed out above the argument is inconsistent with the principles of strict liability under § 402A of the Restatement even as modified by Comment j. Furthermore, the defendants cite no cases, and we are aware of none, supporting the defendants' view of an intermediate seller's liability to a plaintiff in a strict liability cause of action.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00263482

We would agree that there is a circumstance when the interests of a supplier/installer and a manufacturer would not be the same in examining a deponent such as Dr. Mancuso. To the extent that the deposition might relate to an indemnity claim by the supplier/installer against the manufacturer, it would be to the supplier/installer's benefit to elicit testimony that, whereas expert medical and scientific information existed so as to warrant a warning by manufacturers, such information was not generally known outside the scientific community and would not have been readily available to non-manufacturing suppliers/installers. In the instant cases, however, the defendant suppliers/installers complain solely about the admission of the Dr. Mancuso deposition at the trial of the plaintiffs' claims. They have made no complaint about the evidence at the separate cross-claims trial.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [30]

The defendant Owens-Illinois has even less cause to complain about the admission of depositions under Maryland Rule 2-419(c). A defendant manufacturer was present at each of the depositions admitted against Owens-Illinois. Owens-Illinois clearly is held to the same "state of the art" standard as those defendants present at the depositions. The defendants at the depositions are predecessors in interest to Owens-Illinois because they had the same opportunity to develop the testimony. Therefore, these depositions fall within the former testimony exception to the rule [*444] against hearsay and are admissible against Owens-Illinois under Rule 2-419(c).

2.

We now turn to the defendants' argument that these depositions should not have been admitted because they do not address what was known to the expert, medical or scientific community but, rather, address what other asbestos manufacturing companies knew. As previously stated, all manufacturers are held to the knowledge and skill of an expert. Borel v. Fibreboard Paper Products Corporation, supra, 493 F.2d at 1089. The defendants' argument that this expert testimony is irrelevant because it relates only to [31] what individual companies discovered, "reflects a misunderstanding of a critical issue in any product liability action: the state of the art pertaining to any possible risks associated with the product." Dartez v. Fibreboard Corp., supra, 765 F.2d at 461.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit considered this argument [645] in an identical context in Dartez v. Fibreboard Corp., supra. That court determined that similar deposition evidence was relevant to the state of the art element of a products liability case, explaining (Ibid.) (emphasis added):

> "Dartez was required to establish that the dangers of asbestos were reasonably foreseeable or scientifically discoverable at the time of his exposure before these defendants could be found liable . . . . Borel holds all manufacturers to the > knowledge and skill of an expert. They are obliged to keep abreast of any scientific discoveries and are presumed to know the results of all such advances. Moreover, they each bear the duty to fully test their products to uncover all scientifically discoverable dangers before the products are sold . . . . The actual knowledge of an [32] individual manufacturer is not the issue."

REV_00263483

Accord Clay v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., supra, 722 F.2d at 1294-1295.

[*445] We agree with the United States Courts of Appeal for the Fifth and Sixth Circuits that deposition evidence concerning what scientific and medical experts in the field knew about the dangers of asbestos is relevant to the plaintiff's attempt to prove state of the art. Such expert evidence is not irrelevant merely because these experts were employed by private companies. Because manufacturers are held to the standards and knowledge of an expert, this evidence is relevant to show what was scientifically and medically available and discoverable by other experts in the field.

Moreover, "'the admissibility of expert testimony is a matter largely within the discretion of the trial court, and its action in admitting or excluding such testimony will seldom constitute a ground for reversal.'" Bloodsworth v. State, 307 Md. 164, 185-186, 512 A.2d 1056, 1067 (1986), quoting Raithel v. State, 280 Md. 291, 301, 372 A.2d 1069, 1074-1075 (1977). Here, the deposition evidence included statements [33] concerning the availability of published scientific and medical data about the dangers of asbestos exposure in addition to statements about the results of experiments conducted by experts on behalf of the Johns-Manville and Philip Carey Companies.

Furthermore, even if the admission of the depositions were an abuse of discretion, the defendants have not shown that the error was prejudicial. The live testimony of Dr. Schepers in large part duplicated the state of the art evidence in the depositions. Dr. Schepers testified that in 1930 there were approximately fifty medical articles concerning the dangers of asbestos and that by 1960 there were "nearly a thousand" such articles. Dr. Schepers further testified about experiments which he conducted with asbestos containing products on behalf of Owens-Illinois.

In light of the nature of the deposition testimony and the additional state of the art testimony by Dr. Schepers, the defendants have not shown that the admission of these depositions constituted reversible error.

[*446] II.

The defendant Owens-Illinois contends that the trial court should not have instructed the jury that the duty to warn continues after the defendant stops [34] manufacturing or selling products containing asbestos. The instruction only applied to the Zenobia case. The plaintiff Zenobia had argued that because he was a smoker and smoking aggravated the development of asbestosis, a post-exposure warning from Owens-Illinois would have prevented the aggravation of his disease. Owens-Illinois stopped manufacturing asbestos in 1958. Owens-Illinois' argument is not that, under the particular facts of this case, it was not required to give a warning after 1958. Instead, Owens-Illinois argues that, as a matter of law, a manufacturer has no duty whatsoever to warn after it stops manufacturing the product.

Generally, a manufacturer of a defective product has a duty to warn of product defects which the manufacturer discovers after the time of sale. As this Court stated in Rekab, Inc. v. Frank Hrubetz & Co., 261 Md. 141, 146, 274 A.2d 107, 110 (1971), [646] quoting 1 Frumer and Friedman, Products Liability § 8.02, at 148.3, "'[e]ven if there is no duty to warn at the time of the sale, facts may thereafter come to the attention of the manufacturer which make it imperative that a warning then be given.'" See, e.g., [35] LaBelle v. McCauley Ind. Corp., 649 F.2d 46, 48-49 (1st Cir.1981); Fell v. Kewanee Farm Equipment Co., 457 N.W.2d 911, 920 (Iowa 1990); Comstock v. General Motors Corp., 358 Mich. 163, 176, 99 N.W.2d 627, 634 (1959); Feldman v. Lederle Laboratories, 125 N.J. 117, 144, 592 A.2d 1176, 1190 (1991) ("a manufacturer is obligated to communicate a warning based on subsequently-acquired knowledge of the danger as soon as reasonably foreseeable"); Smith v. Selco Products, Inc., 96 N.C.App. 151, 158, 385 S.E.2d 173, 176-177 (1989), review denied, 326 N.C. 598, 393 S.E.2d 883 (1990) ("A manufacturer does not completely discharge its duty to warn simply by providing some warnings of some dangerous propensity of its product at the [*447] time of sale. A continuing duty exists to provide post-sale warnings of any deficiencies it learns exist in the product"). Therefore, if a manufacturer discovers a product defect after the time of sale, the manufacturer must make reasonable efforts to issue a post-sale warning. Rekab, Inc. v. Frank Hrubetz & Co., supra, 261 Md. at 147, 274 A.2d at 111, [36] quoting Levin v. Walter Kidde & Co., Inc., 251 Md. 560, 564, 248 A.2d 151, 154 (1968) ("The duty owed is a reasonable warning"). See also Comstock v. General Motors Corp., supra, 358 Mich. at 176, 99 N.W.2d at 634 (General Motors had a duty to "take all reasonable means to convey effective warning").

REV_00263484

Owens-Illinois does not argue that Rekab, Inc. v. Frank Hrubetz & Co., supra, was wrongly decided. In fact Owens-Illinois acknowledges its continuing duty to warn of defects. Nonetheless, it contends that, as a matter of law, its continuing duty to warn ceased when it stopped manufacturing asbestos products in 1958. Owens-Illinois relies on the assertion that "state of the art" information about the hazards of asbestos was no longer available to it after 1958. Alternatively, Owens-Illinois contends that even if it had known of the hazards of asbestos after 1958, it had no reasonable means of communicating a warning to the users of its products, including the plaintiff Zenobia.

We cannot agree with Owens-Illinois' reasoning. n12 As previously stated, the post-sale duty to warn requires [37] reasonable efforts to inform users of the hazard once the manufacturer is or should be aware of the need for a warning. Owens-Illinois was not precluded from showing that it did not become aware of the need for a warning or [*448] that, in light of the fact that it no longer manufactured the product, it made reasonable efforts to warn.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n12 The defendant Anchor Packing Co., Inc., makes a similar argument based on the fact that the plaintiff Zenobia was not exposed to asbestos products supplied by Anchor after 1953. Anchor argues that because Zenobia was no longer a user of the product, no reasonable effort to warn would have reached him. Our rejection of Owens-Illinois' continuing duty to warn argument also applies to Anchor Packing Co.'s argument.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The Supreme Court of Washington addressed this issue in Lockwood v. AC & S, Inc., 109 Wash.2d 235, 744 P.2d 605 (1987). The plaintiff Lockwood had asbestosis as a result of his exposure to a Raymark Industries product. Raymark argued [38] that documents revealing what it knew about the hazards of asbestos after 1972 were irrelevant because Lockwood's last exposure preceded 1972. The court rejected this argument, stating > (109 Wash.2d at 260, 744 P.2d at 691):

> "[W]e believe that if Raymark had made a reasonable effort to provide Lockwood with the information it acquired about the dangers of asbestos exposure after his retirement, the seriousness of his injury might have been reduced. Under those circumstances, Raymark had a continuing duty to warn Lockwood of the known dangers of its product after he was no longer exposed to it."

REV_00263485

required of actual knowledge of the defect and deliberate disregard of the consequences. The court also ruled that testimony from depositions, at which defendants were not present, was properly admitted under Md. R. Civ. P., Cir. Ct. 2-419.

OUTCOME: The court vacated and remanded the judgment that affirmed the judgment of the circuit court awarding compensatory damages against defendants, a manufacturer and two suppliers/installers of asbestos containing products, and punitive damages against defendant manufacturer in plaintiffs' action alleging that they were injured by exposure to asbestos, ruling that the jury was not properly instructed as to punitive damages.

CORE TERMS: punitive damages, manufacturer, strict liability, deposition, asbestos, warning, actual malice, failure to warn, motive, warn, cross-claim, seller, supplier, punitive damages award, actual knowledge, implied malice, non-intentional, products liability, installer, evil, compensatory damages, intent to injure, wanton, deliberate, standard of proof, gross negligence, malice, common law, defective product, hazard

CORE CONCEPTS - ◆ Hide Concepts

Torts > Products Liability > Strict Liability

In order to recover under a theory of strict liability, a plaintiff must show: (1) that the product was in a defective condition at the time it left the possession or control of the seller, (2) that it was unreasonably dangerous to the user or consumer, (3) that the defect was a cause of the injuries, and (4) that the product was expected to and did reach the consumer without substantial change in its condition. Thus, a seller of a defective product is subjected to strict liability without regard to the knowledge of the defect and even though the seller has exercised all possible care in the preparation and sale of the product.

Torts > Products Liability > Duty to Warn

The seller of a product is required to give warning against the danger, if he has knowledge, or by the application of reasonable, developed human skill and foresight should have knowledge, of the danger. A product bearing such a warning, which is safe for use if it is followed, is not in defective condition, nor is it unreasonably dangerous.

Torts > Products Liability > Duty to Warn

A manufacturer of a product, which is defective only because of the lack of an adequate warning, is not liable when the failure to warn resulted from an absence of knowledge of the dangerous quality of that product. Moreover, the presence of the required knowledge can be established by evidence that the dangerous quality of the product should have been known by a manufacturer because it was known in the scientific or expert community. The manufacturer is held to the knowledge and skill of an expert. This is relevant in determining (1) whether the manufacturer knew or should have known the danger. The manufacturer's status as expert means that at a minimum he must keep abreast of scientific knowledge, discoveries, and advances and is presumed to know what is imparted thereby.

Evidence > Witnesses > Expert Testimony

Industry standards and state of the art are not synonymous. State of the art includes all of the available knowledge on a subject at a given time, and this includes scientific, medical, engineering, and any other knowledge that may be available. State of the art includes the element of time: What is known and when was this knowledge available. This evidence concerning the presence or absence of knowledge in the expert community is called "state of the art" evidence.

REV_00263468

The court cautioned that the "warning should be required to the extent practicable" under the circumstances. [647]

The fact that a manufacturer or seller has discontinued its asbestos product line, and the fact that the plaintiff was no longer exposed to its product, are not circumstances which should necessarily relieve the seller of its duty to warn. Rather, these factors are relevant to a determination of what reasonable efforts to discover the danger and to warn are required. n13 A seller is not entitled to automatic relief from its continuing duty to warn [39] merely because it no longer manufacturers a defective product.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n13 See V. Schwartz, The Post-Sale Duty to Warn: Two Unfortunate Forks in the Road to a Reasonable Doctrine, > 58 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 892, 896 (1983):

> "[T]he facts of a particular case, such as the gravity and likelihood of harm, the number of persons affected, and the economic cost and practical problems associated with identifying and contacting current product users, should all be relevant in determining whether a manufacturer has satisfactorily discharged a post-sale duty to warn."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*449] III.

The defendant Anchor Packing Co. makes two additional arguments. It asserts that because the verdict for compensatory damages was excessive in the Zenobia case, the trial court should have granted its motion for new trial or for remittitur. In addition, it argues that the plaintiff Zenobia failed to show that the products which Anchor Packing Co. supplied or installed contained asbestos or that Zenobia was exposed to Anchor Packing [40] Co.'s products. The record in the Zenobia case does not support Anchor Packing Co.'s arguments.

The granting or denial of a motion for new trial based upon the excessiveness of damages or a motion for remittitur is within the discretion of the trial court. As stated by this Court in Banegura v. Taylor, 312 Md. 609, 624, 541 A.2d 969, 976 (1988), quoting

> Kirkpatrick v. Zimmerman, 257 Md. 215, 218, 262 A.2d 531, 532 (1970):
> "[A]n abuse of that discretion may be reviewed by an appellate court . . . but . . . '[w]e know of no case where this Court has ever disturbed the exercise of the lower court's discretion in denying a motion for [a] new trial because of the inadequacy or excessiveness of [compensatory] damages.'"

The plaintiff Zenobia produced medical evidence that showed that his injuries are permanent and progressive. We cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to grant Anchor Packing Co.'s motion for new trial or remittitur.

With respect to Anchor Packing Co.'s second argument that the plaintiff Zenobia failed to show that he was exposed to products which contained asbestos [41] supplied by Anchor Packing Co., it is simply not supported by the factual record in this case. The plaintiff Zenobia testified that he had handled gaskets used on high temperature steam lines bearing the label "Anchor Packing" while working at the Maryland Shipbuilding and Drydock. He testified that he cut and hammered these products supplied by [*450] Anchor Packing Co. and that these products generated dust. Furthermore, Anchor Packing Co. admitted to selling gaskets containing asbestos designed for high temperature steam lines. This testimony undercuts Anchor Packing Co.'s argument that Zenobia failed to prove that he was exposed to Anchor Packing Co.'s asbestos containing products.

REV_00263486

IV.

In granting the petitions for a writ of certiorari in these cases, this Court issued an order requesting that the briefs and argument encompass the following issue:

> "In light of the concurring opinion of Judges Eldridge, Chasanow, and Cole in Schaefer v. Miller, 322 Md. 297, 312-332, 587 A.2d 491 (1991), what should be the correct standard under Maryland law for the allowance of punitive damages in negligence and products liability cases, i.e., gross [42] negligence, actual malice, or some other standard. See, e.g., Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Co., 267 Md. 149, 297 A.2d 721 (1972); Davis v. Gordon, 183 Md. 129, 36 A.2d 699 (1944)."

See Maryland Rule 8-131(b).

As noted in the opinion of Judges Eldridge, Cole and Chasanow in Schaefer v. Miller, supra, [648] 322 Md. at 312-332, 587 A.2d at 498-509, in recent years there has been a proliferation of claims for punitive damages in tort cases, and awards of punitive damages have often been extremely high. See 2 J. Ghiardi and J. Kircher, Punitive Damages Law and Practice § 21.01, at 2 (1985); D. Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, 49 U.Chi.L.Rev. 1, 6 (1982) ("Large assessments of punitive damages may not yet be a major threat to the continued viability of most manufacturing concerns, but the increasing number and size of such awards may fairly raise concern for the future stability of American industry"); M. Peterson, S. Sarma, M. Shanley, Punitive Damages, (Rand, The Institute for Civil Justice, 1987); J. [43] Sales and K. Cole, Punitive Damages: A Relic [*451] That Has Outlived Its Origins, 37 Vand.L.Rev. 1117, 1154 (1984) ("the amount of punitive damages awarded in recent years . . . has escalated to astronomical figures that boggle the mind"). But see S. Daniels and J. Martin, Myth and Reality in Punitive Damages, 75 Minn.L.Rev. 1 (1990).

Accompanying this increase in punitive damages claims, awards and amounts of awards, is renewed criticism of the concept of punitive damages in a tort system designed primarily to compensate injured parties for harm. See, e.g., E. Elliott, Why Punitive Damages Don't Deter Corporate Misconduct Effectively, 40 Ala.L.Rev. 1053 (1989); Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, U.S. , , 111 S.Ct. 1032, 1043, 113 L.Ed.2d 1, 20 (1991). In Maryland the criticism has been partly fueled and justified because juries are provided with imprecise and uncertain characterizations of the type of conduct which will expose a defendant to a potential award of punitive damages. Accordingly, we shall (1) examine these characterizations of a defendant's conduct [44] in light of the historic objectives of punitive damages, (2) more precisely define the nature of conduct potentially subject to a punitive damages award in non-intentional tort cases, and (3) heighten the standard of proof required of a plaintiff seeking an award of punitive damages.

These cases, along with two others heard by us on the same day, n14 directly raise the problem of what basic standard of wrongful conduct should be used for the allowance of punitive damages in negligence actions generally, and in products liability actions based on either negligence or on strict liability. The jury in these cases received the following instruction on punitive damages:

REV_00263487

> "Implied malice, which the plaintiffs have to prove in order to recover punitive damages in this case, requires a finding by you of a wanton disposition, grossly irresponsible [*452] to the rights of others, extreme recklessness and utter disregard for the rights of others."

Similarly, the Court of Special Appeals evaluated the evidence and stated that in order to affirm a punitive damages award,

> "[w]e . . . require a showing that the defendant conducted itself 'in an extraordinary manner characterized by [45] a wanton and reckless disregard for the rights of others.'"

MCIC, Inc. v. Zenobia, 86 Md.App. 456, 466, 587 A.2d 531, 536 (1991), quoting Eagle-Picher v. Balbos, 84 Md.App. 10, 73, 578 A.2d 228, 259 (1990), cert. granted, 322 Md. 737, 589 A.2d 968 (1991). Each court required the plaintiffs to show by a preponderance of evidence that the defendants acted with "implied" rather than "actual" malice. That is, the plaintiffs were not required to show that the defendants' conduct was characterized by evil motive, intent to injure, fraud, or actual knowledge of the defective nature of the products coupled with a deliberate disregard of the consequences. Instead, the plaintiffs were required to show only that the defendants' conduct was grossly negligent.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n14 Eagle-Picher Industries, Inc., et al. v. Balbos, et al. (No. 22, Sept. Term 1991); Owens-Illinois, Inc. v. Armstrong, et al. (No. 77, Sept. Term 1991).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The standard [46] applied by the trial court and the Court of Special Appeals results from, and consequently requires reexamination of, some of the decisions of this Court relating to punitive damages. That [649] re-examination involves two separate rulings by this Court over the past twenty years. First, the injuries of the plaintiffs are surrounded by "contractual" relationships, e.g., the employment contract, the contracts to produce/supply asbestos, etc. Consequently, these cases call into question the validity of this Court's holdings in H & R Block v. Testerman, 275 Md. 36, 338 A.2d 48 (1975), and Wedeman v. City Chevrolet, 278 Md. 524, 366 A.2d 7 (1976), that, when a contract is involved, the standard for an award of punitive damages differs depending on whether the tortious conduct occurs before or after the contract. Second, these cases challenge the application of the implied malice standard of Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Co., supra, to a negligence or other non-intentional tort case.

[*453] A.

For the reasons set out more fully in the opinion of Judges Eldridge, Cole and Chasanow in Schaefer v. Miller, supra, 322 Md. at 312-322, 587 A.2d at 498-509, [47] we abandon the "arising out of contract" distinction drawn in H & R Block v. Testerman, supra, Wedeman v. City Chevrolet, supra, and their progeny, for the purposes of allowing an award of punitive damages in tort cases. Under the Testerman-Wedeman rule, where a contractual relationship existed, the basic standard for exposure to punitive damage liability would vary depending on whether the wrongful conduct took place before or after the formation of the contract. The Testerman-Wedeman principle required that, if the wrongful conduct constituting the basis for a punitive damages claim occurred after the formation of a contract, the plaintiff must prove actual malice in order for the jury to consider an award of punitive damages, but if the wrongful conduct occurred before the formation of a contract, punitive damages were allowable upon a showing of "implied" malice. H & R Block v. Testerman, supra, 275 Md. at 46-47, 338 A.2d at 54; Wedeman v. City Chevrolet, supra, 278 Md. at 532, 366 A.2d at 13. n15

REV_00263488

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n15 Defective product actions, "[i]n a very real sense, . . . arise out of a contractual relationship." American Laundry Mach. v. Horan, 45 Md.App. 97, 116, 412 A.2d 407, 419 (1980). Despite this statement in the first Court of Special Appeals case to consider punitive damages in a defective product negligence action, the Court of Special Appeals has consistently held that implied malice will suffice to support an award of punitive damages in a products liability case. See MCIC, Inc. v. Zenobia, 86 Md.App. 456, 466, 587 A.2d 531, 536 (1991); Owens-Illinois v. Armstrong, 87 Md.App. 699, 719, 591 A.2d 544, 553, cert. granted, 324 Md. 90, 595 A.2d 1077 (1991); Eagle-Picher v. Balbos, 84 Md.App. 10, 72-73, 578 A.2d 228, 259 (1990), cert. granted, 322 Md. 737, 589 A.2d 968 (1991); Harley-Davidson Motor Co., Inc. v. Wisniewski, 50 Md.App. 339, 437 A.2d 700 (1981), cert. denied, 292 Md. 596 (1982); American Laundry Mach. v. Horan, supra.

In American Laundry Mach. v. Horan, supra, 45 Md.App. at 116, 412 A.2d at 419, the Court of Special Appeals reasoned that because the contract was not one between the party injured and the manufacturer of the product, the tort did not "arise out of a contract" and that the "standard to be applied, therefore, is not that stated in Testerman, but rather the 'legal equivalent' implied malice standard normally applicable in tort cases." Ibid. Because of the approach we take in this case, we need not express any view concerning this reasoning by the Court of Special Appeals.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [48]

[*454] "[T]he purposes [650] of punitive damages relate entirely to the nature of the defendant's conduct." Schaefer v. Miller, supra, 322 Md. at 321, 587 A.2d at 503. Whether the tort occurred before or after the formation of a contractual relationship should not determine whether actual or implied malice is required for allowing an award of punitive damages. Rather, the availability of a punitive damages award ought to depend upon the heinous nature of the defendant's tortious conduct. Schaefer, 322 Md. at 321-322, 587 A.2d at 503. See, e.g., Vancherie v. Siperly, 243 Md. 366, 373-374, 221 A.2d 356, 360 (1966); McClung-Logan v. Thomas, 226 Md. 136, 148, 172 A.2d 494, 500 (1961); Davis v. Gordon, supra, 183 Md. at 133-134, 36 A.2d at 701; Heinze v. Murphy, 180 Md. 423, 431-432, 24 A.2d 917, 921-922 (1942); Nichols v. Meyer, 139 Md. 450, 457, 115 A. 786, 788 (1921); Baltimore and Ohio R.R. Co. v. Boyd, 63 Md. 325, 334-335 (1885).

Awarding punitive [49] damages based upon the heinous nature of the defendant's tortious conduct furthers the historical purposes of punitive damages -- punishment and deterrence. Schaefer v. Miller, supra, 322 Md. at 321, 587 A.2d at 503; Embrey v. Holly, 293 Md. 128, 142, 442 A.2d 966, 973 (1982); First Nat'l Bank v. Fid. & Dep. Co., 283 Md. 228, 232, 389 A.2d 359, 361 (1978). Thus, punitive damages are awarded in an attempt to punish a defendant whose conduct is characterized by evil motive, intent to injure, or fraud, and to warn others contemplating similar conduct of the serious risk of monetary liability.

Because the Testerman-Wedeman distinction focuses on when the conduct occurred rather than on the nature of the conduct, it has no relationship to the purposes of punitive damages. Furthermore, the "'arising out of contractual relations' rule formulated in Testerman and Wedeman had no support in the Maryland cases relied on in the Testerman [*455] and Wedeman opinions." Schaefer v. Miller, supra, 322 Md. at 316, 587 A.2d at 501. As more fully [50] set out in Schaefer, 322 Md. at 322-323, 587 A.2d at 504, the Testerman-Wedeman rule has led to irrational results and its application has been inconsistent.

REV_00263489

The irrational and inconsistent application of a punitive damages standard undermines the objective of deterrence because persons cannot predict, and thus choose to abstain from, the type of behavior that is sanctioned by a punitive damages award. Consequently we abandon the "arising out of a contract" distinction "and return to the principles relating to punitive damages which had prevailed in this State for many, many years before Testerman." Schaefer v. Miller, supra, 322 Md. at 327, 587 A.2d at 506.

B.

In the years before Testerman, this Court had articulated two standards governing an award of punitive damages in non-intentional tort cases. The test that applied prior to 1972 was that "punitive damages were not recoverable in negligence actions absent actual malice or similar wrongful motive. They were not recoverable on an implied malice basis no matter how gross, reckless, or wanton the defendant's conduct might be." Schaefer v. Miller, supra, 322 Md. at 327, 587 A.2d at 506. [51] Although articulated in various ways, the so called "actual malice" standard was explained in an earlier case as follows:

> "[T]o entitle one to such damages there must be an element of fraud, or malice, or evil intent . . . entering into and forming part of the wrongful act. It is in such cases as these that exemplary or punitive damages are awarded as a punishment for the evil motive or intent with which the act is done, and as an example or warning to others."

Philadelphia, W. & B.R. Co. v. Hoeflich, 62 Md. 300, 307 (1884). See, e.g., Davis v. Gordon, supra, 183 Md. at 133, 36 A.2d at 701 (in negligence cases, punitive damages are [*456] awarded as a punishment for evil motive or intent); Heinze v. Murphy, supra, 180 Md. at 429-431, 24 A.2d at 921 ("fraud, malice, or evil intent" is required).

In Davis v. Gordon, supra, this Court refused to adopt an implied malice standard for the allowance of punitive damages in a negligence action and held that there must be "actual malice." In reaching this conclusion, the Court analyzed whether the adoption of an [52] implied malice standard would serve the deterrent and penal objectives of punitive damages. 183 Md. at 133, 36 A.2d at 701. Because the implied malice standard would not further either objective of punishment or deterrence, it was rejected.

In 1972 this Court, for the first time in a non-intentional tort action, allowed an award of punitive damages based upon implied malice. Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Co., supra. The Court in Smith relied upon out-of-state authority to allow the plaintiff to recover punitive damages upon a showing that the defendant was guilty of "gross negligence," which was defined as a "wanton or reckless disregard for human life." Smith, 267 Md. at 167, 297 A.2d at 731. n16 The Smith opinion did not attempt [651] to analyze how this newly established "gross negligence" standard would promote the objectives of punitive damages.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n16 Judge Marvin Smith, dissenting in Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Co., supra, 267 Md. at 173-174, 297 A.2d at 734-735, discussed the inconsistency between the majority's opinion and earlier Maryland cases, including Davis v. Gordon, supra.

REV_00263490

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [53]

The gross negligence standard has led to inconsistent results and frustration of the purposes of punitive damages in non-intentional tort cases. Schaefer v. Miller, supra, 322 Md. at 332, 587 A.2d at 508. Such a possibility was foreseen by the Smith Court, as the majority in Smith expressed concern that a test requiring "wanton" conduct or "reckless disregard of the rights of others" presented "the danger of . . . a test which may be so flexible that it can become virtually unlimited in its application." Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Co., supra, 267 Md. at 166, 297 A.2d at [*457] 731. Despite the Smith Court's limitation of the implied malice standard to torts involving the operation of motor vehicles, the standard has been freely applied to other non-intentional torts. See, e.g., Exxon Corp. v. Yarema, 69 Md.App. 124, 516 A.2d 990 (1986), cert. denied, 309 Md. 47, 522 A.2d 392 (1987); Medina v. Meilhammer, 62 Md.App. 239, 489 A.2d 35, cert. denied, 303 Md. 683, 496 A.2d 683 (1985); [54] American Laundry Mach. v. Horan, 45 Md.App. 97, 412 A.2d 407 (1980). See also Liscombe v. Potomac Edison Co., 303 Md. 619, 637, 495 A.2d 838, 847 (1985) (assuming, without deciding, that the Smith holding was applicable to non-intentional torts not involving the operation of motor vehicles).

In the face of "a literal explosion of punitive damage law and practice," n17 many states have acted to define more accurately the type of conduct which can form the basis for a punitive damages award. In Tuttle v. Raymond, 494 A.2d 1353 (Me.1985), the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine reviewed its law on punitive damages. The implied malice standard applied by the lower courts in Tuttle allowed recovery of punitive damages upon a showing that the defendant's conduct was "wanton, malicious, reckless or grossly negligent." 494 A.2d at 1360. The court rejected this standard, stating

> (494 A.2d at 1361):
> "'Gross' negligence simply covers too broad and too vague an area of behavior, resulting in an unfair and inefficient use of the doctrine of punitive damages . . . . A [55] similar problem exists with allowing punitive damages based merely upon 'reckless' conduct. 'To sanction punitive damages solely upon the basis of conduct characterized as heedless disregard of the consequences would be to allow virtually limitless imposition of punitive damages.'"

The Maine court went on to point out that the implied malice standard "overextends the availability of punitive [*458] damages" and consequently "dulls the potentially keen edge of the doctrine as an effective deterrent of truly reprehensible conduct." Ibid. See also Rawlings v. Apodaca, 151 Ariz. 149, 162, 726 P.2d 565, 578 (1986) ("We do not believe that the concept of punitive damages should be stretched. We restrict its availability to those cases in which the defendant's wrongful conduct was guided by evil motives"); Preston v. Murty, 32 Ohio St.3d 334, 335, 512 N.E.2d 1174, 1175-1176 (1987) ("this [recklessness] is the type of malice which has remained frustratingly vague . . . a positive element of wrongdoing is always required"); Lee v. Bank of America, 218 Cal.App.3d 914, 920, 267 Cal.Rptr. 387, 390 (2d Dist.1990) [56] (gross negligence or recklessness is not enough); First Interstate Bank of Nevada v. Jafbros Auto Body Inc., 106 Nev. 54, 56-57, 787 P.2d 765, 767 (1990) (without substantial evidence of oppression, fraud, or malice, even unconscionable irresponsibility will not support a punitive damages award). n18

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n17 2 J. Ghiardi and J. Kircher, Punitive Damages Law and Practice § 21.01, at 2 (1985).

REV_00263491

n18 See American College of Trial Lawyers, Committee Report on Punitive Damages, at 6 and n. 23 (1989):

> "[I]t appears that the law is evolving in many jurisdictions to require that there be some conscious indifference to the rights of others before punitive damages are warranted.
>
> * * *
>
> "See, e.g., Rawlings v. Apodaca, 151 Ariz. 149, 726 P.2d 565 (1986); Freeman v. Anderson, 279 Ark. 282, 651 S.W.2d 450 (1983); Jardel v. Hughes, 523 A.2d 518 (Del.1987); Tuttle v. Raymond, supra,; Preston v. Murty, 32 Ohio St.3d 334, 512 N.E.2d 1174 (1987); Enright v. Lubow, 202 N.J.Super. 58, 493 A.2d 1288 (App.Div.1985)."

The Committee recommended, at 12, that the following standards be used:

> "[P]ermitting punitive awards based merely on different degrees of carelessness or inadvertent conduct exacerbates the already difficult problem of articulating a clear standard to be employed by the trier of fact and for review on appeal. Thus, the logical and practical line of demarcation should be drawn at the point where the defendant realizes that his or her conduct will, or that there is a strong probability that it may, cause the resulting harm. Conduct, such as extreme carelessness, which does not involve this basic element of consciousness should not be the subject of punitive damages."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [57]

[652]

As previously indicated, arbitrary and inconsistent application of the standard for awarding punitive damages frustrates [*459] the dual purposes of punishment and deterrence. Implied malice as that term has been used, with its various and imprecise formulations, fosters this uncertainty. As pointed out by Professor Ellis, (D. Ellis, Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, > 56 S.Cal.L.Rev. 1, 52-53 (1982)):

> "[T]he law of punitive damages is characterized by a high degree of uncertainty that stems from the use of a multiplicity of vague, overlapping terms . . . . Accordingly, there is little reason to believe that only deserving defendants are punished, or that fair notice of punishable conduct is provided."

See also D. Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 Mich.L.Rev. 1257, 1283 n. 135 (1976) ("any definition of the punishable conduct, such as marketing a product in 'reckless,' 'wanton,' or 'flagrant' disregard of the public safety will necessarily be quite vague"); J. Henderson and A. Twerski, Doctrinal Collapse in Products Liability: The Empty Shell of Failure to Warn, 65 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 265, 290 (1990); [58] D. Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, supra, U.Chi.L.Rev. at 23 ("reckless" standard exposes the defendant to punitive damages liability even if the decision was made in good faith).

REV_00263492

The implied malice test adopted in Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Co. has been overbroad in its application and has resulted in inconsistent jury verdicts involving similar facts. It provides little guidance for individuals and companies to enable them to predict behavior that will either trigger or avoid punitive damages liability, and it undermines the deterrent effect of these awards. n19

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n19 See 2 L. Schlueter and K. Redden, Punitive Damages, Appendix B, at 418-419 (2nd ed. 1989), explaining:

> "Punitive damage awards can only affect behavior if an actor is able to conform to established standards of conduct. If the standards are constantly changing, the actor may be unable to predict accurately the line that separates desirable from undesirable conduct. A potential defendant will either become too cautious, refusing to engage in socially beneficial behavior or will follow a course of behavior that imposes more harm on society than benefit."

Accord D. Owen, The Moral Foundation of Punitive Damages, 40 Ala.L.Rev. 705, 729 (1989); E. Elliott, Why Punitive Damages Don't Deter Corporate Misconduct Effectively, 40 Ala.L.Rev. 1053, 1057-1060, 1065 (1989); D. Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, 49 U.Chi.L.Rev. 1, 22-23, 47-49 (1982).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [59]

[*460] Therefore, we overrule Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Co. and its progeny, including Nast v. Lockett, 312 Md. 343, 539 A.2d 1113 (1988). In a non-intentional tort action, the trier of facts may not award punitive damages unless the plaintiff has established that the defendant's conduct was characterized by evil motive, intent to injure, ill will, or fraud, i.e., "actual malice." n20 See Davis v. Gordon, supra, 183 Md. at 133, 36 A.2d at 701. n21

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n20 We recognize that the term "actual malice" has meant different things in the law, that its popular connotation may not always be the same as its legal meaning, and that its use has been criticized. See, e.g., Masson v. New Yorker Magazine, Inc., U.S. , , 111 S.Ct. 2419, 2430, 115 L.Ed.2d 447, 469 (1991); Hart-Hanks Communications, Inc. v. Connaughton, 491 U.S. 657, 666 n. 7, 109 S.Ct. 2678, 2685, 105 L.Ed.2d 562, 576 (1989); Ross v. State, 308 Md. 337, 340 n. 1, 519 A.2d 735, 736 n. 1. Nevertheless, we simply use the term in this opinion as a shorthand method of referring to conduct characterized by evil motive, intent to injure, ill will, or fraud. In instructing juries with respect to punitive damages, however, it would be preferable for trial judges not to use the term "actual malice." [60] n21 The scope of this opinion primarily encompasses the standard of conduct which will support an award of punitive damages in so called non-intentional tort cases, i.e. negligence and strict liability cases. In addition, our overruling of the Testerman-Wedeman "arising out of contract" principle is applicable to all tort actions. We shall not at this time, however, reconsider or modify the legal principles concerning the type of conduct which will support an award of punitive damages in so-called intentional tort actions, i.e., tort actions other than negligence and strict liability. To some extent, the applicable legal principles are reviewed in Schaefer v. Miller, 322 Md. 297, 319-320, 587 A.2d 491, 502-503 (1991).

REV_00263493

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[653]

C.

"Actual malice," defined above as conduct of the defendant characterized by evil motive, intent to injure, ill will, or fraud, does not translate easily into products liability cases. [*461] "Products liability" actions are those cases in which the cause of action arises from an injury caused by a defective product. The theories [61] of liability in such cases are negligence, strict liability and breach of warranty. n22 As we held in Part B above, in ordinary non-intentional tort cases, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant's conduct was characterized by an evil motive or intent to injure, or defraud the plaintiff. Davis v. Gordon, supra, 183 Md. at 133, 36 A.2d at 701. Nevertheless, it is not likely that a manufacturer or supplier of a defective product would specifically intend to harm a particular consumer. We agree with the academic commentary and the courts that "[t]he manufacturer of a defective product operating in vastly different circumstances, . . . will require a unique description of what specific conduct will render it liable for punitive damages." 2 Ghiardi and Kircher, Punitive Damages Law and Practice, supra, § 6.04 at 12. Some form of "knowledge" of a defect and a subsequent disregard of the danger are required for allowing an award of punitive damages in most jurisdictions. After a survey of the cases, Ghiardi and Kircher state (§ 6.21 at 98):

> "In summary, case law establishes that a defendant must have specific knowledge of a product's defect [62] and its potential for harm before an exemplary award is appropriate. This knowledge is usually gained through defendant's testing procedures before marketing or through postmarketing consumer accident reports and complaints received by the defendant."

See, e.g., Donahue v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 866 F.2d 1008, 1013-1014 (8th Cir.1989) (applying Missouri law); Fell [*462] v. Kewanee Farm Equipment Co., supra, 457 N.W.2d at 919-920.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n22 In Maryland a breach of warranty suit is a contract action. See Nissen Corp. v. Miller, 323 Md. 613, 619, 594 A.2d 564, 567 (1991); Frericks v. General Motors Corp., 278 Md. 304, 307, 363 A.2d 460, 461 (1976); Frericks v. General Motors Corp., 274 Md. 288, 299, 336 A.2d 118, 125 (1975); Volkswagen of America v. Young, 272 Md. 201, 220, 321 A.2d 737, 747 (1974). Therefore, like any other contract action, punitive damages are not recoverable under a breach of warranty count.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [63]

We believe that in products liability cases the equivalent of the "evil motive," "intent to defraud," or "intent to injure," which generally characterizes "actual malice," is actual knowledge of the defect and deliberate disregard of the consequences. Therefore, in order for actual malice to be found in a products liability case, regardless of whether the cause of action for compensatory damages is based on negligence or strict liability, the plaintiff must prove (1) actual knowledge of the defect on the part of the defendant, and (2) the defendant's conscious or deliberate disregard of the foreseeable harm resulting from the defect.

REV_00263494

The knowledge component, which we hold is necessary to support an award of punitive damages, does not mean "constructive knowledge" or "substantial knowledge" or "should have known." More is required to expose a defendant to a potential punitive damages award. The plaintiff must show that the defendant actually knew of the defect and of the danger of the product at the time the product [654] left the defendant's possession or control. n23 See Sch. Dist. of Independence v. U.S. Gypsum, 750 S.W.2d 442, 446 (Mo.App.1988) ("No Missouri [64] case has permitted submission of punitive damage claim in a strict products liability case on the theory that the defendant should have known of a dangerous defect in its product"). n24

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n23 Actual knowledge, however, does include the wilful refusal to know. See, e.g., State v. McCallum, 321 Md. 451, 458-461, 583 A.2d 250, 253-255 (1991) (Chasanow, J., concurring) ("'[K]nowledge' exists where a person believes that it is probable that something is a fact, but deliberately shuts his or her eyes or avoids making reasonable inquiry with a conscious purpose to avoid learning the truth.") Therefore, a defendant cannot shut his eyes or plug his ears when he is presented with evidence of a defect and thereby avoid liability for punitive damages.

n24 For cases involving instances where the plaintiffs demonstrated the actual knowledge required, see, e.g., Fischer v. Johns-Manville Corp., 103 N.J. 643, 672, 512 A.2d 466, 481 (1986) ("the evidence supports a finding that Johns-Manville knew of the dangers created by its product. Not only did it fail to warn users of the serious health hazards associated with exposure to asbestos, it actually took affirmative steps to conceal this information from the public"); Tetuan v. A.H. Robins Co., 241 Kan. 441, 484, 738 P.2d 1210, 1240 (1987) ("Far from simply being 'grossly negligent' in marketing the Dalkon Shield, there was substantial evidence to conclude that Robins deliberately, intentionally, and actively concealed the dangers of the Shield for year after year").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [65]

[*463] Furthermore, the plaintiff is required to show that, armed with this actual knowledge, the defendant consciously or deliberately disregarded the potential harm to consumers. Professor Owen suggests the term "flagrant indifference." D. Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, supra, 74 Mich.L.Rev. at 1369. We prefer the characterization "conscious or deliberate disregard," and emphatically state that negligence alone, no matter how gross, wanton, or outrageous, will not satisfy this standard. Instead the test requires a bad faith decision by the defendant to market a product, knowing of the defect and danger, in conscious or deliberate disregard of the threat to the safety of the consumer.

D.

The defendant Owens-Illinois and several amici argue that a theory of strict liability in tort is inconsistent with an award of punitive damages because strict liability by its nature does not require a showing of fault, and an award of punitive damages requires fault to be valid. Although a few commentators have endorsed this argument, n25 the majority of courts which have considered the issue have found no logical inconsistency in allowing a punitive damages [66] award in a strict liability action. See Sturm, Ruger & Co., Inc. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 46-47 (Alaska 1979), cert. [*464] denied, 454 U.S. 894, 102 S.Ct. 391, 70 L.Ed.2d 209 (1981); Masaki v. General Motors Corp., 71 Haw. 1, 9-11, 780 P.2d 566, 571-572 (1989); Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727, 732 (Minn.), cert. denied sub nom. Riegel Textile Corp. v. Gryc, 449 U.S. 921, 101 S.Ct. 320, 66 L.Ed.2d 149 (1980); Fischer v. Johns-Manville Corp., 103 N.J. 643, 652-654, 512 A.2d 466, 470-471 (1986);

REV_00263495

Torts > Products Liability > Strict Liability
In a failure to warn case, negligence concepts to some extent have been grafted onto strict liability. In such cases, an element of knowledge or "state of the art" evidence is directly pertinent to a cause of action, and liability is no longer entirely "strict."

Torts > Products Liability > Strict Liability
Despite the overlap of negligence principles in a strict liability failure to warn case, strict liability differs from a negligence cause of action in that contributory negligence is not a defense to a strict liability claim.

Torts > Products Liability > Strict Liability
In a strict liability failure to warn case, "state of the art" evidence is relevant with regard to the defendant's liability. The seller is required to give a warning if he has knowledge, or by the application of reasonable, developed human skill and foresight should have knowledge of the danger.

Torts > Products Liability > Strict Liability
Despite the use of the term "strict liability" the seller is not an insurer, as absolute liability is not imposed on the seller for any injury resulting from the use of his product.

Torts > Products Liability > Strict Liability
In a strict liability cause of action where the alleged defect is a failure to give adequate warnings, the seller is not strictly liable for failure to warn unless the seller has knowledge, or by the application of reasonable, developed human skill and foresight should have knowledge, of the presence of the danger. For purposes of the "should have knowledge" component, a manufacturer of a product is held to the knowledge of an expert in the field.

Torts > Products Liability > Strict Liability
The knowledge or state of the art component is an element to be proven by the plaintiff. In a strict liability failure to warn case, the alleged defect is the failure of the seller to give an adequate warning. The seller, however, need not give any warning if the requisite state of the art or knowledge does not require it. Thus, where a product lacks a warning because of insufficient knowledge on the part of the manufacturer or in the scientific field involved, the product is not defective. As defectiveness is an element to be proven by the plaintiff, the knowledge or state of the art component is not an affirmative defense.

Evidence > Hearsay Rule & Exceptions > Former Testimony of Unavailable Declarant
Depositions meeting the requirements of Md. R. Civ. P., Cir. Ct. 2-419 may be admissible under the former testimony exception to the rule against hearsay. The substance of Fed. R. Civ. P. 804(b)(1) is the test for the admissibility of former testimony.

Evidence > Hearsay Rule & Exceptions > Former Testimony of Unavailable Declarant
Md. R. Civ. P., Cir. Ct. 2-419(a)(3)(C) provides that deposition testimony may be used when the deponent is unavailable. Rule 2-419(c) further provides that a deposition lawfully taken in another action may be used like any other deposition if the other action was brought in any court of this state, of any other state, or of the United States, involved the same subject matter, and was brought between the same parties or their representatives or predecessors in interest.

Evidence > Hearsay Rule & Exceptions > Former Testimony of Unavailable Declarant
Fed. R. Evid. 804(b)(1) provides that testimony given as a witness at another hearing

REV_00263469

Home Ins. Co. v. American Home Products, 75 N.Y.2d 196, 204, 551 N.Y.S.2d 481, 486, 550 N.E.2d 930, 935 (1990); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis.2d 260, 270, 294 N.W.2d 437, 443 (1980); Fleet & Semple v. Hollenkemp, 52 Ky. 219, 225-226 (1852) (first case recognizing punitive damages in strict liability and rejecting the argument that they are inconsistent). See also cases cited in R. Lockwood, [67] Annotation, Allowance of Punitive Damages in Products Liability Case, 29 A.L.R.3d 1021, 1022 (1970) and Supplemental Cases. But see Scott v. Fruehauf Corp., 302 S.C. 364, 370, 396 S.E.2d 354, 357 (1990); Butcher v. Robertshaw Controls Co., 550 F.Supp. 692, 705 (D.Md.1981); Doe v. Miles Laboratories, Inc., 675 F.Supp. 1466, 1481 (D.Md.1987), [655] aff'd, 927 F.2d 187 (4th Cir.1991).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n25 See, e.g., 2 Ghiardi and Kircher, Punitive Damages Law and Practice, supra, § 6.01 at 2-5; F. Tozer, Punitive Damages and Products Liability, 39 Ins. Counsel J. 300 (1972). But see D. Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 Mich.L.Rev. 1257, 1268-1271 (1976) (where the author systematically raises and rejects each argument concerning the incompatibility of strict liability actions and punitive damages awards).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The plaintiffs before trial in these cases dismissed [68] all theories of liability except for strict liability. Thus, as stated in Part I, in order to recover compensatory damages under a strict liability theory, the plaintiffs were required to prove:

> "(1) [that] the product was in a defective condition at the time it left the possession or control of the seller;
>
> (2) that it was unreasonably dangerous to the user or consumer;
>
> (3) that the defect was a cause of the injuries;
>
> (4) that the product was expected to and did reach the consumer without substantial change in its condition."

Phipps v. General Motors Corp., supra, 278 Md. at 344, 363 A.2d at 958. In addition, for the reasons set forth in Part I of this opinion, a "knowledge" or "state of the art" element is pertinent in a strict liability case based on a failure to warn. While the cause of action does not require [*465] a showing of any particular intent or actual knowledge, it also does not require the plaintiff to negate an evil intent or actual knowledge of a defect and deliberate disregard of the consequences. Therefore the elements of a strict liability claim are not inconsistent with evidence of evil intent or wrongdoing offered [69] to support a punitive damages award.

It is true that the evidence necessary to support a punitive damages award goes far beyond that required to support a compensatory damages award based on the underlying strict liability claim. In the same manner, the evidence of actual malice that will support a punitive damages award in a products liability action based on negligence requires the plaintiff to prove much more than negligence. The defendant Owens-Illinois does not argue, however, that there is an inconsistency between a negligence cause of action and punitive damages. The showing of actual malice required for a punitive damages award is the same regardless of whether the plaintiff's claim for compensatory damages was based on strict liability or on negligence. In either case, the evidence must show malicious conduct and not simply the supplying of a defective product or negligence.

REV_00263496

We agree with the Supreme Court of New Jersey that "[t]he right to recover punitive damages cannot sensibly, in this day and age, be made to turn on the form of the pleading." Fischer v. Johns-Manville Corp., supra, 103 N.J. at 658, 512 A.2d at 474. Therefore, punitive [70] damages are recoverable in a strict products liability case in the same manner as they are available in a products liability negligence case.

E.

The defendant Owens-Illinois and some amici have argued that, in order for a jury to consider a punitive damages award, a plaintiff should be required to establish by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant's conduct was characterized by actual malice.

[*466] The function of the standard of proof is to "allocate the risk of error between the litigants and to indicate the relative importance attached to the ultimate decision." Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 423, 99 S.Ct. 1804, 1808, 60 L.Ed.2d 323, 329 (1979). Furthermore, the clear and convincing standard has been used

> "in civil cases involving allegations of fraud or some other quasi-criminal wrongdoing by the defendant. The interests at stake in those cases are deemed to be more substantial than mere loss of money and some jurisdictions accordingly reduce the risk to the defendant of having his reputation tarnished erroneously by increasing the plaintiff's burden of proof." Ibid.

See Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, supra, U.S. , 111 S.Ct. at 1062, 113 L.Ed.2d at 43 [71] (O'Connor, J., dissenting) ("there is a stigma attached to an award of punitive damages that does not accompany a purely compensatory award. The punitive character of punitive damages means that there is more than just money at stake").

Maryland requires a "clear and convincing evidence" standard of proof in cases of [656] fraud, First Nat'l Bk. v. U.S.F. & G. Co., 275 Md. 400, 340 A.2d 275 (1975), and in attorney disciplinary proceedings, Bar Ass'n of Baltimore City v. Posner, 275 Md. 250, 339 A.2d 657, cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1016, 96 S.Ct. 451, 46 L.Ed.2d 388 (1975). In First Nat'l Bk. v. U.S.F. & G. Co., supra, 275 Md. at 411, 340 A.2d at 283, this Court stated:

> "When fraud, dishonesty or criminal conduct is imputed, something more than a mere preponderance of evidence must be produced; the proof must be 'clear and satisfactory' and be of such a character as to appeal strongly to the conscience of the court."

See also Everett v. Baltimore Gas & Elec., 307 Md. 286, 301, 513 A.2d 882, 890 (1986) ("certain cases [72] require a more exacting standard because of the seriousness of the allegations").

A growing majority of states requires that a plaintiff prove the defendant's malicious conduct by clear and convincing [*467] evidence before punitive damages can be considered. n26 Many states have adopted the clear and convincing standard by statute. n27 Other states have adopted the standard by judicial decisions. See Linthicum v. Nationwide Life Ins. Co., 150 Ariz. 326, 332, 723 P.2d 675, 681 (1986); Masaki v. General Motors Corp., supra, 71 Haw. 1, 780 P.2d 566; Travelers Indem. Co. v. Armstrong, 442 N.E.2d 349 (Ind.1982);

REV_00263497

Tuttle v. Raymond, supra, 494 A.2d at 1363; Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., supra, 97 Wis.2d 260, 270, 294 N.W.2d 437, 443.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n26 Adoption of this standard is supported by the academic commentary on the topic of punitive damages as well. See American College of Trial Lawyers, Committee Report on Punitive Damages, supra, at 12; D. Ellis, Jr., Punitive Damages, Due Process, and the Jury, 40 Ala.L.Rev. 975, 994-995 (1989); M. Wheeler, The Constitutional Case for Reforming Punitive Damages Procedures, 69 Va.L.Rev. 269, 298 (1983); D. Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, supra, 49 U.Chi.L.Rev. at 58-59. [73]

n27 Ala.Code § 6-11-20 (1991 Cum.Supp.); Alaska Stat. § 09.17.020 (1991 Cum.Supp.); Cal.Civ.Code § 3294(a) (West 1992 Cum.Supp.); Ga.Code Ann. § 51-12-5.1 (Michie 1991 Cum.Supp.); Ind.Code Ann. § 34-4-34-2 (Burns 1986); Iowa Code § 668A.1 (West 1987); Kan.Stat.Ann. § 60-3701(c) (1991 Cum.Supp.); Ky.Rev.Stat.Ann. § 411.184(2) (Michie/Bobbs-Morril 1990 Cum.Supp.); Minn.Stat.Ann. § 549.20 (West 1988); Mont.Code Ann. § 27-1-221(5) (1991); Nev.Rev.Stat. § 42.005(1) (Michie 1991 Cum.Supp.); N.D.Cent.Code § 32-03.2-11 (1991 Cum.Supp.); Ohio Rev.Code Ann. § 2307.80(A) (Anderson 1991); Okla.Stat. tit. 23, § 9 (West 1987); Or.Rev.Stat. § 30.925 (1991); S.C.Code Ann. § 15-33-135 (Law Co-op.1991 Cum.Supp.); S.D.Codified Laws Ann. § 21-1-4.1 (1987); Utah Code Ann. § 78-18-1 (1991 Cum.Supp.).

Colorado requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt to support a punitive damages award. Colo.Rev.Stat. § 13-25-127(2) (1989).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In Masaki v. General Motors Corp., supra, the products liability case arose when the van the plaintiff was repairing "self-shifted" into reverse gear, rendering the [74] plaintiff a quadriplegic. Masaki alleged that the product was defectively designed and manufactured and that he had not been warned of the defect. The case was presented to the jury on negligence, strict liability and breach of warranty theories, and the jury awarded both compensatory and punitive damages. The Supreme Court of Hawaii began its analysis [*468] by reviewing the purposes of punitive damages as punishment and deterrence. In order to effect these purposes, "a positive element of conscious wrongdoing is always required. Thus punitive damages are not awarded for mere inadvertence, mistake or errors of judgment." 71 Haw. at 7, 780 P.2d at 571, citing, Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908, Comment b. The Masaki court then expressed two compelling reasons for adopting a clear and convincing standard, stating > (71 Haw. at 16, 780 P.2d at 575):

> "[P]unitive damages are a form of punishment and can stigmatize the defendant in much the same way as a criminal conviction. It is because of the penal character of punitive damages that a standard of proof more akin to that required in criminal trials is appropriate [75] . . . . A more stringent standard of proof will assure that punitive damages are properly awarded."

Similarly, the Supreme Court of Arizona adopted a clear and convincing evidence standard of proof for punitive damages in [657] Linthicum v. Nationwide Life Ins. Co., supra, 150 Ariz. 326, 723 P.2d 675. That court stated > (150 Ariz. at 332, 723 P.2d at 681):

> "As this remedy is only to be awarded in the most egregious of cases, where > there is reprehensible conduct combined with an evil mind over and above that required for the commission of a tort, we believe it appropriate to impose a more stringent standard of proof."

REV_00263498

The Arizona Court reasoned that a loose assessment of punitive damages undermines the "deterrent impact" and thus "becomes onerous not only to defendants but the public as a whole." Ibid.

Both the Arizona court and the Hawaii court looked to the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine's opinion in Tuttle v. Raymond, supra, 494 A.2d 1353, for guidance. In that action arising out of an automobile accident, the court was urged to abolish the common law allowance of punitive damages in Maine. While the [76] Court refused to abolish common law punitive damages in Maine, it did "redefine and clarify the type of tortious conduct necessary to justify [*469] an award of punitive damages . . . and heighten[ed] the standard of proof incumbent on a plaintiff seeking such an award." Tuttle, 494 A.2d at 1354. The court imposed a higher burden of proof because, "although punitive damages serve an important function in our legal system, they can be onerous when loosely assessed." 494 A.2d at 1363. The court explained (Ibid.):

> "The potential consequences of a punitive damages claim warrant a requirement that the plaintiff present proof greater than a mere preponderance of the evidence. Therefore, we hold that a plaintiff may recover exemplary damages based on tortious conduct only if he can prove by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant acted with malice."

Use of a clear and convincing standard of proof will help to insure that punitive damages are properly awarded. We hold that this heightened standard is appropriate in the assessment of punitive damages because of their penal nature and potential for debilitating harm. Consequently, [77] in any tort case a plaintiff must establish by clear and convincing evidence the basis for an award of punitive damages.

F.

We now turn to the matter of the effective date of our holdings with respect to punitive damages.

Until today, under Maryland common law a plaintiff in a tort case was required to establish by a preponderance of the evidence those circumstances which would authorize the allowance of an award for punitive damages. By changing this standard of proof to clear and convincing evidence, we have not overruled any particular Maryland cases on the ground that they were wrongly decided at the time. Instead, we have exercised our constitutional authority to change the common law. See Murphy v. Edmonds, 325 Md. 342, 362, 601 A.2d 102, 112 (1992); Julian v. Christopher, 320 Md. 1, 9-11, 575 A.2d 735, 739 (1990); Wildermuth [*470] v. State, 310 Md. 496, 529, 530 A.2d 275, 291-292 (1987); Ireland v. State, 310 Md. 328, 331-332, 529 A.2d 365, 366-367 (1987); Kelley v. R.G. Industries, Inc., 304 Md. 124, 140, 497 A.2d 1143, 1150-1151 (1985), [78] and cases there cited.

Recently in Julian v. Christopher, supra, 320 Md. at 10-11, 575 A.2d at 739, we reiterated the principle that "[o]rdinarily decisions which change the common law apply prospectively, as well as to the litigants before the court. Williams v. State, 292 Md. 201, 217, 438 A.2d 1301, 1309 (1981)." Thus in Boblitz v. Boblitz, 296 Md. 242, 275, 462 A.2d 506, 522 (1983), we changed the common law by abrogating interspousal immunity in negligence cases and held that the change was applicable to the case then before the Court and to causes of action accruing after the date of our decision.

REV_00263499

Where, however, a change in the common law does not affect the elements of a cause of action but relates to requirements at a trial, we have held that the change applies "to cases where the trials . . . commence after the date of our opinion in the [658] present case," Jones v. State, 302 Md. 153, 161, 486 A.2d 184, 189 (1985). See also, e.g., Williams v. State, supra, 292 Md. at 219, 438 A.2d at 1310; Lewis v. State, 285 Md. 705, 716, 404 A.2d 1073, 1079 (1979). [79]

Therefore, the "clear and convincing" standard of proof for punitive damages in tort cases applies to the instant cases, to the other two cases heard by us the same day (Nos. 22 and 77), and to all trials commencing and trials in progress on or after the date this opinion is filed.

The overruling of both Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Co., supra, and the "arising out of contract" principle of H & R Block v. Testerman, supra, and Wedeman v. City Chevrolet, supra, is in a somewhat different category. By overruling those holdings, we are not changing the common law. Rather, for the reasons set forth in this opinion and in Schaefer v. Miller, supra, 322 Md. at 312-332, 587 A.2d at 498-509, we have concluded that the Smith, Testerman and Wedeman holdings were erroneous [*471] and were inconsistent with Maryland common law. Moreover, this Court had not previously decided whether the Smith and Testerman- Wedeman principles were even applicable to products liability cases.

When a prior case in this Court is overruled on the ground that it was erroneously [80] decided, the question whether our new holding is retroactive or only prospective is governed by the principles set forth in opinions such as American Trucking Ass'ns v. Goldstein, 312 Md. 583, 591-595, 541 A.2d 955, 959-961 (1988); Potts v. State, 300 Md. 567, 576-583, 479 A.2d 1335, 1340-1343 (1984); McClain v. State, 288 Md. 456, 470, 419 A.2d 369, 375 (1980); State v. Hicks, 285 Md. 310, 336-338, 403 A.2d 356, 370-371 (1979); Wiggins v. State, 275 Md. 689, 698-716, 344 A.2d 80, 85-95 (majority opinion), 275 Md. at 732-741, 344 A.2d at 104-109 (dissenting opinion) (1975). See also Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618, 85 S.Ct. 1731, 14 L.Ed.2d 601 (1965).

As set forth in the above-cited cases, two major considerations in determining whether a new holding is to be applied only prospectively are the purpose of the holding and the extent of reliance upon the overruled cases. Because the primary purpose of punitive damages is to deter defendants rather than to benefit plaintiffs, the [81] purpose is served by applying today's decision retroactively. Furthermore, this is not a situation where there may have been reliance on the Smith case and the Testerman-Wedeman principle. A potential tort plaintiff does not in advance plan for or depend upon a particular punitive damages standard in a possible future tort case.

Therefore, our overruling of Smith and our overruling the "arising out of contract" principle of Testerman and Wedeman shall be retroactive as well as prospective. At the same time, however, a defendant in some other case may not complain about a trial court's application of Smith or the Testerman-Wedeman rule if the defendant failed to object or properly preserve the issue, and if the issue was not raised pursuant to Maryland Rule 8-131(b). See Murphy v. Edmonds, supra, 325 Md. at 375, 601 A.2d at 118 (no [*472] party questioned the applicability of the "gross negligence" standard for punitive damages, and the issue was not raised by this Court under Rule 8-131(b); therefore this Court would not apply a different standard); Boyer v. State, 323 Md. 558, 581 n. 15, 594 A.2d 121, 132 n. 15 (1991) [82] (same). n28

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n28 Although we have in this case changed the standard of proof for punitive damages, and overruled the Smith case and the "arising out of contract" principle of Testerman and Wedeman, some of the amici briefs have suggested additional changes in the law regarding punitive damages, such as adoption of the standards discussed in Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, U.S. , - , 111 S.Ct. 1032, 1044-1046, 113 L.Ed.2d 1, 21-23 (1991), requiring a punitive damages award to bear some relationship to the compensatory damages, requiring a punitive damages award to have some relationship to the plaintiff's costs or harm not covered by compensatory damages (see the authorities reviewed in St. Luke Church v. Smith, 318 Md. 337, 344-354, 568 A.2d 35, 38-43 (1990)), limiting the admissibility of net worth evidence, and other matters. We shall, however, leave any exploration of these issues for another day.

REV_00263500

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

G.

As pointed out above, [83] the standards for allowing an award of punitive [659] damages, articulated in this opinion, apply to the present cases. Therefore, the new standards govern the plaintiffs' claims for punitive damages against Owens-Illinois.

As discussed earlier, the punitive damages claims in the present cases were submitted to the jury under an "implied malice" standard. In addition, the jury was not instructed that the standard of proof was clear and convincing evidence. Because the jury was not properly instructed as to the standards for allowing awards of punitive damages, we remand for a new trial of the claims for punitive damages against Owens-Illinois. The parties, of course, are not limited to the same evidence produced at the original trial. Consequently, when all of the evidence in the remand trial on punitive damages is introduced, the trial court must determine, based on the standards articulated today, whether there is sufficient evidence to present the [*473] issue of punitive damages to the jury. If so, the trial court must properly instruct the jury as to the elements which must be shown by the plaintiffs as well as to the standard of proof. n29 n29 Several amicus curiae briefs filed in support of the defendants in these cases present two suggestions concerning trials on the issue of punitive damages.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

First they argue that evidence of prior punitive damage awards for the same "course of conduct" should be admissible to mitigate a punitive damages award. They assert that the potential for multiple awards of punitive damages violates the fundamental fairness guaranteed by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. We do not agree with the argument that a refusal to allow the jury to consider prior awards of punitive damages violates fundamental fairness. Amici make no distinction between those punitive damages awards that are pending on appeal, those that have been reversed and those that have been paid. If an award of punitive damages has in fact been satisfied, the evidence of the defendant's financial means might in some cases reflect that payment. Furthermore, the admission of prior punitive damage awards would require the trial court to conduct a complicated evidentiary proceedings to determine if the defendant had in fact satisfied the punitive judgment. We decline to impose this onerous burden on the trial court.

Second, amici argue that we should impose mandatory bifurcation of the compensatory and punitive damages claims. We note that a trial court may exercise its discretion and bifurcate these issues, pursuant to Maryland Rule 2-503(b). In addition, as frequently occurs in light of Maryland Code (1974, 1989 Repl.Vol.), § 10-913(a) of the Courts and Judicial Proceedings Article (precluding evidence of a defendant's financial means until there has been a finding that punitive damages are supportable under the facts), the trial court will instruct the jury on the compensatory claims and on the defendant's potential liability for punitive damages.

REV_00263501

Then, once the jury has made a finding of liability on the underlying claims and has determined that there should be liability for punitive damages, the trial court will further instruct the jury concerning the calculation of a punitive damages award. This is precisely the procedure that was followed in these cases.

If there were two separate damages trials in every case, much of the evidence at the trial solely on the issue of punitive damages would duplicate the evidence admitted at the compensatory damages trial. Many of the same witnesses would have to be recalled to repeat their testimony before the jury. In light of the fact that this duplication would burden both witnesses and jurors as well as waste judicial resources, we believe that mandatory bifurcation is undesirable.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [84]

V.

The plaintiffs argue that the trial court should not have reduced their awards by deeming that the defendants [*474] were entitled to contribution against Raymark, Inc., and that Anchor Packing Co. was entitled to indemnity against Raymark. Raymark was a manufacturer of asbestos.

Although Raymark was named as a defendant in the original complaint in the Dickerson case, this manufacturer settled early with the plaintiff Dickerson. Dickerson later filed an amended complaint, which superseded the original complaint, and which did not name Raymark as a defendant. Raymark also settled early with the plaintiff Zenobia. Raymark was never named as a defendant in the Zenobia case, either in the original or in any amended complaint. Sometime after these settlements but before the cross-claims trial, Raymark came under the jurisdiction of the federal bankruptcy court.

As far as the docket entries or record in these cases show, no defendant ever filed a cross-claim expressly against Raymark. Furthermore, the defendants do not in this [660] Court dispute the plaintiffs' assertion that Raymark never had any notice of a cross-claim against it. Instead, the cross-claims in these cases [85] were effected by a cross-claim "stipulation" providing that every defendant named in the original complaint or in an amended complaint > "stipulate and agree that cross-claims . . . are considered to have been filed by each defendant against each other defendant. Each defendant is considered to have denied the allegations of the cross-claims filed against it."

Because Raymark was never named in the original or an amended complaint in the Zenobia case, Raymark could not have entered into this stipulation in the Zenobia case. Raymark was not a party to the Zenobia case, and no defendant sought to implead Raymark into the Zenobia case. See Maryland Rule 2-322 requiring service, upon a person not previously a party to the action, of a summons, the complaint, and all pleadings and motions previously filed in the action. The trial court could not exercise jurisdiction to grant a cross-claim against Raymark in the Zenobia case.

[*475] With respect to the Dickerson case, the "stipulation" apparently covers the cross-claims against Raymark for contribution because Raymark was named in Dickerson's original complaint. The plaintiff Dickerson argues that [86] the trial court should not have determined that Raymark was a joint tortfeasor because Raymark had filed for bankruptcy protection at the time of the cross-claims trial.

REV_00263502

It is not necessary for us to determine, however, whether the trial court violated the automatic bankruptcy stay in granting the cross-claims against Raymark for contribution in the Dickerson case, because there was insufficient evidence in that case to find that Raymark was a joint tortfeasor. No evidence was presented against Raymark at the trial on the plaintiffs' claims, presumably because Raymark was not a defendant at that stage. In the cross-claims trial, the only evidence submitted against Raymark was the deposition of an Anchor Packing Co. employee who stated that Anchor bought sixty to seventy-five percent of its asbestos containing products from Raymark. There was no evidence presented at either trial regarding (1) the plaintiff Dickerson's exposure to Raymark's products, (2) whether Raymark's products were a substantial factor in causing the plaintiff Dickerson's injuries, or (3) whether Raymark failed to warn the plaintiff Dickerson of the dangers in its products. In order for Raymark to be adjudicated [87] a joint tortfeasor, the defendants seeking contribution must prove each of the elements that the plaintiff is required to prove. There was simply no such evidence in the Dickerson case.

Therefore, the granting of the cross-claims against Raymark in both the Dickerson and the Zenobia cases are reversed. On remand the compensatory awards must be adjusted to reflect the reversal of the cross-claim adjudication of Raymark as a joint tortfeasor. For this reason the judgments for compensatory damages must be vacated.

JUDGMENT OF THE COURT OF SPECIAL APPEALS VACATED, AND CASES REMANDED TO THE COURT OF SPECIAL APPEALS WITH DIRECTIONS TO VACATE THE JUDGMENTS OF THE CIRCUIT COURT FOR [*476] BALTIMORE CITY AND REMAND THE CASES TO THE CIRCUIT COURT FOR BALTIMORE CITY FOR FURTHER PROCEEDINGS NOT INCONSISTENT WITH THIS OPINION. PLAINTIFFS TO PAY ONE-THIRD OF THE COSTS IN THIS COURT AND IN THE COURT OF SPECIAL APPEALS AND DEFENDANTS OWENS-ILLINOIS, INC., MCIC, INC., ANCHOR PACKING CO. AND PORTER HAYDEN COMPANY, TO PAY TWO-THIRDS OF THE COSTS IN THIS COURT AND IN THE COURT OF SPECIAL APPEALS.

CONCURBY: McAULIFFE; BELL (In Part)

BELL (In Part)

CONCUR: McAULIFFE, Judge, concurring.

I join in all except Part IV of [88] the Court's opinion. With respect to Part IV, I concur in the result. I agree that we should abandon [661] the "arising out of a contract" distinction discussed in Part IV A of the Court's opinion and that we should adopt the "clear and convincing" standard of proof for the award of punitive damages in any case. Moreover, I agree with the specific test adopted by the Court for the availability of punitive damages in a products liability case.

I write separately only to point out that although the Court's opinion makes clear that "actual knowledge of the defect and deliberate disregard of the consequences" will be considered the equivalent of "evil motive," "intent to defraud," or "intent to injure" and therefore within the definition of "actual malice" in products liability cases, Court's opinion at 461, 601 A.2d at 653 it does not state whether an "equivalent" state of mind will be recognized in other non-intentional torts. The Court's opinion should not, I suggest, be interpreted as excluding that possibility.

There is a state of mind that falls just short of an intent to injure, but is sufficiently egregious to be treated as the [*477] legal equivalent of an intent [89] to injure for criminal as well as civil purposes. Judge Moylan, writing for the Court of Special Appeals in DeBettencourt v. State, 48 Md.App. 522, 530, 428 A.2d 479, cert. denied, 290 Md. 713 (1981), provides an apt definition:

REV_00263503

> It is . . . that the willful doing of a dangerous and reckless act with wanton indifference to the consequences and perils involved, is just as blameworthy, and just as worthy of punishment, when the harmful result ensues, as is the express intent to kill itself. This highly blameworthy state of mind is not one of mere negligence . . . . It is not merely one even of gross criminal negligence . . . . It involves rather the deliberate perpetration of a knowingly dangerous act with reckless and wanton unconcern and indifference as to whether anyone is harmed or not. The common law treats such a state of mind as just as blameworthy, just as anti-social and, therefore, just as truly murderous as the specific intents to kill and to harm.

More recently, see Robinson v. State, 307 Md. 738, 744-46, 517 A.2d 94 (1986).

The Court's test for liability for punitive damages [90] in a products liability case -- that the defendant had actual knowledge of the defect and proceeded with a conscious or deliberate disregard of the foreseeable harm resulting from the defect -- is the civil analogue of DeBettencourt's "deliberate perpetration of a knowingly dangerous act with reckless and wanton unconcern and indifference as to whether anyone is harmed or not." The Court thereby acknowledges that a mental state sufficiently egregious to support a conviction of murder is sufficiently egregious to support the imposition of punitive damages.

This rationale, defined precisely and shorn of terms which might suggest that a lesser state of mind would suffice, should apply with equal force in all non-intentional tort cases. A person who is actually aware that his action [*478] involves a clear and serious danger of substantial harm to the plaintiff or anyone in the plaintiff's class, and who unreasonably takes such action with flagrant indifference as to whether anyone will be harmed or not, should be liable for punitive damages if his conduct causes the foreseeable harm. This type of outrageous conduct, being just short of intentional harm, warrants such a sanction. [91] Although the requisite conduct and state of mind will often include gross negligence, the test would not be met by a showing of gross negligence alone.

I assume that the Court does no more than to leave this discussion for another day.

DISSENTBY: BELL (In Part)

DISSENT: ROBERT M. BELL, Judge, concurring and dissenting.

As relevant to this opinion, n1 the Court's opinion today effects a significant, if not, revolutionary, change in Maryland law respecting punitive damages. In one fell swoop, we have modified the law of punitive [662] damages in three respects. First, we have abolished the distinction held to exist, for purposes of determining whether punitive damages may be awarded, between torts "arising out of contract" and those that do not, overruling in the process H & R Block v. Testerman, 275 Md. 36, 338 A.2d 48 (1975) and Wedeman v. City Chevrolet, 278 Md. 524, 366 A.2d 7 (1976). In an even greater step, we have followed the trend and held that a new, higher burden of proof henceforth will apply when a party seeks punitive damages. Thus, we have joined the trend of permitting awards of punitive damages only upon greater proof than [92] usually required in civil cases. We made this change in an effort "to insure that punitive damages are properly awarded."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 I agree with the Court's opinion except for portions of part IV B. and C., which this opinion addresses.

REV_00263504

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Finally, we reformulated the test for determining whether, in a given case, punitive damages may be awarded. A casualty of that formulation is Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Co., 267 Md. 149, 297 A.2d 721 (1972), the case in which "implied malice" was first recognized to be a predicate for the award of punitive damages. Stating the reason [*479] a new standard is necessary, the majority notes that, when decided, Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Co., supra, was inconsistent with this Court's precedents and did not attempt to analyze how a "gross negligence" standard promoted the objectives of punitive damages. Furthermore, it says that the Smith standard produced "inconsistent results and frustration of the purposes of punitive [93] damages in non-intentional tort cases." The majority asserts that the standard "provides little guidance for individuals and companies to enable them to predict behavior that will either trigger or avoid punitive damages liability, and it undermines the deterrent effect of these awards." (footnote omitted)

In its place, relying on Davis v. Gordon, 183 Md. 129, 133, 36 A.2d 699, 701 (1944), the Court adopts, in non-intentional tort cases, a standard of "actual malice," i.e. "evil motive," "intent to injure," "ill-will," or "fraud." Because, however, in the usual products liability case, whether proceeding on negligence or strict liability, the sale of the product, defective by virtue of a failure to warn or otherwise, ordinarily will not involve evil motive, conscious intent to injure any particular person, ill will or fraud, we also adopt a variation on the "actual malice" theme: actual knowledge of the defect and conscious or deliberate disregard of the consequences. The majority deems that standard to be the equivalent of "actual malice." But the first prong of that equivalent, the majority is emphatic, must be strictly limited; it means that [94] nothing less than "actual knowledge" will suffice. That there is available evidence about which a defendant "should have known" will not be sufficient to support an award of punitive damages. The most the majority will concede is that, where a "willful refusal to know" -- i.e., "where a person believes that it is probable that something is a fact, but deliberately shuts his or her eyes or avoids making reasonable inquiry with a conscious purpose to avoid learning the truth," see concurring opinion (Chasanow, J.) in State v. McCallum, 321 Md. 451, 458, 583 A.2d 250, 253 (1991), is proven, the person so refusing will be charged with actual knowledge of the product's defect.

[*480] Because I share some of the majority's concerns regarding the proliferation of punitive damages claims and their amounts, I join, enthusiastically, with it in adopting two of the changes. I can see no reason for maintaining a distinction, for punitive damages purposes, between torts arising out of a contract and those that do not. Similarly, I believe that requiring proof of punitive damages by clear and convincing evidence is fair and just. Allowing punitive [95] damages to be assessed against a defendant is serious business; it is right that we take steps to insure that it is not viewed lightly. Enhancing the burden of proof to a level commensurate with the seriousness of the matter to be decided is appropriate. I agree with the majority that, because the purpose of punitive damages is, at least in part, to punish, requiring a lower burden of proof for its award is inconsistent with the way we treat other serious cases.

I part company with the majority on the question of what is the appropriate standard for determining the cases in which [663] punitive damages are appropriate. While I have no quarrel with requiring that, in some cases, "actual malice," characterized as "evil motive," "intent to injure", "ill will", "fraud", or, in the case of products liability actions, "actual knowledge of the defective nature of the product, coupled with a deliberate disregard of the consequences", be shown, I am opposed to excising from the standard the concept adopted by Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Company (267 Md. at 167, 297 A.2d at 731): "wanton or reckless disregard for human life," sometimes characterized as "gross negligence". [96] That standard, now the old one, is a floor, not a ceiling; it sets a minimum requirement, not a maximum. Therefore, if a defendant acts with "actual malice," however, characterized, he or she will be subject to an award of punitive damages under the old of the same or a different proceeding, or in a deposition taken in compliance with law in the course of the same or another proceeding, if the party against whom the testimony is now offered, or, in a civil action or proceeding, a predecessor in interest, had an opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony by direct, cross, or redirect examination.

REV_00263505

Evidence > Hearsay Rule & Exceptions > Former Testimony of Unavailable Declarant

Under Fed. R. Evid. 804(b)(1), if it appears that in the former suit a party having a like motive to cross-examine about the same matters as the present party would have, was accorded an adequate opportunity for such examination, the testimony may be received against the present party. Under these circumstances, the previous party having like motive to develop the testimony about the same material facts is, in the final analysis, a predecessor in interest to the present party.

Evidence > Hearsay Rule & Exceptions > Former Testimony of Unavailable Declarant

A "predecessor in interest" for the purposes of Fed. R. Evid. 804(b)(1) is interpreted to include any party with a similar motive to develop the testimony. Privity between the two parties is no longer required. Deposition testimony is admissible if some other party, present at the deposition, had the same opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony as the party against whom the deposition is offered. Motive to develop the testimony, rather than privity between the parties, is the key factor" in assessing whether the parties present at the deposition are predecessors in interest for purposes of Md. R. Civ. P., Cir. Ct. 2-419(c).

Torts > Products Liability > Strict Liability

State of the art evidence is directly relevant to whether a product was defective when it was sold by a manufacturer. In a strict liability action, if a product is defective when it was sold by a manufacturer because it lacked a warning of its dangerous characteristics, although it should have had such a warning in light of the state of the art, and if the defective and dangerous product reaches the user plaintiff without substantial change, middlemen or intermediate sellers of the defective product are strictly liable to the plaintiff user just as the manufacturer is liable to the plaintiff. This principle, is fully applicable in a strict liability failure to warn case.

Evidence > Witnesses > Expert Testimony

Deposition evidence concerning what scientific and medical experts in the field knew about the dangers of asbestos is relevant to the plaintiff's attempt to prove state of the art. Such expert evidence is not irrelevant merely because these experts were employed by private companies. Because manufacturers are held to the standards and knowledge of an expert, this evidence is relevant to show what was scientifically and medically available and discoverable by other experts in the field.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Standards Generally

The admissibility of expert testimony is a matter largely within the discretion of the trial court, and its action in admitting or excluding such testimony will seldom constitute a ground for reversal.

Torts > Products Liability > Duty to Warn

Generally, a manufacturer of a defective product has a duty to warn of product defects which the manufacturer discovers after the time of sale. Even if there is no duty to warn at the time of the sale, facts may thereafter come to the attention of the manufacturer which make it imperative that a warning then be given. Therefore, if a manufacturer discovers a product defect after the time of sale, the manufacturer must make reasonable efforts to issue a post-sale warning.

REV_00263470

standard. On the other hand, by adopting the "actual malice" standard, the majority does much more than excise a useless phrase, it places outside the scope of punitive damages eligibility numerous deserving cases, differing from cases that remain punitive [*481] damages eligible only in the subjective element. That change simply goes too far.

The perception is that more claims for punitive damages, involving conduct so diverse that predictability and, therefore, the ability to choose the proper conduct and avoid being culpable, than were justified, were being brought and allowed with the result that the purposes of punitive damages were being undermined. The changes proposed are for the purpose of making the awards more uniform and consistent with the historical bases for punitive damages awards: punishment and deterrence. The purposes of punitive damages are better served, it has been determined, by requiring a more stringent [97] standard for assessing punitive damages and by requiring a greater burden of proof. To be sure, one of the goals of today's decision is to set a higher threshold for punitive damages eligibility. That is accomplished by changing the burden of proof, that clearly will exclude some undeserving cases, no doubt, a large number, even applying the old standard. But, by both changing the burden of proof and the standard, an even greater percentage of deserving cases, heretofore eligible for punitive damages awards, is affected. Indeed, by so doing, not only is the threshold raised, but excluded is an entire category of cases, non-intentional torts, involving, in many instances, injuries of greater severity than in cases that still qualify and, thus, not necessarily those least deserving of an award of punitive damages. And the distinction causing the exclusion is the subjective intent of the defendant. While I can agree, as I have previously indicated, to raising the threshold by raising the level of the proof required, I cannot agree that punitive damages should be awarded only in cases of "actual malice," where there is a subjective intent element. In cases where there is no actual [98] malice, the totality of the circumstances may reveal conduct on the part of a defendant that is just as heinous as the conduct motivated by that actual malice and, so, for all intents and purposes is the same.

[*482] Although not intentional, i.e., willful, conduct, nevertheless, may be outrageousness and extreme in the context in which it occurs, and may produce injuries commensurate with those caused by intentional conduct. In other words, conduct may be so reckless and outrageous as to be the equivalent of intentional conduct. That is precisely what Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Co., supra, held and the facts as reported in that case justified that pronouncement. It was because the facts were so egregious that the Court was motivated to opine:

> We regard a "wanton or reckless disregard for the human life" in the operation of a motor vehicle, with the known dangers and risks attendant to such conduct, as the legal equivalent of malice. It is a standard which, although stopping short of wilful or intentional injury, contemplates conduct which is of an extraordinary or outrageous character. Yet, it is both a functional and definitive test [99] which, as we have noted, enjoys the virtue of having been frequently applied in this state. And if, as a test, it has been [664] regarded as adequately stringent to serve as a basis for possible imprisonment, then, surely, there appears to be no valid reason for deeming it too liberal for imposing simple sanctions.

267 Md. at 167, 297 A.2d at 731-32. n2

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n2 The majority makes an extraordinary observation -- it suggests that implied malice "provides little guidance for individuals and companies to enable them to predict behavior . . . ." If that is correct, then it is difficult to understand how, for example, manslaughter by motor vehicle, and other, similar crimes, can be upheld since among the purposes of the criminal law, like punitive damages, are punishment and deterrence.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Permitting punitive damages when one acts with actual malice, but not when, given the totality of the circumstances, that same person acts in total disregard for the safety of others has no reasoned basis.

Consider the [100] following example. A hot water pipe bursts in a crowded apartment complex quite near an open area upon which young people are playing baseball. A repair [*483] team dispatched to make repairs observes young people playing baseball nearby. It also sees that the area of the affected pipe is in easy reach of a baseball hit to the outfield. Nevertheless, they dig a hole, but, being unable to proceed due to the temperature of the water, suspend operations. Although aware of the young people playing in the area, they leave without warning them of the hole or its contents or in any way marking or obstructing the hole. One of the outfielders, having chased and caught a ball hit to the outfield, falls into the hole and is severely injured.

Under the new standard, if it could be proved that a member of the repair team harbored ill will toward the outfielder and, in the back of his mind, entertained a hope that the outfielder, or one of the other players, would fall in the unattended hole, then, in addition to compensable damages, the outfielder could recover punitive damages. On the other hand, if none of the members of the repair team knew any of the ball players and, in fact, harbored [101] no evil motive at all, no punitive damages could be recovered, notwithstanding that they acted, given the circumstances, in total disregard of the safety of the ballplayers. I can see no reasoned difference between these scenarios. n3 The state of mind of the individual simply is not so important a factor as to permit recovery in one case and not in the other.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n3 Were the products liability formulation of the standard applied, the case would clearly be a punitive damages eligible case.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

I am satisfied that allowing punitive damages for "wanton and reckless conduct," the test enunciated in Smith, serves the purposes of punishment and deterrence. Gross negligence, outrageous conduct, etc. cannot be defined in a vacuum. To have meaning, the terms must be viewed in a factual context. The conduct described in the example is not only outrageous and extraordinary, it is the sine qua non of reckless conduct. Such conduct should be punished. And that scenario presents a striking example of the kind of conduct a [102] defendant must not engage in if he or she is to avoid paying punitive damages. The example I have proffered [*484] is not the only one that can be posited. There are hundreds of such cases. The long and short of it is that changing the standard for punitive damages will eliminate numbers of cases, in which, heretofore, punitive damages would have been appropriate and those cases now are eliminated not because their facts are not egregious enough to justify such an award but because other, less serious, and perhaps, undeserving, cases may also qualify for such damages. n4 With all due respect, that is not a sufficiently [665] good reason to change the rules of the game. n5

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00263507

n4 To be sure, in Davis v. Gordon, supra, this Court did reject an invitation to assess punitive damages in negligence actions on an implied malice standard; however, in that case, punitive damages would not have been appropriate under any standard. The invitation was accepted in Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Co., supra. In that case, unlike in Davis, rather than deferring to the punitive and deterrent effect of the rules of the road, as opposed to a verdict in a civil case for damages, the Court, in fashioning a standard for the award of such damages, looked to the "usual precedent . . . of manslaughter by motor vehicle." 267 Md. at 167, 297 A.2d at 731, "requiring proof of gross negligence, which has been defined in this context as 'a wanton and reckless disregard for human life'." 267 Md. at 167-168, 297 A.2d at 731. [103] n5 Just last week, we issued the opinion in the non-economic damages cap case, Murphy v. Edmonds, 325 Md. 342, 601 A.2d 102 (1992). The effect of the ruling in that case is to burden the most severely injured victims of accidents, those whose non-economic damages exceed $ 350,000. See dissenting opinion, Chasanow, J., 325 Md. at 378, 601 A.2d at 120. Coming as it does on the heels of that opinion, this opinion, by excluding non-intentional torts from the list of punitive damages eligible cases, continues that trend.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Insulating a defendant from an award of punitive damages except when he or she acts with actual malice, meaning with an evil intent, ill will, with intent to injure, or to defraud, provides a disincentive for that defendant to act reasonably. Since, from the standpoint of a defendant's pocketbook, it makes no difference in the award of damages, whether he or she is negligent or grossly negligent, that is, his or her conduct is extreme to a point just short of being intentional, requiring that defendant to pay compensatory [104] damages for the victims's injuries is not likely to [*485] have a deterrent effect; it is not likely to cause him or her to consider, not to mention, change, his or her conduct.

Requiring a high threshold before a products liability case becomes punitive damages eligible presents other problems. Where a prerequisite to being assessed punitive damages is actual knowledge, i.e., whether the defendant actually knows about the product's defect, there is the danger that a defendant will avoid knowledge of that defect rather than keep abreast of developments regarding the product; he or she may decide that the less he or she knows about the product, the better off he or she is. That is particularly true given the strictness of the "actual knowledge" test the Court has formulated.

Notwithstanding the characterization by the majority of the standard applicable to products liability cases as involving "actual malice", even a cursory review of the standard adopted indicates that that simply is not the case. Requiring actual knowledge of the product's defect is but one prong of the test. The other prong, that there be a conscious or deliberate disregard of the foreseeable harm resulting [105] from the defect presents a different situation altogether. That concept is reminiscent of "implied malice" and, more to the point, like "gross negligence" requires definition on a case by case basis. It goes without saying that when an issue is a question for the factfinder, different factfinders will invariably reach different results from the same, or similar, evidence. Consequently, when different factfinders are presented with the same, or similar, evidence, we can anticipate that different results are likely to be reached.

Thus, although couched in terms of a unitary standard, what we really have adopted is a two-prong standard, one applicable to non-intentional torts and the other, containing an aspect quite similar to the standard we have just discarded, applicable to products liability cases. If we can tolerate case by case judicial definition of the requisite conduct in products liability cases, I can see no reason why we cannot continue to do so in non-intentional tort cases. After all, it [*486] is the application of the test, not its formulation, that is critical. Perhaps we should busy ourselves in developing more effective review mechanisms rather than attempting [106] to redefine the conduct that will support punitive damages.

REV_00263508

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 601 a.2d 633
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 1, 2002 - 8:44 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00263509

Torts > Products Liability > Duty to Warn

The post-sale duty to warn requires reasonable efforts to inform users of the hazard once the manufacturer is or should be aware of the need for a warning. The fact that a manufacturer or seller has discontinued its product line, and the fact that the plaintiff was no longer exposed to its product, are not circumstances which should necessarily relieve the seller of its duty to warn. Rather, these factors are relevant to a determination of what reasonable efforts to discover the danger and to warn are required. A seller is not entitled to automatic relief from its continuing duty to warn merely because it no longer manufacturers a defective product. The facts of a particular case, such as the gravity and likelihood of harm, the number of persons affected, and the economic cost and practical problems associated with identifying and contacting current product users, should all be relevant in determining whether a manufacturer has satisfactorily discharged a post-sale duty to warn.

Civil Procedure > Relief From Judgment > Motions for New Trial

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Abuse of Discretion

The granting or denial of a motion for new trial based upon the excessiveness of damages or a motion for remittitur is within the discretion of the trial court. An abuse of that discretion may be reviewed by an appellate court.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

The purposes of punitive damages relate entirely to the nature of the defendant's conduct. Whether the tort occurred before or after the formation of a contractual relationship should not determine whether actual or implied malice is required for allowing an award of punitive damages. Rather, the availability of a punitive damages award ought to depend upon the heinous nature of the defendant's tortious conduct. Awarding punitive damages based upon the heinous nature of the defendant's tortious conduct furthers the historical purposes of punitive damages, punishment and deterrence. Thus, punitive damages are awarded in an attempt to punish a defendant whose conduct is characterized by evil motive, intent to injure, or fraud, and to warn others contemplating similar conduct of the serious risk of monetary liability.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

In a non-intentional tort action, the trier of facts may not award punitive damages unless the plaintiff has established that the defendant's conduct was characterized by evil motive, intent to injure, ill will, or fraud, i.e., "actual malice."

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

In Maryland a breach of warranty suit is a contract action. Therefore, like any other contract action, punitive damages are not recoverable under a breach of warranty count.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

In products liability cases the equivalent of the "evil motive," "intent to defraud," or "intent to injure," which generally characterizes "actual malice," is actual knowledge of the defect and deliberate disregard of the consequences. Therefore, in order for actual malice to be found in a products liability case, regardless of whether the cause of action for compensatory damages is based on negligence or strict liability, the plaintiff must prove (1) actual knowledge of the defect on the part of the defendant, and (2) the defendant's conscious or deliberate disregard of the foreseeable harm resulting from the defect. The knowledge component, which is necessary to support an award of punitive damages, does not mean "constructive knowledge" or "substantial knowledge" or "should have known." More is required to expose a defendant to a potential punitive damages award. The plaintiff must show that the defendant actually knew of the defect and of the danger of the product at the time the product left the defendant's possession or control.

REV_00263471

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

For purposes of awarding punitive damages in a products liability action, actual knowledge includes the wilful refusal to know. Therefore, a defendant cannot shut his eyes or plug his ears when he is presented with evidence of a defect and thereby avoid liability for punitive damages.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

For purposes of awarding punitive damages in a products liability action, the plaintiff is required to show that, armed with actual knowledge of the defective condition, the defendant consciously or deliberately disregarded the potential harm to consumers. Negligence alone, no matter how gross, wanton, or outrageous, will not satisfy this standard. Instead the test requires a bad faith decision by the defendant to market a product, knowing of the defect and danger, in conscious or deliberate disregard of the threat to the safety of the consumer.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

The showing of actual malice required for a punitive damages award is the same regardless of whether the plaintiff's claim for compensatory damages was based on strict liability or on negligence. In either case, the evidence must show malicious conduct and not simply the supplying of a defective product or negligence.

Evidence > Procedural Considerations > Burdens of Proof, Presumptions & Inferences

The function of the standard of proof is to allocate the risk of error between the litigants and to indicate the relative importance attached to the ultimate decision.

Evidence > Procedural Considerations > Burdens of Proof, Presumptions & Inferences

Maryland requires a "clear and convincing evidence" standard of proof in cases of fraud, and in attorney disciplinary proceedings. When fraud, dishonesty or criminal conduct is imputed, something more than a mere preponderance of evidence must be produced; the proof must be "clear and satisfactory" and be of such a character as to appeal strongly to the conscience of the court.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

The clear and convincing standard of proof is appropriate in the assessment of punitive damages because of their penal nature and potential for debilitating harm. Consequently, in any tort case a plaintiff must establish by clear and convincing evidence the basis for an award of punitive damages.

Governments > Courts > Judicial Precedents

Ordinarily decisions which change the common law apply prospectively, as well as to the litigants before the court. Where, however, a change in the common law does not affect the elements of a cause of action but relates to requirements at a trial, the change applies to cases where the trials commence after the date of the opinion in the present case.

Governments > Courts > Judicial Precedents

Two major considerations in determining whether a new holding is to be applied only prospectively are the purpose of the holding and the extent of reliance upon the overruled cases.

REV_00263472

COUNSEL: Gardner M. Duvall (Harry S. Johnson, Patrick C. Smith, John G. Billmyre, Whiteford, Taylor & Preston, on brief, C. Robert Loskot (John G. Sakellaris, Bernstein, Sakellaris, & Ward, on brief), Baltimore, John J. Nagle, III, Margaret E. Swain, Barbara M. Gaughan, Power & Mosner, P.A., on brief), Towson, for petitioners/cross respondents.

Thomas [2] V. Monahan, Jr., Toni-Jean Lisa, Goodell, DeVries, Leech & Gray of Baltimore, amicus for Maryland Ass'n of Defense Trial Counsel.

Gary I. Strausberg, Janet & Strausberg, Paul B. Bekman, Israelson, Salisbury, Clements & Bekman, Baltimore, amicus for Maryland Trial Lawyers' Ass'n.

Robert Dale Klein, Wharton, Levin & Ehrmantraut, Annapolis, Malcolm E. Wheeler, Parcel, Mauro, Hultin & Spaanstra, PC, Denver, Colorado, amicus for Product Liability Advisory Council, Inc., Motor Vehicle Manufacturers Ass'n of the United States, Inc., Chamber of Commerce of the U.S., National Ass'n of Manufacturers of the U.S., Business Roundtable, and Chemical Manufacturers Ass'n.

Edward F. Houff, Carolyn J. Moses, Church & Houff, PA, Baltimore, amicus for Center for Claims Resolution.

James R. Eyler, John P. Sweeney, Gregory L. Lockwood Miles & Stockbridge, Baltimore, amicus for Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp.

Clifford C. Cuniff, Baltimore, for respondents/cross petitioners.

Peter G. Angelos, Patricia J. Kasputys, Timothy J. Hogan, Law Offices of Peter G. Angelos, Baltimore, amicus for Law Offices of Peter G. Angelos.

JUDGES: Murphy, C.J., Eldridge, Rodowsky, McAuliffe, Chasanow, Karwacki and Robert M. Bell, JJ. [3] McAuliffe, Judge, concurring. Robert M. Bell, Judge, concurring and dissenting.

OPINIONBY: ELDRIDGE

OPINION: [636] [*427]

We issued a writ of certiorari in these cases to consider several important questions relating to a strict products [*428] liability cause of action based on failure to warn of the dangerousness of the products, and to reconsider some of the principles governing awards of punitive damages in tort cases.

The plaintiffs Louis L. Dickerson and William L. Zenobia filed in the Circuit Court for Baltimore City separate complaints seeking damages for injuries resulting from exposure to asbestos, and the complaints were consolidated for purposes of trial and appeal. Both plaintiffs have pleural and parenchymal asbestosis. At the time of the trial, the plaintiffs abandoned all theories of liability except for strict liability under § 402A of the Restatement (Second) of Torts.

The plaintiff Dickerson sought damages from Owens-Illinois, Inc., Eagle-Picher Industries, Inc., and Celotex Corp., all of which manufactured products containing asbestos, and from MCIC, Inc., and Porter [637] Hayden Company, both of which supplied and installed products containing asbestos. Dickerson claimed that he was [4] exposed to asbestos from 1953 to 1963 when he worked as a laborer both at the shipyard and at the steel mill owned and operated by the Bethlehem Steel Corporation at Sparrows Point, Maryland.

REV_00263473

The plaintiff Zenobia sought damages from the manufacturer Owens-Illinois, Inc., and the suppliers/installers MCIC, Inc., Porter Hayden Co. and Anchor Packing Co. n1 Zenobia alleged that he was exposed to asbestos while working as a painter for four months at the Bethlehem Steel Sparrows Point shipyard in 1948, while working as a pipe fitter for eighteen months at the Maryland Shipbuilding and Drydock shipyard in 1951 and 1952, and while employed as a cleanup man at the Carling Brewery for three months in 1968.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n1 All other defendants named by both plaintiffs in the original complaints and subsequent amended complaints had either been granted summary judgment before the trial or had settled prior to or during the trial.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*429] The jury awarded compensatory damages to the plaintiff Dickerson in the amount of $ 1,300,000 against [5] all five defendants. In addition, the jury initially determined that punitive damages were warranted against certain defendants, and, subsequently the jury awarded punitive damages against Owens-Illinois in the amount of $ 235,000, against Porter Hayden in the amount of $ 2,500, and against Celotex in the amount of $ 372,000. The jury awarded to the plaintiff Zenobia compensatory damages in the amount of $ 1,200,000 against all four defendants; subsequently it awarded punitive damages against Owens-Illinois in the amount of $ 235,000 and against Porter Hayden in the amount of $ 2,500.

Pursuant to a stipulation, each of the defendants was deemed to have cross-claimed for contribution or indemnity against all other defendants prior to trial. Anchor Packing Co., a supplier and installer of products containing asbestos, sought in the Zenobia case indemnity against Raymark, Inc., a manufacturer, asserting that Raymark was Anchor's primary source of asbestos containing products. Raymark, Inc., had settled with both plaintiffs before trial. The cross-claims were tried separately, after the verdicts for the plaintiffs. At the time of the cross-claim trial, Raymark, Inc., was under [6] the exclusive jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court. The circuit court granted the defendants' cross-claims for contribution against all settling defendants including Raymark, Inc. The compensatory damages verdicts were reduced proportionally in light of the releases between the plaintiffs and the settling defendants. In addition, the trial court held that Anchor Packing Co. was entitled to indemnity against Raymark, Inc., in the Zenobia case. Thus, because of the plaintiff Zenobia's settlement with and release of Raymark, the trial court struck the jury's award against Anchor Packing.

The compensatory and punitive damages awards were appealed to the Court of Special Appeals by Owens-Illinois, Inc., MCIC, Inc., Porter Hayden, Co., Eagle-Picher Industries, [*430] Inc., and Anchor Packing, Co. n2 The plaintiffs appealed from the cross-claim determinations. The Court of Special Appeals affirmed all aspects of the awards for compensatory damages and affirmed the awards in the cross-claim trial. The award of punitive damages against Owens-Illinois was affirmed, and the award of punitive damages against Porter Hayden was reversed. See MCIC, Inc. v. Zenobia, 86 Md. App. 456, 587 A.2d 531 (1991). [7]

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n2 Before argument in the Court of Special Appeals, the defendants Celotex Corp. and Eagle-Picher Industries, Inc., filed a bankruptcy petition. All further proceedings in the cases against Eagle-Picher Industries and Celotex Corp. were automatically stayed.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00263474

Thereafter petitions and cross-petitions for a writ of certiorari were filed in this Court. The only manufacturer which filed a certiorari petition was Owens-Illinois. Owens-Illinois argued that it was entitled to a new trial because certain depositions were improperly admitted into evidence, and because the trial court gave an erroneous jury instruction that Owens-Illinois had a duty to warn of the hazards of asbestos after it had stopped manufacturing [638] products containing asbestos. Owens-Illinois also challenged the award of punitive damages. MCIC, Inc., and Porter Hayden Co., which supplied and installed products containing asbestos, also filed certiorari petitions which raised a single issue, namely whether certain deposition testimony was erroneously admitted [8] against them.

The plaintiffs filed a conditional cross-petition for a writ of certiorari, asking that the Court address the issues raised in the cross-claims trial if the Court granted the defendants' petitions. Specifically, the plaintiffs requested this Court to decide whether the bankrupt debtor Raymark, Inc., can be adjudicated a joint tortfeasor without leave of the bankruptcy court. If so, the plaintiffs argued that Raymark was not properly adjudicated a joint tortfeasor, and that, therefore, contribution, as well as indemnity in favor of Anchor Packing Co., should not have been awarded with regard to Raymark.

[*431] In response to the plaintiffs' conditional cross-petition for certiorari, the defendant Anchor Packing Co. filed a conditional cross-petition for certiorari. In the event that this Court granted the plaintiffs' conditional cross-petition, Anchor Packing Co. requested that the Court address the following contentions: (1) certain deposition testimony was erroneously admitted; (2) an instruction that Anchor had a continuing duty to warn of the hazards of asbestos after the plaintiffs' last exposure to asbestos containing products was improper; (3) the plaintiff [9] Zenobia failed to show that the products which Anchor supplied and/or installed contained asbestos or that the plaintiff Zenobia was exposed to Anchor's products; and (4) because the verdict for compensatory damages was excessive and against the weight of the evidence, Anchor's motion for a new trial or remittitur should have been granted.

This Court granted all of the petitions and cross-petitions. Additional facts will be set forth in the particular parts of this opinion to which the facts relate. n3

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n3 We note that there were numerous issues which were raised and decided in the Court of Special Appeals but which were not raised in this Court. For example, in the Court of Special Appeals all of the defendants now before this Court had argued that the evidence was insufficient to show that the defendants' activities were substantial factors in causing the plaintiffs' injuries. In this Court, the defendant Anchor Packing Co. is the only defendant raising this issue, and it asserted only that "Zenobia failed to prove that Anchor's product contained asbestos or that Zenobia was regularly or frequently exposed to respirable asbestos dust from an Anchor product." (Anchor's conditional cross-petition for a writ of certiorari, p. 16).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [10]

I.

The defendants' initial argument is that certain deposition evidence should not have been admitted because it was irrelevant and because these defendants were not present at the depositions and thus were unable to cross examine the deponents. n4 The depositions were admitted into evidence [*432] for the limited purpose of proving what the defendants should have known concerning the dangers of asbestos. Such knowledge is often referred to as "state of the art." The defendants do not argue that "state of the art" or an element of knowledge is not relevant in this strict liability case; rather they insist that these depositions,

REV_00263475

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "substantially certain to result" /50 "punitive damages" and reckless and inten! (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*42 U. Miami L. Rev. 803, **

Copyright (c) 1988 University of Miami Law Review University of Miami

January, 1988

42 U. Miami L. Rev. 803

LENGTH: 11071 words

COMMENT: Punitive Damages in Florida Negligence Cases: How Much Negligence Is Enough?

NANETTE A. O'DONNELL

SUMMARY:
... Rather, the content of the warning and Cyanamid's behavior in submitting information of the product's dangerous propensities to the product's suppliers in no way suggested "even gross negligence, much less intentional misconduct." ...

TEXT:

[*803] I. INTRODUCTION

The issue of whether plaintiffs in negligence cases may be entitled to punitive damages has long been the subject of controversy. [1] Many commentators have argued against the propriety of punitive damages and have concluded that this category of damages should be abolished. [2] Others, without necessarily conceding the validity of punitive damages, have argued that their availability should be limited to a narrow range of conduct. [3] Notwithstanding the views of commentators, the doctrine is well entrenched in our legal system. [4] The controversy [*804] in the various jurisdictions thus has centered around the conduct and state of mind requirements that must be satisfied before a jury may award punitive damages. Although virtually all jurisdictions recognize the propriety of punitive damages, courts have expressed disagreement over the "quantum of culpability" [5] that must be demonstrated to support such an award. [6]

Florida has not escaped this controversy. [7] The disagreement has manifested itself in the Supreme Court of Florida's numerous attempts to formulate a standard that governs whether the issue of punitive damages should be submitted to a jury. Under the current standard, the character of negligence necessary to justify an award of punitive damages is the same as that required to sustain a conviction for manslaughter. [8] Trial courts, however, have experienced difficulty in determining what kind of conduct would satisfy this standard because, as recent cases have revealed, the standard is subject to two interpretations. Under the first interpretation, recklessness as defined in the Second Restatement of Torts would be sufficient to justify an award of punitive damages; under the second, some undefined element or aggravating circumstance must also be present. [9] Furthermore, once judges allow the jury to consider the issue of punitive damages, two difficulties arise that prevent it from effectively evaluating whether a defendant's conduct merits such damages: One problem

REV_00263510

The jury instruction should be revised to provide the jury with more precise guidelines to the question of what kind of conduct warrants punitive damages. The instructions should inform juries that the key factors in determining whether the defendant was reckless are the degree of the risk created by the defendant's conduct and the defendant's knowledge of that risk. [133] The jury instruction, for example, could include the criteria contained in the Restatement, that is, whether the defendant knew or had reason to know that his conduct created a strong probability of harm. [134] Until jury instructions on punitive damages are revised to include language that is understandable to laymen, many juries will continue to award punitive damages in an uninformed manner -- and many appellate courts will continue to reverse them. [135]

IV. CONCLUSION

The Supreme Court of Florida has failed to explain what kind of conduct actually fulfills the criminal manslaughter standard for punitive damages. The court should interpret the standard as allowing the issue of punitive damages to be submitted to the jury when the defendant acts with actual or constructive knowledge that his conduct is creating a strong probability of harm. An additional requirement of aggravating circumstances or flagrant misconduct should not be imposed because it would increase the subjectivity of punitive damages awards and thereby undermine the goals of punishment and deterrence. Furthermore, the standard jury instruction on punitive damages should be revised to conform to such an interpretation to [*828] ensure that juries can rationally decide whether to subject a defendant to liability for punitive damages.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 MICH. L. REV. 1257, 1263-64 (1976); Comment, Punitive Damages Insurance: Why Some Courts Take the Smart Out of "Smart Money", 40 U. MIAMI L. REV. 979, 987 (1986).

n2. Compare Carsey, The Case Against Punitive Damages: An Annotated Argumentative Outline, 11 FORUM 57, 57-63 (1975) (arguing that punitive damages should be abolished) and Ghiardi, The Case Against Punitive Damages, 8 FORUM 411, 417-19 (1972) (same) with Mallor & Roberts, Punitive Damages: Toward a Principled Approach, 31 HASTINGS L.J. 639, 647 (1980) (arguing for the retention of the doctrine of punitive damages) and Note, In Defense of Punitive Damages, 55 N.Y.U. L. REV. 303, 327-45 (1980) (same).

n3. See Comment, supra note 1, at 987 (arguing that jurists disagree over the propriety, scope, and purposes of the doctrine); see also Levit, Punitive Damages: Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow, 1980 INS. L.J. 257, 261 (arguing that it is "more constructive" to focus on "clear abuses" of the doctrine than to advocate its abolition).

n4. Day v. Woodworth, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 363, 371 (1851); see Mallor & Roberts, supra note 2, at 639; Owen, supra note 1, at 1263. Punitive damages are currently available in all but five states. Ausness, Punitive Damages in Products Liability, 74 KY. L.J. 1, 4 & n.9 (1985-86). Louisiana, Nebraska, and Puerto Rico prohibit punitive damages entirely. Id. Massachusetts and Washington prohibit punitive damages unless a statute specifically allows their award, and Connecticut limits punitive damages to the expenses of litigation. Id.

n5. Comment, supra note 1, at 989.

n6. This disagreement is demonstrated by the variety of terms that jurisdictions have utilized in formulating their punitive damages standards. Some states, for example, have required a defendant to commit a tort "maliciously" before allowing punitive damages to be awarded. See, e.g., Kirksey v. Jernigan, 45 So. 2d 188, 189 (Fla. 1950) (stating that the malice that would support an award of punitive damages can be inferred from an entire want of care to duty); Bennett v. Howard, 141 Tex. 101, 107, 170 S.W.2d 709, 712 (1942) (noting that the rule is almost universally recognized that punitive damages may be recovered only for injuries resulting from wrongs that are accompanied by some aggravating circumstances of malice or fraud). Other states have allowed punitive damages when "willful and wanton" conduct is involved. See, e.g., Unfried v. Libert, 20 Idaho 708, 728, 119 P. 885, 891 (1911) (predicating punitive damages on the "wanton, malicious, or gross and outrageous" conduct of the wrongdoer). Finally, other states have allowed punitive damages when a defendant acts in "conscious disregard for the rights of others." See, e.g., Honaker v. Leonard, 325 F. Supp. 212, 214 (E.D. Tenn. 1971) (allowing punitive damages for conduct that raises a presumption of conscious indifference to consequences); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 267, 294 N.W.2d 437, 442 (1977) (requiring "reckless indifference for others' rights and conscious deliberate disregard of them").

REV_00263519

n7. See infra Section II.

n8. See, e.g., Chrysler Corp. v. Wolmer, 499 So. 2d 823, 825 (Fla. 1986); Como Oil Co. v. O'Loughlin, 466 So. 2d 1061, 1062 (Fla. 1985); White Constr. Co. v. Dupont, 455 So. 2d 1026, 1028 (Fla. 1984).

n9. See infra Section IIIA.

n10. See Ellis, Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 1, 3-12 (1982); see also Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 260, 280, 294 N.W.2d 437, 448 (1980) (stating that the doctrine of punitive damages "discourages private reprisals, restrains the strong, influential and unscrupulous, vindicates the right[s] of the weak, and encourages recourse to and confidence in the courts").

n11. These justifications find support in the notion that reckless conduct may be so wrongful that it should be sanctioned regardless of whether the community has defined the conduct as criminal. See, e.g., Mallor & Roberts, supra note 2, at 644-45. One observer disagrees with this notion:

If the defendant's conduct has not been of a nature to invoke society's sanctions, if his entire community has not previously seen fit to call out for punishment of such acts, there is clearly no reason why a given jury may . . . in an emotion-ridden court room, enact and enforce punitive measures on an ad hoc basis.

Conrad, Punitive Damages: A Challenge to the Defense, 5 FOR THE DEFENSE 9, 10-11 (1964). This argument, however, overlooks the fact that a community cannot possibly foresee and precisely define all conduct that may be morally reprehensible.

n12. See, e.g., Campbell v. Government Employees Ins. Co., 306 So. 2d 525, 531 (Fla. 1974) (stating that punitive damages are imposed "to serve the predominant function of deterrence and punishment"); RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 908(1) (1979) (Punitive damages are "awarded against a person to punish him for his outrageous conduct and to deter him and others like him from similar conduct in the future."); D. DOBBS, HANDBOOK ON THE LAW OF REMEDIES § 3.9, at 204 (1973) (noting that punitive damages are usually awarded as a punishment or deterrent); see also Wangen, 97 Wis. 2d at 281, 294 N.W.2d at 449 (stating that an award of punitive damages "has the effect of bringing to punishment types of conduct that though oppressive and hurtful to the individual almost invariably go unpunished by the public prosecutor"). Some businesses, after weighing the risk of paying compensatory damages against the cost of changing reckless business practices, may accept the risk of future litigation rather than change their business practices. See Wangen, 97 Wis. 2d at 285-86, 294 N.W.2d at 451; see also Funk v. Kerbaugh, 222 Pa. 18, 70 A. 953 (1908) (per curiam) (upholding an award of punitive damages against a defendant who was involved in the construction of a railroad and decided it would be less expensive to pay damages than to alter its blasting method). This cost-benefit balance, however, may be affected if punitive damages are injected into the equation. The possibility that potential defendants will be liable for sums amounting to more than the amount that would be necessary to compensate injured plaintiffs might provide a strong disincentive to the continuation of such conduct in the future. Wangen, 97 Wis. 2d at 286, 294 N.W.2d at 451. Any benefit derived from such a business practice might be outweighed by the risk of having to pay punitive damages. The business entity, therefore, would be encouraged to change its behavior, to the ultimate benefit of the public.

REV_00263520

n13. See Campbell, 306 So. 2d at 531 (stating that punitive damages help "to maintain public tranquillity by permitting the wronged plaintiff to take his revenge in the courtroom and not by self-help"); Owen, supra note 1, at 1282-83 (arguing that "punishment satisfies the individual's and society's need for vengeance, and thus serves to rectify some of the negative effects of prior misconduct"); see also Mallor & Roberts, supra note 2, at 650 (asserting that "[a]lthough revenge is not a civilized basis for imposing punitive damages, the prevention of private vengeance clearly is"); Note, Exemplary Damages in the Law of Torts, 70 HARV. L. REV. 517, 521-22 (1957) (suggesting that punitive damages serve the purpose of revenge).

n14. Ellis, supra note 10, at 9.

n15. Comment, supra note 1, at 988.

n16. See, e.g., Wangen, 97 Wis. 2d at 281, 294 N.W.2d at 449; Campbell, 306 So. 2d at 531; Ellis, supra note 10, at 10.

n17. Punishment and deterrence are the only justifications for punitive damages that Florida courts have accepted. See, e.g., Celotex Corp. v. Pickett, 490 So. 2d 35, 38 (Fla. 1986) (holding that punitive damages "are imposed as a punishment of the defendant and as a deterrent to others"); Mercury Motors Express, Inc. v. Smith, 393 So. 2d 545, 549 (Fla. 1981) (holding that punishment and deterrence are the only purposes of punitive damages); see also Winn & Lovett Grocery Co. v. Archer, 126 Fla. 308, 327, 171 So. 214, 221 (1936) (stating that punitive damages act as "smart money" against the defendant "by way of punishment or example as a deterrent to others").

n18. See infra Section IIIA.

n19. According to the Restatement, the actor is engaging in intentional conduct if he "desires to cause consequences of his act, or [if] he believes that the consequences are substantially certain to result from [the act]." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 8A (1965).

n20. See id. § 500 comment f. The Restatement defines recklessness as follows:

The Actor's conduct is in reckless disregard of the safety of another if he does an act or intentionally fails to do an act which it is his duty to the other to do, knowing or having reason to know of facts which would lead a reasonable man to realize, not only that his conduct creates an unreasonable risk of physical harm to another, but also that such risk is substantially greater than that which is necessary to make his conduct negligent.

Id. § 500. Comment a to section 500 further explains that recklessness may consist of one of two types of conduct. In one, the actor knows or has reason to know of facts that create a high degree of risk of physical harm to another and deliberately proceeds to act, or fails to act, in conscious disregard of that risk. In the other type of conduct, the actor knows or has reason to know of those facts, but fails to appreciate the high degree of risk involved. Under this second category, the actor is held to the realization of the aggravated risk even though he himself was not aware of it. Id. comment a.

REV_00263521

n21. Id. comment f.

n22. Id.

n23. See id. § 282 & comment e. As compared to recklessness, negligence involves conduct that subjects another to an unreasonable risk that falls below the level of a strong probability of harm. See id. § 500 comments f & g.

n24. Id. comment g.

n25. The Restatement provides that "[p]unitive damages may be awarded for conduct that is outrageous, because of the defendant's evil motive or his reckless indifference to the rights of others." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 908(2) (1979).

n26. 30 Fla. 1, 11 So. 506 (1892).

n27. Id. at 13-15, 11 So. at 507.

n28. Id. at 39, 11 So. at 513. According to the supreme court, the instruction was defective because it left the jury "to its own ideas, whatever they [were], as to what want of care constitutes the gross negligence authorizing the allowance of [punitive] damages." Id.

n29. Id. As support for this standard, the court relied on Florida Railway & Navigation Co. v. Webster, in which an injured train passenger sued a railroad company for failure to maintain its track. 25 Fla. 394, 416, 420-21, 5 So. 714, 718, 719-20 (1889). In Webster, the Supreme Court of Florida held that a jury could award punitive damages if the "negligence was so gross as to amount to misconduct and recklessness." Id. at 419, 5 So. at 719.

n30. The Supreme Court of Florida established the criminal manslaughter standard for punitive damages in Carraway v. Revell, 116 So. 2d 16 (Fla. 1959). For a discussion of Carraway, see infra notes 35-44 and accompanying text.

n31. 94 So. 2d 854 (Fla. 1957).

n32. Id. at 855.

n33. Id. at 858.

n34. Id. (emphasis added). At least two district courts of appeal differ over whether Griffith represents the current state of the law. Compare Paterson v. Deeb, 472 So. 2d 1210, 1221 (Fla. 1st DCA 1985) ("We find nothing in Como Oil . . . and White Construction . . . which suggests that the supreme court has overruled or otherwise limited the rule in [Griffith]."), revs. denied, 484 So. 2d 8 (Fla.), 484 So. 2d 9 (Fla. 1986) with Ten Assocs. v. Brunson, 492 So. 2d 1149, 1151 & n.1 (Fla. 3d DCA) (dicta) (disagreeing with the Paterson court's view of Griffith), rev. denied, 501 So. 2d 1281 (Fla. 1986).

n35. 116 So. 2d 16 (Fla. 1959).

n36. The Florida guest statute provided in part as follows:

No person transported by the owner or operator of a motor vehicle as his guest or passenger, without payment for such transportation, shall have a cause of action for damages against such owner or operator for injury, death or loss, in case of accident, unless such accident shall have been caused by the gross negligence or willful and wanton misconduct of the owner or operator of such motor vehicle. . . .

REV_00263522

FLA. STAT. § 320.59 (1971), repealed by Ch. 72-1, §§ 1-2, Laws of Fla. (1972).

n37. Carraway, 116 So. 2d at 18.

n38. Id. Section 782.07 of the Florida Statutes defines manslaughter as the "killing of a human being by act, procurement or culpable negligence of another, without lawful justification." FLA. STAT. § 782.07 (1987).

n39. Carraway, 116 So. 2d at 22.

n40. Id.

n41. Id. at 20 (quoting Carraway v. Revell, 112 So. 2d 71, 75 (Fla. 1st DCA), rev'd on other grounds, 116 So. 2d 16 (Fla. 1959)).

n42. Id. at 20 n.12.

n43. The punitive damages standards that the supreme court articulated in Carraway and Florida Southern Railway v. Hirst, 30 Fla. 1, 11 So. 506 (1892), were virtually identical. See Carraway, 116 So. 2d at 20 n.12; Hirst, 30 Fla. at 38-39, 11 So. at 513. Yet the court's interpretation of what conduct would fulfill the standards in these two cases was inconsistent. Hirst provided for punitive damages to be awarded in cases involving certain extreme degrees of gross negligence. See supra notes 26-29 and accompanying text. Carraway, in contrast, separated gross negligence and the negligence necessary to support an award of punitive damages into two mutually exclusive categories. See Carraway, 116 So. 2d at 22.

n44. The court could have confined the criminal manslaughter standard for punitive damages to guest statute cases only. Because the guest statute already required gross negligence for compensatory damages, the court had to require something more for punitive damages. Otherwise, as the Carraway court itself recognized, a successful claimant under the guest statute would necessarily have been entitled to recover both punitive damages and compensatory damages. 116 So. 2d at 21.

n45. See, e.g., Atlas Properties, Inc. v. Didich, 226 So. 2d 684 (Fla. 1968) (upholding an award of punitive damages without making reference to either the criminal manslaughter standard or Carraway); see also Piper Aircraft Corp. v. Coulter, 426 So. 2d 1108 (Fla. 4th DCA) (same), rev. denied, 436 So. 2d 100 (Fla. 1983); American Motors Corp. v. Ellis, 403 So. 2d 459 (Fla. 1st DCA 1981) (same), rev. denied, 415 So. 2d 1359 (Fla. 1982). But cf. Castlewood Int'l Corp. v. LaFleur, 322 So. 2d 520, 521 n.1 (Fla. 1975) (suggesting that the lower court's opinion would have conflicted with Carraway if it had upheld a punitive damages award by a jury that had been clearly instructed that it could award punitive damages for gross negligence). In Atlas, a plaintiff brought a wrongful death action against his landlord for the loss of his daughter who drowned as a result of having had her arm caught in an uncovered pool drain. The Supreme Court of Florida held that the evidence introduced at trial was sufficient to sustain an award of punitive damages. Atlas, 226 So. 2d at 690. The evidence showed that the pool was unsupervised; the drain was missing a cover in violation of safety statutes; the landlord was repeatedly warned of dangers involved in operating a pool without a drain cover; the landlord failed to warn its tenants of the condition; and the landlord chose to save money rather than remedy the dangerous condition. Atlas Properties, Inc. v. Didich, 213 So. 2d 278, 279 (Fla. 3d DCA), aff'd, 226 So. 2d 684 (Fla. 1968). It is far from certain that these facts would have been sufficient to support a punitive damage award if Atlas had been decided after White Construction Co. v. Dupont, 455 So. 2d 1026 (Fla. 1984).

REV_00263523

n46. See, e.g., Ellis v. Golconda Corp., 352 So. 2d 1221, 1225 (Fla. 1st DCA 1977), cert. denied sub nom. Peterson v. McKenzie Tank Lines, 365 So. 2d 715 (Fla. 1978); Florida Power Corp. v. Scudder, 350 So. 2d 106, 110 (Fla. 2d DCA 1977), cert. denied, 362 So. 2d 1056 (Fla.), appeal dismissed, 439 U.S. 922 (1978); Carter v. Lake Wales Hosp. Ass'n, 213 So. 2d 898, 900 (Fla. 2d DCA 1968).

n47. See, e.g., Monty v. Hayward, 451 So. 2d 938, 938 (Fla. 4th DCA 1984), rev. denied, 461 So. 2d 115 (Fla. 1985); K. D. Lewis Enters. Corp. v. Smith, 445 So. 2d 1032, 1038 (Fla. 5th DCA 1984).

n48. See Arab Termite & Pest Control of Fla., Inc. v. Jenkins, 409 So. 2d 1039, 1042 (Fla. 1982); Ingram v. Pettit, 340 So. 2d 922, 923-24 (Fla. 1976).

n49. 340 So. 2d 922 (Fla. 1976).

n50. Id. at 924-25.

n51. Id. at 923.

n52. Id.

n53. Id. at 924.

n54. Id. at 923-24.

n55. Id. at 924-25. The supreme court relied heavily on the public policy evidenced by laws outlawing drunk driving. See id. at 925 & n. 12.

n56. Id. at 924 (emphasis added).

n57. Id.

n58. As Justice Sundberg argued in dissent, the majority was totally emasculating the principle of proximate causation" at least in situations such as the one at bar "where there [was] no evidence at all that the intoxication caused any irregularities in the operation of the vehicle." Id. at 926 (Sundberg, J., dissenting).

n59. See Carraway v. Revell, 116 So. 2d 16, 20 & n.12 (Fla. 1959). For a discussion of Carraway, see supra notes 35-42 and accompanying text.

n60. See supra note 55 and accompanying text.

n61. See Arab Termite & Pest Control of Fla., Inc. v. Jenkins, 409 So. 2d 1039 (Fla. 1982); Wackenhut Corp. v. Canty, 359 So. 2d 430 (Fla. 1978); cases cited supra note 45.

n62. 409 So. 2d 1039 (Fla. 1982). Wackenhut Corp. v. Canty, 359 So. 2d 430 (Fla. 1978), an earlier case, also marked a departure by the supreme court from Carraway. In Wackenhut, the plaintiff, a customer, brought a battery and negligence action against a store to recover compensatory and punitive damages for injuries he sustained when the store's security guard pulled on his colostomy bag. Id. at 431. At trial, the jury awarded the plaintiff $ 180,000 in punitive damages in addition to $ 50,000 in compensatory damages. Id. at 432. The trial judge granted the defendant's motion for a new trial on the issue of punitive damages after the plaintiff refused to accept a remittitur. Id. On appeal, the Third District Court of Appeal reversed the trial court and reinstated the punitive damage award. Id. The Supreme Court of Florida affirmed the Third District's decision, holding that the $ 180,000 punitive damage award was proper, not excessive. Id. at 435. Making no reference to

REV_00263524

Carraway, the supreme court ruled that it was proper to submit the issue of punitive damages to the jury if a tort was committed "in an outrageous manner or with fraud, malice, wantonness, or oppression," and that punitive damages were thereafter left to the jury's discretion. Id. at 435-36.

n63. Arab Termite, 409 So. 2d at 1040.

n64. Id.

n65. Jenkins v. Arab Termite & Pest Control Serv. of Fla., Inc., 388 So. 2d 44, 45 (Fla. 2d DCA 1980), rev'd, 409 So. 2d 1039 (Fla. 1982).

n66. The supreme court held that the trial judge could find the amount of the jury verdict to be excessive if it bore an insufficient relationship to the degree of the defendant's misconduct. Arab Termite, 409 So. 2d at 1043.

n67. Id. at 1041 (citing Winn & Lovett Grocery Co. v. Archer, 126 Fla. 308, 327, 171 So. 214, 221 (1936)). Relying on Ingram, the supreme court in Arab Termite also restated the "public wrong" theory of punitive damages. Id. at 1042. It is interesting to note that the wrongful conduct that the court confronted in Arab Termite -- negligent ventilation of a fumigated house -- affected the public in an entirely different manner than the wrongful act in Ingram -- driving while intoxicated.

n68. The Arab Termite standard focuses on the defendant's subjective state of mind rather than on the nature of his conduct because, in paraphrasing the Winn & Lovett opinion, the Arab Termite court failed to include from that opinion the following language that would require conduct that could be objectively ascertained: Punitive damages are awarded in cases in which torts are committed "with such gross negligence as to indicate a wanton disregard of the rights of others." Winn & Lovett, 126 Fla. at 327, 171 So. at 221 (emphasis added). This omission might have been more significant (by foreshadowing a higher standard) if it were not for the fact that the Arab Termite court allowed punitive damages for conduct that appeared to be at most grossly negligent. See infra note 70 and accompanying text.

n69. Carraway v. Revell, 116 So. 2d 16, 20 & n. 12 (Fla. 1959); supra text accompanying notes 41-42.

n70. As reported by the supreme court, the evidence merely showed that the pest control service used a pesticide that was not specified in the contract and that the exterminator's employees "negligently aerated the house." Arab Termite, 409 So. 2d at 1040. This conduct probably would not fulfill the definition of recklessness contained in the Restatement. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 500 (1965). Although this evidence might suggest that the exterminator's conduct created a strong probability of harm, it does not show that the exterminator knew or had reason to know of this risk, i.e., no facts showed that the exterminator had any reason to believe that anyone would reenter the fumigated house before it was safe to do so.

n71. 455 So. 2d 1026 (Fla. 1984).

n72. The defendant White Construction Co., which owned the loader, leased it to the other defendant, Limerock Industries, Inc. Id. at 1027. Both defendants were closely held corporations with a common controlling shareholder. White Constr. co. v. Dupont, 430 So. 2d 915, 916 n.2 (Fla. 1st DCA 1983), rev'd, 455 So. 2d 1026 (Fla. 1984).

n73. White, 455 So. 2d at 1027.

n74. Id.

REV_00263525

n75. Id.

n76. Id. at 1028.

n77. 116 So. 2d 16 (Fla. 1959).

n78. Subsequent cases reveal that the supreme court intended the appellate courts to apply this standard in reviewing both actual jury awards and directed verdicts. See, e.g., Como Oil Co. v. O'Loughlin, 466 So. 2d 1061, 1062 (Fla. 1985) (upholding the trial court's directed verdict on the issue of punitive damages under the criminal manslaughter standard).

n79. White, 455 So. 2d at 1028 (quoting Carraway, 116 So. 2d at 20). In adopting the criminal manslaughter standard, the court gave no indication that it intended to limit punitive damages to only those situations in which deaths had occurred.

n80. Id.

n81. Id. (quoting Carraway, 116 So. 2d at 20 n.12).

n82. Id.

n83. 30 Fla. 1, 11 So. 506 (1892).

n84. 116 So. 2d 16, 20 n.12 (Fla. 1959).

n85. 91 Fla. 214, 221, 107 So. 360, 363 (1926). Cannon involved a prosecution brought under the manslaughter statute. For the relevant text of the current version of this statute, see supra note 38. In attempting to define the term "culpable negligence" in the statute, the supreme court stated in dicta that the degree of negligence necessary to justify a conviction should be at least as high as that required for an award of punitive damages in a civil case. Id. at 222, 107 So. at 362-63.

n86. Hirst, 30 Fla. at 39, 11 So. at 513; see supra notes 26-29 and accompanying text.

n87. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 500 & comment f (1965); See supra notes 20-25 and accompanying text.

n88. This conclusion can be reached only after engaging in a proximate cause analysis because another actor, the driver of the loader, also contributed to the creation of the risk. The defendants' conduct, allowing the loader to be operated with defective brakes, by itself, probably did not create a risk that amounted to a strong probability of harm. Rather, the act of the driver of the loader, by driving at top speed, raised the risk to a much greater likelihood of harm. The question therefore is whether the defendants' conduct, and not that of the driver, created a strong probability of harm. To resolve this question it is necessary to consider whether the defendants could have foreseen the possibility that the driver of the loader might contribute to the risk of harm. See Florida Dep't of Transp. v. Anglin, 502 So. 2d 896, 898 (Fla. 1987); Gibson v. Avis Rent-A-Car Sys., 386 So. 2d 520, 522 (Fla. 1980); Waters v. ITT Rayonier, Inc., 493 So. 2d 67, 68-69 (Fla. 1st DCA 1986); see also RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 501 (1965) (stating that the rules for determining if an actor is liable for recklessness "are the same as those which determine his liability for negligent misconduct"). Although few facts are reported in White, it seems reasonably foreseeable that the driver of a loader that hauls material at a mining site on occasion might drive at excessive speeds to satisfy relevant working quotas or timetables. Because the intervening cause, the employee's act of driving the loader at top speed, was reasonably foreseeable, the defendants' failure to maintain the loader's brakes could have created a strong probability of harm.

REV_00263526

n89. White Constr. Co. v. Dupont, 455 So. 2d 1026, 1028 (Fla. 1984).

n90. See supra note 88.

n91. White, 455 So. 2d at 1027.

n92. Id. at 1028.

n93. The First District Court of Appeal rejected the argument that White stood for the proposition that "punitive damages cannot be recovered even when the defendant has actual knowledge of a hazard and yet fails to warn or take corrective action." Johns-Manville Sales Corp. v. Janssens, 463 So. 2d 242, 263 (Fla. 1st DCA 1984), rev. denied, 467 So. 2d 999 (Fla. 1985). Instead, the First District distinguished White as a case that involved "nothing more than a single isolated instance of negligence, i.e., the defendant operated the loader even though aware that its brakes were defective." Id. In offering this distinction, the court may have been suggesting that the defendants in White lacked the sufficient level of knowledge for punitive damages to be imposed.

n94. White, 455 So. 2d at 1029.

n95. See Chrysler Corp. v. Wolmer, 499 So. 2d 823 (Fla. 1986). For a discussion of Wolmer, see infra notes 108-14 and accompanying text.

n96. 466 So. 2d 1061 (Fla. 1985).

n97. Id. at 1061.

n98. Id. The driver permitted between 50 and 350 gallons of gasoline to be introduced into an underground tank, and as a result, the tank overflowed. Id. at 1061-62.

n99. Id. at 1062. According to the dissenting opinion, there was also evidence that the truck driver left the truck unattended while pumping was in progress "even though it was pointed out to him that the equipment and truck were leaking." Id. at 1063 (Shaw & Erlich, JJ., concurring and dissenting).

n100. Id. at 1062.

n101. Respondent's Brief on the Merits at 42, Chrysler Corp. v. Wolmer, 499 So. 2d 823 (Fla. 1986) (No. 67761).

n102. Nor would he have had any reason to know that he was creating a risk if the truck's flow meter gave him no indication that the tank was overflowing.

n103. 498 So. 2d 859 (Fla. 1986).

n104. Id. at 860. Acrylamide, the toxic chemical in the product, had been linked to a variety of conditions ranging from neuropathy and atasia to severe skin eruptions. Id.

n105. Id. at 862.

n106. The warning label noted that the product contained acrylamide and stated that "[r] epeated skin contact, inhalation or swallowing may cause nervous system disturbances." Id.

REV_00263527

n107. Id.

n108. 499 So. 2d 823 (Fla. 1986).

n109. Id. at 824.

n110. Chrysler Corp. v. Wolmer, 474 So. 2d 834, 839 (Fla. 4th DCA 1985), rev'd, 499 So. 2d 823 (Fla. 1986).

n111. 463 So. 2d 242 (Fla. 1st DCA 1984), rev. denied, 467 So. 2d 999 (Fla. 1985).

n112. Wolmer, 499 So. 2d at 824-25.

n113. Wolmer, 474 So. 2d at 836 (quoting Johns-Manville Sales Corp. v. Janssens, 463 So. 2d 242, 249 (Fla. 1st DCA 1984), rev. denied, 467 So. 2d 999 (Fla. 1985)).

n114. Wolmer, 499 So. 2d at 826. The court also suggested that Chrysler lacked constructive knowledge (i.e., had no reason to know) of the fuel system's danger. See id. (stating that "a closer reading of [the crash] test results" did not support the district court of appeal's interpretation that Chrysler was put "on notice of the fuel system defects").

n115. The extra factor may be flagrant misconduct. In American Cyanamid, the supreme court suggested that flagrant misconduct must be present before punitive damages may be awarded. See American Cyanamid Co. v. Roy, 498 So. 2d 859, 863 (Fla. 1986). In holding that an award of punitive damages was inappropriate, the court stated, "[T]he facts simply do not reflect the kind of flagrant misconduct that would justify a finding of willful and wanton disregard for the safety of persons." Id. (quoting American Cyanamid v. Roy, 466 So. 2d 1079, 1085 (Fla. 4th DCA 1984) (Anstead, C.J., dissenting), rev'd, 498 So. 2d 859 (Fla. 1986)).

A possible explanation of why the court would require flagrant misconduct in addition to the Restatement definition of recklessness may rest in the court's frequent use of the "public wrong" theory. See, e.g., Chrysler Corp. v. Wolmer, 499 So. 2d 823, 825 (Fla. 1986); American Cyanamid Co. v. Roy, 498 So. 2d 859, 861 (Fla. 1986); Ingram v. Pettit, 340 So. 2d 922, 923-24 (Fla. 1976). Under this theory, a tort must create a risk to the public and not just to individuals before it merits punitive damages. Thus, the scope of the tort, or in other words, the number of people affected by it, determines whether punitive damages are appropriate. The application of the public wrong rationale, however, is extremely difficult. On the one hand, it could be argued that the conduct in White satisfies this theory, as the defective brakes endangered the public as a whole. On the other hand, one could argue that the loader's defective brakes posed a danger to only a limited number of construction workers. Hence, not only is it difficult to determine whether a tort affects the public, but a competent lawyer can almost always argue that a defendant exposed the public to harm in some way. In addition, it is unclear why individuals should not receive protection from reckless conduct to the same extent as would the public. Despite the uncertainties as to exactly what element beyond that of Restatement recklessness is necessary before punitive damages are merited under the supreme court's manslaughter standard, it is clear that a standard requiring flagrant misconduct would represent a policy statement to the lower courts that punitive damages should be awarded sparingly.

n116. See supra note 17 and accompanying text.

n117. It remains unclear whether the Florida Tort and Insurance Reform Act of 1986 will have any effect on the punitive damages standard. See Ch. 86-160, Laws of Fla. (codified in scattered sections of FLA. STAT. chs. 110, 120, 458-59, 624, 626-27, 629, 768 (1987)) [hereinafter FTIRA]. For a general discussion of the Act's provisions, see Fort, Granger,

REV_00263528

[*805] relates to the lack of conformity between the standard jury instruction on punitive damages and the criminal manslaughter standard, which judges apply to determine if there is any basis in the evidence to support the imposition of punitive damages. The other problem arises because even if a jury were to apply the criminal manslaughter standard, the standard, as currently formulated, lacks sufficient guidelines to inform the jury whether it may award punitive damages.

This Comment traces the development of the punitive damages standard in the context of Florida cases involving negligent conduct. Section II explores the evolution of the current punitive damages standard as articulated by the principal Supreme Court of Florida cases. Section IIIA analyzes recent cases in which the supreme court has applied the current standard. In so doing, the Section attempts to discover what kind of conduct would satisfy the standard, and considers whether the standard's most recent formulation can assist trial courts in deciding if a defendant's conduct is sufficiently culpable to create a jury question on the issue of punitive damages. Section IIIB addresses the question of which of the two interpretations of the current standard better promotes the purposes of punitive damages. Finally, Section IIIC examines the respective roles of the judge and jury in applying the current punitive damages standard.

II. EVOLUTION OF THE FLORIDA STANDARD FOR SUBMITTING THE ISSUE OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES TO THE JURY IN NEGLIGENCE CASES

Courts and commentators have suggested that punitive damages serve several purposes. [10] The two principal justifications [11] that they have articulated are that punitive damages serve to punish an individual [*806] for his reckless conduct and to deter him and others from engaging in similar acts in the future. [12] Other justifications for punitive damages look to their effect on the victim rather than on the wrongdoer. Punitive damages, for example, help to maintain public order by offering victims of serious misconduct an alternative to private acts of vengeance. [13] Closely related to the concept of vengeance is the concept of vindication. Punitive damages vindicate the rights of injured persons by acting as an "official declaration that they were wronged by the defendant." [14] In addition to these justifications, some courts have recognized the "spur-to-litigation" [15] rationale. According to this argument, the availability of punitive damages is necessary to induce injured persons to act as private attorneys general to stop misconduct. [16]

Relying upon the first two justifications -- punishment and deterrence -- Florida courts over the years have embraced the doctrine of [*807] punitive damages. [17] More recently, however, courts have taken a decidedly less favorable view. But before examining the evolution of the punitive damages standard in Florida, it is necessary to begin with a general discussion of the various categories of culpable behavior set out in the Second Restatement of Torts. The Restatement will also serve as a useful tort framework against which the current Florida standard will later be analyzed. [18]

Under the Restatement, culpable behavior falls into one of three categories that differ according to the extent of the risk of harm and the actor's knowledge of that risk. These categories include intentional, reckless, and negligent conduct. Intentional behavior represents the highest level of culpability and exists if the actor knows that the harm his behavior may produce is substantially certain to occur. [19] Reckless behavior, the intermediate level of culpability, exists if the actor knows or has reason to know of a "strong probability" of harm. [20] For recklessness, therefore, it is enough that the actor "realizes or, from facts which he knows, should realize" [21] that there is a strong probability that his behavior will result in harm. [22] The lowest degree of culpability, ordinary negligence, exists if an actor engages in [*808] conduct that creates an unreasonable risk. [23] Negligent conduct is characterized by mere inadvertence, incompetence, unskillfulness, or failure to take adequate precautions. [24] It is important to note, however, that the Restatement allows punitive damages to be awarded if the defendant acts recklessly. [25]

REV_00263511

Polston & Wilkes, Florida's Tort Reform: Response to a Persistent Problem, 14 FLA. ST. U.L. REV. 505 (1986) [hereinafter Tort Reform]. Section 52 of the Act limits the amount of punitive damages that may be awarded to three times the amount of actual damages awarded in any case based on negligence, strict liability, products liability, professional liability, or breach of warranty "that involves willful, wanton, or gross misconduct." FTIRA § 52, FLA. STAT. § 768.73(1)(a) (1987). Because the supreme court has held that gross negligence alone is insufficient to support an award of punitive damages, the legislature's inclusion of the term "gross misconduct" in the act "could be considered either excess verbiage or as modifying the standard under which punitive damages may be awarded." STAFF OF THE FLA. S. COMM. ON COMMERCE, FLA. MED. MALPRACTICE REFORM AND A REV. OF COURT-ORDERED ARBITRATION 32-33 (January 1988). In any event, the legislature's use of the term "gross misconduct" to lower the punitive damages standard is not necessarily inconsistent with the basic purposes of the Act. The principal purpose of the Act is to alleviate a crisis in the insurance industry. See FTIRA preamble. In furtherance of this purpose, the Act limited the amount of noneconomic damages that a claimant could recover to a total of $ 450,000. Id. § 59, FLA. STAT. § 768.80 (1987). The Supreme Court of Florida recently ruled that this cap violated the provision in the Constitution of Florida that guarantees access to the courts for the redress of grievances. See Smith v. Department of Ins., 507 So. 2d 1080, 1087-89 (Fla. 1987) (striking down section 768.80 as violating article I, section 21 of the Constitution of Florida). If the court interprets the term "gross misconduct" as lowering the punitive damages standard, any frustration of the Act's legislative intent by Smith may be partially mitigated. Some observers have argued that juries will award punitive damages under the name "mental injuries" if they cannot award them in the form of punitive damages. See, e.g., Mallor & Roberts, supra note 2, at 645-46; Note, supra note 2, at 331 & n.149. With a lower punitive damages standard, juries would be more likely to award a greater amount of damages under the category of punitive damages rather than that of noneconomic, compensatory damages. The public policy of Florida prohibits insurance for punitive damages. U.S. Concrete Pipe Co. v. Bould, 437 So. 2d 1061, 1064 (Fla. 1983). Insurance companies, therefore, would end up paying less in compensatory damages overall. Thus, even though the legislature was unable to address the insurance crisis by establishing a cap on noneconomic damages, it may be successful in combating the crisis by allowing juries to move damages into a category for which insurance companies are not responsible -- punitive damages.

n118. See, e.g., Rose v. Locke, 423 U.S. 48, 49 (1975) (per curiam); Bouie v. City of Columbia, 378 U.S. 347, 350-51 (1964); United States v. Harriss, 347 U.S. 612, 617 (1954); Connally v. General Constr. Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391 (1926); see also H. PACKER, THE LIMITS OF THE CRIMINAL SANCTION 79-80 (1968) (noting the "conventional" view "that people are entitled to know what they are forbidden to do so that they may shape their conduct accordingly").

n119. See Ellis, supra note 10, at 5-6 & n.19 (arguing that one should not be punished for his act "unless it has been authoritatively declared to be wrongful before its commission or unless the actor has otherwise been given prior notice that the act is wrong"); Tort Reform, supra note 117, at 521 (arguing that "[d]eterrence is facilitated by predictability, which punitive damage awards are lacking"); Wheeler, The Constitutional Case for Reforming Punitive Damages Procedures, 69 VA. L. REV. 269, 308-09 (1983) (arguing that the "greatest danger of underdeterrence arises from the fact that most punitive damages laws do not provide juries with guidance as to whether punitive damages should be awarded"). But cf. Note, The Imposition of Punishment by Civil Courts: A Reappraisal of Punitive Damages, 41 N.Y.U. L. REV. 1158, 1179 (arguing that "[i]t is doubtful whether there is a constitutional right to precise punitive standards").

n120. Comment, supra note 1, at 995 & n.65. Courts historically have struggled to minimize subjectivity in resolving controversies. The Supreme Court of the United States' attempt to define obscenity serves as a well-known example of this difficulty. See generally

REV_00263529

Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 37 (1973) (Douglas, J., dissenting) ("The Court has worked hard to define obscenity and concededly has failed."); Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184, 197 (1964) (Stewart, J., concurring) (arguing that the Court, in the obscenity cases, has been "faced with the task of trying to define what may be indefinable"). Yet despite the difficulty of defining obscenity, the Court has refused to abandon this task. See Jacobellis, 378 U.S. at 197 (Stewart, J., concurring) ("I know [hard-core pornography] when I see it."). The Court instead has endeavored to formulate standards that provide some measure of predictability. See Miller, 413 U.S. at 37. Similarly, the Supreme Court of Florida should adopt a punitive damages standard that affords potential litigants some degree of predictability.

n121. One may argue that so long as the supreme court maintains the Restatement standard as a threshold requirement, the defendant can be said to be on fair notice of what conduct will result in sanctions and the policy of deterrence therefore will not be compromised. Such an argument, however, fails to recognize the practical reality that upon hearing such language as "flagrant conduct" or "aggravating circumstances," the jury is likely to emphasize this part of the standard over any part that sets forth the more legalistic terminology similar to that of the Restatement: knowledge of a "strong probability of harm." See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 500 comment f (1965). Thus, in actual practice the standard is likely to be applied in a highly subjective manner.

n122. Indeed, such an approach shares some of the same disadvantages as the much-criticized "outrageous" standard used in cases involving the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. See generally Givelber, The Right to Minimum Social Decency and the Limits of Evenhandedness: Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress by Outrageous Conduct, 82 COLUM. L. REV. 42, 51-54 (1982) (arguing that the outrageousness "concept . . . fails to provide clear guidance either to those whose conduct it purports to regulate, or to those who must evaluate that conduct"). Florida courts have accepted the Restatement's formulation of the elements for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. See Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. McCarson, 467 So. 2d 277, 278-79 (Fla. 1985).

n123. By requiring aggravating circumstances in addition to Restatement recklessness, the court would be inviting another problem: the conversion of the punitive damages inquiry into a battle over semantics. This is because in alleging an aggravating factor, the plaintiff in reality may be doing nothing more than attempting to restate in a grandiose manner facts that form an essential element of the Restatement definition of recklessness. In such a case, the additional requirement of aggravating circumstances would be illusory. For example, an amicus curiae brief in the supreme court case of American Cyanamid Co. v. Roy suggested that, at least in the area of products liability, a "criminal coverup" is a requisite aggravating factor for an award of punitive damages. See Brief of Amicus Curiae Florida Defense Lawyers Association in Support of Petitioner at 2, American Cyanamid Co. v. Roy, 498 So. 2d 859 (Fla. 1986) (No. 67124). Yet a "criminal coverup" might amount simply to a failure to warn after becoming aware of a defect.

n124. See, e.g., Wackenhut Corp. v. Canty, 359 So. 2d 430, 435-36 (Fla. 1978); Winn & Lovett Grocery Co. v. Archer, 126 Fla. 306, 328-29, 171 So. 214, 222 (1936); Hospital Corp. of Lake Worth v. Romaguera, 511 So. 2d 559, 564-65 (Fla. 4th DCA 1986). For a general discussion of Wackenhut, see supra note 62.

n125. Before White, judges and juries applied essentially the same standard. During this time, a sufficient basis for a punitive damages claim existed if a tort was committed "in an outrageous manner or with fraud, malice, wantonness or oppression." Arab Termite & Pest Control of Fla., Inc. v. Jenkins, 409 So. 2d 1039, 1041 (Fla. 1982) (quoting Wackenhut, 359 So. 2d at 435-36). This standard was materially the same as the standard jury instruction on punitive damages, which allows the jury to award punitive damages if it finds that the defendant "acted with malice, moral turpitude, wantonness, willfulness, or reckless indifference to the rights of others." FLA. STD. JURY INSTR. (CIV.) 6.12 (February 1987).

REV_00263530

Although the jury instruction contains reference to recklessness and the standard applied by the judge did not, this difference was inconsequential because the term recklessness is usually considered to be synonymous with the term "wantonness," a form of conduct that would create a sufficient basis for punitive damages. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 500 special note (1965).

n126. See supra text accompanying notes 77-81.

n127. FLA. STD. JURY INSTR. (CIV.) 6.12 (February 1987).

n128. For example, although the standard jury instruction allows a jury to award punitive damages when a defendant has acted with malice, the criminal manslaughter standard does not even apply to this conduct.

n129. See supra notes 68-69 and accompanying text.

n130. The difficulties continue to the appellate level. Because appellate courts, like trial judges, review the evidence under the White criminal manslaughter standard, they will also be applying a different standard than that applied by juries.

n131. The Supreme Court of Florida authorized the Supreme Court Committee on Standard Jury Instructions and The Florida Bar to publish and distribute standard jury instructions. In re Use by the Trial Courts of the Standard Jury Instructions, 198 So. 2d 319, 319 (Fla. 1967). The court, however, recognized that a litigant's right to object to the use of a standard instruction has been maintained. Id.

n132. See supra Section IIIA.

n133. See supra notes 19-25 and accompanying text.

n134. See supra notes 20-22 and accompanying text. Ironically, the standard jury instruction that defines the element of "culpable negligence" in criminal manslaughter provides the jury with greater guidance than the current punitive damages instruction: "Culpable negligence is consciously doing an act or following a course of conduct that the defendant must have known, or reasonably should have known, was likely to cause death or great bodily injury." FLA. STD. JURY INSTR. (CRIM.) 68-68a (May 1987).

n135. Recently, litigants recovering punitive damages from juries often have had little success in preserving their awards on appeal. See, e.g., Chrysler Corp. v. Wolmer, 499 So. 2d 823 (Fla. 1986) (upholding the trial court's granting of a renewed motion for a directed verdict after the jury had awarded $ 3 million in punitive damages); American Cyanamid Co. v. Roy, 498 So. 2d 859 (Fla. 1986) (reversing a punitive damages verdict of $ 45,000); White Constr. Co. v. Dupont, 455 So. 2d 1026 (Fla. 1984) (reversing a punitive damages award of $ 2.5 million); Pantry Pride Enters., Inc. v. Velazquez, 503 So. 2d 429 (Fla. 3d DCA 1987) (reversing an award of punitive damages); Ten Assocs. V. Brunson, 492 So. 2d 1149 (Fla. 3d DCA) (same), rev. denied, 501 So. 2d 1281 (Fla. 1986).

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined (i)
Terms: "substantially certain to result" /50 "punitive damages" and reckless and inten! (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, October 2, 2002 - 10:03 PM EDT

REV_00263531

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

A. The Standard Under Early Decisions: Gross Negligence

In the late 1800's, Florida courts permitted the recovery of punitive damages for certain degrees of gross negligence. In Florida Southern Railway v. Hirst, [26] a passenger on a train sued a railroad company for injuries he suffered as a result of a train collision that allegedly occurred because of the railroad company's negligence. [27] The Supreme Court of Florida held that the trial court erred in instructing the jury "simply" that gross negligence was sufficient to warrant an award of punitive damages. [28] The trial court, instead, should have "confined" the term gross negligence to that extreme degree of negligence that would be present if the "negligence [was] of a gross and flagrant character, evincing reckless disregard of human life . . . or a grossly careless disregard of the safety and welfare of the public." [29] Under this reasoning, punitive damages would be considered appropriate if a case involved an extreme degree of gross negligence.

Shortly before establishing the criminal manslaughter standard, [30] the Supreme Court of Florida, in Griffith v. Shamrock Village, Inc., [31] again allowed punitive damages to be imposed for gross negligence. In [*809] Griffith, a tenant sued his landlord to recover compensatory and punitive damages, contending that the landlord had voluntarily assumed the duty of receiving telephone messages for his tenants and that, by failing to deliver a message, the landlord evidenced a lack of care and inattention to his duty that constituted gross negligence. [32] The supreme court reversed the trial court's directed verdict, holding that there was sufficient evidence to support this contention. [33] In what appeared to be a relaxation of the Hirst standard, the court stated: "[P]unitive damages can be recovered in actions such as this and . . . malice may be imputed to defendant from gross negligence, i.e., a want of slight care." [34]

B. The Emergence of the Criminal Manslaughter Standard: Carraway v. Revell

In 1959, the Supreme Court of Florida seized upon an opportunity to revise the standard that governs whether punitive damages may be awarded even though the particular case, Carraway v. Revell, [35] did not involve a punitive damages issue. In Carraway, the plaintiff sued the driver of an automobile under a Florida guest statute [36] to recover compensatory damages for the death of his son, a passenger in the vehicle. [37] The trial judge granted judgment for the defendant, reasoning that because the requirement of gross negligence under the guest statute was the same as the element of culpable negligence under the criminal manslaughter statute, compensatory damages could not be recovered unless the negligence was of a degree that would be sufficient to warrant a manslaughter conviction. [38] Under [*810] this view, therefore, gross negligence and culpable negligence were treated as synonymous. On certiorari, the supreme court rejected this reasoning and defined gross negligence under the guest statute as "that kind or degree of negligence which lies in the area between ordinary negligence" [39] and the kind of misconduct that would warrant a conviction for manslaughter. [40] In dicta, the court attempted to explain the distinction between gross negligence and the culpable negligence element of criminal manslaughter by noting that "the character of negligence necessary to sustain a conviction for manslaughter is the same as that required to sustain a recovery for punitive damages." [41] In its opinion, the Carraway court defined the type of conduct that would justify an award of punitive damages:

The character of negligence necessary to sustain an award of punitive damages must be of "a gross and flagrant character, evincing reckless disregard of human life, or of the safety of persons exposed to its dangerous effects, or there is that entire want of care which would raise the presumption of a conscious indifference to consequences, or which shows wantonness or recklessness, or a grossly careless disregard of the safety and welfare of the public, or that reckless indifference to the rights of others which is equivalent to an intentional violation of them." [42]

REV_00263512

According to the court, therefore, this standard encompassed conduct that went beyond gross negligence, which was the required degree of negligence under the guest statute.

The supreme court's decision in Carraway had the potential for producing far reaching effects. The case might have marked a watershed in Florida tort law by once and for all eliminating gross negligence as a basis for awarding punitive damages. [43] On the other hand, Carraway might have simply represented an aberration, a peculiar case limited to a now defunct guest statute. [44]

[*811] C. The Departure from Carraway

Following Carraway, Florida courts applied a number of punitive damages standards, and as a result, Carraway proved to have little effect on Florida tort law. [45] Although some district courts of appeal followed Carraway by requiring conduct more severe than gross negligence for punitive damages to be awarded, [46] others continued to allow punitive damages for extreme degrees of gross negligence. [47] Subsequently, the supreme court added to this assortment of standards by introducing the "public wrong" theory for punitive damages. [48]

In Ingram v. Pettit, [49] for example, the supreme court used this theory to declare drunk driving to be reckless conduct. [50] Ingram involved a suit for compensatory and punitive damages against an automobile driver who caused a collision. Although the defendant [*812] was legally intoxicated at the time of the accident, there was no evidence that he was operating the vehicle abnormally. [51] Citing Carraway, the defendant contended that punitive damages could be awarded only if there was willful conduct equivalent to that in a criminal manslaughter case. [52] The supreme court rejected this contention because it focused exclusively on semantic distinctions between degrees of negligence rather than on the policies that the distinctions were intended to further. [53] Instead, the court advocated an approach that emphasizes the policy of deterring future harm to the public and thus concluded that punitive damages should be awarded only in those cases in which "private injuries partake of public wrongs." [54] In light of the state's policy against highway accidents, driving while intoxicated constitutes a public menace that should be deterred by punishment. [55] The court therefore held that a jury may award punitive damages against an intoxicated driver who was involved in an accident regardless of whether there was "external proof of carelessness or abnormal driving," because driving while intoxicated "evinces, without more, a sufficiently reckless attitude." [56] Despite the court's statement to the contrary, [57] this holding appears to undermine the traditional requirement of proof of proximate cause. That is, by not requiring any external manifestation of reckless driving, the court was allowing punitive damages to be awarded even if a plaintiff was unable to trace the injury arising from an automobile accident to the alleged reckless act -- driving while intoxicated. [58] In contrast, Carraway suggested that the conduct allegedly warranting punitive damages must itself be of a "gross and flagrant character" before punitive damages may be properly awarded. [59] Thus, driven by social policy considerations against drunk driving, [60] Ingram marked a significant retreat from the Carraway criminal manslaughter standard.

In later cases, the Supreme Court of Florida, without making [*813] reference to Carraway or the criminal manslaughter standard, passed over the issue of when punitive damages may properly be considered by the jury. [61] In Arab Termite & Pest Control of Florida, Inc. v. Jenkins, [62] for example, a jury awarded the plaintiff both compensatory and punitive damages for the wrongful death of her husband. [63] The plaintiff's husband died after he reentered his fumigated house, which the defendant, a pest control service, had negligently aerated. [64] The Second District Court of Appeal reversed a remittitur granted by the trial court, holding that the trial court had erred in finding the award excessive. [65] The supreme court reversed the district court's decision, [66] and ruled that a legal basis for punitive damages existed if a tort was committed "in an outrageous manner or with fraud, malice, wantonness or oppression." [67]

REV_00263513

This standard represents an abandonment of the Carraway approach. The Arab Termite standard focused on the subjective state of mind of the defendant. [68] The Carraway standard, in contrast, [*814] related to objective acts and required that the defendant's conduct be "gross and flagrant" or demonstrate an "entire want of care which would raise the presumption of a conscious indifference to consequences or which shows wantonness." [69] Moreover, it is unlikely that the pest control service's conduct in Arab Termite would have warranted punitive damages if the court had applied the criminal manslaughter standard because the exterminators lacked sufficient knowledge of the risk created by their conduct to satisfy the knowledge element of recklessness. [70]

D. The Return to Carraway: White Construction Co. v. Dupont

In the 1984 case of White Construction Co. v. Dupont, [71] the Supreme Court of Florida attempted to resolve the controversy regarding the appropriate punitive damages standard by readopting the Carraway criminal manslaughter standard, and thus requiring more than gross negligence for punitive damages to be awarded. In this case, the plaintiff, an independent truck driver, sued the defendants, which respectively owned a loader and a mine, [72] to recover for injuries he sustained at the mining site. [73] The litigation arose after one of the defendant's employees drove the forty ton loader "at top speed" [74] and collided with the plaintiff's truck, causing it to run him over. [75] The evidence showed that the loader's brakes had not been working for some time and that the defendants were aware of this [*815] condition. [76] According to the supreme court, Carraway v. Revell [77] set forth the appropriate standard for the judge to apply in determining whether the jury may consider the issue of punitive damages: [78] "[T]he character of negligence necessary to sustain a conviction for manslaughter is the same as that required to sustain a recovery of punitive damages." [79] Under this standard, "something more than gross negligence is needed to justify the imposition of punitive damages." [80] In the words of the court:

The character of negligence necessary to sustain an award of punitive damages must be of a "gross and flagrant character, evincing reckless disregard of human life, or of the safety of persons exposed to its dangerous effects, or there is that entire want of care which would raise the presumption of a conscious indifference to consequences, or which shows wantonness or recklessness, or a grossly careless disregard of the safety and welfare of the public, or that reckless indifference to the rights of others which is equivalent to an intentional violation of them." [81]

Without articulating its reasoning, the supreme court held that although the evidence "would be sufficient to show that the [defendants] were negligent," it was insufficient, "as a matter of law," to raise a triable issue of punitive damages. [82]

III. COMMENT

A. The Two Alternative Interpretations of the Current Standard for Submitting the Issue of Punitive Damages to the Jury in Negligence Cases

The White criminal manslaughter standard cannot be understood without recognizing a distinction between the way the court verbally formulated the standard and the way the court apparently meant it to be applied. The White criminal manslaughter standard purports to be a more stringent standard than the earlier standards, which had allowed recovery for gross negligence. Ironically, however, the standard [*816] that the court articulated in White actually originated in an earlier case, Florida Southern Railway v. Hirst, [83] that had allowed punitive damages to be recovered for certain kinds of gross negligence.

White reaffirmed the punitive damages standard set forth in Carraway v. Revell, [84] which had adopted the standard that appeared in the criminal manslaughter case of Cannon v. State. [85] Cannon, however, borrowed its standard from Hirst, in which the court allowed punitive damages to be recovered for certain extreme degrees of gross negligence. [86] Thus, although the supreme court in White stated that it was adopting a standard that would permit judges to submit the issue of punitive damages to a jury in cases in which the defendant's conduct would satisfy the criminal manslaughter standard, and thus constituted more than gross negligence, the court actually defined that conduct in terms that it had earlier construed as including some degrees of gross negligence. The court's verbal formulation of the kind of conduct that would merit punitive damages in White, therefore, was no more stringent than the standard established in earlier cases.

REV_00263514

The seeming contradiction between the supreme court's purported adoption of a criminal manslaughter standard and its reliance on a definition that it had previously interpreted to include gross negligence can be adequately explained only if the supreme court intended lower courts to follow its actions, and ignore what the court explicitly said. Thus, to figure out what the standard means, lower courts have had to watch the manner in which the supreme court has applied the standard. Yet even a focus on the court's actions provides incomplete guidance because, in promulgating the standard, the court has failed to set forth any kind of coherent approach for determining what conduct merits punitive damages. Observers and lower courts thus have been left only to guess why the supreme court arrives at any given result.

The Restatement, however, offers a useful theoretical framework that focuses the discussion of when punitive damages may be awarded [*817] to two factors. As discussed earlier, the Restatement defines conduct as reckless and therefore suitable for punitive damages if (1) it creates a strong probability of harm, and (2) the actor knows or has reason to know of this risk. [87] In analyzing the recent supreme court cases under the Restatement criteria, the question that must be addressed is whether conduct that would fulfill the Restatement definition of recklessness would be sufficient under the White criminal manslaughter standard to create a jury question on the issue of punitive damages, or whether something more is also required.

Of all the cases decided under the criminal manslaughter standard, White is the most perplexing. Because the court failed to articulate any reasoning, the case may be interpreted in two ways: As requiring only Restatement recklessness or as requiring, in addition to Restatement recklessness, some undefined element or aggravating circumstance, such as flagrant misconduct. As it was fairly likely that the defendants' conduct in White created a strong probability of harm, [88] the critical issue, in determining which of these two interpretations is correct, is whether the defendants knew or had reason to know of the strong probability of harm that their conduct created.

White may be interpreted as being consistent with the Restatement definition of recklessness if the defendants had no actual or constructive knowledge that their conduct was creating a high risk of harm. The facts showed that the defendants knew that the loader's brakes had not been working for some time. [89] Knowledge of this fact alone, however, would not be sufficient to establish the knowledge [*818] required under the Restatement (i.e., knowledge of a strong probability of harm) because the defective brakes, by themselves, probably did not create a strong probability of harm. [90] They merely created an unreasonable risk. Rather, the existence of defective brakes coupled with the fact that the loader was driven "at top speed" [91] raised the risk to a strong probability of harm.

The crucial question in determining whether the defendants were aware of a strong probability of harm, therefore, is whether, in addition to being aware that the loader's brakes were defective, they knew or had reason to know that the loader would be driven at top speed. Given the court's failure to articulate any reasoning, a definitive answer to this question is impossible. Nevertheless, the court's opinion can support an argument that the defendants were not aware that the loader would be driven at high speeds:

REV_00263515

The evidence in this case showed that the loader's brakes had not been working for some time, and that the [defendants] were aware of this fact. Although this evidence would be sufficient to show that the [defendants] were negligent, it is not sufficient as a matter of law, to submit the issue of punitive damages to the jury. [92]

The direct implication of this passage is that the evidence did not show that the defendants were aware that the loaders would be driven at top speed. [93] Thus, the defendants had no knowledge or reason to know that their failure to repair the brakes caused a strong probability of harm. The supreme court's denial of punitive damages was therefore consistent with the Restatement's definition of recklessness.

White, however, contains some language that supports the contrary argument: The court is requiring more than the Restatement definition of recklessness because the defendants did have knowledge that their behavior was creating a strong probability of harm. The basis of this argument lies in the court's rather cryptic statement that [*819] it did not need to address the defendants' argument that the trial court erred in allowing the plaintiffs' "safety expert to testify that [the defendants] were 'knowingly exposing people to injury or death.'" [94] The existence of this testimony would indicate that the record contained some evidence that could have shown that the defendants knew of a strong probability of harm. In light of this evidence, the court's ruling that punitive damages should not have been awarded as a matter of law suggests that the court was requiring something more than Restatement recklessness.

With one exception, [95] the cases decided since White do little to resolve the issue left open by that case: Whether the White criminal manslaughter standard requires something more than the Restatement's requirements for recklessness before the judge may submit the issue of punitive damages to the jury. The court in these cases did not reach this question because the conduct at issue did not meet even the threshold of the Restatement requirements.

The conduct in Como Oil Co. v. O'Loughlin, [96] the first case that the Supreme Court of Florida decided after White that is relevant to this issue, rose, at most, to the level of gross negligence. In Como Oil, the plaintiff sought punitive damages against an oil company for injuries she suffered in a gasoline explosion and fire that resulted from the negligence of the defendant's employee. [97] The explosion occurred after the employee, a truck driver, overfilled a gasoline storage tank. [98] The evidence merely showed that the driver failed to check the amount of gasoline in the tank before pumping the gasoline and that he "watched the flow meter on the truck rather than the actual filling operation." [99] The supreme court held that this evidence did not satisfy the White criminal manslaughter standard. [100] Although the court did not fully articulate its reasoning, it appears certain that the driver's conduct failed to satisfy the Restatement's definition of recklessness. The driver was "simply careless," [101] and thus had no knowledge [*820] that his conduct was creating a risk of harm. [102]

Similarly, the Supreme Court of Florida, in American Cyanamid Co. v. Roy, [103] was unable to answer whether the White criminal manslaughter standard requires something more than Restatement recklessness because the conduct involved in that case did not create a strong probability of harm. In American Cyanamid, the plaintiff brought suit against Cyanamid to recover compensatory and punitive damages for injuries he suffered after being exposed to a toxic chemical contained in one of the company's products. [104] The supreme court rejected the argument that Cyanamid's negligence in failing to warn users of the chemical's dangers rose to the level necessary to support an award of punitive damages. [105] Rather, the content of the warning [106] and Cyanamid's behavior in submitting information of the product's dangerous propensities to the product's suppliers in no way suggested "even gross negligence, much less intentional misconduct." [107] Under a Restatement analysis, it appears that if Cyanamid had apprised potential users of the product's dangers, the risk would have been reduced to something less than a strong probability of harm. Cyanamid's conduct therefore did not even meet the Restatement's definition of recklessness.

REV_00263516

Chrysler Corp. v. Wolmer, [108] the most recent of the supreme court's decisions concerning the appropriate punitive damages standard, may offer some insight as to what the White criminal manslaughter standard requires. The basis of the court's jurisdiction in Wolmer suggests that the criminal manslaughter standard requires something more than Restatement recklessness, but the court's manner of deciding the merits of the case reduces the likelihood that this is a definitive interpretation. In Wolmer, the plaintiff, an owner of a Chrysler automobile, brought a wrongful death action against Chrysler for the loss of his wife, alleging that the company's negligent design of the vehicle's fuel system caused his wife's death in an automobile accident. [109] The Fourth District Court of Appeal reversed the [*821] trial court's directed verdict on the issue of punitive damages. [110] The supreme court granted review under its conflict jurisdiction, finding that because the Fourth District applied a standard that the First District had formulated in Johns-Manville Sales Corp. v. Janssens, [111] the lower court's opinion "expressly and directly conflict[ed]" with the court's criminal manslaughter standard cases of Como Oil and White. [112]

The source of conflict, the Johns-Manville standard, bears a close resemblance to the Restatement recklessness standard. The Johns-Manville standard allows punitive damages if the plaintiff can show that the manufacturer had "knowledge that its product [was] inherently dangerous . . . and that its continued use [was] likely to cause injury or death, but nevertheless continue[d] to market the product." [113] Thus, the Johns-Manville standard, like the Restatement, requires knowledge of a likelihood of harm. By ruling that this standard conflicts with White, the court in effect suggested that the criminal manslaughter standard requires conduct more severe than Restatement recklessness. The court, however, by deciding on the merits that Chrysler was not liable for punitive damages because it lacked actual knowledge of the risk, [114] was relieved of the necessity of explaining exactly how the Johns-Manville standard conflicted with White, that is, what element is needed in addition to knowledge of a likelihood of harm. Consequently, Florida law today remains unclear as to whether the White criminal manslaughter standard requires something more than traditional Restatement recklessness. If in fact such an additional element is required, its identity remains uncertain. [115]

[*822] B. An Assessment of the Two Interpretations and the Policies Underlying Punitive Damages

In Florida, the policies that justify the award of punitive damages in negligence cases are punishment and deterrence. [116] These policies would be frustrated significantly if the Supreme Court of Florida adopts a standard that requires, in addition to Restatement recklessness, some kind of flagrant conduct or other aggravating circumstance because such an additional requirement would inject greater subjectivity and unpredictability into the punitive damages inquiry. Accordingly, the court in future cases should construe the White criminal manslaughter standard as requiring only knowledge of a strong probability of harm, not aggravating circumstances, to support an award of punitive damages. [117]

[*823] The policies of punishment and deterrence are furthered only if persons are able to avoid conduct that would lead to sanctions. One of the most deeply rooted notions in American jurisprudence is that punishment for an act is unfair if a person is not on notice that the act is wrong. [118] Thus, the clearer the punitive damages standard, the fairer it is to impose punishment. Moreover, the deterrent value of a sanction is likely to be diminished if persons are not put on reasonable notice that their conduct will result in punishment. Again, the clearer the punitive damages standard, the more effective it is as a deterrent. [119] By offering some degree of notice and predictability, the Restatement standard for recklessness is better suited to promote the policies of punishment and deterrence than a standard that focuses on an undefined requirement of aggravating circumstances or flagrant misconduct.

Although the Restatement, concededly, does not completely [*824] eliminate subjectivity as to what conduct is sufficiently culpable to merit punitive damages, [120] it does provide guidelines that give some measure of predictability. The Restatement regime focuses on two factors -- the actor's knowledge and the degree of risk. These factors are quantifiable, although imprecise, and allow a person to avoid engaging in conduct that he knows is likely to create a serious risk of harm to others. In contrast, a standard that focuses on aggravating circumstances or flagrant misconduct is subjective to a far greater degree. [121] In applying such a standard, a judge would have little restraint beyond the dictates of his conscience in deciding whether a defendant's conduct strikes him as egregious or in some other way more aggravated than recklessness. [122] In light of its adverse effect on the policies of punishment and deterrence, [123] a requirement under the [*825] White criminal manslaughter standard that some aggravating circumstance exist before the judge may submit the issue of punitive damages to the jury should not be imposed.

REV_00263517

C. The Roles of the Judge and the Jury in Applying the Criminal Manslaughter Standard

Once the trial judge determines that there is a sufficient basis in the evidence to support a demand for punitive damages, he then presents the issue to the jury. [124] Juries, however, face two major obstacles that prevent them from effectively evaluating whether a defendant's conduct warrants punitive damages. First, in considering whether a defendant's conduct merits punitive damages, the jury applies a different standard from the one that the judge applies to determine whether there is a basis for a punitive damages claim. Second, even if the jury were to apply the same standard as does the judge (i.e., the White criminal manslaughter standard), it would be hampered by the standard's lack of guidelines as to whether the defendant's conduct merits punitive damages.

The White criminal manslaughter standard and the standard jury instruction on punitive damages represent markedly different formulations of when punitive damages are justified. [125] Since White was decided, a judge allows the jury to consider the issue of punitive damages if, after viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to the plaintiff, he finds that the character of negligence exhibited by the [*826] defendant was equivalent to the type of negligence that would justify a conviction for manslaughter. [126] If a judge finds such a basis to be present, he then instructs the jury that it may award punitive damages if it finds that the defendant "acted with malice, moral turpitude, wantonness, willfulness, or reckless indifference to the rights of others." [127] In addition to representing entirely different formulations [128] of whether punitive damages may be awarded, the two standards focus on entirely different criteria. Unlike the jury instruction, which relates to the defendant's subjective state of mind, the criminal manslaughter standard focuses on acts of the defendant and the consequences of those acts. [129]

Because the jury is instructed to apply a different standard, it never receives the opportunity to fulfill its traditional role as the trier of fact: to decide whether the defendant's conduct in fact warrants punitive damages. In other words, a jury might have reservations about awarding punitive damages if it were able to consider the defendant's conduct under the criminal manslaughter standard. [130] Therefore, to restore the jury to its proper role as the ultimate finder of fact, the Florida standard jury instruction on punitive damages should be revised to conform to White. [131]

Even if the standard instruction were revised to conform to the White criminal manslaughter standard, another obstacle would still confront the jury. The jury would continue to lack guidelines that would permit it to properly decide whether the defendant's conduct merits punitive damages. As discussed above, the trial judge himself cannot be entirely certain what the standard means because recent supreme court cases can be subjected to two interpretations. [132] Yet the difficulties facing juries are even greater than those facing trial judges in applying White. Unlike a judge, a jury is unable to compare [*827] the conduct before it to conduct in prior cases. Rather, the jury's only tool is the vague language of the criminal manslaughter standard.

REV_00263518

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: george /2 priest and "punitive damages" and alabama and "the case of alabama" (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*56 La. L. Rev. 825, **

Copyright (c) 1996 Louisiana Law Review
Louisiana Law Review

Summer, 1996

56 La. L. Rev. 825

LENGTH: 8777 words

ARTICLE: PUNITIVE DAMAGES SYMPOSIUM: Punitive Damages Reform: The Case of Alabama

George L. Priest *

* John M. Olin Professor of Law and Economics and Director, Program in Civil Liability, Yale Law School.

SUMMARY:
... This paper addresses the modern grounds for punitive damages reform. ... During the 1993-94 fiscal year, an extraordinary 95.6% of tort cases filed in Bullock County included a punitive damages claim; 78.8%, in Lowndes County. ... Forty years ago, in a tort law regime that provided little in the way of consumer remedies, it might have been believed that ever-increasing civil liability verdicts, including punitive damages verdicts, would serve to reduce the number of accidents. ... Again, research of my own currently in progress shows that low-income consumers, if injured, are less likely to seek an attorney; even with an attorney, they are less likely to sue; less likely to recover; and, again by definition, less likely to recover large damage judgments since their lost income is typically low and pain and suffering awards, which are highly correlated with lost income, equally low. ... The Court found that a $ 2 million Alabama punitive damages verdict in a case involving a $ 6,000 compensatory economic loss to be constitutionally excessive. ... While the punitive damages experience in Alabama may appear unusual, there is always the potential for a substantial punitive damages verdict in any jurisdiction. ...

TEXT:
[*825]

This paper addresses the modern grounds for punitive damages reform. [1] It focuses on particular problems relating to punitive damages verdicts in Alabama, but the issue extends substantially beyond the Alabama case. Punitive damages verdicts are relatively infrequent in many jurisdictions. [2] From time to time, however, an occasional jury can render an enormous punitive damages verdict even in a jurisdiction where punitive damages awards are infrequent. Oftentimes, the trial or an appellate court will remit such a verdict, and the pattern of punitive damages infrequency will be restored. There is reason to believe, however, that in recent years the Alabama experience has been substantially different. As I shall describe in more detail below, beginning in the early 1990s, punitive damages verdicts increased in Alabama both in frequency and magnitude. While some of these verdicts were remitted in part on appeal, [3] there was no clear signal from the Alabama

REV_00263533

In my view, a merely procedural approach to the punitive damages problem will never be successful. Indeed, we have stark evidence of its failure. In 1991 in the Haslip case, the Supreme Court specifically approved the procedure for reviewing punitive damages verdicts for excessiveness adopted by the Alabama Supreme Court. [40] Viewing the Alabama procedure on its face, few can contest [*838] that the review procedure appears reasonable. [41] In practice, however, as the Gallant case proves and as the statistics from the rural Alabama counties strongly suggest, the punitive damages problem in Alabama, under the procedures approved by the United States Supreme Court, has grown to epidemic proportions.

The Court's recent BMW opinion, however, strikes out in a new direction. The Court found that a $ 2 million Alabama punitive damages verdict in a case involving a $ 6,000 compensatory economic loss to be constitutionally excessive. [42] The Court adopted three new metrics for the evaluation of excessiveness: the relation between the punitive damages verdict and 1) the "degree of reprehensibility" of the underlying tortious action; 2) the magnitude of compensatory losses; and, 3) criminal statutory penalties for similar offenses. [43] These metrics are likely to be far more successful in constraining punitive damages verdicts than the vague and overlapping "factors" under which Alabama courts previously reviewed punitive damages verdicts. [44]

Nevertheless, there remain serious questions as to how effective this form of comparison will prove in practice. Reprehensibility is a very vague concept and hardly susceptible of careful measurement. Similarly, the mathematical relationship between the compensatory and punitive damages elements is an odd judicial principle. Is there a principled reason that a ratio of 1 to 5 or 1 to 4 is constitutionally suspect in comparison to a ratio of 1 to 2 or less? Moreover, if the purpose of punitive damages is to deter behavior that is morally reprehensible, the relevance of the compensatory loss is not immediately evident unless an intent to affect the magnitude of loss was a specific element of the reprehensible action. Many totally inadvertent or accidental actions generate huge loss; many repugnant and reprehensible actions generate little harm, measured solely in compensatory terms of lost income, needed expense, and pain and suffering. Perhaps the most helpful metric is the relationship to statutory criminal penalties for comparable offenses. Here, legal analysis can be employed with some precision, though the question then arises why, given the existence of some criminal penalty for comparable action, punishment should be delegated to a civil jury through a punitive damages verdict in any case.

Upon reflection, it is not surprising that the Supreme Court has found it difficult to deal with excessive punitive damages. The Supreme Court's job, in general, is to define rights. Few would contest--I do not contest--that punitive damages may be appropriate in some contexts. I would not support a constitu- [*839] tional right of immunity from punitive damages (though that may well be an important improvement over the current state of the law).

What is needed for punitive damages reform is a prudential judgment of the appropriate cap or limit to punitive damages that will allow some room for punishing egregious behavior but constrain the deleterious effects of unlimited punitive damages judgments on consumers. For example, the proportional limit of three times economic losses or $ 250,000 in the recently enacted products liability legislation is a prudential judgment of that nature. But that prudential judgment is a uniquely legislative, not judicial, exercise. Regrettably, the President vetoed the legislation.

With respect to reform by the states, the question is somewhat different. Punitive damages verdicts implicate both interstate and foreign commerce in a manner that only Congress can address. Some have argued that a state without a significant manufacturing or interstate service sector could actually benefit its citizens by adopting an expansive civil liability regime at the expense of citizens of other states. Alabama may well be an example of this phenomenon. Congress is in the best position to provide a solution to this issue.

REV_00263542

Secondly, there is one further effect of our modern punitive damages regime that should not go unnoticed: the effect on the competitiveness of American manufacturers and producers. Some have argued that large punitive damages verdicts in the U.S. are neutral with respect to competitiveness since 1) foreign courts do not award such verdicts against U.S. producers with respect to sales abroad; and, because 2) foreign producers are equally subject to such verdicts for sales in the United States. (Note that BMW is a German corporation.) Thus, for United States sales, foreign producers, just like United States producers, must add expected punitive damages and joint and several liability verdicts into the prices of products and services. (It is often lost on these observers that an increase in prices on account of punitive damages--even if operating neutrally--is not an affirmative argument on behalf of consumers.)

This analysis, however, is only partially correct. Increasingly, foreign courts are refusing to enforce extraordinary judgments from U.S. courts against foreign defendants. For example, the German Federal Court of Justice (Germany's highest court for civil and commerical matters) recently refused to enforce a $ 400,000 punitive damages verdict obtained in an American court by an American plaintiff against a German defendant on the grounds that the punitive damages verdict was inconsistent with German public policy. [45] In the same case, an intermediate United States court already had reduced the pain and suffering damages component from $ 200,000 to $ 70,000 on the same grounds. [46] [*840]

Foreign judgments of this nature should be alarming both to Congress and to United States courts. First, they are strong evidence that the current course of American law does not command widespread assent among reasoned commentators--yet another grounds for general punitive damages reform. Secondly, such judgments suggest an increasing competitiveness problem facing United States producers here in the United States. To the extent that United States punitive damages verdicts must be enforced abroad and foreign courts refuse to enforce them, foreign producers need not add the costs of the American civil justice system, including punitive damages and excessive pain and suffering awards, into the prices of products and services sold in the United States. Thus, foreign producers can underprice American producers in sales to American consumers here in the United States.

Ironically, although American producers and their employees are harmed by this effect, American consumers benefit because they can obtain products and services at lower prices without the effects of our punitive damages verdicts built in. [47] Put slightly differently, the refusal of foreign courts to enforce large punitive damages or pain and suffering awards from American courts represents a type of tort reform, regrettably however, only available--prior to punitive damages reform--to foreign, rather than to United States, producers.

These various reasons support an argument for widespread punitive damages reform. While the punitive damages experience in Alabama may appear unusual, there is always the potential for a substantial punitive damages verdict in any jurisdiction. In addition, there is the potential for punitive damages verdicts to increase in magnitude and frequency so as to become routine, as I believe to be the case in Alabama prior to BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore. It is too early to observe any effect of the BMW decision, and it is only speculation whether the seeming increase in precision of the three metrics defined by the Supreme Court can change the punitive damages environment in Alabama. If not, then some more drastic prudential judgment will be necessary to reduce the harm to consumers from excessive punitive damages awards.

FOOTNOTES:

[n1] This paper is an expansion of testimony presented to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on Punitive Damages Tort Reform in April 1995. It presents some results of empirical work conducted since that presentation and discusses the recent U.S. Supreme Court opinion in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1966).

REV_00263543

n2 See Michael Rustad, In Defense of Punitive Damages in Products Liability: Testing Tort Anecdotes with Empirical Data, 78 Iowa L. Rev. 1 (1992).

n3 For a recent example, see Life Ins. Co. of Georgia v. Johnson, No. 1940357, 1996 WL 202543 (Ala. Apr. 26, 1996) ($ 12.5 million punitive damages verdict remitted to $ 5 million); but cf. Foster v. Life Ins. Co. of Georgia, 656 So. 2d 333 (Ala. 1994) ($ 250,000 punitive damages verdict by trial judge vacated by Alabama Supreme Court reinstating jury's $ 1 million punitive damages award).

n4 For the extraordinary effects that repeated punitive damages verdicts have had on tort claims, see infra text accompanying notes 16-20.

n5 See, e.g., Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 111 S. Ct. 1032 (1991); TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 113 S. Ct. 2711 (1993) (U.S. Supreme Court approval of Alabama punitive damages review procedures).

n6 BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996).

n7 Id.

n8 W. Page Keeton et al., Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts 9 (5th ed. 1984).

n9 See, e.g., Richard A. Posner, An Economic Approach to Legal Procedure and Judicial Administration, 2 J. Legal Stud. 399 (1973); George L. Priest, Selective Characteristics of Litigation, 9 J. Legal Stud. 399 (1980).

n10 These statistics are derived from a study by Forrest Latta, a summary of which formed the basis for the Alabama Supreme Court's statistical appendix in Life Ins. Co. of Georgia v. Johnson, No. 1940357, 1996 WL 202543 (Ala. April 26, 1996).

n11 See Rustad, supra note 2.

n12 All statistics presented are those for non-wrongful death cases only. Alabama procedures provide that the only measure of damages for wrongful death is punitive damages. It may well be appropriate to include wrongful death awards in this study both because the Alabama standards for wrongful death recoveries are equivalent to the standards for punitive damages recoveries in other cases and because the procedure for trial and appellate review is the same. See Green Oil Co. v. Hornsby, 539 So. 2d 218 (Ala. 1989). Nevertheless, the unusual character of Alabama verdicts in comparison to those of other states is best seen if the Alabama wrongful death experience is excluded since Alabama wrongful death procedures differ from those of virtually all other states.

n13 Gallant v. Prudential Life Ins. Co., Barbour County, AL, CV-93-50 (1994). See discussion infra text accompanying notes 27-36.

n14 See Rustad, supra note 2.

n15 George L. Priest, Private Litigants and the Court Congestion Problem, 69 B.U. L. Rev. 527, Table 1 at 540 (1989).

n16 These data were collected under a research project organized and directed by myself and Professor James R. Barth, Auburn University, and conducted by Cornerstone Research, Menlo Park, California, for the case Gallant v. Prudential. Data are available from the author.

REV_00263544

n17 See George L. Priest, The Role of the Civil Jury in a System of Private Litigation, 1990 U. Chi. Leg. Forum 161 (1990) (65% of all jury trials in the Chicago trial courts deal with auto accidents).

n18 Indeed, I present an anecdotal case--though a telling one--infra text accompanying notes 27-36.

n19 These statistics are taken from Alabama Dept. of Commerce, 1994 Economic Abstract of Alabama at Tables 5-1, 5-4, 5-7, 5-13, 5-17, 9-7, 9-11, 13-4, 13-5, 13-6, 13-7, 13-9.

n20 This figure again excludes wrongful death awards. See supra note 12. If such awards were included, the amount equals $ 109 million, equal to $ 26 per capita. See Life Ins. Co. of Georgia v. Johnson, No. 1940357, 1996 WL 202543 app. (Ala. Apr. 26, 1996).

n21 For a discussion of the development of modern tort law, see George L. Priest, The Invention of Enterprise Liability: A Critical History of the Intellectual Foundations of Modern Tort Law, 14 J. Legal Stud. 461 (1985).

n22 William M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, The Economic Structure of Tort Law (1987); Richard A. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law (4th ed., 1992); Steven Shavell, Economic Analysis of Accident Law (1987).

n23 See sources cited supra note 22. Of course, the latter is also a justification for the class action.

n24 See George L. Priest, The Current Insurance Crisis and Modern Tort Law, 96 Yale L.J. 1521 (1987).

n25 Again, I have endorsed limits on pain and suffering awards in contexts of expanded liability, though this issue is somewhat beyond the focus on punitive damages here. See id.

n26 Joseph E. Stigletz, Economics of the Public Sector 347 (1986).

n27 Gallant v. Prudential Life Ins. Co., Barbour County, AL, CV-93-50 (1994) [hereinafter cited as Gallant].

n28 Id.

n29 See generally American Law Institute, Restatement of Restitution and Unjust Enrichment (1936).

n30 Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 111 S. Ct. 1032 (1991). But see BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996), discussed infra.

n31 Gallant (mem. op.).

n32 BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996) (striking down a punitive damages verdict awarded by an Alabama court).

n33 Testimony of Professor James R. Barth, Auburn University in Gallant, supra note 27. Copy on file with author.

n34 Id.

REV_00263545

n35 Gallant, supra note 27, Trial Transcript at 647, April 6, 1994.

n36 See supra text accompanying note 19.

n37 See, e.g., BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996); Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg, 114 S. Ct. 2331 (1994); TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 113 S. Ct. 2711 (1993); Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 449 U.S. 1, 111 S. Ct. 1032 (1991).

n38 Haslip, 499 U.S. at 1, 111 S. Ct. at 1032.

n39 Oberg, 114 S. Ct. at 2331.

n40 Haslip, 499 U.S. at 1, 111 S. Ct. at 1032.

n41 The Alabama review procedure consists of evaluating a punitive damages verdict according to a wide and seemingly comprehensive list of relevant "factors," such as the "culpability" of the defendant's action, the relationship of the verdict to the harm imposed, etc. See Davis Law & Rachel Sanders Cochran, Punitive Damages and Pre-Verdict Procedures, Life of Georgia: A Bold New Frontier, July 1996 The Alabama Lawyer 225.

n42 BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996).

n43 Id.

n44 On this point, see in particular, the concurring opinion of Justice Breyer in BMW.

n45 Judgment of June 4, 1992, BGH Gr. Sen. Z., discussed in George L. Priest, Lawyers, Liability and Law Reform: Effects on American Economic Growth and Trade Competitiveness, 71 U. Denver L. Rev. 115, 146-47 (1993).

n46 Id.

n47 The June 4, 1992 judgment, discussed supra notes 45-46, involved a personal assault, rather than harm caused in the context of product or service use, though the German Court made clear that its opinion was meant to extend to these broader effects. Of course, there is no benefit to American citizens where punitive damages verdicts go unenforced in the context of personal assault.

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined (i)
Terms: george /2 priest and "punitive damages" and alabama and "the case of alabama" (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, October 2, 2002 - 11:42 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00263546

Supreme Court or any court of appeal as to what limits there might be to continued punitive damages awards. Perhaps as a consequence, the frequency and magnitude of punitive damages awards continued to escalate and to dramatically affect the entire civil dispute process. [4] As a consequence, punitive damages claims and awards have become a routine feature of the Alabama civil liability regime.

This paper addresses the Alabama phenomenon. While the Alabama experience, to my knowledge, is unique--there are no studies showing civil jury verdicts of this magnitude in any other American jurisdiction--there is no reason to believe that the phenomenon is unique to Alabama jurisprudence. Indeed, oddly enough, the procedures for trial and appellate review of punitive damages verdicts had been developed in the caselaw more completely for Alabama than for any other United States jurisdiction. [5] Instead, the recent Alabama experience [*826] seems reflective, more generally, of the consequences of permissive appellate review of jury trial punitive damages verdicts. As suggested by the Alabama experience, punitive damages verdicts can begin to snowball. As citizens see large punitive damages verdicts awarded in increasing numbers of cases, expectations and understandings begin to change. The large punitive damages verdict becomes the norm, rather than the exception. This paper documents that experience in Alabama and discusses the effects of such judgments on deterrence and on the welfare of consumers.

Within the past weeks, the United States Supreme Court has once again reviewed an Alabama punitive damages verdict and, for the first time, determined that the verdict and, to some extent, current Alabama punitive damages review procedures, fail constitutional norms. [6] This paper reviews that decision in the context of the broader Alabama experience, and discusses the likelihood that the new approach toward the review of punitive damages judgments adopted by the Supreme Court can halt the spiraling punitive damages experience in Alabama or other jurisdictions.

Part I reviews the Alabama experience to document what I regard to be the increasing commonality of Alabama punitive damages verdicts and claims. Parts II and III address the effects of routine punitive damages claims and verdicts. Part II focuses on deterrence, the principal rationale for punitive damages, and Part III discusses consumer welfare. Part II shows that the deterrent effect of punitive damages verdicts has been vastly overrated, especially with respect to corporate defendants. Part III explains how the principal victims of excessive punitive damages verdicts are consumers, and low-income consumers most of all. Finally, Part IV discusses whether effective punitive damages reform can be effected through the courts, reviewing the Supreme Court's decision in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, [7] or whether a legislative constraint on punitive damages is necessary. It is, of course, too early to determine what the effect of the BMW decision will be; indeed, it is premature to anticipate how the Alabama Supreme Court will respond to the decision. Part IV, however, hazards some preliminary thoughts on the extent to which the more careful inquiry now required by the United States Supreme Court can affect a punitive damages "environment," an environment now reaching to the level of citizen-juror expectations, such as that in Alabama. Part IV suggests that there are reasons to believe that legislative approaches to the punitive damages problem may still be required.

I. The Increasing Commonality of Punitive Damages

Forty years ago, punitive damages verdicts were exceptionally rare in all jurisdictions and were available against only the most extreme and egregious of [*827] defendant actions. [8] The world of civil litigation is surely different today, especially in Alabama. Both the number and, especially, magnitude of punitive damages judgments have increased dramatically. Indeed, in Alabama, the frequency of claims for punitive damages has increased to approach the routine. These claims affect the settlement process by increasing the litigation rate [9] and, necessarily, the ultimate magnitude of settlements, even in cases that are settled out of court.

REV_00263534

A recent study of punitive damages trial verdicts illustrates the phenomenon. [10] Punitive damages verdicts of greater than $ 1 million are alleged to be rare, and verdicts in the multi-millions extremely rare. [11] Alabama appears to be an exception. In 1991, there were eleven reported punitive damages verdicts equal to or greater than $ 1 million and individual verdicts of $ 25 million, $ 45 million and $ 50 million. [12] In 1992, there were twenty-two reported punitive damages verdicts equal to or greater than $ 1 million and individual verdicts of $ 18 million, $ 25 million and $ 33.2 million. In 1993, there were fifteen verdicts equal to or greater than $ 1 million and individual verdicts of $ 12.5 million, $ 19.5 million and $ 65 million. Finally, in 1994, there were twelve verdicts equal to or greater than $ 1 million and individual verdicts of $ 22.7 million, $ 25 million [13] and $ 33.5 million.

The frequency of million dollar and multi-million dollar verdicts over this time period is astounding and is suggestive of the commonality of punitive damages in Alabama. There remains, however, a better test of the commonality thesis. Some commentators continue to dismiss concerns about punitive damages on the grounds that even these numbers are not very large, given the number of jury verdicts reported across the country in any year. [14] In the American system of civil justice, of course, very few verdicts of any kind are reported, relative to the number of claims filed, since only two to five percent of civil cases filed [*828] ever proceed to a verdict. [15] The better test of the commonality of punitive damages verdicts derives from a study of claims.

Recently, I participated in an empirical study of the frequency of punitive damages claims in Alabama. A study of claims--the proportion of all tort cases filed that incorporate a claim for punitive damages--is the best test of the commonality of punitive damages expectations. The study, which to my knowledge is one of the only studies of punitive damages claims, was conducted in three Alabama counties: Bullock, Lowndes, and Barbour Counties. Each of these counties is a relatively rural locale with a small population and without substantial industry. We studied all tort actions filed in these counties in the past several fiscal years to determine the numbers in which punitive damages were claimed. To summarize the most recent statistics, we found that in the fiscal year 1992-93, 76.5% of all tort cases filed in Bullock County included a punitive damages claim; 65.1% in Lowndes County; and 78.3% in Barbour County. [16]

The exceptionally high proportion of punitive damages claims and the universality of such high proportions over each of the counties studied are striking and nearly incredible. Again, the study was not limited to claims involving high dollar amounts or product liability claims or, even, claims against corporate defendants; the study addressed all tort claims. Anyone familiar with our civil justice system knows that most tort actions involve relatively routine forms of accidents, such as traffic accidents. [17] That 65% to 78% of all tort actions over a given fiscal year included punitive damages claims starkly challenges the notion that punitive damages are an infrequent and seldom invoked remedy across American civil law.

Incredible as these numbers may seem, in the succeeding fiscal year, the proportion or number of tort cases including a punitive damages claim actually increased in each of the counties. During the 1993-94 fiscal year, an extraordinary 95.6% of tort cases filed in Bullock County included a punitive damages claim; 78.8%, in Lowndes County. In Barbour County, the proportion of tort cases including a punitive damages claim decreased from 78.3% to 72.1%, but the absolute number of punitive damages claims increased during 1993-94 by over 40%.

Much of the debate over punitive damages proceeds in the form of competing anecdotes in which a defender of our modern regime presents a case of exceptionally egregious defendant behavior deserving of punitive damages and [*829] a supporter of reform presents an opposite example. [18] The Alabama numbers belie anecdotes. No one can plausibly claim that 72.1% to 95.6% of all accident cases over an entire year in any county of the United States involve the form of exceptionally egregious defendant behavior that might merit substantial punitive damages. These numbers show that the role of punitive damages has changed dramatically in the Alabama civil justice system from an occasional remedy invoked against outrageous action to a commonplace of tort law practice.

REV_00263535

These numbers also belie the commonly-heard defense that actual punitive damages verdicts are rare and that many of those awarded by juries are later reduced on appeal such that there is no substantial effect. Debate can be had on what is meant by the term "rare" and what constitutes, in terms of magnitude of verdicts, a "substantial" effect. The impression is often suggested, however, that even for the nation in its entirety, punitive damages claims amount to nothing more than a handful.

Our Alabama study demonstrates that this is a great misimpression. Again, we did not select the largest cities in Alabama or industrial or manufacturing centers; in fact, we did just the opposite. The counties that we studied in Alabama are rural, with modest populations and a relatively non-urbanized citizenry. For example, Bullock County has a total population of only 11,042, 4,040 of whom are employed, and a per capita income of $ 9,212. Lowndes County has a total population of 12,658, with 5,300 employed, and a per capita income of $ 10,628. Barbour County is somewhat larger, with a total population of 25,417, with 12,400 employed, and a per capita income of $ 12,100. [19] None of these counties, however, resembles in the slightest metropolitan areas such as Miami, Los Angeles, or Dallas.

What did we find? In 1993-94, despite these small populations, punitive damages claims in these rural counties constituted far more than the claimed nationwide "handful." In Bullock County, 43 of 45 tort actions included a punitive damages claim; in Lowndes County, 52 of 66 tort actions included a punitive damages claim; in Barbour County, 93 of 129 tort actions included a punitive damages claim. Are punitive damages in Alabama insignificant? The claims reported above are quite recent and remain in the litigation pipeline. Looking to much earlier claims, however, our study in Alabama showed that the magnitude of punitive damages judgments affirmed by the Alabama Supreme Court from 1987 through the first half of 1994 totalled $ 53.2 million, [20] equal to roughly $ 13 per Alabama citizen.

This study demonstrates that the number and magnitude of affirmed punitive damages verdicts is only the very small tip of an extraordinary iceberg. Again, [*830] it is universally conceded that only 2% to 5% of cases filed ever proceed to verdict. Thus, it is not surprising that the systematic observation of any single type of verdict is relatively rare. What the Alabama numbers show is that the availability of unlimited punitive damages affects the 95% to 98% of cases that settle out of court prior to trial. It is obvious and indisputable that a punitive damages claim increases the magnitude of the ultimate settlement and, indeed, affects the entire settlement process, increasing the likelihood of litigation. Thus, as shown in the Bullock, Lowndes, and Barbour County figures, modern Alabama rules with respect to punitive damages impose these effects on a majority of even settled cases.

The next two Parts review the effects of punitive damages verdicts in contexts in which such verdicts have become commonplace. Part II discusses the deterrence justification of punitive damages. Part III addresses the effects of punitive damages on consumers, low-income consumers in particular.

II. Do Punitive Damages Serve a Necessary Deterrent Purpose?

Virtually every supporter defends punitive damages on the grounds of deterrence, accompanied by an anecdote or two involving persons who suffered serious losses in contexts in which most observers would agree that the respective defendant should have prevented the accident. Generally, the anecdotes speak for themselves: I have never once seen a careful study in a specific case showing that a punitive damages judgment of some particular amount was necessary to deter some particular wrongful behavior. Instead, the argument proceeds by implication. The basic defense of punitive damages--and I believe that it is the only serious defense--is the implication that large, unlimited punitive damages verdicts are necessary to control injurious activities in society. Put in a slightly different way, it is implied that without the availability of unlimited punitive damages awards, potential defendants, especially corporate defendants, would face no deterrent threat to prevent them from causing injuries.

REV_00263536

Forty years ago, in a tort law regime that provided little in the way of consumer remedies, it might have been believed that ever-increasing civil liability verdicts, including punitive damages verdicts, would serve to reduce the number of accidents. [21] That view, however, has been totally discredited today, and I know of no serious tort scholar publishing in a major legal journal who could maintain it. Instead, it is widely accepted--and it is a routine proposition of a first-year modern torts course--that compensatory damages--economic losses and pain and suffering--serve a complete deterrent purpose in addition to their role in compensating injured parties. Compensatory damages impose costs on [*831] defendants who wrongfully fail to prevent accidents, costs equal in amount to the injuries suffered. Compensatory damages internalize injury costs to defendants where some action has wrongfully injured an innocent party.

Indeed, the strongest theory in the modern tort academy is that full compensatory damages generate exactly the optimal level of deterrence of accidents--not too little and not too much. [22] For purposes of deterrence or accident prevention, there is no need for punitive damages of any dimension, not to mention unlimited punitive damages, given the availability of full compensatory damages. Of course, this is a theoretical conclusion, and there remains dispute in the academy as to whether, as an empirical matter, court, or juries calculate compensatory damages with perfection in every case or in every context. Thus, substantial academic attention has been given to the refinement of liability rules so that the deterrent effects of compensatory damages may be sharpened.

Given the role of compensatory damages as a deterrent, however, the analysis of punitive or other exemplary damages becomes substantially different. The only justification on grounds of deterrence for any exemplary award beyond the compensatory is that compensatory damages are inadequate for some reason, such as juries awarding damages which are too low in some dimension or some set of injuries going undetected or perhaps being too insignificant individually to justify litigation. [23] The only plausible defense of punitive damages on deterrence grounds is to restore aggregate damages to a level equal to that which is fully compensatory.

Opponents of punitive damages reform currently avoid this issue, but their failure to confront it suggests the ultimate weakness of their opposition. Again, anecdotes involving individuals suffering serious losses are not generally helpful to the analysis. I am extremely sympathetic--as all of us are--to individuals suffering serious injuries. We all wish that wrongfully injurious actions might have been avoided. Given a wrongful injury, we all want the victim to receive full compensation for economic losses and pain and suffering.

The question for punitive damages tort reform, however, is as follows: Given full compensation to the victim, is there some affirmative deterrent purpose served by awarding further damages? Is there some reason to believe that the payment of full compensatory damages will fail to deter the defendant, such that some further multiple through punitive damages is absolutely necessary? For corporate defendants, the answer surely is no. Corporate defendants who must maximize profits net of costs must necessarily take the prospect of compensatory damages into account when determining how to invest in accident prevention. Again, this analysis presumes full compensation. If there were some reason to believe that juries were systematically undervaluing economic losses or pain and suffering, [*832] punitive damages might be necessary to make up for the shortfall. Of course, the opposite may be true. Many, including myself, believe that juries overvalue compensatory damages, including pain and suffering, justifying increased limits on pain and suffering awards, especially in contexts of expanded liability. [24] Barring such a shortfall, however, there is no justification for punitive damages on deterrence grounds.

REV_00263537

The analysis is, perhaps, somewhat different in the context of individual, noncorporate defendants who are less subject to cost constraints and, perhaps, more inclined to behave unconscionably. This is the reason that exemplary or punitive damages are often awarded in cases involving intentional harms such as assault.

As administered by juries, however, our current civil liability regime approaches the issue exactly backwards. In our current regime, large punitive damages verdicts are seldom awarded against non-corporate defendants. I know of no one objecting to a punitive damages cap on the grounds that it will impair the deterrence of private individuals. Instead, large punitive damages verdicts are most typically awarded against corporate defendants who, as profit maximizers (a motivation often irrationally held against them), will be carefully responsive to compensatory damages. Corporate defendants need no punitive damages verdict to encourage them to take all cost-effective precautions to prevent injuries; compensatory damages alone achieve that result. Thus, the increasingly commonplace plaintiff lawyer's charge to a jury to "send the corporate defendant a signal" ignores entirely the universally accepted academic view that, to a corporate defendant, full compensatory damages are not only an effective signal, but also the only signal needed.

III. Do Punitive Damages Help or Hurt Consumers?

If the effect of punitive damages were to benefit consumers or if their effect were even neutral to the consumer interest, we might not be concerned that punitive damages are unnecessary to deter corporate defendants from injurious behavior. The central problem of punitive damages, however, is that, except in the rare cases of jury undervaluation of damages or underlitigation, punitive damages settlements and verdicts affirmatively harm consumers, low-income consumers most of all.

Where punitive damages become commonplace in civil litigation, as in Alabama, or even where they become a significant risk to business operations, consumers are harmed because expected punitive damages verdicts or settlements must be built into the prices of products and services. The effect of the increased frequency and magnitude of punitive damages recoveries of modern times has been to increase the price level for all products and services provided in the United States economy. To observe this phenomenon is not to say that [*833] injured consumers should go uncompensated. If a consumer suffers an injury that can be attributed to some wrongful activity of a defendant, whether manufacturer or service provider, that consumer should receive compensation for economic losses and for reasonable non-economic losses, such as pain and suffering. [25] In contrast, punitive damages, by definition, go beyond the compensatory. The problem with the increasing commonality of large punitive damages verdicts and settlements, such as those in Alabama, is that the awards to some consumers of greater than compensatory damages must be built into the prices paid by all other consumers.

It is an obvious implication of this proposition that low-income consumers are most seriously harmed by our current punitive damages regime. First, lowincome consumers have less money generally and, regardless of the product or service, are more seriously affected in terms of the purchasing power of their limited resources when price levels increase. Secondly, and most importantly, low-income consumers are not the typical beneficiaries of large punitive damages verdicts or settlements, at least not on a systematic basis. Again, research of my own currently in progress shows that low-income consumers, if injured, are less likely to seek an attorney; even with an attorney, they are less likely to sue; less likely to recover; and, again by definition, less likely to recover large damage judgments since their lost income is typically low and pain and suffering awards, which are highly correlated with lost income, equally low.

REV_00263538

Put more simply, where punitive damages verdicts and settlements are frequent and large, low-income consumers are forced to subsidize high-income consumers as expected punitive damages awards are built into the prices of products and services. All consumers--high-income and low-income alike--pay the increased prices; chiefly the high-income gain the return in high compensatory and punitive damages recoveries. Again, a low-income individual will receive a punitive damages windfall, but the far more systematic effect is to harm the low-income consumer as the prices of products and services generally are increased to adjust for the expectation of future punitive damages payouts.

It is important to recognize that the current effect of the doctrines of comparative negligence and joint and several liability is similar. Comparative negligence and joint and several liability have their most general effects on organizations or entities which engage in a large scope of activities, such as state and municipal governmental entities, public utilities, and the like. It has become a commonplace of modern civil litigation for plaintiffs' attorneys to join as defendants any governmental entity or utility remotely associated with an injury. Thus, state governments and municipalities are joined as defendants on claims that roads were misdesigned or poorly maintained, or that a guard rail or telephone pole could have been placed in a better position. Forty years ago, attorneys would not have thought to include entities whose causal relationship to [*834] the harm was so low or, alternatively, if they had attempted to join such entities, the claim would have been dismissed. Today, such litigation is routine and imposes substantial litigation expenses upon our state and municipal governments as well as liability expenses, infrequently but chiefly under the operation of the doctrines of comparative negligence and joint and several liability, where the truly responsible defendants have gone bankrupt, leaving our governments and utilities to suffer the remaining judgment.

It is clear that, for very similar reasons, operation of the doctrines of comparative negligence and joint and several liability harms citizens in general, but low-income citizens most of all. Damages judgments against state and municipal governments must be paid from state and municipal financial sources. It is well-established that state and, especially, municipal finance are seriously regressive in effect, charging more to middle- and low-income citizens, proportionate to income, than to relatively high-income citizens. [26]

These propositions about the effect of punitive damages, comparative negligence and joint and several liability on low-income citizens may appear abstract; however, I believe that they are generally accepted within the academic community. To illustrate their import with greater salience, however, I would like to present one recent example of a punitive damages verdict in Alabama: the case that inspired the research presented above. The case will both reaffirm the pressing need for punitive damages reform and illustrate why such reform should be expanded to all state and federal litigation.

In the case of Gallant v. Prudential, [27] decided by jury verdict in April 1994, Iran and Leslie Gallant sued Prudential Life Insurance Company based on the actions of a Prudential agent. The Gallants purchased a combination life insurance-annuity policy with a $ 25,000 face value at a monthly premium of roughly $ 39.00. At the time of sale, the agent told them that the value of the annuity was roughly twice what it in fact was. The agent had added together the table indicating "Projected Return" with the table indicating the lower "Guaranteed Return." A jury found this action fraudulent and held the agent liable and Prudential separately liable for failing to better supervise the agent. [28]

Fortunately, the problem was discovered before the policyholder had died or had retired to receive the annuity. Thus, to the time of trial, there was no true economic loss beyond the failed expectation of the larger future return. According to the transcript of the testimony, the Gallants testified that, between the time they discovered the misinformation and Prudential called them to offer a remedy (Prudential offered to return their premiums or to discuss adjusting the policy), they had suffered roughly two weeks of sleepless nights and substantial anger at having been misled. That was the extent of their "mental anguish." [*835]

Twenty years ago, cases of this nature were part of the legal field entitled Restitution, in which the appropriate remedy was restitution of all paid premiums or out-of-pocket costs. On very rare occasions, such as especially egregious actions by a defendant, some courts considered awarding plaintiffs the benefit of the bargain, say, by increasing their annuity benefits. [29]

Our modern world has changed. After a one and one-half day trial, an Alabama jury awarded the Gallants damages equal to $ 30,000 in economic loss, $ 400,000 in mental anguish, and $ 25 million in punitive damages. Again, the face value of the insurance policy was only $ 25,000.

I do not wish to minimize the harm to the Gallants, especially the indignity of the misrepresentation, or condone the fraudulent actions of the agent, apparently perpetrated on several other Alabama citizens who recovered separately. Nevertheless, there is not a single person to whom I have described this case--not an attorney, whether plaintiff or defendant; not a liberal or a conservative; not even a radical or idealistic Yale Law student (or faculty member)--who has not been shocked by the outcome or who could defend it as a rational or sensible verdict in the context of the harm. Again, many defenders of punitive damages argue that exceptionally large verdicts are usually overturned on appeal. Alabama's review procedure for punitive damages verdicts had been carefully analyzed and approved by the United States Supreme Court shortly before the Gallant trial. [30] In the Gallant case, however, the judge conducting the review affirmed the $ 25 million award in its entirety, though directing part of the amount to be paid to the State. [31] The case was later settled prior to the United States Supreme Court's recent decision in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore. [32]

What will be the effect of a punitive damages verdict of this nature? The Gallants appear to be persons of modest means (at least before the verdict). Does a verdict of this nature help middle- or low-income consumers in the aggregate? Unfortunately, totally the opposite is true. The insurance policy in question--face value, $ 25,000--was the cheapest form of life insurance/annuity available on the market; its monthly premium was only $ 39.00. Obviously, at such a premium, the insurance carrier could not be expecting to make a substantial profit on the policy. Indeed, an economic expert in the case for Prudential estimated that, over the entire life of the policy, the premiums net of payouts paid by the Gallants would increase Prudential's assets by only $ 46.00. [33] Prudential, like most other life insurance companies, profits more [*836] substantially from large dollar, rather than small dollar, policies. The expert estimated that the verdict reduced dividends to every Alabama policyholder (Prudential is a mutual carrier) by $ 323. [34]

How do we analyze a case like this in terms of whether punitive damages serve a necessary deterrent effect? In his closing argument, the highly effective attorney for the Gallants asked the jury to determine a level of damages that would send a "message" to the giant Prudential Life Insurance Company that fraudulent behavior on the part of an agent would not be tolerated. [35] What kind of damages message is necessary to achieve that effect? Obviously, if the insurer stood to gain no more than $ 46 over the life of the policy, any damages judgment greater than $ 46 sends the insurer a message by making the policy unprofitable. (Of course, I ignore entirely Prudential's defense costs plus the reputational harm from the lawsuit.) The jury in the Gallant case went substantially beyond that amount, however, in awarding compensatory damages of $ 30,000 for economic loss and $ 400,000 for the mental anguish from the two weeks of lost sleep and anger. It certainly cannot be argued that the jury undervalued the Gallant's compensatory loss--indeed, the $ 400,000 mental anguish award itself is extreme. The median per capita income in Barbour County, where the Gallant case was tried, was $ 12,100. [36] Furthermore, there is no reason to think that the agent's behavior in other contexts would go undetected. (Prudential later settled other cases brought by the agent's clients.) As a consequence, there is little justification for a punitive damages award whatsoever.

REV_00263540

What will be the effect of punitive damages verdicts such as that in the Gallant case? In the face of such a verdict, what is the rational response of an insurer like Prudential, or other insurers selling similar policies? Regrettably, but necessarily in a competitive industry, the rational response is to quit selling such low value policies altogether. It makes very little sense to expose the company and its policyholders to the risk of such a damages verdict given the very small gain from the sale of such a policy.

Is this the type of product that our civil liability system should drive from the market? Obviously not, and low-income consumers in Alabama are directly harmed as a result. Here, the dramatically differential effects of such verdicts on high-income versus low-income consumers are made clear. In my own view, it is far more important to our society--if a choice had to be made--to have our insurance industry provide life insurance coverage to low-income citizens than to high-income citizens, since the relatively affluent of our society have other means of providing financial security for their families. The availability of financial protection and security at relatively low cost will be substantially diminished if such low premium policies, as here, are no longer available. [*837]

More generally, where expected punitive damages verdicts are added to the prices of products and services, the first to feel the effect will be low-income consumers. And where the magnitude of punitive damages verdicts rises, imperiling the continued provision of the product or service, the first to be affected will be those products and services with the lowest profit margins, those most attractive to the low-income consumers. The Gallant case provides a dramatic example of the effect. Following Gallant and other large punitive damages verdicts, several insurers quit offering coverage in Alabama altogether.

Punitive damages reform would cure that ill to the benefit of all Americans, especially low-income Americans. Punitive damages verdicts such as the $ 25 million verdict in the Gallant case encourage wasteful litigation. Indeed, litigation seeking punitive damages judgments against financial service companies has become an industry in Alabama. By increasing the prices of all products and services, punitive damages verdicts and settlements reduce the purchasing power of all Americans, especially the poor.

IV. Punitive Damages Reform: Statutory or Judicial?

Many defenders of the current regime question why legislatures should become involved in civil liability reform, rather than leaving reform initiatives to the courts. The question is particularly appropriate given that the Supreme Court has addressed the issue of the excessiveness of punitive damages in several recent cases, including the BMW decision. [37]

First, it is evident, after many opportunities, that the Supreme Court has great difficulty proceeding beyond what might be called a "procedural" approach to the punitive damages problem. With the exception of the recent BMW opinion, the only form of punitive damages control that the Court has adopted has been purely procedural--approving a set of procedures at the state level for judicial review of punitive damages verdicts, [38] or disapproving a state judicial procedure as not providing sufficient review. [39] The recent BMW opinion, as I shall describe, addresses directly the question of the excessiveness of punitive damages verdicts, but chiefly adopts a new set of procedural comparisons for judicial evaluation.

REV_00263541

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 494 A.2d 1353

*494 A.2d 1353, *; 1985 Me. LEXIS 744, **;*
58 A.L.R.4th 859

HATTIE TUTTLE v. RALPH RAYMOND, III

Law Docket No. And-84-79

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine

494 A.2d 1353; 1985 Me. LEXIS 744; 58 A.L.R.4th 859

September 19, 1984, Argued June 21, 1985, Decided

CASE SUMMARY

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: Defendant driver appealed the decision of the Superior Court, Androscoggin County (Maine), which entered a final judgment ordering defendant to pay plaintiff accident victim punitive damages, in an action arising out of the serious injuries sustained by plaintiff in an automobile collision involving defendant.

OVERVIEW: Plaintiff accident victim was seriously injured when an automobile driven by defendant driver struck her automobile. Defendant appealed the trial court's award of punitive damages to plaintiff. The court vacated the trial court's award of punitive damages, but affirmed the judgment, as amended. The court held that in the absence of constitutional compulsion, it could see no reason to bar actions for punitive damages based on the fact that the underlying conduct was also subject to criminal prosecution. The court found that the extra recovery afforded to plaintiff by punitive damages did not constitute a windfall, but rather, provided an incentive for private civil enforcement of society's rules against serious misconduct. The court held that punitive damages were available based upon tortious conduct only if defendant acted with malice, so defendant's conduct was insufficient to support an award of punitive damages because defendant's conduct was not accompanied by malice. The court also held that plaintiff could recover exemplary damages based upon tortious conduct only if he could prove by clear and convincing evidence that defendant acted with malice.

OUTCOME: The court vacated the award of damages to plaintiff accident victim, but affirmed the judgment as amended. The court retained the doctrine of punitive damages, but held that tortious conduct would justify an exemplary award only when plaintiff could prove by clear and convincing evidence that defendant acted with either express or implied malice.

CORE TERMS: punitive damages, exemplary, malice, common law, exemplary damages, tortious conduct, deterrent, clear and convincing evidence, fact finder, criminal prosecution, civil action, punished, windfall, criminal law, civil law, compensatory, safeguards, reckless disregard, standard of proof, preponderance, reckless, observe, deterrence, punitive, abolish, abandon, punishment imposed, double jeopardy, implied malice, treble damages

CORE CONCEPTS - ◆ Hide Concepts

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages
In several recent decisions, the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine has indicated its argument had "a certain equitable ring" to it, the Wisconsin Supreme Court ultimately rejected it. Id. The court stated:

REV_00263547

> The "windfall criterion" overlooks that the payment of punitive damages to the injured party is justifiable as a practical matter, because such damages do serve to compensate the injured party for uncompensated expenses, e.g., attorneys' fees and litigation expenses, and that the windfall motivates reluctant plaintiffs to go forward with their claims. If punitive damages were paid to the public treasury, fewer wrongdoers would be punished because the injured would have no inducement to spend the extra time and expense to prove a claim for punitive damages once an action had been brought.

Id. at 292, 294 N.W.2d at 454. A Maine author has suggested that punitive damages could be split between plaintiffs and the state pursuant to legislative action. Note, supra note 4, at 458.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [19]

The defendant next argues that the doctrine of punitive damages invites abuse because there is no objective standard by which to determine the amount of a proper award. See Ellis, supra note 4, at 53-57. According to the defendant, the jury is left to speculate concerning the appropriate amount of punitive damages in a given case, with the result of arbitrary and excessive awards. The defendant contends that this is a flaw in the doctrine that outweighs any justification for allowing exemplary awards.

In fact, however, the lack of any precise formula by which punitive damages can be calculated is one of the important assets of the doctrine. "Punitive damages . . . can be individualized to provide a deterrent that will be adequate for each case." Mallor and Roberts, supra note 4, at 657. Such flexibility can ensure a sufficient award in the case of a rich defendant and avoid an overburdensome one where the defendant is not as wealthy. Id. at 666; see Hanover Insurance Co., 464 A.2d at 158 (to provide an effective deterrent, punitive damages should bear some relationship to the actual wealth of the defendant). Flexibility is also necessary to avoid situations [20] where the potential benefits of wrongdoing could outweigh a known maximum liability. See Mallor and Roberts, supra note 4, at 648-49, 666; Morris, supra note 4, at 1185-87. In short, "although a quantitative formula would be comforting, it would be undesirable." Mallor and Roberts, supra note 4, at 666.

We, of course, do not advocate the availability of punitive damages on a completely open-ended basis. The trial court must reject a claim for punitive damages as a matter of law unless the plaintiff presents adequate proof that the defendant acted in a sufficiently culpable manner. n19 See McKinnon v. Tibbetts, 440 A.2d 1028, 1031 (Me. 1982). Further, even after the plaintiff has satisfied his prima facie burden on the issue of exemplary damages, the fact finder must weigh "all relevant aggravating and mitigating factors" presented by the parties, including the egregiousness of the defendant's conduct, the ability of the defendant to pay such an award, and any criminal punishment imposed for the conduct in question. Hanover Insurance Co., 464 A.2d at 158-59; see also Mallor and Roberts, supra note 4, at 667-69 (enumerating factors to be considered [21] in assessing punitive damages). After such consideration, an exemplary award is "within the sound discretion of the fact finder." Hanover Insurance Co. 464 A.2d at 158 (emphasis added). If the fact finder awards punitive damages that are excessive in light of the relevant factors, the trial court or this Court can intervene. See M.R. Civ. P. 59(a); Hall v. Edwards, 138 Me. 231, 233-34, 23 A.2d 889-890 (1942); Sullivan v. McCafferty, 117 Me. 1, 9, 102 A. 324, 327 (1917).

REV_00263556

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n19 See infra sections III and IV (to satisfy prima facie burden plaintiff must show by clear and convincing evidence that defendant acted with malice).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*1360] We also observe that the lack of precision in measuring appropriate exemplary awards is not a trait unique to the doctrine of punitive damages. Compensatory awards for intangible harm, such as pain and suffering, and emotional distress, are likewise not subject to any exact standard for determining an appropriate amount. See Mallor and Roberts, [22] supra note 4, at 646.

In conclusion, we are not persuaded that we should abolish common law punitive damages in Maine. n20 It may well be, as the defendant argues, that the doctrine of punitive damages no longer serves any purpose for which it was originally intended. n21

> This argument [,however,] fails to account for the fact that many legal doctrines serve purposes that differ from those for which they originally were developed. . . . So long as a doctrine continues to serve a necessary policy goal, the fact that it has diverged from its original function does not provide a basis for abolishing the doctrine. The pertinent question is whether punitive damages continue to serve a rational policy.

Mallor & Roberts, supra note 4, at 644 (emphasis added). We conclude that they do.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n20 We note that, although our opinion today provides a careful evaluation of a longstanding doctrine, many issues concerning the availability of punitive damages, which are not raised by this case, remain for future consideration and resolution. These issues include, inter alia, whether one can insure against the assessment of punitive damages, whether one can be vicariously liable for punitive damages, and the application of punitive damages in products liability and multiple plaintiff litigation. It should be clear that our decision not to abandon the doctrine of punitive damages does not eliminate the need for future definition and modification of it. [23]

n21 Some theorize that punitive damages initially compensated plaintiffs for intangible harms, which were not cognizable under the existing common law. See Mallor and Roberts, supra note 4, at 643-44; Ghiardi, supra note 4, at 286-87. Of course, modern tort law now allows compensatory damages for such intangible injuries, eliminating that particular basis for punitive damages. It has also been suggested that punitive damages first arose in cases involving "affronts to the honor of the victims," as a means of satisfying insulted plaintiffs and preventing them from resorting to violent forms of self-help, such as dueling. Ellis, supra note 4, at 14-15, 17-18. It is not so clear that this function of the doctrine of punitive damages has become obsolete. Compare Mallor and Roberts, supra note 4, at 650, and Morris, supra note 4, at 1198-99, with Ellis, supra note 4, at 29. In any event, it is not the primary justification given for exemplary awards today.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

III.

REV_00263557

Although we reject the defendant's contention that we should abolish common law punitive damages [24] in Maine, we perceive cogent reasons for avoiding an overbroad application of the doctrine. Notions of fairness and efficiency weigh against allowing exemplary awards where the stated goal of deterring reprehensible conduct would be furthered only marginally or not at all. See Ellis, supra note 4, at 21-33, 39-53. Rather, punitive damages should be available based only upon a limited class of misconduct where deterrence is both paramount and likely to be achieved. With this in mind, we turn to a re-examination of the type of tortious conduct that can justify an exemplary award in Maine.

It is generally accepted that mere negligence cannot support an award of punitive damages. W. Prosser, Handbook of the Law of Torts 10 (4th ed. 1971); Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908 comment b (1977); see McKinnon v. Tibbetts, 440 A.2d 1028, 1031 (Me. 1982). Beyond that, however, there has been some variation in describing the quality of tortious conduct necessary to support an exemplary award. W. Prosser, supra, at 9-10; Ellis, supra note 4, at 20, 34-37. Recent decisions of this Court have indicated that Maine law recognizes the availability of punitive damages [25] based upon "wanton, malicious, reckless or grossly negligent conduct." See, e.g., Oliver v. Martin, 460 A.2d 594, 595 n.2 (Me. 1983); McKinnon, 440 A.2d at 1031 [*1361] n. 2; Auburn Harpswell Association v. Day, 438 A.2d 234, 237 n.2 (Me. 1981) (per curiam).

Such a standard is overbroad. Whatever qualitative difference exists between mere negligence and "gross" negligence, it is insufficient to justify allowing punitive damages based upon the latter class of conduct. See W. Prosser, supra, at 10 ("mere negligence . . ., even though it is so extreme in degree as to be characterized as 'gross,' an unhappy term of ill-defined content," is insufficient to support punitive damages); Ellis, supra note 4, at 36-37. "Gross" negligence simply covers too broad and too vague an area of behavior, resulting in an unfair and inefficient use of the doctrine of punitive damages. See Ellis, supra note 4, at 36-37, 39-53. A similar problem exists with allowing punitive damages based merely upon "reckless" conduct. "To sanction punitive damages solely upon the basis of conduct characterized as 'heedless disregard of the consequences' would be to allow virtually [26] limitless imposition of punitive damages." Miller Pipeline Corp. v. Broeker, 460 N.E.2d 177, 185 (Ind. Ct. App. 1984). A standard that allows exemplary awards based upon gross negligence or mere reckless disregard of the circumstances overextends the availability of punitive damages, and dulls the potentially keen edge of the doctrine as an effective deterrent of truly reprehensible conduct.

We therefore determine that a new standard is needed in Maine. "If one were to select a single word or term to describe [the] essence [of conduct warranting punitive damages], it would be 'malice.'" Miller Pipeline Corp., 460 N.E.2d at 180 (quoting Hibschman Pontiac, Inc. v. Batchelor, 340 N.E.2d 377, 385 (Ind. Ct. App. 1976) (Garrard, J., concurring)). Indeed, the malicious commission of a tort is a common thread running through many of the decisions in which this Court has upheld an award of punitive damages. n22 We therefore hold that punitive damages are available based upon tortious conduct only if the defendant acted with malice.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n22 See, e.g., Auburn Harpswell Association v. Day, 438 A.2d 234, 237 (Me. 1981) (per curiam); Farrell v. Kramer, 159 Me. 387, 391, 193 A.2d 560, 562 (1963); Hall v. Edwards, 138 Me. 231, 233-34, 23 A.2d 889, 890 (1942); Saliem v. Glovsky, 132 Me. 402, 410, 172 A. 4, 8 (1934); Bourisk v. Derry Lumber Co., 130 Me. 376, 378, 156 A. 382, 382-83 (1931); Kaklegian v. Zakarian, 123 Me. 469, 469-70, 123 A. 900, 900 (1924); Jones v. Grindel, 121 Me. 348, 350, 117 A. 308, 309 (1922); Webb v. Gilman, 80 Me. 177, 187-88, 13 A. 688, 688 (1888); Johnson v. Smith, 64 Me. 553, 554 (1875); Goddard v. Grand Trunk Railway, 57 Me. 202, 218 (1869).

REV_00263558

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [27]

This requirement of malice will be most obviously satisfied by a showing of "express" or "actual" malice. Such malice exists where the defendant's tortious conduct is motivated by ill will toward the plaintiff. See H & R Block, Inc. v. Testerman, 275 Md. 36, 43, 338 A.2d 48, 52 (1975); Detling v. Chockley, 70 Ohio St.2d 134, , 436 N.E.2d 208, 210 (1982) (quoting Columbus Finance v. Howard, 42 Ohio St.2d 178, 184, 327 N.E.2d 654, 658 (1975)); W. Prosser, supra, at 9-10 & n.65; Ellis, supra note 4, at 21 & n.109. Punitive damages will also be available, however, where deliberate conduct by the defendant, although motivated by something other than ill will toward any particular party, is so outrageous that malice toward a person injured as a result of that conduct can be implied. We emphasize that, for the purpose of assessing punitive damages, such "implied" or "legal" malice will not be established by the defendant's mere reckless disregard of the circumstances. See Miller Pipeline Corp., 460 N.E.2d at 185. n23

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n23 We observe that an apparent conflict exists between Miller Pipeline Corp. and another decision by a different panel of the Indiana Court of Appeals concerning the quality of tortious conduct that can justify an exemplary award. Compare Miller Pipeline Corp., 460 N.E.2d at 179-80, 185, with Orkin Exterminating Company, Inc. v. Traina, 461 N.E.2d 693, 702-03 (Ind. Ct. App. 1984); see Miller Pipeline Corp. v. Broeker, 464 N.E.2d 12, 12 (Ind. Ct. App. 1984) (rejecting the Orkin standard, which "contemplates something considerably less than the malice standard . . . enunciated in Miller Pipeline," and denying a petition for rehearing). As is indicated in our opinion, we find the malice standard enunciated in Miller Pipeline Corp. persuasive. See Miller Pipeline Corp., 460 N.E.2d at 179-80, 185.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [28]

We recognize that in some other jurisdictions the malice necessary to support an [*1362] award of punitive damages can be implied from a mere reckless disregard of the circumstances. See, e.g., American Laundry Machinery Industries v. Horan, 45 Md. App. 97, , 412 A.2d 407, 419 (1980); Glidden v. Skinner, 142 Vt. 644, , 458 A.2d 1142, 1144 (1983) (quoting Shortle v. Central Vermont Public Service Corp., 137 Vt. 32, 33, 399 A.2d 517, 518 (1979)); cf. Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908 (1977) ("Punitive damages may be awarded for conduct that is outrageous, because of the defendant's evil motive or his reckless indifference to the rights of others." (emphasis added)). We adopt a narrower view in order to reduce the vagueness and uncertainty surrounding the concept of implied malice in this context. See Ellis, supra note 4, at 34-37. As we indicated earlier, by allowing punitive damages based only upon this more certain and more culpable class of conduct, the efficiency and the fairness of the doctrine as a deterrent is increased. See id. at 39-53.

In the case at bar, the evidence shows that the plaintiff was seriously injured by [29] the defendant's reckless operation of an automobile. The plaintiff contends that such conduct on the part of the defendant is sufficient to support an award of punitive damages. See Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Company, Inc., 267 Md. 149, , 297 A.2d 721, 728-32 (1972). n24 Under the standard we announce today, it clearly is not. We certainly do not condone the defendant's conduct; nor do we fail to appreciate the tragic injuries imposed upon the plaintiff as a result of that conduct. We have determined, however, that deterrence -- recognized by this Court as "the proper justification" for punitive damages n25 -- cannot justify imposing an exemplary award in addition to compensatory damages and possibly criminal sanctions based solely upon a defendant's reckless disregard of the circumstances. Because the defendant's conduct was not accompanied by malice, either express or implied, we vacate the award of punitive damages.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00263559

n24 But see id. at , 297 A.2d at 734-35 (Smith, J., dissenting) (finding reckless operation of motor vehicle insufficient to demonstrate actual or implied malice); First National Bank of St. Mary's v. Fidelity and Deposit Co., 283 Md. 228, n.3, 389 A.2d 359, 362 n.3 (1978) ("Only under the peculiar facts and circumstances existing in Smith v. Gray Concrete Pipe Company, Inc., . . . has this Court permitted recovery of exemplary damages in connection with an automobile accident."). [30] n25 Braley v. Berkshire Mutual Insurance Co., 440 A.2d 359, 362 (Me. 1982) (quoting Foss v Maine Turnpike Authority, 309 A.2d 339, 345 (Me. 1973) (emphasis in original)).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

IV.

Our stated goal of avoiding an overbroad application of the doctrine of punitive damages leads us to consider another issue raised by the defendant, namely, the standard of proof that should govern a claim for an exemplary award. Presently in Maine, a plaintiff must prove his case for punitive damages by a preponderance of the evidence. See McKinnon v. Tibbetts, 440 A.2d 1028, 1031 (Me. 1982). The defendant urges us to abandon that rule, and to impose instead the more stringent proof requirement of clear and convincing evidence upon a plaintiff seeking an exemplary award. We realize that, in light of our holding in section III, supra, it is not necessary for us to address this question to dispose of the case now before us. For the benefit of litigants, bench, and bar, however, we conclude that it is appropriate to confront this issue now in the context of our reexamination of the doctrine of punitive [31] damages, rather than postpone it to some future date.

[*1363] This Court recently noted that "although the preponderance [of the evidence] standard normally prevails in a civil case, appellate courts in a large number of categories of litigation have found compelling reasons for requiring a higher form of proof." Taylor v. Commissioner of Mental Health, 481 A.2d 139, 150 (Me. 1984). In Taylor, we listed a wide variety of cases where the United States Supreme Court, the Law Court, or a court of some other jurisdiction has imposed the requirement of clear and convincing evidence upon the party bearing the burden of proof. Id. at 149-50. Under this standard of proof, we observed, "the party with the burden of persuasion may prevail only if he can 'place in the ultimate factfinder an abiding conviction that the truth of [his] factual contentions are "highly probable".'" Id. at 153 (quoting Colorado v. New Mexico, 467 U.S. 310, , 104 S. Ct. 2433, 2438, 81 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1984)).

We conclude that such a higher standard of proof is appropriate for a claim for punitive damages. See Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 850-51 (2d Cir. [32] 1967); Travelers Indemnity Co. v. Armstrong, 442 N.E.2d 349, 360-63 (Ind. 1982); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis.2d 260, , 294 N.W.2d 437, 457-58 (1980). It should be obvious from our discussion in section II, Supra, that, although punitive damages serve an important function in our legal system, they can be onerous when loosely assessed. The potential consequences of a punitive damages claim warrant a requirement that the plaintiff present proof greater than a mere preponderance of the evidence. Therefore, we hold that a plaintiff may recover exemplary damages based upon tortious conduct only if he can prove by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant acted with malice.

V.

Because our opinion today substantially alters Maine law governing the availability of punitive damages, we address the scope of its temporal applicability. We discuss the effect of this decision upon the parties now before us as well as upon claims for punitive damages in general.

REV_00263560

As indicated in section III, supra, we give the defendant, "who has undertaken to change the law [governing punitive damages], the fruit of [his] victory." Myrick v. James, 444 A.2d 987, 1001 [33] (Me. 1982). We adhere to our practice of applying such changes in the common law to the parties presently before us. Id.

Further, "we discern no reason, here, to depart from the general rule that the changes in the law we now announce [are] applicable to any case that has not been terminated in final manner." MacDonald v. MacDonald, 412 A.2d 71, 75 (Me. 1980). This is not a case where public reliance on our previous decisions dictates that we limit the retroactive effect of our decision. See Myrick, 444 A.2d at 1001-02; Black v. Solmitz, 409 A.2d 634, 640 (Me. 1979). Although our decision may deprive some plaintiffs of exemplary awards they would have received under prior law, the primary concern of the doctrine of punitive damages is to deter misconduct, not to benefit plaintiffs. Also, we have given notice of our intent to reexamine the availability of common law punitive damages in Maine on several occasions. E.g., Hanover Insurance Co. v. Hayward, 464 A.2d 156, 158 n.2 (Me. 1983); Oliver v. Martin, 460 A.2d 594, 595 n.2 (Me. 1983); Braley v. Berkshire Mutual Insurance Co., 440 A.2d 359, 361 n.4 (Me. 1982). We determine that our decision today [34] should be given full retroactive effect.

VI.

In summary, we retain the doctrine of punitive damages at common law in Maine, but not without substantial modification. Tortious conduct will justify an exemplary award only when the plaintiff can prove by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant [*1364] acted with either express or implied malice. This rule applies retroactively. Although it is apparent that the defendant in this case acted recklessly, reckless conduct alone cannot satisfy the element of malice necessary to justify an exemplary award. Accordingly, the judgment as to punitive damages must be vacated.

The entry is:

Judgment amended by vacating award of punitive damages; as so amended, judgment affirmed.

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 494 A.2d 1353
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, October 2, 2002 - 10:30 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00263561

willingness, should the proper occasion arise, to re-examine the judicially created rule of punitive damages in light of modern considerations and authorities.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

A substantial majority of jurisdictions today allow common law punitive damages in appropriate cases as a recovery beyond the amount necessary to compensate the plaintiff, for the purpose of deterrence or punishment or both.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

The absence of certain procedural safeguards, which are required in criminal prosecutions, presents no constitutional bar to the imposition of punitive damages in a civil action.

Constitutional Law > Procedural Due Process > Double Jeopardy

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

In the constitutional sense, jeopardy is a technical term that encompasses only the risk inherent in proceedings that are "essentially criminal." Accordingly, a civil action for punitive damages cannot infringe on a defendant's constitutional right to be free from double jeopardy. A claim for punitive damages is based upon a private wrong, and is clearly distinguishable from a criminal prosecution, which is brought solely on the behalf of the public. The state and federal constitutional prohibitions against double jeopardy present no bar to actions for punitive damages.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

Punitive damages can be individualized to provide a deterrent that will be adequate for each case. Such flexibility can ensure a sufficient award in the case of a rich defendant and avoid an overburdensome one where the defendant is not as wealthy. Flexibility is also necessary to avoid situations where the potential benefits of wrongdoing could outweigh a known maximum liability. In short, although a quantitative formula would be comforting, it would be undesirable.

Evidence > Procedural Considerations > Burdens of Proof, Presumptions & Inferences

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

The trial court must reject a claim for punitive damages as a matter of law unless the plaintiff presents adequate proof that the defendant acted in a sufficiently culpable manner. Further, even after the plaintiff has satisfied his prima facie burden on the issue of exemplary damages, the fact finder must weigh all relevant aggravating and mitigating factors presented by the parties, including the egregiousness of the defendant's conduct, the ability of the defendant to pay such an award, and any criminal punishment imposed for the conduct in question. After such consideration, an exemplary award is within the sound discretion of the fact finder. If the fact finder awards punitive damages that are excessive in light of the relevant factors, the trial court or the reviewing court can intervene. Me. R. Civ. P. 59(a).

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

Punitive damages should be available based only upon a limited class of misconduct where deterrence is both paramount and likely to be achieved.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

Torts > Negligence > Negligence Generally

It is generally accepted that mere negligence cannot support an award of punitive damages.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

REV_00263548

Torts > Negligence > Negligence Generally

Whatever qualitative difference exists between mere negligence and "gross" negligence, it is insufficient to justify allowing punitive damages based upon the latter class of conduct. "Gross" negligence simply covers too broad and too vague an area of behavior, resulting in an unfair and inefficient use of the doctrine of punitive damages. A similar problem exists with allowing punitive damages based merely upon "reckless" conduct. To sanction punitive damages solely upon the basis of conduct characterized as heedless disregard of the consequences would be to allow virtually limitless imposition of punitive damages. A standard that allows exemplary awards based upon gross negligence or mere reckless disregard of the circumstances overextends the availability of punitive damages, and dulls the potentially keen edge of the doctrine as an effective deterrent of truly reprehensible conduct.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

If one were to select a single word or term to describe the essence of conduct warranting punitive damages, it would be "malice." Indeed, the malicious commission of a tort is a common thread running through many of the decisions in which the court has upheld an award of punitive damages.

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

The requirement of malice will be most obviously satisfied by a showing of "express" or "actual" malice. Such malice exists where the defendant's tortious conduct is motivated by ill will toward the plaintiff. Punitive damages will also be available, however, where deliberate conduct by the defendant, although motivated by something other than ill will toward any particular party, is so outrageous that malice toward a person injured as a result of that conduct can be implied. For the purpose of assessing punitive damages, such "implied" or "legal" malice will not be established by the defendant's mere reckless disregard of the circumstances.

Evidence > Procedural Considerations > Burdens of Proof, Presumptions & Inferences

Although the preponderance of the evidence standard normally prevails in a civil case, appellate courts in a large number of categories of litigation have found compelling reasons for requiring a higher form of proof.

Evidence > Procedural Considerations > Burdens of Proof, Presumptions & Inferences

The party with the burden of persuasion may prevail only if he can place in the ultimate factfinder an abiding conviction that the truth of his factual contentions are "highly probable".

Evidence > Procedural Considerations > Burdens of Proof, Presumptions & Inferences

Torts > Damages > Punitive Damages

Although punitive damages serve an important function in the legal system, they can be onerous when loosely assessed. The potential consequences of a punitive damages claim warrant a requirement that the plaintiff present proof greater than a mere preponderance of the evidence.

Governments > Courts > Authority to Adjudicate

The court gives the defendant, who has undertaken to change the law governing punitive damages, the fruit of his victory.

Governments > Courts > Authority to Adjudicate

There is a general rule that the changes in the law the court announces are applicable to any case that has not been terminated in final manner.

REV_00263549

COUNSEL: [1]

Attorneys for Plaintiff: Murphy and Coyne. Coleman G. Coyne, Jr., Esq. (orally). Paul P. Murphy, Esq. Lewiston, Maine.

Attorneys for Defendant: Hunt, Thompson & Bowie. James M. Bowie, Esq. (orally). M. Roberts Hunt, Esq. Portland, Maine.

JUDGES: Violette, J. wrote the opinion. McKusick, C.J., and Roberts, Violette, Wathen, Glassman and Scolnik, JJ.

OPINIONBY: VIOLETTE

OPINION: [*1354] This action arises out of the serious injuries sustained by the plaintiff in an automobile collision involving the defendant. After a jury trial, the Superior Court, Androscoggin County, entered a final judgment ordering the defendant to pay the plaintiff $50,000 in compensatory damages and $22,000 in punitive damages. On appeal, the defendant challenges only the award of punitive damages. First, the defendant urges this Court to abolish common law punitive damages in Maine. Alternatively, the defendant contends that punitive damages are inappropriate as a matter of law on the facts underlying this case. Finally, should both of those arguments fail to persuade the Court, the defendant argues that several errors in the trial below nevertheless require reversal of the punitive damages award.

In several [2] recent decisions, this Court has indicated its willingness, should the proper occasion arise, to re-examine "the judicially created rule of punitive damages . . . in light of modern considerations and authorities." Braley v. Berkshire Mutual Insurance Co., 440 A.2d 359, 361 n.4 (Me. 1982); see, e.g., Hanover Insurance Co. v. Hayward, 464 A.2d 156, 158 n.2 (Me. 1983); Oliver v. Martin, 460 A.2d 594, 595 n.2 (Me. 1983). This case presents such an occasion. n1 We refuse to abolish common law punitive damages in Maine. We do take this opportunity, however, to redefine and clarify the type of tortious conduct necessary to justify an award of exemplary damages. Furthermore, we heighten the standard of proof incumbent upon a plaintiff seeking such an award. We hold that, in order to recover punitive damages, a plaintiff must prove by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant acted with malice. We conclude that the conduct of the defendant in this case does not justify the imposition of an exemplary award. n2 Accordingly, we sustain the appeal.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n1 The defendant has properly preserved the issue for appellate review. Cf. Hanover Insurance Co., 464 A.2d at 158 n.2; Oliver, 460 A.2d at 595 n.2; Braley, 440 A.2d at 361 n.4. [3] n2 We reach this conclusion without relying upon our newly announced rule heightening the standard of proof applicable to claims for punitive damages. See infra section IV. Even under the preponderance of the evidence standard heretofore applied to punitive damages claims, see McKinnon v. Tibbetts, 440 A.2d 1028, 1031 (Me. 1982), the plaintiff did not demonstrate conduct sufficiently culpable to justify an award of punitive damages. See infra section III.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

I.

On July 6, 1977 the plaintiff, Hattie Tuttle, was seriously injured when a Lincoln driven by the defendant, Ralph Raymond, III, struck the Plymouth in which she was a passenger. The force of the impact sheared the Plymouth in half. Based on the evidence presented at trial, the jury could have found that the defendant was driving at an excessive speed in a 25 mile per hour zone when he struck the Plymouth, and that the defendant went through a red light just before the impact.

REV_00263550

The defendant conceded liability at trial and focused instead on the amount of damages the jury should properly award. [*1355] From the outset [4] of the litigation, the defendant asserted both that punitive damages should not be recognized under the law of Maine and that, in any event, the facts of this case did not generate the issue of punitive damages. Nevertheless, the trial court submitted this issue to the jury, and refused to disturb the jury's decision to award $22,000 in exemplary damages.

II.

Vigorous criticism of the doctrine of punitive damages is hardly a recent development in the field of jurisprudence. Arguments against the availability of such awards have been circulating for one hundred years and longer. n3 During those hundred years, commentators have exhaustively analyzed the doctrine. n4 Nonetheless, a substantial majority of jurisdictions today allow common law punitive damages in appropriate cases as a recovery beyond the amount necessary to compensate the plaintiff, for the purpose of deterrence or punishment or both. See J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, Punitive Damages: Law and Practice § 4.01, at 4-1, 4-2 (1981); see also id. at § 4.16, table 4-1, at 18-22 (Supp. 1984).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n3 See, e.g., Pike v. Dilling, 48 Me. 539, 544-45 (1861) (Rice, J., dissenting); Murphy v. Hobbs, 7 Colo. 541, , 5 P. 119, 124-26 (1884); Boyer v. Barr, 8 Neb. 68, 71-75 (1878); Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. 342, 397 (1873); Bass v. Chicago & Northwestern Railway, 42 Wis. 654, 672-73 (1877) (opinion of Ryan, C.J.). [5] n4 See, e.g., Ellis, Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S.Cal.L.Rev. 1 (1983); Ghiardi, Should Punitive Damages Be Abolished? -- A Statement for the Affirmative, 1965 A.B.A. Proc. Sec. Ins., Negl. and Comp. Law 282; Mallor and Roberts, Punitive Damages: Toward a Principled Approach, 31 Hastings L.J. 639 (1980); Morris, Punitive Damages in Tort Cases, 44 Harv.L.Rev. 1173 (1931); Note, The Vitality of the Doctrine of Punitive Damages in Maine, 35 Me.L.Rev. 447 (1983).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The law of Maine on this issue is in accord with the position of this substantial majority. Since adopting the doctrine of punitive damages in Pike v. Dilling, 48 Me. 539 (1861), this Court has frequently and consistently reaffirmed the availability of such awards at common law under the appropriate circumstances. n5 "It would be simplistic to characterize [this position] as mere blind adherence to an outmoded principle. Rather, the doctrine of punitive damages survives because it continues to serve the useful purposes of expressing society's disapproval of intolerable conduct [6] and deterring such conduct where no other remedy would suffice." Mallor and Roberts, supra note 4, at 641; see Braley v. Berkshire Mutual Insurance Co., 440 A.2d 359, 361, 362 (Me. 1982); Foss v. Maine Turnpike Authority, 309 A.2d 339, 345 (Me. 1973); see also Mallor and Roberts, supra note 4, at 647-49; Note, supra note 4, at 451-55.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n5 See, e.g., Auburn Harpswell Association v. Day, 438 A.2d 234, 237 (Me. 1981) (per curiam); Farrell v. Kramer, 159 Me. 387, 391, 193 A.2d 560, 562 (1963); Pettengill v. Turo, 159 Me. 350, 362-63, 193 A.2d 367, 374-75 (1963); Hall v. Edwards, 138 Me. 231, 233-34,

REV_00263551

23 A.2d 889, 890 (1942); Kaklegian v. Zakarian, 123 Me. 469, 469-70, 123 A. 900, 900 (1924); Jones v. Grindel, 121 Me. 348, 350, 117 A. 308, 309 (1922); Webb v. Gilman, 80 Me. 177, 187-88, 13 A. 688, 688 (1888); Johnson v. Smith, 64 Me. 553, 554 (1875); Goddard v. Grand Trunk Railway, 57 Me. 202, 218 (1869).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The defendant in the case at bar contends that we should [7] nevertheless abandon the judicially created rule of punitive damages in this state. In support of this position, the defendant proffers several arguments, which we consider seriatim. After careful consideration, we conclude that the doctrine of punitive damages retains its viability, and we refuse to abrogate the availability of exemplary awards at common law in Maine.

One objection raised by the defendant is that the civil law is ill-suited to accomplish the goals that purportedly justify the doctrine of punitive damages. The defendant contends that the proper function of the civil tort law is to make plaintiffs [*1356] whole, and that grave problems arise when it is used to extract from defendants something beyond full compensation for the victim. The defendant asserts that the primary purpose allegedly served by the doctrine of punitive damages, deterrence through punishment, is more properly left to the criminal law with its attendant procedural safeguards.

The bright line that the defendant attempts to interpose between the civil and the criminal law is in fact artificial. The courts of this country historically have not restricted the civil law to a compensatory function. [8] In 1851, the United States Supreme Court, relying on over a century of judicial precedent, observed: "By the common as well as by statute law, men are often punished for aggravated misconduct or lawless acts, by means of a civil action, and the damages, inflicted by way of a penalty or punishment, given to the party injured." Day v. Woodworth, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 363, 371, 14 L. Ed. 181 (1851). Use of the civil law to shape social behavior is both logical and desirable. There are many instances where the criminal law alone is inadequate to achieve the desired deterrent effect. See Mallor and Roberts, supra note 4, at 655-58. For instance, even when the defendant's conduct violates a criminal statute, it may be a crime that is rarely prosecuted, or the maximum applicable penalty may not correspond to the actual outrageousness of the conduct and the defendant's ability to pay. See id. at 656-57. Of course, where a criminal sanction does constitute an adequate deterrent in a given case, there is no justification for adding a civil penalty in the form of punitive damages. See id. at 658; Note, supra note 4, at 456-57. This potential problem, however, does [9] not require the wholesale abrogation of the doctrine of punitive damages. A more sensible solution is to allow the fact finder to consider evidence of any criminal punishment imposed for the conduct in question as a mitigating factor on the issue of punitive damages, n6 a step already taken by this Court. See Hanover Insurance Co. v. Hayward, 464 A.2d 156, 159 (Me. 1983). n7

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n6 We note that, despite our decision in Hanover Insurance Co. v. Hayward, 464 A.2d 156 (Me. 1983), the trial court in this case excluded evidence of the fact that the defendant was convicted and punished criminally for the same conduct that gave rise to this civil litigation. A defendant is entitled to have the jury consider such evidence when it decides whether to assess punitive damages and, if so, in what amount. See id. at 159. Because of our disposition of this case, however, we need not decide whether the trial court's exclusion of this evidence constitutes reversible error. See infra section III.

n7 But see Note, Hanover Insurance Co. v. Hayward: Imposition of Punitive Damages in Addition to Criminal Sanctions, 36 Me.L.Rev. 467, 480-83 (1984) (outlining "several problems with the Hayward approach").

REV_00263552

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [10]

Furthermore, the lack of certain procedural safeguards, which are required in criminal prosecutions, n8 does not render the civil law unfit to serve this deterrent function. The statute books provide many examples where penalties, in the form of multiple damages payable to a private party, [*1357] are imposed in civil actions for the purpose of discouraging undesirable conduct. n9 The absence of these procedural safeguards presents no constitutional bar to the imposition of punitive damages in a civil action. See Malandris v. Merrill, Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, 703 F.2d 1152, 1173 (10th Cir. 1981) (quoting Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 159, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1094, 87 S. Ct. 1975 (1967)). The reason for requiring such safeguards in the criminal arena, the threat to the defendant of incarceration or other substantial stigma, does not justify their application in actions for punitive damages.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n8 As stated by one commentator, who was obviously uncomfortable with the notion of punitive damages:

> Again, when assessed exemplary damages, the accused [sic] is really punished for a criminal offense without the safeguards of a criminal trial. He is summoned into court to make compensation for a purely private injury, with no issue upon a criminal charge presented; punishment by fine is inflicted without indictment or sworn information; the rules of evidence as to criminal trials are rejected; the doctrine of reasonable doubt is replaced by the rule of preponderance of evidence; the defendant is compelled to testify against himself; and, though in criminal offenses the law fixes a maximum penalty which is imposed by the court, the jury is entirely free to assess exemplary damages, subject only to the power of the court, unwillingly exercised, to set aside the verdict. The procedure and principles of criminal law are disregarded. . . .

Willis, Measure of Damages When Property Is Wrongfully Taken by a Private Individual, 22 Harv.L.Rev. 419, 421 (1909); see also Note, supra note 7, at 481-82. [11] n9 See e.g., 10 M.R.S.A. § 1322 (1980) (providing for treble damages, attorney's fees, and costs for willful violation of Fair Credit Reporting Act); 14 M.R.S.A. § 6034 (1980) (providing for double damages, attorney's fees, and costs for willful retention of security deposit in violation of law); 15 U.S.C. § 15 (1976) (providing for treble damages, attorney's fees, and costs for violation of antitrust laws); 15 U.S.C. § 72 (1976) (providing for treble damages, attorney's fees, and costs for unfair competition in importing trade).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In a related argument, the defendant criticizes the doctrine of punitive damages because it permits a person to be punished twice for the same offense. The defendant observes that in the case at bar he was both convicted and fined in a criminal proceeding and assessed with punitive damages in a subsequent civil proceeding based upon the same conduct. n10 The defendant contends that the assessment of an exemplary award in addition to criminal punishment for the same conduct offends the constitutional prohibition against placing a defendant twice in jeopardy. [12] The defendant acknowledges that we recently rejected this precise argument in Hanover Insurance Co., 464 A.2d at 159, but urges us to abandon the reasoning articulated in that case in favor of a new rule that would prevent such double punishment. n11

REV_00263553

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n10 See supra note 6.

n11 The defendant suggests that this Court embrace the rule followed in Indiana, where the courts have held that the possibility of criminal prosecution bars an action for punitive damages based upon the same conduct. See Taber v. Hutson, 5 Ind. 322, 325 (1854); Glissman v. Rutt, 175 Ind. App. 493, 496-97, 372 N.E.2d 1188, 1190 (1978). The Indiana courts themselves, however, have commented that "the rule preventing recovery of punitive damages due to the possibility of criminal prosecution is no doubt ripe for reexamination." Smith v. Mills, 179 Ind. App. 459, , 385 N.E.2d 1205, 1208 (1979); Glissman, 175 Ind. App. at 497, 372 N.E.2d at 1191.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

"In the constitutional sense," jeopardy is a technical term that [13] encompasses only the risk inherent in proceedings that are "essentially criminal." Breed v. Jones, 421 U.S. 519, 529, 44 L. Ed. 2d 346, 95 S. Ct. 1779 (1975). Accordingly, a civil action for punitive damages cannot infringe on a defendant's constitutional right to be free from double jeopardy. Hanover Insurance Co., 464 A.2d at 159; E.F. Hutton and Co. v. Anderson, 42 Colo. App. 497, 499, 596 P.2d 413, 415 (1979); Svejcara v. Whitman, 82 N.M. 739, , 487 P.2d 167, 169 (N.M.Ct.App. 1971); see Helvering v. Mitchell, 303 U.S. 391, 398-99, 82 L. Ed. 917, 58 S. Ct. 630 (1938), cited with approval in Breed, 421 U.S. at 528. n12 A claim for punitive damages is based upon a private wrong, and is clearly distinguishable from a criminal prosecution, which is brought solely on the behalf of the public. Nappe v. Anschelewitz, Barr, Ansell & Bonello, 97 N.J. 37, , 477 A.2d 1224, 1231 (1984); Svejcara, N.M. at , 487 P.2d at 169; see Moody v. State ex rel. Payne, 355 So.2d 1116, 1120 (Ala. 1978) ("it is well settled that exemplary damages are not to be equated with criminal punishment"). The state and federal constitutional prohibitions [14] [*1358] against double jeopardy present no bar to actions for punitive damages. n13

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n12 See also Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1094, 87 S. Ct. 1975 (1967). In Curtis Publishing Co., the Supreme Court, without explicitly addressing the double jeopardy issue, stated: "The Constitution presents no general bar to the assessment of punitive damages in a civil case. . . ." Id. at 159.

n13 Even in Indiana, where the possibility of criminal prosecution bars an action for punitive damages based upon the same conduct, see supra note 11, the courts acknowledge that such a rule is not constitutionally compelled. See Glissman v. Rutt, 175 Ind. App. 493, 497, 372 N.E.2d 1188, 1190-91 (1978).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In the absence of constitutional compulsion, we can see no reason to bar actions for punitive damages based upon the fact that the underlying conduct is also subject to criminal prosecution. n14 Such a step would "[fall] short of a principled approach." Mallor and Roberts, [15] supra note 4, at 656. As we noted earlier, n15 "the criminal system cannot always adequately fulfill its role as an enforcer of society's rules. . . ." Id. at 658; see Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal.App.3d 757, 820, 174 Cal.Rptr. 348, 389 (1981); Kelsay v. Motorola, Inc., 74 Ill.2d 172, 186, 384 N.E.2d 353, 359, 23 Ill. Dec. 559 (1978); Roshak v. Leathers, 277 Or. 207, 213-16, 560 P.2d 275, 278-79 (1977). We therefore prefer a more flexible rule, whereby the fact finder may consider any criminal punishment imposed for the conduct in question as a mitigating factor on the issue of punitive damages. Hanover

REV_00263554

Insurance Co., 464 A.2d at 159.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n14 See 17-A M.R.S.A. § 3(2) (1983). Section 3(2) of the Maine Criminal Code provides:

> This code does not bar, suspend, or otherwise affect any right or liability for damages, penalty, forfeiture or other remedy authorized by law to be recovered or enforced in a civil action, regardless of whether the conduct involved in such civil action constitutes an offense defined in this code.

But see Note, supra note 7, at 476-83 (acknowledging this provision of the criminal code, but concluding that punishment under the code and punitive damages should not both be imposed for the same conduct). [16]

n15 See supra pp. 6-7.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Another objection to punitive damages raised by the defendant is that they bestow a windfall upon the plaintiff. As the defendant observes, such damages are awarded in Maine in excess of any amount necessary to compensate the plaintiff. See Braley v. Berkshire Mutual Insurance Co., 440 A.2d 359, 361, 362 (Me. 1982). The defendant contends that a plaintiff injured by a tort is entitled to be made whole, and not to be put in a better position than if the tort had never occurred. See, e.g., Collens v. New Canaan Water Co., 155 Conn. 477, , 234 A.2d 825, 831-32 (1967) ("punitive" damages are compensatory in function, and may not exceed costs of litigation); Vratsenes v. N.H. Auto, Inc., 112 N.H. 71, , 289 A.2d 66, 68 (1972) ("no damages other than compensatory are to be awarded").

We find, however, that the extra recovery afforded to plaintiffs by punitive damages, rather than constituting a "windfall," serves a useful purpose. The potential for recovering an exemplary award provides an incentive for private civil enforcement of society's rules [17] against serious misconduct. n16 See Mallor and Roberts, supra note 4, at 649-50. As noted earlier, n17 the civil law effectively augments the criminal law in deterring intolerable conduct. The doctrine of punitive damages encourages the use of civil actions by private parties in response to such conduct, especially when the prospective compensatory recovery is [*1359] low or the expected cost of litigation is high. n18 See id.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n16 The defendant contends that this incentive is in fact a drawback because plaintiffs will attempt to maximize their recoveries without any regard as to what amount of punitive damages would serve as a just and sufficient deterrent. See Morris, supra note 4, at 1178. This, however, is not so much a problem inherent in the doctrine of punitive damages as it is a byproduct of our chosen adversary system of justice. We use this system because potential excesses, such as the one raised by the defendant, are hopefully cured by an equally zealous and competent advocate on the opposing side, an impartial jury as a fact finder, and a wise and wary judge overseeing the entire proceeding. [18]

n17 See supra pp. 6-7, 11-12.

n18 In Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis.2d 260, 294 N.W.2d 437 (1980), the defendant argued that, in order to avoid giving the plaintiff a windfall, the court should award any punitive damages to the public. Id. at 291, 294 N.W.2d at 454. After noting that this

REV_00263555

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined (i)
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 standard and reckless and "substantially certain" (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*37 Vand. L. Rev. 1117, **

Copyright © Vanderbilt University 1984.

Vanderbilt Law Review

OCTOBER, 1984

37 Vand. L. Rev. 1117

LENGTH: 36754 words

ARTICLE: Punitive Damages: A Relic That Has Outlived Its Origins

James B. Sales * and Kenneth B. Cole, Jr. **

* Partner, Fulbright & Jaworski, Houston, Texas, LL.B. 1960, University of Texas.

 Associate, Fulbright & Jaworski, Houston, Texas. J.D. 1984, Vanderbilt University.

SUMMARY:
... The doctrine of punitive damages truly is an ancient legal concept that inexplicably has evaded commitment to the archives of history. ... Whatever justification may be advanced to support the punitive damage concept, however, most commentators today acknowledge that the modern bases undergirding the theory in the United States are punishment and deterrence. ... Numerous jurisdictions, however, refuse to permit punitive damage claims against the estates of deceased wrongdoers because the punishment and deterrence rationales no longer are viable once the wrongdoer is deceased. ... Permitting a punitive award in the case of a deceased defendant truly exposes the fallacy of the punitive damage doctrine. ... These jurisdictions ostensibly ignore the very policy that undergirds the punitive damage concept -- punishment and deterrence against future wrongdoing -- and permit the wrongdoer to insure against liability for such awards. ... A particularly egregious aspect of the punitive damage doctrine as punishment is its application within the vicarious liability field. ... The applicability of liability insurance to cover punitive damage awards totally vitiates the punishment and deterrence rationales. ... The historical justifications for the doctrine, however, have long since become obsolete, particularly with the current unfettered expansion of the compensatory damage system. ... Abolishing the punitive damage doctrine would leave unaffected the civil tort system that continues to compensate plaintiffs for every conceivable injury. ...

TEXT:

[*1118] I. INTRODUCTION

The doctrine of punitive damages truly is an ancient legal concept that inexplicably has evaded commitment to the archives of history. Irrespective of the questionable validity of the awarded are the ratio rule and evidence of the defendant's financial condition. The ratio rule is a mechanism that allows an appellate court either to overturn a punitive damage award or to order remittitur if the court concludes that a reasonable relation does not exist between the compensatory and punitive damages awarded the plaintiff. [129] Most jurisdictions mandate that punitive awards bear a "reasonable relationship" to the amount of compensatory damages, [130] but no court ever has established [*1146] a fixed or precise ratio. [131] The rule, consequently, is anything but precise, and as one commentator has noted, its singular value is to serve as a "rough device to allow a court to pare down an excessive award of punitive damages." [132] In an effort to instill some element of certainty into the ration rule, some courts have suggested that fact finders may consider certain factors in determining the issue of excessiveness of punitive awards: (1) the nature of the wrong; (2) the character of the conduct at issue; (3) the degree of the wrongdoer's culpability; (4) the situation and sensibilities of the concerned parties; and (5) the extent to which the conduct offends the public sense of justice and propriety. [133] Despite [*1147] these efforts, one scholar critically noted that "[t]his test is probably more often a rationalization of results than a means of obtaining them. The proper ratio between actual damages is placed at a figure which supports the judge's view of the verdict. . . ." [134] Another commentator has argued for more effective appellate review by asserting that "it is becoming increasingly clear that it is preferable for the court to have the simple right to set aside an award as excessive." [135] To permit punitive damages in the absence of a severely limiting ratio of punitive to actual damages simply invites disaster.

Many jurisdictions authorize the fact finder to consider the defendant's wealth in assessing punitive damages. [136] In these jurisdictions, the wealthier the defendant, the larger the permissible assessment of a punitory award. [137] The rule is premised on the rationale that the function of deterrence will not be served if the defendant can absorb the penalty with little or no discomfort because of existent wealth. [138] One court has sought to justify evidence of a defendant's financial wealth by stating that "what would be 'smart money' to a poor man would not be, and would not serve as a deterrent, to a rich man." [139]

Several significant problems arise when courts allow juries to [*1148] consider the defendant's wealth. First, ill informed juries generally overreact to the emotion provoking nature of evidence of a defendant's wealth. One commentator observed that:

It is a good guess that rich men do not fare well before juries, and the more emphasis placed on their riches, the less well they fare. Such evidence may do more harm than good; jurymen may be more interested in divesting vested interests than in attempting to fix penalties which will make for effective working of the admonitory function. [140]

Second, evidence of the defendant's wealth undoubtedly influences juries to award punitive damages in excess of any rational amount. [141] As an unintended consequence, financially poor codefendants are prejudiced unfairly if they are jointly and severally liable for a punitive damages award that the jury has inflated because of the other defendant's wealth. [142] Fortunately, not all jurisdictions adhere to this rationale. [143] Permitting the fact finder to consider evidence of a wrongdoer's wealth is really nothing more than a camouflaged mechanism designed to encourage large punitive assessments. In essence, it is a procedural device that promotes the redistribution of wealth in society.

D. Additional Patchwork Applications of the Punitive Damage Concept Among the Various Jurisdictions

Some jurisdictions have imposed certain limitations on the punitive damage doctrine that regrettably often serve to further muddy the water for practitioners and jurors. Some states, under a strict products liability theory, disallow punitive damages for property damage because the interests concerned in actions for property damage do not warrant the extension of this controversial doctrine. [144] Courts do not universally prohibit punitive awards for property damage, however, and such awards have occurred in aggravated circumstances of trespass, conversion, infringement of common law copyright, nuisance, and seizure of property by a secured party. [145]

REV_00263571

Many jurisdictions restrict punitive damages by refusing to [*1149] permit such awards for breach of contract. [146] As might be expected, however, other jurisdictions authorize punitive awards for mere contract breaches. [147] In addition, even jurisdictions that generally exclude punitive awards for breaches of contract have formulated exceptions to the general rule. For example, an intentional breach of contract to marry [148] and a breach of contract by carriers or public servants [149] constitute exceptions in some jurisdictions. The basis of these punitive awards, however, usually lies not in the contractural breach itself, but in some tortious element of the defendant's conduct to which the fact finder links the award. [150]

Another area of nonuniform application is the applicability of punitive damages in wrongful death and survival actions. A significant number of jurisdictions prohibit punitive damages in wrongful death actions because these statutory causes of action specifically serve a compensatory purpose. [151] The Seventh Circuit recently dismissed [*1150] the punitive damages claims in wrongful death actions in several states that arose from a catastrophic airplane crash. [152] The court concluded that it should resolve the conflict of laws questions in the case in favor of federal regulation of airline tort liability, which prohibits punitive damages, because of the interests of passengers, airline corporations, airplane manufacturers, and state and federal governments. [153] Other jurisdictions, nonetheless, hold that punitive damages are appropriate in wrongful death actions. [154]

Contrary to the prohibition of punitive damages in wrongful death actions, many jurisdictions authorize the recovery of punitive damages in survival actions. [155] Numerous jurisdictions, however, refuse to permit punitive damage claims against the estates of deceased wrongdoers [156] because the punishment and deterrence rationales no longer are viable once the wrongdoer is deceased. [157] [*1151] Florida, Illinois, West Virginia, and Texas, however, have adopted a contrary rule. [158] Permitting a punitive award in the case of a deceased defendant truly exposes the fallacy of the punitive damage doctrine.

A particularly controversial area of punitive damage is successor liability. Under the successor liability theory, "a corporation acquiring all or substantially all of another corporation's assets, may 'inherit' the tort liability of the selling corporation." [159] Some courts have prohibited recovery of punitive damages from successor corporations. [160] Other courts, concerned with the ease with which succeeding legal entities can merge or consolidate, have authorized the imposition of punitive damages against successor corporations. [161] [*1152] The courts authorizing recovery of punitive awards against successor entities appear to be result oriented. These courts seemingly are concerned with providing a "deep pocket" for the plaintiff, whatever the successor corporation's relationship to its predecessor. Obviously, the successor corporation neither designed, manufactured, nor sold the product that caused the injury. Consequently, neither punishment nor deterrence are served by the imposition of punitive damages for a predecessor's defective product -- unless retribution against innocent parties is contemplated under the punitive damage doctrine.

Some jurisdictions authorize punitive damages in loss of consortium actions. [162] These courts predicate their decisions on the compensatory, rather than the punitive, purpose of the actions. Other jurisdictions reject recovery of punitive damages for loss of [*1153] consortium. [163] Understandably, permitting a punitory award in this context is difficult to justify under any of the rationale espoused by jurisdictions that recognize punitive awards.

Another patchwork application plaguing the punitive damage concept is the applicability of insurance coverage to such awards. Assuming that punitive awards are intended as punishment and deterrence, it is an insupportable contradiction to permit the wrongdoer to insure against wrongful acts that merit punitory deterrence. A majority of jurisdictions conclude that public policy forecloses the application of insurance coverage for punitive awards. [164] Essentially, these decisions conclude that permitting the wrongdoer to shift the financial burden would detract from the deterrent effect of the punitive award. Moreover, extending insurance coverage would, in effect, transfer the burden of the punitive award to the innocent consuming public through increased premium payments. Other jurisdictions hold that insurance coverage is a matter of private contract between the insurance company and the insured and, therefore, requires no public policy considerations. [165] These jurisdictions ostensibly ignore the very policy that undergirds the punitive damage concept -- punishment and deterrence against future wrongdoing -- and permit the wrongdoer to insure against liability for such awards. The result, of course, is to permit a windfall to the plaintiff at the expense of innocent consumers who must pay increased premium rates for their insurance policies. The dichotomy in attitude among the various jurisdictions regarding the public policy of sanctioning insurance coverage [*1154] against punitive damage awards lends further credence to the conclusion that the punitive damage concept represents an archaic doctrine that serves no useful public policy, but which continues only to enhance the largesse dispensed to the plaintiff.

REV_00263572

The flawed nature of the punitive damage doctrine is clearly evident in the total absence of any uniformity of application. The legal rationale formulated to justify the concept is fraught with contradictions and is totally unpredictable in its effect. The anachronistic nature of the doctrine bespeaks the imperative need to relegate the doctrine to its rightful place in the archives of history. Most importantly, not only does the punitive damage doctrine not achieve the ordained objectives of punishment and deterrence, but rather, it presents an unfettered destructive force that erodes the economic stability of society. Surely, a doctrine possessing such questionable credentials and engendering such disquieting consequences should sound its own death knell.

V. RATIONALE FOR ABOLISHING PUNITIVE DAMAGES

A. The Adverse Economic Results of Punitive Damages

Because juries possess essentially limitless discretion in awarding punitive damages, [166] the amount of punitive damages awarded in recent years, as if feeding upon itself, has escalated to astronomical figures that boggle the mind. [167] Judge Friendly forecast this problem: "The legal difficulties engendered by claims for punitive damages on the part of hundreds of plaintiffs are staggering. . . . We have the gravest difficulty in perceiving how claims for punitive damages in such a multiplicity of actions throughout the [*1155] nation can be so administered as to avoid overkill." [168] Several commentators have expressed concern over the possible severe economic effects precipitated by huge punitive damage awards. [169] Although some commentators and courts have indicated that punitive damages have not yet produced the prophesied doom, [170] one recent scholarly article has cited the severe economic consequences of asbestos litigation that forced several formerly large and viable companies into the bankruptcy courts. [171] Fear of bankruptcy earlier this year prompted the Fifth Circuit to declare a universal abolition of punitive awards in industry-wide asbestosis litigation within its jurisdiction. [172] Although the Fifth Circuit did not extend its moratorium on exemplary damages beyond the realm of asbestos related litigation, the court's decision represents a gargantuan step toward the intelligent and overdue recognition of the inappropriateness and inherent destructiveness of the punitive damage concept in the modern tort reparations system.

Even Professor Owen, who formerly supported the award of punitive damages with few limitations, [173] has recently come to recognize the folly of continued and unbridled awards of exemplary damages. Professor Owen recently foreshadowed the Fifth Circuit's opinion in Jackson when he observed that "[1]arge assessments of punitive damages may not yet be a major threat to the continued viability of most manufacturing concerns, but the increasing number and size of such awards may fairly raise concern for the future [*1156] stability of American industry." [174] Professor Owen also has noted with alarm that courts increasingly have abdicated their traditional responsibility to control highly questionable punitive awards. [175] He has suggested several possibilities for establishing upper limits for future punitive damage awards. [176]

REV_00263573

A byproduct of the continued success that plaintiffs have experienced in obtaining large punitive damage awards is the now universal practice of plaintiffs alleging and demanding punitive damages in an effort to increase the ultimate recovery from juries, [177] and to compel defendants to settle meritless cases because of the fear that a jury will return an outrageous punitive damage award. [178] Because of the discretionary nature of jury verdicts, a "verdict will not be disturbed as excessive unless it is so clearly so as to indicate that it was the result of passion, prejudice, partiality, or corruption; or that it was manifestly the result of disregard of the evidence or applicable rules of law." [179] Although some courts have overturned large punitive awards that shock the judicial conscience or are manifestly unjust, [180] the simple fact is that most huge punitive awards are affirmed. [181] This trend is creating a significant [*1157] threat to the stability of our economy. It is now time for courts and legislatures to reconsider the propriety of the punitive damages concept before it creates even more havoc and places our economy at risk. The punitive damage concept, if it ever possessed legitimacy in the civil tort system, surely is an anachronism whose time for service long since has passed and whose insatiable appetite no longer can be afforded.

The current availability of the punitive damage doctrine imposes excessively oppressive and burdensome discovery on defendants. Adhering to the philosophy of liberal discovery, courts ostensibly have concluded that the mere claim for punitive damages entitles the plaintiff to demand the production of interminable reams of documentary and other information potentially related to the issue of punitive damages. [182] For example, an increasing number of products liability plaintiffs incorporate an allegation for punitive damages, and concomitantly, the breadth and scope of court ordered discovery has expanded with this additional claim. Rampant abuse in the discovery process is economically ruinous to defendants, disruptive of the orderly administration of justice, and an unsightly blemish on the tort reparations system. Predictably the public perceives the unfettered discovery process as an unacceptable misuse of the legal system. Consequently, the defendant must choose between the Scylla of economically devastating discovery costs that can transform a favorable verdict into a pyrhhic economic victory and the Charybdis of outrageous and unwarranted [*1158] monetary settlements. [183]

B. Punishment and Deterrence Are Not Viable Theories for the Imposition of Punitive Damages

The purpose of the civil law historically has been to provide a remedy to compensate individuals injured by the wrongful conduct of others. [184] Even disinterested commentators such as Dean Prosser have noted the dichotomy of authorizing punishment under the aegis of the civil law, [185] and one court perceptively has observed:

It is difficult on principle to understand why, when the sufferer by a tort has been fully compensated for his suffering, he should recover anything more. And it is equally difficult to understand why, if the tortfeasor is to be punished by exemplary damages, they should go to the compensated sufferer, and not to the public in whose behalf he is punished. [186]

[*1159] Another court, ever more emphatically, queried:

How could the idea of punishment be deliberately and designedly installed as a doctrine of civil remedies" Is not punishment out of place, irregular, anomalous, exceptional, unjust, unscientific, not to say absured and ridiculous, when classed among civil remedies? What kind of a civil remedy for the plaintiff is the punishment of the defendant? [187]

REV_00263574

As one commentator has observed, juries possessing neither expertise in deciding what constitutes just punishment nor skill in determining who should be punished are inflicting large punitive damage awards even though society has not deemed it appropriate to declare the offending conduct criminal. [188] Parties to civil litigation are subject to quasi-criminal fines, and courts are enforcing these penalties without the safeguards afforded even society's worst criminals. [189]

A particularly egregious aspect of the punitive damage doctrine as punishment is its application within the vicarious liability field. [190] Not only are courts inappropriately using punishment in a civil context, but by imposing on employers and principals liability for the punitive damages otherwise assessable against their employees and agents, the courts have diverted punishment from the wrongdoers to innocent parties. [191] One commentator has noted [*1160] critically that "it is beyond reason to fathom why an innocent employer should be held liable for more than compensation of the plaintiff's injuries." [192] Punishment and deterrence of the innocent does not comport with a system dedicated to the administration of justice.

Courts have long used the "deep pocket" rationale to justify the vicarious liability of employers and principals for compensatory damages. [193] although this theory arguably possesses merit for compensatory damages, its use tp extend punishment against employers and principals is insupportable under the guise of any theory or rationale. [194] For example, even though punitive damages against individual wrongdoers may be awarded in a section 1983 action, [195] neither the municipal nor the local government can be held vicariously liable for its employees' wanton and malicious conduct. [196] Irrespective of the care that employers exercise, they possess no means to identify and prevent each and every employee from engaging in antisocial acts. [197] Therefore, employers should not suffer punishment for conduct that they cannot prevent.

When an employer has attempted to screen employees during the hiring process, in an effort to hire the best available workers for business reasons, the imposition of punitive damages for a "hiring mistake" lacks any deterrent effect. [198] One expert has criticized [*1161] the "make-weight argument" that punitive awards will result in better hiring practices and asserts that the "absurdity" of this rationale should be "apparent to anyone who has ever been in the position of offering employment -- there simply is no way to gauge whether a potential employee will become violent when irritated, just as there is no method of determing with certainty whether he will be a good worker." [199] Another commentator also has observed, while discussing the lack of meaningful standards or limits on the amounts of punitive damages which a jury awards, that "[f]rom a deterrence standpoint, it confounds understanding to permit such vast uncertainty as to the level of the expected penalty." [200] Another scholar has asserted that high compensatory damages will have a sufficient deterrent effect, anyway; and if they do not, then the plaintiff can seek injunctive relief, the violation of which will subject the defendant to contempt proceedings and fines or jail. [201]

In addition, imposing vicarious liability for punitive damages creates the anomalous situation that the consumers or taxpayers in a community, who are the intended beneficiaries of the punishment administered to the wrongdoer, actually absorb the consequences [*1162] of the punishment. Ultimately, it is the innocent consumer and taxpayer who bears the burden of paying for the punitive award imposed upon a vicariously liable employer, corporate entity, or governmental body. [202] "The fact of the matter is that the liberal rules governing vicarious liability for punitive damages allow the wrong person or entity to be punished." [203] If an employer's hiring practices are so outrageous that society should punish them, the most appropriate forum is the criminal justice system, which metes out punishment according to predetermined rules and only against the party guilty of wrongdoing.

Not only is the punishment rationale of punitive damages decidedly inappropriate in a civil law context and the effect of the deterrence rationale minimal at best and unlikely at worst, but any redeeming value these rationales might have dwindles in the face of the ratio rule and the application of liability insurance. The ratio rule generally mandates a reasonable relationship between the amount of compensatory and punitive damages. [204] A majority of jurisdictions currently rejects any precise ratio rule. [205] Commentators have criticized the current approach to the ratio rule because the judicial refusal to establish a predetermined ratio creates uncertainty in assessing quasi-criminal fines; [206] and when courts apply a ratio, whether on an ad hoc basis or subject to some generalized ratio guidelines, [207] the concept of gearing the size of the [*1163] punitive award to the compensatory award simply does not mesh with the punishment rationale of punitive damages. [208] The applicability of liability insurance to cover punitive damage awards totally vitiates the punishment and deterrence rationales. A majority of jurisdictions has judicially declared that punitive damages are insurable. [209] The courts that refuse to allow insurance coverage on public policy grounds recognize that insurance negates the objectives purportedly served by punitive damages. [210] The allowance of insurance reduces the punishment of the wrongdoer while simultaneously imposing the effects of the punishment on all other policy holders through the vehicle of increased premiums. Permitting punitive damage insurance likewise conflicts with the deterrence objective by reducing the incentive to avoid loss-creating conduct. [211] This incongrous situation recently prompted one court to acknowledge that the punitive damage doctrine, as applied today, does not deter tortfeasors and, because of the unpredictable manner in which fact finders impose damages to punish, insurance should be permitted to provide coverage against exemplary damages. [212] More importantly, however, liability insurance for exemplary damages makes necessary the assessment of larger awards to achieve punishment and deterrence, which in turn causes insurance [*1164] costs and coverages to rise, which will, in turn, necessitate even larger punitive awards. [213] This circularity epitomizes the illogical nature of punitive awards.

REV_00263575

Neither the punishment nor the deterrence rationale is appropriate in a civil law context. The entire concept of punitive damages today in civil actions is a wrong idea at the wrong time. [214]

C. Compensation Is Not a Viable Theory for the Imposition of Punitive Damages

The usual rationale for punitive damages is punishment and deterrence. [215] A few jurisdictions, however, continue to view punitive damages as a form of compensatory award for intangible injuries. [216] Irrespective of the viability of this rationale in earlier times, [217] the concept simply no longer is relevant. Compensatory awards currently provide recovery of all costs for physical injuries, disfigurement, physical impairment, loss of earnings and earning capacity, past and future medical expenses, past and future pain and suffering, past and future mental anguish, loss of society and companionship, and every conceivable intangible and imagined injury such as emotional distress [218] and insult. [219] Additionally, third parties such as spouses, children, and parents increasingly can recover compensatory awards for the intangible harms of loss of consortium, loss of parentage, loss of society, and loss of companionship. [220] [*1165] Undoubtedly, the most eloquent condemnation of punitive damages as a form of compensation is etched in an early Washington case:

There is nothing stinted in the rule of compensation. The party is fully compensated for all the injury done his person or his property, and for all losses which he may sustain by reason of the injury, in addition to recompense for physical pain, if any has been inflicted. But it does not stop here; it enters into the domain of feeling, tenderly inquires into his mental sufferings, and pays him for any anguish of mind that he may have experienced. Indignities received, insults borne, sense of shame or humiliation endured, lacerations of feelings, disfiguration, loss of reputation or social position, loss of honor, impairment of credit and every actual loss, and some which frequently border on the imaginary, are paid for under the rule of compensatory damages. The plaintiff is made entirely whole. The bond has been paid in full. Surely the public can have no interest in exacting the pound of flesh. [221]

REV_00263576

Considering the expanded and virtually unlimited access to compensatory damages, punitive damages simply provide a windfall to the plaintiff, penalize the innocent consumers or society, and unnecessarily sap the vitality of the economy upon which society is totally dependent. [222]

The punitive damage doctrine theoretically is unsound, legally insupportable, economically unnecessary for plaintiffs, and economically disastrous for both defendants and innocent consumers. Therefore, it is time, and in fact, the hour grows late, for the legislatures and courts to dismantle this potentially destructive doctrine of another era. Neither right nor justice, neither fairness nor equity, and neither the vitality of the tort reparations system nor economic considerations warrant the survival of this outdated doctrine.

[*1166] VI. THE ALTERNATIVE IN THE ABSENCE OF TOTAL ABROGATION OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES

One commentator observed that the issue of punitive damages in the past "merited scant attention" because such awards were "rarely assessed and likely to be small in amount." [223] Unfortunately, the tort reparations situation today has changed drastically, and the antiquated concept of punitive damages as applied in the 1980s poses serious, if not potentially fatal, consequences. If a complete abrogation of the punitive damage doctrine is not an achievable objective, then a series of coordinated and precisely defined limitations is imperative to forestall the economically and doctrinally debilitating effects of this concept.

First, it is necessary to formulate certain standards of conduct and proof by which the fact finder determines punitive damage liability. Realistic and meaningful standards presently are nonexistent, and confusing jury instructions only serve to further the confusion of juries. [224] Either the courts or the legislatures should authorize the recovery of punitive damages only upon a stringent showing that a defendant acted with deliberate intent, ill motive, or maliciousness. [225]

Second, the courts should require a significantly higher standard of proof than the less exacting "preponderance of the evidence" burden. The degree of proof required should be elevated to [*1167] a "clear and convincing" standard [226] or a "beyond a reasonable doubt" burden. [227] The Second Circuit, based upon its assertion that conduct which would "give rise to punitive damages must be close to criminality," recently stated that the plaintiff must clearly establish this degree of behavior by the defendant. [228] Because the punitive damages concept represents an anomalous perversion of a criminal law concept grafted to the civil law, and considering the weaknesses inherent in the rationale underlying the punitive damage doctrine in today's society, the wisest course strongly suggests the adoption of the more stringent "beyond a reasonable doubt" burden of proof.

Third, it is necessary to reallocate judicial power so that judges, rather than unknowledgeable juries, decide if punitive damages are merited, and if so, in what amount. [229] Judges, equipped by experience and familiarity with legal concepts, are [*1168] better able than inexperienced juries to distinguish behavior that justifies punishment, [230] and hopefully would be able to avoid the bias and naivete that jurors express through inflated punitive awards. Many judges currently support such a realignment of duties. [231] If responsible jurisprudence mandates punishment through civil law remedies, it is only logical to utilize the knowledge of judicial officers to achieve fair and rationale results. Punitive damages awards have become too large, too destructive, and too far removed from economic reality to allow biased and rhetorically enraged juries to continue on their present course. [232]

Fourth, specific limits should be established for punitive damages awards. [233] Such limitations would curtail the current destructive abuses of the doctrine and would eliminate the current inordinate number of outrageous awards. Professor Owen has suggested a limitation of either twice the amount of compensatory damages or the the plaintiff's costs plus $ 10,000. [234] A well-known example of a legislatively imposed limit on punishment oriented damages is the treble damage provision in the Clayton Act that allows actual damages plus twice their value as punitive damages for violations [*1169] of the antitrust laws. [235] Whether legislatures validate a dollar for dollar ratio or a single established amount, an equitable and workable upper limit is essential to control the undisciplined punitive damages doctrine. A dollar for dollar ratio presents the arguable advantage of flexibility that automatically would fluctuate both upward and downward, depending upon the amount of compensatory damages. A ratio limit also presents the danger, however, that juries artificially will inflate compensatory awards to increase the possible punitive amount. The logical solution, therefore, is to view the dollar for dollar ratio as an upper limit, subject to judicial reduction. [236] Unlike the Clayton Act treble damage provisions, judges would retain the authority to exercise discretion in reducing punitive awards below the statutorily allowed upper limit.

REV_00263577

Fifth, the application of the punitive damage doctrine must be modified significantly in the strict tort liability context of product litigation. The legislature should declare that punitive damages may be awarded only once. If a plaintiff establishes that he suffered injury because a defendant supplied a product containing a design or marketing defect, then the plaintiff should receive total compensation for the injury. When hundreds or even thousands of plaintiffs prosecute claims for injuries that emanate from a single design or marketing defect that exists in a single line of a product, however, the product supplier should not endure multiple punishments for a single design defect. The product supplier is deemed liable simply because of the condition of the product -- a single design defect in a particular product. If the civil law is to embrace the added function of punishing product suppliers, then a single [*1170] award for a single design deficiency is sufficient. To borrow a phrase from Justice Holmes, "even a dog distinguishes between being stumbled over and being kicked," [237] and, as many asbestos manufacturers well know, [238] the punitive damage doctrine has assumed the form of strategically placed and excessively destructive kicks.

Sixth, any exemplary damages permitted and recovered should be payable to the state treasuries just like any other penal fines. [239] Plaintiffs currently receive compensation for every conceivable element of injury, [240] and punitive damage awards should not constitute a windfall for the plaintiff. Judicial transfer of punitive damage awards to the state would prevent unnecessary and inequitable windfalls to plaintiffs, would provide state funds that could be used for public purposes, and would be consistent with all other penal fines which are required to be paid to state treasuries. [241]

Seventh, if the punitive damage concept continues to survive its archaic origins, courts should declare that insurance coverage contravenes public policy. Punitive damage awards penalize innocent purchasers of insurance who suffer increased premiums each time a court concludes that liability insurance provides coverage [*1171] for such penalties. [242] Increased premiums do not punish the wrongdoer; they punish all innocent purchasers of insurance.

Last, and undoubtedly most important, the appellate courts must initiate a more aggressive and standardized attitude in reviewing exemplary awards. Currently, appellate courts overturn a punitive damage verdict as excessive only if it is the result of passion, prejudice, partiality, corruption, or is manifestly unjust. [243] Professor Owen recently recognized this problem and suggested that appellate courts should scrutinize carefully the trial record "for improper evidence, for argument that might have inflamed the jury, and for the sufficiency of the evidence as a whole." [244] Appellate courts too long have summarily characterized the amount of punitive damage awards as a fact issue for jury determination. This attitude is an abdication of appellate review responsibility and the results of such an abdication cannot be justified and should not continue.

VII. CONCLUSION

REV_00263578

Punitive damages may have served a valuable function in the scheme of ancient law. The historical justifications for the doctrine, however, have long since become obsolete, particularly with the current unfettered expansion of the compensatory damage system. Because the punitive damage doctrine is monstrously archaic and because of the distorted and arbitrary fashion in which it currently operates, the harm it causes is significantly greater than any good it produces. In today's society, punitive damages merely create a windfall for plaintiffs without serving either as a punishment or a deterrence. The doctrine should be abolished because it is a doctrine of a bygone age of the law. [245] Abolishing the punitive damage doctrine would leave unaffected the civil tort system that [*1172] continues to compensate plaintiffs for every conceivable injury. Furthermore, if punishment or deterrence is necessary, legislatures should enact appropriate criminal statutes with the protections that normally accompany the imposition of penal fines.

If abolition of this outdated doctrine is not accomplished, then both logic and necessity require the imposition of severe restrictions to restrain the doctrine's ill-advised and economically devastating effects. The law continually must change and adapt to fulfill its noble purpose of insuring the fair and responsible administration of justice. This noble legal purpose is threatened by the onslaught of economically destructive punitive awards. Unless farsighted and aggressive judicial and legislative action is initiated, the punitive damages doctrine will continue to wreak a form of devastation never contemplated or intended in the evolution of the tort reparations system.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. K. REDDEN, PUNITIVE DAMAGES § 2.2(A)(1) (1980).

n2. See, e.g., id.; G. DRIVER & J. MILES, THE BABYLONIAN LAWS 500-01 (1952); Sales, The Emergence of Punitive Damages in Product Liability Actions: A Further Assault on the Citadel, 14 ST. MARY'S L.J. 351, 351 n.1 (1983); Special Project, An Analysis of the Legal, Social, and Political Issues Raised by Asbestos Litigation, 36 VAND. L. REV. 573, 691 (1983).

n3. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(A)(1).

n4. See, e.g., Exodus 22:1 (King James) ("If a man shall steal an ox, or a sheep, and kill it, or sell it, he shall restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep."); Exodus 22.9 (King James) ("For all manner of trespass, whether it be for ox, for ass, for sheep, for raiment, or for any manner of lost thing, which another challengeth to be his, the cause of both parties shall come before the judges; and whom the judges shall condemn, he shall pay double unto his neighbour."). Mosaic law also provided for recovery of multiple damages for adultery and usury. See K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(A)(1).

n5. See, Sales, supra note 2, at 353 (Roman civil law recognized punitive damages) (citing Walther & Plein, Punitive Damages: A Critical Analysis: Kirk v. Combs, 49 MARQ. L. REV. 369, 369 (1965)); see also W. BUCKLAND & A. McNAIR, ROMAN LAW AND COMMON LAW 344-45 (2d ed. 1952) (asserting that the basis of Roman civil law was punitive in nature); K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(A)(1) (Roman law provided for multiple damage awards for injurious acts characterized by wanton willfulness or conscious deliberation);

n6. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(A)(2).

n7. 95 Eng. Rep. 768 (C.P. 1763).

n8. Id. at 769. The plaintiff in Huckle sued the King's officers for illegal searches and seizures, assault, and false imprisonment under a "nameless warrant," and the court upheld an award of 300 pounds for "exemplary damages" even though actual damages were only 20 pounds. Id. In the related case of Wilkes v. Wood, 98 Eng. Rep. 489 (C.P. 1763), Lord Chief Justice Pratt stated that:

REV_00263579

[A] jury have it in their power to give damages for more than the injury received. Damages are designed not only as a satisfaction to the injured person, but likewise as a punishment to the guilty, to deter from any such proceeding for the future, and as a proof of the detestation of the jury to the action itself.

Id. at 498-99.

n9. See generally J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, PUNITIVE DAMAGES LAW AND PRACTICE § 1.02 (1984); Cooter, Economic Analysis of Punitive Damages, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 79, 90 (1982); Duffy, Punitive Damages: A Doctrine Which Should Be Abolished, reprinted in DEFENSE RESEARCH INSTITUTE: THE CASE AGAINST PUNITIVE DAMAGES (D. Hirsch & J. Pouros eds. 1969); Owen, Civil Punishment and the Public Good, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 103, 108 (1982); Sales, supra note 2, at 353-55.

n10. Duffy, supra note 9, at 4; Ellis, Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 1, 12-13 (1982); Sales, supra note 2, at 353-54. A number of early cases in which defendants attempted to persuade courts to overturn arguably excessive jury verdicts furnished support for adoption of the punitive damage concept. See Ash v. Ash, 90 Eng. Rep. 526 (K.B. 1701) (court set aside a daughter's 2000 pound judgment against her mother because the "jury were very shy of giving a reason of their verdict"); Wood v. Gunston, 82 Eng. Rep. 867 (Banc. Sup. 1655) (the "Supreme Bench," which had replaced the King's Bench during the Interregnum, agreed that the court could overturn an excessive jury verdict in a slander suit and ordered a new trial); Hawkins v. Sciet, 81 Eng. Rep. 1099 (K.B. 1622) (first case to implicitly recognize the courts' power to set aside jury verdicts, although court allowed instant verdict to stand); see also Ellis, supra, at 12-15. Contra, Townsend v. Hughes, 86 Eng. Rep. 994 (C.P. 1649) (court held that it could not interfere with the jury's power to determine damage awards and sustained plaintiff's judgment of 4000 pounds).

n11. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(A)(2).

n12. Appellate courts in medieval England generally could not review a jury award of damages. Instead, a litigant oppressed by an allegedly excessive award of damages could pursue his grievance directly against the jury by means of a writ of attaint. If the court determined the damages excessive pursuant to its writ, the jury members were punishable under its provisions. Sales, supra note 2, at 354. Such punishment could be so severe that the jurors should "'become forever infamous; should forfeit their goods and the profits of their land; should themselves be imprisoned, and their wives and children thrown out of doors; should have their houses razed, their trees extirpated, and their meadows ploughed . . .'" K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(A)(2) (quoting 3 BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND 402 (1836)).

n13. 45 Vt. 275 (1873).

n14. Id. at 286.

n15. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(A)(2).

n16. See Note, Exemplary Damages in the Law of Torts, 70 HARV. L. REV. 517, 530-33 (1957). Professor Ellis indicates that appellate courts today are more willing to use remittitur to reduce excessive punitive damage awards. Iowa may be the only state that does not allow remittitur of such verdicts. The availability of remittitur in other states does not lead to any more certainty or consistency in punitive damage theory, however; increased availability just makes it more probable that state courts will refuse to uphold extremely large awards. Ellis, supra note 10, at 55 (citing K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 10.5).

doctrine at early common law, the simple fact remains that none of the historical justifications supports the punitive damage theory in today's tort reparations system. The quest to bestow increasing compensation no longer can justify punitive damage awards because actual damages currently recoverable compensate plaintiffs more than adequately for every conceivable element of physical, emotional, or imagined injury. The desire to inflict punishment, likewise, represents an insupportable basis for awarding quasi-criminal fines in a civil context, and is inconsistent with ancient and modern jurisprudence because the civil law historically has been premised upon the concept of compensation and not penal retribution. Deterrence is an equally unsound basis upon which to establish a civil remedy. Unfortunately, theoretical arguments mask the archaic and destructive nature of the punitive damages doctrine. Considering that an award of punitive damages is actually counterproductive to the bases which originally provided credibility for its existence, the severe economic impact of mind boggling and unprecedented recent awards of punitive damages, and the potential for even more catastrophic economic consequences in the future, it is time to relegate this doctrine to its rightful niche in the annals of law.

Part II of this Article traces the evolution of the punitive damage theory, including ancient origins and current status. Part III explores the various justifications theorized in support of the doctrine's present viability. Part IV analyzes the patchwork applications and conflicting standards that measure conduct warranting an award of puntive damages, the treatment of vicariously liable corporate defendants, and other factors that affect the doctrine. This part emphasizes that punitive damages are awarded on the basis of highly questionable rationale and in an absurdly confusing [*1119] and noticeably destructive manner. Part V argues for the complete abolition of the punitive damage concept: ratio potest allegari deficiente lege. In the absence of complete abolition of punitive damages, part VI asserts the urgent need for immediate stringent limitations on a doctrine that currently operates as an undisciplined and unfettered juggernaut of destruction in the civil tort system. Responsible jurisprudence, however, argues forcefully in favor of relegating this legal dinosaur to an era that long since has passed.

II. THE EVOLUTION OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES

A. Ancient Origins and Early Common Law

The precursor of modern puntive damages was the statutory remedy of multiple awards, a practice that, like punitive damages, provided for awards in excess of actual harm. [1] One of the earliest systems of law to utilize civil punitive damages was the Code of Hammurabi in 2000 B.C. [2] Punitory forms of damages also appeared in the Hittite law in 1400 B.C. and in the Hindu Code of Manu in 200 B.C. [3] Even the Bible contains several examples of multiple damage remedies that Mosaic law provided for offenses such as stealing. [4] Commentators disagree over whether Roman civil law ever actually recognized the concept of punitive damages. [5] English courts before the eighteenth century, however, upheld jury verdicts that exceeded the plaintiff's actual physical harm, [6] and an [*1120] English court initially employed the term "exemplary damages" in 1763 in Huckle v. Money [7] to recognize that a jury legitimately could return a verdict for excessive monetary awards. [8]

Courts and commentators have proferred a variety of historical justifications for the development of punitive damages. [9] One theory postulates that courts used the concept of punitive damages to justify otherwise excessive jury verdicts. [10] Early English common-law juries consisted of local townspeople who knew more about the facts of cases than did the judges, and under the reign of Henry II the knights who acted as jurors also provided the only testimony at the trial. [11] Primitive English courts, therefore, only reluctantly interfered with the ostensibly knowledgeable decisions reached by English juries, [12] and the concept that damages possessed [*1121] a proper, albeit punitive quality, simply served to justify these purportedly excessive jury awards.

REV_00263563

n17. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 1.02 4; K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(C); Duffy, supra note 9, at 5; Sales, supra note 2, at 354.

n18. Sales, supra note 2, at 354 (citing Stuart v. Western Union Tel. Co., 66 Tex. 580, 18 S.W. 351 (1885)). The Texas Supreme Court in Stuart allowed recovery for mental anguish when the defendant failed to deliver a death message. The court stated that "the whole doctrine of punitory or exemplary damages has its foundation in a failure to recognize as elements upon which compensation may be given, many things which ought to be classed as injuries entitling the injured person to compensation." Stuart, 66 Tex. at 586, 18 S.W. at 353.

n19. 53 N.H. 342 (1873).

n20. See supra note 7 and accompanying text.

n21. Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. at 364.

n22. 128 Eng. Rep. 761 (C.P. 1814).

n23. Id.

n24. Id.

n25. 95 Eng. Rep. 909 (C.P. 1769).

n26. Id. at 910.

n27. See K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 7.5(D). "The availability of actual damages in tort for mental anguish, wounded feelings, indignity and embarrassment have made the awarding of exemplary damages on such bases redundant." Id. § 2.3(A).

n28. Id. § 7.5(D); Coccia & Morrissey, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Cases Should Not Be Allowed, 22 TRIAL LAW. GUIDE 46, 64-65 (1978); see infra notes 153-66 and accompanying text.

n29. 53 N.H. 342 (1873).

n30. Id. at 382.

n31. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(E) (citing Freifield, The Rationale of Punitive Damages, 1 OHIO ST. L.J. 5, 9 (1935)); Sales, supra note 2, at 355.

n32. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.2(E); Sales, supra note 2, at 355.

n33. Special Project, supra note 2, at 694.

n34. See Duffy, supra note 8, at 5; supra note 27 and accompanying text.

n35. Defense Research Institute: The Case Against Punitive Damages, 6-7 (D. Hirsch & J. Pouros eds. 1969); K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 7.5(B). Dean Prosser stated:

A crime is an offense against the public at large, for which the state, as the representative of the public, will bring proceedings in the form of a criminal prosecution. The purpose of such a proceeding is to protect and vindicate the interests of the public as a whole, by punishing the offender or eliminating him from society, either permanently or for a limited time, by reforming him or teaching him not to repeat the offense, and by deterring others from imitating him. . . .

REV_00263581

The civil action for tort, on the other hand, is commenced and maintained by the injured person himself, and its purpose is to compensate him for the damage he has suffered, at the expense of the wrongdoer.

W. PROSSER, HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF TORTS § 2, at 7 (4th ed. 1971) (footnote omitted). Professors Lafave and Scott have observed:

Criminal law and the law of torts . . . are related branches of the law; yet in a sense they are two quite different matters. The aim of the criminal law . . . is to protect the public against harm, by punishing harmful results of conduct or at least situations . . . which are likely to result in harm if allowed to proceed further. The function of tort law is to compensate someone who is injured for the harm he has suffered.

W. LAFAVE & A. SCOTT, HANDBOOK ON CRIMINAL LAW § 3, at 11 (1972).

n36. 1 N.J.L. 77 (1791).

n37. Id. at 77 (emphasis in original).

n38. Id. at 78.

n39. See K. REDDEN, supra note 1, § 2.3(B).

n40. Id. § 2.3(A); Ellis, supra note 10, at 11-12; Sales, supra note 2, at 355. Some disagreement, however, exists over whether the modern justification for punitive damages in England is compensation or punishment and deterrence. Compare Duffy, supra note 9, at 5 (citing Walther & Plein, Punitive Damages: A Critical Analysis: Kirk v. Combs, 49 MARQ. L. REV. 369, 371 (1965)) (theory that punitive damages are "compensation" for incompensable injuries has remained the modern English justification) with J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 1.03, at 7 (citing Rookes v. Barnard, [1964] 1 All E.R. 367, 407) (despite early confusion, current purpose of punitive damages in English law is "to punish and deter").

n41. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 4.01-.1.6; Sales, supra note 2, at 363.

n42. See J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, at table 4.1 (46 states and the District of Columbia allow punitive damages at common law); Duffy, supra note 9, at 6.

n43. Louisiana, Massachusetts, Nebraska, and Washington constitute this minority. See, e.g., McCoy v. Arkansas Natural Gas Co., 175 La. 487, 143 So. 383 (1932); City of Lowell v. Massachusetts Bonding & Ins. Co., 313 Mass. 257, 47 N.E.2d 265 (1943); Abel v. Conover, 170 Neb. 926, 104 N.W.2d 684 (1960); Kammerer v. Western Gear Corp., 96 Wash. 2d 416, 635 P.2d 708 (1981).

n44. These jurisdictions are Louisiana and Massachusetts. No authority exists in Louisiana law for imposing punitive damages in any case "unless it be for some particular wrong for which a statute expressly authorizes the imposition of some such penalty." McCoy v. Arkansas Natural Gas Co., 175 La. at 497, 143 So. at 386; see Killebrew v. Abbott Laboratories, 359 So. 2d 1275 (La. 1978). Massachusetts similarly disallows punitive damages in the absence of specific statutory authorization. City of Lowell v. Massachusetts Bonding & Ins. Co., 313 Mass. at 269-70, 47 N.E.2d at 272; see Caperci v. Huntoon, 397 F.2d 799, 801 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 940 (1968). Statutorily allowed punitive damages in Massachusetts include situations in which the defendant is guilty of unfair or deceptive insurance trade practices, MASS. GEN. LAWS ANN. ch. 176D, § 7 (West Supp. 1983-1984)(up to 25% of underlying claim), and illegal willful dissemination of the criminal record of an offender, MASS. GEN. LAWS. ANN. ch. 6, § 177 (West 1976) (minimum $ 100 to maximum $ 1000); see Barr v. Interbay Citizens Bank, 96 Wash. 2d. 409, 635 P.2d 441 (1981) (punitive damages allowed only under express statutory authorization).

REV_00263582

n45. These jurisdictions include Indiana, Nebraska, and Washington. See, e.g., Glissman v. Rutt, 175 Ind. App. 493, 494, 372 N.E.2d 1188, 1189 (1978) (criminal prosecution bars imposition of punitive damages); Abel v. Conover, 170 Neb. 926, 929, 104 N.W.2d 684, 688 (1960) (court stated unequivocally that "punitive, vindictive, or exemplary damages will not be allowed, and that the measure of recovery in all civil cases is compensation for the injury sustained"); Spokane Truck & Dray Co. v. Hoefer, 2 Wash. 45, 53, 25 P. 1072, 1074 (1891) (Washington will allow only compensatory damages because they now cover all possible injuries and to allow punitive damages in addition would be akin to "exacting the pound of flesh"); accord Kammerer v. Western Gear Corp., 96 Wash. 2d 416, 635 P.2d 708 (1981); Barr v. Interbay Citizens Bank, 96 Wash. 2d. 409, 635 P.2d 441 (1981).

n46. These states are Connecticut, Georgia, Michigan, and New Hampshire. See, e.g., Collens v. New Canaan Water Co., 155 Conn. 477, 488-89, 234 A.2d 825, 831-32 (1967) (punitive damages actually have a compensatory nature and may not exceed the amount of plaintiff's expenses of litigation, less taxable costs); Westview Cemetery, Inc. v. Blanchard, 234 Ga. 540, 543-46, 216 S.E.2d 776, 778-81 (1975) (recovery under § 105-2003 for injury "to the peace, happiness, or feelings of the plaintiff" may include punitive damages and, therefore, precludes the recovery of punitive damages under § 105-2002); Wise v. Daniel, 221 Mich. 229, 233-34, 190 N.W. 746, 747 (1922) (factfinder may not award exemplary damages as a separate amount for example or punishment, although compensatory damages may be increased); Vratsenes v. New Hampshire Auto, Inc., 112 N.H. 71, 73, 289 A.2d 66, 68 (1972) (punitive award not allowable, but compensatory damages may be increased to compensate plaintiff in cases of wanton, malicious, or oppressive conduct).

n47. See supra note 40 and accompanying text. The states that recognize punishment and deterrence as the rationales for punitive damages obviously do not include the four states that employ the punitive nomenclature in designating essentially compensatory awards. See supra note 46 and accompanying text.

n48. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 4.14 & n.1 (citing cases and statutes from 36 states and the District of Columbia).

n49. Ellis, supra note 10, at 3. Professor Ellis offered as possible justifications: (1) punishment of the defendant; (2) specific deterrence of the defendant; (3) general deterrence of others from acting in a similar manner; (4) preservation of the peace; (5) inducement of private law enforcement; (6) compensation of victims for otherwise uncompensable losses; and (7) payment of plaintiffs' attorneys' fees. Id.

n50. Id. at 3 n.10 (quoting T. BATY, VICARIOUS LIABILITY 148 (1916)).

n51. Ellis, supra note 10, at 11.

n52. See, e.g., Moran v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 691 F.2d 811, 815 (6th Cir. 1982) (failure to warn would support punitive award if such failure manifested a flagrant indifference to the risk of harm); Neal v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 21 Cal. 3d 910, 928 n.13, 582 P.2d 980, 990 n.13, 148 Cal. Rptr. 389, 399 n.13 (1978) ("purpose of punitive damage is to punish wrongdoers and thereby deter commission of wrongful acts"); Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727, 741 (Minn.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 921 (1980) (court allowed punitive damages, even though manufacturer had ceased production of dangerous product, for purpose of deterring future misconduct and "to punish past misconduct"); Leimgruber v. Claridge Assocs., 73 N.J. 450, 454, 375 A.2d 652, 654 (1977) (theory of punitive damages is to punish the defendant for aggravated misconduct and deter such conduct in the future);

REV_00263583

Sandler v. Lawn-A-Mat Chem. & Equip. Corp., 141 N.J. Super. 436, 448, 358 A.2d 805, 811 (1976) (punitive damages are intended to punish the tortfeasor and prevent him from repeating such misconduct).

n53. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 5.39.

n54. See infra notes 101-07 & 188-201 and accompanying text.

n55. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 4.14.

n56. Id.

n57. See, e.g., Pringle Tax Serv., Inc. v. Knoblauch, 282 N.W.2d 151, 154 (Iowa 1979); Standard Life Ins. Co. v. Veal, 354 So. 2d 239, 247 (Miss. 1977); Newton V. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 291 N.C. 105, 114, 229 S.E.2d 297, 302 (1976); Detling v. Chockley, 70 Ohio St. 2d 134, 136, 436 N.E.2d 208, 209 (1982); City Nat'l. Bank v. Haynes, 614 S.W.2d 605, 609 (Tex. 1981); FBC Stores, Inc., v. Duncan, 214 Va. 246, 251, 198 S.E.2d 595, 599 (1973); Spencer v. Steinbrecher, 152 W. Va. 490, 500, 164, S.E.2d 710, 717 (1968). North Carolina consistently has allowed punitive damages solely on the basis of its policy to punish intentional wrongdoing and to deter others from similar behavior. See, e.g., Newton v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 291 N.C. 105 at 114, 229 S.E.2d 297, 302 (1976).

n58. See, e.g., Kerr v. First Commodity Corp. of Boston, 735 F.2d 281, 289 (5th Cir. 1984) (applying Missouri law); Ray Dodge, Inc. v. Moore, 251 Ark. 1036, 1044, 479 S.W.2d 518, 523 (1972); Frick v. Abell, 198 Colo. 508, 511, 602 P.2d 852, 853 (Colo. 1979); Gent v. Collinsville Volkswagen, Inc., 116 Ill. App. 3d 496, , 451 N.E.2d 1385, 1391 (1983); Taylor v. Wachter, 227 Kan. 221, 224, 607 P.2d 1094, 1098 (1980); Bisset v. Goss, 481 S.W.2d 71, 74 (Ky. 1972); Wedeman v. City Chevrolet Co., 278 Md. 524, 531, 366 A.2d 7, 12 (1976); Miller v. Watkins, 653 P.2d 126, 133 (Mont. 1982); Fahrenberg v. Tengel, 96 Wis. 2d 211, 222, 291 N.W.2d 516 (1980).

n59. See, e.g., Acheson v. Shafter, 107 Ariz. 576, 578, 490 P.2d 832, 834 (1971) (punitive damages are meant to punish the wrongdoer and to act as a deterrent to further wrongdoing); Sandler v. Lawn-A-Mat Chem. & Equip. Co., 141 N.J. Super. 436, 448, 358 A.2d 805, 811 (1976) (punitive damages "are intended to punish the tortfeasor and prevent him from repeating such conduct").

n60. See, e.g., Jensen v. Peterson, 264 N.W.2d 139, 144 (Minn. 1978) (punitive damages deter particularly egregious conduct, but court does not indicate by whom); Kirchbaum v. Lowrey, 165 Minn. 233, 236, 206 N.W. 171, 173 (1925) (punitive damages deter willful, wanton, or malicious wrongs, but court does not specify by whom).

n61. See Malcom v. Little, 295 A.2d 711, 714 (Del. 1972); Riegel v. Aastad, 272 A.2d 715, 718 (Del. 1970).

n62. Malcom v. Little, 295 A.2d at 714 (Del. 1972); Riegel v. Aastad, 272 A.2d at 718 (Del. 1970).

n63. See Hofer v. Lavender, No. C-2552 (Tex. July 11, 1984) (either deterrence or punishment, or both are now recognized as valid). Compare Wussow v. Commercial Mechanisms, Inc., 97 Wis. 2d 136, 155-56, 293 N.W.2d 897, 907 (1980) (punishment of past conduct is a sufficient basis for assessing punitive damages, even though they can also serve to deter future outrageous conduct) with John Mohr & Sons v. Jahnke, 55 Wis. 2d 402, 411, 198 N.W.2d 363, 368 (1972) (punitive damages act to punish and deter).

n64. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 4.15 at 17.

REV_00263584

n65. Maine, Oregon, and Utah are among those states that specifically state that deterrence is the only proper basis of punitive damages. See, e.g., Foss v. Maine Turnpike Auth., 309 A.2d 339, 345 (Me. 1973) (deterrence is the proper justification for exemplary damages); Lewis v. Devils Lake Rock Crushing Co., 274 Or. 293, 300, 545 P.2d 1374, 1378 (1976)(deterrence is only proper basis for imposing punitive damages); Nash v. Craigco, Inc., 585 P.2d 775, 778 (Utah 1978)(punitive damages teach the defendant not to repeat and warn others not to participate in such conduct).

n66. Jolley v. Puregro Co., 94 Idaho 702, 708-09, 496 P.2d 939, 945-46 (1972).

n67. See supra notes 56-60 and accompanying text. At least one jurisdiction, California, has suggested that punitive damages may be levied against a product supplier to deter the entire industry of which the defendant is a member. See Schleininger v. Questor Corp., 200 Cal. Rptr. 634 (1984). The extra penalty of monetary awards based on alleged wanton and reckless conduct by all members of an industry is an unwarranted extension of an already flawed concept.

n68. See J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 4.15, at 18.

n69. Hofer v. Lavender No. C-2552 (Tex. July 11, 1984).

n70. In a strongly worded dissent Justice Spears noted that [t]he punitive and deterrant aims of exemplary damages are not separable. The general deterrent effect of an award can not be considered in isolation, because to a large extent general deterrence depends on punishment. Specifically, members of the public are deterred from similar misconduct because they witnessed the wrongdoers conduct. . . .

Id.

n71. See Collens v. New Canaan Water Co., 155 Conn. 477, 234 A.2d 825 (1967); Westview Cemetery, Inc. v. Blanchard, 234 Ga. 540, 216 S.E.2d 776 (1975); McLaren v. Zeilinger, 103 Mich. App. 22, 302 N.W.2d 583 (1981); Perry v. Melton, 299 S.E.2d 8 (W. Va. 1982). But, as noted in Ratner v. Sioux Natural Gas Corp., 719 F.2d 801, 804 (5th Cir. 1983), "[t]he award of punitive damages is unconcerned with compensation; it is intended to punish the wrongdoer and deter the commission of similar offenses in the future."

n72. Sales, supra note 2, at 354; see Hink v. Sherman, 164 Mich. 352, 357, 129 N.W. 732, 734 (1911); Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. 342, 380 (1873).

n73. See Stuart v. Western Union Tel. Co., 66 Tex. 530, 18 S.W. 351 (1885).

n74. Duffy, supra note 9, at 11; see also Reinah Dev. Corp. v. Kaaterskill Hotel, 86 A.D.2d 50, 448 N.Y.S.2d 686 (1982), rev'd on other grounds, 465 N.Y.2d 482, 452 N.E.2d 1238 (1983).

n75. See supra notes 17-29 and accompanying text.

n76. See infra notes 213-20 and accompanying text.

n77. See generally J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 5.01, at 2; Sales, supra note 2, at 364-65; Special Project, supra note 2, at 695.

n78. As an example, Dean Prosser has noted:

Something more than the mere commission of a tort is always required for punitive damages. There must be circumstances of aggravation or outrage, such as spite or "malice," or a fraudulent or evil motive on the part of the defendant, or such a conscious and deliberate disregard of the interests of others that his conduct may be called willful or wanton. Lacking this element, there is general agreement that mere negligence is not enough, even though it is so extreme in degree as to be characterized as "gross," an unhappy term of ill-defined content, which occasionally, in a few jurisdictions, has been stretched to include the element of conscious indifference to consequences, and so to justify punitive damages. Still less, of course, can such damages be charged against one who acts under an innocent mistake in engaging in conduct that nevertheless constitutes a tort.

REV_00263585

W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 9-10. Similarly, Professor McCormick has suggested:

Since these damages are assessed for punishment and not for reparation, a positive element of conscious wrongdoing is always required. It must be shown either that the defendant was actuated by ill will, malice, or evil motive (which may appear by direct evidence of such motive, or from the inherent character of the tort itself, or from the oppressive character of his conduct, sometimes called "circumstances" of aggravation"), or by fraudulent purposes, or that he was so wanton and reckless, as to evince a conscious disregard of the rights of others. "Gross negligence" is a somewhat ambiguous expression. In the sense of extreme carelessness merely, it would probably not suffice, but only when it goes further and amounts to conscious indifference to harmful consequences.

McCORMICK, HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF DAMAGES § 79, at 280-82 (1935). For the sake of simplicity, this Article adopts the broad terms of "intentional," "reckless," and "negligent" to describe and refer to the standards of conduct that govern the imposition of punitive damages. "Intentional" refers to that conduct which is characterized by willfulness or malice, whether express, implied in fact, or implied in law. "Reckless" refers to that conduct which, although not intentional, is marked by various degrees of indifference or wantonness. "Negligent" includes that nebulous area of careless action which courts generally have viewed as insufficient for the imposition of punitive damages. The circular and overlapping characteristics of these three categories reflect the ambiguity and lack of definition inherent in the punitive damage environment. See Ellis, supra note 9, at 34-37, for another attempt to deal with this confusion.

n79. See generally J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 5.02. (The authors give numerous examples of the imposition of punitive damages for the intentional tort of assault and battery.) Some state legislatures have dictated that punitive damages are permissible for intentional or quasi-intentional conduct. See, e.g., MINN. STAT. ANN. § 549.20(1) (1984) (requiring "clear and convincing evidence that the acts of the defendant show a willful indifference to the rights or safety or others"); MONT. CODE ANN. § 27-1-221 (1983) (where the defendant has been "guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed"); NEV. REV. STAT. § 42.010(1)(1981) (where the defendant has "been guilty of oppression, fraud or malice, express or implied"); N.D. CENT. CODE § 32-03-07 (Supp. 1983) ("when the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed"); OKLA. STAT. ANN. tit. 23, § 9 (1955) ("where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud or malice, actual or presumed"); S.D. CODIFIED LAWS ANN. § 21-3-2 (1979) ("where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed"). One state legislature has mandated a reckless standard for awarding punitive damages. See COLO. REV. STAT. § 13-21-102 (1973) ("the injury complained of is attended by circumstances of fraud, malice or insult, or a wanton and reckless disregard of the injured party's rights and feelings").

n80. See Ellis, supra note 10, at 21-22 (when a defendant purposefully injures someone, then characterization of that action as the commission of a wrongful act with a culpable mental state that deserves punishment is relatively easy). The principal problems in justifying punitive damages from a just desserts standpoint arise when the defendant's conduct may not be characterized as purposeful harm. Much of the disagreement among the jurisdictions centers on expanding the punitive damage concept to embrace merely reckless conduct. Id.; see also Addair v. Huffman, 195 S.E.2d 739, 744 (W. Va. 1973) (intentional disregard of a law that protects the public from a particular abuse, thereby resulting in injury, gives rise to the imposition of punitive damages).

REV_00263586

n81. Sherman v. McDermott, 114 R.I. 107, 109, 329 A.2d 195, 196 (1974)(quoting Adams v. Lorraine Mfg. Co., 29 R.I. 333, 338, 71 A. 180, 182 (1908)).

n82. Sandler v. Lawn-A-Mat Chem. & Equip. Corp., 141 N.J. Super. 437, 448, 358 A.2d 805, 811 (1976)(quoting La Bruno v. Lawrence, 64 N.J. Super. 570, 575, 166 A.2d 822, 824 (1960), cert. denied, 34 N.J. 323, 168 A.2d 694 (1961); see Kocse v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., 152 N.J. Super. 371, 375-76, 377 A.2d 1234, 1236 (1977). Idaho applies a similar standard. See Cheney v. Palos Verdes Inv. Corp., 104 Idaho 897, 905, 665 P.2d 661, 669 (1983); Linscott v. Ranier Nat'l Life Ins. Co., 100 Idaho 854, 858, 606 P.2d 958, 962 (1980) (punitive damages are appropriate if defendant's act is an "extreme deviation from reasonable standards of conduct" and if defendant acted "with an understanding of or a disregard for its likely consequences"). Texas also arguably falls within this category. In Ogle v. Craig, 464 S.W. 2d 95 (Tex. 1971), the Texas Supreme Court stated that the "act complained of not only must be unlawful but also must partake of a wanton and malicious nature, or, as sometimes stated, somewhat of a criminal or wanton nature." Id. at 97 (quoting Dennis v. Dial Fin. & Thrift Co., 401 S.W.2d 803, 805 (Tex. 1966)). Texas, however, also allows recovery of punitive damages for grossly negligent conduct. See Schwartz v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 669 F.2d 1091, 1093 (5th Cir. 1982); Burk Royalty Co. v. Walls, 616 S.W.2d 911, 920 (Tex. 1981); Houston Lighting & Power Co. v. Sue, 644 S.W.2d 835, 839 (Tex. Civ. App. 1982).

n83. Silberg v. California Life Ins. Co., 11 Cal. 3d 452, 462, 521 P.2d 1103, 1110, 113 Cal. Rptr. 711, 718 (1974); see Colonial Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Superior Court, 31 Cal. 3d 785, 792, 647 P.2d 86, 90, 183 Cal. Rptr. 810, 814 (1982).

n84. Shortle v. Central Vt. Pub. Serv. Corp., 137 Vt. 32, 33, 399 A.2d 517, 518 (1979). Other jurisdictions follow similar standards. See Freeman v. Anderson, 279 Ark. 282, 286-87, 651 S.W.2d 450, 452 (1983); Dalrymple v. Fields, 276 Ark. 185, 188, 633 S.W.2d 362, 363 (1982) (must be shown that "in the absence of proof of malice or willfulness there was a wanton and conscious disregard for the rights and safety of others"); Satterfield v. Rebsamen Ford, Inc., 253 Ark. 181, 185, 485 S.W.2d 192, 195 (1972) ("when the defendant acts with malice, . . . or with willfulness, wantonness, or conscious indifference to consequences from which malice may be inferred") (citations omitted); Sere v. Group Hospitalization, Inc., 443 A.2d 33, 37 (D.C. 1982) ("defendant's tortious conduct must have been outrageous, characterized by malice, wantonness, gross fraud, recklessness, or willful disregard of the plaintiff's rights"); Riggs Nat'l Bank v. Price, 359 A.2d 25, 28 (D.C. 1976) ("for outrageous conduct such as maliciousness, wantonness, gross fraud, recklessness and willful disregard of another's rights"); Toyota Motor Co. v. Moll, 438 So. 2d 192 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1983) ("for actions or inactions amounting to willfulness, wantonness, maliciousness, recklessness, oppression, or outrageous conduct"); Kelsay v. Motorola, Inc., 74 III. 2d 172, 186, 384 N.E.2d 353, 359 (1978) ("committed with fraud, actual malice, deliberate violence or oppression, or when the defendant acts willfully, or with such gross negligence as to indicate a wanton disregard of the rights of others"); Gent v. Collinsville Volkswagen, Inc., 116 III. App. 3d 496, 451 N.E.2d 1385 (1983); General Motors Corp. v. Piskor, 277 Md. 165, 175, 352 A.2d 810, 817 (1976) ("only when there is an element of fraud, malice, evil intent or oppression which enters into and forms a part of the wrongful act"); Nelson v. Jacobsen, 669 P.2d 1207, 1219 (Utah 1983) (requiring a higher standard of proof than "willful and malicious" for punitive awards in an alienation of affections case); Kesler v. Rogers, 542 P.2d 354, 359 (Utah 1974) ("for particularly grievous injury caused by conduct which is not only wrongful, but which is willful and malicious so that it seems to one's sense of justice that mere recompense for actual loss is inadequate").

REV_00263587

n85. Jones v. Hospital for Joint Diseases and Medical Center, 96 A.D.2d 498, 499, 465 N.Y.S.2d 517, 517 (1982); see Le Mistral, Inc. v. Columbia Broadcasting Sys., 61 A.D.2d 491, 494, 402 N.Y.S.2d 815, 817 (1978) ("based upon tortious acts which involve ingredients of malice, fraud, oppression, insult, wanton or reckless disregard of the plaintiff's rights, or other circumstances of aggravation"). For other weak standard formulations, see Alyeska Pipeline Serv. Co. v. O'Kelley, 645 P.2d 767, 774 (Alaska 1982) ("characterized as outrageous, such as acts done with malice or bad motives or reckless indifference to the interests of another") (quoting Bridges v. Alaska Hous. Auth., 375 P.2d 696, 702 (Alaska 1962)); Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 46 (Alaska 1979); Malcolm v. Little, 295 A.2d 711, 714 (Del. 1972) ("when [the defendant's] wrongful act was committed willfully or wantonly") (quoting Riegel v. Aastad, 272 A.2d 715, 718 (Del. 1970)); Meyer v. Nottger, 241 N.W.2d 911, 922 (Iowa 1976) ("where defendant acts maliciously . . . where the nature of the illegal act is such as to negative any inference of feeling toward the person injured") (quoting Amos v. Prom, 115 F. Supp. 127, 136-37 (N.D. Iowa 1953)); McKinnon v. Tibbetts, 440 A.2d 1028, 1031 (Me. 1982) ("malicious, gross or wanton"); Foss v. Main Turnpike Auth., 309 A.2d 339, 345 (Me. 1973) ("the conduct of the defendant is found to be deliberate, malicious or grossly negligent"); Addair v. Huffman, 156 W. Va. 592, 599, 195 S.E.2d 739, 743 (1973) ("where there is an intentional wrong, or where there are circumstances which warrant an inference of malice, willfulness, or wanton disregard of the rights of others"); Petsch v. Florom, 538 P.2d 1011, 1013 (Wyo. 1975) ("the act of the defendant was committed maliciously, willfully or wantonly").

n86. Ex parte Smith, 412 So. 2d 1222, 1223 (Ala. 1982); see Ford Motor Credit Co. v. Washington, 420 So. 2d 14 (Ala. 1982); Ex parte Lewis, 416 So. 2d 410 (Ala. 1982).

n87. Cooter, supra note 9, at 80. Professor Cooter suggests that because most potential wrongdoers find it economically cheaper to comply with the law, noncompliance is usually unintentional. If the wrongdoer's actions are unintentional, then punitive damages are unnecessary for deterrence and underserved for punishment. Professor Cooter, however, also argues that some individuals intentionally cause harm, and that courts should impose punitive damages against these purposeful wrongdoers to offset either their illicit pleasure in noncompliance or the exceptional cost of compliance that instigates their noncompliance. Id. at 79-80. If, however, such deterrent or punitory measures are still necessary in light of the present expanded compensatory damage remedy, those effects should be achieved through the criminal processes, or at a minimum, restructured to preclude a windfall to an already fully compensated plaintiff.

n88. See Owen, Punitive Damages in Product Liability Litigation, 74 MICH. L. REV. 1258 (1976).

n89. Owen, supra note 9, at 106-07. Professor Owen asserts that the assessment of punitive damages in "deliberate" situations -- those concerning conduct intended to cause harm for no good reason -- "generally would be regarded as appropriate without much argument about either fairness or efficiency." Accordingly, punitive damages properly would lie in "evaluative" situations -- those in which the defendant evaluates the circumstances and decides that he will benefit enough from the act to justify its occurrence -- but only if the defendant's choice is wrong (immoral) and the defendant knows or recklessly fails to discover its wrongfulness before acting. Professor Owen, however, now draws the line at "inadvertent" acts -- those that show no real thought by the defendant concerning the wrongfulness or implications of the act -- because a failure to think usually does not call for punishment. Id. This shift is understandable because an objective view of the courts' indiscriminate use of punitive damages would dampen the enthusiasm of even the doctrine's most ardent supporters.

REV_00263588

n90. Sandler v. Lawn-A-Mat Chem. & Equip. Co., 141 N.J. Super. 437, 448, 358 A.2d 805, 811 (1976). The court also refers to conduct that evinces a "wanton and willful disregard of the rights of another." Id. Actual malice, likewise, reflects the Iowa and Maryland standards. See Feeney v. Scott County, 290 N.W.2d 885, 892 (Iowa 1980); see also West Des Moines State Bank v. Hawkeye Bancorp., 722 F.2d 411, 414 (8th Cir. 1983); Savol v. BL Ltd., 710 F.2d 1027, 1033 (4th Cir. 1983). South Carolina and Virginia also use similar formulations. See King v. Allstate Ins. Co., 272 S.C. 259, 263, 251 S.E.2d 194, 196 (1979)("must be malice, ill will, a conscious indifference to the rights of others, or a reckless disregard thereof")(quoting Cox v. Coleman, 189 S.C. 218, 221, 200 S.E. 762, 764 (1939)); Peacock Buick, Inc. v. Durkin, 221 Va. 1133, 1136-37, 277 S.E.2d 225, 227 (1981)(actual malice or malice in fact); Jordan v. Sauve, 219 Va. 448, 452, 247 S.E.2d 739, 741 (1978)("only where there is misconduct or actual malice").

n91. Anderson v. Continental Ins. Co., 85 Wis. 2d 675, 697, 271 N.W.2d 368, 379 (1978); see Franklin Music Co. v. American Broadcasting Co., 616 F.2d 528, 542 (3d Cir. 1979) (Pennsylvania law requires bad motive or reckless indifference); Amish v. Walnut Creek Dev., Inc., 631 S.W.2d 866, 876 (Mo. App. 1982)(bad motive or evil intent).

n92. Under Missouri law, legal malice and not actual malice governs an award for punitive damages. Armstrong v. Republic Realty Mortgage Corp., 631 F.2d 1344, 1352 (8th Cir. 1980) (applying Missouri law); Pollock v. Brown, 569 S.W.2d 724, 732 (Mo. 1978). As noted by the court in Crues v. KFC Corp., 729 F.2d 1145, 1153 (8th Cir. 1984)(citing Beggs v. Universal C.I.T. Credit Corp., 409 S.W.2d 719 (Mo. 1966)), legal malice is defined to mean "whether the defendant did a wrongful act intentionally and without just cause or excuse . . . [meaning] that defendant not only intended to do the act which is ascertained to be wrongful but that he knew it was wrongful when he did it." Accord Pollock v. Brown, 569 S.W.2d at 724.

n93. Gulf Atl. Life Ins. Co. v. Barnes, 405 So. 2d 916 (Ala. 1981); Randall v. Ganz, 96 Idaho 785, 787, 537 P.2d 65, 67 (1975); Petsch v. Florom, 538 P.2d 1011, 1013 (Wyo. 1975).

n94. Burk Royalty Co., v. Walls, 616 S.W.2d 911, 920 (Tex. 1981); Jeffers v. Nysse, 98 Wis. 2d 543, 297 N.W.2d 495 (1980).

n95. Silberg v. California Life Ins. Co., 11 cal. 3d 452, 462, 521 P.2d 1103, 1110, 113 Cal. Rptr. 711, 718 (1974); Shortle v. Central Vt. Pub. Serv. Corp., 137 Vt. 32, 33, 399 A.2d 517, 518 (1974); see Newton v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 291 N.C. 105, 112, 229 S.E.2d 297, 301 (1976)("'fraud, malice, such a degree of negligence as indicates a reckless indifference to consequences, oppression, insult, rudeness, caprice, willfullness'")(quoting Baker v. Winslow, 184 N.C. 1, 113 S.E. 570 (1922)); Henry v. Deen, 61 N.C. App. 189, 195, 300 S.E.2d 707, 711 (1983)("based on aggravated, intentional, wanton or grossly negligent conduct"), rev'd on other grounds, 310 N.C. 75, 310 S.E.2d 327 (1984); Rubeck v. Huffman, 54 Ohio St. 2d 20, 23, 374 N.E.2d 411, 413 (1978)("caused by intentional, reckless, wanton, willful and gross acts or by malice inferred from conduct and surrounding circumstances").

n96. McClellan v. Highland Sales & Inv. Co., 484 S.W.2d 239, 242 (Mo. 1972). Under this approach, some element of wantonness or bad motive must exist. Id.; see also Kline v. Multi-Media Cablevision, Inc., 233 Kan. 188, 666 P.2d 711 (1983); Loucks v. Albuquerque Nat'l Bank, 76 N.M. 735, 747, 418 P.2d 191, 199 (1966)("only when the conduct of the wrongdoer may be said to be maliciously intentional, fraudulent, oppressive, or committed recklessly or with a wanton disregard of the plaintiffs's rights").

n97. Salt River Valley Water Users' Ass'n. v. Giglio, 113 Ariz. 190, 202, 549 P.2d 162, 174 (1976). The court, however, did not impose punitive damages because of plaintiffs' failure to demonstrate the requisite degree of wanton or reckless disregard. Id. at 203, 549 P.2d at 175; see Nienstedt v. Wetzel, 133 Ariz. 348, 357, 651 P.2d 876, 885 (1982)("where the conduct of the wrongdoer is wanton, reckless or shows spite or ill will"); Currie v. Dooley, 132 Ariz. 584, 589, 647 P.2d 1182, 1187 (1982) (where the defendant's conduct "is wanton, reckless or shows spite or ill will").

REV_00263589

n98. Richardson v. Gibalski, 625 S.W.2d 715, 717 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1979)(quoting Inland Container Corp. v. March, 529 S.W.2d 43, 45 (Tenn. 1975)). A similar amalgamated standard prevails in Montana. In the recent case of Kuiper v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 673 P.2d 1208 (Montana 1983), relying on Graham v. Clarks Fork Nat'l Bank, 631 P.2d 718 (Montana 1981), the court defined the wrongful act as "characterized by some such circumstances of aggravation, as willfulness, wantonness, malice, oppression, brutality, insult, recklessness, gross negligence, or gross fraud on the part of the defendant." 673 P.2d at 1213-14.

n99. See supra note 78, for Dean Prosser's and Professor McCormick's standards for justifying the imposition of punitive damages. Some commentators have elected to divide antisocial conduct into two categories: (1) that conduct which indicates that the defendant desired to cause the harm that the plaintiff sustained, or at least believed that the harm was substantially certain to follow from the conduct; and (2) situations in which the defendant knew, or should have had reason to know, not only that his conduct created an unreasonable risk of harm, but also that a strong probability -- although not a substantial certainty -- existed that the harm would result but, nevertheless, he proceeded with his conduct in reckless or conscious disregard of the consequences. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 5.01 at 8-9. These categories, however, appear to be the equivalent of the intentional and reckless or wanton categories. This characterization provides little illumination and even less meaningful guidance in applying the standard. This strained effort to characterize conduct warranting punitive damages merely dramatizes the total unsuitability of the punitive damage concept in the arena of civil torts reparations.

Unquestionably, there exists an inherent and unintelligible confusion in this area of the law. One commentator defined the recklessness category as conduct that does not suggest that the actor desired to hurt anyone and in which the actor's means of achieving his objective, rather than the objective itself, is scrutinized. This commentator emphasized the subtle differences in connotation of such terms as "conscious indifference,"" reckless disregard," "recklessness," and "wantonness." See Ellis, supra note 10, at 35.

Other commentators simply have labeled the basic types of conduct that warrant the imposition of punitive damages and have failed to analyze the standards by which such labeled conduct can be judged. See, e.g., Duffy, supra note 9, at 7 (majority of jurisdictions allow punitive damages if the defendant's actions were wanton, malicious, or oppressive) (citing Great Atl. & Pac. Tea Co., v. Smith, 218 Ky. 583, 136 S.W.2d 759 (1940) and 22 AM. JUR. 2D Damages § 236 (1965)); Special Project, supra note 2, at 695 (most states require that the defendant act with gross negligence, willfulness, or wantonness).

n100. As one commentator has observed, jury instructions on the standards for assessing punitive damages are unilluminating and, although judges usually tell the jurors that they can award punitive damages if the defendant acted with maliciousness, willfulness, wantonness, or in reckless disregard of the plaintiff's rights, most courts provide little if any meaningful guidelines. Ellis, supra note 10, at 38. A dramatic example of judicial ratification of the application of punitive damages despite judicial acknowledgement of the complete lack of any guiding standards for the jury is found in a recent Montana case. See First Bank (N.A.) - Billings v. TransAmerica Ins. Co., 679 P.2d 1217, 1222 (Mont. 1984).

n101. W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 10; Ellis, supra note 10, at 36.

n102. W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 10; Ellis, supra note 10, at 36-37 (but the definition of gross negligence is unclear); see Maxey v. Freightliner Corp., 665 F.2d 1367

REV_00263590

This attitude first may have manifested itself in American legal jurisprudence in Earl v. Tupper, [13] an early Vermont case in which the court announced that it would not grant a new trial for reason of excessive damage awards if the defendant's malice, oppression, or gross fraud contributed to the plaintiff's injury. [14] As the jury system continued its evolution and juries began to base their verdicts on the testimony of others, however, courts began exercising more control over the monetary amount of jury awards. [15] Consequently, jury determinations alone as justification for tolerating punitive damages as an integral element of the remedy in a tort reparations system began losing much, if not all, of their significance. [16]

Another theory espoused to justify the use of punitive damages views punitory damages as compensation for plaintiffs' ethereal injuries such as hurt feelings, humiliation, wounded dignity, mental anguish, and embarrassment, which the courts during the formative stages of the common law were reluctant to recognize as compensable injuries. [17] Punitive damages, therefore, performed the task of compensating plaintiffs for elements of personal harm that otherwise were unrecoverable. [18] In the early New Hampshire case [*1122] of Fay v. Parker, [19] the court discussed Huckle v. Money [20] and stated that the English decision "said no more, in substance, than that for the outrage and indignity heaped upon the plaintiff by the insolence, oppression, and tyranny of the defendant, a jury might give the plaintiff liberal damages." [21] Likewise, other early English courts allowed intangible injuries to serve as the basis for punitive damages awards. In Merest v. Harvey, [22] plaintiff instituted a trespass action because defendant intruded on plaintiff's land, fired several times at game, and used extremely intemperate language. The appellate court upheld a jury verdict of 500 pounds and queried,

[I]n a case where a man disregards every principle which actuates the conduct of a gentleman, what is to restrain him except damages? To be sure, one can hardly conceive worse conduct than this. What would be said to a person in a low situation in life, who should behave himself in this manner? [23]

The English court then refused to establish a principle that juries justifiably could award only "the absolute pecuniary damage that the plaintiff may sustain." [24] Similarly, the court in Tullidge v. Wade [25] emphasized offensive behavior while discussing guidelines for awarding damages. The Tullidge court stated, "In actions [involving seduction] . . . the circumstances of time and place, when and where the insult is given, require different damages; as it is a greater insult to be beaten upon the Royal Exchange than in a private room." [26]

The ambit of compensatory damages has expanded rapidly over recent years to include an entire spectrum of actual and ethereal injuries, including mental anguish, physical pain, loss of society, loss of consortium, emotional trauma, and other metaphysical injuries. [27] The legal rationale that punitive damages serve a compensatory function, therefore, has ceased to exist. Critics argue that the lack of a viable compensatory rationale makes punitive damages an anachronism that is no longer necessary or justifiable. [28] [*1123] As the court forcefully stated in Fay v. Parker, [29] the idea of punitive damages "is wrong, . . . is a monstrous heresy," and "is an unsightly and unhealthy excrescence, deforming the symmetry and body of the law." [30] At a minimum, and contrary to the philosophical theorem of civil tort reparations, this doctrine reflects a discomforting antibusiness bias.

A final justification urged in support of the punitive damage concept is that quasi-criminal fines satisfy a void allegedly created by the inequitable chasm between severe criminal penalties for wrongs concerning property losses and, in too many instances, lesser criminal penalties for more severe invasions of personal rights. [31] Civil courts, therefore, allegedly can utilize punitive damages to punish more severely the egregious torts that cause personal harm, [32] and a number of courts have expressed the rationale that citizens are more likely to institute suits to protect their rights and enforce the civil law if punitive damages provide an economic incentive to litigate. [33] Once again, however, because the concept of compensatory damages currently embraces every conceivable element of tangible and intangible injury, [34]

REV_00263564

(5th Cir. 1982) (en banc); Ex parte Smith, 412 So. 2d 1222, 1223 (Ala. 1982); Stinson v. Feminist Women's Health Center, Inc., 416 So. 2d 1183, 1185 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1982); Kelsay v. Motorola, Inc., 74 III. 2d 172, 186, 384, N.E.2d 353, 359 (1978); Hibschman Pontiac, Inc. v. Batchelor, 266 Ind. 310, 314, 362 N.E.2d 845, 847 (1977); Sebastian v. Wood, 246 Iowa 94, 66 N.W.2d 841 (1954); Newton v. Hornblower, Inc., 224 Kan. 506, 524-25, 582 P.2d 1136, 1150 (1978); Foss v. Maine Turnpike Auth., 309 A.2d 339, 345 (Me. 1973); Seals v. St. Regis Paper Co., 236 So. 2d 388, 392 (Miss. 1970); Burk Royalty Co. v. Walls, 616 S.W.2d 911 (Tex. 1981); Texas Pac. Coal & Oil Co. v. Robertson, 125 Tex. 4, 79 S.W.2d 830 (1935).

n103. See Wolf v. Nordstrom, Inc., 291 Ore. 828, 637 P.2d 1280 (1981); Chamberlain v. Jim Fisher Motors, Inc., 282 Ore. 229, 578 P.2d 1225 (1978).

n104. W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 12. The imposition of punitive damages based on a theory of vicarious liability is probably the most controversial use of the doctrine. Id. The incongruous nature of vicarious punitive damages clearly is highlighted in the case of Martin v. Johns-Manville Corp., 469 A.2d 655 (Pa. Super. 1983), in which the court held that punitive damages are recoverable against a successor corporation for the vicarious liability of its predecessor even though the successor corporation was not responsible for the alleged defective product marketed by its predecessor.

n105. The Restatement (Second) of Torts contains this formulation of the complicity rule;

Punitive damages can properly by awarded against a master or other principal because of an act by an agent if, but only if, (a) the principal authorized the doing and the manner of the act, or (b) the agent was unfit and the principal was reckless in employing him, or (c) the agent was employed in a managerial capacity and was acting in the scope of employment, or (d) the principal or a managerial agent of the principal ratified or approved the act.

RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 909 (1979). The Restatement (Second) of Agency adopts this rule verbatim. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 217C (1958). This rule represents the conservative view, and a number of jurisdictions either have adopted it expressly, adopted it without mentioning it, or adopted parts of it. See, e.g., Martin v. Texaco, Inc., 726 F.2d. 207 (5th Cir. 1984) (applying Texas law); Briner v. Hystop, 337 N.W.2d 858 (Iowa 1983). Dean Prosser has suggested that the majority of the jurisdictions have adopted the more liberal respondeat superior rule. W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 12. It has been observed, however, that Dean Prosser cites an equal number of authorities for the respondeat superior and complicity rules. Ellis, supra note 10, at 63 n.266. Professor Ellis has asserted that half of the states follow each rule. Id. at 63. Professor Ellis does recognize that "Prosser's misleading statement may be on its way to becoming a self-fulfilling prophecy." Id. at 63 n.266.

n106. The drafters of the Restatement (Second) of Torts justify this liability because it "serves as a deterrent to the employment of unfit persons for important positions." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 909(c) comment b, at 468 (1979). The Restatement provides no clear definition of who constitutes a managerial agent. Jurisdictions that have adopted the complicity rule include the District of Columbia, Texas, New York, California, and Kansas. See Jordan v. Medley, 711 F.2d 211 (D.C. App. 1983) (landlord's passive participation while his son brandished a gun at tenants could constitute ratification of the employee's acts); Egan v. Mutual of Omaha Ins. Co., 63 Cal. App. 3d 659, 133 Cal. Rptr. 899 (1976)(claims adjuster held to be managerial agent despite title of his position); Kline v. Multi-Media Cablevision, Inc., 233 Kan. 988, 666 P.2d 711 (1983)(punitive damages not allowed for mere employee gross negligence in removing a manhole cover and then failing to erect a protective barrier); Gill v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 284 A.D. 36, 129 N.Y.S.2d 288 (1954)(head of "protective department" of defendant held to be managerial agent of defendant in action for false imprisonment); Fisher v. Carrousel Motor Hotel, Inc., 424

REV_00263591

S.W.2d 627 (Tex. 1967)(punitive damages allowed when parties stipulated that offender was the "manager" of the club).

n107. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 909(a)(1979).

n108. See id. § 909(d).

n109. See id. § 909(b).

n110. See, e.g., Maxey v. Freightliner Corp., 665 F.2d 1367 (5th Cir. 1982)(jury awarded $ 150,000 compensatory and $ 10,000,000 punitive damages); Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38 (Alaska 1979), on rehearing, 615 P.2d 621 (Alaska 1980)(a jury awarded in excess of $ 2,000,000 in punitive damages under strict tort liability cause of action involving defective gun); Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348 (1981) (jury awarded $ 125,000,000 in punitive damages, which Court of Appeals reduced to $ 3,000,000, in Pinto rear-end case); Leichtamer v. American Motors Corp., 67 Ohio St. 2d 456, 424 N.E.2d 568 (1981)(court allowed actual and punitive damages against manufacturer in jeep roll-over case); Rawlings Sporting Goods Co. v. Daniels, 619 S.W.2d 435 (Tex. Civ. App. 1981) (affirming imposition of $ 750,000 in punitive damages).

n111. 726 F.2d 657 (10th Cir. 1984).

n112. The court acknowledged that Oklahoma courts would refuse to hold a manufacturer liable if an unforeseeable subsequent modification caused the plaintiff's injuries. Id. at 659 (citing Texas Metal Fabricating Co. v. Northern Gas Prods. Corp., 404 F.2d 921 (10th Cir. 1968)). The court, however, chose to ignore factual evidence that the brakes could have averted the accident, and that the plaintiff's injuries resulted from his fingers being caught between the exposed belt and its pulley rather than from the mower blades. Saupitty, 726 F.2d at 660-61 (Seth, C.J., dissenting). Instead, the majority stated that "construing all of the evidence and the inferences therefrom in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, we cannot conclude that the removal of either the mower's brakes or its belt guard constituted a superseding, intervening cause of plaintiff's injury as a matter of law." Id. at 659-60.

n113. Saupitty, 726 F.2d at 660 (Seth, C.J., dissenting).

n114. Id. at 661 (Seth, C.J., dissenting).

n115. Piper Aircraft Corp. v. Coulter, 426 So. 2d 1108, 1109 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1983); Phipps v. General Motors Corp., 278 Md. 337, 343, 363 A.2d 955, 958 (1976); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 265-66, 294 N.W.2d 437, 441 (1980).

n116. See Sales, supra note 2, at 380, 389-90. Several courts have rejected the application of punitive damages in strict tort liability actions. Gold v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 553 F. Supp. 482 (D.N.J. 1982); Butcher v. Robertshaw Controls Co., 550 F. Supp. 692 (D. Md. 1981); Walbrun v. Berkel, Inc., 433 F. Supp. 384 (E.D. Wis. 1976).

n117. The defendant unsuccessfully argued this in Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 288, 294 N.W.2d 437, 453. Another argument against punitive damages in this area holds that manufacturers do not demonstrate the requisite degree of malice or quasi-criminal intent. See, e.g., Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348 (1981); Leichtamer v. American Motors Co., 67 Ohio St. 2d 456, 424 N.E.2d 568 (1981).

n118. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 118-19 (discussing excessive awards that cripple a corporate defendant); Special Project, supra note 2, at 806-45 (discussing recent bankruptcies). This possibility and other compelling concerns are delineated clearly by the dissent of Justice Rovira in Palmer v. A. H. Robins Co., 684 P.2d 187 (Colo. 1984). The Palmer majority rather glibly glosses over the significant issues that present philosophical impediments to the imposition of punitive damages in product liability actions. Id. at 228 (Rovira, J., dissenting).

REV_00263592

n119. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 714.

n120. See Acosta v. Honda Motor Co., 717 F.2d 828 (3d Cir. 1983); Moran v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 691 F.2d 811 (6th Cir. 1982); Campus Sweater & Sportswear v. M.B. Kahn Constr., 515 F. Supp. 64 (D.S.C. 1979), aff'd, 644 F.2d 877 (4th Cir. 1981); Sturm, Ryer & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38 (Alaska 1979), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981); Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348 (1981); Cloroben Chem. Corp. v. Comegys, 464 A.2d 887 (Del. Super. Ct. 1983); Piper Aircraft Corp. v. Coulter, 426 So. 2d 1108 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1983); Froud v. Celotex Corp., 107 Ill. App. 3d 654, 437 N.E.2d 910 (1982) rev'd on other grounds, 98 Ill. 2d 1324, 456 N.E.2d 131 (1983); Grye v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727 (Minn. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 921 (1980); Rinker v. Ford Motor Co., 567 S.W.2d 655 (Mo. Ct. App. 1978); Leichtamer v. American Motorist Corp., 67 Ohio St. 2d 456, 424 N.E.2d 568 (1981); Thiry v. Armstrong World Indus., 661 P.2d 515 (Okla. 1983); Rawlings Sporting Goods Co. v Daniels, 619 S.W.2d 435 (Tex. Civ. App. 1981); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 294 N.W.2d 437 (1980); Some courts have acknowledged the obvious -- that punitive damages are incompatable with the theory of strict tort liability. Gold v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 553 F. Supp. 482 (D. N.J. 1982); Butcher v. Robershaw Controls Co., 550 F. Supp. 692, 705 (D. Md. 1981).

n121. Some courts eschew this concern based on the absence of confirmed empirical data and conclude, therefore, that the potential for serious harm is of no moment. See Acosta v. Honda Motor Co., 717 F.2d 828 (3d Cir. 1983). The court did note, however, that "[i]t is, of course, possible that a sufficiently egregious error as to one product could result in the demise of its manufacturer." Id. at 838. In Moran v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 691 F.2d 811, 817 (6th Cir. 1982), the court simply suggested that if punitive damages pose a real threat, then the federal or state legislature should provide the relief. In Campus Sweater & Sportwear Co. v. M. B. Kahn Constr. Co., 515 F. Supp. 64, 107 (D.S.C. 1979), aff'd, 644 F.2d 877 (4th Cir. 1981), the threat of multiple punitive awards purportedly "forces a prudent manufacturer intent on maximizing profits to hesitate before marketing a known defective or an untested product." Most recently, in Fischer v. Johns-Manville Corp., 193 N.J. Super. 113, 472 A.2d 577, (1984), the court failed the business community of this country and strongly endorsed the precept that "it is only the threat of punitive damages which ultimately can induce these entrepreneurs and others to act with a reasonable modicum of responsibility." Id. at 125, 472 A.2d at 584 (emphasis added). These attitudes strongly suggest the urgent necessity for the more thoughtful, rational, and dispassionate legislative process to address this significant and continually escalating problem in the tort reparation system. See Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 47 (Alaska 1979); Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727, 741 (Minn.) cert. denied, 449 U.S. 921 (1980); State ex rel. Young v. Crookham, 290 Or. 61, 618 P.2d 1268 (1980); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 285-86, 294 N.W.2d 437, 451 (1980). Unfortunately, punitive damages also are awarded for conduct less egregious than marketing a known defective product. See, e.g., Worderson v. Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp., 681 P.2d 1038 (Kan. 1984); Willis v. Floyd Brace Co. [1983-1984 Transfer Binder] PROD. LIAB. REP. (CCH) P9862 (S.C. Nov. 14, 1983).

n122. For example in Acosta v. Honda Motor Co., 717 F.2d 828, 838 (3d Cir. 1983), the Third Circuit observed that, "[i]t is, of course, possible that 'a sufficiently egregious error as to one product' could result in the demise of its manufacturer, but such a result is not inevitable." In a supporting footnote, the court further observed, "[N]or is such a result necessarily untenable." More recently, in Martin v. Johns-Manville Corp., 469 A.2d 655, 665 (Pa. Super. 1983), appeal filed, Apr. 2, 1984, the court, in an equally off-handed manner, commented that, "if the defendant's conduct was so reckless and injured so many people, that the effect of the damages awarded against it is bankruptcy, we are hard pressed to understand why that defendant should not be required to live with the consequences of its actions." A similar view has been expressed by the Oregon court in State ex. rel. Young v. Crookham, 290 Or. 61, 618 P.2d 1268 (1980). In Fischer v. Johns-Manville Corp., 193 N.J. Super. 113, 472 A.2d 5778 (1984), the state court echoed, in less than moderate tones, the importance of exacting a pound of flesh from reckless defendants in its statement demanding "the ultimate protection which punitive damages afford." Id. at 127, 472 A.2d at 585. The courts likewise have rejected application of the double jeopardy principle to foreclose repeated punitive damage awards for identical product design defects. See Hansen v. Johns-Manville Corp., 734 F.2d 1036 (5th Cir. 1984).

REV_00263593

n123. 727 F.2d 506 (5th Cir. 1984) (rehearing en banc granted).

n124. Id. at 525.

n125. Id. at 528 (citing Acosta v. Honda Motor Co., 717 F.2d at 838, n.15).

n126. Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 727 F.2d 506, 526 (5th Cir.) reh'g en banc granted, F.2d (5th Cir. 1984). The court stated:

We do not reach the issue whether Mississippi would find punitive damages inherently incompatible with the theory of strict liability in all cases. Our holding today is limited to the extraordinary circumstances of this litigation, where the allowance of punitive damages carries the manifest portent of undoing the strict liability remedy for present and prospective claimants and where the purposes of punitive damages are otherwise served.

We cannot predict, of course, whether other jurisdictions would subscribe to our approach in this litigation. From that perspective, our efforts to preserve the viability of strict liability compensation may be infected with an element of futility. The alternative, however, appears to be no solution at all, but mere resignation to defeat of the purposes of both strict liability and punitive damages. A fully satisfactory solution would require properly crafted federal legislation. Since that has not come to pass, we must proceed with fundamental justice as our guide.

The disallowance of punitive damages in this situation expresses this court's central concern for the continued viability of the strict liability cause of action for present and future claimants. Where strict liability for compensatory damages imposes adequate punishment as it does in this type of case, we decline to cleave to a judge-made remedy of punitive damages that would both fail in its own purpose and obstruct the broader objectives of the underlying cause of action which the plaintiff has cohosen to pursue.

Id. at 529-30.

n127. See, e.g., Williams v. Carr, 263 Ark. 326, 565 S.W.2d 400 (1978); American Motorcycle Inst., Inc. v. Mitchell, 380 So. 2d 452 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1980); Pringle Tax Servs., Inc. v. Knoblauch, 282 N.W.2d 151 (Iowa 1979); Traylor v. Wachter, 227 Kan. 221, 607 P.2d 1094 (1980); Robison v. Katz, 94 N.M. 314, 610 P.2d 201 (1980); Fort Worth Elevators Co. v. Russell, 123 Tex. 128, 70 S.W.2d 397 (1934); Cates v. Barb, 650 P.2d 1159 (Wyo. 1982).

n128. W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 13-14; see, e.g., Nelson v. Hartman, 648 P.2d 1176, 1178 (Mont. 1982) (no error in failing to admit defendant's driving record for punitive damages purposes because no punitive damages can exist without actual liability entitling the plaintiff to actual damages); Fort Worth Elevators Co. v. Russell, 123 Tex. 128, 149-50, 70 S.W.2d 397, 409 (1934) (proof of actual damage prerequisite to punitive award); see generally Duffy, supra note 9, at 8; Ellis, supra note 10, at 54 (citing COMMITTEE ON STANDARD JURY INSTRUCTIONS, CIVIL, OF THE SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL § 14.71 (Supp. 1981)); Sales, supra note 2, at 365; Note, 70 HARV. L. REV. 517, 528-29 (1957).

REV_00263594

n129. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 63.

n130. Ellis, supra note 10, at 58 (citing D. DOBBS, HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF REMEDIES § 3.9, at 210-11 (1973) and W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 14)); Sales, supra note 2, at 366; Special Project, supra note 2, at 696. Some states, however, require no rlationship whatever between punitive and compensatory awards. See, e.g., Pinckard v. Dunnavant, 206 So. 2d 340, 344 (Ala. 1968) (exemplary award need not be mathematically related to compensatory award); Ray Dodge, Inc. v. Moore, 251 Ark. 1036, 1046, 479 S.W.2d 518, 524 (1972) (factors other than ratio of punitive damages and actual damages to be considered); Lassitter v. International Union of Operating Eng'rs, 349 So. 2d 622, 626 (Fla. 1976) (punitive damages not required to be proportionate to compensatory damages); Southwestern Inv. Co. v. Neeley, 452 S.W.2d 705 (Tex. 1970) (punitive damages need only be reasonably proportional to actual damages); see generally Leimgruber v. Claridge Assocs., 73 N.J. 450, 457-59, 375 A.2d 652, 656-57 (1977) (discussing split among jurisdictions regarding "ratio" rule). Some courts have stated that an award which is extremely disproportional indicates that the jury acted with passion or prejudice. Dearmore v. Gold, 400 F.2d 887, 888 (5th Cir. 1968) (a ratio of 11 to 1 was too disproportional); Alley v. Gubser Dev. Co., 569 F. Supp. 36, 40 (D. Colo. 1983) (a ratio of 17 to 1 was too disproportional). In contrast, in Moore v. American United Life Ins. Co., 150 Cal. App. 3d 610, 636, 197 Cal. Rptr. 878, 894-95 (1984), a ratio of 83 to 1 was approved (citing Wetherbee v. United Ins. Co. of Am., 18 Cal. App. 3d 266, 95 Cal. Rptr. 678 (1971) (approving a punitive award ratio of 200 to 1)); accord Kerr v. Fruit Commodity Corp. of Boston, 735 F.2d 281 (8th Cir. 1984) (citing Price v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 530 S.W.2d 249 (Mo. App. 1975) (that Missouri has approved a 40 to 1 ratio)); robison v. Lescrenier, 721 F.2d 1101, 1113 (7th Cir. 1983) (applying Wisconsin law); Palmer v. A. H. Robins Co., No. 81SA149 (Colo. June 4, 1984) (en banc) (approving a ratio of 10.3 to 1 when the basic compensatory damage award was $ 600,000, resulting in a punitive damage award of $ 6,200,000).

n131. Wetherbee v. United Ins. Co. of Am., 18 Cal. App. 3d 266, 95 Cal. Rptr. 678 (1971); K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 63-64 (citing Malcolm v. Little, 295 A.2d 711 (Del. 1972)). The imprecise nature of the rule is exemplified by the charge of the trial court that was approved on appeal by the Fifth Circuit in Martin v. Texaco, Inc., 726 F.2d 207 (5th cir. 1984). The trial court, in instructing the jury on the standard for measuring punitive awards under Texas law, stated:

The appropriate ratio will vary from case to case, depending on such factors as the character of the wrongful conduct, the extent to which the defendant is involved in the conduct and the extent to which that conduct offends a public sense of justice and propriety. A very recent court decision, last week as a matter of fact, listed five relevant factors for reviewing a jury's award of punitive damages, as follows: (1) The nature of the wrong; (2) The character of the conduct involved; (3) The degree of culpability of the wrongdoer; (4) The situation and sensibility of the parties; (5) The extent to which defendant's conduct offends a public sense of justice and propriety. Clearly, ladies and gentlemen, this is not an exact science, but is a concept that is very well dealt with by a jury. Now, for your further guidance, I have a few additional instructions. If you find liability in this case, then the decision is solely yours; consider the five guidelines that I gave you and find exemplary damages that you find appropriate in this case.

Id. at 213-14.

n132. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 64.

n133. See Maxey v. Freightliner Corp., 665 F.2d 1367, 1377-78 (5th Cir. 1982) (Fifth Circuit adopted the factors set forth in Alamo Nat'l Bank v. Kraus 616 S.W.2d 908 (Tex. 1981), but found that the defendant's behavior did not justify an award of $ 10,000,000 in punitive damages based on a compensatory award of $ 150,000); Alamo, 616 S.W.2d at 910 (court held that appellate court's review of these factors was not an erroneous standard, and allowed $ 500,000 in punitive damages and $ 12,900 in compensatory damages to stand); see also Leimgruber v. Claridge Assocs., 73 N.J. 450, 456-61, 375 A.2d 652, 655-58 (1977) (court upheld award of $ 16,500 in punitive and $ 1700 in compensatory damages because the awards did not "give rise to the inference of mistake, passion, prejudice, or partiality," "shock the conscience," or "result in a manifest denial of justice"). The Leimgruber court alluded to the following factors: (1) the nature of wrongdoing; (2) the extent of harm; (3) the intent of party committing the act; (4) the wealth of the perpetrator; and (5) any mitigating circumstance that may reduce damages. Id. at 456, 375 A.2d at 656-57. The court in Alley v. Gubser Dev. Co., 569 F. Supp. 36, 40 (D. Colo. 1983), articulated a similar standard of analysis. Another variant of this approach is reflected in Cates v. Eddy, 669 P.2d 912, 921 (Wyo. 1983). California predicates an award for punitive damages on a combination of three factors: the nature of defendant's acts; the amount of compensatory damages awarded; and the wealth of the defendant. See Professional Seminar Consultants v. Sino Am. Tech. Exch. Council, 727 F.2d 1470, 1473 (9th Cir. 1984) (applying California law); Neal v. Farmer's Ins. Exch., 21 Cal. 3d 910, 582 P.2d 980, 148 Cal. Rptr. 389 (1978); see also Comment, Punitive Damages and the Reasonable Relation Rule: A Study in Frustration of Purpose, 9 PAC. L.J. 823 (1978).

REV_00263595

n134. Morris, Punitive Damages in Tort Cases, 44 HARV. L. REV. 1173, 1180 (1931).

n135. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 43.

n136. See K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 61; Ellis, supra note 10, at 54; Special Project, supra note 2, at 695-96. Three states, Alabama, Kentucky, and Texas, do not allow consideration of the defendant's wealth. Special Project, supra note 2, at 696 n.753; see also RESTATMMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 908 (1979) (trier of fact may consider defendant's wealth in assessing punitive awards).

n137. Ellis, supra note 10, at 61.

n138. Neal v. Farmers Ins. Exch. 21 Cal. 3d 910, 929, 582 P.2d 980, 991, 148 Cal. Rptr. 389, 400 (1978) (award of $ 740,000 in punitive damages proper when it amounts to less than a week's worth of defendant's net income); Moore v. American United Life Ins. Co., 150 Cal. App. 3d 610, , 197 Cal. Rptr. 878, 899 (1984) (amount equal to 3.4 weeks of company's net annual income is appropriate).

n139. Hall v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 252 N.W.2d 421, 424 (Iowa 1977).

n140. Morris, supra note 133, at 1191.

n141. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 61-62.

n142. Id. at 62.

n143. See, e.g., Texas Pub. Utils. Corp. v. Edwards, 99 S.W.2d 420, 427 (Tex. Civ. App. 1936) (improper for plaintiff's counsel to argue to jury that it should assess large punitive damages because defendant could afford to pay them).

n144. See, e.g., Eisert v. Greenberg Roofing & Sheet Metal Co., 314 N.W.2d 226, 228-29 (Minn. 1982).

n145. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 101-09.

REV_00263596

n146. The Restatement of Contracts provides that, "Punitive damages are not recoverable for breach of contract." RESTATEMENT OF CONTRACTS § 342 (1932); see Note, supra note 16, at 531. The author emphasizes, however, that courts will allow punitive damages in many modern torts that are closely related to breach of contract, such as inducing another to breach a contract and wrongful termination of services by a public utility. Id.; see Royal Typewriter Co. v. Xerographic Supplies Corp., 719 F.2d 1092, 1106 (11th Cir. 1983) (Florida does not allow punitive damages awards for breach of warranty claims under the Uniform Commercial Code); Saval v. BL Ltd., 710 F.2d 1027, 1033 (4th Cir. 1983) (Maryland does not permit punitive damages for contract breaches absent malice); Superior Trucks, Inc. v. Allen, 664 S.W.2d 136 (Tex. Ct. App. 1983) (exemplary damages not allowed for breach of warranty); Ryan Mortgage Investors v. Fleming-Wood, 650 S.W.2d 928, 937 (Tex. Ct. App. 1983) (exemplary damages not permitted for breach of contract).

n147. See, e.g., Canada Dry Corp. v. Nehi Beverage Co., 723 F.2d 512, 524 (7th Cir. 1983) (applying Indiana law); Henderson v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 620 F.2d 530 (5th Cir. 1980) (applying Mississippi law), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1034 (1980); Robison v. Katz, 94 N.M. 314, 610 P.2d 201 (1980).

n148. See, e.g., Smith v. Hawkins, 120 Kan. 518, 243 P. 1018 (1926); Baumle v. Verde, 33 Okla. 243, 124 P. 1083 (1912); see also K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 41.

n149. See, e.g., Birmingham Water Works Co. v. Keiley, 2 Ala. App. 629, 56 So. 838 (1911); Kohler v. Kansas Power & Light Co., 192 Kan. 226, 387 P.2d 149 (1963); Southwestern Gas & Elce. Co. v. Stanley, 45 S.W.2d 671 (Tex. Civ. App. 1931), aff'd, 123 Tex. 157, 70 S.W.2d 413 (1934); see also K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 41.

n150. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 41; see Sullivan, Punitive Damages in the Law of Contract: The Reality and the Illusion of Legal Change, 61 MINN. L. REV. 207 (1977). For a discussion of the allowance of punitive damages for tortious breach of contractual duties when a fidiciary duty exists, when an independent tort accompanies the breach of contract, when the defendant's conduct is also fraudulent, and when the defendant failed to deal fairly and in good faith, see K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 52-53.

n151. Comment, Disallowing Punitive Damages for Wrongful Death While Allowing Them for Personal Injury and Property Damage Held To Be a Denial of Equal Protection, 8 CUM. L. REV. 567, 574-76 (1977). The author indicates that only 18 states allow recovery of punitive damages in wrongful death actions. Id. at 574-75. Alabama occupies the unique position of allowing only punitive damages in wrongful death actions. Eich v. Town of Gulf Shores, 293 Ala. 95, 300 So. 2d 354 (1974); see also Rosenfeld v. Isaacs, 79 A.D.2d 630, 631, 433 N.Y.S.2d 623, 624 (1980).

n152. In re Air Crash Disaster Near Chicago, 644 F.2d 594 (7th Cir. cert. denied, 454 U.S. 878 (1981).

n153. Id. at 632-33; accord, In re Paris Air Crash, 622 F.2d 1315 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 976 (1980); Eisert v. Greenberg Roofing & Sheet Metal Co., 314 N.W.2d 226 (Minn. 1982).

n154. See Boies v. Cole, 99 Ariz. 198, 407 P.2d 917 (1965); Gavica v. Hanson, 101 Idaho 58, 608 P.2d 861 (1980); Heil Co. v. Grant, 534 S.W.2d 916, 926 (Tex. Civ. App. 1976); Behrens v. Raleigh Hills Hosp. Inc., 675 P.2d 1179 (Utah 1983).

n155. See, e.g., Tarasoff v. Regents of the University of California, 17 Cal. 3d 425, 45 551 P.2d 334, 353, 131 Cal. Rptr. 14, 33, (1976) (allowance of punitive damages in tort actions generally is applicable only to survival actions and not to wrongful death actions); ILL. REV.

REV_00263597

STAT. ch. 111 2/3, § 77 (1966 & Supp. 1984-1985) (permits punitive damages in survival actions under the express provisions of the Public Utilities Act).

n156. See, e.g., Barnes v. Smith, 305 F.2d 226 (10th Cir. 1962); Sullivan v. Associated Billposters and Distribs. of United States and Canada, 6 F.2d 1000 (2nd Cir. 1925); Sanchez v. Marguez, 457 F. Supp. 359 (D. Colo. 1978) (statutory prohibition); Paul v. Milburn, 275 F. Supp. 105 (W.D. Tenn. 1967); Ford Motor Credit Co. v. Hill, 245 F. Supp. 796 (W.D. Mo. 1965); Amos v. Prom, 115 F. Supp. 127 (N.D. Iowa 1953); Holm Timber Indus. v. Plywood corp. of Am., 242 Cal. App. 2d 492, 51 Cal. Rptr. 597 (1966); Simone v. McKee, 142 Cal. App. 2d 307, 298 P.2d 667 (1956); Rowen v. LeMars Mut. Ins. Co., 282 N.W.2d 639 (Iowa 1979); Wolder v. Rahm, 249 N.W.2d 630 (Iowa 1977); Stevenson v. Stoufer, 237 Iowa 513, 21 N.W.2d 287 (1946); Thompson v. Estate of Petroff, 319 N.W.2d 400 (Minn. 1982); Mervis v. Wolverton, 211 So. 2d 847 (Miss. 1968) (statutory prohibition); Summa Corp. v. Greenspun, 96 Nev. 247, 607 P.2d 569 (1980) modified, 98 Nev. Adv. Ops. 157, 655 P.2d 513 (1982); Allen v. Anderson, 93 Nev. 204, 562 P.2d 487 (1977); Gordon v. Nathan, 43 A.D.2d 917, 352 N.Y.S.2d 464 (1974) (statutory prohibition); Thorpe v. Wilson, 58 N.C. App. 292, 293 S.E.2d 675 (1982); McAdams v. Blue, 3 N.C. App. 169, 164 S.E.2d 490 (1968); Morriss v. Barton, 200 Okla. 4, 190 P.2d 451 (1947); Pearson v. Galvin, 253 Or. 331, 454 P.2d 638 (1969); Ashcraft v. Saunders, 251 Or. 139, 444 P.2d 924 (1968); Hayes v. Gill, 216 Tenn. 39, 390 S.W.2d 213 (1965); Dalton v. Johnson, 204 Va. 102, 129 S.E.2d 647 (1963).

n157. Allen v. Anderson, 562 P.2d at 489-90. The Restatement (Second) of Torts also adopts this view:

Under statutes providing for the survival or revival of tort actions, the damages for a tort not involving death for which the tortfeasor is responsible are not affected by the death of either party before or during trial, except that . . . the death of the tortfeasor terminates liability for punitive damages.

RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 926(b)(1979).

n158. Johnson v. Rinesmith, 238 So.2d 659 (Fla. App. 1969); National Bank of Bloomington v. Norfolk & Western Railway Co., 73 Ill. App. 2d 160, 383 N.E.2d 919 (1978); Perry v. Melton, 299 S.E.2d 8 (W. Va. 1982); Hofer v. Lavender, No. C-2552 (Tex. July 11, 1984).

n159. Special Project, supra note 2, at 830. Traditionally, the mere sale of a corporation does not impose liability on the successor for the tort liabilities of the predecessor. See Travis v. Harris Corp., 565 F.2d 443 (7th Cir. 1977); Knapp v. North Am. Rockwell Corp., 506 F.2d 361 (3d Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 965 (1975); Cyr. v. B. Offen & Co., 501 F.2d 1145 (1st Cir. 1974); Shane v. Hobam, Inc., 332 F. Supp. 526 (E.D. Pa. 1971); Kloberdanz v. Joy Mfg. Co., 288 F. Supp. 817 (D. Colo. 1968). There are four generally recognized exceptions in which liability may be imposed on the successor: contractual assumption of the tort liabilities of the predecessor; a transaction that is tantamount to a merger of the predecessor with the successor corporation; the operation of the predecessor as a mere continuation of itself through the successor corporation; and the fraudulent transfer of assets in an effort by the predecessor to escape liability. See Leannais v. Cincinnati, Inc., 565 F.2d 437 (7th Cir. 1977); R. G. Enstrom Corp. v. Interceptor Corp., 555 F.2d 277, 278 (10th Cir. 1977); Knapp v. North Am. Rockwell, 506 F.2d 361 (3d Cir.) cert. denied, 421 U.S. 965 (1974); Bonee v. L & M Const. Co., 518 F. Supp. 375 (M.D. Tenn. 1981); Menacho v. Adamson United Co., 420 F. Supp. 128 (D. N.J. 1976); Hernandez v. Johnson Press Corp., 70 Ill. App. 3d 664, 388 N.E.2d 778 (1979). Recently, some jurisdictions have rejected the general rule that precluded successor liability in favor of "product line" liability based on the socioeconomic policy of risk distribution. See Amader v. Johns-Manville Corp., 541 F. Supp. 1384 (E.D. Pa. 1982); Ray v. Alad Corp., 19 Cal. 3d 22, 560 P.2d 3 (1977); Ramirez v. Amsted Indus., Inc., 86 N.J. 332, 431 A.2d 811 (1981). More recent decisions have categorically rejected the product line concept of liability. Weaver v. Nash Int'l, Inc., 562 F. Supp. 860 (S.D. Iowa 1983); Cowan v. Harris Corp., PROD. LIAB. PEP. (CCH) P9667 (D. Kan. Dec. 7, 1982); Gonzalez v. Rock Wool Eng'g & Equip. Co., 117 Ill. App. 3d 435, 453 N.E.2d 762 (1983); Fenton Area Public Schools v. Sorensen-Gross Constr. Co., 124 Mich. App. 631, 335 N.W.2d 221 (1983). Punitive damages could not be imposed on a successor corporation under the standard that requires the vicariously liable entity to have authorized its employees or agents to engage in the intentional, wanton, or willful conduct at the time of the product's design and marketing. See supra notes 105-09 and accompanying text.

REV_00263598

n160. Special Project, supra note 2, at 832-33.

n161. See, e.g., Neal v. Carey Canadian Mines, Ltd., 548 F. Supp. 357, 391 (E.D. Pa. 1982) (successor corporation liable for punitive damages arising from tort that predecessor corporation committed because "successor is essentially identical to that of the predecessor corporation"). Recently, in Martin v. Johns-Manville Corp., 469 A.2d 655 (Pa. Super. 1983), appeal filed, Apr. 2, 1984, the Pennsylvania Superior Court authorized the award of punitive damages from a successor corporation as the result of the plaintiffs sustaining bronchogenic carcinoma from exposure to asbestos supplied by defendant's predecessor corporation. Relying on Campus Sweater & Sportwear Co. v. M.B. Kahn Constr. Co., 515 F. Supp. 64, 107 (D.S.C. 1979), aff'd, 644 F.2d 877 (4th Cir. 1981), Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 47 (Alaska 1979) cert. denied 454 U.S. 894 (1981) and Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp. 297 N.W.2d 727, 741 (Minn. 1979), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 921 (1980), the Martin court held that punitive damages constituted a deterrent against manufacturers maximizing profits by marketing defective products. The court also addressed the issue of imposing punitive damages on a successor corporation not responsible for manufacturing and marketing the defective product. The court declared:

We believe, however, that in some circumstances a successor should be held accountable for the recklessness of its predecessor. This will be so when the goals that underlie the imposition of punitive damages -- punishment and deterrence -- will be advanced. . . . The fact that the successor does not continue the product line recklessly marketed by the predecessor, or cures the defect, will not necessarily preclude punitive damages. . . . We therefore hold that punitive damages are recoverable against a successor corporation when the plaintiff has shown such a degree of identity of the successor with its predecessor as to justify the conclusion that those responsible for the reckless conduct of the predecessor will be punished, and the successor will be deterred from similar conduct.

469 A.2d at 667. The extension of punitive damages to an innocent successor corporate entity demonstrates the blind commitment of courts to this archaic doctrine and a certain naivete as to the economic effects of the imposition of punitive damages.

n162. See, e.g., Sheats v. Bowen, 318 F. Supp. 640 (D.C. Del. 1970); Kohl v. Graham, 202 F. Supp 895 (D.C. Colo. 1962); Atlanta Life Ins. Co. v. Stanley, 276 Ala. 642, 165 So.2d 731, 738 (1964) (when husband can prove loss of society because of wife's injuries, "the assessment of reasonable compensation therefore must necessarily be left to the sound dicretion of the jury") (emphasis added).

n163. See, e.g., Fireman's Fund Am. Ins. Co. v. Coleman, 394 So. 2d 334, 341 (Ala. 1980) (only damages for loss of services allowed in derivative actions by spouses); Moran v. Stephens, 265 So. 2d 379, 380 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1972) (husband cannot recover punitive damages in derivative action to his wife's action for dog attack injuries); Hammond v. North Am. Asbestosis Corp., 105 Ill. App. 3d 1033, 435 N.E.2d 540 (1982), aff'd, 454 N.E.2d 210 (Ill. 1983); Hughey v. Ausborn, 249 S.C. 470, 154 S.E.2d 839, 842 (1967) (the intentional wrong is not committed against the spouse).

n164. Dorsey v. Continental casualty Co., 730 F.2d 675 (1984); Northwestern Nat'l Co. v.

REV_00263599

McNulty, 307 F.2d 432 (5th Cir. 1962); City of Products Corp. v. Globe Indem. Co., 88 Cal. App. 3d 31, 151 Cal. Rptr. 494 (1979); Hartford Accident & Indem. Co. v. United States Concrete Pipe Co., 369 So. 2d 451 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1979); Brown v. Western Casualty & Sur. Co., 484 P.2d 1252 (Colo. App. 1971); Guaranty Abstract and Title Co. v. Interstate Fire and Casualty Co., 228 Kan. 532, 618 P.2d 1195 (1980).

n165. See Price v. Hartford Accident & Indemnity Co., 108 Ariz. 485, 502 P.2d 522 (1972); City of Cedar Rapids v. Northwestern Nat'l Ins. Co., 304 N.W.2d 22, (Iowa 1981); First Nat'l Bank of St. Mary's v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 283 Md. 228, 389 A.2d 359 (1978); Anthony v. Frith, 394 So. 2d 867 (Miss. 1981); Harrell v. Travelers Indem. Co., 279 Or. 199, 567 P.2d 1013 (1977); Lazenby v. Universal Underwriters Ins. Co., 214 Tenn. 639, 383 S.W.2d 1 (1964); Hensley v. Erie Ins. Co., 283 S.E.2d 227 (W. Va. 1981).

n166. Duffy, supra note 9, at 8; Ellis, supra note 10, at 20; Special Project, supra note 2, at 695.

n167. See, e.g., Maxey v. Freightliner Corp., 665 F.2d 1367, 1369 (5th Cir. 1982) aff'd, 722 F.2d 1238, 1242 (5th Cir. 1984) (court found evidence inadequate to support jury verdict of $ 10,000,000 in punitive damages, but on appeal following remand affirmed the trial court's remittitur of the award to $ 450,000); Dorsey v. Honda Motor Co., 655 F.2d 650, 654-58 (5th Cir. 1981) ($ 5,000,000 verdict upheld), modified, 670 F.2d 21, cert. denied, 459 U.S. 880 (1982); Airco, Inc. v. Simmons First Nat'l Bank, 276 Ark. 486, 492, 638 S.W.2d 660, 663 (1982) (upholding award of $ 3,000,000 as vindictive damages); Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 821-24, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348, 389-91 (1981) (affirming trial court decision to reduce $ 125,000,000 jury verdict to $ 3,500,000); Palmer v. A.H. Robins Co., No. 81SA149 (Colo. June 4, 1984) (en banc) (approving $ 6,200,000 in punitive damages compared to an award of $ 600,000 in compensatory damages); Toyota Motor Co. v. Moll, 438 So. 2d 192 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1983) (approving $ 3,000,000 punitive damages award); Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727, 741 (Minn. 1980) (affirming punitive damages in amount of $ 1,000,000) cert. denied, 449 U.S. 921 (1980).

n168. Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 839 (2d Cir. 1967). Another jurist noted that the destructive economic effects of punitive damages awards will impact "upon business and professional persons, firms and corporations, as well as upon ordinary persons when engaged in a wide variety of activities." Harrell v. Travelers Indem. Co., 279 Or. 199, 209-10, 567 P.2d 1013, 1018 (1977). As an example, see Ratner v. Sioux Natural Gas Corp., 719 F.2d 801, 805 (5th cir. 1983), acknowledging that allowance of an award of punitive damages against a bankrupt corporation would deprive legitimate creditors of any recovery and "would be overkill."

n169. Ellis, supra note 10, at 33-63; Owen, supra note 9, at 119-21; Sales, supra note 2, at 380-81.

n170. See Sales, supra note 2, at 380. The Court in Moore v. Remington Arms Co., 100 Ill. App. 3d 1102, 1111, 427 N.E.2d 608, 616-17 (1981), however, noted: "The tide has since turned; judgments for punitive damages are now routinely entered across the nation, and staggering sums have been awarded."

n171. Special Project, supra note 2, at 806-45. Manville Corp., Unarco, and Amatex Corp. have declared bankruptcy under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978 because of litigation expenses, and compensatory and punitive damage awards related to asbestos cases. Id. at 808.

n172. See Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 727 F.2d 506 (5th Cir.), reh'g en banc granted, F.2d (5th Cir. 1984) (discussed supra notes 123-26 and accompanying text).

REV_00263600

essentially unlimited compensatory damages serve as a more than adequate economic incentive for initiating civil litigation. By purpose and definition, the civil law historically has evolved to compensate and not to punish, [35] and in today's tort reparations system, compensatory damages [*1124] more than adequately fulfill this mission of total and complete reparations. This last justification for the punitive damage concept within the tort reparations system, therefore, not only is suspect, but more importantly, is inherently flawed.

B. Status of Punitive Damages Today

The first American enunciation of the theory of punitive damages occurred in 1791 when a New Jersey court charged the jury in Coryell v. Colbaugh [36] that "they were not to estimate the damages by any particular proof of suffering or actual loss" but, instead, should "give damages for example's sake, to prevent such offenses in future." [37] The Coryell court also stated that the damages should be "such a sum as would mark their disapprobation, and be an example to others." [38] Despite this clear characterization of the purpose of the punitive damages as deterrence, some historical confusion existed concerning the ultimate reasoning that lay at the root of punitive awards. [39] Whatever justification may be advanced to support the punitive damage concept, however, most commentators today acknowledge that the modern bases undergirding the theory in the United States are punishment and deterrence. [40] The status of the punitive damage doctrine in today's tort environment, however, remains remarkably unsettled. Jurisdictions disagree over the applicability of punitive damages in civil actions, and even those states embracing the punitive damages concept differ as to application. [41]

The majority of jurisdictions endorse punitive damages as a [*1125] component of the common law. [42] A minority of jurisdictions, nevertheless, prohibit the recovery of punitive damages under the common law. [43] Two of these jurisdictions allow punitive damages only in the narrow context of statutorily authorized situations. [44] At least three jurisdictions either totally or partially proscribe the use of punitive damages in all civil cases. [45] Additionally, four jurisdictions, despite judicial declarations that punitive damages constitute an integral part of the common law, so severely limit the scope and application of the doctrine that, in essence, punitive damages have been reduced to nothing more than compensatory damages. [46]

[*1126] III. BASIS FOR APPLYING THE PUNITIVE DAMAGE DOCTRINE

The generally accepted bases for punitive damages in those jurisdictions that have adopted the concept are punishment and deterrence. [47] Some jurisdictions adopt only one or the other of these rationales, while others adopt the dual rationales. Some jurisdictions still view punitive damages as an additional award to allowable compensatory sums -- to compensate for perceived gaps in reparations, as was practiced during the colonial era.

A. Punishment and Deterrence

The great majority of jurisdictions that currently authorize the recovery of noncompensatory, punitive damages adopt the dual rationales of punishment and deterrence as justification for their position. [48] One commentator offered seven legal theories in support of the punitive damage concept. [49] He acknowledged, however, that any legal doctrine that is predicated on such a disparate variety of grounds "may reasonably be suspected of resting on no very firm basis in policy." [50] Consequently, he reduced these seven rationale to two fundamental tenets: wrong-doers deserve punishment beyond that which compensatory damages provide, and the judicial system needs punitive damages to deter socially harmful, loss creating conduct by defendants. [51] A number of recent cases echo these incantations to justify the use of punitive measures. [52]

[*1127] Courts generally are quick to assert that they fully control the extent of

REV_00263565

n173. Owen, supra note 88, at 1257.

n174. Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, 49 U. CHI. L. REV. 1, 6 (1981); see Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 841 (1967) (the impracticality of imposing an effective ceiling on punitive awards in hundreds of cases against a single manufacturer, when added to large compensatory damages, could lead to catastrophic awards).

n175. Owen, supra note 174, at 57.

n176. Owen, supra note 9, at 119 (suggesting upper limit of greater of (1) double the compensatory damages, or (2) litigation costs plus $ 10,000); Owen, supra note 174, at 48 (suggesting possible upper limit on punitive damages of $ 1,000,00 per plaintiff).

n177. Duffy, supra note 9, at 11 (trial tactics now are geared to exploit the punitive damages doctrine).

n178. Special Project, supra note 2, at 840 (five asbestos manufacturers formed an alliance to reduce the risk of any defendant "settling out" on the others).

n179. Riegel v. Aastad, 272 A.2d 715, 717-18 (Del. 1970). One reason that appellate courts find it difficult to overturn punitive damage awards is because the standards of review by which courts evaluate the excessiveness of these awards are extremely unclear. See, e.g., Professional Seminar Consultants v. Sino Am. Technology Exch. Council, Inc., 727 F.2d 1470, 1473 (9th Cir. 1984). The Ninth Circuit recognized in Professional Seminar Consultants that the standard of review for punitive damages in California is unclear. Compare Cher v. Forum Int'l, Ltd., 692 F.2d 634, 640 (9th Cir. 1982) (clearly erroneous standard), cert. denied 103 S. Ct. 3089 (1983) with Hasson v. Ford Motor Co., 32 Cal. 3d 388, 650 P.2d 1171, 185 Cal. Rptr. 654 (1982) (substantial evidence standad), cert. dismissed, 103 S. Ct. 1167 (1983). Judicial failure within a particular jurisdiction to provide even a consistent standard of review to prevent punitive damages from getting completely out of hand is disconcerting.

n180. Riegel v. Aastad, 272 A.2d at 718.

n181. See, e.g., Dorsey v. Honda Motor Co., 655 F.2d 650, 657 (5th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 1778 modified, 670 F.2d 21 (5th Cir. 1982) (actual damages of $ 750,000 and punitive damages of $ 5,000,000 affirmed); Airco, Inc. v. Simmons First Nat'l Bank, 276 Ark. 486, 638 S.W.2d 660 (1982) (actual damages of $ 1,070,000 and punitive damages of $ 3,000,000 affirmed); Vossler v. Richards Mfg. Co., 143 Cal. App. 3d 952, 192 Cal. Rptr. 219 (1983) (actual damages of $ 25,000 and punitive damages of $ 500,000 affirmed); Palmer v. A.H. Robins Co., No. 81SA149 (Colo. June 4, 1984 (en banc) (actual damages of $ 600,000 and punitive damages of $ 6,200,000 approved as reasonable); Ford Motor Co. v. Nowak, 638 S.W.2d 582, 585 (Tex. Ct. App. 1982) (actual damages of $ 400,000 and punitive damages of $ 4,000,000 affirmed).

n182. For example, in Jampole v. Touchy, 673 S.W.2d 569 (Tex. 1984), the Texas Supreme Court authorized virtually unlimited discovery and noted, "The documents showing GMC's knowledge of alternative designs are relevant to show conscious indifference in support of Jampole's claim of gross negligence." Id. at 573. Similarly, in General Motors Corporation v. Lawrence, 651 S.W.2d 732 (Tex. 1983), Justice Ray, in a concurring opinion relating to a discovery order, commented: "The scope of discovery in product defect cases may be permissibly wider, especially when the plaintiff is alleging grounds for the award of exemplary damages." Id. at 734. Similarly, the inclination to expand discovery for punitive allegations is reflected in other jurisdictions. See, e.g., Vollert v. Summa Corp., 389 F. Supp. 1348 (D.C. Hawaii 1975); Hughes v. Graves, 47 F.R.D 52 (W.D. Mo. 1969); Coy v. Superior Court of n183. An example of the public's concern with the effect of unwarranted settlements is reflected in an editorial appearing in the Houston Post, September 3, 1984. Commenting on a lawsuit that was tried in the District Court in San Antonio, Texas and then settled with General Motors, the editorial stated:

REV_00263601

Contra Costa County, 23 Cal. Rptr. 393, 373 P.2d 457 (1962); Kuiper v. District Court of Eighth Judicial District, 632 P.2d 694, 702 (Mont. 1981).

A lawsuit settled out of court last week in San Antonio is an example of how far downhill our legal system has tumbled.

The passenger in a Pontiac TransAm sued General Motors for $ 50,000,000 after he was seriously injured in an accident. Testimony indicated the driver was drunk and traveling at 90 miles per hour.

But instead of suing the driver, the injured passenger sued GM, alleging the auto maker's advertising of the TransAm made the driver believe it was a stunt vehicle that could perform beyond the limits of a normal production car.

To any reasonable person, three errors are obvious in the story. First, the wrong party was sued. The driver was at fault, not General Motors. It seems no one these days is willing to take responsibility for his own actions. It's always someone else's fault. However, it doesn't take too much imagination to figure out why GM was sued instead of the driver: GM is richer.

Second, GM should not have settled. This is perhaps more understandable; GM wanted to avoid a long trial and the publicity.

Third, and the most obvious of all, the court should have thrown the lawsuit out at the first hearing. Judges and prosecutors repeatedly tell us dockets are overcrowded, but it is hard to empathize when frivolous lawsuits like this one are allowed to proceed." Houston Post, Sept. 3, 1984, at 13, col. 1.

n184. See Western Union Tel. Co. v. Guard, 283 Ky. 187, 197, 139 S.W.2d 722, 727 (1940); see also W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 2, at 7.

n185. Dean Prosser referred to punitive damages as an "anomalous respect" in which "the ideas underlying the criminal law have invaded the field of torts." W. PROSSER, supra note 35, § 2, at 9.

n186. Bass v. Chicago & N.W. Ry., 42 Wis. 654, 672 (1877). Interestingly enough, the Bass opinion went on to accept the theory of punitive damages because of stare decisis. Wisconisn recently continued this inexplicable adherence to an outdated doctrine in Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 279-80, 294 N.W.2d 437, 448 (1980):

Although controversy continues to surround the doctrine of punitive damages in the twentieth century, and although some have questioned whether tort law -- which is designed to compensate an injured plaintiff -- should also serve the function of the criminal law, i.e., to punish a defendant for the purpose of deterring him and others from further offenses, this court has consistently and frequently said that punishment and deterrence are important considerations in the law of torts in Wisconsin.

n187. Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. 342, 382 (1873). Unlike Wisconsin, see supra note 186 and accompanying text, New Hampshire followed its instincts and limited punitive damages to a compensatory nature.

REV_00263602

n188. Duffy, supra note 9, at 10.

n189. For example, juries have unlimited discretion in determining the amounts of punitive awards, whereas criminal fines must be fixed, and the burden of proof of civil punitive damage liability is established by a preponderance of the evidence and not evidence beyond a reasonable doubt. Likewise, civil defendants do not receive the protection against double jeopardy and, therefore, are subject to civil punitive damages and criminal fines for the same act. Similarly, civil defendants are subject to punitive awards on behalf of innumerable plaintiffs, thereby making any upper limit of liability nonexistent. Also, most crimes require a guilty intent. Finally, civil defendants subject to exemplary damages do not enjoy the protection against self-incrimination. See W. PROSSER, supra note 35, § 2, at 11; Duffy, supra note 9, at 9; Sales, supra note 2, at 363-64; see also Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 839 (punitive damages could amount to tens of millions of dollars while the maximum criminal penalty would be three years imprisonment and a $ 10,000 fine for each of 12 violations).

n190. See K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 630 ("The imposition of punitive damages is particularly offensive in the field of vicarious liability . . .").

n191. One scholar has stated:

If the purpose of awarding punitive damages is to compensate, the normal public policy reason for imposing vicarious liability would appear applicable. But if the purpose of punitive damages is to deter, as it is in the vast majority of jurisdictions today, the penalty is certainly of questionable effectiveness and justice if not imposed on the employee. The inequity is especially acute in the case of corporations where innocent stockholders ultimately bear the punitive burden.

K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 35.

n192. Id. at 631.

n193. The "deep pocket" theory rests upon "the desire to insure that victims of tortious injury can reach a defendant with sufficient wealth to provide adequate compensation." Ellis, supra note 10, at 64. Employers generally are better able to meet this compensatory burden. Id. at 64-65.

n194. See Duffy, supra note 9, at 12-13. The concerns of the "deep pocket" rationale for uncompensated plaintiffs obviously do not apply to punitive damages, which theoretically perform direct punitive and deterrent functions. Ellis, supra note 10, at 65.

n195. 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (1982); see Smith v. Wade, 103 S. Ct. 1625 (1983) (defendant's conduct must be motivated by evil motive or intent).

n196. See City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247 (1981) (municipality may be held vicariously liable for acts of its employees).

n197. Duffy, supra note 9, at 12-13.

n198. Id. Many courts accept deterrence as one of the bases for punitive damages. See supra notes 47-60 & 64-70 and accompanying text. Deterrence can be specific -- of the individual defendant -- or general -- of other possible defendants. The strongest deterrence argument for punitive damages is specific deterrence. Some doubt exists as to whether exemplary awards accomplish this specific goal, and no empirical studies exist. Duffy, supra note 9, at 10-11. This uncertainty is especially strong when the individual defendant to be deterred is a corporate entity. The imposition of a punitive award cannot deter an employer if the employee's act is intentional. Conversely, the employee will not be deterred when the employer is made to pay a punitive award. Ellis, supra note 10, at 68-69. Moreover, the best selection and supervision methods available do not, and cannot, prevent occasional impulsive behavior by employees, and the larger the employer the less any possible deterrent effect because the large employer simply lacks that degree of total control and supervision of employees. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 2.08, at 19-21.

REV_00263603

The general deterrent effect of punitive damages, likewise, is highly doubtful. Several noted authors term it "highly unlikely" that the civil law imposition of punitive damages will achieve the same goal of deterrence associated with the criminal law because: most people do not know what punitive damages are; those people who generally know what punitive damages are, do not know enough to appreciate the intended deterrent effect; and even sophisticated members of the public are compelled to make "judgment calls" regarding the type of conduct that will be subject to punitive damages. Id. § 2.09, at 23-24; see K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 116 ("there is really nothing for which the employer can be punished, and . . . punitive liability is unlikely to encourage employers to use more care in screening or training their employees").

n199. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 631.

n200. Schwartz, Deterrence and Punishment in the Common Law of Punitive Damages: A Comment, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 133, 141 (1982) (discussing the decision in Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 174 Cal. Rptr, 348 (1981), in which the appellate court affirmed the trial judge's reduction of punitive award from $ 125,000,000 to $ 3,500,000, but implied that it would have affirmed the trial court's acceptance of the $ 125,000,000 award or a reduction to $ 1,000,000).

n201. Duffy, supra note 9, at 10; see Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d at 841 (compensatory awards have punitive elements, which would be more pronounced if punitive damages were eliminated).

n202. Realistically, employees of an employer or corporate entity seldom, if ever, indemnify the vicariously liable employer. Consequently, the ultimate "punishment" administered by the punitive damage doctrine is assessed in the form of higher insurance premiums, higher prices for services, and higher product costs that are spread across the entire section of innocent consumers or taxpayers. Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d at 841. Likewise, creditors, sellers, suppliers, and distributors ultimately may pay the cost of the punishment meted out by the punitive damage doctrine without ever having committed a wrongful act. Ellis, supra note 10, at 66; see K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 116 (losses will fall not on the employer, but on the public through price increases, or on innocent shareholders who never receive any benefit from the torts of corporate employees).

n203. J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 2.04, at 12.

n204. See supra notes 127-35 and accompanying text.

n205. See supra note 131 and accompanying text.

n206. Duffy, supra note 9, at 8; Sales, supra note 2, at 367 & n.82.

n207. As noted by the court in Leimgruber v. Claridge Assoc., 73 N.J. 450, 375 A.2d 652, 656 (1977):

The major difficulty in establishing the amount of the punitive damage recovery is the absence of any defeinitive [sic] standard or criterion to guide the trier of fact in determining the proper amount.

REV_00263604

One major objection to the "ratio" rule is that it collides with the rationale for imposing punitive damages which are awarded, as noted, on a theory of punishment and deterrence. . . .

n208. If courts intend punitive damages to punish the defendant, then the wrongdoer's conduct constitutes a more important consideration than the amount of damage the plaintiff suffers, although compensatory damages represent the basis against which the punitive damages are compared. Leimgruber v. Claridge Assoc., 73 N.J. 450, 375 A.2d, 656 (1977); see generally Ellis, supra note 10, at 58-59. Professor Ellis asserts that, although one can form arguments that will theoretically justify the ratio rule, in reality "it invites juries to engage in wealth redistribution and exacerbates the perverse incentives already created by uncertain standards of punitive damage liability and the lack of functional criteria for the magnitude of assessments." Id. at 62-63.

n209. These courts adopt the position of Lazenby v. Universal Underwriters Ins. Co., 214 Tenn. 639, 383 S.W.2d 1 (1964) (public policy not violated by allowance of insurance coverage for punitive damages). Almost all courts allow insurance coverage for vicarious punitive damage liability. Ellis, supra note 10, at 71 (citing Dayton Hudson Corp. v. American Mut. Liab. Ins. Co., 621 P.2d 1155, 1160 (Okla. 1980)); Morrissey, Punitive Damages -- Insurability, 25 TRIAL LAW. GUIDE 257 (1981); Owen, supra note 88, at 1313 n.276 (1976).

n210. See. Ellis, supra note 10, at 71 (citing Northwestern Nat'l Casualty Co. v. McNulty, 307 F.2d 432, 441-42 (5th Cir. 1962)). Recently, in United States Concrete Pipe Co. v. Bould, 437 So. 2d 1061 (Fla. 1983), the Florida Supreme Court determined that insurance coverage would apply to punitive damage liability of an entity deemed vicariously liable, but would not apply to the individual responsible for the egregious conduct.

n211. Ellis, supra note 10, at 74.

n212. First Bank v. Transamerica Ins. Co., F. Supp. (D.Mont. 1984) (implicit in the court's analysis is recognition of the fact that punitive damages serve as nothing more than windfalls for plaintiffs).

n213. Ellis, supra note 10, at 75-76. The Second Circuit has noted another dilemma that liability insurance raises. If courts allow liability insurance for punitive damages, then the cost of providing arguably needless deterrence rests on the consuming public. If courts do not allow such insurance, then a sufficient egregious mistake can destroy a business, thereby punishing innocent stockholders. Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d at 841.

n214. Even the ancient concept of satisfying the public's desire for revenge is outdated. As one author tersely observed, "vengeance is a questionable objective for a civilized legal system." Note, The Assessment of Punitive Damages Against an Entrepreneur for the Malicious Torts of His Employees, 70 YALE L.J. 1296, 1298 (1961). Society has long since progressed beyond the primitive concept of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.

n215. See supra notes 48-60 and accompanying text.

n216. See supra notes 71-76 and accompanying text.

n217. See supra notes 17-30 and accompanying text.

n218. Dillon v. Legg, 68 Cal. 2d 728, 730-31, 441 P.2d 912, 914, 69 Cal. Rptr. 72, 74 (1968) (en banc); Portee v. Jaffee, 417 A.2d 521 (N.J. 1980); W. PROSSER, supra note 34, § 12.

REV_00263605

n219. Ellis, supra note 10, at 16-17. Professor Ellis cites the interesting case of Forde v. Skinner, 172 Eng. Rep. 687 (Horsham Assizes 1830), in which the court held that cutting off the hair of female paupers in a poor house, if done "with the malicious intent imputed [by the evidence] of 'taking down their pride,' . . . that will be an aggravation and ought to increase the damages." Ellis, supra note 10, at 17.

n220. Ellis, supra note 10, at 28; see Sanchez v. Schindler, 651 S.W.2d 249 (Tex. 1983) (Texas Supreme Court rejected over 100 years of judicial interpretation of the Wrongful Death Act to redefine pecuniary loss to permit recovery of loss of society and mental anguish). Even recovery for emotional upset in the absence of any physical injury is now recoverable. See, e.g., Betancourt v. J. C. Penny Co., 554 F.2d 1206 (1st Cir. 1977).

n221. Spokane Truck & Dray Co. v. Hoefer, 2 Wash. 45, 25 P. 1072 (1891).

n222. Some commentators argue that "common sense makes it difficult to disbelieve that the possibility of a hefty punitive jury verdict would not deter a rational and reputable manufacturer." See J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHER, supra note 9, § 6.07, at 24. But see Ellis, supra note 10, at 3 n.9 ("The burden of persuasion lies with the proponents of imposing punitive damages; if the question of whether imposing punitive damages promotes valid objectives cannot be persuasively answered in the affirmative, the damages are not justifiable and should not be imposed"). The vague and meaningless nature of the "reckless and wanton" standard as a basis for imposing punitive damages is exemplified in International Armament Corp. v. King, 674 S.W.2d 431 (Tex. Civ. App. 1984).

n223. Ellis, supra note 10, at 2.

n224. See supra notes 77-103 and accompanying text. Professor Ellis asserts that the vagueness of standards for determining liability and the wide discretion of juries in determining amounts of punitive damages extends "liability far beyond that justified by fairness." Ellis, supra note 10, at 76.

n225. One authority has stressed that substituting the terms "outrageous" or "flagrant" for the current vague terms would be useless because these words are just as elastic as those now in use. Ellis, supra note 10, at 51. The courts must realize the importance of strictly construing even "deliberate intent," "ill motive," and "maliciousness" standards. See Cooter, supra note 8, at 80 (proposing that courts should allow punitive damages only for intentional faults, which would include only gross or repeated conduct).

A bill currently before the United States Senate would limit the imposition of punitive damages in product liability cases to situations in which the defendant manufacturer or product seller acted with "reckless disregard . . . for the safety of product users, consumers, or persons who might be harmed by the product." S. 44, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 12(a)(2) (1984). The Senate bill further defines "reckless disregard" as "conscious, flagrant indifference to the safety of those persons who might be harmed by a product and an extreme departure from accepted practice." Id. § 12(j) (emphasis added). A similar bill before the United States House of Representatives deletes the word "conscious" and would require only that the defendant act "with a flagrant indifference to consumer safety . . . and an extreme departure from accepted practice." H.R. 5214, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 11(b) (1984) (emphasis added).

n226. Professor Owen recently recommended that courts institute a "clear and convincing" evidentiary test. He recognized that such a test might sacrifice a degree of efficiency in favor of some fairness, but fairness over efficiency and the concept that close cases should be resolved in favor of the accused are exactly what the American legal system should epitomize. See Owen, supra note 9, at 118-19 (ratio of additional innocent parties who get punished to the number of additional guilty parties who get punished by an expansion of the rule of punitive damages may be unfairly high). In Gavica v. Hanson, 101 Idaho 58, 608 P.2d 861, 864 (1980), the court suggested that punitive damages generally are not favored and should be awarded only upon clear evidence. Similarly, in Town of Jackson v. Shaw, 569 P.2d 1246, 1252 (Wyo. 1977), the court observed that "[p]unitive damages are not a favorite of the law, are to be allowed only with caution within narrow limits and have been the subject of much controversy." And, in Gent v. Collinsville Volkswagen, Inc., 116 Ill. App. 3d 496, 451 N.E.2d 1385, 1391 (1983), the court acknowledged that "[b]ecause of the penal nature of such damages, . . . the law disfavors them. . . ." See Acosta v. Honda Motor Co. v. Moll, 717 F.2d 828, 839 (3d Cir. 1983) (en banc) (need to prove "outrageous" conduct by clear and convincing proof); Travelers Indem. Co. v. Armstrong, 442 N.E.2d 349, 360 (Ind. 1982) (the court announced a change to "clear and convincing evidence") S. 44, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 12(a)(2) (1984) (requiring "clear and convincing" proof); K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 124-25 (advocating that courts increase the burden of proof to a "clear and convincing" standard); see also Note, Criminal Safeguards and the Punitive Damages Defendant, 34 U. CHI. L. REV. 408 (1967).

REV_00263606

n227. See Schwartz, supra note 200, at 144 (the American legal tradition indicates that incriminating facts must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt before punishment can be inflicted, but under the punitive damage doctrine the civil law awards millions of dollars based on a preponderance of the evidence standard).

n228. Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d at 843. The Second Circuit required only that the plaintiff clearly establish the defendant's recklessness. The term "reckless" lends itself to much confusion and arbitrariness, and therefore, courts should employ the more stringent standards of deliberate intent or maliciousness.

n229. See H.R. 5214, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 11(b), (c) (1984) (proposing that the court, rather than the jury, decide punitive damage liability and amount). But see S. 44, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 12(b), (c) (1984) (proposing that court decide the amount of punitive damages, but allowing jury initially to determine if defendant is liable for them).

n230. See Mallor & Roberts, Punitive Damages: Toward a Principled Approach, 31 HASTINGS L.J. 639, 670 (1980) (suggesting that "the very power of the remedy demands that judges exercise close control over the imposition and assessment of punitive damages"); Owen, supra note 9, at 120 (recommending reallocation of judicial power because of the experience of judges and because judges have less rigid preconceptions that might bias decisions); see also Torres v. North Am. Van Lines, Inc., 135 Ariz. 35, 658 P.2d 835, 841 (1983) (discussion of the role of experienced trial judge controlling punitive damages award).

n231. See Schwartz, supra note 200, at 146-47 (a questionnaire that the California Legislature's Joint Committee on Tort Liability submitted to California's Superior Court judges indicated that 56% of those judges who responded favored vesting in the trial court the authority to determine both when to award punitive damages and in what amount); see also Mallor & Roberts, supra note 230, at 664 (endorsing judicial determination of the appropriateness of punitive awards).

n232. The jury in Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348 (1981), rendered a punitive damage award of $ 125,000,000 for a single claim. More recently in Durgill v. Ford Motor Co., C.A. 79-3203A-28th Dist. Ct. of Nueces Co., Texas (1983), the jury rendered a verdict of $ 6,800,000 in actual damages and $ 100,000,000 in punitive damages for a single claim.

n233. See H.R. 5214, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 11(d) (1984) (limiting punitive awards to twice the amount of actual damages, and never allowing punitive damages to exceed $

REV_00263607

1,000,000 for any one claimant). The House bill also would permit the court to consider any prior punitive damage awards levied against the defendant. Id. § 11(e). A mathematical formula, as H.R. 5214 proposes, in the hands of an experienced trial judge might lead to equitable results. One commentator, however, has suggested that allowing a jury to consider prior punitive awards in an effort to minimize any current exemplary damages could backfire and cause a jury to fine a defendant even more harshly. K. REDDEN, supra note 1, at 122-23.

n234. See supra note 176.

n235. The Clayton Act provides in pertinent part:

Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover three-fold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

