We agree with the district court that if there is FECA coverage, it would bar any swine flu claim DiPippa might assert against the Government.

C.

DiPippa argues that the district court's construction of the Swine Flu Act violates her right to equal protection. She argues that the district court's interpretation establishes two classes of swine flu plaintiffs: 1) injured persons eligible for compensation from the United States under another statute; and 2) those not so eligible. Only the latter group is permitted to pursue remedies based upon acts of both the Government and the program participants.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

(5) Although the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment has no application against the United States, the Supreme Court has held that "if a classification would be invalid under the Equal Protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, it is also inconsistent with the due process requirement of the Fifth Amendment." Johnson v. Robison, 415 U.S. 361, 364-65 n.4, 94 S.Ct. 1160, 1164 n.4, 39 L.Ed.2d 389 (1974). A statutory classification in the area of social and economic welfare will not violate due process if it is reasonable and bears some rational relationship to a legitimate congressional goal. Richardson v. Belcher, 404 U.S. 78, 81, 92 S.Ct. 254, 257, 30 L.Ed.2d 231 (1971).

(6) DiPippa argues that "(s)ingling out those who happen to receive federal workers' compensation benefits and denying them the right they would otherwise be entitled to ... is clearly anirrational classification." We disagree. We are unable to find that the disparity in treatment between persons compensated under FECA and those who are not is so unrelated to the objects of both FECA and the Swine Flu Act as to be arbitrary and irrational.

One congressional purpose behind the Swine Flu Act is to "assure an orderly procedure for the prompt and equitable handling of any claim for personal injury or death arising out of the administration of (the swine flu) vaccine." s 247b(k)(1)(B)(i). Courts have uniformly recognized that Congress intended FECA to guarantee federal employees "surer and more immediate relief in return for foregoing more expensive awards outside the system." Gill v. United States, 641 F.2d 195, 197 (5th Cir. 1981). In light of this guarantee, Congress could have reasonably concluded that federal employees asserting a swine flu claim already had a sufficient remedy under FECA that needed no supplement.

We hold that the procedure that Congress adopted under the Swine Flu Act is rationally related to achieving the legitimate goal of assuring "an orderly procedure for the prompt and equitable handling" of claims.

20 III.

The district court dismissed DiPippa's claim for want of subject matter jurisdiction under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(1). While recognizing the general rule that "district courts ordinarily must withhold further action pending the outcome of proceedings under the FECA," the district court reasoned that the language of the Swine Flu Act required dismissal of DiPippa's claim.

> Where an action or proceeding under this subsection is precluded because of the availability of a remedy through proceedings for compensation or other benefits from the United States as provided by any other law, the action or proceeding shall be dismissed....

42 U.S.C. s 247b(k)(5)(C).

(7) We do not interpret the language of that section so harshly where, as here, there is a substantial question of FECA coverage. The district court would require dismissal where there is a mere possibility of an exclusive remedy under some other law. The language of the Act requires dismissal only where the "availability" of an exclusive remedy precludes a claim under the FTCA. If the Secretary of Labor should determine that no FECA remedy is available, DiPippa may pursue her claim under the FTCA. To avoid statute of limitations problems, the district court should stay proceedings in the action until the Secretary resolves the question of FECA coverage. Joyce v. United States, 474 F.2d 215 (3rd Cir. 1973); Somma v. United States, 283 F.2d 149 (3rd Cir. 1960). Indeed, the Government specifically stated that it would not object if this court remanded the case to the district court with instructions to reinstate the complaint and stay proceedings.

IV.

We will vacate the order of the district court and remand the case with directions to reinstate the complaint and to stay further action pending the outcome of any FECA proceeding.

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[redacted]

REV_00265215

United States Court of Appeals,
Fifth Circuit.

Marie and Donald DUCHARME, Plaintiffs-Appellants,
v.
MERRILL-NATIONAL LABORATORIES, and United States of America, Defendants-Appellees.

No. 77-3488
Summary Calendar.[FN*]

FN* Rule 18, 5 Cir.; see Isbell Enterprises, Inc. v. Citizens Casualty Co. of New York et al., 5 Cir., 1970, 431 F.2d 409, Part I.

June 14, 1978.

Diversity action was brought against manufacturer of swine flu vaccine to recover for injuries resulting from adverse reaction to the vaccine. The United States District Court for the Western District of Louisiana, W. Eugene Davis, J., granted motion of United States to be substituted as sole defendant and to dismiss for failure to exhaust administrative remedies, and plaintiffs appealed. The Court of Appeals affirmed on basis of district court's memorandum opinion holding that: (1) the Act, which provides that cause of action against United States arising out of administration of the vaccination program is exclusive of any civil action against a manufacturer or distributor, does not violate Fifth Amendment due process as abrogating a state cause of action against the manufacturer for damages; (2) allowing a manufacturer a trial by jury on the government's indemnity claim while denying a jury trial in a claimant's action against the government does not violate equal protection; (3) procedures established under the Act are rationally related to achieving goal of assuring interstate distribution of vaccine, and (4) depriving claimants of jury trial in their action against the sovereign does not violate Seventh Amendment right to trial by jury.

Affirmed.

West Headnotes

[1] Constitutional Law ⚖105
92k105 Most Cited Cases

[1] Constitutional Law ⚖301(1)
92k301(1) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 92k299)

[1] Drugs and Narcotics ⚖20.1
138k20.1 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 138k20)

[1] United States ⚖127(1)
393k127(1) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 393k127)

One has no vested right in a tort claim for damages under state law; hence, Swine Flu Act, which provides that a cause of action against United States arising out of administration of swine flu vaccine is exclusive of any civil action against a program participant, is not violative of Fifth Amendment due process as abrogating a state law right of action against the manufacturer for injuries resulting from the adverse reaction to the vaccine; also, cause of action against the manufacturer did not arise until after passage of the Act and, hence, there was no prior vested right in a cause of action under state law. LSA-C.C. art. 2315; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 5; Public Health Service Act, §§ 317, 317(k)(3) as amended 42 U.S.C.A. §§ 247b, 247b(k)(3).

[2] Constitutional Law ⚖253.2(2)
92k253.2(2) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 92k253(2))

While equal protection clause of Fourteenth Amendment has no application against the United States, the Fifth Amendment does prohibit discrimination that is so unjustifiable as to be violative of due process. U.S.C.A.Const. Amends. 5, 14.

[3] Constitutional Law ⚖253.1
92k253.1 Most Cited Cases

In area of social and economic welfare, in order to meet due process standards the classification created under the statute must be reasonable, not arbitrary and bear some rational relationship to legitimate congressional goals. U.S.C.A.Const. Amends. 5, 14
.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[4] Constitutional Law ⚖249(7)
92k249(7) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 92k313)

[4] United States ⚖127(1)
393k127(1) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 393k127)

Swine Flu Act does not violate equal protection by allowing a manufacturer or distributor a jury trial on an indemnity claim asserted against it by the United States while denying a jury trial in an action against the United States by one who has suffered an adverse reaction to the vaccine. Public Health Service Act, § 317(k)(1)(B) as amended 42 U.S.C.A. § 247b(k)(1)(B); 28 U.S.C.A. § 2402.

[5] Drugs and Narcotics ⚖20.1
138k20.1 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 138k20)

[5] United States ⚖127(1)
393k127(1) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 393k127)

Provisions of Swine Flu Act creating a cause of action against the United States for damages arising out of act of a program participant and making such cause of action exclusive of any civil action against a participant with the government having right to seek indemnity from a participant on basis of negligence or breach of contract, are rationally related to achieving goal of assuring interstate distribution of swine flu vaccine, in view of fact that commercial insurers refused to insure drug manufacturers for interstate distribution of the vaccine but would provide insurance for limited risk for which the government could seek indemnity. Public Health Service Act, § 317(k)(3, 7) as amended 42 U.S.C.A. § 247b(k)(3, 7); U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 5.

[6] Jury ⚖31.1
230k31.1 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 230k31(2))

[6] United States ⚖125(7)
393k125(7) Most Cited Cases

Swine Flu Act does not violate Seventh Amendment right to jury trial; in waiving its sovereign immunity by providing for a cause of action against it arising out of administration of the vaccine program the government was entitled to attach any conditions, including no right to jury trial, to its consent. Public Health Service Act, § 317(k)(1)(B), (3) as amended 42 U.S.C.A. § 247b(k)(1)(B), (3); 28 U.S.C.A. § 2402; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 7.

[7] Jury ⚖12(1.2)
230k12(1.2) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 170Ak2081)

Suits against United States, requiring waiver of sovereign immunity, are not "suits at common law" within meaning of Seventh Amendment right to jury trial. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 7.

[8] United States ⚖125(7)
393k125(7) Most Cited Cases

When the sovereign waives immunity it may attach any conditions, including no right to trial by jury, to its consent. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 7.

[9] United States ⚖131
393k131 Most Cited Cases

Administrative procedure required under Federal Tort Claims Act is jurisdictional and cannot be waived. 28 U.S.C.A. § 2675.

[10] Federal Civil Procedure ⚖1838
170Ak1838 Most Cited Cases

Although no administrative claim was filed prior to institution of action for injuries resulting from adverse reaction to swine flu vaccine, dismissal of the government was without prejudice since under Swine Flu Act, if a suit is dismissed for failure to file an administrative claim, the plaintiff has 30 days from date of dismissal or two years from date claim arose in which to file an administrative claim. Public Health Service Act, § 317 as amended 42 U.S.C.A. § 247b.

1308 J. Minos Simon, Lafayette, La., for plaintiffs-appellants.

1309 Edward L. Shaheen, U. S. Atty., Shreveport, La., Jeffrey Axelrad, Leon B. Taranto, Civ. Div., Dept. of Justice, Washington, D. C., for United States of America.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Western District of Louisiana.

Before RONEY, GEE and FAY, Circuit Judges.

PER CURIAM:

We affirm the judgment below on the basis of the district court's memorandum opinion appended.

AFFIRMED.

APPENDIX

(Title Omitted)No. 770,452

RULING ON MOTIONS

Plaintiffs filed this diversity action against Merrill-National Laboratories for injuries resulting from an adverse reaction to a swine flu vaccine. The basis of their cause of action is Louisiana Civil Code Article 2315.

The United States filed motions under the Swine Flu Act (42 U.S.C. s 247b) to dismiss for failure to exhaust administrative remedies, to substitute United States as sole defendant and an additional motion to stay discovery pending outcome of hearing on the motions.

Plaintiffs oppose the government motions alleging: (1) the Swine Flu Act is in violation of the due process clause of the 5th and 14th Amendments in that it abrogates plaintiffs' cause of action under Article 2315 for damages against the manufacturer; (2) the Swine Flu Act, which incorporates the Federal Tort Claims Act, violates plaintiffs' right to a jury trial.

Constitutional attacks on the Swine Flu Act, similar to the attack being made here, have been made in at least three district courts.[FN1]

> FN1. Wolfe v. Merrill National Laboratories, 433 F.Supp. 231 (M.D.Tenn.1977); Sparks v. Wyeth Laboratories, Inc., 431 F.Supp. 411 (W.D.Okl.1977); Stephens v. Wyeth Laboratories, Inc., No. 77-L-0274-S (W.D.Ala., June 3, 1977).

The courts, in all three of the above cases, upheld the constitutionality of the Swine Flu Act.

The Swine Flu Act basically:

1. Creates a cause of action against the United States based on negligence, strict liability or breach of warranty for damages arising out of the act of a program participant; [FN2]

> FN2. Program participant is defined as a manufacturer or distributor of swine flu vaccine. 42 U.S.C. s 247b(k)(2)(B).

2. provides that the cause of action against the United States arising out of the administration of the swine flu vaccine shall be exclusive of any civil action against the program participant, 42 U.S.C. s 247b(k)(3);

3. incorporates provisions of the Federal Tort Claims Act (42 U.S.C. s 247b(k) (1)(B) including (a) no right to jury trial (28 U.S.C. s 2402), (b) two year prescription (28 U.S.C. s 2401(b), and (c) requirement of first exhausting an administrative remedy (28 U.S.C. s 2675); and

4. affords the United States the right to seek indemnity from the program participant on the basis of negligence or breach of contract in connection with the swine flu program. 42 U.S.C. s 247b(k)(7) .

The cause of action provided by the Swine Flu Act to an injured person against the United States is substantially the same as that afforded against the manufacturer under Louisiana Civil Code Article 2315 except that under the Swine Flu Act no trial by jury is afforded and the plaintiff is required to seek first administrative review of his claim.

DUE PROCESS CLAIM

[1] It is well settled that a plaintiff has no vested right in any tort claim for damages under state law. Keller v. Dravo Corporation, 441 F.2d 1239 (5th Cir. 1971), upheld 1310 the exclusive remedy provision of the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act against a due process challenge. The Court in Keller noted that the "abolition of non-vested rights is especially innocuous if . . . one remedy is substituted for another." (441 F.2d at 1242). Legislation has even been upheld where no remedy was substituted in place of the cause of action that was taken away. For example, in Carr v. United States, 422 F.2d 1007 (4th Cir. 1970), the Court upheld the constitutionality of the Federal Drivers Act (28 U.S.C. s 2679) which abrogated a federal employee's cause of action against a fellow employee. The Court in Silver v. Silver, 280 U.S. 117, 50 S.Ct. 57, 74 L.Ed. 221 (1929) upheld the abolition of a guest passenger's action against the host driver for negligence. In Brady v. Roosevelt Steamship Co., 317 U.S. 575, 63 S.Ct. 425, 87 L.Ed. 471 (1943), the Supreme Court recognized the congressional power to grant immunity from tort liability to private operators of government vessels, and in so doing paved the way for the enactment of the Suits in Admiralty Act, 46 U.S.C. s 745.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Plaintiffs rely on Richmond Screw Anchor Co. v. United States, 275 U.S. 331, 48 S.Ct. 194, 72 L.Ed. 303 (1928) for the proposition that congress may never validly divest a private litigant of a civil cause of action. The identical argument was made in Carr v. United States and disposed of in the following manner:

> "There the Supreme Court dealt with statutes whose combined effect deprived a patent owner of his right to sue for infringement. But the patent in that case had been issued prior to the enactment of the relevant legislation. There was, therefore, a vested right in being which was sought to be abrogated." (422 F.2d at 1010-11)

Plaintiffs' cause of action against the manufacturer did not arise until after passage of the Swine Flu Act. Plaintiffs had no prior vested right in a cause of action under Louisiana Civil Code Article 2315.

TRIAL BY JURY CLAIM

[2][3][4] Plaintiffs allege that the Swine Flu Act deprives them of equal protection of the law by allowing the manufacturer a trial by jury of the indemnity claim of the United States but denies trial by jury of their own claim. Plaintiffs contend that they and the manufacturer fall in the same general classification under the Act and they should be treated alike with respect to their right to trial by jury.

While the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment has no application against the United States, the 5th Amendment does prohibit discrimination that is "so unjustifiable as to be violate of the due process." [FN3] In the area of social and economic welfare, in order to meet due process standards the classification created under the statute must be reasonable, not arbitrary and bear some rational relationship to legitimate congressional goals.[FN4]

> FN3. Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497, 499, 74 S.Ct. 693, 694, 98 L.Ed. 884 (1954).

> FN4. Richardson v. Belcher, 404 U.S. 78, 92 S.Ct. 254, 30 L.Ed.2d 231 (1971).

I am unable to find that the disparity in treatment between plaintiffs and manufacturer with respect to jury trial is so unrelated to the object of the statute as to be arbitrary.

Congressional purpose is set forth in the Act, 42 U.S.C. s 247b(k)(1)(A):

> "(i) . . . to achieve the participation in the program of the agencies, organizations, and individuals who will manufacture, distribute and administer the swine flu vaccine . . . and to assure the availability of such vaccine in interstate commerce . . .
> (ii) . . . to establish an orderly procedure for the prompt and equitable handling of claims . . .
> (iii) to be prepared to meet the potential emergency of a swine flu epidemic . . . "

[5] Congress found it necessary to insulate manufacturers from primary liability and provide an exclusive remedy against the United States due to the collapse of the 1311 commercial liability insurance market. Legislative history reflects that insurance companies refused to insure drug manufacturers for interstate distribution of the vaccine due to the potential for a large number of meritless claims with attendant costs of investigation and defense and recent federal court decisions holding drug manufacturers strictly liable for failure to warn of possible adverse drug effects. While the Swine Flu Act is drafted to provide immunity to manufacturers from primary responsibility, the Act affords the United States the right to indemnity on the bases of negligence and breach of the contractural obligation. For this limited risk to drug manufacturers insurance was available.[FN5]

> FN5. See Cong.Rec. E 4695-4707, August 12, 1976. Debate in both chambers appears at Cong.Rec. H 8643-8655 and S 14108-14122, August 10, 1976.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

officers of such corporation or joint-stock association, during the term of such director or trustee.'

The bill alleges misappropriation and embezzlement of moneys of the corporation by its officers, with appropriate details to bring the respondent within the terms of the foregoing provision. The superior court sustained a demurrer to the complaint, for reasons not material here, and rendered final judgment accordingly. An appeal was taken to the state supreme court; and, while that appeal was pending, the provision of the state constitution above quoted was repealed. Thereupon, respondent moved to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the cause of action had abated by reason of the repeal of the provision of law upon which it was based. The court sustained the motion and dismissed the appeal, Coombes v. Franklin (Cal. Sup.) 1 P.(2d) 992; and subsequently denied a petition for rehearing (Cal. Sup.) 4 P.(2d) 157.

[1] In substance, it was held that the right accorded to corporate creditors was created by, and dependent alone upon, the constitutional provision, said to have the force of a statute; and that when that was repealed, the right fell with it, being still inchoate, not reduced to possession nor perfected by final judgment. It was conceded that the liability created by the Constitution was in its nature contractual and, as a matter of law, entered into and became a part of every contract between the corporation and its creditors. But this contractual liability, it was said, was conditioned by the power reserved over corporate laws by section 1, art. 12, of the Constitution, as follows: 'All laws now in force in this State concerning corporations, and all laws that may be hereafter passed pursuant to this section, may be altered from time to time or repealed.' 441 In virtue of this reservation of power, the state court held that the repeal of the liability provision was a known contingency constituting a part of the contract *436 as much as the provision which imposed the liability.

[2][3] The decision of the Supreme Court of a state construing and applying its own Constitution and laws generally is binding upon this court; but that is not so where the contract clause of the Federal Constitution is involved. In that case this court will give careful and respectful consideration and all due weight to the adjudication of the state court, but will determine independently thereof whether there be a contract, the obligation of which is within the protection of the contract clause, and whether that obligation has been impaired; and, likewise, will determine for itself the meaning and application of state constitutional or statutory provisions said to create the contract or by which it is asserted an impairment has been effected. Scott v. McNeal, 154 U. S. 34, 45, 14 S. Ct. 1108, 38 L. Ed. 896; Mobile & Ohio Railroad v. Tennessee, 153 U. S. 486, 492, etc., 14 S. Ct. 968, 38 L. Ed. 793; Stearns v. Minnesota, 179 U. S. 223, 232, 233, 21 S. Ct. 73, 45 L. Ed. 162; Louisiana Ry. & Nav. Co. v. New Orleans, 235 U. S. 164, 170, 35 S. Ct. 62, 59 L. Ed. 175; Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 684, 13 S. Ct. 224, 36 L. Ed. 1123; N. O. Waterworks v. La. Sugar Co., 125 U. S. 18, 38, 8 S. Ct. 741, 31 L. Ed. 607; Bridge Proprietors v. Hoboken Co., 1 Wall. 116, 144, 17 L. Ed. 571; Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black, 436, 443, 17 L. Ed. 173.

In substance, the contention of respondent here is that the reserved power provision, read into the contract as one of its terms, authorizes an extinction by repeal of the creditor's cause of action, unless previously reduced to final judgment.

[4] The authority of a state under the so-called reserved power is wide; but is not unlimited. The corporate charter may be repealed or amended, and, within limits not now necessary to define, the interrelations of state, corporation, and stockholders may be changed; but 442 neither vested property rights nor the obligation of contracts of third persons may be destroyed or impaired. Tomlinson v. Jessup, 15 Wall. 454, 459, 21 L. Ed. 204; Lake Shore, etc., Railway Co. v. Smith, 173 U. S. 684, 690, 19 S. Ct. 565, 43 L. Ed. 858. Compare Greenwood v. Freight Co., 105 U. S. 13, 17, 19, 26 L. Ed. 961; Shields v. Ohio, 95 U. S. 319, 324, 24 L. Ed. 357. The right of this petitioner to enforce respondent's liability had become fully perfected and vested prior to the repeal of the liability provision. His cause of action was not purely statutory. It did not arise upon the constitutional rule of law, but upon the contractual liability created in pursuance of the rule. Although the latter derived its being from the former, it immediately acquired an independent existence competent to survive the destruction of the provision which gave it birth. The repeal put an end to the

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The United States also recognized some potential liability due to their "unique role in the initiation, planning, and administration of the swine flu (vaccine)." 42 U.S.C. s 247b(k)(1)(A)(ii). By making a claimant's remedy exclusive against the United States but allowing limited indemnity by United States against the manufacturer, Congress struck a balance between plaintiff's interest in preserving a tort remedy and the manufacturer's interest in obtaining insurance coverage.

Congress is not denied the power to "treat different classes of persons in different ways," but it is denied power to "legislate that different treatment be accorded to persons placed by a statute into different classes on the basis of criteria wholly unrelated to the objective of that statute." [FN6]

> FN6. Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. 71, 75-76, 92 S.Ct. 251, 253, 30 L.Ed.2d 225 (1971); Johnson v. Robison, 415 U.S. 361, 374, 94 S.Ct. 1160, 1169, 39 L.Ed.2d 389 (1974).

I conclude that the procedure established under the Act is rationally related to achieving the goal of assuring interstate distribution of the swine flu vaccine.

[6][7][8] Plaintiffs make the additional argument that the Act violates their 7th Amendment right to trial by jury.

Although the 7th Amendment preserves the right to trial by jury of suits at common law, it is settled that suits against the United States, requiring waiver of sovereign immunity, are not "suits at common law" within the meaning of the 7th Amendment. When the sovereign waives immunity it may attach any conditions (including no right to trial by jury) to its consent.[FN7]

> FN7. Glidden Company v. Zdanok, 370 U.S. 530, 82 S.Ct. 1459, 8 L.Ed.2d 671 (1962); United States v. Sherwood, 312 U.S. 584, 61 S.Ct. 767, 85 L.Ed. 1058 (1941); Nistendirk v. McGee, 225 F.Supp. 881 (W.D.Mo.1963).

CONCLUSION

I conclude that the Swine Flu Act represents a valid exercise of Congressional power under the Constitution. Accordingly, the motion of the United States to be substituted as sole defendant under the terms of the Act is granted.

[9][10] The administrative procedure required under the Federal Tort Claims Act is jurisdictional and cannot be waived. Executive Jet Aviation, Inc. v. United States, 507 F.2d 508 (6th Cir. 1974). However, under the Swine Flu Act, if a suit is dismissed for failure to file an administrative claim, the plaintiff is given 30 days from the date of dismissal or two years from the date the claim arose in which to file an administrative claim. Therefore, the Government's motion to dismiss without prejudice to plaintiff is granted.

Lafayette, Louisiana, this 1st day of December, 1977.

/s/ W. Eugene Davis

Judge, United States District Court

Filed

Dec. 2, 1977.

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

REV_00265221

United States Court of Appeals,
Third Circuit.

Jimmie Dale THOMASON, Appellant in No. 75-2142 and 75-2143,
v.
John H. SANCHEZ et al.
Jimmie Dale THOMASON
v.
John H. SANCHEZ et al.
Jimmie Dale THOMASON
v.
John H. SANCHEZ and United States of America.
Jimmie Dale THOMASON
v.
John H. SANCHEZ and Dorothy E. Sanchez.

Nos. 75-2142 to 75-2143.

Argued May 3, 1976.
Decided July 22, 1976.

Following collision between automobile and motorcycle both operated by servicemen on military base, motorcyclist commenced common-law action in state court against motorist and his wife and filed federal complaints naming as defendants the motorist, his insurer and the United States. The state action was removed and the actions were consolidated. The United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, Clarkson S. Fisher, J., 398 F.Supp. 500, granted summary judgment in favor of defendants and plaintiffs appealed. The Court of Appeals, Aldisert, Circuit Judge, held that the government was not liable under the Federal Tort Claims Act for the injuries; that, under Federal Drivers Act provision that if district court determines that removed case is one in which remedy by suit within the Act is not available against United States, case shall be remanded to state court, the Tort Claims Act remedy is "not available" only where government driver was not acting within scope of his employment, so that case against motorist acting within scope of his employment would not be remanded to state court; and that, under the Federal Drivers Act, recovery would not be allowed against motorist's personal liability insurance carrier.

Affirmed.

West Headnotes

[1] United States ⚿125(30)
393k125(30) Most Cited Cases

Government was not liable under Federal Tort Claims Act for injuries sustained by serviceman who was operating his motorcycle on military base while in present for duty status. 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1346(b), 2671 et seq.

[2] Removal of Cases ⚿102
334k102 Most Cited Cases

Under Federal Drivers Act provision that if district court determines that removed case is one in which remedy by suit is not available against United States, case shall be remanded to state court, the Federal Tort Claims Act remedy is "not available" only where government driver was not acting within scope of his employment; thus where the Tort Claims Act remedy was not available because injured serviceman was in present for duty status, the remand provision did not apply. 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b-e), (d).

[3] United States ⚿125(30)
393k125(30) Most Cited Cases

Inasmuch as defendant motorist was acting within scope of his employment as a serviceman when automobile struck motorcyclist, there could be no action, separate from an action under Federal Tort Claims Act, against defendant individually or against his insurer. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1346(b).

[4] Insurance ⚿2742
217k2742 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 217k435.4)

Under Federal Driver's Act, serviceman motorcyclist injured in collision on military base with automobile driven by another serviceman in scope of his employment could not recover from motorist's personal liability insurer for coverage of his privately owned vehicle. 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b-e).

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[5] Armed Services ⚖33
34k33 Most Cited Cases

[5] Constitutional Law ⚖299.2
92k299.2 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 92k299(2), 92k299)

Federal Drivers Act, as applied to deprive motorcyclist serviceman of all lawsuit remedies for injuries received in collision with car driven by another serviceman, did not constitute a denial of due process. 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(a, d).

956 Ira Rabkin, Molotsky, Rabkin & Gross, Haddonfield, N. J., for appellant.

C. Kennon Hendrix, Roy D. Cummins, Pennsauken, N. J., for appellees Sanchez and Government Employees Ins. Co.

Jonathan L. Goldstein, U. S. Atty., Maryanne T. Desmond, Asst. U. S. Atty., Newark, N. J., for appellee United States of America.

Before ALDISERT, GIBBONS and GARTH, Circuit Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT

ALDISERT, Circuit Judge.

These appeals from summary judgments in favor of defendants emanate from a vehicular collision involving two servicemen on active duty and require us to interpret provisions of the Federal Tort Claims Act and the Federal Drivers Act. We affirm.

Appellant Thomason, a member of the United States Army, was operating his motorcycle on the grounds of Fort Dix, New Jersey on November 30, 1972, when he was struck by an automobile owned and operated by defendant Sanchez, himself a serviceman. Subsequently, Thomason commenced a number of lawsuits seeking compensation for injuries incurred in the collision. The district court has detailed these various actions now consolidated and their procedural nuances. 398 F.Supp. 500, 501 (D.N.J.1975). In the interest of simplicity, the following recitation suffices for our purposes. A common law action, commenced in state court against Sanchez and his wife, was removed to federal court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. s 2679(d).[FN1] Plaintiff filed federal complaints naming variously as defendants Sanchez, his insurer the Government Employees Insurance Company, and the United States. In these federal actions, Thomason sought money damages and other relief, essentially under the Federal Tort Claims Act. 28 U.S.C. ss 1346(b), 2671 et seq.

FN1. Upon a certification by the Attorney General that the defendant employee was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the incident out of which the suit arose, any such civil action or proceeding commenced in a State court shall be removed without bond at any time before trial by the Attorney General to the district court of the United States for the district and division embracing the place wherein it is pending and the proceedings deemed a tort action brought against the United States under the provisions of this title and all references thereto. Should a United States district court determine on a hearing on a motion to remand held before a trial on the merits that the case so removed is one in which a remedy by suit within the meaning of subsection (b) of this section is not available against the United States, the case shall be remanded to the State court.

Reluctantly, the district court granted summary judgment in favor of all three defendants. In its view, the doctrine of Feres v. United States, 340 U.S. 135, 71 S.Ct. 153, 95 L.Ed. 152 (1950), barred the action against the United States, while the exclusivity provision of the Federal Drivers 957 Act, 28 U.S.C. s 2679(b),[FN2] defeated the claims against Sanchez and GEICO. Thomason now challenges, with varying ferocity, each of these conclusions.

FN2. See note 4 infra.

I.

Feres v. United States held that "the Government is not liable under the Federal Tort Claims Act for injuries to servicemen where the injuries arise out of or are in the course of activity incident to service." 340 U.S. at 146, 71 S.Ct. at 159.[FN3] Injured servicemen were limited to seeking redress through "systems of simple, certain, and uniform compensation for injuries or death of those in armed services." Ibid. at 144, 71 S.Ct. at 158 (footnote omitted). In so ruling, the Court distinguished its then one-year-old precedent of Brooks v. United States, 337 U.S. 49, 69 S.Ct. 918, 93 L.Ed. 1200

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

REV_00265223

(1949): "The injury to Brooks did not arise out of or in the course of military duty. Brooks was on furlough, driving along the highway, under compulsion of no orders or duty and on no military mission." 340 U.S. at 146, 71 S.Ct. at 159. In the instant case, the district court found Feres, not Brooks, applicable:

> FN3. Feres was actually three cases, consolidated for disposition. Read together, the fact patterns disclose the sweep of the Feres doctrine. In Jefferson v. United States plaintiff had claimed damages for a negligent abdominal operation after which a towel 30 inches long was found still inside the plaintiff's stomach. United States v. Griggs was a wrongful death action alleging negligent and unskillful medical treatment by army surgeons. Feres also was a wrongful death action alleging negligence in the quartering of decedent in barracks known or which should have been known to be unsafe due to a defective heating plant.

> The fact that Thomason was in a "present for duty" status and not on any type of leave or pass, as sworn to in an affidavit by Captain James A. Kerchman, Commander of the Medical Company at Fort Dix, brings plaintiff within the ambit of Feres, thereby negating the applicability of the FTCA.

398 F.Supp. at 504.

[1] On appeal, Thomason does not urge that there is a genuine issue as to the material fact of his status at the time of the collision. See F.R.Civ.P. 56(c). Moreover, he concedes that "it seems that the Feres line of decisions is too firmly entrenched to be dislodged at this time." Appellant's Brief at 9. We previously expressed reservations about the continuing validity of the broad Feres doctrine. Peluso v. United States, 474 F.2d 605 (3d Cir.) (per curiam), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 879, 94 S.Ct. 50, 38 L.Ed.2d 124 (1973) (three Justices voting to grant certiorari). Upon reconsideration we reiterate that concern; as we noted there, however, we are powerless to jettison Feres or to dislodge it sufficiently to create an exception for vehicular collisions involving servicemen. See ibid. at 606.

II.

Appellant challenges the judgments as to Sanchez and GEICO on several grounds.

First, he asserts that the Federal Drivers Act, 28 U.S.C. s 2679(b)-(e), "operates only to deny plaintiff a choice of remedies where there is a remedy against the United States." Appellant's Brief at 11. Where, as here, there is no remedy against the United States, the actions against Sanchez and GEICO should be allowed to proceed. This argument has a first-blush appeal. Indeed, the second sentence of 28 U.S.C. s 2679(d), see note 1 supra, provides that, if a district court determines that a removed case such as this "is one in which a remedy by suit within the meaning of (28 U.S.C. s 2679(b) [FN4]) is not available against the United States, the case shall be remanded to the State court." (Emphasis added.)

> FN4. The remedy against the United States provided by sections 1346(b) and 2672 of this title for injury or loss of property or personal injury or death, resulting from the operation by any employee of the Government of any motor vehicle while acting within the scope of his office or employment, shall hereafter be exclusive of any other civil action or proceeding by reason of the same subject matter against the employee or his estate whose act or omission gave rise to the claim.

958 [2] The contention, however, is not of first impression. Rather, it has been presented to and rejected by at least three other circuits. Carr v. United States, 422 F.2d 1007, 1011 (4th Cir. 1970); Van Houten v. Ralls, 411 F.2d 940, 942 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 962, 90 S.Ct. 436, 24 L.Ed.2d 426 (1969); Vantrease v. United States, 400 F.2d 853, 855 (6th Cir. 1968). These courts are unanimous in holding "that within the meaning of the Drivers Act the Tort Claims Act remedy is 'not available' only where the government driver was not acting within the scope of his employment. When the Tort Claims Act remedy is not available for any other reason, the remand provision does not apply." [FN5] Carr v. United States, supra, 422 F.2d at 1011. The reason for this rule lies in the exclusivity provision of 28 U.S.C. s 2679(b), the basic purpose of which was to immunize individual government driversfrom the heavy financial burdens and personal liabilities associated with operating motor vehicles. A contrary interpretation of the "not available" language in the removal section "would revitalize the common law action. (T)his result would directly contradict the Act's immunizing purpose . . . ." Ibid. Moreover, Congress itself has indicated approval of this judicial construction of the exclusivity provision of the

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Federal Drivers Act.[FN6] Accordingly, we confidently join ranks with the Fourth, Sixth and Ninth Circuits.

> FN5. Conceivably, the Federal Tort Claims Act remedy might be barred by a statute of limitations shorter than that prevailing for the common law, state tort action. In such circumstances it would frustrate the immunizing congressional intent behind 28 U.S.C. s 2679(b) to construe 28 U.S.C. s 2679(d) as authorizing a remand to the state court for trial on the merits. Vantrease v. United States, supra, 400 F.2d at 855-86 n.2.

> FN6. See H.R.Rep. No. 715, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. 16 (1971); S.Rep. No. 776, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. 51 (1971) (proposed amendment to 38 U.S.C. s 4116). Using the Federal Drivers Act as a model, Congress passed legislation immunizing the medical personnel of the Veterans' Administration, 38 U.S.C. s 4116 (1970), as amended, (Supp. III, 1973), and the Public Health Service, 42 U.S.C. s 233 (1970). In these two immunity statutes, however, Congress explicitly stated that the remedy supplanting any common law right of action against the individual government employee was not only that provided by the Federal Tort Claims Act but also any compensation or other benefits provided by the United States where the availability of such compensation or benefits precludes a remedy under the Federal Tort Claims Act. See 38 U.S.C. s 4116(a); 42 U.S.C. s 233(a) . Rather than amend the statutory language of 28 U.S.C. ss 2679(b) and (d) in the same manner as it amended 38 U.S.C. ss 4116(a) and (c) in 1973, see Pub.L. 93-82, 87 Stat. 193 (1973), Congress apparently has been content to rely on this judicial construction of the Federal Drivers' Act.

[3] In this case, the district court was fully cognizant of its duty to make "an independent determination . . . as to whether Sanchez was acting within the scope of his employment." 398 F.Supp. at 504. The court concluded:

> The facts reveal that at the time of the collision Sanchez was operating his own vehicle, returning from procuring change for the use of Annex # 1 of the Non-Commissioned Officers' Club at Fort Dix, N.J., of which he was in charge. This finding is substantiated by affidavit of Sanchez of April 3, 1975 indicating that he was within the scope of his employment.
>
> A verified petition for removal has been executed by Maryanne T. Desmond, Assistant United States Attorney, which certifies that defendant John Sanchez was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the incident out of which the within suit arose. The concomitant result of this petition is to provide an exclusive remedy against the United States for personal injuries "resulting from the operation by any employee of the Government of any motor vehicle while acting within the scope of his office or employment." 28 U.S.C.A. s 2679(b).

Ibid. at 504-05. Defendant's status, therefore, had the effect of limiting anyone injured by Sanchez in his official capacity to a lawsuit under the Federal Tort Claims Act. 959 There could be no separate action against Sanchez individually or against his insurer. Plaintiff's status as a serviceman which status eliminated the Tort Claims Act remedy is simply irrelevant to the foregoing.

Moreover, even were we to adopt a different construction of 28 U.S.C. s 2679(d) and order a remand to the state court, we doubt whether the New Jersey courts would be empowered to afford appellant a remedy. "Without exception, the relationship of military personnel to the Government has been governed exclusively by federal law." Feres v. United States, supra, 340 U.S. at 146, 71 S.Ct. at 159. We gather, then, that under the Supremacy Clause New Jersey courts would be bound to apply federal law including both the Feres doctrine and 28 U.S.C. s 2679(b).

[4] Appellant's second challenge to the judgments in favor of Sanchez and GEICO asserts that "under the Federal Drivers Act, there should be allowed recovery which is actually against a federal employee's personal automobile liability insurance carrier for coverage of his privately-owned vehicle." Appellant's Brief at 11. We reject this contention. The reality is that any judgment against GEICO would affect Sanchez, if only in the form of an increased premium. Moreover, we question the desirability and the practicality of formulating a rule of law dependent upon a factual determination whether or not insurance is involved in the case which generally is improper for jury consideration.

[5] Appellant's final argument is that the Federal Drivers Act, as applied to him to deprive him of all lawsuit remedies,[FN7] constitutes a denial of due process. The Fourth Circuit discussed a kindred due process argument at length in Carr v. United States,

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

supra:

> FN7. As a result of the injuries Thomason received in the collision with Sanchez, the government represented in its brief, the Veterans Administration determined that Thomason had a 60% service-connected disability for which he will receive $277 a month, subject to changes in his condition. Appellee's Brief of Government at 15.

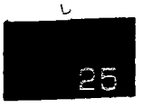
Carr next contends that the Drivers Act violates the fifth amendment's due process clause by denying him equal protection. Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497, 74 S.Ct. 693, 98 L.Ed. 884 (1954). The deprivation, he argues, results from the fact that abrogation is restricted to accidents which involve motor vehicles. Government employees can sue their co-workers for injuries sustained in any other job-related activity.

The classification which the Drivers Act creates does not penalize the exercise of any constitutional right. As we have held, the right to sue a co-worker does not enjoy constitutional protection. Therefore, the classification need not be justified by "a compelling governmental interest." Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 634, 89 S.Ct. 1322, 22 L.Ed.2d 600 (1969) (emphasis in the original). Nor does the Act create a "suspect" classification, see, e. g., Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214, 216, 65 S.Ct. 193, 89 L.Ed. 194 (1944), or involve a "fundamental" interest. See, e. g., Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 561-562, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964). Thus, a rigorous standard of review would be inappropriate here. Rather, the statutory classification comes here clothed with a presumption of constitutionality and it "will not be set aside if any state of facts reasonably may be conceived to justify it." McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 426, 81 S.Ct. 1101, 1105, 6 L.Ed.2d 393 (1961).

The legislative history to which we have already referred makes it clear that Congress was moved by the fact that automobile accident insurance placed such a heavy financial burden on government drivers that it was adversely affecting morale and making it difficult for the government to attract competent drivers into its employ. S.Rep. No. 736, 87th Cong., 1st Sess. (1961), reprinted in 2 U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1961, at p. 2784 (1962). We think that the magnitude of the automobile insurance problem justified Congress's separate treatment 960 of this specific problem. Furthermore, as the Supreme Court said in Silver v. Silver, 280 U.S. 117, 50 S.Ct. 57, 74 L.Ed. 221, in response to a substantially similar argument:

(T)here is no constitutional requirement that a regulation, in other respects permissible, must reach every class to which it might be applied that the legislature must be held rigidly to the choice of regulating all or none. * * * It is enough that the present statute strikes at the evil where it is felt and reaches the class of cases where it most frequently occurs.

280 U.S. at 123-124, 50 S.Ct. at 59.



422 F.2d at 1011-12 (footnote omitted). We adopt this reasoning.

Appellant argues that his case differs materially from Carr's that he is in a distinct sub-class, that of injured servicemen, upon which the effect of the Federal Drivers Act is not reasonable. Appellant's Brief at 14. We are sympathetic with appellant's position, but not receptive to his argument. It is not the effect of the Federal Drivers Act which renders an unreasonable result. The effect of the Federal Drivers Act predicated upon defendant's status is to make the Federal Tort Claims Act the exclusive remedy. Rather, it is the effect of the Feres doctrine which turns on plaintiff's status which produces the hardship in this case. And, as we have stated previously, only the Supreme Court can overrule, or modify, Feres. Peluso v. United States, supra, 474 F.2d at 606.

The judgments of the district court will be affirmed.

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

25

United States Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit.

Richard Thomas CARR and Doreen Carr, Appellants,
v.
UNITED STATES of America, William Granville Reynolds, Sr., and Joseph B. Biggs, Appellees.

No. 13500.

Argued Jan. 5, 1970.
Decided Feb. 27, 1970.

Action for personal injuries resulting from automobile accident involving federal employees. The United States District Court for the District of Maryland, at Baltimore, Alexander Harvey, II, J., entered a judgment dismissing the action and the plaintiff employee appealed. The Court of Appeals, Winter, Circuit Judge, held that Federal Drivers Act provision abrogating federal employee's common-law right of action against government driver acting within the scope of his employment was not unconstitutional as contended by injured federal employee who asserted that the abrogation of his right of action without creation of some new benefit violation due process clause of Fifth Amendment.

Affirmed.

West Headnotes

[1] Federal Civil Procedure ⚿1951
170Ak1951 Most Cited Cases

District judge was well within his range of discretion in refusing to consider certain contentions advanced with respect of the alleged invalidity of Federal Drivers Act on ground that the same had not been timely asserted under the district court's local rules. 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b-e).

[2] Automobiles ⚿196
48Ak196 Most Cited Cases

Federal Drivers Act was enacted to relieve government employee of burden of personal liability for accidents occurring on job by excluding actions against employee for injuries resulting from employee's operation of motor vehicle while within the scope of employment. 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b).

[3] Automobiles ⚿196
48Ak196 Most Cited Cases

Federal Drivers Act abrogates federal employee's common-law right of action against government driver who is acting within the scope of his employment. 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b).

[4] Automobiles ⚿147
48Ak147 Most Cited Cases

[4] Constitutional Law ⚿307
92k307 Most Cited Cases

Federal Drivers Act provision abrogating federal employee's common-law right of action against government driver acting within the scope of his employment was not unconstitutional as contended by injured federal employee who asserted that the abrogation of his right of action without creation of some new benefit violated due process clause of Fifth Amendment. 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b-e); U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 5.

[5] Removal of Cases ⚿21
334k21 Most Cited Cases

Under Federal Drivers Act provision for remand to state court of removed action for which a remedy under Tort Claims Act is not available against United States, Tort Claims Act remedy is "not available" only in those cases where government driver was not acting within the scope of his employment, and when remedy is not available for any other reason the remand provision does not apply. 28 U.S.C. A. §§ 2401(b), 2679(b-e).

[6] Automobiles ⚿147
48Ak147 Most Cited Cases

[6] Constitutional Law ⚿299.2
92k299.2 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 92k299(2), 92k253(2), 92k253)

Federal Drivers Act abrogating federal employee's common-law right of action against fellow employee for injuries sustained from operation of automobile within scope of employment does not violate due process by denying equal protection merely because abrogation was restricted to accidents involving motor vehicles, and federal coworkers could be sued for injuries sustained in other job-related activities. 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b-e); U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 5.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[7] Constitutional Law ⚿208(16)
92k208(16) Most Cited Cases

Right to sue federal coworker for injuries in action arising out of activity within the scope of employment does not enjoy a constitutional protection, and therefore, classification as to what types of accident give rise to cause of action against federal coworker need not be justified by compelling government interest. 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b-e).

[8] Constitutional Law ⚿208(16)
92k208(16) Most Cited Cases

Federal Drivers Act abrogating common-law right of action against coworker for injuries arising out of automobile accident within scope of employment did not create a suspect classification or involve a fundamental interest, and the statutory classification was clothed with presumption of constitutionality and would not be set aside if any state of facts could reasonably be conceived to justify it. 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b-e).

[9] Armed Services ⚿34.11(1)
34k34.11(1) Most Cited Cases

Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act providing for tolling of statute of limitations with respect to action by or against person in military service only tolls a limitation provision if action is either against any person in military service or is against his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, §§ 100, 205, 50 U.S.C.A. App. §§ 510, 525.

[10] Armed Services ⚿34.11(1)
34k34.11(1)Most Cited Cases

Since Federal Drivers Act abolished plaintiff federal employee's right to recover from coworker who was in Navy for a period of time after accident, plaintiff federal employee had no action against any person in military service, and provision of Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act tolling statute of limitations was not applicable. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 205, 50 U.S.C.A. App. § 525; 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b).

[11] Armed Services ⚿34.11(1)
34k34.11(1) Most Cited Cases

Provision extending benefits of Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act to persons bringing actions against servicemen is intended to promote tranquility in military by permitting claimants to await termination of potential defendant's tour of duty without losing meritorious claim. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, §§ 100, 205, 50 U.S.C.A. App. §§ 510, 525.

1008 Bernard S. Cohen, Alexandria, Va. (Cohen, Hirschkop, Hall & Jackson, Alexandria, Va., on brief), for appellants.

1009 Daniel Joseph, Atty., Dept. of Justice (William D. Ruckelshaus, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Morton Hollander, Atty., Dept. of Justice, and Stephen H. Sachs, U.S. Atty., on brief), for appellees.

Before BRYAN, WINTER and BUTZNER, Circuit Judges.

WINTER, Circuit Judge:

This action for personal injuries resulting from an automobile accident was first removed from a state court under the Federal Drivers Act, 28 U.S.C.A. § § 2679(b)-(e), and subsequently dismissed as untimely under the Federal Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C.A. § 2401(b). We affirm.

On December 8, 1965, Richard T. Carr was injured in a collision between an automobile operated by Robert D. Mitchell and another vehicle. At the time of the accident both Carr and Mitchell were federal employees acting within the scope of their employment. On March 6, 1968, over two years after the accident, Carr instituted suit for personal injuries in a Maryland Court against Mitchell. [FN1] Upon the certification that at the time of the accident Mitchell had been a federal employee acting within the scope of his employment, the action was removed to the district court pursuant to the Federal Drivers Act, 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 2679(b)-(e), and 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1441(c), 1442(a)(1), 1446(d). Simultaneously, the United States was substituted rule for the future, but it did not and could not destroy or impair the previously vested right of the creditor (which in every sense was a property right, Ettor v. Tacoma, 228 U. S. 148, 156, 33 S. Ct. 428, 57 L. Ed. 773; Pritchard v. Norton, 106 U. S. 124, 132, 1 S. Ct. 102, 27 L. Ed. 104) to enforce his cause of action upon the contract. Ettor v. Tacoma, supra; Hawthorne v. Calef, 2 Wall. 10, 22, 17 L. Ed. 776; Steamship Company v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. 450, 17 L. Ed. 805; Ochiltree v. Railroad Company, 21 Wall. 249, 252, 253, 22 L. Ed. 546; Harrison v. Remington Paper Co. (C. C. A.) 140 F. 385, 390, etc., 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 954, 5 Ann. Cas. 314; Knickerbocker Trust Co. v. Myers (C. C.) 133 F. 764, 767.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The Ettor Case, supra, involved a statute of the state of Washington which required municipalities to compensate for consequential damages. While that statute was in force actions were brought to recover for damages inflicted upon abutting property in consequence of street grading done by the authority and direction of the city of Tacoma. While these actions were being heard, the statute in respect of this liability was repealed; and the trial court directed a verdict for the city, on the theory that the right of action was statutory and fell with the 443 statute, there being no saving clause. Judgment was affirmed by the state Supreme Court and the case came here on writ of of error. This court reversed the judgment and in the course of its opinion (pages 155-156 of 228 U. S., 33 S. Ct. 428, 430, 57 L. Ed. 773) said:

'The court below gave a retrospective effect to the amendatory and repealing act by holding that the effect of the repeal was to destroy the right to compensation which had accrued while the act was in force. The obligation of the city was fixed. The plaintiffs in error had a claim which the city was as much under obligation to pay as for the labor employed to do the grading. It was a claim assignable and enforceable by a common-law action for a breach of the statutory obligation.

'The necessary effect of the repealing act, as construed and applied by the court below, was to deprive the plaintiffs in error of any remedy to enforce the fixed liability of the city to make compensation. This was to deprive the plaintiffs in error of a right which had vested before the repealing act,-a right which was in every sense a property right. Nothing remained to be done to complete the plaintiffs' right to compensation except the ascertainment of the amount of damage to their property. The right of the plaintiffs in error was fixed by the law in force when their property was damaged for public purposes. *437 and the right so vested cannot be defeated by subsequent legislation.'

In the Hawthorne Case, supra, it was held that a state statute, incorporating a railroad company, which provided that the shares of the stockholders should be liable for the debts of the corporation, in effect pledges the liability or guarantee of the stockholders to the extent of their stock to the creditors of the company. 'They thereby virtually agree to become security to the creditors for the payment of the debts of the company, which have been contracted upon the faith of this liability.' Haw 444 thorne supplied the corporation with materials to build its road and obtained judgment against it. Being unable to satisfy the judgment, he brought suit against Calef, a stockholder. The state Supreme Court rendered judgment against Hawthorne on the ground that the individual liability provision had been repealed by subsequent legislation, passed two months after the debt was contracted, and that such repeal had taken away the right to enforce the stockholders' liability. This court reversed on the ground that when the debt was contracted with the company the creditor held the stockholders' liability as security for its payment and the repealing act, by abolishing it, impaired the obligation of that contract.

In the Joliffe Case, supra, this court had before it for determination substantially the same question that is involved here. There a California statute had created a Board of Pilot Commissioners, and authorized the board to license pilots, prescribe their qualifications, etc. The statute provided, with an exception, that when a vessel was spoken by a pilot and his service was declined he should be entitled to one-half pilotage fees. Joliffe, a pilot licensed under this statute, spoke a vessel of the steamship company and offered his service to pilot her out of the port of San Francisco. This was declined, and the pilot brought suit to recover for one-half the pilotage. Judgment was rendered against the company. Pending review in this court, a new statute was passed and the old act, in terms, repealed. The point was made that the claim to half pilotage fees having been given by statute, the right to recover fell with its repeal, and accordingly that the writ of for Mitchell as defendant on the ground that the Drivers Act, 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b), made the Federal Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C.A. § 1346(b), the exclusive remedy for injuries resulting from the operation of a motor vehicle by a government employee acting within the scope of his employment. At a later date, the district court granted the government's motion to dismiss on the ground that since the action had been commenced more than two years after the accident, it was barred by the limitations provision of the Federal Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C.A. § 2401(b).

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

FN1. Carr's wife also brought suit for loss of consortium. Our holding that Carr's claim was untimely makes it unnecessary to distinguish between the two actions.

[1] In this Court Carr argues (1) that the Drivers Act is an unconstitutional abrogation of a government employee's common law right of action against a fellow-employee for negligence; (2) that the Federal Employees' Compensation Act, 5 U.S.C.A. § 8116(c), requires a remand to the state courts under the Drivers Act, 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(d); (3) that the Drivers Act violates the due process clause of the fifth amendment by restricting the abrogation of the common law right of action to cases which involve motor vehicles; and (4) that the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act, 50 U.S.C.A. App. § 525, tolls the limitations provision of the Tort Claims Act. [FN2]

FN2. The district judge refused to consider the first three arguments on the ground that they had not been timely asserted under the district court's local rules. The district judge was well within the range of his discretion in this ruling. Ledwith v. Storkan, 2 F.R.D. 539, 542, 544- 545 (D.Neb.1942); 6 W. Moore, Federal Practice P55.10(4), at 1837-42 (2d ed. 1966); see Consolidated Masonry & Fireproofing, Inc. v. Wagman Construction Corp., 383 F.2d 249, 251 (4 Cir. 1967). However, we prefer to consider Carr's contentions on their merits.

[2] The Drivers Act was enacted to relieve government employees of the burden of personal liability for accidents which occurred on the job; for unlike many employers, the United States neither maintained liability insurance which protected its employees nor assisted them in paying for their own insurance against on-the-job accidents. Uptagrafft v. United States, 315 F.2d 200, 204 (4 Cir. 1963); H.R.Rep. No. 297, 87th Cong., 1st Sess. (1961); S.Rep. No. 736, 87th Cong., 1st Sess. (1961), reprinted in 2 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 1961, at p. 2784 (1962); 107 Cong.Rec. 18,499-500 (1961). See generally Annot., 16 A.L.R.3d 1394, 1402 (1967). To accomplish this purpose 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b) excludes actions 1010 against employees for injuries which result from the employee's operation of a motor vehicle while within the scope of his employment. H.R.Rep. No. 297, 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 4 (1961). It provides:

'The remedy against the United States provided by * * * (the Federal Tort Claims Act) * * * for personal injury * * * resulting from the operation by any employee of the Government of any motor vehicle while acting within the scope of his * * * employment, shall hereafter be exclusive of any other civil action * * * by reason of the same matter against the employee or his estate whose act or omission gave rise to the claim.'

28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b), as amended by the Act of July 18, 1966, Pub.L. No. 89-506, § 5(a), 80 Stat. 306, 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b). [FN3]

FN3. The changes instituted in section 2679(b) by the 1966 amendment have no significance in this case.

The Drivers Act had an apparently uncontemplated but not necessarily incongruous impact on federal employees injured by government drivers. Prior to the Act a government employee who sustained injuries as a result of the negligence of a fellow-employee acting within the scope of his employment was not restricted to the remedy against the United States provided by the Employees' Compensation Act, 5 U.S.C.A. §§ 751 et seq., 8101 et seq. He could also have brought a common law action against his co-worker for negligence. Allman v. Hanley, 302 F.2d 559 (5 Cir. 1962); Marion v. United States, 214 F.Supp. 320, 322-324 (D.Md.1963).

[3] Congress apparently did not specifically consider whether or not this cause of action against a fellow government employee should survive. Gilliam v. United States, 407 F.2d 818, 819 (6 Cir. 1969) (Combs, J., concurring). Nevertheless, abrogation is well within the ambit of the statutory language:

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

'the remedy against the United States * * * shall * * * be exclusive of any other civil action * * * against the employee * * *.'

28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b), as amended by the Act of July 18, 1966, Pub.L. No. 89-506, § 5(a), 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b). Any other result would undermine the Act's purpose to protect government drivers from all liability. We, therefore, agree with the holdings of other circuits that the Drivers Act abrogates a federal employee's common law right of action against a government driver who is acting within the scope of his employment. Van Houten v. Ralls, 411 F.2d 940 (9 Cir. 1969); Gilliam v. United States, 407 F.2d 818 (6 Cir. 1969); Vantrease v. United States, 400 F.2d 853 (6 Cir. 1968).

[4] Carr does not seriously question this interpretation of the Act. But he does argue that abrogation without the creation of some new benefit as a quid pro quo constitutes a violation of the due process clause of the fifth amendment. We are not persuaded.

First, the argument's premise was rejected as unsound by the Supreme Court in Silver v. Silver, 280 U.S. 117, 50 S.Ct. 57, 74 L.Ed. 221, 65 A.L.R. 939 (1929). There, in sustaining the abolition of a gratuitous passenger's right to sue his host for negligence, the Court held that:

'The Constitution does not forbid the creation of new rights, or the abolition of old ones recognized by the common law * * *.'

Id., at 122, 50 S.Ct., at 58. There has been no indication that this is not the settled law on the question. E.g., Clarke v. Storchak, 322 U.S. 713, 64 S.Ct. 1270, 88 L.Ed. 1555 (1944), dismissing appeal for want of a substantial federal question from 384 Ill. 564, 52 N.E.2d 229 (1943).

Nothing in Richmond Screw Anchor Co. v. United States, 275 U.S. 331, 48 S.Ct. 194, 72 L.Ed. 303 (1928), constitutes contrary authority. There the Supreme Court dealt with statutes whose combined 1011 effect deprived a patent owner of his right to sue for infringement. But the patent in that case had been issued prior to the enactment of the relevant legislation. There was, therefore, a vested right in being which was sought to be abrogated. By contrast, here the accident occurred over four years after the enactment of the Drivers Act. [FN4] Therefore, under Silver Carr had no interest entitled to constitutional protection.

> FN4. The Drivers Act does not apply to accidents which occurred up to six months after its enactment. Pub.L. No. 87-258, § 2, 75 Stat. 539.

Second, we think that in any event Congress provided an adequate quid pro quo for the common law cause of action which it abolished. True, a Tort Claims Act remedy may not be available to Carr because of the exclusivity provision of the Employees' Compensation Act, 5 U.S.C.A. § 8116(c). Van Houten v. Ralls, 411 F.2d 940 (9 Cir. 1969); Vantrease v. United States, 400 F.2d 853 (6 Cir. 1968). But we need not decide this question now. Even assuming that the Tort Claims Act is not available, the Drivers Act is itself an adequate quid pro quo, for it provided Carr with valuable protection against personal liability for on-the-job automobile accidents for which he might have been responsible.

[5] Carr also argues that if the Employees' Compensation Act's exclusivity provision does apply, the Drivers Act requires that his action against Mitchell be remanded to the state courts. In part the Drivers Act provides that if the action which has been removed

'is one in which a remedy (under the Tort Claims Act) is not available against the United States, the case shall be remanded to the State court.'

28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(d). Carr contends that if the Employees' Compensation Act's exclusivity provision bars his action under the Tort Claims Act, then necessarily his Tort Claims Act remedy against the United States 'is not available.' Therefore, he concludes, his case against Mitchell must be remanded to the state courts.

This argument has been rejected by the only other courts of appeals to consider it. Van Houten v. Ralls, 411 F.2d 940 (9 Cir. 1969); Gilliam v. United States, 407 F.2d 818 (6 Cir. 1969); Vantrease v. United States, 400 F.2d 853 (6 Cir. 1968). They have held that within the meaning of the Drivers Act the Tort Claims Act remedy is 'not available' only where the government driver was not acting within the scope of his employment. When the Tort Claims Act remedy is not available for any other reason, the remand provision does not apply.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

We adopt this interpretation of the Act. While the statutory language does not by itself reject Carr's position, his theory would revitalize the common law action. Since this result would directly contradict the Act's immunizing purpose, we reject it.

[6] Carr next contends that the Drivers Act violates the fifth amendment's due process clause by denying him equal protection. Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497, 74 S.Ct. 693, 98 L.Ed. 884 (1954). The deprivation, he argues, results from the fact that abrogation is restricted to accidents which involve motor vehicles. Government employees can sue their co-workers for injuries sustained in any other job-related activity. [FN5]

> FN5. The Act of Oct. 31, 1965, Pub.L. No. 89-311, § 6(a), 79 Stat. 1156 (codified at 38 U.S.C.A. § 4116), extended like immunity to government medical personnel, but the Act was not effective at the time of the accident in this case. Id., § 6(c). In any event, numerous other employees remain personally liable for on-the-job accidents.

[7] The classification which the Drivers Act creates does not penalize the exercise of any constitutional right. As we have held, the right to sue a co-worker does not enjoy constitutional protection. Therefore, the classification need not be justified by 'a compelling governmental interest.' Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 634, 89 S.Ct. 1322, 22 1012 L.Ed.2d 600 (1969) (emphasis in the original). Nor does the Act create a 'suspect' classification, see, e.g., Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214, 216, 65 S.Ct. 193, 89 L.Ed. 194 (1944), or involve a 'fundamental' interest. See, e.g., Reynolds v. Sims,377 U.S. 533, 561-562, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964). Thus, a rigorous standard of review would be inappropriate here. Rather, the statutory classification comes here clothed with a presumption of constitutionality and it 'will not be set aside if any state of facts reasonably may be conceived to justify it.' McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 426, 81 S.Ct. 1101, 1105, 6 L.Ed.2d 393 (1961).

[8] The legislative history to which we have already referred makes it clear that Congress was moved by the fact that automobile accident insurance placed such a heavy financial burden on government drivers that it was adversely affecting morale and making it difficult for the government to attract competent drivers into its employ. S.Rep. No. 736, 87th Cong., 1st Sess. (1961), reprinted in 2 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 1961, at p. 2784 (1962). We think that the magnitude of the automobile insurance problem justified Congress's separate treatment of this specific problem. Furthermore, as the Supreme Court said in Silver in response to a substantially similar argument:

'There is no constitutional requirement that a regulation, in other respects permissible, must reach every class to which it might be applied-- that the legislature must be held rigidly to the choice of regulating all or none. * * * It is enough that the present statute strikes at the evil where it is felt and reaches the class of cases where it most frequently occurs.'

280 U.S. at 123-124, 50 S.Ct. at 59.

As we have indicated, we find it unnecessary to consider the government's position that the Employees' Compensation Act precludes relief under the Tort Claims Act in this case, because even if Carr is not limited to his rights under the Employees' Compensation Act his action is barred by the two-year limitations provision of the Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C.A. § 2401(b).

[9] Lastly, Carr contends that the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act, 50 U.S.C.A. App. § 525, tolls this statute of limitations. This Act in part provides for tolling with respect to

'the bringing of any action * * * in any court * * * by or against any person in military service or by or against his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns * * *.'

Since Mitchell was in the United States Navy for a period of time after the accident, Carr believes that his action under the Tort Claims Act is still viable.

We disagree. Section 525 only tolls a limitations provision if the action is either one 'against any person in military service' or one 'against his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns.' Since the Drivers Act abolishes Carr's right to relief from Mitchell, Carr has no 'action * * * against any person in military service.' Nor do we think that in this case the United States is accurately described as one of Mitchell's 'heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns.' Therefore, we conclude that § 525 does not apply here.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[10][11] We arrive at this conclusion after a consideration of the relevant statutory purposes. The Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act was intended to enable persons serving in the armed forces 'to devote their entire energy to the defense needs of the Nation' without the worries and distractions which are involved in the conduct of litigation. 50 U.S.C.A. App. § 510; e.g., Van Heest v. Veech, 58 N.J.Super. 427, 432, 156 A.2d 301, 304 (1959). We have found nothing to suggest that Congress was protecting a contrary purpose when it extended the benefits of § 525 to persons who bring actions 'against' servicemen. Consistent with the statute's broad purpose, therefore, we think that 1013 § 525 was intended to promote tranquility in the military by permitting claimants to await the termination of the potential defendant's tour of duty without losing a meritorious claim. Blazejowski v. Stadnicki, 317 Mass. 352, 356-357, 58 N.E.2d 164, 166 (1944); Annot., 26 A.L.R.2d 284, 287-88 (1952). See also Reed, Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, 28 Iowa L.Rev. 14, 27 (1942).

This purpose, however, has no applicability here. A serviceman in Mitchell's situation is, by virtue of the Drivers Act, completely immune from 'any * * * action.' 28 U.S.C.A. § 2679(b). He has no need for the partial and temporary relief from worry and distraction which § 525 would provide.

The judgment of the district court is Affirmed.

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

error should be dismissed. This court held the point not well taken and declined to dismiss the writ. The transaction between the pilot and the ship, it was held (pages 457, 458 of 2 Wall., 17 L. Ed. 805), gave rise to a quasi contract. 'The claim of the plaintiff below for half-pilotage fees, resting upon a transaction regarded by the law as a quasi contract, there is no just ground for the position that it fell with the repeal of the statute under which the transaction *445 was had. When a right has arisen upon a contract, or a transaction in the nature of a contract authorized by statute, and has been so far perfected that nothing remains to be done by the party asserting it, the repeal of the statute does not affect it, or an action for its enforcement. It has become a vested right which stands independent of the statute. And such is the position of the claim of the plaintiff below in the present action: the pilotage services had been tendered by him; his claim to the compensation prescribed by the statute was then perfect, and the liability of the master or owner of the vessel had become fixed.'

Respondent, however, insists that long prior to the extension of credit to the corporation by petitioner's assignor, the decisions of the Supreme Court of California had established that the repeal of a law creating such a liability as that here involved extinguishes the cause of action; and that this amounted to a construction of the constitutional provision which entered into the contract and will be followed and applied by this court. Warburton v. White, 176 U. S. 484, 495, 20 S. Ct. 404, 44 L. Ed. 555; Ennis Water Works v. Ennis, 233 U. S. 652, 657, 34 S. Ct. 767, 58 L. Ed. 1139. But upon a careful consideration of the California cases referred to, we are of opinion that they fail to establish the premises upon which the conclusion is based.

The decisions chiefly relied upon are Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 155 P. 90, and Willcox v. Edwards, 162 Cal. 455, 123 P. 276, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1392; Moss v. Smith, involved section 309 of the Civil Code of California, which created a liability against directors who had participated in the creation of debts in excess of the subscribed capital stock. Suit was brought to enforce this liability against directors of a public utility company, but it appearing that during the pendency of the suit section 309 had been repealed as to public utility companies without a saving clause, the court held that all pending causes of action were thereby extinguished. The basis of the decision was that the statute was of a penal character; the court, however, saying that *446 it was not of vital consequence whether it be viewed as penal or remedial. In any event, the liability was not held to be contractual. On the contrary, the court said (page 787 of 171 Cal., 155 P. 90, 94), 'The right of action against these directors conferred by section 309 was a statutory right pure and simple, having no foundation in contract, nor any existence at common law.' And it is significant that the court perceived a determinative distinction between section 309 of the Civil Code, and the provision of the Constitution here under consideration. 'Nothing in Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 441, 64 P. 692, 69 P. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153,' the court said (page 785 of 171 Cal., 155 P. 90, 93), 'is in conflict with this; in the first place, because 438 the directors, under section 3, art. 12, of the Constitution, which section was the foundation of the action, are liable solely for loss sustained by embezzlement and misappropriation-a liability involving loss, and thus entirely different in character from that which appellants contend is imposed by section 309.' 'And that this statute,' the court already had said (page 783 of 171 Cal., 155 P. 90, 92), 'becomes highly penal in character the moment there is eliminated from it the consideration of compensation for loss is at once apparent.'

As already suggested, Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 432, 64 P. 692, 69 P. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153, arose under section 3, art. 12, of the state Constitution, and the court there, in pointing out the purpose and effect of that provision, said (page 444 of 136 Cal., 69 P. 77, 82, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153): 'The constitution merely makes the directors sureties for their fellow directors and for the officers of the corporation for moneys when so misappropriated as to make the officer misappropriating liable, and authorizing the creditors and stockholders to sue. * * * It is not penal in the technical sense, as it allows no recovery as a punishment, but only to compensate for a loss.'

And again at page 448 of 136 Cal., 69 P. 77, 82, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153: 'There is no difference between this case and the ordinary contract of a surety, unless it can be said that this liability is placed upon the director against his will. *447 Argument is hardly required to show that such is not the case. The state could refuse to grant corporate franchises altogether, or may grant on such terms as it pleases. The right to do business as a corporation, or to be a director, if I may speak of it as a right, is not a natural right. These directors took office knowing the responsibilities they assumed in so doing, and in the eye of the law did so as freely and voluntarily as they would have done had they signed a bond agreeing to be responsible for the corporate officers.'

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The distinction between the section of the Code and the constitutional provision, therefore, is clear. In the former the liability is wholly statutory; in the latter it is contractual.

In Willcox v. Edwards, supra, the court had under consideration a constitutional provision repealing a former provision of the constitution making valid certain contracts for the sale of stocks on margin. The right to sue for the recovery of money paid under such a contract, the court held, was not a vested right depending upon a quasi contract arising by operation of law from the terms of the original constitutional provision, but a right dependent upon that provision standing alone; and that upon its repeal, without a saving clause, pending litigation fell for want of authority to maintain it. But it plainly appears that the decision would have been otherwise if the court had deemed the right to be contractual.

Another case relied upon is Napa State Hospital v. Flaherty, 134 Cal. 315, 66 P. 322, 323. There a state statute made certain kindred of indigent insane persons liable for their board at the insane asylum to which such insane persons were committed. The right to maintain an action for nonpayment was conferred upon the board of trustees or directors. Such an action was brought; but the court held that the remedy had been repealed and the cause of action fell with it, putting its decision upon *448 the ground that 'where a right is created solely by a statute, and is dependent upon the statute alone, and such right is still inchoate, and not reduced to possession, or perfected by final judgment, the repeal of the statute destroys the remedy, unless the repealing statute contains a saving clause.'

The case here is entirely different. There the obligation which was imposed upon the relatives was purely statutory. No act was contemplated on their part by way of assumption of an obligation in order to fix the liability. No element of a contract was present. Here both parties acted. The creditor extended credit to the corporation; and his action in so doing, under the state constitutional provisions, brought into force for his benefit the costitutional obligation of the director, which, by becoming a director, the latter had voluntarily assumed and, thereby, in the eye of the law, created against himself a contractual liability in the nature of a suretyship. Harrison v. Remington Paper Co., supra, page 388 of 140 F., 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 954, 5 Ann. Cas. 314. Doubts which otherwise might have existed in respect of the character and effect of the transaction are no longer open. It is settled by decisions of this and other federal courts (Ettor v. Tacoma, and cases cited in connection therewith, supra) that, upon the facts here disclosed, a contractual obligation arose; and the right to enforce it, having become vested, comes within the protection of both the contract impairment clause in article 1, s 10, and the due process of law clause in the Fourteenth Amendment, of the federal Constitution.

Decree reversed.

Mr. Justice CARDOZO.

I am unable to concur in the reversal of this judgment.

'The directors or trustees of corporations and joint stock associations shall be jointly and severally liable to the creditors and stockholders for all moneys embezzled *449 or misappropriated by the officers of such corporation or joint stock association during the term 439 of office of such director or trustee.' Constitution of California, article 12, s 3, repealed November 4, 1930.

The Supreme Court of California has said that the liability thus created is contractual (Dean v. Shingle, 198 Cal. 652, 246 P. 1049); but only in a qualified sense, as the expression of a legal fiction, is the statement true, nor did the court that made it intend otherwise. The liability would not be destroyed though the directors when assuming office and repeatedly thereafter were to repudiate the obligation utterly. They would be held for all their protestations upon a liability imposed by law. Indeed, they would have to answer to the creditors

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Supreme Court of the United States

GALVAN
v.
PRESS.

No. 407.

Argued Jan. 11, 12, 1954.
Decided May 24, 1954.

Habeas corpus proceeding. The United States District Court for the Southern District of California, Southern Division, denied the petition, and the petitioner appealed. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, 201 F.2d 302, affirmed. On certiorari granted, the United States Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Frankfurter, held that even if petitioner, an alien, had joined Communist Party without knowledge of its advocacy of violence he was deportable as a party 'member', absent any claim that he had joined the party 'accidentally, artificially, or unconsciously in appearance only.'

Affirmed.

Mr. Justice Black and Mr. Justice Douglas dissented.

West Headnotes

[1] Habeas Corpus ⚿849
197k849 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 197k114)

Where issues of constitutionality and construction of 1950 Internal Security Act were raised for first time in habeas corpus proceeding, certiorari was granted for review of judgment affirming denial of writ.

[2] Aliens ⚿53.1
24k53.1 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 24k53)

An alien's membership in a proscribed organization may have been so nominal as to keep him out of the deportable class even though he did not join such organization (1) as a child, (2) by operation of law, or (3) to obtain necessities of life, since those instances, enumerated in 1951 corrective statute, were not intended to be exclusive. Immigration and Nationality Act, § 212(a) (28) (E), (I) (i), 8 U.S.C.A. § 1182(a) (28) (E), (I) (i).

[3] Aliens ⚿53.3
24k53.3 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 24k53)

For purpose of statutory provision making "membership" in Communist Party a basis for deportation of an alien, it is enough that alien join Party, aware that he was joining an organization known as Communist Party and operating as a distinct and active political organization, and that he did so of his own free will; cognizance of the Party's advocacy of violence not being a prerequisite to deportation. Immigration and Nationality Act, § 212(a) (28) (E), (I) (i), 8 U.S.C.A. § 1182(a) (28) (E), (I) (i); Internal Security Act of 1950, §§ 7, 13, 50 U.S.C.A. §§ 786, 792.

[4] Aliens ⚿54.1(6)
24k54.1(6) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 24k54(9))

On issue as to alien's deportability, evidence sustained finding that alien had in fact joined Communist Party. Immigration and Nationality Act, § 241(a) (6) (C), 8 U.S.C.A.§ 1251 (a) (6) (C)
.

[5] Aliens ⚿53.3
24k53.3 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 24k53)

Even if alien had joined Communist Party without knowledge of its advocacy of violence, he was deportable as a party "member", absent any claim that he had joined the party "accidentally, artificially, or unconsciously in appearance only." Immigration and Nationality Act, § 212(a) (28) (E), (I) (i), 8 U.S.C.A. § 1182(a) (28) (E), (I) (i); Internal Security Act of 1950, §§ 7, 13, 50 U.S.C.A. §§ 786, 792.

[6] Aliens ⚿39
24k39 Most Cited Cases

The power of Congress over the admission of aliens

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

REV_00265062

though they had ceased to be directors before the debts were in existence. If we put aside deceptive labels, borrowed from the law of quasi contracts, the tangle is unraveled. The petitioner had a contract with the corporation and not with any one else (Crane v. Hahlo, 258 U. S. 142, 146, 42 S. Ct. 214, 66 L. Ed. 514), but annexed by law to the obligation of that contract was a liability purely statutory imposed on the directors. Compare Christopher v. Norvell, 201 U. S. 216, 225, 26 S. Ct. 502, 50 L. Ed. 732, 5 Ann. Cas. 740; Bernheimer v. Converse, 206 U. S. 516, 529, 27 S. Ct. 755, 51 L. Ed. 1163. The decisions in California, when analyzed, will be found to hold nothing to the contrary. They amount merely to this, that the liability created by the statute, which is enforceable also by the shareholders, is not penal but remedial, and is limited to the damage resulting to the corporation from the loss of the embezzled moneys as if the director were a surety to the corporation for the acts of its defaulting officer. Dean v. Shingle, supra; compare, Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 432, 64 P. 692, 69 P. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153. In any event, this Court is not controlled by the label which the state court may affix to a liability growing out of a given state of facts. It determines for itself whether within the meaning of the Constitution the product is a contract to be protected*450 by the power of the nation. Appleby v. City of New York, 271 U. S. 364, 380, 46 S. Ct. 569, 70 L. Ed. 992; Coolidge v. Long, 282 U. S. 582, 597, 51 S. Ct. 306, 75 L. Ed. 562. As to this, its judgment is guided by realities and not by words. The section of the Constitution whereby contracts are secured against impairment is aimed at true agreements, and not at quasi contracts as distinguished from agreements implied in fact. Crane v. Hahlo, 258 U. S. 142, 146, 42 S. Ct. 214, 66 L. Ed. 514; Louisiana v. New Orleans, 109 U. S. 285, 288, 3 S. Ct. 211, 27 L. Ed. 936. Here whatever duty was assumed by a director through the acceptance of his office, was one that he owed in the first instance to the corporation itself, though the creditors and shareholders were privileged to enforce it. Dean v. Shingle, supra. Payment to the corporation before action brought would establish a defense, and even after action brought, any surplus remaining would go into the treasury. A distinction may exist between a liability cast upon directors and one cast upon the shareholders, who are quasi partners in the venture. Corning v. McCullough, 1 N. Y. 47, 49 Am. Dec. 287. To develop the implications of the distinction is unnecessary now.

I start then with the assumption that the petitioner had a contract with a corporation secured in certain contingencies by a statutory liability. I add the assumption that the state of California was not at liberty, after the contract had been made and a cause of action had accrued thereunder, to make the security defeasible if it wasindefeasible in its origin. Either the article of the Constitution prohibiting the impairment of contracts (U. S. Constitution, art. 1, s 10) or the Fourteenth Amendment (which, however, is not invoked) might then stand in the way. Hawthorne v. Calef, 2 Wall. 10, 17 L. Ed. 776; Steamship Co. v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. 450, 17 L. Ed. 805; Ettor v. Tacoma, 228 U. S. 148, 33 S. Ct. 428, 57 L. Ed. 773; Forbes Pioneer Boat Line v. Board of Commissioners, 258 U. S. 338, 42 S. Ct. 325, 66 L. Ed. 647. The difficulty with the petitioner's case is this, that his security in its origin was not vested, but contingent. The meaning of the California Constitution *451 is whatever the courts of California declare it to be. The obligation of the petitioner's contract is whatever the law of California attached to the contract at the hour of its making. Long before that time, the Supreme Court of that state had held that under the law of California a statutory cause of action, whether penal or remedial, may be canceled or modified by repeal or amendment until it has ripened into a judgment. Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 788, 155 P. 90; Napa State Hospital v. Flaherty, 134 Cal. 315, 66 P. 322; Willcox v. Edwards, 162 Cal. 455, 466, 123 P. 276, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1392. Compare Combes v. Franklin (Cal. Sup.) 1 P.(2d) 992, Id. (Cal. Sup.) 4 P.(2d) 157, the decision under review. Consistent with these decisions is a provision of the Political Code: 'Any statute may be repealed at any time, except when it is otherwise provided therein. Persons acting under any statute are deemed to have acted in contemplation of this power of repeal.' California Political Code, s 327, quoted in Moss v. Smith, supra, at page 787, of 171 Cal., 155 P. 90, 94. I assume for present purposes that the rule thus announced would be held of no effect if the statute and decisions declaring it had been made after Coombes became a creditor. Made as they were before that time they were reservations or conditions limiting the statutory liability, and to be read into the 440 statute, and hence into any contract to which the statute was an incident, as if written there in words. Citizens' Savings Bank v. Owensboro,

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

173 U. S. 636, 644, 19 S. Ct. 530, 43 L. Ed. 840; Farmers' Bank v. Fed. Reserve Bank, 262 U. S. 649, 660, 43 S. Ct. 651, 67 L. Ed. 1157, 30 A. L. R. 635. 'The claim of an irrepealable contract cannot be predicated upon a contract which is repealable.' Hammond Packing Co. v. Arkansas, 212 U. S. 322, 346, 29 S. Ct. 370, 378, 53 L. Ed. 530, 15 Ann. Cas. 645. Either the petitioner took his cause of action subject to such infirmities or contingencies as were attached to it by the law of the state of its creation, or he did not take anything.

This view of the case puts aside as irrelevant the provision of the California Constitution permitting the 452 amendment of corporate charters, and sustains the repeal upon the ground that the liability by the law of its creation was defeasible in its origin.

Mr. Justice BRANDEIS and Mr. Justice STONE join in this dissent.

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

not retroactive

Supreme Court of the United States.

SILVER
v.
SILVER.

No. 24.

Argued Oct. 25, 1929.
Decided Nov. 25, 1929.

Appeal from the Supreme Court of the State of Connecticut.

Action by Mae Silver against Benjamin Silver. From a judgment of the Supreme Court of Connecticut (108 Conn. 371, 143 A. 240), affirming a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

West Headnotes

[1] Federal Courts ⚿511.1
170Bk511.1 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 30k1082(1), 106k398(1))

Supreme Court will review only constitutional question considered in lower court's opinion, where record does not disclose others raised by appellant.

[2] Constitutional Law ⚿92
92k92 Most Cited Cases

Constitution does not forbid creation of new rights or abolition of old ones to attain permissible legislative object.

[3] Automobiles ⚿181(1)
48Ak181(1) Most Cited Cases

[3] Constitutional Law ⚿70.3(10)
92k70.3(10) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 92k70(3))

Wisdom of legislation restricting liability for injuries to gratuitous passengers in automobiles is not for courts.

[4] Automobiles ⚿181(1)
48Ak181(1) Most Cited Cases

[4] Constitutional Law ⚿245(2)
92k245(2) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 92k243)

Distinction between gratuitous passengers in automobiles and other vehicles by statute prohibiting recovery for injuries to former held not so evidently groundless as to warrant holding it arbitrary. Pub.Acts Conn.1927, p. 4404, c. 308; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

[5] Automobiles ⚿181(1)
48Ak181(1) Most Cited Cases

[5] Constitutional Law ⚿245(2)
92k245(2) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 92k243)

Legislative restriction on vehicle operators' liability for injuries to guests or licensees need not reach every class to which it might be applied. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

[6] Automobiles ⚿181(1)
48Ak181(1) Most Cited Cases

[6] Constitutional Law ⚿245(2)
92k245(2) Most Cited Cases

[6] Automobiles ⚿6
48Ak6 Most Cited Cases

Statute prohibiting recovery from automobile owners for injuries to gratuitous passengers held not unconstitutional, though not reaching all abuses. Pub.Acts Conn.1927, p. 4404, c. 308; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

*58 *118 Messrs. Thomas R. Robinson, Arthur B. O'Keefe, David M. Reilly and Herman Levine, all of New Haven, Conn., for appellant.

119 Mr. Wm. L. Hadden, of New Haven, Conn., for appellee.

121 Mr. Justice STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is an appeal under section 237 of the Judicial Code, as amended by Act of February 13, 1925 (28

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

USCA s 344), from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Connecticut upholding the constitutionality of a state statute. Chapter 308 of the Public Acts of Connecticut of 1927 (printed in the margin [FN1]) 122 provides that no person carried gratuitously as a guest in an automobile may recover from the owner or operator for injuries caused by its negligent operation. The appellant brought suit in the superior court of New Haven county against appellee, her husband, for injuries so sustained. Judgment for the defendant was affirmed by the Supreme Court. Both courts ruled that the statute barred appellant, a guest carried gratuitously, from recovery for injuries caused by ordinary negligence in the operation of the car, and the Supreme Court, by divided bench, held that the statute did not deny to appellant the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. 108 Conn. 371, 143 A. 240.

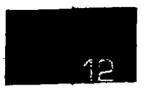
> FN1 Chapter 308. An Act Releasing Owners Of Motor Vehicles From Responsibility For Injuries To Passengers Therein.
>
> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Assembly convened:
>
> Section 1. No person transported by the owner or operator of a motor vehicle as his guest without payment for such transportation shall have a cause of action for damages against such owner or operator for injury, death or loss, in case of accident, unless such accident shall have been intentional on the part of said owner or operator or caused by his heedlessness or his reckless disregard of the rights of others.
>
> Sec. 2. This act shall not relieve a public carrier or any owner or operator of a motor vehicle while the same is being demonstrated to a prospective purchaser of responsibility for any injuries sustained by a passenger being transported by such public carrier or by such owner or operator.

[1][2] As the record does not disclose the constitutional grounds on which the appellant challenged the validity of the statute, our review will be limited to the single question arising under the Federal Constitution which was considered in the opinion of the court below. Saltonstall v. Saltonstall, 276 U. S. 260, 48 S. Ct. 225, 72 L. Ed. 565. We need not, therefore, elaborate the rule that the Constitution does not forbid the creation of new rights, or the abolition of old ones recognized by the common law, to attain a permissible legislative object. See Louis Pizitz Dry Goods Co. v. Yeldell, 274 U. S. 112, 116, 47 S. Ct. 509, 71 L. Ed. 952, 51 A. L. R. 1376; New York Central Railroad Co. v. White, 243 U. S. 188, 37 S. Ct. 247, 61 L. Ed. 667, L. R. A. 1917D, 1, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 629; Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, 243 U. S. 219, 37 S. Ct. 260, 61 L. Ed. 685, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 642; Wilmington Star Mining Co. v. Fulton, 205 U. S. 60, 74, 27 S. Ct. 412, 51 L. Ed. 708.

[3] The use of the automobile as an instrument of transportation is peculiarly the subject of regulation. We cannot assume that there are no evils to be corrected or permissible social objects to be gained by the present statute. We are not unaware of the increasing frequency of litigation in which passengers carried gratuitously in automobiles, often casual guests or licensees, have sought the recovery of large sums for injuries alleged to have 123 been due to negligent operation. In some jurisdictions it has been judicially determined that a lower standard of care should be exacted where the carriage in any type of vehicle is gratuitous. See Massaletti v. Fitzroy, 228 Mass. 487, 118 N. E. 168, L. R. A. 1918C, 264, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 1088; Marcienowski v. Sanders, 252 Mass. 65, 147 N. E. 275; Epps v. Parrish, 26 Ga. App. 399, 106 S. E. 297. Whether there has been a serious increase in the evils of vexatious litigation in this class of cases, where the carriage is by automobile, is for legislative determination, and, if found, may well be the basis of legislative 59 action further restricting the liability. Its wisdom is not the concern of courts.

[4] It is said that the vice in the statute is not that it distinguishes between passengers who pay and those who do not, but between gratuitous passengers in automobiles and those in other classes of vehicles. But it is not so evident that no grounds exist for the distinction that we can say a priori that the classification is one forbidden as without basis, and arbitrary. See State of Ohio ex rel. Clarke v. Deckebach, 274 U. S. 392, 397, 47 S. Ct. 630, 71 L. Ed. 1115.

[5][6] Granted that the liability to be imposed upon those who operate any kind of vehicle for the benefit of a mere guest or licensee is an appropriate subject of legislative restruction, there is no constitutional requirement that a regulation, in other respects permissible, must reach every class to which it might be applied-that the Legislature must be held rigidly to the choice of regulating all or none. Patsone v. Pennsylvania, 232 U. S. 138, 144, 34 S.



Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Ct. 281, 58 L. Ed. 539; Miller v. Wilson, 236 U. S. 373, 382, 384, 35 S. Ct. 342, 59 L. Ed. 628, L. R. A. 1915F, 829; International Harvester Co. v. Missouri, 234 U. S. 200, 215, 34 S. Ct. 859, 58 L. Ed. 1276, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 525; Barrett v. Indiana (1913) 229 U. S. 26, 29, 33 S. Ct. 692, 57 L. Ed. 1050. In this day of almost universal highway transportation by motorcar, we cannot say that abuses originating in the multiplicity of suits growing out of the gratuitous carriage of passengers in automobiles do not present so conspicuous an example of what the Legislature may regard as an evil, as to justify 124 legislation aimed at it, even though some abuses may not be hit. Carroll v. Greenwich Insurance Co., 199 U. S. 401, 411, 26 S. Ct. 66, 50 L. Ed. 246; People of State of New York ex rel. Bryant v. Zimmerman, 278 U. S. 63, 73, 49 S. Ct. 61, 73 L. Ed. 184. It is enough that the present statute strikes at the evil where it is felt and reaches the class of cases where it most frequently occurs.

Affirmed.

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

12

Supreme Court of the United States

NEW YORK CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
SARAH WHITE.

No. 320.

Argued February 29 and March 1, 1916.
Restored to docket for reargument November 13, 1916.
Reargued February 1, 1917.
Decided March 6, 1917.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court Appellate Division, Third Judicial Department, of the State of New York, to review a judgment affirmed by the Court of Appeals of that state, which affirmed an award by the state Workmen's Compensation Commission. Affirmed.

See same case below, in appellate division, 169 App. Div. 903, 152 N. Y. Supp. 1149; in court of appeals, 216 N. Y. 653, 110 N. E. 1051.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

West Headnotes

Commerce ⚿62.21
83k62.21 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 83k27(8))

A night watchman, injured while guarding tools and material for the erection of a depot, held not engaged in interstate commerce, within the federal Employers' Liability Act of April 22, 1908, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51 et seq., though such depot was intended to be used in interstate commerce.

Constitutional Law ⚿245(4)
92k245(4) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 92k245)

The exclusion of farm laborers and domestic servants from the New York Workmen's Compensation Act does not render the act violative of the Fourteenth Amendment, as denying equal protection.

Constitutional Law ⚿245(4)
92k245(4) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 92k245)

The requirement of the New York Workmen's Compensation Act, § 50, that the employer either secure insurance or furnish proof of his financial ability and deposit securities, does not violate the Fourteenth Amendment, U.S.C.A., as denying equal protection of law.

Constitutional Law ⚿301(4)
92k301(4) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 92k275(2))

The New York Workmen's Compensation Act, providing for compulsory compensation without regard to fault, except willful act of employe to produce injury, or his intoxication, and graduating the compensation according to earning power or dependency of survivors, held not to violate the U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14, as unwarrantably limiting freedom of contract.

Constitutional Law ⚿301(4)
92k301(4) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 92k301)

The New York Workmen's Compensation Act, providing for compulsory compensation without regard to fault except willful act of employe to produce injury, or his intoxication, and graduating the compensation according to earning power or dependency of survivors, held not to contravene U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14, as taking property without due process of law.

Constitutional Law ⚿313
92k313 Most Cited Cases

Trial by jury is not secured by U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

Workers' Compensation ⚿13
413k13 Most Cited Cases

Workmen's Compensation Acts and Industrial Insurance Acts held valid.

*247 *190 Messrs. William L. Visscher, Frank

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

REV_00265087

V. Whiting, Robert E. Whalen, and H. Leroy Austin for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Harold J. Hinman and E. Clarence Aiken, and Mr. Egburt E. Woodbury, Attorney General of New York, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Pitney delivered the opinion of the court:

A proceeding was commenced by defendant in error before the Workmen's Compensation Commission of the State of New York, established by the Workmen's Compensation Law of that state, [FN1] to recover *248 compensation from the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company for the death of her husband, Jacob White, who lost his life September 2, 1914, through an accidental injury arising out of and in the course of his employment under that company. The Commission awarded compensation in accordance with the terms of the law; its award was affirmed, without opinion, by the appellate 191 division of the supreme court for the third judicial department, whose order was affirmed by the court of appeals, without opinion. 169 App. Div. 903, 152 N. Y. Supp. 1149, 216 N. Y. 653, 110 N. E. 1051. Federal questions having been saved, the present writ of error was sued out by the New York Central Railroad Company, successor, through a consolidation of corporations, to the rights and liabilities of the employing company. The writ was directed to the appellate division, to which the record and proceedings had been remitted by the court of appeals. Sioux Remedy Co. v. Cope, 235 U. S. 197, 200, 59 L. ed. 193, 196, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 57.

The errors specified are based upon these contentions: (1) that the liability, if any, of the railroad company for the death of Jacob White, is defined and limited exclusively by the provisions of the Federal Employers' Liability Act of April 22, 1908, chap. 149, 35 Stat. at L. 65, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 8657, and (2) that to award compensation to defendant in error under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Law would deprive plaintiff in error of its property without due process of law, and deny to it the equal protection of the laws, in contravention of the 14th Amendment.

The first point assumes that the deceased was employed in interstate commerce at the time he received the fatal injuries. According to the record, he was a night watchman, charged with the duty of guarding tools and materials intended to be used in the construction of a new station and new tracks upon a line of interstate railroad. The Commission found, upon evidence fully warranting the finding, that he was on duty at the time, and at a place not outside of the limits prescribed for the performance of his duties; that he was not engaged in interstate commerce; and that the injury received by him and resulting in his death was an accidental injury arising out of and in the course of his employment.

The admitted fact that the new station and tracks were 192 designed for use, when finished, in interstate commerce, does not bring the case within the Federal act. The test is, 'Was the employee at the time of the injury engaged in interstate transportation, or in work so closely related to it as to be practically a part of it?' Shanks v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 239 U. S. 556, 558, 60 L. ed. 436, 438, L.R.A.1916C, 797, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 188. Decedent's work bore no direct relation to interstate transportation, and had to do solely with construction work, which is clearly distinguishable, as was pointed out in Pedersen v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 229 U. S. 146, 152, 57 L. ed. 1125, 1128, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 648, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 153, 3 N. C. C. A. 779. And see Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Harrington, 241 U. S. 177, 180, 60 L. ed. 941, 942, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 517, 11 N. C. C. A. 992; Raymond v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. this day decided [243 U. S. 43, 61 L. ed. 583, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 268]. The first point, therefore, is without basis in fact.

We turn to the constitutional question. The Workmen's Compensation Law of New York establishes forty-two groups of hazardous employments, defines 'employee' as a person engaged in one of these employments upon the premises, or at the plant, or in the course of his employment away from the plant of his employer, but excluding farm laborers and domestic servants; defines 'employment' as including employment only in a trade, business, or occupation carried on by the employer for pecuniary gain, 'injury' and 'personal injury' as meaning only accidental injuries arising out of and in the course of employment, and such disease or infection as naturally and unavoidably may result therefrom; and requires every employer subject to its provisions to pay or provide compensation according to a prescribed schedule for the disability or death of his employee resulting from an accidental personal injury arising out of and in the course of the employment, without regard to fault as a cause, except where the injury is occasioned by the wilful intention of the injured employee to bring about the injury or death of himself or of another, or where it results solely *193 from the intoxication of the injured employee while on duty, in which cases neither the injured employee nor any dependent shall receive compensation. By § 11 the prescribed liability is made exclusive, except that, if an employer fail to secure the payment of compensation as provided in § 50, an injured employee, or his legal representative, in case death results from the injury, may, at his option, elect to claim compensation under the act, or to maintain an action in the courts for damages, and in such an action it shall not be necessary to plead or prove freedom from contributory negligence, nor may the defendant plead as a defense that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, that the employee assumed the 249 risk of his employment, or that the injury was due to contributory negligence. Compensation under the act is not regulated by the measure of damages applied in negligence suits, but, in addition to providing surgical, or other like treatment, it is based solely on loss of earning power, being graduated according to the average weekly wages of the injured employee and the character and duration of the disability, whether partial or total, temporary or permanent; while in case the injury causes death, the compensation is known as a death benefit, and includes funeral expenses, not exceeding $100, payments to the surviving wife (or dependent husband) during widowhood (or dependent widowerhood) of a percentage of the average wages of the deceased, and if there be a surviving child or children under the age of eighteen years an additional percentage of such wages for each child until that age is reached. There are provisions invalidating agreements by employees to waive the right to compensation, prohibiting any assignment, release, or commutation of claims for compensation or benefits except as provided by the act, exempting them from the claims of creditors, and requiring that the compensation and benefits shall be paid only to employees or their dependents. *194 Provision is made for the establishment of a Workmen's Compensation Commission [FN2] with administrative and judicial functions, including authority to pass upon claims to compensation on notice to the parties interested. The award or decision of the Commission is made subject to an appeal, on questions of law only, to the appellate division of the supreme court for the third department, with an ultimate appeal to the court of appeals in cases where such an appeal would lie in civil actions. A fund is created, known as 'the state insurance fund,' for the purpose of insuring employers against liability under the law, and assuring to the persons entitled the compensation thereby provided. The fund is made up primarily of premiums received from employers, at rates fixed by the Commission in view of the hazards of the different classes of employment, and the premiums are to be based upon the total pay roll and number of employees in each class at the lowest rate consistent with the maintenance of a solvent state insurance fund and the creation of a reasonable surplus and reserve. Elaborate provisions are laid down for the administration of this fund. By § 50, each employer is required to secure compensation to his employees in one of the following ways: (1) By insuring and keeping insured the payment of such compensation in the state fund; or (2) through any stock corporation or mutual association authorized to transact the business of workmen's compensation insurance in the state; or (3) 'by furnishing satisfactory proof to the Commission of his financial ability to pay such compensation for himself, in which case the Commission may, in its discretion, require the deposit with the Commission of securities of the kind prescribed in § 13 of the Insurance Law, in an amount to be determined by the Commission, to secure his *195 liability to pay the compensation provided in this chapter.' If an employer fails to comply with this section, he is made liable to a penalty in an amount equal to the pro rata premium that would have been payable for insurance in the state fund during the period of noncompliance; besides which, his injured employees or their dependents are at liberty to maintain an action for damages in the courts, as prescribed by § 11.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

In a previous year, the legislature enacted a compulsory compensation law applicable to a limited number of specially hazardous employments, and requiring the employer to pay compensation without regard to fault. Laws 1910, chap. 674. This was held by the court of appeals in Ives v. South Buffalo R. Co. 201 N. Y. 271, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 162, 94 N.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

and their right to remain is necessarily very broad, touching as it does basic aspects of national sovereignty, and more particularly our foreign relations and the national security; and formulation of policies pertaining to entry of aliens and their right to remain here is entrusted exclusively to Congress.

[7] Constitutional Law ⚿252
92k252 Most Cited Cases

An "alien" is a "person" entitled to the same protection for his life, liberty and property under the due process clause as is afforded to a citizen. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 5.

[8] Constitutional Law ⚿251
92k251 Most Cited Cases

Fair play is the essence of "due process." U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 5.

[9] Constitutional Law ⚿251
92k251 Most Cited Cases

Substantive due process is a limitation upon all powers of Congress, including the war power. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 5.

[10] Constitutional Law ⚿197
92k197 Most Cited Cases

Ex post facto clause of federal Constitution is applicable only to punitive legislation. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 5.

[11] Constitutional Law ⚿197
92k197 Most Cited Cases

Ex post facto clause of the federal Constitution has no application to deportation, even though deportation may deprive a man of all that makes life worth living and may at times be the equivalent of banishment or exile. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 5.

[12] Constitutional Law ⚿274.3
92k274.3 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 92k318)

Policies pertaining to entry of aliens and their right to remain here are peculiarly concerned with political conduct of government, and in enforcement of those policies, executive branch of government must respect procedural safeguards of due process. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend 5.

[13] Aliens ⚿40
24k40 Most Cited Cases

[13] Constitutional Law ⚿199
92k199 Most Cited Cases

[13] Constitutional Law ⚿255(2)
92k255(2) Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 92k255)

Statute making present or former membership in Communist Party a basis for deportation of alien was not repugnant to either due process or ex post facto clauses of Federal Constitution. Internal Security Act of 1950, § 2(1), 50 U.S.C.A. § 781(1); U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 5.

[14] Courts ⚿90(3)
106k90(3) Most Cited Cases

Not being prepared to deem themselves wiser or more sensitive to human rights than their predecessors, especially those who had been most zealous in protecting civil liberties under Constitution, members of Supreme Court could not justifiably overturn a view of the Constitution which was deeply rooted and had been consistently adhered to. U.S.C.A.Const.Amend. 5.

*738 Messrs. 523 Harry Wolpin and A. L. Wirin, Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Mr. Oscar H. Davis, Washington, D.C., for respondent.

Mr. Justice FRANKFURTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

Petitioner, an alien of Mexican birth, first entered the United States in 1918 and has since resided here with only occasional brief visits to his native country. In the course of two questionings, in March 1948, by the Immigration and *739 Naturalization Service, he indicated that he had been a member of the Communist Party from 1944 to 1946. In March of 1949, the petitioner was served with a deportation warrant, and on the same day a preliminary deportation hearing was held to acquaint him with the charges against him--that after entry he

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

REV_00265063

E. 431, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 156 1 N. C. C. A. 517, to be invalid because in conflict with due process of law provisions of the state Constitution and of the 14th Amendment. Thereafter, and in the year 1913, a constitutional amendment was adopted, effective January 1, 1914, declaring:

'Nothing contained in this Constitution shall be construed to limit the power of the legislature to enact laws for the protection of the lives, health, or safety of employees; or for the payment, either by employers, or by employers and employees or otherwise, either directly or through a state or other system of insurance or otherwise, of compensation for injuries to employees or for death of employees resulting from such injuries without regard to fault as a cause thereof, except where the injury is occasioned by the wilful intention of the injured employee to bring about the injury or death of himself or of another, or where the injury results solely from the intoxication of the injured employee while on duty; or for the adjustment, determination and settlement, with or without trial by jury, of issues which may arise under such legislation; or to provide that the right of such compensation, and the remedy therefor shall 250 be exclusive of all *196 other rights and remedies for injuries to employees or for death resulting from such injuries; or to provide that the amount of such compensation for death shall not exceed a fixed or determinable sum; provided that all moneys paid by an employer to his employees or their legal representatives, by reason of the enactment of any of the laws herein authorized, shall be held to be a proper charge in the cost of operating the business of the employer.'

In December, 1913, the legislature enacted the law now under consideration (Laws 1913, chap. 816), and in 1914 re-enacted it (Laws 1914, chap. 41) to take effect as to payment of compensation on July 1 in that year. The act was sustained by the court of appeals as not inconsistent with the 14th Amendment in Jensen v. Southern P. Co. 215 N. Y. 514, L.R.A.1916A, 403, 109 N. E. 600, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 276; and that decision was followed in the case at bar.

The scheme of the act is so wide a departure from common-law standards respecting the responsibility of employer to employee that doubts naturally have been raised respecting its constitutional validity. The adverse considerations urged or suggested in this case and in kindred cases submitted at the same time are: (a) That the employer's property is taken without due process of law, because he is subjected to a liability for compensation without regard to any neglect or default on his part or on the part of any other person for whom he is responsible, and in spite of the fact that the injury may be solely attributable to the fault of the employee; (b) that the employee's rights are interfered with, in that he is prevented from having compensation for injuries arising from the employer's fault commensurate with the damages actually sustained, and is limited to the measure of compensation prescribed by the act; and (c) that both employer and employee are deprived of their liberty to acquire property by being prevented from making such *197 agreement as they choose respecting the terms of the employment.

In support of the legislation, it is said that the whole common-law doctrine of employer's liability for negligence, with its defenses of contributory negligence, fellow servant's negligence, and assumption of risk, is based upon fictions, and is inapplicable to modern conditions of employment; that in the highly organized and hazardous industries of the present day the causes of accident are often so obscure and complex that in a material proportion of cases it is impossible by any method correctly to ascertain the facts necessary to form an accurate judgment, and in a still larger proportion the expense and delay required for such ascertainment amount in effect to a defeat of justice; that, under the present system, the injured workman is left to bear the greater part of industrial accident loss, which, because of his limited income, he is unable to sustain, so that he and those dependent upon him are overcome by poverty and frequently become a burden upon public or private charity; and that litigation is unduly costly and tedious, encouraging corrupt practices and arousing antagonisms between employers and employees.

In considering the constitutional question, it is necessary to view the matter from the standpoint of the employee as well as from that of the employer. For, while plaintiff in error is an employer, and cannot succeed without showing that its rights as such are infringed (Plymouth Coal Co. v. Pennsylvania, 232 U. S. 571, 576, 59 L. ed. 713, 719, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 359; Jeffrey Mfg. Co. v. Blagg, 235 U. S. 571, 576, 59 L. ed. 364, 368, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 167, 7 N. C. C. A. 570), yet, as pointed out by the court of appeals in the Jensen Case (215 N. Y. 526), the exemption from further liability is an essential part of the scheme, so that the statute, if invalid as against the employee, is invalid as against the employer.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The close relation of the rules governing responsibility as between employer and employee to the fundamental rights *198 of liberty and property is, of course, recognized. But those rules, as guides of conduct, are not beyond alteration by legislation in the public interest. No person has a vested interest in any rule of law, entitling him to insist that it shall remain unchanged for his benefit. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 134, 24 L. ed. 77, 87; Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 532, 28 L. ed. 232, 237, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 292; Martin v. Pittsburg & L. E. R. Co. 203 U. S. 284, 294, 51 L. ed 184, 191, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 100, 8 Ann. Cas. 87; Second Employers' Liability Cases (Mondou v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co.) 223 U. S. 1, 50, 56 L. ed. 327, 346, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 44, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 169, 1 N. C. C. A. 875; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Tranbarger, 238 U. S. 67, 76, 59 L. ed. 1204, 1210, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 678. The common law bases the employer's liability for in juries to the employee upon the ground of negligence; but negligence is merely the disregard of some duty imposed by law;ant the nature and extent of the duty may be modified by legislation, with corresponding change in the test of negligence. Indeed, liability may be imposed for the consequences of a failure to comply with a statutory duty, irrespective of negligence in the ordinary sense; safety appliance acts being a familiar instance. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Taylor, 210 U. 251 S. 281, 295, 52 L. ed. 1061, 1068, 28 Sup Ct. Rep. 616, 21 Am. Neg. Rep. 464; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Rigsby, 241 U. S. 33, 39, 43, 60 L. ed. 874, 877, 878, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep 482.

The fault may be that of the employer himself, or--most frequently--that of another for whose conduct he is made responsible according to the maxim respondeat superior. In the latter case the employer may be entirely blameless, may have exercised the utmost human foresight to safeguard the employee; yet, if the alter ego, while acting within the scope of his duties, be negligent,-- in disobedience, it may be, of the employer's positive and specific command,-- the employer is answerable for the consequences. It cannot be that the rule embodied in the maxim is unalterable by legislation.

The immunity of the employer from responsibility to an employee for the negligence of a fellow employee is of comparatively recent origin, it being the product of the judicial conception that the probability of a fellow workman's *199 negligence is one of the natural and ordinary risks of the occupation, assumed by the employee and presumably taken into account in the fixing of his wages. The earliest reported cases are Murray v. South Carolina R. Co. (1841) 1 McMull. L. 385, 398, 36 Am. Dec. 268; Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp. (1842) 4 Met. 49, 57, 38 Am. Dec. 339, 15 Am. Neg. Cas. 407; Hutchinson v. York, N. & B. R. Co. (1850) L. R. 5 Exch. 343, 351, 19 L. J. Exch. N. S. 296, 299, 14 Jur. 837, 840, 6 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 580; Wigmore v. Jay (1850) L. R. 5 Exch. 354, 19 L. J. Exch. N. S. 300, 14 Jur. 838, 841; Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid (1858) 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 266, 284, 295, 4 Jur. N. S. 767, 6 Week Rep. 664, 19 Eng. Rul. Cas. 107. And see Randall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 109 U. S. 478, 483, 27 L. ed. 1003, 1005, 3 Sup. Ct Rep. 322; Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642, 647, 29 L. ed. 755, 758, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 590. The doctrine has prevailed generally throughout the United States, but with material differences in different jurisdictions respecting who should be deemed a fellow servant and who a vice principal or alter ego of the master, turning sometimes upon refined distinctions as to grades and departments in the employment. See Knutter v. New York & N. J. Teleph. Co. 67 N. J. L. 646, 650-653, 58 L.R.A. 808, 52 Atl. 565, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 109. It needs no argument to show that such a rule is subject to modification or abrogation by a state upon proper occasion.

The same may be said with respect to the general doctrine of assumption of risk. By the common law the employee assumes the risks normally incident to the occupation in which he voluntarily engages; other and extraordinary risks and those due to the employer's negligence he does not assume until made aware of them, or until they become so obvious that an ordinarily prudent man would observe and appreciate them; in either of which cases he does assume them, if he continues in the employment without obtaining from the employer an assurance that the matter will be remedied; but if he receive such an assurance, then, pending performance of the promise, the employee does not, in ordinary cases, assume the special risk. Seaboard

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Air Line R. Co. v. Horton, 233 *200 U. S. 492, 504, 58 L. ed. 1062, 1070, L.R.A.1915C, 1, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 635, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475, 8 N. C. C. A. 834, 239 U. S. 595, 599, 60 L. ed 458, 461, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 180. Plainly, these rules, as guides of conduct and tests of liability, are subject to change in the exercise of the sovereign authority of the state.

So, also, with respect to contributory negligence. Aside from injuries intentionally self-inflicted, for which the statute under consideration affords no compensation, it is plain that the rules of law upon the subject, in their bearing upon the employer's responsibility, are subject to legislative change; for contributory negligence, again, involves a default in some duty resting on the employee, and his duties are subject to modification.

It may be added, by way of reminder, that the entire matter of liability for death caused by wrongful act, both within and without the relation of employer and employee, is a modern statutory innovation, in which the states differ as to who may sue, for whose benefit, and the measure of damages.

But it is not necessary to extend the discussion. This court repeatedly has upheld the authority of the states to establish by legislation departures from the fellow-servant rule and other common-law rules affecting the employer's liability for personal injuries to the employee. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 208, 32 L. ed. 107, 108, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161; Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Herrick, 127 U. S. 210, 32 L. ed. 109, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1176; Minnesota Iron Co. v. Kline, 199 U. S. 593, 598, 50 L. ed. 322, 325, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 625; Tullis v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. 175 U. S. 348, 44 L. ed. 192, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Melton, 218 U. S. 36, 53, 54 L. ed. 921, 928, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 84, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676; Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Hackett, 228 U. S. 559, 57 L. ed. 966, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 581; Wilmington Star Min. Co. v. Fulton, 252 205 U. S. 60, 73, 51 L. ed. 708, 715, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 412; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Castle, 224 U. S. 541, 544, 56 L. ed. 875, 878, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 606. A corresponding power on the part of Congress, when legislating within its appropriate sphere, was sustained in Second Employers' Liability Cases (Mondou v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co.) 223 U. S. 1, 56 L. ed 327, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 44, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 169, 1 N. C. C. A. 875. And see El Paso & N. E. R. Co. v. Gutierrez, 215 U. S. 87, 97, 54 L. ed. 106, 111, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 21; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 221 U. S. 612, 619, 55 L. ed. 878, 883, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 621.

*201 It is true that in the case of the statutes thus sustained there were reasons rendering the particular departures appropriate. Nor is it necessary, for the purposes of the present case, to say that a state might, without violence to the constitutional guaranty of 'due process of law,' suddenly set aside all common-law rules respecting liability as between employer and employee, without providing a reasonably just substitute. Considering the vast industrial organization of the state of New York, for instance, with hundreds of thousands of plants and millions of wage earners, each employer, on the one hand, having embarked his capital, and each employee, on the other, having taken up his particular mode of earning a livelihood, in reliance upon the probable permanence of an established body of law governing the relation, it perhaps may be doubted whether the state could abolish all rights of action, on the one hand, or all defenses, on the other, without setting up something adequate in their stead. No such question is here presented, and we intimate no opinion upon it. The statute under consideration sets aside one body of rules only to establish another system in its place. If the employee is no longer able to recover as much as before in case of being injured through the employer's negligence, he is entitled to moderate compensation in all cases of injury, and has a certain and speedy remedy without the difficulty and expense of establishing negligence or proving the amount of the damages. Instead of assuming the entire consequences of all ordinary risks of the occupation, he assumes the consequences, in excess of the scheduled compensation, of risks ordinary and extraordinary. On the other hand, if the employer is left without defense respecting the question of fault, he at the same time is assured that the recovery is limited, and that it goes directly to the relief of the designated beneficiary. And just as the employee's assumption of ordinary risks at common law presumably was taken into account in fixing *202 the rate of wages, so the fixed responsibility of the employer, and the modified assumption of risk by the employee under the new system, presumably will be reflected in the wage scale. The act evidently is intended as a just settlement of a difficult problem, affecting one of the most important of social relations, and it is to be judged in its entirety. We have said enough to demonstrate that, in such an adjustment, the particular rules of the common law affecting the subject matter are not placed by the 14th Amendment beyond the reach of the lawmaking power of the state; and thus we are brought to the question whether the method of compensation that is established as a substitute transcends the limits of permissible state action.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

We will consider, first, the scheme of compensation, deferring for the present the question of the manner in which the employer is required to secure payment.

Briefly, the statute imposes liability upon the employer to make compensation for disability or death of the employee resulting from accidental personal injury arising out of and in the course of the employment, without regard to fault as a cause except where the injury or death is occasioned by the employee's wilful intention to produce it, or where the injury results solely from his intoxication while on duty; it graduates the compensation for disability according to a prescribed scale based upon the loss of earning power, having regard to the previous wage and the character and duration of the disability; and measures the death benefits according to the dependency of the surviving wife, husband, or infant children. Perhaps we should add that it has no retrospective effect, and applies only to cases arising some months after its passage.

Of course, we cannot ignore the question whether the new arrangement is arbitrary and unreasonable, from the standpoint of natural justice. Respecting this, it is important to be observed that the act applies only to disabling 203 or fatal personal injuries received in the course of hazardous employment in gainful occupation. Reduced to its elements, the situation to be dealt with is this: Employer and employee, by mutual consent, engage in a common operation intended to be advantageous to both; the employee is to contribute his personal services, and for these is to receive wages, and, ordinarily, nothing more; the employer is to furnish plant, facilities, organization, capital, credit, is to control and mange the operation, paying the wages and other expenses, disposing of the product at such prices as he can obtain, taking all the profits, *253 if any there be, and, of necessity, bearing the entire losses. In the nature of things, there is more or less of a probability that the employee may lose his life through some accidental injury arising out of the employment, leaving his widow or children deprived of their natural support; or that he may sustain an injury not mortal, but resulting in his total or partial disablement, temporary or permanent, with corresponding impairment of earning capacity. The physical suffering must be borne by the employee alone; the laws of nature prevent this from being evaded or shifted to another, and the statute makes no attempt to afford an equivalent in compensation. But, besides, there is the loss of earning power,--a loss of that which stands to the employee as his capital in trade. This is a loss arising out of the business, and, however it may be charged up, is an expense of the operation, as truly as the cost of repairing broken machinery or any other expense that ordinarily is paid by the employer. Who is to bear the charge? It is plain that, on grounds of natural justice, it is not unreasonable for the state, while relieving the employer from responsibility for damages measured by common-law standards and payable in cases where he or those for whose conduct he is answerable are found to be at fault, to require him to contribute a reasonable amount, and according to a reasonable and definite scale, 204 by way of compensation for the loss of earning power incurred in the common enterprise, irrespective of the question of negligence, instead of leaving the entire loss to rest where it may chance to fall,--that is, upon the injured employee or his dependents. Nor can it be deemed arbitrary and unreasonable, from the standpoint of the employee's interest, to supplant a system under which he assumed the entire risk of injury in ordinary cases, and in others had a right to recover an amount more or less speculative upon proving facts of negligence that often were difficult to prove, and substitute a system under which, in all ordinary cases of accidental injury, he is sure of a definite and easily ascertained compensation, not being obliged to assume the entire loss in any case, but in all cases assuming any loss beyond the prescribed scale.

Much emphasis is laid upon the criticism that the act creates liability without fault. This is sufficiently answered by what has been said, but we may add that liability without fault is not a novelty in the law. The common-law liability of the carrier, of the innkeeper, or him who employed fire or other dangerous agency or harbored a mischievous animal, was not dependent altogether upon questions of fault or negligence. Statutes imposing liability without fault have been sustained. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Mathews, 165 U. S. 1, 22, 41 L. ed. 611, 619, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 243; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Zernecke, 183 U. S. 582, 586, 46 L. ed. 339, 340, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 229.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

We have referred to the maxim, respondeat superior. In a well-known English case, Hall v. Smith, 2 Bing. 156, 160, 130 Eng. Reprint, 265, 9 J. B. Moore, 226, 2 L. J. C. P. 113, this maxim was said by Best, Ch. J., to be 'bottomed on this principle, that he who expects to derive advantage from an act which is done by another for him, must answer for any injury which a third person may sustain from it.' And this view has been adopted in New York. Cardot v. Barney, 63 N. Y. 281, 287, 20 Am. Rep. 533. The provision for compulsory compensation, in the act under consideration 205 cannot be deemed to be an arbitrary and unreasonable application of the principle, so as to amount to a deprivation of the employer's property without due process of law. The pecuniary loss resulting from the employee's death or disablement must fall somewhere. It results from something done in the course of an operation from which the employer expects to derive a profit. In excluding the question of fault as a cause of the injury, the act in effect disregards the proximate cause and looks to one more remote,--the primary cause, as it may be deemed,-- and that is, the employment itself. For this, both parties are responsible, since they voluntarily engage in it as coadventurers, with personal injury to the employee as a probable and foreseen result. In ignoring any possible negligence of the employee producing or contributing to the injury, the lawmaker reasonably may have been influenced by the belief that, in modern industry, the utmost diligence in the employer's service is in some degree inconsistent with adequate care on the part of the employee for his own safety; that the more intently he devotes himself to the work, the less he can take precautions for his own security. And it is evident that the consequences of a disabling or fatal injury are precisely the same to the parties immediately affected, and to the community, whether the proximate cause be culpable or innocent. Viewing the entire matter, it cannot be pronounced arbitrary and unreasonable for the state to impose upon the employer the absolute duty of making a moderate and definite compensation in money to every disabled employee, or, in case of his death, to those who were entitled to look to him for support, in lieu of *254 the common-law liability confined to cases of negligence.

This, of course, is not to say that any scale of compensation, however insignificant, on the one hand, or onerous, on the other, would be supportable. In this case, no criticism is made on the ground that the compensation prescribed 206 by the statute in question is unreasonable in amount, either in general or in the particular case. Any question of that kind may be met when it arises.

But, it is said, the statute strikes at the fundamentals of constitutional freedom of contract; and we are referred to two recent declarations by this court. The first is this: 'Included in the right of personal liberty and the right of private property--partaking of the nature of each--is the right to make contracts for the acquisition of property. Chief among such contracts is that of personal employment, by which labor and other services are exchanged for money or other forms of property. If this right be struck down or arbitrarily interfered with, there is a substantial impairment of liberty in the long-established constitutional sense.' Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1, 14, 59 L. ed. 441, 446 L.R.A.1915C, 960, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 240. And this is the other: 'It requires no argument to show that the right to work for a living in the common occupations of the community is of the very essence of the personal freedom and opportunity that it was the purpose of the [14th] Amendment to secure.' Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 41, 60 L. ed. 131, 135, L.R.A.1916D, 545, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7.

It is not our purpose to qualify or weaken either of these declarations in the least. And we recognize that the legislation under review does measurably limit the freedom of employer and employee to agree respecting the terms of employment, and that it cannot be supported except on the ground that it is a reasonable exercise of the police power of the state. In our opinion it is fairly supportable upon that ground. And for this reason: The subject matter in respect of which freedom of contract is restricted is the matter of compensation for human life or limb lost or disability incurred in the course of hazardous employment, and the public has a direct interest in this as affecting the common welfare. 'The whole is no greater than the sum of all the parts, and when the individual health, safety, and welfare are sacrificed or neglected, the state *207 must suffer.' Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 397, 42 L. ed. 780, 793, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383. It cannot be doubted that the state may prohibit and punish self-maiming and attempts at suicide; it may prohibit a man from bartering away his life or his personal security; indeed, the right to these is often declared, in bills of rights, to be 'natural and inalienable;' and the authority to prohibit contracts made in derogation of a lawfully-established policy of the state respecting compensation for accidental death or disabling personal injury is equally clear. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. McGuire, 219 U. S. 549, 571, 55 L. ed. 328, 340, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 259; Second Employers' Liability Cases (Mondou v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co.) 223 U. S. 1, 52, 56 L. ed. 327, 347, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 44, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 169, 1 N. C. C. A. 875.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

REV_00265094

We have not overlooked the criticism that the act imposes no rule of conduct upon the employer with respect to the conditions of labor in the various industries embraced within its terms, prescribes no duty with regard to where the workmen shall work, the character of the machinery, tools, or appliances, the rules or regulations to be established, or the safety devices to be maintained. This statute does not concern itself with measures of prevention, which presumably are embraced in other laws. But the interest of the public is not confined to these. One of the grounds of its concern with the continued life and earning power of the individual is its interest in the prevention of pauperism, with its concomitants of vice and crime. And, in our opinion, laws regulating the responsibility of employers for the injury or death of employees, arising out of the employment, bear so close a relation to the protection of the lives and safety of those concerned that they properly may be regarded as coming within the category of police regulations. Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 103, 23 L. ed. 819, 820; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Castle, 224 U. S. 541, 545, 56 L. ed. 875, 879, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 606 .

No question is made but that the procedural provisions of the act are amply adequate to afford the notice and opportunity to be heard required by the 14th *208 Amendment. The denial of a trial by jury is not inconsistent with 'due process.' Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 23 L. ed. 678; Frank v. Mangum, 237 U. S. 309, 340, 59 L. ed. 960, 985, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 582.

The objection under the 'equal protection' clause is not pressed. The only apparent basis for it is in the exclusion of farm laborers and domestic servants from the scheme. But, manifestly, this cannot be judicially declared to be an arbitrary classification, since it reasonably may be considered that the risks inherent in these occupations are exceptionally patent, simple, and familiar. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Cade, 233 U. S. 642, 650, 58 L. ed. 1135, 255 1137, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 678, and cases there cited.

We conclude that the prescribed scheme of compulsory compensation is not repugnant to the provisions of the 14th Amendment and are brought to consider, next, the manner in which the employer is required to secure payment of the compensation. By § 50, this may be done in one of three ways: (a) State insurance; (b) insurance with an authorized insurance corporation or asso ciation; or (c) by a deposit of securities. The record shows that the predecessor of plaintiff in error chose the third method, and, with the sanction of the Commission, deposited securities to the amount of $300,000, under § 50, and $30,000 in cash as a deposit to secure prompt and convenient payment, under § 25, with an agreement to make a further deposit if required. This was accompanied with a reservation of all contentions as to the invalidity of the act, and had not the effect of preventing plaintiff in error from raising the questions we have discussed.

The system of compulsory compensation having been found to be within the power of the state, it is within the limits of permissible regulation, in aid of the system, to require the employer to furnish satisfactory proof of his financial ability to pay the compensation, and to deposit a reasonable amount of securities for that purpose. The third clause of § 50 has not been, and presumably will *209 not be, construed so as to give an unbridled discretion to the Commission; nor is it to be presumed that solvent employers will be prevented from becoming self-insurers on reasonable terms. No question is made but that the terms imposed upon this railroad company were reasonable in view of the magnitude of its operations, the number of its employees, and the amount of its pay roll (about $50,000,000 annually); hence no criticism of the practical effect of the third clause is suggested.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

This being so, it is obvious that this case presents no question as to whether the state might, consistently with the 14th Amendment, compel employers to effect insurance according to either of the plans mentioned in the first and second clauses. There is no such compulsion, since self-insurance under the third clause presumably is open to all employers on reasonable terms that it is within the power of the state to impose. Regarded as optional arrangements, for acceptance or rejection by employers unwilling to comply with that clause, the plans of insurance are unexceptionable from the constitutional standpoint. Manifestly, the employee is not injuriously affected in a constitutional sense by the provisions giving to the employer an option to secure payment of the compensation in either of the modes prescribed, for there is no presumption that either will prove inadequate to safeguard the employee's interests.

Judgment affirmed.

FN1 Chap. 816, Laws 1913, as re-enacted and amended by chap. 41, Laws 1914, and amended by chap. 316, Laws 1914.

FN2 By chap. 674, Laws 1915, §§ 2 and 8, this Commission was abolished and its functions were conferred upon the newly created Industrial Commission.

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

13

Supreme Court of the United States.

MANLEY ETTOR and Mary T. Ettor, Plffs. in Err.,
v.
CITY OF TACOMA and Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Company.

No. 68.
EDWIN HOWARD and Emma Howard, Plffs. in Err.,
v.
CITY OF TACOMA and Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Company.

No. 69.
Nos. 68 and 69.

Argued December 6, 1912.
Decided April 7, 1913.

TWO WRITS OF ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Washington to review judgments which affirmed judgments of the Superior Court of Pierce County, in that state, directing verdicts in favor of a municipality in actions to recover damages for injuries to abutting property from an original street grading done under municipaly authority. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

See same case below, No. 68, 57 Wash. 50, 106 Pac. 478, 107 Pac. 1061; No. 69, 57 Wash. 698, 106 Pac. 481, 107 Pac. 1064.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⚿93(1)

92k93(1)

The right of abutting owners to compensation for consequential damages from an original grading under municipal direction given by Laws Wash.1893, c. 840, and Laws 1907, c. 153, is a vested property right which cannot be destroyed by repeal of the compensatory provision after the damage is done.

EMINENT DOMAIN ⚿70
148k70

The right of abutting owners to compensation for consequential damages from an original grading under municipal direction given by Laws Wash.1893, c. 840, and Laws 1907, c. 153, is a vested property right which cannot be destroyed by repeal of the compensatory provision after the damage is done.

*428 *149 Messrs. Stanton Warburton, John M. Boyle, E. B. Brockway, and C. M. Boyle for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Heman H. Field, George W. Korte, and T. L. Stiles for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Lurton delivered the opinion of the court:

These were actions to recover for damage inflicted upon abutting property in consequence of an original street grading done by the railroad company under authority and direction of the city of Tacoma.

At the time the grading was done there was in force an act of the Washington legislature which required the city 150 to make compensation for consequential damages due to an original street grading. Pending these suits, and while they were actually being heard, the provision of the act referred to which expressly required the city to provide for or make compensation for all such damage was amended so as to provide that the act should not apply to the original grading of any street. Laws of Washington, 1907, p. 316, and Laws of 1909, p. 151. When the attention of the trial court was called to this repealing act, it dircted a verdict for the city upon the theory that the right of action was statutory and fell with the statute, there being no saving clause. This judgment, upon the same ground, was affirmed by the supreme court of the state.

For the plaintiffs in error the contention, shortly stated, is, that the act of 1907 was the sole legislative authority of the city for making the cuts and fills in front of their premises upon the public street, and that that act expressly required the city to make provision for compensating an owner so damaged; and that their right to such compensation, having accrued while the act was in force, cannot be destroyed by subsequent legislation without a violation of the rights guaranteed by the 14th Amendment.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

In the absence of legislation requiring compensation for such damage the general rule of law is that a municipality, in making, grading, and improving streets, is the agent of the state, exercising in the performance of such work a governmental power, and is not liable for consequential injuries to property abutting, if it keep within the street, and use reasonable care and skill in doing the work. 4 Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. §§ 1674, 1677; Smith v. Washington, 20 How. 135, 15 L. ed. 858; Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 641, 25 L. ed. 336, 338; Humes v. Knoxville, 1 Humph. 403, 34 Am. Dec. 657. This was the general law as announced by the supreme court of Washington in its first opinion in the case of Fletcher v. Seattle, *151 43 Wash. 627, 86 Pac. 1046, 88 Pac. 843, and is the general law of the state, as announced by the court's opinion in the instant case. Where the benefits equaled the injury, there was, of course, no injustice in the application of the general rule. But where the damage exceeded the benefits, there was an apparent injustice in casting upon such an owner an undue share of the cost of an improvement for the public benefit. This was recognized in Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, supra, where municipal nonliability was said to be due to the fact that in improving 429 its highways the municipality was but the agent of the state, and that, as the state could not be sued, its agents were equally immune for improvements authorized by the law of the state, without the consent of the state. But this equity which exists when the benefits are less than the damage affords a strong foundation for legislation requiring compensation in such circumstances. This consideration doubtless led to the legislation of the state, requiring compensation for such damage, under which the rights of the plaintiffs in error are asserted.

Whatever may have been the authority of the city of Tacoma under its charter or the general law of the state, to take or damage property for the purpose of opening, making, improving, or grading its public streets, and its immunity from liability for consequential damages in making an original grading, prior to the legislation found in the two acts of 1893 and 1907, Laws of Washington, 1893, p. 189, and Laws of 1907, p. 316, it is plain that the acts in question cover the whole subject of its authority and its liability for taking private property or 'damaging' it, in either making, grading, or regrading its public streets. The two acts referred to are identical in every essential. The latter is a mere re-enactment of the first, by which its provisions are extended to a larger class of municipal corporations.

The act of 1893 was construed and applied by the *152 supreme court of the state in Fletcher v. Seattle, supra. The action was by the owner of premises which had sustained damage while the act was in force, in consequence of an original grading. He recovered a judgment, which, upon a first hearing, was reversed by the supreme court, that court holding that consequential damages arising from an original grading, when the work had been done with due care, was neither a taking nor a damaging of private property within the meaning of the Constitution of the state, requiring compensation for taking or damaging private property for public purposes. But, upon a rehearing, the attention of the court was for the first time called to the act of 1893, and the contention advanced that the only authority of the city to take or damage the property of the plaintiff for the purpose of grading the street was under that act, and that, by its terms, the city was required to make compensation for damage arising from an original grading. The construction of that act upon facts like those in the present case was thereby directly involved. It was urged that the 47th section did not require compensation for consequential damages, but in answer to this, the court said:

'We think the word 'damages' used in the section [the 47th] has the same significance and meaning that it has in other sections of the same act, and that it was used in its broad sense and includes consequential damages. We see no reason why this provision of the law should be segregated from the other provisions, and a different construction placed upon it, or why the provisions of the act in relation to the assessment of the damages should not apply to it as it does to the other sections; and if it does, the right of compensation is equally granted.

'It was said that the title of the act shows that it is legislation concerning the exercise of the right of eminent domain, but we think the title is sufficient to cover the *153 section objected to equally as well as the other sections in the act, and it was evidently had become a member of an organization which advocated the violent overthrow of the United States Government, and of an organization which distributed material so advocating. In December 1950, petitioner had a de novo hearing at which the transcripts of all earlier proceedings were, by agreement, made part of the record. Shortly after the hearing commenced, the examining officer lodged the additional charge against the petitioner that after entry he had been a member of the Communist Party, membership in which had been made a specific ground for deportation by the Internal Security Act of 1950, 64 Stat. 987, 1006, 1008.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

At this final hearing the evidence against the petitioner was derived from two principal sources. The first was 524 his own testimony during the two interrogations by immigration authorities in 1948. During those interrogations, he had testified as to the time and place he had joined the Communist Party, talked freely about his membership in the Party, and indicated generally that the distinction between the Party and other groups was clear in his mind; he had explained that the reason he had not applied for naturalization was that he feared his former Party membership might be revealed, and had offered to make amends by rejoining the Party as an undercover agent for the Government. At the hearing in December of 1950, petitioner denied that in his prior hearing he had admitted joining the Party, insisting that at the time he thought the question related to labor union activities. In response to a question whether he had ever attended meetings of the Spanish Speaking Club, an alleged Communist Party unit, he replied: 'The only meetings I attended were relating to the Fair Employment Practices Committee.'

The second source of information was the testimony of a Mrs. Meza to the effect that she had been present when petitioner was elected an officer of the Spanish Speaking Club. Petitioner denied the truth of this and other statements of Mrs. Meza calculated to establish his active participation in the Communist Party and said: 'She must have been under great strain to imagine all those things.'

The Hearing Officer found that petitioner had been a member of the Communist Party from 1944 to 1946 and ordered him deported on that specific ground. He did not deem it necessary to make findings on the more general charges contained in the original warrant. The Hearing Officer's decision was adopted by the Assistant Commissioner and an appeal was dismissed by the Board of Immigration Appeals. A petition for a writ of habeas corpus was denied by the District Court, and the dismissal 525 was affirmed by the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. 201 F.2d 302.

[1] On certiorari, petitioner challenged the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain deportation under s 22 of the Internal Security Act of 1950 and attacked the validity of the Act as applied to him. [FN1] These are issues that raise the constitutionality and construction of the *740 1950 Act for the first time and so we granted certiorari. 346 U.S. 812, 74 S.Ct. 53.

FN1. In his petition, petitioner also contended that the procedure used against him was unfair because of the new charge lodged by the Examining Officer in the December 1950 hearing. Apart from the fact that this claim was not pressed in the argument or petitioner's brief, it is sufficient to note that there was no element of surprise in the additional charge, since it was simply in more specific terms the same ground for deportation that petitioner already knew he had to defend against, namely, membership in the Communist Party. Furthermore, petitioner declined the Hearing Officer's offer of a continuance to meet the new charge.

Petitioner's contention that there was not sufficient evidence to support the deportation order brings into question the scope of the word 'member' as used by Congress in the enactment of 1950, whereby it required deportation of any alien who at the time of entering the United States, or at any time thereafter, was a 'member' of the Communist Party. [FN2] We are urged to construe the Act as providing for the deportation only of those aliens who joined the Communist Party fully conscious of its advocacy 526 of violence, and who, by so joining, thereby committed themselves to this violent purpose.

FN2. Section 22 of the Internal Security Act of 1950 provides that the Attorney General shall take into custody and deport any alien 'who was at the time of entering the United States, or has been at any time thereafter, * * * a member of any one of the classes of aliens enumerated in section 1(2) of this Act * * *.' Subparagraph (C) of s 1(2) lists 'Aliens who are members of or affiliated with (i)

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

the intention of the legislature to pass an act covering the whole subject of opening streets, and of providing methods of making compensation for damages where damages followed. The title not only provides for the exercise of the right of eminent domain, but, also, the taking and damaging of land and property for public purposes; and § 1 of the act empowers the city to condemn and also empowers it to damage any land or other property for the purpose of opening streets. Section 2 says, when the corporation authorities of any such city shall desire to condemn land or other property, or damage the same, for any purpose authorized by this act, such city shall provide, etc. In this case the city had the power to damage the respondents' land, and it was found that it did damage it, and it damaged it in a way that it was authorized by § 47 of this act; namely, by establishing a grade on the street upon which their property abutted. And this idea is manifested throughout the act. That the section does not contemplate such damages as are caused by an encroachment or actual trespass upon the lands of the owner, as is suggested by the appellant, is manifest from the language of the section itself, which evidently contemplates that the work will be upon the street, and not upon the abutting property.

'We are unable to find any more ambiguity in this section than in any other provision of the act; and under its provisions the plaintiffs are entitled to such damages as they can show they have suffered. The question of public policy and expense to the city are questions which are purely legislative.' 430 THE JUDGMENT OF THE LOWER COURT WAS THEREupOn affirmed.

The opinion so construing the act of 1893 was filed in September, 1906. In March, 1907, the act of 1893, then in force, was extended to a larger class of cities and *154 re-enacted, without any change in any material respect, the 1st, 2d, and 47th sections being re-enacted, the 47th section becoming in the later act § 48. While this act of 1907 was in force, the city directed the grading in question, and made or caused the railroad company to make cuts and fillsin the street in front of the premises of the plaintiffs in error, which resulted in large injury to their property. The city did not provide for compensation for the damage so done by any special assessment upon the property benefited. This brought into effect the provision of the 2d section, requiring the payment of such damage to be made out of the general funds of the city. Payment not having been made as required, the plaintiffs in error brought these actions to recover compensation.

The defense of the city, that it was but the agent of the state in improving the highways of the city, and therefore immune, because the state was immune, vanishes in the face of the fact that the state had absolutely coupled authority in the matter with an obligation to make compensation. The city had no authority save that which came from the very act which imposed an obligation. It would seem to need no argument to establish the contention that the obligation to make compensation to these plaintiffs in error could not be destroyed by subsequent legislation.

Neither of the acts provided any remedy for the enforcement of the obligation to make compensation. Both provided that the city might by ordinance arrange for the ascertainment of the damages, and for their collection by special assessment on the property benefited, or within a special assessment district. But the plain requirement of the 1st and 2d sections of both acts is that if the city does not so provide for special assessments, that it should make the compensation out of its general treasury. The repealing clause of the act of 1909 does not touch the *155 general features of the law beyond the provision that the 48th section of the act, which extended the obligation of compensation to original gradings, should not apply to damage arising from such gradings. It is a mistake to say that the act of 1907 gave a remedy where none existed before. What it did was to impose an obligation to compensate abutters injured by an original grading,--an obligation which, however meritorious, had no sanction in positive law. The remedy, if the city disregarded the obligation, was that afforded by the common law for the breach of any valid contractual or statutory duty. That was the remedy which was enforced by the Washington court in Fletcher v. Seattle, 43 Wash. 627, 86 Pac. 1046, 88 Pac. 843.

Statutes concerning remedies are such as relate to the course and mode of procedure to enforce or defend a substantive right. Matters which belong to the remedy are subject to change and alteration, and even repeal, provided the legislation does not operate to impair a contract or deprive one of a vested property right. If the changing or repealing statute leaves the parties a substantial remedy, the legislation does not exceed its authority. Rights and remedies shade one into the other so that it is sometimes difficult to say that a particular act creates a right or merely gives a remedy. So, also, a statute, under the form of taking away or changing a particular remedy, may take away an existing property right, or impair the obligation of a contract. That the state court has treated the act of 1907 as merely giving a remedy where none existed before, and the act of 1909, as merely repealing the remedy so given, is plain.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The court below gave a retrospective effect to the amendatory and repealing act by holding that the effect of the repeal was to destroy the right to compensation which had accrued while the act was in force. The obligation of the city was fixed. The plaintiffs in error had a claim which the city was as much under obligation 156 to pay as for the labor employed to do the grading. It was a claim assignable and enforceable by a common-law action for a breach of the statutory obligation.

The necessary effect of the repealing act, as construed and applied by the court below, was to deprive the plaintiffs in error of any remedy to enforce the fixed liability of the city to make compensation. This was to deprive the plaintiffs in error of a right which had vested before the repealing act,--a right which was in every sense a property right. Nothing remained to be done to complete the plaintiffs' right to compensation except the ascertainment of the amount of damage to their property. The right of the plaintiffs in error was fixed by the law in force when their property was damaged for public purposes, and the right so vested cannot be defeated by subsequent legislation. Elgin v. Eaton, 83 Ill. 535, 25 Am. Rep. 412; Healey v. New Haven, 49 Conn. 394; Harrington v. Berkshire, 22 Pick. 263, 33 Am. Dec. 741; People ex rel. Fountain v. Westchester County, 4 Barb. 64, are cases arising under street *431 or highway statutes. The principle has been applied in reference to rights accruing under a variety of statutes when affected by a subsequent change of the law. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. 450, 17 L. ed. 805; Miller v. Union Mill Co. 45 Wash. 199, 88 Pac. 130; Grey v. Mobile Trade Co. 55 Ala. 388, 28 Am. Rep. 729; Stephens v. Marshall, 3 Pinney (Wis.) 203; Gorman v. McArdle, 67 Hun, 484, 22 N. Y. 202, 62 Am. Dec. 160; Creighton N. W. 202, 62 Am. Dec. 160; Creighton v. Pragg, 21 Cal. 115; State Trust Co. v. Kansas City, P. & G. R. Co. 115 Fed. 367.

Certain cases have been cited in support of the action of the state court, among them Yeaton v. United States, 5 Cranch, 281, 3 L. ed. 101. But that was a case of a forfeiture to the United States. The repeal of the statute was held to end the proceeding, although a sentence had been pronounced and was pending upon appeal when the act under which it had been entered was repealed. No private right had 157 vested, and the government could abandon its own proceeding, if it saw fit, at any stage. Another case cited is East Saginaw Salt & Mfg. Co. v. East Saginaw, 13 Wall. 373, 20 L. ed. 611. For the purpose of encouraging the manufacture of salt, the state of Michigan, by a general statute addressed to no particular person or corporation, offered a bounty upon salt produced, and exempted from taxation the property engaged in the business. After a time the act was repealed. The claim was that the exemption constituted a contract, and that it could not be repealed without impairing the obligation of the contract. But this court said that the exemption did not constitute a contract, and was nothing more nor less than a law dictated by public policy for the encouragement of an industry. So long as the law was in force, the state promised the exemption and bounty; but there was no pledge that it should not be repealed at any time. In Wisconsin & M. R. Co. v. Powers, 191 U. S. 379, 385, 387, 48 L. ed. 229-232, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 107, the case was said to point out the distinction between 'an exemption in a special charter and general encouragement to all persons to engage in a certain enterprise;' and the same principle was applied to an act which provided an exemption to any corporation building a line of railroad north of certain lines of latitude. The court held that it was addressed to no one in particular, and constituted a mere announcement of policy not constituting a contract, and was therefore subject to repeal at any time. The case of Louisiana ex rel. Folson v. New Orleans, 109 U. S. 285, 27 L. ed. 936, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 211, has been cited. That case merely held that a judgment against the city under a statute for damage to private property, inflicted by a mob, did not constitute a contract, the obligation of which had been impaired by the repeal of a statute under which the city might have been compelled to levy a special tax for its satisfaction. The case turned upon the distinction between liability for a tort and liability under a contract.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

In the instant case the action is neither for a tort, nor *158 for a penalty, nor for a forfeiture, but for injury to property, actually accomplished before the repeal of the law under which the street was graded, which required compensation to be made. The right to compensation was a vested property right.

The judgments must be reversed and the cases remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[redacted]

Supreme Court of the United States.

ANGLE
v.
CHICAGO, ST. P., M. & O. RY. CO.

No. 73.

January 3, 1894.

Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Wisconsin. Reversed.

*241 Statement by Mr. Justice BREWER:

This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Wisconsin dismissing plaintiff's bill.

The bill was filed on the 23d of May, 1888, against the Chicago, Portage & Superior Railway Company, the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Company, and the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company. The Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Company was the only defendant served with process. It appeared, and on the 28th of July filed a demurrer to the bill, which, after argument, was sustained, and on September 2, 1889, the decree of dismissal was entered. 39 Fed. 143, 912.

The facts as stated in the bill are as follows: By two acts, of date June 3, 1856, and May 5, 1864, respectively, (11 Stat. 20, and 13 Stat. 66,) congress granted lands to the state of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of certain railroads, among others one 'from a point on the St. Croix river or lake, between townships 25 and 31, to the west end of Lake Superior, and from some point on the line of said railroad, to be selected by said state, to Bayfield.' These land grants were accepted by an act of the legislature approved October 8, 1856, (Laws Wis. 1856, p. 137,) and by a joint resolution of the legislature of the state of date March 20, 1865, (Gen. Laws Wis. 1865, p. 689,) and a map of definite location was duly filed, and accepted by the secretary of the interior.

By an act of March 4, 1874, (Laws Wis. 1874, p. 186,) the state granted to the North Wisconsin Railway Company, whose name was subsequently changed to Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Company, and who is the defendant herein, (to be hereafter called the Omaha Company,) that portion of the land grant applicable to the construction of the road from a point on St. Croix river to Bayfield, and to the Chicago & Northern Pacific Air-Line Railway Company, whose name was subsequently, and before 1878, changed to that of the Chicago, Portage & Superior Railway Company, (hereafter called the Portage Company,) so much of said grant as was applicable to the construction of the road from the west end of Lake Superior to a junction with the line running from St. Croix rever to Bayfield.

The eighth section of this act, which is the granting section to the latter company, is as follows:

'There is hereby granted to the Chicago and Northern Pacific Air-Line Railway Company all the right, title, and interest which the state of Wisconsin now has, or may hereafter acquire, in or to that portion of the lands granted to said state by said two acts of congress as is or can be made applicable to the construction of that part of the railway ctober 8, 1856, (Laws Wis. 1856, point of intersection of the branches of said grants, as fixed by the surveys and maps on file in the land office at Washington, and the west end of Lake Superior. This grant is made upon the express condition that said company shall construct, complete, and put in operation that part of its said railway above mentioned as soon as a railway shall be constructed and put in operation from the city of Hudson to said point of intersection, and within five years from its acceptance of said lands as herein provided, and shall also construct and put in operation the railway of said company from Genoa northerly, at the rate of twenty miles per year.'

The value of the lands thus granted was, at the time of the wrongs hereinafter described, $4,000,000.

By section 12 the company was required within 60 days to file with the secretary of state an acceptance of the grant upon the terms and conditions named therein, and also such security for the construction of the road as should be required by the governor. Both of these conditions were complied with.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Genoa, named in section 8, was the town on the southern boundary of the state of Wisconsin at which the line of the Chicago & Northern Pacific Air-Line Railway entered the state; and Hudson was the place on the St. Croix river, described in the acts of congress as the initial point of the road to be aided.

On March 16, 1878, an act was passed by the legislature of Wisconsin (Laws Wis. 1878, p. 442) extending the time for the construction of the Portage Company's road three years.

In the panic of 1873-74 the Portage Company had broken down under a load of debts and embarrassments, and remained inactive until 1880. At that time it secured the services of Willis Gaylord to assist in extricating it from its embarrassments, and in continuing the construction of its road. William H. Schofield, an experienced railway projector and financier, was induced to accept the office of president, and the co-operation and assistance of the New York, New England & Western Investment Company (hereafter called the Investment Company) was secured.

A new mortgage for $25,000 a mile, and a new issue of stock, was provided for. Seven *242 hundred thousand dollars of the new bonds and one million of the new stock were to be issued in full satisfaction of all outstanding stock, bonds, and other demands. In pursuance of these arrangements, it issued certificates of stock for $1,000,000, in the name of A. A. Jackson, general solicitor of the Portage Company, which, indorsed by him in blank, were deposited with the Trust Company, and it also executed its orders to the number of 90, calling for the delivery to John C. Barnes or bearer or a designated amount of said $1,000,000 of stock in 10 per cent. installments. These orders were in the following form:

'To the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company: This is to certify that, for value received, Mr. John C. Barnes or bearer is entitled to have and receive _____ shares of the capital stock of the Chicago, Portage and Superior Railway Company, which stock has been fully paid for and placed in your keeping as a special trust for delivery upon this order, and you are hereby authorized and directed to accept or certify in the usual manner this order for the delivery of said stock, and to deliver to the bearer hereof _____ shares of the said stock whenever and as often as any two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of the first mortgage bonds of the said railway company are sold or disposed of by said railway company or by its fiscal agent, or whenever and as often as any ten miles of the railroad of said railway company shall be built, as will be certified to by the president of said railway company; and in any event you are hereby directed to deliver to the bearer, on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1883, any of the said _____ shares of capital stock then remaining undelivered upon a surrender of this order therefor. [Seal.] Chicago, Portage and Superior Railway Company. By _____, President.'

On the margin: 'This order for the delivery of the bonds and stock of this company held in special trust is hereby approved and accepted. The Farmers' Loan and Trust Company. [Seal.]'

These orders were all delivered to John C. Barnes in exchange for and redemption of all the theretofore outstanding stock of the Portage Company, which stock was at once canceled, with the exception of two certificates for $25,000, which, by oversight or design on the part of Charles J. Barnes, vice president of the Portage Company, remained in his custody uncanceled.

The situation after these arrangements were made was such that the entire outstanding stock was in the possession and control of C. J. Barnes, J. C. Barnes, and A. A. Jackson, yet held by them in trust for the company. The further stock provided for was to be issued from time to time to assist in the sale of the bonds, until enough of the latter had been disposed of to construct the road. These arrangements having been perfected, the Portage Company, through its president, sought the alliance and support of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, which had recently completed an extension of its road to Chicago.

Three contracts were entered into of dates June 16, 1881, July 10, 1881, and September 30, 1881, by which the bonds of the company were to be disposed of, and money enough advanced for the construction of the road. The bill sets out fully the nature and scope of these contracts, and copies of them are attached as exhibits. It is unnecessary here to say more than that by them, taken in connection with the prior arrangements of the Portage Company, the latter obtained satisfactory assurances of abundant funds, and was placed in a position to fully perform its agreement with the state, and construct the railroad by at least May 5, 1882; all this, of course, upon the condition of no outside and wrongful interference.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Relying upon the sufficiency of its arrangements for money, it, on August 18, 1881, entered into a contract with Horatio G. Angle for the construction of about 65 miles of its railway, being that portion covered by the land grant heretofore referred to. By the terms of that contract Angle was to receive $8,500 per mile in cash and $5,000 per mile in the full-paid stock of the company, on condition that he completed the road on or before May 5, 1882. It also contracted for steel rails and fastenings to be delivered as the work of construction proceeded.

Angle commenced work, and had made such progress that on the 20th of January, 1882, he had 1,600 men employed along the line, and it was an assured fact that, unless interfered with, he would complete the railway, according to the terms of the contract, on or before May 5, 1882.

The bill further charges that about this time the Omaha Company conspired with other parties to wrest from the Portage Company its land grant, and to that end to prevent the completion of the contract by Angle and the construction of the road.

In the carrying out of this conspiracy the conspirators bribed Charles J. Barnes and A. A. Jackson, officers of the Portage Company, and who, either personally or as attorneys in fact for John C. Barnes, had the control of all the outstanding stock of the Portage Company, though holding it in trust for the benefit of the company, to betray their trust, and transfer the stock to one L. J. Gage, for the benefit of the Omaha Company.

Having thus secured the control of the stock, they caused notice thereof to be given to the officers of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. These gentlemen, finding that the control of the Portage Company was passing into the hands of hostile interests, surrendered the collateral which had been already transferred to them, and declined *243 to proceed further in the contracts which had been entered into.

Continuing the execution of this conspiracy, the Omaha Company notified the general manager of the Portage Company of the purchase of the outstanding stock, and advised and induced him to telegraph officially to the engineer in chief in charge of the work of construction, who had engaged in that work seven engineering corps, to forthwith call in these engineers, suspend their work, and pay them off. They also caused the general manager to notify the contractor, Angle, that the control of the company had been changed, and the English capitalists forced out, and also to telegraph to the merchants at Duluth and Superior City (who were furnishing supplies to the 1,600 men at work) that the company had been sold out, advising them to protect themselves, because the company could not pay or protect them.

In consequence of these notices, the several engineering corps were broken up, the engineers left the work, all the tools, materials, and other personal property belonging to the contractor and the company were attached at the suit of these merchant creditors, and the 1,600 laborers dispersed, and went elsewhere for work.

In further execution of this conspiracy it endeavored to bribe the president and directors of the Portage Company and the Investment Company to turn over the organization of the Portage Company at once to them. Failing in this, it caused a bill to be filed in the circuit court for Cook county, Illinois, falsely charging the president and board of directors with incurring imprudent obligations, and otherwise thus impairing the value of the million and twenty- five thousand of stock, purchased as heretofore set forth, and praying for a temporary injunction, which, on February 11, 1882, was granted without hearing or notice, and restrained the president and other officers of the Portage Company from doing any act or thing whatsoever in the name or behalf of the company during the continuance of the injunction.

In still further execution of the conspiracy, the Omaha Company caused the fact of the abandonment of the work and the dispersion of the laborers engaged thereon to be promptly and widely published throughout Wisconsin, and especially among the members of the legislature, then in session at Madison; concealing at the same time the means by which this had been accomplished.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Further, through its own agents, and especially through Jackson and Barnes, the corrupted officers of the Portage Company, it falsely represented to the legislature that no special progress had been made in the matter of constructing this road; that no considerable number of men had ever been at work; and that the Portage Company had finally abandoned it, and was wholly without means or credit to prosecute it.

On the strength of these representations the legislature, without inquiry or hearing, on February 16, 1882, (Laws Wis. 1882, p. 11,) hurriedly passed an act forfeiting and revoking the grant to the Portage Company, and bestowing it upon the Omaha Company, which forfeiture and regranting were confirmed by an act passed March 5, 1883.

The contract with Angle having been thus broken by the Portage Company, he commenced an action at law against that company. While this action was pending Angle died, but a revivor was had in the name of the present plaintiff, and on January 31, 1887, she recovered a judgment in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Wisconsin for $205,803.19.

Upon that judgment execution was issued and returned nulla bona, and thereupon this bill was filed to reach the land grant in the hands of the Omaha Company.

West Headnotes

Action ⚿2
13k2 Most Cited Cases

Torts ⚿12
379k12 Most Cited Cases

A railroad company which, by bribing the officials of a rival company, obtains control of the latter's stock, causes the calling in of its engineering parties so as to stop construction work, spreads abroad notices which break down the credit of the contractor and result in the seizure of his tools, and by such means prevents the completion of the road in time to earn a land grant, and then by false representations to the legislature secures a forfeiture of the lands and a subsequent grant to itself, is liable to such contractor for the damage caused by these wrongful acts, and such damages may be enforced in equity against the lands in its hands, without questioning the validity of the legislature's action.

10 J. R. Doolittle, Thomas Ewing, M. I. Southard, F. J. Lamb, and B. W. Jones, for appellant.

Thomas Wilson and John F. Dillon, for appellee.

Mr. Justice BREWER, after stating the facts in the foregoing language, delivered the opinion of the court.

That which attracts notice on even a casual reading of the bill--the truth of all the allegations in which must be taken, upon this record, to be admitted by the demurrer--is the fact that, while Angle was actively engaged in executing a contract which he had with the Portage Company,--a contract whose execution had proceeded so far that its successful completion within the time necessary to secure to the Portage Company its land grant was assured, and when neither he nor the Portage Company was moving or had any disposition to break that contract or stop the work,--through the direct and active efforts of the Omaha Company the performance of that contract was prevented, the profits which Angle would have received from a completion of the contract were lost to him, and the land grant to the Portage Company was wrested from it.

Surely it would seem that the recital of these facts would carry with it an assurance that there was some remedy which the law would give to Angle and the Portage Company for the losses they had sustained, and that such remedy would reach to the party, the Omaha Company, by whose acts these losses were caused.

That there were both wrong and loss is beyond doubt. And, as said by Croke, J., in Baily v. Merrell, 3 Bulst. 94, 95, 'damage without fraud gives no cause of action; but where these two do concur and meet together, there an action lieth.' 11 The Portage Company held a land grant worth four millions of dollars. It had contracted for the construction of its road, such construction to be completed in time to perfect its title to the 244 land. The contract had been so far executed that its full completion within the time prescribed was assured. The contractor had 1,600 men employed. The rails had been purchased. The company had lifted itself out of the embarrassments which years before had surrounded it. It had taken up all its old stock but $25,000, which was ignorantly or wrongfully withheld by one of its officers. It had issued 1,000,000 of new stock, had authorized a new issue of bonds, and had arranged for the canceling of all its obligations with 700,000 of these bonds and 1,000,000 with 700,000 of these bonds and 1,000,000 with a wealthy company for the advancement of moneys sufficient for its work, and had gone so far as to place in the hands of that company 100,000 of its bonds, upon which $50,000 in cash was to be advanced. Except through some wrongful interference, it was reasonably certain that everything would be carried out as thus planned and arranged.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

At this time the Omaha Company, which was a rival in some respects, and which had located a line parallel and contiguous to the line of the Portage Company, interferes, and interferes in a wrongful way. It bribes the trusted officers of the Portage Company to transfer the entire outstanding stock into its hands, or at least place it under its control. Being thus the only stockholder, it induces the general manager to withdraw the several engineering corps, whose presence was necessary for the successful carrying on of the work of constructing the road; to give such notice as to result in the seizure of all the tools and supplies of the contractor and the company, and the dispersion of all laborers employed. To prevent any action by the faithful officers of the Portage Company, it wrongfully obtains an injunction tying their hands. In the face of this changed condition of affairs, the company, which had negotiated with the Portage Company, and was ready to advance it money, surrendered the 100,000 of the bonds, and abandoned the arrangement. 12 By false representations to the legislature as to the facts of the case, it persuaded that body to revoke the grant to the Portage Company, and bestow the lands upon itself.

That this was a wrongful interference on the part of the Omaha Company, and that it resulted directly in loss to the contractor and to the Portage Company, is apparent. It is not an answer to say that there was no certainty that the contractor would have completed his contract, and so earned these lands for the Portage Company. If such a defense were tolerated, it would always be an answer in case of any wrongful interference with the performance of a contract, for there is always that lack of certainty. It is enough that there should be, as there was here, a reasonable assurance, considering all the surroundings, that the contract would be performed in the manner and within the time stipulated, and so performed as to secure the land to the company.

It certainly does not lie in the mouth of a wrongdoer, in the face of such probabilities as attend this case, to say that perhaps the contract would not have been completed even if no interference had been had, and that, therefore, there being no certainty of the loss, there is no liability.

Neither can it be said that the Omaha Company had a right to contend for these lands; that it simply made an effort, which any one might make, to obtain the benefit of this land grant. No rights of this kind, whatever may be their extent, justify such wrongs as were perpetrated by the Omaha Company. Here, bribery was resorted to to induce the trusted officers of the Portage Company to betray their trust, and to place at least the apparent ownership of the stock in the hands of the rival company.

Without notice, without hearing, and by false allegations, it secured an injunction to stay the hands of the honest officers of the Portage Company. Such wrongful use of the powers and processes of the court cannot be recognized as among the legitimate means of contest and competition. It burdens the whole conduct of the Omaha Company with the curse of wrongdoing, and makes its interference with the affairs of the Portage Company a wrongful interference.

13 Further, by false representations as to what the Portage Company has done and intends to do, it induced the legislature of the state to revoke the grant to the Portage Company, and bestow it upon itself. The result, and the natural result, of these wrongful actions on the part of the Omaha Company, was the breaking down of the Portage Company, the disabling it from securing the means of carrying on this work, the dispersion of the laborers, and the prevention of the contractor from completing his contract. It will not do to say that the contractor was not bound to quit the work, but might have gone on and completed his contract, and thus earned the lands for the Portage Company; nor that the wrongful act of the trusted officers of the Portage Company in betraying their trust could have been corrected by the Portage Company by appropriate suit in the courts; that the law in one shape or another would have offered redress to the Portage Company for all the wrongs that were attempted and done by the Omaha Company. Granting all of this, yet the fact remains that the natural, the intended, result of these wrongful acts was the breaking down of the Portage Company, the unwillingness of the foreign company to furnish it with money, and the prevention of the contractor from completing his contract.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

It is not enough to say that order remedies might have existed and been resorted to by the Portage Company, and that notwithstanding the hands of its officers were tied *245 by this wrongful injunction. It is enough that the Portage Company did break down; that it broke down in consequence of these wrongful acts of the Omaha Company, and that they were resorted to by the latter with the intention of breaking it down.

It has been repeatedly held that, if one maliciously interferes in a contract between two parties, and induces one of them to break that contract to the injury of the other, the party injured can maintain an action against the wrongdoer. Green v. Button, 2 Comp. M. & R. 707, in which the defendant, by falsely pretending to one party to a contract that he had a lien upon certain property, prevented such party from delivering it to the plaintiff, the other party to the contract, and was 14 held responsible for the loss occasioned thereby. Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216, in which a singer had entered into a contract to sing only at the theater of the plaintiff, and the defendant maliciously induced her to break that contract, and was held liable to the damages sustained by the plaintiff in consequence thereof. Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. Div. 333, in which it was held that an action lies against a third person who maliciously induces another to break his contract of exclusive personal service with an employer, which thereby would naturally cause, and did in fact cause, an injury to such employer. In the opinion of Brett, L. J., it was said 'that wherever a man does an act which in law and in fact is a wrongful act, and such an act as may, as a natural and probable consequence of it, produce injury to another, and which in the particular case does produce such an injury, an action on the case will lie. This is the proposition to be deduced from the case of Ashby v. White, [1 Smith, Lead. Cas. (8th Ed.) *264.] If these conditions are satisfied, the action does not the less lie because the natural and probable consequence of the act complained of is an act done by a third person, or because such act so done by the third person is a breach of duty or contract by him, or an act illegal on his part, or an act otherwise imposing an actionable liability on him.' Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555, in which a manufacturer was held entitled to maintain an action against a third party who, with the unlawful purpose of preventing him from carrying on his business, willfully induced many of his employes to leave his employment, whereby the manufacturer lost their services, and the profits and advantages which he would have derived therefrom. Benton v. Pratt, 2 Wend. 385. Rice v. Manley, 66 N. Y. 82, in which a party had contracted to sell and deliver to plaintiffs a quantity of cheese, but, having been made to believe through the fraud of the defendant that the plaintiffs did not want the cheese, sold and delivered it to him, and it was held that an action could be maintained against the defendant for the damages which the plaintiffs sustained from failing to get the cheese. Jones v. Stanly, 76 N. C. 355, in which the court said: 'It was decided in Haskins v. Royster, 70 N. C. 601, that if a person 15 maliciously entices laborers or croppers to break their contracts with their employer, and desert his service, the employer may recover damages against such person. The same reasons cover every case where one person maliciously persuades another to break any contract with a third person. It is not confined to contracts for service.'

Under these authorities, if the Omaha Company had, by its wrongful conduct, simply induced the Portage Company to break its contract with Angle, it would have been liable to him for the damages sustained thereby. A fortiori, when it not only induces a breach of the contract by the Portage Company, but also disables it from performance.

But there is still another aspect in which these transactions may be regarded. The Omaha Company became by its wrongful acts the sole stockholder in the Portage Company. It matters not that it might have been dispossessed of this position by appropriate action in the courts. It was, for the time at least, the sole stockholder. As such sole stockholder, it took advantage of its position and its powers to strip the Portage Company of its property, and secure its transfer to itself.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

the Communist Party of the United States * * *.' The substance of this provision was incorporated in the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, 66 Stat. 163, 205, 8 U.S.C. s 1251(a)(6)(C), 8 U.S.C.A. s 1251(a)(6)(C).

But the Act itself appears to preclude an interpretation which would require proof that an alien had joined the Communist Party with full appreciation of its purposes and program. In the same section under which the petitioner's deportation is sought here as a former Communist Party member, there is another provision, subsection (2)(E), [FN*] which requires the exclusion or deportation of aliens who are 'members of or affiliated with' an organization required to register under the Internal Security Act of 1950, [FN3] 'unless such aliens establish that they did not know or have reason to believe at the time they became members of or affiliated with such an organization * * * that such organization was a Communist organization.' 64 Stat. 1007. In describing the purpose of this clause, Senator McCarran, the Act's sponsor, said: 'Aliens who were innocent dupes when they joined a Communist Front organization, as distinguished from a Communist political organization (such as the Communist Party), would likewise not ipso facto be excluded or deported.' 96 Cong.Rec. 14180. In view of this specific escape provision for members of other organizations, it seems clear that Congress did not exempt 'innocent' members of the Communist Party.

FN* Now 8 U.S.C.A. s 1182(a)(28)(E).

FN3. Under s 7 of the Internal Security Act of 1950, 50 U.S.C.A. s 786, 'Communist-action' and 'Communist-front' organizations are required to register as such with the Attorney General. Section 13, 50 U.S.C.A. s 792, provides that where such an organization fails to register the Attorney General may institute proceedings requiring such registration.

While the legislative history of the 1950 Act is not illuminating on the scope of 'member,' considerable light was shed by authoritative comment in the debates on the statute which Congress enacted in 1951 to correct what it regarded as the unduly expanded interpretation by the Attorney General of 'member' under the 1950 Act. 65 527 Stat. 28. [FN] The amendatory statute dealt with certain specific situations which had been brought to the attention of Congress and provided that where aliens had joined a proscribed organization (1) when they were children, (2) by operation of law, or (3) to obtain the necessities of life, they were not to be deemed to have been 'members.' In explaining the measure, its sponsor, Senator McCarran, stated repeatedly and emphatically that 'member' was intended to have the same meaning in the 1950 Act as had been given it by the courts and administrative agencies since 1918, 97 Cong.Rec. 2368--2374. See S.Rep. *741 No. 111, 82d Cong., 1st Sess. 2; H.R.Rep. No. 118, 82d Cong., 1st Sess. 2. To illustrate what 'member' did not cover he inserted in the Record a memorandum containing the following language quoted from Colyer v. Skeffington, D.C., 265 F. 17, 72: 'Congress could not have intended to authorize the wholesale deportation of aliens who, accidentally, artificially, or unconsciously in appearance only, are found to be members of or affiliated with an organization of whose platform and purposes they have no real knowledge.' 97 Cong.Rec. 2373.

FN Now 8 U.S.C.A. s 1182(a)(28)(I)(i).

[2] This memorandum, as a weighty gloss on what Congress wrote, indicates that Congress did not provide that the three types of situations it enumerated in the 1951 corrective statute should be the only instances where membership is so nominal as to keep an alien out of the deportable class. For example, the circumstances under which the finding of membership was rejected in Colyer v. Skeffington, supra, would not have been covered by the specific language in the 1951 Act. In that case, the aliens passed 'from one organization into another, supposing the change to be a mere change of name, and that by assenting to membership in the new organization they had not really changed their affiliations or political or economic activities.' 265 F. at 72.

528 [3] On the other hand, the repeated statements that 'member' was to have the same meaning under the 1950 Act as previously, preclude an interpretation limited to those who were fully cognizant of the Party's advocacy of violence. For the judicial and administrative decisions prior to 1950 do not exempt aliens who joined an organization unaware of its program and purposes. See Kjar v. Doak, 7 Cir., 61 F.2d 566; Greco v. Haff, 9 Cir., 63 F.2d 863; In the matter of O.---, 3.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Now, what rights, if any, a corporation may have against a sole stockholder who wrongfully causes the transfer of all the property of the corporation to be made to himself, need not be inquired into. It is clear that this stockholder cannot secure this transfer from the corporation to itself of the property of the latter so as to deprive a creditor of the corporation of the payment of his debt.

To put it in another way: The Portage Company, a corporation, owed Angle $200,000. It had property with which that debt could be paid. The Omaha Company became the sole stockholder in the Portage Company. As such sole stockholder, it used its powers to transfer the property of the Portage Company to itself, and its conduct all the way through was marked by wrongdoing.

Whatever the Portage Company might do, Angle may rightfully hold the sole stockholder responsible for that payment, which the corporation would have made but for the wrongful acts of such stockholder.

16 But the stress of the defendant's contention is not that the bill fails to state a case of wrong, for which, generally speaking, the law would give a remedy, but that the action of the legislature of the state in revoking the land grant to the Portage Company and donating it to the Omaha Company is conclusive upon the courts, and prevents any recovery; and, secondly, that although actionable wrong on the part of the defendant may be disclosed by the bill, the *246 only remedy which the plaintiff has therefor is an action at law for damages, and no grounds are shown for the interposition of a court of equity.

With respect to the first of these matters, it is insisted that the Portage Company was in default at the very time that these wrongs on the part of the Omaha Company were charged to have been committed and the act of forfeiture was passed. By section 8 (the granting section) of the act of March 4, 1874, it was provided: 'This grant is made upon the express condition that said company shall construct, complete, and put in operation that part of its said railway above mentioned, as soon as a railway shall be constructed and put in operation from the city of Hudson to said point of intersection, and within five years from its acceptance of said lands as herein provided, and shall also construct and put in operation the railway of said company from Genoa northerly, at the rate of twenty miles per year.' The act of March 16, 1878, reads that 'the time limited for the construction of the railway * * * is hereby extended three years.' It is said that this act in effect merely struck out the word 'five' in the clause quoted, and substituted therefor the word 'eight,' leaving the other conditions of the grant unchanged. It is not claimed in the bill that the Portage Company had ever constructed any part of its road from Genoa northward, or that a railway had not been constructed and put in operation from the city of Hudson to the point of intersection, and therefore it is urged that it is not shown that the Portage Company was not in default, or that the legislature had not the absolute right to forfeit, as it did, by the act of February 16, 1882. It is contended, on the other hand, by the plaintiff, that the extension 17 was an absolute extension of three years from May 5, 1879, irrespective of the other two conditions in the original grant, and gave to the Portage Company an interest in the land grant which the legislature had no power to take away before May 5, 1882. It is further insisted by the defendant that, even if this claim of the plaintiff be sustained, the act of March 5, 1883, confirming the revocation and resumption of the land grant to the Portage Company, and the regranting of the same to the Omaha Company, was after the expiration of the full limit of extended time as thus claimed by the plaintiff, and that then the Portage Company had unquestionably failed to earn the grant, and had lost all right to the land. Hence, it is said that there was, in whatever aspect the matter may be looked at, a valid resumption by the state of the grant which it had made conditionally to the Portage Company, and a regrant of the lands to the Omaha Company; that the act of the legislature cannot be questioned; that full knowledge of all the situation must be presumed, and that no inquiry is permissible as to the motives which actuated the legislature, it being presumed that everything which it did it did rightly.

In this respect, the case of Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87, is relied upon. In that case a purchase of a large body of lands was made by James Gunn and others in the year 1795 from the state of Georgia, the contract for which was made in the form of a bill passed by the legislature. The title to some of these lands thus acquired passed by conveyances to Peck, who conveyed them to Fletcher. An action was brought on certain covenants in that deed. The third covenant was that all the title which the state of Georgia ever had in the premises had been legally conveyed to Peck, the guarantor. The second count assigned 'as a breach of this covenant, that the original grantees from the state of Georgia promised and assured divers members of the legislature, then sitting in general assembly, that if the said members would assent to and vote for the passing of the act, and if the said bill should pass, such members should have a share of, and be interested in, all the lands purchased from the said *18 state by virtue of such law; and that divers of the said members, to whom the said promises were made, were unduly influenced thereby, and, under such influence, did vote for the passing of the said bill; by reason whereof the said law was a nullity,' etc., 'and so the title of the state of Georgia did not pass to the said Peck.' In respect to this matter, the court, by Chief Justice Marshall, observed, among other things, as follows:

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

'This is not a bill brought by the state of Georgia to annul the contract, nor does it appear to the court by this count that the state of Georgia is dissatisfied with the sale that has been made. The case, as made out in the pleadings, is simply this: One individual, who holds lands in the state of Georgia, under a deed covenanting that the title of Georgia was in the grantor, brings an action of covenant upon this deed, and assigns, as a breach, that some of the members of the legislature were induced to vote in favor of the law, which constituted the contract, by being promised an interest in it, and that, therefore, the act is a mere nullity.

'This solemn question cannot be brought thus collaterally and incidentally before the court. It would be indecent in the extreme, upon a private contract between two individuals, to enter into an inquiry respecting the corruption of the sovereign power of a state. If the title be plainly deduced from a legislative act, which the legislature might constitutionally pass, if the act be clothed with all the requisite forms of a law, a court, sitting as a court of law, cannot sustain a suit brought by one individual against another founded on the allegation that the act is a nullity in consequence of the impure 247 motives which influenced certain members of the legislature which passed the law.'

The rule upon which this decision rests has been followed in many cases, and has become a settled rule of our jurisprudence. The rule, briefly stated, is that whenever an act of the legislature is challenged in court the inquiry is limited to the question of power, and does notextend to the matter of expediency, the motives of the legislators, or the reasons which were spread before them to induce the passage of the act. *19 This principle rests upon the independence of the legislature as one of the co-ordinate departments of the government. It would not be seemly for either of the three departments to be instituting an inquiry as to whether another acted wisely, intelligently, or corruptly. Upon that rule it is insisted that these two acts of the state of Wisconsin cannot be impeached; that whatever wrongs may in fact have been done by the Omaha to the Portage Company, the legislature of Wisconsin, in the exercise of its undoubted power, has taken away the lands from the Portage and given them to the Omaha Company, and, as its power is undoubted, no court can interfere or inquire as to why, or under the influence of what motives or information, those acts were passed; nor can any court decree, either directly or indirectly, that those lands, which were taken away from one company and given to the other, either legally or equitably, still remain the property of the first company, and subject to the payment of its debts.

But it must be remembered that the wrongs of the Omaha Company were done before the legislature passed either the act of 1882 or that of 1883, and it is to redress those wrongs that this suit was brought. Can it be that the legislature, by passing those acts, condoned the wrongs, and relieved the Omaha from any liability to the Portage Company? Did the resumption of the land grant and the regrant to the Omaha Company make lawful its acts in bribing the officers of the Portage Company? Did it relieve the Omaha Company from any liability for the wrongful use of the process of the courts in the injunction? Could it act judicially, and in effect decree that the wrongs done by the one company to the other created no cause of action? A right of action to recover damages for an injury is property, and has a legislature the power to destroy such property? An executive may pardon and thus relieve a wrongdoer from the punishment the public exacts for the wrong, but neither executive nor legislature can pardon a private wrong, or relieve the wrongdoer from civil liability to the individual he has wronged. The wrong was not one done by the state or in the act of the legislature in taking away the land grant, but in such proceedings *20 on the part of the Omaha Company as put the Portage Company in a position which apparently called for the action of the legislature. There is no more challenge of the validity of this legislation by suing the Omaha Company for the wrongs it did leading up to this legislation than there is in challenging the validity of a criminal proceeding by an action against the prosecutor for malicious prosecution. It may be, as counsel claim, that the legislature is presumed to act with full knowledge of the situation; that it knew of the wrongs done by the Omaha to the Portage Company; knew that those wrongs had disabled the Portage Company from proceeding with the work; knew that thereby a cause of action had arisen to the contractor, Angle, against the Portage Company, and also against the Omaha Company; and with all that knowledge in possession deliberately passed the statutes referred to, and yet it does not follow that its legislation was intended or was potent to relieve the Omaha Company from liability. There is in this suggestion no impugning the motives, the wisdom, or the power, of the legislature. It acts as the guardian of the public interests, to which all private interests must yield, and it may well have thought that, notwithstanding the wrong that had been done by the Omaha Company, the fact was obvious that the Portage Company had become disabled, and could not go on with the work; and that in subserviency to such public interest it was necessary that the grant be taken away from the former and given to the latter company, in order thus to expedite the construction. As the courts will not interfere with the action of the legislature, so it may rightfully be presumed that the legislature never intends to interfere with the action of the courts, or to assume judicial functions to itself. It may be presumed to have left to the courts the redress of the private wrongs done by the Omaha Company. In other words, it may have acted upon considerations like these: Public interest requires the speedy building of this road. The Portage Company cannot build it. The Omaha Company can, if aided by this grant. Therefore the public interests demand a taking away of the grant from the one company and giving it to the 21 other. If the disabled condition of the Portage Company has been brought about by the wrongs of the Omaha Company, the courts are open, and the accepted maxim in those tribunals is that, where there is a wrong, there is a remedy. It thus subserves the interests of the public, and leaves the redress of the wrong to that department which has not only the requisite jurisdiction, but also the appropriate machinery, for ascertaining the amount of the injury, and enforcing the due compensation.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Look at this from the opposite standpoint. When this matter was brought to the attention of the legislature, and its action invoked, was it confronted with only these alternatives? *248 Must it, even if it could, as a condition of subserving the public interests, condone the private wrong done by the one company to the other; or must it let the public interests be neglected until such time as the question of private wrong has been determined; or must it, without the possession of the suitable machinery for investigation, arbitrarily determine--as a condition of this transfer in subservience to public interests--the measure of injury done by the one company to the other, and the amount and character of the compensation to be rendered? Large and unnecessary stress would be laid upon the legislature if the question of public interest was always to be thus hampered by suggestions of injury and compensation between private individuals. While, if there be no such stress, abundant freedom of action is open to the legislature, the distinction between the separate functions of the co-ordinate departments of the government is preserved, and at the same time public interest and private justice may be secured. The legislature may proceed with sole regard in all its actions to the public interests, with the assurance that all questions of wrong and loss between individuals will be settled in the judicial department, and that its own action in subserviency to the public interest will bar no redress of a private wrong unless such bar be absolutely necessary to the accomplishment of the public interest.

But it is said that to permit this suit to be maintained, and to subject these lands in the possession of the Omaha Company 22 to the satisfaction of the judgment against the Portage Company, is, pro tanto, to nullify the action of the legislature; that in taking the lands away from the one company and giving them to the other it intended that the transfer should be absolute, without limitation, and subject to no contingencies or burdens. But it affirmatively expressed no such intention; it simply made the transfer, leaving the property subject to all the burdens and contingencies which might arise in the ordinary course of law. Suppose at the time of this transfer from the one company to the state, and from the state to the other company, there was an existing judgment in favor of the Portage against the Omaha Company, would it be for a moment contended that there was anything in the transfer which prevented the Portage Company from satisfying its judgment by a seizure and sale of the lands thus transferred to the Omaha Company? Unless there were in the words of the grant to the Omaha Company something which expressly tied up that land, it passed to the company, subject to seizure and sale in satisfaction of any of its past or future obligations.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Even if it be conceded that, under a true construction of the grant, taken in connection with the act extending the time for three years, the Portage Company was in default on February 16, 1882, and the legislature had then the absolute right to forfeit the grant, such concession would be no answer to the cause of action set out in the bill. For who can say that the legislature would have exercised that right of forfeiture? The mere fact that the Portage Company could not enforce at the time a legal right to the lands as against the state does not absolve the Omaha Company from liability for those wrongs which resulted in putting the Portage Company in a condition naturally calling for legislative action in furtherance of the public interest. If nothing of the kind had been done by the Omaha Company, and the Portage Company was, as it is stated, proceeding diligently in the work, with reasonable assurance that it would be completed within three or four months, it is fair to presume that the legislature would not have disturbed the grant, but would have permitted the Portage Company to fully earn that which it had already partially *23 earned. The selection of the Portage Company in tHe first instance was, of course, made by the legislature in good faith, and the time was extended with the intent that the Portage Company should do the work and have the grant; and, if the legislature saw that the company was doing the work, and would have it promptly completed, respect for the good faith of the legislature compels the conclusion that, but for the untoward circumstances precipitated upon the Portage Company by the wrongful acts of the Omaha Company, the act of February 16, 1882, would never have been passed. Assuredly it does not lie in the power of the wrongdoer--the party whose wrongs created that condition which induced the legislative forfeiture--to excuse its wrongs on the grounds that the legislature had the power to forfeit, and might have done it anyway. The cases of Benton v. Pratt, 2 Wend. 385, and Rice v. Manley, 66 N. Y. 82, are suggestive upon this question. In the former of these cases it appeared that certain parties had contracted with the plaintiff to purchase of him 20 hogs, to be delivered at a future day, nothing having been done to make the contract binding under the statute of frauds. While the plaintiff was driving his hogs, and preparing to fulfill his contract, the defendants, knowing the facts, fraudulently represented that he did not intend to deliver them, and thus induced those third parties to buy their hogs; and when the plaintiff arrived with his they refused to take them, simply because they had already a full supply. The point was made that the plaintiff could not recover, because there was no binding contract between him and the third parties; but the point was overruled, the court saying: 'It was not material whether the contract of the plaintiff with Seagraves & Wilson was 249 binding upon them or not, the evidence established beyond all question that they would have fulfilled it but for the false and fraudulent representations of the defendants.' And in the latter case the plaintiffs had made an agreement with one Stebbins to purchase from him a quantity of cheese, to be delivered at a future day; and that contract, too, was not binding by reason of the statute of frauds. The defendant, knowing of this, fraudulently, by means of a fictitious telegram, *24 persuaded Stebbins that the plaintiffs did not want the cheese, and would not take it, and thus himself secured a purchase of it. Here, too, it was objected, in defense to an action against him for the damages caused by a failure on the part of the plaintiffs to obtain the cheese from Stebbins, that there was no contract which could be enforced against Stebbins for the sale and delivery of the cheese; but the court overruled the objection, saying: 'Plaintiffs' actual damage is certainly as great as it would have been if Stebbins had been obliged to perform his contract of sale, and greater, for the reason that they cannot indemnify themselves for their loss by a suit against Stebbins to recover damages for a breach of the contract. Suppose a testator designed to give A. a legacy, and was prevented from doing it solely by the fraud of B.; in such case, while A. has no right to the legacy which he can enforce against the estate of the testator, yet both law and equity will furnish him appropriate relief against B., depending upon the facts of the case. Kerr, Fraud & M. 274, and cases cited; Bac. Abr. 'Fraud, B.' Suppose A. made a parol contract with B. for the purchase of land, and B. is ready and willing to convey, but is prevented from so doing by the fraudulent representations of C. as to A., by which B. is deceived, and induced to convey to C.; in such case, although A. could not have compelled B. to give him the conveyance, it would be a reproach to the law to hold that C. would not be liable to A. for the damage caused by the fraud.' The same line of thought applies to the case before us. While it cannot be affirmed with certainty that the legislature would not have passed the act of forfeiture, yet it is reasonable to presume that it would not, and that its act was induced by the situation of the Portage Company, which situation was brought about by the wrongful acts of the Omaha Company.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Our conclusions in respect to this matter may be summed up thus: The Portage Company would have completed the work but for the wrongful acts of the Omaha Company. In consequence of the disability thus caused, and also moved by the false representations of the Omaha Company, the legislature resumed its grant, and made a regrant to the Omaha *25 Company. The validity of that act is conceded. It is to be presumed the legislature acted with proper regard to the public interests, and without any improper motives or inducements. Conceding all this, it is equally to be presumed that it left the redress of private wrongs to the judicial department. It attached no conditions to the grant to the Omaha Company which would prevent the appropriation of those lands to the satisfaction of any claims against that company. And hence to hold the Omaha Company as trustee for the creditors of the Portage Company in respect to these lands neither impeaches the validity of the action of the legislature nor casts any imputation upon its knowledge or motives. It may also be noticed that the purpose of this grant from congress in the first place, and from the state to the companies in the second place, was to aid in the construction of the railroad. That purpose having already been accomplished, there is no thwarting public policy, or the purposes of the grant, if the lands granted shall now be appropriated, through the processes of the courts, to the satisfaction of any claims against the Omaha Company.

Passing now to the other of the two objections, it may be conceded that an action at law would lie for the damages sustained by the Portage Company through the wrongful acts of the Omaha Company. Indeed, that is a fact which underlies this whole case. Yet, while an action at law would lie, it does not follow that such remedy was either full or adequate. Waiving the question as to the solvency of the Omaha Company, and assuming that any judgment against it for damages could be fully satisfied by legal process, there remains the proposition that it is contrary to equity that the defendant should be permitted to enjoy unmolested that particular property, the possession of which it sought to secure, and did in fact secure, by its wrongful acts. Ought the Portage Company to be compelled to experiment with the solvency of the Omaha Company before coming into a court of equity? While no express trust attached to the title to these lands, either in the Portage or in the Omaha Company, while it may be conceded that when the legislature resumed *26 the grant it took the title discharged of any express trust or liability in favor of the creditors of the Portage Company, and might have transferred an absolute title to any third party beyond the reach or pursuit of the Portage Company, or its creditors, yet it is still true that the lands were given to the Portage Company, as they had been given by congress to the state in the first instance, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of this road; that a part of the work necessary for such construction had been done; and there is, therefore, an equity in securing, to the extent to which the work had been done, the application of these lands in payment thereof. And when the Omaha Company, by its wrongdoings, secured the full legal title to those lands, equity will hold that the party 250 who has been deprived of payment for his work from the Portage Company by reason of their having been taken away from it shall be able to pursue those lands into the hands of the wrongdoer, and hold them for the payment of that claim which, but for the wrongdoings of the Omaha Company, would have been paid by the Portage Company, partially at least, out of their proceeds. While no express trust is affirmed as to the lands, yet it is familiar doctrine that a party who acquires title to property wrongfully may be adjudged a trustee ex maleficio in respect to that property.

In Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (section 155) the author says, citing many cases: 'If one party obtains the legal title to property, not only by fraud or by violation of confidence or of fiduciary relations, but in any other unconscientious manner, so that he cannot equitably retain the property which really belongs to another, equity carries out its theory of a double ownership, equitable and legal, by impressing a constructive trust upon the property in favor of the one who is in good conscience entitled to it, and who is considered in equity as the beneficial owner.' And again, in section 1053: 'In general, whenever the legal title to property, real or personal, has been obtained through actual fraud, misrepresentations, concealments, or through undue influence, duress, taking advantage of one's weakness or necessities, or through any other similar means or 27 under any other similar circumstances which render it unconscientious for the holder of the legal title to retain and enjoy the beneficial interest, equity impresses a constructive trust on the property thus acquired in favor of the one who is truly and equitably entitled to the same, although he may never perhaps have had any legal estate therein; and a court of equity has jurisdiction to reach the property, either in the hands of the original wrongdoer or in the hands of any subsequent holder, until a purchaser of it in good faith and without notice acquires a higher right, and takes the property relieved from the trust. The forms and varieties of these trusts, which are termed 'ex maleficio' or 'ex delicto,' are practically without limit. The principle is applied wherever it is necessary for the obtaining of complete justice, although the law may also give the remedy of damages against the wrongdoer.'

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

These authorities are ample to sustain this suit. The property was in the Portage Company for the purpose of aiding in the construction of this road. Work was done by the plaintiff in that direction. Equity recognizes a right that that property should be applied in the payment for that work. The wrongdoing of the defendant, the Omaha Company, has wrested the title to this property from the Portage Company, and transferred it to itself. It has become, therefore, a trustee ex maleficio in respect to the property. It follows from these considerations that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to this bill, and the decree of dismissal must be reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to overrule the demurrer, and for further proceedings in conformity to law.

Mr. Justice HARLAN dissents from the opinion and judgment for the reasons stated by him at the circuit in Angle v. Railway Co., 39 Fed. 912, and Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Chicago, P. & S. Ry. Co., Id. 143.

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

15

Supreme Court of the United States

UNITED STATES
v.
KLEIN.

December Term, 1871

THIS was a motion by Mr. Ackerman, Attorney-General, in behalf of the United States, to remand an appeal from the Court of Claims which the government had taken in June, 1869, with a mandate that the same be dismissed for want of jurisdiction as now required by law.

The case was thus:

Congress, during the progress of the late rebellion, passed various laws to regulate the subject of forfeiture, confiscation, or appropriation to public use without compensation, of private property whether real or personal of non- combatant enemies.

The first was the act of July 13th, 1861. [FN1] It made liable to seizure and forfeiture all property passing to and fro between the loyal and insurrectionary States, and the vessels and vehicles by which it should be attempted to be conveyed.

1. The act of March 12th, 1863 (12 Stat. at Large, 820), to provide for the collection of abandoned and captured property in insurrectionary districts within the United States, does not confiscate, or in any case absolutely divest the property of the original owner, even though disloyal. By the seizure the government constituted itself a trustee for those who were entitled or whom it should thereafter recognize as entitled.

2. By virtue of the act of 17th July, 1862, authorizing the President to offer pardon on such conditions as he might think advisable, and the proclamation of 8th December, 1863, which promised a restoration of all rights 129 of property, except as to slaves, on condition that the prescribed oath be taken and kept inviolate, the persons who had faithfully accepted the conditions offered became entitled to the proceeds of their property thus paid into the treasury, on application within two years from the close of the war.

3. The repeal, by an act of 21st January, 1867 (after the war had closed), of the act of 17th July, 1862, authorizing the executive to offer pardon, did not alter the operation of the pardon, or the obligation of Congress to give full effect to it if necessary by legislation.

4. The proviso in the appropriation act of July 12th, 1870 (16 Stat. at Large, 235), in substance----

'That no pardon or amnesty granted by the President shall be admissible in evidence on the part of any claimant in the Court of Claims as evidence in support of any claim against the United States, or to establish the standing of any claimant in said court, or his right to bring or maintain suit therein; and that no such pardon or amnesty heretofore put in evidence on behalf of any claimant in that court be considered by it, or by the appellate court on appeal from said court, in deciding upon the claim of such claimant, or any appeal therefrom, as any part of the proof to sustain the claim of the claimant, or to entitle him to maintain his action in the Court of Claims, or on appeal therefrom, . . . but that proof of loyalty (such as the proviso goes on to mention), shall be made irrespective of the effect of any executive proclamation, pardon, amnesty, or other act of condonation or oblivion. And that in all cases where judgment shall have been heretofore rendered in the Court of Claims in favor of any claimant on any other proof of loyalty than such as the proviso requires, this court shall, on appeal, have no further jurisdiction of the cause, and shall dismiss the same for want of jurisdiction:

'And further, that whenever any pardon shall have heretofore been granted by the President to any person bringing suit in the Court of Claims for the proceeds of abandoned or captured property under the act of March 12th, 1863; and such pardon shall recite, in substance, that such person took part in the late rebellion, or was guilty of any act of rebellion against, or disloyalty to, the United States, and such pardon shall have been accepted, in writing, by the person to whom the same issued, without an express disclaimer of and protestation against such fact of guilt contained in such acceptance, such pardon and acceptance shall be taken and deemed in such suit in the said Court of Claims, and on appeal therefrom,

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

conclusive evidence that such person did take part in and give aid and comfort to the late rebellion, and did not maintain true allegiance or consistently adhere to the United States, and on proof of such pardon and acceptance the jurisdiction of the court in the case shall cease, and the court shall forthwith dismiss the suit of such claimant'---- is in conflict with the views expressed in paragraphs 1, 2, and 3, above; and is unconstitutional and void. Its substance being that an acceptance of a pardon without a disclaimer shall be conclusive evidence of the acts pardoned, but shall be null and void as evidence of rights conferred by it, both in the Court of Claims and in this court; it invades the powers both of the judicial and of the executive departments of the government.130

West Headnotes

Pardon and Parole ⚿23.1
284k23.1 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 284k23, 284k4)

Under the clause of the constitution giving the president "power to grant reprieves and pardons," he may grant a conditional pardon.

Pardon and Parole ⚿24
284k24 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 284k9)

"Pardon" includes amnesty, and blots out the offense pardoned and removes all its penal consequences, and can be granted on conditions.

Pardon and Parole ⚿26
284k26 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 284k11)

Act Jan. 21, 1867, 14 Stat. 377, repealing Act July 17, 1862, 12 Stat. 589, which authorized the executive to offer pardon to those engaged in rebellion, did not alter the operation of the general pardon given thereunder, or the obligation of congress to give full effect to such pardon by necessary legislation.

Pardon and Parole ⚿26
284k26 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 284k11)

Under Act July 17, 1862, 12 Stat. 589, authorizing the president to offer pardon on such conditions as he might think advisable, and the proclamation of December 8, 1863, 13 Stat. 737, promising a restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, on condition that the prescribed oath be taken and kept, the persons who complied with the conditions became entitled to the proceeds of their confiscated property, on application within two years from the close of the war.

United States ⚿66
393k66 Most Cited Cases

It is as much the duty of the government as of individuals to fulfil its obligations.

War and National Emergency ⚿12
402k12 Most Cited Cases

Under acts of Congress relating to property of citizens engaged in hostilities against the United States during the Civil War, no titles, except as to property used in actual hostilities, were divested in the insurgent states unless in pursuance of a judgment rendered after due legal proceedings.

War and National Emergency ⚿12
402k12 Most Cited Cases

The abandoned and captured property act of March 12, 1863, 12 Stat. 820, relating to property of citizens engaged in hostilities against the United States during the Civil War, was not intended to divest title to such property absolutely out of the original owners, but it was the purpose of Congress that the proceeds of the property for which the special provision of the act was made should go into the Treasury without change of ownership.

War and National Emergency ⚿12
402k12 Most Cited Cases

During the Civil War, property in certain states belonging to hostile organizations or employed in actual hostilities on land became, wherever taken, ipso facto, the property of the United States.

War and National Emergency ⚿25
402k25 Most Cited Cases

During the Civil War, property in ships and vessels

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

was not changed by capture alone but by regular judicial proceeding and sentence.

Constitutional Law ⚿54
92k54 Most Cited Cases

16 Stat. 235, prescribing the mode of proving the loyalty of the claimant, under 12 Stat. 820, 28 U.S.C.A. § 268, providing for the collection of abandoned and captured property in insurrectionary districts, and for the taking possession by the government, for the true owner, of the proceeds of such property, and declaring, in effect, that the unqualified acceptance of a pardon by such claimant, without a disclaimer of guilt, is conclusive evidence of his having committed the acts pardoned, but that it shall be null and void as evidence of the rights conferred by it, both in the court of claims, and in the supreme court on appeal, is unconstitutional, as invading the powers of the judicial branch of the government.

Constitutional Law ⚿72
92k72 Most Cited Cases

The President's power of pardon is not subject to legislation, and Congress can neither limit the effect of his pardon, nor exclude from its exercise any class of offenders.

Constitutional Law ⚿72
92k72 Most Cited Cases

The legislature cannot change the effect of a conditional pardon any more than the executive can change a law.

Courts ⚿448
106k448 k.

The Court of Claims is an inferior court which Congress authorizes, and has jurisdiction of contracts between the government and the citizen, from which appeal regularly lies to the Supreme Court.

Courts ⚿460
106k460 k.

The Congress has complete control over the organization and existence of the Court of Claims, and can confer or withhold the right of appeal from its decisions.

Courts ⚿460
106k460 k.

An act of Congress denying the right of appeal from Court of Claims in a particular class of cases is proper as an exercise of the power of Congress to make "such exceptions from the appellate jurisdiction" as should seem expedient to Congress.

Constitutional Law ⚿58
92k58 Most Cited Cases

The provision of 16 Stat. 235, prescribing the mode of proving the loyalty of the claimant, under 12 Stat. 820, 28 U.S.C.A. § 268, providing for the collection of abandoned and captured property in insurrectionary districts, and for the taking possession by the government, for the true owner, of the proceeds of such property, and declaring, in effect, that the unqualified acceptance of a pardon by such claimant, without a disclaimer of guilt, is conclusive evidence of his having committed the acts pardoned, but that it shall be null and void as evidence of the rights conferred by it, is unconstitutional, as invading the powers of the executive branch of the government.

Pardon and Parole ⚿4
284k4 k.

The president may grant a conditional pardon, provided the condition be compatible with the genius of our constitution and laws; and such condition, when accepted by the convict, will be binding upon him.

FN1 12 Stat. at Large, 257.

So an act of August 6th, 1861, [FN2] subjected to seizure and forfeiture all property of every kind, used or intended to be used in aiding, abetting, or promoting the insurrection, or allowing or permitting it to be so used.

FN2 Ib. 319.

These statutes require judicial condemnation to make the forfeiture complete.

A more general law, and one upon which most of

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

I. & N. Dec. 736.

It must be concluded, therefore, that support, or even demonstrated knowledge, of the Communist Party's advocacy of violence was not intended to be a prerequisite to deportation. It is enough that the alien joined the Party, aware that he was joining an organization known as the Communist Party which operates as a distinct and active political organization, and that he did so of his own free will. A fair reading of the legislation requires that this scope be given to what Congress enacted in 1950, however severe the consequences and whatever view one may have of the wisdom of the means which Congress employed to meet its desired end.

[4][5] On this basis, the Hearing Officer's finding that petitioner here was a 'member' of the Communist Party must be sustained. Petitioner does not claim that he joined the Party 'accidentally, artificially, or unconsciously in appearance only,' to use the words in Senator McCarran's memorandum. The two points on which he bases his defense against the deportation order are, first, that he did not join the Party at all, and that if he did join, he was unaware of the Party's true purposes and program. The evidence which must have been believed and relied upon for the Hearing Officer's finding that petitioner was a 'member' is that petitioner was asked to join the Party by a man he assumed to be an organizer, that he attended a number of meetings and that he did not apply for citizenship because he feared his Party 529 membership would become known to the authorities. In addition, on the basis of Mrs. Meza's testimony, the Hearing Officer was entitled to conclude that petitioner had been active in the Spanish Speaking Club, and, indeed, one of its officers. Certainly there was sufficient evidence to support a finding of membership. And even if petitioner was unaware of the Party's advocacy of violence, as he attempted to prove, the record does not show a relationship to the Party so nominal as not to make him a 'member' within the terms of the Act.

*742 [6][7][8][9][10][11][12][13][14] This brings us to petitioner's constitutional attack on the statute. Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 72 S.Ct. 512, 96 L.Ed. 586, sustained the constitutionality of the Alien Registration Act of 1940. 54 Stat. 670. That Act made membership in an organization which advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence a ground for deportation, notwithstanding that membership in such organization had terminated before enactment of the statute. Under the 1940 Act, it was necessary to prove in each case, where membership in the Communist Party was made the basis of deportation, that the Party did, in fact, advocate the violent overthrow of the government. The Internal Security Act of 1950 dispensed with the need for such proof. On the basis of extensive investigation Congress made many findings, including that in s 2(1) of the Act that the 'Communist movement * * * is a worldwide revolutionary movement whose purpose it is, by treachery, deceit, infiltration into other groups (governmental and otherwise), espionage, sabotage, terrorism, and any other means deemed necessary, to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship', 50 U.S.C.A. s 781(1) and made present or former membership in the Communist Party, in and of itself, a ground for deportation. Certainly, we cannot say that this classification by Congress is so baseless as to be violative of due process and therefore beyond the power of Congress.

530 In this respect--the dispensation with proof of the character of the Communist Party--the present case goes beyond Harisiades. But insofar as petitioner's constitutional claim is based on his ignorance that the Party was committed to violence, the same issue was before the Court with respect to at least one of the aliens in Harisiades.

The power of Congress over the admission of aliens and their right to remain is necessarily very broad, touching as it does basic aspects of national sovereignty, more particularly our foreign relations and the national security. Nevertheless, considering what it means to deport an alien who legally became part of the American community, and the extent to which, since he is a 'person,' an alien has the same protection for his life, liberty and property under the Due Process Clause as is afforded to a citizen, deportation without permitting the alien to prove that he was unaware of the Communist Party's advocacy of violence strikes one with a sense of harsh incongruity. If due process bars Congress from enactments that shock the sense of fair play-- which is the essence of due process--one is entitled to ask whether it is not beyond the power of Congress to deport an alien who was duped into joining the Communist Party,particularly when his conduct the seizures made during the rebellion was founded, is the act of July 17th, 1862. [FN3] It provides for the punishment of treason, and specifies its disqualifications and disabilities. In its sixth section, it provides that every person who shall be engaged in or be aiding the rebellion, and shall not cease and return to his allegiance within sixty days after proclamation made by the President of the United States, shall forfeit all his property, &c. The proclamation required by this act was issued by the President on the 25th day of July, 1862. [FN4] The sixty days expired September 23d, 1862.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

FN3 Ib. 589.

FN4 Id. 1266.

On the 12th of March, 1863, Congress passed another species of act--the one entitled 'An act to provide for the 131 collection of abandoned property, & c., in insurrectionary districts within the United States.' The statute authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint special agents to receive and collect all abandoned or captured property in any State or Territory in insurrection: 'Provided, That such property shall not include any kind or description which has been used, or which was intended to be used, for waging or carrying on war against the United States, such as arms, ordnance, ships, steamboats, or other watercraft, and their furniture, forage, military supplies, or munitions of war.'

The statute went on:

'And any person claiming to have been the owner of any such abandoned or captured property may, at any time within two years after the suppression of the rebellion, prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof in the Court of Claims; and on proof to the satisfaction of said court of his ownership of said property, of his right to the proceeds thereof, and that he has never given any aid or comfort to the present rebellion, to receive the residue of such proceeds after the deduction of any purchase-money which may have been paid, together with the expense of transportation and sale of said property, and any other lawful expenses attending the disposition thereof.'

Some other acts, amendatory of this one or relating to the Court of Claims, required proof of the petitioner's loyalty during the rebellion as a condition precedent to recovery.

By the already-mentioned confiscation act of July 17th, 1862, the President was authorized by proclamation to extend to persons who had participated in rebellion, pardon, and amnesty, with such exceptions, and at such times, and on such conditions as he should deem expedient for the public welfare.

And on the 8th of December, 1863, he did issue his proclamation, reciting the act, and that certain persons who had been engaged in the rebellion desired to resume their allegiance and reinaugurate loyal State governments within and for their respective States. And thereupon proclaimed 132 that a full pardon should be thereby granted to them, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, and in property cases where rights of third parties shall have intervened; and upon condition that every such person shall take and subscribe a prescribed oath of allegiance, and thenceforward keep and maintain said oath inviolate, &c.

Under this proclamation, V. F. Wilson, who during the rebellion had voluntarily become the surety on the official bonds of certain officers of the rebel confederacy, and so given aid and comfort, to it, took, February 15th, 1864, this oath of allegiance, and had kept the same inviolate.

He himself having died in 1865, one Klein, his administrator, filed a petition in the Court of Claims, setting forth Wilson's ownership of certain cotton which he had abandoned to the treasury agents of the United States, and which they had sold; putting the proceeds into the Treasury of the United States, where they now were, and from which the petitioner sought to obtain them. This petition was filed December 26th, 1865.

The section of the act of 1862, by which the President was authorized to extend pardon and amnesty on such conditions as he should deem expedient for the public welfare, was repealed on the 21st of January, 1867. [FN5]

FN5 14 Stat. at Large, 377.

The Court of Claims, on the 26th May, 1869, decided that Wilson had been entitled to receive the proceeds of his cotton, and decreed $125,300 to Klein, the administrator of his estate. An appeal was taken by the United States June 3d, following, and filed in this court on the 11th December, of the same year.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Previously to this case of Klein's the Court of Claims had had before it the case of one Padelford, quite like this one; for there also the claimant, who had abandoned his cotton and now claimed its proceeds, having participated in the rebellion, had taken the amnesty oath. The Court of Claims held that the oath cured his participation in the rebellion, 133 and so it gave him a decree for the proceeds of his cotton in the treasury. The United States brought that case here by appeal, [FN6] and the decree of the Court of Claims was affirmed; this court declaring that although Padelford had participated in the rebellion, yet, that having been pardoned, he was as innocent in law as though he had never participated, and that his property was purged of whatever offence he had committed and relieved from any penalty that he might have incurred. The judgment of this court, to the effect above mentioned, was publicly announced on the 30th of April, 1870.

FN6 United States v. Padelford, 9 Wallace, 531.

Soon after this--the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the government for the year 1870-71, then pending in Congress--the following was introduced as a proviso to an appropriation of $100,000, in the first section, for the payment of judgments in the Court of Claims, and with this proviso in it the bill became a law July 12th, 1870: [FN7]

FN7 16 Stat. at Large, 235.

'Provided, That no pardon or amnesty granted by the President, whether general or special, by proclamation or otherwise, nor any acceptance of such pardon or amnesty, nor oath taken, or other act performed in pursuance or as a condition thereof, shall be admissible in evidence on the part of any claimant in the Court of Claims as evidence in support of any claim against the United States, or to establish the standing of any claimant in said court, or his right to bring or maintain suit therein; nor shall any such pardon, amnesty, acceptance, oath, or other act as aforesaid, heretofore offered or put in evidence on behalf of any claimant in said court, be used or considered by said court, or by the appellate court on appeal from said court, in deciding upon the claim of said claimant, or any appeal therefrom, as any part of the proof to sustain the claim of the claimant, or to entitle him to maintain his action in said Court of Claims, or on appeal therefrom; but the proof of loyalty required by the Abandoned and Captured Property Act, and by the sections of several acts quoted, shall be made by proof of the matters required, 134 irrespective of the effect of any executive proclamation, pardon, amnesty, or other act of condonation or oblivion. And in all cases where judgment shall have been heretofore rendered in the Court of Claims in favor of any claimant, on any other proof of loyalty than such as is above required and provided, and which is hereby declared to have been and to be the true intent and meaning of said respective acts, the Supreme Court shall, on appeal, have no further jurisdiction of the cause, and shall dismiss the same for want of jurisdiction.

'And provided further, That whenever any pardon shall have heretofore been granted by the President of the United States to any person bringing suit in the Court of Claims for the proceeds of abandoned or captured property under the said act, approved 12th March, 1863, and the acts amendatory of the same, and such pardon shall recite in substance that such person took part in the late rebellion against the government of the United States, or was guilty of any act of rebellion against, or disloyalty to, the United States; and such pardon shall have been accepted in writing by the person to whom the same issued without an express disclaimer of, and protestation against, such fact of guilt contained in such acceptance, such pardon and acceptance shall be taken and deemed in such suit in the said Court of Claims, and on appeal therefrom, conclusive evidence that such person did take part in, and give aid and comfort to, the late rebellion, and did not maintain true allegiance or consistently adhere to the United States; and on proof of such pardon and acceptance, which proof may be heard summarily on motion or otherwise, the jurisdiction of the court in the case shall cease, and the court shall forthwith dismiss the suit of such claimant.'

The motion already mentioned, of the Attorney-General, that the case be remanded to the Court of Claims with a mandate that the same be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, as now required by law, was, of course, founded on this enactment in the appropriation bill of July 12th, 1870.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Mr. Akerman, Attorney-General, Mr. Bristow, Solicitor-General, and Mr. C. H. Hill, Assistant Attorney-General, in support of the motion:

The United States as sovereign are not liable to suit at 135 all, and if they submit themselves to suit it is ex gratia, and on such terms as they may see fit.

Accordingly the right of the Court of Claims to entertain jurisdiction of cases in which the United States are defendants, and to render judgments against them, exists only by virtue of acts of Congress granting such jurisdiction, and it is limited precisely to such cases, both in regard to parties and to the cause of action, as Congress has prescribed, which body may also define the terms on which judgments shall be rendered against the government, either as to classes of cases or as to individual cases.

Rules of evidence are at all times subject to legislative modification and control, and the alterations which are enacted therein by the legislature may be made applicable as well to existing as to future causes of action. In prescribing the evidence which shall be received in its courts, and the effect of that evidence, the state is exercising its acknowledged powers.

From the foregoing propositions it follows:

1. That Congress may prescribe what shall or shall not be received in evidence in support of a claim on which suit is brought against the government, or in support of the right of the claimant to maintain his suit, and, on the other hand, may declare what shall be the effect of certain evidence when offered in behalf of the government.

2. That it may withdraw entirely from the consideration of the court evidence of a particular kind in behalf of the claimant, even after the same has been submitted to and received by the court.

3. That it may, upon the presentation of proof of a certain description in behalf of the government, determine the jurisdiction of the court over the particular subject.

4. That it may, even in cases where judgment has been rendered in favor of the claimant on certain proof, and notwithstanding the proof was competent at the time of the rendering of the judgment, interpose when such cases are afterwards brought before the appellate court and require the same to be dismissed by the latter.136

These different things are what are done, and no more is done by different parts of the proviso in question.

Messrs. Bartley and Casey, P. Phillips, Carlisle, McPherson, and T. D. Lincoln, arguing in this or similar cases against the motion.

The CHIEF JUSTICE delivered the opinion of the court.

The general question in this case is whether or not the proviso relating to suits for the proceeds of abandoned and captured property in the Court of Claims, contained in the appropriation act of July 12th, 1870, debars the defendant in error from recovering, as administrator of V. F. Wilson, deceased, the proceeds of certain cotton belonging to the decedent, which came into the possession of the agents of the Treasury Department as captured or abandoned property, and the proceeds of which were paid by them according to law into the Treasury of the United States.

The answer to this question requires a consideration of the rights of property, as affected by the late civil war, in the hands of citizens engaged in hostilities against the United States.

It may be said in general terms that property in the insurgent States may be distributed into four classes:

1st. That which belonged to the hostile organizations or was employed in actual hostilities on land.

2d. That which at sea became lawful subject of capture and prize.

3d. That which became the subject of confiscation.

4th. A peculiar description, known only in the recent war, called captured and abandoned property.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The first of these descriptions of property, like property of other like kind in ordinary international wars, became, wherever taken, ipso facto, the property of the United States. [FN8]

FN8 Halleck's International Law.

The second of these descriptions comprehends ships and vessels with their cargoes belonging to the insurgents or 137 employed in aid of them; but property in these was not changed by capture alone but by regular judicial proceeding and sentence.

Accordingly it was provided in the Abandoned and Captured Property Act of March 12th, 1863, [FN9] that the property to be collected under it 'shall not include any kind or description used or intended to be used for carrying on war against the United States, such as arms, ordnance, ships, steamboats and their furniture, forage, military supplies, or munitions of war.'

FN9 12 Stat. at Large, 820.

Almost all the property of the people in the insurgent States was included in the third description, for after sixty days from the date of the President's proclamation of July 25th, 1862, [FN10] all the estates and property of those who did not cease to aid, countenance, and abet the rebellion became liable to seizure and confiscation, and it was made the duty of the President to cause the same to be seized and applied, either specifically or in the proceeds thereof, to the support of the army. [FN11] But it is to be observed that tribunals and proceedings were provided, by which alone such property could be condemned, and without which it remained unaffected in the possession of the proprietors.

FN10 Ib. 1266.

FN11 Ib. 590.

It is thus seen that, except to property used in actual hostilities, as mentioned in the first section of the act of March 12th, 1863, no titles were divested in the insurgent States unless in pursuance of a judgment rendered after due legal proceedings. The government recognized to the fullest extent the humane maxims of the modern law of nations, which exempt private property of non-combatant enemies from capture as booty of war. Even the law of confiscation was sparingly applied. The cases were few indeed in which the property of any not engaged in actual hostilities was subjected to seizure and sale.

The spirit which animated the government received special illustration from the act under which the present case arose. We have called the property taken into the custody 138 of public officers under that act a peculiar species, and it was so. There is, so far as we are aware, no similar legislation mentioned in history.

The act directs the officers of the Treasury Department to take into their possession and make sale of all property abandoned by its owners or captured by the national forces, and to pay the proceeds into the national treasury.

That it was not the intention of Congress that the title to these proceeds should be divested absolutely out of the original owners of the property seems clear upon a comparison of different parts of the act.

We have already seen that those articles which became by the simple fact of capture the property of the captor, as ordnance, munitions of war, and the like, or in which third parties acquired rights which might be made absolute by decree, as ships and other vessels captured as prize, were expressly excepted from the operation of the act; and it is reasonable to infer that it was the purpose of Congress that the proceeds of the property for which the special provision of the act was made should go into the treasury without change of ownership. Certainly such was the intention in respect to the property of loyal men. That the same intention prevailed in regard to the property of owners who, though then hostile, might subsequently become loyal, appears probable from the circumstance that no provision is anywhere made for confiscation of it; while there is no trace in the statute book of intention to divest ownership of private property not excepted from the effect of this act, otherwise than by proceedings for confiscation.

In the case of Padelford we held that the right to the possession of private property was not changed until actual seizure by proper military authority, and that actual seizure by such authority did not divest the title under the provisions of the Abandoned and

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Captured Property Act. The reasons assigned seem fully to warrant the conclusion. The government constituted itself the trustee for those who were by that act declared entitled to the proceeds of captured and abandoned property, and for those whom it should thereafter 139 recognize as entitled. By the act itself it was provided that any person claiming to have been the owner of such property might prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof, and, on proof that he had never given aid or comfort to the rebellion, receive the amount after deducting expenses.

This language makes the right to the remedy dependent upon proof of loyalty, but implies that there may be proof of ownership without proof of loyalty. The property of the original owner is, in no case, absolutely divested. There is, as we have already observed, no confiscation, but the proceeds of the property have passed into the possession of the government, and restoration of the property is pledged to none except to those who have continually adhered to the government. Whether restoration will be made to others, or confiscation will be enforced, is left to be determined by considerations of public policy subsequently to be developed.

It is to be observed, however, that the Abandoned and Captured Property Act was approved on the 12th of March, 1863, and on the 17th of July, 1862, Congress had already passed an act--the same which provided for confiscation-- which authorized the President, 'at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion, in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such time and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare.' The act of the 12th of March, 1863, provided for the sale of enemies' property collected under the act, and payment of the proceeds into the treasury, and left them there subject to such action as the President might take under the act of the 17th of July, 1862. What was this action?

The suggestion of pardon by Congress, for such it was, rather than authority, remained unacted on for more than a year. At length, however, on the 8th of December, 1863, [FN12] the President issued a proclamation, in which he referred to that act, and offered a full pardon, with restorationof all 140 rights of property, except as to slaves and property in which rights of third persons had intervened, to all, with some exceptions, who, having been engaged in the rebellion as actual participants, or as aiders or abettors, would take and keep inviolate a prescribed oath. By this oath the person seeking to avail himself of the offered pardon was required to promise that he would thenceforth support the Constitution of the United States and the union of the States thereunder, and would also abide by and support all acts of Congress and all proclamations of the President in reference to slaves, unless the same should be modified or rendered void by the decision of this court.

FN12 13 Stat. at Large, 737.

In his annual message, transmitted to Congress on the same day, the President said 'the Constitution authorizes the Executive to grant or withhold pardon at his own absolute discretion.' He asserted his power 'to grant it on terms as fully established,' and explained the reasons which induced him to require applicants for pardon and restoration of property to take the oath prescribed, in these words: 'Laws and proclamations were enacted and put forth for the purpose of aiding in the suppression of the rebellion. To give them their fullest effect there had to be a pledge for their maintenance. In my judgment they have aided, and will further aid, the cause for which they were intended. To now abandon them would not only be to relinquish a lever of power, but would also be a cruel and astounding breach of faith . . . For these and other reasons it is thought best that support of these measures shall be included in the oath, and it is believed the Executive may lawfully claim it in return for pardon and restoration of forfeited rights, which he has clear constitutional power to withhold altogether or grant upon the terms which he shall deem wisest for the public interest.'

The proclamation of pardon, by a qualifying proclamation issued on the 26th of March, 1864, [FN13] was limited to those persons only who, being yet at large and free from confinement 141 or duress, shall voluntarily come forward and take the said oath with the purpose of restoring peace and establishing the national authority.

FN13 13 Stat. at Large, 741.

On the 29th of May, 1865, [FN14] amnesty and pardon, with the restoration of the rights of property except as to slaves, and that as to which legal proceedings had been instituted under laws of the United States, were again offered to all who had, directly or indirectly, participated in the rebellion, except certain persons included in fourteen classes. All who embraced this offer were required to take and subscribe an oath of like tenor with that required by the first proclamation.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

FN14 13 Stat. at Large, 758.

On the 7th of September, 1867, [FN15] still another proclamation was issued, offering pardon and amnesty, with restoration of property, as before and on the same oath, to all but three excepted classes.

FN15 15 Id. 699.

And finally, on the 4th of July, 1868, [FN16] a full pardon and amnesty was granted, with some exceptions, and on the 25th of December, 1868, [FN17] without exception, unconditionally and without reservation, to all who had participated in the rebellion, with restoration of rights of property as before. No oath was required.

FN16 Ib. 702.

FN17 Ib. 711.

It is true that the section of the act of Congress which purported to authorize the proclamation of pardon and amnesty by the President was repealed on the 21st of January, 1867; but this was after the close of the war, when the act had ceased to be important as an expression of the legislative disposition to carry into effect the clemency of the Executive, and after the decision of this court that the President's power of pardon 'is not subject to legislation;' that 'Congress can neither limit the effect of his pardon, nor exclude from its exercise any class of offenders.' [FN18] It is not important, therefore, to refer to this repealing act further than to say that it is impossible to believe, while the repealed provision was in full force, and the faith of the legislature 142 as well as the Executive was engaged to the restoration of the rights of property promised by the latter, that the proceeds of property of persons pardoned, which had been paid into the treasury, were to be withheld from them. The repeal of the section in no respect changes the national obligation, for it does not alter at all the operation of the pardon, or reduce in any degree the obligations of Congress under the Constitution to give full effect to it, if necessary, by legislation.

FN18 14th January, 1867.

We conclude, therefore, that the title to the proceeds of the property which came to the possession of the government by capture or abandonment, with the exceptions already noticed, was in no case divested out of the original owner. It was for the government itself to determine whether these proceeds should be restored to the owner or not. The promise of the restoration of all rights of property decides that question affirmatively as to all persons who availed themselves of the proffered pardon. It was competent for the President to annex to his offer of pardon any conditions or qualifications he should see fit; but after those conditions and qualifications had been satisfied, the pardon and its connected promises took full effect. The restoration of the proceeds became the absolute right of the persons pardoned, on application within two years from the close of the war. It was, in fact, promised for an equivalent. 'Pardon and restoration of political rights' were 'in return' for the oath and its fulfilment. To refuse it would be a breach of faith not less 'cruel and astounding' than to abandon the freed people whom the Executive had promised to maintain in their freedom.

What, then, was the effect of the provision of the act of 1870 [FN19] upon the right of the owner of the cotton in this case? He had done certain acts which this court [FN20] has adjudged to be acts in aid of the rebellion; but he abandoned the cotton to the agent of the Treasury Department, by whom it has been sold and the proceeds paid into the Treasury of the 143 United States; and he took, and has not violated, the amnesty oath under the President's proclamation. Upon this case the Court of Claims pronounced him entitled to a judgment for the net proceeds in the treasury. This decree was rendered on the 26th of May, 1869; the appeal to this court made on the 3d of June, and was filed here on the 11th of December, 1869.

FN19 16 Stat. at Large, 235.

FN20 United States v. Padelford, 9 Wallace, 531.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The judgment of the court in the case of Padelford, which, in its essential features, was the same with this case, was rendered on the 30th of April, 1870. It affirmed the judgment of the Court of Claims in his favor.

Soon afterwards the provision in question was introduced as a proviso to the clause in the general appropriation bill, appropriating a sum of money for the payment of judgments of the Court of Claims, and became a part of the act, with perhaps little consideration in either House of Congress.

This proviso declares in substance that no pardon, acceptance, oath, or other act performed in pursuance, or as a condition of pardon, shall be admissible in evidence in support of any claim against the United States in the Court of Claims, or to establish the right of any claimant to bring suit in that court; nor, if already put in evidence, shall be used or considered on behalf of the claimant, by said court, or by the appellate court on appeal. Proof of loyalty is required to be made according to the provisions of certain statutes, irrespective of the effect of any executive proclamation, pardon, or amnesty, or act of oblivion; and when judgment has been already rendered on other proof of loyalty, the Supreme Court, on appeal, shall have no further jurisdiction of the cause, and shall dismiss the same for want of jurisdiction. It is further provided that whenever any pardon, granted to any suitor in the Court of Claims, for the proceeds of captured and abandoned property, shall recite in substance that the person pardoned took part in the late rebellion, or was guilty of any act of rebellion or disloyalty, and shall have been accepted in writing without express disclaimer and protestation against the fact so recited, such pardon or acceptance shall be taken as conclusive evidence 144 in the Court of Claims, and on appeal, that the claimant did give aid to the rebellion; and on proof of such pardon, or acceptance, which proof may be made summarily on motion or otherwise, the jurisdiction of the court shall cease, and the suit shall be forthwith dismissed.

The substance of this enactment is that an acceptance of a pardon, without disclaimer, shall be conclusive evidence of the acts pardoned, but shall be null and void as evidence of the rights conferred by it, both in the Court of Claims and in this court on appeal.

It was urged in argument that the right to sue the government in the Court of Claims is a matter of favor; but this seems not entirely accurate. It is as much the duty of the government as of individuals to fulfil its obligations. Before the establishment of the Court of Claims claimants could only be heard by Congress. That court was established in 1855 [FN21] for the triple purpose of relieving Congress, and of protecting the government by regular investigation, and of benefiting the claimants by affording them a certain mode of examining and adjudicating upon their claims. It was required to hear and determine upon claims founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an executive department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the government of the United States. [FN22] Originally it was a court merely in name, for its power extended only to the preparation of bills to be submitted to Congress.

FN21 10 Stat. at Large, 612.

FN22 Ib.

In 1863 the number of judges was increased from three to five, its jurisdiction was enlarged, and, instead of being required to prepare bills for Congress, it was authorized to render final judgment, subject to appeal to this court and to an estimate by the Secretary of the Treasury of the amount required to pay each claimant. [FN23] This court being of opinion [FN24] that the provision for an estimate was inconsistent with the finality essential to judicial decisions, Congress repealed that provision. [FN25] Since then the Court of Claims has exercised 145 all the functions of a court, and this court has taken full jurisdiction on appeal. [FN26]

FN23 12 Ib. 765.

FN24 2 Wallace, 561.

FN25 14 Stat. at Large, 9.

FN26 14 Stat. at Large, 44, 391, 444.

The Court of Claims is thus constituted one of those inferior courts which Congress authorizes, and has jurisdiction of contracts between the government and the citizen, from which appeal regularly lies to this court.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Undoubtedly the legislature has complete control over the organization and existence of that court and may confer or withhold the right of appeal from its decisions. And if this act did nothing more, it would be our duty to give it effect. If it simply denied the right of appeal in a particular class of cases, there could be no doubt that it must be regarded as an exercise of the power of Congress to make 'such exceptions from the appellate jurisdiction' as should seem to it expedient.

But the language of the proviso shows plainly that it does not intend to withhold appellate jurisdiction except as a means to an end. Its great and controlling purpose is to deny to pardons granted by the President the effect which this court had adjudged them to have. The proviso declares that pardons shall not be considered by this court on appeal. We had already decided that it was our duty to consider them and give them effect, in cases like the present, as equivalent to proof of loyalty. It provides that whenever it shall appear that any judgment of the Court of Claims shall have been founded on such pardons, without other proof of loyalty, the Supreme Court shall have no further jurisdiction of the case and shall dismiss the same for want of jurisdiction. The proviso further declares that every pardon granted to any suitor in the Court of Claims and reciting that the person pardoned has been guilty of any act of rebellion or disloyalty, shall, if accepted in writing without disclaimer of the fact recited, be taken as conclusive evidence in that court and on appeal, of the act recited; and on proof of pardon or acceptance, summarily made on motion 146 or otherwise, the jurisdiction of the court shall cease and the suit shall be forthwith dismissed.

It is evident from this statement that the denial of jurisdiction to this court, as well as to the Court of Claims, is founded solely on the application of a rule of decision, in causes pending, prescribed by Congress. The court has jurisdiction of the cause to a given point; but when it ascertains that a certain state of things exists, its jurisdiction is to cease and it is required to dismiss the cause for want of jurisdiction.

It seems to us that this is not an exercise of the acknowledged power of Congress to make exceptions and prescribe regulations to the appellate power.

The court is required to ascertain the existence of certain facts and thereupon to declare that its jurisdiction on appeal has ceased, by dismissing the bill. What is this but to prescribe a rule for the decision of a cause in a particular way? In the case before us, the Court of Claims has rendered judgment for the claimant and an appeal has been taken to this court. We are directed to dismiss the appeal, if we find that the judgment must be affirmed, because of a pardon granted to the intestate of the claimants. Can we do so without allowing one party to the controversy to decide it in its own favor? Can we do so without allowing that the legislature may prescribe rules of decision to the Judicial Department of the government in cases pending before it?

We think not; and thus thinking, we do not at all question what was decided in the case of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Company. [FN27] In that case, after a decree in this court that the bridge, in the then state of the law, was a nuisance and must be abated as such, Congress passed an act legalizing the structure and making it a post-road; and the court, on a motion for process to enforce the decree, held that the bridge had ceased to be a nuisance by the exercise of the constitutional powers of Congress, and denied the motion. No arbitrary rule of decision was prescribed in that case, 147 but the court was left to apply its ordinary rules to the new circumstances created by the act. In the case before us no new circumstances have been created by legislation. But the court is forbidden to give the effect to evidence which, in its own judgment, such evidence should have, and is directed to give it an effect precisely contrary.

FN27 18 Howard, 429.

We must think that Congress has inadvertently passed the limit which separates the legislative from the judicial power.

It is of vital importance that these powers be kept distinct. The Constitution provides that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress shall from time to time ordain and establish. The same instrument, in the last clause of the same article, provides that in all cases other than those of original jurisdiction, 'the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.'

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Congress has already provided that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction of the judgments of the Court of Claims on appeal. Can it prescribe a rule in conformity with which the court must deny to itself the jurisdiction thus conferred, because and only because its decision, in accordance with settled law, must be adverse to the government and favorable to the suitor? This question seems to us to answer itself.

The rule prescribed is also liable to just exception as impairing the effect of a pradon, and thus infringing the constitutional power of the Executive.

It is the intention of the Constitution that each of the great co-ordinate departments of the government--the Legislative, the Executive, and the Judicial--shall be, in its sphere, independent of the others. To the executive alone is intrusted the power of pardon; and it is granted without limit. Pardon includes amnesty. It blots out the offence pardoned and removes all its penal consequences. It may be granted on conditions. In these particular pardons, 148 that no doubt might exist as to their character, restoration of property was expressly pledged, and the pardon was granted on condition that the person who availed himself of it should take and keep a prescribed oath.

Now it is clear that the legislature cannot change the effect of such a pardon any more than the executive can change a law. Yet this is attempted by the provision under consideration. The court is required to receive special pardons as evidence of guilt and to treat them as null and void. It is required to disregard pardons granted by proclamation on condition, though the condition has been fulfilled, and to deny them their legal effect. This certainly impairs the executive authority and directs the court to be instrumental to that end.

We think it unnecessary to enlarge. The simplest statement is the best.

We repeat that it is impossible to believe that this provision was not inserted in the appropriation bill through inadvertence; and that we shall not best fulfil the deliberate will of the legislature by DENYING the motion to dismiss and AFFIRMING the judgment of the Court of Claims; which is

ACCORDINGLY DONE.

Mr. Justice MILLER (with whom concurred Mr. Justice BRADLEY), dissenting.

I cannot agree to the opinion of the court just delivered in an important matter; and I regret this the more because I do agree to the proposition that the proviso to the act of July 12th, 1870, is unconstitutional, so far as it attempts to prescribe to the judiciary the effect to be given to an act of pardon or amnesty by the President. This power of pardon is confided to the President by the Constitution, and whatever may be its extent or its limits, the legislative branch of the government cannot impair its force or effect in a judicial proceeding in a constitutional court. But I have not been able to bring my mind to concur in the proposition that, under the act concerning captured and abandoned property, there remains in the former owner, who had given aid and 149 comfort to the rebellion, any interest whatever in the property or its proceeds when it had been sold and paid into the treasury or had been converted to the use of the public under that act. I must construe this act, as all others should be construed, by seeking the intention of its framers, and the intention to restore the proceeds of such property to the loyal citizen, and to transfer it absolutely to the government in the case of those who had given active support to the rebellion, is to me too apparent to be disregarded. In the one case the government is converted into a trustee for the former owner; in the other it appropriates it to its own use as the property of a public enemy captured in war. Can it be inferred from anything found in the statute that Congress intended that this property should ever be restored to the disloyal? I am unable to discern any such intent. But if it did, why was not some provision made by which the title of the government could at some time be made perfect, or that of the owner established? Some judicial proceeding for confiscation would seem to be necessary if there remains in the disloyal owner any right or interest whatever. But there is no such provision, and unless the act intended to forfeit absolutely the right of the disloyal owner, the proceeds remain in a condition where the owner cannot maintain a suit for its recovery, and the United States can obtain no perfect title to it.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

This statute has recently received the attentive consideration of the court in two reported cases.

In the case of the United States v. Anderson, [FN28] in reference to the relation of the government to the money paid into the treasury under this act, and the difference between the property of the loyal and disloyal owner, the court uses language hardly consistent with the opinion just read. It says that Congress, in a spirit of liberality, constituted the government a trustee for so much of this property as belonged to the faithful Southern people, and while it directed that all of it should be sold and its proceeds paid into the treasury, gave to this class of persons an opportunity to establish 150 their right to the proceeds. Again, it is said, that 'the measure, in itself of great beneficence, was practically important only in its application to the loyal Southern people, and sympathy for their situation doubtless prompted Congress to pass it.' These views had the unanimous concurrence of the court. If I understand the present opinion, however, it maintains that the government, in taking possession of this property and selling it, became the trustee of all the former owners, whether loyal or disloyal, and holds it for the latter until pardoned by the President, or until Congress orders it to be restored to him.

FN28 9 Wallace, 65.

The other case which I refer to is that of United States v. Padelford. [FN29] In that case the opinion makes a labored and successful effort to show that Padelford, the owner of the property, had secured the benefit of the amnesty proclamation before the property was seized under the same statute we are now considering. And it bases the right of Padelford to recover its proceeds in the treasury on the fact that before the capture his status as a loyal citizen had been restored, and with it all his rights of property, although he had previously given aid and comfort to the rebellion. In this view I concurred with all my brethren. And I hold now that as long as the possession or title of property remains in the party, the pardon or the amnesty remits all right in the government to forfeit or confiscate it. But where the property has already been seized and sold, and the proceeds paid into the treasury, and it is clear that the statute contemplates no further proceeding as necessary to divest the right of the former owner, the pardon does not and cannot restore that which has thus completely passed away. And if such was not the view of the court when Padelford's case was under consideration I am at a loss to discover a reason for the extended argument in that case, in the opinion of the court, to show that he had availed himself of the amnesty before the seizure of the property. If the views now advanced are sound, it was wholly immaterial whether Padelford was pardoned before or after the seizure.

FN29 9 Wallace, 531.

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

antedated the enactment of the legislation under which his deportation is sought. And this because deportation may, as this Court has said in Ng Fung Ho v. White, 259 U.S. 276, 284, 42 S.Ct. 492, 495, 66 L.Ed. 938, deprive a man 'of all that makes life worth living'; and, as it has said in Fong Haw Tan v. Phelan, 333 U.S. 6, 10, 68 S.Ct. 374, 376, 92 L.Ed. 433; 'deportation is a drastic measure and at times the equivalent of banishment or exile'.

In light of the expansion of the concept of substantive due process as a limitation upon all powers of Congress, even the war power, see Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 251 U.S. 146, 155, 40 S.Ct. 106, 107, 64 L.Ed. 194, much could be said for the view, were we writing on a clean slate, that the Due Process *531 Clause qualifies the scope of political discretion heretofore recognized as belonging to Congress in regulating the entry and deportation of aliens. And since the intrinsic consequences of deportation are so close to punishment for crime, it might fairly be said also that the ex post facto Clause, even though applicable 743 only to punitive legislation, [FN4] should be applied to deportation.

FN4. First in Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 213, 271, 6 L.Ed. 606, and again in Satterlee v. Matthewson, 2 Pet. 380, 686 (appendix), 7 L.Ed. 458, a characteristically persuasive attack was made by Mr. Justice Johnson on the view that the ex post facto Clause applies only to prosecutions for crime. The Court, however, has undeviatingly enforced the contrary position, first expressed in Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 1 L.Ed. 648. It would be an unjustifiable reversal to overturn a view of the Constitution so deeply rooted and so consistently adhered to.

But the slate is not clean. As to the extent of the power of Congress under review, there is not merely 'a page of history,' New York Trust Co. v. Eisner, 256 U.S. 345, 349, 41 S.Ct. 506, 507, 65 L.Ed. 963, but a whole volume. Policies pertaining to the entry of aliens and their right to remain here are peculiarly concerned with the political conduct of government. In the enforcement of these policies, the Executive Branch of the Government must respect the procedural safeguards of due process. Kaoru Yamataya v. Fisher (The Japanese Immigrant Case), 189 U.S. 86, 101, 23 S.Ct. 611, 614, 47 L.Ed. 721; Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, 339 U.S. 33, 49, 70 S.Ct. 445, 453, 94 L.Ed. 616. But that the formulation of these policies is entrusted exclusively to Congress has become about as firmly imbedded in the legislative and judicial tissues of our body politic as any aspect of our government. And whatever might have been said at an earlier date for applying the ex post facto Clause, it has been the unbroken rule of this Court that it has no application to deportation.

We are not prepared to deem ourselves wiser or more sensitive to human rights than our predecessors, especially those who have been most zealous in protecting civil *532 liberties under the Constitution, and must therefore under our constitutional system recognize congressional power in dealing with aliens, on the basis of which we are unable to find the Act of 1950 unconstitutional. See Bugajewitz v. Adams, 228 U.S. 585, 33 S.Ct. 607, 57 L.Ed. 978, and Ng Fung Ho v. White, 259 U.S. 276, 280, 42 S.Ct. 492, 493, 66 L.Ed. 938.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice REED concurs in the judgment of the Court and in the opinion as written, except as to the deductions drawn from Senator McCarran's citation of Colyer v. Skeffington, D.C., 265 F. 17, 72.

Mr. Justice BLACK, with whom Mr. Justice DOUGLAS concurs, dissenting.

Petitioner has lived in this country thirty-six years, having come here from Mexico in 1918 when only seven years of age. He has an American wife to whom he has been married for twenty years, four children all born here, and a stepson who served this country as a paratrooper. Since 1940 petitioner has been a laborer at the Van Camp Sea Food Company in San Diego, California. In 1944 petitioner became a member of the Communist Party. Deciding that he no longer wanted to belong to that party, he got out sometime around 1946 or 1947. As pointed out in the Court's opinion, during the period of his membership the Communist Party functioned 'as a distinct and active political organization'. See Communist Party of United States of America v. Peek, 20 Cal.2d 536, 127 P.2d 889. Party candidates appeared on California election ballots, and no federal law then frowned on Communist Party political activities. Now in 1954, however, petitioner is to be deported from this country solely

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

REV_00265067

United States Court of Appeals,
Fourth Circuit.

Kenneth M. ZERAN, Plaintiff-Appellant,
v.
AMERICA ONLINE, INCORPORATED, Defendant-Appellee.

No. 97-1523.

Argued Oct. 2, 1997.
Decided Nov. 12, 1997.

Negligence action was brought against commercial interactive computer service provider alleging that provider unreasonably delayed in removing defamatory messages posted by unidentified third party, refused to post retractions of those messages, and failed to screen for similar postings thereafter. The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, T.S. Ellis, III, J., 958 F.Supp. 1124, granted provider's motion for judgment on pleadings. Plaintiff appealed. The Court of Appeals, Wilkinson, Chief Judge, held that: (1) Communications Decency Act (CDA) barred claims, and (2) CDA applies to any complaint instituted after its effective date, regardless of when relevant conduct giving rise to claims occurred.

Affirmed.

West Headnotes

[1] Federal Courts ⚿794
170Bk794 Most Cited Cases

On appeal of grant of motion for judgment on pleadings, Court of Appeals accepts facts alleged in complaint as true.

[2] Libel and Slander ⚿28
237k28 Most Cited Cases

Communications Decency Act (CDA) immunized commercial interactive computer service provider from liability for defamatory information posted by third parties. Telecommunications Act of 1996, § 509(c)(1), 47 U.S.C.A. § 230(c)(1).

[3] Telecommunications ⚿262
372k262 Most Cited Cases

Communications Decency Act (CDA) creates federal immunity to any cause of action that would make interactive computer service providers liable for information originating with third-party user of service. Telecommunications Act of 1996, § 509(c)(1), 47 U.S.C.A. § 230(c)(1).

[4] Telecommunications ⚿262
372k262 Most Cited Cases

Communications Decency Act (CDA) bars lawsuits seeking to hold interactive computer service provider liable for its exercise of publisher's traditional editorial functions, such as deciding whether to publish, withdraw, postpone or alter content.

[5] Telecommunications ⚿262
372k262 Most Cited Cases

Communications Decency Act (CDA) was enacted, in part, to maintain robust nature of Internet communication and, accordingly, to keep government interference therein to minimum. Telecommunications Act of 1996, § 509(c)(1), 47 U.S.C.A. § 230(c)(1).

[6] Telecommunications ⚿262
372k262 Most Cited Cases

One important purpose of Communications Decency Act (CDA) was to encourage interactive computer service providers to self-regulate dissemination of offensive material over their services. Telecommunications Act of 1996, § 509(c)(1), 47 U.S.C.A. § 230(c)(1).

[7] Libel and Slander ⚿28
237k28 Most Cited Cases

While publishers may be liable for defamatory statement in their works even if they lacked specific knowledge that such statement was included, distributors are free from liability for defamatory statements in materials they distribute unless, at minimum, they actually knew of defamatory statements upon which liability is based.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[8] Libel and Slander ⚿28
237k28 Most Cited Cases

Interactive computer service provider was "publisher" under Communications Decency Act (CDA) with respect to claim that provider failed to promptly remove defamatory statements posted by third party when informed of those statements; thus, CDA precluded provider's liability on that claim. Telecommunications Act of 1996, § 509(c)(1), 47 U.S.C.A. § 230(c)(1).

[9] Telecommunications ⚿262
372k262 Most Cited Cases

Communications Decency Act (CDA) applies to any complaint instituted after its effective date, regardless of when relevant conduct giving rise to claims occurred. Telecommunications Act of 1996, § 509(d)(3), 47 U.S.C.A. § 230(d)(3).

328 ARGUED: John Saul Edwards, Law Offices of John S. Edwards, Roanoke, VA; Leo Kayser, III, Kayser & Redfern, New York City, for Appellant. Patrick Joseph Carome, Wilmer, Cutler & Pickering, Washington, DC, for Appellee. ON BRIEF: John Payton, Samir Jain, Wilmer, Cutler & Pickering, Washington, DC; Randall J. Boe, America Online, Inc., Dulles, VA, for Appellee.

Before WILKINSON, Chief Judge, RUSSELL, Circuit Judge, and BOYLE, Chief United States District Judge for the Eastern District of North Carolina, sitting by designation.

Affirmed by published opinion. Chief Judge WILKINSON wrote the opinion, in which Judge RUSSELL and Chief Judge BOYLE joined.

OPINION

WILKINSON, Chief Judge:

Kenneth Zeran brought this action against America Online, Inc. ("AOL"), arguing that AOL unreasonably delayed in removing defamatory messages posted by an unidentified third party, refused to post retractions of those messages, and failed to screen for similar postings thereafter. The district court granted judgment for AOL on the grounds that the Communications Decency Act of 1996 ("CDA")--47 U.S.C. § 230--bars Zeran's claims. Zeran appeals, arguing that § 230 leaves intact liability for interactive computer service providers who possess notice of defamatory material posted through their services. He also contends that § 230 does not apply here because his claims arise from AOL's alleged negligence prior to the CDA's enactment. Section 230, however, plainly immunizes computer service providers like AOL from liability for information that originates with third parties. Furthermore, Congress clearly expressed its intent that § 230 apply to lawsuits, like Zeran's, instituted after the CDA's enactment. Accordingly, we affirm the judgment of the district court.

I.

"The Internet is an international network of interconnected computers," currently used by approximately 40 million people worldwide. Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844, ----, 117 S.Ct. 2329, 2334, 138 L.Ed.2d 874 (1997). One of the many means by which individuals access the Internet is through an interactive computer service. These services offer not only a connection to the Internet as a whole, 329 but also allow their subscribers to access information communicated and stored only on each computer service's individual proprietary network. Id. AOL is just such an interactive computer service. Much of the information transmitted over its network originates with the company's millions of subscribers. They may transmit information privately via electronic mail, or they may communicate publicly by posting messages on AOL bulletin boards, where the messages may be read by any AOL subscriber.

[1] The instant case comes before us on a motion for judgment on the pleadings, see Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c), so we accept the facts alleged in the complaint as true. Bruce v. Riddle, 631 F.2d 272, 273 (4th Cir.1980). On April 25, 1995, an unidentified person posted a message on an AOL bulletin board advertising "Naughty Oklahoma T-Shirts." The posting described the sale of shirts featuring offensive and tasteless slogans related to the April 19, 1995, bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City. Those interested in purchasing the shirts were instructed to call "Ken" at Zeran's home phone number in Seattle, Washington. As a result of this anonymously perpetrated prank, Zeran received a high volume of calls, comprised primarily of angry and derogatory messages, but also including death threats. Zeran could not change his phone number because he relied on its availability to the public in running his business out of his home. Later that day, Zeran called AOL and informed a company representative of his predicament. The employee assured Zeran that the posting would be removed from AOL's bulletin board but explained that as a matter of policy AOL would not post a retraction. The parties dispute the date that AOL removed this original posting from its bulletin board.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

On April 26, the next day, an unknown person posted another message advertising additional shirts with new tasteless slogans related to the Oklahoma City bombing. Again, interested buyers were told to call Zeran's phone number, to ask for "Ken," and to "please call back if busy" due to high demand. The angry, threatening phone calls intensified. Over the next four days, an unidentified party continued to post messages on AOL's bulletin board, advertising additional items including bumper stickers and key chains with still more offensive slogans. During this time period, Zeran called AOL repeatedly and was told by company representatives that the individual account from which the messages were posted would soon be closed. Zeran also reported his case to Seattle FBI agents. By April 30, Zeran was receiving an abusive phone call approximately every two minutes.

Meanwhile, an announcer for Oklahoma City radio station KRXO received a copy of the first AOL posting. On May 1, the announcer related the message's contents on the air, attributed them to "Ken" at Zeran's phone number, and urged the listening audience to call the number. After this radio broadcast, Zeran was inundated with death threats and other violent calls from Oklahoma City residents. Over the next few days, Zeran talked to both KRXO and AOL representatives. He also spoke to his local police, who subsequently surveilled his home to protect his safety. By May 14, after an Oklahoma City newspaper published a story exposing the shirt advertisements as a hoax and after KRXO made an on-air apology, the number of calls to Zeran's residence finally subsided to fifteen per day.

Zeran first filed suit on January 4, 1996, against radio station KRXO in the United States District Court for the Western District of Oklahoma. On April 23, 1996, he filed this separate suit against AOL in the same court. Zeran did not bring any action against the party who posted the offensive messages. [FN1] After Zeran's suit against AOL was transferred to the Eastern District of Virginia pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a), AOL answered Zeran's complaint and interposed 47 U.S.C. § 230 as an affirmative defense. AOL then moved for judgment on the pleadings pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c). 330 The district court granted AOL's motion, and Zeran filed this appeal.

> FN1. Zeran maintains that AOL made it impossible to identify the original party by failing to maintain adequate records of its users. The issue of AOL's record keeping practices, however, is not presented by this appeal.

II.

A.

[2] Because § 230 was successfully advanced by AOL in the district court as a defense to Zeran's claims, we shall briefly examine its operation here. Zeran seeks to hold AOL liable for defamatory speech initiated by a third party. He argued to the district court that once he notified AOL of the unidentified third party's hoax, AOL had a duty to remove the defamatory posting promptly, to notify its subscribers of the message's false nature, and to effectively screen future defamatory material. Section 230 entered this litigation as an affirmative defense pled by AOL. The company claimed that Congress immunized interactive computer service providers from claims based on information posted by a third party.

[3][4] The relevant portion of § 230 states: "No provider or user of an interactive computer service shall be treated as the publisher or speaker of any information provided by another information content provider." 47 U.S.C. § 230(c)(1). [FN2] By its plain language, § 230 creates a federal immunity to any cause of action that would make service providers liable for information originating with a third-party user of the service. Specifically, § 230 precludes courts from entertaining claims that would place a computer service provider in a publisher's role. Thus, lawsuits seeking to hold a service provider liable for its exercise of a publisher's traditional editorial functions--such as deciding whether to publish, withdraw, postpone or alter content--are barred.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

> FN2. Section 230 defines "interactive computer service" as "any information service, system, or access software provider that provides or enables computer access by multiple users to a computer server, including specifically a service or system that provides access to the Internet and such systems operated or services offered by libraries or educational institutions." 47 U.S.C. § 230(e)(2). The term"information content provider" is defined as "any person or entity that is responsible, in whole or in part, for the creation or development of information provided through the Internet or any other interactive computer service." Id. § 230(e)(3). The parties do not dispute that AOL falls within the CDA's "interactive computer service" definition and that the unidentified third party who posted the offensive messages here fits the definition of an "information content provider."

[5] The purpose of this statutory immunity is not difficult to discern. Congress recognized the threat that tort-based lawsuits pose to freedom of speech in the new and burgeoning Internet medium. The imposition of tort liability on service providers for the communications of others represented, for Congress, simply another form of intrusive government regulation of speech. Section 230 was enacted, in part, to maintain the robust nature of Internet communication and, accordingly, to keep government interference in the medium to a minimum. In specific statutory findings, Congress recognized the Internet and interactive computer services as offering "a forum for a true diversity of political discourse, unique opportunities for cultural development, and myriad avenues for intellectual activity." Id. § 230(a)(3). It also found that the Internet and interactive computer services "have flourished, to the benefit of all Americans, with a minimum of government regulation." Id. § 230(a)(4) (emphasis added). Congress further stated that it is "the policy of the United States ... to preserve the vibrant and competitive free market that presently exists for the Internet and other interactive computer services, unfettered by Federal or State regulation." Id. § 230(b)(2) (emphasis added).

None of this means, of course, that the original culpable party who posts defamatory messages would escape accountability. While Congress acted to keep government regulation of the Internet to a minimum, it also found it to be the policy of the United States "to ensure vigorous enforcement of Federal criminal laws to deter and punish trafficking in obscenity, stalking, and harassment by means of computer." Id. § 230(b)(5). Congress made a policy choice, however, not to deter harmful online speech through the separate route of imposing tort liability on companiesthat serve as intermediaries 331 for other parties' potentially injurious messages.

Congress' purpose in providing the § 230 immunity was thus evident. Interactive computer services have millions of users. See Reno v. ACLU, 521U.S. at ----, 117 S.Ct. at 2334 (noting that at time of district court trial, "commercial online services had almost 12 million individual subscribers"). The amount of information communicated via interactive computer services is therefore staggering. The specter of tort liability in an area of such prolific speech would have an obvious chilling effect. It would be impossible for service providers to screen each of their millions of postings for possible problems. Faced with potential liability for each message republished by their services, interactive computer service providers might choose to severely restrict the number and type of messages posted. Congress considered the weight of the speech interests implicated and chose to immunize service providers to avoid any such restrictive effect.

[6] Another important purpose of § 230 was to encourage service providers to self-regulate the dissemination of offensive material over their services. In this respect, § 230 responded to a New York state court decision, Stratton Oakmont, Inc. v. Prodigy Servs. Co., 1995 WL 323710 (N.Y.Sup.Ct. May 24, 1995). There, the plaintiffs sued Prodigy--an interactive computer service like AOL--for defamatory comments made by an unidentified party on one of Prodigy's bulletin boards. The court held Prodigy to the strict liability standard normally applied to original publishers of defamatory statements, rejecting Prodigy's claims that it should be held only to the lower "knowledge" standard usually reserved for distributors. The court reasoned that Prodigy acted more like an original publisher than a distributor both because it advertised its practice of controlling content on its service and because it actively screened and edited messages posted on its bulletin boards.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Congress enacted § 230 to remove the disincentives to selfregulation created by the Stratton Oakmont decision. Under that court's holding, computer service providers who regulated the dissemination of offensive material on their services risked subjecting themselves to liability, because such regulation cast the service provider in the role of a publisher. Fearing that the specter of liability would therefore deter service providers from blocking and screening offensive material, Congress enacted § 230's broad immunity "to remove disincentives for the development and utilization of blocking and filtering technologies that empower parents to restrict their children's access to objectionable or inappropriate online material." 47 U.S.C. § 230(b)(4). In line with this purpose, § 230 forbids the imposition of publisher liability on a service provider for the exercise of its editorial and self-regulatory functions.

B.

[7][8] Zeran argues, however, that the § 230 immunity eliminates only publisher liability, leaving distributorliability intact. Publishers can be held liable for defamatory statements contained in their works even absent proof that they had specific knowledge of the statement's inclusion. W. Page Keeton et al., Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts § 113, at 810 (5th ed.1984). According to Zeran, interactive computer service providers like AOL are normally considered instead to be distributors, like traditional news vendors or book sellers. Distributors cannot be held liable for defamatory statements contained in the materials they distribute unless it is proven at a minimum that they have actual knowledge of the defamatory statements upon which liability is predicated. Id. at 811 (explaining that distributors are not liable "in the absence of proof that they knew or had reason to know of the existence of defamatory matter contained in matter published"). Zeran contends that he provided AOL with sufficient notice of the defamatory statements appearing on the company's bulletin board. This notice is significant, says Zeran, because AOL could be held liable as a distributor only if it acquired knowledge of the defamatory statements' existence.

Because of the difference between these two forms of liability, Zeran contends that the term "distributor" carries a legally distinct meaning from the term "publisher." 332 Accordingly, he asserts that Congress' use of only the term "publisher" in § 230 indicates a purpose to immunize service providers only from publisher liability. He argues that distributors are left unprotected by § 230 and, therefore, his suit should be permitted to proceed against AOL. We disagree. Assuming arguendo that Zeran has satisfied the requirements for imposition of distributor liability, this theory of liability is merely a subset, or a species, of publisher liability, and is therefore also foreclosed by § 230.

The terms "publisher" and "distributor" derive their legal significance from the context of defamation law. Although Zeran attempts to artfully plead his claims as ones of negligence, they are indistinguishable from a garden variety defamation action. Because the publication of a statement is a necessary element in a defamation action, only one who publishes can be subject to this form of tort liability. Restatement (Second) of Torts § 558(b) (1977); Keeton et al., supra, § 113, at 802. Publication does not only describe the choice by an author to include certain information. In addition, both the negligent communication of a defamatory statement and the failure to remove such a statement when first communicated by another party--each alleged by Zeran here under a negligence label--constitute publication. Restatement (Second) of Torts § 577; see also Tacket v. General Motors Corp., 836 F.2d 1042, 1046-47 (7th Cir.1987). In fact, every repetition of a defamatory statement is considered a publication. Keeton et al., supra, § 113, at 799.

In this case, AOL is legally considered to be a publisher. "[E]very one who takes part in the publication ... is charged with publication." Id. Even distributors are considered to be publishers for purposes of defamation law:

> Those who are in the business of making their facilities available to disseminate the writings composed, the speeches made, and the information gathered by others may also be regarded as participating to such an extent in making the books, newspapers, magazines, and information available to others as to be regarded as publishers. They are intentionally making the contents available to others, sometimes without knowing all of the contents--including the defamatory content--and sometimes without any opportunity to ascertain, in advance, that any defamatory matter was to be included in the matter published.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Id. at 803. AOL falls squarely within this traditional definition of a publisher and, therefore, is clearly protected by § 230's immunity.

Zeran contends that decisions like Stratton Oakmont and Cubby, Inc. v. CompuServe Inc., 776 F.Supp. 135 (S.D.N.Y.1991), recognize a legal distinction between publishers and distributors. He misapprehends, however, the significance of that distinction for the legal issue we consider here. It is undoubtedly true that mere conduits, or distributors, are subject to a different standard of liability. As explained above, distributors must at a minimum have knowledge of the existence of a defamatory statement as a prerequisite to liability. But this distinction signifies only that different standards of liability may be applied within the larger publisher category, depending on the specific type of publisher concerned. See Keeton et al., supra, § 113, at 799-800 (explaining that every party involved is charged with publication, although degrees of legal responsibility differ). To the extent that decisions like Stratton and Cubby utilize the terms "publisher" and "distributor" separately, the decisions correctly describe two different standards of liability. Stratton and Cubby do not, however, suggest that distributors are not also a type of publisher for purposes of defamation law.

Zeran simply attaches too much importance to the presence of the distinct notice element in distributor liability. The simple fact of notice surely cannot transform one from an original publisher to a distributor in the eyes of the law. To the contrary, once a computer service provider receives notice of a potentially defamatory posting, it is thrust into the role of a traditional publisher. The computer service provider must decide whether to publish, edit, or withdraw the posting. In this respect, Zeran seeks to impose liability on AOL for assuming the 333 role for which § 230 specifically proscribes liability--the publisher role.

Our view that Zeran's complaint treats AOL as a publisher is reinforced because AOL is cast in the same position as the party who originally posted the offensive messages. According to Zeran's logic, AOL is legally at fault because it communicated to third parties an allegedly defamatory statement. This is precisely the theory under which the original poster of the offensive messages would be found liable. If the original party is considered a publisher of the offensive messages, Zeran certainly cannot attach liability to AOL under the same theory without conceding that AOL too must be treated as a publisher of the statements.

Zeran next contends that interpreting § 230 to impose liability on service providers with knowledge of defamatory content on their services is consistent with the statutory purposes outlined in Part IIA. Zeran fails, however, to understand the practical implications of notice liability in the interactive computer service context. Liability upon notice would defeat thedual purposes advanced by § 230 of the CDA. Like the strict liability imposed by the Stratton Oakmont court, liability upon notice reinforces service providers' incentives to restrict speech and abstain from self-regulation.

If computer service providers were subject to distributor liability, they would face potential liability each time they receive notice of a potentially defamatory statement--from any party, concerning any message. Each notification would require a careful yet rapid investigation of the circumstances surrounding the posted information, a legal judgment concerning the information's defamatory character, and an on-the-spot editorial decision whether to risk liability by allowing the continued publication of that information. Although this might be feasible for the traditional print publisher, the sheer number of postings on interactive computer services would create an impossible burden in the Internet context. Cf. Auvil v. CBS 60 Minutes, 800 F.Supp. 928, 931 (E.D.Wash.1992) (recognizing that it is unrealistic for network affiliates to "monitor incoming transmissions and exercise on-the-spot discretionary calls"). Because service providers would be subject to liability only for the publication of information, and not for its removal, they would have a natural incentive simply to remove messages upon notification, whether the contents were defamatory or not. See Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps, 475 U.S. 767, 777, 106 S.Ct. 1558, 1564, 89 L.Ed.2d 783 (1986) (recognizing that fears of unjustified liability produce a chilling effect antithetical to First Amendment's protection of speech). Thus, like strict liability, liability upon notice has a chilling effect on the freedom of Internet speech.

Similarly, notice-based liability would deter service providers from regulating the dissemination of offensive material over their own services. Any efforts by a service provider to investigate and screen material posted on its service would only lead to notice of potentially defamatory material more frequently and thereby create a stronger basis for liability. Instead of subjecting themselves to further possible lawsuits, service providers would likely eschew any attempts at self-regulation.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

More generally, notice-based liability for interactive computer service providers would provide third parties with a no-cost means to create the basis for future lawsuits. Whenever one was displeased with the speech of another party conducted over an interactive computer service, the offended party could simply "notify" the relevant service provider, claiming the information to be legally defamatory. In light of the vast amount of speech communicated through interactive computer services, these notices could produce an impossible burden for service providers, who would be faced with ceaseless choices of suppressing controversial speech or sustaining prohibitive liability. Because the probable effects of distributor liability on the vigor of Internet speech and on service provider self-regulation are directly contrary to § 230's statutory purposes, we will not assume that Congress intended to leave liability upon notice intact.

Zeran finally contends that the interpretive canon favoring retention of common law principles unless Congress speaks directly to the issue counsels a restrictive reading of the 334 § 230 immunity here. See United States v. Texas, 507 U.S. 529, 534, 113 S.Ct. 1631, 1634-35, 123 L.Ed.2d 245 (1993). This interpretive canon does not persuade us to reach a different result. Here, Congress has indeed spoken directly to the issue by employing the legally significant term "publisher," which has traditionally encompassed distributors and original publishers alike.

The decision cited by Zeran, United States v. Texas, also recognized that abrogation of common law principles is appropriate when a contrary statutory purpose is evident. Id. This is consistent with the Court's earlier cautions against courts' application of the canon with excessive zeal: " 'The rule that statutes in derogation of the common law are to be strictly construed does not require such an adherence to the letter as would defeat an obvious legislative purpose or lessen the scope plainly intended to be given to the measure.' " Isbrandtsen Co. v. Johnson, 343 U.S. 779, 783, 72 S.Ct. 1011, 1014, 96 L.Ed. 1294 (1952) (quoting Jamison v. Encarnacion, 281 U.S. 635, 640, 50 S.Ct. 440, 442, 74 L.Ed. 1082 (1930)); cf. Astoria Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Solimino, 501 U.S. 104, 110-11, 111 S.Ct. 2166, 2170-71, 115 L.Ed.2d 96 (1991) (statute need not expressly delimit manner in which common law principle is abrogated). Zeran's argument flies in the face of this warning. As explained above, interpreting § 230 to leave distributor liability in effect would defeat the two primary purposes of the statute and would certainly "lessen the scope plainly intended" by Congress' use of the term "publisher."

Section 230 represents the approach of Congress to a problem of national and international dimension. The Supreme Court underscored this point in Reno v. ACLU, finding that the Internet allows "tens of millions of people to communicate with one another and to access vast amounts of information from around the world.[It] is 'a unique and wholly new medium of worldwide human communication.' " 521 U.S. at ----, 117 S.Ct. at 2334 (citation omitted). Application of the canon invoked by Zeran here would significantly lessen Congress' power, derived from the Commerce Clause, to act in a field whose international character is apparent. While Congress allowed for the enforcement of "any State law that is consistent with [§ 230]," 47 U.S.C. § 230(d)(3), it is equally plain that Congress' desire to promote unfettered speech on the Internet must supersede conflicting common law causes of action. Section 230(d)(3) continues: "No cause of action may be brought and no liability may be imposed under any State or local law that is inconsistent with this section." With respect to federal-state preemption, the Court has advised: "[W]hen Congress has 'unmistakably ... ordained,' that its enactments alone are to regulate a part of commerce, state laws regulating that aspect of commerce must fall. The result is compelled whether Congress' command is explicitly stated in the statute's language or implicitly contained in its structure and purpose." Jones v. Rath Packing Co., 430 U.S. 519, 525, 97 S.Ct. 1305, 1309, 51 L.Ed.2d 604 (1977) (citations omitted). Here, Congress' command is explicitly stated. Its exercise of its commerce power is clear and counteracts the caution counseled by the interpretive canon favoring retention of common law principles.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

III.

[9] The CDA was signed into law and became effective on February 8, 1996. Zeran did not file his complaint until April 23, 1996. Zeran contends that even if § 230 does bar the type of claim he brings here, it cannot be applied retroactively to bar an action arising from AOL's alleged misconduct prior to the CDA's enactment. We disagree. Section 230 applies by its plain terms to complaints brought after the CDA became effective. As noted in Part IIB, the statute provides, in part: "No cause of action may be brought and no liability may be imposed under any State or local law that is inconsistent with this section." 47 U.S.C. § 230(d)(3).

Initially, it is doubtful that a retroactivity issue is even presented here. Retroactivity concerns arise when a statute applies to conduct predating its enactment. Section 230 does not directly regulate the activities of interactive computer service providers like AOL. Instead, § 230 is addressed only to the bringing of a cause of action. Here, Zeran 335 did not file his complaint until over two months after § 230's immunity became effective. Thus, the statute's application in this litigation is in fact prospective. See St. Louis v. Texas Worker's Compensation Comm'n, 65 F.3d 43, 46 (5th Cir.1995) (holding "issue is not technically one of retroactivity" when statute applies to "filing of the complaint"), cert. denied, 518 U.S. 1024, 116 S.Ct. 2563, 135 L.Ed.2d 1080 (1996); Vernon v. Cassadaga Valley Central Sch. Dist., 49 F.3d 886, 889 (2d Cir.1995) (same).

Even if this were a case implicating the application of a federal statute to pre-enactment events, the Supreme Court's Landgraf framework would nevertheless require § 230's application to Zeran's claims. Landgraf instructs us first "to determine whether Congress has expressly prescribed the statute's proper reach." Landgraf v. USI Film Prods., 511 U.S. 244, 280, 114 S.Ct. 1483, 1505, 128 L.Ed.2d 229 (1994). This case can be resolved at this first step. In § 230(d)(3), Congress clearly expressed its intent that the statute apply to any complaint instituted after its effective date, regardless of when the relevant conduct giving rise to the claims occurred. Other circuits have interpreted similar statutory language to clearly express Congress' intent that the relevant statutes apply to bar new actions under statutorily specified conditions. See Wright v. Morris, 111 F.3d 414, 418 (6th Cir.1997) (holding language "No action shall be brought ...," 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(a), to "expressly govern[ ] the bringing of new actions"), cert. denied, 522 U.S. 906, 118 S.Ct. 263, 139 L.Ed.2d 190 (1997); Abdul-Wadood v. Nathan, 91 F.3d 1023, 1025 (7th Cir.1996) (holding language "In no event shall a prisoner bring a civil action or appeal a judgment ...," 28 U.S.C. § 1915(g), to govern the bringing of new actions or filing of new appeals).

If we were to find a directive as plain as § 230(d)(3) to be ambiguous as to Congress' intent, we would be announcing a new superclear-statement condition for the retroactive operation of statutes. Such a jurisprudential shift would be both unwise and contrary to the Court's admonitions in Landgraf: "Retroactivity provisions often serve entirely benign and legitimate purposes, whether to respond to emergencies, to correct mistakes, to prevent circumvention of a new statute in the interval immediately preceding its passage, or simply to give comprehensive effect to a new law Congress considers salutary." 511 U.S. at 267-68, 114 S.Ct. at 1498. Here, Congress decided that free speech on the Internet and self-regulation of offensive speech were so important that § 230 should be given immediate, comprehensive effect.

There finally is a significant contrast between statutes that impose new liabilities for already-completed conduct and statutes that govern litigants' access to courts. For example, courts often apply intervening statutes that restrict a court's jurisdiction. See Landgraf, 511 U.S. at 274, 114 S.Ct. at 1501-02. Section 230 neither imposes any new liability on Zeran nor takes away any rights acquired under prior law. No person has a vested right in a nonfinal tort judgment, much less an unfiled tort claim. Hammond v. United States, 786 F.2d 8, 12 (1st Cir.1986). Furthermore, Zeran cannot point to any action he took in reliance on the law prior to § 230's enactment. Because § 230 has no untoward retroactive effect, even the presumption against statutory retroactivity absent an express directive from Congress is of no help to Zeran here.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

IV.

For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the judgment of the district court.

AFFIRMED.

END OF DOCUMENT

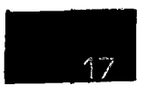
Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

because of his past lawful membership in that party. And this is to be done without proof or finding that petitioner knew that the party had any evil purposes or that he 744 agreed *533 with any such purposes that it might have had. On the contrary, there is strong evidence that he was a good, law-abiding man, a steady worker and a devoted husband and father loyal to this country and its form of government.

For joining a lawful political group years ago--an act which he had no possible reason to believe would subject him to the slightest penalty--petitioner now loses his job, his friends, his home, and maybe even his children, who must choose between their father and their native country. Perhaps a legislative act penalizing political activities legal when engaged in is not a bill of attainder. But see United States v. Lovett, 328 U.S. 303, 315--316, 66 S.Ct. 1073, 1078, 1079, 90 L.Ed. 1252. Conceivably an Act prescribing exile for prior innocent conduct does not violate the constitutional prohibition of ex post facto laws. Cf. American Communications Ass'n v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, 412--415, 70 S.Ct. 674, 690--693, 94 L.Ed. 925. It may be possible that this deportation order for engaging in political activities does not violate the First Amendment's clear ban against abridgment of political speech and assembly. Maybe it is not even a denial of due process and equal protection of the laws. But see dissenting opinions in Carlson v. Landon, 342 U.S. 524, 72 S.Ct. 525, 96 L.Ed. 547, and Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 72 S.Ct. 512, 96 L.Ed. 586. I am unwilling to say, however, that despite these constitutional safeguards this man may be driven from our land because he joined a political party that California and the Nation then recognized as perfectly legal.

Mr. Justice DOUGLAS, with whom Mr. Justice BLACK concurs, dissenting.

As Mr. Justice BLACK states in his dissent, the only charge against this alien is an act that was lawful when done. I agree that there is, therefore, no constitutional basis for deportation, if aliens, as well as citizens, are to be the beneficiaries of due process of law.



*534 The case might, of course, be different if the past affiliation with Communism now seized upon as the basis for deportation had continued down to this date. But so far as this record shows, the alien Galvan quit the Communist Party at least six years ago. There is not a word in the present record to show that he continued his affiliations with it sub rosa or espoused its causes or joined in any of its activities since he ceased to be a member of it.

I cannot agree that because a man was once a Communist, he always must carry the curse. Experience teaches otherwise. It is common knowledge that though some of the leading Socialists of Asia once were Communists, they repudiated the Marxist creed when they experienced its ugly operations, and today are the most effective opponents the Communists know. So far as the present record shows, Galvan may be such a man. Or he may be merely one who transgressed and then returned to a more orthodox political faith. The record is wholly silent about Galvan's present political activities. Only one thing is clear: Galvan is not being punished for what he presently is, nor for an unlawful act, nor for espionage or conspiracy or intrigue against this country. He is being punished for what he once was, for a political faith he briefly expressed over six years ago and then rejected.

This action is hostile to our constitutional standards, as I pointed out in Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 598, 72 S.Ct. 512, 523, 96 L.Ed. 586. Aliens who live here in peace, who do not abuse our hospitality, who are lawabiding members of our communities, have the right to due process of law. They too are 'persons' within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment. They can be molested by the government in times of peace only when their presence here 745 is hostile to the safety or welfare of the Nation. If they are to be deported, it must be for what they are and do, not for what they once believed.

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

17

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

HONEYWELL, INC.; Honeywell Pension and Retirement Committee, on their own behalf and on behalf of the Honeywell Retirement Investment Plan; Investment Plus Plan of Honeywell, Inc.; Honeywell Retirement Savings Plan; First Trust National Association, Plaintiffs-Appellants,
v.
MINNESOTA LIFE AND HEALTH INSURANCE GUARANTY ASSOCIATION, Defendant-Appellee.

No. 95-1754.

Submitted Oct. 22, 1996.
Decided April 2, 1997.

Sponsor of employee benefit and retirement plans sued state life and health insurance guaranty association in state court, seeking declaration that retroactive application of statutory amendment restricting to residents the right to receive guaranty payments was unconstitutional. Association removed. The United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, Richard H. Kyle, J., granted summary judgment to association, and sponsor appealed. A panel of the Court of Appeals affirmed, 86 F.3d 766, but opinion was vacated upon grant of sponsor's request for en banc review. After en banc hearing, the Court of Appeals, Hansen, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) amendment was not unconstitutional under contract clause of Federal Constitution; and (2) retroactive application of amendment did not violate due process; and in an opinion by Loken, Circuit Judge, held that: (3) statutory right to guaranty payments was contractual in nature; and (4) amendment effected substantial impairment of guaranty rights of sponsor's nonresident employees.

Affirmed.

Loken, Circuit Judge, filed concurring opinion in which Bowman, Circuit Judge, joined.

Richard S. Arnold, Chief Judge, filed dissenting opinion in which McMillian, Magill, Beam, and Morris Sheppard Arnold, Circuit Judges, joined.

See also, 518 N.W.2d 557.

West Headnotes

[1] Constitutional Law ⚖154(3)
92k154(3) Most Cited Cases

[1] Insurance ⚖1490
217k1490 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 217k4(2))

Retroactively applicable state statutory amendment restricting to residents the right to receive life and health insurance guaranty payments was not unconstitutional under contract clause of Federal Constitution. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 1, § 10, cl. 1; Minn.St.1992, §§ 61B.01-61B.16.

[2] Constitutional Law ⚖251.3
92k251.3 Most Cited Cases

Modern framework for substantive due process analysis concerning economic legislation only requires inquiry into whether legislation is reasonably related to legitimate governmental purpose; "vested rights" analysis appears to have been supplanted. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

[3] Constitutional Law ⚖253(4)
92k253(4) Most Cited Cases

[3] Insurance ⚖1490
217k1490 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 217k4.4)

Due process was not violated by retroactive application of amendment to former version of state statute creating life and health insurance guaranty association, which amendment restricted to residents the right to receive guaranty payments, as retroactive application achieved legitimate legislative purposes by rational means. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Minn.St.1992, §§ 61B.01 -61B.16, 61B.06, subd. 2.

[4] Constitutional Law ⚖253(4)
92k253(4) Most Cited Cases

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Retroactive application of legislation satisfies reasonableness test for due process if it is justified by rational legislative purpose, even where it destroys settled expectancy or imposes new liability. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

[5] Statutes ⚖268
361k268 Most Cited Cases

"Curative legislation" corrects unintended and unanticipated mistake in underlying legislation which went undetected until some time after original enactment.

[6] Statutes ⚖4
361k4 Most Cited Cases

Legislatures have authority to cure inadvertent defects in their legislation.

[7] Constitutional Law ⚖154(3)
92k154(3) Most Cited Cases

[7] Insurance ⚖1494
217k1494 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 217k4(2))

Right to payment under former version of state statute creating life and health insurance guaranty association was contractual in nature, such that statutory amendment affecting that right implicated contract clause of Federal Constitution. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 1, § 10, cl. 1; Minn.St.1992, §§ 61B.01-61B.16.

[8] Constitutional Law ⚖154(3)
92k154(3) Most Cited Cases

[8] Insurance ⚖1490
217k1490 Most Cited Cases
(Formerly 217k4(2))

Retroactively applicable state statutory amendment restricting to residents the right to receive life and health insurance guaranty payments effected substantial impairment of guaranty rights of nonresident employees participating in employee benefit and retirement plans sponsored by resident employer, for purposes of contract clause analysis under Federal Constitution, where plans lost 75% of their guaranty rights, based on percentage of nonresident employees. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 1, § 10, cl. 1; Minn.St.1992, §§ 61B.01-61B.16.

548 David L. Hashmall, Minneapolis, MN (argued), Karen R. Cole, Paul A. Koches, Joseph Brooks, on the brief, for Plaintiffs-Appellants.

Gary J. Haugen, Minneapolis, MN (argued), Jonathan S. Parritz, on the brief, for Defendant-Appellee.

Before RICHARD S. ARNOLD, Chief Judge, McMILLIAN, JOHN R. GIBSON, FAGG, BOWMAN, WOLLMAN, MAGILL, BEAM, LOKEN, HANSEN, MORRIS SHEPPARD ARNOLD, and MURPHY, Circuit Judges, en banc.

549 HANSEN, Circuit Judge.

The plaintiffs (collectively referred to as Honeywell) appeal the district court's [FN1] grant of summary judgment for the defendant, Minnesota Life and Health Insurance Guaranty Association (the Association), in this declaratory judgment suit. At issue is whether an amendment to a Minnesota statute, which amendment applies retroactively, violates either the Contract Clause or the Due Process Clause of the Constitution of the United States. The district court granted the Association's motion for summary judgment and dismissed Honeywell's complaint, concluding that the amendment passes constitutional muster.

FN1. The Honorable Richard H. Kyle, United States District Judge for the District of Minnesota.

A panel of this court unanimously affirmed the judgment of the district court. Honeywell v. Minnesota Life & Health Ins. Guaranty Assoc., 86 F.3d 766 (1996). Honeywell requested en banc review. We granted this request, vacated the panel's opinion on August 27, 1996, and heard the case en banc. We now affirm the judgment of the district court.

I. BACKGROUND

Honeywell, Inc. is a Delaware corporation with its principal place of business in Minnesota. Honeywell sponsors certain defined contribution benefit and retirement plans for its employees. These plans include the Honeywell Retirement Investment Plan, the Investment Plus Plan of Honeywell Inc., and the Honeywell Retirement

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Savings Plan. The current trustee of the Honeywell plans is First Trust National Association, which has its principal place of business in Minnesota.

The Association is a nonprofit Minnesota corporation created pursuant to the Minnesota Life and Health Insurance Guaranty Association Act (the Act), Minn.Stat.Ann. §§ 61B.01-61B.16 (West 1986). [FN2] The Association exists to protect the contractual rights of policy owners and beneficiaries of life insurance policies, health insurance policies, and annuity contracts (subject to certain definitions and limitations), when the insurer that issued the life insurance, health insurance, or annuity contract becomes financially unable to perform its obligations. See Minn.Stat.Ann. § 61B.02, subd. 2. See also Minnesota Life & Health Ins. Guar. Assoc. v. Department of Commerce, 400 N.W.2d 769, 770 (Minn.Ct.App.1987). To provide this protection, all insurance companies that deal in life, health, and annuity contracts and elect to do business in Minnesota are required to join and contribute to the Association. Minnesota Life, 400 N.W.2d at 770. The dispute in this case arose following the 1991 insolvency of an out-of-state member insurance company and the 1992 enactment by the Minnesota legislature of an amendment that retroactively redefines the term "contractual obligation" under the Act.

> FN2. This Act has been repealed and was replaced in 1993 with Minn.Stat.Ann. §§ 61B.18--61B.32 (West Supp.1996). The legislature provided, however, that §§ 61B.01--61B.16, as amended in 1992, remain applicable to the subject of this suit. Honeywell, Inc. v. Minnesota Life & Health Ins. Guar. Assoc., 518 N.W.2d 557, 558 n. 4 (Minn.1994). The issue in this case deals with a 1992 amendment to the Act, and not the new 1993 version of the Act.

In 1988, the Honeywell plans' trustee, who was a Minnesota resident (as is the current trustee), invested in Guaranteed Investment Contracts (GICs) issued by Executive Life Insurance Company of California (ELIC), a member of the Association. GICs are unallocated annuity contracts, or annuity contracts "not issued to or owned by a named individual." Id. GICs are investments made by the trustee for the benefit of the plan participants and are considered covered policies under the Act. See id. at 775 (holding that GICs are covered annuities under Minn.Stat. § 61B.03, subd. 3 (1984)). The Honeywell GICs expressly name the Honeywell trustee as the policy owner, and not the individual plan participants for whom the investment was made. Honeywell, 518 N.W.2d at 561.

In 1991, ELIC became insolvent and unable to fulfill its contractual obligations on the Honeywell GICs, which amounted to $111,000,000. By letter dated January 10, 1992, the Honeywell trustee, as the resident policy owner, submitted to the Association a claim for guaranty coverage under the Act. 550 Honeywell sought coverage for ELIC's entire obligation to the Honeywell trustee, which would inure not only to the benefit of Honeywell's 9,000 Minnesota resident plan participants but also to Honeywell's 27,000 nonresident plan participants.

The Association neither granted nor denied Honeywell's claim initially. ELIC's insolvency had also affected approximately 10,000 other Minnesota residents who were employed in Minnesota by other companies whose plan trustees owned GICs but which trustees were not Minnesota residents. At that time, the Act required the Association to guarantee the covered policies of "residents" to whom any "contractual obligation" was owed from an out-of-state insurer. Minn.Stat.Ann. § 61B.06, subd. 2 (West 1986). See Honeywell, 518 N.W.2d at 558. The term "resident," defined as "any person who resides in this state at the time the impairment is determined and to whom contractual obligations are owed," Minn.Stat.Ann. § 61B.03, subd. 13 (West 1986), was broad enough to include a trustee who resided in Minnesota. Honeywell, 518 N.W.2d at 560-61. The term "contractual obligation," defined as "any obligation under covered policies," Minn.Stat.Ann. § 61B.03, subd. 5 (West 1986), was broad enough to include a GIC obligation owed to a resident trustee. Honeywell, 518 N.W.2d at 560-61. Thus, as then codified, the Act, combined with ELIC's insolvency, created the potential that all the Honeywell plan participants, thousands of whom were not residents of Minnesota, might be entitled to coverage under the Minnesota Act because their plan trustee happened to be a Minnesota resident. Whereas, many other Minnesota non-Honeywell employed resident plan participants, who worked for companies whose plan trustee resided in a different state, might not be entitled to any coverage because their trustee (the one to whom the contractual obligation was owed) was not a Minnesota resident.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Faced with this dilemma, on January 21, 1992, the Minnesota Department of Commerce (which supervises and regulates the Association and to whom appeals may be taken from the Association's determinations, see Minn.Stat.Ann. § 61B.09(c)), issued an opinion, advising the Association chairman on the coverage problems created by the ELIC insolvency:

> The Department believes it is the clear intent of the Act to cover the people of Minnesota. Accordingly, it is the Department's position that the Guaranty Association Act provides coverage to Minnesota resident employees who are the beneficiaries of defined-contribution pension plans funded by Guaranteed Investment Contracts purchased from Executive Life.
>
> Consistent with that position the Department has determined that non- resident employees of such a plan, regardless of the residency of the trustee or plan sponsor, are not covered under the Act.

(Appellee's App. at GA-59.)

Subsequently, on April 27, 1992, the governor signed into law an amendment to the definition of the term "contractual obligation," in a purported attempt to retroactively "clarify" the statutory coverage in a manner consistent with the Department of Commerce opinion. Honeywell, 518 N.W.2d at 562. The 1992 amendment, which specifically applies retroactively, narrowed the definition of "contractual obligation" to specifically exclude any obligation owed "to nonresident participants of a covered plan or to the plan sponsor, employer, trustee, or other party who owns the contract; in such cases, the association is obligated under this chapter only to participants in a covered plan who are residents of the state of Minnesota on the date of impairment." 1992 Minn.Laws, ch. 540. Thus, the amendment expressly provides coverage only to plan participants who are Minnesota residents. In light of the opinion of the Department of Commerce and the retroactive 1992 amendment, the Association took the position that its guaranty obligation to Honeywell covers only those Honeywell plan participants who resided in Minnesota when ELIC became insolvent.

Honeywell then brought an action for declaratory and injunctive relief and monetary damages in Minnesota state court based on the Association's refusal to fully guaranty the whole of the trustee's claim. Honeywell 551 sought a declaration that retroactive application of the 1992 amendment violates both the Contract Clause and the Due Process Clause of the Constitution because Honeywell's entitlement to coverage and payment under the prior statute had fully accrued before the enactment of the 1992 amendment. The Association removed the case to federal district court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1441.

After removal, the parties filed cross motions for summary judgment. The district court ruled in favor of Honeywell, holding that the retroactive abrogation of Honeywell's guaranty coverage rights impermissibly destroyed vested rights in violation of both the Contract Clause and the Due Process Clause of the Constitution. After the Association moved for reconsideration, however, the district court vacated its initial opinion and certified two questions to the Supreme Court of Minnesota: (1) Did the 1992 amendment to the Act's definition of "contractual obligation" effect a substantive change in the Association's obligations or merely clarify existing obligations? (2) Is the annuity contract owner's (the trustee's) right to guaranty payment from the Association a purely statutory right or is it contractual in nature? The Supreme Court of Minnesota ruled on the certified questions, holding that (1) the 1992 amendment to the definition of "contractual obligation" substantively changed the Association's coverage obligations, and (2) the right to payment from the Association is a purely statutory right under state law. See Honeywell, 518 N.W.2d at 563.

After the Supreme Court of Minnesota responded to the certified questions, the parties again filed cross motions for summary judgment. This time, the district court granted the Association's motion for summary judgment, concluding that retroactive application of the 1992 amendment did not violate either the Contract Clause or the Due Process Clause, and dismissed Honeywell's complaint with prejudice. Honeywell appeals.

II. DISCUSSION

Honeywell contends that its preamendment right to insurance guaranty coverage is contractual in nature and that retroactive application of the amendment constitutes the impairment of its contractual rights in violation of the Contract Clause. Honeywell also argues that the 1992 amendment arbitrarily and irrationally destroyed its accrued, vested right to guaranty coverage, in violation of the Due Process Clause. We begin our analysis with the Contract Clause.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

A. CONTRACT CLAUSE

The Constitution provides, "No State shall ... pass any Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts...." U.S. CONST. art. I, § 10, cl. 1. Read literally, this constitutional prohibition bans any interference with contracts, but cases interpreting the clause clearly indicate that this prohibition "is not an absolute one and is not to be read with literal exactness like a mathematical formula." Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 428, 54 S.Ct. 231, 236, 78 L.Ed. 413 (1934). Instead, when a litigant contends that a legislative amendment has impermissibly impaired contractual obligations, our inquiry initially focuses on "whether the change in state law has 'operated as a substantial impairment of a contractual relationship.' " General Motors Corp. v. Romein, 503 U.S. 181, 186, 112 S.Ct. 1105, 1109, 117 L.Ed.2d 328 (1992) (quoting Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 244, 98 S.Ct. 2716, 2722, 57 L.Ed.2d 727 (1978)) (other citation omitted). Three basic components are essential to this inquiry: (1) Does a contractual relationship exist, (2) does the changein the law impair that contractual relationship, and if so, (3) is the impairment substantial? Id. If we conclude that a substantial impairment of a contractual relationship exists, we must then carefully examine "the nature and purpose of the state legislation." Allied Structural Steel Co., 438 U.S. at 244, 98 S.Ct. at 2722.

We first consider whether a contractual relationship exists. In this case, the district court certified to the state supreme court the question of whether the Association's guaranty obligation to GIC owners, such as the Honeywell trustee, is a contractual or a statutory obligation. The Supreme Court of Minnesota determined that the right to payment 552 from the Association is a purely statutory right under state law. Honeywell, 518 N.W.2d at 563. Honeywell first contends that the district court erroneously certified a question of federal constitutional law to the state court.

While federal courts "accord respectful consideration and great weight to the views of the State's highest court," the determination of whether the Act created a contractual obligation "is a federal question for purposes of Contract Clause analysis, and whether it turns on issues of general or purely local law, we can not surrender the duty to exercise our own judgment." Romein, 503 U.S. at 187, 112 S.Ct. at 1110 (internal quotations omitted). Contrary to Honeywell's assertion, however, the district court did not avoid its duty to determine the constitutional issue by certifying a question to the state supreme court. Instead, the district court gave proper consideration to the state court's views but independently determined that the right to payment under the Act is not contractual within the meaning of the Contract Clause. We review de novo the district court's judgment on this constitutional question. See United States v. Bates, 77 F.3d 1101, 1104 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 519 U.S. 884, 117 S.Ct. 215, 136 L.Ed.2d 149 (1996).

Our independent review leads us to agree with the district court that the rights at issue are statutory in nature and therefore, no contractual relationship existed between Honeywell and the Association. Two factors lead us to this conclusion: (1) the Act itself does not create a contract, and (2) the GICs do not specifically incorporate the terms of the Act.

First, the Act's guaranty is not itself a contract between the Association and those who qualify for the Act's protection. "In general, a statute is itself treated as a contract when the language and circumstances evince a legislative intent to create private rights of a contractual nature enforceable against the State." United States Trust Co. v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 17 n. 14, 97 S.Ct. 1505, 1516, 52 L.Ed.2d 92 (1977). The right to payment under the Act is not enforceable against the state of Minnesota but is an obligation imposed upon the Association. The Association is a nonprofit legal entity and not a state agency. Minn.Stat.Ann. § 61B.04, subd. 1 (West 1986). See also Minn.Stat.Ann. § 61B.21, subd. 1 (West Supp.1996). Even if the Association were a state agency, the Act contains no "clear indication that the legislature intends to bind itself contractually," which is necessary in order to overcome the general presumption "that a law is not intended to create private contractual or vested rights but merely declares a policy to be pursued until the legislature shall ordain otherwise." National R.R. Passenger Corp. v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry., 470

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

U.S. 451, 465-66, 105 S.Ct. 1441, 1451, 84 L.Ed.2d 432 (1985) (quotations omitted). Rather, the Act creates an insurance guaranty association with attendant statutory obligations to safeguard the financial well-being of Minnesota residents to whom contractual obligations are owed by its member insurance companies. The Act does not create a contract; instead, it creates a statutory safety net to protect the economic well-being of Minnesota resident policy owners in the event a member insurer becomes insolvent.

Second, while the Association has the power to enter into contracts, Minn.Stat.Ann. § 61B.06, subd. 9(a) (West 1986), the Association is not a party to the GICs involved here. The GICs at issue are contracts between the Honeywell trustee and the impaired ELIC, not the Association. The Honeywell trustee did not specifically bargain for protection under the Act, and the Act is not expressly or impliedly incorporated into the terms of the GICs. "For the most part, state laws are implied into private contracts regardless of the assent of the parties only when those laws affect the validity, construction, and enforcement of contracts." Romein, 503 U.S. at 189, 112 S.Ct. at 1111. The Association's statutory obligation to guaranty the insurance coverage of residents protected by the Act does not in any way affect the validity, construction, or enforcement of ELIC's obligation on the GICs. Moreover, there is no evidence that the GICs were created in pursuance of the statutory obligation. Cf. Coombes v. Getz, 285 U.S. 434, 442, 448, 52 S.Ct. 435, 436, 438, 76 L.Ed. 553 866 (1932) (upholding the contractual liability created pursuant to a state constitutional rule of law that was repealed). The 1992 amendment merely altered definitions under the Act, which in turn affect the Association's statutory obligation to the Honeywell trustee, but the amendment did not alter or affect any bargained-for agreement between the Association and the Honeywell trustee. The Contract Clause does not "protect against all changes in legislation, regardless of the effect of those changes on bargained-for agreements." Romein, 503 U.S. at 190, 112 S.Ct. at 1107.

[1] We conclude that the Association's obligations are statutory in nature rather than contractual. Absent the existence of a contractual relationship, our Contract Clause inquiry is finished. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's conclusion that the 1992 amendment did not unconstitutionally impair a contractual relationship in violation of the Contract Clause.

B. DUE PROCESS

Honeywell's due process claim presents a closer question. Honeywell argues that retroactive application of the 1992 amendment defeats its vested right to payment under the Act, in violation of the Due Process Clause. Honeywell relies on Coombes, 285 U.S. at 439-48, 52 S.Ct. at 437-38, where the Supreme Court held unconstitutional the repeal of a California state constitutional provision that provided a cause of action against corporate directors. The Court stated in absolute terms that "neither vested property rights nor the obligation of contracts of third persons may be destroyed or impaired." Id. at 442, 52 S.Ct. at 436. More specifically, the Court in Coombes held, "a contractual obligation arose; and the right to enforce it, having become vested, comes within the protection of both the contract impairment clause in Art. 1, § 10, and the due process of law clause in the Fourteenth Amendment, of the Federal Constitution." Id. at 448, 52 S.Ct. at 438. Honeywell also relies on Ettor v. City of Tacoma, 228 U.S. 148, 158, 33 S.Ct. 428, 431, 57 L.Ed. 773 (1913), where the Supreme Court held that a statutory right to compensation for property damage caused by the city in the course of grading streets, which right to compensation was complete before a repeal of the cause of action, was a vested property right that could not be retroactively destroyed. Claiming that these cases control the outcome of the case at hand, the Honeywell trustee asserts a vested right to payment under the Act as it existed when ELIC became insolvent, prior to the 1992 amendment.

The Association, on the other hand, urges us to follow more recent Supreme Court precedents in which the Court reviews economic legislation with a very deferential eye and does not accord vested rights status to economic rights. The Association observes that under this modern approach, due process is satisfied as long as a reasonable legislative purpose supports the retroactive application of the legislation. The Association contends that the retroactive 1992 amendment is supported by a reasonable legislative purpose, and alternatively, that no vested rights accrued in favor of the

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Honeywell trustee upon ELIC's insolvency.

In one sense, both arguments are right. The Supreme Court has never expressly overruled the reasoning of Ettor and Coombes, which accords great protection to accrued statutory causes of action. In the area of economic legislation, however, we cannot ignore the abundance of cases where substantive due process has evolved into a deferential rational basis analysis. We believe that an understanding of the historical context of Ettor and Coombes is essential to divine accurately the present weight of their authority on the issue before us. See Hammond v. United States, 786 F.2d 8, 11 (1st Cir.1986) (questioning the continued vitality of Coombes and Ettor because recent cases have retroactively abridged economic and real property rights without always carefully distinguishing these prior cases). See also W. David Slawson, Constitutional and Legislative Considerations in Retroactive Lawmaking, 48 Cal.L.Rev. 216, 232 (1960) ("The decision [of Coombes v. Getz] seems far too rigid in its conception of permissible legislative change and would almost certainly not be followed today.").

554 Ettor and Coombes were decided during what is referred to in the history of American jurisprudence as the Lochner era, named for the pivotal case of judicial activism, Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45, 25 S.Ct. 539, 49 L.Ed. 937 (1905) (invalidating maximum work hours legislation as an unconstitutional exercise of police power). Cases of that era frequently invalidated statutes that limited economic autonomy in a manner thought by the Court to be unnecessary or unwise, but in more recent decisions, the Court plainly sees its role differently: "[W]e do not sit as a super legislature to weigh the wisdom of legislation nor to decide whether the policy which it expresses offends the public welfare." Day-Brite Lighting, Inc. v. Missouri, 342 U.S. 421, 423, 72 S.Ct. 405, 407, 96 L.Ed. 469 (1952). The reasoning prevalent during the "Lochner [era] has been implicitly rejected many times." Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 597 & n. 18, 97 S.Ct. 869, 875, 51 L.Ed.2d 64 (1977). See also United States v. Carlton, 512 U.S. 26, 31- 34, 114 S.Ct. 2018, 2023-24, 129 L.Ed.2d 22 (1994) (recognizing that three tax cases from the Lochner era "were decided during an era characterized by exacting review of economic legislation under an approach that 'has long since been discarded' " (citation omitted)); Planned Parenthood of S.E. Pa. v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 112 S.Ct. 2791, 120 L.Ed.2d 674, 861 (1992) (recognizing that the demise of Lochner era reasoning began in West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379, 57 S.Ct. 578, 81 L.Ed. 703 (1937)).

Within two years of the Coombes decision, substantive due process analysis in the area of retroactive economic legislation began to be framed in terms of reasonableness, drifting away from the Lochner era's strict protection of economic freedom and vested rights. See Blaisdell, 290 U.S. at 438, 54 S.Ct. at 240 (upholding as an emergency measure a mortgage moratorium law that impaired obligations on mortgage contracts). The Court acknowledged that even the expressly protected obligation of contracts (and similarly, we believe, the concept of vested rights) may be impaired by economic legislation if "the legislation is addressed to a legitimate end and the measures taken are reasonable and appropriate to that end." Id. This rational basis substantive due process test appears to have supplanted the legislatively restrictive vested rights mode of analysis, and allows legislatures more freedom in dealing with economic situations. See, e.g., James L. Kainen, The Historical Framework for Reviving Constitutional Protection for Property and Contract Rights, 79 Cornell L.Rev. 87, 119 (Nov.1993) ("Modern jurists reject the categorical logic of vesting and consider the statute's justifications under the rubric of substantive due process."); Charles B. Hochman, The Supreme Court and the Constitutionality of Retroactive Legislation, 73 Harv.L.Rev. 692, 696-97 (1959- 60) (noting that the vested rights analysis has been replaced by balancing three factors: (1) the nature and strength of the public interest served by the statute, (2) the extent to which the statute modifies or abrogates a preenactment right, and (3) the nature of the right altered by the statute).

[2] In 1976, the Court announced, "It is by now well established that legislative Acts adjusting the burdens and benefits of economic life come to the Court with a presumption of constitutionality, and that the burden is on the one complaining of a due process violation to establish that the legislature has acted in an arbitrary and irrational way." Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., 428 U.S. 1, 15, 96 S.Ct. 2882, 2892, 49 L.Ed.2d 752 (1976). These authorities leave no doubt that, even though

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Coombes and Ettor have never been overruled by the Supreme Court, the modern framework for substantive due process analysis concerning economic legislation requires only an inquiry into whether the legislation is reasonably related to a legitimate governmental purpose. Given the criticism surrounding the Court's Lochner era decisions in general, coupled with the development of judicial deference to economic legislation since then, we join those who question the continued validity of the vested rights analysis of Coombes and Ettor when reviewing the constitutionality of economic legislation, recognizing as we must that only the Supreme Court itself can overrule its precedents. We rely instead on the more recent Supreme Court pronouncements of substantive due process analysis for economic 555 legislation, which articulate a rational basis test.

[3][4] Our task, then, is to determine whether the retroactive application of the 1992 amendment is justified by a rational legislative purpose, or whether it is illegitimate and arbitrary. Retroactive legislation, like prospective legislation, must meet the reasonableness test of due process. Usery, 428 U.S. at 17, 96 S.Ct. at 2893. "But that burden is met simply by showing that the retroactive application of the legislation is itself justified by a rational legislative purpose." Pension Benefit Guar. Corp. v. R.A. Gray & Co., 467 U.S. 717, 730, 104 S.Ct. 2709, 2718, 81 L.Ed.2d 601 (1984). Retroactive economic legislation has been upheld as reasonable even in circumstances where it destroys a settled expectancy or imposes a new liability. See, e.g., Carlton, 512 U.S. at 30-31, 114 S.Ct. at 2022-23 (upholding a curative measure that took away an expected and relied upon deduction for estate tax); Gray, 467 U.S. at 734, 104 S.Ct. at 2720 (upholding retroactive application of ERISA's withdrawal liability as supported by rational legislative purpose); Usery, 428 U.S. at 19-20, 96 S.Ct. at 2894-95 (upholding retroactive aspects of Black Lung Benefits Act of 1972, which required employers to compensate former employees disabled by a work- related disease). The Court has repeatedly noted that although certain economic liabilities or burdens were not anticipated, nevertheless, " ' "our cases are clear that legislation readjusting rights and burdens is not unlawful solely because it upsets otherwise settled expectations." ' " Concrete Pipe & Prod. v. Constr. Laborers Pension Trust, 508 U.S. 602, 637, 113 S.Ct. 2264, 2287, 124 L.Ed.2d 539 (1993) (quoting Gray, 467 U.S. at 729, 104 S.Ct. at 2717-18, quoting Usery, 428 U.S. at 16, 96 S.Ct. at 2892-93).

Using these standards, we conclude that the 1992 amendment redefining "contractual obligation" was neither arbitrary nor illegitimate. The state has a legitimate interest in regulating the insurance industry, easing the economic burdens of its own residents, and ensuring the economic life of an association created by its statute to protect its residents. The general purpose of the Act at issue in this case "is to protect the future financial stability of individuals," Minnesota Life & Health Ins., 400 N.W.2d at 773, and the preamendment Act expressly provided protection to "residents" to whom "contractual obligations" are owed. Minn.Stat. § 61B.06, subd. 2 (1986). The 1992 amendment serves to narrow the definition of contractual obligation, explicitly providing coverage only to resident plan participants. This is a legitimate purpose.

[5][6] The 1992 amendment is also curative in nature, even though it worked a substantive change in the law. See Honeywell, 518 N.W.2d at 560- 63 (holding that the amendment worked a substantive change in the law because before the amendment, it plainly entitled resident policy owners, including trustees, to coverage). Curative legislation corrects an unintended and unanticipated mistake in the underlying legislation, which went undetected until some time after the original enactment. Certainly, legislatures have the authority to cure inadvertent defects in their legislation. See Carlton, 512 U.S. at 30, 114 S.Ct. at 2022 (upholding Congress's attempt to cure a defect in the tax code). In Carlton, the Court concluded that Congress's purpose in retroactively taking away an estate tax deduction, even though the decedent's executor had relied upon it, was neither illegitimate nor arbitrary because "Congress acted to correct what it reasonably viewed as a mistake in the original 1986 provision that would have created a significant and unanticipated revenue loss." 512 U.S. at 31, 114 S.Ct. at 2023. We also note the observation of one commentator that "the individual who claims that a vested right has arisen from the defect is seeking a windfall since, had the legislature's ... action had the effect it was intended to and could have had, no such right would have arisen." Hochman, supra at 705.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Here, the Minnesota legislature acted reasonably when it gave retroactive effect to the 1992 amendment in order to cure a drafting defect that might have inadvertently left thousands of Minnesota residents without coverage under the Act due to the ELIC debacle. We agree with the observation of the Supreme Court of Minnesota: "Given 556 that unallocated annuity contracts were not prevalent at the time of the statute's enactment in 1977, the legislature likely did not contemplate how the Act specifically applied to these contracts." Honeywell, 518 N.W.2d at 561. Absent retroactive effect, an unintended gap in coverage would have left many Minnesota resident workers (whose trustee resided elsewhere) without coverage, while an unintended windfall in favor of nonresident workers who had a Minnesota trustee would have strained the financial capabilities of the Association and required Minnesota residents to pay higher premiums to finance the Association's obligation to out-of-state residents. In sum, "the interest in the retroactive curing of such a defect in the administration of government outweighs the individual [trustee's] interest in benefiting from the defect." Hochman, supra at 705-06. Thus, we conclude that retroactive application of the 1992 amendment was a rational means by which to accomplish the state's legitimate goals.

Honeywell contends that retroactive application is arbitrary and irrational because there is no connection linking the Honeywell trustee to the ELIC failure that triggered coverage and because the amendment has a disparate impact on non-residents. Neither contention has merit. We have already determined that the retroactive application of the amendment was rational and prevented an unanticipated gap in coverage for resident plan participants and an unexpected windfall for nonresident plan participants. Because the context here is curative in nature, there is no need to demonstrate any connection of the Honeywell trustee to the ELIC failure in order for the legislation to be rational. We agree with the Association's contention that the amendment actually eliminates the arbitrary aspect of the prior legislation under which Minnesota residents may or may not have had coverage for their plan funds, depending solely upon the arbitrary residence of their plan trustee, over which they have no control. Additionally, the disparate impact results only from the state's legitimate interest in maintaining the welfare of its own citizens, not from arbitrariness or discrimination. Retroactive application does not deprive nonresidents of any rights (except the expectation of coverage based on the arbitrary residence of their trustee), and it does not place any added burdens or liabilities on nonresidents.

To the extent Honeywell argues that this case is fully controlled by Coombes and Ettor, we also disagree. As already noted, we question the continued vitality of these cases. Furthermore, even assuming they remain authoritative, we conclude that they do not control the outcome in this situation. In our view, Ettor and Coombes do not stand for the proposition that an inviolable vested right exists whenever a statutory economic right accrues. In Coombes, the Court expressly protected what had become a vested contract right, independent of the statute. 285 U.S. at 448, 52 S.Ct. at 438. We have previously concluded that no contract rights are implicated by the 1992 amendment. This case involves legislation of economic matters which exist only by statute and have not been integrated into a private contract, and Honeywell did not even make choices in reliance on the preamendment Act. In Ettor, the Court protected a cause of action that provided a remedy for property damage to private property that occurred while the city graded streets for public use. 228 U.S. at 156, 33 S.Ct. at 430- 31. In the present case, neither the state nor the Association caused a harm and then took away a remedy for the injury caused, as the city and state did in Ettor.

In sum, Coombes and Ettor are not directly applicable to the case at hand because each involves an element distinguishable from the type of economic legislation at issue here. Thus, even if Coombes and Ettor apply, they do not dictate a conclusion that accrued economic rights under the preamendment Act rise to the level of a vested right. Rather, in spite of the expectancies that may have been based upon the preamendment Act, the retroactive 1992 amendment was a rational means by which to accomplish the legitimate economic goal of ensuring the welfare of Minnesota resident workers.

III. CONCLUSION

Finding no violation of either the Contract Clause or the Due Process Clause through 557 retroactive application of the 1992 amendment, we affirm the judgment of the district court.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

LOKEN, Circuit Judge, with whom BOWMAN, Circuit Judge, joins, concurring.

I concur in Part II.B. of the court's opinion, concluding that the Minnesota statute at issue does not violate Honeywell's right to substantive due process, except to the extent that the rollover paragraph on pages 18 and 19 is inconsistent with my view of the Contract Clause issue. As to that issue, I respectfully disagree with the court's conclusion that no contract has been impaired, but I agree that there has been no unconstitutional impairment. Accordingly, I concur in the court's decision to affirm.

As the court explains, the modern Contract Clause analysis is (1) has the State impaired a contract, (2) is the impairment substantial, and (3) is the statute nevertheless a permissible exercise of the State's police power. See General Motors v. Romein, 503 U.S. 181, 186, 112 S.Ct. 1105, 1109, 117 L.Ed.2d 328 (1992); Energy Reserves, Inc. v. Kansas Power & Light Co., 459 U.S. 400, 410, 103 S.Ct. 697, 703-04, 74 L.Ed.2d 569 (1983). The latter two factors are interrelated. "The severity of the impairment measures the height of the hurdle the state legislation must clear." Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 245, 98 S.Ct. 2716, 2723, 57 L.Ed.2d 727 (1978).

[7] 1. Was There a Contract. My starting point on this question is Coombes v. Getz, 285 U.S. 434, 440-42, 52 S.Ct. 435, 435-36, 76 L.Ed. 866 (1932), in which California repealed a constitutional provision holding corporate directors personally liable to creditors for embezzled or misappropriated corporate funds. In holding that the repeal unconstitutionally impaired a creditor's contract with a corporation, the Court described the repealed liability as "in its nature contractual." Justice Cardozo in dissent observed that to call the liability contractual was "a legal fiction ... borrowed from the law of quasi contracts." But he nonetheless agreed that the Contract Clause may protect a creditor's "contract with a corporation secured in certain contingencies by a statutory liability."

To me, Coombes confirms that a statute may create a contract between private parties that the Contract Clause protects. See also Steamship Co. v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. 450, 69 U.S. 450, 456-57, 17 L.Ed. 805 (1864) (statute created contract between shipping company and harbor pilots); Hawthorne v. Calef, 2 Wall. 10, 69 U.S. 10, 22, 17 L.Ed. 776 (1864) (statute providing that stock is security for railroad's creditors created contract between creditors and shareholders). All recent Supreme Court cases analyzing whether a statute had created a contract for Contract Clause purposes dealt with obligations of the State, rather than, as in Coombes, obligations the State has compelled private parties to assume. But that should not alter the analysis. For example, even if a statute mandates the terms of a fire insurance policy, the policy is still a contract. Accord In re Workers' Compensation Refund, 46 F.3d 813, 818 (8th Cir.1995).

In this case, the statute created the Guaranty Association, a private non- profit entity consisting of all insurers wishing to do business in the State, and required that entity to guarantee the "covered policies" of its members in the event of an insolvency. That third party guaranty looks much like the statutory liability in Coombes. "In determining whether a particular statute gives rise to a contractual obligation, it is of first importance to examine the language of the statute." National R.R. Passenger Corp. v. Atchison, Topeka & S.F. Ry., 470 U.S. 451, 466, 105 S.Ct. 1441, 1452, 84 L.Ed.2d 432 (1985). Here, the statute uses the word "guaranty" in its title and provides that the Association "shall ... guarantee, assume, or reinsure" the obligations of its members. Minn.Stat. § 61B.06, subd. 1 (1986). A guaranty is a contract under Minnesota law. See Baker v. Citizens State Bank of St. Louis Park, 349 N.W.2d 552, 557-58 (Minn.1984). In these circumstances, Honeywell has had a "contract" impaired, either its underlying investment contracts with ELIC or, more directly, the guaranty by the Guaranty Association. The contrary conclusion of the Minnesota Supreme Court, though entitled to deference in its construction of state law, is not binding 558 on us for Contract Clause purposes. See Romein, 503 U.S. at 187, 112 S.Ct. at 1110.

[8] 2. Was the Contract Substantially Impaired. Total destruction of a contract is a substantial impairment. Home Building & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 431, 54 S.Ct. 231, 237, 78 L.Ed. 413 (1934). At first glance, this case seems to involve total destruction of the guaranty rights of non-resident Honeywell employees. But that ignores the nature of the guaranteed contracts. As a GIC trade association monograph explained, "GICs are assets of the pension plan. Individual employees do not own any part of a GIC, nor do employees have any individual rights under the contract." Thus, properly viewed, the impairment is partial--a reduction in the Association's guaranty obligation to the Honeywell Plan. (Whether that loss to the Plan must ultimately be borne only by non-resident beneficiaries is an issue not before us.)

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Though partial, the impairment is quantitatively substantial--based on the percentage of non-resident Honeywell employees, the statutory amendment deprived the Plan of some 75% of its guaranty claim against the Association. In addition, the impairment was not merely incidental to another legislative purpose; the statute was enacted to impair. Compare Energy Reserves, 459 U.S. at 418, 103 S.Ct. at 708; Exxon v. Eagerton, 462 U.S. 176, 194 n. 14, 103 S.Ct. 2296, 2307, 76 L.Ed.2d 497 (1983).

Beyond the sheer magnitude of an impairment, the Supreme Court looks at whether the impaired term was central to the contract, whether settled expectations have been disrupted, and whether the impaired right was reasonably relied on. See El Paso v. Simmons, 379 U.S. 497, 514, 85 S.Ct. 577, 586- 87, 13 L.Ed.2d 446 (1965); Spannaus, 438 U.S. at 243 n. 14, 98 S.Ct. at 2722 n. 14. In general, when an industry is heavily regulated, parties are considered to have less reasonable expectation that legislation will not alter their contractual arrangements. See Energy Reserves, 459 U.S. at 411, 103 S.Ct. at 704. These other factors cut against the substantiality of this impairment. As in Veix v. Sixth Ward Bldg. & Loan Ass'n of Newark, 310 U.S. 32, 38, 60 S.Ct. 792, 794-95, 84 L.Ed. 1061 (1940), the industry is both heavily regulated and "regulated in the particular to which [Honeywell] now objects," since the State created the impaired guaranty. Honeywell cannot show substantial reliance on the Association's guaranty when it purchased the GICs in 1988 because the Association has broad power to unilaterally impose conditions on its guaranty obligations, subject to the Commissioner's approval, including the power to declare a moratorium on payments. See Minn.Stat. § 61B.06, subds. 1-3 (1986); Honeywell v. Minnesota Life & Health Ins. Guar. Ass'n, 518 N.W.2d 557, 563 (Minn.1994).

On the other hand, recent Eighth Circuit cases have looked unfavorably on retroactive legislation impairing contracts, even in heavily regulated industries. See Workers' Compensation Refund, 46 F.3d at 820 (statute confiscating excess reinsurance premiums invalid though reinsurance plan documents incorporated changes in state law); Holiday Inns Franchising, Inc. v. Branstad, 29 F.3d 383, 384 (8th Cir.), (statute retroactively restricting franchisor termination rights invalid), cert. denied, 513 U.S. 1032, 115 S.Ct. 613, 130 L.Ed.2d 522 (1994); Minnesota Ass'n of Health Care Facilities, Inc. v. Minnesota Dept. of Public Welfare, 742 F.2d 442, 451 (8th Cir.1984) (statute retroactively reducing nursing home rates for medicaid patients invalid "because it disrupts settled and completed financial arrangements under contracts made in reliance on existing law"), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1215, 105 S.Ct. 1191, 84 L.Ed.2d 337 (1985).

On balance, I conclude this impairment is substantial. Honeywell lost 75% of its guaranty benefit. Cf. Spannaus, 438 U.S. at 247, 438 U.S. at 239-40 (statute imposing $185,000 pension charge on employer closing state office was substantial impairment). Thus, on the sliding scale the Supreme Court uses for the last two Contract Clause factors, this impairment requires close scrutiny of the State's justification.

3. Is the Substantial Impairment Justified. The economic interests of a state may justify its impairing contracts, see, e.g., Blaisdell, 290 U.S. at 437, 54 S.Ct. at 239-40, but the Contract Clause imposes limits on that 559 power. "Legislation adjusting the rights and responsibilities of contracting parties must be upon reasonable conditions and of a character appropriate to the public purpose justifying its adoption." United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 22, 97 S.Ct. 1505, 1518, 52 L.Ed.2d 92 (1977). Given the deference paid to state legislatures, especially when the State is not a party to the impaired contract, most claims founder on this aspect of the modern Contract Clause analysis. The Supreme Court looks hard at whether there is a legitimate public purpose and then defers to the legislative judgment as to the reasonableness of a particular remedy. See Energy Reserves, 459 U.S

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

at 412-13, 103 S.Ct. at 704-06.

Of particular importance in this case, the Court has stated that it is reasonable to amend a statute to eliminate unforeseen consequences or windfall benefits, even if that impairs existing contracts. See U.S. Trust, 431 U.S. at 31 & n. 30, 97 S.Ct. at 1522 & n. 30; Energy Reserves, 459 U.S. at 412, 103 S.Ct. at 704-05. For example, the Court in U.S. Trust explained that the amendment in El Paso was valid because it simply limited parties "to those gains reasonably to be expected from the [original] contract." Conversely, the amendment struck down in U.S. Trust was not in response to windfall benefits or unforeseen consequences because it repealed a provision expressly prohibiting the use of Port Authority revenues for transportation subsidies.

In this case, the Minnesota Legislature based its initial 1977 statute on the NAIC Model Life & Health Guaranty Association Act. The Model Act at that time provided that the association must guarantee all obligations of an insolvent domestic insurer. For an insolvent foreign or out-of-state insurer, however, the association only guaranteed "the covered policies of residents," and it would have "no liability" if that insurer's home State provided "substantially similar" protection "for residents of other states." *See*Minn.Stat. § 61B.06, subds. 2 and 4 (1986). In other words, if every State had enacted this Model Act and uniformly applied it, the association in an insolvent U.S. insurer's home State would pay all guaranty claims. But if an offshore insurer grabbed everyone's money and went under, each State's association would guarantee the covered policies of that State's residents.

In this environment, Honeywell's guaranty claim for its investment in ELIC GICs posed a substantial unforeseen consequence in Minnesota for three reasons. First, the legislators who enacted the initial Minnesota statute in 1977 did not foresee that, unlike regulators in most every other State, Minnesota's Commissioner would take the position in the 1980s, before ELIC became insolvent, that GICs are "covered policies," and the Supreme Court of Minnesota would agree in Minnesota Life & Health Ins. Guar. Ass'n v. Department of Commerce, 400 N.W.2d 769, 773-74 (1987). As a result of this lack of uniform implementation, when Honeywell sent its ELIC claims to all fifty States, it received blanket denials from most everyone except Minnesota.

Second, the Legislature did not foresee that "covered policies" would include group annuities in which a single contract holder, rather than thousands of beneficiaries, is the "resident." One can argue that this issue was reasonably foreseeable. But I see no indication that even the drafters of the various Model Acts anticipated the problem before 1985. That the issue was unforeseen is confirmed by the fact that any careful drafter familiar with ERISA insurance-funded group life and health plans would not try to solve this complex an issue with the single word "resident."

Third, Honeywell took the position that the $300,000 statutory ceiling on the Association's liability "for all benefits ... with respect to any one life," Minn.Stat. § 61B.06, subd. 8 (1986), does not apply to its GIC claims. That exposed the Association to a $111,000,000 claim, far more than any State has allowed in expressly covering GICs. See Minn.Stat. § 61B.19, subd. 4(6) (1996) ($7,500,000 limit on claims regarding "unallocated annuities of a retirement plan"); 1985 NAIC Model Act § 3(c)(2)(B) ($5,000,000 limit).

Faced with this surprising confluence of factors that produced a genuinely unforeseen consequence and arguable windfall benefit, 560 the Legislature enacted an amendment that reduced the Association's statutory guaranty to a level that Honeywell (or any other plan sponsor) should reasonably have expected from the statute as originally enacted: because GICs are not "covered policies" in California, ELIC's home State, the Minnesota Association must guarantee ELIC's GIC obligations to Minnesota residents; therefore, the Honeywell Plan is entitled to a guaranty benefit equal to that portion of its GIC contracts that represent investments on behalf of its Minnesota resident beneficiaries.

In enacting this amendment, the State acted in furtherance of the legitimate economic interests of its citizens. [FN3] The effect of its action was to reduce a state-mandated private benefit in a manner not inconsistent with the reasonable expectations of the parties to that "contract." In these circumstances, I concur in the court's conclusion that Minnesota did not unconstitutionally impair the Contract Clause rights of the Honeywell Plan trustee or the Plan's ultimate employee beneficiaries.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

> FN3. As the court observes in its substantive due process discussion, because the Association's liabilities are unfunded--claims are paid by post-insolvency assessments of the remaining, solvent members--it does not take a team of actuaries to deduce that if Minnesota compels the Association to bestow uniquely generous guaranty benefits on the non- Minnesota customers of this year's insolvent insurer, ELIC, the Association's members must eventually recoup those benefits by imposing higher insurance premiums on future Minnesota policyholders.

RICHARD S. ARNOLD, Chief Judge, with whom McMILLIAN, MAGILL, BEAM, and MORRIS SHEPPARD ARNOLD, Circuit Judges, join, dissenting.

I agree with Judge Loken that a contract was impaired by the Minnesota Legislature's amendment of section 61B. I also believe that impairment was substantial within the meaning of the Contracts Clause, and not sufficiently justified. I therefore respectfully dissent.

The lead opinion holds that there was no contract to be impaired when the Minnesota Legislature amended § 61B to exclude out-of-state-resident life-insurance policyholders and other beneficiaries from its coverage. As Judge Loken's opinion explains, it is settled law that obligations between private parties which are mandated by statute may nonetheless be contractual and enforceable as such. The statute which created the Minnesota Life and Health Insurance Guaranty Association states that the Association was created to protect the rights of policyowners and other beneficiaries by guaranteeing the obligations owed them by insurance companies. Minn.Stat. § 61B.02 subd. 2 (1990) ("The purpose of sections 61B.01 to 61B.16, is to protect policyowners, death benefit certificate holders, insureds, beneficiaries, annuitants, payees, and assignees of life insurance policies, health insurance policies, annuity contracts and supplemental contracts...."). The duty to guarantee the obligations of member insurance companies appears to be the Association's primary reason for existence. The power to collect assessments from member companies exists to enable the Association to fulfill that duty. A guaranty is itself a kind of contract, an undertaking to fulfill the obligation of another if that other is in default.

It seems improbable that the Legislature would create a separate, nonprofit legal entity and endow it with the power to collect assessments from member insurance companies without demanding reciprocal performance from the Association. The words of the statute belie such a possibility: "If a domestic insurer is an impaired insurer [unable to meet its obligations to policyholders and other beneficiaries], the association shall ... guarantee, assume, or reinsure, or cause to be guaranteed, assumed, or reinsured, the covered policies of the impaired insurer...." Minn.Stat. § 61B.06 subd. 1(b); see also § 61B.06 subd. 2 (pertaining to foreign insurers). The lead opinion today holds the Association did not owe a contractual duty to guarantee all covered policies because a legislature must exhibit a clear indication that it intends to bind itself contractually before it will be considered to be so bound. The Legislature in the instant case did not bind itself, however; it bound the Association. The Legislature created the Association to collect membership fees from insurance companies and to assume the obligations of those 561 companies should they become "impaired." I therefore agree with Judge Loken that the obligations owed by the Association, even though their origin is in the statute, are nonetheless contractual and not merely "statutory."

It follows that the Minnesota Legislature's amendment of the statute was an impairment of a contract. Two sets of contractual relationships were impaired by the Legislature's action: that between Honeywell's trustee and the Association, and that between the trustee and ELIC. The former is affected because the Association, under the amended statute, is released from most of its duty to guarantee the obligation owed the trustee. The latter is affected because the trustee contracted with ELIC under the prior version of the statute, and consequently under the assumption that the GICs were fully guaranteed by the Association.

Judge Loken's concurring opinion concludes that there was only a partial destruction of the contract in this case, because the amendment merely diminished the Association's obligation to guarantee the GICs, rather than destroying that obligation completely. As Judge Loken recognizes, a substantial impairment need not be a total destruction to violate the Contracts Clause. I agree that the impairment in this case was substantial. Indeed, the Minnesota Legislature chose which investments to protect and which to abandon at the level of the individual, according to the individual's state of residence. It specifically intended to abrogate the Association's duty to guarantee a given obligation based on the individual investor to whom that duty was owed. It therefore seems appropriate to view the Legislature's action as a complete destruction of those individual contractual relationships.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The Supreme Court has held that the Constitution does not prevent a legislature from working a substantive change in the law, and impairing contracts thereby, as long as it had sufficient justification for doing so. "[L]egislation adjusting the rights and responsibilities of contracting parties" will not violate the Contracts Clause if it is created "upon reasonable conditions and of a character appropriate to the public purpose justifying its adoption." Allied Structural Steel v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 244, 98 S.Ct. 2716, 2722, 57 L.Ed.2d 727 (1978) (internal quotation omitted).

One possible justification for the amendment could be to avoid unforeseen consequences or windfall benefits. Under that view, the Legislature could not have foreseen that Minnesota's Association would be the only one which guaranteed GICs as "covered policies." To the contrary, it was not only foreseeable, but readily ascertainable, that other states did not treat GICs the way Minnesota did. Minnesota's Commissioner and its State Supreme Court both came to that conclusion in the 1980s.

Minnesota also, it is argued, could not have intended to guarantee coverage of policies based simply on the residence of a trustee. The coverage mandated by such a rule, the argument continues, is far more expansive than the Legislature could have anticipated. Perhaps the Legislature did not anticipate that the Association would incur such a large obligation. But it should have; the language of the statute is not so ambiguous that such a reading should be surprising. Under the subdivision which applies to out-of-state impaired insurers, the statute requires the Association to "guarantee, assume, or reinsure or cause to be guaranteed, assumed, or reinsured, the covered policies of residents, and shall make or cause to be made prompt payment of the impaired insurer's contractual obligations which are due and owing to residents." Minn.Stat. § 61B.06 subd. 2. It was clear when Honeywell applied for coverage of its ELIC GICs that GICs were already "covered policies" in Minnesota. The ambiguity is allegedly whether "residents" could foreseeably have included a trustee which held several "covered policies" on behalf of both resident and non-resident beneficiaries. The statute defines "resident" in § 61B.03: " 'Resident' means any person who resides in this state at the time the impairment is determined and to whom contractual obligations are owed." "Person," according to the statute, "means any individual, corporation, partnership, association or voluntary organization." Minn.Stat. § 61B.03 subd. 12-13. The drafters should have realized 562 that individual corporations, partnerships, associations, and voluntary organizations could hold numerous covered policies on behalf of employees or other beneficiaries. I therefore cannot agree that the Legislature's amendment of the statute is justified because of unforeseeable consequences.

That the amendment imposed a retroactive change raises the "hurdle" the state must clear in order to justify a substantial impairment of contracts. Legislation which makes prospective changes affecting private contracts is an appropriate and commonplace legislative function; private contracting parties, especially in regulated industries, should expect that laws and regulations may change and affect their future dealings. We examine the state's justification for retroactive changes more carefully because the opposite is generally true: private contracting parties should and do expect that the conditions under which they contracted will remain in effect unless and until there is a change. They do not normally expect lawmakers to change the basic assumptions underlying those agreements so as to affect legal obligations incurred, or rights vested, in the past. See Minnesota Ass'n of Health Care Facilities, Inc. v. Minnesota Dep't of Pub. Welfare, 742 F.2d 442, 450-51 (8th Cir.1984) (upholding prospective change but striking down retroactive change because it "disrupt[ed] settled and completed financial arrangements under contracts made in reliance on existing law"), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1215, 105 S.Ct. 1191, 84 L.Ed.2d 337 (1985); Holiday Inns Franchising, Inc. v. Branstad, 29 F.3d 383, 385

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

(8th Cir.) (observing that retroactive changes which alter prior contractual relationships have "almost uniformly been declared unconstitutional," and that "this is a datum on which [parties] are presumably allowed to rely while bargaining"), cert. denied, 513 U.S. 1032, 115 S.Ct. 613, 130 L.Ed.2d 522 (1994).

The Minnesota Legislature in this case deliberately effected a retroactive change in the law to allow the Association to avoid a $110 million payout. The Minnesota Supreme Court has held that the Legislature's amendment was a change, and not a clarification of the statute. Honeywell, Inc. v. Minnesota Life & Health Ins. Guar. Ass'n, 518 N.W.2d 557, 562 (Minn.1994). The Legislature's action was a deliberate, retroactive change in the law which altered the settled contractual duties of the Association, and greatly impaired Honeywell's right to payment. The size of the payout, while substantial, does not seem to me to provide sufficient justification for the change. Indeed, the large size of the payout serves only to underscore the substantiality of the obligation that the Legislature has nullified.

Many reasons underlay the determination of the Framers to create a new Constitution. Perhaps none was more prominent than their conviction that States should not be allowed to destroy or water down contracts for the payment of money. The Contracts Clause "was perhaps the strongest single constitutional check on state legislation during our early years as a Nation...." Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, supra, 438 U.S. at 241, 98 S.Ct. at 2720-21 (footnote omitted). I regret that this Court today shrinks from enforcing this part of the Constitution, which is designed to safeguard a basic human right, the right to make private contracts. It is not a coincidence that most of the people injured by this statute cannot vote for the Minnesota Legislature.

I respectfully dissent.

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

United States Court of Appeals,
Third Circuit.

In re TMI,
Dorothy L. Aldrich; Faith Alleman; Philip Angeli; Michael J. Anoka; Ruth V. Anoka; Catherine J. Balinosky; Regis E. Beasley; Louis Borda; Betty Marie Boylestein; George L. Boylestein; Shirlean Burhanan; Ruth E. Butler; Frank J. Caka; Susan H. Chynoweth; Daniel M. Chynoweth; Catherine Costello; John T. Costello; Martha A. Costik; Richard N. Costik; Mary Margaret Earhart; Edward Ferguson; Marco G. Glad, Jr.; Linda I. Glad; Barbara Grandon; Helen M. Hank; Edward John Hertzog; Marie H. Hertzog; Dianne Hindermyer; George Vance Hitz; Marjorie B. Hitz; Carol C. Hoch; Louis A. Hoch; Estate Of Robert P. Holmes; Thelma M. Nagy; Barry Obercash; Georgeann Pristello; James J. Pristello; Jamie Lynn Pristello; Kenneth R. Snyder; Patricia Southard; Joseph Stewart; Charlotte Evelyn Stewart, Appellants.

No. 94-7598.

Argued May 1, 1995.
Decided July 18, 1996.

Pennsylvania residents brought actions in Pennsylvania state court, Mississippi state court, and federal district court in Mississippi seeking to recover for injuries allegedly sustained as result of Three Mile Island nuclear accident. After dismissal of Pennsylvania state claims based on statute of limitations was affirmed, and Price-Anderson Amendments Act was amended, claims were transferred to federal district court in Pennsylvania and consolidated, and defendants moved for summary judgment on claims originally brought in Mississippi state and federal court. The United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, Sylvia H. Rambo, J., granted summary judgment on claims originally brought in Mississippi and adopted prior summary judgment by Pennsylvania state court. Plaintiffs appealed, and the Court of Appeals, Scirica, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) under Act, Pennsylvania statute of limitations applied retroactively to actions properly filed and pending in Mississippi at time of Act's enactment; (2) retroactive application of Act did not violate due process clause; (3) plaintiffs were not entitled to grace period following retroactive application; and (4) discovery rule and doctrine of fraudulent concealment could not be applied to extend period.

Affirmed.

Sarokin, Circuit Judge, dissented and filed opinion.

West Headnotes

[1] Federal Courts ⚿766
170Bk766 Most Cited Cases

Review by Court of Appeals of district court's grant of summary judgment is plenary.

[2] Federal Courts ⚿754.1
170Bk754.1 Most Cited Cases

Court of Appeals exercises plenary review of district court's construction of statute.

[3] Limitation of Actions ⚿6(1)
241k6(1) Most Cited Cases

Under Price-Anderson Amendments Act, Pennsylvania statute of limitations applied retroactively to actions filed in Mississippi state court prior to effective date of Act to recover for injuries allegedly suffered as result of Three Mile Island nuclear accident. Atomic Energy Act of 1954, § 11(hh), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 2014 (hh); Price-Anderson Amendments Act of 1988, § 20(b), 42 U.S.C.A. § 2014 note.

[4] Federal Courts ⚿425
170Bk425 Most Cited Cases

Statutes of limitations are treated as substantive rules of decision, as to which state law is applicable in federal diversity action, for purposes of Erie doctrine.

[5] Federal Courts ⚿372

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

170Bk372 Most Cited Cases

Intent of Erie doctrine is to ensure that outcome of litigation in diversity action in federal court should be substantially the same, so far as legal rules determine outcome of litigation, as it would be if tried in state court.

[6] Electricity ⚷16(1)
145k16(1) Most Cited Cases

Intent of Congress in enacting provision of Price-Anderson Amendments Act under which substantive rules for decision in any public liability action are derived from law of state in which nuclear incident occurs was to ensure that outcome of any public liability action arising from single nuclear incident should be substantially the same as it would be if tried in state where incident occurred. Atomic Energy Act of 1954, § 11(hh), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 2014(hh).

[7] Limitation of Actions ⚷2(1)
241k2(1) Most Cited Cases

Pennsylvania courts generally apply Pennsylvania's statute of limitations not only to wholly domestic causes of action but also to causes of action arising in other jurisdictions unless, pursuant to Pennsylvania's borrowing statute, Pennsylvania court is directed to apply shorter limitation statute of another jurisdiction.

[8] Constitutional Law ⚷305(1)
92k305(1) Most Cited Cases

Legislation affecting pending tort claim is not subject to heightened scrutiny review under due process clause, because pending tort claim does not constitute vested right. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 5.

[9] Constitutional Law ⚷253(4)
92k253(4) Most Cited Cases

Challenge under due process clause to retroactive application under Price- Anderson Amendments Act of Pennsylvania statute of limitations to actions arising from Three Mile Island nuclear accident which were already filed and pending in Mississippi state court at time of Act's enactment was reviewed under rational basis standard. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 5; Atomic Energy Act of 1954, § 11(hh), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 2014(hh); Price-Anderson Amendments Act of 1988, § 20(b), 42 U.S.C.A. § 2014 note.

[10] Constitutional Law ⚷253(4)
92k253(4) Most Cited Cases

[10] Limitation of Actions ⚷6(1)
241k6(1) Most Cited Cases

Retroactive application pursuant to Price-Anderson Amendments Act of Pennsylvania statute of limitations to actions arising from Three Mile Island nuclear accident which were already properly filed and pending in Mississippi state court at time of Act's enactment was supported by rational basis and did not violate due process clause; retroactive application uniformly applied to all plaintiffs and advanced equity by applying same law to similarly situated plaintiffs, and promoted efficiency by allowing exercise of federal jurisdiction over, and consolidation of, claims arising from accident. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 5; Atomic Energy Act of 1954, § 11(hh), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 2014 (hh); Price-Anderson Amendments Act of 1988, § 20(b), 42 U.S.C.A. § 2014 note.

[11] Federal Courts ⚷1.1
170Bk1.1 Most Cited Cases

Congress cannot confer subject matter jurisdiction on federal courts where there is no underlying federal statute creating federal question.

[12] Limitation of Actions ⚷6(1)
241k6(1) Most Cited Cases

Pennsylvania residents who had filed actions to recover for injuries allegedly suffered in Three Mile Island nuclear accident in Mississippi state court after failing to timely bring claims under two-year Pennsylvania statute of limitations were not entitled to grace period after retroactive application of Pennsylvania statute of limitations to Mississippi claims under Price-Anderson Amendments Act rendered those actions untimely; even if Pennsylvania law still requires grace period after retroactive application of statute, Pennsylvania Supreme Court would not apply grace period to plaintiffs who missed Pennsylvania limitations period and brought suit in another state. Atomic Energy Act of 1954, § 11(hh), as amended, 42

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

U.S.C.A. § 2014(hh); Price- Anderson Amendments Act of 1988, § 20(b), 42 U.S.C.A. § 2014 note.

[13] Limitation of Actions ⚿2(1)
241k2(1) Most Cited Cases

Pennsylvania borrowing statute accurately reflects state policy against forum shopping by applying to claims arising in another state either the other state's statute of limitations or Pennsylvania statute of limitations, whichever is shorter, and unequivocally evinces legislativeintent to prevent plaintiff who sues in Pennsylvania from obtaining greater rights than those available in state where cause of action arose. 42 Pa.C.S.A. § 5521.

[14] Limitation of Actions ⚿95(1)
241k95(1) Most Cited Cases

Under Pennsylvania law, "discovery rule" tolls running of statute of limitations until plaintiff knows, or reasonably should know, that he has been injured and that his injury has been caused by another party's conduct.

[15] Limitation of Actions ⚿195(3)
241k195(3) Most Cited Cases

Under Pennsylvania law, plaintiff bears burden of proving that claim was filed within applicable statute of limitations.

[16] Federal Civil Procedure ⚿2466
170Ak2466 Most Cited Cases

Where nonmoving party bears burden of proof at trial, summary judgment is appropriate if nonmovant fails to make showing sufficient to establish existence of element essential to its case.

[17] Federal Civil Procedure ⚿2544
170Ak2544 Most Cited Cases

In responding to motion for summary judgment, nonmoving party must go beyond pleadings and by her own affidavits, or by depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, designate specific facts showing there is genuine issue for trial.

[18] Limitation of Actions ⚿95(4.1)
241k95(4.1) Most Cited Cases

Under Pennsylvania law, plaintiffs who brought actions to recover for injuries allegedly sustained as result of Three Mile Island nuclear accident could not rely on discovery rule to toll running of statute of limitations; plaintiffs knew of accident and knew or should have known that exposure to radiation as result of accident could cause adverse health affects.

[19] Limitation of Actions ⚿104(2)
241k104(2) Most Cited Cases

Under Pennsylvania law, in order to establish fraudulent concealment by defendant as will toll statute of limitations plaintiff must prove affirmative or independent act of concealment that would divert or mislead plaintiff from discovering injury or its cause.

[20] Limitation of Actions ⚿104(2)
241k104(2) Most Cited Cases

Under Pennsylvania law, plaintiffs who sought to recover for injuries allegedly sustained as result of Three Mile Island nuclear accident could not rely on doctrine of fraudulent concealment to extend statute of limitations on actions; even though plaintiffs pointed to statements by workers of utility downplaying seriousness of accident immediately after it occurred, voluminous information about accident was in public domain.

1109 Arnold Levin (argued), Levin, Fishbein, Sedran & Berman, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Lee C. Swartz, Hepford, Swartz & Morgan, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, William R. Wilson, Jr., Jackson, Mississippi, for Appellants.

Ellen K. Scott (argued), Alfred H. Wilcox, Pepper, Hamilton & Scheetz, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, for Appellees.

Before: SCIRICA, McKEE and SAROKIN, Circuit Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT

SCIRICA, Circuit Judge.

In the wake of the Three Mile Island nuclear accident in 1979, more than two thousand individuals brought suit for personal injuries. The

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Source: All Sources : Secondary Legal : Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: ("executive office" /2 president) and "political activities" (Edit Search)

*1995 B.Y.U.L. Rev. 17, **

Copyright (c) 1995 Brigham Young University Law Review
Brigham Young University Law Review

1995

1995 B.Y.U.L. Rev. 17

LENGTH: 41368 words

ARTICLE: Lawyers and the Defense of the Presidency

Nelson Lund *

* Associate Professor of Law, George Mason University School of Law. Ph.D., Harvard University 1981; J.D., University of Chicago 1985.

While serving at the White House as associate counsel to the president from 1989 to 1992, I participated in many of the matters discussed here; all facts directly relied on for this analysis are matters of public record or common knowledge. For helpful comments on an earlier draft, I am grateful to Neal Devins, Harvey Flaumenhaft, Stephen G. Gilles, Mara S. Lund, John O. McGinnis, Geoffrey P. Miller, Stephen G. Rademaker, and Nicholas P. Wise. Generous financial support was provided by the Sarah Scaife Foundation and the John M. Olin Foundation, and William Loeffler offered able research assistance. The author retains responsibility for errors.

SUMMARY:
... The function of articulating a principled defense of presidents and the presidency--mostly from congressional incursions--is carried out primarily by those who serve in the Office of the Counsel to the President at the White House and in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel ("OLC"), to which the Attorney General's legal advisory function has largely been delegated. ... In this address, he claimed that he had possessed the "inherent power" to use the armed forces in the Gulf War without congressional authorization; he said that when Congress takes aggressive legislative action against specific presidential powers, "the President has a constitutional obligation to protect his Office and to veto the legislation"; and he boasted of having said on many occasions "that statutory provisions that violate the Constitution have no binding legal force." ... It is impossible to assess with certainty whether the Bush administration's veto and signing statement strategy will prove to have any lasting effects. ... President Bush emphasized in his veto message that his refusal to approve the bill was based solely on constitutional grounds and that he had no substantive or policy objections to the legislation. ... One might argue that the provision for a Board of Review is the kind of practical accommodation between the Legislature and the Executive that should be permitted in a "workable government." ...

I am not afraid to say that the doctrine of self-interest properly understood appears to me the best suited of all philosophical theories to the wants of men in our time and that I see it as their strongest remaining guarantee against themselves. Contemporary moralists therefore should give most of their attention to it. Though they may well think it incomplete, they must nonetheless adopt it as necessary. [1] want in on the take-off, fine. I've got to make the decision. I have constitutional responsibilities and they have theirs, largely in the purse strings." [43] The President [*37] also moved quickly to establish a special team of lawyers to devise legal strategies for carrying out his interests in these matters. [44] The ranking members of this group were C. Boyden Gray and William P. Barr, the Assistant Attorney General for OLC, who was often described as Gray's protege. [45] Barr's reputation at OLC came to rest largely on his aggressive defense of presidential authority, [46] and he enjoyed a meteoric rise from almost complete obscurity to the office of Attorney General.

Defense of the constitutional authorities of the presidency continued to receive considerable attention throughout Bush's presidency. In a major address on the Constitution midway through his term, for example, the President talked mainly about relations between the president and Congress. In this address, he claimed that he had possessed the "inherent power" to use the armed forces in the Gulf War without congressional authorization; he said that when Congress takes aggressive legislative action against specific presidential powers, "the President has a constitutional obligation to protect his Office and to veto the legislation"; and he boasted of having said on many occasions "that statutory provisions that violate the Constitution have no binding legal force." [47] At the very end of his term, moreover, President Bush engaged in an unusually direct and personal effort to assert authority over a federal agency [*38] (the U.S. Postal Service) that Congress had sought to insulate from the president's control. [48]

This very high-level interest in shoring up the legal defense of the presidency distinguished the Bush administration from its predecessor. President Reagan's first Attorney General, in a rare criticism of the president he served, wrote in his memoirs:

> If there was one area in which the White House was deficient during my years in office, it was in the protection of presidential power. Decisions there were made on the basis of the substance of individual issues. There was no effective concern or review of the impact that issue or the position taken with respect to it would have on presidential power. Nor was there any effort to identify governmental activities elsewhere that, if developed, would adversely affect the province of the executive. Nor, to be candid, was the bully pulpit used to provide leadership or defense of that vital institution. [49]

This is not to say that the Reagan administration ignored the separation of powers or that it was unwilling to act in defense of the presidency. [50] Indeed, Reagan's constitutional lawyers--primarily those at OLC--had worked out a detailed jurisprudence that was scarcely revised or supplemented during the Bush years. [51] Bush's new initiative may be viewed merely as [*39] an elevation of the Reagan administration's jurisprudence to the status of administration policy. Or, one could say, Bush was endorsing the concerns and goals of OLC in a way that would allow the body of legal principles developed in that office to be given a fair test outside the rarefied and insular atmosphere of OLC itself. If we want some idea of what can happen when a president allows, and even encourages, his leading lawyers to devote themselves to the interests of the presidency itself, the Bush administration offers an almost perfect case study.

I have argued elsewhere that OLC faces a set of constraints and incentives that prevent it from developing an institutional mission of the kind that is often observed in government bureaucracies, including such legal bureaucracies as the Office of the Solicitor General. [52] It is even more obvious that the White House Counsel's office--which is completely reconstituted with each new administration and which each president is free to shape in whatever way he sees fit--cannot be assumed to be driven by a stable institutional or bureaucratic culture. It is nonetheless possible that some "missions" are so inherently appropriate or attractive to presidential legal advisors that they will be adopted with a kind of inevitability that does not depend on the operation of bureaucratic imperatives of the usual kind. For OLC, the defense of the presidency seems to be an obvious candidate for such a mission, and separation of powers does seem to be regarded as the soul of that office's work. [53] For those who serve in the office of the White House Counsel, moreover, adopting the mission of defending the presidency would seem to offer them a way of taking the edge off their slightly unsavory reputation for politically driven lawyering. [54] The Bush administration should therefore show us what can happen when lawyers with a commitment to the separation [*40] of powers are elevated, or get themselves elevated, to the role of serious policy players.

REV_00265243

The record of the Bush administration also provides an opportunity to test an important hypothesis derived from game theory. As Professor John O. McGinnis has pointed out, the actual practice of separation of powers can be described through "a model in which governmental powers are often distributed [not by the formal rules set out in the Constitution, but] by the branches themselves through bargains and accommodations that maximize their respective interests." [55] One corollary of this model seems to be that the president should be able to strengthen his bargaining position through a "pre-commitment strategy": by committing his prestige to the defense of a set of publicly articulated principles, the president can strengthen his own hand in future negotiations because everyone will know that departures from those principles will be more costly to the president than they would be if his prestige were not already committed. [56] Under this view, President Bush's visible elevation of the role played by his constitutional lawyers could be seen as serving the president's interests at least as much as it served those lawyers' interests: "By articulating the principles that the executive will not concede, OLC generates commitments for the future that may strengthen the president's bargaining position vis-a-vis the other branches." [57] If this plausible suggestion about the usefulness of "pre-commitment strategies" helps explain the development of the separation of powers, we should expect to observe significantly more resolute and uncompromising behavior by the Bush administration than by the Reagan administration. The theory and evidence presented in this article, however, suggests that other incentives operating on the president and his advisors render a pre-commitment strategy untenable.

A. Implementation of the Legal Strategy: Veto Messages and Signing Statements

President Bush's interest in promoting a coherent and forceful legal strategy for defending the presidency had observable [*41] effects. Perhaps the most visible results of the initiative emerged in his veto messages and in the signing statements he issued when approving new legislation. The President vetoed forty-six bills, citing constitutional objections in at least eleven instances. In five of these eleven cases, the bills would have been vetoed for independent policy reasons, and might well not have been vetoed on constitutional grounds alone. [58] In two of the eleven cases, however, the principal grounds for the President's objection to the bill were constitutional in nature, [59] and in four other cases constitutional objections were the only apparent reason for his veto. [60] Remarkably, every [*42] veto that was based solely or primarily on constitutional grounds involved a claimed invasion of the constitutional authority of the president's office, while at least two other bills that the President deemed unconstitutional (although not a threat to his office) were allowed to become law. [61] President Reagan, by way of contrast, seemed never to have vetoed a bill on the ground that it infringed on the president's authority, [62] although he sometimes included objections to such infringements in messages dealing with vetoes that were based primarily on policy grounds. [63] Reagan, however, did veto at least two bills on constitutional grounds unrelated to presidential authority, including one that simply codified a regulation that the Supreme Court had previously upheld. [64] Reagan frequently approved [*43] bills containing constitutionally dubious restrictions on his authority, [65] and he signed into law at least four bills that his administration later challenged in the courts as violations of the president's constitutional powers. [66]

REV_00265244

A pattern similar to that found in Bush's veto messages can be found in his signing statements. Unlike the President's veto messages, which are required by the Constitution, the statements that presidents sometimes issue when they approve new legislation are completely discretionary. Many presidents have issued such statements from time to time, but serious efforts to use them as a tool for advancing a coherent legal strategy began only in the Reagan administration. [67] Signing statements can serve as such a tool in three principal ways: by interpreting ambiguous statutory language in a manner that the president hopes will be treated by the courts as a legitimate form of legislative history; [68] by instructing the president's subordinates in the executive agencies to resolve [*44] statutory ambiguities in a way favored by the president; [69] and by creating a record that can be used later to refute claims that the president has approved of constitutionally dubious provisions in bills that the president has chosen to sign because of his desire to see other provisions of the legislation become law.

During the Bush years, the constitutional issues addressed in signing statements dealt mostly with questions of presidential authority, and they seem designed mostly to serve the third purpose listed above, namely avoiding the appearance that the President approved of objectionable provisions in legislation he signed. This concern with appearances is quite striking: Bush's signing statements are pervaded by an amazing scrupulosity about the separation of powers that becomes at times almost comical. Even a cursory review of the record suggests that the administration tried to identify and deal with every issue, no matter how small, in every bill that was presented to the President. The lengths to which the Bush administration was prepared to go in applying legalistic analysis to enrolled bills, moreover, are suggested in the following droll passage from the signing statement for the 1991 defense authorization bill:

> Section 1409(a) refers to a classified annex that was prepared to accompany the conference report on this Act and states that the annex "shall have the force and effect of law as if enacted into law." The Congress has thus stated in the statute that the annex has not been enacted into law, but it nonetheless urges that the annex be treated as if it were law. I will certainly take into account the Congress' wishes in this regard, but will do so mindful of the fact that, according to the terms of the statute, the provisions of the annex are not law. [70]

Similarly, the President claimed in another signing statement that provisions in a bill that purported to give the force of law to language in a classified annex to the bill were legal nullities because the annex was not presented to the President along with the bill. [71]

[*45] This kind of hyperlegalistic interpretation was complemented by a grand attempt at comprehensive scrutiny. Each year, for example, the President issued a statement claiming that all legislative veto provisions would be treated as legal nullities. [72] Numerous signing statements challenged the legal validity of provisions that restricted the president's discretion, and the President sometimes seemed to threaten that he would act in defiance of the objectionable provisions. On at least four occasions, he went so far as to obtain a legal opinion from OLC concluding that it would be lawful for him to disregard a statutory provision, [73] and he apparently acted contrary to statutory direction in at least one case. [74] Although the President's constitutional objections to statutory provisions arose most often in the context of Bush's principal interest, foreign affairs, [75] many [*46] dealt with matters, such as the arcana of the Appointments and Recommendation Clauses, in which he could not possibly have taken a passionate interest. [76]

It is impossible to assess with certainty whether the Bush administration's veto and signing statement strategy will prove to have any lasting effects. The strategy was defensive, consisting almost entirely in resisting new congressional encroachments into areas that were thought to be reserved by the Constitution to the Executive's discretion. In order to measure the consequences of this resistance, one would need to determine what precedents would have been created but for the resistance, and to determine what significance those precedents would have had in the future. Once the Clinton administration begins to establish its own approach to veto messages (if there prove to be any) and signing statements, some useful comparisons may begin to emerge. On the evidence that now exists, however, it remains quite possible that the Bush administration's strategy amounted to little more than a kind of gesturing through which it sought to signal its intention--or reserve its rights--to seize ground from Congress if the opportunity to do so ever arose. Absent evidence that such opportunities arose and were taken, it is difficult to see how Bush's veto messages and signing statements could have any real or lasting importance.

B. Compromise of the Constitutional Vetoes

The four Bush vetoes that were apparently based solely on constitutional grounds reinforce this suspicion. They are therefore worth examining is some detail, for their contribution to legal and political developments can only be understood by examining the reasoning on which they were based and by observing how the President subsequently dealt with what proved to be ongoing disputes.

[*47] 1. The Appointments Clause

One minor piece of pork barrel legislation sponsored by a Democratic Senator was vetoed solely because of provisions that violated the Appointments Clause. [77] This bill, which was named in honor of former Congressman Morris Udall, would have assigned authority to make determinations about eligibility for Federal funds to a board dominated by members not appointed by the president. President Bush emphasized in his veto message that his refusal to approve the bill was based solely on constitutional grounds and that he had no substantive or policy objections to the legislation. But when the President was presented with a successor bill that he deemed constitutionally invalid because of a different type of Appointments Clause violation, he signed it anyway. [78] Fidelity to the constitutional analysis that provoked the first veto thus proved less than thoroughgoing. [79]

President Bush's concession in this case can usefully be contrasted with another incident in which he was more successful in getting what he wanted. When he approved the National and Community Service Act of 1990, [80] Bush issued a signing statement discussing what he regarded as constitutional defects in the provision establishing a commission created by the statute to administer the most important programs established in the act. Under the statute, various restrictions were placed on the president's freedom to choose nominees for this commission. The President regarded these restrictions as violations of the Appointments Clause, and said that they were "without legal force or effect." [81]

[*48] So long as the President refused to nominate candidates for the commission, the congressionally mandated programs could probably not have been administered. [82] In his signing statement, the President also indicated that while he was not particularly enthusiastic about the programs that this commission was to implement, he strongly favored a separate part of the act that authorized funding for one of his own favorite programs. [83] Congress therefore had reason to believe that the President might very well refuse to make the nominations required by the statute. In a burst of speed that would otherwise be mystifying, Congress passed remedial legislation bringing the statute into conformity with the President's view of the Appointments Clause early in the next legislative session. [84] What distinguishes this case from the one involving the Udall bill is that here the President's political and policy interests were firmly aligned with his interest in the Appointments Clause, whereas the objections to the Udall bill seem to have been rooted solely in constitutional principle.

REV_00265246

2. Presidential control over foreign policy

In late 1990, President Bush vetoed a bill dealing with export controls on certain goods with military applications because of provisions requiring that sanctions be imposed on countries that use or distribute chemical and biological weapons. The President did not object to such sanctions on policy grounds, and he made this clear by signing an executive order that directed the imposition of the same sanctions contained in the bill. [85] What he did object to was the "rigid" and "mandatory" imposition on him of a legal obligation to impose the sanctions, which interfered with what he called his "constitutional responsibilities" to conduct the nation's foreign policy. [86]

[*49] Although the President's objection to the export control bill was clearly rooted in his understanding of the constitutional separation of powers, he did not claim that such interference violated the Constitution. His constitutional objections were also not clearly distinguishable from his concerns about immediate practical consequences that the bill might have during what proved to be the prologue to the Gulf War: "The mandatory imposition of unilateral sanctions as provided in this bill would harm U.S. economic interests and provoke friendly countries who are essential to our efforts to resist Iraqi aggression." [87] The relative importance of these practical concerns was confirmed, after the Gulf War had been successfully prosecuted, when the President signed a bill with mandatory-sanctions provisions that differed little from those to which he had objected earlier. [88] This outcome, together with the attenuated nature of the President's original constitutional objections, makes it impossible to regard his veto of the original version of the mandatory sanctions as an important sign of commitment to constitutional principles.

3. Congressional responses to Iran-Contra

The two other vetoes that President Bush exercised on constitutional grounds were more significant, but they, too, were followed by compromises that substantially undercut their importance. The vetoed bills were part of a highly complex struggle between the Bush administration and the Congress over legislative efforts to prevent a repetition of certain activities that had occurred in connection with the Iran-Contra affair. In simplified form, many individuals on the Hill were determined 1) to require that Congress be kept fully and contemporaneously informed about covert actions (like the arms sales to Iran); and 2) to ensure that when Congress placed limits on the president's ability to take certain foreign policy actions directly (like the limits placed at times on assisting the Contras), the president would not be able to take those same [*50] actions indirectly by imposing on other nations to carry out activities prohibited by U.S. law.

In late 1989, President Bush was presented with a bill that made it a felony for anyone in the Executive to "assist" others (including foreign governments) in carrying out diplomatic initiatives that the Executive itself is prohibited by statute from pursuing directly. The bill also required the president to notify Congress whenever anyone in the Executive "advocates, promotes, or encourages" the provision of material assistance by others for activities that the Executive itself is forbidden by statute to assist with or undertake. [89] As President Bush noted when he vetoed this bill, its vague and sweeping provisions threatened to interfere with the conduct of foreign affairs by exposing diplomats and other officials to the threat of imprisonment for engaging in discussions that might later be found to constitute a prohibited form of "assistance." President Bush also observed that the threat to the president's constitutional role in conducting foreign relations was heightened by the fact that those who serve in Congress would remain free to engage in the very diplomatic activities forbidden to the Executive. [90] The resulting timidity and disarray in the conduct of foreign policy, said the President, would be "wholly contrary to the allocation of powers under the Constitution." [91]

REV_00265247

The following year, President Bush vetoed another bill that would have had similar effects. This second bill contained a complex set of provisions designed to force the president to notify Congress about covert actions more promptly than President Reagan had informed the legislature about the secret arms sales to Iran during the 1980's. [92] As part of this effort to ensure greater congressional involvement in the conduct of covert actions, the bill defined such covert actions to include any "request" by our government to a foreign government or private citizen to conduct a covert action on behalf of the [*51] United States. This definition was sufficient to provoke the President's veto (although the provisions dealing with notifications to Congress about covert actions were no less important). [93] In language reminiscent of that used the previous year, President Bush criticized the bill's vagueness about the meaning of reportable "requests," and complained that this vagueness "could have a chilling effect on the ability of our diplomats to conduct highly sensitive discussions concerning projects that are vital to our national security." [94] Because the contested provision of this bill did not forbid diplomatic discussions but only required that they be reported, and because it did not include provisions for criminal sanctions, it could not easily be characterized as unconstitutional (and the President's veto message did not use that term). President Bush's decision to veto the bill therefore seemed to reflect a serious determination to resist congressional meddling in the prerogatives of his office and to preserve the traditional separation of powers even beyond what he saw as the strict requirements of the Constitution.

It should come as no surprise that President Bush was most aggressive in his defense of the authority of his office in the field of foreign relations, where his expertise and interest were greatest. The veto messages dealing with prohibited forms of "assistance" and with reportable "requests" reflect this emphasis, and they are also typical of the highly nuanced and sophisticated constitutional analysis that runs consistently [*52] through almost all of the Bush veto messages and signing statements. Viewed in isolation, however, these two veto messages could be quite misleading. First, it should not be overlooked that the group of officials most directly threatened by these two bills was composed of career foreign service officers, a potent interest group within the government and one that counted among its own the man then serving as Deputy Secretary of State (and later as Secretary). More important, the Bush administration proved willing to compromise, and in a very serious way, exactly the principles that seemed to be at the center of the President's decisions to veto these two bills.

To see how this happened, one has to begin by examining yet another bill that was vetoed in 1989. Two days before he vetoed the bill that would have prohibited American officials from "assisting" others in certain foreign policy activities, President Bush had vetoed an appropriations bill that contained two provisions that he said were unacceptable. One of those provisions had to do with funding for abortions in countries receiving U.S. foreign aid. The other provision, which was sponsored by Representative David Obey and which closely resembled the vetoed ban on "assistance," would have prohibited the use of certain appropriated funds either "for the purpose of furthering any military or foreign policy activity which is contrary to [express prohibitions in] United States law" or "to solicit the provision of funds by any foreign government (including any instrumentality or agency thereof), foreign person, or United States person, for the purpose of furthering any military or foreign policy objective which is contrary to [express prohibitions in] United States law." [95] The Obey Amendment also contained provisos that purported to leave U.S. officials free to express their own views or those of the president. When he vetoed the bill, President Bush acknowledged that these provisos might allow the Obey Amendment to be construed in a way that he would consider constitutionally acceptable. He nevertheless complained that "the section as a whole remains sufficiently ambiguous to present an unacceptable risk that it will chill the conduct of our Nation's foreign affairs." [96]

[*53] The President's decision to veto this bill because of ambiguities in the Obey Amendment that created an "unacceptable risk" of chilling the conduct of our foreign relations, however, did not turn out to be the end of the story. Because this amendment was a rider to an appropriations bill sent to the President near the end of a congressional session, the legislature had to respond to the President's veto by passing a new bill. Two days later, the President signed a new version of the bill, from which the controversial abortion-funding provisions had been removed. The Obey Amendment, however, remained in the bill in a slightly modified form. Under the new version, American officials were barred from providing appropriated funds to any foreign government or other person "in exchange for" that government or person undertaking an action that U.S. law expressly prohibited the American officials themselves from engaging in.

REV_00265248

President Bush's signing statement recognized that the new version of the Obey Amendment, though less sweeping than the first, had the same kind of potential to chill the conduct of foreign affairs: "Many routine and unobjectionable diplomatic activities could be misconstrued as somehow involving a forbidden 'exchange.'" [97] Why then did the President sign the bill? Following a pattern characteristic of many Bush signing statements, in which he interpreted objectionable provisions so as to render them consistent with his view of the Constitution (though often completely inconsistent with the statutory language), [98] the President contended that the Obey Amendment [*54] covered only transactions "in which U.S. funds are provided to a foreign nation on the express condition that the foreign nation provide specific assistance to a third country." [99] The signing statement also maintained that because the Obey Amendment applied only where U.S. law "expressly prohibits" American officials from taking an action, it would not apply where U.S. statutes "merely limit funding to undertake such an action." [100]

The President's interpretation was in some respects simply irreconcilable with the statutory language. The Obey Amendment, for example, unambiguously referred to exchanges with any "foreign person or United States person," not just to exchanges with "foreign nations." [101] Similarly, the Obey Amendment prohibited U.S. officials from inducing others to undertake "any action" that the American government is forbidden from taking, not just actions in which a foreign nation "provide[s] specific assistance to a third country." Where the President's interpretation of the Obey Amendment's text was not preposterous, it was far-fetched. The natural and obvious meaning of the phrase "in exchange for" clearly covers implicit agreements as well as transactions based on an express condition, especially in a statutory provision that carefully distinguishes implicit from express prohibitions. And there is precious little room in the statute's language for the President's claim that laws which limit funding for certain activities do not expressly prohibit U.S. officials from providing funding in excess of those limits; on the contrary, it has for a very long time been a felony, pursuant to an express and general statutory prohibition, for government officials to make expenditures beyond the limits set in appropriations legislation. [102]

In a desperate attempt to shore up his utterly implausible interpretation of the Obey Amendment's language, President Bush sought to rely on the amendment's legislative history to [*55] show that his interpretation reflected congressional intent. But he had little to rely on. Flouting standard canons of statutory construction, the Bush signing statement ignored those portions of the legislative history that courts consider the most reliable indicia of legislative intent, such as statements by the sponsor of the provision in question (which in this case was Representative Obey, who chaired the appropriations subcommittee with jurisdiction over the bill). Instead, President Bush referred vaguely to statements by Representative Mickey Edwards (the ranking Republican on the subcommittee), and to a colloquy between two Republican Senators (Kasten and Rudman). [103]

When one examines the legislative history of the Obey Amendment, the flimsiness of the administration's legal argument becomes even more apparent. Representative Obey made it clear that the intent of his amendment was to prohibit appropriated funds from being "expended in any way to promote or entice other governments to support policies which would be illegal if followed by the United States." [104] Representative Edwards, moreover, who helped negotiate the final version of the Obey Amendment and on whom the Bush signing statement purports to rely, never said that the Amendment requires an express agreement. Edwards said that a violation of the provision would have to be based on a "quid pro quo," which is just another way of describing the provision of funds "in exchange for" some action. [105] The term "quid pro quo" no more [*56] excludes implicit agreements than the statutory "in exchange for" language does. [106]

REV_00265249

The President's invocation of Representative Edwards' statements to support his narrow construction of the Obey Amendment was baseless, and his reliance on a colloquy between Senators Kasten and Rudman was not much better. Immediately after the House passed the bill containing the Obey Amendment, the Senate debate began. At the end of that debate, Senator Kasten offered a substitute amendment that would have replaced the Obey provision with language forbidding U.S. officials from providing appropriated funds pursuant to agreements under which, "as an express condition for receipt of such assistance," the recipients would undertake military or foreign policy activities that are illegal under American law. [107] Kasten, who was openly serving as the Bush administration's agent on this issue, withdrew this amendment after engaging Senator Rudman (who had generally opposed the administration's position on related issues) in a planned colloquy. According to the transcript of the colloquy in the Congressional Record, Rudman asserted that violations of the Obey Amendment should not give rise to criminal penalties, and that the words "in exchange for" should be understood to refer to agreements under which U.S. aid is provided on the "express condition" that the recipient undertake an action that U.S. officials are legally forbidden to carry out. [108]

Because no objections were raised to Senator Rudman's interpretation, which the record indicates was offered on the floor immediately before the bill containing the Obey Amendment was passed by the Senate, the Kasten-Rudman colloquy [*57] may not be completely worthless as an indicator of the Senate's intent. [109] Even if one assumes that the colloquy firmly establishes that the Senate's interpretation of the Obey Amendment was the same as the President's, however, the record in the House does not support that interpretation, at least with respect to whether a violation must be based on an express agreement. And since the meaning suggested by the debates in the originating chamber is more consistent with the language of the provision, a disinterested interpreter such as a court would almost certainly reject the construction put on the statute in the Bush signing statement.

It is true that the second version of the Obey Amendment was less threatening to the president's conduct of foreign affairs than either of the predecessor versions that President Bush used his veto to stop. The President's signing statement, moreover, may have helped prevent the new law from being used as a tool of partisan or ideological combat. But President Bush gave up a great deal when he signed the bill containing the second version of the Obey Amendment. To see how much he surrendered, one need only look at his signing statement's claim that the Senate record made it clear that "neither the criminal conspiracy statute, nor any other criminal penalty" would apply to violations of the Obey Amendment. [110] Even if one assumes, perhaps somewhat heroically, that the courts would apply the rule of lenity (which counsels that ambiguous statutes should be construed in favor of criminal defendants), such legislative history could not prevent an Independent Counsel from procuring indictments based on the general conspiracy [*58] statute. [111] Lawrence Walsh had done this and more when he prosecuted Oliver North and others for conspiring to obstruct government functions by evading two of the so-called Boland Amendments (which put restrictions on aid to the Nicaraguan Contras). [112] Everyone concerned clearly understood that the Obey Amendment was an effort to make it easier (not more difficult) to discourage government officials from engaging in activities like those engaged in by the targets of Walsh's investigations. Nor could anyone who was involved in the conduct of foreign policy during this period have had less than an acute awareness of the costs that an Independent Counsel can impose on his targets even when he fails to make his criminal charges stick. Neither the president nor anyone else could assure American diplomats either that similar indictments for violating the Obey Amendment would not be brought or that the courts would rule against the validity of such prosecutions. [113] To the extent that American diplomats chose to take their legal advice from the President's signing statement, or from the more elaborate but equally dubious legal opinion subsequently issued by OLC, [114] the Obey Amendment could have had little chilling effect. But when one considers how reckless or self-sacrificing it would have been to take the President's statement as legal advice, any notion that the President's concession in signing the Obey Amendment into law was an unimportant surrender dissipates like the insubstantial haze of the legal analysis in the signing statement itself. [115]

REV_00265250

[*59] C. The War Powers Resolution

President Bush's use of veto messages and signing statements--which articulated, without insisting on, an aggressive view of his constitutional prerogatives--resembles his approach to the War Powers Resolution. [116] Section 4(a)(1) of this statute, which was enacted over President Nixon's veto in 1973, requires that the President file a report with Congress within forty-eight hours after U.S. forces are introduced "into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances." [117] A report under this section of the statute triggers a sixty-day deadline within which the president is required to terminate the use of military forces unless Congress authorizes their continued deployment. [118] The president is also required to report certain other kinds of military deployments in foreign nations, but these do not trigger a deadline that would force him to seek congressional authorization.

Like other presidents beginning with Nixon, President Bush regarded the sixty-day limit as unconstitutional. Except for one ambiguous reference to section 4(a)(1) by President Ford after the Mayaguez incident, no president has ever submitted a report acknowledging that the sixty-day clock had been triggered. [119] While technically complying with a narrow construction of the reporting requirements of the War Powers Resolution, President Bush was relatively aggressive in asserting the statute's irrelevance to his conduct. After using American air power to help suppress a coup in the Philippines, for example, Bush notified Congress of the actions he had taken, but sought to avoid conceding that his military decisions could be constrained by that statute:

> This measured action by U.S. Forces was taken at my direction in accordance with recognized principles of international [*60] law and pursuant to my constitutional authority with respect to the conduct of foreign relations and as Commander in Chief. I am mindful of the historical differences between the Executive and Legislative branches and the positions taken by me and all my predecessors in office with respect to the constitutionality of certain provisions of the War Powers Resolution. I am sharing this information with you consistent with that Resolution. [120]

A few weeks later, the President ordered the invasion of Panama. Once again noting that his report was "consistent with" (not "pursuant to") the War Powers Resolution, the President said the invasion:

> was necessary to protect American lives in imminent danger and to fulfill our responsibilities under the Panama Canal Treaties. . . . The military operations were ordered pursuant to my constitutional authority with respect to the conduct of foreign relations and as Commander in Chief. [121]

REV_00265251

The following year, after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, the President grew bolder still. In his letter notifying Congress of substantial troop deployments to the Gulf, he said that Iraq's military was "capable of initiating further hostilities with little or no additional preparation," and that "Iraq's actions pose a direct threat to neighboring countries and to vital U.S. interests in the Persian Gulf region." [122] Despite this reference to further hostilities, however, the President implied that the sixty-day clock in the War Powers Resolution had not been triggered, and that in any event the statute would not affect the President's military decisions:

> I do not believe involvement in hostilities is imminent; to the contrary, it is my belief that this deployment will facilitate a peaceful resolution of the crisis. If necessary, however, the Forces are fully prepared to defend themselves. Although it is not possible to predict the precise scope and duration of [*61] this deployment, our Armed Forces will remain so long as their presence is required to contribute to the security of the region and desired by the Saudi government to enhance the capability of Saudi armed forces to defend the Kingdom.
>
> I have taken these actions pursuant to my constitutional authority to conduct our foreign relations and as Commander in Chief. [123]

Despite frequent claims that Bush and other presidents have evaded the War Powers Resolution, or deliberately avoided compliance with it, [124] the statute's language has made it fairly easy for presidents to engage in what they saw as appropriate military actions without having to flout its terms or even to acknowledge that the constitutionally questionable sixty-day clock had begun to run. [125] As the examples above illustrate, President Bush took full advantage of the statute's wording to avoid the risk of acting in clear contravention of its terms. Events in the Gulf, however, finally closed off this path.

As it became clear that Iraq was unlikely to surrender its ambitions in the face of threats and economic sanctions alone, the President was apparently undecided about the advisability [*62] of seeking congressional authorization for a military offensive. Administration officials had consistently maintained that such authorization was not legally required, [126] and the Secretary of Defense is said to have worried that prosecution of the war would become impossible if Congress voted against authorizing the use of force. [127] The President, however, decided to seek congressional authorization before attacking Iraq, and he succeeded in obtaining it.

The President's decision may have been politically prudent, and it may even have reflected a consensus among his legal advisors. [128] Subsequent events, however, by no means disproved the argument attributed to Secretary Cheney: that if the use of force turned out to be successful and the costs were reasonably low, it would not matter what kind of debate or vote there had been in Congress, whereas if the military operation failed or the costs of victory were very high, prior congressional authorization would not save the President from taking the blame. [129]

President Bush, moreover, clearly passed up an obvious opportunity to frustrate congressional efforts to establish a precedent adverse to his claims about the unconstitutionality of the War Powers Resolution. When he asked Congress for legislation, the President was careful not to ask for statutory "authorization," but only for a bill stating that Congress "supports the use of all necessary means to [liberate Kuwait]." [130] And [*63] when he was presented instead with legislation expressly providing the legal authorization required by the War Powers Resolution, [131] the President's signing statement emphasized

TEXT:
[*17] I. INTRODUCTION

President Clinton's first White House Counsel, [2] Bernard Nussbaum, was pressured into resigning his post after a special prosecutor began looking into meetings he had held with officials of an independent regulatory agency. These meetings, which dealt with the agency's investigations of financial dealings in which the President and his wife had been involved before they came to Washington, were immediately and almost universally denounced. Clearly bitter at having lost his job because of a standard of conduct having more to do with appearances of impropriety than with legal rules, Nussbaum claimed that he was the victim of people "who do not [*18] understand, nor wish to understand the role and obligations of a lawyer, even one acting as White House Counsel." [3]

Nussbaum seems to have believed that the job of a lawyer--any lawyer--is to act as aggressively as possible to protect the interests of the individual who retains him, so long as his actions are "consistent with the rules of law, standards of ethics, and the highest traditions of the Bar." [4] Nussbaum's view was soon attacked by his predecessor from the Bush administration, C. Boyden Gray, who said: "He confused his fiduciary role as a temporary occupant of that office with the no-holds-barred role a private litigant would have. He is not [the Clintons'] private lawyer. He is the lawyer for the Oval Office." [5] Nussbaum's successor, Lloyd Cutler, also rejected the applicability of the private-lawyer model. When the President announced his appointment, Cutler said:

> The Counsel is supposed to be counsel for the President in office and for the Office of the Presidency, as many people have said. Most of the time, those two standards coincide. Almost always the advice you would give the President is advice that is in the interest of the Office of the Presidency . . . . When it comes to a President's private affairs, particularly private affairs that occurred before he took office, those should be handled by his own personal private counsel and, in my view, not by the White House Counsel. [6]

As this is written, [7] the Clintons and Nussbaum have steadily maintained that they committed no illegal or unethical acts. Although this article is not concerned with the events surrounding Nussbaum's resignation, those events provide a striking illustration of the somewhat uneasy professional and institutional relationships between presidents and their closest legal advisors. Whatever may come to light in the continuing investigations of the Clinton administration, we can be sure that this will not be the last eruption of controversy about the proper relationship between presidents and their legal advisors [*19] in the government. Ever since Watergate made the distinctions among the president's various personal and official interests in his office a subject of close public scrutiny, the history of that office has looked as much like a battle among lawyers as it has a contest between presidents and their political opponents.

One legacy of Watergate has been an intense interest, often politically motivated, in the ethics of those who serve in the upper reaches of government, along with a proliferation of new laws ostensibly aimed at curbing unethical conduct by government officials. [8] And one consequence of that legacy has been a growth in the size of the office of the White House Counsel, which plays a preeminent role in seeking to prevent ethical embarrassments from impeding the president's substantive agenda. [9] Mr. Nussbaum's government career foundered on the treacherous ethical rocks that have been thrown around the shores of the presidency, a fate that has become almost commonplace among senior officials during the last two decades. [10]

REV_00265235

that > my request for congressional support did not, and my signing this resolution does not, constitute any change in the long-standing positions of the executive branch on either the President's constitutional authority to use the Armed Forces to defend vital U.S. interests or the constitutionality of the War Powers Resolution. [132]

The President may not have conceded that he needed this resolution as a legal matter, but after he requested a mere resolution of support and then signed this one instead, his claims about the legal irrelevance of the War Powers Resolution could themselves only look quite irrelevant.

D. Summary

President Bush's signing statements and veto messages, like his statements about the War Powers Resolution, displayed a consistent and relatively aggressive approach to the separation of powers issues that arose from congressional efforts to subject the administration to a variety of statutory restrictions. In this sense, the Bush record represents a kind of triumph for the academically oriented lawyers responsible for crafting the President's statements. [133] Upon closer examination, however, this victory appears to have been one more of form than substance. The aggressive signing statements do not appear to have reflected much actual resistance to congressional control, and each of the vetoes based on constitutional objections was followed by substantial compromise of the principles on which those vetoes were based. With respect to the War Powers Resolution, President Bush simply (though perhaps [*64] sensibly) flinched when presented with circumstances in which he could have put his bold words to a test.

IV. THREE RETREATS FROM THE ADMINISTRATION'S CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES

If the lawyers' "successes" do not seem to suggest that their role in the development of separation of powers law was particularly important, the lawyers' "failures" provide even stronger evidence that their influence did not amount to much. The Bush record shows that his administration was simply unwilling to defend its theories of the Constitution on several important occasions. A brief look at some of these departures from the principled jurisprudence articulated in the Bush signing statements and veto messages will help to illuminate the forces that discourage a thoroughgoing implementation of a principled jurisprudence of the separation of powers.

A. Legislative Vetoes

Early in its tenure, the Bush administration sought to be done with the contentious matter of the Nicaraguan Contras, which had been inherited from President Reagan. After investing a significant amount of his own time in negotiations, the Secretary of State reached an agreement with congressional leaders that provided temporary funding to support the Contras. Part of these so-called "Central American Accords" required the administration to promise in writing that no money would be used to support the Contras after a date certain unless the chairmen of four congressional committees approved the continued funding in writing. [134] Neither OLC nor the Counsel to the President (nor for that matter the State Department's own Legal Adviser) was consulted about this arrangement, [135] which incorporated a formal legislative-veto device that would clearly have been unconstitutional under the Chadha decision had it been adopted in legislation. [136] There was speculation in the press that personal factors may have [*65] contributed to the absence of advance consultations, and it can hardly be doubted that the Secretary of State and the Counsel to the President had an uneasy relationship. [137] But there was no suggestion that the agreement's impact on the president's ability to protect the authority of his office was overlooked. On the contrary, one State Department official who took part in the negotiations was quoted as saying that "the precedential aspects of this agreement were well and truly understood" by Secretary of State Baker and other negotiators. [138] Instead, it appears that the President decided that resolving the very contentious issue of aid to the Contras was simply more important than maintaining a principled opposition to the use of legislative vetoes. The fact that the newly inaugurated President felt quite free to make this decision without consulting OLC, the Counsel to the President, or any other legal officer in the government, is a striking illustration of how unlikely it is that a president would ever allow the concerns that lawyers have with the interests of his office to determine his conduct in that office.

REV_00265253

The flap over the agreement to comply with a non-statutory legislative veto attracted considerable attention because the Counsel to the President made the mistake of voicing his objections in the press. [139] During the ensuing years, however, no attention at all was paid the fact that President Bush routinely signed bills containing real legislative vetoes that clearly violated the Chadha rule, unlike the Contra funding agreement (which was not technically unconstitutional). Although the President also routinely issued statements denouncing the congressional practice of including such "legal nullities" in bills that were presented to him, [140] I have found no recorded example of the Bush administration's refusing to comply with any of the innumerable legislative vetoes to which it was subjected. Nor does the Bush administration seem to have taken any [*66] other action that might have discouraged the Congress from flouting one of the few apparently significant post-Watergate Supreme Court victories for the office of the president. [141]

B. The Appointments Clause

It is easy to imagine why President Bush might make the trade-off between politics and principle that he accepted in the Central American Accords, especially when one considers that the arrangement did not involve an actual violation of the Constitution. The same cannot be said, however, of another departure from well-settled principles of the separation of powers. On August 9, 1989, President Bush signed into law the Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery, and Enforcement Act of 1989 ("FIRREA"), which effected a massive restructuring of the regulatory regime governing the savings-and-loan industry. As part of that restructuring, an independent agency known as the Federal Home Loan Bank Board ("FHLBB") had most of its functions transferred to a new entity, called the Office of Thrift Supervision ("OTS"), which was located within the Department of the Treasury. When he signed the bill, President Bush did not mention that the new statute contained a provision that purported to appoint as the first Director of OTS the individual who had been Chairman of the FHLBB. [142]

Such a provision, under which an officer of the United States is appointed by statute, is about as clear a violation of the Appointments Clause of the Constitution as one could hope to find. If one were familiar only with the fastidious attention to Appointments Clause issues that pervades the Bush [*67] administration's signing statements and with the President's decision to veto one bill solely because of a less clear-cut violation of the Appointments Clause, [143] acquiescence in the statutory appointment of a federal officer might be surprising, or even shocking. The President's failure to object to this element of the bill when he signed it, however, becomes easier to understand when one recognizes the still more extraordinary fact that the Bush administration had itself proposed the same kind of illegal statutory appointment in a savings-and-loan bill it had transmitted to the Congress a few months earlier. [144]

This blunder led directly to litigation brought by a thrift whose assets OTS was threatening to seize. [145] In the course of the law suit, which challenged the authority of OTS to act on the ground that its director had been unconstitutionally appointed, [146] the Director resigned and was eventually replaced by an official appointed in the constitutionally prescribed manner. Before that happened, however, the Bush administration put forward the desperate argument that the statutory appointment was valid because the chairmanship of the FHLBB and the directorship of OTS were the same office, a position emphatically rejected by the district court. [147] This litigation, which threatened serious disruption of OTS' regulatory work, [*68] became moot when a new Director was confirmed by the Senate and appointed by the President. [148]

REV_00265254

Given the Bush administration's scrupulous attention to the Appointments Clause in other contexts, including one veto that was based solely on an Appointments Clause objection, [149] its flagrant disregard of constitutional forms in this case is quite striking. William P. Barr, who served at the head of OLC when the President signed the bill enacting the violation into law, has publicly stated that OLC "recognized an Appointments Clause problem" in the bill. [150] He also reports that many people in the Treasury Department and Congress thought it was "absurd" to worry about such an issue, so that "the views of the Department of Justice were overridden. Political deals were made, and the bill passed." [151] Read carefully, Barr's account is highly revealing. First, it refers only to a bill in which OLC "recognized" a constitutional "problem." No mention is made of the fact that the Bush administration itself had formally proposed adopting the blatantly unconstitutional statutory appointment mechanism. Second, there is no suggestion that OLC's constitutional objections were communicated to the President or to the White House Counsel. Nor is there any suggestion that the Department of Justice recommended that the President veto the bill, despite Barr's statement in the very same paragraph that "when a provision raises constitutional difficulties, in most cases the Attorney General should recommend veto." [152] It is hard to resist the inference that the Department [*69] of Justice was cutting its own "political deals" with those at Treasury and on the Hill who thought OLC's concerns were "absurd."

What might the "political deals" involving the unconstitutional appointment provision have involved? Press speculation centered on the theory that the Bush administration--as the price for bringing the functions performed by the FHLBB under the control of the Treasury Department--acquiesced in a scheme to install the Chairman of the FHLBB, who had close personal ties to a powerful Republican Senator, as Director of OTS. Under this theory, the unconstitutional appointment (which was strongly opposed in the House of Representatives) was necessary to avoid confirmation hearings involving someone who had been intimately involved in the operation of the FHLBB. The reason for this, in turn, was that such hearings had the potential to embarrass other Senators who were suspected of having improperly interfered with regulatory decisions of the FHLBB. [153] None of this suggests what interests the Justice Department (in contradistinction to the Treasury Department) might have had in participating in any political deals, though one could easily come up with plenty of hypotheses. The most important conclusion for present purposes, however, does not require a choice among such hypotheses. What the FIRREA episode suggests is that circumstances can arise in which the president's constitutional lawyers themselves bargain away the interests of his office for purposes of their own even in an administration in which the president himself has made the defense of that office an important goal. That this may have happened during the Bush administration is a reminder that the president's lawyers have interests other than serving their client--even (or especially) if their client is assumed to be the presidency itself. The Justice Department's acquiescence in the unconstitutional statutory appointment may therefore be usefully compared with the phenomenon illustrated by the Contra funding incident. Just as the president [*70] has interests that he must weigh against those of the office he holds, so his lawyers may be tempted to forego the interests of his office to pursue an agenda of their own.

C. The Mask of "Complicated and Indirect Measures"

The Contra-funding and FIRREA examples expose some important forces that necessarily limit any single-minded pursuit of the institutional interests of the presidency. Whatever intrinsic importance one may attach to the principles at stake in these incidents, however, neither departure from principle was likely to produce a truly large or enduring effect on the structure of government or on the law of the separation of powers. For an illustration of the Bush administration's abandonment of constitutional principles when something very significant was actually at stake, it is useful to examine the history of the Supreme Court's decision in Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, Inc. ("Airports Case"). [154] This case proved to be an important victory for the interests of the president's office--in fact, it was probably the most important case involving those interests decided during the Bush administration. But the outcome was one that the President's lawyers actually opposed in the courts.

The Airports Case arose from a congressional effort to create an ingenious substitute for the legislative veto device that the Supreme Court had declared unconstitutional in Chadha. To the extent relevant here, the story begins in 1984, when a consensus developed that capital improvements at Washington National and Dulles Airports could best be carried out if operating control and financial responsibility for the airports were transferred from the federal Department of Transportation to some sort of newly created state, local, or interstate entity. [155] In 1986, after consultations among executive agencies and interested congressional staffers over the best means of effecting such a transfer, OLC reviewed three different proposals that would have given Congress substantial powers [*71] to supervise the new entity. [156] These powers were in the nature of legislative vetoes, and were manifestly intended to substitute for the informal oversight powers that Congress and certain of its officers and committees had been exercising in the normal course of administration while control of the airports was vested in the Department of Transportation.

Under one proposal, state authorities would have been authorized to operate the airports, but Congress would have created a board of review comprising several members and officers of Congress; this board would have been empowered to veto the most important decisions of the new operating authority. OLC emphatically rejected this proposal because it would constitute a legislative veto in violation of Chadha. Under a second proposal, Congress would have required Virginia and the District of Columbia to establish the same kind of review board under state law, as a condition of their being allowed to gain control of the airports. Characterizing this proposal as one that presented "complex and novel questions involving the relationship between federal and state grants of authority," OLC gave an elaborate legal analysis and concluded, despite its "grave reservations" about the proposal's constitutionality, that "a colorable argument" could be made in its defense. [157]

The third proposal was similar to the second proposal except that a) the members of the review board would serve in their "personal capacities" as users of the airport and not as representatives of Congress, and b) the members of the review board would be members of Congress appointed by the new state operating authority from a list of names submitted by the congressional leadership. OLC declared that this proposal would probably withstand constitutional scrutiny, and declined to object to it on legal grounds.

[*72] The provision finally enacted in 1986 closely resembled the third proposal, which had been cleared by OLC earlier that year. After Virginia and the District of Columbia enacted the required enabling legislation, and the Secretary of Transportation entered into long-term leases with the new operating authority, the board of review was appointed from lists provided by the congressional leadership. In 1988, a citizens' suit was brought, challenging the new arrangement on the ground that the veto power granted to the board of review was unconstitutional. [158]

In 1989, after George Bush became president, the District Court ruled that the legislative veto device created through the statute was constitutional. Appeal was taken, and the Department of Justice intervened in the Court of Appeals to defend the constitutionality of the statute. [159] The Court of Appeals, however, reversed the district court, holding that the device violated the separation of powers because the members of the board of review were in reality agents of the Congress. [160]

REV_00265256

At this point, the Justice Department began behaving in an equivocal manner. Although it had intervened in the Court of Appeals to defend the constitutionality of the statute, it declined to join the airport authority's petition for certiorari. [161] When the Supreme Court granted the petition, the United States automatically became a respondent, [162] and it filed a brief on the merits that offered the Court little more than an expression of the government's ambivalence.

This ambivalence might more accurately be described as incoherence. On the one hand, the Justice Department [163] argued that the mere fact that the board of review was created pursuant to state law did not preclude its being characterized as an agent of Congress, and therefore invalid under Chadha (which forbids legislative vetoes) or under Bowsher (which forbids agents of Congress from exercising executive authority). [164] [*73] The Justice Department's brief correctly observed that treating the board of review as a mere creature of state law would open "a massive loophole in the separation of powers." To permit such influence laundering would allow Congress to require the states, as a condition of receiving federal financial assistance, to appoint members of Congress to state offices controlling the administration of virtually all roads, schools, housing, and health care, thereby completely supplanting the federal agencies through which the president performs his central function of executing the federal laws. In a stunning effort to evade the compelling logic of this argument, however, the Justice Department then claimed that the statute at issue in the Airports Case was constitutionally valid. Noting that members of Congress on the board of review were supposed to serve in their "personal capacities," the Justice Department contended that such individuals were especially well suited to represent the interests of all other users of the airports because members of Congress must make frequent trips between Washington and their home districts. The Court was invited to imagine that members of Congress would somehow be appropriate representatives of airport users because they use the airports heavily, while they would not be appropriate representatives of those who use roads, schools, and hospitals because they merely partake in those programs to the same extent as other citizens.

The Supreme Court understandably dismissed this argument by observing that the facts of the case "belie the ipse dixit that the Board members will act 'in their individual capacities.'" [165] Rather than accept this "individual capacity" fiction, the Court affirmed the Court of Appeals, holding that the board-of-review device, although difficult to characterize, logically must be either an effort to exercise legislative power in violation of Chadha or an attempt to exercise executive power in violation of Bowsher. [166] Repudiating the Justice Department's unprincipled suggestion that the Court uphold the statute while essentially confining the case to its facts, Justice Stevens forcefully explained why such ad hoc constitutional decision-making should be avoided:

> [*74] One might argue that the provision for a Board of Review is the kind of practical accommodation between the Legislature and the Executive that should be permitted in a "workable government." Admittedly, Congress imposed its will on the regional authority created by the District of Columbia and the Commonwealth of Virginia by means that are unique and that might prove to be innocuous. However, the statutory scheme challenged today provides a blueprint for extensive expansion of the legislative power beyond its constitutionally-confined role. Given the scope of the federal power to dispense benefits to the States in a variety of forms and subject to a host of statutory conditions, Congress could, if this Board of Review were valid, use similar expedients to > enable its Members or its agents to retain control, outside the ordinary legislative process, of the activities of state grant recipients charged with executing virtually every aspect of national policy. As James Madison presciently observed, the legislature "can with greater facility, mask under complicated and indirect measures, the encroachments which it makes on the co-ordinate departments." Heeding his warning that legislative "power is of an encroaching nature," we conclude that the Board of Review is an impermissible encroachment. [167]

Perhaps the best that can be said about the Justice Department's brief is that it supplied the Supreme Court with the key argument needed for understanding the threat that the board-of-review device posed to the separation of powers. By contending that the argument did not apply in this case, however, the Government's brief created a risk that the Court would misapprehend how serious that threat was. The significance of that risk is suggested by the fact that three dissenting Justices emphasized how odd it was that the Court was reaching out to protect the president's authority from a threat that the President's own lawyers denied was real: "Should Congress ever undertake such improbable projects as transferring national parklands to the States on the condition that its agents control their oversight, there is little doubt that the President would be equal to the task of safeguarding his or her interests." [168]

[*75] How can the strange behavior of the Justice Department be explained? The first crucial step obviously came in 1986, when OLC approved the scheme that was eventually invalidated by the Supreme Court. This approval seems manifestly inconsistent with OLC's institutional propensity to resist congressional efforts to undermine the principles articulated in Chadha and Bowsher, and it is easy to imagine that OLC's 1986 decision reflected policy pressures from the Department of Transportation and the Office of Management and Budget. These agencies would undoubtedly have been more concerned with paying the price demanded by Congress for relieving the government of financial commitments and onerous operating responsibilities than with the niceties of constitutional law. Once OLC's clearance was obtained, and the statute was enacted, it is not the least bit surprising that the Justice Department's litigating divisions defended the scheme when it was challenged in court. The Department's litigation bureaucracies are strongly predisposed to defend the constitutionality of federal statutes, and they would have had little or no incentive to second-guess OLC's earlier approval of this one.

Surprisingly, the Justice Department continued to take this approach even after President Bush came into office and gave the defense of the presidency the kind of apparently serious backing that it had lacked during the Reagan administration. The Bush administration was notorious for its efforts to avoid being perceived as "Reagan's third term," [169] and it would have been easy to abandon the Reagan-era OLC position when the Justice Department first entered the case in 1989. Even if one assumes that the case did not at that time receive the kind of serious attention within the Department that this [*76] would have required, it would have been perfectly possible for the Department to change its position after the Court of Appeals bestowed upon the President a significant and unaskedfor victory. Such confessions of error by the government are not common, but they are a traditional and well-accepted element of the Justice Department's practice. [170] So long as they do not become so frequent as to undermine the Government's credibility in the courts, their only negative effect is the embarrassment they cause to whichever individuals approved the position later abandoned by the Government. [171] Thus, the fear of such embarrassment is the likeliest cause of the Justice Department's failure to change its position in the Airports Case. [172]

[*77] If inertia was propelling the Justice Department to defend this statute in the courts, the Court of Appeals' decision does seem to have introduced a bit of wobble into the trajectory, for the Justice Department declined to seek certiorari after that decision. But the Department was never actually deflected from its course, even though its own brief in the Supreme Court clearly showed why a decision upholding the statute would pose a serious threat to the interests of the presidency. The fact that the Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court were both far more willing than President Bush's own Justice Department to defend the institutional interests of the presidency in this case is highly suggestive, especially when this incident is considered together with the FIRREA case. Judicial precedents are by nature more powerful than the kinds of precedents about which the administration was so scrupulous in its signing statements and veto messages. Despite the Bush administration's rhetorical commitment to the legal defense of the presidential office, the most enduring victory for that office was imposed by the courts in the face of outright resistance by President Bush's lawyers. Thus, when the outcome mattered most, the Bush administration was at its weakest in defending the president's constitutional interests.

REV_00265258

Lest one think that bureaucratic glitches or other special circumstances within the Justice Department are sufficient to explain the way the Airports Case was handled, the administration [*78] later confirmed that deeper forces were at work. A few months after the Supreme Court refused the invitation to create what the President's own lawyers called "a massive loophole in the separation of powers," Congress passed a bill amending the airport statute in response to the Court's decision. This bill included yet another desperate effort by Congress to retain its control over Dulles and Washington National by creating a new board of review that differed only superficially from the one that had been invalidated. Although membership on the new board was not in terms restricted to members of Congress, the board's members had to meet certain qualifications that few people outside Congress would possess, and the congressional leadership was given complete control over choosing candidates for the board. The new board also lacked an absolute veto over the operating authority's decisions, but it was given the power to delay (for up to six months) important actions with which it disagreed.

This congressional persistence in the pursuit of an unconstitutional goal can probably be explained by a strong and bipartisan fear that a state-controlled airports authority might inconvenience members of Congress by shifting some flights from the overburdened facilities at Washington National to Dulles Airport (which is several miles farther from the Capitol). Members may also have been concerned that they might lose the reserved, free parking places that they now enjoy at both airports. [173] Although the President said that he considered this new device unconstitutional, he signed the bill into law anyway, blandly commenting that the courts would have to deal with the constitutional problem. [174] This latest congressional [*79] gambit was eventually invalidated by the courts, which concluded that it violated the separation of powers under the analysis set forth in the Airports Case. [175] Although the courts did curb this congressional overreaching again--an overreaching apparently motivated by the pettiest kind of self-interest--it will never be possible to accuse the Bush administration of having been a significant contributor to that outcome.

D. Summary

The three examples discussed in this section show that the Bush administration was willing to tolerate and even advocate substantial losses of presidential legal authority in response to perfectly ordinary--and in some cases remarkably trivial--political pressures. As the examples suggest, such pressures sometimes operated directly on the president and sometimes they seem to have had their effect at lower levels of the government. When one looks at these incidents--together with the results of the administration's strategy of using signing statements, veto messages, and presidential addresses to articulate an ambitious agenda for defending the presidency--there appears to be no evidence that the President's agenda was significantly furthered or even seriously pursued. Not only did the Bush administration fail to carry out a "precommitment strategy" of the kind described by Professor McGinnis, but it may have undermined its credibility on the Hill by wrapping itself rhetorically in high-flown constitutional "principles" that were abandoned as soon as adhering to them became inconvenient.

REV_00265259

V. DEBACLE IN THE COURTS

Perhaps the most remarkable example of the Bush administration's reluctance to act on its stated principles transpired after the President became a lame duck in the autumn of 1992. In a well-publicized series of judicial decisions growing out of an arcane dispute over the litigating authority of the U.S. Postal Service, President Bush and his Justice Department [*80] suffered serious setbacks on several important issues involving presidential legal authority. [176] These losses are significant for present purposes not so much because they occurred, but because they could likely have been avoided if the administration had proceeded in a timely fashion according to the principles that it claimed to treasure.

On January 22, 1991, the U.S. Postal Service filed suit against the Postal Rate Commission in the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. Although such suits are specifically authorized by statute, they are constitutionally questionable because they assume that disputes within the executive establishment can be resolved by an entity outside the president's control. The principle at stake--that the executive department of government is a unitary entity subject to the president's control and supervision--implies that a suit brought by one executive agency against another is a kind of absurdity, like a person bringing suit against himself. It is also a principle that is central to the constitutional vision to which President Bush committed himself at the beginning of his administration, and which he affirmed in numerous signing statements throughout his term. [177]

Despite the centrality of the unitary executive in the jurisprudence adopted by the Bush administration, the theory has [*81] met with a chilly reception in the courts, which have taken a relaxed attitude to the creation of independent agencies that are legally insulated from presidential control (at least when those agencies perform functions that do not seem to be at the core of the president's own constitutional responsibilities). [178] When confronted with the Postal Service lawsuit, the administration therefore had two obvious choices. It could let the suit go forward, hoping that nobody would notice the retreat from administration principles. Or it could try to use the President's claimed authority over the two agencies to force them to resolve their dispute outside the courts.

This should have been an easy decision. The Postal Service is controlled by an eleven-member Board of Governors that comprises nine part-time Governors together with the Postmaster General and the Deputy Postmaster General (who are chosen by the Governors). At the time of this dispute, all of the Governors had been appointed by Presidents Reagan and Bush, and a majority were Republicans. Although the Postmaster General and his Deputy could have been expected to resist presidential control because they were full-time officials with a vested interest in their statutory independence, it should have been political child's play for a then-popular president to persuade a sufficient number of the part-time Governors to avoid a confrontation with him over an obscure legal issue that he considered important. Had this occurred, a useful administrative precedent would have been created, and without the risk of any adverse judicial decisions. If the President had failed to persuade the Board of Governors to go along with his wishes, the administration could then have made a considered decision whether to risk litigation or to retreat to the passive role embodied in the first option.

The Bush administration took neither of the obvious paths. Instead it entered a prolonged period of dithering, during which it relied on what one commentator has aptly called a [*82] strategy of "delay, threats, and prayers." [179] The public record does not indicate who was responsible for this "strategy," but there can be no doubt that it was adopted. In any event, as the delay continued the threats began to look empty, and the prayers went unanswered. Finally, some twenty months later, further stalling became impossible, and the Justice Department formally directed the Postal Service to withdraw its lawsuit. After this extremely tardy directive was predictably ignored, President Bush at last took action. On December 11, 1992, a president whose political resources had largely evaporated when he lost his bid for re-election took the extraordinary step of personally directing the Board of Governors to withdraw the lawsuit, on pain of dismissal. The Board voted six to five to defy the President, and the winning majority immediately went to court seeking an order to block their threatened removal. The President responded by attempting to use his recess appointment power to replace one of the Governors, which might have led to a reversal of the Board's narrow decision to ignore his directive.

REV_00265260

The upshot of this litigation was a total victory for the Postal Service and a complete loss for the President. First, President Bush was subjected to an unprecedented court order forbidding him to discharge presidential appointees. [180] Second, the court of appeals ruled that the Postal Service had the authority to bring suit against the Postal Rate Commission even in defiance of the president. [181] The court firmly rejected the Justice Department's theory of the unitary executive, concluding that the judiciary may resolve disputes arising among executive agencies when authorized by statute to do so. [182] Finally, although the Clinton administration continued to defend Bush's recess appointment, that issue was also resolved against the presidency. [183]

[*83] Thus ended George Bush's experiment with presidential commitment to the theories developed by the constitutional lawyers who saw themselves as the guardians of the presidency. The Bush administration arrived where the Reagan administration had so often found itself: begging the courts for relief from impositions that might have been avoided through the exercise of political will. One difference, however, is that while the Reagan administration at least achieved some notable victories through litigation, as in Chadha and in Bowsher, the Bush administration seems to have contributed less than nothing to the few legal gains that the presidency made during its four years in office.

VI. CONCLUSION

Perhaps the most obvious question raised by the Bush record on separation of powers is whether the absence of signal successes in enhancing or defending the office of the presidency resulted more from incompetence or from the operation of incentives that caused the administration to put greater value on achieving other goals. Examples like the postal service case and the airports litigation suggest that ineptitude played a significant role, for in neither case does any strong overriding political or policy goal seem to explain the administration's failure to defend the interests of the presidency. Poor execution of policy, however, occurs in all administrations (and all other large organizations), so examples like these are not necessarily very revealing.

In this case, incompetence is not likely the sole or even principal explanatory factor even for those incidents in which it probably played an important part. In the airports matter, for example, the Justice Department became institutionally invested in defending the congressional board of review during the Reagan administration. One would therefore have expected this defense to have continued during the Bush administration, as it did, unless the new President's special commitment to policing the separation of powers had been taken quite seriously. What this incident suggests more strongly than anything else is that the commitment communicated by the President was not strong enough to overcome ordinary forces of bureaucratic inertia and personal egotism at the Justice Department. Similarly, the Postal Service case is probably best explained in terms of an unwillingness by the Justice Department to request that the President take action in a matter that involved only [*84] separation of powers principles (with no prospect of collateral political or policy benefits), during a period when both the President and the Department's senior officials had more politically promising and seemingly urgent items competing for their time and attention. Both cases might have seemed quite important to lawyers whose principal concern was constitutional law and the long-term effects of that law on the structure of government, but neither case promised the President or the Attorney General any immediate political or policy payoff. The same kind of explanation seems to fit the Bush record taken as a whole. Consider each group of incidents analyzed in this paper: the compromises that followed the four vetoes that were based on objections to legislative encroachments on the president's authority; the Administration's support of the unconstitutional statutory appointment in the FIRREA legislation; and the virtual absence of a willingness to violate the many unconstitutional provisions (such as legislative vetoes) contained in legislation signed by the President. Taken together, all of these suggest that the defense of the presidency never assumed real importance in the Bush administration.

REV_00265261

The President's public pronouncements, however, as well as the prominent role that he assigned in his administration to lawyers known especially for their interest in separation of powers issues, [184] and the extremely scrupulous attention that was given to these issues in his signing statements and veto messages, suggest that these issues were deemed quite important by President Bush. Since Bush had little or nothing to gain from feigning this interest in the defense of his office, there is no reason to suppose that his intellectual commitment to the issue was anything other than genuine. His administration's strong pattern of significant concessions, inaction at crucial moments, and downright self-destructiveness, therefore suggests that a more resolute pattern of behavior would have imposed short-term costs that the President and others around him simply proved unwilling to pay. One should [*85] expect other presidents and other administrations to be subject to the same incentives, and one should expect them to respond to those incentives in a similar manner. What makes the Bush administration unusual is only that the President and some of his lawyers seemed to think at the outset that this time things could be different.

Those who hoped to assist President Bush in strengthening the office he temporarily held must have been personally disappointed in the outcome. Some of them may even have been disappointed in the President himself. Should other citizens share this sense of a missed opportunity? I suspect not, and I believe the reason has implications that go beyond the particular incidents that so preoccupied the lawyers during the Bush administration. Whether in the context of the separation of powers or in that of ethics--and sometimes in both at once, as with Iran-Contra--the increased lawyerization of political disputes since Watergate has often submerged real disputes about substantive choices beneath distracting contests over abstract principles. This has probably had some healthy effects, for distractions can sometimes avert potentially destructive clashes. And there would be poisonous long-term consequences if disputes over ethics issues and separation of powers were fought out as naked trials of political strength. But more of a good thing is not always better. The logic of reframing political disputes in legal terms can ultimately draw lawyers into the role of the client, a result that lawyers seldom find disagreeable. But it would be irresponsible for a President to let his lawyers determine how far he should push the defense of his constitutional prerogatives, just as it would be to cede the definition of those prerogatives to Congress. The professional training and professional obligations of lawyers do not qualify them for that task, however valuable and necessary their advice on the subject may be.

George Bush and his administration may not have made all the right decisions in trying to balance the president's substantive goals and his constitutional responsibilities to his office. That would hardly distinguish his presidency from any other, and it ought not to obscure the fact that he at least did not leave his office significantly weaker in legal terms than when he assumed it. It is obvious that Bush might have weakened the presidency by offering too little resistance to an aggressive Congress. But it is equally true, and much less obvious, [*86] that he might also have weakened it by letting his lawyers effectively assume an office to which they were not elected.

[*87] AFTERWORD: A NOTE ON SOURCES AND METHODS

The analysis presented in this article is based on a study of the public record, and those who

The preoccupation with ethics in government is the most obvious lingering effect of the Watergate affairs, but it may not be the most important. This article will consider a less visible aftermath of Watergate: the increasing significance of disputes that generally fall under the rubric of separation of powers. President Nixon, of course, tried unsuccessfully to invoke the [*20] constitutional separation of powers to prevent his own downfall. As emboldened congresses and a more belligerent press have sought to subject subsequent presidents to tighter and tighter controls, those presidents have also invoked the Constitution to protect themselves from encroachments on their freedom of action. Some of these disputes have arisen from the post-Watergate ethics laws, [11] but they have not by any means been limited to this context. Because recent turf fights between presidents and their adversaries have often been waged in legal and constitutional terms, lawyers who specialize in the separation of powers have become much more prominent than they once were. The function of articulating a principled defense of presidents and the presidency--mostly from congressional incursions--is carried out primarily by those who serve in the Office of the Counsel to the President at the White House and in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel ("OLC"), to which the Attorney General's legal advisory function has largely been delegated. [12] The rise of this species of presidential lawyer is worthy of considerable attention, both for its intrinsic intellectual interest and because it can be expected to have continuing effects on the political life of our nation. [13]

The comments that Gray and Cutler offered when Nussbaum resigned his office [14] exemplify the conventional wisdom among this new breed of presidential lawyer about the proper relationship between them and their client. Cutler and Gray agree that government lawyers may not properly serve as the president's personal attorney, and in this they are surely correct. But they also agree that the office of the presidency should, at least to some extent or in some circumstances, be [*21] regarded as the real client to whom the president's lawyers owe their professional loyalty. I believe this is incorrect in several respects. First, it has no basis in the law. Second, it exaggerates the professional obligations and constitutional role of the lawyers, while suggesting an unduly restricted view of the president's own role and obligations. Third, the moralistic romanticism of the Gray and Cutler vision obscures the economy of incentives that actually determines much of what presidents and their lawyers actually do.

This article seeks to present a more realistic understanding of the work that is and can be done by those who advise the president about his constitutional rights and responsibilities. I argue that the role of lawyers in defending the presidency is determined primarily by the operation of ordinary incentive structures, rather than by legal requirements or professional norms. The potential influence of these lawyers, moreover, is sharply constrained by those same incentive structures, and especially by the fact that the president faces different incentives than his legal advisors. I conclude that as a result of these constraints, the principled defense of the office of the presidency cannot become a significant element of any president's agenda, even if the president wants it to be. For the reasons suggested by Tocqueville, [15] this analysis is not the enemy of professional obligation or constitutional responsibility, but their friend. The doctrine of self-interest properly understood may be incomplete, but it is the strongest guarantee against our lawyers and our presidents.

Part II explains the analytical framework used in this article, and contrasts it with other approaches that dominate the existing academic literature. The following sections of the article provide a detailed case study to support the conclusions suggested by the analysis used here. Part III explores the Bush administration's unprecedented effort to implement a serious and systematic legal strategy for the defense of the presidency. This strategy unquestionably had visible results, but it also generated compromises that were often more important, though much less conspicuous. Part IV examines three major incidents in which the administration's legal strategy was simply abandoned. I argue that these incidents were, on the whole, [*22] more significant than the cases in which the strategy was actually are skeptical about its conclusions can test the evidence presented here against that record. This point deserves some emphasis because I worked in the Office of the Counsel to the President during the Bush administration, and in OLC during the Reagan administration. Anyone with such a background might reasonably be supposed to have the usual biases that arise when one has been involved with events and institutions that one later seeks to explain. [185] It should not be thought, however, that lack of direct involvement in government provides any assurance of impartiality in the study of government. Those who devote their time to the study of their own country's political institutions are not likely to be unaffected by their own political opinions, and those opinions need to be disciplined for the same reason and in much the same way as the biases of the former participant.

REV_00265236

The difficulties in preventing one's political beliefs from distorting one's analysis are particularly acute in the study of legal policy and separation of powers, where there is nothing like a political or academic consensus about the basic criteria that one could use to judge the performance of government officials and institutions. For that reason, scholars who work in this area cannot easily escape the necessity of acquiring a detailed familiarity with the legal issues and materials that legal policy-makers must grapple with in their own work. Such familiarity is also needed to avoid a different kind of shortcoming, because adequate analysis also requires independence from the explanations offered by policy-makers for their own conduct. This afterword provides illustrations of both points, using examples drawn from two of the most detailed recent studies of the operation of the legal bureaucracies that have primary responsibility for separation of powers issues.

Professor Cornell W. Clayton's critique of the Bush administration's approach to legal policy illustrates some of the pitfalls that can trap those who do not acquire a sufficient [*88] familiarity with the law. [186] Professor Clayton, who sees the Bush approach to legal policy as an ill-advised extension of the Reagan administration's misguided efforts to increase its control over the administrative state (and thereby to diminish congressional influence), concludes that a new alliance between the Justice Department and a conservative Supreme Court has implications that are "potentially far more dangerous to the rule of law" than previous presidential efforts to supervise legal administration. [187] Although this threat to "the rule of law" remains obscure in Professor Clayton's analysis, it seems to proceed from a notion that the "politicization" of legal policy by recent conservative presidents constitutes an improper evasion of congressional will. [188] The best solution, Professor Clayton suggests, may be for Congress to remove the Justice Department from the president's control. [189]

Leaving aside the implausible suggestion that the Supreme Court's separation of powers jurisprudence would permit the president's authority over the Justice Department's core law enforcement functions to be taken away, [190] the legal materials that Professor Clayton uses to support his thesis do not in fact support his claims. I will limit myself here to two examples that are especially relevant to this article because they involve the Bush administration's approach to separation of powers.

[*89] First, after claiming that the Bush administration went farther than its predecessors in using "signing statements to gut congressional policies with which it disagreed," [191] Professor Clayton offers as his only example a draft signing statement that the President never issued:

> In the most egregious example of this practice, Boyden Gray circulated a statement interpreting the 1991 Civil Rights Act so as to gut several key provisions, even before the bill was signed. . . . [The Gray directive] specifically attacked race preference policies and would have ended the use of preferences and quotas in federal hiring. The directive was clearly an attempt to achieve administratively what the administration was not able to achieve in its fight with

Congress over the wording of the Civil Rights Act. [192]

Not only was the draft signing statement described here never issued, [193] but Professor Clayton's characterization of it is demonstrably inaccurate. Gray's draft would have required federal agencies to terminate programs "that may be inconsistent with the new law or with the principle of discouraging quotas and unfair preferences. So-called 'race norming' of the General Aptitude Test Battery, for example, is plainly forbidden by section 106 of the new Act." [194] The Gray draft would also [*90] have directed federal agencies to begin work on new employee selection guidelines, to be "established under section 105 and other provisions of the Act," and it would have directed federal agencies to cease inducing employers "to violate the laws" by adopting quotas, preferences, and set-asides "on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin." [195] In addition to the fact that the document focused on requiring federal agencies to conform with the Civil Rights Act of 1991, including such specific provisions as the statute's flat prohibition of "race norming," there is not one word in that statute authorizing the kind of "quotas and unfair preferences" described in the draft. On the contrary, the statute specifically and expressly forbids "any employment practice [in which] race, color, religion, sex, or national origin [is] a motivating factor . . . even though other factors also motivated the practice." [196] Thus, the statute plainly and on its face dictates exactly the policy that Professor Clayton castigates Gray for recommending.

This misinterpretation seems to have arisen from unfamiliarity with the relevant legal materials and background. At one point, for example, Professor Clayton makes the following statement about the Bush Justice Department: "In Wards Cove v. Antonio [sic] (1989), Patterson v. McClean Credit Union (1989), and City of Richmond v. Croson (1989), the department argued and finally won a majority of the Court to accept its position that the use of disparate impact evidence under Title [VII] should be restricted." [197] This sentence contains several [*91] errors. First, none of these cases was briefed or argued during the Bush administration. Second, Patterson had nothing to do with disparate impact evidence or with Title VII, and the Court rejected the position advocated by the Justice Department in that case. Third, the Croson decision had nothing to do with either of these issues or with any other federal statute. In a note appended to this sentence, Professor Clayton says that "Congress overturned these decisions by passing the Civil Rights Act of 1991." [198] The 1991 statute in fact codified large parts of Wards Cove, including its holding, and unambiguously "overturned" only one relatively minor dictum. The 1991 Act overturned Patterson, but in doing so it adopted the position advocated by the Bush administration throughout the legislative debate, which in turn was consistent with the position taken by the Justice Department in the Patterson litigation itself. Finally, the 1991 Act contains no provisions that have anything to do with the legal issue in the Croson case.

A second example of difficulties that can ensue when complex legal issues are treated in too summary a fashion arises in Professor Clayton's discussion of the relation between the Supreme Court's Chevron doctrine (which requires judicial deference to federal agencies' interpretations of statutes in certain circumstances) and Justice Scalia's views on the use of legislative history in statutory construction. According to Professor Clayton, the Bush Justice Department was engaged in a "quest to get the Supreme Court to place more stringent limitations on lower court review of administrative action." [199] The key to this effort, we are told, was Justice Scalia, who has "championed broad application of the Chevron standards" and who "has argued that lower courts should ignore congressional intent altogether as a basis for reviewing administrative action." [200]

At best, these are caricatures of Justice Scalia's positions. Taking the second allegation first, Professor Clayton cites two of Scalia's opinions (one for the Court and one concurring in the Court's judgment) to support his description of Scalia's position on congressional intent. [201] But neither case involved [*92] a review of any federal administrative interpretation, and neither opinion advocates ignoring congressional intent. In neither case, nor anywhere else that I am aware of, has Scalia even suggested that lower courts should adopt different principles in interpreting statutes than the Supreme Court should. Nor do I believe that Scalia has ever contended that any court should "ignore congressional intent altogether."

REV_00265264

Professor Clayton's notion that Scalia wants to "ignore congressional intent altogether" seems to proceed from a misunderstanding of Scalia's views about the use of legislative history in statutory construction: "According to [Scalia's] view, all that is important is the language of [the] statute, not Congress' efforts to explain what its statutes mean through committee reports or legislative histories." [202] So far as I am aware, however, Scalia has never asserted that courts should ignore the legislative history of a statute when it provides the most probative evidence of a statute's meaning, and Professor Clayton cites no such assertion. Scalia has argued, in considerable detail and in a variety of contexts, that courts should not unnecessarily substitute inferences drawn from the legislative history of statutes (which consists of statements by entities other than Congress, such as congressional committees and individual members) for inferences drawn from the statute itself (which is the only thing that Congress has actually voted on). Some of what Sca pursued. Part V analyzes the Bush administration's single most aggressive attempt to carry out its program, and explains how and why it completely missed its goal, leading instead to a setback for the program. Part VI offers some concluding observations.

REV_00265265

II. FRAMEWORK FOR THE ANALYSIS

The increased legalization of ethics and the increased legalization of turf battles between the legislature and the executive have a common origin in Watergate, but they have also had a common effect: enhancing the influence of lawyers in the White House and in OLC. To see why this has occurred, consider for a moment the roles played by most of the senior political appointees in the executive departments and agencies, such as cabinet secretaries. In theory, these are supposed to be the president's representatives in the permanent bureaucracy, giving policy direction in the light of an agenda set by the single popularly elected possessor of the executive power of the United States. [16] In practice, these officials inevitably serve both as the president's representatives in the agencies and as representatives to the White House for the bureaucracies and their congressional and interest-group overseers. These conflicting roles can be balanced in different ways, and with greater or lesser success, depending on a great variety of circumstances. What is important for present purposes is simply to note that the remedies for failing to balance these roles successfully are entirely political. Political appointees can be fired by the president, and can be subjected to various lesser kinds of pressure and embarrassment from the White House. Similarly, an agency's congressional superintendents can often exert a considerable countervailing influence on its political managers because of legislators' discretion to grant and withhold appropriations, provide desirable enabling legislation, inflict unflattering publicity through hearings and investigations, and take other steps that will cause political appointees to appear as successes or failures.

[*23] The president's principal legal advisors have an apparently very different set of roles. Unlike the various interests that political managers are expected to balance politically, the law binds everyone, including the president. As oracles of the law, therefore, attorneys can in effect issue commands to their nominal superiors in a way that others cannot. As ethics laws have become increasingly complex and arcane, those who are expert in their interpretation have naturally become more important and more powerful. And, as disputes over the allocation of power between the executive and the legislature have become more legalistic, experts in this branch of constitutional law have also become more important and more powerful. The most important authorities on ethics and separation of powers, moreover, are largely found in the same small group of people who work at the White House Counsel's Office and in OLC. [17]

[*24] If lawyers were, or could be, simply the voice of the law, it might be appropriate to treat them very differently from other political officials in the government. But politically appointed lawyers obviously have interests and obligations that are quite similar to those of political managers, such as protecting and advancing their own reputations and promoting the president's agenda. To appreciate the special role played by lawyers who specialize in the separation of powers, one must begin by understanding more precisely how they differ from other political appointees, and how they are the same.

A. Legal Ethics and the Role of the President's Legal Advisors

Among the more salient features of most commentaries on the advisory function of the presidential lawyer is the exaggeration of the deep and inherent tensions that are supposed to exist between the political and professional obligations of those responsible for providing the president with legal advice. Real tensions between these obligations undoubtedly do exist, but the dilemmas that result are typically specious. Lawyers who work for the president without fully sharing his political goals, for example, have an obvious incentive to wrap their own political agenda in the guise of professional obligations. Similarly, those who wish to influence an administration's conduct have an obvious incentive to encourage the president's lawyers to [*25] resist his agenda in the name of supposedly professional considerations. Exaggeration of the tension in the role of presidential legal advisor has had real effects on the public discourse about the role of lawyers in government, and on the academic literature about the functioning of legal bureaucracies. [18]

REV_00265237

The principal alternative views about the professional obligations of the president's legal advisors are illustrated by the quotations in Part I from the three lawyers who have recently served as White House Counsel. Gray and Cutler are clearly right in one respect. Those who serve in this position are government employees, who cannot properly act as personal counsel for their supervisors. In this respect, however, they are no different from lawyers retained or employed by institutional clients in the private sector. There are circumstances in which the distinction between the interests of a corporation and the personal interests of its principal officers is genuinely difficult to draw. And counsel to a private corporation will sometimes be tempted to substitute loyalty to an officer who controls the disposition of the firm's legal work for loyalty to the firm. Painful ethical dilemmas can arise and mistaken choices may be made by lawyers in these circumstances just as they may in the government. Such problems are inherent in the business of representing institutional clients, however, and the underlying standard of conduct is the same in the public and private sectors: "A lawyer employed or retained by an organization represents the organization acting through its duly authorized constituents." [19] Thus, if Nussbaum undertook [*26] to represent the President or his wife (or both) in their personal capacities while he was on the public payroll, he was acting improperly. This judgment does not depend on any peculiar ethical tensions created by government service in general or by the special demands of employment in the White House. [20] The same impropriety would exist if Nussbaum, after returning to private practice, were to bill a corporate client for services performed in behalf of the personal interests of the client's chief executive officer. [21]

If it is clear that government employees may not properly represent the personal interests of those who hire them, it is not nearly so clear exactly what interests they are supposed to represent. Gray and Cutler differ on this question, and their views represent the two alternatives most frequently presented. According to Cutler, the White House Counsel must seek to balance the interests of the president as a politician against the interests of the office he holds. When these interests diverge, as they occasionally must, Cutler suggests that the lawyer must decide which is more important in the case at hand. Good judgment--a sensitivity to the competing demands of politics and [*27] principle, and an ability to resolve concrete dilemmas in a way that serves the interests of the nation as a whole--is thus considered the hallmark of excellence in a presidential legal advisor. Cutler's view is neither quirky nor indefensible. It is, for example, essentially the view taken by Professor Nancy V. Baker in her extended study of the history of the Attorney General's office. [22]

Gray articulates what seems at first to be a sharply different and more glorified view of the White House lawyer's job: that his client is the presidency itself, an entirely abstract entity whose needs and interests transcend the desires and concerns of any individual who happens to get elected to that post. When fully elaborated, this view provides a theoretical justification for the ascent, and in many ways the ascendance, of government lawyers who specialize in the separation of powers. Tracing their intellectual roots to Alexander Hamilton, whose theory of the executive gives intellectual respectability (and even a certain air of timelessness) to their endeavors, these lawyers present themselves as agents of the Constitution itself and guardians of an office whose significance to our nation far outstrips the petty political disputes that consume the daily life of most of those around the president. Important elements of an academic theory supporting Gray's view are presented by Terry Eastland, who contends both that the Constitution itself largely dictates how presidents should conduct themselves in office and that these constitutional duties are largely bound up with defending the prerogatives of his office. [23]

REV_00265238

What unites the views expressed by Cutler and Gray--and in my view unites them in error--is the assumption that mere lawyers should be deciding how the president ought to accommodate his political and policy agenda with the obligations he has to the office he occupies. Like clients in private practice, the president is responsible for his own decisions, and in fact he has the authority either to make his own legal determinations without consulting any of his lawyers or to proceed in the face of contrary advice from any lawyer he does consult. [24] It is [*28] true that the president has legal obligations that differ from those of any private citizen, or indeed from any other government official. But they are his obligations, not those of his lawyers or subordinates. [25] If, for example, the president decides that his political and policy agenda is more important to the future of the country than defending his office from constitutionally dubious legislative restrictions, no lawyer anywhere in the government has the authority to displace that determination. Like anyone else, his lawyers may argue that a particular judgment by the president is mistaken, and they may sometimes be right. But when lawyers assume to substitute their own judgment for the president's--as they must if "the Oval Office" (Gray) or the "office of the presidency" (Cutler) is their client--they are acting without legal warrant.

Though the president's lawyers have no legal right to substitute the presidency for the president as their client, they have the right to negotiate with the president for the privilege of making such a substitution. Lloyd Cutler may have done just that, for it appeared when he was appointed that President Clinton needed his services far more than Cutler wanted the job. [26] But even apart from such special circumstances, there [*29] are persistent forces encouraging presidents to allow their closest legal advisors to view themselves as counsel for the presidency. If those forces were to produce a settled expectation that the president should be treated by his chief legal advisors merely as a kind of caretaker for the institution of the presidency, to which they owe their true allegiance, it might not much matter whether there is a legal basis upon which the president's lawyers could rely in presuming to set themselves up as judges of his fidelity to his constitutional oath of office. Such an arrangement might even be thought to benefit presidents more than their lawyers, since it is after all the president who gets to employ the authority that the lawyers would be dedicated to defending and expanding.

The Bush administration provides a useful case study through which to explore the tensions between advising a president and advising the presidency. When George Bush was elected president, a variety of factors had established a pattern of conflicts in which unsettled constitutional issues involving the separation of powers provided the terms of debate for a struggle over control of the basic mechanisms of governance. In addition to the continuing repercussions of the Watergate scandals and the 1974 elections, these factors included both the seemingly fixed disinclination of the voters to establish either political party in command of both the legislative and executive departments of government and the fresh tensions generated by the Iran-Contra affair. Coming into office without a well-articulated substantive agenda, but with a strong sense of the disorder that can arise from congressional attempts to exercise naturally executive functions, President Bush took what must be the unique or very unusual step of directing that a legal strategy be developed for enhancing the defense of his office. The record of this effort to close the gap between constitutional principle and administration policy can help illuminate both the possibilities open to presidential legal advisors and the limits on their role in government.

[*30] B. The Existing Literature and an Alternative Approach

A close study of the Bush administration's record on separation of powers issues also offers an opportunity to supplement a growing body of scholarship dealing with the behavior of legal bureaucracies. This scholarship, which has been produced mainly by political scientists, attempts to explain the behavior of lawyers in government in terms of a variety of personal, institutional, and historical forces. Professor Nancy V. Baker, for example, focuses on individual Attorneys General and seeks to explain their performance in office according to whether they behaved more as a neutral law officer or as the president's advocate and supporter. [27] Professor James Michael Strine's detailed study of OLC concludes that both continuity and change within that office can be explained by its institutional structures, norms, roles, and rules. [28] Professor Cornell W. Clayton emphasizes the impact on legal policy-making at the Justice Department of wider historical and political forces such as the nationalization of governmental power, the judicialization of large areas of public policy, and the institutionalization of partisan conflict. [29]

REV_00265239

The information included in these studies can explain a great deal, for government lawyers operate in environments that are severely constrained by a variety of factors including the norms and expectations of the legal profession, the balance of power that obtains among various political factions in and out of government at any given time, and the sheer growth in the size and complexity of the federal administrative state. In my view, however, the existing literature does not adequately explain the operation of these factors because it gives insufficient attention to the way in which incentive structures affect the choices made by individual lawyers and those with whom they deal.

The absence of serious inquiry into the incentives that affect individual choice in legal bureaucracies appears to result in part from constraints that the subject matter places on those who undertake these studies. First, the most accessible sources of information about the way legal bureaucracies operate are the memoirs of those who have served in high positions in the [*31] government. Such memoirs are unreliable because their authors face an extremely strong temptation to understate the degree to which they engaged in self-serving or mistaken behavior while in office. When researchers try to supplement such sources through interviews with more obscure officials, their research cannot escape the underlying problem. Many government lawyers take the confidentiality of their work seriously, and are therefore reluctant to speak in useful detail about what they and others in the government do. Those who do choose to speak with researchers, especially when they speak anonymously, cannot be assumed either to constitute a fair sample or to be unbiased reporters. On the contrary, it would be safer to suppose that many who are willing to provide information to outsiders do so because they have an axe to grind. [30]

Documentary evidence in legal archives will rarely be able to provide much assistance in correcting the problems described above. The documents that underlie the legal advice presidents receive are seldom available to researchers until after the decisions to which they relate are long past, and they often never become available. [31] Much advice, moreover, is formulated in meetings and discussions that are never recorded, among people who will never have a reason to offer complete, or completely candid, accounts of what was said.

These limitations can to some extent be overcome through sufficient study of the public record, which contains a great deal of information about what presidents and their lawyers actually do, and about their efforts to explain publicly what they do. Not only does the public record contain a great deal of information, but it has the very important advantage that research based on it can be checked by anyone who wants to verify the claims made by those who rely on it. Unfortunately, the public record has not been thoroughly scrutinized in the existing literature, and for very understandable reasons. Light reading it is not, and much of it can be confusing to those who are unfamiliar with the specific bodies of law out of which particular [*32] legal issues arise. And yet, one cannot meaningfully evaluate what happens when the president is given legal advice on important issues unless one can evaluate the strengths and weaknesses of the legal arguments involved. Without such an evaluation, one is not likely to understand the relationship between the legal and the extra-legal components of the advice, or the real causes of any ensuing decisions.

The Afterword to this article gives examples of the difficulties that can arise from insufficient skepticism about information from sources within legal bureaucracies and from insufficient familiarity with the law with which these bureaucracies deal. These difficulties can be especially serious when academic analysts are intent on formulating lessons that they wish to urge on policy-makers, as most students of this subject have been. Professor Clayton, for example, is extremely harsh in criticizing what he considers the "politicization" of the Justice Department under Presidents Reagan and Bush, and he concludes that serious consideration should be given to removing that Department from the president's control. [32] Professor Jeremy Rabkin, conversely, reviews most of what little is known about the history of the Office of the Counsel to the President, and concludes by attacking the Clinton administration for relying insufficiently on the institutional wisdom of the Justice Department. [33]

Such recommendations, however, can hardly be distinguished from political advice unless they are grounded in adequate explanatory models. The models employed in the literature, however, are ill-defined, and the scholarship in this area is very short on testable predictions. Indeed, one rarely sees any analysis that gets much beyond such self-evident points as the following: when the executive and legislative departments are controlled by different political parties, conflicts over separation of powers increase; [34] increasing conflicts between the executive and the legislature tend to increase the involvement of the judiciary in issues involving the control of governmental institutions; [35] executive officials have less success in pursuing aggressive agendas if their private financial dealings create opportunities [*33] for their adversaries to attack their ethics; [36] and legal advisors who do not champion the president's agenda lose influence with the president while those who do champion his agenda invite attacks from the president's political adversaries. [37]

I have tried to overcome some of the limitations in the existing literature. First, I employ a simple and fairly well defined model of human behavior, drawn from the science of economics, which has proven useful in explaining a wide range of human conduct. I assume, as a hypothesis, that the president's legal advisors and the other people with whom they deal in their professional lives behave as rational utility maximizers in an environment characterized by limited resources. This model implies, most importantly for present purposes, that people cannot have as much as they want of the most obvious things they desire--such as money, prestige, power, and leisure--and that they will respond to changes in their environment by changing their own behavior in an effort to maximize their self-interest. Using this model does not require one to assume that truly disinterested, or even self-sacrificing, behavior never occurs. Nor need one assume that acts of insanity or irrational zealotry never occur. The approach adopted here simply makes the provisional assumption that such conduct is rare enough in certain contexts (in this case, the business of government during the late twentieth century in the United States) that events will largely proceed as if self-sacrificing or irrational behavior were nonexistent. [38]

Use of the rational-choice model seems particularly suitable in examining the behavior of people operating in a system that was consciously designed to promote an identity (though necessarily an imperfect one) between duty and interest. [39] Another [*34] reason for regarding this model as especially useful in the present context is that it helps direct attention to important causal influences that those who create the public record on which we must rely have a motive to conceal, even from themselves. People who serve in public office are both expected and inclined to explain their own behavior by reference to the "public interest" or "the law" or "the Constitution," rather than in terms of their self-interest. Abandoning this expectation and discouraging these inclinations would not elevate public discourse or improve the operation of government. But neither can it advance the understanding of government to accept such protestations of disinterestedness, at least without critical examination. Government lawyers, in particular, may be less driven by self-interest than those who compete with other people in the worlds of business or electoral politics, but such a happy fact is one that would need to be proved rather than assumed.

One of the more obvious dangers in the use of a rational-choice model, of course, is that one will be tempted simply to discount appeals to standards such as "the law" or "the Constitution" as so much self-serving camouflage, without giving sufficient attention to the fact that people can include fidelity to the law in their own utility functions. [40] The law and legal principles, like the dictates of loyalty and justice, can and do operate as meaningful constraints on lawyers' behavior even [*35] though this surely happens less often than lawyers say it does when they are explaining their own actions. I have tried to avoid the pitfall of unjustified cynicism by examining the strengths and weaknesses of the legal arguments offered by the individuals whose conduct is being considered, and by comparing what they actually did with the explanations they offered for what they did.

The rational-choice model of human behavior generates a simple but somewhat counter-intuitive prediction about the subject-matter of this article: a president should prove unsuccessful if he attempts to make the defense of the presidency an important element of his administration's agenda. The rewards for a consistent and forceful defense of the legal interests of the office of the presidency would be largely abstract, since they would consist primarily of fidelity to a certain theory of the Constitution. To the extent that the rewards could be translated into actual increased power to accomplish policy and political goals, those rewards would mostly be reaped at some remote period of time, after the defenders of the theory had left office. The costs of pursuing a serious defense of the presidency, however, would tend to be immediate and tangible. These costs would include the expenditure of political capital that might have been used for more pressing purposes, the unpleasantness of increased friction with congressional barons and their allies, and the sheer expenditure of time by extremely busy people on uninvitingly dry legal issues.

Presidential lawyers who specialize in the separation of powers would tend to collect a large share of the benefits in the form of increased glory and increased job satisfaction, but the specialization of functions that produces this result also means that the costs would largely be borne by others in the government, above all by the president. Therefore, when the costs to the president (and to those of his advisors with a broader responsibility for governance than that allocated to separation-of-powers lawyers) become significant, we should expect the lawyers' legal principles to be compromised or abandoned. And because the costs of adhering to those principles tend to be highest in the most important cases, we should expect to find a pattern in which the principles are adhered to only primarily in relatively trivial cases. The following sections of this article are devoted to testing these predictions.

The approach sketched here necessarily requires a level of analysis that is more detailed than one ordinarily finds in studies [*36] of the operation of legal bureaucracies. I have therefore limited the study in two dimensions. First, only issues involving the separation of powers are considered. Second, the analysis is confined almost exclusively to George Bush's four years in office. [41]

III. THE EFFORT TO IMPLEMENT CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLE

In 1987, Vice President Bush was introduced at a meeting of a group of conservative lawyers by C. Boyden Gray, who had served as his Counsellor throughout the Reagan administration. The Vice President then delivered a speech arguing that congressional "micromanagement" of foreign policy was an improper substitution of the legislature's properly political oversight responsibilities with an unduly legalistic "regulatory" regime. Bush believed both that this was a serious practical problem because it threatened to "destroy our government's ability to function effectively," and that its amelioration required practical steps to establish relationships of trust between officials in the executive and legislative departments of government. Significantly, however, Bush contended that these practical steps should be taken in the context of a reexamination of the intent of the Framers of the Constitution and the "objective principles embodied in the law" they created. [42]

After becoming president, one of Bush's very first public statements dealt with this same issue: "I am concerned about the erosion of presidential power, particularly in the fields of national defense and foreign policy, but I want to work with Congress," Bush said. "If they

REV_00265242

* no elections // fundraising
* no lobbying

Signup Page and Personalization

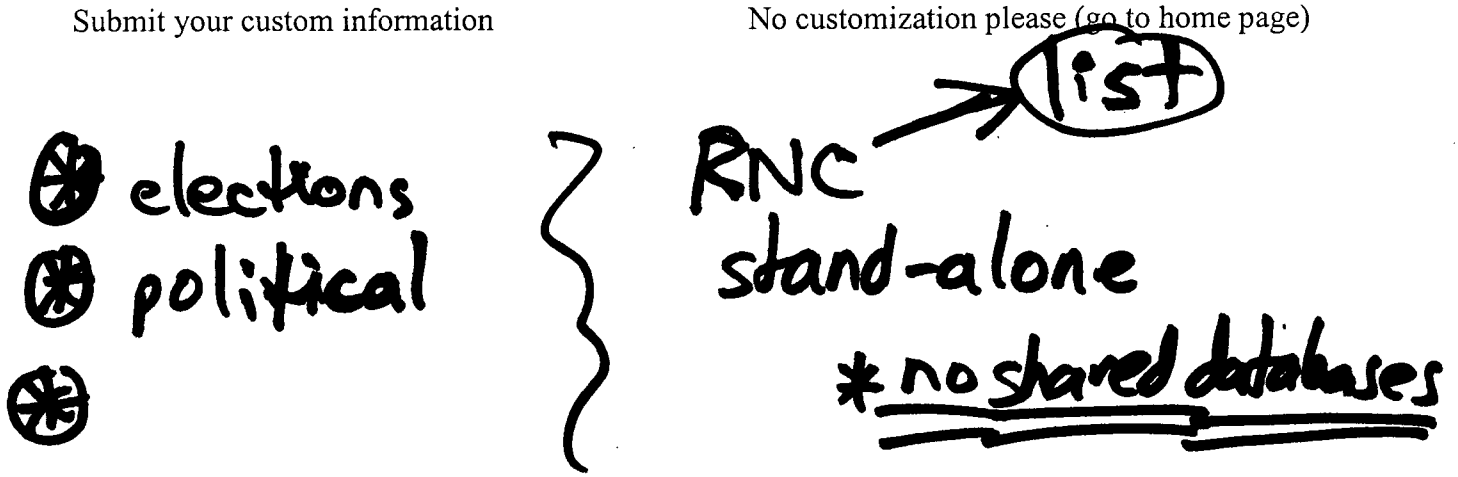
Information on White House e-mail updates

This is your chance to receive updates directly from the White House. We offer different types of information, from general updates on the President's agenda, to information regarding specific issues. Occasionally, there's even information that effects local communities.

By submitting your e-mail address below, you will automatically get Message to America, a timely general update on the latest information from the White House.

[Type e-mail here]

Please note:
Typically, these updates would not go out more than once a week. Due to rapidly developing events, we may send out up to two messages per week if substantial new information is available.



Get Custom E-mail Updates

Take 15 seconds to customize your White House updates based on:

- Zip code – when available, get information that affects your community
- First Name & Last Name – so we can address you by name, when appropriate
- Issue category – receive the latest information on the issues below

Submit your custom information

No customization please (go to home page)

Header Signup Confirmation and Personalization Option Page

Thank you for submitting Neil_Zimmerman@who.eop.gov for White House e-mail updates.

Important Notice:
Whitehouse.gov uses a "double opt-in" process to ensure the privacy of our subscribers. A second step must be completed to receive White House e-mail updates. An e-mail will be sent to the address you submitted (Neil_Zimmerman@who.eop.gov) to explain how to complete the double opt-in process.

Get Custom E-mail Updates

Take 15 seconds to customize your White House updates based on:

- Zip code – when available, get information that affects your community
- First Name & Last Name – so we can address you by name, when appropriate
- Issue category – receive the latest information on the issues below

Submit your custom information No customization please (go to home page)

Confirmation Page

Please confirm the information you submitted is correct.

E-mail: Neil_Zimmerman@who.eop.gov
Zip code: 20502
First Name: Neil
Last Name: Zimmerman
Issues: Education
Economy/Budget
Homeland Defense
Message to America

If the above information is correct, please "click submit."

If you want to make changes to the above information, please click "go back."

Possible E-mail Names

WH News
WH Update
WH Alert
White House News
Stars & Stripes
The Red White & Blue

Message to America
Liberty Mail
Enduring Freedom
Freedom Mail
United Voices
American Freedom
Voice of Freedom
Freedom Ring
Our Country
Victory Mail
America United American Unity
United America
Free and Brave

E-mail Updates on whitehouse.gov

The process will take no more than two weeks, but can be compressed the faster we get the Office of Administration (OA) certain information.

E-mail subject/issue categories
When you sign up for e-mail updates, you will automatically get the general e-mail update we send out. This e-mail should not go out much more than once a week except under special circumstances.

As soon as they finish the initial sign-up process, they will be asked if they would like to personalize their e-mail updates. If they don't, then they're finished with the sign-up process. If they do, then they will be able to personalize in three ways:

- Zip code – when available, get information that affects your community.
- First Name & Last Name – so we can address you by name, when appropriate.
- Issue category – receive the latest information on the issues below.

We should start out with a few issue categories until we have a more robust system (including a way to measure e-mail campaign success) and more people to help write these updates.

We could start off with the core agenda topics:

1. General (Message to America)
2. Budget
3. Education
4. Faith- and community-based initiatives
5. Trade promotion authority
6. Military reform
7. Missile defense
8. Energy

In light of recent events, we may want to revise these topics.

Once we have a more robust system and e-mail writing/approval process we can offer as many issue categories as we wish. Correspondence helped identify the following top 22 issues:

1. Adoption
2. Agriculture
3. Campaign Finance Reform
4. Child Support
5. Civil Rights
6. Crime
7. Community and Faith Based Initiatives
8. Defense
9. Disabilities
10. Drug Policy
11. Economy, Budget, and Taxes
12. Education
13. Energy
14. Environment and Natural Resources
15. Foreign Policy
16. Health Care
17. Housing / Homeownership
18. Immigration
19. International Trade
20. Labor Relations
21. Medicaid/Medicare
22. Social Security

1. User enters email address into a web form and clicks a submit button

2. User is presented with a "thank you" page that shows their email address and describes the double opt-in process (verbiage to be supplied by you). Below the thank you and double opt-in language, the user is presented either:
   - An enticement for personalization, with a choice of going to the personalization forms or returning to the home page.
   - An enticement for personalization, with the personalization fields available below the thank you, double opt-in, and enticement language.

   The personalization text boxes would be First Name, Last Name, and Zip Code. Check boxes related to subjects will be available for users to indicate their interests. (Subjects to be supplied by OSI) Demonstration form will have one subject checkbox.

   User fills in form and indicates subject interest via a check box, then clicks "submit" button or, if no personalization is desired, clicks on a button to return to the home page.

   2.a. (only if no personalization) User receives an email asking them to confirm their desire to receive email updates.

   2.b. User replies affirmatively and their email address is added to the list of subscribers.

3. User is presented with a confirmation page showing their e-mail address as well as the fields they have filled in. They are asked to confirm their information and click "submit" if correct, or click "go back" if corrections are needed. Process loops until "submit" is clicked.

4. User is presented with a "thank you" page (verbiage to be supplied by OSI) with a link to the home page.

5. User receives an email asking them to confirm their desire to receive email updates.

6. User replies affirmatively and their email address is added to the list of subscribers.

OFFICE OF STRATEGIC INITIATVES

September 19, 2001

MEMORANDUM FOR TIM CAMPEN

THROUGH: BARRY JACKSON AND TUCKER ESKEW

FROM: NEIL ZIMMERMAN, JIMMY ORR, AND JANE COOK

CC: BRETT KAVANAUGH AND MARCUS MOLLMANN

RE: WHITE HOUSE INTERNET CONTENT MANAGEMENT

The Office Media Affairs (OMA) will be responsible for the content management of the White House Web site. All posts to the Web site will need to be approved by OMA.

The Office of Strategic Initiatives (OSI) will be responsible for the content and database design for the White House Web site e-mail distribution system. All e-mail sends and database manipulation will need to be approved by OSI.

OMA and OSI will work closely on e-mail and Web site message coordination. The White House Counsel's office will be an integral part of all OMA and OSI Internet processes and planning to ensure White House Internet components (Web site and e-mail) receive continual ethical, legal, and privacy review.

The e-mail system should capture e-mail addresses, first name, last name, zip codes and issue categories. The database should be scalable so that additional personalization information can be collected.

Sign-up process attached.

The e-mail system will need to send general updates to the entire list (up to millions of addresses) as well as specialized updates based on user personalization (name, zip code, issue categories, etc.). The e-mail content will be original material, not the automatic generation of documents available on the White House Web site.

While it may not be possible now, the Web site and the E-mail system will need to interact with each other. They should operate from the same database and content management system. The goal: to have a personalization system allowing the Web site experience to mirror preferences indicated via e-mail (link usage, questionnaire responses, etc.) and vice-versa.

E-mail Sign-up Process

Sign-Up Box in Web site Header or Sidebar

I. Insert E-mail address and click submit
II. Pop-up confirmation box
    A. Thank you for submitting (show address submitted)
    B. Want Personalized updates?
        1. Click here to find out how to:
            a. Get localized information
            b. Be addressed by name
            c. Choose your own issue categories
III. End of process OR click through to personalization page (Item II,B below)

WH News Sign-Up Page

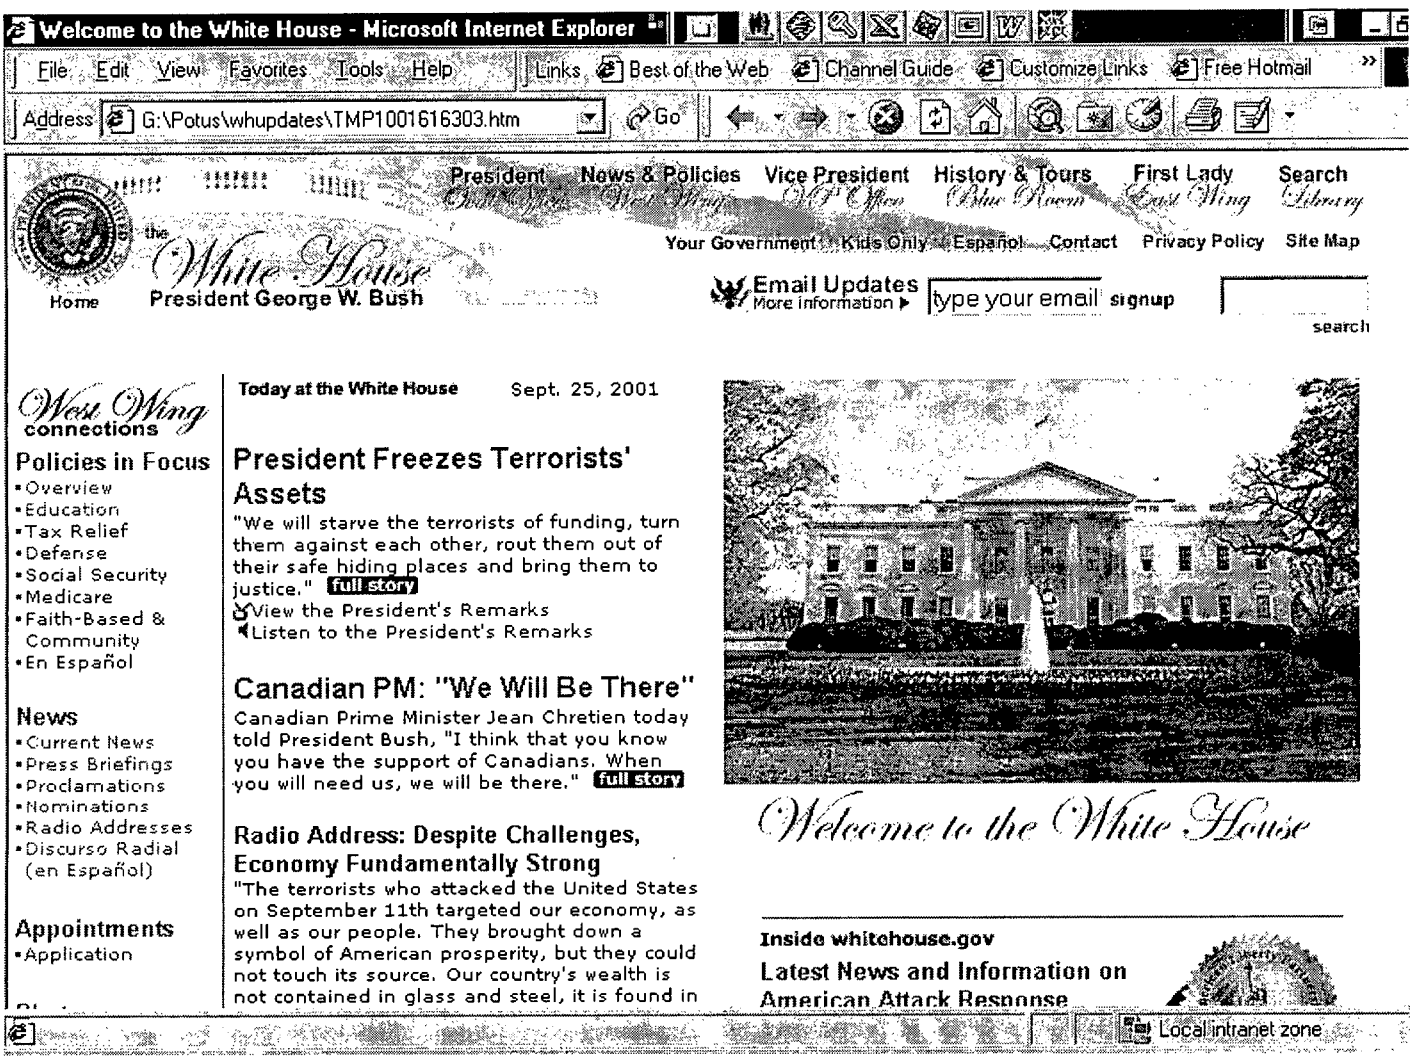
I. Insert E-mail address and click submit
II. Go to Confirmation page:
    A. Thank you for submitting (show address submitted)
    B. Want to personalize your updates?
        1. Zip Code
            a. Get information that is relevant to your area.
        2. First and Last Name
            a. Allow e-mails to be addressed to you by name.
        3. Issue Categories
            a. Get special updates based on the topics you choose.
III. End of process if no personalization
IV. Click through to personalization confirmation if personalization selected
    A. Show what personalization has been selected and the information that's been submitted
    B. Click OK to submit or GO BACK to correct
V. End of process once OK selected

Note: Whichever method is used to sign-up, a double opt-in process is required.

Mass Outbound E-mail

Phases:

I. Limited system
   A. Limited changes
      1. Current staff structure
      2. Current Web site and e-mail Listserv
   B. Basic Format
      1. Plain text
      2. E-mail content will be written specifically for e-mail delivery
      3. No automatic content generated based on Web site content
   C. Limited issue categories
      1. General agenda updates
      2. Only top issues available for specified issue updates
      3. Scheduled updates only, no real time content generation
   D. Little information collection, simple personalization
      1. E-mail address
      2. Personalization info: name, zip code and/or issue category



II. Comprehensive system
   A. Significant changes
      1. Structured Internet content and design teams (at least OSI and Media Affairs)
      2. Integrated Content Management system for Website and E-mail
   B. Dynamic Format
      1. Plain text
      2. HTML Web based
      3. AOL friendly HTML
   C. Multiple subject categories
      1. General agenda updates
      2. Specified issue updates, including a more comprehensive list of issues
      3. Automatic "filler" content generated based on personalization information, i.e. general information is replaced if specialized information is available either on the Web site or in original e-mail content
   D. Full Personalization
      1. Basic information collection (email, name, zip code, issue category)
      2. Format of e-mail (plain, html, etc.)
      3. Frequency of updates (scheduled, real time)
      4. Relationship Marketing Option to receive targeted information
      5. Ability for subscribers to view/alter their subscription (myWhiteHouse.gov)
      6. Ability to measure click through rate of each e-mail
      7. Ability to measure click through rate of individual accounts for message targeting

Jane M. Cook
09/27/2001 02:45:55 PM

Record Type: Record

To: Neil H. Zimmerman/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc: Christopher J. Orr/WHO/EOP@EOP
Subject: email updates graphic update

Source: All Sources : News : By Individual Publication : W : The Washington Post
Terms: "susan webber wright" (Edit Search)

The Washington Post, April 14, 1999

Copyright 1999 The Washington Post
The Washington Post

♦ View Related Topics

April 14, 1999, Wednesday, Final Edition

SECTION: EDITORIAL; Pg. A26

LENGTH: 577 words

HEADLINE: President Clinton in Contempt

BODY:

IN WHAT NOW seems that long-ago age of impeachment, it was easy to lose sight of the basic issue: the damage caused by a president's choosing to lie under oath. The president's lawyers used clever wordplay as a distraction, the House managers bumbled into blind alleys. But now Susan Webber Wright, a federal district court judge in Arkansas, has eloquently returned to the central point. With her unsparing order holding President Clinton in contempt of court, Judge Wright has employed that most powerful legal tool -- common sense. Yes, she concludes, the president lied. Yes, this is a serious offense against the judicial system. Yes, the record should reflect that such behavior is unacceptable. This is the judgment that Mr. Clinton's behavior deserved, and it is one that seems likely to stand the test of time.

Mr. Clinton and his defenders have made much of the purported political motives of his accusers in the independent counsel's office and in Congress. Whatever the merits of his complaints -- and we believe they are limited -- Judge Wright cannot conceivably be similarly vilified as a partisan. It was she, after all, who initially ruled that the Paula Jones case should not proceed until Mr. Clinton left the White House -- a ruling reversed on appeal. It was also she who ultimately threw out Ms. Jones's claims without a full trial. She has given the president a fair shake all along the way.

Now she is stating what is, when all the White House obfuscation is stripped away, only obvious. "The record demonstrates by clear and convincing evidence," she says, "that the president responded to plaintiff's questions by giving false, misleading and evasive answers that were designed to obstruct the judicial process." When Mr. Clinton was asked in a sworn deposition whether he had ever been alone with Monica Lewinsky, the judge says, his testimony was "intentionally false." When he was asked whether he had engaged in sexual relations with Ms. Lewinsky, his answers were "intentionally false."

"Intentionally false" -- this isn't the maybe-some-people-could-conclude-that-he crossed-the-line of Mr. Clinton's lawyers. This is, as the judge says, "a willful refusal to obey this court's discovery orders." This is behavior, she spells out, that cannot be tolerated.

The practical consequences of Judge Wright's finding -- fines, legal expenses, appeals -- remain to be seen. But the moral consequences are plain. Mr. Clinton, for all his talk of repentance and soul-searching, never could bring himself to acknowledge the seriousness of his offense against the American judicial system. Now, freed of the political danger of conviction in the Senate, he already has begun a further spinning of the ordeal to which he subjected the nation. Impeachment was no badge of shame, he told us not long ago; he had been honored to defend the Constitution in his impeachment trial.

REV_00265276

We wonder if, as he reads through Judge Wright's ruling, he can still feel his role in all this has earned him any honor. "Sanctions must be imposed," she says, "not only to redress the president's misconduct, but to deter others who might themselves consider emulating the president of the United States by engaging in misconduct that undermines the integrity of the judicial system." Removal from office would not have been the proper remedy, but there had to be a reckoning for Mr. Clinton's conduct. Finally, someone has gotten this right.

LOAD-DATE: April 14, 1999

Source: All Sources : News : By Individual Publication : W : The Washington Post
Terms: "susan webber wright" (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, February 27, 2001 - 7:43 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

Source: All Sources : News : By Individual Publication : N : The New York Times
Terms: "susan webber wright" (Edit Search)

The New York Times, July 30, 1999

Copyright 1999 The New York Times Company
The New York Times

♦ View Related Topics

July 30, 1999, Friday, Late Edition - Final

SECTION: Section A; Page 18; Column 1; Editorial Desk

LENGTH: 339 words

HEADLINE: A Deserved Fine for Mr. Clinton

BODY:
Federal Judge Susan Webber Wright has set an appropriate sanction in directing President Clinton to pay nearly $90,000 to Paula Jones's lawyers for making false statements about his relationship with Monica Lewinsky in the Jones lawsuit. The constitutional and political issues raised by the events that ultimately led to Mr. Clinton's impeachment will long be analyzed by historians. But Judge Wright steered clear of pronouncing judgment on the full harm done to the Clinton Presidency or to the office itself by Mr. Clinton's behavior. Instead she focused on his actions not as a political leader but as a litigant governed by the rule of law.

In April she found him in contempt of court for "giving false, misleading and evasive answers that were designed to obstruct the judicial process." That stark assessment, unvarnished by political spin, now stands as the appropriate legal conclusion about his conduct.

Yesterday, as part of the contempt ruling, Judge Wright ordered Mr. Clinton to pay the Jones lawyers for expenses and attorneys' fees incurred as a result of his false answers to written interrogatories and false testimony during a deposition on Jan. 17, 1998. He had denied ever being alone with Ms. Lewinsky and denied having sexual relations with her. Judge Wright earlier ordered Mr. Clinton to pay $1,202 for the costs the Government incurred when she traveled to Washington to preside over that tainted deposition.

The Jones lawyers had sought nearly $500,000 in costs, but Judge Wright ruled that the sanction must be based on actual losses in light of the fact that the parties have already settled the case for $850,000. Mr. Clinton's lawyers did not appeal the contempt ruling, and many may have considered the ruling a symbolic gesture. But the order to pay goes beyond symbolism. The $90,000 penalty sends a clear message that even a President cannot get away with intentional falsehoods under oath. It may also deter ordinary citizens from emulating Mr. Clinton's abuse of the judicial system.

http://www.nytimes.com

LOAD-DATE: July 30, 1999

Source: All Sources : News : By Individual Publication : N : The New York Times
Terms: "susan webber wright" (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, February 27, 2001 - 7:48 PM EST

REV_00265278

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

Source: News & Business > News > News Group File, All ⓘ
Terms: justice robert young and michigan (Edit Search)

↶Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

Detroit Free Press MAY 6, 1999 Thursday METRO FINAL EDITION

Copyright 1999 Detroit Free Press
All Rights Reserved

Detroit Free Press
Found on Freep.com
Detroit Free Press

MAY 6, 1999 Thursday METRO FINAL EDITION

SECTION: NWS; Pg. 8B

LENGTH: 529 words

HEADLINE: MISCONDUCT CASE MAY PROCEED RUNCO'S CONCERNS TO BE HEARD, JUSTICES ASSURED BY TENURE COMMISSION

BYLINE: DAVID ASHENFELTER FREE PRESS STAFF WRITER

DATELINE: LANSING

BODY:
The Michigan Supreme Court appears likely to allow the judicial misconduct case against Dearborn District Judge William Runco to move forward, based on justices' comments during a court hearing Wednesday.

Justice Robert Young Jr. told lawyers for Runco and the Michigan Judicial Tenure Commission that the court halted Runco's case so it could receive assurances that the commission would consider Runco's claim that the incident that prompted the charge is so old, he can't prove his innocence.

"What's missing that requires the further intervention of this court," Young asked Runco's lawyer, Richard Bone of Southfield, after wringing assurances out of the commission's executive director, Allan Sobel, that Runco's concerns would be considered during misconduct proceedings.

Bone and Sobel declined to comment after the 85-minute hearing. Justices didn't indicate when they might decide.

Runco, 42, is accused of enriching himself at the expense of his clients in a 12-year-old real estate deal before he became a judge. The commission says Gerald and Ilene Trifan of Dearborn retained Runco to review a pizza chain's $46,000 offer to purchase their lots in Melvindale.

Instead of representing the Trifans' interests, the commission says Runco secretly teamed with a Dearborn developer who bought the lots for $46,000, resold them for $153,000 and gave Runco a $53,000 cut.

The commission said it learned about the incident from the FBI in late 1997. Trifan's husband died late last year.

REV_00265280

Runco hasn't offered his account of the events, but he says he did nothing wrong. He asked the Michigan Supreme Court to dismiss the misconduct charges on grounds witnesses have died, memories have faded and documents to exonerate him no longer exist. A Supreme Court-appointed fact finder was scheduled to hear the case May 24.

In March, the high court took the unprecedented step of halting the misconduct proceedings and directed both sides to tell justices whether they should adopt a statute of limitations for judicial misconduct in Michigan or allowed judges to raise the so-called laches doctrine to protect judges from stale claims.

The decision fueled considerable speculation in Michigan's legal community that the court's five Republicans, who voted in favor of holding up the case, might be trying to help out a fellow Republican. Runco, a former state legislator, was Gov. John Engler's pick to become a Republican Party nominee for state Supreme Court justice last summer. Runco dropped out of the race after learning of the tenure investigation.

At Wednesday's hearing, Bone said it's unfair to make Runco endure a costly, humiliating and damaging fact-finding hearing because he can't defend himself. Sobel urged the court not to dismiss the case until after the charges are fully aired. After that, Sobel said, the fact finder, the commission and ultimately the Supreme Court can decide whether Runco did anything wrong or whether it was impossible for him to defend himself. Sobel said Runco's stale-claim defense will be considered at every stage of proceedings.

DAVID ASHENFELTER can be reached at 1-313-223-4490.

LOAD-DATE: October 23, 2002

Source: News & Business > News > News Group File, All ⓘ
Terms: justice robert young and michigan (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, June 4, 2003 - 6:37 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2003 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00265281

Source: Legal > States Legal - U.S. > Michigan > Cases > Federal & State Cases, Combined
Terms: department of natural resources and burt township (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*459 Mich. 659, ; 593 N.W.2d 534;
*1999 Mich. LEXIS 1249, **

TOWNSHIP OF BURT, Plaintiff-Appellee, v STATE OF MICHIGAN, DEPARTMENT OF NATURAL RESOURCES, Defendant-Appellant. STATE OF MICHIGAN, DEPARTMENT OF NATURAL RESOURCES, Defendant-Appellant.

No. 111334

SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN

459 Mich. 659; 593 N.W.2d 534; 1999 Mich. LEXIS 1249

June 2, 1999, Decided
June 2, 1999, Filed

PRIOR HISTORY: [1] Cheboygan Circuit Court, Robert C. Livo, J. CAVANAGH and REILLY, JJ. and WHITE, P.J. (Docket No. 200328).

DISPOSITION: Affirmed.

CASE SUMMARY

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: Defendant state environmental agency appealed an order from the Cheboygan Circuit Court (Michigan), which granted judgment for plaintiff township and held that defendant was subject to plaintiff's local zoning laws for its construction of a public boat launch. Defendant claimed it was not subject to local zoning laws where it was inherently immune from local zoning laws and had exclusive jurisdiction over the subject matter.

OVERVIEW: Defendant state environmental agency was required to comply with plaintiff township's local zoning laws in the construction of a public-access boat launch where Mich. Comp. Laws §§ 125.327(2)(b) and 125.321 empowered townships with the right to regulate the development of boating facilities and the township and the legislature did not exempt defendant from compliance with local zoning laws. Defendant began construction of a boat launch without plaintiff's approval. Plaintiff brought suit, claiming defendant was subject to local zoning laws. The trial court entered judgment for plaintiff, holding plaintiff could not prevent construction, but defendant was subject to the zoning laws. Defendant appealed and the appellate court affirmed. Defendant again appealed. The reviewing court affirmed, holding where state law gave townships the right to govern the use and development of boating facilities and no clear legislative intent existed to exempt defendant from such laws, defendant was required to comply with local zoning laws. State laws did not give defendant exclusive jurisdiction over the subject matter.

OUTCOME: The reviewing court affirmed the appellate court's affirmance of a judgment in plaintiff township's favor in a zoning action in which defendant state environmental agency sought to build a boat launch. Defendant was subject to local zoning laws where state law gave townships the right to regulate the development of boating facilities and

REV_00265282

C

Following Dearden's example, the appropriate order for the application of that test to our facts would seem to be first to determine whether the Legislature has provided the department claiming exemption from local zoning ordinances a sufficient grant of authority that might support such a claim. Should that be the case, the next step would be to refer to the zoning enabling act to determine if a countervailing intent was present. n1

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 As might be gathered from this, I believe it more correct to analyze the issues in this order than the order in which the majority reviews them. I do not, however, suggest that the order in which the issues are analyzed would be determinative of the result reached in this case. Likewise, the determinative factor in this case for me is not, as the majority suggests, some sort of "presumption" along the lines rejected by Dearden, but rather a careful comparison of the provisions of the NREPA, TRZA and TPA. In viewing these, as required by Dearden to determine the Legislature's intent, I find, much as in Dearden, an expression of legislative intent in the NREPA investing complete jurisdiction in the DNR, and nothing to the contrary in those portions of the TRZA and TPA the majority cites in support of its holding. This finding rests not on a view of "inherent immunity," but rather on the intent of the Legislature as expressed in these competing statutes.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*674] [21]

The DNR's duties are outlined in § 503 of the Natural Resources and Environmental Protection Act (NREPA):

The department shall protect and conserve the natural resources of this state; provide and develop facilities for outdoor recreation; . . . prevent and guard against the pollution of lakes and streams within the state and enforce all laws provided for that purpose with all authority granted by law . . . . The department has the power and jurisdiction over the management, control, and disposition of all land under the public domain, except for those lands under the public domain that are managed by other state agencies to carry out their assigned duties and responsibilities. On behalf of the people of the state, the department may accept gifts and grants of land and other property and may buy, sell, exchange, or condemn land and other property, for any of the purposes contemplated by this part. [MCL 324.503(1); MSA 13A.503(1).]

Also relevant, as acknowledged by the majority, is § 78105 of the NREPA:

The department shall have the following powers and duties:

(a) To acquire, construct, and maintain harbors, channels, and facilities for vessels [22] in the navigable waters lying within the boundaries of the state of Michigan.

(b) To acquire, by purchase, lease, gift, or condemnation the lands, rights of way, and easements necessary for harbors and channels.

* * *

(h) To charge fees for both daily and seasonal use of state-operated public access sites, if the cost of collecting [*675] the fees will not exceed the revenue derived from the fees for daily and seasonal passes. All revenues derived from this source shall be deposited in the Michigan state waterways fund. A seasonal pass shall grant the permittee the right to enter any state-operated public access site without payment of an additional fee. [MCL

REV_00265291

324.78105; MSA 13A.78105.]

Lastly, § 78110 provides:

The Michigan state waterways fund is created in the state treasury. The fund shall be administered by the state treasurer and shall be used by the department solely for the construction, operation, and maintenance of recreational boating facilities, the acquisition of property for the purposes of this part, for grants to local units of government to acquire and develop harbors of refuge and public boating access sites under section 78115, and [23] for the administration of this part. The fund shall receive such revenues as the legislature may provide. [MCL 324.78110(1); MSA 13A.78110(1).]

Thus these provisions, taken together, have the following import: first, the DNR is charged with providing outdoor recreation facilities and, in particular, with both the power and duty to construct harbors and channels for our navigable waterways; second, the DNR may expend funds or otherwise acquire property to accomplish this; and, third, the DNR may raise revenue, by access fees, to further accomplish the above purposes. n2

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n2 I pause to note that this case would seem to center on the DNR's charge to provide harbors and recreational facilities, rather than on its charge to protect the waterways. As the majority demonstrates, the latter issue can be seen, at the level of the DNR, to be a vestige of the Legislature's constitutional mandate to protect the natural resources, Const 1963, art 4, § 52, and another vestige of this mandate can be seen in the zoning enabling ordinances. Hess v West Bloomfield Twp, 439 Mich. 550, 565; 486 N.W.2d 628 (1992). It is important to note, however, that, while Hess dealt with the applicability of a zoning ordinance to a pier constructed for mooring of boats, the pier and land it abutted were under private, as opposed to public, ownership, and thus the issue of a potential conflict between the zoning enabling ordinance and the NREPA was not present.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*676] [24]

I further note that I agree with the majority that while Dearden involved a statute that granted "exclusive jurisdiction" to a department, that is not a mandatory bar that must be hurdled by a department claiming jurisdiction. The determinative factor is whether the Legislature's intent is clear from the statute as a whole, not whether any particular words are present within the statute. In this case, in viewing the various statutory enactments, I find a clear grant of broad-ranging authority to the DNR to provide and maintain access to our navigable waters, and further specific authority for the DNR to provide outdoor recreational facilities.

D

In viewing the Township Rural Zoning Act (TRZA), MCL 125.271 et seq.; MSA 5.2963(1) et seq., and the township planning act (TPA), MCL 125.321 et seq.; MSA 5.2963(101) et seq., and, in particular, the provisions cited by the majority, see slip op at 6-7, I find only a general grant of power to regulate to meet recreational needs n3 and conserve natural resources, n4 as well as a provision that a township's basic zoning plan include subjects pertinent to the future development [25] of the township, which may include, among other things, waterways and waterfront developments. n5 [*677] What I am unable to find in reviewing the TRZA and TPA is the exact thing that eluded the Dearden Court, an expression that either act was intended to subject the department's jurisdiction to provide access to waterways to the myriad local ordinances that exist, in widely varying degrees, throughout our state.

REV_00265292

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n3 MCL 125.271(1); MSA 5.2963(1)(1).

n4 MCL 125.273; MSA 5.2963(3).

n5 MCL 125.327(2)(b); MSA 5.2963(107)(2)(b). I would suggest, however, that a requirement that such pertinent subjects as waterways be included in the basic plan is not, on its face, any sort of enablement of zoning authority over such things. The actual question of the applicability of a local zoning ordinance to a navigable waterway is not before us, and hence I will refrain from further addressing this issue.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

III

In Dearden, the Court noted [26] with concern:

If the department were subject to those ordinances, the underlying policies of the general correctional system could be effectively thwarted by community after community prohibiting the placement of certain penal institutions in appropriate locations. [403 Mich. at 267.]

That is exactly the case here. If the DNR is subject to zoning ordinances in each of the local municipalities that exist throughout the state, local communities could effectively prohibit the placement of public access sites within their communities, thus thwarting the DNR's performance of its legislatively mandated duty.

This case, on its face, would seem to provide an example of just such a danger. Burt Lake is one of Michigan's larger lakes, with, according to the DNR, over 16,700 surface acres. It is not disputed that currently public access to this lake consists of a seven-car/trailer site at one state campground, a twenty-three-car/trailer site at another state campground, and [*678] a number n6 of unimproved road endings that abut the lake. The DNR claims that it has determined that a deficiency of public access facilities exists on the lake. The township disputes this. It would seem [27] clear, however, that, currently, the DNR, by way of the access points at two state parks, is able to provide access to Burt Lake for thirty boats (the obvious corollary to car/trailer parking places provided at the access points). Some indeterminate number of other boats may be able to gain access from the unimproved roadway ends that abut the lake. In any event, it would seem that very few indeed of our state's citizens will be able, on any particular day, to access Burt Lake, unless, of course, they own private property on the lake.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n6 While the parties do not offer an exact number, a review of the township's zoning map would suggest that, at least on paper, twelve road ends are marked as public access sites.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The township lays claim to regulating, through zoning, the land that abuts the lake, while this as a general proposition, is within the authority granted by the TRZA, the effect of this application of zoning power, when applied to the DNR, could well be to frustrate the DNR's attempt to carry out its [28] legislatively directed mandate to provide harbors, channels, n7 and recreation facilities.

REV_00265293

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n7 We are informed by an amicus curiae that the proposed boat launch would entail the DNR dredging a 76 x 332 foot channel.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The Court of Appeals and the majority suggest that the DNR is free to carry out its mandate, but that it must comply with the zoning regulation of the township. Given the posture of this case, the township has not yet had the opportunity to review an application [*679] from the DNR and rule on it. The township's stated position before this Court is that the DNR's proposed access site would be reviewable as a "special land use." The record includes the township's zoning plan, which, in § 5.6, states that the planning commission shall have the "function, duty and power to approve or disapprove" an application for such a permit.

Consistent with its statutory mandate, the DNR has acquired 5.6 acres of land, which includes 362.3 feet of shoreline on Burt Lake. The effect of the majority's decision today [29] is to remove from the DNR its ability to fulfill its legislatively mandated duty to provide access to the lake and, instead, to hinge the performance or nonperformance of that duty on the discretion of a local planning commission. n8 The navigable waterways of this state belong to all the citizens of this state. n9 The Legislature has charged the DNR with providing our citizens with access to their waterways. The Court today grants a local planning commission the ability to veto such endeavors and frustrate both the DNR's lawful activities and the ownership interest of the great majority of our citizens in their waterways.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n8 The record is not clear whether the members of the local planning commission are themselves elected by township citizens, or, alternatively, appointed by elected officials. In either event, it would seem fair to say that such officials are likely accountable to their constituency, the citizens of Burt Township.

n9 Collins v Gerhardt, 237 Mich. 38; 211 N.W. 115 (1926).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [30]

While I am not unmindful of the interests of the township and its citizens in issues regarding access to the lake, and in effecting the underlying purposes of their zoning ordinance, such interests should not be elevated to a point where they might serve to frustrate [*680] the interests of the citizens of this state in their waterways, the DNR's ability to effect its mandate, and the Legislature's interest in seeing its mandate carried out. Within the text of the NREPA, I see no intent to subject the broad mandates of that act to the complete discretion of every local municipality, nor do I find evidence of such an intent in the TRZA or TPA. Furthermore, the Court's decision may well tend to negatively implicate the ability of the vast majority of our citizens to enjoy the waterways of this state.

KELLY, J., concurred with CAVANAGH, J.

Source: Legal > States Legal - U.S. > Michigan > Cases > Federal & State Cases, Combined ⓘ
Terms: department of natural resources and burt township (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, June 4, 2003 - 8:18 PM EDT

REV_00265294

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2003 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

did not exempt defendant from compliance from such laws.

CORE TERMS: township, zoning, ordinance, et seq, waterway, zoning ordinance, legislative intent, local zoning, boat, duty, natural resources, lake, public access, site, exclusive jurisdiction, launch, harbors, exempt, recreation, immune, channel, seasonal, penal, state agencies, public domain, conserve, vest, exemption, acquire, recreational facilities

LexisNexis(TM) HEADNOTES - Core Concepts - ♦ Hide Concepts

Real & Personal Property Law > Zoning & Land Use > Zoning Generally
Administrative Law > Sovereign Immunity
HN1 The legislative intent, where it can be discerned, is the test for determining whether a governmental unit is immune from the provisions of local zoning ordinances.

Real & Personal Property Law > Zoning & Land Use > Zoning Generally
Governments > Legislation > Interpretation
HN2 The Michigan legislature, through the Township Rural Zoning Act (TRZA), Mich. Comp. Laws § 125.271 et seq., grants significant authority to townships bearing on their right to regulate the use and development of boating and recreational facilities. The TRZA broadly vests authority in townships to regulate land development to meet the needs of the state's citizens for recreation and other uses of land Mich. Comp. Laws § 125.271(1). The TRZA further provides that zoning ordinances shall be based on a plan designed to, among other things, conserve natural resources. Mich. Comp. Laws § 125.273. Indeed, the status and force of this zoning authority is enhanced by Michigan's state constitution. Mich. Const. art. 7, § 34 (1963) provides that statutory provisions relating to townships shall be liberally construed in their favor.

Real & Personal Property Law > Zoning & Land Use > Zoning Generally
HN3 The Township Planning Act, Mich. Comp. Laws § 125.327, provides that a basic zoning plan shall show the planning commission's recommendations for the development of the township and include certain subjects pertinent to the future development of the township, including the general location, character, and extent of, among other things, waterways and water front developments.

Environmental Law > Zoning & Land Use
Governments > Legislation > Interpretation
HN4 There is nothing in the Natural Resources and Environmental Protection Act, Mich. Comp. Laws § 324.101 et seq., that suggests a "clear expression" of legislative intent to vest the Michigan Department of Natural Resources with exclusive jurisdiction over its subject matter.

COUNSEL: Secrest, Wardle, Lynch, Hampton, Truex & Morley (by Gerald A. Fisher and Thomas R. Schultz), Farmington Hills, MI, and Lyon & Ingelson (by Jeffrey T. Lyon), Cheboygan, MI. for plaintiff-appellee.

Jennifer M. Granholm, Attorney General, Thomas L. Casey, Solicitor General, and James L. Stropkai and Stephen M. Rideout, Assistant Attorneys General, Knapps Centre, Lansing, MI, for defendant-appellant.

Amici Curiae:

Kohler & Black, P.L.C. (by Ellen J. Kohler), Traverse City, MI, for Michigan Environmental Council.

Olson, Noonan, Ursu & Ringsmuth, P.C. (by James M. Olson and Christopher M. Bzdok), Traverse City, MI, for Burt Township Association.

Butzel, Long (by James Y. Stewart), Birmingham, MI, for Michigan Boating Industries Association.

Miller, Canfield, Paddock & Stone, P.L.C. (by Larry J. Saylor), Detroit, MI, for Huron-Clinton Metropolitan Authority.

David M. McCleary, Lansing, MI. for Michigan United Conservation Clubs, Federation of Fly Fishers, Anglers of the AuSable, and Michigan Recreation and Parks Association.

Bauckham, [2] Sparks, Rolfe & Thomsen, P.C. (by John H. Bauckham), Kalamazoo, MI, for Michigan Townships Association and Michigan Municipal League Legal Defense Fund.

JUDGES: Chief Justice Elizabeth A. Weaver, Justices James H. Brickley, Michael F. Cavanagh, Marilyn Kelly, Clifford W. Taylor, Maura D. Corrigan, Robert P. Young, Jr. KELLY, J., concurred with CAVANAGH, J.

OPINIONBY: Robert P. Young, Jr.

OPINION: [*661]

BEFORE THE ENTIRE COURT

YOUNG, J.

We granted leave to appeal in this case to determine whether defendant, the Michigan Department of Natural Resources, is required to comply with plaintiff Burt Township's zoning ordinance in constructing a public-access boat launch on the shores of Burt Lake. We conclude that the DNR is subject to Burt Township's zoning ordinance. Accordingly, we affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

In 1989, the DNR obtained title to two lots on Burt Lake n1 for the purpose of constructing a public-access boat launch. n2 Upon learning of the proposed development, the Burt Township zoning administrator sent a letter to the DNR, noting that the project had not been approved by the township zoning board and requesting that the [3] DNR submit an application for the board's review. The DNR responded that it did not need the [*662] board's approval because the DNR was a state agency and local zoning ordinances therefore did not apply to it.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 The lots consist of 5.6 acres, with 362.3 feet of water frontage.

n2 The proposed facility would accommodate fifty vehicles and trailers and would include a "vault toilet."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Burt Township originally filed suit in 1992, requesting a declaratory judgment that the DNR was required to comply with the zoning ordinance. However, Burt Township voluntarily dismissed the lawsuit without prejudice in June 1993. According to Burt Township, it agreed to the dismissal because the DNR indicated that it did not have sufficient funding to complete the boat launch. Moreover, township officials believed that they had reached an informal agreement with the DNR concerning the scope of the project in the event that the DNR later chose to pursue the project.

REV_00265284

In 1995, having obtained the necessary funding, the DNR began [4] construction of the boat launch. However, the DNR did not seek approval from or otherwise notify the township board. As a result, Burt Township filed the instant lawsuit. The township again sought a declaratory judgment that the DNR was required to comply with the township zoning ordinance. The complaint also requested permanent injunctive relief.

Following a hearing, the trial court issued a written opinion. The court held that, while Burt Township could not prevent the DNR from building the boat launch, the DNR had to comply with the township zoning ordinance. The Court of Appeals, over a dissent by Judge White, affirmed. 227 Mich. App. 252; 576 N.W.2d 170 (1997). We granted the DNR's application for leave to appeal. 458 Mich. 865 (1998).

II. Standard of Review

Whether the DNR's construction of the boat launch facility is subject to Burt Township's zoning ordinance is a question of law subject to de novo review. Cardinal [*663] Mooney High School v Michigan High School Athletic Ass'n, 437 Mich. 75, 80; 467 N.W.2d 21 (1991).

III. Analysis

A. Dearden v Detroit--Legislative Intent

We agree with the [5] parties and the Court of Appeals that the present dispute is governed by this Court's decision in Dearden v Detroit, 403 Mich. 257, 264; 269 N.W.2d 139 (1978), in which we held that "*HN1*the legislative intent, where it can be discerned, is the test for determining whether a governmental unit is immune from the provisions of local zoning ordinances."

In Dearden, the Michigan Department of Corrections leased a multiresidential structure from the archdiocese of Detroit with the intent to convert it into a rehabilitation center. However, the Detroit Board of Zoning Appeals denied the archdiocese's request for a variance and permission to change the use of the property. The archdiocese brought suit, seeking to set aside the board's decision. The Department of Corrections intervened. The circuit court and the Court of Appeals affirmed the board's decision denying the requested variance. 403 Mich. at 260-261.

This Court disagreed and held that the Department of Corrections was immune from local zoning ordinances when establishing state penal institutions. Id. at 267. The Court found in the statute establishing the authority of the Department of Corrections, [6] MCL 791.201 et seq.; MSA 28.2271 et seq., "a clear expression of the Legislature's intent to vest the department with complete jurisdiction over the state's penal institutions . . . ." 403 Mich. at 265. Conversely, the Court found nothing in the language of the zoning enabling act, [*664] MCL 125.581 et seq.; MSA 5.2931 et seq., to suggest a legislative intent to subject the department's exclusive jurisdiction over the state's penal institutions, and its duty to coordinate and adjust those institutions as an integral part of a unified, general correctional system, to the many and varied municipal zoning ordinances throughout the state. [403 Mich. at 266-267.]

The Court concluded that Detroit's zoning ordinance was "void to the extent that it attempts to prohibit the use of the subject property as a rehabilitation center." Id. at 267. n3

REV_00265285

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n3 We note that the test enunciated in Dearden, while relatively straightforward in concept, has proven to be difficult to apply. Indeed, the Court of Appeals has issued several published decisions reaching varying conclusions regarding the application of the Dearden test. See, e.g., Addison Twp v Dep't of State Police (On Remand), 220 Mich. App. 550; 560 N.W.2d 67 (1996) (holding that the Department of State Police was not immune from a local zoning ordinance); Lutheran High School Ass'n v Farmington Hills, 146 Mich. App. 641; 381 N.W.2d 417 (1985) (holding that a school district was subject to a zoning ordinance); Cody Park Ass'n v Royal Oak School Dist, 116 Mich. App. 103; 321 N.W.2d 855 (1982) (same); Marquette Co v Northern Mich Univ Bd of Control, 111 Mich. App. 521; 314 N.W.2d 678 (1981) (holding that a state university was immune from the State Construction Code Act, MCL 125.1501 et seq.; MSA 5.2949[1] et seq.). We express no opinion on the results reached in these cases. However, we note that the decisions in Cody Park Ass'n, Lutheran High School Ass'n, and Addison Twp have since been "overruled" by subsequent legislative amendments of the statutes at issue in those cases.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [7]

B. The DNR's Proposed Boat Launch

In order to determine whether the DNR's boat launch is exempt from Burt Township's zoning ordinance, we must, as required by Dearden, examine the texts of the Township Rural Zoning Act (TRZA), n4 which provides Burt Township with authority to regulate land use and development, and the Natural Resources [*665] and Environmental Protection Act (NREPA), n5 which governs the DNR's activities here. n6

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n4 MCL 125.271 et seq.; MSA 5.2963(1) et seq.

n5 MCL 324.101 et seq.; MSA 13A.101 et seq.

n6 We reject at the outset the DNR's claim that the Legislature, through part 301 of the NREPA, MCL 324.30101 et seq.; MSA 13A.30101 et seq., formerly the Inland Lakes and Streams Act, MCL 281.951 et seq.; MSA 11.475(1) et seq., has established in the DNR "an exclusive framework for the protection of the public trust in the waters of this state."

Const 1963, art 4, § 52 mandates that the Legislature conserve and develop the natural resources of the state and provides that such protection is of "paramount public concern in the interest of the health, safety and general welfare of the people." As fully explained below, the Legislature clearly has charged both the DNR, through the NREPA, and townships, through their statutory zoning power, with the protection of natural resources. Indeed, we recognized in Hess v West Bloomfield Twp, 439 Mich. 550, 565; 486 N.W.2d 628 (1992), that by granting townships the authority to promote the public health, safety, and general welfare through enactment of zoning ordinances, the Legislature was complying with the constitutional mandate to protect the environment, including bodies of water, from impairment or destruction.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [8]

1. Township Zoning Authority

HN2

The Legislature, through the TRZA, has granted significant authority to townships bearing on their right to regulate the use and development of boating and recreational facilities such as the one at issue. The TRZA broadly vests authority in townships to regulate land development "to meet the needs of the state's citizens for . . . recreation . . . and other uses of land . . . ." MCL 125.271(1); MSA 5.2963(1)(1). The TRZA further provides that zoning ordinances shall be based on a plan designed to, among other things, "conserve natural resources." MCL 125.273; MSA 5.2963(3). n7 Indeed, the status and force of this zoning [*666] authority is enhanced by our state constitution. Const 1963, art 7, § 34 provides that statutory provisions relating to townships "shall be liberally construed in their favor."

REV_00265286

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n7 Reiterated in this section is the importance of zoning ordinances in meeting "the needs of the state's residents for . . . places of . . . recreation."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [9]

In addition to the broad grant of regulatory authority contained in the TRZA, we also believe the township planning act (TPA), MCL 125.321 et seq.; MSA 5.2963(101) et seq., to be particularly relevant in this case involving waterfront development. HN3 The TPA provides that a basic zoning plan shall show the planning commission's recommendations for the development of the township and include certain subjects pertinent to the future development of the township, including the general location, character, and extent of, among other things, "waterways and water front developments." MCL 125.327(2)(b); MSA 5.2963 (107)(2)(b).

These statutory provisions reveal that the TRZA and the TPA provide townships with extensive authority to regulate the use and development of land within their borders, including waterfront property. Moreover, this Court in Dearden declined to adopt a rule that state agencies have inherent immunity from local zoning ordinances. Dearden, 403 Mich. at 261. Thus, we conclude that it is incumbent upon the DNR to establish a clear legislative intent to exempt the DNR's activities from the Burt Township zoning [10] ordinance. n8 n8 The dissent takes issue with the "order" in which we address the relevant statutes. We believe our analysis to be consistent with Dearden. The dissent, on the other hand, would presume that the DNR, by virtue of its grant of authority under the NREPA, is exempt from local zoning ordinances unless a contrary intent is stated in the TRZA. This is tantamount to a rule of inherent immunity that Dearden expressly rejected.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*667]

2. The DNR's Claimed Exemption From Zoning Ordinances

As the Court of Appeals noted, the DNR relies upon three NREPA provisions in support of its claim of immunity. The first is § 503, which provides in relevant part:

The department shall protect and conserve the natural resources of this state [and] provide and develop facilities for outdoor recreation . . . . The department has the power and jurisdiction over the management, control, and disposition of all land under the public domain, except for those lands under the public domain that are managed by [11] other state agencies to carry out their assigned duties and responsibilities. On behalf of the people of the state, the department may accept gifts and grants of land and other property and may buy, sell, exchange, or condemn land and other property, for any of the purposes contemplated by this part. [MCL 324.503(1); MSA 13A.503(1).]

REV_00265287

Section 78105 further provides that the DNR "shall" have the following powers and duties:

(a) To acquire, construct, and maintain harbors, channels, and facilities for vessels in the navigable waters lying within the boundaries of the state of Michigan.

(b) To acquire, by purchase, lease, gift, or condemnation the lands, rights of way, and easements necessary for harbors and channels. . . .

* * *

(h) To charge fees for both daily and seasonal use of state-operated public access sites, if the cost of collecting the fees will not exceed the revenue derived from the fees for daily and seasonal passes. All revenues derived from this source shall be deposited in the Michigan state waterways fund. A seasonal pass shall grant the permittee the right to enter any state-operated public access site without [*668] payment of an additional [12] fee. [MCL 324.78105; MSA 13A.78105.] Finally, at the time that this case arose, § 78110 provided in pertinent part:

The Michigan state waterways fund is created in the state treasury. The fund shall be administered by the state treasurer and shall be used by the department solely for the construction, operation, and maintenance of recreational boating facilities, the acquisition of property for the purposes of this part, and for the administration of this part. The fund shall receive such revenues as the legislature may provide. [MCL 324.78110(1); MSA 13A.78110 (1).][n9]

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n9 We note that the Legislature has since amended part 781 of the NREPA. See 1998 PA 210. Because those amendments became effective on July 1, 1998, they are not applicable to this appeal.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The DNR maintains, and the dissenting Court of Appeals judge agreed, that these various statutory provisions evince a legislative intent that the DNR has absolute authority to [13] provide public access facilities on inland lakes to the complete exclusion of municipal zoning interests. However, we agree with the Court of Appeals majority that, unlike the statute at issue in Dearden, HN4 there is nothing in the NREPA that similarly suggests a "clear expression" of legislative intent to vest the DNR with exclusive jurisdiction over its subject matter and thus to exempt the DNR's activities in this case from the Burt Township zoning ordinance. n10

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n10 We agree with the observation made in the Court of Appeals dissent that the NREPA "sets forth a comprehensive legislative scheme addressing the protection, conservation, and development of the natural resources of this state." 227 Mich. App. at 262 (White, J.). However, we do not accept the dissent's conclusion that such a scheme is "inconsistent with the view that a local unit of government can control public access through local zoning." Id. at 263. The creation of a comprehensive regulatory scheme simply does not, standing alone, equal a grant of exclusive jurisdiction, particularly in light of townships' rival comprehensive regulatory power under the TRZA.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*669] [14]

As an initial matter, we note that the Dearden Court found persuasive to its holding the fact that the statutes establishing the authority of the Department of Corrections explicitly stated that the department had "exclusive jurisdiction" over prison facilities. Dearden, 403 Mich. at 265. Accordingly, Burt Township has argued that the absence of such a term in the NREPA is controlling. We reject this argument. While the presence of such terms as "exclusive jurisdiction" certainly would be indicative of a legislative intent to immunize the DNR from local zoning ordinances, we decline to require that the Legislature use any particular talismanic words to indicate its intent. The Legislature need only use terms that convey its clear intention that the grant of jurisdiction given is, in fact, exclusive. Whatever terms are actually employed by the Legislature, our task is to examine the various statutory provisions at issue and attempt to discern the legislative intent in enacting them.

The DNR places great emphasis on the mandatory nature of the duties expressed in the NREPA, as evidenced by the Legislature's repeated use of the term "shall," as well as the fact that the DNR [15] is given the "power and jurisdiction" to manage and control lands under the public domain. n11 However, we are not persuaded that the Legislature, in directing that the DNR engage in certain governmental functions, intended that the DNR be authorized to do so in any manner it chooses. According the DNR "power and jurisdiction" [*670] to manage land within its control is not the same as granting it exclusive jurisdiction. Thus, the fact that the DNR is mandated to create recreational facilities on public land it manages and controls does not indicate a legislative intent that the DNR may do so in contravention of local zoning ordinances.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n11 "Public domain" is defined by statute merely as "all land owned by the state or land deeded to the state under state law." MCL 324.301(h); MSA 13A.301(h).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

We also find no particular significance in the fact that the TRZA does not expressly provide that state agencies are subject to zoning ordinances. As stated, this Court in Dearden declined to [16] hold that state agencies are inherently immune from local zoning ordinances. Id. at 261. Nor was the Dearden Court persuaded by those foreign decisions finding immunity if, as here, the agency was granted the power of eminent domain. Id. Again, the issue is one "not of absolute governmental immunity, but rather of legislative intent." Id. at 265.

Further supporting our conclusion that the DNR is not immune from local ordinances enacted under the TRZA is the fact that the TRZA itself expressly exempts from local control or regulation "the drilling, completion, or operation of oil or gas wells" as well as the location of such wells. MCL 125.271(1); MSA 5.2963(1)(1). The TRZA instead vests jurisdiction over wells "exclusively in the supervisor of wells of this state . . . ." Id. The TRZA further exempts from zoning ordinances a "state licensed residential facility." MCL 125.286a; MSA 5.2963 (16a). As such, the Legislature has demonstrated that it was aware of overriding land-use issues that warranted specific exemption from local regulation, but provided no such exemption for the DNR's [17] activities. This fact provides additional assurance that there was no legislative intent to exempt the DNR here.

[*671]

IV. Conclusion

In sum, the NREPA and the TRZA appear to provide coextensive statutory rights concerning the protection of natural resources in general and the development of recreation facilities and other waterfront developments in particular. Moreover, nothing in the NREPA establishes a clear expression of legislative intent to exempt the DNR's activities in this case from the Burt Township zoning ordinance. Accordingly, for all the reasons stated, we hold that the DNR, in the construction of its public-access boat launch, is subject to Burt Township's zoning ordinance. The decision of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

REV_00265289

WEAVER, C.J., and BRICKLEY, TAYLOR, and CORRIGAN, JJ., concurred with YOUNG, J.

DISSENTBY: Michael F. Cavanagh

DISSENT:

CAVANAGH, J. (dissenting).

I must respectfully dissent from the conclusion reached by the majority. While we are all in agreement in regard to the principles that form the basis for our analysis, I find the majority's application to be wanting, and fear that the effect of the majority's decision will be to wrest away from the [18] Department of Natural Resources (DNR) a significant portion of its ability to comply with its legislatively issued mandate.

I

I agree with the Court of Appeals, the parties, and the majority, that Dearden v Detroit, 403 Mich. 257, 264; 269 N.W.2d 139 (1978), provides the controlling test on this issue. Therein, we held that "the legislative intent, where it can be discerned, is the test for determining whether a governmental unit is immune [*672] from the provisions of local zoning ordinances." Id. Likewise, this question of law is subject to de novo review. Cardinal Mooney High School v Michigan High School Athletic Ass'n, 437 Mich. 75, 80; 467 N.W.2d 21 (1991). Accordingly, I am able to concur with the majority regarding parts I, II, and III(A) of its analysis.

II

A

With respect to the application of the Dearden test, however, I must part company with the majority. As might be gathered from the "where it can be discerned" language of the Dearden test, determining the intent of the Legislature in situations such as this is often a difficult endeavor. While there are cases where the Legislature has specifically excluded [19] a governmental unit from zoning provisions by including such an exemption in the plain language of a statute, the more common instance is the one that was found in Dearden itself, where no facial exemption exists. In such instances, we are forced to peruse both the statutes relating to the governmental unit's function and the statute that enables zoning to determine whether one contains an implicit legislative grant of superiority, or, alternatively, whether the two appear coequal and thus must coexist.

B

As a benchmark to this endeavor, recall our findings in Dearden. There, we found the statute relating to the governmental unit (the Department of Corrections, [*673] MCL 791.201 et seq.; MSA 28.2271 et seq.) to be "a clear expression of the Legislature's intent to vest the department with complete jurisdiction over the state's penal institutions . . . ." Dearden at 265. At the time, the statute included language that the "department shall have exclusive jurisdiction over . . . penal institutions . . . ." MCL 791.204; MSA 28.2274.

Conversely, this Court found persuasive the absence of any specific expression of legislative [20] intent in the zoning enabling act to subject the department's exclusive jurisdiction to the various local zoning ordinances. In the absence of such an expression, the Legislature's grant of authority to the Department of Corrections was controlling.

REV_00265290

Source: News & Business > News > News Group File, All ⓘ
Terms: justice robert young and michigan (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

Detroit Free Press MAY 27, 2000 Saturday METRO FINAL EDITION

Copyright 2000 Detroit Free Press
All Rights Reserved

Detroit Free Press

Found on Freep.com

Detroit Free Press

MAY 27, 2000 Saturday METRO FINAL EDITION

SECTION: EDITORIAL; Pg. 10A

LENGTH: 1018 words

HEADLINE: FROM OUR READERS;
STATE SUPREME COURT

BODY:
POLITICS, JUSTICES AND RACE
The debate surrounding this year's Supreme Court contests has not been pretty thus far, and it promises to get uglier. There was, however, something particularly disturbing about Trevor Coleman's May 17 editorial page column concerning state Justice Robert Young (" A telling silence speaks volumes on behalf of Brown ruling").

Coleman cautioned Young to note that, although he is African American, no organizations typically supportive of the causes of racial minorities have defended him against the latest attack aimed at him by the Michigan Democratic Party. Coleman's premise is that the color of one's skin dictates one's political agenda or judicial philosophy, under penalty of ostracism.

I don't know what research into Young's background Coleman engaged in, beyond observing that he is a conservative jurist who believes the will of the people, as expressed by the Legislature, should be strictly adhered to.

Does Coleman know, for instance, that Young spent countless hours tutoring minority law students while carrying on a busy law practice? Does he know that Young was a member of the Task Force on Children's Justice concerning child abuse and neglect; that he is a director of Vista Maria, a member of 100 Black Men, a trustee of the Detroit Institute of Children, former general counsel of AAA Michigan, a member of the American Bar Association's minority council, and is on the community leaders council of United Way Community Services? I suspect not. In any event, Coleman argues that one characteristic -- Justice Young's judicial conservatism -- means that he must not be thoughtful, compassionate or sensitive to the concerns of his race. This is, of course, pernicious nonsense, by which he and others attempt to dictate to African Americans what their judicial or political philosophy must be.

Coleman should keep in mind that discrimination is defined as the arbitrary classification of a group of persons. When one classifies on the basis of skin color, as Coleman did in his column, such arbitrary classification is called racism.

REV_00265296

Thomas G. Kienbaum
Former president, State Bar of Michigan
Birmingham

Anti-civil rights record
Your May 12 editorial " Justice Young: Protests over campaign literature seem injudicious" was on target. Justice Robert Young is indignant because his support of Brown vs. Board of Education is being questioned. No matter what Young's position on Brown is, however, he has made it clear through his rulings where he stands on civil rights.

Prior to being appointed to the state Supreme Court by Gov. John Engler, Young's career was spent defending corporations against charges of civil rights violations at a silk-stocking firm and later as vice president and general counsel of AAA of Michigan. In that role, he argued over and over again that claims of race, sex and other types of discrimination should be dismissed. As a Court of Appeals judge and now Supreme Court justice, he has continued in that vein.

While on the Court of Appeals, in numerous cases Young routinely ruled against civil rights plaintiffs. As a justice, he recently voted to let stand a Michigan Court of Appeals ruling that is probably the biggest blow to civil rights in the state of Michigan in the last 20 years (Rembert vs. Ryan's Steak House).

By insisting that he is a supporter of Brown, Young would like us to believe he is a supporter of civil rights. His track record belies this.

Deborah L. Gordon
Attorney, Royal Oak

Racial politics
There can only be great sadness that race has become an issue in this year's Michigan Supreme Court elections. It would be one thing if genuine matters of equality were at stake, but repeated attacks on Justice Robert Young are merely a crude playing of the race card.

As recounted in Trevor Coleman's column, at issue are Young's views of the landmark Brown vs. Board of Education ruling. Coleman is right to say that Young, who supports the outcome, has nonetheless concluded the case was poorly reasoned. I do not share Young's views on this point.

Yet Young's viewpoint is considered respectable by many prominent people in legal circles and does not discredit him from being a judge. Apparently, however, African Americans are not allowed to engage in this kind of analysis. Recent attacks on Young have included outrageous claims that he desires "the elimination of constitutional rights and believe(s) Brown vs. Board of Education was wrong." The head of the AFL-CIO has gone so far as to say that this campaign is about the defeat of the "three white men."

Why have no major civil rights leaders come to Young's defense? Coleman suggests the reason is that, in essence, they believe Young is guilty as charged. It appears that Young's problem is that his independence of mind has made him an outcast among those who toe a single line and accept no dissent. Yet I believe an independent mind is a highly desirable trait in a judge.

Reasoned political debate is at the heart of our system. Racial politics must be put behind us.

Leroy C. Richie

REV_00265297

Dearborn

Immune from rebuke?
I got a kick out of constitutional law professor Robert Sedler's rebuke, in his May 18 op-ed column, of Michigan Justices Clifford Taylor, Robert Young and Stephen Markman (" Activist court shames Michigan"). Sedler bemoaned their "radical departure from the traditional judicial role by ignoring stare decisis, disregarding precedent and even reaching out to overrule prior decisions."

By this logic, I take it that Sedler disapproved, in principle, of repealing alcohol Prohibition, of overturning the constitutional definition of blacks as "three-fifths" of a person, and of overturning Plessy vs. Ferguson ("separate but equal") in favor of Brown vs. Board of Education.

I am reminded of C.S. Lewis' observation that there are critics who "debunk ...values" while "having in the background values of their own which they believe to be immune from the debunking process."

Ronald L. Trowbridge
Vice President for External Programs and Communications, Hillsdale College

GRAPHIC: Drawing TIM BRINTON, Special to the Free Press

LOAD-DATE: January 29, 2002

Source: News & Business > News > News Group File, All ⓘ
Terms: justice robert young and michigan (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, June 4, 2003 - 5:57 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2003 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00265298

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Binder - [P2, P6/B6] + Opinions - Book 2 [1]

OA/NARA#: 2170/2087
9796

Box 64
Folder 9

REV_00265299

Records Management, White House Office of (ORM)
Subject Files

FG006-27
(Office of Senior Advisor - Karl Rove)

518197

OA/NARA #: 10732 / 10790
9708

Box _____
Folder _____

REV_00265413

FOIA Marker

This is not a textual record. This FOIA Marker indicates that material has been removed during FOIA processing by George W. Bush Presidential Library staff.

WHORM

FG006-27

Stack:	Row:	Sect.:	Shelf:	Pos.:	FRC ID:	Location or Hollinger ID:	NARA Number:	OA Number:
W	18	4	5	1	[illegible]		10790	10732

Folder Title:

FOIA

5.18197
FG006-27

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

FACSIMILE TRANSMITTAL SHEET

TO:	FROM:
Paul Gigot	Karl Rove
COMPANY:	DATE:
WSJ	04/16/02
FAX NUMBER:	TOTAL NO. OF PAGES INCLUDING COVER:
(917) 510-2880	6
PHONE NUMBER:	SENDER'S REFERENCE NUMBER:
(917) 510-2821
RE:	YOUR REFERENCE NUMBER:

☐ URGENT ☐ FOR REVIEW ☐ PLEASE COMMENT ☐ PLEASE REPLY ☐ PLEASE RECYCLE

NOTES/COMMENTS:

REV_00265415

http://cantwell.senate.gov/news/releases/2002_03_14_pickering.html

March 14, 2002

Senator Maria Cantwell's Statement on the Nomination of Charles Pickering

Mr. Chairman, I share my colleagues' belief in the importance of the confirmation process. Federal Judges serve for lifetime terms, and are responsible for interpreting our Constitution and our laws in ways that have real implications for the ability of regular Americans to assert their rights.

In evaluating judicial nominations, among the factors I consider include whether the nominee demonstrates:

The highest level of professional ethics and integrity, and have the ability to distinguish between personal beliefs and the issues that come before the court. Unfortunately, I believe Judge Pickering falls short in meeting these criteria. Judge Pickering is an honorable person he is simply the wrong person to fill this very important position.

Like my colleagues, I am troubled by Judge Pickering's handling of the case of United States v. Swann, where a white defendant was tried for burning a cross on the lawn of an interracial couple. Judge Pickering had multiple ex parte conversations with prosecutors and Justice officials in an effort to get the sentence of Mr. Swann lowered. In doing so, Judge Pickering seems to have lost sight of the ethical limitations on his own actions, and the extent to which he was failing to maintain judicial independence. As Brenda Polkey, the victim of the cross burning said, her "faith in the justice system was destroyed" by Judge Pickering's efforts to reduce Mr. Swann's sentence. In every aspect of government we need to work hard and keep faith with the public.

This case indicates how deeply held Judge Pickering's views are, and how far he will go to arrive at an outcome he believes to be correct. The difficulty that he has in keeping his personal views out of his judicial decision making are obvious not only in this case but in several opinions in which he goes beyond the facts of the case to state his belief of what the law ought to be.

Because of this troubling record of not following precedent, and of overstepping ethical bounds to achieve a particular outcome, at his hearing I asked Judge Pickering questions that focused on the right to privacy.

I asked Judge Pickering about privacy as it pertains to consumers' rights-- specifically medical and financial records -- as it pertains to an individual's right to privacy in the context of government surveillance, and with regard to a woman's right to make personal decisions about her body. In response, he declined to state whether he believed that any right to privacy was conferred by our Constitution.

While my concern about how Judge Pickering would rule on cases of fundamental privacy rights is not the only factor in my decision to oppose his elevation to the Circuit Court, it is one I believe is important.

The Fifth Circuit covers three states -- Louisiana, Texas and Mississippi - that have each passed more anti-choice legislation restricting a woman's right to make personal choices about her own body than any other states. In fact, all three states continue to have unconstitutional and unenforceable laws prohibiting a woman from receiving an abortion on their books, because the legislature in each of these states will not repeal the laws. This is the context against which we must consider the President's nomination of Judge Pickering.

While Judge Pickering has repeatedly pledged to restrain his personal ideological views and follow the legal precedent of the Supreme Court, given the unique role that the Fifth Circuit plays in protecting not only the constitutional right to privacy enunciated in Roe and affirmed in Casey, but also in protecting women's access to abortion providers in the states within the Fifth Circuit, I am concerned about Judge Pickering's willingness to say where in the Constitution privacy is protected and his willingness to follow the law.

Judge Pickering's actions on the bench reveal at times a lack of understanding of the requirements of judicial ethics and a failure to meet the very highest standards of the legal profession. Judge Pickering has exhibited an inability to distinguish his personal beliefs from judging the issues before the court. Therefore, I can not support his elevation to the Fifth Circuit.

# #

Records Management, White House Office of (ORM)

Subject Files

FG006-27
(Office of Senior Advisor - Karl Rove)

578329

OA/NARA #: 10732/10790
9708

Box _____

Folder _____

REV_00265428

2018-0011-P [ ]

Systematic Processing Marker

This is not a textual record. This Systematic Processing Marker indicates that material has been removed during systematic processing by George W. Bush Presidential Library staff.

Stack: Row: Sect.: Shelf: Pos.:	FRC ID:	Location or Hollinger ID:	NARA Number:	OA Number:
11/4/2/1	9708

Folder Title: ORM
FG006-27
518329

Records Management, White House Office of (ORM)
Subject Files

FG006-27
(Office of Senior Advisor - Karl Rove)

528845

OA/NARA #: 10732/10790
9708

Box _____
Folder _____

REV_00265433

2018-0011-P [ ]

Systematic Processing Marker

This is not a textual record. This Systematic Processing Marker indicates that material has been removed during systematic processing by George W. Bush Presidential Library staff.

Stack:	Row:	Sect.:	Shelf:	Pos.:	FRC ID:	Location or Hollinger ID:	NARA Number:	OA Number:
11	4	2	1		9708

Folder Title: ORM
FG006-27
528845

Records Management, White House Office of (ORM)

Subject Files

FG006-27
(Office of Senior Advisor - Karl Rove)

536006

OA/NARA#: 10734/10792
9710

Box_____
Folder_____

REV_00265436

2018-0011-P [ ]

Systematic Processing Marker

This is not a textual record. This Systematic Processing Marker indicates that material has been removed during systematic processing by George W. Bush Presidential Library staff.

WHORM

FG006-27

Stack:	Row:	Sect.:	Shelf:	Pos.:	FRC ID:	Location or Hollinger ID:	NARA Number:	OA Number:
W	11	4	2	3	9710		10792	10734

Folder Title:

536006

536006

MAYNARD, COOPER & GALE, P.C.

1901 Sixth Avenue North
Suite 2400, AmSouth/Harbert Plaza
Birmingham, Alabama 35203-2618
Telephone: (205) 254-1000
Facsimile: (205) 254-1999

FACSIMILE TRANSMISSION

		FAX NUMBER
TO:	Adam Goldman Associate Director for Public Liaison Office	202-456-2130
CC:	Karl Rove	202-456-1806
	Jack Oliver	202-863-8774
	Scott Talbott	202-289-1903
	Steve Bartlett
	Sam Upchurch	205-326-7751
FROM:	Steve Still
DATE:	April 15, 2003
COMMENTS:	President Bush's Growth and Job Initiative

TOTAL PAGES INCLUDING COVER PAGE: 3 SENT BY: Grace Long

IF YOU DO NOT RECEIVE LEGIBLE COPIES OF ALL PAGES
PLEASE CALL (205) 254-1994

USER NO. 2339 FILE NO. 7008 MATTER NO. 8

PLEASE NOTE: Unless otherwise indicated or obvious from the nature of the transmittal, the information contained in this facsimile message is attorney privileged and/or other confidential information intended only for use of the individual or entity named above. If the reader of this message is not the intended recipient, or the employee or agent responsible to deliver to the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any dissemination, distribution or copying of this communication is strictly prohibited. If you have received this communication in error or are not sure whether it is privileged, please immediatcly notify us by telephone, and return the original message to us at the above address via the U.S. Postal Service at our expense. Thank you.

MAYNARD, COOPER & GALE, P.C.

C.C. TORBERT JR
N. LEE COOPER
FOURNIER J. GALE III
DANIEL H. MARKSTEIN III
THOMAS G. MANCUSO
KIRBY SEVIER
GEORGE G. LYNN
J. HOBSON PRESLEY JR
STEPHEN E. BROWN
CURTIS O. LILES III
ROBERT R. SEXTON
H. THOMAS WELLS JR
JAMES L. GOYER III
STEPHEN W. STILL
A. INGE SELDEN III
LEE E. BAINS JR
TONY G. MILLER
FRANK D. McPHILLIPS
MARETH J. PORTER
J. FARLEY McDONALD III
ALVIN L. FOX JR
WALKER PERCY BADHAM III
DAVID M. SMITH
JARRED O. TAYLOR II
J. MICHAEL SAVAGE
JAMES L. PRIESTER
GREGORY H. HAWLEY[12]
LUTHER M. DORR JR
JOHN N. GOLIS[2]
J. KRIS LOWRY
MARK L. CREW
JAYNA PARTAIN LAMAR
RANDALL H. MORROW
C. MARK STRENGTH

M. BETH O'NEILL
JOHN H. BURTON JR
PATRICK C. COOPER[4]
CYNTHIA G. LAMAR-HART
SCOTT A. ABNEY
GREGORY E. CURRAN
JEFFREY M. GRANTHAM[2]
STEPHEN C. JACKSON[3]
JAMES M. POOL
MITCHELL G. ALLEN
THOMAS H. BRINKLEY
KATHARINE A. WEBER
MICHAEL D. MULVANEY[4]
J. ALAN TRUITT
CARL S. BURKHALTER
SARAH YATES LARSON
THOMAS C. CLARK III
CHRISTOPHER B. HARMON
JEFFREY A. LEE
WARREN B. LIGHTFOOT JR
ROBERT W. TAPSCOTT JR
THOMAS W. THAGARD
S. DOUGLAS WILLIAMS JR
PETER S. FRUIN[4]
T. LOUIS COPPEDGE
TIMOTHY M. LUPINACCI
WILLIAM B. WAHLHEIM JR
JOHN F. DULIN JR
LORRIE L. MARGROVE
ELIZABETH G. BEAUBE
JIM G. McLAUGHLIN
CAROLE G. MILLER
KEVIN W. PATTON
CARRANZA M. PRYOR

JOHN A. SMYTH III[4]
STEPHEN W. STALLCUP
JAMES R. SUSSUM
EDWARD A. MOSS[4]
LAURA A. WOODRUFF[4]
KATHRYN C. PUGH
B. JUDSON HENNINGTON III
JOHN A. EARNHARDT
JOSEPH E. SMITH[4]
BRANNON J. BUCK
ALEXANDER J. MARSHALL III
MARCIE E. PADUDA
JENNIFER R. SMITH
REECE B. ALFORD
STEVEN L. McPHEETERS
HARDWICK C. WALTHALL
STUART D. ROBERTS
ROBERT M. LICHENSTEIN JR
JULIE L. WILSON[4]
MATTHEW W. GRILL
JAMES PHILIP NAFTEL II
DAVID F. DONAHUE
JOY W. BEEDLE[1]
R. ALLEN KILGORE JR
ERIC L. PRUITT
KATIE L. WREELAND
JANELL M. AHMET
A. MICHELLE CLEMON
CATHERINE W. MAIN
ROBERT E. POUNDSTONE IV
CHRISTINE R. STROUD
LUCAS B. GAMBINO
SCOTT S. BROWN
THOMAS J. BUTLER[3]

TIMOTHY W. GREGG[11]
KEVIN W. BEATTY
JOHN T. LANIER
D. BART TURNER
JOHN DAVID COLLINS
GREGORY K. MIXON
ROBERT S. PLOTT[4]
WILLIAM L. CAMPBELL JR
EDWARD M. HOLT
M. LEE HUFFAKER[1]
MELINDA J. LUCAS[1]
KELLY B. RUSNIN
ROBIN A. ADAMS
JOHN B. HOLMES III
JAMES L. MITCHELL
CLAYTON M. RYAN

ATTORNEYS AT LAW
1901 SIXTH AVENUE NORTH
2400 AMSOUTH/HARBERT PLAZA
BIRMINGHAM, ALABAMA 35203-2618
(205) 254-1000
FACSIMILE (205) 254-1999

WRITER'S DIRECT DIAL NO.: (205-254-1097)
E-MAIL: SSTILL@MCGLAW.COM

[1]REGISTERED PATENT ATTORNEY
[2]ALSO ADMITTED IN MISSISSIPPI
[3]ALSO ADMITTED IN TEXAS
[4]ALSO ADMITTED IN NEW YORK AND CALIFORNIA
[5]ALSO ADMITTED IN CALIFORNIA
[6]ALSO ADMITTED IN ARKANSAS AND MISSISSIPPI
[7]ALSO ADMITTED IN NEW YORK AND CONNECTICUT
[8]ALSO ADMITTED IN FLORIDA
[9]ALSO ADMITTED IN GEORGIA
[10]ALSO ADMITTED IN NEW YORK
[11]ONLY ADMITTED IN MARYLAND AND DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA
[12]ALSO ADMITTED IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

April 15, 2003

Via Facsimile
Mr. Adam Goldman
Associate Director for Public Liaison Office
122 EEOB
17th Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, DC 20500

Re: President Bush's Growth and Job Initiative

Dear Mr. Goldman:

Please find the attached letter that Carl Jones, Chairman and CEO of Regions Financial Corporation will send to all 52,000 registered shareholders. The letter will also be sent to all Regions bank presidents within the company's nine state territory to be forwarded to employees and customers. In addition, the letter will go to the client base of Morgan Keegan, a Regions subsidiary and the largest investment-banking firm headquartered in the South.

On behalf of Regions Financial Corporation, I know that the company is pleased that it can assist the Administration with this worthwhile initiative. Please let us know if Regions can be of further help.

We also plan to contact various members of Congress regarding this matter. Moreover, I am copying my good friends Karl Rove and Jack Oliver so that they will be informed of this activity.

Very truly yours,

Stephen W. Still

cc: Karl Rove
Jack Oliver
Steve Bartlett
Scott Talbott
Samuel E. Upchurch, Jr.

Regions Financial Corp.

Post Office Box 10247
Birmingham, Alabama 35202-0247
Telephone 205 944-1300

Dear Regions stockholder:

I am writing to ask that you consider supporting President Bush's growth and jobs initiative currently pending in Congress. I believe that we have a rare and important opportunity before us to provide for a better economic future for all Americans.

As you know, our economy has teetered on the brink of recession during the past three years. While there is no single solution for our nation's slow economic growth, the growth and jobs initiative pending in Congress provides a significant opportunity to place our economy on the road to recovery. The plan would create new jobs for Americans, encourage savings and investment, promote economic growth, and put money back in the pockets of American taxpayers.

In particular, I hope that you will consider supporting the proposal to eliminate personal taxes on corporate dividends. Regions pays what we believe to be a generous dividend of 3.7% to our stockholders. We recognize that dividend payments are an important source of income for many of our stockholders and for 40 million other American families. The proposed elimination of the dividends tax is an acknowledgement by our nation's leaders of the importance of this income to its citizens. Furthermore, the dividends tax is a double tax, as this income is already taxed at the corporate level. The elimination of the tax is expected to create jobs, boost wages and lower the cost of capital for American businesses — meaningful results for all Americans. In addition, by removing the double tax, it should encourage greater dividend payments to stockholders.

If you support the pending jobs and growth proposal and, in particular, the proposal to eliminate the double taxation of dividends, then I urge you to contact your representatives in Congress. You may also voice your support by simply logging onto www.trcdividendbenefits.org.

Thank you for investing in our company and in our country, and for your interest in shaping our nation's economic future.

Best regards.

Sincerely,

Carl E. Jones, Jr.
Chairman and Chief Executive Officer

April 14, 2003

The President of the Republic of Colombia
Alvaro Uribe Vélez

requests the pleasure of the company of

Mr. David Hobbs

at a reception

on Friday, May 2nd
Two thousand and three from six thirty to eight o'clock

Blair House
1651 Pennsylvania Avenue NW
Washington, DC

R.S.P.V. (202) 387-8338 Ext. 320

Business Attire

Due to heightened security please be sure to RSVP and bring a photo ID for clearance.*

Legislative Affairs
Eisenhower Executive Office Building
Washington, DC 20501
Ph: (202) 456-6774 Fax: (202) 456-7017

Office of the Vice President of the United States

Fax

To: David / Eric From: Candi

Fax: 6-1806 Pages:

Phone: Date:

Re: CC:

☐ Urgent ☐ For Review ☐ Please Comment ☐ Please Reply ☐ Please Recycle

if you haven't read this from AJ, you might find it interesting.

HAIR-TRIGGER OUTRAGE IS TIRESOME, DANGEROUS

BY CHARLIE COOK

There is much to love about politics and the people it attracts, but one of the tiresome things about covering politics is the highly selective sense of outrage that exists among political people of all stripes. They're quick to pounce on the slightest transgression—whether real, imagined, or contrived—on the other side of the fence, but are strangely silent when something similar happens on their own side.

Last month, my good friend Stu Rothenberg wrote a dead-on column in Roll Call after Democrats expressed outrage over two comments—one by then-Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., who waxed nostalgic about Strom Thurmond's 1948 presidential campaign, and the other by Rep. James P. Moran, D-Va., who used a poor choice of words in discussing the role of the pro-Israel community in rallying support for war with Iraq. Stu wrote of "the hypersensitivity displayed by self-proclaimed arbiters of political correctness, and in both cases, the reaction is more dangerous than the alleged crimes themselves." This hypersensitivity, he said, was "bound to chill the discussion of issues and create more incentive for the thought police to turn the politically incorrect into political outcasts."

Recently, two more examples of hypersensitivity—one on each side of the aisle—occurred. The first was the GOP reaction to Democratic presidential candidate John F. Kerry's comment that "what we need now is not just a regime change in Saddam Hussein and Iraq, but we need a regime change in the United States." Outraged cries went up, charging that it was treasonous to compare President Bush to Saddam, especially in wartime. I must confess to wincing at the "regime-change" remark that Kerry himself later called a bit "harsh." But because the first and last uniforms I ever wore bore Boy Scout insignia, I give considerable latitude on war-related matters to anyone who has served in combat. As Kerry's campaign press secretary put it, "Unlike many of his Republican critics, Senator Kerry has worn the uniform, served his country, seen combat. So he'd just as soon skip their lectures about supporting our troops."

The Massachusetts Democrat's remarks amused many liberals and Democrats, while conservatives and Republicans (who would never vote for Kerry anyway) were appalled. Most moderates and independents, who will likely decide the 2004 election, won't even be aware of Kerry's candidacy for another six months. And a year from now, few voters will recall his controversial comment.

An alleged gaffe on the Republican side came when freshman Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota told Roll Call, "I am a 99 percent improvement over Paul Wellstone." Democrats pounced, with Rep. Betty McCollum of Minnesota calling on Coleman to apologize. She called the remarks "inappropriate and disrespectful" and "an unnecessary attack on a leader our state continues to mourn." Coleman responded that he should have been clearer: "It was my understanding we were comparing my relationship to the White House to the relationship Senator Wellstone had with this White House." He went on to say he would never want to "diminish the legacy or memory" of Wellstone. Frankly, if Coleman was merely talking about how well he gets along with the Bush White House, his assessment was correct, if poorly phrased. If he was talking more broadly, his critics were right on target.

Senate Minority Leader Thomas A. Daschle, D-S.D., drew fire for saying on the eve of combat in Iraq, "I'm saddened, saddened that this president failed so miserably at diplomacy that we're now forced to war, saddened that we have to give up one life because this president couldn't create the kind of diplomatic effort so critical for our country." Later, Daschle rather lamely claimed that he didn't know war was so imminent. While Daschle was certainly within his rights to criticize the president, his remarks occurred at a time when such attacks should have been muted. The content was not out of bounds, but the timing was.

None of these was a hanging offense, though. The context of Coleman's remarks isn't clear, so it's difficult for an outsider to say whether he was out of bounds. Kerry gave a flip response that probably should have been worded differently, but few of his most vocal critics are in a position to question his patriotism. In Daschle's case, the content was fine, the timing wasn't. In every case, though, the reactions were overblown. ■

The author can be reached at ccook@nationaljournal.com.

REV_00265446

F: FITZGERALD

5 36 04

Chicago Tribune
—ONLINE EDITION—

Sponsored by careerbuilder
THE SMARTER WAY TO FIND A BETTER JOB

http://www.chicagotribune.com/news/local/chi-0304150265apr15,1,2663641.story?coll=chi%2Dnews%2Dhed

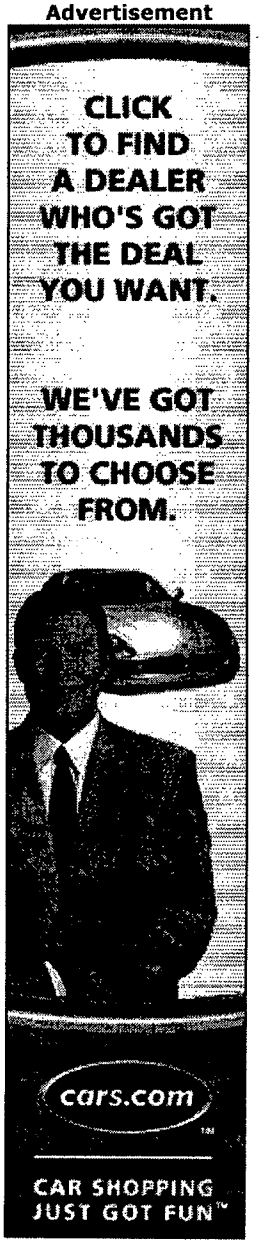
Fitzgerald not going to pursue re-election

By Rick Pearson
Tribune political reporter

April 15, 2003, 3:16 PM CDT

Update: U.S. Sen. Peter Fitzgerald announced this afternoon he will not seek a second term, leaving the Illinois Republican Party scrambling for a candidate in a crucial state for the 2004 elections. The senator said he was concerned about the time he would have to spend away from his wife, his 10-year-old son and his job to campaign.

First-term U.S. Sen. Peter Fitzgerald (R-Ill.) told close associates Monday night that he would not seek re-election next year, saying he had "no fire in the belly" and citing concerns about the personal cost of another campaign and the lament that his independence had left him with few political friends, sources said.



Neither Fitzgerald, 42, nor his top aides responded to requests for comment as questions about his political future swirled from Washington to Chicago. But sources said he began notifying close political supporters of his decision late Monday.

On Tuesday, Fitzgerald plans to make a formal announcement at a luncheon of what was supposed to have been his Chicago-based campaign finance and business leadership committee, the sources said.

The decision by Fitzgerald, a wealthy banking heir from Inverness who was known for bucking the traditional Republican establishment, immediately created the potential for a wide-open GOP primary for the party nomination next March. A handful of Republicans, including businessman Andrew McKenna, had been exploring the possibility of a primary challenge to Fitzgerald.

That list is likely to grow with him out of the race. Former Atty. Gen. Jim Ryan, the unsuccessful GOP candidate for governor last fall, has expressed interest, GOP sources said. Other names being mentioned included former state Sen. Patrick O'Malley of Palos Park and DuPage County Board Chairman Robert Schillerstrom.

Advertisement

Early polling results questioned Fitzgerald's political viability, causing concern in the White House that a weak GOP candidate in Illinois could threaten the party's bare majority in the Senate and undermine President Bush's re-election efforts in a state he lost badly in 2000. Fitzgerald was regarded by many Republicans as the most imperiled of all GOP senators up for election in 2004.

REV_00265447

Publicly, the White House opposed any primary challenge to Fitzgerald. But a Republican close to the Bush administration said efforts had been under way to see if Fitzgerald could be encouraged to drop out.

Fitzgerald served six years in the state Senate before his election to the U.S. Senate in 1998, first bucking the candidate of the GOP establishment in a bruising primary and then defeating first-term incumbent Democrat Carol Moseley Braun by 50 percent to 47 percent in the general election.

Fitzgerald's tenure has been fraught with controversy, which only accentuated deep divisions in a state Republican Party left in shambles following the scandal-clouded rein of former Gov. George Ryan. Fitzgerald and Ryan fought continuously, with the senator demanding federal purchasing rules governing construction of the Abraham Lincoln Library and Museum in Springfield to prevent the former governor's friends from getting beneficial contracts.

That controversy also brought Fitzgerald into conflict with U.S. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Plano. Hastert, a product of the regular Republican organization, berated Fitzgerald for grandstanding.

Two years ago, Fitzgerald went outside the Illinois political spectrum to name assistant federal prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald of New York as the new U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Illinois. Patrick Fitzgerald, who is of no relation to the senator, went on to indict and win convictions of several of George Ryan's associates as part of an ongoing probe into corruption that occurred during Ryan's tenure as secretary of state.

Sen. Fitzgerald also battled Republican business interests as he fought attempts to block the expansion of O'Hare International Airport championed by Ryan and Mayor Richard Daley. Fitzgerald repeatedly vowed a filibuster to block federal legislation to cement the O'Hare project into law. Daley allies, including Democratic U.S. Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, never called the measure for a vote because of Fitzgerald's opposition.

Fitzgerald's decision caught some of his closest friends by surprise. "We had just finished organizing one of his [campaign] finance committees," said state Sen. Dave Syverson (R-Rockford). "I just can't imagine that."

Even with his conservative background, Fitzgerald's tenure in the Senate represented an independent political ideology. Though he sided with Republican conservatives on opposition to abortion and other social issues, Fitzgerald also supported tighter restrictions on guns and had a strong environmental record. Despite intense pressure from the Bush administration, he recently voted against oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska.

All told, Fitzgerald ended up primarily self-financing his first campaign for the Senate and spent more than $13 million of his own money.

Concerns about spending more of his personal wealth were among the reasons he opted not to seek re-election, sources close to the senator said. Although new federal campaign spending laws allow candidates to raise money in greater amounts than he was able to do in his first campaign, Fitzgerald still expected that he would be the primary source for dollars.

Tribune staff reporters Diane Rado and Mike Dorning contributed to this report

Copyright © 2003, Chicago Tribune

REV_00265448

536006

FRANK KEATING
PRESIDENT & CHIEF EXECUTIVE OFFICER
FrankKeating@acli.com

AMERICAN COUNCIL OF LIFE INSURERS
FINANCIAL SECURITY FOR LIFE

February 6, 2003

Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, DC 20500

Dear Karl:

I am writing to request a meeting with you regarding the Administration's proposed economic growth package. I commend President Bush and his team, on behalf of the American Council of Life Insurers ("ACLI"), for leadership on this important initiative. As the fourth largest investor in the US economy, the life insurance industry relies heavily on a strong and growing economy.

With regard to the growth package, the dividends exclusion proposal is praiseworthy. Reducing the cost of capital is something we can certainly support. However, the proposal could have an unintended but very negative effect on the annuities market. Quite simply, such a proposal could immediately and directly extinguish a very important part of our business, one that is integral to another important economic goal – long-term retirement security for individuals.

I look forward to exploring this matter with you in more detail at your earliest convenience.

Sincerely,

Frank Keating

101 CONSTITUTION AVENUE, NW, Suite 700, WASHINGTON, DC 20001-2133
Telephone: (202) 624-2300 Facsimile: (202) 572-4700

ACLI AMERICAN COUNCIL OF LIFE INSURERS FINANCIAL SECURITY FOR LIFE

FACSIMILE

To: Karl Rove

Company: The White House

Phone: 202-456-2108

Fax: 202-456-0191

From: Frank Keating

President & Chief Executive Officer

American Council of Life Insurers

101 Constitution Avenue, NW, Suite 700

Washington, D.C. 20001-2133

Phone: (202) 624-2300

Fax: (202) 572-4700

Email: FrankKeating@acli.com

Date: February 6, 2003

Pages: 2 (including cover)

THIS MESSAGE IS INTENDED FOR THE USE OF THE INDIVIDUAL OR ENTITY TO WHICH IT IS ADDRESSED AND MAY CONTAIN INFORMATION THAT IS PRIVILEGED, CONFIDENTIAL AND EXEMPT FROM DISCLOSURE. If the reader of this message is not the intended recipient or an employee or agent responsible for delivering the message to the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any dissemination, distribution, or copying of this communication is strictly prohibited Any adherent receipt by you of such confidential information is not intended to constitute a waiver of any privilege. If you have received this communication in error, please notify us immediately via telephone and return the original message to us by mail. Thank you.

Ralston, Susan B. 536006

From: Karl Rove [KR@georgewbush.com]
Sent: Tuesday, April 08, 2003 7:34 AM
To: Ralston, Susan B.
Subject: Fw: The Press & The War: April 7, 2003

-----Original Message-----
From: Mark McKinnon
To: Tucker Eskew; Peter_H._Wehner@who.eop.gov; Jim Wilkinson; mark Kitchens
Cc: Dan Bartlett; Adam Levine; Scott McClellan; Karl Rove
Sent: Apr 7, 2003 9:18p
Subject: FW: The Press & The War: April 7, 2003

Latest Tessin Report:

The Press & The War: April 7, 2003

Vis-à-vis the war in Iraq, this Dan Balz piece from today's Washington Post (http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/articles/A43777-2003Apr6.html) may not be the most important press of the last three days; but it's still pretty amazing:

The war in Iraq dominates the world's attention and gobbles up television air time and newspaper columns round-the-clock. But at the first in a series of forums for Democratic presidential candidates, Iraq and President Bush's foreign policy took a back seat to the economy, health care and education.

Not one question dealt directly with the war. When Sen. John Edwards (D-NC), the first candidate to participate in the forums, explained his pro-war position to the audience during his opening remarks, he won scattered applause -- not the boos he has often heard at such gatherings.

(Thomas Beaumont writes in the Des Moines Register (http://desmoinesregister.com/news/stories/c4789004/20939101.html): "Edwards...fielded questions about health care and a wide array of economic and social issues during a 90-minute town hall-style forum perhaps most remarkable for the absence of any questions about the war in Iraq." Ouch.)

To give Sen. Edwards' experience some perspective, contrast Beaumont's campaign report in the March 16 Register: "Democrats are finding, despite their best efforts in some cases, only one issue matters on the caucus campaign trail right
---
Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld (www.BlackBerry.net)

Ralston, Susan B. 536006

From: Rove, Karl C.
Sent: Monday, April 07, 2003 10:13 AM
To: Ralston, Susan B.
Subject: FW: meeting

see previous message

-----Original Message-----
From: Hennessey, Keith
Sent: Sunday, April 06, 2003 10:35 PM
To: Rove, Karl C.; Buchan, Claire
Cc: Bolten, Joshua B.
Subject: FW: meeting

SF met with Rahn, at Cesar's request. SF agreed to meet with a group of conservatives to talk about Jobs & Growth. Given what happened last time (they leaked stuff from a similar meeting with Larry), I wanted to suggest smaller meetings, but it wasn't appropriate in the meeting for me to interject.

We'll exclude Moore.

Karl -- Do you have any problems with anyone else on Rahn's suggested list?

Claire -- SF is now aware of what happened last time. You'll be invited to sit in, and SF will assume that everything he says will leak.

-kbh

-----Original Message-----
From: PRA 6
Sent: Monday, March 31, 2003 2:01 PM
To: Hennessey, Keith
Cc: PRA 6
Subject: meeting

Dear Keith:

It was a pleasure to have met you on Friday. As we discussed, I suggest you invite the following economists to participate in the meetings. (All of them write frequently on tax and economic issues for the national media, and generally support the Administration.)

Dan Mitchell - Heritage
Alan Reynolds - Cato
Steve Entin - IRET
Kevin Hassett - AEI
Bruce Bartlett - NCPA
Steve Moore - Club for Growth
Larry Kudlow - Kudlow and Cramer
Grover Norquist - ATR
Larry Hunter - Empower America (he also writes Jack Kemp's columns)
David Malpass - Bear Stearns
Richard Rahn - Discovery

Even though I have listed 11 people, given travel schedules and conflicts, I expect you would never have more than 7 or 8 at any particular meeting.

I expect they are all in your data bank - but if you need anyone's contact information please contact Taya Bullard in my office at 703-553-3700.

I look forward to hearing from you.

Best regards,

Richard

REV_00265454

536006

Upcoming Political Travel

Event	Date	Surrogate	Location
Kent County Lincoln Day	4-Apr-03	Karl Rove	Michigan
Fundraiser for Jeb Hensarling	4-Apr-03	Sec. Evans	Dallas, TX
Roundtable with Finance Committee / Grove City College event	9-Apr-03	Karl Rove	Pittsburgh, PA Grove City, PA
Fundraiser for Lisa Murkowski	9-Apr-03	Sec. Abraham	Washington, DC
Republican Women's Federal Fund	10-Apr-03	Mehlman	Washington, DC
American Society of Newspaper Editors / Breakfast with Finance Committee (T)	11-Apr-03	Karl Rove	New Orleans, LA
Berks County Lincoln Day Dinner	11-Apr-03	Mehlman	Reading, PA
RNC Dinner in Palm Beach at Cathy Bailey's home	15-Apr	Gov. Racicot and Lezlee Westine (T)	Palm Beach, FL
Hot Springs, AR Lincoln Day Dinner	15-Apr-03	Mehlman	Hot Springs, AR
Kanawha County Lincoln Day	15-Apr-03	Sec. Evans	Charleston, WV
Brown County Lincoln Day Dinner	15-Apr-03	Mitch	Indiana
Fundraiser for Sen. Kit Bond	16-Apr-03	Sec. Martinez	Kansas City, MO
Cass County Lincoln Day Dinner	16-Apr-03	Mitch	Indiana
Fundraiser for Rep. Bob Ney	17-Apr-03	Sec. Martinez	Logan, OH
Howard County Lincoln Day	17-Apr-03	Mitch	Indiana
Harris County Lincoln Day Dinner	17-Apr-03	Karl Rove	Houston, TX
Fundraiser for Cong. Burr	24-Apr-03	Karl Rove	Winston-Salem, NC
Fundraiser for Boehner/Turner/State-GOP	25-Apr-03	Karl Rove	Dayton, OH
RNC Eagles Spring Meeting- Bush Library	25-Apr-03	41	College Station, TX
Harrison County Lincoln Day Dinner	25-Apr-03	Mitch	Indiana
VA-10 Jefferson Day Dinner	25-Apr-03	Mehlman	Fairfax County, VA
Lincoln Club event	27-Apr-03	Rosario Marin	Pebble Beach, CA
RNC Renewal Dinner at Dwight Schar's house	30-Apr-03	Karl Rove	McLean, VA
Fundraiser for Scott Walker	1-May-03	Karl Rove	Chicago, IL
Meeting with IL GOP Finance Committee	2-May-03	Karl Rove	Chicago, IL
Editorial Board Meeting with Chicago Tribune	2-May-03	Karl Rove	Chicago, IL
McLean County Lincoln Day	9-May	Dep Sec MacKay	Bloomington, IL
Wisconsin State GOP Convention	10-May-03	Sec. Thompson	Milwaukee, WI
Kalamazoo Lincoln Day Dinner	12-May	Mehlman	Kalamazoo, MI
Fundraiser for Sen. Bunning	15-May-03	Karl Rove	Lexington, KY
Iowa Statewide Lincoln Day	16-May	Sec. Evans	Des Moines, IA
Fundraiser for Sam Katz	21-May	Sec. Paige	Philadelphia, PA
Fundraiser for DE GOP	21-May	Sec. Paige	Wilmington, DE
President's Dinner	21-May	POTUS and FLOTUS (T)	Washington, DC
Fundraiser for Bob Peeler	29-May	Karl Rove	TBD, SC
TN Statesmens Dinner	7-Jun	Sec. Martinez	Nashville, TN

REV_00265455

THE WHITE HOUSE 536006
WASHINGTON

Date: 4/1/03

To: Bob McNally

From: Strategic Initiatives Susan P.

x FYI
___ Appropriate Action
___ Direct Response
___ Prepare Response For My Signature
___ Per Our Conversation
___ Let's Discuss
___ Per Your Request
___ Please Return
___ Deadline
___ Other

Comments: _____

_____

_____

REV_00265456

Canadian Electricity Association
Association canadienne de l'électricité

March 28, 2003

Mr. Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
White House
2nd Floor, West Wing
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington DC, 20500

Dear Mr. Rove:

It was a pleasure to hear your remarks on March 26, 2003 at the Edison Electric Institute Policy Forum.

As I mentioned in my brief comments during the Q and A session after you spoke, the Canadian Electricity Association (CEA) released its annual North American Energy paper on March 21, 2003. In the context of increasing regional integration and promoting greater energy security, our paper is titled "Enhancing Opportunities for Cross Border Trade and Environmental Performance." The paper identifies seven areas for enhanced cross-border cooperation, including air issues management, which you made reference to in your remarks. I would encourage you to review the paper, and should you have any questions, feel free to contact me.

Together with our American counterparts, Canadian electricity companies consider the continued integration of the North American energy marketplace a significant priority, in the interests of consumers on both sides of the border. The open and constructive working relationship we have is a vital one that has evolved over decades, and over many hurdles. We want to continue to build on that relationship, and look forward to continuing to work together in delivering on the President's continental energy vision as set out in the "Cheney Report".

Sincerely,

Hans Konow
Canadian Electricity Association

Enclosure

66 Slater Street, Suite 1210
Ottawa, Ontario, K1P 5H1

Tel.: (613) 230-9263
Fax: (613) 230-9326

REV_00265457

Canadian Electricity and the economy

The Integrated North American Electricity Market

Enhancing Opportunities for Cross Border Trading and Environmental Performance

March 2003

Canadian Electricity Association

Canadian Electricity Association
Association canadienne de l'électricité

REV_00265458

THE WHITE HOUSE 536006

WASHINGTON

Date: 4/4/03

To: ~~Mary Ann Hamilton~~

From: Strategic Initiatives Susan Ralston

____ FYI

____ Appropriate Action

X Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: Can you send a POTUS letter?

REV_00265459

THE WHITE HOUSE 536006

WASHINGTON

Date: 4/4

To: ~~Adam Goldman~~

From: Strategic Initiatives Susan

1 FYI

____ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: _____

_____

_____

REV_00265463

CAPITAL TO CAPITAL:

AIPAC'S birthright israel

American Israel
Public Affairs Committee
Political Leadership Development Program

TAGLIT · תגלית birthright israel
www.birthrightisrael.com

REV_00265464

AIPAC

Dear Friend,

AIPAC is now recruiting for its first ever birthright israel mission.

The AIPAC birthright israel trip is open to Jewish young adults, between the ages of 18-26, who are involved in the American political process, and who have not previously traveled to Israel on a peer educational program. This trip is a free gift from birthright israel – a partnership between the government of Israel, local Jewish communities, and Jewish philanthropic partners. Tentative dates for this program, which we are calling "Capital to Capital," are May 25-June 5, 2003.

We are writing to solicit your recommendations of young political professionals – perhaps on your staff – who may be interested in this exciting opportunity. The program will be unlike any other Israel trip being offered, and it will provide valuable reference points for the seminal issues affecting American foreign policy in the Middle East.

This unique experience creates a nexus between participants' political and Jewish identities by fusing their experience in American politics with their first formal experience with the Jewish State. Together, we will visit Israel's most important sites, as well as places associated with the U.S.-Israel relationship. Our proposed itinerary includes: The Israeli Knesset, an IDF army base, the American Embassy in Tel Aviv and American Consulate in Jerusalem, and the Arrow missile defense testing site.

Registration for this program is now open – a short profile and application form, as well as our proposed itinerary, is enclosed. Space will be limited, so it is important that applicants notify AIPAC of their interest as soon as possible by responding to Brian Jaffee, Campus Programming Director, via e-mail: bjaffee@aipac.org or phone: (202) 639-5334. The deadline for applications is Friday, April 11, 2003.

We hope that you know of young political professionals who may be interested in participating, and that you will encourage them to contact us at their earliest convenience.

Sincerely,

Robert Bassin
Political Director

Jonathan Kessler
Leadership Development Director

BOARD OF DIRECTORS

President
Amy R. Friedkin, CA

Chairman of the Board
Tim Wuliger, OH*

Secretary/Treasurer
Herbert D. Katz, FL

Herta Amir, CA
Robert H. Asher, IL*
Paul L. Baker, AZ
Rudy Boschwitz, MN
Beverly B. Cannold, FL
Stanley M. Chesley, OH
David S. Cordish, MD
Melvin A. Dow, TX*
Lewis M. Eisenberg, NJ
Howard E. Friedman, MD
Morton L. Friedman, CA
Joseph B. Gildenhorn, DC
Steven Grossman, MA*
Russell S. Holdstein, CA
Ada Horwich, CA
Howard Jonas, NY
Lionel Kaplan, NJ*
Randall Kaplan, NC
Richard A. Katz, M.D., CA
Michael Levin, NJ*
Mel Levine, CA*
Edward C. Levy, Jr., MI*
Fredric Mack, NY*
Bob Mazer, IL
Paul S. Miller, NY
Mayer Mitchell, AL*
Larry Mizel, CO
Lester Pollack, NY
Abe Pollin, MD
Lee Rosenberg, IL
Nina Rosenwald, NY
Arthur Sandler, VA
Herman Sarkowsky, WA
Eugene Schupak, M.D., AZ
Michael Siegal, OH
Barry J. Silverman, M.D., FL
Priscilla F. Siskin, TN
Jeffrey Snyder, MD
Sandra Stein, CA
David S. Steiner, NJ*
Donna Sternberg, LA
Roselynne Swig, CA
David Victor, MI
Cary Wallin, NH
Larry Weinberg, CA*
Harriet Zimmerman, FL
Mortimer B. Zuckerman, NY

* Presidents Emeriti

Executive Director
Howard A. Kohr

Regional Offices:

Florida:
954-382-6110

Midwest:
312-236-8550

Mountain West:
406-542-2595

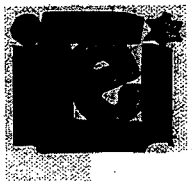
New England:
617-457-8710

Northeast:
212-750-4110

Pacific Northwest:
415-989-4140

Southeast:
770-541-7610

Southern Pacific:
323-937-1184



Southwest:
713-871-1891

Israel:
011-972-2-625-5105

America's Pro-Israel Lobby
The American Israel Public Affairs Committee
440 First Street, NW • Suite 600 • Washington, D.C. 20001 • (202) 639-5200 http://www.aipac.org

Rev. 6/02

REV_00265465

IsraelExperts
The Experts in Educational Travel

CAPITAL TO CAPITAL:
AIPAC'S PROPOSED birthright israel ITINERARY

Day 1 — Check-in for El Al overnight flight to Israel

Day 2 — Arrival at Ben Gurion Airport.
Assistance through customs and transfer to Hotel.
Welcome Dinner with guests from AIPAC Israel Office
Orientation session: getting to know each other and discussing expectations
Overnight - Herzliah.

Day 3 — Breakfast at the hotel and early meeting:
An introduction into Israeli Politics and Society .
Guest Speaker - David Horovitz, Editor of Jerusalem Report

Tour of Tel Aviv and Old Jaffa, including a visit to Rabin Square, and Ben Gurion House.

Visit to the Inter-Disciplinary Center in Herzliah
The War on Terror
Guest Speaker – Boaz Ganor, Director, International Policy Institute for Counter-Terrorism

Visit to American Embassy in Tel Aviv.
Key issues in current U.S.-Israel relations
Guest Speaker - American Ambassador

This evening, Dinner with Young Student Activists – from all parties – an informal opportunity to meet Israel's future Political leaders and get a better understanding of the Israeli Political scene. Dinner to be held either at the home of the American Ambassador or at Tel Aviv University.
Overnight – Herzliah.

Day 4 — Breakfast at the Hotel

The Middle East and U.S.-Israel Defense Cooperation: A Strategic Assessment
Guest Speaker – General Giora Eiland, IDF Chief of Planning

Visit site of one of the U.S.– Israel joint strategic Military projects
Possibly Arrow testing facility.

Tour Beth Hatefutsoth Museum of the Diaspora.
Jewish History and the Connection between Israel and World Jewry
Guest Speaker – Natan Sharansky, Minister for Diaspora Affairs

P.O. Box 298 Gedera 70700 Israel
Telephone: 972-8-867-4343 Fax: 972-8-857-3813 Email: education@israelexperts.com
Toll Free in North America: 1-866-7-ISRAEL

www.israelexperts.com

Visit the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies at the Tel Aviv University
Post Iraq Middle East
Panel of Experts – Moderated by Shai Feldman, Director, Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies

Dinner at the Hotel
Israel Advocacy and Propaganda Response
Guest Speaker – Ross Culiner, Israeli Educator, Advocate, and Guide

Overnight Herzliah.

Day 5. Breakfast at the Hotel
The Israeli Economy and US-Israel Trade Relations
Guest Speaker ....Representative of the Israel-America Chamber of Commerce.

Leave Tel Aviv for the Galilee and visit sites and people illustrating the various connections to this tiny land – Travel past the Crusader ruins of Caesarea, past the Druze Village of Ussafiah and through Haifa with its blend of Jewish, Arab and Christian inhabitants;

Travel through the Lower Galilee and learn about the importance of the Kibbutz Movement in Israel, its place in the development of the State, and the situation of the Kibbutz 50 years after the establishment of the State.

Continue through the Galilee to Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee for a late afternoon special program on "Poets and Pioneers" – who came to settle the land and reclaim their soul... reshaping the land of Israel and its people for the coming generations.

Dinner at a Kibbutz in Galilee

(Campfire with members of kibbutz)

Overnight: Kibbutz

Day 6 Morning –leave the kibbutz and ascend the Golan Heights overlooking the borders with Jordan, Syria and Lebanon.
Security considerations in the North and the strategic Significance of the Golan Heights: Tour the Golan Heights and visit an army base accompanied by an Israel Defense Force spokesman.

After lunch, leave the Galilee and head for Jerusalem stopping at the Machal Memorial which pays tribute to the many volunteers from abroad, and particularly from the US, who contributed to the defense of the country – a time to say "Shehecheyanu" before entering Jerusalem.

Visit the Haas Promenade overlooking the Old City of Jerusalem for a visual introduction to the complexity of Jerusalem in the search for Middle East peace.

Dinner at the Hotel with guest speaker.
Israel in the Media – a discussion and analysis of Israel's changing image.
Guest Speaker – Colonel Miri Eisen, IDF Spokeswoman

Overnight – Jerusalem.

Day 7 Breakfast at the hotel.

Visit Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial, including the Children's Pavilion, and lay a wreath in the Valley of the Destroyed Communities.
While 6 million died....US Policy and Implications of Jewish Powerlessness
Guest Speaker – Ross Culiner, Israeli Educator, Advocate, and Guide

Visit Mt Herzl military cemetery where Israel's top leaders are buried – the price to pay... including Americans who have given their lives during the establishment of the State of Israel.

Dialogue with Congressional Delegation visiting from the U.S.

Early afternoon walking tour through the Nachlaot suburbs to see the ultra-orthodox prepare for Sabbath.

Kabbalat Shabbat: An opportunity to choose to attend synagogue services at one of the many religious streams of Judaism – Hebrew Union of College, Kol Haneshama or the Great Synagogue of Jerusalem.

Dinner at the Hotel and discussion with guest speaker
The Land and the People: The History and Vision of Zionism
Guest Speaker - Rabbi Levi Lauer, Director of Israel-Diaspora Education at the Shalom Hartman Institute or Avraham Infeld

Overnight – Jerusalem.

Day 8 Shabbat –in Jerusalem

Optional – an opportunity for early morning synagogue services.

Join your tour guide on a walking tour through the old city of Jerusalem, entering through the Zion Gate viewing the Jewish Quarter, the Cardo and on to the Western Wall.

Lunch at the hotel

Afternoon, at leisure or free time for family visits

Dinner at Hotel.

Evening hike along the Burma Road, once a strategic thoroughfare for a besieged Jerusalem during the War of Independence. Learn of the important role played by American volunteers who joined forces with the Israelis to defend Jerusalem.

End the evening with a camp-fire and program of Israeli songs that shaped the nation.

Overnight Jerusalem.

Day 9 Breakfast at the hotel and early meeting
Israeli Government Perspective on the Search for Peace...The "Road Map" – where does it lead

(Speaker ...Bibi Nethanyahu/ Dori Gold/Shimon Peres/ David Agoz)

Visit the American Consulate in Jerusalem
American-Palestinian Relations
Guest Speaker...Acting Consul General Jeff Feltman

Visit and tour the Knesset (Israeli Parliament) and meet with Israeli Politicians, including Yuli Edelstein, Shlomo Benizri, Nissim Dahan, Neomi Hazan etc.

Visit with Hillel at the Hebrew University on Mount Scopus and see the Mt Scopus Sinatra Cafeteria, meeting with student political activists of both Jewish and Arab origin.

Dinner at the Hotel.

The Story of Operation Moses; After dinner, hear an amazing and moving account of the operation of bringing thousands of Ethiopian children to Israel, walking for weeks through the deserts of Sudan – accounted by an officer who participated.
Overnight Jerusalem.

Day 10. The Story of Massada
After breakfast, leave the hotel for a thrilling day trip to Massada and the Dead Sea. Ascend Massada from the Roman ramp and tour the remarkable remnants of this fortress, built to escape the invading Roman Forces. Descend and enjoy time floating in the salty waters of the Dead Sea.

Late afternoon, continue on to Kibbutz Nacshon in the Jerusalem corridor, for a farewell dinner including home-made cheese and wine ...

Evening: Evaluation and summary.

Overnight – Jerusalem

Day 11. Transfer to the airport for departure.

CAPITAL TO CAPITAL
AIPAC'S birthright israel MISSION

Participant Application and Profile

NAME:_____

CAMPUS (if applicable):_____

YEAR IN SCHOOL (if applicable):_____

STUDENTS: Please indicate which political organizations you are affiliated with on campus:

AIPAC Student Government College Democrats College Republicans

Other_____

POST-GRADS: Please indicate which political institution/organization you are currently working for:

Congressional Office_____ Executive Branch Dept._____

Political Party_____ Other_____

Please indicate how are you currently registered to vote: Dem. Rep. Ind.

HOMETOWN:_____

EMAIL ADDRESS:_____

PHONE NUMBERS: School:_____

Cell:_____

Hometown:_____

1. Have you ever been to Israel?

   Yes No

   - If so, how many times: _____
   - Please indicate the nature of your trip(s):

     Family High School Mission

     University Program Other_____

2. Do you aspire to a career in politics, public policy, or media?

Yes No

3. Are you considering running for elected office in the future

Yes No

4. Have you ever contributed time or money to an electoral political campaign?

Yes No

5. Do you have any personal contacts within the campus, community, or national media?

Yes No

6. Did you attend AIPAC's Summer or Winter SAI/Saban NPLTS?

Yes No

7. Have you attended an AIPAC Policy Conference?

Yes No

8. Are you currently active in Hillel or Chabad?

Yes No

- If so, please indicate which:

Hillel Chabad

9. Are you affiliated with a campus fraternity or sorority?

Yes No

- If so, which?_____

536006

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

Date: 4/2/03

To: ~~Mary Ann Hennessy~~

From: Strategic Initiatives Susan Ralston

____ FYI
____ Appropriate Action
X Direct Response
____ Prepare Response For My Signature
____ Per Our Conversation
____ Let's Discuss
____ Per Your Request
____ Please Return
____ Deadline
____ Other

Comments: Karl would like a note from POTUS sent.

THE WHITE HOUSE 536006
WASHINGTON

Date: 4/2/03

To: Barry

From: Strategic Initiatives Susan

____ FYI
__✓__ Appropriate Action
____ Direct Response
____ Prepare Response For My Signature
____ Per Our Conversation
____ Let's Discuss
____ Per Your Request
__✓__ Please Return
____ Deadline
____ Other

Comments: Karl would like you to review this draft to determine if it is appropriate.

The 80-20 Initiative, Inc.

http://www.80-20initiative.net

February 22, 2003

Mr. Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
Faxed to 202 456-0191
A hard copy is sent via Express Mail

Dear Mr. Rove:

May we work together to find a win-win situation out of a lose-lose one?

Are you aware that Rep. Howard Coble's recent statement on internment of Japanese Americans could cost President Bush 1.5 million of about 2.0 million Asian American votes in 2004? It is wrecking the grand design and hard work that President Bush and you laid out in late 2000 to attract minority votes.

My name is S. B. Woo, former Lt. Gov. of Delaware (85-89), and currently president of The 80-20 PAC, Inc. 80-20's ability to deliver a bloc vote in the Asian Am. community in a presidential election is proven by two independent research projects. Here are the facts:

1) See results of a large national survey on how AsAm voted in 2000. It was done by group of professors from Utah, Harvard, Yale and Florida and was partlally funded by The National Science Foundation
http://www.80-20initiative.net/NAA_Political_Survey.pdf
Specifically, see parag. 4 of p. 1 on how AsAms "voted by more than 2 to 1 for Gore. See also parag. 6 of p.3 where 80-20 was specifically mentioned. At the time 80-20 was only 2 years old. We are now 4.5 years old and much stronger.

2) A book by 3 Syracuse Univ. professors, entitled "Click on Democracy," ranked 80-20 as one of nation's two most effective cyberspace political orgs. in the 2000 election. You probably know 1 of the authors, Steve Davis who used to be the national news editor of "USA Today."
http://www.amazon.com/exec/obidos/ASIN/0813340055/qid%3D10251
98992/ref%3D%3Dsr%5F11%5F0%5F1/104-8613051-5694362

In 2000, 80-20 had only 300,000 valid AsAm e-mail addresses. Today, we have 600,000 and can reach all of them via e-mail in one day.

Why are we so worked up over Rep. Coble's statement?

Let me share with you our principal "hopes and fears." Our hope is to enjoy equal opportunity and justice. Our fear is that the conservatives in GOP will advocate putting some or all of us in internment camps, if and when, God forbid, we get into a war with some of the Asian nations.

Lastly, let me assure you that 80-20 has no problem endorsing a Republican presidential candidate in 2004, if the Coble episode can be resolved to our satisfaction. From day one, 80-20 has advocated a "SWING bloc vote." Although we endorsed Gore the last time, we are quite prepared to endorse a GOP candidate. The AsAm appointments that President Bush made are deeds that we count strongly in his favor.

I hope you are interested in finding a win-win situation. Please let me know. You will not only be helping to restore the faith of millions of Asian Americans in the GOP but also helping to make America "a more perfect Union." In addition, you may be helping to prevent another minority from voting in a bloc in favor of the Democratic party permanently. If and when the AsAms have voted in a bloc for a Democratic presidential nominee twice in a row, a pattern might begin to set in.

I'll be glad to travel to D.C. to see you. The conversation can be confidential, if you like. If I don't hear back from you, then I also know your answer.

Sincerely,

S. B. Woo

S. B. Woo
President, The 80-20 PAC, Inc.
(302 366-0259 -p or 302 366-0909-fax or sbw@udel.edu)

S. B. Woo

PRA 6

THE WHITE HOUSE 5360006

WASHINGTON

Date: 4/02/03

To: ~~Dan Bartlett~~ Karl Rove

From: Strategic Initiatives

X FYI

____ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: _____

_____

_____

The Dilenschneider Group

XC: Dan Bartlett
(Card retrieval)

April 1, 2003

VIA FACSIMILE (202) 456-0191

The Honorable Karl C. Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
The White House
West Wing, Second Floor
Washington, DC 20502

Dear Karl:

If you think this worthy, would you consider advancing it to the President?

Best regards,

Robert L. Dilenschneider

RLD:llg
Attachment

The Dilenschneider Group, Inc.
MetLife Building, 200 Park Avenue, 26th Floor, New York, NY 10166
212 922 0900 (fax 212 922 0971)

THE WHITE HOUSE 536006

WASHINGTON

Date: 4/3/05

To: ~~Lauren Willson~~ Karl

From: Strategic Initiatives

✓ FYI

____ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: _____

_____

_____

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

536006

Date: 4/3/03

To: ~~Ken Mehlman~~ Karl

From: Strategic Initiatives

X FYI

____ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: _____

REV_00265488

Republican National Committee

Schlapp -
Make sure this layout is ok + consistent w/ what we send the campaign.

Date: 2/6

FAX COVER SHEET

TO: Kate

FAX NUMBER:

FROM: Janice

FAX NUMBER: (202)863-8760

TOTAL NUMBER OF PAGES INCLUDING THIS COVER: 4

IF YOU DO NOT RECEIVE ALL THE PAGES, CALL (202)863-8720

THANK YOU

Kate - This draft is Chairman Correspondence Fach wants Ken to see -- the cover sheet explains letter to NRA members --

310 First Street, S.E. • Washington, D.C. 20003 • 202-863-8720

Feb-06-2003 11:18pm From-CHAIRMANS OFFICE 2028638684 T-165 P.001/004 F-888

REV_00265490

REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE – APPROVAL SHEET

Program:	Direct Marketing / Correspondence
Date:	January 24, 2002
Mail Date:	Varies
Project Name:	Response to NRA post card
Copy Due Date:	February 5, 2002

Background/history: Chairman Racicot is receiving the attached post card that was generated by an NRA mailing. (note: this is a repeat of a similar NRA package from last year.) Attached is response letter as Finance will key names. This first letter does not ask for funds, but names will be added to prospecting.

Note to legal: this will be printed on standard RNC letterhead.

Please call Janice with any questions. Thank you.

CHECK OFF AS APPROPRIATE:

	INITIALS	DATE	COMMENTS:
Finance	[signature]	1/24	_____
Legal	[signature]	1/24/03	_____
Dep. Chairman	[signature]	_____	_____
Chairman	_____	_____	_____
Deputy Finance Director
Program Director	[signature]	1/24

[signature]

Feb-06-2003 11:18pm From-CHAIRMANS OFFICE 2028638684 T-165 P.002/004 F-698

REV_00265491

AN IMPORTANT MESSAGE TO REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN MARC RACICOT

Dear Party Chairman:

As the 108th Congress convenes and we begin to move toward the next presidential election in 2004, please know that my fellow NRA-PVF supporters and I will continue to be vigorously committed to defending the Second Amendment and defeating anti-gun candidates.

Please be advised that NRA-PVF will keep me closely informed of the actions of politicians who ran for office as pro-gun candidates but who fail to keep their promise to support our gun rights. Their betrayal of our trust will be answered at the ballot box.

Sincerely,

Robert J Perkins

Robert J Perkins
Dacula, GA 30019-2562

Additional Comments:

FOLDED Post Card copy

Feb-06-2003 11:18pm From-CHAIRMANS OFFICE 2028638684 T-165 P.004/004 F-698

REV_00265492

THE WHITE HOUSE 536006
WASHINGTON

Date: 4/3/03

To: ~~Ken Mehlman~~

From: Strategic Initiatives Susan

____ FYI

__✓__ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: _____

_____

_____

5 36006

UNIONS AFFECTED BY CREATION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF HOMELAND SECURITY

Labor Organization	Acronym	Affiliation	Number of Bargaining Unit Employees
American Federation of Government Employees	AFGE	AFL-CIO	32,736
National Treasury Employees Union	NTEU	Independent	12,130
National Association of Agricultural Employees	NAAE	Independent	2,032
National Association of Government Employees/ International Brotherhood of Police Officers	NAGE /IBPO	AFL-CIO	572
Metal Trades Council	MTC	AFL-CIO	513
International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers	IAM	AFL-CIO	482
National Federation of Federal Employees	NFFE	AFL-CIO	240
National Association of Plant Protection and Quarantine Service Employees	NAPPQSE	Independent	225
Fraternal Order of Police	FOP	Independent	97
Service Employees International Union	SEIU	AFL-CIO	47
National Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association	MEBA	AFL-CIO	41
United Food and Commercial Workers	UFCW	AFL-CIO	34
International Brotherhood of Boilermakers	IBB	AFL-CIO	24
International Association of Fire Fighters	IAFF	AFL-CIO	19
Federal Law Enforcement Officers Association	FLEA	Independent	15
International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades	BPAT	AFL-CIO	12
Total			49,219

UNION RECOGNITION IN DEPARTMENT OF HOMELAND SECURITY

Structure	Border and Transportation Security											Emergency Preparedness and Response				Chemical, Biological, Radiological, and Nuclear Countermeasures	Information Analysis and Infrastructure Protection
Designated Component	Immigration & Naturalization Service	Customs Service	Animal & Plant Health Inspection Service	Coast Guard (Appropriated and Non-Appropriated)	Coast Guard 3(cont'd)	Coast Guard (cont'd)	Coast Guard (cont'd)	Coast Guard (cont'd)	Coast Guard (cont'd)	Coast Guard (cont'd)	Federal Protective Service	Federal Emergency Management Agency	Federal Emergency Management Agency (cont'd)	Chemical, Biological, Radiological, & Nuclear Response Assets	Office of Health Services, Office of Emergency Preparedness	Plum Island Animal Disease Center	Federal Computer Incident Response Center
Former Agency	Justice	Treasury	USDA	DOT	DOT	DOT	DOT	DOT	DOT	DOT	GSA	FEMA		HHS	HHS	USDA	GSA
Total # of Bargaining Units Employees (Units)	28,095 (3)	11,930 (2)	2,498 (7)	4,224 (45)							786 (6)	1,138 (9)		150 (1)	200 (2)	10 (1)	18 (1)
Unions & Bargaining Units (# of Employees)		NTEU (DC) 11,373					IBB (CA) 10	NAGE (NJ) 34			BPAT (SC) 12				NTEU (DC) 150		NFFE (DC) 18
		NTEU (DC) 557					IBB (WA) 14	NAGE (VA) 30		UFCW (AL) 34	NFFE (DC) 179				NTEU (DC) 50
							NAGE (CT) 85	NAGE (NJ) 87	MTC (MD) 435	SEIU (LA) 47	IBPO (MA) 8
							NAGE (ME) 5	NAGE (MA) 180	MTC (VA) 78		FOP (N. East) 81
			NAAE (DC) 2,032				NAGE (MA) 101	NFFE (MO) 13	IAFF (NY) 10		FOP (TX) 16
							NAGE (MA) 34	NFFE (OH) 28	IAFF (CA) 8		FLEA (PA) 15
			NFFE (AZ) 6				NAGE (MI) 8	NFFE (WI) 2	IAM (NC) 482

KEY

AFGE = American Federation of Government Employees
BPAT = International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades
FLEA = Federal Law Enforcement Association
FOP = Fraternal Order of Police
IAFF = International Association of Federal Firefighters
IAM = International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers
IBB = International Brotherhood of Boilermakers
IBPO = International Brotherhood of Police Officers
MEBA = National Marine Engineers Beneficial Association
MTC = Metal Trades Council
NAAE = National Association of Agriculture Employees
NAGE = National Association of Government Employees
NAPPQOSE = National Association of Plant Protection and Quarantine Office Service Employees
NFFE = National Federation of Federal Employees
NTEU = National Treasury Employees Union
SEIU = Service Employees International Union
UFCW = United Food Commercial Union

Note: There are no bargaining units in the following agencies: Transportation Security Administration, Department of Energy, Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory, Department of Health and Human Services, Civilian Biodefense Research Program; National Biodefense Analysis Center; Department of Defense, National Communication System; Department of Commerce, Critical Infrastructure Assurance Office; Federal Bureau of Investigation, National Infrastructure Protection Center; Department of Energy, National Infrastructure Simulation and Analysis Center; Department of Justice, Office of Domestic Preparedness; Department of Energy, Nuclear Incident Response; Federal Bureau of Investigation, National Domestic Preparedness Office; Domestic Emergency Support Team; and Secret Service.

REV_00265502

536006

Union Recognition in the Department of Homeland Security and the Department of Defense

	DHS	DoD
Total Number of Unions	16	57
Total Number of Bargaining Units	75	1,556
Total Number of Members	12,304*	106,969*
Total Number of Employees Represented	49,219	427,875
Total Number of Overall Employees	170,000	664,348

* OPM does not maintain this data. Estimates are based on 25% union membership.

PRA 6

5 36006

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

FACSIMILE TRANSMITTAL SHEET

TO: Bill Kristol	FROM: Karl Rove
COMPANY:	DATE: 4/8/2003
FAX NUMBER: PRA 6	TOTAL NO. OF PAGES INCLUDING COVER: 3
PHONE NUMBER:	SENDER'S REFERENCE NUMBER:
RE: Dallas Morning News article	YOUR REFERENCE NUMBER:

☐ URGENT ☐ FOR REVIEW ☐ PLEASE COMMENT ☐ PLEASE REPLY ☐ PLEASE RECYCLE

NOTES/COMMENTS:

Dallas Morning News
April 8, 2003

Instructor suspended after extra-credit offer

College class was given option to attend, write about peace rally

By MATTHEW ZABEL
Denton Record-Chronicle

A government instructor at North Central Texas College in Corinth said she was suspended last week for offering her students extra credit for attending an anti-war rally in February.

She said she plans to file a grievance with the college.

"I see it as a way to stop discussion on this topic," said Peggy Connally, the instructor. "In a democracy, I feel that, especially at a college campus, both sides of the issue should be aired."

Ms. Connally, who has taught government for nine years in the North Central Texas College district, said Monday that college officials suspended her April 1, citing several anonymous student complaints about her "unfair teaching and not being a good citizen."

"All I can tell you at this point

See STUDENT Page 2B

REV_00265511

Continued from Page 1B

is there is an investigation ongoing," said Dr. Lee Ann Nutt, provost of the college's Corinth campus. "The suspension with pay from one class is the situation we've got here. It's just from one class. The investigation is ongoing. Nothing has been decided at this time."

Dr. Nutt would not comment on the nature of the investigation and would not give an ending date for the suspension.

In February, Ms. Connally said, she offered an optional extra-credit assignment to her students in Corinth to attend a peace rally in Dallas and write a paper about the event. She offered a different extra credit assignment to her Bowie campus class because the Dallas event seemed too far away to be practical for them.

Dr. David Meernik, chairman of the political science department at the University of North Texas, said he's not sure he agrees that Ms. Connally should have been suspended for that assignment, but perhaps she should have allowed students to pick what type of rally they wanted to attend.

"It's a good idea to let students choose which rallies they want to go to," he said. "You wouldn't dream of telling students they could attend a Republican Party meeting for extra credit but that they can't go to a Democratic meeting."

Faculty members have academic freedom to teach and give credit in the area of their subject matter, said Dr. Richard Rafes, a University of North Texas administrator who also teaches a course in higher education law.

Peggy Connally

"Academic freedom also includes academic responsibility, which means they must be balanced in objectivity," he said.

When she made the assignment, she made it clear that students need not agree with the anti-war viewpoint, Ms. Connally said. At that time, the war with Iraq had not begun, and she knew of no rallies in favor of the war, she said.

"If a student had come to me and said, 'I found this pro-war rally, could we attend that instead?' I would have considered it," she said. "To be fair, you'd have to offer both."

Ms. Connally said she gives a wide range of extra-credit opportunities each semester. She also had given an assignment for students to research the U.S.-Iraq war and to be prepared for a class debate on the subject.

Ms. Connally said she plans to file a grievance internally with the college because she thinks school officials suspended her without due process.

Citing a college policy, Ms. Connally said students were supposed to bring complaints first to their professor, then to the department chairman and then to the dean.

"If those complaints came t the dean or the vice president they should have been referre back to me," she said. "I'm sur prised this particular issue wa taken this far. If the students ha come to me, we could have avoid ed this. This has been blown wa out of proportion."

Metropolitan

DallasNews.com
© 2003, The Dallas Morning News
Assistant Managing Editor/Metropolitan News
Sharon Grigsby 214-977-7693

CONTACT US

Phone: 214-977-8456 Fax: 214-977-8319 E-mail:metro@dallasnews.com
Mail:P.O. Box 655237, Dallas, TX 75265

REV_00265512

THE WHITE HOUSE 536006
WASHINGTON

Date: 4/8/03

To: ~~John Bridgeland~~ Karl

From: Strategic Initiatives

x FYI
____ Appropriate Action
____ Direct Response
____ Prepare Response For My Signature
____ Per Our Conversation
____ Let's Discuss
____ Per Your Request
____ Please Return
____ Deadline
____ Other

Comments: _____

HOW YOU CAN HELP

American Legion Programs, Products & Support Troops and Inspire Communities

Navy photo

Navy photo

DoD photo

AMERICAN LEGION

REV_00265517

536004

GLOBAL BUSINESS COALITION ON HIV/AIDS

Decline declined 4/9/03

Juergen E. Schrempp
Chairman of the Board of Management,
DaimlerChrysler AG
Chairman

Richard Holbrooke
President & CEO

Ben Plumley
Executive Director

Simpson Thacher & Bartlett
Legal Counsel

Mr. Karl T. Rove
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, DC 20500

March 19, 2003

Dear Mr. Rove,

As Chairman and President of the Global Business Coalition on HIV/AIDS, we would like to invite you to be one of our honored guests at our Annual Dinner to be held in Washington, DC on June 11, 2003. Our keynote speaker will be Secretary of State Colin Powell. There will be additional remarks by Senators Frist and Kerry, who are among the leading co-sponsors of the bill supporting President Bush's dramatic State of the Union commitment to fight the disease. The MC will be Glenn Close, and the Invocation will be delivered by the Reverend Franklin Graham. We expect Secretary Powell to make a major statement on the global scourge of HIV/AIDS.

The dinner will be held at the Kennedy Center. Dinner co-chairs will be Senator and Mrs. Jesse Helms, Mr. and Mrs. James A. Johnson and Mr. and Mrs. Franklin Raines. Please let us know if you will attend, and if you wish to bring your spouse or a guest. Our complimentary space will be extremely limited, as we anticipate great interest in this event, especially from the business community.

The GBC is the world's foremost organization of businesses committed to fighting AIDS. We have 107 members with a total workforce of over three million employees in 178 countries, and are growing rapidly. The GBC works closely with UNAIDS, the ILO, the Global Fund, and other international organizations. Our website (www.businessfightsaids.org) carries the most comprehensive information available on how business should participate in the war against AIDS, and it publishes the plans adopted by many of its members as part of their effort to put an end to the pandemic.

Please let us know if you wish to reserve a place (or two) reserved for you at one of our head tables on June 11th. Call (212) 651-6403, or fax: (212) 651-6405.

Sincerely,

Juergen E. Schrempp
Chairman, GBC

Richard Holbrooke
President, GBC

CORPORATE ADVISORY BOARD

Kathy Bushkin
President
AOL Time Warner Foundation

Bertrand Collomb
Chairman and Chief Executive Officer
Lafarge

Douglas N. Daft
Chairman and Chief Executive Officer
The Coca-Cola Company

Mervyn Davies
Group Chief Executive
Standard Chartered Bank

John Demsey
President, M•A•C Cosmetics
and Chairman of the Board,
M•A•C AIDS Fund

Jean-Pierre Garnier
Chief Executive Officer
GlaxoSmithKline plc

Raymond V. Gilmartin
Chairman, President and Chief Executive Officer
Merck & Co., Inc.

Leo J. Hindery, Jr.
Chairman and Chief Executive Officer
Yankees Entertainment &
Sports Networks (YES)

Christopher J. Kirubi
Chairman and Chief Executive Officer
Haco Industries

Jan Leschly
Chairman and Chief Executive Officer
Care Capital

William H. Roedy
President
MTV Networks International

Anthony Ruys
Chairman of the Executive Board
Heineken N.V.

David Stern
Commissioner
National Basketball Association (NBA)

Ratan Tata
Chairman, Tata Sons
Tata Iron & Steel Co. Ltd

Tony Trahar
Chief Executive Officer
Anglo American plc

HEAD OFFICE
1515 Broadway, 45th floor
New York, NY 10036 USA
TEL +1 212 846 5893
FAX +1 212 846 1939

www.businessfightsaids.org

FAX / MEMO FROM MERLE FRASER

536006

TO: MR. CARL ROVE
Office of The President

DATE: 28 Mar 03

Good Morning, Nr. Rove!

Thank you, for your letter ackowledging receipt of the Dr. Jack Wheeler article.

Enclosed is a most important article on Islam's "intentions" for the US, along with two Jack Wheeler articles.

I realize you are busy, but I truly appreciate you and your advice to our President.

Blessings,

Merle C. Fraser, Jr.

PRA 6

PS I am the 70 yr old Korean vet who wrote to you.

ANSWER:

If action is required, please indicate date completed.

FM 12: 04

behind the lines

by Dr. Jack Wheeler

To the Point

In 1991, as the Soviet Union was collapsing and Central Europe was being liberated, I had a meeting in Prague with Martin Palous, Czech President Václav Havel's principal aide and today Minister of Czech Foreign Affairs. He told me the exact moment when he and other Czech anti-communists knew they had a chance to bring freedom to their country.

"The moment was when we heard," he explained, "on secret short-wave radio, Ronald Reagan tell the world that the Soviet Union was an 'Evil Empire.' At last — at last!! — a President of the United States finally..." and Martin pointed straight up with his index finger, then swept it dramatically down in an arc to the table... "touched to the point. Finally, America and the West had found the courage to name the true identity of the Soviet Union. It was then that we knew we had real hope."

For 16 years now, since January 1987, I have been writing this column for Strategic Investment. For 16 years, I have been trying to "touch to the point," to provide the critical insights and identify the fundamental principles of what moves world events. For 16 years I have been faced with the same frustration. It is that this is impossible to do in 800 words a month.

So it is that, with Dan Denning's and Bill Bonner's blessing, I will be making my departure from Strategic Investment. My last monthly column will be in April. Starting that month, I will launch my own electronic newsletter. It will be entitled To the Point.

Trying to decide what to write about this month typifies the problem I have had for so many years. I could write a column entitled "The Lynchpin," about how the overthrow of the Shah in Iran enabled the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the virus of Islamic radicalism to terrorize the world — and how the coming overthrow of Iran's Mullah dictatorship and its replacement with a pro-West democracy will both crash oil prices and drive a stake into the heart of Muslim terror.

I could write a column entitled "War is Peace," about the remarkable parallels between Islamic morality and communist morality. From Orwellian double-think (war is peace, slavery is freedom), to property-is-theft kleptomania (private/non-Muslim property rightfully belongs to the state/Muslims), to a the-end-justifies-the-means moral code, Marx and Mohammed were in striking ways ideological brothers.

I could write a column on "Solar System Warming," about how so-called "global warming" is part of a solar system-wide phenomenon: Pluto is getting warmer, as are Mercury and Neptunian moons, while the polar caps of Mars are retreating several meters per year. You'd be amazed at how easy the solution is to prevent a hotter sun from heating up the Earth. This will, of course, infuriate the eco-fascists for whom "global warming" is a rationale for destroying the prosperity of Western civilization.

I could write a column on the next oil bonanza (it's in West Africa) and how to make a lot of money from it. Or a column on how to destroy North Korea's Yongbyon bomb-making nuclear plant without those stone age fascists in Pyongyang knowing what did it (clue: it's done with Smart Spears). Or a column on why every other Democratic presidential candidate is a joke compared to Joe Lieberman — but why Joe is going to lose anyway to GW in 2004. Or a column on how California is going to rise from Gray Davis' ashes by electing Arnold Schwarzenegger as governor. Or... well, the list is very long.

The world is far, far too big, exciting, and complex for me to cram it into 800 words a month. Plus, it's far too dynamic to stay still for a month. Every month for 16 years now I've written my column, then crossed my fingers that the world would stay put long enough until the lag time between writing, editing, printing, and mailing passed and the issue got into people's hands (normally about two weeks — I'm writing this on Jan. 14).

An electronic To the Point will allow me to provide in-depth analyses and insider nuggets about what moves the world on a continual — and instantaneous — basis. I'm really excited about it — and I hope you would be too. If you are, I'd like you to consider subscribing. We're going to launch To the Point in April. I'd really appreciate it if you were one of our founding subscribers. To be one of them, you can call Pater Patrone at Precision Communications, 301-657-9482.

Not that this means goodbye. Dan Denning made it clear that he wasn't willing to see me ride off into the sunset. It's just that I'll be writing for SI on a periodic, rather than regular, basis. And we've got two more months where "Behind the Lines" will still be there.

By the time you read this, I'll be leading an overland expedition across the Sahara Desert. I'll let you know how it went in the March SI. Then in April, you can join me on another kind of exploration, searching the world where we can touch it to the point. ■ with call options on the indexes. I would NOT go loading up on blue chips (more on that in moment). But if you look at the S&P chart I've included on page one, you'll see that it's looking pretty "toppy" over the short term, even after the rally off the October lows.

REV_00265528

BEAR MARKETS, FROM PAGE 1

And with a longer-term view, note that the S&P's 200-day moving average, which is moving down, lies at 948. The S&P has not traded above its 200-day moving average since late March 2002. Should it test those October lows...there's no telling where the downside is. If you traced the ascent of the index back to the beginning of the mania in 1995, you'd be looking at around 450. Buying long-term, out-of-the money puts is the surest way to take advantage of this.

Right now, out-of-the money S&P puts have large premiums. You're not alone if you're looking to hedge against a big and sudden fall in the index. As of this writing, the June 800s are selling for around $24. If you get closer to being in-the-money, the June 900s will cost you more than double than at $52.

If the Dow retraced back to where it started the hyperbolic part of its rally in 1995, you'd be looking at Dow 3,800.

Going further out in time isn't much help. The September 800 puts are at $36 and the September 900s are at $62. There's a chance these premiums could come down. But if you look to the Dow you'll find more reasonable prices, although because the Dow puts aren't as volatile, you'll also see smaller upside gains if the indexes do move down. The Dow is also bucking-up against its 200-day moving average at 8,911. It hasn't traded above its long-term average since June of last year. And if the Dow retraced back to where it started the hyperbolic part of its rally in 1995, you'd be looking at Dow 3,800.

Now, I know there are a lot of even more negative prognostications about where the Dow is headed. There's also the question of time. It could turn out, as my friends at The Daily Reckoning believe, that this will be a soft, slow-motion erosion of stock prices. It could take 10 years, as it has in Japan. I personally think that external events will shock the system and accelerate the pace of decline. But for now, let's stick with how you can trade it, should it happen in 2003. Remember, this is a trade, not an investment. You may be able to make some money on it. But if you can't afford to lose the money, your best bet is to own a few gold stocks and sit on the sidelines.

That said, the Dow's October low was 7,286. If we look at long-term out-of-the-money puts, we find some reasonable prices in June of this year. For example, the June 2003 76 puts (DJXRX) go for $2.60. Even the June 84s (DJXRF) at $4.50 are reasonable. If you want to go further out, the December 72s (DJXXT) are at $3.60 and the December 80s (DJXXB) are at $5.80.

My recommendation if you're looking for a long-term hedge is to buy the June 76 puts (DJXRX) and the December 72s (DJXXT). I'll track these two puts in the weekly e-mails and in the portfolio page on the Web site (http://www.strategicinvestment.com).

Existing Options Positions

On Jan. 7, I sent an e-mail to subscribers to sell the February '03 Amex Diamond 80 puts (DAVNB). Those puts closed at $.95 that day, which would have left you with a 59%% loss if you got in at the entry price of $2.30. As I told readers, I had hoped to sell the puts on a decline in the Dow, which has since come. But as I advise readers of my trading service, Strategic Trader Alert, if you're going to enter into these positions, keep a mental or actual stop-loss of 25% to prevent yourself from taking an unduly large loss.

I replaced those Diamond puts with a longer-dated put, the June 88s (DAVRJ), entry price $6.30. If you're still in those puts, look to sell them on further declines in the Dow. I'll keep you posted via e-mail. If you didn't buy those puts, refer to the Dow puts above for a newer recommendation. By the way, if you're looking for a good place to get pricing information on the puts I recommend, try http://CBS.marketwatch.com. That's where I get all my ticker symbols (also bigcharts.com), and that's where you can find historical pricing information for the options I recommend.

As you can see, trading options on the indexes still entails risk. If you don't have an e-mail address, I suggest you avoid it. It's too hard to keep up with the movements in the market. I'm not trying to scare you, but if you're playing with money you can't afford to lose, sit these trades out and read what I have to say below for a more conservative way to invest in the "big picture" trend.

The Trade of the Decade Heats Up

The trade of the decade, you'll recall, is to sell stocks and buy gold. Pretty simple. But which stocks to sell? Take your pick. Some short-sellers specialize in picking the sickly and weak stocks in the market. And this works just fine as far as it goes.

I have a much simpler approach. In a bear market, most stocks go down. The stocks that go down the most are usually the ones that went up the most during the bull market. Stocks don't obey Newton's law of gravity exactly. But it's not hard to understand that those who've gone up the most have the sumption, there must always be some diminution in what would otherwise have been the productive funds of the society.

REV_00265529

"With regard to profusion, the principle which prompts to expence, is the passion for present enjoyment; which, though sometimes violent and very difficult to be restrained, is in general only momentary and occasional. But the principle which prompts to save, is the desire of bettering our condition, a desire which, though generally calm and dispassionate, come with us from the womb, and never leaves us till we go into the grave. In the whole interval which separates those two moments, there is scarce perhaps a single instant in which any man is so perfectly and completely satisfied with his situation, as to be without any wish of alteration or improvement of any kind. An augmentation of fortune is the means by which the greater part of men propose and wish to better their condition. It is the means the most vulgar and the most obvious; and the most likely way of augmenting their fortune, is to save and accumulate some part of what they acquire, either regularly and annually, or upon some extraordinary occasions." ■

behind the lines

by Dr. Jack Wheeler

A Positive Scenario for 2003

One hundred and sixty years ago, in 1843, the commissioner of the U.S. Patent Office, Henry Ellsworth, reported to Congress: "The advancement of the arts, from year to year, taxes our credulity and seems to presage the arrival of that period when human improvement must end." (This is the source of the spurious quote attributed in 1899 to Ellsworth's successor, Charles Duell, who never said, "Everything that can be invented has been invented.")

Human improvement did not come to an end in 1843, nor will it in 2003. In fact, I think 2003 is going to be a great year for the U.S. economy. Not spectacular. But I'm willing to bet a glass of Guinness at the Irish Times bar on Capitol Hill that the Dow, S&P 500, and NASDAQ will all be higher at the end of 2003 than they were at the start.

There are two basic reasons for this, and they are both named George W. Bush. GW is determined not to make his dad's mistake, and knows voters must perceive an improvement in the economy for many months, up to a year, before he runs for reelection. Further — and here's the key — his strategy for accomplishing this is to get the government out of the way, stimulating the economy by decreasing tax and regulatory burdens on businesses and investors, and not through socialist subsidies.

In other words, GW's economic policy is to give the real engines of growth — entrepreneurs and small businesses — more freedom to prosper. The timing couldn't be better. The bubble — and its bursting — has come and gone. Both are over. The entrepreneurs who are stepping up now aren't the flashy, arrogant kids of the dot-com Age. They are more sober and experienced, i.e., grown-up. They are coming up with solid technology and business plans that make sense and will make a lot of money.

A good example is Wayne Pierzga. He and his partners are levelheaded engineers who've been around the entrepreneurial block and know the electromagnetic spectrum inside and out. They've got a proprietary technology to capitalize big-time on a niche of the wireless communications market no one else has.

Instead of launching billion-dollar satellites or erecting gazillions of ground-based repeater towers, they're going to put low-cost, lightweight radio repeaters on existing aircraft flying normal flight routes. Such repeaters on only 14 aircraft at any given time (with two ground stations) will give full coverage for the entire United States east of the Mississippi, providing a high-speed (240+kbs DSL equivalent) Internet and voice connection for business jet and commercial airline passengers, and for the entire shipping industry (cargo planes, trains, trucks, and ships).

In talking to Wayne, what struck me immediately was not just the enormous financial potential of his technology but its national security implications. Every one of the countless shipping containers that enters the United States daily is a possible security threat, containing, say, a "dirty bomb" capable of ruining a city. A small tracking device placed on a container signaling Wayne's system will tell the shipper where it is in real time and if it's being opened after customs inspection. Warren Buffet (who owns NetJets), and Fred Smith (who runs FedEx) may have to get in line behind Tom Ridge (who runs the new Department of Homeland Security) to see Wayne.

I found out about Wayne and his company, Aegeus, through a venture capital (VC) firm that specializes in discovering startups with both proven business savvy and proprietary technology with a fabulous upside — the Artemis Strategy Fund in Bethesda, Md. The Artemis team knows what it's doing more than any other VC outfit I'm aware of.

CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE

REV_00265530

A POSITIVE SCENARIO, FROM PAGE 7

Amidst the myriad of VC flameouts and retrenching, Artemis developed a smarter strategy that wasn't impacted like so many recent VC debacles. Give Jim DeMocker a call at Artemis — 301-657-6222 — if you'd like to learn more about Wayne Pierzga's Aegeus or get a report on the Artemis investment strategy.

With GW now running the whole Washington show, he is going to make it far easier for folks like Wayne and at Artemis to revitalize the U.S. economy. The latent ingenuity, creativity, and sheer raw ability of so many Americans is staggering. All they need is for the government to take away the regulatory and tax obstacles it sets on the road. You watch. A lot of these ingenious entrepreneurs are going to be unleashed in 2003, and a lot of investors are going to make money with them. It's our job here at SI to help you be one of them. This is the start of my 17th year for SI, with my first article appearing in the January 1987 issue. I wish you a free, healthy, and prosperous 2003 — and come January 2004, we can talk about it over a Guinness at the Irish Times. ■ doom, boom and gloom report

by Dr. Marc Faber

A Vision of the Future

The rise of China as Asia's dominant economic and political power raises a number of issues. It is obvious that with a population of 1.2 billion, China will be the largest consumer in the world for most goods and services. Already today, China has more refrigerators, mobile phones, TVs, and motorcycles than the United States, and it is only a matter of time before it will have huge markets for just about any product. As a result, its resource requirements will rise very substantially, and Chinese purchases of oil, coffee, copper, grains, and so on will move commodity prices dramatically.

Just consider the following. Asia, with a population of approximately 3 billion people, consumes 19 million barrels of oil daily. By comparison, the United States, with a population of 285 million, consumes about 22 million barrels of oil — that is a per capita consumption more than 10 times that in Asia. However, consumption in Asia is now rising rapidly. China's oil demand has doubled over the last seven years to around 4.5 million barrels a day. In Asia ex Japan, a similar trend can be observed. Therefore, my guess would be that oil consumption in Asia will double again over the next 10 years or so to anywhere between 35 million and 45 million barrels. It is worth noting that if Asian demand doubled to around 40 million barrels per day, Asia's per capita oil consumption would still be inferior to that of Latin America.

This is fairly realistic given Asia's superior growth prospects, rapid industrialization, and the steady increase in the standard of living in countries that have recently opened up, such as China and Vietnam. With a demand of around 45 million barrels of oil a day, Asia will change the geopolitics surrounding the oil-producing regions of the world, as by then Asia's oil demand will be the largest of any economic bloc. Therefore, I expect China to become far more involved in the Middle East and Central Asia in the years to come, which could lead to some additional tensions in this volatile part of the world. In particular, I regard a clash of Chinese interests in the Middle East and in Central Asia with American, as well as possibly Russian, interests as almost inevitable. A doubling of oil demand in Asia will inevitably lead to significantly higher oil prices in the second half of this decade, when total oil production in the world is expected to peak out.

But it is not only in the oil market that Chinese economic growth will be felt. Take, for instance, the per capita consumption of food in China, which I won't compare to food consumption in some Western countries where a large percentage of the population suffers from obesity. If we look at consumption of meat, milk, fish, fruits, and poultry in China, Taiwan, and Hong Kong, it becomes obvious that the rising standard of living in China will lead to very meaningful increases in its purchases of agricultural products in the years to come; sometime in the future, it will have a similar per capita consumption pattern to those in Hong Kong and Taiwan.

Or compare the per capita consumption of coffee in China with that in Western countries. Annual per capita consumption of coffee in Germany amounts to 8.6 kg, in Switzerland to 10.1 kilograms, and in Japan — where coffee consumption has increased rapidly in the last 30 years — to 2.3 kilograms. In China, per capita consumption is just 0.2 kilograms. If China's per capita consumption rose to just 1 kilograms (a little less than in South Korea), then China would have a total consumption of 1.2 billion kilograms compared to a total consumption of around 70 million kilograms in Switzerland!

What I wish to emphasize here is that if standards of living continue to rise in China, the country will have a huge impact on the world's commodity markets a commodit ably. In fa chase of a

as the safe emergence world's do power.

Some question r
China's gr point to th problems problems nancial sy at state-ov underfunc abilities, c growing w tween its lations. I a problems,
around As China.

My be that it is e much mor and highly eigners —
American
cleaners.
which, inc emerging tial in scop can be dea
China has of the caus making ra

Howe
the future crisis, whi with the b however, s financial c century al a civil war bly well be idly growi temporary enon that business c out that th
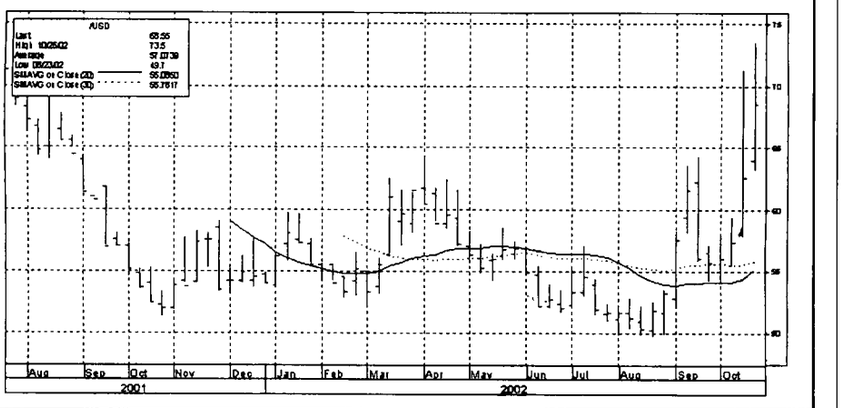
the violen



But in

Dr. M
Ltd., Room
Central, H
9192.

REV_00265531

markets and is likely to push up commodity prices very considerably. In fact, I regard the purchase of a basket of commodities as the safest way to play the emergence of China as the world's dominant economic power.

Asian Demand Driving up Coffee Prices (December 2002 Coffee Futures)

Some readers will, of course, question my optimism about China's growth prospects and point to the large number of problems China is facing. These problems relate largely to its financial system, large bad loans at state-owned banks, underfunded pension fund liabilities, corruption, and the growing wealth inequity between its rural and urban populations. I am very familiar with all of these problems, since I am usually invited to conferences around Asia to present the bearish case about China.

My bearish case, however, rests more on the fact that it is extremely difficult for foreigners to make much money in China because of its deflationary and highly competitive environment in which foreigners — as was the case in the 19th-century American economy — are regularly taken to the cleaners. But in terms of China's own problems, which, incidentally, are endemic to almost all emerging economies, I believe that, while substantial in scope, they can be dealt with. I emphasize can be dealt with, because the problem is that China has so far failed to deal effectively with most of the causes of its problems and has postponed making radical financial reforms.

However, I remain convinced that, sometime in the future, China will experience a serious financial crisis, which will then force its policymakers to deal with the bad loan and pension fund issues. You, however, should not be overly concerned about this financial crisis. The American economy of the 19th century also experienced a series of crises, and even a civil war, and yet its economy performed admirably well between 1800 and 1900. Moreover, all rapidly growing economies experience terrific temporary setbacks from time to time — a phenomenon that was already familiar to the father of the business cycle theory, Clement Juglar, who pointed out that the riches of nations can be measured by the violence of the crises which they experience.

But in terms of China's long-term prospects, I should like to remind you that the U.S. economy also expanded rapidly in the second half of the 19th century — and (this) in a deflationary environment. This was due to several factors, including a rapid increase in its population (rising from 37 million in 1867 to 76 million in 1900), the opening of new territories facilitated by the railroadization of the country, and the application of new inventions to manufacturing, which boosted productivity dramatically. Thus, when we compare the U.S. economy in the second half of the 19th century to China at present, we should not overlook the fact that, in 1850, the U.S. economy was well behind the United Kingdom and the Continent in terms of industrialization; therefore, a catching-up effect came into play.

This is evident when we compare the growth of industrial production in the United States, Germany, and the United Kingdom from 1875 to 1890. In the case of the United States, industrial production grew on average by 4.9% per annum, compared to just 1.2% for the United Kingdom and 2.5% for Germany. America's strong growth in the second half of the 19th century was typical of an emerging economy and is comparable to strong per capita GDP growth in China between 1978 and 1995, averaging more than 5% per annum, while the world's per capita GDP growth only averaged 1.11% over the same period. Moreover, by 1885, the United States, which had hardly any industries at the beginning of the century, led the world in manufacturing, producing 28.9% of the world's manufactured goods, while Britain had been displaced to second, with 26.6%, and Germany to third, with 13.9%. Also, while the United States had produced hardly any cotton around 1800, its plantations supplied five-sixths of the world's cotton by 1860!

The point is simply this: if the United States could become the world's dominant economic power

CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE

Dr. Marc Faber is managing director of Marc Faber Ltd., Room 2705 New World Tower, 16-18 Queen's Road Central, Hong Kong; tel. (852) 2801-5410, fax (852) 2845-9192.

REV_00265532

A VISIONOF THE FUTURE, FROM PAGE 9

by the end of the 19th century from extremely humble beginnings, I think that, with the acceleration of the pace of change that allows regions that open up to industrialize in no time, it is quite probable that within just 10 to 20 years China will be by far the world's most important economy — no matter how many crises it will have to deal with in the interim.

One problem that I can foresee, however, is that, because of its size and increasing economic and military importance, China will grow out of proportion for a harmonious balance of power in Asia. When, in future, China has become Asia's largest trading partner, with respect to both its exports and imports, it will not only be an economic hegemon but will also replace the United States as Asia's most influential political power. That such a transition will at some point lead to serious tensions between the United States and Japan on one side and China on the other is obvious, but the trend towards China's dominance in Asia is well established and, in my opinion, unstoppable.

What Asia Still Needs to Implement!

The philosophers of progress — men such as ARJ Turgot, the Marquis de Condorcet, William Godwin, Adam Smith, etc. — showed that progress depended to a large extent on freedom, equality, and popular sovereignty. Only where restrictions on the individual's freedom to think, work, and create were lifted could society progress. Freedom was considered essential for successful manufacturing and commerce. For Adam Smith, a "system of natural liberty" would only permit three functions for the government: defense from foreign attack, administration of justice, and maintenance of a few important public works.

The origin of progress and economic development in Western Europe is extremely complex, but in essence it highlights what Asia still lacks, to a large extent. However, I am hopeful that the transition from the Asian feudal society to a well-structured market economy and an institutional capitalistic system, as opposed to a feudalistic capitalistic system (such as we still find in many Asian societies, including China), will get under way. The reason I am optimistic is that a feudal system is based on a complete system in which political, economic, and military power are one and the same, and its objectives are security and stability, rather than growth. The market economy and the capitalistic system, however, rest on equality and individual freedom, and on institutions with dependable rules and laws (as opposed to the discretionary justice of manorial or royal courts).

The move towards democracy in Asia and towards a true market economy and capitalistic system seems to be, from a historical perspective, an irreversible trend. That the transition from a political system resembling feudalism to sovereign power with liberal representative governments creates tensions shouldn't be surprising. Countries that have a strong and forward-looking leadership, such as Taiwan, South Korea, and Singapore, may be able to sail through this difficult transition phase smoothly. Other countries whose governments resist the changes or tend to go backwards (such as Hong Kong, which is increasingly run by the property lobby and obeys the commands it receives from China), may face a more uncertain political and social future. Still, even a country such as Indonesia, which, under Sukarno and Suharto, was organized in a very feudalistic fashion, held fair elections in 2001, in which Mrs. Megawati Sukarnoputri was elected by popular vote.

Moreover, it is likely that we will also see big changes in China's political system sometime in the years to come. I would expect these changes to occur at the same time as the coming financial crisis I referred to above, which will simultaneously bring about the necessary financial and economic reforms.

There is another factor that fosters my optimism about the Asian region, and emerging markets in general. Because of feudalistic capitalism and the perceived strength of the American economy in the 1990s, emerging economies suffered from significant capital flight. As a result, individual investors and central banks have a vast pool of funds parked principally in the U.S. capital market. If, however, the political, social, and economic transition outlined above does indeed take place, conditions for a massive repatriation of funds held overseas will be created, which would lead to higher investment activity and boost local asset values.

As explained above, China and India are exporting deflation and will continue to put extreme pressure on Western manufacturers and tradable service companies, as well as on the export-oriented industries of other emerging economies in and outside of Asia. At the same time, China is becoming a major buyer of commodities and will become, in due course, Asia's largest trading partner. The emergence of China as a major buyer of commodities should support commodity prices, and if, in future, the global economy should resume synchronized growth, as was the case in the 1980s (in our opinion, not very likely in the near future), commodity prices could soar. In fact, grain prices, after having built an extended base since 1998, have been rising explosively since June. We therefore still believe that commodity prices are bottoming out and will outperform Western financial markets in the years to come. The purchase of commodity futures, including coffee, cotton, rubber, copper, gold, silver, sugar, etc., is recommended. ■ rather than rising. [The same as in the 1990s — ed. note] How, then, can there have been inflation? ...owing to decreasing costs following on technical progress, prices would have fallen if an amount of additional credit had not been pumped into the economic system. Hence there was inflation, even if only of the relative kind. But it can be perfectly well argued that the quantitative effect of the inflationary credit expansion was considerably aggravated by an abnormal qualitative distribution of credits. One case is the great expansion of installments credits which gives the impression that the Federal System was trying to administer the heroin not only per os but also per rectum... Another example is the real estate market which was grossly oversupplied with credits. The worst and most conspicuous case, however, was the stock market speculation which was the leader on the road to disaster. For purpose of illustration, it may be mentioned that the volume of brokers' loans rose from 1921 to 1929 by about 900 per cent... We may conclude, then, that the last American boom is a striking example of how the disequilibrating effects of variations in the volume of credit may possibly be greatly aggravated by peculiarities in the qualitative composition of the stream.

REV_00265533

[Emphasis added — ed. note]

I have reproduced Röpke's explanation of the 1920s' boom and the following depression, because it immediately becomes obvious that we have a very similar situation today — only with far worse credit excesses and far more "abnormal qualitative distributions of credit." This time, however, the problem is not so much the expansion of brokers' loans, but consumer and real estate credits as well as the leverage that was built up through government-sponsored enterprises (Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac, etc.), the derivatives markets, and corporations' special-purpose entities.

I hope the reader will understand that the current mortgage financing boom and consumer credit explosion are simply not sustainable in the long run and that, at some point, credit expansion in the consumer and mortgage sector will slow down, as it has in the last two years in the corporate sector (see above). The consequences of such a slowdown will obviously be that consumer spending will have to slow down very considerably, which will inevitably hurt the economy, but hopefully will redress some of the external imbalances. So, whereas economists who point out that the consumer is in great shape may be correct now, sometime in the future the consumer may wake up with a terrific "debt hangover," which will force him to retrench. ■ credit and currency markets

by Dr. Kurt Richebächer

A New Borrowing Era

Several peculiarities strike us about the American economy. There is, first of all, an unusual emphasis on consumption as the prime mover of economic growth, and there is furthermore a general disregard of what is happening to saving and capital accumulation. Alternatively, the emphasis is on autonomous changes in productivity growth through new technologies as the root cause of economic growth and profitability.

This is a radical departure from the thinking of the old economists. Measured by the rate of productivity growth, the U.S. economy appears to be in excellent shape, definitely better than the whole rest of the world. But measured by its record-low rates of saving and capital accumulation, it is in most miserable shape. What is the right interpretation?

Looking at the whole postwar period, the United States actually experienced its most vigorous and definitely its most healthy economic performance in the 1960s. Its rates of national saving and of capital investment were then at their highest in the whole postwar period, and so were its rates of business profits. The main purpose of moderate borrowing on the part of the consumer at the time was the financing of new homes, and the main purpose on the part of businesses was the financing of new investment in plant and equipment, that is, in tangible assets. In essence, it was overwhelmingly borrowing for capital formation.

This pattern of borrowing began to change gradually in the 1970s and rather dramatically in the 1980s. From then on, debt growth went exponential. Consumer debts have since skyrocketed by 473% and business debts by 382%. These numbers compare with simultaneous GDP growth by 283%.

A drastic change in the use of the new debts was the other striking new feature of the developing borrowing binge. Exploding credit quantity implied plunging credit quality.

Consumers started to borrow like crazy to finance increased current spending, and businesses

CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE

REV_00265534

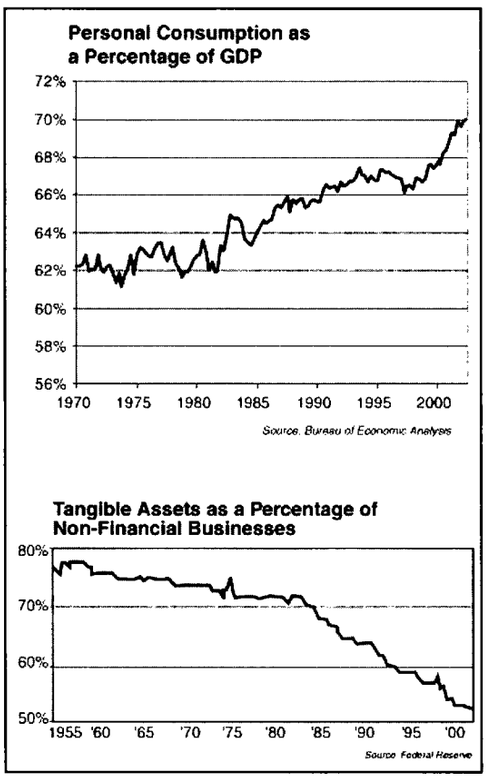
NEW BORROWING ERA, FROM PAGE 11

borrowed like crazy no longer to invest in plant and equipment, but to finance financial transactions — mainly leveraged stock buyouts, mergers, acquisitions, and stock repurchases — that were thought to be more appropriate for quickly raising shareholder value.

The Forgotten Need for Saving

No less drastic were the changes in the behavior and the finances of the consumer. On the surface, his finances look far better than those of the corporate sector as the vertical rise in indebtedness was more than outpaced by the combined rise in market values of houses and corporate equities. Even though the consumer's net worth has modestly declined since the second quarter of 2002, it is still sharply up since the mid-1990s. The question is how quickly these market values will fall, if the U.S. economy weakens again.

Our immediate particular interest, however, is in the macroeconomic dislocations and distortions that are plaguing the U.S. economy in the post-bubble aftermath. In the case of the consumer, this macroeconomic damage resides mainly in his massive dissaving, as reflected in the extraordinary plunge of the personal saving rate to almost zero in 2001.



Ever since firms and retailers invented consumer installment credit in the 1920s, U.S. economic growth has become heavily geared to consumer spending and borrowing. But this traditional consumption bias took a big leap in the 1980s and in particular in the late 1990s. The most striking characteristic of both periods were exploding consumer debts and collapsing national saving.

In the 1980s, in actual fact, the hemorrhage of national saving had caused great and widespread concern. Many American economists expressed their strong misgivings about the implicit negative effects on capital investment. This time, in diametric contrast, nobody seems to care or even take notice.

There seems to prevail a widely accepted view that credit creation makes old-fashioned saving from current income superfluous. As to the equal utter lack of interest in capital formation, the apparent explanation is a singular focus on productivity growth. Why are saving and investing even necessary, if the U.S. economy is enjoying stellar productivity growth without them?

What's wrong with this view? In short, everything. It's macroeconomic nonsense.

What really induced generations of economists of all schools of thought to elevate saving to an indispensable, key condition for economic growth? The basic reason is that it is the limiting factor for capital investment. Short of nirvana, all resources are scarce. Due to this elementary wisdom, new capital investment can only come about to the extent that somebody makes the resources for the production of the capital goods available. That somebody happens to be mainly the consumer. By saving, that is, by spending less than he earns, he effectively releases the necessary productive resources for investment.

But this necessary release of productive resources is true only for saving from current income, coming implicitly from current production. The attendant release of resources is what makes this kind of saving indispensable for investment and economic growth. In essence, capital formation represents the surplus of production over consumption, and that has to be made possible by saving.

In today's America, there apparently prevails a very fuzzy conception of the essence and function of saving in the macroeconomic growth process. Typically, people think of it exclusively in terms of finance. But that is by no means the key aspect.

Manifestly, nothing is easier than to replace a lack of savings with credit creation. But this does not replace savings in the sense of releasing productive resources for the production of capital goods. From this perspective, falling savings imply falling investment.

The latter is precisely what happened in the

Dr. Kurt Richebächer, former chief economist and managing partner for the Dresdner Bank in Germany, writes The Richebächer Letter, a monthly look at the state of world currency and credit markets.

REV_00265535

557478
FG006-27

Senior Advisor to the P

The White House

Karl Rove
Phone: (202) 456-2369
Fax: (202) 456-0191

EUROPE

PLEASE ADVISE

Date: Thursday, March 27, 2003
Date Due: April 10, 2003
To: Action Request

Steve Hadley NSC WW Please make a recommendation

Correspondence Subject:
3/27/03 letter from Jean-David Levitte re: requesting a meeting with Karl Rove. Please return this form to advise of your recommendation. Thanks.

Prepared by:
Susan Ralston (202) 456-2369

SCANNED
BY
ORM

Records Management, White House Office of (ORM)

Subject Files

FG006-27
(Office of Senior Advisor - Karl Rove)

536021

OA/NARA#: 10734 / 10792
9710

Box
Folder

REV_00265537

2018-0011-P [ ]

Systematic Processing Marker

This is not a textual record. This Systematic Processing Marker indicates that material has been removed during systematic processing by George W. Bush Presidential Library staff.

WHORM
FG006-27

Stack:	Row:	Sect.:	Shelf:	Pos.:	FRC ID:	Location or Hollinger ID:	NARA Number:	OA Number:
W	11	4	2	3	9710		10792	10734

Folder Title:

536021

536021

FROM THE OFFICE OF RICHARD F. HOHLT.....A Fax

rick@hohlt.com
aaron@hohlt.com

202-833-4146- Office
202-833-1587- Fax

DATE: April 18, 2003

REMINDER

TO: Karl Rove
Attn.: Susan
456-0191

Chairman Racicot has scheduled the next "Off the Record" dinner for next Tuesday, April 22nd.

LOCATION: The Metropolitan Club - Anderson Room
1700 H Street, NW
835-2500

USUAL TIME: 7:00 p.m. Cocktails
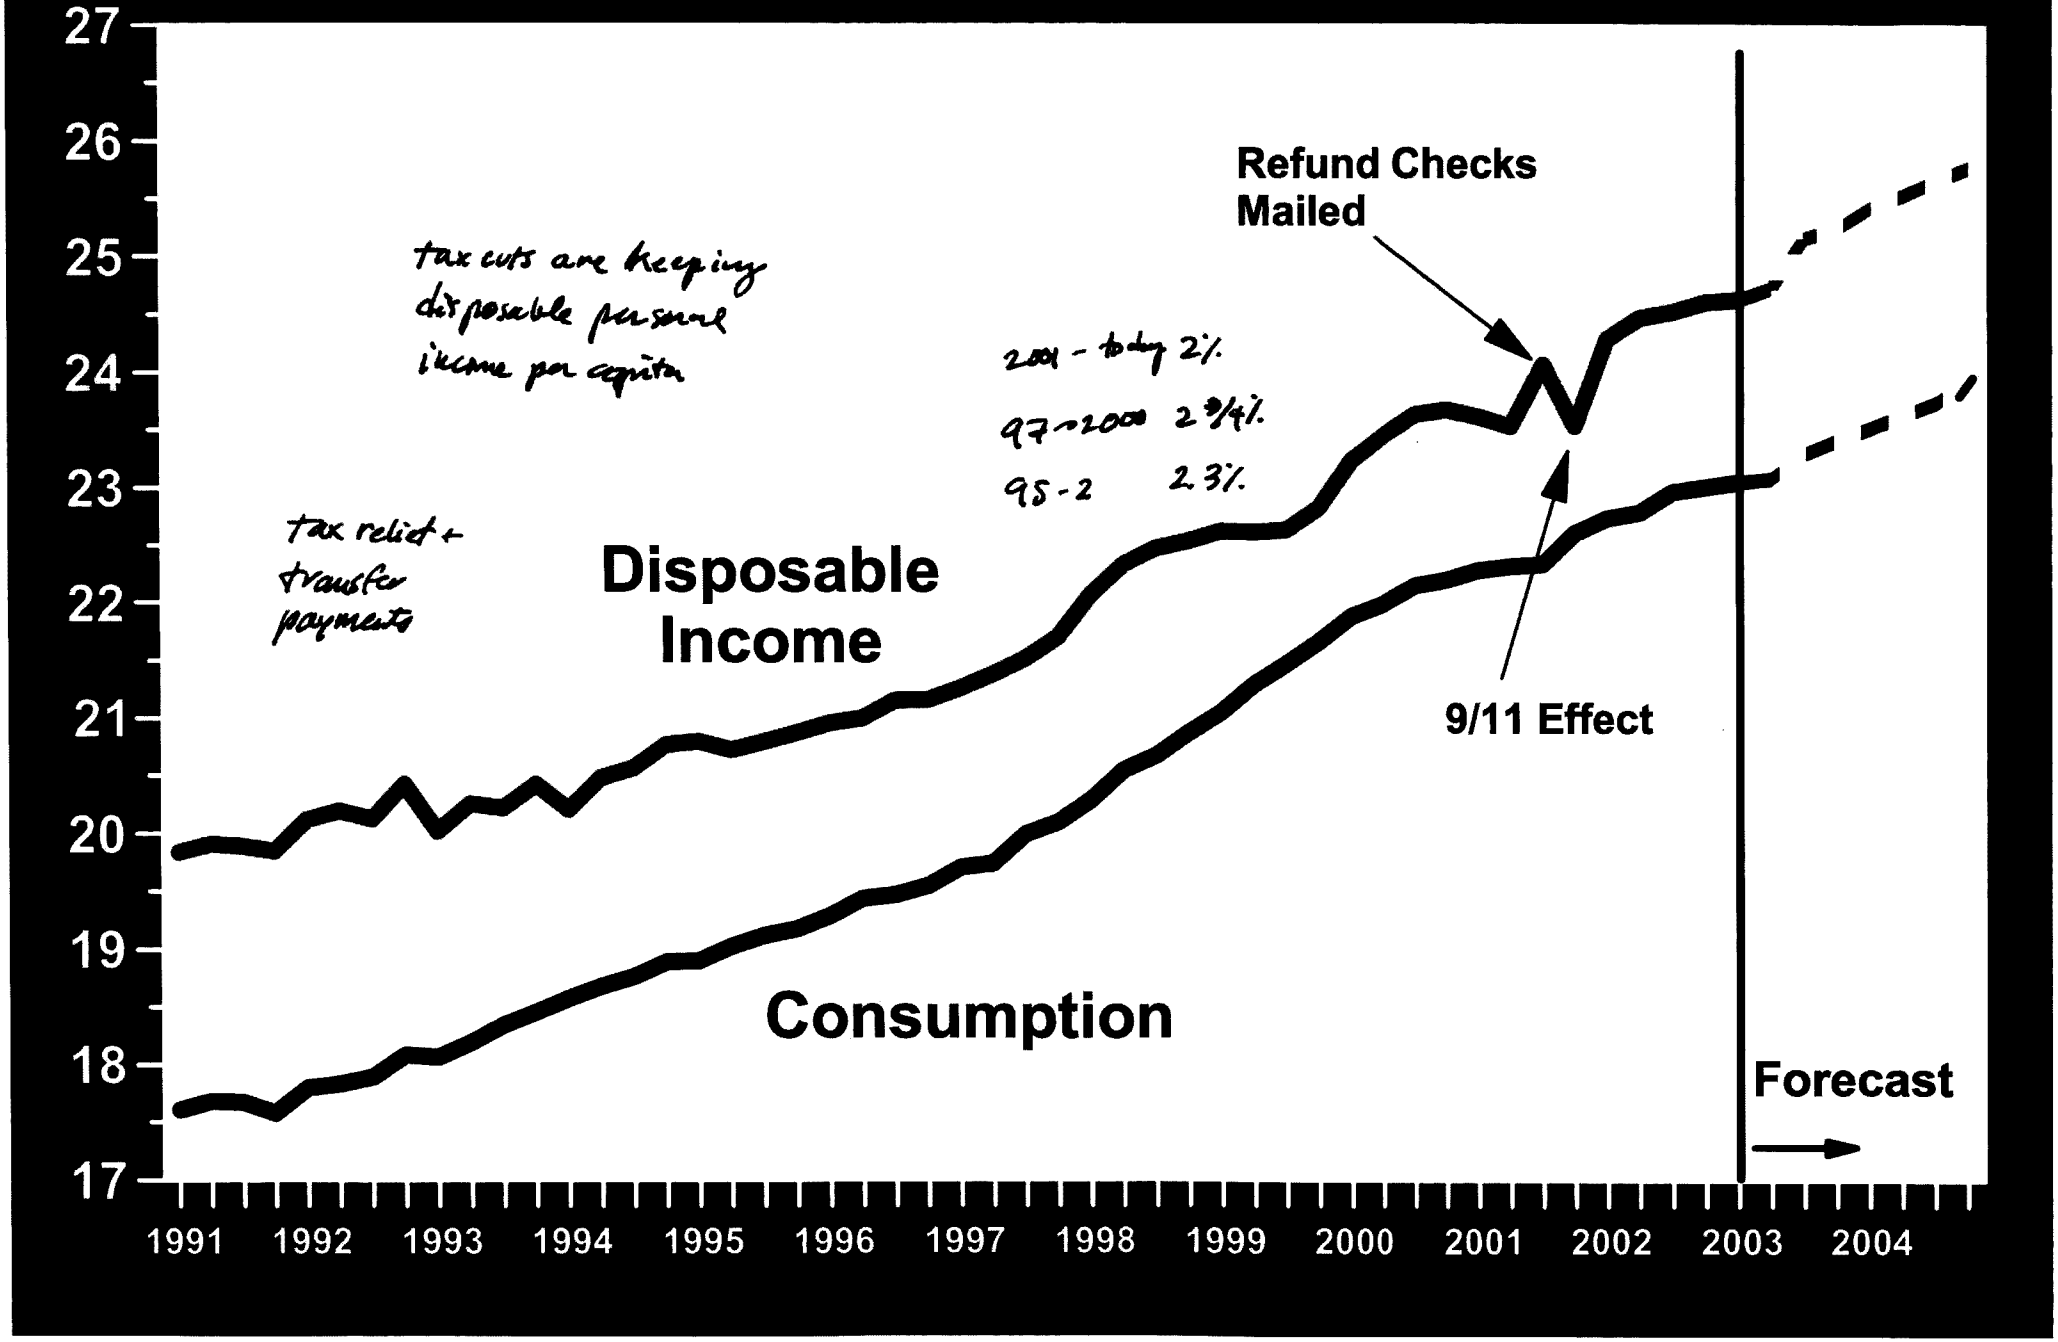
7:30 p.m. Dinner

Please contact my office at 833-4146 if you will not be able to attend.

ONLY PAGE



Receipts as a Percentage of GDP

REV_00265540

Real Consumption and Disposable Personal Income Per Capita

(1996 Dollars)

REV_00265541

FILE:

Rove, Karl C.

536021

From: Mehlman, Ken
Sent: Monday, May 19, 2003 7:34 PM
To: Bartlett, Daniel J.
Cc: Rove, Karl C.; Taylor, Sara M.; Johnson, Collister W.; Dyck, Paul B.; Schlapp, Matthew A.; Thomas, David M.; Napolitano, Michael J.; Rodriguez, Leonard B.; Davis, Alicia W.; Hoelscher, Douglas L.; McMaster, David; Bearson, Darren W.; Gray, Adrian G.; Walters, Katherine M.; Mehlman, Ken; travis@georgewbush.com; jack@rnchq.org
Subject: Upcoming BC04 fundraising activity that could earn media

Dan,

None of these events has been announced by the White House but our finance team is working to put them together--making calls, sending our faxes, etc.

Host committee pre-sell memo sent out tomorrow
1. POTUS-- DC-- 6/17
2. POTUS--NY--6/23
3. POTUS--Greensboro, GA-- 6/20
4. POTUS--LA--6/27
5. VP-- Boston--6/23
6. VP--Richmond--6/23
7. FLOTUS--Chatanooga--6/20
8. FLOTUS--Cincinnatti--6/24

People already making calls for event (although memo has not been sent out, but will be in coming days)
1. FLOTUS--Philadelphia--6/24
2. POTUS--San Fransisco--6/27
3. VP-- Akron--6/30
4. POTUS--Miami--6/30
5. POTUS--Tampa--6/30

People begininning to make calls for events
1. POTUS--Dallas--7/18
2. POTUS--Houston--7/19

NRN 536021

WARREN W. TICHENOR

16 May, 2003

Dear Karl,

Thank you for your time yesterday morning.

And thanks too for visiting with Rhonda via phone last evening. She was very surprised and pleased to hear from our favorite genius.

Thanks for all you're doing.

Sincerely,

Warren

The Honorable Karl Rove
Assistant to the President and Senior Advisor
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, DC 20500

202-456-0191 fax

WWT:am

5 360021

THE WHITE HOUSE

21 May

Steve-

This is from Senator Helms' former Chief of Staff - very strange request from a very strange acquitance.
Gribaum.

Lou

REV_00265545

Jean-Louis Gergorin

Jean-Louis Gergorin is Executive Vice President, Head of Strategic Coordination and a Member of the Executive Committee at EADS .
Prior to this position, Mr. Gergorin was Group Managing Director and Deputy to the CEO of Lagardère SCA. He joined the Lagardère Group in 1984 as Senior Vice President of Corporate Strategy for Matra.

Before joining the private sector in 1984, Mr. Gergorin spent 12 years in the French government, in particular as a founding member of the Franco-German Committee on Defence and Security. In 1973, he co-founded the French Foreign Ministry's policy planning staff, serving first as deputy head, and then in 1979 as head. In June 1972, he became a member of the Council of State.

Today, Mr. Gergorin is advisor to the French Foreign Ministry's policy planning staff and lectures at the Institute for Political Science in Paris. He is a member of the Executive Committee of the International Institute for Strategic Studies.

Mr. Gergorin studied in Paris at the École Polytechnique and the École Nationale d'Administration (ENA). He has been a research fellow at the Rand Corporation and Harvard's Kennedy School of Government in Cambridge, Massachusetts. He also participated in senior management studies at the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, California and is an alumnus of the Stanford Executive Program of the Stanford Business School.

Mr. Gergorin is a "Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur" and "Officier de l'Ordre National du Mérite", an Aviation Week Aerospace Laureate (1989).

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

5J6021

Date: 5/21/03

To: Judge Gonzales

From: Strategic Initiatives Carl

____ FYI

____ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

X Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: _____

_____

_____

REV_00265547

Ralston, Susan B. 536021

From: Steve Weisman [weisman@nytimes.com]
Sent: Friday, May 02, 2003 12:08 PM
To: Ralston, Susan B.
Cc: Ralston Senior Advisor, Susan B.
Subject: for Karl Rove

Karl,

I wonder if you would like to travel the high road with me.

I'm putting together a piece about this yin-yang moment in history. Is the whole debate on foreign affairs between multilateralists vs. unilateralists (or between advocates of force vs. advocates of diplomacy) an oversimplification? Or is it something that the President likes because he wants to hear all the options? Or both?

It would great to have you on the record reflecting on this, contributing some insight into what the dismay vs. eagerness over this subject. I'm trying to get Wolfowitz on the record and already have Armitage. I want to do it before leaving next week Powell back to Middle East.

Thanks.

Steve

Share w/ Dan
Decline - tell Steve I have made way too much on my plate now.

536021

WILLIAM D. WITTER, INC.
153 East 53RD Street
51ST Floor
New York, New York 10022
Phone: (212) 753-4421 Hit # 3 or (212) 753-7878
Fax: (212) 752-1981

Fax Cover Sheet

(If you have any problems receiving these pages, please call us directly.)

DATE: 5 / 9 / 03

TO: Mr. Karl Rove c/o Susan Ralston

FAX #: 202 / 456-0191

FROM: Charles F. Huber c/o Diane Nafornita

NUMBER OF PAGES (Including Cover Sheet): 3

MESSAGE:

Please see attached. Thank you.

Give Us a Paradigm Shift
Not Shifty Policy

Tax policy which shifts percents, trades exemptions or favors one group against another is politics. A paradigm shift redirects policy. The exemption of dividends from taxation favors production over consumption. It creates future jobs. The gap is bridged by private borrowing- for production -- not services or handouts. Corporations pay taxes. The only change is that a dividend deduction replaces the interest deduction while debt equity ratios improve.

Non taxation of dividends is a paradigm shift in the economic life of individuals, corporations and government. Over the past fifty years corporate America has pyramided debt. Non-tax deductibility of dividends has all but wiped out preferred stocks. Individuals were convinced to eschew taxable dividends in favor of capital appreciation. In a generation stock ownership rose from about 8% of the population to almost 60%. These holdings were mostly pensions, IRA's, 401K's and other savings plans.

The stock market bubble burst. Badly burned investors now look approvingly at dividends. The Board of Directors of debt-laden corporations may welcome the opportunity to recapitalize debt with equity. Widespread such recapitalization would further lower interest rates.

Let's turn back the pages of history to Ma Perkins, FDR's Cabinet Secretary who conceived Social Security. Unemployment hovered at 20%, interest rates were low and mortality stood at 67/8. Long forgotten is the fact that Social Security was founded primarily to induce a portion of elderly workers to retire at about 1/3 of their annual salary, to create a job shift to employ a younger out of work force with family responsibilities. To finance this response were 45 givers for each recipient based on a $10 per year contribution (1/2% of $2,000 per year average income). Against 67/8 year mortality the fund was cash flow positive and hailed as one of the great achievements of the New Deal.

Peering through the looking glass from the other end Ma Perkins might find herself aligned with President Bush over the exclusion of dividends from taxation. Unemployment is low. Mortality now rose to the mid 70's. There is pressure by corporations to retire workers early as technology obsoletes the training and education of its older employees. Medical magic extends mortality to seventy five but 50% of all the money we spend on health during our lifetime will be spent during our last six months. And, the cost will continue to rise. Death is a luxury.

For Government to finance this cost it will have to print money (inflation) or confiscate capital (death taxes approaching 100%). The only alternative is forced savings. Pensions, 401K's, IRA's, etc. are now under funded and individuals pinch paychecks as costs rise mostly local taxes. The appearance of a new tax-free income stream would be welcome even if qualified by restrictions (education, health, emergency, etc.).

Gradually the burden of social security must switch from Government to the individual. Antipathy between employers and employee will be muted by focus on the same end game a comfortable passage at age 75.

At this point why not have two work cycles. Allow our 55 and older retirees to become civil servants (teachers, hospital workers, postal, local civic, etc.) for a supplemental tax-free modest income to boost the effectiveness of their savings or pensions while at the same time lowering the operating costs of the agencies in which they serve. Accomplish this through attrition. Face down the public servant unions.

Consistent with Ma Perkins plan to ease the plight of the young by creating unemployment income for the elderly would be giving the public sector at all levels the opportunity to hire anyone over fifty five years of age for wages with tax free income over and above social security, retirement and other private funds. Obviously these people can be hired at wages far lower than young family providers. The young are better able to compete for higher paying, faster rising jobs in the dynamic high technology market of the future and will build savings. Education will veer right from left. The crucial gap between 55 years of age and rising mortality will be eased by cash flow and insurance absent today for 40 million uninsured Americans will be available.

Private and faith based institutions will step forward and with Government provide a safety net for a drastically reduced pool of Americans who somehow missed the American dream. Charity for the needy is quite different from the need for charity. Everyone deserves his fair share.

Personalization of Social Security can become reality as the young discover the wonder of compounding – interest, whether dividends or capital appreciation when given thirty or forty years to develop. IOU's by the Treasury are replaced by real cash.

Secretary Rumsfeld proved that intelligence; communication and speed supercede manpower, equipment, and stationary defenses. So also must programs in place for 50 years be reexamined. Carbon paper has been replaced by E-mail and the Internet for all but Government. Static budgets must be replaced with moving matrices reflecting daily changes in markets. Ten year forecasts are laughed at. Five year plans deserve careful study Rumsfeld, Gingrich, and Cheney are not conservatives – they shake fruit from over ripe limbs -- they propel rather than impel and they destroy obstacles to change rather than reinforce them.

Freeing dividends from taxation unleashes funds which can hold up our teetering social security while building a larger privately owned corporate base to support it.

We defeated Baghdad – let's defeat Washington.

Charles F. Huber II

536021

Washington Post Correction 05.09.03

CORRECTIONS

The headline on a May 8 article about President Bush's visit to the aircraft carrier USS Abraham Lincoln incorrectly said the ship was delayed. The ship arrived at its scheduled time after waiting offshore for a day.

536021

CHUCK HAGEL — FAX —

U.S. SENATOR — NEBRASKA

To: Karl Rove

Of: White House

Fax: (202) 456-0191

Subject: Cordell Hull Award Acceptance Speech

Pages: 7, including cover

Date: May 9, 2003

Attached is the Cordell Hull Award Acceptance Speech that Senator Hagel gave last night at the first annual event.

The award was given by the Cordell Hull Institute to Senator Hagel as a leader committed to principles of open trade, private enterprise and free competition. Hagel was honored for his "consistent, vigorous and courageous support for free and open trade and maintenance and development of the mutilateral trading system.

In the speech Senator Hagel linked the leadership and vision of Cordell Hull in responding to the challenges of the first half of the 20th century to the challenges America faces today.

Please call Mike Buttry at 202/224-5809 or myself if you have any questions.

-Beth Lee

From the desk of...
Beth Lee
Press Secretary
Senator Chuck Hagel
248 Senate Russell Bldg.
Washington, D.C. 20510
Phone: (202) 224-3474 Fax: (202) 228-2086
beth_lee@hagel.senate.gov

UNITED STATES SENATOR • NEBRASKA
CHUCK HAGEL
PRESS RELEASE

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
Thursday, May 8, 2003

Contact: Mike Buttry
Beth Lee, 202/224-4224

Cordell Hull Award Acceptance Speech
U.S. Senator Chuck Hagel
May 8, 2003

The history of America is the history of great leaders. In that pantheon of visionary, wise, and courageous leaders resides Cordell Hull. The Cordell Hull Institute does America and the world an important service by reminding us of the power of Hull's ideas and the strength of his leadership. This included, but certainly was not limited to, his vision of an international economic order that helped build the base for post World War II peace and prosperity.

I am deeply honored to be the first to receive the Cordell Hull Award.

Hull understood, like few others of his time, the connections between trade, democracy, security, and world stability. This required alliances -- coalitions of common interests in a world that would be forever inter-connected. As a U.S. Congressman and Senator from Tennessee, and later as Secretary of State under President Franklin Roosevelt, Hull helped steer American foreign policy away from the misguided tendencies of American isolationism. Those isolationist policies led to global instability after World War I, undermined the American and global economies during the inter-war period, and, in the process, contributed to the origins of World War II. It was at the end of his tenure as Secretary of State in 1944, at Dumbarton Oaks, here in Washington, that Hull and others developed a plan for a United Nations built on the ashes and carnage of World War II.

Hull's influence and achievements with regard to trade and a liberal international economic order were unparalleled during his time. He believed that benefits from free trade would flow to all peoples, and his commitment to free trade never wavered. Hull also knew that the mechanisms of free trade were imperfect. But he understood that trade contributed to prosperity, stability, property rights, human rights, more transparent governments, rule of law, and hope for a better life and a better world for all people.

REV_00265557

In his memoirs, Hull describes the philosophy that helped inform his approach to foreign policy, that free trade can play an instrumental role in reducing the chances for war among nations. He wrote that he came to believe that,

> "unhampered trade dovetailed with peace; high tariffs, trade barriers, and unfair competition, with war. Though realizing that many factors were involved, I reasoned that, if we could get a freer flow of trade – freer in the sense of fewer discriminations and obstructions – so that one country would not be deadly jealous of another and the living standards of all countries might rise, thereby eliminating the economic dissatisfaction that breeds war, we might have a reasonable chance for lasting peace."

Despite spectacular successes over the last 55 years, we are again today at another defining time in global trade. Our greatest challenges lie in the developing world. Many developing countries are not convinced of the relevance of the November, 2001 Doha Round of WTO talks to their long-term economic development. We know that trade-based development strategies are critical to setting countries on the path to democracy and economic prosperity. But many developing countries have been disenchanted by the previous WTO trade round negotiations. Our challenge, today, in the Doha Round, is to make trade-based development relevant to all nation's interests.

Many developing countries are not able to get to the starting line of trade-based development. The first priorities of the citizens of poor countries are the basics; food, water, shelter, medicine – then maybe training and education. America and other developed nations must not overlook these fundamental requirements and challenges of economic development. We must acknowledge and address them, with constructive and real policies and programs. The U.S. and other industrialized countries must continue to help developing countries build the capacity and infrastructure for trade-based growth, so they may fully participate in, and benefit from, the world trade system.

Economic reform and change means difficult choices and tough decisions. Even in the United States and other developed countries, it is often easier to avoid or defer the tough choices that come from enacting enlightened, long-term economic and trade policies than it is to make these choices and focus on the future. Free and fair trade is not a guarantee. It is an opportunity.

REV_00265558

Hull's insights and achievements, that helped form the building blocks of global peace and prosperity, do not end with his commitment to more open markets and a liberal international economic order. Hull was a man of many parts, and he understood in a deep and profound way the connection between American power and purpose in world affairs. For Hull, who guided American statecraft during World War II, knew that American leadership meant more than the application of great military power. The experience of two world wars reinforced his belief that international organizations and structures would be critical to future global prosperity and stability. The national interests of the United States could not be separated from global stability. Looking out on the international landscape in 1948, Hull observed that,

> "We are today more powerful in arms and powerful in the cause of peace and humanity. But with our great strength [sic] have come great responsibilities. The heaviest of these, which we have accepted in the light of our power and duties, is that of providing our full share of leadership toward cooperation among nations for peace, justice, freedom, and progress."

Hull's wise counsel is not limited by time. It applies today, just as it did fifty-five years ago. Our successes in defeating communism during the Cold War, and in prosecuting the war on terrorism today, are the result of unprecedented cooperation among our allies in Europe, Asia, and throughout the world. America's long-term interests are almost always best served by working through institutions, coalitions and alliances, such as NATO and the United Nations. Building coalitions is never easy. But coalitions are a kind of diplomatic stock option that allows other countries to invest in our shared interests and policies, both the risks and the gains... serving the purposes of all investors.

The September 11, 2001 attack on America reinforced the necessity of coalitions. We cannot win the war on terrorism alone, and our many successes against terrorism so far have been the result of cooperation with our allies. That said, we cannot underestimate the effect that 9/11 has had on the American consciousness, and its implications for America's policies at home and abroad. We must be vigilant, but we must be balanced in our responses and policies. Our responsibilities to secure our borders and protect our citizens should not undercut policies that promote and protect free trade, civil rights, immigration policy, and other vital dynamics and rights central to America's past and future.

The build-up to the war in Iraq fractured some of our most valued alliances and institutions, including the Atlantic Alliance and the United Nations. These two relationships have been integral parts to America's security and diplomacy since World War II. These fractures cannot be ignored, and must be rebuilt. America has always had differences with friends and allies and we will continue to have differences in the future. But we strengthen our relationships by building on our common interests – not focusing on what divides us.

REV_00265559

I regret that there exists today a negative perception of American power and intentions that has fostered concern and resentment among some of the peoples and governments of long-standing allies. While we have never and will never compromise our national security, we must be careful to avert the perception that we are charting a unilateralist course in our foreign policy. A return to the balance of power politics of the 19th century would be a dangerous setback for America and the world. Shifts in alliances occur during times of great change in world history, but we must be careful not to allow these shifts to work against America's global interests.

My late friend and colleague, Daniel Patrick Moynihan, also made this case at last year's commencement address at Harvard University when he said,

> "Certainly we must not let ourselves be seen as rushing about the world looking for arguments. There are now American armed forces in some 40 countries overseas. Some would say too many. Nor should we let ourselves be seen as ignoring allies, disillusioning friends, thinking only of ourselves in the most narrow terms. That is not how we survived the 20th century. Nor will it serve in the 21st."

Re-building Iraq is an opportunity for re-vitalizing our relationships, alliances, and international institutions. What we do next in Iraq, the Middle East and around the world, and how we do it, will help America, in Henry Kissinger's words, "to translate its dominance into a systematic fostering of international consensus." Dr. Kissinger further stated in a recent Washington Post op-ed, with regard to Iraq, that,

> "it is in America's interest not to insist on an exclusive role in a region in the heart of the Muslim world and to invite other nations to share the governance – at first coalition partners, progressively other nations, and with a significant role for the United Nations, especially its technical and humanitarian organs."

At the beginning of the 21st Century we find historic opportunities to help build a better world. President Bush has committed the United States, in consultation with our Quartet allies -- Russia, the United Nations, and the European Union -- to implement the Road Map to get the Middle East peace process back on track. This is a critically important step. As we work these single international tracks in Iraq, Afghanistan, the Middle East, and North Korea, we must also work parallel tracks that develop regional security institutions, especially in the Persian Gulf and the Middle East, in order to help build long-term trust and confidence among the states of these regions. Supporting policies that promote and enhance trade and private sector development in these countries is essential for their future. Such policies and institutions will be key to regions moving away from authoritarianism and stagnation toward a hopeful and dynamic future.

REV_00265560

Cordell Hull understood that economic prosperity at home could not be de-coupled from peace and stability abroad. America's competitive position in the world is vital to our power, purpose, and future. Economic growth and prosperity are not zero-sum games, at home or abroad. We therefore cannot disconnect our foreign and trade policies from our domestic policies. Both foreign and domestic policies are woven into the fabric of America's national security and our economic prosperity.

Our long-term economic potential depends on confidence and stability. Confidence is gone when there is instability in the world and uncertainty in America.

American power and purpose must be focused on meeting the challenges of today... but not unmindful of the burdens of tomorrow. At the height of American power following World War II, in 1948, Cordell Hull, in a chapter of his memoirs entitled "What of the Future?" advised that, "We have, in fact, reached the time when we should stop, look, and listen. We should analyze ourselves and our position in the world with sharp introspection."

Some time for reflection on America's role in our world at this present critical juncture in history would bring us back to a basic truth that, in addition to great power, world leadership requires trust. And trust is the indispensable coin of the realm. We cannot lead without the confidence of others. Former President George Bush, writing with Brent Scowcroft in A World Transformed in 1998, reflected on the importance of a benign perception of American power in promoting stability in world affairs. He wrote that the United States, because of our resources and power,

> "has a disproportionate responsibility to use that power in the pursuit of a common good. We also have an obligation to lead. Yet our leadership does not rest solely on the economic strength and military muscle of a superpower: much of the world trusts and asks for our involvement. The United States is mostly perceived as benign, without territorial ambitions, uncomfortable with exercising our considerable power.
> Among our most valuable contributions will be to engender predictability and stability in international relations, and we are the only power with the resources and reputation to act and be broadly accepted in this role."

REV_00265561

The power of America's steadfast commitment to free trade, democracy, human rights, religious freedom, and economic prosperity has been an inspiration to much of the world, because these values are not ours alone. Cordell Hull knew that America does not have sole ownership of these values. There must be a sharing of a common destiny for all peoples.

In so many ways, America's purpose at the beginning of this new century remains what it has always been: investing in the next generation and in the citizens of the world for a better future. Ours is indeed a shared destiny, and the American experience offers hope for all mankind; for those who have never known the promise of democracy, open economies, universal tolerance and respect for the dignity of all people. Our optimism and ideals are tempered by the cold reality of a dangerous world. The threats from tyranny, terrorism, weapons of mass destruction, disease and poverty allow us no reprieve. But we must meet these challenges just as Cordell Hull and his generation met the challenges of their time. We are better prepared than any generation in American history to meet these 21st Century challenges. This is so because of what past generations of Americans built for us and bequeathed to us – immense power and nobility of purpose. We are now the guardians of this trust.... and we must protect it, build on it, and prove worthy of inheriting it.

REV_00265562

Ralston, Susan B.

536021

From: Ralston, Susan B.
Sent: Friday, May 09, 2003 9:28 AM
To: Devenish, Nicolle
Cc: Davis, Alicia W.
Subject: CORRECTION - The Union Leader
Importance: High

In Distaso's article about KR's visit, he writes:

> "He said Bush's tax cut plan would create $1.4 billion in new revenue in 2004, $600 million of which will be generated by the elimination of double taxation of dividends."

http://www.theunionleader.com/Articles_show.html?article=20970&archive=1

Karl said he was misquoted. Karl said 1.4 million jobs, 600,00 of which...

JOBS not REVENUE

Can you have the correct this?

The Union Leader NEW HAMPSHIRE SUNDAY NEWS

News - May 8, 2003

Bush adviser Rove: Don't trade tax cuts for health care plan

By JOHN DISTASO
Senior Political Reporter

KARL ROVE

Senior Presidential adviser Karl Rove said yesterday rescinding all or part of President George W. Bush's tax cuts to fund a sweeping health-care program is "just wrong" and nothing short of a huge tax hike.

At least two Democratic Presidential candidates want to kill Bush's tax cuts and divert the money to health-care plans. Dick Gephardt wants to use all of the cut; Howard Dean, a part of it.

In New Hampshire yesterday to talk to business people, students and Republican activists, Rove was greeted with biting criticism of his boss by the state Democratic chair.

Describing himself in a self-deprecating way as the mastermind of Bush's 19-percentage point loss to John McCain in the 2000 first-in-the-nation GOP Presidential primary, the administration's chief political adviser said the White House is officially months, if not a year, from shifting into a 2004 reelection mode.

But he was clearly on hand to let Granite Staters know Bush takes the state just as seriously as the Democratic contenders.

Rove said Democratic plans to rescind tax cuts for health care "would just absolutely stop the economy dead in its tracks. We'd have a lot more people out of work and a lot less growth."

In an interview, Rove said, "If they want to advocate that, that's their right, but I don't think that's going to go down with the vast majority of Americans."

State Democratic Chair Kathleen Sullivan said Bush, through his tax cut, "wants to borrow $550 billion to give away to the very wealthiest Americans, with middle-class and working Americans stuck paying off the debt for years to come." She said Rove "and his buddies are looting our prosperity for generations to come."

Sullivan said two million Americans have lost their jobs since Bush became President; 40 million have no health insurance. "Yet George W. Bush wants to use the United States Treasury to bankroll a tax giveaway for his friends," Sullivan said.

Rove said Congress agreed two years ago to phase in the tax cut over 10 years. Rescinding it would be "a huge tax increase on the American people."

News &
Articles from Leader and N
Hampshire Su
News, Septem
to the present available onlir
NewsBank.

NEW
- Old Man of t Mountain
- Church In Ci
- Education
- NH Politics
- NH Primary
- War on Terr
- Granite Stat
- State House
- City Hall

SPOR
- Monarchs
- Joe Sullivan
- Vin Sylvia
- Jim Fennell

FEATU
- John Clayto
- Stacey Cole Nature Talks
- John Harrig Woods & Wil
- Weather
- Our Gourme
- Verizon Wir
- 40 Under 40

COLUI
- Joseph W. M Publisher's N
- Jack Kenny
- Robert D. Ni
- George F. W
- Jonah Goldb
- Deroy Murdo
- Kathleen Pa

Prudential Yearl Realty

REV_00265568

He said that despite opposition to the cut plan from some moderate Senate Republicans, "at the end of the day we'll get it. It's not a process that people with weak stomachs should watch."

Recent polls have shown Bush's overall approval ratings high, better on foreign policy than domestic policy.

"The difference is, one he's popular on and on the other, he's really popular on," said Rove. "I look at how you match him up (in polls) with named Democrats or generic Democrats or Democrats in Congress, and he has a significant lead. People have a real trust in him because they've seen him for three years and because they know what his values are."

But, told that a poll by Franklin Pierce College released Tuesday showed that in New Hampshire, Bush is in a dead heat with a generic Democratic Presidential candidate, Rove said, "I'm not surprised."

He predicted "a very close election" and predicted that in any poll specifically pitting Bush against any Democratic contender "where you had to deal with the reality instead of the abstract, he'd be fine."

Rove said he is unfamiliar with the Pentagon contract hiring Vice President Dick Cheney's former company to fight oil fires in Iraq and, it was revealed this week, also to operate Iraqi oil fields and distribute petroleum.

Democratic Presidential candidate Howard Dean said yesterday the contract "doesn't surprise me a bit. It's an emblem of an administration that has sold this country down the river."

Cheney's office has said repeatedly the vice president has no role in the operations or government contracts of Halliburton Corp.

Rove said the Pentagon believed it "was important to make certain we had a company with the ability to do certain things — fight the fires and make sure the oil fields get back in operation as quickly as possible. And smart people at the Defense Department went through this process and determined Halliburton."

California Democratic Rep. Henry Waxman questioned Halliburton's expanded role in a letter to the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

Rove said Waxman "has a tendency of sending off letters accusing — alleging — certain things in order to get a little more attention. But I'm confident this was thought through and was the right thing to do."

Earlier, at a corporate-sponsored "Politics and Eggs" forum, Rove pushed hard for Bush's tax cut and blamed the sluggish economy on the 9/11 terrorist attacks, corporate scandals and the Iraqi war.

He said Bush's tax cut plan would create $1.4 billion in new revenue in 2004, $800 million of which will be generated by the elimination of double taxation of dividends.

At St. Anselm College's New Hampshire Institute of Politics, Rove advised students interested in government and politics never to assume politicians can mislead the public, which he called the "masses are asses" theory.

He lauded New Hampshire as a state where, in politics, "retail matters, wholesale doesn't." And he denied Republicans were trying to exploit the 9/11 tragedy by holding its convention in New York City in late August and early September. He also said the Iraqi conflict was merely one battle in an overall war on terrorism, and, he said, he had "no doubt at all" that weapons of mass destruction will be found.

Return to Front Page

The information on this site is copyrighted and cannot be reused without the permission of The Union Leader.

536021

Allstate.
You're in good hands.

FAX

Date 5-27

Number of Pages 2
(Including Cover Sheet)

To KARL ROVE

Company

Department

Phone Fax 202-456-0191

From Laura Sarlo

Department

Phone 847-402-8386 Fax 847-402-2832

Subject

Notes

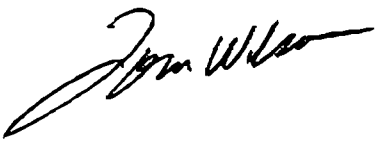
☐ For Review ☐ Please Respond ☐ Urgent ☐ FYI

Allstate Insurance Company
2775 Sanders Road, F9 Northbrook, IL 60062 Email Lsarlo@allstate.com

Allstate.
You're in good hands.

Thomas J. Wilson
President
Allstate Protection

May 27, 2003



Mr. Karl Rove
Special Advisor to the President
The White House

Dear Karl:

Thank you for enabling my daughter's eight grade class to tour the White House during their recent visit to Washington, DC.

I hope things are well with you and look forward to seeing you at a future Financial Services Forum meeting.

Best regards,

Allstate Insurance Company
2775 Sanders Road, F8 Northbrook, IL 60062 Phone 847-402-8388 Fax 847-402-2832 Email Twilson@allstate.com

536021

U.S. News & WORLD REPORT

BRIAN DUFFY
EDITOR

EXEC. OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT
WHITE HOUSE ARCHIVES
2003 JAN 27 AM 10:11

January 17, 2003

Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, DC 20500

Dear Karl,

We are pleased that you will be joining us as a guest of Mort Zuckerman at the annual White House Correspondents' Association dinner on Saturday April 26, 2003 at the Washington Hilton.

Before the black-tie dinner, U.S. News is hosting a private reception in the Conservatory Room at the Hilton. We would be delighted if you could join us there starting at 6:30 p.m. You may pick up your dinner ticket at the reception. If you prefer to receive your dinner ticket before the dinner, please contact Lynne Edwards at 955-2659 to arrange to have your ticket delivered to you. Feel free to call Lynne if you have any questions about the reception or dinner. The dinner begins at 7:30 p.m. in the International Ballroom.

We look forward to seeing you on April 26.

Pls deliver tick through Press office

Sincerely,

B. Duffy

Brian Duffy

1050 THOMAS JEFFERSON STREET NW • WASHINGTON, DC 20007-3837
202-955-2271 • BDUFFY@USNEWS.COM
HTTP://WWW.USNEWS.COM

REV_00265572

1/17 accepted
536021

Mortimer B. Zuckerman
Chairman and Editor-in-Chief

December 4, 2002

Mr. Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, DC 20500

Dear Karl:

I would be delighted if you would join U.S.News & World Report as my guest at the annual White House Correspondents' Association Dinner. It's a black tie event on Saturday, April 26, 2003 at the Washington Hilton Hotel. U.S. News will host a private cocktail party in the Conservatory Room at the Hilton starting at 6:30 p.m; dinner follows at 7:30 p.m.

Please RSVP to Mary Jean Hopkins (202) 955-2541. I very much hope that you will be able to come.

Sincerely,

Mortimer B. Zuckerman

1050 Thomas Jefferson Street, N.W., Washington, DC 20007-3871
Tel: 202-955-2537
U.S.News Online: http://www.usnews.com

REV_00265573

April 24

CONGRESSMAN RICHARD BURR
NORTH CAROLINA

January 16, 2003

Mr. Karl Rove
The White House
Washington, DC 20500

Dear Karl:

This is to follow up with a request that I made when meeting with Ken Mehlman last week. I would like to ask that you be the guest speaker at an event sponsored by my campaign during the April Congressional recess. Ken indicated to me that he would have a date worked out by the time I return to the U.S. on January 22.

My campaign hosts this event every non-election year as a means of beginning the fundraising process for the next election. The donors are all $1000 givers and by attending this level they secure membership in the Richard Burr Capitol Club. This event has always been successful and has been well attended.

This year, my plan is to expand this event to draw attendees from the entire state of North Carolina and if you will agree to be the speaker, I have no doubt that you will be a major draw. Typically this event is held on a weeknight and I will be glad to work with your schedule to pick a suitable time.

I hope that by the time I return that we can quickly set a date that is convenient for you so that I can put in motion the plans for making this dinner a success.

Please let me know if you have any questions and I look forward to having you as my guest.

Sincerely,

Richard Burr

Authorized and paid for by The Richard Burr Committee, Timothy W. Gupton, Treasurer
Post Office Box 5928 • Winston-Salem, North Carolina 27113-5928 • 336-777-1170 • Fax 336-773-0198

536021

FROM THE OFFICE OF RICHARD F. HOHLT.....A Fax

rick@hohlt.com
wade@hohlt.com

202-833-4146- Office
202-833-1587- Fax

DATE: May 23, 2003

SAVE THE DATE

TO: Karl Rove
Attn: Susan
456-0191

Chairman Racicot has scheduled the next "Off the Record" dinner for Thursday, June 19th.

LOCATION: To Be Determined ...

USUAL TIME: 7:00 p.m. Cocktails
7:30 p.m. Dinner

Please contact my office at 833-4146 if you will not be able to attend.

ONLY PAGE

5 J6021

REMARKS VIA SPEAKERPHONE TO THE
OHIO REPUBLICAN PARTY EXECUTIVE FINANCE COMMITTEE

Thursday, May 22, 2003
6:00 p.m. – 6:15 p.m.
Ohio Republican Party
Via Speakerphone to Columbus, Ohio
Coddy Johnson

I. PURPOSE

To thank the Ohio Republican Party Executive Finance Committee for their support and leadership moving towards 2004.

II. BACKGROUND

Tonight's event is intended to promote the strong partnership between the Ohio Republican Party (ORP) and the Party's Executive Finance Committee, which is comprised of 19 of the State's top CEOs and business leaders. This event will provide the Executive Finance Committee with an overview of the party's financial and political plans and an opportunity to meet with local and statewide GOP elected officials. The business leaders in attendance have all committed to contribute $25,000 a year over the next two years to the ORP Operating Account, the Party's new fund for unlimited, unreported personal contributions as allowed under state election law.

The event includes a program with speakers Bob Bennett (State GOP Chairman), Jim Dicke (Finance Committee Chairman), Barry Jackson (Deputy Senior Advisor to the President), Senate President Doug White, House Speaker Larry Householder, Chris McNulty (ORP Executive Director), Governor Taft, and you. Your remarks will take place at 6:00pm and will be broadcast via speakerphone to event participants. The meeting will already be in progress, beginning at 4:00 p.m.

The ORP has cultivated a relationship with top state CEOs and donors for nearly two decades, which has helped to garner the resources necessary to achieve an unparalleled record of electoral dominance. In the 2002 election cycle, the Party's successful efforts help to:

- Re-elect Governor Bob Taft with 58 percent of the vote, thereby allowing Republican control of the governor's office for 16 straight years, the longest GOP tenure since 1822.
- Elect Jennette Bradley as the State's first African-American lieutenant governor and the first female African-American lieutenant governor in the Nation.
- Elect Republican candidates to the other four statewide offices (State Attorney General, State Auditor, State Treasurer, and Secretary of State) for the second straight cycle.

- Elect Maureen O'Connor and re-electing Justice Evelyn Stratton to the Ohio Supreme Court, giving the court a conservative majority and the first female majority in State history.
- Gain an additional three seats in the Ohio State House, giving the GOP a 62-seat majority and matching the record set in 1966.
- Pick up an additional seat in the Ohio State Senate for a 22-seat edge, representing the largest margin since 1967.
- Gain seven countywide offices on Election Day, bringing the GOP total to nearly 65 percent.

The ORP also played a critical role in the 2000 campaign, spending over $4 million on a statewide Victory Program that included paid and volunteer phone banks, issue and slate mailings, and targeted radio advertisements. Under new Campaign Finance Laws, the ORP has restructured its 2003 budget so that $2 million will be spent on generic, non-Federal party-building activity and over $1.4 million on Federal election activity. The Party's 2004 budget has not yet been decided.

III. PARTICIPANTS

VIPs in Attendance
Governor Bob Taft (R, OH)
Attorney General Jim Petro (R, OH)
Treasurer Joe Deters (R, OH)
Missy Deters, Joe's wife
Senate President Doug White (R, OH)
House Speaker Larry Householder (R, OH)
GOP State Chairman Bob Bennett

VIPs Not in Attendance
Senator George Voinovich (R, OH)
Senator Mike DeWine (R, OH)
State Auditor Betty Montgomery (R, OH)
Secretary of State Ken Blackwell (R, OH)
Ohio's GOP U.S. House Congressional Delegation

19 Executive Finance Committee Members (see attached list)

ORP Staff
State GOP Chairman Bob Bennett
State GOP Executive Director Chris McNulty

White House Staff
Barry Jackson (in Ohio)
Sara Taylor (with you)

IV. SEQUENCE OF EVENTS

5:58 pm: Sara Taylor is conference into the ORP Executive Finance Committee Meeting via her cell phone.
6:00 pm: Sara Taylor hands her cell phone to you.
6:01 pm: Chairman Bob Bennett introduces you to event participants.
6:03 pm: You deliver remarks.
6:15 pm: You conclude remarks and direct any follow-up questions to Barry Jackson.
Note: This is an opportunity to thank leadership and get them excited for 2004. It does not require long remarks.

V. PRESS

Closed

VI. REMARKS

Talking Points provided by Coddy Johnson

VII. ATTACHMENTS

Talking Points
List of Executive Finance Committee Members

OHIO EXECUTIVE FINANCE COMMITTEE MEMBERS

Dave Brennan, White Hat Management
Jack Chester, Chester Wilcox & Saxbe
Jim Dickie, Chairman EFC, and Crown Equipment Corporation
Harley Dunbar, Dunbar Mechanical
Dick Farmer, Cintas Corporation
Jerry Jordan, Jordan Energy, Inc.
John Kessler, The New Albany Company
Carl Linder, American Financial Corporation
Bob Meyerson, Texlon Corporation
Wally O'Dell, Diebold Corporation
Butch O'Neill, AGT International
Niles Overly, The Frank Gates Company
Joe Ruscigno, Fitch Reporting Inc.
Rick Stansely, The Stansley Group
Tim Timken, The Timken Company
Dr. Michael Walsh, Physician, Toledo Hospital
Mrs. Lillian Walsh, Dr. Walsh's wife
Monte Will, First Union Securities
Bob Winzeler, Winzeler Stamping Company

Declined 5/23

536021

5310 North Sheridan. Chicago Illinois 60640
Telephone No. 773-334-4573
Fax No. 773-334-6225

CINDY's PHARMACY

PRA 6

Fax

To: SUSAN B. RALSTON From: CINDY FLORES (773) 334-4573

Fax: (202)456-0191 Pages: 2

Phone: 202 456-2369 Date: 5/21/2003

Re: CC:

☑ Urgent ☐ For Review ☐ Please Comment ☐ Please Reply ☐ Please Recycle

• Comments:

Please help also follow up my request for a Message from Pres. G. Bush for our Souvenir Program (ASAP). Sending you a copy of the letter. Thanks!

I hope you can come to our Dinner Ball on June 7th.

FACC – Kasarinlan™
Dr. Jose P. Rizal Heritage Center
1332 West Irving Park Road, Chicago, IL
Tel: (773) 281-1210 Fax: (773) 281-9586

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE 2003

MANUEL E BELBIS
Overall Chairperson

CYNTHIA FLORES
Vice Chairperson

MILA V. BENSING
Recording Secretary

CARMELITA V. MADRIDEJOS
Corresponding Secretary

EUSTAQUIO R. FLORENDO
Treasurer

WINNIE MANCENIDO
Assistant Treasurer

TONNETTE CARAAN
Auditor

GALILEO CASQUEJO
Business Manager

PRESS RELATIONS
GERRY ALCANTARA
ALEX F. CIRERA
YOLY TUBALINAL

ADVISORS
ALFONSO S. BASCOS, ESQ.
DR. BEN CAMACHO
OGIE CORQUERA
VICKIE CORQURA
BERNARD FOJAS
THELMA FUENTES
DR. VIRGILIO JONSON
ED LIBUNAO
FLORANTE A. LLANES
EMIL MENDOZA
HERMINIO R. POBLETE
BEN ROSERO
RUDY TAPALLA

May 21, 2003

Ms. Susan B. Ralston
Executive Assistant to the Senior Advisor
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, DC 20500

Dear Susan:

In behalf of the FACC-Kasarinlan, I would like to invite you to attend our dinner ball on June 7, 2003 at the Holiday Inn O'Hare at 5440 North River Road in suburban Rosemont. While the program starts at 7:30 p.m., guests usually arrive earlier for the cocktails (6:30 p.m.). Dinner is served at 7:00 p.m.

The Filipino American Council of Greater Chicago (FACC) is the Filipino American community's umbrella organization, hence is the lead organization in these festivities. This year, we are celebrating the 150th anniversary of Philippine independence from Spain's colonial rule. One of the Kasarinlan activities is the dinner ball, where the community's movers and shakers get together (at least once a year) to commemorate our native land's independence. We also have other activities, like the dinner theatre and art exhibits, which showcase Philippine culture at its best.

We are pleased to inform you that our guest speaker for the night is the Honorable Loren Legarda, the majority leader in the Philippine Senate. The lady senator will most likely speak about the ever-growing relationship between the U.S. and the Philippines, what with President George W. Bush hosting a rare state visit for the visiting President Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo last weekend. This promises to be a lovely night, so we are looking forward to June 7th, where we expect you to be one of our VIP guests.

Thank you for your kind attention, and I hope that you will accept this invitation.

Sincerely,

Cynthia C. Flores

CYNTHIA C. FLORES
Overall Vice Chairperson
& Dinner Ball Chair

KASARINLAN™ IS A TRADEMARK OF THE FILIPINO AMERICAN COUNCIL OF GREATER CHICAGO (FACC)

FACC – Kasarinlan™
Dr. Jose P. Rizal Heritage Center
1332 W. Irving Park Rd, Chicago, IL 60613
☎ 773-281-1210 🖷 773-281-9586

HERMINIO R. POBLETE
PRESIDENT, FACC

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE
2003

MANUEL E BELBIS
Overall Chairperson

CYNTHIA FLORES
Vice Chairperson

MILA V. BENSING
Recording Secretary

CARMELITA V. MADRIDEJOS
Corresponding Secretary

EUSTAQUIO R. FLORENDO
Treasurer

WINNIE MANCENIDO
Assistant Treasurer

TONNETTE CARAAN
Auditor

GALILEO CASQUEJO
Business Manager

PRESS RELATIONS
GERRY ALCANTARA
ALEX F. CIRERA
YOLY TUBALINAL

ADVISORS
ALFONSO S. BASCOS, ESQ.
THELMA BASCOS
DR. BEN CAMACHO
OGIE CORQUERA
VICKIE CORQUERA
BERNARD FOJAS
THELMA FUENTES
DR. VIRGILIO JONSON
ED LIBUNAO
FLORANTE A. LLANES
EMIL MENDOZA
HERMINIO R. POBLETE
BEN ROSERO
RUDY TAPALLA

May 7, 2003

The Honorable George W. Bush
President, United States of America
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, DC 20500-0001

Dear Sir:

In behalf of all the Filipinos in the state of Illinois, we send you our greetings!

On June 12th of this year, the Philippine flag will be raised at the Daley Center Plaza in Chicago to honor the 105th anniversary of Philippine independence. It is also a tribute to the more than 150,000 Filipinos who have adopted Illinois as their second home.

To commemorate this important day in our history, the Filipino American Council of Greater Chicago, through its Kasarinlan Committee, has scheduled a series of activities that will feature various aspects of Philippine history, arts and culture. The first major event is the dinner ball, which will be held on June 7th at the Holiday Inn O'Hare, where we will be honoring Mrs. Philippines-Kasarinlan 2003 and Miss Philippines-Kasarinlan 2003. The other events showcase Philippine culture at its best — art exhibit by Filipino artists, poetry reading/short plays by the Pintig Group, and a balagtasan (Filipino drama). There will also be a special tribute to Filipino seniors and veterans, a health fair, and a dinner theatre presentation, among others.

In this regard, we would like to request for your message and your photograph, which we will publish in our souvenir book. We are sure the Filipinos in Illinois will be honored to hear from you.

Thank you very much for your kind attention. Mabuhay!

Respectfully yours,

MANUEL E. BELBIS
Overall Chair

CYNTHIA C. FLORES
Chair, Dinner Ball

KASARINLAN™ IS A TRADEMARK OF THE FILIPINO AMERICAN COUNCIL OF GREATER CHICAGO (FACC)

FACC

FILIPINO AMERICAN COUNCIL OF GREATER CHICAGO

Dr. Jose P. Rizal Heritage Center
1332 W. Irving Park Road, Chicago IL 60613
(773) 281-1210 * FAX (773) 281-9586

BOARD OF DIRECTORS 2002-2006

HERMINIO R. POBLETE
President & Chairman, Board of Directors

JOSE RENE ABELLA
Vice President

MILA V. BENSING
Recording Secretary

PAZ SALADINO
Corresponding Secretary

CARMELITA V. MADRIDEJOS
Asst. Corresponding Secretary

EUSTAQUIO R. FLORENDO
Treasurer

DR. MARIA G. ACIERTO
GIL ASIN
JAIME M. ALBAN
MARINA M. ALBAN
ALFONSO S. BASCOS, ESQ.
THELMA P. BASCOS
TORIBIO BATACAN
MANUEL E. BELBIS
MILA V. BENSING
SHIRLEY V. BORRES
WILLI RED BUHAY
RAM B. CABANERO
ARCADIO CALABAS
NESTOR CASTILLO
ALEX F. CIRERA
JOSIE CIRERA
RUFINO F. CRISOSTOMO JR.
BELEN CRUZ
VEDASTO DIAMANTE
JEAN ESPINOSA
CARMEN D. ESTACIO
CARMELITA E. FLORENDO
EUSTAQUIO R. FLORENDO
BERNARD M. FOJAS
TING JOVEN-GIOVANELLI
MAURO LARRACAS
FLORANTE A. LLANES
TOMAS A. MADRIDEJOS
CARMELITA V. MADRIDEJOS
AMABLE TOY MANCENIDO
ORIEL B. MOJICA
EVANGELINE T. PAREDES
BEN ROSERO
LYDIA ALBERTO-RHOTON
PAZ SALADINO
CONNIE SANTOS
PLARIDEL E. SENERIS
JOHNNY TABLIZO
RUDY E. TAPALLA
JEAN D. VALDEZ
OSCAR C. VALDEZ
SAMUEL D. VALDEZ
CAESAR P. YABUT
REV. TELESFORO D. YAGUE

JAIME M. ALBAN
Administrator

LUIS CHITO BAUTISTA
Asst. Administrator

ALFONSO S. BASCOS, ESQ.
Legal Counsel

May 16, 2003

Ms. Susan B. Ralston
15572 Wigeon Way
Woodbridge, VA 22191

SUBJECT: INVITATION TO THE KASARINLAN DINNER BALL ON JUNE 7, 2003

Dear Ms. Ralston:

We have the honor of inviting you as a Special Presidential Guest in our Kasarinlan dinner ball this coming June 7th, starting at 6:30 p.m., at the Holiday Inn O'Hare at 5440 N. River Road in Rosemont, Illinois.

As you know, we are celebrating the 150th anniversary of Philippine independence from Spanish colonial rule in the FACC's Kasarinlan (the Tagalog word for independence). In the said dinner ball we are expecting many guests from our Filipino American community in the greater Chicago area, among which are the leaders from the various groups — socio-civic, political, mass media, professionals, and business, among others.

The Guest of Honor and speaker is Senator Loren Legarda-Leviste, a prominent political personality in the Philippines. Aside from the other events in the said dinner ball, there will also be coronation ceremonies for Mrs. FACC-Kasarinlan 2003, and Miss FACC-Kasarinlan 2003.

We hope that you will honor us with your acceptance of this invitation.

Sincerely,

HERMINIO R. POBLETE
President

456-0191

536021

FROM THE OFFICE OF RICHARD F. HOHLT.....A Fax

rick@hohlt.com
elizabeth@hohlt.com
wade@hohlt.com

202-833-4146- Office
202-833-1587- Fax

DATE: 5/22/03

TO:

Susan -

Please give to Karl, only if he's interested. Thanks very much.

2 PAGE(S) TO FOLLOW

FROM THE OFFICE OF RICHARD F. HOHLT.....

rick@hohlt.com
wade@hohlt.com

202-833-4146- Office
202-833-1587- Fax

DATE: May 22, 2003

TO: Chairman Racicot
Jack Oliver
Ken Mehlman

The following individuals have confirmed their attendance for tonight's "Off the Record" dinner at the Hay Adams Hotel in the John Hay Room. As customary, cocktails at 7:00pm and dinner at 7:30pm.

Josh Bolten
Dan Bartlett
Tom Collamore
Ken Duberstein
Secretary Don Evans
Don Fierce
Ed Gillespie
Ed Goeas
Rick Hohlt
David Hobbs
David Keene
Ron Kaufman
Jan Van Lohuizen
Cathie Martin
Bill Timmons
Matt Schlapp
Ambassador Mercer Reynolds

Total: 20, including the three of you

CC: Karl Rove

ONLY PAGE

FROM THE OFFICE OF RICHARD F. HOHLT.....A Fax

rick@hohlt.com
wade@hohlt.com

202-833-4146- Office
202-833-1587- Fax

DATE: May 22, 2003

TO: Chairman Racicot
Jack Oliver
Ken Mehlman

Following is the Suggested Agenda for tonight's "Off the Record" dinner at the Hay Adams Hotel in the John Hay Room. As customary, cocktails at 7:00pm and dinner at 7:30pm.

SUGGESTED AGENDA

I.	Chairman Racicot	Opening Remarks Introductions: Schlapp, Reynolds, Martin
II.	Pollsters	Latest Data
III.	Ken Mehlman	Campaign Overview Convention Update
IV.	Jack Oliver	Fundraising
V.	Josh Bolten/David Hobbs	Domestic Agenda/Legislative Strategy
VI.	Dan Bartlett	Communications Effort

CC: Karl Rove

ONLY PAGE

F cuba
536021

Mercedes M. Viana
05/08/2003 08:04:17 AM

Record Type: Record

To: See the distribution list at the bottom of this message

cc:
Subject: El Nuevo Herald: Critican la postura de la Casa Blanca con Cuba

El Nuevo Herald: Criticisms on the White House's position on Cuba

Our "friends" are criticizing the White House on Cuba . . . Here's what they are saying in the article

Quote from Congresswoman Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, "I wrote a letter three months ago and I'm still waiting for a response and to tell you the truth, I don't believe I will ever receive a response."

More quotes form Ileana: "I feel very frustrated, but will not surrender and will continue to fight, even if it's against a Republican administration and against the (Cuban) tyranny."

Other Cuban American legislators admit that they receive some courtesy calls from the White House. Otto Reich is the only one to answer the phone.

Mario Diaz-Balart was the only one to defend the President. His quote: "The President remains firm in keeping the sanctions and economic embargo in place, and we are very grateful (to the President). However, I believe we need to take additional steps to assure that the tyrant is not a a danger to the United States."

A complete translated version will be sent shortly . . .

elNuevoHerald.com

Posted on Thu, May. 08, 2003

Critican la postura de la Casa Blanca con Cuba
RUI FERREIRA
El Nuevo Herald

Las imágenes de tres balseros intentado esquivar a los guardacostas ante las costas de Cayo Largo han levantado una polémica dentro de la comunidad exiliada, donde muchos aseguran que la Casa Blanca no escucha sus clamores y parece prestar poca atención a la situación cubana.

Los mismos congresistas cubanoamericanos y personal de su entorno, hasta ahora feroces defensores de la administración republicana de George W. Bush, se quejan hasta de que nos los atienden.

"Hace unos tres meses le escribí una carta. Todavía estoy esperando una respuesta y a decir la verdad, no creo que la vaya a recibir nunca", dijo la congresista republicana Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, desde su oficina en el Capitolio.

La congresista cree que la política hacia Cuba creada por la pasada administración Clinton fue diseñada para favorecer al gobernante cubano. De hecho, en sus argumentos ella la llama "política Clinton-Castro". Pero, pese el cambio de administración, Ros-Lehtinen no mostró un mayor optimismo.

"Me siento muy frustrada, pero no me voy a rendir y seguiré batallando, aunque sea contra una administración republicana, en contra de la tiranía", agregó la congresista.

El presidente Bush vino a Miami el año pasado y prometió que endurecería la política hacia la isla. Tanto los congresistas por el sur de la Florida, como importantes comentaristas, se embarcaron en una ofensiva de apoyo al presidente.

Pero ahora, escasos 11 meses después, los aplausos se han convertido en quejas que están tocando a la puerta de la Casa Blanca.

Miembros del entorno de los legisladores, admiten en privado que la Casa Blanca no les está prestando mucha atención, si es que prestan alguna.

"Los contactos a veces son de mera cortesía. Otto Reich [enviado especial para Latinoamérica] es el único que contesta el teléfono", dijo uno de ellos.

Añadió otro: ``Nosotros estamos literalmente cubriéndole las espaldas al presidente, pero me pregunto durante cuánto tiempo. ¿Hasta cuándo lo vamos a proteger cuando la realidad es que, en privado, está pasando otra cosa?".

"Esto se está calentando, no son sólo los congresistas, es también la comunidad que está molesta. La tensión está subiendo y son como dos trenes a punto de chocar", agregó la fuente en el Congreso, que solicitó no ser identificada.

El novato congresista Mario Díaz-Balart, aunque crítico, fue más cuidadoso.

``El presidente es muy firme en relación a las sanciones y el embargo económico, y por eso le estamos agradecidos. Pero creo que por la situación que tenemos ahora en Cuba, se debería tomar pasos adicionales para ayudar a que el tirano deje de ser un peligro para Estados Unidos".

En la carta enviada por Ros-Lehtinen hace tres meses a la Casa Blanca, la congresista se quejaba abiertamente de que todavía los exiliados no habían visto expresiones concretas de un cambio en la política hacia la isla.

De hecho, los cambios introducidos por la administración republicana no alteraron significativamente la política trazada por Clinton, como la de "pies secos, pies mojados". Las nuevas medidas que se anunciaron, están paralizadas, argumentan.

Así, la administración Bush incrementó 10 veces el monto que cada exiliado puede enviar de remesa y, pese a que prohibió los viajes de estudio, los estadounidenses siguen viajando clandestinamente como los hacían antes.

Por otro lado, las fuentes congresionales aseguraron que la Casa Blanca rebajó a la Agencia Internacional para el Desarrollo (USAID) el presupuesto de ayuda a la disidencia interna cubana de $15 millones a $6 millones.

"¿Se acuerdan del programa de becas para los disidentes que anunciaron el año pasado? No se puede decir que ese programa esté funcionando, no se puede decir que sea siquiera un programa", añadió la fuente en el Congreso.

Por otro lado, los cuatro balseros que arribaron la víspera seguían ayer en poder de las autoridades. Tres de ellos estaban en el Centro de Detención de Krome, mientras que un cuarto, que nunca llegó a tocar tierra, seguía en custodia del Servicio de Guardacostas.

Se creía que este cuarto inmigrante era Jorge Parrado, pero luego sus familiares fueron informados de que se trataba de otro hombre.

"Estamos perplejos", dijo Sandy Cobas, de Judicial Watch, que había comenzado a representar legalmente a los familiares de Parrado en sus esfuerzos por evitar de que éste fuera repatriado a Cuba. ``Ahora no sabemos dónde está Jorge".

Una mujer de Miami reveló que su hermano, Ramón Aguilar, es el balsero que se encuentra en el barco de los guardacostas, explicó Cobas.

A su vez, otros 12 cubanos se entregaron ayer a las autoridades en Los Cayos después que desembarcaron en dos grupos separados, confirmó el portavoz de la Patrulla Fronteriza, Keith Roberts. Un grupo llegó a Cayo Largo y otro a Cayo Hueso. Al cierre estaban siendo procesados en Krome.

Message Sent To: _____

Nicolle Devenish/WHO/EOP@EOP
rfernandez@rnchq.org @ inet
Otto Reich/NSC/EOP@EOP
Emilio T. Gonzalez/NSC/EOP@EOP
Jeanie S. Mamo/WHO/EOP@EOP
Matthew A. Schlapp/WHO/EOP@EOP
Leonard B. Rodriguez/WHO/EOP@EOP
scastillo@rnchq.org @ inet
Abel Guerra/WHO/EOP@EOP
Israel Hernandez/WHO/EOP@Exchange@EOP

536021

~~CONFIDENTIAL~~

FILE: Faith Based

The InnerChange Freedom Initiative: A Preliminary Evaluation of a Faith-Based Prison Program

by

Byron R. Johnson
Distinguished Senior Fellow and Director
Center for Research on Religion and Urban Civil Society University of Pennsylvania and Adjunct Fellow
Manhattan Institute

with

David B. Larson
International Center for the Integration of Health and Spirituality

May 2003

JCR – Key findings on page 5

~~CONFIDENTIAL~~

DRAFT

Determined to be an Administrative Marking Per E.O. 13526, SEC 3.4(B)

REV_00265604

The InnerChange Freedom Initiative: A Preliminary Evaluation of a Faith-Based Prison Program

Table of Contents

Executive Summary
Background
  Do Secular Prison Programs Reduce Recidivism?
  Prison Fellowship and Religious Programs
  Describing the InnerChange Freedom Initiative
Research Methodology for Evaluating IFI
  Selection Criteria for Admission to the IFI
  A Matched Design
  IFI Participants - the Study Group
  Selection Bias
  Graduating from the IFI Program
  Measuring Recidivism
  Monitoring the Role of Mentoring
Findings
  Does Participation in IFI Reduce Recidivism?
  Mentoring and Aftercare
  Why Do IFI Graduates Have Lower Recidivism Rates?
  Describing the IFI Environment
Spiritual transformation - A Developmental Process
  Spiritual Transformation Theme 1: I'm Not Who I Used to Be Spiritual Transformation Theme 2: Spiritual Growth
  Spiritual Transformation Theme 3: God Versus the Prison Code
  Spiritual Transformation Theme 4: Positive Outlook on Life
  Spiritual Transformation Theme 5: The Need to Give Back
  The Role of Spiritual Transformation in Prisoner Rehabilitation
Mentoring Matters, But It's Hard to Do
What Do We Know About IFI Recidivists?
  Summarizing Lessons Learned from IFI Recidivists
Summary of Findings
Discussion of the Findings
Endnotes
Tables

REV_00265605

~~CONFIDENTIAL~~

DRAFT

The InnerChange Freedom Initiative:
A Preliminary Evaluation of a Faith-Based Prison Program

Determined to be an Administrative Marking Per E.O. 13526, SEC 3.4(B)

Executive Summary

In April of 1997, with the full support of the Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ), Prison Fellowship Ministries (PF) launched an unusual correctional experiment - a Faith-Based Pre-Release Program. The program was distinctive in that it was expressly Christian in orientation. The InnerChange Freedom Initiative (IFI), as it would later be named, was officially launched under the recommendation of then-governor George W. Bush. This unique public-private partnership between TDCJ and PF represented a first for Texas, if not the country. Technically speaking, IFI is a faith-based program operated by PF through a contract with TDCJ. IFI is a largely volunteer driven program that is different from other rehabilitation programs or prison ministries in some profound ways. It represents perhaps the first full-scale attempt to offer comprehensive programming emphasizing education, work, life skills, values restructuring, and one-on-one mentoring in an environment where religious instruction permeates all aspects of the prison environment.

Reanalyzing data previously compiled and analyzed by the Criminal Justice Policy Council of Texas, this study tracks the two-year post-release recidivism rates for those prisoners that entered the IFI program from April of 1997 through January of 1999, and were released from prison prior to September 1, 2000. In addition, this report summarizes the results of an intensive on-site, multi-year field study of IFI, including in-depth interviews with IFI staff and participants.

To allow for a two-year tracking period, IFI participants included in the current study are those who have had the potential to be out of prison for at least two years by September 1, 2002. A total of 177 participants met these requirements and thus form the basis of the IFI study group. Comparison groups were selected from the records of inmates released during the evaluation period that met program selection criteria but did not enter the program. The comparison groups were matched with IFI participants based on the following characteristics: race, age, offense type, and salient factor risk score. A total of 1,754 inmates were identified as the matched group for this study.

Anchored in biblical teaching, life-skills education, and group accountability, IFI is a three-phase program involving prisoners in 16 to 24 months of in-prison programs and 6 to 12 months of aftercare following release from prison. In this ambitious correctional experiment, IFI is responsible for implementing, administering, and funding inmate programs, and TDCJ is responsible for housing and security matters. IFI and TDCJ are testing the proposition that by intentionally working together they will be able to achieve the civic purpose of recidivism reduction and thereby increase public safety.

REV_00265606

Among the study's key findings are the following:

1. The IFI participants in this study include 75 prisoners who completed all phases of the program (called IFI Graduates), 51 who were paroled early, 24 who voluntarily quit the program, 19 who were removed for disciplinary reasons, 7 who were removed at the request of the staff, and 1 who was removed for serious medical problems. The total number of IFI participants comes to 177 offenders who were released prior to September 1, 2000. IFI participants were compared to a matched group of 1,754 inmates who met the IFI selection criteria but did not participate in the program.

2. 17.3% of IFI program graduates and 35% of the matched comparison group were arrested during the two-year post-release period. A program graduate is someone who completes not only the in-prison phases of IFI dealing with biblical education, work, and community service (usually lasting 16 months), but also includes an aftercare phase (usually lasting 6 months) in which the participant must hold a job and have been an active church member for 3 consecutive months following release from prison.

3. 8% of IFI program graduates and 20.3% of the matched comparison group were incarcerated during the two-year post-release period.

4. Considering all participants, including those inmates who did and did not complete all phases of the program, 36.2% of IFI participants were arrested compared to 35% of the matched group during the two-year tracking period. Among the total number of IFI participants, 24.3% were incarcerated compared to 20.3% of the comparison group during the two-year post-release period.

5. Mentor contact is associated with lower rates of recidivism.

6. Initial skepticism of the IFI program diminished over time with TDCJ staff eventually embracing the program.

7. Narratives of IFI members revealed five spiritual transformation themes that are consistent with characteristics long associated with offender rehabilitation: (a) I'm not who I used to be; (b) spiritual growth; (c) God versus the prison code; (d) positive outlook on life; and (e) the need to give back to society.

8. Spiritual transformation can best be understood as a developmental process marked by key turning points or events.

9. Completing the IFI program, and continued positive pre and post-release mentoring are linked to both the offender's spiritual transformation and rehabilitation.

REV_00265607

10. Lack of post-release accountability via mentors and congregations, the decision of the IFI participants to isolate themselves from those that could most benefit them, and finally, the tendency to not accept personal responsibility for poor decision-making, are factors associated with recidivism.

REV_00265608

TR: KR 536021
FYI -
from Tim G.

F: Guns

KEEP AND BEAR ARMS
GUN OWNERS HOME PAGE .COM

This article was printed from KeepAndBearArms.com.
For more gun- and freedom-related information, visit
http://www.KeepAndBearArms.com.

This news item was printed from Keep And Bear Arms.
For more 2nd Amendment Information visit Articles at:
http://www.KeepAndBearArms.com

Print Page

Print This Page

Written By: Sam Cohen

President Bush's Boy Feels the Sting of His Boss' Mistake

by Sam Cohen
SamCohen@attbi.com

May 8, 2003

KeepAndBearArms.com -- The New Hampshire State Republican Committee is sponsoring a series of in-state visits from party bigwigs. Last night, Karl Rove, advisor to the President, and a friend of George W. Bush for 30 years, spoke at a lecture hall at Southern New Hampshire University, in Manchester. The hall was full, with several hundred people there, including a state senator, a recent Congressional candidate, and a number of other people I knew. (New Hampshire's a small state.) I sat in the front row, and after Rove's speech, was the last of a half-dozen people to be recognized for questions.

I introduced myself as a director of Gun Owners of New Hampshire, the NRA state affiliate, noting -- for the benefit of the audience -- that even Bill Clinton admitted that the country's 83 million gun owners, and the NRA, delivered the electoral votes of Arkansas, Tennessee, and West Virginia in the 2000 election. I then told of assistant White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan's statement a couple of weeks ago that President Bush had joined Democrat senators Dianne Feinstein and Chuck Schumer in calling for renewal of the so-called Assault Weapons Ban of 1994, due to sunset after ten years in 2004.

My question was whether President Bush was aware that many thousands of gun-rights activists around the country felt so strongly about this that we had drawn a line in the sand (my exact words), and would not support ANY politician -- even President Bush himself -- who supported this atrocious legislation.

Rove began his answer by referring to the tremendous amount of email that the White House had received on this subject, but then he shot back the question of whether we supported Bush in the 2000 elections.

I said "absolutely." His follow-up was that Bush had publicly campaigned on his position of "enforcing existing gun laws," and his position hasn't changed; he was just being consistent. Rove then closed the session and walked off the stage.

Just a few minutes later, I approached him to continue in private as he was leaving the building; I was the last to do so before he got into his car. This is where it got interesting: Rove took my arm and literally got in my face, using the old drill sergeant intimidation trick of speaking through clenched teeth with his nose an inch from mine. It didn't work, because I'm taller (and older, and uglier) than he is, and I took HIS arm in turn. He told me that Bush was sticking to his position, but that Congress would never pass the legislation. I told him that there were a lot of us, that we were dead serious, and that if Bush let the ban get renewed he'd lose the election, because freedom is more important than politics. He looked at me -- still with clenched teeth -- turned, and walked to his car, obviously angry.

GOOD! First, his anger told me that he knew that the hypocritical strategy was dangerous. More importantly, it tells me he'll remember the exchange.

Molon Labe!

Sam Cohen
http://www.thespiritof76.com/rkba.html

* RKBA! (...the exclamation point means "shall not be infringed!")

REV_00265610

Decline
5/12 536021

THE JAZZ MUSEUM IN HARLEM
104 EAST 126TH ST., 2ND FLOOR
NEW YORK, N.Y. 10035

Leonard Garment
212-348-8300
212-348-5030 FAX

May 5, 2003

Dear Karl,

You know how much I would love to have you come to The Jazz Museum in Harlem party on May 14 (see attachment). Charlie McWhorter would not have missed it for the world! (If your Boss and/or Mrs. Boss would like to drop by, we would be thrilled, charmed and, of course hugely grateful.)

Best.

Len

FILE

Leonard Garment, David Levy and the Board of The National Jazz Museum in Harlem invite you to an evening of cocktails, music and conversation with Ken Burns, Billy Taylor and other friends of jazz

Wednesday, May 14, 2003 at 6:30 in the evening at the home of Daryl and Beth Libow

PRA 6

Please RSVP by May 7
rphillips@jazzmuseuminharlem.org or PRA 6

Business or casual attire

536021

INTER-AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT BANK

Office of the Executive Director for the United States of America

Declined 5/12

DOCUMENT TRANSMISSION FORM

DATE: 05-09-03	No OF PAGES: 2 Including this page	OUR FAX ACCESS No (202) 623-3612
Approved by:

To: Mr. Karl Rove

Fax No.: (202) 456-0191

From: US Office

Subject: Farwell Reception for Mr. Arrizurieta

Please find attached invitations.

FILE

REV_00265612

Farewell - Despedida

for

Jorge L. Arrizurieta
United States Alternate Executive Director

Please join us in a farewell toast

Date: Tuesday, May 20 2003
Time: 5:30 p.m.
Location: Las Americas Dining Room

R.S.V.P. Adela Yurawecz x-1029

Maria Eugenia Peredo-Cohen x-3519

Suggested Contribution: $15

Adela Yurawecz
Assistant to Mr. Jorge L. Arrizurieta
US Alternate Executive Director
(202) 623-1029

5/12/2003

Records Management, White House Office of (ORM)

Subject Files

FG006-27
(Office of Senior Advisor - Karl Rove)

536027

OA/NARA#: 10735 / 10793
9911

Box
Folder

REV_00265629

2018-0011-P [ ]

Systematic Processing Marker

This is not a textual record. This Systematic Processing Marker indicates that material has been removed during systematic processing by George W. Bush Presidential Library staff.

WHORM

FG006-27

Stack:	Row:	Sect.:	Shelf:	Pos.:	FRC ID:	Location or Hollinger ID:	NARA Number:	OA Number:
W	11	4	3	1	9711		10793	10735

Folder Title:

536027

Thurs, 4/3 ok
TBD POTUS travel

EVANS & NOVAK
1750 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W.
Suite 1203
Washington, D.C. 20006

ROBERT D. NOVAK

Telephone: 202/393-4340 Fax: 202/393-5588

February 8, 2003

NOTE TO SUSAN RALSTON

FROM KATHLEEN CONNOLLY

RE Evans and Novak Political Forum

Following up on their telephone conversation, here's Bob's letter inviting Karl to speak at the upcoming forum.

I look forward to hearing from you regarding Karl's schedule.

EVANS-NOVAK POLITICAL REPORT

WHAT'S HAPPENING . . . WHO'S AHEAD . . . IN POLITICS TODAY

1750 Pennsylvania Ave., N.W. • Suite 1203 • Washington, D.C. 20006 • 202-393-4340

February 8, 2003

Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
The White House
Washington, DC

Dear Karl:

I'm delighted that, schedule permitting, you will once again address an Evans and Novak Political Forum.

The Sixty-Third Evans and Novak Political Forum will be held on Thursday, April 3, at the University Club, 1135 16th Street in Washington. The Forum begins with an 8:30 speaker, runs through lunch and ends in mid-afternoon.

The audience consists of about 60 executives who are subscribers to the Evans-Novak Political Report. All proceedings are completely off the record.

As you know, your presentation would be one hour, 10-15 minutes of remarks on any subject of your choosing and the balance of the hour used for a q and a session. Kathleen Connolly will contact your office to work out a convenient speaking time.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

Robert D. Novak

Level 39
55 Collins Street
Melbourne Vic 3000
Australia
Telephone: 61 3 9921 7147
Facsimile: 61 3 9921 7142

536027

AUSTRALIAN
AMERICAN
EDUCATION
LEADERSHIP FOUNDATION
ABN 37 652 060 192

NO

20 December 2002

Mr Karl C Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Ave NW
Washington DC 20500 USA

Dear Karl,

INVITATION TO AUSTRALIA – FORUM 03/AUGUST 13-16

I have pleasure in inviting you to participate in the 11th Annual Meeting of the Australian American Leadership Dialogue – of which you are an original member. We would like you to bring your wife and son. We have a family program established through the support of the Premier of the State of Victoria.

The Leadership Dialogue is scheduled for August 14 and 15 in Melbourne – the world's most liveable city. You and the family should plan to arrive no later than August 13. Through our Section 501 (c) 3 Foundation in Washington DC, we would be responsible for your return airfares from DC to Melbourne, and for your accommodation at the Melbourne Park Hyatt for the nights of August 13, 14 and 15.

This year's Leadership Dialogue was a spectacular success, in no small measure to the outstanding leadership you and your staff demonstrated during the half day of sessions at the White House. This was a truly unique and memorable occasion for us all.

Karl, please let me know if you and your wife are able to join us, and I shall set in train the arrangements.

Kind regards,

Phil Scanlan
Founder

Do come!

THE SENIORS COALITION

Working for a Responsible America

June 4, 2002

The Honorable Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
Strategic Initiatives
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, DC 20502

Dear Karl:

Since we last ran into one another on the Hill, we've made tremendous progress in building the Senior Congress program, the exciting grassroots senior advocacy and action arm of The Seniors Coalition (TSC).

As you may know, TSC is the leading free-market advocacy and education organization representing four million seniors nationwide. We've been very active in advocating the President's priorities in Congress. We've worked closely with Gian-Carlo Peressutti of the Office of Public Liaison, and since his departure, with Josephine Robinson and Angela Sailor.

The response to our Senior Congress initiative has been enthusiastic and encouraging. We've already briefed Jack Oliver, Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, Rep. John Thune, Sen. Tim Hutchinson, NRCC Chairman Rep. Tom Davis, as well as top GOP political strategists on this program. Now that Senior Congress has moved beyond the concept phase and is underway, I thought this might be a good time to brief you on this program. It would be a worthwhile investment of your time to understand the strategic grassroots capabilities this program is developing.

I would welcome the opportunity to meet with you to discuss the Senior Congress program. I hope that you can find some time in your busy schedule to hear about this initiative. Please let me know when you might be available to meet. I can be reached at (703) 239-1960.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

J. Drew Hiatt
Vice President
Federal Government Affairs

Washington D.C. Metro Office:9001 Braddock Road, Suite 200 • Springfield, Virginia 22151
Phone (703) 239-1960 • Fax (703) 239-1985 • E-mail:tsc@senior.org

THE SENIORS COALITION

Working for a Responsible America

To: Karl Rove

Fax: (202) 456-0191

From: Drew Hiatt

Phone: (703) 239-1960

Fax: (703) 239-1985

Date: June 7, 2002

Pages:2, (including this sheet)

Subject: Request for meeting

Comments:

Karl,

Please see attached.

Sincerely,

Washington D.C. Metro Office: 9001 Braddock Road, Suite 200 • Springfield, Virginia 22151
Phone (703) 239-1960 • Fax (703) 239-1985 • E-mail: tsc@senior.org • Web: www.senior.org

Call list 536027

Ralston, Susan B.

From: Rove, Karl C.
Sent: Wednesday, April 23, 2003 2:33 PM
To: Bartlett, Daniel J.
Subject: FW: Hello

Can we talk about this? And have you seen his "Hell of A Ride" book?

-----Original Message-----
From: John Podhoretz <PRA 6 >@EOP
Sent: Wednesday, April 23, 2003 2:50 PM
To: Rove, Karl C.
Subject: Hello

To: Karl Rove
From: John Podhoretz

I am writing because I'm looking for a little help in setting the historical record in the right way. I've signed a book deal with St. Martin's for a book about the making of a great president -- how George W. Bush is becoming a world-historical figure. The book will come out at the beginning of 2004.

This is not a work of reportage, but rather a polemic-argument that will seek to demonstrate the truth of the president's rise to greatness and the folly of his ideological and partisan foes.

I was hoping I could get some guidance from you on these matters. I am not looking for scoop or inside dirt, but rather an informed perspective on my thesis and whether it's right, wrong or stupid.

I'm going to be in Washington next week from April 29 through May 3, Tuesday through Saturday, and would love to buy you lunch, dinner, breakfast, or coffee at your convenience. My schedule is open right now except for lunch Tuesday and breakfast Friday.

You can reach me by return of this e-mail or by phone at PRA 6
I'd only ask one favor, which is that you not forward or copy this e-mail to anyone else.

Thanks so much for your consideration.

John Podhoretz

att1.eml (2 KB)

- att1.eml

5 36027

Phil Gramm

Ralston, Susan B.

From: Rove, Karl C.
Sent: Tuesday, May 06, 2003 8:07 AM
To: Ralston, Susan B.
Subject: FW: updated version for Senator Gramm

discuss

-----Original Message-----
From: DeFrancis, Suzy
Sent: Monday, May 05, 2003 5:47 PM
To: Rove, Karl C.
Cc: Ralston, Susan B.
Subject: FW: updated version for Senator Gramm

CEA has updated the study if you decide to send on to him.

-----Original Message-----
From: Swagel, Phillip L.
Sent: Monday, May 05, 2003 5:40 PM
To: DeFrancis, Suzy
Cc: Mankiw, Nicholas G.
Subject: updated version for Senator Gramm

Suzy, attached is a version of the memo without the CEA letterhead. If it's not too late, please use this for Senator Gramm.
Phill

Economic Effect of Jobs and Gr...

- Economic Effect of Jobs and Growth Proposal.pdf

REV_00265643

4542

EVENT: Religious Freedom

EVENT DATE: Mid - May

INVITATION TRACKING SHEET

Office of the Director of Appointments and Scheduling
Bradley A. Blakeman

TODAY'S DATE: 5-9-03

TO:

___ Andi Ball
___ Ruben Barrales
___ Dan Bartlett
___ Joshua Bolten
___ John Bridgeland
___ Secretary Card
___ Ari Fleischer
___ Stephen Friedman
___ Justice Gonzales
___ Joseph Hagin
___ David Hobbs
___ Melanie Jackson
___ Elizabeth Kleppe
___ Jay Lefkowitz
___ Ken Mehlman
___ Admiral Miller
___ Brian Montgomery
X Condoleezza Rice / John Fiklin
___ Karl Rove
___ Margaret Spellings
___ James Towey
___ Lezlee Westine

COMMENTS DUE BY: 5-13-03

Note: Please return this form with your recommendations within 5 working days or else we will assume that this invitation should be regretted.

ACTION REQUIRED

☐ Accept Invitation/Meeting Request (Schedule Proposal Attached)
Comments:

☐ Consider in Long Range Meeting
Comments:

☐ Regret Invitation/Meeting Request
Comments:

☐ Recommend Surrogate
Name(s):

Please return to Brook Holladay and Bonny-Kate Marshall, 1800 G Street, 9th Floor

REV_00265644

293853

4542

UNITED STATES COMMISSION ON INTERNATIONAL RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

April 29, 2003

The Honorable George W. Bush
President of the United States of America
The White House
Washington, D.C. 20500

Dear Mr. President:

The U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom commends your deep personal commitment to religious freedom. On numerous occasions you have called for countries to provide for and protect the religious freedom of their people. The Commission is aware that you have also stressed this fundamental human right specifically in meetings with Presidents Putin and Jiang. In recognition of your commitment to international religious freedom, the Commission respectfully requests a meeting with you in mid-May to present our findings and policy recommendations on countries to be featured in our annual May 1 report.

The Commission was established by the International Religious Freedom Act of 1998 and is composed of ten members, including presidential appointees Dr. Richard Land, Bishop William Murphy, Ambassador-at-Large for International Religious Freedom John Hanford, and, until recently, Ambassador Shirin Tahir-Kheli. As you know, the Commission reviews and recommends options for United States' policies with respect to foreign countries engaging in or tolerating violations of religious freedom. By statute, the Commission is required to submit a report to the President, the Secretary of State, and the Congress each May 1. The Commission looks forward to having the opportunity to present its report to you in person for the first time.

In addition, as you may know, the Commission has accepted an invitation from the Chinese government to conduct a fact-finding mission to their country this summer. We greatly appreciate that you personally requested access for the Commission during your February 2002 visit to China. In preparing for this mission, we welcome any advice you might have.

Thank you for your consideration of this meeting request.

Respectfully yours,

Felice D. Gaer

Felice D. Gaer
Chair

Felice D. Gaer, Chair • Dean Michael K. Young, Vice Chair • Firuz Kazemzadeh • Richard Land • Bishop William F. Murphy • Leila Nadya Sadat • Nina Shea • Hon. Charles R. Stith • Ambassador John V. Hanford III, Ex-Officio • Joseph R. Crapa, Executive Director

800 NORTH CAPITOL STREET, NW, SUITE 790 | WASHINGTON, DC 20002 | 202-523-3240 | 202-523-5020 (FAX)

REV_00265645

add to cable list

536027

Ralston, Susan B.

From: McClellan, Scott
Sent: Tuesday, May 20, 2003 1:51 PM
To: Ralston, Susan B.
Subject: RE: excerpts

This is the story that ran. He did not include much from what I told him.

Bush White House, GOP lawmakers put trial lawyers on defensive By PETE YOST, Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON

Renewing a battle from President Bush's days as Texas governor, the White House and its GOP congressional allies are putting trial lawyers on the defensive, from immunizing drug makers from lawsuits to cutting into the fees of attorneys who sue major corporations.

The latest effort, ahead of the 2004 elections, was unveiled last month when two Republicans allied with the White House introduced legislation that would sharply curtail lawyers' contingency fees in lawsuit awards topping $100 million.

Democrats point out that the legislation is aimed at a group of attorneys who traditionally are a major source of campaign donations for their party.

The Association of Trial Lawyers of America contributed $3.8 million to Democrats in the 2002 election cycle, compared to $335,000 to Republicans, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

"We've heard of enemies' lists, but this now looks like the White House and their friends in Congress want to start employing an enemies tax," Democratic consultant Jenny Backus said.

Tort reform has long been of interest to Bush, predating his first race for governor in 1994, the White House says.

In a recent book about Bush, presidential adviser Karl Rove is quoted as persuading Bush to elevate the importance of tort reform in the governor's race. In a memo obtained by The Associated Press in December, the White House identified legal reform as one of 10 possible "signature issues" heading into the president's bid for re-election in 2004.

The barrage of proposals by Republicans - from legislation to presidential executive orders - has trial lawyers working several fronts to protect their turf. The trial lawyers association spent $3.5 million lobbying Congress last year.

"On the other side, there's every corporation in America, thousands of lobbyists and many millions of campaign contributions," pointed out Carlton Carl, a spokesman for ATLA.

Republicans say the effort isn't about punishing a Democratic constituency, but about excesses in the legal system that the Bush administration says ultimately drive up insurance rates and other costs for consumers.

"The president has always been a strong supporter of efforts to stop lawsuit abuse," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

The latest effort to create a federal excise tax on lawyers' fees is part of a broader attack by Republicans in Congress.

Medical malpractice bills in Congress would cap some economic damages for insurance companies, HMOs, nursing homes, pharmaceutical companies and medical device manufacturers.

Separate legislation would push more class action lawsuits out of state courts and into federal courts where delays are common and where legal requirements make it harder for plaintiffs to pursue cases brought by large numbers of people. Another bill would effectively immunize the makers of a vaccine additive that may cause autism.

Bush and corporate America have long been at odds with plaintiffs' lawyers.

Sinking tens of millions of dollars into lawsuits against well-heeled corporations, trial lawyers receive a percentage of any money awarded in a case. If the lawsuit fails, the clients who often have few assets owe their lawyers nothing, while the attorneys lose the money they put into the effort.

Lawsuits have become an avenue of potential relief for groups such as asbestos workers whose health has been harmed in the workplace and consumers injured by defective products.

The bill sponsored by Republican Sens. John Kyl of Arizona and John Cornyn of Texas would force lawyers who won a landmark $246 billion settlement against the nation's big tobacco companies to pay $9 billion to the states. In other types of cases, the fees of trial lawyers would be limited to no more than five times an hourly rate.

"If $2,500 an hour isn't enough, I'm not sure I can help," Cornyn spokesman Don Stewart said.

Lawyers question the bill's emphasis on big money. "It's interesting that this proposed tax wouldn't apply to lawsuits filed by corporations like Enron against its employees but it would apply to lawsuits filed by employees against Enron," says Carl of the trial lawyers group.

Supporters of the bill say it would apply only to the largest lawsuits, but Carl says the measure actually would have much broader coverage. The $100 million threshold requirement can be met by adding up awards in many similarly filed cases, said Carl.

The bill, which faces uphill struggle in the Senate, resurrects a Texas political battle that pitted Bush and Cornyn against Democratic state Attorney General Dan Morales, a Democrat.

Morales hired a team of plaintiffs' lawyers, sued the tobacco industry and won a settlement in which the companies will pay $17.3 billion to the state and $3.3 billion to the private lawyers over 25 years. Bush denounced the legal fees and Cornyn made them a major issue in a successful campaign to succeed Morales as attorney general.

As soon as he was elected state attorney general, Cornyn announced an investigation of the legal fees, leading to Morales' federal indictment two months ago for allegedly steering hundreds of millions of dollars in attorneys' fees in the tobacco case to a friend. Morales says he is innocent and his legal team says the case was politically motivated.

-----Original Message-----
From: Ralston, Susan B.
Sent: Tuesday, May 20, 2003 1:00 PM
To: McClellan, Scott
Subject: RE: excerpts

Karl wanted to know what happened w/ this. Can you please let me know?

-----Original Message-----
From: McClellan, Scott
Sent: Friday, May 09, 2003 2:19 PM
To: Rove, Karl C.; Ralston, Susan B.
Subject: FW: excerpts

Karl -- The AP may be doing a story about what they are referring to as White House Congressional allies who are seeking to sharply limit the fees of lawyers who sue tobacco companies (through legislation by Kyl and Cornyn to place an excise tax on excessive fees) and who are big sources of funding for the democrat party.

The reporter is not sure if this is going to run, but he said they will need to answer the question "what role did karl rove have in tort reform in texas?" he is asking which version is correct -- your trial testimony or the one from slater's book.

REV_00265647

Have you responded to this previously? This article is going to bed at the close of business today. He said he would just reference both if I did not have any additional feedback.

-----Original Message-----
From: Pete Yost [mailto:pyost@ap.org]
Sent: Friday, May 09, 2003 2:11 PM
To: McClellan, Scott
Subject: excerpts

Scott,
below are excerpts from wayne slater's book and from karl rove's 1997 deposition in the tobacco litigation. the picture rove gives in the book is that he persuaded bush to put tort reform on the agenda. in his testimony in the lawsuit, the picture rove gives is different. he says tort reform "was not my area" and that "I can't say that I did" discuss tort reform with Bush and "I can't say that I didn't. I do not recall." which version is correct?

slater's book:
"The two issues, education and juvenile justice, were on the agenda list. And they were on the people's agenda list," said Rove. "Now welfare, was not, the idea of the compassionate conservative, faith-based institutions _ that was not on their radar scope in a public way, but it was on Bush's. This idea of culture change was really the dominant driving influence here, the idea that we had to change the culture from one that said: 'If it feels good, do it. If you have a problem, blame it on somebody else.' So he chose welfare reform because he said we're not just about educating every child and locking up the bad actors. There's a caring side of this that is aimed at changing the culture.
"Later, we added tort reform. I sort of talked him into that one."

1997 deposition:
Rove: the governor had a very specific tort reform package that he laid out in the 1994 campaign that he largely enacted in 1995.
q. and you were involved and participated in discussions with him regarding tort reform?
rove. I can't say that I did, but i can't say that i didn't. i do not recall. i know that the tort reform was a significant part of his legislative agenda, but, as i say, it was not my area.

REV_00265648

5/26/07

Submitted to Claire Buchan on 5/21 at 6:00p

Key Columnists

George Will Rove
Mort Zuckerman -- Rove
Paul Gigot -- Daniels
Kate O'Beirne -- Daniels
Bill Kristol -- Daniels
Bob Novak --- Rove
Fred Barnes -- Daniels
Bob Samuelson (won't write but will pay tax-free dividends later perhaps)
Charles Krauthammer -Pete Wehner
Rich Lowry, Ramesh Ponuru (National Review online) Rove

Mort Kondracke Rove
David Broder -- ~~Rove~~ not Rove
EJ Dionne Rove if absolutely needed

Key Reporters

Jeanne Cummings – WSJ
Dick Stevenson - NYT
Mike Allen – WP

Likely Sources for Reporters

Grover Norquist Rove
Paul Weyrich Rove
Robert Bixby
Warren Rudman Rove if needed
Phil Gramm Rove
Jack Danforth Rove
Steven Moore

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

Date: April 8

To: Susan

From: Strategic Initiatives Pete

____ FYI
____ Appropriate Action
____ Direct Response
____ Prepare Response For My Signature
____ Per Our Conversation
____ Let's Discuss
__X__ Per Your Request
____ Please Return
____ Deadline
____ Other

Comments: Bill, Neil + el looked but couldn't find that Karl ever said anything close to this.
-Rebekah

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

Date: 3/31/03

To: Pete

From: Strategic Initiatives Susan

____ FYI
____ Appropriate Action
____ Direct Response
____ Prepare Response For My Signature
____ Per Our Conversation
____ Let's Discuss
____ Per Your Request
__X__ Please Return
____ Deadline
__X__ Other Research

Comments: Can you have someone find this quote?

REV_00265652

"Conservatives are just another special interest group."

-Karl Rove, Bush White House, 2002

"Because of your book, I now hesitate to call myself a conservative Republican or even just a Republican. From now on, I am simply a conservative."

– Dale Owens
Montrose, CO

"Reading Connecting the Dots of American Politics has enabled me to better express my Conservative ideals."

– Sandy Williamson
Dallas, TX

A mandatory, Conservative reference on the important issues of today; CONNECTING THE DOTS OF AMERICAN POLITICS provides over 300 pages of expose' on "Liberalism," the "United Nations," the U.S. "education" indoctrination system, Multiculturalism, Illegal Immigration, Reparations, the Kyoto Protocol, the War on Terror, the Arab Israeli Conflict, including a history of the Middle East, the attacks on the Electoral College, Christianity and the Second Amendment, and a thorough "airing" of the issues of moral clarity, culture, and racism.

CONNECTING THE DOTS OF AMERICAN POLITICS

By Donn W. Fletcher

For information about the author and a preview of the book on the Internet, see www.donnfletcher.com, or www.1stbooks.com.

Order, toll free, at 1-888-280-7715.
$19.50 + shipping.

REV_00265653

536027

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

Date: 4/14/03

To: ~~Ashley~~ Estes

From: Strategic Initiatives Susan

____ FYI
__X__ Appropriate Action
____ Direct Response
____ Prepare Response For My Signature
____ Per Our Conversation
____ Let's Discuss
____ Per Your Request
____ Please Return
____ Deadline
____ Other

Comments: _____

FILE

REV_00265654

Cheryl F. Halpern

PRA 6

April 4, 2003

Dear Karl,

It was good to see you, if only fleetingly, the other day at the White House. I hope that you and Jay had a good work out.

I want to take this opportunity to share with you my heartfelt appreciation for the manner in which the President has been leading our country. Enclosed please find my letter to the President, which expresses my admiration. I apologize for sending this to you at home. It is my understanding that given security considerations mail sent directly to the White House would not be seen by either you or the President for some time, if at all. I hope that you will pass my letter to the President.

Many thanks!

As always,

Cheryl

Cheryl F. Halpern

PRA 6

April 4, 2003

President George W. Bush
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, D.C. 20500

Dear President Bush,

I have started writing a letter to you on several occasions but time and again I have found myself at a loss for words to adequately express my gratitude for the compassion, morality and courage with which you lead our nation.

As President you have had to address issues unlike those faced by any other American leader. The tragedy of 9/11 has forever changed the way Americans live. Your decision to go to war against terrorism was a courageous act that was necessary in order to preserve our values and way of life. Similarly the decision to go to war against the brutal regime of Saddam Hussein was a moral and compassionate act.

The experiences of the Iraqi people, especially Iraqi women, are unfortunately reminiscent of the atrocities perpetrated by the Nazis. Although the number of people killed is not as large as those lost in the Holocaust, the public beheadings, the ethnic cleansing, the campaign of terror, torture and rape that has been vigorously pursued by Saddam Hussein is certainly as brutal and horrific. Thanks to your clarity of vision the sins of silence and appeasement that occurred at the time of the Nazi perpetration of crimes against humanity will no longer be repeated with this Iraqi regime.

My family represents a Jewish legacy of both rabbinic scholars and Holocaust survivors. Our way of life is predicated on the teachings of faith and the memories of ever reoccurring anti-Semitism. The manner in which you have chosen to prioritize the war on terrorism and the liberation of Iraq personifies so many of the lessons that the Jewish people have learned through time as well as our religious beliefs. Maimonides, the codifier of Jewish law, taught, "One does not wage war, whether profane or holy, before one offers peace, as it is written (Deuteronomy 20:10) –When you draw near to a city to wage war against it, you shall call out to it for peace." Your deliberation before committing American troops and your repeated appeal to Saddam Hussein to leave his country and avoid war is consistent with this Jewish perspective.

Cheryl F. Halpern

PRA 6

Mr. President, you and I walked together down the path of the righteous at Yad Vashem when we visited Israel together in 1998. Today you have raised America to be "righteous among the nations" with the commitment of our armed forces to save the lives of the oppressed Iraqi people. It is a privilege to be able to say that I know you. I pray that the Almighty will bless you and our country and that we will all go on, "from strength to strength."

With admiration and affection,

Cheryl

P.S. My best regards to the First Lady!

Grubb&Ellis.
Property Solutions Worldwide

Grubb & Ellis Company
600 Six PPG Place
Pittsburgh, PA 15222

To/ Alicia Davis-

Need to get a Thankyou letter to the Chairman.

Love

~~Mr. Carl Rove~~

REV_00265659

RCAC
REPUBLICAN COMMITTEE OF ALLEGHENY COUNTY

125 Seventh Street, Suite 626
Pittsburgh, PA 15222-3410
Ph: 412-281-9748 Fx: 412-471-3271
www.rcac.net

Resolution

Supporting President Bush's call for tax cuts and expressing dissatisfaction with the nations of Russia, France, Germany and China.

WHEREAS, the Republican Committee of Allegheny County Operating Committee was assembled with a quorum present at the March 27, 2003 monthly meeting.

WHEREAS, those assembled recognizing the tax burden on the American people passed a resolution supporting the tax cuts being advocated by President George Bush.

WHEREAS, recognizing that tax cuts are a national issue and that tax relief would stimulate our economy.

WHEREAS, those assembled feel that the countries of France, Germany, Russia, and China and others who worked against the United States in their efforts to get United Nations support for the War in Iraq should not be rewarded with any tax dollars or financial aid from the United States.

NOW THEREFORE, IT IS MOVED, AND IT IS THE SENSE OF THE OPERATING COMMITTEE OF THE REPUBLICAN COMMITTEE OF ALLEGHENY COUNTY,

That this body does hereby support President Bush's tax cut proposal and does support withholding financial support to the above mentioned countries.

April 2, 2003 2003. Read and Approved.

Richard J. Stampahar
Richard J. Stampahar
Chairman

Attest: Robert A Dell II

REV_00265661

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

530027

Date: 4/14/03

To: ~~Steve Hadley~~, ~~Dave Bartlett~~, Torkia, Ekaw

From: Strategic Initiatives Karl

X FYI

____ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: _____

FILE

REV_00265662

From: Kenneth Y. Tomlinson
To: Karl Rove
Subj: Broadcasting to Baghdad/Iraq
1 April '03

Radio

BBG's Radio Sawa gives Iraqi listeners straightforward reporting about the war, humanitarian information, and clear, persuasive explanations of current US policy. We can also rely on the daily broadcasts of Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty's Radio Free Iraq.

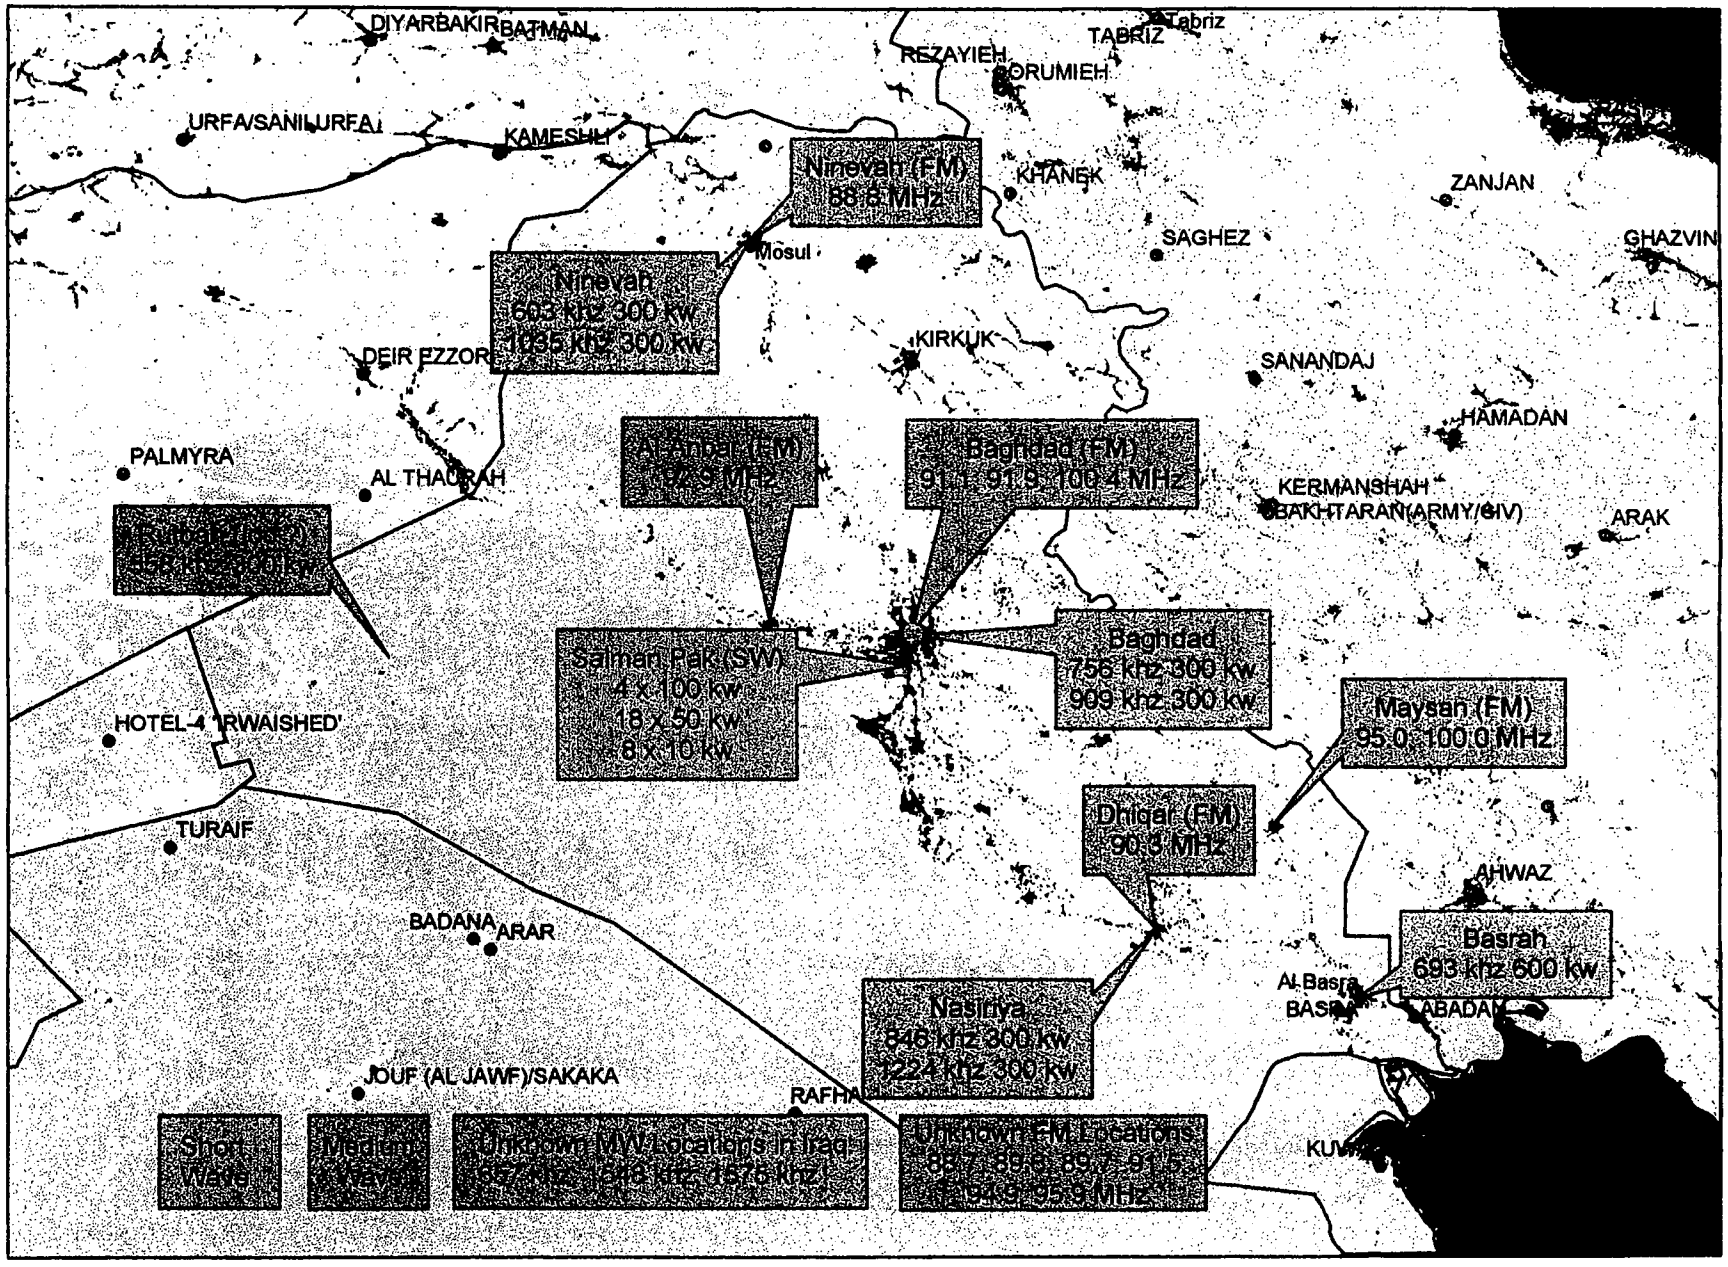
Radio Sawa now broadcasts to Iraq on medium wave and three simultaneous shortwave frequencies, 24 hours a day. Although shortwave reaches the target audience during all hours of the day, the far more popular medium wave signal only covers Baghdad at night.

The only option to improve medium wave and add FM transmission (which is a highly popular medium in the capital) is DoD's COMMANDO SOLO platforms that DoD is currently using exclusively. According to our most up to date information there are at least four such platforms in theater. BBG is accustomed to work with COMMANDO SOLO having done so in Kosovo and in Afghanistan.

COMMANDO SOLO would greatly improve our ability to reach the 5+ million population in and immediately surrounding Baghdad around the clock.

BBG is prepared to implement a decision to dedicate COMMANDO SOLO medium wave and FM assets to this mission immediately.

Attached is a map and technical details of known terrestrial transmission sites in Iraq. If they were to become available and secure, we are also prepared immediately to provide round-the-clock Radio Sawa programming. The signals from these ground-based assets would be stronger and more cost-effective than those relayed through airborne platforms.



Television

The anti-American images that the Iraqi television audience sees today must be countered by factual, objective information. Although the timetable for BBG's Arabic television service is half a year away from its initial broadcast, we must move now. Using clips and segments from US broadcasters, BBG proposes within a week to start providing four hours of daily television programming specifically for the Iraqi audience with a focus on Baghdad. The suspicion of Iraqis that the US may not free them from the tyrant keeps them quiet. They are afraid of Saddam, and they are afraid of having to pay with their lives for any expression of relief or joy at the possibility of liberation.

The television broadcasts discussed below will address this fear. With sufficient additional resources including also COMMANDER SOLO TV broadcasting facilities we would produce for distribution with simultaneous translation where necessary shows that:

- start building the concrete seeds of hope that can sustain the Iraqi people while the bombs are falling around them. We can give them HOPE;
- interview Iraqis in exile who are not afraid to speak out about the horrors they have suffered under Saddam, and who are leading far better lives in the West than they did under the Iraqi dictator;
- demonstrate how Iraqis living in parts of the country that have already been liberated are enjoying better lives and new freedom;
- look in detail at how well American troops are treating Iraqis in the liberated areas;
- look at possible new leaders of Iraq and their visions for a better future;
- examine how individuals control their destinies in democracies, and what life in Iraq could look like under elected leadership;
- counter hostile-to-the-US propaganda to separate truth from lies giving historical context of wars that are known in the Middle East—like the invasion of Kuwait and the Iraq-Iran war;
- offer health segments that deal with wartime issues like malnutrition, water shortages, refugee issues, and preparations for chemical or biological attacks;
- cover the news to include White House, Pentagon, CENTCOM, and State department briefings;

Broadcast Transmission Sites in Iraq

IBB Engineering - Jan. 16, 2003

0 87.5 175 350 525 700 Miles

REV_00265665

5 36027

F: Sk-4

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

Office of Political Affairs
Coddy Johnson
Associate Director

w. 202-456-5390
c. 202-309-1361

To:	Brett Kavanaugh
CC:	Karl Rove, Susan Ralston, Matt Schlapp
Date:	5/21/03
Re:	Response to John Walker Letter

Brett –

Per your recommendation, Please find enclosed a copy of the letter I sent to John Walker in response to his letter dated May 12.

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

Office of Political Affairs
Coddy Johnson
Associate Director

w. 202-456-5390
c. 202-309-1361

To: Karl Rove
Cc: Matt Schlapp
Date: 5/26/03
Re: Weirton Steel Bankruptcy

Karl -

As discussed, Weirton Steel filed on May 19th for Chapter 11 bankruptcy citing increased legacy costs, industry consolidation, and illegal foreign dumping as reasons for the decision. Weirton has devised a two part plan to address the situation:

1) Weirton will use the protection of bankruptcy to shed much of their outstanding legacy costs of $760 million. It is unclear at this time whether the Pension Benefit Guarantee Corporation (PBGC) will step in to help, but PBGC Director Steve Kandarian is considering possible options.
2) Weirton will also file for a loan from the Emergency Steel Loan Guarantee Board (ESLGB), likely for the $250 million maximum limit, similar to what was granted to Wheeling-Pitt on March 27.

In the meantime, the company has received a $255 million credit line from Fleet Capital Corporation. Their long-term viability will depend heavily on the results of the ESLGB process.

Thanks,

REV_00265670

536027

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

Date: 4/14/03

To: ~~Lefkowitz~~

From: Strategic Initiatives Karl

____ FYI

____ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

✓ Other

Comments: can we talk about whether these talking points are adequate?

FILE

REV_00265673

Global Health

The "ABCs" of HIV Prevention

AIDS - Still a Growing Problem

The AIDS pandemic continues to claim millions of lives, particularly in high prevalence regions such as southern Africa. UNAIDS data also indicates disturbing signs of rapidly increasing HIV prevalence, mainly related to injecting drug use, in eastern Europe and in parts of central and southeast Asia, and southern South America. These continuing trends underscore the pivotal role of preventing HIV transmission through fundamental changes in behavior among youth and adults. Ultimately, the most effective way to reduce the numbers of sick and dying persons, infants at risk of infection, and orphans is to reduce the number of infected adults in the first place.

Condoms have been an important and successful intervention in many regions, particularly when targeted at commercial and casual sexual encounters. Reported condom use among female sex workers is now close to 100 percent in such countries as Thailand, the Dominican Republic, Cambodia, Senegal, and Uganda. However, condom use within marriage and other regular relationships remains low in nearly all regions, including the most severely affected African countries. According to Demographic and Health Surveys (DHS), "ever use" of condoms in Uganda was 23 percent in 2000 (up from 10 percent in 1995), 28 percent in Zambia in 1996, and 34 percent in 1999 in Zimbabwe (down from 36 percent in 1994). It is thus unlikely that condoms alone will significantly reduce HIV prevalence in generalized, mainly heterosexual epidemics. Botswana, for example, has the highest per-capita condom availability in Africa, yet adult HIV prevalence continues to increase (38 percent in 2001).

The "ABC" Message: Abstain, Be Faithful, or Use a Condom

Recent epidemiological and behavioral data from Uganda and other countries where HIV prevalence has been reduced or stabilized suggest that an "ABC"-based approach can alter patterns of personal behavior

In the Spotlight
▸ President Bush Announces Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief
▸ USAID Announces New Initiative to Fight HIV/AIDS
▸ Faith and Community-Based Organizations
▸ USAID HIV/AIDS March E-Newsletter

through a fundamental modification of community norms and rules of behavior. Successful prevention programs in places like Uganda, Senegal, and Jamaica have employed a multi-pronged approach to behavior change, involving promotion of abstinence or delayed onset of sexual debut and fidelity/partner reduction, along with condom use especially for higher risk sexual encounters. By finding common ground among diverse political, religious, public health, and other constituencies, such an approach can facilitate a more concerted and unified prevention effort. In Uganda, for example, the participation of faith-based groups, youth, women, and other grassroots sectors, combined with clear, forceful government leadership and donor (including USAID) support, resulted in broad community mobilization in support of delayed sexual onset, reductions in casual partnerships, and increases in condom use for commercial sex and other high-risk encounters.

In 1995, about 10 percent of Ugandan respondents reported having a casual sexual partner, down from almost 30 percent in 1989. This major decline in casual sex resembles a similarly large reduction in HIV prevalence, from 15 to 5 percent between 1991 and 2001. In Lusaka, Zambia, there have also been encouraging signs of HIV decline among youth, primarily linked to a large reduction in the number of non-regular sex partners. Outside of Africa, prevalence appears to have declined in the Dominican Republic, for example, mainly due to reduction in sex partners and high levels of condom use for commercial and other casual sex.

USAID's Position on "ABC"

USAID believes that where there are generalized epidemics, a fully balanced approach to the ABC's - abstinence, being faithful, and condoms - should be implemented. USAID is encouraging its missions to support the development of HIV/AIDS communication strategies that involve input from a broad-based constituency of local stakeholders. The agency has developed new indicators for monitoring and evaluating of HIV prevention programs consistent with an ABC framework, to include median age of sexual debut, percentage of people reporting multiple partners, and condom use with non-regular partners, which reflect these adjustments.

As the fight against AIDS increasingly expands into care and support, prevention of mother-to-child transmission, voluntary counseling and testing, orphans and vulnerable children, and the development of vaccines and microbicides, effective behavior change components must be fully integrated.

January 2003

REV_00265677

Have a question or comment about USAID or the USAID website?
Visit our contact page to find the appropriate resource.

5J6027

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

Date: 4/14

To: ~~BEN MEHLMAN~~ KARL

From: Strategic Initiatives

X FYI

____ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: _____

FILE

REV_00265679

Ralston, Susan B.

From: Rove, Karl C.
Sent: Wednesday, April 09, 2003 8:10 AM
To: Mehlman, Ken; Ralston, Susan B.
Subject: FW: Houston Mayor's Race

-----Original Message-----
From: Chris Wilson [mailto:cwilson@w-r-s.com]
Sent: Tuesday, April 08, 2003 7:26 PM
To: Rove, Karl C.
Subject: Houston Mayor's Race

Karl,
Thought you might find the attached memo on the Houston Mayor's race interesting. It's from a poll I did for Michael Berry, a candidate for Mayor.
Best regards,
Chris

Chris Wilson
WRS
Global Perspective. Innovative Research. Superior Results.
McLean, VA • Washington, DC • Oklahoma City, OK

8484 Westpark Drive, Suite 800
McLean, VA 22102
703.744.7990 – main
202.318.3067 – fax

www.w-r-s.com

12 April 2003

Susan - update data base on your computer and mine.

Then send to Ken.

Ken -
Have never seen a more contorted explanation of why a loser guy in 4th place with less than 1/5th the vote of the frontrunner and all of 6% is the inevitable winner!
Karl

Global Perspective.
Innovative Research.
Superior Results.

RESEARCH FINDINGS

TO: BERRY FOR MAYOR TEAM

FROM: CHRIS WILSON, CEO

SUBJECT: RECENT POLLING NUMBERS

DATE: THURSDAY, APRIL 03, 2003

The Current Race for Mayor: Sanchez cannot win

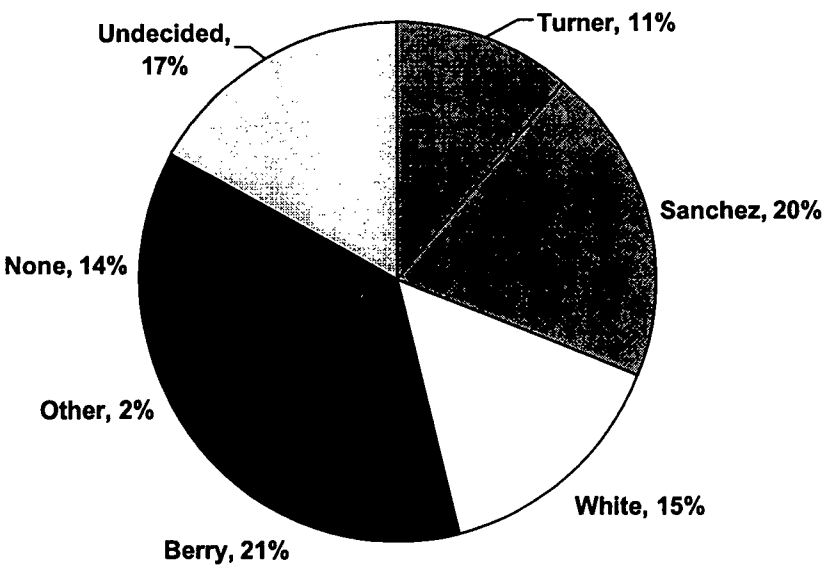
At present, the race for Mayor of Houston is nothing more than a contest in name identification. The bottom line is that those candidates who are better known (e.g., Orlando Sanchez due to his previous race, Sylvester Turner due to his years in the state house, and now to a lesser degree Bill White thanks to his $500,000 expenditure on media) have an artificial lead in the polls simply due to their name identification.

Our recent numbers show Sanchez in the lead with 32% of the vote, followed by Turner (21%), White (8%) and Berry (6%). However, any poll that is published now does not reflect support for a candidacy, per se, but rather indicates that voters recognize the name of that candidate. Of course, by November it is likely that all of the candidates will have equal name identification, and voters will actually have factors on which to decide which candidate to support. Most importantly, more than one in four voters (28%) is undecided.

Understanding current numbers are nothing more than a reflection of name identification, these recent polling numbers say that Orlando Sanchez will NOT be the next Mayor of Houston. As a researcher who has seen literally thousands of political opinion surveys, it is clear that Sanchez cannot win.

To explain, Orlando Sanchez has a soft name ID of 95% and a hard name ID of 77%, yet he only receives 32% of the vote. This is what is known as a "still-birth" candidacy. Sanchez has effectively peaked and has nowhere to go but down. His anemic numbers show that without completely redefining himself (which is all but impossible when a candidate already has universal name ID), Sanchez cannot win this election.

Voters are already looking for another option.



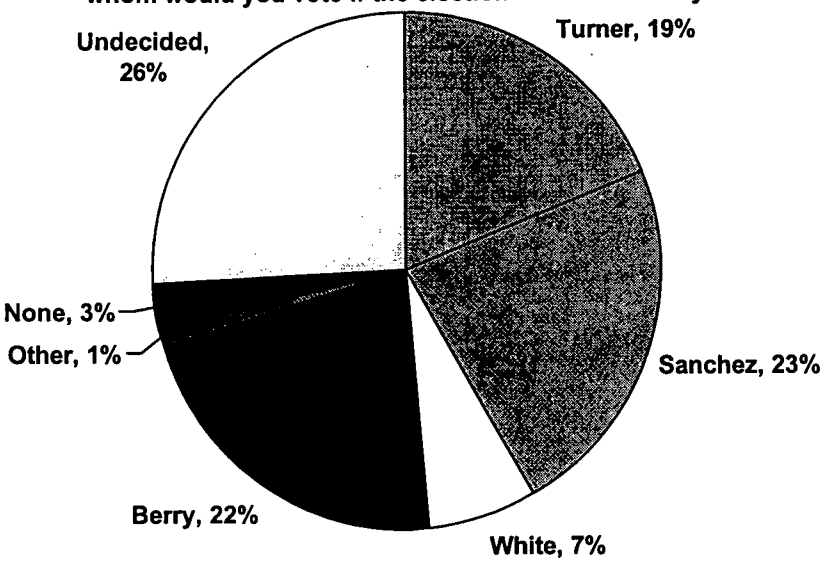
Voters are looking for another choice: Berry is that choice

Conversely, Michael Berry is very well positioned to win. This early in the campaign he is not expected to have high name ID (again, that's all a survey at this point amounts to—a name ID poll), yet he is very popular with voters who know him (unlike Sanchez or Turner) and is the most popular second choice with all voters.

The fact that Berry is already the number one second choice shows that as his name ID increases, his portion of the vote will increase exponentially.

This is far more important, in my view, than having universal name ID in March and points to a surge in support once voters become more familiar with his candidacy.

Who would be your second choice?



8484 Westpark Drive, Suite 800 • McLean, VA 22102
703.744.7990 • fax 703.744.7480
www.W-R-S.com

© 2003 WRS
Do not copy or distribute without permission

Informed Ballot: Berry in dead heat for lead

To fully understand the underlying support for Berry, consider the following data: after being given more information regarding the background and positions of Councilman Michael Berry, respondents were asked what is commonly referred to as an "informed ballot". After learning this new information about Berry, both positive and negative, and simply the type of information they could be expected to hear over the course of a campaign for Mayor, Berry moves into a dead heat for the lead with Sanchez– 22% to 23%.

If you knew all the information you just heard were true, for whom would you vote if the election were held today?

Further, the fact that Berry surges from 6% to 22% illustrates the type of growth potential necessary to win a race of this kind. Berry is the only candidate with the ability to hold a base of Republicans and pick up enough Democrats and Independents to win.

Conclusion: Berry is the only candidate who can beat Sylvester Turner

Most political experts recognize that it is likely that Sylvester Turner will make the Mayoral runoff election due to his natural base of support from Democrats, voters in his district and African American voters city-wide–I would concur with that supposition based on this data and historical trends in Houston.

What these numbers show is that Michael Berry is the only candidate who can beat Sylvester Turner. If either Orlando Sanchez or Bill White makes the runoff with Turner, Turner will be the next Mayor. Again, Michael Berry is the only candidate who can draw support across party lines and across the city.

I understand that some candidates have released data that purport to show support for their candidacy. The fact is, these findings and the manner in which we have interpreted the data are far more indicative of what will occur in November than any name ID poll released today.

As always, please feel free to contact me with any questions.

Statement of Methodology: These findings are based on an n= 540 sample of likely voters in Houston conducted February 8th – 11th, 2003. A study of this size has a margin of error of +/-4.3% at the 95% Confidence Interval.

REV_00265682

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

Date: 4/14

To: ~~DOUG BADGER~~ KEITH HENNESSEY

From: Strategic Initiatives KARL

X FYI
___ Appropriate Action
___ Direct Response
___ Prepare Response For My Signature
___ Per Our Conversation
___ Let's Discuss
___ Per Your Request
___ Please Return
___ Deadline
___ Other

Comments: _____

THE WHITE HOUSE 536027
WASHINGTON

Date: 4/14

To: ~~KEITH HENNESSEY~~ DOUG BADGER

From: Strategic Initiatives KARL

X FYI
___ Appropriate Action
___ Direct Response
___ Prepare Response For My Signature
___ Per Our Conversation
___ Let's Discuss
___ Per Your Request
___ Please Return
___ Deadline
___ Other

Comments: _____

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

Date: 4/14 FILE

To: BARRY

From: Strategic Initiatives KARL

X FYI
___ Appropriate Action
___ Direct Response
___ Prepare Response For My Signature
___ Per Our Conversation
___ Let's Discuss
___ Per Your Request
___ Please Return
___ Deadline
___ Other

REV_00265683

cc: Barry Bobyar Hennessey

SEAN KELLY

MEDICARE | The PRESIDENT'S REFORM PLAN would give beneficiaries three choices. By Mary Beth Franklin

PICK YOUR PLAN

OLDER Americans who are struggling to pay the ever-increasing cost of prescription drugs may get some relief. President Bush's proposed overhaul of medicare would offer all participants some help paying for their medicine. But the richest benefits would be reserved for those who agree to switch from traditional medicare to new private plans.

The President's package is merely a rough outline, but congressional leaders are optimistic that they can craft a medicare reform bill by Labor Day. Although most lawmakers, industry groups and consumer advocates agree that some kind of drug benefit is needed, the devil is in the details. At this point, it's a bit like playing Let's Make a Deal: Is the prize hidden behind door number one, two or three?

The choices. The President's proposal would devote an extra $400 billion to medicare over the next ten years and offer seniors three options.

Seniors could stick with the traditional program that permits free choice of doctors and is used by more than 85% of today's 40 million participants. Here, the new drug benefit would include a discount card that could cut costs by 10% to 25% and offer added protection against drug costs above a yet-to-be-determined annual limit. People who choose this route would continue to need supplemental insurance to fill in the gaps in coverage.

Choice number two would be an HMO with comprehensive benefits (including some prescription-drug coverage) but a limited choice of doctors. This lowest-cost option would be similar to the medicare HMOs used by about five million seniors today.

Alternatively, beneficiaries could sign up for a new "enhanced medicare." Referred to as a PPO, this plan is modeled after the preferred-provider organizations used by most working Americans as well as an ongoing medicare pilot project (see "New Prescription," Nov.). A PPO offers the best deal if you use its participating doctors, but allows you to seek out-of-network care at a higher cost. The enhanced plan would also offer comprehensive drug coverage and preventive care not available under traditional medicare, and would eliminate the need for medigap insurance.

The debate. Consumer advocate Ron Pollack, of Families USA, calls the PPO proposal a cruel trade-off for seniors. "It forces them to choose between the doctors they trust and the medicines they need," Pollack says. Congressional Democrats proposed a prescription-drug benefit that would be added to the existing medicare program. But opponents say it is too expensive and does not address the need to update the 38-year-old program and institute cost-saving reforms before the 77 million baby-boomers retire.

AARP associate director Chris Hansen sees President Bush's proposal as a "positive step," particularly his desire to issue the drug-discount card as soon as possible, even if more dramatic program reforms take years to implement. "We are getting deluged with calls from people who need help yesterday," Hansen said.

One of the biggest challenges is to design a medicare drug benefit that works in conjunction with retiree health benefits from private employers. "Companies want a wraparound plan that offers some added value to their retirees," notes James Klein, president of the American Benefits Council. Some observers worry that if medicare offers drug coverage, employers may drop this costly retiree health benefit.

—Reporter: MATT [illegible]

REV_00265684

536027

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

Date: 4/14

To: ~~KEITH HENNESSEY~~ KARL

From: Strategic Initiatives

X FYI

____ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: _____

_____

_____

FILE

REV_00265685

xc: Keith H.

ME? A DEFICIT HAWK?

AFRAID OF the big, bad budget deficit? Not I. Mind you, I'm not complacent about it, but neither am I going to lose any sleep over the rising tide of red ink that is bubbling up in Washington. And I hate to see the budget deficit becoming, once again, a political football in an increasingly bitter partisan debate.

Yes, the federal budget deficit is on the rise again, after falling to zero—with even a year or two of surplus—during the robust-revenue years of the late 1990s and the first year or so of this new millennium. The reasons are pretty simple: A three-year bear market has slashed capital-gains tax receipts, and anemic business profits have trimmed corporate income-tax revenues. Personal income-tax receipts aren't so hot, either.

Red-ink equation. Meanwhile, federal spending continues to rise on everything from social security to homeland security, from defense to farm subsidies, from medicare to roads.

It's that simple: Sagging revenues and rising spending mean more red ink.

The tax cuts passed by Congress in 2001 haven't been a big factor in the rising budget deficit so far, because they are being phased in gradually over the next few years. But Democrats are blaming the tax cuts anyway—despite the fact that many Democrats in Congress voted for them and aren't calling for their repeal.

It's useful to keep in mind that federal budget deficits have been a bipartisan way of life in Washington for over a half-century, with surpluses a rarity—just a half-dozen or so since 1953. The magnitude of the deficit is usually a function of how the economy is doing. Deficits tend to contract in good times and swell during and shortly after recessions, when tax receipts fall but government spending grows to fight the slump.

CHRISTOPHER ROBBINS

Columnist Knight Kiplinger is editor in chief of this magazine and of The Kiplinger Letter and Kiplinger.com.

KNIGHT KIPLINGER

At the levels now likely, the red ink that is bubbling up in Washington won't be a drag on the economy.

Measured as a share of the country's annual economic output, the largest budget deficit since World War II occurred in 1983, right after the severe recession of 1981–82. That year the deficit topped 6% of gross domestic product (GDP). During times of moderate economic growth over the past 30 years, deficits typically ran 2% to 3% of GDP, and the budget deficit was, appropriately, a nonissue with most voters.

John Maynard Keynes, the father of deficit spending, would have approved. He said it was okay for government to run an occasional deficit to stimulate a weak economy and make up for impaired spending in the private sector. But Lord Keynes also insisted that in boom times, government should run a surplus, or at most a very small deficit—an admonition that members of both political parties conveniently overlook.

Republicans used to rail against all deficits, but most have embraced the mainstream economists' view that deficits that constitute a modest share of GDP (say, 3%) are not risky to the nation's health. Democrats, who controlled Congress during most of the 28 years of continuous deficits between 1969 and 1998, used to excuse deficits as no big deal. Now, no longer in the congressional majority, they find political advantage in becoming born-again balanced-budget hawks.

Over the next fiscal year or two, the U.S. budget deficit will probably expand to some $300 billion, due to continued sluggishness in tax receipts (corporate and personal income, as well as capital gains), federal-spending increases of almost 10% a year, the cost of military operations and phasing in of the 2001 tax cuts.

I am assuming that Congress will enact just a few of President Bush's requested new tax cuts—most for low- and middle-income taxpayers and for small businesses—but won't abolish taxation of dividends, make the estate-tax repeal permanent or accelerate the 2001 rate cuts for high-income taxpayers. Given their modest size, the new tax cuts won't be a big factor in boosting budget deficits anytime soon.

If the deficit does hit $300 billion a year, it will undoubtedly be misrepresented—by politicians and financial journalists who should know better—as the biggest ever. But it won't be even close to a record shortfall. It will be less than 3% of today's $10.5 trillion economy, a manageable share that will be half the record level of 1983. And that's why I am not going to lose sleep over it.

Significantly, the U.S. economy grew its way out of big deficits twice before, with strong economic growth in the second half of both the '80s and the '90s, as the supply-side tax-cutters predicted it would. Will this happen again in the second half of the current decade? It certainly could, if economic vitality picks up, if tax receipts rise accordingly and if Congress shows some discipline on the spending side.

The first two "ifs"—faster economic growth and higher tax receipts—are definitely in the cards, as capital spending by business picks up, companies begin hiring again, and profits reemerge from a brutal reduction of overcapacity.

But the last "if"—spending restraint by Congress—will be harder to achieve. An aging population will send medicare costs soaring in the years ahead, even without the likely addition of some sort of prescription-drug benefit. And there is no reason to believe that military spending will decline much in a more dangerous world.

What needs watching. So deficits are back. But for most of the past 50 years, they didn't impede a steadily rising standard of living for all Americans, and they're nothing to get alarmed about now. Their share of annual GDP, however, does bear close watching.

Deficits do matter because the annual shortfall has to be borrowed, mostly from American citizens and companies, but also from foreign lenders. So deficits put mild upward pressure on U.S. interest rates. And the interest on those government bonds consumes a significant share of Uncle Sam's tax revenue every year—currently it takes about 18%. That's money that could be spent instead to fill today's and tomorrow's social needs. K

REV_00265687

THE WHITE HOUSE 536027
WASHINGTON

Date: 4/14/03

To: Ruben

From: Strategic Initiatives Susan

X FYI
___ Appropriate Action
___ Direct Response
___ Prepare Response For My Signature
___ Per Our Conversation
___ Let's Discuss
___ Per Your Request
___ Please Return
___ Deadline
___ Other

FILE

Comments: _____

_____

_____

REV_00265688

Board of Supervisors
County of Los Angeles

MICHAEL D. ANTONOVICH
SUPERVISOR

April 2, 2003

Mr. Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
The White House
Washington, DC 20500

Dear Mr. Rove:

Unlike the Los Angeles City Council -- one of our 88 cities voting not to support your foreign policy -- the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors, representing the County's 10 million citizens, 88 cities and 134 unincorporated communities, unanimously passed my resolution supporting President Bush, the Commander in Chief, and our Armed Forces in the administration's efforts to liberate Iráq and protect our national security.

Best regards and God bless.

Sincerely,

Michael D. Antonovich
Los Angeles County Supervisor

MDA:aab

ROOM 869 KENNETH HAHN HALL OF ADMINISTRATION, 500 WEST TEMPLE STREET, LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA 90012
TELEPHONE (213) 974-5555 • FAX (213) 974-1010 • WEBSITE http://antonovich.co.la.ca.us/

REV_00265689

F; ASIAN Outreach
FILIPINOS

536027

3/3/03
J. Tafoya

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Contacts: Perry Diaz, 916/691-6642, FAX 916/691-6643,
Perrydiaz@aol.com

Judy Tafoya, 916/6829718, FAX 916/682-7960,
Jtafoya7344@yahoo.com

FILIPINO-AMERICANS UNITE TO SUPPORT BUSH IN 2004

Sacramento, CA – 'Fil-Ams for Bush 2004' was recently formed to unite Americans of Filipino heritage in support of the re-election of President George W. Bush.

On February 17, Presidents' Day, the national effort was announced by Perry Diaz--a recognized Filipino-American political leader and organizer residing near Sacramento, California--national coordinator of the non-partisan 'Fil-Ams for Bush 2004.' Diaz is a Republican stalwart who approximately 60 days ago spearheaded the National Movement of Filipino-American Republicans; it already includes affiliated organizations from 13 states and the District of Columbia.

He explained the rationale for a Filipino-American, non-partisan campaign by saying, "...while it may be that Democrats currently outnumber Republicans, we're finding more and more that we are able to demonstrate that Filipinos are more closely-aligned with the Republican Party's beliefs." He goes on to say, "Preserving the traditional family, individual hard work, self-determination and personal opportunities, sacrifices made for their children's higher education, the entrepreneurial spirit and sometimes just a small business on the side in addition to their regular jobs, and so much more are common traits among Filipino-Americans. These are the things they do and how they live. And, when it is finally put to them whether they truly believe that they are incapable of accomplishing these things on their own, but that government must step in and be their caretaker, Filipino-Americans begin to understand the difference and to realize their comfort zone is with the Republican Party."

"Then, if you take it to the next step," adds Judy Tafoya, Executive Director of NMFAR, "and point out the threatened traditional family structure, the taxpayers' tremendous burdens, the job-busting over-regulation of small business and escalating costs, the shenanigans to block qualified nominees and so much more, it doesn't take long to figure out that maybe it's time for a change, The party to the left which purports to be the champion of the people really isn't."

(more)

'Fil-Ams for Bush 2004' intends to form a Fil-Am PAC, harvest votes and raise funds in support of President Bush's re-election. A dedicated web site will be up and running in April, 2003. In the mean time, support is fast building via NMFAR's network and is gaining momentum with Fil-Am individuals and organizations representing businesses, professionals, and various community interests. Leaders in Arkansas, California, Colorado, the District of Columbia, Florida, Hawaii, Maryland, Michigan, Nevada, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Texas and Virginia are already solidly aligned with 'Fil-Ams for Bush 2004.'

For more information about 'Fil-Ams for Bush 2004,' or the National Movement of Filipino-American Republicans (NMFAR), call Perry Diaz Toll Free at 800/905-0240, 916/691-6642, FAX 916/692-6643, FILAMGOP-Movement@yahoogroups.com; or, P.O. Box 231841, Sacramento, CA 95823.

########

NATIONAL MOVEMENT OF FILIPINO-AMERICAN REPUBLICANS

Vision Statement:

To empower the Filipino-American community through involvement in the American political process.

Mission Statement:

To provide the leadership and resources to build the structure of a National Federation of Filipino-American Republican grassroots organizations to be established at the regional, state, and local levels for the purpose of developing and supporting Filipino-American Republican candidates at every level of government and for supporting Republican candidates to get elected to positions and offices vital to the interests of the Filipino-American community.

Goals:

A. Advocate for the passage of the Filipino Veterans Equity bills in 2003.
B. Organize the Filipino-Americans for Bush by March 2003.
C. Establish FILAMGOP PAC to raise funds for Filipino-American Republican candidates by Spring of 2003.
D. Organize state and local organizations and have them chrtered by their respective states by Spring of 2004.
E. Hold a convention in Washington DC to organize the National Federation of Filipino-American Republicans (NFFAR) by Spring of 2004.
F. Work for the recognition and chartering of NFFAR by the Republican National Committee by 2004.

Initial Organizational Structure of NMFAR:

National Coordinator	Perry Diaz
West Coast Coordinator	Hernando Caampued
East Coast Coordinator	Ernie Gange
Executive Director	Judy Tafoya

State Coordinators:

State Coordinators will be assigned to Filipino-American Republican leaders who will commit to building up their state organizations. Multiple coordinators in each state may be assigned. Interested persons are encouraged to volunteer by contacting the National Coordinator or the East Coast Coordinator.

Contact Information:

Address: P.O. Box 231841
Sacramento, CA 95823

Telephone No.: (916) 691-6642
FAX No.: (916) 691-6643

Email Address: FILAMGOP@attbi.com
Web Site: FILAMGOP.COM (under construction)

The NATIONAL MOVEMENT OF FILIPINO-AMERICAN REPUBLICANS (NMFAR) is registered and recognized under the laws of the State of California on December 2, 2002.

DRAFT
1/30/03
J. Tafoya

MEDIA RELEASE

Contacts: Perry Diaz, 916/691-6642, FAX 916/691-6643,
PRA 6
Judy Tafoya, 916/682-9718, FAX 916/682-7960,
PRA 6

FILIPINO-AMERICAN REPUBLICANS LAUNCH NATIONAL POLITICAL AGENDA

Sacramento, CA —

Known as the National Movement of Filipino-American Republicans (NMFAR), an effort that was launched about 45 days ago has already lined up Fil-Am leaders in 13 states and the District of Columbia for the purpose of galvanizing Filipino-American Republican voters. Five additional states are also targeted.

The Movement's primary objective is to establish the National Federation of Filipino-American Republicans by spring, 2004, at a convention in Washington, D.C. The dream of the Movement's organizers: Full participation of Republicans of Filipino heritage in the American political mainstream.

Organizers of this undertaking are Perry Diaz, National Coordinator; Hernando Caampued, West Coast Coordinator; Ernie Gange, East Coast Coordinator; and Judy Tafoya, Executive Director.

Perry Diaz describes the Filipino-American experience as follows: "The first Filipino emigrants were the 'pensionados'—young men who came for an education in America in the early 1900s. In the 1920s, agricultural laborers began arriving to work in Hawaii and the Pacific Coast—mostly young, unmarried men. Then, in the mid-1960s, changes in immigration laws and quotas again brought Filipinos across the Pacific. This time, however, this 'third wave' consisted mostly of professionals—men and women--and families, as compared to the students and laborers of the past. Our Filipino-American experience, and The Philippines' own history before that, is quite unique."

--more--

"Even so," Diaz continues, "there is very little evidence, politically speaking, that Filipino-Americans—Republicans in this case—have any significant role in the policy-making and decision-making processes. We hope to change that."

NMFAR's Executive Director, Judy Tafoya, added, "What we are beginning to see, at long last, is the arrival of the 'fourth wave' of American Filipinos on America's political shores—a crossing that took nearly 100 years. First and foremost, NMFAR consists of Republicans in support of Republican principles and objectives. Now, we want to work for our seat at the table along with everyone else."

State Coordinators officially on board, thus far, are acknowledged leaders in their communities and states, representing a variety of businesses and professions. Each one has endorsed NMFAR'S pursuit of political empowerment and is committed to develop and support Fil-Am GOP candidates for elective and appointed offices at all levels, as well as other GOP candidates who are vital to the interests of Filipino-Americans:

- Arkansas – Mary J. Bradley
- California – Marissa Acierto, Ely Ayao, Charito Benipayo, Paul Blanco, Hernando Caampued, Celly Carbonell, Nick Catudan, Perry Diaz, Van Dichoso, Bob Medina, Frankie Jaramilla, Eli Perdido, Dennis Purificacion, Judy Tafoya, Oscar Velasco
- Colorado – Nestor J. Mercado
- District of Columbia – Myriam Silverio
- Florida – Ning Aguila
- Hawaii – Hon. David Pendleton
- Maryland – Thelma Estrella
- Michigan – Ed Navarra, Owen Diaz
- Nevada - Geny Del Rosario
- New York – Myrna Littlewort
- Pennsylvania – Hon. Jeff Coleman, Ernie Gange
- Rhode Island – Armando "Doy" Heredia
- Texas – Luz O. Bates, Esq.; Arsenio R. Martin, M.D.
- Virginia – Vellie S. Dietrich-Hall, Myriam Silverio, Gil Zulueta

--more--

Coordinators are being sought for Illinois, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Ohio and Washington, as well.

By the spring of 2004, the National Federation of Filipino-American Republicans will have been established to continue the work begun by NMFAR. NMFAR will drive organized GOP voter registration and support campaign operations as key elements in the development of Fil-Am GOP state organizations, including a 'Filipino-Americans for Bush 22004' effort. It will also raise funds for viable Fil-Am GOP candidates, and others. Passage of the Filipino veterans' equity bills also ranks high on NMFAR's priority list.

Diaz stated, "This is an exciting time for us--for Filipino-Americans. For too long, we have been a minority within minorities, politically. Now, we're beginning to see candidates for local offices—city councils, school boards, state legislatures—and we're starting to gain ground, incrementally. We'll not only support well-prepared candidates who are ready for public office, we'll be grooming a 'farm team' for the future, as well. This is just the beginning."

For more information about NMFAR, or becoming a State Coordinator, please contact Perry Diaz at Toll Free 800/905-0240, 916/691-6642, FAX 916/691-6643; FILAMGOP@attbi.com; or write NMFAR, P.O. Box 231841, Sacramento, CA 95823.

###

NATIONAL MOVEMENT OF FILIPINO-AMERICAN REPUBLICANS

Endorsement and Commitment Form

Name _____

Address _____

City/State/Zip _____

County _____

Political Involvement _____

Community Involvement _____

Phones: Business _____ Home _____

Phones: Fax _____ Mobile _____

E-Mail _____

Registered Republican? Yes _____ No _____

I endorse the Vision and Mission Statements of the National Movement of Filipino-American Republicans and I am committed to work to attain its Goals.

I will serve as a State Coordinator for _____ (State)

Signature _____ Date _____

Fax to: (916) 691-6643 or E-mail to: FILAMGOP@attbi.com

For more information, please call (800) 905-0240

536027

April 23, 2003

Dear Karl,

fyi.

Regards,

tsg

SUPPORT PRESIDENT BUSH'S TAX PLAN!

To: Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island
Senator George Voinovich of Ohio
Senator Michael DeWine of Ohio
Senator Susan Collins of Maine
Senator Olympia Snowe of Maine
Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania

Cc: President George W. Bush

Re: Support President Bush's Tax Plan!

Please stop standing in the way of the Bush Tax Plan!

President Bush's Tax Plan will bring real and immediate benefits to all Americans. A family of four with two earners and $39,000 in income will receive more than $1,100 in tax relief -- real money to help pay the bills and push the economy forward.

His plan will allow Americans to keep more of their own money so they can spend and save and invest -- the millions of individual decisions that support the market, that support business, and help create jobs.

I believe America needs that tax relief now!

And our economy, our President, our country needs you to STOP STANDING IN THE WAY OF THE BUSH TAX PLAN.

Please change your position and support President Bush's Tax Plan today.

Thank you.

Juliet Baden Affonso, PRA 6
Karla Armendariz, PRA 6
Michael Arterburn, PRA 6
Charles V. Austin, Jr, PRA 6
JAMES BESSINGER, PRA 6
JAMES BESSINGER, PRA 6
Carolyn Blashek, PRA 6
William F. Britt, Jr., PRA 6 chris burch, PRA 6
John Carter, PRA 6
Herbert Chandler, PRA 6
Mary Chandler, PRA 6
Esther Chang, PRA 6
Bill Coleman, PRA 6
Tamara Coleman, PRA 6
Fred L. Colica, PRA 6
JOHN CORMIER, PRA 6
Mrs. Catherine Costello, PRA 6
James & Jerry Ann Crawford, PRA 6
Ronald Davis, PRA 6
Charles Dettis, PRA 6
Adam Dickinson, PRA 6

Carlie Dixon, PRA 6
Dan Donahue, PRA 6
Daniel Dumas, PRA 6
KEN ENDERLE, PRA 6
Lorena Hancock, PRA 6
Rayma Hannah, PRA 6
Dennis B. Hardwick, PRA 6
Barton Hartzell, PRA 6
Glenn Hastie, PRA 6
Tom Hayman, PRA 6
Ernie Haynes, PRA 6
Eugene Hughes, PRA 6
Karolee Hughes, PRA 6
Ed & Gloria Hynes, PRA 6
Gary Johnson, PRA 6
Tamara Kaeding, PRA 6
David Keefer, PRA 6
Gordon P. Kellogg, PRA 6
Mary Knobeloch, PRA 6
Lori LaBree, PRA 6
John LaPorte, PRA 6
judy lee, PRA 6

Sixty Second Activist Club
9625 Surveyor Court #400, Manassas, VA 20110

Olivia Lovett, PRA 6
Jane MacFarland, PRA 6
Martha D. Mauldin, PRA 6
Randall McCraney, PRA 6
Barbara McFeters, PRA 6
Lacey McKinnon, PRA 6
Bobby McMillan, PRA 6
Daniel R. Miller, PRA 6
Charles Morton, PRA 6
James I. Nichols, PRA 6
Marilyn G. Nichols, PRA 6
Charles Nickerson, PRA 6
Philip J. Nicolay, PRA 6
lin padden, PRA 6
Raymond Raboin, PRA 6
Kathleen Ramich, PRA 6
Sylvia Reiter, PRA 6
Tal Rice, PRA 6
Claudette Riley, PRA 6

Carol Romano, PRA 6
JOHN SANGENARIO, PRA 6
Priscilla Savage, PRA 6
Linda Scalf, PRA 6
Charles Scalzo, PRA 6
Terry Schwartz, PRA 6
Cindy Showalter, PRA 6
Karl Singer, PRA 6
Mary Smith, PRA 6
Patricia Sodermark, PRA 6
BEN TORRES, PRA 6
Drew Travis, PRA 6
Christina Tunger, PRA 6
Dan Vegas, PRA 6
Martha Vergara, PRA 6
Susan Wolven, PRA 6

Sixty Second Activist Club
9625 Surveyor Court #400, Manassas, VA 20110

536027

F:PAC\61

Family Research Council <frcpub@frc.org>
04/16/2003 04:34:08 PM

Please respond to frcpub@frc.org

Record Type: Record

KR

To: Tim Goeglein/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:

Subject: Washington Update - April 16, 2003

To: Friends of Family Research Council
From: Ken Connor, President
Date: April 16, 2003 - Wednesday

'Big Tent Theory' Pitches Fits for the Party's Future

As Abraham Lincoln, the first Republican president observed, a house divided against itself cannot stand. Neither can a political party divided against itself endure. But that lesson appears lost on Republican National Committee Chairman Mark Racicot. In his pursuit of an inclusive GOP, he has jeopardized the foundational views of the Republican Platform, particularly its stance on the sanctity of marriage. Since its inception, the GOP has supported the legal union of one man and one woman. The party does not endorse the notion of same-sex marriage, does not believe in criminalizing thought in so-called hate crimes legislation, does not support transferable privileges and prerogatives of marriage to the unmarried, and asserts that homosexuality is incompatible with military service. As such, what could possibly be gained from the chairman of the RNC secretly meeting with a homosexual activist organization that positions itself in direct opposition to the GOP views on these issues? Only the destruction of the Republican platform as we know it. The Republican party cannot stand for marriage, yet, in the name of "inclusion" seek to accommodate those who would destroy it. What may or may not have transpired at Racicot's meeting with the Human Rights Campaign is irrelevant. What does matter is that his appearance has lent credibility and legitimacy to the leftist agenda. If the GOP recruits members of groups whose views are diametrically opposed to the party's platform, the GOP will not only lose the marriage plank--it may end up walking it.

Peek-Abu: U.S. Captures Hidden Iraqi Terrorist

The wheels of justice grind slowly, but they do grind. The capture of Abu Abbas is proof of that. Eighteen years after the heinous murder of Mr. Leon Klinghoffer in the

The Associated Press State & Local Wire

The materials in the AP file were compiled by The Associated Press. These materials may not be republished without the express written consent of The Associated Press.

March 28, 2003, Friday, BC cycle

SECTION: Business News; State and Regional

LENGTH: 435 words

HEADLINE: Davis calls on Bush administration to end oil lease litigation

BYLINE: BY TOM CHORNEAU, Associated Press Writer

DATELINE: SACRAMENTO

BODY:
With a deadline looming over the Bush administration to decide its interests in coastal California oil leases, Gov. Gray Davis and U.S. Sens. Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein renewed their stand Friday opposing any new offshore drilling.

The U.S. Justice Department has until Tuesday, April 1, to decide whether to ask the U.S. Supreme Court to overturn a ruling that gives California a say in how coastal waters are developed.

At issue are 36 leases off the central California coast the Bush administration would like to see explored and potentially developed. Estimates are that the leases contain a supply of oil large enough to keep California refineries working for two years and a pool of natural gas big enough to satisfy the state's demand for five months.

In a conference call with reporters Friday, Davis said a letter signed by the three California leaders, all Democrats, has been sent to the president asking him to halt the legal effort in support of opening the leased areas to oil drilling.

"Two federal courts have ruled in the state's favor, the right is clearly on our side," Davis said. "The message needs to be made, that when it comes to protecting our coast, Californians stand strongly and firmly. Keep your hands off our coast."

California leaders have been vigilant in opposing offshore oil drilling virtually since the disastrous Santa Barbara oil spill in 1969. No drilling to explore for oil deposits has been conducted since 1989.

But 36 leases, originally granted by the federal government between 1968 and 1984, remain viable.

The oil companies that hold the leases were given 10-year extensions by the Clinton administration in 1999, and California leaders have been battling in the courts ever since to prevent new projects.

A federal appeals court upheld a lower ruling in December that said the disputed leases cannot be drilled or explored until the California Coastal Commission approves of the plan. It is the appeals court ruling that attorneys for the Justice Department are considering to take to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The efforts of the Bush administration to pursue the California coast comes in stark contrast to how the president has handled a similar issue in Florida.

Last spring, when the president's brother, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, was fighting a tough re-election campaign, Bush announced plans to provide over $230 million to protect Florida's Everglades and Gulf coast areas from oil and gas development. Requests from California leaders for the president to help buyout leases on the West Coast have gone unfulfilled.

LOAD-DATE: March 29, 2003

Digest Briefs

Tuesday, April 1, 2003
AP Breaking News

The Associated Press

(04-01)

SACRAMENTO (AP) -- The Bush administration dropped its challenge Monday to a court ruling halting oil and natural gas exploration off the California coast, a move hailed by California officials as a victory.

A day before the deadline to appeal to the Supreme Court, Interior Secretary Gale Norton said the administration wants to resolve the dispute over 36 offshore leases held by oil companies through negotiation, not lawsuits.

"The administration supports the moratorium on new leasing off the California shore and respects the wishes of the people of California," Norton said in a statement.

The move was praised by California officials and environmentalists who had sued the federal government to allow the state to have some say in the future of the 36 leases in waters off Ventura, Santa Barbara and San Luis Obispo counties.

"The future of California's beaches is now where it should be -- in the hands of California," said Gov. Gray Davis.

Posted on Sat, Mar. 29, 2003

Davis calls on Bush administration to end oil lease litigation

SACRAMENTO (AP) - Gov. Gray Davis and U.S. Sens. Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein have renewed their stand opposing any new offshore drilling, just days ahead of a deadline for the Bush administration to legally assert its interest in coastal California oil leases.

The U.S. Justice Department has until Tuesday to decide whether to ask the U.S. Supreme Court to overturn a ruling that gives California oversight in how coastal waters are developed.

At issue are 36 leases off the central California coast the Bush administration would like to see explored and potentially developed. Estimates are that the leases contain a supply of oil large enough to keep California refineries working for two years and a pool of natural gas big enough to satisfy the state's demand for five months.

In a conference call with reporters Friday, Davis said a letter signed by the three California leaders, all Democrats, has been sent to the president asking him to halt the legal effort in support of opening the leased areas to oil drilling.

``Two federal courts have ruled in the state's favor, the right is clearly on our side," Davis said. ``The message needs to be made, that when it comes to protecting our coast, Californians stand strongly and firmly. Keep your hands off our coast."

California leaders have been vigilant in opposing offshore oil drilling virtually since the disastrous Santa Barbara oil spill in 1969. No drilling to explore for oil deposits has been conducted since 1989.

But 36 leases, originally granted by the federal government between 1968 and 1984, remain viable.

The oil companies that hold the leases were given 10-year extensions by the Clinton administration in 1999, and California leaders have been battling in the courts ever since to prevent new projects.

A federal appeals court upheld a lower ruling in December that said the disputed leases cannot be drilled or explored until the California Coastal Commission approves of the plan. It is the appeals court ruling that attorneys for the Justice Department are considering to take to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The efforts of the Bush administration to pursue the California coast comes in stark contrast to how the president has handled a similar issue in Florida.

Last spring, when the president's brother, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, was fighting a tough re-election campaign, Bush announced plans to provide over $230 million to protect Florida's Everglades and Gulf coast areas from oil and gas development. Requests from California leaders for the president to help buyout leases on the West Coast have gone unfulfilled.

DOI Will Not Seek Review of CA Offshore Leases Litigation
U.S. Newswire
31 Mar 18:08

Interior Department Will Not Seek Supreme Court Review of California Offshore Leases Litigation

To: National Desk
Contact: Mark Pfeifle of the U.S. Dept. of the Interior, 202-208-6416

WASHINGTON, March 31 /U.S. Newswire/ -- Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton today reiterated the Bush administration's goal of protecting the scenic beauty of coastal California. The secretary announced that the United States will not seek Supreme Court review of the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals decision in the case California v. Norton.

The Interior Department hopes that issues related to 36 undeveloped oil leases off the coast of California can be resolved through negotiations with the lessees.

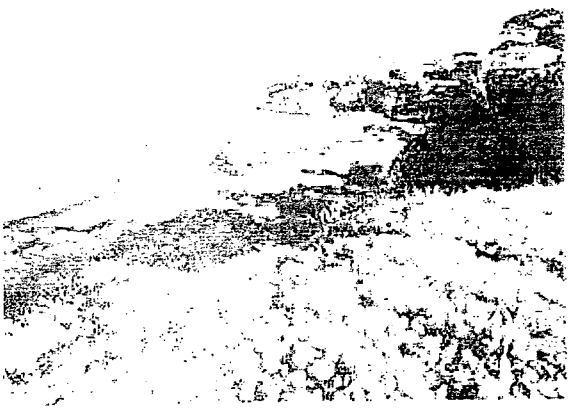
"Our administration strongly supports environmental protection and understands the importance of this issue to the people of California," Norton said. "The administration supports the moratorium on new leasing off the California shore and respects the wishes of the people of California. We believe our efforts will be better spent in negotiation rather than in continued litigation with the state."

http://www.usnewswire.com
-0-
/U.S. Newswire 202-347-2770/
03/31 18:08

Copyright 2003, U.S. Newswire

Bush Reverses View Of California Offshore Oil Ban

By J.R. Pegg



WASHINGTON, DC, April 1, 2003 (ENS) - The Bush administration said Monday it will not appeal a court decision that upheld California's right to ban oil and gas exploration in federal waters off the central coast of the state.

Administration officials downplayed this reversal in policy and said they now prefer to resolve the dispute through negotiations rather than in the courts.

"Our administration strongly supports environmental protection and understands the importance of this issue to the people of California," Interior Secretary Gale Norton said in a statement.

"The administration supports the moratorium on new leasing off the California shore and respects the wishes of the people of California."

Today was the deadline for the administration to decide whether or not to take its legal challenge to the U.S. Supreme Court. An appeal to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals was denied in December 2002.

Californians fear offshore oil drilling could harm the state's coastal areas such as Monterey Bay shown here. (Photo by Robert Holmes courtesy California Division of Tourism)

California officials and environmentalists hailed the administration's change of mind, but said it reflects the realization that the legal challenge was weak.

"Bush administration officials must have decided that they don't have a strong legal case, as I have pointed out all along," said California Senator Barbara Boxer, a Democrat. "I hope that they now also understand how much we Californians care about our coast."

The decision makes it clear that California will have a large role in future decisions about the 36 offshore leases at the center of the

News You Can Use

Enliven your website or paper with ENS News.

Daily headlines FREE!

Contact Us for details.

AmeriScan

Power Sector Could Cut CO2 Emissions 60 Percent

Energy Agency Gets Serious about Biomass Generation

World's Largest Solar Irrigation Pump Unveiled

Nuclear Regulatory Commission Gets a New Chief

Financial Managers Warn of Climate Change Risks

Feds, Colorado Agree on Gunnison River Water Rights

Pennsylvania Creates Rail-Trail Connections

New Jersey Fish to Swim Through New York Subway Cars

Mobile ENS

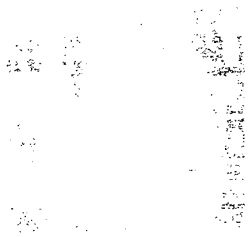
Click for free ENS headline alerts to your mobile phone from TextAmerica.

REV_00265707

with the Natural Resources Defense Council.

But it does not end the possibility that the Bush administration might still try to extend the leases or push forward with new drilling, he said.

The 36 undeveloped oil leases are located in federal waters, some three miles off the coast between the Channel Islands National Marine Sanctuary and the Monterey Bay National Marine Sanctuary.



They were leased prior to the moratorium on new offshore oil and gas drilling and before the creation of the marine sanctuaries.

Bush administration officials have not said they are giving up on these leases.

"They still have not answered the big question," Caputo said. "Is there or is there not going to be drilling?"

There are two formal ways to end the debate - the Bush administration could either not renew the leases or buy them back from the leaseholders.

Not renewing the leases would allow them to expire, costing the government nothing. But a legal challenge from the leaseholders is a near certainty. Some are already involved in a legal action because they have not been permitted to develop the leases.

California Senator Barbara Boxer vowed to battle against any effort to increase offshore oil drilling off her state's coast. (Photo courtesy Senator Boxer's office)

There is precedent for a buy back. In May 2002, the administration agreed to purchase some $235 million worth of oil and gas leases off the coast of Florida.

Some California officials have questioned the different treatment for California versus Florida. California Governor Gray Davis, among others, called into question the role of the President's brother, Jeb Bush, who is the governor of Florida.

"It is hard to say that the Florida coast should be protected but the California coast should not," Caputo said.

State officials favor a buy back and believe the federal government should pay for it. The Interior Department did not comment on its specific plans for the leases.

REV_00265708

The legal battle began in 1999 when the federal government, during President Bill Clinton's administration, extended the leases by two to four years.

State officials and environmentalists filed suit, arguing that the state had the right to review the oil drilling leases under its Coastal Management Plan.

In June 2001 a U.S. District Court ruled in favor of state officials and environmentalists and determined that the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service failed to comply with the Coastal Zone Management Act, a federal law that gives states the authority to review federal actions that may affect their coasts.

The U.S. District Court ruling also found that the lease extensions were illegal because the federal government failed to study the environmental consequences of drilling the leases, as required by federal law. It determined that the state has the right to ban drilling on the leases permanently if it determines they threaten the coast or the state's fisheries.

Conservationists fear oil drilling could have negative impacts on California's array of marine life, including the sea otter. (Photo by Mike Boylan courtesy U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service)

Bush administration officials challenged the ruling and argued the environmental impact assessment was unnecessary because the leases had been extended, not approved for drilling.

In December 2002, the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco upheld the lower court ruling in all respects. According to federal law, the administration had until March 3 to ask the U.S. Supreme Court to review this decision. In February, the Bush administration asked for and was granted an extension to April 1.

Bush administration officials declined to comment on their next course of action, but state officials and environmentalists hope Monday's decision reflects an understanding that the majority of Californians oppose offshore oil drilling.

REV_00265709

other than protect it," Caputo said.

Copyright Environment News Service (ENS) 2003. All Rights Reserved.

REV_00265710

Bush won't challenge ban on new California offshore oil drilling

4/1/03

WASHINGTON (AP) _ The Bush administration said Monday it is dropping its challenge to a court ruling halting oil and natural gas exploration off the central California coast.

Facing a Tuesday deadline to decide on an appeal to the Supreme Court, Interior Secretary Gale Norton said the administration wants to resolve the controversy over 36 offshore leases held by oil companies through negotiation, not lawsuits.

``The administration supports the moratorium on new leasing off the California shore and respects the wishes of the people of California,'' Norton said in a statement.

California officials had been asking the administration to call off the litigation and buy back the leases. Interior officials have said they want the state to bear some of the cost.

In December, a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals unanimously blocked any attempt to build the first new oil platforms off California's coast since 1994. No drilling to explore for oil deposits has been conducted since 1989. The proposed developments were off the coast of San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara and Ventura counties.

The ruling, upholding a lower court decision, said the area can't be drilled or explored until the California Coastal Commission approves the plan.

Oil exploration off California's coast has been an explosive issue since 1969, when a massive oil spill soiled the Santa Barbara and Ventura county coast. Offshore rigs account for roughly 20 percent of the state's petroleum production.

California sued to block the exploration in 1999, days after President Clinton's interior secretary, Bruce Babbitt, extended petroleum companies' offshore leases for 10 years as they were set to expire.

The lawsuit contended that Babbitt's decision was subject to review by the state under a federal law giving California authority to determine whether offshore drilling in federal waters is consistent with the state's coastal protection plans.

Posted on Wed, Apr. 02, 2003

California's offshore oil drilling debate, at-a-glance

The history:

A 1969 oil spill dumped 4 million gallons of crude on the Santa Barbara and Ventura county coasts, prompting an outcry against offshore drilling.

The oil rigs:

Twenty-three oil and gas platforms operate off California's coast in the Santa Barbara Channel, where they are visible from the Pacific Coast Highway. The platforms serve 43 operating leases.

The leases:

Oil companies paid the federal government $1.25 billion between 1968 and 1984 for 40 additional undeveloped leases, each covering about nine square-miles of ocean floor. The leases let the companies do exploration and development work, which typically takes five to 10 years, but does not allow them to drill. No drilling to explore for oil deposits has been conducted since 1989.

Four leases expired in 1999 with no moves to renew them; the others would have expired had not the Interior Department kept them alive by granting extensions.

The lawsuit:

California sued in November 1999, days after President Clinton's interior secretary, Bruce Babbitt, extended the offshore oil leases for 10 years as they were about to expire.

The state argued federal law gives California the right to decide if offshore drilling is consistent with the state's coastal protection plans. The Bush administration contended the state's environmental reviews would be conducted before the sites are developed or explored.

Federal district and appellate courts ruled in the state's favor. The Bush administration decided Monday it would not appeal the decisions.

The oil:

The federal government estimates the Santa Barbara Channel contains enough oil to run California's refineries for two years and meet its natural gas needs for five months. That's about one fifth the amount of energy within Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, where the Bush administration also wants to allow drilling.

REV_00265712

Interior Deputy Attended Oil Lease Talks

Thu Apr 3, 3:13 AM ET

By DON THOMPSON

SACRAMENTO, Calif. - The No. 2 official in the U.S. Interior Department participated in meetings on oil and gas leases involving companies that were clients of a lobbying firm he had worked for previously.

Clients of Deputy Interior Secretary J. Steven Griles' former lobbying firm had huge financial stakes in the leases off Florida and California.

Some of the meetings involving Griles figured in a dispute that ended with the Bush administration paying $46 million to Chevron USA Inc. to abandon a natural gas drilling project in the Gulf of Mexico, just 30 miles from Florida beaches.

Before the Senate confirmed Griles in 2001, he promised to refrain for a year from involvement in any issue in which one of his former clients or employers had a financial interest.

Though Griles is listed as a lobbyist for Chevron in reports filed with Congress by his firm, he says he did no personal lobbying for the company.

While Griles' nomination was pending before the Senate, Chevron was paying Griles' firm $80,000 to lobby the Interior Department, according to reports filed with Congress.

In September 2001, two months after he was confirmed, Griles participated in the first of at least four meetings with Interior Department colleagues about the Chevron project, according to Griles' appointment calendars, which were obtained by news organizations and environmental groups under the Freedom of Information Act.

Interior spokesman Mark Pfeifle defended Griles' actions, saying he acted ethically.

Pfeifle said Griles participated in discussions about the dispute involving Chevron's leases, but made no decisions. The Justice Department (news - web sites) negotiated a settlement with the company.

"Steve Griles made as many decisions for the Tampa Bay Buccaneers to win the Super Bowl as he did on the Destin Dome buyout," said Pfeifle. Destin Dome is the name of the area of the Gulf where Chevron's leases were located.

Pfeifle said the Chevron settlement was negotiated by career employees who saved taxpayers more than $285 million because Chevron and other oil companies had sued the federal government for far more than they collected.

After inquiries by The Associated Press, Griles' former lobbying partner Marc Himmelstein said the firm plans to change each of the three lobbying reports it filed with Congress to remove Griles' name.

One of the lobbying firm's principals, John Northington, said he performed all the work for Chevron. Northington said his work focused exclusively on the proposed merger of Chevron and Texaco which the federal government was reviewing.

Griles worked in the Interior Department during the Reagan administration and later worked at the lobbying firm, National Environmental Strategies Inc. It was co-founded by former Republican National Committee (news - web sites) chairman Haley Barbour.

In 2001, President Bush (news - web sites) nominated Griles as deputy to Interior Secretary Gale Norton. As a condition of his Senate confirmation, Griles promised, in writing, to "recuse myself for one year, from becoming involved in official matters dealing with my former employers and clients."

REV_00265713

At the time, Florida was fighting a proposal by Chevron to drill up to 21 gas production gas wells in the Gulf of Mexico. Last spring, Bush announced plans to provide over $230 million to protect Florida's Everglades and Gulf coast areas from oil and gas development. That provided a boost to the re-election campaign of his brother, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, for whom offshore drilling was a thorny political issue.

Griles also participated in at least 10 meetings regarding 36 oil and gas leases off the California coast. California has blocked development of the leases, and leaseholders are seeking $1.2 billion in compensation.

For two years ending in 1997, Griles lobbied for Shell Oil Co., which has a major financial stake in the leases through its ownership share in one of its 43 subsidiaries, Aera Energy, which wants $772 million in federal reimbursement for its investment in 19 leases.

Griles also lobbied for Devon Energy, which has a 30 percent share in one of the leases.

Norton announced Monday that the Bush administration would not ask the U.S. Supreme Court (news - web sites) to review lower court decisions upholding California's right to review the renewal of the federal offshore drilling leases. That raises the possibility that the federal government will buy back the California leases, as it did with Chevron in the Gulf of Mexico.

Pfeifle said Griles was unaware of Shell's financial interest and removed himself from discussions of the California issue in May 2002 when he discovered Devon Energy's involvement.

Within a month, however, Griles met with Shell Exploration & Production Co. President and CEO Rauoul Restucci. Pfeifle described the Restucci meeting as a "courtesy" visit.

While he is at the Interior Department, Griles is receiving four annual payments of $284,000 from his former firm, for having brought in so many clients while he worked there.

EDITOR'S NOTE — Associated Press reporter Pete Yost in Washington contributed to this story.

REV_00265714

TO: DT
FR: SR
Per our conversation.

536027

Bruce C. Thompson

PRA 6

May 28, 2003

Karl Rove
White House

Karl:

I understand the President will be in San Diego and other parts of CA this week. Is there any chance of me being able to greet him?

Bruce

BCT/drn
fax

Conaughton Barry

5136027

Ralston, Susan B.

OK

From: PRA 6
Sent: Wednesday, February 05, 2003 2:14 PM
To: Ralston, Susan B.
Subject: Brownfield Stimulus Act

Karl,
Good to see you at the White House reception last week. As I mentioned to you, I would like to have the opportunity to occasionally bring a client of Capitol Link which whom I am affiliated to meet with you.
As soon as possible, I would like to schedule an appointment with you for Tom Darden, CEO of Cherokee Investment Partners headquartered in Raleigh who is not only a client, but a friend and major Republican donor to the NCGOP and our candidates; former Congressman Mick Staton who is President of Capitol Link; Jonathan Philips who is the legal counsel for Cherokee and me. We will come at a moments notice on any date that is convenient for you.
Attached is an email from Cherokee with attachments that summarizes what the Brownfield Stimulus Act would be, and the support and involvement it already has.
I am always looking for win-win situations and as a former Secretary of Environment and Natural Resources under Governor Martin, I believe this is the type of environmental initiative that could be a "home run" for all concerned.
I look forward to hearing from you.
Many thanks,
Bill Cobey, PRA 6

Fri 3/7 3:3>

Ralston, Susan B.

From: Jonathan Philips PRA 6
Sent: Tuesday, February 04, 2003 7:11 PM
To: Bill Cobey
Cc: Mick Staton
Subject: talking points

Bill—great speaking with you. Thanks for calling. I've attached a one page overview, the published colloquy between Grassley and Baucus, and an article published when the colloquy was published. Feel free to include whatever you feel is helpful.

Here are some quickly assembled talking points for your email. You may wish to switch around the order to reflect at the top what you think will resonate most powerfully. I've also included a blurb about supporters, Cherokee and timing. Feel free to amend as you see fit.

TALKING POINTS

Win-Win—

TOP 4 Points:

1. Easy environmental win that would be supported by Chamber of Commerce and Sierra Club alike

2. No cost to federal treasury—not another government program, this is a market-based environmental solution. No one is paying UBIT on these investments so no federal revenue tax hit (working with Joint Tax in crafting language); ideal measure for economically troubled times. Cost/benefit study shows positive impact on local, state and federal treasuries

3. Creates jobs, stimulates economy, and answers recent state/city cries for more federal help

4. Complements President's Faith-Based and Community Initiative by empowering religious and other community nonprofits to invest in blighted sites without penalty

SECONDARY POINTS

5. Bipartisan issue: popular with conservatives (and liberals alike)

6. Builds and strengthens communities

7. Cleans up contamination and pollution across the country with private dollars

8. Reduces workload of and expenditure by federal and state governments which currently handle nation's estimated 1,000,000 brownfields.

9. Issue/Proposal has no natural enemies

10. Brownfield tax incentives are one of President's 6 stated objectives with regard to environment

11. Fits well with (and tracks) Brownfield Tax Incentive (Sec. 198); dove-tails nicely with President's effort to expand and make Sec. 198 permanent NOTABLE PARTIES INVOLVED – with organizational contact familiar with issue.

Working Closely with Senators Grassley and Baucus on Senate proposal

US Conference of Mayors—Mayor Patrick McCrory (Charlotte) and Judy Sheahan (USCM) announced in January that they will support it; working with National Governors Association to jointly support it.

EPA—Met with Governor Whitman and she and Marianne Horinko await White House direction on this. Like it very much but, of course, cannot endorse without White House stamp of approval.

Chamber of Commerce—Bruce Josten and Bill Kovacs are supporting it.

National Taxpayers Union---John Berthoud and Al Cors support it.

International Council of Shopping Centers—Cynthia Stewart

International County/City Management Association – Danielle Miller Wagner

GROUPS THAT WOULD NATURALLY SUPPORT IT

Pension funds, universities, foundations, churches, other tax exempts

Environmental insurance companies (e.g., AIG)

Real estate groups (developers, investors, REITS) – favorably discussed with Real Estate Roundtable

Environmental Groups

Tax Groups

CHEROKEE

Cherokee is the largest brownfield investment firm in the world, headquartered in Raleigh, NC, with offices in Denver, NJ and London. Clean-up activities in one state alone are estimated to create $200 million in annually recurring tax revenue. Cherokee stumbled upon this solution while raising its last fund. It learned that US tax exempt investors are finally getting comfortable with the risks associated with brownfield cleanup and are feeling pressure to place capital into socially responsible investments. Unfortunately, investors sensitive to UBIT (unrelated business income tax), representing over 60% of the investment capital in the US, have generally avoided brownfield investment due to their underlying fear of UBIT on these investments. Since no one is paying UBIT on these investments, Cherokee, in November of 2002, raised the idea of exempting UBIT from qualified brownfield sites with members and staff on the Senate Finance Committee and the proposal has since rapidly gathered momentum.

TIMING

The time is now for the White House to seize the issue as its own before a flurry of others do so. Let the President introduce it as a fresh idea generated by the private sector to dramatically increase the private capital invested in cleaning up the environment. The press is sniffing around the issue and eager to write stories. We expect it to be introduced shortly by Senators Grassley and Baucus in the Senate. Several influential members on Ways and Means in the House have expressed interest in introducing the proposal, as well.

Thanks!

Jonathan Philips

PRA 6

THE BROWNFIELDS INVESTMENT STIMULUS ACT OF 2003

Providing Needed Private Capital for Brownfield Cleanup and Redevelopment

OVERVIEW

The Problem

- Brownfield sites are real property, the expansion, redevelopment or reuse of which may be complicated by the presence or potential presence of contamination. Brownfield sites create public health risks, blight our communities, siphon public funds away from worthy uses, encourage sprawl and drain municipal tax rolls.
- The United States has an estimated 1,000,000 brownfield sites spread across the country, with tens of thousands of new sites being discovered or created each year.
- Currently, tax-exempt investors such as endowments, foundations and pension funds can incur Unrelated Business Income Tax (UBIT) by investing in the cleanup and redevelopment of brownfield sites. Because these investors hold over $6-trillion dollars in financial assets, the unintended consequence of UBIT has been to deprive brownfield sites of much-need capital for remediation and redevelopment activities.
- Congress originally adopted UBIT to level the playing field in situations where tax-exempt organizations entered marketplaces occupied traditionally by taxable entities (for example, tax-exempt university bookstores competing against taxable bookstores).
- Because of concerns about liability and the difficulty of quantifying risk at brownfield sites, however, taxable entities are not investing sufficient funds into the cleanup and redevelopment of these sites. At the current rate of cleanup, it could take many generations to clean up all of our nation's brownfield sites.
- The prospect of incurring UBIT has 1) rendered brownfield investment virtually inaccessible to 60% of institutional investment capital in the US, and 2) has had a chilling effect on the few brownfield investment funds that do have tax-exempt investors by imposing strict limitations on the ability to clean up and redevelop the vast majority of sites that are in desperate need of revitalization.

The Solution

- The Brownfield Investment Stimulus Act of 2003 will allow UBIT-sensitive entities to invest in the cleanup and redevelopment of brownfield sites without incurring UBIT.
- This will open investment by tax-exempt entities and will provide brownfield cleanups much needed private capital.
- This solution will cost little to administer and is expected to have, at most, a de-minimus and short-term impact on tax revenues (because these institutional investors are not currently invested in brownfield sites due to their fear of UBIT).
- Because revitalization and redevelopment returns brownfield sites to productive use and to the tax rolls, this bill will create jobs and result in a significant increase in local, state, and federal revenues for years to come.

Click here for documents related to the 12/9/2002 issue of Superfund Report

SENATORS PLAN TAX BILL TO BOOST BROWNFIELDS REDEVELOPMENT FUNDS

Date: December 9, 2002 -

Two key lawmakers on the Senate Finance Committee will likely introduce legislation in the 108th Congress designed to spur brownfields redevelopment by tax-exempt entities by easing the tax code.

The bill would give an additional boost to EPA's popular brownfields program, which was strengthened earlier this year when President Bush signed legislation easing the liability provisions in federal Superfund law for brownfields developers. However, top EPA officials have indicated that the program may face budget cuts next year because of an uncertain budget climate.

Now congressional sources say outgoing Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-MT) and likely incoming chair Charles Grassley (R-IA) are preparing to introduce legislation to make it easier for tax-exempt organizations -- such as pension funds and university endowments -- to invest in brownfield cleanups. The legislation is necessary because such entities hold more than 60 percent of the institutional capital in the United States, according to a statement Baucus made on the Senate floor on Nov. 19.

A source with Grassley's office says the bill is still in the preliminary stages, but will focus on easing the unrelated business taxable income (UBTI) provisions of the tax code, as well as easing rules on deducting interest on mortgage debt. UBTI is incurred by tax-exempt organizations to ensure that they do not exploit their tax-free status to gain a competitive advantage over taxed entities.

"If we were to allow tax-exempt entities to invest in the remediation and redevelopment of these sites without incurring UBTI, we may be able to create a powerful engine to help revitalize our Nation's brownfield sites," Baucus said on the Senate floor. "It also seems possible that we could accomplish these goals in this slowed economic climate with a solution that neither materially impacts revenue or requires significant costs for administration."

An industry source says finding a legislative vehicle for any tax bill is the first challenge, since such legislation rarely moves on its own. The Grassley source says it is uncertain what sort of legislative package the bill may ultimately fit into, but says it will be initially introduced as a stand alone bill.

Source: Superfund Report via InsideEPA.com
Date: December 9, 2002
Issue: Vol. 16, No. 25
© Inside Washington Publishers

SUPERFUND-16-25-7

REV_00265721

THIS SEARCH
Next Hit
Prev Hit
Hit List

THIS DOCUMENT
Forward
Back
Best Sections
Doc Contents

THIS CR ISSUE
Next Document
Prev Document
Daily Digest

GO TO New CR Search
HomePage
Help

Congressional Record article 43 of 153 | Full Display - 5,969 bytes.[Help]

BROWNFIELDS REVITALIZATION -- (Senate - November 19, 2002)

[Page: S11556] GPO's PDF

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I rise today to highlight an issue of great importance to the people of my State and to people across this country.

Over the past several years, I worked closely with a number of my Senate colleagues to pass the Brownfields Revitalization and Environmental Restoration Act. Signed into law by the President last year, this act is an innovative piece of legislation that will promote and accelerate the cleanup of hundreds of brownfield sites around the country.

The Brownfields Revitalization and Environmental Restoration Act passed with strong bipartisan support in both the House and the Senate. It will help states and local communities clean up the country's estimated 1,000,000 brownfield sites. These sites blight our communities, threaten public health and safety, and drain local tax bases.

I am proud of this legislation. It devotes desperately needed resources to address the environmental and economic challenges posed by brownfields.

Still, I remain convinced that there is much left to do. With an estimated 1,000,000 brownfield sites across this nation and new sites being discovered each day, the very best efforts of our government will be insufficient to tackle this growing concern in any reasonable period of time.

For that reason, I have begun exploring legislative options to encourage additional private capital investment in the remediation and redevelopment of our nation's brownfield sites. Such a solution would complement the Brownfields Revitalization and Environmental Restoration Act and could help us make great strides toward creating jobs and cleaning up the environment in communities across the country.

Over 60 percent of the institutional capital in the United States is held for investment by tax-exempt entities such as pension funds and university endowments. Given the risks associated with acquiring and cleaning up contaminated sites, it is no surprise that private investors are reluctant to invest large amounts of capital in brownfields cleanup and revitalization. Tax exempt entities are often prevented from engaging in brownfield cleanups because of the unrelated business taxable income, UBTI, provisions in the code.

The UBTI provisions of the tax code play an important role in ensuring that entities do not use their tax-exempt status to gain a competitive advantage in the marketplace over taxed entities. It is clear, however, that the free market is not moving to remediate and redevelop many of these sites, certainly not at a rate that will solve this problem during our lifetimes. It is my belief that without some additional stimulus, many of these sites will remain unattractive as business investments and will continue to languish and blight our communities.

REV_00265722

If we were to allow tax-exempt entities to invest in the remediation and redevelopment of these sites without incurring UBTI, we may be able to create a powerful engine to help revitalize our Nation's brownfield sites. It also seems possible that we could accomplish these goals in this slowed economic climate with a solution that neither materially impacts revenues nor requires significant costs for administration.

[Page: S11557] GPO's PDF

In the coming months, it is my intent to explore legislative options to encourage the investment of additional private capital into the cleanup and redevelopment of our Nation's brownfield sites. It is my intention and desire to work on this matter in a bipartisan fashion with my good friend and colleague, the senior Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, let me thank the good Senator from Montana and take a moment to echo his remarks. I strongly supported the Brownfield Revitalization Act and applaud the strides that it is making toward remediating brownfield sites across our Nation.

In Iowa, as in many other States, we are challenged with our share of brownfields in places like Des Moines, Cedar Rapids and Sioux City. The cleanup and redevelopment of brownfield sites can help reduce health risks, protect the environment, revitalize surrounding communities, preserve open space and create jobs by reintroducing properties into the stream of commerce that have languished for years.

Philosophically, I support efforts to encourage private markets to help solve problems such as those presented by our Nation's brownfield sites. Given the size and scope of the brownfield problem in this country, I believe it behooves us to look for additional, innovative and low-cost solutions to help encourage investment in the remediation and redevelopment of these sites.

I understand that current law may discourage tax-exempt investors from contributing capital to the remediation and revitalization of brownfield sites. Let me say to my good friend and colleague from Montana that I will gladly work with him to explore legislative options to help bring additional private capital to bear on solving our Nation's brownfield problem.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I thank my good friend from Iowa. As we have worked together as chairmen and as ranking members of the Senate Finance Committee, I have always found him to approach issues in a fair and even-handed manner. Let me express my sincere appreciation to him for the many bipartisan efforts that we have worked on together, particularly the Brownfields Revitalization and Environmental Restoration Act that passed 99-0 in the Senate. I look forward to working with him on this and many other issues in the months and years to come.

THIS SEARCH	THIS DOCUMENT	THIS CR ISSUE	GO TO
Next Hit	Forward	Next Document	New CR Search
Prev Hit	Back	Prev Document	HomePage
Hit List	Best Sections	Daily Digest	Help
	Doc Contents

REV_00265723

REV_00265724

536027

Wirthlin WORLDWIDE

1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

DATE: April 16, 2003

TO: Karl Rove

COPIES: Richard Wirthlin

FROM: Dee Allsop

SUBJECT: Trade Winds Results

cc: Lauren W.
Matthew D.
Fred
JVL

Dr. Wirthlin asked that I send you the enclosed results of our latest National Quorum™. In late March and again in early April, WirthlinWorldwide conducted a survey called "Trade Winds" that addressed changes in American consumer attitudes and behavior since the start of the war in Iraq. The attached document contains the topline results of those two studies.

If you desire more information (crosstabulation, etc) please contact Beth Strackbein at 703-480-1900 ext 3082.

FROM:
KARL ROVE

FILE

MEMORANDUM

BRUSSELS | CANBERRA | CHICAGO | CINCINNATI | DALLAS | DETROIT | GRAND RAPIDS | HONG KONG | LONDON | MANCHESTER | NEW YORK CITY | OREM | SALT LAKE CITY | SINGAPORE | WASHINGTON

Wirthlin WORLDWIDE
1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

April C 2003 National Quorum Survey Results
Field Dates: April 8-12, 2003; N=1,000 Adult Americans
March 21-24, 2003; N=1,003 Adult Americans
Margin of Error: ± 3.1 percentage points at a 95% confidence level

To begin, I'd like to ask you some questions about the situation in Iraq...

*A1. How interested are you in following the events that are happening in the war in Iraq and the war on terrorism. Would you say that you are...

4/03	3/03
71%	74%	Very interested
26%	24%	Moderately interested
3%	3%	Not at all interested
		Don't Know/Refused

---

*A2. Next, how informed do you feel you are about the events that are happening in the war in Iraq and the war on terrorism? Would you say that you are...

4/03	3/03
52%	52%	Very well informed
43%	43%	Moderately well informed
5%	4%	Poorly informed
	1%	Don't Know/Refused

---

*A3 Which of the following types of long-term financial services investment products do you own? [MULTIPLE RESPONSES ACCEPTED]

4/03	3/03	9/01
42%	45%	54%	An employer sponsored 401k, 403b, or similar retirement plan
38%	45%	45%	Individual retirement accounts such as Roth IRA or regular IRA
35%	39%	45%	Mutual funds, which invest in stocks
31%	38%	39%	Universal life insurance (other than what is paid for by your employer)
32%	32%	37%	Individual company stocks
20%	26%	27%	Bonds
20%	24%	29%	Money market funds
19%	24%	29%	Other mutual funds
13%	15%	15%	Annuities
27%	20%	18%	None of the above
4%	3%	2%	Don't Know/Refused

REV_00265729

1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

L. Nestle

10%	France
7%	Germany
7%	Canada
59%	The United States
10%	Other
7%	Don't Know/Refused

M. Orangina

24%	France
9%	Germany
6%	Canada
14%	The United States
16%	Other
31%	Don't Know/Refused

N. Allegra

18%	France
6%	Germany
9%	Canada
48%	The United States
4%	Other
15%	Don't Know/Refused

O. Michelin

23%	France
16%	Germany
4%	Canada
43%	The United States
7%	Other
7%	Don't Know/Refused

RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

GERMAN

P. Volkswagen

1%	France
87%	Germany
1%	Canada
5%	The United States
3%	Other
4%	Don't Know/Refused

Q. BMW

5%	France
70%	Germany
1%	Canada
6%	The United States
14%	Other
5%	Don't Know/Refused

R. Chrysler

2%	France
19%	Germany
4%	Canada
67%	The United States
3%	Other
5%	Don't Know/Refused

S. Mercedes Benz

9%	France
76%	Germany
	Canada
4%	The United States
5%	Other
4%	Don't Know/Refused

T. Audi

16%	France
58%	Germany
4%	Canada
3%	The United States
10%	Other
8%	Don't Know/Refused

REV_00265739

1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

U. Saab

12%	France
42%	Germany
1%	Canada
3%	The United States
31%	Other
11%	Don't Know/Refused

V. Krupp

8%	France
56%	Germany
2%	Canada
9%	The United States
6%	Other
19%	Don't Know/Refused

W. Bayer

5%	France
20%	Germany
8%	Canada
55%	The United States
2%	Other
10%	Don't Know/Refused

X. Adidas

15%	France
15%	Germany
6%	Canada
33%	The United States
21%	Other
10%	Don't Know/Refused

Y. T-Mobile

7%	France
8%	Germany
11%	Canada
49%	The United States
7%	Other
18%	Don't Know/Refused

REV_00265740

1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

Z. Heineken

1%	France
70%	Germany
4%	Canada
7%	The United States
10%	Other
7%	Don't Know/Refused

AA. Walther Firearms

4%	France
30%	Germany
6%	Canada
35%	The United States
6%	Other
19%	Don't Know/Refused

BB. Heckelr and Koch Firearms

3%	France
40%	Germany
5%	Canada
25%	The United States
6%	Other
21%	Don't Know/Refused

CC. Braun

10%	France
47%	Germany
5%	Canada
18%	The United States
6%	Other
15%	Don't Know/Refused

DD. Siemens

16%	France
24%	Germany
10%	Canada
31%	The United States
4%	Other
15%	Don't Know/Refused

REV_00265741

1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
[illegible], VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

EE. Stihl

7%	France
32%	Germany
7%	Canada
29%	The United States
12%	Other
14%	Don't Know/Refused

FF. Miele

34%	France
14%	Germany
3%	Canada
4%	The United States
23%	Other
22%	Don't Know/Refused

CANADA

GG. Molson

4%	France
25%	Germany
30%	Canada
13%	The United States
8%	Other
20%	Don't Know/Refused

HH. Moosehead

5%	France
12%	Germany
49%	Canada
19%	The United States
5%	Other
9%	Don't Know/Refused

REV_00265742

1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1500 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

II. Canadian Club

-- France
 Germany
79% Canada
16% The United States
 Other
5% Don't Know/Refused

JJ. Canada Dry

 France
-- Germany
68% Canada
27% The United States
2% Other
3% Don't Know/Refused

KK. LaBatts

37% France
13% Germany
24% Canada
5% The United States
6% Other
16% Don't Know/Refused

LL. Air Canada

 France
 Germany
90% Canada
4% The United States
1% Other
4% Don't Know/Refused

MM. Bombardier

25% France
14% Germany
12% Canada
15% The United States
9% Other
24% Don't Know/Refused

REV_00265743

RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 [illegible] 1900 FAX [illegible] 1905
www.wirthlin.com

NN. Roots

9%	France
11%	Germany
8%	Canada
32%	The United States
16%	Other
25%	Don't Know/Refused

OO. Ski-doo

9%	France
11%	Germany
17%	Canada
31%	The United States
13%	Other
19%	Don't Know/Refused

PP. LearJet

22%	France
13%	Germany
6%	Canada
45%	The United States
4%	Other
10%	Don't Know/Refused

QQ. Sun Life

9%	France
4%	Germany
13%	Canada
48%	The United States
4%	Other
23%	Don't Know/Refused

RR. T.D. Waterhouse

6%	France
7%	Germany
13%	Canada
47%	The United States
5%	Other
22%	Don't Know/Refused

Wirthlin WORLDWIDE
1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

SUMMARY TABLE OF "FRANCE"

80%	Perrier
64%	Grey Poupon
62%	Christian Dior
60%	Evian
52%	L'Oreal
45%	Yoplait
48%	Peugeot
41%	Lancome
37%	LaBatts
34%	Miele
29%	French's Mustard
24%	Orangina
25%	Bombardier
23%	Dannon
23%	Michelin
22%	Learjet
18%	Allegra
16%	Audi
15%	Adidas
16%	Siemens
12%	Saab
10%	Nestle
9%	Sun Life
10%	Braun
9%	Roots
9%	Ski-Doo
8%	Krupp
9%	Mercedes Benz
8%	Universal Pictures
7%	T-Mobile
7%	Stihl
6%	T.D. Waterhouse
5%	Bayer
5%	Moosehead
5%	BMW
4%	Molson
4%	Walther Firearms
3%	Heckelr And Koch Firearms
2%	Chrysler
1%	Heineken
1%	Volkswagen

REV_00265745

1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

 Canada Dry
 Air Canada

SUMMARY TABLE OF "GERMANY"

87% Volkswagen
70% Heineken
70% BMW
76% Mercedes Benz
58% Audi
56% Krupp
47% Braun
40% Heckelr And Koch Firearms
42% Saab
32% Stihl
30% Walther Firearms
25% Molson
24% Siemens
19% Chrysler
20% Bayer
15% Adidas
16% Michelin
14% Bombardier
14% Peugeot
14% Miele
13% Learjet
12% Moosehead
12% Lancome
13% LaBatts
10% Dannon
11% Ski-Doo
11% Roots
9% Orangina
8% T-Mobile
7% T.D. Waterhouse
7% Grey Poupon
7% Nestle
6% Allegra
5% Yoplait
5% Evian
5% Christian Dior
4% Sun Life
2% L'Oreal

REV_00265746

1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

2% Universal Pictures
1% Perrier
1% French's Mustard
 Air Canada
 Canadian Club

SUMMARY TABLE OF "CANADA"

90% Air Canada
79% Canadian Club
68% Canada Dry
49% Moosehead
30% Molson
24% LaBatts
17% Ski-Doo
13% T.D. Waterhouse
13% Sun Life
12% Bombardier
11% T-Mobile
9% Allegra
10% Siemens
8% Dannon
8% Roots
8% Bayer
7% Stihl
7% Nestle
8% Evian
6% Orangina
6% Adidas
6% Lancome
6% Walther Firearms
6% Learjet
5% Heckelr And Koch Firearms
5% Yoplait
5% Braun
4% L'Oreal
4% Audi
4% Universal Pictures
4% Chrysler
4% Michelin
4% Heineken
3% Christian Dior
3% Miele

REV_00265747

Wirthlin WORLDWIDE
1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 430 1905
www.wirthlin.com

*A4. How confident are you in the security of your investments? Would you say you are...

4/03	3/03	9/01
66%	73%	82%	TOTAL CONFIDENT (NET)
26%	21%	16%	TOTAL NOT CONFIDENT (NET)
25%	28%	28%	Very confident
40%	45%	54%	Somewhat confident
15%	14%	12%	Not too confident
11%	7%	4%	Not at all confident
9%	6%	2%	Don't Know/Refused

[n=452 RESPONDENTS WHO OWN INDIVIDUAL COMPANY STOCKS OR MUTUAL FUNDS IN Q.A3]

A5. If you were buying stocks now, how much influence would the fact that a company were French, German or Canadian have on your decision whether or not to purchase that stock? Would you say it would be...

55%	TOTAL INFLUENCE
44%	TOTAL NO INFLUENCE
28%	A great deal of influence
27%	Some influence
19%	Very little influence
25%	No influence at all
1%	Don't Know/Refused

REV_00265730

1420 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

2%	Perrier
2%	Krupp
2%	Peugeot
1%	French's Mustard
1%	Grey Poupon
1%	Saab
1%	Volkswagen
1%	BMW
	Mercedes Benz

SUMMARY TABLE OF "UNITED STATES"

78%	Universal Pictures
67%	Chrysler
64%	French's Mustard
59%	Nestle
48%	Sun Life
47%	T.D. Waterhouse
55%	Bayer
49%	T-Mobile
48%	Allegra
45%	Learjet
43%	Michelin
33%	Adidas
34%	Dannon
35%	Walther Firearms
32%	Roots
29%	Stihl
31%	Siemens
28%	L'Oreal
31%	Ski-Doo
27%	Canada Dry
24%	Yoplait
25%	Heckelr And Koch Firearms
19%	Moosehead
16%	Canadian Club
18%	Braun
15%	Bombardier
15%	Grey Poupon
14%	Orangina
13%	Molson
13%	Lancome
11%	Christian Dior

REV_00265748

RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

9%	Krupp
10%	Evian
7%	Heineken
6%	BMW
5%	Peugeot
5%	Volkswagen
5%	LaBatts
4%	Air Canada
4%	Mercedes Benz
4%	Perrier
4%	Miele
3%	Audi
3%	Saab

SUMMARY TABLE OF "OTHER"

31%	Saab
21%	Adidas
23%	Miele
17%	Peugeot
16%	Orangina
16%	Roots
14%	BMW
13%	Ski-Doo
12%	Stihl
11%	Dannon
10%	Heineken
10%	Audi
10%	Nestle
9%	Yoplait
9%	Bombardier
8%	Molson
7%	T-Mobile
7%	Michelin
6%	Krupp
7%	Christian Dior
6%	Walther Firearms
6%	Lancome
6%	Grey Poupon
6%	Heckelr And Koch Firearms
5%	T.D. Waterhouse
6%	Braun
6%	Evian

REV_00265749

RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1300 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

6%	LaBatts
4%	Sun Life
4%	Allegra
5%	Mercedes Benz
5%	Moosehead
4%	Siemens
4%	Learjet
3%	L'Oreal
3%	Perrier
3%	Volkswagen
3%	Chrysler
3%	Universal Pictures
2%	Bayer
2%	Canada Dry
1%	Air Canada
1%	French's Mustard
	Canadian Club

REV_00265750

1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

France	Germany	Canada	U.S.	Other	Brand
48%	14%	2%	5%	17%	Peugeot
80%	1%	2%	4%	3%	Perrier
60%	5%	8%	10%	6%	Evian
41%	12%	6%	13%	6%	Lancome
62%	5%	3%	11%	7%	Christian Dior
8%	2%	4%	78%	3%	Universal Pictures
45%	5%	5%	24%	9%	Yoplait
23%	10%	8%	34%	11%	Dannon
29%	1%	1%	64%	1%	French's Mustard
64%	7%	1%	15%	6%	Grey Poupon
52%	2%	4%	28%	3%	L'Oreal
10%	7%	7%	59%	10%	Nestle
24%	9%	6%	14%	16%	Orangina
18%	6%	9%	48%	4%	Allegra
23%	16%	4%	43%	7%	Michelin
1%	87%	1%	5%	3%	Volkswagen
5%	70%	1%	6%	14%	BMW
2%	19%	4%	67%	3%	Chrysler
9%	76%	*	4%	5%	Mercedes Benz
16%	58%	4%	3%	10%	Audi
12%	42%	1%	3%	31%	Saab
8%	56%	2%	9%	6%	Krupp
5%	20%	8%	55%	2%	Bayer
15%	15%	6%	33%	21%	Adidas
7%	8%	11%	49%	7%	T-Mobile
1%	70%	4%	7%	10%	Heineken
4%	30%	6%	35%	6%	Walther Firearms
3%	40%	5%	25%	6%	Heckelr And Koch Firearms
10%	47%	5%	18%	6%	Braun
16%	24%	10%	31%	4%	Siemens
7%	32%	7%	29%	12%	Stihl
34%	14%	3%	4%	23%	Miele
4%	25%	30%	13%	8%	Molson
5%	12%	49%	19%	5%	Moosehead
*	*	79%	16%	*	Canadian Club
*	*	68%	27%	2%	Canada Dry
37%	13%	24%	5%	6%	LaBatts
*	*	90%	4%	1%	Air Canada
25%	14%	12%	15%	9%	Bombardier
9%	11%	8%	32%	16%	Roots
9%	11%	17%	31%	13%	Ski-Doo
22%	13%	6%	45%	4%	Learjet
9%	4%	13%	48%	4%	Sun Life
6%	7%	13%	47%	5%	T.D. Waterhouse

REV_00265751

RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

A11a. How concerned would you say you are that U.S. consumer boycotts of French, German or Canadian products will hurt the U.S. employees of these companies and employees of their U.S. suppliers?

58%	TOTAL CONCERNED
42%	TOTAL NOT CONCERNED
19%	Very concerned
39%	Somewhat concerned
25%	Not too concerned
16%	Not at all concerned
	Don't Know/Refused

A12. Moving on...Have you read seen or heard anything recently in the media about consumers in countries like France, Germany or Canadian boycotting US products sold in their countries due to the US led war in Iraq?

33%	Yes
67%	No

1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

*A13. Do you think that U.S. military action will lead to fewer acts of terrorism against U.S. citizens, or will it lead to even more terrorism because terrorists will try to get back at the U.S.?

4/03	3/03
42%	40%	Fewer acts of terrorism
52%	53%	More acts of terrorism
4%	5%	No difference
2%	2%	Don't Know/Refused

*A14. How long do you think it will take for things to pretty much go back to normal?

4/03	3/03
33%	27%	More than 3 years
29%	21%	2-3 years
21%	20%	6-12 months
6%	10%	3-6 months
4%	8%	2-3 months
5%	6%	This will never go back to normal
1%	4%	1 month
1%	2%	2 weeks
1%	3%	Don't Know/Refused

A15. Based on recent world events, which do you think is more likely to be the target of a possible terrorist attack against the United States...US interests overseas like embassies, American Universities and American tourists, or targets here in the United States itself?

48%	U.S. interests overseas
46%	Targets in the U.S.
4%	Both equally
2%	Don't Know/Refused

1818 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

A16. And finally, based on recent world events have you modified your behavior with respect to any of the following based on any concerns you have about possible terrorist attacks here in the US? The first one/next one is....

[PROBE IF NECESSARY: have you modified your behavior with respect to this activity out of concern over possible terrorist attacks?]

Yes	No	DK/Ref
25%	75%	–	D. Traveling for business or pleasure
13%	87%	–	B. Visiting shopping malls
9%	90%	1%	C. Traveling to and from work
16%	84%	–	*A. Dropping off or picking up your children from school

*n=294 respondents with school-age children; B-D were asked of all respondents

---

And just a few final questions for statistical purposes...

X1. Are you currently registered to vote?

82%	Yes
18%	No

D1. What is your age, please?

4%	18 - 20
4%	21 - 24
6%	25 - 29
9%	30 - 34
10%	35 - 39
12%	40 - 44
9%	45 - 49
9%	50 - 54
9%	55 - 59
8%	60 - 64
5%	65 - 69
6%	70 - 74
7%	75 and older
1%	Refused

REV_00265754

D2. Do you have any children? [IF YES, ASK:] And how many children do you have?

75%	TOTAL YES
15%	Yes/1
26%	Yes/2
18%	Yes/3
9%	Yes/4
4%	Yes/5
4%	Yes/6 or more
24%	No/No children
1%	Refused

[n=750 RESPONDENTS WITH CHILDREN IN Q.D2]

D2a. Are any of your children school age? (IF YES) What grades are your children in at school? [MULTIPLE RESPONSES ACCEPTED FOR THOSE WITH CHILDREN]

56%	No school age children
7%	Preschool/ kindergarten
23%	1-6
11%	7-8
15%	9-12
7%	College/Post graduate
1%	Don't Know/Refused

[n=323 RESPONDENTS WITH SCHOOL-AGE CHILDREN IN Q.D2a]

D2b. Has the War in Iraq resulted in any changes in your children's activities at school?

17%	Yes
82%	No
1%	Don't Know/Refused

D3. What is the last grade of formal education you completed?

17%	Less than high school
24%	High school graduate
9%	Technical/Vocational
27%	Some college
16%	College graduate
8%	Post-graduate
	Refused

REV_00265755

RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

D4. In politics today, do you usually think of yourself as a Republican, a Democrat, an Independent, or what?

D4A. Would you call yourself a STRONG (Republican/Democrat) or a NOT-SO-STRONG (Republican/Democrat)?

D4B. Do you lean more toward the Republican Party or toward the Democratic Party?

44%	Total Republican
12%	Total Independent
45%	Total Democrat
20%	Strong Republican
13%	Not-So-Strong Republican
11%	Lean to Republicans
12%	Independent
12%	Lean to Democrats
17%	Not-So-Strong Democrat
16%	Strong Democrat

D5. In politics today, do you generally consider yourself to be liberal or conservative on most issues?

D5A. Would you consider yourself VERY (Conservative/Liberal) or just SOMEWHAT (Conservative/Liberal)?

D5B. Would you say you lean more toward [ROTATE ORDER] conservative or liberal?

60%	Total Conservative
37%	Total Liberal
3%	Total Moderate
14%	Very Conservative
43%	Somewhat Conservative
2%	Lean Conservative
3%	Moderate
1%	Lean Liberal
31%	Somewhat Liberal
5%	Very Liberal

REV_00265756

1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

D6. What is your religious preference? (IF "PROTESTANT," ASK:) What denomination would that be?

1%	Episcopalian
4%	Presbyterian
8%	Methodist
6%	Lutheran
19%	Baptist
2%	Pentecostal
22%	Catholic
19%	Other Christian (Net)
2%	LDS/Mormon
1%	United Church of Christ
1%	Seventh Day Adventist
	Church of the Nazarene
	Assembly of God
1%	Church of God
	Mennonite Churches/Amish
	Reformed Churches
13%	Other Christian Churches
1%	Jewish
2%	Other Non-Christian
1%	Agnostic/Atheist
1%	Muslim/Islam
13%	None
2%	Don't Know/Refused

[n=801 CHRISTIAN RESPONDENTS IN Q.D6]

D6a. Do you consider yourself to be a born again Christian?

53%	Yes
46%	No
1%	Don't Know/Refused

REV_00265757

Wirthlin WORLDWIDE
1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

Next, I would like you to think about how recent world events may be influencing the types of products you purchase.

A6-A. As a result of recent world events, how likely are you to try a substitute product for one you've previously bought that is made in France or by a French company?

A6-B. As a result of recent world events, how likely are you to try a substitute product for one you've previously bought that is made in Germany or by a German company?

A6-C. As a result of recent world events, how likely are you to try a substitute product for one you've previously bought that is made in Canada or by a Canadian company?

CANADA		GERMAN		FRANCE
4/03	3/03	4/03	3/03	4/03	3/03
48%	49%	44%	47%	41%	46%	TOTAL LIKELY (NET)
51%	50%	55%	53%	58%	53%	TOTAL UNLIKELY (NET)
17%	13%	19%	15%	19%	23%	Very Likely
31%	36%	25%	32%	22%	23%	Somewhat Likely
20%	19%	22%	22%	19%	16%	Not Too Likely
31%	31%	33%	31%	39%	37%	Not At All Likely
1%	1%	1%	1%	1%	1%	Don't Know/Refused

*A7. Now I'd like you to think about how events including the war in Iraq and the ongoing war on terrorism are going to affect your own personal life. I'm going to read you a list of activities and I'd like you to tell me if you are MORE LIKELY to engage in the activity or find the activity more appealing, or if you are LESS LIKELY to engage in the activity or find each activity less appealing given what is happening in the world and in the United States. The first/next is ...

A. Boycotting or avoiding purchasing products from French companies
B. Boycotting or avoiding purchasing products from German companies
C. Boycotting or avoiding purchasing products from Canadian companies

More likely/ More appealing		Less likely/ Less appealing		About the same
4/03	3/03	4/03	3/03	4/03	3/03
31%	29%	43%	29%	26%	42%	Boycotting or avoiding purchasing products from French companies
23%	19%	44%	29%	33%	52%	Boycotting or avoiding purchasing products from German companies
17%	11%	45%	32%	38%	57%	Boycotting or avoiding purchasing products from Canadian companies

REV_00265731

1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

D7. What is your total annual family income? Please stop me when I reach your income.

23%	Less than $20,000 (Net)
4%	Under $5,000
5%	$5,000 but less than $10,000
8%	$10,000 but less than $15,000
6%	$15,000 but less than $20,000
14%	$20,000 - less than $30,000 (Net)
7%	$20,000 but less than $25,000
6%	$25,000 but less than $30,000
12%	$30,000 - less than $40,000 (Net)
7%	$30,000 but less than $35,000
5%	$35,000 but less than $40,000
8%	$40,000 but less than $50,000
7%	$50,000 but less than $60,000
6%	$60,000 but less than $70,000
5%	$70,000 but less than $80,000
6%	$80,000 but less than $100,000
8%	$100,000 or more
11%	Refused

D8a. Do you consider yourself to be of Hispanic, Latino or Spanish origin?

D8b. What is your race? [NOTE: If respondent says "Don't Know" or doesn't mention a punch below, SAY: "Which of the following race categories do you most closely identify with?"]

10%	Mexican, Mexican American, Chicano, Puerto Rican, Cuban, or other Spanish/Hispanic/Latino origin.
73%	White
12%	Black or African-American
1%	American Indian or Alaskan Native
1%	Asian (e.g., Asian Indian, Chinese, Filipino, Japanese, Korean, Vietnamese)
	Native Hawaiian or Other Pacific Islander (e.g., Samoan, Guamanian or Chamorro)
1%	Other ethnic origin
1%	Don't Know/Refused

REV_00265758

D9. Are you married, separated, divorced, or single and never been married?

54%	Married
4%	Separated
14%	Divorced
18%	Single, and Never Been Married
9%	Widowed
	Engaged to Be Married
	Living with Significant Other
1%	Refused

D9a. Are you currently employed, either full-time or part time? [IF NECESSARY] Is that full-time, or part time? [INTERVIEWER: SELF-EMPLOYED COUNTS AS YES, STILL GET FULL-TIME/PART-TIME]

61%	TOTAL YES
48%	Yes, full-time
13%	Yes, part-time
39%	No
1%	Don't Know/Refused

[n=388 UNEMPLOYED RESPONDENTS IN Q.D9A]

D9b. Are you a full-time student, a homemaker, retired or something else?

7%	Full-time student
31%	Homemaker
46%	Retired
3%	Unemployed
7%	Disabled
6%	Other

D11. Gender (BY OBSERVATION)

48%	Male
52%	Female

RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

A8. Next I'd now like to know if recent world events have impacted your impressions of international organizations and international views as well. For each of the following, please tell me if recent world events have made you more supportive or less supportive of that organization or view. The first/next is...

A. NATO – The North Atlantic Treaty Organization

34%	TOTAL MORE SUPPORTIVE
47%	TOTAL LESS SUPPORTIVE
10%	Much more supportive
25%	Somewhat more supportive
15%	No impact
31%	Somewhat less supportive
16%	Much less supportive
4%	Don't Know/Refused

B. The United Nations

36%	TOTAL MORE SUPPORTIVE
55%	TOTAL LESS SUPPORTIVE
17%	Much more supportive
19%	Somewhat more supportive
8%	No impact
26%	Somewhat less supportive
29%	Much less supportive
1%	Don't Know/Refused

C. U.S. support for Israel

50%	TOTAL MORE SUPPORTIVE
35%	TOTAL LESS SUPPORTIVE
22%	Much more supportive
29%	Somewhat more supportive
13%	No impact
25%	Somewhat less supportive
10%	Much less supportive
2%	Don't Know/Refused

D. Government and military cooperation between the US and Europe

52%	TOTAL MORE SUPPORTIVE
38%	TOTAL LESS SUPPORTIVE
22%	Much more supportive
29%	Somewhat more supportive
9%	No impact
26%	Somewhat less supportive
12%	Much less supportive
2%	Don't Know/Refused

1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

E. Economic cooperation and free trade with France and Germany

20%	TOTAL MORE SUPPORTIVE
67%	TOTAL LESS SUPPORTIVE
6%	Much more supportive
14%	Somewhat more supportive
12%	No impact
34%	Somewhat less supportive
33%	Much less supportive
1%	Don't Know/Refused

F. Economic cooperation and free trade with Canada

34%	TOTAL MORE SUPPORTIVE
47%	TOTAL LESS SUPPORTIVE
10%	Much more supportive
24%	Somewhat more supportive
18%	No impact
35%	Somewhat less supportive
13%	Much less supportive
1%	Don't Know/Refused

SUMMARY OF SUPPORT

Total More Supportive	Total Less Supportive	Much Less Supportive
52%	38%	12%	Government and military cooperation between the US and Europe
50%	35%	10%	U.S. support for Israel
36%	55%	29%	The United Nations
34%	47%	16%	NATO - The North Atlantic Treaty Organization
34%	47%	13%	Economic cooperation and free trade with Canada
20%	67%	33%	Economic cooperation and free trade with France and Germany

REV_00265733

Wirthlin WORLDWIDE
1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

Next, I would like you to think about how recent world events may be influencing the types of products you have purchased recently.

A8a. As a result of recent world events, have you substituted a product for one you've previously bought that is made in France or by a French company?

A8b. As a result of recent world events, have you substituted a product for one you've previously bought that is made in Germany or by a German company?

A8c. As a result of recent world events, have you substituted a product for one you've previously bought that is made in Canada or by a Canadian company?

Germany	Canada	France
9%	8%	15%	Yes
91%	92%	85%	No
			Don't Know/Refused

[n=180 RESPONDENTS WHO HAVE SUBSTITUTED A PRODUCT FOR ONE THEY'VE PREVIOUSLY BOUGHT MADE IN EITHER FRANCE, GERMANY, OR CANADA IN Q.A8A-Q.A8C]

A9. How long do you expect that you will continue to substitute for these products?

3%	Less than 3 months
9%	Three months to less than six months
9%	Six months to less than one year
12%	One year to less than two years
63%	Two years or more
5%	Don't Know/Refused

A9a. As a result of recent world events, have you cancelled or postponed a personal or business trip to France?

A9b. As a result of recent world events, have you can cancelled or postponed a personal or business trip to Germany?

A9c. As a result of recent world events, have you cancelled or postponed a personal or business trip to Canada?

Canada	France	Germany
4%	4%	3%	Yes
96%	96%	97%	No
--		--	Don't Know/Refused

REV_00265734

RESTON, VIRGINIA 20195
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

[n=80 RESPONDENTS WHO HAVE SUBSTITUTED A PRODUCT FOR ONE THEY'VE PREVIOUSLY BOUGHT MADE IN CANADA IN Q.A8C]

A10. Based on what you have seen read or heard, please tell me all of the Canadian brands, products or companies that you are aware of here in the United States. [MULTIPLE RESPONSES ACCEPTED]

4%	Air Canada
3%	Canada Dry
3%	Water - General
3%	LaBatts
2%	Ford
2%	General Motors
2%	Lumber Products - General
2%	Molson
1%	Bombardier
1%	Moosehead
1%	Canadian Club
1%	LearJet
1%	T.D. Waterhouse
17%	Other
67%	Don't Know/Refused

[SPLIT SAMPLE; EACH RESPONDENT IS ASKED 1/3 OF ALL PRODUCTS]

A11. As you know, consumers here in the US can purchase products not only made here in the US, but in various other countries around the world as well. I'm going to read you a list of various products and after each one, please tell me which country you most closely associate that product with. The first/next is ...

FRENCH

A. Peugeot

48%	France
14%	Germany
2%	Canada
5%	The United States
17%	Other
14%	Don't Know/Refused

REV_00265735

1920 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

B. Perrier

80%	France
1%	Germany
2%	Canada
4%	The United States
3%	Other
9%	Don't Know/Refused

C. Evian

60%	France
5%	Germany
8%	Canada
10%	The United States
6%	Other
11%	Don't Know/Refused

D. Lancome

41%	France
12%	Germany
6%	Canada
13%	The United States
6%	Other
23%	Don't Know/Refused

E. Christian Dior

62%	France
5%	Germany
3%	Canada
11%	The United States
7%	Other
13%	Don't Know/Refused

F. Universal Pictures

8%	France
2%	Germany
4%	Canada
78%	The United States
3%	Other
5%	Don't Know/Refused

1515 ASSOCIATION DRIVE, SUITE 500
RESTON, VIRGINIA 20191
PHONE 703 480 1900 FAX 703 480 1905
www.wirthlin.com

G. Yoplait

45% France
5% Germany
5% Canada
24% The United States
9% Other
13% Don't Know/Refused

H. Dannon

23% France
10% Germany
8% Canada
34% The United States
11% Other
14% Don't Know/Refused

I. French's mustard

29% France
1% Germany
1% Canada
64% The United States
1% Other
4% Don't Know/Refused

J. Grey Poupon

64% France
7% Germany
1% Canada
15% The United States
6% Other
7% Don't Know/Refused

K. L'Oreal

52% France
2% Germany
4% Canada
28% The United States
3% Other
10% Don't Know/Refused

REV_00265737

Records Management, White House Office of (ORM)

Subject Files

FG006-27
(Office of Senior Advisor-Karl Rove)

536037

OA/NARA#: 10735/10793
9711

Box
Folder

REV_00265760

2018-0011-P [ ]

Systematic Processing Marker

This is not a textual record. This Systematic Processing Marker indicates that material has been removed during systematic processing by George W. Bush Presidential Library staff.

WHORM
FG006-27

Stack:	Row:	Sect.:	Shelf:	Pos.:	FRC ID:	Location or Hollinger ID:	NARA Number:	OA Number:
W	11	4	3	1	9711		10793	10735

Folder Title:

536037

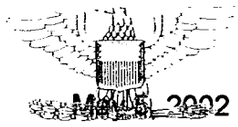
536037

June 15, 2002

RE: Alternative DVA Health Care Concept Submitted May 10,2002

Mr. Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President

Dear Mr. Rove:



This is to update you on developments since your letter of May 21, 2002. I realize that the inefficient and wasteful DVA system can only be reformed with a long-term strategy. Hopefully, this first step will be feasible as a GOP campaign issue in 2004.

You undoubtedly remember how the entitlement-demanding professional veterans (mostly with brief periods of non-combat service) turned their backs on former President Bush in 1992. They have a major share of blame for the recent 8 years of bad foreign and defense policies. Although the National staffs of the VFW and TROA have tried to dismiss this concept out of hand, it was unanimously endorsed by both my local VFW Post (8194, Stuart, FL) and TROA (FL Treasure Coast) chapter.

On June 12th, my fellow Martin Co. GOP Executive Committee members voted 63% (27 to 17) in favor of it, just missing the 2/3 needed to pass. A few veteran members who didn't closely read the copy that was mailed to them and confused several people in the audience into believing they would have to wait until 60 to get VA treatment and that I was advocating depriving peace time vets. Considering that was my second meeting as a member, I'm very encouraged. Enclosed is the non-partisan version I'm currently working through AUSA.

Sincerely,

PRA 6

Association of the United States Army
Resolutions Committee
Government Affairs Directorate

Gentlemen:

Enclosed is a proposed resolution for reforming and enhancing the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs (DVA) health care system.

Few leaders in government, the media and key segments of our society have any military service. Unfortunately, this has made it easy for liberals and their allies in Congress to degrade the prestige of an Honorable Discharge. The DVA also is no longer dominated by veterans who understand veteran-unique problems as it was from the post-war era through the 1980s. Consequently, an unfair DVA priority system currently reflects post-Viet Nam victimization and liberal guilt trends within our culture. It simply is wrong for our gallant warriors from World War II and the Korean Conflict to compete on waiting lists for treatment with able bodied younger peace time veterans, especially those with substandard service records.

I have also enclosed a supporting editorial and would appreciate your forwarding copies to the editorial staff of Army magazine and the AUSA news. Your server appears to be having problems. Once it is repaired please contact me and I will E-mail you electronic copies.

Sincerely,

Signed
Charles J. Winn
Colonel, AUS (Retired)

PRA 6

5 May 2002

PROPOSED RESOLUTION FOR THE ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES ARMY

SUBJECT: VETERANS HEALTH CARE ENHANCEMENT

SUBMITTED BY: Colonel Chuck Winn, AUS (Ret)

PRA 6

All veterans separated under honorable conditions are entitled to some form of quality medical treatment. The recent opening of the Department of Veterans Affairs (DVA) medical treatment facilities to all veterans however, regardless of status, created second-order adverse impacts on our most deserving veterans. These include our World War II and Korean War veteran populations who are in most need of medical care. Other honorably discharged veterans who served in combat theaters, deployed on contingency operations, or in support assignments during periods of hostilities have made the most contributions and greatest sacrifices. Like our greatest generation of veterans they too deserve local, no-hassle quality health care.

A fairer and more cost-effective method of providing health care can be achieved, without building and staffing new or expanded DVA medical facilities and infrastructure. This can be accomplished through a DVA-funded enrollment card used for payment of any board-certified hospital, clinic or health care provider in the private sector.

WE THEREFORE RESOLVE to urge the Administration and Congress to:

- Establish a premium veterans' health care plan for our veterans who have gone above and beyond, modeled on the Department of Defense (DoD) TRICARE system.
- Determine eligibility on a point system assigning weighted criteria on such variables as service in combat, length of service on active duty, the numbers of deployments for contingencies, degree(s) of service-connected disability; type of military occupational specialty; and age.
- Make all honorably discharged veterans who completed a full term of active or reserve service eligible upon reaching age 60.
- Continue funding and operating existing DVA hospitals and medical facilities at current levels for treatment of veterans until they criteria for the premium plan.
- Redefine treatment priorities at all DVA medical facilities with highest categories based on character and length of service, medical condition and economic need.
- Establish an absolute disqualification for such premium plan to any veteran with less than an honorable discharge or a record of substandard service.

May 5, 2002

A Veterans' Health Care Proposal

PRA 6

Veterans who have gone the extra mile for their country deserve local, no-hassle quality health care. Ex-servicemen and women from all regions of the country, must also receive their fair share of the Department of Veterans' Affairs (DVA) resources for this purpose. A fair and cost-effective method of achieving this is possible without building and staffing new or expanded DVA medical facilities and infrastructure.

Unfortunately, the recent opening of the doors of DVA medical treatment facilities to all veterans, regardless of status, created second, and third-order adverse impacts on our most deserving veterans, who have made the greatest sacrifices and are in most need of care. Honorably discharged veterans who served in combat theaters, deployed on contingency operations, or in support assignments during periods of hostilities contributed more than others. For years, politically untouchable "sacred cows" have been the large number of veterans who draw various degrees of disability payments for conditions contracted during relatively short periods of peacetime service. Not to denigrate supporting duties or peacetime service, but considering all military service relatively equal is absurd. Why, for example, should an ailing World War II or Korean War combat veteran have to compete on waiting lists on the same footing with a peacetime veteran with a general discharge for drug or alcohol abuse? A less extreme example is a combat veteran having a lower priority than an honorably discharged peacetime veteran with a service-connected disability contracted from an off duty sports injury.

A premium veterans' health care plan must be established for our veterans who have gone above and beyond. Such a plan could be modeled on either the Department of Defense (DoD) TRICARE system or possibly MEDICARE. Eligibility could be determined on a point system assigning weighted criteria on such variables as service in combat, length of service on active duty, the numbers of deployments for contingencies, degree(s) of service-connected disability; and type of military occupational specialty. Age should also be a factor. Perhaps any honorably discharged veteran who completed a full term of service could become entitled to the premium treatment plan upon reaching age 60. General guidelines might be:

- All honorably discharged vets would become eligible for the premium plan at age 60. This would include those with one full enlistment or term or service and honorably discharged reservists who completed their full service obligations.

- At age 50, all honorably discharged after a full term who deployed OCONUS to an active warfighting theater resulting in a campaign or expeditionary medal; reservists activated for contingencies or war time service, or gray area reservists with 20 years qualifying service for retirement, would become eligible.

- Any veteran with a VA disability exceeding 70 percent, or any combat wounded veteran would be eligible regardless of age.

- All honorably discharged vets should be eligible for a TRICARE-style pharmacy system regardless of age.

- All other veterans should be required to use VA facilities until reaching the minimum age for the premium plan. Highest priority Should be based on character and length of service and economic need. i.e. all honorably discharged vets get a higher priority over general discharge types regardless of how dire their economic circumstances.

Our older veterans should not have to travel for quality care, or compete on waiting lists with the maladjusted and able-bodied who were separated for sub-standard performance or misconduct. Premium DVA enrollees could be issued a credit card-style enrollment card that could be accepted by any board-certified hospital, clinic or health care provider.

All veterans separated under honorable conditions are entitled to some form of quality medical treatment. This mass base of veterans can provide the patient load to keep DVA hospitals properly funded and operating at existing levels. A premium service must also be established however, for our greatest generation and veterans from other eras who have gone above and beyond. Under no circumstances however, should a veteran with less than an honorable discharge be eligible. Unquestionably, this proposal requires additional definition, but it is a sound and compassionate alternative to expanded and less efficient bigger government programs.

536037

National Journal

19 June 2003

VIA FACSIMILE

Alberto R. Gonzales
White House Counsel
The White House

RE: National Journal article about Bush White House and Hatch Act requirements

Dear Judge Gonzales:

I believe you are aware through the White House Press Office that National Journal will publish an article in its issue of June 27 regarding the responsibilities and challenges posed to White House employees and others in the government during the re-election season, as they juggle governing responsibilities and campaign enthusiasm.

As with previous White House counsels, you recently distributed a memo to staff providing explanatory information related to the Hatch Act and its 1993 reform amendments.

I would like to interview you, for the record, about the advisory you and Brett Kavanaugh shared with staff, and the general procedures President Bush expects his staff, the Vice President's staff, and others in the Bush administration to follow to avoid any question of wrongdoing or abuse of Treasury resources for partisan political purposes. I am familiar with former Counsel Abner Mikva's April 27, 1995, memo and would like you to describe how President Bush would compare his interpretations of the Hatch Act and his own provisos to those of the previous administration, which obviously ran into difficulties on this score.

I am, of course, interested in the president's application of appropriate procedures to Senior Adviser Karl Rove and his staff, the Office of Political Affairs, the Office of Public Liaison, Cabinet Affairs, and others who hold dual responsibilities for helping the President as he governs while also tending to campaign considerations. I have made a separate such request to David Addington in the Vice President's office through Mr. Cheney's press office.

My deadline is no later than midday June 25, and preferably earlier.

Thank you in advance for your assistance.

Alexis Simendinger

Alexis Simendinger
White House Correspondent
National Journal
202-739-8490
202-833-8069 Fax

cc: Dan Bartlett, Communications Director
Ari Fleischer & Ashley Snee, Press Office
Karl Rove, Office of Strategic Initiatives
David Addington, Office of the Vice President

REV_00265770

536037

LE COVP
FRISEVR
München - Hamburg - Berlin

LE COVP Coiffeur et Beauté GmbH
Verwaltung : Pienzenauerstr. 18 81679 München
White House
Mr. Carl Rove
Senior adviser to the President

Washington DC
USA

18 th June 2002

Invoice

Dear Mr. Rove,

Le Coup Coiffeur et Beauté GmbH is located near the reception hall in the Hotel Adlon in Berlin. The safety-measures taken during the visit of President Bush in May caused the closure of our business-rooms.

The business rooms remained closed on 22nd and 23rd of May 2002.
This costs a loss of two full days amounting to the sum of € 2.400,00.

Please settle the bill within 4 weeks to our account

HypoVereinsbank Munich
Account number PRA 6
National bank code PRA 6

Yours sincerely

Annette Angermaier
LE COVP

LE COVP Coiffeur et Beauté GmbH
Im Hotel Adlon, Unter den Linden 77, 10117 Berlin
Verwaltung: Pienzenauerstr. 18 81679 München
Telefon 089-2714088 Fax 089-2714089

536037

CENTER FOR COMMUNITY CHANGE BACKGROUNDER

Company Profile

- "For almost 30 years, CCC has been nationally recognized for its work helping people build organizations and create better communities and policies. The Center's 84 person staff includes many of the nation's leading experts on community development, community organizing, leadership training, coalition-building, housing, welfare reform, jobs, economic development, banking and reinvestment, and Native American issues." (CCC's Website, www.communitychange.org, Accessed 6/11/2003)

- "The Center for Community Change is committed to reducing poverty and rebuilding low income communities. To do this, we help people to develop the skills and resources they need to improve their communities as well as change policies and institutions that adversely affect their lives. We believe that poor people themselves – through organizations they control – need to lead efforts to eliminate poverty." (CCC's Website, www.communitychange.org, Accessed 6/11/2003)

- CCC Focuses on low-income communities, especially those of color. Additionally, they look for groups whose aim is to create progressive social change to benefit their constituents as well as a community that has serious social problems, such as poverty or high unemployment. (CCC's Website, www.communitychange.org, Accessed 6/11/2003)

- "The National Campaign for Jobs and Income Support (NCJIS), a project of the Center for Community Change (CCC), is a coalition of more than 1000 grassroots anti-poverty groups that have been organizing since 2000 to transform TANF into a meaningful anti-poverty program. Under the banner Make TANF Work! (www.maketanfwork.org), the National Campaign is spearheading a national effort to fashion a progressive policy and political strategy on welfare reform reauthorization." ("New Poverty Data Should Turn Welfare Debate On Its Head," US Newswire, 9/24/02)

Employees

Deepak Bhargava: Executive Director

Richard Stolz: Deputy Director For Public Policy

Stephanie Robinson: Director Of Public Policy; Former General Counsel To Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.)

Rachel Gragg: Senior Policy Analyst; Former Policy Adviser For The Late Sen. Paul Wellstone, D- Minn. (1991-2002).

Benson Roberts: Board Member, CCC; Working On President Bush's "Renewing The Dream" Tax Credit To Benefit Low-Income Homebuyers.

Anti-Bush Child Tax Credit Ad

On June 5, 2003, Center For Community Change Lauched An Ad Claiming Bush Chose The Fortunate Over The Needy. "In another effort to build pressure, a coalition of liberal groups today begins airing TV ads in Washington blasting Bush for leaving the working poor out of the child credit benefit increase. The Center for Community Change is buying a relatively modest amount of airtime, but it is encouraging hundreds of like-minded groups to air the same ad in other cities. The ad shows two children: one too poor to qualify for the increased credit and another, whose parents make more money, who receives it. 'President Bush chose the most fortunate to get the most,' an announcer says." (William M. Welch, "Study: Military Kids Slighted On Tax Credit," USA Today, 6/5/03)

The Ad, Run On Cable News Television, Is Set To Run For Two Weeks, But May Be Extended. "Center for Community Change spokeswoman Germonique Jones said the spot began running last Thursday [6/5/03] in Washington on CNN, CNBC, MSNBC and Fox News Channel. The spot is scheduled to air for two weeks, but Jones said the group could change the buy depending on congressional action on the issue. Squier Knapp Dunn Communications produced the spot." (Mark H. Rodeffer, "Group Bashes Bush On Child Tax Credit," National Journal, 6/10/2003)

Anti-Bush Statements And Policy Positions

"The Sheep's Clothing Has Long Come Off 'Compassionate Conservatism' And President Bush's True Colors Are In Full View. This Administration Is Engineering The Most Comprehensive Assault On Poor Americans Since The Reagan Years." (CCC Press Release, "CCC Nominates Bush Administration For Oscar," 2/13/03)

Center For Community Change Opposes President Bush's Work Initiatives. "'For all the fanfare in the 1990s about how we were going to reward work, what's happening now is the reverse - we're punishing work,' says Deepak Bhargava, executive director of the Center for Community Change, a Washington-based advocacy group." (Holly Yeager, "State Fiscal Crises And Law Changes Hit Nation's Working Poor," Financial Times [London], 1/25/03)

In January 2003, The ED of CCC Vocally Opposed Bush's Work Initiatives, Calling The Bill "Bankrupt". "Advocates for the poor criticized Bush for pushing the same plan that couldn't muster enough support last year in the Senate. Welfare measures stalled in the then Democratic-controlled Senate. 'Bush is proposing the same bankrupt bill that failed last year,' said Deepak Bhargava, executive director of the Center for Community Change, an advocacy group. 'Bush has been bashed for a week for giving away the store to the rich and [now] they want to show that they care about the poor. But this is the wrong way to do it.'" (Deborah Barfield Berry, "Bush Touts Welfare Changes," Newsday, 1/15/03)

The Group Is Pressuring The Bush Administration To Establish A National Housing Trust Fund. "A coalition of advocates for construction of affordable housing today called on the Bush Administration to establish a national housing trust fund that would help state and local governments 'address the acute housing shortage for America's low wage earners and low income elderly and disabled people.' The groups -- The Center For Community Change, ACORN and the Low Income Housing Coalition -- joined by members of Congress, released a report at a Capitol Hill news conference this morning, which found 'that 65,000 affordable homes are being built every year by local and state funds.'" ("Coalition Of Affordable Housing Advocates Urge Bush Administration To Back National Housing Trust," White House Bulletin, 7/23/02)

The Center For Community Change Opposed President Bush's 2001 Tax Cut. President Bush's proposed tax cut plan would overwhelmingly benefit the nation's wealthiest one percent. . . . The plan has been widely criticized because upper-income earners have enjoyed most of the gains in recent years, faced a lower share of the tax burden in the last 25 years, and yet would still receive most of the benefits under the president's tax plan. (Center For Community Change Policy Alert #218, CCC Website, www.communitychange.org, Accessed 6/11/2003)

CCC Opposed Bush's Child Tax Credit In 2001, Claiming It Was Not "Refundable." "A refundable child credit of $1,000 per child would be the single most effective measure that policymakers could take to achieve greater fairness in any tax cut and to reduce child and family poverty. President Bush's proposal to double the existing child credit will not accomplish these goals as presently drafted. It provides little or no benefit to the families that need it most. Millions of poor and moderate-income children would receive no benefit whatsoever from the Administration's proposal simply because it is not refundable. . . . [N]o children would be lifted from poverty under a nonrefundable child credit." (Press Release, ACORN, Center for Community Change, Children's Defense Fund, Food Research and Action Center, National Campaign for Jobs and Income Support and National Council of La Raza, "Joint Statement: Make The Bush Child Tax Credit Refundable," 2/8/01)

KansasCity•com

536077

Posted on Mon, Jun. 23, 2003

Ex-geek enjoys 'meteoric' rise to White House

By DAVID GOLDSTEIN
The Kansas City Star

WASHINGTON - By his own admission, the new White House political director was once a bit of a geek.

Growing up in Wichita, Matt Schlapp spent a lot of time in front of the television, glued to C-Span.

Washington's political wars fascinated him. He watched confirmation hearings and congressional investigations the way other kids watched MTV. He followed debates on the Senate and House floors as if he had a front-row seat in the gallery. He felt in the know.

Now the one-time C-Span devotee has become one of the off-camera Washington insiders that always so intrigued him.

Schlapp is the new White House political director. He advises the president. His boss is Karl Rove, the West Wing's resident political guru. Republican leaders and party chairmen from 50 states take his calls. He has a large corner office in the ornate Eisenhower Executive Office Building.

"I guess I always thought it'd be great to do politics," Schlapp said, relaxing in his office one recent afternoon. "But I can't imagine as a kid in Wichita, Kansas, that I thought seriously I'd do something like this in the White House."

Republican Rep. Todd Tiahrt of Kansas, his former boss who brought him to Washington eight years ago, called Schlapp's rise "meteoric." He summed up his friend's status in a way that the political world can instantly grasp.

"He has Karl Rove's ear," Tiahrt said.

Rove praises Schlapp's judgment and political instincts.

"He doesn't flinch when bullets are whizzing by," said Bush's chief strategist. "He keeps focused on the goal."

Schlapp, 35, still has a "pinch me, I must be dreaming" quality about him. Walking down the long, black-and-white checkerboard marble corridors of the Eisenhower building, he said he often thinks of the people who once worked there, including Eisenhower and Teddy Roosevelt.

"When you first walk into this environment and imagine working in this place, you have a real reverence for it," he said. "You think, `What an accomplishment. What a privilege.' "

Schlapp was born in Ohio. His family moved to Wichita when he was 12. His mother, Wichita City Councilwoman Sue Schlapp, said her son always watched the news and read presidential biographies. But she added, as any mother would: "I don't know that he was geeky."

A tennis instructor, she passed on her skills and love for the game, while her son, who idolized Ronald Reagan, eventually persuaded the New York-born, Irish, Catholic, dyed-in-the-wool Democrat to switch parties.

"She finally woke up one day and said, `Why am I always voting for Republicans for president?' " he said.

Schlapp played tennis for Wichita's Kapaun-Mount Carmel High School and still tries to squeeze in a game when he can. He calls the game a release valve from the pressure of his 12- to 14-hour days. He occasionally plays in charity tournaments in the capital, partnering with people such as Fox News anchor Brit Hume.

He joined Tiahrt as a volunteer when the former Boeing engineer ran his giant-killer campaign against nine-term Democrat Dan Glickman in 1994. His political resume was pretty thin, apart from being a student co-chairman of the first President Bush's 1988 re-election campaign at Notre Dame University.

Schlapp became Tiahrt's chief of staff, but returned to Wichita every two years to manage the congressman's re-election.

In 2000, he joined then-Texas Gov. George Bush's presidential campaign as a regional campaign manager over seven Midwestern states. Several, such as Missouri, became key battlegrounds.

"I really felt sorry for the guy," said Tony Feather, a Missouri-based Republican strategist who was the Bush campaign's political director in 2000. "We gave him what we thought was a manageable set of targets (states) and layered in three or four more targets on top. He got it done. He did a fabulous job."

Schlapp served in the Florida trenches during the post-election re-count, as did many campaign aides who went on to the White House. He was part of the supposedly spontaneous Thanksgiving eve demonstration at the Miami-Dade County Hall, where protesters pounded on the windows and disrupted the first re-count of the ballots. One participant dubbed it the "Brooks Brothers protest" because of the buttoned-down appearance of the demonstrators.

Asked what he did in Florida during the re-count, Schlapp said: "Just different things."

After Bush was declared the winner, Schlapp became deputy political director.

"Your short-term elation is quickly replaced with a real desire to get to the work and do it seriously," he said. But he conceded: "It's really exciting to be able to tell people what you do and who you work for."

When his immediate boss, White House political director Ken Mehlman, left a few weeks ago to manage Bush's 2004 re-election campaign, Schlapp moved up. Not long after that, he became a father for the first time.

Schlapp's office is where the politics and policy of the administration meet. His main responsibility is to ensure that Bush's program has support around the country and to look for the best venues for the president to make his case.

He is in close touch with Republican Party leaders across the country, constantly taking the political temperature and -- particularly with 2004 looming -- gauging the president's strengths and weaknesses.

With so much political drama on so many fronts -- the aftermath of the war in Iraq, the fate of the president's agenda in Congress, the roiling field of potential challengers in the Democratic Party -- Schlapp has little time to kick back and enjoy his sudden ascendance.

REV_00265777

But he knew that would be the case. He recalled that when Bush took office more than two years ago, the president told his staff: Don't mark time. The first term will go by very quickly.

"That resonated with me," Schlapp said. "I think he wanted us to quickly get over the wide-eyed `Wow! Isn't this a fantastic experience' and turn immediately to the task at hand. The last 21/2 years are like a blink of an eye."

To reach David Goldstein, Washington correspondent, call (202) 383-6105 or send e-mail to dgoldstein@krwashington.com.

© 2003 Kansas City Star and wire service sources. All Rights Reserved.
http://www.kansascity.com

REV_00265778

FARHAT
INDUSTRIES
3500 Grapevine Mills Parkway
Grapevine, TX 76051

FORT WORTH TX
PM
20 JUN
2002

UNITED WE STAND

Determined to be an Administrative Marking
Per E.O. 13526, SEC 3.4(B)

Karl Rove
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, D.C. 20500

~~CONFIDENTIAL~~

20300-0003

OCV #018

✓#156

REV_00265781

F.

DAIMLERCHRYSLER

Letkowit & Joe O'Neil Barry

DaimlerChrysler Corporation
Robert G. Liberatore
Senior Vice President
External Affairs and Public Policy

536037

June 10, 2003

The Honorable Karl Rove
Senior Adviser to the President
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, DC 20500

Dear Mr. Rove: Karl

As the world's largest transatlantic company, DaimlerChrysler takes a keen interest in healthy relations between the United States and Europe. As a global corporate citizen, DaimlerChrysler also takes seriously its obligation to act in a socially responsible manner wherever it operates.

These two interests recently converged with approval of President Bush's initiative on AIDS. DaimlerChrysler CEO Juergen Schrempp chairs the Global Business Coalition on HIV/AIDS, and authored the attached article from the German newspaper Frankfurter Allgemeine calling on European leaders to join President Bush in the fight against AIDS. The article appeared as the leaders of the G-8 countries gathered in Evian, France.

DaimlerChrysler is proud of its own efforts to combat HIV/AIDS, which include providing our South African employees with treatment and prevention services. We have also supported a number of initiatives to keep open channels of communication and dialogue between European and American officials during recent times of tension.

If you would like more information on DaimlerChrysler's efforts to combat HIV/AIDS, or if you have any questions, please do not hesitate to contact us.

Sincerely,

RGL/aw
Attach.

DaimlerChrysler Corporation
1401 H Street, NW, Suite 700
Washington DC USA 20005-2110
Phone 202.414.6747
Fax 202.414.6716
e-mail: rgl1@dcx.com

Article translated from German.
Published on June 1, 2003 in "Frankfurter Allgemeine Sonntags Zeitung" in Germany

Don't give AIDS a chance

By Juergen Schrempp

Today the leaders of the G-8 nations at Evian will have an opportunity to overcome American-European tensions and find new common goals. Together they can help to restrain a disease, which already has already killed 25 million people.

President George Bush has already set a sterling example. He won approval from Congress to spend $15 billion over the next five years to combat AIDS. Of that total, $14 billion would go primarily to countries in Africa.

More than 42 million people worldwide are infected with the HIV virus. By 2010 the death total is expected to rise to 80 million. 30 million of those suffering from AIDS are in Africa, where some countries may lose up to a quarter of their populations by the end of the decade. In some African countries, almost 40 percent of the adult population is infected with the virus.

As President Bush has said, "this is a terrible disease, but not a hopeless disease."

We know what to do. AIDS can be prevented. Infection rates in Uganda have been brought down dramatically. AIDS can be treated. Anti-retroviral drugs are becoming more affordable, extending many lives.

Unchecked, the disease will overwhelm the economies and national structures of developing countries. Demographic experts warn that the crisis could spread to Eurasia and destabilize even Russia, India and China.

The leaders of the G-8 countries can pledge additional funding. This is necessary. Beyond this they should do whatever they can to enlist the civil institutions of their countries in the fight against AIDS.

During the five minutes it has taken to read this article, 30 people have died from AIDS and 55 have been infected with the virus. The leaders of the G-8 countries have an historic opportunity to give millions of people hope.

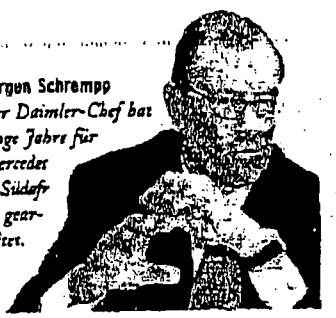
GASTBEITRAG

Gebt Aids keine Chance

VON JÜRGEN SCHREMPP

Die Führer der G-8-Staaten werden heute in Evian Gelegenheit haben, die amerikanisch-europäischen Spannungen zu überwinden, und neue Gemeinsamkeit zu finden. Sie können gemeinsam eine Krankheit bändigen helfen, die 25 Millionen Menschen das Leben gekostet hat.

Präsident George W. Bush ist mit gutem Beispiel vorangegangen. Er bekam 15 Milliarden Dollar für die Bekämpfung von Aids über die nächsten fünf Jahre vom Kongreß bewilligt. Von dieser Summe werden 14 Milliarden vor allem afrikanischen Ländern zugute kommen.



Weltweit sind mehr als 42 Millionen Menschen mit dem HIV-Virus infiziert. Bis 2010 wird von 80 Millionen Todesfällen ausgegangen. 30 Millionen der an Aids erkrankten Menschen leben in Afrika, wo einige Staaten bis zum Ende des Jahrzehnts ein Viertel ihrer Einwohner verlieren könnten. In manchen afrikanischen Ländern sind fast 40 Prozent der Erwachsenen mit dem Erreger infiziert.

Präsident Bush hat es auf den Punkt gebracht: „Dies ist eine furchtbare, aber keine hoffnungslose Krankheit." Denn wir wissen, was wir zu tun haben: Aids kann verhindert werden. In Uganda konnte die Infektionsrate dramatisch reduziert werden. Aids kann auch behandelt werden. Medikamente zur Bekämpfung von Retroviren werden erschwinglich und verlängern das Leben vieler Infizierter.

Unkontrolliert wird die Krankheit die Volkswirtschaften und staatlichen Strukturen in den Entwicklungsländern überfordern. Demographen warnen, daß sich die Krise auf den eurasischen Kontinent ausdehnen und sogar Rußland, Indien und China destabilisieren könnte.

Die Führer der G-8-Staaten können weitere finanzielle Mittel zur Verfügung stellen. Dies ist notwendig. Darüber hinaus sollten sie alles unternehmen, um die zivilen Institutionen ihrer Länder in den Kampf gegen Aids einzubinden.

In den letzten fünf Minuten, die zum Lesen dieses Artikels benötigt wurden, starben 30 Menschen an Aids, 55 weitere infizierten sich. Die Führer der G-8-Staaten haben die historische Chance, Millionen Menschen Hoffnung zu geben.

Jürgen Schrempp Der Daimler-Chef hat lange Jahre für Mercedes in Südafrika gearbeitet.

REV_00265784

F: Jean Becker

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

536037

FACSIMILE TRANSMITTAL SHEET

TO:	FROM:
Ms. Jean Becker	Karl Rove
COMPANY:	DATE: 6/30/2003
FAX NUMBER: PRA 6	TOTAL NO. OF PAGES INCLUDING COVER: 2
PHONE NUMBER:	SENDER'S REFERENCE NUMBER: 202-456-2369
RE: Kentucky Governor's Race	YOUR REFERENCE NUMBER:

☐ URGENT ☐ FOR REVIEW ☐ PLEASE COMMENT ☐ PLEASE REPLY ☐ PLEASE RECYCLE

NOTES/COMMENTS:

26 KENTUCKY GOVERNOR: According To Ben

Campaign Tip Sheet
Primary/Filing Dates, Latest Polls, Latest Ads...

AG Ben Chandler was in DC 6/26 and held an interview with reporters at DGA headquarters. Chandler said GOPers will have trouble "nationalizing" the election in KY, and suggested that if Pres. Bush comes to the state, he should be asked "if he brought any jobs with him." He said that KY voters have questions about the war on terrorism and WMD and said he has been amazed at "how well Bush has been able to string out 9/11."

Chandler noted that Dems have a "sizeable registration advantage" over GOpers in KY, said he is better known, and noted that his grandfather, Happy Chandler, also served as gov. Chandler maintained that he is an independent Dem, pointing to his 100% rating from the NRA and his willingness to take on scandal-plagued Dem Gov. Paul Patton. Chandler, who has called on Patton to resign, says he doesn't think he'll see any fallout from Patton's problems because he's been taking on Patton from day one. Chandler said he is also looking for Dem chairs who aren't "connected to the current regime" in Frankfurt. More Chandler: "I'm more anti-Patton than the Republicans."

Chandler downplayed the influence of Sen. Mitch McConnell (R), who he said hand-picked Rep. Ernie Fletcher (R-06) to run for gov. Chandler: "I'm not sure how popular he is." He noted that McConnell brings in "funding and strategy," but said that KY voters had an independent streak and don't necessarily vote party line.

When asked about the final days of the Dem primary which saw businessman Bruce Lunsford drop out and endorse House Speaker Jody Richards, Chandler said his campaign didn't have enough time to respond to what was going on." Since then, Chandler has tapped Richards' campaign manager to run his own and has tried to unite the party.

As for fundraising, Chandler predicts he will be behind at the end of this quarter, but plans to have a big July and August. He noted that he raised $3M in the primary, besting Fletcher's primary total by $1M. He said he's not sure if he'll tap into the fortune of his running mate, Charlie Owen. Chandler: "It may or may not happen." He said he plans to raise substantial amounts of money, regardless of whether own helps.

As for other KY issues, Chandler said that he believes Sen. Jim Bunning (R) is vulnerable and that there are several Dems mulling bids against the sen. Asked if he made his Owen, his running mate and someone often mentioned as a possible Senate candidate, pledge to serve a full four-year term as LG, Chandler said he did not (Hotline, 6/27).

A Good Gimmick?

A Louisville Courier-Journal editorial says that Fletcher "is right: Ben Chandler's proposal for the two of them to get on a bus for three weeks and make joint campaign appearances all over the state is a 'gimmick.'" But Fletcher "is wrong to imply that gimmicks are bad, and to be so dismissive of this particular one. ... Yes, a bus tour would be a gimmick. But exploitive TV ads are gimmicks, too, and a tour might be just the kind of new gimmick voters need" (6/26).

(Back to Contents)

REV_00265786

F: Declined invitations

536037

The Atlantic Monthly

TO:	The scheduler of Mr. Karl Rove
FAX:	(202) 456-2369
FROM:	Amanda Whipkey
DATE:	June 20, 2003
NO. OF PAGES TO FOLLOW:	2
REGARDING:	Atlantic Monthly/Microsoft "Salon Dinner"

-need to check schedule
-check w/ Dan

Please see the attached invitation to the Atlantic Monthly/Microsoft "Salon Dinner" on July 15th.

-~~E~~J. Goergen called to decline on ~~4~~ 6/30/03 at 4:42 p.m.

600 New Hampshire Avenue Washington DC 20037 Telephone: 202-672-5600 Fax: 202-672-5700

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY

(Est. 1857)

June 20, 2003

Mr. Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
The White House
Washington, DC 20510

Dear Mr. Rove:

Before Washington closes down for the summer recess, I hope that you'll join us for an Atlantic Monthly/Microsoft "salon dinner." Please mark your calendar for Tuesday, July 15, at the Metropolitan Club, with a cocktail reception at 6:30pm, moving to dinner and discussion at 7:15pm.

Our first two dinner conversations focused on Iraq and the economy. For this, our third, we will turn to politics and the ongoing campaign, and will give some special attention to the upcoming presidential race, including the media's role, key constituencies, the power of incumbency, and the growing impact of technology. Beyond the political focus, the conversation will be as broad or narrow as the group dictates, reflecting the topics of the day and preoccupations of our guests—a cross-section of leaders from the political, media and business worlds in Washington.

Joining us as a special guest will be Jeff Raikes, Group Vice President of Microsoft. Jim Fallows, National Correspondent for The Atlantic and recent National Magazine Award winner ("Iraq: The Fifty-First State?" November, 2002) will launch our dinner conversation on the 15th. Also joining us will be Cullen Murphy, Managing Editor of The Atlantic, and David Brooks, Atlantic Correspondent.

I do hope that you'll attend and would ask that you RSVP to Amanda Whipkey at awhipkey@theatlantic.com or on 202-266-6003. Of course, feel free to contact me with any questions or thoughts at 202-266-7201.

All the best,

John Fox Sullivan
President and Group Publisher

THE WATERGATE, 600 NEW HAMPSHIRE AVENUE, NW, WASHINGTON, DC 20037
Telephone (202) 266-6000 Facsimile (202) 266-6001

Atlantic Monthly/Microsoft Salon Dinner

Tuesday, July 15, 2003

The Metropolitan Club
1700 H Street, NW
Washington, DC

Schedule for the Evening

6:30pm	Cocktail Reception
7:15pm	Dinner and Group Conversation Anderson Room 2nd floor
9:30pm (approx)	Conclusion

RSVP Information

Please respond to Amanda Whipkey at 202-266-6003 or at awhipkey@theatlantic.com, including any special dietary or other needs

Special Notes Regarding the Metropolitan Club

- Complimentary valet parking available.
- Please observe the dress code – coat and tie for gentlemen and commensurate attire for ladies.
- No cell phones or personal communication devices are permitted to be used in the Clubhouse.
- The Metropolitan Club is made available through the courtesy of Mr. Jack Krumholtz, Director of Federal Affairs of Microsoft's Washington office

536011

March 8, 2002

The Honorable Karl Rove
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, DC 20500

Dear Karl:

BOARD OF TRUSTEES

FREDERICK J. RYAN, JR.
Chairman
WALTER F. BERAN
Treasurer
JOE L. ALLBRITTON
GORDON M. BINDER
STEVE FORBES
MERV GRIFFIN
J. TERRENCE LANNI
RUPERT MURDOCH
GERALD L. PARSKY
JIM PATTISON
A. JERROLD PERENCHIO
NANCY REAGAN
MARY JANE WICK
ROBERT TUTTLE
PETE WILSON

LIFETIME TRUSTEES

WALTER H. ANNENBERG
LODWRICK M. COOK
RONALD REAGAN
GEORGE P. SHULTZ
LEW R. WASSERMAN

Executive Director
MARK BURSON

As you know, on Thursday, May 16, 2002 the Congressional Gold Medal will be awarded to President and Mrs. Reagan. The ceremony will take place in the Rotunda of the United States Capitol and Nancy Reagan will receive the awards on behalf of herself and the former President.

In celebration of the presentation of the Congressional Gold Medals, a special tribute to President and Mrs. Reagan will take place on the evening of Wednesday, May 15th at the Ronald Reagan Building in Washington, DC. As a special tribute to President and Mrs. Reagan, Mstislav Rostropovich has rearranged an international concert tour to perform for the dinner.

The Board of Trustees of the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library Foundation would like to invite you to serve as a member of the Honorary Host Committee, which includes attending the reception and dinner. We certainly hope Mrs. Rove will be able to join you.

All proceeds from the event will benefit the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library Foundation. This will be the first time Nancy Reagan has been in Washington, DC for several years and there are no other plans for her to return in the foreseeable future. We certainly hope you will be able to attend. To RSVP please have your office contact Erica Jolles or Holly Bauer at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library Foundation at 805-522-2977.

We hope you will be able to join us for what promises to be a very special evening.

Sincerely,

Fred.

FREDERICK J. RYAN, JR.
Chairman

Washington Address: 808 Seventeenth Street, N.W., Suite 300
Washington, D.C. 20006
Tel: (202) 789-2130 Fax: (202) 530-0324

40 PRESIDENTIAL DRIVE, SIMI VALLEY, CALIFORNIA 93065
Phone (805)522-2977 Fax (805)520-9702
www.reaganfoundation.org

REV_00265828

NKN
536037

THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS
THE QUORUM OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES
47 EAST SOUTH TEMPLE STREET, SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH 84150-1200

January 9, 2002

Mr Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Ave NW
Washington DC 20500

Dear Friend:

Our visit in your office last week was the highlight of my trip to Washington. Thank you for seeing us, and for your extraordinary warmth and candor.

It was a special privilege to get to know one whose work I have admired and appreciated, and who is, in the midst of all of this, a native son of Salt Lake City!

I am very grateful for the presidential cuff links you gave me, which will be a treasured possession always.

You and your associates (and especially President George W. Bush) are in our thoughts and prayers always.

Sincerely,

Dallin H. Oaks

DHO/mm

REV_00265833

Goergen, Barbara J.

From: Ingols, Adam B.

Sent: Monday, July 14, 2003 11:43 AM

To: Bennett, Melissa S.; Mallea, Jose; Campbell, Anne E.; Goergen, Barbara J.; Cooper, Jean; Allgood, Lauren K.; Ritacco, Krista L.; Pfeifer, Sarah; Ingwell, Carmen M.; Smith, Marty P.; McQuade, Vickie A.; Kratovil, Lindley ; Mayfield, Jennifer H.

Cc: Douglas, Penny G.; West, Christal R.

Subject: Medicare Meeting

Attached is the list of invites for tomorrow's Medicare meeting with Members of Congress. The meeting is scheduled for 4:20pm - 5:05pm in the Cabinet Room. Please let me know if anyone is unable to attend. Thanks

Sarah and Carmen, please let me know if you have any trouble with Secretary Thompson and Tom Scully attending the meeting. Thanks

PARTICIPANT LIST

Vice President
Tommy Thompson, Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services

House Members
Congressman Dennis Hastert (R, IL-14), Speaker of the House
Congressman Tom DeLay (R, TX-22), House Majority Leader
Congressman Bill Thomas (R, CA-22), Chairman, House Ways and Means Committee
Congressman Billy Tauzin (R, LA-03), Chairman, House Energy and Commerce Committee
Congressman Collin Peterson (D, MN-07)
Congressman Rodney Alexander (D, LA-05)

Senate Members
Senator Bill Frist (R, TN), Senate Majority Leader
Senator Charles Grassley (R, IA), Chairman, Senate Finance Committee
Senator Max Baucus (D, MT), Ranking Member, Senate Finance Committee
Senator John Kyl (R, AZ), Chairman, Senate Finance Subcommittee on Health Care
Senator John Breaux (D, LA), Ranking Member, Senate Finance Subcommittee on Social Security and Family Policy

White House Staff
Andrew Card, Chief of Staff
Harriet Miers, Deputy Chief of Staff for Policy
Karl Rove, Senior Advisor
David Hobbs, Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs
Stephen Friedman, Assistant to the President for Economic Policy
Dan Bartlett, Director, Communications
Lewis Libby, Chief of Staff to the Vice President
Scott McClellan, Press Secretary

Candida Wolff, Assistant to the Vice President for Legislative Affairs
Ziad Ojakli, Principal Deputy Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs
Eric Pelletier, Deputy Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs

REV_00265840

Daniel Keniry, Deputy Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs
Keith Hennessey, Deputy Assistant to the President for Economic Policy

Amy Jensen, Special Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs
Matthew Kirk, Special Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs
Doug Badger, Special Assistant to the President for Economic Policy

Agency Staff
Tom Scully, Administrator, Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services

Pres. Yes 7/15 11:40am

Ralston, Susan B.

From: Howerton, Glenda [ghowerton@tri-city.org]
Sent: Wednesday, May 21, 2003 6:31 PM
To: Ralston, Susan B.
Subject: RE: Message from Dr. Carl Herbster of Kansas City

I will be in Washington, D.C. again on Tuesday, July 15 and Wed. morning July 16. I could be available Monday, July 14 as well. My preference would be Tuesday, July 15.

Carl of KC

-----Original Message-----
From: Ralston, Susan B. [mailto:Susan_B._Ralston@who.eop.gov]
Sent: Monday, May 19, 2003 12:46 PM
To: Howerton, Glenda
Subject: FW: Message from Dr. Carl Herbster of Kansas City

When he's next in town, let me know at early as possible.

-----Original Message-----
From: Howerton, Glenda [mailto:ghowerton@tri-city.org]
Sent: Monday, May 19, 2003 11:56 AM
To: Rove, Karl C.
Subject: Message from Dr. Carl Herbster of Kansas City

Dear Karl,

Just want to drop you a note and let you know how much I appreciate you and the President's staff at the White House. I am especially thankful for Tim Goeglein and all he does to keep us and the conservative movement informed and activitated. You are very fortunate to have him on your team. I enjoy talking with him on the conference call weekly and meeting with him periodically when I am in Washington, D.C. He is a great guy and a wonderful help to me and many others.

Next time I am in Washington, I would like to meet with you again. I know your schedule is hectic and I do not want to waste your time. However, I do have an idea to bounce off you concerning a conservative movement. I would also like to talk with you personally about some commitments I am making to the conservative cause and to the President. Let me know when you might be available and I will arrange my schedule to meet yours.

Thanks again for all you are doing on behalf of the President and the people of the United States. We pray for you often.

With great appreciation,
Carl of KC

536037

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

Date: 7/1/03

To: Richard Russell

From: Strategic Initiatives Susan Kalston x67323

____ FYI

____ Appropriate Action

X Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: Can you please call Bill Timmons per Kari? Let me know.

REV_00265844

United States Commission for the Preservation of America's Heritage Abroad

888 17th Street, N.W., Suite 1160
Washington, DC 20006
(202) 254-3824 phone (202) 254-3934 fax
e-mail: uscommission@heritageabroad.gov

536037

F: Declined Events 3/2/03

Fax

To: Hon. Karl Rove From: Sheila Leslie

Fax: 202-456-0191 Pages: 2 (including cover sheet)

Phone: 202-456-2369 Date: July 1, 2003

Re: Reception honor of Chairman Miller, at the Polish Embassy, Tuesday, July 8th CC:

☐ Urgent ☐ For Review ☐ Please Comment ☐ Please Reply

Please RSVP to the Commission office at 254-3824.

Thank you

RSVP called to decline on 7/1/03 - conflict w/ schedule

Washington, June 18, 2003

The Ambassador of the Republic of Poland
Mr. Przemyslaw Grudzinski kindly requests the pleasure of your company to attend a reception in recognition of the NATO Parliamentary Assembly.
During the event
the Honorable Longin Pastusiak,
President of the Senate of the Republic of Poland will present
Mr. Warren Miller,
Chairman of the United States Commission for the Preservation of America's Heritage Abroad with the Commander Cross of the Order of Merit of the Republic of Poland
The reception will take place on Tuesday, July 8, 2003, at 7 p.m.
at the Embassy of the Republic of Poland,
2640 16th Street, NW Washington, DC

Business Attire

R.S.V.P.
202 - 2343800, ext. ~~2101~~ 2111

REV_00265848

536027

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

Date: 7/2/03

To: Matt Schlapp & Brad Hoester

From: Strategic Initiatives Susan

____ FYI
____ Appropriate Action
____ Direct Response
____ Prepare Response For My Signature
____ Per Our Conversation
____ Let's Discuss
____ Per Your Request
____ Please Return
____ Deadline
____ Other

Comments: What can we say to Bloomfield?

REV_00265849

The Washington Post

Tuesday, June 17, 2003

Comrades is the largest ultramarathon in the world, with almost 13,000 runners this year. Some years they run uphill, some years they run downhill, but you always have 12 hours to finish.

54 Miles in 12 Hours

South Africa's Comrades Marathon Is Test of Endurance, Mutual Support

By Dina Kraft
Special to The Washington Post

DURBAN, South Africa, June 16 t the end, some of the runners were taken away on stretchers while others skipped, sang and kissed the ground. Some had hobbled or crawled toward the finish line, others leaned on fellow runners for support.

Fat beads of perspiration rolled down the face of Mohamed Vorajee, a 42-year-old mechanic from Ladysmith. His dark green tank top and shorts were soaked. He had finished a few seconds too late to receive a medal, but he could not stop smiling.

"I feel great," he said. "I've never been this far in my life."

Almost 13,000 competitors wound their way through 54 miles of steep hill country to cross the finish line today in South Africa's Comrades Marathon, the biggest ultramarathon and one of the most unusual sporting events in the world.

A South African institution, the race is run on alternate years uphill from the lush east coast city of Durban to the British colonial-style town of Pietermaritzburg. This year was a downhill run, beginning before the day's first light from the brick city hall of Pietermaritzburg. The sounds of "Shosholoza," a Zulu worker song translated as "Go Forward," launched the runners on their way.

See COMRADES, D2, Col. 3

BY RAJESH JANTILAL FOR THE WASHINGTON POST

Mark Bloomfield, 53, of Adams Morgan, one of the more than 320 foreign entrants, embraces wife Maxine after finishing race.

Long and Crowded Road

South Africa's Comrades Marathon is about 54 miles long, between Pietermaritzburg and Durban. More than 12,000 runners enter annually and about 9,000 finish in the alotted 12 hours.

BY GENE THORP—THE WASHINGTON POST

REV_00265856

Going a Long Way With Comrades

COMRADES, From D1

Thousands thronged the sidewalks and hilltops to cheer the runners on, especially in their final push toward the finish. The grueling race must be completed in 12 hours to get a finisher's medal—no excuses, no exceptions. Still, many runners return year after year. Those who have run 10 or more are awarded a special green number. For a handful, this year marked their 30th Comrades. One man ran his 42nd.

Thunderous peals of "Go! Go!" ushered the last man—who also was the oldest man competing—across the finish line. Zeb Luhabe, the 76-year-old retired policeman who had taken 10 races to finish before the cut-off, said he was "on top of the world." Right behind him a 24-year-old collapsed after missing it by one second.

South Africa has become known for "ultra" racing, a term for distances longer than the standard marathon, 26.2 miles. In addition to Comrades, which is in its 78th year, the country is host to the world's second-largest ultramarathon, a 35-mile run along the shoreline of Cape Town called Two Oceans, and long-distance canoeing, swimming and cycling events.

"The nation is psychologically drawn to extremes," said Bob Aldridge, editor of Suparunner, one of South Africa's largest running magazines. "Anything harder and tougher, we like to do. It's part of still being part of a wild, tough continent."

The popularity of distance events can also be traced to the 1970s and 1980s, when South Africa, at the height of its political isolation under the apartheid government's policy of enforced racial separation, looked within for athletic inspiration.

The spirit of camaraderie for which the race was named helps keep people coming back. Everyone has a favorite story: the woman who misses the finish line by a few yards to help an injured friend; the blind runner whose guide drops out but who keeps running with the help of another runner; couples who marry minutes before the starting gun's blast.

Blanche Moila, one of South Africa's top long distance runners, says the race typifies ubuntu, the Zulu word for humanity. "You think of the other person's well-being . . . it's putting others' needs before yours."

Today's race began at 5:30 a.m., so in some of the early stretches the runners raced by moonlight. A pink sliver of sun eventually rose, exposing ribbons of mist curled into valleys dotted with thatch-roofed farm houses and acacia trees. As they ran, they passed the history of the country, hills soaked in the blood of battles fought alternately between the Zulu, the British and the Dutch settlers known as Boers.

More recently the fighting that took place led to a near civil war. Death squads of the Zulu nationalist Inkatha Freedom Party backed by the apartheid government attacked their rivals, members of the African National Congress, which is not the ruling party. Counterattacks followed. As the runners made their way through an area called the Land of 1,000 Hills, some remembered that in the early 1990s it was dubbed the Land of 1,000 Kills.

Running in a pair of American flag-patterned shorts was Mark Bloomfield, a 53-year-old business lobbyist from Adams Morgan. International participation in Comrades has grown since South Africa's first all-races election in 1994. This year's race had more than 320 runners from abroad, among them several from the Washington area.

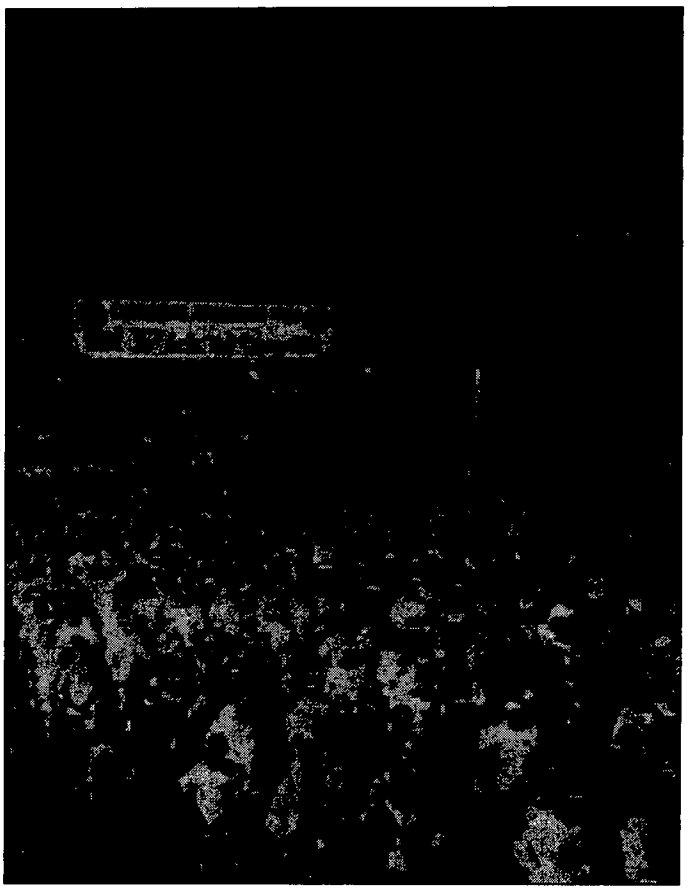
"Running is sort of my freedom . . . there are no outside pressures on me," he said. "My world in Washington is the White House, Congress, journalists and my business sponsors. The running is a balance to that."

Bloomfield, tired but exhilarated as he crossed the finish line in 11:02:00, said he was buoyed by the crowd and his fellow runners.

Struggling up one of the hills he suddenly felt a hand clasped with his and a push forward. It was the runner next to him.

Running not far from Bloomfield was Paul Newton, 34, of Bethesda. Originally from South Africa, he said Comrades was always a challenge he wanted to meet. He trained through the snowy winter, running routes from Georgetown through Rock Creek Park. His friends were baffled.

"They all think I'm nuts," Newton said. Crazy or not, his training paid off, and he finished in 10:53:23.



The country's most celebrated sporting event has a long history.

It began in 1921, the brainchild of World War I veteran Vic Clapham. He had fought with the British in the savannah of East Africa and wanted to find the most fitting way to honor his fallen comrades. He sought an event that would recall not only the intense heat, thirst and physical demands endured in the war's long treks and fighting, but the friendships and connections forged in battle.

His answer: a very long run.

Clapham was said to have been inspired by tales of a Zulu running between Pietermaritzburg and Durban each week delivering newspapers and mail in the mid-1800s. Word had it the Zulu prided himself on running the hills in 12 hours flat.

The first Comrades was run on dirt roads. Runners had to open and shut farm gates behind them and even cross a stream. There was none of today's refreshment stands with high energy drinks and peeled bananas. Runners stopped at farmhouses along the way for chunks of bread and jugs of water. A young

BY RAJESH JANTILAL FOR THE WASHINGTON POST

The sun isn't even up when the flood of runners crosses the starting line in Pietermaritzburg. They'll go through the hill country and end up in Durban.

REV_00265857

farmer won with a time of 8:59, the slowest winning time in the competition's history, but still a respectable result by today's standards.

Comrades' popularity soared during the time of political isolation. South Africa's athletes were banned from international competition and the country needed local sports heroes.

They found a hero in Bruce Fordyce, a handsome archaeology student who won nine consecutive times. In 1981 Fordyce, a mop of blond hair flowing behind him, won his first Comrades. His youth and can-do charisma captured the imagination of a nation, and television—relatively new to South Africa at the time—helped put both him and the race on the map.

Fordyce's politics also caused a stir. In the 1981 race he wore a black armband to protest the aligning of the race with Republic Day, the 20th anniversary of the apartheid government. Some spectators threw tomatoes, others booed and spat.

"We had unbelievable flak," he said.

An intelligence officer friend cautioned him to accept drinks along the route only from people he knew, warning of government plans to poison him.

Fordyce said he began running seriously in 1976, the same year of the bloody uprising by black students in the Soweto township, a turning point in the anti-apartheid struggle. He said he was depressed and "looking for something to do."

At 47, Fordyce says he now runs for the fun of it, even though that means walking some of the last hills on the course.

He also credits the spirit of camaraderie among the runners and the supporters who chant, wave and shout encouragement along the entire route. Farm workers cluster on the edges of sugar cane fields to wave. Children in wheelchairs line up along the roadside to cheer.

"Everybody helps each other," Fordyce said. "The spectators urge you on. It's a wonderful vibe."

Russia's Elena Nurgalevia wins women's race in 6 hours 7 minutes 46 seconds. Fusi Nhlapo was first man, in 5:28:52.

Comrades contestants pass the halfway point in the ultramarathon. They have already run farther than they would in a regular, 26.2-mile marathon.

To qualify for this race, runners must have completed a race of marathon length or longer in a prescribed time. (For example, you have to run a marathon in less than five hours.) But nothing can prepare a runner for this. As miles are run, but dozens lie ahead, willpower kicks in.

"It's incredible how the mind takes you through ... it's much worse to stop than to carry on," Fordyce said.

Helen Lucre, who immigrated to South Africa from New Zealand, won the women's race from 1985 to 1987. She said she did not realize when she began training that the distance run in Comrades was unusual.

"Everybody ran Comrades. You did not know 90 kilometers [about 54 miles] was not normal. I did not know otherwise," she said, laughing. "Ignorance is bliss."

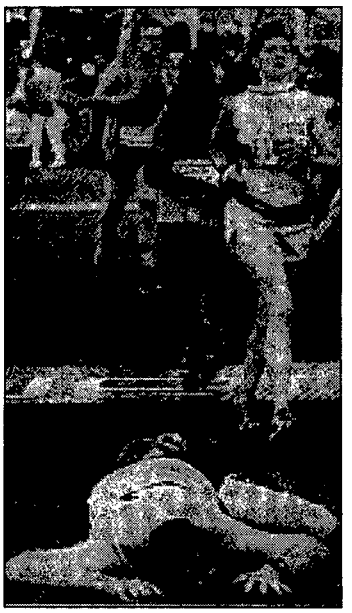
The legacy of Comrades was also a powerful pull.

"It was almost mythical before you run it. [People] would tell you about this race in the hills. There is so much history, so many legends," she said.

In a 1921 letter to the editor of a Pietermaritzburg newspaper urging people to support the race, founder Clapham noted the race was open to "Europeans of any sex or age"—no blacks, and later women were banned as well. It was not until 1975 that the race opened to all, becoming one of the first multiracial sporting events in South Africa.

Lucre recalled scenes of whites and blacks helping each other across the finish line, collapsing into each other's arms in exhaustion and exhilaration at a time when the two races rarely interacted.

"Sport has been an incredible bridge to show that regardless of race we could mix," Lucre said. "Running was one of the few outlets where race did not have to matter."



The diminutive cross-country runner Moila, 46, ran her third Comrades race. She was the first black woman in South Africa to receive national colors for a sporting event in 1983.

Bringing black women into the fold of running has not been easy here, she said.

"[Running] was frowned upon in my community," said Moila, who trains twice a day between shifts as a psychiatric nurse. "Sports was too much of a male thing to do and the main fear was that it would interfere with the reproductive system and you would not be able to have children."

Black men are now taking a leading role in the race, which was long the domain of white South Africans. Today's winner was 31-year-old Fusi Nhlapo, recently laid off from his job at an iron and steel company, who finished in 5:28:52.

"If you want something you have to work hard for it," Nhlapo said. "You must have a dream."

A competitor collapses after crossing the finish line. The 78-year-old event has a history of runners helping each other.

A Long-Running Obsession

While ultramarathoning is still outside the mainstream in most countries and statistics are often sketchy, it is universally agreed that Comrades is by far the world's largest ultramarathon, followed by Two Oceans, another South African race.

World's Largest Ultramarathons in 2002 (according to USA Track & Field)

Race (City or Country)	Distance	2002 finishers
Comrades Marathon (Durban, South Africa)	about 54 miles	9,099
Two Oceans (Cape Town, South Africa)	34.8 miles	6,460
City to City (Johannesburg)	31 miles	1,625 in 2001*
IAU World Championships (site varies)	62.1 miles	1,331 in 2001*
Millau (Paris)	62.1 miles	1,316
River Schimanto (Jap	farmer won with a time of 8:59, the	921 in 2001*
Del Passatore (Florence)	slowest winning time in the competi-	914

*Statistics for these races were not available for 2002.

South Africa is so ultra-obsessed that Comrades is the second-largest road race in the country. (A women's 10K is first.) In contrast, the largest U.S. ultra is more than 50 times smaller than the biggest U.S. race, and it doesn't crack the top 100 in field size.

Largest U.S. Road Races in 2002

Top Five Races	Distance	Finishers
Peachtree Road Race (Atlanta)	6.2 miles	50,000 (estimate)
National Race for the Cure (D.C.)	3.1 miles	46,953
Lilac Bloomsday Run (Spokane, Wash.)	7.46 miles	45,795
Bolder Boulder (Boulder, Colo.)	6.2 miles	42,501
Race for the Cure (Denver)	3.1 miles	39,400 (estimate)
Largest U.S. ultra: JFK 50 (Boonsboro, Md.)	50 miles	862

Sources: Ryan Llampa, USA Track & Field; Association of International Marathons and Road Races

REV_00265858

June 4, 2003

Stock Option Accounting – Ownership or Employee Compensation
E. Floyd Kvamme

FASB, in its study of how to treat Employee Stock Options, has taken the position that these options are an expense. SEC Chairman Donaldson last weekend in a two-hour meeting in Silicon Valley is quoted as saying, "We've crossed the Rubicon, options are worth something and should be treated as an expense."

Subsequently, Mr. Donaldson and his Chief of Enforcement were not particularly open to talking about the ownership position but rather wanted to have input on "how to expense". This position mirrors that of FASB in that only valuation method is on the table for discussion. Donaldson did say that the method the accounting industry proposed for use in footnotes over the last several years, the Black-Scholes formula, is "off the table". This admission of the fallacy of using Black-Scholes for options accounting may be viewed by some as good news; I'm inclined to view it as an example of a rush-to-judgment that has mislead readers of footnotes for almost ten years and an example of what could happen again if expensing is mandated.

Ownership
The practice of using broad based option plans in Silicon Valley was driven by the desire of employees to be owners. Existing companies saw that if they didn't grant ownership opportunities to their employees, they would start their own company. From the start up phase, venture capitalists used ownership opportunity as a lure to build the team at the new company. VCs diluted their own holdings at every round of financing to ensure that there were enough shares in a pool to attract new talent into a company. As companies moved into the public market, shareholders continued to be asked to approve requests for share pools to be used to attract and maintain employees.

No one supporting the Ownership argument is suggesting that Options have no value. They have value just as the people to whom they are granted have value. But, the value of the person – the key asset in most technology companies – is not "accounted" for either, or placed on the balance sheet because we definitely haven't figured out how to do that. (More on this point later.) The value of the option to the shareholder is that an important asset (person) has been added to the company and that addition will, hopefully, increase the value of the company and, correspondingly, the share value for all shareholders.

For reporting purposes in the private stage, an investor's ownership percentage always assumed that the option pool was fully utilized. The accounting was simple; the option shares were simply added to the share count. Once public, shareholders were regularly asked to approve additional pools of shares to continue to attract and maintain employees. Fixed price options were granted at the market price on the day of grant on the theory that the market was aware of the share count including approved option programs, thus dilution was in the market number. The owners were saying, "If you will join our company and make it more valuable, we will allow you to share in our investment's success." Analogies to this sharing motivation exist in most of business – the "promise" of being made partner if you work hard and prove yourself or the "promise" of some profit sharing if you stay with the firm for a certain time and it achieves certain results.

At the time of exercise of an option, the accounting simply made an entry on the Cash line and the Paid In Capital line – just as happens when a new round of capital is raised except that in the case of Options, the share count already included the shares being exercised so the only real change is an increase in cash – the exercise price of the option.

Expensing

If expensing is required, the P/L takes a charge. I'll not get into the issue of how to determine what the charge will be – as mentioned above that's the focus of FASB and the SEC. The other side of the entry is to add to Paid In Capital in the Equity section of the Balance Sheet. At the end of a year, Earnings are moved into Retained Earnings, also in the Equity section. The net result of Expensing is that the Equity section sees a shift from Earnings to Paid In Capital. The cash flow from operations is not changed. Scores of examples could be used; I'll only mention one company on whose board I sit to show how little sense this all makes. Power Integrations (POWI) last year had sales of about $100M and showed good profits; further, they generated over $15M in cash; the required Black-Scholes footnote showed them losing millions of dollars on these results. While many (now including Mr. Donaldson) are saying that Black-Scholes is not an appropriate tool, this reporting has been going on for years as required by FASB and is clearly misleading. If Power Integrations had chosen – as FASB suggested in 1993 – to use what is now their footnote reporting as their standard reporting, they would have accumulated massive deficits with their GAAP reporting while being handsomely cash flow positive.

Clearly, with many examples like POWI, anyone supporting expensing must call for an alternate valuation method so that the results are not as ridiculous as Black-Scholes results. The problem is that any number will simply add expense, increase Paid In Capital without having any impact on operations or the cash flow resulting from operations.

Further, in accounting for equity transactions, for example when a new round of financing or an IPO or secondary are raised, the entire transaction is required to be kept off the P/L – that's the rule and it's a good one. Paid In Capital means the total of the hard dollars that have been paid into a company – whether through the sale of securities or options and always has the cost of those transactions netted out so that hard numbers are used. These equity transactions have never gone through the P/L; the net result of an option grant is either that nothing happens (the option is not exercised) or shares are sold. Thus, these are equity transactions.

Lastly, if expensing is mandated by an argument that says it is a true compensation expense, it is hard to see how that expense stays off the tax books. As a result, a company will be tempted to use an exaggerated valuation for its options so as to gain the tax benefit of so doing; I'm personally convinced that several of the companies that have opted to expense are doing so to gain this favorable tax advantage. If Black-Scholes had been used over the last ten years as suggested in 1993, corporate taxes from tech companies would have been multiple billions of dollars less even as cash flows were strong. The public would not approve of this treatment.

What to do

Here are several suggestions on what steps I recommend:

1. Accept that traditional accounting using a P/L, balance sheet and cash flow statements has many issues when applied to tech companies. Our assets are our people, our intellectual property and know-how and our customer relationships – none of which are on the balance sheet or accounted for. Calculating a "book value" in a tech company is a joke; it is meaningless. Rather than putting another patch on the system by expensing ownership opportunities for our key assets but not valuing that asset (person), support legislation that says this whole area needs study and review – Dreier-Eshoo and Ensign-Boxer are a step in this direction.
2. Establish a study panel to recommend strong rules on shareholder involvement in approving stock option plans. At a minimum, in my view, all plans should be shareholder approved annually, no automatic green-up plans should be accepted, and plans should have a minimum vesting period and a maximum exercise period. Further, plans should be designed to encourage long-term holdings. This study should also seek to advise on the many types of option plans that are in use and seek to rationalize the treatment of the many forms of plans.
3. In the interim, give shareholders the best data possible on how to value their shares and remove the requirement for Black-Scholes treatment in footnotes. At a minimum, this means that if a person becomes a shareholder when a stock is selling at $20, they should be presented information at each quarterly report as to how many shares will be used in calculating EPS (earnings per share) for the full range of outstanding options. This data will yield what most individual investors are relying on – the best measure of what the earnings must be for the share price to reach the target price of the investor. Dreier-Eshoo calls for such data presentations.

Why this is important
Some may argue that the tech industry is making a "mountain out of this molehill". I fear that such talk in utterly uninformed.

Expense advocates must recognize that all valuation methods proposed to date are built on calculations of past stock performance. Using the past to predict the future is antithetical to the tech industry; we have always sought to change the future – sometimes with success, sometimes not; the past is not and never will be a good yardstick – thus, making impossible the search for the "holy grail" of an appropriate expense value.

Today, Asian competitors are attracting hundreds of Americans – American citizens – into their high tech startups by offering options at par value in an economy that has no capital gains tax – they are treating the options as equity, not a business expense. Suggestions that America should follow the IASB and rationalize its accounting to "world standards" is really proposing "European" standards. Our competitor is not in Europe; s/he is in Asia.

Lastly, over the years, I have had the pleasure of entertaining delegations from virtually every corner of the globe studying the "Silicon Valley Miracle". That miracle is tied to Ownership. Owning a "piece of the rock" is Silicon Valley; book entries that confuse the investor as to the operating results of a company and lower the attraction of tech investing will deflate the risk level people are willing to take to our great expense.

536077

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

Date: 7/1/03

To: Terri Troy

From: Strategic Initiatives Karl Rove

X FYI

____ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: _____

Karl - FYI Barry

LexisNexis

Copyright 2003 The Jerusalem Post
The Jerusalem Post

June 4, 2003, Wednesday

cc: Ten Troy

SECTION: OPINION; Pg. 7

LENGTH: 1158 words

HEADLINE: Rise up, Republicans

BYLINE: Michael Freund

HIGHLIGHT:
Avocacy of the road map will undermine support necessary for Bush's reelection. The writer served as deputy-director of Communications & Policy Planning under prime minister Binyamin Netanyahu.

BODY:

Nearly 20 years ago, while some of my teenage friends were out doing the kinds of things our grandparents' generation would have thought morally reprehensible, I was busy doing something they might have considered even worse - handing out flyers on behalf of a Republican presidential candidate.

I still remember the sneers, and the occasional smiles, that my nascent political activity evoked as I stood there in New York's Grand Central Station, a kippa perched on my head, trying to persuade rush-hour commuters to cast their ballots for Ronald Reagan.

At the time, the very idea of a "young Jewish Republican" was still something of an oddity, as most Jews continued to lean leftwards, carrying on what for many was the equivalent of an inviolable family tradition, namely to vote Democratic come thick or thin.

In the intervening years, of course, that has started to change, as increasing numbers of American Jews have begun to find a comfortable ideological home in the GOP, a place where they can park their political identities while still remaining true to their belief in the need for a safe and secure Israel. But whatever gains the Republican have made among American Jews in recent years are now in danger of being erased, and the person to blame for this may be none other than George W. Bush himself.

Though Bush received just 19 percent of the Jewish vote in 2000, the aftermath of 9/11 and the president's tough stand against Yasser Arafat enthralled numerous American Jews, leading to what many perceived to be a potentially galvanizing shift among the Children of Abraham away from the Democrats and towards the party of Lincoln.

Indeed, a May 8 Boston Globe article noted that "after a year and a half of strong statements from President Bush about fighting terrorism, along with his equally strong backing of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel, some prominent analysts in both parties say they detect a shift in the Jewish community" toward the Republicans.

But that shift is now at risk as Bush heads to Aqaba today for a summit meeting with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian leader Abu Mazen, where he will press for implementation of the road map leading to the establishment of a Palestinian state.

By compelling Israel to make concessions inimical to its security, Bush is gambling not only with the future of the Land of Israel but also with that of the Republican party itself. His pursuit of the road map, and his insistence that Israel turn over territory to its enemies, has rightly evoked a growing sense of anger and frustration among many pro-Israel American Jews and Christians.

After all, how can Bush possibly justify coercing Israel to appease Arab terror at the same time that America is using force against it? And why should the Palestinian regime be rewarded with statehood when the Taliban and Saddam Hussein were punished with removal from power? With next year's presidential election campaign just around the corner, Bush is playing with political fire, making it virtually impossible for American Jews who support Israel to fully embrace him and his party.

Consider, for example, the letter sent to the White House last week by the official Israeli branch of Republicans Abroad, in which the group warned the president that pressing ahead with the road map "will only serve to alienate American Jews and the Christian Right."

In the letter, the group's leaders noted that "We are aware of increasing numbers of American citizens, both here in Israel and in the United States, who are now considering abandoning the Republican party as a result of your Administration's pursuit of the 'Road Map.'"

AND IF you think the Jewish vote doesn't matter anymore in American politics, then think again.

According to a 2001 study by the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, 55% to 60% of American Jews consistently vote Democratic, 10% are loyal Republicans, while 30% to 35% "can be lured by any party depending on its position." Sprinkled among key battleground states in the campaign, that large group in the middle "adds up to a swing vote representing up to 2% of the electorate in states like Florida and Pennsylvania," says the study.

In either case, "a shift of that amount would have changed the result in that state and, in all probability, singlehandedly crowned the American president. Put another way, the Jewish swing vote, mobilized behind a particular candidate, would have given him the 2000 election."

Thus the Jewish vote remains key and is sure to play an important role in next year's presidential election campaign.

But the political risk to Bush may be even greater than just the loss of Jewish votes, for his strong-arm tactics against Israel have also started to arouse the ire of a key component of his core constituency, the Christian Right.

Just last Thursday, Bush received a political warning shot across his bow from Christian televangelist Pat Robertson, the founder of the Christian Coalition and a former Republican presidential candidate.

Speaking on the Christian Broadcasting Network, Robertson declared, "The president of the United States is imperiling the nation of Israel. Not only is he going against the clear mandate of the Bible, which is very important, but he's also setting up a situation where Israel will no longer have secure borders."

JUN. 5. 2003 12:35PM CONGRESSMAN PLATTS NO. 986 P. 3

REV_00265870

He even suggested that Bush's insistence on establishing a Palestinian state "will be the beginning of the end of the state of Israel as we know it." Those are pretty strong words, the kind of words that could cost Bush and his fellow Republicans a lot of votes next year if they aren't careful.

Sure, Bush's approval ratings may still be riding high after the recent war in Iraq, but as the memory of the victory fades and a lethargic economic recovery sets in, if at all, those numbers will begin to slide, and the president knows it.

Hence, as unlikely as it may seem right now, the outcome of next year's presidential race is far from being a foregone conclusion.

It is therefore imperative that Republicans - Christian and Jew alike - speak up now, loudly and unequivocally, against the road map.

Not just because it endangers the future of Israel, although that should be reason enough, but also because it threatens to undermine the principled stand which the party has taken in the global war on terror, in the process needlessly driving away countless numbers of sympathetic Jewish and Christian voters alike.

There is simply no good moral, political, or ideological reason for Bush to be twisting Israel's arm, and he needs to understand that he will pay a price at the ballot box if he does.

Republicans who care about Israel, then, need to rise up and send the president a clear and unambiguous message: If you choose Palestine, then come November 2004, we will not hesitate to choose someone else in your stead.

GRAPHIC: Photo: President Bush saying hello at Sharm el-Sheik. Is he also saying good-bye to Jewish and Christian support? (Credit: Ap)

LOAD-DATE: June 4, 2003

CONGRESSMAN PLATTS NO. 986 P. 4
JUN. 5. 2003 12:35PM

REV_00265871

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

5)6077

Date: 7/1/03

To: Keith Hennessey

From: Strategic Initiatives Karl. Rove

X FYI

____ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: _____

REV_00265872

Keith- Have ya seen this? Is it of any relevance? Sun; Jun 15, 2003 7:43 PM

Subject: further comments on the travelocity-drug purchasing system-newt
Date: Sunday, June 15, 2003 9:33 AM
From: PRA 6
To: PRA 6, PRA 6, PRA 6, PRA 6, PRA 6
Cc: PRA 6 <SteveL@cbo.gov>, <douglas.holtz-eakin@cbo.gov>, PRA 6, PRA 6, PRA 6, PRA 6, PRA 6, <dorothy_gray@rpc.senate.gov>, <CHansen@aarp.org>, <bjames@ihc.com>, PRA 6, PRA 6, PRA 6, <jrother@aarp.org>, <dsweeney@aarp.gov>, <darren.willcox@mail.house.gov>, PRA 6

Molly Coye has been sharing the concept of a travelocity type drug purchasing system and got the encouraging response back from London that is at the end of this email

I am beginning to look for one or two companies that as payers might want to set up a travelocity style drug purchasing system that would emphasize

1. patient-physician and patient-pharmacist management of the decisions (a pharmacy benefit administrater rather than manager system)

2. an expert system (possibly along the lines of rxaminer.com)to provide the page of choices so the doctor, the pharmacist and the patient would all have a common knowledge of the medically appropriate drugs and the prices and subsidies (studies show this knowledge reduces the cost of prescriptions substantially)

3. a supplier of pricing data and possibly as the backroom for the transactions (possibly ndchealth)

4. e-prescribing(probably along the surescripts model) and e-health records (the latter along the healthtrio model they have developed for the British National Health Service) to minimize medication errors and to reduce the cost of the system (e prescription can save as much as two hours a day of doctors' time)

5. a payment plan which subsidizes the first dollar cost for the least expensive choice (including where medically appropriate over the counter drugs such as Claritin) and then allows the patient to apply that number of dollars to any more expensive purchase so you have an open formulary with an economic incentive to buy the least expensive drug

I think this system would prove to be substantially less expensive than the current systems and would have a higher level of aptient control and patient satisfaction while actually costing a lot less.

any additional questions or critiques would be helpful as we work on this thanks

newt

To Keith — Assume you saw this.

charles SCHWAB
CAPITAL MARKETS

Washington Research Group

Kmk

Washington Commentary
Portfolio Perspectives
June 20, 2003 - Page 1 of 16

Cover Story	House and Senate Make Progress on Medicare Drug Bills	1
Economy	The Debate Within the Fed	9
Electricity	FERC Schedules Action on Contracts, Refunds	10
Energy/Electricity	Senate's Energy Bill Slides Further Into Summer	11
Energy/Electricity	White House Sends Democrat Nominee for FERC to Congress	11
Agribusiness	Beef Exporters Facing a July 1 Deadline over Japanese Market	12
Pharmaceuticals	Generic Drug Legislation Likely to Become Law	12
Pharmaceuticals	Pixantrone Potential Appears Paltry	12
Broadcast	FCC Ownership Rules Should Survive Legislative Challenge	13
Telecom	FCC Focuses on Public Safety Spectrum Improvements	13
Financial Services	Assessing the Potential for OFHEO's Move to Treasury	14
Homeland Defense	The Myth of Homeland Security Spending – A FY04 Analysis	15
Asbestos	Day One of Asbestos Markup Produces Little Movement	15

Cover Story: House and Senate Make Progress on Medicare Drug Bills

Congress made more progress this week toward enactment of a Medicare drug benefit bill. Legislation won the approval of the two House committees with jurisdiction over the government health insurance program for the elderly. The Senate, meantime, began debating its version of Medicare drug benefit legislation.

The full House and Senate will debate and likely approve their versions of the $400-billion, 10-year legislation by the end of next week and then begin trying to reconcile the differences between the two bills when they return from their Fourth of July recess.

The House legislation goes further than key Democrats such as Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) would like in relying on private insurers to provide the drug benefit. That could still be a potential obstacle to passage. However, we think the odds favor compromise and enactment before Congress adjourns this fall.

As the legislation stands now, we believe enactment would be positive for generic drug makers and rural hospitals, potentially positive in the short-term for brand-name drug makers, health plans and pharmacy benefit managers and probably negative for

REV_00265875

Electricity: FERC Schedules Action on Contracts, Refunds

Christine Tezak, June 20 Bulletin Summary

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) continues to move forward on the long-term contract review and on the modifications to the global refund proceedings in California (covering the Oct. 2, 2000-June 30, 2001 period) for the open meeting on June 25, 2003.

On the bilateral contracts, which have been protested by buyers (Puget Sound Energy, the Pacificorp subsidiary of Scottish Power, Sierra Pacific and the California Department of Water Resources), the FERC suggested at its open meeting on March 26 that the preferences of the three seated commissioners would lead to orders that would set the Puget Sound docket for settlement before an administrative law judge orders to uphold the contracts in the other three proceedings.

Oral arguments have been held before the commission on all four of the dockets listed above. We do not believe that those proceedings changed the inclinations indicated by the three commissioners — Chairman Pat Wood III and Commissioner Nora Mead Brownell to uphold, Commissioner William Massey to modify — and that we are likely to see a 2-1 split vote to uphold the contracts.

If we get a decision at the meeting next week, this is better than our expectation that these proceedings could lag through the summer.

We do anticipate that if the contracts are upheld by the commission, the buyers will petition for rehearing, be denied and then seek recourse in the federal appellate courts. However, we believe that there is a high likelihood that the appellate courts could side with FERC and eventually uphold its decision, whether it is in favor of the sellers or buyers.

On the refund proceedings, the FERC has indicated it plans to issue an order next week. On March 26, the FERC decided that it would modify the gas prices used in calculating the refunds for the period Oct. 2, 2000 to June 30, 2001. This entailed filings and a technical conference where sellers had the opportunity to submit natural gas cost data in order to make sure that natural gas costs were properly covered.

California has complained that it doesn't like the cost numbers for natural gas submitted by the power sellers. According to participants in the technical conference, we believe that there may be a good chance that the recalculated refund numbers may result in refunds lower than the $3.3. billion "back of the envelope" calculation suggested by the FERC external affairs office in March. An order next week may be a denial of California's protests and a direction to the California Independent System Operator to run the refund simulation based on the cost numbers provided since the open meeting on March 26, 2003.

REV_00265884

FERC indicated that it plans to have the new refund numbers available by late summer. Movement forward on this docket now would make achieving that timeline more likely.

Energy/ Electricity: Senate's Energy Bill Slides Further Into Summer

Christine Tezak, June 16 Bulletin Summary

With a unanimous consent vote to end discussion on the energy bill until after the July 4 recess, the Senate ended its efforts to move energy legislation forward last week. While Energy and Natural Resources Committee Chairman Sen. Pete Dominici (R-N.M.) remained upbeat and talked of getting another week of dedicated floor time when Congress returns that he expects would be enough to get a bill passed, we do believe that getting this bill into conference with the House measure (that passed in April) is unlikely before September. While we do not think that this delay dooms the bill, we do believe that the odds of it ultimately failing to emerge from the legislative process increase the longer it is subject to debate in the Senate.

This bulletin also updates status of Section 29 and Section 45 credits. Bottom line: we expect these to be in a bill, should one get to the president.

Energy/ Electricity: White House Sends Democrat Nominee for FERC to Congress

Christine Tezak, June 18 Bulletin Summary

The White House finally sent a nominee for the Democratic slot at the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) to Congress yesterday. The Bush Administration named Suedeen Kelly to the balance of former Chairman Curt Hébert's term expiring in June 2004. The nominations of Kelly and Joe Kelliher, still at the Department of Energy after being initially nominated almost two years ago, have been "linked" by Democratic senators seeking to keep the five-member FERC from getting a three-to-one majority with a vacant seat. That goal, however, may not be realized if current Commissioner Bill Massey is not renominated during recess (his term expires this June 30), and Kelly and Kelliher are, subject to Senate confirmation at a later date. In any event, the whole issue should be resolved in the next few weeks.

REV_00265885

Agribusiness: Beef Exporters Facing a July 1 Deadline over Japanese Market

Mark McMinimy, June 19 Bulletin Summary

Officials in Japan, the largest foreign market for U.S. beef, are demanding that as of July 1 all U.S. exports of beef be certified as having originated from cattle that were born and bred in the United States. Industry sources say U.S. exporters probably cannot meet this deadline and are hoping Japan will be flexible.

Unless a compromise solution is found, U.S. beef processors and exporters, such as Tyson Foods and Smithfield Foods could lose – at least temporarily – a market valued at $900 million last year. And it is conceivable that other significant foreign markets, like South Korea, might follow Japan's lead.

Pharmaceuticals: Generic Drug Legislation Likely to Become Law

Paul Heldman, June20 Bulletin Summary

We now think that the odds favor enactment of generic drug legislation as part of the final Medicare drug benefit package after the Senate voted 94-1 yesterday to attach it the Medicare bill. This is modestly positive for generic drugmakers Barr Laboratories Inc., Teva, Andrx, Ivax, Mylan, Watson and Dr. Reddy's.

With the strong Senate vote, House Republicans and Democrats are negotiating a possible generic drug amendment to the House Medicare bill. While the House could still be an obstacle to passage, we believe House Republican lawmakers will have a hard time opposing generic drug legislation after yesterday's Senate vote, signs of acceptance of the legislation from some brand-name drugmakers and efforts by the bill's drafters to satisfy Bush Administration concerns about the proposal.

We still think the Medicare drug benefit will have a far greater impact in generating new business for generic drugmakers than the generic drug legislation. The generic drug legislation, sponsored by Senate Health Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) and Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), builds on a final regulation introduced by the Bush Administration last week to reduce legal barriers to bringing generic drugs to market.

Pharmaceuticals: Pixantrone Potential Appears Paltry

Greg Frykman, M.D., June 18 Bulletin Summary

With Cell Therapeutics' merger with Novuspharma announced June 17, we believe there are several facets of Novuspharma's new anthracycline, pixantrone, that investors should be aware of in evaluating its prospects both at the FDA and commercially.

REV_00265886

Our view is that pixantrone will face a small market in its desired indication (high-grade non-Hodgkin's lymphoma), will not see much off-label use in what is a crowded field of similar compounds, and may have difficulty demonstrating the one safety advantage it could have - lower cardiac toxicity.

Considering the many members of the anthracycline drug class in which it resides, pixantrone is unlikely to gain much traction in an already competitive space whether the setting is for palliative care, such as in prostate cancer, or one in which a survival advantage has been demonstrated, as in breast cancer.

Additionally, a number of similar drugs have gone off patent and their generic use is being increasingly incentivized by payors including the Medicare and Medicaid programs. We remain concerned that pixantrone, as a new member of an existing class comprised of many other similar drugs, would have a difficult time establishing much market share.

Broadcast/Cable: FCC Ownership Rules Should Survive Legislative Challenge

Paul Glenchur, June 20 Bulletin Summary

Yesterday, a Senate Committee backed legislation to undo recent deregulatory changes in the FCC broadcast ownership rules. The Committee vote was bipartisan with all but one Democrat on the Committee backing the proposal and about half of the Committee Republicans going along for the ride. Despite the Committee vote, however, actual passage and enactment of the legislation remains unlikely. Stiff opposition in the House and uncertain prospects in the full Senate suggest major obstacles remain. Also, the administration supports the FCC's deregulatory action and we question whether Republican leaders would push the legislation against White House resistance. The FCC appropriations bill, however, could be another legislative vehicle worth monitoring in the ongoing battle over media ownership.

Telecom: FCC Focuses on Public Safety Spectrum Improvements

Paul Glenchur, June 17 Bulletin Summary

The Federal Communications Commission (FCC) is hard at work on a plan to address public safety interference in the 800 MHz spectrum band. Concerns about disrupted communications among first responders in the case of disasters or terrorist attacks have made resolving this issue a priority. The Commission is weighing the details of a Nextel plan that would realign the 800 MHz band and provide 10 MHz of contiguous spectrum in the 1.9 GHz range as compensation for lower range spectrum allocated to public safety users. The plan is facing stiff opposition, however, and we expect the debate over Nextel's plan and possible alternatives to heat up in the months ahead. At this point, we think Nextel stands a good chance of getting a contiguous block of spectrum in the 800 MHz range, a positive development for the company as it could improve operations and allow cost-effective shifts in the company's transmission technology. The effort to obtain 1.9 GHz spectrum as part of the plan appears much less likely to prevail.

REV_00265887

Financial Services:

Assessing the Potential for OFHEO's Move to Treasury

Katherine Scheeler, June 17 Bulletin Summary

After a week of tumult, investors seem to have found some breathing room on Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae. We believe that, absent unexpected findings of criminal activity on the part of Freddie Mac, the worst may be over, and the time to sort out the regulatory fallout has begun.

According to sources, the government sponsored housing enterprises (GSEs) intend to begin negotiations to move their safety and soundness regulator - the embattled Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight (OFHEO) - from the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) to the Treasury Department.

While there could be risk for the GSEs in amending their charter through the legislative process, which a move to Treasury would necessitate, we believe the GSEs would require guarantees from the administration to minimize that risk. The most likely scenario is a series of conversations between Treasury and the GSEs led by Fannie Mae with some buy-in by essential Senators (e.g.; Sens. Richard Shelby (R - Ala.), Paul Sarbanes (D - Md.), Kit Bond (R - Mo.)) and Congressmen (e.g.; Reps. Michael Oxley(R - Ohio), Barney Frank (D - Mass.), David Dreier (R - Calif.), and Tom Delay(R - Texas)). We believe that the legislators would prefer to attach the negotiated provisions as a rider to the VA-HUD appropriations legislation, since using regular legislative order would be an unwieldy process with much opportunity for mischief by GSE detractors. The VA-HUD bill is expected to be completed soon after the July 4th recess.

We continue to believe that a regulatory move to Treasury could resolve the perennial questions about regulator credibility and lift the cloud of regulatory uncertainty that has remained stalled over the GSEs and their stock prices. In particular, we feel that a move to Treasury would strengthen the GSEs by reaffirming by statute the relationship of the GSEs to the government and by providing regulatory "running room" for the foreseeable future. Tangibly, it may also provide comfort regarding derivatives use as Treasury has more experience in this area and is likely to quell critics' complaints about inadequate oversight. We believe that an agreement to move to Treasury would take off the table any changes in the capital standards, registration of debt or mortgage backed securities as well as pre-approval for new products but could involve a quid pro quo exchange of the Treasury line of credit for access to the Federal Reserve's discount window.

REV_00265888

Homeland Defense:

The Myth of Homeland Security Spending – A FY04 Analysis

Erik Olbeter, June 16 Bulletin Summary

In FY03 to date, federal homeland security funds have been spent largely on personnel - not technology products. Although personnel is likely to be the largest component of FY04 spending on detection systems, select technology vendors are likely to see more monies. President Bush's budget proposal may call for less than a one percent increase in federal homeland security spending, but within the budget, two areas are likely to see significant funding growth: explosive detection systems from companies like L-3 Communications, OSI Systems and Smith Group; and biometrics credentialing from firms such as ActivCard and Maximus. Firms such as Drexler Technology and Identix are also in the running, although we believe they face more challenges than the others. It's also important to note that once again the budget directs a significant portion of overall spending to state and local governments. Our analysis shows that only a small portion of the total is likely to be spent on technology vendor wares and that it is difficult to determine a common investment theme.

Asbestos:

Day One of Asbestos Markup Produces Little Movement

Katherine Scheeler, June 20 Bulletin Summary

The Senate Judiciary Committee's asbestos legislation markup made little progress yesterday. Approximately 65 amendments have been circulated by six Democrats and two Republicans, of which 25 are amendments sponsored by Judiciary Committee Chairman Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) and Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) covering issues like collateral sources and a ban on asbestos. We believe it is very likely that the committee will face continued difficulties with maintaining a quorum necessary to proceed with votes on amendments, given the tightness of senators' schedules, which may dog Hatch's efforts to make progress on the bill in markup.

According to Judiciary Committee staff, Hatch does not have the votes to pass the current version of the legislation out of committee, since Sen. Charles Grassley (R-Iowa) reportedly objects to the provisions creating an Asbestos Court and Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) has expressed skepticism about the medical criteria. The committee is set to resume consideration of the bill Tuesday, June 24, though it is possible that progress may be made over the weekend. Although difficulty in reaching consensus over such controversial legislation is to be expected, we are somewhat surprised by Hatch's strategy. Still, we continue to believe that enactment is possible, given the intensity of effort so far by interested parties.

* * *

REV_00265889

Regulation Analyst Certification

As to each company and security covered in these materials, the respective named analysts certify that: the views expressed in these materials accurately reflect the respective analyst's personal views about the applicable subject securities, issuers and other topics, and that no part of each analyst's compensation was, is or will be related to the specific recommendations or views contained in these materials.

General Disclosure Information

Charles Schwab & Co., Inc. ("Schwab") is a member of the NYSE, SIPC and other major U.S. securities exchanges, and is a specialist in various securities on the Boston Stock Exchange and is a subsidiary of The Charles Schwab Corporation (TCSC), which is listed on the NYSE under the symbol "SCH". Schwab Capital Markets L.P. ("SCMLP"), member SIPC / NASD, is a market maker in over 5,000 securities. SCMLP is also a subsidiary of TCSC.

Although the information contained herein is obtained from sources believed to be reliable, its accuracy or completeness is not guaranteed. This report is for informational purposes only and is not an offer, solicitation or recommendation that any particular investor should purchase or sell any particular security. Schwab does not assess the suitability or the potential value of any particular investment. All expressions of opinion are subject to change without notice.

No portion of this report may be copied in any manner or form, nor redistributed without the prior written consent of Schwab. All charts and research have been compiled from publicly available, proprietary and/or licensed data. Additional information regarding the data and/or the methodologies utilized in preparing this report is available upon request. ©2003 Charles Schwab & Co., Inc.

Specific Disclosures for publicly traded companies mentioned in these materials:

The following publicly traded companies are discussed in this report: Lincare (LNCR 31)[2], Apria (AHG 24)[2], U.S. Oncology (USON 7.65)[2], Health Management Associates (HMA 19.06)[2], Lifepoint (LPNT 23)[2], Province Healthcare (PRV 10.70)[2], Community Health Systems (CYH 20)[2], Universal Health Services (UHS 41)[2], Hanger Orthopedic Group (HGR 10.94)[2], Davita (DVA 26)[2], Fresenius Medical (FMS 16.19)[2], Renal Care Group (RCI 35)[2], Gambro AB (GAMBF 5.75), Beverly Enterprises (BEV 3.81)[2], ManorCare (HCR 25)[2], Kindred (KIND 19.00)[2], Genesis Health Ventures (GHVI 17.85)[2], Ventas (VTR 14.56)[2], MedCath (MDTH 5.12)[2], Amgen (AMGN 64)[2], Johnson & Johnson (JNJ 54)[2,3], Select Medical (SEM 23)[2], VistaCare (VSTA 23)[2], Odyssey Healthcare (ODSY 32)[2], American Healthways (AMHC 32)[2], Scottish Power (SPI 25)[2], Puget Energy (PSD 24)[2], Sierra Pacific Resources (SRP 5.52)[2], Tyson Foods (TSN 10.80)[2], Smithfield Foods (SFD 23)[2], Cell Therapeutics' (CTIC 10.35)[2], Novuspharma (NVUSF 26), Nextel (NXTL 17.34)[2], Fannie Mae (FNM 71)[3,5,6] Freddie Mac (FRE 51)[3,4a,5,6], L-3 Communications (LLL 46)[2], OSI Systems (OSIS 16.24)[2], ActivCard (ACTI 9.52)[2], Drexler Technology (DRXR 16.62)[2], Identix (IDNX 6.79)[2], Maximus (MMS 29)[2], Barr Laboratories Inc. (BRL 62)[2,7], Teva (TEVA 55)[2], Andrx (ADRX 21)[2], Ivax (IVX 18.80)[2], Mylan (MYL 33)[2], Watson (WPI 40)[2], Dr. Reddy's (RDY 22)[2].

Price information reflects closing prices on June 19, 2003. Numerical footnotes, if any, correspond to the following disclosures:

1) A research analyst or a member of their household has a financial interest in the securities of this company as follows: a) long common stock; b) short common stock; c) long call; d) short call; e) long put; f) short put; g) long rights; h) short rights; i) long warrants; j) short warrants; k) long futures; l) short futures.

2) SCMLP makes a market in this company's securities. SCMLP, in its market making capacity, sells to or buys from customers the securities of this company on a principal basis.

3) Schwab is a specialist in securities of this company. Schwab, in its specialist capacity, sells to or buys from customers the securities of this company on a principal basis.

4) Schwab or its affiliates has managed or co-managed a public offering of securities for this company in the past 12 months: a) the security type is a debt instrument; b) the security type is an equity instrument.

5) Schwab or its affiliates has received compensation for investment banking services from this company in the past 12 months.

6) Schwab or its affiliates expects to receive, or intends to seek, compensation for investment banking services from this company in the next three months.

7) Schwab or its affiliates beneficially owns 1% or more of an equity security of this company.

8) A research analyst or a member of their household is an officer, director or advisory board member of this company.

9) A research analyst received compensation that is based (among other factors) Schwab's investment banking revenues.

10) Schwab or a research analyst has a conflict of interest relating to this company.

11) Schwab officers, other than research analysts, serve as officers, directors or advisory board members of this company.

12) Schwab and/or its officers own options, rights or warrants to purchase the securities of this company.

pharmacies, home respiratory care companies and other providers or manufacturers of durable medical equipment.

Here's our side-by-side comparison of the House and Senate bills, and our thoughts on how providers of health care services and products would be affected.

Issue	Senate Version	House Version	WRG Analysis
Medicare Advantage Structure	Beginning in 2006, would create a new "Medicare Advantage" program that would include regional preferred provider organizations (PPOs) and Medicare HMOs. The Medicare Advantage plans would provide a benefit package that would include medical care and prescription drugs. PPO plans would bid on a national or regional basis. CMS would choose three PPOs in each region. Offers disease management services, chronic care and quality improvement programs. Plans would share risk with the federal government.	Structure similar to the Senate. Private insurers would offer a drug benefit that is essentially the same whether a senior enrolls in a managed care plan or remains in traditional fee-for-service. Seniors would have the same options available in the House plan: traditional fee-for-service with a private drug insurance add-on, Medicare HMOs and PPOs.	There is consensus among Republicans on the structure and the White House has dropped its insistence that seniors be given a better drug benefit if they join a managed care plan. The decision to choose only 3 PPOs per region increases the pressure to bid lower.
Traditional Fee for Service Structure	Private plans would compete to offer a drug-only insurance product that would be an add-on to traditional Medicare. The value of the plan would be equal to the drug component of the new Medicare Advantage plans. Seniors could receive additional prescription coverage from employers and state programs.	Nearly identical to the Senate plan.	The question remains who will offer the drug-only insurance plans. Lawmakers envision pharmacy benefit managers (PBMs), we believe a PBM/insurer hybrid is more likely. This is a risky product and there may not be many willing to play in the space.

REV_00265876

Issue	Senate Version	House Version	WRG Analysis
Fall Back	If no private plans are available in a region, Medicare would offer its own plan that would be administered by a private insurer, but all risk would fall to Medicare.	The Health and Human Services (HHS) Department would be allowed to pick-up as much as 99% of the risk in order to get plans to move into rural areas. Legislation also would increase the minimum size of a region a plan can bid on to minimize the areas potentially uncovered by a private plan.	This is still an area of contention. Democrats would like a stronger Medicare presence in the fall-back. Too much of a move towards Medicare would likely bring opposition from the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America (PhRMA) and Republicans.
Benefit and Income Testing	$35 a month premium. $275 deductible. 50% co-pay from $276 to $4,500 in total spending. Senior pays all cost between $4,500 and $5,800 in total spending. Government pays 90% of costs above $5,800. Deductible and size of the "benefit hole" may still change on the Senate floor. The bill does not include any means testing.	Similar structure, though amounts vary. $35 a month premium, $250 deductible. Medicare would pay 80% of the costs up to $2,000. After that, a senior would pay all the costs up to $3,500 in out-of-pocket costs after which Medicare would pay 100% of the cost. The catastrophic benefit would be income tested, meaning seniors with higher incomes, $60,000 for an individual or $120,000 for a couple, would have a higher catastrophic limit. The most a senior would pay before catastrophic coverage starts would be $12,000 for individuals with incomes of $200,000 or more.	Senate has voted for income testing before but this could be an issue on which AARP takes a stand. Still likely to survive in final bill. Means testing catastrophic benefit probably has little impact on Rx sales since higher income seniors are unlikely to go without drugs. House bill is more generous for the average senior. According to the Confessional Budget Office (CBO), the average senior has about $2,500 in drug costs per year. Under the Senate plan, that senior would pay 72% of the cost for the first $2,500 while under the House plan the senior would pay about 60% of the cost.

REV_00265877

Issue	Senate Version	House Version	WRG Analysis
Low Income Seniors	Provides assistance on a sliding scale up to 160% of the federal poverty level (FPL).	Subsidies up to 150% of FPL. Beneficiaries would pay a $2 co-pay for a generic drug and $5 for a brand name drug.	This is the cohort that is likely to see the greatest increase in utilization. According to a March/April 2000 Health Affairs study, there are more than 4 million seniors with incomes below 150% of the FPL who do not have any insurance, including Medicaid. According to CBO, Medicare beneficiaries without drug coverage have seven, or 22%, fewer prescriptions filled on average than elderly people with medicine benefits. Beneficiaries with drug benefits filled an average of 32 prescriptions in 1999 (the latest year for which figures are available), compared to 25 filled for senior citizens without insurance.
Drug Card	Interim step for the first two years. Cards would be offered by PBMs or insurers. Medicare would provide a $600 yearly subsidy for low-income seniors.	Similar.	The drug card is a likely an interim step. PBMs support the measure because it would allow them to increase utilization of mail order pharmacies. Conversely, retail pharmacies oppose the measure for the same reason.
Dual Eligibles	Leaves responsibility to the state Medicaid programs.	Federal government would pick up the bill for drugs for the dual eligible population.	House plan likely to be included in final measure due to pressure from governors.
Employer Subsidies	Employers would be subsidized to continue retiree drug coverage. Payments would be 64.3% of the average premiums.	Employers would be subsidized 28% of drug spending over the $250 deductible for beneficiaries that remain in employer-sponsored plans. The employer subsidies would end after $5,000 in total beneficiary spending.	Final version likely to include some employer subsidies. According to CBO about 37% of seniors currently enrolled in an employer-sponsored plan would have their employer plan terminated under the Senate plan.

REV_00265878

Issue	Senate Version	House Version	WRG Analysis
Managed Care Plans	Plans would bid and Medicare would pay plans according to a "benchmark" that is based on 100% of fee-for-service spending. Unlike the current system, plan risk would be limited for drugs and Medicare would reinsure plans for drug risk. No increase in Medicare + Choice payments for the 2004-2005 interim period. Medicare PPOs would have risk corridors for drug spending for 2006 and 2007. Medicare would pay 50% of the cost of drugs between 105% and 110% of the premium and 10% of the cost above 110%.	House plan could be more positive for managed care plans. The benchmark rate is likely to be higher because it may include spending such as medical education not included in the Senate plan. Annual increases would also be higher under the House plan. Bill calls for an increase in payments for 2004 and 2005. Rate increase in 2004 for most counties under the plan would be 3.7% (compared to 2% in current law). Increase in 2005 unknown but also likely to be higher than 2%.	The House plan is likely to survive conference. It has support from the White House and is likely to be scored at a minimal cost.
Formularies and Cost Containment Measures	Plans would be allowed to use formularies, tiered co-pays and other private sector cost containment measures.	Same.

REV_00265879

Issue	Senate Version	House Version	WRG Analysis
Drug Payments to Providers	Freezes average wholesale prices (AWP) at April 1, 2003 level and reduces payments from 95% of AWP to 85% of AWP. Instructs Medicare to look for "widely available market price" for drugs and substitute for AWP. If resulting decrease is greater than 15% then AWP would be reduced by 15% a year until the new price is reached. Physician fees would be increased to offset some of the reduction in AWP. Adds an administrative fee for home infusion drugs.	Uses "stock replacement" model beginning in 2005 for oncology drugs (and 2006 for other drugs). Specialty pharmacies would bid by HCPCs code to deliver a drug to a physician or outpatient facility. Medicare would choose a reference price and certify specialty pharmacies as Medicare eligible, meaning they can deliver the drug for the reference price. Exempts hemophilia, radiopharmaceuticals and drugs used in conjunction with end-stage renal disease from the stock replacement changes. For 2004 the plan instructs Medicare to lower prices as they see fit but exempts only radiopharmaceuticals from the interim changes.	Stock replacement model takes away the physicians' financial incentive completely and makes the specialty pharmacy the Medicare contractor. Bidding by HCPCs code gives incentive to use generics. Stock replacement model likely to be in the final bill over objections of oncologists. Even with increased fees to doctors and new administrative fees for other services this measure could still save as much as $8 billion over 10 years. Interim step is likely to reduce drug prices at a variable rate, meaning the cuts will be greatest where the mark-ups are the highest. That would be negative for Lincare, Apria and U.S. Oncology.
Rural Hospitals	Lowers wage index, increases DSH payments and equalizes the standardized amounts. Total increase is probably between $15 billion and $20 billion over 10 years. Amendment in the Senate Finance committee moved the start date for the increases to FY2005.	Many of the same rural provisions. Most start in FY2004.	Rural provisions are likely to be in the final version of the bill. Start date remains uncertain due to funding constraints. If equalization of standardized amount is moved to FY2005 rural hospitals may actually see a decline in Medicare rates beginning Oct. 1. That's because under a temporary provision passed last year, rural hospital standardized rates are equalized from April 1, 2003 through Sept. 30, 2003 then are scheduled to revert back to their original rural rate, a 1.6% decrease. Rural hospital companies include Health Management Associates, Lifepoint, Province Healthcare and Community Health Systems.

REV_00265880

Issue	Senate Version	House Version	WRG Analysis
Puerto Rico Hospitals	Medicare inpatient payments to hospitals in Puerto Rico would increase for five years starting in the fiscal year that begins in October 2004. Medicare would pay Puerto Rico hospitals at 100 percent of the national standardized rate, instead of the current blend of 50 percent of the local rates and 50 percent of the national standardized amount.	Increases the blend from 50/50 federal/local to 75/25 federal local over a three year phase in.	Some version of the pay increase is likely to survive. Would be positive for Universal Health Services, which owns three hospitals in Puerto Rico. UHS owns and operates more than 30 acute-care hospitals.
Orthotics and Prosthetics	Seven year freeze on durable medical equipment (DME). Custom orthotics and prosthetics would be exempt from the freeze.	Competitive bidding for DME including oxygen. Custom orthotics and prosthetics would be exempt from the freeze.	Exempting custom orthotics and prosthetics means the impact on Hanger Orthopedic Group could be minimal.
Dialysis	Increases payments temporarily by 1.6% for 2005 and 2006. Moves to a bundled composite rate. Leaves Epogen out of the bundle and paid at the current rate. New composite rate would be increased at 5 basis points a year beginning in 2005.	Increases the current composite rate by 1.6% in 2004. Rumored increase in the Medicare secondary payer timeframe from 30 months to 36 months was not included in the bill.	The separately billable drugs, excluding EPO would be moved into the composite rate at current AWP rates so that the change is budget neutral. A payment increase is likely but start date is an open question. Pay increase would be positive for Davita, Fresenius Medical, Renal Care Group and Gambro AB.
Acute Care Hospitals	No provisions.	Annual increase equal to market basket less 40 basis points for 2004-2006.	House provision is worst-case scenario and likely outcome. Nevertheless, 40 basis points is a historically low decrease in the annual update and should be viewed as positive for hospital companies.

REV_00265881

Issue	Senate Version	House Version	WRG Analysis
Skilled Nursing Facilities (SNFs)	No provisions.	No reduction in the annual payment increase.	House decision not to seek a reduction in the rate of growth is a surprise and good news for nursing home companies including Beverly Enterprises, ManorCare, Kindred, Genesis Health Ventures and the REIT Ventas, which now appear likely to get a more than 6% increase in Medicare rates beginning October 1.
Ambulatory Surgery Centers (ASCs)	No provisions.	Would set annual increase at CPI less 2 percentage points.	Neither bill includes a provision to reduce ASC payments down to the HOPD rates as recommended by the Medicare Payment Advisory Commission (MedPAC). That provision may still appear as an amendment, however.
Specialty Hospitals	An amendment by Sen. John Breaux (D-La.) would close the "whole hospital" exception to the physician self-referral law meaning physicians would no longer be able to refer patients to specialty hospitals in which they have an ownership interest. Provision is likely to be clarified to grandfather in all current specialty hospitals and those under construction, though the exact rules are unclear.	Calls for a report on specialty hospitals.	Inclusion of grandfathering clause would be a significant victory for specialty hospitals. There is opposition to the Breaux amendment in the House and the final outcome is unclear. Overall, the likely outcome should be viewed as more positive for specialty cardiac hospital operator MedCath than the scenario envisioned a few weeks ago.
Functional Equivalency	Prohibits CMS from implementing functional equivalency in the future but does not appear to reverse the CMS ruling that found Amgen's Aranesp to be functionally equivalent to Johnson & Johnson's Procrit.	Allows CMS to use functional equivalence in the future but only through a detailed rulemaking process. Does not reverse the Aranesp/Procrit decision.	Amgen appears to stand little chance of getting Congress to overturn CMS's decision. Amgen continues to lobby CMS to change the dosing crosswalk between the two drugs and may have some success.

REV_00265882

Issue	Senate Version	House Version	WRG Analysis
Therapy Caps	No provision.	Would delay implementation of the therapy caps until 2004.	Delay of implementation would be positive for SNFs and rehab companies.
Long-Term Acute Care Hospitals (LTCHs)	No provision.	No provision.	Both bills would be neutral for Select Medical and Kindred, which avoid feared Medicare payment reductions.
Hospice	No provision.	No provision.	Both bills would be neutral for VistaCare and Odyssey Healthcare which avoid feared Medicare payment reductions.
Disease Management	Includes a demonstration project to promote disease management.	Requires PPOs to offer disease management services.	Increased use of disease management potentially positive for disease management firms including American Healthways.

Source: Senate Finance Committee. House Medicare documents.

* * *

– by Eric Weissenstein/Paul Heldman/Brenda Mallory
WRG Health Care Team

Economy: The Debate Within the Fed

Greg Valliere, June 20

Oh, to be a fly on the wall at the June 24-25 Fed meeting! With the economy apparently at a turning point, with deflation fears continuing, with "non-traditional" options clearly on the table, what will the central bankers do?

They'll probably cut rates by a quarter point, issue an upbeat statement about the future of the economy and hope that they have finished their work for this cycle. Former Fed Gov. Lyle Gramley thinks Chairman Alan Greenspan isn't comfortable with a 50 basis point move, in part because of the potential impact on the money market business.

Greenspan undoubtedly realizes that the Fed's last move in a cycle often appears -- in retrospect -- to be unnecessary. But he and his colleagues have hinted so broadly that another rate cut is coming that failure to move could disappoint the markets, which is the last thing they want.

So the Fed appears poised to move one last time, but we believe the larger story is that the central bankers may leave rates unchanged until 2004 -- perhaps well into 2004 -- while making an important upward adjustment in their implicit inflation target.

REV_00265883

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

536037

Date: 7/1/03

To: Sezlee Westine

From: Strategic Initiatives Karl Rove

X FYI

___ Appropriate Action

___ Direct Response

___ Prepare Response For My Signature

___ Per Our Conversation

___ Let's Discuss

___ Per Your Request

___ Please Return

___ Deadline

___ Other

Comments: _____

_____

_____

REV_00265891

BRT Press Release

White House Study Reveals Tort System's Harm To America's Workers And Consumers

Contact: John Schachter
(202) 872-1260

Release Date: 04/29/2002

Individuals bear brunt of $180 billion cost through higher prices, lower wages, report finds

Washington, DC - At a Business Roundtable (BRT) meeting today, the Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisors released a study that sheds new light on who pays the cost of excessive litigation in the United States. According to the study, up to $136 billion in annual tort costs are "economically excessive," and American workers, consumers and investors bear the burden of an expensive and inefficient liability system through higher prices, lower wages, and decreased returns to investment, as well as lower levels of innovation.

"This important study adds credence to calls for wide-ranging changes to America's civil justice system," said BRT President John J. Castellani. "The extent of the tort tax illustrates why a substantial majority of Americans believe the current liability system needs major reform."

The study, released by Dr. Glenn Hubbard, predicts that the total cost of the tort system in the future will likely be greater than the $180 billion estimated in 2000. "The trends are ominous," Castellani added. "Litigation costs are rising along every dimension. In some states, class action lawsuits have increased 1,000 percent over the past 10 years." The BRT is currently urging Congress to pass class action reform legislation that closes the legal loopholes that have made state court systems choice locations of frivolous suits.

Other noteworthy findings of the study, entitled "Who Pays for Tort Liability Claims? An Economic Analysis of the U.S. Tort Liability System," include:

- The U.S. civil liability system is the most expensive in the world, more than double the average cost of other industrialized nations.
- Studies are likely to substantially underestimate the economic cost of the U.S. tort system by as much as $50 billion due to distortions in production and consumption decisions.
- The $136 billion excessive cost of the U.S. tort system would be equivalent to a 2 percent tax on consumption, a 3 percent tax on wages, or a 5 percent tax on capital income.
- Only 20 percent of direct tort costs actually go to claimants for economic damages, such as lost wages or medical expenses.
- 58 percent of the total annual cost of tort is due to administrative expenses and legal fees.

####

The Business Roundtable is an association of chief executive officers of leading corporations with a combined workforce of more than 10 million employees in the United States and $3.5 trillion in revenues. The chief executives are committed to advocating public policies that foster vigorous economic growth and a dynamic global economy.

Who Pays for Tort Liability Claims?
An Economic Analysis of the U.S. Tort Liability System

Council of Economic Advisers
April 2002

Executive Summary

With conservatively estimated annual direct costs of $180 billion, or 1.8 percent of GDP, the United States tort system is the most expensive in the world, more than double the average cost of other industrialized nations. Whereas an efficient tort system has a potentially important role to play in ensuring that firms have proper incentives to produce safe products, poorly designed policies can mistakenly impose excessive costs on society through forgone production of public and private goods and services. To the extent that tort claims are economically excessive, they act like a tax on individuals and firms. This paper pursues this analogy between inefficient tort litigation and taxes, and examines the question of "who pays" for excessive tort costs. It finds that the cost of excessive tort may be quite substantial, with intermediate estimates equivalent to a 2 percent tax on consumption, a 3 percent tax on wages, or a 5 percent tax on capital income. As with any tax, the economic burden of the "tort tax" is ultimately borne by individuals through higher prices, reduced wages, or decreased investment returns.

States, which is designed to deliver compensation efficiently to workers who are injured on the job. Workers' compensation is a no-fault system, and thus litigation costs will be lower. According to the National Academy of Social Insurance, for every dollar paid to workers' compensation claimants, approximately 23 cents is paid in administrative costs.[16] Using this assumption that "fair" administrative costs should be roughly equal to 23 percent of damages paid to claimants, one can begin to estimate the "excessive" costs inherent in the U.S. tort system.

Even if we start with the extremely cautious assumption that both economic ($36 billion) and non-economic damages ($40 billion) are set at an economically efficient level, and that an additional 23 percent should be spent on administration, an efficient tort system would result in transfers of only $93 billion per year.[17] By this cautious calculation, the current U.S. tort system includes "excessive" tort costs of $87 billion per year.[18] Were one to adapt the assumption that non-economic damages are random, the "litigation tax" would rise to $136 billion per year, even after accounting for reasonable administrative expenses.[19] To the extent that the economic damages awarded by the tort system are not well targeted and therefore fail to provide proper incentives to firms, the entire $180 billion in direct costs is economically excessive.

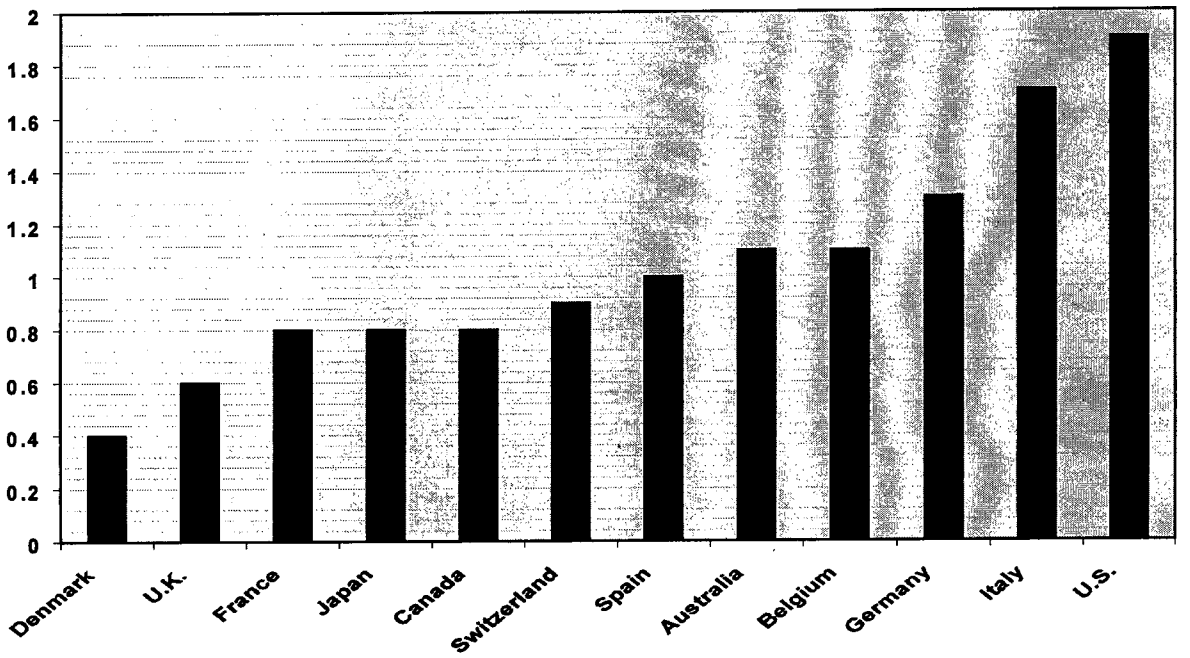
Another useful perspective is provided by comparing the cost of tort liability in the United States to that of other developed countries. While it is difficult to make cross-national comparisons because of data limitations, estimates by Tillinghast-Towers Perrin suggest that the U.S. tort system is substantially more costly than that of other countries. As shown in figure 2, U.S. tort costs in 1998 were 1.9 percent of GDP, approximately double the average cost of the other nations studied. Only Italy, with

---

[16] National Academy of Social Insurance, "Workers' Compensation: Benefits, Coverage and Costs, 1999 New Estimates and 1996-1998 Revisions," May 2001.

[17] (Economic damages ($36 b.) + Non-Economic damages ($40 b.)) * Administrative cost factor (1.23) = Non-excessive tort costs ($93 b.)

[18] Total tort costs ($180 b.) – Non-excessive tort costs ($93 b.) = Excessive tort costs ($87 b.)



[19] Total ($180 b.) – (Economic($36 b.) *Admin cost factor(1.23)) = Excessive tort costs ($136 b.)

REV_00265902

costs of 1.7 percent of GDP, rivaled the U.S. in total direct costs. Tort costs in Denmark, the United Kingdom, France, Japan, Canada and Switzerland are all estimated to be less than 1 percent of GDP.

Figure 2

International Tort Costs as a Percentage of GDP, 1998

Source: Tillinghast-Towers Perrin, "U.S. Tort Costs: 2000"

How Large is the Burden of the Litigation Tax?

Regardless of which estimate of the direct cost presented above is closest to the truth, it is likely to substantially underestimate the total economic cost of the U.S. tort system. In the analysis of taxation, economists recognize that the total burden of a tax exceeds the revenue it collects. The excess burden or "deadweight loss" of taxation arises because taxes distort production and consumption decisions. In the current setting, an example of this phenomenon is that physicians may prescribe unnecessary precautionary treatments, often referred to as "defensive medicine," in order to avoid non-financial litigation penalties such as harm to their reputations and the time and stress associated with a malpractice suit.[20] Some socially desirable products and services are likely never produced due to excessive tort liability claims.

REV_00265903

Anecdotal evidence suggests that some products that may have a net benefit to society as a whole are withheld from the marketplace due to excessive concerns of liability from the tort system. For example, concerns over liability have resulted in withdrawals of certain medicines, and halted the production of vaccines such as smallpox and DPT. In trying to gauge the size of these costs, the appropriate measure of loss is the difference between the value of the good that is not produced and the value of the next best alternative. Because only one of these goods is produced in the market, it is difficult to assess this loss. The net economic cost of these types of actions is difficult to quantify, and is not included in the $180 billion estimate.

Despite these difficulties, one can approximate the magnitude of the deadweight loss through the literature on taxation. Recent research by Professor Dale Jorgenson of Harvard University estimates that the marginal deadweight loss per dollar of revenue raised by the corporate income tax in the United States is 27.9 cents.[21] If all tort claims have a comparable deleterious effect on the economy, the deadweight loss resulting from the $180 billion in direct costs would be an additional $50 billion. Even using the most cautious estimate that excessive direct costs total $87 billion, an additional 27.9 percent deadweight loss would bring the total cost of the litigation tax to $111 billion. In the intermediate case with direct costs of $136 billion, the total economic burden would be $174 billion annually.

---

[20] Daniel Kessler and Mark McClellan, "Do Doctors Practice Defensive Medicine?" The Quarterly Journal of Economics, May 1996.

[21] Dale Jorgenson and Kun-Young Yun, Investment, Volume 3, Lifting the Burden: Tax Reform, the Cost of Capital, and U.S. Economic Growth, 2001, Table 7.10, page 287.

REV_00265904

Who Pays for Excessive Liability Claims?

Who pays the litigation tax? While a tax may be collected from a firm, its burden must ultimately be borne by individuals through job loss or a reduction in wages (workers), an increase in consumer prices (consumers), a decline in property values (landowners), or a reduction in profits and thus share prices (owners of capital). Of course, these categories are not mutually exclusive. The same person could suffer from lower wages, face higher prices for products, and have lower returns on his pension assets.

Determining the true economic burden. or economic incidence. of a tax is a complex undertaking, as it requires that one consider how wages and prices have adjusted throughout the economy as a result of the tax. If wages fall as the result of a tax, economists say that the tax has been shifted backward onto labor. If prices rise, economists say that the tax has been shifted forward to consumers.[22] Alternatively, firm profitability could be reduced, in which case the tax burden is borne by participants in private pension plans and owners of stocks and mutual funds.

For example, in the United States, the Social Security system collects 12.4 percent of a worker's wages[23] to support retirement and disability benefit payments. Half of this, or 6.2 percent, is levied on the worker. The remaining 6.2 percent is levied on the employer. However, most of the employer-paid portion of the social security tax is shifted backward so that the employer portion of the payroll tax has the same effect on a worker as does the portion levied directly on the worker. Thus, even though employees legally bear only half of the payroll tax, they bear the full – or almost full – economic burden of the tax through lower wages.[24]

---

[22] Joseph E. Stiglitz, Economics of the Public Sector, Third Edition, New York: W. W. Norton, 2000, page 483.

[23] Up to a maximum taxable amount of $84,900 in 2002.

[24] Joseph E. Stiglitz, Economics of the Public Sector, Third Edition, New York: W. W. Norton, 2000, page 483.

REV_00265905

The legal incidence of the costs of the U.S. tort system falls on firms engaged in the production and sale of goods and services. Moreover, to the extent that the distribution of tort costs is largely random, tort costs only increase a firm's costs and decrease profits in a manner similar to the corporate income tax. Thus, to a first approximation, one can view the economic incidence of excessive tort costs as being similar to the corporate income tax in the United States.

The incidence of the corporate income tax is the subject of considerable debate among tax economists. Most economists believe that a substantial portion of the corporate tax is shifted to consumers through higher prices, or to workers if wages decline due to a decreased demand for the taxed good. The remainder falls on investors. Importantly, to the extent that it falls on capital, it is on owners of all capital, not just those firms most likely to fall subject to tort litigation. To see this, suppose that some industries or sectors are more likely to be subject to liability losses. If the high cost of liability makes investing in these sectors less attractive, capital will move out of the higher cost sector, driving down the rate of return to capital in other sectors. The lower return reflects the cost of the litigation tax. Thus part of the burden of these tort claims can be borne by all owners of capital not just those in the sector with higher tort claims.

Traditionally, three governmental agencies have engaged in the distributional analysis of tax policy: the Joint Committee on Taxation (JCT), the Office of Tax Analysis (OTA) at the Department of Treasury, and the Congressional Budget Office (CBO). During the 1980s and early 1990s, "JCT did not distribute corporate income tax changes at all, on the ground that the incidence of the tax was too uncertain."[25] Beginning in 1992, JCT allocated the corporate income tax to owners of capital generally, and for the past several years, the JCT has not conducted distributional analysis at all. OTA makes the assumption that the tax is borne by owners of capital. Traditionally, the CBO has used three different variations: 100 percent by capital, 100 percent by labor, and half by each. The inconsistent set of assumptions and methodologies across agencies highlights the uncertainty about the economic incidence of the corporate income tax. In fact, a recent survey of economists who specialize in public finance found that virtually all of these economists believe that the burden of the corporate income tax is shared by both capital and labor generally, but "there is significant disagreement about the precise division."[26]

[25]Michael J. Graetz, "Distributional Tables, Tax Legislation, and the Illusion of Precision," in David F. Bradford, Ed., Distributional Analysis of Tax Policy, 1995, page 47.

REV_00265906

To the extent that capital markets are globally linked, allowing capital to flow freely across borders, the after-tax rate of return to capital must be equated across countries. One implication is that if tort liability raises the cost of capital in the United States, mobile capital will seek the relatively higher return available elsewhere, until rates of return are again equalized. The result is that the capital stock in the United States may be smaller with high tort costs than with low tort costs. A smaller capital stock means there is less capital per worker, thus lowering productivity and wages. In this way, the costs of tort may fall on the less mobile factors of production, namely labor. If global capital markets were fully integrated and capital freely mobile, then the entire burden of the costs of excessive tort in the United States could be shifted to labor through reduced real wages and consumers through higher prices.

The relative magnitude of the burden of excessive tort costs in the U.S. is quite substantial. For perspective, in the year 2000, total wage and salary disbursements to private industries (i.e., excluding government workers) totaled just over $4 trillion.[27] Taking the extremely conservative excessive cost estimate of $87 billion – an estimate that treats the current level of economic and non-economic damages as appropriate,

---

[26] Victor R. Fuchs, Alan B. Krueger, and James M. Poterba, "Why Do Economists Disagree about Policy? The Roles of Beliefs about Parameters and Values," National Bureau of Economic Research Working Paper No. 6151, August 1997, page 12.

[27] Economic Report of the President, February 2002, Table B-29.

REV_00265907

allows for a reasonable administrative charge of 23 percent of the award, and ignores the deadweight burden – the litigation tax is equivalent to a 2.1 percent wage and salary tax shifted onto private sector workers. Alternatively, if this $87 billion were shifted forward to consumers through higher prices, this would be equivalent to a 1.3 percent tax on personal consumption.[28] If the excess burden were not passed through to labor or consumers, and instead was borne entirely by capital, then it would be equivalent to a tax on capital income of 3.1 percent.[29] It should be noted that nearly 80 million Americans own corporate stock, either individually or through their pension funds.[30] In fact, over 20 percent of corporate stock in the U.S. is held by public and private pension funds – suggesting that if this litigation tax is not passed through to workers via wage reductions or price increases, workers are still harmed through reduced returns on their retirement saving.

Table 1 below illustrates the "tax equivalence" of tort litigation costs under various assumptions about the incidence of the tax, and the size of the excessive tort costs. As a lower bound on the size of the litigation tax, we treat all economic and non-economic damages as economically appropriate, allow for 23 percent administrative costs, and ignore the deadweight burden. This translates to a litigation tax of approximately $87 billion per year. For an intermediate estimate, we include non-economic damages in the excess cost of tort, following the work of Viscusi. This implies a litigation tax of $136 billion per year, ignoring the deadweight loss. For an upper-bound estimate, we treat all tort costs as economically excessive, and also include an estimated $50 billion in deadweight loss.

As illustrated in Table 1, under the assumption that the tax is fully shifted forward through prices, the annual excessive tort costs are equivalent to a tax on consumption

---

[28] Economic Report of the President, February 2002, Table B-1.
[29] According to unpublished data from the Productivity and Technology Division of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the capital (non-labor) share of nonfarm business output was $2,762 billion in 2001.
[30] Investment Company Institute, Equity Ownership in America, 1999.

REV_00265908

ranging from 1.3 percent to 3.4 percent. Alternatively, if shifted backwards onto labor, the "litigation tax" is equivalent to a tax on wages from 2.1 percent to as high as 5.7 percent. If the incidence of the tax falls on investors, it is equivalent to a tax on capital ranging from 3.1 percent to 8.2 percent. The final row of Table 1 illustrates the case in which the burden of the litigation tax is shared by consumers, workers and investors.[31]

Whether it falls entirely on labor, or whether some portion of it also falls on capital owners in the U.S., the cost to the U.S. economy is substantial. For example, in the year 2000, the intermediate cost estimate of $136 billion is more than the Federal government spent on all of the following programs combined: Education, training, and employment; general science; space and technology; conservation and land management; pollution control and abatement; disaster relief and insurance; community development; Federal law enforcement and administration of justice; and unemployment compensation.[32] Alternatively, $136 billion is two-thirds the amount of revenue collected from the corporate income tax[33] or nearly half (46 percent) of the amount spent on national defense.[34] Viewed differently, at more than 3 percent of wages per year, the cost of the litigation tax is also far more than enough money to solve Social Security's long-term financing crisis. To a family of average income, three percent of wages is also the cost of more than three months of groceries, six months of utility payments, or eight months of health care costs[35]. That is, $136 billion represents a large drain on the productive resources of the United States.

---

[31] The assumed division is 25 percent through prices, 25 percent through wages, and 50 percent through reduced investment returns. This incidence assumption is based on one of the corporate tax incidence scenarios used by Joseph A. Pechman in Who Paid the Taxes, 1966-85, Washington, D.C., The Brookings Institution, 1985, p.35.
[32] Budget of the United States Government, Fiscal Year 2003, Historical Tables, Table 3.2, pages 54-69.
[33] Ibid, Table 2.1 page 30.
[34] Ibid, Table 3.1, page 51.
[35] Bureau of Labor Statistics, "Consumer Expenditures in 1999," May 2001.

REV_00265909

Table 1
Size of the Tort Litigation Tax

Incidence Assumption	Equivalent Tax Base	Annual "Excessive" Tort Costs
		$87 billion	$136 billion	$230 billion
Fully shifted forward Through prices	Consumption Tax	1.3%	2.0%	3.4%
Fully shifted backward Onto workers	Wage Tax	2.1%	3.3%	5.7%
Fully borne by Investors	Capital Tax	3.1%	4.9%	8.2%
25% shifted through prices, 25% shifted through wages, 50% borne by investors	Consumption Wage Capital	0.3% 0.5% 1.6%	0.5% 0.8% 2.4%	0.8% 1.4% 4.1%

Source: CEA calculations. The taxes are calculated by dividing the annual excessive tort costs by the appropriate base. The consumption base is total personal consumption expenditures which totaled $6,728 billion in the year 2000. The wage base is total wage and salary disbursements to private industries, which totaled $4,069 billion. The capital base is non-labor payments in national income, which totaled $2,789 in the year 2000.

REV_00265910

Summary

The cost of the U.S. legal liability system has increased substantially over the past several decades. While economic theory suggests a potentially useful role for a tort system in providing proper incentives, excessive tort costs are akin to a tax on firms. Like any tax, this "litigation tax" imposes deadweight losses on the economy in the form of products and services that are never produced as a result of the fear of litigation. Both the direct and indirect costs of excessive tort must ultimately be borne by individuals in the economy through some combination of higher prices, lower wages, and reduced returns to investments.

REV_00265911

Introduction

With estimated annual direct costs of nearly $180 billion,[1] or 1.8 percent of GDP, the U.S. tort liability system is the most expensive in the world, more than double the average cost of other industrialized nations that have been studied.[2] This cost has grown steadily over time, up from only 1.3 percent of GDP in 1970, and only 0.6 percent in 1950. The current cost amounts to nearly $650 for every citizen of the United States, and is one reason that many commentators have called for reform of the tort liability system. The cost is especially troubling because only 20 percent of these dollars actually go to claimants for economic damages, such as lost wages or medical expenses.

Defenders of the status quo argue that the existing system protects consumers by making firms responsible for damages caused by their products and services.[3] Indeed, the underlying notion that firms are induced to recognize the full social cost of their products is one economic rationale for an efficient tort system.[4] That is, just as firms must pay compensation to employees and suppliers as part of the cost of producing output, ideally tort liability forces the firm to consider the potential for damage that the firm's products may cause. In this sense, it is analogous to "making polluters pay."

However, poorly designed policies can mistakenly make polluters pay too much and impose excessive costs on society through forgone production of public and private

---

[1] Direct costs include awards for economic and non-economic damages, administration, claimants' attorney fees and the costs of defense.

[2] Tillinghast-Towers Perrin, "U.S. Tort Costs: 2000, Trends and Findings on the Costs of the U.S. Tort System," February 2002.

[3] Throughout this paper, we use the term "firm" to refer to any producer of goods and services.

[4] Another economic argument sometimes used to support tort liability is that the right to sue provides consumers with "insurance" in the event of an accident. For a discussion of the limitations of this view, see Paul Rubin, Tort Reform by Contract, Washington, D.C.: The AEI Press, 1993. For purposes of this paper, it should be noted that regardless of the rationale for the system, the cost is still borne by individual consumers, workers, or investors.

REV_00265894

goods and services. Tort law alters firm behavior in a socially desirable manner if tort liability claims are optimal. If claims are excessive and fail to provide proper incentives, then these claims are a drain on resources that can deter the production of desired goods and services and reduce economic output. The United States bears the burden of an expensive and inefficient liability system through higher prices, lower wages, and decreased returns to investment, as well as lower levels of innovation.

The similarity between inefficient tort litigation and taxes suggests that the economic costs of the tort liability system may be better understood by pursuing the analogy between the expected costs arising from the tort system and taxes on firms. As with a tax, it is possible to examine the question of who bears the incidence of – that is, who pays for – excessive tort costs. An important lesson in the economics of taxation is that people pay taxes; firms are legal entities that can bear no real burden. Put differently, the burden of any tax depends not on who writes the check (the legal liability), which may be the firm, but rather on the market outcomes that shift the cost to workers, consumers or owners of capital.

What Are the Role and Limits of Liability Laws in a Market Economy?

The production and sale of nearly every economic good or service entails a degree of risk, however small, that the product may cause unintended harm. Children can be injured playing with toys, patients may have adverse reactions to medications or medical procedures, and workers may fall off ladders or be injured by machinery. Because consumers often have less than perfect information about these risks and are generally unable to insure against them, the government plays a potentially important role in promoting health and safety.

Many policy tools are available to address such risks, including a reliance on market forces, contracts, direct regulation, social insurance, and the legal liability system. Each approach has its relative strengths and weaknesses, and reliance on any single one may not be desirable.[5] In the United States, the tort system of legal liability is sometimes viewed as contributing to overall social objectives by ensuring that firms consider more fully the health and safety aspects of their products.

REV_00265895

A guiding insight is that competition in private markets for goods and services pushes firms to produce the kinds of goods that consumers prefer using the most efficient combination of labor, capital and other inputs. If consumers and firms are already faced with incentives to weigh the social costs and benefits of their respective consumption and production decisions, the burden of government policy is to preserve economic efficiency by avoiding intervention.

For some transactions, however, it may be infeasible to account fully for all of the relevant benefits and costs. A consumer purchasing a new car, for example, may have neither the technical expertise nor the information necessary to fully evaluate the risk of injury posed by a particular design feature. It could also be costly to obtain complete information on every key aspect. Alternatively, a patient purchasing a medical procedure, for example, may be unlikely to fully understand the complex risks, costs and benefits of that procedure relative to others. Such a patient must turn to a physician who serves as a "learned intermediary," though there remains the problem that the patient may also not be able to judge the skill of the physician from whom the procedure is "purchased." In such a case, the ability of the individual to pursue a liability lawsuit in the event of an improper treatment, for example, provides an additional incentive for the physician to follow good medical practice. Indeed, from a broad social perspective, this may be the least costly way to proceed – less costly than trying to educate every consumer fully. In a textbook example, recognition of the expected costs from the liability system causes the provider to undertake the extra effort or care that [5] For broader discussion of the role of each of these approaches, see W. Kip Viscusi, "Toward a Diminished Role for Tort Liability: Social Insurance, Government Regulation, and Contemporary Risks to Health and Safety," Yale Journal on Regulation, Winter 1989.

REV_00265896

matches the customer's desire to avoid the risk of harm. This process is what economists refer to as "internalizing externalities." In other words, the liability system makes persons who injure others aware of their actions, and provides incentives for them to act appropriately.

Central to this view, however, is the notion that the exposure of firms to potential tort liability costs provides proper incentives. In the specific context of punitive damages, Professor W. Kip Viscusi of Harvard University makes the point that "the linchpin of any law and economics argument in favor of punitive damages is that these awards alter incentives."[6] In his research on corporate decisions regarding environmental and safety torts, Viscusi evaluates the effect of punitive damages "by examining the risk performance in the four states that do not permit punitive damages as compared with other states that do." He finds that "this detailed effort to detect a deterrent effect yielded no evidence of any safety incentive role. This lack of evidence is consistent with the proposition that punitive damages are random." If punitive damages are essentially random, then they will not provide proper incentives for risk mitigation. Instead, they will operate purely as a "tax" on firms -- a cost with no corresponding benefit.

Some scholars disagree with Viscusi's conclusion. For example, Professor David Luban of Georgetown University argues that one should consider the "retributive aims of punishment" as well as the deterrent aims.[7] However, tort liability only achieves a goal of retribution if the economic burden of the punishment is borne by the responsible party, which may not be the case if the costs are ultimately passed through to investors, workers or consumers, or if punitive damages are essentially random, as Viscusi argues. Professor Theodore Eisenberg of Cornell Law School and several co-authors take an alternate view, claiming that tort liability is largely predictable and is

---

[6] W. Kip Viscusi, "Why There is No Defense of Punitive Damages," Georgetown Law Journal, November 1998.
[7] David Luban, "A Flawed Case Against Punitive Damages," Georgetown Law Journal, November 1998.

REV_00265897

therefore capable of providing proper incentives to firms.[8] However, while both authors question Viscusi's findings, neither provides direct empirical evidence to indicate that punitive damages actually have a deterrent effect. In fact, the empirical evidence that Eisenberg and co-authors do offer is consistent with the possibility that punitive damages are awarded on a random basis, as noted by Professor A. Mitchell Polinsky of Stanford University.[9]

Other research has examined the effect of expected tort liability costs on innovation and investments in safety. At lower levels of expected liability costs, Viscusi and Professor Michael Moore of Duke University[10] find that firms have incentives to invest in product safety research in an effort to reduce liability costs while still bringing a particular product to market. At higher levels of expected liability costs, however, firms will choose to forgo innovation or to withhold a product from the market, resulting in a net negative effect of expected liability costs on innovation. Based on their estimates, Viscusi and Moore identify many industry groups for which high liability costs exert a net negative effect on innovation.

Industry-specific studies by other authors have generally supported the results of Viscusi and Moore, documenting negative effects of liability on innovation in many areas, such as general aviation, chemicals, pharmaceuticals, and medical practice. The evidence of direct linkages between liability and safety in industry-specific analyses has been weak. Other factors, such as regulation and the fear of bad publicity, may provide stronger incentives to improve safety features than does legal liability, though liability

---

[8] Theodore Eisenberg, John Goerdt, Brian Ostrom, David Rottman, and Martin Wells, "The Predictability of Punitive Damages," The Journal of Legal Studies, June 1997.

[9] A. Mitchell Polinsky, "Are Punitive Damages Really Insignificant, Predictable, and Rational? A Comment on Eisenberg, et al.," The Journal of Legal Studies, June 1997.

[10] W. Kip Viscusi and Michael Moore, "Product Liability, Research and Development, and Innovation," Journal of Political Economy, 1993.

REV_00265898

may play an indirect role by encouraging the spread of safety-related information and by bringing potential hazards to the attention of regulators[11].

Reconciling these alternative views is beyond the scope of this paper. Instead, recognizing the controversy that exists about the incentive effects of tort liability in general, and punitive damages in particular, this paper will consider several scenarios. For our most cautious estimates of the size of the "litigation tax," we make the very strong assumption that both economic (e.g., loss of wages, medical expenses) and non-economic (e.g., pain and suffering, loss of consortium, punitive) damages are currently set at an optimal level. We then consider an intermediate case that treats non-economic damages as essentially random and therefore part of the litigation tax. Finally, we consider the case in which all of the costs of the U.S. tort system are treated as economically excessive, which would result if both economic and non-economic damages were largely random and failed to provide proper incentives.

What Are the Direct Costs of the U.S. Tort Liability System?

In the year 2000, according to a study by Tillinghast-Towers Perrin, the U.S. tort system cost $179 billion. This includes $128 billion of "insured" costs derived from financial data for the U.S. insurance industry. These data "are considered highly reliable in that they are subject to audit and reviewed by state regulatory agencies."[12] The costs include benefits paid to third parties or their attorneys, claim handling, legal defense costs and insurance company administrative costs. Tillinghast estimates that $30 billion in costs is paid by firms that insure themselves. Finally, they estimate that an additional $21 billion is due to medical malpractice. We will make use of these Tillinghast estimates for illustrative purposes in this paper, although the main conceptual contribution of this paper – that excessive tort claims act as a tax paid by individuals – would hold with equal force with any alternative measure of direct costs.

[11] Peter Huber and Robert Litan, eds., The Liability Maze: The Impact of Liability Law on Safety and Innovation, Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution, 1991.
[12] Tillinghast-Towers Perrin, "U.S. Tort Costs: 2000, Trends and Findings on the Costs of the U.S. Tort System," February 2002, page 8.

REV_00265899

The estimate of nearly $180 billion in direct costs of the U.S. tort system is likely to understate substantially the actual costs of the tort system for several reasons. First, the $180 billion estimate pre-dates September 11. The terrorist attacks have increased the uncertainty surrounding legal liability claims. Insurance companies, uncertain how to assess new liability risks, are raising premiums and capping or denying coverage. As such, the cost of the tort system in the future will likely be even greater than the year 2000 estimates employed herein. Second, this estimate ignores the many economic distortions that arise as a result of individuals and firms trying to avoid lawsuits. These costs, which will be discussed in more detail below, can include distortions to labor markets (e.g., doctors deciding not to practice certain specialties or in particular communities for fear of being sued), the practice of "defensive medicine," or the decision by manufacturers to keep products off the market.[13] Third, this estimate also ignores the potential deleterious effect of excessive tort claims on innovation. In product areas where litigation is frequent and costly, the prospect of high liability claims may be enough to ward off any potential new entrants.

Lacking a more comprehensive estimate of total costs, however, we will use the $180 billion as an initial conservative estimate of total tort costs. An even more difficult issue is deciding how much of this $180 billion is economically "excessive." There is no easy or widely accepted empirical answer to this question. To the extent that awards are largely "random" and fail to provide incentives to firms, most, or even all, of the tort expenses are excessive. Alternatively, to the extent that damages awarded to claimants are a good proxy for the actual damages caused, the fraction of tort costs that go to claimants to compensate for damages, plus reasonable "transactions costs," could be loosely viewed as the "right" level, and costs above this amount as being excessive.

[13] Some anecdotal evidence of these costs can be found in Michael Freedman's "The Tort Mess," Forbes.com, May 13, 2002.

REV_00265900

To pursue this line of reasoning, recall that more than half of the total annual cost of tort is due to administrative expenses and legal fees. As observed, "viewed as a mechanism for compensating victims for their economic losses, the tort system is extremely inefficient, returning only 20 cents of the tort cost dollar for that purpose."[14] This share of total tort costs that go to direct compensation for victims is lower than in the past. In the late 1980s and early 1990s, economic damages accounted for 22-25 percent of total tort system costs.[15]

Figure 1: Distribution of Liability Costs

Source: Tillinghast-Towers Perrin, February 2002.

As indicated in Figure 1, an additional 22 cents goes to claimants for non-economic damages, such as pain and suffering, loss of consortium and punitive damages. The remaining 58 percent of tort costs go to pay for administration, claimants' attorney fees, and defense costs. However, one should not necessarily view the entire 58 percent as "excessive," because some level of "transactions costs" is required in order to administer any system. As a guide for what is a reasonable level of costs, we use the experience of the Workers' Compensation system in the United

[14] Ibid,,page 12.
[15] According to previous studies by Tillinghast-Towers Perrin published in 1995, 1992 and 1989.

REV_00265901

Records Management, White House Office of (ORM)

Subject Files

FG006-27
(Office of Senior Advisor - Karl Rove)

536041

OA/NARA #: 10735/10193
9/11

Box _____
Folder _____

REV_00265912

2018-0011-P [ ]

Systematic Processing Marker

This is not a textual record. This Systematic Processing Marker indicates that material has been removed during systematic processing by George W. Bush Presidential Library staff.

Stack: Row: Sect.: Shelf: Pos.:	FRC ID:	Location or Hollinger ID:	NARA Number:	OA Number:
11/4/3/1	9711

Folder Title: ORM
FG006-27
536041

Dan B.
DHS - Susan Neely
D. Holtz

Ralston, Susan B.

53604 #

From: Karl Rove [kr@georgewbush.com]
Sent: Wednesday, July 16, 2003 3:23 PM
To: Ralston, Susan B.
Cc: Ed Gillespie
Subject: FW: Homeland Briefings/Battles

------ Forwarded Message
From: PRA 6
Date: Wed, 16 Jul 2003 12:09:45 -0400
To: "Karl Rove" <kr@georgewbush.com>
Subject: Homeland Briefings/Battles

Karl,

Feel free to disseminate this in any way.

I attended what was billed as a "Homeland Security Briefing" in Memphis. Harold Ford was the sponsor.

Attended by about 50 opinion makers -- mayors, chiefs, hospitals, industry, law enforcement.

Ford handed out the CFR "woefully unprepared" document.

Ford specifically criticized the tax cuts as putting us at "risk".

Said DHS "process" is "not adequately described by the administration."

Said there was "growing unease" with the process. Said he opposed DHS from the beginning.

Critical of ODP specifically. Said he may bring them to Memphis for explanations.

Chief Deputy Marshall for Western District brought up the budget/six months behind/'hurtful to process. Ford pounced on that as reason to be more critical.

State Homeland Security Director for Bredesen was somewhat critical. Said feds were slow. Contradicted himself on whether money had come down yet or not. I strongly suspect states are sitting on this grant money letting it draw interest because of the shortfalls.

The intended message is that nobody knows where the money is, and that it's the administration's fault.

Should you ever need to say that Dems are politicizing Homeland Security, this is an extreme example of it. I had a rep from USMS with me, so there is a more credible witness than myself. I also suspect some of the chiefs there would be willing to comment off the record. Some appeared disgusted.

There were also FOUR TV cameras there. No one defended the administration. I couldn't, because I was there for information analysis/intelligence purposes for the chairman of the city council. But someone should have. I suspect Ford is an extreme example, but his remarks may be some indicator of what the Dems will be saying.

I'm happy to do anything I can to help with this, other briefings, try to get talking points into the hands of someone who can speak up, etc. Whatever you need.

I hope this is helpful. If there's someone else you prefer I send stuff like this to, I'll be glad to. You are my only contact at this point.

tommy

------ End of Forwarded Message

From: Bob Novak

XC: KH - FYI
BJackson

Sign-on letter to Sens. Allen and Corzine, Reps. Reynolds and Matsui:

Circulated by Senator Lindsey Graham (R-SC), Rep. Charlie Stenholm (D-TX) and Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-AZ)

We believe that strengthening Social Security is one of our most important domestic policy priorities. The long-term financial outlook of Social Security is deteriorating and, absent structural reforms, it will impose an unsustainable financial burden on today's workers and future generations.

The white-hot rhetoric surrounding Social Security modernization is creating an environment that punishes those who discuss reform options openly and honestly. The American people deserve a modernized Social Security system that provides true retirement security for all Americans, while reducing the pressure on future taxpayers and on other budgetary priorities.

This goal will only be achieved if we make a commitment to discuss the need for Social Security reform candidly. Unfortunately, this has not always been in the case. Social Security has often been used as a weapon to achieve short term political goals. Indeed, both parties seemingly compete to outbid each other in ruling out options for restoring the fiscal health of Social Security. It is time for the demagoguery to stop.

To this end, we pledge to defend candidates – Republican or Democrat – who support Social Security modernization and are willing to make tough choices to address the fiscal challenges facing Social Security. We will no longer turn a blind eye to political attack ads that accuse responsible reform advocates of wanting to dismantle Social Security or slash benefits of current retirees. These attacks are untruthful and poison the bipartisan cooperation that will be required to enact the necessary reforms.

In 2000, then-candidate Bush said, "Too many times, Social Security has been demagogued to frighten the elderly for political advantage. Too many candidates have traded on the problems of the system instead of correcting them, shoving them off for others to handle – to some future generation, some other president and some other Congress."

We agree. It is time for this Congress and this President to solve the problems plaguing Social Security. Inaction is no longer an option. The longer we wait to tackle the necessary reforms, the harder the task becomes.

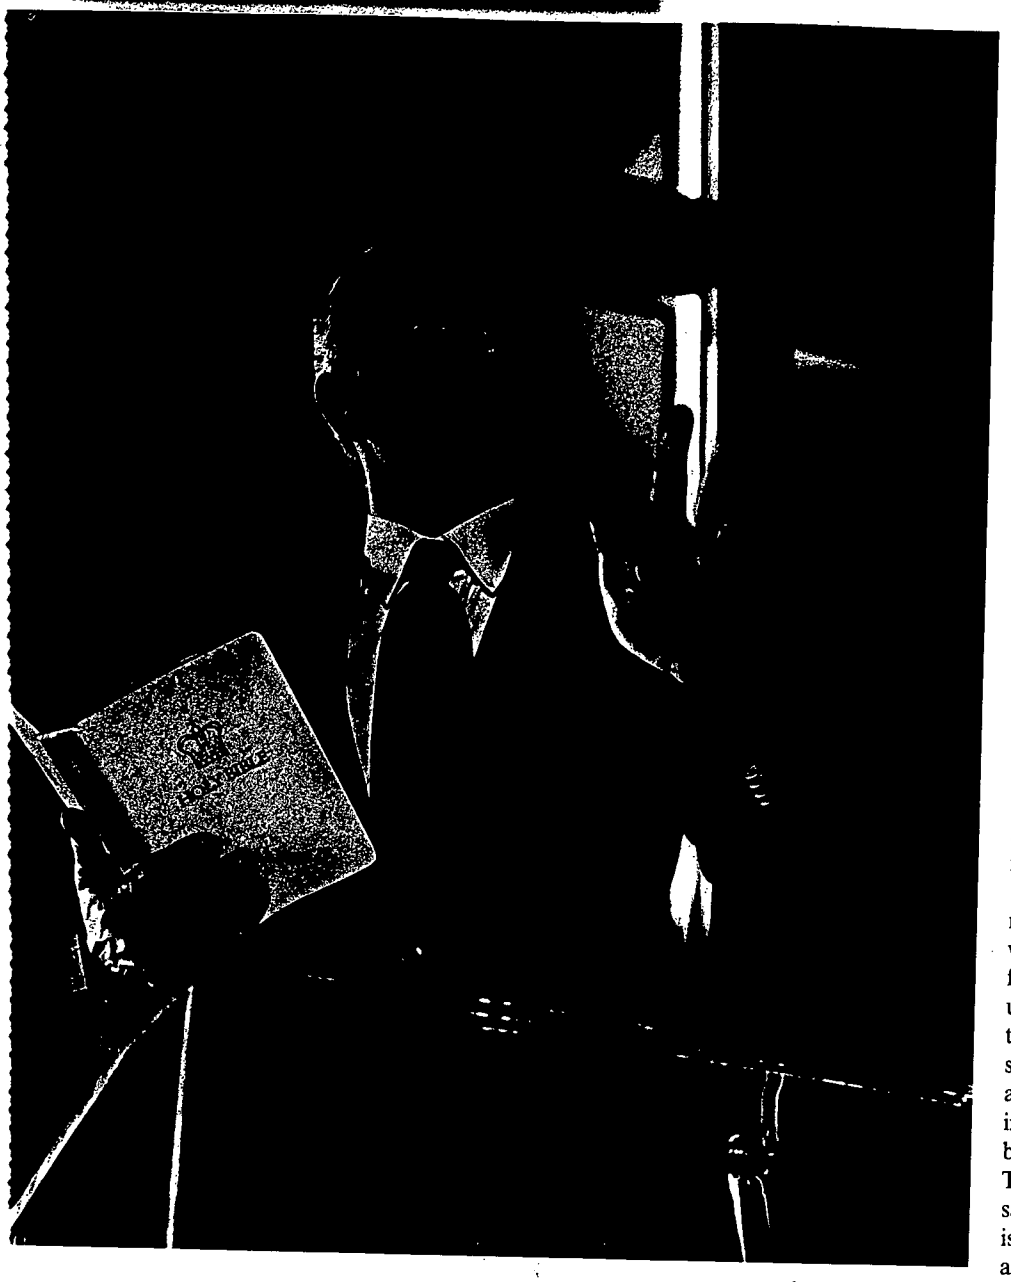
Although we all come from different political backgrounds and ideologies, and we have different ideas on how to modernize Social Security, we are proud to stand together in this effort to address Social Security and we encourage others to join us.

Dan FYI
Karen
Hughes

Reading

Karl:

Given the topic ("God and George W. Bush"), the writer (Christopher Hitchens, a devoted and vocal atheist), and the publication (Vanity Fair), I think this piece turned out okay.



Pete

Susan

discuss

Karl

CHRISTOPHER HITCHENS

ONE PRESIDENT UNDER GOD
George W. Bush's deep religious belief has resulted in a "faith-based initiative," among other questionable policies.

GOD AND MAN IN THE WHITE HOUSE

The Supreme Court will soon consider the 1954 addition to the Pledge of Allegiance of two short words: "under God." The Bush administration has sworn to keep them there. What is happening to the wall separating church and state–the key distinction between America and the fundamentalists it is fighting?

I am a strict constructionist and a firm believer in original intent. This is why I believe that the Pledge of Allegiance, in its current phrasing, is two words too long. The superfluous words—"under God"—were inserted during a jittery McCarthy-era moment in 1954, and after President Eisenhower had been unduly impressed by a preacher. The same preacher sermonized that the pledge, in its form as then recited, could be uttered by any schoolchild in Moscow. Quick remedial action was required, and so it was determined that the rhythm and harmony of the pledge, along with its main point, should be ruined by a crude editorial insertion.

Francis Bellamy, the former Baptist minister and Christian socialist who wrote the original pledge, was looking for a form of words that would be genuinely "inclusive." At the time he did this, in 1892, children in the South were still watching Civil War veterans swear allegiance to the Confederate flag, and in the North there was much Protestant bigotry against Catholic immigration. Thus, reasoned Bellamy, it was necessary to have a civic and secular patriotism, based upon the idea of "liberty and justice for all." That simple notion managed to get the country's children through two World Wars before it was trashed. Now the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in California has upheld a complaint brought by an atheist parent. So we'll soon see the Supreme Court debating something apparently trivial but actually essential. How stands the "wall of separation" between church and state, in a country locked in furious battle with armed and dangerous theocrats?

Over at the Department of Justice, Attorney General John Ashcroft is in righteous mode and prepared for spiritual warfare. You might think that he would be too busy pursuing the god-inflamed and god-intoxicated enemies of the Republic, but he's taking time out to keep the pledge the way it is: a standing insult to secular Americans. After the appellate court voted 2–1 to find the current wording of the pledge unconstitutional, he swore that his department would "spare no effort to preserve the rights of all our citizens to pledge allegiance to the American flag." This is the intellectual equivalent of saying that the Constitution upholds the right of all Americans to worship Santa Claus in their own way. But then, Mr. Ashcroft has also made another famous statement, telling his audience that "America has been different. We have no king but Jesus." This proclamation is also two words too long. We have no king at all, and we have no state church, or official religion, and that's that. It's also supposed to be the essential difference between ourselves and the homicidal fundamentalists.

PHOTO COMPOSITE BY MICHAEL ELINS

REV_00265918

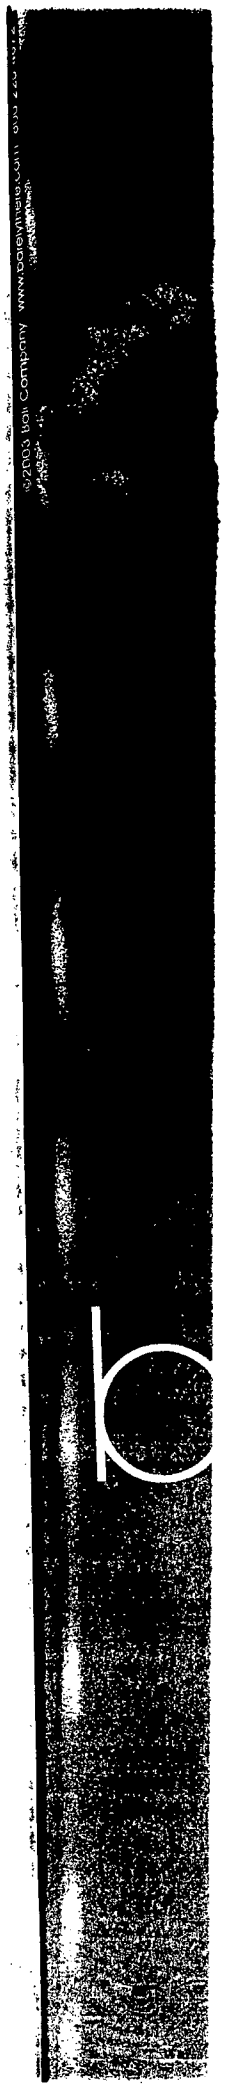
Ashcroft was not attorney general when he made this stupid remark in 1999, while accepting an "honorary degree" from Bob Jones University. (A full degree from that historically racist and sectarian sink of ignorance would hardly count higher.) And George Bush was not president when he was asked to name his favorite political philosopher during a candidates' debate in 1999, and modestly nominated Jesus Christ. As it happens, the two favorite "political philosophers" of the American right are Leo Strauss, an agnostic, and Ayn Rand, a proud and determined atheist. But millions of people at home and abroad have now gotten hold of the idea that we have a fundamentalist and proselytizing administration, led by a born-again believer. How true is this charge?

To begin with the defense rather than the prosecution: Bush has not mentioned the name of Jesus, except when speaking to other Christians, since taking the oath of office. He only makes general invocations of the Almighty these days. It's understood that he privately asks himself, "What would Jesus do?," but there's no particular objection to that, since if he were not a Christian he would be the first president since Abraham Lincoln who did not make this claim. (Also, he clearly doesn't take the advice of his favorite "political philosopher," who generally counseled turning the other cheek.) It's true that the president employed the word "crusade" when speaking of the fight against al-Qaeda, but this word has only lately fallen under a ban of disapproval. Until very recently, every civil-rights activist in America would have described his or her movement as a crusade. Also, Bush only said it twice. And he more than balanced it by making several highly flattering remarks about the Muslim religion, going further in this respect than any of his predecessors and making a claim—that Islam is "a religion of peace"—which asks us to believe quite a lot, and which nobody living in an officially Muslim society could believe for a second.

Descending from the grand to the minuscule, the president has also told us on more than one occasion that he personally has been aided by a higher authority, and that he needed the help as much as he once needed a drink. The old choice—"It's me or Jack Daniel's, you asshole"—has been brusquely offered to many a gross Texan husband by many a pissed-off Texan wife, and there's no good reason to doubt that this story is just another version of the old, old one. Except that in Bush's case it worked. He really did choose Jesus over the amber nectar. (Forcing myself to reflect on this choice has taken me into an area of ethereal responsibility well above my pay grade at this magazine.) Yet, not to be overly sarcastic about it, the decision did involve the future candidate in the first page-by-page, line-by-line scrutiny of any book that he had ever undertaken. As a result of a long, hard stint at "Community Bible Study," he is now as abstemious as any Muslim or strict Hindu or 1920s biblical-Protestant prohibitionist.



In a society half crazed by its own addiction to therapy and personal growth, there needn't be any great alarm about that either. Bush's marriage was saved, and his daughters and niece grew up to be barflies or prescription forgers, which shows that we are all at the mercy of heredity as well as of divine judgment. There is no final victory of good over evil. Did someone say evil? Yes, as a matter of fact, Bush did, on several occasions, adding the word "evildoers" to describe the perps themselves. I think that it's culturally shallow for liberals to assume, as they mainly do, that evil is a word only of religious discourse. (Try "malefactor," for example, as a synonym for evildoer.) Hannah Arendt, an imperishable name among secular intellectuals, referred repeatedly in her analyses of genocidal Europe to the "evil-doer" Adolf Eichmann and to "radical evil" and "the banality of evil." This suggests, if we put it only briefly, that we do need a word for it. The president did not refer to an axis of sin, now did he?

Bush has not mentioned the name of Jesus, except when speaking to other Christians, since taking the oath of office.

Actually, his problem is more one of banality than it is of evil. Like that great Republican Dwight Eisenhower, he seems to believe that any "faith" is better than none. Eisenhower remarked rather gauchely that "our government makes no sense unless it is founded on a deeply-held religious belief—and I don't care what it is." With comparable naïveté, President Bush announced that Vladimir Putin was a fellow he could bond with because he carried a crucifix inherited from his mother and was a man of faith who could be looked in the eye, and that Turkey's new Islamist prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, was also a trusty believer in heaven's providence. Thus a cruel and shifty ex-lieutenant colonel in the K.G.B. and a mediocre religious demagogue from Ankara both received a kiss of peace at the White House. (Both went on to watch coldly and to act cynically, after numerous Bush entreaties, as American forces took on Saddam Hussein more or less by themselves.)

The case for the defense now switches automatically to the case for the prosecution. If faith can lead to such godawful pratfalls in foreign policy, what fresh hell might it not wreak on the domestic front? Here we find the president resorting to the softer language, not of faith but of the "faith-based," in order to imply that the federal government can and should take care of the rich, while the churches, mosques, synagogues, and cults can and should take care of the poor. To some extent this was inevitable, because the Clinton welfare policy had already dumped poor children off the rolls. But it was impressive to see how soon a doubt-based policy kicked in. Church-state relations, especially financial ones, are not a one-way street. The state should not, as our Constitution stipulates, have anything to do with favoring religion in general, let alone any religion in particular. But neither should any religion—or all religion, for that matter—be tainted by association with the state. You cannot escape this dilemma by pretending to be neutral or indiscriminate. Do I want my taxpayer dollars to fund, say, a security detail in some housing project that is run by Louis Farrakhan's Nation of Islam local recruits? Emphatically not. But how can Farrakhan himself justify taking money from a regime he regards as polluted and profane? And how can anyone justify the funding of a group such as Farrakhan's, which has, to put it squarely, discriminatory hiring practices? This is an extreme case, which did in fact come up, but it nonetheless illustrates all the other ones. The charitable instinct, or the prompting of compassion, is one thinkable defense of the religious mentality. But this is undermined and corrupted by definition if it solicits money that's already been compulsorily raised by law. There's no way around or through this contradiction, which is why the "faith-based initiative" was so eviscerated by the Senate this spring.

Embarrassed overseas and thwarted at home by his reliance on simplemindedness, Bush has resorted to a tactic of "signaling." In his speeches, and in some of his nominations and appointments, he lets the relevant constituencies know that he is on their side. He has two amazingly smart allies in this process: Michael Gerson, his chief speechwriter, and Karl Rove, his senior adviser. Gerson is loosely describable as a Christian "evangelical," a term of art in the religion business that has no known definition. (Approximately speaking, an "evangelical" Christian is one who really believes this stuff and wants to share the good news.) Neither Gerson nor Rove has anything to do with "end time" or "premillennial" Christianity, and neither believes that an intense military tussle with Satan is soon to take place at Armageddon. This is an often circulated slander against them, and against Bush too. It obscures the picture rather than illuminating it. Bush had an Episcopalian boyhood, attended Presbyterian church when the family moved to Texas, and later joined his wife's United Methodist congregation. His "conversion" moment had nothing to do with any particular branch of Christianity and was complete long before he planned a political career.

REV_00265919

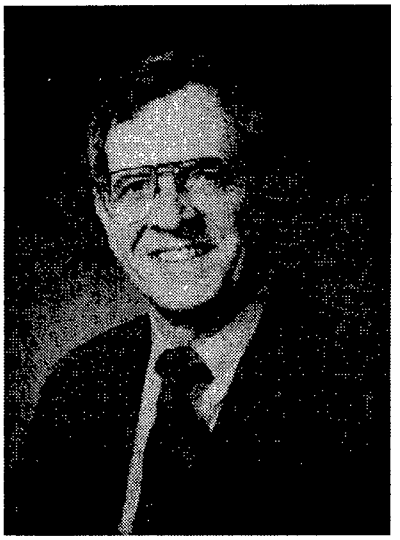
But in 1994, as he was thinking about running for governor, he told a reporter from a Houston newspaper that you don't get to heaven if you don't believe in Jesus. The reporter was Jewish, and there was a minor flap. (Some Jews get upset when some Christians say there won't be a Christian-Jewish reunion in paradise. Other Jews, I have noticed, can manage to bear the idea.) Anyway, this crass remark probably helped secure a Bush base among true believers in the more brush-infested parts of Texas. He did much the same thing, running for president in 2000, when he made an emergency pit stop at—yes—Bob Jones University during a tough battle on the southern front with Senator John McCain. Since then, the signaling has become much more sophisticated, not to say refined, not to say more niche-marketed.

In his inaugural speech, written by Michael Gerson, Bush put the following question about America and destiny: "Do you not think an angel rides in the whirlwind and directs this storm?" That arresting image was, I think, first used by the 18th-century English poet and essayist Joseph Addison. But it was actually drawn in this case from a letter written by John Page, during the American Revolution, to the deistical skeptic Thomas Jefferson. The idea was as ecumenical as you could get.

Then, in his most recent State of the Union address, the president announced that there was "power, wonder-working power," in "the goodness and idealism and faith of the American people." The wording was corny enough—all presidents say something like that—but if you were an old-time gospel type you couldn't have failed to "get" the reference to a favorite hymn, "There Is Power in the Blood," which says that there's "power, power, wonder-working power, in the precious blood of the lamb." This same "lamb," as we know, is the human sacrifice represented by Jesus. A similar "message" was sent in the very title of Bush's campaign biography. As you will all at once recall, this was A Charge to Keep—which derives from a famous hymn by Charles Wesley, brother of the founder of Methodism. It speaks of the duty "to serve the present age" and "to do my Master's will." But such hinting and indirection is imposed on the president, who must also try to please Catholic and Jewish and Muslim voters as well as a surprising number of secular ones, and who has—in Karl Rove—a polycentric and polymorphous organizer who got him most of the Muslim vote last time. Bush's appeal to Catholics, by way of statements on cloning, stem-cell research, and partial-birth abortion, completes this holy triangulation. As for the Jewish vote, still muted as a force in G.O.P. circles, that's perhaps why we hear, from time to time, that Ariel Sharon is "a man of peace" as well. (If religion is so goddamned peaceful, then why are we fighting zealots and fundamentalists on so many fronts?)



As a result of "Community Bible Study," Bush is now as abstemious as any Muslim or strict Hindu or 1920s biblical-Protestant prohibitionist.

One provisional conclusion would be that Bush does better when speaking in devotional codes, or in the words of Michael Gerson, than he does when improvising for himself. (The gift of speaking in tongues has emphatically not yet descended upon him when he talks ad lib.) I have spoken to numerous thoughtful people who work or who have worked for Bush, none of whom wanted to be quoted, none of whom go to the same place of worship as he or as one another, and most of whom are more devout than he, who all agreed on one point. The president is neither a religious fanatic nor a man who just uses religious rhetoric as a cynical tactic. He takes his religion as a confirmation, or as a reinforcement. He doesn't think he's a prophet. He prefers to be a fatalist and to say that all is in God's hands. "It relieves him of the things of this world," one of them said. "It means he's less worried." Bush, in other words, could have made a very plausible Muslim, and—why is this more of a stretch?—a fairly good Hasidic Jew.

America is a most religious country and has a most decidedly secular constitution. Only state secularism, after all, can guarantee religious pluralism. This is an easy paradox to grasp. Has Bush grasped it? He has appointed not just John Ashcroft but also Rod Paige. And he has nominated Dr. W. David Hager. Mr. Paige is secretary of education and appears to believe that in a future, ideal America the churches and not the government should be in charge of the instruction of the young. Dr. Hager, who is Bush's idea of an adviser to the F.D.A., is an opponent not just of abortion but also of contraception outside of marriage, and has been quoted as saying that women suffering pre-menstrual syndrome should turn to prayer and Bible reading. (If this man is wedded, I think Congress must subpoena his wife, or—if he should turn out to be from Utah—all his wives.) One of Bush's first presidential acts was to forbid federal funding for any group overseas that even gives advice on abortion. This is, by all reports, just the compassionate treatment that the African AIDS epidemic needs. And the foregoing implicitly raises the very fraught question: If this is Bush's idea of a political nomination, what might his judicial nominations be like? (The current nightmare of the Democrats, and fund-raising tool for advocacy groups, is J. Leon Holmes, proposed for a district-court judgeship in Arkansas in spite of his expressed opinion that rape victims hardly ever get pregnant and thus won't be needing access to abortion.)

The wider picture might clarify a bit if Bush's critics did not also attack him in the name of god. During the prelude to the war against Saddam Hussein, a spokesman for Bush's own United Methodist Church was quoted in a bit of peace-loving propaganda as saying that such a conflict "violates God's law and the teachings of Jesus Christ." How the bishop could know this is quite beyond me. How the Pope presumed to say what Jesus would do is also quite beyond my power of surmise (I do know that it came as a huge shock to the White House to discover that it was Christianity that was the religion of peace). If religion is to be kept separate from politics, or at the very least separate from government, then everyone, including so-called liberation theologians and candidates running under the assumed title of "Reverend," must learn to contribute their own brick to the wall of separation. □

REV_00265920

Jack M. Webb, Businessman, lawyer, geologist, mediator, lobbyist, farmer, soldier, diplomat, and political advisor. He currently serves as Chairman and President of Jack M. Webb & Associates, Inc., as a Director of Scotia Pacific Holding Company, Techxas Ventures, American Meridian Insurance Company (Bermuda), Employers Indemnity Company and the Boy Scouts of America. Previous directorships include Houston National Bank, Charter Bank Houston, Altair Corporation, Medical Community Insurance Company, Lucas Petroleum, Vision Software, Inc., the National Parks Foundation, the Museum of Natural Science, Rice Center, Texas Aerospace Commission, the Bluebonnet Bowl, Episcopal High School, River Oaks Property Owners Association, Harris County Health Facility Development Corporation and the Texas State Board of Registration for Professional Engineers. As Executive Director of the Houston Political Action Committee, he has been influential in national electoral politics for more than twenty years. He is also a graduate of the American Leadership Forum and Leadership Houston.

Presidential appointments include the President's Commission on White House Scholars, the Advisory Board of the U.S. Peace Corps and Presidential Delegation assignments to Finland, Haiti, Ghana, Angola and Bolivia, as well as various White House advance teams. Other appointments include the Pipeline Safety Standards Committee by the Secretary of Transportation, Take Pride in America by the Secretary of the Interior and the Houston World War II Commemorative Committee by the Secretary of Defense. Government related activities have included assignments in Africa, Europe, the Middle East and Latin America. Currently he serves as the Honorary Consul of Ghana.

In the private sector, he has undertaken thirty-four federal court appointments as Trustee in complex business reorganization cases, e.g. Couch Mortgage Company, and twelve state court appointments as Special Deputy Receiver for Texas insurance companies, e.g. Employers Casualty Company. He also has served as Chairman of the Board and General Counsel of Republic Capital, Senior Vice President of First City Texas, Vice President, Secretary and Assistant General Counsel of Gulf Resources & Chemical Corporation and as legal counsel for Panhandle Eastern Corporation and Standard Oil Company of California. Founder of Jack M. Webb & Associates, he has specialized in representing individuals and corporations before the Congress of the United States and also provided clients with consulting services in government relations, both in domestic and international matters.

An Eagle Scout as a boy, for over thirty years, he has been a Scoutmaster of a Houston Boy Scout troop and served as a leader for Boy Scout World Jamboree trips to Korea, Japan, Australia and New Zealand. He received a Doctor of Jurisprudence from Tulane University and Bachelor of Science in Geology from Centenary College of Louisiana prior to service as a Captain in the U.S. Army tank corps. In 1999, he attended the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University.

3434 Locke Lane • Houston, Texas 77027 • (713)960-8806 • FAX (713)960-8833

536041

2002 FEB 21 PM 5:56

CALFEE, HALTER & GRISWOLD LLP
ATTORNEYS AT LAW
Cleveland

Direct Dial No. 216/622-8448
email: jmino@calfee.com

February 19, 2002

Mr. Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, DC 20502-0001

Dear Mr. Rove:

Thank you for taking the time to meet with Alex Arshinkoff, Tom Wagner and me last week. We appreciated the opportunity to share our views on the state of the steel industry and put forth some considerations as the President shapes his steel policy in the coming weeks.

We were pleased to provide input on the legacy cost issue as well as bring to your attention the liquidity issues facing a substantial portion of the steel industry. Certainly, we are prepared to provide further input upon request.

Sincerely,

John Mino

cc: Thomas E. Wagner, Esq.
Alex Arshinkoff

CALL SHEET

5 36641

DATE		TIME	NAME	COMPANY	PHONE NO.	NOTES	MESSAGE
3/17		2:46p	Michael Beschloss
4/11			Suzie Terrell
4/29			John Podhoretz
5/9		8:50a	Amb. Tony Hall
5/16			Desiree Sayle
5/19			William Harvey	Hampton Univ.
6/16			Bob Lichter
6/24			Bob Tyrell
6/25		10:00 a	Rev. Eugene Rivers
6/25		1:48 p	Newt Gingrich
6/26		5:00 p	Rev. James Robison
6/30			Fran Manilla	National Parks Dept of Interior
7/1			JP Woodley	DoD
7/9		8:00 a	Bill Pope	State Dept.

PRA 6

PRA 6

7/9		8:10 a	Rev. Kirbyjohn Caldwell
7/9			Dan Fried
7/9			Doug MacKinnon
7/9			Dr. James Dobson
7/14	6	8:33 am	Eli Jacobs
7/14	5	10:00 a	Jerome Lewis
7/14		6:30 p	Amb. Sam Zakhem
7/15			Rush Limbaugh
7/15		9:00 a	Kristen Silverberg
7/15	4	12:30 p	Dina Powell
7/15			Governor Thompson
7/15			George Will
7/15			Thomas DeLeire
7/15	3	2:33 p	Steve Bell	Sen. Domenici

Holly +

PRA 6

CALL SHEET

7/15		3:00 p	Senator Domenici
7/15	(2)	3:22 p	Governor Pataki
7/15		3:30 p	Haley Barbour
7/15	(1)		Senator Don Nickles

→ Brett Bernhardt

PRA 6

REV_00265928

Discuss w/ Andy

F: Hagin 536041

Susan Ralston

From: Ken Mehlman [kmehlman@georgewbush.com]
Sent: Friday, June 20, 2003 10:28 AM
To: Karl Rove
Cc: Susan Ralston
Subject: PLEASE MAKE SURE KARL SEES THIS

Hagin's information was only partially correct. See below note from Mercer. Jamie Reynolds only ordered the tent after the service told him to.

-----Original Message-----
From: Mercer Reynolds
Sent: Friday, June 20, 2003 10:27 AM
To: Ken Mehlman
Subject: Re:

Yes because the secret service told us they needed 24 hours to sweepNthe ballroom and we couldn't get in ther until noon today because of a conflict. If we had known sooner about the needs of the ss we could have moved the meeting.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

F: Americorps
Karl 536041

Goergen, Barbara J.

From: BJ Goergen [BGoergen@georgewbush.com]
Sent: Tuesday, July 15, 2003 10:18 AM
To: Goergen, Barbara J.
Subject: FW: Americorps

-----Original Message-----
From: Karl Rove [mailto:KR@georgewbush.com]
Sent: Tuesday, July 15, 2003 10:16 AM
To: BJ Goergen
Subject: FW: Americorps

------ Forwarded Message
From: PRA 6
Date: Tue, 15 Jul 2003 08:20:35 -0400
To: "Karl Rove" <kr@georgewbush.com>
Subject: Americorps

Karl:
I believe you should know the following if you don't already because I believe the intensity of feeling continues to mount.

As you know, Teach For America has had incredible support from the White House and from the Secretary of Education since the start of the Administration. The President spoke at a White House-arranged event under a Teach For America banner in Atlanta two days after his State of the Union in 2002 and talked about the creation of the USA Freedom Corps and expansion of AmeriCorps.
I also understand that Teach For America's growth is one of the First Lady's five official "projects," and that Mrs. Bush has done multiple events across the country for Teach For America to help with recruitment and also with building the program's community support. Moreover, Secretary Paige was one of their biggest supporters when he was superintendent in Houston and has remained a vocal advocate.

Without the supplemental funding it appears that Teach For America will have education awards for 570 corps members. LAST YEAR THEY HAD 3300. They were expecting to place those 3,300 corps members in the following cities and states:

Atlanta
Baltimore
Bay Area (CA)
Chicago

Detroit
Houston
Los Angeles
Miami
Mississippi Delta
New Jersey
New Mexico (Navajo Reservation)
New Orleans
New York City
North Carolina (eastern rural)
Philadelphia
Phoenix
Rio Grande Valley
South Dakota (2004 expansion)
South Louisiana
St. Louis
Washington D.C.

2800 teachers who were scheduled to go teach in poverty areas in a number of target states for little or nothing because they heard a call to service.

In addition, there will be a letter from Governors, which presently has 28 signatures, including 9 Republicans and 19 Democrats, to the House leadership urging support of the supplemental. Fourteen additional Governors, including 10 Republicans and 4 Democrats, are still considering endorsement. The list includes the following:

Republicans

1. Gov. Huckabee, AR

2. Gov. Sonny Perdue, GA

3. Gov. Mike Foster Jr., LA

4. Gov. Romney, MA

5. Gov. Judy Martz, MT

6. Gov. Johanns, NE

7. Gov. Guinn, NV

8. Gov. Pataki, NY

9. Gov. O Leavitt, UT

Democrats

1. Gov. Napolitano, AZ

2. Gov. Davis, CA
3. Gov. Minner, DE
4. Gov. Vilsack, IA
5. Gov. O'Bannon, IN
6. Gov. Patton, KY
7. Gov. Sebelius, KS
8. Gov. Musgrove, MS
9. Gov. Granholm, MI
10. Gov. Easley, NC
11. Gov. McGreevey, NJ
12. Gov. Richardson, NM
13. Gov. Henry, OK
14. Gov. Rendell, PA
15. Gov. Holden, MO
16. Gov. Warner, VA
17. Gov. Locke, WA
18. Gov. Doyle WI
19. Gov. Wise, WV

Marc

------ End of Forwarded Message

F: Jean Becker
536041

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

FACSIMILE TRANSMITTAL SHEET

TO:	FROM:
Jean Becker	Karl Rove
COMPANY:	DATE: 7/16/2003
FAX NUMBER:	TOTAL NO. OF PAGES INCLUDING COVER: 2
PHONE NUMBER:	SENDER'S REFERENCE NUMBER: 202-456-2369
RE: From the Hotline...	YOUR REFERENCE NUMBER:

☐ URGENT ☐ FOR REVIEW ☐ PLEASE COMMENT ☐ PLEASE REPLY ☐ PLEASE RECYCLE

NOTES/COMMENTS:

REV_00265942

grapes by those who want to undo '02 election	40	57
Recalling Davis will make it easier to solve the state's budget problems	29	65

Are You Inclined To Support Each Of Six Possible Candidates In A Replacement Election For Governor Should Davis Be Recalled? (LVs)

	Yes	No
Richard Riordan, Republican	37%	53%
Arnold Schwarzenegger, Republican	31	62
Bill Simon, Republican	30	62
Tom McClintock, Republican	27	57
Darrell Issa, Republican	22	61
Peter Miguel Camejo, Green Party	11	73

Pollster Mark DiCamillo said, while the 51%-43% "split" on the recall "is grim news" for Davis, "it's far too early to write Davis' political obituary." DiCamillo: "I feel we really haven't begun to get a good feeling of what the chances are of a Davis recall. This is a very hypothetical situation where we don't even know the whole ballot yet. The voters' intentions are unsettled." Meanwhile, Davis pollster Paul Maslin said "the slim pro-recall majority is likely to be a high-water mark"; he "predicted support for a recall will slip as an election moves closer."

"The real wild cards" in a recall "are the people running to replace Davis." So far, Dem leaders "have managed to keep the field confined to Republicans and minor party candidates, which is likely to help Davis." DiCamillo: "When Democrats see that they're presented with five Republicans and a Green Party candidate to replace Davis, they say 'Give me someone else.' ... That's a political vacuum that usually gets filled. Certainly it presents an opportunity to any Democrat who would want to get involved" (Wildermuth, San Francisco Chronicle, 7/16).

(Back to Contents)

Fax to Jean Becker

18 KENTUCKY GOVERNOR: Analize This

Louisville Courier-Journal's Hawpe writes, "Accountability is the essence of good politics," and AG Ben Chandler's (D) quest to make the cong. record of Rep. Ernie Fletcher (R-KY 06) and his support of Bush policies "an issue" should "not come as a surprise." Likewise, "Fletcher wants voters to see" Chandler's record and find "proof that he's at least partly responsible" for the "ineptitude and corruption" scandals surrounding KY Gov. Paul Patton (D-KY). In short, "Chandler hopes to nationalize the election," while "Fletcher hopes to Pattonize it."

Campaign Tip Sheet
Primary/Filing Dates, Latest Polls, Latest Ads...

On Fletcher manager Daniel Groves' recent criticism towards the Chandler camp for trying to "nationalize" the KY GOV race, Hawpe writes, "I don't understand. ... It ought to work very well, not for Chandler but for Fletcher. ... The congressman has earned the right to bask in the reflected glow of broad public support for the President," after "faithfully" supporting Bush tax cuts and the admin's policies toward Afghanistan and Iraq. Hawpe continues, "Indeed, the assumption is that Fletcher will bring Bush to Kentucky as many times as possible."

More Hawpe musings: "Is it fair, or sensible, to nationalize the gubernatorial election? Certainly, Fletcher's votes, like Chandler's decisions and actions as a state official, tell the public a lot about his value system." As for the Fletcher camp's tactics, "Is it fair to Pattonize the election? Nothing wrong with trying. ... [Voters] can inspect Chandler's record to see whether he contributed to political and policy messes the Patton administration has created in Frankfort, or whether he tried to do something about them" (7/16).

(Back to Contents)

REV_00265943

536041

California State Senate

STATE CAPITOL
SACRAMENTO, CA 95814
(916) 445-3688
FAX (916) 327-2272
E-MAIL: SENATOR.BRULTE@SEN.CA.GOV

10681 FOOTHILL BLVD., #325
RANCHO CUCAMONGA, CA 91730
(909) 466-9096
FAX (909) 466-9892

COMMITTEES:
GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATION
TRANSPORTATION

JAMES L. BRULTE
SENATE REPUBLICAN LEADER
SENATOR, THIRTY-FIRST DISTRICT

June 11, 2002

Mr. Karl Rove
White House
West Wing, 2nd Floor
Washington, DC 20500

Dear Karl:

I thought you might like to see the mail piece (State Paid) that I put out on the Anniversary of President Bush's Tax Cut.

Over 70,000 pieces went out to California households in my District.

Sincerely,

JIM BRULTE

P.S. I've got at least three other Republican Senators sending them out too.

Materials received in ORM

REV_00265944

The National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse
at Columbia University

June 18, 2003

Mr. Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, D.C. 20500

Dear Karl:

Enclosed please find a copy of a note I sent to Andy Card asking the President to proclaim September 22nd as "Family Day—A Day to Eat Dinner with Your Children."

CASA research has consistently found that the more often children eat dinner with their parents, the less likely they are to smoke, use illegal drugs or abuse alcohol.

Family Day could be a real plus for the country, for substance abuse prevention and for the President.

Sincerely,

Joseph A. Califano, Jr.

Enclosures

633 Third Avenue
New York, NY 10017-6706

phone 212 841 5200
fax 212 956 8020
www.casacolumbia.org

Board of Directors

Joseph A. Califano, Jr.
Chairman and President

Lee C. Bollinger
Columba Bush
Kenneth I. Chenault
Jamie Lee Curtis
James Dimon
Peter R. Dolan
Mary Fisher
Douglas A. Fraser
Victor F. Ganzi
Leo-Arthur Kelmenson
Donald R. Keough
David A. Kessler, M.D.
Manuel T. Pacheco, Ph.D.
Joseph J. Plumeri II
E. John Rosenwald, Jr.
Michael P. Schulhof
Louis W. Sullivan, M.D.
John J. Sweeney
Michael A. Wiener

Directors Emeritus

James E. Burke (1992-1997)
Betty Ford (1992-1998)
Barbara C. Jordan (1992-1996)
LaSalle Leffall (1992-2001)
Nancy Reagan (1995-2000)
Linda J. Rice (1992-1996)
George Rupp (1995-2002)
Michael I. Sovern (1992-1995)
Frank G. Wells (1992-1994)

The National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse
at Columbia University

633 Third Avenue
New York, NY 10017-6706

phone 212 841 5200
fax 212 956 8020
www.casacolumbia.org

Board of Directors

Joseph A. Califano, Jr.
Chairman and President

Lee C. Bollinger
Columba Bush
Kenneth I. Chenault
Jamie Lee Curtis
James Dimon
Peter R. Dolan
Mary Fisher
Douglas A. Fraser
Victor F. Ganzi
Leo-Arthur Kelmenson
Donald R. Keough
David A. Kessler, M.D.
Manuel T. Pacheco, Ph.D.
Joseph J. Plumeri II
E. John Rosenwald, Jr.
Michael P. Schulhof
Louis W. Sullivan, M.D.
John J. Sweeney
Michael A. Wiener

Directors Emeritus

James E. Burke (1992-1997)
Betty Ford (1992-1998)
Barbara C. Jordan (1992-1996)
LaSalle Leffall (1992-2001)
Nancy Reagan (1996-2000)
Linda J. Rice (1992-1996)
George Rupp (1995-2002)
Michael I. Sovern (1992-1995)
Frank G. Wells (1992-1994)

June 18, 2003

Mr. Andrew H. Card, Jr.
Chief of Staff to the President
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, DC 20500

Dear Andy:

For the past two years, President Bush has proclaimed the fourth Monday in September, "Family Day." The President joined the governors of thirty-five states and a host of organizations and community groups across the nation in recognizing the importance of family dinners to creating healthy children.

This year Family Day will take place on September 22. We would like the President to issue a proclamation declaring that day "Family Day" by June and host a ceremony to publicize the event in June. Family Day fits in perfectly with the President's Parents Drug Corps initiative. Family dinners are a comfortable, natural way that any parent can help their kids grow up safe and drug-free. CASA research has consistently found that the more often children eat dinner with their parents, the less likely they are to smoke, use illegal drugs or abuse alcohol.

With the President's support, this year we will be able to teach even more Americans that simple actions like eating dinner together can do a world of good in protecting a child's health and well-being. This ceremony would be an ideal way for the President to emphasize the importance of parental involvement in their children's lives.

I hope the President will support this important initiative which can help thousands of parents and children across the nation.

Enclosed are copies of the Presidential Proclamations issued in 2001 and 2002.

Sincerely,

Joseph A. Califano, Jr.

Family Day, 2002

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

America's character begins in the home, where children learn proper standards of conduct, principled values, and the importance of service. Families provide children the encouragement, support, and love they need to become confident, compassionate, and successful members of society. We must work together to promote and preserve the health and security of our families by upholding the timeless values that have sustained our society through history.

Recent events have reminded Americans of the blessings of family and friends, and of the importance of faith. As a Nation, we have a renewed dedication to our freedom, our country, and our principles. In homes, schools, places of worship, the workplace, and civic and social organizations, we must continue to encourage responsibility, compassion, and good citizenship.

Americans must also act to fight crime and drugs, and provide a safe and healthy environment for our children. We can begin by working to strengthen the bonds and improving communication between parents and children. Research done by the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University has consistently shown that the more often children eat dinner with their parents, the less likely children are to smoke, drink, or use illegal drugs. Naturally, parents should be the most prominent and active figures in their children's lives. By spending more family time together, parents can better engage with their children and encourage them to make the right choices.

The nurturing and development of our families require investment, focus, and commitment. Strong families make strong and drug-free communities. By taking time to develop positive and open relationships with their children, parents help fight the war on drugs and encourage positive choices. Across our land, citizens, schools, and civic institutions can assist families by helping to meet the needs of all those who live in our communities. As we work together to strengthen our families, we will build a Nation of hope and opportunity for all.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, GEORGE W. BUSH, President of the United States of America, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States, do hereby proclaim September 23, 2002, as Family Day. I call upon the people of the United States to observe this day by spending quality time with family members and engaging in other nurturing activities to strengthen the relationships between parents and children and help fight against substance abuse.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this Twentieth day of September, in the year of our Lord two thousand two, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and twenty-seventh.

Family Day, 2001

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

Strong families make a strong America. Responsible, caring, and involved parenting dramatically affects the direction of a child's life and fundamentally influences the well-being of society as a whole. To help ensure a bright future for our children and for our Nation, we must expand our efforts to strengthen and empower families in their important task of effectively preparing children for the challenges of tomorrow.

To help families, we must fight crime and violence in our schools and communities, and we must make a quality education available to all young people, regardless of background. We must also work to ensure that adults have the skills and resources they need to provide for the health, safety, and well-being of their children.

Our Nation should send a consistent message that hails the vital importance of families. We live in an era of busy schedules and significant commitments to work, school, and community. However, quality time among family members remains as vital as ever to maintaining strong and loving bonds between parents and children and to protecting young people from harm. In its most recent survey, the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University (CASA) found that a teenager who sits down to dinner with his or her family seven nights a week is 20 percent less likely to smoke, drink, or use illegal drugs than those that do not. By contrast, teenagers who never eat dinner with their families are 61 percent more likely to engage in these activities.

According to CASA's research, other family-bonding activities can similarly promote the avoidance of drug, alcohol, or cigarette use by teens. These include helping teenagers with homework, attending religious services with them, making religion an important part of their lives, and praising and disciplining teens as appropriate. CASA also advises that parents should monitor their teen's television viewing, music purchases, and Internet use, and should establish curfews and know where their children are after school and on weekends. Perhaps most importantly, parents should send a clear message, by example and word, of their clear disapproval of cigarette, alcohol, and drug use.

CASA's findings demonstrate how parental influence remains the single most important weapon in the war on drugs. Americans must continue to recognize the importance of strong families and involved parents in setting our Nation on the road to a drug-free society. The health, safety, and well-being of our young people merit nothing less.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, GEORGE W. BUSH, President of the United States of America, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States, do hereby proclaim September 24, 2001, as Family Day. I call upon the people of the United States to observe this day by spending quality time with family members and engaging in other wholesome activities that help unite and strengthen the bonds between parents and children.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this twenty-fourth day of September, in the year of our Lord two thousand one, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and twenty-sixth.

FACSIMILE

THE NATIONAL CENTER ON ADDICTION AND SUBSTANCE ABUSE
At Columbia University
633 Third Avenue – 19th Floor
New York, NY 10017-6706
(212) 841-5200

FAX: (212) 956-8020

Date: June 18, 2003

To: Karl C. Rove

Fax: 202/456-0191

From: Joseph A. Califano, Jr.

Direct Phone: 212-841-5210 Direct Fax: 212-957-8987

#of Pages (including this cover): ___5___

CASA Account code: _150_

The information contained in this telecopy message is intended only for the use of the individual or entity named above and may contain information that is privileged, confidential and exempt from disclosure under any applicable law. If the reader of this message is not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any dissemination, distribution or copying of this communication is strictly prohibited. If you have received this message in error, please immediately notify us by telephone and return the original message to us at the above address via the US Postal Service. Thank You.

536041

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

Date: 7/15/03

To: Matt Schlapp

From: Strategic Initiatives Karl

X FYI

____ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: _____

REV_00265953

FYI - NR

NRN
but alert Matt
so he can mention in next discussion
w/ Teamster
staff

- Mary Ann Hanusa just received this from the Mail room
- Wanted you to see this

JAMES P. HOFFA
GENERAL PRESIDENT

January 31, 2002

The President
The White House
Washington, D.C. 20500

Dear Mr. President:

I would like to thank you for the invitation to attend the State of the Union address as your guest. It was truly an honor to represent the members of the Teamsters Union by sitting with the First Lady and so many other distinguished guests.

Since I have been elected President of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, I have fought to unify this great Union. At your State of the Union address, I was inspired by how you have unified this great nation.. Republicans, Democrats, and Independents took to their feet, time and time again, in solidarity with you. Thank you, for allowing me to be present at such a great showing of American spirit.

We face many challenges in the upcoming months and years. We must do more to better the lives of working families; union and non-union, Republican, and Democrat. I look forward to facing these challenges with you.

Thank you.

Fraternally,

James P. Hoffa

25 LOUISIANA AVENUE, N.W.
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20001

536041

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

Date: 7/15/03

To: Ruben Barrales

From: Strategic Initiatives B.J. Koerge

X FYI

X Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

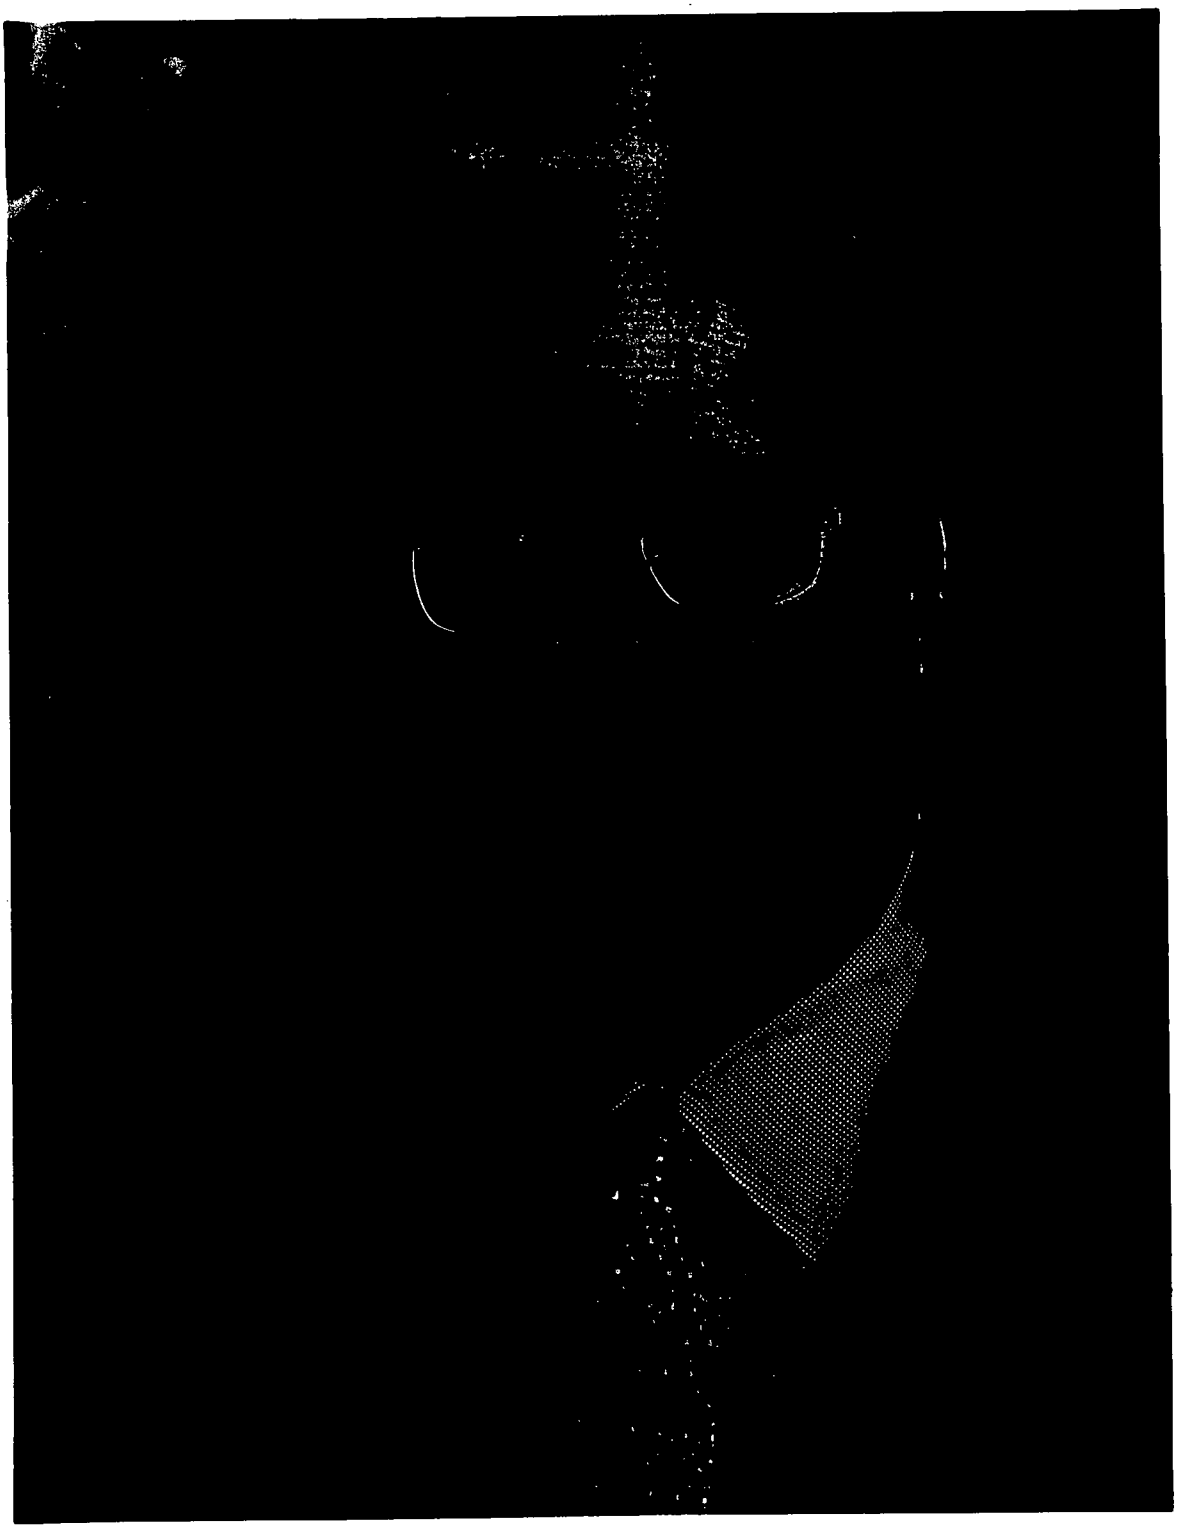
____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return



____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: This came to Karl as an fyi so we are sending directly to you.

REV_00265955

5J6041

BEST WISHES,

Kane Rose

Dustin-Have we already sent him something?

EXEC. OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT
WHITE HOUSE LIAISON

2003 JUL -9 PM 4:59

Steve McDowell

PRA 6

The White House
Attn: White House Senior Advisor Karl Rove
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue NW
Washington, D.C. 20500

Dear Mr. Rove:

My name is Steve McDowell and I am a Retired Vietnam Veteran whose only hobby now is my extensive Autograph Collection. In writing this letter, I am in hopes that you will be able to send me an Autographed Official Photograph signed in your hand? Please no Auto Pen or Machine Signed Pictures please.

This new hobby due to some disabilities currently going on is my only Favorite Thing these days, and I sure would appreciate adding your Photo to my Private Collection. I am also a New Freedom Helper, a GOP Team Leader, and worked for the Republican Campaign here in Alabama before and during those last exciting days when President Bush actually was voted into Office! Also, may I say that you are doing a wonderful job in your capacity for The President, he could not ask for more!

Sincerely,

Steve McDowell

ask KR maybe

- Please deadline

- last minute — TBC conflict

From: Miss Amanda Downes
Social Secretary,
British Embassy,
3100 Massachusetts Avenue, NW
Washington DC 20008-3600.

Telephone: 202 588 7951

Facsimile: 202 588 7894

Date: 30th May

To: The Hon Karl Rove

Number of pages including cover page: 3

REV_00265958

The British Chargé d'Affaires, Mr Tony Brenton
requests the pleasure of the company of Mr and Mrs Karl Rove
at a Tribute to the Life of The Rt. Hon. the Lord Jenkins of Hillhead on Tuesday, 15th July
Tribute at 6 o'clock followed by a reception

The Ambassador's Residence
3100 Massachusetts Avenue, NW
Washington DC 20008

R.S.V.P. to the Social Secretary
by fax: 202 588 7894
Business Attire

Limited parking will be available in the Embassy Compound
Please present this invitation on arrival and bring ID

Lord Jenkins of Hillhead

Biography

Roy Jenkins was born in 1920, and was educated at Abersychan Grammar School and Balliol College, Oxford, where he read Philosophy, Politics and Economics. He was Chancellor of the University of Oxford from 1987 until his death.

Lord Jenkins was Labour MP for Central Southwark (1948–50) and for Stechford, Birmingham (1950–77), and SDP MP for Glasgow Hillhead (1982–87). A former Chancellor of the Exchequer (1967–70), Home Secretary (1965–67 and 1974–76), and President of the Commission of the European Communities (1977–81), he was one of the four founders of the Social Democratic Party and its first leader, and was, until January 1998, Leader of the Liberal Democrats in the House of Lords.

Lord Jenkins was an Honorary Fellow of Balliol and St Antony's Colleges in Oxford and of Berkeley College, Yale. He held honorary doctorates from universities including Harvard, Pennsylvania, Louvain, Urbino, Michigan, Wales, Reading, Warwick, Trinity College Dublin, Bristol, Georgetown, Kent, West Virginia, Bologna, Sofia, and London. He was a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. In 1972 he was awarded both the Charlemagne and the Robert Schuman Prizes for promoting European unity. He also held the Luxembourg Order of Merit and the Prix Bentinck. He received the Freedom of the City of Brussels in 1980 and was awarded the Grand Cross of the Order of Charles III of Spain in the same year, the Order of Merit of Italy in 1990 and a Commander of the order of Légion d'honneur of France in 1999. He was made a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1992, and awarded an Order of Merit in 1993.

Among his publications are Mr Balfour's Poodle (1954), The Labour Case (1959), Asquith (1964), Afternoon on the Potomac? (1972), Nine Men of Power (1974), Truman (1986), Baldwin (1987), his autobiography, A Life at the Centre (1991), Gladstone (1995), which won the 1995 Whitbread Biography Award, The Chancellors (1998), Churchill (2001) and Twelve Cities (2002). He was a frequent contributor to British newspapers and periodicals on a wide range of subjects. In 2001 the Chancellor was recognised with a lifetime award by the Wolfson History Prize panel.

536041

FAX TRANSMITTAL

July 11.2003

To: Karl Rove

Fax: 202 456-0191

From: John L. Sullivan

PRA 6

F. Declined events

SULLIVAN LAND & CATTLE COMPANY PO BOX 3088 GALVESTON, TEXAS 77552

Mr. Karl Rove
The White House
Washington, D.C. 20500

July 11, 2003

Dear Karl

My son, Rocky (John Richmond), Sullivan will be interning for Congressman Pete Sessions from July 13th, 2003 to July 25th, 2003. He will be at the White House on July 17th at 7:30 AM for a tour and on July 22nd to intern from 8:45 AM. He would very much like to meet with you on one of these dates or any other time when you could spare a few minutes to see him.

Rocky is an ambitious 18 year old who plans to be President someday. It would certainly be a thrill for him to meet you!

My personal best wishes to you and your family. Additionally, I think The President is doing a job that's great and needs to continue through two thousand eight!

Yours truly,

John L. Sullivan
W. 409.740.4200

PRA 6

BJ. called to decline on 7/14/03

cell phone

PRA 6

Rocky Sullivan

(saved in &PUBLIC, ADMIN, interns, interns 2003, schedules – Section III)

July 13-25, 2003

Intern Coordinator – Bethany Smith
PRA 6
Office of Congressman Pete Sessions – 202.225.2231
Office Location – Longworth House Office Building 1318

July 13, 2003 - Sunday
3:00 pm – 7:00pm - Arrive and get settled in their rooms/housing accommodations.
7:00 pm - Dinner with interns at George Washington University (Jacqueline Bouvier Kennedy Onassis Hall – Directly across from Foggy Bottom Metro Station)

July 14, 2003 – Monday – Business Casual
9:00 am – Meet in front of Capitol South Metro Station, go to Longworth Office Building
9:30am – 12:00 pm - Orientation (HC - 8)
10:00 am – Judy Schneider "How Congress Works"
12:00 pm – 1:00 pm – Speaker: David Boaz, Executive Vice President (Topic: The War on Drugs: A Constitutional and Moral Critique) – Located in B-339 Rayburn lunch will be provided
1:00 pm – Meet at Capitol South metro Station to compute to Archives
1:15 pm – 2:45pm - National Archives
3:00 pm – 4:00 pm – Visit Smithsonian Museums on the Mall
4:30 pm – 5:30pm – Kennedy Center Tour (Liz PRA 6
6:00 pm – Millennium Stage at the Kennedy Center (optional)
6:30 pm – Softball Game: Team Sessions vs. Young, but Legal

July 15, 2003 – Tuesday – PROFESSIONAL ATTIRE
8:45 am – Library of Congress (101 Independence Avenue; across from the Capitol building)
9:00 am – Library of Congress tour
11:00 am – Jonathan Poe with the NRCC
2:00 pm – Supreme Court (begins at 2:30pm must be there at 2:00pm to ensure the reservations; located next to the Library of Congress)
5:30pm – 6:30pm – Pictures with Congressman Pete Sessions (Cannon Balcony)
7:00pm – Dinner with Congressman Pete Sessions (HC – 8)

July 16, 2003 – Wednesday – Business Casual
8:50 am – Meet at Foggy Bottom Metro Station
9:30 am – Anne Frank Exhibit (at the Holocaust Museum)
11:30 am – The U.S. Holocaust Museum (confirmation 65381)
3:30 pm – 5:00 pm - Crossfire, CNN (Jack Morton Auditorium, Media and Public Affairs Building, The George Washington University on the corner of 21st and H streets)
7:00 pm - The United States Army Military District of Washington presents - The Twilight Tattoo at the Ellipse near the White House (optional)
6:30 pm – Softball Game: Team Sessions vs. Coalition of the Willing

July 17, 2003 – Thursday – Business Casual
7:20 am – White House Tour (meet at the SE Visitor's Entrance to the White House no later than 7:30am Bring Congressional Intern ID Badge and Drivers License) (Paul, Lauren, Julianne, Katherine, Michael, Prasid, Rocky, Joseph, Casey, Marcus, Frederick)
11:00 am – Meet in front of Longworth House Office Building: Depart by Bus to Navy Yard
11:00 am – 4:00 pm Jag Day Contact: Erin PRA 6
6:30 pm – Softball Game: Team Sessions vs. Dept of Homeplate Security

July 18, 2003 – Friday
8:45 am – Meet in front of Jacqueline Bouvier Kennedy Onassis Hall at George Washington University

REV_00265963

(Take the Metro Blue and Orange line and transfer to the Red Line to the Tenleytown/AU station, Exit on the west side of Wisconsin Avenue, Take any "30" series bus (#30, #32, #34 or #36) going south on Wisconsin Avenue, Ride approximately one and one-half miles south on Wisconsin Avenue to the Cathedral. (This is a downhill walk, if you prefer to walk.)

10:00 am – 11:00 am – National Cathedral

1:00 pm – 3:30 pm Coast Guard Tour (meet outside Longworth House Office Building)

Press Release Due

July 19-20, 2003 – Saturday and Sunday

Weekend: Trip ideas; Monticello, New York, Philadelphia, Atlantic City, Charlottesville, US Army Ordinance Museum at Aberdeen Proving Grounds, Antietam Civil War Battlefield in Sharpsburg, Gettysburg Civil War Battlefield, Annapolis/Naval Academy, Chesapeake Bay, DC Sessions

July 21, 2003 – Monday

10:00am – 12:00pm – Spy Museum (Contact Chase Lum (PRA 6); 800 F Street NW & 9th)

6:30 pm – Softball Game: Team Sessions vs. Bread for the City

7:05 pm – Baltimore Oriole vs Texas Rangers Oriole Park at Camden Yards (take the train from Union Station to Baltimore)

July 22, 2003 – Tuesday – PROFESSIONAL ATTIRE

8:45 am – Intern at the White House (BRING CONGRESSIONAL ID'S!)

Meet Bethany at the 1800 G Street in front of the building

July 23, 2003 – Wednesday

7:30 am – Leave for Mount Vernon (Take Metro's Yellow Line Train to Huntington Station in Virginia. Exit to the lower level (Huntington Avenue) of the station to catch a Fairfax Connector bus to Mount Vernon. Board the Fairfax Connector Bus, 101, at Huntington Station for a 20 minute trip to Mount Vernon's entrance gate; fare is $.50. Monday through Friday: 7:09; 8:11; 9:11; 10:19; 11:19; 12:19; 1:19; 2:19; 3:19; 3:44; 4:14).

8:45 am – Mount Vernon

7:00 pm - The United States Army Military District of Washington presents The Twilight Tattoo at the Ellipse near the White House

8:00pm – Intern Survivor (JBKO Basement with Congressman Sessions)

July 24, 2003 – Thursday – PROFESSIONAL ATTIRE

8:45 am – Meet in front of Longworth House Office Building

9:00 am – 10:00 am - Coffee with Senator Kay Bailey Hutchinson (284 Russell Senate Office Building)

4:00 pm – Bureau of Engraving and Printing Tour

6:30 pm – Softball Game: Team Sessions vs. Young, but Legal

July 25, 2003 – Friday

Wrap-up and final evaluations

10:00 am – 12:00pm – Guy Harrison and Marty McGuinness

2:00 pm – Singapore Embassy

REV_00265964

536041

Ralston, Susan B.

From: Steve Papermaster [PRA 6]
Sent: Friday, June 13, 2003 1:16 AM
To: 'Karl Rove'
Cc: Ralston, Susan B.
Subject: White House Innovation Summit, PCAST

Karl,

You guys are really working me hard for all this great pay! I've been in Washington all week and will be through next Tuesday. We held our PCAST meetings - very productive. We need to schedule one with the President this fall if possible. I'm co-chairing the Nanotechnology Committee with Chuck Vest from MIT -very promising - big (in a nano way) opportunities. Also, I was at the White House dinner last night following the Holocaust Museum Anne Frank Exhibit opening with Laura. Beautiful.

I'm working via PCAST, etc. on the prospective White House Innovation Summit - have talked through with Lezlee, Richard Russell, Steve Friedman, Jay Lefkowitz and others. I think there is very good reason to go through with this and also to build out the Innovation theme for the campaign and for economic development plans. This could also wrap in the IT Advisory Council and others in science, industry and technology. I'd like to discuss this soon with you and the President present some ideas and get your thoughts. If this is possible in the next few days (through next Tuesday) let me know. Otherwise I'm back here June 24 - 26th and then July 2, 3.

I'm also working with Ken, Jack and Marc on the web campaign plans along the lines that we discussed - FYI.

Hope you're well. Please let me know or have Susan R. contact me.

PRA 6

REV_00265965

Ralston, Susan B. 536041

From: Stanzel, Scott
Sent: Thursday, June 12, 2003 11:46 AM
To: Schlapp, Matthew A.; Ralston, Susan B.
Cc: Mamo, Jeanie S.
Subject: Akron Beacon Journal - Alex Arshinkoff (Summit Co. Ohio GOP Chair)

The Akron Beacon Journal called to see if Karl would like to comment on Mr. Arshinkoff, his visits to the White House and his friendship with Karl. I don't think he should be involved with the stories, but I wanted to make sure you were aware of them.

Akron Beacon Journal
Stories fly about the life of Summit GOP chief Alex Arshinkoff http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/news/6069768.htm

Scene magazine (free Cleveland weekly - original story)
The Godfather in the Closet
http://www.clevescene.com/issues/current/feature.html/1/index.html

Susan -
Re Scott Stanzel's instructs are correct.
Land

REV_00265966

Ohio•com

Posted on Thu, Jun. 12, 2003

Stories fly about life of Summit GOP chief

Alternative magazine publishes allegations about Alex Arshinkoff, hitchhiker, nightclubs

By Bob Dyer
Beacon Journal staff writer

His enemies have whispered it for years. But not until now has it been paraded into the spotlight.

The new issue of Scene magazine features a cover story titled, ``The Godfather in the Closet.'' In it, the Cleveland publication accuses Summit County Republican Chairman Alex Arshinkoff of going to gay bars and offering political favors to keep that knowledge quiet.

The magazine also details a police report accusing Arshinkoff of touching a male hitchhiker he picked up at 2 a.m. on a cold December night in the Highland Square section of Akron.

When contacted for comment Wednesday, Arshinkoff said he hadn't read the article. Later, his niece, lawyer Betty Konen, called and said:

``Everybody knows that Alex's political adversaries have been promoting this for months. And finally, after all this time, an alternative publication has sensationalized the police report that was previously circulated to daily newspapers and rejected as a story....

``This story is preposterous, = [100.0]and everyone who knows Alex and Karen Arshinkoff knows it is not true.''

Given his bitter, ongoing wars with local Democrats, much of the invective in the story is not surprising. But a couple of Republicans rip him, too. Former Fairlawn Mayor Pete Kostoff claims Arshinkoff double-crossed him, and Common Pleas Judge Mary Spicer talks about falling from Arshinkoff's favor in a dispute over Oriana House.

After Kostoff failed to toe the line, several relatives were fired from government jobs.

Democrat interviewed

That, apparently, is one of the reasons Democrat Michael Curry, who works for the Summit County Board of Elections, was not afraid to ``out'' Arshinkoff in the Scene story.

Curry describes encountering the GOP leader on different nights in two gay bars, the Leather Stallion and The Grid, both on St. Clair Avenue on the near east side of Cleveland. The former bills itself online as ``the Midwest's Oldest Gay Leather/Levi Club.''

According to Curry, Arshinkoff offered to allow two Democratic judges to run unopposed if Curry would keep his mouth shut.

Curry, reached Wednesday evening, said everything in the article pertaining to him was accurate. He was willing to go on the record because of ``the (type of) people he's running for office (while) living the double life."

REV_00265967

Other allegations

Among the other charges in the 5,000-word story, Arshinkoff:

• Sponsored campaign ads wrongly claiming Democrat Probate Judge Jane Bond was under investigation by the state Supreme Court because her husband profited from a program she supervised.

• Arranged a lucrative contract between the Republican attorney general's office and a lawyer who had made major contributions to the county's GOP.

• While chairman of the University of Akron's board of trustees, switched some of the university's law work from Buckingham, Doolittle and Burroughs to Amer Cunningham when his niece, Konen, left the former for the latter.

Scene is a free weekly publication with a circulation of about 100,000. It is widely distributed in Summit County, at stores, bars, restaurants and newsstands.

In the story, written by staff writer Sarah Fenske, an incident two days after Christmas is explored in great detail.

According to Scene, the young man was hitching a ride. Arshinkoff picked him up, asked him about his sexuality and refused to take him home.

According to a police report, at that point the driver tried to touch the hitchhiker. The hitchhiker jumped out at a red light.

Police were watching as the car sped away and stopped it to see whether the driver was intoxicated. He wasn't. He told police he had picked up a hitchhiker but kicked him out because he was too drunk. Meanwhile, the hitchhiker circled back and approached the police after Arshinkoff pulled away and told them he jumped out after the driver tried to touch him.

No complaint filed

Police did not pursue the matter because the hitchhiker, a 21-year-old Kent State University student, did not file a complaint.

No formal police report was written, but ``field interrogation cards'' were filled out by officers at the scene.

The Akron Beacon Journal heard about the documents in January. City officials initially said the reports weren't public records.

When the Beacon Journal threatened to sue to obtain them, the city released copies. After viewing the reports, the newspaper made a decision not to pursue a story because no formal charge was made.

Akron City Prosecutor Doug Powley said Wednesday that he was only made aware of the cards through the downtown rumor mill. He said such cards are maintained by the department primarily for possible future drug or prostitution investigations.

Based on the information taken by the officers, there was not enough evidence to bring charges.

REV_00265968

``You cannot prosecute for sexual imposition under the statute unless the purported victim is offended by the contact," said Powley. ``If the victim is not complaining, it would appear they are not offended. I cannot be offended for the victim."

The hitchhiker could not be reached for comment Wednesday.

Some of Arshinkoff's enemies were downright gleeful Wednesday, anticipating that the disclosure would lead to his political demise.

Said Tom Adgate, a Republican who incurred Arshinkoff's wrath by running against his hand-picked prosecutor, Michael Callahan: ``I guess family values has a whole new meaning."

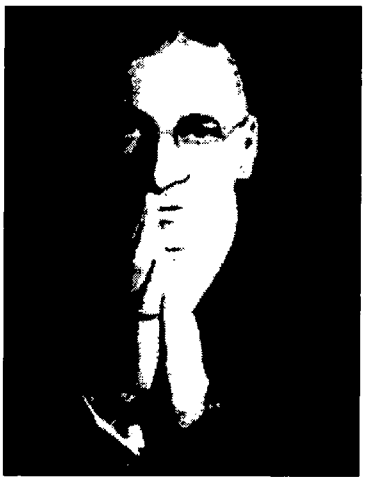
Beacon Journal staff writer Phil Trexler contributed to this story. Bob Dyer can be reached at 330-996-3580 or bdyer@thebeaconjournal.com.

© 2003 Beacon Journal and wire service sources. All Rights Reserved.
http://www.ohio.com

REV_00265969

Print this page

Close Window



From clevescene.com
Originally published by Cleveland Scene Jun 11, 2003
©2003 New Times, Inc. All rights reserved.

The Godfather In the Closet

The Republican boss of Summit County revels in crushing his enemies. Now his private life might crush him.

BY SARAH FENSKE

It was past 2 a.m. when the kid left the bar and headed for home. Back from college for Christmas, he'd met up with his high school buddies at Annabell's, a neighborhood watering hole in Akron. Frustrated for reasons that no longer seem important, the 21-year-old Kent State student had been too annoyed to wait for a ride.

It wasn't long before he wished he had. It had been a white Christmas. The ground was still blanketed, early that morning of December 27, 2002; the air, frigid. Maybe a stranger would give him a lift.

As the kid would later explain in an interview with Scene, he tried to flag down the first car he spotted, a souped-up Mitsubishi, neon underbelly aglow. It didn't stop. But when the new Audi behind it did, the kid got in.

The driver was a middle-aged white man. Dark hair, well dressed. He asked the kid how he was doing; the kid said OK, then offered a few dollars for gas. The man said not to worry.

Arshinkoff, 50, has run the county Republican Party for half his life.

The kid told him to take a right at Main Street. But the man didn't. I'll get you home, don't worry about it, the kid remembers him saying. Then the man started rubbing his thigh. Are you gay? he asked. Are you bi? No? Are you sure?

The kid was trying not to freak out. He saw a red light ahead and clicked open his seatbelt, bracing himself for the jump out. But the light flicked to green.

What are you doing? The man asked. Are you nervous?

The kid said no, he was just trying to get comfortable. The man was caressing his thigh, grabbing at his crotch. "I didn't want to piss him off," he says. "He could just hit the gas, and I'd be stuck."

Do you want to make some money? The man asked. The kid laughed weakly and said he had plenty. He was watching the light ahead, willing it to stay red.

REV_00265970

under investigation by the Ohio Supreme Court because her husband did work for Oriana House, while she supposedly supervised it.

Never mind that she hadn't actively supervised the program. Or that her husband earned a total of $2,000. Or that the Supreme Court had received a complaint from one of Arshinkoff's buddies, but wasn't necessarily investigating.

Presumably, a man who plays this brand of hardball should know the ball will eventually be fired back.

Michael Curry believes so. In the summer of 2001, Curry, who works for the Summit County Board of Elections, spotted Arshinkoff at the Leather Stallion, a gay bar on St. Clair. The Democrat made a point of greeting Arshinkoff "just to freak him out," he says.

Thirty minutes later, Arshinkoff came over and asked him to stay quiet about seeing him there, Curry says. Curry replied that it wasn't his style to out people. "It's just not my belief system," he says.

Arshinkoff seemed relieved. "If there's anything I can do for you, I'd be happy to do it," he said, according to Curry.

Joking, Curry seized the gambit. He named two friends, both Democratic judges. "I want to see that the two of them never have any opponents," he said.

"I can do that," Arshinkoff responded.

"I was shocked at the transference of power," Curry says. He'd been joking, after all. But when he ran into Arshinkoff several months later, at a gay dance club called The Grid, Arshinkoff waved him over. "He said he'd live up to his end of the bargain," Curry recalls.

Curry decided not to live up to his. "I've just decided he's a hypocrite about it," he says. "He's gone out and recruited candidates who are homophobic and anti-gay." Also, it's tempting to envision the fallout: "If he ever openly admitted he was gay, I think a lot of the money would dry up."

The pyre is growing. The newest memo circulating among the anti-Arshinkoff crowd is a complaint phoned in to the board of elections. In the conversation, a former Municipal Court employee claims Arshinkoff sexually harassed him.

It's public record, duly noted by a deputy clerk. Coupled with the police report, it's led to talk of an overthrow.

But Democrats aren't sure how to play it. "We're a party that supports gay rights," says county Chairman Russ Pry. "We don't believe in outing people. But we don't believe in being hypocrites, either. We don't believe in condemning someone's lifestyle -- and then secretly living it."

Adds McCarthy, "If this was an elected official who had picked up a young girl, I think people would have been all over that. And if Alex is a cruiser, if that's his M.O. . . . I'm sure there are people within his party that would be upset."

Chris Bleuenstein, who recently quit the Republican central and executive committees, says he thinks the gay issue may be the straw that finally breaks Arshinkoff's back. "Most people are aware of it," he says. "Stupid him -- he just keeps getting caught."

REV_00265979

The party, Bleuenstein believes, is probably "not enlightened enough" to deal with a gay leader. "I would envision a coup," he says, adding, "He is not going to step down."

Madden, the Akron police deputy, says the whole thing doesn't seem fair. Arshinkoff hasn't been charged with anything, and homosexual acts -- Rick Santorum's views aside -- are perfectly legal in Ohio. "There's crime, and then there's embarrassment," Madden says.

But this is politics. And Alex Arshinkoff would be the first to explain: In politics, embarrassment is often enough.

REV_00265980

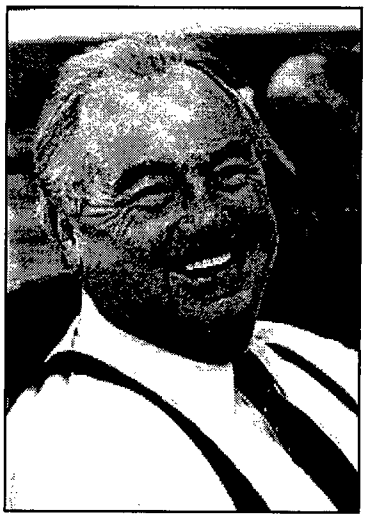
The Audi pulled to a stop, and the kid saw his chance. He took off running. The Audi peeled off in a different direction.

Then the kid heard a siren. An Akron patrolman had witnessed his desperate departure, according to the police report. The cop stopped the car and questioned the driver. The man told him he'd picked the kid up, but he was too drunk and had hopped out.

But the kid, fearing trouble, doubled back to the cop car. Gasping for breath, he relayed his version. The man had tried to touch him, he said. He had to run. "You can arrest me for anything you want right now," he remembers saying.

The cop took the driver's information and let him go. Then he told the kid to relax, something like "What are you doing getting into a stranger's car, anyway?" He offered to take the kid home.

Then a second black-and-white pulled up. The officer gestured at the departing Audi with its ARA 1 vanity plate. "Do you know who that was?" the kid heard him ask. "That was Alex Arshinkoff. He's the chair of the county Republican Party."



"My stomach just dropped," the kid says.

Photo courtesy of Judge Mary Spicer

Republican Judge Mary Spicer held onto her seat — despite opposition from the party boss's niece.

Walter Novak

County Executive James McCarthy says people would be "all over" the report if it involved a young female hitchhiker.

For years, Alex Arshinkoff topped the scale at more than 400 pounds. He was a man of giant appetites: for politics, for conversation, and of course, for food. A former dining companion says Arshinkoff would order one entrée, finish it, then order another. Sometimes he'd go for a third.

Thanks to the Atkins diet, a personal trainer, and daily nine-mile walks, Arshinkoff has shed half of his girth. But he's still larger than life. Head of the Summit County GOP for 25 years, he seems to burnish a reputation as the county's Dark Lord, a man who consumes politics and plays to win. To many insiders, he is Don Corleone in the flesh, with a dose of Machiavelli's Prince thrown in for good measure.

(Through his assistant, Arshinkoff declined Scene's interview request.)

Since two failed runs for city council more than two decades ago, Arshinkoff has never been the guy on the ballot. He's not a politician, as he'll tell anyone willing to listen.

He's far more powerful, and he knows it. He picks the candidates. He runs their campaigns. He tells them what to do. Who to hire. Who to fire. If they don't play ball, they're out. Just like that. He's done it to top Summit Republicans. He did it as a University of Akron trustee.

He was on George W. Bush's campaign finance committee. Karl Rove is said to call him for advice. When the first President Bush visited Akron in 1990, he started his speech by thanking Alex

REV_00265971

Arshinkoff.

"He's a master of the nuts and bolts of politics," says state Senator Kevin Coughlin (R-Cuyahoga Falls). "He is just one of these old-school political leaders."

Arshinkoff lives for the job, calling up candidates at all hours of the night with advice and exhortations. When he's not being compared to Machiavelli, he gets Boss Tweed.

"Even those who don't like him have to admit he's as shrewd as they come," says Republican County Councilman Mike Callahan.

He's made himself wealthy. He's on Senator Mike DeWine's payroll as a consultant; he also began a lobbying business in 1997, harvesting the ties he developed as party chairman. He represents nine companies, from FirstEnergy to Playhouse Square, offering his advice and pushing their interests in Columbus. He has a $200,000 home in Hudson, an antique Chevy Bel Air, and two Corvettes -- in addition to the Audi paid for by the party.

His family has done well too. One brother is a bailiff; so is a sister-in-law. One niece is Barberton's clerk of courts; another is the party's attorney; a third works for the county engineer. Until Republicans lost the judge's seat this January, his nephew-in-law worked for the Juvenile Court.

In other counties, party chairs aren't so powerful, and there's little reason Summit County should be an exception. Akron has long been heavily Democratic. Despite suburban growth, the county retains a three-to-two Democratic edge.

But you'd never know it, looking at a list of Summit County officeholders. Under Arshinkoff, Republicans have put practically every seat in play. They hold a majority of judgeships, the Probate Court, the sheriff's office, both Ohio House districts, and the state senate seat.

"He has created the most effective county organization in the state," says Arshinkoff's Cuyahoga County counterpart, state Representative Jim Trakas. "Republicans in Summit County do better than they should. And state and national candidates do much better there than they should too."

A relentless fund-raiser, Arshinkoff gets $100,000 checks from lawyers and $1 million donations from CEOs. He also collects from the little guys: A list of campaign contributions shows bailiffs, magistrates, low-level county flunkies and their spouses -- all chipping in their $100 or $1,000 when asked.

He's a great motivator. "He has always kept the heat on, kept the pressure on," says state Representative Bryan Williams (R-Akron). "He keeps people prepared and primed and ready to go."

In 2000, the county party raised more than $2.19 million and spent $200,000 on TV ads, $300,000 on the sheriff's campaign, and $700,000 in a failed bid for the county executive's office.

The money doesn't just stay in Akron. In the last decade, the party gave $64,000 to Bob Taft, $46,500 to Secretary of State Kenneth Blackwell, and a whopping $339,000 to Ohio Auditor Betty Montgomery.

To Arshinkoff, though, the local game is paramount. He's not so much interested in policy, though friends insist he's a true right-wing believer. For him it's the power, and power is in the money: the salaries, retirement benefits, and perks intrinsic in several hundred county jobs.

"It all has to do with raising money, contracts, pay-to-play," says County Executive James

REV_00265972

McCarthy, a Democrat. "If you don't give money to his party, you're not going to get jobs from the county -- or state contracts."

Democrats point to lawyer Deidre Hanlon. From 1996 to 2001, she earned $1.69 million from Attorney General Betty Montgomery's office. Most of the money came from an exclusive contract, allowing Hanlon to sell assets of deceased Summit County residents to pay off their Medicaid bills. As The Plain Dealer first reported, she was one of only two lawyers in the state to get such a contract.

Her luck may have followed the money trail: From 1996 to 2001, Hanlon donated $121,000 to the county GOP. Meanwhile, under Arshinkoff, the Summit GOP gave Montgomery $244,400 during the same period.

Democrats say it's a system where those who play ball are rewarded; the recalcitrant are punished.

Consider Saundra Robinson. She beat a Democrat for a Juvenile Court judgeship in 1990 -- a surprising upset and a major victory for a party that counts its success by the jobs it controls.

Arshinkoff was in heaven. But Robinson was no pushover. "He made suggestions," she says. "Some of them were good." She had no problem hiring loyal Republicans who were qualified, she says, but refused to hire those who weren't.

That was her fatal mistake. When it came time for her reelection four years later, Arshinkoff ran another Republican in the primary -- with the party's full support. Robinson lost. "If I wanted to stay there, there were rules to play by. I didn't," she says. "I know I could have gone the other way and still be sitting there today."

Kim Hoover, then a Cuyahoga Falls councilman, found himself in a similar position in 1994. The county prosecutor's seat opened up when its longtime holder was appointed a judge; Hoover was widely considered the Republican Party's top choice.

But first Arshinkoff wanted to talk. The day before the appointment was to be announced, Arshinkoff informed him of the people to be fired his first day, Hoover says. One was Fred Zuch, chief of the criminal division, a widely respected bulldog who paid no mind to the orders of party bosses.

Arshinkoff's reasons seemed nebulous at best, Hoover says. He refused.

It didn't take long for Arshinkoff to find another candidate: Maureen O'Connor, then a common pleas judge. She took the job.

O'Connor didn't have to fire Zuch; Hoover's plight was leaked to the newspapers, and even Arshinkoff wasn't bold enough to order Zuch's termination after that. But the opportunity Hoover missed is clear. Five years later, O'Connor was elected lieutenant governor. She now sits on the Ohio Supreme Court.

Today Hoover is a Cuyahoga Falls Municipal Court judge. He hears traffic violations, DUIs, and minor drug busts.

He has no regrets. "I know who and what I am," he says. "Alex can say to me, 'If you'd listened to me, you could be lieutenant governor, you could be a Supreme Court justice.' Well, I have no interest in those types of things. And he can't beat me here in my own town -- and that's a source of great frustration to him."

REV_00265973

Last election, Hoover faced a challenger in the Republican primary. He beat her handily. Soon after, Arshinkoff appointed her to an open Municipal Court seat. She'd done her job by challenging the rogue Republican; she'd earned it.

Get people talking about Arshinkoff, and soon enough they'll mention the incident involving the Kent State student. "You've heard about that report, right?" they'll ask. Feign ignorance, and they'll offer you a copy.

In the six months since that night, the police report has been circulated among politicos, pushed at newspaper reporters, and whispered about wherever Democrats gather. The kid got a call from someone who works for Summit County and someone at The Plain Dealer. The first wanted to know if he thought Arshinkoff was dangerous; he didn't call the second back.

The kid isn't exactly basking in the attention. He doesn't want his name used; he has no intention of filing suit. "It's water under the bridge to me," he says. But he can't help but wonder: "What is a public official going and picking up people like that?"

Nothing official became of the report. The kid says the police never talked to him again. He didn't press the matter, either. Akron Deputy Police Chief Mike Madden says the cops generally don't investigate "field reports," which are generated by traffic stops rather than official complaints.

"You've got a he said/she said situation, or in this case, he said/he said," Madden says. "There's no way for me to make a case off of that." Sure, if the kid is telling the truth, the incident could be a case of sexual imposition, Madden says. But who's to say? There are no witnesses, no physical evidence.

"I don't know that anyone even took cognizance of this report when it came in," Madden says. "If it weren't that particular name on it, no one would even care."

But it is that name. And people do care. For a Republican who touts "family values," there's a question of hypocrisy. There's also the antagonism factor: Arshinkoff has made so many enemies, they're practically a political party of their own. Even people who say positive things about him are glad to snark when they know it won't get back to him.

Of course, every powerful man has enemies, but the hatred Arshinkoff engenders goes beyond that. Now, perhaps emboldened by the report, many people who've felt his lash are breaking their silence for the first time.

Pete Kostoff, the mayor of suburban Fairlawn for 11 years, was a loyal party man who shared Arshinkoff's Macedonian heritage. Their fathers were friends, and they'd attended the same Eastern Orthodox church for years. Kostoff was considered one of Arshinkoff's top lieutenants.

That meant little when Kostoff endorsed a Democrat in the Cuyahoga Falls mayoral race. It wasn't just any Democrat -- it was his law partner and close friend, Wayne Jones. Kostoff thought it would be OK, because Jones was taking on Don Robart, a Republican known to be on the outs with Arshinkoff.

Indeed, Kostoff thought he had Arshinkoff's blessing. "He told me I'd have to sit out for a period of time, but then I'd be brought back to the party," Kostoff says. Like a good soldier, he agreed to step down from the party's central and executive committees, presuming it was temporary. Arshinkoff told him that he would also be supporting Jones, however quietly.

REV_00265974

But as the campaign heated up, it became apparent that Arshinkoff was doing no such thing. Robart's campaign literature was vintage Arshinkoff. It showed an aerial view of Jones's five-acre spread, calling him out for supporting low-income housing because he didn't have to live by it.

After Jones lost and it came time for Kostoff's promised rehabilitation, he and Arshinkoff met for lunch. "You'll have to buy a little time," Kostoff remembers his friend saying.

After six months, Kostoff could read the writing on the wall. "There are a lot of people pissed off at you," Arshinkoff told him.

"I was hoping you'd help explain this to them," Kostoff protested.

No such luck. "It became convenient for me to be expendable," Kostoff says.

Within the next three years, Kostoff's uncle was fired from the Board of Elections -- just one year before he could retire with a decent pension, Kostoff says. His brother was fired from the engineer's office. His sister-in-law, the chief magistrate at Juvenile Court, returned from a week's vacation to find a letter tacked to her front door. She, too, had been sacked.

"At the end of the day," Kostoff says, "people can say it's just politics, but I don't think you use politics to hurt people. He and his gang seem to enjoy inflicting hurt on people."

Kostoff gives money to Republicans he thinks are independent. He considers himself part of the Republican Party. But he won't give it money, not as long as Arshinkoff is around. "Sooner or later, other people of conviction are going to stand up and tell him it's time to move on."

Common Pleas Judge Mary Spicer had always been a good Republican, though she was occasionally annoyed by Arshinkoff's directives. He'd summon the Republican judges to lunch at Tangier or the Portage Country Club, then tell them who to hire, she says. She resented it.

Spicer was the court's point woman for Oriana House, a halfway house the county used as a sentencing alternative to hard time. Though Spicer did the nitty-gritty supervision work, all eight judges signed off on decisions and appointments. They were, technically, a "judicial corrections board," she says, though they didn't officially meet or take minutes.

Such leadership may have seemed lackadaisical, but no one considered it a problem. The county was happy with Oriana, says County Executive McCarthy. So were the judges.

Or so they thought.

In February 2002, it was Spicer's task to get the other judges to sign off on appointments to Oriana's citizens' advisory board. Most were reappointments -- people involved with the issues at hand, such as vocational training and rehab programs.

But that wasn't what her fellow Republican, John Adams, noticed when Spicer gave him the papers to sign.

"These are all Democrats," he told her.

Spicer was surprised. She'd never thought of party affiliation as an issue. Still, she agreed to let Adams take the appointment papers and think it over. She couldn't formalize the appointments until another judge returned from vacation anyway.

REV_00265975

(Adams says he "may have issue" with Spicer's recollections, but would prefer not to revisit "these things.")

Then Spicer's phone rang. It was her cousin, Probate Court Judge Bill Spicer. He reminded her that the filing deadline for their reelection campaigns was a week away. He also asked her to hold off on the Oriana appointments. "These are our last bargaining chips," he said. (Bill Spicer declined comment for this story.)

Mary Spicer knew that Adams, Arshinkoff, and her cousin were tight. She also knew that another Common Pleas judge, Democrat Jane Bond, was planning to challenge her cousin for his seat. The link was clear, she says: The GOP would approve the appointments only if Bond got out of the race.

Spicer thought it ridiculous. Then she got a call from Arshinkoff.

He was irate, Spicer says, and launched into a rant about Oriana House. "He said there was all this fraud and theft and corruption," she recalls, still amazed. But he offered no evidence, no specifics. Yelling, he said he was only telling her because he had to protect "his" judges.

Spicer yelled back, finally shouting that she wasn't going to talk about it anymore. Then she hung up.

In short order, she got a visit from her cousin and his bailiff, Chris Masich. They asked her to get Bond to drop out of the Probate Court race, she says. They told her she could promise Bond that she'd never face an opponent again.

Spicer resisted. She saw the party boss's hand. "This is how Alex Arshinkoff works," Spicer says. "He sends other people with messages, so he can say, 'I never said that.'"

Shortly thereafter, Masich sent Spicer a note telling her to forget the whole thing. Judge Adams started making a stink to the papers about problems with Oriana House's leadership, using buzzwords of "fraud" and "corruption."

The only judge to second him was another Republican running for reelection; after that judge announced her concerns, her challenger, another Republican, decided not to run after all.

Insiders believe Arshinkoff wanted control of the jobs at Oriana. If the organization could be proved corrupt, the county could take it over -- meaning direct oversight by Republican judges, meaning more jobs for the GOP to fill.

"Alex likes any place that has people," McCarthy says, "because that becomes patronage, contributors, campaigners."

Jim Lawrence, Oriana's executive director, would accuse Arshinkoff of "running a political operation out of Common Pleas Court." But it was effective: State Auditor Jim Petro agreed to do an audit.

Then Adams -- despite only four years' experience as a Common Pleas judge -- was appointed to a federal judgeship. And Arshinkoff's niece, attorney Betty Konen, announced that she was running against Mary Spicer as an independent.

Arshinkoff pushed an unprecedented amendment through the GOP's executive committee: From then on, the party could give support -- and cash -- to independents, even those challenging Republicans.

REV_00265976

Spicer won her reelection, despite not getting a penny from the party or use of its in-house communications firm. She was also barred from using the party's bulk-rate postage unless Arshinkoff first approved her mailers. (She declined.)

Still, Arshinkoff had his own interpretation of Spicer's victory. He noted to a friend that Spicer had been forced to spend $70,000 of her own money on the campaign.

Spicer isn't bitter. "I'm still here," she says. "And I have a new birth of freedom. I don't get calls summoning me to lunch." She doesn't get told who to hire, either. She just gets ignored.

The Oriana House fallout continues. Montgomery, one of the largest recipients of Arshinkoff's largesse, took the auditor's position in January. A month later, she announced that the ongoing performance audit would be teamed with a more extensive "special audit."

Due to Montgomery's ties to Arshinkoff, Oriana's attorney asked her for an independent, outside review. She refused.

Four months later, she has yet to announce any major findings or problems, or complete the first audit. She's still looking.

With Arshinkoff, politics always comes first. Callahan, the county councilman, remembers Arshinkoff saying at a late-night poker game, "I've got a lot of friends in this business, but I'm in the business of getting people elected. That comes first. The job comes first." Good government can finish no better than a distant second.

In 1999, two Common Pleas judges completed a study showing that the Court needed two more judges. The recommendation was approved by the county and the Ohio Supreme Court. The bill was written.

And then it died.

The reason? State Senator Roy Ray, an Akron Republican and Arshinkoff ally, lobbied fellow legislators to kill it. His official reason: The courthouse didn't have room for two more judges.

But Judge Mary Spicer says word drifted back from Columbus that Arshinkoff had stopped it. After all, more judges meant more openings for Democrats, in years when Arshinkoff already had several expensive races to run.

The same fate befell plans to add a second Juvenile Court judge. For years, court workers had pushed for another judge as well as building renovations.

But talks between County Executive McCarthy, a Democrat, and Juvenile Court Judge Judy Hunter, a Republican, reached a stalemate in 2001. So Hunter asked Kostoff to run interference.

The Kostoff plan, recorded in a letter signed by Hunter in February 2001, agreed to details of building expansion and signed off on adding a second judge once renovations were complete.

One month later, McCarthy got a terse, one-paragraph letter from Hunter. She wrote that she

REV_00265977

"must and do hereby rescind" her previous statements. She gave no explanation.

Kostoff says Arshinkoff caught wind of the plan and stopped it. He was afraid Democrats would win the second judgeship and wrest partial control of the Juvenile Court, which Republicans then held.

Hunter denies this, although she offers no explanation. "There were a whole lot of dynamics at work with that whole scenario, including other issues beside court expansion," she says. As for Arshinkoff's involvement, "You would have to talk to him about that."

Arshinkoff's goal might be protecting his party, but it's irritated his opponents to the point of open contempt. "I have no respect for him, for a lot of reasons," says Jones, now the county Democratic Party's finance chairman. "He's been in powerful positions, and he's used that position in no way to help the county. It's all for his personal gain."

Arshinkoff's power plays extend beyond government. He sat on the University of Akron Board of Trustees for nine years and was its chairman from 1997 to 2001.

Under his watch, the board drummed out university President Peggy Gordon Elliott, after commissioning a report from then-Attorney General Montgomery on Elliott's hiring practices. Montgomery's report finished with "no recommendations or ultimate conclusions," but it was enough for the trustees to send Elliott packing, settlement agreement in hand. The trustees who supported her ouster were Republicans; Democrats were irate, but outnumbered.

John Wray was the university's treasurer when he drew Arshinkoff's ire. Wray says he's still not sure what happened, though he won't dispute that politics played a role. William Beyer, then the associate vice president of administrative support services and Wray's boss, is more outspoken.

"John's work was outstanding," he says. "But you could see what was going on. There was talk for a couple years that they weren't happy with him, because he did a lot of work for [then-Democratic Congressman] Tom Sawyer. That's the way things were up there."

Wray, whose contract wasn't renewed, headed off to Walsh University in Canton.

It was hard to fight. Trustees are appointed by the governor, and for years, Ohio's governor has been Republican. Akron's board is stacked with big Republican contributors: Of the nine members currently serving, eight have contributed more than $7,000 to county party coffers in the last four years, according to records. As for the ninth, her husband provided the money.

Arshinkoff may be gone from the university, but his relatives are still making money there. The university began using the firm Buckingham, Doolittle & Burroughs for substantial amounts of legal work in 1999. In 2001, the firm's workload dropped precipitously, and the university took on a new firm, Amer Cunningham Co., according to financial records.

What happened? Konen, Arshinkoff's beloved niece, left Buckingham, Doolittle in August 2001. She landed at -- where else? -- Amer Cunningham.

Hardball campaign ads have become Arshinkoff's signature. He uses TV extensively, even for judicial seats, though Summit County is dependent on costly Cleveland airtime. Every penny seems to bring torrents of mud.

In one ad, Judge Bond -- who lost a tight Probate Court race last year - was accused of being

REV_00265978

Briefing
534041

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

MEMORANDUM

TO:	KARL ROVE SENIOR ADVISOR TO THE PRESIDENT
FROM:	TIM GOEGLEIN DEPUTY DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC LIAISON
	MATT SMITH ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC LIAISON
DATE:	THURSDAY, JUNE 19, 2003
RE:	LUNCH WITH KATE O'BEIRNE AND GUESTS
Time/Location:	12:00 p.m. / The Oval Room (800 Connecticut Avenue, NW)
Invited attendees:	Kate O'Beirne - National Review Brit Hume - Fox News Channel Jon Rauch - National Journal Larry Kudlow - National Review Hugo Gurdon - conservative editor of The Hill Ramesh Ponnuru - National Review Byron York - National Review
Potential Topics:	Campaign 2004 Medicare Reform Economy Judicial Nominations, including Supreme Court

Attachments:
Current articles by attendees

Their Brothers' Keepers
June 30, 2003 – CURRENT ISSUE OF NATIONAL REVIEW
By Kate O'Beirne

In early May, the Institute on Religion and Democracy sent a letter to President Bush, prompted by South Korean president Roh Moo Hyun's visit to Washington. The letter — spearheaded by Christian conservatives — issued a plea in behalf of Roh's suffering neighbors: "We call on you to give voice to desperate cries for freedom from the tormented people of North Korea." The liberal National Council of Churches received a very different letter, concerning its work in North Korea: The head of a North Korean government-approved Christian church group thanked the Council for siding with the "international solidarity movement for peace" and condemned America's "high-handed and imprudent acts." Liberal religious groups, which once enjoyed a monopoly on the issue of human rights, are largely silent about abuses not only in North Korea but in many other repressive states, including Cuba, China, Sudan, Nigeria, and Iran. In recent years, religious conservatives have become the most effective international human-rights crusaders.

See additional attachment for full article as it appears in this week's issue of National Review

Sandra's Day
June 30, 2003 – CURRENT ISSUE OF NATIONAL REVIEW – Cover Story
By Ramesh Ponnuru

Justice O'Connor gets her way more often than the chief justice does. As the "swing vote" on the Court, O'Connor is in the majority more often than any of her colleagues. Legal briefs in important cases are written to appeal, above all, to her. As a result of her position at the center of the Court, she can be a powerful voice for conservatives when she is with them. When the Court upheld school choice last year, it was her unqualified endorsement of the decision in a concurring opinion, as much as the majority opinion itself, that conferred solidity to the ruling. But it is disturbing to reflect that, given the power the Supreme Court has assumed, O'Connor has become the most powerful woman in America. Excluding foreign policy, indeed, one could even say that she is the most powerful person in America.

See additional attachment for full article as it appears in this week's issue of National Review

Byron York
June 12, 2003, 8:45 a.m. National Review Online
The Nominee Who Won't Back Down
Alabama's Bill Pryor faces Senate Democrats.

Say you find yourself nominated for a seat on one of the nation's federal courts of appeal. You face a confirmation hearing in a bitterly divided Senate Judiciary Committee. You know that if you've ever made any particularly blunt statements in the past - particularly if they were true - you'll be confronted with your words and expected to explain to senators that your remarks were somehow taken out of context, that your real meaning was obscured, or that you wouldn't say such a thing today.

At least that's what the confirmation handbook says you should do. But on Wednesday in the Dirksen Senate Office Building, William Pryor, the Alabama state attorney general who has been nominated to a seat on the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals, threw the confirmation handbook out the window. The result was one of the most extraordinary Judiciary Committee sessions in recent memory.

THE "WORST ABOMINATION"

Pryor has said some very blunt things in the past. For example, he's a vigorous opponent of abortion and has called the Roe v. Wade decision "the worst abomination in the history of constitutional law."

The quote appears in every anti-Pryor tract produced by the liberal interest groups that oppose his nomination. Before the hearing, Pryor no doubt knew that more than one senator would read his words to him and ask for an explanation. And indeed, right off the bat, New York Democrat Charles Schumer recited the "abomination" line and asked, "Do you believe that now?"

It was the perfect moment for Pryor to begin a backpedaling, thank-you-for-your-question-and-please-confirm-me explanation. Instead, Pryor said, simply, "I do."

Schumer looked slightly amazed. "I appreciate your candor," he said. "I really do."

Later, Pennsylvania Republican Arlen Specter went over the same ground. Did Pryor really say such a thing? Specter asked. Was the quote accurate?

Yes, Pryor said, the quote was accurate.

Did Pryor stand by his words?

"I stand by that comment," Pryor said. "I believe that not only is [Roe] unsupported by the text and structure of the Constitution, but it has led to a morally wrong result. It has led to the slaughter of millions of innocent unborn children."

Specter seemed more than a little chagrined. "Well," he said, pausing for a moment and looking down, "let's move on."

There were plenty of other Pryor statements to move on to. There was the time he said that with Roe, the Supreme Court had created "out of thin air a constitutional right to murder an unborn child." And then there was the remark that he "will never forget January 22, 1973 [the day of the Roe decision], the day seven members of our highest Court ripped up the Constitution."

Given more opportunities to back away from his words, Pryor again declined. "I believe that abortion is the taking of human life," he explained when committee chairman Orrin Hatch asked him about his comments. "I believe that abortion is morally wrong."

At that point some longtime confirmation observers, while impressed with Pryor's candor, wondered what was going on. Who is this guy? Is he suicidal?

Honest would be more like it. In years of speeches, interviews, campaigning, and writing, Pryor has in fact said many of the things attributed to him. Faced with strong Democratic opposition in a tense confirmation setting, he could either do an across-the-board climb down - something that would have looked ridiculous, given the intensity of his opinions on many matters - or he could argue that yes, he holds strong personal views but is able to separate them from his performance as a public official.

Pryor chose the latter. "I have a record as attorney general that is separate from my personal beliefs," he told Hatch. "I am able to put aside personal beliefs and follow the law, even when I strongly disagree with it."

On abortion, Pryor argued that, despite his personal opposition, he had ordered Alabama's district attorneys to take "the narrowest construction available" of the state's newly passed partial-birth-abortion ban. Pryor told the committee that he believed Supreme Court precedent, specifically the Casey decision, dictated a more moderate reading of the law than the aggressive stance favored by some pro-life groups in Alabama. "Look at my record," he told the committee. "I have done my duty."

MR. FEDERALISM

After abortion, the most contentious issue at Wednesday's hearing was the sometimes-touchy legal relationship between the states and the federal government. Pryor is a state attorney general and has on several occasions argued in favor of state interests when he felt they were being encroached upon by federal power. For his troubles, the left-wing interest group People for the American Way recently called him "a leader of the modern states' rights movement," a not-too-subtle attempt to link Pryor to southern defenses of segregation.

People for the American Way and other critics pointed to a Supreme Court case, United States v. Morrison, in which Pryor filed an amicus brief arguing against the constitutionality of part of the Violence Against Women Act. Pryor argued that Congress had unreasonably stretched the meaning of the Constitution's Commerce Clause to impose federal penalties on those guilty of violence against women. He argued that if Congress wanted to use the Commerce Clause to regulate an activity, then that activity must involve commerce - and that physical assault does not qualify. Pryor's opponents have written disapprovingly that he was the only state official to file a brief opposing portions of the act, while officials from 37 other states filed briefs supporting it.

To hear Democrats tell it, Pryor had made a grievously misguided legal judgment. But the problem for Pryor's opponents is that he was, in fact, proved right. The Supreme Court, in a five to-four decision, ruled in favor of Pryor's argument in United States v. Morrison.

The same held true for other federalism cases in which Pryor played a part. While committee Democrats clearly did not like Pryor's position in those cases, they found it difficult to overcome the fact that Pryor's arguments had been validated by a majority of the nation's highest Court. At the very least, Pryor's Court victories made it difficult for Democrats to charge, as they have in other confirmation battles, that the nominee was far outside the judicial mainstream.

THAT NICE JUSTICE SOUTER

Much of the hearing focused mostly on stray comments Pryor has made in the past about the Supreme Court. For example, after a high Court ruling on an Alabama death-penalty case a few years ago, Pryor said, "This issue should not be decided by nine octogenarian lawyers who happen to sit on the Supreme Court." While nobody pointed out that the remark was factually wrong - after all, there are some spry justices who have not quite hit their 80s - Democrats in general took offense.

Massachusetts senator Edward Kennedy pressed Pryor to admit that he had made an "improper" statement. Pryor declined, calling it instead "overheated political rhetoric."

But wasn't it improper? Kennedy asked again.

"It was overheated," Pryor answered.

Kennedy kept at it. Finally, Pryor offered a compromise. "I think it was inappropriate," he said.

Other Democrats questioned Pryor about remarks made in July 2000 about David Souter, the Supreme Court justice appointed by the first President Bush who has often disappointed Republicans by taking liberal positions in key cases. Speaking to a Federalist Society audience, Pryor praised the Court's federalism decisions, but noted the narrow margin of victory in many of them. "We are one vote away from the demise of federalism," he said. "Perhaps that means that our real last hope for federalism is the election of Governor George W. Bush as President of the United States, who has said his favorite justices are Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas....I will end with my prayer for the next administration: Please, God, no more Souters."

Senator Schumer asked Pryor: "What's wrong with Justice Souter?" For a moment it appeared that Pryor would retreat, as he began to explain that his remarks were a "perhaps feeble attempt at humor." But then Pryor stiffened again, saying he was simply responding to Souter's outspoken opposition to majority decisions in some federalism cases. "I have on several occasions disagreed with decisions of Justice Souter," Pryor explained. When asked why he had singled Souter out, Pryor gave a simple answer: Because Souter had written the opposing opinions. The issue went away.

THE ATTACK THAT WASN'T

All the talk about abortion and federalism and octogenarians and David Souter tended to conceal an extraordinary aspect of the hearing. Even though Pryor is a conservative white Republican from Alabama, there were almost no attacks on him based on race. Race was, in fact, a virtual non-issue in the hearing.

Yes, there was the "states' rights" innuendo - Pryor told the committee he didn't like the term because "from John C. Calhoun to George C. Wallace" it had been "used as an illegitimate defense of evil." There was also some talk about Pryor's opinion on one portion of the Voting Rights Act. But the strength of Pryor's record on race forced Democrats to abandon their traditional strategy of accusing southern Republicans of being "insensitive" to the concerns of African Americans.

To attack Pryor on race, Democrats would have had to counter the evidence contained in a detailed testimonial for Pryor sent to the committee by Alabama Democratic state representative Alvin Holmes. Offering his "full support and endorsement" of Pryor, Holmes, who is black, listed several examples of what he called Pryor's "constant efforts to help the causes of blacks in Alabama." Pryor had sided with the NAACP against a Republican lawsuit challenging state-legislative districts, Holmes wrote, even after he "came under heavy pressure from other white Republicans in Alabama for fighting to protect black legislative seats." Pryor played a key role in the prosecution of the last men charged in the 1963 Birmingham church bombing, took the lead in ending racial disparities in criminal sentences, worked to strike the state's ban on interracial marriages, and wrote a bill strengthening penalties for cross burning, Holmes wrote.

The committee also received a letter from former Alabama state representative Chris McNair. While McNair noted Pryor's stands on legislative districting and other issues, his testimonial was more personal. McNair's daughter, Denise, was one of four girls killed in the 1963 bombing. "Bill Pryor's personal support for the recent trials of the men convicted of bombing the 16th Street Baptist Church and the murder of my daughter has meant a lot to my family and this community," McNair wrote. "By designating the prosecutors as Special Assistant Attorney Generals and by providing financial assistance through his office, he demonstrated a commitment to justice that had been long overdue. I had numerous conversations with him about these cases and his desire to see that justice was done. His commitment to the cases was sincere and has been very much appreciated."

NO BACKING DOWN

Whenever Pryor comes up for a vote in the Judiciary Committee - it could be a couple of weeks - it is likely that he will be approved on a straight party-line vote. If Democrats remain united in opposition, that would make him an ideal candidate for yet another filibuster on the Senate floor.

But that is not guaranteed. Yes, Pryor has made strong statements about abortion, but not any stronger than those made by Michael McConnell, who was confirmed by the Senate - when it was controlled by Democrats - to a seat on the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals. Yes, Pryor's opinions on federalism rankle some Democrats, but his views have the virtue of having prevailed in several Supreme Court cases. And yes, Pryor's statements about Souter and the Court's octogenarians were unwise, but by no means confirmation-killers.

So maybe he will be filibustered and maybe not. In the end, Pryor's nomination might be the ultimate illustration of the capriciousness of the confirmation process as currently practiced in the Senate. How could Democrats filibuster Pryor when they confirmed McConnell? On the other hand, how could they not filibuster Pryor when they are filibustering Priscilla Owen, the Texas judge who angered Democrats by her views on the decidedly tangential issue of parental notification for teenage girls seeking abortions?

Whatever happens, Pryor knows this: He didn't duck, he didn't cover, and he didn't backtrack in the face of his critics on the Judiciary Committee. And when it was all over, even his opponents respected him for that.

Larry Kudlow
June 17, 2003, 8:00 a.m. National Review Online
Pour It On
We need shock-and-awe accommodation from the Fed.

Now that President Bush has signed the most pro-growth and investment-oriented tax cut in 20 years — the stock market is up 500 points since Congress passed the bill — the focus of economic policy shifts to the Federal Reserve. The monetary priests next meet on June 25. Most supply-siders disagree, but Alan Greenspan & Co. should turn the money spigots wide open that day — more than they have thus far in this reflation cycle. I'm talking about shock-and-awe level accommodation from the Fed.

No matter what the investment — be it corporate profits paid out as dividends, or capital gains, or new capital-goods orders and shipments by large and small businesses, or new high-risk venture start-ups — higher after-tax investor-class returns will place new liquidity demands on the financial system. The Fed must accommodate them.

A shock-and-awe liquidity-expansion policy from the Fed will counter our underperforming economic recovery, offset the forces of worldwide deflation and recession, and stomp out deflation fears at home. An aggressive liquidity stance will also accommodate rising transaction demands following the latest Bush tax cut. And it will even counter the negative effects of any potential breakdowns in the investment portfolios of Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae, the troubled loan institutions.

Deflationary interest rates are making this very same case. Last winter, the bellwether 10-year Treasury note yielded around 4 percent. Today it is slightly over 3 percent. In the money markets, euro-dollar and fed-funds futures have all risen to new contract highs, thereby pricing in a 50 basis-point cut of the Fed's interest rate.

In commodity markets, early year rallies for basic metals and industrial materials have stalled. Even gold prices, the strongest reflation indicator so far, have slipped in recent weeks.

The Fed should follow these real-time financial- and commodity-market indicators. Liquidity-sensitive market prices are signalling that the economy is still soft and that lingering deflation remains a threat to future growth. In fact, business durable-goods prices continue to fall at a 2 to 3 percent rate, on average.

Broad-based government price indexes may be registering zero inflation, but people like Ben Bernanke, a new Fed board member, and Glenn Hubbard, the president's former top economic advisor, have sensibly argued for a 2 percent inflation target. Meeting this objective would require sustained reflationary policies, not stand-patism.

Over the past two years, an output gap — the difference between actual and potential GDP — has opened up to roughly $500 billion. The three-quarter-long recession in 2001 deserves much of the blame, but so does a sub-par 2 percent economic recovery since then. Continued 2 percent growth will widen the output gap, raise unemployment further, and guarantee that budget deficits at the federal, state, and city levels continue to expand.

The most hopeful economic indicator has been the stock market. The Wilshire 5000 index of all actively traded stocks has climbed by roughly 30 percent since last October 9, adding nearly $2.2 trillion to investor wealth. But stocks remain 35 percent below their prior peaks.

The National Association of Business Economists is now predicting 3 to 4 percent real economic growth over the next 18 months — another good omen, one with which I basically agree. But both the stock market and the more optimistic NABE economists are providing forecasts. And these forecasts are surrounded by more-than-usual uncertainty.

Some say that market interest-rate declines have already done the Fed's work; no additional central bank actions are necessary. But the key measure of Fed policy is not their short-term interest-rate target, but the volume of new cash they put into the economy.

That's why recent statements by Alan Greenspan and his vice chairman Roger Ferguson sound encouraging. They have suggested that the Fed could purchase 10-year Treasury bonds — even if this reform is only temporary. Here, too, the issue is not the Fed's theoretical control of interest rates. World credit markets — not the U.S government — set rate levels. Instead the issue is conducting open-market operations through 10-year bond purchases, which will pump in new cash just as readily as the Fed's more normal method of buying Treasury bills.

We must not risk another disappointment in the stock market or the economy. That would be devastating. Mr. Greenspan and all his little maestros need to pour it on. This is no time to take chances. Add more money. Do whatever it takes to get America humming again. Supply-side tax cuts set the stage for strong economic growth. But it's up to the Fed to show us the money.

— Mr. Kudlow is CEO of Kudlow & Co.

The Hill
JUNE 18, 2003
EDITORIAL

On target, on time

Congress is on a roll. The lawmakers' ability to get things done belies what many critics envisioned only a few short months ago as yet another season of legislative gridlock and chaos.

Instead, President Bush has signed into law a $350 billion tax cut, sought as a needed tonic for a sluggish economy. Signs are that at least Wall Street is paying heed to the altered outlook.

Then, in short order, a child tax-credit for lower-income families that slipped through the cracks during the first go-around got bolted into the package. Once again, Senate and House conferees demonstrated their ability to act quickly.

Now attention has shifted prescription drug legislation as an integral part of Medicare reform. While much still remains to be decided, it seems likely that a comprehensive package will be enacted. All concerned, including the Bush White House, deserve praise for showing the mix of flexibility and resolve needed to move ahead on big-ticket items.

But before more plaudits are awarded, Congress must still prove its mettle by moving the 13 annual spending bills through the pipeline in a timely manner and within already determined budgetary targets. This exercise will require a break from a sorry tradition: for Congress has managed to enact all 13 bills on time as stand-alone measures only three times in the past four decades.

Lawmakers were four months late in dealing with the 2003 package, which is typical. It arrived at the White House as a catch-all, virtually incomprehensible mish-mash even as Bush sent his 2004 budget in the other direction down Pennsylvania Avenue.

To be sure, the means exist to keep the machinery cranking even in the absence of timely congressional action. But continuing resolutions are inherently inefficient and augur a break down in budgetary restraint. The current fiscal year proved no exception; after intending to spend $763 billion, Congress wound up approving $842 billion, without counting the extraordinary outlays needed to fight the war in Iraq.

As we have regularly reported, the key problem has been enactment of constricted budget resolutions that could not be squared with real-world needs set by even the most conservative-minded appropriations chairmen.

Happily, some progress is being made. Through a series of program shifts, Rep. Bill Young (R-Fla.), the House Appropriations Committee chairman, has secured an extra $5.2 billion to be allocated to the 2004 domestic spending bills.

Clearly more needs to be done if Young and his counterpart in the Senate, Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), are finally to achieve the appropriations ideal of ending gridlock and holding overall spending in check.

Along the way, the lawmakers should revive the Budget Enforcement Act. which was quietly allowed to expire last Sept. 30 after 12 years on the books. Although an imperfect instrument, it could serve as a useful psychological tool.

Baghdad last summer and then went into hiding in the Ansar al-Islam terrorist camps in northern Iraq. These camps, in which traces of Ricin were found on the soles of a shoe and boot recovered from the bombed-out wreckage, were populated by over 150 bin Laden-trained disciples. Zarqawi is now believed to be hiding out in Iran, where he may still be able to run parts of the European network that were not dismantled earlier this year.

Two. Documents found in the rubble of Iraq's Mukhabarat intelligence headquarters by reporters for London's Daily Telegraph show that Iraqi military and intelligence officials sought out al-Qaeda leaders much earlier than previously thought, and met with bin Laden on at least two occasions. In addition to previously reported meetings between Farouk Hijazi, a senior Iraqi intelligence officer, and bin Laden in Sudan in 1994, the Mukhabarat documents show that on February 19, 1998, about six months prior to the attacks in Dar es Salaam and Nairobi, Iraqi intelligence officials made plans to bring a senior bin Laden aide to Baghdad from Khartoum. The key document shows that a recommendation was made for "the deputy director general [of Iraqi intelligence to] bring the [bin Laden] envoy to Iraq because we may find in this envoy a way to maintain contacts with bin Laden." The meetings took place in March 1998.

Concurrent with Saddam's outreach program to al-Qaeda was Sudan's almost desperate efforts to convince the Clinton administration to examine the intelligence they had gathered on everyone from bin Laden and his key deputy, Egyptian Islamic Jihad chief Ayman al-Zawahiri, to members of the Hamburg cell who provided aid to many of the 9/11 hijackers. Correspondence of February 1998 from Sudan's intelligence chief to the FBI's regional director went without reply until June 24, 1998, at which time the FBI sheepishly made it clear that the problem in communicating with Sudan lay elsewhere in the U.S. bureaucracy. The U.S. embassies were bombed six weeks later.

Three. Some of the world's most notorious terrorist villains have turned up in the postwar cleanup of Iraq. The legendary terrorist Abu Nidal committed "suicide" in Iraq last fall—supposedly by shooting himself in the head three times. His deputy, Abdul Rahman Isa, disappeared in an apparent kidnap in early September. In both cases, there was the strong smell of an effort to get rid of evidence in the form of living terrorists on Iraqi soil that could implicate Saddam.

But after the war, more of them emerged. Abu Abbas, mastermind of the 1985 Achille Lauro hijacking, was captured by U.S. forces. It turned out, further, that Abu-Zubayr, a senior al-Qaeda operative who had planned attacks on U.S. ships passing through the Straits of Gibraltar, was an officer in Iraq's secret police. In April, U.S. forces in Baghdad also arrested Khala Khadr al-Salahat, the terrorist who allegedly had constructed the radio-sized bomb that blew up Pan Am Flight 103. In the rubble of the intelligence headquarters, evidence was found that the Iraqis had used their Manila embassy to funnel payments to al-Qaeda's Philippine operation, Abu Sayyaf; at Iraq's Salman Pak terror-training facility, an airplane was found that had been used to train hijackers.

When the world made it difficult for Saddam to hit his intended targets directly, he sought out others suitably inclined to do his dirty work.

One thing is clear from the postwar trove of intelligence on Saddam's ties to terrorists: When the world made it difficult for Saddam to hit his intended targets directly, he sought out others suitably inclined to do his dirty work. In some cases, he hid it well; in others he did not. But even the most diehard opponent of the war can no longer deny the physical evidence of the ties that bound Saddam to al-Qaeda and other terrorists, the scientific linkages that made them lethal, and the rationale for having to put an end to it all. The world is a much safer place thanks to the U.S. war to end this terror-sponsoring regime. ■NR

■ THE WORLD

Their Brothers' Keepers

The conservative shade of human-rights activists

KATE O'BEIRNE

In early May, the Institute on Religion and Democracy sent a letter to President Bush, prompted by South Korean president Roh Moo Hyun's visit to Washington. The letter—spearheaded by Christian conservatives—issued a plea in behalf of Roh's suffering neighbors: "We call on you to give voice to desperate cries for freedom from the tormented people of North Korea."

The Christian Left is also concerned about abuse in North Korea—by the United States against the Pyongyang regime. The National Council of Churches received a very different letter, concerning its work in North Korea: The head of a North Korean government-approved Christian church group thanked the Council for siding with the "international solidarity movement for peace" and condemned America's "high-handed and imprudent acts."

North Korea's widespread famine, its vast system of gulags, and its cruel treatment of dissidents and religious believers are not the only human-rights catastrophes to escape the condemnation of most of the mainline churches that worship with the Christian Left. Liberal religious groups, which once enjoyed a monopoly on the issue of human rights, are largely silent about the abuses of many other repressive states, including Cuba, China, Sudan, Nigeria, and Iran. In recent years, religious conservatives have become the most effective international human-rights crusaders.

The Christian Left has always been a bit deaf to the cries of certain political dissidents and religious minorities. In the 1970s, President Jimmy Carter's human-rights crusades enjoyed the support of the mainline Protestant community, liberal evangelicals, and left-wing Catholics, whose collective moral indignation echoed the selective outrage of secular liberals. Thus, right-wing regimes were roundly denounced for repressing political liberties, while left-wing ones were gently encouraged to "dialogue" about their troubling shortcomings.

REV_00265990

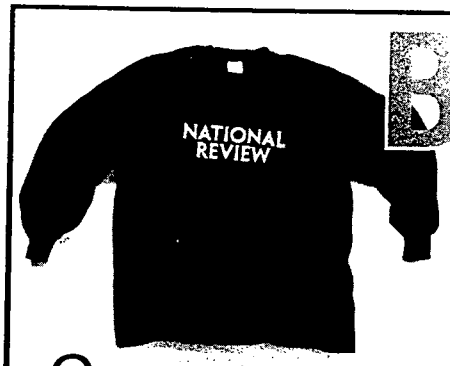
In the 1990s, a different crew took up the cause of global human rights: religious conservatives. Their first successful campaign, for which they built a broad alliance of believers, highlighted the widespread incidence of religious persecution. It resulted in the 1998 International Religious Freedom Act, establishing an independent commission to monitor violations and a State Department office responsible for an annual report to the president. Two years later, religious conservatives led the effort to enact landmark legislation to combat international sex trafficking. (The Clinton administration opposed both laws. In the case of the International Religious Freedom Act, their opposition was a combination of liberal suspicion of Christian activism and State Department resistance to congressional meddling. The sex-trafficking legislation got caught up in the feminist debate over whether or not prostitution is a legitimate career choice.) This year, conservatives lobbied successfully to secure billions of dollars for the global battle against AIDS.



Recent events show that the Christian Left is up to its old tricks. The sympathy and support religious liberals have extended to Havana and Beijing was also extended to Saddam Hussein. In early May, about 150 activists, including the Rev. Jesse Jackson and representatives of Pax Christi, the United Methodist Church, the United Church of Christ, and the Unitarian Universalists, placed an ad in the New York Times. They declared, "We, religious leaders, stand firmly in support of the United Nations," and praised the leadership of Secretary-General Kofi Annan. Earlier this year, the Rev. Robert Edgar, general secretary of the National Council of Churches, reported that the "highlight" of a visit by American church officials to Baghdad was the opportunity to pray with Tariq Aziz, Saddam's notorious deputy. During the visit, any concerns about Saddam's brutal repression were raised in private. Public concerns focused on Iraqi victims of the 1991 Gulf War and American plans "to use its imperial power to crush a small nation."

A "pilgrimage of peace" to the Middle East last April followed the same pattern. No moral distinction was made in the condemnation of Israeli and Palestinian "acts of violence," except that only Israel's behavior was specifically criticized. Mark Tooley, director of the United Methodist committee at the Institute on Religion and Democracy, explains that because the mainline Christian community generally can't bear to criticize any Marxist or Muslim regimes, its outrage is highly selective: "The only country they criticize on human rights is Israel."

Even as Christians and other religious believers risk rape, torture, enslavement, and death in scores of countries, religious liberals direct their attention to alleged American atrocities. The National Council of Churches has mounted a campaign against SUVs and is promoting an initiative to help Florida's farm laborers. The World Council of Churches is waging a war against the use of most forms of energy worldwide.

Persecution of Christians has increased due to global population trends. Prof. Allen D. Hertzke of the University of Oklahoma, author of the forthcoming book Freeing God's Children: The New Faith-Based Movement for International Human Rights, describes "an unheralded demographic revolution—a tectonic shift of the Christian population away from the West toward developing and non-democratic countries." Because about 60 percent of the world's Christians now live outside of Europe and North America, an estimated 200 million Christians are at the mercy of hostile governments in Asia, Africa, and the Middle East.

History teaches that where religious

Big Duds FOR BIG Dudes!

Classic Long-sleeved Crew-neck "Tee" Features White NR logo Emblazoned on Super-comfortable 100% "Heavyweight" Pre-shrunk Navy Blue Cotton Roomy XXL Size Only!

Get the Long-sleeved NR "Tee"

I'm a big, bad, XXL-kind-of conservative:
Send me _____ of these great shirts
(only $24.99 each, including shipping!) to

Name _____
Address _____
City _____
State _____ ZIP _____

PAYMENT METHOD

☐ Check enclosed (make payable to "National Review")
Bill to: ☐ MasterCard ☐ Visa
Acct. No. _____
Expir. Date _____
Signature _____
Total payment $ _____

New York State residents must include sales tax.

NATIONAL REVIEW 215 Lexington Avenue, New York, NY 10016

REV_00265991

freedom exists, liberalization and democracy take root. In recognition of this fact, and given the resurgence of religious conflict in the post–Cold War world, Hertzke believes that religious liberty should be a key goal of foreign policy. Indeed, many non-Christians understand that promoting religious liberty benefits believers and non-believers alike. Hertzke points to David Saperstein, the liberal leader of the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism and an active member of the coalition to fight Christian persecution, and to former New York Times executive editor A. M. Rosenthal, who wrote a dozen columns in 1997 alone calling attention to the plight of Christians. Hertzke concludes, "There is a greater antipathy between some mainline religious leaders and evangelicals than between evangelicals and Jewish leaders."

He offers a number of reasons why liberal Christians have largely ignored the issue of religious persecution. First, they are uneasy about strengthening religious believers anywhere, especially Christians — a legacy of the Enlightenment view that religion has been at the root of persecution from the distant past to the present day (from Torquemada to the Taliban, one might say). The feminist conviction, shared by many liberals, that traditional religious believers and the patriarchal West pose the most alarming threat to freedom was captured in the motto of the 2002 International Women's Day: "Afghanistan Is Everywhere."

Second, liberals are deeply suspicious of the motives of the despised "Religious Right." In a 1997 New York Times column, Anthony Lewis perfectly reflected liberal animosity to religious conservatives when he dismissed the efforts of evangelical proponents of religious liberty as a self-interested appeal in behalf of their coreligionists. He accused them of mounting the campaign "to advance their cause of giving religion a prime role in the American political structure."

Untroubled by the Left's attempts to undermine them, conservative Christian human-rights groups continue to fight for the world's most defenseless and imperiled peoples. In January 1996, Michael Horowitz of the Hudson Institute and Nina Shea of Freedom House organized a conference on "Global Persecution of Christians." That same year, 5,000 churches observed an International Day of Prayer organized by Christian groups and ministries. Two years later, 100,000 churches participated. Fueled by the energy of the evangelical grassroots, and mobilized through religious newsletters and radio stations, this successful coalition has commanded congressional action despite the hostility of the mainstream media and mainline churches. For worldwide victims of persecution, this faith-based movement has been an answer to their prayers. NR

WHAT THEY'RE SAYING ABOUT

NRO
nationalreview ONLINE

"There's plenty of conservative thought on National Review Online."
—Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

". . . an excellent site that is updated constantly and frequently breaks news that the print magazine's bi-weekly schedule makes difficult."
—Columbia Journalism Review

"Unlike most websites . . . which simply post a partial list of that week's print stories, NRO presents up-to-the-minute commentary, sort of like the rapid-response tactics that successful campaigns employ."
—New York Press

". . . most-enjoyable-to-read conservative site on the web today."
—PoliticalProfessional.Com

www.nationalreview.com

■ THE WORLD II

We're Number Twenty?!

The odd, anti-American scorekeeping of the Center for Global Development

JIM LACEY

The Center for Global Development (CGD), a left-leaning global-poverty think tank, recently announced that the United States ranks 20th out of 21 countries when it comes to helping poorer nations—just barely ahead of last-place Japan. Considering that the total aid given by the U.S. and Japan is equal to the combined total for the other 19 nations in the survey, it's worth asking why we fared so poorly. Could the top-ranked Dutch truly be twice as generous as we are—or are the data simply being tortured to shame America?

The survey ranks countries according to their policies in aid, trade, investment, migration, peacekeeping, and the environment. America wins hands down in trade, but is at or near the bottom in every other category. It was only right that the CGD gave us a win on trade, considering that America has been the global growth engine for two decades; in recent years, our willingness to import products from the rest of the world (and to run a potentially harmful current-account deficit) has kept the global economy afloat. Unfortunately, the CGD does not give the U.S. much credit for making it easy for poor countries to export their goods to us. It ranks all of the countries in Europe only fractions of a point behind us on this measure—even though the EU's trade policies do more harm to

Mr. Lacey is a Time magazine correspondent.

REV_00265992

SANDRA'S Day

Why the Rehnquist Court has been the O'Connor Court, and how to replace her (should it come to that)

BY RAMESH PONNURU

CONSERVATIVES have never much cared for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. They viewed her nomination to the Supreme Court as the result of Ronald Reagan's ill-advised, because gratuitous, 1980 campaign pledge to appoint the first female justice. During her confirmation hearings in 1981, some conservatives argued that her record as a state legislator in Arizona made it unlikely that she would vote against Roe v. Wade. Her subsequent votes confirmed that suspicion: She reaffirmed Roe in Planned Parenthood v. Casey (1992) and even divined a kind of constitutional right to partial-birth abortion in Stenberg v. Carhart (2000). Conservative activists tend to regard her as a "moderate," or even "liberal," justice, and say that President Bush should avoid appointing another justice like her.

The standard conservative picture of Justice O'Connor is, at best, an oversimplification. She is, in truth, both better and worse than they think she is. Some conservative Court-watchers fear that the Right's confusion could cost it dearly if there is a nomination fight later this year.

The conservative case for O'Connor is that she has voted reasonably well. While she has become a reliable vote for social liberalism at the Court, she has also sided with conservatives on many occasions. The conservative heroes on the Court have been Clarence Thomas, Antonin Scalia, and, to a lesser extent, the chief justice, William Rehnquist. O'Connor has generally voted with them on racial preferences, the death penalty, criminal procedure, and other issues. She also sided with them in Bush v. Gore.

The Rehnquist Court is known for two great doctrinal innovations. Instead of continuing to insist on strict secularism, the Court now merely requires governmental neutrality among religions. The Court has also embarked on a so-called "federalism revolution" that limits the power of Congress while protecting the prerogatives of the states. O'Connor has played a leading role in both areas. Eugene Volokh, a law professor at UCLA who once clerked for her, concludes, "She's a woman of the center-right on a lot of the really important issues that have come before the Supreme Court."

Have conservatives damaged their own cause by taking an excessively negative view of O'Connor? Washington is rife with speculation that Rehnquist, O'Connor, or both will retire this summer. In one scenario, Rehnquist leaves and Bush elevates O'Connor to chief justice. If O'Connor leaves, however, the conservatives may have lowered the bar for her replacement. Alberto Gonzales, the White House counsel, is often mentioned as a potential Bush nominee. He is a moderate, and possibly to the left of O'Connor on some issues, such as racial preferences. But so hostile are conservatives to O'Connor that the White House could tell them that he is an improvement. If, on the other hand, Bush nominates a true-blue (true-red?) conservative to replace O'Connor, liberals will say that he is tilting the Court far to the right—and by exaggerating her liberalism, the conservatives will have lent that claim credibility.

REV_00265993

ON THE O'CONNOR COURT

The difficulty conservatives have in getting a fix on O'Connor is a function of the bifurcation in their view of the Supreme Court. Conservative lawyers and law professors care a lot about issues such as affirmative action and federalism, on which O'Connor often votes the way they want. But social conservatives are the only mass constituency on the right that pays attention to the Court; and while they are usually allied with the conservative legal community, their priorities are different. The activists tend to disdain O'Connor because of her votes on abortion and, to a lesser extent, gay rights. The conservative lawyers tend to disagree with her decisions on those issues, but are less hostile to her because of her other votes. Another way of saying this is that how happy a conservative is with Justice O'Connor is a reflection on how happy he is with the Rehnquist Court.

Actually, the O'Connor Court might be a better label for it. Justice O'Connor gets her way more often than the chief justice does. As the "swing vote" on the Court, O'Connor is in the majority more often than any of her colleagues. Legal briefs in important cases are written to appeal, above all, to her. As a result of her position at the center of the Court, she can be a powerful voice for conservatives when she is with them. When the Court upheld school choice last year, it was her unqualified endorsement of the decision in a concurring opinion, as much as the majority opinion itself, that conferred solidity to the ruling. But it is disturbing to reflect that, given the power the Supreme Court has assumed, O'Connor has become the most powerful woman in America. Excluding foreign policy, indeed, one could even say that she is the most powerful person in America.

O'Connor's style of judging has increased that power. The justice is famous for issuing narrow rulings that turn on the particular facts of the case rather than rulings that articulate broad principles. Applying this common-law approach to constitutional cases preserves her freedom of action in future cases. But it also, and necessarily, undermines the predictability of the law and aggrandizes the judicial role. This is the principal critique that conservative lawyers—including Justice Scalia, in many opinions—make of O'Connor. She may often vote with Scalia and Thomas, says a former Rehnquist clerk, but "she is not driven by . . . legal arguments in the sense that a conservative jurist should be."

In the 1995 Adarand case, for example—concerning racial preferences in federal contracting—O'Connor voted with the conservatives. But she refused to say that racial preferences in federal contracting were always impermissible, or to expound some other rule that made it clear which preferences were okay. Instead she said that such preferences would receive "strict scrutiny" from the Court. "Strict scrutiny" is the highest degree of scrutiny in the Court's equal-protection jurisprudence; traditionally, a legislative or bureaucratic classification is subjected to strict scrutiny as a prelude to being found impermissible. Justice O'Connor, however, went out of her way to explain that while the program at issue in the case had to go, in future cases strict scrutiny would not necessarily be "fatal in fact." So which preferences should stay and which go? The Clinton administration's response to this uncertain guidance was to preserve all existing federal preference programs except the one at issue and another that fell in court. To this day the Court's position with regard to other contracting preferences remains unclear.

O'Connor has ruled (or rather not ruled) similarly in racial-gerrymandering cases. Jeffrey Rosen, an influential legal commentator, has said that the upshot of those cases is that congressional district lines cannot be drawn with regard to race if the results offend Justice O'Connor's aesthetic sensibilities.

Or take abortion. From her earliest days on the Court, O'Connor has argued that restrictions should be upheld so long as they do not impose an "undue burden" on the right to procure abortions. In Casey, Justices O'Connor, Anthony Kennedy, and David Souter adopted this standard for the Court. It is a standard, not a rule—in the parlance of the law profs—because its application depends on subjective judgments. In Stenberg, Justice O'Connor and four of her colleagues decided that a ban on partial-birth abortion imposed an "undue burden" on the abortion right; Justice Kennedy apparently felt that it was a "due burden," since he dissented from the judgment. Justice Scalia, also in dissent, noted that the only effect of the standard was to turn the Supreme Court into a veto board for abortion regulations.

In Bush v. Gore, the Court said that the doctrine underlying its decision was "limited to the present circumstances" and would not govern future cases. Critics have seized on the line as the epitome of the decision's lawlessness. But the Court has been making good-for-one-ticket-only decisions for some time, thanks in large part to O'Connor. Volokh, the former clerk for O'Connor, notes that in some areas of the law she has been willing to defend "bright-line rules" and that other justices also adopt vague, subjective standards on some occasions. This observation should be taken as a qualification, rather than a refutation, of a valid generalization: Justice O'Connor practices "one case at a time" judging more often, and with greater consequence, than her colleagues.

THE FEDERALISM REVOLUTION

Conservative lawyers consider the federalism revolution the most valuable part of the Rehnquist Court's legacy. O'Connor's record on federalism is not without the ambiguities one would expect from the rest of her jurisprudence. She has sometimes held the revolution back—as in U.S. v. Lopez, a 1995 case that is something of a landmark. The Constitution gives Congress the power to regulate commerce among the states. In Lopez, the Court ruled that the Gun-Free School Zones Act was not a legitimate exercise of this authority. The Court had not imposed a limit on congressional power under the commerce clause in six decades. O'Connor, the swing vote, joined a concurring opinion that appeared to weaken the Court's conclusion and left the law unsettled.

REV_00265994

Notwithstanding such episodes, O'Connor can fairly be said to have not only participated in but even led the revolution. Her strong dissent from the federal drinking-age case in 1987 was a harbinger of it. And one of its signal accomplishments was the doctrine, announced by Justice O'Connor in Gregory v. Ashcroft (1991), that federal law will not be read to compromise the sovereignty of state governments unless the law includes a clear statement to that effect.

Unfortunately, the Court's federalism revolution isn't all it's cracked up to be by legal conservatives. Michael Greve of the American Enterprise Institute has noted that the Court's federalist decisions partake of romanticism about "states' rights." These decisions contain many references to the "dignity" of states. The Court's assumption is that it can protect federalism by protecting state governments. As a consequence, the Court has been inattentive to the "horizontal" dimension of federalism: to the constitutional provisions that promote competition and accountability among state governments by constraining their power. If Eliot Spitzer wants to nationalize American industries from the New York attorney general's office, the Supreme Court is not going to stop him. The O'Connor Court's federalism is not that of the Founders.

How legal conservatives convinced themselves that federalism could be restored by the federal judiciary is one of the minor mysteries of the age. The O'Connor Court is itself a significant offender against federalism, just as its predecessors, the Warren and Burger courts, were. When the voters of Colorado passed an amendment to the state constitution opposing certain gay-rights laws, the Court's response was to slap them down. On abortion, the Court—O'Connor very much included—is "hysterically nationalist," as Robert Nagel argues in The Implosion of American Federalism. When seen against this backdrop, the "federalism revolution" starts to look less like a readjustment of state-federal relations and more like a transfer of power from Congress to the Court.

A highly developed institutional amour propre may be the most striking feature of the O'Connor Court. It is present in the plurality opinion in Casey, which O'Connor joined. The Casey Court reaffirmed Roe in large part out of a reluctance to give in to the Court's critics. Appearing to capitulate would compromise the Court's ability to "speak before all others" for the nation's constitutional ideals. It is this self-regard that brings together O'Connor's penchant for finicky edicts, the O'Connor Court's marked reluctance to overturn the activist precedents of the Warren and Burger courts, the Court's racial cases, and its intervention in the 2000 election. There is an authoritarian streak in this jurisprudence that Justice O'Connor does not, in all likelihood, perceive.

Should O'Connor either retire or be nominated to chief justice, fixing her position in the conservative-liberal spectrum more precisely may be important in the political battles that follow. But her most important legacy is not as a liberal, moderate, or conservative justice. It might be best expressed in the title of Kenneth Starr's book on the O'Connor Court—First Among Equals—except that the title is two words too long. There is little evidence that O'Connor or her Court regards other governmental authorities as equals. ■ NR

■ AT WAR II

The New Fellow-Traveling

In the present crisis, a sickening familiarity

DAVID PRYCE-JONES

ISLAMIST fellow-traveling today has a different focus from the Soviet fellow-traveling that preceded it, but the cast of mind is the same. The common premise that Western society is responsible for the world's ills generates in certain intellectual circles guilt for the present as well as fear for what is to come. The conviction then develops that whatever "we" do must be wrong, and whatever "they" do is justified. Fellow-travelers in both cases come to apologize for those hostile to Western society, even to identify with them.

The Soviet Union invariably proclaimed that the goal of Communism was peace and the perfectibility of mankind. Evidence to the contrary never dissuaded fellow-travelers from the belief that Communists must be admirable because they said they were. Islamist extremists likewise speak of jihad as the necessary prelude to peace and the perfectibility of mankind. In the eyes of the new fellow-travelers, these extremists may not yet be necessarily admirable, but they are Muslims, therefore victims of Western colonialism in the Third World, and deserving sympathy. So in the perspective of Islamist fellow-traveling September 11 becomes a day when America had it coming, and the exploding aircraft had the effect of "a work of art." In the aftermath of September 11 there was a record number of conversions to Islam in non-Islamic countries—apparently some 30,000 in Holland alone. The Free Iraq campaign brought the new fellow-traveling to unprecedented heights, notably a speech by an academic at Columbia University appealing for "a million Mogadishus" to throw American forces out of Iraq. Here was a reprise in animus and tone of Cold War fellow-traveling.

The Soviet Union aimed to destroy bourgeois democracy. Only in their more extravagant moments do Islamists and their fellow-travelers promise to destroy the United States; their narrower but

Mr. Pryce-Jones is an NR senior editor, and this essay is adapted from a speech given at the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research in New York.

REV_00265995

Briefing

536041

June 18, 2003

To: Karl Rove
Fr: Marc Lampkin
Re: Meeting with John Tyson

Dear Karl,

Great to see you last night! Thanks also for your kind words to Emily and me.

Thank you for agreeing to meet with John Tyson, Chairman and CEO of Tyson Foods. As you may know, Tyson Foods is the world's largest producer of chicken, beef and pork, and the company produces one-out-of-four servings of meat consumed in the United States. In addition to food production, Tyson stands as one of the largest agricultural consumers in the country serving as an enormous purchaser of corn and soybean animal feed.

Mr. Tyson is eager to share with you his perceptions of the American agricultural sector as well as news of the Company's recent developments, including Tyson Foods' expanded charitable efforts. Specific topics to be covered include:

Trade and Trade Promotion: The state of American agriculture has never been more dependent upon access to foreign markets than it is today. Tyson is very supportive of the President's interest in promoting free trade.

Mr. Tyson would like to reiterate the industry's concern about the ongoing problems with chicken exports to Russia, America's largest market for poultry exports. Mr. Tyson is hopeful that resolution of the matter may be close at hand, due in large part to the efforts of the Bush Administration.

Country of Origin Labeling: Tyson would like to see the Administration support Congressional repeal of mandatory country of origin labeling for meat. The law passed in last year's Farm Bill will burden farmers, ranchers, processors and retailers with tremendous new costs and legal liabilities -- with no apparent benefit to consumers. A broad coalition of farmers and processors is working to get Congress to reconsider and make the country of origin labeling voluntary instead.

Additionally, we expect that Mr. Tyson may touch briefly on a few additional public policy challenges facing his company including issues related to meat packer ownership of livestock, recent developments in food safety, and the poulty industry's concern with the Department of Labor's poultry initiative.

File
536041

THE WHITE HOUSE
OFFICE OF PUBLIC LIAISON

EISENHOWER EXECUTIVE OFFICE BUILDING ROOM 186
WASHINGTON, DC 20502
PHONE: 202-456-2380
FAX: 202-456-2130

TO: BJ Goergen FROM: Mike Meece

COMPANY: DATE: 6/13/03

FAX: 6-0191 TOTAL NO. OF PAGES INCLUDING COVER: 3

RE:

COMMENTS:

PRA 6

The document accompanying this Facsimile Transmission Sheet is intended only for the use of the individual or entity to which it is addressed. This message contains information which may be privileged, confidential or exempt from disclosure under applicable law. If the reader of this message is not the intended recipient, or the employee or agent responsible for delivering the message to the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, dissemination, copying or distribution, or taking any action in reliance on the contents of this communication is strictly prohibited. If you have received this communication in error, please notify us immediately at the number above.

Pitney Bowes Management Services

Operating from the Hyatt Regency Chicago
Business Center

Date: June 13th Number of pages: 2

To: Mike Meece

Company Name: White House

Fax Number: 202-456-2130

Phone Number:

From: Margaret Garikes

If there are any problems or questions regarding this transmission, please call (312) 616-6888

Comments:

Mike –

I am Director of Federal Affairs for the American Medical Association. Attached is the resolution you asked about. I will be working with Rich Deem on this issue. Please don't hesitate to call if you have any questions –

PRA 6

Thanks–

Margaret

Pitney Bowes Management Services Business Center,
Illinois Center Concourse Level, 151 East Wacker Drive, Chicago, IL
(312) 616-6888 Fax (312) 565-2966

AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION HOUSE OF DELEGATES

Resolution: 213
(A-03)

Introduced by: Wisconsin Delegation

Subject: End of Life Drug and Pain Treatment

Referred to: Reference Committee B
(Cyndi J. Yag-Howard, MD, Chair)

Whereas, Physicians have the right and obligation to provide treatment in accordance with the best interest and wishes of the patient; and

Whereas, A recent interpretation by US Attorney General John Ashcroft of 21 Code of Federal Regulations Section 1306.04 (2001) threatens to revoke the license of a physician who prescribes medication that may hasten dying for someone with a terminal illness; and

Whereas, The Drug Enforcement Administration has issued a warning that threatens physicians with loss of their DEA narcotic license in regard to their treatment of end-of-life patients; and

Whereas, A non-medically trained individual will be assessing the physician as to whether it was an attempt to relieve pain or to end the life of the patient; and

Whereas, Such directive can have a "chilling" effect on pain treatment by all physicians; therefore be it

RESOLVED, That our American Medical Association communicate to the President, the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, and the Attorney General, its strong opposition to the use of 21 Code of Federal Regulations Section 1306.04 or any other rationale that would involve placement of licensure restrictions on physicians who use opioid analgesics and other pain-reducing medications appropriately to treat patients with pain (Reaffirm HOD Policy); and be it further

RESOLVED, That our AMA oppose harassment of physicians by agents of the Drug Enforcement Administration in response to the appropriate prescribing of opiates and other controlled substances to patients with terminal illness. (Reaffirm HOD Policy)

Fiscal Note: No Significant Fiscal Impact

Received: 5/7/03

First Name	Last Name	Company	Phone	City	State
Ed	Hanway	Cigna
Bernie	Marcus	The Home Depot
Ed	Rust	State Farm
John	Bachman	Jones Financial Corp
Mac	Crawford	Caremark Rx
John	Dillon	International Paper
Bob	Essner	Wyeth
Lou	Giuliano	ITT
David	Glass	Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.
Hank	Greenberg	AIG
Chad	Holliday	DuPont
John	Jones	Air Products and Chemicals
Bill	Jurgenson	National Mutual
Ed	Kelly	Liberty Mutual
Ed	Liddy	Allstate
Bob	Nardelli	The Home Depot
Earl	Nye	TXU
Phil	Purcell	Morgan Stanley
Art	Ryan	Prudential
Lee	Scott	Wal-Mart
Fred	Smith	FedEx
Bill	Walters	FMC
Bill	Weldon	Johnson & Johnson

PRA 6

Ralston, Susan B.

536041

File: Medicare

From: Karl Rove [KR@georgewbush.com]
Sent: Tuesday, June 17, 2003 1:14 PM
To: Ralston, Susan B.
Subject: Fw: thinking threogh the medicare conference

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld (www.BlackBerry.net)

-----Original Message-----
From: PRA 6
To: bill_frist@frist.senate.gov <bill_frist@frist.senate.gov>; jill_cernok@kyl.senate.gov <jill_cernok@kyl.senate.gov>
CC: Dean_Rosen@frist.senate.gov <Dean_Rosen@frist.senate.gov>
Sent: Tue Jun 17 08:58:50 2003
Subject: thinking threogh the medicare conference

I want to reemphasize that thinking through who serves on the medicare conference is 90% of the game

I went through a series of negotiations as speaker where one senator could hold up the entire conference forever.
you cannot allow grassley and baucus to dictate the conferees or you will have given away the game before it starts.

you have to make sure this is a leader's conference and that you hahve enough signatures to report out a bill for the senate even if you lose one or two republicans this is very hard under senate rules and traditions and will lead to a lot of complaining but you should insterview each member and make sure they are on the team before you appoint them to the conference the peak moment for individual members is before the bill gets off the floor the key moment for leaders is in appointing conferees and holding up a conference until you get the bill you want they will not be able to filibuster you but if you are not careful they will be able to block a bill from coming out of conference

newt

Records Management, White House Office of (ORM)

Subject Files

FG006-27
(Office of Senior Advisor - Karl Rove)

5360124

OA/NARA #: 10726/10704
9713

Box _____
Folder _____

REV_00266009

2018-0011-P [ ]

Systematic Processing Marker

This is not a textual record. This Systematic Processing Marker indicates that material has been removed during systematic processing by George W. Bush Presidential Library staff.

Stack: Row: Sect.: Shelf: Pos.:	FRC ID:	Location or Hollinger ID:	NARA Number:	OA Number:
11/4/3/3	9713

Folder Title: ORM
FG006-27
536124

Copyright 2003 U.P.I.
United Press International

January 7, 2003 Tuesday

LENGTH: 746 words

HEADLINE: Outside View: Nigh time for tax reform

BYLINE: By LESLIE CARBONE

DATELINE: FAIRFAX, Va., Jan. 5 (UPI)

BODY:
With so much attention focused on what President George W. Bush proposed in the way of economic reform in his Tuesday speech to The Economic Club of Chicago, the administration has a rare and promising opportunity to help America's struggling families today and for generations to come.

A 2-year window of political opportunity exists to promote fundamental tax reform that will substantially reduce taxes on working families and dramatically simplify America's Byzantine tax system.

With the prospects for significant tax reform -- and his own political clout -- buoyed by the November 2002 election, the president is expected to spend the next couple of years rallying support for the cause of dramatically altering America's progressive income tax.

That's good news for working families who pay a high price for America's behemoth tax code.

The progressive income tax applies higher marginal tax rates to people earning more. It is a selective law that levies an additional penalty on people who do well-- and it backfires badly.

Middle-class Americans were originally exempt from the income tax. First introduced as a tax on just "the rich" -- the wealthiest 1 percent of Americans -- the average two-earner family today pays more than $6,000 just in federal income taxes.

Once the tax was put in place, under the guise of "soaking the rich," it was very easy to broaden it. Now nearly everybody pays.

The government's demand for revenue during World War II provided the rationale for expansion from a class-based tax to a mass tax. Once it had begun milking the middle class, the government was loath to stop.

That's only the beginning. Progressive taxes actually make it harder for middle-class workers to find jobs in the first place. Progressive taxes discourage productivity and inhibit economic growth -- which translates into fewer available jobs for workers.

Fewer available jobs mean lower wages for those who find and keep work. Wages are highest when many employers have to compete for few workers; they are lowest when many workers have to compete for few jobs. In this setting, lower- and middle-class families suffer the most.

Though the highest marginal rates are imposed upon the most productive Americans in terms of the income they generate the real costs -- fewer jobs, lower wages, slower growth

REV_00266016

-- hit working families the hardest.

America's progressive tax policy is also morally destructive.

Progressive taxation casts suspicion on the virtuous behavior that creates wealth and is a kind of fine on prosperity. Government seizes a greater share of the fruits of the labor of hard-working, honest citizens who have prospered against the odds then their neighbors who may have not. In so doing, it stigmatizes prosperity and the virtues that produce it.

Prosperity brings less tangible benefits, such as greater freedom from worry, the trust and confidence of others, and self-respect. Virtues become habits when practiced regularly, building healthy families, healthy communities and healthy nations.

A nation that treats the fruits of virtuous behavior as sinister is a nation in moral peril because it lures its citizens toward the practice of vice rather than virtue. The resulting social-down-spiral creates greater dependency on government by infantilizing the citizenry, teaching people that they can't make it on their own without a government handicap.

With a new Congress heading into session and new economic leadership taking office shortly, the president now has a golden opportunity to reshape America's tax policy and undo the damage that the mistakes of the past century have wrought.

In the coming State of the Union address, Bush should ask the Congress and the country what kind of America tax policy should support. Should it forge a nation that honors the virtues that create wealth to everyone's benefit or one that punishes creative and responsible economic behavior and ends up hurting those who can least afford it? By adopting the right vision, the Bush economic team can remodel America's tax code into one that will strengthen -- not undermine -- the nation's moral and economic fiber.

Leslie Carbone, former director of family tax policy at Family Research Council, is the author of Slaying Leviathan: The Moral Case for Tax Reform (forthcoming).

"Outside View" commentaries are written for UPI by outside writers who specialize in a variety of important global issues.

LOAD-DATE: January 8, 2003

prev Document 8 of 10 next

About LexisNexis™ | Terms and Conditions | Privacy Policy | Support Identifier
Copyright © 2003 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

Copyright 2002 U.P.I.
United Press International

February 16, 2002, Saturday

SECTION: FINANCIAL NEWS

LENGTH: 910 words

HEADLINE: Outside view: Enron? Blame the government

BYLINE: By LESLIE CARBONE, Special to United Press International

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, Feb. 16

BODY:
The U.S. government announced Feb. 10 that it is trying to wrest control of Enron Corporation's retirement plans. That's a little like the Taliban trying to grab control of the National Organization for Women.

The beleaguered energy-trading company has been the target of non-stop government and media scrutiny since filing bankruptcy last December after hiding huge debts and losses via off-the-books partnerships, many of them named for Star Wars characters.

This scam made multimillionaires out of Enron executives but cost about 20,000 of its workers and former workers an average of $50,000 apiece in retirement savings.

The unfolding drama, which features cool as a cuke company fat cats testifying (or refusing to testify) before Congress, emotional employees recounting the tens of thousands of dollars that they lost, and even a suicide, has provided politicians a rare opportunity to look virtuous beside the corruption of others.

Congress has seized the day. In opening statements during the House Energy and Commerce oversight subcommittee's Feb. 7 hearing, angry politicians condemned Enron's panel of pariahs waiting to testify.

Committee Chairman James Greenwood, R-Penn., accused the assembled executives of "avarice" and "appetite". Richard Burr, R-N.C., railed against their "greed with no regard for the American lives affected by it".

Billy Tauzin, R-La., called the men "crooks"; Michael Bilirakis, R-Fla., and Bobby Rush, D-Ill., labeled them "terrorists".

Some of this criticism is no doubt warranted, but perhaps Congress should remove the log from its own eye before the speck in Enron's.

While those who run and ran Enron are responsible for their own wrongdoing, it is government's incompetent meddling in Americans' financial lives that left the employees at the mercy of the company's shenanigans.

It is federal policies that have left workers dependent on retirement shelters like 401(k)s and therefore on the companies that administer them.

Here's how: First, by creating the Social Security program, government enshrined retirement income as a right -- but, because the program is insolvent, no one can count on it -- but being forced to put 12.4 percent of their earnings into the system makes it that much harder for low- and middle-income workers to save on their own.

REV_00266018

Second, this difficulty is exacerbated by the federal tax code, which also diminishes take-home pay and therefore the opportunity to save -- and then diminishes the earnings from any savings or investments the worker has managed to make.

Instead of eliminating these problems directly and making it easier for people to simply save, the government permits tax-deferred savings and investments only via vehicles like the 401(k) plans at the center of the Enron scandal. While they are restrictive, company-sponsored 401(k) plans allow workers far greater tax-deferment opportunities than they have on their own under current law.

That's what helps companies like Enron that offer seemingly generous retirement benefits lure employees -- and why workers can lose big when these companies behave unscrupulously.

Naturally, many in government have learned all the wrong lessons from the debacle and are proposing various means to increase -- rather than decrease -- the meddling that allowed for it.

The Labor Department announced on Feb. 10 that it plans to remove and replace Enron's retirement plan overseers -- as though the government provided a stellar example of how to run a retirement program.

Recent rumblings suggest that Social Security privatization is losing steam, as Enron's free fall and the stock market's recent problems have shaken investor confidence, but that's a little like choosing television over books because there are so many trashy novels out there.

A number of bills in Congress would cap the percentage of company stock allowable in 401(k) accounts; fortunately, the Bush administration opposes such limits. Even campaign finance reform has been given a boost, largely because Enron gave more money in campaign contributions to Republicans, including George W. Bush, than to Democrats.

There is a better solution. The answer to the problems created or exacerbated by government meddling is less meddling, not more.

First of all, Social Security reform that allows workers more direct control over their own money is needed now more than ever.

Second, fundamental tax reform is needed to cut the Gordian knot of bizarre disincentives to earn, save, and invest in the current income tax code. Such reform could come as either a national sales tax or a flat income tax, but, either way, it should reduce the overall tax burden, tax everyone fairly at the same rate, eliminate the multiple taxation that subjects workers to paying taxes on money when they earn it and again when they save or invest it, and let people simply save.

It's understandably tempting to want the government to protect the little people from the Enrons of the world, but the best way that the government can do so is to undo the policies that allowed so many people to be hurt in the debacle in the first place. As the Enron case makes clear, government is not the solution; government is the problem.

(Leslie Carbone, former director of family tax policy at Family Research Council, is writing a book, Slaying Leviathan: The Moral Imperative of Tax Reform.) Content: 02001000 04010000 09011000 11006000 11008000

REV_00266019

5JC-124

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

Date: 9/5/03

To: Matt Schlapp

From: Strategic Initiatives Karl Rove

- [X] FYI
- [ ] Appropriate Action
- [ ] Direct Response
- [ ] Prepare Response For My Signature
- [ ] Per Our Conversation
- [ ] Let's Discuss
- [ ] Per Your Request
- [ ] Please Return
- [ ] Deadline
- [ ] Other

Comments: _____

REV_00266020

536124

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

Date: 9/5/03

To: Keith Hennessey
From: Strategic Initiatives Karl Rove

____ FYI
____ Appropriate Action
____ Direct Response
____ Prepare Response For My Signature
____ Per Our Conversation
X Let's Discuss
____ Per Your Request
____ Please Return
____ Deadline
____ Other

Comments: _____

_____

_____

REV_00266023

536124

September 3, 2003

MEMORANDUM FOR SUSAN RALSTON

FROM: BJ Goergen

SUBJECT: Arizona and New Mexico Travel

Timeline of Events:

Friday, July 11th	Leonard Rodriguez e-mailed Susan Ralston, Israel Hernandez, BJ Goergen, and Matthew Schlapp to request dates for Karl Rove's participation in fundraisers for the New Mexico GOP and Congressman Renzi (AZ-1).
Thursday, July 17th	Susan Ralston e-mailed Leonard Rodriquez saying Karl Rove was available on the evening of September 12th and the morning of September 13th. Leonard started organizing the events.
Monday, August 11th	Israel Hernandez, Susan Ralston, and BJ Goergen met to discuss Karl Rove's September and October Presidential travel schedule. Israel Hernandez said it was important for Karl Rove to travel with POTUS on September 12th to Georgia and Mississippi, so BJ Goergen called Leonard Rodriguez to determine the possibility of changing the dates of the AZ/NM events to September 19th and 20th.
Tuesday, August 12th	Leonard Rodriguez e-mailed to BJ Goergen that September 19th and 20th worked well for the AZ/NM events. BJ Goergen called Jack Oliver and Kate Walters at BC '04 to confirm that these dates worked for the BC '04 events as well.

	BJ Goergen called Leonard Rodriguez to let him know the campaign was ok with the new date change.
Friday, August 15th	Leonard Rodriguez e-mailed BJ Goergen, Susan Ralston, and Israel Hernandez the line by line for Karl's travel to AZ/NM.
Tuesday, August 19th	In the directors' meeting, Angela Flood brought up the line by line with Karl Rove to make sure he approved. Karl Rove replied that his only concern was that he wanted the people on the ground in Arizona and New Mexico to have enough time to plan the event properly.
Tuesday, September 2nd	Matt Schlapp e-mailed Karl Rove.

HISPANIC RELIGIOUS LEADERS OF SOUTH FLORIDA
September 5, 2003

Via Facsimile
The Honorable Michael K. Powell
Chairman
Federal Communications Commission
445 12th Street, S.W.
Washington, D.C. 20024

Dear Chairman Powell,

On behalf of our fast growing national group of religious leaders representing over 3,000 Hispanic churches, we must express to you our deep regret at what we understand to be the handling of the Univision/HBC merger since requesting to meet with you, our request still denied. We share this with deepest respect and pray for those entrusted with the important responsibility to protect the public interest.

We now understand that in spite of the Third Circuit Court decision to stay the Republican Commissioners' new media ownership rules, you may be insisting upon finalizing approval under the old media ownership rules, rules that you and the other Republican Commissioners had rejected as inappropriate and not in the interests of minorities.

In essence, there appears to be such an overwhelming obsession to do what HBC and Univision demand be done that people whose entire legal and professional careers have been built on integrity and consistency appear to be scrambling to circumvent a Circuit Court order to please non-Hispanic billionaires at the expense of the public interest: 38 million Hispanic Americans. This obsession is so strong that public officials will rely on rules that they themselves deemed inadequate and legally unsupportable.

Our disappointment is furthered by the news that our brothers and sisters in this cause, the fine student leaders and exemplary graduates across America along with the mothers and grandmothers who move our communities have not even had the opportunity to exercise their right to petition the government by securing a meeting with you. We are sincerely grateful for the time that Paul Gallant gave us, but as these important groups have individual points of view that you have not yet heard, it seems appropriate that they be given the right to speak directly to you about the greatest threat that our community's freedom of speech has ever faced in this country before you make a final decision.

While some might say that it is late in the process, please remember that since this process has been conducted in secret with no public hearings, it is new to the citizens that are affected.

CREATIVE BUILDING PRODUCTS
6409 Highview Drive . Fort Wayne, IN . 46818
Tel: 800.830.0245, Tel: 260.432.7158, Fax: 260.459.0929

800.860.2855

NESTABLE COT BUNKER BARRICADE

Product Description:

The Cot Bunker is a uniquely molded plastic unit that is shipped broken down in a nestable mode to conserve space. It requires no tools for assembly, has no loose parts to lose or replace, and does not require any engineering support.

The multi-use Cot Bunker can be deployed both inside and outside of tents. It can be setup directly on the ground or on a hard floor surface. For additional security, individual Cot Bunkers can be placed side by side to construct a ballistic wall that will provide the troops with an excellent Defensive Fighting Position for any threat up to .50 cal M33, .50 cal Armor Piercing and 155 mm shrapnel. When the troops stop to rest and retire to their cot area a full measure of security will be apparent and provide a welcome time to relax, take care of personal needs, or prepare for the next assigned mission.

Tests by an independent lab show the cot bunker will withstand a .50 caliber ball, a .50 caliber Armor Piercing and up to 155 mm fragmentation with no through penetration. Written report provided on request. Great for Defensive Fighting Position or inside small arms target!

Points of Contact:

Mr. J.C. Brown
(260) 432-7158 or (800) 860-2855
(260) 459-0929, fax
E-mail: spirit@soacorp.com

Product Information:

Size:	N/A
Weight Empty:	75 lbs
Weight Full:	2400 lbs
Capacity:	23 cubic feet

F.O.B. - Origin:

Quantity discounts available on retail sales only.
Terms 2% 10, Net 30 Days Standard.
Product Only
Will Accept Government Credit Card

Product Photograph:

Cost Data:

NSN No	Part No.	Color	Retail/Ea.	Gov./Ea.	GSA No.
-	4140	Olive Drab	$481.00	$446.00	-
-	4141	Desert Tan	$481.00	$446.00	-

CREATIVE BUILDING PRODUCTS
6409 Highview Drive . Fort Wayne, IN . 46818
Tel: 800.830.0245, Tel: 260.432.7158, Fax: 260.459.0929

800.860.2855

WATER/SAND FILLED BUNKER/CHECKPOINT

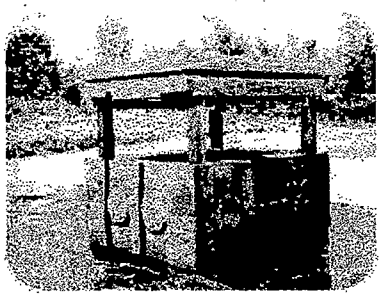
Product Description:

The Bunker/Checkpoint is designed to enable the combat troops to secure and hold the specific objective. The objective can be in various forms of check points, road intersections, airfields, bridges, supply dumps, troop encampments and others in various threat level situations. This unit can be erected quickly and is portable, utilizing the least amount of manpower with very limited engineering support. The 18" of overhead cover and 360 degree protection provides the greatest amount of soldier protection and survivability and enable the troops to take care of themselves quickly and adequately.

The Bunker/Checkpoint is portable, all weather, all terrain and reusable, adapting to any basic terrorism at most threat levels providing exceptional force protection. Relocation is simple, merely remove the media used as ballast, disassemble, and you're ready to deploy. Standard colors are Olive Drab and Desert Tan. An optional bad weather protective cover (P/N 4130) is available. The Bunker comes with all materials and tools necessary for setup and deployment.

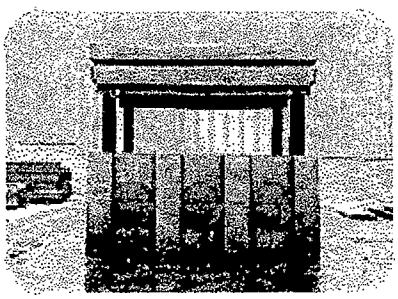
Points of Contact:

Mr. J.C. Brown
(260) 432-7158 or (800) 860-2855
(260) 459-0929, fax
E-mail: spirit@soacorp.com



Product Information:

Size: 7' deep x 9' (W) x 8' (H)
Weight Empty: 1,375 lbs water or 1,495 lbs sand
Weight Full:
Bottom: 8,995 lbs water or 18,792 lbs sand
Top: 5,100 lbs water or 10,710 lbs sand
Gallon Capacity:
Bottom: 1,044 gallons water
Top: 595 gallons water



F.O.B. - Origin:

Quantity discounts available on retail sales only.
Terms 2% 10, Net 30 Days Standard.
Product Only
Will Accept Government Credit Card

Product Photograph:

Sand Filled

Water Filled

Cost Data:

NSN No	Part No.	Color	Retail/Ea.	Gov./Ea.	GSA No.
5419-01-447-4690	4218W	Olive Drab	$5904.00	$4920.00	-
5419-01-450-1758	4219W	Desert Tan	$5904.00	$4920.00	-
5419-01-447-4613	4218S	Olive Drab	$8532.00	$7110.00	-
5419-01-450-1756	4219S	Desert Tan	$8532.00	$7110.00	-

CREATIVE BUILDING PRODUCTS
6409 Highview Drive . Fort Wayne, IN . 46818
Tel: 800.830.0245, Tel: 260.432.7158, Fax: 260.459.0929

800.860.2855

BUNKER/CHECKPOINT PROTECTIVE COVER

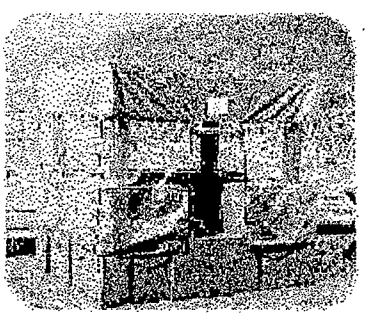
Product Description:

The product is designed to cover the Bunker/Checkpoints and to provide a level of comfort to the troops. If you ever stood a post, you will immediately understand the great benefit of this product. The clear plastic, roll up windows give excellent wind/rain protection and the double zippers allow for easy installation and removal.

Tie straps are sufficient to roll up the cover for fresh air and other uses. Constructed from military specification material makes this a great addition to the force protection. The simple act of keeping rain off the equipment is a very good benefit. Available colors are P/N 4130 Olive Drab and P/N 4131 Desert Tan.

Points of Contact:

Mr. J.C. Brown
(260) 432-7158 or (800) 860-2855
(260) 459-0929, fax
E-mail: spirit@soacorp.com



Product Information:

Size: 7' deep x 9' (W) x 4' (H)
Weight: 48 lbs
Weight Full: N/A
Gallon Capacity: N/A

F.O.B. - Origin:

Quantity discounts available on retail sales only.
Terms 2% 10, Net 30 Days Standard.
Product Only
Will Accept Government Credit Card

Product Photograph:

Cost Data:

NSN No	Part No.	Color	Retail/Ea.	Gov./Ea.	GSA No.
-	4130OD	Olive Drab	$1125.00	$1042.00	-
-	4130DT	Desert Tan	$1125.00	$1042.00	-

CREATIVE BUILDING PRODUCTS
6409 Highview Drive . Fort Wayne, IN . 46818
Tel: 800.830.0245, Tel: 260.432.7158, Fax: 260.459.0929

800.860.2855

BUNKER COVER PERSONNEL PROTECTOR

Product Description:

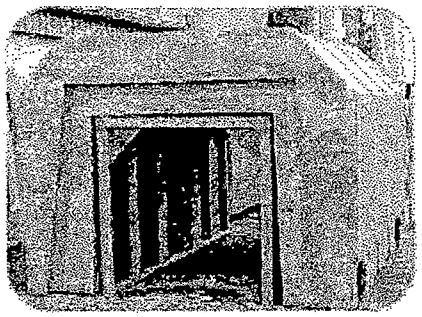
A molded plastic system to mitigate blast and absorb fragmentation, shrapnel and energy as a personal protection enhancement. The molded, plastic, color-safe unit can be installed by hand and filled with sand to create 24 inches of minimum protection.

Quickly deployed and easily recoverable make this an excellent system. The front and rear treatment complete the ability to protect from small arms fire or ricochet. The complete systems includes four (4) segment covers and two (2) end treatments. Colors are Desert Tan and Olive Drab.

Test results are available upon request.

Points of Contact:

Mr. J.C. Brown
(260) 432-7158 or (800) 860-2855
(260) 459-0929, fax
E-mail: spirit@soacorp.com



Product Information:

Size: 30" Deep x 121" (W) x 84 1/2" (H)
Weight Empty: 385 lbs
Weight Full: 9450 lbs
Gallon Capacity: N/A

F.O.B. - Origin:

Quantity discounts available on retail sales only.
Terms 2% 10, Net 30 Days Standard.
Product Only
Will Accept Government Credit Card

Product Photograph:

Cost Data:

NSN No	Part No.	Color	Retail/Ea.	Gov./Ea.	GSA No.
-	12541OD	Olive Drab	$1017.00	$942.00	-
-	12542DT	Desert Tan	$1017.00	$942.00	-

CREATIVE BUILDING PRODUCTS
6409 Highview Drive . Fort Wayne, IN .. 46818
Tel: 800.830.0245, Tel: 260.432.7158, Fax: 260.459.0929

800.860.2855

PERSONNEL PROTECTOR END CAP

Product Description:

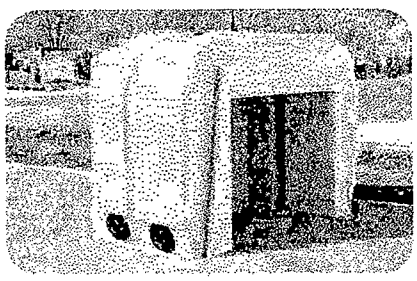
The Roto Molded, Plastic, Safety End Treatment is designed to provide safety from blast and shrapnel. This unit is placed at the entrance of any opening, where blast mitigation or ballast protection is desired.

The fifteen (15) year UV unit is sand filled, eliminating the typical labor of intensive sand bagging. This unit is easily recovered and repositioned, as threat level or operation requirement dictates.

Test results are available upon request.

Points of Contact:

Mr. J.C. Brown
(260) 432-7158 or (800) 860-2855
(260) 459-0929, fax
E-mail: spirit@soacorp.com



Product Information:

Size: 36" Deep x 121" (W) x 84 1/2" (T)
Weight Empty: 385 lbs
Weight Full: 15,800 lbs
Capacity: 150 cubic feet
Gallon Capacity: N/A

F.O.B. - Origin:

Quantity discounts available on retail sales only.
Terms 2% 10, Net 30 Days Standard.
Product Only
Will Accept Government Credit Card

Product Photograph:

Cost Data:

NSN No	Part No.	Color	Retail/Ea.	Gov./Ea.	GSA No.
-	12543OD	Olive Drab	$906.00	$788.00	-
-	12544DT	Desert Tan	$906.00	$788.00	-

CREATIVE BUILDING PRODUCTS
6409 Highview Drive . Fort Wayne, IN . 46818
Tel: 800.830.0245, Tel: 260.432.7158, Fax: 260.459.0929

800.860.2855

PORTABLE GUARD TOWER

Product Description:

The Portable Guard Tower is sold as a complete unit which includes one Guard Tower, one Conex Box and one pallet (75 coils or 3750 ft) of Concertina wire. The Guard Tower itself is manufactured with four seperate wall units that allow for quick and easy assembly on top of the standard Conex Box. Once placed on the Conex Box the Guard Tower will be approximately 12 feet in the air, giving the guards a greater view of the perimeter or area of threat. Once in position, the walls are filled from the top using sand as ballast. The sand filled walls provide the guards inside with 360 degrees of protection from 9mm, 5.56, and 7.62 threats. 12" dumps are provided for easy removal of the ballast allowing the Guard Tower to be repositioned as needed.

The overhead cover is 3/4" plywood on which lights, sensors, and antannae can be installed if desired. Access to the cover can be reached through a hatch type door that is pre-installed for convenience. The CBP Guard Tower eliminates the time and the mess associated with using sandbags. This product is a recoverable asset that can be broken down and deployed inside the Conex Box.

All parts and tools needed for assembly are included in the kit bag. Stakes are also provided for the Concertina Wire installation. The standard colors for the Portable Guard Tower are Olive Drab or Desert Tan; however, all colors are available upon request.

Points of Contact:

Mr. J.C. Brown
(260) 432-7158 or (800) 860-2855
(260) 459-0929, fax
E-mail: spirit@soacorp.com

Product Information:

Size:	Approx 12' in the air
Additional Sizes:	Base is 48" (H) and Cover is 48" (H)
Total Weight:	4652 lbs approx.
Weight Conex:	2700 lbs
Weight Tower:	1000
Weight Wire:	952 lbs

F.O.B. - Origin:

Quantity discounts available on retail sales only.
Terms 2% 10, Net 30 Days Standard.
Product Only
Will Accept Government Credit Card

Product Photograph:

Cost Data:

NSN No.	Part No.	Color	Gov./Ea.
Guard Tower	9672OD-GT	Olive Drab	$3722.72
Guard Tower	9672DT-GT	Desert Tan	$3722.72
Conex Box	9672OD-CB	Olive Drab	$4795.00
Conex Box	9672DT-CB	Desert Tan	$4795.00
Concertine Wire	9672CW	Silver	$2101.60
Complete Unit	9672	OD or DT	$10,618.82

CLEAR SKIES
VPDATE

536124

Hernandez, Israel

From: Estes, John D.
Sent: Friday, September 05, 2003 7:42 PM
To: Hernandez, Israel; Willeford, Emily; Jackson, Barry S.; Westine, Lezlee J.; Bearson, Darren W.; 'dbearson@georgewbush.com'
Cc: Stolpe, Elizabeth A.
Subject: WV Clear Skies Venues

The following is a list of venues that we have been able to identify for the September 16 Clear Skies Event. OPL and CEQ believes that the best legislative location for the President to travel would be the Charleston site at the Kanawha Manufacturing Company. This company will benefit the most by passage of Clear Skies and will more than likely increase jobs when the bill passes.

Note: OPA has identified that the Vice President will be in Charleston on the 15th for a Fundraiser for Congresswoman Capito, and have heard that James Carville and Terry McAuliffe will be in town on the 16th for a Fundraiser for the West Virginia State Democrat Party.

State and local support: IGA is still waiting to hear back from state and local officials and should have something for us early next week. Below the three venues I have listed several elected officials that Congresswoman Capito's office sent over as possible supporters of Clear Skies. OPA would like to double check with IGA before signing off, but it is a good start for us on support.

Vetting: EPA has signed off on the Charleston and Huntington site, but we are still waiting to hear back on the Mineral Wells location. Also scheduling/vetting has not had a chance to vet the locations, but they will check them over the weekend and get back to us.

If you have any questions please call me on my cell phone PRA 6

JD

Charleston, West Virginia

Kanawha Manufacturing Company has been serving the power, coal, and metals industries since 1902. From the '40s through the '60s, Kanawha designed and built coal tipples, or preparation plants where coal is cleaned and sized before it is shipped. Kanawha Mfg. Co. started business in 1902 building mine cars for the coal mines in West Virginia. Early products included boilers for industrial heaters, all kinds of coal handling equipment, and even farm tractors. Since the '60s, Kanawha has expanded into the power generation aftermarket for both products and maintenance services. Kanawha offers a complete line of replacement parts for the fossil power industry. In addition, they can rebuild most wear components.
Kanawha provides maintenance and installation services in power plants. From the coal yard to the stack, they repair, rebuild, or replace just about everything that wears out in a power plant. Kanawha makes pollution control equipment components (scrubbers, etc.). Clients include American Electric Power, Con Edison.

Business

- Non-unionized

- Family owned and operated company in its 4th generation of management
- 187 employees working in two shops

Clear Skies Impact: The Clear Skies mandated emission reductions will require a substantial investment in pollution control equipment by the coal-fired power generators. Kanawha will benefit by maintaining or even increasing production of their pollution control equipment components business. The current Clean Air Act regulatory scheme would likely decrease their business as coal fired plants repower to natural gas or shut down. Kanawha has very small air emissions so they would not be directly affected by the attainment status of their county (Kanawha County will come into attainment with new PM air quality standards in 2010 and 2020 just because of Clear Skies).

Huntington, West Virginia

J.H. Fletcher controls approximately 95% of the domestic roof bolting business for underground coal mines. The company provides similar equipment for copper, gold and other minerals mined underground. Roof bolting machines go into an area after the coal has been extracted to drill into the rock layers comprising the roof of the mine to insert the metal rods and bolts that bind the rock layers together to provide a stable and safe area in which to work. Liability coverage is significant for the company because roof bolting machinery goes into area that is unstable. New companies are reluctant to enter the business because of the liability. J.H. Fletcher has remained in the business even with the significant costs for liability coverage.

Business

- 185 employees grown moderately over last 10 years

  2 machine shops in town are exclusive supplier – 50 additional employees
- $35 -50 million in sales – about 15% is overseas business
- Private company, non-unionized
- Currently manufacturing equipment for salt, limestone and coal mines in the U.S. and coal mines in South Africa and copper mines in Poland.

Committed to Manufacturing in the U.S.

- Hired 14 new people in 2002 to enter 2-3 year in-house training program. When the market declined, kept individuals in the training program. Committed to long-term training and employee development for the company
- Created a new division last year for industrial minerals, which company sees as a significant growth area for them

Clear Skies Impact: The goal of Clear Skies is to get mandatory emission reductions while preserving the use of coal for electricity generation. Fletcher will benefit from Clear Skies by maintaining or increasing their coal mine equipment production due to continued coal use. Fletcher does not have significant air emissions so they would not benefit directly from the attainment status of their county. (Cabell County comes into attainment with new PM air quality standards just because of Clear Skies in 2010 and 2020.)

REV_00266038

Mineral Wells, West Virginia

Benson International located just outside of Parkersburg has been building steel and aluminum dump truck bodies for 40 years. Benson International has product lines that include steel and aluminum dump trailers, all aluminum platform trailers, steel drop deck trailers, 35 to 70 ton lowboy trailers, moving floor and refuse trailers, custom non-pneumatic dry bulk hopper trailers, specialized equipment trailers and logging trailers. Benson International is considered one of the largest custom trailer and body builders in the business.

Business

- Employee owned business
- 80 employees
- Non-unionized

Clear Skies Impact: One-third of Benson's business is related to the coal industry. Benson will benefit from Clear Skies by maintaining or increasing their coal transport equipment production due to continued coal use for electricity generation under Clear Skies. Benson does not have significant air emissions so they would not benefit directly from the attainment status of their county. (Wood County comes into attainment with new PM air quality standards just because of Clear Skies in 2010 and 2020.)

From Congresswoman Capito's Office - Supportive Local Elected Officials in these areas include:

State Senators:
Vic Sprouse
Steve Harrison
Karen Facemyer
Lisa Smith
Donna Boley
Frank Deem

State Delegates:
Mike Hall
Patty Schoen
Ann Calvert
Tim Armstead
Rusty Webb
Ron Walters
Bob Ashley
Mitch Carmichael
Larry Border

County Commissioners:
Putnam -- Jim Caruthers and Steve Andes
Kanawha -- Hoppy Shores
Mason -- Bob Baird
Jackson - Jim Waybright

REV_00266039

Mayors :
Charleston -- Danny Jones
South Charleston -- Richie Robb
St. Albans -- Richard Milam
Hurricane -- Raymond Peak

Charleston city council:
Minority Leader -- Tom Lane

Kanawha County Board of Education:
Board Member -- Becky Jordan

REV_00266040

536124

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

Date: 9/8/03

To: Matt Schlapp & Brad Hester

From: Strategic Initiatives Susan Ralston

____ FYI

✓ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

____ Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: _____

_____

_____

AmeriCorps Chronology

President Bush strongly supports AmeriCorps. In both his 2003 and 2004 budgets, he called on Congress to expand AmeriCorps by 50 percent to 75,000 members annually. He also requested and received $64 million in the 2003 wartime supplemental for the National Service Trust, the fund that pays the education awards for AmeriCorps members who complete their service. Last April he proposed a Citizen Service Act reauthorization bill to extend and reform AmeriCorps and other programs of the Corporation. Following is a chronology of Presidential actions and key events related to AmeriCorps.

January 2002	President Bush calls on every American to give two years of service over their lifetime and creates USA Freedom Corps to foster a culture of service, responsibility and citizenship and help Americans answer the President's call to service.
February 2002	President submits fiscal 2003 budget request for Corporation for National and Community Service for $1,035 billion, an increase of $297 million (+40%), above enacted levels for fiscal year 2002. This budget proposes to expand AmeriCorps by 50% to enroll 75,000 members per year.
April 2002	President unveils "Principles and Reforms for a Citizen Service Act" to guide the reauthorization of the Corporation and its programs AmeriCorps, Senior Corps, and Learn and Serve America. The President's proposal would extend programs for 5 years and make them more accountable and effective and responsive to local needs. Principles lead to bipartisan legislation being introduced in May, 2002.
June 2002	Citizen Service Act passes House Education and Workforce Act with broad bipartisan support.
July 2002	Sec. Ridge announces grants to involve AmeriCorps members in homeland security efforts in law enforcement, public health, and disaster relief and preparedness.
October 2002	Corporation discovers that there may not be sufficient funding in National Service Trust to support all the positions it approved for 2002-03 program year. Several factors led to this situation, including a surge of enrollments in the wake of 9/11, longstanding lack of clear accounting guidelines for the Trust, and inadequate procedures for reconciling positions with available Trust funding.
November 2002	Corporation implements an enrollment pause until additional funds are appropriated to the Trust.
January 2003	Corporation institutes comprehensive set of new procedures for awarding AmeriCorps grants and monitoring AmeriCorps enrollments to ensure timely reporting and tracking of member enrollments.
January 2003	President urges Congress to pass Citizen Service Act in State of the Union Address.
February 2003	President submits fiscal 2004 budget request to Congress, which again proposes to increase AmeriCorps to 75,000 members per year.

February 2003	Congress passes the omnibus fiscal 2003 appropriations bill with funding for AmeriCorps that is far short of the President's request. While a slight increase over 2002, the bill reduces AmeriCorps Grants by 30%, rescinds $48 million in unspent funds from prior year balances, and places a cap limiting fiscal 2003 enrollments in the National Service Trust to 50,000 members, including the approximately 20,000 positions affected by the enrollment pause.
March 2003	President Bush requests $64 million to provide for prior-year obligations for education awards in the National Service Trust.
March 2003	AmeriCorps lifts enrollment pause, allowing AmeriCorps grantees to enroll members in approximately 20,000 positions previously approved in the 2002 grant cycle and supported by fiscal year 2003 Trust appropriations.
April 2003	GAO releases legal opinion stating that the Corporation must use a far more conservative method of accounting for the Trust than OMB recommended.
April 2003	President signs Public Law 108-11, the Emergency Wartime Supplemental Appropriations Act, which includes language providing up to $64 million to cover obligations previously incurred in National Service Trust.
May 2003	OMB issues legal opinion disagreeing with GAO stating that the Corporation may use estimates of enrollment and earning rates.
July 2003	President Bush signs into law the Strengthen AmeriCorps Program Act, which establishes accounting guidelines for the Trust that will enable AmeriCorps to increase grant levels in all categories in 2003.
July 2003	Corporation issues new set of grants based on Strengthen AmeriCorps Program Act accounting guidelines. The Corporation expects to support the maximum possible number of 50,000 positions, consisting of 30,000 new positions and 20,000 positions approved last year but delayed by the enrollment pause.
July 2003	Corporation announces new leadership, including new Chief Operating Officer James Manning and intent to nominate David Eisner as CEO.
July 2003	President proposes fiscal 2003 supplemental limited to emergency funds to support disaster response, firefighting, and shuttle recovery operations.
July 2003	Senate passes by 71-21 margin a fiscal 2003 supplemental appropriation of $100 million for an additional 20,000 new AmeriCorps positions. House rejects this request. $100 million is still pending in Legislative Branch appropriations conference, but is unlikely to be passed with this funding in it.
July 2003	House subcommittee passes fiscal 2004 VA-HUD bill that for the first time since the mid-1990s includes funding for AmeriCorps. White House SAP expresses disappointment that the bill is $119 million or 20 percent below the President's request ($79 million below the President's request for AmeriCorps) and would only support 55,000 members, not the 75,000 the President requested.
September 2003	Senate appropriations committee passes VA-HUD bill that sets the expectation that AmeriCorps will reach 75,000 members in FY 2004, provides flexibility to reach that goal, but underfunds the President's request for AmeriCorps by $93 million.

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY
HEADQUARTERS, 3D INFANTRY DIVISION (MECHANIZED) AND FORT STEWART
954 WILLIAM H. WILSON AVENUE
FORT STEWART, GEORGIA 31314-3418

REPLY TO ATTENTION OF

AFZP-CG

MEMORANDUM THRU

Commander, V CORPS, Unit 91402 APO, AE 093002
Commander, Combined Forces Land Component Command (CFLLCC) APO, AE 09304
Commander, US Central Command(CENTCOM), 7115 S. Boundary Blvd. McDill Air Force Base, Florida 33621-5101

FOR Commander, PERSCOM, ATTN: TAPC-PDA

SUBJECT: Recommendation for the 3D Infantry Division (Mechanized) (and attached units) for the Presidential Unit Citation

1. I strongly recommend the 3D Infantry Division (Mechanized) (attached units) for the Presidential Unit Citation.

2. The performance of the division in these operations was exemplary and deserves the highest praise and recognition.

3. Proposed Citation:

THE 3D INFANTRY DIVISION (MECHANIZED) DISTINGUISHED ITSELF BY EXCEPTIONALLY MERITORIOUS SERVICE DURING COMBAT OPERATIONS IN IRAQ FROM 20 MARCH 2003 TO 29 JULY 2003. DURING THIS PERIOD THE DIVISION ADVANCED OVER 750 KILOMETERS INTO ENEMY TERRITORY AND DECISIVELY WON EVERY ENGAGEMENT OF EVERY BATTLE, AGAINST MORE THAN FIVE IRAQI DIVISION; SUSTAINED RELATIVELY FEW CASUALTIES AND ACHIEVED ONE OF THE MOST ONE- SIDED VICTORIES IN MILITARY HISTORY. THE DIVISION BOLDLY ADVANCED INTO THE HEART OF BAGHDAD AND ULTIMATELY REMOVED THE BRUTAL IRAQI REGIME FROM POWER: AND RAPIDLY TRANSITIONED TO ENFORCE LAW AND ORDER AND HELP REBUILD A SHATTERED NATION. THE ACTIONS OF THE DIVISION'S SOLDIERS, AND THOSE OF THE UNITS IN SUPPORT OF THEM, DESERVE THE HIGHEST RECOGNITION AND ARE IN KEEPING WITH THE FINEST TRADITIONS OF THE 3D INFATNRY DIVISION (MECHANIZED), "ROCK OF THE MARNE", AND UNITED STATES ARMY.

AFZP- CG
SUBJECT: Recommendation for the 3D Infantry Division (Mechanized) (and attached units) for the Presidential Unit Citation

4. Point of contact for the request is CPT Charles E. Hall, 767-5857.

4 Encls
1. Narrative
2. Casualty List
3. Task Organization
4. Proposed Citation

BUFORD C. BLOUNT
MG, USA
Commanding

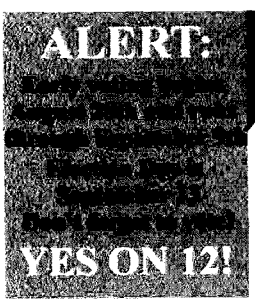
REV_00266048

F: 536124

TALKER (GWOT)

- CANNOT LET FUNDING BECOME DRIVER IN PROSECUTION OF WAR EFFORT

- SO FAR FROM AN ARMY VIEW
  - ✓MILPERS PAY
  - ✓OPERATING TEMPO & ENABLERS
  - ❑RESETING THE FORCE FOR 5026 (SWIFTLY DEFEAT THE EFFORT)
  - ❑SOLDIER SUPPORT ITEMS



- NO CHECK MEANS ....AT RISK
  - MUST BE READY TO FIGHT IN KOREA & MUST BE READY FOR ALL SUBSEQUENT ROTATIONS TO SWA (IRAQ & AFGANISTAN)
  - ALL SOLDIERS MUST BE SIMILARILY EQUIPPED WITH BEST STUFF WE HAVE...OWE IT TO THEM & THEIR FAMILIES....OWE IT TO THE NATION

REV_00266049

F: Yes on 12

536124

Yes on 12 Committee

Sign up for E-Mail Updates! Please Enter your email address

Sign Up!

View The Yes on 12 Commercial

View the Yes on 12 Television Commercial

President Bush Backs Medical Lawsuit Relief

"We understand a person who has been harmed by a bad doctor deserves his or her day in court. Yet, the system should not reward lawyers who are fishing for rich settlements. Because frivolous lawsuits drive up the cost of health care, they affect the federal budget. Therefore, medical liability reform is a national issue that requires a national solution."

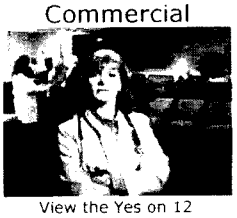
--President George W. Bush
Houston, Texas
June 10, 2003

Copyright 2003 YES ON 12 | Site Map | Contact Info

Political Advertisement Paid for by Yes on 12 Specific Purpose Committee

PMB 704, Post Office Box 2013, Austin, TX 78768

REV_00266050



Yes on 12 Committee

Sign up for E-Mail Updates!
Please Enter your email address

Sign Up!

View The Yes on 12 Commercial

View the Yes on 12 Television Commercial

President Bush Backs Medical Lawsuit Relief

"We understand a person who has been harmed by a bad doctor deserves his or her day in court. Yet, the system should not reward lawyers who are fishing for rich settlements. Because frivolous lawsuits drive up the cost of health care, they affect the federal budget. Therefore, medical liability reform is a national issue that requires a national solution."

--President George W. Bush
Houston, Texas
July 10, 2003

Copyright 2003 YES ON 12 | Site Map | Contact Info

Political Advertisement Paid for by Yes on 12 Specific Purpose Committee
PMB 304 Post Office Box 2013, Austin, TX 78768

REV_00266051

536124

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

OFFICE OF THE SENIOR ADVISOR

202-456-2369

202-456-0191 FAX

FACSIMILE TRANSMITTAL SHEET

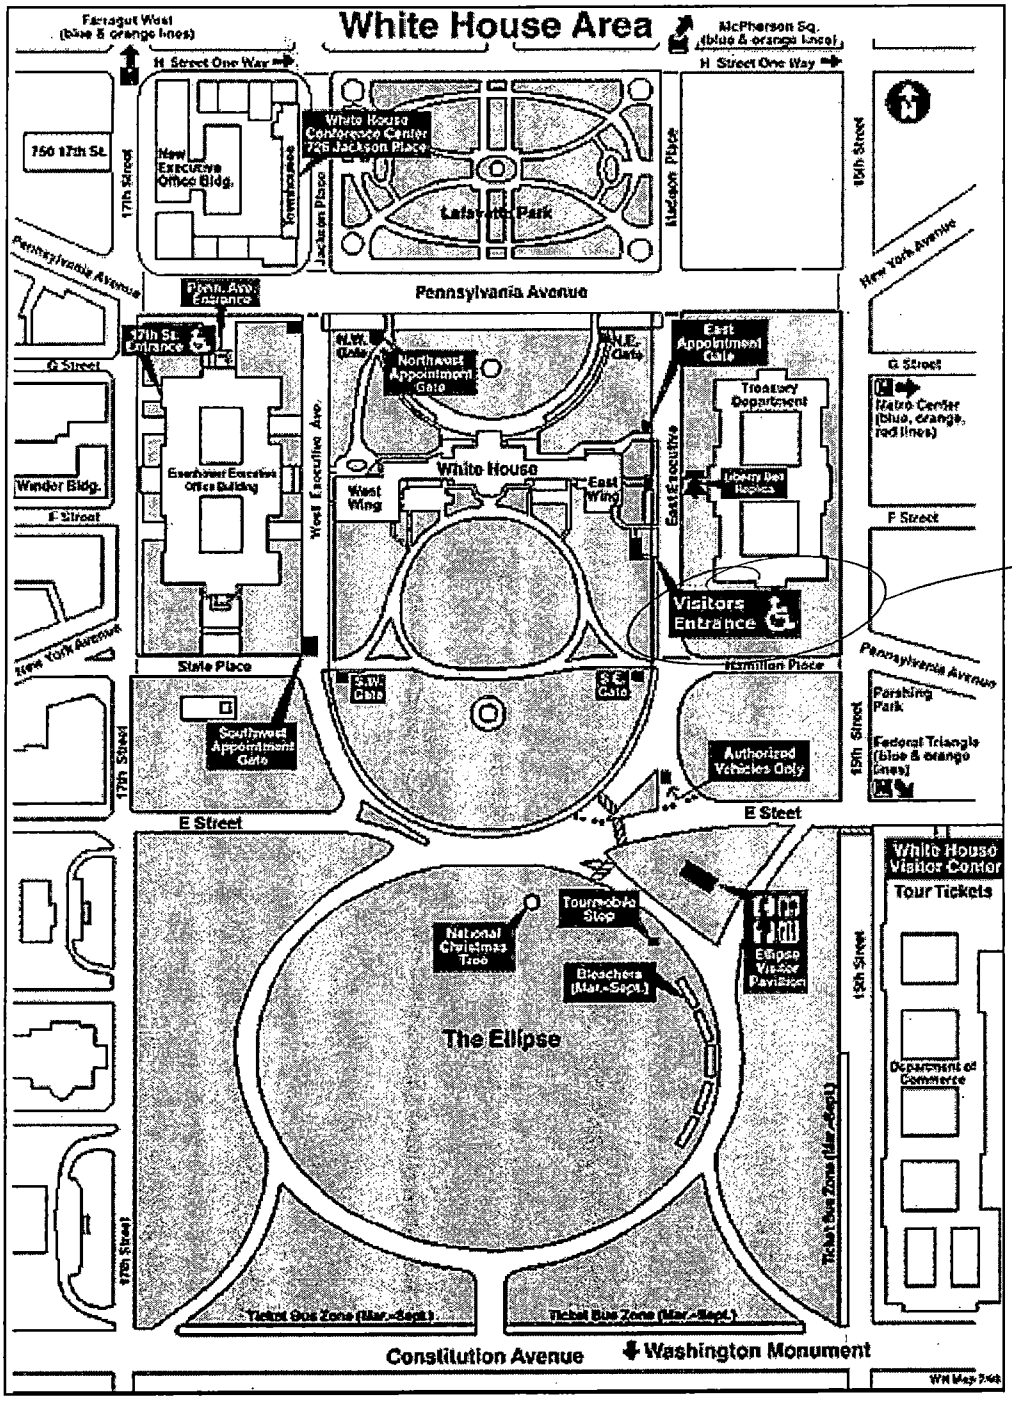
TO: Sherill Whisenand	FROM: Melissa Cathleen Danforth MCD
COMPANY:	DATE: SEPTEMBER 9, 2003
PRA 6	TOTAL NO. OF PAGES INCLUDING COVER: 3
	SENDER'S PHONE NUMBER: (202) 456-7375
RE: Tour Request - Approved	SENDER'S FAX NUMBER: 202-456-0191

☐ URGENT ☐ FOR REVIEW ☐ PLEASE COMMENT ☐ PLEASE REPLY ☐ PLEASE RECYCLE

Sherill,

The White House tour request has been approved for October 24, 2003 at 10:00am.

Attached are detailed instructions for the day of the tour. Please note the important point of not bringing anything to the White House but a photo ID. We apologize for the inconvenience, but it is essential that this rule is followed.



If you or any of the participants have any questions, please do not hesitate to contact me directly at the phone number above. Thank you again for your help.

Office of the Senior Advisor

Directions for a White House Mansion Tour

- Arrive at the Southeast Visitor's Entrance Gate Located on the Provided Map
    - Report to the Southeast/ Visitor's Entrance gate 15 minutes before 10:00 AM.
    - The guard at the gate will have your name on a list, but you must provide a valid form of photo identification, such a driver's license, for all those over 15 years old.
    - You may not bring bags or cameras of any kind – please do not arrive with them, as the Secret Service has prohibited any bag or coat check. (This includes handbags/purses and all personal bags; bring only a photo ID)

SE Gate

- If any further assistance is needed please contact our office at (202)-456-7375

Staff Tour Request Form
White House Visitors Office
Fax: 6-3623

Today's Date: September 4, 2003

Sponsor Code: SI
Staff Member's Name: Karl Rove
Office: Senior Advisor's Office
Phone/Fax: 6-2369/6-0191

Tour Information
Date(s) Requested: Preference: October 24, 2003
Option B: October 23, 2003

Number of People: Seven (7)

Security information for each guest

Name	DOB	SS#
John Edward Whisenand	PRA 6
Holly Scharf Whisenand
Bryn Logan Whisenand
Ronald H. Short
Claudia Schalk Short
Katherine Anne Short
Sarah Elizabeth Short

Request is: X confirmed for 10/24/03.
___ not available.

Time: 10:00 a.m.

Response sent on 9/5/03 by KM.

Instructions for Staffers Requesting Tours

1. One staff member may escort up to 6 people a day, space permitting, Tuesdays through Saturdays at 10:00 a.m. The staffer should personally know the guests he/she is escorting.

2. Staff members must submit requests through their office contact using the following form via fax to the White House Visitors Office (202-456-2370) no later than 10 days before the requested date of the tour.

3. The Visitors Office will return the fax to you as soon as possible, notifying you of the availability of the tour.

4. Changes to the security forms can be made no less than one week prior to the tour date.

5. The information will then be processed by White House security and clearance will be determined.

6. You will then be responsible for contacting your guests and confirming the tour date and time. Please inform your guests of all the new rules and security procedures.

7. Staffers and their guests should arrive at the south side of East Executive Avenue OUTSIDE THE SOUTHEAST GATE at least 15 minutes before their scheduled tour time. Please do not suggest meeting your party inside the gate, for guests will not be allowed on East Executive Avenue without the pass holder.

8. All guests age 15 and up will need to show photo identification with information exactly matching the name previously submitted for clearance. Individuals whose identification does not exactly match the name or data cleared for entry may be denied admittance.

9. Prohibited items include, but are not limited to, the following: handbags, book bags, backpacks, purses, food and beverages of any kind, tobacco products, personal grooming items (make up, hair brush or comb, lip or hand lotions, etc.), strollers, any pointed objects (pens, knitting needles, etc.), aerosol containers, cameras, video recorders or any type of recording device, guns, ammunition, fireworks, electric stun guns, mace, martial arts weapons/devices, or knives of any size.

   The U.S. Secret Service reserves the right to prohibit any other personal items. Neither the White House nor the U.S. Secret Service will provide coat or package check facilities.

10. All persons and items entering the White House will be screened through a security process. Individuals may be requested to consent to an interview or additional security procedures before they are admitted to the White House complex.

Records Management, White House Office of (ORM)
Subject Files

FG006-27
(Office of Senior Advisors - Karl Rove)

538065

OA/NARA #: 10745/10803
9/21

Box _____
Folder _____

REV_00266058

2018-0011-P [ ]

Systematic Processing Marker

This is not a textual record. This Systematic Processing Marker indicates that material has been removed during systematic processing by George W. Bush Presidential Library staff.

Stack:	Row:	Sect.:	Shelf:	Pos.:	FRC ID:	Location or Hollinger ID:	NARA Number:	OA Number:
11	4	10	11		9721

Folder Title:
ORM
FG006-27
538065

Revised 10A
Adopted by Voice Vote 08/13/02

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

KENTUCKY BAR ASSOCIATION
SECTION OF LITIGATION
STANDING COMITTEE ON FEDERAL JUDICIAL IMPROVEMENTS

REPORT TO THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES

RECOMENDATION

RESOLVED, that the prompt filling of existing judicial vacancies in the federal courts of the United States is essential for the efficient, responsible, and effective administration of justice; and that undue delays in the nomination and confirmation of candidates for vacancies in the federal courts of the United States adversely affects such effective, responsible and timely administration of justice;

FURTHER RESOLVED, that the American Bar Association urges the following:

1. The president of the United States should promptly nominate candidates to fill vacancies in the federal courts of the United States.

2. The Senate Committee on the Judiciary should promptly act on nominees,

3. The Senate of the United States should promptly advise and consent to or reject the nominees.

FURTHER RESOLVED, that the American Bar Association urges its members and state, local and territorial bar associations to encourage the President to make prompt appointments to fill federal judicial vacancies and to contact the appropriate members of the Senate to urge prompt hearings and votes on pending nominations for the federal courts of the United States.

REPORT

Introduction

This report will be short on rhetoric and long on statistics. The number of judicial vacancies in the federal courts was termed "alarming" by the Chief Justice of the United States in his 2001 Year-End Report on the Federal Judiciary.[1] President George W. Bush, a Republican, began making judicial nominations on May 9, 2001. The Senate, controlled since June 2001 (after reorganization) by the Democrats, was responsible for the confirmation process. This process includes control of the setting of hearings at the Senate Judiciary Committee and control of the calendar of consent proceedings in the United States Senate as a whole. As noted by the Chief Justice, "When the Senate adjourned on December 20th [2001], 23 court of appeals nominees and 14 district court nominees were left awaiting action by the Judiciary Committee or the full Senate,"[2]

The Present State of Affairs

Since the beginning of this year, the same delay in holding hearings and acting upon the nominees has continued: By July 19, 2002, President Bush nominated (or

---

[1] Hereinafter referred to as "2001 Year-End Report."

[2] Ibid. at p. 3.

REV_00266062

renominated) a total of 113 prospective Article III judges,[3] 59 of whom have been confirmed by the Senate. Here is the complete breakdown on pending nominations as of July 19, 2002:

- Total nominations pending before the Senate:
  - 21 Circuit Court
  - 32 District Court
  - 4 Claims Court
  - 1 International Trade Court.
- Nominations pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee awaiting a hearing:
  - 16 Circuit Court
  - 19 District Court
  - 4 Claims Court
  - 1 International Trade Court.
- Nominations pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee awaiting a vote:
  - 1 Circuit Court
  - 5 District Court
- Nominations scheduled for a hearing:
  - 0 Circuit Court

[3] Also nominated were four nominees for the U.S. Court of Claims and one for the International Trade Court.

REV_00266063

- 0 District Court
- 0 Claims Court

- Nominations pending before the full Senate awaiting a vote:
  - 3 Circuit Court
  - 12 District Court
- Nominations Confirmed by the Senate:
  - 11 Circuit Court
  - 48 District court.[4]

As of July 19, 2002, there were 91 existing Article III federal judicial vacancies. Of these 91 vacancies, 29 are circuit seats and 62 are district seats. These 91 vacancies constitute 10.6 percent of the federal judiciary. Thirty-five of the 91 vacancies are so-called "judicial emergency" vacancies. Twenty-six nominees pending are for positions designated as "judicial emergency" vacancies.[5] Nothing has changed.

Indeed, data recently released by the bipartisan Constitution Project at Georgetown University and Professor Wendy Martinek of Binghampton University, points out that in the first year of President George W. Bush's term in office, successful

---

[4] Figures are taken from the website of the U. S. Department of Justice's Office of Legal Policy. For a review of that site and the information on federal judicial vacancies and confirmations, see www.usdoj.gov/olp/judicialnominations.htm.

[5] The formulation by which a judicial vacancy is determined to be a "judicial emergency" is quite convoluted: In its simplest format any court with more than one authorized judgeship and only one active judge has a "judicial emergency."

REV_00266064

nominees took an average of 112 days from nomination to confirmation. On May 9, 2002, the anniversary of his first judicial nominations, President Bush met with members of the Senate Judiciary Committee to take stock of the situation. Of the 11 circuit court nominees who were named 365 days previously, only 3 had been granted hearings at the Senate Judiciary Committee. Nothing came of the meeting.[6] Those 8 have still not had hearings.[7] By July 19, 2002, President Bush had nominated 32 individuals to serve on circuit courts, but only 11 were confirmed, for a confirmation rate of less than 35 percent. Finally, there are more judicial vacancies today than when President Bush took office.

---

6 White House Press Release, May 9, 2002.

7 See footnote 4 above.

REV_00266065

The Damage

The purpose of this Report and Resolution is not to excoriate either Democrats or Republicans; as the Chief Justice has pointed out, in the second term of President Clinton, a Democrat, the Senate, then controlled by Republicans, confirmed only 17 judges in 1996 and 36 in 1997.[8] The fact is that whoever may bear responsibility for delays in the process, it is the federal courts that suffer, and so does the rule of law. As noted recently by Senator Arlen Specter in a published letter in Legal Times, "filling vacancies is the most pressing issue facing our lower courts – due to the correlation between judicial vacancies and delays in processing cases."[9] The Senator goes on to cite examples of hardship arising from the present situation:

- 50% vacancy rate on the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals, resulting in a death penalty appeal left pending for eight years, and a plaintiff in a civil case dying after having waited more than 15 months just to have an oral argument in a job discrimination suit.

- More than a quarter of the seats vacant in the 4th Circuit court of Appeals despite four declared judicial emergencies and one seat vacant for eight years. A municipality in South Carolina is waiting 39 months for clarification of the constitutionality of a municipal ordinance. A maritime Longshoremen's Act claim has been pending for 38 months.[10]

---

[8] See Report of the Chief Justice, 1997 Year End Report on the Federal Judiciary at p. 8..

[9] Senator Arlen Specter, "Let's Agree on a Timely Basis," Legal Times, July 8, 2002.

[10] Ibid.

REV_00266066

A real possibility arising from the often lengthy and unpleasant nature of the confirmation process is that successful lawyers in private practice will become reluctant to serve. As the Chief Justice notes, "for lawyers coming directly from private practice, there is both a strong financial disincentive and the possibility of losing clients in the course of the wait for a confirmation vote."[11] We simply cannot lose this component from the reservoir of available and willing candidates for judicial office. In the words of the Chief Justice, "The Senate ought to act with reasonable promptness and to vote each nominee up or down. The Senate is not, of course, obliged to confirm any particular nominee. But it ought to act on each nominee and to do so within a reasonable time."[12] We respectfully agree: Vote them up or down, but don't hang them out to dry.

Prior House of Delegates Action

As noted above, the situation arising from the state of judicial vacancies is not unique to our time, and the House has dealt with it previously: In February 1990, at its Mid-Year Meeting, the House passed Report No. 8F, sponsored by the Virgin Islands Bar Association and the Standing Committee on Judicial Selection, Tenure, and Compensation. The Resolution, inter alia, urged "the President of the United States to expedite the appointment to vacancies existing in the United States judicial system and that the Senate take prompt action in considering confirmation of such nominees."

---

[11] 2001 Year-End Report, p. 4.

REV_00266067

In 1998, at the Mid-Year Meeting, the House passed Report No. 8A, sponsored by numerous bar associations and Sections. The Resolution, inter alia, urged, "the President of the United States promptly to advance nominations for current vacancies for federal judicial positions and the Senate of the United States to hear and vote on those nominations in an expeditious manner."

In October of 1997, at a meeting of the Board of Governors attended by Senator Patrick Leahy, now Chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, the Board approved the following Resolution:

> Resolved, That the Board of Governors of the American Bar Association, which includes members of both political parties, urges the United States Senate promptly to hear and vote on pending nominations for United States District Courts and Courts of Appeal.
>
> Further Resolved, That such action is essential for the effective and efficient administration of justice in the United States.

The present report recognizes the existence of the prior actions by the House and the Board of Governors. We believe, however, the present resolution is required by the emergency situation existent in the federal courts. In addition, the present resolution focuses with greater emphasis on the role of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary as a cause of the blockage in the confirmation process: The notion that that Committee, by the simple expedient of refusing to hold timely hearings may avoid confirmation proceedings in the full Senate, is simply unacceptable to our notion of an appropriate and constitutional nomination process.

---

[12] Id. At p. 3.

REV_00266068

Finally, this resolution is presently timely because Report No. 112, which will be considered by the House at the August 2002 Session, and presented by ABA member C. Boyden Gray, contains unsatisfactory language which can only be overcome by House approval of the present resolution. The most unacceptable portion of the Gray Report is its insistence upon urging that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary clear nominees for a full Senate vote within a specific time period. We believe that urging such a requirement upon a full committee of the Senate by the ABA is, to say the least, presumptuous. Note that Senator Specter, in the protocol he would require of the Senate Committee requests precisely such a time limitation. We believe Senator Specter's proposal is a reasonable one for a United States Senator who is himself a Member of that Committee.

REV_00266069

Records Management, White House Office of (ORM)
Subject Files

FG006-27
(Office of the Senior Advisor - Karl Rove)

538438

OA/NARA #: 107446/10804
9722

Box ____
Folder ____

REV_00266070

2018-0011-P [ ]

Systematic Processing Marker

This is not a textual record. This Systematic Processing Marker indicates that material has been removed during systematic processing by George W. Bush Presidential Library staff.

Stack:	Row:	Sect.:	Shelf:	Pos.:	FRC ID:	Location or Hollinger ID:	NARA Number:	OA Number:
	11	4	6	2	9722

Folder Title: ORM
FG006-27
538438

538438
FG006-27

Keith Hennessey
10/17/2002 04:51:32 PM

Record Type: Record

To: Karl C. Rove/WHO/EOP@EOP, Ken Mehlman/WHO/EOP@EOP, Kirk Blalock/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:

Subject: can we do something with this?

Mr. REID. ... I have great respect for the AARP. It is a great organization, but they don't run the Senate or this country. There are many people in the State of Nevada, and all over the country, who badly need this Medicare give-back. So I am willing to take my chances with AARP because the Republicans would not let us pass a prescription drug bill, a generic drug bill. I will take my chances with AARP and go with the Senator from Montana. Let's pass the Medicare give-back bill to help millions of people in America--rural America and urban America--people who badly need this. I am going to have convalescent centers going broke in Nevada, filing bankruptcy.

Is that what we want? We had a convalescent center in rural Nevada. They had all kinds of problems. They did not know what to do with the people in the center because they were going broke. What do they do with them? It was the only center in town. This legislation would direct money to that situation.

AARP is a great organization, but they can take that letter and carpet floors with it because that is not how we run the Senate. We do what is best for the people of our States, and the best for our States is to do what the Senator from Montana said to do. We tried to pass all kinds of legislation, and we have had the big stall. So do not have anyone lecture me on enough time to do things. I have spent days, weeks, and probably months of my life sitting here doing nothing because they would not let us do anything.

=====

Source: Congressional Record, October 16, 2002, pp. 10538-10539

p. 10538:
http://frwebgate.access.gpo.gov/cgi-bin/getpage.cgi?dbname=2002_record&page=S10538&position=all
p. 10539:
http://frwebgate.access.gpo.gov/cgi-bin/getpage.cgi?dbname=2002_record&page=S10539&position=all

Robert_C._McNally@opd.eop.gov
10/18/2002 11:25:56 AM

Record Type: Record

To: Robert C. McNally/OPD/EOP@EOP

cc: See the distribution list at the bottom of this message
Subject: Re: Enron Guilty Plea Talkers -- recommended

Please find attached a slightly revised set of talkers and longer list of FERC actions on the help list. This reflects input from FERC. DOE is fine with these.

(See attached file: Enron Guilty Plea Talkers 2.doc)

- Enron Guilty Plea Talkers 2.doc

Message Copied To:

Daniel J. Bartlett/WHO/EOP@EOP
Lawrence A. Fleischer/WHO/EOP@EOP
Claire E. Buchan/WHO/EOP@EOP
James R. Wilkinson/WHO/EOP@EOP
Scott McClellan/WHO/EOP@EOP
Tucker A. Eskew/WHO/EOP@EOP
Mary J. Matalin/OVP/EOP@EOP
Catherine J. Martin/OVP/EOP@EOP
Kenneth A. Lisaius/WHO/EOP@EOP
Joel D. Kaplan/WHO/EOP@EOP
Keith Hennessey/OPD/EOP@EOP
Edward Ingle/WHO/EOP@EOP
Matthew Koch/WHO/EOP@EOP
Karen Y. Knutson/OVP/EOP@EOP
Douglas J. Holtz-Eakin/CEA/EOP@EOP
Marcus Peacock/OMB/EOP@EOP
Cesar Conda/OVP/EOP@EOP
Benjamin A. Powell/WHO/EOP@EOP
Karl C. Rove/WHO/EOP@EOP
Susan B. Ralston/WHO/EOP@EOP
David M. Thomas/WHO/EOP@EOP
Israel Hernandez/WHO/EOP@EOP
Phil Cooney/CEQ/EOP@EOP

Jim Towey 538438
FG006-27

Karl C. Rove
10/18/2002 08:54:00 AM

Record Type: Record

To: Susan B. Ralston/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:
Subject: 2nd Annual Superintendent's Prayer Breakfast

---------- Forwarded by Karl C. Rove/WHO/EOP on 10/18/2002 08:55 AM ----------

Beth Kennedy Jones <bkjones@aunahil.com>
10/16/2002 04:03:06 PM

Record Type: Record

To: Karl C. Rove/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:
Subject: 2nd Annual Superintendent's Prayer Breakfast

Dear Mr. Rove,

2nd Annual Superintendent's Prayer Breakfast

I am sending you this invitation at the suggestion of Cathy Fenton.

Beth Kennedy Jones
Aunahil, Inc.
202.256.3132
Fax 301.656.7167

- att1.htm
- Invitation for White House.doc
- Prayer Breakfast Flyer.pdf

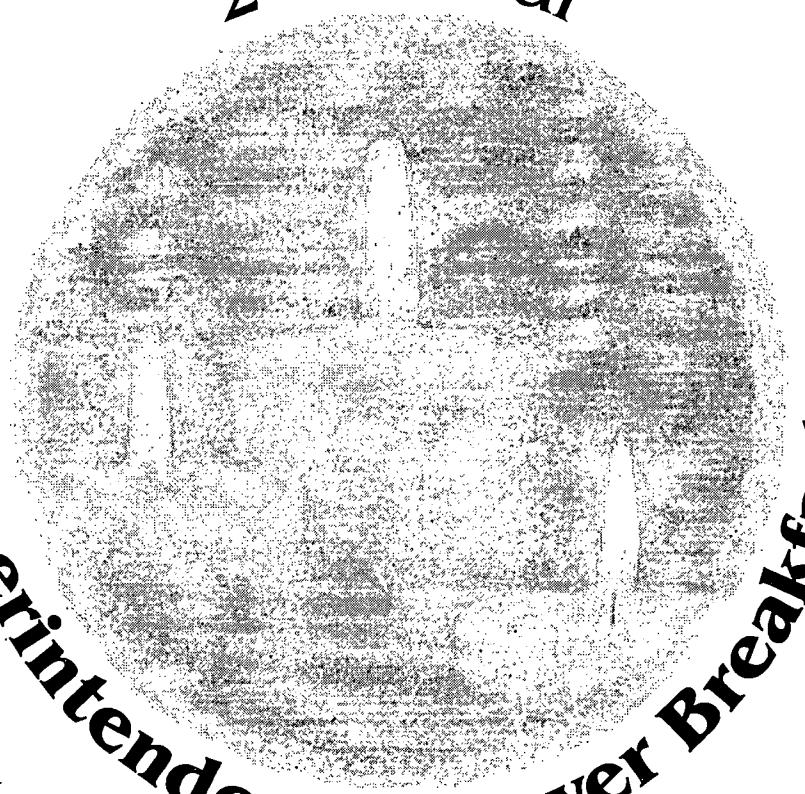
Aunahil, Inc.

On Saturday, November 2, 2002, the Interfaith Partnership will host its second annual District of Columbia Public Schools Superintendent's Prayer Breakfast from 8:30am to 10:30am at the Washington Hilton Hotel, 1919 Connecticut Avenue, NW, Washington, DC. The White House is invited to be part of this endeavor.

The Interfaith Partnership is collaboration between the District of Columbia Public Schools and members of the faith community who support the moral and academic development of our children. Frequently the faith community comes together to discuss what can be done to help our children grow and develop both academically and morally so that they can become productive citizens of this city, this country, and this world. Declaring that our children are our future is a great thought, however, taking steps to build a better future for them is what will make the difference. We long to reach out to young people when we see them going in the wrong direction, but often we don't know how or where to start. This Prayer Breakfast is your opportunity to help us take that first step. The proceeds from this Breakfast will go to DCPS programs that help young people reach their fullest potential in every way possible

Your attendance will help us support the young people of our schools who need to know that they are part of a world community that cares.

Please contact Beth Kennedy Jones BKJ@aunahil.com or (202)256-3132



7217 Oakridge Avenue, Chevy Chase, MD 20815
202.256.3132 FAX 301.656.7167
BKJ@aunahil.com

REV_00266094

"Team Work: Making The Dream Work, OUR CHILDREN FIRST!

Interfaith Partnership presents the

2nd Annual Superintendent's Prayer Breakfast

in Support of DC Public Schools

Saturday, November 2, 2002 • 8:30am

Washington Hilton Hotel
1919 Connecticut Avenue, NW • International Ballroom

Donations: $35
Proceeds to benefit the Superintendent's Student Services Fund

Make checks or money orders payable to:
Interfaith Partnership to Support DCPS
PO BOX 63102 • Washington, DC 20029-3102
(Payment must be received by Monday October 21, 2002)

For more information, call the Interfaith Partnership (202)399-5079
DCPS staff call (202) 442-4287

OK
538438
FG006-7

FAX

URGENT

ATTN: Susan

TO: Jim Connaughton, Chairman
Council on Environmental Quality
722 Jackson Place NW, Washington DC 20503
1 202 456 0191

FROM: Amory B. Lovins, CEO
Rocky Mountain Institute
1739 Snowmass Creek Road, Snowmass, CO 81654-9199
1 970 927 3129 (direct)
1 970 927 4178 (fax)
ablovins@rmi.org

DATE: 4 October 2002

RE: Private Visit with Mr. Connaughton and/or Mr. Rove

[3 pages including this one]

Susan:

Please forward this 2-page memo to Mr. Connaughton as soon as possible. On behalf of Mr. Lovins, and with thanks,

Sincerely,

[Mr.] O-E Bustnes
Special Aide to CEO

29 August 2002

Jim Connaughton, Chairman
Council on Environmental Quality
722 Jackson Place NW, Washington DC 20503
fax 202 456-2710

Dear Mr. Connaughton:

I understand that after her conversations with you and with Karl Rove last year—the latter with RMI Directors Ray Anderson and David Orr and our friend Bo Callaway—RMI cofounder L. Hunter Lovins sent you in May a copy of the report of RMI's National Energy Policy Initiative (www.nepinitiative.org). It validated the hypothesis that building energy policy around existing consensus could bypass the most contentious issues and yield a highly integrated and effective package. The NEP Initiative report has so far been endorsed by a remarkably bipartisan group of 33 senior private- and public-sector energy leaders. It will inform and jump-start the work of the Hewlett Foundation's new National Commission on Energy Policy, and is already sparking many constructive industry conversations.

The fractious current round of energy legislative activity will soon reach its conclusion. Then, and increasingly as even more of the original assumptions unravel, the consensus-based, inclusive, and transparent process that the NEP Initiative explored for addressing pressing national security, economic, and environmental needs—simultaneously and without compromise—will invite closer attention. On 26 June, when Bruce Smart, Jack Riggs, and I presented the process and outcome to a not-even-standing-room EESI crowd of 175 Members and staffers, cochaired by Zach Wamp and Mark Udall, the general reaction was, "This makes so darned much sense—so why didn't we just do that?" And the reaction I typically get among senior energy-industry executives is that our little group of policy wildcatters drilled down through thick layers of partisan polarization, and discovered...a gusher of consensus. Not a bad thing to try, and I daresay a good one for you and Mr. Rove to reflect on, because the energy issue remains largely unhandled. Like health care after President Clinton, it will be baaaack; and it will become a worsening political liability if handled again in the same fashion.

This is one of several topics I'd like to visit privately with you and Mr. Rove about. Hunter resigned from RMI in June to lead the Natural Capitalism Academy, which works on our shared goal of making natural capitalism a dominant business model. Yet RMI's work has only accelerated, and so has the need for our favorite kind of discreet, nonpartisan, high-level conversation. Among other things, we could usefully discuss:

- Innovative, win-win, market-based, and economically stimulative policy approaches to such vexed issues as automotive and electrical efficiency.
- How and why "barrier-busting" should move to the top of the energy-policy and environmental agenda.
- Eliminating oil dependence for fun andprofit (our "prospecting" operation recently found a Saudi Arabia under Detroit, and a nega-OPEC worldwide).

REV_00266097

- Two political opportunities to do more with very profitable climate protection and get to brag about it.
- How FreedomCAR risks spending 10–20 years (and embarrassing itself) reinventing a vehicle that was privately developed two years ago, and how refocusing FreedomCAR's goals—as I suggested when leading an industry panel before the Energy Subcommittee of the House Science Committee—could instead reinvigorate and extraordinarily advantage the Big Three in global competition.
- The order-of-magnitude economic gain we've just documented in resilient distributed electricity generating systems (Small Is Profitable, RMI, 30 August 2002).
- The nearly $10 billion of annual fuel and logistics savings potential recently found in military platforms by a Defense Science Board panel on which I served, using profitable means that all boost warfighting capability.
- How DOE is undercutting DoD's mission, and how to fix that contradiction.
- A long-term inconsistency in QDR01 strategic doctrine that troubles me and some very senior military experts, and that needs to be addressed rather soon in the evolution of post-9/11 security policy and military transformation.

I'm next in Washington 7–9 October, with a fairly flexible schedule 7–8 October and early the 9th (when my DoD engagements begin at 1000). Might any of those dates be convenient for you, Mr. Rove, or ideally both? I think at least a half-hour would be rewarding and an hour highly desirable. You can check me out with folks like Jim Woolsey, Bud McFarlane, and Bill Reilly. My background in brief:

> Physicist Amory Lovins, 54, cofounded and leads Rocky Mountain Institute—a 20-year-old, 50-person, independent, nonpartisan applied research center (www.rmi.org)—and cofounded and chairs Hypercar, Inc., which transforms how the world designs and builds light vehicles (www.hypercar.com). He has briefed 16 heads of state and worked in over 50 countries, advising major firms and governments worldwide. Published in 28 books and hundreds of papers, his accomplishments in diverse fields have been recognized by the "Alternative Nobel," Onassis, Nissan, Shingo, and Mitchell Prizes, a MacArthur Fellowship, the Happold Medal, eight honorary doctorates, and the World Technology, Heinz, Lindbergh, and "Hero for the Planet" Awards. His work was recently featured in a six-page Fortune feature (20 May 2002) and in Time. (26 August 2002).

I look forward to the opportunity to expand our exploration of breakthrough policies.

Sincerely,

Amory B. Lovins, CEO

1739 SNOWMASS CREEK ROAD • SNOWMASS, COLORADO 81654-9199, USA
1 970 927 3129 • FAX 1 970 927 4178 • ABLOVINS@RMI.ORG • WWW.RMI.ORG
SCHEDULING ASSISTANT: MISSY MORGAN, 1 970 927 7202, MMORGAN@RMI.ORG
SPECIAL AIDE: ODD-EVEN BUSTNES, 1 970 927 3129, OEBUSTNES@RMI.ORG

REV_00266098

538438

FG006-27

Deborah Hart Strober
Gerald Strober
25 East End Avenue
New York, New York 10028

TO: Mr. Karl Rove
FROM: Deborah Hart Strober and Gerald Strober
DATE: October 9, 2002
SUBJECT: Kennedys and Cuban Missile Crisis

Dear Mr. Rove,

Regarding recent comments by Senator Edward Kennedy and others concerning the attitudes of President Kennedy and Attorney General Robbert Kennedy on the use of military force during the Cuban Missile Crisis, we call your attention to the following verbatim quotations from our book, Let Us Begin Anew: An Oral History of the Kennedy Presidency [HarperCollins, 1993]:

Gaylord Nelson, Governor of Wisconsin, 1958-62; U.S. Senator [D. Wis.] 1963-81 Bobby Kennedy was out in Wisconsin when this crisis was happening. We flew from Milwaukee to Green Bay to watch a Packer game. On the way there Bobby said, "What do you think about the Cuban situation?" I said, "As far as the public is concerned, the president is barely keeping up with the crowd. Public opinion is moving out ahead of him. The president should declare a belligerent blockade." Although he has been credited with supporting the blockade, he said, "No, no. It would be the worst thing you could do. The Russians would challenge it. What we really should do is make a strike--a huge strike, and knock 'em right out of business." In any event, that was Bobby's position at the Green Bay game before the president went ahead and put up the blockade. [Page 377]

Dean Rusk, Secretary of State, 1961-69 I met frequently during those thirteen days with Bob McNamara and Robert Kennedy. We built a consensus among the three of us that the quarantine should be the technique used in response to the crisis, realizing that that might be no more than a temporary move, because in the background was the possibility of direct military action. [Page 394]

Richard Bissell, Deputy Director of Plans, Central Intelligence Agency, 1959-62 From the time the hard evidence was in, Kennedy handled himself very well. I don't know how many options he had open to him: with all the hard evidence in, he couldn't simply dust his hands and say he didn't believe it, ot that it didn't really make any difference whether there were missiles there or not. Some of the participants in Washington thought we were close to nuclear war. [Page 395]

Ray Cline, Deputy Director for Intelligence, CIA, 1962-64 Bobby was not as impressive as Jack was. I think he was really a vindictive fellow. I hate to say that, but I think he was really determined to put Castro out of business. Jack Kennedy would have made up his own mind, and he would have finally made the bitter decision to move against Cuba, because he knew the Russians couldn't move against him. We had plans for maybe seventy cities to be destroyed in the Soviet Union. [Page 396]

D. H. S. G.S.

538438
FG006-07

MAYOR VICTOR ASHE
P.O. BOX 1631
KNOXVILLE, TN 37901

TELEPHONE – 865-215-2040
FAX – 865-215-2978

TO: KARL ROVE

COMPANY:

FROM: MAYOR VICTOR ASHE

DATE: 10/09/02

NUMBER OF PAGES INCLUDING COVER PAGE: 3

MESSAGE:

I THOUGHT YOU WOULD FIND THIS of INTEREST.

VA

538439
Eliu FG006-27

PRA 6

KARL ROVE

Washington, DC
Richmond, VA
Washington, DC
Wednesday, October 9, 2002

3:40 p.m. Depart the White House for Washington, Dulles Airport
Via: Susan's car

4:25 p.m. Arrive Washington, Dulles Airport
FBO: Piedmont Hawthorne
23411 Autopilot Drive
Dulles, VA
Phone: (703) 661-0150
Tail Number: N326HG

4:30 p.m. Depart Washington, DC for Richmond, VA
Charter Flight (50 min flight)
Pilots: Tim Sullivan
Eliu Rivera
Passengers: Karl Rove
Senator George Allen (T)
Dwight Schar
Martha Schar
Susan Ralston
Tom Spahr

5:20 p.m. Arrive Richmond International Airport
FBO: Million Air
Phone: (800) 962-5262
400 Portugee Road
Richmond, VA
Met by: Ken Hutcheson, Political Consultant to Attorney General Kilgore
Contact: (804) 304-1698

5:25 p.m. Depart Airport for The Jefferson Hotel
Via: Ken Hutcheson
Contact: (804) 304-1698

PRA 6

EVENT: REPUBLICAN PARTY OF VIRGINIA'S ADVISORY COUNCIL MEETING
The Jefferson Hotel
101 West Franklin Street
Richmond, VA

5:40 p.m. Arrive at Jefferson Hotel and proceed to Dominion Room for meeting.

5:50 p.m. Attorney General Jerry Kilgore introduces you.

5:55 p.m. You make remarks.

6:10 p.m. Conclude participation in meeting and proceed to Lemaire Restaurant (Valentine Room) for Dinner.

EVENT: REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE DINNER

The Jefferson Hotel
101 West Franklin Street
Richmond, VA

6:15 p.m. Begin participation in Dinner.
Note: Everyone is seated for dinner at 6:30 p.m.

7:15 p.m. Attorney General Jerry Kilgore introduces you.

7:20 p.m. You deliver remarks and participate in Question and Answer Session.

7:40 p.m. You conclude remarks and participation in event.

7:45 p.m. Depart Jefferson Hotel en route Richmond International Airport
Via: Ken Hutcheson
Contact: (804) 304-1698

8:05 p.m. Arrive Richmond International Airport
FBO: Million Air
Phone: (800) 962-5262
400 Portugee Road
Richmond, VA
Tail Number: N326HG

8:10 p.m. Depart Richmond, VA en route Washington, DC
Charter Flight (50 min flight)
Pilots: Tim Sullivan
Eliu Rivera
Passengers: Karl Rove
Senator George Allen (T)
Dwight Schar
Martha Schar
Susan Ralston
Tom Spahr

9:00 p.m.	Arrive Washington, Dulles Airport FBO: Piedmont Hawthorne Phone: (703) 661-0150 23411 Autopilot Drive Dulles, VA
9:05 p.m.	Depart Piedmont Hawthorne for your residence Via: Mike Frederick Contact: (703) 919-8288
9:30 p.m.	Arrive at your residence.

KARL ROVE

REMARKS AT REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE DINNER

Wednesday, October 9, 2002
6:15 p.m. – 7:45 p.m.
The Jefferson Hotel
101 West Franklin Street
Richmond, Virginia

I. PURPOSE

To support the Republican National Committee's fundraising efforts on behalf of 2002 Republican candidates.

II. BACKGROUND

There are no competitive races in Virginia this year. This event is expected to raise over $900,000 for the RNC.

III. PARTICIPANTS

Attorney General Jerry Kilgore (R)

Co-Chairs
Don Blakenship, Massey Energy Company
Bill Goodwin, CCA Industries, co-owns the Jefferson Hotel (Not in attendance)
Tom Saunders, SKM Equity (Not in attendance)
Dwight Schar, NVR, Inc.
Nick Taubman, Advanced Auto Parts

25 Invited Guests (See attached list)

Susan Ralston

IV. PRESS PLAN

Closed

V. SEQUENCE OF EVENTS

6:15 p.m. -- You arrive Lemaire Restaurant (Valentine Room) for dinner.
6:30 p.m. -- Everyone is seated for dinner.
Note: You will switch tables between the main course and dessert.
7:15 p.m. -- Attorney General Jerry Kilgore introduces you.
7:20 p.m. -- You deliver remarks and participate in Q and A.
7:45 p.m. -- You conclude remarks and depart for Richmond International Airport.

VI. REMARKS

Provided by Kasey Pipes

VII. ATTACHMENTS

Talking Points
List of Dinner Participants
Virginia Political Briefing

DINNER PARTICIPANTS

Tom Benedetti, Benedetti & Farris
Liz Benedetti, guest of Tom Benedetti
Don Blankenship, Massey Energy Company
Richard Cullen, McGuireWoods, LLP
Abby Farris, Benedetti & Farris
Jerry Kilgore, Attorney General of Virginia
Marty Kilgore, wife of Jerry Kilgore
Alan King, Universal Leaf
Wanda King, Universal Leaf
Aaron Leibowitz, Executive Director, Republican Party of Virginia
Baxter Phillips, Jr., Massey Energy, Co.
Dick Poulson, Smithfield Foods, Inc.
John Rocovich, Moss & Rochovich
Sue Ellen Rocovich, wife of John Rochovich
Dwight Schar, NVR, Inc.
John Sherman, Scott & Stringfellow Investments
Martha Sherman, wife of John Sherman
Tom Spahr, Self-Employed, Computer Software
Nick Taubman, Advanced Auto Parts
Jenny Taubman, wife of Nick Taubman
Gary Thomson, Chairman, Republican Party of Virginia

General Talking Points for Republican National Committee Dinner

Acknowledgements:

- Attorney General Kilgore
- Chairman Gary Thomson
- Event co-chairs: Dwight Schar, Nick Taubman, and Don Blankenship. Also not in attendance, Bill Goodwyn and Tom Saunders were co-chairs.

Memorandum

To: Karl Rove

From Tom Benedetti

Date: October 8, 2002

Re: RNC Dinner in Richmond

VIA FACSIMILE: 202-456-6538

Attached are the attendees for the RNC dinner at the Jefferson Hotel in Richmond. I wanted to give you a quick heads up on the evening.

We have raised over $900k on the event. The success of the event is due to Nick Taubman and Dwight Schar, but especially Nick. We had 5 Co-Chairs each contribute $100,000: Nick, Dwight, Don Blankenship, Bill Goodwin and Tom Saunders in New York. Nick got on the phone and really hustled on this because he believes it is important to the President. Tom Suanders secured two $100,000 contributions as well. Unfortunately, he couldn't make the dinner.

Dwight, Nick and Tom Saunders have also been sending personal and family contributions around the country to the GOP Senate candidates.

Of the guests that will be at the dinner, I know that you have met Nick and Jenny Taubman at Julie Finley's house several months ago, Dwight and Martha Schar (they hosted an event for Norm Coleman you attended), and Dick Poulson of Smithfield at a dinner in the spring at the Metropolitan Club.

Finally, Senator George Allen may attend and fly down with you. But as of 9am this morning, that has not been confirmed.

VIRGINIA POLITICAL BRIEFING

13 ELECTORAL VOTES
2001 – Open Governor
2002 – Senator Warner Up

POLITICAL CLIMATE:

BUDGET SHORTFALL

With this year's projected revenue shortage approaching $2 billion, Governor Mark Warner (D) announced at a September 25 press conference that all State agencies will experience cuts of at least five percent in the December 20 budget. His plan, to be unveiled on October 15, will include "significant layoffs" in the 100,000 member bureaucracy and tuition hikes at State universities.

TRANSPORTATION TAX

A November referendum backed by Governor Warner will give Northern Virginia voters the option to increase their sales tax rate from four-and-a-half percent to five percent to fund road and transit projects over the next 20 years. Proponents, including Senator John Warner (R) and Congressman Tom Davis (R, VA-11), argue the measure will relieve traffic congestion. Opponents of the referendum, a mixed coalition of anti-tax conservatives and environmentalists, are skeptical of the benefits for the region. Supporters have raised nearly $1 million, and opponents have raised less than $200,000. Internal polling shows over 60 percent of Northern Virginia voters support the proposal.

DROUGHT

Despite recent statewide showers, Virginia's rivers and reservoirs remain far below normal levels. The three-year drought has caused erratic harvest yields, and most of the State has implemented mandatory water restrictions, including a ban on lawn watering since August 30.

VANCE WILKINS' RESIGNATION

Vance Wilkins, Virginia's first-ever Republican Speaker of the House, was forced to resign this summer after it was revealed that he paid a 26-year-old woman $100,000 to settle sexual harassment allegations against him. Wilkins denied any wrongdoing but acknowledged paying the money to keep the case out of court. The Republican House caucus selected William Howell (R, Stafford) as new Speaker on July 20. Howell will be sworn in when the General Assembly reconvenes on January 8, 2003.

MATRICARDI INDICTMENT

Virginia Republican Party Executive Director Ed Matricardi was indicted April 9 for secretly listening to and recording two Democrat strategy sessions conducted by telephone in late March. On May 14, State prosecutors dropped the charges in favor

Drafted by: Coddy Johnson, Office of Political Affairs
202/456-5390 office
202/309-1361 mobile

REV_00266110

of a joint State-Federal probe. Matricardi resigned from his post April 10 and was hired as executive director of the South Carolina Republican Party in early July.

GOVERNOR MARK WARNER

On April 4 Governor Warner vetoed legislation outlawing partial-birth abortion. Warner said the late term abortion ban "does not contain sufficient protections to safeguard the women of Virginia." The General Assembly returned April 17 for a scheduled one-day session but failed to override the veto.

On the same day, Governor Warner endorsed a bill that rolls back Alexandria's ban on carrying guns in municipal buildings. Analysts said the two decisions were meant to reflect Warner's "middle-of-the-road" ideology.

REDISTRICTING

For the first time since Reconstruction, Republicans controlled Virginia's redistricting process and mapped all Republican members of Congress into safer districts. However, in March, Salem Circuit Court Judge Richard Pattisall ruled the redistricting plan unconstitutional because he said it "diminished the voting strength of African Americans." Governor Warner and Attorney General Kilgore have since been engaged in a partisan battle over the legality of the plan. They have asked the State Supreme Court for an expedited decision in an appeal of Judge Pattisall's ruling, but the Court has yet to make a decision.

SENATE

With no Democrat nominee and no legitimate opposition, Senator Warner is expected to win re-election in November.

HOUSE

Randy Forbes (R, VA-04)
Louise Lucas (D) dropped out of the race on August 24, leaving incumbent Randy Forbes (R) without general election opposition. Lucas was Forbes' opponent in the June 19, 2001 special election to fill deceased Congressman Norman Sisisky's seat.

Drafted by: Coddy Johnson, Office of Political Affairs
202/456-5390 office
202/309-1361 mobile

REV_00266111

VIRGINIA POLITICAL BRIEFING

13 ELECTORAL VOTES
2001 – Open Governor
2002 – Senator Warner Up

STATISTICS

2000 General Election Results (Presidential):

	Total Votes	%Won
Bush	1,437,490	52%
Gore	1,217,290	44%
Nader	59,398	2%
Other	27,650	1%

1996 General Election Results (Presidential):

	Total Votes	%Won
Dole	1,137,171	48%
Clinton	1,090,219	46%
Perot	159,795	7%

Virginia has gone to the Republican candidate in every presidential election since 1964.

CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION - And Win %'s

U.S. SENATE:

- Senator John Warner (R), 4th term, re-elected in 1996 with 53%
- Senator George Allen (R), 1st term, elected in 2000 with 52%

U.S. HOUSE: 11 total (3D, 7R, 1I)

- Jo Ann S. Davis (R-01), 1st term, elected with 58%
- Ed Schrock (R-02), 1st term, elected with 52%
- Robert "Bobby" C. Scott (D-03), 5th term, re-elected without contest
- Randy Forbes (R-04), 1st term, elected in a special election on June 19, 2001 with 52%
- Virgil H. Goode, Jr. (I-05), 3rd term, re-elected with 67%
- Bob W. Goodlatte (R-06), 5th term, re-elected without contest
- Eric Cantor (R-07), 1st term, elected with 67%
- James P. Moran (D-08), 6th term, re-elected with 63%
- Rick Boucher (D-09), 10th term, re-elected with 70%
- Frank R. Wolf (R-10), 11th term, re-elected with 84%
- Thomas M. Davis, III (R-11), 4th term, re-elected with 62%

STATE GOVERNMENT

Governor Mark Warner (D), 1st term, elected in 2001 with 52%
Lieutenant Governor Tim Kaine (D), 1st term, elected in 2001 with 50%
Attorney General Jerry Kilgore (R), 1st term, elected in 2001 with 60%*

The largest winning margin (60% to 40%) in statewide election history.*

Drafted by: Coddy Johnson, Office of Political Affairs
202/456-5390 office
202/309-1361 mobile

REV_00266112

VIRGINIA POLITICAL BRIEFING

13 ELECTORAL VOTES
2001 – Open Governor
2002 – Senator Warner Up

State House:	100 (64R, 34D, 2I)
Speaker:	William Howell (R)
Majority Leader:	Walter Stosch (R)
State Senate:	40 (22R, 18D)
President:	Lieutenant Governor Tim Kaine (D)
President Pro Tempore:	John H. Chichester (R)

STATE PARTY

Chairman:	Gary Thomson
National Committeeman:	Morton Blackwell
National Committeewoman:	Anne Petera

STATE DEMOGRAPHIC PROFILE

Estimated Population 1998: 7,078,515, up 14.4% since 1990
Race/Ethnicity: 72.3% White, 19.6% African-American, 4.7% Hispanic, 3.7% Asian Median Household Income: $46,677
College Educated: 30.3%
Median Age: 36 years (11.2% are 65 years and older)
Family Households: 68.5%
Married-Couple Families: 52.8%
(Source: 2000 US Census Bureau)

THE PRESIDENT'S PREVIOUS TRAVEL

Date	Event	City
9/11/02	Pentagon Observance for September 11	Arlington
4/17/02	Remarks at George C. Marshall ROTC Award Seminar	Lexington
3/20/02	America's Fund for Afghan Children	Alexandria
1/10/02	Signing of H.R. 3338	Arlington
10/15/01	Welcoming Ceremony of the Joint Chiefs of Staff	Arlington
10/11/01	DOD Service of Remembrance at the Pentagon	Arlington
10/2/01	Announcement at Reagan Washington National Airport	Arlington
9/26/01	Remarks and Briefing at the CIA	Langley
9/17/01	Briefing and Meeting at the Pentagon	Arlington
9/12/01	Visit to the Pentagon	Arlington
8/1/01	Meeting with Secretary of Defense at the Pentagon	Arlington

Drafted by: Coddy Johnson, Office of Political Affairs
202/456-5390 office
202/309-1361 mobile

REV_00266113

7/9/01	Tour and Meeting at Fair Oaks Hospital	Fairfax
7/3/01	Visit to Inova Fairfax Hospital	Fairfax
6/19/01	Tour and Remarks at the Pentagon	Arlington
6/6/01	National D-Day Memorial	Bedford
5/10/01	Vienna Community Anti-Drug Coalition Dinner	Vienna
4/6/01	2000 Malcolm Baldrige Awards	Alexandria
3/20/01	Visit to CIA Headquarters	McLean
3/4/01	Visit to Newport News Shipbuilding	Newport News
2/13/01	Visit to Naval Air Station	Norfolk
2/6/01	Visit to Tree Top Toys and Books, Inc.	McLean
2/2/01	Republican House and Senate Retreat	Williamsburg

VICE PRESIDENT'S PREVIOUS TRAVEL

Event	Date	Location
FBI SAIC Conference	05/15/02	Rosslyn
Fundraiser for Senator Mark Warner	03/04/02	Tysons Corner
Fundraiser for Randy Forbes	06/04/01	Chesapeake
VA Technology Council Spring Banquet	04/18/01	McLean
Fundraiser for Randy Forbes	04/12/01	Richmond
CPAC Reception and Dinner	02/15/01	Arlington
GOP Retreat	02/02/01	Williamsburg

House of Representatives
Washington, D.C. 20515

MEMORANDUM

9/26

Hard copy of letter
faxed on 9/26-

U.S. House of Representatives

David B. Dettoni
Senior Legislative Assistant

Honorable Frank R. Wolf
Member of Congress
10th District, Virginia

241 Cannon Building
Washington, D.C. 20515
(202) 225-5136
Fax (202) 225-0437

REV_00266115

FRANK R. WOLF
10TH DISTRICT, VIRGINIA

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS
SUBCOMMITTEES:
CHAIRMAN—COMMERCE-JUSTICE-STATE AND JUDICIARY
TRANSPORTATION
TREASURY-POSTAL SERVICE-GENERAL GOVERNMENT

CO-CHAIR—CONGRESSIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS CAUCUS

241 CANNON HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING
WASHINGTON, DC 20515-4610
(202) 225-5136

13873 PARK CENTER ROAD
SUITE 130
HERNDON, VA 20171
(703) 709-5800
(800) 945-9653 (IN STATE)

110 NORTH CAMERON STREET
WINCHESTER, VA 22601
(540) 667-0990
(800) 850-3463 (IN STATE)

www.house.gov/wolf/

Congress of the United States
House of Representatives

September 26, 2002

The Honorable Colin Powell
Secretary of State, Department of State
2201 C St NW Ste 7276
Washington DC 20520

EXEC. OFC. PRESIDENT
WH STRATEGIC INITIATIVES
2002 OCT -9 AM 10: 41

Dear Secretary Powell:

I have received some very disturbing information concerning U.S. policy in southern Sudan outlined in the enclosed letter and a memorandum from two very knowledgeable individuals whom I know to be credible sources. They have been in the region and have met with senior government officials in countries neighboring Sudan. These reliable sources have informed me that the State Department has instructed our ambassadors in the region to intervene with these countries to convince them to cease their aid and support to the SPLM. This situation clearly gives the appearance that the U.S. has sided with the Government of Sudan. The people of south Sudan are the victims and they need America's support.

The Bush Administration and special envoy John Danforth have taken bold action to raise the prospect for peace. I was very pleased to learn about the July 20 Machakos agreement in which the Government of Sudan and the Sudan People's Liberation Movement agreed on the two contentious issues: self determination for the south and the issue of Sharia.

But, as you are well aware, in early September, the Government of Sudan walked out of the Machakos talks, dashing hopes for peace in the Sudan. Since then they have launched a brutal campaign against the people of southern Sudan, including blanket aerial bombardment of civil and civilian targets.

I am horrified by the pictures of devastation coming out of southern Sudan. Innocent civilians are being mercilessly slaughtered and maimed by government fighter planes. I have enclosed two photographs that graphically show the results of the Government of Sudan's recent attacks on innocent civilians. The Government of Sudan has declared a jihad against the people of southern Sudan. The Government of Sudan is reportedly receiving arms and ammunition from Yemen and using its newly purchased Mig 29 fighter planes against civilian targets.

President Omar Bashir of Sudan has ordered his armed forces to devastate the south. Here is what he said recently: "I gave the army a free hand to move out in all directions, to use all of its weapons, with no restraints, no restrictions, whatsoever."

THIS STATIONERY PRINTED ON PAPER MADE OF RECYCLED FIBERS

Although I am encouraged to hear that the Government of Sudan is cooperating in the war against terrorism, I am mindful of the fact that this is the same government and leaders who provided sanctuary to Osama bin Laden's al-Qaeda. While they are claiming to have abandoned their support for international terrorism, their terror campaign against their own people continues unabated. They must be stopped.

Mr. Secretary, our government has always stood with the helpless and the innocent civilians in Sudan. Having U.S. ambassadors place pressure on the SPLM's allies in the region, as the reports I received now indicate, while turning a blind eye to the massive mobilization and armament of the Sudan military, would represent a shift of our support to the Government of Sudan.

I seriously doubt that it is our government's objective to weaken the south in favor of the Government of Sudan. Peace will not come to Sudan if the south is severely weakened. There must be a balance of political and military power to give peace a chance in the Sudan. Our government should not reward the Government of Sudan with a cease-fire before it commits itself to a just and lasting peace in Sudan.

Mr. Secretary, I strongly urge you to instruct our ambassadors in Africa and other pertinent U.S. officials that it is not the policy of the U.S. to pressure the SPLM's neighbors to cease their support of the SPLM and they should immediately and forcefully reinforce this point with the appropriate officials in those countries. Equal pressure needs to be applied to both sides of the conflict in order to return the parties to the peace process so that the suffering people of Sudan can live in peace.

Your leadership on this matter is critical.

Sincerely,

Frank R. Wolf
Member of Congress

FRW:dd

P.S. I have just received reports that the Government of Sudan has put in effect a flight ban over the region of Eastern and Western Equatoria for all Operation Lifeline Sudan relief flights. This flight ban will prevent much needed food and medicine from getting to vast parts of the needy and suffering in Sudan.

Thank You for your help.

September 25, 2002

Dear Congressman Wolf,

Thank you for calling me today. I am writing as you requested and I am writing to you as a private American citizen and in no way do my views represent the views of my employers or associates.

This time in Sudan is unique; unique for a chance, a small chance, at peace. It is a fragile time and one that has come at tremendous cost in terms of lives and suffering. This moment will be fleeting if not approached in a correct, just, fair, and careful manner; equally treating all the parties.

The opposition to the National Islamic Front have little to live for and everything to die for. They want freedom....plain and simple. The war is more than North vs. South, Muslim vs. Christian, Black vs. Arab or who gets the oil. It is about the oppressed against the oppressors.

The parties have come to the negotiating table, not because of the pressure the USA or IGAD brought to bear, but because of the military and political pressure the SPLA has brought to bear on the GOS regime. The SPLM want peace more than anyone because they and their people have suffered the most.

The engagement of the US in the peace talks known as Machakos is vital. America has the most important and influential role of all outside parties to play. We must stay involved; but if that involvement is not fair or realistic to the circumstances of the parties, then indeed, we could see the destruction of the very opportunity for peace that President Bush and his administration has worked hard to achieve.

I have been to Sudan perhaps 100 times in the last five years. I am a humanitarian worker and give assistance to people of all races, religions, and creeds. In this process the leadership of the opposition held areas talk with me about their future, their vision, their fears, their frustration, and their hopes.

The opposition forces can not and will not accept a cease-fire without first having a comprehensive political settlement; a settlement that is just and allows the right of self-determination and participation in governmental processes. The leadership of the SPLA has no choice in this regard. The actual people fighting the war will not lay down their arms without guarantees of a comprehensive political settlement they know will be monitored by the international community.

Even if the SPLM Chairman, John Garang, said he agreed to a cease-fire, his troops would not follow his orders unless they were assured of such a settlement! The US State department is pressuring the SPLA for a cease-fire, but without any political settlement. By all appearances there is not equal pressure on the GOS. During Machakos I, the GOS launched massive ground attacks south of Bentiu, driving off hundreds of thousands of civilians from farm and marsh land. Thousands were killed. During Machkos II, the SPLA took the town of Torit and the GOS walked out of the talks.

The GOS walked out of the talks! Not the SPLM.

Now intense and unrealistic pressure is being placed on the SPLM to enter into a cease-fire. This is happening while the GOS launches massive air attacks on civilians throughout the south of Sudan. Humanitarian sites have been the targets of these attacks and my colleagues have help the injured, gathered the dead and buried them.

Why is the US using its influence, its ambassadors, and its resources to favor a government that it includes on its own sheet of countries who support terrorism?

In regards to the Sudan peace talks, why is the US favoring a government system that is a platform-driver of international terrorism?

Many voices, including mine, are calling for peace. In Sudan a bad peace will be worse than no peace! A bad peace will further marginalize and weaken people like the Nuba, the Dinka, the Nuer and the Fung. A bad peace will weaken and destroy the only thing that has brought the parties to the table to discuss peace...and that is the fighting capacity of the SPLA forces. A bad peace will play into the hands of the National Islamic Front.

There is strong fear in neighboring countries of the export of radical Islam from Sudan. These countries have a justified right to worry. Where was the assassination attempt on the President of Egypt originated? Sudan. Where were Islamic extremists attacks launched into Eritrea from? Sudan. What country has been supporting the Lord's Resistance Army in Uganda? Sudan. What country hosted, perhaps birthed, al'Queda? Sudan.

What has changed about Sudan and their world view that now makes them partners in the war on terror? Has their ideology changed? Has their leadership changed? Have their tactics changed? How much can they cooperate on the war on terror before they are directly implicated in the attacks? The world needs evidence of any changes in the National Islamic Front or its methodologies before trust is bestowed.

Even though the surrounding countries worry about the export of extreme Islam into their own lands they are being pressured by the US Ambassadors to provide no assistance to the opposition forces.

Congressman Wolf, America must stay engaged and pressure the parties back to talk peace. But if that pressure is not exerted in a fair manner and directed to a just end I fear peace will not come.

These are my concerns, my worries and thoughts as you have asked for.

I pray for a just and true peace for all of Sudan.

Ken Isaacs

Duplicate of fax

EXEC. OFC. PRESIDENT
/H STRATEGIC INITIATIVES
2002 OCT -9 AM 10: 46

538438
FG006-27

TEXAS PARKS & WILDLIFE

COMMISSIONERS

KATHARINE ARMSTRONG
CHAIRMAN, AUSTIN

ERNEST ANGELO, JR.
VICE-CHAIRMAN, MIDLAND

JOHN AVILA, JR.
FORT WORTH

JOSEPH B.C. FITZSIMONS
SAN ANTONIO

ALVIN L. HENRY
HOUSTON

PHILIP MONTGOMERY
DALLAS

DONATO D. RAMOS
LAREDO

KELLY W. RISING, M.D.
BEAUMONT

MARK E. WATSON, JR.
SAN ANTONIO

LEE M. BASS
CHAIRMAN-EMERITUS
FORT WORTH

ROBERT L. COOK
EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

September 27, 2002

Mr. Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue NW
Washington, DC 20502

Dear Karl:

This is a request for you to facilitate a grant through the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service (the Service) to the Texas Parks and Wildlife Department (TPWD) for the World Birding Center (WBC). A capital contribution of $1.9 million from the Service would help develop facilities, create interpretive features, restore native habitat, and would establish the Service as a full WBC partner. Such a significant contribution to our capital effort will demonstrate just how effective state and federal partnerships can be. We have already secured $11,350,000 or 71 percent of the $16,100,000 needed for capital improvements at the three major resource sites (Mission, Weslaco, and Brownsville). The Parks and Wildlife Foundation of Texas is raising the additional funds to complete this capital phase of the WBC project.

The WBC is destined to become an internationally recognized conservation model, using economic incentives to promote conservation. Ecotourism and birdwatching in the Lower Rio Grande Valley currently generate over $100 million annually. The WBC will include a 120-mile corridor in the Valley and is designed to further wildlife conservation and ecotourism in one of America's most important bird migratory corridors. This area also is, unfortunately, an area where 95 percent of the wildlife habitat has already been lost. Despite this, the diverse sub-tropical landscapes in South Texas support incredible birdlife, making this region the number one destination for birdwatchers in North America.

WBC communities are adjacent or very near to the Service's Lower Rio Grande Valley Santa Ana and Laguna Atascosa National Wildlife Refuges. Federal properties are integrated with WBC site planning at most of our locations. As it opens and grows, the WBC will continue to further ecotourism south into Latin America, emphasizing bird migration and habitat conservation and mirroring the Service's own binational efforts in the border region. The enclosed brochure will give you more background information and a map of the principal WBC sites.

ENJOY THE TEXAS OUTDOORS!

Take a kid hunting or fishing

Visit a state park or historic site

We hope the Service will join us as a major partner in this international conservation model. Please let me know as soon as possible your thoughts on this state and federal cooperation opportunity. We can then discuss additional details, such as the federal role in ongoing development, recognition of National Wildlife Refuges as part of the WBC network, onsite acknowledgement and other mutual benefits.

Sincerely,

Katharine Armstrong
Chairman

KA:GG:ne

4200 SMITH SCHOOL ROAD
AUSTIN, TEXAS 78744-3291
512-389-4800

www.tpwd.state.tx.us

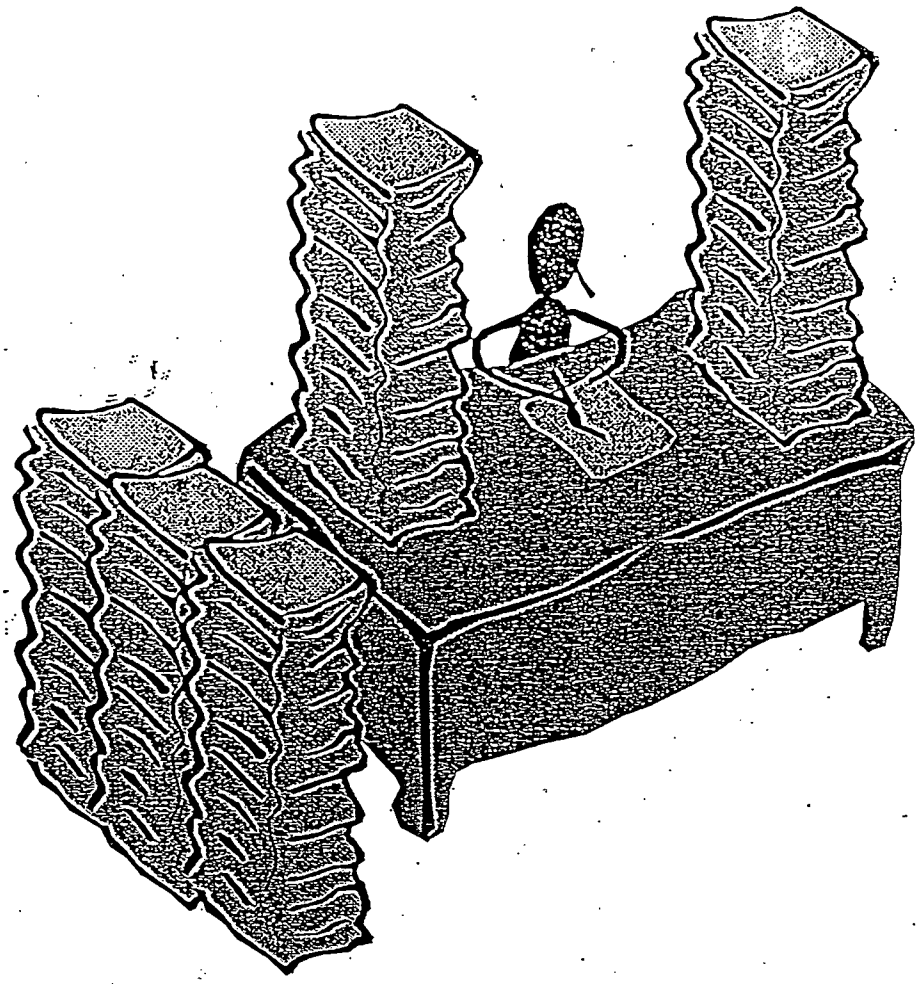
To manage and conserve the natural and cultural resources of Texas and to provide hunting, fishing and outdoor recreation opportunities for the use and enjoyment of present and future generations.

TEXAS PARKS & WILDLIFE

Sept 27

KATHARINE ARMSTRONG
CHAIRMAN

Dear Karl,



Per our discussion.
Any help you can give me on this would be very much appreciated.

All the Armstrongs are so proud of the wonderful job you are doing for the Pres & Country.

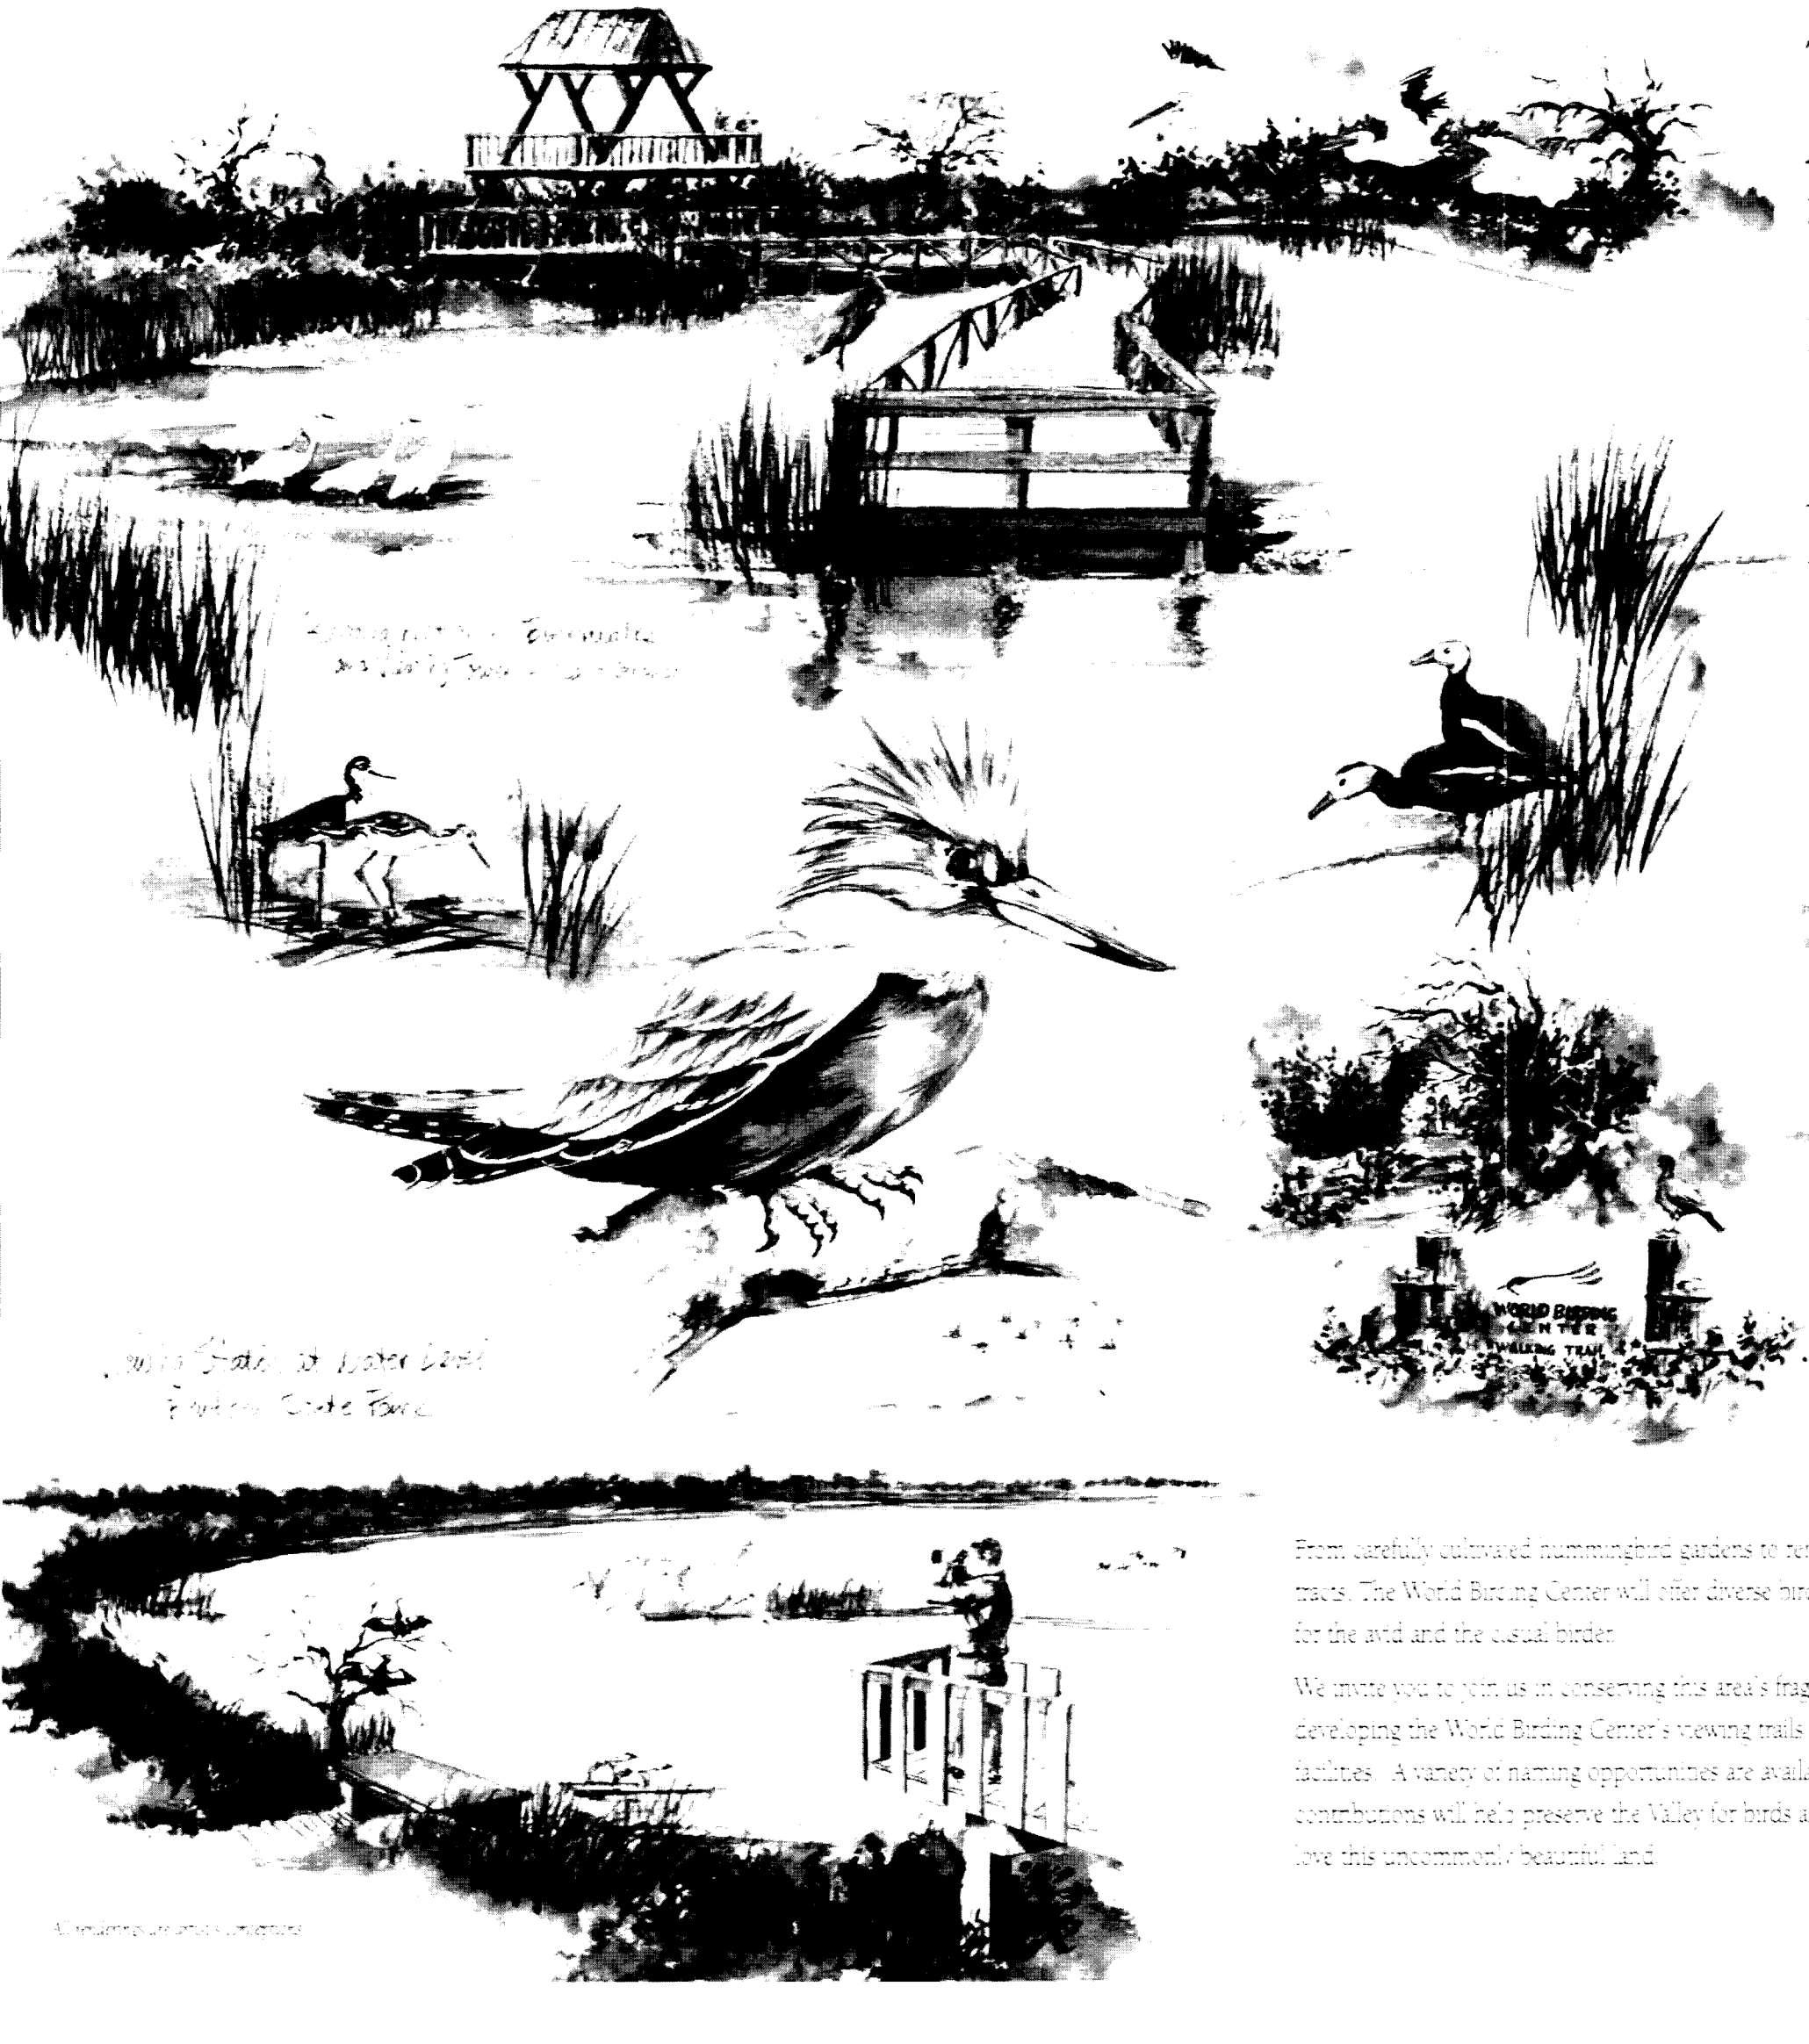
Love, K

PARKS AND WILDLIFE COMMISSION

REV_00266123

ORM

SCANNING INSERT SHEET



REMAINDER OF CASE NOT SCANNED

REV_00266124

WORLD BIRDING CENTER

The World Birding Center hosts one of the most spectacular convergences of birds on earth

The Wo
A Passio

World Birding

To significantly and active conse
wildlife for curre education, comm nature tourism.

More than 95 pe
Lost Through from Roma to Sout
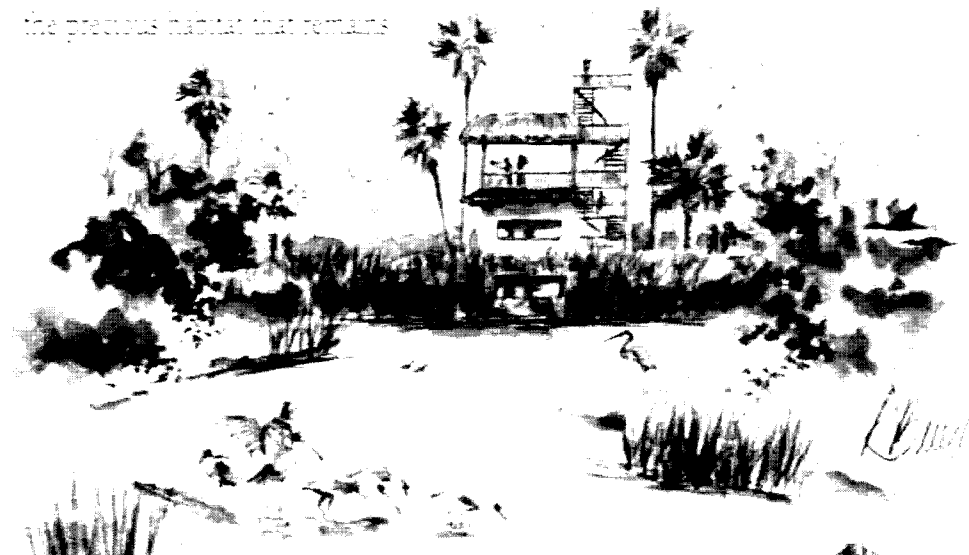
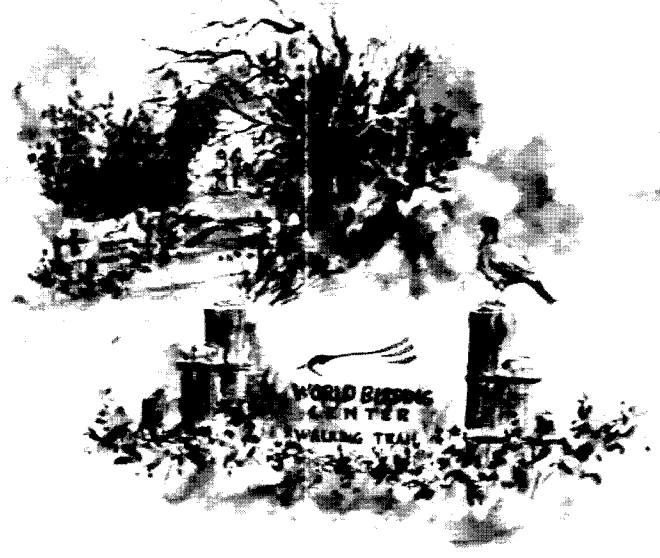
the precious habitat

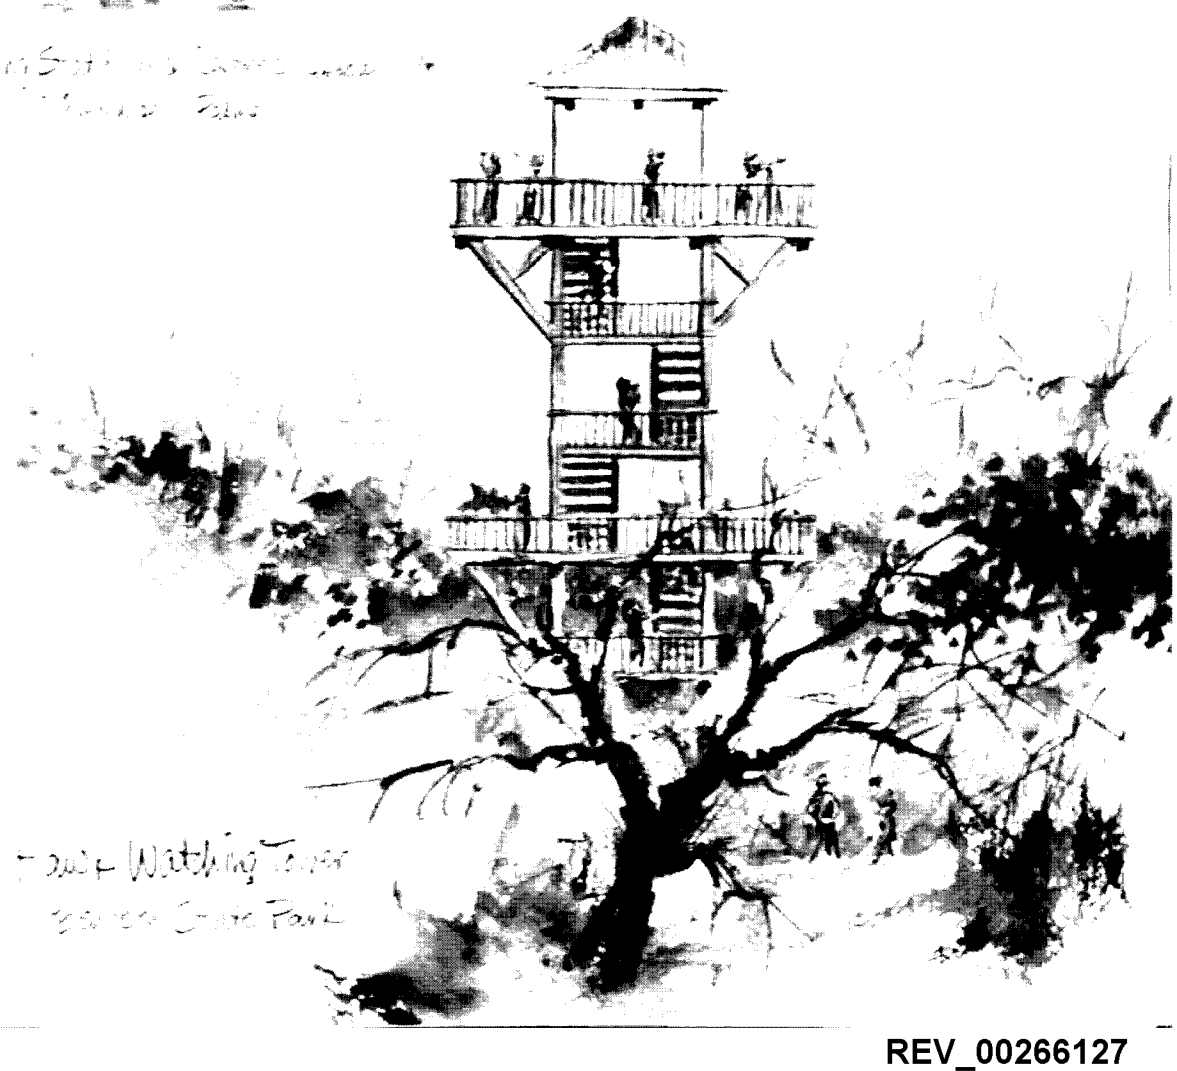
From carefully cultivated hummingbird gardens to remote wilderness tracts, The World Birding Center will offer diverse birding experiences for the avid and the casual birder.



We invite you to join us in conserving this area's fragile habitat and developing the World Birding Center's viewing trails and visitor facilities. A variety of naming opportunities are available. Your contributions will help preserve the Valley for birds and for all who love this uncommonly beautiful land.



REV_00266126



The World Birding Center, A Passion and A Mission

World Birding Center Mission Statement:
To significantly increase appreciation, understanding and active conservation of habitat, birds and other wildlife for current and future generations through education, community involvement, and sustainable nature tourism.

More than 95 percent of the Valley's native habitat already has been lost. Through the World Birding Center Valley communities from Roma to South Padre Island are restoring new areas and preserving the precious habitat that remains.

From carefully cultivated hummingbird gardens to remote wilderness tracts, The World Birding Center will offer diverse birding experiences for the avid and the casual birder.

We invite you to join us in conserving this area's fragile habitat and developing the World Birding Center's viewing trails and visitor facilities. A variety of naming opportunities are available. Your contributions will help preserve the Valley for birds and for all who love this uncommonly beautiful land.

WORLD BIRDING
CENTER

538438
F G006-27

49.5 % of households own stock.

Susan - discuss, please.
PUB: ELO. PACKAGE

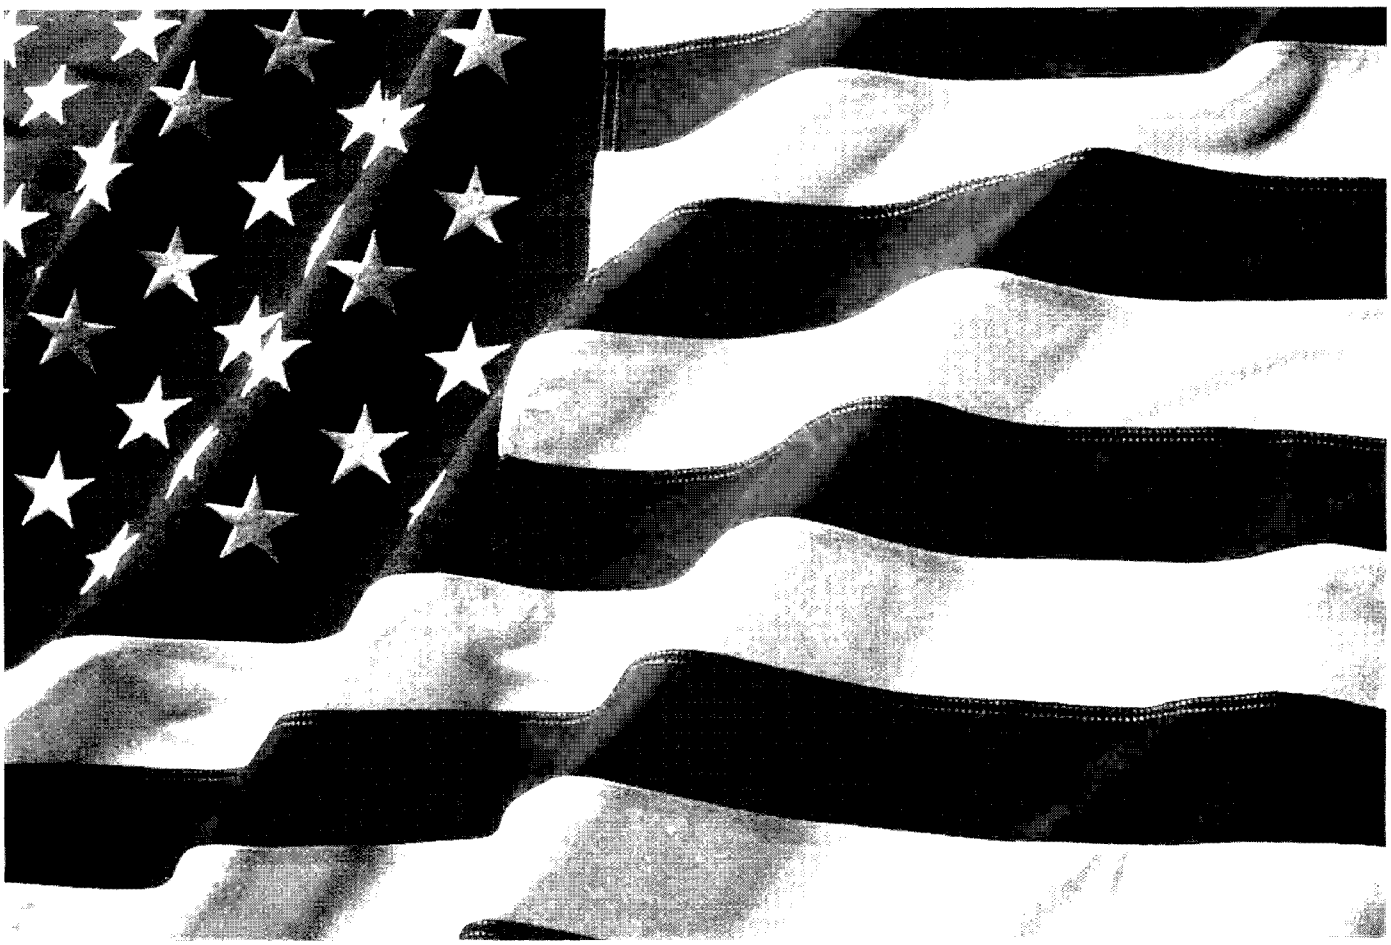
Characteristics of Members of 25th, 50th, and 75th Percentiles of Net Worth Distribution
(Based on 1998 Survey of Consumer Finances)

	25th Pctile		50th Pctile		75th Pctile		2002 Projected 50th Pctile
Net worth	$9,280		$70,259		$205,031		$75,334
Total assets	$27,614		$117,863		$261,597		$132,242
Financial assets	$4,835	(17.5%)	$22,430	(19.%)	$89,706	(34.3%)	$20,047	(19.%)
Directly held equity	$53	(.2%)	$2,367	(2.%)	$16,390	(6.3%)	$2,362	(2.%)
Bonds	$218	(.8%)	$320	(.3%)	$1,861	(.7%)	$391	(.3%)
Assets in retirement accts	$1,733	(6.3%)	$10,257	(8.7%)	$31,022	(11.9%)	$11,194	(8.7%)
Equity	$835	(3.0%)	$5,986	(5.1%)	$16,786	(6.4%)	$5,974	(5.1%)
Non-equity	$898	(3.3%)	$4,271	(3.6%)	$14,236	(5.4%)	$5,219	(3.6%)
Other financial assets	$2,830	(10.2%)	$9,486	(8.%)	$40,433	(15.5%)	$6,100	(8.%)
Non-financial assets	$22,779	(82.5%)	$95,433	(81.%)	$171,892	(65.7%)	$112,195	(81.%)
Housing value	$14,461	(52.4%)	$73,988	(62.8%)	$123,603	(47.2%)	$96,776	(62.8%)
Other non-financial assets	$8,318	(30.1%)	$21,445	(18.2%)	$48,289	(18.5%)	$15,419	(18.2%)
Total Debt	$18,333		$47,604		$56,566		$56,909
Housing debt	$12,343	(67.3%)	$35,274	(74.1%)	$45,306	(80.1%)	$48,043	(84.4%)
Other debt	$5,990	(32.7%)	$12,331	(25.9%)	$11,260	(19.9%)	$8,866	(15.6%)
Percent with any pension	44.1%		63.9%		76.3%
Percent with DB plans	25.6%		33.1%		53.1%
Percent with IRA or 401(k)	25.1%		45.0%		66.2%

Note: Percentages in parentheses are shares of total assets and total debt, respectively.

8574458

REV_00266129



Characteristics of Members of 25th, 50th, and 75th Percentiles of Retirement Asset Distribution
(Conditional on having positive retirement assets. Based on 1998 Survey of Consumer Finances)

	25th Pctile		50th Pctile		75th Pctile		2002 Projected 50th Pctile
Net worth	$184,796		$239,177		$426,526		$223,671
Total assets	$236,813		$295,297		$505,683		$293,363
Financial assets	$70,145	(17.5%)	$107,777	(19.%)	$185,277	(34.3%)	$97,885	(19.%)
Directly held equity	$8,953	(.2%)	$26,726	(2.%)	$56,249	(6.3%)	$26,672	(2.%)
Bonds	$3,924	(.8%)	$6,971	(.3%)	$6,664	(.7%)	$8,518	(.3%)
Assets in retirement accts	$6,958	(6.3%)	$24,281	(8.7%)	$75,266	(11.9%)	$26,889	(8.7%)
Equity	$3,424	(3.0%)	$12,424	(5.1%)	$40,755	(6.4%)	$12,399	(5.1%)
Non-equity	$3,534	(3.3%)	$11,857	(3.6%)	$34,510	(5.4%)	$14,490	(3.6%)
Other financial assets	$50,310	(10.2%)	$49,800	(8.%)	$47,098	(15.5%)	$35,806	(8.%)
Non-financial assets	$166,668	(82.5%)	$187,519	(81.%)	$320,406	(65.7%)	$195,477	(81.%)
Housing value	$84,126	(52.4%)	$102,973	(62.8%)	$135,523	(47.2%)	$134,689	(62.8%)
Other non-financial assets	$82,542	(30.1%)	$84,546	(18.2%)	$184,883	(18.5%)	$60,789	(18.2%)
Total Debt	$52,017		$56,120		$79,157		$69,692
Housing debt	$38,944	(74.9%)	$45,633	(81.3%)	$59,134	(74.7%)	$62,152	(89.2%)
Other debt	$13,073	(25.1%)	$10,487	(18.7%)	$20,023	(25.3%)	$7,540	(10.8%)
Percent with DB plans	37.2%		52.6%		50.6%
Percent with IRA or 401(k)	86.3%		94.2%		93.0%

Note: Percentages in parentheses are shares of total assets and total debt, respectively.

REV_00266130

Equity Ownership in America

Investment Company Institute and the Securities Industry Association

REV_00266131

FIGURE 76. continued

	Equity Investors	Type of Equity Owned: Individual Stock	Type of Equity Owned: Stock Mutual Fund
Household Defined Benefit or Defined Contribution Retirement Plan Coverage[2,3]
Defined benefit retirement plan	38	41	38
Defined contribution retirement plan	70	68	71
401(k) plan	57	56	58
403(b) plan	12	10	13
State, local, or federal government retirement plan	18	16	19
Any of the above	79	78	80
Household Ownership of State-Sponsored College Savings Plans
Yes	5	6	6
No	95	94	94
Number of respondents	2,148	1,109	1,910
Financial Goals[2,3]
Retirement	87	84	88
Inheritance	34	37	33
Emergency	33	35	32
Minimizing taxes	31	31	32
Education	29	30	29
Current income	18	21	17
Purchase of a home or other large item	14	15	13
Primary Financial Goal
Retirement	65	60	67
Education	10	11	9
Current income	6	8	6
Inheritance	6	7	6
Emergency	5	6	4
Purchase of home or other large item	3	4	3
Minimizing taxes	3	2	3
Number of respondents	2,110	1,093	1,878
Financial-Related Uses of the Internet in 2001[2,3]
Check stock prices	46	60	46
Read online financial publications	38	49	38
Access brokerage account for information	35	43	35
Access bank account	35	38	35
Collect information on retirement planning or personal financial planning	34	42	34
Send email to professional financial adviser or broker	15	20	16
Seek specific recommendations on how to invest money	15	20	15

[1] Excludes primary residence but includes assets in employer-sponsored retirement plans.

[2] Multiple responses included.

[3] Number of respondents varies.

REV_00266132

FIGURE 76

Financial Characteristics of All Equity Investors, Individual Stock Shareholders, and Stock Mutual Fund Shareholders, 2002

(percent)

		Type of Equity Owned
	Equity Investors	Individual Stock	Stock Mutual Fund
Household Financial Assets[1]
Less than $5,000	3	2	3
$5,000 to $9,999	5	4	5
$10,000 to $24,999	11	7	11
$25,000 to $49,999	14	12	14
$50,000 to $74,999	8	5	8
$75,000 to $99,999	8	6	8
$100,000 to $149,999	10	8	10
$150,000 to $199,999	6	8	6
$200,000 to $499,999	19	22	19
$500,000 to $749,999	6	9	6
$750,000 to $999,999	3	4	3
$1,000,000 or more	8	13	8
Mean	$463,400	$668,200	$466,800
Median	$100,000	$180,000	$100,000
Number of respondents	1,132	580	1,015
Household Ownership of Non-Equity Investments[2,3]
Bank deposit accounts	86	86	85
Bond investments	36	38	37
Individual bonds (excluding U.S. savings bonds)	17	21	17
Bond mutual funds	26	26	27
Hybrid mutual funds	52	53	56
Money market mutual funds	35	41	37
Fixed or variable annuities	23	23	24
Variable annuities	17	17	18
Fixed annuities	11	11	11
Investment real estate	24	29	24
Household Ownership of IRAs[2,3]
Traditional or Roth IRA	53	59	55
Traditional IRA	44	52	46
Roth IRA	21	24	23
SIMPLE IRA, SEP-IRA, or SAR-SEP IRA	15	15	16
Any of the above	57	62	59

REV_00266133

FIGURE 82

Equity Ownership Characteristics by Household Financial Assets

	Household Financial Assets
	Less than $25,000	$25,000 to $99,999	$100,000 to $499,999	$500,000 or More
Median
Household financial assets in equities	$6,000	$25,000	$100,000	$497,200
Number of equities owned	3	4	6	11
Percent of Equity-Owning Households
Own:
Individual stock (net)[1]	33	38	53	73
Inside employer-sponsored retirement plans	10	15	20	21
Outside employer-sponsored retirement plans	25	31	44	67
Stock mutual funds (net)[1]	89	88	92	90
Inside employer-sponsored retirement plans	68	76	72	58
Outside employer-sponsored retirement plans	38	39	60	71
Conducted equity transaction(s) during 2001	20	33	44	60
Year of first equity purchase:
Before 1990	12	27	55	78
1990 to 1995	20	33	25	12
1996 to 1998	25	27	12	9
1999 or later	43	13	8	1
Source of first equity purchase:
Inside employer-sponsored retirement plan	63	60	49	30
Outside employer-sponsored retirement plan	31	33	41	64
Both inside and outside employer-sponsored retirement plan in same year	6	7	10	6
Type of equity first purchased:
Individual stock only	17	19	21	31
Stock mutual funds only	74	72	67	51
Both individual stock and stock mutual funds	9	9	12	18
Willing to take:
Substantial risk for substantial gain	11	10	8	10
Above-average risk for above-average gain	25	29	27	29
Average risk for average gain	45	47	51	50
Below-average risk for below-average gain	11	7	9	8
Unwilling to take any risk	8	7	5	3
Primary financial goal:
Retirement	63	72	68	64
Education	12	9	10	8
Other	25	19	22	28
Agree:[1]
I am not concerned about short-term fluctuations in my investments	77	77	80	80
I tend to rely on advice from a professional financial adviser when making investment decisions	54	54	57	56

[1]Multiple responses included.

Note: Number of respondents varies. See pp. 2–3 for transaction definitions.

REV_00266134

FIGURE 91

Characteristics of Individual Stock Shareholders by Household Financial Assets

	Household Financial Assets
	Less than $25,000	$25,000 to $99,999	$100,000 to $499,999	$500,000 or More
Median
Age[1]	36 years	39 years	46 years	55 years
Household income	$45,000	$63,800	$75,100	$125,000
Household financial assets[2]	$10,000	$48,000	$212,600	$1,000,000
Percent of Individual Stock-Owning Households
Married or living with a partner[1]	67	60	71	81
College or postgraduate degree[1]	40	50	59	77
Completed graduate school[1]	15	14	24	43
Employed[1]	88	91	79	67
Retired from lifetime occupation[1]	7	9	18	43
Non-equity investments held:[3]
Savings accounts, money market deposit accounts, or certificates of deposit	80	84	82	88
Bond investments (net)[3]	10	19	40	51
Individual bonds (excluding U.S. savings bonds)	8	8	19	33
Bond mutual funds	6	13	29	36
Fixed or variable annuities	9	9	23	33
Hybrid mutual funds	32	47	57	65
Money market mutual funds	21	28	39	52
Investment real estate	8	15	31	49
Participate in or covered by defined benefit or defined contribution retirement plan (net)[3]	71	86	85	77
Defined benefit plan	27	41	48	47
Defined contribution plan (net)[3]	64	80	78	63
401(k) plan	55	67	66	49
403(b) plan	5	11	10	13
State, local, or federal government plan	13	14	21	16
Have IRA (net)[3]	31	58	64	78
Traditional IRA	22	37	55	72
Roth IRA	18	27	24	24
SIMPLE IRA, SEP-IRA, SAR-SEP IRA	9	12	19	15
Used Internet in 2001 to:[3]
Check stock prices	72	63	66	68
Send email to a professional financial adviser or broker	18	16	22	31
Seek specific investment recommendations	19	22	22	27
Access a brokerage account to get information	49	44	49	52
Ethnic background:[3]
Caucasian	95	92	94	94
African-American	4	5	3	1
Asian	2	1	2	2
Hispanic	4	2	5	3

[1] Refers to the household's responding financial decisionmaker for investments.

[2] Includes assets in employer-sponsored retirement plans but excludes value of primary residence.

[3] Multiple responses included.

Note: Number of respondents varies.

REV_00266135

FIGURE 92

Individual Stock Ownership Characteristics by Household Financial Assets

	Household Financial Assets
	Less than $25,000	$25,000 to $99,999	$100,000 to $499,999	$500,000 or More
Median
Household financial assets in individual stocks	$3,800	$13,000	$35,000	$200,000
Number of individual stocks owned	2	2	3	8
Percent of Individual Stock-Owning Households
Own:
Individual stock (net)[1]	100	100	100	100
Inside employer-sponsored retirement plans	32	40	38	29
Outside employer-sponsored retirement plans	78	83	85	93
Stock mutual funds (net)[1]	65	69	85	85
Inside employer-sponsored retirement plans	36	59	69	55
Outside employer-sponsored retirement plans	46	38	62	72
Conducted individual stock transaction(s) during 2001	24	45	44	62
Year of first individual stock purchase:
Before 1990	18	22	41	70
1990 to 1995	11	22	24	19
1996 to 1998	31	31	19	6
1999 or later	40	25	16	5
Source of first individual stock purchase:
Inside employer-sponsored retirement plan	30	32	30	17
Outside employer-sponsored retirement plan	70	60	63	81
Both inside and outside employer-sponsored retirement plan in same year	0	8	7	2
Type of equity first purchased:
Individual stock only	54	47	40	44
Stock mutual funds only	16	30	38	31
Both individual stock and stock mutual funds	30	23	22	25
Willing to take:
Substantial risk for substantial gain	14	9	9	11
Above-average risk for above-average gain	29	31	29	31
Average risk for average gain	45	49	49	49
Below-average risk for below-average gain	9	6	9	5
Unwilling to take any risk	3	5	4	4
Primary financial goal:
Retirement	48	70	65	64
Education	10	11	12	10
Other	42	19	23	26
Agree:[1]
I am not concerned about short-term fluctuations in my investments	75	80	78	81
I tend to rely on advice from a professional financial adviser when making investment decisions	45	41	49	52

[1] Multiple responses included.

Note: Number of respondents varies. See pp. 2–3 for transaction definitions.

REV_00266136

538438
FG006-07

FAX COVER SHEET

Send to: Karl Rove	From: John Averyt
Attention: EYES ONLY	Date: 10/18/02
Office location: White House	Office location: Home

PRA 6

☐ Urgent ☐ Reply ASAP ☐ Please comment ☒ Please review ☐ For your information

Total pages, including cover 4

Comments:

Thought this might interest you.

John Averyt

OpinionEditorials.com
A project of Frontiers of Freedom
"All the opinions that are fit to print!"

October 17, 2002

Rope a Dope or Knockout

John R. Averyt

Iraq is "off the table." Democrats want to discuss the economy. While President Bush was on vacation this summer, the Democrats demanded a debate on Iraq. They kept up their drumbeat until the President came off the ropes.

The Bush administration responded with a full court press on Iraq. Under patriotic pressure, Minority Leader Richard Gephardt and Majority Leader Senator Tom Daschle signed the Resolution of Force against Iraq. Now they want to discuss the economy? As the old saying goes, be careful for what you wish . You might get it.

Election rhetoric tends to overheat, so what is the current state of the economy? Is it really as bad as Democrats say? Do they exercise political poetic license? Their fellow travelers claim this the worst economy since Herbert Hoover. Visions of bread lines dance in Democrat heads. Are they merely visions or have they some basis in reality?

There is general agreement that the economy is growing. September's 5.6% unemployment represents the second monthly decline. It peaked at 6.0% in April of 2002. A level of 7.0% unhorsed the President's father in 1992. Joblessness reached its nadir at 4.0% during 2000, the final year of the Clinton Bubble.

Unemployment from the Carter years peaked at 9.0% in 1982, making 5.6% seem downright reasonable. Assuming, that is, one is still employed. To the unemployed, this is a depression. In a time of relative prosperity, it must seem worse than Hoover's.

On October 15, 2002, the Dow Industrial Average rose 378.28 points, or 4.8 percent, to close at 8,255.68. Strong earnings from Bank of America and Citigroup led the market. Microsoft, General Motors, Cisco, and Intel posted solid gains. In four trading days the Dow is up 13.3 %, over a thousand points. The S&P 500 is up 13.4%. While both remain negative for the year, things certainly look better today than Wednesday, October 9, 2002. The Dow was then at a five year low.

No one can measure the anger of the unemployed. They have not yet mounted an assault upon the

REV_00266138

Capitol steps. Nor is there any indication they have turned against Republicans. This is something Democrats aim to change.

The Associated Press reported that Representative Richard Gephardt had denounced President Bush for "abdicating" economic leadership. The Minority Leader proposed a 200 billion-dollar tax cut and spending program for economic stimulus. Tax cut from Richard Gephardt? Is someone coming to his senses?

Mr. Gephardt went on to say that "the last thing you do in a recession is raise taxes." Aside from the inaccuracy of the recession statement, the economy is growing, he sounded like Dick Armey. $200 billion seems like a lot of money. One cannot cavil when stimulating a $10 trillion economy. The President should see Mr. Gephardt's $200 billion and raise him $500 billion. Time to come off the ropes.

Rope a dope is the boxing tactic used by Mohammed Ali to defeat George Foreman. He laid on the ropes and absorbed punches until Foreman was exhausted. Then Ali put the big man on the canvas.

As Mr. Gephardt observed, one cannot ask for bi-partisanship on Iraq and not on the economy. Even a broken watch is correct twice a day.

The President's economic advisors should meet with Democrat and Republican leaders. Let them craft proposals and discuss alternatives. The President could give a speech to the nation calling for bi-partisan cooperation. He should outline his master plan for the economy. The Democrats are eager to debate. GOP Chairman Marc Racicot says that the Republicans have already proposed all the items in Mr. Gephardt's bill. Let the games begin.

Things are not as bad as they could be and not as good as they should be. They are not as bad as the Democrats would have us think. There is no recession. Growth is slow. Unemployment is moderate, if one is still employed. Responsibility can be assigned to a Democrat Senate stone wall. They refuse to pass growth-stimulating legislation. Homeland Security, Terrorism Insurance, Energy Independence, all would add thousands of jobs to our economy. The President should tell Mr. Daschle, "tear down that wall."

Mr. Gephardt's proposal doesn't sound so bad. The President who signed the bloated farm bill and the unconstitutional Campaign Finance Reform can consider a few billion in tax rebates. Christmas is coming. Why not play Santa Claus? It's much more attractive than Ebenezer Scrooge.

A recent survey found 40% of Americans wanted to hear their candidates talk about the economy. 11% mentioned terrorism; 4% Iraq. The Republicans can master this issue. Mr. Bush spent the last part of the summer on the ropes. He won a famous victory. Time to put them on the canvas, Mr. President. Those who have lost their livelihoods depend on you. Christmas is coming.

###

John R. Averyt

http://www.opinioneditorials.com/guestcontributors/averyt_20021017.html 10/17/2002

Send comments to JAveryt@nyc.rr.com

Click here to read additional articles by this author.

Enter your email address to receive our free "Special Update" newsletter including cutting-edge commentary, contest announcements, and more.

Submit

www.ff.org

OpinionEditorials.com is brought to you by Frontiers of Freedom

This site is provided as an educational service of Frontiers of Freedom (FOF). The ideas and opinions expressed herein do not necessarily reflect the thought or opinions of FOF or its officers, staff, or directors.

© 2002 Frontiers of Freedom | All rights reserved | Terms and Conditions editor@opinioneditorials.com

538438
FG006-27

- Decline
- Let them know we just received

Sent e-mail 10/16

EXEC. OFC. PRESIDENT
WH STRATEGIC INITIATIVES
2002 OCT 16 PM 1:31

EDWARD J. FITZMAURICE, JR.

And

HARRY R. HOGLANDER

Cordially Invite You To Attend

A Reception To Meet The New National Mediation Board Members

Thursday, October 17, 2002
5:00 pm to 7:00 pm

The State Room
National Mediation Board
1301 K Street, N.W.
Suite 250 East
Washington, D.C. 20005

E-MAIL RSVP TO: rsvp@nmb.gov

REV_00266143

538438 .01 [illegible] + return for laptop entry
FG006-17

Karl C. Rove
05/26/2002 10:14:58 AM

Record Type: Record

To: Susan B. Ralston/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:
Subject: the final goodbye

run this off
---------- Forwarded by Karl C. Rove/WHO/EOP on 05/26/2002 10:14 AM ----------

Lorraine Nisbet
05/22/2002 09:29:33 AM

Record Type: Record

To:

cc:
Subject: the final goodbye

I wanted to thank all of you for the great memories I will take with me when I leave the White House today for the last time. I am moving back to Texas to be closer to my family and friends. Time did not allow me to say personal farewells to everyone, so I hope you accept this as my expression of thanks for all you have done to make working here so special. I enjoyed working with each of you and hope to keep in touch once I am gone. Take care.

Lorraine Nisbet

PRA 6

538438
FG006-27

GIFT REGISTER

THE WHITE HOUSE

For President/First Lady
Please Complete as Thoroughly as Possible
Please Send Gift and Register to: White House Gift Office
Room 457, OEOB
456-7133

Gift Accepted By or Presented To:	Date Gift Received/Presented:	Date Form Filled in:
Karl C. Rove	10/16/02	10/16/02

Title and Office: Senior Advisor

GIFT INTENDED FOR

☒ President ☐ First Lady ☐ President & First Lady ☐ Other First Family Member (indicate below)

DONOR INFORMATION

DONOR INFORMATION	PRESENTED BY
Name of Donor: ☐ Dr. ☐ Mr. ☐ Ms. ☐ Mrs. ☐ Rev. ☒ Other ___ Chairman Richard M. Langworth	Presenter: (if other than Donor) David Sampson
Address: (please include Zip Code and Country if applicable) The Churchill Center 181 Burrage Road Hopkinton, New Hampshire 03229	Address: (please include Zip Code and Country if applicable) Economic Development Administration 14th & Constitution Ave., N.W. Washington, DC 20230

GIFT INFORMATION

Circumstances of Presentation: (including date, location, and purpose of event)	Brief Description of Gift:
Given by the Chairman to David Sampson and then mailed to Karl Rove.	Book, "Supreme Command" by Eliot Cohen

ACKNOWLEDGMENT

☐ Copy Attached ☒ To be Handled by Gift Office
Coordinate Acknowledgment with other office: (i.e. NSC, State - specify below)

REPORT PREPARED BY

Name:
Susan B. Ralston
Office:	Room No.:	Telephone No.: (please include area code)
Office of the Senior Advisor	2-WW	202-456-2369

OTHER COMMENTS

REV_00266145

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION
Assistant Secretary

2 October 02

Karl,

While attending the Churchill Center's recent annual conference, the Chairman asked that I pass on a copy of Supreme Command w/ his compliments to the President. The chapters on Lincoln + Churchill are especially noteworthy.

Keep up the great work and feel free to use me wherever I can help in the next few weeks.

Best regards.

THE CHURCHILL CENTER
WASHINGTON, D.C. • WWW.WINSTONCHURCHILL.ORG

Richard M. Langworth CBE
Chairman, Board of Trustees

Telephone: (603) 746-4433
Facsimile: (603) 746-4260
E-mail: malakand@conknet.com

181 Burrage Road
Hopkinton, New Hampshire
03229 U.S.A.

REV_00266146

THE CHURCHILL CENTER

WASHINGTON, D.C. • WWW.WINSTON CHURCHILL.ORG • PATRON: THE LADY SOAMES DBE

11 September 2002

Richard M. Langworth CBE
Chairman, Board of Trustees
181 Burrage Road, Hopkinton
New Hampshire 03229 USA
Telephone (603) 746-4433
Facsimile (603) 746-4260
Email: malakand@conknet.com

HONORARY MEMBERS
The Hon. Conrad M. Black OC PC
Winston S. Churchill
The Lord Deedes KBE MC PC DL
Sir Martin Gilbert CBE
Grace Hamblin OBE • Robert Hardy CBE
The Lord Jenkins of Hillhead OM PC
Yousuf Karsh CC • William Manchester
The Duke of Marlborough, JP DL
Elizabeth Nel
Sir Anthony Montague Browne KGMG CBE DFC
Colin L. Powell KCB • Wendy Russell Reves
Ambassador Paul H. Robinson, Jr.
The Lady Thatcher LG OM PC FRS
The Hon. Caspar W. Weinberger GBE

BOARD OF TRUSTEES
Winston S. Churchill • The Hon. Jack Kemp
Richard M. Langworth • George A. Lewis
Amb. Paul H. Robinson, Jr.
The Hon. Celia Sandys
The Hon. Caspar W. Weinberger

BOARD OF GOVERNORS
Garnet R. Barber • David Boler
D. Craig Horn • William C. Ives
Nigel Knocker • Richard M. Langworth
Dr. John H. Matl.er • Charles D. Platt
John G. Plumpton • Douglas S. Russell
Ex-officio: James W. Muller

ASSOCIATED ORGANIZATIONS
International Churchill Society, Canada
International Churchill Society, UK
International Churchill Society, Australia

AFFILIATE
Washington Society for Churchill

THE CHURCHILL CENTER
Founded in 1968 to encourage study of the life and thought of Winston Spencer Churchill; to foster research about his speeches, writings and deeds; to advance knowledge of his example as a statesman; and, by programs of teaching and publishing, to impart that learning to men, women and young people around the world.

Dear Mr President.

Having heard your views on the Great Man many times, and knowing of the bust in your office, David Sampson and I thought you would enjoy the enclosed book.

I also enclose two copies of our journal, Finest Hour—the current issue, and the 9/11 one. If you should wish to receive them regularly you have only to let David know, though I cannot imagine how limited your time is.

Our mission for 20 years has never changed: to foster leadership, statesmanship, vision and boldness among democratic and freedom loving peoples worldwide, through the thoughts, words, works and deeds of Winston Churchill. We are glad to know you share our sentiments.

All success attend your hand in the months ahead.

Respectfully

Richard M. Langworth

The President
The White House
Washington

REV_00266147

SUPREME COMMAND

★ ★ ★

SOLDIERS, STATESMEN, AND LEADERSHIP IN WARTIME

★ ★ ★

"Cohen argues . . . that great victories are more often achieved precisely when national leaders involve themselves in the pursuit of policy. This is a great read, and more importantly, it carries a significant message."
—PAUL KENNEDY, author of The Rise and Fall of the Great Powers

ELIOT A. COHEN

REV_00266148

October 9, 2002

The President
The White House
Washington, DC 20502-0184

Dear Mr. President:

On behalf of the family of Cesar E. Chavez and the Cesar E. Chavez Foundation, I write to invite you to deliver the keynote address at the Foundation's Third Annual Educating the Heart Dinner on Friday evening, April 4, 2003, in Los Angeles.

The Educating the Heart Dinner is the Chavez Foundation and family's official celebration of Cesar Chavez Day, now an official holiday in five states: California, Colorado, Arizona, Texas, and New Mexico. In these states and throughout the country, Cesar Chavez Day is a "day on," not a day off—a chance for people to celebrate Cesar's life by participating in his legacy of self-improvement through serving others. In California alone, over 500,000 students took part in service-learning activities around Cesar Chavez Day 2002 that directly benefited over one million California residents.

Our 2002 Dinner was one of the largest events in Los Angeles, attended by over 1,400 of Southern California's business, labor, community, and political leaders. This year's Cesar Chavez Day is of particular significance, as we prepare to mark the tenth anniversary of Cesar's passing; the Dinner promises to be one of California's most important events.

Speakers at past Educating the Heart events have included Governor Gray Davis, Cardinal Roger Mahony, actors Martin Sheen and Edward James Olmos, and Yolanda King, eldest daughter of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. This year, as the United States celebrates Cesar's place among our pantheon of national heroes by publishing a commemorative postage stamp in his honor, it would be particularly fitting for you to address our gathering. We would be honored if you were able to join us.

The Cesar E. Chavez Foundation, a 501(c)(3) non-profit charity, was established in 1993 by Cesar's family and friends to preserve, promote, and apply the legacy and universal values of civil rights and farm labor leader Cesar Chavez through contemporary programming based on his timeless vision for a better and more just world. Proceeds from the Dinner enable the Foundation to pursue its mission through programs such as the Cesar E. Chavez Citizenship Project, the Cesar E. Chavez Oral History Project, and scholarships for needy students.

We sincerely hope that you will be able to participate in the Educating the Heart Dinner on April 4, 2003.

Very truly yours,

Andrés F. Irlando
Executive Director

CESAR E. CHAVEZ FOUNDATION
634 SOUTH SPRING STREET SUITE 727 LOS ANGELES, CA 90014
PHONE: 213 362 0267 FAX: 213 362 0265
www.cesarechavezfoundation.org info@cecfmail.org

REV_00266150

Determined to be an Administrative Marking
Per E.O. 13526, SEC 3.4(B)

538438
FG006-27

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
PROPOSED TALKING POINTS ON U.S. POLICY TOWARD IRAQ

~~CONFIDENTIAL~~

The American Jewish Committee does not intend to issue a written statement on policy toward Iraq. However, if members are asked the organization's views by members of Congress or other officials, or by fellow civic leaders, the following talking points may guide a response:

- The American Jewish Committee supports the Administration's assessment of the danger posed by the regime of Saddam Hussein – and the Administration's conclusion, affirmed in bipartisan resolutions before Congress, that absent strict, swift and certain Iraqi compliance with its disarmament agreements and with repeated UN Security Council resolutions, force may be required to confront the Iraqi threat. If the U.S. decides to go to war against Iraq, AJC will give its total support to our country's effort.

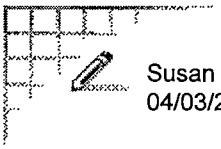
- The regime of Saddam Hussein, a supporter and instrument of terror, poses a grave threat to America and American interests – and to regional and world stability.

  - Iraq possesses biological and chemical warfare materials and has shown its willingness to use them; Saddam has used chemical warfare against Iran and against Kurdish villagers in his own country. For decades, Iraq has been trying to develop nuclear weapons – and, with UN inspectors banished since 1998, it appears close to succeeding. Over the years AJC has commissioned and disseminated research papers on the Iraqi weapons programs, assessing the grave threat they pose to the region and to the world.

  - The Iraqi regime continues to violate Security Council mandates, and its own commitments, to disarm. It evaded and deceived UN inspectors seeking to enforce these commitments, and ultimately forced their exit. It continues its quest to acquire weapons of mass destruction.

  - Saddam Hussein has proven himself to be vicious and maniacal, and the world cannot rely on his self-restraint or self-preservation to keep him from using non-conventional weapons.

- The Iraqi threat is likely to grow more ominous unless checked decisively – that is, unless the regime, a necessary target of the war against global terrorism, is effectively disarmed – at the earliest feasible date. U.S. leadership is essential in meeting this challenge.



- AJC's consultations with 60 foreign governments in the opening weeks of the current UN General Assembly session found wide agreement on Iraq's threat to peace and stability; we also heard praise for the President's decision to seek Security Council support for decisive action.

- AJC commends the Administration for seeking to work through the UN Security Council for effective inspections and appropriate military measures that would assure the elimination of Iraq's WMD capability, and for seeking congressional authority to take military action against Iraq if necessary.

- AJC recognizes the strategic, political and humanitarian challenges that will face Iraq and the international community in the aftermath of military action – and at the dawn of Iraqi freedom from the despotic rule of Saddam Hussein. U.S. leadership in meeting these challenges will be essential.

538438

FG006-27

Susan B. Ralston
04/03/2002 05:14:39 PM

Record Type: Record

To: Kirk Blalock/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:
Subject: American Chemistry Council

Per our conversation, call Fred Webber re: 9/17/02 invitation to Karl to have dinner w/ ACC Executive Committee at Ritz Carlton at 7 PM.

PRA 6

FREDERICK L. WEBBER
PRESIDENT AND CEO

American Chemistry Council Good Chemistry Makes It Possible

March 11, 2002

The Honorable Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Ave., NW
Washington, DC 20500

Dear Karl,

The American Chemistry Council Executive Committee, made up of 15 CEOs of the world's leading chemical companies, will be meeting in Washington on September 17, 2002. We would be pleased if you could join us at dinner from 7:00 to 9:00 PM at the Ritz Carlton Pentagon City and speak to the group on the administration's accomplishments and priorities.

I will follow up with your office, or you can have a member of your staff contact me directly or Ed Murphy of the American Chemistry Council Federal Relations Department at 703-741-5936 concerning your participation. I know our Executive Committee will find your comments extremely valuable.

Again, thank you for considering this request.

Sincerely,

I'm looking forward to seeing you on Wednesday evening at the St. Regis. All the best!

THE GRIZZLE COMPANY
Suite 400
1400 Sixteenth Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20036
Tel 202/234-2101
Fax 202/234-1614
e-mail: grizzleco@aol.com

* * * * * FAX * * * * *

TO: Susan Ralston

FAX No.: 456-0191

FROM: Charlie Grizzle

DATE: April 3, 2002 (5:01PM)

TOTAL PAGES FAXED: 3 (including cover)

MESSAGE:

THANKS!

THE GRIZZLE COMPANY

Tel: 202 234 2101 Fax: 202 234 1614

April 2, 2002

Mr. Karl C. Rove
Senior Advisor to the President
The White House
Washington, D.C. 20500

Dear Karl:

You will recall that I spoke with you about this potential dinner with the Executive Committee of the American Chemistry Council at our recent old gang dinner. Dave D'Antoni, with Ashland, Inc., one of our clients is the current chair of the Executive Committee.

I know you have many demands on your time, but I believe this would be a very worthwhile engagement.

Thank you for your consideration.

Best regards,

Charlie

Charles L. Grizzle
Chairman

Attachment

Suite 400 1400 Sixteenth Street, N.W. Washington, D.C. 20036 E-mail: GrizzleCo@aol.com

538438
F0006-27

ITINERARY
New York City
October 16, 2002

Marc Racicot, Karl Rove, Adam Goldman

8:00 – 9:05	US Air Shuttle #2662 National to La Guardia
Transportation	Carey Limo at Baggage claim (will remain all day) 212-599-1122 confirmation: 02688047
10:00 – 10:40	Paul Gigot, WSJ 200 Liberty Street, World Financial Center, 11th Floor 212-416-4236
11:00 – 11:30	Roger Ailes, CEO of Fox News Channel 1211 Avenue of the Americas, Second Floor Contact is Bridget: 212-301-8220
12:00 – 12:30	Hon. John Whitehead, Chairman, Lower Manhattan Redevelopment Corp. 21 Club, Main Private Dining Room 21 West 52nd Street Contact is Mindy Gollop: 212-582-7200 Mark Miller: 202-309-1528
12:30 – 2:30	Louis Perlmutter Fundraiser Luncheon 21 Club, Club Room
2:45 – 3:15	Jack Rosen, President, American Jewish Congress 21 Club, Club Room
Transportation	Carey – please note separate car for Rove/Goldman 212-599-1122 confirmation: 02688015
Rove/Goldman 4:30 – 5:44	Delta Shuttle #1761 La Guardia to National
Racicot TBD	To Atlantic City

539438
FG006-27

KARL ROVE

REMARKS AT LEWIS PERLMUTTER LUNCHEON
12:30 p.m. – 2:00 p.m.
21 Club
New York, New York

Israel Policy Forum

The Israel Policy Forum (IPF) was founded in 1993 "with a singular purpose: to support active and sustained American efforts aimed at resolving the conflict between Israel and its Arab neighbors." The IPF "has been the only independent, mainstream Jewish organization that consistently mobilizes prominent American Jews to deliver a solid message of support for an active American diplomatic role in the Mideast."

The Forum states in their mission statement that they are non-partisan. They are generally supportive of President Bush promoting peace in the Middle East, and their recent activities have "worked hard on encouraging support for the President's vision of a peaceful Middle East." In a letter to the President this July they thanked the President for his efforts stating, "Thank you for your commitment set forth in your June 24, 2002, address to actively lead toward the goal of reaching a final status agreement between Israel and the Palestinians within three years. We pledge to support our country's effort to do so."

The Forum's main focus is on peace. They are critical of all sides who utilize force as a sword or a shield. Consequently, the tone of the Forum has become less supportive of the President in his effort to gain support for an attack on Iraq. In an October 11th article titled "Like Father, Like Son?," the Forum advises that it would be "best if the Bush administration puts its weight behind diplomatic efforts to resume negotiations and achieve an end to Israeli-Palestinian violence, in advance of any action against Saddam Hussein if possible." The Forum makes its case that war on Iraq should be done with care and advises that "it is the responsibility of the United States to ensure that the Iraq situation does not make the Middle East even more of a tinder box."

Lunch Group

This luncheon is with business leaders of the American Jewish community. This group is made up mostly of people involved in finance but also includes textiles and manufacturing sectors. On whole, the group leans Democrat. While most of the attendees are from the Northeast (mainly New York), there is one attendee from California and one from Ohio.

Note: Since 1998, the luncheon attendees have collectively donated $1.125 million to Democrat groups and candidates and $332,500 to Republican groups and candidates.

Invited Guests

Gary Heiman (Ohio)
CEO, Standard Textile Industry: Textiles

William Kaye (New York)
Managing Partner, MBK Partners
Industry: Finance – Investment Management

Marvin Lender (Connecticut)
Vice Chairman, M & M Investments, LLC
Industry: Finance - Investment

Jerry Levin (New York)
Chairman and CEO, Sunbeam
Industry: Manufacturing

Peter May (New York)
President and COO, Triarc Companies Inc.
Industry: Metals and Packaging

Joseph Neubauer (Pennsylvania)
Chairman and CEO, Aramark
Industry: Managed Services

Norman Pattiz (California)
Founder and Chairman, Westwood One Industry: Radio

Stephen Peck (New York)
Partner, Torrey Associates, LLC
Industry: Finance - Investment

Louis Perlmutter (New York)
Limited Managing Director, Lazard Freres & Co. LLC
Industry: Finance – Investment Banking

Michael Sonnenfeldt (New York)
Founder and Owner, MUUS & Co.
Industry: Finance - Investment

538938
FE001-77

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

CONTACT PERSON: Susan Ralston

PHONE NUMBER: 6-2369

DATE OF REQUEST: 10/8/02

Your Name and Position:
Adam Goldman, Associate Director of Public Liaison

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
RNC political meetings in NYC

Dates of Travel: Wed, 10/16/02 Destination(s): NYC

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
~~Republican National Committee~~

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Marc Racicot

Address of Organization: ~~310 First Street, SE~~
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: PRA 6

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Airfare	$236.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☐ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to ☐ 31 U.S.C. 1353 ☐ 5 CFR 2635.[illegible]

Counsel's Signature Date

15 Oct 02

(REV. 7/96)

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Susan Ralston

PHONE NUMBER: 6-2369

DATE OF REQUEST: 10/8/02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
Karl C. Rove, Senior Advisor to the President

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
RNC political meetings in NYC

Dates of Travel: Wed, 10/16/02 Destination(s): NYC

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
~~Republican National Committee~~

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Marc Racicot

Address of Organization: ~~310 First Street, SE~~
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: PRA 6

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Airfare	$236.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three ~~(3)~~ days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☐ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 41 CFR 304-1.2 ☐ 5 CFR 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature Date

15 Oct 02

(REV. 7/98)

TRAVEL AUTHORIZATION

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

DATE OF REQUEST: 10/8/02

Please Print

TRAVEL AUTHORIZATION NUMBER: _____

Last Name	First Name
Rove	Karl
Extension: 6-2369	Room: WW-2	Title: Senior Advisor	Office: OSI
Contact Person: please print Susan Ralston			Extension: 6-2369

ATTACHMENTS:

☐ Invitation/Documentation Regarding Event ☒ Travel Expenses From Outside Sources Form

PURPOSE OF TRAVEL (include event dates and host information, if applicable):

RNC political meetings in NYC

DEPARTURE:			RETURN:
Date:	Time:	Mode:	Date:	Time:	Mode:
Wed, 10/16	9:00 AM	US Air	Wed, 10/16	5:00 PM	US Air

ITINERARY (List all cities including those through which flights are routed):

Origin: Washington National Airport, DC

Destination: LaGuardia, New York

Return to: Washington National Airport, DC

FUNDING SOURCE:

☐ Official ☒ Political ☐ Mixed ☐ 501 (c)(3) ☐ Other: _____

NOTE: For travel funded by political, 501(c)(3) or other sources, an approved "Travel Expenses From Outside Source" form must be attached.

SPECIAL EXPENSES

Hotel:		Per Diem:		Privately Owned Vehicle:
Air Fare:	$236.00	Taxi:		Standard Vehicle Rental:
Train Fare:		Mini-Van Rental:		TOTAL ESTIMATED EXPENSES:	$236.00

APPROVING SIGNATURES:

Office Head:	Chief of Staff or Designee:
White House Management:	Political Travel:

(REV. 1/02)

ORIGINAL (WH MANAGEMENT COPY)

REV_00266163

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

CONTACT PERSON: Susan Ralston

PHONE NUMBER: 6-2369

DATE OF REQUEST: 10/8/02

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

Your Name and Position:
Adam Goldman, Associate Director of Public Liaison

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
RNC political meetings in NYC

Dates of Travel: Wed, 10/16/02 Destination(s): NYC

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
~~Republican National Committee~~

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Marc Racicot

Address of Organization: ~~310 First Street, SE~~
Washington, DC 20003

Phone: PRA 6

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Airfare	$236.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization.
You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel

TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☐ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☐ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature _____ Date _____

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00266164

TRAVEL AUTHORIZATION

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

DATE OF REQUEST: 10/8/02

Please Print

TRAVEL AUTHORIZATION NUMBER: _____

Last Name	First Name
Goldman	Adam

Extension:	Room:	Title:	Office:
6-5157	187B	Associate Director	OPL

Contact Person: please print	Extension:
Susan Ralston	6-2369

ATTACHMENTS:

☐ Invitation/Documentation Regarding Event ☒ Travel Expenses From Outside Sources Form

PURPOSE OF TRAVEL (include event dates and host information, if applicable):

RNC political meetings in NYC

DEPARTURE:			RETURN:
Date:	Time:	Mode:	Date:	Time:	Mode:
Wed, 10/16	9:00 AM	US Air	Wed, 10/16	5:00 PM	US Air

ITINERARY (List all cities including those through which flights are routed):

Origin: Washington National Airport, DC

Destination: LaGuardia, New York

Return to: Washington National Airport, DC

FUNDING SOURCE:

☐ Official ☒ Political ☐ Mixed ☐ 501 (c)(3) ☐ Other: _____

NOTE: For travel funded by political, 501(c)(3) or other sources, an approved "Travel Expenses From Outside Source" form must be attached.

SPECIAL EXPENSES

Hotel:		Per Diem:		Privately Owned Vehicle:
Air Fare:	$236.00	Taxi:		Standard Vehicle Rental:
Train Fare:		Mini-Van Rental:		TOTAL ESTIMATED EXPENSES:	$236.00

APPROVING SIGNATURES:

Office Head:	Chief of Staff or Designee:
White House Management:	Political Travel:

(REV. 1/02)

ORIGINAL (WH MANAGEMENT COPY)

REV_00266165

TRAVEL EXPENSES FROM OUTSIDE SOURCE

WHITE HOUSE OFFICE

In order to consider whether the Government may accept from an outside source payment of your travel, subsistence and related expenses under the GSA travel rule or 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f), you must complete the information below. You must submit this form and related documentation and receive approval PRIOR to commencement of travel. Failure to receive PRIOR approval may result in you having to pay the travel expenses yourself. The outside source need not be a 501(c)(3) organization, but if it is, please state so on this form and include the IRS determination letter.

Please include a copy of the letter of invitation.

CONTACT PERSON: Susan Ralston

PHONE NUMBER: 6-2369

DATE OF REQUEST: 10/8/02

Your Name and Position:
Karl C. Rove, Senior Advisor to the President

Nature of Meeting or Event: ☐ Official ☒ Political

Meeting or Event Description and HOW IT RELATES TO YOUR OFFICIAL OR POLITICAL DUTIES:
RNC political meetings in NYC

Dates of Travel: Wed, 10/16/02 Destination(s): NYC

Persons or Entity Making The Payment (please also note any financial interests of the person or entity known to you that may be affected by the exercise of your Government responsibilities):
~~Republican National Committee~~

Contact at Organization Making the Payment: Marc Racicot

Address of Organization: ~~310 First Street, SE~~
Washington, DC 20003

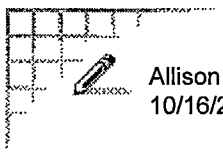
Phone: PRA 6

Expense:	Amount:	Method:*
Transportation (specify): Airfare	$236.00	☒ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Lodging:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Meals:		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)
Misc. (specify):		☐ In Kind ☐ Reimbursable ☐ Other (Political Only)

*Payment may be made either in-kind or by check made payable to the U.S. Treasury; you may not directly receive payment by either cash or a check made out to you.

This form and any accompanying memorandum of approval must be attached to your travel authorization. You MUST complete a travel voucher listing all expenses (regardless of payment method) following the trip.

Please send this form to the Counsel's Office (Room 128, EEOB) at least three (3) days before commencement of travel



TO BE COMPLETED BY COUNSEL'S OFFICE ☐ Approved ☐ Disapproved Pursuant to: ☐ 31 U.S.C. § 1353 ☐ 5 C.F.R. 2635.204(f)

Counsel's Signature: Date:

(REV. 7/96)

REV_00266166

538438
FLOOD-27

Allison L. Riepenhoff
10/16/2002 04:33:18 PM

Record Type: Record

To: See the distribution list at the bottom of this message

cc:

Subject: Springfield, MO and Rochester, MN

There is the potential for fairly cold weather this Friday, and I wanted to advise those of you traveling of the current forecasts for these two cities:

Springfield, MO
Partly Cloudy
High: 65
Low: 47

Rochester, MN
Showers
High: 53
Low: 35

Especially with the potential for cold weather in Rochester, please consider bringing a coat with you.

Thank you,

Allison

Message Sent To:

538438
F600627 MRM

FORSTMANN LITTLE & CO.

767 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York 10153
Telephone: (212) 355-5656 Fax: (212) 759-9059

EXEC. OFC. PRESIDENT
WH STRATEGIC INITIATIVES

2002 OCT 16 AM 10:13

September 27, 2002

Mr. Karl Rove
White House Senior Advisor
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
West Wing, 2nd Floor
Washington, D.C. 20500

Dear Karl,

My profound thanks to you for turning your life inside out to appear in Aspen. I can assure you that you got a lot of people, many of whom are not on "our team", to think differently about Iraq. I hope that you got something out of the day as well.

Needless to say, if there is ever anything I can do to be helpful, you only have to let me know.

I hope the hat is useful for your boy.

With best regards,

Ted

Theodore J. Forstmann

REV_00266168

538438

FG006-27

PBS Policies for Acquisition of Real Estate
As Related to the American Media Inc. Building

GSA, as a general policy, will not acquire through lease, purchase or construction any building unless it has first identified tenants for the property. No tenant needs are currently pending in the area around the AMI building location.

For property that can only be used for special purposes, e.g., to study the effects of anthrax, the policy is even more stringent. GSA will acquire special purpose space only after the requesting agency has signed a formal agreement committing itself to be financially liable for all related costs for the term of the lease, or life of the property; or be willing to pay all costs necessary to convert the facility into common office space should it vacate the property prematurely. Even if willing to pay conversion costs, the original tenant pays full rent until a new tenant is found.

The Atlanta Regional Office of GSA has contacted the Centers for Disease Control and the Environmental Protection Agency. Neither have any long-term interest in the American Media Building. Moreover, both CDC and EPA are landholding agencies, so either could acquire the property directly if either so chose. CDC further opined, that to make the building safe for occupancy would be most costly. They recommended the building be torn down. We believe the FBI's only interest in the building is because it is a crime site.

Regardless of whether viewed as a general office or special purpose space, the overall value of the property is in excess of the $2.1 million level for which specific congressional approval of a prospectus is necessary before GSA could do anything.

This discussion did not consider the legal liabilities issues presented in Mr. Hance's letter.

GSA rightly views the property as contaminated and it believes that cleanup of such a facility requires skills which are beyond its current expertise. Of course, GSA would follow any legislatively enacted direction or mandate regarding the property.

REV_00266169

Office of Inspector General
Washington, DC 20405

FACSIMILE TRANSMISSION RECORD

DATE: September 30, 2002

TO: Susan Ralston

OFFICE: Office of Karl Rove

FAX TELEPHONE NO.: ( ) 456-0191
AREA CODE

CORRESPONDENCE SYMBOL: --

OFFICE TELEPHONE NO.: ( )
AREA CODE

FROM: Daniel R.Levinson

OFFICE: Inspector General

CORRESPONDENCE SYMBOL: J

OFFICE TELEPHONE NO.: ( ) 501-0450

NUMBER OF PAGES BEING TRANSMITTED
INCLUDING COVER SHEET: 2

REMARKS:

PLEASE NOTIFY US BY CALLING (202) 501-0450 TO LET US KNOW THAT YOU HAVE RECEIVED THE MESSAGE/MESSAGES.

HAVE A NICE DAY!

Federal Recycling Program Printed on Recycled Paper

F: HUGHES, KAREN

F: Karen 538438

FG006-27

Karl C. Rove
10/09/2002 01:05:33 PM

Record Type: Record

To: Susan B. Ralston/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:
Subject: Re: strategery

discuss
---------- Forwarded by Karl C. Rove/WHO/EOP on 10/09/2002 01:07 PM ----------

From: Barry S. Jackson on 10/09/2002 12:51:19 PM
Record Type: Record

To: Karl C. Rove/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:
Subject: Re: strategery

i made a special point of asking krista to see if we could get karen's participation next week at strategery - this is an fyi in case you have occasion to talk to karen between now and tuesday
---------- Forwarded by Barry S. Jackson/WHO/EOP on 10/09/2002 12:52 PM ----------

Krista L. Ritacco
10/09/2002 10:33:43 AM

Record Type: Record

To: Barry S. Jackson/WHO/EOP@EOP
cc:
bcc:
Subject: Re: strategery

Karen can't attend or call in.... she's speaking at the LBJ school at UT that day from 3 p.m. until 10:30 pm that evening. Maybe next time....

From: Barry S. Jackson on 10/09/2002 09:59:48 AM

From: Barry S. Jackson on 10/09/2002 09:59:48 AM
Record Type: Record

To: Krista L. Ritacco/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:
Subject: strategery

you may want to see if Karen can join us - I think this is a meeting where her input will be valuable - if she can't be here, maybe we can hook her up by phone -thanks

538438
FE006-67

Karl,
Any chance you can make it?
Would love to see you!
Bill Gertz

Regnery Publishing
cordially invites you to celebrate
Bill Gertz's
New York Times Bestseller

BREAKDOWN

6:00 to 8:00 p.m.
Tuesday, October 15, 2002

Morton's
1050 Connecticut Avenue, NW
Washington, DC

RSVP 202-216-0601 ext. 434
by Friday, October 11, 2002

EAGLE PUBLISHING, INC.

- Bethune
- Just got this 10/16

REV_00266174

CENTER FOR THE STUDY OF THE PRESIDENCY

AMBASSADOR RICHARD T. MCCORMACK COUNSELOR

1020 19TH STREET, NW SUITE 250
WASHINGTON, DC 20036
202-872-9800 ☆ FAX 202-872-9811
E MAIL: CENTER@THEPRESIDENCY.ORG

538438
FG006-27

Karl Rove

Oct. 4, 2002

Dear Karl;

This is potentially an opportunity for the President to take a high profile intervention on behalf of the interest of the broader investment public.

This industry's failures have been so massive, so expensive, so embarrassing, so costly to the broader economy that the public will stand up and cheer if the President were to personnally intervene in this case, and back the tougher candidate for the oversight responsibility in the accounting industry.

Obviously on a matter of this kind there are potential problems that an outsider like myself is not aware of; but if all that is at stake here is which of the potential candidates is more agreeable to an industry which has fallen so short, this ought to be an opportunity for the President to score some long term points with the investing public, and the American people.

I also think that foreign capital is likely to return to America quicker if we are seen to be really cracking down on the accounting indsutry's past failures. We have a massive loss of confidence here that needs to be addressed, if the dollar itself is not to face continual weakness due to current accounts problems.

Sincerely,

Richard McCormack

Attachments: Note to Larry Lindsey; Washington Post article.

REV_00266175

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

Date: 10/15/02

To: ~~Josh Bolten, Gary Edson~~ 10/15

From: Strategic Initiatives Karl

____ FYI

____ Appropriate Action

____ Direct Response

____ Prepare Response For My Signature

____ Per Our Conversation

X Let's Discuss

____ Per Your Request

____ Please Return

____ Deadline

____ Other

Comments: _____

_____

_____

REV_00266178

538438

FG006-21

Voter / Consumer Research
RNC 35
Topline Results
n = 801
Oct 8-10, 2002

Hello, I am _____, from Voter / Consumer Research. We're a national survey research company doing a public opinion survey in your area. I need to speak with the youngest (male / female) available now, who is 18 years of age or older. This person must be registered to vote at this address.

Q1. Do you feel things in this country are going in the right direction, or have they gotten off on the wrong track?

		Sep 01	Sep 29	Oct 8
1	Right direction	37	41	39
2	Wrong track	49	47	52
3	Don't know	13	12	8
4	Refused	-	1	*

Here are the names of some people and organizations in the news. Please tell me for each of these whether you have a very favorable, somewhat favorable, somewhat unfavorable or very unfavorable impression. If you're not aware of the name just let me know. (RANDOMIZE)

		Very favorable	Somewhat favorable	Somewhat unfavorable	Very unfavorable	Aware / No opinion	Not aware	Refused
Q2. George W Bush	Sep 01	30	25	17	26	2	*	*
	Sep 29	38	26	14	20	2	*	-
	Oct 8	40	26	13	19	2	*	*
Q3. The Republican Party	Sep 01	20	31	22	21	4	1	*
	Sep 29	25	32	18	18	6	1	*
	Oct 8	24	33	19	17	5	2	*
Q4. The Democratic Party	Sep 01	21	33	21	17	6	1	1
	Sep 29	20	35	20	17	6	1	*
	Oct 8	18	38	21	16	5	1	*
Q5. Tom Daschle	Sep 29	8	22	12	19	14	25	*
	Oct 8	7	22	12	16	13	29	*

Q6. Thinking about the elections this November, on a 0 to 10 scale, with 0 meaning you have paid no attention at all and 10 meaning you have paid a great deal of attention, how much attention would you say you have paid to the upcoming elections in November?

		Sep 01	Sep 29	Oct 8
	Mean rating:	-	6.5	6.3
11	Don't know	-	1	*
12	Refused	-	-	*

Q7. And if this fall's elections for Congress were held today, would you vote for (ROTATE) the Republican candidate or for the Democratic candidate?

1	Republican candidate	35	41	43
2	Democratic candidate	39	42	42
3	Don't know	25	16	14
4	Refused	1	2	2

REV_00266179

Q62. Which of the following income groups includes your TOTAL FAMILY INCOME in 2001, before taxes? Just stop me when I read the right category—

1	Under $10,000	6
2	$10,000-$20,000	10
3	$20,000-$30,000	13
4	$30,000-$40,000	12
5	$40,000-$50,000	10
6	$50,000-$75,000	15
7	$75,000-$100,00	11
8	$100,000 and over	11
9	Don't know (VOL)	2
10	Refused (VOL)	10

Q63. Are you yourself of Hispanic or Latino descent – for instance Mexican American, or Cuban or Puerto Rican, or not?

1	Yes	7
2	No	92
3	Don't know	*
4	Refused	1

Q64. (IF NO) Is your racial or ethnic background (RANDOMIZE) white, black, Asian, Native American, or something else?

1	White	81
2	Black	10
3	Asian	2
4	Native American	3
5	Other	3
6	Don't know	*
7	Refused	2

Q65. Sex (BY OBSERVATION)

1	Male	48
2	Female	52

Q8. If the elections for President were held today, and the candidates were (ROTATE) George W Bush, the Republican and Al Gore, the Democrat, who would you vote for?

		Sep 01	Sep 29	Oct 8
1	George W Bush, the Republican	-	55	57
2	Al Gore, the Democrat	-	37	35
3	Don't know	-	7	6
4	Refused	-	1	2

Q9. How would you rate the job George W Bush has been doing as President ... do you strongly approve, somewhat approve, somewhat disapprove or strongly disapprove of the job he's been doing?

1	Strongly approve	24	33	35
2	Somewhat approve	35	37	35
3	Somewhat disapprove	18	14	15
4	Strongly disapprove	2	15	15
5	Don't know	2	1	*
6	Refused	-	*	-

? →

Q10. Thinking about the job George W. Bush has done as President, is it better than you expected, worse than you expected or about what you expected?

1	Better than expected	-	35	35
2	Worse than expected	-	11	11
3	About as expected	-	52	53
4	Don't know	-	2	1
5	Refused	-	*	*

REV_00266180

Here are some specific issues I'd like you to rate President Bush on. Again, please tell me for each of these whether you strongly approve, somewhat approve, somewhat disapprove or strongly disapprove of him on that point. (RANDOMIZE)

		Strongly approve	Somewhat approve	Somewhat disapprove	Strongly disapprove	Don't know	Refused
Q11. Managing the economy	Sep 01	19	30	19	28	4	*
	Sep 29	15	36	19	26	3	*
	Oct 8	17	36	19	24	4	*
Q12. Working with both parties to get things done	Sep 01	29	35	15	15	6	*
	Sep 29	30	37	16	12	4	*
	Oct 8	36	36	15	11	3	*
Q13. Understanding the problems facing people like yourself	Sep 01	24	26	16	29	5	-
	Sep 29	21	35	14	24	4	1
	Oct 8	24	32	18	22	4	*
Q14. Handling foreign policy	Sep 01	19	32	17	21	11	-
	Sep 29	31	33	13	20	4	*
	Oct 8	32	32	14	19	3	*
Q15. Fighting the war on terrorism	Sep 01	-	-	-	-	-	-
	Sep 29	50	26	11	11	2	*
	Oct 8	54	24	9	11	2	*
Q16. Education	Sep 01	-	-	-	-	-	-
	Sep 29	28	36	16	12	8	*
	Oct 8	30	36	15	12	7	-

Q17. Of the following list of issues, which ONE is the most important as far as you are concerned? (RANDOMIZE)

		Sep 01	Sep 29	Oct 8
1	Taxes	6	4	4
2	The economy	19	21	18
3	Education	14	8	12
4	Homeland security	-	12	14
5	Medicare	4	5	4
6	Health care reform	9	7	7
7	Social Security	17	7	8
8	The breakdown of the family	17	9	9
9	Fighting terrorism	-	19	20
10	The environment	4	3	2
11	Other (VOL)	1	2	2
12	Don't know	2	3	2
13	Refused	*	*	*

REV_00266181

Q18. And of this same list, which one is your second choice? (RANDOMIZE REMAINING ITEMS)

		Sep 01	Sep 29	Oct 8
1	Taxes	10	5	6
2	The economy	16	17	18
3	Education	15	17	13
4	Homeland security	-	12	12
5	Medicare	10	6	6
6	Health care reform	10	8	11
7	Social Security	16	10	8
8	The breakdown of the family	9	5	7
9	Fighting terrorism	-	15	15
10	The environment	8	5	3
11	Other (VOL)	*	1	*
12	Don't know	1	*	*
13	Refused	-	*	-

Q19. As of right now, how concerned are you about your personal retirement security?

1	Very concerned	-	39	39
2	Somewhat concerned	-	37	34
3	Not very concerned	-	14	14
4	Not at all concerned	-	8	13
5	Don't know	-	2	1
6	Refused	-	*	*

Q20. As of today, which do you think (VER A:) the President should do more about .. (READ, ROTATE)

1	Fighting terrorism /OR/	-	42	37
2	Improving the economy	-	46	47
3	Both (VOL)	-	10	14
4	Neither / other (VOL)	-	*	1
5	Don't know	-	2	1
6	Refused	-	-	-

As of today, which do you think (VER B:) Congress should do more about .. (READ, ROTATE)

7	Fighting terrorism /OR/	-	35	42
8	Improving the economy	-	48	44
9	Both (VOL)	-	14	12
10	Neither / other (VOL)	-	*	1
11	Don't know	-	1	1
12	Refused	-	*	-

Q21. Thinking about the economy, in the next year do you think the economy will improve, decline or stay about the same?

1	Improve	-	37	34
2	Decline	-	18	22
3	Stay about the same	-	40	41
4	Don't know	-	6	4
5	Refused	-	-	*

Q22. And what about your own financial situation, do you think a year from now you will be in better financial shape, worse financial shape or about the same?

	Sep 01	Sep 29	Oct 8
1 Better shape	-	34	36
2 Worse shape	-	10	11
3 About the same	-	53	51
4 Don't know	-	3	2
5 Refused	-	*	*

Q23. As of right now, do you think economic conditions in the country are (ROTATE) getting better or getting worse?

1 Getting better	-	27	26
2 Getting worse	-	61	63
3 Same / no change (VOL)	-	6	8
4 Neither / other (VOL)	-	3	1
5 Don't know	-	3	3
6 Refused	-	*	*

Q24. Thinking about the stock market, do you believe that the market will (ROTATE) improve, remain at its current level, or decline over the next six months?

1 Improve	-	32	30
2 Current level / Same	-	35	33
3 Decline	-	24	28
4 Don't know	-	9	8
5 Refused	-	*	*

Q25. (ROTATE) Do you think the President could do more to improve the economy / OR / do you think he is doing about all he can to improve the economy?

1 Could do more	-	51	57
2 Doing all he can	-	44	39
3 Don't know	-	4	4
4 Refused	-	*	*

Q26. Did you by any chance watch the speech about his policy on Iraq that President Bush gave on Monday, or not?

1 Watched it	42
2 Did not watch it	58
3 Don't know	*
4 Refused	-

Q27. (IF DID NOT WATCH: From what you saw in the news) do you have a very positive impression of what President Bush said, somewhat positive, somewhat negative or a very negative impression? (IF DID NOT WATCH: If you haven't heard enough to say, just let me know)

	Saw it	Didn't
1 Very positive	38	11
2 Somewhat positive	32	21
3 Somewhat negative	15	9
4 Very negative	13	8
5 Haven't heard enough to say (VOL)	-	47
6 Don't know	3	3
7 Refused	-	1

REV_00266183

(VERSION A:) Now on the following list of issues, please tell me for each one who you trust more to handle that issue between (ROTATE) President Bush and the Democrats in Congress. (RANDOMIZE)

		President Bush	Democrats in Congress	Equal / no difference (VOL)	Neither (VOL)	Don't know	Refused
Q28. Education	Sep 3	47	39	3	3	7	*
	Oct 8	46	37	4	4	10	-
Q29. The economy	Sep 3	44	42	3	4	7	-
	Oct 8	42	41	7	4	7	-
Q30. Health care	Sep 3	31	52	3	6	9	-
	Oct 8	35	47	4	6	9	-
Q31. Social Security	Sep 3	33	50	3	5	9	-
	Oct 8	37	45	5	6	8	-
Q32. Managing the federal budget	Sep 3	42	42	3	6	7	*
	Oct 8	44	36	6	5	9	*
Q33. Caring about people like you	Sep 3	44	42	2	9	4	-
	Oct 8	41	41	5	8	5	*
Q34. Dealing with corporate misconduct and the stock market	Sep 3	42	40	3	6	8	1
	Oct 8	40	38	3	7	11	*
Q35. Working with both parties to get things done	Sep 3	54	31	2	8	5	*
	Oct 8	54	27	6	6	7	*

(VERSION B:) Now on the following list of issues, please tell me for each one who you trust more to handle that issue between (ROTATE) Republicans and Democrats in Congress. (RANDOMIZE)

		GOP in Congress	Dem in Congress	Equal / no difference	Neither	Don't know	Refused
Q36. Education	Sep 3	41	43	4	4	8	*
	Oct 8	41	44	6	3	6	*
Q37. The economy	Sep 3	48	38	1	5	7	*
	Oct 8	42	41	6	5	6	1
Q38. Health care	Sep 3	29	50	4	6	11	*
	Oct 8	32	51	5	4	7	1
Q39. Social Security	Sep 3	34	48	2	6	9	-
	Oct 8	34	48	6	4	8	1
Q40. Managing the federal budget	Sep 3	45	38	2	5	10	*
	Oct 8	44	36	6	7	7	1
Q41. Welfare reform	Sep 3	38	45	2	4	10	*
	Oct 8	39	43	5	4	9	*
Q42. Dealing with corporate misconduct and the stock market	Sep 3	39	37	5	8	11	*
	Oct 8	39	36	7	8	10	*
Q43. Working with both parties to get things done	Sep 3	42	34	5	10	9	1
	Oct 8	40	32	10	9	8	1

REV_00266184

Q44. (VERSION A:) One issue concerns establishing a federal government department to deal with domestic security. Between the following two views, which one is closest to your point of view (ROTATE)

The view of Republicans who say it is wrong to give the President less authority to manage the homeland security department then he has for other federal agencies
OR
The view of Democrats who say that people working for this Department should have the same civil service protections that people working for other federal government departments have

(IF NECESSARY:) which of these two views is closest to your own?

1	Republican view, more flexible in dealing with threats	39
2	Democratic view, same civil service protections	49
3	Both equally (VOL)	2
4	Neither (VOL)	2
5	Don't know	7
6	Refused	*

Q45. (VERSION B:) One issue concerns establishing a federal government department to deal with domestic security. Between the following two views, which one is closest to your point of view (ROTATE)

The view of Republicans who say the department should not be restricted by union rules, like requiring that border patrol agents live near restaurants or have easy access to dry-cleaners
OR
The view of Democrats who say that people working for this Department should have the same civil service protections that people working for other federal government departments have

(IF NECESSARY:) which of these two views is closest to your own?

1	Republican view, more flexible in dealing with threats	29
2	Democratic view, same civil service protections	57
3	Both equally (VOL)	1
4	Neither (VOL)	4
5	Don't know	8
6	Refused	1

Here are several things the President has been saying recently. Please tell me for each of these if you have a positive or negative reaction, using a 10 point scale. A zero would mean you have an extremely negative reaction, while a ten would mean you have an extremely positive reaction. You can use any number between zero and ten of course. (RANDOMIZE)

		Mean Rating	Don't know	Refused
Q46.	I should have the same authority to protect national security as every President since Jimmy Carter has had	7.5	2	*
Q47.	The Senate should not tie my hands and take away authority to protect national security	6.5	2	*
Q48.	The Senate should not give me less authority to manage the homeland security department then I have for every other agency in the federal government	6.5	3	*
Q49.	I have worked with members of both parties on a compromise homeland security bill, but I am opposed to Democrats in the Senate, who want to expand the power of unions to block hiring and firing decisions in the federal government	5.8	5	-

REV_00266185

As I mentioned unions are working with Democrats in the Senate to include features in the Homeland Security bill that have to do with department employees. For each of the following please tell me whether you strongly favor, somewhat favor, somewhat oppose or strongly oppose that specific proposal. (RANDOMIZE)

		Strongly Favor	Somewhat Favor	Somewhat Oppose	Strongly Oppose	Don't know	Refused
Q50.	A proposal to require that border patrol agents live within easy access of restaurants, movie theatres and dry cleaning	10	22	24	30	15	1
Q51.	Not allowing the Customs Service to require that they carry nuclear radiation detectors, but making this subject to union negotiations	15	18	19	36	12	1
Q52.	Prohibiting the customs service from selecting agents for foreign assignment based on qualifications, basing selection on seniority instead	15	16	22	42	5	*
Q53.	Keeping in place rules and procedures that make it very difficult to remover poorly performing government employees	21	14	13	47	4	*

And now just a few last questions for classification purposes...

Q54. In the last general election in which you voted, which answer best describes how you voted for state and local offices such as governor and senator? (ROTATE CODES 1 THRU 7, TOP TO BOTTOM / BOTTOM TO TOP)

1	Straight Democratic	14
2	Mostly Democratic	18
3	A few more Democrats than Republicans	7
4	About equally for both parties	18
5	A few more Republicans than Democrats	7
6	Mostly Republican	21
7	Straight Republican	11
8	Other (VOL)	1
9	Never voted (VOL)	2
10	Don't know	1
11	Refused	*

Q55. What is your approximate age?

1	18-24	8
2	25-34	14
3	35-44	17
4	45-54	25
5	55-64	14
6	65 and over	22
7	Don't know	*
8	Refused	*

Q56. Is your religious background Protestant, Catholic, Jewish or something else? (IF SOMETHING ELSE OR UNCLEAR RESPONSE ASK: Is that a Christian religion or not?)

1	Protestant	42
2	Catholic	24
3	Other Christian	18
4	Jewish	2
5	Other non-Christian	6
6	Agnostic / Atheist	1
7	None	4
8	Don't know	*
9	Refused	2

Q57. (IF ANSWERED 1 – 3) How often do you attend worship services? Would you say... (READ – ROTATE TOP TO BOTTOM, BOTTOM TO TOP)

1	Never	10
2	A few times a year	27
3	A few times a month	16
4	Almost every week	12
5	Every week	23
6	More than once a week	11
7	Don't know (DNR)	1
8	Refused (DNR)	1

Q58. On political issues, do you consider yourself (ROTATE) a liberal, a moderate, or a conservative?

1	Liberal	17
2	Moderate	39
3	Conservative	39
4	Don't know	4
5	Refused	1

Q59. Are you or is anyone in your household a member of a labor union or a teacher's association, or not? (PROBE IF NECESSARY: Would that be a labor union or a teacher's association?)

1	Yes / Labor	13
2	Yes / Teacher	10
3	Yes / both	2
4	No	76
5	Don't know	*
6	Refused	*

Q60. (IF FEMALE:) Do you / (IF MALE:) Does the woman of the household work outside the home or not?

1	Yes	54
2	No	44
3	Don't know	1
4	Refused	1

Q61. Do you have any money invested in the stock market through individual stocks, retirement plans or mutual funds or not?

1	Yes - Invested in the market	62
2	No - not invested	35
3	Don't know	*
4	Refused	3

REV_00266187

538438 File
FG006-27

October 14, 2002

MEMORANDUM FOR KARL ROVE

FROM: KEN MEHLMAN
DEPUTY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND
DIRECTOR OF POLITICAL AFFAIRS

ADRIAN GRAY
DEPUTY DIRECTOR OF SCHEDULING AND DIRECTOR OF SURROGATE SCHEDULING

SUBJECT: POLITICAL ACTIVITY: October 6 – October 20
63 Fundraisers, 36 message events

Monday, October 7, 2002 (6 F/R, 6 message)
- FLOTUS fundraiser for Collins (NYC)
- Rove fundraiser for Rogers (Birmingham)
- Evans fundraiser for Cianchette (Portland)
- Evans message event for Bass (Nashua)
- Martinez fundraiser for Talent (St. Louis)
- Whitman message event for Hutchison (Dallas)
- Whitman fundraiser for Perry (Houston)
- Chao fundraiser for Ferguson (WDC)
- Barreto message event for Hayes (Charlotte)
- Van De Water (DOT) message event for Ballenger (Hickory)
- Carbonell (HHS) message event for Taff (Kansas City)
- England (Navy) message event for Leach (Iowa City)

Tuesday, October 8, 2002 (10 F/R, 6 message)
- POTUS fundraiser for Hilleary (Knoxville)
- Martinez fundraiser for Brown (Philadelphia)
- Principi fundraiser for Forrester (East Orange)
- Evans fundraiser for Sununu (Manchester)
- Chao fundraiser for Chambliss (WDC)
- Norton fundraiser for Talent (Kansas City)
- Abraham fundraiser for Wilson (WDC)
- Abraham fundraiser for Chambliss (WDC)
- Whitman message event for Sanchez (Albuquerque)
- O'Neill message event for Istook (Oklahoma City)
- Manson (DOI) message event for Chambliss (Cumberland Island)
- Peters (DOT) message event for Chocola (South Bend)
- Peters (DOT) fundraiser for McVey (Indianapolis)
- Carbonell (HHS) message events for Taff (Kansas City) (x2)
- Jackson (DOT) fundraiser for PA HRCC (Harrisburg)
- Sampson (DOC) message event for Pickering (Meridian)

Wednesday, October 9, 2002 (5 F/R, 3 message)

- Mrs. Cheney message event for Hutchinson (Ft. Smith)
- Mrs. Cheney fundraiser for Talent (Kansas City)
- Rove fundraiser for T-100/Regents (Richmond)
- Norton fundraiser for Talent (Kansas City)
- Evans fundraiser for Fisher (Philadelphia)
- Martinez fundraiser for Feeney (Orlando)
- Allen (HHS) message event for Lingle (Honolulu)
- Perry (GSA) message event for Benjamin (Youngstown)

Thursday, October 10, 2002 (2 F/R, 3 message)

- Mehlman fundraiser for WV GOP (WDC)
- Evans message event for Burr (WDC)
- Paige message event for Chambliss (Atlanta)
- Barreto message event for Bush (Orlando)
- Mainella (DOI) fundraiser for Turner (Dayton)

Friday, October 11, 2002 (5 F/R, 3 message)

- Mehlman fundraiser for Kinder (Kansas City)
- Mehlman fundraiser for Talent (Kansas City)
- Chao fundraiser for Alexander (Nashville)
- Whitman message event for Gerlach (Philadelphia)
- Norton fundraiser for Raye (WDC)
- Martinez fundraiser for Bush/FL GOP (Miami)
- Martinez message event for Bush (Orlando)
- Towey message event for Ferguson (Union)

Saturday, October 12, 2002 (3 message)

- Principi message event for Monteith (San Diego)
- Paige message event for Regula (Cleveland)
- MacKay (VA) message event for Brown-Waite (Florida)

Monday, October 14, 2002 (9 F/R, 1 message)

- POTUS fundraiser for MI Victory (Detroit)
- VPOTUS fundraiser for Renzi (Phoenix)
- VPOTUS fundraiser for Pearce (Roswell)
- Mrs. Cheney fundraiser for Bentley (Glen Burnie)
- Abraham fundraiser for WV GOP (Charleston)
- Abraham fundraiser for Capito (Charleston)
- Whitman fundraiser for AZ GOP (Arizona)
- Martinez fundraiser for Oxley (Findlay)
- O'Neill message event for Leach (Cedar Rapids)
- Norton fundraiser for Smith (Salem)

Tuesday, October 15, 2002 (6 F/R)

- VPOTUS fundraiser for Cole (Midwest City)
- VPOTUS fundraiser for Sullivan (Tulsa)
- VPOTUS fundraiser for Sununu (WDC)
- 41 fundraiser for Porter (Las Vegas)

- Chao fundraiser for Hutchinson (Fort Smith)
- Mrs. Ashcroft fundraiser for Talent (Springfield)

Wednesday, October 16, 2002 (4 F/R, 1 message)
- VPOTUS fundraiser for Janklow (WDC)
- Whitman fundraiser for Morella (Maryland)
- Thompson fundraiser for Chocola (WDC)
- Abraham fundraiser for Chocola (WDC)
- Jackson (HUD) message event for Taff (Kansas City)

Thursday, October 17, 2002 (8 F/R, 3 message)
- POTUS fundraiser for Chambliss (Atlanta)
- POTUS fundraiser for Perdue (Atlanta)
- POTUS fundraiser for Bush (Daytona Beach)
- Chao fundraiser for Forrester (Union)
- Paige message event for Talent (St. Louis)
- Abraham message event for Allard (Rocky Flats)
- Thompson fundraiser for Leach (Iowa City)
- Martinez fundraiser for Simon (Salinas County)
- Evans fundraiser for Garrett (Trenton)
- Giuliani fundraiser for Coleman (Minnesota)
- Walters message event for Portman (Cincinnati)

Friday, October 18, 2002 (5 F/R, 7 message)
- POTUS rally for MN Victory (Rochester)
- POTUS rally for Talent (Springfield)
- Rove fundraiser for TX Victory (Dallas)
- Abraham message event for Thune (Sioux Falls)
- Paige message event for Ballenger (Hickory)
- Paige message event for Hayes (Charlotte)
- Thompson fundraiser for WI GOP (Wisconsin)
- Whitman fundraiser for Straight (Princeton)
- Evans fundraiser for Chocola (South Bend)
- Martinez fundraiser for Simon/CA GOP (Los Angeles)
- MacKay (VA) message event for Chambliss (Columbus)
- Scully (HHS) message event for Sununu (TBD City)

Sunday, October 20, 2002 (2 F/R)
- 41 fundraiser for Ganske (Des Moines)
- Thompson fundraiser for Green (Wisconsin)

ADMINISTRATION POLITICAL EVENT BREAKDOWN

Total # of Administration Events: 1231
Message: 587
Fundraiser: 541
Photo-op: 110

Total # of events for Senate: 342
Message: 169
Fundraiser: 154
Photo-op: 19

Total # of events for House: 684
Message: 352
Fundraiser: 273
Photo-op: 59

Total # of events for Governor: 205
Message: 66
Fundraiser: 114
Photo-op: 25

538438 file Cal fed
F6006-27

Memo

To: Karl Rove
From: Ken Calvert
Date: September 12, 2002
Subject: CALFED/Drought articles

Please see the attached article from the September 3 editorial page of the Los Angeles Times. While I disagree with the editors' assertions regarding the Administration's record on the environment, the editors do tap a concern prevalent throughout California regarding CALFED. Namely, many in the state are concerned that the CALFED compromise is unraveling. The Administration could easily allay this concern by asking House Leadership to schedule a bill that already has widespread Congressional support.

As you know, for the past two years, I have been working on a CALFED bill (HR 3208) that brings back much-needed balance to water use among urban water users, farmers, and the environment. It passed the Resources Committee last November and is ready for floor action. In spite of the support of Chairman Jim Hansen, Bill Thomas, George Miller and many others from both sides of the aisle, it is being held up by the House Leadership due to concerns regarding labor language.

As we have discussed, the labor language is, at worst, meaningless because it applies only to California, a state with stricter labor law than the federal statute. In fact, according to a Congressional Research Service, the language is detrimental to unions in California because legal precedent could make the less-stringent federal law supercede state law. (The supporters of the labor language have not seen the CRS report that explains the precedent.)

This language should not stand in the way of the CALFED bill. To allow it to unravel a compromise so many years in the making would be disastrous. Please help Chairman Hansen and me in our efforts to get this bill scheduled as soon as possible. If the House does not act, Senator Feinstein will likely attach her plan to another bill. If she is successful, CALFED will become a glorified environmental restoration program. We will lose the important private property protections and enhanced water storage in my bill. In short, conservatives will lose any influence on the process.

Under separate cover, I am sending recent articles from various news sources on the country-wide drought. A robust White House water policy, beginning with support of CALFED, would be a perfect compliment to President Bush's excellent new forest initiative.

Keep Water Project Afloat

The Bush administration's decision to quit its appeal of a lawsuit pitting farmers against the environment in the Sacramento-San Joaquin river delta threatens to revive some of California's most bitter water battles. And there's concern that the action signals a waning of federal support for Cal-Fed, the program to end those old wars and to restore the environment of the two rivers' delta and San Francisco Bay.

An Interior Department official says nothing's really changed and the administration remains committed to Cal-Fed, the $8.5-billion cooperative state-federal program to revitalize the delta. But considering the Bush record on the environment—reciting platitudes while unraveling good policy—it's prudent to remain skeptical. The department and its U.S. Bureau of Reclamation will have to back up those assurances with actions.

The dispute started when the giant Westlands Water District sued the Interior Department over interpretation of a 1992 law that ordered the Bureau of Reclamation to dedicate 800,000 acre-feet of water annually from its Central Valley Project to environmental protection, primarily for the health of fish in the bay-delta system.

Westlands claimed the criteria the bureau used actually resulted in diverting 1.1 million acre-feet for the fish, cutting into the farm district's allocation. (One acre-foot meets the household needs of two families a year). A federal judge in Fresno ruled in favor of Westlands. The Clinton administration and the Natural Resources Defense Council appealed, seeking to uphold the rule.

Now the Bush administration has dropped the appeal. Assistant Interior Secretary Bennett W. Raley says the formula will be simplified. The fish will get their 800,000 acre-feet, he added. But Barry Nelson of the Natural Resources Defense Council says the fish may actually lose 300,000 acre-feet if the accounting system is changed.

The allocation is a key provision of Cal-Fed, which is designed to restore environments damaged by years of pumping water from the delta and to stabilize water deliveries to farmers and Southern California homes.

If Cal-Fed is allowed to unravel after years of negotiation and delicate compromise, the state will fall back into water warfare and allocation of supplies by the courts. With water supplies shrinking everywhere, such a war is unaffordable.

Just the FAX from...

Ken Calvert

United States House of Representatives

43rd Congressional District
CALIFORNIA

2201 Rayburn HOB
Washington, D.C. 20515

Please Deliver To:

Name: Karl Rove Date: 9/12/02

Office: _____

Fax Number: 456-0191 Phone Number _____

From:

- ✓ Rep. Ken Calvert
- ___ Dave Kennett
- ___ Rebecca Rudman
- ___ Intern
- ___ Dave Ramey
- ___ Deron McElroy
- ___ Caroline Eklund
- ___ Linda Ulrich
- ___ Deena Contreras
- ___ Sara Smith

Phone Number: (202) 225-1986 Fax Number: (202) 225-2004

Total Number of Pages (Including Cover) 3

Comments: Re: CALFED Water

538438 Mc Hagel FG006-27

CHUCK HAGEL — FAX —

U.S. SENATOR — NEBRASKA

To: Karl Rove

Of: White House

Fax: (202) 456-0191

Subject: Hagel's Senate Floor Speech

Pages: 6, including cover

Date: October 9, 2002

Attached is the speech Senator Hagel just gave on the Senate floor regarding the Iraq resolution that the Senate is currently debating.

Call me if you have any questions. Thanks.

-Beth Lee

From the desk of...
Beth Lee
Press Manager
Senator Chuck Hagel
248 Senate Russell Bldg.
Washington, D.C. 20510
Phone: (202) 224-3474 Fax: (202) 228-2086
beth_lee@hagel.senate.gov

UNITED STATES SENATOR • NEBRASKA
CHUCK HAGEL

PRESS RELEASE

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
Wednesday, October 9, 2002

Contact: Beth Lee or Josh Denney, 202/224-4224

The Iraq Resolution
Statement on the Floor of the U.S. Senate
U.S. Senator Chuck Hagel
October 9, 2002

"The Senate is by design a deliberative institution, and over this past week we have witnessed thoughtful debate and commentary on how to meet the challenge of Saddam Hussein's Iraq. Ours is not an academic exercise; debate informs our decision whether to authorize the President to use force, if necessary, to enforce UN Security Council resolutions dealing with Iraqi disarmament.

There are no easy answers in Iraq. The decision to commit our troops to war is the most difficult decision Members of Congress make. Each course of action we consider in Iraq leads us into the imperfect, the dangerous, and the unknown. But we cannot avoid decision on Iraq. The President cannot avoid decision. The risks of inaction are too high. We are elected to solve problems, not just debate them. The time has come to chart a new course in Iraq and the Middle East.

History informs our debate and our decisions. We know that tyranny cannot be appeased. We also know that our power and influence are enhanced by both a nobility of purpose and the support of allies and institutions that reinforce an international commitment to peace and prosperity. And we know that war has its own dynamic, that it favors neither ideology nor democracy nor tyranny, that men and women die, and that the nations and individuals who know war are never again the same.

President Bush has rightly brought the case against Iraq back before the United Nations. Our problems with Iraq, as well as terrorism and the worldwide proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, are not America's alone. Israel, Iran, Turkey, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Iraq's own Kurdish population, and other nations and peoples are on the front lines of Saddam's ambitions for weapons of mass death. The United Nations, with American leadership, must act decisively to end Saddam Hussein's decade-long violations of UN Security Council resolutions.

REV_00266210

America's best case for the possible use of force against Iraq rests with the American and international commitment to enforcing Iraq's disarmament. The diplomatic process is not easy, and we face the competing interests and demands of Russia, France, China, and others, whose interests in Iraq may not always be the same as ours. A regional and international coalition is essential for creating the political environment that will be required for any action we take in Iraq, and especially for how we sustain a democratic transition in a post-Saddam Iraq. We cannot do it alone.

America, including the Congress, and the world, must speak with one voice about Iraqi disarmament, as it must continue to do in the war on terrorism.

Because the stakes are so high, America must be careful with her rhetoric and mindful of how others perceive her intentions. Actions in Iraq must come in the context of an American-led, multi-lateral approach to disarmament, not as the first case for a new American doctrine involving the preemptive use of force. America's challenge in this new century will be to strengthen its relationships around the world, while leading the world in our war on terrorism. For it is the success of the first challenge that will determine the success of the second. We should not mistake our foreign policy priorities for ideology in a rush to proclaim a new doctrine in world affairs. America must understand that it cannot alone win a war against terrorism. It will require allies, friends, and partners.

American leadership in the world will be further defined by our actions in Iraq and the Middle East. What begins in Iraq will not end in Iraq. There will be other "Iraqs." There will be continued acts of terrorism, proliferating powers, and regional conflicts. If we do it right, and lead through the United Nations in concert with our allies, we can set a new standard for American leadership and international cooperation. The perception of American power is power, and how our power is perceived can either magnify or diminish our influence in the world. The Senate has a constitutional responsibility and an institutional obligation in this effort. Federalist Paper #63 specifically notes the responsibilities of the Senate in foreign affairs as follows:

> "An attention to the judgment of other nations is important to every government for two reasons: the one is that independently of the merits of any particular plan or measure, it is desirable, on various accounts, that it should appear to other nations as the offspring of a wise and honorable policy; the second is that in doubtful cases, particularly where the national councils may be warped by some strong passion or momentary interest, the presumed or known opinion of the impartial world may be the best guide that can be followed. What has not America lost by her want of character with foreign nations and how many errors and follies would she not have avoided, if the justice and propriety of her measures had, in every instance, been previously tried by the light in which they would probably appear to the unbiased part of mankind?"

REV_00266211

The resolution before us today should be tried in that same light as The Federalist Papers. The original resolution proposed by the Bush Administration, S.J. Res. 45, would have been a setback for this institution. It did not reflect the best democratic traditions of either Congressional-Executive relations, or the conduct of American foreign policy.

S.J. Res. 46, sponsored by Senators Lieberman, Warner, McCain, and Bayh, is a far more responsible and accountable document than the one we started with three weeks ago. I congratulate my colleagues, especially Senators Lugar, Biden, and Daschle, and the four sponsors of this resolution, for their efforts and leadership in getting us to this point. S.J. Res. 46 narrows the authorization for the use of force to all relevant UN resolutions regarding Iraq, and to defending our national interests against the threats posed by Iraq. It includes support for U.S. diplomatic efforts at the United Nations; a requirement that before taking action, the President formally determines that diplomatic or other peaceful means will not be adequate in meeting our objectives; reference to the War Powers Resolution requirements; and periodic reports to Congress that include those actions described in the section of the Iraq Liberation Act of 1998 regarding assistance and support for Iraq upon replacement of Saddam Hussein. This resolution recognizes Congress as a co-equal partner in dealing with the threat from Saddam Hussein's Iraq.

If disarmament in Iraq requires the use of force, we need to consider carefully the implications and consequences of our actions.

The future of Iraq after Saddam Hussein is also an open question. Some of my colleagues and some American analysts now speak authoritatively of Sunnis, Shi'ites and Kurds in Iraq, and how Iraq can be a test case for democracy in the Arab world. How many of us really know and understand Iraq, its country, history, people, and role in the Arab world? I approach the issue of a post-Saddam Iraq and the future of democracy and stability in the Middle East with more caution, realism, and humility. While the people of the Arab world need no education from America about Saddam's record of deceit, aggression and brutality, and while many of them may respect and desire the freedoms that the American model offers, imposing democracy through force in Iraq is a roll of the dice. A democratic effort cannot be maintained without building durable Iraqi political institutions and developing a regional and international commitment to Iraq's reconstruction. No small task. To succeed, our commitment must extend beyond the day after, to the months and years after Saddam has gone. The American people must be told of the long-term commitment, risk and cost of this undertaking.

We should not be seduced by the expectations of "dancing in the streets" after Saddam's regime has fallen, the kites, candy and cheering crowds that we expect to greet our troops, but instead focus on the great challenges ahead, the commitment and resources that will be needed to ensure a democratic transition in Iraq and a more stable and peaceful Middle East.

REV_00266212

We should spend more time debating the cost and extent of this commitment, the risks we may face in a military engagement with Iraq, the implications of the precedent of U.S. military action for regime change, and the likely character and challenges of a post-Saddam Iraq. We have heard precious little from the President and his team, as well as from the Congress, with a few notable exceptions, about these most difficult and critical questions.

We need only look to Afghanistan, where the Afghan people joyously welcomed our liberation force, but months later a fragile transitional government grapples with rebuilding a fractured political culture, economy and country. However, Iraq, because of its resources, geography, capabilities, and history, offers even more complications and greater peril ... and yes, greater promise. This is the vast unknown – the heavy burden that lies ahead.

The Senate should not cast its vote in the hopes of putting Iraq behind us so we can get back to our campaigns or move on to other issues next year. The decision to possibly commit a nation to war cannot and should not ever be considered in the context of either party loyalty or campaign politics. I regret that this vote will take place under the cloud and pressure of elections next month. Some are already using the Iraq issue to gain advantage in the political campaigns. It might have been better for our vote to have been delayed until after the elections, as it was in 1990. Authorizing the use of force against Iraq or any country, for any purpose, should always be weighed on its own merits, not with an eye on the politics of the vote or campaign TV spots. War is too serious, the human price too high, and the implications unforeseen. While I cannot predict the future, I believe that what we decide in these chambers this week will influence America's security and role in the world for the coming decades. It will serve as the framework, both intentionally and unintentionally, for the future... it will set in motion a series of actions and events that we cannot now understand or control.

In authorizing the use of force against Iraq, we are at the beginning of a road that has no clear end. The votes in Congress this week are votes for an intensification of engagement with Iraq and the Middle East, a world of which we know very little, and whose destiny will now be directly tied to ours.

America cannot trade a new focus on Iraq for a lesser effort in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The bloodshed between Israel and the Palestinians continues and the danger mounts. Stability in Afghanistan is not assured. We must carry through with our commitment. Stability in this region depends on it. America's credibility is at stake, and long-term stability in Central and South Asia hangs in the balance. We must also continue to pay close attention to North Korea, where there is no guess work about nuclear weapons. There, on the Korean Peninsula, reside nuclear weapons, ballistic missiles, and 37,000 American troops.

Despite setting the right course for disarmament in Iraq, the Administration has yet to define an end game in Iraq; or explain the extent of the American commitment if regime change is required; or describe how our actions in Iraq might affect our other many interests and commitments throughout the world.

REV_00266213

I share the hope of a better world without Saddam Hussein. But we do not really know if our intervention in Iraq will lead to democracy in either Iraq or elsewhere in the Arab world. America has continued to take on large, complicated and expensive responsibilities that will place heavy burdens on us over the next generation. It may be necessary. But Americans should understand the extent of this burden and what may be required to pay for and support it...in both American blood and treasure.

As the Congress votes on this resolution, we must understand that we have not put Iraq behind us. This is just the beginning. The risks should not be under-stated, miscast or misunderstood. Ours is a path of both peril and opportunity, with many detours and no shortcuts.

We in the Congress are men and women of many parts. For me, is it the present-day Senator, the former soldier, or the concerned father that guides my judgment and ultimate vote? It is pieces of all ... for I am pieces of all. The responsibilities of each leads me to support the Lieberman-McCain-Warner-Bayh resolution. In the end, each of us who has the high honor of holding public office has the burden and privilege of decision and responsibility. It is a sacred trust we share with the public. We will be held accountable for our actions. As it must be."

###

REV_00266214

Sile telcom
538438
FG006-27

Richard M. Russell
10/11/2002 01:09:18 PM

Record Type: Record

To: See the distribution list at the bottom of this message

cc:
Subject: fyi--comptel

Baby Bell Rivals To Take Case to White House

By Robert MacMillan
washingtonpost.com Staff Writer
Thursday, October 10, 2002; 1:57 PM

Executives from upstart telecommunications firms are scheduled to go to the White House Friday to lobby senior officials to maintain tough restrictions on what services the Baby Bell telephone giants can offer.

Executives from firms competing with Verizon and other regional phone companies are expected to tell White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card and special adviser Karl Rove that they should not kowtow to Baby Bell requests that the government kill regulations that tell them where they can sell Internet service.

A spokeswoman for the Competitive Telecommunications Association (CompTel) said that its members also will tell Rove and Card that they support the administration's desire for a competitive telecom market, but that fewer rules on the Baby Bells won't erase the industry slump.

Some of CompTel's larger members include McLeodUSA and Williams Communications. The Association of Local Telecommunications Services (ALTS), which also will have members in attendance at tomorrow's meeting, represents such companies as Covad Communications, Time Warner Telecom and Teligent. CompTel had not finalized its attendee list before deadline, and ALTS officials were not available for comment.

White House officials also did not return telephone calls seeking comment.

Demand for broadband Internet access is strong among businesses and consumers, according to industry studies, but access barriers in some areas and high costs have kept subscriber numbers relatively low.

Some business groups have accused the administration of failing to act on broadband, though U.S. Commerce Secretary Donald Evans said that it has been one of the White House's top issues in the past two years.

The FCC is considering changing the regulations that govern high-speed broadband service, a move that the Baby Bells support. The Telecommunications Act of 1996 says the Bells must open their own local markets to competing local phone service providers before being allowed to offer their phone or Internet services in other regions.

If the FCC changes the rules, the Bells could offer broadband access outside of their traditional local calling areas, which the Justice Department established when it broke up Ma Bell in 1984.

The change would classify digital subscriber line -- or DSL broadband service -- as an information service rather than a telecommunications service, taking away regulations that the Bells say hurt telecom competition..

The Bush administration has been loath to take a stand on broadband rules for fear of alienating the various sides in the battle. In June, President Bush spoke for the first time on the topic, saying that supports the FCC's reconsideration of broadband rules

Congress, meanwhile, has made little progress in the debate. The Tauzin-Dingell bill, which favors the Baby Bells, passed the House early this year but is frozen in the Senate Commerce Committee. The chairman on the Senate committee, Ernest "Fritz" Hollings (D-S.C.), has introduced a competing bill that does not favor the Bells and which includes millions of dollars in government spending to encourage broadband deployment.

Congress is not expected to complete action on any broadband legislation before it adjourns later this month for the mid-term elections.

Message Sent To:

adam b. goldman/who/eop@eop melissa s. bennett/who/eop@eop
susan b. ralston/who/eop@eop jean m. russell/opd/eop@eop lezlee j. westine/who/eop@eop
keith hennessey/opd/eop@eop
kristen silverberg/who/eop@eop leslie a. mooney/opd/eop@eop
Kathryn J. Hayes/WHO/EOP@EOP

Open Letter from Lay Catholics to President Bush

Dear Mr. President:

Religious believers are not of a single mind when it comes to the difficult question of what to do about the threat posed to the United States and other nations by the regime of Saddam Hussein. We are divided not so much between communities of faith as within them. Devout Catholics, Protestants, Jews, and people of other faiths can be found on both sides of the question whether military action is the correct course at this time. We are Catholic citizens who wish to contribute to your deliberation of the question.

Recently, Bishop Wilton D. Gregory wrote to you on behalf of the 60-member Administrative Committee [of] the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, to raise "serious questions about the moral legitimacy of any pre-emptive, unilateral use of military force to overthrow the government of Iraq." We believe that Bishop Gregory made the case for that position as well as it can be made in light of basic principles of just war that are accepted by faithful Catholics as well as by many Protestants, Jews, and other believers. However, we think it is important for you to consider the arguments to be made in light of these same principles for the opposing position, namely, that pre-emptive and, if necessary, unilateral force can be justified to remove the grave threat to peace and justice posed by the Iraqi dictatorship.

Let there be no doubt that we are in complete agreement with Bishop Gregory's statement of the principles of just war. Moreover, as Catholics, we believe that these principles, as propounded by the magisterium of the Church, are binding upon us in conscience. As Bishop Gregory himself says, however, "[p]eople of good will may apply ethical principles and come to different prudential judgments, depending upon their assessment of the facts at hand and other issues."* His letter makes clear that the Administrative Committee's judgment that "pre-emptive, unilateral . . . force is difficult to justify at this time," is based on a prudential assessment of "the facts that are known to us."

Bishop Gregory explores the application of just war principles in four areas: "just cause," "legitimate authority," "probability of success and proportionality," and "norms governing the conduct of war." The questions he raises are legitimate and important; we hope and trust that you will consider them carefully. In doing so, perhaps the following points will be helpful.

---

* The distinction between ethical principles and prudential judgments can be manipulated and abused, as it sometimes is by Catholic and other politicians who claim to be "personally opposed" to abortion but support laws permitting and even funding deliberate feticide. The stringent ethical norm requiring that every human being be recognized as possessing full dignity and afforded the equal protection of the laws excludes support for abortion on putatively "prudential" grounds.

Just cause. Here Bishop Gregory does not offer conclusions, but simply raises pointed questions. (1) Is there clear and adequate evidence of a direct connection between Iraq and the attacks of September 11th or clear and adequate evidence of an imminent attack of a grave nature? It seems to us relevant that (a) the Iraqi regime has amply proven its hostile intent and willingness to engage in aggression against Kuwait, Israel, and other foreign states, as well as its own minority populations; (b) the regime has acquired and used biological and chemical weapons against foreign and domestic enemies; (c) it has made determined efforts to increase its stockpile and enhance the lethal quality of its biological and chemical weapons, while also attempting to acquire nuclear arms; (d) it has resisted and confounded the efforts of duly constituted United Nations weapons inspection teams; (e) it is in material violation of 16 United Nations Security Council resolutions, designed to ensure that Iraq does not pose a threat to international peace and security; (f) it is plain that the regime is equipping itself for further aggression and attempting to develop the capability to blackmail its victims with credible threats of annihilation.

(2) Is it wise to dramatically expand traditional moral and legal limits on just cause to include preventive or preemptive uses of military force to overthrow threatening regimes or to deal with the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction? Just war principles do not exclude the preemptive uses of military force against a proven aggressor who is planning or equipping himself for further aggression. No "expansion" of traditional moral and legal limits is necessary or being called for. The question is one of prudential judgment: In light of the likely horrific consequences of Saddam's acquisition of weapons of mass destruction, is the use of force the only effective way to defend his potential victims? If you conclude in view of all of the facts that force is necessary, then we believe that you are justified, and indeed required, to act. (The proposition sometimes asserted—though not by Bishop Gregory—that preventive or preemptive military action can never be defensive within the meaning of just war doctrine, is simply erroneous.)

(3) Should not a distinction be made between efforts to change unacceptable behavior of a government and efforts to end that government's existence? We believe that the relevance of this distinction depends upon the circumstances. Again, the question is one of prudence. If a regime's murderous aggression cannot be prevented without changing the regime, then nothing in the theory of just war excludes efforts—by force, if necessary—to change the regime.

Legitimate authority. We agree with Bishop Gregory on the importance of your decision to seek a congressional resolution for action against the Iraqi regime. We also endorse your efforts to enlist United Nations support, though any failure of the United Nations to live up to its own responsibilities should not deter you from acting with those nations that are prepared to join with the United States to prevent aggression. Prudence plainly suggests that no effort should be spared to build consensus at home and abroad. Complete consensus in the matter of war can hardly be expected, however, and the absence of complete consensus does not render unjust an otherwise just use of military force.

Probability of Success and Proportionality. Here again Bishop Gregory raises a set of important questions. And again we hope and trust that you will consider them carefully. None of the points he raises rules out the use of military force as a matter of moral principle. All concern factors that must be taken into account in assessing the prudence of a decision one way or another. For example, Bishop Gregory asks: How would another war in Iraq impact the civilian population, in the short- and long-term? On the one hand, as Bishop Gregory implies, harm to non-combatants (including civilian deaths) is virtually inevitable in war, even where one side is careful, as we are confident the United States would continue to be, to minimize civilian casualties. On the other hand, the people of Iraq have suffered for many years under a brutal and murderous tyranny from which the effective use of military force could liberate them. As Bishop Gregory says in his letter, "[t]here are no easy answers." But we stress the need to consider the factors on both sides of the equation.

The same is true for Bishop Gregory's other questions, such as: Would the use of military force lead to wider conflict and instability? We agree that you must very carefully consider whether force might lead to wider conflict. Yet you must also consider whether the reverse is more likely true. Indeed, the weight of evidence, in our judgment, tends in that direction. If The Iraqi regime is not deterred from acquiring weapons of mass destruction, it will almost certainly become an even more aggressive and destabilizing factor in the Middle East than it has heretofore been. Wider conflict and instability could result from the failure to use force in a timely manner. One need think only of the tragic consequences of the failure of France and other nations to enforce the terms of the Versailles Treaty against Germany when Hitler remilitarized the Rhineland in 1936. Had the allies exerted themselves to act at this moment of comparative weakness for the Nazi tyranny, much conflict could have been avoided, and many lives spared.

Norms governing the conduct of war. Here again the focus of Bishop Gregory's attention is on the very important question of harm to the civilian population of Iraq. And, again, we urge you to take this consideration very seriously, but also to consider the likely harm to innocent people of failing to deter aggression by the Iraqi regime, as well as the possibility of restoring to the Iraqi people freedom from the merciless tyranny of Saddam Hussein.

Catholics and all men and women of goodwill agree that the decision to use military force must never be taken lightly. Indeed, the tradition of just war theory holds that force may be justified only as a last resort. We therefore echo Bishop Gregory's admonition to "pursue actively alternatives to war." But if, in your careful and considered judgment, no alternative can be found capable of removing or disarming a proven aggressor whose willingness to murder his enemies is checked only by his capacity to accomplish the task without unacceptable consequences to himself, then the norms of justice permit—and your obligations of civic leadership require—you to act with the force of arms.

Yours sincerely,

The Star-Ledger dug up a court case that, in Forrester's view, makes the case against a switcheroo. LINK

California

Mickey Kaus's trial balloon pops:

"Former Los Angeles Mayor Richard Riordan announced Monday that he will not seek to be a write-in candidate for governor." LINK

Gov. Gray Davis (D) isn't keeping a low profile in these final weeks before the election, his staff insists to the Los Angeles Times , noting that today, Davis will be in Los Angeles "finalizing preparations for a three-week campaign blitz, talking with strategists and supporters, and discussing campaign ads ... He will devote much of the week to shoring up his support among Latinos, a crucial bloc of voters for Davis — and a source of simmering discontent as well ... On Monday, the Davis campaign unveiled a 60-second, Spanish-language radio spot touting the governor's support for Latinos in policy decisions and appointments." LINK

Republican gubernatorial nominee Bill Simon didn't heavily advance yesterday's campaign appearance by Rudy Giuliani for fear that it would draw protests. So only a handful of supporters showed up to hear and see America's Mayor. LINK

Not a huge shock: the Los Angeles Times endorses Davis. LINK

We admit: we love the phrase "Governor Woogie." Sadly, the Los Angeles Times doesn't dig up a similar nickname for Woogie's Republican opponent Bill Simon, but does give Simon otherwise comparably insightful profile treatment today. LINK

Florida

Gov. Jeb Bush (R) debates attorney Bill McBride (D) at Universal Studios in Orlando today.

On "Today", Bush spoke movingly about his daughter with family psychologist Jamie Gangel.

The Miami Herald watchdogs a state GOP party mailing, noting that it appears to feature an AARP endorsement of Governor Bush. But the AARP says it hasn't endorsed him. LINK

And if the senior vote in Florida hadn't decided the past two gubernatorial elections, it wouldn't be as big as a story as it is.

Iowa

David Yepsen warns that Iowa's 4th district race is tightening. LINK

New Hampshire

Republican Senate nominee John Sununu and Democratic Gov. Jeanne Shaheen were "testy" in last night's debate, and the estimable Dante Scala of St. Anselm College doesn't see a quick rapprochement. LINK

New Hampshire is preparing for an onslaught of get-out-the-vote efforts. The Portsmouth Herald looks at NARAL's plans for the state (and mentions their expected efforts in Colorado, Georgia, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, North Carolina, Oregon and Texas).

It's not rocket science or even fuzzy math why NARAL chose New Hampshire: a strong Democratic woman candidate is running in a tight race where more than 16 percent of voters who turn out (according to NARAL) have identified themselves as pro-choice voters, first and foremost. LINK

Arkansas

Senator Tim Hutchison (R) chose last night's debate to argue that obstructionist Senate Democrats refused to confirm qualified judges. From the write-ups, Democratic nominee Mark Pryor scored more points by urging Hutchison to stop "blaming" and start explaining. Also last night: those Reform Voter Project ads were a subject of discussion, no doubt making proprietor David Donnelly a happy man. LINK

REV_00266226

Bob Smith

FULL TIME PAS POSITIONS IN NATIONAL SECURITY
10/02/02

538439
FG006-77

Ambassador positions:

Organization for Economic Development and Cooperation
European Union
UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization)

Department of Homeland Security:

Assistant Secretary positions to be determined in the area of:

Intelligence and Information Analysis
Chemical, Nuclear, Biological Countermeasures
Emergency Response and Preparedness
Other administrative (CFO, GC, IG, HR)
President's Homeland Security Advisory Council (PA PT)

NASA:

Chief Financial Officer

Defense:

Assistant Secretary for Army Civil Works

USAID:

Director of Democracy (SES)

State:

Assistant Secretary for International Narcotics and Law Enforcement

Energy:

Under Secretary for Nuclear Security
Administrator, National Nuclear Security Administration
Deputy Under Secretary, National Nuclear Security Administration

Records Management, White House Office of (ORM)
Subject Files

FE006-27
(Office of Senior Advisor - Karl Rove)

538440

OA/NARA #: 107446/10804
9722

Box
Folder

REV_00266230

2018-0011-P [ ]

Systematic Processing Marker

This is not a textual record. This Systematic Processing Marker indicates that material has been removed during systematic processing by George W. Bush Presidential Library staff.

Stack:	Row:	Sect.:	Shelf:	Pos.:	FRC ID:	Location or Hollinger ID:	NARA Number:	OA Number:
11	4	6	2		9722		10804	10746

Folder Title:
ORM
FG006-27
538440

538440
FG006-27

Karl Rove <KR@georgewbush.com>
10/10/2002 04:28:58 PM

Record Type: Record

To: Susan B. Ralston/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:
Subject: Fw: FYI

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld (www.BlackBerry.net)

Please send all replies to kr@georgewbush.com

-----Original Message-----
From: MRacicot - Bracepatt <MRacicot@bracepatt.com>
To: Karl Rove <KR@georgewbush.com>
Sent: Thu Oct 10 14:18:01 2002
Subject: FYI

CQ MONITOR NEWS

Montana GOP Senate Nominee Suspending Campaign
By Adam Graham-Silverman, CQ Politics Reporter

Oct. 10, 2002 - Montana Republican Senate nominee Mike Taylor plans to announce Thursday that he is suspending his campaign against incumbent Democrat Max Baucus, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

In a news conference in Helena, Mont., Taylor was expected to cite the tone of the campaign as the reason he is halting campaign operations.

The state Democratic Party began running an ad this week that accused Taylor of lining his pockets with money from a student loan program at a hair design school he ran.

Campaign spokesman Bowen Greenwood told The Associated Press that Taylor believes the ad, which includes videotape of Taylor from the 1980s in which he is wearing an open-front shirt and gold chains while massaging a man s face, was an attempt by Democrats to portray him as a homosexual.

"At this point, in order to win, Mike would have to stoop to their level," Greenwood said.

The move fueled speculation that another candidate, such as Marc Racicot, a highly popular former governor who is now chairman of the Republican National Committee, could replace Taylor. Last year, Racicot refused to run for the Senate, despite pleas from top Bush> administration officials and national GOP leaders.

New Jersey Democrats succeeded in replacing embattled Sen. Robert G. Torricelli with former Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg on their Nov. 5 ballots, surmounting a GOP legal challenge that was turned back by the U.S. Supreme Court Oct. 7.

Under state law, Taylor, a state senator who made a fortune with his hair care products and school, can get off the ballot only by petitioning the state Supreme Court, but the situation is differs from New Jersey in several ways. Ballots already have been printed for the race and early voting began Sept. 20.

Write-in candidates, however, can file up to 15 days before the election, leaving an small opening for a challenger to Baucus.

One GOP source said that an effort to substitute Racicot was not behind Taylor s decision.

"I am not aware of anybody actively reaching out to Racicot about the race," the source said.

The Republican National Committee declined to comment on Racicot s interest in the race.

Despite Montana s Republican lean, Baucus has led in recent polls and in the money chase. He often cites his work with President <Bush> on his signature <tax cut law (HR 1836 - PL 107-16) and on Montana issues.

The Democratic ad cites Department of Education letters to Taylor and claims he caused students to default on their loans.

Taylor s wife took responsibility for what she called "clerical errors" that resulted in the letters from the department, but denied that Taylor was involved in a scam to bilk students.

Source: CQ Monitor News

538446
FG006-17

Karl Rove <KR@georgewbush.com>
10/10/2002 04:30:48 PM

Record Type: Record

To: Susan B. Ralston/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:
Subject: Fw: taylor's statement

Run and bring in

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld (www.BlackBerry.net)

Please send all replies to kr@georgewbush.com

-----Original Message-----
From: WHF <whf@nrsc.org>
To: Ken Mehlman <kmehlman@georgewbush.com>; Karl Rove <KR@georgewbush.com>
Sent: Thu Oct 10 16:31:00 2002
Subject: Fw: taylor's statement

Fyi montana

Bill Frist

-----Original Message-----
From: Wolfe, Ginny <GWolfe@nrsc.org>
To: WHF <whf@nrsc.org>
Sent: Thu Oct 10 15:33:28 2002
Subject: taylor's statement

Taylor made the following statement at a press conference in his headquarters in Helena, MT:

Perhaps foolishly, I believed that a god fearing common person that worked hard and honest could be anything he wanted to be in America. I ran for the U.S. Senate because I wanted to help Montana families, America, and our President. I believed in the American dream.

Now I knew that this was a tough hill to climb - especially since my opponent raised more money from out of state special interests than any other U.S Senator in history. But we kept hoping that with the White House, and the RNC under Marc Racicot, we could take that steep hill.

I understood and accepted the fact that politics in Montana is a contact sport. I actually welcomed the rough and tumble ... the clashing of ideas and visions for the future.

I'd seen the ads where Nancy Keenan and Denny Rehberg exchanged shots about each other's voting record. I'd seen the ads where Conrad Burns and Brian Schweitzer traded jabs over prescription drug ideas. And sure, they were all hard hitting.

But not lies. And never personal slanders of the vilest kind.

I simply never thought that my opponent would run television ads that lied, assassinated my character, and mislead the people of Montana (see the following documentation).

And not in my wildest dreams did I ever imagine that a sitting U.S. Senator of 28 years would sanction the use of 20-year-old pictures of me for the most despicable of insinuations about my character.

My opponent has blanketed the airwaves with loathsome distortions of the truth, and called it a campaign. I talked - always - about votes, about plans for the future, and about ideas. I thought it would be enough. I was wrong.

With his millions of out-of-state special interest money, he has turned me into a lightning rod, drawing criticism not just to me, but to my party and even my beloved state. The lies about me made national news on Tuesday - he has smeared my good name so badly that regrettably I draw unfavorable reviews of Montana.

All of this over a picture of me that's untrue - the furthest thing from the truth.

Perhaps I may be able to repair the damage my opponent has inflicted upon my good name and that of my family, but at what price? I would have to blanket the airwaves with slime more thoroughly than he. I will not.

I will not.

If that's what it takes to win, it is a victory not worth the winning. I think I would make a good Senator. But I know I'd make a bad liar. I will not be like him.

And so today I stand before you today prepared to set aside my dream of serving Montanans in the United States Senate, for someone of impeccable character and integrity ... someone yet un-poisoned by my opponent's venom .... someone with the stature to enter this race as a write- in candidate who could win and put an end to my opponent's vicious, self-serving ways once and for all.

I am willing to step down in favor of a man or woman who will have a better chance than I to return decency to our seat in the United States Senate.

I am willing to do this, not because my ideas have been tried and found wanting, but because they've been shouted down with slander and left untried.

I've thought about little else, day and night. And I've talked to my wife at great length, because I know how she loves me and how forceful she gets when our family's reputation is unjustly impugned.

I am willing to suspend my campaign because my opponent's lies about me are hurting my wife, my family, my friends, my party and most of all Montanans from all walks of life. Were it just me, and there was no one else in a better position to win, I would stay and absorb the blows. I would stand and let him hit me believing that sooner or later the truth would prevail. But there is so much more at stake. Montanans young and old are suffering and so to is our national image.

I cannot let this go on, without giving Montanans an option ... a reason to hope that there is a candidate out there who - with their massive outpouring of support - could overcome this sea of sleaze from my opponent. The notion that Montana deserves a U.S. Senator who will always put Montana first rather than just in election years deserves a fair hearing, not a mud bath.

I know that my departure would only temporarily dash the hopes of many generous, giving donors ... hardworking, dedicated volunteers ... people who lent me their good names and reputations.

To them I say: Please understand that we must offer this option for the sake of all Montanans. Your efforts are exemplary - beyond compare. No candidate has ever had better allies. Your friendship and support will be the shining memory that I take from this race, which my opponent's lies can never sully.

To Rick Allen in Kalispell, Mary Jolley and Brent Stanghelle in Great Falls, John Rush in Helena, Jim and Jan Helgason in Billings, to all the women in Gallatin County, and a hundred others I could name if you'd give me enough airtime, I say more than just thank you. I say that the state of Montana owes you a debt for your diligent efforts to keep this race on a high note.

To all of you who helped, I will always be in your debt. Now let's look to the horizon and prepare to embrace the candidate who's out there who we pray will rise to the occasion and make history of which all Montanans will be proud for generations to come.

Karl Rove <KR@georgewbush.com>
09/20/2002 11:35:05 PM

Record Type: Record

To: Susan B. Ralston/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:
Subject: Fw: october 11th

Run off and put with his incoming letter

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld (www.BlackBerry.net)

Please send all replies to kr@georgewbush.com

-----Original Message-----
From: Karl_C._Rove@who.eop.gov <Karl_C._Rove@who.eop.gov>
To: Karl Rove <KR@georgewbush.com>
CC: Susan_B._Ralston@who.eop.gov <Susan_B._Ralston@who.eop.gov>
Sent: Fri Sep 20 15:49:03 2002
Subject: october 11th

---------- Forwarded by Karl C. Rove/WHO/EOP on 09/20/2002 03:50 PM

(Embedded image moved Ashley Estes to file: 09/20/2002 03:13:23 PM pic01051.pcx)

Record Type: Record

To: Kara G. Figg/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc: Karl C. Rove/WHO/EOP@EOP
Subject: october 11th

rev. james and betty robison have asked to come see the president while they are in town that day. he said ok... this is like the 7th time they've asked.

kr - do you have any issues with this? he keeps talking about his book and said that you gave a copy to the president? Sent to Gift Unit

538440
FG006-27

Comments to Keith @ 11:10 pm

Keith Hennessey
10/07/2002 10:30:47 AM

Record Type: Record

To: See the distribution list at the bottom of this message

cc:
Subject: fact sheet

All recommended edits have been incorporated.

I'm looking for final signoff from Dan and Karl on this document.

Chao goes at 11. I'm getting them to send me her latest draft now, including our suggested edits, I hope.

Gene Scalia will do a "technical briefing" off-camera at 11:30 AM.

-kbh

---------- Forwarded by Keith Hennessey/OPD/EOP on 10/07/2002 10:23 AM ----------

Keith Hennessey
10/07/2002 10:28:18 AM

Record Type: Record

To: Joel D. Kaplan/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:
Subject: fact sheet

taft-hartley fact sheet.do

Message Sent To:

Daniel J. Bartlett/WHO/EOP@EOP
James R. Wilkinson/WHO/EOP@EOP
Karl C. Rove/WHO/EOP@EOP
Susan B. Ralston/WHO/EOP@EOP
Krista L. Ritacco/WHO/EOP@EOP

ADMINISTRATION TAKES ACTION TO PROTECT AMERICA'S ECONOMY AND AMERICAN JOBS

PRESIDENTIAL ACTION

- Faced with a growing threat to the American economy and American jobs, the President today used his statutory authority under the Taft-Hartley Act to convene a Board of Inquiry to examine the work stoppage at the West Coast ports. A Board of Inquiry is part of a framework established by Congress to address labor disputes that threaten national health and safety.

- The dispute is a threat to America's national health and safety. The health of our economy in every corner of America is in jeopardy because of the dispute. In many areas of the economy layoffs have begun, thousands more jobs may be lost, and all Americans may soon begin to pay sharply higher prices for household goods.

- Each shipping container at these ports holds a part of the national economy – from produce to computers, spare auto parts to lumber, consumer electronics to grain and wheat. Any household good sold on a store shelf can be found in these containers.

- The dispute is estimated by some to be costing America's economy as much as $1 billion a day:

  - ✓ West Coast ports are crucial to US trade, handling over $300 billion in trade a year. These ports handle more than half of all containerized imports and exports.

  - ✓ West Coast ports handle 25 percent of all US grain exports, 40 percent of all wheat, 14 percent of all corn, and seven percent of all soybeans exports.

  - ✓ Sixty-five percent of all US containerized food trade moved through these ports in 2001.

  - ✓ Layoffs have already begun in multiple industries around the country.

  - ✓ Millions of dollars in produce, fish, meat and poultry are rotting on docks and ships.

  - ✓ Trade with Asia is particularly affected. Japan, Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, China, Indonesia, Thailand, the Philippines, India, and Malaysia are the top 10 destinations for containerized US agriculture products. Together, these nations receive 85 percent of all agricultural shipments from the West Coast.

  - ✓ The costs to the economy become larger and more permanent the longer the ports remain closed.

  - ✓ Improvements in supply chain management mean that shipping delays quickly translate into empty store shelves and cancelled orders.

  - ✓ Air cargo carrier rates are increasing dramatically, increasing the retail cost of those goods shipped by air.

  - ✓ October is a critical inventory-building month for retailers: the value of imports through West Coast ports is greater in October than in any other month of the year. If the ports remain closed, revenues from the holiday shopping season will soon be affected.

  - ✓ As the duration of the shutdown increase, more manufacturers and retailers will use up their remaining inventory. Trucks and trains transporting goods to and from the ports are backing up – the longer the shutdown continues, the more time it will take for shipping to return to normal.

- ✓ Reopening the ports, even if only for 80 days, will benefit the economy. The parties will be given time to settle the dispute. Manufacturers and retailers will be given additional time to adjust and prepare.

- ✓ Manufacturing is only barely beginning to recover from the recent recession, having lost nearly 1.9 million jobs in the last two years. Manufacturing cannot afford further jolts.

- ✓ With modern inventory techniques and the increased integration brought by globalization, shutting off much of our trade with Asia will affect not just large importers and producers, but also the tens of thousands of smaller U.S. firms that supply directly-affected firms.

Three times as much of the U.S. economy is now directly related to trade as was the case in 1971, the last time the United States had a major West Coast port stoppage.

- The employment consequences of a continued shutdown would fall hardest on those with the least economic opportunity – workers with less job seniority are likely to be laid off first, and low-income families may have little savings to weather the effects of a shutdown.

- The dispute has implications for national defense. The American military relies on commercial ships using the West Coast ports to carry exports necessary for the support of armed forces. In addition, defense contractors receive components and materials through the West Coast ports that are necessary to supply the military's needs. The disruption of the flow of such military-related goods could impact national security.

- The Taft-Hartley process is the government's principal legal means of addressing a labor dispute that could have a devastating national impact. The government first sought mediation as an alternative solution to this dispute. Since the beginning of the dispute, the government has made itself available to help both parties resolve their differences. The Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service (FCMS) has been on the ground seeking a solution since before the work stoppage began. However, the mediation process has not been successful, and the President has decided to take action in order to protect America's national health and safety.

THE ISSUE

West Coast ports have been closed since the second shift on Sunday, September 29, when the Pacific Maritime Association (PMA) shut down the ports in response to a reported work slow-down by members of the International Longshore and Warehouse Union (ILWU).

WHAT HAPPENS NEXT

Step 1: The President's Executive Order

The President's Executive Order establishes a Board of Inquiry. The Executive Order states that:

- A labor dispute exists;

- The dispute affects a substantial part of the maritime industry, an industry engaged in trade, commerce, transportation (including the transportation of military supplies), transmission, and communication among the several States and with foreign nations; and

- A continuation of this lockout will imperil the national health and safety.

The law states that the President may begin the Taft-Hartley process if he determines that the labor dispute issue "will imperil the national health and safety." The President has determined that the short-term and long-term damage to our economy and our national health and safety constitute such a threat.

The President has appointed the following three Board of Inquiry members:

- Bill Brock (Chairman) – Served as a member of the House of Representatives from 1963 to 1971, as a U.S. Senator from Tennessee from 1971 to 1977, and as U.S. Trade Representative and Secretary of Labor from 1985 to 1987. Currently Chairman of Bridges Learning Systems, an intervention program for academically troubled students

- Patrick Hardin – W. Allen Separk Distinguished Professor of Law, University of Tennessee College of Law. A former Chief Counsel to the Chairman and Associate General Counsel in charge of the Division of Enforcement Litigation of the National Labor Relations Board, Professor Hardin has been on the faculty of the University of Tennessee since 1975. Editor-in-chief of The Developing Labor Law (3rd ed.)

- Dennis R. Nolan – Webster Professor of Labor Law, University of South Carolina School of Law. Professor Nolan has been on the faculty of the University of South Carolina since 1974. Currently serves as Vice President of the National Academy of Arbitrators. Author of eight books and numerous articles on arbitration, collective bargaining, and labor disputes.

The President has chosen these three individuals for the Board because they are unbiased, fair and experienced at labor and employment issues.

Under the Taft-Hartley process, the Board's job is to inquire into the issues involved in the dispute and issue a public report that outlines the facts of the dispute – including each party's statement of its position. However, the law prevents the Board from making any recommendations or choosing sides in the dispute. The Board may only state the facts.

The Executive Order requires the Board to report back to the President by no later than October 8th.

Step 2: Petition for Injunction

After the President receives the Board's report, he may then direct the Attorney General to seek a court injunction to halt the work stoppage. To receive this injunction, the Government must establish that the dispute affects a substantial part of an entire industry and imperils the national health or safety.

If the court issues the legal injunction against further work stoppage, an 80-day clock begins, the ports would open, and employees would return to work.

Step 3: Reconvening the Board of Inquiry

After 60 days, if no agreement has been reached, the Board is required to issue a second public report to the President that includes:

- The current positions of the parties involved;
- The efforts which have been made for settlement;
- A statement by each party of its position; and
- A statement of the employers' (PMA) last offer of settlement.

Step 4: NLRB Secret Ballot Vote

Between days 61 and 75, the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) will conduct a secret ballot vote of ILWU employees on the PMA's last offer of settlement. The NLRB is required to certify the results to the Attorney General no later than five days thereafter.

At the end of the 80-day period the legal injunction is discharged. If the dispute is unresolved, and if ILWU employees have rejected the PMA's final offer in the NLRB secret ballot vote, the parties become free to engage in work stoppages again.

Step 5: President Reports to Congress

The law requires the President to send a final report to Congress on the entire Taft-Hartley process. The report may include further recommendations on how to resolve the labor dispute.

THE THREAT TO AMERICA'S NATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

The President is taking this first step to protect our economy because the West Coast port dispute is causing serious damage to multiple industries and putting thousands of American jobs in jeopardy. This growing economic damage constitutes a threat to America's national health:

- Ford Motor Co. has 14 plants -- 10 assembly plants and four power train plants -- that receive parts from affected ports in Seattle and Tacoma, Wash., and Long Beach, Calif. The assembly plants that receive parts are Atlanta Assembly, Chicago Assembly, Kansas City Assembly, Louisville Assembly, St. Louis Assembly, Ontario Truck, Twin Cities Assembly, the Edison, N.J. assembly plant, the Norfolk, Va. assembly plant and an assembly and stamping plant in Hermosillo, Mexico. The power train plants affected are Cleveland Engine No. 2, Dearborn Engine, the Sharonville, Ohio, transmission plant and Van Dyke Transmission in Sterling Heights. (Detroit Free Press, October 5, 2002)

- New United Motor Manufacturing Inc. (NUMMI) of Fremont California has run out of material for their production line and has been forced to lay off two shifts, about 5,100 employees. They were told to take two days off. NUMMI builds the Pontiac Vibe, Toyota Corolla, Voltz, and Tacoma pickups. Honda of America Manufacturing is resorting to airlifting critical parts from Japan. (Automotive News, October 4, 2002 and reports to Maritime Administration)

- Matsushita Kotobuki, which manufactures televisions and VCRs for Panasonic, has had to stop production. They have laid off 150 workers in Vancouver, Washington. They could be rehired in one to two weeks. (KOIN, October 4, 2002)

- Hawaiian Express Service, a freight forwarder in Hayward, California, laid off 100 employees Friday. (The Mercury News, October 6, 2002)

- A shipment of blankets, clothing, and medical supplies destined for hurricane victims in Haiti has been stuck in Lynnwood, Washington, since Monday. And a container of similar supplies for Nicaragua is backed up on a rail car destined for Long Beach. (Heraldnet, October 5, 2002)

- Tyson, the world's largest meat producer, said it might have to adjust production in its beef, pork and poultry operations because the fresh meat it exports is perishable. More than half of the country's beef, pork and lamb export products go through West Coast ports, according to the U.S. Meat Export Federation. George's Inc., a poultry and egg company based in Springdale, also is being affected. (Arkansas Democrat Gazette, October 3, 2002)

- If the shutdown lasts even another week or two, it could take more than a month to unsnarl the backlog of idled or ruined goods -- a delay that could torpedo the holiday sales plans of a variety of retailers. Within three weeks, the shutdown could force companies around the country to jettison nearly a quarter-million jobs. (Contra Costa Times, October 2, 2002)

- Eastern Washington farmers and others shipping perishable goods are particularly anxious because the dispute comes during apple and potato harvests. Washington, on average, exports one of every three apples picked in the state, and it's the biggest exporter of french fries in the world. Apples farmers must get off to a quick start in the fruit selling season, said Richard Thomason, who grows red, granny smith, fuji and honey crisp apples on 120 acres in Brewster. If buyers can't find Washington apples, they will simply turn to other suppliers, he added. "I think agriculture is probably going to take the biggest hit on this thing," Thomason, chairman of the Washington Apple Commission, said yesterday. – Seattle (WA) Post-Intelligencer, October 2, 2002

- Nissan North America eliminated the Saturday shift at its 6,000-employee plant in Smyrna, Tenn., and will soon shut down if the port lockout continues. The Smyrna plant manufactures almost 500,000 Altimas, Xterra SUVs, and Frontier pickups each year. (Buffalo News, October 5, 2002)

- No. 1 U.S. railway Union Pacific Corp. said the stoppage was cutting sales by as much as $5 million a day. The Consumer Electronics Association, whose members include Microsoft Corp., said a prolonged lockout could cut consumer electronics sales by $22-billion this year. – Financial Post, October 5, 2002

- Food is rotting in cargo holds, and railroads have halted grain shipments from the Midwest. Wheat futures dropped sharply Thursday on the Chicago Board of Trade as concerns rose that the lockout would hurt U.S. grain exports. (Associated Press, October 5, 2002)

- Elope Inc., a hat wholesaler in Colorado Springs, Colo., usually does brisk business this time of year. "We've already lost the Halloween business. It's Christmas I'm worried about now," said company chief executive Kevin Johnson. "If this isn't resolved in the next week, we're dead in the water." (Associated Press, October 5, 2002)

- Layoffs may begin Friday for 15 full-time employees at Quality Trading, one of the largest straw exporters in Oregon. Quality Trading is made up of 22 Willamette Valley farmers who cut, bale, store and ship straw to farmers in Japan, Taiwan and Korea. (Associated Press, October 5, 2002)

- Union Pacific, the nation's largest railroad, had 55 trains parked across the western United States, unable to move cargo. Grain shipments bound for export are sitting in warehouses and growers of perishable goods like apples and citrus worry that their harvests will not reach lucrative Asian markets. (Associated Press, October 4, 2002)

- At New United Motor Manufacturing Inc., half-assembled Toyota Corollas and Pontiac Vibes were sitting in limbo because the necessary engines, transmissions and vehicle frames were sitting in cargo holds at the Port of Oakland. (Chicago Tribune, October 4, 2002)

- California almond growers, who exported $662 million worth of almonds in 2000, said each day of the shutdown threatens their ability to serve Asian consumers preparing for holidays. (Chicago Tribune, October 4, 2002)

- "We're already in a crisis," said James McCranie, executive vice president of marketing at Seald-Sweet, a citrus growers' cooperative in Vero Beach, Fla. McCranie said the co-op had at least 30 containers trapped at West Coast terminals, the first shipment of a crop of grapefruit headed for Japan. The fruit, which is carried in refrigerated containers that have no independent power source, will quickly rot if not handled properly. "The problem is you have no confidence that your cargo is being properly refrigerated and there's no way to divert it," McCranie said. "It's perfectly fine fruit and could be sold in Washington or Oregon. He complained that shipping lines were not able to give any information about where the cargo was and in what condition. "For a perishable, it couldn't be worse." (Journal of Commerce, October 4, 2002)

- Bill Ciesinski, manager of transportation and logistics at International Forest Products in Foxboro, Mass. said that the lock-out had brought some of his business to a halt. IFP had begun to load 6,000 metric tons of woodpulp aboard a ship in Eureka, Calif. just prior to the port shutdown. Ciesinski said his company was paying detention for the ship, hoping for a quick resolution of the dispute. "I'm holding the ship there because if I don't load it, I have to wait another month," he said. He also has had shipments of waste papers delayed. "It's jeopardizing letters of credits and if it is not settled by Sunday, we are going to lose a significant number of orders," he said. (Journal of Commerce, October 4, 2002)

- Phoenix-based Action Performance (ATN), a maker of die-cast model cars, was hit the day shippers locked out dock workers, on Sunday. The company had a shipment of thousands of model cars that were supposed to be unloaded that day so Action could record a sale before the quarter's end. The cars, however, didn't make it off the ship, so the company had to issue notices saying it wouldn't book $5.7 million in expected revenue for the quarter. That caused Action's stock to slide $1.10 to $19.90 Thursday, a 5.2 percent drop. (CBS Marketwatch.com, October 4, 2002)

- Reports are coming in that such companies as Chiquita Brands (CQB) and Del Monte (DLM) were having to leave perishable goods on docks. Those companies, along with Dole (DOL), are expected to feel the effects. (CBS Marketwatch.com, October 4, 2002)

- California's sole auto plant halted production of Toyota Tacoma pickups and stopped making passenger cars before the end of the normal shift. (Memphis TN Commercial-Appeal, October 3, 2002)

- Gap Inc., the nation's largest clothing retailer, was hoping to receive its first shipment of apparel intended for the holiday season when the port shutdown began last Friday. (Newhouse News Service, October 3, 2002)

- Retailers might not be able to get enough toys made in China in time for the holiday season. Electronics and technology companies won't be able to get television or computers assembled in the Pacific Rim, or parts for electronics they make in factories here. Foreign automakers won't be able to import cars or trucks made overseas, or the parts for cars they made domestically. (Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 2, 2002

-end-

538440
FG086-27

EXEC. OFC. PRESIDENT
WH STRATEGIC INI.
2002 OCT 10 PM 7:17

THE VICE PRESIDENT
WASHINGTON

September 25, 1992

Mr. Ernest A. Whiting, Jr.

PRA 6

Dear Ernest:

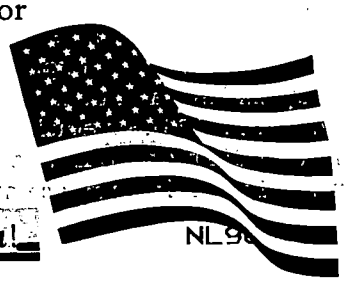
Thank you very much for your letter regarding concerns about our government and the threat posed to our nation by the loss of respect for traditional values of faith, family and morality. I understand and share your concerns, and I appreciate your views.

Love for God, family, neighbor and country has always been the source of our strength and goodness as a nation, and the decline of traditional values is cause for grave concern. This decline is directly responsible for many of the social ills that our country faces today.

I want to assure you that President Bush and I are deeply committed to upholding traditional American values, and we will continue such efforts as restoring protection for the unborn, combatting pornography, and supporting voluntary prayer in our public schools. It is encouraging to hear from citizens like you who recognize the need to renew the values that are our greatest heritage as Americans.

Thank you again for taking the time to write me.

Sincerely,



Dan Quayle

Dan Quayle

REV_00266248

E.O. 13166 Regulations Now in Our Public Schools

TO: Jim Boulet, Jr., Executive Director
English First
8001 Forbes Place, #102
Springfield, VA 22151

FROM:

God Bless America!

Mr. Ernest A. Whiting, Jr.
PRA 6

English First was established in 1986 and is recognized by the Internal Revenue Service as a 501(c)(4) non-profit organization to help Congress establish language policies that would preserve our common language. Contributions or gifts to English First are not deductible for federal income tax purposes. A copy of our annual report is available for inspection at our office or can be mailed to you upon written request. West Virginia residents may obtain a summary of the registration and financial documents from the Secretary of State, State Capitol, Charleston, WV 25305. The official registration and financial information of English First may be obtained from the Pennsylvania Department of State by calling toll-free, within Pennsylvania, 1-800-732-0999. Florida residents may obtain a copy of the official registration and financial information of English First (Registration number SC-02949) from the Division of Consumer Services by calling toll-free, within the state, 800-HELPFLA.

While the President has been busy fighting the war against terrorism, Clinton holdovers in the Departments of Education and Health and Human Services continue to push Bill Clinton's radical anti-English agenda. It is time for the Bush Administration to hear our side of the story on E.O. 13166.

☑ It's outrageous! I can't believe President Bush didn't get rid of Clinton's radicals who are now undermining any efforts to restore the unity of a common language that our nation so urgently needs today.

☑ I support English First's efforts to continue the battle against E.O. 13166 until we have convinced the Bush Administration to repeal it and restore the unity that made America great.

☑ I will send the enclosed postcards to the President; to Congressman Dan Burton, Chairman of the House Committee on Government Reform; and to Congressman Ernest Istook, a member of the House Appropriations Committee, urging them to repeal E.O. 13166; investigate the activities of the Clinton holdovers and cut off funding to any agency that enforces E.O. 13166.

☑ Enclosed is my contribution so that English First can push even harder to resolve our language crisis while we still have a chance to reunite all Americans behind our common language.

☐ $20 ☐ $35 ☐ $50 ☐ $100 ☐ $250 ☐ $500 ☐ $1,000 ☑ Other $ 30.00

Please make your check payable to English First. Thank you!

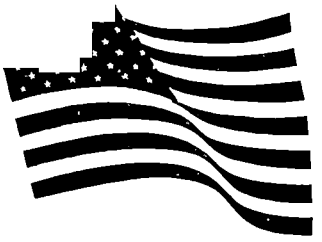
☑ Check enclosed ☐ Please charge my:
☐ VISA ☐ MasterCard ☐ American Express ☐ Discover card

Card # _____ Exp. Date _____

Signature _____



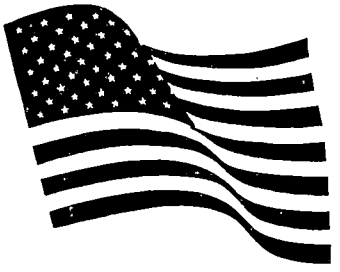
☐ Check here if you have added English First to your will.

Thank You For Your Continued Support!

REV_00266249

SFC Ernest A. Whiting, Jr.

PRA 6

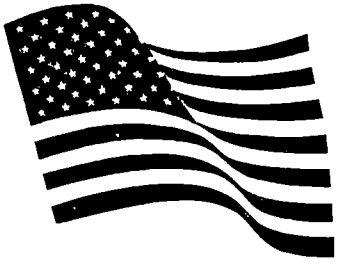


God Bless America!

The Honorable George W. Bush
The President
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W.
Washington, DC 20500

SFC Ernest A. Whiting, Jr.

PRA 6



God Bless America!

The Honorable Dan Burton
House Committee on Government Reform
2157 Rayburn House Office Building
Washington, DC 20515-1101

SFC Ernest A. Whiting, Jr.
U.S. Army Retired
1446 C Street SE
Washington, DC 20003

God Bless America!

The Honorable Ernest Istook
U.S.House of Representatives
Washington, DC 20515-1101

REV_00266250

Dear President Bush:

While you are dealing with a variety of pressing issues, there are Clinton holdovers within your Administration who are undermining your efforts.

English First, the national organization dedicated to making English our official language, has discovered a hotbed of anti-English activists at HHS OCR and believes there are other activists advancing Clinton's language rights goals throughout your Administration.

The most effective way to stop these activities is to rescind Clinton's Executive Order 13166 which makes choice of language a civil right. The 11th-hour Executive Order has already caused a lot of chaos and tremendous expense for communities, hospitals, government contractors and even schools and churches. Please repeal this dangerous order and take the time to clean out all of Bill Clinton's holdovers.

Sincerely,
Sfc Ernest A. Whiting, Jr., U.S. Army Retired

Dear Representative Burton:

As Chairman of the House Committee on Government Reform, I urge you to hold public hearings and use your powers of subpoena to compel people such as HHS OCR employees Robinsue Frohboese and Claudia Schlosberg to testify under oath regarding the abuse of their offices to advance a radical anti-English language agenda.

It is time the American people had the facts about this unethical conduct.

Sincerely,
Sfc Ernest A. Whiting, Jr.
U.S. Army Retired

Dear Representative Istook:

I urge you to add language to the Labor/HHS Appropriations bill forbidding HHS OCR from implementing the Tucson regulations anywhere else.

If it is possible, I would also urge you to cut off funding to this agency unless and until it ceases all efforts to implement E.O. 13166 regulations. This order is destroying the unity of our nation and costing the government billions in implementation. Thank you.

Sincerely,
Sfc Ernest A. Whiting, Jr.
U.S. Army Retired

Ari / Dan
538440
F 006.27

United Brotherhood of Carpenters & Joiners of America

Fax

To: Blalock
Rine
Nappo

To:	Ken Mehlman	From:	Chris Heinz File - Terror Ins
Fax:	202-456-6538	Pages:	2
Phone:	202-546-6206 x312	Date:	9/30/2002
Re:	Terrorism Insurance Letter	CC:

☐ Urgent ☐ For Review ☐ Please Comment ☐ Please Reply ☐ Please Recycle

101 Constitution Avenue, NW Washington DC 20001

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

Date: 10/10/02

To: ~~Dan Bartlett, Ari Fleischer~~

From: Strategic Initiatives Karl 10/10

X FYI

___ Appropriate Action

___ Direct Response

___ Prepare Response For My Signature

___ Per Our Conversation

___ Let's Discuss

___ Per Your Request

___ Please Return

___ Deadline

___ Other

Comments: _____